So we are going to find out if there is an action which is whole, sane, healthy, rational, and therefore holy. That is, why has thought invented an ideal? You understand? The ideal is the opposite of 'what is'. Right? Oh, come on! The ideal is in the future, 'what is' is actual. And I do not - one does not know how to deal with the actual, how to understand it, how to go beyond it, and therefore not being able to understand it he projects an ideal, which is fictitious, which is not actual. So there is the division between 'what is' and the ideal, and hence conflict. Thought, being fragmentary, is not capable of understanding 'what is' actually in the present. It thinks it will understand by creating an ideal, and trying to follow that ideal and therefore bringing more and more conflict. Right? But if one is capable of looking at the present, the actual, the 'what is', without the principle, without the ideal, without the observer who is the past - you are following all this - then you meet the actual. I will point this out. I will show it to you in a minute.

I have been told by the scientists that in observing the molecule or a cell, by merely observing it the very transformation is taking place in the cell. Some of you must know this, scientists and so on. By observing the molecule the very observation is changing it. I have been told this. Now can I, can one look at 'what is' without a prejudice? Pre-judgement. You understand? Prejudices means that, judging before. Right? Can you look at 'what is' without the observer who is the past? I wonder if you follow this? Look: one is envious, which is a common thing, unfortunately. Envious of people, you know what envy is, I don't have to describe it. How do you regard, look at that envy? Are you looking at it as an observer who is different from envy? You understand my question? Please, you look at it as though you are separate from envy, but the fact is you are envy. Right? You are not the observer who is different. The observer himself is that. So the observer is the observed. Right? This, please, this is really very important to understand. When you have grasped the truth of this, that the observer is the observed then that which is observed undergoes radical change.

What prevents a radical change of 'what is' is the interference of the observer, who is the past. Have you got it? Have you understood? Do please, this is significantly important because this removes altogether all conflict. We are educated to conform to the division of the observer and the observed, and the observer is trying to do always something about the observed. Right? He says, 'I am envious, I will find it reasonable to be envious if I am not envious what will happen in the society', or 'I must suppress it, rationalize it, or justify it'. Right? Which are all a process of conflict, but the actual fact is, the observer is the observed. Right? And therefore the division ends. And when there is observation only of the fact, the fact undergoes radical transformation. This is a scientific fact. You understand? When you are angry, which most people are, a form of violence, when you observe that you are angry, in that observation there is the observer who says, 'I must not be angry', or 'It is right to be angry' - isn't there? Right? You are following this? So there is a conflict between the observer and the observed. Right? Out of that conflict we have all kinds of violence and so on and so on. So can one live a life in which there is no conflict whatsoever? Which is to be perfectly sane. It is the unbalanced, the insane that are always in conflict. Right?

So one wants to find out a way of living in which there is no conflict, in which thought, which is the movement in time as measure, which creates division, and whether thought can realize its own limitation, and function where it is absolutely necessary, and not enter into the psychological field at all. Are you getting all this? No. No, please. You understand? Thought has created the psyche. Right? Do you understand that? Thought has built the psyche, the psychological states, which is me, my ego and all the rest of it. And thought is fragmentary, therefore what it has created, the 'me', is fragmentary. And then thought says, 'I must integrate with the whole' - which is an impossibility.

So there it is. And our consciousness is filled with the things of thought. Therefore our consciousness is fragmentary. So is there a consciousness which is not fragmentary? Do you understand my question? And can thought find it? You are getting it now?

Audience: Yes.

K: Good! By Jove, it takes a long time, doesn't it!

So can thought realize itself, that it is a fragment, and whatever movement it makes must be a fragment, fragmentary, and is there an action which is not fragmentary and which can only take place when the observer is the observed, and watching, that which is undergoes a radical change.

Now the next point is: is there a consciousness which is not put together by thought? You understand? First we have divided the universe as the 'me' and the 'you', 'we' and 'they', good and bad and evil and all the rest of it. We have divided it, which is thought has divided it. And then thought says to itself, is there a consciousness which is not put together by me? Right? Now how are you, a human being, going to find out if there is a consciousness which not put together by thought? Man has tried this for millennia. You understand? It isn't just now we are trying it. He has said there must be another consciousness which is not this kind of consciousness. And so he says, 'I must control thought'. Do you follow? 'There must be a system by which thought can be controlled'. Right? 'And then when thought is controlled, held, then perhaps I will know what the other is'. And this is the whole basis of meditation, whether Zen or other forms of meditation. Control thought. And they have never said, 'Who is the controller?' The controller is still the thought. I wonder if you see all this.

So, to find out, to come upon that which is not put together by thought, we not only have to understand the place of thought as knowledge - right? - and where thought has no place whatsoever - not suppressing it. Thought has a place as knowledge in our daily, superficial activities; when you drive a car you must know how to drive a car, you must know, if you work in a factory, and so on, how to write - you know, where knowledge is necessary. And it is only possible to give knowledge its right place when you have understood the whole nature of thinking. That is, psyche, the entity as the 'me', has been put together by thought - me, my virtue, my temperament, my desires, my ambitions, my peculiar idiosyncrasies, my experience as opposed to your experience. Those are all the result of thought. Right? And thought has its right place, otherwise you couldn't speak, you wouldn't be able to understand the English language. Right? Is this clear? That thought as knowledge has its right place, but it has no place in the psyche, which means, can the mind, can this whole structure of the psyche cease to be? Do you understand? Then only there is a totally different kind of consciousness - which you will never find through meditation. You understand? Even though you call it transcendental and all that nonsense. That word 'transcendental', you know it is a good word spoiled, by cheap meditation. Do you understand?

Therefore there is time in the right place, as movement of thought, measurement in the technological field, you must measure otherwise there is no technological activity at all, and all the things that thought has created is reality. Right? All the things that thought has put together is reality. But thought has not put together the mountain or the tree, but that is also a reality. Right? Please follow this carefully. All the gods, all the rituals, all the mischief that is being made in the world by thought is a reality - war is a reality, killing people is a reality, the violence, the brutality, the callousness, the destruction is a reality made by thought, put together by thought. And nature is not reality - is actuality but not put together by thought. Wait, go slowly. I'll show you something else. Right? All the things that thought has put together, including wars, violence, all that is a reality. The mountains, the trees, the rivers, the beauty of the sky is a reality but it is not put together by thought. Belief is a reality put together by thought but it is neurotic. You follow? The neuroticism is a reality. And truth is not reality. I wonder if you get this? Thought can never touch truth. Right? Then what is the relationship between truth and reality? Are you interested in all this? I don't know. You understand?

We have examined the nature of thought. We said thought is a material process, matter, because it is stored up in the brain, part of the cell, which is matter. So thought is a material process in time, in movement. And whatever that movement creates is reality: both the neurotic as well as the so-called fragmentary, they are realities. The actual is a reality, like the microphone. And also nature is a reality. So what is truth? Can thought, which is fragmentary, which is caught up in time, mischievous, violent, all that, can that thought find truth, truth being the whole, that which is sacred, holy? And if it cannot find it, then what place - or what is the relationship of thought, of reality to that which is absolute? You understand?

You know all this demands meditation. This is real meditation. Do you understand? Not the things imported into this country by the gurus. Whether consciousness, which is its content, can ever expand to include that consciousness of truth. Or this consciousness of the psyche, the 'me' with all its content has to end before the perception of what is truth. So one has to find out what is the nature of the psyche. Do you understand? Which has been put together by thought. What is me, to which one clings so desperately? The vanity, the arrogance, the desire to achieve, to become successful, you know be somebody. What is this, the nature of it? How has it come about? Because if that exists the other cannot be. You understand? If I am egotistic, in its total sense, not in parts, the fragmentary sense, totally, because one is totally self-centred. You may pretend but as long as that psychic centre exists truth cannot possibly be, because truth is the whole and so on and so on.

So how is the mind, the mind being all the senses, the emotions, the memories, the prejudices, the principles, the ideals, memories, experiences, the totality of that, which is the psyche, which is the me, how is that to end and yet behave in a world which is now? You understand? Is that possible? To find that out I must - one must go very deeply into the question of fear, the very complex problem of pleasure, because pleasure is very complex, fear is fairly simple, pleasure is what one demands; and the question of sorrow, whether sorrow can ever end. Man has lived with sorrow for millennia upon millennia. He hasn't been able to end it. And one must also go into the question of what is death. Because all - and love - all that is the matrix of the me. So this is a very, very serious affair. It is not just a thing to be played with. One must give one's whole life to understand this. To live in this world completely, sanely without the psyche - you understand - not escape, not go off into some monastery or commune, or this or the other, but to live here, in this mad, insane, murderous world where there is so much corruption, where politics are divorced from ethics and therefore there is corruption. To live in this world sanely, without the psyche, the 'me'. Do you understand? This is a tremendous question. That requires a mind that is capable, can think meticulously, correctly, objectively, having all your senses fully awakened, not drugged by alcohol, speed and all the rest of it. Do you understand what all this means? You must have a very healthy mind. And when it is drugged you haven't got a healthy mind - or smoking, drinking, all this destroys the mind, makes the mind dull.

So the next time we meet - what time is it?

Q: Five after.

K: The next time we meet, which will be next Saturday or rather there will be dialogue on Tuesday and Thursday. Next Saturday and Sunday we will go into the whole question of fear. When we go into questions of these kinds, fear, pleasure, you must end it, not carry fear with us afterwards. Whether there is an ending to fear, that is important to find out, not what to do with it, which we will come to. Whether it is possible for a human mind to have no psychological fears at all. And when there are no psychological fears then you will understand the physical fears, which are very simple to deal with. So when we are going into these questions, as we have done this morning, the whole problem of consciousness, its content, the psyche, whether one can live, a human being can live in this world without the psychological structure. I don't know if you have ever put that question to yourself. Probably you have not. If you put that question, don't answer by saying, 'We must all be one. We must love all people'. That is all just the movement of thought still. But to find out the way of living in which the psychological torment, all the movement doesn't exist at all. That requires tremendous examinations, accurate thinking. So when we discuss, talk over together next Saturday evening, please bear in mind that we go into it so that we end it that morning, completely. Because otherwise we just, you know, we play with things. Therefore this is a very serious affair. Right.

Are there any questions?

Q: What is your impression of the conclusion that truth is the correct perception of reality?

K: I didn't say that, sir. You are saying that.

Q: I am asking for your impression of that conclusion.

K: Truth is the correct impression of reality?

Q: Perception.

K: Would you mind repeating it once more.

Q: What is your impression of the conclusion that truth is the correct perception of reality?

K: Truth is the correct perception of reality. What is your impression of that conclusion. If it is a conclusion, it is not worth examining. No, don't laugh, please. If it is a conclusion, that is thought has examined it, and come to a conclusion, then whatever it has concluded is still within the realm of fragmentary thought. But perception of and giving reality its place, out of that perception comes perhaps, with all the implications of freedom, fear and so on, freedom from fear and so on, then truth is.

Q: When you talk you used the word 'image' very often. I would like a definition of it. I know the definition, I took a hypnosis class and the definition in the hypnosis class was an image is the ability to reproduce any of the five senses, taste and so on, without that sense being directly stimulated. So I can see the tree with my eyes closed. I would like to see if your definition of it coincides with this definition.

K: What is your definition of an image. I would rather not give definitions. One can look up in the dictionary and it says that it comes from the imagination, to imagine the tree. Right? To imagine what I think I am. To imagine that I want to be a great man, which are all the process of thought. You know, you have an image, a picture, about yourself, haven't you. No? Then why do you want a definition? Do you want to compare your definition with that of the speaker? Or do you want to compare the image - if the speaker has an image about himself - and see whether your image corresponds with that? No, what is important, it seems to me, is to find out for yourself if you have an image about yourself, why you have it, whether it is an actual reality, you understand, actual, or fictitious, whether put together by thought and therefore neurotic, and act according to that neurosis. You understand? So find out please for yourself if there is an image, a picture, a conclusion that you have about yourself.

Q: Can a fragmented mind do that?

K: Can a fragmented mind do that. Of course it can. Are you asking a much more complex question, which is: can thought be aware of itself? Right? Watch it. Look at yourself. Can your thought be aware of its thinking? No? Just a minute. Aren't you aware when you tell a lie? Aren't you aware of the beginning of a lie? Aren't you aware at the beginning of anger - if you have ever looked. If you are a little watchful. So thought can be aware of itself.

Q: In the observation of that is there a change?

K: In the observation of that is there a change. Is that your question?

Now we have to go into the question of observation. Do you observe without an idea? You know the word 'idea' means, the root meaning of the word 'idea' is to observe - not what we have made of it: I observe something, make an abstraction of it into an idea. Right? And I live according to that idea, not according to the fact. I don't know if you see this? So to observe implies no idea, no conclusion, no prejudice, that means no observer, who is the past. So to look without the observer, is that possible? Then only that which is observed undergoes a radical transformation. It is the observer that prevents transformation. I wonder if you have caught this. Because the observer is the past.

Q: The observation of thought not the observer, the observation of thought, is that thought observing itself? Or has it has transcended itself in the truth of observing thought?

K: Are you asking, sir, the observation of thought? How do you observe anything?

Q: Not with thought.

K: No, just go slowly and you will find out. When you say, 'I have observed', what you mean by that? In the observation are all your senses fully awakened? Or only you observe in a limited way? You understand my question? When you see the tree, which is part of the observation, are all your senses totally awake, then only you are seeing. But if you merely look with your eyes and the rest gone to sleep, then you are not observing. So to observe oneself: I want to know myself, what I am. I want to have a full knowledge of myself without any deceit, without evasion, to see actually what I am, not condemning it, or accepting, but to observe it. How do I do it? Do I observe it as an outsider looking in? You follow? Or there is no outsider but only observing? You understand? I wonder if you get this.

Q: If we have created an image of ourself and we lose that image, we are empty.

K: If we lose the image of ourselves we are empty. So you are filling yourself with a lot of things which are not real, which are just words. So when you remove the words - see what you are doing - when you remove the word, the name, the form, the furniture to which you are attached, you are nothing. So you are the furniture! No, please, see it. So you are frightened to lose the furniture and being nothing. See what you have reduced yourself to - that you are the furniture. Can you look at that fact? Observe that fact. Please do it now. You will see what takes place. You are attached to a furniture, husband, wife, whatever it is, attached. You are attached to something - thing. Are you aware of it, that you are attached? Then are you aware why you are attached? Because it gives you comfort, it helps you to escape from yourself, from your loneliness, from your boredom and so on and so on. So you are attached because of loneliness - suppose that is. Now look at that loneliness, observe it, not translate it saying, 'How ugly it is, how empty it is, how appalling, I am frightened' - just to observe it. Now if you observe it without the observer, which I have explained carefully, then that which is observed, which is loneliness, undergoes a radical transformation. It is the fear, which is the past, that prevents the radical transformation. Right?

I think that is enough, isn't it.

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 6TH APRIL 1976

Krishnamurti: A lovely morning, isn't it, probably you ought to be on the hills walking. We are going to have a dialogue. The word 'dialogue' comes from the Greek word logos, which means, words by which to express one's deep inner thoughts. Probably most of us don't want to go so deeply as that or expose ourselves too much but we could have a conversation, not dialectal which is argumentative, but rather a conversation in which we can share the problems however deep, and go widely and deeply into them. So this is not, if I may remind you, an argumentative dialectical conversation. That is, trying to find truth through opinions and arguments. I don't think one can ever come upon that. So we are going to, if we may this morning, spend an hour or so talking over some issue that is of vital interest.

Questioner: Education and may be the approach according to different ages.

K: The lady wants to discuss the question of education according to different ages.

Q: (Inaudible) God thought a tree and there was a tree, or God said, let there be light and there was light and I wonder if we could go into that problem of thought and what is often thought of as the absolute mind.

K: Could we also go into the question of the absolute truth or god or whatever name one likes to give to it and the hurt of everyday life.

Q: In the Bible it says, the wrath of god, the will of god, and it spoke almost as if god things.

K: In the Bible it says the wrath of god and so on, which implies god is thinking. I am sorry god is thinking - too bad! We will come to that. Do you want to discuss, talk over that?

Q: I want to discuss the problem of after you awaken the energy in you and your parents curse you and turn you out, and you have no friends, what do you do then, nowhere to sleep, nothing to eat?

K: When the parents get upset with you and turn you out and you have no place to go, no place to sleep, what is one to do.

Q: They didn't do this until I spoke of and told them that a certain energy had awakened in me.

K: Yes, I understand. So what is one to do.

Q: What is our function as a human being, why are we here, our function?

K: As a human being why are we here.

Q: Why do I desire a mate, why aren't I enough?

K: Oh, why does one desire a mate, why isn't one self-sufficient. Is that it?

Q: Why do you say one shouldn't escape from the world in which one lives actually and not escape into some monastic world?

K: I think that is enough. First of all you want to know what kind of education one should have in a school, not only in one's school, college and university, but throughout life, at whatever level one is at; and also you want to know, to talk over if there is a will of god, if there is the word of god, the wrath of god, so apparently god is thinking; then there is the question of when a person asserts himself with the parents or says something which he wishes the parents turn him out, no money, no place to sleep, what is one to do; and your question, why should one not live alone, be self-sufficient, one does one desire a mate. Now which of these questions do you think we should take, including yours, sir. No, please, I think they may be all related.

Q: How do we find the way to live?

K: I think if we could take one question, one issue and it may be that they are all related to each other - I think they are, because they are all human problems: being turned out of one's house, without money and food and shelter; and what kind of education one should have right through life, that means what is learning; and also if there is a god who thinks; and is it possible to be completely self-sufficient. I think they are all related, don't you, or not? So can we take one thing, which is learning. I think as we go along we will relate all these to that question - may we? What do you think is learning? Learning. That is - you know what the meaning of that word is - so what is learning? Why have human beings to learn and what to learn? What is the function of learning, why has education, whatever that may mean for the moment, why has it become so important in the world? Whether you go to India, the Middle East, or Japan or Russia or here, they are all being educated, going through the mill of education, the schools, colleges, if they are lucky and university; and then getting a job, getting married, settle down and having all the responsibility of a citizen, an honourable citizen or dishonourable citizen. So why are we being educated? No, please, why are you educated, if you are lucky enough to go to college and university, why?

Q: To accumulate information.

K: He says, accumulating information - for what? Please, go into it. Why should I accumulate information, what to do with it?

Q: I would like to learn to be free of prejudice.

K: We will come to all that. But first mustn't we find out why we are being educated, dozens and dozens and thousands of schools.

Q: To survive.

K: Go into it, don't just say one word, examine it, explore it. We are educated at the most expensive schools or the ordinary schools, why? Is it to conform to the pattern of society - please listen, find out - and become technicians in order to use what we know skilfully? Right? And earn a livelihood. That is one part of survival in a particular given society or culture. Right, that is part of that education. Which is, in a world that is becoming more and more over populated there must be more and more skilled people to do all kinds of things. And one is being educated to conform to that pattern. That's one side of it. And also in learning, what is taking place to the mind? In learning, acquiring information, learning a technique as a lawyer, business man, as a politician, as anything, learning a technique, what is happening to the whole structure of the brain, of the mind?

Q: It seems that it becomes fixed, or frozen.

K: Mustn't you have that?

Q: Yes, technically.

K: Technically you must have it. So what is the function of learning? You follow the question? I am a student, been to college and university, and I have acquired certain information, knowledge, stored up in memory and I use that memory skilfully in any job that I have to do, I specialize in whatever job, as a foreman, a labourer, whatever it is, as a lawyer, politician, a doctor and so on.

Q: The aspect of the brain is sharpened by functioning.

K: Yes, what takes place? Is that all my life? Is that all one's life? Are we educated in any other direction? You follow my question? We spend twenty or thirty years in acquiring a particular technological activity, learn all about it and disregard or neglect the totality of life. Right? Now we say, is that learning? When you emphasize one part of life, one segment of life, and learn all about it - how to earn bread and butter, to put it very simply - the other part totally disregard. That's what is happening. They don't disregard it but train you in certain beliefs, and dogmas - I am a Catholic, I am a Protestant, and all the rest of it. So is this education?

Q: No.

K: No, don't say, no. This is actually what is happening. If you had a son, if one had a son what is one to do in a world of this kind? You don't face the problem. You have children, if you educate them in only one area, small area of life and disregard the rest of it, you must have neurotic behaviour. Right? A life that is broken up, fragmented - no?

So then, what is learning and what is education when we think our children should be educated totally, all round? You have understood my question? I want him to understand not only technological things that he must know but also I want him to know beauty, I want him to know what his relationship is with nature, what his relationship is with human beings, what is death, what is love - you follow? - I want him to know the whole area of life. And no school teaches that. And therefore our problem becomes more and more complex because we don't know how to live but we only know the technological field. So what shall we do? So we have produced, our parents, grandparents, you and we, have produced a society, a culture, that says, learn that part, that segment of life, disregard the rest. What shall we do?

Q: Can a human being be educated in any other aspects besides technology?

K: Can there be education in the other areas of life. What do you mean by education? To be told, to be given information about the other areas of life? The psychologists are doing it, the anthropologists are doing it, the philosophers, so-called philosophers are doing it - is that what we call learning?

Q: Can education teach people how to learn and then apply?

K: We said that, sir, learn.

Q: Teach you how to learn, not to teach you facts, should not education teach you how to learn.

K: How to learn. That's what we are asking, how to learn. What does it mean, learning? I know we have to have facts about learning, I must learn how to drive a car from another, how to do this and so on. But can I know about myself, the vast area, from another? Please, this is a very important question. Can I learn - please - about not the technological area but the other areas of life from another, from the guru, from the psychologist, from the anthropologist, from all the Freuds and you know, can I learn from another?

Q: Perhaps the artist can help in that direction.

K: The artist. That means, can anybody help me to learn about myself? Come down to brass tacks - go on.

Q: I must first see that all of my education has been one of the accumulation of knowledge which has been passed down to me.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: If my education has been that then I should have learned about myself already, and I haven't, from another.

K: I am asking a much more serious question, sir, if you don't mind, do listen: I can learn medicine, doctors, surgery, how to drive a car and so on, the technology of all that, from another. Right? Can I learn about myself from Freud?

Q: No.

K: From psychologists? From gurus? From philosophers?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Please, just find out. If I learn from another, from a psychologist, am I learning about myself, or his interpretation about myself? You understand?

Q: He may point the direction so that you can look at yourself.

K: No, do try it, sir. I tell you to look at yourself in this way, in a particular way, and you try to follow my instructions about yourself. Does it mean then that you have learnt about yourself? Oh, this is such a simple question. Or must I learn how to look, not from another but learn what it means to look?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: First of all, sir, look: I am a human being, one is a human being, totally related to the rest of other human beings in the world. That's a fact. I am not an isolated entity, I am related to the rest of the world. And I can learn about myself by reading the book which is me, because I am the world. If I can read that book I don't have to go to anybody. Right? So how am I to learn to look at myself, which is the vast area which traditional education doesn't explore, traditional education doesn't help me. I wonder if you are getting all this. Are you following all this?

Q: Don't you have to have desire to learn first?

K: Mustn't one have the desire to learn. Do you have the desire to learn about yourself now, here? Would you be a little bit honest, if I may say so, and say, have you the desire, as the lady points out, to learn about yourself, not according to Freud, Jung, the latest psychologist, to learn about yourself because you are the world and the world is you, you are a human being totally related to all the rest of other human beings in the world, whether you like it or not. If you have a desire to learn, or the necessity, or the urgency and you see the importance of learning about yourself because if you don't know about yourself what can you know about life?

Q: Does the image of ourselves prevent us from looking at ourselves?

K: We are going to find out, we are going to find out how to look at ourselves, learn about ourselves.

Q: What is our reaction to stimulus around us?

K: My question, sir, as the lady put it, do we have the desire, or the urgency, or the necessity to see the importance that we must learn about ourselves? Do we have that urgency, or you just say, tell me all about it and I will take what parts I like and neglect what I don't like?

Q: It depends on how serious one is.

K: I am asking a very simple question.

Q: When you are confused you realize that we have that problem but we forget it. We are confused, we make mistakes, we don't know what's going on, then we have serious concern but most of the time we forget about it.

K: Look, I want to know about myself, so I must learn about myself, so I must find out what it means to learn. Right? And what it means to observe. There are two things involved in it: what it means to learn and what it means to observe. Or put it the other way round: what it means to observe and what it means through observation learning. May we go on from there? What does it mean to observe oneself? You understand, this vast area which has been neglected, which we have taken for granted, which is crowded with a lot of beliefs, prejudices, dogmas, and so on, I want to learn all about that. So I say, before I learn I must look. Right? Now how am I to look, what does it mean to look, the art of looking? You understand? The word `art' means to put everything in the right place, where it belongs, that's the meaning of that word art. The artist is one - please listen - not one who just paints pictures or write a poem - an artist is one who puts everything in its right place. So you are giving a new meaning to art, to an artist. You follow?

So the art of observation, what does it mean? How do I observe, not only myself, the world around me, the politicians, the businessman, the priest, the wife, the husband, the educator, you follow, how do I observe it?

Q: One must be receptive to what is actually there.

K: How do you observe things, sir? How do you look at that mountain?

Q: You look with your eyes, you see outside, but if you look with your mind, you look inwards.

K: We are coming to that. First how do you look at those mountains?

Q: You look with your eyes.

K: Of course, sir. You are sitting there with your eyes open and you see those mountains, that range of mountains. What is your reaction when you look at that?

Q: Silence.

Q: I would say you are not interested most of the time.

K: Sir, now you are looking at those mountains, what is your reaction?

Q: You are paying attention.

K: Out of that attention what is your reaction when you look at those?

Q: I don't think we ever have a reaction, at least very rarely, we are not even looking, I don't think.

K: That's it. Have you time to look at it? Do you, sitting there, say, wait I am going to look at those mountains and find out what my reactions are, what I see and use words by which you express that which you feel, which is a dialogue. What takes place when you look at those mountains? There is visual sensation, there is visual perception, there is sensation, isn't there. Then what takes place?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do look, sir, don't.

Q: You name it.

K: You name it. You say, that's a mountain. Right?

Q: The reaction would seem to pass.

K: Yes, sir, I know.

Q: Then you start working on it.

Q: You forget about it.

K: Look, sir, may I go into it? You look at that mountain, you see it, there is the reaction of beauty, the shadow, the depth, the line of it, the valleys and you say, that's a mountain. You verbalize it. Then, it is beautiful. Right? So when you are verbalizing it you have gone away from looking. Right? Oh, do please.

Q: We experience it.

K: Experiencing what? You are experiencing the mountain?

Q: No, our reaction to the mountain.

K: I give up!

Q: When I look at the mountain I see everything, but I don't judge what I see.

K: You just observe, don't you. In that observation when there is verbalization you have already moved away from observation, haven't you? This is so simple, isn't it? So can you observe without verbalizing, just to observe without naming? Now can you look at yourself, observe yourself without saying, good, bad, get depressed, just to observe.

Q: That's so much harder.

K: Don't make it hard or easy. Just do it! Please, this is not group therapy. I have a horror of group therapy, it is silly. So, please, this is not group therapy. What we are trying to find out is the art of learning. The art of observing - can I observe the tree, the things about me, around me, the act of politicians, what is going on in the world, observe there, and observe myself, see actually what I am without any interpretation, without judgement, just to look at myself. Which is, art means, as we explained, to put everything where it belongs, in its right place. So I look at myself, myself which is the complex structure of my human activity. You follow? My ambitions, my greed, my envy, my deceits, my arrogance, my double talk, at everything, I look. My tradition which says, there is god, and my tradition also says, there is no god. One part of me says, the whole ritual of churches and so on is nonsense, another part is frightened if I say that out, I might lose my job or I might get into difficulties. One part of me says, I must take drugs because everybody is doing it and they say you get experience, the most extraordinary things, and the other part says, don't be silly. And so on and on and on. Can I look at all these various complex activities in myself? Probably one never has done it. Right?

So what am I to do? What is there to learn? You are following? You haven't gone to sleep? Is this all too much of a morning, on a lovely morning?

Q: How does one know what the right place is?

K: How does one know which is the right place. That's a good question, isn't it? How is one to know to put things in their right place? He has asked me that question, I'll show you. I don't know. Wait. He asked me a question, how do you put everything where it belongs, correct, accurate place, he asked me that. And I say, I don't know. Please listen. I don't know but I am going to find out. You understand? I don't say, this is the right place, that's the wrong place, so my mind is free to find out, so I don't accept tradition, which is the right place, I don't follow the authority which tells me which is the right place. You follow? So I say, I don't know. So I begin to observe. I see there is a contradiction in oneself. Right? Now why is there a contradiction in oneself? As long as there is a contradiction you cannot find the right place, can you? Do please see a very simple fact like this. I don't know but I do know that I am in conflict. Right? So I say, as long as I am in conflict I will never know what is the right place. So I must find out why I am in conflict, what is conflict. And if the mind can ever be free from conflict, then I will put everything in the right place. You have understood? Because I said, I don't know - which is a fact - but I do know I am in conflict. And as long as I am in conflict there is no right place. Right? So what is conflict? Because that becomes much more important than what is the right place. Why is a human being in conflict? Because he is divided in himself, contradictory. Right? Now why is there contradiction? Are you enquiring with me or are you just listening? Why is there conflict?

Q: You are in conflict when you don't trust your feelings.

K: Your feelings also may be contradictory. I want one thing and I don't want another thing, my feeling says, eat more, and my mind says, don't eat more. So feelings can't be trusted.

Q: Intuition.

K: You haven't understood what I said. Intuition, that's one of the most dangerous things, isn't it?

Q: I am in conflict when I am dividing 'what is' from 'what should be'.

K: That's right. But we are educated, trained to 'what should be', so there is a contradiction. So as long as there is a contradiction I will not know what is the right thing to do. So I am in contradiction, therefore one is in contradiction. What is that, what is contradiction? Is it two opposing desires? Or opposing objects of desire? Or being uncertain I say one thing, and do another? You are following all this? So I say to myself, why does one live in contradiction. Why doesn't one live with `what is', not with `what should be', which is a contradiction. Why can't I live with actually `what is'? Do look at it. One is envious, live with it, not have the opposite - I mustn't be envious, it is immoral to be envious, or it is rational to be envious - live with it. We don't live with it because we don't know what to do with it. You understand? If you knew what to do with it then the opposite wouldn't exist. Have you understood?

Q: If you have a habit you can't learn about it if you are trying to change it - yes?

K: Look at it. If I have a habit, say of scratching myself, or twisting my fingers, something or other, look at it, be aware with all your senses, don't say, `I must not do that', that brings a conflict, that's a duality, that means conflict. Wait a minute. So we come to it, slowly we are learning, it is coming. Which is, as we do not know how to live with envy, what to do with it, we think we should get rid of it, or do something about it if we move away from it. Which is, not to be envious, the ideal of a human being who is not envious, who doesn't have any envy, that must be a marvellous state. So you move away from `what is', from the fact of envy. Right? When you move away from the fact of envy what takes place, when you don't move away what takes place?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do look at it, do look at it. You remember yesterday we were talking about the scientists are saying, some of them at least I have been told, that when you look at a cell through a microscope, as you are observing it is undergoing a transformation. Now we are saying, as you observe envy without its opposite - you understand - without trying to avoid it, rationalize it, just to look at it, the very process of observation is transforming the envy totally. Listen to it carefully, you will get it in a minute. That is - we'll keep to envy - when we have that feeling of envy we either rationalize it, justify it or condemn it. Right? Which is a division, isn't it. In that there is a conflict: the observer says, I must not be envious, the observer says, why shouldn't I be envious, in a world that is full of envy if I am not envious I will be destroyed. Or he avoids it. And so the observer says, I must do something about it. So there is a division between the observer and the fact of envy. When you look at the microscope without the observer, you understand, then that which is envious undergoes a radical change. And I'll show you why. Don't accept what I am saying, I am not your authority, I am not your guru, for god's sake. It undergoes a change because justification, condemnation or rationalization is a wastage of energy. Right? And when you don't waste that energy through that you have that energy, that energy transforms the fact of envy.

Look: I have a habit, twisting my fingers, you know most people have it, they can't keep still, they are doing something or other. Look at it, don't rationalize it, don't say, well other people do it, why shouldn't I do it - just watch it. Which means you are not wasting your energy by saying, other people do it, why shouldn't I do it, I have been used to that, let it go. But when you don't waste all that energy in rationalization, justification and so on, you have all that energy. Right? Then observe with that energy the twisting of the fingers. I wonder if you get it, if you don't it's up to you. Let's get on with it.

Q: The energy of habit is one thing, and the energy of observation is another. But the two energies are not different, are they?

K: They are the same, of course.

Q: It's not just the feeling that they are different.

K: Wait, let's keep to simple things. If you have understood this thing, this principle, that when you rationalize, justify or condemn you are wasting energy, the energy that is needed to observe 'what is'. Whether it is any kind of feeling, any kind of reaction, any kind of prejudice and so on.

Q: A man's action is if you are envious you want to say harsh words, he wants to...

K: Wait, I know all that, but extend a little bit.

Q: This is what I mean.

Q: How does one look at envy?

K: Aren't you envious? Aren't you? Everybody becomes silent. Aren't you envious, can't you look at it, know the feeling of it? Envy means comparison, doesn't it. I compare myself with you who are more intelligent, more bright, more clever and all the rest of it, taller, beautiful, and all that. I compare myself with you. So where there is comparison there must be envy. In that envy there is imitation, the desire to conform to the pattern. Right? All that is implied in being envious. Now you mean to say you can't look at it? Can't you look at the feeling of envy as it arises? Of course you can.

Q: What about judgement?

K: Just look at it. It is a wrong question to ask, how am I not to judge it. But you have been used to judging and therefore you say, how am I not to do it. If I tell you how not to do it then your old tradition and the new tradition will be in battle. I wonder if you see all this. Whereas if you say, look, I am envious, I am going to watch it, I am going to see if I am comparing myself with anybody. And we are educated to compare ourselves: I am poor, you are rich, both physically and psychologically and I am envious of you because I want to be rich like you. You mean to say you can't know the feelings that arise as they come up? Can't you watch that?

Q: If envy says, I don't want to sit here and be watched, I want to go and express myself?

K: Go ahead and do it.

Q: It won't sit still for you to watch it.

K: Go ahead and do it. Be caught by it. That's what we are all doing.

Q: How is it the same energy that can observe and also that justifies?

K: When I twist my fingers, twiddle my fingers, isn't that energy? When I condemn it, isn't that part of that same energy?

Q: I don't see how that is the same energy.

K: Ah, no. I am afraid you have not understood what I said. I am envious. Envy implies comparison, measurement, imitation, conformity. Right? All those are implied in envy. And most human beings are envious, almost everybody. And am I envious, I want to find out. Of course one is. Right? Are you following this, is this clear madam? Now can you watch it? Are you watching it with the feeling of condemnation, with the feeling of judgement, or just watching it? Because condemnation, justification, rationalization are a wastage of energy, the energy which is needed to focus all your attention on 'what is' which is envy. Because when you condemn, justify, rationalize, it is the observer, the past which says, condemn, the past says, judge, the past says, it's quite all right. So the past which is also energy, when you don't waste that energy you have that energy to observe. Understood now?

Q: Is that different from the past?

K: Yes, totally different from the past.

Q: Sir, are you saying that one is that energy, the habit, the envy?

K: Of course.

Q: Consciousness is that. I mean it is absurd to say you are the energy.

K: You haven't understood it, sir, let's find out. When you think, you are using energy, aren't you? When you feel, that's a form of energy. When you get angry, envious, afraid, that's all energy, isn't it? Envy, jealousy, anger is you and so on. That whole complex structure is you, which means you, the past.

Q: Sir, when you look at envy and see that you are envious, then you also see you are judging envy. Will that energy of observing the fact that you are judging the fact that you are envious, will that energy transform the judgement?

K: You see you are still judging. For the love of Pete! Why do we judge? Which means you have a preconceived opinion, a prejudice - no? When you look at a picture in a museum, you just judge it, don't you. You judge it by saying, it is by so-and-so, he is already famous, already known, he must be a very good painter and therefore I like it, or I don't like it. You are judging already. You have formed an opinion, your brain is forming opinions all the time, it is part of your education, part of your tradition to judge. No? So you never look. If it is by Picasso, you say, my god, it is such a marvellous painter - it is already finished. Van Gogh or this or that. So you prevent yourself from looking.

Q: Thought creates the image and through the image I understand. How can I understand without the image?

K: Thought creates an image, image being prejudice. Right? Image being a conclusion. How can I look without a conclusion, without an opinion, without a judgement? You see how we are trained, educated, conditioned to operate always with judgement, opinions. And that you call freedom.

Q: If I pick that up I have to analyse the colour, analyse the size.

K: But can you just look at it without analysing?

Q: That's why I can't see envy because I can't even see the mountains.

K: That's just it, sir. So carry on now. From there, we said learning. We have only learnt about a very small part of existence, the technological existence, and the rest we do not learn about. And we say, how am I to learn about it. By observing it, looking at it myself, which is the world and the world is me, looking at this world which is me without any judgement. Right? Can you do it? As that gentleman pointed out, the parents turn you out because you do something, they are judging you, they are pushing you out of the house, they destroy your affection, the bitterness, and all the rest of it follows.

So there is a vast field, a complex area in the human mind which has not been explored. They have explored it, the psychologists, anthropologists and others have explored it theoretically, or experimented with animals, gone down to Africa and looked at the gorillas and say, by studying those I will learn about myself. Don't laugh, this is what is happening. You don't have to go to India, or to a Zen monastery to learn about yourself, you can learn about yourself where you are because that is your world. So don't waste money on going to Africa. So this is your world in which you live, with your neighbour, with your wife, with your husband and so on. The small micro world is the large world if one knows how to look at that small little world.

So learning implies when you look at yourself you can learn about yourself only when the accumulated experience doesn't interfere with the actual observation at the moment of 'what is'. Have you understood that? Listen. I look at myself, myself is constantly moving, it isn't static. Right? Have you noticed it? One moment it is peaceful, the next moment it is angry, the third moment it is pursuing some pleasure, it is constantly in action, movement. And I have learnt by looking at myself something about it. Right? That becomes an experience, that becomes the knowledge, with which knowledge I look the next time. See what has happened. I look at the present movement with the past knowledge, therefore I never look. You have understood this? So can I look at the present movement without the past experience impinging upon it? I wonder if you follow all this.

Q: I ask myself the question, can I look without the past knowledge, but I am the past knowledge.

K: Yes, so can you look at yourself without the observer who is the past?

Q: It has to be in the present, it is the only way.

K: Now, what does that mean, you have to be in the present?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just listen to that question, he says, I have to be in the present, what does that mean?

Q: You have to forget the past.

K: What does it mean to be in the present?

Q: You have to observe what is going on.

K: Can you observe without the past?

Q: It will be there.

K: Do it, sir, do it. Find out.

Q: I can see the past pop up. I can see in the present the past coming forward.

K: Sir, be very simple. Look: I flatter you, or I insult you. That is registered in your memory. Right? Now the next time I meet you can you forget those insults or the flattery and look at me? That is the present, isn't it.

Q: Sir, you asked a question, can you watch yourself without the past. Which is the same thing as saying, can you watch yourself without you.

K: That's right.

Q: And I don't understand that.

K: You are the past, aren't you? Your accumulated memories, experiences, knowledge, interests, all in the past, knowledge is the past. Knowledge is the past. Right? Sir, look: I read the Bible and it says, or some book says, god is will - I like that idea, I think it is marvellous and that becomes a prejudice, doesn't it. Whether it is reality, whether it has any truth in it, it doesn't matter, it appeals to me, that god is looking after me. Right? So I get a fixed idea, I am that fixed idea. And I live with that idea for many years, and you come along and say, 'Don't be silly, that's a prejudice'. And you say, 'I can't get rid of it'. Right? 'It is so part of me'. Of course it is part of you. He says, don't get rid of it but look at it, observe it, don't fight it.

Q: It's observation, sheer observation with no past affecting the state of observation. What happens to the observer and the object observed?

K: That's just what I am saying, sir. What happens when the past doesn't interfere with the thing observed. Right, sir? What happens to the thing observed and what happens to the observer? Wait. Are you answering him?

Q: You asked a question. You don't exist any more.

K: You see this is all guess work. He asked a question, which is, what happens to the thing observed and to the observer when the past is not. Right, sir, that was the question? What is the observer? Is he not the past? Which is his experience, his prejudice, his knowledge. The observer in essence is the past.

Q: There is observation then.

K: There is only observation. Then that which is observed undergoes a radical transformation. I wish you would do it and find out.

Q: Anybody doing it besides yourself?

Q: Yes.

K: Sir, look, there is something I want to find out, which is, I want to find out if there is a way of living without conflict, right through my life, not just for a few minutes. Right? Because if there is conflict there is violence, there are all kinds of things that come out of that conflict: violence, bitterness, anger, hatred, throwing bombs, terrorism, brutality, comes out of that conflict. No civilization, no culture, can exist in conflict, as the modern world is living, the culture, it is destroying itself. So as a human being related to the world, I say, is it possible to live without a single conflict? Have you ever asked that question? Have you really? Not only between you and me, my wife, without a shadow of conflict in oneself. After having asked that question, I have gone into it because it is a very important for a human being to find out, otherwise he is going to destroy humanity. You understand? I don't think you see the importance of this. You see the conflict between the Arab and the Jew is going to destroy them, isn't it? No? Between the Muslim and the Hindu, that is going to destroy them; the communist and the capitalist, they are going to destroy each other; the Catholic, the Protestant - you follow? And conflict in oneself. As a human being living in this chaos, in this conflicting, mad, insane world you must find out.

So can a human being live in this modern culture, which is no culture, in this modern culture without a single conflict in himself? He can, if one goes into it very seriously you will find out. That is, conflict exists as long as there is fragmentation in oneself. Right? And this fragment is between the observer and the observed. Do you see it? As long as there is a division between the observer and the observed there must be conflict. I am a Jew, you are an Arab, or I want opposing contradictory desires. You follow all this?

Q: If we destroy each other there won't be the problem.

K: If we destroy each other there will be no problem - is that what you are saying?

Q: Not necessarily. If the Jew and the Arab eliminate Judaism and Arab-ism, the conflict, then there is no object and no subject.

Q: It seems that our divine wholeness is covered over by the illusions of self and other things, fragments.

K: How do you know you are covered over by divine intelligence?

Q: I don't. I didn't say I was covered over by divine intelligence; I said, if my divine wholeness is.

K: How do you know you are a divine whole?

Q: I am not a divine whole, I have experienced that there is a wholeness, which gets covered over by the fragments that we examined this weekend, fragments of self and other things. And you were saying that these divisions are fragments and not the discovery of the wholeness.

K: Sir, just take, 'what is', don't let's imagine that we are perfect, just take actually what is going on outside of us and inside, actually.

Q: A life without conflict, without sorrow, without pain, isn't that a statement of perfection?

K: It is not a statement of perfection. Human beings suffer, one asks is there an end to sorrow. But it doesn't mean one wants to live a perfect life, I don't know what a perfect life is. We are moving away from something.

I have asked, is there a way of living in this culture, in this world, in your daily life, in which there is no conflict. We said as long as there is a division, outwardly, like the Arab, Jew, the Muslim, the Hindu, Communist and so on, as long as there is outward division there must be conflict, and as long as there is inward division there must be conflict. Right? The outward division we have created. Right? I am a Jew, or an Arab, and I won't give up my prejudice, my culture, my etcetera, I stick to my prejudice. You follow? So inwardly there is division as the observer and the observed. But the observer is the observed. If you see that once, the truth of it, then all conflict ends, then you won't be fighting that which is observed.

Q: After you have eliminated the conflict does the division remain?

K: No, of course not. How can it remain?

Q: There is no division, there is wholeness?

K: Don't go beyond, that's just an idea, find out what it means to live wholly. The word `whole' means healthy physically, sane, sanity, to think clearly, objectively, rationally, and holy, sacred. The word `whole' means all that.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I made it fairly clear.

Q: We can't be holy all the time you have to live.

K: What time is it?

Q: Twelve thirty.

K: We meet again on Thursday.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 10TH APRIL 1976

I wonder if you realize how serious these meetings are. They are not meant for the intellectuals only, nor a form of entertainment. This is very serious because we are concerned with the transformation of the human mind, a way of living, totally different, a way of looking, observing in which there is complete action. So this is rather a serious gathering. And I hope one realizes the nature of this kind of meeting.

We have been talking the last few times that we met here about the world, the degeneration that is going on throughout the world, and our relationship to that degeneration. For the world actually, if you look into it very, very deeply, is you, and you are the world. This is not just a statement of words, but an actuality because wherever you go there is suffering, poverty, a great deal of sorrow, fear, brutality, violence, man against man, the concentration camps of the gurus, the totalitarian attitude of these so-called religious teachers - all these and other factors indicate a great moral degeneration of mankind. And those who are concerned, not superficially, not doing some good work here and there, or belong to any particular political, social or religious party, but are concerned with the division of man against man, the utter indifference to what is going on. And when you observe all these things it boils down to several factors, which we talked about the last two times that we met here.

One, man's relationship to man, man and woman, and that relationship if it is not properly understood, rightly lived, must inevitably lead to conflict. And where there is conflict between human beings, whether it be man or woman, there must be violence, brutality. This is manifest throughout the world - the utter lack of human relationship. And we went into that question, pretty thoroughly I think.

And also the last time that we met here we were talking about sharing together the question and the problem of the whole nature and the structure of thought. Because thought has built this world: the divisions, the wars, the conflict, the religious persecutions, thought has been responsible not only for the technological advancement as knowledge, but also thought has been responsible for a great deal of untold misery. Thought has put together our consciousness. The content of one's consciousness is the result of millennia of thought. And this consciousness is a constant movement from the past to the present. And it is not a private consciousness, it is not your consciousness, it is a consciousness of the total movement of man, conditioned according to the culture he lives. That conditioning gives character, tendency, idiosyncrasies and so on. All that is the result of thought, which we talked about last week when we met here.

And we also said, all the things that thought has created, put together, not only externally, environmentally, but also inwardly - all our desires, pursuits, ambitions, corruptions, contradiction, is reality. Please, we are sharing this together. After all that is what communication means, the capacity to listen, understand the words, and the meaning of the word, what lies behind the word, and by attentive listening share that which is being said - not agreeing or disagreeing, but partaking the problems. And one of the problems is this question of thought, upon which man has lived untold years and centuries. And we consider thought can bring about a radical change in us. Thought, which is the response of memory, knowledge, experience, which is the past, thought we consider is of the highest importance, however refined and the ascent of man through knowledge, which is the accumulation of experience, thought, is in itself going to bring about a great change in man. We are questioning that. We are questioning, enquiring into this problem: whether knowledge, which is the accumulation of thousands of years of experience and the accumulation of knowledge, stored up in the brain as memory, whether that knowledge will transform man at all. Please understand this. We think knowledge, experience, is necessary to bring about a different way of living, a different kind of relationship between man and man. Our brains have evolved through time, centuries upon centuries, millennia upon millennia. And from the ancient of days man has suffered, he is caught in sorrow, misery, conflict, violence, worshipped gods which are his own invention, fought for their gods, for their ideals, for belief - all the product of thought. And we think, still think that thought can miraculously change us. And we are saying, the speaker is saying that thought as knowledge cannot possibly change man. Knowledge has its place in action - driving a car, all the technological knowledge is necessary but the knowledge as experience, the psychological experience stored up as memory cannot possibly change man. Then what will change man? You have understood the question? - I hope.

That is: from the pre-historical times, before the civilization of Egypt, Mesopotamia and the ancient Greeks and the Romans, and the Persians, and all the rest of it, one has observed man crying because their sons, their wife, their husband have been killed and we are still crying. And we think by accumulating a great deal of information about ourselves as knowledge, will somehow, that knowledge through thought will transform our lives. That is our tradition. And we are saying thought can never change man because thought in itself is a fragment, thought in itself has created a fragmentary way of living, saying one thing and doing another. The contradiction that exists in man is the product of thought because thought itself is limited, thought itself cannot see the whole, thought in itself thinks that it can perceive the whole and act. I hope we are sharing this together. It is necessary that we look into this - not come to it with preconceived ideas, conclusions, either agreeing or disagreeing. That is a non-objective, non-scientific way of looking at life. You must come to it, enquiring, asking, demanding, sceptical and then you will find out. That is why it is important, if you are at all serious, looking at the world about you, which is the world which man has created, the society, the culture, when you observe all that, what place has thought? Because thought has a place.

And also we were talking, the last time we met here that the enquiry into the human problems, psychological problems, is also the beginning of meditation. We think meditation - unfortunately brought over from the East, that is a kind of escape, repeating some silly mantras, paying $150 or a $1,000 and you think that by devoting some time to it something miraculous is going to take place. It will only make your minds more dull, more sleepy, and perhaps that is what you all want; not being able to see what life is and be concerned with the transformation of that life, we want to escape from it and the escape we call meditation. But without understanding - please do pay a little attention to what is being said, because we are concerned with your life, with man's life, with human life, the misery, the anxiety, the fears, the despairs, the hopes - without being concerned with our daily relationship, and bringing about the right kind of relationship between each other, not the relationship of two images, which we talked about, but actual relationship, and without understanding the place of thought, the place of knowledge, and the nature and the structure of knowledge, and without understanding, without laying the foundation meditation has no meaning - in spite of all the gurus.

So it becomes absolutely necessary that we, as human beings, who are serious, committed, involved in the total processes of living, that we understand the meaning of relationship because society is based on relationship, all existence is based on relationship, and in that relationship there is conflict, then society, the culture is still within the area of conflict. And without understanding the immense complex question of thought in our daily life, without understanding it we become more and more confused, more and more dependent on others to tell us what to do. And so we become lost, confused, dependent, either on a guru or a community, or some authority.

And also we have to understand this question of fear, into which we are going. Here again let me point out that we are enquiring into this question together, sharing the problem together, not that the speaker is talking about it and you just listen, agreeing or disagreeing, casually paying a little attention, and come back and enquire how to be free of fear next year.

So as it is a human problem, not only in this country, everywhere - please understand this - if one single human being understands this radically, this problem of fear, resolves it, not tomorrow or some other day but instantly - which we are going into - he affects the whole consciousness of mankind. Again that is a fact. As we said your consciousness is not your private property. Your consciousness is the result of time, of thousands of incidents, experiences that are put together by thought. That consciousness is in constant movement. It is like a stream, a vast river of which you are a part. So there is no particularization, and if you go into it very deeply, there is no individuality. You may not like that, but look at it. Individual means an entity who is undivided, indivisible, who is not fragmented, broken up, a whole being - such a man is an individual. But most of us unfortunately are fragmented, broken up, divided and we have the arrogance to call ourselves individuals. Actually, if you look at yourself very deeply, you are like the rest of the world - unhappy, concerned, confused, miserable, aching, frightened and all the rest of it.

So we are going together to examine this question - please examine, enquire, explore into this question of fear. Whether you can end it, the psychological fear first, and then biological fears. You understand? We are sharing it together. Because fear, whether it be very little or enormous burdensome, fear of losing a job, fear of not being successful, fear of death, fear of not being loved, fear of loneliness, isolation, fear of deep insecurity, the fear of being dependent and losing that dependency, fear of not doing the right thing, or the fear of following the rest of the crowd and being left behind. You know what fears are.

And also let us remind ourselves that this is not group therapy, which is one of the things that the West has invented, or rather America has invented, which is really quite absurd, it is like talking to each other about ourselves, which you can do in another room by yourself, without exposing yourself to a lot of idiotic thoughtless people. (Laughter) And you think you are somehow by confession, by all the rest of it, purging yourself. If you are really serious you can do it utterly, completely, nobly, thoroughly by yourself in your room.

So we are going to enquire very seriously whether psychological fears can end at all. You understand the implications of it? Because man has never been able to psychologically be free of fears. Fear has burdened his mind, darkened his outlook, he does not know how to deal with these fears, therefore he escapes from these fears, into violence, brutality, arrogance, bitterness, you know the whole human bag of tricks. So what is the root cause of fear? Please look into yourself as we are talking. Use the words as a mirror to discover your own fear and find out as you observe the root of it, not the branches, the leaves, the trivialities of fear, which we will also understand a little later, but the fundamental cause of fear. Because if there is fear psychologically, inwardly, every action becomes distorted, there is no meticulous clear observation. So it becomes very important to understand this question of fear. So we are asking; what is the root of fear? Not only is there fear of death - in this country you don't talk about death. It is there but you don't talk about it, you don't look at it, you don't want to find out the nature of it, but we have learnt very carefully to avoid it. And we are going to go later on, perhaps next week, Saturday or Sunday, to talk about death also, it becomes part of life. It isn't something at the end of life. It may be the very beginning, the ending and the beginning and therefore there is no beginning and no ending, which we will go into later on.

So what is the root of fear? Is it not being able to find complete security, psychologically, inwardly? Complete, total certainty, security. Is it that we don't understand time? Is it that we are seeking permanency, something that will endure, that will last, that is final? You are following all this? Is there the uncertainty of not being? So we will go into it.

First let's look if there is security psychologically. Because we may be seeking psychological security and therefore creating insecurity in the outward world. You are understanding this? We will go into it. I see you don't understand it, we will go into it. What is security, psychologically, inwardly? What do we mean by security, being secure? Firm, certain, enduring, unshakeable, unmovable, so that nothing can shake it, break it down. Is that what you are seeking in relationship between each other? In having complete knowledge and depending on that knowledge to give us stability? Which means, seeking permanency, nothing that can be changed, and therefore eternity in the sense of putting an end to time. Do you understand all this? I wonder if you do. And is time one of the factors of fear? Are we beginning to understand each other, are we? There is time by the watch, time as yesterday, today and tomorrow. Time, the chronological time is necessary, it is there. Is there psychological time? You understand? Is there for me, for you, psychologically tomorrow? If there isn't, there is immense fear. Do you understand? If you are confronted with the fact that there is no tomorrow psychologically - do you understand? - your whole foundation is shaken because tomorrow you are going to have greater pleasure, tomorrow you will be better, tomorrow you will achieve, tomorrow you will get rid of your fear. So is there psychologically tomorrow?

Tomorrow means time - please go into it, this is rather complex and unless you give a little attention to it you will miss it - tomorrow means time. Tomorrow implies thought, which is in itself fragmentary, has created time psychologically, in which you will move from 'what is' to 'what should be'. Right? You are understanding all this? So is time a factor of fear? We must examine all this and then we will see how to look at fear. You understand? First we are looking at various factors that may be the cause of fear, like time, thought, the desire for certainty, the demand for a relationship in which there is complete permanency, and therefore psychologically total security. And we are asking: are these the factors of the basic cause of fear? Time, which is the product of thought - chronological time is not the product of thought, the sun sets, the sun rises and the calendar was invented 4,500 BC - that time exists but is there time at all psychologically, to make an effort to be something? Or, is fear of not being? You understand? What is this everlasting demand of self-expression, the 'me' expressing itself, the 'me' and the 'you', the 'I', the ego - do you understand? What is that? And without that there is tremendous fear, because in losing that, you have to find out what is this thing that is the 'me'. Are you following all this? Or is it just a lot of words? For god's sake wake up and tackle it. Because it is your life. And if you understand this and free of fear you are - you open the door to heaven. What is this me? Is it an actuality, or verbal reality? You understand? The 'me' that says, 'I must be'. 'I must meditate', 'I must find god', 'I must realize', 'I must be happy', 'I am lonely', 'I must be successful', 'I am frightened', 'I must be told' - what is that 'me'? Is it not the name? Right? The name, Mr so and so, the form? Right? The form being the body, that which you see in yourself in the mirror, and all the associated memories. Right? All the concepts about yourself, the image about yourself, the image that says, 'I am much better than you are'. Are they not all the product and put together by thought? Right? You are seeing this? Put together by thought. Thought itself is a fragment, and the activity of that fragment is not only you, the 'me', but the fragment it has created right round you. Right? Separate nations, separate classes, wars, the whole of that and thought is a material process in time. Right? Thought is the response of memory, experience, knowledge, stored up in the brain, and the response of that is thought.

So the 'me' is fictitious, to which we cling. It becomes tremendously important. And we say that may be the root cause of fear, clinging to something that is non-existent. So there is that. There is the fictitious, imagined me, a picture, a symbol, an idea, an image, put together by thought in time, which is a material process and measurement; and not being that, being uncertain of its very existence, deeply, in the very depths of one's being, that may be the deep fundamental cause of fear. You are understanding all this? Which doesn't mean if you have no 'me' you cannot live in this world. Right? On the contrary. I will show you in a minute.

Now can you look at this picture? That is, the movement of time. Time is movement. Right? It is so complex, you don't see the beauty of it. You see the ending of that movement is putting a stop to time, and that is one of the major factors of meditation, so that time comes to an end, psychologically. So we are saying fear, deep rooted fear is the movement of thought in time, which is material process, which has created an artificial structure called the 'me', and having created it thought clings to it, clings to a fragment which it has created, and thought itself is a fragment. Fear in relationship, because in relationship we have created the image of you and me. Right? The man and the woman, each person has an image of the other. A picture, a symbol, put together by time, of many days, many years, or an hour, and the relationship is between these two images. Look into it, you will see the actuality of it. And we cling to the picture, to the image, and we are frightened of losing that image, then we are forced to look at each other totally differently, if there is no picture. And is fear caused by dependency on authority, somebody to tell us what to do, how to think, what to think, following somebody, the gurus, the priest, the authority - they are all tyrants. You follow? In a democracy tyrants are an abomination, but you have spiritual tyrants - don't you? Your pet guru?

So, there is dependency, there is the picture of yourself created by thought, to which you are clinging, and there is desire. What is desire? You have to understand these things, not mentally, actually, not verbally, but actually see, taste it, capture it and look at it. What is desire, by which we are driven? Desire is, isn't it, sensation. Sensation plus thought is desire. You understand? Now you must be sensitive. Right? Otherwise you are dead. Sensation there must be but the moment thought takes over, and it becomes desire, then the whole problem arises. So can there be - listen to this - a complete sensation, looking at everything with all your senses - the trees, the mountains, the sky, the clouds, the rivers, a face, a picture, everything totally with all your senses and not let thought come in, take it over? You understand? Have you ever tried it? No. You don't do anything.

So after having described all this, and knowing that description is not the described - you understand, we have described in words the nature, the quality, the structure, how it is put together, this thing called fear. We have described it. Now can you look not at the description but at the fact, that which is described? Can you look at it? That is, can you observe it? And it is very important to learn how to observe. There is an art in observation. As we said the other day, 'art' means putting things in their proper place, where it belongs. Everything where it belongs. Art - the meaning of that word. So can you observe this thing called fear, after having described it, can you observe it? So what do we mean by observing? Are you, who is the observer, different from the thing observed? Do you understand my question? When you are angry, or envious, or jealous or whatever it is, are you different from that feeling which we have named as jealousy? Are you different? Or you are jealousy? So the observer is the observed. I wonder if you see that? That is, to put it differently: is the thinker different from his thought? Or again differently, the experience - you are crazy about having experiences, aren't you? Now is the experiencer different from the experience? Right? What is your answer? Is he different? Therefore why do you seek experiences? You follow? If there is no difference between the observer and the observed, then there is only the observed. Right? Then there is only thinking, not the thinker different from thought.

Look: I see you don't get all this. You want experiences, you are bored with the experiences that you have had already, the daily experience of sex, this, that and the other, you want other experiences. Right? Experience of god, experience of enlightenment, experience of Jesus, experience of Krishna consciousness - don't you? God what gullible people you are! You want it. And you have never enquired who is the experiencer, and is he different from the experienced. You want to experience Krishna consciousness, or the consciousness of Jesus, or whatever it is, and to experience that, and when you do experience you must recognize it, mustn't you? No? That means you have already known it. No? Therefore the experiencer is the experienced. So can you look at fear without the observer? Do you understand? Because you are the fear, fear isn't different from you. Right? Do you understand this? When you are angry, is that anger different from you? If you are different then you try to control it, then you try to rationalize it, then you try to do something about it. Please listen to this. But if the observer is the observed you can't do anything about it, you are that. Right? Now look, observe that, which is fear, without the observer. You understand? What is the time? Audience: Ten past.

K: I'll finish this, then we will go on.

You see there is this problem of fear, which we have described, we can go on adding to that description a great deal, much more, but what we have described is good enough. And one realizes in observing that fear, that fear is not different from the observer. When the observer is the observed there is fundamental change in that which is observed. I'll show you. When there is division between the observer and the observed - I am not fear, but there is fear - you understand? - the division - then what takes place in that division? Conflict, doesn't it? I must get rid of it, I must control it, why shouldn't I have fear? Why shouldn't I have neurotic actions out of those fears, and so on and so on and so on. There is always contradiction, division, therefore conflict. Right? Which is wastage of energy, isn't it? Right? Do you understand that? It is a wastage of energy when there is conflict. Conflict being I must control it, I must run away from it, I must go to somebody to tell me how to get rid of fear. You follow? All those are factors of wasting energy. Right? Do you see this? Now if you don't waste energy, and that only takes place when the observer is the observed, then you have that immense energy to transform 'what is', the very observation is the energy which transforms that which is. Have you understood this? For god's sake get it. Then you will see that you are completely, totally free from psychological fears.

If you have paid attention this morning, listened to it with all your heart and your mind, then when you get up, walk home, you are free of fear. That means you have listened. That means it is your problem. Your problem - it is absolutely necessary to solve it, not tomorrow, instantly. That is, when you perceive something then you act instantly, and that perception is only possible when the perceiver is the perceived, because there you have total energy. As we explained the other day, some scientists have said that when you observe through the microscope, that which is observed is transforming itself all the time. So when there is total observation, that is only possible when there is no observer - the observer being the past - when there is that total attention given to observation, that which is observed undergoes a fundamental transformation.

Got it? Do it!

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 11TH APRIL 1976

I am sorry you have been kept waiting for half an hour.

We have been talking over together, the last three times that we met here, the importance of observing our daily life. We are concerned with that only and whether it is possible, living in this rather chaotic, degenerating world, to bring about a radical transformation in the human mind. We are not concerned with theories, speculative philosophy, nor asserting any form of belief. But rather together examine, closely and meticulously our ways of life, the way we live, our contradictions in ourselves, the misery, the confusion, the loneliness, the despair, and all the travail of human mind. With that we are concerned, not with speculative philosophy. Philosophy means, according to the dictionary, the love of truth, or the love of life. And we have been concerned with relationship, because on that the whole of society is based. If our human relationship with each other is not right then our society, our culture, is bound to be violent, menacing, destructive, as it is now.

And also we talked about thought, the importance and the understanding, and having an insight into the whole structure and the nature of thought. And yesterday morning we talked about fear, whether the human mind can ever be free of fear, not only at the conscious level but at the deeper layers of one's consciousness. Whether it is at all possible for human beings who have lived for millennia upon millennia, to utterly be free of this terrible burden of fear. We went into that sufficiently yesterday.

Today we would like to talk about pleasure and sorrow. We are going to go into this problem, which is much more complex than fear, the pursuit of pleasure. And before we go into this we must understand what is reality, and what is truth. This is not a speculative question. It concerns our life, and therefore we must understand very deeply the nature of reality. When we talk about reality we mean that everything that thought has put together, both outwardly and inwardly. The outward movement is the inner movement, and the inner movement is the outer movement. There is no division between the outer and the inner. And whatever thought has put together, that is reality. Thought has not put together the trees, and mountains, the lakes but thought has put together the whole technological area, with all its enormous complicated machinery, based upon knowledge. That is also reality because it is part of thought. And also reality is all the illusions and the neurotic behaviour, the beliefs, the dogmas, the rituals - the desire for experiences and so on are reality. We are concerned with the transformation and bringing order in that reality. The reality of the things of thought. I hope we are meeting each other because, if I may point out, this is rather important to understand when we go into the question of pleasure and whether the human mind, your mind can ever be free from sorrow, or must sorrow continue endlessly.

So to find that out we must enquire very deeply into the question of what is reality. We are saying that nature, the trees, the mountains, the lakes and the beauty of nature is not created by thought, but that is reality, that is an actuality. But all the psychological structure put together by thought, the 'me', and the 'not me', the 'I' and the 'you', 'we' and 'they', the communist, the socialist, the imperialist, the business, all that area of the psyche is a reality, and the neurotic behaviour, the illusions, the beliefs, also that is a reality. And to bring order in that reality, which is the reality which thought has created as the 'me', as the 'you', the divisions between nationalities, beliefs, dogmas, all that, in that confusion there must be order because without order no society, no different kind of culture can come into being. We disregard order. We think that is old fashioned, that it is square - or whatever name you give to it. We think order is mechanical. And therefore we want to be free of mechanical habits, mechanical traditions, mechanical culture and so in disregarding it we are bringing confusion and not order. I hope we are sharing this together, not agreeing with the speaker, or disagreeing, but examining. And in the process of examination there must be no prejudice, or a particular direction in the examination.

We are disorderly people. I don't know if you have watched yourself walking down the road, sloppy, uncombed hair, dirty, unconcerned, all the things that are happening, a permissive, thoughtless society which we have created. Not only in this country, but right throughout the world it is taking place, because America has become the standard of the world, the affluent society is the highest form of society apparently, and the world is copying it. And unless in that reality - please follow this, if you don't mind - unless there is order in the structure of thought, in the world of reality, which is the world in which we live daily, we will not be able to end sorrow. A man who is concerned with the understanding and going beyond sorrow, must bring order in life, in daily life. As we said, order has been regarded as mechanical, conforming, following a particular pattern, moralistic, laid down by society, by traditions, sanctions of religion and so on and so on. So one has to find out what is mechanical. You understand?

Is the mind mechanical? Is your mind, which is the thought movement, is it mechanical? We mean by mechanical that which has a cause. Any movement that has a cause with its effect, and the effect becoming the cause, which is a process of a chain movement, that is mechanical. You have understood? Please give a little thought to this if you don't mind, because this is really important to understand because we are going to find out if there is any part of the brain which is non-mechanical. Or is the whole structure of the brain, of our mind, mechanical, repetitive? And we say that which is mechanical must always have a cause - the cause becoming the effect and the effect becoming the cause for the next effect. That is a process of enchainment, binding. As long as that process exists there must be mechanical activity. Right? That is, if one acts according to a particular pattern established by experience as memory, and act according to that memory, that is binding, that is mechanical. Whether that mechanical habit is ten thousand years old, or a week old. So there is a part of our brain, which you can observe yourself, we are not a specialist, I am talking as a layman, we can observe in ourselves a part of the brain which is the storehouse of memory, memory being experiences, accumulated knowledge, and according to that knowledge, experience, memory, there is activity, therefore that is mechanical. And realizing that we revolt against it. Are we communicating with each other? I will explain as we go along. It is quite a complex thing.

So our daily life becomes a mechanical process. You have had certain experiences, certain incidents, which have become a memory, and according to that memory thought responds, and pursues in that circle, in that cycle: that is mechanical. And thought, which is based on memory, is mechanical. You understand, sirs? So thought is mechanical. And the mechanical thought says, 'I must bring order in the things which I have created'. You are following this? In the world of reality, not in nature, but in the world of reality of human relationship, fear, pleasure, sorrow, he says, 'I must bring order'. Thought has created this confusion and says, 'I will bring order to it' - therefore it brings more confusion. Is this clear? Are we meeting each other? No, please, don't accept my words, but look at yourself and watch it. Your thinking is mechanical because it is based on memory - memory is experience, knowledge, and thought says, 'I will bring order in the things which I have created, which is rather messy, confused'. And that is what is happening politically, if you have watched it with all the campaigning going on now, and that is what religions have done, all our human relationship has become mechanical. Right?

Now we are enquiring: is there an action, a way of living, which is non-mechanistic, which is not based on the movement of thought as time? Are we understanding something of each other?

So we are going to find out if there is an action which is not mechanistic and therefore we must understand very clearly what is reality. Reality, as the psychological reality in which we live, is mechanistic. And as long as there is activity in that mechanical existence of our life there must be more confusion, more sorrow, more violence, more everything. Now we are going to find out if there is an action which is non-mechanistic. Is this clear? Can we proceed from there? I hope you have understood something of it, because it is your life, it is not my life. It is your way of living, your daily existence, which has become so utterly meaningless, so mechanistic, except for occasional freedom and so on. So we are going to go into this question of whether there is an action, a way of living which is not based on the mechanical repetition of memory, conforming to a pattern, a way of living in which there is no conflict - all that is involved.

So there is this world of reality which thought has created, the Christian, the Buddhist, all the rest of it, and what is truth? What is the relationship, if there is such a thing as truth, between truth and reality? That is, I want to find out if there is non-mechanistic action. Because if the human mind can find that then I can begin to enquire into the whole structure and nature of pleasure. Whether pleasure is mechanistic and is there joy, ecstasy, real enjoyment which is mechanistic? You are following this? Please, we are using ordinary English, not American English, or the eighteenth century English, or the twenty-first century English, but English as it is spoken originally according to the dictionary and so on.

So we are asking ourselves if there is an action which is free of regrets, free of any form of corruption, an action that doesn't leave a residue, that doesn't create contradiction, that in itself is the flowering of order? Do you understand? We are going to find out together. We are asking: what is an insight, an insight into the world of reality which thought has created, having an insight into that structure. You understand? Insight means having a sight in. Right? I think this is too complex. We will approach it differently.

First of all let's look at the question of pleasure. We will come back to it in a different way. Why does the human mind pursue pleasure? We are not saying that there should be no pleasure. We are going to investigate into the nature of pleasure because apparently human beings are everlastingly committed to pleasure. Aren't you? Pleasure implies that which is pleasing, in action, in conduct, in relationship, in all the things we do we are pursuing pleasure - why? Why is there this immense demand for pleasure? Which is the easiest way of action, the most comfortable way of living, the easy relationship of sex and all the rest. This enormous pursuit, not only of physical, sensory pleasures, but psychological pleasures, and the ultimate pleasure is for god, for enlightenment and so on. Right? Why? I do not know if you have ever asked that question of yourself. So what is pleasure? Because it is very important to understand, it may be the other side of the coin of fear. You understand? We shared together yesterday the complex problem of fear, and pleasure is much more complex. And we are saying that it may be the other side of the coin.

So most human beings disregard fear, do not know how to deal with fear, and pursue constantly pleasure. So we are asking: what is pleasure? Is it mechanistic? Because, as we said, through culture, through tradition, through our habits, environment and so on, our brain has become, part of the brain, has become mechanistic, as we went into. And pleasure - I am asking - is it mechanistic? So we are saying: what is pleasure? Is it the repetition of a certain delight of yesterday, whether it be sexual or other, which becomes a memory and the pursuit of memory as pleasure? Therefore is pleasure mechanistic? Please bite into it, don't just sit there and say, 'Yes', bite and find out because we are concerned - please, I am deeply serious about all these things - we are concerned with the transformation of the human mind. We can't live as we are living. There must be a radical change in our minds, in our hearts, in our whole way of living. And it is very important, those who are really serious, to find out why we human beings have been caught in this everlasting pursuit of pleasure.

Now look at it. Yesterday there were some delightful incidents, something that you liked immensely, it happened, which is registered in the brain, then it becomes a memory, then thought says, 'I must have more of that'. Right? Whether it is sexual or other. The repetition of an incident which is over, which was considered by thought as pleasure, and the pursuit of it today and tomorrow. You follow this? Which is mechanistic, obviously. Now what is the difference between pleasure, enjoyment and joy? There are three things: pleasure, enjoyment and joy. Pleasure you can cultivate. Right? Taste, all this cultivated sensory activities and the right pleasure, you can cultivate it. Can you cultivate enjoyment? Or can you cultivate joy? Joy comes uninvited by some curious chance. You find yourself suddenly, extraordinarily, unspeakably happy. Then thought takes it over and says, 'I must have more of it'. So the moment thought interferes with that thing called joy, which is uninvited, it becomes pleasure, therefore it becomes mechanistic. Are you following all this?

So that is our life: a way of living, which is constantly repetitive, constantly going over something that was, that is already dead, making it live through thought and pursuing that as pleasure. Right? Can you look at something beautiful and enjoy looking at that tree and the clouds, and the light, that's enjoyment. Right? But when thought comes in and says, 'That was a most lovely thing', it is already finished. Right? So can you - please this requires a tremendous sense of alertness, watchfulness, awareness - can you watch the beauty of nature, the beauty of this world, with all your senses and not let thought come in? Therefore enjoyment is completely for the moment, but when thought takes it over, it becomes pleasure and it becomes mechanistic. Have you understood this? This requires a mind - look, experiment with it now, as we are talking: look at the trees, the sunlight, the beauty of the hills, the shadows, the playing of those shadows among the hills, the valleys, look at it. And it is a delight. Can you watch it without thought coming into it? And end it there, not wanting to continue it. Have you understood? What has continuity becomes mechanistic. That which has an ending there is a new beginning. Got it? Have you understood? Right?

Now please listen to this: you had an insight into this, didn't you. Didn't you? Now please just a minute, watch it carefully. You had an insight. Is that insight the product of thought? So you have found something. That is, when there is an insight and action through insight, it is not mechanistic. Got it? Have you understood this? We are coming back to it, because we are going to find out if insight or intelligence is not the product of thought, as we said it is not just now, then acting according to insight and intelligence is non-mechanistic action. Don't say, 'What is intelligence?' We said when we explained very carefully that watching the shadows, the mountain, the clouds, and seeing the beauty of it, and ending it, and not giving thought a movement in that, you had in insight into it, we said how true that is. Right? That to act according to that insight is non-mechanistic. Have you got it? Oh, my lord!

Look sirs - ladies, or whatever it is: when we pointed out that whenever thought takes over the moment of delight it becomes mechanistic. You saw that, didn't you? The perception of that is intelligence, isn't it. Can you act always according to that intelligence, not according to the repetitive movement of thought? Do you see the difference? Wait, I will come back to it.

So we see the movement of pleasure, based upon desire, desire being sensation; to watch the trees, the clouds, the heavens and the stars and the moon, that is a tremendous sensation if you watch it with all your senses. Then thought comes in. So where there is sensation plus thought there is a desire. You have understood? You see it? That is, the sensations, the activity of the senses at their highest, plus thought is desire. Do you see that? How do you see it? You see it because your intelligence is observing it. That intelligence is not the product of thought. Right? So we've come back to it.

Now we are going to enquire into this question of sorrow. I do not know if you have gone into it, or if you have even considered why there are tears, why human beings suffer, both biologically as well as inwardly. What is this suffering, this sorrow, can it ever end? Or, is it an everlasting movement from the beginning of man to the end of man? Do you follow? Must man put up with it, live with it? Religions, organized religions, based on authority and belief, have never solved this problem. Christianity said, somebody suffers for you and you carry on. Hindus and the Buddhists have their own explanations - which we won't go into now. So man has lived with this sorrow from the ancient of days, and we are asking something, which is: can sorrow end? If there is no ending to sorrow there is no compassion, there is no love. We think suffering is necessary, or we think there is no solution to suffering, therefore we must escape from it. And we have developed a marvellous network of escapes, which are facts. What is sorrow? When you suffer, when there is this thing called sorrow, which is pain, grief, loneliness, a sense of total isolation, no hope, no sense of relationship, communication, total isolation - don't you know all this? This great thing that man has lived with and perhaps cultivated, because he doesn't know how to resolve it. And we are going to find out, share together this question and find out if there is an end to sorrow, because without the ending of sorrow there is no love. When there is love will you suffer for another? When there is love will there be sorrow? You might have sympathy, kindness, generosity, sharing, but love is something totally different, a different dimension, which only one can come upon when sorrow ends. So it is immensely important to find out as human beings this everlasting torture which is called sorrow.

There is sorrow when someone dies whom you like, love, so-called love in quotes. And you feel utterly lonely when you have lost that upon which you have depended. When you feel that you cannot climb the ladder of success, when someone whom you love, at least you think you love, and it is not returned, when your beliefs in which you have false security are shattered, when your mother, father dies, or son, brother dies there is sorrow. You all must know this thing. And I do not know if you have ever asked yourself deeply whether there can be an end to human sorrow. You understand.

Now what actually takes place when you suffer? Not biologically, physiologically, we will deal with that, but psychologically, which is much more penetrating, much deeper, much more excruciating. You may shed tears, escape from it, never look at it, but it is always there. And what is sorrow? Please, this is not an intellectual investigation, an analytical process. To me analysis is no answer. Analysis implies the analyser and the analysed. The analyser is the analysed. I do not know if you have gone into it. When you analyse something of your own nature, when you analyse your sorrow, who is the analyser? Is he different from the thing called sorrow? Or he has divided himself as the analyser, separates himself from sorrow and says, 'I'll look into it'. But in the very examination of it the division exists and therefore he can never understand through analyses the whole immensity and the nature of sorrow. So we are not analysing, because analysis implies time. Analysis implies the analyser and the analysed. And the analyser may be mistaken and his analysis will be useless. So do you - please experiment with me - do you see, have an insight into the question of analysis, the futility of it? You understand? So you have an insight into it, so you will never again analyse. You see? Right? If you have an insight into this question of analysis which the speaker has explained, the analyser sets himself apart from the analysed and says, 'I will examine that thing, which is to be analysed', and the examiner is the past with his prejudices, with his conclusions, with his memories, with his knowledge which he has acquired through Freud and somebody else or other. And then he examines or analyses that. So he establishes a division and where there is division there is conflict. And we are saying the analyser is the analysed. The man who says, 'I am going to examine my anger' - the examiner is himself anger. Right? Do you see that? Therefore if you have an insight into that you will never again analyse. That insight is your intelligence.

So we are saying, sorrow is the lot of human beings, everyone knows it. And what takes place when we are in sorrow? Apart from emotional sentiment, tears, apart from all that, what takes place? As we don't know how to understand sorrow, what is involved in sorrow, we have not had an insight into sorrow, we escape from it, we rationalize it, we justify it, or say that every human being suffers, I suffer. Or if you are prejudiced religiously, you say it is the work of god. Now all those are ways and means of escaping from the fact, 'what is', which is sorrow. Now if you don't escape, that is, no rationalizing, no avoiding, no justifying, remain with that totality of suffering, without the movement of thought, then you have all that energy to comprehend that thing which you call sorrow. You understand? Have you understood something? That is, to remain without a single movement of thought, with that which you have called sorrow. Then if you remain with that there comes a transformation in that which you have called sorrow. That becomes passion. You understand? Because the root meaning of sorrow is passion. When you escape from it, you lose that quality which comes from sorrow, which is complete passion, which is totally different from lust and desire. So when you have an insight into sorrow and remain with that thing completely, without a single movement of thought, out of that comes this strange flame of passion. And you must have passion otherwise you can't create anything.

So out of passion comes compassion. Compassion means passion for all things, for all human beings. So there is an ending to sorrow. And only then you will begin to understand what it means to love.

So one has to understand, have an insight into fear, that is, insight into relationship, insight into the whole structure and nature of thought, thought that breeds fear, that pursues pleasure and the ending of sorrow. If you have an insight into all that you have that intelligence that transforms your mechanistic activity into something totally non-mechanistic. Right?

Don't go home and think about it! You have no time. If you think about it, when you think about what has been said, then your thinking becomes traditional, mechanistic, and empty, but as you are sitting there, sharing this thing, it is happening now, it must happen now otherwise it won't ever happen, because thought will prevent it, thought has no insight; but when you look at that picture, or the picture we have pointed out, knowing the description is not the described, and you look at it, and have an insight into that, and it must take place instantly, now, and that thinking about it at home - don't do it, it is just a waste of time. Right? When you are sharing something, you are sharing it now.

What times is it? I think that is enough, isn't it?

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 13TH APRIL 1976

Krishnamurti: I believe we are going to have a dialogue this morning, a conversation between two friends about a serious subject. And if we could this morning take one subject, one problem, or one issue and go into it thoroughly perhaps that would be worthwhile. So what shall we talk over together seriously and see how far we can go into it deeply, not theoretically, not in abstraction, but an issue or problem that we have to face psychologically every day. So what subject or what issue can we take that will by pursuing it step by step cover the whole field of existence?

Questioner: Sir, I am sorry to be asking you a question about violence, but I have had it with me for over a year and I have never been able to ask you. I thought I would find the reply for myself but up till now it has not appeared to me. The question is very simple: the physical survival of a man or a whole community, not the psychological survival, the physical, if he is threatened with annihilation by the force of arms of another party, what then is the right action?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: I would like to ask why thought persists?

K: Why thought persists, continues, is that it?

Q: What is the relationship between feeling and action?

K: What is the relationship between feeling and action; and the other question was, what is a community or a group of people or a nation to do when a stronger nation uses arms and violence to suppress it.

Q: I am trying to avoid conditioning, and in relation to this question, how does it relate to the school that is being started here?

K: Is there any way of not conditioning a child. Yes, sir?

Q: Sir, could we talk about education, especially the education of the young child?

K: Could we talk about the education of the young child.

Q: Is there a possibility of relationship between a man and a woman in a transformed state, and specifically if desire and the interference of the mind wasn't operating would there be sexuality?

K: I couldn't quite catch the whole question. Could you make it brief?

Q: Yes. Without the interference of thought or desire would there be sexuality between people living in the transformed state, living together.

K: Has somebody heard it?

Q: Sir, she wants to know is there a possibility of a relationship between a man and a woman in freedom, and if they are both free is there any sexuality.

Q: Without desire operating.

K: Yes, yes.

Q: What about resistance towards fear?

K: Resisting fear. Now that's enough. Yes, sir?

Q: What is important to me is to be the wholeness of love, and understanding, without duality, to express the vitality of that.

K: Have you understood the question?

Q: He wants to know, I think, well he hasn't exactly asked a question, he says what is important to him is a feeling of love without the duality of subject and object.

K: A statement was made which is, that he feels love and compassion should exist in life and how to express it in action. Now that's enough. Now which do you think is the most important question in all these questions?

Q: What is the correct action in life?

K: What is the correct action in life. Could we take that and into that question put all the other questions, including one nation oppressing another nation, supporting one nation with arms against another nation which is weaker, and all the questions of love and affection, and how to resist fear, though we have talked a great deal about fear, it is not a question of resisting it, and so on. Can we go into that, taking that one question: what is the correct action in life? Right? Would you like to begin with that and include all the others? May we?

The word `correct' means accurate, right. When we use the word `correct', the meaning of that word, the root meaning of that word also implies accurate, right, meticulous action in life and what is right action from that. What do we mean by action? Let us stick to this one thing, it will include everything if we go into this really earnestly and seriously. What do we mean by action? You know this has been one of the great problems of life. The religious people have said, right action is to have a highest principle and act according to that principle. The Indians call it Brahman, and the Buddhists and so on, various religions have said, right action must conform both morally, spiritually, in every direction according to the principle of the highest thing.

And in the modern world what do we mean by action, to act, to do. Is action in the active present - please listen to this - is action in the active present, or is it an action dependent on the past according to the future, or is action based on the past ideas, conclusions, knowledge? You understand? The word 'act' means to do now. That is the word, the significance of that word is to act now. Now what do we mean by action in our daily life? Is it based on a principle, on an ideal, on a conclusion; the Arab and the Jew, the Hindu, Muslim, on the conditioning of the human mind according to culture, tradition and so on? And is action based on a past memory, experience, knowledge? So what do we mean by action, which means, what is your action in daily life based on, what is the motive, what is the purpose, what is the intention, what is the background of action?

Q: Self-centredness.

K: Is it based on self-centred activity? Please, this is very, very serious question because we are going to find out if there is an action which is not mechanical. We will go into that but first we must be very clear for ourselves what do we mean by action. Coming here to the meeting is an action, thinking is an action, going to the kitchen and washing dishes is an action, digging the garden and so on, going to the factory, going to the office - what do we mean by action? Is action fragmented: the action of the artist, the action of the police, the action of the engineer, the action of man and woman in relationship? Those are all fragmented actions, aren't they? Right? Please, come with me, move. So you may go to the office and there be ambitious, envious, play all kinds of tricks and come back home and be very affectionate - both are activities. And they are self-contradictory, so it is fragmentary and therefore conflicting: I say one thing and do another, think something and put a totally different meaning into words. All that is action. The action that is going on killing baby seals, wiping out the whales - a lovely civilization you have! - forming a community, a commune, fighting with each other, wars, everything is action. So what do we mean by correct action? Knowing what the world is, how it is fragmented, the Arab, the Jew, the Muslim, the Hindu, you follow, the Catholic, the Protestant, the communist, the socialist and so on and so on and so on.

First of all, do we see or are aware of what is actually going on in the world? Or have we shut our eyes and live in a small world of our own desires, our own pleasures, our own activities, and say, what is right action in there? Do you follow? So what do we mean by correct action?

Can there be correct action if that action is based on an ideal? Let's take that for example. Can there be correct action according to an ideal? What is an ideal? Please go on. Please, this is a dialogue.

Q: Something from the past.

K: You say, an ideal, what is that, what does it mean? You have ideals, haven't you, conclusions, haven't you?

Q: `What should be'.

K: What should be, all right. What should be, from `what is'. Right? `What is' and `what should be' - that's a fragmentary action, isn't it. Why do human beings have ideals at all, `what should be'?

Q: I think that ideals are a memory of an orderly action according to an order.

K: Which is, `what should be'.

Q: In a sense, however there are ideals as a memory of the order of the universe.

K: No, sir, look, please, let's be simple, don't let's bring in the universe, let's begin slowly. I am angry, one is angry - the 'should be' is not to be angry. One is not brotherly but one should be brotherly. Right? So why do we have this 'should be'?

Q: Fear.

Q: Trying to change.

K: Please if I may suggest as a friend, look into yourself and find out why you have a 'should be'.

Q: We don't like 'what is'.

Q: Because you are not the real thing.

K: No.

Q: Because one doesn't know what to do with what is going on in oneself.

K: That is what I am saying, you do not know what to do with 'what is', is that it? Do please give a little attention.

Q: We are avoiding looking at 'what is'.

K: Therefore, one avoids 'what is' because one doesn't know how to deal with 'what is'. If you knew how to alter the 'what is' you wouldn't go to 'what should be', would you? Please, it's a dialogue.

Q: 'What is' I will never be able to change though, I don't kill baby seals but people do, I can't change that. What can I do?

Q: She says she doesn't kill baby seals, she is resigned to not being able to change certain things.

K: So you are resigned, you accept.

Q: I don't.

K: You don't accept it?

Q: I don't accept it but I am upset. It seems something that I can't change.

K: I am not talking of changing something out there, changing yourself. We are asking, what is correct action in daily life. That was the question he raised and we said what is action. I can't go back if you don't pay attention to it. Let's go on.

We say our action is based on, one of our activities is based on `what should be'. Right? I am asking you, why you have invented the `should be'.

Q: Because we are fragmented.

K: That's not an answer.

Q: We have certain ideas on how we think things should be handled.

Q: Because I feel insecure.

Q: I don't remember ever inventing this, I am this.

K: How does it come about? Why do human beings have this `should be'?

Q: They are frightened of `what is'.

Q: Because he doesn't understand life in the moment, in this moment, now.

K: Sir, are we answering this question theoretically, or observing ourselves and finding out why you have an ideal, why you have a `should be', which is in the future, why?

Q: It seems that we can achieve some desirable goal.

K: We are all saying the same thing, sir, the `should be' is the goal, the purpose, the end and so on. I am asking you, please consider this, don't move away from it, I am asking you why you have such an ideal.

Q: It takes you to the future.

Q: People think they will receive some reward in the end if they were to conform to what we think is correct action, as opposed to conforming to what may be considered incorrect action though you will be punished. I think that has a lot to do with it, that you are going to receive a reward.

K: I understand that, sir. But we are saying, apparently we don't...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Have you got an ideal or not?

Q: Yes.

K: Be simple. Why?

Q: We want a psychological time.

Q: Thought.

Q: When I feel that things should be other than they are it is because I have been taught that I am not what I should be. That I am in some way not adequate.

K: I understand all that, madam. So you are saying, out of inadequacy, out of insufficiency, out of not being able to solve the problem 'as is', we have an ideal as a means of either escape, or as a means of transforming the 'what is' into 'what should be'. So I am asking you - you are the most extraordinary crowd.

Q: Because it affirms us.

K: Affirms what?

Q: I feel more important if I have ideals.

Q: So that we can be something because we are not able to impartially observe ourselves.

Q: We are not living in the here and now.

Q: We don't like what is happening in the world, violence or unhappiness or suffering. And the world is suffering, there is conflict and wars and wrong doings all around us. We believe that it doesn't have to be if we have all the ingredients in the world right here to change the world if we together decided it can be done.

Q: I have an ideal because if I don't have an ideal then I won't be anything. Then I would be nothing.

K: So you have an ideal because without an ideal you would be nothing. Right? How is that ideal put together?

Q: Thought generates a picture of the good in some way.

K: Sir, look, please let's be simple about this. The gentleman asked, the first question, what is the correct action in daily life. What should one do to act correctly, accurately, rightly in a world that is so utterly confused, in a world of conflict, in a world of violence, in a world in which relationship is so fragile, what is the right thing to do?

Q: Pay attention.

Q: Listen to each other.

Q: Change ourselves.

Q: Be still.

Q: `Should be' is a form of escape. Right? No?

K: You should know, whether you are escaping from `what is', you should know, unless one is totally neurotic. Unless one is totally neurotic then you wouldn't know even to find out what is correct action. But not being wholly neurotic we are investigating that problem. What is the right action in human relationship, what is the right action with regard to society, what is the right action when there is conflict, violence and so on and on and on, what is the right thing to do? Isn't it a problem to you? How do you set about finding what is right action? Would you accept authority when they say, this is right action, obey this?

Q: I guess so.

K: Will you, please look at it.

Q: I would sometimes, yes.

K: So you accept authority.

Q: That is not justifying that but that is true.

K: So you would accept authority to find out what is right action. So you are not free to find out, you have already established in your mind that there must be authority who will tell us what is right action. What happens then? Please follow that one particular issue: if you accept authority and say, authority will tell us what to do, what is the correct action, what is the result of that?

Q: Authority becomes important rather than the actuality.

K: Do look at, sir.

Q: You don't accept the fact that you already know, that you can look within yourself and answer it.

K: If you follow the sanction of a society, the sanction of a church, the sanction of a guru, what happens to your mind? There is no freedom, is there? And mustn't you have freedom to find out what is correct action? For god's sake. So when you accept another as an authority to tell you what to do, or what is the right action, you are denying right action. Ideal is your authority. Right? And that authority is created by an attitude of mind which says, the present, the `what is' I am not able to solve, or I don't know what to do with it, I want to run away from it. And you project the opposite of `what is', the `should be' is the opposite of `what is'. Right? So you have conflict. Out of that conflict can there be right action?

Are you following all this?

So what is a man to do, or a woman, who wants to find out what is correct, accurate, right action in life? Have you ever given your life to find out, or even ten minutes to find out what is right action? No, I am afraid you have not.

Q: You say that all ideals are essentially the same process of authority in the sense that it imposes upon you.

K: I did not say that, sir. What I said was, if you make an ideal as the authority then there is a contradiction in your life, it is the opposite of 'what is', isn't it, and therefore there is conflict in that. And where there is conflict how can you find out what is right action? So I want to find out as a human being, living in this world, in this almost insane world, what is right action.

Q: Observing without the observer.

K: I say is one's action based on the past, past memory, past experiences, knowledge? This is a very important question, go into it with me please for a while. If one's action is based on the past then I am living in the past. Living in the past one meets the present and modifies the present and creates a future. Right? I live according - one, not I - one lives according to a principle, established either through pleasure or through compulsion or through environmental influence or through ignorance, one projects from the past a principle, which is 'what should be', and one tries to live according to 'what should be'. Right? This is what is happening in our daily life: I must not be angry, I must be this, I must not do that, I wish it didn't happen that way. So we are always living in the past, meeting the present and modifying the present and that we call action. Right? And in that process action is never complete. Right? Are we meeting each other on at least this one thing? One has had an experience and that experience either pleasurable or dangerous or distasteful, and according to that experience one tries to live and meets the present, doesn't understand the present, becomes confused in the present and creates a future confusion. Right? Do we see this in our life? Right? May we go on from there?

We are trying to find out what is correct, right, accurate action. Accurate means care, attention, otherwise you cannot be accurate. Right? If you want to measure something you must pay tremendous attention to it, otherwise you will not measure correctly. So to act correctly you must give to action great attention. Right? But you cannot give great attention to action if there is an idea which is established in the future. Or you say, I have a measure of my own and I am going to measure accurately something else. You follow? So to find out correct action, right action, accurate action, there must be care. Right? Is that clear? Please, this is a dialogue. Care. Do you care, care, love, committed, to find out what is right action, or is it just theory? Care, you care as the mother cares for the little baby, you understand, it wakes up in the middle of the night and she spends day after day, day after month, caring - do you so infinitely care to find out what is right action? You understand, sir? We know a man, he was a high judge, supreme honour in the great Courts. One morning he woke up and said, 'I am passing judgement on people and I don't know what right judgement is. I know according to legality, I know what it means to pass a judgement, but what is true judgement?' You understand? So he called his family - this is an accurate story because I saw him, and I am not exaggerating, this is what happened - he called his family, he said, 'I am going to find out what is right judgement, what is the truth in judgement.' So he said, 'I must give up everything, give up my position, my money, my family, this is to me tremendously important in life because I am a judge.' He gave up everything and for twenty five years lived by himself and tried to find out what is the right judgement. And somebody brought him to one of the talks the speaker was giving and he came to see us the next day and said, 'You are quite right because what I have been doing is mesmerizing myself, thinking I have found the right action. But I never started right from the beginning to be free from tradition'. You understand? 'To be free from any possibility of deception. And there must be no illusion in my enquiry'. You follow? And illusion exists when there is a desire to arrive at the right decision. Oh, you don't understand this.

So to find out what is correct action you must care infinitely. If you do then you and I can have a dialogue. But if you say, you know, throw any old idea into the basket and pick something out of it thinking that is right action, I am afraid we shan't meet each other. But if you are really concerned then we can look at it. To start with there must be freedom of enquiry, to enquire, no prejudice, no conclusion. Can you do that? Otherwise you can't enquire, or find through that enquiry what is right action. That's simple, isn't it, but extremely difficult to do because you don't want to give up your prejudices, your conclusions, your ideals. So there must be freedom not only to enquire into what is correct action, there must be freedom to pursue constantly, right to the very end, until you find the right action.

So to find out there must be care, there must be attention.

Right? So one has to begin by finding out what is action.

Everything is action: getting up, sitting down, walking, looking at the sky, the trees, talking, being miserable, going to the office, quarrelling, violence, everything in human relationship is action, even in the technological world it is action.

Q: But not my action.

K: Is your action different from that of another? Yes, sir, you have to enquire. Is my action of which I am very proud, or I want to find out what is correct action, is my action different from your action? If my action is based on anger, it's like yours; if my action is based on ambition, it's like yours. Right? If my action is based on envy, it's just like any other only I express it in trousers, the other expresses it in knickerbockers or in something else. So there is no 'my action' and 'your action', there is only action. We can't accept that easily because we think my action must be totally different from your action, because I think I am an individual. Am I an individual? As we said the other day, individual means indivisible, not fragmented, not broken up, whole, such a person is an individual but most of us are fragmented, broken up, contradictory. So I want to find out what is action. Action, not right action, I'll come to that presently. What do we mean by action? There are such varieties and multiplications of action. So is there an action not contradictory, not fragmented, but whole, which at any level of existence will be whole always? You understand my question? We know fragmented action. Right? Are you clear on that? Right. And fragmented action must lead to conflict, broken up. So I am asking myself as a human being, I say, is there an action which is whole, complete, not contradictory, not fragmented, not a business action, family action, artistic action, commercial action, technological action, but action as a whole. You have understood my question?

So my enquiry is not only into fragmented action but observing the fragmented action both outwardly and inwardly, which is the same movement, one says to oneself, is there an action which is not fragmented. That is, I do something at the office, something totally different at home. You follow? Totally different religiously and morally and so on and so on. Is there an action which is whole? The word `whole' means healthy, that means physically healthy, then it also means sane, sanity, not neurotic - neurotic being based on some belief, conclusion, ideas - reasonable, logic, clear. That means sane. And also `whole' means holy, h-o-l-y, sacred. You follow? That word `whole' means all that. And one's mind says, I must find an action which is whole. We know what is fragmented action, the action of a Muslim against a Hindu, the Jew against the Arab, violence and so on, those are all fragmentary actions. Now I want to find out if there is an action which is whole. Right? Are you interested in this, does it mean something to you? Now how am I to find out, how is one to find out when your mind is fragmented? You understand?

Q: When the mind is fragmented? I didn't understand that.

K: Is your mind not fragmented, or are you saying, is the mind fragmented?

Q: He doesn't understand what your question is.

K: He doesn't understand my question. Sirs and ladies, you know what fragmented action is. Right? Kind and the next minute unkind, generous and not generous, brutal and occasionally kindly, affectionate, saying one thing and doing another - the politicians are doing that beautifully and we are doing it in our daily life also. Those are all fragmented actions. When every religion has said, don't kill, and we have killed everything, and Christians probably have been the greatest killers in the world. You understand? So there is fragmented action. We know that and the result of all that. The dolphins are one of the most intelligent animals in the sea, and they are destroying them. And the people who destroy them go home and say, 'I love you'.

Q: Being annoyed is a fragmented action too.

K: Of course, sir, everything is fragmented action. So I am saying, we know that. Now what is then an action which is not fragmented?

Q: There is one action, sir, that action is overpopulation of the world, all over the world we have one common action and this has started to over-populate the world.

K: I know.

Q: This is the cause of all the troubles we have.

K: Yes, sir, I know, overpopulation. They are doing something at last in India, when it is probably too late. Overpopulation all over the world, five billion and in the next five years - you follow? Geometrically progressive. That's also action, fragmented. Now when a human being realizes that, this fragmented action, and asks, is there an action which is not fragmented.

Q: Action without choice.

K: The same thing.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We have done that just now.

Q: It seems to me that as long as there is action there has to be someone who is performing the action. So long as there is someone performing the action there seems to be a centre of desire.

K: Quite right.

Q: So long as there is a centre of desire...

K: As long as a human being is fragmented his actions will be fragmented. That's what you are saying.

Q: How can one resolve it?

K: I am coming to that, sir, we are going into it, not escape from it. We are going to understand and resolve this problem.

Q: Is there an unfragmented action?

K: We are going to find out, sir.

Q: An action based on love is not fragmented.

K: Is that an idea? Is that a theory? Is that 'what is'? So when you say, action based on love is not fragmented, you have already fragmented it.

Q: It is an observation of 'what is'.

K: Which is, sir, if we say, look, all that I know is what I call love, in it there is fragmentation. Is there love in which there is no fragmentation? Then it is not a theory. I am enquiring, I am finding, I am caring to find out.

Q: Sir, the growth of a tree, that's a type of action, would you say it's a fragmented action?

K: We said the other day - sir, that cannot be answered. Let's get on. Now a human being says, there is the actor and the action. Right? The actor is the fragmented human being and whatever he acts must be fragmented. Right? Whatever he does, his god, his love, his relationship, his activity, everything he does must be fragmented if the actor himself is fragmented. Right? That's simple law. It is a fact. So can there be a human being, you, who is not fragmented and therefore his action complete, whole? Now we are going to find out. Because we have no ideals in examination, no conclusion, no prejudice, I am what I am. There is this human being who is fragmented, is he aware that he is fragmented or is it just an idea that he is fragmented. You follow the difference? Is he aware in himself that he is fragmented? Or he has been told that he is fragmented? Which are two different activities. Now which is it? Do you know, or aware, that you are fragmented?

Q: I am aware that I am fragmented.

K: First do you know, are you aware, conscious, any word you like? If you are, then what will you do with that fragmentation, how do you look at that fragmentation? Please, do pay attention, you will find it if you pursue this. How do you look at that fragmentation?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, how do you look at it, sir, don't theorize about it, do it actually and find out how you look at yourself as a fragmented human being.

Q: It is undesirable.

K: So you say, undesirable, so already you are looking at the fragmentation and say it is undesirable, you have already condemned it. Therefore can you look at your fragmentation without judgement?

Q: Without making it pure?

K: Without judgement.

Q: Without making it better?

K: I beg your pardon?

Q: With hope.

K: With hope, which is another judgement. Do please give a few minutes attention to this.

Q: Sir, but if one realizes one is fragmented, one can only know one is fragmented by means of contrast, by having an ideal of what being whole, a unit is and what is fragmented.

K: No, sir, look, don't you know when you are fragmented, when you say one thing and do another?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is that not fragmentation, I say one thing and do something else? On a simple basis, start with that not with heavens.

Q: Inconsistency.

K: Inconsistency, contradiction, simple words.

Q: What about the resistance that kind of occurs when I am sitting here right now, that feels fragmentary.

K: Sir, do look at yourself. I am asking a question, whether you are aware that you are a fragmented human being, aware in the sense watching, looking, that you have a black beard, white hair, purple or whatever it is, watching. You look, you are tall or short. In the same way can you look at yourself and see whether there is fragmentation?

Q: Isn't what is looking a fragment also?

K: I am coming to that, sir, of course. If you will kindly have a little patience you will find out because one must go into this very carefully, sir. I said at the beginning you must care, you must love the thing you are looking at and find out.

Q: Don't I have to accept that as what I am and `what is' right now?

K: When I see I am fragmented, I have to accept it, haven't it. Why do you accept it? Just look at it. Then from that arises, are you looking at it, or rather, how do you look at it? Take trouble please. How do you look at it? Are you looking at it with judgement? Are you condemning what you see, saying, `I mustn't be fragmented, how awful, I know it will lead to all kinds of trouble therefore I mustn't be fragmented'? How do you look at your own fragmented activities, with what eyes, with what ears?

Q: Realizing that even if you are fragmented still you have to act.

K: Of course, sir, we are coming to that. So if you are observing with conclusions, with prejudice, with all kinds of reasoned thoughts, then you are still fragmented, aren't you? So can you look - please listen to this - can you look without any condemnatory attitude, rationalized, just look? Then is there an observer different from the thing he is looking at? If you eliminate condemnation, prejudice, judgement, rationalization, which are all the past activities, you follow, then is there an observation in which the observer is not? The observer being condemnation, judgement, prejudice, despair, hope, saying, how terrible - all that is the observer's activities, therefore it prevents you from looking at `what is'. This requires sanity, reasoned thinking. So there is only the observation, the thing, not the observer looking. You follow? When you look without the observer who is the past, who is the judgement and so on, what takes place? Q: Contemplation.

K: Experiment, do it please, don't tell me. When there is no division between the Arab and the Jew, what takes place? What takes place?

Q: Conflict ends.

K: Conflict ends.

Q: Acceptance.

K: Not acceptance, sir.

Q: There is nothing to accept, the conflict would be over.

K: Yes, the thing is gone. You understand? When there is no Muslim and Hindu, communist and socialist, and all the rest of it, outwardly, there is no conflict, is there, and therefore complete action outwardly.

Q: We have to cease to exist.

K: Now, please I am going to show you, I am going to look at something. You understand? There is now the Catholic, the Protestant, the Baptist, you know, the division, division, division, all over, not only in the religious world, in the so-called religious world, but also the political world, the geographical world, racial world, there is division that has caused untold misery. Right? That has brought appalling destruction. Now do you see the truth of that? The truth, not, I am a Jew, I must still be a Jew, I'll accept this. Do you see where there is division there must be conflict. See it, have an insight into it. And therefore the moment you have an insight into the truth of that then you are acting wholly, aren't you. Is this clear somewhat?

Q: Sir, any sense of self is divisive, isn't it?

K: Yes. But I don't want to go to that ultimate fact. Now let's look at it the other way. Thought we said is a fragment, do you see the truth of that? Thought is a fragment, it is not the whole, and thought has divided the world - you are a Christian, I am a heathen, you are godly and so on. I don't have to keep on repeating this endless rubbish. So thought being fragmented in itself, whatever it does it breaks up. That is a truth. Do you see the truth of it? Right? So is there an action which is not touched by thought and therefore it will be whole?

What is the root of all this contradiction? You understand my question? What is the root in one's life that brings about this contradiction? The `me' and the `not me', `we' and `they', my belief against your belief, my experience against your experience - what is the root of this division? We are still asking what is the correct action in life. And we say, what is the root of this division.

Q: Thought itself, the word.

K: We went into that sir, go a little deeper than that. We have said that, thought itself is a fragment and therefore whatever it does creates fragmentary activity. Now we say, go a little further. Is there - no, what is the root of all this?

Q: Desire for profit.

K: Oh, no. The desire for profit, the desire to avoid punishment. We are nurtured, our culture is based on these two principles: reward and punishment. Right? No? Do this, you will go to heaven, do this, you will become successful, do this, you will be representing the country, if you don't do that you will be punished. So our culture is based on this principle of reward and punishment. That's again fragmentary. But I am asking you, what is the root of all this movement of fragments, breaking up, what is the source of all this?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You don't even think it out first. I am just asking a question and you are ready to jump. What is the root of all this, sir?

Q: Motive.

Q: Self.

K: We have been through all that. We said as long as you have a motive, a cause, there must be fragmentation. Where there is a cause there must be an effect, therefore there is a division. It is not one unitary movement. You understand. Now I am asking - please listen, I hope you aren't too cold - what is the root of all this?

Q: Egocentricity.

Q: Trying to escape from 'what is'.

K: Are you answering this, please I am not being rude or impatient, are you answering this from your investigation and discovery, or are you just throwing off some words? We want to know what is the root of all this, the root of this misery, confusion, contradiction, unhappiness.

Q: If there is no action then there is no conflict.

K: What? We are saying, sir, life is action, you can't live without action. May I go on asking the same question?

Q: Separation from the moment.

K: Have you discovered that?

Q: The origin of thought.

K: Go on, sir, go on.

Q: We want to be secure.

K: Are you saying the basic cause is insecurity and because we have reduced the world and ourselves and everything around us to such a confusion, which breeds insecurity and therefore out of that insecurity all fragmentation takes place - is that what you are saying? Why have we reduced this world like this, what has made us? Why do human beings behave as they do? May I ask this, why do you behave as you behave?

Q: Because that's our attitude.

K: Do please listen. Why? Why do you support wars, why do you support all the killing that is going on? Why? Do please go into it, don't answer me.

Q: Ego.

Q: Because I don't see it going on.

K: You mean to say you don't know they are killing each other, throwing bombs, terrorists, innocent people being killed by the hundred.

Q: I see it on the screen.

K: But you mean you see it there but you don't feel it, is that it? Would you feel it if your - not your - if one's son, wife, husband were killed? What a world this is. No, I am asking, sir, please, don't be bored by this question, repetitive question because you are not answering it: why do human beings behave like this?

Q: Sir, we base our actions on thought and it is always inadequate.

K: Yes. So what will you do, what are you going to do about it? If you realize that your thought and all action based on thought is inadequate, incomplete, contradictory, causing great misery, what are you going to do about it? Just escape? Run away into some commune where you won't think at all, you know, carry on? What will you do?

Q: Reunite this half with the other half. We have fallen, when we are pregnant we are only half what we are, to become whole we have to be reunited with our true inheritance.

K: That's another idea, isn't it, are you doing it?

Q: I am working on it.

K: Not 'working on it'. You see that gentleman said a very simple thing.

Q: Maybe that we have not been separated. We are not separate.

Q: Clearly as thought I can do nothing.

K: Sir, he said thought being inadequate and the inadequacy brings about this confusion, misery, the slaughter of human beings and nature and everything, what are you going to do about it? What will you do as a human being? Join societies?

Q: See it.

K: That would prevent killing?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I give up! You see.

Q: We have to find out if there is an action which is not based on self.

K: So what are you going to do?

Q: Find out.

K: Find out what? You are not relating to yourself as a human being who is the world. Right, sir? You are the world and the world is you, we have created this world, haven't we.

Q: We are related to our thoughts.

K: So please, if thought is inadequate and realizing, if I may point out something, which is, all thought leads to sorrow. Then what will you do? Please listen to what I just now said: all thought, because all thought is fragmentary, all thought leads to sorrow. If you see this what takes place?

Q: You live it.

K: Do you live it?

Q: Yes.

K: That means you are only giving thought its right place and therefore psychologically free of all thought?

Q: It's logical.

K: Not logical, sir, of course it is logical, but does this take place?

Q: I feel it is logical, I do not think it takes place.

K: Logic goes only so far. Right? Logic is necessary, logic implies clear thinking. Clear thinking has pointed out thought is inadequate, thought being inadequate can't solve the problems, human problems, so what will you do when you realize that, you in yourself? You are the total human being, of all humanity you are, you are the result of all human suffering, of all human agony, despair, fear, hope, you are that, so you are the world and the world is you. Right? Do you realize that, do you see the truth of it, the feel of it? Therefore you give up all nationality. You follow? Right? Then you realize that your thinking is inadequate. How do you realize it? As a rational process? As a logical conclusion?

Q: You feel it.

K: You realize it, you feel it, it is so in you, then what is next?

Q: That's what I feel.

Q: We don't know what is next.

K: What time is it?

Q: Twelve thirty.

K: Look, may I, it is twelve thirty we must stop, may I just finish this. Sorry, not to take it away from you but we must conclude this. If we realize that all thinking is inadequate to solve our problems, not as a logical conclusion, not as an aphorism, but truth, that it is a law that thought is inadequate because thought is a fragment, thought has created the world and divided the world, all that is seen and also realizing that you are the world and the world is you, fundamentally, basically, because go where you will there is suffering, tears, misery, confusion, hunger, starvation, misery, you understand. It is the common thing in humanity. So you are the world and the world is you. And when you realize that thought, which is thought of mankind, is inadequate to solve the problem, the human problem of living, existence, relationship, fear, all that, then what happens?

Q: We have to go beyond thought.

Q: Before you were asking a gentleman here that if he didn't feel when there was a war, killing, what about if your wife or son was killed. Maybe it will come to feel the same way killing anybody the way we feel about our son or husband.

K: No, madam. That becomes a theory.

Q: I don't mean a theory, I mean deep inside if you really feel the same. Could that be possible?

K: May I finish? I said let me conclude. How do you realize this truth? Is it an intellectual acceptance of an obvious reasoned fact, a theory that one has proposed and you accept it as a theory, or do you make from this statement that you are the world and the world is you, and that thought is inadequate, an abstraction of it, an ideal, or do you live with it? You understand my question? If you live with it, not make an abstraction of it, an idea of it, that thought is inadequate to solve our human problems in spite of what the politicians say, every philosopher says thought is necessary, they have built marvellous schemes, systems, but you, you are not a philosopher, nor am I, we are just ordinary human beings, and we realize thought is so inadequate, for god's sake, what am I to do when it is inadequate? We say, live with it, hold it, like a jewel, look at it, don't you tell what it should do, look at the jewel that you have, it will tell you what to do. You understand what I am saying? But we are so eager to tell it what to do. You understand? You read a story, a thriller, it's all written there, you don't have to tell it what should be done; so in the same way here is the most extraordinary jewel you have, to realize that you are the world and the world is you, and thought is totally, absolutely inadequate to solve our human problems of relationship - to see that and live with it every minute of the day, then you will find the correct action.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 15TH APRIL 1976

We are going to have a dialogue. The speaker thought it would be a good idea if two or three discussed with me a particular subject and in discussing that please join in. There are three or four people who are going to have a dialogue with me about a particular subject, which I am going to tell you presently. And please join in when you are doubtful or uncertain and want to make the point clear. So it is not excluding you but when we have two or three or four people discussing, having a dialogue, it's much more concentrated. Which doesn't mean we want to keep you out so join in when you think it is necessary.

The subject is: in a disintegrating society what is correct action to survive in freedom? You understand? In a disintegrating society what is correct action to survive in freedom - that is the subject which we are going to have a dialogue about. The more you go into this question the more vital, interesting and has great significance. You understand the question? Please be clear what we are discussing about. We know society is disintegrating, morally, ethically, even economically and overpopulation and so on, religiously, it is disintegrating. Right? And in that disintegrating society what is correct action to survive in freedom? That's what we are going to discuss this morning. There they are, three or four of them; one from Germany, American, one Indian from India and so on. So we are going to start with these three or four, and then please join in when you think it is necessary, not talk about trees and you know some other subject except what we are talking about.

If you realize that the society is disintegrating - we mean by that word to disintegrate, breaking up, not generating, creating but breaking up, a society that is breaking up throughout the world, not only in this country, but in India, in Europe, in every part of the world - what is correct action, correct being accurate, true, right action to survive both physically, ethically, religiously, with a mind that is clear and intense, to survive in freedom. If there is no freedom, and yet you may survive, you have lost the whole endeavour man has been making for millennia, which is to free himself from nature, from the political structure, domination, tyranny and all the rest of it. So the question is - please, if I may repeat it again - in a disintegrating society what is correct action to survive in freedom. Right? You have got the question clear? Now we are going to start.

This is not an arena, you understand. I am not the gladiator and the rest are the lions. You understand? They are not going to attack me, we are going to survive. We are going to go into this question, which is extraordinarily important and very interesting. We were to have discussed this question with the scientists and the psychotherapists who met here about three weeks ago, but unfortunately they didn't, we discussed about something else. So we would thought this would be a very good and pertinent question to ask.

Q: I think in considering that question one must start with the question, is correct action based on thought, or how can I bring correct action about in my daily life?

K: Does correct action come from thought which will affect my daily living. We can theorize what is correct action which would be of very little importance, very little significance but what is correct action in my life, in daily every day life. Realizing I live in a society that is not only corrupt, immoral, destructive, wars, and living in that society does correct action come from thinking? That is the question.

Q: Shall we not make clear at the outset what is action?

K: If you hear the question, do you want me to repeat it? No? Not necessary? Please tell me.

Q: Some people want the questions repeated.

K: Some want it repeated. Before we, the questioner says, before we discuss correct action, whether it is derived from thought, the question is what do we mean by action, to act. Now, so there are two points in this: does thought bring about correct action, and what do we mean by action? So let's take those two for the moment. So we will say, what is action? We were looking at a dictionary, action means to act, to do, not, having done or will do, not in the past or in the future but doing, which is always in the present. Right? Please let's be clear on this point. Action means active present, acting in the present, not having acted or will act. So action is always in the present. This is very important to understand, at least I feel it is important because we are always acting from an experience, from knowledge, therefore it is based on the past, or, I will act, which is in the future, therefore we are never acting now in the present. So is there such action? You understand the question? We have acted according to a pattern based upon experience, which is the past, according to a system, to a tradition, to a memory, which are all the past, and from that past we act, thinking we are acting in the present. Or I will act, which means I have laid down a pattern of action in the future, according to that pattern I act. Is this clear? Either action springs from the past or from the future: I will do, I should be, or I have been, which was good, bad, indifferent, or pleasant and I am acting from that.

So is there an action - please listen to this - is there an action which is not based on future or on the past? Just listen to the question first. You understand? We act from the past or according to a pattern of the future - the past is the tradition, is the memory, is the experience, is the knowledge, and the future is the ideal, the 'what should be', 'what must be', which is also another form of tradition and according to these two patterns we act, therefore we are always acting within the time limit of yesterday and tomorrow. So is there an action which is always in the present? You understand the question? It's extraordinarily interesting this, if you go into it.

So we have explained what is action, either having its root in the past, which is a motive, which is a cause, or a fixed or modified pattern in the future and acting according to that, imitating it, conforming to it, that being the example. So always within this pattern we are acting. Now we are asking something entirely different, which is, is there an action which is not based in the future or in the past, which is real action? If I want to climb the tree, I am climbing the tree - not 'I will climb the tree' or 'have climbed the tree'. I don't know if you see. Right?

So we are asking: is there an action which does not have its roots in the past or conforming to a pattern established in the future? Leave it there. That's what we call action.

The other is: is there correct action springing from thought?

That was the first question. Are you following all this? You are interested in this? I hope you are. Though it is cold I hope you like this. So we are going to look at the whole structure and nature of thought, whether thought can bring about correct action. Or there is a totally different action which is not contaminated by thought? So what is thinking? And is the thinking different from the thinker? Right? So the question is: what is thinking? I am asking you this question, just listen, I am asking you this question: what is thinking, what takes place, what happens in your mind, in your brain when that question is put to you, what is thinking? Go on, sir, what is thinking? Watch your mind, your brain, how it responds.

Q: The brain can't find the answer, so in questioning this one realizes that one doesn't know.

K: No. The questioner says when you put that question, I don't know. That's one answer, I don't know what thinking is, but this whole machinery is in operation all the time, I don't know how it works, what is the energy that makes it work, what is the result, how it comes into being. Now I am asking you, please listen, what is thinking? And when somebody puts that question don't you look for an answer? Where? In a book that you have read? Examine it, please go slowly. In a book that you have read or try to remember somebody told you about it, or you say, I really don't know, I never thought about it? I have never thought about it, I am expecting someone to tell me about it, or I am trying to remember where I read about it. When you say, I don't know, what takes place? You understand? Either when you make a statement, I don't know, you are waiting for someone to tell you, or expecting to discover it for yourself. Right? When you say, I don't know, either you are waiting for someone to tell you, or you are looking for an answer in yourself. Right? Are we following each other? Now what are we doing? Waiting for the speaker to tell you? Or waiting for an answer out of your own observation? So that's one thing. Or you say, 'Well, I read it in a book, I must remember what it said, what the writer said, and I can't remember it, so I say, I don't know', which is totally different from the 'I don't know' of the first. You are following all this? I read it in a book and I have forgotten it, so I say, I don't know. Which is, you hope to remember the author of that book and try through association find the answer in that book. Right? So you are looking for an answer in memory. Right? Right?

Now something else: let's look at it for a minute. If you are asked a familiar question, what's your name, there is instant reply, isn't there. Why? There is memory in operation but it is so trained, your name is so well known to yourself it comes out instantly. Now if one asks a much more difficult question with which you are not quite familiar there is an interval - please watch all this, you can watch it in your own brain - there is an interval between the question and the answer, which is time lag. In that time lag you are enquiring quickly, where was it that I can find the answer, in that book, there is that operation going on, between the question and the answer there is a time interval in which memory is searching. So you take time to say, yes, that's the answer. Right? The familiar question, instant reply; a much more difficult question, an interval between the question and the answer and in that interval you are looking, you go to your book and try to remember; then there is the third thing, which is, you say, 'I really don't know', you are not expecting someone to tell you, when you don't know, you don't know. Right? Not knowing proceed from there. You understand the three stages?

Q: I didn't get the last one.

K: Sir, I do all the work. Sir, please do pay a little attention because we want to go on, there's much more involved in this question. The third thing is, when I say, 'I don't know', I am not expecting an answer from anybody, memory has no records about it, so I say, I don't know, which is real freedom to enquire. You understand? When you say, I don't know, that's a solid ground upon which you can build, from which you can move. Right. So there are these three states.

So the questioner says, what is thinking. It's memory, response of memory as we saw, response of experience as knowledge stored up in the brain cells, which is matter. You understand? The cells are a material process so thought is a material process. Right? That's clear. So can thought bring about correct action? That's the question. Right?

Q: The relationship between the noise of the thought, the sound of the thought which is immediate and the symbol of the thought. The relationship between the noise, the sound of the thought which is immediate, and the symbol of that sound, the symbol of the word. It is the noise of the thought.

K: I can't hear, make it much louder.

Q: Thought we said is a material process. Right?

K: I mean all the scientists are saying that too now.

Q: Yes. So there is a noise, sound in the active present right now, coming over, and then that sound has a meaning. The sound in a particular mode has a meaning, so what is the relationship of that sound in the now and the meaning which is from the past?

K: You can see he is from the Orient! No, no, it is very interesting, please. I understand, sir, I understand.

Q: Before you go on could you sort of rephrase his statement?

K: What is the relationship between the sound which the word makes and the meaning of the word. The meaning of the word and the sound of the word. Clear? Now wait a minute. He put that question. Right? He said, what is the relationship between the sound the word makes and the meaning of the word, the significance of the word, what is the relationship. Now he has put that question what is your answer? Take time. What is the answer? The relationship between the sound and the meaning of the word, which makes the sound, what is the relationship? That is, without the sound is there a meaning? You understand? Now you use the word `god', I am taking that haphazardly, god; the word makes a certain sound, that sound creates a meaning, is there a meaning without the sound? Is there a meaning without the word? Go slowly, you are going to find out in a minute. You have heard the word `mantra', have you? Which is now rampant in this country, fifty dollars worth! You know the word mantra, it is a Sanskrit word. Now I am not going to involve too much in it, I will just touch on it. You repeat that sound verbally - listen carefully - out loud, Topatopa, Coco Cola, don't laugh, please, it is the same. You don't have to pay fifty dollars to find that out, you can repeat the word, Topatopa, Coco Cola, repeat, repeat, repeat, loud; then you repeat it without the sound. You understand? Repeat it silently so that you don't hear the sound of the word. I won't go into all this. And when you repeat something without sound, what takes place?

So the question is, his question is: what is the relationship between the sound and the meaning of that sound? Right? Is there a meaning without the sound?

Q: There is.

K: There is. We are enquiring, please, you spoil it.

Q: Is there a meaning without the symbol?

K: That's what I am coming to. What is the source of the sound, the word? Please, if there were no word would there be no thinking? Or is thinking part of the verbalization? You know, this is too difficult, you are not used to all this. Look: let's take the word 'god'. Please I am neither believing it nor saying that there is god, we will just take the word, because that is a common word which you all use. You use that word, that word makes a sound and the word has great significance, which thought has given to it. Right? So what is the relationship of that word to the reality, to truth? You understand? Is there a relationship between truth and sound? Right? Of course not. Right? You have understood? It doesn't matter. This is too complex, I won't go into it.

So is there a thinking when there is no word? Or we are so used to words and when we are thinking we are thinking not only in words, in symbols, in metaphors, in imagination, it's all a process of verbalization. And if there is no verbalization, picture, imagination, what is thinking then? Right.

Q: How would one think if one didn't speak a language, say like English or French?

K: If you did not speak English, how would we communicate with each other? Through symbols, waving fingers? Which is also a form of verbalization. So let's proceed, we must get on.

So thinking, we said, is the response of memory, memory is the past, which is stored up in the brain and therefore thought is a material process. A material process in time. Time is movement, from here to there and so on. So thought is a material process in time. Right? This is simple. Now, can thought produce correct action? That was the question. We said what is action, we went into it, which is action either conforming to a pattern in the future, or imitation or adjusting the present to the past and acting according to that adjustment, and is there an action which is not in the future or in the past but now, which is not held in time, which is not encased in time? Got it? Now we say, is there correct action from thought? Now we have understood the meaning of thought, the meaning of action. Now is there right action in a disintegrating society to survive in freedom, right action? So can thought produce right action?

Q: No, thought cannot produce right action because thought is of the past, or the future, and action is now.

K: So the questioner is saying, thought which is based on the past or on the future, therefore fragmentary, and so it cannot under any circumstances produce right action. Do you understand? This is a most dangerous thing to say when all our actions are based on the past or on the future.

Q: It proceeds from thinking which is not the past or the future. Thinking which is in the now.

K: Yes.

Q: Now does that produce right action?

K: We are going to find out. So we said, thought is a fragmentary process, therefore it cannot under any circumstance bring about correct action. Do we see the truth of it, not the verbal statement and the sound the verbal statement makes, and the meaning the verbal sound creates, discarding all that do you see the truth of it?

Q: Is mechanical thinking sometimes very necessary?

K: Mechanical action is sometimes necessary. Of course. Riding a bicycle, driving a car, doing a dozen things in the technological world. Right? So that's understood, let's leave that for the moment.

Q: Sir, can correct action, accurate action follow from anything other than accurate perception?

K: That's what we are coming to. Quite right. Correct action can only come into being when there is accurate perception. You follow? He made a statement, which is, when there is accurate perception, from that perception there is action. And that perception is always in the present; it is not I have perceived and act, or I will perceive and act. Therefore perception brings right action. Now wait a minute: do you perceive the truth that thought under whatever circumstances cannot bring about correct action? Intellectually we have examined it, we have analysed it, we have broken it all up, and now we say, do you perceive that, as you perceived the tree which is truth, that's an actuality? So in this statement that thought under no circumstances can bring about correct action, do you perceive in that truth?

Q: How about creative thought? When you are writing a poem, or writing something, something that is new?

K: What about creative thought, when you write a poem, when you paint and so on, what is creative thought. So we must go again into the very complex question of what is creative, what is it to be creative? Do you want to go into that?

Q: Are not the terms 'creative thought' in itself a contradiction? Creation is birth and that's not creation.

K: You have heard it so I won't repeat it.

Q: Is not creation action and not thought?

K: Is not creation action, I don't know. He says, the questioner says, is there such thing as creative thought.

Q: How can that be, creation is of the now and thought is of the past, then there is a separation there.

K: The lady says it cannot be that because creation is in the present, thought is in the past.

Q: What is creation?

K: What is creation.

Q: Is not thought the vehicle we use to express creatively, express a creative impulse - thought is the vehicle.

K: Thought is a vehicle for a creative impulse. Creative impulse, which is taken over by thought and expressed in a poem, in stone, in what you like; the impulse, then the thought comes and takes it over and expresses it, and you call that creation. Right? Creative thinking. You see, we are going away a little bit, sorry, I must come back, we may deal with it presently because this is much more important than creative thought, creative thinking. What is correct action in my daily life? That's what we are talking about.

Q: Correct action and creative thought implies a sort of direction, for the hand to move from here to there, there's a direction. Now we use thought, a gentleman over there says as a vehicle, isn't that to give direction. I am wondering if true non-temporal, intelligence, that you have spoken of elsewhere, if that gives direction to action so that one isn't just wandering aimlessly, so that action can be correct and it leads to something.

K: Action implies, the questioner says, direction. And thought gives to action direction, from the past or from the future, direction based on the past or on the future, is that correct action. So please don't let's go back over and over again. So we have come now, we have said thought under no circumstances can bring about correct action. And that gentleman said, perception is action. Do you perceive the truth that lies in the statement that thought under no circumstances can bring about correct action, do you see the truth of it?

Q: I don't see it. I know from the past, from my life, every action is conflict and every action is a result of thought and yet I still do not, that's the only way I perceive that statement that you speak of.

K: No, sir, he made a statement, which is, thought under no circumstances can bring about correct action. Right? After explaining all this, after explaining the process of thought, after explaining what action is, we said thought is fragmentary and therefore there can be no correct action when there is a fragmentary broken up action. Right? That's all.

Q: But you say, you perceive it like the tree, I don't perceive it like I perceive the tree.

K: Do you perceive it as truth, as something real? Not a verbal statement and an abstraction of that statement? Do you understand? I hear a statement of that kind, then hearing it I make an abstraction of it into an idea. `Yes, I agree, that's a very good idea', so you have moved away from the fact, from the statement when you make an abstraction. So let's move.

Now he said, perception is action. That is, do you perceive in that statement the truth that thought can never bring correct action? You know what it does to one if you see this, a tremendous burden is taken away because we said thought is necessary, thought will bring about correct action, all the moralists, all the religious people, all the churches, all the politicians, thought, thought, thought. Here we are saying thought will never; you have broken a tremendous tradition.

Q: Sir, to hear the question I still have to think.

K: No. I have thought. I have explained to you.

Q: I think, as soon as I hear the question my mind thinks.

K: That's just it, sir. Can you listen without thinking? For god's sake. Can you listen - sir, look, that gentleman asked, what is the relationship between sound and the meaning - can you listen to the sound the word makes and the meaning which that sound is associated with. Now, can you merely listen to the sound first and not associate it with meaning? You have never done all this.

Q: But you know a language.

K: Sir, let's go back, sorry. So we see that thought cannot bring about right action. Now the next question is, in that question, survival. Right? We said the subject was: in a disintegrating society what is correct action to survive in freedom. Right? Now what do we mean by survive?

Q: Sir, is not survival implicit in correct action? How could you have correct action which did not include survival, indeed survival in freedom?

K: Is not correct action implied in survival.

Q: No, vice versa.

K: Vice versa. Doesn't survival imply correct action.

Q: No, does correct action imply survival.

K: Does correct action imply survival. Now what do we mean by survival?

Q: Biological survival.

K: Now when the world is overpopulated, when there are wars, when there are terrorists' bombs, all that is going on, in that culture, in that society, is survival possible? You understand my question?

Q: Survival in freedom, which is more important, freedom or survival?

K: We will find out, we are going to relate both of those and find out. Biological survival. When nations are divided, like the Arab, Jew, the Muslim, the Hindu, the communist, the socialist, you follow, this whole cycle of division into nationalities, into ideologies, into beliefs, is survival possible? You understand my question? We have had Vietnam war recently, there is a war going on all the time, all over the world, some place or other, and for those people who are caught in that their survival is non-existent. We sitting here having no wars, no immediate threat, we talk about survival. And when you look at this problem as a whole, is survival possible, biologically I am talking about, not psychological, we will come to that later, is biological survival possible when the world is divided? You understand? Nationalities, classes, ideologies, all the rest, is that possible?

Q: If I am lucky.

K: Obviously it is not possible. Right? Which history has shown, for those people who have lived at that period, they have been destroyed.

Q: But when I live here and I am lucky there is no war, then I have a good chance to survive.

K: Yes. Does survival then depend on luck? On chance? No, please. Will you tell your grandsons, or your sons and daughters, 'Your survival depends on chance, old boy', will you tell them that?

Q: We separate biological survival with psychological survival.

K: We will come to that, madam, go slowly. Go slowly, please, we are coming to that.

Q: Isn't it important, it seems to be that it is indispensable to enquire as to the origin of the conditions which have prompted us to ask these sort of questions.

K: Which is, you are saying, shouldn't you find out why human beings have divided themselves into nationalities. Yes, sir, that is what you mean, that is what you mean, why. Very simple. Tradition, custom, hoping to survive as a tribe against another tribe, security, if I identify myself with a community survival is more possible. Right? If I don't I may be destroyed. It is all very simple. So biologically survival becomes extraordinarily difficult when human beings biologically have divided themselves into nationalities, groups, committees, communities based on beliefs, principles, ideals, and all the rest of it. So will you sacrifice, give up your ideals, your nationalities, your beliefs, your etcetera, etcetera, to survive? Which means psychologically will you give up the structure of belief - you follow? - to which you cling as a means of psychological security which prevents biological security. If I insist that I am an Arab with all my religious feelings, with all my hurts of this and that, and I cling to that, hold on to that psychologically, I am bound to create a world in which survival becomes impossible.

So will you give up psychological securities to which you hold? Your belief, your dogma, your tradition, your prejudice, my experience is better than your experience, I know, you don't know? You follow? All that, can you give it up?

Q: Would that be correct action?

K: Wait, sir, you will find out, you are going to find out. Which means as long as you are seeking security in illusion, biological security becomes impossible. I don't know if you see that. Can you give up your experiences of pleasure? And there is great pleasure in calling yourself an American. Right? Affluent society and so on; or call yourself a Hindu who has lived for five thousand years, long before you were all etcetera, etcetera, and they take tremendous pride in that - 'We are a very ancient race, our knowledge of divinity existed before you were ever born or religion ever came into being'. So to give up all that, which is part of one's arrogance, completely to wipe it out. Yes, sir?

Q: I feel like I am my experience.

K: That's it. You think you are your experience. That's right, sir. I think, my experience is that as long as I remain a Hindu I am completely secure - that's my experience, I am that experience and that's what destroys biological survival. Can you give that up?

Q: Can you carry that same idea to your own name?

K: Sir, they have tried that too, change names into a number, or if not into a number call yourself Brother John. But it is still the same thing. Oh, for heaven's sake.

Q: I want to make it clear to myself, is what you are saying that any type of allegiance to any whatsoever it might be is false?

K: That's right, sir. Any type of attachment, not allegiance, attachment, attachment to a tree, to a piece of furniture, to a name, to a belief, to an ideology, that is what is destroying survival.

Q: If somebody says, I'll take you home, I say, take me home - that leads to property.

K: So correct action to survive in freedom. You understand? See what is involved. In a disintegrating society what is correct action to survive in freedom? It is all one movement, your understand, it is not correct action, survival, freedom, it's a total movement. I don't know if you see that.

So what is freedom? Are you free because you have got money and can go to India, Tibet, or to a Zen monastery? Are you free because you choose? We said because you can choose therefore you are free, and the people who can't choose, as in Russia, choose different systems, go from village to village, or one profession to another, they are not free. So you think freedom is based on choice. Right? Is that so? What do you mean by choice? When do you choose?

Q: When you are confused.

K: You choose when you are confused. When you are clear there is no choice. So clarity means freedom. I don't know if you see this, not choice. A man who sees things very clearly, clarity, such a man is free, but a man who chooses all the time and thinks he is free because he can choose, he is a slave. I wonder if you see that? So freedom means freedom - there are two kinds of freedom: freedom from and freedom. Right? We think freedom is always from something - from a prison, from a burden, from a wife or husband who nags or this or that - it is freedom from, which is really a reaction, which is not freedom. So is there a freedom which is not a reaction? You understand what is involved in all this?

Q: Freedom is non-attachment.

K: That's right. Freedom means non-attachment. Now wait a minute. You hear that statement, how do you receive that statement? Do you receive it applying it to yourself, or is it an idea? If that statement is made to the speaker, the speaker says, am I attached to my tree, to my reputation, to my book, to my belief, to my furniture, to my house, to my wife, to my father, attached - am I? And if you say, yes, I am attached, then you have to enquire why you are attached. Why?

Q: Fear.

K: No, no, don't register fear. Just saying fear as though you have solved it. You have to penetrate into it, why. Why are you attached? Do you know what happens when you are attached? You become that to which you are attached? Right? If you are attached to the furniture you are the furniture. Right? You accept that, that you are the furniture? So when you are attached you are that to which you are attached. That means to anything, it doesn't matter what. So why are you attached? Attached to a name.

Q: It seems something outside of oneself by which one can get out of one's emptiness.

K: So you say to get out of one's own emptiness, one's own loneliness, one's own boredom, one's own insufficiency, you cling to something hoping that it will give you sufficiency. There is emptiness and I have filled that emptiness with my furniture. Wait, don't laugh, that's what you are doing. And you laugh at it, that's an escape. You may fill that emptiness with books, with furniture, with my husband, my house, my experience, my god, my nationality and therefore you feel that emptiness has been filled and you are perfectly happy.

Q: How does freedom relate to survival?

K: We have explained this. How is freedom related to survival. If you are not free from your nationalities and divisions and ideologies as an Arab and a Jew, a Hindu, Muslim, communist, socialist, etcetera, biological survival becomes impossible. And that is made impossible because psychologically we are attached to all this. And if you want to live that way, go ahead.

Q: How is this related to silence?

K: Wait a minute. You see you are off to something.

Q: We do not see that truth in non-attachment, that non-attachment means freedom, then we make a theory of out of and become attached, and again there is no freedom.

K: That's what I was saying. When you hear a statement that attachment to the furniture destroys survival, how do you receive that statement? Is that an idea, or an actual fact in your life? You know the word `idea' comes from the Greek which means to observe. You understand? Not what we have made of it. You observe something and make an abstraction of it as an idea, you hear this statement that survival is not possible if there is psychological attachment to anything, you hear that statement and you make an abstraction of it into an idea and then say, how am I to carry out that idea. You understand all this? If you don't make an abstraction of it into an idea then you face it, then you are directly observing it.

Q: Sir, the position you take, the premises on which you operate, is that not a form of attachment?

K: Is not the position I take a form of attachment. Is the position the speaker takes, is that not an attachment? I didn't know I was taking a position. What position am I taking? Because I am sitting on the platform?

Q: Because of the statements you make.

K: Because of the statements I make? Those are logical, sane statements, it is not mine or yours. I don't take a position. I am not attached to those statements, I will change them if they are false. But if I said, I believe in god, and stick to it, then you can say I take a position. We are, as I said from the very beginning, investigating together, sharing the problem together, there is no authority in sharing. The speaker happens to be sitting on a platform, a little higher, for convenience, in that there is no authority. If I was attached to a certain position I would crawl out of it very quickly, I assure you.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, we have to live in the material world, clothes, food and shelter, that's the material world, work efficiently, objectively, sanely. That's the material world, but that survival in the material world is destroyed by our attachment, by our belief, by our experience, by our conditioning. If you are born in Russia you are conditioned in one way, if you are born in the Arab world - you follow? That is what is destroying us.

I think we had better stop. What time is it?

Q: Twelve twenty.

K: I think we had better stop, the wind is coming up.

Q: Freedom from attachment implies freedom from the need for physical survival.

K: No, sir, of course not. I need this warm coat to sit here.

Q: To you have to defend your body to survive?

K: Of course.

Q: Then you are not detached from your body.

K: Now, that goes off into something else. You people. Now wait a minute, sir. Are you the name, are you the thought, are you the body? If I am attached to the body, I am the body, I am then the furniture. If I am not attached to the name, to the form, to the body, then the body has its own intelligence to survive, which we have destroyed through drink. You follow? Destroyed the body, which we will go into when we talk about meditation. We had better stop now. Sorry, I hope you got something out of it.

OJAI 5TH PUBLIC TALK 17TH APRIL 1976

The last four talks that we have had here we have talked about several things concerning our daily life. Because we are concerned, not with abstractive theories, nor beliefs, nor any kind of conclusion about our daily existence, but we have been talking over together, I hope sharing the question of relationship between human beings, which is the very basis of all existence. And if that relationship is not correct, right, accurate, then we produce a society which is confused, brutal, violent, wars and so on, which is the modern culture, modern society. We also talked over together the whole question of what is thinking, what is thought upon which all our psychological as well as the technological world is based. Whether thought is adequate to meet all these problems, human problems. If it is not adequate then what is the activity which will produce correct action? We went into that very carefully, not only at the talk here but also through discussions that we have had here.

Then we talked about pleasure and the pursuit of it, what is involved in it, and also we went into the question whether man can ever end his sorrow, or must we accept sorrow as inevitable and go on with it. This has been one of the great problems of human beings, from the ancient of times, pre-history man has suffered, both biologically and psychologically, inwardly, very deeply through wars, through national divisions, through religions and so on. Man hasn't apparently, human beings, have never been able to resolve this problem of sorrow, and whether it can be ended completely. So out of that ending of sorrow comes passion, which is totally different from lust. We went into that carefully.

We also talked about fear - whether man can completely free himself totally from fear. We pointed out that it is possible: as there is an ending to sorrow there is an ending to fear. And this morning, if we may, we would like to talk about love, and also a very deep problem which is death. We are concerned with living which includes dying also. And in going into all these problems, investigating them, sharing together, is part of this thing called meditation, which we shall go into tomorrow morning. But without understanding, or deeply concerned with the human relationship, fear, thought, sorrow, meditation becomes merely an escape and therefore utterly meaningless. And I think it is very important for us to understand if we are at all serious, and I hope we are serious at least for this morning, that we should face these problems, not in abstraction, not as an idea, but as a daily, everyday fact. And if we merely avoid these facts, as most of us do, as we have developed a whole series of networks of escapes, our daily life becomes not only a great travail, great conflict, struggle, pain, but we produce a society, a culture that must inevitably conform or follow our daily life of misery, confusion, anxiety, sorrow, uncertainty and all that. So we are talking over together, sharing these problems. We are not, though it is a lovely morning after the rather dreary days of wind and rain and cloud, this is not a gathering to be entertained, to have one's intellect stimulated, or emotionally stirred. We are dealing with daily serious problems, and if we don't resolve them as human beings we contribute to future sorrow, misery, confusion, not only your own children but the whole of humanity. So please this is very serious what we are talking about. Either you listen completely, share it wholly, or you merely pay passing attention and carry on with your daily confused, unhappy lives. So please bear in mind, if I may again point out, that we are sharing this thing together, sharing implies that one must be hungry to find out, hungry to taste the things that are real. So this is not a one-sided affair. The speaker may point out, paint a picture verbally, but that which is painted verbally is not the actual, the description is not the described, the word is not the thing. And unless we go beyond and see the fact, the described, we merely then play with words. After saying all this we are going to now go into this question of what is love.

Again this has been one of the great problems of human beings. Human beings whether they live in the Far East, in the Middle East, or here. It is a question that one must investigate, not accept what love is, or define it, or come to some abstract conclusion what it should be because those things have no value at all. But to find out actually in our daily life what is implied in that word, the content of that word, the full significance of that word, because we are using that word so slackly. We have loaded that word with so much meaning, mostly sensual. So we must, if we may, use that word, knowing all the complications of that word, the meaning of that word, and explore together, share the structure and the nature of that thing called love.

So we are first asking whether love is desire, or love pleasure? When we use the word 'desire' what is the significance of that word, what is the meaning of that word 'desire'? How does it arise? How does it flower? What is the root of it? How does it come into being? So we must carefully go into that when we use desire in association with love. And apparently for most of us it is intimately connected with desire. Sexually, psychologically, biologically, spiritually, all that is involved in that word. So what is the root of desire, how does it come into being? When you have a desire for something, the objects of desire vary, but the root of desire is the same though the objects vary. So how does desire come into being in each one?

Please, as we said, we are investigating, sharing, we are not laying down the law, we have no authority in this matter, or any matter. The speaker is not your guru, nor are you his followers. That is an abomination, because when you follow somebody, except technologically, you are destroying truth. And through following another you can never come upon that which is truth. So one must, if we may point out, be free of all authority and be sceptical. It is good to be sceptical, doubtful psychologically about everything, including your pet gurus, specially your pet gurus! They are springing like mushrooms in this country. It is a very serious matter. And if one wants to find out for oneself, one must stand alone. And most of us are afraid to be alone.

So what is the beginning of desire? Because most religions, that is the propagandists religions, religions based on belief which are no religion at all, religions of authority and all that, most organized religions have said that you must, to serve god, you must be free of desire. And so the monks, the Indian sannyasis try to suppress desire and in the process of repression identify themselves with an image, with a name and thereby they think they have solved the problem. They are burning inside with desire but they suppress it through rituals, through discipline, through every form of conformity, effort. So this has been a great problem for human beings who are very serious to find out if there is a reality - if there is truth. Because desire breeds illusion, desire breeds experiences, and when you cling to an experience that becomes an illusion. So one must go into this question of what is desire very carefully, deeply because we have identified love with desire.

Is not desire sensation? Sensation, that is the activity of the senses plus thought. You understand? Sensations plus thought is desire. No? Do we share this, communicate this actuality together? Though one states it, that is, sensation plus thought is desire - is that fact, or just a statement of an idea? Can you look at something with all your senses completely? And in that looking end it and not let thought come into the activity of sensation? You understand? That is, when you look at something, the trees, the mountains, the human being, the face, anything, the endless movement of the sea, to look at it with all your senses, all your eyes and ears and nerves, look at it completely and not allow thought to come, to interfere with it. Then your perception is whole. Whereas when thought interferes with that perception it becomes fragmentary. So desire is fragmentary. Right? And we have unfortunately, or fortunately - it is up to you - identified desire with that thing called love. So we are asking: is love desire? And also we are asking: is love pleasure, sexually, and in all its different manifestations? Pleasure as we went into the other day, is what most human beings pursue endlessly, psychologically, outwardly as well as inwardly. We are not saying that you must not have pleasure, but we are investigating the whole business of pleasure because love is associated with pleasure. Pleasure of an experience, sexually or otherwise, both biologically and psychologically. If there is a psychological pleasure, which you call experience, and retaining that experience as memory and pursuing that memory, then that experience becomes pleasure. You understand this? That is, you may have had a marvellous, pleasurable experience yesterday. It is registered in the brain as memory and thought comes in and says, 'I must have more of it tomorrow' - that becomes pleasure. But when you have an experience, whatever kind, pleasurable generally, or miserable, then to end it, not let thought take it over. So we have gone into that if you were here the other day when we went into this question of pleasure. I am afraid we won't go into it too deeply this morning.

So we are saying: is love pleasure? And is love attachment? Please do pay attention to all this because it is your life. Is love attachment? You are attached to somebody. What is the process, what is the meaning of this attachment? Because we are asking: is love attachment? You may be attached to your house, to an idea, to a belief, to a person - what is the meaning of that attachment? When you are attached to something you are that - aren't you? When you have totally identified with something, you are that. And why is this urge to identify? To be attached? Please this is not a group therapy, which is an ugly thing, but rather observing actually what is going on in yourself. Therefore you have to give attention to it. Why is a human being attached to another? And what happens if he is not attached? And is attachment love? Does not attachment breed fear - because he may lose it? Being attached you may become jealous, frightened, anxious, which are obvious phenomena. You are attached because of your own insufficiency, loneliness. And so out of your own insufficiency, loneliness, a sense of lacking, you cling to another. So is attachment love? Where there is attachment there must be exploitation. Are you following all this? And we use that word 'love' to cover up all this. And is love jealousy? Do you follow all this? So when none of these things exist as attachment, because you have understood that emptiness in oneself can never be filled by something else. You have to look at it. You have to not escape from it, observe it totally. Then you will see that loneliness goes completely away. Then there is not that lonely attachment. Then perhaps one will know what love is. Because in that attachment there is fear, there is anxiety, there is hate, all the conflicts in relationship. Where there is conflict can there be love? And where there is ambition can there be love? Do you follow?

So when you strip yourself of ambition, anxiety, attachment, and understand deeply the meaning and the significance of pleasure, and desire, then you perhaps come upon that strange thing called love. And out of that comes compassion. Compassion is the highest form of intelligence. When you have compassion and therefore intelligence, you will do the right thing at the right moment. You understand all this? I hope you are following, not verbally but actually in your hearts, in your minds, doing it.

And there is the question of what death is. It is rather strange to talk about it on a lovely morning like this, but it is part of life. Without going into the full meaning of that word, and knowing what is implied, to shut ourselves away from it, to escape from it, to avoid it, not to talk about it, is to divide life, a total movement. So we must go into this question. Not only for the aged, but also for the young, we are all involved in this. So what does living mean, and what does dying mean? You understand my question? What do we mean by living, our daily living? An effort, a struggle, a conflict, pleasure, anxiety, uncertainty, fear of losing a job, or having a job try to get a better job, and so on, constant struggle, constant effort, fear, anxiety, with occasional joy, which is totally different from pleasure? This is our life, if you are honest about it, this is our daily, everyday existence. And that is what we call living. Right? Please don't accept what I am saying, I am only stating 'what is'. To that endless struggle we cling, and say that is living. And what then is dying? The ending of this so-called living? You are following all this? Is it a biological ending? Or the ending of this immense stream which man has created of conflict, sorrow, pain, anxiety? You are following all this? Please, it is your life we are talking about, not the description which the speaker is giving about his life, or somebody else's life. It is your life, your daily life with which we are concerned. Unless there is a radical transformation in that daily life we are going to create more and more misery for ourself and for other human beings - which is actually what is going on.

So what is dying? There is a biological death. Right? Through accident, through disease, through an incident, a bomb, an explosion, accident, and the body, the organism wearing itself out, and the organism coming to an end. I do not know if you have ever thought about this question of the intelligence of the body, the organism, the biological intelligence of the body. The body, has its own intelligence, if you have observed it. But we have destroyed that intelligence through drink, through drugs, through constant effort, battle, trying various drugs and various chemicals, you know, medicines and all that kind of thing, we have destroyed that innate intelligence of the organism. And so the body dies by constant strain, usage. I do not know if you are interested - you should be - whether this organism, this biological instrument, can with its brain ever deteriorate. You understand my question? Our brain as it gets older deteriorates. You have noticed it, it is called gaga-ism, senility. Can the brain be young all the time? You understand? - and not deteriorate? When there is constant friction biologically as well as psychologically, the brain must deteriorate. Right? Constant friction, constant effort, constant struggle, and is there a way of living without effort and therefore have a brain that is always young, fresh, active, decisive. You are following my question? I'll go into it if you are interested because it is possible.

Is one aware daily of the constant battle in oneself, trying to be something, trying to imitate, trying to conform, becoming the ideal, which is the mechanical process. You follow? Is one aware of that, conscious, do you know you are doing this? Not how to stop it, not how to break the mechanical routine, but to be aware of it without any choice, just to look at it, because if you introduce an effort you have already destroyed. So can you observe without any choice the mechanical movement of the brain, or rather one part of the brain which has been so cultivated for centuries upon centuries to act mechanically, just to be aware of it. Not to correct it, not to alter it, because then again, in that alteration comes conflict. As we said where there is duality, difference between the observer and the observed there must be conflict. When there is no observer but merely observation then there is no conflict.

And if one is aware during the day of all the movement, mechanical movement, the ways of your thinking, desire - you follow - to be totally aware of all this during the whole day, then you will find at night when you go to sleep, though in spite of all the scientists say that the brain is constantly in action, constantly in movement, constantly agitated, there are no dreams. The mind, the brain is quiet because all your problems, all your activities have been dissolved during the day, if you are attentive, you are watchful, aware. So when you go to sleep there is peace, the brain may be in movement but it is a quiet movement. It is not an agitated, anxious movement, therefore the brain in itself brings order. You are following all this? It doesn't matter.

So the brain becomes young, fresh and it cannot be young, and fresh and decisive if there is any form of hurt. Do you understand? Most human beings are hurt from childhood, in school, in college, in university, in offices, they are being hurt all the time. And to be free of this hurt, which we went into the other day, so that the brain has no resistance. You understand?

For after all innocence means a brain that is not capable of being hurt - not biologically, accidents can happen, but psychologically not to have any hurts and therefore an innocent mind. So what is death? What is the thing apart from the biological ending, what is death? What is it that we are so frightened of? Is it the ending of your experiences? The ending of your knowledge? The ending of all the things that you are attached to, psychologically? Biologically when death takes place whatever you are attached to does end. You are not going to carry your house, your furniture, your books and even your gurus - the Catholic guru, or the Protestant guru, or the Indian guru. So what is it that human beings are so dreadfully frightened of? They are frightened of something ending. Right? Psychologically, inwardly ending. And knowing it is going to end then we want comfort. We say there must be a continuity. And the ancient Hindus said there is a continuity, which is called reincarnation. You are interested in all this because it is your life we are talking about, not somebody else's life. They said you will be reborn next life according to what you have done this life, if you have behaved properly, decently, humanly, not humanly in the civilized sense, morally, that which is called karma, we won't go into all that - next life you are going to be better. So through a series of incarnations depending on the present activity, present behaviour, present morality, through a constant series of lives you will ultimately come to the highest principle. That is a very comforting theory. And millions believe in that. There is the whole Buddhistic attitude, that life is a constant flux. You understand? Constant movement and when that manifests there is an enclosure taking place which becomes the 'you', the 'me', which through time, through constant movement undergoes change, flux, that is their - you understand? The Hindus, the Buddhists, and of course the Christians have their own belief, the resurrection, because they believe that their own deity woke up from death physically. Right? As some group of priests in Europe said, 'I wish they took a photograph of it'!

So there are these things. Now we are saying something entirely different. Please listen because it is very important when you understand it. Because then you will see, if you really understand this thing, that there is a timeless movement, a timeless state which we are going to go into. First we said the world is you, and you are the world. Right? Whether you go to the Orient, Europe or come here human beings radically, basically are afraid, anxious, in sorrow, confused, unhappy, with occasional joy, psychologically it is a constant movement - it is the same movement whether you have got a brown skin, black skin, yellow skin or any kind of skin pigment, East, Europe or here, it is the same stream. You understand? The same stream, therefore you are the world and the world is you, that is a fact. You may have different temperament, different gifts, capacities, idiosyncrasies, those are the responses of the culture in which you have lived but the basic stream is the same. You follow? Therefore you are the world, and the world is you. Right? Therefore there is no individuality. Individuality implies a wholeness, indivisible entity and you are not that indivisible entity - you are divided, broken, therefore you are not actually an individual, indivisible. That you become totally individual in the complete sense of that word when you are whole, in which there is no fragmentary action. The word 'whole' means healthy, sane, holy, and as you are the world and the world is you, and you are caught in this constant stream, and when sorrow can be ended, fear can be ended - you understand? - not tomorrow, actually now. We went into that question. Then you are out of that stream - not you - there is a manifestation which is out of that stream, or freedom from that stream, because that stream is time. Right? Please get it. That stream is time.

So you have to find out whether time has a stop. Time has a stop when there is no longer that movement of that stream. That stream is fear, that stream is conflict, that stream is sorrow, and all the confusion man has built - built through thought. So then that is the stream of time. When there is ending to that stream time has stopped, therefore there is a totally different dimension, which we will discuss tomorrow, the whole problem of meditation.

So the thing that we are afraid of losing, when death takes place, is the structure which thought has built as me, the form, the name, and the attachment to the form and to that name, which are pain, pleasure, anxiety, all that is the 'me', you. You can say, ' Well that is not me but there is a higher me' - which is still the product of thought. So when that movement in which human beings are caught, that stream is the movement of time, driven by thought. The greater the volume of that stream is the volume of thought. And when that stream, which is our consciousness, with all its content, when that stream comes to an end then time has a stop and therefore there is a totally different dimension. And when you understand this, not verbally, deeply, live it daily, and it can be done, then you will see death has a totally different significance.

What is the time?

Q: Five after twelve.

You have had an hour of it and I think that is enough.

OJAI 6TH PUBLIC TALK 18TH APRIL 1976

This is the last talk for this year at Ojai. But unfortunately, or fortunately, there will be talks in Europe, and in India, if I go, and in England. One has been talking for the last fifty years and more. Seeing a lot of people, talking over, not only their personal problems, but the global problems of human beings, the vast confusion, the misery, the extraordinary lack of clarity. And through all these days and time and years it becomes more and more clear that unless human beings radically transform themselves we may destroy not only ourselves but the earth, the air, pollution, overpopulation and so on. So it seems to us that there must be a group of people who are utterly serious, who are deeply concerned, not superficially, not adjusting themselves to environment and circumstances, but rather live a life that is whole, complete, noble, full of intensity and clarity. Otherwise we waste our life, the short years we have, we seem to disregard, fall into various traps of non-essential or useless things - and being caught, we extricate ourselves and fall into another trap.

So we have talked about various things, like relationship between human beings, or the utter lack of that relationship; we have talked about the process of thought as a material movement in time; and thought, we said, is inadequate, totally inadequate to solve our human problems because thought has created them, and thought cannot solve them because thought is a fragment, a material process and a movement of measure. We also talked about fear, the ending of it, the ending of sorrow, and the understanding of the whole complex problem of pleasure. Yesterday morning we talked about love and death. I do not know if one actually lives these things, or merely verbally accepts them, or denies them, and let the things go by.

As we are concerned with the very deep problem of existence, we must not put aside the whole question of what is religion, if there is anything sacred, holy. And the question of meditation, with which we are going to deal this morning. That is, religion, the understanding or coming upon that which is sacred, if there is such a thing, and what are the implications of meditation. So these are very serious matters, not something for a Sunday morning, lovely, listening to some pious remarks, enjoying the sunshine and looking at the mountains, but it is wholly a very serious matter with which we are concerned. So please give, if one may ask, your attention. To hear correctly is an art, to see things as they are is also an art. And to learn, not from others, which is according to technological things, but to learn the whole of human content of one's consciousness, because one is the result of millennia of human endeavour, human sorrow, human agony, anxiety. It is all there in us. And to learn to look at it, to listen to all the content of that consciousness, and in the observation of that consciousness is action. So we are this morning, if we may, going to talk over together, seriously, the question of what is religion, because religion is the creative factor of a new culture. If there is no religion then the culture dies, civilization goes to pieces. So we must, considering what the world is like, with all its brutality, violence, wars, divisions, class hatreds and so on, which all indicate degeneration of the human mind, it beholds us to discover for ourselves what is religion. Is it a gathering of beliefs? Is it performing rituals? Repeating endless words which have really no meaning at all? Is it going on Sunday morning to a church, or to a temple, or to a mosque, and repeating some chant, words and think one is terribly religious? If one asks oneself seriously what is the necessity of any belief, of any conclusion, because belief, conclusions divide people: you have it in this little village, five or six divisions of Christianity. And throughout the world there is so much division brought about by so-called religions, - the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Muslim, the Christian and their innumerable sects. So what is the importance of any belief at all? Or does belief prevent the understanding of what truth is? And is religion divorced from daily life? Is religion a movement which brings order in our life? You understand my questions? We are sharing this thing together. We are not asserting anything. On the contrary, we are together sharing the investigation that we are doing now, exploring. And you cannot possibly explore scientifically into the realm of psychological demands that put together various forms of beliefs.

And if religion is divorced from our daily life it can only create further confusion, further conflict. So we are asking: what is religion, what is the nature, the depth of that word? Each one will think, he will answer the meaning of that word according to his particular fancy, imagination, or his conditioning. If he is a Hindu he will say, 'Religion is my belief in something' and so on. So if there is no belief, which doesn't mean one is an atheist - I am not at all sure those who believe are not really atheists because their belief is merely a traditional acceptance. So we are asking: what is the nature of religion? If it is none of these things, and it is none of these things, beliefs, rituals, authoritarian attitudes, division between yourself and your highest god, or no god, if there are interpreters between you and truth, all that is surely not religion. The worship of things made by thought, put together by thought as a symbol, or made by the hand, an image, and the worshipping of that symbol or that image surely is not religion. So what is religion?

And to find that out one must discard completely and be free to enquire. You cannot enquire if you are anchored in a belief. So if you are really earnest to go into this question, and you must go into this question, every human being must enquire, not accept, but explore into the nature of that word, the meaning of that word and the depth of that word, because the word is merely a sound. The sound can produce a meaning, but it is much more than that. So in order to find out what is a religious life - and not surely the monk who is dedicated to a certain form of worship, certain form of acceptance of beliefs and dogmas, and dedicated, given himself over to some idea - an idea is not a truth - such a monk, such a sannyasi is not really a religious man at all.

So what we are asking is much more complex. To find that out you must have order in one's life. Right? Our life is confused, contradictory, disorderly, fragmented, broken up, and how can such a life have order? You are following all this I hope, Order is not the acceptance of a blueprint. Order comes only when one realizes, is aware fully, without any choice, of one's own confusion, one's own daily disordered life - to be aware of that. From disorder comes order. That is, from the understanding, from the awareness without any choice the observation of our daily life which is disorderly, the observation not based on condemnation, rationalization, judgement, to be aware of that disorder, out of that awareness comes order.

And this order is a living thing, therefore it is constantly moving. So virtue - you may spit on that word, the modern generation does, morality means nothing, morality in essence is order. And without order how can there be clarity? Right? Because part of this is the question of meditation. Without order in one's life, without being totally moral in one's daily activity, how can you even think of meditating? You understand? You may sit cross-legged for the rest of your life, breathe in a certain way which you have learned from that country, India, you can sit like that for the next ten incarnations or a million incarnations, you will never come upon that which is truth because your life is disorderly. Therefore you must bring order into that life before you even think of meditating. If you do, without having order, it is a marvellous escape and therefore without any significance, without any meaning. Please do realize this. Meditation is the most marvellous thing but not your kind of meditation. There must be order in our relationship, there must be order and that can only exist when there is no fear, and order is not put together by thought. If it is put together by thought then it will create further disorder. Please understand all this. It is your life.

So to find out, or come upon that which is most sacred, most holy, there must be a life which is based solidly on order. And the importance of all meditations is to come upon that silence. Because biologically, physiologically, to see anything clearly, to look at these trees, the light on the leaves, the green grass, and the hills, to see it clearly your mind must be quiet, mustn't it. It is so simple, we make it so complex. To see anything clearly, to observe clearly, you must have a quiet mind, mustn't you? If you are chattering, chattering, you won't see the tree. You won't see the depth of the shadow, the beauty of a trunk or a limb. So you can only see it when your mind is quiet. Right? See the fact of it, the reason of it, the logic of it, first: that you can see something clearly only when your mind is silent. You cannot hear what somebody else is saying if you are talking to yourself all the time. So if you want to hear somebody clearly you must be quiet. So silence is absolutely necessary to perceive outwardly and inwardly. Right? And the outward and the inward are the same movement, they are not different. Right? It is one unitary movement, but we have divided it as the inward and the outer. So by observing clearly the outer you then discover the inner, and then see that it is one movement. And to see this clearly you must look, observe silently.

There are different forms of silence. We are investigating together the meaning of the word and the depth of that thing called religion. Which is, to find out if there is anything incorruptible, untouched by thought, which is not an illusion, which is not the projection of one's own desire, or an experience; but something that has never been touched by thought, something totally original. And to come upon that we said there must be order in daily life, which is the essence of virtue. Right? There are different kinds of silence. Aren't there? The silence between two noises. Right? And is that silence? There is silence between two thoughts - is that silence? There is so-called peace between two wars - is that peace? You are following all this? So what is silence? Is it put together by thought? Is it contrived? Is it something that is manufactured because you understand if one wants to see heaven, in quotes, you must be silent, therefore you say, 'How am I to be silent? Teach me how to be silent' So out of that desire to find out what is silence people then begin to invent systems, methods, ways to come upon that. Now if once you understand this you will never touch any system. Because what is implied in a system and a practice? Repetition, practise, practise, practise, control, make an effort, which is, become mechanical. Our minds, as we went into the other day, part of our brain has become mechanical. We said thought in its essence is mechanical, because thought is the repetition, or the reaction of memory. And when you already live a life which is mechanical and try to go beyond that mechanical life by introducing another mechanical process, which is systems, methods, practices, you are still mechanical. So when once you see the truth of this, the logic, the reason of this, you will never touch systems, methods, practices.

So anything that is contrived, put together by thought, however beautiful, however logic, however ancient, traditional, makes the mind more mechanical and eventually dull. So can one see the truth of it and reject - or rather, the very seeing of the truth of it ends the demand for systems, methods, 'how am I to achieve'. I hope you are following all this.

So we are asking: what is silence? If it is not put together by thought, then what is silence? You understand my question? Because we said only when there is silence, when there is no noise you can hear properly. In observation silences is necessary. When you are looking under a microphone you must look silently, discover what there is. In the same way, to see clearly you must be silent, to hear clearly the mind mustn't be chattering. If you see the truth of it, then it happens. You haven't to make an effort to be silent.

So we said order. And the mind, part of the mind being mechanical by following any method, system, practice, furthers the mechanical process of the brain. Right? So what is that which is silent? We will look at it by examining what is awareness. You are following? To be aware. When you are sitting there you are aware of the trees, the shadows, the light on the leaves, the movement of the leaves. Aren't you? If you are looking at the tree you are aware of it. Can you look at it without verbalization? You understand? Just to look without naming it, without giving it a quality, or description, just to observe. First that is, we never observe, we look at it and say, how beautiful, how ugly, how useful - depending on our conditioning. So we never observe things as they are. Right? Now can you observe, see this whole beauty of this land, all the hills, their quietness, their shadows, just to observe without any reaction of thought, without any reaction of like and dislike. Just to observe. That is awareness. Right? Aware of the universe around you, then be aware of the universe inside. The universe inside is much more complex. The universe inside is our whole consciousness. And the consciousness is its content. Right? Please come with me. You are not going to sleep are you?

As I said, the universe inside is much more complex, much more subtle, and if one knows, or has the energy, the capacity, the intensity and the clarity, there is a great tremendous depth in that. So we are saying: to be aware first of the outer, to look at it, and to be aware of all your reactions to it, and then go beyond your reactions and observe. Now in the same way go into the universe of yourself, which is your consciousness with all its content, with its experiences, with its knowledge, with its likes, with its fears, anxieties, sorrow, pain. You follow? That enormous content which man has added thousands of years, to be conscious of that, to be aware of that. Can one be aware - please listen to it - can one be aware totally? Or take one segment after another, one layer after another, one fragment after another? Will you understand the content of consciousness - the content makes up consciousness, if there is no content there is no consciousness, as we know it - will you look at it, understand it bit by bit? Or is there an understanding of it totally? You are getting my point? Are you following all this? Are we talking Greek? Your content of your consciousness is your conditioning, as a Christian, as a socialist, conditioned by the climate, by the food, by all the things that man has done to himself and to others: his identifications, his beliefs, all that is consciousness. To understand that consciousness will you examine it portion by portion? Or is there a way of looking at it wholly, so that you don't have to take time? You understand my question? Now we said there is a way of looking at it wholly, not fragment by fragment. And that is only possible if you understand what is awareness - awareness of the world outside you, watching your reactions to the world outside you and to observe without reactions the world outside you, and to move from the outer to the inner with all the content, which is your consciousness - to observe it. First you will react to it, naturally. I don't like, I like, how beautiful this is, how pleasurable that was, I wish I could keep a little bit of this, and so on and so on and so on. To watch that reaction and then to go beyond it. If you go beyond it then you see the whole content instantly.

So this is part of meditation: to see the outer actually as it is, not what you wish it to be, the wars, the antagonisms, the hatreds, the innumerable insults and hurts that human beings receive, the sorrow, the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness, lack of love, all that to observe. Then what takes place? Then you will see that energy is being gathered, because there is order and therefore there is no wastage of energy. Right? When there is mathematical order in your life, daily life there is no wastage of energy. It is only when there is order there is wastage of energy. When there is order there is the accumulation of energy. And with that energy to observe the world and yourself, and to realize the world out there and here are the same movement. So again you are adding to that quantity further energy. Right? And you are adding, not 'you are adding' - there is the accumulation of energy when there is an observation without the observer. The observer is the past, isn't it? The past being all your prejudices, your opinions, your conclusions, your traditional responses, tradition may be two days old or ten thousand years old. So the observer is the past and the observer meets the present, the 'what is', and tries to translate according to his past conclusions, the present. Right? And therefore gives to the past further movement in time, as the future. I wonder if you capture all this.

Look sir: you are the result of the past. That is a fact. Your brain, part of your brain is the result of series of adventures, happenings, incidents, experiences, as knowledge, and knowledge is always the past. That movement of the past meets the present and translates the present, or modifies the present according to the past and so gives a further movement into the future. Right? Now the question is - this becomes difficult, I am going to make it difficult - the question is, the past meeting the present, the past is a movement, the present is also a movement, the past meeting the present ends there, which means no movement, and therefore time has a stop.

So meditation then is bringing about order in life, and thereby gathering great energy, and ending conflict between the observer and the observed, which adds further energy. You understand? When there is a division between the observer and the observed there must be conflict. Take a very simple example: when you are angry, at the moment of anger, at the second of anger there is no division, is there. But a second later a division takes place: I must not be angry; or, why shouldn't I be angry. Where there is a division there must be conflict. And we live in conflict. Therefore the conflict with all its violence and so on is a wastage of energy. So this gathering of energy, psychological energy, not only biological, the gathering of this total energy is the beginning of - oh, I mustn't - is the beginning of a silence. Not quite.

As we said, we live a confused life, which is our consciousness is in turmoil. I do not know if you have noticed your own consciousness: constantly in battle, constantly choosing, denying, asserting, domination, attached, it is in constant struggle, boiling all the time. And therefore in that boiling there is a wastage of energy. For that turmoil to come to an end is part of meditation. Not by control, the moment you control, who is the controller?

Please, go into this yourself. You understand? Who is the controller? The controller is part of thought. So the controller then tries to control thought which is a wastage of energy. But if you see the truth that the controller is the controlled, the truth of it, then the conflict comes to an end. That means you have further energy.

Right? There is further energy. And this energy is necessary, this complete energy, which is not put together by friction. Friction has its own energy, and this energy which we are talking about, is not put together by thought, and therefore it is not the result of friction. Right? This energy is necessary to come upon that which is sacred, which is the religious mind. Got it? Some of you?

So meditation is - I'll go on whether you understand or not after this, it's up to you - meditation then is the emptying of the content of consciousness, its content. Which means the fears, the anxieties, the conflict in relationship, the ending of sorrow, and therefore compassion. The ending of the content of consciousness is complete silence. Because then that silence is full of energy. You understand? It is not vacant silence. It is not a silence that wants something more. I wonder if you understand all this. You have never done all this. That is why it has all become so difficult. I hope it isn't difficult.

So meditation is not the repetition of mantras, not merely sitting down breathing carefully. Meditation must be totally uninvited. You understand? Not contrived, not put together. Which means there is no measurement. If one has gone that far - no, it is not far or near if one has done this - then there is that emptiness. Do you understand? Now wait a minute. Scientists say, in this emptiness there is energy. You understand? We are saying when there is this meditative process, movement, there is a totally different kind of consciousness of a dimension in which there is all this energy which has been gathered through meditation, order in life and so on and so on. You have total energy. There is total energy. And in that emptiness there is not a thing. There is nothing. Nothing means not-a-thing. Thing mean thought. We said thought is a material process. So thought in that emptiness doesn't exist at all and therefore there is no experiencer who is experiencing this total nothingness. You understand what I am saying? Oh, gosh, you people!

So we also have to enquire what is beauty. What is beauty? Because that is also part of our life. What is beauty? Is it the line? Is it the shadow? The line of an architectural building? The painting? The marvellous cultures that exist in the world? The mountains? The running waters? The beautiful face? What is beauty? Does not beauty exist when there is not a centre of conflict? I wonder if you understand this? When you say, 'How beautiful it is' - what is the feeling behind that? What is the nature, the quality of emotion, the feeling, the surging of something? Is that beauty? Or is beauty the total absence of the observer? There is only complete observation, in which there is no choice, no division. So there must be this sense of beauty, because that may be that which is sacred. Not the beauty of a form of a woman, or a man - there is the beauty of woman and a man, the beauty of a tree, the beauty of a line, the sheet of water, the running sea but to find out, or come upon that sense of total absence of anything that is contradictory, that is, anything that is whole, complete, sane, rational, such a mind is a beautiful mind - you understand? - which is the religious mind. Because there you have got the total energy embodied there.

So there is such a thing as something sacred, which is not touched by thought, which is not touched or made corrupt by human beings with their desires and frights and quarrels and mischief. And to come upon that is not only part of meditation, but the ending of sorrow is the beginning of wisdom. You understand? So wisdom, which is not learning from books, or going to a school to learn wisdom, but when there is an ending of sorrow in yourself as a human being, then out of that comes wisdom. And when a human being transforms himself, you transforms yourself radically you are affecting the whole consciousness of mankind. You understand, sirs, because you are the mankind, you are the movement of mankind - which is a fact, which is actual. If you change you affect the world. So it is your tremendous responsibility - not run off into some fanciful meditative experience, which is illusion. So we must be very sceptical of all psychological experiences, subjective experiences, because they are the most destructive.

So meditation implies a life of great order, and therefore great virtue, moral. And it implies the understanding and the depth of beauty. And it implies the emptying of that consciousness which is you, with all your attachments, fears, hopes, despairs. Emptying all that by observing. Then you have this energy which alone can discover that which is eternal, which has no beginning and no ending.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 11TH JULY 1976.

Krishnamurti: What would you like me to talk about?

Audience: Freedom. Memory. Authority. Urgency.

K: I would like to talk about something that might be of general interest. But before we go into it I would like most earnestly to remind you that these talks and discussions are not a form of entertainment. They are not a gathering of people to be amused, intellectually excited, emotionally stirred and all that nonsense. We are very serious people, at least I am. And we are talking on that level. You can either listen most earnestly, or discard, or use some of the things that appeal to you and then discuss it, but words have very little meaning, though they are necessary for communication, words do not transform man, do not radically change man. And we are concerned principally and deeply and primarily with the transformation of men. That is the basis of these discussions and talks. If you are interested in it, not superficially, but deeply, seriously, then we can go into these questions very, very deeply. So it depends on you very much how you listen, at what level you listen, and if you mean business - not financial business - but if you mean seriously to bring about a radical transformation, then we are in communication with each other, then we can meet each other. If you are merely superficial, want to be intellectually or emotionally stirred, then I am afraid we will have very little in common. So if that is really deeply understood right from the beginning, then we can proceed together to investigate our human lives. Is that all right? Is that all right for me to go on that line?

Audience: Yes.

K: First of all I think it is very important to understand what human beings have made, what they have built, what their social structure is, what their behaviour is in this world. What actually is going on. What human beings, you and I, and our parents and grandparents have built; not only technologically, in the world of science, biology, archeology and all the rest of those sciences, but psychologically, inwardly, which is far more important than the outward activity, because the inward activity generally controls, shapes the outer activity, what man, human beings throughout the world have done. Because I think that is very important to understand; what human beings have created, have built, not only in their relationship with each other, but psychologically, inwardly, their religions, their society, their culture, their wars, their brutality, cruelty, violence and all the rest of it. For perhaps a million years we have lived that way: violence, wars, brutality, in the family, perpetual wrangles - you know all the rest of it that is going on. That is what we have built psychologically. The tribal worship which is called nationalism, the division of churches, the religions, one religion opposed to another religion, all maintaining that they are seeking god, the god which man has projected out of his own image. God has not made man but man has made god. There are national divisions, quarrels, wars, discrimination, and in the cultural society in which we live there is a great deal of violence, terrorism, life has become a great danger. You know all this. Every morning in the papers you read it, the terrible things that are going on.

Who is responsible for all this? Please this is not a rhetorical question, but we have to investigate it. Why has man brought about all this, this horror? You understand my question? What is the basis of it? Unless we ask fundamental questions and try to find not an answer, but the manner of investigating the question, because answers are fairly easy to give, but the answers will be superficial, verbal. But asking the question and investigating the question is quite a different matter, then it becomes the responsibility of each one of us to find out, as human beings why we live this way, why our society, our culture, our religions, have brought about this present condition, why human beings after having lived for two million, five million, ten million years - I don't know how long - are still going on in the same old way, savagery, complete selfishness, brutality, division, all the rest of it, of which you are quite familiar. And if you ask: is this the result of thought, care, affection, love, of which we talk a great deal?

So we must begin to enquire why man has created this society, this culture, and why we accept it, live with it and not run away from it? We run away from it by forming small communes, or going off to some monastery, or joining some sect, or following some guru, and we think we have solved the whole problem.

So if we can look at all this objectively, sanely, and ask ourselves why - why has man, a human being, created a society, a culture in which we live? Right? So to find that out we must investigate the whole movement of thought - right? Because our society, our religions, our morality, all our relationship is based on thought. I think there is no question about it. Right? So we have to investigate the whole movement of thought. Thought has not only created the extraordinary technological advancement, but also thought has created wars. Thought has created all the religions in the world, with their images, with their rituals, with their saviours, with their gods - all based on thought. And thought has divided man against man - my country, your country, my god and your god, my belief and your belief, ideals, all that. Right? Thought is responsible for this. Can we see the truth of that, that thought is responsible, and thought says, "I can solve this problem". You understand? Please do pay attention, this is your life. We will ask questions afterwards.

Surely your beliefs are the result of your thought? Your churches, your temples, your mosques, your gurus, the whole system of religions is based on thought; thought which has been conditioned by the interpreters which stand between you and what they call god, the priests. Thought has been conditioned heavily for two thousand years - or in India and other parts of the world for seven thousand years - conditioned, shaped, and thus bringing about a division. So thought is responsible for all this, apart from the technological world, the world of sanitation, the world of medicine, you know, all that, that also thought has created. Now is this a fact? Or do you think there is something else that has created this extraordinary world? You understand my question? If thought has created this - and there is no question about it - then what is the nature of thought that has brought this about?

Now we will have to go into this very, very carefully, slowly, not be dogmatic, not be assertive, not take sides, but investigate, find out, the movement of thought, and whether thought can be aware of itself, and see its activity. Right? Can thought be aware of itself: what it has done: can thought become aware, conscious of its own movement as time: and can thought become aware that it is a fragment, not a whole? You understand?

We recognize verbally that thought has built this world, the world, the culture, the religions in which we live, of which we are a part. And so we are asking: what is the nature of thought? Thought itself, not what thought has produced, has brought about, the nature, the structure of thought itself. Is thought comprehensive? Is thought a total movement? Or is thought fragmentary, partial? You understand my question? I hope I am not talking to myself. If thought is fragmentary then whatever it brings about must be fragmentary. If thought is broken up, is the factor of breaking up, then whatever its activity must be fragmentary - right? Is thought a total movement? Or only a partial movement? Right? If thought is a total movement of life then whatever it does will be whole, complete. But if thought is limited, fragmentary, then whatever it does, at whatever level, at whatever depth, must still be fragmentary, limited, time binding.

So there are these two questions, you understand? Which is: is your thinking partial? Does it cover the whole field of life, not fragmentary, but whole? So let us examine, investigate, first whether thought is fragmentary, limited. Isn't it limited? It thinks it can cover the whole, it thinks it can be complete, sane, rational, holy - it can imagine all those things, but in fact is thought limited and therefore broken up? Now look psychologically into yourself and you will see that thought is very limited. It can think it can go beyond its limitation but it is still limited - right? It can imagine it can reach god but the god is its own projection. Probably those of you who believe in god won't accept this. So we have to investigate again your belief in god - if you believe in it; or if you don't believe in it, why you don't believe in it. You understand?

Thought demands, needs stability, permanency, security, and thought sees that there is no security in this world - right? Thought sees everything is in perpetual movement, flux, change; so it projects an idea of what it calls god, there there is security - god is all omnipotent, god is all just, god is all love, god is all, you know, all the rest of it. Which are all the activity of thought - right? So thought is responsible for the gods, for all the churches, for all the temples, for all the mosques, the whole business of it. And thought is fragmentary, as you can see, when it has divided people against people - right? Nation against nation, me and you, we and they - right? You are following all this? So thought is in itself fragmentary, therefore it cannot possibly comprehend that which is whole - the word 'whole' implying sanity, complete, a mind that is without any kind of illusion, without fear, and therefore holy.

So what is thought then? Because that is a very important question to ask. If thought can transform our minds, our hearts, our being, then we must use thought. If thought cannot bring about a radical transformation then what is its place? You are understanding all this?

Look: make it much more simple. I want to change myself. I am part of the world. I am the world, because basically wherever I go there is suffering, pain, anxiety, grief, sorrow, death, conflict, misery, unhappiness - wherever you go: in Russia, China, India, Africa, and so on, in America, in this country, everywhere human beings radically are caught in this. That is obvious. Now I see the necessity of radical transformation. I don't want to live that way. It has no meaning to live that way. So I ask myself: how am I to change radically? Will thought change me? You understand my question? Please do follow this. Thought sees itself, what it has brought about psychologically, inwardly, as well as outwardly. And I ask myself: can thought bring about radical transformation in myself? So I say, "What is thought?" Can thought be aware of itself? Can the thinking that is going on in myself, in this mind, can it be aware of itself, see its own movement, what it has done, what it cannot do and what it wants to do? You follow all this?

So you ask yourself, and I ask myself, what is thought? Why has thought taken such predominance in the world? So what is thought? What is this thing that is always in action, always in movement, chattering away? Bringing about a division, me and you, my family, your family, my god, your god - you follow? - this whole movement that is going on within me. So what is this movement? Movement implies time - right? Please, is that all right? Time being moving from here to there, covering the distance from 'what is' to 'what should be', both outwardly and inwardly. So time is a movement. So thought itself is a movement - right? So thought is time. Are we meeting each other, please?

So I see, there is an observation that thought is movement as time. Right? So what is thought? Thought is memory - right? Memory stored in the brain, stored up as experience and knowledge - right? Knowledge when I drive a car, knowledge when I say "I know about myself" - you understand? So the accumulation of experience, which has become knowledge, is stored in the brain, and the response of that is thought - right? That is simple, isn't it? Let's move. That is simple, isn't it?

If you have no memory you are in a state of amnesia - right?

You have memory, and that memory is based on experience, past experience, which has become knowledge and stored up in the brain. That is a fact whether you accept it or not accept it: even the scientists are coming to that. So thought is a movement in time, which is the response of memory as knowledge. Right? So knowledge is the past. So thought is the past. It can project the future by modifying the present, but it is still the past in operation. So thought is fragmentary. You get the idea? Do you see this?

Thought we said is the response of memory; memory is knowledge, knowledge based on experience; knowledge is always in the past, there is no knowledge of the future. So thought meeting the present, modifies itself, and projects the future - right? So thought, because it is based on knowledge, experience, which is the past, is always fragmentary. Swallow that pill! Right?

And thought, being fragmentary, has created this culture which is fragmentary: the Arab and the Jew, you know, the whole business of it, and thought says, "I will solve this problem, politically, religiously, psychologically" - all the problems it has created. What it has created is fragmentary and thought says "I will go beyond the fragment" - thought itself being a fragment. You get it? Therefore it cannot possibly go beyond itself. Please see this, even verbally, intellectually, whatever - but see it. Once you see this, observe the truth of it, then our whole process of thinking becomes radically different. If thought cannot solve this problem, human problem, then what will? You understand my question? We have so far, for millenia, depended on thought to solve our problems. All our philosophies, of the great philosophers, are based on thought - the modern philosophers, the Greek philosophers and the ancient Hindu philosophers. And their philosophy which is the child of their thinking, man hopes through those philosophies to solve the problem. You understand? So we have accepted thought as the complete solution of everything. And when you realize, not emotionally, but logically, sanely that thought is a fragment and therefore it cannot possibly solve the total problem of man, then you have to ask what will solve man's problems? You understand my question? Have you got it? Are we touching each other? Are we in communication with each other? Please.

That is, do you see the truth of this, not the verbal statement of it, the truth of it? Look, I will point out something. The speaker makes this statement that thought, being fragmentary, cannot possibly solve the things which it has created - right? Now I have made a statement. How do you receive that statement? Do you understand? Do you see the statement as the truth itself? Or do you make an abstraction of that statement into an idea and accept the idea, and not the fact? Now what do you do? Has it become an idea? Or a fact? You understand this? What have you done? How have you received that statement: that thought, whatever it has created must be fragmentary, and thought trying to solve the problem, the things which it has created it with its problems, can never solve it? How do you receive that statement? Is it an idea? Or do you see it is so? You understand my question? If it is an idea - now the word 'idea' in Greek means to observe, to observe, not what we have made of it. So is it an idea, or a fact that you say, "Yes, it is so"? You understand? Which is it? Because it is very important to understand this. If it is an idea, it is still fragmentary. But if you see the fact, it is not fragmentary. Can we go on from there? It is very important.

If you draw a conclusion from what has been said, that thought is a fragment, then that conclusion is the movement of thought - right? But if you see what has been said, that thought is a fragment, it is a fact, then you can deal with facts not with ideas. You understand? We live with ideas, with conclusions, with concepts, which are non facts, and therefore we get completely lost. Whereas if we dealt only with facts then there is a means of communication. You are getting this?

So do you, listening to this fact, do you draw a conclusion, or live with the fact? I can't repeat it ten times. What is it that you do? If it is a conclusion, why have you made a conclusion, why don't you face the fact? You can only face the fact if you are actually listening to the fact. I say to you, as a fact, that it is a lovely day. It is a fact, you accept it. Don't you? It is a lovely day. And so you remain with the fact, you accept it. Don't you? It is a lovely day. And so you remain with the fact. But if you draw a conclusion from a statement it becomes non fact, and when we are discussing non facts there is no relationship between us. You get it? So do you, when you listen to a fact, draw a conclusion, or remain with the fact? And if you draw a conclusion why do you do it? What is the operation of this business? Is it habit? You understand? Because we always live with ideas, with conclusions, with 'what should be', so we are conditioned to that, and therefore we find it awfully difficult to break from that. And to break from that is to observe that you are operating always in that field, to be aware of it. Right? Can we go on?

So to break from this conditioning - it is the conditioned mind, this idea from the Greeks, all humanity has done this, never look at the facts but draw a conclusion about facts. Our philosophies, our gurus, the whole thing is based on this. And we say why does the mind do this? And we say why is there this instant reaction?

Because it is part of our training, part of our education, part of our lack of energy to break with it. So we are now dealing only with fact, which is: thought is a fragment, and therefore whatever it does will produce further fragments, further misery, further confusion - right? Do you see that as a fact?

Then the next question is: if thought cannot solve our human problems, psychological problems, not technological problems, not how to go to the Moon, or to Venus, or to bring about different kinds of wars, instruments of war, but human psychological problems, inward problems, if thought cannot solve it what will? You have understood the question? So man said, "Thought cannot solve it, god will solve it". You understand? An outside agency, whether it is the outside agency of god, or the outside agency of a better society. You understand? Please face all this. So thought says to itself, "I can't solve this. Therefore there must be an outside guide, outside father, outside agency, god, highest principle, or the highest ideal, or change the circumstances, the environment - which the Communists wants to do, and then human beings will change", which is exactly the same thing. Thought created the god, the outside agency, thought has created the idea that a perfect environment will change man. So thought is still a fragmented activity - right? I wonder if you see this?

So thought cannot solve the problem. So what will? Right? Now when you ask that question, whom are you asking? You understand my question? Are you asking somebody outside you? Asking the speaker to tell you? Or are you saying to yourself that thought cannot solve this, it is a fact, then what is the next action? You understand? If you ask another, that asking is still fragmentary - you understand? I wonder if you understand this? If you ask another and the other replies then you are setting him up as the authority - right? And the authority is still a fragment. Your gurus are fragments, whether the priest on the corner, or far away. So you are asking this question of yourself. Right? Which is quite different, because when you ask that question there is no authority to tell you. Right? So then you are free of one of the basic principles, which is no authority in spiritual matters. That means no guru, with all their circus going on. So you are asking yourself this question: my thought which has created me, my problems, my anxieties, my fears, my hopeless despair, my sorrow, agony, if thought cannot solve it, what will? So I am not looking outwardly because I see what I am inwardly conquers the outer - right? It has been shown historically, it has been shown every day - what you are inside conquers the outer. The Communists started out with no government, the government withering away, individuals complete - you know, all the rest of it - but the opposite has taken place, which is the inner conquers always the outer.

So you are asking a question, which is: if thought cannot change me what will? So I begin to investigate into myself - right? You understand? Because I am the world, and the world is me, that is a fact. You may have different customs, different costumes, different manner of eating, clothes and all the rest of it, but basically, deeply we are alike. We have sorrow, we have misery, we have confusion, we are in disorder. So go where you will it is the same human problem, as human beings we are the same, you may call yourself a Swiss, an American, or a Hindu, or a Buddhist, whatever you like, but strip all the labels and you see the agony, the suffering, the miseries, and occasional happiness. So the world is me and I am the world. That is not an intellectual idea, it is a fact. So when I enquire into myself I am enquiring into humanity. You understand? I wonder if you see that? Not myself, I am humanity. It isn't a selfish egocentric movement. Therefore when I look at myself and enquire into myself, I am enquiring into the whole human agony and pain and all that. So it is not a selfish movement - right?

So what will change me, a human being, who is the world? I recognize very clearly that an outside agency will not solve this - right? Nor the transformation of environment, because I have created the environment, through my fears, through my anxieties, through my desire for security, all the rest of it. So what will change this whole movement of thought? Got the picture? So I see thought has its own energy - right? The energy of conflict, the energy of competition, the energy of wanting to succeed, you know, all that - the energy. That thought in its fragmentary activity has got its own extraordinary energy; the energy which has created the whole technological world; and the energy which thought has created in relationship - right? Relationship between two human beings, two human beings which thought has divided as you and me - right? So where there is division there must be conflict. And that conflict gives tremendous energy - right? Outwardly and inwardly. Outwardly you see the Arab and the Jew, what is going on, the energy that is wasted in that. And the energy thought has created between you and me as man and woman, you know, all that business, in relationship - right? The extraordinary energy it has created. And we think that energy is going to solve the problem. You get it? So I see clearly that energy cannot possibly solve it, therefore there must be a totally different kind of energy? Right? I am enquiring. I am not saying there is, or there is not. I see thought as energy; energy which has created this extraordinary technological world, and extraordinary misery between man and man, human beings (I had better include the woman, otherwise the woman will say "Why did you leave me out?") - between human beings. So one must find out if there is a totally different kind of energy, which is not brought about through conflict - right? Which is not the essence of conflict. Are we meeting each other?

So what is the capacity of the mind that can find this out? You understand? Has it the capacity? Please go into it with me a little bit. The speaker observes the energy of conflict in human relationship, and that energy, which is the movement of thought, that energy, thought says, "I will transform with that energy." - right? I see that. It is a clear observation, it is a fact. Then if that energy cannot solve all my problems, human problems, then what will? Now is my mind, human mind, capable of finding it out? You understand? Because the human mind is frightened, is anxious, is always striving, struggling, in conflict - right? Can such a mind find this out? Or that mind must be quiet before it can find it out. You understand the question? Come on!

If my mind is always chattering, anxious, frightened, seeking its own security, its own happiness, its limited demands, such a mind cannot possibly find something which is not the product of thought. Right? Do you see this? Is this clear? So to find that energy, if there is, there must be freedom - right? (You asked that question: to discuss freedom.) There must be freedom. Freedom from anxiety, freedom from fear, freedom from sorrow, you understand? Otherwise you cannot possibly come upon the other. This is logical, isn't it? No? So is it possible for the mind, for a human being, to be totally free of all the things that thought has put together - psychologically? Do you understand my question? That is, human consciousness is made up of all its content - right? Your consciousness - right? - yours, is made up of your demand for money, your demand for sex, your demand for power, position, prestige, happiness, attachments to your furniture, to people, to places, to things, it is made up of all your beliefs - right? All that is your consciousness - no? Right? Oh, for god's sake! That is human consciousness with its content. As long as there is that content in the consciousness, which is fear, pleasure, sorrow, and all its complications, that is your consciousness, put together by thought - right? So as long as those contents remain in that consciousness, and that consciousness is its content - right? - you cannot possibly find out if there is a different kind of energy. Therefore one must be free of its content.

Surely if I want to find something beyond my own imagination, illusions, desires, I must first be free of those things, mustn't I? Logical. I must be free of attachment - right? Whether it is an attachment to a person, to a belief, to a piece of furniture, or a house. I must be free from it before I can possibly look beyond. So is it possible for me to be free of complete psychological authority, so that I don't look to another to tell me what to do - psychologically? Of course the doctor will tell me what to do, or the technician will tell me what to do - that is quite a different matter. But psychologically, inwardly, to be told what to do by another - the other is myself - you understand? - because he is in sorrow, he is in misery, he is in confusion, and he is my guru, or my priest, or my god, or my saviour, he is just like the rest of humanity.

So part of this consciousness is to accept inward authority in the world of the psyche, which is generally called the spiritual world. So can you, can this mind be free of that? You have made the outside authority because inwardly you are in disorder. If there is no disorder you have no authority. You understand? There was a time - if the Italians will forgive me - at one time Italy was in confusion and Mussolini came to bring order. It is happening in India; it is happening all over the world. Where there is outward disorder, that very disorder creates the authority - right? That is a law. So when there is disorder in you, you are bound to create the outer authority. The gurus are multiplying by the dozen, with their systems - you know all that filthy business.

So can you be free of this search for an authority which will give you security? That is part of your consciousness, which is based on fear. So we come to a very complex problem of fear - right? As we said, our consciousness is filled with these three principal factors: fear, with all its complications, ramifications; pleasure, which is very complex; and sorrow. Our consciousness is filled with that. So can the mind, this consciousness empty itself of itself to find out if there is a totally different kind of energy? Unless it is free from that you will never find it. Right? Logically.

You can talk about freedom, we can talk about authority, and all the rest of the things, but it has no value, for a man who is very serious. And we have to be serious in a world that is so disarranged.

So I had better stop there and perhaps you will ask some questions with regard to what we have talked about. We will go on the day after tomorrow, we will go on with all this. We are going to have seven talks and five discussions, so you will have plenty of time to tear me to pieces! Or rather tear to pieces what you have heard, or not heard! So would you like to ask some questions on what we have talked about? Before you ask questions please bear in mind that you are asking the questions of yourselves aloud, because we are not your authority, we are not your guru. You have to find truth for yourself, which means you have to be a light for yourself. There is no other light except the light which you have for yourself. Then when you find that light then it is the light of the world. You understand? So.

Questioner: You say that thought is the problem. I am finding that there is a lot of fear in me and all the rest. (Part of question inaudible on tape)

K: May I answer that question? The questioner says thought existed before fear - fear existed before thought. Pardon.

Q: Thought to me is not the problem but the symptom.

K: Oh, the symptom is the problem and not the cause.

Q: Fear existed before thought.

K: Do let's be clear about your question sir.

Q: Well I am saying that thought is not the problem. There is a lot of pain in me.

K: The questioner says, if I am representing him rightly, the questioner says thought is not the problem. The problem is fear and pain. And he adds also those are the symptoms.

Q: They are not the symptoms.

K: Oh, they are not the symptoms.

Q: Thought is the symptom.

K: Let's be clear.

Q: O.K. I'll say it again. Fear - when I was very little, I had a lot of fear.

K: When I was little I had a lot of fear.

Q: But I didn't have thought.

K: When he was little he had a lot of fear, but he had no thought.

Q: A little baby doesn't have a mind to have thought.

K: No. So don't let's go back to babies. Let's find out if fear is independent of thought. Or thought has brought about fear. Right sir? Whether fear is the result of thinking, or fear independent of thought. That is the question, isn't it?

Are the opposites independent of each other? You understand my question? The opposites, the opposed, are they independent of each other? Or are they essentially related to each other? Wait, I'll show you, go slow, go slow! There are opposing desires - right? I want that, I don't want that. There are opposing desires. Are they independent of each other? Or they have the same movement? Do you understand? So they are not independent of each other.

Now is pain the opposite of - what? - non-pain? Or both are the same. They are like the two sides of the same coin. Therefore there is no question of independence. That is what I want to get at first.

We think the opposites are independent - right? The opposite desires, we think they are independent of each other, are they? Desire is common to both - right? I desire that and I don't desire that. So desire is the common factor - right? So the opposites are never independent. Is that clear sir? If you see that then fear is thought. We will go into that the day after tomorrow morning. Please let's get this clear first. That any opposite - bravery and cowardice - are related to each other - right? That is simple isn't it? Cowardice and bravery are related to each other, therefore they are not independent of each other. So there are no opposites at all, except man, woman, dark, light - that is a different matter. Psychologically there is no opposite. This leads to quite a lot. When there is an opposite there is a conflict - right?

Look: just look, I am envious - if one is envious - one is envious. The opposite is non-envious. What is the opposite? How has non-envy come into being? Because I have been envious. Therefore being envious I see it brings a lot of trouble, so I will be non-envious. But I have been envious, therefore the non-envy is related to envy. In the same way violence and non-violence. We say they are two opposites. They are not. There is only one, which is violence. But as human beings don't know what to do with violence they invent non-violence in the hope of achieving that, using that as a lever to get rid of violence. You understand this? Come on. Move! So psychologically there is only one factor: that which is, not the opposite. That which is, is envy. If my mind is capable of dealing with that envy why should I have non-envy? Because it can't, therefore it invents the other, which is an escape from the fact. Right?

So thought and fear: he said fear is independent of thought. Is it? If you had no thought at all would you be afraid? Of tomorrow? Of the past? Of death? Of your neighbour? Your wife? So thought is fear. We will go into all that the day after tomorrow.

Questioner: Fear is in the body, not only in the head.

K: I know.

Q: You can feel it trembling.

K: I know, you get almost paralysed, you shake. We will go into all that the day after tomorrow.

Any other questions? We will deal with it sir.

Q: (Question in French)

K: The question is this: it is a question about death and the person that is left behind - right? This loneliness, the solitude, the lack of companionship, the sense of utter loneliness, being left alone.

Is this the occasion to discuss that question of death? You know it is one of the most complex problems that man has faced from the time he began, this question of death, survival after death, and this utter sense of loneliness. To answer that question really very, very deeply, we must spend a lot of time on it, not just two minutes at the end of a talk, because death is something which all human beings have tried to avoid. Or having accepted it, like the ancient Egyptians perpetuated the daily living eternally. Or there is the whole problem of reincarnation and so on and so on. So if you don't mind at the end of an hour and twenty minutes or so, if you will forgive me madame, we will discuss this question at another time. May we do that?

You see you ask a question and you don't go through with it.

You ask what is the mind, what is fear, what is thought, you don't take time, you don't give the other fellow time to explain and go into it. You say, "Answer me quickly". These questions cannot be answered quickly because they are immense questions, which human beings have worked upon for millenia and you want it all said in a few words. We have to find out what death is, if there is immortality, and what is it that is immortal, why there is that immense sense of loneliness, left alone completely. That means, please we are not being harsh or anything but you have to give time, you have to come and listen to it, find out. But if you say, "Sorry I can't, I have got to go tomorrow, I have got to see my friend in Geneva, or somewhere else, sorry, tell me quickly". These things cannot possibly be told in a few seconds. So you will have to forgive me.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 13TH JULY 1976.

We were talking the last time that we met here about the movement of thought. How thought has built this modern world, both technologically and psychologically, what it has done in the field of science and in the field of psychology. And it has built various religions, various sects, beliefs, dogmas, rituals, saviours, gurus and all the rest of that business with which you are quite familiar. And we said, thought has its place, limited, fragmented but thought cannot possibly comprehend or understand or come upon that which is whole. Thought can never find out that which is timeless, if there is a reality, if there is truth. Thought can never, under whatever circumstances, come upon that immensity. And without that comprehension of that totality, of that dimension in which time as thought and measure does not exist. Thought must find its own place and limit itself to that space. That is what we were talking about last time when we met here.

We were going to talk about the great problem of fear. But before we go into that I would like, if I may, to go into the problem of observing ourselves. When we observe ourselves we are not isolating ourselves, limiting ourselves, becoming self-centred, because as we explained, we are the world, and the world is us. This is a fact. And when we, as human beings, examine the whole content of our consciousness, of ourselves, we are really enquiring into the whole human being - whether he lives in Asia, Europe or America. So it is not a self-centred activity. That must be very clear: that when we are observing ourselves we are not becoming selfish, self-centred, becoming more and more neurotic, lopsided; but on the contrary we are examining when we look at ourselves the whole human problem, the human problem of misery, conflict and the appalling things that man has made for himself and for others. So it is very important to understand this fact, that we are the world, and the world is us. You may have superficial mannerisms, superficial tendencies, but basically all human beings throughout this unfortunate world go through misery, confusion, turmoil, violence, despair, agony. So there is a common ground upon which we all meet. So when we observe ourselves we are observing human beings. I hope this is clear, and not make this observation into some neurotic, lopsided, selfish affair, as most people are apt to do.

So the problem then is: is it possible to observe oneself - please listen to this for a minute - is it possible to observe oneself without further recording? I will explain what I mean.

We are conditioned. That is an obvious fact, as Christians, Communists, Socialists, Hindus, Muslims, whatever it is, we are conditioned with all the beliefs, with all the dogmas, with all the rituals, with all the fears, what human beings are, their appetite, their sexual demands, their desire for power, position, money and so on. This is what human beings right throughout the world want. And god or truth plays the secondary part. So we are conditioned, and we are always operating in that area, changing the design, the shape, the form, always within that area of the conditioned mind, which again is obvious. I hope this is clear. And the brain is always registering - that is the function of the brain, to register. If you observe your own brain in operation, if you can, and it can be done - we will talk about it in a little while - then you will see that it is always recording, registering like a computer. Of course a computer is mechanical, this is much more subtle, much more alive, but its function is to register, because through registration there is certain security. If you have had an accident, physiologically as well as psychologically, it is registered as a memory, and that memory gives security, not to have further accidents. That is again very simple. So our brain is a registering machine, which is experience, knowledge and memory, and the response of that memory is thought - which we talked about the other day when we met here.

So all our activity is within this area, registering and remembering, and acting skilfully according to what you have registered, or not skilfully, logically or illogically, sanely or with insanity. That is what is going on if you observe all the time. May we proceed? You are following all this? You know this is really very, very serious. If I may point out this is not a plaything, something to be amused by, something to be entertained with; it is a matter of life and death, it is a matter of enormous importance in our daily life, because our daily life is such a confusion, such a turmoil, and to bring about some kind of order in that chaos we have to understand how to observe ourselves and to see how the brain acts, not from books, those are just the explanations of some philosopher or some psychologist, or some phoney guru. I am sorry I put all gurus as traditionalists, bringing their own jargon, their own idiosyncrasies, their own beliefs and foisting it on others.

So if you observe yourself, and therefore you are observing all humanity, the history of humanity is you, and that you is the history, you have to read that history, be capable of reading it, not from the books published by others about human beings but as you are the total essence of all human beings in the world, one has to learn the art of observing oneself. As we said, the word 'art' implies, means to put everything in its right place. That is the actual meaning of art. Not what he produces, pictures, poems, we are not concerned with that. The meaning of that word is to place everything in life in its proper place; and when you do that you are the greatest artist, you may never paint, you may never write a poem, you may never produce a sculpture, but if you know, if you have observed yourself and have learnt the art of observation and put everything in your life in its right place, you are the greatest artist in the world. I hope you understand this.

And when you observe yourself you see that all your activity, which is registration, recording, is the process of conditioning - right? You understand? Are we meeting each other? Communication is important. Communication implies sharing, not only a verbal sharing but to go beyond the word, to capture the significance of what one is saying, then we are in communion with each other, because we are supposed to understand either French or English, or Italian, and if one speaks in English we are using certain words which may not be modern words, which may not have the jargon of the modern world, but it is the language of five thousands years and more, because man has used words like fear, sorrow, pleasure and the immensity of something that is beyond all registration.

So we are always registering, remembering, storing up as knowledge and acting always within that area. The acting within that area is to strengthen our conditioning, obviously - right? Are we meeting? If I am a Hindu and I am conditioned by centuries of tradition, centuries upon centuries of dogma, belief, and I act deeply within that area, the activity strengthens the conditioning. That is clear, isn't it? So there is no freedom from that conditioning as long as I am operating in that area, psychologically as well as biologically depending on the psychological demands. Clear, isn't it? If I am a Communist and I have certain dogmas, certain dialectical conclusions, thesis, antithesis and synthesis, you know the game, and live within that, I strengthen more and more my conclusions, they prove my conclusions, so I never break out from that. So there is no freedom within that area. It's clear isn't it? Can I go ahead?

So my question is: is it possible - please listen - is it possible not to register? You understand? Because if I keep on registering all the time, the brain is always conditioning itself. I wonder if you understand this? If I am always acting within the field of knowledge, what I have learnt, what my experiences are and I am always acting within that limited area, the conditioning becomes stronger and stronger and stronger, which is what is happening with all of us - right? And so one asks: is it possible not to register psychologically? You understand my question? This is a very, very serious question. Is there a part of the brain which is capable of not registering? You understand? If a human being is always operating within the field of the known, which is his conditioning, then the very activity of that produces greater volume of resistance. So we are asking a most fundamental question, not an idiosyncratic question, or a neurotic question: is it possible for a brain not to register at all? Is there a part, or is there a quality of brain that understands the need of not registering? You understand? The need. Are we meeting each other - please?

Now we are going to go into that first because when we come to discuss fear you have to understand the meaning, the word, the significance of all that, fear. And as long as we are operating within the field of the known, fear is strengthened - right?

So is it possible not to register at all, psychologically? Biologically you may have to register, you have to register, record whether you drive on the right side or on the left side of the road, depending upon the country you live in; you have to register many, many things physically, but what is the need to register psychologically at all? If it is not possible then we are everlastingly condemned to live in this area of knowledge, in this area of continuous strengthening the conditioning - right? We have understood this? Now we are going to find out if it is possible. Please you are not listening to a talk. You are listening to yourself. You are listening to the operation of your own brain, watching your own thoughts, watching your own registration, the remembering and then acting, skilfully, not skilfully, you are watching yourself, which is you are sharing with the speaker - right? So you are watching not what the speaker is talking about, which becomes an idea, but you are watching yourself in operation.

We are asking: the brain traditionally has been educated, gathering strength through knowledge and always living in that area, therefore registration becomes tremendously important for its security. And we are asking something: that unless there is freedom from that area we are condemned forever to live there, fighting, quarrelling, all the misery that goes on.

Now we are going to find out, not through the speaker, but for yourself, as a human being representing all humanity, we are going to find out whether there is a possibility of not recording at all and therefore breaking down the conditioning. You have understood? From childhood through the parents, through all the environment of society and so on, we are being hurt - right? You are hurt from childhood, aren't you? You have got many hurts psychologically. That hurt is brought about through the image that you have about yourself, obviously. Right? May I go on? Are you sharing this?

You have an image about yourself, haven't you? You are marvellous, or not marvellous, or you are very sensitive, you are most extraordinary, you have more intelligence than somebody else, or that you are very near god - you know all that bilge! So you have got an image about yourself, and that image is constantly being hurt from childhood, psychologically, which affects biologically, which is psychosomatic. Now when there is that hurt you are withdrawing, isolating, resisting, therefore that resistance, that isolation, that hurt strengthens the conditioning - right? And being strengthened you act neurotically, because you feel you are terribly sensitive, because you have built a wall around yourself, and you withdraw at any remark, any insult, any flattery - flattery is the same as insult, they are two sides of the same coin. So as long as you have that hurt, as long as there is that feeling of isolating yourself, resisting, the strengthening process of conditioning goes on. And you act from that hurt, from that resistance, from that isolation neurotically - right? Now is it possible not to be hurt? - which is not to register the insult? You understand? You insult me, or flatter me - some people have insulted me but most people have flattered me unfortunately. And not to resist either - is that possible? You understand my question?

Now you are watching yourself. That is, you are watching through the words I am using, the speaker is using, watching through those words yourself as a human being, not a human being somewhere else, but actually sitting there in front of us, watching himself. He knows the hurts, he is aware of the isolating process of that hurt because he doesn't want to be hurt more, therefore there is resistance, there is isolation and from that isolation there is activity, logical, illogical, stupid and all the rest of it, and that activity strengthens him more and more. Now we are asking: is it possible when that insult or flattery is made not to register it? Bearing in mind that the brain is trained, accustomed, educated to register - you have got the picture? Are you working as hard as the speaker is working? I hope you are!

How do you answer this question? The speaker has put forward a question which is: is it possible not to register when the hurt or the flattery is made? Now how do you answer that question? How do you listen to that question? How do you listen to it? Is it an idea? Or is it a fact? You understand? Come on! Do you draw a conclusion from what you have heard? Or do you actually observe the hurt, the activity of that hurt and ask yourself if it is at all possible not to receive any hurt at all, and therefore not register the hurt, not to register the word, the implication of the word, which means that you have no - the image is getting hurt, because the image is you? You understand all this? All right sirs? Because if the brain is capable of not registering, except physiologically, then it has quite a different movement, quite a different activity, quite a different energy. I insult you - I hope I don't, but suppose I do. Can you listen to the insult, the word, the meaning, and the desire to hurt you, all the implications, listen to it completely and the brain not take it in? I will show you how to do it - not how. How it operates.

Are you interested in all this? Does it mean anything to you? Because this implies a tremendous revolution inwardly. But most of us are frightened of that revolution inwardly, and therefore resist it. You may say, "Well if something deeply changes in me I may do nothing. I may lose my family" - you follow? Fear arises. Now to find out whether it is at all possible not to register, to listen to that insult or flattery with all your senses totally at the highest. Have you ever done that? To observe the moving waters of a river with all your senses, including not only the senses but the sensory perception of the brain itself, because the brain is sensation? To listen to that insult or flattery with the brain, with all the senses heightened - can you do that? We never observe anything with all our senses. We observe either intellectually, which is part of the senses, or orally, partially, hear the word, translate the word, pleasurable or not pleasurable, and so we are always observing partially, with part of our senses awakened. We are asking something entirely different, which is: to observe, or to listen to that insult or flattery with all your senses. Can you do it? Do you know what it means?

Questioner: Then you don't register.

K: The gentleman says then you don't register. You see? Please I don't know who the gentleman is therefore I am not insulting him. He has already drawn a conclusion. Has he done it? Or he has said by listening that will happen if you do that. I am asking you to listen to something very, very carefully to find out the truth of it, not the conclusion, not an idea, but to find the truth of it. That when you listen to an insult or flattery with all your senses highly awakened - the senses being not only the brain but the quality of the mind, which is part of the senses, the totality of all the senses, then you will find that there is no registration whatsoever. Right? Just listen to it. Don't draw a conclusion. Don't say, "If I do that it will happen". If you listen to what is being said with all your senses you are then free from the conditioning. Have you understood something of this?

Have you ever observed a picture without comparison, who painted it and all the rest of it, just to observe it? Then you are beyond that picture, beyond, gone away from it.

So it is possible. The speaker asserts, not you, because you don't do it. If you do it then you can assert that is the truth; but to merely repeat what somebody says means nothing. We are saying that it is possible not to register, there is a quality in the brain that does not register if you give all your senses, which is total attention.

So then when there is no registration then thought, which is the response of all registration, then thought takes its proper place - right? Which is, thought puts itself in its own place. It doesn't flow over where it is not needed.

Now bearing all that in mind we can turn to the discussion, or to the dialogue of fear. May we go on? You aren't tired are you after following this? We are going to go into the question of fear. Which is, to observe the fear in yourself. You are the humanity, you are not Mr so-and-so, with a name and a form. You are the essence of all human beings. For god's sake do realize that. Because you, like anybody else in the world, go through agony, he knows what sorrow is, what death is, frustration, loneliness, the lack of love, compassion, violence; this happens all throughout the world. So you are the essence of all humanity. That is a fact. So when we are discussing or having a dialogue about fear, we are discussing human fear, not Mr so-and-so's fear - or Miss so-and-so's fear. When you understand the global fear of humanity then you can see your own little fears; but if you are only concerned with your own little fears then you lose the greater fear altogether. You understand this? So we are having a dialogue about human fear.

Can you, as a human being, observe your fear. Sitting there, you know your fears, can you observe it very carefully? Take time, we have got plenty of time. Observe it. Fear of death, fear of loneliness, fear of tomorrow, fear of losing a job, fear of losing your wife, or your girl, or your boy, losing your position, losing the vitality, the energy, fear of not being as intellectual, verbal or clever as another. To be aware of it, to observe it.

Now listen to this carefully, if you don't mind. Does the word fear create fear? Or does fear exist without the word? You have understood my question? Does the word fear awaken fear? Or without the word does this thing called fear exist? Please this is very important for you to find out if you are serious about the freedom from fear, total freedom from fear, psychologically. Then if one can understand the freedom psychologically from fear, then the biological fears become a totally different thing. Don't they? If there is freedom from fear inwardly, then biologically there is the activity of intelligence which says, do this and don't do that, which we will discuss after. First we must have a dialogue about psychological fear.

So we are asking: when you observe your fear you use the word fear instantly, and the word is not the thing. The word 'tent' is not the actual tent. So the word is not the thing - right? So is the word fear the actuality? Or the actuality exists without the word? It is very important to find out because we are caught in words. Words and their symbols, and their meanings have become tremendously important. So can you separate the word from the fact - the word 'tent' and the actuality? I use the word tent to describe this, to communicate, but the communication, the word, the description is not the thing - right? So similarly the word, is it fear? Or is the word separate from the feeling? This is tremendously important to find out because every human being is caught in this fear, of tomorrow, or yesterday's misfortunes, of guilt, what he has done, or not done, what he hopes to do and he may not be able to do. He wants to succeed and he fails - you know the constant dread of pain, psychological pain, psychological demands and frustrations, all that, because we live with it. We have lived with it for a million years. Man has not been able to solve it, he postpones it, he avoids it, he runs away from it.

So here we are asking: can you separate the word from the feeling? Or the word has created the feeling, and without the word there may be no feeling, and if there is feeling what is it? You understand? Please do understand this. Suppose I am afraid of not being able to talk to an audience, to you, because I have cancer or something - I haven't got it, don't worry, or it doesn't matter if you worry, I haven't got it. Suppose I have cancer and I am frustrated because I want to express, if I am silly enough to want to express. I am frightened. And I am afraid not only of biological pain but frustrated, deeply wounded, hurt by not being able to communicate, because that is what I have been doing for the last fifty years or more, so I am frightened. I am not but I am supposing. Now that fear - I am asking myself: is the word making the fear? Or does this feeling exist by itself? If the feeling exists by itself, what is that feeling? The feeling is no tomorrow - you understand? - pain and all the rest of it. So the feeling is sensation, isn't it? Without the word the feeling is a sensation, but with the word it becomes fear. I wonder if you capture it. Do you get it? It must be in your blood. I'll repeat it once more. See it.

You see we associate always the word with the thing. The moment you use the word 'tent' you have a picture of the tent - small, big, coloured, you know, whatever it is, you have a picture of it instantly. To separate the word from the fact, the fact is not the word. Right? That is simple. Fear we all know, every human being right through the world knows this appalling thing called fear, and that has burdened man for a million years. And when you are frightened you shrink, you become blind, you are paralysed, you have lost everything. You know that feeling, I am sure of it. So you have to find out for yourself, not repeat what the speaker is saying, that is of no value, find out for yourself whether the feeling is separate from the word, the word being fear; and find out also if the word is creating this feeling. If there is a separation of the word from the feeling, then you have the feeling. But the moment you name that feeling it becomes fear. And when you don't name it, it is a sensation - right? And look at that sensation with the totality of all your senses. You understand what I am talking about? Have some of you understood what I am talking about?

So part of the brain, part of the mind and brain is sensation - right? But the moment you name a particular sensation by a particular name you have already created the response according to your conditioning. My conditioning - suppose - a person's conditioning is that he is anti-Communist. And he is trained, he is educated to be anti, anti, anti Arab, anti Jew, anti this or that. So you respond according to that conditioning. And part of that conditioning is the association of the word with the thing, never realizing that the word is not the thing. Now the word fear is not the feeling. So you have only that feeling left. That feeling, that sensation is part of the brain, part of the mind. To observe that feeling with all your senses, then you will see, if you do it, not theorize about it, not speculate about it, but actually do it, then you will see that fear, which is a movement of thought, which is a movement of thought as the word, ceases. Have you understood all this?

Then psychologically when one is free of fear, actually, then what effect has it on the physical instrument? You understand my question? If you are not frightened of any danger psychologically, what effect has that depth of the realization of truth on the physical? If you are free of that fear now, what effect has it on your physical state? You know the psychological fears dominate the physical. That is obvious. And therefore the body, the instrument, the organism loses its own intelligence. If the fears of the psyche are constantly in operation, as with most people, then there is a tremendous strain on the organism. It is frightened, it is nervous, it is always apprehensive, always guarding itself, never open. And so those psychological fears affect very deeply the physical organism. And the inner affects the outer and therefore its own native intelligence of the body is being destroyed, as you destroy the organism through the pleasure of a taste - smoking, drinking, drugs, eating a lot of meat, you know all the rest of it that goes on. You are trained, you are educated along these lines, therefore that is always destroying the deep organic intelligence. So when there is no fear inwardly the organism operates with its own intelligence, and therefore it is quite a different operation - you understand? Nothing is dictated to it.

So you must lay the foundation of all this, because then only you will understand later on, when we discuss about meditation, what is implied in it. But if you don't lay the foundation, which is not to be inwardly, psychologically afraid, and if you are afraid and you still go after meditation then you are caught up in illusions, in stupidities, in absurd activities, because the root, the essence of destructive activity goes on and you pile on it all kinds of idiotic ideas. Meditation is something that comes naturally when you have laid down the foundation - right?

So what we are talking about, or having a dialogue, is laying the foundation, not only the biological foundation but the psychological foundation. When that foundation is deep, strong, healthy, sane, then meditation then becomes something extraordinary. But without that, meditation becomes rather childish, meaningless, leading to illusion.

Would you like to ask some questions, of what we have been talking about. Or do you want to sit quietly? If you want to sit quietly, do it by yourself when you are alone in your room, because when you sit quietly with a lot of people, then you depend on those people to make you quiet. You understand? You know when you sit with others quietly it helps you to be quiet - right? Naturally. Because you are watching others, you feel others are sitting there quietly, so you feel you mustn't disturb them, so you become naturally quiet, and gradually you begin to depend on others to help you to be quiet - right? Quietness, stillness comes naturally, if you understand the whole process of thought; all the movement of thought, thought as fear, thought as pleasure, thought as time. When you have gone very, very deeply into that question, then silence is as natural as when there is no wind among the trees.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 18TH JULY 1976

May we go on with what we were talking about the last time that we met here? We were saying: why do human beings, right throughout the world, live this most extraordinary, conflicting, sorrowful life? We asked that question and we went into it fairly thoroughly.

I think we ought to ask also whether it is at all possible for the content of consciousness to free itself from its own limitation? We are using words - the meaning of the words - that are probably thousands and thousands of years old. Though English didn't exist then, but the content, the meaning of the words existed. So we are using a language, which is English, using very simple words, words that have meaning in themselves, not what you attribute to them, a significance of words that convey their meaning, if one is willing seriously to listen. Because at a Gathering like this there must be some who are quite serious, they must at least comprehend the deep meaning of all that we are talking about.

You see religions throughout the world have lost their meaning completely. They are a lot of mumbo jumbo without much meaning, and rituals, dogmas that have lost their - if they ever had it - their significance. Now people who are so-called religious go to these rituals, get stimulated, feel rather good and come away from it and then live their ordinary daily life. We are talking of religion that is totally integrated with life, with everyday activity, not something that you put away on Sunday morning and live in a peculiar, illusory, fantastic mundane world. So we ought to consider very deeply what is the meaning of religion, and if it has any meaning at all, and if there is in life something sacred. After all that is what all religions are supposedly concerned with: to find out if there is something totally sacred, uncorrupted by thought, by our sentiment, by our human vanities and all the rest of it. And to come upon that, or to enquire very deeply into that, which a very serious person must enquire, because without the basis of a religious life no political action, however cunning, however worthwhile, has any meaning, because they ultimately lead to war, to confusion, to man's agony. So it becomes very important if one is very, very serious, and I hope some of you are, to find out through very careful investigation, not through romanticism, not through imagination, not through some theory, but actually come upon this, and therefore it behoves us that we do seriously enquire whether there is something original, uncontaminated, not touched by culture, civilization. And to enquire into that one must go into this question of what is consciousness.

Are we aware of our total content of ourselves, of our consciousness? Our consciousness is what we are, what we think, what we feel, what we demand, our failures, miseries, confusion and all the rest of it is part of that consciousness. I hope this is clear. Because please bear in mind again, if I may repeat it, that we are using words in order to communicate. Communication implies thinking together. Thinking together to find out the limitations of thinking, thinking together to find out the illusions that we have cultivated, thinking together so that we share, not verbally, not theoretically, ideationally, but actually share. When you share something with another, the other is responsible, totally responsible with regard to what he shares, not with regard to what he thinks, or believes, that he already knows. But sharing implies a commitment, a sense of gathering together our energies to participate in that which is going on. That demands on your part, if I may point out, a certain quality of attention, a certain quality of urgency, and intensity, because otherwise you can't share. If you are not meeting the speaker at the same level, with the same intensity, then there is no possible communication. That is an obvious fact. If I want to tell you something you must listen, or if you want to tell me something I must pay complete attention, otherwise there is no communication.

But there is a further form of communication, which is communion, which is to go beyond the word. To see the meaning instantly, the truth of it, or the falseness of it, or see the falseness as false, and truth as truth. That demands that you must give attention, care, affection, give your whole sensory attention. Then only can we share, something together, then it becomes great fun, then it becomes worthwhile, because we are concerned with our life, with our daily living, and not with some abstraction, not with some ideals and so on. We are actually dealing with daily activity, because unless you lay a right action in life - have right action in life, meditation, the search to truth, if there is something utterly sacred, cannot possibly come about. That is what we are doing.

We are asking if there is something that is beyond the measure of man, beyond the structure of thought, beyond time. And to find that out, as we said, it is very important to observe what is taking place in us: how we think, what we feel, our anxieties, our depressions, our jealousies, hatreds, sorrows, all that. Because as we pointed out previously each human being, wherever he lives, whatever his circumstances, whatever his environment, pleasant or unpleasant, he is the total summation of all humanity, because he is in sorrow like the other, he is as confused, as miserable, anxious, frightened. So you are the world, and the world is you. That must be an absolute truth to each one, not just an idea to be investigated. Because you can see this as a fact when you travel around and see human beings under various circumstances, lack of food, lack of proper environment and all the rest of it, those human beings are still suffering, tearful, anxious, uncertain - oh, you don't know what miseries they go through, just like every other human being right through the world. So this is a common fact, basically.

And we are concerned with the transformation of that factor, transformation of the whole psyche, the whole psychological structure of a human being - that is what we are concerned with. Not with the environment, with the social structure. When there is complete transformation within the human being then the social structure, the religions, everything is transformed. So this is of the highest importance, not merely the social goodness. So we are asking whether it is possible to transform the total structure and the nature of our consciousness?

So what is this consciousness? When are you conscious of yourself? That is the beginning of consciousness - you understand? We are not conscious of ourselves if there is no problem - right? If there is no conflict, if there is no anxiety, uncertainty, when there is no battle between you and me. Then we are not conscious of ourselves at all, which is a very, very simple fact. We are only conscious of ourselves when there is a problem, whether it is a sexual problem, an ideological problem, or a problem in relationship, a problem with another, with the community, and so on and so on. So there is only a consciousness that comes into being, as we know it, when there is an issue, when you are in conflict of some kind, both biological as well as psychological. Otherwise you are not. This is very important to understand. Though it sounds very simple, it is a very complex thing. A human being is only conscious when he has some kind of issue, problem, a certain quality of fear and so on. When there are none of those things he is not conscious of himself. So consciousness is self-centred. I wonder if you get all this? (May I take a breather?)

So consciousness, with which we are concerned, which is to transform what it is into something totally different, which is when there is no problem. You understand? Both biological as well as psychological. And is that possible? That is our enquiry for this morning.

This is a great thing to discover for oneself, that there is a totally different kind of consciousness - perhaps we won't even use that word consciousness - a different dimension which exists naturally, it comes into being when we, with our consciousness become self aware. Now we are asking whether that self awareness, with all its self-centred activity, can be resolved totally completely? So we are going to investigate together, examine the nature and the structure of our consciousness. You understand? (Why am I struggling so much for you?)

So first: what is our consciousness? What is the meaning of that word consciousness, according to the dictionary, not what you think, what you would like to give to it, but the common usage of that word to be found in a good dictionary? It says "to be conscious of, to be aware of, to understand, to grasp, to see the significance, to have an intelligent perception" and so on and so on. That is, to be aware of what is happening. Not after it is over, or what will happen; to be conscious implies an active present observation. You understand? All right sirs? Good. That is, to be conscious of what actually is going on. That is the meaning of that word: I am conscious that you are sitting there. Not "I have been conscious" or "I will be conscious". You understand what this implies? When you are actually conscious what is going on there is no time. There is time only when I have been conscious, or I will be conscious. That is: where there is an action taking place there is no time - right? Only when that action is controlled by the past, or shaped according to the future, then time comes into being - right? You see this? So to be conscious implies what is actually going on. Therefore there is a freedom from the past and the future. By golly, I am getting it. Right? This is fun! We are investigating.

So: you as a human being, representing the total human entity, are you actually aware now of that consciousness? Or do you say, "I will think about it"? "I will investigate into it", "I will examine it" - you follow? All that implies you are not actually being conscious. So awareness means to be actually conscious, to be aware actually of what is going on. Not how to be aware, or the practice of awareness, or that you will achieve awareness. I wonder if you see this? So that is clear: that we are observing actually our consciousness, what exactly it is. That is a very difficult thing to do because we are used to the idea that I will be conscious, or I will become aware, I will examine to find out the content. We are saying quite the opposite. Because when you say, "I will examine" there is a time interval between the actual examination and the determination to examine. There is a time lag - you follow all this? In that time lag all kinds of other activities go on which interfere with your examination. Have you got it sirs? Got it? Good, at least somebody gets it.

So we are actually examining, looking at our consciousness, the content of it - because the content makes up consciousness. You understand? Without the content there is a totally different thing. The content is our consciousness. Right? That must be very clear. The content makes up our consciousness. When you are angry, that's your consciousness. When you are jealous, petty, narrow, all the rest of it, that makes the total content. So we are looking at the consciousness of a human being, which is yourself, actually as it is. Right? Now I said it becomes difficult because to observe for most people implies observation through the knowledge which you have acquired - right? Is that clear? I observe you because I know you. That is, I have met you yesterday, and I have talked to you so there is a memory, and that memory observes you. Right? That is, there is the observer, who is the past, observing the actual, which is the present. Right? Do you see this? Am I making it terribly difficult? No? Good.

I want to see myself. I want to be aware of my consciousness, what it is doing, what its activities are, what it demands, pursues, and all the rest of it. Now how do I observe that consciousness? How do you observe it? You observe it from what you have learnt about it - right? Either from some philosopher, analyst, or you have examined yourself and have stored it up as a memory and with that memory you are examining, you are looking. So the observer who is observing the consciousness is the past - right? So with the past he is observing the present, the fact. So he twists or adulterates the present. That is obvious. If you have insulted me and you have hurt me and I remember that hurt, then I look at you with that hurt. The observer is the hurt. So when we observe consciousness, as we are doing now, the actual consciousness, your observation is from the background of a conclusion right? So there is a division between the observer and the actual fact which is. Hence there is a conflict between the observer and the thing which is. Got it? Are we together somewhat in this?

So when you have a gap between the observer and the observed, then there is a time interval and during that time interval other factors enter, conflict arises and so on. Therefore it is imperative to remove this gap, otherwise you cannot observe actually the present - you get it? You see the logic of it at least.

So is that possible? That is, the observer who is the past, the past being knowledge, his experience, his hurts, his demands, his ideologies, his memories, and the actual fact, which is the present consciousness in which may be included the past and the future. So actually is it possible to observe without the interval, the gap? You understand my question? That is, it is necessary that one looks at the present, this present consciousness, with its activity, without the past. That means the observer is the observed. I wonder if you see that? Because the observer when he is different from the observed, then there is an interval of conflict.

Now I will make it much simpler. Is anger different from you who are angry? Do you understand my question? The man who is envious - is envy different from the man who says "I am envious"?

Or the observer and the observed are the same - right? While you think about it I will take a rest, while you look at it for yourself. When you hate somebody, when you are angry, envious, is that feeling different from you? Or you are that feeling? If there is not that feeling, you are not. Just see the simplicity of it. Do you understand?

So to observe the present, which is the content of consciousness, one must come to this realization that the observer is the observed. The observed is not different from the observer. This is really most important to find out. Because when you understand this deeply then meditation, into which we will go, becomes something entirely different. I can't tell you the importance of understanding this: that the feeling is not separate from you, you are that feeling. The observer though he may think he is different from the observed, he is still the observed. That is the observer - I will go slowly - the observer is the past - right? The observer, which is the result of thought, thought being experience, knowledge, stored up as memory in the brain, all that storehouse of memory is the past. And with that past there is observation. Thought says, "I am different from the observed". So thought breeds this division because the past is security, the past is certainty, the past is vital to thought, so it must keep itself separate from the observed. But when you examine it you will see that the observer is the observed. I can't go much more into it unless you drink it in, absorb it, put your teeth into it.

So: now you are observing without the observer your consciousness. That is you don't look at it with like and dislike, saying "This is right", "This is wrong", "This should be", "This is good", "This is bad" - which is all the past, your past being your conditioning, the background. But when you realize that you cannot look at what actually is with the eyes of the past then the very demand to look removes the past; not the effort made to remove the past, but the very demand to see the present frees the observer from the past, therefore there is only the observed. Right? See this, please. Right, can we go on from there?

So now we are observing without any judgement - right? Judgement is the past. So you are looking at this whole consciousness of the human being without judgement, without comparison, without any form of distortion; any form of distortion takes place when you judge, when you compare, when you say, "This is right", "This is wrong", "This should be", "This should not be". So the mind is free now of all distortion. And the distortion takes place when the movement of time, as past, comes into being. You understand the point?

So now we are observing the content of consciousness without any attitude, without any prejudice, just to observe. Now what is the content of consciousness? There are three obvious principles in that field, which is sorrow, pleasure, fear, with all the ramifications, with all the complications of each one. We are looking at it, not saying what to do about it. If you say, "What am I to do?" then you are looking with the eyes of the past. So you are observing without any sense of effort, therefore when there is no effort there is tremendous attention. You understand? Come on sirs.

We said the content of consciousness is consciousness. And the content of these three principal activities of human beings - fear, pleasure, sorrow. We went into the question of fear the other day - I won't go into it now because there is lots more further to be said. We said the word is not the thing. The word fear is not the feeling. Does the word awaken the feeling of fear? Or does the feeling exist without the word? If the feeling exists without the word then it is sensation, like any other sensation. And when you observe that particular sensation with all your senses that which you call fear no longer exists. This is very important to understand, which we went into the other day.

(Why am I working for you so hard? Eh? C'est mon metier! No it is not, so let's get on with it.)

So we look now at the content to observe pleasure. Not that it should not exist, or that it should exist. What would you do without pleasure, what would you not do without pleasure. Just to observe. That very observation brings its own peculiar discipline. You understand? The word 'discipline' means to learn, not what we have made it into, which is to conform, suppress, identify and drill oneself into a particular pattern. That is generally what is understood by the word 'discipline'. The root meaning of that word discipline means to learn, discipline - it comes from that, disciple, learn from the master - here there is no master, we are learning. So to observe without the observer brings its own order. You understand? Order means discipline. So we are observing this thing called pleasure. So we are asking: why man, throughout the world, at what ever level of society, class he may be, this is one thing he is pursuing, in the name of god, in the name of religion, in the name of politics, pleasure; with which goes power, position, prestige and all the rest of it - why? You understand? Why are you, as a human being, representing the world, which you are, why are you pursuing pleasure? Observe it, not whether it is right or wrong. Why is there this demand? You understand? When you go to church, when you go to a temple, it is another form of pleasure; sexual pleasure; the pleasure of possession, the pleasure of denial; the pleasure of austerity; the pleasure of abundance; the pleasure of possession, the pleasure of detachment; the pleasure of achievement; the pleasure of renunciation; the pleasure of completely controlling your body. This immense structure of pleasure is one of the factors of our consciousness, perhaps it may be one of the major factors. So why? You understand? You can't answer, not a verbal answer. Observing this fact of pleasure, why we are asking, man has pursued it upon millions of years, which is you?

Knowledge is a great factor of pleasure, the pleasure of having read a great many books, all the information, able to talk about it, inform people - you follow? - the whole pleasure of knowledge. Why? Observe it please in yourself. Why you, as a human being, pursue this pleasure? And what is pleasure? There are different kinds of pleasure: the pleasure of sensation, biological, organic sensation; there are the psychological pleasures? And the pleasure of thinking very clearly. And what is this pleasure? Is joy, that thing which comes uninvited, is that joy pleasure? You are wandering by yourself, if you ever do, in a wood, or you walk along and suddenly without any invitation, without seeking it there is that peculiar sense of ecstasy, joy. That is wholly different from pleasure. But thought recognizes that joy as an extraordinary state, then remembers that state - please follow this - remembers that state and wants more of it. So pleasure is the movement of thought. I wonder if you see it?

I have had a pleasure of a good meal and I remember it, and I say to myself, "I must have it tomorrow". The pleasure of domination, pleasure of having power over others. All that is the movement of thought over an incident which has happened and stored up as memory. And the movement of that is pleasure. So joy is entirely different from pleasure. The moment you remember that joy then it becomes pleasure.

And enjoyment: when you see a mountain, listen to the running waters, or see a green field and the lonely tree in a field, there is delight, there is a sense of fulness, appreciation of this vastness of this marvellous earth. Again that feeling of enjoyment is taken over by thought and pursued. Therefore that becomes pleasure. Is this clear?

So pleasure is the movement of thought in time, and we are conditioned to that. We seek enlightenment, a religious life, basically because it will give ultimate pleasure. Right? So pleasure is one of our basic principles in life, which is the pursuit of it. Not seeing the immense importance of seeing something extraordinary and not storing it. You understand? I wonder. This is, please if I may point out to you again, this is very important because the brain is recording all the time, recording every incident, every happening, every experience, every - you follow? - it is like a computer, storing, storing, storing. Because in that storage there is great security. If there is no storing up you are lost. So the brain needs security to function safely, intelligently, actively, efficiently. And so the brain stores up, as it stores up to act skilfully in the mechanical world, so it stores up memory, knowledge, as a means of its own security, which is obvious.

Now as long as that is operating there is nothing new - right? As long as the brain is operating, functioning, using its knowledge in skills, it is limited, it becomes mechanical. In that there is no basic freedom. So we are saying: is it possible to see something lovely, look at it, give your complete attention to it and not record it? The moment you record it, it becomes the pursuit of pleasure. You understand? So is that possible? You have a most pleasurable happening, extraordinary pleasurable; to observe it and to be so completely attentive that the brain doesn't record. Then that incident is over and not carried over. So it is important to find out because it is part of meditation. This is real meditation, because to find out if there is in the area of the brain, or in the mind, in the universe, in the global existence, a state, a dimension in which thought has never entered, therefore culture, civilization has never touched it. To find that out, and that is real meditation, that is the real religious life, one must find out why this recording process goes on all the time. Do you understand? If the process goes on all the time then the brain becomes mechanical. Our brains are mechanical - part of them. Is there another part of the brain which is not mechanical? To find that out, registration must come to an end - you follow? See the sequence of it for yourself. Not because I am capable of a good argument or anything of that kind, but see it for yourself how important it is to find out if there is an area where thought, with its mechanistic activity has never entered. And you can only find that out if the registration process comes to an end. That is, can the brain observe, be fully completely attentive, with all the senses, to that particular happening, to that particular incident, be fully aware? And when it is so completely aware there is no recording. You can do it for yourself. You can see it. If you can look at something, it doesn't matter what it is, with all your senses, not intellectually, not visually, not merely hearing but with every nerve, with every sense fully awakened, to observe that incident, however pleasurable, however painful, then you will see there is no record. Don't agree with me. Don't say, "Yes, that is marvellous" - do it. That means you have to find out what it means to be aware. What is implied in that word. Is it something that can be practised? "I shall become gradually aware, I am not now but I will be the day after tomorrow." Or go to classes to learn how to be aware. Oh that is all so silly, cut it out.

So: you are only aware now or never. You understand? Either you are - you can't cultivate it, then what you cultivate is the desire to achieve something. And when there is the desire to achieve something then you have lost totally the beauty, the perfume of awareness. Do you understand?

So what is it to be aware? When you sit there, are you aware of your surroundings? The man or woman next to you, just to be aware without any judgement, evaluation, choice. Just watch it. Aware of the tent, aware of the colours round you, the faces, and is it possible to observe without any choice? To look. Because the moment you choose, the past with all its demands, with its illusions, with its distortions, comes. So to be aware implies not only to be aware of all your environment, circumstances, the colours of nature, you know, aware of everything around you, just to observe for a second or two, then move from that awareness, in which there is no choice, to see with all your senses. Can you look at something completely? And it can only be done now, not as a result.

Then from there you can go into the question of attention. Where there is attention there is no centre. Have you noticed it? When you are completely attentive, say for instance, you are listening to me, fortunately or unfortunately, you are listening to me, to the speaker. And the speaker says to you, what it means to be attentive. He says, where there is complete attention, which is the understanding of awareness in which there is no choice, the observation of something with all your senses, then moving to attention. And when there is that tremendous attention, really effortless attention, then you see there is no centre as the 'me' who is the observer. Now you listen to that. Are you giving your total attention to it? Or do you say, "There is that train going by, that blasted train I wish it wouldn't"? And so on and so on.

So is it possible for a human being to give that total attention, the movement of awareness, senses, and attention - one movement. It is not I learn first awareness, then senses, it is one unitary movement. With that attention, complete attention, observe an incident, a happening. Because there is no centre there is no registration. You understand? You have got it?

Have we met this somewhat? The centre is the 'me', the ego, the I. That is put together by thought; put together by thought as name, form and all the attributes it has collected around itself. That is the centre, the 'me'. Now when that centre is operating it is operating in the field of registration, it is always registering - I am hurt, I am not hurt, how good I am, how bad - you follow? - what a marvellous morning that was, etc. etc. etc. So where there is a centre there must be registration. Where there is complete attention, and therefore no centre, there is no registration. This is a fact.

So can you observe the content of consciousness - the content - observe that with all your attention, which is your fear, and the immense pursuit of pleasure? That is, organized religions, religions of belief, religions of propaganda, whether it be two thousand years or ten thousand years, have always said, "Destroy pleasure. Deny pleasure, because you can't serve god if you have pleasure". So they have destroyed it and become distorted. What we are saying is something entirely different: which is to observe that pleasure, and the pursuit of pleasure with all the capacity of attention. Then in that state there is no registration. Then you will find out that there is a quality of mind where no registration takes place at all.

Incidents on the peripheral existence of life goes on, noise, buying a ticket to go to some place, meeting, talking here, it is all peripheral action as far as the speaker is concerned. But there is a place where there is absolutely no registration. Now that is part of meditation, which we will discuss another time. And also we will have to discuss in the next three meetings, gatherings - sorrow, love, death and meditation. They are all implied when we began at the beginning of the talks, the implications in those talks were meditation. It is not at the end you will learn how to meditate. It is a total thing. Right.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC TALK 20TH JULY 1976.

We were talking over together the problem of consciousness. As we said, it is a very complex question. The content of consciousness is the whole nature and structure of consciousness. That is what we were saying the other day. One is only aware of that consciousness of oneself when one has any kind of problem, strife, contradiction, anger, jealousy and so on, it is only then that one becomes completely conscious of oneself. Otherwise there is no consciousness of the 'me' - which we talked about sufficiently that last time that we met here.

And I think it is important this morning to talk over together the question of suffering, and the word 'love', which has been so misused, and what is the real significance, or meaning of that word. And to go into these questions rather deeply, one has to begin with what we call relationship, human relationship. Otherwise love becomes an abstraction, without much meaning and remains something printed in a book, or talked about in a church or a temple, and completely forgotten.

So we should begin, I think if I may point out, that relationship is the whole structure of society to put it very, very simply; it is a very complex problem this question of relationship. But to enquire into that question one must begin very near. That is: very near, our human relationship with each other. And then discover from there what is right relationship - if there is such a thing - and move from there to the question of what is the nature of love. And whether love can exist as long as human beings suffer? And if there is an end to suffering, specially psychologically? So we are going to go into this very complex problem.

As we said, we must begin very near to find out actually what our relationship is with each other, because on that our whole social, moral, ethical structure is based. That is society, society which we have built, a society which is utterly at present immoral, degraded, destructive. And if we would change the social structure it must begin from within, not merely change from outside. I think that is fairly obvious as one observes more and more the attempts made by Communists and other reformers; they think that by altering, reshaping the social environmental structure human beings will radically change. And when one examines the various experiments made in India, in ancient times, in China and in recent times, basically human beings don't change even though the environment changes. And it is very important, it seems to me, that we should understand the relationship of ourselves in our relationship to society, and whether in transforming the human mind, human consciousness basically, whether a new social order can come into being? That is one of our problems, because social order must change inevitably. There must be radical transformation of it - the Terrorists, the Revolutionaries, and the Idealists, some of them at least, think by changing the environment, throwing bombs and all the rest of the physical revolution, it will somehow transform the nature and the structure of human consciousness. And we think that the radical transformation of society can only take place when there is a radical transformation in human consciousness. I think we have made that very clear from the beginning of these talks.

So we must find out what is our human relationship to society, human relationship with each other, human relationship with the whole of humanity, a global relationship. So what is actually, in our daily life, our relationship to each other, and what is it based on? As we said, the word is not the thing, the description is not the described. What we are doing now is a verbal description but if we are caught in the description and don't go to the described, the fact, then we will merely skim on the surface and will lose all its meaning. So one must be aware, conscious, or whatever word one may use, not to be caught in words, not to be caught in descriptions, conclusions, but rather look, observe what actually is our relationship in daily life, and whether that relationship can be transformed into something other than 'what is'? That is our question: to transform 'what is' one must be concerned and observe completely 'what is', and not imagine 'what should be'. Right?

What is our relationship based on? Is it on knowledge? Is it on experience? Is it on various forms of intellectual, emotional, sentimental conclusions? Please, as we are saying, observe, if you do not mind, your own actual relationship with another - actual, not what you think it ought to be, not an ideal relationship, but factual, daily, everyday relationship, because that is what we live with, and if we understand that then we can go much further. But without deeply delving into that, merely to imagine, or have a fanciful relationship has no meaning, because we are dealing with facts and not with ideational abstractions, because that will lead nowhere. So what is our relationship actually?

Relationship - the meaning of that word - means, does it not, to respond. To respond completely to another - the meaning of the word, not what we have made of that word, the root meaning of that word is to respond, like responsibility. And do we ever respond totally with each other? Or it is always a fragmentary response, a partial response? If it is a partial, fragmentary response, why is it? You understand my questions? I hope we are communicating with each other because this is really very important. Like everything else that we have talked about, human relationship is one of the most radical, basic, essential things that we have to find out, because from that we may find out for ourselves what love is, really what love is - not what we have made of it. So it is really most important for each one of us to find out what actually our relationships are, and whether they can be transformed, and is it possible to transform them radically?

Is not our relationship based on memory, memory piled up through various, emotional, irrational, sexual responses? That is, there is desire, plus thought, and thought creates the image - right? Desire, that is sensation, plus thought and thought creates the image of myself and of you. So there are two images: myself and that which I have made out of you - right? Go into with me please, this is your life and for heaven's sake give some thought to this thing, because we are destroying each other, we are destroying the earth, the air, everything we touch we have destroyed. And I do not think we feel utterly responsible for all this. So please give your attention, which means your care, your affection, to find out what actually our relationships are.

We said our relationship is sensation plus thought, which is desire, and the image which thought has shaped according to that desire. So I have an image about myself, various images - the business image, the intellectual image, the emotional image and various images which I have built in myself, which society has helped me to build, education has helped me to build, I have an image. And my relationship with you is another image which I am making from you - right? That is an absolute fact. Right? The image or the picture, or the form is you, and I am related to you through that picture - right? I am attached to that picture, as you are my wife, my friend, my girl or boy, or whatever, I am attached to the image which I have made about you and I am holding to that image. And that image is projected through the various incidents in our contact with each other - right? Please. And you have an image about yourself, various images, and you add me to another image. So your image and my image of you are related - right? Go into this, please go into this. Look at yourself. You may have been married for five, or ten years, you have a girl or a boy, and slowly the images are built, consciously or unconsciously - generally unconsciously. So the image has taken root through nagging, through domination, through assertions, insults, possessiveness, attachments - you follow? - all those incidents have built this image in me of you. And you do the same about me. This we call relationship, and this we call love. I love you - which is, I love the image which I have built of you. It sounds rather cynical, but it is not, but this is actual fact.

So why does the brain build such images? Do you understand my question? I have built one about you, and you have built one about me. I am asking, this is a fact and I am asking: why does the brain do this? Which is, thought. Why does thought create this division between you and me through the image? Is that clear? Let's get going. Why?

As we said, the brain needs security - right? From childhood, children need security, they must be protected. We don't protect them, but that doesn't matter. We destroy them. That is another issue. So the brain needs complete security. It may find security in an illusion, god, fanciful images, all kinds of things and therefore neurotic. Or it may find security in the image which it has built as knowledge. You are following this? So the brain has made this image through thought, this image to be completely secure. I know my wife - you follow? - I know her. A positive assertion. That is, the image which I have built about her gives me that feeling that I completely have her, she is mine. And the other way round, and so on and so on. So the images are built through the desire to be completely secure. That is one of the factors.

And having an image is very convenient, because you don't then have to look at her, or him, you don't have to bother. You feel utterly responsible to that image, not to the human being. Watch yourself, please. And having an image, you having an image of each other, you live in your daily life at a very superficial level. The superficial level being sexual, and one goes off to the office, comes back - you know this very superficial life that one lives. That is one of the reasons why the images become tremendously important.

Now when one becomes aware of this process - the image maker and the image - when one becomes conscious of this, then one asks: can the image making stop? You understand my question because this is very important? Please look at yourself, look at your relationship. You have an image and I have an image, and our relationships are based on that.

And the next question is: we said why does it do it, we find some reason for doing it. And the other question is: is it possible not to make an image at all? If that can be prevented then our relationship becomes tremendously significant - you understand? Are we meeting each other? We are asking: is it possible not to build the image? The image maker is thought, obviously. Right? Thought as time, the remembrance of many incidents of yesterday, which is time, and through time the image has been formed, day after day, day after day. And thought has built the image through desire, sensation and so on. Now we are asking whether this whole momentum can stop, which is the traditional momentum?

We are slaves to tradition. We may think we are modern, very free, but deep down we are very traditional, which you can see when we accept this image making and establish our relationship with each other on those images, it is as ancient as the hills. That is one of our traditions, we accept it, live with it, torture each other with it. So can that tradition come to an end? That is - we go back to what we were saying yesterday and the other days - when an incident within our relationship takes place, a happening, not to register it at all? Have you understood? All right, it's not clear.

In our daily relationship you say something in anger, in irritation, and the brain registers it and adds to the image that it has already built about you, and that insult, that irritation, that anger, that something which you said that you want to hurt me, hurt the image, can that stop? You understand my question? It can stop only when you understand the whole process of registration. The brain registers everything. It is now registering what I am saying. And when an incident takes place it is registered. Now we are saying can that registration stop? You understand this question? I insult you in our relationship, and immediately reaction takes place, which is the registration. Now can that end, because otherwise our love is merely emotional, sentimental, sexual and rather superficial? It is only a mind that is not hurt that is capable of loving, isn't it? You see the meaning of it? Come on, please. So you hurt me, which is you hurt my image which I have built about myself. And can that insult not be registered at all so that my brain is not hurt. And then I will know the full meaning and the beauty of something which I feel exists but I now realize. So I am going to find out whether it is possible to stop that hurt being registered at all.

It is possible only when the image is not - right? Is that clear? When I have no image about you and you have no image about me, it is only then whatever you say leaves no mark - which doesn't mean I am isolated, or I have no affection, but the registration of hurts, insults, all those movements of thought, have come to an end. Which is, at the moment of insult to be completely, with all your senses attentive. You understand what I am saying? Am I talking to myself? Or are you all with me? Because you see our brains are hurt, various shocks, incidents, a sense of tremendous damage is being done to our brain. It wants security, therefore it finds security in abnormal and normal things, like a nation - the worship of a nation is abnormal, a tribal instinct, but it finds security there - and so on and so on and so on. The very desire to be secure is destroying itself - you understand? I am secure with my family. With my family there is a battle going on all the time between me and you, with my children - you follow? - constant conflict, agony, despair, annoyance - you know all that is going on day after day, day after day. That is a great shock to the brain. And so we are saying: as long as there is an image maker there must be hurts, there must be registration. It is only when the image maker is not then no registration takes place. Which means there is no me who is the image which gets hurt. You understand? There is no me - me is the image which I have about myself, an extraordinary human being capable, or "I am going to be successful" - you know, the things that thought has built around itself as the me, which is the deep conscious or unconscious image that it has built.

Now we are saying: in our relationship the image making becomes an extraordinary everyday activity and therefore there is actually no relationship. Relationship can only take place when there is no image - you understand what I am saying? Have you got something of this? Not verbally, for god's sake not verbally, actually in your blood. Then it brings a truth into our relationship.

So: then what is our relationship if there is no image between you and me - you understand? - then what is our relationship? Come on sirs, investigate it. I have no image about you - which is the most important thing - you understand? I actually have no image about you. Then what is my relationship to you? Have you an image about me, in our relationship? If you have what is our relationship? You have no image, and I have an image - then what takes place between us? I am in battle, because I have an image about myself and therefore I am in battle with you who have no image, therefore you are not in battle with me. You understand?

So can you in our relationship bring about in me a state of mind in which the image making has ended? You understand? That's your responsibility to me. Come on sirs. You have no image, and I have an image about you. What then is our relationship? You have the responsibility in our relationship to see that I don't make images about you. That is your responsibility - you understand? Then you are watching, you are alert, you are fully alive, and I am half asleep all my life. So it is your responsibility to see that I have no image. So two people having no image - if it ever takes place, which is a most miraculous thing, greater than any miracle in the world, if that takes place then there is a totally different kind of communion with each other. Which means never quarrelling - you understand sirs? Never possessive, never domination, shaping each other by words, threats, innuendos. Then we have a relationship of the most extraordinary kind. I know it can take place. It has been done, we have done it. It is not just a lot of words.

So we are saying: when there is no image then there is love. So we have to find out what that love is actually. What is it that we call love now in our life? When you say you love somebody, what does it mean? Is it sexual love, a biological affair, and the memory of it, the demand for it, the pursuit of it? And that apparently plays an extraordinary significance in our life. Blown up in every magazine, in every cinema, and all the rest of it. Is it sexual love? Is it love when there is jealousy? You understand? Is there love when - please listen - when I go off to the office or factory, or become a secretary, or whatever I do, and you do something else also because you want to fulfil yourself - the wife wants to fulfil herself, and the husband wants to fulfil himself, and the children want to fulfil themselves, where are we? You understand? So all this is called love, responsibility. So to find out what love is there must be no fragmentation. No fragmentation in my work and the implications in that work, and there is no division between my work and my family, my wife, my girl - you understand what I am saying? It is not broken up. I go to the office, there I am very ambitious, greedy and envious, desiring success, you know, pushing, pushing driving, competitive, and then come home and say, "Oh, darling I love you". It becomes all so cheap. And that is our tradition.

So we are asking: is it possible to live a life that is totally harmonious, whole, so that when I go to the office I am still whole there, not something different from my family? You understand? Is that possible? Not say it is an idea, it is a Utopia, it is this - one has to make it possible, one has to work at this thing, put your teeth into it to find out, because we are destroying ourselves.

So we are saying love comes into being only when there is total harmony in oneself, in whatever action one is doing, and so there is no conflict between the outer and the inner. You understand? To find out how to live that way. How to live a life that is not contradictory, that is not broken up, that is not convenient, comfortable - you follow? - that is total, whole, harmonious. To find that out one must go into the question of sorrow. They are all related, you understand? Relationship, love and sorrow. They are all interrelated.

Man has lived with this thing called sorrow: from the ancient of days man has carried this burden. And we are still carrying that burden, we are very sophisticated, highly technical and so on, but inwardly there is this grief, this ache, this loneliness, this sense of isolation, this sense of the great burden of sorrow, not only the sorrow of one's own little life, but the sorrow of humanity - you understand? We are meeting each other? The sorrow of humanity, sirs. They are suffering in India, in Asia, in the Arab world, in the Jewish world, in Russia, human beings are suffering, there is a global suffering. And our little selves are also suffering. So we are asking: is it possible to end that suffering? If there is no end to suffering then there is no compassion, then there is no love, then there is no relationship. This is what is actually happening in our society: no relationship, no love, no compassion, no ending of sorrow, therefore we are making a hideous mess of our lives - you understand?

So we are asking: is there an end to sorrow? Do you understand? This is a question which every human being has asked, when he is at all serious, when he has looked at his own sorrow and the sorrow of another. He asks this question: "Can it ever end? Or is it an everlasting misery of man?" We are going to find out, not in abstraction, not as a theory, but actually to find out if you, as a human being who represents the world, and the world is you, whether you can end that sorrow. We are going to find out.

This is a very serious matter, like everything else in life, and very complex; to find out what love is one has to shed every tradition, every sense of emotion, sentiment, all the things that one has built round oneself, to put away all that, then to come upon something that is whole, total, harmonious. One has to work, look, observe. So we are going to do the same with sorrow.

There is a biological pain, a physical pain. And that pain is registered in the mind, in the brain. And there is the fear that it might happen again tomorrow. And that brings sorrow also. There is loneliness, deep isolation, unrelated to everything in life, and the sense of complete withdrawal, complete sense of nothing to which the mind can be related. And that is a tremendous sorrow. I do not know if you have not known this. Most human beings do. Then there is the sorrow of death, the person you have lost and you left behind. The loneliness, the sudden cessation of that person whom you thought you loved, cared for, companionship, in whom perhaps you may have invested all your immortality, all that. There is sorrow there too. And there is the sorrow of all the people in the world who have been killed, so-called wars, wars of religions, wars of nationality, wars of security, killing millions and millions for your own particular nation, for your own particular security. There is all that immense untold sorrow. You understand all this? And we are responsible for all this - not the Americans in Vietnam, or the Arabs in Beirut, human beings are responsible for this, because their primary demand is: please give me security. And the security takes the form of nationality, the form of religious beliefs which goes very deeply and they hold on to that, that is their security, for which you are willing to kill and destroy. All that has brought about thousands of years of sorrow - right? We are describing this, so please don't get emotional about it because this is what we have to face and to understand.

So there is this sorrow of man. Can it end? If it doesn't end we are chained everlastingly to this misery. The suffering may be conscious or unconscious. So we have to look at the unconscious, the deep down, the hidden, as well as the conscious. So we have to go back into the question of what is consciousness.

The western world through Freud and others have divided consciousness into the unconscious and the conscious. The unconscious is the racial, communal, heredity, tradition, memories, all that, motive. And the conscious is the highly sophisticated, educated, technical mind. So there is a division between the conscious and the unconscious - right? That is your tradition again. It may not be at all that way. What has divided it? Thought - right? Unless we understand the deep meaning of the movement of thought every movement it makes must be divisive - right? So in the deep layers of one's consciousness is there sorrow? Is there sorrow of thousands of years of human suffering, stored up, brought from the past to the present in a human being, deep down in the very deep recesses of one's mind? We said that is part of the content of consciousness - you understand? Because the part makes the whole. So the part is consciousness. So there is in us the past suffering of man as well as the present suffering of man in consciousness. And can that thing end? If you see the importance that it must end, the importance, the essentiality of it, not accept it, not say, "Well it has been going on for a million years, what about it, a few more people suffering, a few people not suffering, what importance does it make?" It makes tremendous importance because when a human being transforms himself totally, radically, then he affects the whole of the consciousness of man. You understand? I'll show it to you.

Your consciousness is affected by all the things of the past, isn't it? By Hitler, by Stalin, by all the tyrannies, by all the brutalities, all that is the past. The content of that consciousness is the human consciousness. You are affected, as you are living in the western world, by Christianity - that Christianity is put together by priests, saviours and all the rest of it - that is part of your consciousness.

So suffering is part of this consciousness, whether hidden or one is aware of it. Now we are saying can all that immense burden of loneliness, despair, isolation, withdrawal through various forms of hurts, building a resistance around oneself, all that, can that come to an end - not gradually, not over years, but end now? You understand my question? You understand what I am saying? We are used to and we have been trained, educated, it is our habit to say, "Well I will gradually do it." "It may take time but I will do it." Which is, I am suffering now, gradually I will end suffering. There is that vast gap between the ending and the beginning. And in that gap various other forms of incidents and accidents take place, therefore there is always postponement of that. You are following all this? Therefore one has to break down this tradition of eventuality, of eventually I will come to that.

So we are saying: sorrow, which is part of human conditioning, part of our consciousness, can that sorrow end? Not in some distant happy future, but now? The now is the most important - you understand? So to find out what that now is (I wonder if you are meeting this? Are we meeting each other?) - what is the now so that it ends? The now is the past meeting the present - right? The past meeting the present, and if the past meeting the present modifies itself and goes to the future, then there is no now. Have you understood this thing, this very simple thing? That is, the past, my memories, my anxieties, my hopes, my remembrances, pleasures, pains, all that is a movement with the present. That is, I meet you, there is the challenge of the present and it modifies itself and proceeds to the future - right? So time is a movement from the past, through the present to the future. This is what we are accustomed to, this is part of our tradition. The Communists say, thesis, antithesis, and synthesis, which is bit by bit, bit by bit. So the past meeting the present, modified proceeds further to the future. We are saying that the now is when the past meets the present and ends it. You understand? And it can only end when you know the whole structure of memory. You get it? Memory as experience, as knowledge, and the response of that knowledge, experience, memory, is thought. So when thought brings the past to the present and for thought to end it there and not proceed to tomorrow. I wonder if you capture all this. Some of you get this because it is very important for your life so that there is an ending all the time - you understand?

So: that is, when you are feeling lonely, isolated, which brings great sorrow, on the death of another, or losing a job and so on and so on, ten different sorrows that human beings have created for themselves, facing that loneliness, which is brought about by self-centred activity of daily life - you understand? - that loneliness is the synthesis, the essence of our daily self-centred activity - right? To face that loneliness and not give it a future - you understand what I am saying? That is, to look at it, to observe it completely, with all your senses, with complete attention, then you will see the past meets the present and ends it, so that there is no future to loneliness, it has ended. So in the same way sorrow, with which you are quite familiar, for most of us we have built various escapes from that thing: escapes through church, through reading books, you know, a dozen ways. The very escape from it only strengthens it, obviously. So to be aware of the escapes, which means giving it time to flower, to be aware of the escapes and meet that suffering completely without any sense of distortion by thought, then there is an ending to suffering. Only when there is an ending to suffering there is compassion, because the word 'suffering' is related to compassion. Compassion means passion for all things - you understand? For all things. That means no killing. But Christians are used to killing. They have probably killed more people than anybody else. So no killing, which means to live on things that you have to kill like vegetables - you have to kill, you understand? - but not to kill animals. When there is this sense of compassion then you don't kill a thing, by word, by gesture, by an idea.

So what we are saying is: in the understanding of relationship love comes into being, and in the understanding of love we alter the structure of society, and there is an ending to sorrow. And it is only then there is compassion. You know compassion is the most extraordinary thing in life, because there is no 'me' who is compassionate, there is only that state of compassion which is not mine of yours.

Do you want to discuss anything? Ask questions?

Questioner: Are emotions rooted in thought?

K: Are emotions rooted in thought. What are emotions?

Emotions are sensations aren't they? You see a lovely car, or a beautiful house, a beautiful woman or man, and the sensory perception awakens the senses, doesn't it? Senses, then what takes place? Contact - right? Contact then desire. Now thought then comes in. Can you end - please listen to this - can you end there and not let thought come in and take over? I see a beautiful house, the right proportions, with a lovely lawn, nice garden, all the senses are responding because there is great beauty. Well-kept, orderly, tidy, all the sensations respond. Why can't you stop there? You understand? Can you stop there and not let thought come in and say, 'I must...' and all the rest of it. Then you will see emotions, or sensations are natural, healthy, normal. But when thought takes over then all the mischief begins.

So to find out for oneself whether it is possible to look at something with all the senses and end there, and not proceed further. Do it. That requires, as we said, an extraordinary sense of awareness, in which there is no control - you understand? No control, therefore no conflict, just to totally observe that which is, and all the senses respond and end there. There is great beauty in that. For after all what is beauty? We won't discuss that now.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC TALK 22ND JULY 1976.

We have been talking over together many psychological problems, complex human relationships in which there is such conflict, pain, anxiety. We also talked about fear, not only in our daily life, but also the fear of tomorrow, which may be death. We also talked about the pursuit of pleasure and compassion which is so rare a thing in this world, and the ending of sorrow.

I think we might also talk over together this morning - and the weather is appropriate - about death. It is a very complex problem in which many things are involved. Unless one goes into it rather deeply, very wisely, with great insight into it, if you are merely seeking superficial comfort, a belief that will be most satisfactory, then I am afraid those who are expecting such things will be disappointed. But if you will kindly listen with some affection, care and enquire seriously then we can talk over, have a dialogue, about this very complex and perhaps the most important thing in life apart from living, which is death.

To understand it, not verbally, not intellectually, without any emotion, or sentimentality, because sentimentality, emotion, belief do not solve any of our problems. We have to approach it most objectively, rationally, without any fear, and therefore with sanity. And so perhaps if we can talk over together this question; the meaning of death, then perhaps some of us can penetrate into that which is so mysterious, frightening, and that brings about such great sorrow in human life.

First of all there are several things which we must understand before we go into the question of death. First is having an insight, or having a deep understanding of the world and ourselves, the society and ourselves, the community and each one of us. The society, the world about us is not different from us. We have made this world what it is, with our fears, with our ambitions and greed and violence and destructive demands, we have built this society, this culture, both religious and non-religious. This is our way of living, our daily living that has produced this society, this culture. And so we are the world, and the world is us. That must be clearly understood from the beginning if you are to enquire very deeply into the question of death: that you as a human being, are not different from the humanity of the world. We have gone into this question, and if we may repeat it again, that wherever you go in the world you find human beings, apart from their environment, apart from whether they are rich or poor, whether they believe or not believe, all throughout the world human beings suffer, go through great anxieties psychologically, always in conflict in their relationships. There are fears of various kinds. So human beings right throughout the world have fears of various kinds. So human beings right throughout the world have a common factor apart from their culture, their superficial behaviour. So we are the world, and the world is us. The individual or personal tendency, character may depend on heredity, environment, and culture, but when you strip this off, move all that, below, deep down, in human beings there is this struggle, pain, anxiety, a great sense of frustration, misery, confusion. So there is a common factor in every human being. So basically, fundamentally we are the world, and the world is us. If you really grasp that, feel that, not merely intellectually argue about it, but deeply when you feel it our whole outlook changes completely. So that is the first thing one must grasp fundamentally: that you are not different from another human being. You are the essence of all humanity. If you know how to read yourself then you read humanity. You understand? If I know how to look at myself, observe myself, then I am observing the total human being, which is you, me and another, however far away they are, or however close they be.

When that is clear then the next point is we must consider time. This is very important because we are slaves to time both chronologically as well as psychologically. There is chronologically tomorrow and many years ahead, chronologically. And psychologically is there time at all? We are questioning it, we are enquiring into it, we are having a dialogue together, so please share in this. Don't let me, let the speaker show you and then agree with it, or disagree with it. We are sharing it together. Time is also another great problem in life. Time chronologically exists. That is obvious. There is no question of argument about it. We are asking: is there psychological time at all? And if there is psychological time as we have it now, what is that time? Psychologically we have time, that is tomorrow, the day after tomorrow, a year hence. I will be something, which is the movement of time, from this to that. Right?

We are enquiring what that time is. When we say, "I will be that" psychologically, or "I won't be that", "I shall reach a state of perfection, a state of bliss" and all the rest of it - all that implies from this to that. To move from this to that demands time, both biologically, physically as well as psychologically. That is clear. I hope it is clear.

So what is this time to which we are so attached? That is, tomorrow is very important for us psychologically because I do not know how to transform 'what is', so therefore give me time to understand it and go beyond it - you follow? You understand this? I am angry as a human being, one is angry. And to get over that anger time is necessary. That is, give me tomorrow, or a week, and by then I will be able to be free of anger. So we think time is necessary to transform 'what is' into 'what should be'. Right? So we are enquiring what is that time, the movement from this to that? Please, are we meeting each other? At least some of us. Please. Don't encourage me, I don't want your encouragement. But we must understand each other.

So what is that time that human beings demand in bringing about a change from that which is to that which should be? What is that time? Is it a movement of ignorance? Please go slowly, we are enquiring. Ignorance. Is it the lack of capacity to meet 'what is' entirely, and not having the capacity, that energy we need time to capture that energy? You are following this? Is time the product of thought apart from chronological time? So don't mix the two together. We are talking entirely about psychological time, because chronological time is very easy to understand. If I want to catch a bus I must be there. We are talking about psychological time. Is time from 'what is' to 'what should be' the process of thought? Is time thought? Is time measure? You understand? Now go slowly into this, very carefully.

Time as measure has become very important technologically. To go from here to Mars you need time. And to bring about that technological knowledge and use that technological knowledge skilfully, to put together this thing that can go to Mars, needs time; technologically you need time. Thought has put together technology, and thought is time - right? Thought is the movement of time. Thought is measurement - right? Are we meeting each other? Please don't agree with me, just look at it, not only verbally but actually. Human beings have ideals - I don't know why but they have ideals - ideals which have been projected by thought, noble ideals or whatever the ideals be. Why do human beings invent ideals? What is the cause of it? Is it because they do not understand, or go beyond their own anxiety, their own greed, sorrow, and therefore they project the opposite of 'what is' as the ideal and try to live according to that ideal? Therefore to live according to that ideal you need time. Are we following this? So being incapable of dealing with 'what is' we say we must have time to achieve and to change that which is. That is simple. I have explained that.

So time is a movement of thought as measure - right? The Greeks were responsible for this. I am not a Greek scholar, I don't read books and all the rest of it, psychological books or philosophical books. I read other books. They bore me in fact. None of the sacred books or any other books, so-called religious books, I have a horror of all that stuff. So the Greeks said in their thinking: measurement is absolutely necessary. Thought is measure and the whole western world is based on that, the whole technological world is based on measurement. That is simple. And measurement means time. Time implies thought - right? To move from here to there I need time. So why does a human being invent, or see the necessity of that which should be? You follow my problem? Because he can't deal with this, with 'what is'. If he knew how to deal with 'what is' the future wouldn't exist. You capture it?

So man - or rather thought has invented time as a movement to achieve that which should be, the ideal. So we are saying: is there such time, psychological time? If a human being knows what to do with 'what is' tomorrow doesn't exist. You follow? So measurement implies comparison. Comparison between this and that, comparing that with this, and that is much more hopeful, much more pleasurable, much more inviting than this. So time has become an extraordinarily important thing to us. And the ending of time, the putting a stop to time is death, for most of us. This is rather important to understand, because we are talking over together a very complex problem which is called death. To really go into it very, very deeply one has to understand not only that you are the world and the world is you, but also you have to understand time. Death means the ending of time, as it is generally understood. Right? That is, you have lived a life for fifty, or thirty or ninety or a hundred years, or whatever it is, you have lived a life of struggle, conflict, misery, confusion, occasional joy - you know what human life is. All those fifty years, or sixty or thirty, is a movement of time - right - in which all these complexities have taken place. For most of us the ending of that complex life is death - right? - which is the ending of time. Are we meeting?

So to us time has become extraordinarily significant. To learn a language one needs time. To learn any skill one needs time. But we think also psychologically to change 'what is' needs time. It is the same movement as learning a language, we have transferred it to changing ourselves into something. And the ending of time, or time must have a stop, means death. Right? We are coming back to it a little later.

And also we must understand, when something ends there must be a new beginning. Right? Because if there is a continuity there is no newness, freshness, no radical change. So ending is a new beginning, the ending is a new creation. The ending of a tradition is freedom to something else. So we human beings are frightened to end - the ending of what we know, what we have achieved, what our personal relationships are, our knowledge, all the things that we have accumulated. If that continues it is a mechanical movement - right? The ending of that is a new movement. Do you see this?

Look: a human being is attached to another, dependent on another. When there is attachment, is that love? In that attachment there is pain, there is suffering, there is fear, there is jealousy, there is a sense of losing and therefore feeling empty, loneliness, therefore the greater the attachment becomes. So when there is an ending to attachment there is something totally new. We are meeting each other?

So we are going to find out if there is not an ending only but is there no beginning and no ending? You understand? What is immortality? The ancient Egyptians sought immortality in stone. They said life is eternal. That is, life, which I live every day, will continue for ever and ever and ever. You see it in their tombs and all the rest of it. And they try to cheat death that way. They said life is eternal, which is, my life, with all my goods, with all my property, with all my power, with all the slaves that I have - the ancient Egyptians said that is all continuous. So they sought immortality through the assertion that life continues as it is. Which is, they thought there is no beginning and no ending. We must find out if there is an ending - you understand? - ending to attachment and this and that, and when there is an ending is there no beginning and no ending? You understand? This is something new which I am discovering myself now. You understand? I am investigating together. So we have to find that out because we have sought immortality as the perpetuation of our own self: myself, my name, my form, my character, my desires, etc. etc. - we want that made immortal, that is beyond death. By Jove, this is very, very difficult to explain all this to you, verbally. We will go into it.

And so we are frightened of a name which is called death. So man says, "No, you won't die but life after life if you live properly, you will become more and more perfect, until you reach the highest principle, the Hindus call it Brahman, till then you must go through various lives, called reincarnations and other forms of continuity". So man has always sought immortality, something which death can never touch. That is, he is always frightened of an ending, an ending of himself. So one has to ask what is it that man hopes continues? You follow? The me, the ego, the person, to which he clings, and he is so frightened to lose that. So we are asking: what is that? The me, the I, the ego, all that, what is that? Has it any reality? Or is it put together by various social, environmental, ideological, verbal structures - you understand? When you say 'me' - what is that me, I? It is a name, it is a form, it is various characteristics, memories, experiences, knowledge - right? The 'me' is a colossal image put together by thought - right? When thought, which is a material process, comes to an end, the 'me', what happens to that? You are following all this?

We said thought is a material process, which we have been saying for many years and the scientists are now saying the same thing; not that I want their encouragement, I am just stating it. A material process. And thought has put together the 'me'. When thought, which is a material process, comes to an end with death - is there a me? You understand? So what - please listen - what is the origin of thought? You understand sirs? The beginning of thought? Is it not, the root of it, is it not man living with his senses, knowing the thing and all the senses are moving - no I must be careful with you, you are not meeting me.

We are asking what is the origin of thinking, thought? Life being uncertain, in flux, in movement, changing, the origin of thought must have its beginning in reaction, reaction to environment, and so on, reaction. Thought is reaction because it is the reaction which is memory. And when there is a memory there is reaction to that memory, which is thinking. I have got it! I'll stick to that, not stick to it, that is the truth. That is, thought is reaction. Understood sirs? That is, knowledge as experience, experience which is stored in memory, memory stored in the brain, and the reaction to that memory is thought. Very simple. I ask you, "What is your name?". You reply instantly, because you are familiar with it. I ask you a little more complex question and you take time. And I ask you a question which you cannot possibly answer and you say, "I don't know". So it is a process of reaction. So thought, which is a reaction and therefore fragmentary has created the 'me', which is a total reaction. Please do see this, it is very important because we are going to find out if death is an ending of thought, which is a material process, and therefore the ending of me - is there something more? You understand?

So we have talked, we have gone into the question of the world and you - you are the world, and the world is you, time, and the desire for continuity, and the fear of ending, and the ending is the 'me', which is put together by thought, and the origin of thought is reaction. So when life as we know it, that is our daily life of confusion, misery, attachment, pain, anxiety, that is all we know, with pleasure, occasional joy, sexual and all the rest of it - we don't have to repeat it over and over again. All that comes to an end: is there a totally different dimension in which there is no beginning and no ending? All that we know is a beginning and an ending, and the fear of ending - right? Are we meeting each other? Fear of ending, which is death.

So we are asking: can the life that one lives end, can all the attachments, beliefs, experiences, knowledge, end now? That means dying now. You understand the question? I wonder if you do. Look sirs: our life, our daily life, which has been a continuous stream from the very beginning of humanity, until now, a river, a rushing river of sorrow, misery, confusion, quarrels, violence, bestiality, wars, utter selfishness, lack of compassion - all that is a vast stream flowing, of which we are. Either that can end, or it will continue for ever. I wonder if you understand this. Either there is an ending to that stream, that means the mind which has lived in that stream, which is of that stream, can that consciousness completely empty itself of all that, and therefore dying to all that, ending to all that? Therefore if there is an ending to all that there is a totally different beginning in which there is no end or beginning.

I wonder if you capture this? Have you got it sirs? Have some of you got this? I'll go into it again.

Death, the Christians have made death into one thing; the Hindus, the Buddhists have made it into another thing. And human beings whatever their beliefs, whatever their beliefs in reincarnation, whatever it is, it doesn't affect their life, they are frightened of an ending, the ending of everything they have known. Death means losing all that, your family, your houses, your insurances, your attachments, whether they be to furniture, to people, to houses, to beliefs, to ideals, to gods, losing everything that you have known, which is the ending, obviously. We cannot face that, because thought is a material process and thought has put together that thing which is me. The 'me' is the known. I may not know all the content of me but it is the known when investigated and discovered, self-knowledge. All that is a continuous movement of time as thought and measure. That is what we live with and that is what we are attached to, and when that ends there is fear of death. You have understood? So we would rather live with the known, that is our misery, our confusion, our struggles, our pettiness and all the rest of the ugliness, we would rather cling to that than say, "End it". That means putting an end to time. That is, there is no tomorrow. You understand? So the living is the ending of what is known as life, which is our pain and all the rest of it, and to that we cling desperately. And being afraid we seek shelter, we seek comfort, we seek some palliative. And we then have innumerable beliefs that I will continue, and I will meet my brother, my sister - you follow?

So long as a human being lives in that river of sorrow and doesn't end it, humanity will go on endlessly in that stream. But when there is an ending to that there is a totally different dimension in which there is no beginning and no ending. And that is absolutely timeless. This you have to come upon by living it; not talking about it, that has no meaning, but when you attach to something, end it today, not tomorrow. And one can. Because there is pleasure in attachment, in possession, and to look at that pleasure and see what all the implications of that pleasure bring about, which is fear of losing, fear of not having that same thing tomorrow, jealousy, anxiety, hatred, all that comes out of that attachment. Seeing all that as a whole and to end it instantly, is dying to all that now, and therefore there is a totally different dimension in which there is neither an ending, nor a beginning, which is eternity. Do you understand what I am talking about? Please you have got to live this in your daily life. Which means you are greedy, a human being is conditioned to be greedy, conditioned by society, by education, by endless years of tradition. That is part of his tradition, that he must be greedy. And not being able to meet that, how to dissolve that greed, he invents a world of non-greed. Therefore he says, "Give me time to achieve that." But if he knows how to observe greed, then there is only that feeling. There is not the other non-greed. To observe it means one has to find out if the word 'greed' brings the feeling, or the feeling exists apart from the word. This is really important to find out. Do I exist apart from the word, the name, the form, this, that and the other? So in the same way, is greed encouraged by the word? Or is that feeling, sensation independent of the word? If it is independent of the word it is just a sensation, and you must have full sensations, therefore you are completely out of that category of belonging to the word of 'greed' - do you understand this? So if there is an ending of your pleasure of tomorrow, then you will discover for yourself that death means in everyday life a beginning in which there is no ending and beginning.

Man has sought this everlastingly. I don't know if you have gone into it. I do not know if you have gone into yourself very deeply, because you are the history of mankind, you are the essence of mankind, and if you know how to read that book you don't have to read any other book in the world, apart from technological books, or something or other. There is this vast unread book of yourself, and to read it you must have the capacity to observe it, to look into it. You can only look into it, not page after page - please listen to this - but to read the whole book in an instant. And you can do that if there is no observer or reader reading a book. You have got it? That is, the book is yourself, and the reader is that which he is reading. But if the reader says, 'I am different from that which I am reading', then he is translating what he is reading according to his prejudice, his knowledge, his previous history. And therefore between the reader and that which he reads there is always distortion, conflict. So if there is the art, to put everything in its right place, therefore when you read that book of yourself there is only observation, not retention, not acquiring knowledge and with that knowledge read the book. You understand? There is only observation of that book, and it will tell you everything, literally it will cover the whole psychological world.

So the ending of life, which is your daily life, of which you are so frightened because we want something permanent. You understand? And we think the 'me' is permanent - right? The 'me', identified with the house - the house is permanent, semi-permanent - you understand? So through what it thinks is permanent it has made itself permanent. So that has become our greatest illusion that I am permanent. When you look at that I, it is put together by thought, and thought is a material process. Until you see that deeply you will always be frightened of death. But if you see that the 'me' is totally impermanent because thought is impermanent, and that which thought puts together is impermanent, then there is no fear of ending, because it is thought that says, "I will continue". But thought itself knows that it is also an end. So the ending is not only a new beginning, but it is that movement which is not of time, in which there is no beginning and no ending.

But the question arises: how is it that there are manifestations from that stream? You understand? Are you interested in all this? You understand my question? That stream, which is a million years of human sorrow and anxiety, fear and despair, hope and all the rest of it, that stream is always manifesting itself, isn't it? Which is you - no? You understand what I am saying? Having manifested itself as you, then you are born in a family, you have a brother, you have a wife - the brother, the son, the wife dies and you are left alone, you are left lonely. That is, you have separated yourself from the stream, thinking you are different from the stream, and therefore feel completely isolated when death takes place. Are you understanding all this? I am sure, unfortunately, with each human being, there have been deaths, the loss of someone whom you think you love. The love is that attachment, that image that pleasure. And when you lose that person in death, the organic death, you are left alone. You are not only crying for that person who is lost but also you are crying for yourself, self pity, loneliness, isolation, left alone to do all the things which the other one helped you to do. And you are left. And one sheds tears, or one goes to seances, or one believes in meeting them in heaven, or meeting them in the next life, reincarnation and so on. So all that is avoiding the observation of the sense of loneliness - you understand? - the sense of complete isolation. The more you move away from that isolation, that is, avoid it, run away, escape, the stronger that thing grows. But when there is total observation of that loneliness, then you will see that loneliness transforms itself completely.

So there is not only the losing of someone, but also the incapacity to meet what actually one is, and so one goes through depressions, sorrows, misery, moods, bitterness - you follow? - all that, which is part of the human stream, you are caught again in it. You understand what I am saying? So when you see an attachment in yourself, end it immediately. That is to die instantly to that. You understand? It is easy to die to something that is painful, but it is extremely unpleasant to die to something that you like, that you are attached to. But when you see this thing, how extraordinarily important it is that time must have a stop, then death has an extraordinary meaning, it has a most significant meaning; which means the ending everyday of everything that human beings have put together. Then you will see for yourself - not that, you won't see for yourself but there is a totally different thing altogether.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 28TH JULY 1976

I think there is a difference between dialectical questioning and dialogue. Dialectical questioning, or investigation, implies, according to the dictionary, to find the truth through opinions. That is the literal meaning of dialectical approach. Whereas dialogues are between two friends who know each other fairly well, know their vocabulary, the usage of words, and together, with a spirit of real enquiry find truth - by enquiry, not by asserting opinions. So it is up to you to choose which you want: either through opinions to investigate if there is truth, which I question very much because opinions imply prejudices, personal idiosyncrasies and so on; whereas dialogue implies that both of us are deeply interested in a problem, we are not prejudiced, we don't want a certain definite answer, but together we are investigating to find the truth of the problem. You see the difference? One is dialectical approach, the other is approach to truth through careful, non-personal, objective investigation. That means we both of us start with no opinions, no conclusions, no assertions, but together, as two friends, and I mean by friends, who are really concerned with a problem, to investigate it together by sharing it, and thereby perhaps coming upon what is truth - right? So if that is clear during all these dialogues which we are going to have, which is, not asserting opinions, or prejudices, or conclusions, "I believe", that is a conclusion, whereas if you are investigating we are both open and we can go very far if we both are free to look objectively into things.

Now what are the questions you would like to ask?

Q: I would like to ask a question. Very often I feel closed in, and out of that state of feeling so much closed in I wish to come out and I am afraid. My question is, is it possible to naturally come out of this and flower?

K: Just let me repeat the question. He asks, one feels held in, bound, enclosed, and is it possible naturally to come out of that and flower. That is his question.

Q: (In French)

K: May I repeat the question briefly, otherwise don't make it too long. The questioner says, as far as I understand it, that there is a state of attention which he has come to, which is partial, which is fragmentary and during sleep does it become more full. Is that the question, sir?

Q: Conscious of my sleeping state.

K: Ah! He becomes conscious of his sleeping state, which is fragmentary. I understand now. What other questions? Just a minute, sir.

Q: I find the fears are so huge, and the sorrow is so huge, that the body has its own intelligence, the nervous system, it takes like physical time, the body says, "I can only take so much".

K: There is so much fear, and so much sorrow, that biologically, organically the body cannot stand it.

Q: It can only tolerate so much.

Q: I would like to discuss the 'me'. I would like to know whether it is hunger, the 'me', the image-maker, and not thought, not memories. For example, if I am hungry for food, I think of food. I am not referring to food hunger so much as hunger for love as being the 'me'. I think frustration of this love-hunger breeds fear, and they both breed thoughts and images and then they nurse the fear.

K: What is the question, sir?

Q: Is the 'me' merely the past images, or do you think it is love-hunger?

K: Like love and hunger?

Q: Yes, a hunger to be loved, or a hunger for food.

K: I see, I understand the question. Is the 'me', the ego, an image created by thought, or is it like hunger, like hunger for love?

Now just a minute, that's enough questions. Can we take one question amongst several and investigate that one question to the very end so that we all are of the same movement, going along the same way, keeping up the same speed. Which is, I am asking can we take among these questions one central question and work that out completely so that at the end of it you will know for yourself - right? Can we do that? That is, either we discuss that gentleman's question, which is, attention, fragmentary and the state of sleep in which there is a different state of attention; or is the primary demand love, as hunger, and the 'me' is only the result of thought; or do you want to discuss that question which is, most human beings are enclosed by their activity, by their sorrow, by their problems, by their inhibitions, by their education, and so they are held, as it were, in a fortress, bound and they want to release themselves completely, break through; or the sorrow and fear are so great the organ can only stand so much, tolerate so much. Now which of these questions do you think, if we took one question out of these four, we can investigate together? That is, is the primary urge for love, which is not the ego, the 'me' put together by thought, therefore the primary demand of every human being is to love and to be loved. And why do human beings enclose themselves, enclosed by their education, society, by their frustrations, all that, enclosed and not being able to get out of that enclosure naturally. And is there an attention, which is totally different in the state of sleep and therefore can that attention be maintained during waking hours - if I understand the question rightly. And the other is, fear, sorrow, the physical organism cannot stand too much of it. Now which of these?

Q: The one of being enclosed and wanting to find freedom.

K: All right, let's begin with that, and perhaps we will include all the others. The questioner says please discuss, or go into, why human beings are enclosed, held in, and never free.

Q: It is a lack of awareness.

K: But that is a conclusion, that stops investigation by saying you should be that, it is lack of something - finished. But if we say, look, suppose the speaker, I, am enclosed, I am not free, I can't express myself, there is not an easy flow, there is not a freedom, why are human beings right throughout the world, this is not his question, it is the question of humanity, why human beings are so encircling themselves, why have they this burden of tremendous weight so that they don't ever feel free? Can we discuss that, discuss it in the sense investigate it, not say, "Yes, you should be free", or 'Because you lack awareness' or this or that. So please we are going to go into this question, why human beings, practically everyone in the world, unfortunately, have allowed themselves, or as it happens that they are living within four walls, as it were. Now can we investigate it.

How would you approach this problem? You understand my question? I am enclosed. I have been hurt, I have been shocked, I have had a great deal of pain, both physical and psychological, I have had a great many insults and so on and so on and so on. I am enclosed. And I feel I am a prisoner. Now how shall I approach this problem - you understand? What is my approach to it? Is my approach wanting to be free from this? You understand my question? Is my motive, which says, be free from this, therefore I have already started with a direction, therefore I am not investigating. The direction is going to guide me - you understand? I wonder if you grasp this. I am a prisoner, psychologically, specially psychologically and I have a motive which is to break through this. The motive gives a direction, doesn't it? Be quite sure. Wherever there is a motive it obviously gives a particular line, particular direction, therefore I have already started in a direction, therefore I have stopped investigating. Is this clear? So am I free of motive in my investigation? If I am not free then why if I understand that any motive gives a direction and therefore it is impossible to investigate, that is if I have a certain belief and I am rooted in that belief and I want to investigate I can't. I have already started with a tremendous prejudice. So if I have a motive for my investigation then that motive makes the investigation in a particular direction, therefore it is not investigation at all. So am I free from motive in my examination why human beings are prisoners, psychological prisoners. You understand my question? First, are you free from it? You will be free from it when you see the truth - the truth that a motive gives a direction, therefore you stop investigating. And hence you say, "That's absurd, I'll drop it", it is a natural thing to drop a motive. I wonder if you understand this. Have you understood this, sir?

That is, please be clear, if I want to be free from psychological prison which I have created, or others have created, or society has created, or my parents and so on, if my motive is to be free from the prison, then my eyes are focussed in a direction therefore I am not looking - right? So I see I want to understand why I am enclosed, and I see also that if I have a motive it is not possible to investigate. That's simple. Therefore I have not motive. Right? Are you in that position? That any psychological investigation demands, it is necessary, that there should be no direction. That means you start with no belief, no - you are free of all that and therefore investigate. You understand? If I am a Buddhist and I have a certain direction, certain prejudices, I have read a great deal, and I am convinced of that, it is finished. Or a Catholic, it doesn't matter who it is.

So it is very important in order to investigate that there should be freedom to observe. And you can only observe when there is no direction, when there is no motive - right? So have you dropped the motive? If you have dropped the motive then what is the prison? You understand, I have no motive, I am looking at 'what is', which is my prison - my various hurts, wounds, all the things we go through life which make us shrink, become like a snail that draws in. Now that is the fact, we are looking at that. What has happened? Is it that I have been hurt from childhood, at home, school, college, university, all through life, being somewhat sensitive a human being is hurt. So he begins to withdraw - right? He begins to enclose himself. So one of the causes of this withdrawal, with this isolation, with this sense of imprisonment, one of the factors is hurt - right? Now all human beings are hurt - right? Now when we generalize all human beings it gives us much more vitality - you follow? I wonder if you understand that? When I am hurt, it is a very small affair, but when I see all human beings are hurt it becomes something tremendous. I wonder if you understand this. So is it possible not to be hurt - never? You understand? One has been hurt when one is young and the hurt remains through life with most people - right? We carry that burden, and therefore we resist people, we withdraw, we isolate ourselves, we become bitter, from that violence and so on. Now we are asking, is it possible to be free of the past hurt or hurts and so being free one is never hurt - you understand? There is the curing process of the past and the prevention. I wonder if we are meeting each other? Oh, come on sirs, this is a dialogue.

You understand my question? There is the past hurt, and is it possible to be free of those past hurts, and to prevent future hurts so that the brain is never hurt, so it remains young? I wonder if you understand. And therefore innocent. The word innocent - it comes from the Latin - which is, incapable of being hurt. So we are going to look at it. I have been hurt, suppose I have been hurt as a human being from childhood. I know what happens when there are these hurts, I am aware of it - that I withdraw, that I resist, that I isolate myself in order not to be hurt more - right? Are you aware of this process? Please, come on!

Q: It is very difficult to be aware because there is so much agony involved in it.

K: It is difficult to be aware because there is so much agony involved in it. Let's keep to that one word - there is so much agony involved in becoming aware that I am hurt. You understand what he is saying? Don't go to sleep please. This is your problem, you understand, it is not only his problem, it is the human problem. We are all hurt from childhood. The greater the hurt, the greater the violence.

Q: Would you say that a human being from childhood on experiences this being hurt? Apparently, to me at least, it looks like an essential dimension of being a human being. So then I think, for my part at least, I feel it is not the intention, the purpose of my existence to refrain from being hurt. Apparently it is part of my existence. So I have may be to cope in a more creative way with being again and again hurt. I feel being hurt is part of the progress of growth.

K: It is natural to be hurt. It is natural to be hurt as a means of growth, as a means of evolution, as a means of progressing, you must be hurt.

Q: There is a difference in being hurt and carrying that hurt over, making that hurt something psychological. If someone pushed me I am hurt at that moment, but that is a different hurt from psychological hurts.

K: Sir, look that gentleman says part of human existence is to be hurt, it is natural. I am questioning that. Why should we be hurt? And look what damage it does psychologically, inwardly, how it affects our brain. It is not, "I think it is a part of life to be hurt", but see the result of it.

Q: How can you prevent being hurt?

K: I am coming to that. We are coming to that: how to prevent hurt, and what to do with the hurt that we have. But if we say, hurt is part of life, war is a part of life, killing each other is part of life, disease is part of life, psychological disease, then that's the end of that argument. But if we say, is it possible to prevent being hurt and what to do with the hurt that one has, then we can go into the question.

Q: How do we know we are hurt?

K: How do you know you are hurt - don't you know you are hurt? Oh lord! Come on!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, look, when in the school, or in the family, the child is told, you are not as good as your brother, or your sister, you have already hurt that child - right? And in class, in a school where A is compared with B, and the teacher says A is not as clever, or intelligent as B, you have already hurt the child. So where there is comparison and competition there is hurt. This is so obvious. Now are we - the gentleman asked too - are we aware that we are hurt? Come on sirs. Be simple about it, don't complicate it. Are you aware that you are hurt?

Q: Yes.

K: Thank god! At least somebody is fairly frank and comes to it. Do you see the result, are you aware of the result of this hurt, what happens? That is isolation, resistance, and the resistance implies violence, and a sense of gradual isolation. From that all kinds of bitterness, lack of love, lack of sense of freedom, all that arises. Are you aware of this? Of course, any person is aware of this, aren't you? Right.

There is that past hurt, how do we wipe that out? If you say, "I must not be hurt", or "I won't resist", it is already another form of resistance. I wonder if you see that. You understand? I am hurt, and I am aware of that hurt, and the results of that hurt, and if I say, "I won't be hurt, I'll forget my hurt", therefore I am already resisting. Right? Therefore that is another form of resistance. Oh, come on!

Q: One should change the focus onto something else.

K: One could change the hurt to something else, to love.

Q: The focus.

K: The focus onto something else, which is love. You see you are not - how can I, you don't go into this, how can I when I am hurt, very deeply wounded, it is there and try to focus on something else. That would be an escape. This is a fact, that is non-fact. Right?

Q: Isn't it only the image that we have of ourselves that is hurt?

K: We will come to that madam. Sir please listen. What am I to do with the hurt which I have, and I see the results of it, what am I to do with that hurt?

Q: Experience it.

K: But I am experiencing that, I have got it.

Q: I have an idea if you experience it thoroughly it will disappear.

K: You are saying if I can experience it thoroughly. I did not experience it thoroughly at the beginning, the result is there now. If I really paid attention at the beginning there would be no hurt, but I have not paid attention so I have got this hurt. What am I to do?

Q: Try and understand why you are hurt.

K: I will tell you. I can understand why I have been hurt. I have got a marvellous image about myself and that image is hurt - right? I have an image that I am a very clever man, and you come along and tell me I am a fool, that hurts me. My image is hurt - right? My image is me. I am not different from my image - right? Am I different from my image?

Q: What is the solution to it?

K: You want a solution before you have gone into it. How impatient you are really, you want a quick way out of everything - a quick pill, quick Nirvana, quick meditation, quick everything. Please listen. When we say, "I am hurt", who is hurt? The image which I have about myself is hurt, isn't it? That is simple, no? Now is that image different from me? So I am that image. Wait sir, wait, I am coming to your question a little later. I am that image. I have created that image, that image has been built through the parents, society, through environmental influences and so on and so on, so that image is me, I am not different from that image. So when you say something which is not pleasant that image gets hurt, which is me.

Q: Every time that we are hurt our image is changed, because of that our image is another one. Shouldn't we accept this change of images?

K: Images change after hurt, but the hurt remains. I may change my image, but the hurt remains. But you don't even investigate this thing.

Q: Isn't it possible that a small child is being hurt before they have images?

K: I am afraid I can't answer the question because I don't know enough children. But you can see for yourself madam whether you are hurt, you. If you are hurt, and we are asking who is hurt, the image you have about yourself, or you different from the image? You must answer this question.

Q: It is right what you say but my past hurts...

K: Which is what? Your past is the image which you have had about yourself. How extraordinary this is! Look I am only interested in freeing myself from hurt and nothing else, I don't want all kinds of theories, tell me how to be free of my hurt, if I have it. And that hurt remains in spite of everything else. I may go to Japan and Zen Buddhism and all the rest of it, but the thing is there inside, I can't escape from it. I try to escape from it, it is there. What am I to do?

Q: Observe it.

K: I am putting that question to find out. What will you do? Because I see the necessity of being free from hurt because that brings all kinds of ugliness. So I must be free from it, there must be freedom from it, what am I to do?

Q: Why do you want to be free from it?

K: Oh, sir, come on, I explained that. I see the result of it, and what am I to do?

Q: You can't help what gives the hurt, it is the potency, what is the memory.

K: Yes, the memory, the experience, the knowledge, which is the past, in the past there is that thing called 'me', the image, which has been hurt. Now I am asking you what is one to do? Just look at it first before you answer. What is one to do?

Q: Why does hurt continue?

K: It is part of memory. One cannot wipe out memory, the experience or the knowledge of it, you can't get rid of it, it is there.

Q: But when you want to be free from it, it is there. You also have a continuity.

K: Sir, I explained to you. That is putting it quickly. Look, I have been hurt for various reasons and I see the result of those hurts, and I see the importance that these hurts must go, what am I to do?

Q: I can only do something about the hurts when I am different from the hurts. But we are not different from the hurts, so I can't do anything about the hurts.

K: The gentleman says, I am the hurt, the image is the hurt, there is no difference between the image and me, I am that image. And that image has been hurt. And as long as I try to do something about it I am creating another image - right? I wonder if you see that.

Q: The image is what is hurt, you can't separate yourself from your images, so you can't separate yourself from the hurts.

K: Therefore what happens? If I am the hurt - you are not meeting it - if I am the hurt and the image is not different from me, which means the observer is the observed, then what takes place?

Q: Stay with it.

Q: If I see that, I stop dividing my mind.

K: That's right sir, that's right. If I see the truth that I am the image and the image is me, therefore there is no division, then quite a different process takes place. Which is, there is only observation, not freedom from hurt. There is only observation when you observe without the observer, if you will go into it - do you want me to go into this very carefully, follow this. The observer is the past - right? The observer is the memory, the experience, the knowledge, which is the past. So with the past he is looking at everything - right? And with the past, as the observer, he is looking at the present. Right? Therefore between the present and the past there is a division created by the observer. You get it? So there is conflict between the observer and that which he observes. He says, "I must change it, I must control it, I must suppress it, I must run away from it" and so on, but when the observer is the observed the conflict comes to an end. And this is the most important thing to discover, this truth: that the experiencer is the experience - right? The thinker is the thought. There is no thinker if there is no thought. So the thinker is the thought. Though the thinker says, "I am different", but in actuality the thinker is the thought. Right? The experiencer is the experience. I will show it to you if you are willing to listen.

I experience something. To know that I have experienced something I must recognize it, mustn't I? Of course. I must know what it is. Otherwise I can't say, "I have experienced". So recognition implies the past, doesn't it - the past, with its knowledge, with its memory, is the experience, and he says, "I am experiencing something". So the experiencer is the experience. Until you see that you can't move away from it. Look, the gods, the gods that you have created, human beings have created, whether in Christianity, Hinduism or whatever it is, those gods are the projections of one's own thoughts, one's own desires. Do you accept that? If once you accept that, do you know what happens? You understand my question? The image that you have made of god is the image that you have built. God hasn't made you into his image, but you have made god into your image. For god's sake, this is so simple. No, you agree but the whole of Christianity, the whole world of religious thought is based on that. Once you see that, you deny the whole structure of thought in religious matters.

So the hurt is not different from me, the 'me' is the image, and that image gets hurt, so I am that image. That anger is not different from me, I am anger. I might think I am different but in actuality I am anger. So do you see the truth of it - not the idea of it? The actual truth that when you are angry that anger is you.

Q: It seems that I am angry.

K: Don't go off to something else. You don't see the first principle of this, sir. When you are jealous, is that jealousy different from you? It is only different from you when you say, "I am justified in being jealous. It is right to be jealous, my wife..." - you follow? Then there is a division between the statement and the fact. So the fact is that you are that feeling, which you call jealousy. That is simple. Now if that is an absolute truth which you see, you see, not I, then conflict comes to an end between the observer and the observed. You understand?

So there is hurt and that hurt is me, and the 'me' is not different from the hurt. Therefore what is to take place? All the energy which I have used in conflict - you understand, between the observer and the observed - is not wasted - right? I wonder if you see this. I have wasted energy in dividing the observer and the observed, the 'me' and the not 'me' - right? I wasted that energy in conflict, in suppression, in trying to run away from it and all the rest of it. But when I do not run away and I see the truth that the observer is the observed, then what takes place?

Q: The energy is available.

K: Then energy is observation - right? So I have found something: when there is complete energy there is no recording. You understand? When I give complete attention to your insight, there is no recording. It is only when I am not completely attentive there is recording. You get the point? Have you understood this simple truth? For god's sake get it. You understand? I have wasted my energy in conflict, I say, "I am not that hurt, I am different from that hurt", therefore I try to do something about that hurt - right? I try to run away from it, suppress it, resist it, isolate and so on. But when I discover the truth that I am that hurt, then I have gathered all that energy, which I have wasted, in observing 'what is'. In observing 'what is' the thing undergoes a radical change. You have got it? So there is no hurt, that is, no hurt from the past either. So with that complete attention next time you call me a something or other it is not registered. Where there is complete attention, where there is complete energy of all the senses, there is no recording.

Q: What is the source of the attention?

K: There is no source of attention. Please sir, don't bring in that question yet. Do you see this thing, this marvellous thing, sir, it is so simple. Traditionally we are trained in this formula, that is, I am different from that. I am different from my anger, my god is different from me, my belief and so on. That is, we traditionally accept that the experiencer is different from the experience, and so there is a constant division and conflict. Where there is division there must be conflict - right? Do you see that? Nationally, religiously, economically, socially, wherever there is a division there must be conflict. That is a law.

And here I am. I have been hurt and traditionally I have said I am different from the hurt, therefore I will do something about the hurt - run away from it, escape from it, justify it, build a wall of resistance, and so on and so on, which are all wastage of energy. And when there is a perception that the observer is the observed, the wound is the 'me', then I don't waste any energy, with that energy I observe, which is complete attention. Now if you give complete attention if I flatter you, it has no meaning; or if I insult you, it has no meaning. Now can you do it at the moment of insult, not afterwards? You understand?

Q: (Inaudible, in Italian)

K: Sir, if you give your attention there is no hurt, or the mark of flattery. You understand? That means you have to go very deeply, as the questioner points out, into the whole problem of consciousness. You understand? Where the building of images goes on, where in the unconscious deep layers of one's mind the image building is going on. I may say, "Yes I have no image", but down there there are images. So can I be conscious, can I be aware of the totality of my consciousness - the hidden as well as the open? The total area, field of my consciousness, can I be aware of the totality of it? Let me finish, you can question me afterwards.

We are used to dividing consciousness into the upper and lower - right? Subconscious, conscious, this division takes place because of thought. Thought is fragmentary because thought is the result of time, time being memory, time being the past, therefore thought is fragmentary - right? I wonder if you see that. So the fragment can never see the whole. And we say, unless there is an observation of the whole there can never be freedom from that. Can I observe, can a human being observe the total content of consciousness, the total, not one segment, or one part, or partial, the totality of consciousness? The totality of consciousness is all that it contains, naturally - attachments, desires, the images which thought has put there, the sorrows, the pains, the anxieties - you follow - the whole human endeavour, all human sorrow, misery, confusion, chaos, all that, at one glance. Can you see that as a whole? Can you see the tent - please listen - see the tent as a whole? Look at it, look at that tent and see if you can see the whole of it. I can see the whole of it, what is inside. I can't see the whole of it on the outside. You understand? I wonder if you grasp this. I can see this in its entirety, it is fairly simple. But I can't see what is the outside of it - right? So I can only see something entirely if I understand space. Can I go on? I am talking, you are not joining me. I can see the totality of something when I have space - right? I can only see the tent from the inside, the whole of it, but I can't see the tent from the outside. To see the whole of it I must not only observe the inside but the outside. Naturally.

Q: Can you see the whole?

K: That is the whole. Just a minute, just a minute. So I must find out to observe this human consciousness, to see it as a whole there must be space, mustn't there? To look at anything, to look at you, I must have space between you and me. If I am right up against you I can't see you - right? So I must have space. What is space? Are you interested in this? What is space? If there is a centre the space is limited. You may extend it as far as possible, but it is still limited if there is a centre. If there is no centre space is immense. Right? We measure space from the centre to the circumference, but if there is no centre there is no measurement. Get it? There is no measurement. So when there is no measurement what have you, as your consciousness? I wonder if you see it. Don't state it.

Look: I am attached to my furniture - there is a very nice table in my room at Brockwood, a beautiful table. I am very attached to it - if I am, I am not but if I am attached to it, it is a measurement, isn't it? I wonder if you see it. I am attached. I don't want you to touch it, I don't want you to harm it, no sunlight must come on it. So where there is a measurement as attachment, the space is very limited. Of course, sir. Because I am measuring from my centre of pleasure to that table, and that measurement limits it. Right? If there is no measure, which is from the centre to the table, then there is vast space - right? Is that so with you? Don't agree. Is that so with you, that there is no centre? And if there is no centre you see the whole of consciousness. I wonder if you do. It is marvellous. You follow, sir. I am getting excited about this, I must calm down.

Measurement, we said, is thought. Measurement is a process of time, from here to that table. That is, thought is a movement in time - right - in time as measures from me to that. Right? If that movement is not, then what is my consciousness made up of? Nothing. I wonder if you see all this. No, you don't see it. It is too difficult, you can't see this.

Q: If there is no centre, is there a whole, is there a part?

K: When there is no measurement then there is the whole. Just a minute, I will show it to you in a different way. Human consciousness is from a centre, isn't it? I am attached to that, my family, my house, my anger, my jealousy, my hope - from a centre the whole of consciousness is built. No? I am attached to that furniture, I am attached to that house, I am attached to that belief, to that idea, and my sorrow - you follow? Always from a centre moving out. That is my consciousness. Look at your own, it is simple. And that consciousness is divided into the unconscious and conscious, which the western world has done, and the eastern world does it in a different way, that is irrelevant. So as long as this division exists there must be measurement - right? I wonder if you see that? Then I begin to examine what is inside, underneath. I wonder if you see. So when there is no measurement there is no centre, and therefore the consciousness which human beings have known disappears and then there is a totally different dimension, a boundless dimension, because there is no measure. So as long as there is measurement, space is very limited, from me to that table, because it is very narrow. But if there is no table or the centre, space is immense.

Now can the mind observe the totality of consciousness? And it can only observe when there is no centre saying, "This is right, this is wrong, this should be, this should not be" - you follow? I don't think you get this. Do you get it, sir?

Have I answered your question? That is, your question was: why human beings are so enclosed, self-enclosed, why they have built a wall around themselves, why they never flower and in the flowering end, end to attachments - you follow, all that, why? And we said - we took one part of that, which is human beings are hurt, and they think that hurt is different from me. The 'me' then says, "I am different, therefore I am going to control that hurt, I am going to change it, I am going to suppress it, I am going to run away from it, this is ugly, this shouldn't be". But when the 'me' is that image, and that image is the hurt then I have all that energy, which I have wasted, to look at that hurt. And when there is complete energy in that observation there is no hurt, naturally.

Q: I don't understand that, sir.

K: Is it a question of English? I will try and put it differently. Is the world different from you? Don't answer me, please. It is not a school examination! Don't answer me please. Is the world different from you as a human being, the world which is outside, not the physical world only, but the psychological world, the world of anger, the world of violence, the world of sorrow, the world of pleasure, the world of nationalities, the world of religious differences and beliefs, is that different from you? No. See the truth of it, not the verbal description, the truth of the matter. Go to India, or Japan, or Asia, or America, human beings may put on trousers, or put on kimonos, or dhotis in India, or this or that, but there essentially deep down they have sorrow, anxiety, misery, uncertainty - you follow - the agony of human existence is the same right through. So you are the world and the world is you. That is a truth. Do you see that? Or do you say, "No, I am different from that Indian" - psychologically? Of course you are different, you are a woman or a man, lighter skin, dark hair, brown, white, socially, more food, more clothes, whatever it is; but inwardly, deep down you have the same agony going on. So you are the world, do you see that? Do you know what happens when you say, you are the world and the world is you, it gives you tremendous strength, tremendous vitality, because then you are not 'me' alone fighting the rest of the world. You understand this? Then you are not. In the generalization there is vitality, if you know how to see the generalization actually.

So in the same way the world is you, and you are the world. You are the experiencer and you think you are different from the experience. Again that is our prejudice, our tradition, our education, whereas you are that experience, the experience is not different from the experiencer, therefore there is no searching for experience. You understand? You are free of experience. And a mind is free of experience only when it is a light to itself - you understand? Which is truth. Got it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The questioner wants to know, this is the last question please, we must stop in five minutes. He want to know about T.M. - the good old stuff! Transcendental Meditation. You know, please, we are looking at it objectively. We are not condemning it, we are not putting it aside, but looking at it. The word mantra, which is involved in Transcendental meditation, mantra means a form, a formula, a series of words that will help to bring about concentration. The root meaning of that word, mantra, the root meaning of that word is to help to bring about concentration, through a picture, through a word, through repetition of something, a formula, is to help you to bring concentration.

Q: It is not a concentration.

K: Please, sir, I said the root meaning of the word. The root meaning. Please sir, don't take sides, you may be a Transcendental meditation person or whatever it is, don't take sides, we are looking at it. So the root meaning of that word is to bring about concentration, to help through words, through sentences.

Concentration is bringing all your energy to a certain point - right? And resisting any encroachment on that point. To concentrate on a book, or on a page, means I resist every other movement. Right? I am not saying about Transcendental meditation, I am just saying what is implied in concentration. Put away every other thought but this particular thought - right? And in that way there is a division, concentration and non-concentration. I concentrate for ten minutes and resist every other encroachment and therefore I create a division. That is implied in concentration. And in various forms of concentration there is the controller and the controlled. Right? I try to control my thought, which is the controller is different from that which he controls. What he is controlling is the other thoughts, and the controller is also part of thought. So when you see the truth that the controller is the controlled, the whole phenomenon of concentration undergoes a total change.

Now in this Transcendental meditation, the word transcendental is an unfortunate word because it means to transcend all human conflicts, transcend above everything else. That is the implication. To transcend, to go beyond. Now by repeating certain words, first loud, second silently, third repeat without the word so that the mind becomes more and more quiet. The idea being through being constant repetition of a certain word you reduce the mind to be quiet. This is the idea of mantra and all the rest of it, to make the mind quiet. Which is, through a method, through a system, through somebody saying, "Do this and you will get that". The authority and acceptance of authority and gaining something. As we said earlier, in spiritual matters there is no authority because you have to be a light to yourself. There is no guru. There is no teacher.

There is no leader.

Q: You don't need to accept any leader if you practise Transcendental Meditation. You become calm very soon and very naturally. And my experience is I was reading Krishnamurti many years. I was reading Krishnamurti before I was practising Transcendental meditation, and it was very beautiful. And then I read Krishnamurti after twenty minutes of Transcendental meditation and it was much more quiet and beautiful. There is a probe of sensitivity during Transcendental meditation, you haven't got any goals during Transcendental meditation. You watch the mantra like you watch the river, and as the mantra has no meaning neither the past nor the future extends, so that you learn to live right in the moment. Then when I read Krishnamurti the first time I always wanted to tell him that it was just what he wanted us to live, we learn it very naturally, without accepting any authority if we practise Transcendental meditation. It is not something different from what Krishnamurti is teaching us. It is the same, it is not suppression, it is not control, it is very natural. There is nothing different.

K: I am afraid it is a great deal different, sir. Forgive me for contradicting you!

Q: You are a student of Transcendental meditation, I am sure.

K: You are sure I did TRanscendental meditation?

Q: No, I know it by reading your books.

K: Don't read the books! Sir, you are not getting what I am talking about. Look, the first principle in a religious life is no authority, which implies that you must be a light to yourself, therefore non-dependence on anything - gurus, mantras, books, persons, ideas, nothing. That means to be light to yourself it implies that you have to be totally alone. The word alone means all one. You understand, sir? The meaning of that word alone means all one, all made into one. Oh, you people don't know all these things.

So when you are alone in that sense you have abundance of compassion therefore you are a light to yourself, then you can forget all the gods, all the mantras, all the teachers, nothing matters. But we are afraid to stand alone, to be a light to ourselves, making mistakes, failures, find yourself to have a light to yourself. That demands great attention, great care, and you can't get attention, love, care through books, through people, mantras, nothing.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 29TH JULY 1976

And we said yesterday, we are having a dialogue, which means a conversation between two people, or with many, who are interested, or concerned with certain problems of human beings and want to go into them deeply, with care and affection, not with any form of assertion or argument. And a dialectical method is investigating through opinions to find out the truth. So we are not dialectically investigating. We are, as two friends, talking over together their human problems and hoping to solve them and to discover truth.

And I am afraid there is a great deal of misapprehension that we are trying to find a technique to truth - a technique, which means learning the method, practising a method, learning a certain form of technique that will help you or another to come upon this truth. We are not advocating, or saying, that there is any technique to truth. Please be very clear on this matter. Technique implies learning a method. I mean, to go to Mars, as they have done, which is a most extraordinary feat, you need a great deal of technological knowledge, a great deal of accumulated knowledge of the 'know-how'. But as truth is a pathless land, please bear this in mind, it is a pathless land, you can't lay down a line, a direction, a path to it and practise it, discipline yourself, learn a technique.

So please bear in mind that we are not giving or offering, or telling a technique, a method, a system. We are already so mechanically minded, our minds are already sufficiently mechanistic, and by practising a technique, a verbal repetition, silence, you know the whole business that all techniques will somehow loosen, or free the mind from all mechanistic activity. I am afraid it won't. What we are saying is, that you must have the interest, the drive, the intensity to find out - find out for yourself, not be told how to do it. Then what you discover is yours, then you will be free from all gurus, from all techniques, from all authority. Please bear that in mind while we are having a dialogue about these matters.

So what shall we talk about, or have a dialogue this morning?

Q: Could we talk about the nature of understanding?

K: Understanding. The nature of understanding.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We are afraid, the questioner says, to be vulnerable, to be open, because the more you are vulnerable the more likely you will get hurt. And so we fear to be open. You see the word vulnerable means, doesn't it, like a leaf in the wind it is vulnerable to wind. So could we discuss that.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The responsibility of a human being with regard to the images he forms about another. Could we discuss that, responsibility.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The relationship of speech, words, thought and the silent mind.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: How can we live without a motive - is that the question?

Now that is enough for the time being. That gentleman wanted to discuss or have a dialogue about understanding. The relationship between speech, word, thought and silence. The responsibility of not forming an image in relationship. Those were the questions that were put. And to be vulnerable. Can we live without a motive. Now what shall we take out of those questions, one of those questions so that we can think or observe or trace it right to the end, not be diverted in other directions, go to the very end of one questions which may include all other questions.

Q: Understanding.

K: Understanding, right. I think that is good, I would take that too myself. Understanding. What do we mean by that word understanding? Please go slowly into it, not quickly. To understand something, what is implied in it? Is it a verbal understanding, a comprehension through verbal description, a comprehension through affection - I like you, I am friends with you, I tell you something, therefore you understand what I am saying. Or is it an insight into something which is rather complex and confused? Or how does understanding take place? You understand my question? Does understanding take place through verbal communication, which is description? Because you and I if we are speaking English, then it is something, French, Italian, whatever it is, through verbal communication and the description is there an understanding or an insight? Or does understanding take place not merely through words, not merely the description, but going beyond the word, which means both you and the other are free of the verbal structure which is the nature of thought, and penetrating and having an insight? You understand?

When we talk I understand how the cars run, that is very simple. I have observed it, I have undone it, I have played with it and I know how it works. I understand how to climb that mountain, I know. But we are talking of understanding psychologically, aren't we, deeply, not the mere worldly understanding but much more the understanding which brings about an insight. An insight means having a sight in something, which then becomes the truth. And I can never go back from it. When I understand something, which means I have an insight into that and therefore that very insight will wipe away any misunderstanding, any complexity, you have clear sight in that.

Therefore understanding implies, does it not, a mind, or a brain, the whole structure of the mind listens not only to the word but goes beyond the words and sees the deep meaning of that particular statement, and then there is an insight and then you say, "I understand it", "I have got it". So insight implies a mind that is quiet, willing to listen, go beyond the word, and observe the truth of something. Say for instance, the speaker makes a statement like, 'The ending of sorrow is the beginning of wisdom.' He makes a statement of that kind. Now how do you receive it? Please listen to me. The speaker makes that statement: "The ending of sorrow is the beginning of wisdom". How do you receive it? What is your reaction to that statement? Do you make of it into an idea, an abstraction, and with that abstraction, which is an idea, try to understand what he said? Or you listen, that is, you listen to the word, the meaning of the word and go beyond the word and see the truth of that statement, or the falseness of that statement? Not how to end sorrow, or how to have wisdom, but whether that statement conveys a truth or a falsehood. To observe the truth or the falsehood your mind must be quiet and then you have an insight into it, then you say, "By Jove, how true that is". So in the same way, understanding implies having an insight into a problem. Right? So that you go beyond all arguments, all dialectical approaches, it is so. It is immovable. Like say, for instance, the speaker says, "There is no technique to truth, truth is a pathless land". He makes that statement, he has made it fifty years ago, and how do you receive that statement? Go on sirs. How do you receive that statement? This is a dialogue. Do you receive it with opinion, saying that can't be true because everybody talks about technique, the method, the system, and this man comes along and says, there is no path, there is no technique to truth. So you say, well who is right in this, is this man right or is that man right. So are you arguing, comparing, judging, or do you listen to that statement, not knowing what is right and wrong, because you don't know, actually you don't know? Ten people, or a million people have said there is a technique, and some person comes along and says, there is no technique whatsoever. You understand? This man may be totally wrong. And he explains: a technique implies practice, time, a mechanistic process. Our minds are already mechanistic enough and you are making it more mechanistic. So he explains all that and you still say, a thousand people have techniques. Do you balance these two and then say, well I prefer that rather than that? Or you receive what he said with complete objective silence, quiet, not knowing what is truth? And when you listen quietly, which means complete attention, then you discover, have an insight into what is being said, then it is yours, not mine. I don't know if you see. That is, to find out what is true and what is false. To find out the truth in the false - right? So your mind must be extraordinarily open, vulnerable, otherwise you don't know. I wonder if we are understanding each other.

You see, is love an intellectual thing? Technique is an intellectual thing, a method is an intellectual affair, and can you love through a technique? Right? Can you? By practising being very nice, very kind, very gentle, and all the rest of it, and at the end of a year after having practised a method will you love? Right?

Q: No.

K: It is impossible, isn't it? So why do you say, no?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right. Why do you say that? Now just a minute, why do you say that? When I said, will there be love if you practise kindness, gentleness, non-violence, etc. etc., will you have at the end of it love? Will you have it?

Q: No.

K: What makes you say, no? Do listen to it carefully.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir. Listen to me. We said, can love come into being through any form of intellectual effort as technique, and you said, no. What makes you say, no?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What makes you say, no?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You have an insight that techniques is a method, it is an intellectual affair, and we said, how can that produce love? You follow? There is instinctive response. Now if someone says - listen carefully - the observer is the observed - the observer being the past, and what he observes is through his past background, therefore what he sees is seen from the background. The observer is the observed - he makes that statement. And you say, "I don't understand that - right? I can't see it, please tell me in a different way". So the speaker says, the thinker is the thought. If there is no thought there is no thinker - right?

Q: Right.

K: And why do you say right? Because you see the obvious thing, don't you? And he says further, the experiencer is the experience. And he says the experiencer must recognize the experience otherwise there would be no experience. So recognition implies the past. So the past experiences what it wants, or experiences that which he has projected. And you say, yes, quite right. So you instinctively - or rather when it is put very clearly you say, perfectly right. So understanding takes place when both of us have a common language, the words have the same meaning for you as well as for me, and we are talking about the same thing, with the same interest, with the same intensity, then there is a direct communication - right?

Q: Only with words.

K: We have been through that. Words are only means for communicating, but we must go beyond the words. We have said that ten times.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: A monkey? There is a very famous story, I don't know if you want to be told. A very famous story of a monkey going to the Buddha, and the monkey says to the Buddha, "I have practised meditation for the last twenty years", or fifty years, "and I can do most extraordinary things. I can go right round the world in a few seconds." And the Buddha, stretching out his hand, the monkey is sitting there, and he says, "Do it". The monkey says, "I am going to make a tremendous effort to go right round the world." And he opens the eyes and he says, "You are still there". You get it!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Right. One has built a wall around oneself, the questioner says, and one desires to jump over that wall, because that wall becomes a prison, that wall becomes a wall of resistance, which implies isolation, bitterness, lack of love and all the rest of it. And so the verbal description makes you want to jump over. Just a minute. Right? The verbal description that you are a prisoner enclosed by your own desire not to be hurt, you have built brick by brick this wall and the speaker describes the wall, the effects of the wall - the bitterness, the sorrow, the isolation, the loneliness - and from that violence and all that, he describes it, and you say, "I want to get over that wall". Which means you have no insight into what has made you build that wall. All that you are concerned with is to get over it. And you will never get over it. Whereas if you had an insight into the whole movement of hurt, resistance, isolation, see the whole picture, observe the whole picture then the wall doesn't exist.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That is why I want - please let's be clear what we are saying. Having an insight means complete observation of the whole movement of hurt. We are taking that as an example. The understanding of the complete movement of hurt.

Q: Why?

K: Wait. I'll tell you. Let me finish. I'll tell you later why. Do we understand, or observe the whole movement of hurt, the whole movement, not just building a wall? Why we are hurt, the image that we have about ourselves, and that image is me, and then I am hurt, and then I build a wall round myself not to be hurt any more because if I see if I am vulnerable I will get hurt more likely, so I build a wall round myself. And by building a wall round myself I resist and in resistance I have become more and more enclosed, more and more isolated, and from that isolation I feel desperate and I see you who are not desperate, I am angry with you, I become bitter. And all the rest of it follows. Do I see, is there an observation or awareness of this whole movement of hurt?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand. I understand your question. First let me finish with this.

Do you observe, are you aware of this whole movement? Or you are only partially aware, and therefore you say, "How am I to get over it?" When there is a partial awareness of this movement then the reaction is, "Tell me how to get over it". Then the 'how' becomes the method. But when there is the total observation of this whole movement of hurt there is no 'how', you see it. There is an insight into it. You have got it?

Now the question is, the lady asks, why do I bother with it? Why should I go through all this business of insight, and awareness? Because human beings are violent, human beings are bitter, human beings are enclosed, tight, everything is self-centred, the more activity the more self-centred it becomes - in the name of god, in the name of social work, in the name of etc., but the thing becomes tighter and tighter and tighter and therefore more and more anxiety, greed. And a man observing this says, "Why should I live like this?"

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no. You have not - forgive me for repeating - I am afraid you haven't understood. I said insight is not a movement. It is direct perception in which there is no movement.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Have you listened to what I said?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I said no movement, not somebody moves. Please madame, we are old friends, we have known each other many years. We are saying, insight means non-movement. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Nowhere! No, you are missing my whole point, please.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No madame, you haven't understood. Please you are not listening, forgive me for saying so, but you are not listening to what is being said.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look I say something which is very applicable to you and to me, and words, description, have no meaning, and you say then, "I understand it". That understanding is non-movement, isn't it, you have understood it.

Q: Here we part company.

K: I am sorry. Don't let's part company, which is what everybody does when they don't agree or understand. Just a minute please. Don't use 'we part company', that is the worst...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just listen to what I have got to say. I know what you are saying, I have understood what you are saying. You haven't understood what I am saying. I have understood what you are saying. I have understood it, please believe me. Don't ever say, "We part company". That's the first thing to learn. That means you and I are opposed to each other. You and I, or two human beings when they say, 'We part company' it is the worst thing to say. Please listen to me, you are not listening to me, you are listening to yourself. Don't let us ever come to that point when we say, "You go north, I go south", because what we are trying to do here is to understand our human problems, to find out what is true and what is false. Not my truth or your truth, or your falseness or my falseness, but what is truth, which is non-personal, it is not yours or mine, it is truth. And that is what we are trying to understand. So if you and I are concerned with the enquiry into what is truth, there is no parting. We may go slower, somebody may go faster, but we are on the same path, we are in the same direction - no path.

So please that's the most ugly thing to say to somebody else, "We part", it is like a divorce.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Leave it alone.

Q: Insight and knowledge, can we discuss that please?

K: Yes. And also there is lots more to discuss. That lady pointed out the responsibility of image-making, and living without an image. And also about vulnerability and to live without a motive. All those questions are involved.

We began by asking, because that was the first question we all agreed to, what is understanding. If I am fixed with a certain point and you are moving away from that point, there is no understanding between you and me, because I am fixed in my opinion, in my belief, in my experience, in what I think. And therefore communication between you and me comes to an end. Because the speaker has no belief, literally has no belief, no opinion, he is only investigating, penetrating, tracing out. But if you take a stand then it is finished, you do not investigate it. We said investigating into what is truth, and to enquire into that we must not only understand the verbal meaning - English or French or whatever it is, German - then go beyond the word and you can only go beyond the word when you understand thought which lives on words. You understand this? Which lives, breeds on words, and to go beyond that is to have real communion, which then perhaps will bring about an insight. That is what we said. An insight into what is false and what is truth. And that requires very alert capable observation, not based on prejudice.

So we will go to another question which is: human beings get hurt because they think they are vulnerable, because they are sensitive, and the question is: does not vulnerability bring more hurt, and therefore don't be vulnerable, don't be open, because then you get more and more hurt. Right? That was one of the questions.

Now, what brings about hurt? We said hurt comes into being when there is an image of myself and that image gets hurt. That's fairly simple, right? I have an image about myself, that I am a great man, or a silly man, and whatever image I have about myself that image gets wounded, that image is me. The 'me' and the image are not different. Now as long as I have an image about myself, and myself is that image, getting wounded is inevitable. Right?

Obviously.

Q: Because there is resistance.

K: That's right. Because there is resistance, because I have assumed a position, I have assumed an image which is very pleasant to me and when you come and disturb it I get hurt. So if there is no image there is no possibility of getting hurt. Right? We went into the question of how to go beyond the image. We went into it the other day very carefully. Now to have no image is to be completely vulnerable. Please listen carefully. It is only when there is resistance then there is hurt.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You can't. If you have an image it must resist. That's natural. It is like having a wall.

Q: But you have a body.

K: Wait. You go back to the body. That is the organism can tolerate so much and no more. All right. A body, the organism, the biological thing, can tolerate fear up to a certain point, beyond that it can't tolerate, it can't hold, it goes to pieces. So then you have to make the body healthy - right food, right exercise and all the rest of it. What is the question, sir?

Q: When the image is not I have nothing.

K: That's right.

Q: And when I have nothing, nothing can hurt me.

K: Not, 'nothing can hurt me'.

Q: That is a problem of mine.

K: I understand.

Q: Only vegetables can live in that state.

K: I am not a vegetable. Please, I have lived, this entity has lived for almost eighty years. There have been all kinds of insights, every kind of devotion, every kind of flattery, every kind of usage of words, calling the person all kinds of names, ugliness, terrible. And no image, therefore never being hurt. I am not a vegetable. You may say, "Oh, that is an illusion you are living in". I say, no, I have investigated how illusions come, which means sensation, plus desire, plus thought, image. When you have that process there is bound to be illusion. I have not that. I have gone into that thoroughly. So I am not vegetable and other human beings can do this.

So let's proceed. Where there is image there is hurt. When there is no image at all, and that is essential, that is possible, and it is possible only when you understand the whole movement of building images, having an insight into the building of images, then there is no building images and then only there is complete vulnerability. It is only when there is partial vulnerability then there is hurt.

To go to the next question is, which is: what is our responsibility to another in this image-making? Right? After finishing this we will go to the next question: can one live without a motive in love?

What is responsibility? What is one's human responsibility with regard to another, when both of them are building images about themselves. You are building an image, and I am building an image, and our relationship is based on those images - right? If you have observed yourself for two seconds this is an obvious fact. I live with a human being and with that human being, out of our living, I begin to build up an image - hurt, irritation, pleasant companionship, you follow, I gradually through years I have established a strong image; as the other person has established a strong image about me. So the relationship is between these two images. Whether you like it or not it is a fact. Then if one of them is free of all image making, literally all image making, what is his responsibility towards the other? That is the question as far as I understood it. Right? Is that right?

Q: One is not free actually of images.

K: Yes, one is not actually completely free of image making. So we have to be concerned with that, not the responsibility. We have to be concerned why we build images. It is fairly simple.

K: Why do you have an image about yourself? You have images about yourself, haven't you? Don't be shy, it is simple. You have an image about yourself, how does it come into being? You have an image about yourself - not you sir, I am not personally asking you - you have an image about yourself, why do you have it, and how does it come into being?

Q: Through thought.

K: No, look at it simply.

Q: From childhood.

K: From childhood you are told you are not as good as your brother, that you are not as clever as your elder brother, so you begin slowly to build the image. Your friends help you, and you help your friends to build this image, society helps you, your parents help you. So gradually school, university, college, you build this tremendous image of yourself, that you are clever, not clever, that you are this or that, so you have an image. And one very rarely is aware of this - right? One is not aware of this image.

That image is me, and one is not aware of it. Now to become aware of it is the first thing. Can you become aware of it? Not say, "I don't like it", or like it, be aware of the image that you have about yourself - can you?

Q: When I am hurt, yes.

K: Now, now. Not when you are hurt. Now I am asking. You have an image, don't let's beat round the bush. It is so simple.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madame, we are not talking of love. Be simple.

So to become aware of that image: then are you aware of it as though it were different from the observer? Please answer these questions simply. Are you aware of that image as something different from you who are looking at it? Is the observer different from the image? Naturally not. So the observer is the image - right?

Q: You can see this if...

K: Not 'if'. Do you see or have an insight that you are different from the image. When you have an insight you then say, "I am the image". Obviously. Now, careful, just go slowly from here. You are the observer and you discover for yourself that the image, the observer is the observed, the observer is the image. Then what takes place? Don't guess. Don't say, "Yes, if that happens this will happen". That has no meaning. What takes place when the observer realizes what he is observing is himself? So the observer is the observed. That is, having an insight into that, then what happens? Go slowly. What takes place?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are not watching it. You are too complicated, keep it simple. When it is very simple you make it very complicated.

Q: I am lost.

K: You are lost. Please look at it. This is really most important. Once you have this key, the real thing that you have, then you will find out so much. When the observer is the observed, the experiencer is the experience, the thinker is the thought, what has taken place? What has actually taken place? The division between the two has come to an end. Right? Before we had this division, the observer said, "I am different from the observed" - right? So in that division there was conflict. The observer then says, "I must do something about the observed. I must control it, I must suppress it, I must run away from it". So when the observer sees he is the observed, conflict comes to an end. Right? When the Arab realizes he is the Israeli, the war is over - you understand?

So when the observer realizes he is the observed then the conflict, the division, the struggle, all that has come to an end because he can't do anything else, he is that - right? You have understood. He is that, therefore conflict has completely come to an end. When a Hindu realizes he is the Muslim - you understand?- the Muslim may have different customs, but essentially he is himself then he says, "For god's sake, don't let's fight, don't let's be silly". So conflict comes to an end. Is that a fact with you? Or you are accepting my fact?

So if it is a fact to you then you have come to a way of living in which there is no conflict whatsoever, which means no opposite. You understand? No opposite. That is, opposing desire, wanting to do this and not wanting to do that, which is in opposition to each other. When you realize desire has different objects that are still desire then the opposition goes. There is only desire. Then what is desire? Then you go into it and see desire can come into being only when there is sensation, plus thought, and desire. From that arises the image. I wonder if you follow all this? Sensation, thought, desire, then the image-making. I see that car, observe it, sensation, then thought says, "How nice, I wish I could drive it" - desire, and the image, which is me sitting in the car and having fun. Right?

So as long as there is image-making there must be hurt. When there is no image-making there is no possibility of being hurt at all. And to have an insight into that frees you from image-making.

And the next question is, which the lady didn't put, which I am going to put: what is the relationship between two people when one has really no image and the other has image. What is then the relationship between the two? You understand? It can happen - you understand? It does happen. You may be married and your wife may be free of image-making - my god, that would be marvellous! And she would call it marvellous if you had no image. So what is her relationship to you - she, who has no image, and you have image? It is your responsibility, not mine.

Q: I can't answer.

K: You can't answer. Quite right.

Q: She has love.

K: Ah, you don't know. You see, you have already formed an image. If you have no image, what is your responsibility to the world, to another, and what takes place when there is no image in this relationship of human beings? You don't know. Right. That is the truth. You don't know. Any formation is just an image-making. You don't know. Remain with that fact that you don't know, which is an extraordinary discovery. You understand sir? You always have an answer, but to say to oneself, "I really don't know what would happen if there was no image making, but I am going to find out". You follow? When you start with certainty you end up in doubt. When you start without any certainty you end up completely certain. You understand? So you don't know. From there move, find out, whether you can be free of images and what is implied, and the responsibility to others - you follow? It is a marvellous thing that is growing, flowering, you discover it.

And the next question is: can one live without a motive? That is, we said, where there is a motive there is a direction - right? The direction set by thought - right? I have a motive of wanting to get rich. Thank god I haven't got it, but suppose I had it. I have a motive, therefore all my life is directed towards that particular thing - getting money, because then I can have a son, I can travel, I can have a house - you follow? So we are traditionally trained, brainwashed to have direction - heaven, Jesus, Buddha, whatever direction, economically, socially, religiously - we are trained to have direction. Right? And so we don't know how to live without a motive. Then we ask, is it possible to live without a motive? Right? Not knowing, we can find out. I don't start by saying, "I mustn't have a motive", that's silly when I have got it. But to say, "Well I have got a motive, I see what is implied in a motive, I move in a certain direction, pleasant or unpleasant, profitable or not profitable, worthwhile and not worthwhile and so on." The direction is set by thought, which is desire, image, sensation and particular direction. That is the motive operating. And we are trained traditionally, educationally, socially, in every way, even religiously - you follow? You have directions - having directions, motives, then you can find out why thought sets a direction. You understand my question? Are you following this. Why thought sets a direction in life. Direction means non-comprehension of the whole. Right? It is like looking at a map - please give me five minutes, don't get tired, if you are tired then go to sleep and don't listen, but keep awake for five minutes at least. We will finish with this.

Why do we have direction in life? Because one of the reasons is it gives security, at least thought assumes it gives security. Right. If I have no motive I don't know what to do, I am lost. So the fear of getting lost, fear of not being secure, both financially, psychologically and physically, thought says, "I must have a direction in life". So it sets a direction, which means pushing away all other things, like one of those athletes we saw in the Olympic Games, he was completely in one direction, diving, running, whatever it is, completely absorbed, trained, concentrated. And the rest of life is, you know - politics, religion, everything is a side issue. There he is completely secure. So thought sets a direction in order to be both biologically and psychologically secure. That is a fact. Right? So it discards the whole map of life. It only sees one direction which is towards that particular village and the rest is denied. So when you have a direction, which is tradition, accepted as normal, then there is division between the one who has a direction going north and the other fellow is going south east, south west, you know, break it all up into fragments. You follow? The moment you have a direction you are breaking up life into fragments. I wonder if you follow. I have just seen it now. I have got an insight into it. No, see it for yourself. The moment you have a direction you have broken up life into fragments. So your life has become a fragment because you have a direction. You see it?

Then the question is: can I live without direction? You understand? I see the whole of the map and the map says there is no motive, no direction. Now just a minute. I'll go slowly into this. When there is direction there is a fragmentation of life, of living. That is clear. Fragmentation implies conflict - you in that direction, I in another direction, she another direction, so we are all breaking up and therefore there is no co-operation, except for profits and all the rest of it, so there is always conflict when there is fragmentation. Right? Can we go on? And the mind says, 'Is it possible to live without fragmentation, without direction?' It can only say that when it has seen, or had an insight into the fragmentary way it is living because it has a direction. Have you understood what I am saying? If I see, observe, am aware that having a direction implies fragmentation, where there is fragmentation there must be conflict - Arabs, Jews, Hindu, Muslim, Catholic, Protestant, the whole business of living. Where there is a direction there is fragmentation, and therefore division and therefore conflict.

Do you have an insight into this reality? It is a reality. It is an actual factual daily reality: where I have a direction - I want to be the Prime Minister and so on, so there is conflict between you and me. Where there is division there must be conflict, that is a law. Have I an insight into that? Then only I can say, "Can I live without motive?" Not before because it has no meaning. So I don't know. You understand? I don't say, "I can", or cannot, I don't know. But I do know where I have a direction there is fragmentation, conflict and all the rest of it follows. So that I am fully acquainted with, I am familiar with it, everyday of my life. From that I ask myself, because I have an insight into that, I ask myself is it possible to live without a motive. I really don't know. But I do know the other but I don't know this. So I am going to enquire. I am watching, there is an observation in my action, in my speech, when I have a motive. And I say "Yes, I have got a motive there, why?" You follow? So I begin to bulldoze it, bring it all out. So at the end I can say, "I have no motive". You know what that means? No conflict, no fragmentation, a life which is whole, healthy, sane and holy. Then only you can say this, but to say it before means nothing.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: There is no motive, I said, I have no motive. To quickly say it, actually what it means. There is no motive for living. You know what that means? That means real compassion, you understand?

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 30TH JULY 1976

It seems to me that we never actually observe what is taking place. To know what is exactly taking place is a great revelation. To see exactly, accurately, what is going on, both in the outside world, technologically, politically, as far as we can know politically, and observe in ourselves the actual movement of thought, our responses, the motives, we are so unfamiliar with ourselves. And all our dialogues and talks have been to bring about a transformation - we are using the word 'transformation' correctly, an inward revolution psychologically, so that human beings are really different, basically, not carry on the same old way, same old routine, boredom, loneliness, suffering and all the rest of it. So it is very important, it seems to me, to observe accurately, correctly, rightly, what is going on. And if we can so observe, I think we will learn enormously, we will discover so many things. But when we observe we generally don't like what we see, or like what we see, so we run away from it. Whereas if we could stay with what actually is going on, not imaginatively, or in any way suppress it, but observe it meticulously. Then we will find out for ourselves an extraordinary lot of things.

So after saying that, what shall we have a dialogue about this morning? - bearing in mind that a dialogue means conversation between two friends who are concerned with the same problem, who are interested, deeply involved, and therefore a certain affection, care, hesitation in enquiry.

Q: Can we talk about judgement?

K: We are always judging ourselves. That is one of the questions.

Q: What are emotions?

Q: What does it mean to behave?

Q: Can we talk about death and dying?

Q: (In Italian)

K: The gentleman asks in Italian, forgive me if I do not put it rightly, he asks, it is not only that we cry, when someone whom we like dies, for ourselves, but also what happens to the other person, what is involved in death with regard to the other person. Even our tears may be for that person.

Q: What prevents observation.

K: Do circumstances, relationship, all the impingement of the outer environment, does that prevent observation - is that your question, sir?

Now what shall we discuss. We have asked several questions: your question which is, why we are always judging, and so we never observe accurately ourselves, before we even look at ourselves there is always a judgement taking place? That is one of the questions. The other question was: would you talk about death? And behaviour, what do you mean by behaviour? And we cry, not only for ourselves when there is a death of someone whom we like or love, but we cry for that person also, so there is this tremendous sense of sorrow, not only for the one who is gone, but also for oneself. So what shall we discuss or have a dialogue about?

Q: Judgement.

K: Judgement.

Q: Death.

K: Death. Do you want to talk about death - really?

Q: No, judgement.

K: Judgement. We will begin with that, judgement, and go on to the other questions. Because that is very important because we are going to find out whether we judge death, or see it as it is. We will come to that.

The question is: why human beings always judge, or condemn, or approve, or accept, why is there this constant movement of appreciation or depreciation, why is there this state? That is the question. Why do you think you judge? It is our tradition, partly, isn't it? You are brought up from childhood to judge, to evaluate - right? This is good, this is bad, this is right, this is wrong, this should be, this should not be, I am not good, I am bad, all the rest of it, this constant repetition of judgement. Is that an avoidance of facing oneself? You understand my question? I project judgement over everything - politics, economics, religion, god, no god, about everything - and projecting that I hide myself from myself. It is like a smoke screen I throw out and behind that I refuse to look. Is that one of the factors? And is it another factor that it is much easier to judge? Judgement being opinion, prejudice, or previous knowledge, and that reaction to previous knowledge is almost instantaneous, and so it is much easier to judge than to withhold judgement, and observe, which becomes much more difficult.

So is it avoidance, an escape from looking exactly at 'what is'? And judgement in religious matters is tremendously potent because all religions judge. When you die there is an entity who is going to judge you. You know the Greek idea. All this is a form of judgement about you. When you go to appear at the gate of St.

Peter then he is going to judge you, and so on and on and on. Is that part of our great tradition - religious, social, and also partly avoiding observing what is actually going on?

If some of these are the facts, and perhaps more, is it possible not to judge at all but to observe? I like that red shirt, or I don't like that red shirt. But without that reaction, just to observe it. Then I learn much more and see that colour totally differently. I don't know if you have noticed that.

So in behaviour - that gentleman asked the question, what is behaviour - what place has judgement in behaviour? You understand? One judges behaviour according to a traditional pattern - I get up when the ladies come in, open the door for the ladies, this or that, various forms of behaviour. Now what relationship is judgement to behaviour? You understand my question? And what is behaviour, to behave? To act really, isn't it, to act in my relationship with another, or with my friend. In relationship to act. Now to act rightly, correctly, accurately, which is not judgement, is it? I wonder if we see that. We said behaviour is action - right? Of course. Is that action based on judgement? Or is it accurate, correct, right? I am using those three words which have the same meaning. So when we use the word 'accurate', is that accuracy based on previous memories, previous activities, previous patterns, and then judge my action - right or wrong, good or bad? Or in correct action there is no judgement? I am finding something.

What is correct action? Can I say, previously before the act takes place, "This is correct action, this is the wrong action"? You understand my question? Are we meeting each other? I want to find out, as a human being living in this world, what is correct action - politically, religiously, in every way, completely. Now how am I to find out what is correct action? First I must enquire if it is based on judgement - judgement of others, or a judgement which I am going to impose on my action according to the pattern which I have developed. So is correct action based on a judgement of others, or on my own judgement based on experience, knowledge, and all the rest of it? You understand, are we meeting? Yes? Am I acting because of environment correctly? Or am I acting correctly because I have previous patterns of behaviour? Or is action independent of both? Action means the doing now - right? The doing now, active present, isn't it. The verb, to act. And acting is the moment of action. If that action is based on the future - ideals, hope, judgement - then it is not acting. Or if that action is based on my previous conclusion, it is not acting - right? If I act according to the past it is not action. If I act according to the future it is not action. Action being the active present of that verb to act. Right? Action is only in the present. So where does judgement take place? You understand my question? If I am acting without the pattern of the future or the past, then it is complete action. You may say, that is wrong action, or another may say, but it is action. I wonder if I am making this clear. So behaviour is not based on the past pattern, or a future ideal. It is acting now, whatever that action be, in the present. And please see the importance of this. If there is no pattern of the future, according to which I am acting, or a pattern of the past according to which I am acting, then I am acting without motive, without the idea of a reward or punishment. So acting is now. So where action is in the present, free from the past and the future, it is the right action. I wonder if you have got it - have you understood it, sir? Have I conveyed something?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, on criteria, yes, patterns. That's what we said. So we have answered those two question, judgement and behaviour.

And then there is the question of death - do you want to discuss that?

Q: There is also the question of emotion.

K: Quite right. What is emotion? What is the relationship of emotion to thought? Is emotion independent of thought? Or is thought part of emotion? Emotion, what does that mean, the word itself?

Q: To move out.

K: It comes from the word motion, motive, and emotive, out. Now just a minute. I am asking, is emotion feeling, sentiment, sensation, have they have any relationship to thought? Sentiment, emotionalism, romanticism, what is their relationship to thought? And emotion, sentiment, romanticism, what relationship have they to love? You understand my two questions? Which is the relationship to thought and the relationship to love.

Is love sentiment? Is love romanticism? Is love a sensation? Right? So what is emotion, to move out? I feel very strongly about something. What does that imply? You feel something very strongly about Hinduism, it doesn't matter what, or communism, or dictatorship. Let's call it not communism, dictatorship, communism is now becoming bourgeois! Have you emotions? Now what is its relationship to thought? Go carefully, carefully.

Q: It's without relation to thought.

K: That's what I am going to find out. Don't categorize, let's play with it. If there was no thought would you have emotion? Or you would have sensation. So we are asking, what is the relationship between thought and emotion? I see something very beautiful: perception, seeing, contact, sensation, desire, then thought. And thought builds the image, which is established. So there is perception, seeing, then contact, sensation. If thought doesn't interfere, it stops there, then there is only sensation. I wonder if you are meeting my point. Please don't accept this, I may be totally wrong, so examine it, investigate it, question it.

That is, I see something which is most pleasurable. The seeing awakens the senses, all the senses are awakened, and can it stop there and not allow desire, thought, image? Then is emotion merely sensation, untouched by thought? Therefore it is no longer a movement of desire. Have you understood. It is fairly simply. I see a beautiful - what? Tell me something.

Q: Woman.

K: Woman! I thought so. You all love that, don't you? There is the perception of a beautiful woman. Religions have condemned desire because by perceiving that woman, seeing that woman, all the sensations arise, then thought comes in, the image is formed, and the battle begins. Right? So throughout the world the religious monks have said, cut out desire, suppress it, control it, don't look at a woman - right? I don't know if you have walked behind any priests, or any group of monks, if you have you would have noticed it - they look and promptly look away. Because they daren't, the whole tradition says, suppress it, deny it. But what we are saying is something entirely different. Seeing that beautiful woman or a man, sensations awaken, which is natural, and to stop there, not let thought come in, then the desire begins, then the image making begins. You follow? You understand? You try it, do it some time and you will see the extraordinary discipline it demands. Discipline in the sense not imposing a pattern, but the act of learning, which is discipline. The seeing of beauty, the sensations arise, and withering away. They do not wither away when thought comes in, then desire begins and all the problems. You follow? Right.

So let's go now, if you want to, to discuss death. It is an immense problem this, you understand. Do you really want to go into it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: His question is localized, a particular question, which is: when there are tears when somebody dies whom you like, or love, those tears are directed towards that person and towards oneself - oneself and the other. That is particular question which we will come to in the course of the dialogue about death.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Some people have noticed, the questioner says, that at the moment of death there is a smile on the face of the person who is dying - some of the cases. Some other people die with great agony, in accident, old age, crippled, unconscious, and then perhaps the smile doesn't come in. Or, as the gentleman says, sometimes it happens there is a smile on the face of the person who is dying. What is the significance of that smile? That is the question.

Q: What is the difference between fear, sorrow and happiness?

K: Do we want to discuss that question?

Q: Could we first discuss death?

K: Could we first discuss death and then that question afterwards? Is that all right, sir?

So we are going to have a dialogue about death - dialogue being a conversation, an enquiry between two friends, between two people, or a few people who are really concerned about it, not theoretically, who actually want to find out. So we are enquiring, we are not dogmatically stating anything, we are enquiring. And when we enquire rightly then we discover the truth of it, you understand? To enquire correctly there must be freedom - right? If I am afraid of death then I can't enquire because that fear is going to warp my investigation - right? Is that clear? Or if I have a belief about death and after life, that too distorts investigation.

So to investigate about a human problem, as death, which is very complex, there must be freedom to look. And you cannot observe, or investigate if there is any kind of prejudice, belief, hope, fear. Therefore are you prepared for that? You understand my question? That to enquire very seriously there must be no prejudice, otherwise it distorts, no fear, no desire for comfort, hope, none of that. The mind must be completely empty to look. Right. That is the first thing to have to find out about something.

First of all, every human being has a desire for continuity - right? Every human being. The ancient Egyptians did it in one way, and the modern people do it in another way - they bury them, or incinerate them, or in incinerating they hope something will continue. So there is this solid demand on the part of every human being that there must be some kind of continuity - right? It is there in you, isn't it, look at it. So what is it that continues? Is there anything that continues? Is there anything permanent? Or everything is impermanent? You understand my questions? So I must find that out. Before I can go into the question of death I must first find out, a human being, or you, must find out if there is anything permanent that continues. Continuity implies permanency - right? Now is there anything in you as a human being that has a continuity?

Q: There is a desire for continuing.

K: No, sir, careful. No, apart from desire, apart from it, is there anything permanent - permanent being continuous, which is a movement without an end? You understand?

Q: May be.

K: No, not, may be. First look at it. There is the desire for continuity - desire being, we said very carefully, sensation, and thought is desire and the desire creates the image. See the sequence of it. Sensation, thought, desire, the image making. Apart from desire is there something that is permanent, which means time doesn't touch it. That is what we mean by permanent. Time will not change it. And therefore it is a movement continuously. So is there anything in a human being which is permanent?

Q: What is the psyche?

K: We will come to that, madame. Please don't put questions which are not related actually to what we are discussing. Please, I beg of you because then you are not paying attention then to what we are saying. We will include the psyche and all that presently. But this is what we are asking: is there anything permanent in human beings?

Q: Continuity implies time.

K: That's right, sir. Continuity means time, and also it means there is no time. If it is continuous from the beginning, never ending, it is beyond time. Just a minute. I don't want to investigate that yet. Is there anything in a human being, in you, in me, that is permanent?

Q: There is a feeling of existence, of the self.

K: There is the feeling of existence, there is the feeling of the self. The self and the feeling of living, from childhood until you die. Existence, the feeling of living. So what is the 'I'? He said the 'I' is permanent - somebody said that. So what is the 'I', the 'me'? The psyche, the personality, what is that? Please, be serious, don't fiddle with this thing, it is much too serious if you really want to go into this question.

Q: Thought as memory.

K: You are saying, thought as memory. Are you repeating this because you have heard somebody say it, or is it a truth to you?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Please, sir, do listen carefully. We are having a conversation, or enquiring into what is the 'I' - the 'I' being the feeling that you are living, that you are existing. Now what is that 'I'? Is that 'I' permanent? The ancient Hindus laid down that that 'I' is evolving, life after life, until it reaches perfection, which is the highest principle, Brahman. So that 'I' has a continuity till it makes itself perfect and is absorbed into the highest principle. That is the idea of reincarnation - re-incarnating. Please listen to that word. Re-incarnating. That is, born over again. Now we are asking, what is that 'I'? Is that 'I' permanent? Don't repeat something which you do not yourself find. Then you are merely repeating what somebody else has said, that is of no value. Is that 'I' permanent? Which means, what is that 'I'? How does it come into being? Is it a spiritual entity, therefore continuous, or is it a momentary affair, in a flux, in constant change? You understand? Is it at essence a spiritual thing which is a non material process? Or is it a material process? Material process being, thought as being matter, it has built through various incidents, accidents, impressions, impingement of environment, family, all that is a material process put together by thought, and thought says, "I am different from thought". You are following all this? So the 'I' and thought have separated themselves and said, "Thought will go on, my thought will go on". Right?

So you have to find out for yourself, in this enquiry about death, if there is anything permanent, or everything is in movement, everything, both the material process and the idea that you are a spirit, both are in constant movement - movement being time, time being from here to there, chronologically, time also being the cultivation of the psyche. Movement. So is there anything permanent, or everything in a human being is undergoing change?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: He says, we are something permanent. Which is, there are certain moment in life when there is a realization or a happening that is beyond time. That happening is permanent. That is what the gentleman says. When that thing happens, if it has become a memory...

Q: It isn't a memory, sir.

K: Wait, listen. I said, if. If it has become a memory then it is a material process, and you can call that permanent. Or if it happens, that extraordinary state of timelessness, and if it is not a memory, the question then is, will it continue? You understand? Just a minute, let us finish, keep your question, sir. That is, you have an experience of something - I won't use even the word 'experience' - an happening of something which is beyond time. When it is not registered as memory it still remains beyond time: the moment it is registered it is made of time. That is simple. Then is that happening a continuous thing? Or does it end? If it is continuous then it is of time. Please, I have gone into this very carefully because we are going to go into something which requires great attention, real sensitivity to find out. We are asking, is there something permanent? It is for you to answer.

Q: We want something to be permanent.

K: There is the desire to have permanency - my permanent house, my permanent name, my permanent form - you follow? - the memories, the attachment, we want everything permanent. All insurance is based on permanency. So, just a minute, sir, we have to find out for ourselves if there is anything permanent.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, sir. Do look, please. For myself there is nothing permanent. I am not imposing this onto you. Nothing permanent. Then what is death? You understand? If there is a continuity of the 'me', the 'me' putting its structure, put together by thought, thought being the word, the word being the name, the name being attached to the form. The name, the form of its body, the organism, and the whole structure of the psyche is put together by thought, obviously. Do you see that? Or do you say, "No, no, there is something much more spiritual behind that"? If there is something much more spiritual behind that, and if you say that exists, it is still part of thought. You understand? If you say, that behind the veil of time - which is a good expression - the veil of time there is something utterly timeless, then you have recognized it - right? If you have recognized it, it is part of your memory, if it is memory it is a material process of thought. Either that something behind the veil is real, true, therefore unthinkable. Right? So you don't know. But when you assert there is something spiritual, a spiritual essence, you have already contaminated it, therefore it is no longer spiritual. Grasp this once and you will see. You see this is an old trick of a great many of the Hindus that there is god within you, Brahman is within you, and all that you have to do is to peel off, like onion skins. You understand? That is, you have established by thought god in you, of the Brahman in you, and then thought says, I must get at it, therefore let me operate. You follow?

So if all thought is a material process, and whatever it has put together is still a material process, even though it says, there is a permanent me, it is still part of the structure of thought. Then what is an ending, which is death? You understand? I wonder if you are following all this. Just listen to this, sir, look at it, don't answer me, look before you answer it. As most of us desire continuity and therefore are frightened of death, then what takes place when there is an ending called death? You understand?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir. We said, sir, that everything is in movement, and I said when there is an ending - look, let me put it very simply: I desire to continue, that's my hope, that's my longing - I don't, but I am just taking that as an example, as a human being, an ordinary human being, he says, "I must continue, I am frightened of death", but there is an ending. I die. I may not want to die. I may cry at death, I may fight against death, that is inevitable - right? So I am saying, when there is the desire for continuity and there is an ending, then what takes place? You understand my questions? Are you getting tired?

There is the death of the organism, and death of the psyche. They are interrelated, psychosomatic, all that business. So I am asking, a man who says, "I must continue, I want to continue, it's my life, for god's sake help me because my one desire is to continue." And I am asking, all right my friend, what happens when that end comes, which is inevitable? Either it ends through accident, through disease, all kinds of endings, what happens? So to find out what happens you must investigate if the psyche, the 'me', is a permanent thing, or impermanent thing. If it is impermanent then the ending - what happens? Please, don't answer, look at it, find out for yourself. This is tremendously important because man says, I must find immortality - you understand? The ancient Egyptians found immortality in the tombs through a continuity of their daily life eternally. If you have looked at the Egyptian tombs and read about them, that is their desire, that they must continue for the next thousand years, or million years because the Nile valley was protected - desert on both sides, and therefore that Nile valley gave them a sense of permanency, and that permanency they translated as, continuous life. You can read about it, or if you are interested you can look at it. And the ancient Hindus said, the self, though it is impermanent, must continue until it reaches the perfect principle, the highest principle, which is Brahman. Or they said, there is god in you, and through various incarnations you will make that ego perfect until it reaches the highest principle - you follow? And the Christians have their own way of resurrection and all the rest of it.

Now I want to find out, as a human being, though my desire is for continuity, I know there is inevitably death - inevitably, whether you like it or not it is there. And I say to myself, what happens when there is an ending?

Q: It is a great shock.

K: That's not my question, please. We will discuss it in a different way, just a minute. You are not answering my question because you are not facing it, you are not looking at it, not putting your teeth into it to find out.

I want to continue, that is my hope, my desire, my longing. I have continued for eighty years with my family, with my furniture, with my books, with all the things I have collected for eighty years and please give me another thousand years with the same things. But death comes along and says, "No, my friend, you are going to die" - what happens after that? You follow my question? I desire - human beings desire a continuity and there is an ending. Continuity being all that the human mind has collected - knowledge, things, ideas, attachments, all the things human beings have collected - property, things, ideas, beliefs, gods, all that I want that to continue for the rest of eternity. But death comes and say, "End it". So I am asking, what is it that ends?

Q: The psyche.

K: Are you sure? Sir, be careful, don't just speculate. I really don't like to discuss this, or go into it with many people because they are not serious. This demands great seriousness, not just verbalizing all the time. I said, the desire comes into being through sensation and thought; then thought, which is desire, has a name, as K, the form of K, and there is all the content of my consciousness, which has been put together by thought, that I want to continue. I want thought with all its content, with all the attachments, with all the pain, with all the suffering, with all the misery and confusion, that I want to continue.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: When the physical body dies, the material process which is the brain structure, which is the thought process, dies. You understand. I wonder if you see this.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I am the world, and the world is me. That is a fact. Right? The world is me, not as an idea, not as a theory, but an actuality, as if I put in a pin there is pain, as real as that, that I am the world and the world is me. The 'me' is put together by thought. It is a material process. Thought is matter, a material process, because it is the response of memory which is stored in the brain as knowledge, and so when that brain dies the material process dies - right? Then what takes place? You understand my question?

Q: The material process dies.

K: Madame, if I may point out without being rude, when you say the material process dies, have you died to that now? Not when death comes. You understand, sir? I'll show it to you.

I am the world, and the world is me. My consciousness is the consciousness of the world. The content of my consciousness is the content of the consciousness of the world. And that content is put together by thought - my furniture, my name, my family, my bank account, my belief, dogmas, all that is in my consciousness, which is the world's consciousness. Unless you see that you can't go further into what we are enquiring. Then that consciousness, which is a material process, comes to an end, because the organism collapses through disease, accident and so on, so the brain decays and so the thought process comes to an end. Right? So the thought process which has put together the ego, the 'me', has come to an end. Ah, you don't accept that. So I say, is it possible to die now to everything that thought has put together as consciousness, which is me, and me, the world. You understand my question? I wonder if you do.

Q: We can't accept what you say, that is annihilation.

K: He says, we can't accept that because it means total annihilation. That we can't accept. Why not, if that is truth? That's why you want something permanent, you want something that will be endless, which is yourself, with all your miseries, all that business. So I say to myself, as I am the world and the world is me, my consciousness is the consciousness of the world, and all that content of that consciousness which makes up consciousness is put together by thought - beliefs, dogmas, rituals, everything is put together by thought. I say to myself, can all that die now, not fifty years later, now? Which means can that content empty itself now? You understand my question? That is, death is now, not fifty years later.

When you die your body withers away and your brain ends. And all the content of your consciousness cannot continue as it is, because it is the thought process. So I am asking myself, and you - I am asking you, not myself, I am asking you as a human being, seeing the reason of all this, the reason, the logic, and therefore going beyond logic, the truth of it, that we are the world and the world is you, and your consciousness is the consciousness of the world. I don't know if you see that. And when you see that, have an insight into that, then the things that have been put together by thought can all that come to an end, not fifty years later, but now? You understand the question? Have you understood my question? Please this is dreadfully serious.

Look sir, part of my consciousness is, I believe - belief is part of my consciousness. Right through the world they believe in something - right? God, I believe in perfect state, I believe in my experience, I believe in god, I believe in Jesus, I believe in Buddha, I believe, which therefore is a common factor for man. That belief is put together by thought, which is a material process. Can you end that belief now, as you are going to do when you die? You follow my question? To end your belief in something immediately, and see what takes place. Not say, I am frightened to drop my beliefs, because beliefs give me tremendous security. So you are seeking security in an illusion, therefore it is no security at all. So can you die to that now? Then only you can answer what comes next. But before you can answer what comes next you must act. Which is, words are not action, theories are not action, but when there is this perception that belief is one of the most common factors of human desire, which is, they find in belief great strength - I believe in god - that gives tremendous strength. It may be an illusion, and it is because it is put together by thought. So can I die to that?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I said that sir. I said that. So can you die to that belief, to belief, not to a particular belief, to belief? And as most people have ideals, and it is one of the most extraordinary phenomenon in the world that wherever you go every human being has ideals - ideals of something or other, it doesn't matter what it is, noble, ignoble, actual and so on. Now ideals are obviously put together by thought, it is a material process in opposition to what I am. So can you die to that?

And unless you die to that, you cannot possibly answer the next question. And we want to find out the next before we die. That's what we are clinging to, you understand. If that can be told, verbalized and then made common, you will all believe in that. It becomes vulgar - I am using the word 'vulgar' in the ordinary sense, common, not insulting it, derogatory. Then it becomes a belief and we are all happy. But to die not knowing - you understand? No, you don't understand.

So we are only dealing with facts, not with theories, not with projected ideas, comforting or ennobling, but we are dealing with actual facts of daily life. Our daily life is made up of things put together by thought. Thought is a material process.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand sir. He is talking about ectoplasm, that is quite a different problem.

Look sir, let me put it round the other way. A human being doesn't end his sorrows, his miseries, his confusion. Then he is like the rest of the world. He dies, but sorrow, confusion, misery as a vast field goes on. You understand this, this is a fact. Like a vast volume of water in a great river there is this immense sorrow of man. For god's sake, do see all this. There is such violence, hatred, jealousy, that is the vast stream. And we human beings are part of that stream. Unless I die to that stream it will go on, the stream will go on, which is the world. You understand. So the man who steps out of the stream, the human being who steps out of the stream, will know what is beyond 'what is'. But as long as you remain in that stream, one foot in and one foot out, playing, which most of us do, you will never find out what is beyond death. Which means one must die to everything without hope. You understand all this? That is one of the most difficult things. I believe Dante in his Inferno said, Lose all hope before you enter - it is not that kind of hope, we are not entering into Inferno. But a man who dies to everything will know what is eternal. You understand?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, that is just a - you go back into theories. Sir, you understand?

Look, you see sir, please. You know it is one of the most difficult things to talk or discuss, or go into things with tremendous attention right to the end. Only very few people can do it. This is a subject that demands all your attention, not verbalization, theories and all that but continuous attention. And few can do this, few want to do this, they can do it but they are too lazy, too uninterested. If you are really captivated, caught by this, wanting to find out, you will give complete attention, therefore no words but constant pushing, pushing, pushing, not knowing where you are going. And that is death. When you die there is an ending to everything that you know. So can you not die now to everything that you know? You follow? So then you will find out for yourself what is truth in which there is no illusion, nothing personal, it is not my truth or your truth, it is truth.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 31ST JULY 1976

As we were saying yesterday, and the previous talks, I think it is very important, if I may point out, repeat it again, that one should be a light to oneself and not follow anybody. Naturally in the technological world you have to follow, you have to accept, you have to do all kinds of things there, but in the world of the mind, or if you like to use the word, spirit, authority cripples, destroys that light. One must come upon it for oneself. Truth is something you can't find through another, nor through any technique. And it is becoming more and more evident throughout the world that because the technological world has so extraordinarily advanced we think that the same kind of technology can be applied for ourselves, for our psychological well being. So we are apt to think, or feel, or accept, that a technique of some kind is necessary for deep understanding, having an insight, or coming upon that truth. So if I may point out again this morning that one should be most advisedly careful not to accept anything from anybody psychologically, but to investigate for oneself if one is at all serious. And from there one can learn a great deal because one is the world, as we pointed out, if we know how to read the book of ourselves, then everything is there.

Now what shall we talk about?

Q: Can we talk about energy?

Q: Can we talk about self deception and be aware of it?

Q: If I observe my sorrow, it disappears. Would you please go into it much more?

Q: What do you think of suicide?

K: What do I personally think about suicide? And what other things would you like to talk about?

Q: Can we talk more, or have a dialogue about being a light to oneself?

K: Shall we start with that? And perhaps we could include all the other questions in it.

What does it mean to be a light to oneself? So can we start from the beginning? We are not a light to ourselves now. That is a fact - right? We are confused - politically, religiously, in all our relationships with each other, there is a certain strain, confusion, conflict, and from that this question of sorrow and so on. So we are, as human beings right throughout the world, dreadfully confused. There are so many guides, so many philosophers, so many gurus with their systems, asserting, persuading, hoping that you will follow and so on. So there is this immense confusion outwardly and inwardly. That's a fact. Can we start from there?

And there are many throughout the world who think or assert that this light, or this wisdom, or this truth, god, whatever name you like to give it, is abiding in each one. That is an assumption, a theory, a traditional acceptance of what someone has asserted, or because you are conditioned to that you accept it. So the fact is we are very, very confused. Right. Could we start from that basis? We may be sometimes not confused, sometimes see things very, very clearly, and having that perception once it becomes a memory and we want to capture it, hold on to it, and fight to get it back again. But as human beings, wherever we live, in whatever clime, and whatever circumstances, this state of confusion and conflict exists.

That's a fact from which we can start. If we are a light to ourselves now conflict wouldn't exist. So we must start with actually what is.

Obviously if there is any kind of confusion, whatever choice we make out of that confusion will still be confused - right? Out of my confusion - suppose I am confused - I choose a certain path, certain direction, certain gurus, certain activity. Because I am confused, out of that confusion whatever I choose will equally be confusing. I think that is equally a fact. So it becomes very important not to choose. Right? I wonder if we understand that. Not to follow a certain direction, or a path, or a system, or a method, or a guru, or this, or that, because it leads us to much greater confusion, to greater division, which is what is happening in the world - there are your gurus and my gurus, mine is better than yours, mine knows more than yours. You follow, this battle going on all around us.

So to find a light for oneself, action out of confusion leads to further confusion - right? Can we not accept it as a fact - it is like the blind leading the blind. So the first requirement, seems to me, is to be free from the desire to find truth, to find something away from 'what is'. Right? Are we meeting each other? So are we aware that we are confused? And if we are confused, then what is the action, or is there any action which will not lead to further confusion, or is there an observation of this confusion which, by the very observation is the action?

Now let me go into it a little bit more. Suppose I am confused as a human being. And I realize that whatever I do out of that confusion will lead to further confusion, further conflict, further misery. I am very clear on that point. Then I must act. Life demands action. I can't wait until I have completely unconditioned myself and then act. You follow? I must act because action is life, like relationship is life, activity, action, the doing, is part of life. So what am I to do? I know I am very confused, and is there a part of me which is not confused? You follow? Or is the whole of me confused? Is there a part of me, or somewhere in me is there clarity, is there a sense of freedom, total freedom in which there is no confusion, conflict, and all the rest of it? You understand my question?

Q: One must be very careful not to put it into words.

K: I understand. But I am enquiring into this. I am asking myself, if I am confused, I am asking myself, am I totally confused in all my consciousness, the whole of it; or is there a part of that consciousness, which is me, which is not confused? And if I can hold on to that part which is not confused, then out of that action will be right. You understand my point?

So I must find out if there is anywhere within me, not imagined, not caught in an illusion of desire, I must find out if there is anywhere within me some spot which is really beautifully completely free of all this confusion. Right, you have understood? Or the whole of me is confused. Can a confused mind, confused consciousness, ask such a question: is there a part of me which is not confused? I wonder if you see the point of this. I am confused, my mind is troubled, in conflict, broken up, fragmented, and that mind which is fragmented asks, is there a part of me which is clear, not fragmented? You follow? It is a wrong question. Of course. It is a wrong question, but we put that question. I don't know if you see the importance of this. I am confused and I know I am very confused, but my desire is, there must be somewhere within me, some spot, some area, where there is tremendous clarity. My desire wants that, and so it creates an illusion and is caught in that illusion and says, "Yes, there is an area which is very clear". You follow?

So one must be aware at depth that this idea, or this desire to have an area where there is clarity, which is an illusion, one must become very careful about that, not be caught in it. So I am asking then, I am totally as a human being confused - religiously, politically, in my relationship, in my activity, there is regret, there is sorrow, there is pain, there is anxiety - you follow - all the human agony with which I am surrounded, of which I am part - now life demands action, life says, without relationship you cannot exist. And I discover in my relationship too there is confusion, there is conflict, there is battle between the sexes. So there it is. So what shall I do? You understand now my question? I am not admitting, or desiring an area within my consciousness where there is some clarity. I have totally put away that because I see it is the activity of desire, hope, wanting, which inevitably leads to illusion. So I completely discard that. Please this is a dialogue, I am not talking only. We are sharing this thing together, therefore you are participating in this.

So I am only confused, and I must act, and I see I have relationship - wife, husband, boy, girl, whatever it is, relationship, father, parents, whatever it is - and there too I am confused. Confusion implies conflict. Confusion implies uncertainty. Confusion implies a sense of division. I am aware of all that. So what shall I do, knowing that whatever I do will lead to further confusion, further misery, so what shall I do? Shall I wait until I have cleared all my confusion, withdraw into a world of monasteries, retreats, ashramas, you follow, communes, and all the rest of it, shall I withdraw into all that? And that implies I have to choose there too - which commune, which guru, ashrama, which retreat, but I am still confused so whatever I choose will be... right? I wonder if you see all this. So I say to myself, joining a group, retreating into a monastery, following somebody else is still part of this confusion so I will not follow anybody, I will not join any group, or retreat into any monastery, or into a commune. So I am left with this confusion. You understand what we are doing? We are brushing everything away - desire hopes to find some clarity and therefore creates illusion. So we are cleaning the deck, as it were.

And what shall I do? I am related, I have relationships, I have to earn a livelihood, I have to write, read, I have to act in life. What shall I do? Dialogue please!

Q: Who is it that wants to do something?

K: My girl or my wife or my parents say, "Do this". Society demands that I do something, earn a livelihood. It is not, I want to do something, because I realize whatever I do is confused, but society, parents, everything says, you have to act, you can't sit still on a chair and look at your neighbour. So what shall I do?

Have a dialogue with me please, it is a dialogue, a conversation between two people who are interested in the same thing, with same intensity, you understand, and therefore a communication takes place easily.

There is an unconscious desire, or a belief, or a longing, that there must be a way out from this confusion - right? So we have to go into that question. Please, we have to go into this question, which is: is the content of my consciousness, whether it is conscious or deep down, hidden, is there anywhere within the hidden area an actuality which is clear? An actuality, not an imagined actuality. So I have to examine what is hidden within the consciousness - right?

Now first of all who has divided this consciousness into the unconscious and the conscious? Who has divided it? Why does this division exist? Let me put it that way.

Q: (inaudible)

K: No, don't jump to it, sir. The whole Freudian, the whole psychological world and the analytical world, psycho-therapeutic world say that there is an unconscious - right - and the conscious, there is a division. And I say to myself, why is there this division? Who has invented this division? Why should I accept the division? A million people say there is a division - professors, highly qualified people, MDs and all the rest of it, they say there is a division - the unconscious, conscious. You all may be wrong. I am not saying you are right or wrong, but you may be, I don't know, but why should I accept this division? You understand.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, the human mind demands to know, and there may be something in consciousness which is hidden. That's all you can say. Something hidden, not divided - you understand? I am objecting to the division. I am objecting rationally, not because I am prejudiced against division. But I say, why do we accept, millions and millions of people now in the western world and partly in the eastern world because the west is conquering technologically in every way the east, why has humanity accepted this?

Q: It is incapacity to see the whole.

K: The incapacity to see the totality of consciousness. So you say because there is this incapacity there has been this division. Watch it very carefully in yourself please. Look at it yourself. Because I am incapable of seeing the totality of my consciousness I resort to dividing it, thereby hoping I will see the whole. First I fragment it, then I put it together in the hope of seeing the whole. You understand? So first we divide and then we join them together. I say to myself, why do you divide it first? And you say, well I can't see the whole. How do you know you can't see the whole? Is it because you have divided it and you are conditioned by this division, which is your accepted tradition that it is divided? I wonder if you are following all this.

Now my question then is: as I, an outsider, if I may point out, I don't accept this division, though a million people accept it I say, no. Because what is important is to see the whole of consciousness - right? Then there is no necessity for a division. Now is that possible? You follow my next question, sir?

Q: As I live a superficial life and occasionally I delve deeply, and that delving deeply gives the idea that there is the unconscious and the conscious - the delving deeply, because I live a superficial life.

K: That is one of the reasons. One of the reasons is the incapacity to see the whole and therefore divisions take place. The other is, one lives a very, very superficial life and occasionally one digs deeply. It may be a dream, or it may be a conscious act, then you realize there is something much deeper than the surface, and therefore there is a division. Right? Go on sirs, this is a dialogue, please.

Q: It gives great strength if you believe in something.

K: Belief brings great strength - right? Now if there is a neurotic belief, that very neurotic belief gives you an enormous vitality. I don't know if you have met many neurotics. Perhaps most of us are neurotic. So they are extraordinarily vital people - 'vital' in quotes. But that is not the question here for the moment, if I may go into it.

So there are many reasons, or several reasons why there is this division, and having been made mankind is now generally accepting it. And an outsider, like the speaker, comes along and says, "Why does this division exist at all? Is it not possible to see the whole of consciousness?" You understand my question?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: He says, in ourselves we are fragmented, in ourselves there are various divisions, and that those divisions help us to divide this consciousness and unconsciousness. So it is part of our whole life, living, which has brought about this division. Right? We accept all these reasons. Right?

Now is it possible to see the totality of one's consciousness, including that which is hidden, including what you call the unconscious? So I am asking, is it possible?

Q: The more I demand to find out if there is a possibility of total observation the more conflict arises.

K: I understand. But I am asking, is it possible - I am not saying it is, or it is not - is it possible for us to see the totality of consciousness in which is included the unconscious, the hidden? The general agreement is, that it is not possible - right? The psychologists, the professors, the MDs, all of them say, that is not possible, it is only given perhaps to the few loonies, but actually that is not possible.

Now what do we mean by seeing the totality, the whole? Do we observe anything wholly? Do we observe something completely? Or is it only partial observation?

Q: Partial.

K: I am coming to that sir, just look at yourself. Can you see, for instance take greed, or envy, can you see the total movement of greed at once? The total movement. You understand my question? What do you say?

Q: I don't know.

K: The lady says, "I don't know". All right, you have stated that, then what? You are going to enquire, aren't you, first. You don't know, but it is important to find out if it is possible to see the totality of consciousness, including the unconscious. Why isn't it possible? What prevents us from observation of the totality?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madame, we have answered that question, please. Look our question, madame, is: can you see, observe, the total movement of greed? All its implications, why greed arises, what is the source of its continuity, why is it condemned, and so on and so on, the whole movement of greed, can you see it at one glance - not only the active greed, conscious greed, but also the hidden greed? Can you see the whole of that?

Q: What is hidden greed?

K: Hidden greed? I may say, I am not greedy, but deep down I am terribly greedy. Please listen to my question first. Can I see the total movement of greed?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, no, I am not telling you anything. I am asking you if you can see the whole movement of greed?

Q: I can't and I don't know why.

K: You cannot. You say you cannot and you don't know why.

Q: If you are interested in something you can see the whole of it.

K: Yes. I am interested in seeing the movement of greed, the whole movement. But I haven't got the energy to go fully into it. I am interested, but the vitality, the energy, the intensity is lacking. So what shall I do? Take drugs, smoke, drink, all kinds of stimulation to have more energy so that I can watch the total movement of greed? It becomes rather silly, doesn't it. So what shall I do? May I go into it? I go into it, you are not helping, find out. Can I observe the total movement of greed, total movement, the hidden as well as the conscious greed? What is movement? I said total movement of greed. Greed is a movement, it isn't static, it is constantly moving, more, more, more. So can I observe the movement?

Now what do we mean by movement? Movement means from here to there. So movement means time. Right? Time is movement, whether chronologically or psychologically, it means movement. So as long as I have this idea of movement, which is time, time is going to prevent me from observing the whole. You get some of it? If it is not clear we will go into it.

Q: It is clear but...

K: Wait, wait, I am coming to that. He asks, you are not answering the question. He says, you have moved away from the question, which is, you have introduced a new factor which is time. And then you will say, how am I to stop time? I am not stopping anything. I am merely observing. And that is the difference. I am not asking myself, how am I to stop time; I am just observing the whole factor, the whole map of greed. And one of the points which prevents me from seeing the whole map of greed is this movement - movement to end it, the movement to pursue it, the movement which says, "I must stop". I am observing all that. This observation of movement, I am not denying it, I am not trying to stop it, there is only observation of this movement.

So as greed is also a movement - right - it is part of time. I haven't got it, but I will get it. Right? So I have to find out if my mind is caught in this movement. I wonder if you are understanding all this?

Q: Yes.

K: No, sir, don't agree, it is very difficult, go slowly. We said, consciousness contains both the conscious as well as the unconscious. And part of that consciousness is greed - or take any other thing. And so I ask, can we see the totality of greed, the total movement, the nature of it, the structure of it, how it arises? To see it clearly, not theoretically but actually - right? Can you see this - the origin of it and the end of it? Is there an end to greed? I am not greedy for wealth, or money, position, status and all the horrors, but I am terribly greedy to have truth, to find truth. That to me is the most important thing and I am terribly greedy, which is part of greed. I know you don't like to think that, but it is still greed.

So can I see the whole of it, this movement? I can only see - please this is simple - I can only see the total movement of greed when there is no direction - to get rid of it, to stop it, to suppress it - all that prevents me from looking at greed totally. Right?

Because, as we said the other day, direction is fragmentary, which is a motive. Motive is fragmentary. The motive gives you direction and therefore it is fragmentary. When we have a directive, that I must get rid of it, greed, then I have moved along a certain direction, therefore direction prevents me from seeing the whole. You understand this? That is, to suppress greed, to rationalize greed, to escape from greed, or to say, "I must stop greed", any activity which is directive prevents the seeing of the whole. Right? So as long as a human being, wants to see the totality of consciousness with its hidden layers, he must understand, have an insight to the fact that wherever there is a directive, that directive is divisive, therefore fragmentary, which will prevent the perception of the whole.

Q: That's all there is to it.

K: No, no, there is lots more to it. Directive.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, I said, sir, greed is part of consciousness, as violence, as hope, despair, anxiety, all that is part of our consciousness. Your consciousness is the world consciousness, and so on. Part of that consciousness is greed. Can you see the movement of greed totally, not only the hidden but the obvious greed? We are saying you can only see the totality of the movement of greed when there is no direction. Which means, only when there is no motive, because motive gives direction. Right, that is simple. So if there is the demand that it is only by seeing the totality of consciousness then also the unconscious is revealed, then you have to observe without any direction. And that demands a certain attention, seriousness, because then you end greed - you follow? Then you don't play with greed. So you are then aware of the totality of it. But most people don't want to give up their greed, they like their greed. It is a tremendous pleasure to possess. So we are asking something quite different. That is very clear.

And also to see the whole, it may reveal itself through dreams. Do you want to go into all that? Are you interested in it?

Q: I'd be interested.

K: You'd be interested in anything.

So fear is part of our consciousness, and as long as there is fear, which is a directive, therefore you can't see the whole. Dreams. There are obvious dreams, obvious physical, biological pressures and dreams. We are not talking about that. What are dreams and why should we dream at all? You understand my question? During the day the brain is very, very active - observing, you know what it goes through, thinking, chattering, denying, accepting, quarrelling, conflict, that is going on all the time. Registering insults, registering flattery, the whole movement is going on during the day. And during the night the movement still goes on - no? Right? Unless there is an end at end of the day of all this movement of chattering, quarrelling, seeking prestige, power, position, all that, if that doesn't end at the end of the day it then carries on - right? This is a fact. Are we moving together?

So dreams are the continuation of our daily activity, only in different forms, through pictures, ideas, you follow, all that, symbols. So the same movement of confusion, conflict, misery goes on. So our question is: can this movement of our daily life, as we know it, the conflicts, end each moment? You understand? Not at the end of the day because the brain can only function when it is absolutely in order, properly - you understand? So it demands order. You can find this out for yourself, it is very simple.

Q: We don't have the time to go into the bottom of every question.

K: I am going to show it to you. The lady says, we haven't time to go into the bottom of every problem, every question, every conflict. We haven't got time. We have got plenty of time: as each thing happens, look at it and end it. You have got instantly plenty of time. But we like to play with it. We won't go into that for the moment.

Q: What about psychologically?

K: Even psychologically, please. We are saying, dreams are a continuation of our daily conflicts, miseries, confusions, carried over during sleep, during which the brain is still active because it is trying to bring order while you are asleep. You understand? Because it says, "I can only function if there is order. If there is disorder I get disturbed, I get neurotic, so I must find order." To have order means security for it. This is obvious, all these questions. Are there psychologists here, they would tell you.

So it demands order, which means security, for it to function healthily, normally. But as our daily life is so disorderly it tries during the sleep to find some kind of order. So is it possible during the day, any problem that arises, psychological, human problem, as it arises to let it flower, end? Let it flower - you understand? Suppose I am angry, I let it flower, it doesn't mean I go and beat you up, or say words, but I watch the anger flowering in myself and withering. You follow? So when there is such activity of appearance, manifestation, flowering and withering as you go along during the day, at night the brain has order so it can rejuvenate itself - you understand all these things - so that it is clear.

So we are asking, as the human being living in modern society, with all its complexities, becomes so confused, and life demands, and relationship demands, that he should act, what shall he do? You remember that was our first question. So in exploring what to do, we say, can you see the whole? It is only when you see the whole there is correct action. We cannot see the whole of consciousness because we have always got some direction - unpleasant, or pleasant, hidden or open, but it is always there. And therefore that prevents the observation of the total map.

Q: I have a feeling that I need to understand.

K: Understand who? Understand the speaker? I am afraid so. The speaker is only a mirror in which you are seeing yourself - right? When you see yourself the mirror becomes unimportant, break it up, throw it away. And I mean it.

So we are observing ourselves, not what the speaker says is ourselves, which you have to understand, but you have to understand, know, look at yourself. Yourself is confused. Please, that is simple. Totally confused. And as long as you do not perceive the totality of that consciousness, whatever you do will lead to further confusion and misery. To perceive the totality of that consciousness there must be no directive. You understand? Directive means motive, the motive says, "I must understand my consciousness, I must get rid of this, I must..." and all the rest of that childish stuff. So when there is an observation without a direction the unconsciousness is open. You understand? It is all revealed, with one breath you see the whole thing.

Q: We don't do it.

Q: If I have no motive why should I do anything?

K: If I have no motive why should I do anything - is that it? If you have no motive, you say, I have no desire to do anything. You have a motive when you want to have shelter - right? Shelter, a home, a roof on top of you. There is a motive when you want to be clothed, because it is cold. There is a motive when you are hungry, food. Is that same movement carried over to the psyche? You follow my question? There are motives biologically, organically. It may be that we are so conditioned by that, we carry that over to the psychological area, where we say, "I must have a motive to live, otherwise I can't act". You see the difference? Biologically, organically, there is a motive for food, clothes, and shelter, money, I must work, there is a motive. It may be that we are so conditioned by that we move that same urge into the psychological field. And when in the psychological field there is any motive then you divide up life, break it up, and therefore you don't see the totality of life - not my life, or your life, the totality of human life.

Q: We are fragmented.

K: You are still fragmented. So we are asking: can this totality of consciousness be observed? And we are saying, it can be observed totally, including the unconscious, all the travail that is going on in the unconscious, as well as in the conscious, a lot of worms squirming! And all that is revealed when we are observing without the observer - you understand? The observer is the past, the observer is the motive, the observer says, "I must not do this", etc., etc. The observer is the past and the observer gives motive for observation, and therefore it can never see the totality of it. The observer is the observed - right? That consciousness which is observing is himself, but he likes to divide it and say, "I am different from my consciousness", which is obviously silly. So observation takes place only when there is no observer as the past, who gives direction. Then when there is perception of the whole there is action, not fragmented.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, sir, just a minute. Is the good opposite of the evil? You understand my question? The good. Is the good opposite or different from the bad, the evil? You understand my question? The gentleman says, I am always attempting to identify myself with the good. And we are saying, is the good different, or opposite, opposed to evil?

Q: I identify myself with truth.

K: No, you can't use the word truth, please just a minute, we will come to that point, sir. We are asking a much more fundamental question, which is: is the good opposed to evil?

Q: Good and bad are part of the same thing.

K: Please, just stick to one thing. This is really a very serious question. You understand? Because this has been one of our battles in life - the good and the bad, the beautiful and the ugly, the evil and the beneficial, and so on and so on.

Q: They are different, but not separate.

K: I don't understand that. Is the good, when you say opposite, is it related to the bad? Or is good totally independent of the bad?

Do look.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, not avoidance, just look at it per se, in itself. Do we know the good because we know the bad, the evil? Do you know you are dull because you compare yourself with someone who is bright? Please, this is one of the...

Q: We always do that.

K: The gentleman says, we always do that, we compare ourselves with somebody who is bright and then call ourselves dull. That is what we do all our life. But we are challenging, we are questioning that. I know that is the normal, traditional thing, we know all that, don't bring that up. It is so obvious. But we are asking, is the good opposite of the evil? If it is the opposite it has roots in the evil. No?

Q: They are two aspects of the same phenomenon, two sides of the same coin.

K: Two aspects of the same phenomenon, two sides of the same coin. But sir, that is just words. I want to go much deeper than that, you are just sticking at words.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are not looking, you are not investigating, you are just saying something. Do please investigate, that is the purpose of these dialogues which we have had for the last four days, and tomorrow is the last dialogue. We are saying, please investigate, don't say, it is pleasure, it is this, it is that. We know all these things. Is the good opposite to the evil? If it is the opposite then the good has roots in the evil. Right? I only know that I am dull when I compare myself with you who are bright - right? So my dullness is rooted in your cleverness. Or, are the two different? If they are different, how do I know what is evil? And what do I know about the good? The good, not the relative good, not the opposite of evil. Then how do I know what is good? I only know what is good in comparison. If I don't compare - you understand - if I don't compare myself with you who are bright, and then through comparison I find myself I am dull, if I don't compare, then am I dull? I don't know.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't think we have understood. This is too difficult. Look, sir. All religions have this problem: the devil, the good angels and the bad angels. The good and the bad. This has been right through all religions, from the ancient Sumerians to the present day. Which is, there is this conflict between this and that. There is only conflict between this and that if they are related. If they are not related, how do I know what is good if they are not related? Only by comparison. And comparison means measure, measure means thought, is thought the product of good? You understand what I am saying? No, you don't. If the good is the product of thought then it is merely a fragment and therefore not the good. But there is a good which is not the product of thought, therefore it is nothing to do with the opposite, it is.

Are we in communication with each other, sharing something with each other, have you got something this morning? Or are we just carrying on in the same old way?

Q: (In Italian)

K: The gentleman says, you are at one level, we are at another level, can't you come down to us? Or can't we come up to you?

And we can only come up to you, the gentleman says - I don't say this - when we have the same interests, at the same moment, with the same intensity, then we meet each other. That is, we meet each other when both of us have got the same interest, same intensity, and energy. So there is never communication, the questioner says, because we are always bobbing up and down. And can't you see our difficulty and break through our difficulty and do something about it? So you are putting the burden onto me. And as I have said many times, I am not your guru, I am not your leader, and I am not your teacher. You are the teacher, you are the guru, you can learn everything about yourself if you know how to read your book, which is yourself. But you don't want to read it, you won't take the trouble to look at it. And it is all there, because you are the world and the world is you, and therefore the whole thing is buried in you - the agony, the suffering, and all the rest of it.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 1ST AUGUST 1976

This is the last discussion or dialogue, and before we ask questions may I say something?

We have talked about a great many things related to our personal life, a life which is common to all humanity, with all the problems, the confusion, the misery, the conflict, violence; and many other things we have talked about. And I hope it will not be merely a verbal description, but each one of us will face the actuality of our daily life and find out for ourselves if these teachings have any direct relationship in our life. Otherwise it would be such a waste of your energy and time and money to come and sit here on a damp day. And, if I may suggest, one should take these teachings as a whole, not take bits of it, what you like and reject the others, it is a total package, if I may use the modern word. And considering what is happening in the world - politically and all the appalling things that are going on - unless one radically as a human being changes fundamentally we will not be able to help humanity.

And it is very important, it seems to me, that we should not follow anybody, join any group, belong to any sect, but be concerned with the whole of mankind, the global problems of life. And to understand that, this enormous complex problem, one has to be, as we said, a light to oneself. And this light cannot be found through another, whatever they may say, however popular they are, whatever circus, one has to be free from all the authority, fear and so on. And what is important is, the first step is the last step. I hope you understand that. The first step that one takes is really the last step.

Now we can ask questions.

Q: Could we discuss, or talk about together, the question of awareness without following any particular system or practice? Go into the question of awareness.

Q: Can I ask a question? In understanding the problem of greed, it seems greed, or any other particular problem, there is a sense of deep relief. Now how can we sustain the drive without forming it into a practice? How can discovery not prevent other discoveries?

K: Yes. How is one if one discovers something not to make it into a memory, into a knowledge and so make it into a routine, and so lose the energy of that first discovery, and to maintain that all the time? That is the question.,

Q: Sir, can we go into what prevents this first discovery taking place, on the spot observation, now?

K: What prevents us from observing the fact and going beyond it?

Q: Is that also what leads to laziness?

K: Yes, is that part of laziness, indolence, and weight of tradition.

Q: Not part of that, is it the same movement?

K: The incapacity to observe what is actually going on now, is its root laziness?

Q: No, is it lack of energy on our part to observe immediately and act on that observation, is it lack of energy, laziness?

Q: Could we talk about love?

Q: Is it possible to have a technique without being conditioned by that technique?

Q: Do you have to be alone to be free, and in that freedom what is relationship with another human being? Cannot there be freedom in human relationship?

Q: Could we talk about what makes relationship creative?

Q: For many, many years you have talked about awareness. Is there any relationship between the language and awareness?

K: What is the relationship between the word awareness and the actuality of it? That's enough.

Q: (Long question, inaudible)

K: I understand. Sir, in one question you are putting so many things, sir. I think we are misunderstanding each other. I am sorry.

So which question shall we discuss? You have several questions: please talk about love, go into it much more deeply; what is the nature of energy that sustains constant discovery, constant moving; and you asked, what prevents observation and action; and does aloneness imply freedom; and can there be, in relationship, freedom? Now which shall we talk about?

Q: Love and compassion.

Q: The danger of words and being attached to words and not seeing the reality behind the word.

Q: The other way, through words one can come into awareness.

K: Also there was a question: please go into it in much more detail, what it means to be aware without a technique. Now which shall we discuss?

Q: Start with the words.

K: Do we want to go into this question of words, awareness, and include all the other questions which have been put to us?

What is the function of a word? If we use, or know English, or French, or Italian, or whatever it is, we use a word to communicate, to point out. When we say, 'door', we mean a particular door, to point it out. And words have made the mind accept and build a prison around itself. That is, we are prisoners of words - right? You dislike certain words and like certain words, words condemn or help, and so on. So what is the function of a series of words, or a sentence? Obviously to communicate. That is simple enough.

And is there a thought without a word? If there is no word, is there thinking? Or the words help to think? You are following this? Is thinking related to words? If there were no words would there be thinking? Is there a thinking without words - word being symbol, image, picture, all that? So is thinking part of the structure of words? I want to tell you something, can that be communicated without words? And it can be communicated without the word if we are both at the same level, at the same intensity, with the same interest, then there is a communion which is non-verbal. We understand it instantly by a gesture, which is not a word.

So part of thought is the verbalization to communicate what one thinks. I think about something and I want to communicate it to you. Either we are both telepathically in communication, which is dangerous, misleading unless we are both at the same level, with the same interests, with the same energy - so there is a non-verbal communication, a gesture, a look; and a verbal communication. But both are involved in thinking. Right? I think something. I may not put it into words but I make a gesture, and that gesture conveys a great deal, or a look. So words become important only for communication. And if we both understand the meaning of the word then communication is fairly simple. But if I spoke in Russian and you didn't understand Russian, then we can't communicate.

Now move from there. So thought is part of verbalization. That is, in thinking, the whole process of thinking, are words necessary - to make it very simple - are words necessary to think? You understand my question? Or is there a thinking without words? Is this all becoming too intellectual?

So we must go further into it. That is, is there a thinking without image, symbol, word? And if there is no symbol, word, image, what is then thinking? There may be no thinking, or a different form of thinking. We won't go into that because that leads somewhere else.

And what relationship has the word to actuality? The actuality of a word like the 'tent', is not the tent. The word is not the thing. That's simple. But for us the word is the thing. We identify the word with the thing, we don't separate the word from the thing. That's part of awareness. You get it? To separate the word from the thing. The tent is not the actual tent, the word. The word 'tent' is not the actuality. But for most of us when we use the word 'tent', the imagination is there already, you see the tent, so there is no separation. So part of awareness is to separate the word from the thing. Is this clear? So that makes a tremendous difference because I am going to show you something in a minute. Just hold on.

The word 'fear' is different from the actuality - right? The feeling of it. So we have to find out if the word creates the fear, or the feeling of fear is independent of the word. That's part of awareness. You understand? To separate the word from the actual.

Then if the word is different from fear - the word fear is different from the actual, then what is the actual without the word? That's part of awareness. Are you following all this? Is this too complex?

So - please I'll repeat it again - is the word 'fear' the actual, and does the actual exist without the word? If it exists without the word, is it fear? That's part of awareness. You understand? So if it is independent of the word, then what is it that we call fear, if that feeling is independent of that word, what is it? It is just sensation - right? There is nothing wrong with sensation. So all that is part of awareness - to separate the word from the actual. You understand? To do this all the time. The word 'wife' is not the actual, but the word 'wife' instantly is identified with the actual. To separate the word from the actual, then there is quite a different process of observation, awareness. You understand? Are we getting somewhere?

So the word 'awareness' is not the fact. And to be aware, does it need a technique? That was one of the questions. Obviously not. Because if you practise awareness, it is just a mechanical process of verbalization, and not separate the word from the actual. You can do that now as we are sitting. Right.

So the whole significance of awareness, part of it, is to separate the word from the thing. Because the word 'Mr Smith' is not Mr Smith. But if I look at him without the name he is quite a different entity. So this is a tremendous process of awareness, which needs no practice, no technique, I can instantly see the truth of it.

Then in awareness is there choice? You understand my question? I am aware - the speaker is aware of all of you sitting there, with different coloured shirts and blouses or whatever it is.

To observe, or to be aware without choice, observe the colours without saying, "I like", or "Don't like", "This is good,", just to observe. Right?

So to be aware implies the separation of the word from the fact, and in which there is no choice whatsoever. And this awareness is not concentration. Is it? Concentration implies exclusion, focussing one's desire on a particular thing - to concentrate, to focus one's observation on a particular thing, excluding other things. So concentration implies building a wall round yourself in order to exclude and concentrate - right? Now what is the relationship of awareness to concentration and attention? You follow? We are moving further into attention.

So when there is an awareness is there a concentration? Am I putting the question? Concentration, we said, is focussing one's desire, one's wish - I won't use the word attention - on a particular thing, and so exclude anything that interferes with that concentration - right? Awareness is not concentration. And is attention concentration? It is not. Where there is attention there is no centre from which to attend. Whereas in concentration there is a centre and therefore exclusion. I wonder if you get it? So we have talked about it enough.

So to be aware implies the separation of the word from the fact; and in that awareness there is no choice but only observation. You can see this happening in daily life, if you observe it, when you are interested in something very much you observe without any word. And attention is that. Attention implies no centre, therefore no border, therefore attention is tremendous, vast.

Now the other question is: does freedom imply aloneness?

Right, that was the question that was asked. The meaning of the word alone means, all one. The dictionary meaning of that word means, all made into one, all one. Now how can there be freedom if there is self-centred activity, which prevents aloneness? Right? If I am concerned everlastingly about myself - my problems, my worries, my wife, my cooking, you know, worried, worried, concerned all about that, occupied, if my mind is occupied with many things, which is self-centred, there cannot be aloneness, can there? So freedom is a non-occupied mind. A mind which is occupied, it doesn't matter with what - god, with worries, with money, with sex, with pleasure - occupied, which most of us are, with something or other we are occupied - as long as there is this occupation with something there cannot be freedom, obviously.

And when there is that freedom, the questioner asks, what is relationship then? What is then relationship in that freedom - if you have such freedom? First have that freedom and find out. But without having that freedom we are asking, what is relationship. I am not trying to belittle it. But the fact is, our minds are occupied with chattering, with vanity, arrogance, all kinds of things, self pity and so on. Can that mind be free of all that? And when it is free isn't it alone? Because it is something totally different from the other whose mind is occupied. I wonder if you see that. Right?

So if a man, a human being, is free from this tremendous occupation that is going on, then what is his relationship? Can a human being find that out? To find that out he must unburden himself of all the content of occupation, the content of one's consciousness, which then is freedom. Then what takes place? You are free and another is not. You, as a human being, may be free from all worries and all occupation, and the other is not, then what is your relationship between the two? What is the responsibility of the man who is free and the other who is not?

Now you wanted to talk about love. What place has freedom, which is a man who is not occupied, burdened with tremendous occupation, problems and all the rest of it, what is his relationship with another who is not free, is there in that relationship love? Or it is only then there is love? Now look, what do we mean by the word love? Be careful! To separate the word from the thing. What is that thing when you separate the word, the feeling? You love another - what is it that you love? Please, you love another, don't you - your wife, your husband, your girl, your boy, or whatever you call it - you love. What does that word mean to you when you use that word? Has love a motive? Please, don't shake your head, for us it has. Because you give another sex, or give him comfort, or cook his meal, or depend on him, possess him, dominate him, push him around, or her around - possess, attachment, all that is implied in that word. Jealousy, anger, hatred, a sense of anxiety, fear, because you may lose that person, all that arises, and that we call love. Right? We are not being cynical, we are just looking at facts.

Q: Is there one moment when there is something else?

K: We will come to that, sir, an instant. We will come back to that.

To discover what it means to love, mustn't one be free of all that? Free of attachment - let's take that for the moment. When one is attached, what are you attached to? Suppose one is attached to a table, what does that attachment imply? Pleasure, sense of possession, and the utility of it, the feeling that it is a marvellous table I must hold it, and so on and so on. So when a human being is attached to another, what is going on? One is attached to you. What is this feeling of the other who is attached to you? In that attachment there is pride of possession, a sense of domination, fear of losing it, losing that person, therefore jealousy, and therefore greater attachment, greater possessiveness - right? And jealousy, anxiety, all that comes up. Now if there is no attachment does it mean no love, no responsibility? You understand my question? So for most of us love means this terrible conflict between human beings, and so relationship becomes a perpetual anxiety. You know all this, I don't have to tell you. And that we call love. And to escape from this terrible strain of what we call love, we have all kinds of entertainments - the television entertainment, the - forgive me if I use the word - religious entertainment. Marvellous we quarrel and go off to church, or the temple, and come back and begin again. So all this is going on all the time.

So can man, or woman, be free of all this? Or is that impossible? If it is not possible then our life perpetually is a state of anxiety, and from that all kinds of neurotic attitudes, beliefs, actions take place. Now is it possible to be free of attachment, which implies a great deal? Is it possible for a human being to be free of attachment, and yet feel responsible?

Now to be free of attachment doesn't mean its opposite - detachment. You follow. This is very important to understand this. When we are attached we know the pain of attachment, the anxiety of it, and we say, "For god's sake I must detach myself from all this horror." So the battle of detachment begins, the conflict. Whereas if you observe, are aware of the fact and the word, the word attachment and freedom from that word, which is the feeling, then to observe that feeling without any judgement - to observe it. Then you will see out of that total observation there is quite a different movement taking place, which is neither attachment or detachment. You understand this? Are you doing it as we are talking, or are you just listening to a lot of words? You know you are attached, don't you - to a house, it doesn't matter to what, to something or other, to a belief, to a prejudice, to a conclusion, to a person, to some ideal, tremendously attached. Attachment gives great security, which is an illusion - right? It is an illusion to be attached to something because that something may go away. So what you are attached to is the image which you have built about that. I wonder if you get it.

So can you be free of this attachment so that there is a responsibility which is not a duty? Then what is love when there is no attachment? You understand my question? Look: if you are attached to a nationality, you worship isolation of nationality, which is a form of glorified tribalism, you are attached to it. What does that do? It breaks it up, doesn't it? I am attached to my nationality as a Hindu, tremendously, and you are attached to Germany, France, Italy, nationality, England. We are separate. And the wars, and all the complexity of all that goes on. Now if there is no attachment, and you have no attachment, what takes place? Is that love? I wonder if you are getting it? Are we understanding each other a little bit?

So attachment separates - right? I am attached to my belief, and you are attached to your belief, therefore there is separation. Just see the consequences of it, the implications of it - which we can't go into now, it is too much. So where there is attachment there is separation, and therefore there is conflict. Where there is conflict there cannot possibly be love. And what is the relationship of a man and a woman, or a man and whatever it is, what is his relationship to another when there is freedom? You understand? Freedom from attachment, all the implications of it. Is that the beginning - I am just using the word beginning, don't jump on it - is that the beginning of compassion? You understand? When there is no nationality, and there is no attachment to any belief whatsoever, to any conclusion, to any ideal, then that human being is a free human being. And his relationship with another is out of freedom, isn't it, out of love, out of compassion. I wonder if you are getting all this?

So what next? You see all this is, isn't it, a part of awareness. Now must you analyse, as we have done, analyse what attachment means, the implications of attachment and so on; or can you observe the totality of it instantly, and then analyse? Not the other way round. I wonder if you see. We are used to analysis. Part of our education is to analyse, and so we spend a lot of time on that. So we are proposing something quite different: to observe, then see the totality, and then analyse. Then it becomes very simple. But whereas if we analyse and try to reach the totality you may go wrong - which you generally do. But to observe the totality of something, which means no direction, as we went into yesterday, then analysis either becomes important or unimportant, you can analyse or not analyse.

Now I would like to go into something else from this. Which is, is there something sacred in life, which is part of all this? Is there something sacred in your life, holy? Remove the word, separate the word, the image, the symbol, which is very dangerous, and when you do that, ask yourself, "Is there anything really sacred in my life?" Or is everything so superficial, everything so put together by thought? And thought is not sacred, is it? Do you think thought is sacred, and the things that thought has put together are sacred? And yet we have been conditioned to that - as a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Christian, we are conditioned to worship, adore, or whatever one does, pray, to things that thought has put together. And that we call sacred. I wonder if we are meeting each other.

So one has to find out, because if you do not find out if there is something really sacred, which is not put together by thought, life becomes more and more superficial, more and more mechanical, and utterly meaningless at the end of one's life. I wonder if one realizes this. You know we are so attached to thinking, and the whole process of thinking, and worship the things that thought has put together. Thought whether through the mind as an image, as a symbol, or through the hand, a sculpture, a symbol; the image made by the hand or by the mind is the process of thought. And thought, we said, is memory, experience, knowledge, which is past. And the past becomes the tradition, and the tradition becomes the most sacred thing. So are we worshipping the tradition, or is there something which has nothing to do with thought and tradition, with rituals, you know, all the circus that goes on? So one has to find out. How do you find out? Not the method - sorry, when I use the word 'how', I am not using it as a method. Then let me use a different word. Is there something sacred in life? There is the whole block of humanity which says, "There is absolutely nothing. You are the result of environment, and change the environment then you will never talk about anything sacred. Then you will be a mechanical, happy individual." You know the whole block - the communist world, the tyrannical world and all the rest of it. So if one is very, very serious about this matter, and one has to be really profoundly serious, whether you belong to one that says, "Please, nothing but matter" - matter being thought process; that is materialism in the deep sense of that word. And the other calls itself religious, which is actually material. I wonder if you see that. Because that is also based on thought. So if you belong to neither then you have to find out. You don't assert anything. Then you begin to enquire.

Now what does it mean to enquire into oneself so as to find out if there is anything deeply sacred, holy, in one's life - in life, not in one's life, in living? Is there something marvellously, supremely, sacred - or there is nothing at all?

Are you interested in all this? Because we are becoming more and more materialistic. You may go to churches, temples, mosques, but it is all the structure of thought, put together by very clever cunning thought. Because thought wants security, and therefore it finds security in those things which it has created. And what it has created it says, is sacred - the gods, you know, the whole business of it. Can one be free of the movement of thought and what it has created as sacred, put that aside, and also not say everything is completely materialistic - you follow? So when you are in that position, neither this nor that, then what is the mind to do to find out? You understand my question? If you are very serious - and this demands that one must be profoundly serious otherwise you will play, it becomes a game and leads to illusion - so what will happen? May I go into it? Please share it, for god's sake share it, otherwise it becomes another messy word, sentimental nonsense.

It becomes necessary to have a very quiet mind, doesn't it. Because it is only in freedom you can find out - right? There must be freedom to look. But if you say, "Well, I like my belief, I'll stick to that", you are not free. Or if you say, "Everything is materialistic", which is a movement of thought, then also you are not free. So there must be freedom from the imposition of civilizations, personal desires, personal hopes, and then observe. And you can only observe when the mind is completely still. If there is no stillness in the mind movement takes place - right? Movement being time, thought. So it is absolutely necessary to be free to observe, free from one's prejudices, from one's longing, from one's fears - all that which we have talked about endlessly during these seven talks and four or five discussions. Can the mind be completely without movement? Do you understand my question? Because if there is movement there is distortion. So can the mind be completely still? And one finds it terribly difficult because thought comes in immediately, so one says, "I must control thought." The controller is the controlled - we have been through all that, I won't go into it. When you see that, that the thinker is the thought, the controller is the controlled, the observer is the observed, then there is no movement. You understand? When one realizes anger is part of the observer who says, "I am angry", so anger and the observer are the same. That is clear, that is simple. In the same way, the thinker who wants to control thought is still thought. When one realizes that the movement of thought stops. I wonder if you see that.

So when there is no movement of any kind in the mind then naturally the mind is still, without effort, without compulsion, without will, without all that, it is naturally still, not cultivated stillness because then it is mechanical, which is not stillness, which is just an illusion of stillness. So there is freedom - freedom implies all that we have talked about - and in that freedom there is silence, which means no movement. Then you can observe - then there is observation, then there is only observation, not the observer observing. Get it? So there is only observation out of total silence, complete stillness of mind. Then what takes place? You understand? I can go further into it, but you won't. Then it becomes a theory. You follow. Then it becomes something and you say, "I will argue about that". We can argue and show that I am wrong or right, or this or that, But if you have gone that far, which is, freedom from one's conditioning, and therefore no movement, and complete silence, quietness, which is what? Then there is the operation of intelligence, isn't there? I wonder if you get it?

Look, I'll show you. We said attachment implies great pain, anxiety, fear and therefore deepening of possession. To see that is part of intelligence, isn't it? Is this clear? To see the nature of attachment and all its implications, to have an insight into it, is intelligence - not the cunning intelligence of thought, I am not talking of that intelligence. The intelligence which says, "How true that is". It is this intelligence that is now in operation. You understand what I am talking about? I wonder if you follow what I am saying?

Q: Sir, I am afraid it is only theoretical.

K: Theoretical, I know. No, no. If you see it - listen sir - if you see attachment, all the implications of attachment, and see the danger of attachment, the perception is intelligence. That's all. That's all.

Q: That intelligence is going on.

K: No, I am relating it, I am going to relate it. You will see it in a minute.

Q: Why doesn't one realize that the observer is the observed?

K: Why doesn't one realize it? Part of our tradition is that the observer is different from the observed - right? That is part of tradition, part of education, part of our whole social, religious structure, that the observer is totally different from the observed. But can you see the observer is the observed? Do you realize it? Not only now for the moment because I am pushing you into a corner, but actually do you realize it? That there is no thinker without thought? So the thinker is the thought. Is that terribly difficult to see?

Q: It is very difficult to see that for us.

Q: Are you speaking of self observation?

K: No, no, we have gone beyond that. He raised a question madam, which is, do we actually realize that the observer is the observed, or are you accepting it as an idea? Then the idea becomes important, then you will ask how is that idea to be carried out. Then we are lost. So, now please, just try this: listen to what is being said, listen, don't translate it, or refute it, or argue with it, just listen. It may be wrong, but listen. The speaker says, the observer is the past, the observed is the present. The observer meets the present with the eyes and understanding of the past, therefore there is no meeting of the present. That is simple enough, right. I am trying to explain something, please listen. We said the observer is the past, and our life is based on the past, because we remember, all our knowledge, all our experience is stored as the past. That background, that conditioning, meets the present, and translates what is meets in terms of the past. So the observer maintains separation - right? But if there is no observer there is only the present. Right? Obviously. So the thinker thinks he is separate from thought - right? But is there a thinker without thinking? So the thinker is the thought. That's simple. Now do you realize that?

Q: If I am not the one looking who am I?

K: You are the thought. You are thought. You are thought because you are the form, the name, and all the psychological build up of thought - my belief, my anxiety, my pain, the whole movement of thought. This is simple, sir. We have been through this a hundred times.

So do you actually realize that the observer is the observed? When you see a tree, or a car, the observer is not the car - I hope not - or the tree. We are not talking of that, we are talking psychologically, inwardly. The observer separates himself, so he says, "I am different from the observed", but they are essentially one. Anger is not separate from the person who says, "I am angry". Anger is the person, is the psyche, and so on. We have gone into this. So do you see this fact that the observer is the observed? If you don't see it conflict then will continue between the observer and the observed, anger and the entity who says, "I am different from anger". Then he controls it, suppresses it, tries to change it, you know the whole business you go through. That's a wastage of energy. There is no wastage of energy, and therefore no conflict when the observer is the observed. That's simple. What is the difficulty, I don't quite see.

Q: Why don't you see for us it is so difficult?

K: Because it is fairly simple, isn't it, for most people because they are so traditionally bound. It is a simple fact, you are bound to that separation. You won't let go and say, "Let us find out".

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't know about individuals, sir. The word individual means an entity who is not divided. The meaning is, indivisible, then he is only an individual. But we are so fragmented, so broken up, so distorted, we may call ourselves individuals, but we are not. But that is irrelevant.

The first thing then is to eliminate conflict which is a wastage of energy. And to eliminate that wastage is to realize the observer is the observed, the Arab is the Jew, the Hindu is the Muslim - only in name, you follow, it is so silly.

Q: But it is much more difficult to realize the conditioning is the conditioner.

K: That's right, sir. So much more difficult to realize our conditioning. Our conditioning is to live in the past - right? Our life is based on past memories, past hurts, past anxieties, everything is somewhere behind us. That is our life. And we don't see when we live in the past we can never understand what is going on inwardly. So unless one realizes the observer is the observed, the thinker is the thought, or the experiencer is the experience, there is no freedom from conflict. The god that one worships is surely put together by thought, isn't it? But the man who say, "No, it is God", you can't argue with him, you can't even open the door, he is firmly part of the tradition, and bound by his conditioning. But those who say, "All right, I am enquiring, going into it," then one has a communication with them, which is to observe, to see that the observer is the observed and so end conflict. The ending of conflict means freedom. In that freedom is intelligence. You understand? Because I have seen the observer is the observed, which is intelligence to see that. And that intelligence is part of this freedom, isn't it?

So to have this silent mind, which is necessary, if one is serious, to find out if there anything totally uncontaminated by thought and humanity. All the religions have said there is, and the priests all over the world have said, "We are the interpreters of that", and that is their market value and so on. So if you discard all that, really discard because your intelligence says, that is all too absurd, then your mind is completely still. Is it still now? Or are you still chattering? Go on sirs, it is for you to answer. If it is not still, then find out why it is not quiet, spend some time, energy, not 'how to make it still', that becomes too absurdly childish, find out why it isn't still, enquire. You understand? Because you are attached to a shoe, and what you are going to do tomorrow, or have for dinner, I have this, I have that, I must do that, I must read, I must do my exercises - you follow - chattering, chattering, chattering. Now the chattering is part of the thought, part of the chatter, isn't it? The one who chatters is the entity that says, "Yes, I am chattering", they are not separate. The chattering and the entity who says, "I am different", the entity who says, "I am different" is actually the chatterer. Now if you see that, actually see it, then it is finished.

Then there is no conflict not to chatter. Unless you come to that point, which is, to be free and therefore the operation of intelligence going with it, then only you have a quiet, healthy, sane mind. And in that quietness you will find out if there is something really sacred, or nothing at all.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC TALK 24TH DECEMBER 1977

To communicate with each other is quite important. Unfortunately we must use words. And we rather interpret each word according to our like and dislike. And during these talks here we are going to use the English language, and try to use the words with exactly the meaning in the dictionary, not what I would like it to be, or you would like it to be, but actually the word, not only its common usage, but also words that have a special meaning. And as we go along we will try and explain these words, and please if you will kindly listen to the language, the word itself, not what you think the word means, or your reactions to the word, but actually listen to the word itself, because it is going to be rather amusing and worthwhile if we could really communicate, not only verbally, but also through the words catch an insight into the full meaning, to the significance, to the depth of that word.

But to have a verbal communication with each other we must both first be free to observe, free to listen. And that, I am afraid, is one of the most difficult things to do, to listen. Because we are going together during these talks, discussions, to investigate into the actuality of our daily life. We are not going to discuss theories because they are utterly meaningless, nor speculative ideas, which are equally absurd, or accept some authoritarian traditional outlook. We are going together, if we may, to investigate what actually is.

It is one of the most difficult things to observe actually, which means what is actually taking place now, to observe that and to investigate, if it is possible, that which is being observed. To observe one must be free. That's an obvious fact. If you want to observe the beauty of the evening, the light on the clouds and looking through the leaves at the blue sky, you must be free to look, you must not be preoccupied. You must not be concerned with theories of how to look, how to paint, you must look. So, what we are going to do, if we may this evening, and the following talks, is to learn the art of investigation into the actual, not into what you experience, which may not be true - all your religions and all the rest, we are going to investigate all that; but what is absolutely necessary to examine, to investigate, to explore, is there must be freedom. If you are tied to a particular belief or to a particular dogma, to a particular tradition and are bound by it, intellectually as well as emotionally, or tied so deeply in your daily lives, then you cannot possibly investigate, obviously. It is like an animal that is being tied to a post, and can only wander within the radius, the length of its rope. So what is important, if I may suggest, I hope you will follow this, to examine, to explore, there must be freedom. That is, you are exploring now, not when you go home, or when you feel inclined, but sitting here, talking over together, communicating with each other, we are actually investigating. This is one of the most difficult things to do: to observe, to examine, to explore what is actually going on. Of course, you cannot possibly explore, or investigate politically. That's absurd, nobody can do that because everything is so uncertain, lopsided, and crooked, dishonest, theoretical, so it becomes impossible. Nor the economic condition, the world as it is, because there are constant changes going on. But we human beings, who are riddled with our problems, not only political, economic, but social, individual, relationship with another, if we are really very, very serious and honest, also we have to enquire into what is truth. It is one of the most extraordinary things if you go into it. If you are really seeking truth, compassion, that which is timeless, if you are really deeply concerned and persistently understand what is implied in that, in that pursuit, you are never alone. When you are seeking truth, you are never alone. You are never lonely. You are not approaching as an individual. When you look at life as an individual, as a separated, fragmentary entity, then you are lonely - which we will all go into presently, all this.

So, if we may repeat again, to investigate, to observe, to listen one must be free. Freedom is not at the end but at the beginning. If you are not free, you cannot examine, obviously. It sounds very simple, but it is very, very complex, because our minds, our brains are so conditioned, it is almost impossible to listen, to investigate without pressure, without the distorted outlook. So that is our first concern, if you are at all serious, if you want to go into this matter deeply. One must be free from prejudice, from your own particular experience, from your own dogma, belief or your innumerable conclusions. So one must be free of all that to examine. Right? Are you now free to examine what we are going to look at? That is the first thing, if I may keep on insisting on it; the world is so utterly confused and each one of us, if we are honest and observing our own actions, we are also very confused, uncertain. That is why there is the increase of authority, increase of gurus, increase of those who are certain that they know. So you are caught in all this which prevents you from examining logically, reasonably, sanely.

So these are the things we require to examine: freedom; to be able to think clearly, that means logically and to see the limit of logic. But you must proceed logically before you see the limit of it. And also one must have sanity. That word 'sanity' is rather a difficult word. Each one will interpret it according to his own inclination. Sanity implies good health, first. So that having good health, the illnesses, all those ailments that one has, does not distort your examination. So one must have health, but if one is not well, to know one is not well and to observe that it does not interfere with your observation, with your examination and therefore to bring about sanity, which means health, clarity and to observe without any distortion. If you are a Hindu and caught in that ancient tradition, with all the superstitions, theories, and all the nonsense that is going on, then obviously you are not sane; or if you are a Christian, with all the dogmas, rituals, beliefs, and again you are not sane. Sanity implies having a capacity to observe oneself clearly without distortion, without any form of deviation from that which is actually going on. All that means sanity and much more.

Now we are communicating with each other. We are seeing the meaning of sanity. Now to communicate, you and the speaker must both be sane, otherwise you will think something totally different, distort what is being said. So I hope when we are talking over our innumerable problems, human problems, which we will as we go along, that we are both at the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity; otherwise there is no possibility of communication. Right? You understand? That is, to meet each other linguistically, as well as non-linguistically, at the same level, because there is no authority here, we are both examining and therefore if one assumes authority then the communication ceases. So at the same level, at the same time, at the same intensity means love. Otherwise you can't meet. You understand? It is simple, but very complex if you go into it. Because, after all, what is love? I am afraid there is no such thing in this country. They know what is kindness, perhaps, generosity, a little bit, tenderness when it suits them, affection, when it is fairly convenient; but that word, not just the meaning of the word, but the whole content of that word. Love implies no division. Love implies that all forms of jealousy, antagonism, vanity and so on have gone from one's heart. So love is when there is communication, to be at the same level, at the same time, at the same intensity. And that is what we mean by communication.

So we'll begin. First of all, we must understand each other very clearly. The speaker wants to tell you something. To him that is very, very important, and being important it is very serious. Not casual seriousness, but persistent and continuous seriousness because we are going to investigate that wherever one goes, no matter what country, what type of person, whether they are scientists, philosophers, so-called religious leaders, businessmen, the sannyasi, the monk, and those who are disciples of these people, it is a common factor throughout the world, human beings suffer, uncertain, in agony, in despair, lonely, anxious, frightened. And that is the common factor. If you really observe, whether you may call yourself a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Christian or this or that, but behind that screen of words, one is anxious, one is frightened; there is no happiness; there is constant struggle bringing about great self-importance, self-centred activity. This is the common factor so you are the world and the world is you. Right? Please understand this, not as words or theories, but as an actuality. That is, if you look at yourself, and I hope you will, you will see how extraordinarily complicated your life is, how extraordinarily, uncertain it is. There is always anxiety, jealousy, confusion, misery. This is a fact. This is what is actual. All the theories about them, what you should do about them, how to deal with them, are all unnecessary. As long as you live in the world of theories as I am afraid most Hindus do, that is a marvellous escape. As long as you are dealing with theories, you will never face the actual. When you do face the actual, then you realize that you are like the rest of the world, and that brings you an extraordinary sense of communion. You understand this? When you know that you are suffering and your neighbour is also suffering, whether the neighbour is next door a few feet away or thousand miles away, then there is a certain sense of being together. Haven't you noticed all these things? And so non-verbally, non-theoretically, but actually, as a fact; that there is this microphone, which is a fact, there is the tree, it is a fact, and in the same way, it is an absolute irrevocable fact that you are the world and the world is you. Do you see this? Do you see the actuality of it, not the theory of it. There is no theory. Theory is when you listen to a statement like that, which is, you are the world and the world is you, you make an abstraction of it. You understand what we mean by abstraction? That is, you listen to those words, you don't quite understand, or agree with it, or you don't want to agree with it because you like to think that you are extraordinarily separate, therefore you make an abstraction of it. That is, you make it into an idea, and then theorize about that idea. You understand? Argue back and forth, invent new theories and so on and so on. Which is away from the fact. Right? We are understanding each other?

So please don't make an abstraction of it, make it into an idea, but see the fact only, the actuality. The word 'actual' means that which is taking place now. The word 'actual' means that which is happening now. What is happening now is this extraordinary common factor of every human being. When you realize that, not as a theory as you accept or reject, but something which is fearfully actual, then your whole attitude towards life changes. Then you are not alone because you are like the rest of humanity. Which means you, as a human being, represent the totality of all humanity. You understand this? You, as a human being, are the representative of all humanity because you suffer, you cry, you are frightened, you want pleasure, you are seeking god, and not knowing if there is god, belief, rituals that have no meaning, so you are like the rest of them, the Christians, if you go into a church and there are a lot of words, meaningless words, symbols, and inwardly the monk, the sannyasi, you, everyone is burning with desire, with pain, with sorrow. So that is the first thing to understand, that you are the world and the world is you. If - no, that is so, not 'if', I withdraw that word. That is so.

Then the next question is: is it possible to change, to transform that which is? You understand? That is, human beings throughout the world from childhood get hurt psychologically. You are aware of this, obviously. You are hurt. You are hurt by your parents, by comparing you with somebody else. Please follow all this because it's your life. Because we are going to see whether it is possible at all to wipe away all this factor and have a brain which is pristine, a brain that is never damaged, never deformed. It is possible, I'll show it to you. But you must also have energy to do it, passion, the urge to find out.

So as we were saying, every human being right throughout the world from childhood psychologically is wounded - aren't you? Wounded through comparison, through imitation, through conformity. All those are the instruments of getting hurt, and more. Now, please see, a brain that has been hurt psychologically can never act freely. Therefore it can never act rightly, accurately, precisely. Right? Please see the fact. That is, if I am hurt, because somebody said I must be like my elder brother, some idiotic teacher tells me that, at home or in school. And I try, make an effort. And throughout life that goes on. You are being hurt and the consequence of being hurt is that you resist, that you build a wall around yourself. Are you being aware of all this as I am talking, otherwise we cannot communicate. It is very important for you to understand. A psyche, a human mind that is hurt, therefore distorted, its activity will become neurotic, violent. So you are hurt and the consequence of it is you resist, you build a wall around yourself, gradually you become more and more lonely, withdrawn and from that you act. Therefore your action is distorted. Your action then is violent and so on.

Now the question is, if you are at all aware of being hurt, see the consequences of it, the result in your human relationship - if you are hurt you will never have a relationship with another. So that is a common factor of every human being right throughout the world. Now, since you are the world and the world is you, is it possible for you to be free of hurt? You understand my question? Have we gone together so far? That it is very important for a human being not to be hurt at all. Right?

Now, what is hurt? Please examine what is hurt and who is hurt. I say I am hurt. When you call me a fool, I am hurt. When you say anything that is contrary to what I think, or I have an image about myself and that image gets hurt. Right, do you see this? Actually see it, please for your own sake just observe it. Obviously each one has an image about himself, that you are clever, not clever, that you have a certain status - you know, I don't have to go into all that. You have an image about yourself. That image is challenged and gets hurt. And is it possible not to be hurt at all? You know, how can you love somebody if you are hurt? Do you understand? How can you have sympathy, care, affection when you are hurt, and frightened to be hurt more? So it is very important to be free of hurt. Which means to be free of the image which you have about yourself. The image may be conclusions, opinions, your perception of yourself as being somebody or not being somebody. So can you live without any image at all? Do you understand what that means? To have no image about yourself: that does not mean that you are lost, that you become insecure, uncertain. On the contrary when you have an image about yourself, that image creates uncertainty. That image denies security. So that is the first thing in realizing our inner human behaviour. We are talking about human behaviour in our daily life because that is the only life you have, not the theoretical life, whether Brahman exists, or what Shankara said, or some philosopher said, they are all worthless. They have no meaning at all. What has meaning is what you are, what you are actually doing, whether you are suffering and the rest of it. So let's proceed from there.

So our consciousness is made up of all these things, fear, hurt. Please listen. It is not something mysterious, your consciousness. Philosophers and others like to make it mysterious, but in actuality your consciousness is made up of all the things that thought has put together. That is, your jealousy, your attachment, your fears, your longing for something or other, pleasure; having been attached, pain of attachment and try to be detached. All that is the content of your consciousness. And that content has been put together by thought. So one has to go into the question of this very complex problem of thought. You understand?

Everything that thought has put together is reality. This is a reality, the microphone because thought has gone into it, put together, and we have name it as a microphone. The churches, the cinemas, and all the technological world, the motor car, your gods, your temples, all the rituals, everything is put together by thought. Right, is this clear, because please understand this very carefully. I am going to go into it very, very slowly, in detail, because it is very important to understand.

We are saying that thought has divided the world into nationalities, into classes, into religious differences - Christ, Buddha, Rama or Sita or whoever it is. All that is the creation of thought - the rituals, the pujas that you do every day is put together by thought. There is no denying of that. It would be silly to deny that. But thought has not put together the tree, nature, the forest, the rivers, the mountain, the skies, the stars, the birds - nature. But thought has used nature in making a chair, a microphone, all that.

Please see the difference. Thought whatever is has created is reality. This is a reality, you can't dodge it. And thought also created illusions, which is a reality. All the gods, which are illusions, created by thought are reality. The temple there in the corner is a reality, but it is the product of cunning thought. And thought has not put together nature, the universe. Right? Be very clear on this. And also thought has created the illusions that one lives with.

So thought is the response of the brain that has recorded. That is, the function of the brain is to record. If it did not record, you would have not thought. It is like a registering machine there. Everything is recorded, which is our knowledge. From knowledge there is memory, and the response of memory it thought. These are facts. You cannot say that thought is the ripple of god or the ripple of some invention. If you say it is a ripple of god, it is still a product of thought. So please see how human beings are caught in the product of thought, in the things thought has created, and make it into something super extraordinary. Right? Please see this, it is very important because we are going to find out what is the brain.

The speaker is not an expert on it but he has watched it in himself and discussed this matter of the whole movement of the brain with specialists and they agree what is generally accepted. Which is, the brain is the instrument of registration. You register your experience; you register, your brain has been registering all the traditions, your grandmother, your great-grandmother and so on. So it registers nationality, your religious beliefs and so on. So your brain is under pressure all the time. I haven't discussed this matter except with one or two and they are beginning to agree with what I am saying. Which is, a brain is under constant pressure. All propaganda is pressure. When you say, I believe in god, it is the result of pressure. When you say, I am a Christian, it is still propaganda imposed through two thousand years of constant pressure, believing that there is Jesus the Saviour, Virgin Mary and so on. Constant pressure. Just like the Hindu for 10,000 years or 5,000 years he is being under pressure saying you believe you are a Hindu, you are a brahmin, this, that, pressure, pressure, pressure. Are you aware of this fact? Are you? To be aware, conscious, not something extraordinary, that you are constantly under pressure, at home, in the office, and when you go off to amuse yourself, still under pressure. Everything, you are under great pressure. Now what happens to a brain that is under pressure? Ask yourself this question. I believe in god. That is a pressure. I go to the temple every other day. That is a pressure, because you have been told. Or you are under pressure as a good lawyer to hold your position, and so on and so on. Do you know that you are under constant pressure? Now, if you are aware of it, any form of pressure is a distorting factor. Your brain is deformed. You mightn't like to think so but it is a fact. Deformed, damaged, distorted. When a Hindu says I believe, I do this because it is right, I have accepted, all the things that they are doing, it is under the pressure of propaganda. Right? It may be ten thousand years or two thousand years. This pressure does damage the brain. The brain has the capacity of highly polished, pliable steel that moves in any direction but always comes back to the centre. Right? If you had no pressure - I wonder if you understand all this? This is part of meditation, to free the mind from all the pressure, which means no practice because that is a pressure. You won't agree to all this because all of you are practising meditation, forcing yourself, controlling yourself. All that is too childish.

Now the question is this: is it possible to register only what is absolutely necessary and nothing else? Have you understood this? Have you understood my question? Have you, sir? Somebody say, yes, or no. Are we working together? Yes? Or are you just listening and meaninglessly going away afterwards? Are we working together to find out the full significance of this word 'pressure' on the brain? You understand?

Then, the problem arises: why should there be registration at all? That Nagra machine is registering now - they are going to make a cassette out of it. So we are asking why does the brain have to register? Please enquire, find out. I am going to go into it with out. Because it is very important to have a brain which is not damaged, to have a brain that is not distorted, deformed through constant pressure. If you have a deformed brain, damaged brain, then your actions are crooked, untrue, there is no validity in your action. It is like a diseased man trying to be healthy. He is diseased. Therefore he must clear up the disease then he will be healthy. In the same way, we are saying, is it possible to register only that which is absolutely necessary? I'll show you. Let us go into it. Because then you have a mind, a brain, that has never been damaged, like having a body that has been healthy from the beginning to the end, never has gone to a doctor, never operated upon. So a brain that is pristine, young. So that's what we are going to discover.

Why does the brain register at all? You understand my question? Register? Why does the brain register? If it does not register, you couldn't talk, you couldn't learn any language, you couldn't learn any technical knowledge. So the brain registers because it finds in registration security. Right? I am going to explain. See the first statement: the brain can only function healthily, happily, sanely when it is secure, like a baby, it must have security, every mother will tell you. So please listen to it and when we have a discussion you can bring it up. I don't think you will bring it up at all because I am going to make it very, very, clear. The brain can function happily, easily, without effort, if it feels completely secure. Right? So it has found security in knowledge, knowledge being technological knowledge, in book knowledge. So it says: as long as I have knowledge, I am secure; which means knowledge implies accumulating information and gathering information, storing it up as memory and in that memory it is quite safe. That is, to be safe in this world, the world economically I must become a doctor, a scientist, a lawyer, a businessman, there there is a certain security. Are you following all this? No? And that same security has spilled over into the psychological security. You understand? No, I see you don't understand. What sir?

Q: Go on.

K: I am going on. I want you to understand what I am saying, not just rattle along. This is not theory. Carefully listen. This is not theory, watch it, careful, listen to this, it is not theory, what I am saying. You can test it. Theory you can't test. But this you can test in your life.

So it needs security. Right? Do you see that? And it has one security in the world - knowledge, information, job, technological capacity. There it is completely safe. And that same movement of searching for safety has spilled over into the psychological field. It says: I am safe as long as I have got a name, as long as I feel I am this or that, I feel safe. That is, the brain has created an image about itself. There it feels completely safe. Right? I wonder if you see this. Psychologically, that is, inwardly, is there safety at all? You may believe in something. That belief may be questioned, therefore there is uncertainty and so on. So we are saying, is there security in your psychological world, in your world, inside world? Is there security in your gods, in our theories, in your going to the temple every other day, or whatever you do, puja and all the rest of it, is there security? Be tremendously honest about this. And when you say, I am angry, I will achieve a state of mind which will never be angry. Watch it. You have projected an idea and in the future you will not be angry. Therefore, in the future you are seeking security. You understand the subtleties of all this? You understand all this, sir, the subtleties?

So we are saying: register only what is necessary - language, technological information, and don't register anything else, your hurts, your attachments. You follow? Is that possible? First see the problem, don't say, yes, or no. Because I will show you, if we go into it that one can do it.

I am asking, why should the brain register your hurts? You understand, I started with that, you are hurt from childhood, why should that brain register that hurt at all? Is it possible not to register your hurt? Is it possible not to register this tremendous attachment - attachment to your wife, to your house, to your gods, to your theories? Attachment, being attached. And that attachment is a pressure and therefore it is damaging your brain. Please understand why it is necessary to have a brain that is not deformed, because in meditation any form of distortion, any form which is pressure, prevents the clarity of perception of truth. If you want to meditate, the brain must be free of all registration except that which is absolutely necessary, otherwise it is damaged. Therefore a man, a woman, who really wants to go into this tremendous question of meditation, the full meaning of it, the depth of it, the beauty of it, the greatness of it, the timeless quality of it, must understand the whole nature of thought. So is it possible not to register your hurts, your desires, your longings? It is possible only when you know the art - the art, when you learn the art of observation. The word 'art' means to put everything in its proper place - the true meaning of that word, the dictionary meaning, from Latin, Greek and so on. That is to put everything in its right place. Then you have order. If you put everything, you put your socks, your shirts, your trousers, your ties, your saris, or whatever it is, in the right place, there is not need for searching, wasting your energy, everything is in order. Similarly, to learn the art of observation, to learn the art of observation, to register and not to register, I wonder if you to capture this. Now we are registering everything, therefore, the brain is overburdened, damaged, deformed, and it cannot think logically, clearly, sanely.

To observe, to see. To observe, it is again very simple: when you observe you must have clear eyes. To look at the trees you must have unclouded eyes. You may have to wear glasses, but it makes your eyes see clearly. So to observe the outward things of life. Right? How the world is divided, why it is divided, the Hindu against the Muslim, the Muslim against somebody else. You follow? To observe all the facts, what is actually happening, which does not demand theories, but it requires that you observe. So from observing the outer you come to observe the inner. But if you do not know how to observe the outer, you have no criterion to see if you are observing correctly in yourself. You understand how important it is to start observing the outer and from the outer moving to the inner. Not moving suddenly to the inner, because you will misjudge.

So, one must learn the art of looking, observing. You cannot observe what is happening actually in the world if you are attached to one particular part of that world. If I am attached to this country saying, I am a Hindu, I am proud of being a Hindu, I am ancient, all that, if I am attached to that, I cannot possibly observe the division that is going on in the world - the Arab, the Jew, the Communists, the Socialists and so on and so on. So, to learn to observe without personal distortion entering into the factor? Can you do it? That requires tremendous alertness, watching. Observe what is going on inwardly, what is actually going on. This becomes extraordinarily interesting. Can you watch, can you observe inwardly what actually is happening, actually at the moment of happening? Not after the event. That is, to observe my violence - violence in different forms. I won't go into that, we will discuss it much more in detail tomorrow. That is, to observe that which is actually taking place, which is at the moment of anger to observe it; not after, or train your mind so carefully that you watch before it happens; but actually as it is flowering, beginning to grow, the actual movement of it. Which demands a mind, a brain that is not caught in the past, which is not a slave to words, which is violence. That very word is a distorting factor, and therefore when you observe with that word, you have already distorted. You understand how subtle it is? So to learn the art of it, therefore, you are watching the movement which is out of time. So the brain is capable of observing without distortion.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC TALK 25TH DECEMBER 1977

I wonder why you are all here. I really do wonder. We are talking about something which is very, very serious, which demands not only a capacity to think clearly, but it demands that you give your life to it, your heart, your brain, your whole outlook on life. Unless one is very, very serious, in the right sense of that word, one really doesn't live a life at all. One becomes rather flippant. Flippancy has its own place, but when you are all here, so many of you, one wonders how serious you are. And we accept things as they are - politically, perhaps a little more slightly revolutionary, politically, economically we hope things will stabilize themselves. And spiritually - if I may use that word, which is rather an ugly word, because it has been so misused, spiritually, morally when one looks around, there is so much hypocrisy, so much playing a double game, saying one thing and doing something entirely different. The modern 20th century is technologically, tremendously advanced. You are advancing with it, technologically, but at the same time you go to the temples, do puja, do all those absurd things that have no meaning at all. So we kind of play a game, I don't know with whom, but we are playing a kind of game. One wonders how serious, how tremendously honest one is; not honest to some ideal, to some concept, to some theory, but an integrity, an integrity that is inviolable, that does not change according to circumstances.

So I ask, and you must also ask yourself, why one is here. I know why the speaker is here. He feels as he has travelled all over the world for the last fifty years, and more, that human beings change very little, psychologically. There is a vast technological revolution going on, of which we have no concept whatsoever. But there is tremendous technological advancement, which may, if we are not very alert and careful, destroy us. And being technologically advanced, morally, ethically, deep down in our heart, we remain as we are - slight modifications here and there, going from one guru, perhaps to another guru, doing all kinds of absurd things, hoping by some miracle to bring about a moral, ethical, a deep, profound religious transformation. That is why we are asking how serious one is, because we are talking about communicating with each other, about something that you give great attention, care, affection, love.

We were talking about what it is to live a religious life, that is the basis of all these conversations, dialogues, meetings here, whether it is possible for human beings like you and a million others, whether it is possible to free oneself from all conditioning and not belong to any group, any sect, any particular religion, because all religions have lost their meaning. And to come upon, to investigate a way of life, which is neither Hindu, Buddhist, American, Christian or Communist, but a way of life that is profoundly, deeply religious, and so it affects all activities, all our thinking, all our ways of life. That is what we are concerned with. And if you are serious, and I hope you are, deeply, not superficially, then we can go on with what we were talking about yesterday. If I may I will repeat, somewhat briefly, what we talked about yesterday evening.

We were saying that each human being, you, represent all humanity, psychologically. You may have fair skin, dark skin, black, be educated, have jobs but basically, deeply, you are like other human beings - in sorrow, in misery, in confusion, frightened to face the unknown, death and so on. This is the common factor of all of us. So you, as a human being, are the representative of all humanity, which is an absolute, irrevocable fact. And so you are the world and the world is you. And if there is a fundamental transformation in the whole structure and nature of consciousness, in those who are willing to listen and learn, then it affects the whole of mankind. Which is again a fact. I do not know if you have not noticed how one person affects the rest of mankind. He may be evil and such a person does affect the rest of mankind. Hitler, Stalin, and all the ugly people that have lived in the world brutally, we are all affected by them, as we are affected somewhat by the good.

So what we are trying to do in these talks and discussions is to communicate with each other and find out for ourselves whether it is at all possible to bring about deep psychological revolution. Mankind has tried various kinds of institutions and organizations to change man. Communism has been one of them, Capitalism, Socialism, various forms of organizations and institutions, through compulsion, through tyranny, through reward and punishment. But none of them have solved the question of poverty, peace, war. We need a totally different kind of mind to solve the poverty of this country; not a political solution or economic adjustments and so on, but a totally different kind of mind which is a global mind, not a Hindu mind or a Christian mind, or a Communist mind, but a mind that understands the whole implications of man, the totality of man, not his mere biological existence, but the psychological understanding of himself, the totality of the man, totality of a human being. This requires a different kind of mind and it is only such a mind that is going to solve all our economic, social and political problems, not new theories, new way, new communism, or eurocommunism and all the rest of it.

So we are going to talk over together what we said yesterday. That is, the brain, your brain, is under constant pressure, the pressure of tradition, the pressure of education, the pressure that exists in relationship, between man and woman; the pressure - economic, social, environmental pressure. Every form of pressure does affect the brain. You can watch this for yourself. If you watch yourself, you can see any pressure - and we are being subjected to innumerable pressures, all the religious pressures - pressure does distort, deform the mind, the brain, and so the whole of consciousness. That is, the brain, consciousness and the mind: it is really one movement, not three separate activities going on. The brain registers, cultivates memory, from that memory there is response as thought, and thought has put together innumerable factors psychologically, which becomes our consciousness. And the mind is the part of that. So, the totality of human existence, human beings, that is what we are talking about, not merely consciousness, not merely the activity of the brain, not merely the separate thing called as mind. It is all one unit, separated for convenience but actually one movement of the pressure of thought. Please don't agree with what the speaker is saying. That would be really too bad. Then we destroy our relationship. Then we can't commune with each other, we can't have a conversation, a dialogue together. I am only sitting on a platform because it is convenient for you to see the speaker and for the speaker to see you. But that little height doesn't give him any authority, and I really mean it.

So, together, and I mean together, we are going to investigate into this problem of how to bring about a fundamental revolution in the psyche. That's the basis of our conversation. And we must communicate, we must use ordinary language, no special language, ordinary daily usage of English. Perhaps some of you speak French, or Italian, then that's a different matter. We are speaking English so that you and I understand that language, probably we all speak English.

So we are investigating together into this question whether the brain which has been so damaged through pressure, through the pressure of propaganda, environmental pressure, religious pressure, economic pressure, the pressure of all the gurus that exist in the world telling you what to do, what not to do, how to meditate, what not to meditate, and all the absurd things that are going on, levitation and so on. All that is pouring great pressure on your mind. One may be conscious or unconscious of it. Now we are trying together to bring it into the open, to bring about an awareness of these pressures. Right? Are we meeting each other? Because to me this is very, very important to have a brain, and therefore a consciousness, which is not contaminated by time, not perverted or deformed through various disciplines, various relationships between human beings and so on.

So we are going to enquire together into this question. Enquiry, investigation implies there is no investigator, only investigation. If you as a Hindu, or a something or other, examine, your examination will be coloured by your prejudice, by your lust. So we are only investigating, there is no investigator. I hope you understand this question. Do you? You are not investigating, there is only you and I examining. You know, a first-class scientist, a really good scientist, not one of those people who are employed by the government, but really a first-class scientist is concerned with observation, not whether he has got a Noble prize, or this or that, but he is just concerned to observe through the microscope, see what is actually going on. We must be like that because we are investigating into something that demands a mind that is free to look, a mind that is only concerned with what it sees; not tell what it sees, what it should be. So, there is only investigation and not an investigator. So we move from there.

We said yesterday one must learn the art of observation. I am not teaching you, you are not my disciples, I am not your guru, which would be terrible, most destructive. But together we are looking. Is it possible to observe without prejudice? Go into it yourself. To observe the tree, your wife or your girl friend, your neighbour, and so yourself without any prejudice, without any conclusion? Please listen to this, do it as we are talking. We are investigating together, we are walking together. We are walking together on the same road, with the same speed, with the same intensity. So, to learn the art of observation implies that which is observing is free, free from all you Hinduism, otherwise, what you see will be distorted by your conclusion, by your beliefs, by your ideas. This is logic, this is reason, this is sanity. If I want to look at you, understand you, I mustn't have all my prejudices. So in the same way, to observe without any form of previous conclusions. Can you do it? Without any prejudice, without any thought for a conclusion. You understand? To come to it fresh, otherwise you can't see. This is simple, isn't it? So logical, so reasonable, so sane.

So if you can do that, then we can examine the content of that, then you can examine the content of consciousness, the content, the various things that thought has cultivated and put together which becomes consciousness. The word 'conscious' means to be conscious of, to be aware of, to understand, to have an outlook that is whole. So first let's be clear on this point. That is, consciousness is made up of its content. Your consciousness is made up of your beliefs, your prejudices, your opinions, whether you are Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, Communist, Socialist, left, right or centrist and so on. And also it is made up of your fears, your beliefs, your daily rituals, the pleasures, both sexual, sensory and other forms of pleasure; and also sorrow, the fear of death and living in a world of illusion. All the gods are all illusions put together by thought. So all that is your consciousness. Right? Don't agree with me, just see the fact. That is, if you are a lawyer, you have spent years and years and years of studying law and so on, so that is part of your consciousness. If you are an engineer, that is part of your consciousness. If you follow somebody, that's part of your consciousness. So the content makes consciousness. If you had no content, if you had no fear, if you had no sorrows, no belief, no sectarian, narrow outlook, if you had none of these things, what is your consciousness? Have you a consciousness, if the whole content is emptied? You may have a totally different kind of outlook, different kind of dimension of consciousness, but what is actual is what is its content. Right? Do we see this together? Do you? No? Not quite. All right. We'll have to go into it again.

When you examine your being, your self, what you are, what are you? You understand my question? A name, a form, tall, short, this or that, physiologically. Psychologically you are all the things that are - culture, education, environment, the parent, all that you are, aren't you? Your belief in Christianity, belief and so on, all that is what you are. Right? But you may think that there is in you some supreme light. But that is still part of your thinking. Right? So you are the result of the past, the result of time, the result of all the prejudices, hopes, fears, anxieties, all that you are. So your consciousness is all that. You are not separate from your consciousness. You are that. Is this clear now, somewhat? We can go very deeply into it, but at least let's understand each other verbally.

We are concerned with the observation of the content of your consciousness. Right? The content. Can you observe the content? One of the contents is violence. Human beings are by nature violent. That may be the result of the evolution, from the animal and so on and so on, the result of all that is that you are violent. Now we are going to observe violence, observe it. Is it possible to change violence without bringing about another pressure on the brain? That is, the pressure on the brain is one form of violence, violence in the sense get angry, hate people, jealous. And violence also means physical violence. That has been the result - if you want to go very deeply into this question of violence - that has been the result of self-centred activity. Right? When you are thinking about yourself, when you are concerned about yourself, your advancement spiritually, your advancement economically and so on, you are so deeply concerned about yourself, aren't you? Right?

Aren't you? Don't be ashamed of it, it is an ordinary fact. Now this self-centred activity brings about a resistance, pushes everybody away from yourself. Right? May we proceed? So from that results, when you are completely enclosed, and being tremendously concerned about yourself, any response from the outside to break up that enclosure is an act of violence. Right? Do you understand this? I won't go into the deeper causes of it, which is, violence comes into being when there is conformity, violence comes into being when you are imitative, when there is comparison. All these are attributive factors of violence. We can go on and analyze it much much, that's good enough. Now, can you observe that violence without putting another pressure on the brain? You follow what I am saying? I wonder if you understand what I am saying.

Look sir, one is violent. The tradition has said: control it, suppress it, analyze it, take time over it. All these factors have been a kind of pressure on the brain, to control violence or practise non-violence, which is, of course, sheer nonsense. So the tradition has said, control. Let's keep to that one word for the moment. And the brain has been pressurized to control, trained, educated, it lives in the culture which says: control. So that is a pressure, isn't it? Be clear on this point. It is a form of pressure on the brain.

Now, if you observe violence and try to bring about a change in it, that is another form of pressure. You understand now, you are understanding what I am saying? So to observe violence without any pressure, which is without control, without suppression, without running away from it? To run away from it is to practise, or cultivate non-violence, that is another escape from the fact. Can you observe - please, this is very important for you to understand - can you observe without any pressure of the tradition, without any pressure of what you would like, or dislike, just to observe? Then, if you so observe what is actually going on, then that very observation transforms what is being observed without any pressure. I wonder if you get this? Are you following? Do it, not verbal agreement. Any child can play that kind of game. To see your violence, to be aware of it. And the response to that is the whole activity of your educated tradition - say, I must control it, I must change it, I mustn't be violent, or excuse your violence, justify it, and so on and so on. So you are acting according to a brain that has been under the pressure of tradition, and therefore you respond naturally by suppressing it, controlling. Right? We are saying, observe without any pressure - the pressure being your tradition, your hoping to go beyond violence because it is one of your religious conditionings and so on, but just to observe.

Let me put it very, very simply - do you understand what I am talking about, some of you? To look without the movement of thought. Can you do it? Try it. Play with it. To observe the tree, the moon, stars, the clear beautiful nights - to observe without naming it, without saying 'What a beautiful evening!' because the moment you have said 'what a beautiful evening', the beauty has stopped. The moment you verbalize, you have moved into a different realm altogether. It is necessary to communicate it if you want to say to you friend what a lovely evening, but to observe the sunset without a single movement of word or thought. Please, I'll keep at this until you really understand this.

Then we can examine the content of your consciousness, one by one. Because unless there is radical transformation, man will go on the same way as he has gone on for the last millennia. So how do you observe? How do you observe your girl-friend or your wife or your husband? Have you ever asked that question? If you are married, or have a girl friend, have you ever asked that question, how you look at them? Right, sir, can we go into it? Do it together. How do you observe a human being? Do you observe him, or her, without the previous conclusions, understandings, recognitions? Do you understand what I am saying? Can you look at your girl friend, or wife - please do it - without saying, 'My wife'? Or associating that woman, or that man, with all the things that you have gathered - your sexual pleasures, the images of all that, the pictures, the excitement, all the sexual responses. Do you look at her, or him, that way? Go on, look at it. Or do you look at her or him with the images or pictures that you have built about her or him? Come on, sirs, watch it. Do you? So what happens? When you are looking at another, however intimate it may be, you are looking with the images, conclusions, ideas, that you have built about her or him. So, what is your relationship with that person then? Come on, sir, this is your life, this is what is happening in India. Because if you have this picture, cultivated through time, through days, months, through years, you are then living in a world of images, and therefore you lose all human contact. Right?

Therefore there is no love in that. Right? You are living in a world which is over, which is past with all the images, sexual pleasures and so on and you have no actual contact with that human being.

So, that is what has happened, when you observe another.

Therefore you have no direct relationship with another. Look, you are all sitting there and you are watching me. Why? Answer it yourself, why? Because you have accepted a reputation about this man, you have read something about him, you have found out how he lives and what he thinks and what he has done, this and that, ten different things. So, you have the pictures of this man talking. So you are really not looking at the man, but at the pictures you have created about the man. Right? Oh, be honest, for god's sake. So is that love? So what happens? Can you observe your wife or your girl friend, can you observe without any picture? Can you? You understand what I mean by picture, so I won't go into it. Can you observe as though you are meeting something for the first time? That is, the brain has got used to you, to each other. So you never look at anybody as though you are meeting him for the first time. Then there is immediate contact, immediate relationship. Now, can you observe this phenomenon without the movement of thought? Can you observe the speaker without all the things you have built round him? Which doesn't mean that you become indifferent, callous, or impolite. You observe something much deeper than the word. Now can you observe your violence without the pressure of tradition, control, or justifying it, just to observe it without any movement of thought. Then you will see, if you do that, that the thing that you are observing undergoes a radical change. I have discussed this point with some of the scientists, they have agreed that when you so observe in the scientific world, they see that which they are observing through the microscope is changing all the time. You understand, sir? Then if you can do that, then the brain is releasing itself from all the pressures. It is no longer functioning in tradition. Right? Are you doing it? Therefore one has to go into this question, as we did yesterday, of the nature of thinking.

What is the origin of thought? You all think a great deal, you read a great deal. And I am asking you a very simple question, which is the question is simple but to go into it demands a great deal of enquiry. Now what is the origin of thinking? And can you observe the arising of thought? These two things are very important to understand. You can observe the arising of anger, can't you? Can't you? No? Come on, sirs. You can see the movement of anger coming up, the response. In the same way, can you observe the arising of thought and the origin of thought? Because all our lives is spent in thinking. Right? That's obvious. Whatever you do demands thinking. But we have never asked, what is the beginning of it; and not only what is the beginning of it, but also the arising of thought, as the arising of anger. Right? Because you have to answer this question, because that may solve a great many problems. The origin of thought is the beginning of remembrance. Right? Just listen to it, don't agree, just listen it. You may never have given your thought to it, enquired. The origin of thinking, the first man, is when he had an incident, painful or pleasurable, and that has been registered in the brain. That is the origin of thought. Do you see this? It doesn't need that you read lots of books and go to lots of gurus and philosophers, it is very simple when you observe yourself. You had an incident a few days ago; that incident is registered in the brain, and that is the response of that registration which is memory and thought begins. Right? Is this simple, clear? There's nothing to agree to, it's a fact. Don't make a lot of ado about it. A very simple fact.

Now, the next question is: can you observe, after registering, the arising of thought? You register pain. You have been to a dentist, and he has hurt you, and that hurt has been registered. Now can you observe the arising of the memory of that pain, now? You follow what I am saying? You have had pain, you have been to the dentist a week ago, he has hurt you, and it has been registered, and can you observe the fear of that pain arising, the fear that it might come back, can you see the arising of that fear? Can you? This is important to understand because the arising of thought when there is an awareness of it, there is only thought, not the thinker who is thinking about the thought. This is a little bit difficult.

Traditionally we are used to the idea that the thinker, the experiencer, the analyzer is different from the analyzed, the thought, the experience. Right? Please understand this, give your attention to it. I hope you aren't too tired, are you? So there is the thinker and the thought. The thinker says, I'll control thought, I'll change thought, I will bring about a different way of thinking. So there is a division between the thinker and the thought. Right? Now how has this division arisen, and is it a reality? This is what we are used to: the thinker and the thought, the experiencer and the experience. Now why has this division existed, who has brought it about and is it an actuality?

Now first, is there a thinker if there is no thought? Go on, sir, answer this thing. If you don't think, there is no thinker. So the thought has made the thinker. Right? Because thought has said, the thinker is more permanent than me. Right? Because thought sees itself as being impermanent, changing, moving. But the thinker, which thought has put together, becomes a permanent entity, because in that permanency there is security. You are following all this? Right? There is this whole idea in this world that there is something superior - atman, god, anything you like - in each one. This is what you are all brought up on. And that thing has been put there by thought obviously. So thought recognizing itself as being impermanent, in a flux, creates a thinker who says, I know I am permanent, I am the past, I have got a tremendous accumulation of knowledge and I will say what thought should do. Are you following? Is that what you are actually doing?

So when you meditate, so-called traditional meditation, you are always trying to control thought. Do please be simple and acknowledge this. You are always trying to control thought, aren't you? Who is the controller? Is it some divine entity? The higher self? The higher monkey? You never even question it, you never even find out, you accept it. So the controller, which is me, you, then tries to control thought and the battle is on - fighting, fighting, fighting for the rest of your life to control thought. But if you see the fact, the actual, that thought is the thinker, and the thinker is the thought, then the whole relationship changes. Right? You understand this? Right?

Look: I am greedy, suppose. I am greedy. Traditionally, culturally, I have been educated not to be greedy. I am just taking that very lightly. You must not be greedy. My background, my culture says, don't be greedy, but I am greedy. So there is a contradiction going on all the time inside me. Right? I am greedy but yet I am trying not to be greedy. So the entity, the thinker, says, I must control greed - is the controller different from greed itself? Are you following all this? They are both the same, aren't they? What kind of game are you playing? So you are never free of greed, you are always battling with greed.

So if one learns the art of observation, the observer is the observed. Right? You don't see that. Is anger different from you? At the moment of anger there is no you, is there? There is just this reaction called anger. Right? A second later you say, I have been angry. So the 'I' is supposed to be different from anger. Right? Oh, come on. Whereas if you see you are anger, not that you are different from anger, then if you can observe that movement, that you are not different from the thing you are observing, the observer is the observed, if you can see the truth of that, conflict comes to an end. You understand?

Because as I said, our tradition has said: control, suppress, run away and the brain has been pressurized to this conditioning, so, it is damaged. It is always responding according to the pattern, the pattern which has been brought about through pressure. Now if you do the same thing again, you are increasing the pressure, whereas if you recognize the pressure, see what it has done and therefore observe without any pressure, that which is observed undergoes a fundamental change. At least intellectually understand this. That's good enough for the time being. But if you really go into it very deeply and see this thing, then you will see that you can bring about a fundamental change without any effort. Effort implies pressure, and we are so used to change under pressure - the pressure may be reward and punishment. So, we are saying, in learning the art of observation, you will find there is no pressure and therefore no effort, and therefore the thing that is observed, like violence, undergoes fundamental change. It has transformed itself totally.

MADRAS 1ST DIALOGUE 27TH DECEMBER 1977

K: Is it possible to have a dialogue, which means a conversation between two people? That is not possible because there are so many of us. So how shall we communicate with each other about things that apparently, or seriously concern our lives? So since you have taken the trouble to come so early in the morning, what can we talk over together that has real significance in one's life. Not some theory, not some abstract subject, but actually concerns our daily living, our daily relationship with each other, our sorrows, affections, and pains, and anxieties, amongst all these things what shall we talk over together?

Q: Often I am subjected to insults and feel really hurt. And you were kind enough to say that an innocent mind is incapable of hurt, but I cannot understand innocent.

K: You are often subjected to painful things in life and you don't understand what it means to be innocent. Is that it?

Q: What is the difference between sleep and meditation? Can sleep be converted into meditation?

K: Lovely questions!

Q: One question more, sir. Seeing the content of the consciousness is not the emptying of the consciousness? And if it is so why has not the essence come into being?

K: Seeing the content of one's consciousness, doesn't that very observation empty consciousness. Right? Yes, sir?

Q: In the life of the usual man there is dilemma in the form of 'I', the separative self-sense. Its dominant activity in consciousness serves to contract everything else in consciousness, or severely distort it, most unfortunately the heart, the metaphorical heart. It seems to me that traditional methods have failed, and theories have failed to bring about a lasting release of this contraction, or dilemma because they are in themselves only contracted. My question then is, sir, can we this morning find some movement, some natural event in consciousness to bring about the cessation of that thought, or thinking, which is the separative self-sense?

K: You have all heard the question, so I don't have to repeat it. Is it possible - if I understand the questioner - to eliminate the self which is brought about by thought, and live or be at a different dimension of consciousness. Isn't that right, sir?

Q: Yes.

K: Do you want to discuss that?

Q: Sir, what do you mean by pursue thought to the very end?

K: Sir, forget what I mean, because it's your life, not my life. How do you live your life, what does it mean? You have a number of years to live in which there are so many complications - jobs, pressure of overpopulation, all the vulgarity, the noise, the brutality that is going on in the world - what is your life. Instead of talking about meditation and all that - we will come to that - but first shouldn't we understand our daily life, what it means, why we live the way we are living. Aren't you interested in that?

Q: We are fed up with up daily life.

K: We are fed up with our daily life.

Q: Sir, I want to know a how to prevent the problem of poverty.

K: The problem of poverty, with all its degradation and so on. Is that what you are really concerned about?

Q: Poverty.

K: Sir, what you are really concerned about?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I would like, if you don't mind, I would like to put you the question, and please be good enough to answer it.

Q: It seems to me...

K: Wait, sir. Let me first ask you something sir. I am not preventing you from asking questions but first may I ask you something. What are you, each one of you sitting here, concerned about? Seriously. What are you concerned about?

Q: With my life.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking you something and you are answering something else. Would you kindly listen and find out what I am asking. You may be full of your own questions, but first please kindly listen. What are you concerned about - your life, not poverty, this and that, what are you concerned in your daily life?

Q: My own happiness.

K: Are you concerned about it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just listen sir, and find out, don't be clever and just answer anything that comes into your minds. What are you concerned about if you look into yourself, and ask this question, what are you concerned about?

Q: What is the purpose of life?

Q: I think we are only concerned about ourselves primarily.

K: The questioner says he is concerned primarily about himself. Is that a fact? Could we start from that? No? Aren't you all concerned about yourself?

Q: There are a number of pressures on the brain...

K: Sir, just a minute, sir. It is the most extraordinary audience. I am asking you something very seriously, and apparently you don't take my question very seriously. I am asking you what is your daily concern in your life. Is it that you want more money?

Q: Well...

K: Just listen, sir. Listen to somebody, what he has to say first.

Q: Mental peace.

K: He wants mental peace. Is that your concern?

Q: I am not concerned about that for the time being.

(General discussion amongst audience)

K: I wonder why you have come this morning. You must have got up rather early, taken the trouble to come here, and apparently you just go on talking to yourself. So please would you kindly listen, try to find out what I am asking you. What is in your daily life, going to a factory, office, business, law, and so on, what is your chief concern in your daily living? Just think about it, don't answer it immediately. What's your chief concern?

Q: Relationship.

K: Don't invent something, sir. Apparently it is one of the most difficult things for you to pin down and find out what you are deeply concerned with in your daily life. Is it sex? Is it money? Is it relationship? Is it that you are unhappy? Is it that around you there is so much poverty, so much degradation? And are you concerned with searching, or trying to find out what truth is? What are you concerned about?

Q: A sense of reality.

K: I wonder why you come here at all really. You are not answering my questions at all.

Q: I am concerned with my life.

K: Concerned with your life, yes. What do you mean by that?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Find out what he means. Your life, what does it mean? Your daily life.

Q: I am concerned with dharma, duty.

Q: The lack of love is difficult in the human.

K: Is that your problem, sir?

Q: It is the lack of love.

K: No, your problem.

Q: Lack of love.

K: Just a minute, sir. Wait, sir. You have made a statement. If you want to sit here and talk to the audience, come and sit here, sir. Apparently you have never asked that question of yourself: what is my/your deep problem while you are living in this world, what is your problem? One says it is lack of love, somebody says lack of relationship. Any old thing you trot out, but you have never said and looked at yourself to find out what it is you are deeply concerned with. Are you concerned with death? Are you concerned with living a life that is righteous, that is honest, that is sane? What are you concerned about? Just carry on as you are?

Q: Sir, I feel I am concerned with sorrow.

K: You are concerned with sorrow, and is it possible to be free of it. Is that it? Are you really? Would you answer that question: are you concerned with sorrow, all of you?

Q: Yes.

K: Don't say, yes quickly.

Q: No, sir, we are not concerned with sorrow all the time, while we are sitting here. But there is a lot of misery everywhere. All the time everyone is seeking pleasure.

K: Sir, don't read you question, please.

(General discussion amongst the audience)

K: Sir, would you mind, talk amongst yourselves, get over it, and I'll wait. Talk over with yourself, with your friend, and look all around, who is here, and then answer my question after you have talked to your friends and looked to see who is here, and find out what you really want to find out. Why are you here, sir? Why are you here? Would you kindly answer me, it's simple enough. Why are you sitting here, so early in the morning, having taken all the trouble, why?

Q: I recognize the whole movement of my life is distorted, not truthful, not real.

K: Yes, sir. So the questioner says, I see my whole life is distorted, dishonest and I'd like to lead a life which is correct, which is honest. Is that right, sir?

Q: That is correct.

K: Is that what you are all interested in?

Audience: Yes, sir.

K: No, don't laugh, sir, for god's sake, what is there to laugh at.

Q: We are coming here to learn.

K: Sir, please, just listen, sirs. Don't you know that one leads a terribly hypocritical life: say one thing and do another, go to temples and cheat somebody, talk about god, this, that and the other, take vows and go to Tirupati, or some awful little temple and lead an ugly, brutal, daily violent life, that is contradictory, that is a way of hypocrisy. Are you aware of this? Don't you know this is happening in your life daily? You read the Gita, or the Upanishads, repeat mantras, and do puja, and the next minute go down the street and kill somebody, violent, spit, class divisions. Don't you know all this? So there is contradiction in your life, isn't there? Right, sir? Which means unless you lead an integrated life you live a life of hypocrisy. So can we talk about that?

You see how silent you are when it comes to real brass tacks, when you are really concerned with a way of living in which one's life is a hypocritical life, a contradictory life. Shall we discuss that? Sir, if you discuss with me, don't pretend, don't try to slur over, cover up your ugly life. We are going into it if you want to find out how to live a life that is whole, that's not broken up, that's not hypocritical.

Sir, don't take notes please. Please don't take notes, then you can't listen. You can't listen and take notes. So if you don't mind, either take notes or don't listen and go out.

We know, as that gentleman pointed out, that one leads a very dishonest life. That one has contradictions in oneself. We know this, don't we, sir? No? So can we start from there?

Q: Start there.

K: We are starting from there. First, are you aware, just conscious that you lead a double life? You understand? Are you aware of it?

Q: Yes but I don't...

K: Sir, may I ask you - don't duck your head sir - may I ask you why you are sitting there and asking these questions? Are you interested in what we are talking about? Be serious, don't be flippant. Are you?

(General discussion amongst the audience)

K: Sir, I am asking you to kindly listen to what I am asking, and enquiring. Does one know, do you know that you lead a double life, a contradictory life, a hypocritical life?

Q: Many of us know.

K: All right, if you know what will you do about it? Just put up with it, carry on everyday leading a double life like this?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand, sir. So what will you do, sir, if you know that you lead a hypocritical life, what will you do about it? Just talk about it? Don't you want to break it, live a different way of life? Do you? I am asking a simple question. Please, does one know first that one leads a double life, say one thing, do another, think something and do quite the opposite. That way of living is a hypocritical way of living, isn't it, sir? Now, that way of life brings a lot of problems, doesn't it.

Q: Actually I do understand, but I don't understand that I am a hypocrite, although I can see it intellectually.

K: Intellectually, the gentleman says, I see my way of life is hypocritical, my way of life is distorted, confused - intellectually. Now what do you mean by that word 'intellectually'? Verbally?

Q: I see what you say but when I am involved I just react.

K: I understand this. I am asking you, you use the word 'intellectual', what do you mean by that word? I intellectually understand that there should be brotherhood - intellectually. But actually, in daily life you contradict that. Now when you say, I understand intellectually, you mean you understand verbally what is being said. Right? You don't feel it, you don't live it, you have an idea and you accept that idea and say, yes, that's a marvellous idea. Is that what you are all doing? That you verbally accept certain facts, but actually you have no relationship to it at all. You just repeat the words and live quite differently. Are you aware of this? Do you know this? Put on whatever you do, puja, which has no meaning, but carry on.

Q: That is so.

K: Right. If that is what is happening, what shall we do? Don't you want to break that pattern - a pattern of hypocrisy. How do you break it? You understand? All your tradition says, carry on. Right? Carry on, go to temples, do puja, it doesn't matter what kind of life you lead daily. So we are now reversing the process and saying: look, what matters is how you live daily. Right? So are you serious enough to be concerned with your daily life? Are you seriously concerned in the change of your daily, miserable, contradictory, hypocritical life? Then if we are, then we can discuss, then we can go into it, help each other to break down. But if you are not interested then it becomes very difficult. So I want to be quite sure that you are really interested in what we are talking about, which that gentleman raised. He said, my life is distorted, untrue, not straight, and I would like to change the pattern of that so that I lead a life that is true, that has no sense of contradiction, that is whole. Isn't that right, sir?

Q: Correct.

K: So can we go into that. Please, can we all of us go into this?

Q: Yes.

K: Don't casually agree, but find out if you really deeply want to go into this problem because it means changing your whole life. If you say, I want to live the way I am living, complete callousness, brutality, indifference, without any affection, hypocritical, then you are perfectly welcome to live that way. I am not saying you shouldn't. It's up to you. But if you want to find out a way of living in which there is no contradiction, which is not hypocritical, which is whole, then it's worthwhile talking about it. We will help each other. Right, sirs? Is this what you want? Is this what you want, sirs and ladies, to find out a way of living that is not contradictory, opposing, hypocritical, honest, a true way of living - do you want to find out? What do you say, sirs?

Q: Yes, we do.

K: Right. Why is there in our life contradiction? Why is there contradiction? In your life, sir, why is there contradiction? Please tell me.

Q: It is the experience we live.

K: Sir, would you kindly listen. I said, why is there in one's life a contradiction.

Q: Because we listen to other people, then we get confused.

Q: Because we apply the teachings.

K: Because you apply my teachings? What the dickens are you talking about? Sir, just look at yourself. Why do you say one thing and do another? Very simple, keep it at its simplest level. Why is there this contradiction, opposing desires? Right? Opposing wants, opposing purposes, why? Why is there this division in one's life? Think, watch it, find out, not from me, find out, we will help each other.

Q: The brain and mind are in conflict.

Q: Possibly because we have desires, and at the same time we have an idea that we should not have desires.

K: You understand, sir, you want something and you fight against it. I am asking you, why do you fight? Why do you have an opposite desire? If we could understand this one thing then perhaps it would clear up a great deal. You know what desire is, don't you. Don't you, sirs, you know what desire is? Wanting a shirt, wanting a car, wanting a woman, wanting pleasure, wanting to have better position in the world - desire. You understand, desire. Now, please listen: how does desire arise? Not for a car, or for good clothes, desire itself, how does it arise?

Q: Fear.

K: No, no, please. Desire, sir. I want a better house, more money, better wife, or god knows what else - desire, desire. Right, you know this, don't you. So I am not asking the objects of desire, but what is the source of desire?

Q: Could it be thought?

Q: Comparison.

K: Yes, comparison. Compare your little car with a bigger car, your little house with a bigger house, comparison. That is not what I am asking, if you will forgive me. I am asking, how does desire arise itself, not for a something, not for a big house, but the desire. What is the beginning of desire?

Q: A mental image, a thought.

K: You haven't even listened, sir.

Q: The search for happiness.

(General discussion amongst audience)

K: Look, sir. Finish all your... and then let's come back. You have stated all that you want to say, now let's come back and find out how desire arises. This is - please be good enough to listen - this is very important to find out, then you will know how to deal with it.

Q: There is something that you desire.

K: But sir, the origin, the beginning, how does desire - desire being wanting something, wanting or not wanting, this movement of desire - what is the origin, the beginning of desire?

Q: Thought.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's just the point, sir, I am trying to go into that. How does desire arise. Because unless you find out contradictory desires, then you battle with contradictory desires, but if you find out the beginning of desire then we can go into it further and deeply. Now I am going to go into it if you will kindly listen. You are ready to listen, you are not ready to find out. That's your culture, that's your training, that's your religious up-bringing - listen. You don't want to think for yourself but accept what other people say - Shankara, this person, that person, it doesn't matter, your pet guru. All that you are concerned with is, tell me what to do, not find out.

Q: It is sensation that brings desire.

K: Just a minute, sir, go slowly. We are trying to find out, enquire into the problem of desire, not the object of desire - woman, man, position - not the object of desire but desire itself, how it comes into being. I'll show it to you, and do it. You follow? There is nothing complicated about it.

Q: Sir?

K: Yes, sir?

Q: Does not the arising of desire happen simultaneously with the arising of time?

K: We will come to that, sir. First there is perception, isn't there? Seeing something, seeing a better house. Right? The seeing, then there is sensation - go slowly, do it, watch it. You see a car, you see a woman, you see a man in a big position, in authority and so on, you see that; from that there is sensation, then you touch it, contact. Seeing, contact, sensation. Right sir? Right? I see a car, touch it, like it, sensation; from sensation thought says, I like that, I want that. So please listen. Seeing, contact, sensation, then thought saying, I like that, I'd like to have more of it. So the whole process is: seeing, contact, sensation, desire. Right? That's very simple, you can watch it yourself. You see a nice house, then there is sensation, from that sensation identification with that object and you say, I would like to have it. Right, that's very clear. Right, sir?

Q: Can a blind man see?

K: A blind person doesn't see but he feels. You are not blind so please don't - you are not applying this to yourself, you run off to talk about a blind man. A blind man may not see but he touches, from the touching he has sensation, from sensation the feeling of like and dislike and all the rest of it, desire. So desire arises, seeing, perception, contact, sensation, then thought comes in and says, I like, I don't like and so on and so on. Have you got this simple fact?

Now why is there an opposing desire? You understand my question? Is desire in itself contradictory? Please think about it for a little. You see how desire arises, why is there a contradictory desire, opposing desire? Answer me, all of you.

Q: The difference in...

K: No, I am asking, sir, first listen to find out. We understand the nature of desire. I am asking a very simple further question: why is there an opposing desire? Wait, listen. And is desire in itself contradictory? Or the objects of desire vary, desire is not contradictory in itself but the objects of desire vary. You understand my question? That is, I see a car, I see a woman, I see a man in a good position, power and so on, so the objects vary. But desire itself doesn't vary, it is desire. Right, sir? So the contradiction exists with comparison, change of objects, one is more attractive than the other, but it is desire. So desire in itself is not contradictory. Is this too much? Do you understand this, sir? Discover this extraordinary fact that desire in itself is not contradictory. Desire can never be contradictory, but the objects can be contradictory. Right? Is this clear?

Q: Not clear.

K: Are you saying this is not clear? There is a fundamental thing that one has to understand that desire in itself is never contradictory. That's a marvellous thing to discover for yourself.

Q: Sir, perhaps if you would explain not the power of desire but the 'why', perhaps it would be clearer.

K: Why?

Q: Yes, the 'why' of desire, not the 'how'.

K: The 'why' of desire. That's our whole nervous organism, everything is geared to sensation, sensory perceptions, and from sensory perceptions desire arises. We went into that.

Q: It makes no sense to me, what you say. I'm sorry. I cannot put that together logically. There is some other element that I cannot touch.

K: No, there is no other element, sir. You see, don't you, you see a big house - let's take that. From that there is sensation, isn't there, the seeing, there is sensation, a natural sensation, like putting a pin in your leg it hurts. So there is seeing, sensation. Right? Then there is contact, either you touch it, or sensory touch it, then from that desire arises when thought says, I'd like to have that.

Q: Why does thought say that?

K: Why - because all our education, all our conditioning is to identify ourselves with what we want. Right? I want that big house. So desire is identification with the object of desire. The object of desire, there is nothing complicated, there is nothing that is not logical.

Q: Sir, in the child who has not yet been fully conditioned into the desire for a car or a house, or any of that business, there is still the activity of desire.

K: Of course, sir.

Q: How does it arise?

K: The activity of desire is immediately you give a toy to the child and the child possesses it, 'It's mine', and he will fight for it. This is very simple, sir, don't elaborate a simple thing more and more. There is seeing, contact, sensation. Right? From sensation there is the image-building, if you want to go much more deeply into it. The image of a big house and the identification by thought with that big house, is the whole movement of desire.

Now I am saying desire in itself is not contradictory. One has been told that to achieve god or enlightenment, or whatever it is, bliss, or whatever you want, you must become a sannyasi, renounce the world and follow a narrow path. But that is an idea, a concept, a thing which has been put forward and tradition says that's the way to achieve god, or whatever it is. But you have other desires. Right? You have sexual desires, you have desires for money, position, and so on. So there is contradiction. Right, you follow this? To serve god you must become a sannyasi, but your daily life is much stronger than the other, so you have a contradiction. Right? Now why do you have the image or the picture of a sannyasi? That is, a monk can only achieve the godhead, why? Why do you accept it? It may be totally wrong. Right? Why do you accept it?

Q: It is a reasonable thing.

K: Sir, look, look: the ideal of a sannyasi is non-existent. What is factual is your daily desire, not to serve god you must become that. That may be totally wrong, probably it is. So you have to say, first I will only deal with the fact, the actual, not the supposed way of living. The actual is one is burnt up with desire. Right? Therefore deal with that and not with the other. The other makes you a contradiction. I don't know if you follow this.

Sir, look, I'll explain. Tradition in India has established for thousands of years that to find enlightenment, to find god, to find whatever it is they promise, you must become a sannyasi, that is, renounce the world. Right?

(General discussion amongst the audience)

K: The tradition says this, sir, I am not saying it. Tradition says this. Now that has been established. But human beings are devoured by desire. Which is the fact, which is the actual?

Q: We are full of desire.

K: That is the fact and not the other. So you have invented something opposite from your daily life and therefore there is a contradiction. Whereas if you say, look, I am only concerned with desire and all the implications of it, dealing with facts, then there is no contradiction at all. I wonder if you see this. Have you understood this simple thing, sir? Look sir, suppose I am violent, angry, jealous, full of hatred and all the rest of it, now why can't I deal with that without having the opposite of it? You understand my question, sir? I am violent but all of you, including the gurus and the mahatmas say, live a way of life which is non-violent. The way of non-violence is fictitious, it is not real. What is real, actual, is I am violent. Right? I have to deal with that, not with non-violence. But your whole tradition says, deal with a fictitious non-violence. I wonder if you understand this? That's simple, sir, isn't it? So you have eliminated the contradiction. So you are only dealing then with facts. That is, I am violent. I am violent. Therefore my mind is free of the opposite because I am only dealing with what actually is going on, not with supposed non-violence, which is nonsense. You follow? So I have eliminated contradiction. I wonder if you see this.

Do you see this, sirs? If we are dealing with what is actually going on then there is no contradiction. Suppose I have cancer, and the doctor says, the surgeon says, you must be operated, but I am frightened, I hesitate and I talk. But the surgeon says, my dear chap you have to have it, you go on the table tomorrow, otherwise it will be the worse for you. I accept the fact. But if I live in a world of non-fact, as most of you do, then there is contradiction. As most of you live in a world of ideas and not with facts there is contradiction. I wonder if you see this. A simple fact. Right sir? Can you eliminate all ideals, which are fictitious, which are not real?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand all that. I am asking you something different, would you kindly listen. Which is, eliminate that which is not factual, actual. Ideals are not actual. Right? This is obvious, isn't it, sir? Non-violence is not actual, it is an ideal opposed to violence. Right? Right, sirs? So if you had no ideals but only facts, you are only dealing with facts, then there is no contradiction. I wonder if you see this. I'll show it to you, sir.

I am violent - suppose I am - suppose I am violent. I have been told, my culture, my tradition, all the people have said, try to be non-violent. That is the ideal. So I have been conditioned to that. Which is, there is contradiction between what is happening, which is I am violent, and the ideal of non-violence. And I see that very clearly, so I say to myself, I have to deal with facts, not with ideals. So I put away all ideals and only deal with facts, which is the actual sense of violence. You follow? I have eliminated altogether a thing which brings about contradiction. Therefore I am dealing only with facts, which what is actually happening. That is, the actual happening is that a reaction has come into me which I have named as violence. I wonder if you are following this? There is a reaction. You have called me a fool and my reaction is to get annoyed. But my conditioning says, suppress it, go beyond it, control it. Which is the ideal interfering with the fact. I wonder if you see that.

So I see very clearly that any form of interference of ideals distorts, or makes me escape from the fact. Then I have no contradiction. See the beauty of it, sir. I have no contradiction because I am only dealing with facts. But when you are dealing with ideals - your ideal, my ideal, his ideal, there is contradiction. Right.

Now I am concerned only with the actual happening of violence. That is, a feeling has arisen because you have called me a fool, and I have named it, that reaction, I have named it as violence. Right? Now can I watch - is there an observation of that feeling without naming it? You understand? Try and do it, sir. Do it as we are talking. That is, not to name the reaction as being violent, because the moment you use the word 'violent' it has a great many connotations, associations. Which is, you mustn't be violent, you must be kind - again unreal. So can you observe that feeling without calling it violence? So can you observe without the word? You understand all this, sir? This requires tremendous observation, not discipline, just observation. Are you following all this? Following in the sense, are you doing it?

That is, we have become slaves to words. A Hindu is a category of a group of people called Hindus, and there is a category, a group of people called Muslims. The Hindus have their own conditioning, that they are this, that they are that, and the other fellow has his own conditioning, so there is battle between them. So to remove the contradiction deal only with facts, not with fictions, not with ideals. Right, sir? That is, I am violent...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: First see the problem as a whole, then we will deal in detail. That is, desire in itself is not contradictory. The objects of desire vary and therefore the contradiction lies in the objects. So that's one point.

The second point is, contradiction exists when we are not dealing absolutely with what is actually happening. Which means elimination completely of ideals. Which is very difficult because you are conditioned from childhood to have ideals - ideals of non-violence, ideals of nobility, ideals of a sannyasi, you follow, ideals. So can you see the falseness of ideals and therefore they have no value, not fight them. Seeing that they make life extraordinarily complicated, false, can you see the truth of it and therefore let it disappear. Like when you see a cobra, you know it is dangerous, it's finished, you don't play with it. So in the same way ideals are fictitious, they have no reality. What has reality, what is actually happening, is the fact.

So the fact is you call me a fool - please follow this - you call me a fool and the word 'fool' has many, many associations, and I get angry. There is anger. And that word 'violence' is applied to that feeling. Therefore in that very word there is contradiction. I wonder if you see this. Right, sir? So is there an observation of this arising of a sensation of reaction, but not naming it? Then you are dealing with fact, not with the word. I wonder if you see that.

Q: It is not easy.

K: Don't say, difficult. You are used to it, you are habituated to it, you are conditioned to it. See you are conditioned when you say, a Muslim. To a capitalist, communism is something terrible. So you are a slave to words. Your mind functions with words and you are used to a certain set of words. So find out whether you can observe without the word. That is, can you observe the tree without the word? Find out. Then you will see that you can observe a woman, a car, a tree, a sunset, without the word.

Sir, let me go into it a little more to make it really simple. The word 'microphone' is not the thing. Right? The word is not the thing. Right? Do you see this? I wonder. I wonder why you come here. You want to learn about all this, therefore find out, sir. Nobody is going to tell you all these things, no book, no guru, they are too damn silly. So find out. The word is not the thing, the 'door' is not the actual door. Right? The word 'tree' is not the actual tree. So the word is not the thing. That's one fact. Right? I can describe the mountain - beautiful, the beauty of the valley, the blue light, the clear line against the marvellous sky, the quality of the air, I can describe it, but the description is not the actual. Right? Now most of us are caught in descriptions. Right? In the word. So you have to eliminate the description, the word, and look at the fact. You see then you have eliminated so many contradictions. I wonder if you see this. See for yourself, or rather, learn, not memorize, but learn, which is, that there is a possibility of observation without the word. That means you have learnt a tremendous lot, that your brain is now active without the word. We function within the word - Gita: there is immediately some kind of absurd reaction. And if you say, the Bible, you don't pay so much attention to it. It's just the words. So are you aware that you are a slave to words? And a mind which is a slave to words battles with unrealities. But whereas if you say the word is not the thing, never, then you move into a different dimension altogether.

Q: You say the door is not the word. If you remove the word 'tree' then the tree and the door are the same.

K: What a crazy question! I said, sir, please listen, don't let's become terribly clever. The word 'microphone' is not the fact. Right, sir? The word 'door' is not that door. When I point to that and say, 'That's the door', then the word identifies itself with the fact, the door. But the door remains when the word is gone. So go into it a little bit. This is very, very important because you will see for yourself if you go into for yourself and learn, that for us the word has become much more important than the fact. God is tremendously important for all of you - if you believe in all that rubbish. And suppose you meet a man who says, 'I don't believe in god', you are fighting over words. You don't know what god is, you know the description, which is not the actual fact.

So first please see how important it is for yourself, and learn that the word is never the thing. The wife, the word 'wife' is not the wife. Perhaps you will understand that better. (Laughter)

K: So I am asking please learn. Learn, not memorize, but learn to observe how the thing arose, how the thing comes out. Which is, we have contradiction only when we are not dealing with what actually is going on. Right? Because we don't know how to deal with what is going on we invent the ideal, which is an escape from what is going on. And if you want to change what is going on don't have contradiction. You understand the point? It's so simple. Then you have the energy to deal with 'what is'. Instead of wasting that energy in contradiction, having ideals and all the rest of it. Do you see this? Look, sir, I am violent, and my conditioning has been by all the gurus, the mahatmas, the whole culture says, don't be violent. And I try all the time to be non-violent. But the actual fact is I am violent. So I am wasting my energy in trying to be non-violent. So when I remove that I have the energy to deal with 'what is'. You understand? But that energy is still wasted when I am using the word 'violence' and getting intoxicated with that word. So I have the energy to observe the fact of being angry. And I won't use the word 'anger' because the word is not the thing.

Q: Sir...

K: Wait, wait, let me finish, don't interfere. The word is not the thing, therefore there is only that reaction. Not named it. The moment you name it becomes stronger. You are strengthening by naming it, by associating through that word the past, therefore you are giving it strength. But if you don't name it, it soon dissipates. You have got this? So you have eliminated altogether contradiction. You are only dealing with what is actually going on. What is actually going on is poverty. Now please listen to this. The communists say, do this, the ideal. The congress people are all dealing with ideals, never dealing with the fact, which is poverty. Can poverty be solved by this country alone, or is it a global problem. If it is a global problem, which it is, then no nationalities, no division. We are concerned with facts. You understand sir? Then you and I can meet. I am not interested whether you are a Hindu, or a beastly something or other, I am not interested. Let's deal with the fact. But now economically we are divided, politically, religiously, and we fight over that and not with the facts. I wonder if you see this. It's so simple, it becomes extraordinarily clear. Because then you will find out what is right action. There can be no right action as long as you have ideals.

Right, sir? Good!

Have you learnt something this morning?

Audience: Yes.

K: No, learnt, not memorized. See the difference between memorizing and learning. You memorize by listening to what I have said like a schoolboy learning mathematics. But that's your tradition, that's your conditioning, everything turned into memory, and repeat, repeat, repeat. Whereas if you are listening and learning, it is not accumulating memory, you are learning, you are moving. I wonder if you see that.

So if I may ask, have you learnt something this morning?

Q: Learnt to think.

K: I am very glad if you have learnt to think. If you have learned to think, sir, you won't belong to any society, to any group.

Q: I am a Theosophist.

K: Then drop it.

Q: Sir, may I ask a question. You have said when I look at a flower and I see the flower, I am conditioned to say, flower, and that's what I end up seeing, not the flower. So you have said if I recognize that I have done that, just see the flower without saying flower, then I see the truth, I am dealing with facts. The fact is in my case that I am conditioned to respond always with the word 'flower', or whatever it is, and I can see that and say, 'Ah, I see that I am saying, flower'. You see the problem?

K: I understand. That is, we are conditioned by words. We are conditioned by environment. Right, sir? One is conditioned by the culture one lives in. We are conditioned by the religion, all that is going on around us from childhood. Right? Now is one aware of this conditioning? Right? Which means you have no opposite to that conditioning. Please listen to it, just listen to it.

The gentleman asked a question, very simply: I am conditioned by the word 'flower', I am conditioned by the culture in which I live, I am conditioned by the religion, by the parents, by education: I am conditioned. Right? Now are we aware, know that we are conditioned? Right, sir? That's a simple fact. Do you know that you are conditioned? When you call yourself a Hindu, you are conditioned. Right?

Q: We don't know that.

K: I want that fact to be clear. You don't know it. You don't know it because it has become such a habit. It's like repeating, repeating, repeating, like your name, it's a habit. And the gentleman says, I cannot break down, or go beyond this habit. He is aware that he is conditioned, as most of you are not aware. He says, I know I am conditioned because of the flower, this, and that and the other. First be aware of it, and if you have an ideal, please listen, if you have an ideal that you must go beyond it, then you have contradiction. Right, sir? So remain only with the fact that you are conditioned. Right? Now, how do you observe that fact? Learn, please learn. How do you observe that fact that you are conditioned? Do you observe it with the desire, with the motive that you must be free of it? Then if that motive, that desire is to be free of it, you have created a contradiction. So can you be free to observe without a motive? The moment you have a motive, that motive is born out of your conditioning. You follow, sir? I am as good as any lawyer!

Q: I see that I am always conditioned.

K: Watch it, sir. I am saying, we are dealing with facts. See that clearly. So are you free of motive?

Q: No.

K: Therefore you don't see for yourself that when you have a motive you are introducing a factor which is non-actual.

Q: I am conditioned to have the motive though.

K: No. The word 'motive' means to move. Now let me go into it myself, I'll explain it and perhaps you'll see it better. I realize I am conditioned, actually realize, not just verbally say, I am conditioned. I am conditioned because I was born in India, as a Hindu, as a Brahmin and all the rest of it, I am conditioned by the western culture, I am conditioned by etc., etc. Now that is a fact. That is an actual daily fact that I am conditioned. Now I explained I am conditioned and the result of that conditioning is, I am separate from humanity. Right? I know all the reasons why that conditioning is dangerous, but it is still descriptive. So can I look at my conditioning without any kind of motive, which is to be free of it, which is to rationalize it, just to observe it without any motive. Unless I do that I will only move from one conditioning to another conditioning. So the importance is to find out if it is possible to observe without motive. If you say, that's impossible, then you give up, throw in the sponge and walk away. If you are serious, if you are really honest, want to find out the truth of it, you have to find out if you can live without a motive.

So when you have no motive then you are free to observe. You understand sir?

Q: I understand.

K: The very motive is more conditioning. So when you live in a motive you are also living in a conditioning.

Q: It is too difficult.

K: Ah, it is too difficult - never to use the word 'difficult'.

It's nine o'clock. I would like to ask, if I may, most respectfully and politely, whether you have learned, not memorized, anything this morning.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Have you learnt anything, sir? Which means you have really understood in your heart, not verbally, in your heart, that contradiction exists when you are not facing facts. If you learn that one thing you have learnt a tremendous lot. That means you have eliminated in life the conflict of opposites.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 29TH DECEMBER 1977

K: What do you think would be worthwhile to talk over together this morning?

Q: I think sir, what is the difference between sleep and meditation?

Q: How can one learn about fear and be free of fear?

K: All right. How can one learn about fear and be free of fear; and the other question was, is it possible while you are asleep to meditate.

Q: Could we talk about what causes distortion, distortion such as fear and aggression.

K: What brings about in our activity, in our thinking distortion, a deformed neurotic way of thinking.

Q: Yesterday, you talked about contradictions and is it possible to be free of contradiction?

Q: Sir, most of us in this world are dishonest, do not do our duty and most of us exploit others. Even a few people who are free from all this see that other people are in conflict. Is there a solution to all these problems?

K: Is there any solution to all our problems of dishonesty, contradiction, exploiting each other and so on.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't quite understand your question, sir. So what is the question sir? So, what shall we discuss? Do you want to talk about sleep and meditation? Do you want to talk about fear? Whether the thought produces the thinker, and so that the observer produces the observed, and how can we with all our complication in life and dishonesty, contradiction, unhappiness how can we solve all these many problems? Which one would you like to discuss?

Q: The last one.

K: The last one.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You said that to observe trees, nature, the skies, the rivers, the waters, observe people, and observe oneself, there must be freedom; will not this freedom lead to chaos? That is what the lady asks. So what shall we talk over together? Together, not I answer and you just listen, but together go into the question, which question would you like take?

Q: About fear.

K: You want to talk about fear? Now please don't ask any more questions, let's find out which one of these questions you would like to talk about. That to observe one must be free and if there is freedom will not there be chaos in the world? The other is, we live such a complicated contradictory life, rather stupid, exploiting, hurting people, with all our problems, is it possible to resolve them all? And to talk about meditation and sleep, and fear. Now just a minute, which of these questions would you like to discuss very carefully?

Q: Freedom.

K: Which is that? (Audience laugh) Why do you laugh? I am just asking.

Q: Is it possible to be free?

K: Can we be free, would you like to discuss that? That is, with all our complications of our life, poverty, exploitation, conflict, suffering, all our life which is so miserable, so unhappy, can we be free of all this? Shall we discuss this? Do you really want to go into this seriously, including fear. What do you think is the central factor, which causes all these disturbances, contradiction, misery? What is the central root of it? Do you understand? We can discuss the pruning of a tree and we go on talking about pruning, pruning trees. But if the root is rotten and is not healthy, whatever it produces must be rotten, inedible, useless. So, are we discussing, talking over together, the pruning of the branches, the peripheral activity or going to the very root of the matter?

Please understand my question, first: shall we talk over together the peripheral. You know the word peripheral, which means the outer; the branches of a tree or should we concern ourselves and find out what is the root cause of all this? Disturbances, hypocrisy, fear, the invention of gods and all the rest of it, the misery that man lives in. Which shall we discuss? The peripheral activity or the root cause of it?

Q: The root cause.

K: You want to discuss the root cause. How do you find out? How do you find out the root cause of all our misery, confusion and all the rest of it. The root cause. Now just a minute, let me explain a little bit. Is there a cause? We say there must be a cause for all this misery, for all this confusion, for all this uncertainty, fear and so we are trying to look for a cause. Right? Is there such a cause? We are looking for it. But there may not be a cause at all. You understand my question? Let us find out. Where do you begin to enquire? You understand? We want to find out the cause, the beginning of all this confusion. Right? The beginning, and if you could understand it, eliminate it, be free of it, then perhaps life will be a marvellous affair. So how do you try to find out the root of it? You understand my question? Do you take one branch and go to the root - you understand my question - take one branch like fear, like pleasure, like sorrow, like confusion, take one issue, and work it down to the root. There is a tree, do you take each branch and go down to the root, there are many branches, or do you see the whole of it? Is this clear?

Would you kindly listen: sir there are spokes of a wheel, collecting the spokes will not make a wheel. Right? Are you clear on this point? Collecting the many spokes will not make the wheel. Do you have a perception of the whole or do you want to discuss a particular and then through the particular come to the whole? You have understood my question? Through the particular come to the whole, or you have a perception of the whole and then take the particular. You see the difference? One is to analyze. Right? Analyzing the particular, through the analysis come to the root, or without analysis see the whole and work out the particular. I wonder if I am making myself clear.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am going into it sir, have patience. First, please understand my question, this is very important. We are always taking a particular like fear and then try through fear to understand the whole movement of our life. Or you understand the whole movement and then take a particular thing. Like, an architect - any architect here? Like an architect, he has a perception of the whole building. The whole building; the nature of it, the structure of it, the beauty of it, the line of it, the proportions, the shade and depth and so on, and having the perception of the whole he work out the details. Right? You understand this? Now which is it we are going to do? Have you understood my question? Please be good enough to understand my question first. We are used to work out from the particular, deduce, whereby there may be a different way of looking at it. Take the whole of life, and see the very root of it. You are not used to that, so you have never done that, you are not used to it, so let us begin with the particular. Right? What would you take up? Fear? Or confusion or unhappiness?

Fear: in the understanding, exploring, going into the whole movement of fear, will you find out - please listen - will you find out the root cause for all the confusion, all the misery. Do you understand what I am saying? I will explain, I am afraid - I will go into fear later. I am afraid. By understanding and being free of fear, will I have solved all the other problems? - confusion, uncertainty, sorrow, anxiety, greed, hatred. You understand my question? By understanding, going very deeply into fear, will I resolve all the other problems? Be clear on this point. So it is very important to understand, whether by discussing one particular aspect of our life, will you understand the totality of our life? You understand? Am I making my question clear? You, sir, you are looking at me. You follow what I am saying?

Q: No.

K: You don't understand me. You follow what I am saying? So, you are not used to taking the whole of life and looking at it, but you are used to, through education, through tradition and so on, you are conditioned to take one aspect of life and hoping thereby to resolve all the other problems. Right? So let us do that. Fear, you want to discuss fear. What is fear? You are afraid; aren't you? At least be honest with yourself. You are afraid. Afraid of losing your job; afraid of death; afraid of not reaching god or whatever it is, afraid of not doing the right thing; afraid of not being respectable. We have many, many forms of fear, which is the fear that you have?

Q: Fear of the future.

K: Fear of tomorrow, is that it? One is afraid of tomorrow.

Q: Fear of wasting life.

K: Fear of wasting life, your life. Find out, sir, what is your fear.

Q: Afraid of ignorance.

K: Oh, come off it! Are you afraid of ignorance?

Q: No, but generally.

K: You, sir. Just listen we are talking seriously. This is not a matter of laughter. You said fear of ignorance. Are you really frightened of being ignorant?

Q: No sir, I am not at all sir.

K: Sir, I am asking you a question: are you afraid of being ignorant?

Q: No, sir.

K: Then why do you bring that up?

Q: I see it's a problem.

K: Whose problem?

Q: Generally, sir.

K: No, sir. I asked - either you are not courteous enough to listen to my question, which is, what is your particular form of fear? Yours, not somebody else's.

Q: I have no fear.

K: The gentleman says he has no fear. We can't say anything more about it.

Q: I am afraid of public opinion.

K: So, you are afraid of public opinion, afraid of tomorrow, future. So, what are you afraid of?

Q: Afraid of suffering.

K: Afraid of suffering. Go on, sir, unless you are all marvellously free human beings of fear.

Q: Afraid of death.

K: Afraid of death, afraid of suffering.

Q: Afraid of losing security.

K: Afraid of losing security both physical and psychological.

Q: Afraid of doing the wrong thing in relationship.

K: Afraid of doing wrong things in relationship.

Q: Afraid of not being able to forget.

K: Afraid of not being able to forget, that is, regrets. Now which of these do you want to discuss?

Sir, have the courtesy to listen, politeness to listen. You have so many fears. Fear of tomorrow, fear of insecurity, fear of death, fear of wasting one's life and so on. Which if these do you want to go into? I am waiting sir. You tell me!

Q: All fears.

Q: Fear of security?

K: Shall we go into that?

Q: Yes.

K: You see you agree to anything. You are not responsible for yourself. You are not thinking out for yourself. I am asking you most respectfully: what is your particular form of fear? Are you aware of it? Do you know it? Do you know your particular fear sir?

Q: Yes.

Q: Fear of I don't know what.

K: Fear of the unknown, which is death, tomorrow, which is the unknown. You don't know what might happen tomorrow. There might be an earthquake. The building may fall down and kill you. You see, it shows, sir, you have not looked at yourself. You do not know your particular fear. You want to discuss fear as a generality. You don't say, look, I am frightened of death; I am frightened of loneliness; I am frightened of losing wife. I am frightened of losing my sex; I am frightened of losing the property I own; I am frightened of not getting a better job; which of these are you aware of? You follow sir?

Q: The ending of life before I know myself.

K: Fear of death before knowing the whole nature of myself. That is your fear. Now which of these fears do you want to discuss? Your fear, not mine or somebody else's.

Q: I love a particular girl. I want to marry that particular girl. My parents won't allow it so I am afraid.

K: Throttle the parents or run away with the girl. You are all grown-up people, I believe, educated, and apparently fear doesn't mean a thing to you. You just talk about it. You really don't know what fear is. Do you? You are all well fed, good jobs, or money, and you have never found out for yourself what you are afraid of. Look at the tragedy first. The tragedy of so-called educated grown-up people, who have studied sacred books or whatever it is and do not know for yourself what you are frightened of; that is a tremendous tragedy. You understand sir?

Now let us take one thing: you are afraid of tomorrow, the future, shall we discuss that for the moment? What is the future? Just investigate, don't answer. What is the future? When you use the word 'future', tomorrow, or ten years, hence what do you mean by the word 'future'?

Q: Planning.

K: Wait, wait. What is the past? What do you mean by the word 'past', what do you mean by the word 'present'? What do you mean by the word 'future'? The past, the present, the future, what does it imply? Sir, don't be nervous sir.

Q: Time.

K: The past, the present, and the future, somebody said, it is time. Just listen carefully. What do you mean by time? Just listen, I am not quibbling about it. If you understand this you will understand so much, you learn so infinitely. So we are talking about the past, the present and the future. All this implies time, that is, there was yesterday, today, and tomorrow. Right? That is, according to the calender, it was 29th yesterday, 30th today. So according to the calender, according to the sunrise, sunset, that is one kind of time. Right? There is another kind of time. Which is, I have done something in the past which I regret; I am doing something in the present which is coloured by the past; and the future is shaped by the past. This is simple. Have you lost me? So past, present and the future is a movement. It is not static. It is not fixed. It is a movement. So time is a movement. Right? Time is a movement. This is clear sir. Time is a movement. Are you afraid of this movement? You are afraid of the past. What is the past? Don't introduce karma and all the rest of it, but just the past. The past being how you were educated, your memories of what you have learnt, memories of your pleasures, sexual and others, memories of what you should do and what you should not do. So the past is the collection of memories, remembrances, whether pleasurable, painful or regretful. You are following all this, don't get tired, we are just beginning. You are investigating with me. I am not talking to myself. The past is all those memories accumulated during the time, whether it is 10, 30, 50 years or a hundred. During this life time, that's good enough. During this life time. I won't enter into the problem of reincarnation and all that. I am only taking this short period of life which one is actually living. Which is, the past is all the collections of memories, painful, pleasurable, regret and so on. So all that is the past. Is this clear? In this life time not whether you are born previous life and all that, we won't enter into that for the moment. During this life time you have collected all the experiences, memories, knowledge, which is the past. Right? So knowledge is the past. All knowledge is the past. Please see the truth of this, not agreeing, see the truth of it for yourself. All knowledge, scientific knowledge, knowledge you have gathered through experience, knowledge that you have gathered through information, all knowledge is the past. Right? Are we learning together? Not memorizing what the speaker is saying, learning. So in the past we live, don't we. All your living is in the past.

Q: When you are actually living memory doesn't interfere.

K: Is that what you are saying? Is that a theory or an actuality? Don't please, if a may ask you, most kindly, don't theorize, don't speculate, find out actually what you life is.

Q: (Inaudible_

K: What do you mean by living? actual living is the operation of the past in the present. Right? The past shapes, controls, changes, modifies the present. This is obvious sir. So, if you look at your daily life, you are actually living in the past. You may think you are living in the present, or complying according to the pattern of the future, but actually you are living in the past. Your name, your recognition as so-and-so, and the familiarity of your habits, of your surroundings, everything is collected, stored in the past as memory. It is simple. So you are living in the past. You won't like that but it is a fact. Right?

Q: The habit and conditioning comes from the past.

K: Habit, conditioning, tradition, everything is from the past. The past meets the present, modifies it and goes on. The future then is the modification of the past, meeting the present, and shaping the future. This is a simple ordinary daily fact. That is, I have collected lots of memories, unhappy, pleasurable, confusing and so on and I meet the present. The challenge of the present. The challenge. And I respond according to my knowledge, memory and so modify my memories and go on. So the past meeting the present modifies itself and goes on. This is a simple daily fact. This past, which is, you as a Hindu, or a Brahmin, or whatever it is, the past meets the present 20th century with all its technology, with all its economic problems, and you modify your Brahminism or whatever it is and go on. So life is a movement from the past, through present to the future. Now what is it that you are frightened of?

Q: The unknown.

K: I explained madam, the future is the result of the past. The future: you are afraid of the unknown. You are afraid of the unknown because you are afraid of losing what you know. Is that it?

Q: Being trapped in that movement.

K: Sir, you haven't understood, sir, please. I am asking you, please, sir, what is it that you are afraid of? You say, 'I am afraid of the unknown, the future'. Please listen. You are afraid of the future. What is the future? It's a movement of the past, modifying itself and going on. This is your daily life. So, what are you afraid of? Ending this movement?

Q: The past has become the present. And the present is going to be the future, so there is nothing to be afraid of.

K: Is that a fact with you? Don't laugh sir please. I am asking you most respectfully. When you have understood the business of past, present and future, you have ceased to fear?

Q: Yes sir.

K: Actually?

Q: The more I explore the concept I am afraid I have not used my time in the past correctly.

K: It is not a concept. It is a fact. Don't make a fact into a concept. It is very important to understand this. The fact is we live in the past, we are jealous, we know hatred, it is all in the past. And that past is all the time moving in the present, modifying, going on - like a river that is going on. It is not a concept. It is a fact of our daily life.

Q: But even then...

K: I am going to come to that sir, first please listen. You are this movement. Aren't you? You are not separate from this movement of the past, the present, and the future. You are that. Right sir? You can say, I am the higher self, there is god in me, but it is still the past tradition, saying that, and all that is the past. Even your higher self, even your atman, Brahmin, the whole works of theology is still in the past. Which you have accepted, which has been, through propaganda of years, impinged on your brain. You are the past. You are being modified in the present. You are the future. Right? That is a fact. That is an actuality. Now what are you afraid of?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Please sir, you have not accepted. Please listen sir. Kindly listen. You have not accepted an idea. You have seen the fact. There is no need for acceptance. The sun rises and the sun sets. You don't say, I accept that idea. You are all so cuckoo, you don't think. You just live in ideas, words. So I am saying you, Mr Smith, you Mr Roa, or whatever it is, you are the past, you are the present, modified by the present activities and you are the future. This whole movement is you. You are not separate from time. Time is the past, present, and future. You are the channel of time, you are that time. Right? That is a fact like a microphone. Now, wait a minute, what are you afraid of?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait sir, you have not even listened to the question. Please have the courtesy, politeness, to let the speaker finish his sentence. Think it out before you answer my question. I said, you are this, the whole movement of time. Sir, see the beauty of it. You are missing so much; you are this whole time. And what are you afraid of? This movement coming to an end? Are you afraid of that?

Q: Pleasure coming to an end.

K: So, you are afraid of losing pleasure. Just a minute sir, go into it quietly. You are afraid of losing your pleasure. Pleasure - sexual pleasure, right? Pleasure of having clothes, possession, power, car, money - if you have all that - pleasure of your family, pleasure of achievement. So all this pleasure you are afraid of losing. Now, wait a minute. What is pleasure? See, you use the word, and think you have understood it. What do you mean by that word 'pleasures? You look at a sunset, if you ever do, I am afraid you don't, but if you do look at a sunset, and see the beauty of the sunset, the colour, the streaks of light, the quietness of the sunset and so on, when you do look at all it, it gives a great pleasure. Like looking at a beautiful tree, like looking at a beautiful woman or a man, it gives you pleasure - sexual excitement, sensory and all the rest of it. Now, at the moment, at the second of that pleasure, you don't call it a pleasure, do you?

Q: Well...

K: Have the courtesy to listen to my question. At the moment of anger, at the second of anger, there is only anger, there is no 'I am angry' - that comes a second later. Right? So, at the moment of pleasure, at the second of pleasure, there is no saying, 'I am seeking pleasure'. Right? So, always a second, or a moment later, you say, how happy I was, I want more and more of it. So watch it carefully, sir, please have the courtesy, the politeness, to listen. That is, at the moment of anger, at the moment of greed, or jealousy there is only that fact, that reaction which we have named as anger, jealousy, pleasure and so on. At the second, there is no identification. But a few seconds later comes the identification, and we say 'That was pleasurable. I must have more of it'.

Now what is implied in that? At the moment of its happening there is no 'I'. A second later the 'I' comes in and says, how lovely that was and I must have more of it. And the pursuit of it. Now, what is that, this movement? Is it not the movement of time? Just look at it. The movement of time. The second it happens, there is no time. There is no saying, ah, how happy I am. A second later you say, how happy I am.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do listen sir, have the courtesy, the politeness to listen to the speaker till he has finished. Find out what he wants to say. And then you can say whatever you want to say. I am not preventing you from saying anything you want to say. So, this second of happening, then identification with that happening with myself and wanting more. If it is pain, at that moment of pain there is no you. A second later you say 'how awful, I have an awful pain'. Then the avoidance of it. It is the same movement, as pleasure, same movement as pain. So all that movement is time, isn't it? Time is involved.

So what you are afraid of is not being able to pursue the pleasure that you have, and the ending of it. You are afraid of you pleasure ending. Right? So what are you going to do about it? What are you going to do about your pleasure and the pursuit of pleasure and the fear that it may end? You are faced with the problem. Right? What is your response?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You haven't understood, sir. Time must go on? The sun rises and sun sets. There is light and darkness. This will go on even though you don't exist and I die, but this will go on. Right? So time will go on. Wait sir, listen to what I am saying. I must have the patience of the devil. You don't seem to have a little patience. You go on with your own ideas, with your own thinking. That is, time by the clock, which is chronological time, sun rising, sun setting, the stars, the moon, that is so marvellously orderly that will go on. Right? Even though you die. So what you are afraid of is the ending of you, with your pleasures, with your anxieties, with your memories, with your pain, with your sorrow, with your losing attachments, all that is what you are afraid of. Right? No?

Q: Sometime back you said there is a gap between the two, I want to know how the link happens.

K: I don't understand your question.

Q: How does the 'I' which lives in time operate on fear? How does the brain record time? Sir, I see a beautiful sunset, at that moment I don't record.

K: Sir, that is not what he is talking about.

Q: Fear arises in me. For a split second, I recognize that fear, the recognition of fear is in time. But fear itself is out of time. What is the difference between fear in time and fear out of time?

K: All right, I've got your question.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, that gentleman has asked a question and you are going on with your question. You have not the courtesy to listen to his question. How impolite we are. The question is, as far as I understand it, please correct me if I am wrong: fear arises, and the arising of the fear is out of time. Then, I recognize it by naming it and so make that into time. Right? What is the relationship of fear, which existed before I named it and the fear of time. Right? Is this your question sir?

Q: The last sentence is not correct.

K: What is not correct sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I have repeated what you have said. May I repeat it again, sir. At the moment of arising fear is out of time, according to you. Then, the naming of it, the giving it a recognition, that is in time. So what is the relationship.

Q: (Inaudible)

Q: He is saying that it is according to you, is it not according to him?

K: Will you move out of your position, sir, if I correct you? If you will change your position, if I show you. Right. Let's be very, very simple. Anger arises, then you name it. Right? At the moment of the arising of that thing called anger, there is no time. When you name it then it becomes time. Right? So are you asking, is it possible to be aware, or watch the arising of anger, and not name it. If you don't name it, it is out of time, the moment you name it, you bring it into time. Right?

Q: He said, what is the link?

K: Of course sir this is a little complicated. Go into it with me, if you are interested, if not go and jump, skip a rope, or whatever you like.

Q: Absolutely there cannot be a link between the two, then how the link happened is my question.

K: How does it happen, what?

Q: By saying, the very act of naming. the very act of recognizing, which is naming brings...

K: He doesn't listen, it is purely an abstract thing, you are not doing it. Let us be simpler. What are you afraid of? All the past is you, all your memories, all your pains, all your pleasures, and your aspirations and your idea of atman, god and this and that. all that, the past which is you, you are not different from the past. So, what are you afraid of? Ending this? Which is death, isn't it? Right? Right sir? Ending. Now wait a minute. Have you been ended; please listen, have you ever ended while you are living now, a particular attachment? You are attached to something, aren't you? Right? Yes sir? Wife, house, ideas, beliefs, you are attached to something. Can you end it without argument, without saying, why should I end it. You won't discuss this with death. You understand? He does not give you time to discuss, 'Wait wait, old boy, give me time, let me detach myself'. He says, end. Have you ever ended a particular attachment, ended it? Have you?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Don't be flippant sir, this is very serious. Have you ended any pleasure? No. Find out. Find out if you can end a particular pleasure. End it, not say, I will end it today and pick it up day after tomorrow. Your attachment to your wife, to your children, end it. And see what happens. That is what is going to happen when death comes. Right? You have no time to argue with death. Probably you will die of some disease, or unconscious, so I am saying while you are living find out what it means to end something completely end, not pick it up next year. Then you are facing fear. Right? Then you are actually facing fear and frightened of what might happen if you detach yourself from something. Do it! You leave your order of monks, leave your gurus, leave your traditions, leave your beliefs.

End it with a sharp knife so that it is finished. Then you will know what fear is. Then you will find that you are tremendously lonely. You understand? That is great fear. But without ending something you are trying to discuss theoretically. And you will go on I am sure of it. You will go on being attached, go on talking about all this and next year when we meet you'll say, let us talk about attachment.

So, you never in your life, living, face fear. You talk about fear, and I say you will know the nature of fear when you free yourself from any kind of attachment. Give up your Hinduism - you might lose your job, you might not be able to marry your daughter. You follow? So, you are frightened. So if you are serious, if you go into this matter of fear very deeply, you have to test it, you have to find out for yourself; not play around with words. You are attached to your wife, aren't you? Or to your girl friend, aren't you? Or to your job, or to your opinion? Or something or the other? Will you naturally, happily end it? Go on, sir.

Q: When you try to end a habit, conflict is produced.

K: Because one has not understood the nature of the habit, why the mind, the brain functions in habit. You function as a Hindu, which is a habit. Right? You function as a specialist, as a doctor, an engineer, or a businessman, and that's a habit. Why does the brain function in habits? What a tragedy it is, sir, how you are wasting your life. That is what that gentleman asked: he asked, how I am to prevent myself from wasting my one life, the precious life, I have. Please help me to prevent the wastage of my life. Right? Aren't you wasting your life? Consider it sir, aren't you wasting you life?

Don't take notes sir, please apply it to yourself sir, not notes, for god's sake. What is the matter with all of you? When somebody tells you, he loves you, do you take notes? That is what I am telling you. I am telling you, I love you, and you say 'Yes sir, very interesting', or, you think about something else. Aren't you wasting your lives sirs and ladies? If you are living in a world of ideas you are wasting your life. The word 'idea' you know, comes from Greek, which means to observe: Just to observe, not make an abstraction of what you observed and that abstraction becomes an idea. You understand. The word 'idea' means from Greek, Latin and so on, pure observation. Now have you observed how you are wasting your life. Aren't you, aren't you wasting your lives sirs? Which means you are living in a world of ideas, world of make-believe, world of suppositions and theories. Right? Or some conclusion you have come to and you live with that conclusion; all that, if I may point out, is a waste of life. Life is to be lived, to be understood, gone into very, very deeply. It's your life? Why you are so colossally selfish - aren't you, colossally selfish? Right, sir? And how can a selfish man live without conflict. He must live in conflict.

There you are, you are taking notes again. Why do you waste you time coming here sir? Look sirs, the speaker wants to tell you something: tell you that there is a different way of living, actually in daily life, not in heaven or in some future, but in daily life there is a way of living where live isn't a problem, life isn't a struggle, life isn't a beastly everyday boredom, and I want to tell you, I want to communicate with you. That means let's talk it over together. Not you accept or agree with whatever I say, but let's talk it over. But you, you are not willing to do that. You sit there, accept or reject what is said, or you are mesmerized by your own ideas. You understand sir. So, please don't waste your life. This is the only life you have. You may think you have a future life - reincarnation, but what you do now will control the future, obviously. So, don't waste your life. Which is like a person who has got tremendous affection and says, please don't waste your life.

Q: Talk.

K: No sir, it is finished.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What has this to do with what we are talking about. He is talking about some Soviet Union books. That gentleman has not listened at all. I don't know why you all come. Sir, don't you know life is the most precious thing? You understand? And how you are wasting it, destroying it. We will go into this when we talk in the public talks. We will go into it very, very carefully sir, please have the courtesy to listen.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 31ST DECEMBER 1977

May we go on talking over together what we discussed the last time we met here, last Sunday? If I may, I would like to point out something: we were talking about the art of observing, observing the world, what a chaotic, confused, brutal world it is actually, factually. And also we said through the outward observation, the same movement turned inside, which is to observe oneself, actually, what one is; not theoretically, but factually, what is actually daily going on within our own confused, miserable, rather frightened existence. We went into the question of what it means to observe. I think we went into it fairly thoroughly, but this evening, if I may, if one may, I would like to begin with the art of listening, whether one really listens at all, not only to what the speaker is saying, but also to everything that is going on around us - the nature, in our families, when we are talking to a friend and so on, whether we even listen or we only listen casually, paying a little attention, rather bored, know exactly what the other fellow is going to say. And so, gradually one gets into the habit of partial listening, whether at home, in the office or anywhere else. I think there is an art in the way one listens. Perhaps in the very act of listening, the whole problem may be solved. If you have gone into it very thoroughly, what it means to listen, not merely respond to verbal communication, not only understanding the words, and so on, but also to listen to what is behind the word, to listen between the words, to see the depth of the word and have an insight into the meaning of that word before it is almost spoken. That requires great deal of attention, sensitivity and alertness to capture what the other fellow is saying. And, listening implies, doesn't it, not to make an abstraction of what is being said - and abstraction being to draw a conclusion from what you hear, which is actually an abstraction. I don't know if we are meeting together on this point.

Please let me again, if I may, remind you most respectfully, that we are sharing the thing together. I am not making a speech, throwing out a lot of ideas. But together we are exploring, together in exploration sharing, we are walking together, and we must keep at the same speed, with the same elan, with the same movement. Otherwise you cannot share. You may be far ahead and I may lag behind. So sharing implies, doesn't it, that both of us together investigate into the art of listening first, because we are going to investigate into a great many other things this evening, but first I think it is important to learn for ourselves the art of actually listening. When you listen to that statement of any kind, the instinctual response is to either agree or disagree. And therefore you stop instantly from listening. Or, compare what you hear with what you already know. So, comparison in listening prevents you from listening. I hope we are meeting each other in this point. And also listening implies, doesn't it, that in our enquiry both of us are not coming to any conclusion. As we said, the word 'art' means putting everything in its proper place.

So I think it is very important to learn for oneself the art of listening. If one listened really very, very carefully, not interjecting your own personal opinions and conclusions and prejudices, but listen with your heart, with your mind, with your being, and perhaps a deeper form of communion can take place, both verbally and non-verbally.

So, having stated that, I would like to go into the question: what place has knowledge in our life? I don't know if you have ever asked this question. Knowledge implies, doesn't it, that which is known, that which has been experienced, gathered, collected, stored up as memory in the brain. That is a fact. And as we are living, more and more information about everything is being gathered, about the whole universe, matter, movement of stars, time, eternity, and so on. And also we have information according to the psychologists and philosophers about ourselves: what we are, what we should be, how we are evolving towards something or other, this constant information is being given, gathered and distributed. So we live with extraordinary accumulation of knowledge; knowledge not merely from books, whether they are so-called sacred or holy but also from our own experiences we have gathered a tremendous lot of human knowledge about ourselves - if you gone into it.

So, we are asking what is the place of knowledge with regard to right action? Are you interested in this? Are you sure? Because, in a confused world, a world that is becoming more and more insane, more and more destructive, one must, if one is at all serious, fairly intelligent, deeply concerned to find out for oneself what is one to do, not only as a human being but as a collective representative of all humanity. We went into that the other day, because every human being, you as a human being, is a representative, is the totality, of all humanity. Now will you listen to that statement, that you are actually the representative of humanity, will you listen to it? Or will you draw a conclusion from it, make it into an idea and discuss about that idea, argue back and forth? So, when you do that, you are moving away from the act of listening. If you listen totally, completely, with all your being, then a deep transformation takes place, because to realize that you as a human being, no longer petty individual, worrying about his little this or that, but you are the entire humanity, if you listen to that, it is really a most profound awakening - I won't call it experience. It brings tremendous clarity, a great deal of vitality and strength. And so, I am asking, if I may ask, are you listening to that statement completely or have you already gone off making an abstraction and an idea and observing the idea? I don't know if I am making myself clear on this point. The word 'idea', it comes from Greek and so on, means to observe. See what we have made of that word, which means to observe - not a conclusion, not a fixed opinion, but to observe what is actually going on, both outwardly and inwardly. So are you, if I may ask, listening that you are actually the representative of all man, humanity. You see, that means when you listen so completely, the idea of petty little individuality disappears altogether. You are concerned with the whole global human being. I wonder if you get this?

So, we are asking what place has knowledge when there is an enquiry into what is right action? Right action means correct action, accurate action, precise action, not right action according to you or to me or to some action based on some pattern, some conclusion, some ideal. Those are not actually correct action. So we are trying to find out, if you are interested in it, and you must be as a human being, when there is so much confusion, both outwardly and inwardly, what place has knowledge with regard to right action? You have understood the question, sir? Because we have got tremendous knowledge, and knowledge implies, by the very word, that which has been known, which has been acquired, which has been accumulated through experience, through education and so on and so on - this whole accumulation of knowledge. There are a whole group of scientists saying man can ascend only through knowledge. The ascent of man through acquiring more and more knowledge. Knowledge we said is always in the past - there is no knowledge of tomorrow. The tomorrow is dictated by the knowledge of yesterday, passing through the present. That is obvious. So we live in the past, if you observe yourself: you might have had marvellous experience a couple of years ago or yesterday, and that experience, the residue of that beauty, or that love, whatever it is that you think that experience is, and it is gone and you are searching for it, longing for it, longing which is again moving in the field of knowledge - always functioning within the field of the known. I hope you are following all this.

So, what is right action? You understand? What is right action, which will be true, precise, accurate, correct under all circumstances, whether you are at home, the office, whatever you are doing? It is very important to find out. Does knowledge bring order? Because action, correct action is based on order, not of choice, not on accumulated information called knowledge. So one asks, does knowledge bring order? Are we in communication with each other, or are you off somewhere else and I am off somewhere else? Because I feel we are not in communication because for some of you it is all new. And so you are hesitating, questioning, worrying about it. Sir, let us make it very, very simple. Knowledge implies storing up of experience, gathering all the known facts and storing up in the brain and acting according to memory. That is simple. Right? Acting according to memory. Acting according to that, does it bring order? Please be clear on this point, because we are investigating. I am not telling you it does or doesn't. But through exploring, investigating, we'll find out whether knowledge, which is always the past, can bring about order? You understand my question? Can tradition bring order? The word 'tradition' means to hand over, hand across and also, if you go into that word deeply you will find the meaning, it also means being treacherous. Please listen carefully. The word 'tradition' not only implies the accepted meaning: to hand over from father to son, the whole movement of tradition, but also it implies to be a traitor, traitor to the present. You understand? No, you don't.

So let us enquire into the word 'knowledge', whether knowledge brings order, or when you are functioning within the field of the known you are repetitive. And you may think repetitive existence is complete order. Please enquire into it, because we are all very traditionalist. You may think you are very modern, but your whole background, the unconscious, the deep layers of your mind, is very traditional. Not merely following some silly guru, but also going to the temples, but also the desire to conform to a pattern, whether you have created that pattern or it is imposed upon by society, culture and so on. So we are asking: what is order? If it is not related to knowledge, knowledge being the known, and functioning within the area of the known is repetitive, and that brings a great comfort, because you are always safe - at least you think you are safe.

So, what then is order? You understand my question? Because we are enquiring very carefully to find out what is correct action in life, what is right action with regard to your relationship to your wife, to your girl friend, to your neighbour, as a citizen of the world, what is right action? Because unless you find out for yourself, you will always be in a turmoil, always be either regretting or frightened and therefore never acting wholly, completely. I wonder if I am making this clear? So, may we go on? I hope you are also exploring.

What is order? Is your life in order? A sequential order not occasional order, like in mathematics: sequence. If you go into the whole problem, which we won't now - mathematics, when it is a sequential movement is pure order, ultimate. So, is one's life orderly, sequential, following one thing after the other, logically, sanely, reasonably? Please enquire. And if it is not in order, then one has to enquire, why there is so much confusion in the world and in us. Right? I hope you are following. Right, sir? Why is there so much confusion? Why is there so much uncertainty, such fear of insecurity, such sense of choosing and the choice may lead to further confusion? Because, presently if we have time, we want to go into the question of fear, so we are leading up to this tremendous problem of every human being which is fear, but to understand it deeply and to be free of it, one must find out not only the sequential clarity of thought but also find out for oneself whether choice ever brings clarity. I wonder if you understand all this. May we go on? Why do you choose? You may choose between black cloth or a white cloth or between a certain quality of material, between two cars, between this or that. There it is in order, isn't it? You must. But why do you choose in any other psychological direction? You understand my question? Why do you choose at all? Between various gurus - if you do choose but generally what one does is you like what he says, you like his blah, blah, blah, and then go after it - but when you are enquiring into confusion which means disorder, how does disorder come about in every human being? Disorder implies contradiction. Right?

Disorder implies, saying one thing and doing another in which there is no integrity, no honesty. Disorder implies the incapacity to see clearly, and when you see clearly there is no choice. So choice exists when there is confusion. I wonder if you accept all this. It is only a man that is confused who says: I am going to choose. When the thing is very clear, there is no choice, you just do according to that clarity. But if you notice, our existence is based on choice and the pursuit of will. Will is the very essence of choice. I wonder if you follow all this?

So what does clarity mean? You understand sir? When you look at a map, an ordinary map, if you want to go into a particular place from where you are, you look at it in one way. You measure up the distance, you know exactly where the road is, and you take that road. So there is no confusion there because in front of you is the map. Because you have a direction. Right? Because you have a direction where you want to go, there is no choice. You just take the best road and go. So where there is direction, you think there is order. I wonder if you get this? And have you a direction? You understand? Direction, not getting a job, becoming a professor or something or other, but psychologically, inwardly a direction. And the direction is brought about through motive. Right? So as long as you have a motive, the direction is distorted. And so that is one of the fundamental reasons of confusion. Right? So can you observe the map without direction, which is not the map of road and villages and towns, but the map of your whole existence without direction. I wonder if you meet this point - because the moment you have direction, you are discarding the observation of the whole. Look, sir, can you look at life as a whole, not as a businessman, as a scientist, as a specialist, or a religious person or an atheist, or communist, but life, this immense thing, with all the complications of anxiety, fear, greed, envy, sexual demands, you know, take the whole picture? You can only do that, to see the whole, when you have no direction. And therefore, the perception of the whole is order. I wonder if you see this. Are we communicating with each other, are we travelling together, or are you far ahead or I am far ahead and you are behind, are we moving together?

That means, order implies a way of living in which direction as a motive comes to an end. Therefore, you are looking, observing the whole of existence, not as a doctor, as a philosopher, as a religious man, who is a cuckoo or whatever it is. You are looking at the whole of life. So, order means the understanding, the actual fact of a life, daily life, in which there is no contradiction, there is no following a particular pattern. There is no action of a direction. Therefore, there is no choice. I wonder if you get it. It does not matter. If you don't get it, it is your misfortune. Let me go on.

So once you have established order, not following a pattern which is not order, not following a blueprint, not following what a guru says, those are all total disorder - but order means the observation of the whole of your life, the totality of your life. It is like observing something like the tree wholly, not get delighted at one particular branch or one particular leaf or one particular fruit, but the whole of the tree. That means your mind must have the capacity to look without direction, without prejudice, without personal problems, to look. All right.

So when one asks this question: what place has knowledge with regard to correct action, knowledge has its right place. Learning to drive a car, learning a language, learning a technique, learning a skill, all that you must have knowledge. Otherwise you are not a capable person. But knowledge has no place when there is correct action. This is difficult to understand, so let me go into it a little bit. Because action is not having acted or will act. Action means in the present. Action is the movement in the present. But if you are acting according to a pattern which is the past, then you are not acting at all. I wonder if you see this. Or following a particular ideal which is in the future and then acting according to that ideal in the present, it is not correct order, correct action. Right? I wonder if you see this. But we are caught between the past and the future. Right? So we live in the past. That is our life. And the past is guiding, shaping the challenge of the present and shaping the future. That is our daily life. So we are saying - please listen, you may not agree or disagree, these are facts - that knowledge has no place where right action is to take place. Knowledge then merely becomes mechanical. Action is not mechanical.

So to find out the art of living in which knowledge has its right place and seeing what the implications of actions are, not according to some book or some personal experience but action which is not mechanical, which is not repetitive, which is not pleasurable or rewarding or painful, but correct, right, that can only take place when you have placed knowledge in its right place. Shall we go, move on? You are only too willing to move on.

We want to go into the question, because if there is fear there is no right action. You may talk about right action, you may write books about right action, but as long as there is this immense fear within one, there is no right action. So we are going to enquire together - please together - what is the nature and structure of fear. You understand? Because every human being in the world is frightened about something - he may be frightened about his wife, may be frightened of not living rightly, he may be frightened of the future, he may be frightened of losing the job or all the neurotic fears and so on and so on and so on. Right? So we are going to go together, investigate whether it is possible to know what one's fears are, and when you leave this evening, when you walk out of here, to be completely free of fear. Because otherwise it is not worth talking about it. Whether it is at all possible to be both physiologically as well as psychologically, to be completely free of fear. You understand? Can we go together in it?

First of all, is one aware of fear, your particular fear, or you slur over, not wanting to enquire because you don't know how to deal with fear? So we are going to deal with fear, not run away from it, not escape from it, not rationalize it, not say 'It's all right, let's have a little fear because that keeps us in order'. We are talking about complete, total freedom of fear, because otherwise there is no order in life. Otherwise you would accept the authority of the guru, of the politician, of your priest or of the psychologist or the analyst. So it is a very fundamental question which each one has to face and find out and totally eradicate it. We are going to do that now.

So please listen, not only listen but also move together. Have you ever faced fear? Please listen to my question. Be acquainted, live, know the actual fact of fear? Or you think about something - the future, you may lose your job, you may lose this and that, and the other thing, and therefore you are artificially creating fear. You understand the difference? I wonder if you do. I am asking, if you will kindly listen, whether you ever know what fear is? Or you only know fear because you think about the past or the future? You understand my point, question? So please listen. Is fear caused by thought, thinking about the past or thinking about the future, the past pain that you had whether at the dentist or other pains physically that you have had and thinking about it, hoping that it will not recur and get frightened about it? Which is the movement from the known, the known pain of last week, and projecting a non-state of pain in the future and getting frightened about it. Have you understood what I am saying?

So what is it we are doing? Please be clear on this point because it is most extraordinary if you go into it. Am I frightened of what I did yesterday? Am I frightened of losing a job, though I am not losing the job, I may lose the job, or I am frightened because my wife is more dominant than me and I live under her domination and I am a little frightened, or I am frightened of death, which is the future? So which is it I am doing: actually know what fear is, the fact of fear - do you understand? - not the fear caused by thought. Please, this is your life, it is important for you to understand this.

Has fear a cause, the cause being that you had pain last week and you are frightened that it may happen again. Right? Or is there a fear by itself without the movement of thought bringing about fear? No, no, don't say yes, sir, you haven't gone into the whole problem of fear. First of all, sirs, aren't you frightened? Frightened about something, aren't you? Darkness, wife, the boss, the authorities, and also frightened of not fulfilling, frightened of not having loved, frightened of being lonely, frightened of being never on top of anything, aren't you frightened of something? Now when you look at your fear, is thought creating that fear? Do you understand my question? So is thought the root of fear? Do you understand? That is, I am living now. At least I think I am living - a shoddy, stupid, miserable life - that I call living. And I am frightened of the unknown. I don't know what is in the future, I only know what is now in my knowledge. So I am frightened of the unknown, so I cling to the known. Right? I don't let go the known and say, let's find out. But I am so frightened that I cling to the known. Which means what? That thought says: I am accustomed to live with the past, the known, and I am frightened to move out of that. Right? So the origin of fear, is it thought? Not how to control thought, that is not the point, not how to change thought, how to stop thought. But is the beginning of fear, the beginning of thought? Do you understand my question? So how is one, knowing that thought is the movement of time, past, present, the movement of time, and this movement of time coming to an end, is fear. I am putting it a little more complicatedly which is, look: don't you think all these things out? From yesterday I move, live through the present. The yesterday's memories are modified and go on. So the past through the present being modified goes on. So the past is going on all the time, modified somewhat polished, somewhat less and more, but the past is the river that is moving all the time. That is, knowledge is moving through the present, modified, changing, but knowledge is still going on. So thought which is the response of memory, which is the collection of various experiences, knowledge, and so on, from that is the storehouse which is the cultivation of memory, and the response of that memory is thought. This is a fact. You don't have to invent, discuss. Look at it.

So I am asking myself and you, we are exploring: is the origin of fear thought? If it is, then what relationship has thought to action? Do you follow what I am saying? I wonder if you do.

I have got a quarter of an hour more. The speaker's intention, his communication with you, is that when you leave this place that you are totally free of fear, both physically as well as psychologically, because a man who lives under fear, lives in darkness. It is a tremendous burden, and in darkness trying to find something that is dark. He will never find anything. So that is what I want to discuss with you, to make you to see the reality that there can be freedom from fear.

So we are saying: is there a fear independent of thought? Do you understand? Or, all fear is related to thought? Right, sir? Now which is it? Obviously thought which is the response to memory and so on, thought, thinking about what happened yesterday, that pain, not wanting that pain, and that pain may come back and be afraid of it - that is, physically. The same thing psychologically. I am attached to you and that attachment I consider as love, which is nonsense, it is not love; where there is attachment, there is no love.

Obviously. We won't go into that for the moment. So I am attached and I am afraid if I let go my attachment I am facing a greater fear of loneliness. Right? Are you following all this? So thought is attached to a belief, to a person, to an idea, to a conclusion, to an opinion and is afraid to let go, because if you let go, where am I?

So fear is related to thought. I am afraid of dying, coming to an end. I may believe in all kinds of surviving - reincarnation, future life, resurrection and all that, but the fact is that I am coming to an end, and I don't know what will happen at that moment when I have to let go everything, so thought says: push it off further away, as far away as possible and do not even think about it. But there is always this worm going on, afraid of the future, afraid of letting go, afraid of not knowing, afraid of loneliness, and so on. So thought is the origin of fear. Right?

So the question then is: why does thought - please listen - why does thought have such extraordinary importance in the field of the psyche? You understand my question? You understand my question? Why does thought, thinking, take such supreme command in the field which is me? You understand? Is the 'me' the result of thought? Are you understanding what I am asking? Is your self, including the higher self, the supreme self, the atman, the super-consciousness, the ultra-consciousness, consciousness beyond, beyond, beyond, beyond, all that is still within the field of thought. Right? So what relationship has thought, if it is the origin of fear, what relationship has thought with regard to correct action, right action? You are following all this?

So, we will have to go into the question: what is the origin, the beginning, why has thought become so tremendously important? If thought creates fear, if thought has made the past so tremendously important, which is knowledge, and if thought, in spite of knowledge, in spite of everything, breeds fear, is it possible to give thought its right place and therefore, thought does not enter into any other field? You understand? Are we communicating?

So what is thinking? When I ask you that question, are you thinking? Or, please listen, are you listening? Which is it that you are doing? I am asking you. Giving thought its right place gives you freedom from fear. Are you actually listening to that statement? Or are you saying, how am I to put thought in its right place, please tell me what to do? So you are not actually listening! You have gone off, right?

So, I am asking you: please listen, find out, learn the art which is to put everything in life in its right place - sex, emotion, everything in its right place. So, we are asking: can thought realize itself and its activities and so bring about in itself its right place? You understand my question? Thought is now moving in all directions. And one of the directions is fear. So to understand fear, you must understand the place of thought - not stop thought. You can't do it. You may try to do it, but you can't stop thought. But if you can put it in its right place - not you - when thought puts itself in its right place, then it has understood, it knows its limitation, it knows its capacity to reason, logic, and so on, but in its right place, right? So we are asking: can you - can thought see itself, its own limitation, its own capacity and say, this reason, capacity has its place and it has no place anywhere else? Because love is not thought. Is it? You say, no. I think your heads must be very loose! Is love the product of thought, remembrance? Please listen carefully. Remembrance, of your sexual pleasures, other pleasures? Is that love? We will go into what the nature and the beauty of that thing is later. First, we are saying: unless you learn, learn not memorize, not repeat after what the speaker has said but actually find out for yourself whether thought has its own, realizes its own place, and when it realizes it, it won't move in any other direction, and therefore no fear. You understand this? This requires, please, application - test, not agreement or verbally, but daily test that you know that - not you - thought has created the you. Right? Thought has made you different from itself, and that is our problem, one of our problems. Thought, the origin of thought is the beginning of remembrance. Whether it is the most savage man, the most primitive animal, the anthropoid apes, remembrance is the beginning of thinking. Like that tape is registering now, the brain registers; registering means remembering. And the origin of thinking is remembering. That is a simple, ordinary fact. So can thought - please listen - can thought, your thinking, can your thought awaken to itself, know itself as the cause of fear and therefore realizing that, says: I know my right place. You understand? You know this requires great, not concentration, great awareness, implications of the whole movement of fear, the understanding of the movement of thought.

You see, if you do this, if you go into it, if your thought goes into it, this is part of real meditation, because you cannot meditate if your life is not in order. Right? If your daily life is not perfect order then meditation is something cheap, an escape, a meaningless illusory pursuit. That is why we are saying if there is to be real meditation, the full meaning of that word, the depth of that state, the beauty and the clarity and the compassion, you must then begin by laying the foundation of order in your daily life. But you find that extremely difficult. Therefore, you go off and sit under a tree or hold your nose and do all kinds of stuff thinking you are meditating.

So there is a tremendous possibility of being completely free of fear if you have listened very carefully to what the speaker has to say, because we are journeying together, we are walking together, we are sharing together in our walk, in our exploration. Therefore, there is no learning from somebody. You are learning as you walk, as you explore. So there is no authority. So have you, after an hour and a quarter, realized - has thought realized its place? Meditate upon it. Think about it. Go into it. Give half an hour of your life to find out - not half an hour, give your life to find out. Because, then you will see for yourself as a human being who represents mankind, whose consciousness is the consciousness of humanity, when there is no fear in that consciousness you, who have understood and gone beyond it, change the consciousness of humanity. This is a fact. So if I may ask, have you learnt the art - has thought learnt the art of putting itself in its right place? Then, once it has done that, the doors of heaven are open - heaven, you know. All right.

MADRAS 4TH PUBLIC TALK 1ST JANUARY 1978

We have been talking about the art of listening, and the art of observation, and I'd like a little bit to talk about the art of learning. We said, the art of listening is not to translate what you hear into your own particular jargon, into your own particular vernacular, or Sanskrit English, or your own particular language, but to listen actually to what is being said without making an idea of it, which I am afraid most of us do. We never listen to the thing itself, but make something out of it, either to suit ourselves or make it fit into our own particular way of thinking. That obviously prevents actual listening.

And also we were talking about the art of observation. To observe without distortion, without our particular prejudices and all the idiosyncrasies and tendencies to interfere with what we observe. We talked about that at some length also. Because when you observe something, specially yourself, without any distortion, without liking or disliking, without the idea of punishment and reward, then that which you observe freely, yourself, undergoes a radical transformation. I do not know if you have experimented with it, if you have tested it, or you are merely listening to a talk just as you would listen to other talks. Probably you are all professional listeners! So it becomes rather difficult when we are talking about serious matters that you are not testing it in your own daily life, that you are not going into it fully and deeply to find out if what the speaker is saying is true or false.

And the art of learning. I think this is rather important, perhaps for some of you it is rather new. For most of us learning implies, doesn't it, memorizing, storing away what you have heard, or what you have learnt, store away in the brain and trot it out when it is necessary. That's what we call learning from school days, through university, if you are lucky enough to go through university and so on. That is, gathered information, store it up as knowledge and act, either skilfully or not skilfully according to that knowledge. This is what we call learning. Isn't that so? I am not saying it is something extraordinary. But all of us function in our daily life from stored up memories, as knowledge, either very, very skilfully, or not at all. I think there is another way of learning, which is not only to store up knowledge, because we must have knowledge to function in daily life, technological, engineering, mathematical, professorial, scientific, doctor and so on, must have that kind of knowledge. But there is, I think, a way of learning which is not repetitive, which is not routine, which is not institutionalized way of thinking, tradition, but entirely different. This, I would like to begin if I may to talk about it, and perhaps we can both communicate with each other what the speaker means by learning.

That is, to learn apart from acquiring knowledge and storing it up and acting according to that, but learning without storing up knowledge. Learning to have an insight into the problem of existence, or problem of poverty, problem of religion and organization, to have an insight into it which is not intellectual, not analytical, but to have clear sight in that and act instantly according to that. Am I making any sense? Please help me to communicate to you what I am thinking about or feeling. Don't just go off to sleep. Just help me to convey this to each other. I think this is very important because to us skill, a capacity, has become extraordinarily important because it encourages the self, the 'me'. Right? The greater the skill the greater power, greater position, greater influence and all the rest of it, which is essentially the expression of the 'me', the self, ultimately selfishness. It encourages deep rooted selfishness. And if one is in search of what is truth, the truth, then one must be free of those activities that are merely memorial.

To have an insight into, say, tradition. To have an insight into it, not learn all about tradition, all the arguments against or for tradition, but have a deep insight into the whole nature and the structure of tradition, how it acts, what are its dangers and so on, to have immediate insight into that, and acting from that insight. So that you are acting without calculation, without personal demands, without personal prejudices and so on. You have got an insight into something that is true and are acting from that, then it is ultimate skill, which does not build up the self. Am I conveying something? Are we meeting each other on this?

So there is a way of learning which is not only the storing of memory but also freedom from the repetitive activity which memory cultivates. So when the speaker makes a statement, as I am going to make it now, that the ending of sorrow is the beginning of wisdom - the ending of sorrow is the beginning of wisdom - how do you receive it. What is your immediate reaction to it, not calculated reaction, not argumentative reaction, you hear a statement of that kind, how do you respond to it? Do you say, I have heard this before, who said it, I don't quite remember, is it so, it sounds rather good, but has it any validity? Are you comparing what is said, that statement, with somebody else's, or you have immediate insight into it and see the extraordinary truth of it and therefore the perception of that is a total action, not a fragmentary action. Am I conveying this?

So we are saying, that there is a way of learning which is having insight. When one has an insight it is not remembered. Each new insight is something fresh. Therefore action then is constantly not repetitive but constantly creative. I wonder if you get all this.

We will go into it as we go along, because we are going to talk about, as we talked about yesterday, fear, how every human being has this burden of fear. And we went into it. We said that fear is the movement of time. Just listen to it. The speaker says, fear, you know fear, don't you, fear is the movement of time. Now how do you receive it, share it, what is your response to it? Is it a response of insight and therefore total comprehension of it, or is it a fragmentary approach? You understand? Am I making myself clear, somewhat? I said fear is the movement of time. Thought is movement. Right? So thought is the movement of time. Thought is the response of memory, knowledge, which is the past. So thought springs from the past, modifies itself in the present and goes on, which is a movement from the past through the present to the future, it's a movement. All movement implies time. To go from here to Bangalore, your next village, or whatever it is, requires time. So thought is the movement of time. Right? At least verbally be clear on this - intellectually if you would prefer. I personally don't like that word 'intellectual' because it is rather a shoddy word. The intellectuals have done great harm, I'm afraid, in the world. Because they first encourage you to be communists, say a marvellous thing will happen, and then later on they get disillusioned with it, they withdraw and you are stuck. This is happening all over the world all the time. So I am rather wary of the intellectuals.

So when one says, as the speaker says, fear is the movement of time, do you capture the significance of it and see the depth of it instantly? Or your mind is arguing with it, or drawing a conclusion from it? You see the difference? So we ought to go into the question a little bit of what is time. There is obviously the time by the watch, chronological time, there is time by the rising of the sun and the setting of the sun, time as tomorrow when you are going off to do something; time as yesterday; time as future. Right? That's simple. Now we are questioning - please listen - if there is psychological time at all. Do you understand my question? Psychologically we think we have time. When you say, I will be good, I will achieve a state of mind when I will have peace, I will become the prime minister, I will become the executive, the top dog. So that is a movement of time. Right? Physically there is the movement of time, and we are questioning whether there is psychological time at all. Do you understand my question? Am I making my question clear at least? Do say yes, or no. Question, not the answer, not the explanation, which I am going to go into, but the question itself.

Now it matters very much how you approach a question. Perhaps in the very question is the answer. So it matter very much how you come to question and how you approach the answer. Right? Now how are you approaching this question? That is, is there psychological time at all? That is, I will become something.

Right? That is time. I am violent but I will not be violent. That is in the future. So that means time. I am unhappy but I will become happy, granted certain things and so on and so on. So all that implies time, psychologically. That is, I have had an experience which was extraordinary, lovely, beautiful, etc., and it has gone and I hope to have it again, and I go after gurus and all the lot. So all that implies psychologically time. Right? The moment you use the words 'I will', that implies time. Psychological time. So I am questioning, the speaker is questioning whether such time actually exists at all. Do you understand my question? How do you approach that question?

Please, sir, just listen, don't question, we are going to have a discussion the day after tomorrow, under the trees in the morning so you can bombard me with questions then. But I am asking you how do you approach this question, please listen to it, learn from it. The question is - first of all why do you put such a question. I am putting it, probably you have never put it, I am putting it, and you will ask me, why do you put such a question. I will tell you why I put it. I question the whole evolutionary psychological process altogether. Do you understand? That is, biologically we can't grow a fourth arm, or a second head, man's biological evolution has come to the highest possible, physically. That has taken a million years. And we may be under that misapprehension that psychologically it is the same. Inwardly we will make progress, eventually reaching enlightenment, god, whatever you like to call it. Now the speaker says, such time doesn't exist at all. You understand? So I put this question to you and how do you approach it. Obviously if you are articulate, and I hope you are, you will say,

I doubt it. Because if you say there is no time at all, psychologically, then I have no hope. You understand the question. That is why I want you to find out how you approach it. The speaker is denying all hope, therefore you must receive it with a shock, it must be a shock to you if you really understood it. So are you approaching the question with a shocked mind or are you saying, now let me listen? You understand? Let me find out, let me learn, not memorize, let me have an insight into this enormous truth. It may be an enormous truth or an enormous lie. You understand?

So it matters immensely how you approach the question, any question. Because in the very question itself and the approach is the answer. I am going to go into it. Are you working with me? We are working together? Or are you merely casually listening? You understand? Are you ploughing all the time and never sowing? Or, you are ploughing and sowing together? You understand? Which is it you are doing? Sowing means action in daily life. But if you all the time plough, plough, plough, which you probably do, intellectually, argumentatively, traditionally, then you never sow. So what is it that you are doing? Sorry to put so many questions to you.

So we are asking is there psychological time at all? Do you understand my meaning now? Or is there only fact, the actual and therefore no future to the actual. I wonder if you see that. Look, sir, we are educated from childhood, religiously as well as sociologically and in every way to live in a world of duality. Right? Not only duality of man, woman, darkness and light, but psychologically, inwardly to live in a world of opposites. Right?

And these opposites are endless corridors. Right? Now the speaker is questioning whether there is an opposite at all - though all your sacred books say there is an opposite, you have to find it - forgive me, I don't know all the names of it. So you have been educated, and the speaker says there is no opposite, only 'what is'. Right? Just go into it, play with it.

The opposite of violence is non-violence. Right? But non-violence is not factual, is not actual, but violence is actual. Right? Oh, my lord! Are we meeting each other somewhere? So the opposite is the invention of thought because it doesn't know how to deal with 'what is'. I wonder if you understand this. Are we meeting each other somewhere. Please, I must go on because I have a lot to talk about.

Is there an opposite to hate? Or only the fact of hate, the actuality of that feeling, and not the opposite of it. For most people the opposite exists. And I am saying, why does it exist. Why is there the opposite of hate? Call it love, call it goodness, whatever - why? Is it because we don't know how to deal with the fact of hate, 'what is', and so we think by having an opposite to it it will help us to get rid of hate. Having an ideal, which is non-factual, non-actual, we hope that will help us to get rid of that which is. Right? I wonder if you understand, it's simple enough. So we have invented the opposite, but the fact is 'what is'. When you are concerned only with 'what is' there is no opposite, there is no conflict with the opposite. Right?

So we are enquiring into whether there is time psychologically at all. Which means, is there an opposite of 'what is', now? You understand? I am in despair because I have lost my son, I have lost my job, I have lost my grandmother, whatever it is - I'm in despair. And I don't know how to solve this thing. Right? I am in despair, I cry, I am miserable, unhappy, and you come along and tell me, 'Look, old boy, you have to go through it, and come out of it and you will be happy, it is an experience, it is a lesson, it is your responsibility' or whatever, you give me all the explanations. Which is what? You are giving me hope. So out of my desperation you help me to escape from it and give me a hope. Now giving me hope is psychologically time. Right? So the speaker says such time doesn't exist at all, you have to deal with the fact of desperation. Right? Not try to achieve a state in which there is no desperation. So psychologically there is no evolution, there is no 'I' becoming better and better and better. Which is sheer nonsense, anyhow.

So time exists only in relation to knowledge and its action where it is absolutely necessary, otherwise there is no other time. Do you understand what it means? Either you live totally complete now and never again, which means a terrible statement to accept. I wonder if you see that. Because it takes away from you every sense of hope, which means you have to face actually 'what is', and not try to cultivate its opposite. Do you understand now? So you are now confronted with actually what is going on. And, as I said, if you can observe it without any distortion, if I can observe my despair, without any distortion, that means without any hope, without wanting to transform it, without wanting to run away from it, suppress it, but actually observe as though through a microscope without any conclusion, direction, just to observe, and that very observation transforms my desperation. I wonder if you get it. Will you test it out? Will you? And not go off into the opposite, because your whole habit, tradition is to go off to the opposite. So when you realize that psychological time doesn't come in at all.

So we said, fear is the movement of time. And time has a stop. This is, again how do you receive such a statement. You understand? Is this all too much for an evening? I must go on because I want to tell you so many things, learn from each other.

And now we must go into the question of the other side of the coin of fear which is pleasure. Right? Do you want to go into it? What is pleasure, and why does man throughout the centuries, millennia, pursue this thing at all costs, pleasure, why? Why do you, as a human being, pursue pleasure and avoid fear, and all the rest of it? Not only sexual pleasure, but pleasure of a position, status, pleasure of having a very good body, pleasure of achievement, pleasure of success, pleasure of possessing money and so on and so on. You are following all this? Why do you pursue pleasure? And it has become tremendously important in life, why? Go on, sir, answer these questions. When you go to a guru and obey all the silly things he trots out, and it gives you great pleasure to follow him - why? And does it give you pleasure now, sitting here, listening to the speaker? I doubt it!

So I am asking, it is the other side of the coin, the whole pursuit of pleasure, what is pleasure. When at the moment of pleasure, the moment, second, there is no idea, or thought of pursuing pleasure. Right? It is only after the event, whether that event be sexual, event be seeing the beauty of a sunset, seeing the sheet of water with the light on it, reading a phrase and seeing the beauty of the phrase and the pleasure of that phrase, a dozen ways we seek pleasure. What is pleasure? And why has man, you, who are the representative of all humanity, why have you made pleasure the greatest thing in life? Right? Why has sex - I hope you don't mind talking about it a little bit - why has sex become so extraordinarily important. The pleasure of it, the remembrance of it, the cultivation of it, the attraction towards it. Why has love been attached to that act, sex. So I am asking you, is love pleasure? Is love desire? Which is a form of pleasure. I desire to have a car, and that gives me great pleasure in possessing the car. So desire, which is so condemned by all religious people, and because of this condemnation it is said for any man who would be a religious person they must be free of desire - which is absurd.

So we are going to question everything and find out a way of living where there is only immediate action from insight. Not from calculation - we have been through that. So what is pleasure? Why has man throughout the ages given that as the greatest thing? Look into yourselves, sir, don't just listen to me, find out, learn from it. Is it because senses, sensory perception, sensory activity is much more important than clarity? You understand my question? Must I explain every question. Sir, to us senses, taste, smell and all the rest of it, give us such tremendous satisfaction. Right? So is pleasure a form of deep satisfaction and therefore the cultivate of desire and pleasure, which has nothing whatsoever to do with love. You follow what I am asking? So I am asking you, if you are thinking at all, following what the speaker is saying, is love desire, is love pleasure? If it is not, then either love has tremendous significance, or pleasure dominates that. You are following all this? Which in your heart, if you are honest, look at yourself, which is the most important thing to you? Not love, because you don't know anything about it. I question whether in India they know anything about love. They know a great deal about pleasure, a great deal of devotion, reverence, which is a form of self-worship. Right? And since you have give pleasure such tremendous importance, why has the mind, the brain given such significance to pleasure? Come on, sirs. You understand? The pleasure of having had an extraordinary experience last week, and I have lost it and I must have it. Pleasure of position, pleasure of - you understand, pleasure.

So is pleasure the movement of thought? Right? As we said, fear is the movement of thought and time. Right? So we are asking, is pleasure also the movement of time? Come on! I see a beautiful thing, a beautiful house, a beautiful woman or a man. The perception of beauty is natural, otherwise you would be dead, paralysed. To see something beautiful and to see it completely, that's natural. But the perception is interrupted by thought: I would like to have that house, it's so beautiful, I wish I could live there. Right? So see the beauty of the house and not let thought come into it at all. You understand what I am saying? Do you understand this? Because the moment desire comes into existence pleasure begins. But if you see the beauty of something and remain with it, and not move with the flow of desire. Sir, can you look at a car, a really good car - they don't exist in India, it's a monopoly here in this country, you play havoc with it - a really good car, beautiful lines, look at it. Because it's natural to look at that car, the line, all the rest of it. To look at it and not let thought say, how beautiful, I wish I could drive it, I wish I could be in it, own it, and drive it. You understand? Then begins the pleasure. You understand what I am saying?

Let me put it the other way: I see a beautiful sunset, lovely, with all the colours of the evening, the extraordinary sense of light and gaiety and beauty and strength. To look at it, enjoy it, look at it, and end it. Not say, I must remember it, and I wish I could have more of it, I'll come back tomorrow and look at it. Which is the perception translated into action of tomorrow, which is the cultivation of pleasure. I wonder if you see it.

So to look at something completely, end it. And not carry it over. You understand? The 'carrying it over' is the pleasure. Right? This requires a great sense of attention, and that attention itself brings its own discipline - not the discipline imposed. Right? So we are saying, fear is the movement of time. Pleasure is a movement of an event which is over and demanding that event, which is always pleasurable, to continue. Whereas if you can look, if that pleasure can end, there is no continuity, therefore there is no pursuit of pleasure. You understand this?

So the next thing is - we have got twenty minutes, so we can go into it. I want to find out what love is. Don't you? Don't you want to find out what the true factor, the true nature of love is, don't you? Do you? I will go into it. First of all, when there is fear, is there love? When there is pleasure and the pursuit of pleasure, is there love? When there is attachment, I am attached to my wife, I am attached to my husband, attached, is that love? Go on, sir, find out. You are attached to your wife, why? What is attachment? The pleasure she gives you, sexually or otherwise, and the image you have about her, gratifying or not, and all the rest of it, and you are attached. And because you are attached, and because of the pleasure of that attachment, and possession, there begins the act of cruelty. The cruelty of jealousy. Right? The cruelty of anxiety, fear, hatred. Right? You know all this, don't you. So I am asking, is attachment love? If you are not attached, would that be love? Then you might chase another woman, or another man. And when there is jealousy, is that love? And to come upon that extraordinary state, and the nature of it, the beauty of it, obviously fear, the movement of pleasure, which is remembrance, attachment, jealousy, all that must completely end. Will you do that? Or, you say, yes, quite right, it's a marvellous idea, I agree with you - and so you live in a world of words. And apparently because you live in a world of words you are starved, decayed because you have no love. Right? Would that be an accurate statement? Right?

Look at yourselves, sir, and find out whether you love any human being, whether you love any stray dog, whether you love the skies, the beauty of a tree and a flower, or you are so tremendously caught up in your own cocoon that you have no time or regard for anything else. Well, sirs, find out. Because if you have no love you are dead people. You may be very clever, you may be great pundits, scholars, specialists, but if that thing is not you have no right to exist as a human being. I know you will smile at this, you will see the reason of it, the logic of it, the sanity of it, but you will go on your old way. Right? And that's the tragedy of this country. They are very good analyzers, they are very good at arguments, theories, but when it comes down to action they are dead. Right, sirs?

So what will you do? Without love - if you have love then you can do what you will. Because you have no love, with all the gods, all the gurus, all the nonsense that is going on in this country. Do you understand all this, sirs?

So as love is not to be cultivated, not something that you plant and water it and let it grow, with care. As it is not something to be argued, discussed about, which means is it possible for the mind, for the brain to be free of the word. You understand? The word, not love, I don't mean that, the word. Is it possible for the brain not to function always with words? Because we are a slave to words - the Hindus, the Muslims, the Christians, the communists - words. So can you observe the slavery of the mind to words? And the word is not the thing. Right? The word 'love' is not love. So the word is not the thing. So the description is not the described. But to you the description is satisfactory. That's good enough. Right? So the symbol, the shadow, is more important than the fact.

So how will you, as a human being - please listen, sirs - how will you, as human beings, have this thing, this perfume; how will you come by it? You have suffered enough. Right? Humanity has gone through hell, tremendous wars, tremendous agony. Apparently that has not brought this thing. All your reasons, your theology, your gods, your gurus, your scriptures, have not brought this thing to you. You understand, sir? Do listen to me for god's sake, listen to me. Your organizations, institutions, none of them have brought this to you. So how will this happen, this miracle? Nobody can give it to you. Right, sir? You can't buy it. The gods that you have won't give it to you. The gods that you have are created by your mind, by your thought, by your hand. So thought won't give it to you, all your reason won't give it to you, all your selfish activities won't give it to you - your position, your authority, your status, nothing will give it to you. But you must have it. So what will you do? Sir, please, what will you do? I will tell you.

Sir, are you hungry for this? Do you abandon yourself to have this? You understand what I mean - abandon? Will you give up one thing - attachment - give it up and face what happens if you give it up. You understand? Immediately fear will arise, won't it. Right? Right, sir? Fear will arise when you let go. Then face it. Don't escape from it, deal with it, understand it, go into it. In the same way, if you really deeply are concerned with the nature of love and beauty, then it will come. But you must do something for it.

You see, unfortunately, we are educated in terms of reward and punishment. Right? That's our outlook on life. A merchant's outlook, a commercial outlook. I'll give you something, give me something in return. That's why you go to the temples. Now as you cannot buy love, reward and punishment, can you naturally, easily, happily, let go your particular form of pleasure, knowing pleasure is not love. You understand, sir? Will you do it?

Sir, look, if you have no love there is no possibility of meditation. Meditation means first putting everything in its right place, so the mind, the brain is free. You understand? Putting everything in its right place: your knowledge, your sex, your relationship and so on, in its proper order, in its proper sequence. Like an engineer, everything must be in sequence otherwise he cannot build a bridge. So meditation implies that you have established order in your life. Otherwise when you meditate you go off into an illusion, and it may be a very exciting illusion, and one of the things in meditation that comes is the desire for power. You understand? Desire for various forms of occult processes. You know there is a whole group of people practising levitation. Right?

It's much simpler to take a lift!

So unless you have laid the foundation in your daily life, the foundation is order, and out of this order, please, comes love. Not out of your chaos, confusion, not giving such tremendous importance to sex, to pleasure. Sex has its place, pleasure has its place, but when that becomes supreme you have chased away love. Right, sirs?

So we said fear is the movement of time, pleasure is the movement of a remembrance of an incident that has given you delight - which is also the movement of time. And where time exists there is no love. Time being, I will become something, I will become non-violent, I will become good. So the speaker says there is no such time, there is only 'what is'. Understand, observe 'what is', and 'what is' then undergoes tremendous change, but you must observe it without any distortion, which means you observe it with care, with love. You understand? So can you observe your violence with affection? Can you? Because then you don't condemn if you observe something with affection. You don't deny it, you don't suppress it.

So from the beginning of this talk we said the art of listening, the art of observing, seeing, the art of learning. Art means to put everything in life, in our daily life, in its right place. Then when you have put everything in its right place order comes. Order in your daily life. Then when there is order the mind then is free. Right? And only when the mind - the word 'mind' we are saying is both the activity of the brain, the content of our consciousness, which is consciousness, and all that is the mind - when you have put everything in order the mind is free. And it's only a mind that is free knows, has that extraordinary quality of love. So we will talk about what is implied in this question of what is sorrow, whether there is an ending to sorrow and what it means to die. All this is part of meditation.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 3RD JANUARY 1978

Could we this morning take one problem, or one issue, and work it out in great detail completely and fully; not just hear what the speaker has to say, but together take one issue, whatever it is, in our daily life and go into it step by step deeply and sanely. Could we do that this morning? You understand my question? What would you like to take as an intimate problem of one's life that you would like to talk over with each other and find a complete and total answer for it? So would you kindly say what kind of thing you would like to go into freely. What would you like to talk over together?

Q: Sir, there is an intellectual understanding of all that you are talking about but there is no fundamental understanding therefore it doesn't produce a transformation of my life. Could you please go into that question.

K: The questioner says, intellectually - I think he means really verbally - we understand more or less what you are saying, logically, reasonably, and fairly sanely, what you are saying. But after hearing you somehow we don't seem to be able to go very deeply into ourselves and transform ourselves completely. That's the question. Would you like to go into that question?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Oh, for goodness sake, they are just words to you. Haven't you got a problem? Haven't you got a problem, sir, daily life problem?

Q: All of us are oppressed.

K: We are oppressed, is that it?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: By society, by our friends, by your wife, by your husband, by your culture, you feel totally oppressed. Is that a problem? Or something to talk about? Please, as this is the last discussion, or dialogue, please don't waste your time and my time in talking about something that doesn't affect your life at all.

Q: Can you teach us about the wholeness you speak of in daily life?

K: Yes, not teach you but I will go into it. The question is, is it possible in our daily life to live a whole, complete full life. The word 'whole' means healthy, first; healthy body, healthy mind. Then it also means sanity; a sane mind, a mind that is capable of reasoning logically, objectively and so with clarity and therefore sanity. The word 'whole' means also holy, h-o-l-y. All this is implied in that word 'whole'. And the gentleman wants to know how to live a life that is whole.

Now which do you want to discuss? Which is the real problem to you, sir, not what I say to you, or you accept what I say, but an actual daily problem in your life.

Q: I have one such problem, sir. Irritation. I am easily irritated.

K: I am losing my temper and irritated. I am glad you get irritated!

So what shall we discuss?

Q: We should take the first question: we understand what you say intellectually.

K: Shall we go into that.

Q: Everything is covered in that.

K: Everything is covered in that question. So shall we go into that? We understand what you are talking about, intellectually or verbally, but somehow it doesn't seem to affect us very deeply. Somehow it doesn't penetrate widely and deeply our entire life. That's the question. So we are going to discuss that, talk it over together.

When you say, we understand what you are talking about intellectually, is that a fact?

Q: Not for me. I would like you to say something in a definitional sense about the words you use, brain and mind and consciousness. You use those three words and I would like you to say something about the words brain and mind.

K: I will, sir. This is what we are discussing now, we will go into it perhaps. I am asking, if I may, when you says, we understand you intellectually, verbally, what do you mean by that. Are you understanding me, the speaker, what he is saying, or are you trying to understand yourself, using the speaker as a mirror in which you are seeing yourself? Do you understand the difference? Right, sir? Which is it you are doing? Are you trying to understand what the speaker is saying, or are you perceiving yourself, seeing yourself in the mirror which the speaker is putting before you? Which is it you are doing? Understanding the speaker, or understanding yourself by seeing in the mirror which he puts before you? This is a simple question, so don't complicate it. So which is it we are doing?

Q: We try to apply what K is saying.

K: Yes, we are trying to apply what is being said. Do you know what he is saying? Before you apply something the speaker is saying, do you know what he is saying? He is saying, look at yourself. Use the speaker as a mirror, and then look at yourself. Right? That's what he is saying. Have we understood? Look at yourself. Do you see yourself, or do you see the picture that the speaker is painting? Do you understand my question, sir? Which is it that you are doing? Are you seeing yourself as you are, or are you trying to understand something the speaker is saying, therefore it becomes intellectual. I think this is a fairly simple question, and please answer it. Which is it that we are doing? If you are hungry, any amount of description of food will not satisfy you. Right? So are you hungry, or are you merely satisfied with the description of food, because you have already eaten?

Q: I am really hungry.

K: So you are really hungry, you want some food: who is going to supply you the food? Metaphorically speaking, I am not giving you food, you are not hungry, but in a different sense. Who is giving you the food that you want?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, don't just casually answer this, sir, go into it. You are saying, I am hungry and I want some food that will appease the hunger. Now wait a minute. Appease the hunger. Are you hungry intellectually, deep down, are you hungry? No?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: And from whom are you going to get the food? From the guru? From your books? From your culture? From some politician? Where are you going to get the food?

Q: From everybody I have ever seen.

K: I know, sir, you say that very casually. Is that a fact that you are really hungry, not in the physical sense, that you are really hungry and you want that hunger to be appeased and you don't mind getting it from anybody. Right?

Q: From everybody I have ever seen.

K: Yes, from everybody, anybody - from your wife, will you get it? You are all so casual.

Q: I am looking...

K: Wait, sir, we will go into it. First of all, let's be very clear what we are talking about. You are searching. Right? You are searching, you go from guru to guru, from temple to temple, or from philosopher to philosopher, and you happen to come here this morning and say, 'Please help us in ourselves to find truth'. Right? Is that right? Are you quite sure? So first of all, are you clear what you are searching for? Are you searching for satisfaction? Are you searching to escape from this dreadful life, monotonous, stagnating, dull, boring life, and so you want an escape, a drug? When you say, I am searching, and we are asking, what is it you are seeking? Happiness?

Q: Yes.

Q: Contentment.

K: Contentment.

Q: Peace.

K: Yes, sir I can supply all the words and you will all agree. So what is it, you want all this: happiness, contentment, peace, love - what?

Q: Everything.

K: Everything. Are you capable of receiving everything?

Q: Order, sir.

K: I said, are you capable of receiving everything that you want.

Q: No, sir.

K: No, sir you have not even understood my question. Your capacity is very small, it's like going to the well with a small pitcher.

Q: Sir, I want to...

K: Just a minute, sir, be good enough to listen to what the speaker is saying, have the courtesy to listen first. You might go the well with a small pitcher, and be satisfied what you collect in that little pitcher. Is that what you want?

Q: I need a vessel that will hold everything I hold.

K: Sir, you haven't even listen to what I am saying. If you are seeking everything, that is, happiness, contentment, enlightenment, wisdom, ending of fear and so on, you must have a vessel that can contain the enormity of life.

Q: I...

K: Sir, sir. Is this the first time you are here, sir?

Q: Yes.

K: Oh, then that explains it. Good enough sir. Is this the first time that you are all here? Please have the goodness to listen. I am asking, if I may, what is it you are seeking. It's no good saying, everything. Are you seeking contentment?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Are you seeking contentment?

Q: We don't know what we are seeking.

K: Yes, sir, I am taking one example, one factor, let's go into it, sir, and then spread it out. Are you seeking contentment? Would you kindly answer.

Q: Sir I think it is...

K: Sir, are you seeking contentment? If one could go into that one question, that will perhaps open a great deal. But you won't even go into that. Are you asking, because I am discontented, unhappy, I find no satisfaction in anything, so I am greatly discontented, disturbed, and I would like to be free from that disturbance, from that dissatisfaction, insufficiency, and find some place, or somewhere where I can be completely contented. Is that what you want? Go on, sirs. Is that what you want?

Q: Yes, it is.

K: Right sir?

Q: We want to know what we are.

K: One of the factors of what you are is discontent. Right? One of the factors. Through one factor, the understanding of one factor, and opening, going into it very deeply we may cover the whole field. You understand, sir? So if you will kindly find out for yourself whether you are so discontented with life, with your job, with your environment, with your culture, with everything, discontented. Discontent. Are you? With your guru, with your religion, with your Vedas, with your Upanishads, with your politics, your economic environment, and so on, discontented with everything that you have about you? Is that a fact?

Q: Yes, sir it is a fact.

K: To you? Right. So you want to find a way out of this discontent. Right? Now please listen, first listen. Who is going to help you out of this? You have tried the Vedas, you have tried the Upanishads, you have tried the gurus, you have tried puja, you have tried god knows what, and you are not out of it. Right? Are you? Are you out of it? Be honest to yourself, I don't want your agreement, nodding your head, but be honest to yourself. You have tried so many things and you say, I cannot find contentment, and therefore I am burning with discontent; please help each other to see if it is possible to be free of this discontent. Right? So it is a legitimate question to ask you. Do you know the meaning of that word 'discontent'? Discontent with something - please listen - with something, with my husband, with my wife, with my girl friend, discontent with something; or is there discontent by itself? You understand my question, sir? Which is it? I may be discontent in the house I am living in because I want a larger house, I may be discontent with my wife, who is dull, a bore, or my husband. I am discontent with that. I am discontent with my job and I want a better job. I am discontent with what I am - my ugliness, my pettiness, my brutality. Which is it? You understand? Discontent, being discontent, dissatisfied with something and is there a discontentment in itself. You understand? You have understood my question, sir? Now which is it?

Q: I am discontent.

K: You are discontent not about something, but it is a flame that is burning in you, not fed by another, by faggots or wood of not having this, not having that, wanting more, wanting less. So you find that there is a discontent by itself. Is that so?

Q: It is not a fact, sir. It is discontentment with something.

K: That's all. I understand, sir. So let's be very clear that you are discontent with something. Right? Right, sir? With my relationship, I am not good at exams, I am not this, so you are discontented with something. Now what is it that you are discontented with? Then if you know what you are discontented with then we can proceed, we can go into it. But if you casually say, I am discontent, it means nothing. Do you want - please listen - do you want that discontent smothered, put down, - die down, let it wither away? Or do you want that discontent which is like a flame to burn, to burn everything round out? You understand my question? Which is it you want: to suppress that discontent, to hold it down, to put a lid on it, to run away from it; or do you want that discontent to keep on burning? Why shouldn't you be discontent? Is it a good thing to be discontent? No? Yes. So it is good to be discontent. Right? With what? With your husband? With your children? With your society? With your culture? With your tradition? With your government? Or, dissatisfied in yourself, what you are - petty, small, narrow minded, ugly, quarrelsome, jealous, anxious. Which is it: discontented with things outside, house, husband, or discontented in yourself with regard to what you are?

Q: With what I am, sir.

K: You are discontented - please listen, sir - you are discontented with what you are. Right? Is that it? Not with husband, wife, society, the world outside you. Please. So you are discontented with yourself. Right? Would that be right, sir?

Q: Only rarely am I discontented with myself.

K: So we will accept that: you are very rarely discontented with yourself, what you are. Mostly we are discontented about the world outside of us. Now just a minute, just a minute, go slowly. Is the outside different from you? You understand? The society which you have created - the society which is around you, are you not the product of that society? Are you not the product of the culture? Are you not the product of your tradition? Of your economic condition? So you are the outside, which you think is separate from you. Right? So don't divide the world and the 'me'. You understand? You are the world. Right? Because you are the result of your society, you are the result of your conditioning, you are the result of your tradition, you are the result of your father, mother, who believe and so on and on. All that is the outside world, and that outside world has made you. Right? So you are the outside world. Right, sir? Not only logically but factually, it is so. Right? So don't divide, saying, I am different from the world, I am dissatisfied with myself and not with the world. You understand the question? So you are dissatisfied not only with the world but what the world has made you. At last, it takes such a long time. Right? So you are the world. Right? Right, lady? So the world is you, so you can't say I am not dissatisfied with the world but only with myself. When you are dissatisfied with yourself you are dissatisfied with the world: the culture, the religion, the puja, the house, you follow. Right? So you are discontented with what you are, which is the world. Right, sir? Right?

Q: I am unable to see that.

K: You are unable to see that. All right, sir. Aren't you conditioned by the religion in which you have been brought up? Right? And that religion has been passed from father to son, to son, to son. Generations of superstition. Right? So you are the result of that superstition. Right?

Q: And education.

K: I said, that, education, superstition, the culture, the Vedas, the books, you are the result of all that. So you are discontented with yourself therefore you are discontented with the world. So you are the world. Right? Don't say, yes, until you really understand it, even verbally. A Christian is conditioned by the propaganda of two thousand years, as you are conditioned by propaganda of five thousand years or more. Right? So you are the result of that propaganda. Obviously, lady, don't take time. So when you say you are discontented, you are discontented with the world, which is you. Got it?

Now, let's proceed from there. So you are the world and the world is you, and you are discontented with everything that the world has put together. Right? So to what depth is this discontent? Is it just superficial? You understand? Just under the skin, or does it go very deep?

Q: It is rather superficial.

K: So you say it is rather superficial. Right?

Q: No.

K: With you it is not, so I am going slowly, we will go into it slowly, have a little patience. How is it that you are so bright? This discontent, someone says, is rather superficial. Why is it superficial? Please go into it, sir. Why is it superficial? When you say, superficial, it is on the surface - the word 'superficial' is on the surface. Why is it on the surface? Go into it a little bit. You see poverty round you, people deprived of everything, degradation of poverty, you see this round you, dirt, squalor, misery, confusion. So how can you see all that and say, 'It's all very superficial'? Or is it that you are not - forgive me, I am just suggesting - that you are not sensitive. Right? You are not sensitive. Now what do you mean by that word 'sensitive'? One is sensitive to one's own feelings. Are you following this? One is sensitive to one's own desires. One is sensitive to one's own demands, longings, loneliness, to oneself. Which means you are so self-centred that you are not sensitive to the beauty of the trees, you are not sensitive to the beauty of the sky, you are not sensitive to that starved dog, the poverty. You are just sensitive to yourself, about yourself. Therefore you say, I am superficial. Have you understood? So which is it? Why are you not aware of what is taking place around you? The squalor of your house, the untidiness of your house, the way you eat, the food, everything, why aren't you sensitive to all that?

Q: Sir, I am bothered about what I am going to be all the time, sir.

K: Yes, so you are all the time concerned about yourself and your future. Right? So your discontentment is a very short little affair. Isn't it? Because I am so concerned with the future, about my dresses, about my looks, about my - you know, about myself. So I am asking why are you superficial, when there is so much agony around you, so much misery, how can you possibly be superficial? That's one point.

When you say, it is not superficial but very deep - right - now what do you mean by that word 'deep'? Is it measurable? Please go into it carefully. Is it measurable? So the word 'depth' means it is possible to measure. Right? The very word implies a measurement. Now, wait, look. May I go into it a little bit?

Q: Go on.

K: I will, sir. The whole western world, from Greece, the whole western world said, measurement is absolutely necessary. That's why they have developed technology to its utmost extent - they will go on - but measurement was necessary. Right? You are getting this? Now the ancient Hindus - which you are not, so don't identify yourself with them - the ancient people said, measurement is very limited - I haven't read the books, but you can see it. So to find the immeasurable you must be free of measurement. Of course. Which means, you must be free of that capacity to compare, to measure, the more and so on. You understand what I am saying?

So there are these two approaches to life: measurement, the whole of the west is based on that, if you have gone into it, if you have discussed with people you will see that from Greece, which exploded over Europe and so America and so on, you will find that the principle of their outlook was measurement, to measure. And the Asiatic world said, measurement is not enough, one must go beyond the capacity to measure, because measurement is very limited. So you have these two. Now which is it you are thinking of when you say, deep? Are you interested in all this? I am sorry the sun is in your eyes, what am I to do? Would you like to come and sit here, sir, any of you?

So which is it when you say, I am deeply discontented, is it that you have compared, measured and therefore you use the word 'deeply'; or you merely say, I am totally discontent, not using the word 'depth'? Does somebody follow all this?

Q: What is discontent?

K: That's what I want to know: are you totally discontent, or measurably discontent? That's good. Which is it?

Q: Totally.

K: No, no, be careful, sir. When you say, I am discontented with the world - the world being my house, my property, my wife, my children, my culture, my gods, outward, and therefore that is measurable, and also you see that you are that, you are the result of all that. Therefore are you saying, my discontent is comparative, I have compared? I wonder if you see all this. I have compared my discontent with other people's discontent and therefore I am measuring it? Or do you say - please listen - I am totally, completely discontent? You see the difference? So which is it?

Q: Total.

K: Be honest, you don't have to be dishonest with me because it doesn't matter. So are you totally or partially discontent?

Q: Partially.

K: Partially.

Q: Totally.

K: Totally. Wait. One at a time.

Q: It means that the centre is not there if you are totally discontent.

K: Yes, so you are totally discontent. Are you actually? Or is it just words, totally?

Q: We are in a trap.

K: Yes, you are in a trap. The trap of the rat race, the trap of what humanity is doing - wars, talk about peace, prepare for wars, armaments. Right? Talk about non-violence, go to temples, do everything to prepare for war. Right? All your money, your taxes, go into that. Don't you know all this? Of course. So what are you discontented with, and why are you discontent? You understand? You say, I am discontented totally - why?

Q: Because there is no transformation.

K: You are not answering my question, sir. Think it out. Why am I discontented. Is it because I want deep satisfaction? Is it because I have ideas what the world should be? Is it because I see that it's monstrous to have a poor country where there are rich countries? So why is it you are discontented?

Q: Unlimited wants.

K: Unlimited want. I am discontented because my want is so stupendous, wide, unlimited, and I am discontented.

Q: The means are limited.

K: Yes, sir, that's what it means. That's why I said at the beginning of the talk, of this discussion, are you going to the well with a little pitcher, or you have the well itself. You understand my question? No. You know when you go to a well if you have a little pot there's not much water. So how do you go to the well - with little minds? With wanting to change a little - I wish my husband was a little different, my wife a little bit better, nicer looking, not so stupidly dull, or this or that. With what energy, with what capacity, with what spread of your arms - how do you go to the well? You are doing that now. You understand? You are coming to the well. How are you coming to it? And also, why are you coming to it? Both are important: why you go to the well - you understand what I mean by 'well', I don't have to go into it. Why do you go to the well? What is the motive, what is the urgency, why do you want to go there? And if you are there can you drink enormously the waters, or you just slake your thirst? You understand my question? So which is it you are doing? Please, sirs, this applies to all of us, for god's sake, to all of us. Please find out.

Look: I want to meditate, so I go from one guru to another, to try to find out how to meditate, but my mind, my heart is like a little peanut. Right? Like a monkey nut, a groundnut. And I say, 'By Jove, with that little mind I am going to meditate'. Right? Your meditation then becomes the same size as the peanut. So in the same way, are you coming to the well with a little pot, or with a tremendous thirst?

Q: Have we all got the capacity to transform totally?

K: Sir, I am not talking of total transformation. I am talking about how you come to the well which will perhaps quench all your discontent. Wait, sir, I haven't finished. And you are asking a question, has each one of us the capacity. It's up to you. Right, sir, it's up to you. If your discontent is tremendous then you go to the well with a tremendous vessel. If your discontent is the size of a groundnut, peanut, then you go to the well with a little vessel. And I am afraid that's what you are doing. Not you, lady, but most of us.

Q: The desire to change, is that also not measurable?

K: Of course it is. So you have to find out what you mean by change. Change from the known to the unknown? Or change from one corner of the field to another corner of the field? You understand? So please be good enough to find out for yourself why you are discontent, and whether you go to the ends of the earth to find the water that will quench completely the whole discontent.

Isn't this discontent good, like a flaming that is burning? And if you smother it you just become mediocre, a bourgeois little entity. That's all. But you keep that flame burning, burning, burning, not be satisfied with anything - communism, socialism, Maoism, or Krishnamurti-ism, anything. Now what is it you are doing? This is very important to find out, is it not.

Q: It is importance to have the energy.

K: Yes, sir, the importance of energy. Is not energy part of this discontent. But if you are discontented with little things - bigger houses, little more, little less, bigger car, more money, more this, more that, that discontent, that energy is dissipated in little things. Right, sir? Are you doing that? When I ask you that question, are you doing it - you all become silent. Yes, sir?

Q: If one has discontent you reject everything.

K: You can't reject Krishnamurti-ism because he is talking about yourself. It means you reject yourself.

So please for your own sake, don't waste your life. Right? You waste your life when you are satisfied with little things. Right? Little car, bigger car, better house, better garden, better this and that. So don't waste your life. If you want to find out what meditation is, give your life to find out.

Q: Does it help to be always discussing, always hunting?

K: Hunting, or searching. It means both, sir.

Q: Is it useful to be always burning?

K: Is it useful - for whom, I don't know - to always be in a state of burning. What do you mean useful?

Q: Burning means wastage.

K: This is quibbling over words. Sir, may I ask a question of all of you? Forgive me if I ask you a question. Aren't you wasting your life? Aren't you? What are you going to do about it?

Q: That's is what we want from you, sir.

K: That is, I am becoming your guru. I refuse to be your guru. Followers destroy the gurus, and the gurus destroy the followers.

Q: How do we know if we are wasting our life?

K: Sir, that's what I am asking, sir, please find out. You have got another half an hour, ten minutes, or more, to find out whether you are not wasting your life. You have only this life - the other life, the future, may be, or may not be, but you have got only this life - thirty years, forty years, fifty years, or whatever it is, aren't you wasting it, which is such a precious thing?

Q: The concept of wastage presupposes some kind of goal.

K: Not in the least. Sir, I'll show it to you, what I mean by wasting, there is nothing presupposing a goal. Am I not wasting my life when I am following somebody, when I accept authority, except the authority of surgeons and so on? Am I not wasting my life by following somebody? Because when I follow somebody that somebody is created by me. No? So I am following myself in the name of the guru. Right? So isn't that a waste of time, this pretension to follow some ideal which you have projected and of which you are part? You are following yourself, your desires, your wantings, all the rest of it. So isn't that a waste of your life?

Q: What if the relationship between the disciple and the guru is of its very nature non-dual?

K: Oh, no, no. I don't want to go to some beastly guru, sir, we have gone beyond that, I hope.

Q: Gone beyond what?

K: I hope we have gone beyond the gurus and authorities.

Q: I thought you were talking about guru relationships.

K: No, no, I am not talking of dual relationship. I am only saying, aren't you wasting your life when you accept spiritual authority.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, please find out. We are talking about wasting your life, and the gentleman says when you use the word 'waste' it implies a motive, it implies an end. I am refuting that statement: I say it does not. I waste my life, sir, when I am bothered about my little corner of myself, my goodness - you follow - thinking about myself, myself, myself. Isn't that a waste of life? No? Yes. So are you wasting it? You see you become silent.

Q: You follow a spiritual authority for a particular reason.

K: I explained all that, sir. Sir, I don't want to go into that question now because we have dealt with it umpteen times, a thousand times. So that is not the point now being considered. We are considering whether we are wasting our life.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: First find out if you are wasting it.

Q: We have to have a goal or...

K: No, no, no, not goal.

Q: Can you please explain that?

K: I will, I will. You understand, sir, first of all our life is very short. Right?

Q: Life is not so short.

K: Good god, sir, you may live another ten years, fifty years, hundred years, but it is short. What is the matter! Your life is short, isn't it? Now it may be relatively short or a little bit longer, but it is still short. Are you aware of that?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Need I go into that? No. I won't go into, you can discuss it with somebody else. Do we know we live during these years a very short life. Right? And it matters enormously how we spend that life. Right? Spend in the sense, whether we are sane, whether we have got a very good body and keep it healthy, otherwise you are finished. Where you have got a good clear capacity to think. And it implies a life that is not merely superficial. And also it implies that when you are talking about whole, is your life sacred. You understand? Is your life sacred? That's what I mean, your life is not sacred if you are not sane, reasoned, capacity to think clearly, objectively, not about yourself, yourself all the time, and to have a good body, good mind, good brain. And also that implies to love, to love, to have compassion. All that is implied when we say, your life is very short, are you wasting it.

So I am asking you, if I may, is your life sacred? Not the temples, those are all the inventions of thought, all your temples and your gods, your books. But I am asking you, is your life sacred. No, sir, please sir. Holy? That you are acting rightly under all circumstances? So if you are not, you are wasting your life. Right? That's why I said it is very important to find out whether your life, which is not your life, it is the life of humanity, because you are the representative of humanity because you suffer like the man who suffers in America, or in Russia, your anxiety is like the man in America, or Russia - he is full of sorrow, anxiety, pain. Right? He is like you. So you are actually the representative of humanity. Right? So if you really understand that, not intellectually but deeply, then I am asking, is your life sacred? It doesn't mean putting on robes and all that circus. Because if your life is sacred you affect the consciousness of mankind. You understand? Because you are the representative of all humanity. Your consciousness is the consciousness of all humanity, because all humanity, all human beings suffer, lonely, despair, hope, live in anxiety, in uncertainty, no security. You understand? This is happening right through the world, and you are part of that. Therefore if your life is changed radically, if your life is sacred, you affect the consciousness of man. You understand? So that means, your discontent has no depth, it is discontent, not with something but the flame of it. Then that energy, which is so tremendous if you don't run away from it, the energy of discontent, that energy will find the right action always.

Well, sir, where are we now at the end of an hour and a quarter, where are we? Go on, sirs, where are we?

Q: Do you want us to face reality even if it is evil. The problem is how to face it.

K: How to face...

Q: I think you want us to...

K: I don't want you to do anything. I don't want you to do anything. Right? It's your life. If you say, help me to understand this, we can then, but if you say, tell me what to do, then I become your guru, I become your authority - please listen - which I absolutely refuse.

Q: Can we together find a solution?

K: I am doing it now. We are doing it now. Are you aware, know, conscious that you are wasting your life? Don't say, relative, positive, so much - wasting. And I said, wasting implies that this discontent, are you smothered in it, are you running away from it, or try to find such deep satisfaction that discontent disappears. I consider that a waste of life, just to run away from discontent.

And also I said, is your mind sane, clear, objective, not concerned all the time about your little self. And also I said, if you are in constant battle with yourself, struggle with yourself, that's a waste of life because you are wasting energy. So find out if you want to, why you have conflict in yourself all the time. Why are you in conflict, sir? Aren't you in conflict, why? Didn't you hear what he said the other day at the talk? Facts, fact has no opposite. When you have the opposite then you are in conflict. Have you understood? That is, when I am angry the opposite is not to be angry, so there is a conflict. Right? So I only deal with fact, which is anger, not, 'not to be angry'. So I say, anger. That anger is me. I am not different from anger. Right?

So I observe - there is an observation of the fact of this reaction named as anger. Right? Are you following this? By observing without distortion that which you have named as anger undergoes fundamental transformation. Experiment, test it, don't agree with it. You know you are envious, don't you, that you are much nicer looking than I am, more intelligent than I am, envy. Now the opposite of that word 'envy' is what? Not to be envious. Which is the fact? Which is the fact? Envy, isn't it? Not, 'not to be envious'. So you look at the fact. Right? How you look at the fact is tremendously important. Whether you look at it with distortion, that is, wanting to go beyond it, or wanting to suppress it, or wanting to say, 'Why shouldn't I be envious?' All those are factors of distortion. Where there is distortion it means you are moving away from the fact. Right? So can you observe the fact of that reaction which you named as envy without the word, just to observe it? Then, as I was explaining, when you look at something through a microscope, if the observer is conditioned by his hypothesis, conditioned by his desire, then the object at which he is looking through the microscope, it doesn't do anything. Whereas if he looks through it without any distortion the thing which he is observing undergoes a change. You understand? So there is no conflict. Conflict exists only when you move away from fact. When I see myself in the mirror and say, I am ugly, that's a fact. But when I say, I want to be more beautiful, more this and more that, conflict begins. You understand. The observation of the fact removes completely conflict.

Q: I want to ask a question.

K: In relation to what we are talking about?

Q: Yes. Act if you have no choice, if you have a choice don't act.

K: No, no sir. Just a minute. Go into it. Sir, why do you choose? Choose between yellow cloth and white cloth, between blue cloth and red - you choose there naturally, that is inevitable. If you want a good car, you choose it. You choose, that's all right. But why do you psychologically choose at all? You understand my question? Why do you choose? Doesn't choice come when you are not clear? When I know the road to Madras, there is no need for choice, I just go. Where there is clarity there is no choice. It's only the confused mind that chooses. You won't accept all this. So before you choose be free of your confusion, then it's finished. Can you be free of your confusion? If you are not free then you are wasting your life. You understand? So can you be free of your confusion? What are you confused about? Whether to choose one politician or another, one group of politics, congress, this, that. Do you know the facts about these gentleman - politicians the world over are a strange people. Right? This is so obvious. So where do you choose? Do you go all round the world and say, 'I am going to marry the most beautiful girl' and so go round the world and choose. Come on, sirs, when you use the word 'choice' what do you mean by it? Choose between various gurus? One guru better than the other guru, one god better than the other god? So when there is choice it indicates a mind that is utterly confused. We think because we choose we are free, which is a fallacy. A free man doesn't choose, he is clear.

Well, sirs, if I may, it is five minutes to nine, if I may ask, not as a teacher in a school, what have you learnt this morning? You understand my question? What have you gathered? Will you be the same tomorrow? The same dull, stupid, traditional, repeating, repeating - will you be the same tomorrow?

Q: It will be the day after tomorrow.

K: Yes, sir very clever, the day after tomorrow. So I am asking, you have spend an hour and a half listening, what have you gathered which is yours, not mine?

Q: Understand life better.

K: Understand life better - your life? Your life? When you use 'better', when you use the word 'better', the better is the enemy of the good. Right? Either you are good or not good, either you flower in goodness, or you don't flower.

MADRAS 5TH PUBLIC TALK 7TH JANUARY 1978 'WHAT IS THE INNERMOST NATURE OF THE SELF?'

In spite of what is going on around here, we are a gathering of serious people. This is not an entertainment. And so I hope you will not mind if we go on talking about what we have been discussing or going into in last four talks.

I think we ought to go into the question of sorrow and death. We ought to go into it fairly thoroughly. But before we go into it we should consider seriously what is the whole nature of thought, because we live by thought. All our activities are based on thought. All our relationship with each other is based on thought, though we call it love and all the rest of it, but essentially it is based on thought. Our religions, the whole psychoanalytical process of the Freudian, the Jungian and all the rest of it, and all the rituals, the pujas, the gods that man has created throughout millenia after millenia, is based fundamentally on thought. I think we ought to go much more in detail about that, if you will.

I wonder if one realizes thought in itself is fragmentary, very limited. It may expand that limitation thinking it is going to cover the whole universe, but it is still fragmented, limited. It is limited because it is born of time; time being memory, experience, knowledge stored in the brain, and that memory responding. And so it is always limited, fragmentary. It can imagine, it can think, it can say to itself, that I can perceive the totality of man, of love, or of the immeasurable, the timeless. It can think it can conceive of it, but being itself limited and fragmentary, whatever it creates, puts together, must be limited and fragmentary. And that's why when all our relationship is based on thought, our relationship is never whole, complete.

So we are going to find out, if it is possible, whether there is a perception, an insight, an innermost way of living which is not fragmentary, which is not limited. I hope we are understanding each other. As we said the other day, we are exploring together, we are investigating into this problem, which is: is it possible to live a life, a daily life, which is not broken up, fragmented, but a life that is complete, whole? I am sure most of us must have asked that question. Because when there is an action of the whole then it is never repetitive. It is only a fragmentary activity that is always breaking up, limited, boring, repetitive. We are going to go into that for a little, if you don't mind.

Because thought has divided the world into nationalities, geographic divisions, class divisions, religious divisions, ideological differences - communists, socialists, ultra left and ultra right, and so on and so on. Thought has done this. And also we live a fragmentary life. Our life is broken up - businessman, religious man, a monk, a lawyer and so on and so on, specialized entities. And that too is the result of thought which is in itself limited and fragmentary. Now we are going to find out if it is possible not to live a life which is fragmentary, but which has no regrets, no grief, anxiety, sorrow.

So we have to investigate together into the question of what is the self, the 'me', the ego, the entity that identifies itself as being separate from another? If you will we are going to go into that to find out whether one can lead a daily life which is not based on you and me - me first and you second. Our whole culture is that, social, moral, ethical, religious and so on. Right? Can we go on with it? What is the self, the 'me', the ego, how does it arise, what is its inmost nature of the self? Inmost, the very depth of it. Is that very structure, the nature of the self, fragmentary? Or is there in the very structure, in the very essence of it, a quality which is not fragmentary? You are following all this? I ask because - please sirs, I ask because I am not sure we are meeting each other. Please, sir, I am not sure we are communicating with each other. I rather doubt that we are, because it is a very serious thing that we are investigating. Because man has always lived with sorrow, and is acquainted with grief, whether it is possible to end that sorrow, not in some distance future but in our daily actual life now.

And also to find out, not intellectually or verbally, or emotionally and romantically, the nature and the beauty of love, what is the depth of it, the meaning of it, the fulness of it. And also what is death? So it is very important, it seems to me, that we examine together, share together, walk together, investigate together, this question, which is: what is the nature of the self, the identity of a particular individual opposed to the community, opposed to the many, and what is the inmost nature of the self? Without speculating, without asserting, without accepting the traditional verbiage - I am using the word 'verbiage', it is just words. So we are together, please bear in mind, we are together exploring. So you are not just sitting there listening to the speaker but actually working with him. That means you will have to give your attention, you have to listen to each other, though all of you can't speak and I am the only person unfortunately who speaks at the moment. We have to be very alert, watchful, heeding that which is being said, and our response to what is being said, and how we receive or accept, or listen to what is being said. All this is the responsibility of those of you who are willing to listen seriously.

May we go on? If the self, the 'me', is put together by thought then whatever it does at the highest so-called conscious, or super-conscious level, is still fragmentary. Right? If it is not put together by thought, the 'me', the ego, the self, then it is something sacred, inviolable, unaltered, something that is beyond time. So we are questioning these two factors: whether it is put there, the nature and the structure of the 'me', the ego, the self, by thought and therefore fragmentary, and whatever it does, however it might imagine, long for, hypnotize itself that it is the whole, that it can perceive the whole, it can come upon truth, either that is a total illusion and deception; and if the self, the 'me', the ego, the you, is something that is not of time, that is not born of thought, then it is capable of perceiving totally the nature of truth, that which is beyond words, which is not measurable by words. So these two are factors which we must examine. Right?

So we are trying to find out the inmost nature of the self because all our activity is based on self. The me first and you second. In all our relationships, in all our bureaucratic activities, social activities, in our relationship with each other, the self, the self-centred activity is constantly in operation, even when we are meditating, even when we are supposed to be religious and all the rest of it. Right? So what is the self? Unfortunately most of you probably have read philosophy, sacred books - I won't call them sacred because they are just books - or somebody has told you, your guru, or your religious leader probably has told you the self is something extraordinary, it is to live everlastingly from the beginning to the end.

So we are asking a very simple question, which is really tremendously complex. How you approach that question matters a great deal. Whether you approach it with fear, you approach it with a conclusion, or accepting the authority of others, and your approach then is already limited, circumscribed. To investigate one must be free otherwise you can't investigate. Right? If you are prejudiced, if you have some ideals, some conclusions, some wish, then that very wish, conclusion is going to dictate your investigation. So can you, if I may ask, be free to go into this matter very carefully, logically, sanely, and freely, to find out the nature of the self, and the inmost essence of the self?

Because if the self is merely the operation of thought, put together from the very beginning of time then death has a certain meaning. If it is not, then death is a beginning. We will go into it. The individual, the identity of a human being who feels, or thinks he is separate, is he actually separate though his form, name, may be different, his idiosyncrasies, his character, his peculiar, if I may use the word without being misunderstood, genius, peculiar genius - not in the great sense of the word genius - peculiar excentricities, tendencies, qualities, are they the result of culture, the culture in which you are born, the development of character, the resistance to the culture, which may be the idiosyncratic outlook on life. This is very, very important for us, if I may point out over again, to go into.

So first, what are you? Your activity is based on the self, self-centred activity from morning until night. So what is that centre from which you are acting? The centre from which you are meditating, if you meditate - I hope you don't - that centre from which all your fears, all your anxieties, sorrows, griefs, pain, affections, arise, that centre from which you are seeking happiness, enlightenment, god, or truth, or whatever you like, the centre from which you say, "I take a vow to be a monk", the centre from which, if you are in business, trying to become more and more and more powerful, more money. That is the centre which we are examining, the self. What is that self and how has it come into being? That is, to know yourself. You understand? That is, knowing yourself as actually what you are, not what you think you are, what you hope to be, but the self and the knowing of that self, whether it is possible to know it completely, the essence of it. And whether it is possible to go beyond all the fragmented activity of the self. Right?

So is the self that centre put together by thought? Please think and investigate, reason, as though for the first time you are thinking about it, then it is fresh, then you can investigate. But if you say, "I already know what the self is, I already have come to certain conclusions about it", you will prevent yourself from examining it. Right? That's fairly simple.

So what is the self? You, what are you? Not, who you are, but actually what are you? There is a difference between who you are and what you are. I don't know if you see semantically the meaning of the two. The one, when you say who you are, you are investigating somebody leading further and further away from the centre; but if you say what you actually are, 'what is', then you are dealing with actuality. The actuality is that which is actually happening. Right? You will see it in a minute. So what are you? You are a name. Right? A form, the result of a society, a culture which has emphasized throughout the ages that you are separate, something indefinitely identifiable. Right? You have your character, your peculiar tendency, your character, either aggressive or yielding. Is that not put together by the culture which has been brought about by thought? It is very difficult for people to accept a very simple, logical examination, because they would like to think the self is something most extraordinary. We are pointing out the self is nothing but words and memories. So the self is the past. And to know oneself means to observe yourself, actually what you are, in our relationship with each other. Then the reactions of the self come out - right? - in our relationship, intimate or not intimate. Then you begin to see what you are, your reactions, your prejudices, your conclusions, your ideals, your this and that, all that. Is not all that a result? Right? Are you following? That which is a result has a cause. So is a cause a series of memories, remembrances, and so a centre that has been created by thought to which thought clings. Am I off by myself?

Let's begin differently. Don't you want to know about yourself? If you don't know about yourself, actually what you are, you have no basis for any action which will be true, not fragmentary, not miserable, regretting, and so on. Don't you want to know what you are? To know yourself. Now how do you begin to find out about yourself? You can only know yourself either through observation in relationship, or through analysis. Right? Are you following this? Oh, come on! I can know myself. I will talk about myself. I can know myself watching my relationship with others, with my wife, if I am married, or with my girl friend, or with friends, in that observation I see myself reacting - as a Hindu, as a Buddhist, as a Christian, as a non Christian, or imagine that I love people. You know, I find out. Or through analysis. Right? Analysing myself. Now to me analysis is paralysis. And the Hindus are very good at it, and therefore they are totally paralysed because they don't act. They analyse, analyse, analyse, therefore gradually this analysis leads them to paralysis. You watch them as they walk down the street. So either you analysis, or you observe in relationship, observe yourself, what you are, how you think, how you react, what are your responses, what is the centre from which you are moving. Always a fixed point and from there move. Therefore the movement is very limited. So we are going to find out.

In the process of analysis who is the analyser? You understand my question? The analyser thinks he is different from that which he is analysing. But is that so? The therapeutic analysis by a professional - you understand what I am talking about, do you? All right. Probably they have never questioned this: who is the analyser? Is the analyser different from the analysed? You understand? Am I different from my anger, from my greed, from my anxiety, from my ugliness, brutality, cruelty, hate, am I different from that? If that is different from me then I can analyse it. Right? And each analysis, if I am good at it, each analysis must be complete otherwise the remembrance of that analysis is going to interfere with the next analysis. Is this all Greek to you? I'll go on, it doesn't matter. I am afraid you are used to listening, not investigating.

So is the analyser different from the analysed? Or they are both the same, the analyser is the analysed. Right? Need I go into that? When you go through the process of introspection, analysis, and all that, what is happening when you analyse? You are taking time, aren't you? Time. You investigate in the morning and go off to your job, and come back, and again investigate yourself, or you investigate very, very carefully, slowly, minutely, all that implies time. And who is the analyser? Is he something different from that which he is analysing? Is anger different from you? Is jealousy different from you? Your cruelty, your hate, different from you? Or you are that? You understand? You have divided this thing: you are different from that, therefore you think you can analyse that. But when you observe very closely you will find that you are anger. At the moment of jealousy, anxiety, you are that. Only a second later you say, "I have been angry". Which is the movement of thought dividing anger from you. Oh, come on! Right?

So the analyser is the analysed. And if you realize that you will drop totally, completely all analysis. But when you talk to psychotherapists they won't drop it because they have got Cadillacs, cars and all the rest of it, their life depends on it. And probably it is the same with you, because you are so conditioned that you refuse to see this simple fact. If you drop completely analysis then how will you investigate the self? You understand my question, you are following all this? How am I to investigate, look, observe, understand this very, very complex thing called me if I don't analyse, because I see it is stupid to analyse, it will lead nowhere. Therefore I reject it completely, entirely. Are you in that position? Or you have got one foot there and one...! You understand my question?

So I can only find out about myself by observing my reactions in my relationship. So relationship becomes tremendously important. Right? Because it is going to reveal to me what I am. Whether I think I am divine, or there is some part of me that is divine. I am going to discover it in relationship. If there is some part of me which is divine then that part must act. So we have invented a very clever thing, which is, there is something very divine but it is all clouded over, so I have to peel off, like an onion, then I'll find myself. Self-realization - I don't know what that means. They use that a great deal in this country, and I am sure they don't know what it means either. So I realize I can only understand myself in relationship therefore I observe. Do I observe - please listen - do I observe with the memory of previous observation? You understand my question? I have observed myself in my relationship yesterday, with my wife, with my friend, with my boss, and I remember that. Then with that remembrance observe myself next day. Do you understand? So what is happening? I am not observing myself at all. The memory is operating, remembrance is operating, therefore there is never penetration into the very structure and nature of the self. Are we getting together somehow, in spite of the words, in spite of your intellectual bla?

So is it possible to observe myself each moment as though as it was fresh? Not having remembered my observation and let that remembrance operate. Do you see the difference? To let the remembrance operate, or observe from moment to moment, afresh each response, see what it does to you. Then that response becomes extraordinarily important because it is fresh. But the moment you name it, it has already become the old. So you have to have an alertness to watch that you do not name it, that it is not an operation of remembrance, therefore you are observing with a clarity that is penetrating, that has an insight. Right? So which is it you are doing, actually now, please, I am asking you. This is very important for you to find out, to learn, not memorize, learn from listening to find out. Gosh, I have got so much to talk about yet. Which is it that you are doing? If you are analysing then you are going to end up being paralysed completely, and become neurotic, if you are not already. Then if analysis is completely out because you see the futility of it, not because I tell you, but you yourself have an insight into the whole structure of analysis, therefore you can drop it. Then to observe yourself in relationship, to observe without the gathered knowledge of previous observation - if you do that then you are merely repetitive, therefore you are not learning, watching yourself in operation. And if you can not name that reaction.

Now, put it round the other way, a little bit. May I go on? I will go on. Have you observed anything - your wife, your girl friend, or the tree, or the movement of water - with all your senses, with the totality of your senses, your smell, your hearing, your taste, all your senses heightened and observing? Have you ever done that? Oh my lord, what a generation. If you have done it there is no centre from which you are looking. You understand? Because then thought is part of that observation, then your senses are part of that observation. Therefore thought is not separate from the senses, therefore there is no division as the 'me', the observer and the thing you, the observed. Are we getting somewhere? I won't even ask you that.

So the nature, the inmost nature of the self, when you have gone through all the layers of the self, the essence is nothing. You are nothing. Right? On that nothingness thought has imposed the super structure of consciousness. Consciousness being the content, without the content there is no consciousness - the content being you are a Hindu, Buddhist, your religion, your particular god, your puja, your anxiety, your sorrow, your pain, your hate, your love, all that is the content of your consciousness. Obviously. And the idea that you are super atman, or super, super consciousness is part of that content. You understand what thought has done. We are absolutely nothing. All this super structure has been built by thought. And thought is the response of registration. Of course. You understand registration, like a tape. See what thought has done.

So what then is love? You understand my question? I am going to discuss tomorrow, what is meditation, what is the real meaning of meditation. Is it the emptying of this consciousness with all its content - fear, greed, envy, nationality, my god and your god, my rituals and my possession, emptying the whole of that? That means facing, observing nothing. That nothing is not a thing. You know nothing means, not-a-thing. Thing is that which has been put together by thought. I wonder if you see all this. Nature has not been put together by thought. The tree, the stars, the waters and the lovely evening and the beauty of sunlight, it has not been put there by thought. But thought has made out of the tree a chair, a table, that is a thing. So when we say nothing it means not a thing put there by thought. It is not negation. I wonder if you see.

So then what is love? Is it a thing of thought? Is it a fragmentary affair? Or when thought is not then love is. And what relationship has love to sorrow? And what relationship has sorrow to passion? And what is the meaning of death? Love is not a thing, a thing. We said a thing is something put together by thought. If thought is love then that love is fragmentary, is something that thought as desire made that love acceptable, which is pleasure, sensory pleasure, sexual pleasure and other forms of pleasure. So if love is not thought then what is the relationship of love to compassion? Does compassion come into being with the ending of sorrow? And what does sorrow mean? Please you have to understand, this is all our life, our daily life we are talking about. Because we all go through great sorrow - sorrow of the death of someone, different forms, the multiple forms of sorrow, the agony, the loneliness, the utter despair, without any hope. How do you think all those poor people without any hope...

So one has to go, explore into this question of sorrow, whether it is possible to end it completely. This has been one of the things mankind throughout the ages has tried to understand, accept, tried to go beyond, or rationalize it, explain it by using various Sanskrit words, or putting all sorrow, as the Christians do, into one person. Right? If you don't do any of that, which are all escapes, you are faced with your sorrow. You know the sorrow of loneliness, don't you, the sorrow of frustration, the sorrow of loving somebody and not reciprocated, or the sorrow that comes into being when you love somebody and he has gone, the sorrow that each one has, feeling that he is totally inwardly empty, worthless, without self sufficiency. You know the various forms of sorrow. Is sorrow self pity? I have lost somebody, and that brings great agony. In that agony there is self pity, loneliness, lack of companionship, sense of being left completely without any strength, vitality, dependence. You are totally lonely. That is, we all know this kind of sorrow. By rationalizing, explaining, seeking escapes, which we do, we are caught in this network of escapes. If you don't escape because you understand the futility of escapes, suppression, going off to temples and taking... all that nonsense, then you are faced with the fact, and not move from that fact. You understand, not move. That means thought wants to run away from it, but to remain with it, to observe the thing growing, flowering and decaying. And it can only flower, decay when you watch it, when you care for that thing which you call sorrow.

You know when you care for something you watch it with great tenderness, with great care, with great attention. Your baby, how the mother looks after it, gets up at midnight, many times during the day, weary, but she cares, she is watching. So in the same way if you watch this thing called sorrow with care, with the hesitancy, with affection, then you will see there is no escape from it, therefore that very thing that has been called sorrow turns into some totally different thing, which is passion. Not lust but passion. And without passion life has no meaning.

So the self and the structure of the self is based on nothing. The innermost depth of the self is absolutely not-a-thing. And love is not nothing, not-a-thing, but love is only possible, the beauty of it, the greatness of it, the magnitude of it, only when thought realizes it has no place in relationship and therefore love is. And the ending of sorrow, the ending of sorrow is passion.

So the next thing is to find out what is the relationship of love to death. What is the relationship of our existence to death? We are tremendously concerned with what happens after death, but we are never concerned before death. We are never concerned with our life, how we live our life but we are always concerned how we end life. Right? Now we are going to reverse the process. That is, how you live your daily life, whether in that daily life there is an ending, ending to your attachment. You know what your life is, don't you? It is one battle from the moment you are born until you die, a series of endless conflicts, a series of hopeless endeavour leading nowhere but more money, more pleasure, more things - things including your gods because they are made by hand or by the mind, which is thought, anxiety, depression, and elation, confusion, uncertainty, always seeking security, and never finding it. This is your daily contact, your daily life, controlling yourself, controlling your sex, or indulging in sex, ambition, greed, power, position. Right? This is your daily, ugly, brutal life. And you colour it by calling it various names and giving peculiar meaning to it. But in actuality this is your daily life. You know it very well, and you are afraid to let that go. You are bound to let it go when you die, you can't argue with death. Death through accident, disease, old age, senility, you know, you face all that.

So this is your life and we are saying this is far more important than death - not at the end but now. Death means - please listen - ending. I know you would like to go on. We think there is reincarnation, maybe. That is totally, completely irrelevant whether there is life hereafter or not. What is totally relevant is what is now. Right? Whether you can alter the way you live now. Even if you do believe in this idea of reincarnation, born - you see, what is being born next life, who is being born? Yourself, your greed, your envy, your brutality, your violence modified? And if you believe in that then what you do now matters enormously, but you don't really actually go as far as that, you play with the idea, but you are greedy, you are envious, you are brutal, you are competitive, and all the rest of it.

So we are asking: death means the brain without oxygen, without blood, decays, ends. Now can you end in life now something which you hold most dear, which is yourself? Right? Can you end your attachment? Go into it. End it, not argue, why not this, end it and see what happens. So if you end all the things like greed, envy, anxiety, loneliness, now, death has a totally different meaning. Then there is no death. The body will decay naturally because you live so wrongly. So you are living with death all the time. You understand? Death is life. Ending is a beginning. If you keep continuously the same thing going on, there is nothing new. You understand? Only when there is an ending, a flowering takes place. You understand? Do it, sirs, please, in your life do it. Test it out. That's what I mean that you must be serious. It is only the serious man that lives. Serious in the sense he knows he is frightened, he knows he is greedy, he is aware of his own peculiar pleasure, and without argument, without suppression, without - end it with ease, with grace, with beauty. Then you will see a totally different beginning. Because then there is an actual facing of nothing, which is death, which is the invitation to death while living. The invitation is the ending of all your attachments and all the rest of it.

Then out of all this comes a strange factor, the factor of supreme intelligence. And that intelligence is based on compassion, clarity, and because of that intelligence there is great skill. So if you are serious then act, do, not some vague theory, or ideals, the ending of something that you hold most dear, your ambition, your spiritual ambitions, your physical ambitions, your business ambitions, end it. Then you will see yourself a new flowering takes place.

MADRAS 6TH PUBLIC TALK 8TH JANUARY 1978

I am not casting a spell, I am just looking around! I believe this is the last talk, at least for the time being.

As we said the other day this is not an entertainment, an intellectual game that we are playing with each other, or a theoretical investigation into ourselves or into some philosophical outlook or ideas. We are here, if I may point out, for a very serious purpose. We are concerned with the transformation psychologically, inwardly, of human beings. We human beings have created this monstrous world, almost insane, destructive, violent. Unless our consciousness undergoes a radical transformation psychologically, really there is no hope for man, obviously. So it is a serious thing that we are talking about. It is a serious thing to take a journey together into this whole problem of our daily existence, and see if it is possible to transform, to bring about a radical psychological revolution in the very structure of our thinking, of our acting, of our behaviour and our outlook. That's what we are concerned with, not with some superstition, not some philosophical ideas, or some hypothetical examination, but actually we are concerned with our own lives, understanding our lives, our daily miserable, conflicting, unhappy lives, almost criminal lives and see if we cannot possibly bring about a deep abiding transformation in ourselves.

We said, we are the world and the world is us. You, as a human being, represent the entire humanity. You, because wherever one goes, unfortunately, one meets these human problems of suffering, utter lack of love, confusion, sorrow, and everlasting conflict within and without. Wherever you go this is taking place in every human being. And so this is the common factor, and therefore, if I may point out most seriously, that you are the world and the world is you, you are the representative of all humanity, past and present. I do not know how you receive such a statement. Whether you translate it into an idea and therefore pursue that idea logically, illogically, opposing one idea by another, or you see the fact of it, the truth of it, have an insight into it, therefore you become totally responsible. Not as an individual opposed to a community, but as a human being without labels, without particular idiosyncrasies and so on, which we talked about yesterday.

So together the speaker and you are going to explore the problem of whether the brain, our human brain which has been so damaged, so deformed, so distorted through constant pressure of propaganda, of our culture, by our ambitions, by our greed, anxiety, fears, and also by our pleasures. There has been constant pressure on the brain. That's a fact. And when there is pressure on the brain there must be a distortion, unless the brain has the capacity to renew itself, come back to itself after the pressure is over - which very few people are capable of.

A nice evening, isn't it, I hope you look at the skies some times, the beauty of the trees and the light on the sparkling waters, and enjoy it. There is a great deal of difference between enjoyment and pleasure. When you enjoy a thing you are at the moment delighted with it, the beauty of a leaf, with the beauty of a face, or the curve of a branch, but looking at it, having registered it then you want to pursue that, then it becomes pleasure. And joy is something entirely different from pleasure. Pleasure can be cultivated, pursued, run after, hunted, but joy you cannot hunt or pursue. It happens. But unfortunately when it happens thought comes along and says, I must have more of it - then it becomes pleasure. So I hope you look at these trees and have a delight in them.

We were saying the other day that there is an art of listening, the art of observation, seeing, and the art of learning. Please understand this, it is very important because perhaps through this art of listening, observing, learning, the pressure on the brain may never be felt at all, so that the brain remains pristine, pliable, young, fresh, innocent; because only a mind that is innocent can see the truth, not a complicated mind, not an intellectual mind that is concerned with theories, impracticalities and all that. So through the understanding of what is the art of listening, the art of seeing, the art of learning, if we can capture the full significance of these three arts then when pressures occur on the brain, such as ambition is a pressure, violence, or resistance, anger, propaganda, tradition, all these are tremendous pressures on the brain. And therefore a brain that lives in these pressures must inevitably be distorted, deformed and damaged.

So we are saying that by understanding the art of listening, the art of seeing, observing, and the art of learning, then that pressure on the brain can be understood and not be affected. This is, please, a serious affair, not a matter of agreement or disagreement, quoting one authority against another authority, but we are investigating, exploring together, sharing together, this question, which is of tremendous importance, because our brains, if you have gone into it yourself, not that the speaker is a specialist in the structure of the brain but one can observe the effect of various forms of pressure on the brain, by observing oneself one can see it. The extreme pressure leads to neuroticism, and probably most people whose brains are deeply deformed are neurotic, like most traditionalists are neurotic.

You understand all this? Understanding verbally is one thing, and having an insight into the fact is another. The insight brings about transformation, but mere agreement with words has very little effect - none at all. Please together we are investigating into a very complex problem, which is essentially meditation. Because a brain that is damaged can be caught, and is caught, in illusion, and it may meditate for ten thousand years, it will not find truth.

So it is very important to understand whether it is possible for a brain that has been damaged to make it bring about its original quality of freshness, clarity. A brain that is capable of instant decision, not based on logic, reason. Reason, logic, thought, has a certain value but it is limited.

So what we are doing now is together to go into this question whether you are aware for yourself, whether you are a lawyer, engineer, scientist, physicist, businessman, or just an ordinary man going to the office every day, whether you are not under great pressure in the family, outside the family. Whether you are aware of this pressure, that is, to be cognizant of it, to be conscious of it, to know for yourself, not because the speaker points it out but to know for yourself whether your conscious thinking is not the result of various pressures, and therefore that thinking is the outcome of a distorted brain. So please look at it for yourself and find out.

Then the problem arises whether it is possible to bring the brain to its original condition, undamaged, not distorted, and therefore able to function freely. If you have gone into this question, at least some of you, I hope, have gone into it. Not just repeat, repeat, repeat. If you have gone into it the question must inevitably arise whether it is possible for a human being to remove this pressure, this weight, and be free. Then the question is, what is one to do. You understand my question? If you are concerned, then what are you, who is a human being, who is the representative of humanity, whose consciousness is the consciousness of the entire human race, and that consciousness is damaged. When it calls itself a Hindu, a Muslim, a Buddhist, a Christian it is dividing itself and fighting everlastingly.

So we are asking, is it possible? We say it is possible only when you understand, or learn the art of listening, how to listen. When you listen and when there is resistance to what is being said, that resistance is the outcome of your pressure, you don't listen. Not that you must accept, nor must you reject but just to listen, without resistance, without translating what is said into what you would like it to be. So to learn the art of listening. I think if you know that the thing is very simple, it is almost over, because there is a great miracle in listening. Because in that if there is no interpretation of what you are hearing, or make an abstraction of what you are hearing, or turn it into an idea, and pursue that idea, then you are off the mark entirely. But if you listen with your heart, with care, with attention, with affection, then that very listening is like a flowering. There is beauty in that listening because as we said the other day, art means to put everything in its right place.

In the same way, to observe. To observe the world as it is, the outer world, with all the misery, poverty, degradation, vulgarity, the brutality and the appalling things that are going on, in the scientific world, in the technological world, in the world of religious organizations, the crookedness, the ambition, money, money, money and power. To observe all this without bringing your personal condemnation, or acceptance or denial, just to observe it. Have you ever observed a cloud? Have you? A cloud of an evening is full of light and colour, great beauty, just to observe it without verbalizing it, without wanting to see the beauty, just to observe. And then from the outer to observe equally that which is going on inwardly - your thoughts, your ambitions, your greed, your envy, your violence, your vulgarity, your sexuality, all that, just to observe. And then you will see if you so observe that the thing flowers, your greed flowers and dies. There is an end to it. You are never greedy again because the flower is dead, withered because you have let it come out and die naturally.

And also to learn the art of learning. Learning implies generally for most of us, accumulation of knowledge stored up in the brain, like a computer, and act according to that knowledge. That's what we call learning. It is generally accepted, the meaning of that word is generally that. But we are introducing something entirely different, which is to learn without accumulation. That is - now just a minute, I'll show it to you now. I said to learn without accumulation. To learn means to have an insight into the fact. Now insight implies grasping the full significance of, say for instance, your greed. Grasping the full nature and the structure of greed, having an insight into it, a comprehension, a total comprehension of that reaction called greed. When you have an insight there is no need to learn, you are beyond it. I wonder. I won't even ask whether you understand, I am going on.

Because it is very important to understand these three because then if you have really captured the full significance of these three then the pressure on the brain can be understood and removed as you go along. And pressure exists on the brain when there is no space in the brain. I hope we are communicating with each other, and I am not talking to myself. Everything exists in space: the trees, the fish, the clouds, the stars, the birds and the human beings, they must have space to live. And as more and more the world is getting overpopulated space is becoming rather limited. That's an obvious fact. And so that may be one of the factors of violence. That human beings, not having enough space, living in a city, in a town, and this pressure is one of the factors of violence. Leave that, for the moment.

And as inwardly we have hardly any space at all. Right? That is, our brains are so occupied, our minds are so concerned with ourselves, with our progress, with our status, with our power, with our money, with our sex, with our anxiety, we are so occupied, the very occupation prevents space. The people may be occupied with meditation, say, do please come to that quickly, talk about it, not about all this. And you are occupied, your mind is occupied to find out how to meditate. You are occupied with it, as a woman is occupied in the kitchen, with her utensils, food and all the rest of it, so your brain is occupied. If you are a lawyer your brain is occupied, concerned with all the law and so on and so on. All our world, inner world, inside, psychologically, is in a state of constant occupation with something or other. Right? So there is no space.

And because there is no space the pressure of occupation becomes greater and greater and greater. Does all this mean anything to you? Like those people who have taken drugs for a short period, or a long period, their brains are affected, obviously. If you drink alcohol a great deal, naturally the brain is damaged. In the same way any human being who is completely occupied with something or other, whether the most sublime ideas, or with sexuality, that occupation prevents space and therefore the brain becomes more and more damaged. You can this for yourself.

The word 'leisure', or rather the word 'school' comes from the word 'leisure'. It is only when you have leisure that you can learn. Right? But when the brain, or the mind is so occupied you have no leisure, therefore you can never learn anything new. So that's one of the problems of meditation. Whether the mind - I am using the word 'mind' to indicate the brain, consciousness, with all its content, all that is the mind, I am using it specially that word. I may be wrong. I am using that word to communicate with you what I mean by the word 'mind'. The mind that is capable of reason, logic, sanity, a brain that can react, a consciousness with all its content of greed, envy, brutality, violence, ugliness, affection, all that, the whole structure of all this is the mind. So we are saying when the mind is so occupied, as most people's mind are, there is no space, no fresh air can come into it, and therefore the damage on to the brain through pressure becomes greater and greater and greater. Right? So that's one of the problems of meditation. Whether the mind, the brain, the consciousness can be free of all pressure. Which means a mind that is free. That's one thing.

We are investigating, please bear in mind what we are doing, we are investigating into what is meditation, not how to meditate. That is the most silly question you can possibly ask: tell me how to meditate. That means you want a system, a system of meditation. The word 'system' implies perceiving the whole by collecting the parts. A system of railways, the system of political parties like the system of communism, socialism, capitalism, all that implies a state of statecism. System goes with the word 'static'. So when you say, teach me, or, teach us, or, help us to understand or to meditate, you want a system which will help you to meditate. System implies also, stare, to stand, not move. For the speaker there is no system of meditation because you can practise, practise, practise, like a man who practises on the piano the wrong note all the time. And that's what you are doing.

So we are asking, looking into this question of meditation, that the mind must be totally free from any pressure. Which means no pressure of will. Please this becomes rather difficult and I hope you don't mind if I go into it very deeply. Because in meditation the act of will has come totally to an end. Will is the essence of desire, a heightened form of desire. Desire we have gone into, I won't repeat that, we haven't time. So it is the heightened form of desire, will. And we act all our lives through will - I will do this, I must not do that, I will become something great. The very essence of will is ambition, violence. Right? Is it possible to act in daily life without the act of will? Which means without control, which doesn't mean you act without control. But to understand the significance of will and control.

For most of us, all our life we are trained, educated, cultivated, conditioned to control. Control your anger, control your sexuality, control your whatever you are controlling. You have never enquired into who is the controller. And if you say, who is the controller, you will say, it is the higher self. But is it? The controller is put together by thought - right? - is the permanent centre - or rather, the semi-permanent centre, a centre which thought has created as the controller who knows a great deal, who has experienced a great deal, who is much wiser and so on. So that controller controls all our action. And we are questioning the controller itself, whether he is not also a part of thought. Therefore if he is a part of thought, which he is when you go into it, the contradiction between the controller and the controlled comes to an end. I am not going to ask if you understand; I don't care if you understand. You must travel together. You must give your heart to all this, not just stare and listen, listen, you are used to being lectured to, talked at. We are not doing that, we are investigating together happily, easily, with some care, affection, and then you will begin to see this for yourself.

So is it possible to act in life, in daily life, without will, without control? See the significance of that question. When specially you have been educated to control. You will say, if I have no control I will do everything I want to do. The world will become more chaotic than it is. Perhaps the world is more chaotic as it is because it has learnt to control. So you must go into this question. And the controller is the essence of desire, varying from time to time. Therefore there is always conflict between the controller and the controlled. I'll show you in a minute. That is, when you traditionally accept meditation, and try to concentrate, try to control your thoughts. That's what most meditation are about, first, begin, that you control your thoughts. Right? Isn't that so? No? Have you ever done any kind of meditation? If you have - not that I have done it, because I reject the whole thing in toto - if you have, your thoughts wander off all over the place, and then you say, 'I must think of this', and so there is a battle going on, with thought wandering off and you pulling it back, the controller pulling it back, and this battle goes on for the rest of your life. And you think you are a tremendous person when you have controlled your thoughts so completely you are master of it. But you never ask, the controller itself is the product of thought. So you are playing games with yourself.

We are saying in meditation, if you are interested in it, if you pursue it to its utmost depth and height, mind must be completely free of all action of will. The action of will exists when there is choice. Right? I choose that and go along there. When there is choice there is confusion. Right? When you are confused you begin to choose. Right? Only when you are clear there is no choice. So choice, will, control, go together and prevent the total freedom of the mind. That's one point.

The other is, our consciousness. Please follow all this. I am going into it step by step. Our consciousness. We think our particular consciousness is different from mine, or from another. Is that so? Your consciousness contains all the culture that has been poured into that mind, the tradition, the books that you have read, the struggle, the conflict, the misery, the confusion, the vanities, the arrogance, the cruelties, grief, sorrow, pleasure, all that is your consciousness - as a Hindu, Buddhist, Muslim, that's your consciousness. Right? The content of that makes your consciousness. The book is its content. That's simple. So consciousness is its content. Now is it possible to be free of the content? That is, not being a Hindu, not being a Muslim and all the implications of it, not having greed, envy, anxiety, fear, the pursuit of pleasure, sorrow, all that, can the mind, consciousness as we do it, be free of its content. This is very important if you want to take a long journey into meditation, it is very important to understand this. Not how to empty the consciousness of its content but to become aware of it first. To become aware that you are a Hindu, with all the implications of it: the superstition, the dogma, the tradition, the puja, the meaningless things that you do in religion. Are you conscious of your envy, your greed, your ambition, your utter lack of relationship with another, lack of love? Are you aware of this content?

Now, awareness implies, to observe the world as it is, to know the world, the trees, nature, the beauty and the ugliness. And also to be aware of your neighbour, their sari, dress, to be aware. And also to be aware inwardly, what you are actually - not what you think you are. To be actually aware of what you are. If you are aware, so aware, you will see that there are a great many reactions, like and dislike, punishment and reward, in that awareness. So can you be aware without any choice, a choiceless awareness? Just to be aware without choosing, without direction, without prejudice.

So, to become totally aware of our consciousness. That means, please, it will become a little more difficult, which means can consciousness become aware of itself? Not being asked to be aware and that then becomes a pressure, but to naturally become aware choicelessly of your consciousness. Can consciousness become aware of itself? Which means also, can thought, your thinking, become aware of itself? That is, the brain is like a computer, it is registering. Registering your experiences, your hopes, your desires, your ambitions, it is registering every impression, and from that impression, from that registration, thought arises. That's the original man - not original man - the anthropoid ape for example, the nearest to man, it registers, it remembers, therefore it begins to think. From registration thought arises. Now we are asking can there be an awareness of the thought arising. As you can be aware of your anger arising - you can be aware of that, can't you. No? Are you all asleep? Or am I putting so much in this talk? It doesn't matter.

So as one can be aware of anger arising, so can we be aware of thought beginning? Which means to be aware of the thing flowering, growing. In the same way, is there an awareness of consciousness, the totality of it? This is part of meditation, this is the essence of meditation, to be aware without any choice, of the world outside you and the immense complex world inside you. So when you come to that point you will see that the world is not separate from you, the world is you. So by consciousness becoming aware of itself then the parts that make up consciousness disappear, consciousness then becomes quite a different thing, it is a consciousness of the whole, not of the part. You won't understand, it doesn't matter. That's one point.

Then as most of us are accustomed to systems, various forms of yoga, various forms of government, various forms of bureaucratic rule, they are all based on systems. You go to your guru and he will give you a system of meditation. Or you pick up a book and learn from that book a system. As I said, system implies the comprehension of the whole through the part, collecting the part you hope to understand the totality of existence. And also system implies stare, to stand, not move. System is the opposite of dynamism. Right? So all your brain, mind is trained to follow systems: political systems, religious systems, yogic systems, your guru's systems, or your own invention of systems. Therefore when you are following a system you are static. And that's the easiest way to live, to follow a system, like a railway that keeps going along the lines. And we are never aware that we are like the railway, running on lines, grooves.

So, concentration, as we said, is resistance to all other forms of thought. Right? Concentrate. Therefore you cultivate resistance. Whereas we are saying, concentration at a certain level is necessary, like a schoolboy, even there if he can learn how to attend then concentration becomes very easy. So we are going to find out now, that is part of meditation, what it means to attend. Right?

So we have talked about awareness, concentration and attention. Do you attend anything? Attend. That means give your heart, your mind, all your senses completely to something. Do you? When you so attend, that is, when all your senses are completely awake and observing, then in that process, or in that quality of attention there is no centre. Right? When there is no centre there is no limitation to space. Because most of us have centres, which is the form of the 'me', the ego, the personality, the character, the tendency, the idiosyncrasy, the peculiarities, there is a centre in each one, which is the essence of the self, which is selfishness. Wherever there is a centre the space must always be limited. Right? Just see it. And if there is no centre there is no idea of border. And that is why we are saying a mind that is occupied is forming all the time a centre. And therefore its occupation is limiting the space. So we are saying when there is total attention, that is, when you observe, hear, learn with all your senses awakened there is no centre.

So we will move on next. From this arises, when you have done all this, if you have done it, in daily life, with your relationship, with your wife, with your neighbour, with everybody, relationship with nature. Relationship means to be related. You can only be related to another if you have no image about yourself or about another, then you are directly related, but we have images, pictures, sexual or otherwise, pictures. And these pictures, these remembrances prevent relationship. So out of this comes compassion. That is passion for all. And that can only take place when you know - not, when you know - when there is this perfume, this quality of love, which is not desire, which is not pleasure, which is not the action of thought. Therefore love is not a thing put together by thought, by environment, by sensation. Love is not emotion. Love is not sensation, but in this country, if I may point out, there is no love because you have been living for centuries and millennia on theories and words. And also each man is out for himself. Don't say, does this love exist abroad. That's not the point. When the speaker speaks abroad he will then tell them what he thinks there. But you don't have to say, does this exist in Europe. It's like asking a politician, this country is very corrupt, isn't it, and the politician says, yes, but no so corrupt as my neighbour. So that's an evasion, not facts.

So in this country love doesn't exist. Love means the love of rocks, the love of trees, love of a strange dog, love of the skies, the beauty, the sunset, love of your neighbour. Love, without all the sensation of sexuality with which it is identified now. Love cannot exist when you are ambitious, when you are seeking power, position, money. How can a man love you if you are a wife or a husband, when all his mind is concentrated on becoming something, power in the world. He can sleep with you, have children, but that's not love, that's lust, with all its misery. And without love you cannot have compassion. And where there is compassion there is clarity, clarity of the mind, not logical clarity, which is another thing, to think clearly, objectively, non-personally, to reason sanely, that also brings certain clarity. But we are not talking of that clarity. The light that comes from compassion, therefore every act is clear. And from that clarity comes skill. Skill in communication, skill in action, skill in the art of listening, learning, observing. But for us skill has become a means of self-expression. Skill of an engineer, of a chemist, he is concerned about himself, how his skill is helping him to strengthen himself. You see all this round you.

And so we are saying, meditation is the awakening of that intelligence that's born out of compassion, clarity and the skill that intelligence uses. The word 'intelligence' means not only what is to be read between the two lines, horizontally as well as vertically but much more than that. That intelligence that is non-personal, non-cultivable, that comes only out of compassion and clarity. All this is meditation, much more. And the 'more' is when the mind is free and therefore completely quiet. It cannot be quiet if there is no space. The stillness of a night, because there is vast immense space.

So silence can only come not through practice, not through control, not the silence between two noises, not the peace between two wars, silence comes when the body, the mind is in complete harmony, without any friction. Then in that silence there is a total movement which is the end of time. That means time has come to an end.

There is much more in meditation, which is to find that which is most sacred, not the sacredness of the idols in a temple, or in a church, or in a mosque - mosques don't have idols but they have their own form of peculiar idols - those are man-made, handmade, made by the mind, by thought. So there is sacredness which is not touched by thought, that can only come about naturally, easily and happily when we have brought about complete order in our daily life. When there is such order in our daily life - order means no conflict - then out of that comes this quality of love, compassion and clarity. And meditation is all this, not something that you escape from life, from our daily living. And those who know the quality of this meditation are blessed.

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC TALK 2ND APRIL 1977

I don't quite know how to begin these talks. As there are going to be six talks and seven discussions, I'd like to point out, if I may, that we are going to think over together our problems, we're going to use reason, clear thinking, and not any kind of assertive beliefs, opinions, judgements, or any form of conclusion. And therefore it becomes rather serious. It is not an entertainment, a morning off or an afternoon, Saturday and Sunday, but rather a serious gathering to consider very deeply the many human conflicts, problems, sorrows, pleasures, fears, and the nature of meditation and so on. We're going to go into all these talks, into all these matters.

But first I'd like to point out, if I may, the speaker is not trying to convince you of anything. Please believe it. He's not persuading you to think along his particular line. Again, please believe it. He's not offering a particular set of ideologies, nor beliefs, nor conclusions, because these have separated the world, human beings, one against the other. So we're not in any way concerned with any of those matters, neither belief, conclusion, opinions or judgements. But we are going together, and we mean together, you and the speaker, carefully, objectively, to look what is happening around us, not romantically, not sentimentally, but just to observe, without any conclusion, without offering any opinion, but just to look and reason together, think over together. And I think it's very important to understand that word 'together'. Most of us are accustomed to go to meetings or gatherings of this kind, either to accept what the speaker is saying or to reject, one opinion or one idea against another. Or persuade you through clever argumentation to follow or accept what he's saying. And therefore we are thinking together over these problems, sharing together. And this is really very important to understand, if I may go on with it, because one is apt to listen as though somebody was talking out these, and you're casually accepting or denying.

So it seems to me, that's your responsibility, responsibility being that you undertake seriously, to think together, to find out the accurate, true solutions to these problems, that we human beings are tormented with. So it behoves, on the part of each one of us, that reasoning, the capacity to think logically, sanely, wholly, becomes very important. We're apt to think anything that is the product of reason, clear thinking is too intellectual, and therefore not for each one of us. But on the contrary, I feel if we can think, observe, reason together, putting aside our personal conclusions, opinions, evaluations, what we like and what we don't like, what we're attracted to and so on, if we can put aside all those things, and able to think together, deeply, sanely, that is, objectively, wholly, then I think we shall be able to deeply transform ourselves. Because, when one goes round the world, as the speaker does, from India, Europe, and here, one sees great sorrow, wars, violence, all kinds of stupidities, terrorism, killing, drugs. You know what is happening as well as I do. And we are accepting these as though they are inevitable. And as most of us are traditionally minded, we naturally and easily put up with these things. Or we revolt against them. But revolt is a reaction, like Communism is a reaction to Capitalism, or Fascism.

So, without revolt, without going against something, and forming our own little group or communes, or following a particular guru or another guru, from India or from this country, and they are bursting like mushrooms all over the world, these gurus, unfortunately. But if we could, without accepting any kind of authority, because in spiritual matters there is no authority, there is no guru, there is no priest, there are no sanctions. And this is very important to understand if we are going to go together, investigating into all these problems that we human beings have had, centuries upon centuries, generation after generation. So first, if one may point out, there is no authority here, we are friends, two friends talking over together our conflicts, our uncertainties, our travail, the things that we human beings go through in our life, and end in death, without understanding what it is all about, or committed to a particular action, thinking that will solve all our human conflicts and miseries and fears.

When that is clearly and definitely understood, that there is no authority, the speaker has no authority whatsoever, though he may be sitting on a platform, because that's merely for convenience, so that we can all see each other. But a little height doesn't give him any authority. And so don't put him into authority, place him into, give him authority. And I really mean this, because in psychological matters, which we are going to investigate very deeply together, there is no authority, whether it is the European psychologists or the modern psychologists or the gurus or the books, or the saviours, ancient or modern, in that field of psychology to accept authority is to deny clarity, clear thinking, logic, and to be sane, and therefore whole. The word 'whole' implies having good health, having sanity, and also it implies h-o-l-y, holy. So when we use the word 'whole', holistic, it implies all that, health, sanity, clarity, and that which is holy, complete. So, as we were saying, in the psychological field, as there is no authority, we are putting aside all that people have told us, if we can, which is very difficult, and examine, step by step, again, if we can, into the enormous problem of existence, our daily living.

Psychologically, inwardly, we human beings, wherever we are, are the world - psychologically. The world is us, the world is me and I am the world. And that is a psychological, absolute fact, though you may have white skin, brown skin or black skin or whatever it is outwardly, affluent, rich, prosperous, many cars, all the rest of it. Or you may be very poor. But inwardly, deep down, we're all the same, we suffer, we're lonely, we're in sorrow, conflict, misery, confusion, depending on somebody to tell us what to do, how to think, what to think. We are slaves to propaganda, from the various churches and various religions, sects - that's what's happening all over the world, not only politically, by the experts, by the governments and so on, but inwardly, deep down we are slaves to propaganda, we are conditioned human beings, whether we live in India, in America or here.

I hope that one realizes that, not intellectually, not verbally because that has very little meaning, but actually see the fact of it, that you living in America, with all the riches, marvellous country, crazy people, drug-minded, you know, all that's happening in this country, the violence, the brutality, the divisive communes, based on their beliefs and so on. But when you sweep all that aside, put all that aside, whether here or in India or in Europe, we go through the same mill of misfortune, uncertainty, deep sorrow. So we are actually, psychologically, the world, and the world is you. Once you realize this fact, not verbally, not ideologically or as a statement of fact, but actually, deeply feel the fact, realize the fact, that you are not different from the other, however far away he is, inwardly, because he suffers enormously, he's terribly frightened, uncertain, insecure, both physiologically as well as psychologically.

And when you realize that, and in examination of that realization you're not concerned with your little self, you're concerned with the total human being. You understand this? With the total humanity, which is you, because you are the world. So when we are talking about these matters, we are concerned with the human being, not with Mr X or Y or somebody else, because he is the total psychological entity as a human being, wherever he lives. I hope this is clear. This is factual. You may be conditioned in a particular way, you may be Catholic, a Protestant, god knows what else you are, Baptists and, you know, Jesus-minded - you're conditioned. And in India, which is the same, they are conditioned by thousands of years of certain kinds of beliefs, superstitions, ideas, gods and all the rest of it. But below that conditioning, in the depth of their human mind, when they're alone, when they are facing life, there is sorrow, there is pain, there is grief, there is anxiety.

So you are the world and the world is you. And when one sees that as an actual irrevocable fact, then you begin to think entirely differently, then you begin to observe, not personal, as a personal individual having troubles and anxieties, but the whole entire humanity is having it. Then it gives you an extraordinary strength. I don't know if you follow all this. It gives you extraordinary vitality, then you are not alone, you are the entire history of mankind, if you know how to read that book which is you.

And that's what we are going to do, we're going to read together the history of mankind, enshrined in you, as a human being. This is not rhetoric, this is not a verbal explosion, but a serious factor we're deeply concerned with, a fact which we deny, because we think we are so individualistic, we are so concerned with ourselves, with our petty little problems, with our little gurus, with our little beliefs, but when you realize an extraordinary fact, then either it gives you tremendous strength, a great urgency to investigate and transform oneself because you are mankind. And when there is such transformation, you affect the whole consciousness of man. I don't know if you realize this. You actually affect the whole consciousness of man because you are the entire humanity, and when you change fundamentally, deeply, when there is psychological revolution in you, then naturally as you are part of that consciousness of a human being, which is the rest of the humanity, the consciousness of the world is affected. You see the reason of it, the logic of it. Your consciousness is affected by the various prophets, the various warmongers, Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, you know, all those people have affected mankind, but we're not aware of it.

And what we're going to do together, during these talks, is to penetrate the layers of our consciousness, and investigate whether it is possible to transform the content of our consciousness and out of that a different dimension of energy and clarity may come into being. That's what we're concerned with, and therefore it's a serious matter, not to be played with. If you're not interested, if you are not serious, don't waste your time coming here, it's a waste of your energy, and I really mean it, because this is very, very serious, and it is voluntary, not a thing that you are persuaded or rewarded - because our conditioning is reward and punishment. But in investigating our consciousness, which is the entire consciousness of mankind, we are delving into ourselves, and from there discover, come up on what is truth.

Having laid that, said all that, which is necessary, which is probably one of the most important things, which is the first step and therefore the last step, let us begin by investigating what human beings demand, what human beings basically, fundamentally, inwardly demand, ask. Which is, what is it that as a human being who is the representative of the world, and therefore he is the world, psychologically, what is the most, innermost demand of such a human being. Don't answer me, please - this is a question we are put so that we can think about it together.

Most human beings in one part of their consciousness, want to find both biological, physiological, as well as psychological security. You must have food, clothes and shelter. That's an absolute necessity. But also we want, we demand, we crave, we search for psychological security. To be psychologically certain about everything. Look into yourself, observe, use the speaker, if I may point out, as a mirror. The words which he's using are merely description, but the description is not the described. Right? Therefore you are looking at yourself and finding out what is the innermost demand that you want, that human beings want. And this whole struggle in the world, both psychologically as well as physiologically, is to find security. No? The word 'security' means to be secure, your physical permanency, physically to be well, physically to continue, advance, grow, whatever it is; and psychologically, inwardly to find security, to find something that is permanent, because everything, psychologically, if you observe very carefully, is very impermanent. Your relationships, psychologically, are terribly uncertain. You may be temporarily secure in your relationship with another, man, woman, all the rest of it, temporarily. But that very temporary security is a danger of it being, becoming completely insecure.

Do please examine it, don't accept it, we are thinking over together, we are reasoning. To see the logic, the reason, the sanity of it, not because the speaker asserts it, not because he has some beastly reputation, because all those things are irrelevant when you are really going into something very, very serious.

So one asks, is there any security, psychologically, at all? That is, one seeks psychological security in the family. We'll go step by step into it - in the family, the family being the wife, the children. There you try to find in the wife, a relationship that will be secure, lasting, permanent, permanent being relative, because there is always death. And not always finding it, there are divorces, quarrels and all the misery, jealousies, anger, hatred that goes on. You must be aware of all this, aren't you? And also one tries to find security in a community, with a group of people, with the communes, large or small. One tries to find security in the world, a nation. I'm an American, I'm a Hindu, that gives a tremendous sense of identity with a group, and therefore security. Do please, as we said, listen to it, not reject it. There may be reason behind it, or there might not, but a serious man examines it, doesn't reject or accept.

And so when you try to find security psychologically in a nation, and therefore that nation is different from another nation, naturally there is division, and where there is division between nations, in which you have invested psychologically your security, there are wars, there are economic pressures, divisions - that's what is actually going on in the world. Right?

And if you seek security in ideologies - Communist ideology, the Capitalist ideology, religious ideology, conclusions, images, crosses and all the rest of it all over the world - again there is division. You believe in one set of ideals which you like, which give you comfort, in which you seek security, with a group of people who believe the same kind of nonsense. And another group believe another thing, and the same thing, people are divided. Religions have divided people. Right? The Christians, the Buddhists, the Hindus, the Muslims, you know, the Baptists, divide, again they are at each other, each believing something extraordinary, romantic, which is unrealistic, unreal, not factual.

So, seeing all this, not as a theory, not as something to be avoided or becoming supercilious or intellectual, or being attached emotionally, but seeing all this very clearly, one asks, is there psychological security at all. Right? You understand my question? And if there is no psychological security, then what is a human being? It becomes a chaos. Right? He loses his identity, because he's identified with America, he's identified with Jesus, he's identified with Buddha, he's identified with a nation and so on and so on, when reason, logic says how absurd all this is. Then does one go into despair or - please listen to this - or because you have observed the fallacy of these divisive processes, the unreality of these fictions, myths, fantasies which have no basis, and the very perception of that, is that not intelligence? Not the intelligence of a clever, cunning mind, not the intelligence of book knowledge, but the intelligence which comes out of clear observation. Right?

In that observation which brings about extraordinary intelligence, there is security, therefore that means that very intelligence is secure. No, please, you must have it, not agree with me and say, 'Yes, how extraordinary, I didn't think of that before,' but it must be part of you, it must be you that are finding it, not me that have found it and tell you and therefore you accept it or reject it. You see the difference?

As we said at the beginning, I'm not out to, the speaker is not out to convince you of anything - I'm not a propagandist - I don't want you to think as I think, because I don't think at all. And I mean it. We'll go into that later on, because that's an extraordinary fact, the capacity to observe without thought, therefore in that observation have a tremendous insight, and that insight is supreme intelligence, and that intelligence acts - which we'll go into, when we are discussing the whole structure and the nature of thought.

But as most of us will not let go, will not, are so frightened to let go and not finding security. You understand? I can let go, one can let go being a Catholic, Protestant, Communist, all the rest of that nonsense very easily. But when you do let go, when you cleanse yourself of all this, either you do it as a reaction, or you do it because you have observed intelligently, holistically, with great clarity, the absurdity, the fantasies, the make-believes. And because you observe without any distortion, because you're not out to get something from it, because you're not thinking in terms of punishment and reward, because you observe very clearly, then that very clarity of perception is intelligence. In that there is extraordinary security, not that you become secure, but intelligence is secure.

Are we meeting each other? Is there communication between each other? Or is it merely a verbal communication?

Communication verbally is necessary, to use the correct word, and unfortunately in America the correct word is not being used - they use any old sloppy word and think they convey. But we're using correct words. And communication implies not only the usage and the comprehension on both sides, the meaning and the significance of the word correctly, but also it implies that we share, share what is being said, which is the responsibility of sharing, partaking together. So we are not merely communicating verbally, but also deeply sharing the fact: the fact being, the absolute fact, not relative fact, the absolute fact that there is no security in anything that man has invented, psychologically. All our religions are inventions, put together by thought. All our divisive endeavour, which come about when there are beliefs, dogmas, rituals, which is the whole substance of religion, when you see all this very clearly, not as an idea, but as a fact, then that very fact reveals the extraordinary quality of intelligence, in which there is complete, whole security. Right? I hope you see this fact of intelligence now, not tomorrow - don't go home and say, 'I'll think it over.' When you think it over tomorrow, you've already distorted it, but we are thinking together now, using our reason, our capacity to think clearly. So communication of the fact between you and the speaker is now, not eventually, not when it's convenient for you. Then you have lost time, you have wasted days and months. You don't do that when the house is on fire, you do, act.

So when you are concerned, as we are, I hope, all of us together, when you are concerned deeply with the transformation of man, because man must radically transform - when I use the word 'man' I am also including the woman, we are not talking about equal rights, women and men, the Women's Liberation, and all that. We are talking, when we say 'man', man - woman, so please forgive if I use that word 'man'. Don't write me letters, say, 'Why don't you also use woman'. As it has been done - which means they are not really listening, which means they are not, they are still thinking partially. We are thinking together holistically, as a whole, not you and I, separate human beings thinking together, we are looking at something together. You know, when you feel that we are doing something together there's a great deal of care, there's a great deal of attention, there's a great sense of sympathy, affection. And I'm using that word in all that sense together.

So in our consciousness, one of the factors is this demand and the search for psychological security. And when we are seeking psychological security in nations, in beliefs, in gurus, in books, in ideas and so on, in leaders, then because it brings about division, therefore physiologically there are divisions - Hindu, Buddhist, different nation, Englishman, American, Dutch, German, you know, division. And therefore when there is psychological attachment to a belief, to a nation, there is insecurity, physiologically. You understand, sir? Isn't that so? Isn't that a fact. When I'm attached to India - I'm not - when I'm attached to India and all that nonsense which represents India, just the image, the romanticism, you know, all that bilge - so when I'm attached to that, I separate myself from the rest of the world, psychologically, and therefore division invariably brings conflict. When there is division between man and woman - you understand? You are married, you've got all this misery in you. When there is division there must be conflict, inevitably, that's an absolute law. And this division is brought about by the attachment to psychological ideas. Therefore there is poverty, degradation, wars, terror in the world, the world is becoming a dangerous place to live.

So is it possible then for a human being, you, who are the world - please, that is the central issue in this matter - you are the world and the world is you. And the world out there and out here, inside, traditionally has been conditioned to be a fragment, a fragment - American fragment, Indian fragment and so on, Catholic fragment - therefore outwardly there is no peace. Right? And man cannot exist without peace, he cannot create, he cannot have affection, he cannot have compassion, love.

So part of this consciousness of man is the fact of the search and the demand and the attachment to a fragment, in which he hopes to find security. And to transform that fragment in which man has invested, hoping to find security, to completely transform that, can only come about when there is intelligence, intelligence which is perfection. I went into that. Right? Right, sir? Do you see it? And is there now, not tomorrow, when you go home and think about it - then you're lost - is there now, as you're sitting there, listening, using your reason, capacity, energy, affection, care, and attention, is there that transformation taking place? If not, you're not listening, you're not exercising your capacity to think clearly. Or you're caught in verbal images; or in a symbol to which you are attached, because if you let go that symbol you're frightened, and therefore you're lonely and all that begins. We'll discuss fear later on.

But as we are listening together, reasoning together, gathering our energies, is there that transformation, which is the freedom, complete freedom from trying to find security in a fragment. You understand? Is there freedom? Please ask it, demand it, because we're going to go into very complex matters - this is only just the beginning of it, because we're going to together go into this whole problem of what is consciousness, and the content of consciousness. Without the content there is no consciousness. Because part of the content of your consciousness, human consciousness, is this demand for security. Right? Security in god, which again is a word, a symbol, a belief, security in a nation, security in a group, security in a commune, security in the wife, the children, security in ideas, you know. That is part of our consciousness, that consciousness has been put together through millennia upon millennia, which we call evolution. A fragment cannot evolve, it will always remain a fragment. I wonder if you see this. A fragment cannot become the whole.

So part of our consciousness, which is the human consciousness of the world, a fragment of that consciousness is the demand and the search for psychological security. And that's one of the fragments of the content of our consciousness. Therefore the content makes for consciousness. See the truth of it, the reason of it. Part of one's consciousness says, 'I am an American, I am a Buddhist, I am this, I am that.' Or I've identified myself with something or other. And this identification is the demand or the desire to find security. That security either temporarily or permanently, there is no permanent security. And if there is temporary security, then that leads to havoc, as we pointed out.

So, can you, as you have listened for an hour, with your heart and mind, can you actually be aware of the fact that you're free of it? If you're not, either you haven't exercised your capacity to reason or to listen to somebody who says, 'Do please, for god's sake, look at this.' And you won't look. And if you don't look, nobody's going to persuade you, certainly not the speaker. Persuasion, propaganda, threats, offering rewards or punishment will never help you to look. If you look under compulsion it is distorted.

So can you, as a human being, after talking over together for an hour, see this extraordinary fact, and seeing the fact and the reality of it, free part of that consciousness of the fragment which is the demand, the search for security. Therefore the mind becomes extraordinarily awakened. You understand? It can then go into the problem of fear - which we will tomorrow and so on - into the enormous content of our consciousness. And ultimately the question is, can the content be completely emptied? You understand, sir? Emptied so that - empty, not something else. That means, reward.

So we'll stop today, if you don't mind, because we've talked for a hour, and to listen for an hour about serious things is quite difficult - probably you're not used to this kind of thing. I can go on but not you. So if you don't mind, we'll stop and meet again tomorrow morning.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 3RD APRIL 1977

I'm sure most of you will understand the importance of leisure. Because it's only when you have leisure that you learn. The meaning of that word 'leisure', according to a very good dictionary, means not having any occupation. At the time when we are talking over together, not to be occupied all the time, psychologically, physically or intellectually, just have plenty of leisure so that one can learn. That's really the meaning of a school, where one can learn easily, without conflict, when your mind is not occupied with so many other problems. So if I may suggest this morning, and the rest of the other mornings that we meet here, that you are not occupied, that your minds are not filled with problems, anxieties, occupations, trying to solve problems. But that we are here together to have actually leisure, so that when we talk over things together, as we're going to, that leisure, which is the mind not being occupied, not chattering, not trying to find out, just having plenty of leisure, so that in that state one can learn.

There are two types of learning, either memorize what is being said, which is what most of us call learning, or learning through observation, and therefore not storing it up as a memory and then looking, observing through memory. I'm going to explain it. Then, as we said, there are two types of learning. One is to learn something by heart, so that you store it up in the brain and act according to that, knowledge, skilfully, or not skilfully. That's what most of us do. When we go to school, college and university, we store up a great deal of information called knowledge, and according to that knowledge, act, beneficially for oneself or for society, skilfully or incapable of acting, simply, directly. That's one type of learning, with which we are all very familiar, which we do all the time, every experience is stored up as knowledge, and acted according to that, action taking place according to that knowledge. So that's very clear. I expect for most of us, it is so.

Then there is another kind of learning, which probably you're not quite accustomed to, because we are such slaves to habits, to tradition, to every form of conformity. There is the other type of learning, as we were saying, which is, to observe. Observation implies, to see without the accompaniment of previous knowledge, to look at something as though for the first time, afresh. And if you observe things afresh, then there is not the cultivation of memory, because each time you observe through that observation you learn, store it up as memory, then the next time you observe, you are observing through the pattern of memory, therefore you never see anything fresh.

So as we were saying, leisure is extraordinarily important, not to have a mind that is constantly occupied, constantly chattering, because it's only in that unoccupied mind a new seed of learning can take place. Which is entirely different from the memory, cultivating memory, storing up as knowledge and acting from that knowledge.

As we were saying, there is another kind of learning, which is, to observe, the tree, the skies, the mountains, the beauty of the mountains, the light among the leaves. And that observation if stored up as memory will prevent the next observation being fresh. You get this point - it's quite simple. That is, if you observe your wife or your girl friend or boy friend, if you observe, can you observe without the previous recording of the incidents, and all the rest of it, in that particular relationship. If you observe or watch the other without the previous knowledge, then you learn much more. I wonder if you're understanding what I'm talking about - am I conveying anything or nothing at all?

You see, for me, the most important thing is, among a great many other things, is to observe. And we mean by observe, observing not to have the division between the observer and the observed. Most of us have this division; the observer who is the total summation of past experiences, knowledge and all that, which is the past, then that past observes, so there is a division between the observer and the observed. That is the source of conflict. Right? I wonder if you see this.

As we said yesterday, wherever there is division there must be conflict, between races, between people, between two individuals, husband, wife, boy or girl, nations, divisions of belief, division of churches, any form of division must bring about conflict. That's clear. Now, is it possible, not to have that conflict at all, right through one's life? You understand my question? We are traditional, we traditionally accept this conflict, this struggle, this everlasting fight, not only physiologically, that is, to survive, but also psychologically, the good and the bad, and so on, the division.

So is it at all possible to live a life without a single effort, because if there is constant effort, there is no peace. Right? Please, we're communicating with each other, you're not listening to a speaker agreeing or disagreeing, but we are sharing the thing together, we are travelling together, we are concerned about all this together, therefore it is ours, not mine or - it is ours.

So we're asking, as man has lived centuries upon centuries a life of battle, conflict, both outwardly and inwardly, constant struggle to achieve, and then fear of losing, dropping. We are all familiar with all this. Now we're asking, is it possible not to have any conflict or even a shadow of conflict in one's life, otherwise you can never have peace. You may talk endlessly about peace, but there will be no peace as long as man is conditioned to the acceptance of conflict. So we are asking, is it possible to live a life, daily life in all stratus of life, both outwardly and inwardly, a life that is absolutely without conflict.

Now when you listen to that, don't please, if I may suggest, accept it or deny it. Don't say, it is not possible. Or say, it is possible. If you say, it is possible, then it's just an idea and therefore valueless. But if you say, it is not possible, then you block yourself. So we are together investigating this question. And investigation can only take place when you have leisure - leisure being your mind not being occupied with other problems. We are here together, because you have leisure this morning, you came. Near or far, from far, and together, having leisure, which means, a mind that is not occupied with daily problems and therefore willing to learn and see if that is possible to live that way all of one's days. Are we meeting each other? Somewhere? Not verbally, I hope, but actually, because it's our problem, because life is becoming more and more difficult, mere survival, physical survival is becoming enormously difficult - over-population, national divisions, economic qualities, you know, all the rest that is happening. Life is becoming extraordinarily difficult.

And the mere physical survival, one is conditioned to the fact that one must make tremendous effort to achieve a position and hold it. You know all this. And if you don't hold it, if you don't struggle, you might lose everything, you might be crushed, you might fall down and all that. So we're asking a very, very serious question - do please give your attention to it. Is it possible to live without a single shadow of conflict?

Conflict exists when there is division, the 'me' and the 'you', 'we' and 'they', the American, the Russian, the ideology of this group and the ideologies of that group and so on and on. Psychologically first, which is most important, not physiologically. If one understands very deeply the nature and the structure of conflict psychologically, and perhaps end it there, then you will be able to deal with the physiological factor. But if you are only concerned with the physiological factor, biological factor, to survive, then you'll find it enormously difficult, you can't probably do it at all.

So we are concerned as we have leisure this morning sitting down together in a beautiful place, with a lot of shadow, green trees, mountains and the cool breeze - I hope it's not too cold - and having leisure we are examining, exploring together the fact whether one can live a life that is really without conflict and therefore with deep care, affection, attention. Right? Have you got the question?

So we ask, why is there this conflict, psychologically. First psychologically. Why? From ancient days, both historically and religiously, and economically and so on, there has been this division between the good and the bad. I do not know if you are aware of the ancient caves in the south of France, north of Africa, in their caves, where there is a painting, probably, they say it is 25,000 years old - don't write to me and tell me, 'You are wrong about the date.' - where there is this constant, in symbolic form, the fight between the good and the evil. It existed in Sumeria, 7,000 B. C., and down to the present time. The good opposed to the evil, the righteous and the unrighteous, the angel and the devil. We are all familiar with this. We are conditioned to this division. And, as we have leisure, and I'm going to insist on that during these talks, we're going to investigate the fact, whether there is this division at all. Or only 'what is', and not it's opposite. You understand? There is, suppose there is anger, that is the fact, that is 'what is'. But not to be angry is not a fact. So the fact and the non-fact, that is, the good opposed to the evil. And we are asking why human beings have divided this, how has it come about, this division, god and the devil, you know, the whole mythological as well as intellectual and so on - why this division. Is it because we look at everything from the past - one of the factors. The past being all that you have learnt, all that you have experienced, and living in the past you look at the present, not as the present but from the past. I wonder if you see it. Are we communicating with each other - I do hope - let's - if we're not I would like to go over it in a different way.

We're asking why human beings live in this division, therefore in conflict. We are saying, one of the factors is, this constant living in the past, which dictates all our action, which is the factor of the unconscious. I won't go into that for a moment but later on, and I hope that a lot of prominent psychologists are here, analysts, I hope they'll go well along with me slowly. We have never questioned this division, we accept it, because we are very traditional by nature, habit, we don't want anything new. And that being a factor, another factor is, that there is a division between the observer and the observed. When you look at a mountain you are looking at it as an observer, so there is an observer and the thing observed, which you call a mountain. The word is not the thing. Right? The word 'mountain' is not the mountain. But to us the word is very important. So when you look at that, instantly the response is, 'That's a mountain,' - the word. Now can you look at that mountain, at the thing called 'mountain' without the word, because a word is a factor of division. I wonder if you're getting all this. When you say, 'It's my wife,' the word 'my' creates the division. We'll go into it when we talk about relationship.

So one of the factors of this division is the word, the name. And the word and the name is a memory, is part of thought. And when we look at a thing, the man or the woman or the mountain, the tree, whatever it is, division takes place when the name, the memory, thought comes into being. Right? So is there an observation, without the word, without the name, without the attachment to that particular form and symbol, and to observe without all that.

Is this getting difficult? So can you observe without the observer, who is the past? You understand? Who is the past, who is the essence of all the memories, experiences, the reactions and so on, which are the past. And look at something without the past, without the observer. When you do that, there is only the observed, so there is no division. You understand? And so no conflict, psychologically. Are you doing it or are you just memorizing what is being said? Can you look at your girl friend or wife or whatever, your nearest intimate friend, can you look or observe her or him without the name, the word, and all the experiences that you have gathered in that relationship, which is memory, which is the past, and look? And when you so look, what takes place? Then you're looking at him or her for the first time. You understand? For god's sake, get this. Don't please learn it, but actually, as you are, leisure and we are talking over something which is tremendously important, and learning implies doing it now, not tomorrow, not another day.

So that the observer is the observed, therefore there is only the observed. I wonder if you get this. Nobody's going to tell you all these things, no books, no gurus, no philosophers. You have to learn this from yourself. And you can only learn this from yourself when you have time, leisure, the mind not being occupied with all kinds of things.

So we are saying, it is possible to live a life that is completely, psychologically free from all conflict. Has it happened to you? Please, this is not group therapy, which is an abomination to me, personally, exposing our dirty laundry to each other. It has no meaning. But what we are actually doing is learning, not memorizing, but learning, observing the fact. And the fact will do everything if you let the fact alone. You understand? So the fact is that human beings live in the past, and therefore there is always division between the past and the present, and the future. The past being the time.

So we're saying, as long as, if I may go a little further, as long as there is a time interval in your observation, between the observer and the observed, there must be conflict. Please, don't agree with me, see, find out if this is an actual fact to you. If you have really understood this, not verbally but actually doing it, because we're talking about a very, very serious problem which is conflict, struggle in life. And when you do not struggle, you think you're lost, and thereby be afraid of losing, which is another form of conflict.

So if you really have gone into this with the speaker, together, and discovered for yourself, not from the speaker, but discovered it for yourself that as long as there is a division between the observer, the image-maker, and the fact, which has no image but only fact, as long as there is division there must be everlasting conflict. That's a law. And can that conflict be ended. And we're pointing out or talking about it and learning that it can end.

So when there is a psychological ending of suffering, ending of conflict, which is part of suffering, then how does that apply to our livelihood, how does that apply in our relationship with each other? If this is a fact that you as a human being who is the world and the world is you, which we went into yesterday very carefully, if this is a fact, that you are actually now living a life in which there is psychologically no conflict whatsoever, then how does that ending of psychological struggle, with all its conflicts, pain, anxiety, fear, how does that apply to our daily living? You understand? To our daily going to the office etc., etc. What's your answer? If this is a fact to you, that you have ended psychological conflict, then how will you live a life without conflict outwardly?

What am I to do, if I live this kind of life, no conflict inwardly? You know what that means. When there is no conflict inside, there is no conflict outside, because there is no division between the inner and the outer. You understand? It's like ebb and flow, the sea coming in and the sea going out, but when there is this psychologically no conflict, the ebb going out, also no conflict. You understand? What shall I do? I have to earn a livelihood, unfortunately - personally I don't. I don't because I've no problem about earning a livelihood. But you have a problem about earning a livelihood. Why haven't I a problem about not earning a livelihood, because, very simply - you're all waiting? You're a strange people all right. I've no problem because I don't mind what happens. You understand? I don't mind if I fail or succeed, I don't mind if I have money or not - personally I have no money, thank god. I don't want money, but I need food and clothes and shelter, and if somebody gives me, it's all right, if somebody doesn't, I live where I am. You understand my question? I have no problem, because I don't demand anything from anybody or from life. I wonder if you understand this.

So, I've explained, but my way of living is entirely different from yours. So if I had to earn a livelihood, what should I do? Having psychologically no conflict of any kind. You know what that means? How has it happened that I have no conflict? Is it a theory, is it a desire which has been fulfilled, is it an illusion, is it something that I've hypnotized myself into? You understand my question? Or is it an absolute, irrevocable fact, which nobody can touch, it is inviolate. You know what inviolate means? That which cannot be damaged, which cannot be touched. So if that is so, then what shall we do together - it is together - what shall we do together to earn a livelihood? Because there is no conflict, therefore there is no ambition. Because there is no conflict, there is no desire to be something. Right? Because there is no conflict, because inwardly there is absolutely something which is inviolable, which cannot be touched, which cannot be damaged, then I don't depend, psychologically on another. Therefore there is no conformity, no imitation and all that.

So not having all that, then I will do what I can in the world, be a gardener, a cook, anything. But you're so heavily conditioned to success, and failure. Success in the world, money, position, prestige, you know, all that, and that's what we are struggling for. But if none of that exists - you understand what takes place in a human being. In consciousness, in human consciousness, which is so heavily conditioned - right? - heavily conditioned to success, and the fear of failure. To be something, not only outwardly but inwardly. That's why you accept all the gurus, because you hope he'll lead you to some illumination, some kind of illusory nonsense. Not there is not something absolutely true, but nobody can lead you to it.

So our whole consciousness or most of it is conditioned to accept, to live a life of constant struggle, because we want to achieve, we want to become, we want to play a certain part, we want to fulfil, we want, you know - which all implies, the denial - please listen to this - the denial of 'what is' and the acceptance of 'what should be'. Because we deny 'what is', and have created the ideal of 'what should be', there is conflict. But to observe actually 'what is', which means, you have no opposite, only 'what is'. Look, if you observe violence, the word 'violence' is already contaminated, the very word, because there are people who approve of it, people who don't approve of it, so it's already warped. So take, for instance, violence. And the whole philosophy of non-violence, both politically, religiously, and all the rest of it.

That is, there is violence, and its opposite, non-violence. The opposite exists because you know violence. And the opposite has its root in 'what is'. Right? So we think by having an opposite, by some extraordinary method or means, we'll get rid of the 'what is'. Which is, 'what is' and 'what should be'. To achieve 'what should be', you need time. See what we go through, the misery, the conflict, the absurdity of all this. 'What is', is violence, and 'what should be' is non-violence. So we say we need time to achieve non-violence, because I'm conditioned to violence and to non-violence - I must have time, I must make an effort, I must struggle to be non-violent. That's the philosophy, that's the conditioning, that's the tradition, the good and the bad.

Now can you put away the opposite and just look at violence, which is a fact. The non-violence is not a fact. Non-violence is an idea, is a concept, is a conclusion. But the fact is violence, that you're angry, that you hate somebody, that you want to hurt people, anger, jealousy, all that is the implication of violence, that's the fact. Now can you observe that fact without introducing its opposite. You understand? Then you have the energy, which is being wasted in trying to achieve the opposite, you've all that energy to observe 'what is'. In that observation there is no conflict.

So what will a man do who has understood this extraordinary complex existence based on violence, conflict, struggle, who is actually free of it, not theoretical about it, actually free, which means, no conflict, what shall he do in the world? Will you ask me, or are you asking yourself this question? Will you ask this question - please listen - will you ask this question if you are inwardly, psychologically completely free from conflict? Will you?

Obviously not. It's only the man in conflict who says, 'If there is no conflict, I will be ended, I will be destroyed by society.' Because society is based on conflict. But the society is what you have made of it, you have made the society, you are responsible for the society, because you are greedy, envious, violent, and society is what you are. So there is no difference between you and society, you are society. These are facts. But when you separate yourself from society and say, 'I am different from society,' which is such nonsense, then if there is complete transformation of the structure of society which is violence, immorality and all the rest of it, in you, you affect the consciousness of society. And when you are so free inwardly, do you ever ask that question, 'What shall I do? In the outward world.' Do answer it yourself, sir, find out what the answer is, for yourself, because inwardly you have completely transformed something which man is conditioned to, that constant battle, battle, battle.

Have I answered the question? I've answered it for myself, long ago. But will you put that question to yourself and find out, without any illusion, without any fantasy, without any desire to be or not be, which all brings conflict, find out for yourself the fact of it. That is, a complete transformation, inwardly, of something which man has held as the most important thing, which is struggle, fight, conflict, you know, all the rest of it.

So, the next thing is, if I may go on to something else, that our consciousness, if you have observed it, and because we have leisure we can look, now. If you observe your consciousness, if you are aware of your consciousness, that is, are you aware of your consciousness, what you are? If you are aware, then you'll see that your consciousness is in total - I'm using the word 'total' in its absolute sense, not relative sense, in its absolute sense - your consciousness is in total disorder. Are you aware of that fact? To be aware implies very simply, to be aware, you are aware of the trees, you are aware of where you're sitting, I am aware of the sun on my head, which I don't like, I'm aware of the various colours and so on - aware, outwardly. And inwardly, to be aware implies, to be aware without any distortion. You can't distort that tree and say, that's an elephant. But you can very easily distort what you see inwardly.

So to be aware implies to be aware without any distortion of what is going on inside. Right? Are you so aware of your consciousness. If you are, you will find, don't you find, that it is contradictory, saying one thing, doing something else, wanting something - you follow? The total movement within an area which is so small and so, no space, and in that little space there is disorder. And are you aware that you are in total disorder? And ultimately that disorder leads to neuroticism, obviously, and all the factors of modern society with psychologists, psychoanalysts, psycho-therapists, you know, all that stuff going on. If you are aware in the sense that you watch yourself, which is your consciousness, without any disorder, without any distortion - is that possible. That is only possible when the observer is the observed. You understand? When the observer is the observed there is no distortion, he sees 'what is'. But if the observer exists, then he distorts what he sees. You understand? Is this clear?

So can you observe - is there an observation of oneself which is our consciousness, and see the actual fact of its disorder, of one's disorder, in daily life, not only outwardly, but much more deeply, inwardly. Outwardly we're very orderly, some of us at least, because it's compulsive, it's becoming more and more, you have to be orderly etc., I won't go into all that. But inwardly, are you in order? Or there is disorder? Can you observe this fact? And what takes place when you observe choicelessly, which means without any distortion, what takes place? You understand my question? Because where there is disorder, there must be conflict; where there is absolute order, there is no conflict. And we're saying there is an absolute order, not relative order. And that can only come about naturally, easily, without any conflict, only when one is aware of oneself as a consciousness, observes the confusion, the turmoil, the contradiction, outwardly and inwardly, and observe without any distortion. Then out of that comes, naturally, sweetly, easily, an order which is irrevocable.

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 5TH APRIL 1977

K: Every Tuesday and Thursday for the next two weeks we will have dialogues. The word 'dialogue', I looked it up in the dictionary, means putting our thoughts into words. And a dialogue between friends, and I hope this is that way, implies that there are no arguments, no assertions, that two friends are talking over together their problems, amicably, frankly and easily, because they are friends. So perhaps we could approach these dialogues that way. That is, if you could ask a question and go into it very, very deeply, patiently, and see the whole implications of those questions. And so what shall we talk about this morning together?

Q: I wonder if we might talk about mysticism, and whether or not there actually is mysticism or is this inevitably an escape.

K: Mysticism. Could you talk about mysticism. Anything else?

Q: I have a problem which I have been exploring for weeks and weeks and weeks and it is this: to see the false as false, to see the true as true, and to see the truth in the false. It is this that I'm searching.

K: That's your question, is it, sir?

Q: Yes, I don't understand it.

K: All right, we will go into that. Anything else?

Q: Is there such a thing as sacred or timeless thought, or is all thought conditioned?

K: Is there something sacred, unconditioned, not touched by thought. Is that it sir?

Q: Yes.

Q: I am asking a question not about religion, or the meaning of religion, the traditional religion because it is shown that it strengthens the self. Instead I am asking why does the whole belief and create divisions in the first place.

Q: I would like to talk about reality, the nature of it.

K: I should like to talk about reality.

Q: In your writings you refer to 'the Beloved', what is this beloved?

K: All right, sir. Look, it is not what I write and what I think, what is your question, it is not my question. Don't say, well you have written this, what do you mean by that. Could we honestly, simply and easily talk about what we are concerned with, each one is concerned.

Q: How can I bring about a psychological revolution?

K: How is it possible to bring about psychological revolution.

Q: What is the content of one's consciousness?

K: The content of one's consciousness. Now just a minute, that is enough questions. Let's see. Now what shall we take among all these questions? Shall we take the question, if you are really concerned not with what somebody has said, but your own problem - you understand, sir - your own concern about what is truth, why religions have so separated themselves and we are caught in it, what do you mean by the false and the true, could one talk about the unconditioned, is there such a thing as the unconditioned, sacred, untouched by thought, and is it possible to really bring about a transformation in oneself. These are all the various questions, more or less, that have been put to each other. So which shall we take first?

Q: What does it mean to be serious about those questions?

K: What does it mean to be serious. I don't know. I do know for myself when one is very, very serious, for oneself, but I don't know what you mean by being serious, you may translate it in so many ways, that in seriousness there is no humour, no laughter, seriousness committed to a particular ideology, and also one can be quite serious neurotically and so on and so on. I think we generally mean by seriousness that one is really concerned, deeply concerned with something that we want to solve, we want to understand, go into.

Q: I'd like to go into the question of fear.

K: I'd like to go into the question of fear.

Q: Could you please say something about the relationship of individuality to consciousness. I think there is lot of confusion about this. For example, consciousness and all its contents are made, and where does individuality fit in?

K: Now, I don't know how many questions to answer, all these questions, how is one to answer them, all the various questions. Perhaps if we take one question amongst all these which might cover the whole field.

Q: Reality and truth, the relationship between this.

K: I am afraid that is a too abstract subject.

Q: How does one start to transform oneself?

K: How does one start to transform oneself. May we start with that question? Would that be all right with all of you?

How does one start to bring about a radical, deep psychological revolution? That's the question, isn't it, sir?

Q: Yes.

K: One has to go into this question rather carefully. First of all we have to understand what do we mean by change? Change from this to that. Right? We generally mean that. Change from what one is into what one should be. Is that change at all? You follow my question? I want to change from what I am, with my greed and all the rest of it, and change that into something much better. Right? Right sirs? This is a dialogue, please I am not talking by myself. So please. And when there is such change, is it really a transformation? Or is it merely a reaction? Or is it a premeditated desire, end to which you want to change - change. You understand? And is transformation inward psychological revolution, is that totally different from change? You understand my question? Please, let's talk over as two friends, please. You understand? Wait a minute, sir, let me finish.

There is capitalism and communism. The communism is change from capitalism - at least they think so, but all political things are becoming the same, more or less. Is that change? They talk a great deal about revolution, outward revolution, and is that revolution based on a change which is preconceived? You understand? And therefore conforming to a pattern already established, and therefore it is not radical change. I wonder if I am making myself clear.

Q: They seem two forms, communism and capitalism, of the same conflict.

K: No, no, forgive me. Don't - forget communism and capitalism. I want to change from greed to non-greed. The non-greed is already established in my mind, is already put into words, there is a pattern to which I am conforming. Or I will conform when there is change.

Q: The idea of change.

K: No, just listen. Please, go slowly, please. First I want to be clear on the difference between change and transformation, a mutation, if you want to use that word. Change implies changing 'what is' into 'what should be'. Right? Into 'what should be' is already established, by thought, by environment, by circumstances, by pressures and so on and so on. It is already established. And when I change I am changing from 'what is' into 'what should be' which is conceived. Therefore I say to myself that is no change at all. Right? It is still pursuing the same pattern only in a different field. So I see that very clearly. I hope you do too. I see that fact, that change implies a continuity of 'what is' modified. Right? Whereas transformation is something entirely different. The ending of 'what is', not 'what should be'. Am I right? This is a discussion between two friends, I am not being logistic or reasoned and all the rest of it, do we as two friends, please I really mean it, as two friends see this, the difference between change and total ending of something.

Q: Change is something like totally non directional. In other words when someone...

K: That's right sir, that's right. One is directional, the other is non-directional. But sir, just get it, what it means. Because we have operated, our mind is always directional. Whereas we are saying, the ending is non-directional and therefore it is something tremendous and not limited.

Q: I see very clearly intellectually that always change leads to no change at all, there is no transformation. How is it that we don't feel it inside?

K: We are going to go into that, just a minute. If we see clearly the meaning of these two verbally, even verbally or intellectually, that is, change implies continuity of 'what is', modified, directional, and transformation, mutation, total psychological revolution has no direction, is not modified, it is the ending of something. Right, is this clear? Verbally at least.

Q: Isn't it true that if someone is in a situation where they want to move out of where they are, like someone is standing in the middle of the planet, and he wants to go somewhere, he has to seemingly at least, at some point he has to have some point of direction because...

K: Wait, sir, wait. Don't particularise yet, we are going slowly. First let's understand this - please, to understand this psychologically is more important than merely verbal understanding of it. The 'better' is the evil. The whole mentality - our whole mentality is, 'becoming better'. The 'better' is directional, 'the better' is modification of 'what is' into 'what should be'. It's all directional, preconceived, modified. Whereas the other is a total ending of 'what is'. Now if that is clear, now which is it you, please, as a human being, want, or demand, or are seeking - sociologically, economically, psychologically?

Q: Prayer for something and meditation is to listen.

K: Prayer and meditation - we are not quite discussing that, sir, if you don't mind. Now which is as a human being, actually, not theoretically, is caught up in: a directional movement or the ending of that directional movement? You understand my question?

Q: What is directional?

K: You don't understand my question? Sir, when you have a direction - look, you are looking at a map, a map of America, or Europe, or India, a map, and if you have a direction from this place, Ojai, to Nebraska, whatever that is, you have a direction. Right? So when you are concerned with the direction you don't see the whole map. But we are trying to see the whole map, not a direction. Right? Is that all right?

Q: Yes.

K: Thank god! So, now which is it as a human being you are caught in?

Q: I feel that when I am caught in that situation I am very scared.

K: No, madam.

Q: We are always seeking temporary solutions.

K: No, I am asking - please don't go off to something else. We are asking each other, as two friends, I am not sitting on a platform, we are walking together, or sitting under a tree, we are asking, which is it you, as a human being, actually are caught in, directional, or non-directional?

Q: Directional.

Q: Are we seeking a temporary direction?

K: Directional, isn't it. Now if it is directional, and you are aware that you are caught in a directional movement, how do you end that movement? That's all the question, not how to transform that movement into something else. I am going north - sorry, I am going south, and I really want to go north, so I turn round and go. You see the difference? I break the movement of going towards the south and turn and go north. But I must know, be aware by the sun or by the compass that I am going south. Now if we agree, or if we see actually that we are caught in a direction, a modified continuity of 'what is', I am asking, how do you end that.

Q: As soon as there is a way to do it...

K: All right. Is it possible - put it not the 'how', the method, the system - is it possible to end that.

Q: You become objective, step out of the circle and look at this circle.

K: I can't quite hear.

Q: Step out of the circle, become more objective.

K: Are you doing it?

Q: Trying.

K: Ah, no, no, you can't try. The compass says, go south, and you really want to go north, you don't say. 'Well, I'll try and turn round and go north', you turn round and go north.

Q: Sir, when you use words like tremendous and revolution, we could forget.

K: Sir, that's what I am asking, sir, please listen quietly, sir. As two friends, are you aware that you are caught in a directional movement? And if you are aware of it, is it possible to end that directional movement? It is a very simple question. The complication comes a little later.

Q: You stop making comparisons.

K: I don't quite follow. I am going, sir, please, I realize that I am caught in a directional movement, which is modified - the continuity of 'what is' modified, directional. Am I aware I am doing this? I am violent, I should not be, non-violent; I am greedy, non-greedy; I am this and that. And all that is a modified continuity of 'what is'. Is that clear? If that is clear then I am asking myself, can that end. That is the change, that is transformation - not transformation of 'what is' into something else.

Q: When the mind is...

K: No, no, stick to this one question, sir.

Q: The mind can't answer it because having never not been going in a direction, it seems impossible to tell if it is possible not to go in a direction.

K: All right, sir. Are you saying our memory, our brain is so conditioned, that it is always moving in a direction. Which means what?

Q: You are always trying to be somewhere other.

K: No. Which means our brain is conditioned generations after generations to go in a direction. Right? Have you observed it? Have you observed your brain, your whole process of thinking is directional - directional either lateral or horizontal, or vertical, it is always a direction. Right? Are you aware of that?

Q: Is the non-directional a fixed point?

K: Is it because we are talking about it and therefore temporarily it is non-directional? What is temporary is not actual. Right?

Q: Doesn't it all seem that when there is no longer someone who wants anything to change, anything to be different.

K: Madam, that comes a little later. But we are already ahead when we have stated that, when we have not actually realized the directional movement, which is modified continuity of 'what is', can that end. That's all I am asking. Actually not intellectually, not verbally and say, 'Yes, finished'. Wait. And see the implications when you say, it is finished.

Q: How can I see that I am moving in a direction?

K: Don't you, madam, don't you want to be better, to be - if you are fragmented, don't you want to be integrated, don't you want fear to end? That's a direction.

Q: Looking at the fear as attachment...

K: Don't take fear as an example. It is so difficult.

Q: Sir, aren't you saying that it is not fair to be non-directional, you should be directional but know what your direction is.

K: No, no, no, no. We are not saying that. To know your direction - when you use the word 'know', what do you mean by that word?

Q: You see the whole map.

K: Yes sir. You have used the word 'know', what do you mean by that word?

Q: It is a conclusion.

K: No, please, two minutes. When you use the word 'know', what is implied, what is the significance, what is the meaning of that word, to know?

Q: To be sure of it.

K: I know you because I met you yesterday. Right? You were introduced to me, and I say, yes, I know you. Which is what?

Q: You recognize.

K: To recognize. How does that recognition process take place?

Q: From memory.

K: Which is what? Your name, you were introduced to me yesterday - your name is registered in the brain, and therefore it is memory, therefore it is already known. Right? So when I say, I know, you are already speaking from the past. You don't see the complications of this.

All right. So we are asking, is it possible to end the directional movement? Not have a new direction, but have no direction at all. Because to have a new direction is another modified continuity. I wonder if you see.

Q: We don't know because if I am driving a car and I have never stopped, I have always kept going and I don't know how to stop.

K: So you have always been going in a particular direction and you don't know how to stop. Let's take that. You have always gone along a particular road, a direction, and you really don't know how to stop. Can we start from there? Now what is the impetus that makes you want to stop? What is the motive?

Q: Desire.

K: No, please, don't.

Q: See you are going the wrong way.

Q: The fact that I have crashed into one horrible thing in life against another makes me begin to see.

K: So your motive is the horror, or you have seen the results of direction. Is that so? Or is it a conclusion? You see the difference? I can conclude it is a wrong direction. I can think it is wrong. But I may want another direction.

Q: Before you go in another direction you have to stop the one you are on.

K: All right. Before you go into any other direction you have to stop. What makes you stop, sir?

Q: Crisis in consciousness.

K: No, please don't complicate it. Crisis in consciousness. Madam, do you know what that means? Crisis means a challenge, it is such a great challenge, and your response must be equal to that challenge. This is what is going on now. So I am asking, when you say can you stop moving in a certain direction, and I am asking what makes you stop, what is the motive, what is the urge, the desire, the necessity.

Q: I see I am getting nowhere.

Q: The direction is hazardous.

Q: You crash into the wall of reality, you see my desires did nothing for me.

K: So when you crash into reality and you say, 'I get nothing from it', so your motive is reward and punishment. Be simple about it sir. Your motive is punishment and reward. That is directional. That is what we are brought up on from childhood. Modern psychologists - I don't read their books, but I have friends who talk about it, who have come to see me and we discuss it - they are saying we always punish people, now let us do the other, reward people. Which is the same thing. So do you want to stop because you want a reward?

Q: Discontent.

K: Do you want a reward and therefore you stop? Or you are frightened of punishment and therefore you stop?

Q: Stop because you are aware.

K: You stop because you are aware. Now please, what do you mean by being aware? I am not being facetious, I want to understand each word that you use so that you and I are both on the same level. I may have a different meaning to that word, and you may have a different meaning to that word. So what do you mean by being aware?

Q: By seeing the futility of making effort.

K: Do you see that actually? That means you no longer make effort of any kind. Do you see it?

Q: You realize that the thinker is fabricating the whole sense of direction.

K: Agreed, madam. I agree, but when you say, I am aware of that fact, what do you mean by aware - we are asking. When you see thought, or when you realize the whole fabrication is brought about by thought, are you aware of it. And what do you mean by that word 'aware'?

Q: You see it clearly.

K: Now when you use - I am sorry, I am going to push this point if you don't mind - when you see, what do you mean by seeing?

Q: Understanding.

K: What do you mean by understanding? Madam, understanding, how? Intellectually?

Q: No.

K: Therefore what do you mean by that?

Q: It is sort of like a dawning.

K: All right. It dawns upon you, which means what? Go into it. Don't stop.

Q: I see the difference between being the thinker and fabricating an illusory sense of things, and being the wholeness that hears the very living that life is, right now, everything.

K: Which means what? That you have an insight. You see the actuality of the falseness of moving in a certain direction. You are aware of the total implications of moving in a certain direction, you have grasped it, you have got it, it's in your blood. So you don't go back ever again in any direction.

Q: Just be.

K: No. You see that's what I want to prevent. Being.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You see the point sir, what she is saying. The lady there says, I see it. Either one sees it verbally, intellectually and therefore it is not actual seeing. And when you say, 'I see', she meant, I understand. When you say, I understand, what do you mean by that word? Understand what is explained. I understand verbally, intellectually, grasp the meaning of words and I understand that. She said, no, I don't mean that. I said, have you really grasped the falseness of direction, that it leads nowhere? Do you actually as you perceive that tree, is it as actual, as real as that, therefore you will never knock against that tree again. So when you use the word 'direction', when you use the words, 'I understand', it means you have finished altogether moving in a modified continuity, in a direction, which means that you have ended it. Now is that a fact? Please, if it is a fact, what has taken place in daily life? What has taken place in the movement of the brain? You understand? Because our brain is conditioned for centuries and centuries, generations after generation, millennia, to move from this to that. Right? Improve oneself, change oneself, become oneself, identify yourself, fulfil yourself, be yourself, if you cannot, then achieve god, move always in a direction, direction. Now when you see that direction is false, is there the brain free of that movement? You follow? Or it's merely superficial capture of the meaning. I wonder if I am making myself clear?

Q: It's stopping.

K: You understand? Which means - go slowly - which means the brain has broken away from the past conditioning, so it will never function in that direction at all, because it has captured the danger of it. Because the brain demands security. I won't go into all that for the moment. The brain demands security, and it thought it had found security in a directional movement. You are following this? You are following it, madam? And the brain sees the danger of it, therefore says, 'I can't go in that direction'. So the brain itself has understood the movement, the danger, not merely a verbal understanding. I wonder, am I explaining something sir?

Q: The next time it happens...

K: Oh, it never happens. That's what I am trying to show you. It can never happen.

Q: The momentum of all this...

K: No.

Q: It will come up though.

K: That's what I am saying sir. Unless the brain itself, the structure, the whole - sir, you know the brain, please I am not a brain specialist, I haven't read a book about brains and so on, but I have watched this movement of the brain, which is really part of meditation. I won't go into all that. The brain is conditioned. And it is conditioned to go in a certain direction: change 'what is' into 'what should be'. It is always modifying. And in that modification it finds security, because the brain can only function when there is complete safety, properly. So it will find safety in some neurotic belief, or it says, I have achieved something - you know, all the rest of it. Here when the brain sees the danger of a directional movement, it itself stops naturally, it can never go back. Now does this happen to you?

Q: Are you saying stop directional movement, but not movement, are you saying stop movement altogether?

K: No, no, directional movement.

Q: Is directional movement preconceived?

K: Sir, I won't go into movement. Movement means time, time means - I won't go into all that for the moment.

Q: If that did happen we wouldn't be here.

K: No, sir. Sir, two friends are talking over together this question.

Q: We would not be here because we were seeking something.

K: It's up to you. If you are seeking something, and the speaker has nothing to give.

Q: We...

K: Wait, wait. The speaker has nothing to give. But the speaker says, let us talk over as two friends - that's completely different. You are used to - not you, sir, particularly - you are used to being given something, told something, what to do, that is the whole function of the priest, the gurus, the authority, to me all that is absurd. I deny all that. So I can't give you anything. But I say to you, please, let's talk it over together, which is entirely different. You understand, sir?

Q: Are you saying that if you don't seek anything, and you allow the brain to basically just to see.

K: No sir, no. Don't go on with it. No, no. It's much more complex than that sir, please. The brain itself is conditioned. We are taking one small section of the brain, as it were, which is functioning in a direction, that's all. I am not touching the rest of it. The rest of it we can go into later - the rest of it is fear, pleasure, the whole human structure. So we are asking - it is really a very important question, if you once grasp this - that the ending of direction is the complete transformation. That means you will never seek direction, psychologically. Of course if I want to know how to go to Santa Barbara I will ask somebody who knows the direction and so on. But we are not talking on that level.

Now I am asking, if I may ask my friend, I say, look we have talked about forty minutes, have you really got this? Have you really grasped this, does it mean anything?

Q: Sir, suppose you will occasionally you will perhaps be at this timeless place, a place where you can work and see. Perhaps at one time it is seen, but then as you lose that vision...

K: No. No, sir. Would you once you realize the rattler, once you have seen the rattler and seen the danger of it, would you go back and play with it?

Q: No. But it stops being a rattler, it looks like something else.

K: You see that means we haven't really actually seen the danger of a directional movement. That's all. Yes sir?

Q: Directional movement seems to be inconsistent with nature.

K: No, sir, please. I explained at the beginning, if you don't mind if I repeat it again, we said: change and transformation. Don't forget what we started out with. Change implies modified continuity.

Q: Does a caterpillar change...

K: Leave the caterpillar, poor thing, it's a marvellous thing, leave it alone. I am talking of human beings. Human beings think they are changing, when actually the change is modification of 'what is'. That's all we are saying. The modification of 'what is', they consider is change. I say, that's not change at all. The ending of 'what is' is radical transformation.

Look sirs, make it much simpler. One is violent, human beings are violent for various reasons I won't go into - from the beginning of the animal until now, we are violent. Now we have a direction, which is to become non-violent. There has been the philosophy of it in India, Tolstoy has gone into it, you follow, the whole mess of all that. Sorry, I consider it a mess, you may not. So we are conditioned to a modified change, and I say when we discuss transformation, how to bring it about, I say, look at these two words first: the word change implies that, the word transformation implies the ending of this movement of change, the ending, psychologically - not the caterpillar and so on and so on.

Now after talking over together for forty minutes or more, or less, as two friends say, please, have we understood each other.

Q: Verbally we understand.

K: No, wait. So you have not understood?

Q: I have not understood.

K: So we say, now let's begin again. I have not understood. Why? Look sir, careful. Wait, wait. You and I are great friends - I am your husband or your wife, we are holding hands. You would say when I tell you something very extraordinary for me, deep, would you say, I don't understand - would you tell her that? Wait. What is your relationship first? She is trying to tell you something she feels most profoundly. And you say, sorry, I don't understand - would you say that?

Q: I would say nothing.

K: Why?

Q: Because I would.

Q: Wouldn't you have to feel it?

K: Feel it. What do you mean by the word 'feel'? You see, I am very critical of words - sorry, forgive me. Which is not avoidance, which is not escape, which is not merely argumentation or avoidance. I am saying one has to be terribly careful in investigating, the usage of words.

Q: If you can't understand a thing, and you can't feel it, then what?

K: Which is what? Either you feel, touch, smell, taste, or you think. Now when you say, I don't understand, we are saying is it emotional that makes you understand, a feel that makes you understand? Please, you are not answering my question. After forty minutes, we are holding hands together, and I say to you, please, listen to what I have got to tell you. It's most tremendously important, because it will perhaps change our relationship entirely. And listen to me, paying attention to what I am saying, and it tells you, and at the end of forty minutes you say, sorry I don't understand what you are talking about - would you say that to your girl friend?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes.

K: You would?

Q: Do you know?

K: I don't know, don't jump on me! What kind of relationship have you then?

Q: Honest.

K: You have no relationship at all, apparently.

Q: When I say I don't understand, that's the point, I do have relationship.

Q: There's no love.

K: That's it, sir. There is not even affection to understand something. If you and I had affection - if you had affection and I had affection for you, and I say, look, for god's sake, do look at this, and because you have affection for me, love for me, what I say is important to you.

Q: That's...

K: So our relationship, sir, is that we are not friends. I tell you I am your friend, you say, 'Buzz off'. And I say, 'Look, this is one of the most fundamental things in life that you must understand', and I tell you as a wife, as a husband, as a girl friend, as a boy friend holding your hand, kissing, everything, I say, look. And you don't even say at the end of forty minutes, 'I don't really see what you are talking about'. I don't think you say that to your girl friend. She would leave you the next minute.

Q: That's words.

Q: You wouldn't say it because you wouldn't want to hurt.

K: So it's not a question of hurt. We don't understand what relationship is.

Q: Krishnamurti...

K: Do think about it a minute. We don't understand what relationship means. Because I come along and say, look, let us talk as two friends, which implies care and affection, love, consideration, involvement, commitment, and you sit there and say, 'You go on talking, but...' - you would never say that to your wife or husband or girl friend or boy friend, because you are involved in it.

Q: Please explain it again.

Q: I don't agree.

K: What is it you don't agree with, sir?

Q: If I don't understand someone, I don't care if I love her or not, I'll tell her that I don't understand. That may be the end of our relationship but I have to take that chance.

K: Therefore you are not concerned with relationship.

Q: Not as much as I have understanding.

K: Ah! No, relationship is the only thing in life.

Q: What is relationship?

K: That's just it. We will go into that. What is relationship? It's a very complex question. What is relationship? To be related to somebody. Is it merely a physical attachment, sex and all that? Are you related then? What do you mean by relationship? And you say to my wife, my girl friend, boy friend, husband, whatever it is, father, what do you mean by this word, what is the significance, the depth of those words.

Q: Relationship is loving and caring.

K: The actual fact. What do you mean by relationship?

Q: Sharing. Relating. Experiencing.

K: Are you sharing? Are you sharing?

Q: Trying.

K: I don't try, sir, please.

Q: To give your attention to someone.

Q: To be free of attachment to another.

K: I am related to my wife, what does that mean? Facts, not theories, suppositions, and hopes and what I would like, but facts, everyday facts.

Q: We share the last name.

K: We share the bed?

Q: Sometimes.

K: That's about all.

Q: No, we share the name, the name.

K: Sir, you are not being... you are not going into it.

Q: It feels like we are all part of the same. Each is part of each other and you are part of humanity.

K: Oh, that's just theories.

Q: We don't know.

K: Please, madam, as somebody has said we really don't know what relationship is.

Q: Relationship is relating to the other as yourself, I see you as myself speaking.

K: That's just an idea.

Q: No, its a fact.

K: Wait, go into it slowly, madam. You all have conclusions about it. I haven't. I refuse conclusions. I refuse - forgive me, as a friend - I say, my friend, my lady, please, don't come to conclusions. Let's look at it. Let's start as though we don't know about it. Then we can learn an infinite lot. But if you say, yes, I know. You know if you start with certainty, you end up in doubt. Right? But if you doubt, you will end up in certainty. But we start the other way, we are all certain.

So let's find out, if you are willing - what time is it?

Q: Five to twelve.

K: Five to twelve. Briefly. You haven't yet solved this problem which we started out with. This always happens. I want to find out deeply, with your help, and you want out deeply with my help, in exploring what does it mean to change, and what does it mean to transform - transformation. We said any form of change is a continual modified continuity, which is the essence of mediocrity. Ah!

Q: Krishnamurti, what happens if we end direction.

K: I am saying. What happens when there is an end.

Q: Aren't we in a vacuum?

K: Oh, no, no. That's just it, sir. You haven't ended it and therefore you have never found it, you have already come to a conclusion. Do we enter into a vacuum, is there nothingness, is it annihilation. You follow? You haven't really answered the question whether you have ended it. Then you will find out something totally different.

So I am asking after an hour, holding your hand, we have been friends - and I really mean it, we have been friends, and you feel probably, temporarily, poor chap, let's be friends with him because he is talking so much about it - and I say, look we have talked forty minutes, have you understood this simple, fundamental fact? Understood in the sense not intellectually, but it's in your blood so that you will never again go in any direction.

Q: Isn't that we move together when we are talking.

K: Have you done it, madam?

Q: I think I have.

K: That means you have ended direction. After an hour. See the importance of it. For god's sake, see the importance of it. We want success; that's a direction - sociologically, politically, religiously, in every way we want to achieve something, become something, gain something. That's a direction. When we conform, imitate, that's a direction. I say that is the very core of mediocrity. That's what we are - except the present company - you are all mediocre.

Q: How do you stop being mediocre?

K: Which means, can you end direction.

Q: You can end direction, but you establish non-direction.

Consciousness which is non-directional, then you experience non-direction and direction at the same time, then you solve the problem.

K: No, no, you are off the mark. Forgive me sir. You are off the mark. You haven't even listened.

Q: I don't know...

K: Look, sir, when you go to school, in the school you are told you must be as clever as A. You are given marks. All directional. You understand? Competitive, which brutalizes children. You have seen the American children - oh, you are all Americans, sorry! So from childhood until you die, be something, become something, achieve something, be a millionaire, become the president, become the governor - you follow? Move out. Which is all directional. And if you are religious you say, well I must be the right hand of Jesus, or god, or whatever it is. So you are all trained, conditioned to accept this norm. Somebody comes along, like me, poor chap, and says, look, just look what you are doing. You haven't the time, you haven't the patience, you won't even listen, just look what you are doing. This produces - directional movement produces violence, hatred. You follow, the whole thing, which is modern society. And you say, yes, I understand that but I don't know how to stop it. Which means you really don't want to stop it. You follow? You want to go on because that is your conditioning. Or you are frightened. Frightened, if you stop what will happen. Which means you are seeking a reward. When you are frightened you are seeking. If you don't get your reward, you say...

So here we are together as friends, and I really mean it as friends. And I say please this is a fundamental thing to understand, the beauty of it, it is really most extraordinarily beautiful if you understand. When there is no direction it is - the heavens. So at the end of an hour I ask you as a friend sitting under a tree, holding hands or whatever you will, very close friends, say, have you really understood this thing.

Q: We are...

K: Just listen sir, have you really understood it in your heart, in your blood, in your nerves, in your brain, it captures something. If you have, then you will never again seek direction. That means you will never again want to be something, socially, psychologically.

Q: That cannot be.

K: There we are.

Q: If you have no direction, it will always be with you as a shadow until the concept is removed, until the concept is gone into the essence, it shall be with you.

K: What?

Q: Direction or non-direction. It doesn't matter. If you ask a bird how it flies...

K: Oh, no, sir. You can ask a caterpillar which foot it puts first and then it stops. If you ask a caterpillar whether it puts the first leg then he will be paralysed, he will be looking at it and won't move. Please, sir, don't fritter it away, please.

Q: Sir, may I ask for an answer, for confirmation or denial. Last night when I was coming up here, somebody told me I was a whore, I was very upset. She said you sleep in your car. Yes, I said, I will if I have to. So I was very upset. So I sat down right there. I saw I was trying to do the impossible.

K: Madam, this is not what we are discussing.

Q: No, I wanted her to accept what I do and she couldn't. The trouble was if I had enough feeling what...

K: You see what the difficulty is at the end of an hour. Each man is going on with his own, so that means you and I have no relationship whatsoever. Which means if you haven't with me, you have no relationship with anybody, because I am an ordinary human being. You understand, sir? I am a human being, if you have no relationship with an ordinary human being how can you have relationship with another human being?

Q: Is relationship directional?

K: No, sir. That is a complex question, perhaps we will discuss it the day after tomorrow. But see what we have done. We don't care. Right sir?

Q: When you talk and say you, and I talk and say I, who is you and I?

K: We.

Q: The body, what is it?

K: Sir, when we say you, I am talking as a human being to another human being, not as I and you. You understand? We are talking of human beings. I've explained very carefully that every human being is the total history of mankind. It is a fact. And if you know how to read that book you don't have to read any other book in the world, because everything is contained in it - man's misery, confusion, sorrow, death, love, sex, all that is you. You are the world and the world is you. Therefore there is no you and I when there is that.

Q: Isn't that...

K: Please sir, when I say you - we are talking quickly, en passant.

Q: You say there is direction.

K: Yes, sir I said that. Sir, don't you see the end of something, something new is born. Don't you see if we go on in the same way over and over and over again there is no ending to something, it is only when something ends a new beginning can come. If we were satisfied with the piston engine, we would never have had the jet. Right? The jet came into being when the man said, I know all about pistons, let's stop it. Let's look in other directions - directions, you know what I mean!

Q: Would you share a moment of silence with us?

K: Would you stop talking and be quiet for a while together. To be actually quiet, an unoccupied mind. (Pause) Right sirs.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 7TH APRIL 1977

K: Perhaps there are some new people who have come this morning, so we are having a dialogue. The word 'dialogue' means putting into words one's thought. And as two friendly people talking over together their problems perhaps we could this morning discuss or have a dialogue, a conversation, in that spirit, that we are together examining, exploring, investigating our problems. This is not a group therapy. Group therapy implies exposing one's own dirty laundry to another. I don't think that's worth it. Whereas if we could examine deeply our problems perhaps we could resolve them this morning, and not carry them over year after year until we die. So what shall we talk over together?

Q: I would like to ask you will thought and experiencing always remain, or appear to be as opposites, or is there an understanding which can bridge this gap?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: Can we talk about violence and cruelty in human beings, and what is the relationship between that of violence and cruelty in the animal kingdom? Where does that relationship end?

K: I don't quite follow your question, sir.

Q: I am asking what is the relationship between cruelty in human beings, violence in human beings and violence in animals, and where does that relationship end between us and violence.

K: The first question was, thought and experience, are they different, and can they be brought together; and the other question is, what is the relationship between human beings and animals, who are both of them violent. Any others?

Q: I was wondering, we ended our conversation last Tuesday on a particular point, you mentioned that after forty five minutes of our discussion that say between two loved ones, if one did not understand after that period of time there would be no relationship or love between the loved ones. I just wondered if you would somewhat go over that, I personally I don't agree with this in the sense that in your descriptions of a certain people, you have talked about the observer and the thing to be observed being one. That particular example, if I may use an example, say the audience here and trying to understand your philosophy and so forth - it may not necessarily be a philosophy - K: I think I understand your question.

Q: One other thing, just an observation, it seems to me that during the course of people asking questions and so forth, the question is somewhat irrelevant to what is going on in your discussion. You seem to get at a certain point frustrated, and I just wondered, you know in your talks about infinite patience, in your books and so forth, does there seem to be a paradox or a contradiction there. That's just an observation. In a sense people here said they didn't really understand a lot of what you said on Tuesday, and they were asking questions, those questions did not reveal understanding, so it may not be to the point for you to tell us we don't understand. You know, you just seem to get frustrated.

K: Sir, I don't quite follow your questions that you have asked. I don't quite...

Q: I just wondered...

K: Why I am frustrated?

Q: Why you are frustrated by the questions that are asked.

K: All right, sir. Why are you frustrated by the questions asked by the audience.

Q: If one really cares about another what does that imply?

K: If one cares for another what does that imply.

Q: Could we talk about relationship?

K: Could we talk about relationship.

Q: Just to repeat what I asked, it was thought and experiencing.

K: Thought and experiencing, I understand, sir.

Q: Could you explain how we can have a relationship without fear and jealousy.

K: Can we have relationship with another without jealousies, fears and anxieties and all the miseries that come in relationship.

Q: Is there something to be learnt from the experience of having been in a place before, because I have experienced deja vu, when you feel as if you have been through a particular action before, even though now in the present it is all new experience you feel as though you have been there before. Is there something to be learned from that?

K: Is there something to be learnt from?

Q: From the feeling of having been here before.

K: Learnt from having been here before, the feeling of it.

Q: Could we talk over the question of me?

K: Could we talk over the question of me. That is enough.

First of all to answer that question, I am afraid I don't feel frustrated. Perhaps you think I should, but I am not frustrated. So let us drop that question. Should we discuss relationship, what is the significance of relationship, the depth of relationship, should we discuss that; or shall we go into this question of thought, what is the relationship of thought to experiencing, and what is experiencing without thought? Should we go into that?

Q: Yes.

K: You want to go into the question of experiencing and its relation to thought. Relationship of experiencing and thought. All right. Do you want to go into it very deeply?

Q: Yes.

K: First of all, let's find out together and I mean together, we are both of us exploring, we are both of us trying to understand what we are talking about. We are using words which we both understand. I am not speaking in Italian, or Russian, but in English. So together we are going to examine this very complex problem. First of all, what is thinking? What does one mean by the word 'thinking'? How does thinking arise, what is the significance of thinking, what is the source of all thought? All thought, both scientific, religious, the thought of everyday, the business thought. We are discussing, talking over together this question of thought.

Why has thought played such an extraordinary part in human life? Does thought exist without the word? And is the word 'thought' - please, all these are implied in this question. So please, if you will kindly go together in this.

So first we will begin by asking is there a thinking without words? Is there a thinking without a symbol, an image, a picture? You understand my question? Or the word is the thought. Or does thought bring the word in to action? You see it is a very complex question, this. So we are going to go into this very, very slowly and find out the whole nature and the structure - the structure of thought. That's what you want, don't you?

Q: Yes.

K: At least you want to discuss that and we will come to that presently. Sir, when one asks you what is thinking, what is your response to that word? If you observe what is going on, that is, the speaker asks you a question, what is thinking? Your immediate reaction, if you are aware of it, is to search out in your memory the correct answer. Either the accumulated memory through books, the information that you have received by reading psychological books and so on. So your immediate response to that question, which is, what is thinking, your brain is tremendously active, looking, asking, searching. Right? And what do you find? May I put it this way: when one is asked a familiar question, what's your name, where do you live and so on, the response is immediate - why?

Q: Because the thought is in your memory bank.

K: Yes, sir but I have asked a question, just a minute, sir. I have asked a question, which is, I have asked what is your name, your response is immediate. Right? I am asking you why is it so immediate. Don't answer it, look into it, first find out, sir.

Q: We are more concerned with labelling than investigating, it's right there.

K: No, sir. I am asking - I asked your name, and your reply very quickly, why? I ask you something a little more complex. You take time. I ask you something and you reply, 'I don't know'. So there are at least three factors: one, immediate response, what's your name, where's your house, etc., etc; and a little more complex question you take time, a lag, an interval between the question and the answer; and if there is a question about which you have never thought, or investigated, you say, 'I really don't know'. Right? That's clear. So there are these three factors. The one familiar, quick answer because you have repeated your name a hundred thousand times, you are very familiar with it so the response is quick, there is no time lag. There is a time lag if I say, what is the distance between here and Timbuktu, you say, 'By Jove, let me think' and you are calculating. And you say, so much, or I don't know. Or I ask you a question, do you know if there is god. You don't answer. If you are sane, rational, not committed to any form of belief, you say, 'I really don't know'. So there are these three things.

Now I ask, the question is, what is thinking? You will not be able to reply to it quickly because you haven't thought about it. Now I ask you a question, what is thinking, your brain is searching. Right? Asking, looking, watching, where can I find that out, where is the answer to it. Isn't that what is going on? So you are looking into memory, the bank of memory, and trying to find an answer to it. Have you found it? Have you found an answer for yourself, which must be rational, logical, objective, can stand up against any questioning, which can be doubted, not easily accepted. So have you found such an answer?

Q: Yes.

K: So we are asking, what is thinking. Is not thinking the response of memory? Right, sir? Memory as knowledge, as experience, stored up in the brain, in the very cells themselves and that knowledge, experience, memory, responds. So the experience, knowledge, the memory, and the response of memory is thinking. Right? Right, sirs? No, don't please accept because this poor chap talks about it. See it for yourself.

Q: They are all one and the same.

K: I coming to that. That is the experience, knowledge, memory, thinking, it is a tremendously rapid movement. Right? It's one unit. Not separate banks. It is one united movement. Right? So thinking is based on memory, which is the past. Right? So thinking can never be new. Right?

Q: There are inventions.

K: Inventions. Wait a minute, sir. Don't go off. We will answer that question presently, but first see what is happening to you, not to the person who is inventing a new thing - we will go into that. What is happening when you ask this question, that applies to yourself, please, not to the inventor. So do we see this fact, the nature and the structure of thinking - the structure, like a building. The structure of thinking is the movement of the past as memory. So memory, thought and thinking can never be under any circumstances new. Because it is the response of memory, the past experience, stored up as knowledge, so thought is coming from the past.

Q: Do not the thought process, this knowledge, do they not come together into a new thought, a new realization, a combination.

K: Thought can never realize anything new because it is the response of memory, the old. There can be the new only when thought stops.

Q: Who would stop thought?

K: Please, do first of all let's get this clear. See what we are doing; our whole social, moral, political, religious structure is based on this movement of thought. All our gods, all our churches, all our rituals, all our saviours, everything, is based on thought.

Right? Sir, if you say, yes, see the danger of what you are saying. If there is the urge to find the new, totally new, thought must totally come to an end. Which means you must abandon everything that is based on thought, which you won't.

Q: Is it possible to abandon thought?

K: Is this possible. The lady asks, is this possible, to end thought.

Q: If you answer in either way you block yourself.

K: So without blocking oneself let's find out. Our relationship with each other, man, woman, husband and wife, boy and girl, and so on, is not that relationship - please listen - based on thought?

Q: What is the capacity of combining images.

K: What is the capacity to combine various images.

Q: And...

K: Listen carefully, don't add more to it. What is the capacity - I am not trying to stop you, sir - what is the capacity that combines, that adds, that brings together various images. Right? What do you think it is, the capacity? I have got an image of the country, I have got an image of my wife, I have got an image - if I believe - of god, I have got an image of my boss. Right? Now what is it that combines, that brings about relationship with each other? Is it not thought itself? Wait a minute, sir. We will go into it differently, you will see it in a minute. We will see each other in two minutes.

I am asking, what is the relationship between human beings, what is that relationship based on?

Q: Feeling.

K: Feeling. Is there a feeling without thought? You are all so quick. If you did not recognize a feeling would there be a feeling?

That is, one is jealous, that's a feeling. Right? Right? And if you did not recognize it, which is the word 'jealousy' is stored up in memory, representing a particular feeling, and when you use that word 'jealousy' it is recognized, otherwise it is a feeling. So there is no feeling without thought. Please, I don't want to go into all this, it is very complex thing - we will go into it presently. I am asking first of all, what is the relationship of human beings, what is it based on - husband, wife, boy friend, girl and so on, what is it based on?

Q: Can there be direct perception as well as thought in a relationship?

K: Can there be direct perception as well as thought in relationship. We are going to find out. I am asking - we are asking each other, what is our relationship based on.

Q: Images.

Q: Relationship is based on thought.

K: When you say your relationship is based on thought, do you know what the implications of that are?

Q: There is no relationship.

K: No, sir. Can you say that to your wife, there is no relationship? Or to your girl friend, 'Oh, it's all just thought'. Please go into it together, let's go into it. We are asking what is this relationship based on.

Q: It is based on love.

K: Based on love. Is it? If it is based on love then there can be no jealousy. Right? There can be no attachment. Right? There can be no possessiveness, no domination, no sense of belonging to me and belonging to another. So we won't, please if you will forgive me, we will go into that word and it's a very complex business, so let's begin very simply. We like to think our relationship is based on love, on goodness, kindness, affection, care, love and all the rest of it. But it is not. That's a fact. Let's look at the facts. So we are asking, what is it based on.

Q: Fear.

K: Is it based on fear?

Q: Mutual exploitation?

K: I don't know, sir, you are all involved in it, I am not.

Q: Is it based on desire?

Q: It is based on need.

K: Please, sir, look at your wife, find out what your relationship is with her instead of just throwing out words. Or your girl friend, find out, look at it.

Q: It is based on need.

K: Need. Which is what? I need you, for what? Comfort, sex, dependency.

Q: The laundry.

K: You don't go into this. Are you frightened to go into this?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: It is based on our past conditioning.

K: Jesus!

Q: Sir, I don't really know, but it seems like there is a force involved, if there are two people they are two, they are opposite, they are male and female, or simply that if there are two there is you and there is me, and this force seems to be resolving that condition. There is a deep desire, need, which the force is seeking to resolve, to make the two one.

K: Sir, if I may point out respectfully - I am not sure if I point out respectfully - may I point out that we are all so full of ideas, conclusions, what we want, we don't examine 'what is'. If I am married and I have a wife, or a girl friend, what is my relationship to her, what is it based on? Attraction, physical sensation, sex? And the movement of thought which predominates all this. No? I see. Let's look at it, sir.

You are married, one is married, or have a girl friend, what takes place instantly? Do look at it, please look at it. You are married, you have a girl friend, what takes place? Look at it. You have an image of her, haven't you? She has an image of you, hasn't she? No? Yes, sir? Start from that. You have an image about her, and she has an image about you. How does this image come into being?

Q: By a process of memory, which is thought.

K: So you are saying this image building is based on memory; you said something awful yesterday, rude to me, you insulted me, called me a fool, registered, memory and the building of images. Right?

Q: Can't the relationship be fresh every time you see the person?

K: But, sir, that is an idea, a conclusion. First begin with 'what is'.

Q: You are saying that all our relationships are based on memory, 'what should be', our needs. There seems to me there is no need other than that, if it's not in our hearts how does it get there?

K: Sir, in our heart, to have a relationship in our heart it means affection, care, all that is involved in that, have you got that?

Apparently you can't look frankly at this. One has an image about another, whether it is the wife, or the president of this country, or the pope, you have an image about each other. That's a fact. Based on previous memory, previous incidents, and stored up in the memory and the memory, which is image-making, memory is image, the word. Right? That's simple. So my relationship to my wife or girl friend is based on an image which has been gathering through incidents - sex, pleasure, this pleasure, the memory of sex, all that, then there is the dependence on her. Right? The attachment, the possessiveness, all that is built up through time as memory and image. This is fact. No? No?

Q: Yes.

K: Contradict, sir, discuss, break it. If I am wrong, I am wrong, let's find out.

Q: It's a fact.

K: Right. Then your relationship is between these two images. See the implications of it. Memory, relationship between two people, husband, wife, boy or girl, all that, is between these two images, which thought has built together through time. It may be one day, or one second, it is already there. When you say something nice to me, it is already in memory, or when you insult me, it is already there. When there is relationship between two images, is it relationship?

Q: No.

K: If it is not then what are we talking about?

Q: The minute that you say it, it can't be love, you've said it, then it is not love.

K: I haven't gone into that yet. I said relationship between two images put together by thought in which we are caught. Right? Therefore the constant battle, the struggle between man and woman, husband and wife, whatever, the constant conflict, ending up in divorce and all the rest of it. Now let's move from there. I face the facts. I don't deceive myself, I don't say it's love, it's romance, it's a lovely feeling - wash it all out. The fact is, it's based on this image-making. Right?

Now my next question is, can this image-making stop? You understand my question?

Q: Can there be image-making and not be caught by it?

K: I don't understand the question. Can there be image-making and yet not be caught in it.

Q: Can the brain make actual images without being caught in them?

K: You haven't seen the question. You haven't understood the first part of the question: what is thinking; thinking we said is memory - experience, knowledge, memory, stored up in the brain, and its one movement, not separate movements, one movement which is the whole process of thinking. This thinking in relationship has built these images, me and you, we and they, communists, socialists, and all the rest of the world. So I am asking myself, I see when there are these two images, you have about her and she has about you, I see there is tremendous danger in this. You follow? Do you see the great danger in this in relationship, in all relationships, whether it is with the neighbour, or with your neighbour ten thousand miles away. Do you actually see what happens when there is these two images?

Q: We have to live in the now.

K: It is not a question of living in the now, sir, it is a fact. We go away from the fact. So you are asking yourself, as long as these two images exist there must be conflict. Right? And the next question is, I see the danger of conflict because when there is conflict there is no love, obviously - so we are asking, can this image-making stop.

Q: Who is going to answer the question?

K: Both of us together. I have put the question, which is the image-making and the images that we have between us, in relationship, and we say can that image-making stop. Not who is to stop it, please understand that. Not who is to stop it. If you say, 'I will stop it', the 'I' is the product of thought. Right? So thought has created the images, thought says, I'll break it because it will create another image. So what will bring about an end to the image-making?

Q: Yoga.

K: Yoga? Lord love a duck! Sir, the word 'yoga' - I won't go in it - sorry. That's a distraction. When we are talking about something very, very serious, to talk about yoga has no meaning. If you want to discuss yoga we will go into it, but when you are discussing relationship in which there is conflict - don't you know conflict, sir, between you and your wife. And can that division which thought has brought about, can that end?

Q: When thought ends.

K: No, sir. Can that end, the image-making?

Q: What about the use of memory?

Q: We tend to carry it to the present moment.

K: The present moment, that is to live in the present. Right, sir?

Now is it possible to live in the present? What does it mean?

Q: It means to be present.

K: No, what does it mean, sir, to live in the present, actually, not theoretically, actually, daily, when you are in your office, in your home, when you are sleeping with somebody, live in the present - what does it mean?

Q: Not having images.

K: That's a theory. You really don't know what it means to live in the present, which is to live without time. I won't go into all that. Again we are distracting. So I am asking...

Q: Is there anywhere but the present?

K: How can we live anywhere but in the present. The word 'present', the actual second, the present - you see, I can tell you but it has no meaning when we are discussing this. So can the image-maker, which is thought, and the building of images end?

Q: If we still the mind we can end it.

K: If we still the mind we can end it. Now, that is just a supposition - 'if', 'I wish it would rain' - it doesn't rain. Sir, please, for god's sake, stick to what we are talking about, not theories, not conditional responses, which is 'if', 'when', all that; the fact is this. If you will listen we will go together into this, but you are so full of ideas.

I see the tremendous danger, and I am using the word 'danger' in its full significance. Danger in relationship, having images about her and about him, because that brings about great conflict in life. Right? In that there is violence, conflict means violence, in that there is no care, you might say, 'Darling, how beautiful you are, here is a ring', but conflict goes on the next minute. So we have to find out whether this image-making can end, not through effort, because if you make an effort it is part of, again, conflict, not through desire, not through a reward, say 'If I do this, I will get that'. So what am I to do? Put that question to yourself. What are you to do when you have got these two images, and you are living with another human being intimately or not intimately, you have got these images and therefore conflict, what are you to do?

Q: It started without images.

K: What has that got to do with it?

Q: Start every day anew.

K: That's just a theory again, start every day anew.

Q: Without the images.

K: Without the images.

Q: The experience of complete, total and absolute inner silence is the experience of no image.

K: Absolute, total silence.

Q: Inner silence.

K: Inner silence. Have you got it?

Q: Yes, I have.

K: Then the problem is over. You see, your people don't...

Q: Not twenty-four hours a day.

K: Not twenty-four hours but occasionally. The rest of the time battle. Sir, please, would you kindly listen. I really want to end this. This image-making, I see the tremendous danger in it. So I ask myself, can this end? Because the danger is more important than anything else; like a precipice, when you see the danger of it, you move away from it. When you see a rattler you move away from it.

Q: Krishnaji...

K: One moment. Just listen, sir. So one sees the danger of it. Which is, why does thought create these images? Don't please answer it immediately.

Q: Desire?

K: Go into it a little bit, sir, before you answer. Go into it a little bit. That is, I am asking you why thought, which is, my wife said something to me yesterday, nagged me, bullied me, was happy with me, gave me some comfort, etc., etc., and that has built an image. And that image, I live according to that image; and she does too. And I say to myself, why does thought do this? Don't answer it yet, please, give two minutes to go into it. You can only go into it if you have no ideas about it, if you don't say, this is so, that is so, and jump to words. So we have to find out why thought does this. Thought does it - I'll have to continue because you don't - thought does it because in the image it finds security. My wife, the image, and in that I am secure. Wait a minute, sir, just listen to it. My country. Right? Security. My group. Security. The group being the image which I have created about the group, the image which I have created about the nation, the image which I have created through religious indoctrination, the image - whether the Christ, the Hindu gods and all the mess of that business. And so thought creates these images because it finds security in it. Right? Whether that security is in neuroticism, neurotic beliefs, or some beautiful fanciful image, it is still the same. So thought finds security, wants security. Why?

Q: It seems to me thought wants to maintain itself.

K: Yes, go on, sir, a little further, don't stop there. Sir, don't. You have said something, investigate, move with it.

Q: It seems to me that thought is impermanent and therefore it seeks safety.

K: Are you sure of what you are saying? Don't theorize about it. Unless you are speaking from fact, everything else is meaningless.

Q: Security, safety and certainty.

K: Which is what? To be certain, secure, all that means it demands complete inviolable security. Just a minute. Why? Why does thought demand this? My wife. You follow? I possess her, she is mine, etc., etc. In that there is great certainty, great security. I have identified myself with her. She has fulfilled what I want. And she does the same with me, it's a mutual interacting exploitation. Sorry, to use an ugly word but it is a fact. So I say to myself, if thought seeks security, is there security in the image? You understand, sir? I sought security in my wife, the wife or the girl, and I have built an image about her, and in that image there is security for me. But it's an image. You understand? It's a word, it's a memory, it's such a fragile thing, but yet I hold on to it.

Q: Sir, I thought I was aware of the passage of time, and I'm afraid it's going to end, so I seek permanency in the images I create.

K: You see permanency in anything. Right? So I am asking, why does thought seek it. Look into it, sir. I seek - please just listen, sir - I seek security in the traditional symbol, in the cross, I seek security in that. That cross, the whole structure, the nature and all that lies behind it, rituals, dogma, all that, I find security in that, why? And I know logically, if I am aware at all, logically, it is a product of thought. Right? And yet thought clings to it, why?

Q: Conditioning.

K: Is that part of our conditioning? Part of our being conditioned from childhood to believe in that symbol - Rama, Krishna, Christ, you know. Why? If thought finds security in it, and thought looks into it, I say, my god, there is no security, it is just an idea. Right? Which thought has put together. So when thought clings to an image it is the very essence of neuroticism. Right? I know it is danger and yet I cling to it. Do you see the absurdity of this, sir?

Q: Yes, I do.

K: So do you actually, no wait a minute, do you actually see the absurdity of it?

Q: Yes, I do.

K: Then it's the end.

Q: Yes, yes.

K: Then you don't create images. Wait, wait. That is, the wife calls me an idiot, will I listen to her without forming an image? Or the old tradition, habit, conditioning, response says, yes, image-making. You follow? When she calls me an idiot, no image-making. Is that possible? Or when she flatters me, which is the same thing, the other side of the coin. If you will listen I'll show it to you. Shall we go into it?

Q: Yes.

K: That is, the wife calls me an idiot because I said, did, something which she didn't like and all the rest of it, she calls me an idiot. Thought is conditioned, so the immediate response is an image. Right? I am not an idiot. There is an image. Now can I listen to her - please find out, I am going to tell you something - can I listen to her without a response? You understand? Not indifference. Can I listen to her when she says, 'Darling, you are so lovely' - which is another image. Right? Can I listen to her when she calls me an idiot, when she says, 'You are marvellous' - both. You understand? Listen to it without storing it, without registering it. Do you understand my question? Do you understand sir? It is very important, do get this a little bit. Which is - do you want to go into all this?

Q: Yes.

K: The mechanism of the brain is to register. Right? It is registering. And it so conditioned that it registers immediately - idiot. Or you say, what a marvellous person you are. It is registered. Now to stop registering - you understand my question? When he calls me an idiot, not to register it, or when you calls me marvellous, not to register. Which doesn't mean I become indifferent, hard, callous. So I can only do that - please listen - I can only not register, that is only possible when I give my complete attention to what she says. When she calls me - please listen - when she calls me an idiot or a marvellous person, when I pay complete attention there is no registering. Why? You understand my question? Do it, please, as you are sitting there do it now. That is, you have got an image about your wife or your girl friend, or your boy friend - gosh, this boy and girl, I'm getting bored with this! We go on until we die with this question, boy, girl, woman, man. It's so silly. I am pointing out the image-making is the process of thought. Thought has made this image, therefore there is conflict in that, I see the tremendous danger in conflict, whether between India and Pakistan, or whether Russia. You follow? Tremendous danger because they kill each other. So I ask, can that image-making stop? It can. Why does thought bring about these images? It finds security in these images - security, safety. And yet thought knows how absurd it is. Therefore when thought clings to something which is irrational, it is neurotic.

So I am saying, asking, since the mind, the brain is so conditioned, it can't let go and say, finished. So I am saying when the wife says, or the man, husband says, or the boy says, or the girl says, 'You are an idiot', not to register. Just see it. Don't say it is possible, it is not possible, but find out. Because if you say if it is possible, then you have already gone off; or if you say it is not possible, you have blocked yourself. So is that possible, can that be done? We are going to investigate.

Why does the brain register the word idiot, and the word beautiful, marvellous, you are a lovely man - why? One is an insult, one is a flattery. Because the word 'idiot' has a great deal of significance. Right? The word itself is an insulting word. I have an image about myself, and that image rejects the idea that I am an idiot. You understand? I have not only an image of my wife, my husband, my girl, or whatever it is, also I have an image about myself. Right, sir? So when you call me an idiot the image gets hurt. Right? So is it possible to end all image-making about myself as well as the other? To end totally all images. Don't say, no, or, yes. So what is the momentum, the energy from which the image-making takes place? You understand what I am talking about? No, I am not making myself clear. I will.

Let's begin: as long as there is a centre, as the 'me', with my image, that is the centre, that image will always get hurt, or flattered. Right? So as long as there is a centre it is impossible not to register. Do you get it? Haven't you got an image about yourself? If you are really honest and look at yourself, haven't you got an image about yourself? That you are this, that you are rather ugly, that you are not so clever, and I wish I were more beautiful, you know, not so bright, not so intelligent - you have got an image about yourself. So that image, which is the centre of your being, as long as that image is there it must register. Which means, registering means division, conflict, violence, and all the rest of it. When you see the whole structure of relationship, the whole of it, then the centre becomes unimportant. You are following all this? The centre has no value. Therefore there is no registration at all. The speaker is telling, for him, a fact, not just an idea. Because I have lived through this. K, this person, has lived through this - I have been insulted, hurt, brutalized, kicked about, called marvellous, you are the great teacher, everything. There is no registration because there is no centre. You understand, sir? Therefore no conflict. Have you got this?

So we began with asking, what is thought, and what is experiencing. Right? In the moment of experiencing anything, it doesn't matter, sex, looking at that lovely branch, or the evening sunset, the delight of an early morning, when there is an experiencing actually that is the second, in that there is no thought. Then thought comes along and says, 'How marvellous that was' and holds it. The moment it says, how marvellous, it has captured it, and therefore wants to repeat it. Right, sir? So to look at that sunset, or the morning light on a leaf, the experience of it and end it, not carry it over, all that demands tremendous attention. And attention is not possible when there is a centre which says, I must attend, I must get - you follow. Right, sir?

What time is it, sir?

Q: Twenty past twelve.

K: We meet next Tuesday, for this dialogue we are going to talk over together about education.

Q: Sir, the lady would like me to ask if this image and hurt are the same thing.

K: The image and the hurt?

Q: Are they the same thing?

K: Of course. The moment you have an image you are going to be flattered or injured.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 9TH APRIL 1977

We were saying how important it is in a world that is becoming so utterly chaotic, that there should be, and there must be, human transformation, a great, deep psychological revolution. A revolution is not the bloody kind, the physical kind, which man has experimented with centuries upon centuries, trying to change the environment through conflict, bloodshed, violence of every kind. And apparently he has not succeeded at all, though he has environmentally brought about certain destructive change, he has not radically, psychologically brought about deep transformation of man. And we are concerned in these Gatherings with that, whether man can radically transform himself, psychologically. Because if he does not bring about that transformation, that revolution, psychologically, inevitably we will have more and more conflict, more and more wars and conflict in all relationship, whether intimate or superficial.

And also we were saying - I hope you don't mind, those of you who have heard it before - that wherever you go in the world, whether in the East or in Europe or here, one finds man, which includes the woman, and I hope you don't mind if I don't say each time, woman - man or woman is about the same throughout the world, psychologically; they suffer, they are in great turmoil, uncertainty, anxious, great deal of sorrow and great many tears, loneliness, despair. And eventually facing death. And so, as one observes this fact, one sees that man, you or the woman, is the whole world, he is the world, and the world is him. If one realizes that, very deeply, not intellectually or merely verbally, then that brings about an extraordinary quality of vitality, to face things, to face the world as it is.

And that is what we have been saying during the last two talks here. Now this morning, if we may, we'll go into the question of what is consciousness, the content of consciousness. And whether that consciousness can be radically transformed.

One often wonders whether human beings, you and I and others, are aware of themselves. Most people are aware rather superficially, their petty desires, superficial conflicts, their physical demands, sexual appetites and all the rest of it. They're superficially cognizant, know what they are going through. But there is also far deeper layers of one's being, which is consciousness, to be conscious of oneself. That is, to know or to be aware of the whole nature and the structure of consciousness, of what one is - that is consciousness. To be aware implies watchfulness, to observe, to observe what is going on within oneself, not biologically but psychologically - the thoughts, the motives, the conflicts, the desires, the opposing purposes, ideals and facts, saying one thing, doing another, thinking one thing, and contradicting in daily life.

The whole process of this is consciousness, which is fairly obvious. We are using the word 'consciousness' which means to be conscious of oneself, and all the turmoil that is going on within oneself. To observe it implies, or to be aware of it, if there is any choice in that observation that the factor of the choice distorts observation. I think that's fairly clear. That is, if one is to observe one's own deep layers of consciousness with all the struggles, the pains, the anxieties, the laughter, the tears and the ambition, and the mischief that's going on within oneself, to observe it, to be aware of it, and if one chooses, then the observation becomes, is distorted. That's fairly simple. Right? Can we proceed from there?

So observation implies no choice. And when you observe this whole process of oneself, the whole content of oneself, the various factors, influences that bring about this consciousness, is that consciousness - please listen, give a little attention to this - is that consciousness different from the observer? You understand my question? One observes the mountain, the shadows, the movement of the clouds and so on, one observes. When you observe, there is a you, the observer and the thing observed. The observer, as we said, is the past, all the memories, experiences, knowledge, stored up in the brain as memory, which is the past. And when you observe through memory there is a division between the observer and the observed. Right? So to observe without the observer is a real problem, which we'll go into presently, if we've not done it already in the previous talks, because it's really quite important because it is the factor of conflict. Where there is division there must be conflict, as in nations, when you have various types of beliefs, in religious beliefs, there is always division, always conflict.

So to live in complete, deep peace, the observer is the observed, and therefore no conflict. So we are going to examine together, go into this question of consciousness, together. Please, if I may point out again, this is a very serious talk. One has to give considerable attention, in which is implied care, affection, and we're taking a journey together, I'm not taking a journey and you're following me, we are together exploring this. Therefore it is your responsibility, if you are at all serious, to go into this.

And, as we said the other day too, the speaker in exploring together with you, has no authority. Though he sits on a platform, which is for convenience only, don't make him into an authority - then you're not capable of exploring. Because your consciousness is the consciousness of mankind. I think that is the basic thing one has to understand: what you are, the world is. Your consciousness is in conflict, disarray, confused, disordered, and in your relationship, in all the things you do, there is disorder. And in the world there is disorder. So what you are, the world is.

So we are together going to explore this question of what is consciousness, and what are its contents. And are the contents different from consciousness. And is the content consciousness, and whether it is possible to go beyond this small, little, conditioned consciousness. That's what we're going to explore during the next three, four talks. So please be a little serious. I'm afraid most Americans - forgive me for saying so - are not very serious people. They'd rather be amused, entertained, acquire a lot of superficial knowledge from books, or go to classes, be told about psychology and other matters. And they think they are terribly learned, they know all the facts in the world. But they know very little about themselves, actually. They know about themselves according to Freud, Jung and all the rest of it, but when you put all those authorities out, and when you look at yourself, you hardly know yourself. So if you don't mind my pointing out, be a little serious, if you can, don't hold to your particular theory or to your particular conclusion, or add what we're saying to that which you already know. Or what we're saying adapt it to your particular guru or, you know, all that business.

So just, we are, as friends, look into this, we are not doing propaganda for you, or trying to convince you of anything. So, if you're a little serious and are willing to pay a little attention for some time, a duration, because you cannot give half a minute attention and then think about something else. This requires very considerable, deep enquiry which demands your care, your affection, your sense of responsibility.

So we said, we're going to observe, be aware of our consciousness. And we said also where there is a choice in observation, saying, 'I prefer this, I don't like this, or this is what I, this is right and that is wrong', so choice psychologically distorts clarity, observation. So please observe without choice.

In our consciousness there are certain factors, which are the desire for power, position. And there are many hurts that we have received from childhood, wounds, deep psychological hurts. And also in that consciousness there is the everlasting search for pleasure. Please, we are looking together, I am not saying it is, we are enquiring, learning together the whole content of our consciousness.

And there is the pursuit of pleasure, and there is this enormous sense of fear. Right? Then also there is suffering, not only personal suffering, but the suffering of mankind, man, and woman have been through a million thousand years with wars every other year, destruction, enormous sense of sorrow.

And in that consciousness also there is that thing which is called love, with all its jealousies, hurts, wounds, anger, violence, and so on. And also in that consciousness there are innumerable beliefs, dogmas, ideas, conclusions. And also there is death, the fear of the unknown, fear of dying, coming to an end.

So this is the content of our consciousness, the knowledge that we have acquired from books, the knowledge that we have acquired from experience, stored up, in memory, in the brain as memory, which is the whole movement of thought. Right?

So the whole content of our consciousness are these things. So we're going to examine the major factors, not all the details, because that's endless. The major factors, like power, demand for power, which most of us want, a position. Power implies success, domination, power over others, or power over oneself, and so on. And also there is in that hurt, being hurt, from childhood we are hurt. And being hurt we have become violent. We'll go into that slowly, step by step. So we're going to examine, first the desire for power. Right? The desire to dominate, the desire to assert, aggressiveness, all that is a sense of power. The dictators throughout the world are, they are representatives of that power. And as long as they've not solved the problem of power, there's going to be conflict, not only in the world of dictatorship, totalitarianism, but also in the world of so-called democracy, individual voting and all that, there is also the desire for power, possession, domination. And this is an important factor to understand, and if it is at all possible to be free of it.

And is it possible to be free of it, this desire for power, which is to possess another, to dominate another, to carry out your particular ideals, and assert those ideals, you follow - all that, which is the expression of will. You understand this? Are you following all this? I hope you are, because it's your life, not my life. And if one observes, how you waste your life. You understand? So in talking over together amicably, with friendship, with affection, with compassion, together, don't waste your life, and not to waste it implies the understanding of one's consciousness and going beyond it. So it is a very, very serious matter.

So in one's life, in one's daily life, is it possible to be free of the desire for power - power includes domination, possession, assertion, aggressiveness, all that. So to understand power, one must understand the whole movement of desire. Right? You're following all this, some of you at least? Because most of us want to fulfil our desires and when these desires are not fulfilled we feel frustrated. And from that frustration there comes all kinds of neurotic activity. So it's very important, it seems to me, to understand the nature and the structure of desire, which eventually is will, and will is the essence of power.

So you must go into this question of desire. We're not saying that you must not have desire, but to understand it, to go into it, see the results of desire, how desire arises, what is its nature, not as the monks throughout the world, religious monks have said, suppress desire. We are not saying that, on the contrary. When you suppress desire it must explode in other directions, but to understand, to go into it, to see the whole nature of it, then it becomes something else. So we're going to go together into the understanding of desire. You know what desire is, don't you, most of you, don't you? Desire for clothes, desire for cars, desire for man or woman, desire for position, knowledge, desire saying, 'I wish I was as clever as that man,' and so on.

So what is this desire, and how does it arise? Please, if I may ask you, suggest, don't repeat something that you don't know, that you have not directly seen, because we are all secondhand human beings, we repeat slogans, what people have said, what you have learnt from books - you have never discovered anything for yourself, and that's what we're going to do, find out for yourself, and then it is irrevocable, it cannot be destroyed, it is inviolable, it can never be damaged, if it is something that you find for yourself.

So we're asking, what is desire, how does it come, because it is one of the major factors in our life - the want, the want of so many things, not because you're lonely you want something, or that you are in bad health, therefore you want something, to be in health. We are not talking, we are asking, what is desire itself? It is really very simple, if you look at it. If you observe it very closely. Desire arises, doesn't it, through perception, through contact, through sensation, and thought, and thought then creates the image. Seeing, contact, sensation, then desire, and the creation of the image out of that desire, and wanting that. Do you get this? No, see it in yourself, please, not because I point it out. You look at a car, you look at a woman, you look at a house, there the visual perception, sensation, then there's the contact and the desire, desire then creates the image of having that car or that house or that woman or that man. Right? Do you see this? Actually, not because I tell you.

And thought then pursues the fulfilment of that desire. And out of that comes conflict, not being able to fulfil and being able to fulfil. So desire with its will, is the search for power. That is, to dominate people, in the name of god, in the name of peace, in the name of ideal revolution, and so on. So is it possible to live - please listen to it - is it possible to live without will. That means, to live without direction, which doesn't mean living chaotically. We'll leave it like that for the moment. We'll come back to it later.

And also one of the factors in our consciousness is the many hurts that one has received. The wounds. The wounds, the psychological wounds that one has received from childhood, in the schools, colleges, universities, and as we grow up, in business, in family, the hurts that one has accumulated. And the result of those hurts, what takes place when you're hurt? Either you resist, build a wall around yourself, and not to be hurt any more, and therefore withdraw from life - right? And the more you withdraw, the more neurotic you become. And isolate yourself, not to be hurt. And then one asks, is it possible not to be hurt at all in life. We are aware that we are hurt, that is, when in school an educator compares one boy with another boy, that boy is hurt. When the parents say you're not as clever as your brother, that's a hurt. And when somebody calls you an idiot, that's a hurt. And so on, there are a great many psychological deep wounds.

And when there are wounds of a such kind, the action from those wounds is to protect oneself, withdraw oneself, to resist. And out of that resistance there is violence. Now we are asking, is it possible not to be hurt at all, and to totally wipe out the past hurts. The past hurts to be wiped away and never again to be hurt. And it's very important to understand this because if we don't understand this, we've no proper relationship with another. Now we're going to go into this question, whether it's possible never to be hurt again, and to wipe out the hurts that one has received from childhood. Are you following this carefully? I hope you're interested because it is your life.

What is hurt? When you say, 'I am hurt,' what is it that is hurt?

Is it not, we're asking the question so that we two enquire into this - I am not, the speaker is not asserting, but we're enquiring - is it not that you have an image about yourself, and it is that image that is hurt. You have an image about being clever or not clever, being beautiful or not beautiful, you have an image or a picture or an idea about yourself. And it is that image, that picture, is hurt. It's fairly simple, isn't it? So we're asking, seeing the consequences of being hurt, which is violence, withdrawal, resistance, isolation and all the neurotic behaviour that comes from that isolation, seeing all that, it becomes very important to find out, and urgently, whether such hurts can be wiped away, altogether, and therefore never in life to be hurt. You understand what it means to have an innocent mind, a mind that is untouched, which has never been hurt. The word 'innocence' comes from the word, the root of it is, a mind that has never been hurt. Right? See the beauty of it first.

So the image which you call the 'I', I am hurt, as long as that image exists, there must be hurt. As long as I have an image about myself that I'm clever, that I'm this, that I'm that, or that I have a certain reputation, that I'm a great man, that I am this, a dozen images about oneself - as long as you have an image about yourself, you're going to be hurt. So is it possible not to have an image? Which doesn't mean that you become vacuous, live in a dreamy world, or become a vegetable. We are asking a question, as long as you're hurt, the consequences of being hurt are great, ugly. And when there is no hurt, your actions are extraordinarily clear. So is it possible not to have an image about yourself, both professionally, you understand, like a man who is capable, expert, specialist. And when you question them, they'll get hurt also, like an ordinary man, he gets hurt when you say he's a fool, because he's got an image of himself, and so on.

So is it possible not to have an image. If you say, 'How am I to get rid of the image?', the 'how', which is the method, the system, when you say 'how' that is implied, then that system, that method brings about another image, and that image will also be hurt. But to see the fact, the actual, that as long as you have an image, you're going to be hurt terribly. And if you want to live a sane life, which means no hurt, and you see the importance of living a sane, clear, life without any hurt, naturally the image disappears. If you see the necessity, the importance and the urgency that as long as you have an image you're going to be hurt, and the consequences of hurt are enormous - if you see that, then you never create an image.

Is that clear? Are you doing it now? Or will you say, 'I'll think about it when I go home, when I've a little time'. You have the time, the leisure, the peace, now. If you don't do it now, because you've been forced to see it - forced in the sense, together we are investigating, therefore together we are seeing the fact. And because you see the fact of being hurt and the consequences, the image-making stops.

So one asks - please go into this carefully - the image is built by thought. Thought has put together the image that I should be something, that I am something. And what is thought, which we went into the other day. We'll go into it again. What is thought? What is thinking? Upon which all our social, moral, ethical, religious structure is based - thinking. All the gods and all the churches, all the symbols, the saviours, the, you know, Christ, Buddha, all that, the whole religious structure, the popes, the priests and the bishops, the arch bishops, you know, it's all based, brought about by thought, thought of centuries.

So we have to enquire together what is thinking, because it's very important, because we're going to talk over together, fear, after we've gone into this question of what is thinking, we're going to go together into this whole nature of fear, which holds us so strongly.

Thought is the response of memory. Thought, memory is the accumulated facts, knowledge, experience. If you are an engineer, you have learnt a great deal about engineering, pressures, structure, mathematics, from childhood, and that is stored up in your brain as knowledge, and according to that knowledge you act skilfully or not skilfully. Right? Professionals, and the amateurs.

So thinking is the response of memory, memory being experience, not only your experience but man's total experience and the accumulated knowledge of centuries of which you are the representative as man or woman. So thinking is the response of memory. Memory is the past. You know, one must doubt a great deal. You understand? Have doubt. But if you begin with certainties, you end up in doubt. Right? Do you see this? But if you begin with doubt, doubting everything, not accepting, doubt, then you end up with certainties. But we unfortunately begin with certainties and end up with uncertainty and die.

So we are saying, thought is a response of memory, stored up in the brain cells, and we are not experts in the brain, but it is a fact, you can observe it in yourself, every day. So there is the image of yourself that gets hurt. And is it possible to be free of that image? That image has been created by thought, successive incidents, accidents, assertions, all that has brought about the hurt to the image.

And thought in relationship, in human relationship, is a distorting factor. May we go into that? We're going to discuss together human relationship, the wife and the husband, the boy and the girl. We are saying that thought in relationship - right?-destroys relationship. We're going to go into that, because is thought love? Is thought compassion? And in relationship, between two human beings, intimate or otherwise, the movement is a separating factor. So we're going to talk over together the problem of relationship. And it is one of the most important things in life. If you're not related properly to nature, the trees, birds, to nature, then you are not properly related to man or woman. And life is relationship. And it becomes very, very important to find out what is right relationship.

We'll start with facts, and we're only dealing with facts, not with ideas for what relations should be, should not be, what it must be - those are all not facts. What actually is the relationship between you and your wife or your girl or your boy, actually. Is there any relationship at all? And what does the word 'relationship' mean? To be related, to be in contact, to be in touch, both physically as well as psychologically. Not to be separate. The word means that. I am related to you. That word implies tremendous significance. And we're going to look at it factually, what is actually in daily life taking place. Whether you're married or not married, every incident, every word, every assertion in that relationship, which is very delicate, an image is formed, isn't it? You have an image about your wife or your girl, and the girl has an image about you.

That's simple. As long as you have an image, there must be division. When you say, 'I know my wife,' or my girl friend, or the boy friend, when you say, 'I know' in that very assertion you find security. And that security is the factor that there is the image you have about her or him. And that image gives you a great sense of security. Doesn't it? Do you actually know your girl friend or wife or husband, actually? Of course not. You know all the reactions, all the superficial things, because you have an image about her, and she has an image about you. And these two images have a relationship which is words, memories, ideas. Because you have already settled in your own mind, you have a marvellous relationship.

Look, sirs, if you're a man, you go off to your office or the factory or some work, and there you're ambitious, greedy, envious, wanting success, position. And you come home and she also wants, goes out to work in America, she has her ambitions, desire for success, position. Where is your relationship? In bed? And is that all the relations you have? And what is your relationship to your children? None at all. See what we are producing in the world. For god's sake, it's your world. And thought is the factor in your relationship, not love. And thought is memory. You understand? Remembrance. So is it possible to live a life with another intimately or otherwise without any sense of image? That requires great attention, care. But you're not willing to give that care and attention, because you're concerned about yourself. And she is concerned about herself. The concerns are both the same, both are ambitious.

So one asks at the end of it, what is love? Is love desire? Is love sex? Is love attachment? Is love being concerned about oneself eternally? Is love jealousy? Can there be love when there is fear? Can there be love when there is only the search for pleasure? You understand all this? So we're going to go into this question of what is pleasure. Let's first deal with what is fear.

You know as long as you have fear one lives in darkness. All our actions are distorted. Fear is like a terrible disease, and we put up with it, we live with it, we accept it, because we don't know what to do with it, how to be free of it. So we're going to enquire into the whole problem of fear. And first of all to go into it, we are not analyzing, because an analyzer is the analyzed. We are saying, the analyzer is the analyzed. The analyzer is not different from the thing analyzing, he is part of that analysis. Analysis implies division. Analysis implies time. You go to a psychologist, the money and the time and the trouble, all that business, he will analyze you. That means you are different from the analyzer. Right? And the analyzer is his own analysis. Because we are saying, analysis does not solve any problem. On the contrary, it perpetuates the problem, prolongs it, because you see, I analyze myself. If I don't go to a professional, I analyze myself. What is implied in that? I analyze myself: I am different from the thing which I am going to analyze. Right? But is that a fact? That which I analyze is me, who is analyzing.

So analysis implies time, division, it is like, analysis is analyzing itself all the time, it has no meaning. So we're not analyzing, but we're only observing. To look at that tree without analysis, you understand - just to look at the mountain or your friend, sitting beside you, or the girl. Just to look, not to analyze.

So we're going to do the same with regard to fear. We're not analyzing, we are merely observing fear, the nature of fear, the cause of fear, the structure of fear.

You know what you are, you know your fears, fear of loneliness, fear of old age, fear of not fulfilling, fear of losing, fear of being attached, and you might lose that which you are attached to, fear of not having success in life - dozens of fears. Will you examine, observe the many branches of fear, or fear itself. You understand? One may be afraid of loneliness, one may be afraid of one's wife or husband, girl or boy friend, one may be afraid of losing what you have, one may be afraid of a job, losing a job and not having a job and so on. And psychologically one may be afraid of this extraordinary sense of loneliness. One may be afraid of being attached and losing. Or one may be afraid of death, of a disease, of pain that you have had, and you don't want that pain tomorrow and therefore - there are many, many fears. Do we - please listen, please carefully listen - do you take one fear after the other or do you observe the central fact of fear? You understand my question? Do you look at the fragments of fear, fragments of fear or the whole, total fear? Which is it that you want to do? Will you take one fear at a time, fear of loneliness, fear of death, fear of not having a job, fear of, that your wife or girl friend may turn away from you, one by one. Or the root of fear - you understand my question? Which is it that you want to do? The whole fear or the varying expressions of fear?

Well, sirs? If you tackled the root of fear - right? - then the whole, the tree of fear disappears. You understand my question? If you tackle the root of it, the various fragments lose their meaning.

Understood? So we're going to do that - either you want to tackle, to grasp, to understand the fragmentary fears, or the very root of it. If you understand, go into the very root of it, the fragmentary fears disappear.

So we're going to go into this question of fear, radically, at the very root of it, whether it's possible to be free of the total fear, of all fear, both superficial fears and the deep-rooted fears, the unconscious unknown fears. We are now going to observe fear, fear at the very root, the root of it. And we are saying it is not analysis, because analysis will not eradicate fear. Analysis implies, as we pointed out, takes time, the analyzer thinking different from that which is analyzed, when they are both essentially the same.

So we're going to look into fear. What is the root of fear? The root of fear is time. Do look at it carefully, don't accept what I'm saying. The root of fear, we are saying, is time. Look, one has had pain last week, physical pain, and you don't want it to occur again, and you are afraid it might happen. Right? So the remembrance of pain which you had a week ago and not wanting it again. So there is time. You understand? Fear is essentially, basically, fundamentally, a question of time. Go into it, I'm going to go slowly into it.

What is time? Time is movement, from here to there, it's a movement by the clock as well as psychologically. Moving from 'what is' to 'what should be', that demands time. And you might not achieve what you want to be, and therefore there is fear. So time is the factor of fear. Look, I am afraid of death, suppose one is afraid of death. That is, in the future. If death happened instantly, there is no fear. So time is the factor of fear. And what is time, apart from the chronological fact, by the watch, when you have to take a bus, car and all that, what is the factor of time? What is time? I will see you tomorrow. That is a fact of time. And I hope to change from what I am to what I should be. That requires time.

Time ceases when there is only 'what is'. When one is violent, time is necessary to become non-violent. But when there is only violence, and not its opposite, there is no time. So time is a movement. Movement implies not only time but thought. Going from here to there. All movement of thought is time. All movement of thought is measure and time. So time is the factor of fear. Time is brought about by thought, that I will die in two years time, therefore I'm frightened, and I think about it. So thought and time, which are both the same, is the basic factor of fear. And there is no fear when there is only the absolute fact, instantly. That is, can you observe the movement of time as thought which breeds fear? I am afraid of tomorrow, the fear comes into being when I think what might happen tomorrow. Or I've had pain yesterday and I don't want it to happen again, I don't want to have that pain again, and it might happen and there is fear. Right? So fear is the movement of time and thought.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 10TH APRIL 1977

I would like this morning, if I may, to talk about pleasure. One of the structures of our consciousness is fear, pleasure and sorrow. And before we talk about it, go into it, I think we ought to understand something very clearly and simply, the art of listening, the art of seeing, and the art of learning. The word 'art' is generally applied to artists, those who paint, those who write poems, do sculpture and so on. But the meaning of that word 'art' means giving everything its right place, putting all our thoughts, feelings, anxieties and so on, in their right place. So the word 'art' means giving the proper place, proper proportion, putting everything in harmony - not just paint a picture or write a poem.

So if you will this morning apply the art, the art of listening. We rarely listen to anybody. We are so full of our own conclusions, our own experiences, our own problems, our own judgements, so we have no space in which to listen. We ought to have some space so that as two friends, you and I, the speaker, are talking over together their problems, amicably, under the shade of a tree, sitting down and looking at the mountains, but concerned with their problems, and so they are willing to listen to each other. And to listen is only possible when you put aside your particular opinion, your particular knowledge or problem, your conclusions, then you're free to listen, not interpreting, not judging, not evaluating, but actually the art of listening, to listen with great care, attention, with affection. And if we have such an art, if we have learnt such, rather, if you are capable of such listening, then communication becomes very, very simple. There'll be no misunderstanding.

Communication implies to think together, to share the things that we are talking about together, to partake in the problem, as two human beings, living in a monstrous, corrupt world where everything is so ugly, brutal, violent and meaningless. It is very important, it seems to me, if I may point out, that in the art of listening one learns immediately, one sees the fact instantly.

And if you, if one listens rightly, as we pointed out the meaning of that word right, correctly, accurately, not what you think is right, or wrong, but in the art of listening there is freedom and in that freedom every word, every nuance of word has significance and there is immediate comprehension, which is immediate insight, and therefore immediate freedom to observe.

Also there is the art of seeing, to see things as they are, not as you wish to see them. To see things without any illusion, without any preconceived judgement or opinion, to see actually 'what is', not your conclusions about 'what is'.

Then, the art of learning, not memorizing, which becomes very mechanical, because our minds, our brains have already become so extraordinarily mechanical. So the art of learning implies freedom to observe, to listen without prejudice, without argumentation, without any emotional, romantic responses. If we have these three arts, not merely as a verbal conclusion or an intellectual comprehension, but actually, in our daily life, to put everything in its right place, where they belong, so that one can live a really very quiet, harmonious life. But that is not possible if you haven't learned this art of giving things their proper place.

So we're going to talk over together this morning the problem of fear, not only the problem of fear, go into it much more, but also the problem, the question why human beings, throughout the ages, pursue so intensely, pleasure. Not that it is wrong or right, but why?

Modern civilization, which is really based on consumerism, is the pursuit of pleasure, if you observe it. The books, your own feelings, is this constant, endless pursuit of pleasure, if you go into it, because pleasure and fear are the two sides of the same coin. And to understand one and disregard the other becomes rather meaningless. So we have to examine both, fear and pleasure, not as a separate thing, but flowing into each other, as the two sides of the same tree, the same coin.

We were saying yesterday that fear is time, not only the chronological time but also psychological time. Time, as we pointed out, is movement, from here to there, physically, to go from here to Santa Barbara or to Los Angeles you need time. That's a movement. And also there is psychological time, at least we think there is psychological time, that is, the changing of 'what is' into 'what should be', the pursuit of an ideal, away from 'what is'. The 'what is', is violence or grief or pain, and to overcome that or to understand it or to go beyond it, psychologically we say there is non-violence, and to achieve that you need time.

So there is both physiological time, the time by the clock, and also we think, unfortunately, that there is psychological time. That is, the pursuit of an ideal, which is time. For the speaker, all ideals are idiotic, because what is important is not ideals but to understand 'what is'. If one understands 'what is', then the ideals become unnecessary. But we think that to overcome 'what is', we need the ideals in order to lever, give pressure to wipe away 'what is'. So that is time.

So thought, which is memory, stored up in the brain as experience and knowledge, so that movement of time is called evolution. Right? To evolve. So we think one can be free of fear through time. Now, we are, the speaker is questioning the whole process of evolution, psychological evolution. Which is, there is fear - all human beings have various types of fears, both biological as well as psychological. And the freedom from it, we have never demanded the freedom from it, we have never asked for the freedom from it, we put up with fear. And that's a part of our conditioning.

So we are going to question, and investigate together, this question of whether the whole structure of human thinking, which is time, which is measure, and as long as that process goes on, there must be fear. We are saying that fear can stop instantly, completely, and has no future, not that you will have other forms of psychological fears, but the ending totally of fear. And that's only possible when you understand the nature of time, the psychological time.

And, if we want to understand the nature of fear, and see the consequences of fear in action, one must use logic, reason, and approach it sanely. And to approach it sanely you must understand the whole movement of thinking. And we've said over and over again, what is the nature and structure of thought. And thought invents time, psychologically, because thought says, as I am myself uncertain, not secure, it invents security in an idea, in an ideal, in a picture, in a symbol, and clings to that symbol.

So to understand fear and go beyond it completely, not only superficial fears, but the deep unconscious unknown fears, is only possible when you know or when you understand the process of thinking. And give thought its right place, which is the art of thinking. That is, as we said, thought is the outcome or the response of knowledge, stored up in the brain as memory. So thought has a right place, in building a house, or in the technological world, and so on. But thought psychologically breeds fear. So thought psychologically has no place if you would be free of fear. Are we meeting each other?

Now please listen to this, not how to be free of fear, which is meaningless, because the 'how' implies the invention of thought which creates, which brings about a system. When you say, 'How am I to do it?', you're asking for a system. That system is put together by thought. So thought again is caught in a system, hoping to be free of fear. So what we are saying is, please learn the art of listening, that is, you have fears of many kinds, or you have a fear, or you have fears which if you understand the root of it, all superficial, and the very root of fear goes. So please listen, as we said, with the art of listening, which is, the art of listening is, to put away your prejudices, your conclusions, your wanting to be even free of fear. The very wanting to be free of fear, the very desire to be free of fear is a hindrance to listening.

So please learn now the art of listening. And with that attention of listening, which is an art, when the speaker says, 'Thought is time, thought is measure, thought is a movement in time, which creates fear,' if you see that, if you actually listen to it, to that statement, and not make a conclusion of that statement, but actually listen with your heart, with your mind, with all your capacity, attention and care, then you will see that fear has no place at all. The art of listening is the miracle.

So we'll come back to it a little later. So now we're going to talk about together what is pleasure, why man has pursued pleasure, because that's part of our consciousness, it's part of our daily life, it's part of our thinking, it's the motive that keeps us pursuing. Why has man made pleasure into such an extraordinary importance, into such fantastic proportions - the whole world of entertainment, why? There is not only the world of entertainment, from Hollywood and all the rest of the world, but also there is the religious entertainment. I'm not being sacrilegious or insulting, but the whole structure and the nature of religious mass and all the rest of it is a form of entertainment, you are entertained, you are emotionally sustained, excited.

So we have to go into this question, if you are willing, and you must be willing because it's part of your life. There is not only sexual pleasure but also there are various types of psychological pleasures, the pleasure of owning something, the pleasure of possession - please listen, see it in yourself, not just accept the words of the speaker, that has no meaning whatsoever. The pleasure of possession, the pleasure of being attached to something, the pleasure of belonging to something, a group, a community, a sect, a family.

Then there is the pleasure of power, power over others, power over oneself, the control, which is a form of asceticism. The word 'ascetic' comes from, which means basically 'ash', the word 'ascetic' means that which has been made into an ash, a withered human being - that's what is implied. So there is power, there is pleasure in power, possession, attachment, there is pleasure in belonging to a particular community, the pleasure of following the herd, not swimming against the current, or swimming against the current, which becomes also a form of pleasure.

So there are these innumerable forms of pleasure. I hope one is aware of it. That is, if one may ask, are you, as a friend, talking over together, the friend asks, are you aware of the pursuit of pleasure which you follow, which you are pursuing. And we are discussing that pleasure, whether it is the pleasure of taste, food, sex, the biological pleasures, the sensuous pleasures, and the psychological pleasures. Why do you, as a human being, who represent the world, and as a human being you are the world, why do you pursue this pleasure? You understand my question? Why this constant demand? The pleasure of achievement, the pleasure of living up to an ideal, the pleasure of the search for so-called god. God is, after all, the invention of thought, isn't it? Are you willing to look into that? Because, while we are talking about that, it's important to understand what is reality, and what is truth. Because we have made god into an absolute truth, not only in this country but all over Europe, and over the whole Asiatic world - mention the word 'god' and you are a most respectful person.

So we are asking, what is reality? And what is illusion, and what is truth? Are you getting tired of all this? I hope you're not merely listening to a lot of words, then it becomes very tiresome, then it becomes rather boring. But if you're listening, which is the art, which is a great art, then you have to find out what is reality.

Would you say reality is everything that thought has created, everything, the beautiful building, the temple, the mosque, the cathedral, and all the contents of the cathedral, the mosque, and the temple. That is reality. And thought has not created nature, that is reality, there it is. But thought has created many illusions, the illusion of nationality, which is accepted as a reality, illusion of war, which is accepted as necessary, a civilized existence. So thought whatever thought has created, both technologically as well as that which thought has created as illusions, is a reality. And thought has not created nature, but thought has built a chair out of the wood of nature.

So truth has nothing whatsoever to do with reality, which we'll talk about when we go into the whole question of what is meditation. Because what we're talking about now is part of meditation; the art of listening is a part of meditation, the art of seeing is part of meditation, and learning. So what we're doing now is the movement of meditation, which is to be free of fear, and the understanding of pleasure.

So we're saying, is pleasure love? Please find out for yourself, ask that question. Is pleasure love? Is desire love? Is possession love? Is the desire for power love? So we are asking, desire, pleasure, is it the nature of love? And if it is not, why have we made pleasure more dominant than love? And to understand love - please do go into this with the speaker, because this is very important in our life, because we have no love, we know what attachment is, we know what it is to possess or being possessed, and the pleasures of that. We all know what it means to have sex, and the pleasures of sex, the imaginations, the pictures, the thought involved in that act, all pleasure. All that we're asking, is that love?

And we use that word 'love' so easily. I love my country, I love my books, I love what I'm eating, I love my wife, or my girl. So one has to go into this question very deeply to see and discover for oneself what love is. Without that you have wasted your life, you're just zombies, or just human beings uttering a lot of words, living a useless life, confused, miserable, suffering.

So we can only understand that which is love when there is the understanding, not verbal, or intellectual but the depth of the meaning of pleasure. There is pleasure, there is enjoyment and there is joy. You understand? Pleasure and the enjoyment of a morning, when the sun is out, early morning, the birds are singing and light on the mountains and the leaves and the colour - that's a great delight, great enjoyment. But when thought comes into it and says, 'What a lovely morning it is! I wish I could have such mornings every day.' Or the remembrance of such a morning and the demand, the pleasure of that morning, remembered, is pleasure, isn't it? Look, you have an experience, a pleasurable experience, an experience which is delightful, happy, joyous. And you don't end it there, thought comes in and says, 'Let's have it again, let's repeat it.' Which is the pursuit of pleasure, that which was delightful, enjoyable, has become instantly a pleasurable thing through the movement of thought. You get it? You understand this?

So there is pleasure, there is enjoyment, there is joy. Joy you can never invite, it comes, a happy and extraordinary harmonious marvellous state. And you don't end it there. Thought says, 'I must have it again.' The desire to have it again is the pursuit of pleasure, not the actual experience.

So there are these factors in pleasure, that which thought pursues, as pleasure, the enjoyment independent of pleasure, the delight, the beauty of something. Talking of beauty, would it be right to talk about it a little bit here? What is beauty? You know when you see something extraordinarily beautiful, the mountain, the deep valleys, shadow, a sheet of water - when you see this marvellous, intense thing, at that moment, at that second, you are not, you with your problems, with your idiocies, with your absurdities, all that's gone - you're not there, because the magnitude and the dignity and the glory of a mountain is so enormous it drives you away. Which means, there is beauty only when you are not.

So we are saying, pleasure, enjoyment, and joy. And to put all this in their right place is the art of living. But our consciousness, which is our daily life, is so confused, so contradictory, and we are saying, unless you understand very deeply pleasure, enjoyment and joy, which comes, which grows into great ecstasy, unless there is order in your consciousness, you cannot possibly meditate. And that is what we are doing now, to live a way of life which is meditative, not meditate and lead a stupid, mischievous violent life.

So if pleasure, desire is not love, if jealousy is not love, if attachment is not love, if being possessed or to possess is not love, and as most human beings live with the pleasures of possession, then what is the relationship between pleasure and love? What is the relationship between attachment - you know what attachment is, how it comes into being? - and love? What is attachment - my country, my god, my belief, my wife, my husband, the dependence on another, whether it is a guru - and I hope none of you have gurus - then you're depending on somebody who thinks he knows. When somebody says, 'I know,' beware of that person.

So, to understand what is the relationship between pleasure and love, you must understand what is relationship between human beings. Right? What is the relationship between human beings, actually? Have they any relationship at all? Or it's only relationship of reactions, a sense of dependency, sexual and all the rest of it. When you say, 'I'm related to my wife or to my girl friend or boy friend,' what does it mean? Go into it, for god's sake, because it's your life. What does it actually mean? Are you really related? Or merely the idea, the thought of being related? You follow what I'm saying? If it is the thought of being related, that relationship is based on remembrance, remembrance of hurts, remembrance of sexual pleasures, remembrance of dependence, and so on. So your relationship is based on the remembrance of things past. And to that relationship we hold. So she has a remembrance of things past, and you have a remembrance of things past, so you never meet. Perhaps you meet in bed, but actually you never meet. Which is, as long as your relationship is based on remembrance of things of the past, then you are not related. You may call it love, it's a dead thing. And that's why there is such conflict between man and woman.

So listen to it, not what to do about it. If you listen, as we said, the art of listening, to be sensitive, to be alert, to be watchful, now. If you are doing that now, the art of listening, you will see you will put thought in its right place. Then you'll have an actual relationship with another, and therefore never conflict with another.

So we have come to a point in the understanding of our consciousness, which is our life, which is our daily, every day life.

In that consciousness there is the desire for power, the many hurts that one has received from childhood. Then there is fear, pleasure, and the thing that we call love, which is not love. And the innumerable beliefs that we have. I believe in god, I don't believe in god, I believe in socialism, I believe in capital - you follow - belief. And belief indicates a life which is based on make-belief, which is nothing to do with actuality.

So we are bringing order in consciousness, not by wanting order, not by making an effort to bring about order, but by listening, seeing, learning. To listen there must be no direction. You understand? To see there must be no distortion. And to learn, not to memorize, there must be freedom to observe, to learn and to watch.

So we will discuss when we meet next time, Saturday, what is love, and it's relationship to sorrow. And if there is time, we'll go into the question of what is death, because that's one of the factors of life, the dying. And unfortunately we never face it. To find out what it means to die while living, while you're full of life, not neurotic life, sane, healthy life, to find out the depth and the meaning of that extraordinary thing called death. And it is related to love. Love is not separate from life and death.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 12TH APRIL 1977

K: We are going to talk over together, as usual together, about education, this morning. But before we do that I would like to make an introduction about the whole K Foundations and their schools.

The speaker, K, has been concerned with education since 1925 - a long time. And he was concerned with education and he was responsible for choosing the sites in India. There is one school in the north, near Benares, which is four or five hundred miles from New Delhi, and there are about two hundred acres there on the river Ganga, the Ganges; and also there is a school in Rishi Valley, in south India, about one hundred and seventy miles from Madras, which is south India; and there are also two other schools, one in Madras itself, and one in Bombay. The one in Bombay which has been going on for twenty-five years is entirely and wholly for the poor people, very, very poor people, they have got one hundred and sixty students; and there is another school being brought into being near Bangalore. So there are five schools in India.

And there is a school, as perhaps some of you know, at Brockwood in Hampshire, England. That has been going on for nearly eight years. We have said we will limit it to sixty students, and there are only sixty students there. I believe there are about fourteen, I am not quite sure, nationalities there, from all over the world.

And this school here, we have been discussing with the teachers, with the parents, and with the architects for the last two years. This school here is entirely different from other schools in India and in England. Here the parents are involved in it, which is a new kind of experiment because if the children are going to be different the parents must also be different otherwise there is a contradiction between the children and the parents, and there will be conflict between them. So to avoid all that we thought it would be right that the parents as well as the teachers and the students work together as a family unit. So.

And with regard to the architecture here, we have been talking with some prominent architects for the last three years, or two years, I have forgotten now, and as Mr Mark Lee has pointed out, we are going to create it, not only a school but also a centre - which is going to happen in India, it is happening in England, and it must happen here, which is a centre where people can gather together for perhaps three weeks at a time to discuss, and be together, to be concerned with the problems and so on. That's the introduction.

So please the speaker is completely and totally involved in all the schools, in India, in England and here. These schools are not being created against his wishes, he is involved completely; and also with the centres. So having said that let us talk over together the question of education.

Q: If we as parents have not undergone a transformation then how can we bring about in our children such transformation?

K: I am going to go into that. Let me talk a few minutes first and then we will discuss the whole question.

I do not know why we educate our children. We have never asked, perhaps, what is the intention, what is the meaning of education. Is it to turn out so many engineers, technicians, academicians, professors, specialists, medically and otherwise?

And apparently that is what is happening, the cultivation of memory about facts, technologically educated, so that human beings throughout the world can earn a livelihood, settle down in a particular pattern of society, and totally completely disregard the whole psychological structure of man. That is what is actually happening in the world: cultivate one fragment of the mind so that going through school, college and university, if one wants to, and learn sufficient information, facts, and act from that memory skilfully or not. That is the pattern set for man in education. Right? Do we agree to this? Please, not agree, do we see this together?

And the psychological factors of human beings, because they are so utterly neglected, so disregarded, never even thought about and gone into, has produced a society that is utterly lopsided, utterly fragmented. So if that is the education most of us want, and that is what our children are educated to, then we must inevitably face the fact of conflicts, wars, terrorism, and all the ugliness that is going on in the world. Again that is a fact.

So when we talk about education, what do we mean by it? Is it the cultivation, not only of knowledge, but also be concerned with the whole total man. You understand? The whole of man - or the woman; forgive me if I talk about man, in that is included woman. And if the cultivation, or the concern of education is not only the technical development of man, with considerable information and knowledge, but also include in education the understanding of the whole psychological structure - the two should go together, and not one ahead, or the other - so that man is a total human being, not a fragmented, broken being.

And also apparently through education as it is now, as knowledge is encouraged, is cultivated, many scientists, including some of the famous ones who have been talking on television in England and perhaps here also, that man can only ascend through knowledge. Do you understand? Ascend. Like Bronowsky and others are saying that man can climb, ascend, go forward only through the acquisition of knowledge. And these specialists, professors, experts, totally disregard the other field. And we all think in the Foundation that the two should go together, not one ahead of the other. So that education is concerned with the total cultivation, development, the whole of man. And to bring about that one needs not only teachers, or educators, who know a great deal about history and all the rest of it, but also are concerned with the other. Therefore one finds it terribly difficult to find such teachers. You understand? Who are really concerned with the total understanding of themselves and the children, the parents, as a unit, who are concerned with the whole of man. So that's one of our problems, to find proper teachers, who are really concerned with not only the deep inward cultivation, but also be excellent academically, the two marching together.

Then also one of the factors is, parents generally send their children to schools; day schools, state schools, free schools, private schools, residential schools and so on. They are not responsible for them. They feel as long as they are very young, up to perhaps five or six, they feel very responsible, after that let them go, throw them to the wolves. This has happened in India, and we have talked a great deal about it in India. And the parents for economic reasons, and also tremendous tradition of thousands of years want to say, 'You know better than we do about education, educate them, because we are much too occupied with our own lives'. So that is one of our problems: the parents are not totally responsible - in the sense we are using the word 'responsibility', which means being responsible, feeling the depth of their relationship to their children so that they themselves are educating themselves as well as the children, so that there is no contradiction, when they go home they don't find the parents totally in a different area, dimension. That's one of our difficulties.

The other difficulty is financial. Nobody wants to do this kind of work. They would rather send their children to private, public schools, because it is much safer - at least they think so. They think they will have a good job and all the rest of it.

So these are the many complex problems in real education. In the so-called education it is comparatively easy. I do not know if you were listening last night on the television, the President of Yale University, and a Californian university. As you listened to them, they are not concerned at all with the psychological unfoldment or freedom of man. They are concerned with that and not with the other.

So then we ask, what then is education? You understand? How is this to be brought about? What is the function of a teacher, the educator? What is his relationship to the student? And what is his relationship to the parent? You are following all this, I hope? Are we meeting each other?

Let's begin with what is the relationship of the educator with the student? What is his relationship to the student? The speaker, K, because when he goes to India he spends practically a month in each place at these schools, talking with the students, with the teachers, and all the whole school together, he knows a great deal, you know, we have been talking endlessly for last fifty-two years about education. So I am asking you, as parents, you, as educators, what is the relationship of an educator, the teacher, to the student. Is the relationship based on giving information from a status, as a teacher? You understand, status? He knows and the other fellow doesn't know, which is a fact, and so his relationship to the student is merely that of giving information, knowledge of a particular subject to the student. So he has really no relationship with the student. But when the educator comes, steps down from his platform, from his status, and begins to establish a relationship with the student, in the sense that the teacher is concerned not only with the technological knowledge, but with the whole psychological structure but also what kind of food he eats, what kind of clothes he wears, how he behaves, how he talks, how he eats, how he walks. Do you understand? All this is part of the relationship between the teacher and the student.

So there is no teacher separate from the taught. Am I making this clear? The teacher isn't merely the one who gives information, but the one who is so deeply concerned with the student, which means he is concerned with himself as well as with the student. That is, if I may explain a little more, if you will permit me. The student comes to the school conditioned. Right? Already conditioned, by the parents, by his friends, by the neighbour, and so on. He is conditioned. And the teacher is also conditioned. Right? Both the educator and the one to be educated are both conditioned. Right? So the responsibility of a good teacher is to explain to the student that we are both conditioned. Right? If he can explain it in different ways, it is comparatively easy, and say, 'I am conditioned as an educator, and so are you'. In talking over together, in discussing, having a dialogue with each other, when we are out for a walk and so on, explore this conditioning. You understand? So that it is a constant relationship with each other. I wonder if I am making something clear? We are trying this, please, in Brockwood and in India where one of the new Principals with whom we have been talking a great deal, we are trying this. So that there is no division psychologically between the teacher and the student. Which means the teacher cares for the student - cares in the profound sense of the word, you know, affection, all that. Am I making this clear somewhat, what we are trying to do, what we want to do, what we will do. If not it is not worth trying. You understand? Because there are millions of other schools.

So that's one of our problems. Not 'our' problem, it is a human problem. The other problem is: will the parent who is heavily conditioned, with his beliefs, with his ambitions, lack of time to be with the children, care for the children, and all the rest of it, and the mother too has very little time for them because in modern society both the parents, the father and the mother go out to earn more money to have more cars and more something else. So they have very little relationship with their children. So will the parents also be concerned with the total development of their children and of themselves, with the help of the teachers altogether. Do you understand the question? Are you following? Are we communicating with each other, somewhat?

And the other problem is: to relate history - I am taking that as an example - as a factual movement, to relate it so that the child, or the student understands the full meaning of history. You understand? If I am a teacher of history - god forbid, I am not a teacher of history - if I am a teacher of history, how am I to teach him the full meaning of history? You understand? The full significance of history, not the kings and the wars, and the dates of wars, you know what generally history is. But I want him to understand the story of man, which is history. Right? I wonder if we are meeting each other? The story of man, I want to tell him about that, not only the factual kings and queens, and the presidents and the wars and all the rest of it, but also I want him to see the extraordinary story of man who has grown, you follow, all that. How am I to teach him that? I don't know if you have ever thought about it. A few of us have already discussed this point here, the parents, and the educators. How is an educator to teach history, not of a particular country, of a particular group of people or a community, but the global history of man. Are we meeting each other?

If I was that teacher, educator, I would proceed this way: sorry! Because that student is the embodiment of total humanity. Right? Do you understand this? I wonder if you understand. We said in the talks here, the world is you, and you are the world. Right? That's an absolute truth to me. It may not be to you, but it is a complete, irrevocable, inviolable fact. And so is that student, he is the world and the world is him, because he is going to suffer, you know, go through all the mill and the travail of human beings, right throughout the world, so in him is the history of man. You understand what I am saying? Oh, come on! Do we understand this?

Q: Yes.

K: I am so glad some of you do. So I say now together we are going to learn the story of man, which is you. I would spend a great deal of time over that, how to read the history of man which is you, the book, the content of that book, which is you. So if he can read that book, that story of man, which is the student, which is the teacher, which is the parent, which is the man, human being, then also I would go into the question of wars, you know, the specialized communities - America, England, you know, the division, why the division takes place, all the rest of it, so that he learns the history of man through himself. You understand? Not through a book, not through some psychologist, professor and philosopher and all the rest of it. So he will be an authentic man. I wonder if you are getting this.

Q: Yes.

K: He will not be a secondhand man, or woman, as we are, but he will be the total human being. If I was a teacher in a school, that's how I would approach history. And if I was talking about mathematics, which is a little more complex a problem, I would be concerned with order. Right? Mathematics, part of it is very orderly. Right? Right, sir? Are there some mathematicians? It is very orderly. Higher mathematics, deeper, going into higher things, it may be rather confused, uncertain, unclear, but the general mathematics is order. So if I were a teacher of mathematics I would talk to him about order. You understand? Order in daily life, how he behaves, how he eats, how he talks, all these are very, very important. Consideration of others, politeness, which in America doesn't exist. Sorry, forgive me for saying this. There is no respect for anything. So order, consideration, how one behaves, how one talks, how one walks, and out of that comes naturally respect for each other. So order in his room. You understand, sir? Order in his clothes and so on. So I would begin with that so that he understands order. Not imposed discipline. I wonder if you see. Are you understanding, sir? Because together, the student and I, are concerned with order. Which means punctuality, which meaning turning up at meals at the correct time and so on. And I would talk a great deal about that. And introduce algebra and all the rest of it. So that he, in himself, he is bringing order out of this chaos, without discipline, which means, compulsion, reward, punishment, marks, good boy, encourage him. All that is so irrelevant. They have had discipline in all the schools, beaten them and all the rest of it, it has not created any different human being.

So that is how I would, if I were a teacher, how I would teach the two subjects and other subjects I would go into. So that my relationship to the student is not that of an elder brother, or a teacher, or somebody outside, but together we are learning. I believe the word 'school' comes from the word 'leisure'. Leisure implies a mind which is not occupied. Not occupied with books, family, problems, just not occupied. It is only when the mind is not occupied then you can learn. But if it is already occupied, crammed full of complexities, it can't learn, in the deeper sense of the word. So in a school of this kind there would be leisure. Not to do what you like - have leisure to sit and look. I wonder if you understand all this. It doesn't matter, we will go into it.

So that's our problem. That's the problem of education, if one is deeply concerned with humanity, with each other, as an educator and the person to be educated.

Now I have talked enough so perhaps you would like to. Yes sir?

Q: Your descriptions have been very clear, and I think well understood by me and they do raise the problems inherent today in education. However I wonder if you could answer me, how is it that when two entities comes together, the educator and the student, both who are conditioned, how can they generate education, create an education in that circumstance when both individuals are conditioned?

K: Wait a minute. You are the student, I am the educator. Have I to repeat that question? Have you heard that question?

Q: Repeat it, some people might not have heard it.

K: The questioner asks, how is it possible for the educator and the one to be educated, when both are conditioned, how to approach each other, how to free each other, how to bring about this freedom from which creation takes place. That's right, sir?

Q: That's right.

K: You have heard the question now? We are saying, you are the student, if I may, and I am the teacher. We both are conditioned. You in your way, and I am in my way, but deeply held in a trap. How do we free each other from this trap? If I remain as an educator, on the platform, the blackboard behind me, then I have authority. But if I step down from that metaphysical platform and I step down together, say I am conditioned, you are conditioned, right, let's go into it. What does it mean being conditioned? Being conditioned implies religiously, psychologically. Right? So as long as you belong to something, attached to something, you are bound to be conditioned, to a belief, to a person, to some kind of physical necessity and so on, you are bound to be conditioned. So I talk it over with you. Not as a man who says, 'I am free, and I'll tell you', but together we are both conditioned. Right, sir?

Q: But can the blind lead the blind?

K: No, you have missed my point. In talking with you I am realizing I am conditioned.

Q: You are saying you are blind, yes.

K: No, I am not blocked. When I am talking over with you I am exposing myself to you.

Q: Yes.

K: And you are exposing yourself to me.

Q: We are both exploring our states.

K: Yes, we are both seeing our conditioning.

Q: I see how it is.

K: So in talking it over together we are freeing ourselves from it.

Q: I don't see that point, sir. How I, in admitting to you that I am conditioned, and you in admitting to me that you are conditioned...

K: No, I'll show you.

Q: We are still conditioned.

K: I'll show you, sir. I am conditioned, if I am, as a Hindu. Right? As an Indian. And you are conditioned as a Christian, if you are, it doesn't matter. And I would go into my conditioning, how tradition, superstition, the handing down, etc., etc., I would go into it very, very carefully. And I would help you to go into it very, very carefully. So we see the fact. I see the fact that being conditioned as a Hindu, and you conditioned as a Christian, divide, divide people.

Q: Yes.

K: Wait, follow it. It divides people. From that division arises conflict - wars, etc., etc., etc. Do you as a student, and I as an educator, see this fact so that I am no longer a Hindu?

Q: You are a conditioned human being.

K: No, I am no longer a Hindu.

Q: Well, what are you then?

K: I am a free man, a free human being.

Q: No, sir. If I may beg to differ.

K: Don't beg sir, just differ.

Q: In showing me that you are a Hindu and I am a conditioned Christian, both mutually deeply understanding the point that we are both human beings with a conditioning imposed upon each of us, and understanding this point sincerely and deeply. My point remains that in spite of that deep understanding...

K: And freedom.

Q:... and feeling - no, we are still conditioned, we still remain conditioned understanding conditioned human beings.

K: No, sir, you are missing the point, sir.

Q: I must be. It does not liberate us in my mind to understand that one is in goal. It does not release one from being in prison.

K: It does.

Q: No, sir.

K: I'll show it to you. I'll go into it. Let's go into it quietly. You are the student, I am the educator. Forgive me, I am not, but we are putting it here. I would point out the meaning of division, what it does in the world, historically, physically, in relationship and so on, conflict. Right?

Q: If you wish.

K: Not, if I wish.

Q: Is conflict the relevant point that we are discussing. Because I thought conditioning was the relevant point.

K: No. If I am conditioned to the belief that all Christians are devils and only the certain type of Hindu, the Brahmins, are the holy people, what happens? We have no relationship.

Q: Yes. But if I was conditioned to understand that Hindus were beautiful people...

K: No, no. You may be conditioned as beautiful people but I am conditioned to treat you as the devil.

Q: In my mind we are still conditioned, sir. And it is to go beyond this conditioning that right education must begin.

K: I am showing you, sir.

Q: How to go beyond it.

K: To go beyond it. As long as I am conditioned, you are conditioned, there must be conflict. That's obvious, sir. The Arab and the Jew, the Catholic and the Protestant. And go to this village and you see how many churches there are, the Baptist, you follow.

Q: Conditioning can be negative, yes.

K: No, not 'can', does.

Q: All right.

K: So is it possible for you and me to uncondition ourselves?

Q: That's the question.

K: Uncondition myself implies not being a Hindu, not treating you as the white devil, and you not calling me the beautiful Indian.

Of course.

Q: All right.

K: So we both of us then are free of our conditioning, of our prejudices, our superstitions.

Q: I hesitate that discussing it as we are does free one from that conditioning.

K: It does if you are paying attention to it.

Q: Good, then we are, and we are becoming free. Do you really therefore believe...

K: Not 'believe'.

Q: Or know...

K: Not even 'know'. Facts.

Q:... that the way to uncondition is through discourse.

K: Not only discourse. But through relationship.

Q: Through relationship.

K: I a married. I watch my wife and she watches me and I realize through relationship how very different, contradictory we are.

Q: Is this a speedy process?

K: You can do it instantly, or take time. If you are tremendously attentive, it is finished.

Q: All right. I have another approach that I can describe.

Q: No.

K: Wait a minute sir, let him.

Q: And that would be that the only way to uncondition an individual, or a group of individuals, is to introduce an element that has no conditioned aspect, that is unconditioned, a pure state which has no conditioning.

K: How do you know the pure state? That's a theory.

Q: No. If we assume that there is in creation a conditioned state, do we at least intellectually agree that there is somewhere an unconditioned state?

K: No. It is like saying - the Hindus have said this, and the Christians have said this for umpteen years and centuries - that there is god, who is the unconditioned.

Q: Yes. Oh, all right.

K: I don't accept all the gods and the unconditioned state. All that I can begin with is, I am conditioned.

Q: So there is no hope then?

K: You see, on the contrary. Your hope is based on a concept.

Q: No, sir. If we do not agree that there is a non-conditioned state...

K: Sir, the whole problem is that you are already conditioned that there is an unconditioned state. That's your conditioning.

Q: Whether I am or not is irrelevant.

K: No. The only relevant fact is human beings through centuries, through experience, etc., etc., are conditioned.

Q: I believe that there is an unconditioned state. That may be my conditioning.

K: It is.

Q: Fine.

K: Now break it, break it.

Q: All right. I want to ask a sincere question, and I don't mean to monopolize the floor, please.

Q: That's good.

Q: If there is, irrespective of my belief or not, if there is no unconditioned state then there can be no education.

K: Wait. It is for you and me to uncondition ourselves to find that state.

Q: Oh, we can uncondition ourselves, so there is an unconditioned state.

K: You see you are still sticking to your conditioning.

Q: How can you find what is not there?

Q: Don't try and find out from conditioning.

Q: You said...

K: Please, sir, do see it logically.

Q: I am trying, sir.

K: You suppose you believe there is that.

Q: Yes.

K: That is part of our conditioning.

Q: Yes, I understand that.

K: You accept that? So you are accepting something which is non-existent, or may be existent.

Q: Yes, I accept that.

K: So put that aside. It may be, or it may not be, so put it aside, break away from that conditioning and then start, say, look, we are conditioned, let us free ourselves first and see if there is there, or not. But don't presuppose. Surely that is simple.

Q: What will the end result be then if we do this?

K: First do it. Not seek the end result, or suppose. Let us first uncondition ourselves.

Q: Therefore there is an unconditioned state. I feel unconditioned now, therefore there is an unconditioned state. This is what I must arrive at in order for education to begin, my education.

K: No, forgive me for saying so, you have not broken away from your conditioning.

Q: No. At least intellectually I have.

K: No, intellectually is just playing words, throwing words at each other. Intellectually we can say, it is beautiful beyond that mountain.

Q: May I ask then, has anybody achieved this unconditioned state, other than intellectually, in the audience?

Q: Well the fact that we are listening.

Q: You are not listening to the question.

K: Wait a minute, sir, wait a minute. Suppose the speaker says he has, what is your position?

Q: My position is I also want to achieve that.

K: Suppose the speaker says he has unconditioned himself, what value has it to you?

Q: That is an example.

K: Which means imitation. Which means you have an example which you are going to follow.

Q: No, sir, a goal.

K: Which means a direction.

Q: All right, a direction.

K: When there is direction there must be conditioning. No, don't laugh. Where there is direction there must be a conditioning. Direction implies motive. Where there is a motive you are already veering off, you are already...

Q: The only unconditioned state which I agree is directionless, is omnipresent.

K: Ah, you see you are still caught in your old conditioning.

Q: Sir, why does motive imply conditioning?

K: No, I said motive implies direction. And where there is direction it is conditioned.

Q: Could we go back to that example of the mountain being over there.

K: Look, I sit here and imagine what the other side of side of the mountain is. Right? It's marvellous, it is beautiful, it must be, it is so hot here, over there it must be cooler, but I never get up from here, walk, climb and find out.

Q: Well, I have.

K: Which means you are free from the idea, the concept, the conclusion, the belief that there is an unconditioned state.

Q: You are only free of that concept when you realize it.

K: No, it is not a concept, it is a fact.

Q: You are only free of the knowledge of the fact when you arrive at that state you are unconditioned.

K: When you uncondition yourself you know the fact. It is not a belief, not an idea.

Q: The fact, the reality of it, that I know.

K: Then there is nothing more to be asked.

Q: No, there is, because I as a teacher and others as students, I must allow them to come to this unconditioned state also in order for their education to begin.

K: Which is, I would talk to them, as I said, about conditioning.

Q: Would you then hold it up to them as an ideal?

Q: No, sir, I would...

Q: That is the implication of what you are saying.

Q: Well I was try to arrive at it on a discourse level. It cannot be arrived at on that basis. It has to be experienced as an irrefutable reality.

Q: Why does it ever have to be even considered? The facts of conditioning demand action.

Q: Yes, correct.

Q: Why does the word 'unconditioned state' ever have to come into being?

Q: It doesn't, if the teacher has the skill to lead the conditioned student to the unconditioned state without...

K: You see!

Q: Don't the facts demand action, why does there need to be a leader when the facts demand the action?

Q: Sir, the river flows into the ocean, and in an ocean it realizes an unconditioned state, away from its boundary. A teacher in my mind, and I may be completely incorrect, at this moment is that he is the one with the knowledge. This is a fact, we have heard.

Q: No, no.

Q: He will bring the student to the awareness of this unconditioned state which is pure knowledge.

Q: (Inaudible)

Q: If I have missed the point, and I obviously have, it is because that I am here to learn.

Q: Get out.

K: What were you going to say, sir?

Q: Listen to the pitfalls in what you are saying, sir.

Q: Please explain them to me.

Q: I have the authority, I am the one who knows, you are below me, you are nothing. The pitfalls are terrible in this, sir. Q: No, sir. Please may I answer - this will be my last statement on the subject.

Q: Hooray!

Q: Once an unconditioned, or shall we say, once a teacher who is capable of bringing the awareness of the student to an unconditioned state - please be with me for a moment - once this teacher enables the student's awareness to come to an unconditioned level, then the truth itself is there for the student, he doesn't have to tell him anything more. Education has begun. The student knows the unconditioned state within himself, from that point on he can add the facts.

K: Sir, may I answer your question finally? How can the conditioned teacher say that there is an unconditioned state. Fact the facts, sir. How can the teacher, you a human being, caught in sorrow - you understand, sir?

Q: Sir, I heard your question very clearly. You asked me a question, how can the teacher, a conditioned teacher lead the student to an unconditioned state.

K: No, no.

Q: Pardon me. Please ask the question again.

K: How can the conditioned teacher talk about the unconditioned state?

Q: Because there are two forms of conditioning. There is a perpetual conditioned state and there is a temporary conditioned state. So a conditioned...

Q: Oh, no.

Q: Yes, please listen to me. It might be valuable also. In other words a conditioned teacher may have periods of clarity in which he is unconditioned.

K: Be careful. Don't get caught in temporary, you will then be lost.

Q: No, sir, please I am not. I am just trying to make a point. The conditioning can be intermittent. Would you agree with that point? Conditioning can be intermittent.

K: Wait, sir. We are saying, conditioning is the fact. Right? Is the fact. You may be temporarily unconditioned.

Q: Good.

K: Wait, sir, listen to the very end of it, you won't agree! One is conditioned. One may be temporarily, for a brief second, unconditioned. Wait. That state of briefness, temporary, which means what? A state in which time exists, for a brief moment time is not. Wait, wait, sir. Look, sir, I am conditioned, and for a moment I feel free. What is implied in that moment when I say, I am free? Can you ever say, I am free? No, go into it, sir. Can one ever say, I am free? Or put it round the other way, can one ever say, I am happy? The moment you have said it, it is gone.

Q: Yes, you can only say, I have been happy.

K: Please, listen to what I am saying, sir. The moment I acknowledge I am free, I am not free.

Q: I agree.

K: So the temporary freedom is no freedom at all.

Q: For that moment it is.

K: It is no freedom. Freedom means being out of the prison.

Q: Yes, but it is the only way out, temporarily at first.

K: Sorry.

Q: It then becomes permanent.

Q: No, no, no.

K: There is no temporary happiness. There is no temporary enlightenment. There is no temporary glory, or whatever it is. Either it is complete, or not, it is never fragmentary.

Q: How does it go from the none to the real?

K: First face the fact. I don't know if there is real, all that I know is that we live in a monstrous world. Right? All that I know is that I am conditioned by this world, I am that world. That's all I know. And I start from that, I don't imagine that there is an unconditioned state, there is a bliss, nothing, I start from the actual daily fact.

Q: What do you mean by monstrous?

K: Oh, no. Monstrous - all the killing, the terror, the mugging, rape, you know what is happening in the world.

Q: Excuse me, if I could make one suggestion. The questions all seems to point to the place of knowledge in the transformation of man. Maybe another time for a discussion.

K: The lady asks, sir, are you making a point, which is, knowledge is important in freedom?

Q: My point is that freedom is knowledge.

K: Eh!

Q: Is knowledge, that it can be gained temporarily and then on the basis of a temporary intermittent experience it can become permanent, but one has to start somewhere.

K: What a dangerous argument you are going into, sir, really don't, because you will be caught out.

Q: All right, I won't go into it.

Q: The original question that somebody brought up is, what do we do as parents with children, our children, how do we deal with them. As you were explaining the educator and the student.

K: How do you deal with the children who are not here.

Q: Our own children.

K: Your own children, all right, sir. How do we deal with our own children. How do you actually deal with them now?

Q: Without love.

K: So, first without love. Second you have no time for them. You go off to the office, she goes off to the office, or she pursues her ambitions, you pursue, you follow, so you have no time for them. Third, you are conditioned and they are conditioned. You conditioned them, and you are conditioned by society, by people round you, you are that. Right? So in fact there is no love, no care, no relationship, and they are your children.

Q: None, is there no relationship?

K: The questioner says, is there no relationship at all. That gentleman agrees sir, that gentleman who put that question says, you are right. We think we love them. If we love them do you think you would have wars? If you loved them do you think you would have all this terror going on in the world? If you really cared deeply for your children do you think you would have this kind of education? Your children are running away from you, they are escaping, they are forming their own little communes, you know what is happening in this country - divorce, each person occupied with his own sensations, problems. You know. So sir how will you deal with such people? So that is what we are saying, the father, the mother, are conditioned, for god's sake change, transform yourself. Then there is some hope for the world, but to merely live in a kind of abstraction means absolutely nothing. That's what all the priests, all the do-gooders, the idealists, live in a world of non-reality. The reality is what is actually going on with our daily life.

Q: We have come here to learn something.

K: If I had a child I would say, I am going to - you follow, sir? Because we have no love for them. Have you ever watched a mother caring for her little baby? What she goes through, getting up early in the morning, all through the night, watching, watching, watching. At the age until five, after that throw them out. Throw them to the wolves, in fact. So can you, as a parent, father, mother, uncle, whatever it is, can you change, you bring about in you the transformation? Which is to love a child right through life. The child is far more important because he is the future generation. If you condition him to be like you, which is to be concerned about oneself, about yourself, about your worries, about your ambitions, your fulfilments, and all the rest of it, you don't care a hoot for the child.

Q: I am the mother of two children. I find my time really occupied with their demands. And I see my three and a half year old son coming from a very pure and innocent state going through some strong changes, being very fascinated by excitement, violence, and I find myself trying to point out to him how the excitement is just a thrill, and help him to understand the violence. I find myself stopping constantly and I realize I don't know what to do.

K: I understand.

Q: When I don't know what to do, then something happens, or I show him something but he only seems to forget it.

K: The lady says, I have got two children. They are nice, clean, healthy, lovely children. And they watch the TV, the people around and they are fascinated by violence. And I, I talk to them, but they are much more attracted to that than to what I am saying. Right?

Q: They don't want to see me.

K: I know, you are a nuisance when they want the other. So what is she to do? You understand the question? What will you do? You understand, this is an agonizing problem, you understand, this isn't just an intellectual thing. What am I to do? I have got two children and they are attracted to guns, soldiers, violence, and I see the absurdity, the cruelty of all that, and how am I to stop them? You understand my question? How will you stop it?

Q: Sir, I don't think you can stop it. I think that in my own case I have the same problem with my child, but I am going along and watching the programmes with him, I am not dividing myself from him.

K: You are not answering the question. I am a mother. I see my children caught in this trap, or being attracted to the trap. And I see the danger, I see the horror, I see the misery of it. What am I to do?

Q: I think the only thing the mother, or the father, can do is to change themselves fundamentally.

K: Yes, sir, but in the meantime what am I to do with my child?

Q: Warn them.

Q: I find myself through relationship with those around me, with my child, that living exposure comes out of my own violence, I see it. As I understand it, really understand it...

K: I understand all that.

Q: As I really understand it, it no longer exists, but there is still enough violence.

K: Yes, madam, we have understood the question. The parents may be free from violence but my children are attracted to violence, what am I to do?

Q: Pay attention to them.

K: What do you do, sir, with your children who are attracted to violence, to all that, what will you do?

Q: It isn't the same.

K: See what happens, sir, look at it. Look at it. I can't keep them away from other children, can I. I can't take them away and go away, live in a forest with my children. That's impossible. I can't argue with them, I can't point out the dangers to them because they are much more attracted to the other. You understand? This is how all the youth movements, all the tyrannies with their youth movements are doing, making it so attractive that everyone wants to go and join it. Hitler did it, Stalin did it, the dictators are doing it. You follow? So what shall I do? Put yourself in that position, feel for it, for god's sake have passion about it.

Q: Try and educate them differently.

K: Keep them home and not meet other children, don't let them see TV, don't let them read violent books? And if you do, when they leave they are attracted to all that, the opposite.

Q: You have to be clear yourself which television is violent.

Q: The reason a child is attracted at say, age three, to television, or anything violent is because he already has an image that he cannot have the mother's attention, the father's attention.

K: That's what I am saying, I am coming to that, madam. Look at it, sir. He is attracted to it, attracted to all that, and he won't listen to my talk, he kind of avoids me. Right? Don't you know all this, as parents? No?

Audience: Yes.

K: So what am I to do? What is wrong that they should be attracted to that? Answer my question: why should they be attracted to that and not to something much more beautiful, or whatever it is?

Q: Because we are attracted to it.

K: Yes, sir, I understand. Then the child in the meantime grows up.

Q: We can expose them to other things.

K: We have done all this, expose them to the most beautiful music, pictures, good talk, literature, but they prefer that.

Q: They are attracted to the violence because they feel a separation, a lack of relationship with the parents.

K: Sir, are you a parent?

Q: No.

K: Put yourself in the position of a parent.

Q: I am trying to.

K: Sir, feel the misery of a mother who feels this thing, don't intellectually answer this.

Q: Why are my children so young attracted to this?

K: I am going into it, sir. What am I to do? I don't feel violent, I have worked myself out of it, I don't feel I want to kill somebody, I don't want to throw bombs at somebody. I don't want to create a physical revolution because I don't believe in physical revolutions but my two children are attracted to all that. What am I to do? What is wrong with society that allows this to happen? You don't face all this.

Q: Perhaps...

K: Let me go on, sir. You don't face this, which means what? You don't want to transform yourself or society, you don't feel passionate about anything. No? Sir, passion is something that comes out of great suffering. Right? But you avoid suffering, you escape from suffering. If you have no passion you can't create, you can't build anything.

So if I have two children and I have a passion, not just intellectual concepts of what I should do, should not do, a passion to see that they understand this thing. So I would spend my time with them, point out, I would do it because I have love for them, I have affection for them, I care profoundly for them. I am passionate about all this.

Q: I think a lot of compassion is dissipated in the search for a method.

K: Quite right, sir. Method...

Q: That man has never experienced that, it is agony observing the child, which is the fuel.

K: So, sir, if I was a mother and had two children, and I don't want them to be thrown to the wolves, that is, society, everything, I am concerned about them and myself, in my relationship, find out, I'd spend - you follow, sir - it's my passion. I'll find a way to do it.

Q: Maybe when you say 'passion' you mean something different from what we understand by that.

Q: May be if we had the enthusiasm to live.

K: Oh no, it's nothing to do with enthusiasm. Enthusiasm fades and disappears; you are enthusiastic about TV, or TM, which is transcendental meditation, enthusiastic about a new guru.

Q: I remember as a boy, I can't speak from the parent's point of view, but as a boy I must have been saying something very cruel to my parents, and they just broke down, both of them at once. It shocked me very much.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: I always remembers that.

K: Did you hear what he said?

Q: It really made me see the violence that I was doing, and it was just because they broke down, they cried and I had never seen them cry, may be two times in my life.

K: There you are. That's enough.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 14TH APRIL 1977

Krishnamurti: What shall we talk over together this morning?

Questioner: Sir, what opens the door to perception and understanding, or does it open by itself?

K: Does one open the door to perception and understanding, or does it open by itself.

Q: Could we consider if there really is such a thing as a teacher, or rather simply an environment in which the student learns?

K: Is there such a thing as a teacher for students, or will it not be an environment that will help them to learn.

Q: Last Tuesday you said the facing of sorrow and suffering or pain, passion comes. I was wondering, would you discuss that and the connection or lack of connection of that idea, or fact, and boredom, negativity, contempt, anxiety, criticism and low energy.

K: Sir, there are too many questions in one question.

Q: Could you also talk about the hyperactivity of the mind? Whether negative or positive thinking starts it. Can self enquiry be cultivated in spite of pleasure of the self, or whether that matters.

Q: Sir, why does one keep slipping back into despair?

K: First his question was, what is passion, and does it come out of grief and pain. And the rest of the other question, sir, I couldn't make out. So if you don't mind one question will be enough. And also the other question is, this gentleman asks, why does one so often slip into despair.

Q: What is intelligence? What enables intelligence to awaken in the educator and in the student, particularly if intelligence is not a result?

K: What is intelligence, and if intelligence is not a result then how can that intelligence be transmitted or conveyed to the student.

Q: Or even how can it awaken in the educator himself?

K: Or how can that intelligence awaken in the educator himself.

Q: Can we discuss further the relation between desire and love?

K: What is the difference between desire and love.

Q: The relationship.

Q: Can we discuss discipline?

K: Discipline. Could you discuss discipline.

Q: Our relation to the suffering of others, and people and animals, and any living things.

K: Yes, what is the relationship between suffering of human beings and animals and so on. I think that's enough, don't you?

What is intelligence, can it be awakened in us and so help the student to understand it. And is intelligence something to be striven after, or does it come naturally. That's one of your questions. And what is passion, does it flower from suffering and pain. Why does one so often slip into despair. What is the relationship between human beings who suffer and animals who are tortured and suffer. Now out of all these questions which do you think we ought to discuss, take it up?

Q: Passion.

Q: Suffering.

Q: Intelligence.

K: Can we begin by talking over together, having a dialogue between ourselves, between friends, what is intelligence, and how does it come into being, can it be cultivated, and can that intelligence be awakened in the student. Perhaps if we could go into that question fully the other questions might be included in it.

What is the intellect? What is intellect? The capacity to reason, to perceive, to understand, to grasp the significance of a word or a statement. That is generally understood to mean the intellect. The capacity of the brain to reason objectively, sanely, if it is possible, and not be caught in opinions and judgements. That is the general meaning of intellect. And what is the function, or relationship of the intellect, which all of us have, that capacity to reason, healthily or not healthily, sanely or insanely, what is the relationship of the intellect to thought? Please, you don't mind my going step by step? May we go on that way? What is the relationship of the capacity to reason sanely or insanely, its relationship to thought? Is intellect - all the meaning which we have given - different from thought? You understand?

Is not thought the whole movement of memory, experience, knowledge - the whole movement of that is thought. Can thought reason correctly, rationally, and therefore the intellect is part of that thought? Are we meeting each other?

Audience: Yes.

K: Yes? May we go on? Please, it's no good going on by myself, unless both of us discuss it, understand what we are talking about. We are trying to establish if there is any difference at all between thought and the intellect. The intellect is the product of thought, and if it is the product of thought then thought, can it reason correctly, accurately, sanely? That we must first establish, then we can proceed from there in the understanding of what is intelligence.

As thought is conditioned, as thought is fragmentarily, as thought is the movement of time, and the movement of measure, can that thought which is the past, which is the product or the response of the past, can it ever meeting the movement of the present, can that ever be rational, sane, healthy? You are following this, sir? Because we have given such importance to thought. Right? We have given such extraordinary value to all the construction of thought. All the movement of thought, which has made the gods, the rituals, the saviours, built churches, temples, mosques, the whole movement of thought is based upon knowledge which is past. Right, can we go on from there? It's a dialogue, please. We are not asserting anything. We are together investigating, informing each other, the nature of thinking. So we say thought - what, sir?

Q: Would you characterize much of what you do as thought?

K: Would you characterize what the speaker is doing as a movement of thought. My word! May we come to that a little later - I am not going to avoid it, I am not cunningly moving away from it, I will answer it, but first understand this thing. Because if I tell you how the speaker functions without understanding all this, then you will say, 'What are you talking about, you are mad'. So I think it is important to understand before I can answer that question, what is thinking, and what are the things that thought has created, and thought being very limited, the scientists are now accepting, I was told by Dr Bohm and others, that even the scientists are accepting the very limitations of thought. So we are saying, thought is a fragment. Right? Whatever it creates, whatever it thinks is still in the field of fragmentation. Right? So thought can never perceive the whole because thought is directional, thought moves with a motive, thought functions with remembrances. So it will invariably, under all circumstances, whether technological, scientific, human, religious, or superstitious, illusory, it is fragmentary. Do we see this fact? Not, I tell you the fact and you see it - do you see this as a fact for yourself?

Q: Where does sanity and insanity fit into what you are saying?

Q: We began by saying intellect is reason, logic, sanity, what is the relationship of intellect to thought. Then we say thought is fragmentation. Then the gentleman asks, how does sanity fit into that picture.

K: It doesn't. One can reason using thought as an instrument of expression, one can reason, and think that reasoning is very sane, but if that intellect is neurotic, whatever it does is still neurotic. So it can never be sane. Right? I don't know if you agree to this, if you see that. Sanity implies - let's go back. The word 'whole' implies health, sanity of the mind, and the perceiving of that which is holy, sacred. That word covers all that: health, sanity and holiness, h-o-l-y. So can thought perceive the whole, can the intellect perceive the whole? You understand my question? Because it is fragmentary it can never perceive the whole.

Q: Would this imply that logic and reason are mechanical?

K: Yep! I mean, yes. I am becoming an American! You have understood what he asked, which is, is thought mechanical. Now you, please, how would you answer that question? I said, yes - or yep! Now how would you answer that question?

Q: What are the other functions of the mind besides thought, or thinking?

K: Wait, sir. How would you answer that question, is the mind, the brain, thought mechanical?

Q: Mechanical means repetition.

K: Mechanical means - it has several meanings: repetition, there must be a motive which keeps it going, an energy which keeps it going. So is the intellect, thought, mechanical? I do not know if you have not noticed for yourself that we live in habits, we are creatures of habits - sexual, nutritional, committed to a belief, an idea, or an ideal, a conclusion, and living in that field all the time is mechanical - repeating, believing, caught in tradition, ancient or modern. So the whole process of our existence is mechanical, as it is. Right, sir?

Q: Obviously thought is mechanical, but I am not so sure about the intellect.

K: The gentleman says, if I understood it rightly, he says is intellect also mechanical.

Q: Thought in the past would be recording things over and over.

K: Is not the intellect also fragmentary?

Q: It's true intelligence, is it?

K: We are coming to that, slowly we are coming to it, go step by step so that we both understand that, we are speaking accurately.

Q: Intelligence is perception and adds rational data without the use of thought. Is that possible?

K: I don't quite understand.

Q: He is confusing intelligence and intellect, not seeing the distinction between them.

K: He says, if I understand rightly, that intellect is intelligence.

Q: Or asking.

K: He's asking. Please, I said thought is fragmentary. Right? Intellect must be fragmentary. Intellect which is reason, understanding, capacity to grasp things, but that intellect cannot perceive the whole because it is still fragmentary because thought is functioning. When thought is functioning, whether it operates through the intellect, or uses the intellect as a means of understanding, thought being fragmentary, whatever it does or produces, using the intellect, the intellect is still fragmentary.

Q: What would it mean then to speak of right reason?

K: I am coming to that, sir. Just a minute.

Q: What is the difference between intellect and thought?

K: Between the intellect and thought. What is the difference between the intellect and thought. You see, I am answering all the questions, why don't you answer it?

Q: The intellect is the response of thought, as we know it.

K: The intellect, the lady says, is the response of thought.

Q: In the service of thought.

K: In the service of thought. The intellect, the lady says, is at the service of thought.

Q: It produces all the knowledge we have acquired through the thought process.

K: I am afraid we can't hear. Please, if we once understood this together it becomes very simple. We said thought is under all circumstances fragmentary because thought is limited, because thought which is the response of memory is limited. You might acquire tremendous knowledge about everything, about the world, everything in existence, and that learning results in knowledge, and that knowledge is never complete, is never whole, therefore from that knowledge, the response is thought, that thought is limited, fragmentary. That is the first principle. If that is clear, then thought operates through the intellect.

Q: Through the intellect?

Q: Yes.

K: What?

Q: I don't understand what you mean by 'through' the intellect.

K: Thought is part of the intellect.

Q: It's like the structural capacity to think.

K: Yes, madam. Look, I've just looked at a first-class dictionary, and it says, the intellect is the capacity to reason, the capacity to think clearly, to understand, to grasp. So thought is in operation. When you reason thought is in operation.

Q: So then instead of saying intellect is the tool of thought, we would say thought is the tool of the intellect.

K: Thought - you see, we shouldn't really separate the two, that's what I am trying to get at.

Q: Would you say that the intellect is like a movie screen and thought projects data onto it, and they work together?

K: Use your own intellect. Use your own intellect, which is part of the mind. We are speaking in English. You and the speaker understand English, so the understanding, the verbal understanding is part of the intellect, which is thought. You translate what you hear in English and that becomes the understanding, verbal understanding of what is being said. So thought is intellect. So intellect can never be, or perceive the whole. Intellect thinks it can. Thought thinks it can see the whole. Just a minute, madam. Right? But we are saying that thought being fragmentary can never see the whole. Right, sir?

Q: It's not quite clear.

K: You are not quite clear.

Q: Is intellect anything other than the manipulation of concepts, words and images?

K: That's right. That's right.

Q: Is that all it is?

K: That's all it is. Concepts - manipulation of concepts, beliefs, ideals, reactions, imagination, all that is the function of the intellect.

Q: What about logic?

K: Logic is part of it.

Q: Logic is the manipulation.

K: Of course. Logic is the manipulation of thought. If this is clear, not because I say so, because I am not your authority, I have no authority.

Q: You said that thought was part of the intellect at one point.

K: I said that thought is that part of the intellect.

Q: But then you said that thought is intellect.

K: Yes, thought is intellect.

Q: If thought is part of intellect then it would seem...

K: All right, we'll change it. I withdraw 'part', and say it is - thought is the essence of the intellect.

Q: There is no difference, they are one and the same?

K: You observe it in yourself, sir. I say to you, 'It's a beautiful day'. You listen to the words, the words convey a certain response in your memory, which becomes a thought, and you say, 'Yes, it's a lovely day'. Which means thought is operating, conveying and all the rest of it. So thought is the movement of the intellect. Thought being limited under all circumstances, whether it is technological, aspirational, imagining there is god, or imagining there is Jesus, this, that and the other, it is essentially limited.

Q: What about the relationship between thought and mind?

K: The mind, to me, I may be wrong, please question it, go into it, the mind is the intellect, the thought, the feeling, the nervous responses, the reactions, the whole structure of human thought, the whole content, which is consciousness is the mind, in which suffering, pain, anxiety, fear, the pursuit of pleasure, fear of death, the whole of that is consciousness which is the mind.

Q: What's the function then of meditation in relationship to consciousness?

K: Meditation, what is the function of meditation in relation to consciousness. What is the function of meditation in relationship to consciousness. Sir, meditation is the process of emptying the content of consciousness. Emptying the content of consciousness, which is the content makes consciousness. If there is an emptiness, emptying of all the content, the consciousness as we know it does not exist. It's a totally different dimension. We won't discuss that because that's a tremendously complex question - we will go into it perhaps on Saturday or Sunday.

Q: Isn't the content of consciousness thought?

K: Yes, sir. The content of consciousness are all the things that thought has put in it. Please forgive me, we won't go into that because we can do it on a different occasion.

Q: Doesn't the mind stop when it realizes...

K: We haven't come to that yet, sir.

Q: Could we ask it this way: if consciousness is only the manipulation of concepts, images, symbols, memories, experiences, does it ever see anything for itself?

K: No.

Q: OK.

K: So let's see. We start now, if you all see this as an actuality, not because I tell you, that thought is fundamentally limited, and whatever it does within the area of consciousness is still limited. It can imagine consciousness is as wide as heaven, but it is still the product of thought. It can imagine the most lovely things, it is still the product of thought. It can say, there is god, it is still the product of thought. It can say anything, illusory, factual, it is still within the field of consciousness. Right?

Q: What is thought limited to?

K: No, thought is limited in itself, it is not limited to something. Goodness! Sir, you haven't seen the first thing: that thought is the response of memory, stored up in the brain as memory, which is the result of experience and accumulation of knowledge, so it is limited. Please stop there. Let's get on with it.

So what then is intelligence? You understand? If thought is fragmentary, and so the intellect also is fragmentary, and is intelligence part of this fragmentation? If it is not, then fragmentation has no relationship to the whole. That is, sir, when I say I am a Hindu, the assertion of that is based on memory, conditioning, superstition and so on, so as long as there is conditioning which is the product of thought, whatever it does is still limited, fragmentary, illusory. So the question is then, what is intelligence, if all this is not intelligence, what is intelligence? You understand my question? Are we meeting each other somewhere?

Q: Yes.

K: Not in the Oak Grove!

Q: Yes.

Q: Would intelligence be the recognition of the limitation of thought?

K: Yes, sir. Yes, sir.

Q: Does...

K: You haven't listened to him, we are so occupied with our own conclusions. He says, is it not intelligence that realizes the limitations of thought. And we said, yes. So we are going to go into the question of what is intelligence, apart from the dictionary meaning. Because the dictionary meaning says, intelligence is the capacity to read between the lines. You understand? Legere, I won't go into it. To read between the lines, which means you must observe what occurs between two spaces of thought. I am translating it, it doesn't say that in the dictionary. It comes from the word 'legere' to read - to read, psychologically read, and read objectively 'what is', all that is implied in intelligence, that word, according to the dictionary. We are not using that word, intelligence, in that sense, because all that is implied in thought. You understand? To read very carefully between two lines, is to penetrate that which is not said through thought, that which is not printed on the page, you have to exercise thought to penetrate what is between the lines. I wonder if you get this.

So we are saying, what is intelligence.

Q: Is it the complete integration of intellect and thought?

K: No, find out. Go into it, sir. If thought is limited, whatever it does bring about conditioning. When I say, I must be brotherly, it is part of that conditioning. So whatever it does is limited and therefore conditioned. Now is intelligence the product of thought?

Q: No.

K: The product of reason?

Q: Intelligence is cessation of thought.

K: Is that a fact to you, or just an idea? You see, that's why I don't want to... Can thought bring about intelligence?

Q: No.

K: Or is intelligence totally independent of thought? And if it is independent, totally, can intelligence then use thought? Not the other way round.

Q: Intelligence is...

K: Please, just listen, forgive me, I am not being impatient, but please just listen. Which is, we said, thought is limited, fragmentary, it is the movement of time, which we will go into a little later, the question of time. And if that is so, then we are asking, does thought bring about intelligence? If it does, that intelligence is still fragmentary. Right? Therefore it cannot be intelligence. Wait, wait. So what is intelligence? If we say thought cannot bring about intelligence then intelligence is totally independent of thought. So have you listened to this grasped, or had an insight into these two facts? Insight, that is see the truth of this, that thought is limited, and thought cannot under any circumstances bring about intelligence, cultivate intelligence, under no circumstances, therefore thought is unrelated to intelligence. Intelligence we say is the capacity to see the whole - the whole of the movement of thought. The capacity to see that. The capacity to see thought is limited, to have an insight, that insight is intelligence. I wonder. Right, sir. Now wait a minute, wait. Therefore intelligence can analyze; thought because it is fragmentary, whatever it analyses will still be fragmentary. Whereas intelligence analyzing will be analyzing always with the background of the whole. I wonder if you see all this? Right?

Q: What is the whole?

K: What is the whole. What makes you ask, if I may madam, what makes you ask that question?

Q: How can you operate from the background of the whole, how can you operate from the background of anything?

K: We said thought is necessary in certain areas, the area of technology, the area of communication, verbal communication, the area where memory must function: technological, verbal, how to ride a bicycle, drive a car and so on and so on and so on, there memory must function, otherwise you wouldn't know - that would be rather insane. Now we are saying that very thought which is based on knowledge, which is necessary, that thought says, 'I can understand the whole structure of man'. So whatever it investigates will be fragmentary. Right? I wonder if you see this?

Q: Isn't it that the best it can do is to come up with a formulation or a conclusion about the whole structure of man, or the whole?

K: But it is not the whole.

Q: It is not the whole.

K: So the description is not the described, the word is not the thing. Right?

Q: But that's not it.

K: That's all it can do. Thought can describe what the mountain is, but the description is not the actual.

Q: In other words...

K: Not 'in other words', just see the fact. Right? Can we move from there?

Q: Yes.

K: By Jove it takes a long time, doesn't it?! So what is intelligence? Intelligence is the capacity to see the truth that thought is limited. And how does that capacity come into being. You understand, that was your question. It can only come into being when thought - wait, I've got it! It can only come into being when there is the art of placing - when there is the placing of thought in its right place. Have you got something? That is, I need thought to speak - not I, I am going into that presently, that question, how do you - to communicate to you verbally I need to use thought. Right? Because words have been stored up in the brain and all the rest of it. But thought thinks, I can also perceive the whole, pretends, imagines, conceives, but that is not the whole. So we are saying the perception of the whole is intelligence. And how does that perception arise which is intelligence? Right, is this clear?

Q: I don't agree that we can think our way to the whole.

Q: He didn't say that.

K: I have been saying, sir - I never said you can think your way to the whole - I said on the contrary, thought will not lead to the perception of the whole. That's simple.

Q: But intelligence will.

Q: When thought is in order then it stops and intelligence can operate.

K: No, madam, just go slowly. Golly, you don't even listen to anything. Look, I see the world fragmented. Right? The world around me - me, you, we, they, the Hindus, the Buddhists, the Christians, fragmented, broken up. All that is the operation of thought, obviously. When I say I am a Hindu, it is the operation of thought. And so whenever thought operates it can only bring about fragmentation. That's an absolute fact - I won't go back on that, repeat, repeat. So thought can never make its way through to intelligence. So how does this intelligence come into being?

Q: The recognition of a thought as a thought, and only a fragment, is the beginning of intelligence.

K: I said so, we said so just now. He asked that question, that gentleman asked that question, and we said, yep!

Now let's go on, sir. Thought cannot bring about order in itself.

Q: It thinks it can.

K: See the difference. Thought thinks it can bring about order in itself. But thought being limited, whatever its order, is limited. I am using logic, simple. So the capacity to put thought in its right place is intelligence. That is, I do require knowledge, experience which will give me knowledge, therefore memory and thought, all that. That's clear. So to put that in the right place is intelligence. So that intelligence comes into being only when thought realizes whatever it does is limited, when it realizes its own limitation.

Q: Thought realizes.

K: Thought, oh, yes. Can thought realize its own limitation - you are asking?

Q: Yes.

K: What do you say? No, what do you say? Just think about this.

Q: It is still a thought, sir, no. If thought realizes its limitations it is still part of thought.

K: Of course.

Q: And so we suffer.

K: No, don't bring in suffering, please. My golly! So we are saying, thought cannot make its way or cultivate intelligence. Intelligence comes into being when thought sees - I must be careful here.

So, may I go into something else for the moment, totally related to what I am saying? To observe the mountain, how do you observe the mountain? There they are in a mist. Watch it, sir, watch it, look at it. Look at it first. How do you observe that mountain, that thing called mountain.

Q: I look.

K: How do you look at it, apart from your eyes, apart from visual perception, the nerves, the retina and so on, the nerves and so on, conveying to the brain, the shape of the mountain, all that. How do you look at it?

Q: We look at the mountain with the image, which is the word 'mountain'.

K: Yes, the word creates the picture, and the picture indicates that it is the mountain.

Q: That's not true.

K: That's not true, he says. You discuss with him, sir. Go on discuss it. Sir, don't say it is true, or not true, have a dialogue with him, friendly dialogue.

Q: When you see that it's a mountain first, but if you see the mountain first with no word involved, you just see it in the now, that it's a piece of land, you don't need to think about it being a piece of land you just see a mountain. There's no image involved in the past. It's in the present and it's just there.

Q: What is it?

Q: Well if you ask, what it is, then you have to give a name to it. Just look at it and not ask what it is, just look at it in the now, you are not thinking about what it is, or what it is going to become, you are just thinking of what you are looking at, you just standing and looking, you are just looking. There's no thought involved.

Q: What is the relationship between pain and intelligence?

K: Sir, we haven't even come to that.

Q: Sir, you can look at the mountain without the image.

K: You can look at the mountain, the gentleman says, without the image. Of course, sir, you can, just to observe without a picture.

Q: But I question that.

K: Sir, that's what you two have decided. That means what? To observe without the word. Right? Without the picture that you have conceived as a mountain. Right? Without the response which mountains awaken in you, just to observe. Just to observe. In that observation there is you and the thing you observe, so there is a distance between you and the thing you observe. Right? And the distance is time, to go there and so on. That distance brings a division. Right? Now can you look - please listen - can you look at your boy friend, or husband, or wife, can you observe without the name, without the picture, without the image, without all the movements that have taken place between you and her, or her and you, which is division. Right? Come on, please. Can you observe without the distance, that distance, time, interval. That's easy to look at the mountain! But can you look at your wife, or boy, or whatever it is, without the word, without the image which is the result of all your conflict, the struggle, the pain, the insults, the nagging, the pleasure, the fear, the domination, the attachment, all that brings about a division. Right? The division takes place when there is the observer. Right? Who is the past. So can you observe without all that, your wife, your girl friend? Go on, sir, look at it.

Q: If you do that then there is no observation.

K: On the contrary. If you do that, the gentleman says, there is no observation. All this is preventing you from observing the actual. Right? Right?

Q: Yes.

K: Watch it, sir. Don't question me, watch it in yourself. My ambition to become the most important executive in my business, or whatever it is, is separating me from her. Right? Because I am concerned with myself. And she is concerned with herself - her fulfilment, her blah, blah, blah. So is there an observation - please listen to this, because I am going to relate it presently to intelligence - is there an observation without the word, the image, the picture and so on?

Q: Yes, there is.

K: Don't say, yes, or no, sir, look, find out. What happens then if there is no division between you and her, which is the division of thought, memory, remembrances, conclusions, when there is none of that between you, what takes place?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are observing her, or him, for the first time. No? So in the same way observe the movement of thought, be aware of the movement of thought so that this awareness puts thought in its right place. You understand? And this awareness is choiceless, because if there is choice there is immediately thought, and this awareness, penetrate it more and more in that awareness, it becomes attention. Right? I wonder if you are following all this.

Q: Yes.

K: Of course you are not. So attention means what? Attention can only take place when there is no centre as memory, conclusion, which are all the movements of thought. So attention implies no centre as the 'me' at all. The 'me' is put together by thought. So when there is no 'me' attention is intelligence. Fight me!

Q: Sir,...

K: No, first, have you understood, please. I must ask that question first before you attack me. Just a minute, sir, just a minute. Before you jump on me, have you understood what I have said? Be clear, otherwise what you say will have no relation to what I am saying. Right? I said - I'll repeat it carefully - I said you observe your wife or your husband; when you observe the observer is made up of the past. The past is your thoughts, your memories, your remembrances about her, all that. Now can you look at her without all these images, pictures, and all the rest of it? And that is only possible when there is great awareness of the movement of thought. Right? Can you observe your wife, or your whatever it is, without the movement of thought? The movement of thought occurs only when there is choice. I say, 'Yes, she has been good to me', and hold on to that, or hold on to, 'Oh, she has been etc., etc.'.

So where there is choice there is no awareness because it is still the operation of thought. So to observe without the observer is to be totally aware of her, or her, me, you. So then in that awareness if there is no choice there is supreme attention. Attention can only take place when there is no movement of thought as the 'me', with all my pictures and all the rest of it. And that is intelligence.

Now, have you understood my statement? You may not agree, you may say, that's all blah, anything you like, but first understand what I have to say.

Q: How does that awareness arise?

K: I'll show you how. I have carefully pointed out: look at the mountain. Can you look at the mountain without the picture, without the word, without the symbol, without all the reactions arising out of seeing it - beautiful, ugly, I don't like that, I like - you follow? So can you observe that, which is fairly easy, but can you observe your wife and your girl friend, or your boy friend without the image, the name, all the accumulated pleasures and so on and so on?

Q: I can do that for a short space.

K: You do that for a short space, you can do that temporarily, for a short space, then it comes back. So what happens? Go on, just watch it carefully, watch it, sir, in yourself. Temporarily you may have this, awareness, and then the other things overflows. That temporary thing becomes a memory, doesn't it - I have had it for a second. And that remembrance makes thought demand more, wants more of that temporary remembrance, or that remembrance which was temporary. You understand, sir? I'll show it to you.

Why am I working for you all?

Q: We are working together.

K: Oh, you are not.

Q: So what quality in us does it take to use this awareness?

K: I am showing it to you, madam. It's not what quality. Can you observe the mountain without the word, just to observe. That's fairly easy, isn't it. You can. If you are interested in finding out what observation is you can do that. But now apply that to your wife, or to your husband or to your wife. Can you look at her, or him, without the name, without the remembrance, you follow, all that, can you?

Q: Is understanding a part of intelligence or a part of thought?

K: Understanding can only take place when your thought is not in operation. When you are silently listening for the first time.

Q: If I went to the mountain and I see an image...

K: Sir, did you hear what the speaker just now said to that question? If my mind is chattering while you are talking, telling me something, I can't understand it. Right? Because I am thinking of something else. But if I stop thinking of something else, and listen to what you have said, I understand you.

Q: How can I stop thinking?

K: No, I said very carefully, sir, - I'll stop thinking - that's all wrong. I said please you don't follow it step by step that's why. I said, sir, do quietly listen. Forgive me if I insist on asking this. I said first look at the mountain. Can you look at the mountain without the word? And perhaps some of you who have gone into the question of observation, to see, may understand this. And I said the next thing is, can you observe your intimate friend, your wife or your husband, or boy or girl, to observe - please listen - to observe her is only possible, or him, when the memories, conclusions, all the images which thought has built about her are in abeyance. Then you can see her as she is, as it is. Right? I have said this, very clear and very simple. That can only come when you are aware of the movement of thought. That is all I have said. Yes, sir?

Q: You are saying that intelligence operates in me only when I look at somebody else's wife.

K: I said your wife, your girl friend, not somebody else's wife, or somebody else's man. This is too absurd. Either you are serious, sir, either you are serious or you are making this into a picnic.

Q: I am trying to understand.

K: Please, sir, if you want to have an amusement I'll walk out, I'm not interested.

Q: There are some serious people here.

Q: I assure you that there are some serious people here. Now you say that by observing or being aware of thought then you can look.

K: No, sir, listen to what I have said. I have said, if you are aware of the movement of thought, be aware of the movement of thought, how it functions, how it operates. You follow?

Q: That is not stopping thought?

K: No, I said observe it, sir, which doesn't mean stopping it.

Q: I think that has to be cleared up because when you look at the mountain...

K: Sir, please, you haven't even...

Q: I understand what you say, but when you look at the mountain a thought comes in and it's a mountain...

K: Then you are not watching the mountain.

Q: What do I think, do I have to stop thinking it's a mountain, and look at the mountain?

Q: By saying that you get away from looking at the mountain.

K: Sir, leave the mountain now. I am glad there are no coals or oil up there. Leave the mountain. Can you look at your wife, or your girl friend, or at yourself, which is much better - can you watch yourself, what you think, what you feel, what you want, what your pleasures are, sex, can you look at yourself without any previous conclusions, without saying, this is good, this is bad, I am beautiful, I am ugly, I am not so intelligent as you are, this, that - just watch, look at yourself as though you are observing yourself in a mirror. The mirror doesn't distort, unless the mirror is crooked. The mirror doesn't distort. In the same way look at yourself. Can you do that? Which means can you be aware of the movement of your thoughts? Without any distortion? The moment distortion takes place thought is in operation.

So we proceeded from there to be aware. And if you are aware, if there is any choice, that choice distorts observation. If you say, well, 'My nose must be straight', you are not looking at the mirror. So where there is choice awareness is a distorting factor. When there is no choice, that means in that awareness you are aware of the movement of thought, movement, not stopping it, and that awareness brings about the right place to thought, the right place to thought. And that awareness if there is a penetration more deeply is attention. In that attention there is no centre from which you are attending. If there is a centre that is the movement of thought. You can see if you give - please just listen - if you give all your attention to something there is no centre. Right?

Q: What actualizes the attention, that supreme attention in which there is no centre, even if you are not aware of it.

K: No, you haven't followed the whole step. You haven't followed the whole picture, the whole thing that we have been saying. There is no incentive, there is no motive.

Q: I realize that. I am just asking what actualizes that first? Are you saying there is supreme attention in the now.

K: Sir, would you listen to a statement without making an idea of it, without distorting it, without making a conclusion of it? I will make a statement. I say, the ending of sorrow is the beginning of intelligence. Listen to it, just listen to it, without drawing a conclusion, making an abstraction of it.

Q: What is the name of that thing that is looking without commenting on it.

Q: What is it that sees thought and sees thought's limitation? Is it thought itself?

K: If it is part of thought then it is still limited. You haven't got the roots of the matter.

Q: Sir, the interval, the space between me and what I have observed, what happens when I believe that I perceive that, or I have perceived that as a fact, and then my thought begins to take over once more? At that point. I believe that thought has been silent completely, and it is no longer, thought is in operation, that's my impasse.

Q: Why doesn't the silence continue - I think that's what he is asking.

K: Sir, are you asking, is intelligence continuous? Right? So that one moment you are intelligent and the rest of the day you are unintelligent. So you say, can this intelligence be sustained, last several days. Is that what you are asking? The moment you have asked that question, the question is not an intelligent question, because you are introducing thought which says, 'I must have it for a whole day'.

Q: Yes.

K: Ah, you don't see the beauty of all this.

Q: Sir, what does it mean for awareness to penetrate thought?

K: No, I didn't say that. I said, sir, please would you listen, I must stop because you can't sustain this for an hour and a half, your brains won't stand this. I said can you be aware, as you are aware of the tree, as you are aware of the colour of the dress you are wearing, the person who is sitting next to you and the sky, the trees, can you be aware, watch, the movement of thought? Then you say, who is watching. If thought is watching itself, it stops movement. You understand this? If I watch myself being angry, I stop being angry. Right? If I watch myself being happy, happiness stops.

So can you be aware of your movement of thought? This awareness is not identified with thought, just to watch it, sir, like watching this microphone, watch it. But if I say, 'It's a microphone, it's that colour, this, who is sitting behind it' I am not watching. So I say can you watch yourself as though you were looking at a mirror that doesn't distort? And I said, when there is this alert watchfulness which is awareness in which there is no choice, that moves into attention, in which there is no centre from which you attend. So when there is complete attention, with your heart, with your mind, with everything you have, to attend, then that intelligence begins to operate. Right.

OJAI 6TH PUBLIC TALK 17TH APRIL 1977

I would like, if I may, this morning talk about meditation. It is really one of the most important things in life. Not how to meditate, not the system of meditation, nor the practice of meditation, but rather what is meditation. And if one can find out very deeply what is the significance, what is the necessity, what is the importance of it for oneself, then one puts aside all systems, methods, gurus, and all the peculiar things that are involved in the Eastern type of meditation.

It's very important, I think, to uncover for oneself what one is, what actually one is. Not the theories, not the assertions and the experiences of psychologists, philosophers and the gurus and all the rest of them, but rather investigate into the whole structure of oneself - what actually one is, what is the nature and the movement of oneself. And in that transformation of oneself, radically, psychologically, one affects the whole consciousness of man.

All human beings throughout the world suffer, go through great agonies, despairs, fear; and there is the absolute fear of death. This is the common lot of every human being, whether they live in Asia or in the Western world, whether they are under tyranny, or in the so-called democratic societies. This is the common lot.

And we don't seem to be able to understand how extraordinarily important it is to see what one is, actually as though you are looking at it yourself in a mirror, psychologically, and bring about a transformation in the very structure of oneself. Because that transformation affects man. After all, each one of us is the history of mankind. That's a fact. History in the sense, the story of suffering, agony, violence, brutality, cruelty, ambition and all the things man has put together with his thought. And so when one fundamentally, deeply brings about a transformation, a mutation, then that mutation affects the whole consciousness of man. Like those rather brutal, violent people who are tyrants, who have been tyrants, who have killed thousands and millions of people, for some ideologies - Communist and other ideologies - have affected the consciousness of man. This is also an absolute fact and a reality.

So it becomes very important, if one is at all serious, if one is concerned with the world as it is, with all its appalling misery, confusion, uncertainty, and with all the divisions of religions, nationalities, with their wars, with the accumulation of their armaments, spending enormous sums to prepare for war, to kill people, in the name of nationality and so on and so on, so it becomes vital, absolutely important that there must be freedom, freedom from this whole content of our consciousness. The content of our consciousness are all the things put together there by thought. Thought, as we said, is the response of memory stored up in the brain cells. That memory is knowledge, experience, and the response and the movement of memory is thought. So thought is limited. And whatever it does, both in the technological world as well as in the psychological field, must be limited, because thought in itself is a fragment, a movement of fragmentation. And even the scientists, and when we use the word 'scientists' those people have gone into all this business, even they agree, and so perhaps you'll also, because the scientists say so, you'll also easily accept.

But we're not talking of acceptance, we are seeing the fact for ourselves, not according to anybody, including the speaker, because there is no, as we said, no authority in the matter of the psyche, in the matter of spiritual business. And when there is authority, that destroys all endeavour to find truth, which is the ultimate enlightenment.

And freedom from this, from our angers, brutalities, from our vanities, arrogance, from all the things that we are caught up in, freedom from that is meditation. And all these talks here have been to lay the foundation for this meditation. The foundation, if laid by thought, is still limited. Please, some of you may have come here for the first time, and so it is necessary to explain that we are exploring, investigating into the whole structure of our consciousness, of what you actually are, not what you want to be, or what you should be, or your ideologies, which are all the projections of thought, and therefore limited - but actually, in your daily life, to see what you are. And the very perception of it is the beginning of the transformation. Change and transformation are two different things. Change is a modified continuity. I am this and I want to be that. That is projected by thought, because it does not understand 'what is'. So it hopes by having an ideal the 'what should be', away from 'what is', it hopes to use the ideal as a means of changing 'what is'. Which is, the humanity throughout the world is violent. That's a fact. That is the actual reality. And thought has said, 'I don't know how to deal with this violence, but if I have an ideal called non-violence, then perhaps I will move from this to that.' That is, a modified continuity of violence. Therefore it is not non-violence. Whereas we are talking about the transformation of violence, not into something else, but complete, the ending of violence, which is the transformation, which is mutation.

So if one understands that very, very clearly, not that we change from this to that, but the ending of violence, the ending of anger, the ending of sorrow, the ending of this continual struggle to be or to become psychologically something, to end it.

And we also went into the question of the observer and the observed - the observer who separates himself from the observed. I must be this, I am this, I must become that. So the observer is making an effort to become that. Is the observer different from that which he is observing, psychologically? Or the observer is the observed. Please, this must be clearly understood when we are going into the question of what is meditation, because meditation implies the ending of all strife, of all conflict, inwardly, and therefore outwardly. Actually there is no inward or outward, it is like the sea, there is the ebb and flow.

So in the same way, it is very important that we understand this question. Is the observer, psychologically, we're talking, different from the observed? I observe the tree or the mountain, and I am not the tree - I hope not. But when I observe my anger, my greed, am I different from my greed? You understand the question? Am I different from the fact of anger? When there is anger, there is no me or anger, there is just that state of anger. Right? Can we proceed from there? I hope you are following all this, if not, I'm afraid you'll be wasting your morning instead of playing golf or going for a walk. If you don't understand this, perhaps you would leave and go for a walk.

But as a human being, living in this world, with all the terrible things that are going on, it behoves for every human being in the world to be concerned with this problem, to bring about a different way of living, not the terrible, meaningless existence that we do lead.

So we are asking, is the observer different from that which he observes, psychologically, that is, inwardly, under the skin as it were. That is, I am angry, I am greedy, I am violent. Is that 'I' different from the thing observed, which is anger, jealousy, greed? You're following this? Am I different? Obviously I'm not. Right? When I'm angry there is no, 'I am angry', there is only anger. So anger is me. So the observer is the observed. So you eliminate the division, altogether. You're following this point? Wherever there is division there must be conflict - between the nations, between communities, between the episcopalians and god knows what else. So wherever there is division there must be struggle, there must be conflict - between a man and a woman, when they are pursuing their different ways, their personal, etc., division. Where there is division, man and woman must be in conflict.

So we are saying to eliminate this conflict, psychologically, it's very important to understand whether the observer is different from the observed. If he is not, then the observer is the observed, and therefore conflict ends. I'll explain, go into this a little more. I hope you are working with the speaker, that you're not merely listening to a series of words, ideas, conclusions, but rather using the speaker, the words, as a mirror in which you are seeing actually yourself. So that you are aware of yourself, because we're talking about a human being, which is you. That human being is the story of the totality of mankind. And when you investigate that, when you look at it, you see the conflict has always existed between man and woman, in himself.

So part of this meditation is to eliminate totally all conflict, inwardly, and therefore outwardly. And to eliminate this conflict one has to understand this basic principle, which is, the observer is not different from the observed psychologically. Are we meeting each other? Yes? Do you see the fact, not the acceptance of what I'm saying.

Look, when there is anger, there is no 'I', but a second later the thought creates the 'I' and says, 'I have been angry,' and there is the idea that I should not be angry. So there is 'me' who have been angry, and I should not be angry, so the division brings conflict. I hope you understand this because we are going into something which demands that you pay complete attention to this, which is, the essence of meditation. And to eliminate totally, completely every form of conflict, otherwise there is no peace in the world. You may have peace in heaven, but actually to live in this world with complete, inward peace, therefore every action is born out of that peace.

So it's very important to understand that the observer is the observed. When that takes place - please listen - that is, one is jealous, of which you all know, one is jealous, is jealousy different from the observer? You understand my question? Or the observer is the observed, therefore he is jealous, there is not 'I am jealous,' but there is only jealousy. right?

Then what takes place? You understand? Before there was division between me and jealousy, and then I tried to conquer it, I tried to suppress it, rationalize it, put away from it. But now when I see the 'me' is jealous, then what takes place? Before I tried to conquer it, suppress it, understand it, rationalize it, or say, 'Yes, why shouldn't I be jealous?' And therefore in all that process, there is conflict. Whereas, we are saying, when there is no division between the observer and the observed, and therefore only the thing that is, which is jealousy, then what takes place? Does jealousy go on? Or is there a total ending of jealousy? You understand my problem, my question? I wonder.

When jealousy occurs, when there is no observer, you let it blossom and then end. You understand the problem, question? Like a flower that blooms, withers and dies away. But as long as you're fighting it, as long as you're resisting it, or rationalizing it, you're giving life to it. So we are saying that the observer is the observed. And when there is this jealousy, let it, when the observer is the observed, then jealousy blossoms, grows, and naturally dies. And therefore there is no conflict in it. I wonder if you see this.

So what then is action? We live by action, all our life is action - action according to a motive, action according to an ideal, according to a pattern, or action habitual, traditional, without any investigation. So we're going to ask ourselves, what is action? Because a mind that is in meditation, must find this out. What is action?

One of the major problems in our life is conflict, in ourselves. And from that conflict all kinds of neurotic activities go on. And to end conflict, and therefore end neurotic action becomes very important, to have a sane mind, a mind that's healthy, a mind that's not neurotic, caught in beliefs and fears and so on. So we're investigating conflict and the ending of conflict. And also we're asking now, what is action, because we live by action. When you go to the factory, when you go to your office, when you talk, when you walk, everything is action, life is action. So when you're asked, what is action, and how do you act, according to what principle, according to what quality or state of mind from which you act. Please investigate it together. You generally act from memory, the memory which has set a pattern, which has become habit, routine, which is based on remembrance and that remembrance having, being pleasant, act according to that which is pleasant. Or act on reward or punishment. Or you act according to an idea, an ideal, having an ideal you say, 'I will carry that ideal out in daily life.' Or you have a certain ambition. And try to fulfil that ambition. So there are these various types of action.

So each of these actions are incomplete, fragmented. Each action is not whole, holistic. You understand this? If I go to the office every morning for the next fifty years, I'm a business man - thank god I'm not - but I'm a business man, or a lawyer, doctor, some kind of professional careerist. Therefore my actions are divided. Right? Do you see this? Divided, fragmented. I'm a business man and I come home and I love my children, but when I'm a business man, there, I don't love anybody, I want profit etc., etc. So my actions are divided, fragmentary. So when there is a fragmentary action, it must inevitably bring conflict, psychologically. So we're asking, is there an action - please listen to this - is there an action which has no conflict? You understand my question? So we're going to find out, together, we're going to investigate into this question whether there is an action in which there are no regrets, no failures, no sense of frustration, and therefore an action which is whole, harmonious, complete, holistic.

But first we must see very clearly that our actions are fragmentary in our life. I may be a scholar, a painter, but my life, though I'm an excellent sculptor, my life is shoddy, I'm ambitious, greedy, wanting money, position, recognition, fame. So there is contradiction. And hence, where there is contradiction there must be conflict. And that's the way you live. I may be a priest but I am burning inside to be, to become a bishop. It's this pattern goes right through the world. And where there is division in action there must inevitably be conflict - that's law.

So we're trying to find out if there is an action which is whole and never contradictory, therefore an action that does not bring about tension, division and all the rest. So we must find out what is action, not action in a particular field contrary to another part of the field. Therefore one has to see what one is actually doing, how one is actually living, living a contradictory life, contradictory action, and therefore conflict. You must see that, you must become aware of it. Are you aware of this fact, that you, as a human being, live actively, and each action contradicts other actions. Are you aware of this fact? If you are completely aware, then what takes place? You understand my question?

Suppose I live a contradictory action, live in contradictory actions, and you tell me, 'Be aware of it.' What do you mean by being aware of it, I ask. Awareness is not possible when you choose, when you say, 'I like that particular action, I would like to keep that, and please help me to avoid all other actions.' You follow? Which are contradictory to what I like. You follow what I'm saying? Therefore that is not awareness, that is choosing a particular action which is most satisfactory, most comforting, most gratifying, rewarding and all the rest of it, and I say, 'Please let me hold to that and help me not to have contradictory actions with regard to that.' That is not awareness. You understand? Where there is choice in awareness, there is no complete, total, holistic awareness.

So I'm asking you, are you aware of this fact, that your whole life is lived in contradiction with contradictory actions, without any choice, just to be aware what actually is? Then if you are actually aware of it, there is no problem, is there? I wonder if you see this. We'll go into it a little later.

So, I'm coming back to it. We are saying that there is an action which is continuous, without any break. Do you see this? Our actions are broken, and therefore contradictory, change, but we are saying, there is an action which is continuous and therefore holistic, whole. The word 'whole' means to have good health, physically. It means also to have a mind that is sane. Sanity implies not being committed to any particular form of belief, dogma, church, nothing - sane, which is capable of reason, logic, and therefore able to think clearly, directly, objectively. That is sanity. But a neurotic mind cannot think logically, sanely. Therefore an holistic mind, whole, the word 'whole' means having good health, a sane mind. And also the word 'whole' means holy, sacred. All that is implied when we use the word 'holy', 'whole'.

So we are saying there is an action which has no break in it, and therefore a movement that is holistic, whole, and that movement we're going to find, not I'm projecting the idea and then finding it. You're following this? But in the process of meditation, we're going to find that action. You've got what I'm saying?

So we're coming to the point, what is meditation? Not how to meditate, not how to sit in a particular posture, breathe in a certain way and all that - to me all that is nonsense. Because you can only meditate in the depth of meditation and understand it fully, when there is no search or desire for power, when there is no storing up of hurts, when there is no fear, when you have understood the meaning of pleasure, in which there is joy and enjoyment. We went into that, I won't go into it now. And when there is the ending of sorrow, this must be, and love and all that. Therefore this is the basis of foundation, otherwise you're caught in an illusion. So we're asking what is meditation? And why should we meditate?

First of all, the Asiatics, including India, have brought to this country their idea of what meditation is. Their system of meditation, their concept of meditation, the conclusion of their meditation, which is traditional. You have in this country, and also brought from India, the thing called 'transcendental' meditation. The word 'transcendental' is misused. They give you a mantra. You know what that Sanskrit word 'mantra' means, it is entirely different from what you have been told, the root meaning of that word. It means, 'man' means, reflect - please listen, for god's sake listen - reflect on not becoming or being. Reflect on it. Look at it, observe it, see what is implied in it. Therefore reflect on not becoming, or not being. 'Tra' means to put away or destroy all self-centred activity. You understand? So mantra means reflect on not becoming, and dispel all movement born from the centre as the 'me'. That is the meaning of that word. And you have made it into something extraordinarily meaningless, which is, you repeat a word or a series of words, given by another, for 150 dollars or 20 dollars or some absurd money and then you repeat it three times a day for 20 minutes or 5 minutes, and have a good siesta. You know what a siesta is, don't you? And you think you are meditating.

So we're asking, what is meditation. That certainly is not meditation, because I can have a 20 minutes siesta, wake up, go to my office and - follow? - carry on the most mischievous life. Or in my family.

So we are trying to find out, what is meditation? Not according to any guru, not according to any system, because freedom from all authority is one of the factors of meditation, therefore there is no teacher of meditation.

And to find out what is meditation, what is the first thing that is necessary to find out? All previous knowledge of what meditation is, blocks the exploration of what is meditation. You've understood? If I have heard somebody tell me what is meditation, and I accept that or deny it, but it has left a mark on me, and with that memory I investigate it, then it's blocked. So we are investigating into what is meditation without any previous knowledge. So there must be freedom from the past, which is time.

So we have to investigate what is time. Time by the watch and time psychologically. That is, I will be something or I will become something. That requires time, doesn't it? Physically to go from here to there requires time, that's obvious. But we're asking, is there psychological time at all. That is, is there the movement of becoming, or being, or moving from this to that. Which is psychological time. We are questioning that psychological time. We are accustomed or educated to this idea that you must change from what you are into something what should be. That is the traditional acceptance of this. We are saying, that movement is time. And that movement has no meaning because you're not changing 'what is', you're changing 'what is' modified. Change implies modification. Transformation implies the ending of 'what is'. The ending of anger, not how to become not angry. I hope you've understood this.

So in the investigation into what is meditation, freedom is absolutely necessary, freedom from authority, psychologically - of course I have to accept the authority of the policeman or the doctor etc., that's irrelevant. From all authority, there is no teacher, that's going to teach you what meditation is. When there is that freedom you can proceed.

What is necessary in the investigation of what is meditation, first? Is it concentration, or is it attention, or is it awareness? There are three things, concentration, awareness and attention. You're in daily life, sir, look at daily life. When you concentrate, what takes place, actually? Your whole energy is focused on a particular point, or on a particular page. Right? When you concentrate. Which is to put aside all interfering thoughts. So what happens then? That is, you're resisting, in concentration. But we are saying something totally different, which is, be aware of your thought, aware, don't choose in that awareness which thought you would like, just be aware of it.

And from that awareness comes attention. Attention implies that there is no centre from which you are attending. This is really important to understand, because this is the essence of meditation. In concentration there is a centre - right? - from which you are concentrating, on a picture or on an idea or on some image, etc.

From a centre you are exercising energy in concentration. That means, resisting, building a wall, so that no other thought comes in. Therefore there is conflict. There's conflict. When you resist anything there must be conflict. When you say, 'I must think about that and I must not think about other things', your mind, your brain, your thought is wandering all over the place. Right? So you try to pull it back, and therefore there is conflict, constant conflict. To totally eliminate that, become aware of your thought. Say, for instance, I want to think about - what? - think about my suffering, I want to think about it. In thinking about it, I'm distracted by the noise that is going on out there. Or by a thought that comes in that I must see somebody tomorrow, so there is always a distraction going on. Now, become totally aware of this movement of distraction. I'm thinking about suffering, and then I think about cleaning my shoes. Then leave suffering, and look at your thought which wants to clean your shoes. So there is no conflict.

So pursue each thought and therefore there is no contradiction, no resistance about any thought. You've understood this? So then from that arises awareness, to be aware, you are aware then of all the movement of your thought. You've got it? Then out of that awareness comes attention. Now when you are attending to something, really, deeply, there is no centre, is there? Have you watched? Now wait a minute. If you are listening very attentively to what is being said, now, actually now, when you are attending with all your nerves, ears, giving all your energy to attending, is there a 'me'? Is there? Obviously not. You understand? So in attention there is no centre from which there is, you're attending, whereas in concentration there is a centre. You get it? Well, it's up to you.

Then in that attention, if you have gone that far, which is that you have laid the foundation, that you are free from all the business of thought, all the travails of thought, fear, agony, despair, that's the foundation. That is, the content of your consciousness, which is put there by thought, now is being emptied. You understand? It's being freed.

So meditation is the emptying of the content of consciousness, which is consciousness. You're getting this? That is the meaning of, and the depth of meditation, the emptying of all the content, which means - please listen - thought coming to an end - thought is necessary when I function technologically, in the office and so on, but every other form of registration comes to an end. You understand what I'm saying? No, please listen - I'll tell you something. You know, our brain is registering almost everything, the noise, the words which I'm using, like a tape, it is registering. Now is it possible not to register but only register what is absolutely necessary? Why should I register your insult? Why? Why should I register your flattery? It's unnecessary. Why should I register the hurts? Unnecessary. You understand? Therefore register only that which is necessary to operate in daily life as a technician, a writer and so on. But psychologically, don't register anything else. Are you capturing this? So the registration is the movement of thought, which is anger, jealousy, hatred, all that.

So the brain, so consciousness then has lost its content, therefore it is totally a different state of mind, which is - I do not know how far you can go into this. I will go on. Follow it if you can, if you cannot, it doesn't matter, because this is the way of living, not the way that we carry on day after day with all kinds of confusion, uncertainty. We are pointing out a totally different way of living, which is the emptying consciousness of its content, which is fear.

Now we've come to a point when we say, meditation is the attention in which there is no registration psychologically, no registration except the fact of language, going to the office, working in a factory and so on. Nothing else. Then out of that comes complete silence, because thought has come to an end. It functions only where it is absolutely necessary. So time has come to an end. You understand? Time means, movement, therefore when time stops, then there is a totally different kind of movement, in silence. And religion then becomes a totally different thing. Religion then has a totally different meaning.

Now, let's look at that. Religion as it is now - please, if I use strong words, look at it, don't say you're prejudiced or you're conditioned or anything, just look at it. Religion now is a matter of thought. Right? Thought has made the various Hindu religions, the Christian religions, with all their contents, their superstitions, with their symbols, with their, you know, figures, everything is put together by thought. And therefore each religion is fragmented. You are a Christian, somebody else is a Muslim, somebody else is a Hindu and so on. And in those divisions there are subdivisions, multiple divisions, all the result of thought. This is what you call religion, going to the Mass, rituals, the incense, the symbols, all that is called religion, the beliefs, the hopes, the fears, and the desire to be secure in another world or find security in a belief and so on. All that is called religion. Right? We are saying that is not religion, that is merely the movement of thought in fear, in hope, in trying to find security. Thought being a material process, material process - when we use the word 'material' it means memory, experience, knowledge, is stored up in the brain, in the very cells, therefore it is matter. So thought is a material process. And anything that thought has created, put together, is fragmentary, and therefore not religious.

So we're finding out, then what is religion? If all this is not religious? Which no bishop, no devout Christian, no devout, superstitious Hindu or superstitious - will accept this, but it doesn't matter, these are facts. Then what is religion? If it is none of these things, then what is it? It is the investigation with all your attention, which means with all your energy, the summation of all your energy to find out that which is sacred, to come upon that which is holy, which thought has not put together. And that can only take place when there is freedom from noise, that is the noise of thought. That means, the ending of thought and time, psychologically, inwardly. But not the ending of knowledge in the world where you have to function with knowledge. So this, that which is holy, that which is sacred, which is truth, can only be when there is complete silence, when the brain itself has understood the necessity or put thought in its right place. Then out of that immense silence, then there is that which is sacred.

Silence demands space, space in the whole structure of consciousness. There is no space in the structure of our consciousness as it is, because it's crowded with fears. You follow? Crowded, chattering, chattering. And therefore there is no space. When there is silence, there is immense, timeless space. Then only there is a possibility of coming upon that which is the eternal, the sacred.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 27TH JULY 1977.

K: We are going to have a dialogue about any subject. Dialogue implies conversation between two people, people who are concerned about serious things. It is not an intellectual game, or idealistic exchange, or exchange of mere ideas, but rather it is a conversation, I hope friendly, between us. So what shall we start with?

Q: I am a student confronted with theories, speculations and my mind is occupied with this during eight or ten hours a day. I have a great passion to live a simple life, a life with beauty, among all these complex circumstances. Is that possible?

K: The questioner says - I don't know if I need to repeat it - the questioner says that he is a student dealing with theories, ideas, speculations, and he wants to lead a very simple life, a life of beauty, quietness and fairly simple. How is this to be managed? Any other questions?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Are you saying, sir, many philosophies and teachers say that suffering is necessary? Is that it? That is one question.

Q: Is it possible to look at the psychological and physiological state as one movement?

K: Is it possible to observe the physiological as well as the psychological states as one movement. Obviously.

Q: Sir, you said the other day that we should keep our discontent alive. Later on you also said that we should be able to live without conflict. I can't quite understand this.

K: I didn't hear the first part of the question.

Q: One day you said we should keep our discontent alive, and the other day you said no conflict.

K: To keep discontent alive without conflict. Is this possible? Or one day you said be discontented and also, in the next talk, live without effort. How do you bring this about, together?

Q: Why is it so difficult to be totally aware?

Q: How can a human being unattached totally, function in this world?

K: Is that enough?

Q: What do you mean by responsibility?

K: I think that is enough. May we start with these few questions together and go on with them, should we?

One wants to live a simple life, uncomplicated, and yet at the same time a beautiful life, but being a student, who is concerned with ideas, speculations, theories and so on, how is this possible? That is one question. The other is, what is responsibility, what do you mean by that word responsibility? And another is, one day in one of your talks you said one must keep this discontent alive, and in another talk, there must be no effort, is this possible? And how is one - not how - is it possible to be totally and completely aware? Right? Can we start with that.

I think if we could talk over together as a dialogue, what does it mean to be totally aware, and I think we can then ask the question of responsibility, being a student how to live a life of simplicity in a world of theories, ideas and so on, and the other question which is, conflict and discontent. Can we start? Would you object to that, sir? Would any of the questioners object if we start with what does it mean to be completely and totally aware? Can we start with that then I think the other questions will be answered through that.

According to the dictionary meaning - I prefer to look at the dictionary and see what it means, not translate what I think is awareness, or what you think, but according to the dictionary awareness implies sensitivity: to be sensitive to the environment, to all the things, most of the things that are happening in the world outside, and also to be sensitive, to be aware of what is happening, going on within oneself, within the skin, as it were. To be aware not only to nature, to other human beings, to all the beauty of the world, and the political chaos, the contradictions, the hypocrisy, all that outwardly, and also to be aware inwardly, one's own problems, conflicts, desires, misery, confusion and so on. So it is a movement of sensitivity to the outer as well as to the inner. That is, I think, the real meaning of being aware. We all agree to that, do we? Please I am not laying down the law, I am just exchanging with you what does it mean to be aware, that is generally understood.

Q: Is it awareness, or aware of the outer and the inner?

K: I am going into that.

Q: There are a lot of people here speaking a lot of words of what it is about, awareness. But has it changed their lives? What do you say? Has there been a radical transformation in their lives? That is one thing I would like to ask: how many people have actually been changed throughout the years by what you have said?

K: How many people have been changed by your talks. Right? How many people have been radically changed by your fifty years and more of talking all over the world? Right, sir?

Q: Ask the people who have been here.

K: Let us first listen to what he has to say. He says you have talked for about fifty or more years, and has there been any human being, one or two that are radically changed.

Q: Like yourself. It seems to me that people will only hear your words but not implement them.

K: I don't know quite follow, sir, what you are saying.

Q: What I am saying is, they try and live according to your words instead of following themselves.

K: No, I don't quite understand what he is saying. Would you talk a little more quietly. I will answer it sir, I will repeat your question.

Q: What I am asking is this: people come here, there are a lot of people coming here for many years, and it seems that they have not in their daily life effected the radical change that you are talking about.

K: That is what I am going into.

Q: Now, I ask myself why.

K: Don't. If you answer the question yourself you are...

Q: I can't answer the question because I have not arrived at where you are at. The words seem to be particular and peculiar to you. But they have no meaning or relevance to my life simply because one has got to follow oneself. And it seems quite futile asking questions about what awareness is when you don't know the meaning of awareness.

K: We are trying to explain, sir, the meaning of that word first, awareness. And with regard to the other question: you have talked for over fifty years, have there been any one person who is radically transformed by your words? Right? If I may point out, it is not my responsibility to see if anybody is changed, or not. It is up to them. It would be an impudent action on my part if I said, "Have you changed?" It is up to each one who listens, or who cares to listen, or who is serious. It is up to them, and not up to me.

That's all.

Q: I agree.

K: It is up to you, sir, as well as up to every other person. May we go on?

That is, we were asking...

Q: Thank you very much.

K: Not at all, sir. We were asking, what is it to be aware. We said according to the dictionary, it has several meanings but I am taking the principal meaning of that word, which is, to be conscious, to be in touch, not verbally, but inwardly, to be in touch, to be conscious, to be sensitive to the outer and to the inner. When one is sensitive there is no division as the outer and the inner. And we are saying, is it possible - that is the question - which is, is it possible to be aware totally, completely. It implies, does it not - this is a dialogue, I am not giving a speech, so please share in the question and answers - we are saying, the questioner is saying, is it possible to be completely aware? Now is there a difference - I am asking you - between the outer, that is the political, social, economic, and all the things that are happening in the world, the violence, the brutality, the appalling political chicanery, deception, all that is going out there, is it not also going on inwardly? Is society created by us, or society just exists by itself? You understand my question. So if we are related, or sensitive to what is happening in the world, with all the violence and so on, who is responsible for it? And to be aware of that responsibility, which means to be sensitive, to be conscious, of one's own violence, double talk, say one thing and think something else, wanting complete security, nationalities, and so on and so on, can one be totally aware of this movement? That's the question; please answer it, discuss it, talk it over.

Can a human being, again who is the representative of the whole of humanity, which we discussed very clearly, which is obvious, which is factual, can a human being be aware of that noise of the train, the wind among the leaves, the beauty of the mountains, the environment and also be aware what is going on inwardly?

Is it possible to be aware - no, I must go a little more deeply. One is aware of this tent. Right? Conscious, the shape of it, the structure of it, the length of it, the proportions of it. Right? And also one is conscious, one is aware, sensitive to the people sitting around you - the colour of their dress, how they look, the colour of their shirts, and what the ladies wear, and so on, to be aware of it, conscious of it, sensitive to it. Right? But in that awareness comes the question, "I like that blue shirt, and I don't like that red shirt", "I like that person, I don't like that person" - for various reasons. Now can you observe - we are asking - can one observe the person sitting next to you, the dress they wear, the colour, without choosing, without saying, "I like, I don't like", just to observe? Is that possible, can you do it? That's fairly simple, isn't it? No? Can't you do that?

Q: When you point it out, yes it is possible.

K: I am coming to that, sir, you want to go ahead too quickly.

You might observe the shirt the speaker is wearing, and say, "Sorry, that's too much colour. I don't like it. It is sewn badly" - which is perfectly right, it is made in India! Please wait a minute, things are made very well in India, perfectly, but this happened to be a bad tailor. And you can look at it without any condemnation or approval, can't you? Right? That's fairly simple, isn't it?

Q: Why do you say it is simple, it is not simple for us. To look without judging, it is not possible. (continues in Italian)

K: Ah, no, the gentleman is saying it is very difficult for us to be aware without judgement, without judging. And I say, is he speaking for himself, or generally, for all the people in the tent. He says, at last, I am speaking for myself. Now is that so? Can you not observe - please try it, this is a discussion, a dialogue, a conversation - can you observe without judgement, without approval, just to look? Is that not possible? No?

Q: No.

K: It is not possible? Why? Is it because one is so heavily conditioned to like and to dislike? I am just asking, I am not saying you are. I don't like the Russians, or I love the Russians, I don't like this, and I don't like that, but to observe. Because we will go into it a little deeper afterwards. Can you observe a tree, a mountain, a river, without - just to look at it, not say, "I like," "I don't like", "This is beautiful" - just to look at something. Is that not possible? Because if you cannot do that outwardly it becomes much more difficult when you go inwardly. Right? It is fairly easy to observe a car and say, "That's not a nice colour", or just to look at it. And if one cannot do that then how can you observe yourself without any condemnatory process, just to observe what is actually happening?

That is, to be aware without any choice. I believe, I was told the other day, when we use that word 'choiceless awareness' that is the essence of religion. It may be, it may not be. I am just passing it on to you.

So we are asking: if one is not sensitive, you can't be sensitive if you say, "I don't like that", or "I do like that", "This gives me more delight in looking and that disgusts me". Because if one is not capable to observe without any movement of thought, which is like and dislike, condemning, accepting, how can one observe the extraordinary complexity of one's own existence inwardly? You understand my question?

Q: Can we ask the question the other way: is there anyone here in this tent who can so observe without judgement?

K: The gentleman says, is there anyone here in this tent who can so observe, without judgement. That will answer that gentleman's question about whether anybody had changed or not. It's up to you.

Q: It can be done for a moment.

K: The gentleman says it can be done for a moment. Just for a second or two you can observe, just observe. But a few seconds later the whole machinery of thought begins. Right?

Q: I can do it with will.

K: Gosh, you people! He can do it with will, he can control and observe. I say that is not possible. When you control your like and dislike and observe, you are not observing totally. You are not giving your whole energy to observe. I can't understand the difficulty in this at all.

Q: It is so difficult to see what is in front of you.

K: Sir, can't you look at this poor man sitting on the platform, just look at him.

Q: But after a while...

K: No, sir, we are not going inwards into that. I said, can't you look at the speaker with his pink, or whatever it is, look at him, just look without all the machinery of thought of saying, "I like", "I don't like", "He is good", "He is clever" - he is this, just to observe.

Q: There is a fear, sir, if I may speak for myself, that once one observes without judging standards of morality will disappear.

K: We will come to that, sir, we haven't gone into the very, very complex problem of observing, being aware, inwardly. We are just observing this. Can you listen to that noise of that train without saying, "For god's sake, I want to listen to you", and therefore resist the train, noise of the train?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, the gentleman asked - we haven't even approach his question, we are just exploring the question - the gentleman there asked, what does it mean, is it possible to be totally aware? He says, I want to be, I see the importance of it, but I can't do it, what does it mean? He is asking that question. And we are exploring the word, not the significance of the whole thing, just the word. I said the word means to be conscious, to know, to be sensitive. And one cannot be sensitive, judge if there is condemnation, judgement, just to observe.

There is an Italian gentleman, I have known him for over sixty years - seventy? And I look at him, I talk to him and I have known him all these years, I never once ask him, have you changed. It is up to him. If he does not change then it is his misery. It is not my misery.

Q: You have talked for fifty years in order to produce what result? And you have not produced it.

K: I don't want to produce...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Would you kindly listen to me. I will answer your question, sir.

Q: You can only answer it in words, not change people.

K: You have gone back to the question.

Q: Excuse me, Krishnamurti, I am no follower of yours but I think I would like to point out to those gentleman over there. First to enlighten you, that is something you have to do for yourself. His aim in life is to keep and maintain the light of his own being.

K: Sir, I can answer the question for myself, you don't have to! Would you please listen. Please I am talking very seriously, why I am talking, why I have not deviated for the last sixty years from what I have been saying, I will tell you why if it interests you.

First of all the speaker doesn't expect anything from anybody. Right? Because he said, look, he said very carefully from the beginning, no authority, he said that sixty years ago. I am eighty two now. Sixty years ago he said that, no authority, therefore don't follow anybody, including me. You have to be a light to yourself, not light your candle or your fire at the fire or candle of another, including myself. So you by listening, if you care to listen, are responsible for yourself, not for me. And I also said, the speaker does not expect anything from anybody, all of you. If you want to drink at the fountain, drink it. And if you don't, don't. It is very simple. If I expected anything from you I would be disappointed, I would be hurt. I would feel, my god, I have done nothing in my life. But I don't feel that. I am very serious, I don't feel that way. I am talking and the urge to talk is born out of compassion, without any cause. I carefully explained, compassion has no cause. So that is why I am talking. And also you might ask a flower on the road side, why do you have such beauty, why do you have such perfume. And if the flower was able to talk it would say, "Look, I am like that, what are you going to do about it?".

So let's continue with what we were talking about.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, we are talking about awareness. Please ask that question...

Q: Awareness is to be aware without thought. (Inaudible)

K: I don't understand your question, madam. I can't hear it. If somebody has understood will you tell me.

Q: We are conditioned to like and dislike things. How can we stop this?

K: Yes, we are conditioned to like and dislike, can we talk it over how to stop this. And also I forgot when those questions arose why you have schools. There too we are not expecting anything except to help them to understand life. If they don't it's up to them. Let's proceed.

We are having a friendly conversation, a friendly conversation between two people, you and I, or many of us together, which is about is it possible to be totally aware. We are going to go into that question. It is a very complex question, and if we can go together into it you will see what is implied in it. But you are refusing. I am saying, to be aware implies to be sensitive, to be conscious of the outer as well as the inner. If one is not sensitive to the outer, it becomes much more difficult to be sensitive to the things that are happening inside the skin, as it were. So I began by saying, can you observe something without judgement. That's all. Just to look. Not say, "I like" - I know you are conditioned, I know it is very difficult, you make it terribly difficult by making it an intellectual thing. But to look at something, just look without all the operation of thought entering into it. If you cannot then it is impossible to look with clarity, without any judgement about what is happening inside you, which is very, very complex.

So I just began by pointing out, to look at the outer without any judgement. If that is not possible, find out why it is not possible, not how to be free of the conditioning, but why is it not possible. Find out. It is not possible because your whole education from childhood has been to say, develop this conditioning of like and dislike. Right? I like Italians, I hate the Russians. Right? That's how we operate. Or I hate the person who is speaking here. So it doesn't matter.

So I am just asking you to kindly observe what is happening outside - violence, divisions of religions, political divisions, building up instruments of war. Right? This is happening outside. Concentration camps - people who disagree politically are sent to mental hospitals, torture. All this is going on outside. Can you look at it first without identifying yourself with any of them. Right? If you cannot do it, find out why. Is it because you are an Englishman who is so stuck in his conditioning, or an Indian who is so traditionally bound? Nationality in India didn't exist at all for centuries, millenia, it is only the British, and other foreigners, brought it in, and they began the national wars, conflicts and all the rest of the nonsense.

So if you are aware of that let's move inwardly. Right? Now can you look at yourself without any judgement? I want to live a very simple life. That is one of the questions. But I am surrounded by ideas, theories, speculations, and that gives me a degree. You follow? Therefore how am I to live simply? So this is one of the problems. Look into it. We are asking, can you look at yourself, not according to me, or according to Jung, Freud, or professional psychologists, just to look at yourself? As you look at yourself immediately you say, "I am bad", or "I am evil", or "I am jealous". You follow? The whole machinery of the past, the traditions, thought begins. But before the thought begins just have a space, a little space so that you can look without that machinery quickly coming into action. You understand? It seems so simple.

Q: Shall we give importance to some things and not to others?

K: Sir, we haven't come to that yet. You see we have already started what is important, what is not important. I am just looking at myself, I haven't come to anything.

Look, I'll begin: I want to look at myself, I want to see what I am, not who I am. What is all this going on in me? I just want to look first. I see I can only look without distortion if there is no judgement. Right? I see that. But I have been conditioned, heavily conditioned so long - society, education, etc., family, tradition says, you must judge. I know that. I have been conditioned. I say I'll hold that in a minute, I'll hold that back, but I just want to look. Right? Are you doing this as we are talking together? Or have you just gone off. Are we doing this together?

Q: Yes.

K: Right. That is, I want to look at myself. I want to see exactly the shape of my face in the mirror. Right? I look at myself in the mirror, the outer, and my face is my face. I can't say, well I wish I had a straighter nose, or black whatever it is. I just look first. All right. Then I say to myself, I wish it were not like that. Right? Why do I say it? Because I think your nose is better than mine. Right? So comparison is born. You understand? You are following this? Now can I look without comparison? You understand? My interest is to look, is to observe, and therefore as my interest is tremendously strong to look, comparison fades away. You understand? Because my whole urgency, urge is to observe. Therefore comparison doesn't exist at that moment, it may come later, I will deal with it later. But at the moment my interest is so great that I want to look. My interest pushes aside all comparison. Right?

Now, have you got that interest? I am not saying you must have it. Have you got it? If not, why not? You understand my question? If you haven't got that tremendous interest to know what is happening in the world, and what is happening inside you, and you have created the outer - the society, the whole structure is created by human beings, and as you are a human being who is the representative of all humanity, you are responsible for this terrible state. So I just want to observe.

Q: Even if you say I observe my face...

K: X's face. Sir, all right, I want to look at you. I know you are American, by your speech, or an Italian. And I don't like Americans, suppose - please don't go off - so I say, oh, he is an American and turn my head away. Right? But my interest is to look, whether you call yourself an American, your language is American, whether you are vulgar, stupid, that's not my - I want to look, I want to see what you are.

Q: You take a photograph of it.

K: Yes, take a snapshot and you look at it. Can you do the same about yourself. That is what I am coming to. You refuse to move. I want to go into this. This is tremendously important. I want, as a human being, I want to look at myself before I say who am I, what am I, condemn, judge, evaluate, this is good. I just want to look.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, you are all making it so complex. It will become tremendously complex a little later, don't begin with complexity. My body, my mind, my - you follow? Just look at yourself.

Q: What do you mean by, 'the house is burning'?

K: You have understood his question. I'll repeat his question. He says, what do you mean 'the house is burning'? Don't you know the house is burning? Your house, the world is your house, the earth is your house. The earth is being destroyed, the rivers are being polluted, the air is becoming impossible to breathe with so many cars, and all the rest of it. Some fishes are being destroyed completely, the whales are disappearing, there are wars - preparing, whether it is in Egypt or Israel, it doesn't matter, it is part of your house. Are you aware of this, that it is your house? Not Israel and Egypt. Right? Are you aware of it, sensitive to it? Or you say, "Poor chaps, it is their affair"? If you are not aware of it, why are you not aware of it? The house is burning, you understand? You don't seem to realize what the world is going through.

And the second question is: must there be complete transformation - listen to the question - must there be complete transformation, psychologically, all that we have talked about, before you put out the fire? You understand the question? I see the fire in the world, and the fire inside myself - the misery, the confusion, the idiocy, the pettiness, my arrogance, and all the rest of it. Until - the questioner says - until I radically transform myself it is not possible to put the fire out.

Q: You must become...

K: Sir, listen to the question first, find out what is implied in it: I cannot do anything until I become perfect. Right? And the house is burning in the meantime. And the house is me. I am being burnt, so I wait until I become perfect. Right? This is the question that is asked not only by that gentleman but by everybody. Which is, can I teach, can I start a school, can I do anything until I have completely transformed? You see the absurdity of the question, need I explain it? I am not being rude to you, sir. But need that question be answered? Do you mean to say you wait until you become transformed; or you see the importance of putting an end to the fire, and that very essential urge to put out the fire is transforming you. You understand? Right.

Now please let's stick to one thing. What time is it?

Q: A quarter to twelve, sir.

K: Thank you. Let's go into this a little bit, may I? I want to look at myself. I know I am so conditioned that I cannot look at myself properly. Right? So I put that question 'wanting to look at myself' completely, I leave that. I then go and tackle or investigate, why am I conditioned, why do I accept it? Not just say, well I am conditioned. I know. Why do I accept it? Do you accept it because it is the easiest way of living?

Q: Yes.

K: So, wait a minute, sir, I want to observe and I see I cannot observe because I am conditioned, and I have never questioned because I am afraid I might not be comfortable. So I see I want to be comfortable, is that it, that's why I can't look. So why do I want comfort? Where am I to find it? I want it. But where am I to find it? So I find it in my companion - I think I find it - in my wife, with my girl, with a belief. So don't disturb all that, because with my wife so far I have found comfort with her, safe. But one day something is going to crack, so I am frightened. You follow how far I have moved away. I want to observe and I find I am really afraid to observe. Right? Right? Are you following this? So I am going to find out why am I afraid. What am I afraid about? Losing my comfort, losing my security, losing my conditioning? It is this conditioning that is creating the misery in the world. Right? So the house is burning, I want to put out that fire, but I don't want to because I am frightened. Right?

Are you doing this? So in other words, sir, you want to remain mediocre which means - I am not condemning you, I am just pointing out - mediocrity means climbing half way up the hill; excellence means going right to the top of it.

So most of us would rather remain in our stagnant pools of little conditioning, and knowing that very conditioning is destroying the world. Right?

So look how far I have gone into it. I want to look and I find I am conditioned, I question why I am conditioned because in questioning why I am conditioned I find I want comfort, I want the easiest way. The easiest way is to accept.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Though there is contradiction I accept it. There is contradiction. So I would rather let things alone. Right? Is that what you are all doing? Please investigate, I am not saying you are doing it.

Q: Sir, when we are talking about this, including myself, what part is looking, one part is looking at the other part. We verbalize it and think we understand it. I can understand your message, that there is a different way of seeing yourself. Like you said, seeing in the mirror, you see your face.

K: How do you look at your own consciousness, is that it?

Q: I think in the same way that you look at your face.

K: Yes, sir. How do you look at your own consciousness, the questioner asks, as you look at your own face. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You are a rummy crowd!

Q: What exactly am I thinking about at this moment. It is always something in the past.

K: Look: at the end of an hour and ten minutes - three trains have passed - at the end of an hour and ten minutes, or more, that question has not been answered. The gentleman says, please tell me, I am really anxious to find out, how to be totally aware. That has not been answered. And he will go away and say, my god, when will that question be answered. Because you really don't want to find out, do you, what it means to be totally aware?

Sir, to be totally aware implies a choiceless observation of the content of your consciousness. The content is the society, the wars, the misery, the confusion, the repetitive pleasurable actions and so on, the content is that, can you observe it? Can you observe that you are afraid - not how to change it, not how to run away from it, or transform it, just to observe that fear? And to know, to be aware that you are pursuing pleasure - pleasure of possessing money, pleasure sexually, pleasure of a position, different forms of pleasure - are you aware of it? Now wait a minute, 'are you aware' means are you aware fragment by fragment? You understand? Are you aware of the many parts of the content of consciousness? Or are you aware instantly of the whole? The whole is more than the parts. But if you say I am going to look at each part, there will never be perception of the whole which is much more. So which is it that you are doing actually - examining the parts, fear, jealousy, anxiety, sorrow, the house is burning, I am left, centre, or extreme right, or extreme left politically, are you aware of the fragments; or are you aware of the totality of consciousness?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I know, but find out if I am observing the parts and why are you observing the parts? Because you are conditioned. I look at my life as a Frenchman, as a Dutchman, or whatever it is. That is my tradition, I have been brought up in Holland and I have said, I am a Dutchman, and that is my conditioning, therefore I will always look fragmentarily. Just be aware of that, not how to go beyond it. The moment you become aware of it you are already out of it.

So consciousness with its fragments - each one of us is aware of the fragments. You understand, sir? The wheel is greater than the spokes. Right, you understand that? The whole is greater than the parts. That's all. But if I am conditioned, holding on to my parts, I will never see the whole. If I say, I have been born in India, I am a Brahmin, I am the tradition, etc., etc., which is the part, and I hold on, so I will fight for the part. Which is simple, that is what you are doing - America, Russia, you follow? Whereas if you see the whole of it then the parts disappear. Right, sirs? Do it, please do it.

Q: How do you get to the total?

K: I am showing it to you.

Q: No, you are not. You are destroying it. You are talking about it.

K: No. All right, sir. I have got your question, wait sir. I will show it to you. If you will kindly listen, sir, I am pointing out something. First I say, please listen, first I say the word is not the thing.

Q: That's right.

K: Right? So what I have described is not the actual, the truth. Right? So can you when you are listening not be caught in words but see the thing that is being described? But that becomes difficult because we have lived in a world of words. So I have been saying from the beginning of every talk, the word is not the thing. The word 'mountain' is not the mountain. I may describe the mountain most eloquently, beautifully, or paint it, but the paint, the picture, the words, the description is not the thing. Therefore consciousness is the word, the content is the word and awareness is the word, so go beyond the word, which is see your own consciousness, its content, etc. So if you are merely caught by the description then you will fight with me for ever.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, madam. Look, we human beings are used to being told what to do. We want to be awakened to all this. Right? We want to see all of this and go beyond it. And who is going to do it for you? If I see - please listen sirs - if I see that I have to be a light to myself - right - and that I cannot light this light from another, or through another, then I have to look at myself. Look. Look at the content of myself. But I cannot look at the whole as a whole because I am trained to look partially. So my concern then is, why do I look partially. I look partially because of my education, my tradition, my environment, the society, my wife, my father, they have all been looking at themselves partially. So I refuse to look, I refuse to look how they have told me to look. I say, I don't know, they may be totally wrong, probably they are, so I want to look, for the first time to look. Sir, when you look there is no difference between the observer and the observed, there is only the state of looking.

Q: Do I look partially because of my attachment, my positioning, or because of all the things that I have done wrong in my life, and I know it? Say I have been buying something for five francs and I am selling it for twenty five francs to somebody who needs it. I do see moral things. At this point I can't make any kind of excuse for myself - my ego can make an excuse for anything, but I do not want to see the real me which is ugly, hideous.

K: Quite right, sir. When you say, hideous, ugly, you are already condemning it. For god's sake, do look how we are caught in words. Sir, when you love somebody - I mean love, ordinarily, not something extraordinary - for the moment you forget everything, don't you. You may want to hold her hand or sleep with her, or have her as your companion. In that there is no problem.

We have made this all so terribly intellectual, verbal.

We'll continue, if we may tomorrow morning.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 28TH JULY 1977.

K: If you don't mind we will continue with what we were talking about yesterday. Which is, is it possible to be totally awake, aware? And if you will allow me I will talk about it for a little while and then you can have a dialogue about it. And we are only going to discuss, talk over together, what does it mean to be aware totally. And if you don't mind I won't answer any other question except that because I think if we could go into this very deeply we will find out how to look at ourselves. And from that observation one begins to see what is the meaning of knowing oneself. Because without knowing yourself you have no basis for action. Without knowing yourself one wanders around with all kinds of absurd ideas, commits oneself to all kinds of activities, caught in various traps. So I think it is very important if we could go into this question of what does it mean to be totally, completely aware. And I think most of our questions will be answered in the discovery for ourselves of what it means to be aware. May I go into that that way? Would you allow me?

First of all, one can see the importance of being a light to oneself. It doesn't mean to cling to some idea that one has discovered, or experienced a light in oneself. But that comes about by understanding fully, deeply what awareness means. I am going to talk it over with you first, and then please question, let's talk it over, have a dialogue together.

I don't think awareness can be practised. If you practise it then it becomes mechanical. Right? That's simple enough. It is like a man who plays the piano, if he practises all day long he might practise the wrong notes. So awareness implies no practice at all. It is free observation without any distortion, without any bias, without any prejudice, without any conclusion - free observation and exposition. Not only observation of the world around one, but also from the outer observation move inward because unless one understands the outer very carefully merely starting with the inner awareness may be distorting, may be illusory, may be non-factual. Whereas observing the outer, your reactions to the outer, whether you are a Christian, Buddhist, Hindu, Muslim, British, American, whatever it is, so if you are conditioned as most of us are, and if you look at the outer with that conditioned mind then you can't observe freely.

So awareness implies that one is conditioned, and from that conditioning we have created the world, the moral, ethical, cultural, political, religious world, as well as the psychological world. Right? We are conditioned by our culture, by the society in which we live, which we have created, and we are conditioned by the religions, by the priests, by the family, the tradition, the tradition of war, and the tradition of god, as the tradition of rituals. We are conditioned by the name, by the connotation attached to that name. All this is a form of conditioning.

Now just a minute. So the human being conditioned at the beginning, and then he conditions himself through greed, and then he creates a society which helps him to be greedy. Right? This is simply logical. So it is an interaction between the outer and the inner. It is not that the outer is different from the inner, but it's interaction, constant ebb and flow. It's clear, isn't it? So we are asking: is it possible to be aware of one's conditioning totally, both the conditioning of the conscious mind as well as the deep rooted conditioning of which one may not be aware at all? And we are going to deal with both. Please I am talking now and you are going to discuss it with me afterwards. I will stop at a certain time.

So is it possible for a human being, without a motive - if a human being has a motive to examine and be free of that conditioning, that very motive is born out of his past conditioning. I wonder if you see that. We will discuss it. If I have a motive to be free of my conditioning because I have pain, or pleasure, of fear, or this or that, the motive is born out of my conditioning. And so the motive dictates how I observe my conditioning. Right? See the importance of this. So I must observe my conditioning, whatever it is, good, bad, indifferent, mediocre, and excellent, whatever it is, I must examine it, look at it without any motive. Because I see the logic of it, the reason of it - where I have a motive, that motive is the outcome of my conditioning, that motive dictates further conditioning, modifying it, or changing it a little bit here and there, but that motive being born out of my conditioning operates on further conditioning. That's clear.

So is it possible for me to observe without any motive? See what we are doing, going step by step into it. Is it possible for me, for one to observe without any motive? If one sees the logic of it, the truth of it, that is, a motive born out of my conditioning still maintains the conditioning. Do you, and I, see the truth of it? When I do, the motive disappears. I don't have to struggle against it. Right? If I have a motive to be free of my conditioning, that motive is dictated by the desire to be free of my trap in order to be something else. To be something else is born out of my conditioning, to be something else is the reaction to my conditioning, dictated, directed by the motive. That's clear. May I go on? Please we are going to discuss this, have a dialogue.

So one asks, is it possible to be free of motive, all motives, not just one motive? And that is only possible if I see the movement of a motive. Right? How the motive is born, what its actions are, what its responses are, how that very motive curtails, limits further examination, therefore seeing the truth of that the motive, all motives disappear. I wonder if you see that. We are going to discuss this a bit, have a dialogue soon.

Now the very fact, having no motive, gives freedom of observation. Right? Right? Now one observes, that is, having no motive I am becoming aware of my consciousness. Right? Of one's consciousness. So in becoming aware without motive, and therefore no choice in the observation of my conditioning, because the motive dictates the choice - I wonder if you see all this? We will discuss it. So there is no choice in observation. Observation then is freedom to look. The motive is the factor of the past, the motive is the past. The motive is the observer. Without the motive there is no observer. Are we getting something of this? You are following? So the mind is free to observe without any choice, without any motive, because I see choice is the outcome of my conditioning, motive is the outcome of another form of conditioning, so seeing the truth of that there is freedom to observe without the observer. We will go into it later.

So there is an observation only - no correction, no direction, no suppression, there is just observation. I observe - there is an observation - not "I observe" - there is an observation of authority. One of our conditionings. Authority implies fear, conformity, imitation, obedience, following somebody - much more is involved in that authority. Authority of one's own experience, authority of one's own knowledge, or the authority that has been imposed through society and so on and so on.

So in the observation of authority, that is the art of observation - please follow this - the art of observation is to see that authority has a certain place - doctors, medicine, technology, but authority has no place in the field which we call the psyche. Right? Art means, as we said at the beginning, to put everything in its right place. Right? See the beauty of it, sir: to put everything where it belongs, not through choice but through observation. Have you got it? Right?

(noise of train) They have better rail beds and therefore they are going faster, more noise!

So authority has its right place, I have observed it - there is an observation of it. And there is fear. I am just taking a few of the contents of our consciousness of which we are becoming aware. Fear has its right place - which is the fear to protect the instrument, the organism, and it has no other place. Pleasure, and how thought pursues pleasure - we went into all that. And what is love, what is sorrow - we went into all that. So is there a possibility of being aware of the whole of it at a single observation and not pursue, take fragment by fragment, because they are all interrelated, they are not separate, they are not fragments which exist by themselves. They are all interrelated, acting upon each other. So in this observation is it possible to observe totally the whole movement?

You understand? It is possible only when we understand the meaning and the significance of thought - thought, experience, knowledge stored up in the brain as memory, and the action of that memory, thought. Again the art of putting, giving thought its right place and no other.

Now we are asking: is it possible to be aware of this total movement as a single unit? Or must you go through fragmentary observation of the fragments? That's one point. Second point is: can the conscious mind investigate the unconscious, the deeper layers of consciousness? You understand my question? That's part of observation, that's part of being totally, completely aware. As most of us are educated to live on the superficial conscious level we find it awfully difficult, or impossible, to open up - not to a psychologist, or a psychotherapist, to ourselves, to open up everything, because again if we have understood fear then it is possible. You understand? If you have gone into the question of pleasure, love, suffering, death, then the whole cave, the whole hidden thing is exposed. You don't have to go after them but they come out. Have you understood any of this?

Right? So having no motive, there being no direction, and so no choice, there is a total awareness. You get it? Complete awareness. Why the Russians are behaving that way, or the British, the Americans, the Hindus, why religions are this way. Because we have observed the outer very carefully, how you are trapped by the gurus because you want to find out something - you are eager, when one is very young, and fresh and innocent and wanting to enthusiastically find out, there comes along some man who says, "I'll tell you all about it", and you are caught. To be aware of all that. Which means to be aware of your desire, desire being will and so on, desire with its illusions, which is to follow somebody who is going to give you the light. To practise something hoping thereby that you will have this extraordinary delight, or ecstasy, joy.

Ecstasy, as we said, is a state of mind which is beyond the self.

So both consciously as well as deep down there is a total awareness, and from that total awareness in which there is no choice there is complete action, to act without a motive which is out of compassion. You get it? Which is out of clarity. And that compassion, clarity gives the skill to operate, to function, to act. This is total awareness. Have you got it?

Now let's discuss it.

Q: Are you actually doing that all the time?

K: Sir, do it. I am not asking you to do anything.

Q: I am asking you.

K: I am not answering you. If you have listened very carefully you will have answered it yourself.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, just listen. Can you be free of motive? Begin with that, knowing a motive is born out of your conditioning. That conditioning dictates what kind of motive you have. That conditioning has come into being right from the time you were born, from the past, millenia after millenia. It isn't just a newly conditioned mind, it is the result of millenia existence of man. Man has operated always with a motive - of god, country, and you know all the rest of it, I don't have to go into it.

So please first let us talk about this, this one thing. Is it possible for you to be free of a motive. If you have a motive, is that love?

I'll put it round the other way then perhaps we will get together a little more clearly. When I love you, if I have a motive because I want companionship, sex, or I am lonely, or you are nice, attractive, sensuously I would appreciate it, if I have any form of motive can there be love? Find out.

So we are asking: after explaining the whole movement of motive, logically, sanely, have you a motive in observation? That's all. Let's stick to that one thing. If one has a son or a daughter and you love them, but you say, "Yes, he must be an engineer, and she must marry the rich man", etc., etc., but is that love? Right? So ask yourself if in your observation of the world outside you and the world inside you, which we will come to presently, are you free of a motive when you observe the world - the communist, their tyranny, what is happening in Russia, and there is the affluent society of America, and the amazing poverty of the Asiatic countries, including Africa, when you look at it, have you a motive? - wanting to help them, wanting to feed them. Go on, sirs, examine it. Or have you a motive when you are a wife and a husband, a girl and a boy? If you have then you can't observe. That is a simple fact.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, forget the culture. You see we are going off. Have you a motive in your observation?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, please begin with this, you will go into it a little later. Have you a motive when you follow your guru - if you have a guru? I hope you haven't, but if you have a guru, a long beard, brown, or a white man with a white beard - it is the same thing - have you when you follow somebody, a guru, have you a motive?

Q: If I observe only because I want to understand...

K: That's a motive.

Q: So how do you observe?

K: No, no. If you see the truth that motive of any kind - righteous, or pleasurable, any motive, is born out of your own conditioning, and you want to be aware totally of your conditioning, then motive prevents you from observation. That's all. That's a simple fact.

Q: I know that all my actions have a motive. That's clear. But I am afraid that without motive, without desire, I will fall into indifference.

K: He says, if I have no motive I might fall into indifference. Is that so? Or are you imagining that you might fall into indifference? Because you have not seen the truth that motive distorts observation, but you have already concluded that if there is no motive the whole thing will collapse. But therefore we have to talk over together the question of whether it is possible to be free of a motive. Right? Not project what will happen without a motive. That's a clever trick to prevent oneself from having a motive.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We have said that, sir. Art is putting things in their right place. Not painting pictures, appreciating Picasso or Rembrandt, or somebody else, putting everything in its right place. Then the motive to eat the right food, right diet, and yoga and all the rest of it has its right place. It would be insanity to say...

So proceed, after talking over together, I am going to stick to this one point until we completely understand it - not understand, act. Which is, are you free from motive? Or you first see that if there is no motive, my god, what shall I do? Which is, thought - see what has happened - thought projecting what might be, then that very thought is frightened of what might be, and therefore do nothing, carry on. So is there a possibility of observing without a motive?

Q: Sir, I have a very strong urge to become more aware so I tried to be aware. And is this different from motive?

K: No sir, it is not. I want to be aware. Right? I want to be aware. Why? Explore. Look into it. Why do I want to be aware? You mean to say when the house is burning you are not aware? Right? The house is burning, isn't it? Unless you are totally blind, totally indifferent, completely consumed with your own activities, obviously you are not aware of what is happening, which is the essence of neuroticism. No? So as the house is burning, your house, you mean to say you are not aware of it - you are not aware of what is happening in Russia, in Italy, the chaos, Eurocommunism, dictatorships, instruments of war, the tradition of war. Historically, there have been wars for five thousand years, practically everyday somewhere on the earth.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, I said communism, American, everywhere the earth is being destroyed.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No. Listen. Forgive me, I said the whole world, including Eurocommunism, communism, Marxism, Lenin, Mao, everywhere, America. Sir, don't pick up one word and throw a brick at it. The whole world is destroying itself. Human beings are destroying themselves. It is an absolute fact.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, let's forget communism, Eurocommunism, socialism.

Q: But education has the motive of learning. So if I want learn what am I to do?

K: Sir, look. Of course. I want to learn mathematics, or engineering; there is a motive because that way I will be able to earn a livelihood. Right? Right? We said put it in its right place.

Q: I understand what you want to say.

K: Not what I want to say.

Q: It is a fact.

K: So if it is a fact to you, sir, are you free of motive to observe?

Q: If I see the necessity.

K: No, not if you see the necessity. I want to observe whether I love my wife, or my girl friend - love. If I have a motive, is that love?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am afraid then we haven't understood at all what we have been saying. I want to observe my relationship - keep to that one little thing - I want to observe my relationship with my wife, or my girl friend, or my children. I want to be aware of that relationship. If I have a motive because my wife gives me sex, pleasure, comfort, cooks my meals, washes my etc., etc., and I say, "I love you, darling, because you do all those things" - is that love? That's all. Let's stick simply to that. And is it possible to have a relationship with a woman, or a man without a motive?

Q: Sir, if you say to a person, "I love you" that is already a motive because it excludes other people so it is not love.

K: No, no. Please you are going off. Sir, most of us...

Q: What is the reason that you choose that person? That is a motive. Because you like another person more than someone else.

K: Don't you?

Q: Sir how many people are couples here?

K: Oh, for god's sake sir, please.

Q: And why? Because they have a motive.

K: So sir, because of that motive is there love? That's all I am saying.

Q: No, when you say, "I love you", you exclude other people from your relationship. So you isolate yourselves.

K: I am asking, sir, you may love that one. Don't exclaim, "I can't love all the others".

Q: Why not?

K: I don't know.

Q: Because you have a motive when you say, "I love you". It is exclusive to that person.

K: In that exclusiveness is there a motive? So if there is a motive in that exclusive love of another, is that love? Therefore that's all. Now can you love that man, or that woman, without a motive? What is the difficulty?

Q: Can we use a different word from love?

K: He wants to introduce another word instead of love. Call it mud! You see how we refuse to stay with one thing and go through with it.

Q: What we are talking about is looking at our life.

K: I am sorry, you are not looking at your life or my life.

Q: I am going to say something else. Now, you are the one putting the questions. On the other hand it is very clear that all of us are here because we have a motive. We want to understand you.

K: Right sir. First of all you are not understanding me at all - not you only, please sir, please listen.

Q: All these abstractions...

K: Sir, would you mind, you have said enough. Please you have said enough, sir. I am going to answer, if you will permit me. Which is, you are not trying to understand what the speaker is saying. What the speaker is saying is, look at yourself. That's all. To look at yourself you must be aware, not aware of what K is teaching you, or telling you, but to be aware of what you are doing, why you are here. What is the motive behind your coming here. Are you aware of it, do you know your motive? To understand K, the speaker, or in talking over together you are understanding yourself. That's all. I have made this very, very clear from the very beginning when I began talking. But if you say, I am here to understand you, I say, there is nothing to understand, you are understanding empty words. That's very clear so don't let's go back to that.

What is the motive that you are here? One. What is the motive in your listening? What is the motive when you want to find out, to look at yourself? What is the motive behind the desire that says, look at yourself? Please may I beg of you to keep to this one point.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The gentleman says, I come here because I feel a sense of liberation, freedom. Sir, please, I am not asking your personal motive for coming here. This is not a group therapy. I hope it is not. No group therapy. I am asking you to investigate for yourself what is the motive, if you see the truth of this simple fact that when you have a motive, that motive is born of your conditioning, and you strengthen that conditioning. That's all. And therefore you cannot be aware of your conditioning.

Q: I see the motive but nothing happens.

K: He sees the motive but nothing happens.

Q: I come here each year with an urge to find a new motive, a refined motive - different forms of the same thing, modified, or continued.

K: What shall we do? I won't move from this. You can move, go away, get up and go, perfectly right. You are free to do what you like outside the tent, not inside the tent. Because inside the tent we are responsible.

So I am holding to this one fact: do you, as a human being, who is the representative of all humanity, I repeat that over and over again - the repetition becomes a lie if you repeat it without understanding it. Right? The speaker sees the fact, therefore his repetition is not propaganda, is not a lie, he is just showing you what it is. But if you take the words and repeat it, it will be a lie, it will be hypocrisy, it won't be honest. But if you see it for yourself that you are as a human being the total essence of all humanity - there is great beauty in that. And if the question arose, what do you mean by being totally aware, please explain it. I have explained it before the discussion began, what the speaker means by the perception of the whole, holistic. The word 'holistic' means something much more than the parts. And the something much more is not possible when you are holding on to the parts. Which is the part is my motive is different from your motive. But if both of us are free of motives we can both work, journey together.

So Mr Ortalani, etc., and all the others, after listening to this carefully, logically, sanely, are you free of motive? Don't answer me, find out. That is if you want to answer that question, is it possible to be totally aware, it is only possible when there is an observation.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Madam, we are talking about a motive, not about love. Does one see that where there is a motive there is a distorting factor? That's all. Stick to something factual, not move into some other factor.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, my friend, if you are here to resolve your problems with the speaker's help, you are not going to be helped. A simple fact. If you have a sexual, mental, fear, sorrow, any problem, they are not going to be solved with my help. And by talking over together, talking it over together, investigating together, exploring, then you yourself will help yourself - you are the humanity. That's all. Sir, if this doesn't please you for god's sake don't come. Go to some guru, church, do whatever you want, but if you here, if you are serious, let both of us meet on the same level. Right? On the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity. Right? Which is love. Otherwise we won't meet.

Q: How does one see the house is burning?

K: How does one see the house is burning? The newspapers tell you every morning, the radio tells you every evening, the televisions show you exactly what is happening. The news is printed all over the pages, and if you don't see the house is burning then something is amiss.

Q: Yes, but what I am saying is...

K: We haven't understood each other, sir. Let us drop the 'house is burning', and look at something else. Which is, are you here with a motive?

Q: Of course.

K: Yes. What is that motive? Don't tell me! What is the motive? Find out. If the motive is to follow the teachings of K then you are totally taking the wrong direction. But if you come here with a motive to understand and talk over together, to solve the problems not according to me, but observing yourself totally, then that motive will disappear and you will understand yourself.

Q: Once one sees the house is on fire...

K: I said leave the house on fire! I said what is the motive that you are here? Don't tell me but find out, etc. Sir please sit down. I have repeated this a hundred times. Either it is the difficulty of language - motive means move, a momentum, a drive, a desire, all that is implied in the word 'motive', move. What makes you move? Fear? Sorrow? Your ignorance of yourself? Then if that motive, which is the drive, momentum, and you are here, then let's talk it over together, not that you are copying K, or following his teachings, or this or that, because I am not your guru. Don't be a follower of anybody. But in talking over together you see yourself, see yourself totally. That is to be totally aware of yourself. Then when you are totally aware of yourself there is no problem.

Q: I cannot live without a motive but I would like to.

K: You cannot live without a motive but you wish to live without a motive. See the contradiction. I want to live without a motive but I have a motive, therefore there is conflict. Right? And if you like that conflict carry on. And if you see the futility of that conflict you examine both, why you have a motive, how the motives are born, the desire, the urge, the compulsion, the drive, the momentum that makes you do something. And the other which is merely a verbal communication, which has no reality. What has reality is your motive. And when you see that motive is born out of your conditioning, and therefore strengthens your conditioning, if you like it carry on.

What time is it? Isn't that enough for this morning?

Q: No.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is a motive complete? Motive is very complex. No, don't analyse it, for god's sake don't analyse it, just look at it. Look sir, please just listen to me. Why do I talk? Why do I go through this? For over fifty years I have done it, why? What is my motive? I am going to answer it. Listen to it. What is my motive? If I have a motive, you understand, which would be to help you, to see that you are free of sorrow, to see that you love, and then I would fight with you, force you, compel you, I would do all kinds of tricks with you, offer you heaven. Right? And I won't do that for the very simple reason that together we are going to look. We have created the world together, man and woman, baby, that also, but the world, society, morality, political structure, the economic structure, that we have created together. So please together. That means you have to look at yourself because yourself is the whole universe, yourself is the whole of humanity, therefore if you follow somebody else you are not a human being looking at yourself who is the whole of humanity. Because that man whom you follow is only taking a part, a segment, a tiny little observation. We are looking at the total observation. Right? That's enough for today.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 29TH JULY 1977.

K: I am sorry you have such a nasty morning.

We are going to have a dialogue, that is, an enquiry together as two friends who know each other fairly well, talking over their problems, and therefore without any aggression, without any assertion, but as a friendly enquiry into our problems. So what shall we talk over together, have a dialogue about this morning?

Q: What is the relationship between self knowledge and education, not only of children but of grown-ups as well?

K: Would you like to discuss that? Education not only of children, students, but also educating ourselves. What is the relationship between education and self knowledge? Do you want to discuss that, talk it over together?

Q: Sir, what is the relationship between discontent and meditation?

Q: What is the relationship between meditation and death?

K: The Brockwood people have got together on this, I see!

Q: Can you speak about the heart entering into the mind?

K: Is there any difference between heart and mind? That is, affection, care, consideration, non-aggression, and so on and so on, which are supposed to be the qualities of the heart, can that enter into the mind. But both the mind and the heart when they are really harmonious are one.

So shall we talk about, have a dialogue, about the relationship of self knowledge and education, not only of the student but also of the grown-ups; and what is the relationship between death and meditation; and discontent and meditation? Shall we start with those three, or have you another question? All right.

What is the relationship between self knowledge and education? One asks, if one is talking over together, two friends, what do we mean by education, and what do we mean by self knowledge? We must be clear before we find a relationship between the two, we must be clear what we mean by education, what we mean by self knowledge. So what do we mean by education? Most of us know how to read and write. Most of us have some kind of degrees, college, school, university, where you acquire a great deal of information about many subjects, or branch off into a particular subject and specialize in that subject, developing a skill so as to function in the world - if you want to function in the world. That is what we call education. That is the accepted norm, the meaning of education. But we question it. Right? We are questioning if that is all of education. Or is education not only the cultivation of various subjects and so on and so on, gathering knowledge, but also be concerned with the totality of man? Which apparently no school, no college, no university, is concerned - at least, as far as I know.

So what do we mean by education? If you are merely satisfied with the acquisition of knowledge, the cultivation of memory, and then use that memory skilfully in a particular branch of any livelihood, and so on, and so on, engineer, scientist, philosopher - the word 'philosopher' means the love of truth, the love of life, not speculating, theoretical, verbal, intellectual expressions. So proper education would apparently mean not only the cultivation of knowledge but also the cultivation of the whole of man. Right? Now is that possible in a school, in a college, in a university - the cultivation of the total human existence, human being? I believe we neglect all that field, all that side, and cultivate extraordinary capacities, technological and so on. We know this.

Now the questioner asks, what is the relationship between self knowledge and education. So we have more or less verbally expressed what we mean by education.

And what do we mean by self knowledge? This 'know thyself' has been a catch word, or a slogan, for millenia; the Greeks said it, the ancient Indians said it. And what do we mean by that word 'know yourself'? Can you ever know yourself? Please, we are questioning, I am not laying down any law. Please, we will discuss this. Can we know ourselves ever? Can I say to myself, "I know myself"? Is that ever possible? And when you say, "I know myself", in it is involved a certain conceit, a certain sense of arrogance of achievement - right - that one has really deeply investigated into oneself and has come to a conclusion. And that conclusion gives you the assurance that you know yourself. Right? This is what we call knowing yourself. Now I want to question that.

So we are questioning both the self knowledge and education, and their relationship with each other in a school, college, university, and daily life. Is that all right? I am talking, why don't you? Please, have a dialogue, let's have a dialogue about it. One sends one's children to a school - the State demands it and so on and so on. So you send them. And they are taught there something totally different from their daily life, from childhood. As they grow up the contradiction grows more and more and more. This is inevitable, you must have seen it in your own life. That the acquisition of knowledge has become tremendously important because it gives one a social security - social security being you can earn a livelihood, in that there is a security, a job, and all the rest of it. So the cultivation of knowledge, which is memory, gathering information and storing it up in the brain as memory, and using that memory skilfully, which will earn us a livelihood, and neglecting the whole area of human existence.

When you send the children to school, they are being trained to conform. Right? Would you question this statement? They are trained to conform, conform to the left ideology, central ideology or extreme right ideology, religious, Catholic, Protestant, Hindu. So they are being very carefully conditioned - right - both at home and at school. And as they grow up they live within that conditioned area. Right? Am I saying something extravagant? I hope you are going to discuss. They live in that conditioned area, they accept all the traditions of that society - wars, you know the whole business.

Now he says to me, the questioner says, what is the relationship between self knowledge and education. There is none as we understand education means now. It is only when you don't quite fit into the society you are called neurotic, you have problems. And then you go to the analysts, or the psychotherapists, and they try to somehow help you to conform. So what is relationship between the two? When do we begin to enquire, if we do at all, into the whole structure and the nature of the self? Do we ever do that?

Q: Is it possible if I don't know myself?

K: But do we ever say, I don't know myself? Do we ever question, ask, what is it all about - my action, my living, the wars, the conflicts, the misery, the relationship between man and woman, the everlasting struggle? We never ask what is this human being who is caught in this? We only ask that question to understand oneself when we are in a tremendous crisis. Right? Please, I am not...

Q: I think that education is developing skill, and know thyself is relative.

K: I understand, madam, but we are talking first of what is actually happening in the world. Your theories or my theories, but what is going on with your children and other children. In that, in schools, there is neither compassion, nor clarity, nor the communication of that clarity and compassion through skill. That doesn't exist. It only exists as a theory because you have heard me talk about it. Or you might have read about it somewhere. But actually - deal with facts - not what you or I think education should be. If we know what the facts are then we can move from there. But if we start with theories we are lost - we have your theory, and somebody else's theory, and we never get together. If we take what actually is happening in all the schools throughout the world - the speaker has been to many, many schools in the west, and here, and all the rest of it, there are five schools in India with which we are concerned, and Brockwood and so on, Canada and Ojai, California. So please let us deal with facts.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, there are exceptional schools. There are one or two rare schools, perhaps in Germany, perhaps in England, one or two, who are concerned with the total education of man. Right? Don't let us say, your school is better than mine.

To educate, we said, as it actually takes place, is to cultivate memory. That memory is used skilfully as knowledge in earning a livelihood. So society demands that every human being has some kind of skill to earn a livelihood, or help the student to conform to a particular ideology, and so on and so on.

So we are asking: what is the relationship between the two - self knowledge and education? We know what education more or less is, except there are exceptional schools. I don't know any but there are, let's hope for humanity's sake there are exceptional schools. When do we ask this question, that is, I want to know myself? When do we ever ask, if we are at all thoughtful, do we ever ask it? Do we say, I must know myself, otherwise there is no education. When do we ask it?

Q: When we suffer.

K: When do you ask? When you suffer. Then what takes place when you suffer? Do you say, "Why am I suffering? What is the root of suffering"? Or do you say - please I am just asking, I am not laying down - or do you say, "I want to escape from it, I want comfort, I am lonely, desperately lonely, I have lost everything, I have lost the person I thought I loved, I am left completely lonely in this world"? Right? Then there is suffering, and that suffering makes you seek comfort, rely on somebody, come to a conclusion, and so on and so on, turn to god, or whatever you prefer. So you really never ask yourself actually, if you are truthful to yourself, never ask oneself, "What am I, what is this?" Right?

Now we are saying, let us examine both and see their relationship, if there is such a thing as separate education and self knowledge as something separate. I don't know if you see. Are the two things separate? You understand? We have divided it as education and self knowledge. Then we try to find a relationship between the two. But I question very seriously whether the two are separate.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You yourself, our friend says, you yourself have separated, the physical, the psychological and so on. So this leads somewhere else, that is, is the psychological enquiry, does it affect psychosomatically? You know what that is? If there is psychologically perfect health, psychologically, perfect health in the sense no conflict, sanity, no me and you, psychologically there is no division, that does surely affect the physical: one is much more healthy, vigorous and all the rest of it.

So we are now asking, please, what is the relationship between the two, and is there a division at all between the self enquiring into what is the 'me' and education? Are you meeting this question, sir? Right?

How am I, as a teacher, not sitting on the platform, I don't mean that, in a school, how am I to convey to the students both the acquisition of physiological facts - knowledge, mathematics, history, geography and all the rest of it - and also in the very teaching of those subjects cultivate the enquiry to look at himself as the representative of all that. I wonder if I am making myself clear.

If I am a teacher of history, how am I to help the student not only to know the meaning of history, which is the story of man, and also help him to understand himself, who is the man? Are you catching what I am saying? Right? Does this interest you? Or you say, for god's sake let's talk not about education because I have no children - just a minute sir - and drop that and let's talk about our personal problems? Which is it? Are you interested in this? Be sure because this is not entertainment.

So how am I, a teacher in a school, to help him to understand himself through the subject which I am teaching, which is history? Right? We have talked a great deal about this in various schools so I am rather good at it! Sorry, I didn't mean that!

History is the story of man. Right? The wars, the kings, the tyrannies, the so-called cultural evolution of man from the Stone Age and all the rest of it. How am I to teach him history so that through history he is understanding himself, which is the total development of man? Right? Now how am I to do it? If you are the teacher put yourself in the position of a teacher, and how are you to teach history that way? Mathematics, or physics, anything? That's the only way to cultivate self knowledge and at the same time acquire knowledge of various subjects, so that they are not separate, they are always moving together, flowing together.

Q: Sir, I don't know myself, can I be a teacher?

K: Can I be a teacher of this kind if I don't know myself first? Right? So you are saying, let the house burn while I am... That is, I must understand myself first before I do anything. You see the falseness of it?

Q: No, I...

K: No, please sir, look at it, sir. Must I wait until I have complete knowledge of myself before I teach in a school?

Q: Not in a general school but in a school of this kind.

K: In a school of this kind - all right, I'll accept that for the moment. Which means what? I can't teach until I know myself wholly. If that is so then the children, the students, are being thrown to the wolves. Not knowing the importance of self knowledge, or what is the right kind of education, we are saying a teacher who is interested in both, in the very teaching of it he is learning himself. In teaching history and his relationship to the student, the student and myself, in the very act of teaching I am discovery how I am acting, what I am thinking, what my motive is, so there is constant enquiry, not only into the history and teaching but also as I am teaching I am discovering myself. That's what we are trying to do in the various schools. I won't mention schools. Don't get interested, I am not doing propaganda. That is, when the teacher is really interested in self knowledge and education, and tries to find out how to teach through history - I am taking one particular subject - through history to find out what he is and learn at the same time the whole story of man. This can be done surely if the teacher is really interested in this.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I know that is why we want to have special teachers' educational centre - I am not going into all that. We are going to do it.

Q: What I mean is I am a teacher myself. I would like to discuss what will you do at this centre?

K: Madam, how can one answer such a question? I have a son - I haven't, but suppose I have a son. I can't afford to send him to the right kind of school because I haven't the money, my husband and I have separated. This is a common occurrence in modern society, the breaking up of the family, and I am left with two or three children. Right? What am I to do? Go on, sirs, it's your job, enquire. I have to earn money to support them, work like a slave for these four children, or two children, or one child, and educate them in the right sense, because one has thought about it. As there are no such schools, except very, very few, what are you going to do? You follow, sir? Go into it. You should think before you have children, before you get married, of the whole thing, not afterwards. Right? We are always thinking what shall we do when it is a fait accompli, not before. You say, I am going to get married, if I want to marry, or have children, what is going to happen? That is the self knowing - you understand? But not say, well, I have got four children, for god's sake what am I going to do. There is the State that will help you and so on. Or there are special schools where you can have scholarships and all that. So don't let's enter into that.

So what is a teacher to do? A teacher of the right kind, not who just says, I am bored with all the other work, at least I can become a teacher. And therefore - you follow. Generally the teachers are those who can't get into business, who can't earn a lot of money, who this and that and that, so they eventually become teachers. I don't mean that there are not exceptions. There are exceptions, thank god. Right?

So what shall we do now? How shall I teach history, mathematics, if I am a teacher, so as to convey both the acquisition of knowledge and also at the same time to know oneself? I think if the teacher is really interested it is a creative thing, you discover; you don't say you are going to teach in this way or that way, then the teacher gets bored. But if he is creative, interested, it flows out of him. Right?

Q: The best teacher is one who knows himself and what he teaches.

K: Yes, that is what we are saying. Are we saying something different from you?

Q: No.

K: All right. The other question is - have we discussed sufficiently that point - the other question is: what is the relationship between discontent and meditation? We will come to you afterwards. What is the relationship between discontent and meditation? What do you think? As we said, discontent most of us have. Either it becomes an all consuming flame, or it is soon satisfied, smothered by getting married, by having a job, by having children, or by joining some society, community, or becoming some ideologist. You follow? That flame which should be burning is gradually smothered. That is a fact. One is totally discontented with society, with the establishment, with short hair, grows long hair, you know the whole thing that goes on. So can discontent never be smothered? Never. Though you may have children, wife, never that flame wither away, die, become ashes. Go on sirs, investigate into yourselves as we are talking. Right, dialogue. I don't seem to have any dialogue. That's one problem: whether it is possible to keep the discontent at its highest excellence. Excellence means to reach the top of the mountain. Mediocrity means to go half way. Right? We are explaining what the dictionary says.

And meditation. What is meditation? Not all the childish stuff, not all the immature gurus with their immature disciples, but what is real meditation? We said that, we said real meditation is to empty the content of one's consciousness. That is, no jealousy, no anger, the whole content without effort. We went into that.

So can these two move together, or must they be separate, or the very discontent, keeping that flame alive is a form of meditation? You get it?

Q: Sir, it seems very often that discontent means rebel against somebody or some group.

K: That's right, sir.

Q: How can we feel discontent without making a cause?

K: If discontent has a cause - you are following - then the effect of it is to be satisfied by joining this or that, or by doing this or that - if there is a cause. Now is there a discontent without cause? I wonder if you see this. Suppose one is discontented, not with society, with my wife, or with my group, or with my friends, but discontent. Don't you know that? No? Not with something, or I want something and I can't get it therefore I am discontent. I want to be a great man, I can't because I haven't the capacity and I am terribly discontent, frustrated. So I channel, there is a channelling that particular discontent along certain lines so that it is gradually diminished and dies. So we are asking: is there a discontent without cause?

Q: It has to have some relation with actuality.

K: The actuality is, sir, the actuality is I am discontent with my society, I am discontent with the pattern which society has given me, I am discontent with the education I am getting, I am discontent because I don't want to have a job, go to university and get a job, but I want to do something entirely different - wander the world with a little money, or help along. So that way you will observe, if you have gone into it sufficiently deeply, that gradually this discontent withers away. Right? Haven't you noticed this? Some people are ardent leftists, extreme leftists, the moment they get married and a job the thing quiets down. We happen to know many of such people, of course there are exceptions - don't jump on the exceptions.

So we are asking: discontent is to keep that thing alive, flaming. Which is to be discontent with tradition, with the tradition of wars, the tradition of belonging to a group, the tribal instinct of the tradition of saying, my group and your group, we and they. Now in enquiring into all that which is the outcome of discontent is a form of meditation, isn't it? Which is, in enquiring why I accept, one accepts, religious authority, or even political authority, or ideological authority, in enquiring into that one discovers one accepts it because one is frightened to stand by oneself - the fear of loneliness. So that fear of loneliness is smothered by saying, I must be with you, I must escape. So the understanding of that fear is part of meditation. Right? So the highest form of discontent is freedom. Right? The excellence of discontent brings freedom. Do it, sirs, not verbally accept it. See the depth of such a thing.

So discontent and meditation go together. Right? If you are content with the system, a guru, or what ancient people have described, then you accept it and practise it, you are smothering discontent. But if you say, look, what do you mean by it, why should I accept any system of meditation? Who are you to tell me how I am to meditate? There are lots of teachers who are giving lessons how to meditate, which is the acceptance of authority. When you question it, the flame is keeping alive.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Ah, no discontent brings freedom.

Q: Because discontent is merely suffering.

K: Discontent, he says, is merely suffering. Because you suffer because you can't get something out of discontent. I am married to a woman I don't like, I am discontent.

So now let's go on to something else: he said, what is the relationship between death and meditation. Right? Are you interested in all this? Not interested, is it part of your life? You see let us approach death with total discontent. Right? Will you? That is, not accept any form of comfort, any form of explanation, approach it with any idea, or be afraid to understand what death is. So is there a tremendous discontent to find out? Which means there is no fear. Right? There is no seeking of comfort, no me, what is going to happen to me? So can we approach it that way?

One may be married, have children. The man goes out and may have an accident, killed, and the wife is left alone with children. She feels terribly lonely. Right? Don't you know all this? Lonely, desperate. And she is not really concerned about death, the whole meaning of death, but she is concerned about herself and what is going to happen to the children, who is going to support them. I have lost somebody whom I loved, and so on and so on. One never says, all right, I want to find out what death is. You understand what I am talking about? Can we go into this that way? Which is, approach it with total discontent, not knowing where it will lead me. Right? Can you do that? There is no hope. You know, I don't know if you know what it means to have no hope - not to be depressed, not to say, my god, I am lost. But hope is born out of despair. Right? When there is no despair there is no hope. Right? I wonder. Why is there a despair? Because one is left alone. This sense of great loneliness. One may have a lot of money, children will be properly educated, you may have a house, or whatever it is, there is this intense feeling of desperate loneliness. Don't you know it all? Don't you know it? You may have friends, you may live with lots of people in a group, and there is occasional intimation of this extraordinary sense of isolation, loneliness, without any relationship with anybody. Haven't you had all this? You see then, specially when you are young, one doesn't know what to do. Right? One has no sense of direction, no somebody whom you can trust. Nothing, you are just left absolutely alone. Has it ever happened to any of you?

Then there is the fear of that loneliness. And fear being much stronger than loneliness, you escape from it. Right? You know all this. You escape from it, you run away from it, you smother it, you do everything not to be frightened, or you say, I must face this loneliness. And when you force yourself to face this loneliness there is nothing, it doesn't respond, there is no answer because you are building a wall of resistance against it. I wonder if you know all this. No? We are talking about something very common to every human being.

And the question then is to understand what loneliness means. To go into loneliness, what does it mean, how does it come about? Right? Don't we every day of our life, in our activity - of course there are always exceptions, so don't let's talk about the exceptions - isn't there in our daily life, our activities are always isolating ourselves? No? You understand? One goes to the office, or the factory, or some kind of work, there you are climbing the ladder of success, you want to become something, higher, and higher, which is a form of isolation, isn't it? No? When a local priest wants to become the archbishop it is the same pattern, or a communist, or a commune leader wants it.

So through these activities one is gradually enclosing oneself, building a wall round oneself. We are doing it. Do face this. Every day we are doing it. And one day suddenly this loneliness becomes real. One has carefully brought it about - my wife, my god, my country, my ideals - isolation. And my success, my ambitions, I must do something better than you. All this is a form of bringing about isolation, which is the ultimate expression of loneliness. Right? This sense of having no relationship with anybody, or with anything, even nature doesn't tell you, you have nothing.

So can one look at that loneliness, not escape from it, not try to cover it up, nor try to fill it with companionship, with knowledge, with a dozen things, but just to observe that loneliness? Observe - we went into that - without direction, without motive, without wanting to change it, just to observe completely that sense of intense loneliness. Right? Then are you doing it as we are talking?

Q: Krishnaji, I don't think we do it as you talk. We listen to you and then think of putting it into practice.

K: Oh no, no, we have been through all that. Don't put anything into practice, least of all what we are talking about. You can put into practice what other people say, but here, at least while you are in the tent don't put anything that the speaker is saying into practice, then you are dead.

So we are saying, can you live with that loneliness, observe it without wanting to go beyond it, suppress it, run away from it, without giving it any direction, which means - listen to it carefully - thought has created that loneliness by your activities, and thought then says, "I must escape from it". So can you look at it without any movement of thought? Without any movement of thought. Then you will see for yourself it doesn't exist at all. You have gone beyond it - not you, it doesn't exist. Then a totally different kind of thing comes about, which is you are alone. Alone is different from loneliness. Alone means, the word itself means 'all one'. It doesn't mean all of you I am.

Now he says, death and meditation, can you approach death without any single movement of thought? That is what it means. When one actually, physically, biologically dies that is what is going to happen. Right? Are we clear? You may be lonely, greedy, envious, all the rest of it, belonging to right, left, centre, extreme right, extreme left, all that, but when death comes it says, "Don't argue with me, old boy, you are finished"!

So can we come to it having finished all this? You understand? That means, having no fear, having no attachment. That's is what death is going to tell you at the end, it says, you can't have your house, you can't carry your money with you, your bank accounts are closed, you are leaving your wife, your favourite chair, everything you are leaving behind. Right? So can you do it now - leave your favourite chair? Now to do that, leave no attachment of any kind, to a belief, to a dogma, to a conclusion, and leave your fears, your pleasures, your attachments now, then what is the relationship of that to meditation? Right? To leave, say for instance, to put away attachment without conflict - if you have a conflict then you cultivate detachment, which is the opposite. I wonder if you understand this? Detachment then leads to indifference, callousness. Right? You are following this? So being attached, not to become detached, callous, indifference, brutality, violence, all the rest of it, but without effort to cut lose everything. You understand? That is, to loosen the threads of attachment without effort, that is part of meditation. Right? Because the investigation of attachment shows that you are dependent on somebody, or on something. When you are dependent on something you become that. Right? When one is attached to one's favourite chair you are that favourite chair. Right? So to enquire into it, without compulsion, without motive, is a form of meditation. Right?

So the understanding of death comes through meditation. Which is, death means ending of your pleasure, complete ending of your pleasure - sexual, religious, etc., etc. And death doesn't argue with you, doesn't say, "Old boy, I'll give you another day" - or a week. He says, "Look, it is there, at your door". So the investigation into attachment, fear and so on, is the movement of meditation, which is the enquiry into the whole structure of thought. Right? They are all linked together. You understand? So when you are enquiring into attachment, you are attached because you are lonely, you are attached because you haven't solved this enormous feeling of guilt, loneliness, separation, wanting to be something, and being incapable of fulfilling what you want, therefore feeling frustration, bitterness, anger, hate, all that. To enquire into it without any motive, if you have a motive enquire why you have a motive. That motive is the response of your conditioning. Enquiry, you know, if you observe it will tell you everything. But we are so eager to read the book, the book of ourselves, we are so eager, we want to know everything very quickly. But if you just observe, the book will tell you instantly everything. And I mean it. It will tell you everything about yourself. It will tell you, if you observe without direction, without motive, without fear and all the rest of it, the whole story of yourself instantly, not chapter by chapter, page by page, it shows everything wholly. Do it!

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Are you saying, sir, if I understand it rightly, I can't hear it properly, are you saying: what is the relationship between discontent, and affection, and love? Is that it, sir?

Q: I don't understand what you mean by discontent without a cause.

K: The questioner says, I don't understand what is discontent without a goal.

Q: A cause.

K: Without a cause. The cause is a goal! You see the truth of it? That was quick! The gentleman doesn't understand what is discontent without cause. Sir, what do we mean by a cause? You put a pin into my knee there is pain, that is the cause. Pin, pain, connects through nerves to the brain and the response is pain. There is the cause and the effect. Just follow this two minutes. There is the cause and the effect. They are never separate. We have separated them. Right? Do you see that? Cause, effect, the effect becomes the cause for the next effect. I wonder if you see that? Right? So it is a chain, it is one continuous chain - not cause something, and effect something else. Follow it closely, a little bit.

I am coming to something, I just saw something. Cause and effect, the effect becomes the cause, and so it is a continuous chain in which action is always limited. So the cause becomes the means, or is the means different from the cause? Sir, this requires a little bit - think it over with me, will you follow it?

One has observed cause, effect. One smokes endlessly, the effect is cancer in your lungs. So the cause creates the effect, the effect becomes the cause for the next effect. So it is a constant chain. So action is always within this field of enclosure. Right? So the means of action is never free from the cause. Are you getting something? Oh, yes, I see it. Right? One wants to create a beautiful society, a lovely society, therefore the cause is that, and to create that I must destroy lots of people because they are in the way. So the means doesn't matter, the end matters. The end matters, therefore the means doesn't matter. So the cause without means, the effect is to destroy you. Whereas there is only means, no cause and effect. I wonder if you see that? No, no. Don't agree with me. I am not quite sure. There is only means, no cause and no effect. Wait. I'll find out. Means - the doing. Right? The doing. The very doing is the means. I have got it now, I can go.

When there is cause the means is not important, the effect is important. So you are only concerned always with the cause and the effect, and never realizing the effect becomes the cause. So we are never concerned with the means, never. And the means is the doing - not to achieve an end, but the doing.

Q: The doing...

K: One moment.

Q: The doing is the actual.

K: That means the doing is the means. The doing is without a cause and effect, therefore the means is all important. Yes, sir, I have got it. I'll battle with you.

So the gentleman asks: I don't understand what you mean by discontent without cause. If there is a cause for discontent, then discontent is the effect, but it is not discontent at all. I wonder if you see that. If I have a cause to be angry, because you hit me or you said something to me, the cause, and the effect is always a result - I hit you back, or I call you by a name, or I wait until I am stronger than you then... all the rest of it. So in that process there is no means. The means is the very fact of discontent, not the cause and the effect. I wonder if I am making myself clear? Have I explained this question, sir, to you, who asked this question?

Q: No.

K: I have gone too far. I am saying when there is a cause for discontent it is not discontent. That's very simple.

Q: Would you say that cause and effect are on the level of the ideal and the means are on the level of time?

K: Sir, look, what is action? Just look at it, please look at it for a minute. I must stop, what time is it?

Q: Ten to twelve.

K: I must stop talking. What was I going to say?

Q: Action.

K: Action. If you are acting because you have a cause, that is, you have an idea, or a principle, or a conclusion from which you are acting, that acting is not action. Action, the meaning of the word action means doing, now. Not doing according to a principle. I wonder if you see. It is very simple. We have translated action as doing something according to a cause, a principle, an idea, a conclusion, or an ideal, a belief. Either action based on the past or on the future, therefore it is not action; action means doing, the active present. Verbally, in the verbs, not having done, or will do, but doing. Therefore the doing is the means. Got it? I must stop.

Sirs, look, this is meant to be a dialogue and I am talking all the time.

Q: What do you mean by dialogue?

K: I explained, madam, perhaps you were not here at the beginning. A dialogue means a conversation between two friends, between two people who are interested in the same subjects seriously, want to find an answer, not quarrel over words, ideas, but two really good friends who say, let's talk about this.

Q: It doesn't seem possible. I think the microphone is in the way.

K: If the microphone were not here I don't think you would hear.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 30TH JULY 1977.

K: What shall we talk over this morning?

Q: We had a very deep investigation into death and meditation yesterday. The other day we went into awareness. If we could go on, that is, is there an awareness of truth, whether that exists beyond the word? And if it does can this awareness happen?

Q: Could we talk about 'abreaction' and the effect on personal growth, on experiences such as 'the process' you experienced in 1922, the development for person growth.

K: I am not quite clear about that question.

Q: 'Abreaction' - the aspect of the process of what you experienced on August 20 1922, and the effect of such experiences on the personal development.

K: Sorry. What language do you speak, sir?

Q: Italian.

K: Speak in Italian.

Q: (In Italian)

Q: Sir, is thought employed to realize this radical transformation? And can we know anything which is not in the field of thought, including this awareness? If we employ thought through investigation and through enquiry then is that thought, is that process going to promote this change, this dimension which we speak of in which there is no movement of thought?

Q: Why has thought become such a beastly little heaven?

Q: That is not what I am asking.

Q: No, it is what I am asking.

K: Would you make your question short?

Q: OK. Is thought used, is thought employed to realize, to bring about, to comprehend this radical transformation?

K: I am afraid I haven't understood. Would you speak louder.

Q: I don't know how to make it clearer. I am asking if it is thought that does the investigation, that does the enquiry?

K: I see. Is it thought that enquires, is it thought that observes, is it thought that explores.

Q: Yes. And does that process of that bring about this transformation?

K: Ah. Does that process bring about change, transformation.

Q: Change, right. Thank you.

Q: Sir, I am sorry to repeat the question again. The other day you were kind enough to explain to me but I have confused it. How can thought see its movement?

K: How can thought see its own movement. Right, sir.

Q: Please, sir, in the western tradition there has been a question that all philosophers and thinkers have written about and thought deeply about, and that is: what is man's place in nature. Now with regard to what you have talked about, in the total awareness where there is love, silence and total space, what is nature and what is man's place in nature? Thank you.

K: What is nature... would you repeat it slowly, sir, don't make it too long.

Q: OK. In that total awareness that you have spoken about where there is love, etc., in regard to that, what is nature, what is our perception of nature, what does nature become, and what is our place in that?

K: In this total awareness, in which there is love and so on, what is the relationship between that awareness and nature.

Q: I had to stop at something yesterday, and I would just like to know if you think this is OK.

K: Make it short, please.

Q: I am lonely because I live with motivation. When I drop motivation I have love. But you can't have love when you still have motivation. I won't be lonely any more when I drop motivation.

K: Sorry I haven't got it.

Q: Shall I do it again slowly?

K: Please, make it short.

Q: I am lonely because I live with motivation. When I drop motivation I have love because you can't have love when there is still motivation. So I can't be lonely when I drop motivation. Do you understand?

K: When I drop motivation there is love and... what?

Q: Well I just discovered for myself if I drop all motivation I am left with love. So if I have only love I can't be lonely. And loneliness is having motivation.

K: I think we will go into that. Right? There have been so many questions. The first one was: in this awareness what is truth; why does thought have such an extraordinary deep rooted importance in our life; and the gentleman asked also - I have forgotten. Sir, may we take one question out of all this, and go into that one question which perhaps will answer all the other questions. Can we do that madam, can we do that sir?

Q: I don't think we can do it, sir. I can't see that you can do it. They are all different questions.

K: I think if we can take one question you will see it. I think the gentleman who asked the first question, which was: what is the relationship of awareness and truth? I think if we could take that one question, though there are contradictory questions, personal and that which we talked about the other day, so I think if we take this one question we will see if we can get all the others in, however contradictory they are. May we try it? May we, sir?

He asked a question, which was: what is the relationship between truth and awareness? Would you like to put that question in a different way? What is the relationship of actual facts and truth? Right, would that be right? I am asking you, sir.

Q: Yes.

K: What is the relationship of violence, which is an actual fact, to truth? What is the actual relationship to a recognized, well known factor in oneself as envy, greed, fear, to truth? What is truth? We will come to that. I daren't touch it for the moment. But we can go into this question by being aware what is reality? Fact, facts, 'what is', reality, truth.

What would we call facts? What would you say, or describe, or talk about, 'what is', actually 'what is', not theoretical, not abstracted, not an abstraction, or a supposition. When we say 'fact', 'what is', what do we mean by those two words? Right? Facts. The fact is that there is war. Right? The fact is that human beings are violent. The fact is there are national divisions, political divisions, religious divisions, ideological divisions. Right? You and me division, the woman and the man division. And the fact is where there is division there is conflict - the Jew, the Arab and so on and so on, the Muslim and the Hindu, and so on. So where there is division there is conflict. That is a fact. That is a law. Right?

Now what is reality then? Is fact different from reality? And is reality different from truth? You understand? Please this needs a little bit of enquiry into this. The questioner asked also: in observation is there transformation morally - if I understood that question rightly. Now we are going to observe together this problem, this question. The fact, what actually is going on, reality, and truth. We said facts, or what actually is - short, tall, broad, brown, white hair, pink and so on, black. Those are facts. The conclusions from those facts - like and dislike - though they are reality as illusions. Right? Reality - no, I must go slowly.

So fact, 'what is', reality and truth. What is the relationship between these three? Is this clear? Let's move. Don't be impatient, please.

Q: Sir, is the fact a fact without words?

K: Is a fact without words. I make a gesture, that is without words, but it is a fact. I look at you, friendly, or with antagonism. That's a fact, there is no word. That's one point.

What is reality? Let's come to the next. What is reality, the real, the actual? Would you say everything that thought has created is reality? Thought has created this tent. Right? It is a reality. Thought has created this microphone. It is a reality. Right? Thought has created the various illusions, which is a reality. Because it is created, one lives with it. You are following? Whatever thought creates is a reality - the building, technological things that thought has produced technologically, computers, televisions and so on. Everything that thought has created is a reality, including the illusions that thought has created. Nationality is an illusion. Right? And god is an illusion, thought has created it. Right? But thought has not created nature - the tree, the things that are outside. Right? But the chair, made out of the wood of a tree is a reality. Please, right? Thought has not created nature, but thought making a chair out of a tree is a reality. So thought has not created nature. One of the questions was: what is the relationship of man and nature. Right?

So there are these things: facts, which thought has created also, I am and I am not, I must be, I will be, I have been; or I will evolve slowly, or that there is no evolution at all psychologically, and so on. The building, the instruments of war, the churches, and the things that are in the churches, all the rituals, all the adorations of images made by the mind or by the hand, are still the product of thought. Right? And the illusions surrounding these churches, the gods within, the saviours within, are all created by thought which are illusions. Right, is this clear? Are we all together in this? It is not very difficult.

So what is the relationship then of reality to truth? Right? Or is there no relationship at all? Does this interest you, all this?

Q: I'd like to know what sort of work one should be doing.

K: Sir, if we understand what kind of life we are, what we are, from self knowledge action takes place. Sir, we have divided action as though it was something totally different from ourselves. Right? We are investigating into really what is total action, which we are coming to - what is total action in our daily life? Right? Look, what shall I do? Let me put it this way, what shall I do confronted with all this confusion, misery, suffering, uncertainty, what shall I do? The country is demanding one thing, society wanting me to do something else, the priest asks me something else. You follow? Amidst is all this immense confusion, which is the right action? That is the question he is asking. What is the right action? Is there right action if I am caught in an illusion? I am in some kind of illusion, such as, I love my god. That is an illusion, because god - if you don't mind, I hope you will not think me blasphemous, or absurd - god is created by thought. No?

Q: Thought is created by what?

K: I am afraid. I am afraid of the future, there is nobody upon whom I can depend, there is somebody who must be protect me, the father figure. And I want to feel consoled by the image which I have created and I say, that's god. Thought has created it. Sorry. I hope you don't mind. Which doesn't mean I am an atheist, on the contrary. That is not god, something else is god.

So I am caught in this illusion that somebody is going to look after me, some superior entity, an outside agency, a god, a guru, or whatever it is, the State. Now in that illusion, which is an illusion, what is right action? Right action can only take place when I have no illusion. Right? When I have no illusion that I am much more superior than anybody else. So action can only take place when the mind is totally free from all illusion. That's obvious. If I am neurotic I can't act rightly. That's obvious. If I am confused I can't act rightly. If I am caught in a particular form of prejudice with its conclusions I can't act rightly. So there must be freedom from all this to act rightly, in daily life, whether it is politics, religion, my wife, children, everything. As long as there is an illusion of any kind action, total action is not possible. That's actually what we are examining: facts, thought creating the microphone which is a reality, it is not an illusion, the building, the tent is not an illusion, the chair is not an illusion, and nature - the tree, the mountains, the sky, the moon, the everlasting stars and the beauty of stars, that is not created by thought. But thought has created illusion which are realities. You follow?

So by investigating very carefully, as we are doing now, what is illusion, and what is reality? If thought has created the tent, and thought also creates various forms of illusion, so both are realities. But there must be recognition, or perception, or awareness, or observation that the church, the building is not an illusion, but what is contained within the church, or in the mosque, or in the temple, is illusion created by man. This is all very simple. Once you see this it becomes extraordinarily clear. Right? Are we meeting each other? Are we?

So to find out what truth is, to let it happen, like spring, like a flower, like the water flowing, let it happen, that can only come about when the mind has put everything in order. Right?

Q: How do you define the word truth?

K: I don't define truth.

Q: But...

K: Sir, sir, you haven't even listened to what I am saying.

Q: I have.

K: I am sorry, you are not, when you are asking a question what is truth, describe truth, I haven't come to it yet. You are asking something which I haven't even enquired into yet. We are enquiring into facts, into reality - reality, as we said, everything that thought has created including the illusions. But thought has not created the mountain, the rivers, the trees, nature. So what is the relationship of man to nature? Which was one of the questions. If man lives within the illusion which he has created he has no relationship. Right? But man without illusion, and seeing what thought has created, and thought has not created nature, and therefore puts thought in its right place, then he has a relationship to nature. I wonder if you get this?

Q: To give up illusions is a very painful process.

K: We are not giving up anything. There is no sacrifice, there is no "I must give up this in order to get that", but to observe this. To observe - please, sir, this is very important, if you would just follow this - to observe what thought has created, and what thought has not created, to observe the illusion - to observe, not say, it is right, or wrong, I must give it up, to see that thought has created illusion as well as the building. The building is necessary, illusions are not necessary: to see that, to observe it, there is no fear, it is a fact. So when you observe the fact there is no fear. I wonder if you see it?

Q: What I don't see is...

K: Have you understood what I said just now?

Q: What I don't see is if thought is creating the illusions...

K: No, no. So we have to discover, we have to find out what it is to observe. Right? We are now going to enquire together into what does it mean to observe. I can observe you with thought. Right? Thought can observe you, say, yes, he is an Irish man, he is a German, long hair, short hair, like and dislike. Right? And being conditioned I don't like Irishmen, or I love Irishmen and not the Englishman. You follow? Now is that observation? Is it one form of observation? Right? A very limited form of observation. But if I want to observe there must be no movement of thought. Right? I wonder if you see that. I want to observe you, just look at you. But if I am prejudiced I can't look, my prejudice is looking. Right? So is there an observation of my prejudice - not that I observe my prejudice, because prejudice is the 'I'. I wonder if you see that. So is there an awareness of prejudice, saying, yes, I am prejudiced? That is an awareness of your prejudice.

So there is an observation without thought, without the movement of thought with its prejudices, with its like and dislike. In this context there is another problem, which is, in observation there is a certain sensitivity. Right? If you observe very closely without any prejudice the sensory activity becomes much more acute and therefore there is more sensitivity. Now the question is there, if I may go into it a little bit: when you are sensitive do you have more pain, more suffering? Go on sir, answer it. I am asking you a question, which is, when there is sensitivity, not that you become sensitive - see the difference, please. I said through observation, without prejudice and so on, there is the sharpening of all the senses, therefore there is greater sensitivity to smell, to taste, to see the trees, the mountains, the rivers, the faces. And being sensitive acutely - when there is sensitivity is the suffering much greater? Or when I am sensitive then everything affects me, either greater pleasure or greater suffering. I wonder if you see the difference? Right?

So we are saying, observe the reality. Reality is everything that thought has created, including the various neurotic activities, neurotic behaviour, neurotic assumptions, and illusions. Right? Those are all creations of thought - to observe it, not thought observes it. I wonder if you see. Are you meeting me, are we getting somewhere, am I meeting you?

Q: No.

K: Sir, can you look at this tent without thought - thought being naming it as tent, seeing the structure, how the arch, the cross bars, without using the words, without thought saying, it is a tent, just to observe? Isn't that possible?

Q: Is that a kind of hypnotism?

K: Oh, for god's sake.

Q: I can't see this.

K: Just to observe, sir, it is not hypnotism. You know what that word means? I don't know if we are talking English, or not.

Q: There is observing, or no observing at all. If you observe the tent you are here, if you are not here you are not observing the tent.

K: Of course not. When you are observing a word called tent you are not actually observing the tent. You are only observing the word. I wonder if you get it.

Q: If I look, I...

K: Sir, look at yourself.

Q: It is much more complicated to look at yourself than just observing the tent.

K: We have said that before.

Q: The actions are on different levels but are going on all the time.

K: We said it is easy to observe a tent, but it is much more complex to observe another human being. We have been into that very, very carefully in the talks and the discussions, I won't go into that again.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, this becomes so impossible. Each man interprets it in his own way. Just find out for yourself whether you can observe another human being, your wife, your husband, or your girl, or that man who is speaking, can you observe that person without any image? Right? That's all. Look, sir, if you are married, or if you have a girl friend, or a boy friend, you have created an image about him or her, haven't you? That is a fact, isn't it. Fact. The fact which is the product of thought, the image. Right? Oh, lordy, come on!

Look, I am married, or a girl I have, and through various activities, interrelationship, she has created an image about me, and I have created an image about her. This is an absolute fact. So our relationships are between these two images. These images, or pictures, or ideas, or our conclusions, are the product of thought. Right? So can there be a relationship without images? Right? I am asking.

Q: Sir, can we be sensitive to needs without being prejudiced?

K: You haven't understood what I have said.

Q: That is exactly what you are asking me.

K: No, I am not.

Q: You are talking about observing without prejudice.

K: No, sir, would you listen first.

So I am asking if we have an image about another, that image is created by thought, that image is a reality created by thought, and relationship then is between two thoughts, two images, two pictures, two ideas, two conclusions. So we are asking is that relationship at all? Or relationship exists only when there is no image. Right? Is that possible? My wife calls me a fool. And that is immediately registered in the brain, the picture is formed, and there is antagonism, or anger, or irritation. She may be telling the truth, or she may not be telling the truth. So that there is an image formed. Now is it possible to let the machinery of making the images end?

Q: The answer is yes. And because when you observe without thought and without image, then you have the truth. This is what is truth, to observe without image and without thought.

K: Now is that a reality, a fact, or a supposition? Any supposition of what it is, is an illusion.

Q: If we look without the thought process there is no perception whatsoever.

K: Try it, sir. I say there is. What shall we do? I happen to be sitting on the platform, and you are sitting down there. Therefore people will listen to me, people won't listen to you! But we are saying, have you tried to look at something without thought? Find out, sir, go into it.

So what we are saying now is, thought, which is again let's repeat, thought which is experience, knowledge, stored up in the brain as memory, and the response of memory is thought, which is a material process. A material process. So whatever thought has created is reality, the image between man and woman, the image I have about the tent, the word that creates the meaning, and is there a meaning without the word. Go into it all. And as nature is not created by thought, then what is the relationship of man who is full of thought, full of his images, his conclusions, his fears, what is the relationship between reality and that which is not created by thought? None at all, obviously. Right? I may talk about nature, I may talk about there is beauty of the mountains and the rivers and all the rest of it, but if one is enclosed within oneself, with one's problems, with one's ideas, with one's conclusions, illusions, and all that, there is no relationship at all.

Q: Sir, thought is the product of...

K: Are you asking, sir, how does thought arise? Are you asking, how does thought arise?

Q: Yes.

K: I will show it to you. If I may, if you will listen kindly, I will show it to you. I say to you, or to somebody, you are a fool. Now what is your reaction? You have an image about yourself that you are not a fool and you get annoyed. Right? Right? So experience of various kinds is registered in the brain, which is knowledge, and that knowledge with its memory is thought. The origin of thought is from the very beginning of time. Right? Every incident, every experience, every pain, physical, biological as well as psychological is registered in the brain, and that becomes a memory, and from that memory you act. So thought began with the origin of man. When is the origin of man? The scientists say twenty five million years and so on and on. If you want to investigate into that, go into it.

Q: Man is part of nature.

K: Are you? Biologically you may be, but are you part of nature? Go on sir, answer it for yourself, this doesn't require a great deal. Nature is all that, the rivers, the trees, the mountains, the birds, the endless seas, and so on. Are you all that? Or are you a Catholic, Protestant, Communist, Socialist?

So, sirs, you are not going forward with this. Now let us ask - we know what thought is, we know what thought has done, the most extraordinary things - technologically, surgically, medically, extraordinary things. And thought has also created lots of illusions, which we all know, which we don't have to go into. All that is reality. Right? Is that clear? Then what is the relationship of reality to truth? When you ask that question it means, it signifies that there is a truth. Right? Please listen carefully. We know now and have very clearly established between ourselves what is reality - sorrow, pain, insight, neurotic behaviour, all that is created by thought. So whatever thought creates is reality. Why doesn't man stay there? You understand my question? He is always probing. Right? He says, I acknowledge this, it is fairly clear, but there must be something more. Right? Are you following this, sir? So thought begins to investigate. Right? Is this clear, or not? Thought then, whatever it creates, is a reality. You understand this? One sees very clearly what is reality. Thought says, yes, I am very clear about that. But thought also says, that is not enough, there must be something much more. So either it projects a god, an eternity, a timeless state, but it is still the product of thought. Right? So it is still reality. I wonder if you see this. Do we see this a little bit, may we go on?

It is only when thought realizes its own limitations, then it won't investigate into that, if there is or if there is not. This is logic, isn't it, really clear? No? We said whatever thought creates is reality. When thought investigates into what it wants, hoping for something greater, it is still reality. So it is always moving in its own limitation, in its own area - it may extend it, it may contract it, it may say, well I am the universe, I am the cosmos, I am god, but it is still thought. Right? So thought cannot investigate into that, if there is that. Right?

Q: That is the only instrument we have.

K: Our Italian friend says, it is the only instrument we have. But if that instrument says, I cannot penetrate into something I don't know, it stops. Wait a minute, sir, see the fact of this. It can create, say, I know there is something, but it is still within the area of thought. I wonder if you see this simple thing. No? So thought, however sharp, however intelligent, however erudite, learned, experienced, it is still thought, a reality, as the building, as the microphone, and so on. So thought being the past, the outcome of the past, is limited by time. Right?

Q: You have said that the probing is necessary for thought to see itself.

K: I did not say that, sir. Look.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I said, sir - you see, I don't want to go back to this, we have already explained it ten times. So if you don't mind, sir, I won't go back into it.

See what thought does. Thought recognizes itself as a movement in time. Right? That is, thought being the outcome of the past knowledge, knowledge is always the past, so it is time-bound, so it is limited, so it is fragmentary. Now having been time-bound it says, there must be something timeless, because it wants that state because it says, this is too limited. Right? Right? So thought, which is the movement of time, tries to investigate into something which is timeless. Therefore that is impossible.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You will find out.

Q: So I cannot say the river is here.

K: What good does that make to you? I say yes, there is. You say, what nonsense, it might be an illusion.

Q: Can I put it in a different way: what is the capacity of thought to deal with meditation?

K: Sir, thought has no place in meditation.

Q: The capacity of thought in meditation.

K: Sir, look sir, as a human being living in this world there must be some kind of action, action, to act. I must do, action is life. And I want to find one human being who is fairly intelligent, fairly observing, knows what is happening in the world and so on and so on, and also what is happening in himself, says, what is the right action, what am I to do with all the surrounding misery? Right? That is what we are investigating - what am I to do. Not all your theories, speculations. To find out what is the total action, so that I have no regrets, no pain, no saying, my god, I wish I hadn't done that. To find that out we say, look, you must put everything in its right place. Right? Say, put thought in its right place, let thought put itself in the right place. Which is, thought has its right place, which is not only the world of technology, but also in the world of language, etc., etc., and thought being the outcome of the past, knowledge, is time-bound, therefore very limited. Right? And that is the only instrument we know. Is there another instrument which is not of this quality? But before we put that question you must find out exactly the limitation of thought, discover it, be aware of it, not just put, is there something else. Are you aware totally of the limitation of thought?

Q: Partially.

K: Is it partial being pregnant?

So, sir, what we are trying to find out is, what is man to do surrounded by this extraordinary confusion, uncertainty, poverty in every direction, what is one to do? You don't ask that question, you don't burn with that question. So we are trying to find out what do totally. So all action has been based on thought, either the thought which has said, I have done this, which has brought me pain, I will not do that, but if I do the other thing it will bring me pleasure, I will do that. That has been our action. Our action is based on reward and punishment, obviously. And that is the world we have lived in. And that world has no answer, it can keep on going round and round in that world saying, there is an answer, there is an answer, but it will always remain there. That is obvious.

So when there is an understanding of thought, and therefore putting thought in its right place, then what is the instrument, if there an instrument, which is not of thought? Right? But you must put it in the right place, not just say, let me investigate the other. That is what you are trying to do. You say, "I want to find the other before I give this up. I will give this up if that is much more profitable, if that is much more pleasurable". I say, "Sorry, thought whatever it does is limited". So what is there which is not of thought? If somebody has gone into it sufficiently deeply, you will see, then you will ask the question: is love thought? Go on, sir. Can thought cultivate love? And when it cultivates love, is it love? A man who is full of vanity cultivates humility, and he says, "I am very humble" - that humility is still vanity. Right?

So is love the product of thought? Answer it, sirs. If it is not, there is the action. Right? So as love is not manufactured by thought, then what is love? Is there such a thing at all?

Q: It is energy.

K: Oh, madam, listen.

Q: But I thought you said it was a dialogue.

K: But it is not just answering like that, love is energy. That doesn't mean anything.

Q: It means something to me.

K: All right. Is love thought? Go on, sirs. You say, it is not. Right? Then that may be the new instrument.

Q: Love is the product of reward and punishment.

K: Oh, no, sir, I am afraid you don't understand English either, perhaps I may not understand English. Which is, I said our life is based on reward and punishment. Right? And that is the movement of thought. If I do this I will get that, which will be better. If I don't do this I may be punished - punished in the sense I will be unhappy, I will be in conflict, etc., etc. So we have gone beyond that, please.

So is love the new instrument?

Q: No.

K: No.

Q: There is no instrument needed any more.

K: You are using the word 'instrument' like a screwdriver! We are not talking of that. That is why I didn't want to use instrument - that gentleman used that word instrument, I was just following it. It is not an instrument. Oh lord. We said everything that thought creates is reality. Is love a reality - in the sense we have used that word 'reality'? If it is not it is something entirely different, outside of thought. Right? Have you got it? Or just verbally say, "Yes, quite right, let's go on with it"?

So we said, love is not within the realm of thought. It is not sensation, which is the realm of thought. It is not in the realm of thought as pleasure. It is not in the realm of thought as desire. Right? Therefore love is not a remembrance. Right? Now has the brain, your brain, seen the fact of this, the reality of it? So as long as there is desire, pleasure, pursuit of pleasure, there is no love because all these are the product of thought. When there is love, what is the action - because we are concerned with that? Then what is the relationship between that which we call truth - which may not be - what is the relationship between something which is temporary - thought is temporary - right, I wonder if you see that - therefore it is time-binding. Now is there something which is not time-binding, which is not temporary, which is not based on reward and so on and so on? We say there is, which is love. Then what is the action in our daily life when there is love? Would you ask that question? You understand, sir, what I am asking?

Q: You said as long as there is the product of thought there is no love. Therefore as long as there is building, technology, there is no love.

K: Oh no, sir, you are going off. It is such a waste. I'll go on, sir.

What is the action of a man who has understood reality, not mentally, intellectually, but deeply, you follow. He has put reality in its right place. And perhaps he has that perfume of love. What is his action? Would you put such a question? Please say, no or yes. Let's find out. That's a wrong question, isn't it? If there is that thing called love then it acts - please follow this very carefully. In investigating the whole structure and the nature of all reality, and giving it its right place, the mind has become extraordinarily intelligent - not the intelligence of cunning, conspiratorial cunning. You follow? It has become extraordinarily sensitive, alive and therefore intelligent. Therefore that intelligence is not of thought.

Q: Would you allow a very small experiment?

K: Just a minute. Sorry, I am in the middle of a sentence.

Q: I know.

K: Sorry, I am not going to listen. Sorry I am in the middle of a sentence madam. Then please politely.

Q: Would you please listen to me? Please.

K: What were you going to say madam?

Q: I ask you very kindly. Well you have tried to make people see the concept of sensitivity as being either true or not. And more or less denied the role of the word or the image in making this clear. I would like to try to illustrate what you said.

K: I am asking a question about what you are saying, madam. Are you French or English?

Q: I was born in Holland a long time ago.

K: Which language do you speak easily?

Q: You speak English easily. Can you understand my English? Would you like to try?

K: Are you expressing easily in English?

Q: Yes.

K: Then please be brief.

Q: Yes. Sensitivity, the concept without the image, and without the use of words, I feel only through the concept you cannot ask people to see. The word sensitivity would perhaps mean something if I gave you a picture. There is a kind of sensitivity, it is rather like a dustbin, with the lid open and the bottom open. That's one. There is another kind that has the lid open and no bottom. I mean it keeps all that comes in and it relates it to the self, and it hangs on to that. Do you see? And there is no bottom. Then this goes right through.

K: Right, madam. All right, madam.

Q: Do you see what I am saying?

K: Kindly sit down.

Q: I was only trying to make things clear, and the words and images shouldn't be discarded as useless, you cannot only see things with your head.

K: Please sit down, you have stated what you wanted to say.

So if one has, if I may point out most respectfully, if one has gone into this, as we have gone, very closely, very hesitantly, into what is reality, and in seeing what is reality there is a sharpening of not only the intellect, not only your sensitivity, out of that comes a quality of intelligence which is not of thought. Right? If you have done it. Then that intelligence is love. Then action is dictated by that intelligence, wherever we are. It may say you become a gardener, or this or that, that intelligence is love and therefore that intelligence acts.

Then you can go on much further, if you want to, into it. Is intelligence, this intelligence, not the intelligences of cunning verbal disputation, dialectical opinions, and so on, but a mind that put everything in its right place - the building, the illusion, the fear, you follow, everything, therefore through observation there is intelligence. We are saying that is the new moment of action.

Now what is the relationship - I had better not enter into that.

You will all - that will be theory, won't it. I would like to ask what is the relationship of intelligence to compassion, to clarity and skill? You understand? We said skill by itself has no meaning. It has a meaning that makes you more and more selfish, more and more egotistical, and limited. It becomes egotistic, limited because there is no clarity, and clarity comes with compassion. Right?

So in our daily life, our everyday life, not for a life of a few weeks at Saanen, but when you go back home, everyday of your life, can this operate, move? That is, compassion, clarity and skill. Because you must have skill in life, skill may be with one's hand, skill may be an intellectual skill, skill may be communication, verbal communication, but when that is without the other two it becomes what we have made the world into, cunning, deceptive, hypocrisy, using skill to achieve a status, and the moment you have status you become very proud, privileged, you know, all the rest of it. So where there is compassion, clarity and skill there is no vanity, no hypocrisy, no contradiction.

You see I would like to go into something much deeper, which is, what is the relationship when there is this total action, to meditation, meditation which is the complete emptying of all the content of one's consciousness, which we have talked about, and what is the relationship of that to total silence, emptiness? You understand, sir? One is afraid to use the word emptiness because we think emptiness, my god, that is nothing. After all I have worked and lived and I end up in emptiness? You follow? But when you have put everything in its right place, which is the art of living - the art of living is to give everything its proper place. That is the art of living, which is the greatest skill, and out of that orderly life one has this intelligence, which is love. And with love goes compassion, and clarity and skill. Now what is the relationship of intelligence to that which is the outcome, natural outcome, without effort, of total emptying of the mind of its content, which is meditation. You understand, we talked about it sufficiently.

What is the relationship of intelligence to silence? You understand? When there is the right kind of meditation, silence must be the central issue, the central core of meditation is the total emptying of all the fears and so on, so that consciousness as we know it doesn't exist. And what is the relationship of this intelligence to this total silence of emptiness? You understand it? No. One can go into it if you have gone that far. You understand? Not verbally but actually in daily life, then it is fun to explore. What time is it?

Q: Twelve o'clock.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 31ST JULY 1977.

K: I am so sorry it is such bad weather. This is the last dialogue, or discussion, or whatever one likes to call it. I wonder how much one has got out of all these talks and discussions. Whether one has deeply understood and changed, transformed oneself, or do we still remain half way up the hill. Because I think we ought to ask this question of ourselves. We said the other day, the word mediocrity means going up the hill only half way; and excellence means going all the way up. And I wonder whether we are moving, or staying only half way, frightened, anxious, uncertain, not knowing what to do, and remain there.

So I think it would be rather interesting and worthwhile if you could go into this question for yourselves. But before I go into all this, there are really things to talk over together.

Q: Could we talk about the importance of relationship and self knowing?

Q: When thought stops, what exactly is aware, and what is the relationship of this awareness to the sacred?

Q: May I say something?

K: Please be very short, not ten minutes, a minute.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I have to translate what you say in English because many of them don't understand French. I think the gentleman is asking, if I can understand him properly, and if I am mistaken I am sorry, he is asking, why do you speak, you are a god to these people and so on and so on. Right? That's the real meaning of what he is trying to say. Why isn't there after so many years of talking, one person who can sit beside me. You come over and sit beside me, all of you! If there is one who really understood what the speaker has said then why doesn't he sit here and help me to convey? Then I invite all of you to come and sit here.

Q: Can love go beyond death?

Q: I have this process in myself and I wish to open myself. How can I do that without inventing a god?

K: What was your question, sir, the first question?

Q: The importance of relationship and self knowledge.

K: Shall we start with that?

Q: When I try to investigate these questions often there is a feeling of isolation.

K: I think by taking that question of what he said: relationship to self knowledge. Right? I think we will stay with that because otherwise we will get lost, and also I think we will finish with what we were talking about yesterday.

Let's be very clear about one or two things - not your god!

Q: Thank god!

K: Thank god! And I am not your leader or your guru, please for god's sake do listen to whatever we are saying. We are not trying to impress you, influence you, to tell you what to do, nothing of the kind. But I think it is very important for human beings to communicate with each other. To communicate implies we must both be interested in the same thing, at the same level, with the same intensity, otherwise you can't communicate. If you are not interested in this question of self, and the relationship of that self with another, which is a very important sociologically as well as psychologically, I don't think any talking about it becomes clear. Unless one wants to go into these things very carefully I think we had better stop talking to each other.

First of all yesterday we were talking about something very important, it seems to me at least. We were saying, what is love in relationship with each other. That was the thing we were talking about yesterday - the love that exists between man and woman, the love of a mother with her baby, the love of one's country and so on and so on. We were going to go into that question which said, can there be love if there is no total comprehension or self knowledge? Right? We were exploring that question. And that question also can be answered this morning when he put that question: what is the relationship between human beings who have self knowledge, or who are understanding themselves? That's the first question raised.

Are you all quiet now, after the morning's disturbance? I would like if I may to go into this question with a dialogue, that is, communication between us, both verbally and non verbally. Because most of us, as far as one sees throughout the world, have no real understanding, or the depth of this extraordinary word called love. And it is worthwhile, I think, to go into it very quietly, not offering opinions - your opinion against my opinion, or your ideas of what love is - exploring. Do you understand, which is quite different from offering opinions.

So can we go into that question, which is related to self knowledge. We said self knowledge, knowing oneself, must begin knowing the world outside, knowing what is happening in the world - politically, religiously, economically, socially, racially, the class differences, the totalitarian states, leftist, right and centre, all that one must observe. It is not possible to observe if one is prejudiced. That is very simple and very clear. If I stick to my nationality, to my belief, to my race, I cannot possibly investigate, explore, observe the world. Through the observation of what is taking place outside of each human being - without observing what is going on around us, socially, morally, religiously and so on, merely to investigate oneself leads to insanity, because there is the object very clearly to be observed, what is going on. From there you begin. Move from the outer to the inner, not the inner and then the outer. You can deceive yourself enormously if you begin with yourself. Whereas if one begins from the outer, then goes deeply within oneself, then you will see there is no difference between the outer and the inner. It may be like the sea, the ebb and flow, going out and coming in all the time.

Now to observe oneself, we said, one must be free to look. Freedom implies freedom from prejudice, belief, dogma, conclusion, so that you can observe yourself, otherwise you will see what you want to see, or deny what you see. Right? So to observe there must be freedom. That's simple. Now can we do this as we are talking? Can we, wanting to understand the extraordinary complex structure and the nature of the self, the 'me', observe that structure and that nature of this self without any conclusions? If you say, that is very difficult, one cannot do that, then you have blocked yourself. Right? That's simple Whereas if one is really involved in it because what one is the society, the religions, all that is the result. If you are envious, greedy, seeking power, position, you create a society which will bring about what you are - greed, power, position and all the rest of it.

Is it possible to observe oneself without any distortion? We say - please follow it step by step - we say it is possible only when there is no direction, when there is no motive. Because the motive dictates the direction, and distorts the observation. Right? That's clear. Then you will say, how can I observe myself without a motive because I am full of motives - motives being reward and punishment essentially. Isn't it? So can one look at oneself freely without this tremendous tradition of man seeking reward and avoiding punishment, but just to be free to look? Right? Let's do this as we are talking.

And in observing one of the most fundamental questions is: what is relationship between human beings - relationship, man, woman, husband, wife, mother and baby, and so on? Because if our relationship is not correct - I am using the word 'correct' in the English sense - actual, truthful, right - then we create a society, either a society which is so disintegrating, which is so appalling, or a world of totalitarianism, we create it, and accept it. We will go into that, leave it for the moment.

So it is very important to understand relationship. Right? Relationship implies, the meaning of the word is to be related, actually to be related, to be in contact, to have empathy, sympathy, a sense of sensitivity that understands each other completely, not partially. So as most human beings have not that relationship at all, their relationship is based on conflict, how does this conflict arise? You are following? Please this is important if you will go together into this because our life is involved, don't let's waste our life, we have got only this life - good enough, what the future life may be, it doesn't matter, if we don't change what we are now we will continue in a different form - I won't go into that.

So it is very important to understand this question of relationship because that is part of self knowledge, part of knowing oneself. Through relationship, which is the outside, you can then move from the understanding of relationship move inwardly. So it is important to understand relationship. Which is, are we related at all to anything - nature, to each other, private intimate relationship, sexual, the mother and the baby, and so on, relationship? Now what is this relationship based on? Please follow it for yourself. You have your husband, your girl friend, or boy friend, a mother with a baby, all that is part of our life, so please follow, if you will, be serious enough for once in your life.

What is this relationship based on? Is it two entities, two human beings deeply concerned with themselves, deeply occupied with their own ambitions, with their own worries, with their own anxieties, uncertainties, confusion, these two people meet - boy and a girl, and so on and so on. And then there is all the problem of sex, and in this relationship because each is separate inwardly - right - there is conflict. Obviously. Right? Can we go on with it?

So conflict becomes inevitable when each one of us is occupied so entirely with himself. Right? Which we are. And we need to be, in exploring this, tremendously honest otherwise the game is not worth playing. Now the problem is can this relationship exist without effort, without this constant strife between human beings, and what then is that relationship in which there is no conflict at all? You are following? So why does this conflict exist at all, first? It seems that this conflict exists because each one is centred within himself: from himself he goes out - right - from himself he acts, from himself he says, "I love you", but the centre is the 'me', the self. Right? This is clear, isn't it? We are describing what is very obvious.

Now the question is: can that centre be understood and dissolved? Otherwise life which is relationship must inevitably be a series of incidents and conflicts. That's clear. So we are asking: can this centre be understood, watched, see the nature of it, the structure of it, and end it - not verbally but actually end it? Right? That is our question. Therefore one must observe freely the nature and the structure of the self. Right? May I go on?

So various questions are put: what am I, who am I, accept what the psychologists say, and the latest psychologist with his peculiar ideas, and new ways of thinking, you say, "By Jove, I will accept that". We are saying don't accept anything because then you are merely copying what the psychologist says you are. Right? So there is no authority in the observation of oneself - Freud, Jung and the whole bally lot of them. Wipe it out, and begin. Because then what you discover is original, not secondhand. Right?

So it is only possible to observe oneself in relationship - how one reacts to another, how one looks at another, what are the verbal and non-verbal communications with each other. So it is only in relationship that one sees what one is, actually, not theoretically, not subjectively, but seeing in relationship your responses. Now the responses are the expression of what you have remembered. Are you following? You have remembered certain incidents, certain expressions, verbal, gestures, it is stored up, you have registered them, the brain has registered them. And what you have registered becomes a memory and with that memory you observe. That's fairly clear, right? You observe your relationship with another with a past memory, therefore you are not observing. Right? So is it possible not to register at all? Please this is really a very, very complex question. Unless you give your mind, your intelligence, your capacity to think clearly you won't capture this. And you must be serious because this is one of the most fundamental questions: whether the brain, which is registering all the time, which is consciously or unconsciously absorbing, which is registering, and this registration is like a tape which is being played over and over and over again. Right? So we are asking: is it possible for that tape, that machinery, which is registered, to stop? You understand? Are we meeting each other? Somebody tell me, please. Are we together?

Q: Yes.

K: Please, I am not your god. You are not my followers, I am not your guru; we are together taking the journey into something tremendously important in life. If you are not doing it don't listen, think of something else. But if you do pay attention, give your whole attention to it.

So the brain, its function is to register. It registers because in that registration there is security. Right? It feels safe because it says, "I know, I remember", and in that remembrance, in the conclusions which I have, I am secure. Right? So the brain demands security, like a baby, it must have security right from the beginning, otherwise it becomes neurotic, all kinds of things happen to the baby. Now the brain is seeking security because having security implies it can function effectively. If it is uncertain, unclear, then its efficiency is lost. This is clear, isn't it? I am not saying anything very strange, so please. I am going to say something very strange a little later on so go into it!

So the brain demands security. Then only it can function effectively, sanely, rationally. If there is any kind of uncertainty then its actions become neurotic. Right, that's clear. So it must register. So when in relationship there is constant registration and remembrance, then relationship becomes a conflict because you are remembering your incidents, accidents, what has been accumulated, and the other is also doing the same, so the centre is being strengthened. The 'me' is strengthened in me and in you. So the question is: is it possible only to register what is essentially important? What is important - not essentially, remove that word - what is absolutely important. Because if, as the brain demands security, it will find security in what is absolutely necessary. Right? It must have security in food, clothes and shelter, absolutely. In technological knowledge and so on and so on. But what is the need of registering any other factor? You understand what I am saying? Please go into it with me, if you don't mind. Don't offer opinions and judgements, we are investigating it. The brain is accustomed through millenia to register - my tribe, I live with my tribe I am safe, outside my tribe I am unsafe, outside my class, outside my group, outside my belief, I am uncertain, there is fear. So the brain through millenia has developed this quality of registering because in that there is safety. Right? Now we are saying, is there safety in the registrations that are going on psychologically? You understand what I am saying?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: One moment. I am going to go into it. Sir, I said for ten minutes listen to me to the very end and then you can jump on me as much as you like, but please listen to what I have to say first. Because you are disturbing, I am going on with something, let me finish to the end of it. I am not being impatient or trying to prevent you from talking, you will have your opportunity afterwards.

We are asking: is there security in registering all the psychological hurts, all the psychological fears in relationship, the attachments - you follow? So take one thing: in relationship psychologically we are hurt - right - hurt, wounded from childhood. And the results of that hurt are violence, wanting to hurt others, or withdrawing not to be hurt anymore, and therefore isolating oneself, and being isolated act neurotically, and so on and so on and so on. So I am looking at that one thing for the moment, which is that we hurt each other in our relationship. The more intimate it is the more we get hurt. And is it possible not to be hurt at all? Which is, not to register the things said by another which may wound? You are following this? Do it in yourself as we are talking. In our intimate relationship with each other we say things casually, we say things rather brutally, you know, friction. And in that friction there is a great deal of hurt. Now we are asking, is it possible in that relationship with each other not to register and therefore not to be hurt? You have understood? All right?

We are saying it is possible. And I will go into it. Don't say it is impossible and then block yourself. Right? We are going into it. Don't say it is not possible, or it is possible. We are moving together, like a river going round, going, moving, flowing and any difficulties that come we will go round it, but keep going.

So we say it is possible not to register in relationship because love is not remembrance. Right? Love is not something that you say, "Darling, you were so good to me the day before yesterday." So love is not a thing of the past, a thing cultivated by thought, it is not a thing that can possibly happen when there is conflict in relationship. So we are trying to find out what is love in relationship in which there is no conflict. We are saying that it is possible only when you begin to understand yourself in relationship. In relationship there is hurt, many, many hurts. And those hurts can never heal completely because they are all the time happening. So is it possible in relationship not to get hurt? Please, this is a tremendous question, you understand? We are saying it is possible. And it is possible only when there is the realization, when there is the realization, the observation that any form of registration in relationship psychologically is hurting, and it is essential to register at a certain level, not at the psychological level. When you see that, when you observe it, when you know it, then you don't register. Say for example, in our relationship I call you a fool, or, you were terrible this morning, I want to read the newspaper and you come and take it away. I get irritated.

So at that moment, which is at the moment when you are being called a fool, or whatever you are, at that moment to be attentive. You understand? Attention implies, as we said the other day, there are three types, which is concentration, awareness and attention. Concentration implies focussing with your whole energy on a certain point, therefore excluding and there is constant resistance to other forms of thoughts coming in. We said choiceless awareness is to observe without any choice - we went into that. Now attention is when you attend completely, as I hope you are doing now, completely attentive, there is no centre. Right? Have you noticed it? So when another calls you an idiot in relationship, when you are so attentive it doesn't register. Don't ask, how am I to be so attentive. That is a silly question. There is no practice, there is no method, there is no system. But when you see the real importance, the truth of this fact, that any form of psychological registration will inevitably end in conflict and hurt and all the rest of it, when you see the truth of it clearly you don't register. Therefore at the moment when a person calls you an idiot when you are attentive there is no registration. Are you doing it? Will you do it, not in the future, actually sitting next to your boy friend, or husband, wife, or whatever it is, see the whole machinery of it, not just a single part but the whole structure of this.

We said, registration is the means of acquiring security. Right? It has sought security in the images that it has built in relationship, in the image. Right? That image ceases to exist when there is complete attention.

Now, wait a minute: the gentleman asked, what is it that divides that which is to be registered and that which is not to be registered. Right? Now when you see the nature and the structure of relationship, what happens, actually observe it with your heart, with your mind, with your blood, what happens out of that observation? There is not only attention there is intelligence, isn't there? No? Because you have seen something which is true. That is when you are not attentive hurts begin, when you are attentive there is no image forming. If you see the truth of that, the perception of that is intelligence. You have an insight into it. You have insight into the nature of registration of the brain, and that insight you can only have when you are free to observe. That is, insight can only take place when there is emptiness, not your prejudices, your hopes, your fears. Right? That intelligence says, this is where registration is necessary. Right? Therefore there is security for the brain in intelligence. You understand?

Q: Yes.

K: Not verbally, but in your blood. It is like seeing something tremendously dangerous it is finished, you don't approach it. In the same way when you see the extraordinary fact that hurts, all these conflicts between human beings - I have said it all.

Q: What about will in relationship?

K: I must do this and you want to do something else. Right? I want to become the chief executive of some business, and you want to do something else. Desire, which is the essence of will, pushes me in one direction and pushes you in another direction. Right? That is one of the factors in relationship. No? That's very simple.

Q: It is not simple at all.

K: Sir, it is very simple when you have got this intelligence. It is extraordinarily simple to understand the activity of will, which is the activity of desire. Please have an insight into it, you understand, not a verbal argument, saying, this is tremendously difficult, or not difficult. Have an insight into the whole movement of will, which is desire. I desire - I don't know - to play golf, to be a first-class golfer. My wife wants to be a social leader. And there is conflict between us. Right? I want that, and she wants that. Now how will you avoid the conflict? To avoid the conflict, to wipe away all conflict you must understand desire, why there are separate desires. I wonder if you have got this? You are following this? Why you have a particular desire, and another a totally different desire. Desire being for an object, for a position, for an idea, for something. Right? You have a desire for that, and she has a desire quite the opposite. If the two desires go together, both of us wish for the same thing we think there is perfect harmony. But when there is contradiction between the two then there is trouble. And the gentleman says, it is one of the principal causes of conflict.

Now is desire different? The object of desire may be varied. I may want a car, you may want a baby. And so there is conflict. But we are saying, is desire in itself different? You have understood? The objects of desire may vary. We will leave that. But is desire in itself different? Or is it essentially desire? If we understand what is the nature and the structure of desire, the essence of it, then what will happen? Now we will go into it.

I want to move to something else. Have patience. Is desire love? We said not. Right? We were very clear on that matter when we talked about love. And the nature and the structure of desire, we went into it very carefully some time ago, during this gathering here. Which is, perception, seeing, contact, sensation. Then thought taking it over, making it into desire and creating the image which will be fulfilled through the will of desire. It is simple. I am not going to go into that. No, because there is something we must talk about.

So if we understand desire, really, basically, have an insight into desire, you will have your object and I will have mine, there will be no conflict. It is only when we don't understand desire fundamentally then there is conflict. Leave that alone.

Now I want to go on. That is, we said registration in which thought has found security, the brain, now finds that psychologically there is no security at all, therefore there is no registration. But the discovery of that is intelligence. And in that intelligence there is complete security. Right? Complete security. Have you got that intelligence after listening to all these talks, and words and words and words? Have you captured that, has that intelligence been awakened?

And that intelligence can only be awakened when there is an observation which is to observe freely, without any distortion, without any motive in relationship, to observe. Out of that comes intelligence. So intelligence gives complete security, therefore it registers what is necessary and what is not necessary. So we are saying then, is love a remembrance? Right? Is love something to be thought about? Or can love be cultivated by thought? We said no. That is fairly simple, everyone agrees to that. Then what place has love in relationship? Right? If love is not desire, if love is not the pursuit of pleasure, then what is love in relationship? Go on work it out, sir. Would you ask that question when there is that sense of love? The problem is this: you have that love, which is not desire, which is not pleasure, etc., etc., which is the essence of intelligence. I wonder if you see it. Suppose you have that extraordinary essence which is of intelligence, which is love, and I haven't got it. In our relationship - I am fortunately, or unfortunately, I am married to you - and you have got it and I haven't got it, then what is our relationship? You understand this? You understand my question?

Q: I would like to ask a question, please.

K: It is raining very heavily.

Q: In discussing I really appreciate your talks and discussions, and everyone can see if there is some truth in what you have said or not. I would like to ask if you can imagine that I am there if you are not there.

K: No, sir, this is all theoretical.

Q: Do you not understand this?

K: Yes, yes. This has been an old question, I know it. But we are not discussing that at the moment. If you don't mind. What we are talking about is, when there is that quality of love which is not desire, which is not merely pressure, then what is the action of that love in relationship? Which is, we said, in relationship each one is concerned with himself.

Q: Compassion.

K: No, wait sir. Don't jump to any conclusions. Don't use words yet. We said in relationship you discover what you are. Right? Your reactions, your pride, your envy, your this, and that. And through relationship you begin to dissolve all that. Right? Then you are beginning to understand yourself as deeply as possible, because in relationship it shows it. And you begin to realize that where there is attention there is no registration. We went through that. Then the problem arises, what is love in this relationship? Right? If there is no desire, if there is no pursuit of pleasure in this relationship, what is then relationship? You understand? Go on, sirs, think it out. I am not going to think it all out for you and then you accept it or reject it. Go into it. I love you.

Q: Attention.

K: Not attention, madam, we have gone into that. I love you - watch yourself do, you love somebody don't you? You love somebody and that love is not controlled by desire, that love is not the pursuit of pleasure - we went into all this before. Then what is the relationship between two human beings, man, woman, when there is this love?

Q: There is no centre, therefore they are one whole.

K: That is a conclusion, that's a theory. The lady says there is no centre therefore we are one. Is that it? You see none of you - forgive me for saying this - none of you do it, go into it.

Q: How do you know?

K: How do I know? If you did it you wouldn't be here. God, it's raining hard, isn't it. I hope you have got warm clothes.

We are asking: what is the place of this quality of love in relationship? Do you understand? We said there is the operation of intelligence, the awakening of intelligence, which is the essence of love. Right? And this intelligence is also compassion. This intelligence is also clarity, which we talked about. And also this intelligence acts skilfully. Right? Skillfully - got the meaning of it now? You are understanding it?

Q: Like a river.

K: Go into it for yourself and you will see the extraordinary thing that will happen in your life if you do it. Not verbally, not theoretically, not come to some conclusion, but actually have an insight into all this. And you can only have insight when there is freedom, psychological freedom, freedom from choice, freedom from direction so that you can look.

So we talked about compassion, clarity, and skill. We said, in that quality of love there is intelligence. Right? Intelligence is compassion, isn't it? Because you can't have compassion without clarity. So in one's relationship with another, when there is compassion - love, compassion, intelligence, clarity - you will act in excellent skill in relationship. Right? I wonder if you see this? Do you see it, or is it all Greek still?

As we said, we have great skill, we have acquired enormous skill in every direction - in the air, in the sea, on the earth, skill in being cunning in our relationships. Right? Deceptive, hypocritical, act in a skilful manner to avoid getting hurt, getting my own way and hoping you will follow me and therefore not create any conflict. We have learnt all this. But that skill is not out of clarity. That skill only emphasizes the more 'me'. We went into that.

So see what takes place. Just briefly I will go into it, what takes place logically. We said you can know yourself without distortion by observing what is outside, what is happening in the world. And from the world move inwards, and then whatever you see will be correct because you have learnt to observe correctly, truthfully, accurately, what is going on around you. So in observing yourself one of the major of factors in relationship is conflict - hurt, expression of will, desire. Right? Getting hurt, conflict and each one desiring his own particular way. All that emphasizes separation, division. So wherever there is division created by will, created by idea, created by desire, objects of different desires, pursuit of particular ideologies, divides people, and therefore there is tremendous conflict. My wife may be Catholic, and I may not be Catholic, and there is conflict. I want her to become non-Catholic and she wants to make me Catholic, so there is battle.

So we said, the brain registers because in registration there is security. And the security it has created is in the image that we have made about each other. And because there is the image of each other which is different there is conflict. So we are having an insight into oneself - right - through relationship. That insight can only take place when there is freedom and emptiness to look. You can't look if your mind, if your brain is full of prejudices, this and that. So there must be emptiness to look. That is, the observer ceases to be. We have gone into all that.

So we said registration, non-registration psychologically is possible only when there is that intelligence. That intelligence comes about when there is an insight. So that intelligence registers what is necessary and what is not necessary.

Then we went into the question of what is love. Is love desire, etc., etc? If it is not then love is intelligence in relationship. Right? And that intelligence is part of compassion. And that compassion can only be when there is clarity. Clarity which comes through freedom, and freedom of observation and insight. And compassion, clarity, will function with great skill in relationship. Right?

Now have you, at the end of all these talks and dialogues - if we have had dialogues, we haven't had dialogues at all, I have talked or the speaker has talked all the time, we must do it differently next year if we are here - we will be here! Now at the end of all this where are we? Have we together taken the journey, together all the way, flowing together, passing, like a river passing obstacles, it goes round it, have we moved that way? Or are we still part of the bank and looking at the river? You understand what I am saying? Are we sitting comfortably on the bank with our ideas, with our hope, with our security, you know all the rest of it, and watching the river go by? Which is it that we are doing? To be part of the river, to flow with the river you must leave the bank, naturally. I wonder - please don't answer - I wonder how many are flowing with all this. Then, sirs, look. Then it becomes very important that there isn't only one speaker like me. You understand? It becomes very important that you come and sit here instead of me. That you become the one that is enlightened, who has clarity, compassion, skill. Because the world is getting madder and madder, insane and some of you must go psychologically through tremendous revolution to come here and sit here and talk, go outside. Will you do all this? Or we are too old?

Q: You said at the end...

K: What is the time? I must stop. I can't talk any more. So I hope - not hope - that you have walked along together, and that together we have walked very far. Not stopped half way and say, well it is too difficult, I don't understand, I must understand him not myself. You know all that game we play with each other, and play with lots of ideas and cunning logic and all that, dropping all that, have we gone very far together?

BOMBAY 1ST PUBLIC TALK 21ST JANUARY 1978

If I may, I would like to remind you that this is not an entertainment. This is not a gathering of people who want to be amused or intellectually enlightened. We are concerned, if I may point out, with the total regeneration of man. Because as one observes throughout the world man is destroying himself, by his education, by destroying the environment, pollution and all the terrible things that are going on in the name of technology and war. The division of people into races, cultures and the division of religions, all this indicates, doesn't it, that there must be a new kind of mind to deal with all our problems, a new quality of apprehension, to perceive a different kind of action which will always be right, correct, true, under all circumstances.

And it seems to me that we should be concerned, if we are at all serious, whether it is possible for man, that's you, to be reborn anew, not in some future date or future time, but during one's short period of life; whether it is possible for you to bring about in yourself a moral revolution. The essence of moral revolution is religion, not all the phony stuff that is going on in the name of religion, not all the rubbish, superstitious nonsense. But, rather, we must be concerned whether it is possible for a human being, which is you, to bring about a total regeneration of the mind. We mean by that word 'mind', not only the movement of consciousness, the quality of the brain which is so damaged under pressure and also we mean by the mind, the quality of action. That is, not only action in our daily life, which we shall discuss presently, but also action with regard to our social environmental existence, action with regard to our state of consciousness - I am using that word not as a noun, but as a movement. And to bring about a total psychological revolution is our concern, not only this evening, but throughout our existence.

Before we go into that, we must understand each other. We are using ordinary non-technical language, language that is spoken ordinarily. So to understand each other, we must use words. Words have great significance in our life. Most of us are slaves to words. We live in a network of words, and we think by understanding the word we have understood the whole significance of existence. So we must be very clear, right from the beginning, that however important the word is in communication, the word is never the thing. The description is not the described. But most of us, unfortunately, are apt to fall into the trap of description and think we have understood, think we have captured the full significance of existence. So we must be very wary, advisedly careful in the usage of words and the limitation of words, and we must use words as a means of communication. We can communicate with each other only when we have the same direction, when we capture the meaning of what the speaker is saying, which is to communicate with each other, which means sharing together, investigating together, exploring together this question whether human beings, you, whether you live in Russia or America or in Europe or in India or in Asia, whether that human being is capable of bringing about not only a moral revolution, but a regeneration of the totality of one's existence. That's what we are concerned about and that's what we are going to talk about.

So, we must first, it seems to me, establish proper communication, that is, to listen to what is being said and not translate what is said into your own particular pattern of thought, into your own particular images or knowledge or conclusion. You are apparently here to understand what the speaker has to say. That is obvious, otherwise you wouldn't be here. To understand what he has to say, he must use words, but words are very deceptive. You will translate the word which he uses to cover your own particular mode of thinking, your own particular way of life, which excludes naturally whether you are listening or not. That's simple, isn't it? If you go on thinking your own way, you are caught in your own particular pattern and translate what is being said into your pattern, then you, obviously, are not understanding the speaker. It seems to me that is very, very simple. That is, to listen to what the speaker has to say without interpreting it, without translating it according to your own particular way of life or conclusion.

So first, if I may point out, there is an art of listening. Have you ever thought about it? I wonder if you ever listen to your wife or your husband or your girl friend. Do you? Do you listen? Or you have already come to a conclusion that you know her or him and whatever he says passes by very lightly, doesn't actually penetrate your mind. So what we are trying to do, here, this evening, is to learn the art of listening. To listen to those crows, though they are a nuisance, to listen to what the speaker is saying, to listen to your own thoughts, to your own reactions, to listen to your responses to what is being said. So all this requires, doesn't it, a careful, attentive, precise mind; not just casually listen while you are talking to somebody else. Because it is very important, it seems to me, from the very beginning of these talks that we should understand each other, that we should share the problems together. We have got many human problems and it is possible, if we give our care, our attention to solve them completely, totally and utterly.

So please learn, understand the art of listening. It means to listen with affection, with care, with a sense of urgency. And if you are at all serious, and I hope you are, not serious in your particular mode of life, but that quality of seriousness that comes about when you are comprehending or aware or understanding the global problem of man. When I use the word 'global problem', aren't you, as a human being, whether man or woman, a representative of all mankind? Please understand this question, this is a very serious question. Aren't you as a human being representative of all humanity? Because, your problems are the problems of every other man - economic, social, moral, private, personal; and whether American, Russian, or Chinese, or this country, your problems are shared, are common to every man, because you suffer, are anxious, uncertain, insecure, confused, caught up in a world of utter insanity, madness. This is the problem of every human being in the world. There is fear of death. They want to find out what is meditation, how to go beyond and be utterly free of all fear, to find out the full significance of existence. And to find out also a way of living that is true, not hypocritical. This is the common problem of every human being in the world. And so you represent the common factor, and therefore you are the rest of humanity. Your consciousness is the consciousness of the world, not your private consciousness.

I hope we understand each other about this question. That is why when one says, as we say, that you are the world and the world is you, it is literally so. And whether you as a human being representing the common factor of humanity, whether it is possible for each one to bring about a regeneration of his mind. That is the question, that is the problem we are facing, not as individuals, but as a human being; not as a group, but as one entity who represents the whole global man, with all his problems. So if you as a human being can bring about a radical, moral revolution, that revolution affects the whole of mankind. I wonder if you understand this. You know, one or two people in the world affect the consciousness of mankind. The great butchers of the world, the great conquerors affect your consciousness, as the consciousness of this country is affected by their superstitious beliefs, as in Europe, two thousand years of a certain incident and glorified into a religious symbol does affect the whole consciousness of Europeans and Americans. And in the same way if you are a communist and if you accept that pattern, and that way of thinking, that whole consciousness is affected. I wonder if you follow all this.

So please understand the utter simple responsibility of a human being, you, living in this mad world. When you change radically it affects the conscious of the world. So that's what we are concerned with. The word 'regeneration' means to be reborn, not in some future life, which may or may not be true, but in this life, in this whole period of existence, whether it is possible for you as a human being who represents all mankind, whether it is possible for you to be reborn. Do you understand my question? That is the question, the challenge that the speaker is putting before you. How you respond to it is very important. Morally, every country in the world is immoral. Our society is immoral, our religions are immoral, and we live in that society. We respond to that society. We are part of that society. We are that society. We are not different from that society. Please see this, not intellectually, not verbally, but actually, that you are the result of your environment, of your culture, if there is such culture; the result of your religions, of your gurus, of your books, of your education. You are that. And in that we pretend that there is something extraordinarily spiritual, and we are trying to discover that spiritual entity, which is sheer nonsense.

So, we are asking you as a human being, whether you can bring about a regeneration in your life, your life being your daily relationship with another human being. That's our life. You may technologically be a marvellous engineer or a scientist and so on. That is merely a calculated, specialized entity to earn a good livelihood. But we are not talking about that. As a human being, we are referring, not as a specialist. I have always thought, a doctor who is always investigating, who is a specialist in nose, ear and throat and as the specialist, his heaven will be nose, throat and ears. Won't it? I wonder whether you understand all this. So those who are specialized have their little heaven of their specialization. Obviously if you spend all your life, being a doctor or a surgeon, good or bad, if there is such a thing as heaven, you will be, there, a surgeon. Obviously. So it matters very much whether you can bring about a change, in yourself, radically, morally. And we are going to investigate that together.

When we use the word 'investigate', it implies that your mind must be capable to explore, to look, but if you come with a prejudice, with a conclusion, with a direction, you will not be able to observe. Right? So investigation implies that you must be free to look, free to look at your life, free to look at your reactions to life, free to look at your reactions or responses to your wife or to your husband, because there is the life. We are going to investigate into that. And to investigate, you must be free to look. So first find out for yourself whether you are free to look; look at your life, your daily, ugly, conflicting life; to look at it, to investigate it, to explore it. If you have a conclusion, then your investigation will be directed by what you have concluded. I wonder if you see all this. If you have a prejudice, that prejudice is going to dictate your investigation. If you have a belief, that belief is going to direct your investigation. So the mind - please do it as we are talking - your mind must be free to explore, and is your mind free? Obviously not. Because if it was free you would already be investigating. So, if I may point out, it is very important in our investigation whether it is possible for a human being, you, to bring about a radical, not only transformation in consciousness, but also a moral, regenerating action.

Then the next question is, in this investigation, the investigator is not different from the investigation. This is going to be rather difficult. When you examine as a scientist, a good scientist, through a microscope into something, if he comes with a hypothesis, that hypothesis is going to direct what he observes. Right? So he must observe what is actually going on, not what he thinks is going on, not what he would like to see going on. So investigation implies that your mind, your eye, your whole being which is being investigated, be free to be observed. Right? Is this clear? Are you doing it? Or you have the habit of listening to somebody, words, words, and you are caught in that habit of just attending to some speaker. You understand what I am saying? So we are going to investigate together whether it is possible for a human being like you to bring about a regenerating factor, regenerating energy, regenerating action in our daily life. That is our question.

First of all, what is our life, our daily life? What is our daily life? Your daily life? Your daily life is, isn't it, one series of conflicts, one series of struggles, conflict between the opposites; wanting to be something and denying that. And a series of conscious as well as unconscious fears, a pursuit of pleasure, and a relationship, actually, not theoretically, actually a relationship with another, with your wife, with your husband or whatever it is, in which there is no love at all. And our life is made up of this continuous burden of sorrows and also fear of death. That is our life, the daily conflict of our life. And added to that we try to find out how to live a life which is peaceful and so we escape through meditation, denying this life, try to find through meditation a way of living which won't be in conflict. Look at your life, not at the description which the speaker is making, at your daily life. We are going to first find out whether it is possible to live in our daily life without conflict. Please give your attention to this. Nobody talks to you like this, give your attention, your heart, to find out whether you can live a life, your daily life, to live without conflict in relationship, because our life is relationship. Right? Our life is in contact with each other, and in that relationship there is conflict. So is it possible to live a life, live in a relationship with each other in which there is no conflict whatsoever? Right? Let us investigate that and find out if it is possible or not possible. We are not saying 'yes' or 'no'. We are going to investigate and therefore find out for yourself, because the speaker has no authority whatsoever. He is not your guru. I wouldn't accept you as followers. This is very important to understand. You are all trained to follow, to obey, and the speaker says, together, you and I, as two human beings, are going to investigate whether it is possible to live a life in which there is no conflict. You understand this? See the greatness or the beauty of that question, not intellectually put, but the actual reality of that question.

Why do we live in conflict? What is the root of conflict? You understand? The root of it? There are many expressions of conflict. Right? Many expressions - the neurotic expression, the common expression of conflict and the ultimate conflict to achieve peace or some enlightenment. All that is based on conflict. Right? So I am asking why do you have conflict? When I ask you that question, please look at yourself, your own thinking, your own way of life and find out, if that question, why you live in conflict, is put, how you respond to it, how you receive the question. You understand? Is it an actual question which disturbs you as pain disturbs you, or is it a theoretical question put to you and you are trying to answer a theoretical answer? Or do you realize for yourself that you live in conflict, and ask yourself whether it is possible to live without conflict. Don't say 'yes' or 'no', but let's investigate it. Right? As we said, to investigate there must be freedom, you can't be tethered to a belief, to an idea, to a tradition. You must be free to look. What is the cause of conflict? Are you waiting for me to answer it? You are. Therefore it means that you are not investigating. That means we are not sharing the problem.

We live in duality. Don't we? I want this and I don't want that. I like to be this but I am not like that. I like to be happy and I am not happy. I am angry and I would like not to be angry, and so on and so on. Why is there - please listen - why is there an opposite at all? You understand my question? I am asking you, if I may, most respectfully, why is there an opposite? Why have we accepted an opposite? There is an opposite as light and darkness, man and woman. I am asking this question psychologically: why is there in you a dual process of thinking? You understand? Or - please listen - there is only the fact, what is actually happening and nothing else. You understand my question? Look: one is greedy or one is violent. Why have we invented the non-violence? Why have we invented the idea of not being greedy? Why? When we are actually greedy, actually violent, why have we the opposite of it? This country has lived with non-violence, which is sheer nonsense, of course, because you are all violent. So please follow this. It is not rubbish that we are talking about. It is a very serious factor, because this may totally eliminate altogether conflict, if you know, understand what is being said. When we use the word 'fact', we mean by that word that which is, 'what is'. The what is not is non-fact. Non-violence is a non-fact. But the fact is violence. I am asking why has humanity, you, invented the opposite? Do you understand my question? Either you have invented it because you don't know how to deal with 'what is', with violence, and therefore it is an escape from 'what is'. Or you think you need an ideal which is the opposite to eradicate 'what is'. Or use the ideal as a means of getting rid of 'what is'. The 'what is' is a fact, is actual, but the ideal is non-factual. It's an escape from the fact. So can you drop your ideal? Can you drop the opposite and deal only with 'what is'? You understand my question? I can't see your faces, but you can see mine. It is unfortunate, it should be other way round.

So we are saying, observe and investigate 'what is', not how to go beyond 'what is', not how to transform 'what is'. If you do, then the duality comes into being, therefore conflict. I wonder if you understand. That is, suppose I am jealous. I have never been jealous in my life, but suppose I am. See what is involved in observing 'what is'. Suppose I am jealous, and my education, my culture, my religious upbringing has said, 'don't be jealous, it is wrong to be jealous, because jealousy implies hate, anger, all the implications of jealousy, bitterness and so on, so don't be jealous'. So I have been educated in not being jealous. But the fact is I am jealous. So immediately I have a conflict. You understand?

Immediately the conflict begins. I am jealous and I must not be jealous. But the fact is I am jealous. So I am only concerned with jealousy, not 'I should not be jealous'. So I have no conflict of duality. I have only the understanding and the observation of what it means to be jealous. Are you following all this?

So I am going to investigate into 'what is', which is jealousy, which is a common factor of all humanity, a feeling which I have named as jealousy arises, because - I won't give you the reasons, it's obvious. Don't you know jealousy? So I don't have to give the reasons. Now, a feeling arises and there is immediate naming of it, immediate recognition of it, through verbal association. When the feeling arises, instantly there is naming of it as jealousy. The meaning of it is to strengthen it. When you recognize it, which means you have had that feeling before, and you have named it, and that memory reacts to the present feeling. So you are looking - please listen to this - you are looking, or observing this new expression of that thing called jealousy with old memories.

Therefore the old memories are contradicting or trying to bring the present feeling into its own record. So to observe that feeling without naming, will you do it? Next time when you are jealous, probably you are jealous even now, can you observe that feeling arising and not name it at all? Then what takes place? Then, as I said, that very observation without naming brings about a transformation in the fact.

You know I have gone into this question considerably, previously many years ago, and we were talking to some scientists the other day, the speaker asked one of them what actually takes place when a scientist observes a phenomenon through a microscope, a phenomenon that he is investigating. Right? And when he observes it without any prejudice, without previous knowledge, without a direction, then that which he has observed is undergoing a radical change. You understand this? The scientists, some of them, have assured the speaker that it is so. So we are saying, if you can observe the reacting feeling which you have named jealousy, without naming it, just to observe it, then that very observation brings about a radical transformation in that which is being observed. Have you got it? Or must I explain it again?

Look sir: the word 'violence' is associated with so many things and when we use that word, we are already educated to condemn it because violence is something unholy. So to observe our feeling of violence without the word, and in that observation you will find that feeling is undergoing a radical transformation. You can only test this, not accept it. You can test it for yourself, in your daily life, if you know how to do it. And therefore we are sharing this thing together, that it is possible to live completely without conflict of duality, because there is no duality. It is the invention of thought. What is fact is real. Everything else is non-real. So can you, in your daily life in your relationship, live without the opposite and only live with 'what is'? And you can test this. You know what I mean by 'test this'? Actually finding out for yourself by watching yourself and seeing whether what is being said is true or false, because it is your life. It is not my life. You have to test it.

And also in that conflict there is the problem of desire. So we are going to investigate together, because there is no authority here, and I really mean it, I am not an authority. The authority of a surgeon is totally different from the authority of a guru. You know sir, when you are seeking truth, really seeking truth, you are never alone. Do you understand that?

Now we are trying together to find out for ourselves how to live a life in which there is not a shadow of conflict. We have gone into this question of duality. Right? I hope you understand it with your heart, with your depth, not intellectually, but with tremendous attention, because your life is in conflict. The other problem is, conflict arises when there is the dual opposing desires. So we are going to investigate together what is desire. We are together investigating into this tremendous problem of desire. Because that is one of the root causes of conflict. All religions have said 'get rid of desire', because a man who comes to serve god must be free of desire. And we are educated unfortunately to suppress it, to run away from it, to find a substitution, or desire for the noblest thing - god or whatever it is. And modern society, modern world says 'express yourself fully, indulge in your desires. It is nonsense of all religious idiots, throw them all away.' Our society has become permissive, to do whatever you like.

So we must together investigate into this question of desire. I do not know if you have ever asked yourself why desire plays such an important part in our daily life - desire to be perfect, desire to achieve a status, a position, a power, desire to have money and all the rest of it, the whole gamut of desire. Please listen. Do the objects of desire vary or desire itself varies? Do you understand the question? When you are a young chap you desire a car, or later on a woman or later on a man or later on a house and so on. Do the objects of desire vary, or intrinsically desire has in itself a variety, a change - no, not change - a different object inherent? We are going to find out. First, let's find out the root and the meaning of desire, how desire arises, not how to suppress it, not how to run away from it, but to see for ourselves the whole movement of desire, the origin of desire, the beginning of desire.

Are you prepared? Are you also working, as the speaker is working, not physically, psychologically, intellectually, verbally trying to communicate something and are you also working together or are you just listening, half asleep? Because it is really a very important problem in our daily life, whether it is sexual desire or desire for power, desire for sidhis, desire for enlightenment, desire to have a bigger house or for a more beautiful wife and so on. What is desire? If one can understand it very deeply you will find that the object becomes totally irrelevant. So we are going together to understand the movement of desire, movement, not a desire for something, the movement. Now just a minute. When we use the word 'movement', it means moving from here to there, which is time. Movement implies time, not only chronological time, but psychological time. That is, I desire to have a big house. I don't, but suppose I desire to have a big house. It's a movement which will take time. To have that house, I must work, I must gather money, and all the rest of it and get that house. That is a movement in time. When we use the words 'movement of desire', in that is implied time also. I wonder if you see it. Do you see the implications? You don't. We will come to it. I just thought of it, it is a marvellous idea. Desire means movement. Movement means time. We are not only investigating time, but also desire. Are you getting tired at the end of the day? If you are tired I'm awfully sorry, but we will go on. Because desire for enlightenment is the same as desire for a house. There is no difference for a sannyasi who desires heaven and a man who desires a house. They are still movement. He must do certain things, control, celibacy, and all that business, arrive at that state when he says, 'I've got enlightenment', which is absurd. When you say 'I am enlightened', you are not enlightened.

So in investigating desire, we are investigating time. It is really extraordinary. You don't see the beauty of it. What is desire? Desire is never static. It is always moving, living, and most of us think that it is static and therefore can control it, therefore can suppress it, can escape from it, but it is a living thing. So we are trying to capture a living thing, not a static, dead thing. So your mind must be equally alive to understand it. That means your mind also must be alive to investigate into what is desire, how does it arise? The speaker is putting this question for you to find out for yourself, not wait for the speaker to tell you. Unfortunately I will tell you! But find out for yourself as we go along. Then it becomes exciting, fun, alive. But if you merely listen to what he is saying, memorize it and then apply it, then it is a dead thing. So together we are doing it. What is desire? One sees a beautiful watch in the window, or a beautiful car, a beautiful dress, whatever it is. There is first the seeing, then there is contact, then there is sensation, then thought comes in and says 'how nice if I had it'. So perception, contact, sensation, then thought, image, thought creating the image of you driving in the car, and having the pleasure of driving the car, and then desire. You understand? Watch it in yourself, not what the speaker is saying. So there is first perception, the seeing, contact, the sensation, thought creating the image and desire. This is the movement of desire, which is the movement of time. When I see the car and thought says 'how nice it will be to drive a car', the power, and then desire; to get the car needs time, and all the rest of it.

So our question is, why does thought create the image and out of that image desire is born? You understand my question? Is it possible for thought not to create the image? You understand my question? Seeing, contact, sensation, then thought creating the image and the pursuit of that image, desire. We are asking whether thought can be in abeyance and not create the image. Look at it: I see a beautiful watch in the window. I see it, I contact it, sensation and then thought comes in and says 'how nice it will be for me to have it'. Now before thought comes in, just to observe, contact and sensation and stop there. This requires great attention of your reactions. Then desire becomes a minor part. Then you begin to understand the movement of desire. But when the image becomes strong, then the pursuit of desire is intense. Have you understood a little bit of this? - not understood, are you doing it? That is, memory which is stored in the brain - I am not a brain specialist but you can observe it in yourself - memory is stored in the brain like a recorder - seeing, contact, sensation and for the brain to stop the movement of recording. You understand this? I wonder if you understand this? No, sir, you don't. Please, keep quiet. You know, the function of the brain is to record, record every kind of experience, every kind of incident; it is its business to record like a tape recorder, everything that is being said is recorded. So the brain is the recording instrument. And the question is - this may be a little bit difficult - the question is, not to record what is not necessary. Find out. To record only what is absolutely necessary, not to record your jealousies, which is not necessary; not to record your hurts which is not necessary, not to record your ambitions.

Then the brain is only recording that which is essential - the language, how to drive a car, how to do business and not do tricks in business, and all the rest of it. Just to record what is necessary. Then you will find that the relationship between desire and the non-recording process is that the desire is not recorded. I wonder if you understand this? No, please don't agree. You have not done it. You can only agree when you have tested it, gone into it. Find out for yourself, do it, test it. But to say, 'Yes, I agree', your head is loose, that is all. So this is a tremendous problem for humanity to find out. As we have discussed, we are going to find out a way of living in which there is no conflict whatsoever. And the speaker is showing that it can be done, completely, which means you must understand, discover through your own investigation the conflict in which we live, between man and woman, sexually or otherwise, the conflict of ambition, the conflict of competition, all that. And, we said, it is possible only when you actually live with 'what is', not with the ideas, with suppositions, with fixations. And also, in trying to understand the whole movement of conflict, if you understand, find out the movement of desire. Desire comes into being only when thought creates the image and that image is recorded. I have found something very new. It doesn't matter, you won't understand this.

So we have to stop. You are the representative of all humanity and that is the fact, you represent me, the American, the Russian, because they are all in conflict, misery, confusion, that is the common factor between all human beings, though you may be a doctor, a rich man, may have many possessions and all that, but you still go through the misery of sorrow, pain suffering, fear, so you are that, you are the rest of the world, you are the world. If you understand and transform yourself, you are bringing great blessing on the world, So, we are saying there is an actual way of living - when I use the word 'actual' it means what is taking place, actually what is happening - if you understand that, life opens, has a totally different meaning.

BOMBAY 2ND PUBLIC TALK 22ND JANUARY 1978

If we may we will continue with what we were talking about together yesterday evening. We were saying, weren't we, that one of the factors of conflict between man and man is desire, and also we are educated, conditioned to live and accept this conflict between the opposites. We talked about that yesterday evening. And also we talked about the responsibility of every human being, the responsibility that must be accepted by everyone if one is at all aware or sensitive, or informed of what is happening in the world. As we were saying yesterday, we are living in a society that is totally and utterly immoral, and there must be, if humanity is to survive at all, a moral revolution, not a revolution according to a pattern, according to some ideal, because morality is not a blue print. It is a living thing. It is not laid down by any particular religion, or sanctioned by any particular group, but rather, it must be understood as a living thing to be lived in our daily life. We never seem to accept that fact. We are always running away from our daily responsibility, the responsibility between human beings, between man and woman, wife and husband and so on. We seem to either deliberately, avoid it and so become rather hypocritical in our life, that is, saying one thing, and doing something totally opposite to what you have said. So we gradually become a rather hypocritical group of people. And also we were saying yesterday that a regeneration of the mind is necessary. Though technologically man has advanced extraordinarily, perhaps to destroy himself and destroy the earth and the air, and everything else; and that regeneration can only be possible when we are aware, know, appreciate the state or the condition in which we live.

It seems to me if I may point out, that most of us either in business or in some kind of profession or just ordinary people like you and me, seem to forget that we are concerned with a life that is becoming more and more intricate, complex, and so unclear, uncertain. It is only clarity that brings about innocence, and we will talk about that clarity, perhaps, if time allows later on.

Regeneration is possible when we have abandoned or put aside totally our usual religious, moral, evasive attitudes. We talked about it yesterday, also. We said, perhaps some of you may remember, that we human beings who have lived perhaps two or three million years or more, morally, psychologically were just about the same as we were two thousand or five thousand or ten thousand years ago. We have the same problems - sorrow, pain, grief, the utter lack of love, fear and so on. We don't seem to have come to grips with them and gone beyond them. We are still living in all this common factor of all humanity. As we said yesterday again that you are the essence of all humanity because you suffer, go through all kinds of miseries, unhappiness, disappointment, despair and pursuit of pleasure and so on. So you are the common factor of all humanity and, perhaps, if you change radically you do affect the consciousness of mankind. That's also a truth, a fact.

So we are talking about not only moral regeneration, but a total regeneration of the mind - mind being not only the quality of intelligence, the capacity to understand, perceive and also the capacity of the brain that is not wounded, that is not damaged, that is not living under constant pressure, and a sense of deep abiding love for nature, for trees, birds, rocks, the stray dogs and a love of each other. When we talk about mind we include all that, not merely an intellectual capacity.

And we were saying yesterday with regard to desire, the capacity of the brain to make images, that is, we said the movement of desire is perception, the seeing, the contact, the sensation and thought bringing about an image and from that flows, moves desire. That is an obvious fact. And desire is one of the factors of conflict in our daily life, as comparison which is the conflict of duality. We went into that very carefully yesterday and we won't go into it again today.

But I think we should consider seriously the capacity of thought to make images, pictures, symbols, words and we live in that world of words, symbols, images, pictures - and as we said, we are going to examine that fact. Please bear in mind again, if I may repeat, that we are partaking in our exploration, I am not speaking to you as a lecturer giving certain ideas, but on the contrary we are sharing together our problems; sharing, partaking, inviting each other to look at our major problems in life, and when we do look, as we said, it is possible without any effort whatsoever to bring about a transformation. That is the point, that, one has to learn the art of observation. Art means the capacity to put everything in its right place. That is the real meaning of that word art, to put everything in its right place, so that the mind is liberated, is free from constant disorder.

So we are going to talk over together, together, I mean together, partaking in understanding what we mean by observing, whether we observe at all the trees, the birds, or your wife, your children, observe. And what does observation mean? Because we are going to go into something when we find out what it means to observe and actually learn the art of observation. We are going to go into the question of why the brain, thought brings about images and with those images we live, from which arises fear. We are going to go into that together. So first what do we mean by observing, the art of observing, the art of seeing. We talked yesterday about the art of listening, whether we listen at all to anybody or we are always occupied with our own thoughts, with our own problems or, if we do hear another, it is always translated according to the pattern, pictures, images that we have about that person. So there is never actual listening to another. So we are now talking over together this question what it means to observe. Of course if we know how to observe, perhaps we may dissolve all our problems. To observe, to see. Perception is not only visual, optical, but also a great deal of psychological interference with what we observe.

We observe through many conclusions. Right? Please go into it as we are talking, observe, see how you look at it. You have some conclusions and you look with those conclusions, or you have some experience and from those experiences you have cultivated a memory and that memory looks. Which is, the past looks, because memory is always the past, as knowledge is always the past. And with the eyes and memories, and remembrance of the past you look. That is a fact. So you are never actually looking. Right? You are always looking with a distortion, with a conclusion, with an opinion and so you never see actually 'what is'. Your desire, your conflict interferes with observation. So we are asking, is it possible to observe without the interference of the past? The past is the observer. Right? All right, I see I am not making myself clear. Let us bring it down to much more reality which is, when you look at your wife or your girl friend, or your husband or your guru, if you have one, and I hope you haven't got any, when you look at them you have already formed a picture, an image, and that image looks, that picture looks, that conclusion looks. So there is never a direct observation of anything, of your relationship with another. Right? So the past is the observer - the past being the experiences, the accumulated memories which have become knowledge stored in the brain cells and that knowledge, that experience, that memory looks, and so, there is always an observation which is distorted. So we are asking, can you look, observe nature, the birds, the rocks, the stray dog and your wife, your husband without the picture you have created about that person. Can you do that? Then only it is possible to observe actually your relationship.

Can you observe the speaker, this speaker, without the image, the picture you have built around him? And if you cannot, your communication with the speaker and his communication with you is distorted. You don't actually listen so completely. You can only listen completely to something new, but if you come with your old habits, with your old memories, you know all the rest of it, you can't possibly listen totally. In the same way if you come with a picture of the speaker, his reputation, and all the blah that is around him, you can't possibly have a direct communication with each other, because I have no picture about you because I don't know you. Even if I knew you, I wouldn't build a picture about you because we must go into the word, 'know' and 'knowledge'. Sorry to complicate all this. Can you ever say you know a person? Can you ever say you know your wife, or your husband, or your guru or your whatever it is, your boss? You will have knowledge about him, superficial knowledge, what he looks like, and so on and so on, but one can never actually say, I know. Because the person is a living thing. And when you say; I know, you are then caught in the image that you have created about that person. I hope you see all this. So then you look at the person with a totally different mentality, that you are actually looking at a person or nature, the beauty of the sky as though for the first time. We never ask, why do we as human beings live in the past, and all our activity stems from the past, why? You understand my question? We are the past. Just a minute, don't agree or disagree, let us examine. We are exploring, you are exploring as much as the speaker is actually exploring now. So it is not a matter of agreement or disagreement. You are looking.

Why do we live in images, images being symbols and words? Why the past which is made up of our memories, of our experiences, knowledge, why is that so dominant in our life, the past? Is it because, please find out for yourself, though I may talk about it, find out for yourself if it is the truth, if it is the fact - is it because the past is more secure, more certain and the future is totally uncertain? So the past knowledge, and all knowledge is the past, however great that knowledge be, we live in the past and the past is more secure, more certain, we are aware of that, we are in contact with it and that gives us a great sense of security. Right? Is that so? Right? And so the past meets the present, the present incidents, accidents, experiences, modifies itself and goes on. Right? The past meeting the present, modifies itself and goes on to the future, that is our life, that is the flow of our life, of our everyday life. Right? Now we are asking why does the brain which is the mind and so on, why does the brain live in the past? I am going to go into something. I hope you won't mind, perhaps a little complex, but if you don't understand, say so, and we will go into it and explain much more. Our brains are damaged. Our brains are deformed. I will explain why, first listen. Our brains are not functioning at their highest level. Where there is pressure, the brain must be marred, must be distorted. Right? When there is any kind of pressure, there must be distortion. Right? That is so. If I am pushing you always in one direction, your whole conditioning is deformed, and all conditioning is a form of damage. So when the brain is constantly under pressure, as yours is, then it is deformed. Right? Think about it, go into it. You are under pressure, aren't you? Economic pressure, social pressure, pressure of propaganda, the pressure of religions, the pressure of gurus, the pressure of ideals, the pressure of your wife, husband, you are constantly under pressure. No? And so where there is pressure, the brain must be deformed. Are we aware of this? Are we aware that we live under pressure, which is in this country, over population, poverty, constant, ruthless competition, division, all those act as a pressure - economic, social, tradition. So our brains are damaged, deformed.

Now is it possible not to be deformed? That is one of the questions we have to ask and find out if it is possible or not. I hope you are following all this. First may I ask are we investigating together or are you merely listening to the speaker? Are you actually investigating your own self, the way you think, the way you feel, the way you act. Are you not under pressure? Right? You are under pressure and when there is pressure on the brain it must yield and if there is enough vitality in the brain it can reject, it cannot be moulded by pressure. Right? I wonder if you understand all this. It is very important to find out for yourselves whether you live under a pressure - the pressure of jealousy, the pressure of greed, the pressure of comparing, the pressure of imitation, the pressure of obedience - watch yourself please - the pressure of competition. So life as we live it is under great pressure, strain, which must naturally affect the brain, and so our conduct, our behaviour, our way of thinking is distorted. Right? Now we are asking is it possible not to live under pressure so that the brain is clear, and therefore totally undamaged, undeformed. I don't know if you have gone into the question of clarity, having a clear mind, not a confused mind. Lawyers have a good mind, a clear mind, that is a speciality, but in their relationship with each other, with their wives, with their children, they are confused. So we are saying a total clarity of the mind is the essence of innocence. Perhaps we will talk about it later.

So we are asking is it possible to live a life in which there is no pressure whatsoever, so that the brain is not deformed, so that one acts freely, innocently, totally because most of us are neurotic. It is obvious when you sit here, some of you should come up here and sit with me, and you observe how neurotic we are in our action, in our behaviour, in our peculiar expression of seeking religion, whatever god and all that you seek there is this deformation of the mind, of the brain from which there can never be right action. So we are going to find out what it means to have right action under all circumstances, wherever we are, whether we are a business man, a sannyasi - you wouldn't be a sannyasi if you knew what right action was. Right? That is very simple. A right action in your relation with your wife, with your children, with your husband, with your neighbour. And to find that out very deeply, actually, one has to find out if one is living under pressure and to be free of any pressure. Out of that comes right action.

We said yesterday, desire with all its conflicts is one of the factors of pressure. We explained what desire is. I am not going to go into that. We also explained the conflict between the opposites, which is also a pressure. There is only 'what is', there is no opposite. Right? This is difficult to perceive, this is difficult to go into, because we have always lived with the opposites. We have never said to ourselves: let me look at what actually is. The word 'actual' means that which is happening now, to see actually what is happening, not have the educated, cultivated ideal, which is the opposite. So you discard the opposite entirely, not that there is not the woman and man, sunlight and darkness, but the psychological structure in which we live which admits duality. But when you observe, look, there is only 'what is', the actual thing that is happening. So desire, conflict in ourselves of these opposites and fear. Fear is one of the great pressures on our mind, on our brain. Right? Are you following all this? What am I to do? Is this all totally new to you? Is this all something that you haven't gone into yourself and found? Or are you just waiting to be told. Sir, when you are waiting to be told, out of your confusion, out of your uncertainty, you create authority. You understand? You are responsible for creating authority and then having created the authority you just obey like so many sheep. There is no actual discovery for yourself. You are all secondhand human beings. And what we are saying is, please in the name of heaven share this, partake in this, examine, explore together in this. It is as much your responsible as the speaker to find out and not just sit there and accept or not accept.

So we are saying fear, as desire, conflict is one of the factors that deforms the brain. So we are going to examine why we live in fear and whether it is possible to be totally, completely, utterly free of fear; not only biological fear, the fear of getting hurt and so on but the psychological fears which mankind has accumulated through centuries, through millennia, whether it is at all possible to be completely rid of it. And we say it is possible, and we are not talking secondhand. It is possible. So we are exploring together fear, which means, what are you afraid of, what is actually your fear? Is it that you are lonely, and therefore afraid, or you are so withdrawn from humanity through your own isolating process that you have lost contact with another, that you have lost contact with nature. You are so withdrawn because you have been so hurt. Please examine all this, explore it, not analyzing. My lord! As we said analysis is paralysis. You laugh, it is a good phrase. But you are educated to analyze. All the psychiatric societies, groups, psychoanalysts are all processes of analysis. But you never ask who is the analyzer. You take it for granted. Is not the analyzer the analyzed? Examine it, go into it, find out. The analyzer is the analyzed. If he is to analyze, if the analyzer is to analyze, he must know what he is analyzing. So you are part of the analysis, like the thinker is the thought, without thought there is no thinker, like the experiencer is the experience and so on. There is no time perhaps to go into this question of analysis. We have discussed this point with a great many psychotherapists, they go up to a certain point and they abandon it, because for various reasons, economic, social reasons, their wives and their responsibilities and so on. They go so far to a certain point and no further and probably you do the same.

But we are asking that by observing fear without analysis, it will tell you the whole structure and nature of fear, not that you tell fear what it is, but if you can observe fear, without analysis, it reveals its content. Right? Do you know fear? Or are you aware of fear after it has happened, or project what might happen. You are following? No? I am asking you, if I may, what is fear? You are afraid of darkness, perhaps, you are afraid of loneliness, you are afraid of not being happy, you are afraid of so many things, aren't you? If you are a sannyasi you are afraid of not achieving enlightenment in this life. If you are a husband you are afraid your wife might look at somebody else and so on and so on. Right?

There are so many fears. There is bodily fear: having had pain you are afraid of the pain or the disease recurring. So there are all these kinds of fears - fear in dreams - I mustn't go into that because there is a tremendous lot to be said about sleep and dreams. Sorry, I mustn't go into it because this is slightly distracting. So are we concerned with the many expressions of fear or are we concerned with fear itself? Not the object of fear but the root of fear, you understand? Which is it that you are investigating with me? Is it the many expressions of fear - fear about something, fear about my boss, fear about my losing the house, fear of death, fear of not being happy, fear about my not becoming a success and so on, fear about, which has many expressions; or are you concerned with the root of fear? You understand my question? Which is it that you want to investigate with me, the expressions, the objects of fear - fear of losing your wife, fear of death, fear about this, fear about that - or the fact of fear itself?

Be quite clear what we are investigating. If you are investigating your own particular fear because you are lonely, because your husband has run away, this and that, then you are looking at a particular form of fear. Right? Whereas we are asking if one can understand the very nature and structure of fear, the expression, fear about something comes to an end. Right? So be clear. We are investigating not the expressions or about fear but fear itself. Are we together in this? Because please, it is very important to understand fear. We have lived with fear for millennia, and out of fear we have created the gods and all the circus that goes on in the name of religion. We invent so many things, so many images out of fear which are not real, which are not actual. So it is very important to understand and be free of fear. And that is why we are investigating together into this question. It is not for amusement. It is not for intellectual entertainment. Because in investigating this thing together you may walk out of this place completely free of fear. That is what the speaker wants you to do: to walk out as a free man with light and laughter, joy inside, with a song. I am sorry!

So we are investigating into fear. To go into the root of fear we must understand why the brain, thought lives in images. Please follow this a little bit. Why you live and create images, pictures, about the future, about your wife, your husband, about the speaker and so on? Why you create pictures. Because if you don't create pictures and images, is there fear? Go into this very carefully. So we must first go into the question why thought breeds these complicated, complex pictures, images in which we live. Right? So we must ask what is thought. You understand? Please, are we going together? No? We are investigating into fear and to go into that very deeply you must enquire into why thought creates the picture of the future or of the past which breeds fear, and what is thought? Unless you understand this you will not come face to face with fear. You will avoid it. You will run away from it. Because fear is a living thing. You can't control it, you can't put a lid on. Right?

We are investigating now, not fear, but thought which creates the images about which it is frightened. Right? Am I the only one working or are you also working together with me? It's up to you. What is thought, what is the origin, the beginning of thought? Right? You must answer that question, not just say, well I will look in some book and try to find out. There is no book that will tell you what is the origin. We are going to find out what is the beginning of thought. Right? Animals, the higher form of apes have a form of thinking, some form of calculated intelligence. So we are asking what is the beginning, the origin of thought? The first man, you understand, the first ape man, how did he begin to think? Because in us there is the origin of thinking. Are you following all this? Or is this becoming too complex? Right? The origin of thinking is the registration, the imprint on the brain of an incident, like the tape recorder recording on the ribbon what is being said. So similarly the brain records everything that is happening in us and around us. This is a fact. And the recording is necessary for its survival, for its security. Otherwise you wouldn't know how to talk and so on. I won't go into all that rather unnecessary detail. So the recording, which is the function of the brain to survive, and to survive it must think ahead or think about the past which will help for it to act skilfully in the present. Right?

So the origin of thinking begins with the recording of an experience, of an idea and so on, recording. And therefore, having recorded the past pain, physical past pain, then thought says, I must not have that pain again tomorrow, and so it is frightened of tomorrow. It has created a picture of tomorrow having a pain, and so it is frightened of that. Are you getting this? See the connection between creating an image and fear and how the brain registers, holding to some biological, physical pain, then thought says, I hope I will not have that again. Right? So image-making, thought, making pictures is the beginning of fear. Right? I wish you would see this. You understand sir? Suppose I have a very good job in a good business and there are cleverer people below me who are going to push me out. So I have an image of what might happen tomorrow, the clever boys coming and pushing me out. So I imagine, there is an image, thought is making an image of what might happen to me and so I am frightened. You follow this? So thought with its pictures and images causes fear. This is one factor.

Thought which is the movement of time is another factor of fear. That is, what might happen in the future. Right? I am living, I am quite safe, no disease, but I might die tomorrow. So the tomorrow is the movement of thought, as time. Right sir? I am going to watch you. I hope it will help me. Time being, not only by the watch, by the sun, but also time as inward time, psychological time. That is, I am not what I should be but I will be tomorrow. The tomorrow then becomes tremendously important. Right? So I am frightened that anything might happen between now and tomorrow. I wonder if you see all this. So thought is a movement in time, and movement means time. To go from here to your house means time. To become, psychological something, implies time. So as long as there is time, there is fear. And thought is the movement of time. Right? Not how to stop thought. You understand this? Right sir? Not stopping thought. If you stop thought, who is the entity that is stopping thought? It is still thought. Is that clear, right? Right sir? So you have to understand the nature and the structure of thought in order to be totally and completely free of fear. It is thought that is making fear. It is thought that says, what might happen, or what has happened in the past and I am afraid of that. Right? So that is why it is important to investigate the whole movement and nature of thought. Thought, as we said, has its origin in registration. Now please listen. Is it possible to register only what is absolutely necessary and nothing else? You have understood my point? That is, I insult you, or rather the other way round, better, you insult me, and I register it. And that registration which is memory is going to react next time I meet you, which is totally unnecessary. Why should I register insult or flattery? When you do so register your reactions, your responses are distorted. Right? So I am asking you, is it possible not to register psychologically, inwardly, but only register how to speak a language, how to drive a car, how to do your business, and all the rest of it. Only register that and nothing else. Then there is no fear at all. I wonder if you see this. No, sir, don't agree. It requires deep penetration, an insight, an inward look to find out whether your brain can be free to register only that which is obviously necessary, and not build the psychological structure of the 'me', which is in essence the root of fear.

You may intellectually, or verbally understand this, but that isn't good enough. But you have to go into it very deeply to understand this, which is, thought, the origin of thought, which is the registration, like a tape registering your voice, so the brain is registering. It has been trained, it has been educated through school, college, university, and to suddenly come upon this non-registration, except where it is necessary, is a tremendous task, which means you have to watch without analysis, without direction, watch whether the brain is not receiving insults, flattery, hurts. You follow? To be so tremendously alert. Then you will see for yourself, you can test it under all circumstances that the psychological fears come totally to an end.

So you have investigated this with me this evening, has that fear ended in you? Not in me, don't bother about me, because it is so - I won't tell you, it doesn't matter, that is totally irrelevant. Have you together investigated, explored, therefore partaken in this exploration, this fact of fear? If you have not then you have not listened. If you have listened with your heart, with your mind, with all your blood, listened, then that very listening is a miracle and will wipe away fear, because you have understood the whole structure and the nature of fear.

So it is very important to understand and to live - I am using the word 'understand' not verbally, but we are using the word 'understand' which implies action, which implies perception and action. Not perception, then act much later. I wonder if you understand this? Action means the doing now. That is what it means, the active present of the verb to act, which means you are acting now, not, I will act, or I have acted. So are you listening, perceiving in this exploration the whole movement of fear, the whole movement, both the biological, the physical fears, as well as the psychological fears, the nature of fear, how thought through the image, picture, which is time, creates this feeling of fear, uncertainty. Right? Have you explored and found the truth of it, have you an insight into it, have you touched the very root of fear, and therefore it is like cutting down a tree, it's finished. Are you in that state? Or when you leave here you are going to be afraid of your wife, your husband, your - all the rest of it? Then you have wasted your time. Don't waste your life, for heaven's sake, don't waste your life. This is the only life we have. What you do now matters enormously.

Therefore, if you act through fear you are lost. Fear and love cannot exist together. In this country there is no love. They have devotion, reverence but no love. Devotion to your guru, to your gods, to your ideals, is self-worship. Right? You understand? It's self-worship because you have created your guru, your ideals, your gods, you have created them, thought has created them, which is, your grandfather has, and you accept it because it satisfies you, so it gives you comfort. So what you are devoted to is you are devoted to yourself. Right? Swallow that pill and live with it! So we are asking, as love cannot exist with fear, and we live in fear, the other thing is not. And when you have the other thing you have all life, and then do what you will it will be right action. But fear can never bring about right action, as desire can never bring about right action, or conflict. So when you understand fear, the root of fear, go down to the very depths of fear, then the pressure on the brain doesn't exist, therefore the brain again becomes fresh, innocent, not something jaded, moulded, shaped, made ugly as it is now.

So please if you have not understood this now, go home and spend an hour with yourself, quietly to find out. You may cry, you may sigh, you may shed tears, but find out how to live without a shadow of fear, then you will know what love is.

BOMBAY 3RD PUBLIC TALK 28TH JANUARY 1978

If I may, I would like to talk about several things this evening. First of all, we should establish between us the right kind of communication, not only the verbal communication, because words and language drive us and we very rarely use words with their full significance. So, if I may point out, one has to be very watchful of words. One is caught in words and words become very significant. But language is meant to be used to communicate. So language shouldn't drive us, but we should use language to understand each other. So, if I may point out, when we are communicating, as we are this evening, we should be very watchful that the words don't trap us and the words do not limit our perception, our insight.

I would like to, first of all, if I may, point out again that we are exploring together into some of the problems which the speaker is going to raise this evening. To explore into a problem very deeply, one must be free from one's motives, from one's prejudices, one's fixations and conclusions. To investigate, the mind must be extraordinarily free to look, and we are going to try and look and explore together - I mean together, not that the speaker talks and you just listen, but rather sharing, partaking, participating, in what we are going to talk about together.

First of all, I wonder why you come. That is rather interesting if you go into it and find out for yourself, why you are all sitting there, listening to the speaker. He has something very definite to say and he would like that you understand what he says completely, totally, utterly. Then he would like that you should participate in what he is talking about. And when you are participating, sharing, you must be equally responsible. Also, if I may again point out, you must be eager, intense, to find out. I think love is that state of mind which wants to communicate at the same level, with the same intensity, with the same clarity, and if we have not this quality of affection and eagerness to participate in what we are talking about, to get totally involved, then they remain merely words, they remain merely an intellectual concept, ideas. But if we can listen, not merely to the words but to something that is beyond the words; nothing mysterious, but not to be caught in verbal, linguistic drives. Right? Is that clear? I don't know if you are, but we will proceed.

First of all, we live in great disorder, both outwardly and inwardly. And disorder is a wastage of energy. Where there is complete order within oneself, there is the essence of all energy. So, we will talk a little while about the disorder in which we live.

What is the root of disorder? What makes our lives so disorderly, so confused, so uncertain? And being uncertain, confused, we try to find something that will give us security, certainty. And in the search for that certainty and security we get caught in all kinds of mischievous activities. So, I would like to, if I may, go into this question: why human beings, you and others, live in such confusion. I don't know if you are aware or conscious that you do live in confusion. Why? And we seem to get used to this confusion, to this disorder. Why? Is it that to break away from disorder is more frightening, more uncertain, than to live in disorder? Because we are used to disorder; the dirt, the squalor, the poverty, the misery, outwardly the appalling political conditions that are going on, and also inwardly, this great uncertainty, confusion and choosing. I think one of the destructive activities is choice. We think we are free when we can choose, whether it be in philosophy, or the ideals, or the statement, because you are free, politically, religiously and all the rest of it, we think we are free to choose. It is only the mind that is confused, uncertain, disorderly, that chooses, not a mind that is clear, not a mind that sees everything in order. It has no choice. It does what is actually right under all circumstances. So, one asks, and I hope you are asking yourself, why we live in such great disorder. You know what we mean by disorder; contradiction, imitation, conformity, obeying, repeating over and over again the same thing, all that is going on, within and without. Why do human beings support, entertain, continue to live in disorder?

One knows, if one has gone into this question, that when there is order there is great energy. The greater the order, the greater the energy. If you have your room in order, put away things in their right place, then there is no confusion. You go directly and you don't waste your energy in searching where things are. And when one lives in disorder, as most people do, there is constant seepage of energy. And we are going to find out, participate, why one lives in disorder, if one is at all aware. Why? I think one of the reasons is that we accept conflict as inevitable. A mind that is in conflict is obviously in disorder. Are we meeting each other, or am I making statements and you just agree or disagree? Are we sharing this thing together, participating, or are you just casually listening? Because, I think it is very important to find out for oneself, whether it is possible to live completely, totally in order, so that there is complete order. A machine that is not functioning properly is wasting energy. So, one asks oneself - and please ask yourselves, if I may suggest - what is the root cause of disorder.

Pleasure is the root. Pleasure. I will go slowly. There is pleasure, enjoyment and joy, and beyond joy there is ecstasy. And what is pleasure? Why do human beings, right throughout the world, pursue pleasure - pleasure sexually, pleasure in having a position, status, pleasure in seeking enlightenment, following a guru, following a system and all that, pleasure of belonging to something, to a group, to a community, the pleasure of pursuing an ideal, the pleasure of practising certain systems of meditation? What is this pleasure? And why do human beings pursue it? There is total disorder - lovely country this is. When you walk down any street the debris in the road never removed year after year, and we put up with it. That's up to you.

So, we are asking: what is the nature and the structure of pleasure? When we use the word structure, I don't mean merely the form, the scaffolding, but the whole movement of pleasure, because if we don't understand that very deeply, we may get caught in what we superficially call love. So, it seems to me very important to understand and go into it very deeply - why human beings are caught in the pursuit of pleasure. Pleasure is always - I was going to use the word individual, but there is no such person as an individual, I am going to explain what we mean by the word 'individual', so don't get alarmed - pleasure is always secretive, isolating. I mean by isolating, you may join others in the pursuit of a certain form of pleasure, but in that joining a group, you are always isolated, if you have not noticed it in yourself. And pleasure, as being an isolated and secretive process, may be, and probably is, one of the major factors of disorder. And what do we mean by that word - the pleasure of having great wealth, the pleasure of controlling oneself absolutely, the pleasure of austerity? The word 'austerity' means ash. It comes from the word 'ash'. Most people who practise austerity, become very dry. They have the practice; but inwardly, they have no life, no living quality. So, why do human beings pursue pleasure, and what is the nature of pleasure? You know, the objects of pleasure may vary. One may seek sexual pleasure or the pleasure of climbing a mountain or the pleasure of running a race, and so on. The objects vary but the essence of pleasure is always the same. Right? The root of it, though the branches of pleasure may multiply, vary, but the root of pleasure is always constant.

So, we are asking, what is the nature of pleasure? At the moment of pleasure, at the second of pleasure, is there a recognition that says, 'I am having a great pleasure'. You follow what I am saying? At the moment of anger, there is no you to be conscious of being angry. It is only after it is over that you say, 'I have been angry'. In the same way, at the second of pleasure there is no you who says, 'I have had pleasure'. It is only after it that you say, 'Yes, what a pleasurable meal I had. What a pleasurable evening!' Or when you have achieved a status, a position, and that gives you a certain form of pleasure, then that is recognizable. But generally, pleasure is a second, or a little later.

So one discovers that pleasure is the movement of time. After all, when you have had pleasure - sexually, or the pleasure of seeing a most marvellous mountain with the blue sky, the lines, the valleys, the snow, the marvel of light - the seeing gives you great delight. What actually takes place there? Please observe it in yourself. You see something extraordinarily beautiful. Have you ever seen something extraordinarily beautiful? I doubt it. A flowing river, a sheet of water, the beauty of a night full of stars, the bird quietly singing away, and when you see such extraordinary majesty of a mountain, what takes place? Have you considered it? You see this extraordinary thing called mountain. The majesty of it for a moment drives all your worries, all your problems, pushes everything aside because of its greatness, its magnificence. Like a child with a toy - the toy absorbs the attention or the pleasure of the child. Similarly, the great beauty of a mountain, the evening light on a water, drives away the 'me', the self. Then, a second later, thought says, how marvellous it was, that feeling. Are you noticing all this? Don't you know all these? What a lovely sunset it was. So, thought, which is the movement of time, thought captures that incident and demands more of it. The demand for the more is the pursuit of pleasure. Are we understanding each other? The remembrance of a thing past, and that remembrance re-awakening the memory, that memory says: I must have more of that marvellous state. One has had a marvellous experience or experience of great delight in the past, it is recorded, and thought then says: I must continue with that delight, though it is over, there must be more of it. The demand for the more is the pursuit of pleasure. Right? That is a fact.

So, pleasure is the movement of a remembrance and the pursuit of that remembrance. Right, sir? Now, can you observe? Please test it, test the statement that the speaker is making, don't accept a thing he says, but test it, test it in your daily life. You see something beautiful, a beautiful woman or a beautiful man or the beautiful sunset with all the light and the glory and the extraordinary radiance of it. To see it and not record it. You understand my question? The moment you record it, you are already caught in the pursuit of pleasure.

So, enjoyment is not pleasure. You enjoy at the moment it is happening. Then, thought takes it over and says: 'What a lovely thing that was: I must have more of it.' So, to enjoy and not pursue it - you understand what I am talking about? Will you do it, are you doing it as you go along? No, you are not. And joy is something entirely different. You can invite pleasure, you can pursue pleasure, you can cultivate pleasure. But joy you cannot capture. It comes uninvited like ecstasy; not the ecstasy of a vision or an experience, but an ecstasy in which there is no recording whatsoever. We won't go into that for the moment. So, there is this pleasure which brings about disorder. There is enjoyment. You can enjoy a beautiful sunset, but the moment that enjoyment is captured by thought, thought then wants more of it, then it becomes pleasure. And joy is something that cannot be invited. And when there is that quality of joy, to observe it, to not record it, requires an extraordinary sense of alertness, watchfulness because the whole machinery of the brain is to record, remember, to store up knowledge.

So, we are asking: is pleasure, desire, love? Please answer that question for yourself. You have many desires, many pleasures, above all sexual pleasure which you call love, and we are questioning: is that love? Or love has nothing whatsoever to do with pleasure and desire?

Love of a guru is fear. Right? The love, the respect that you have for your bosses, for your politicians, for your gurus, for your so-called higher authorities, that respect which is never shown to those below you, politically, religiously, morally, ethically, in business, is really a cowardice. Are you accepting all this? The word 'respect' means to look back. Do you understand the meaning of that word? It is very significant. When you say, 'I respect somebody,' especially those above you - financially, so-called religiously - there is nobody spiritually above you, I don't think you understand all this - when you show respect, you are looking back and looking back in order to find out that which is most profitable. Right? So, we're asking: is pleasure love, is desire love? Does an ambitious man, who is climbing the ladder of success, know love? Does the man or the woman who has a family, husband, wife know what it means to love? Or is there a relationship with another, which is not based on memory, image, psychological, sexual pursuit, a relationship in which the 'me' and the 'you' don't exist? You understand all this? And we are asking: is there love in this country? Don't say: is there love in another country? That is a political reply. But actually, when you consider and go into it very deeply, it is one of the greatest tragedies of this country, that there is not love at all. There is respect, there is devotion, there is bootlicking, psycophantism, everything but the other.

To bring about a regeneration of one's mind, one's whole being, love is the flame that burns away all the meanness, the brutality, the cruelty, the ugliness. And so we are going to find out through negation what it is, what is the positive, through negation discover that which is the positive. When there is jealousy, there is no love. Right? When there is ambition, there is no love. When you are competing, there is no love. When there is fear, there is no love. So, can you be totally free of fear, negate fear, not deny fear, understand the nature of fear and go into it, live with it, totally wipe it away? In the same way, to be completely free of ambition. You say in this world, if you are not ambitious you will be destroyed. Be destroyed. You understand? Because without love, you are dead, without love, you cannot bring about a new civilization, new culture, nothing.

How can a man who is thinking about himself, about his problems, his worries, who is busy building himself up - how can he love? So, can you live a life without ambition, without fear, having a right relationship with another, not based on memories, pictures, images? Do go into it, because without deeply understanding the nature and the beauty of this thing called love, which is so loaded with all kinds of ugly memories and associations, because if we don't clearly understand what love is, you will not be able to understand what sorrow is. And therefore, without understanding what love is - not intellectually or verbally but living it - you will never understand the depth and the greatness of death, which we are going to explore together what is sorrow. You understand what we are saying?

We are saying pleasure is one of the factors, perhaps the major factor, of disorder in our lives and therefore it is a wastage of energy. Where there is disorder, there is wastage of energy. And also we said in enquiring what is pleasure, perhaps in the understanding, in going to the depth of it, order will come, and therefore you will have greater energy to put aside your ambitions, your greeds, your fears, so that you know what love is - and therefore bring about right relationship with man and woman. From that arises the question, naturally and inevitably, what is sorrow? Why do human beings throughout the world put up with sorrow? Why in the Christian world is sorrow worshipped, worshipped in the one man who bears the sorrows of mankind. That is all very romantic and all the rest of it, but actually, we are all, most human beings, everyone is in sorrow of some kind or another. Here in India, they explain it very carefully - past lives and karma and all the rest of it. But that has not solved the problem. You live in sorrow, and the question is: can sorrow end, is there an ending of sorrow? Not get used to it, not accept it, not carry the burden of sorrow in your heart, but find out for yourself whether there is the ending of it.

When someone dies whom you say you love, you are in sorrow, you shed tears. There is the sorrow of poverty, ignorance. There is the sorrow of not being loved. This is your lot. Please listen to all this, not by the ear, but with your heart listen. There is the sorrow of disease, there is the sorrow that man feels in complete isolation. There is the sorrow of poverty, when you see all these poor, ignorant, dirty, hopeless people. There is sorrow when you see all the animals of the world being killed, destroyed, butchered in laboratories, and so on. There is sorrow when you see a young seal being killed by a man with a bludgeon, all the millions of whales being killed. And the wars - thousands of people killed, children maimed, you know all that. There is sorrow. Can all this, can this sorrow in human beings, end?

So, there is a peculiar thing: in ending there is a new beginning. If you end something, there is something new taking place. But, if there is a continuity, there is nothing new. But we cling to continuity, because in continuity we think there is safety. Right? Say for instance, you are attached to somebody, or to your ideal, to a belief, to whatever it is, or to your guru. I hope none of you have gurus. I will repeat it till I die. It is the most ugly thing to follow somebody, especially in matters of the spirit.

Can sorrow end? Your sorrow. Which means, if you end sorrow, out of that ending comes passion, not lust. Most human beings know what lust is. But lust is not passion. Passion comes into being when there is the ending of sorrow. And sorrow exists only when there is this enormous fear of death. That is the ultimate fear. Isn't it? Sir, look at it; for god's sake, be honest. So, without passion there is no regeneration of the mind, and that passion can only come into being when there is the ending of sorrow. So, you must enquire, find out for yourself, spend time, energy, to find out whether it is possible - this thing that man has carried throughout the millenniums - to end that thing.

Now what is sorrow? Is it a word? The word - please listen - the word, as we said at the beginning of the talk, drives most of us. The language drives us. We don't drive the language, the language drives us. So the word 'sorrow', the description of sorrow, is not sorrow. Right? I can describe in various ways what sorrow is; but the description is never the fact, never the described. So, we must be very clear, not to be caught in the description, in the symbol, in the word. Right? So we are dealing only with the fact, not with the word, not with the symbol. So, what is the fact of sorrow, the actuality of sorrow? That is - please listen - the word 'actual' means that which is happening now. Right? Sorrow as an actuality, does it exist? My son dies, I will never see him again. I thought I loved him. And that love may be inherited from the monkeys that love their little babies. Please face all these facts; because our brains are very old - it is derived through thousands of years, millennia, millions of years. So it is very, very old. And when a mother loves a child, it may be derived from that ancient instinctual reaction. And is sorrow a word? Does the word create sorrow - please listen - does the word create sorrow or sorrow exist by itself, irrespective of the word, irrespective of the incident, irrespective of my son dying? Do you understand my question? Or is sorrow always associated with an incident? My son dies, my wife dies.

We are asking: is there sorrow by itself, per se? Or is it always in relation to something? if it is in relation to something, it is not sorrow. No sir, don't nod your head so easily. I don't quite know if I understand it myself. I have just made a statement which I am going to penetrate and enquire because I don't prepare talks. What did I say? I said: is there sorrow without the word? If there is no word, and if there is no relationship which brings sorrow, then has sorrow a cause? Is sorrow an effect? Please go into it with me. If there is a cause, then the effect is sorrow. Then the effect becomes the cause. It is like a chain, isn't it? When there is a cause, the cause produces an effect. That effect becomes the cause for the next effect. So, it is a chain. Now, is sorrow a movement of bondage? Are you following what I am saying? Yes, sir? Or is sorrow something that has existed and will exist for the rest of our lives and for generations upon generations? And it will exist if there is a cause. Do you understand? Leave it there for the moment, because we want to go into the question of death.

We never ask, what is death? Not the unknown, after death, but what is the meaning, the state of a mind, the whole thing, when there is no breath? Are you understanding all this? I don't think you are, but I will go on. Sirs and ladies, death must be a most extraordinary thing - if one is not frightened - because it is something of such colossal importance in our lives, much more than sex, much more than pleasure, much more than all the circus of religions. Death has an extraordinary importance and significance in our life, the dying. And nobody, no religion, or the institutions called religions have answered this question. They have explained it. They say there is another life, you continue with it, you continue what you are, modify and go on. Or, as with the ancient Egyptians, death is part of our life, take what you live with, when you die you carry on with what you have, and all the rest of it. But nobody, it seems to me, perhaps somebody has - I am not asking this in vanity - nobody has asked how to live a life with death. You understand my question? Death is something further away from living, death is something at the end of living. The living is the disease, the pain, the anxiety, the hopeless misery, confusion, despair, hope, anxiety, the sense of utter loneliness, conflict in all our relationship, the utter lack of love, and fight, struggle. That is our life. And we never ask, 'Can I live with death always as my shadow?' That is, death says to each one, everything that you have got - your attachments, your beliefs, your hopes, your fears, your despair - when death comes, all that ends. Actually your brain cells, not having enough oxygen, come to an end within three to five minutes. That is complete death. And to live with death means to end your attachment now. Can you do it? Your attachment to your wife, to your husband, your attachment to your beliefs, your experiences, to your gurus, your visions, to everything that you are attached to. Can you? Not with effort, not with the hope that by getting rid of attachment, you will get something else. That is a merchant's mentality, in which you are very carefully trained: if I give up this, will I have that?

So, can one live with death? That means, ending everyday all that you have acquired. You know what it means then? Then there is the ending of sorrow. Therefore, out of that ending comes tremendous energy of passion; and that passion is love, compassion. Therefore, love, passion and death are very closely related together. But all that you are concerned with is: my son dies, I shed tears, and I hope to meet him in the next life. Or you say: is there a next life? Out of that you have nothing. You understand? You have just ashes - which is just words, beliefs and comfort. You know when you end something - like attachment, I'll take that as an example, or violence, your personal vanity, arrogance - end it, you will see out of that comes a totally different beginning.

So what is important is not what death is, but what is your life, your life now. Because your life now is a tragedy, tragedy of despair, therefore the tragedy of hope, because you are in despair there is the desire, the longing for something hopeful. But if you end despair, there is something entirely different. Hope is the silliest form. But the ending, the ending of your attachment to your husband - the husband may not like it, because he feels secure when you are attached to him, and you like being attached to him or to her because you feel you are secure. So, out of that comes jealousy and anxiety, hatred and all the rest of the nonsense. So, what is important - please listen, not hearing with your ears but listen inside - what matters is your daily life, which is conflict. End conflict, see what happens. End your ambition. If you say that they will crush me, be crushed, die to it.

Because, sirs, if you have no love in your heart, if you have no love for the skies, for the rocks, for the trees, for the birds, for the stray cat - love of beauty - beauty does not exist in this country because you have no love in your heart. So, the ending is the dying and the beginning. If you are only interested in understanding what death is, or crying over your son or your uncle or somebody else dying, then you are not concerned with life, with living. So, can you end your conflicts, your worries, your hatreds, your anxieties? Abandon them? That is death. Then, life and death are not separate. They move together.

BOMBAY 4TH PUBLIC TALK 29TH JANUARY 1978

We have been talking over together the many problems of our daily living, such as relationship, fear, pleasure and the sorrow that man carries throughout his life. And we also talked over together the question of what is love. I think we ought to also talk over together what is meditation, what is the meaning of it, whether it is necessary, and what is the intention of a person who wants to find out what is meditation. But before we go into that, if I may, I would like to point out certain obvious facts which may escape your perception. Most of us are heavily conditioned, most of us follow the easy path of tradition without much thought, the repetitive beliefs, the repetitive conclusions and what the ancient people have said and so on. We are bound a great deal to tradition. And we think that along the traditional way there is some kind of future, hope for man. Tradition implies - the very meaning of that word - to hand down, to pass on, to give from generation to generation a certain set of ideas, systems, beliefs and worship. And also that word has a very definite meaning, which is betrayal; to betray; to betray the present. And, for most of us it is very difficult to break down the walls that generations of the past have built around each human being. Unless we do break down all our beliefs, all our ideas and conclusions, we cannot possibly start with a clean slate, and one must start with a clean slate to find out for oneself what is truth. And, the entity that breaks down tradition is part of the tradition, is not separate from the tradition.

So, the problem arises how is one, knowing that one is heavily, deeply conditioned as a Hindu, Muslim, Buddhist, Christian and so on, whether it is at all possible to uncondition oneself, to break down this conditioning and not enter into another conditioning. To find that out, to break down, one must go into the question whether the entity who wishes to break down the tradition is different from the tradition itself? You understand my question? Please, let us go into this as two friends talking over together. That is, is the observer of the tradition different from the tradition itself? That is the question, first. That is, the entity that wishes to break down the enormous conditioning, the weight of it, is that entity different from the quality of the conditioning itself? Or the entity that wishes to break down the conditioning is part of the conditioning, therefore there is no division between the entity that wishes to break down the conditioning and the conditioning? They are one, not separate. You understand my statement? We think and our conditioning says that the 'I', the person who makes the effect, who breaks down the conditioning, is something totally different from the conditioning. But, when you observe closely, you will see that the entity, the being that endeavours to break down the conditioning is part of that conditioning itself. So, you have a great problem. I hope we are participating in what we are talking about.

You know, one of the most interesting and amusing things is to find out what is the process of our thinking, how we approach a problem. The approach is far more important than the problem itself - how you come to the problem. And the approach to the problem either breaks down the problem or increases the problem. So we must be very clear when we talk about the observer is not different from the observed, which is a fact if you go into it very carefully, how you receive, how you approach, how you participate in that question. That is, a person who is angry, is he different from the person who says 'I must not be angry'? Or the observer is the observed and therefore when the observer is the observed you eliminate altogether conflict? Please understand this very carefully. I'll explain it in ten different ways because we are going to go into something that is very, very complex that must be approached with clarity, and there is no clarity, if there is conflict. So, from the very beginning we are saying that it is important to find out for yourself whether the observer who watches his conditioning is different from that which is conditioned. All right.

Suppose I was born in India - I was born in India - brought up as a Hindu with all the superstitions, pujas, beliefs, illusions, god is in me, god is outside me, god is all in me, you know, that tremendous weight of tradition. Now, is that tradition different from me who is observing that tradition? Do you understand my question? If it is different from me, then there is a division between me and the conditioning. Then I can operate on that conditioning, break it down because I want to go beyond my conditioning. But am I, who is endeavouring to go beyond the conditioning, different from the conditioning itself? If I can solve that problem, then I remove altogether - there is a removal altogether of conflict. You understand? I hope so. Because, when we talk about meditation - as we are going to - any form of effort on the part of the meditator denies meditation, because the meditator is more important than meditation. And to find out, to understand what the meditator is about, is far more necessary, far more important than to say 'Please teach me how to meditate'.

So, we are saying: is the conditioned different from the man or the person who says: 'I want to break down my conditioning.' If he wants to break down his conditioning, then there is conflict. Because the person or the idea that he must break down, thinks he is different. So we are saying both are conditioned. Both. Now, that is the problem first. How do you approach that problem? Is the problem different from you? Or you are the problem? Now, if you are the problem, that is your whole outlook on life, your whole activity, your whole existence is basically, fundamentally conditioned, if you go into it very deeply. And there is no spot, there is no somewhere in that conditioning, some light, some divinity, some energy outside us, that is going to break down the conditioning. The whole human mind is conditioned through education and this modern education is destroying our minds, our brains, through tradition, through beliefs, through the assertion that 'I am different from that which I observe.' That is part of the tradition. So, the entirety of your existence is conditioned.

Now, how do you, if you are at all aware of this problem and if you are somewhat alert to this problem, how do you approach it? You understand my question? What is your reaction, response to this fact? Do you see the fact, or do you make the fact into an idea, and creating the idea, then follow the idea, not the fact? I wonder if you see this. Now what is it your are doing? How do you approach this question, which is basic, which you understand? Because if you are really going into the question of what is meditation, which is very complex, and one has to go to the very root of it, and you cannot possibly understand what it means to meditate if there is any kind of effort. What we are saying goes against all tradition.

So, how do you approach this question? Is it a fact to you, like that tree is a fact, like the person sitting next to you is a fact? But the person sitting next to you, you may like or dislike, or you may have an image about that person, a picture about that person, so, there is a division between you and the person sitting next to you. And in that relationship there is a conflict. Obviously. Isn't there? Let me put it differently, because this is really a very basic question which you must absolutely understand. Am I becoming too serious?

Isn't there conflict between you and your wife or your girl friend, between you and your guru and all the rest of it? Isn't there conflict? Isn't there conflict in yourself? Now, is that conflict different from the observer who says 'I am in conflict'? Or the observer is the very root of conflict? Please don't agree unless you see the fact. This is a microphone. Right? We all name it as a microphone. If we named it as a giraffe, we would all say that it is a giraffe. But we have all agreed that it is a microphone. That is a fact, put together by thought. Right? So, anything put together by thought is a reality. I want to expand this question slowly. Are you following all this?

Nature, that tree is not put together by thought. So, what you make of that tree is put together by thought. A chair made out of wood is put together by thought, but nature is not created by thought. Right? That is clear. No? And anything that thought has created is reality. And thought creates also illusion, and therefore that is also a reality. And thought says: 'I am different from the thing I act upon', because thought has created the observer who is the essence of the past, the observer then says 'I am different from that which I observe'. So he translates what he sees in terms of the past, but the past as the observer is the observed because he translates what he sees in terms of the past. Have you got this? Or are you all asleep? Please, if I may beg of you, we are sharing this thing together. You understand? We are participating in this. If you don't, you don't. Leave it alone. But see the fact. So, the fact is your entire structure, both physiologically as well as psychologically is conditioned. That is a fact. Now, to break down the psychological conditioning, we invent, thought invents the observer who is going to break it down. Thought itself is conditioned. Therefore, whatever it does is conditioned. So we have lived and accepted as tradition duality, the 'me', and the not 'me', we and they. Thought itself is fragmented, because it is the result of memory, experience, knowledge, and knowledge is always limited, and knowledge is always in the past, is the past. Therefore, anything born out of that knowledge, experience, memory is limited, fragmentary. But thought says 'I can investigate the immeasurable, the divine, etc., etc.' But thought itself is fragmentary, it cannot investigate that which is immeasurable, nameless. You get this?

So, we are going to go into this question of whether there is a stop to thought, whether there is an ending to thought, which means, you have to come to the question freely to enquire, not with all your superstitions, your saying 'God has made me, he is in me and he will tell me what to do', and all that stuff. That is just belief, there is no purpose or meaning. So we have to approach this question with a free mind, free mind being without your prejudices, your conclusions, your ideas. That's fairly simple. If you are serious, you can put aside your conclusions, your opinions, your judgments so that your mind is capable of investigating.

So, first we are going to investigate together the question of time. Because it is very important to understand time. There is time by the watch, there is time according to the sun rising, the sun setting, the moon rising, the moon setting, yesterday, today and tomorrow. Time implies movement. To get from here to my house takes time. I have to cover so many miles. That's the movement of time. So, all movement implies time. A tree from the acorn to become an oak takes time. And is there - please listen - is there psychological time at all? You understand? Me breaking down my conditioning which will take time; me that will become better, that will take time; me that is in despair because I have no money, nobody to love, nobody to care for, I am ignorant and I will take time to throw away my ignorance. You understand? I am in despair and there is hope in me, that will take time. All movement is time. Is there such movement, psychologically, inwardly? You understand my question? I wonder because it is part of your tradition to accept time as a means of enlightenment. You must practise, you must prepare, you must struggle, you must follow a guru, follow what he says in order eventually to attain whatever you are going to attain. That involves time. We are questioning, I am questioning, if there is such psychological time at all? Or thought has invented it because thought does not know how to solve problems which it has created.

Are you understanding all this? Look into yourself and see you are greedy or ambitious or jealous. You say that will take time to get rid of it. I am jealous and if I am jealous, I want to be free of it because it brings a lot of antagonism, fear, hate, all the rest of it. It is burdensome, an ugly thing, and I want to get rid of it. So - please follow this carefully - is that jealousy different from me or jealousy is me? And therefore when I realize that jealousy is me I have eliminated time altogether? Then I have a totally different problem. You understand? Come on sirs, help me. I am doing all the work. You understand my question? If I am different from my jealousy, then I can operate upon it, suppress it, rationalize it, say 'why shouldn't I be', and so on and so on. In that process, there is a conflict. Conflict is part of the movement of time. But when there is the realization of the fact that jealousy is me, that is the fact, in that there is no time. So, what then takes place? When the observer is different from the observed, then the observer can act upon it. When the observer is the observed, then what takes place? You understand my question?

We are saying: what takes place when the observer is the observed which is anger? You can test this out for yourself. Don't accept a thing the speaker is saying, because if you accept, repeat, then you are second-hand human beings, which you are. So, please have the courtesy, the dignity, the intensity not to accept anything psychologically. So, we are investigating together this question, when the observer is the observed, the anger is not different from me; I am anger. Before, I thought I was different from anger, and therefore I could act upon it. But I see the fact, the truth, that I am anger. Then, what takes place? Before, the observer wasted his energy by separating himself from that which is observed and trying to operate. Therefore, there was conflict, struggle, pain, time. All that is involved which is, in that process he was wasting all energy, a great deal of energy. When he does not do that, he has got immense energy. You understand? This is a simple fact. So, there is tremendous energy. With that energy, the problem comes to an end. It is only when you are not energy, that you become jealousy. I wonder if you understand all this. I am not going to repeat it, I can't repeat. I'll tell you differently, if you wish.

As we said yesterday, there is wastage of energy when there is disorder. There is wastage of energy when there is conflict. There is conflict between the observer and the observed when the observer thinks he is different from that which he is observing. But when there is the realization - not you realize - when there is the realization of the fact that the observer is the observed, you have all that energy. And when there is great energy there is not the fragmentation of an energy called jealousy. Got it? That can only be done when you put it to the test, not agree. Next time or now, when you are jealous, go into it, look at it. That is, how do you approach jealousy? As we said, are you approaching jealousy or greed or violence and so on, from the point of view of an observer who is different from that which he is observing? If you are different, then you are wasting energy in your conflict with that which you are observing; whereas if the observer is the observed, therefore, you have got that tremendous energy which is not being wasted. Therefore, where there is energy which means total attention - ah, I've got something else - when there is that total energy, which means complete attention, there is no jealousy. Only when you are not attentive you are jealous. Only when you are not attentive, you waste your energy. Get it?

So, we are saying psychologically there is no tomorrow. This requires great meditation to understand this. There is no tomorrow, which means tomorrow, psychologically, implies a movement towards that thing which thought has created and is pursuing. One of our conditionings is that if I practise a system, I will achieve nirvana or heaven or whatever it is. There are two things implied in this: practice: what does practice mean? Doing something over and over and over and over again. That is what you mean by practice, sadhana and all the rest of the Sanskrit words. Do you know what happens to a mind that is practising, practising, practising? It is a dead mind. You might have a bright mind but keep on practising, your mind becomes mechanical and destructive. Sorry. So, you practise, practise a system. The word system comes from the root 'stare', 'to stand' not move. A system means it is not a movement, it is not a dynamic thing, it is not a living thing. So, when you practise a system, you are dead. Right?

So, listen, go into it very carefully, you will see the entity that practises has invented the practice to safeguard himself, to find in the practice security. And through that security, he hopes to achieve something or other, which is so absurd. Right? That's one thing. In meditation, you have to find out, participate or enquire into the whole movement of time, that is, the whole concept of psychological evolution. We are saying psychologically there is no evolution. There is only 'what is'. I have said enough but there is a lot more to be said about it.

And also you have to enquire into the question of space. Most of our minds are occupied. Right? Occupied with something or other. If you are a very religious man, you are occupied doing mantras, pujas and beliefs. Occupied. Like a housewife is occupied with her meals, with her cleanliness, with her utensils. Have you found something? The man who is occupied with god is the same as the woman occupied with her meals. One is not higher, nobler than the other. Both are occupations. The man who is in business is the same as the man who is occupied, a sannyasi, with repeating his mantras and thinking, thinking, thinking. Sorry!

So, when the mind is occupied, there is no space. Everything lives in space. Nothing can exist without space. If you have ever watched of an evening how the birds are sitting on a telephone wire, have you watched that? They have an equal space because if they are too close, they cannot fly. So, as long as the mind is occupied with something or other, there is no space, and the mind must have space to understand, to look, to observe. Now, how do you approach this question? Please listen. You know your mind is occupied with something or other, psychological sexual pictures, psychological demands and all the rest of it. Your mind is occupied - I don't want to go into details - with something or other. How do you approach this question: whether your mind can stop, end occupation? How do you approach this question? Are you approaching it as an observer who is different from the occupation or the very observer is the movement of occupation? Because, if you are occupied, there is no space, and you must have space. Without space you cannot possibly live. They have tried putting lots of rats together in a very, very, very small space. They have found the rats kill their own babies, because they need space, otherwise, they destroy each other. That is what happens in big cities. I won't go into it. So, how do you approach this question? Your mind is occupied, your thoughts are occupied, your feelings occupied, and you realize that you must have some space to breathe, to look, to observe, to have some freshness. Now, how do you approach it? Is your intention to break it down, the occupation, or the very observer is occupation? You understand my question? No, I am not going to go into details all over again. I have got lots more.

So, meditation implies order. When there is order there is no dissipation of energy. Only when there is disorder there is dissipation of energy. Order in your relationships, in your daily relationship with your wife, with your husband, and that order can only exist when there is love, not images of each other. I have gone into this very carefully in previous talks. So, there must be order in your relationships, in your daily life, because that gives you the energy to understand what is beyond order. If you have not order, don't meditate. That will lead you to illusions, to superstitions, to all kinds of fanciful images. Therefore, it is very, very important to establish order in your daily life, which is going to be your immense problem, because you and your wife or your friend or your boss are demanding something of you. Your wife wants something from you, and you don't want it, you want to possess her, own her, and she is going to break it down. There is jealousy, antagonism. All that creates disorder in your daily life. For god's sake, see this. And your going to temples, to ashrams, has no meaning whatsoever if you have no order. Because we don't have order, we try to escape, go to temples, do pujas, and all the nonsense that goes on. So, that is the first thing to realize if you want to go into the depth of meditation, because you need great energy, not the energy of this idea of kundalini. I won't go into that and those people who talk about kundalini know nothing about it, because the speaker knows a great deal about it. Full stop. I am not going to discuss that with any of you.

You need tremendous energy, not mechanical energy. There is a division - let's understand this: mechanical energy and non-mechanistic energy. Mechanical energy has always a cause. It needs a cause to make it move, like petrol. An internal combustion machine needs petrol. Therefore, it depends on something; that is mechanistic. Our minds have become mechanistic - go to the office everyday at nine o'clock, come back, sex, whatever you do, that becomes a routine. So, our life, by education, by circumstances, by over-population, by so-called culture has become mechanistic. That is a fact. Face it. When you practise, practise, follow a system, that is mechanistic. Now the energy that is not mechanistic is when you put everything in its right place. When you put your handkerchief in the right drawer or your socks in the right place, or your kurta, or whatever you put on, in the right place, then you are free, you have time, you have energy, you do not go round searching. That is as simple as that. Understood sir? Look, you have to start from great simplicity, then the flower blooms. But you start with great certainties, great beliefs and you end up with uncertainty. So, a person who is serious, earnest, and those who are earnest and serious are the only people who are living. The others live a mechanical life, therefore, they are almost dead.

So, if you want to go very deeply into meditation, there must be complete order, not sporadic order, order one day, disorder the next day, but order right through life. That is, I have to repeat this, I hope you don't mind. The art of listening, the art of observation, the art of learning - art means, according to the dictionary, the root of it, to put everything in its proper place. Right? Sex in its proper place, business in its proper place, money in its proper place. Then, you will ask 'what is the proper place, tell me what is the proper place'. You become then mechanical. But you have to find out, to put your relationship in its right place, which is not to be jealous, not to possess, not to dominate - love. You don't know anything about it. So, you have to find out how to listen, not with the hearing of the ear, but listening with your heart, with your mind, with your whole being. If you so listen with complete attention, there is nothing more. But we do not listen. And the art of seeing. The observer is the observed. That is the art of seeing. Then, there is the art of learning. Learning which is the accumulation of knowledge becomes mechanical. But there is a learning, which is to have an insight instantly into things and act immediately, in which there is no time interval. I won't go into it. I have explained all this.

So, art means to put your life, your whole existence, your daily activity in its proper order, not according to any blueprint, not according to your guru, not according to your books, not according to some ashram, but to learn the art of putting everything in its right place. Will you do it? When you go home, when you see your wife or your husband or your girl friend, see what your relationship is, actually, not invent it, whether you dominate, whether you possess, examine it, look at it, then give it order.

Then there must be this thing called love, not lust. Sex has its place, but you cannot through sex or through that excitement achieve some extraordinary state, which is all sheer nonsense. When you have put order, which means no disorder in your life, there is energy. Then that energy can begin to enquire into what is time. I have gone into it. Then we can enquire into what is space, which is to put occupation in its right place. You understand? I wonder if you do. You must be occupied. You understand? A businessman must be occupied with what he is going to do, but to give occupation, whether it is the housewife or husband or businessman or the so-called sannyasi, to put this tremendous occupation in its right place, then you are free of occupation. Then you have space in your mind.

Now, from that space, thought finds its right place. Because, now thought is all over the place. It is part of your tradition that says, thought must be controlled when you meditate. You have never asked who is the controller. If you have asked, who is the controller, you will say it is my divine something or other. That divinity, if it exists, is the invention of thought. Obviously. Because you cannot hold the sea in your hand, you cannot hold the air in your fist. You think you have got divinity inside you. That is your tradition, that is your upbringing, but you have never asked because you dare not ask. If you ask, you will get frightened, because you think that divinity is going to operate, somehow guide you, protect you, help you to earn more money, less money. You follow? So, thought being fragmentary, thought must find its proper place. Which is, to think when necessary, not to think when it is not necessary, not to control thought. Again, the problem arises, is the controller different from that which he is controlling? Wait! I have been brought up - suppose - I have been brought up in the tradition that I am different from thought. So, I try to control thought in my meditation, or in my school or in my college, everywhere we are taught there is 'me' that is controlling thought, and thought has created the 'me'. Right? Do you see that? Thought has said, it has not said so verbally, but in its realizing that thought is in constant movement, changing, undergoing, modifying itself all the time, thought has said there must be something permanent, and the permanent is the thing that thought has put, which is the 'me', which is the divinity, which is something super-super-superconsciousness, it is still thought. I wonder if you see this?

So, thought, when it realizes its limitation, has its right place, which is - please go into this with me, it may be a little complex but this requires that you understand this - thought is a movement born of memory, experience, knowledge, stored up in the brain. The very cells of the brain hold memory. So, thought is a material process. So there is nothing divine about thought, but thought can invent divinity, and thought can then worship that divinity. All the temples, all the churches, all the mosques are created by thought, and having created them, thought says 'I am going to worship it', which is self-worship. Right So when thought has its right place only - please go into it, share it, partake of it, be with it - that is, as long as long as the brain is registering like a tape, then thought operates everywhere. But when thought realizes, please understand this, when thought itself realizes that the registration is the beginning of thought and when there is no registration thought has its right place.

That is, sirs, you are always talking about silence, peace of mind. What you want is peace of mind from worries. When you have a piece, it is a very small thing: a piece of wood, a piece of stone. So, we are enquiring into something very complex, which is to have silence, complete, total, utter silence of the brain, and therefore of the mind. And that silence can only be born, not cultivated, not practised, there is no system, but when thought sees itself as the movement born out of registration and therefore limited. Then the question arises: is there a possibility of not registering at all, but only registering what is absolutely necessary? That is, it is absolutely necessary when you drive a car, to think, or it may be instinctual, but you have thought of it, to learn a language, to play the piano, to do your business, to do whatever you do, thought is necessary. But why is there, what is the necessity of registering your hurt? What is the necessity of registering your flattery? What is the necessity of possessing somebody psychologically? So, you begin to understand that it is possible, and to test it, not accept it, not repeat it, that it is possible not to register at all but only register what is absolutely necessary. Then, out of that comes silence, which is born out of space. A little mind, having no space, can practise meditation, practise silence; then that silence is between two noises, between two thoughts, between two things. But the silence we are talking about is born of order in daily life and the understanding of the movement of time, time as movement, time as thought. Then space; then out of that space comes a silence which can never be put into words.

Now, if you have come as far as that, actually, not in theory, not in practice, not as a hope, but in your daily life have come to that point, there is absolute silence, because you have put occupation in its right place, therefore there is space and so on. And if you come as far as that, movement as time comes to an end. So, there is an ending to time; there is an ending to thought because you have put everything in its right place, therefore, there is complete order in you. And when there is complete order, then you are part of the universe, not some sublimated universe, but the universe of order, because the sun rises, the sun sets. The universe is run on order, stars, heavens, beauty of the world is based on order. And out of that silence, out of the order comes compassion, because it has no cause. Compassion has no cause, no motive. It does not begin with something and end with something. There is compassion. And with it comes clarity, because you have put everything in order. And clarity implies innocence. Mind, because it has everything in order, and because there is that extraordinary perfume of compassion, there is clarity. And with that clarity comes skill. We have skills; the businessman has skill, the doctor has skill, the carpenter has skill, the cook has his skill, the lawyer has his skill, but those skills encourage the self. If you are a very good engineer, it enhances your importance, your ego. Now, is there a skill which does not cultivate the 'me'? I suppose you are not interested in all this.

So, meditation is the flowering which has no motive, which does not seek anything, because it is without time, without the self, the 'me; there is no belief, nothing. Meditation is to come upon this quality of nothingness, absolute nothing. Nothing is not negation, is not a negative thing. Nothing means not-a-thing, not a thing put there by thought. So, the mind, the brain, is no longer a plaything of thought. So there is a totally different dimension. Don't please translate it according to your books, according to your gurus, according to your tradition. If you do, you are lost. You have to test it in your daily life. If you have no compassion, if you have no love in your heart, to love a tree, to love a woman, to love a man, to love a child, to love your children; if you love your children, you will have a different world, you will have a different education. They would not become all engineers, all lawyers. You follow? You would create a different world, different culture but you have no culture. Culture means that grows, multiplies, flowers and bears fruit.

So, meditation is the exploration of the self, and in the exploration of the self, the 'me', not the super-consciousness - all those are such idiotic, nonsensical, meaningless - the ending of the self, the ending of your selfishness disguised in so many ways. The ending of that is the beginning of meditation.

Now, please, I want to sit quietly for two minutes or a minute. Don't mob me. Afterwards you can mob me, but let me sit quietly for a minute. You don't mind?

BROCKWOOD PARK 22ND JUNE 1978 1ST CONVERSATION WITH PROF. BOHM, MR. NARAYAN AND TWO BUDDHIST SCHOLARS

Narayan: I will just say one or two things by way of introduction. Dr Schloegel is a well known scholar in Zen Buddhism. She lived in Japan for twelve years and she teaches Zen Buddhism in London. She was also the librarian of the Buddhist Society until very recently, and many people know her because many people have been her students. We have been wanting to arrange this dialogue with Krishnaji since last year, but it has not been possible. Dr Rahula is from Ceylon, Sri Lanka, and he is a very great Buddhist scholar both in the and the Theravada and the Mahayana. He lectures in Ceylon, Oxford, he goes to the USA, Japan and he is quite well known, and has written quite a few books. And I am very glad it is possible that we have this dialogue today with Krishnaji.

K: Probably you all know Dr Bohm and myself so we don't need introducing.

Rahula: Yes, sir, we know you so well and I have been following your teaching - if you will allow me to use that word, I know that you don't like that word - from my young days and I have read most of your books with great interest, deep interest, and I have wanted to have this discussion with you for a long time, and I am very happy, very pleased that we have got this opportunity today, thanks to Mr Narayan for arranging all this.

I must say that as I have followed your teachings, your books, for many years, I must say that for a person who knows Buddha's teaching sufficiently well, your teaching is quite familiar, and for a person like that it is not a new thing, it is quite familiar. And what the Buddha taught 2,500 years ago you teach today in a new idiom, a new style, and you put his teaching into a new garb. And that is what I feel always when I read your books. And I have written very often, I haven't got the books here, but most of your books are with me, and when I read your books very often I write in the margin, comparing such and such a teaching with the Buddha, sometimes I even quote the verse, or the chapter and verse, or the text - not only Buddha's teaching, the original ancient teaching, but even later Buddhist philosopher's ideas - I will discuss with you later - even those things you say practically exactly the same. I was surprised how you got these things so well and so beautifully.

And to begin with I want to mention very briefly a few points which are common between Buddha's teaching and your teaching. And, for instance, Buddha did not accept god who created the world and who rules this world and rewards and punishes people for their actions. You also don't accept that idea, I believe. Then Buddha did not accept the old Vedic, Brahmanic idea of eternal, permanent everlasting, unchanging, soul, Atman - Buddha denied it. And you also, I think, don't accept that thought, that type of thought.

Then Buddha begins his teaching on the ground that human life is in predicament, suffering, in conflict, sorrow. And I see in your books you always emphasize that. And then Buddha says that the cause of this conflict, suffering, is due to the selfishness which is created by the wrong idea of idea - myself, my atman. I think you say the same.

And then Buddha says that when one is free from that desire, attachment, self, he is free from suffering, he is free from conflict. And in fact you said somewhere, I remember, freedom means freedom from all attachment - you said that somewhere. And that is exactly what the Buddha taught, that all attachment, there is no discrimination, there is no good attachment and bad attachment - of course there is in our ordinary practical life, but ultimately there is no such division.

Then seeing truth, realization of truth, that is to see things as they are; when you see that, you see the reality, you see the truth and you are free from that conflict. I think this is what very often you say - in a discussion, I think, between you and Dr Bohm, I think, 'Truth and Actuality', in that discussion you have discussed this question. When I read that recently I thought this is quite well known in Buddhist thought as sanghasatya and paramarthasatya, sanghasatya is the conventional truth, and paramarthasatya is the absolute or ultimate truth. And so you can't see the ultimate truth, or the absolute truth without seeing the relative truth. That is the Buddhist attitude. I think you say the same thing.

Then one of your things more on the popular level, but it is very important, you always say that you must not depend on authority - anybody's authority, anybody's teaching. You must realize it yourself, you must see it for yourself. This is a teaching very well known in Buddhism and Buddha said, don't accept anything just because it is given by religion or scriptures, or by the teachers, or by a guru, only if you see for yourself that it is right, then accept it; if you see it is wrong or bad then reject it.

And I remember a very interesting discussion you had with Swami Venkatesananda. And his point was very much that the whole idea of gurus, the importance of gurus, but you always said what can he do, it is your business to do it, a guru can't save you. This is exactly the Buddhist attitude that you should not accept authority, and after reading I listened to that also. A friend of mine lent me that tape, later on I read the whole thing in your book 'The Awakening of Intelligence', after reading at the end I wrote as from the text - Buddha has said these things too, all this discussion is summarized by the Buddha in two lines in the Dhammapada: you should make the effort, the Buddhas only teach. This is in the Dhammapada which you read long, long ago when you were young. I found it in Mary Lutyens' book, you quoted it, not this line but another.

Then another very important thing many people don't understand when you say - I must say this openly, let them know it, if they don't understand it, your emphasis on awareness, mindfulness. This is a thing in Buddha's teaching which is very, very important, extremely important, to be mindful. I myself was surprised when I read in the Maha-parinibbana-Sutra, that is a discourse about the last month of his life, at every point wherever he stopped and talked to his disciples he said always, be aware, cultivate awareness, mindfulness. It is called the presence of mindfulness. This also is one of your very strong points in your teaching, which I appreciate very much and follow.

Then another interesting thing, your emphasis always on impermanence. This is one of the fundamental things in Buddha's teaching, everything is impermanent, there is nothing permanent. And in one place you say exactly - I think it is in the book 'Freedom from the Known' - to discern nothing is permanent is of tremendous importance for only then is the mind free. That is exactly in the four noble truths of the Buddha.

Then another interesting small point I want to mention: how your teaching and the Buddha's teaching go together. I think in one place, in 'Freedom from the Known', you say, control and outward discipline are not the way, nor has an undisciplined life any value. When I read this I wrote on the margin, Buddha told a Brahmin, a Brahmin asked the Buddha, how did you attain to these heights of spiritual heights, by what precepts, by what discipline, by what knowledge did you attain? Buddha said, not by knowledge, not by discipline, not by precepts, nor without them. That is the important thing - not with these things, but not without them also. Exactly what you say: you condemn this slavery to discipline but without discipline life has no value. That is exactly in Zen, which is Buddhism, after all. There is nothing called Zen Buddhism, Zen is Buddhism. In Zen discipline is attachment, and slavery to that is very much condemned, but there is no Buddhist sect in the world where discipline is so much emphasized. I think Dr. Schlogel will talk about this later.

Therefore all these things - we have many other things to talk about but to begin with I want to say that these things, these fundamental things are quite in agreement, and there is no conflict between you and the Buddha. Of course you are not a Buddhist, as you say.

K: No, sir.

R: No. And I myself don't know what I am. It does not matter. But in your teaching and the Buddha's teaching there is hardly any difference, only you say the same thing in a fascinating way for the man today, for tomorrow's man. And now I would like to know what you think about all this.

K: May I say, sir, with due respect, why do you compare?

R: This is because when I read your books as a Buddhist scholar, as one who has studied Buddhist texts I always see it is the same thing.

K: Yes, sir, but if I may ask, what is the necessity of comparing?

R: There is no necessity at all.

K: If you were not a scholar of Buddhism, and all the Sutras, and the sayings of the Buddha, if you were not just scholarly and not gone very deeply into Buddhism, how would it strike you reading this, without the background of all that?

R: That I can't tell you because I was never without that background. One is conditioned, it is a conditioning. We are all conditioned. Therefore I cannot answer that question because I don't know what would be the position.

K: So if I may point out, I hope you don't mind.

R: No, not at all.

K: Does knowledge condition human beings - knowledge of scriptures, knowledge of what the saints have said and so on and so on, the whole gamut of so-called sacred books, does that help man at all?

R: Scriptures and all our knowledge conditions man, there is no doubt about it. It conditions. But I should say that knowledge is not absolutely unnecessary. It is just like this: Buddha has pointed out this very clearly, if you want to cross the river and there is no bridge, you make a boat for yourself and you cross with the help of the boat. Going to the other shore, if you think, oh, this boat has been very useful to me, very helpful, I can't leave it here, I will carry it and you put it on your shoulder, was that man acting rightly? No. Then what you should do is to say, of course this boat was very helpful to me but I have crossed the river, now it is not any more use to me, and I'll leave it here for somebody else to use. That is the attitude for knowledge and learning. Buddha says, even the teachings, not only that, even the virtues, so-called virtues, moral virtues are also like the boat and they have a relative value and conditioned value.

K: I would like to question that. I am not doubting what you are saying, sir. But I would like to question whether knowledge in its actual sense, has the liberating quality of the mind.

R: I don't think knowledge can liberate.

K: Has the quality, sir. Knowledge can't, but the quality that you derive from knowledge, the strength, the sense of capacity, the sense of value, the feeling that you know, the weight of knowledge - doesn't that strengthen you, the self?

R: Certainly.

K: Does knowledge actually condition man - let's put it that way?

R: Knowledge.

K: The word knowledge, both of us surely mean, and all of us, means accumulation of information, accumulation of experience, accumulation of various facts and theories and principles, the past and the present, all that bundle we call knowledge. Does then the past help, because knowledge is the past?

R: All that past, all that knowledge disappears the moment you see the truth.

K: No, can a mind that is burdened with knowledge see truth?

R: Of course if the mind is burdened and crowded and covered with knowledge...

K: It is, generally. It is. Most minds are filled and crippled with knowledge. I am using the word 'crippled' in the sense of weighed down. Can such a mind perceive what is truth? Or must it be free from knowledge?

R: To see the truth the mind must be free from all knowledge.

K: Yes, so why should one accumulate knowledge and then abandon it, and then seek truth? You follow what I am saying?

R: Yes, yes. I think that in our life, even when we take our ordinary life, most of the things which will happen are useful at the beginning, and for instance, in our studies as children at school we can't write without rules, but today I can't write on ruled paper. But at that stage...

K: Wait a minute, sir. I agree. When you are at school, college and university, we need lines - lines to write on and all the rest of it - but does not the beginning matter enormously, which might condition the future, as he grows up? You understand what I am saying? I don't know if I am making myself clear. Does freedom lie at the end or the beginning?

R: Freedom has no beginning, no end.

K: Would you say that freedom is limited by knowledge?

R: Freedom is not limited by knowledge, perhaps knowledge that is wrongly applied, though acquired, may obstruct freedom.

K: No, there is no wrong or right accumulation of knowledge - knowledge. I may do certain ugly things and repent, or carry on with those ugly things, which is again part of my knowledge. So I am asking if knowledge leads to freedom? As you say, discipline is necessary at the beginning. And as you grow older, mature, acquire capacities and so on and so on, that discipline, has it not conditioned the mind so that it can never abandon discipline in the usual sense of that word.

R: Yes, I can quite understand. You agree that discipline at the beginning, at a certain level is necessary.

K: I question that, sir. When I say I question it, I don't mean I doubt it, or it is not necessary, but I question it in order to enquire.

R: I should say at a certain level it is necessary, and if you cannot abandon it ever - I am talking from the Buddhist point of view. And there are two words in Buddhism with regard to the way: all those people who are on the way, who have not yet arrived, that means all those disciplines, precepts, and all those things that are good and bad, right and wrong. And an arhat who has realized the truth has no discipline because he is beyond that.

K: Yes, I understand this.

R: But that is a fact in life.

K: I question that, sir.

R: I have no doubt about it in my mind.

K: Then we have stopped enquiring.

R: No, it is not so.

K: I mean we are talking about knowledge: knowledge being useful or necessary, as a boat to cross the river. I want to enquire into that fact, or into that simile whether it is the truth - whether it has the quality of truth - let's put it that way. For the moment I am putting it that way.

R: You mean simile, or that teaching?

K: The whole of that. Which means, sir - just a minute - which means accepting evolution.

R: Yes. Accepting.

K: Evolution, gradually, step by step, advancing, and ultimately reaching. Right? First I discipline, control, effort, and as I get more capacity, more energy, more strength I abandon that and move on.

R: There is no plan like that, there is no plan.

K: No, I am not saying there is a plan. I am asking, or enquiring, whether there is such a movement, such progress at all.

R: What do you think?

K: What do I think? No.

Schloegel: I am very much with you, I can't believe it.

R: Yes, there is no progress.

K: No, we must go into it very carefully, sir, because the whole tradition, both Buddhist, Hindu and Christian, all the religious and non-religious attitudes are caught up in time, in evolution - I will be better, I will be good, I will eventually blossom in goodness. Right? I am saying in that there is a root of untruth in it, there is untruth in it. Sorry to put it that way.

S: May I please come in. I entirely agree with that for the very good reason that ever since human beings have existed as far as we know, we have always known in our different context that we should be good. If it would be possible to progress by something like this we would not be the human beings that we are nowadays. We would all have progressed sufficiently.

K: Have we progressed at all?

S: Precisely, we have not progressed - if at all very little.

K: We may have progressed technologically, scientifically, hygienically and all the rest of it but psychologically, inwardly, we have not - we are what we were ten thousand years ago, or more.

S: And so the fact that we know we should do good and have evolved so many systems of how to do it has not managed to help us to become precisely that. And as I see it there is a specific obstacle in all of us, and it is this obstacle that needs - because we do quite honestly from our very heart, most of us want to be good but most of us do not bring it off - but it is this working through that seems to me at stake.

K: We have accepted evolution. Biologically there is evolution. We have transferred that biological fact into psychological existence, thinking psychologically we will evolve.

R: I don't think that is the attitude. No.

K: But that is what it means when you say 'gradually'.

R: No, I don't say gradually. I don't say that. That realization of truth, attainment of truth, or seeing the truth, is without a plan, is without a scheme.

K: Is out of time.

R: Out of time. Exactly.

K: Which means then, my mind, which has evolved through centuries, for millenia, which is conditioned by time, which is evolution, which is the acquiring of knowledge, more, more, more, will reveal the extraordinary truth.

R: It is not that knowledge that will reveal truth.

K: Therefore why should I accumulate knowledge?

R: How can you avoid it?

K: Psychologically avoid it, not technologically.

R: Even psychologically, how can you do that?

K: Ah, that's a different matter.

R: Yes, how can you do that because you are conditioned.

K: Wait a minute, sir. Let's go into it a little more.

Biologically, physically, from childhood up to a certain age, maturity, adolescence and so on, that's a fact. A little oak tree grows into a gigantic oak tree, that's a fact. And is it a fact, or we have created, assumed it is so, psychologically we must grow? Which is, psychologically, eventually I will achieve truth, or truth will take place if I prepare the ground.

R: No, no. That is a wrong conclusion you have come to, that is a wrong point of view. The realization of truth is a revolution, not evolution.

K: Therefore, can the mind be free psychologically of this idea of progress?

R: It can be.

K: No, not 'can be'. It must be otherwise you can't.

R: That is what I told you that revolution is not evolution, a gradual process.

K: So psychologically can there be a revolution?

R: Yes. Certainly.

K: Which means what? No time.

R: There is no time in it.

K: But all the religions, all the scriptures, whether it is Islam, or whatever it is, have maintained you must go through certain systems.

R: But not Buddhism.

K: Wait a minute. I wouldn't even say Buddhism, I don't know have read, except when I was a boy, but that has gone out of my mind. When you say, eventually you must discipline first and then let go of that discipline.

R: No, I don't say that. I don't perceive it like that, and nor did Buddha.

K: Sorry. Then please, I may be mistaken. How do you consider...

R: I asked you, how do you proceed.

K: Proceed with what?

R: That realization of truth, how do you do that?

K: Ah, that's a different matter.

R: How do you proceed?

K: That's quite a different matter.

R: I mean what I say is that we are conditioned. Nobody can tell us that, however much they try. And the revolution is to see that you are conditioned. The moment you see that it has no time, it is an entire revolution and that is the truth.

K: Suppose one is conditioned in the pattern of evolution - I have been, I am, I shall be. That's evolution. No?

R: Yes.

K: You understand? I was ugly yesterday, but today I am learning about that ugliness and freeing myself and tomorrow I will be free of it. Right? That is our whole attitude, psychological structure of our being. This is an everyday fact.

R: Do we see that?

K: We see that, right.

R: No. You see understanding is one thing, intellectually, verbally.

K: No, I am not talking either intellectually or verbally, that is a fact. I will try to be good.

R: There is no question of trying to be good.

K: No, but sir, not according to the Buddha, not according to scriptures, but average human beings of everyday life, he says, "I am not as good as I should be, but I eventually - give me a couple of weeks, or a couple of years - and I will be awfully good".

R: Certainly that is the attitude of the people.

K: Practically everybody.

R: Practically everybody.

K: Now wait a minute. That is our conditioning - the Christian, the Buddhist, the whole world is conditioned by this idea, which may have come from the biological progress moved into the psychological field.

R: Yes, that's fine.

K: Now how is a man, or a woman, a human being, to break this pattern without time? You understand my question?

R: Yes. It is only by seeing.

K: No, I can't see if I am caught in this blasted ugliness of progress. And you say it is only by seeing, and I say I can't see.

R: Then you can't.

K: No, but I want to enquire into it, sir. That is, why have we given progress in quotes, such importance, psychologically?

S: I am not a scholar but I come from the practical side. May I come in for a moment please? I am a practitioner but I have done my practice in a Buddhist field, and for me personally as a Westerner, as a one-time scientist, I have found the most satisfactory answer in the Buddhist teaching that I blind myself, I am my own obstacle, as long as I, with all my bundle of conditioning, am here, I cannot see and act. It seems to be a possibility.

K: That doesn't help me. You are saying that I have learnt that.

S: I have learnt it but I have learnt it in the same way as one learns to play a piano, rather than in the way of studying a subject. That is the point that I would like to contribute.

K: Again you are going back to playing the piano, which means practice - not practice, good pianists don't practice.

S: I must have practiced in order to become good.

K: So what are we talking about at the end of this?

N: There seems to be one difficulty in this. Knowledge has a certain fascination, a certain power, one accumulates knowledge, whether it is Buddhist, or scientific, and it gives you a peculiar sense of freedom, though it is not freedom in the realm of conventional freedom. And after years of study one finds it very difficult to get out of this because for years, twenty and twenty five years you arrive at this, and you value it, and it hasn't got the quality of what you might call truth. And the difficulty with all practice seems to be that when you practice you achieve something; and achievement is of the conventional reality type, it has got a certain power, a certain fascination, a certain capacity, maybe a certain clarity.

R: By that you get attached to it.

N: Yes. And to break away from it is much more difficult than for a beginner, a beginner who has not got these things may see something more directly than a man who has so much of acquired wisdom. Maybe. Is it so?

R: That depends on the individual. You can't generalize.

K: Sir, if I may point out, one can generalize as a principle.

R: As a principle, in which way?

K: I mean - let's come back to it. We are all caught in this idea of progress. Right?

R: We have just come to an agreement on that point, that humanity accepts the fact that progress is a gradual evolution, so as you said, biologically they accept it, and prove it, so they apply the same theory to psychological things. We agree it is the human position.

K: Is that the truth? I may have accepted biological progress, biological evolution, which I have gradually transferred to psychological existence. Now is that the truth.

R: Now I see you are questioning. I don't think it is the truth.

K: Therefore I abandon the whole idea of discipline.

R: Then you see that.

K: No, no.

R: I should have said there is no question of abandoning it. If you abandon it consciously...

K: No, sir, just a minute. I see what human beings have done, which is move from the biological to the psychological, and there they have invented this idea that eventually you will come to the godhead, or evolution, or enlightenment, reach Brahman, or whatever it is, nirvana or paradise, or hell. If when a human being sees the falseness of it, actually not theoretically, then it is finished.

R: Absolutely, that is what I tell you all this time.

K: Why should I then acquire knowledge of scriptures, of this or that, psychologically?

R: There is no reason.

K: Then why do I read the Buddha?

R: That is what I told you, we are all conditioned.

Bohm: Could I ask a question: do you accept that you are conditioned?

K: Dr.Bohm asks do we all accept that we are conditioned.

R: I don't know whether you accept or not, I accept it.

K: No.

R: And there is nobody in time. To be in time is to be conditioned.

K: No, Dr.Bohm is asking, the implication of his question is - need I translate what you are saying? Go on sir. It's your show now.

B: Well I am really saying that I think that Krishnaji has said, at least in some of our discussions, that he was not deeply conditioned in the beginning and that therefore he had a certain insight that would not be common. Is that fair?

K: Please don't refer to me. I may be a biological freak, so leave me out of it. What we are trying to discuss sir, is this: that psychologically can we admit the truth that there is no movement forward - the truth of it, not the idea of it. You understand?

R: I understand.

K: The truth of it, not I accept the idea of it, the idea is not the truth. So do we as human beings see the truth or the falseness of what we have done?

R: You mean human beings generally?

K: The whole world.

R: No, they don't see it.

K: Therefore when you are telling them, get more knowledge, read this, read that, scriptures, what the Buddha said, what Christ said, if he existed at all, and so on and so on - they are full of this accumulative instinct which will help them to jump, or propel themselves into heaven.

B: When we say we are all conditioned, how do we know that we are all conditioned? That is really what I wanted to say.

K: Yes, his point is, sir, are all human beings conditioned?

R: That is a very complicated question. As far as our society is concerned, all are conditioned. There can't be anybody who is unconditioned because he is within type. But what we are talking about is the realization which has no time, which is unconditioned. But you can't say it is a human being as you take humanity.

B: But I really wanted to emphasize that if we say we are all conditioned there could be two ways. You see, one way could be to accumulate knowledge about our conditioning, to say we observe the common human experience, we can look at people and see they are generally conditioned. Right? The other way would be to say, do we directly see in a more direct way that we are all conditioned. That's really what I was trying to drive at.

R: Of course, I can see there are people who see that.

K: But does that help sir, in this matter? I mean there may be, or there may not be.

B: You see the only point I was trying to make is that if we say we are all conditioned then I think there is nothing else to do but some kind of disciplined or gradual approach. That is you begin with your conditioning.

K: Not necessarily. I don't see that.

B: Well let's try to pursue it. That's the way I take the implication of his question that if we begin all conditioned...

K: ...which we are.

B: ...then what can we do for the next step?

R: There is nothing called 'the next step'.

B: How can we be free of the conditioning as we do whatever we do?

R: The freedom from conditioning is to see.

B: Well, the same question, how do we see?

R: Of course many people have tried various ways.

K: No, no, there are not various ways. The moment you say a way, you have already conditioned him.

R: That is what I say. All that is finished. That is what I say. And you are also conditioning by your talks, your lectures are also conditioning. Trying to uncondition the mind is also conditioning it.

K: No, no, I question that statement, whether what we are talking about conditions the mind - the mind being the brain, the thoughts, the feelings, the whole human psychological existence - whether what K is talking about conditions the mind. I doubt it, I question it.

R: I think...

K: If I may suggest, we are going off from the central issue.

R: The question is how to see it - is that it?

K: No, sir, no. Not 'how', there is no how. First let us see this simple fact, sir: do I, as a human being, and therefore representative of all humanity - I am a human being, right, and therefore I represent all humanity. Right?

S: In an individual way.

K: No, as a human being, I represent you, the whole world, because I suffer, I go through agony, etc., etc., so does every human being. So do I, as a human being, see the falseness of it, the step human beings have taken, moving from the biological to the psychological, with the same mentality? There progress, from the little to the big and so on and so on, from the wheel to the jet. As a human being, do I see the mischief that human beings have created, moving from there to this? You understand?

R: Yes.

K: Do I see it, as I see the table? Or is it I say, "Yes, I accept the theory of it, the idea of it," and then we are lost. Therefore the idea, the theory is the knowledge.

S: If I see it as this table then it is not a theory any more.

K: It is a fact. But the moment you move away from the fact then it becomes idea, knowledge, and the pursuit of it.

S: And it has further and further pictures.

K: Further away from the fact. I don't know if I am making myself clear.

R: Yes. I guess that is so.

K: What is so? Human beings moving away?

R: Human beings are cornered in that.

K: No, no. Sir, it is a fact, isn't it, that there is biological progress, a little tree to a gigantic tree, from a baby and all the rest of it, boyhood, adolescence. Now we have moved with that mentality, with that idea, with that fact into the psychological field and create there the fact that we progress, which is a false movement? I wonder if I am making myself clear.

B: Are you saying that is part of the conditioning?

K: No, leave the conditioning for the moment. I don't want to enter into that. Sir, would you say, why have we taken over from the biological growth into the psychological growth, why? Which is a fact, why have we done this?

S: I want to become something.

K: Which is you want satisfaction, safety, certainty, a sense of achievement.

S: And it is in the wanting.

K: So why doesn't a human being see what he has actually done, not theoretically?

S: An ordinary human being.

K: You, I, X, Y.

S: I do not like to see it. I fear it.

K: Therefore you are living in an illusion.

S: Naturally.

K: Why?

S: I want to be something which I fear at the same time not to see. This is where the divide is.

K: You have a false fear, there is no fear. No, madam. when you see what you have done there is no fear.

S: But the fact is, that I usually do not see it.

K: Why don't you see it?

S: I suspect because of fear. I don't know why.

K: You are entering into quite a different field, fear. But I would just like to know as an enquiry, why human beings have done this, played this game for millenia. You understand sir? Why this living in this false structure, and then people come along and say, be unselfish, be this and all the rest of it - why?

S: All we human beings have a very strong irrational side in us.

K: I question all this. Because we are living not with facts but with ideas and knowledge.

R: Certainly, certainly.

K: Not with facts, the fact is biologically there is, psychologically there isn't. And so we give importance to knowledge, ideas, theories, philosophy, and all the rest of it.

R: You don't agree at all, you don't see at all that a certain development, an evolution, even psychologically?

K: No.

R: A man who has been very undesirable, criminal, telling lies, stealing and all these things - you explain to him certain very fundamental, very elementary things, and he changes into - in our conventional sense - a better man, now he does not steal, now he does not tell lies, he does not like to kill others.

K: He is a terrorist.

R: The man who is changed like that.

K: Are you saying sir, a man who is evil, 'evil' in quotes, the terrorists that are going around the world, what is their future? Are you asking that?

R: Don't you agree a criminal in the accepted sense, you meet a criminal like that, you explain to him the wrong way that he lives, and he realizes what you have said, either because of the ideas he has realized, or because of your personal influence, or whatever it be, he transforms himself, he changes himself.

K: I am not sure, sir. I am not sure. A criminal, in the orthodox sense of that word, whether you can talk to him at all.

R: That, I don't know.

K: You can pacify him, you know, give him a reward and this and that, but an actual criminally minded man, will he ever listen to any sanity. The terrorist - you know, sir, the terrorists - will he listen to you, to your sanity? Of course not.

R: That you can't say, I don't know. I am not at all positive about it.

K: That is what happening, sir.

R: But until I have more proof I can't say that.

K: I have no proof either, but you can see what is happening.

R: What is happening is that there are terrorists, and we don't know whether any terrorists have transformed and converted into good men. We have no proof.

K: You see that is my whole thing. The bad man evolved into the good man.

R: That in the popular sense and the conventional sense, certainly there is, I can't deny that.

K: I don't quite follow.

R: A bad man...

K: Quotes, 'bad' man.

R: Yes, that's right. A bad man, or a criminal, changing his way of life, and becoming a good man - good also in quotes.

K: Yes, we know that, we have dozens of examples.

R: Don't we accept that at all?

K: But, no, no, wait a minute, sir. Bad man who tells lies, who does cruel things, and so on, probably one day he realizes it is an ugly business, and says, "I'll change and become good", but that is not goodness. Goodness is not born out of badness.

R: Certainly not.

K: Therefore the bad man, in quotes, can never become the good man, non quotes.

R: No I would quote surely, goodness.

K: Ah, goodness is not the opposite of the bad.

R: At that level it is.

K: At any level.

R: I don't agree.

N: We might put it this way. In the conventional level the bad man becomes the good man. I think we carry that phrase, that attitude to the progress psychologically. That's one thing we do, the human mind does.

R: That is what we were talking about. That is, transfer this idea to the psychological realm.

N: The other thing is, we seem to feel that psychological progress is the only way the bad man becomes the good man at the relative level.

K: I don't want even to... you see you are making it again a relative thing. Sir, may I put it this way: is there an opposite?

N: At the relative level.

K: No, at any level - psychological, of course, you are wearing yellow and I am wearing brown, the opposite night and day, man and woman and so on and so on. But is there an opposite of fear? Is there an opposite of goodness? Is love the opposite of hate?

R: If you ask me...

K: Opposite, which means duality.

R: I would say, we are talking in dualistic terms.

K: All language is dualistic.

R: You can't talk, I can't talk without dualistic approach.

K: Yes, comparing. But I am not talking of that.

R: And at the moment you speak about the absolute, the ultimate... When we talk good and bad we are talking in the dualistic level.

K: No, that's why I want to move away.

R: You can't talk about the absolute in terms of good or bad, there is nothing called absolute good, or bad.

K: No, no. Is courage the opposite of fear? That is, if fear is non-existent is it courage? Or it is something totally different?

S: It is something totally different.

K: Therefore it is the opposite. Goodness is never the opposite of bad. So what are we talking about when we say, "I will move, change, from my conditioning, which is bad, to freedom from my conditioning, which is good"? Therefore freedom is the opposite of my conditioning. Therefore it is not freedom at all. That freedom is born out of my conditioning because I am caught in this prison and I want to be free. It is a reaction to the prison, which is not freedom.

R: I don't quite follow.

K: Sir, could we consider for a minute: is love the opposite of hate?

R: The only thing you can say is, where there is love there is no hate.

K: Ah, no, no. I am asking quite a different question. I am asking, is hate the opposite of affection, love? If it is then in that affection, in that love, there is hate, because it is born out of hate, out of the opposite. All opposites are born out of their own opposites. No?

R: I don't know. That is what you say.

K: But it is a fact, sir. Look, I am afraid, and I cultivate courage, you know, to put away fear. I take a drink, or you know, all the rest of it, to get rid of fear. And at the end of it I say I am very courageous. All the war heros and all the rest of them are given medals for this because they are frightened. And they say, "We must go and kill", or do something, and they are very courageous, heros.

R: That is not courage.

K: I am saying anything born out of its opposite contains its own opposite.

R: How?

K: Sir, if someone hates you and then says I must love, that love is born out of hate, because he knows what hate is and he says, "I must not be that, but I must be that". So that is the opposite of this. Therefore that opposite contains this.

R: I don't know whether it is the opposite.

K: That is how we live, sir. This is what we do. I am sexual, I must not be sexual. I take a vow of celibacy - not I - people take a vow of celibacy which is the opposite. So they are always caught in this corridor of opposites. And I question the whole corridor. I don't think it exists. We have invented it, but actually it doesn't exist. I mean, please this is explanation, don't accept anything sir.

S: Personally from the way in which I, where I stand at this moment, see it, and I claim no possibilities either for the truth of it, or something, it is a working hypothesis. I see this channel as a humanizing factor, this channel of opposites, we are caught in it.

K: Oh no, that is not a humanizing factor. That is like saying, 'I have been a tribal entity, now I have become a nation, and then ultimately international' - it is still tribalism going on.

S: No. That I quite agree. I see it in the sense of a really barbaric stage, I could have laughed when you had broken your leg, nowadays I could not laugh any more.

B: I think both of you are saying that we do in some sense make progress, in the sense that we are not as barbaric as we were before. Right?

S: That is what I mean by the humanizing factor.

K: I question whether it is humanizing.

R: I don't like to work in extremes.

K: This is not extremes, this is just facts. Facts are not extremes.

B: Are you saying that this is not a genuine progress. You see in the past people were far more barbaric generally than they are today, and therefore would you say that that really doesn't mean very much?

K: I don't quite follow.

B: Well, some people would point to their past and say there was a great deal of barbarism then.

K: We are still barbarous.

B: Yes, we are, but some people say we are not as barbaric as...

K: Not 'as'.

B: Let's see if we can get it straight. Now would you say that that is not important, that is not significant?

K: No. When I say I am better than I was - it has no meaning.

B: You say that has no meaning to say that.

K: Absolutely.

B: I think we should clarify that.

R: In the relative, dualistic sense I don't accept that. I can't see that. But in the absolute, ultimate sense there is nothing like that.

K: No, not ultimately - I won't even accept that word 'ultimately'. I see how the opposite is born in everyday life, not ultimately. I am greedy, that's a fact. I try to become non-greedy, which is non-fact, but if I remain with the fact, I am greedy, then I can do something about it actually, now. Therefore there is no opposite. Sir, you know violence and non-violence. Non-violence is the opposite of violence, as an ideal. So non-violence is non-fact. Violence is the only fact. Right? So I can then deal with facts, not with non-facts.

R: So what is your point?

K: My point is, there is no duality even in daily life. It is the invention of all these philosophers, intellectuals, who say there is the opposite, work for that. The Utopians, the idealists, the fact is I am violent, that's all, let me deal with that. And to deal with it don't invent non-violence.

S: The question now is: how am I going to deal with it, having accepted the fact that I am violent...

K: Not accepted, it's a fact.

S:... having seen it.

K: Then we can proceed, I'll show you.

S: And the question is how to proceed.

K: We'll proceed with that. Therefore I must see what I have done. I avoid the fact and run away to non-fact. That is what is happening in the world. So don't run but remain with the fact. Can you do it?

S: It is part of our training. That is precisely the point.

K: I am sorry, I won't accept the word 'training'.

S: Well it is precisely this 'can you do it' and one does it though one very often does not like doing it.

K: No. Of course you can do it. It is like seeing something dangerous and you say, "It's dangerous I won't go near it". Running away from the fact is dangerous. Finished. You don't run away. That doesn't mean you train, you practise not to run, you don't run. I think the gurus have invented this running, the philosophers. Sorry.

R: There is no running away. That is entirely different. It is a wrong way of putting it.

K: No, sir.

R: You can't run away.

K: No, I am saying, look.

R: If you see there is no running in it.

K: I am saying, don't run. Then you see. Don't run, then you see. But we say, "I can't see because I am caught in that".

R: I quite see that, what you say I see very well.

K: So there is no duality.

R: Where?

K: Now in daily life, not ultimately.

R: What is duality?

K: Which is the opposite. Violence and non-violence. The whole of, you know, India has been practising non-violence, which is nonsense. There is only violence, let me deal with that. Let human beings deal with violence, not with the ideal of nonviolence.

R: Yes, that is of course quite a different question.

K: No.

R: We agree, if you see the fact, this is a fact, we must handle this.

K: Therefore there is no progress.

R: That is a word that you can use any way.

K: No, not any way.

R: It is simply a word.

K: No, sir, no sir. When we have an ideal, to achieve that ideal I need time. Right? Therefore I will evolve to that.

R: So?

K: So no ideals. Only facts.

R: What is the difference, what is the argument? We agree there are only facts.

K: Which means, sir, to look at facts time is not necessary.

R: Absolutely not.

K: Therefore if time is not necessary I can see it now.

R: Yes, agreed.

K: You can see it now. Why don't you?

R: Why don't you - that is another question.

K: No, no.

R: Yes.

K: No, not another question.

B: If you take it seriously that time is not necessary then right now one could perhaps clear up the whole thing.

R: Yes, that does not mean all human beings can do it, there are people who can do it.

K: No. If I can see it, you can see it.

R: I don't think so. I don't agree with you.

K: It is not a question of agreement, I am not trying to argue about these matters, so there is no agreement or disagreement. But when we have ideals away from facts time is necessary to get there, progress is necessary. I must have knowledge to progress. All that comes in. Right? So can you abandon ideals?

R: It is possible.

K: Ah, no, the moment you use the word 'possible' time is there.

R: I mean seeing the facts...

K: Do it now, do it sir, not - forgive me, I am not being authoritarian - when you say it is possible you have already moved away.

R: I mean to say, that I must say that everybody can't do it.

K: How do you know?

R: That is a fact.

K: No, I won't accept that.

S: I can perhaps come in with a bit of a concrete example. I think that we can possibly come together on that. If I stand on a high - a concrete fact - on a high springboard over a swimming pool and I cannot swim, and I am told just jump in and relax completely, the water will carry you. This is perfectly true I can swim. There is nothing that prevents me except I am frightened of doing it. That is I think the point in question. And therefore this is I think the question. Of course we can do it, there is no difficulty but there is this basic fear which does not stand to reason that makes us shy away.

K: Please forgive me, I am not talking of that, we are not saying that. If one realizes that one is greedy, why do we invent non-greed?

S: I wouldn't know because it seems to me so obvious that if I am greedy then I am greedy.

K: Now why do we have the opposite - why? All religions say we mustn't be greedy, all philosophers, if they are worth their salt, say don't be greedy, or something else. Or if you are greedy you will not reach heaven. So they have always cultivated through tradition, through saints, the whole gamut of it, cultivated this idea of the opposite. Right? So I don't accept that. I say that is an escape from this.

S: Which it is. It is a half way stage at best.

K: It is an escape from this. Right? And it won't solve this problem.

S: It hasn't.

K: It hasn't. So to deal with the problem, remove it. I can't have one foot there and one foot here. I must have both my feet here.

S: And if both my feet are here?

K: Wait, no. A simile, a simile. So I have no opposite, which implies time, progress, practice, trying, becoming, the whole gamut of it.

S: So I see I am greedy, or I am violent.

K: Now we have to go into something entirely different. How is one, a human being - not 'how' - can a human being be free of greed now? That's the question. Not eventually. You see I am not interested in being greedy next life, who cares, or the day after tomorrow, I am not interested in it, I want to be free of sorrow, pain, now. So I have no ideals at all. Right sir? Then I have only this fact, I am greedy. Now do we go into that? What is greed? The very word is condemnatory. Right, sir? The word has been in my mind for centuries, and that word 'greed' immediately condemns the fact. By saying "I am greedy" I have already condemned it. Right? Now can I look at that fact without the word with all its intimations, all its content, with its tradition? Look at it. You cannot understand the depth and the feeling of greed or be free of it if you are caught in words. So as my whole being is concerned with greed it says, "All right I won't be caught in it, I won't use the word greed". Right? Now is that feeling devoid of the word, divorced from the word 'greed'?

S: No, it isn't.

R: It has no word.

S: Please go on.

K: So as my mind is full of words and caught in words, can it look at something, greed, without the word?

R: That is really seeing the fact.

K: Then only I see the fact. Then only I see the fact.

R: Yes, without the word.

K: Therefore it has no value. Finished. This is where the difficulty lies, sir. I want to be free of greed because it is in my blood, my tradition, my upbringing, my education, everything says be free of that ugly thing. So I am all the time making an effort to be free of that. Right? I am not educated, thank god, on those lines. So I say, all right, I have only fact, the fact is I am greedy. Right? I want to understand the nature and the structure of that word, of that feeling. What is it? What is the nature of that feeling? Is it a remembrance? You understand, sir? If it is a remembrance I am looking at it, the present greed, with past remembrances. The past remembrances have said condemn it. Can I look at it without past remembrances?

S: Exactly.

K: I am going to show you. Right sir?

R: If you can see without - I'll listen, yes.

K: I'll go into it a little more because the past remembrance condemns this and therefore strengthens this. Right? If it is something new, I won't condemn it. But because it is new but made old by remembrances, by memories, by experience, I condemn it. So can I look at it without the word, without the association of words? That doesn't need discipline, that doesn't need practice, that doesn't need some guide, just to say, can I look at it without the word. Can I look at that tree, woman, man, sky, heaven, without the word and find out? But someone comes along and tells me, "I'll show you how to do it", then I am lost. And 'how to do it' is the whole sacred books. Sorry. All the gurus, all the bishops, the popes, the whole of it.

So do we stop now?

N: Yes, sir, I think we stop now.

K: By Jove, we have been talking an hour and a half.

R: It depends on you. I am very much interested, I am not tired at all.

K: We had better keep it for tomorrow morning and afternoon. Don't let's overeat.

R: There are several other things that I would like to ask you tomorrow morning and afternoon.

N: Tomorrow we meet at 11.30.

BROCKWOOD PARK 23RD JUNE 1978 2ND CONVERSATION WITH PROF. BOHM, MR. NARAYAN AND TWO BUDDHIST SCHOLARS

K: Yes, you wanted to start.

Rahula: This morning and afternoon I want to ask you one or two things to clarify. And for a long time these questions were on my mind, and very often I thought of you, to meet you and to discuss these things, not in a place like this but privately between you and me, but it was not possible and now ultimately I am grateful to Mr. Narayan for arranging this. We continued yesterday about something, I think you were getting at the last thing about greed and as a bad thing, the idea is given by words, but if you see it without the word it may not be the same thing. And of course that is quite so, because the thing itself has no word when you see the thing. In Buddhist terminology there are three levels of knowledge: one is that we get wisdom, self-knowledge through learning, the books, the teacher; then there is further development, the wisdom that you get by thinking, meditating according to that, your knowledge, still within words, it is still within language; but the highest wisdom goes beyond words, it has no word, it has no name, it has no terminology. That means that you see the thing without a word. I think that is what you meant when you said, when you see the thing, all our reflections, accumulated meanings disappear. That is how I understood it. I don't know whether that is what you meant.

K: Perhaps we will go into it, sir, but you also said you would like to ask some other questions.

R: That's right. That is very interesting. I am very grateful to you.

K: Not at all, sir.

R: These are things which have been on my mind for a long time. Sir, you know the words arhat, in Buddhist terminology. Arhat is the one who realized the truth, who is liberated, who is free, and that is a very well known term. And the question was put to the Buddha, very often, by his disciples, and by various people, what happens to an arhat after his death? And then that man asked, "Does he exist after his death?" The Buddha said, "No." "Then he does not exist." The Buddha said, "No." "Then he exists and does not exist." Buddha said, "No." "Then he does not exist, nor not exist. These are the four corners." He said, "No. None of those terms exist or does not exist, is or is not, can be applied to that state." All those terms, relative, dualistic terms, are used only within our knowledge, within our experience, within empirical world. But this is beyond that, therefore you can't apply any of those words. This answer is everywhere, in many places he was asked these questions, and what do you say to this? He said you can't exist, or not exist.

K: Could we talk over together, sir, what is living and what is dying, and what is the state of the mind that is dead, or in the process of dying? Could my putting it that way be a help to answering the question?

R: I don't know.

K: You see, after all arhat is known also I believe in Indian thought, Hindu thought, because, not that I have read any books but I have discussed. Human beings right throughout the world, as far as one can make out, are always enquiring or believing into what is death, is there life after death, is there a continuity, and if there is no continuity what is the point of living at all? Life is such a dreadful affair anyhow with a lot of trouble, anxieties, fears, and so on, if there is no reward for living properly, correctly, what is the point of being good, kind, noble, etc? Could we approach your question from that point of view? Or do you want to ask what is the state of a mind that has no self whatsoever?

R: That's right, that is an arhat.

K: That is what I want to get at.

R: That's right.

K: Yes. Could we go into that, that way?

R: I think that is a good approach, because that is an arhat who has no self whatsoever.

K: Is that possible? We are enquiring.

R: Yes.

K: I am not saying it is, or it is not, we are enquiring, I am not saying it is, or it is not, we are enquiring, proceeding through exploration and finding out, not believing or not believing.

So what is the self? The name, the form - just a minute, sir, let me enquire, we are enquiring. The form, the body, the organism, the name, the name identifies itself with the body, certain characteristics identifying itself with the 'me' - I am strong, I am weak, I have got a good character, I am not bad. So the characteristic is identified by thought as the 'me'. The tendency is identified by thought as the 'me'. The experiences, the accumulated knowledge is identified by thought as the 'me', and the 'me' is that which I possess - my property, my house, my furniture, my wife, my books. All that, the violence, the pleasure, the fear, the agonies, all that with the name, with the form, constitutes the self. So what is the root of the self? Is the root of the self the acquired experiences - I am enquiring, sir - the acquired experiences - we are enquiring into the very root of it, not the mere expressions of it. Right sir? I want to laugh a bit!

R: Yes, that is very important.

K: So the whole process of identification - my house, my name, my possessions, what I will be, the success, the power, the position, the prestige, the identification process is the essence of the self. If there is no identification is there the self? You understand sir?

R: Yes, I follow.

K: So can this identification come to an end? Which is, the identification is the movement of thought. If thought didn't say, that is my furniture, identifying itself with that, because it gives it pleasure, position, security, all that, so the root of the self is the movement of thought.

R: Yes.

K: So death is the ending of that movement. Or is death a continuity of that movement into the next life? You understand?

R: Quite.

K: Arhat, or the liberated man, why should he wait until the end, till he reaches that which is called death? So, when we realize the very root of the self is the movement of thought in time, in distance, from here to there, and all the conflicts, miseries, confusions, created by thought - right sir - is the self. So when thought comes to an end that is a form of death while living.

R: Yes.

K: Now, can thought come to an end? To bring that about, or wanting thought to end, we meditate, we practice, we are aware, we go through all the tortures of so-called meditation. Right sir? Would you agree to that.

R: Popular religion.

K: No, no. You see - please sir, if I may point out, the ordinary man is not interested in all this. Right? He wants his beer, whatever he wants, he is not interested in all this, because, perhaps wrong education, social conditions, economic position, environmental influences, and maybe the religions have helped to keep the man down there, popular, the elite are somewhere else - the pope, the cardinals - you follow? So I wouldn't, if I may point out sir, I wouldn't say popular. It is the human tendency, that is all we are talking about. Every human being has identified himself and so conditioned himself with something or other, with god, with nirvana, with moksha, with heaven, with paradise and so on. Now while living can that death, which is the end of thought, take place? Not at the end of one's life which then is a graveyard renunciation. It has no meaning.

R: I agree when you said it is not necessary to wait until the end of your life, at the death, and Buddha pointed out the same thing. When this question was put to him, the question was asked also what will happen to the Buddha after his death. He asked the disciple, "What is Buddha? Is it this body?" - like you said, the name, the form, all this. Exactly what you said, in Buddhist terminology is called the kamarupa.

K: In Sanskrit too.

R: And the disciple said, no. Then you can't pin-point the Buddha even now, living, then how can you say after death?

K: Sir, if I may ask, I hope you don't think me impudent - why do we bring in the Buddha? We are talking as human beings.

R: Just because I raised the question from the Buddha's point of view.

K: Ah, no, as a human being I want to know what happens after death. Or what is the significance of death. Or can one live in daily life not as a monk, as a saint, all that stuff, daily life, without the self?

R: Of course my question was not that. The person who has realized the truth, who has become liberated, free, to him, what happens. That is the question.

K: I would never ask that question, because he might say this happens, or he might say that happens, or nothing happens. Then it becomes a theory to me, which is an idea.

R: I wanted from you a little more than that.

K: Ah, you want from me.

R: Not a theory.

K: If you want it from this person who is talking you have to enquire as he is enquiring. And therefore he asks, is it possible to live in daily life, not at the end of one's existence, in daily life without this identification process which brings about the structure and the nature of the self, which is the result of thought? Can the movement of thought end while I am living? That is the question, rather than what happens when I die. The 'me' is merely a movement of thought. Thought itself is very limited. Right? It is a piece in a vast movement, it is a small piece, broken up. So as long as thought, limited, a broken up thing, a fragment, whatever it creates will still be limited, broken up, fragmentary. Right? So can a human being, you or I or any of us, can we live without the movement of thought, which is the essence of the self? Suppose I say, yes, it can be done - what value has it to you?

Schoegel: Once that identification is really broken - once that identification of thought and 'me' is really broken...

K: Ah, no, not broken, end.

S: That is what I mean, ended.

K: When you break something it can continue. It is an ending.

S: It can never come back in the same way again, it is an irrevocable ending.

K: All I am saying is, suppose the speaker, this person says, yes, it is possible, I know it is possible, then what? What value has it to you?

S: That is what personally I hope we can discuss.

K: I am coming to that. What value is that to you? Either you accept it; or you say, don't be silly, and walk away, as it is not possible, and you leave it. But if you want to enquire and say, look, is it possible, let's find out - not as an idea but as an actuality in daily life. Right? Somebody join us!

Narayan: Dr.Rahula, we have been talking in this context of the value of Buddhist meditation, preparation, practice, mindfulness. What is the value of all those things that are mentioned in the Buddhist literature, which is practised as a very important thing in relation to the ending of thought?

R: Ending of thought, or self?

N: Mindfulness, let us say.

R: Mindfulness, or rather presence of awareness - a sense of mindfulness. Yes, satybhata has many aspects, not only one but the most important thing is the mindfulness, awareness in everything. Even now what we do here is a meditation, it is not sitting with legs crossed like a statue under a tree, or in a cave, that is no meditation, that is only an exercise externally. Many people take it as the meditation. What we do here nobody would think we were meditating. But to me this is the deepest sort of meditation, also given in the satybhata, this is called dharmapassana, to see, or to follow, or to observe, or to be aware of various subjects, topics, things, doctrines, things like that, various things, that is the intellectual side of it. Then there is also meditation being mindful of everything you do, whatever you do, eating, drinking, or going about, talking, everything is mindfulness. And all that leads to what he says.

N: It leads to.

R: It leads to what he says.

N: That is the thing I really want to get at.

R: To end the thought process of self.

N: Yes.

K: Sir, I hope you don't think me impudent or irreverent to what the Buddha said. I personally haven't read all these things. I don't want to read a thing about all this. They may be correct, or not correct, they may be under illusion or not under illusion, they may have been put together by disciples, and what the disciples do with their gurus is appalling - twist everything. So I say, look, I don't want to start with somebody telling me what to do, or what to think. I have no authority. So I say, look, as a human being, suffering, going through agonies, sex and mischief, and terror, and all the rest of it, in enquiring into all that I come to the point, which is thought. That's all. I don't have to know all the literature in the world, which will only condition further thinking. So forgive me for putting it that way: I brush all that aside. We have done this - Christians, I have met Christians, Benedictine monks, Jesuits, great scholars, always quoting, quoting, quoting, believing this is so, this is not so. You understand sir? I hope you don't think I am irreverent

R: Not at all. I fully agree with you and that is my attitude as well. I am talking to examine it.

K: You see I only start with what is a fact, for me. What is a fact, not according to some philosophers and religious teachers and priests, a fact - I suffer, I have fear, I have sexual demands. How am I to deal with all these tremendously complex things which make my life and I am so utterly miserable, unhappy. From there I start, not from what somebody said, that means nothing. You follow, sir? I am not belittling, forgive me, the Buddha, I wouldn't.

R: That, I know, I know you have the highest respect for the Buddha. But we have the same attitude and I want to examine it with you. That is why I put the question.

K: No, sir, not quite, sir, forgive me for saying so, not quite. I start with something which is common to all of us. Right? Not according to the Buddha, not according to some Christian god or Hindu or some group, to me all that is totally irrelevant, they have no place because I suffer, I want to find out to end it, or must I carry on for the rest of my life - this agony, this brutality, this sexual perversion, or sexual desires, you know, all the rest of it.

Right sir? So I see the root of all this confusion, uncertainty, insecurity, travail, effort, the root of this is the self, the 'me'. Right sir? Now is it possible to be free of the 'me' which produces all this chaos, both outwardly, politically, religiously, economically and all the rest of it, and also inwardly, this constant struggle, constant battle, constant effort? So I am asking, can thought end? So thought has no future - that which ends then has a totally different beginning, not the beginning of the 'me', ending and picking up again later. Right sir?

In what manner can thought end? That's the problem. The Buddha must have talked about it. Right sir? I don't think Christianity, as far as I know, has touched this point. They said, give yourself to God, Christ, abandon yourself to him. But the self goes on. They haven't gone into this at all, only the Hindus and the Buddhists have done so, and perhaps some others. So can this thought end? Then the priest comes along and says, yes it can end, only identify yourself with Christ, with the Buddha - you follow? Identify, forget yourself.

R: That is the Christian attitude.

K: Christian, also part of the Hindu.

R: But not Buddhism. I must defend it.

K: I know.

N: I believe a great deal of Buddhist thought has degenerated into this.

R: Yes, yes, of course, degenerated, that is certain schools of thought, but I mean to say according to the Buddha's teaching.

K: You see.

S: Shall we say it is human nature to lean on something, and this is what automatically happens and this is what we are trying to get away from.

K: So here I am, an ordinary human being, fairly educated, not according to schools, colleges, fairly educated, has observed what the world is going through and he says, "I am the world, I am not different from the world, because I suffer, I have created this monstrous world, my parents, my grandparents, everybody's parents, created this". Right sir? So how is it possible for thought to end? Some people say, yes, which is to meditate, control, suppress.

S: No, no.

K: Wait. I said some people madam.

S: I beg your pardon.

K: Some people have said, suppress it, identify the self with the highest, which is still the movement of thought. Some people have said, burn out all the senses. Right sir? They have done it, fast, do everything for this thing. So somebody comes along like me and says, effort is the very essence of the self. Right? Do we understand that? Or has it become an idea, and we carry that idea out? You understand what I am talking about? I don't know if I am making myself clear.

N: If you say effort is the very essence of the self, is there again a preparation, an initial training to come to that situation? Or does one come to it effortlessly?

S: If I have understood you and please correct me if not, you mean that the very effort that I make to come to it, that in itself is already contributing to my delusion?

K: To the maker of the effort, who has already identified with something greater, and is making an effort to reach it. It is still the movement of thought.

S: And it is still a bargaining - if I do this, or if this happens, then I will get that.

K: So how do you, if I may ask, listen - listen? How do you listen?

S: Listen?

K: A person like me says, effort of any kind only strengthens the self. Now how do you receive that statement?

S: I am entirely in agreement.

K: No, not agreement, or disagreement. How do you listen to it?

S: Let it impinge.

K: No, no.

Bohm: Do we listen in the same way we have made identifications, that is in general we listen through the past, through our previous ideas, through what we know?

S: That must be.

B: Is that right?

S: If one can open out and just listen.

K: Ah, no. When you eat, you are eating because you are hungry. The stomach receives the food, there is no idea of receiving the food. So can you listen - listen - without the idea of receiving, or accepting, or denying, or arguing, just listen to a statement? It may be false, it may be true, but just listen to it. Can you do it?

S: I would say yes.

K: Then if you so listen, what takes place?

S: Nothing.

K: No, madam, don't say immediately, nothing. What takes place? I listen to a statement that thought is the root of the self. After carefully explaining the mood of thought which identifies itself with the form, with the name, with this and that and the other thing. So after explaining very carefully, it is said that thought is the very root of the self. Now how do we receive, listen to the truth of that fact, that thought is the root of the self? Is it an idea, a conclusion, or is it an absolute, irrevocable fact?

R: If you ask me, it is a fact. You see I listen to it, receive it. I see it.

K: Are you listening as a Buddhist - forgive me for putting it that way?

R: I don't know.

K: No, you must know.

R: I am not identifying anything at all. I am not listening to you as a Buddhist or a non-Buddhist.

K: I am asking you, sir, are you listening as a Buddhist - just a minute - are you listening as a person who has read a great deal about the Buddha, and what the Buddha has said and so comparing - just a minute - and so you have gone away from listening. Right? So are you listening - I am not being personal, sir, forgive me - are you listening?

R: Oh, you can be quite free with me - I won't misunderstand you and you won't misunderstand me.

K: No, no. I don't mind you misunderstanding me at all. I can correct it. Are you listening to the idea, to the words, and the implications of those words, or are you listening without any sense of verbal comprehension, which you have gone through quickly, and you say, yes, I see the absolute truth of that?

R: That is what I said.

K: Do you?

R: Yes.

K: No, Sir. Then it is finished. It is like seeing something tremendously dangerous, it is over, you don't touch it. I wonder if you see it.

S: Why not touch it?

B: It seems to me there is a tendency to listen through the word, as you say, and that word identifies, and that identification still goes on while one thinks one is listening. This is the problem. It is very subtle.

R: In other words, it is listening you use the word in seeing, in that sense.

K: No. Sir, I listen. When you say something to me, what the Buddha has said, I listen. I say, he is just quoting from what Buddha has said, but he is not saying something I want to know. He is telling me about the Buddha, but I want to know what you think, not what Buddha thought, because then we are establishing a relationship between you and me, and not between you, Buddha and me? I wonder if you see that.

R: That also means you were listening...

K: I was listening to what you were saying about Buddha. Just listening. I don't know. You are quoting, probably what you are quoting was perfectly so, you are quoting probably correctly and so on, but you are not revealing yourself to me and I am revealing myself to you. Therefore we have a relationship through the Buddha, not direct relationship. I love my dog and you like that dog too, but you like that dog and our relationship is based on that dog. I don't know if I am making myself clear. I am not comparing Buddha to the dog!

S: May I try to say what you are trying - not trying - what you are looking for is our personal experiential response.

K: No, your personal experience is also the experience of everybody else, it is not personal.

S: Though it is individually rendered.

K: If you and I suffer it is suffering, not my suffering and your suffering. But when there is identification with suffering there is my suffering. And I say, I must be free of it. But as human beings in the world we suffer. We are going off somewhere else.

B: It seems to me this question of identification is the main one, it is very subtle, in spite of all that you have said, identification still goes on.

K: Of course.

B: It seems to be built into us.

S: And this raises a question whether that identification can be ended - if I understood rightly.

B: Identification prevented listening freely, openly, because one listens through the identification.

K: What does identification mean? Why do human beings identify themselves with something - my car, my house, my wife, my children, my country, my god, my - you follow? Why?

S: To be something, perhaps.

K: Let's enquire why. Not only identify with outward things, but also inwardly identify with my experience, identify with experience and say, this is my experience. Why do human beings go through this all the time?

B: At one stage you said we identify with our sensations, for example, our senses, and this seems very powerful. What would it be not to identify with our sensations?

K: Yes. So when one listens, am I listening to identify myself with that fact about which he is talking, or there is no identification at all and therefore I am capable of listening with a totally different ear? Am I hearing with the ears of my hearing, or am I hearing with total attention? You understand sir? Am I listening with total attention? Or, my mind is wandering off and says, "Oh my goodness, this is rather boring, and what is she talking about?" - or he - and so I am off. But can I attend so completely that there is only the act of listening and nothing else, no identification, no saying, yes, that is a good idea, bad idea, that's true, that's false, which are all processes of identification, but without any of those movements can I listen? When I do so listen, then what? The truth that thought is the essence of the self, and the self creates all this misery, is finished. I don't have to meditate, I don't have to practise, it is over when I see the danger of these things. So can we listen so completely that there is the absence of the self? And one says, can I see, observe something without the self - which is my country, I love that sky, it is a beautiful sky - and all the rest of that. So please.

So the ending of thought, which is the ending, or cutting at the very, very root of the self - a bad simile, but take that - when there is such active, attentive, non-identifying attention, then does the self exist? I need a suit, why should there be identification in getting a suit? I get it, there is getting it. So the active listening implies listening to the senses. Right sir? To my taste, the whole sensory movement. I mean you can't stop the senses, then you would be paralysed. But the moment I say, "That's a marvellous taste, I must have more of that", begins the whole identification.

B: It seems to me that that is the general condition of mankind, to be identifying with the senses. Now how are we going to change that?

K: That is the whole problem sir. Mankind had been educated, conditioned for millenia to identify with everything - my guru, my house, my god, my country, my king, my queen, and all the horror that goes on.

B: You see with each one of those there is a sensation.

K: It is a sensation, which you call experience.

R: So we should come to our point.

K: Yes, which is?

R: The one that we began.

K: When the self ends - it can end, obviously, it is only the most ignorant and most highly burdened, and people with knowledge, and identifying themselves with knowledge and all that, when there is the ending of the self, what takes place? Not at the end of my life, not when the brain becomes deteriorated, when the brain is very, very active, quiet, alive, what then takes place, when the self is not? Now, how can you find out, sir? Say, X has ended the self completely, not picks it up in the future, another day, but ends it completely, he says, yes, there is a totally different activity which is not the self. What good is that to me, or to any of us? He says, yes, it can end, it is a different world altogether, different dimension, not a sensory dimension, not an intellectual projected dimension, something totally different. I say he must be either a cuckoo, a charlatan, or a hypocrite, but I want to find out, not because he says so, but I want to find out. Can I, as a human being, living in this tremendously ugly, brutal, violent world, economically, socially, morally and all the rest of it, live without the self? I want to find out. And I want to find out not as an idea, I want to do it, it's my passion. Then I begin to enquire, why is there identification with the form, with the name - it is not very important whether you are K or W or Y. So you examine this very, very carefully not to identify yourself with anything, with sensation, with ideas, with a country, with an experience. You understand sir? Can you do it? Not vaguely and occasionally but something you have got to do with passion, with intensity, to find out.

That means I must put everything in its right place. Right? Because I have to live, to have food, I don't have to identify myself with that or that food, I eat the correct food, and it's finished, therefore it has its right place. But there are all the bodily demands, sex, put it in its right place. Who will tell me to put it in the right place? You understand sir? My guru, the pope, any scripture? If they do I identify myself with them because they are giving me help to put things in the right place, which is sheer nonsense. Right sir? The pope can't tell me, sex has its right place, and he says, don't divorce, marry, your marriage is with god - all that. And I am stuck. Why should I obey the pope, or the guru, or scriptures, or the politicians? So I have to find out what is the right place for sex, or money. Right sir? What is the right place? How shall I find out what is the right place for sex, which is one of the most powerful, urgent physical demands, which the religious people say, cut, destroy it. Right sir? Suppress it, take a vow against it and all the rest of it. I say, sorry, that doesn't mean a thing to me. So I want to find out what is its right place. How shall I find out? I have got the key to it. Right? Which is, non-identification with sensation, that is the key of it. Right sir? So non-identification with sensation, which is translated in modern experience - I must experience sex. Right? So that is, identification with sensation makes the self. So is it possible not to identify with sensations? - yes sensations, I am hungry, but sex is a little more powerful. So I have got the key to it, the truth of it. Right sirs? So I feel secure, all right. Non-identification, that is the truth of it. If I really see the truth of it then sex, money, everything has its right place.

R: In other words, you can see, you must see, or you see without the self.

K: Ah, no, no.

R: Identification is self.

K: No, there is the truth that identification with sensation, with this, or that, builds the structure of the self. Right? Is that an absolute, irrevocable, passionate, lasting truth? Or is it just an idea which I have accepted, yes, it's true, and I can change that idea tomorrow? But this thing is irrevocable. One must have money - money gives me freedom, money gives you freedom to do what you like, freedom, sex, if you want it, money gives you a sense of travelling, power, position - you know, all the rest of it. So non-identification with money. You follow?

B: And that means the end of desire for anything.

K: No, desire has very little meaning. But it doesn't mean I am a dead vegetable.

B: Are you saying identification gives desire excessive meaning?

K: Of course.

So having put everything in its right place - I don't put it, it happens because I have seen the truth of this thing so everything falls in its right place.

R: Right.

K: No, I can't say yes, right or wrong.

R: No, no, I see what you say.

K: Then what place has thought? You understand, sir? What place has thought? Has it any place at all? Obviously when I am talking I am using words, the words are associated with memory and so on and so on, so there is thinking there - not with me, there is very little thinking as I am talking, don't let's go into that. So thought has a place. Right sir? When I have to catch a train, when I have to go to the dentist, when I go to do something, thought has its place. And it has no place psychologically when there is the identifying process taking place. Right? I wonder if you see.

N: Are you implying that because there is no thought the identifying process has lost its strength?

K: No, it hasn't lost its strength.

N: Or it doesn't happen at all.

K: We said just now, that having the key, or living with the fact, living with the truth that identification brings about the structure and the nature of the self, which creates all the innumerable problems, seeing the truth, living that truth - living, it's in my brain, in my throat, in my gullet, it's part of my blood - seeing the truth of that, that truth is there. And so thought has its right place. I have put money, sex - not I.

S: It falls into its place.

K: I want to go further into this.

N: If the insight, the passion, the truth, is powerful enough...

K: No, you see you are using the word 'powerful'.

N: Yes, I am using it.

K: No, it is not powerful.

N: It has its own strength.

K: No, you can't use those words.

N: Now if it has no strength thought asserts itself.

K: No, no, it is not strength.

B: You are saying it is identification that makes thought do all the wrong things.

K: That's right. Identification has made thought do the wrong things.

B: It would be all right otherwise.

K: Otherwise thought has its place.

B: But when you say no identification, you mean the self is empty, that it has no content, doesn't it?

K: There are only sensations.

B: Sensations but they are not identified.

K: Not identified.

N: Through thought.

K: Not identified.

B: They are just going on, do you mean?

K: Yes, sensations are going on.

B: Outside or inside.

K: Inside.

N: And you are also implying there is no slipping back.

K: Of course not. When you see something most dangerous, you don't slip back or go forward, it is dangerous. Sir then is that death? That is the question we began with.

R: Yes, yes.

K: Is that death? Death as we know it, that is the brain cells, etc., etc., die. Right? The body deteriorates, there is no oxygen and all the rest of it. So it dies. Sensations die with it. Right? Now where am I?

B: Sensations, you say, die with the body. There is no sensation.

K: No sensation. Right? Now is there a living with the sensation fully awakened - they are awakened, they are alive, but the non-identifying with sensation deprives, wipes away the self. We said that. Now what is death? Is it possible to live a daily life with death, which is the ending of the self?

R: Yes.

K: I am not questioning. Go on, somebody talk for a little while.

R: I follow it.

N: Would you say there is a great deal of talk about insight - insight meditation, vipassana - is insight a thing we can use and doesn't slip back? Is insight that quality?

R: Exactly what he is saying now is the insight meditation. What he is telling now is the insight meditation.

N: No, I am asking, does insight endure without reference to time?

K: Don't use the words 'endure', 'last'.

N: All insight is a momentary process.

K: The moment you have an insight it is finished.

N: Finished, yes.

R: Once you see it, finished.

K: I have an insight into the whole nature of the self. I have an insight.

R: Exactly that is what he says.

N: It is complete.

R: In itself it is complete and there is no coming back.

N: Otherwise it is not insight.

R: You have seen it, and you know it and there is no slipping back, no coming back.

S: Who has seen it? With those words we always into trouble.

R: No, this is only the language. There is no see-er apart from seeing.

N: There is no see-er apart from seeing.

B: Would you say the insight transforms the person?

K: That is what we were discussing the other day - the insight transforms not only the state of the mind but the brain cells themselves undergo a change.

R: Absolutely.

B: Therefore the brain cells being in a different state behave differently, it is not necessary to repeat the insight.

R: The whole system changes with that.

K: Be careful, sir, don't - either it is so, or it is not so. So I am left with this now: I am left with the question of what is death. Is the ending of the self death? Death in the ordinary accepted sense of the word. It is not, obviously, because the blood is circulating, the brain is working, the heart is pumping, and all the rest of it.

B: It is still alive.

K: It is alive but the self is non-existent because there is no identification of any kind. This is a tremendous thing. Non-identification with anything, with experience, with belief, with a country, with ideas, with ideals, wife, husband, love, no identification at all. Is that death? People who call that death say, my god, if I don't identify myself with my something or other, why I am nothing. So they are afraid of being nothing. Then identify. But nothingness, which is not a thing, you understand sir, not a thing, therefore it is quite a different state of mind. Now that is death. While there is living, sensations, the heart beating, the blood circulating, breathing, the brain active, undamaged - our brains are damaged.

B: Can this damage be healed? Is it possible to heal the damage?

K: Insight, that is what I want to get at. Our brains are damaged. For thousands of years we have been hurt psychologically, inwardly, and that hurt is part of our brain cells, remembered hurts, the propaganda for two thousand years that I am a Christian, that I believe in Jesus Christ, which is a hurt; or I am a Buddhist - you follow sir - that is a hurt. So our brains are damaged. To heal that damage is to listen very carefully, to listen, and in the listening to have an insight into what is being said, and therefore there is immediately a change in the brain cells. Therefore there is no identification, complete and total. And then is that love? You see I question this, sir. There is a great talk about compassion, isn't there, in the Buddhist literature. Be compassionate, don't kill, don't hurt. What place has love in compassion? To love a man or a woman, or a dog, or a piece of stone, a stray cat, to love something, the clouds, the trees, what place - or the nature, anything, love, the house put together by architects, a beautiful thing, the bricks, to love it, which is non-identifying with the bricks, with the house. The dying while living is that love in which there is no attachment.

R: That is so.

K: So then what place has love - loving a woman, a man, you understand, not identifying, please identifying with the sensations of sex with a woman, or with a man, and yet to love that person. When there is that love, that love is not the woman whom I love, it is global love. I wonder if you see.

R: Yes.

K: Don't agree, sir.

R: No, not agree, I see it.

K: What place has that quality with compassion? Or is compassion the same as love?

R: No.

N: Why do you say no?

R: Compassion is only for the suffering people. Love, there is no discrimination, whereas compassion is directed towards those who are suffering.

N: You make that distinction between compassion and love.

R: Yes.

N: Is it in the Buddhist language?

R: Karuna is compassion and love is maitri, it is more than compassion.

K: Sir, does one love without identification, which implies no self, no attachment?

R: That is the true love.

K: No, I am asking you, you as a human being, not as a Buddhist, as a human being without identification with your senses and so on and so on, do you love a woman or a man, or a child, or the sky or a stone, or a stray dog without identifying? They all suffer - the woman suffers, the man suffers, the dog has a terrible life, a stray dog, chased and kicked. And when there is no identification do you love that dog, or do you have compassion for that dog? Is compassion an idea - I must have compassion for the suffering, for the poor, for the demented?

B: I still think the question is, is there love for somebody who is not suffering? Suppose there is somebody who is not suffering.

K: Suppose somebody is frightfully happy, because he writes good books, or thrillers and gets a lot of money, says, jolly good luck.

B: I didn't mean that exactly. You could say that he was suffering underneath.

K: That's what I am questioning.

B: But would there be love if there were no suffering? You know if mankind were to be free of it.

K: Would there be love without suffering. Or, are you saying, a human being must go through suffering to have love?

B: Well not necessarily.

K: You see when you put it that way, that is what it implies, doesn't it.

B: Well you could say one point that there could be love whether there is suffering or not. And the other is compassion, the way the Buddhists use it, is that is only for suffering

K: I question that.

N: I didn't quite feel that karuna, compassion, was only for those who were suffering. I think it has a wider quality than that.

R: No, there are four qualities called Brahma Viharas, these supreme qualities - maitri, karuna, mudita, upekkha. Maitri embraces suffering and not suffering; karuna embraces only suffering, mudita is directed towards the happy people, happiness, in the world there is no such sympathetic joy; upekkha is equanimity. These four qualities are called the Brahma Viharas, the supreme, divine qualities. And that classification when you use the word love it is much bigger.

K: No, I haven't come to compassion yet, sir. I just want to know as a human being, do I love somebody - the dog, the chimney, the clouds, that beautiful sky, without identifying? Not as a theory but fact. I don't want to delude myself in theories, or in ideas, I want to know if I love that man or woman or that child, or that dog, without saying, "It is my dog" - my wife, my house, my brick - actually not abstraction.

S: If I can be quite sure the 'I' is gone, as long as I feel 'I' is acting as self, I cannot do it.

K: No, madam. We said the truth is the identification breeds the self which causes all the trouble, miseries.

S: And if that is seen.

K: I said that, it is an absolute, irrevocable reality, it is in my blood, I can't get rid of my blood, it is there.

S: Then I cannot help but love.

K: No, no. You are all too quick.

S: I beg your pardon.

K: Not, "I cannot help loving" - do you?

R: If you see it.

K: No, no. Do you see the truth, the truth of that, that identification is the root of the self, with thought and all the rest of it? That is an absolute fact, like a cobra, like a dangerous animal, like a precipice, like taking deadly poison. So there is no identification, absolutely, when you see the danger. Then what is my relationship to the world, to nature, to my woman, man, child? When there is no identification is there indifference, callousness, brutality - say, "I don't identify" and put your nose in the air?

R: That would be very selfish.

K: No, not selfish. Is this what is going to happen?

R: No.

K: No, sir, you can't just say, no. Why not? It will happen if it is intellectual.

S: It is not truth.

K: I have an ideal.

R: That is what I said, you have not seen then.

K: No. I am asking, sir, is this non-identification an ideal, a belief, an idea which I am going to live with and therefore my relationship to the dog, to the wife, to the husband, to the girl, or whatever it is becomes very superficial, casual. It is only when the truth that identification is absolutely cut out of one's life, there is no callousness then - because that is real.

We haven't solved the question of death yet. It is five minutes past one and we have to stop for lunch.

R: And in the afternoon I have some more questions, a list of things.

K: Let's go through them.

R: And these have been working in my mind for a long time.

K: Let's do it.

R: I want to discuss them with you and there is one session only we have this afternoon.

K: Do you want some more sessions?

R: Not possible today because we are going to have lunch.

K: This afternoon we are going to meet, but after today?

N: Dr. Rahula said he would like to stay back on Saturday, if it is possible. But Dr. Schloegel is going back this evening.

K: So we can meet today, this afternoon sir and we will see.

R: We will see how it works. If it is not possible today we will meet some other time. But you are going away.

K: Yes, I am going away on Tuesday. We will see.

BROCKWOOD PARK 23RD JUNE 1978 3RD CONVERSATION WITH PROF. BOHM, MR. NARAYAN AND TWO BUDDHIST SCHOLARS

Narayan: I am suggesting that Dr. Rahula puts all the questions that he has noted down so that in the course of the discussion we can cover most of the ground. And I have also got one or two things to say. I would like also to put it so that the discussion can centre round the questions.

Rahula: Why not put your question first?

N: My question is, in the Buddhist philosophy as coming from Nairanjana, probably the greatest thinker, second century: he talked a great deal about shunyata, void and it has a very close association with insight. And I believe the whole of later Buddhist thought owes its strength to this Nairanjana idea of shunyata as being something which is pure, pristinal. And there is no insight without shunyata. I will put it that way. And then he also said without understanding the outer there is no possibility of going to the inner. Then he also made a statement which seems to be fallacious: samsara is nirvana, and nirvana is samsara.

K: Sir, you are using Sanskrit words, perhaps some of us may understand each other but you must explain it.

N: Samsara is worldly life with all its travail, suffering and dukkha, sorrow, with all its sorrow. Nirvana is a state of freedom, bliss, liberation. He said samsara is nirvana, and nirvana is samsara. And this is explained by the Buddhist scholars through (?), the whole thing is interrelated, conditioned co-ordination. So this has a very powerful influence over the Buddhist thought today, as I understand it. And I would like this to be examined in the context of what we have been talking about.

K: I haven't understood the statement.

N: The first thing is the importance of shunyata.

K: What do you mean by that word shunyata?

R: From the Buddhist point of view I will explain. Shunyata literally means voidness, void, emptiness.

K: Nothingness. I know the meaning.

R: That is the literal meaning. But the significance is that it is attributed by western Buddhist scholars mostly to Nairanjana. That is incorrect. It is the Buddha who said this first and Nairanjana as a great thinker, philosopher, developed it into a system. Whereas Buddha said it in a very simple way. And Ananda who was Buddha's nearest associate, companion, disciple, asked one day, "Sir, it is said the world is sunyata, empty, what does it mean, to what extent is it sunyata?" He said, "Ananda, it is without self" - he used the word, atman - "without self and anything pertaining to self, therefore it is sunyata". It is very clearly explained. In many other places he told a man, "See the world as shunyata and you are liberated". And these are the original statements. Nairanjana took these ideas and developed them by his dependent origination, I would rather call it conditioned genesis, and on that philosophy, that is everything is interdependent, relative, nothing is absolute, everything is cause and effect, and cause cannot be separated from effect and effect is a continuity. That is time also. And on this philosophy Nairanjana developed very highly as a system this teaching of shunyata as void, empty. And that is exactly what Krishnaji says also. There is no self, and you see it and every problem is solved. There is no complication, there is no problem.

That is how I see it in relation to his explanation.

Then the second thing you said - what was the second question?

N: The relationship between the outer and the inner.

R: That is exactly what Krishnaji and Dr.Bohm discussed as 'Actuality and Truth' and it is published in that new book, that is sunyatasatva and paramatasatva, these are also accepted Buddhist philosophical propositions. Sunyatasatva is conventional, that is what we do, talk and eat and all these things, duality within relativity. You can't say this is false, this table. But in another sense this is not so. But sunyatasatva is that conventional truth.

Paramatsatva, the ultimate, absolute truth. These two also cannot be separated.

N: That's right.

R: Now Nairanjana clearly says in one place, one who cannot see and does not see the conventional truth is incapable of arriving at the ultimate truth.

The third question you raised was, I think, nirvana and samsara. That is also, Nairanjana says - really I remember the words even by heart - he says that nirvana has no difference whatsoever from samsara and samsara has no difference whatsoever from nirvana. To clarify the word 'samsara', the strict definition is the continuity of our existence. And I remember once I put this question to Krishnaji in Paris, personally, there was nobody except him and myself.

K: Two wise people!

R: I don't know. But I put it to Krishnaji there is a great Nairanjana statement like this, it is very interesting to say it today,

I asked him what he thought. Then to my surprise he said, "Who is Nairanjana?" I said, "That is your compatriot", and then I explained to him who Nairanjana was historically as a thinker and a philosopher. I said in Buddhist history he is perhaps the boldest thinker. Then he asked me, what were his attainments. I said we can't say, that we don't know, only we know his writings, through writings about him, but about his attainments, spiritual realization we can't say anything. Krishnaji paused for a minute and asked me, "What did Buddha say about all this?" I said, nothing. You said, that is correct, that is right. Because I was always doubtful and I did not accept Nairanjana's statement so clearly, definitely saying nirvana and sunyama were the same.

K: I am not quite sure that we understood, all of us.

R: Yes, will you explain this point sir?

K: May I ask this, to explain a little more? What does samskara mean actually?

R: Samskara is another thing. Samsara literally means wandering, going off.

K: And Samskara means?

R: Samskara means construction, that is all our thinking.

K: The past.

R: It belongs to the past.

K: That's right.

R: It belongs to the past.

K: Yes, I understood that.

R: All our sanskarsas are memory, knowledge, learning and all that.

K: Like an old man going back and living in the past. That's it.

R: But samsara is continuity. Nirvana means...

K: Whatever it is.

R: Whatever it is, it is never defined in positive terms by the Buddha. Always whenever he was asked he said, no, that is not nirvana.

K: So you have asked your questions?

Now, sir, you had better ask your questions too in relation to what he has said.

R: The question is not from him, from you. My question I am asking from you.

K: What?

R: There are many questions but as we have not much time...

K: We have got plenty of time, sir.

R: One question is - both I will say at once so you can take them - one question is that in western philosophy, western thought, free will has played a very important part.

K: Free will.

R: Free-will - absolutely freely. Yes, free will. According to the same philosophy that Mr.Narayan said, conditional relations, that is cause and effect - according to that philosophy, Buddhism, such a thing is impossible because all our thinking, all our construction, all our work, all our knowledge is conditioned. Therefore if there is a free will it is free only in a relative sense and it is not absolute freedom. That is the Buddhist position. That is one question I put.

K: Let's talk it over, sir. What is will? What is will? How do you explain what will is?

R: Will is that you decide, you want.

K: No, what is the origin, the beginning of will? I will do this, I won't do that. Now what is the meaning of will?

R: The meaning of will is to want to do.

K: No. All right, let me go on then. Is it not desire?

R: It is a desire.

K: Desire accentuated, heightened, strengthened, which we call will.

Bohm: It seems to me that we make it determined. We determine the object of desire. We say, "I am determined".

K: In that there is determination.

B: It gets fixed there.

K: I desire that, and to achieve that I make an effort. That effort, the motive of that effort is desire. So will is desire. Right?

R: It is a form of desire.

K: Now, can desire ever be free?

R: Absolutely. That is what I wanted to hear from you because you don't like to say that but I want to say it.

K: Desire can never be free. It can change the objects of desire: I can desire one year to go to buy this, the next year that, change, but desire is constant, the objects vary. And the strengthening of desire, I will do that, the will is in operation. Will is desire. Now can desire ever be free?

R: No.

K: But we say free will exists because I can choose between this and that, between this job and that job, I can go - except out of the totalitarian states - I can go from England to France freely. So the idea of free will is cultivated with a sense that human beings are free to choose. What does that mean, to choose? I can choose between blue jeans and something else, between this car and that car, between that house and so on, but why should I choose at all? Apart from material things, apart from certain books and so on, why is there choice? I am a Catholic, I give up Catholicism and become a Zen Buddhist. And if I am a Zen, I become something else, and I choose. Why? Why is there choice at all, which gives one the impression that I am free to choose? Right sir? So I am asking why is there the necessity of choice at all? If I am a Catholic, and absorb the whole significance of Catholicism, with its abstractions, with its rituals, dogmas, you know the whole circus in it, and I abandon that, why should I join something else? Because when I have investigated this I have investigated all the religions. So choice must exist only when the mind is confused. No? When it is clear there is no choice. Is that right?

R: I think you have answered the question, to me you have answered the question.

K: I haven't fully answered it.

B: I think that the western philosophers might not agree with you, I am not sure.

K: They won't agree, of course.

B: They say that choice is not desire, that will is not desire, but will is something else. I think that is my impression.

K: Yes, will is something else.

B: Will is a free act.

K: The will is something inherited, or it is part of the genetic process, to will, to be.

B: But I think for example, I can't say I know much about it, but Catholic philosophers may say that when Adam sinned, he willed wrongly, let's say, he made a wrong choice and he set us off on this way.

K: You see that is a very convenient way of explaining away everything. First invent Adam and Eve, the serpent and the apple, and god, and then put everything as the primal crime.

R: Yes, a lot of creation in that, mental creation.

B: I think if one observes one can see that will is the result of desire. But I think people have the impression that will is something entirely different.

K: Yes, will is part of something sacred.

B: That's what many people think.

K: Something derived from a divine being.

R: According to the western philosophy.

K: More or less. I don't know very much about western philosophy but from people with whom I have talked, and they may not be sufficiently informed, but they have given me the impression that will is something not quite human, not quite desire, not quite something that you cultivate. It is born out of the original sin, original god, and so on and so on.

But if one puts all that aside, which is theoretical, problematical and rather superstitious, if you put all that aside, then what is will and what is choice, and what is action without choice and will? You follow? That is the problem. Is there any action which is not compounded with will? I don't know what the Buddha said.

N: Would you say that insight has nothing to do with will?

K: Oh, nothing whatever to do with will, or desire, or memory.

N: So insight is something which is free from will, and also analysis.

R: Yes. Insight is seeing. And in that seeing there is no choice, there is no discrimination, there is no judgement, there are no moral or immoral values. You see.

N: So insight is not visible to will, nor is it visible to analysis.

R: No.

K: You see this is becoming theoretical. You are making it so theoretical.

N: Because through analysis...

K: Excuse me, sir. You are making it theoretical, you have defined it, it is not this, it is not that, and you think you have insight.

N: I don't agree.

K: Then why do you discuss it?

N: No, because we have been discussing insight so far, or we have been seeing.

K: Now, Narayan, if I may point out, we are talking over together action in which there is no choice, in which there is no effort as will. Is there such action? I don't know, sir, please.

R: There is such an action.

K: You know it? Or is it a theory? Forgive me, I must be clear. I want to move away, if you will forgive me, and I am not being impudent, one should move away from theories, from ideas, from conclusions. But find out for oneself the truth of that matter: which is, is there an action in which there is no effort of will at all, and therefore no choice? So what is correct action in which there is no will, no choice, no desire - because will is part of desire and so on? To find that out one must be very clear, mustn't one, of the nature of desire. And desire is part of sensation, and desire being part of sensation, and thought identifies itself with that sensation, and through identification the 'I' is built up, the ego, and the ego then says, "I must", or "I will not".

So we are trying to find out if there is an action not based on the principle of ideals, on desire, on will, not spontaneous - that word is rather a dangerous word because nobody is spontaneous, one thinks one can be spontaneous but there is no such thing because one must be totally free to be spontaneous. Do you follow? So is there such action? Because most of our action has a motive. Right? And motive means movement - I want to build a house, I want that woman, or that man, I am hurt psychologically or biologically and my motive is to hurt back - so there is always some kind of motive in action, which we do in daily life. So then action is conditioned by the motive. The motive is part of the identification process. So if I understand - not 'understand' - if there is a perception of the truth that identification builds the whole nature, the structure of the self, then is there an action which doesn't spring from thought? I don't know, am I right sir?

B: Could we ask why - before we go into that - why there is identification, why is it that this is so prevalent?

K: Why does thought identify.

B: With sensation and other things.

K: Why is there identification with something?

B: Specially sensation.

K: Yes. Go on sirs. Answer it sirs. You are all experts.

N: Is it the very nature of thought to identify, or are there forms of thought which don't identify with sensation?

K: Narayan, why do you - if I may again most politely and respectfully, etc., etc., why do you put that question? Is it a theoretical question or an actual question? Why do you, Narayan, identify?

N: Let me put it this way...

K: No, I won't put it differently.

N: Why I can identify with these sensations, I have nothing else to identify with.

K: So why do you give importance to sensation? Do you say, I am a sentient being and nothing else?

N: No, no.

K: Ah, that's it.

N: If I have to identify with anything it can only be with sensation.

B: Is there a duality in identification? Could we make it clear.

K: In identification, as you point out sir, there is duality, the identifier and the identified.

B: Is it possible that you are trying to overcome the duality by identifying, by saying, "I am not different", when you are, or when you feel you aren't.

K: You see I don't want to enter into the field of ideologies, theories. To me, I have no interest in it. But I really, in investigating I want to find out, perhaps I have found out but talking over together, is there an action in which the self is not? In daily life, not in nirvana, when I have reached freedom and all the rest of it, I want to do it in this life, as I live. Which means I have to find out - the mind has to find out an action which has no cause, which means no motive, an action which is not the result or an effect of a series of causes and effects. If that exists action is always bound, chained. Am I making myself clear? So is there such an action?

B: Well, it seems to me we can't find it as long as we are identifying.

K: That's right. That's why I said as long as identification exists I can't find the answer.

B: But why does thought identify?

K: Why does thought identify with sensations?

B: Is that irresistible or is that just something you can put aside?

K: I don't know if that is irresistible, or if it is part of sensation.

B: How is that?

K: Let's investigate.

B: You think that sensation is behind that?

K: Perhaps, when I say perhaps, that word is used for the purpose of investigation, not "I don't know", but let's investigate. But it may be. So why have sensations become so important in life - sexual sensations, the sensation of power, whether occult power or political power, economic power, or power of a woman over man, or man over woman, power of environment, the influence of the environment, the pressures - why has thought yielded to this pressure? Right, sir?

B: Does sensation necessarily produce a pressure?

K: It does when it is identified.

B: Yes, but then it is the two together.

K: I know, but let's examine. What do we mean by sensation?

B: Well it is clear that we may have a remembered sensation of pleasure.

K: Senses, the operation of the senses - touching, tasting, seeing, smelling, hearing.

B: The experience that happens then; and also the memory of it.

K: No, the memory is only when there is an identification with it.

B: I agree, yes.

K: When there is no identification the senses are senses. But why does thought identify itself with senses?

B: Yes, that is not yet clear.

K: We are going to make it clear.

B: Are you saying that when the sensation is remembered then we have identification?

K: Yes.

B: Can we make that more clear?

K: Let's make it a little more clear. Let's work at it. There is perceiving a pleasurable lake, seeing a beautiful lake, what takes place in that seeing? There is not only optical seeing by the eye, but also the senses are awakened, the smell of the water, the trees on the lake...

B: Could we stop a moment? When you say seeing, of course you see through the visual sense.

K: I am using purely visual sense.

B: Therefore you already have the visual sense awakened merely to see. Is that what you mean?

K: Yes. Just seeing.

B: Visually.

K: Visually, optically, I am just seeing, then what takes place?

B: And the other senses start to operate.

K: And the other senses start operating. Why doesn't it stop there?

B: What is the next step?

K: The next step is thought comes in - how beautiful that is, I wish I could remain here.

B: So thought identifies it.

K: Yes.

B: It says, "It is this".

K: Because in that there is pleasure.

B: In what?

K: Seeing and the delight of seeing, then thought coming into operation and saying, "I must have more, I must build a house here, it is mine".

B: But why does thought do that?

K: Why does thought interfere with senses - is that it? Now wait a minute, sir. The moment the senses take pleasure, say, "How delightful", and stop there, thought doesn't enter. Right? Now why does thought enter? If it is painful thought avoids it, it doesn't identify itself with that.

B: It identifies against it, it says, "I don't want it".

K: No, leave it alone, go away from it, either deny it or move away from it. But if it is pleasurable, when the senses begin to enjoy, say, "How nice", then thought begins to identify itself with it.

B: But why, I mean?

K: Why, because of pleasure.

B: But why doesn't it give it up when it sees how futile this is?

K: Oh, that's much later.

B: That's a long way on.

K: When it becomes painful, when it is aware identification breeds both pleasure and fear, then it begins to question.

B: Well, are you saying that thought has made a simple mistake in the beginning, a kind of innocent mistake?

K: That's right. Thought has made a mistake in identifying with something that brings to it pleasure, or there is pleasure in something.

B: And thought tries to take over.

K: To take over.

B: To make it permanent, perhaps.

K: Permanent, that's right, which means memory. A remembrance of the lake with the daffodils and the trees and the water and sunlight, and all the rest of it.

B: I understand thought has make a mistake and later it discovers that mistake, but it seems to be too late because it doesn't know how to stop.

K: It is now conditioned.

B: So can we make it clear why it cannot give it up, you see.

K: Why it cannot give it up. That's our whole problem.

B: Can we try to make it more clear.

K: Why doesn't thought give up something which it knows, or is aware is painful?

B: Yes.

K: It is destructive. Why? Go on, why, sir? Sir, let's take a simple example: psychologically one is hurt.

B: Well that is later.

K: I am taking that as an example, doesn't matter later. One is hurt, why can't one immediately give up that hurt, because knowing that hurt is going to create a great deal of damage? That is, when I am hurt I build a wall round myself not to be hurt more, there is fear, and isolation, neurotic actions, all that follows.

Thought has created the image about myself, and that image gets hurt. Why doesn't thought say, "Yes, by Jove, I have seen this", drop it immediately? It is the same question. Because when it drops the image there is nothing left.

B: Then you have another ingredient because thought wants to hold on to the memory of the image.

K: Hold on to the memories which have created the image.

B: And which may create it again, and thought feels they are very precious.

K: Yes, they are very precious, nostalgic and all the rest of it.

B: So somehow it gives very high value to all that. How did it come to do that?

K: Why has it made the image so valuable. Why has the image become so important which thought has created?

B: If I may say that in the beginning it was a simple mistake, and thought made an image of pleasure and it seemed to become very important, precious, and was unable to give it up.

K: Yes, why doesn't it? Sir, if I give up pleasure, if thought gives up pleasure, what is there left?

B: It can't seem to return to the state in the beginning when there was nothing.

K: Ah, that is the pristine state.

B: It is unable to return to that state.

K: It can't because thought - you know, all the rest of it.

B: Well, I think what happens is that when thought thinks of giving up pleasure which has become very precious, then the mere thought of that is painful.

K: Yes, giving up is painful.

B: And therefore thought runs away from that.

K: Yes, so it clings to pleasure.

B: It does not wish to face the pain.

K: Until there is a better reward for pleasure, which will be a better pleasure.

B: That's no change.

K: Of course.

B: But thought seems to have fallen into a trap which it has made because it has innocently remembered pleasure, and then gradually made it important and then it has become too painful to give it up. Because any change from the immediate removal of pleasure is very painful.

K: Because it has nothing else then afterwards, then it is frightened.

B: But you see in the beginning it was not frightened to have nothing else.

K: Yes.

B: Now it is.

K: Yes, In the beginning, that means the beginning being the beginning of man.

B: Yes.

K: In the beginning of man - can we question even that?

B: Perhaps not.

K: Beginning of the ape.

B: If you go far enough back. You want to say it has been going a long time, but thought has built this trap which has gradually got worse.

K: Sir, could we say as the brain is very old - all our brains are very old - merely tracing it back further and further and further, you can never find out. But I can say my brain is now as it is, which is very old, conditioned, in terms of pleasure and pain.

B: They say the old brain is also the emotional product of the brain.

K: Of course, emotional and all the rest of it, sensory. So where are we now?

B: Well, we say this brain has conditioned itself by continual memory of the image of pleasure, the unpleasantness of giving it up and the fear.

K: So it clings to something which it knows.

B: Which it knows and which is very precious to it.

K: But it doesn't know that it is going to breed fear.

B: Even when it knows it still clings.

K: But it would much rather run away from fear hoping the pleasure will continue.

B: Eventually it starts to become irrational because it creates pressures which make the brain irrational and unable to get this straight.

K: Yes. Where are we now at the end of this? We started off, sir, didn't we, Dr.Bohm, with, is there an action in which there is no motive, no cause, the self doesn't enter into it at all? Of course there is. There is when the self is not, which means no identifying process takes place. There is the perceiving of a beautiful lake with all the colour and the glory and the beauty of it, that's enough. Not the cultivating of memory, which is developed through the identification process. Right?

B: This raises the question, how are we going to stop this identification?

K: I don't think there is a 'how'. You see that means meditation, control, practice, practice, practice. And that way makes the mind mechanical, dull - forgive me - and literally incapable of receiving anything new.

Schloegel: If it imitates, if it just imitates it, this is precisely what happens. If these practices are done with imitation, imitation...

R: That means if that practice becomes an imitation then the mind is mechanical.

K: What do you mean 'imitation'?

S: If you tell me - if I make it very simple - just three times a day put your hand on the floor, something will happen; and I do it, I do not think about it, I do not enquire about it, I do not say, "Now, what happens, why should I", if I do not question it, if I just mechanically do it nothing will happen, I will get only more and more fuzzy. But if I enquire into it why, what for, what is my reaction...

K: My question is, I have listened to somebody who says, put your hand there, and then I begin to enquire, but I don't accept anybody telling me that I must put my hand there, then I don't have to enquire. Do you remember that famous story of a guru, he had a favourite cat, and he had many disciples. Every morning before they all started meditation, he caught hold of the cat, put it on his lap, and meditated. And when he died the disciples had to search around for a cat.

R: I heard it quite differently. The cat was tied up so he could not come and listen.

K: Same thing. You see our minds are mechanical anyhow, have been made mechanical. Can't we investigate why we have become mechanical, rather than practice that which is non-mechanical, which may be mechanical.

S: We can, since there have been people who have become whole before us...

K: I don't know.

S: Or it seems so.

K: I don't know anybody.

S: It seems likely.

K: You see you accept it.

S: Looking at it as a possible proposition.

K: I don't know. I start with myself. I don't look to somebody who is enlightened. I don't know. They may deceive themselves.

S: This is why I am trying to find...

K: So one must start with oneself. Oneself is already secondhand, living in the shadow of others, so why look to others. So here I am. From there I begin. It is so simple, whereas the other leads to so many complications.

S: I do not necessarily see it as a complication. If I have an idea that there is something that is more than my illusion, my suffering, my general state of dissatisfaction in which I am and which I have to face, if I do not think that there is any possibility then I might not even try. If I see that there might be a possibility, I do not need to take it for truth, but it gives me the sense that it is worthwhile trying to work with myself as my own subject of experiment, to work it out.

K: Why do you want a motive?

S: I think it is almost impossible not to start with that motive because that starts from self.

K: No, madam, we are talking about the same thing, aren't we? I just want to know myself, not because I suffer, I go through, you know, I just want to know what I am, not according to anybody but just know about myself. So I begin to enquire, I begin to look in the mirror, which is myself. The mirror says, your reactions are these, and as long as you have these reactions you are going to pay heavily, you are going to suffer. So that is all. So now how am I, an ordinary human being, knowing all my reactions, ugly, pleasant, hateful, all the reactions one has, to bring about an observation in which there is no motive to restrain, or to expand, reactions? I wonder if I am making myself clear.

S: Yes.

K: How am I to observe myself without a cause? The cause generally is punishment and reward. Which is obviously too absurd, like a dog being trained. So can I look at myself without any motive? Go on sirs.

S: At this stage of enquiry, where I am beginning to try to do it, to start with I cannot do it, I am too conditioned.

K: No, I wouldn't admit that. You are always asking for help.

S: No, but I can in the same way that I can do a physical training, I can be able slowly, but not immediately, to look at the proximity of those things that I do normally not like to see in myself.

K: I understand that madam. I have no muscles to do certain exercises, in a week's time I have those muscles by doing exercises. That same mentality is carried over - I don't know myself but I will gradually learn about myself.

S: It is not that I need to gradually learn - we have to be very careful here - it is not that I need to gradually learn about myself, it is only that I have to develop the courage, the strength to bear myself.

K: It is the same thing, it is the same thing. I haven't the strength, physical strength to do certain exercises: the same mental operation goes psychologically, I am weak but I must be strong.

S: It is not that I must get strong. I think this is where one gets oneself into a critical state, it is not for the motive, it is the very real suffering and looking, and suffering and looking, and there is a changing factor in it which in the end makes it possible.

K: Which is again gradual, evolution. I say that is totally - if I may point out, I am not correcting you - that will lead nowhere, that is an illusion.

S: It need not lead to anywhere, but if it is continued in that spirit, with that attitude, not I get something out of it, then there is a sudden change which is possible and it does occur. And I would like to make another point on that: whether we have done it starting with that motive and began slowly the other way, or whether we have done it unknown to ourselves so that it can suddenly happen on the basis of the life that we have lived, does really not make any difference.

K: Madam, either you have insight immediately, or you don't have it.

S: yes, that is true but...

K: Ah, there is no preparation, that means time, which means cultivating, identification, the 'me'.

S: No.

K: Of course. The moment you allow time it is the cultivation of the self.

S: Not necessarily.

K: Why do you say, not necessarily?

S: If I do it for something that I want to gain out of it then it is certainly a cultivation of the self.

K: Madam, when you say, as we said just now, insight is devoid of time and memory. Insight is timeless, it must happen. You can't gradually come to it, it is not a thing cultivated by thought. So to have an insight into oneself instantly, not by degrees. Is that possible?

S: Yes.

K: No, don't say, yes, we are enquiring.

S: Then I would say with my own conviction and experience, yes.

K: Say yes to what?

S: It is possible.

K: That means if you have an insight, that insight wipes away the self, not momentarily. So would you say action then is without motive? Do you know such action - not occasionally, but living an everyday life? I don't want to be occasionally fed but I want to be fed every day. I don't want to be occasionally happy - you know all the rest of it. As insight is devoid of time and divorced from memory, thought, therefore is there an action born of insight? You understand?

R: If you have insight - I don't say 'had' because that means memory again.

K: Have insight.

R: If you have insight, there is no exception, all your actions are without motive.

K: Again forgive me - are we talking theoretically or actually?

R: Actually.

K: That means action is correct, accurate, right through life.

R: Yes. You may make mistakes, sir, technically.

K: No, I am not talking of technically.

R: There is no self, there is no motive if you have that insight. Every action...

K: Have you got that insight? Not you, sir, has one insight, that insight into the whole nature of the self, not arguments, not inductions, not deductions, not conclusions, but have an insight into the nature of the self. And therefore the self, if there is an insight through the self then action will inevitably follow from that insight.

S: May I make one point clear that I feel strongly about - it is not that I have the insight, that is not possible. There is that insight. It is not as if I had it.

K: I have no insight, I have only blood. If I say, "I have an insight into that", I am a little bit mentally deranged. So what are we talking about? You asked a question, sir.

R: Of course we have gone very far away from our initial question.

K: I know.

R: Now let us go back to that question that was answered.

K: Let's go back to it.

R: No, that question you have answered. Then there is another question also dealing with intelligence. You see there is - perhaps you are aware of this theory, many people - that we think in a language. Many people say that. In which language do you think. I don't know. There is no language in thinking. Thought has no language, and the thought is immediately interpreted into the nearest language.

K: Sir, could you convey your thought to me without the word?

R: That is the thing. When you convey thought it is indefinite.

K: No, sir. Can you convey your thought to me without the word?

R: That depends on the level.

K: Which means what?

R: I don't know whether you accept it, or whether you have that experience, without talking, without words, there is communication.

K: That is, sir, there can only be communication, communion, when you and I are on the same level, and with the same intensity, at the same time. Right? Which is what? When you and I are on the same level, with the same intensity, at the same time, what is that thing? Then words are not necessary.

R: No.

K: What is that thing?

R: You can say if you like that it is thought.

K: No, no. Sir, when both of us are like that, what is the quality of that state? Not the absence of thought, but the quality, the perfume, the thing of it. Wouldn't you call that love?

R: Yes.

K: Don't.

R: But you asked me, or just you are going to answer it. I get confused when you put it to me and think you want me to answer it.

K: Sir, when two people have this extraordinary quality of this state, words are not necessary. There is that quality of love which exists, words become unnecessary. There is instant communication. Now for most of us language drives us. Right? Right sir? Language drives us, pushes us, shapes us. Our minds are conditioned by language, which is language, words, drive us, force us. I am an Englishman - the language, and the content of that language. Right? And if we use words without the language directing us, words then have an entirely different meaning.

N: The language doesn't drive you, but you drive the language.

K: That's right.

B: I think that ordinarily we are identified with our language and therefore it is driving us, but if we are free of identification...

K: That's right, sir, It is extraordinary how language has made us. I am a communist.

B: That's an identification.

K: That's it.

B: But do you think that language is the major source of identification?

K: One of them.

B: One of the big ones.

K: Yes.

R: I don't know whether it would be useful, I would like to remind here of a very important Mahayana Buddhist philosophical attitude. That is, it is said that the world is caught up in language. And it is said the ordinary man is stuck in words just like an elephant in the mud, and so one must go beyond words to see them. Because as long as you are, as you say, driven by language...

K: Are you?

R: Are you asking personally?

K: Yes, are you? Am I? Dr.Bohm, is he driven by language?

R: That I can't see. You answer it.

K: I can answer for myself, but I am asking you.

R: Yes, you answer for yourself.

K: Absolutely.

R: That's enough.

N: But I think the more skilful, or scholarly one becomes in language, I suppose there is a great possibility of being caught in language.

R: Yes.

N: Whereas the rustic might just use it for simple communication.

K: Sir, that was your question, whether thought has words, whether thought is part of words. Does the word create the thought, or thought create the word?

B: You once asked the question, is there a thought without the word?

K: That is very interesting, sir, shall we go into it a little bit? Do you want to go into it, sir?

R: Is there a thought without the word.

B: That is the question.

R: I think thought has no word. Thought has no word. Thought is an image.

K: No, we are using the word in the sense of the symbol, the image, the picture, the word.

B: You see the word can easily be turned into an image, for example, by an artist, a description can be turned by an artist into an image, or vice versa, the image could be described and turned into words. So they have an equivalent content.

K: Sir, what is the origin of thought? If you had to find out, not what the Buddha said, if you, as a human being, had to find out something you must find out, otherwise your head will be chopped off, it is something tremendously important that you must find out, what will you do, what is the origin of thought. God made the word and the word was incarnate, at the beginning of Genesis. Please sir, answer that question.

R: Is there an origin?

K: Must be.

R: Why?

K: Otherwise - in you sir, what is the origin?

R: No origin.

K: Of course, sir, there must be a beginning of thought.

R: That is again a fallacy, a wrong way of looking at it.

K: No, no.

R: By asking everything must have a beginning.

K: No, I am not asking that everything has a beginning. I am just asking in order to find out, what is the beginning of thought. How did thought begin? With the dog - you follow sir - with the animals, everything that is living, they all think in various ways, or feel, and so on - there must be a beginning of that. What is that in human beings.

S: If we had no desire at all we would have no thought.

K: No, it is not a question of that.

B: Are you discussing thought without identification?

K: No, sir. How did thought begin in myself? Was it handed down by my father, by my parents, by education, by environment, by the past? I want to know. What made me think? Go on sir. What made you think?

R: The question is this, you are putting some cause behind it, but I would say, nothing made me think, it is in the nature of yourself, thinking.

K: No.

R: There is no other cause.

K: Oh yes there is. I'll show you.

R: What is that?

K: No, I am not the final authority, sir. I'd like to talk it over. If I had no memory, would there be thinking?

R: I ask you again, what is the origin of memory?

K: That's fairly simple to answer. I remember seeing you in Paris - which I don't, but suppose I remember seeing you in Paris - that is recorded, isn't it? Right, sir?

R: That is generally accepted that it is recorded in the brain.

K: No, it is an ordinary fact.

R: No, that I do not accept. It is an old 19th century, 18th century, theory that everything is recorded in the brain somewhere.

K: No, sir. Look, I met you this week, you come back a year later - I hope you will - and then I say, yes, sir, I recognize you.

How does that recognition take place?

R: This is a question that I want to ask you. I didn't ask it but this is the question that I very much wanted to ask you.

K: I meet you now, and in a year's time you come back, I hope you will for a discussion. Then I say, yes, sir, Mr. Rahula, we met last year. How does that take place? Very simple. Memory, the brain has recorded that memory of meeting you, learning your name. So that is memory, and when I meet you next time I recognize you. Right?

R: How does it happen?

K: It is very simple. You have been introduced to me, we have sat down here for two afternoons and a morning, and that is remembered, when you come back next year I say, yes. If I didn't remember I wouldn't recognize you. Right? So recording goes on - it is the 19th, or 1st century, or the 20th century, recording must go on. The elaborate educating process of learning a technique, how to drive a car, or go to the moon, whatever it is, it is careful accumulation of memory, which then acts. There is nothing wrong in that, is there?

R: How does it happen?

K: Sir, I don't know how to drive a car, so I go to the man who teaches me how to drive a car. I take twenty four lessons, at the end of it I am inspected and the man says, pretty good. I have learnt it by driving with him, he is telling me, be careful, turn to the left, he is guiding me all the time. So at the end of twenty four lessons I am a good driver. I hope. And that's all. There is nothing right or wrong about it. In the same way I meet you today, next year I will remember, which is, there is remembrance, which is the recording process. No? It is so simple.

R: It is not so clear to me. Let us admit it is recorded, how does that record come up when we meet next year?

K: When I see you. That memory comes up and says, oh, he is Mr. Rahula. And the recording is the image, pleasurable or not pleasurable.

R: I hope it will be pleasurable!

K: And that is recorded, and when I meet you next time, I meet you. But if it is not pleasurable I say, oh, what a bore. And I turn away and talk about something else. So this whole process is recorded - how I learnt to drive a car, how I learnt to speak English, French, German, whatever it is, there must be recording. No?

R: Certainly it is so.

K: But you said 19th century...

R: What I want to say is, it is not in the brain. That is the thing. It is in the nature of what we call generally the mental faculty. Just as I hear noise etc., the mind faculty, the mental faculty, also is a faculty. That is one possibility.

K: It is the faculty of the brain to record.

R: It is not the physical brain. That is my point.

K: Ah, you have gone off into something else.

R: Yes, that is what I say.

N: You are saying that the mental faculty is spread all over the body, not necessarily in the head?

R: Our mental faculty is one of the sense organs - there are five physical sense organs. You see the eye has the power to see and examine, the ear can't do it, it can hear all right. There is the mental factor just like eye, ear, nose, tongue - all the physical faculties - there is the mental faculty, which eye, ear, nose, tongue and body deals with the external world, material world. But the world is finished by that, the bigger part of the world is not touched by that.

K: What is the bigger part of the world?

R: That is what we were talking about, these sensations and all these things are not touched by the body, or anything like that. Then the mind faculty the mental faculty is the thing that has many, many aspects, many potentialities; one is the memory. And what I want to clarify from you is how does it happen, and of course you begin with the idea of the brain...

K: No.

R: ...the recording in the brain, and with which I disagree.

K: Sir, let's cut out the brain, for the moment. I meet you today and I see you a week later. There is the process of recognition. All right. That's one part of the faculty. The other part of the faculty is to think logically, or not logically. So there are several aspects, faculties which are made up in the mind. You cannot have mind without the brain.

R: Yes. Not only the brain, but without the body, without the stomach, without the heart. Without the physical existence you can't have the mind.

K: That's all. Therefore the mind is part of the senses, the mind is part of the thought, emotions, certain faculties and so on and so on. Is that outside, or the whole structure of the organism, the whole brain, body, eyes, ears, all that is part of this mind which is the process of thinking. No?

B: Are you saying mind is thought, or is it more than thought as well?

K: I don't know but I don't want to say that. I only want to say the mind as long as it is functioning within the field of thought is limited.

B: You mean consciousness, the mind is that.

K: Yes, consciousness is limited.

B: We say it is limited by these faculties, wherever they are.

K: Yes, that's right, whatever they are.

B: But as far as recognition goes, people are even making machines that can imitate the process of recognition.

K: Of course.

B: You know you can recognize simple things already by means of a computer.

S: And yet, if I have met you just for a moment, and there was not a sufficient impact of you of that meeting image, I will next week pass you by and not recognize you.

B: That's the point, it has to be recorded with some energy, you see.

S: That is what I mean, there must be sufficient energy.

K: All recording must have energy.

B: If you don't turn on the microphone nothing is recorded.

R: And many things that we see and hear we don't remember, only things that leave a certain impression.

B: You see I think it is fairly clear how the record could give rise to a recognition from the next experience. The next time you see the person the record is compared with.

R: It comes back.

B: It comes back, yes.

R: It is exactly like the computer.

K: So our brains are computers.

R: I should say, no, not the brain.

K: What is the brain?

R: The brain may be the basis - why do you only say brain, why not the whole body, whole heart, without heart can you think?

K: No. Therefore sir, we said that. The brain, the mind, the mind contains the brain, the feelings, the heart, the whole structure.

B: All the nerve centres.

K: We are using the mind as consciousness, which is I cannot have consciousness if the heart doesn't function.

R: That is why I used the word mental faculty instead of the mind, or consciousness, the word faculty embracing, involving all that department.

K: What do you mean by the word faculty? What does the word mean, sir?

B: To have some capacity and ability - capacity to do something.

R: The ability to do, like when you say a visual faculty.

K: No, sir, ability to do depends on knowledge. If I didn't know how to play the piano, that is learnt it...

R: No, excuse me, sir, you are going away from the point. I said the mind faculty - mind has the power, the capacity, the potentiality, to do all that. And those are different aspects of the thing.

K: Oh, I see.

B: The faculty is inborn.

R: Inborn, innate, in itself has the power. And you can't ask why and from where.

K: No, I won't ask that. I won't accept the mind has the inborn faculty.

B: To think.

K: Inborn which means it is not genetic, it is not heredity.

B: No, inborn means genetic.

R: No, no, that is not right. Say the mind just like our eyes has the power to see.

K: So the mind has the power...

R: ...to do all those tricks, all those things that we are taught - the memory, reaction and sensation, and all that.

K: The mind is the active energy to do all this.

B: Well also the physical structure is all over the body. I think that it is a good analogy to say that the eye has certain possibilities and in this whole body already the infant has the ability to think already built into him because of the heredity.

K: How has this 'built in' come into being?

B: By growing in the same way that the eye grew. You see the eye has a tremendous...

K: Which means evolution.

B: Evolution, yes.

K: Wait, wait, go slowly. Which means right from the beginning it has evolved until we are now monkeys, greater monkeys. Sorry!

R: I question that. You took for granted Darwin's theory.

K: I don't take Darwin, I see this happening in the world.

R: When you say we are evolved from the monkey.

K: We have evolved from imperfect man; or not evolved from perfect man. We are going down the hill instead of up the hill, or we are going uphill, therefore we are imperfect man.

B: I wonder if we want to discuss all these things, they are really details that are not certain.

R: That is why I object to that statement about the monkey evolving. We don't know.

K: I don't know sir, I don't know how we have evolved but I do know the very simple thing which is, without recording there is no thought.

R: That means that thought is memory.

K: Of course. Thought is memory, which is experience, which is knowledge, stored up - it doesn't matter where, in my big toe, stored up - and when it is challenged it operates.

B: Well we have also said thought is the ability to reason logically and along with the memory, all that together.

K: Logically, or illogically, and so on.

B: All that is what you have called faculties.

R: Yes, I used that word because it uses a bigger field.

B: But you are saying it still depends on memory.

K: Of course, a sense of recording is memory.

B: Without memory none of the other faculties could operate.

K: Of course. I see that thing, it has been called a tree, I call it a tree. That's all. It is recorded all the time. Without that recording there is no beginning of thought, there is no thought. Sir, if you were born in the Catholic world, and conditioned by the Catholic world, you would be thinking along the Catholic world, Christ, you know the whole business of it. So you are conditioned by propaganda, by books, by priests, by all the circus that goes on, as you are conditioned in India, or Ceylon and so on. So what is the origin, the beginning of this conditioning? Why does man condition himself? For security, to avoid danger? Obviously. I believe in Christ, because I have been brought up in the Christian world, that's my conditioning, and this life is a miserable life, unhappy life, but I believe in Christ which gives me a certain sense of comfort, strength, to face this appalling thing, the world, so it gives me great comfort. That's all. It gives me security in an insecure world, psychologically the Father is looking after me. And the Hindus, the Buddhists, the Muslims, they are all in the same category.

So the instinctual response of a human being is to feel secure, like a child, sir, obviously. No?

R: How does it come about, that sense of security, the feeling of security, what is the origin of that?

K: The mother and the child, the baby, they must have a little security, the baby must have security, physical security, it must have food at the right times, at the right hour, and all the rest of it.

B: Does the baby have a feeling of security at the same time?

K: Probably, I don't know, not being a baby, but I am sure it feels safe.

B: It feels safe.

K: Safe, looked after, quiet, the moment it cries the mother is there, to change the diapers, to feed it and all the rest of it. What's wrong with that? From that physical security we turn to psychological security, which Christ gives me. It may be nonsense, unreasonable and all kinds of things, but I like that, at least I have comfort in some illusion. But I don't call it illusion. If you call it illusion I will kick you. So we go on that way. You have your security in something, I have my security and another has his security in Islam, and so on. So each one of us clings to our own particular form of security, whether it is reasonable, sane, rational, that doesn't matter.

B: It seems to me that it is similar to the pleasure question, that is you register the feeling of pleasure and then try to build it up.

K: I can't say, well I'll let go of Christ, I say, my god, I can't.

B: It is the same with pleasure, you can't give up pleasure.

K: Of course, of course, the same problem.

S: I think it is harder with pleasure because people nowadays do seem as if they give up or change their religions without too much difficulty, but we are much against giving up our pleasure when it really comes to it.

K: Ah, well that's a different matter altogether. Physical pleasure...

S: Or pleasures of the mind.

K: Of course.

R: But where are we going?

K: Where are we going - I haven't finished yet. We haven't discussed the central issue, what is action without this enormous complex of motives, reactions, regrets, pain, sorrow. Can a human live in action without all this dreadful confusion? That's all. And you say, yes, you can live. And you tell me, if you are a Christian, believe in god, believe in Christ, he will save you from all this. And I am so unhappy I say, for god's sake, and I cling to it. And if you are X you say, I believe in all the things the Buddha said, that to me is good enough. I will take comfort in that. So my actions are based on reward and punishment. Right? Right, sir? If I do this I will reach Nirvana, if I don't I'll go to hell, which is the Christian idea and all the rest of it. One has thrown all that overboard, being fairly intelligent and educated one says, that is all nonsense. I want to find out if there is an action without any shadow of effort and regret. You understand sir? It is important to find out, not theoretically or casually, it is a burning question for me, a passionate thing I must find out because I don't want to enter into the cage, the rat race. So what shall we do? What is right action under all circumstances, which doesn't depend on circumstances - my wife says, do this, I love you but you must do this, or something else. I put away all those influences or pressures, but I want to find out if there is an action which is complete in itself.

So I must understand is there an action which is total, which is complete, total, whole, not partial. Which means can I observe myself wholly, not in fragments? Or through the fragment instantly see the whole? So is there an action which is whole? I say, yes, there is, definitely. Don't you ask me, what is that?

R: I wanted to ask but I was waiting for the reply.

K: Ask it!

R: I want to ask, what is that?

K: First of all, can you see with your eyes the tree as a whole? Can you see your wife, or your husband, or girl friend, or boy friend, as a whole entity? Do you understand my question? Can you see anything totally, or are you always seeing partially?

R: When you use the word 'totally' what is the meaning?

K: Whole. Don't go to something else. Can I see you as a whole being? You understand? Can I see humanity as myself, which is the whole? That's good enough. Can I see humanity as myself? Because humanity is like me, suffering, miserable, confused, agony, terrified, insecure, sorrow-ridden, like another. Right? So in seeing man, humanity, I see myself.

R: Or rather the other way: by seeing yourself you see humanity.

K: Which is me. It doesn't matter whether you say, I see myself as humanity, then humanity is me. I am not separate from humanity, I don't say, I am an elite, I am this; I am like the rest of the gang. So I see the world as myself, which is the whole. That's simple sir - not simple, it is - would that be right sir?

B: I was wondering if, as you said, we could consider the tree for a moment.

K: The tree is too petty.

B: It is not clear when you say you see the tree as a whole...

K: The whole thing, to see something wholly, sir.

B: Just see it all, right.

S: I think we are in a slight language difficulty because we have no other possibilities. This, "I see as a whole", really it means that the self, or the fallacy of the self, has clearly been seen into and has broken down, because otherwise however much I see the tree as a whole it is still my thought.

K: That is the ultimate thing. But can you see your husband, your wife, or your girl friend, as a whole being? Totally, you know. You can, can't you? How does that happen when you can see somebody wholly?

S: Tremendous - but not mine - warmth.

K: No,no.

S: Warmth comes in.

K: If you love that tree you will see it wholly.

S: But we have also to be careful what we mean by love.

K: Keep it very simple, don't intellectualize it for the moment - we'll do it later. If I love somebody, love not possessive, acquisitive, all the rest of that nonsense, if I love the whole thing is there, the totality of that man or woman is there. So can I see myself wholly - myself being humanity? I am not different from humanity. I am not an individual. That's all phoney. I am the rest of the world, I am the world. Can I see that as a whole? I am not a communist sir, because the communists say that too, but I am not that - stupid communists.

R: Why do you want to deny communism?

K: No, no.

R: What is wrong if you are a communist?

K: No, you have misunderstood. Communists are full of theories and putting those theories into practice and shaping man according to a theory. I am not talking about that, leave that for the moment.

To look at myself, I can only see myself as a whole when I am actually the rest of mankind.

B: You mean in essence, you mean that essentially I am the same as the whole.

K: Essentially, basically.

B: The basic qualities.

K: I may have a long nose, or short nose, and crooked eyes, or blue eyes, I am not talking about that.

S: A basic human being.

K: As a human being. Then there is no individual effort, nor collective effort. Right? When one sees oneself as a whole the parts disappear. But we think by collecting the parts we make the whole. So when I see myself as a whole then the parts disappear, therefore the self is not. Sir, when I see that thing, that tree, completely, I can only see it completely if I don't condemn, if I don't say, "It's my tree, it's my garden." Right? You understand what I am saying?

R: Yes, yes.

K: So when I love that tree I see it as a whole.

B: Would you say then that it is similar to all trees? Like saying, if I see myself as a whole I am the same as all mankind.

K: So all trees I love.

B: Is that the same?

K: Of course.

B: It doesn't depend on that single tree. It is not just this tree that you love.

K: It isn't that elm that I love.

B: That is right here in this place.

K: The trees I love, whether they are in your garden, or my garden, or somewhere else.

B: Wherever it is.

K: On the field.

B: So it doesn't matter, the particulars.

K: That's it.

S: And it doesn't matter which side it is because they are the same. I love the tree and see it whole because I love it, that doesn't matter, the one and the other is the same.

K: I raised the question of seeing wholly because what is action which is not fragmented, not broken up as a business man, as the artist, as a lecturer, as a professor, as a priest, an action which is total. Don't say, if the self is not then you will have it. But I have a self, one is caught in the self; or rather the self is there.

B: But you are saying, see the self whole and then it will change.

K: What?

B: You are suggesting, see the self whole and it will not be there.

K: Yes, sir.

B: Therefore would you also say that you have to love the self?

K: That is a dangerous statement. I was going to make it and I stopped myself in time because that is what advertising people say, love the world as yourself, love your hair, use this shampoo.

B: Could you say instead you are mankind, you love mankind?

K: Ah, now, be careful.

B: Because the analogy seems to be limited.

K: Analogies are limited.

S: So are the words in themselves.

K: Any more questions, sir? We will stop unless you have any more questions.

R: There is no end to these questions, therefore let us finish today like that. But you have answered all my questions, and thank you very much for all your very enlightening explanations. And also I must thank Mr. Narayan for arranging this.

K: And all these people.

R: Of course they are all one.

K: No, no.

R: When I thank you or Narayan, or somebody else.

K: No, we have to thank all the people here, you don't thank me and therefore thank everybody else.

S: We all thank each other.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 26TH AUGUST 1978

I see all my old friends are here!

If I may ask most politely and respectfully, please don't make this into a festive occasion. It is not a Pop festival, but rather we are a serious group, not inclined to frivolity, but a rather earnest, serious group of people who will want, or desire, to enquire into the whole complex problem of living. And if one may point out again, there is no speaker here, though he is sitting on the platform, but actually the speaker doesn't exist because then you will be merely listening to the speaker and not actually investigating for yourself. So please, if I may again suggest most earnestly that there is no speaker but we are together investigating, exploring, enquiring into something, which is life with all its complex and varied problems. So we are sharing this thing together. The speaker is not here. And I want to make that quite clear. But rather together we are taking a journey into ourselves and demanding the excellence of ourselves.

We are never challenged psychologically; we may be challenged outwardly, we may demand outwardly better material, better workmanship, better schools, better politics: the challenge is for the better outwardly, always. But apparently very few of us enquire and challenge ourselves with the highest form of both intellectual, ethical, moral action, psychologically. And if we may, we are going to go into this question together, that we are challenging ourselves deeply, demanding the highest form of intellectual and - I would not like to use the word 'emotional' because that tends to become sentimental, but rather the highest form of affection, the highest form of love. And why is it that human beings who have lived for millenia upon millenia are living the way we are doing now - confused, unhappy, miserable, uncertain, and outwardly in the world, as one observes, things are getting worse and worse and worse. The more you produce, the more we are using the things of the earth, we are destroying the earth. And inwardly, spiritually, if I may use that word, we have lost all sense of religious excellence. I am using the word 'religious' in the sense of not belief, not dogma, not rituals, not the varied form of hierarchical, theological assertions, but the religious person is one who has no self at all. That seems to me the highest form of religious action, where the 'me', the ego, the self, doesn't exist at all. And that is the highest form of intelligence and excellence ethically and in action.

So we are going, if I may, into these problems. So you are not listening to a speaker but rather listening to yourself and challenging yourself, not accepting anything but the highest form of clarity, the highest form of behaviour, and so excellence in action. That is what we are going to go together into. So please you are listening to yourself, you are listening not according to your particular like and dislike, including those, but actually listening to what is going on and demanding why we live as we do now in this appalling, frightening, destructive way that we are living. Right?

I think that is the most serious question we have to ask of ourselves. When outwardly everything is disintegrating, there is no question about it - terrorism, which is the ultimate form of war, there are the terrorists, divided nations, all that is going on in the world, four hundred billion dollars a year spent on armaments - the world all over. So we are all crazy people. And to allow all this each one of us must find out for oneself what is the right action with regard to all these external events, what is one to do, which must be correct, accurate, true. And that can only be found out for ourselves if we are challenging our actions, our way of life, which is jobs, occupation, relationship with each other, and the utter lack of clarity in thought, the sloppiness of our thinking. And to live a totally different kind of life, not merely based on pleasure, on fear and so on. So we are going together to find, if we can, all the answers to these questions for ourselves. If that is clear between you and the speaker, and the speaker is not here, if it is very clear with what we are concerned with then we have established a certain kind of relationship with each other. If we are all concerned with the same thing, not with our particular opinions and judgements, with our intellectual theories, but rather be concerned together seriously, at least for today and for the few days when you are here, concerned to find out a way of life that may bring a different world into being - right?

So that is our question. If we are going to enquire together obviously the first step is to put aside all our personal prejudices, our personal desires, our petty problems of the moment, and so have the capacity to enquire freely and deeply. Capacity doesn't come through constant practice, psychologically we are talking about. It comes when there is direct interest and the challenge to which you must respond with all your highest capacity, then you have the capacity to enquire freely. Otherwise you will be merely playing with words. The words are important because they convey a certain meaning, but if words drive us, if words force us into certain conclusions, certain actions, then language, words control us, shape us, force us. That again is very clear, isn't it? Either language uses us, or we use language. But most of us are driven by language, use the word 'Communist' and you have all kinds of fearful ideas, not that the Communists are not fearful. And if you say "I am British", immediately certain reactions arise. So words, language drive us, shape us, shape our thinking, our behaviour, our action. In realizing that, the slavery to language, but if we know how to use language, the exact meaning of words, the content and the significance of the depth of the word, then we are using language unemotionally, unsentimentally, not identified with a particular word, then we can communicate with each other directly and very simply. If I stick to the word 'Hindu' or an 'Indian', and that word shapes my thinking, my prejudices, all that nonsense, then the word 'Indian' or 'Hindu' forces me to act in a certain way. But whereas if I am free of that word 'Hindu' with all its national, limited, superstitious significance, then I am free to understand the human being who is behind the word. Right? Are we meeting each other?

So here we are using language and the language is not using us - we are using the language unemotionally, language which is pliable, correct according to the dictionary, so we can both of us communicate with each other very simply and directly when we use the word unemotionally, the word which hasn't got tremendous psychological content behind it. Can we do this? For most of us it is extraordinarily difficult because we have identified ourselves with the word and the word is us - I am a British, I am Hindu. Can we strip ourselves of this network of language which is driving us, shaping us, and unemotionally use words that are simple, direct and therefore a word that doesn't bring about psychological reaction? Right? Can we do this first of all? If we can, then we can enquire together because we are free of the word which drives us, but we are using the word directly. I hope this is clear. Am I making the thing clear? At least I hope so.

Then knowing the meaning of words unemotionally, without any reaction to the word, then we can enquire into this whole problem of our way of living, why we live this way, why every day of our life is conflict, violent, selfish, narrow, limited, anxious, fearful, uncertain, a muddle in which we live. So we are challenging ourselves to find out why we live this way. Why we are mechanical in our relationship, in our ways of thinking, why we tolerate any form of violence, both in ourselves and externally, why though man has lived for thousands and thousands and thousands of years he lives in sorrow, without any love, frightened, miserable, utterly unintelligent.

So we are going to begin to enquire together, using words unemotionally without any reaction, to find out why we have become so intellectually, ethically mechanical. Right? We are just stating facts, not conclusions. It is not a conclusion to say we are mechanical, we are, we are caught in a routine whether in the office, or when you come home from your labours, exactly the same repetitive process goes on, sexually, ethically, in our daily action. Some of us realize it and try to escape from them by becoming revolutionaries, physical revolutionaries, or ideological revolutionaries. Physical revolution doesn't bring about anything, that is obvious, in spite of the terrorists. psychologically, inwardly, inside the skin as it were, why have you become mechanical? I mean by that word 'mechanical', action based on pleasure, action based on fear, action based on authority, action according to a certain pattern of thinking, action along evasion, avoiding, running away and never facing the fact as we are. These are not conclusions, these are obvious daily facts. And again please, you are listening to yourself, although the speaker may put it into words, though the speaker is not here, you are listening to yourself and finding out, challenging yourselves why we live this mechanical existence. You may leave one set of ideologies, Christian or Communist and join another set of ideologies, you may give up being a Catholic and become a Protestant or a Hindu, or if you are rather advanced you will go off and do Zen Buddhism, or if you are still more advanced you go off into Krishnamurti stuff! (Laughter).

You understand how we are never demanding for ourselves what is the right thing to do, always depending on somebody, guru, this person or that person. So what is the right action in a world that is crumbling, that is becoming daily more frightening, where there are so many divisions of beliefs, dogmas, nationalities and so on and so on, religions and every form of division. What is the right action for each one of us in our daily life with our occupations and so on, what is the right action, what is the correct way of living? If you challenge yourselves, and I hope you are doing it now, what are you to do?

So we have to enquire: What is action? Right? What do we mean by that word 'action', whether you are married, whether you are not married, whether you are in the office, whether you are fairly well off and independent and so on and so on, what is the correct thing to do in my life, facing all this, not according to any pattern, obviously, that is not correct action? Not based on certain ideologies, that also is not correct action because those ideologies are projected by thought, clever, cunning thought. And action based according to certain authority, whether religious, political or your own particular authority based on your own experience and knowledge, that is neither correct action. Please understand all this because if you base your action on your own experience then your experience is very limited, and you are constantly demanding greater and greater experiences, which is greater and greater sensation, not experience. The word 'experience' means to go through, finish with something. And action based on a past conclusion, however right, however worthy, that is still from the past and therefore still limited in terms of time. Or if your action is based on a future conclusion, on a future ideology or a future ideal, that again is not correct action because you have projected the ideal, what you should be, what your country should be, or what your group should be, and act according to what should be, therefore you are not acting at all. Action implies doing something now, independent of the past and the future.

This is really quite fascinating and tremendously interesting, if I may use these words, which are not the correct words but it doesn't matter for the moment, to find out for oneself: is there an action totally devoid of time? You understand? Time being the past with all my memories, knowledge, experience, stored up in the brain as memory and acting according to that memory, which is the past acting in the present, or the past, which has had so many experiences, so many failures, so many anxieties, fears, sorrows, projects something in the future as ideological, what should be, how happy it would be and act according to that, which again is non action - right? At least let's meet together intellectually, then if you understand that intellectually then you can go still deeper into it, at least we can understand each other at that level, which is very limited.

Then: is there an action in daily life, in our daily relationship with each other, intimate or not intimate, sexual or not sexual, is there an action which will be holistic, whole, which is not dependent on time, on environment, on circumstances? So we are challenging: is there such an action? Or we only know action based on the past, or on the future? We don't know any other action and we accept such action, it is much more convenient, more comfortable, easy to accept such action. So we are challenging each other to find out if it is possible to live a life of correct action, which is not dependent on environment, on circumstances, on the past, or on the future. You understand? This is the most difficult thing to find out. When you want to find out such an action, if there is such an action, thought immediately begins to operate, thought says "Is there such a thing?" "I must enquire." So thought is the past - isn't it? Thought is the outcome of memory, thought is the result of your experience, accumulated knowledge and from that arises memory and then from the reaction of that memory is thinking. That is simple, very simple if you go into it. It is not complicated. So when there is such a challenge as saying: is there action which is not dependent on the past or the future, on environment, circumstances, then thought begins to operate - right? That is what you are doing. Then thought says, "I must find out such action." Since thought cannot find such action, you say that it is impossible. You are following all this? We are all together in this, or am I talking to myself? I can do that in my room.

So action based on thought is limited because thought in itself is a broken up thing, a fragment, limited because it is based on knowledge and knowledge however much you may accumulate, however much you may accumulate facts, expanding knowledge over and over, expanding constantly, it is still limited. That is obvious again. Perhaps not to the people who advocate the ascent of man through knowledge, because that is their particular form of conclusion. But when one sees actually, in daily life, how knowledge is so extraordinarily limited, you may have technological knowledge and you must have, and to that knowledge more can be added, it can be constantly expanded, but is there the accumulation of psychological knowledge from which action takes place? All right?

One has accumulated knowledge, psychologically. I have been hurt many years ago as a boy, or a girl, I have been hurt. And that hurt has become my knowledge, it is there inside my skin. And I act according to that knowledge, which is I resist, I isolate myself in order not to be hurt more. And so there is constant division between me and another to prevent being further hurt. This is a common fact again. So I act according to that knowledge. I may see the irrationality of it. I may go to psychologists. I may do all kinds of things about it but the wound is still there and that wound is responding all the time. So I am acting according to a past incident, whether that past incident is pleasurable or painful is irrelevant but it is the past event, which is my knowledge. I have had a lovely afternoon - that becomes my knowledge. I am going to have a marvellous day tomorrow - and again, you follow, this whole process is based on the accumulated process of experience, desire and pleasure.

So is there an action which is totally independent of all this? You understand my question? To enquire into that, the operation of thought must be understood because you can't stop thinking. If you force, as many people do through meditation, which is not meditation, try to control thought, shape thought, then they have divided themselves into the thinker who is superior and thought inferior, and so the superior tries to control the inferior - you know all this. So is there an action which is totally divorced from all this? We are challenging you - I am challenging you and you are challenging me, together we are in a state of being challenged.

Perhaps if you have challenged sufficiently deeply and earnestly and with all your being then you will find an answer, which is, I will tell you but we are discussing this together, we are sharing this together therefore I am not telling you and you are not accepting it, then it becomes futile, then we might just as well go to some guru. But whereas if you can discover this for yourself then you are free - you understand? You have understood action in all its full meaning and its depth and the beauty of action. We say - the speaker says there is such an action devoid completely from the past or the future, from environment, from circumstances. It is to have an insight into the total movement of thought as it expresses itself in the environment, circumstances, past and future, which is to have insight into action. That is, insight is not the response of memory - right? Hasn't it ever happened to you, suddenly you say "I have understood it"? - without words, without gestures, without circumstances, without the past, you suddenly feel that you have got it. And that is irrevocable, it is ultimate truth, you can't say, "Well I have got it but the next day I have lost it".

So we are going to find out together the meaning of this word 'insight'. To have an insight into something is not personal, it is not based on some ideological conclusions, memories, remembrances. One must be free of that to have an instant insight into something. One must be free of knowledge to have immediate perception. This is not something extravagant, exotic, or rather emotional but actual: where if you have ever had this kind of immediate understanding and therefore immediate action, that immediate understanding demands immediate action irrelevant of time. Hasn't it happened? It happens obviously but then thought says, "I have that insight, I have had that strange deep perception and therefore from that immediate action, but I wish it could continue all the time". You understand? I want that insight, that immediate perception, immediate understanding, to continue. When you say it must continue you have already begun the whole movement of thought. I wonder if you see this? Insight, the quick perception of something is instantaneous and finished there. You can't carry it over. Whereas thought demands that it should be carried over, and therefore prevents the next insight. I wonder if you get all this?

Have we understood something of this because it is very important, because from this we can go into something further where quick insight is demanded so that you never have to struggle, never have to have conflict. Because when you are acting upon insight it is an irrevocable truth. It is not intuition. We are using the word carefully. People have intuitions, which is, they desire, project and you know all that ugly stuff. Insight, quick perception and action is not personal therefore it is whole, it is holistic. And our actions are never whole. We do something, regret, "I wish I hadn't done that", or we have done something which gives us pleasure and we want more of that action. So whereas insight is something which is quite simple, but to have such an insight into things one must have a quick mind, not a dull mind, not a mind that is frightened, or a mind where thought says "If I do that what will happen? I might regret it, or there might be failure, it might bring about hurt to others and to myself" - and so action is never total, complete, whole. Whereas action which is born out of insight, immediate perception has no regrets because it is actual, it is the only action.

Now bearing that in mind, perhaps even intellectually, do you have a quick perception of what is the whole nature and structure of authority? Authority of books, authority of professors, authority of scientists, authority of the religious priests, and so on and so on. Or your own experience, which has become your authority. To have an immediate insight into this then you are free totally of all authority. Then you don't have to fight and struggle to say "I accept this authority, I don't accept that. The authority of my guru is marvellous but I reject the authority of the priest". They are exactly the same thing.

So in discussing, in being challenged and challenging each other, are you free of authority? There is the authority of the policeman, the authority of the law, the authority of the surgeon - that perhaps has its right place - but is there psychological authority of a belief, of a dogma, of a conclusion, of an ideology, the Communist, Socialist or whatever authority, religious, inwardly? If you have then you will never find out what is right action - obviously. Right?

So enquiring step by step into this are you actually, if I may most respectfully ask, free of authority, including the authority of this person sitting on the platform at this moment? If you are not, find out why you accept authority inwardly. Objectively you need authority - right? You can't drive on the right hand side in England, you would have accidents. If you reject authority of some State laws you will be punished and so on and so on - there authority has its right place. But inwardly, deeply, not to have any form of authority.

Then we can proceed to enquire into why human beings live constantly in a state of fear - right? Shall we go into it? Why you as a human being, who is the representative of all humanity - right? - I wonder if you realize that. That you as a human being represent the entire human mind because you suffer, you are uncertain, you are caught in certain beliefs, or you are conditioned, you are British, you are French, you are German, or this or that, and you believe in this Jesus or Christ or somebody else doesn't believe in that, and you are a Hindu, a Muslim, you follow? So are you aware that in your relationship, in your daily activity, there is a sense of great fear - right? Is one aware of it? If one is - now look: if you have fear the natural - I won't call it natural - the irrational response is to cultivate courage, whatever that may mean. Or to run away from it.

Or rationalize it - why shouldn't I be afraid, it is natural and so on and so on. Or you identify your fear and yourself, yourself and fear are one, there is not you separate from fear, so that fear which is you identifies itself with something greater and says in that surrender to the greater I have lost fear. We have played all these kind of games for centuries. And we still have fear, at the end of a million years every human being right through the world has some kind of fear. Now to have a quick insight into this and therefore to be totally free from it. Is that possible? Because fear is the most dreadful thing, you know all the rest of it, the result of fear - neuroticism of every kind, escape into various forms of entertainment, religious and otherwise, rationalizing fears and accepting fears as part of our daily existence.

Now we are asking: is it possible to have an insight into the whole nature and structure of fear and be free of it? Don't you want to know if you can be free of fear? Or do you accept, as we accept so many things, it as part of life? If you don't accept it as part of life then what is the nature of fear? What is the root of fear? What is the substance, the structure, the whole movement of fear? Not only fear of one's wife or husband, girl - you know, fear in its entirety, not one particular form of fear. Don't you want to find out? In the sense, don't you want to give your mind, your heart, your being, your whole energy to find out whether it is possible totally to eradicate fear? Fear has many forms, one of the major factors of fear is attachment - attachment to a person, attachment to an ideal, to a belief, attachment to a piece of furniture - you know what attachment is. And where there is attachment there is inevitably the fear of losing. And is it possible to exist without isolating, without attachment? You understand my question? Is it possible for a human being who has lived ten thousand years and more, lived always in fear as part of his life from the caveman until now, is it possible to uncondition himself from fear? As we said, one of the factors of fear is attachment, to find out if one is attached, not avoid it, but find out to see if one is attached to something, to your guru, to your knowledge, to your furniture, to your friend, to your wife, girl, boy or whatever it is, attached to your country. Where there is attachment there is jealousy, there is possessiveness, there is a sense of identifying oneself with something else. And when there is that attachment and identification there is always uncertainty. These are facts, aren't they? No?

So can you be free of attachment? - not tomorrow or when you are on the deathbed, then of course it is very simple to be detached!. (Laughter) You can't argue with death. But now living your daily life, to be free of every form of attachment without becoming isolated, which again breeds fear. I may detach myself from this and from everything else and suddenly feel I am lonely, a sense of emptiness, and being frightened of that emptiness begin again being attached, not to a person, but to some marvellous ideal. All that in every form of attachment brings fear. A man or a woman who really enquires and demands, challenges himself whether you can ever be free of fear, then we have a quick insight into the whole nature of attachment. Have you, as we are talking, exploring with each other, have you got this feeling, this insight, this immediate perception of the whole nature of attachment and its structure with all the complications involved in it, see it instantly?

And when you see it in all its totality it is finished. It doesn't mean you become callous. It doesn't mean you become isolated. On the contrary: you are a free human being who is no longer held down by fear. Right? That is only one expression of fear. Perhaps the deepest expression of fear, of losing what you have. Actually you have nothing but that is irrelevant.

So what is the root of all this fear? You see most of us are inclined to trim the branches of fear - right? I am afraid of this thing therefore let me get rid of it, or let me go to somebody who will help me to be free of fear, of that particular expression of fear - the psychologist, the priest, the analyst, the latest gurus and all that business. But we are not concerned with the trimming of the tree of fear but rather to uncover the root of fear so that when you see the root of it and have a depth of understanding of the root then if you have certain understanding it is an insight then fear disappears completely, you are no longer afraid psychologically. Physically it is a different matter. Physically one must be careful, one must be rational, sane, unless you are extraordinarily neurotic then that is a different matter. But physically one must be watchful of danger, as you would be watchful of a precipice, as you would be watchful of a dangerous animal and perhaps human beings are becoming more and more dangerous than any animal. So one has to be watchful of human beings, the terrorists, the politicians - are there any politicians here? (Laughter) And very watchful of gurus and so on and so on.

So one understands the watchfulness, the danger physically. But what is the root of psychological fear? Please challenge, ask yourself. Don't accept my challenge. Ask yourself what is the root of all this? Don't say "I don't know" and just leave it like that. Or draw some conclusion. If you do, it will prevent you from finding out the root of it. If you say, "I really don't know what the root of fear is", then you start with humility. Then you say, "I really don't know but I am going to find out". But if you start with arrogance and saying "I can solve it. I know, I have all the facts about fear", then you are starting with a conclusion, with a sense of hope, which doesn't mean you must be in despair to ask it, but if you are really deeply concerned with the nature and the structure of fear at its very depth, what is the root of fear? Those of you who have read or heard the speaker before, don't say "Yes, I know it". That is a cheap trick. Because you have heard somebody tell you that, and that may be the truth but it is not yours, it is not the truth, it is somebody else's. There is no your truth or my truth, but if you accept a statement made by somebody like this person and say "Yes, I have heard that before but it hasn't got rid of my fear", then language is driving you - you understand? Language is driving you. Language is using you. But if you are free of what you have heard before, but actually demand now as you are sitting there, to find out what is the essence, the root, the basis of all fear, then as you don't know you come to it afresh, you come to it with a certain sense of curiosity to find out. But if you come to it already with some conclusion there is no possibility of your understanding the root of it.

So let's find out together, afresh, what is the root of this whole nature and the structure of fear. When you want to find out, if you have a motive, that is, "I must be free of fear" - which is a motive, then that motive gives a direction to your enquiry. So the motive which gives a direction prevents you from enquiring. This is simple isn't it? If I have a motive in order to enquire into fear because I want to get rid of fear, I have already given a direction to it - right? Because my desire is to get rid of it, not to understand the nature and the structure and the depth of fear. We won't get rid of the word 'fear'. So the word 'fear' is driving us. You understand? Whereas if you look at it, if you are free of the word and say, "What is this fear which I have lived with for so long?" What is it? Is it time? - time being yesterday, today and tomorrow, the sun setting, the sun rising. Which is, is fear the result of time? Something happened which you are fearful of a year ago or yesterday and that fear of that incident remains, and that memory of that thing is called fear. You are following all this? The memory of that incident which took place a year ago or yesterday has left a certain remembrance and that remembrance says there is fear - right? So recollection of a word called fear will say, that is fear. Whereas we are trying to find out, being free of the word, what is the essence of it. Are you following all this? Is this getting too tiresome all this?

What is the root of it? I say to myself because I am a very serious person, and I have got plenty of energy, I must find it out, I don't want to live with fear. It is too absurd, too illogical, irrational. What is the essence of it? Is it time? It is partly that, time. And also is thought creating fear? You understand?

So time, thought - I have understood more or less the nature of time, time externally, time inwardly, psychologically: I will be, I am not, I will be, or I should be, whereas I am not. The 'should be' is the movement of time - right? I don't know if you are following all this?

It is a nice morning and I hope you are enjoying this too. I hope you are having a pleasant happy time in this enquiry, as you would have a pleasant time sitting on the lawn and looking at the trees and the clouds and the warm sunshine.

So what is thought then? I have understood the nature of time. Now I want to understand if thought is responsible for fear. I don't know but I am going to find out. If thought is responsible I must understand the whole nature of thought. What is thinking? Thinking is the response of memory - right? Obviously. If you have no memory at all you wouldn't think. But thinking has become very important for us. We apply thinking to everything we do. Is love a remembrance, a thought? I am not talking of sexual love, sensation, the sensuous love, I won't even call that love, it is sensation. Is love sensation? Is love a remembrance? And is thought love? You understand? I am asking all this. And what is the nature of thought? Very simply it is based on the accumulation of knowledge gathered through experience of millenia, living, which is stored up in the brain - I am not a brain specialist, you can watch for yourself - in the brain and the memory responds to a challenge.

Now I am challenging myself: what is thinking? And so it says, 'Memory, of course'. So is memory responsible for fear? I have been hurt physically last year, I remember that and I am afraid it might come back again, the disease, or the pain, or whatever it is. That is, thought based on an experience of last year's or yesterday's pain, remembering it and being frightened of it. That mustn't happen again. All our action, all our existence, is based on thought.

I don't know if you have ever realized this extraordinary fact: everything that we do is based on thought. There is no spontaneity, that is quite a different existence, to be spontaneous. To have that spontaneity one must understand the nature of thought which has conditioned our brain, our whole mental outlook, our activity. When there is an understanding, immediate insight into this then there is spontaneity, there is freedom. But that is quite a different matter.

So we are asking: time, I see is partly responsible. Thought is also responsible. Is time thought? Or thought is time? You understand? They are not time and thought separate. There is only thought which creates psychological time - right? And therefore having gone into the depths of it, understood it, not intellectually, verbally but actually see for oneself the nature of thinking, then one realizes thought is basically responsible for fear. Then one says, "How then can I stop thinking?" - which is the most absurd question. You see that is part of the trick of what the gurus have brought. Which is: meditate, try to control thought, stop thought. Have you ever tried to stop thinking? If you have you will find out that the person who says "I must stop thinking" - the entity that says that is also part of thought. He is playing a trick upon itself.

So if you see time is thought, time is movement, movement from yesterday, today, tomorrow. And also thought is movement, movement based on a past memory, past experiences, past knowledge - knowledge is always the past. So thought is basically responsible for fear. You understand? Now is the word 'fear', fear? You understand? Is the word 'fear', actual fear? Or the word is not that thing. Are you all getting too tired? You understand my question? Is the word different from the thing? Or is the word creating that thing, fear? Then the word is driving you and the word is creating the fear. Or is there fear independent of the word? Which is, the word is not the thing? Right? You understand? So have you separated the word from the thing? The tent, the marquee, the word is not that - right? So when you look at it, can you separate the word from the thing? You understand my question? So have you separated the word from the reaction, which you call fear? Which means, are you aware that you are caught in the network of words? And therefore the words are driving you. So can you look at the thing without the word? Which means look at that thing without naming it, which becomes the word. I wonder if you understand all this? Look, this requires great alertness, great awareness, of observation. It isn't just saying, "Yes, I can separate the word, this and that" - play around. But actually see that you are caught and that your observation is through a word, and therefore the word becomes all important. In realizing that you say, "All right, I will separate the word, put it away, let me look at the thing itself" - not with the word interfering with it, the word with its connotations, its content. "Let me look at that thing". Do you understand? I am expending a lot of energy, I hope you are too.

So, can you look at fear, the word, the actual sensation without the word? Or the word is creating the sensation? The name, fear, is creating that. You understand? You can look at the marquee, the word and the fact, the tent, differently, you can separate it and say, "Yes, I can look at it without the word. I can see the lines, I can see the posts, without the word". But to do that psychologically one has to be extraordinarily alert. To be so deeply aware of the meaning, the word and the thing. Now if you are, then the thing you are looking at without the word, is it fear? You understand what I am trying to say? The reaction which you have named as fear, if you don't name it, is there fear? You have come to that after investigating, understanding time and thought. Thought is time because both are movement. Time is movement. Thought is movement. So they are not two separate things. Thought creates psychological time.

So thought has created the word. The original man or the ape or the primate says "I am afraid" - fear has gone right down to us - you follow? And now we are asking: separate the two, the word and the sensation, the reaction and look at it, observe the reaction without the word. Now when you observe the reaction, is the observer different from the reaction? You understand? Or they are both the same, the observer is the observed, the reaction is the observer? Right?

I see you don't see, some of you. You have been angry, is that anger different from you? You are only aware of that anger - at the moment of anger you are not, but a second or a minute after you say, "I have been angry". You have separated yourself from that thing called anger and so there is a division. Similarly, is the reaction which you call fear different from you? Obviously it is not. So you and that reaction are the same. When you realize that, you don't fight it, you are that. Right? I wonder if you see it. Then a totally different action takes place, which is, before you have used positive action with regard to fear, say, "I must not be afraid, I will deny it, I'll control it, I must do this and that about it, go to a psychologist" - you know, all the rest of it. Now when you realize, when there is the fact - not realize - when there is the fact that you are the reaction, there is no you separate from that reaction. Then you can't do anything, can you? I wonder if you realize you can't do anything. Therefore a negation, a negative, a non-positive observation is the ending of fear - right?

What time is it?

Audience: One o'clock.

Forgive me for talking an hour and a half, I didn't realize it. I hope you aren't bored, you aren't stiff sitting in the same position.

Audience: Don't be afraid. We enjoyed it.

K: Good. We will meet tomorrow again.

Audience: Thank you. (Clapping)

K: Please don't clap. It isn't worth it.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 27TH AUGUST 1978

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday morning? Before we go into that may I point out that one should have quite a bit of scepticism, doubt, not accepting what the speaker is saying but questioning, investigating, enquiring into what he is saying or what we are thinking ourselves, if there is any truth, if there is any falsehood or if what is being said is factual, which is, applicable to daily life. So if one merely accepts words, as most of us do, we are collectors of words and phrases, and thereby we miss a great deal. So what we are talking about is that self knowledge, that is knowing oneself, is the greatest importance, not according to some psychologist, analyst or according to the speaker but knowing oneself actually as one is. Not denying or accepting what is but observing, looking into oneself very, very deeply. And whether what you find in yourself, not according to somebody else, but actually for yourself what you see and what you perceive in your actions, in your reactions and so on, to be aware of that, to know oneself. Knowing oneself implies, doesn't it, not having known and recognizing 'what is'. That is, to discover oneself anew each time, not according to a remembrance of something that you have seen before in yourself and recognize it, and keep on recognizing all the time. I hope I am making this clear.

That is, I want to know myself because if I don't know myself there is no possibility of right action, right behaviour, or I have no foundation for any clarity. One can deceive so immensely, live in a kind of illusory world, a make-belief world, but to know oneself so completely frees the mind from all its entanglements, from all its worries, its everlasting chattering and so on.

In that enquiry we were saying yesterday, we are driven by language. Language uses us rather than we use language. We went into that fairly thoroughly yesterday. And also we said that the speaker not being here, you yourself are speaking to yourself and listening to yourself to find out what exactly is going on within yourself, within the skin, within the psychological area of yourself. We know very well what is happening around us, at least if you are fairly well informed, but very few of us know exactly where we are, what our reactions are and if it is possible to go beyond them.

And also we were saying yesterday that the basic root of fear in which most of us live, is time. Chronological time as yesterday, today and tomorrow, and also the whole movement of thought. Those are the two factors which bring about fear. And the other factor in that is remembrance. The remembrance of a past fear and holding on to that remembrance and projecting a future fear. We were talking about that yesterday.

So if we may we would like to go into further factors of ourselves. Most of us, psychologically, live in disorder. I do not know if you are not aware of it. We are driven by, not only language, but also by a great many pressures from outside, economic, social, political, national, the religious beliefs and so on. But psychologically the greatest pressure is desire with most of us. As we said yesterday, please we are communicating with each other. You are not merely listening to the person who is talking, who is not at all important. What is said is important, not the person. It is like if you have a telephone you don't give great importance to the telephone, you keep it clean but what is said through the telephone is all important. Similarly the person who is speaking here is not at all important. I would like to point this out over and over again: the person is not important at all. But what is said is important. So your admiration for a person, or your dislike of the person, or this, that, all that nonsense is of very little importance. You don't, if you have a good telephone you don't smash it, you keep it clean, you respect it. But the telephone itself is of no value at all, but what is said through the telephone becomes significant. Similarly here the person is not important. Have you understood that clearly and definitely?

We are saying we live in disorder, psychologically, we may have an orderly room, do proper exercises, do so-called yoga - I won't go into that word, what it means, how it began and all the rest of it, it is not the moment. But we keep order outwardly, apparently, but there is disorder, astonishing disorder in the world. Perhaps that disorder is brought about by each one's psychological disorder. Disorder means contradiction in oneself, thinking one thing, doing another, saying one thing and do the opposite to what you have said, or being uncertain, not clear, contradictory, and so on. All that indicates disorder. And also where there is contradiction there must be effort, where there is division there must be conflict and so on. All that is a state of disorder in which we live, that is an obvious fact.

And to bring about order psychologically what is one to do? I hope you are challenging yourself and not accepting my challenge. Knowing consciously where one is in disorder psychologically, what is one to do? How is one to bring about order? Because without order psychologically as well as outwardly one must live in chaos - as the world is becoming more and more chaotic, destructive, violent, which shows a great deal of disorder in the world. And perhaps that disorder is projected by each one of us because we live in disorder.

So we are asking: how is one to have complete, total order in oneself, is that possible? Where there is order there is tremendous energy. Where there is disorder there is the dissipating of energy, wastage of energy. So we are going to enquire together - I am not enquiring to myself but together we are enquiring, exploring into this question: what is order and can there be order without understanding disorder? So we are enquiring together to find out this actual state, the fact that we live in disorder - is that a fact, not a verbal description of the disorder? The word is not the thing. The description of the disorder is not actual disorder. The description of a mountain however beautifully it is painted, the beauty of the valley, the light, the snow, the lines against the sky, the whole sense of dignity, beauty of that mountain can be described most beautifully but the description is not the actual fact. For most of us description is sufficient. So we are caught in the description, not with the actual fact. So then we are asking: what is disorder? - is that an idea of what you think should be order and in comparison with what you think should be order there is disorder, which again is total disorder. I hope you are following all this. So we are going to find out what is disorder, and having an insight, a quick perception of the whole structure of disorder, then out of that comes order. That order is not according to a pattern, according to a blueprint, according to some saying, or some philosopher, or some religious quack. And most religious priests and hierarchy and all the rest of it are super quacks, even the new pope.

So are we aware first that we live in disorder? Not the definition of that word but the actual fact of contradiction, of division, me and mine and you and yours, we and they and all that division that goes on within ourselves, the constant conflict. All that indicates disorder. And how do you observe that disorder? Say for example, as we took yesterday, attachment in any form is a factor of disorder, and also a factor, as we pointed out yesterday, as we discovered yesterday, a part of fear. So attachment to a person, to an idea, to a conclusion, to a past memory, to a piece of furniture and so on and so on, does breed disorder. Do we see that fact?

And the freedom from attachment, without becoming isolated, callous, indifferent, does that bring about certain order? Because what we are talking about is, that when we have put everything in order then there is a great deal of energy, tremendous energy. And one needs that energy to go most profoundly into oneself. So we are asking, discovering for ourselves, first the disorder in which we live and the nature of that disorder which is part of attachment, fear, and pleasure and so on, and without directing it in any particular direction, hoping that will bring order, but just to be aware of this disorder without any movement away from it. Are we meeting each other? Is the speaker making the thing clear? That is, may I go into it? All right.

Suppose I live in disorder, inwardly, I may have marvellous order outwardly but inwardly perhaps I am in great disorder. And I ask myself, what am I to do? Is that disorder different from me? Or I am that disorder? You understand this question? Please, this is really important to understand because if the disorder is different from me then I can do something about it, then I can change the pattern, move from one corner to another corner, or bring psychological order by suppressing, by control, by this and by that. I can do something about it. But if the disorder is not different from me, which is a fact that the disorder is me, the disorder is me, then the problem arises what happens then? You are following all this? You are not listening to me, you are listening to yourself. Then perhaps you will bring about a change. But if you merely listen to the speaker, you can listen to him for the rest of your life, and I hope you won't, and if you merely listen to him you won't change. But if you yourself see that you live in disorder and that disorder is not different from you, fundamentally, basically you are that disorder, then what takes place? Before you could do something about it because you had separated yourself from it and you operated on it, and therefore in that there was constant conflict, betrayal, one day you could do it, the next day you couldn't do it and so on and so on, fluctuating from day to day. Whereas the fact is you are that disorder. That is a fact, not a conclusion which the speaker has come to and is trying to impose it on you, it is not. We are not doing propaganda of any kind, trying to convince you of anything. But when the disorder is me I can't do anything about it, which means I can't operate on it as I used to before. So I remain in this total disorder. Are you doing this as we are talking? Or is it just a verbal accumulation? I am not different from that disorder. That disorder exists because I have divided myself from what I have called disorder. That is one of the major factors of disorder. I have discovered that. Wherever there is a separation between me and psychologically what I observe, that division is one of the major factors of disorder. That is, when I call myself a Hindu, or myself a Muslim, a Christian, Catholic or a British or a French, or German, or whatever it is, the division is a factor of disorder - the Jew and the Arab, you have got an obvious example, everyday that is happening. So psychologically when there is division between disorder and myself, I am encouraging and cultivating disorder. Whereas the fact is the disorder is myself and therefore the realization, the truth of that brings order. Are you following this? You are all very silent. It's up to you.

Q: I am waiting for it to happen.

K: The gentleman says he is waiting for it to happen. I'm afraid you will have to wait a long time! (Laughter) It is a fact, it can't happen to you. You, yourself, see what is going on, therefore the actual fact, the truth of the matter frees the mind from disorder. The cause of this disorder is the separation as me and different from disorder - you understand?

So similarly can we bring order in our life? That is, to learn the art of putting everything in its right place. That is order. But you cannot put things in their right place unless the man who puts the thing in the right place is also very orderly - you understand? Naturally. So we are trying to find out what is order, and what is disorder. Disorder can be dissolved only when the division between me and the other ceases to be, psychologically. And one has to learn the art of putting things in their proper place. Money, which most of us, if we have lots of it, cling to, if you have little of it you want more of it, and so on and so on. Money has become tremendously important in the world. And also sex has become tremendously important - I am not going to talk about it, it is important. You know how important it is in your life. And when you give something such great importance that very fact that you are giving a particular thing great importance is disorder - right? If I give tremendous importance to exercise, so-called yoga, then I am putting that totally out of proportion. So putting everything in its proper place implies giving everything its right value - right? Can we do that? Do we want to do that? Or is it all much too difficult? Or you say, "Please, we have lived for so many years in this mess, let me go on. Don't interfere with this mess". And so you accept the mess and you are accustomed to it, you become comfortable with this mess, and you don't want to alter it. But a man who is seriously concerned not only with the world outside of us but also inwardly, to give money, sex, everything its proper place is to learn the beauty of freedom. Without that there is no freedom.

So then the next problem is: we live under great pressure, more and more. Pressure - institutional pressures, political pressures, economic pressures, social pressures, and so on and so on and so on. And we said perhaps the greatest pressure in most of us is the desire that we want to act, the pressure of tremendous desire - right? Are we following all this? May I go on?

I hope you are watching all this in yourself. Because you can listen to these words for the next ten years, fifteen, twenty years but at the end of that you say, "I am where I was". Because you don't apply, you don't say, "I am going to find out". You merely live at the level of words.

The next thing is: why is there such a tremendous pressure of desire in most of us? The pressure of sex, the pressure of desire for sex, desire for experience, desire to be popular, famous, desire to - you know, all the rest of it, what the activities of desire are. Desire for enlightenment, which is the most stupid desire! For enlightenment doesn't come through desire. You may go to all the highest peaks in the Himalayas but you will never find illumination there. It is where you are, not in India, or in Japan, or in some other place - or even Rome. (Laughter) Sorry to talk about Rome because I have heard this morning about the Pope being elected!

So if one is aware of oneself, one sees how desire is so extraordinarily strong - desire for power, to dominate people, you know all this, I don't have to go into details. You know it all very, very well. And we live under this pressure. And so not only physiologically one becomes ill, the strain of it, but also psychologically it is a great travail, it is a great problem. I desire, say for example, to be the most marvellous person, and it is a constant strain to become somebody, to be somebody, to achieve a result. So one can see desire, without being understood, the whole nature and the structure of desire, is one of the factors of disorder - right? Please do we see that? Please don't accept what I am saying, that is totally unimportant. Is that in yourself a fact which you have discovered for yourself, seeing desire in all its multiple forms and multiple expressions does breed confusion, does breed disorder - right? And most people have said control desire, suppress desire, or fulfil desire, go the extreme of desire - they have done all these tricks. Talk to any monk and they will tell you that you must suppress any desire, carnal desire, or any form of desire in order to serve god - whoever god is. And so there is always this suppression, control, constant conflict - you desire something, you suppress it, you rationalize it, you control it, you run away from it and so on. So what we are trying to do, what we are saying is: let's find out the nature of desire, how it arises, and whether we can give desire its proper place, and not in any way suppress it, control it, destroy it - right? We are going to go into that.

So one must find out the whole nature and the structure of desire. Find out for oneself, not be told what is the nature and the structure of desire. Then if you accept it you will come back next year and for the next thirty years and say, "Well, that is exactly where I am, I began and you have left me where I was after thirty years". Because one has lived on words, not actually gone into it for yourself. Why has desire become so extraordinarily important? It is encouraged through education, in every form, society, all things around us encourage this process of desire. I want to find out why desire has become important in oneself and what is desire? So I must first understand the nature of sensation - right? Sensory perception, senses. I must understand the way of the senses. May we go on?

The senses being touch, smell, taste and so on. And we never function with all the senses in operation. I wonder if you understand this? No? Taste becomes so extraordinarily important, if you are a gourmet, if you like good food, wine and all the rest of it, taste becomes extraordinarily important. Or if you are sensitive, music. Music becomes important, hearing a lovely sound and the space between sounds, and the quality of sound. Or something. So our senses are broken up, fragmented, we never see anything with all our senses completely. Right? Are we understanding each other? Can you look at something, the movement of the sea, the way of the clouds, the wind among the trees, to look at it all with all your senses fully flowering and looking. Can you do that? Then when you do that you will see as a test - you are not accepting what I am saying - test it for yourself - then you will see there is no centre from which you are observing. There is no division caused by the centre who says, "I am different from that". When you observe things totally, a woman or a man or a child, or your girl friend, husband, wife, with all the senses awakened then there is no one particular sense demanding an action. You are following all this? Are you doing it as we are talking about it? So senses have their right place, but they become destructive, divisive and conflicting when one particular sense is developed and the others are dormant or semi-dormant. Whereas when you observe something entirely with all your senses then there is no division in yourself.

So desire is part of these sensations, is the beginning of sensation - right? That is a fact, isn't it? See a beautiful woman or a man or a child, or a car, or a mountain, or a lovely proportioned house, or a garden, and perception, sensation and the desire arises - right? And the desire, that sensation, perception, sensation creates the image and then desire begins to operate. That is the whole movement of desire. This is a simple, obvious daily fact which you can observe if you are paying attention.

So where does the conflict, the trouble, the confusion begin, in the movement of desire? Right? You are following? Say, for example, I see a beautiful tree, or a lovely garden. I have got a piece of land and I'd like to have such a beautiful garden myself.

That is, there is perception, sensation, the image-making which is thought - right? - and then thought pursues that which it has observed, which it has pleased. So wherever there is the movement of thought with regard to sensation then desire brings conflict. Are you understanding this? Is this clear? No, I see it is not. I will have to repeat it differently.

There is perception of a beautiful house, well proportioned and all the rest of it. Then there is sensation. That is normal, that is essential, otherwise I am blind, my senses are not acute, aware. But the trouble begins the moment thought creates the image of owning a house like that and working for it, identifying oneself with that house and so on. So where thought begins to interfere with the perception then there is division, then desire begins. You follow this? Is this clear? No, not what I am saying, for yourself. Are you also working as hard as we are working? It is hot in here. Are you working as hard? I hope so. It doesn't matter. It is up to you.

So the question is: it is natural to have the perception, sensation, that is natural, but can that moment stop and not thought come, and create an image and pursue that image which becomes desire? You understand my question? That is, perception, sensation is normal, healthy, but when thought comes in, creates the image then the image is pursued as desire, then the trouble begins. Haven't you noticed it in yourself? You can see a beautiful car and there is sensation and the image of you driving in it, driving it, the power you have and all that. But whereas seeing the car, sensation and stop there, Can you do it? You try it and see what is involved in it. In that there is no control. You see the whole implication of desire, how it arises, how thought then creates the image and pursues it.

Whereas perception, sensation and looking at the car - or the mountain, the girl, or the boy, or whatever it is. Then there is no conflict, there is no suppression of desire, then you have the enormous energy that has been used up by the movement of thought as desire. Is this clear?

So the next point is - we are investigating into ourselves - why do we live so greatly on remembrances? You understand my question? Why do human beings live in the past, which is to remember? Right? You all look so puzzled. You had a pleasant day and you remember it, and it is stored up as a memory, and you delight in that memory, you live in that memory; or you live in a sexual memory, or the memory of some achievement that has been possible for you. So remembrance has become extraordinarily important for all of us - as experience, as knowledge. I am asking - we are asking, why? Do you understand? Not that we must not remember, of course you must remember how to drive a car, where your home is and so on and so on, the technological knowledge one has acquired, but psychologically why has remembrance such importance in our life? Right? You are asking this question yourself. So what is remembrance? What is the factor of remembrance? There was an incident that was pleasurable or painful, an event that brought a smile or a tear, and that is registered in the brain - right? Naturally, this is simple. And that registration becomes the memory, that registration is the remembrance of that delightful event, or that painful event. Now the question is: why should we register psychologically anything? You understand my question? I have put a question: why should the brain register an event which was painful or pleasurable? It may register things that are dangerous - right? Like a precipice, like a dangerous animal, or dangerous snake, or a dangerous person, a crook and so on, it may register. Those are all obvious daily facts. But why should the brain register the hurt, the flattery, the insult, the feeling that you are this and all the rest of it, why should there be registration psychologically at all? You have got the question, haven't you? Are we meeting each other?

Now we are asking: it is one of the factors of the brain to register, of necessity. I must register technological knowledge if I am working with machines and so on and so on. And also if I write or if I am a surgeon, a doctor and so on, it must be registered. But we are asking: why should one psychologically register anything at all? At least see the question first. Is it necessary? Does it bring a clarity? Does it bring greater energy, freedom and so on? Or psychological registration is one of the factors that destroys a real joy. I'll go into it presently.

We said the brain in its activity must register certain things, it is necessary. But we are asking: psychologically, inwardly why should the brain register? Is it a habit that we have fallen into, that when you insult me I register it immediately? When you flatter me, I register it immediately? Why? When you flatter me you are my friend, when you insult me you are not my friend and so on and so on. Now we are asking: can this registration stop psychologically? See what it means? Then that means regeneration of the brain. So the brain becomes extraordinarily alive, young and fresh because it is not registering that which is not necessary. I wonder if you follow all this? Now, is that possible? Intellectually one can see the beauty of it, verbally, say, "By Jove, it must be most extraordinary intellectually to have no psychological registration". It doesn't mean one is a vegetable, or empty, or all that, but there is a freedom, an extraordinary sense of elation, an extraordinary sense of youthfulness, the brain doesn't get old, worn out. So one must find out if it is possible. Because as we grow older the brain gets more and more mechanical, more and more fixed in a groove, in a track, and becomes hard, brittle, not pliable, quick. Now is this possible, not to register psychologically at all? You have got the question? Is the question clear? Yes?

Now, let's proceed to find out. Find out, it doesn't mean that I am going to tell you and then you discover it and say, "Yes, it is so". Then you will come back thirty years later and say. "I am still where I started."

We said the brain needs security, safety to function efficiently. It must register certain facts, how to drive a car, write letters and so on and so on, technology and so on. Then the brain has realized that putting order, giving order to register only things that are necessary, which is to bring order - right? Then we can proceed to find out why the brain or the psyche, psychologically registers. Does it bring safety, avoid danger? Does it prevent further hurts, further destruction, further obstructions? Or we have cultivated unconsciously the habit of registering. We have registered there, so why not here? From there we have moved to here, psychologically, outwardly it is necessary but psychologically, from there we have moved to here. And is that necessary at all? A very simple example: from childhood we are hurt psychologically, by parents, by other children, by the school, college, university, if you are lucky and so on and so on - we are hurt, we are wounded psychologically. And that wound is registered. And having been hurt then it registers isolation, fear and all the rest of it. Now is it necessary when you incite me to register at all? You understand my question? Is it possible to prevent registration? You understand my question? I hope so. It is possible only when you are insulting me, or flattering me, for all my senses to be awakened and listening. You understand this? Then there is no reception at all? Is this all Greek? (Laughter) I see the importance to have fresh, young, bright clear brain. That is utterly important. Is it possible to maintain that clarity, that precision, decision with that beauty of all that is implied until I die? It is not possible when there is registration of things that are not absolutely necessary. Right? So one has to find out why any form of psychological registration becomes memory, remembrance, and is it possible not to do it? One discovers if you go into it deeply it is possible. It is possible only when you are really attentive at the moment of insight, at the moment of flattery. Right? Have you tried this?

The other day a man said to me, "You are a damn fool, you are stuck in a rut" - it was rather impolite but there it is. (Laughter) So I went to my room and I said, "Is that a fact?" I want to find out, one may be stuck in a rut and one may be a damn fool. One investigates it and by watching very carefully you don't register, you listen to the word, you listen to the fact whether you are or not, whether you are stuck in a rut. Are you stuck in a rut? You understand? Are you? No, find out, don't answer me please. Somebody calls you what somebody called me, I hope more politely, and you want to find out if it is so. You neither deny nor accept but you must watch it, find out. If you are stuck in a rut, it is fairly obvious, you soon find out you are in a rut.

So registration does not take place when you are alert, awake, totally aware with all your senses open, there is nothing to be registered psychologically. Will you do it? No, you won't because pleasure has become immensely important for us - right? If you observe yourself very carefully you will see what a great part, perhaps the greatest part, pleasure plays in our life. The pleasure to find god, or illumination, the pleasure to be free, the pleasure to have money, possessions, lovely wife or husband and all that business, pleasure of sex, pleasure of power, the politicians with their pleasure of immense power. And so the registration of pleasure in most of our lives is tremendous - right? And the pursuit of pleasure has become a dominant factor: that is the remembrance of a past pleasure and the pursuit of that past pleasure as remembrance and desire behind it and searching out, asking, demanding, wanting. Our whole religious organizations are based on that. It is a vast entertainment, it gives great pleasure, which is great sensation, that you are in the presence of holy things and so on.

So we said, the registration of pleasure, of an event that gave you great delight, is registered and the pursuit of it in our life.

Now the question is: what is pleasure? When you are enjoying something at the moment you don't say, "How pleasurable it is, how lovely" - you are in it. Only a second later thought comes along and says, "What a lovely time that was, how beautiful it was, what a great sensation it gave me, what a lovely experience", so there is registration taking place, then thought is in operation. You are following all this?

We are talking about all this because it is part of knowing oneself, not from books, not from words, not from description, but actually knowing oneself. Knowing doesn't mean accumulating memory about oneself and from that accumulation observe. If you observe through accumulation you are only accumulating what you have already known. But whereas if you are observing afresh each time then it is like a vast river with a volume of water flowing, moving.

So what is pleasure? Is it time, is it thought as fear? We said the root of fear is time. The root of fear is thought. Thought which is remembered, remembrance remembers certain events that caused fear, registered, the remembrance of it and the next time this whole remembrance is projected. You are watching? So is pleasure time and the movement of thought? Or they are both the same, thought and time are essentially the same? So thought is the movement of pleasure, which doesn't mean that you can't look at a beautiful tree and enjoy it, a beautiful person, a painting or a lovely valley with all the purple shadows in it. Look at it but the moment it becomes registered and remembered it is no longer delight, it becomes a pleasure, which is the remembrance of things that have happened before. Now if you see the whole nature of this, completely, then pleasure has its place, delight and therefore psychologically, inwardly there is no registration of that event. The mind then, the brain then becomes extraordinarily alive, young, fresh without any neurotic reactions.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE

29TH AUGUST 1978

This is supposed to be a discussion, or a dialogue. A dialogue being a conversation between two people and as it is impossible to have a conversation with two people including so many, perhaps we could take a problem which may affect all of us and discuss it as though it were between two people. Or we could turn this into a question and answer meeting. So which would you like?

Discussion generally ends up in an argument, which would be rather futile, offering one opinion against another, one judgement against another and so on. But whereas a dialogue, a conversation between two people who are friends, who are concerned about a problem which is mutual and perhaps they can talk over their problems deeply, quietly, seriously and with a sense of humour. Or we could turn this into a question and answer meeting; there too again what kind of question one asks, who is asking, what is the purpose of asking and who is going to answer the question, and so on. All that is involved in all this. So which would you like, or think it proper, to either question, dialogue or discussion?

Questioner: Dialogue.

K: If it is to be a dialogue what shall we talk about, remembering a dialogue is between two people, a conversation amicable, easy, quiet and penetrating? So what shall we talk over together?

Q: I would like to ask a question, not necessarily a dialogue. You were saying yesterday that the chaos and the violence in the world is a result of our everyday life. But I don't think it is as easy as all that. If you take the spectrum, at one end of the spectrum you put Hitler and at the other end of the spectrum you put a person like Schweizer, then you have two people who are doing something quite different: one person is trying to help humanity and the other person is trying to destroy humanity. Now if you leave that aside for a moment: take any one person in this tent, give them the right environment, the right job, they are free of conflict, they are not hooked on religion or dope and they get cancer. Now the conventional religious view would say that it is an act of god, which is obviously crackers. But you could say that this person has a disposition towards a disease. Now it does appear to me that in the world today there are people who are definitely for the forces of good and those for the forces of destruction.

K: The gentleman asks why do you say the world is in chaos because we are in chaos, each one of us, uncertain, argumentative, greedy, selfish, violent, which perhaps may project in the world, bearing in mind that we are the world: we are not different from the world. And there are good people, the questioner says, and there are some bad people, bad guys and good guys, and would it be erroneous on your part to say that because we live in our own particular individual lives, rather violent, ugly and so on, that maybe quite inaccurate.

What other questions would you like to discuss, talk over?

Q: I would like to ask a question, if I may. I was churning over in my mind what you said yesterday about registering memories. And what concerned me was if you were to ask me a question, if I was to totally experience what you were saying to me that at the end of the question, if I had totally experienced it, that I wouldn't know that you had asked me a question in order to be able to answer it. And what I would like to ask you is: is it possible that we have two parts to our communication, which are the two hemispheres of the brain, one which only receives and which totally registers all the time, and the other part which transmits, which in fact we need not register because if we experience that we need not register it. It is possible - my mind has got a blank now. (Laughter) When we receive we are not able to blot out that memory, that it is there totally and that in fact it is our choice whether we use one side of the brain or the other and to what we use each side of the brain.

K: The questioner says there are two spheres in our brain, one that is receiving, registering, memorizing, and the other part, perhaps the other part which is more free, which is not conditioned and therefore there is this duality going on in us. And memory, remembrance of a particular of this sphere is necessary. That is his question.

Any other questions?

Q: Yes, would you please talk about the problem that arises when the intensity of one's feelings and emotions block one's awareness.

K: When one's emotions and sentiments and reactions, which are intense and strong, block a perception, what is one to do?

Q: I understand that meditation is a way of life all day, so you think there is no need to sit down in lotus position at certain times. That is one thing. And the other thing is when we return from here and we are all alone in a crowd where do we find the strength to keep on?

K: Yes. Is it necessary to sit in a certain posture, lotus posture introduced from India and the East, is it necessary to sit that way to meditate? And is it necessary to set aside a certain part of the day to have daydreams! (Laughter) I know, I am only joking. And how is one to have, when one leaves here to have the strength to face all one's solitude, loneliness, all the travail of life. That is the question.

Q: Do you see any relation between the awareness and faith?

K: What is the relationship between awareness and faith? Yes sir?

Q: I would very much like to ask a question connected with the first question. This is that one can see fairly clearly that one's own psychological pain, the pain of the world as a whole is caused by us, a projection. But it seems that there is pain in the universe as a whole which is not caused by human beings. The sort of thing I refer to is the genetic imperfection of children being born with frightful diseases which one cannot put to human beings. In other words a slightly imperfect universe causes this pain. This is quite a problem.

K: If I understood the question rightly, may I put it in my own words to see that we understand each other? That there is not only individual suffering, each person suffers in a different way, but also there seems to be a universal suffering, a global suffering - children are born deformed, mentally retarded and so on and so on.

Now just a minute please - which of these questions do you want to discuss? Which is, first the question the gentleman asked: you may be in error when you say that because we live in chaos and uncertainty and violence and so we create a world that is chaotic, violent and so on. That may be a wrong question. Are you exact in saying that? I have reduced it to a small thing sir. And the other question is: do we have to sit in meditation in a particular posture, lotus as it is called in India and it is brought over into this country. And the other is, your question, emotions and sentiments, which are intense come in the way of observation, clarity and awareness. And the other question is: what is the relationship between awareness and faith? And that question that gentleman put, which is: there is not only human, particular human suffering but there is global, universal suffering. Now which of these questions...?

Q: What about loneliness?

K: Nobody asked about loneliness, I introduced it.

Q: The question about registration, the two sides of the brain.

K: Oh, yes, I beg your pardon - quite right.

Q: There is one more question.

K: Wait a minute sir. That gentleman asked that perhaps two spheres in the brain, one that registers, remembers, accumulates knowledge, experience, cultivates memory and so on, the other part may be unconditioned. What is the relationship between the two? That is right sir? Now no more questions.

Q: One more question. What is the source of urgency, energy to go into all these questions?

K: What is the source, the drive, the push, the pressure, why should one be interested in all these things?

Q: What is the beginning of memory and is there a point in time when the mind sees the age of a problem?

K: What is the beginning of memory and what is?

Q: Is there a point in time when the mind sees the age of a problem, like fear being older than jealousy?

K: I don't quite understand.

Q: I can see fear is older than jealousy. There are times when I can see the age of a problem. It is a rather serious question about reincarnation.

K: Ah, you want to discuss reincarnation. Now which of these questions would you like to talk over together?

Q: Global suffering.

K: You decide. (Laughter)

Q: Emotions.

Q: The use of energy.

Q: Reincarnation.

Q: Krishnaji, could you deal with them all in some way by answering one question?

K: The questioner asks: could you include all these questions in one question, in one statement. Perhaps we could.

Q: You said we could forget the past and...

K: I never said we could forget the past sir.

Q: Forget the past, you said it the day before yesterday.

K: No, I did not.

Q: When you have got suffering you have forgotten it, in your finger - and the past is difficult to forget. I want to know how we can forget the past.

K: Forgive me for contradicting you sir, but I did not say forget the past. You can't forget the past. We will go into all this by taking one question, which perhaps will include all others. now which shall it be? Just think it out sir. Look we have had several problems put to us and the gentleman suggests that we should perhaps by investigating one question, one statement, you could perhaps include all the others. I think that it could be done. But which shall we take which will include all the others?

Q: Emotions.

K: Just take a second sir. Take just a second. Let's find out.

Which question would include all the others?

Q: Where do all these questions come from?

K: What is the source of all these questions?

Q: The source is the energy which asks the question.

K: Is that what you are interested in, the source of the energy that asks all these questions?

Q: No.

Q: Could you answer the question: what is insight, by what process does it come about?

K: Look there are so many.

Q: The registration in the mind.

Q: You decide, or we are never going to start.

K: You are quite right. (Laughter) Could we take up the relationship between awareness, faith and emotions, meditation and what is the need of a brain that it should register at all, not the two but the necessity of registering at all. Could we by taking one question, I think we could do it, I suggest this, I am not saying it must be that way, I suggest that we discuss what is the relationship, which would include all these. What is the relationship between awareness, faith, meditation, the registration, the global suffering of man, in which is included the suffering of each one of us - right?

Q: And the registration.

K: And registration - I said that.

Now, shall we begin by talking about registration and relate that to awareness and to the intensity of our emotions and so on? Right? So we will begin if we may, if - please correct me, I am not the Delphic Oracle - if you think we should discuss something else we are willing but let us begin by asking: what is the need of a human mind, brain to register anything at all? First of all, are we aware, know, cognizant of this registering process going on? You understand? I am just beginning with that. Do you, as a human being, know, or aware that you are registering? You understand my question? Or you have accepted the statement and then you proceed to question the statement? Are you aware that you are registering certain things? An unhappy incident of yesterday is registered. Are you aware of this registering process going on? Or you are merely accepting a statement by somebody else? You see the difference? If I accept a statement that you have made and question about that statement, which is one thing, whereas if I am aware that I am registering, then my question has a different quality to it - right? So which is it we are doing now? Are we aware that we are registering? Are you aware now, sitting there that you are registering what is being said, which means that you are actually listening to what is being said. Right? Are you? Or are you still concerned about why the need for registration? You see the difference?

Can we proceed this way, slowly?

Q: Sir, one is aware that one holds on to what is being said.

K: Yes, that is it. One is aware that one holds to what is being said? Now why does one hold on to what is being said? When the speaker says there is no speaker, you are listening to yourself, you are investigating yourself, why do you hold on to a statement made by this person? - which means you are not actually listening to yourself.

Q: Sir, because you want to act on it.

K: No, no. You see the difference sir? If you are told you are hungry, that is one thing; but if you are really hungry that is another. Obviously, right? So which is it? Are you really hungry? Or you are told you are hungry? Which means, are you aware that you are registering, holding on to a statement, to a phrase, to a conclusion, to an idea and so on, which is registration going on? Right sir? Now why do you want to register what is being said? Because the speaker must have either a reputation, or you think he knows something more than you do, or you are expecting him to solve your problems, so you are depending on another. The other says, "Please, don't depend on anybody, including the speaker." You follow?

So, let us be clear in this matter. Are you aware of the whole momentum, the movement of registration, when you can see a tape recorder registering - right? Are you similarly aware that you are recording? Or you have been told that you are recording. See the difference. If you are told that you are recording that is one thing, it has no value, it is just like a tape, you can wipe it out and a new tape can be put in; whereas if you discover for yourself that you are registering and ask the question: "Why am I registering, what is the necessity of any kind of registration?" Then we can proceed, then we can communicate with each other. But if you are saying that you said that yesterday about registration, I am awfully interested in this idea, let's talk about it. Then it remains merely at the verbal level, it has no meaning. At least for me, it has no meaning whatsoever. Whereas if you say, "I want to find this out, why I register" - can we go along that way?

Why do you register, if you are aware of it? Obviously you register when something is dangerous - right? A precipice, a snake, a dangerous animal, or a dangerous man, or a motor coming hurtling towards you, it is danger. You immediately register it, in order to protect. And also you register when there is pleasure. So this process is going on all the time. The registration of everything that is dangerous - right? And everything that gives one a great pleasure. One can say the registration began with the first man - the cave man, however they lived. You can see there they had to register danger otherwise they would be destroyed. So let's find out what is dangerous for us to register, and then we can go on to the other. What are the most dangerous things in life that should be registered? Not depending on individual opinions. I wonder if I am making myself clear? Because to me one thing may be most dangerous, and to you, you say that is too silly. So it must be a common factor for a human being, whose necessity is to register danger and therefore avoid - right? Danger means avoiding, not going near it, not touching it, not be involved in it - right sir? So what is most dangerous for you, us human beings?

Q: What disturbs the mind.

K: No, no. What is most dangerous? Not what disturbs your mind You are going off into some - please begin at the lowest level.

Q: That is what disturbs me, that is most dangerous for me.

K: You see what I was trying to void. What is most dangerous for me - I said maybe not so dangerous for another. So don't look, if I may suggest, don't take yourself and say this is my particular danger. See the danger of what is dangerous for man.

Q: Survival.

K: Yes, which is non-survival? Not to survive. Sorry I am putting it wrongly. The demand is to survive. Anything that destroys that survival is dangerous - right? For all human beings, not for me or for you, for all of us.

Q: Why?

K: Why? Why should we survive?

Q: May I restate the question? What is more important than survival?

K: Wait sir, we will come to that slowly. Come to it sir. Survival, and the lady said why should we survive. It is a serious question. Why should we survive? What is the need for survival and this urgency, the demand to exist, to survive, to live? Come on sirs, answer it.

Q: Instinct.

K: Instinct. That is not it. The birds have the instinct to survive, the animals, the reptiles, the most elemental - you know everything demands survival.

Q: Pleasure in life.

Q: Fear of death.

K: Fear?

Q: Because we think it is important.

K: I don't see why you even asked that question: what is the necessity of survival. Here you are! If you hadn't demanded to survive you wouldn't be here and I wouldn't be here, none of us would be here. The parents would produce us, they wouldn't exist either. So the world wouldn't exist. So anything that is dangerous to survival we must register - right? Physically a car coming towards us we jump out of the way - right? So there must be some kind of registration to protect the organism - right? To have a roof, to have clothes, to have food, that's apparently natural in every living thing. And so we avoid anything that is dangerous - right?

Let's go into it a little more. Is belief dangerous to physical survival?

Q: Yes.

K: So you have no belief?

Q: A particular belief.

K: I understand sir, I understand. I believe in something, or in some idea, in some goal, and so on, a belief, so I am asking each one of us, I am asking: is belief a danger to physical survival?

Q: No.

Q: It may be.

Q: In Northern Ireland.

K: In Northern Ireland.

Q: Don't let's go into politics right now please.

K: I know.

Q: A misguided conscience can be...

K: No, no please. I am taking belief, don't begin too many things at once. Take one factor, go after it step by step into it. Is belief a danger to survival? I believe in Catholicism and you are a Protestant, I am a Catholic, we believe in different things. Look what is happening in Northern Ireland, what is happening in the Middle East and so on and so on. For physical survival, apparently belief is a most dangerous thing.

Q: Sir, could I ask you do we not need belief in technical matters?

K: In technical matters, why do you even there have belief? You work, you learn and you go on.

No, just please go into it for yourself, don't question me, find out if you have belief, any form of belief and doesn't that belief divide people? Belief can be a conclusion, a concept, an opinion, strongly held opinion.

Q: Prejudice.

K: All that, included. We can put a lot of these words together but let's find out if each one of us has a certain belief, that I am a Christian, that I am an Englishman, a Frenchman, or - you know, all the rest of it. Isn't that a tremendous danger for physical survival?

Q: Yes.

K: You say yes, sir but are you free of it?

Q: No sir. (Laughter)

Q: Belief in the good in every one of these beliefs.

K: So I know. We teach in the school every one of these things. So history may be rewritten differently.

Q: Surely belief...

K: You are not really interested to find out for yourself. For God's sake, do listen.

Are you really serious to find out the necessity of registration and the inadequacy psychologically of any form of registration? We are discussing that. If you say belief is a danger then why do you hold on to it, saying I am a Hindu, you are a Muslim or a Jew, or a Communist - why do you hold on to these words?

Q: Perhaps because one doesn't see it completely.

K: So, the gentleman suggests you don't see this completely. The danger, you don't see completely the danger of any form of belief, which is obviously non-fact. Why do you hold on to that?

Q: All belief is a support structure.

K: Yes, belief is a support. If it is a dangerous support why don't you drop it.

Q: I have dropped some.

K: Ah! (Laughter)

Q: But not all of them, when I see all of them only then will I drop them.

K: It is like all of us sir, we want to keep some which are pleasurable, pleasant, comfortable and the others we discard.

Q: I suggest, if I may, that it is not the sensations, the physical sensations of a dangerous experience that we register but that it is the reasoning that we attribute to it at the time that we register in our minds.

K: That is right sir. Let's go step by step into it sir.

We have talked about physical survival and anything that is dangerous to that must be totally avoided if you want to survive. And belief, any division between people is most destructive - right? If you are a Christian, I am a Buddhist, and I fight for my Buddhism and you fight for something else, there is no physical security. Every war has shown this - right? Every war is the result of our particular conditioning, of our particular beliefs, etc. etc. So will you drop all those beliefs because that is the most dangerous thing for survival?

Q: Are you saying that anybody who believes in anything, from the people you mentioned yesterday, the politicians, priests, gurus, is not being honest with themselves, and that only Krishnamurti can put forth the truth? That only the truth is available from you and we must not believe anything from any other person?

K: I couldn't hear the whole of it sir, somebody who has understood it please repeat it.

Q: It is not the belief that is the threat to survival, it is the belief in the belief that is the trap to survival, it is an attitude of mind. The feelings that the belief is something true for all time.

K: Sir, drugs are dangerous for survival, drink is dangerous, smoking and all that business - do we drop all those things because they are dangerous?

Q: When we see a cigarette...

K: Sir, that is just it. So really we are discussing intellectually, verbally this idea of survival. We really don't care if we survive or not. We just exist.

So let's proceed from there. Psychologically why do you register?

Q: Fear.

K: No, just look sir. Look. I can answer these questions very quickly, but do please enquire. It is a conversation between us two - us two is all of us, you and I, a conversation, in which we are saying: why do I, or you, register psychologically anything?

Q: We can't help it. It just happens.

K: It may be our conditioning. It may be our education. It may be our social condition and economic and so on and so on. So we are conditioned to accept this psychological registration. Now we are saying, all right, that is a fact. Now why?

Q: Does one actually register in fact?

K: Yes, one actually registers, that is a fact. But I am asking why? Do find out. Ask yourself sir, not me ask you, ask yourself: I register my hurts, my pleasures, what you said to me, what you didn't, do, this, that, ten different things. Why do I register psychologically?

Q: Biological registration has gone into psychological registration.

K: There is biological registration which we said is necessary and psychological registration. We said why do we register psychologically at all?

Q: For security. To feel secure.

K: Is that so? Or you are isolating yourself which gives you the illusion that you are secure?

Q: Because we have no choice.

Q: Because we think we can solve things by thought.

K: You say we have no choice - why?

Q: Human nature.

K: No. The gentleman said we have no choice. What do you mean by the word 'choice'? Is danger a choice? And why do you choose?

Q: Conditioning.

K: No, no, don't just throw out.

Q: Can we say biologically, let's say I like smoking or whatever - right? This is dangerous but it is pleasurable so thought has a choice.

K: Yes. Sir we are trying to find out the meaning of that word

'choice', the depth of that word. I choose between two pieces of material for trousers or a coat. Wait, wait. Choose. And I choose to go to that place and not to that place. I choose this guru and not that guru. I choose to believe in this and not in that. I am questioning, asking you, if you will kindly listen to find out, why do you choose, what is the source of your choice?

Q: Inattention.

Q: It is a question of pleasure again.

K: No, no. When do you choose? Don't you choose when you are uncertain? A man who is very clear, very clear, there is no choice. It is so.

Q: When you don't know.

K: Sir, that means what? That is right, when you don't know. Do you think you will find...

Q: One thing you choose on a certainty, and the other on a non-certainty.

K: Yes, that is the same thing. When one is very clear you don't choose, when you know exactly what route to take to a certain place there is no choice. It is only when you are uncertain you begin to choose, or ask, question, find out. So I am asking psychologically choice exists only when you are confused, uncertain - no? When you are very clear there is no need for choice. So a mind that is confused chooses. You are all silent at that statement.

Q: Could we talk about why the mind chooses?

K: Wait sir. I want to see - please look at it sir. We are discussing, trying to talk over together why the brain registers. The brain biologically we said, organically must register.

Psychologically, inside, we are asking, why do we register at all? Somebody said because we have no choice in the matter. And the word 'choice' implies choosing between this and that. Now when you see danger you don't choose - right? You see danger and move. You don't say, "Well, shall I go to the right or to the left, is it right, wrong" - (Laughter)

So similarly I am asking: psychologically what is the need for registration? Does it help us to protect ourselves?

Q: Yes. When you set out in life we are concerned with the survival of the body but soon the mind takes over.

K: That is what we are saying. Physical survival has skipped into psychological survival - right? I say, why?

Q: It exercises a sense of identity.

K: Identity with whom?

Q: Because we don't really know what is right?

K: So you want to find out what is right? How do you find out what is right when your mind is uncertain, and confused? No you are going off, you don't stick to one thing at a time. Please forgive me. Psychologically why do I register?

Q: Because we want to register.

Q: Because I am not whole.

K: No, sir. Look into yourself, you will find out.

Q: In order to build up experience.

K: In order to build up experience, which is knowledge, which then becomes memory. And without memory, without knowledge you are nobody. So we say "By Jove, I must have some knowledge about..." - right? - otherwise I am nobody. Is that what you are saying? You are not thinking about all this.

Q: One wants to protect oneself.

K: One wants to protect oneself. Biologically, organically, you have. We have learnt how to do that very well. In spite of wars, in spite of terrorists, except the victims. Now we are saying psychologically do you protect yourself? What is it you are protecting?

Q: I think it is...

K: Please answer me. What is it you are protecting?

Q: All this memory.

Q: Your idea of yourself.

Q: Our minds become so cluttered up with what is in our minds that it becomes greater than our experience of our bodies. So our minds become up there and we are more aware of our minds than our bodies. And we think that it is our minds that we should protect.

K: So you give more attention to your body and less attention to your brain.

Q: No, the other way round.

K: Yes, get more and more muddled. (Laughter) You see sir, we psychologically register in order to be something - right? Psychologically - right? I register where I was born, that is simple. The brain registers because it has been trained to accept certain strata of society, and that gives the person psychologically a position, a sense of power, a sense of superiority. So this registration psychologically gradually builds up the ego, the 'me' - right? Don't accept what I am saying, please look at yourself. If you didn't register psychologically would have an ego?

Q: No.

K: Obviously not. Psychologically you are aggressive, abrasive, violent, it gives you a certain sense of - you know, authority, a certain sense of assurance. So this gradual process of registration psychologically builds the sense of the 'me'. That is a fact, no? Me, my opinion, my judgement, my wife, my husband, my girl, your girl, boy, my house, my quality, my experience, my hurts, my fears, my - I am all that, psychologically. Right? It is a fact. You don't have to agree with the speaker, it is so.

Then I say to myself, why do I build this ego, why is there this constant building of the me?

Q: To protect it.

K: What are you protecting?

Q: I am just trying to hold on to it, more and more.

K: Yes, sir. After building it up you hold on to it, cling to it, you say, "I daren't break it down."

Q: It is like a sand castle.

K: Sand. Don't go off into similes. Stick to one thing. So I say, what is the need for it, because that brings enormous trouble, enormous pain? I am hurt, I am frightened, I am anxious, I am jealous, I am greedy, I must not, I must be - you know - this battle is going on constantly, emotionally getting stronger and stronger, more intense. And what am I building? What is the reality of this structure? You understand? The reality, in the sense this is real, the microphone in front of me is real. Actually I can touch it. Can I touch the psychological structure of the 'me'? I can't. So it is merely a building up of words. This is rather difficult to accept. One builds in relationship the hurts, the flattery, the comfort and so gradually out of that I depend on you. And you hurt me by doing something so I cling to you not to be hurt. And so on and so on. Now, why do we do this?

Q: We are protecting the part of us that does not know.

K: No. We don't know what will happen if there is no building up the 'me'. Right? I will find out. I will find out if I say, "All right, I will find out, there must be a process where the building up is not" - right? Then I will find out what happens. But to speculate what might happen before is such a waste of time and energy.

Q: That's what makes the fear do it.

K: So: first you build it up, society helps, religions help, everything helps to sustain the structure, and then you are afraid to lose it - right? And then you proceed to meditate how to get rid of this self - no? So before we say how to get rid of the self, let us find out why you build it.

Q: The need for power.

K: Yes, all right, it leads to power, put it any way you like. But the fact is this constant assertion, this constant building up of the 'me', psychologically, is it not a great danger? A great danger in your relationship with your wife, with your girl, with society, with anything. Is it not a great danger - because the danger is that you are in constant struggle, constant battle.

Q: It is difficult for you to adapt.

K: No sir, find out why you are - are you aware that you are building the 'me' up? And from that structure you have strong emotions, you want to express, you want to assert.

Q: Is it the need for pleasure?

K: Yes, all right, for pleasure and also it's fear, and also it is greed, and also it is constantly in pain, being hurt - you know. So don't take one thing and say it is that, it is the whole thing.

Q: Is not the 'me' a myth - is there not a myth that we believe in that if we don't survive psychologically we shan't survive.

K: It may be a myth sir but can't you throw away that myth?

Q: Have we been conditioned to this myth?

K: Yes, if you are conditioned to this myth, can't you uncondition yourself, can't the mind say, "It is nonsense"? See we don't want to do that and we talk round it all the time. If I am aggressive it gives me pleasure, it gives the structure of aggressiveness, it makes me violent, rude, vulgar and I like it. All right, keep it! Don't talk about meditation, etc. etc. etc. If that is a fact find out why you register these things, why you hold on, and whether it cannot be totally dissipated. If you say it cannot, that is the end of it. All right you cannot. If somebody says, "Find out if it can or not" - then you say you are an illusion, you are an ass, you don't know anything about it.

So whereas I am suggesting psychologically there is no need for registration, if you see the danger, real danger, as you see a precipice, real danger of this psychological build up of the 'me', then you find out how to be free of it. Not you, you are part of that. There will be no toleration of the 'me', with all the opinions, judgements, evaluations, aggressiveness, fear, pleasure, you know, the whole bundle of it.

Q: What about the registrations that have already taken place from childhood before you are able to reason in this way?

K: What about the registration that has taken place from childhood. If you see registration is a danger, then the childhood registration till now disappears.

Q: We don't see it though.

K: That is all I am saying sir. We won't see the danger of it, we like it. We like our fear, we like - you accept it, aggressiveness, we like to live in constant battle with ourselves, that gives us a sense of well being, that at least you are alive. And so on and so on.

Q: It is comfortable.

K: All right, sir, it is comfortable.

Q: What can we do with the vacuum that is left?

K: You see - what will you do if you are in a vacuum. That is, you don't know what will take place if there is no registration. Find out. Not say you will live in a vacuum. I say to you that you won't. What is the matter? On the contrary, a man who is in constant battle is not living.

Q: How do we find out?

K: How do I find out what?

Q: How can you find out what else there is? What is the alternative to having this ego thing. How can we find out what the alternative is? How do we go about it?

K: I don't understand.

Q: Have a faith.

Q: How did you do it? How did you get rid of your ego?

K: How do you know I have got rid of it? (Laughter)

No sir, don't bother about me. (Laughter) I have been a long time at it, from the age of fifteen. For me, when I was born, probably it was not there. But that is totally utterly irrelevant to you. What is relevant is you, why you hold on to this thing, this miserable unfortunate suffering 'me'. And to escape from that you go off to India, put on robes and put on beads - you know.

(Laughter) All that nonsense goes on.

Q: Because we live in the past or the future, not in the present.

K: Please don't bother about me. Just find out why you build, see the consequences of building this structure, the consequences of this structure, and if you like it, if it pleases you, if it gives you comfort, know in that comfort there is tremendous danger, that you suffer, that you go through all kinds of neuroticisms, you know what is happening. If you say that gives me comfort, stay with it.

Q: In other words we are too lazy to change.

K: Yes. Now how is that? I perceive, or I am aware that I am building this structure, thought is building this structure all the time, sleeping, waking, dreaming, day dreaming, walking, all the time, concerned about itself. Now what is the way, what is the process to end this thing? You don't ask that.

Q: If I may - if I ask myself why I collect these identifying things about me, who do I ask in order to get past the me?

K: No I am asking you.

Q: I understand. I don't mean ask a person. How does an I do this?

K: I'll show you sir in a minute, look.

Q: O.K.

K: Is it a fact to you, that you are building psychologically this illusory structure, which has become such an extraordinary reality to one? Are you aware of the structure first?

Q: I think so, yes.

K: If one is aware of it, what do you mean by being aware of it? We have come back to the original question: what is the relationship between awareness and faith? There is no relationship whatsoever between awareness and faith. Faith is not a fact. It is a belief.

Q: Define faith. What does faith mean to you?

K: Nothing. Please don't bother about - so are you aware of the structure? Please let's be for five minutes serious. Are you aware of the structure in yourself? If you are, what do you mean by being aware? In that awareness is there a duality, that is, I am aware of that? You understand my question sir? I am aware of that light, that light is different from me. Now am I in that same position when I say I am aware of the structure, the structure being different from me? Or the structure is me?

Q: It is a very comfortable feeling.

K: No, no. It isn't a question of comfort or discomfort. Please move away from those things, forgive me, you are just going back to that. Which is, am I aware as though the structure were something separate from me, away over there, or near, and I who am aware is different from that? Or I am that? You understand? Obviously. Right? I am that. That is, the observer is the observed - right?

Q: I question if that is true or not.

K: No, no. There is no question, don't hesitate so, see it is so simple. I have built up this structure, the structure has been built. And part of the structure is, I am different from the structure. I am the soul, I am the great man, I am the, etc. etc. Or I am full of knowledge and the structure is not knowledge. You follow? So I am asking: do you see the structure as something separate from yourself?

Q: No.

K: If you really say no, that means, what does it mean?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir. Oh, for half an hour, do please put your minds to this I beg of you. Are you different from your aggression? Obviously you are not. You are aggression, it is part of you.

Q: We alone can change it.

K: No. Who is we?

Q: I mean we ourselves. We can change.

Q: If I was just my aggression I wouldn't know about my aggression.

K: Oh yes you would.

Q: How?

K: Your friends would tell you, "Don't be so aggressive." (Laughter) If he is a friend.

Q: You ask us to look for ourselves, well that surely implies...

K: No, madam, I am asking this, please listen to it, if I may suggest. I am asking you how do you observe this structure? You can observe the building, see it away from you. But this structure you can't separate it, say "It is not me", it is you. Your fears, your quarrels, your ambitions, your aggressiveness, your anxieties, all that structure is you. There is no argument about it.

Q: But you are not a united thing. You are all sorts of things and they are all in conflict with each other.

K: That is what I am saying.

Q: How do you take aside one part of you and observe other parts?

K: No. The observer is part of the observed.

Q: Yes but you couldn't observe yourself in totality if you were...

K: Oh, yes. I can observe, I can say I am fear. The next day I say I am pleasure. The third day I say I am so jealous. But is part of the whole thing. Now that is what I am saying. Please, if I may suggest, please give your attention to this, which is: as long as the 'me' separates himself from the structure, the 'me' that separates itself from the structure, as long as there is this division there will be conflict, there will be fights, there will be nagging, there will be anxiety, and all the rest of it. But the fact is: the structure is you.

Q: Sir, the conflict seems to be inward, in the individual and it somehow seems to be a conflict between what you were talking about the senses not being fully alert, and also the mind, the intellectual mind wanting to take individual problems and fears or tendencies.

K: Sir, all that is included in that. Your individual tendencies, idiosyncrasies, your particular talent, or lack of talent, your capacity - include everything that thought has put together as me. That is the structure thought has created. Then thought says, "I am different from the structure."

Q: I don't think everybody thinks that they are different from the structure.

K: I don't know.

Q: I don't.

K: Do you. I am not talking to you personally madam, but I am just asking: does each one of us realize that we are the structure and that structure is not separate from us? If you realize that, if that is an actual fact then a totally different action takes place.

Q: Are you saying that the part of us that is made up of our belief is our outer shell and that in order to grow and evolve we have to break through something?

K: No, no, no. I am not saying anything of the kind. I am just saying sir - don't translate what I am saying into your own - you know when I speak in India, which I do unfortunately, or fortunately, they translate what I say into their own particular language and most of the languages in India are derived from Sanskrit, and the words they use are loaded with tradition, all kinds of meanings. I say, please don't translate what I am saying, just listen to what I am saying, which is very difficult because they immediately translate. They think by translating that they have understood. They have understood the traditional meaning, say for instance of awareness. They have got a special Sanskrit word for it, in that word there is all kinds of connotations in that word. So please, I am just saying, as long as there is a difference between the structure and the observer there must be suppression, there must be conflict, there must be escape, there must be going off to India, to find how to do this and how to do that, meditate, surely, not cooking and so on and so on and so on. Whereas when there is the actual proof, the fact that the observer is the observed, the structure is me, me is not different from the structure, then there is a totally different action. That is what I want to get at.

Q: Sir, if you realize that and there is a sort of silence, how do we keep that and not go back?

K: When you see a danger, a precipice, or a dangerous animal, you don't go back to it, it is finished.

Q: It seems to me that this process of separation is a fundamental process of all the conditioning that goes on, and everything that I seem to do to try and go against this conditioning, always seems to be just another part of this conditioning.

K: Yes sir.

Q: How on earth do I get around that?

K: I am showing it to you, you don't listen. Not that you must listen sir, but I am pointing out something. When you say "I am that conditioning, conditioning is not different from me" - when that becomes an absolute, irrevocable truth, a fact then there is totally different action out of that fact.

Q: Then what happens?

K: Ah! Then what happens - that is exactly what it is. First you don't come to it but you say then tell me what happens. (Laughter) You don't want to climb the mountain, which is arduous, which demands that you carry little, dangerous, I have played with all this, I have done this, some part of it. It is dangerous to climb mountains. So you go lightly, not with heavy rucksacks and all the rest of it.

So this demands that you work, that you look. But unfortunately all kinds of interruptions take place. Some of you this morning I saw doing exercises - good or bad, that is up to you - but here you don't even give ten minutes to find out. Find out what actually takes place when the observer of the structure is the observer himself - the structure is the observer. Then you will find there is no conflict at all - right? When you are that what can you do? You follow sir? So there is no conflict and therefore there is energy. I won't go more into it because that is too - where there is energy, complete energy there is emptiness.

That is enough for today, isn't it? Perhaps we can continue with this on Thursday. Would you agree to that please?

Q: Yes.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE

31ST AUGUST 1978

K: What shall we talk about this morning, talk over together?

Q: Could we please request you to say something about the energy of consciousness?

K: Would you talk over together the energy that you talk about.

Q: I feel after Tuesday's discussion that there is some confusion over the word 'observation', in as much as what we generally call observation is in fact commentaries after the fact and not observation at all.

K: What do you mean by observation? We generally observe after the event and not observe as it is taking place - is that what you mean sir?

Q: Yes.

K: Any other? Madam?

Q: Could you speak about learning, and what is learning, what is relationship? And can one learn about oneself through relationship?

K: Can one learn about oneself through self observation?

Q: And relationship with others.

K: Can one learn through relationship with others about oneself. That is the question?

Q: Yes.

Q: Please talk on emptiness.

K: Just a minute.

Q: You have said that silence is the one fact. I wonder if you could enlarge on that.

K: Silence is a fact and could we go into it, enlarge it, and see the depth of it, the meaning of it.

Q: Could you go into emptiness please?

K: Could we go over together, talk about that which you have said about emptiness.

Q: The question of registration, whether one should register or not.

K: Oh. The question of registration, whether one should register or not. I wonder if you were here the other day sir, I think we discussed it two days ago, or the day before and I hope you will not mind if we don't go into it because we went into it pretty thoroughly.

Q; I wonder, could we talk about the energy of violence.

K: Talk about energy of violence.

Q: (In French) ...disorder.

K: Disorder. Can one be aware of oneself and at the same time observe one's disorder?

Q: Can one be one with fear and so on and at the same time observe it.

K: That's it sir.

Q: You said that we shouldn't make an effort but that we should work on ourselves. I don't understand not to discipline and not to make the effort and still be working on ourselves. Can you make that more clear?

K: Can you talk over together about effort and discipline and without effort can one observe oneself.

Now just a minute please: we have had so many questions. I don't know of whom you are asking these questions, because we are asking these questions of ourselves and trying to find a solution, an answer. So these are the questions: energy, can one learn about oneself through relationship and also what do you mean by that word 'learn', can one learn about oneself through relationship and what do you mean by learning. The other is to talk about emptiness, silence. I think that is about all. And that lady points out can one observe oneself in action, and that lady put a question, which is, effort and discipline seem to go together, and you apparently point out a different way of observing, acting. So which of these questions shall we take?

Q: The last question: you also point out that you must do it. It seems like a contradiction.

K: You also say you must do it, that is, test it out. Test it out, test out what is being said in one's own life and not depend on somebody else. Now which of these questions shall we talk about?

Q: Learning and relationship. (Laughter)

K: Learning and can one learn about oneself through relationship. Now which of these questions would you like to talk over together?

Q: Energy.

Q: Silence.

Q: Silence and energy.

K: Silence, emptiness, relationship - all right, I think we can bring it all together in talking over this question of what is learning, and can one learn about oneself in any kind of relationship, and perhaps if we could go into that rather deeply we might be able to answer these several questions about energy, silence, discipline and effort, and can one observe without any effort and discipline, and is it possible to be aware at the same time when one is acting, conscious? Right? And silence and so on. Can we bring all this into this one question which has been put: what is learning and can one learn through relationship? Can we go into that and bring all the other factors into it? May we?

Audience: Yes.

K: All right. What do we mean by learning? I think this is a fairly important question, if we could go into it rather slowly and carefully. We learn from books, we learn from parents, colleges, universities and so on, and also we learn through experience. We learn through various forms of events, which all become knowledge - right? That is fairly clear: that we gather information, experience, and various forms of events and incidents that happen in our life, and from all these we accumulate knowledge, and from that knowledge we act - right? That is one way of learning.

Is there another way of learning at all? That is, we know the ordinary way of learning. Is there another way of learning? Because the ordinary way of learning, the implication of learning in the ordinary way, is to accumulate knowledge and act according to that knowledge, therefore that learning helps us to become more and more mechanical. I don't know if you follow all this? May I go on with it? This is not a talk by me. We are sharing this thing together. I can go into it but you will also have to join in, in the investigation of what we mean by learning. So it is your responsibility too, not just mine talking about it.

The ordinary everyday form of learning is to accumulate through experience, events and accidents and so on, a great deal of knowledge, and that knowledge is always the past. There is no future knowledge - right? And if we act according to that knowledge it must be action based on the past, based on knowledge and that knowledge can be expanded infinitely, or to a certain extent, but it will always be limited, it will always become a routine, mechanical. So we are asking if there is another way of learning. Learning through accumulation of knowledge and acting according to the accumulation of knowledge, acting and acquiring knowledge from that action: or having acquired knowledge through various forms act, from that. You follow? Do you understand? Am I making myself clear?

Q: Yes.

K: That is, I accumulate knowledge about science, about technology, doctors and so on, accumulate it. And then from that accumulation I act. Or act and through that action learn. And having learnt a great deal through action that also becomes knowledge. So both are the same essentially: acquire knowledge and then act, act and from that action accumulate, which becomes knowledge, so essentially both are the same. Both tend to become mechanical. If this is clear then the question is: is there a way of learning which is non-mechanistic? I don't know if you are interested in all this. To find that out we must be very clear that the mechanistic activity of accumulated knowledge and the whole movement of that, one must be very, very clear in oneself. Can we proceed? Please as we are talking over together, find out how you learn, whether this learning is becoming more and more mechanistic. You hear me, the speaker, read about it, listen to tapes, learn, accumulate knowledge and then say, "Well, I am going to practise that." Therefore that practise becomes mechanistic.

Now we are asking: is there a different movement which is not mechanistic? - which is also learning but it is not accumulated knowledge and acting from that - right? Is this clear?

Audience: Yes.

Q: Sir, part of that mechanistic process might be an attempt to destroy the knowledge that you have accumulated.

K: Yes, which is still mechanistic. You try to get rid of that past knowledge which you accumulated, you say that is not the way to learn so you learn in a different form but yet accumulate.

Q: Yes.

K: This accumulation process goes on all the time. So we are asking, please: is there a different way of learning which is accumulated, which is not mechanistic, which is not all the time functioning on the past movement. Right? We are going to find that out. Do please enquire, question, challenge and all the rest of it for yourself and find out.

We said very clearly, action and then knowledge, knowledge and action are both essentially the same. Now we are asking: is there a different learning? Don't jump to conclusions, don't say spontaneity, don't say it is intuition. Don't let's be caught in words. Is there a way of learning which is not mechanistic?

Q: Does silence come into this?

K: You see, you are jumping. It is as though you don't know.

Q: Through suffering in relationship.

K: Wait madame we are coming to that. We are starting with, is there a question mark, therefore you don't know. So don't say it is silence, this or that. You really don't know. Sir that is the way to find out, with a clean slate you don't know, so you are going to find out. Are you quite sure you don't know? Or you pretend you don't know? (Laughter) For oneself, no please I am talking of oneself seriously. Do I pretend that I don't know, or I actually don't know a way of learning, perhaps learning then has a different meaning, a way of learning which is not mechanistic, I don't know. I have to be terribly honest to myself then I can find out. But if I say, "Yes, I don't know, but I have a few ideas about it, behind me", then you are not enquiring at all.

So can we start honestly by saying I really don't know? Which is rather difficult because when you don't know you are looking, you are trying to find out if you know. You understand my question? When you say I don't know, but there is always the desire to find out, or expect to be told, or project some hidden hope and that becomes an idea and say, "Yes, I begin to capture it." So if you can be free of all that and say, "I actually do not know", then you are curious, you are really curious, like a young boy or a girl learning for the first time. You have got it? No, no, see what has happened. Do watch yourself sir, don't look at me or anyone, watch yourself, which is, when you say "I really don't know", what has taken place? Your mind is not actively thinking out how to find out - right? Are we meeting each other in this point? Say for instance, I really don't know, which means I have no hope of finding it, I have no conclusion, I have no motive. This is very important, when I say I don't know, in that is implied having no motive whatsoever. Because motive then gives a direction and then I have lost it. So I must be very, very clear and terribly honest in myself to say, I really don't know. Wait sir, listen to it carefully. I really don't know, then what has taken place in my mind? Find out, don't answer quickly.

Hasn't it broken away from the old tradition? You understand? The old mechanistic tradition. When I say, I really don't know I have moved out of that field altogether - right?

Q: Although I don't think that one's thinking in terms of not knowing a new way of learning. All that one knows is that the conflict which mechanistic knowledge causes, just that - one doesn't know any more. And one can see that one doesn't know how to get over this conflict.

K: We are not talking of conflict yet sir. We will come to that in a minute. We are talking about: is there a different process of learning? If you don't know it - I don't know it - and I actually say "I don't know it" - what has happened?

Q: My mind then says if I don't know it I am empty.

K: Oh, for god's sake! How silly people are.

Q: Why is it stupid?

K: I didn't say stupid, I said silly. (Laughter) Because we are not paying attention, it is empty - is it empty? Or is it so tremendously free of that, mechanistic, it is totally awake? Because it is intensely curious to find out. You see the difference? The mind that says, "I don't know" - wait, let me take an example. Do you know what God is? Of course you have beliefs, you have dogmas, all kinds of conditioning, but actually you don't know that. You can invent about it, you can think about it, you can argue about it, or be against it, but the actual fact you don't know. So you start with not knowing in order to find out.

Q: May I ask you sir, do you always start with not knowing when you come to speak, do you always start with saying, "I don't know, let's find out now"?

K: Yes, that is what I am saying.

Q: Is that what you do when you come into this tent, is it what you do? Are you completely free of what you know before?

K: Please I don't prepare talks, I don't do anything, I just come and I spill out. (Laughter) I have prepared talks, written them all out carefully and so on and so on, and one day somebody says throw away all your notes and talk. So I did and began that way.

Q: There isn't a lot of difference really. I mean having it written down on paper and having it written down inside.

K: No. I don't, I am doing it now. Please - you follow? When you say actually you don't know, you stop the mechanistic process of learning, haven't you? So your mind is not empty, it is free from that in which it has been functioning, and therefore it is now in a state of acute attention, learning, acute state, free from that. Then what takes place?

Q: Hunger.

Q: The mind gets bored.

K: Do try it, please try it as we are talking here, do it in the sense attempt to find out.

Q: Enquiry.

K: Yes. What does enquiry mean? Enquiry implies that you must be free from your prejudice, from your habits, conclusions, from any form of opinion so that your mind is free to move. In the same way if you understand this whole nature of this mechanistic acquisition of knowledge then if you put it in its right place you are free from it. And you are then capable of complete attention, aren't you? When there is complete attention is there a learning? Please this requires a little bit of going into.

I may be rather stupid this morning so please forgive me if I keep on persisting in this thing but perhaps we will come back to it a little later.

The next question in that is involved: can I observe myself through relationship? Can I know myself fundamentally, basically, all the reactions, all the nuances, the subtleties of myself in relationship - right? That is the question, that was raised. So we have to enquire what do we mean by 'relationship' - the word itself. To be related, to be in contact, to be not physically intimate but, not only that, but to have a relationship at the same level, at the same moment, with the same intensity, then there is a relationship - right? There is a relationship between a man and woman, or a friend and another, or a boy and girl, when they meet not merely physically only but much more, which is when they meet at the same level, at the same moment, with the same intensity there is actual relationship, when they are meeting at the same level - right? That can be called a real, true relationship.

Now, one's relationship with another is based on memory - right? Would you accept it? On the various images, pictures, conclusions I have drawn about you and you have drawn about me. The various images that I have about you - wife, husband, girl or boy or friend and so on. So there is always image-making - right? This is simple, this is normal, this is actually what goes on. When one is married or lives with a girl or a boy every incident, every word, every action creates an image - no? Are we clear on this point? Don't agree with me please, I am not trying to persuade you to anything, but actually you can see if for yourself. A word is registered, if it is pleasant you purr, it is nice, if it is unpleasant you immediately shrink from it, and that creates an image. The pleasure creates an image, the shrinking, the withdrawal creates an image. So our actual relationship with each other is based on various subtle forms of pictures, images and conclusions. That's right?

Now I am asking: when that takes place what happens? The man creates the image about her, and she creates an image about him. Whether in the office, whether in the field, or anywhere this relationship is essentially based on this formation of images - right? This is a fact, isn't it? Can we go on from there.

Then what takes place? You have an image about her and she has an image about you. It doesn't matter where it is, in the office, in the factory, in the field, in every way, labour, there is this image-making all the time. So when there is an image like that, she has and you have, then in that there is division, and then the whole conflict begins. Right? Where there is division between two images there must be conflict - right?

Q: Why have images become so important?

K: We will go into it madame First go into it step by step, not say 'Why' - have you got this image about your brother, your sister, your husband, your wife, your father, whatever it is? Then see when there is this image there is certainly a division, the Jew and the Arab, the Hindu, the Muslim, the Christian, the Communist - it is the same phenomena - right? When that takes place there must be fundamentally conflict. The husband or the boy or the girl may go off to work and there he has created images about himself, his position, his worth, his competition and all the rest of it, he comes and says, "Darling how are you?", and again he has got his image and she has hers. So there is conflict. So it is a basic law that where there is division between people there must be conflict. Full stop. Right? The man may say to the woman, or the woman may say to the man "I love you" but that may merely be sensory love, sexual love but basically they are not related at all. They may wear rings and hug each other and sleep in the same bed and live in the same house, but basically he is pursuing his ambitions, his greed and all the rest of it, and she also. Right? So basically they never meet at the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity. Cannot. Right? Do we see this? - not accept the words that are spoken by the speaker, that is worthless. Actually this is so in daily life. And then we can say to each other, "I love you. You are so beautiful" - you are this and you are that, put more colour on your hair - you know, play with all that kind of stuff.

Now why do we create these images? Why do you create an image about your girl or your wife, or your husband, or your boy, why?

Q: I think it is survival.

K: Survival?

Q: I think it is through fear. Basically because you didn't look at something you feared.

K: He says that it is survival.

Q: To guard one's ego. One doesn't want to be intruded on. One doesn't want someone close, one's frightened to lose one's ego.

K: Oh! Is that so?

Q: I don't know.

K: What sir?

Q: Because we don't see the whole of the fact.

K: How can I see the whole, if that is what you are saying, the whole beauty of relationship, the whole nature of love and all that, when we are so concerned about our beastly little selves all the time?

Q: Is it because we are registering all the time?

K: No, madame we have been through all that, I want to forget the registration. Look at it anew. Why do I, or why does one create an image about another? Why do you create an image about the speaker?

Q: It is lack of attention.

K: Just go into it sir. Why do you create an image about your girl, or your husband, boy and all that, why?

Q: To be dependent.

K: Do look at it before you answer. See what you do first. If I may gently suggest, see the fact of it first, not say well this is it, this is that. Just see if it is so.

Q: We want to be recognized in some way or another.

Q: Is it because I'd like to know what is going to happen tomorrow.

K: Do look at it sir. You are married, you have got a girl, or a boy. This image-making goes on. And I am asking why. Take time. Please. You don't know, I don't know, let's find out.

Q: It is very pleasant to have an image. It is possession.

K: Is it? Is it very pleasant to have an image?

Q: It is very gratifying.

K: Is it very pleasant to have an image? Please sir - an image?

Q: Image is a dirty word.

K: All right. I won't use the word image - use some other word.

Q: Phantasy.

Q: Familiarity - we take things for granted, we are at all times preoccupied rather than attentive.

K: I want to find out why I create the image about my wife - if I have one. Is it habit? Is it convenient? Is it immemorial conditioning? Is it a tradition that I do this, brought over from the genes and so on and so on, that instinctively I make an image about you?

Q: Does it matter why?

K: Find out. So I am saying is it this tremendous habit in which we live?

Q: No. It is influence.

K: Include that. Influence. And because one is so accustomed to being influenced, which is environment and all the rest of it. So I say, is it habit, is it a tradition that has been handed down, unconsciously, from race to race, from generation to generation? Is it a thing which I have accepted as my arm, as I accept a leg, it is part of me?

Q: Sir, does that really answer the question why. That is just saying that we do have an image, but why do we have an image?

K: I am going into that sir.

Q: I think it is a continuation of the conditioning that we ourselves have received.

K: It is part of our conditioning, inherited from father to son and so on and so on, generation after generation. So just let's find out. So put all this together, habit, immemorial tradition, desire for a sense of nearness and yet withdrawal - all that. Is that why you do it? Do look at it, take a second, please take a second. Or is it that we want to be certain of the girl or the boy, the husband, certain? Certain to possess her, it is mine and not yours. All that is involved in it. Desire for certainty - it is my wife, my girl, my boy, my husband, I am sure. That is, it gives me certainty in my relationship with another. I know my wife, which is the most absurd statement. It gives me a feeling that I possess something and I am sure of that possession. So habit, tradition, a thousand million years of tradition carried from generation to generation to generation. Then the desire to possess, to be dominated, love to be possessed and love to be dominated - a neurotic state, and the desire to be certain, it is my house, my table, my pen, my wife - right? What do you say to all this?

Q: We should be free of all that.

K: We should be, or we are?

Q: We should be.

K: Oh! I should be on the top of the Himalayas, but I am not!

(Laughter). How can we talk over together if we are not both moving in the same direction? Please. The 'should be' is non-existent; 'what is' is the only fact.

Q: Can one not accept this state by understanding it?

K: No, madame we are doing it. We are doing it step by step, going into this. I am certain about my name, I am certain about my form, my physical form, I am certain I am qualified mechanically or a scientist, or professor - I am certain. My profession, my career as a military, or navy, or a doctor, it is my career, I am certain. So I want to be certain in my relationship - no? And when that certainty is shaken then begins the trouble, it ends up in divorce, or a separation, or whatever you like to call it.

So these are the factors that we create these images in order to be sure, certain, in order to possess and in that possession feel the power, the pleasure, the strength of that possession. And there is in this inherited a thousand million years or a million years of man's desire to hold somebody and not let go, and so on and so on. These are the factors in daily life - no?

Q: So that implies something is just fixed, doesn't it?

K: Yes sir.

Q: We also make use...

K: That is right. I want to be certain. I want to be sure when I come back from the office she is there. And when she comes back from the office she wants to be quite sure I will turn up too!

(Laughter) This is the game we have been playing infinitely, in a variety of ways.

Q: Why do we need the certainty?

K: We are going to go into that. Go slowly sir.

Q: I am afraid I lose control.

K: You are afraid to lose control over her? I hope your wife is there! (Laughter).

Look sir, we are talking about something so tremendously serious. Whether it is possible, knowing these are facts, not imagination, not ideas, not some conclusions which you have got because I have talked about it but these are daily facts. Now the question is: in that there is no possibility of relationship. You may sleep together, you may hold hands together, do all kinds of things together, but actually there is no relationship. That is a fact. And you don't want to acknowledge it. Because the moment you acknowledge it then begins doubt, frightened, nervous and all that begins. Now please just listen.

Now, can I learn about myself in my relationship with another? That is the question we began with, that is the question that was put. In that relationship I can observe my reactions - right? I like and I don't like. She said a nasty word, or it was so pleasant and so on - my reactions I can watch. Those reactions are myself, aren't they? They are not separate from me, both sensory as well as nervous, psychological responses - right? I am learning about myself tremendously as I go along, I have seen infinitely what I am doing, what I have done, what I am doing, what I will do tomorrow if I continue this mechanistic way of behaviour - right? And death comes and you say, "Darling, I am leaving you." She feels terribly lonely, miserable, unhappy, tears, finds out suddenly she is left alone, or he is left alone. And then he can't face it and goes off to some entertainment, or goes off with another woman, or whatever it is, or becomes tremendously religious. (Laughter)

What a game we are playing with each other - right sir? So I see this is a fact. I have learnt a tremendous lot about myself in my relationship with another. Then the factor arises: can this image-making stop? You understand my question? Can this momentum of the past, all that of that tremendous momentum, with tremendous volume behind it, like a river with a great volume of water rushing, can all this image-making tradition, desire for all that end, without a single conflict? You understand my question? Are you interested in this? What will you pay for it? (Laughter) That is all you can do. By paying something you think you will get it.

Now how can this mechanism of image-making, not just image-making but the desire for certainty, the tradition, the whole structure of that, can that end? Right? Are you asking that question? Or am I asking, I am putting my question onto you? If you put that question to yourself, do you say, "I don't know therefore I will find out"? Or you are already struggling to find out? How can this image-making come to an end? Which means the ending of registration, not to register a word that he or she says, the slur, the insult, the nagging, all that, not to register at all. Is that possible? Do you understand my question? Please don't go off to sleep. I am asking this question, you have to answer it.

Q: No, it is not possible. I don't find it possible.

K: The lady says it is not possible, therefore she has shut the door.

Q: No, I haven't shut the door, but I find it impossible.

K: The moment you say it is impossible, it is not possible, or it is possible you have shut the door. It is like a man saying "I can't do it" - finished. I am sure each of us can do it. I am certain, clear, if you put your heart and your mind into this question.

When the wife or the girl, or the man or the husband, says to you, "You are rather stupid this morning" - must you register that - react to the word, to his feeling and watch your own reactions to the word and his feeling. You follow? Can you watch all this instantly? Or he says, "You look very nice this morning" and you follow? Go into it sir. Not to register at all. Now is this possible? Please we are talking about learning about oneself in relationship. And we see why we create this image and so on, and therefore there is no actual relationship at all. There may be physical relationship, psychologically, obviously you are totally divided.

How can you be related and love another if you are ambitious? You can't. Or competitive, or this or that. So you have learnt a tremendous lot in enquiring into this relationship. You have come to the point now when we say: is this possible, to hear the word, not shut off, hear the word, see the meaning of the word, the significance of the word, the expression on the face of the man or the woman who says it, and your own reaction to all that, can you be aware of all that?

Q: Sir, it seems that we are continually getting into this difficulty at this point of saying I don't know. Could we look at that and maybe it is the mechanism that builds the images that doesn't want to say "I don't know". It doesn't like the idea of saying it.

K: Don't keep on repeating, "I don't know", then you are stuck. But we started out by saying we create these images; why we create these images is fairly clear. And we said the next question is: can this image-making stop? Then I can say, "I don't know". Right? Because then your mind is tremendously alert.

Q: One has to be concerned to end the images.

K: Yes. You are concerned to find out whether the image-making can stop. And you say it is not possible, or it is possible, then you are stuck. But when you say "I don't know, but I am moving", when I say "I don't know", I am not static. I am moving, I am tremendously active and full of energy to find out. I am not transmitting my energy to you, you are doing it yourself, please. That is a danger.

So is this possible? Which means to listen and not to register.

Q: Sometimes you are paralysed.

K: No, there is no paralysis madame. You can't paralyse when your relationship with another is so tremendously important. All life is relationship. Not just you and me, it - not only you and me, it is a global problem. So we have to meet it globally, not just "I love my wife" - you follow? You and me, that is too little affair. When you understand the global issue then you will understand the little issue. But if you start with the little issue you won't understand the global - global in the sense of the enormity of it. It concerns every human being wherever he may be. So I say - now can I listen to the word, see the expression, the gesture, the contempt, the arrogance and so on, on the face of the other and listen to it without any reaction? So now we will have to find out what you mean by listening. Are we interested in this? Can we go on? No please I can go on. I have spent my life from the age of fifteen at this - right? So please spend also an hour with this.

Can I listen? Therefore what does it mean to listen? Do you ever listen? Are you listening now? Please, you understand? Are you listening to what I am saying? No, I am not sure. Or you are listening to a conclusion which you have made about yourself? Or in listening you have already drawn a conclusion? Or you have abstracted from listening an idea? And pursuing that idea? Therefore you are not actually listening. So are we listening now? That means you are listening without a single movement of thought because you are so tremendously concerned about this. If you are not then you won't listen. If you are deeply, profoundly concerned about this then you will instinctively naturally listen. And so are you listening from your experience, are you listening to the word and not to the content of the word, or are you listening and making an abstraction of what you are hearing into an idea and say, "Yes, I have got it"? Which means then that you are listening without any movement, any movement of thought, any movement of intention. Just listening. If that is so - carefully please hear what I have to say - if you can so listen when the boy or the girl, or the wife, can you listen to that in the same way? You understand my question? You are finished. It is so terribly simple if you capture the simplicity of it. But intellectually we make a such a mess of everything.

So if there is the act of listening, then there is no registration. The other day after one of the talks, a man came up to me and said "What a marvellous talk that was. It was excellent. I feel as if I have got it all." I listened to it very carefully. I have been told this for fifty years and if I keep on registering how marvellous it is I would be a cuckoo! (Laughter). So can you please find out, listen to somebody saying nasty things, or pleasurable things, so completely that there is no registration? Which means can you be so attentive at the moment the word is said that there is no centre which records? You understand my question? Have you ever been attentive? Attentive in the sense of giving all your attention, all your energy, your heart, your mind, everything to that. When you do that there is no 'me' from which you are attentive, there is only attention - right? In that attention there is no recording. It is only when there is inattention there is a centre which records. Got it?

Q: Sir, there is no distraction.

K: No. There is no such thing as distraction. Please understand this. There is no such thing as distraction. You want to pay attention to that and you are distracted as one generally is. Which means what? You are not paying attention, therefore there is no distraction. So realize that you are not attentive and therefore distraction. The moment you are aware that you are inattentive, you are already attentive. Capture this sir. There is no effort necessary in this. So it is possible not to register at all when the wife says something pleasant or unpleasant, or a friend or a boy or a girl or a boy at the office, labour. Can you live that way? Not for one day or a few minutes - can you live the entirety of your life that way?

Q: Regardless of your age.

K: Regardless of my age, or your age? (Laughter). I don't understand this.

Q: Excuse me sir. When I am attentive in this way of which you speak, is the attention limited to the thing to which I am attentive?

K: No.

Q: Or identified with.

K: No. Attention is attention, not limited to this or to that. I am attentive. There is attention. Not tension. (Laughter) When you are attentive there is no tension. Now wait a minute, just look at it: the question was about learning and can one learn about oneself through relationship. We went into the whole thing step by step, logically, reasonably, sanely. Now, just a minute, listen to this. We went into it very, very carefully, in detail. Now can you observe this whole thing as a whole, not broken up into little pieces. You understand my question? Can you have perception of the entirety of the structure? We have dealt bit by bit, fragment by fragment, or piece by piece. That means nothing personally to me, but if you capture the whole thing then from that you can work details. But you cannot through details work to the whole.

Now can you after an hour and twenty minutes, and ten minutes, or a quarter, can you observe this whole phenomena of registration, learning, relationship as a whole? I mean by whole having a deep insight into the whole thing instantly. You see we are not used to that. We are always from one thing to another, from one fragment to another fragment, from one broken piece to another and so gradually build up the whole. We think we have built up the whole. But the whole is not this. The whole is the perception of the whole structure and beyond, then you can be terribly logical.

Q: And beyond the structure you said.

K: Oh, of course. The structure is very, very fragile.

Q: Does the attention include the structure and going beyond the structure?

K: Yes sir, when we are attentive the structure is non-existent. You understand? You are missing all this. When you are totally attentive there is no structure - right? That attention is meeting the person at the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity - the other may not, that is indifferent, that is irrelevant. Your mind is meeting that totally. Then begins the objection on the other person, saying "You are indifferent to me," you are this, you are that, begins. You are not the cause - you understand? I wonder if you see all this?

Q: What is being attentive?

K: I have explained madame. You are not attentive to something, about something, or for something, you are just attentive.

Q: Who, what is it that is being attentive?

K: There is no you to be attentive, I have explained that. There is only attention.

Q: And there isn't another I there?

K: No, please. See you are going off to something. So are we at the end of an hour and a quarter - are we free of the images? If you are not you haven't been listening, and nobody can force you to listen. It is up to you. If you want the present kind of relationship with each other and so with humanity, globally that way, it is up to you, but if you want to find out a way of living totally differently, it is also up to you but you have to listen to everything in yourself, in others - you follow? I think that is enough for this morning, isn't it?

Q: I don't see how the structure disappears, I am sorry, I don't understand it? How does the structure disappear when I am attentive to it?

K: Sir, I will tell you. The structure exists with all that we mean by structure, which is the desire for certainty, habit, centuries of tradition and so on, all that is the structure, the picture, the image, which we have made about another, when we are totally attentive there is no structure and therefore you are beyond everything, the image-making. You just try one thing. Just for fun. Next time your wife, your husband, your girl or boy says something pleasant or unpleasant, watch it, just for that second watch it, be attentive for that single moment and then you will see whether you are registering or not. You see that is what I mean, find out, try it, otherwise you will never find out.

Q: It seems to me there is contradiction, how can you watch it and be one with it at the same time? For god's sake explain that.

K: I don't quite follow sir.

Q: How can we be fear and watch it at the same time?

K: No, we are going off into something sir. I am saying, that you have listened for an hour - right sir? - an hour and a quarter. You have realized, understood the mechanistic way of learning and a different way - right? And also whether one can learn about oneself through relationship. We went into that more or less. Now I am asking: can you be aware of this whole structure first? Right? Be aware of it as you are aware of the colour of the dress of the person sitting next to you. Then be aware that you are separate from that, which is absurd, therefore in that awareness you realize there is no division there begins to be a sense of great attention. In that attention, which is not yours or another, it is just attention, in that attention, the whole structure is non-existent and I say from that when your wife, or a girl, or a boy says something to you be attentive at that moment and see what happens.

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 2ND SEPTEMBER 1978

We have been talking about various things that concern our daily life. We are not indulging in any form of theories, beliefs, or ideological, speculative entertainment. We are actually deeply concerned - I hope - with our daily life and to find out if it is at all possible to bring about a radical change in the ways of our life. Because our life is not what it should be. We are confused, miserable, sorrow-ridden, struggling, struggling from day after day until we die. And that seems to be our lot. This endless conflict, not only in our personal relationships but also with the world, which is deteriorating from day to day, becoming more and more dangerous, more and more unpredictable, uncertain, where the politicians and the nations are seeking power.

And we should also talk over together this morning, I think, about freedom: whether man - or woman, when I use the word 'man' I include the woman, I hope you don't mind, Women's Lib - it seems to me, as one observes in the world, in our daily life, freedom is becoming less and less. The more and more restrictive we are becoming, our actions are limited, our outlooks are very narrow, or bitter, cynical, or very, very hopeful, and we never seem to be free from our own daily conflict and misery, completely free from all the travail of life. And I think we should talk over together this question of freedom. Of course in the totalitarian states there is no freedom. Here in the western world and the eastern world, partly, there is somewhat more freedom - freedom to change your job, freedom to travel, to say what you like, to think what you like, express what you like, write what you like. But even this freedom that one has is becoming more and more mechanical, it is no longer freedom.

So I think we should, if you are at all serious, go into this question rather deeply. That is, if you are willing. The Churches, the religions have tried to dominate our thinking: the Catholic church in the past tortured people for their belief, burnt them, excommunicated them, and even now excommunication is a form of threat for those who are Catholics. Which is exactly the same thing that is happening in the Totalitarian State - control of your mind, your thoughts, your behaviour, your actions. They are more concerned with the control of the mind, control of thought, and anyone who descends from that, disagrees, is banished away, or tortured, or sent to mental hospitals and so on. Exactly the same thing as the past Catholic world has done and now they are doing it in the so-called political economic states. So freedom is something that we have to find out what it means and whether it is possible for us to be free, not only inwardly, deeply, whether it is at all possible inwardly, psychologically, inside the skin as it were, but also to express ourselves correctly, truly, accurately. Then perhaps we will understand what freedom is.

Is freedom the opposite of slavery? Is freedom the opposite of prison, of bondage, of repression? Is freedom to do what you like? Please, as we said the other day, we have been talking over together, the speaker is only expressing, I hope, verbally what we are all questioning, therefore you are not listening to the speaker but listening to the questions which you are putting for yourself, therefore the speaker is not here. Is freedom the opposite of non-freedom? And so is there an opposite at all? You understand? That is, if we move away from the bad to the good and think that is freedom, the good being the freedom - if we accept the good, which we can go into presently, what is the good, and the bad - is the good, the goodness the opposite of that which is not good, which is evil, which is bad? If there are opposites then there is a conflict. If I am not good, I will try to be good. I will make every effort to be good, if I am somewhat conscious, somewhat sane, not too neurotic. So we are asking: is freedom the opposite of anything? Or if freedom has an opposite then is it freedom? Please enquire together in this matter. That is, any opposite, the good and the bad, the very opposite of the bad has in it the opposite of the bad which is the good, the good has in it the roots of the bad. Go into it please. Consider it together.

If I am jealous, envious, the opposite of jealousy is a state of mind which is not jealous - a state of feeling. But if it is the opposite of jealousy that opposite has in it its own opposite. Do we see this? Because we want to go this morning into the question of what is love? Whether such a thing exists at all. Or is it merely sensation which we call love? So to understand the full significance and the nature and the beauty of that word which we use as love, we must understand, I think, what is the conflict between the opposites. Whether this conflict is illusory, in that illusion we are caught, which has become a habit? Or there is only 'what is' and therefore there is no opposite to it. I hope this is not becoming too intellectual, is it? Or too verbal? Or too nonsensical?

Because as long as we live in opposites, jealousy and non-jealousy, the good and the bad, the ignorant and the enlightened, there must be this constant conflict in duality. Of course there is duality, man, woman, light and shade, light and darkness, morning and evening and so on, but psychologically, inwardly we are asking whether there is an opposite at all? Is goodness the outcome of that which is bad? If it is the outcome of that which is bad, evil - I don't like to use the word 'evil' because that is so appallingly misused, as is every other word in the English language - if goodness is the opposite of the bad then that very goodness is the outcome of the bad, therefore it is not goodness. Right? Do we see it ourselves, not as an idea, as a conclusion, as something somebody has suggested to you, but actually do we see anything born out of an opposite must contain its own opposite? So if that is so, then there is only 'what is', which has no opposite. Right? Is somebody meeting me? We are meeting each other?

So as long as we have an opposite there cannot be freedom. Goodness is totally unrelated to that which is evil, which is bad - in quotes 'bad'. As long as we are violent, to have the opposite which is non-violent, creates a conflict, and the non-violence is born out of violence. The idea of non-violence is the outcome of being aggressive, abrasive, anger and so on. So there is only violence, not its opposite, then we can deal with violence. As long as we have an opposite, then we are trying to achieve the opposite. I wonder if you see?

So is freedom the opposite of non-freedom? Or freedom has nothing whatsoever to do with its opposite? Please we have to understand this very carefully because we are going to go into something, which is: is love the opposite of hate? The opposite of jealousy? The opposite of sensation? So as long as we are living in this habit of opposites, which we are - I must, I must not, I am, I shall be, I have been and in the future something will take place - all this is the activity, the movement of the opposites. May we go on?

So we are asking: is freedom totally unrelated to that which we call non-freedom? If it is then how is that freedom to be lived, understood and acted, from which action takes place? We have always acted from the opposites - right? I am in prison and I must be free of it. I must get out. I am in bondage to a habit, psychologically as well as physiologically, and I must be free of it to become something else. Right? So we are caught in the habit of this everlasting corridor of opposites and so there is never an ending to conflict, to struggle, to be this and not that. I think this is fairly clear. Can we go on from there? You are not listening to me: you are discovering this for yourself. If you are, it has significance, meaning and can be lived daily, but if you are merely accepting the idea of it from another, from the speaker, then you are merely living in the world of ideas, and therefore the opposites remain. The word 'idea' - the root meaning of it, from Greek and so on, is to observe. See what we have made of that word! Just to observe, and not conclude, or make an abstraction from what you have observed into an idea. So we are caught in ideas and we never observe. If we do observe we make an abstraction of it into an idea.

So we are saying: freedom is unconnected with bondage, whether it is the bondage of habit, physical or psychological, the bondage of attachment and so on. So there is only freedom, not its opposite. If we understand the truth of it then we will deal only with 'what is', and not with 'what should be', which is its opposite. I have got it. Are we meeting each other somewhere? Right? May we go on?

So it is very clear that there is only the fact, the 'what is' and there is no opposite to 'what is'. If you understand that basically, the truth of it, you are dealing with facts, unemotionally, unsentimentally, then you can do something. The fact itself may do something. But as long as we move away from the fact, the fact and the opposite will continue. So we are asking now if that is clear, not because somebody said so but because you have discovered this for yourself fundamentally, it is yours, not mine, then we can proceed to enquire into this whole question which is very complex: what is love? If we are sentimental, romantic and imaginative and Raphaelites and Victorians, then we will never even put that question. But if we put aside all sentiment, all emotional response to that word, or having a conclusion about that word, then we can proceed sanely, healthily rationally into this question of what is love. Do you understand? So first of all are we approaching the question without a motive, without sentiment, without prejudice? Because the approach matters enormously, rather than the object itself - right? Do we meet this? Am I putting you all to sleep?

So do we know how we approach this question? Are we aware of our approach to it? We say, "Yes, I know what love is," and therefore you have stopped enquiring. So as we said, the approach to the problem is more important than the problem itself. Don't make it into a slogan! Or a cliché, then you have lost it. So are we clear how we approach this question? If the approach is correct, accurate, in the sense there is no personal conclusion, or opinion, or experience, then you are approaching it afresh, then you are approaching it with a sense of deep enquiry.

So we are saying: what is love? Theologians have written volumes about it. The priests throughout the world have given a significance to it. Every man and woman throughout the world gives a specific meaning to it. If they are sensual, they give that meaning and so on and so on. So being aware how we approach it, openly, freely, without any motive, then the door is open to perceive what it is - right? We close the door to perception if we come to it with an opinion, with some conclusion, with our own personal little experience. We have closed the door and there is nothing you can do, you can't investigate, but if you come to it openly, freely, eagerly to find out then the door opens and you can look through - right? Please, are we doing this? Because I think this may solve all our human problems. The approach and what is love. In the mechanistic world it doesn't exist. To the totalitarian people, that word is probably an abomination - they only know the love of the country, the love of the State. Or if you are a Christian you have the love of god or the love of Jesus, or the love of somebody. In India it is the love of their particular guru, of their particular deity, and so on. So we are asking, putting all that aside, not ignorantly but seeing what they have done, what religions have done with that word and perhaps with the feeling behind that word, being aware of all that, we must go into this - right?

It means we must not only look what others have done to the word, how they have imposed certain conclusions upon our minds throughout the ages, and also what our own inclinations are, being aware of all that, let's approach it tentatively. What is love? Is it pleasure? Go on sirs, enquire, dig into yourself and find out. Is it pleasure? For most of us it is, sexual pleasure which is called love, sensory pleasure. And that sensory pleasure, sexual pleasure has been called love. And that apparently dominates the world. It dominates the world because probably in our own lives it dominates us. So we have identified love with that thing called pleasure, and is love pleasure? Which doesn't mean that love is not pleasure. Enquire into it, it may be something entirely different. First we must enquire into it - right? Is love desire? Is love remembrance? Please. Which means, is love the remembered experience as pleasure, and the demand of thought as desire, with its image and the pursuit of that image is called love. Is that love? Well sirs?

And is being attached to a person, or to a country, to an idea, is that love? Attachment, dependence? Please look into yourself, not listen to me, I am not worth listening to. What is significant, what is worthwhile is that you listen to yourself when these questions are being put, you have to answer it for yourself because it is your daily life. And if attachment is love, what are the implications involved in it? You understand my question? If we say love is pleasure then we must see the whole consequences and the implications of that statement. Then we depend entirely on sensory, sexual excitement, which is called love. And with it goes all the suffering, the anxiety, the desire to possess, and from that possessive desire attachment. And where you are attached there is fear, fear of loss. And from that arises jealousy, anxiety, anger, gradual hatred - right?

And also we must see what are the consequences if it is not pleasure. Then what is love, which is not jealousy, attachment, remembrance, pursuit of pleasure through imagination and desire and so on? Is love then the opposite of all this? You follow? I am lost!

We said is love the opposite of pleasure, of attachment, of jealousy? If love is that then that love contains jealousy, attachment and all the rest of it. Therefore love, seeing all the implications of attachment, pursuit of desire, the continuous reel of remembrances, I loved, I am not loved, I remember that particular sexual pleasure or that particular incident which gave me delight - so the pursuit of that and the opposite of what is called love, is then love the opposite of hate? Do you understand? Or love has no opposite? Are you following all this?

So we are finding out - please go with it you will see something extraordinary come out of this. I don't know what is coming out of it myself but I can feel something extraordinary coming out of it. If you will all listen to yourselves actually. And the religions have made love of god, love of Jesus, love of Krishna, love of Buddha - you follow? Totally unrelated from daily life. And we are concerned with the understanding and finding the truth of our daily life, the totality of it, not just sex or power or position, or jealousy, or some idiotic complex one has, but the whole structure and the nature of the extraordinary life in which we live.

So as we said, the opposite is not love. If we understand that, that through negation of what it is not, which means not negating or denying in the sense of pushing it away, resisting it, controlling it but understanding the whole nature and the structure and the implications of desire, of pleasure, of remembrance, out of that comes the sense of intelligence which is the very essence of love - right? Are we meeting each other sir?

He said it is impossible. I am young and full of beans and I am full of sex, and I want to indulge in it. You may call it whatever you like but I like that. Until I catch some disease or some man or woman runs away with another then begins the whole circus - jealousy, anxiety, fear, hatred and so on. So what is one to do when one is young, full of life, all the glands highly active, what is one to do? Don't look at me! (Laughter) Look at yourselves. Which means - please listen - which means you cannot possibly depend on another to find out the answer. You have to be a light to yourself. You have to be a light to yourself in understanding, desire, remembrance, the whole attachment, to all that - understand it, live it, find out. Find out how thought pursues pleasure endlessly. If you understand the depth, and the fullness and the clarity of all that, then you will not be in a state of perpetual control, then guilt and regret - you follow? All that one goes through when one is young, if one is sensitive. If you are merely out for pleasure, well that is a different matter.

So love is not the opposite of hate, of desire, of pleasure. So love is something entirely different from all that, because love has no opposite. If you really understand this, go into it, not catch my enthusiasm, my vitality, my interest, my intensity, then you will find out what is much more inclusive than that, is compassion. The word is passion for everything - for the rock, for the stray animals, for the birds, for the trees, for nature, for human beings. How that compassion expresses itself - when there is that compassion, actually not theoretically and all that nonsense - when there is actually that state of compassion, all action from that is action of intelligence. Because you cannot have love if you haven't understood the whole movement of thought. One cannot grasp the full beauty and the significance and the depth of that word without understanding the whole business of attachment, not intellectually but actually, whether you are free from attachment - from the man and the woman, from the house, from the particular carpet or particular something or other that you own - right?

So out of that investigation and awareness and all the significance of that, from that there comes intelligence, not born of books and cunning thought and discussions, and clever expressions and all that; but the understanding of what love is not, and putting all that aside. Not say, "Well I will find out gradually when I am dead and buried, or just before" - but now today, to find out while you are sitting there listening to yourself, to be free completely from all attachment - from your wife, from your husband, from your girl - attachment - do you understand? Can you? Not resist it, not throw it away, I am going to fight it, I am going to exercise my will to resist it and so on and so on. Will is part of desire.

So can you put aside attachment, dependence, and not become cynical, bitter, withdraw and resist. Because you have understood it, what attachment implies and in the very understanding of it, it drops away, and it drops away because you are intelligent, there is intelligence. That intelligence is not yours or mine, it is intelligence.

So then the action of compassion can only come through intelligence. It is like those people who love animals, protect animals, and wear their fur - right? You have seen all this, haven't you?

If we have understood this to its very depth then we can proceed to enquire into this problem of fear with regard to death - right? Do you want to go into it? No, no please, don't casually say, "Yes, let's do it for fun". Because most of us who are young or old, whether we are diseased, or lame, or blind or deaf or ignorant, poor, we are frightened of death. It is part of our tradition, it is part of our culture, part of our daily life to avoid this thing called death. We have read all about it. We have seen people die, you have shed tears over them, and felt this enormous sense of isolation, loneliness, and the fear of all that. And from that there is this great sorrow, grief, not only the human sorrow of two human beings but also there is this great sorrow, global sorrow, sorrow in the world. I don't know if you are aware of all this. We have had recently two wars - hasn't that created immense sorrow for mankind? No? Think how many women, children, people, have cried and shed tears - not your tears or mine but human tears of humanity. So there is a global sorrow, the sorrow of the world and a particular human being with his sorrow.

Are you getting mesmerized by me? I question this all the time because you are so very silent and I hope that silence indicates the non-movement of physical movement and the non-movement of thought, does it indicate that you are really deeply concerned, deeply enquiring, putting your whole heart and mind and everything that you have into this understanding of 'what is'?

So before we go into the question of death, we must also understand the nature of sorrow: why we shed tears, why we rationalize sorrow, why we hold on to it. In the Christian world sorrow is put on the cross, finished with it. You have idealized it or put away that sorrow onto one person and that person is going to redeem you from sorrow. You know all this, don't you? So one never goes into this whole question of sorrow. In the Asiatic world sorrow is explained through various theories, very intelligent, very clever - there is great possibility in their theories but yet in the Asian world, including India, there is still sorrow. So we are asking whether man can ever be free from it? Because we are asking this question to find out its right place - the right place of sex, money, physical security, technological knowledge and so on. All these have their right place. When once you have put these in their place, freedom comes.

So sorrow: the word sorrow, in that is involved passion. Passion, not lust, but that quality of mind when sorrow is completely, totally understood and gone into, seeing the whole significance of it, then out of that comes passion. Not to paint pictures - I don't mean all that kind of stuff - but passion, that quality of energy which is not dependent on anything, environment, good food and so on, it is that tremendous quality of energy, which may be termed as passion. It comes out of the understanding of this burden which man has carried for millenia. Why do we suffer, psychologically? You may have physical pain, injury, disease, crippled and is it possible - please listen quietly - is it possible to put pain, physical pain in its right place and not let it interfere with the psychological state of the mind - you understand what I am saying?

One has often physical pain in different forms. Or one may have serious sickness, or crippled, and that sickness, that disease, and so on, not to allow all that to interfere with the freedom, with the freshness of the mind. That requires tremendous awareness, watchfulness to see that physical pain is not to be registered - you understand? - psychologically. Are we meeting each other? You have been to a dentist, haven't you, so have I, all of us have been, and there is considerable pain sitting there by the hour, and not to register that pain at all. Then if you register it, then you are frightened to go there again, fear comes in. Whereas if you don't register it, the pain, - you follow? - quite a different quality of mind, brain comes into action. So we went into the question of registration very clearly, carefully, so I won't go into it now.

So similarly we live in sorrow and perhaps that is getting more and more expansive, through divorce, people are divorced and their children go through a terrible time, the children suffer, become neurotic. All that goes on in the children; they are fed up with their present wife and for various sexual and other reasons and they chase another woman, or man - you follow all this, this is happening. And there is tremendous suffering in the world, the people who are in prison, the poverty that exists in India and Asia, incredible poverty. And the sorrow of a world of those who live in Totalitarian States. We were talking the other day to a person, just in Switzerland we met them, and we had asked them a question, saying how do you tolerate all this? He said, "We get used to it". You see what the implications are? We get used to oppression, suppression, fear, watching always what we are saying, we get used to it. As we have got used to our own particular little environment - you understand what I am saying?

So is it possible to be totally free from sorrow? If the mind, if the brain is capable of not indulging in its own misery, in its own loneliness, in its anxieties, travail and struggle and fear and all that, therefore there is no centre from which you act. The centre being the 'me' with all the things that are included in that, as long as that exists there must be sorrow. So the ending of sorrow is the ending of 'me', the ego. Which doesn't mean the ending of 'me' implies callousness, indifference: on the contrary.

So we know what sorrow is and never to run away from it, just to live with it, capture it, understand it, go into it at the moment, not a few days later after you have been through all kinds of struggle, just to never move from that fact. Then there is no conflict about it. And out of that comes a totally different kind of energy, which is passion.

So now we can go into the question of what is death. All this is necessary to find out what is meditation, you understand? To be free of hurts, wounds, psychologically, to be free of fear, to understand the whole movement of pleasure, the nature and the structure of thought, and the thought that has created the division, the 'me' and the thing which he has observed is not 'me' - all the divisions. To understand all this and lay the foundation, then one can really meditate, otherwise you live in illusions, some kind of fanciful day dreaming. Or you go to Japan, or Burma, I don't know if you can go to Burma nowadays, Japan and learn Zen meditation. It is all such nonsense. Because unless you put your house in order, the house that is burning, that is being destroyed, unless you put your house, that is yourself, in order, to sit under a tree in a cross-legged Lotus position, or whatever position you take, is utterly meaningless. You can delude yourself, you can have illusions galore. So that is why it is important and to understand and be free of anxiety, fear, attachment, and whether it is possible to find out the ending of sorrow.

Then we can go into the question of death. I wonder why we are all so frightened of it. Have you ever asked: what does it mean to end anything? What does it mean to end attachment? To end it. Say at this moment, sitting there, observing yourself very carefully and realizing that you are attached to a person, or to something or other, ideas, your experience and so on. To end that attachment now without argument, without etc. etc. Just end it. Then what takes place? Do you understand my question? I am attached to this house, behind me - I hope not! And realizing that I am attached, not theoretically or in abstraction, but actually, the feeling, possessing that, being something there, all that nonsense. To observe that, be aware of that attachment and end it instantly. The ending is tremendously important. The ending of a habit, smoking or whatever habit one has, to end it. So one must understand what it means to end something without effort, without will, without asking, "If I end this will I get that?" - then you are in the market. In the market place you say, "I will give you this, give me that" - which most of us consciously or unconsciously do. That is not ending. To end and find out what happens.

So in the same way, death. Please hold on to it for a minute, don't say, "Is there life after death? Do you believe in reincarnation?" - as I said, I don't believe in anything. Full stop. Including reincarnation. But I want to find out, one must find out what it means to die. It must be an extraordinary state. That is freedom from the known - you understand? I know my life, your life. You know your life, if you have gone into it, observed it, carefully watched all the reactions and your behaviour, your lack of sensitivity, or being sensitive escape into insensitivity and so on and so on. You know your life very well, if you have watched it. And all that is going to end - right? Your attachment is going to end when you die. You can't carry it with you but you like to have it until the last moment. Right? So can you end your habit, one habit without arguing, rationalizing, fighting it, you know, it is finished, over? Then what happens? You will find out only if you don't exercise will - right? "I will give up" - whatever your particular habit is. Then you are struggling with it, you are battling with it, you are running away from it, suppressing it and all the rest of it, it goes on. But if you say, "Yes, I'll end it, it doesn't matter, I'll end it" - see what happens.

In the same way death implies the ending. The ending of everything that one has collected during this life, the furniture, the name, the form, your experiences, your opinions, your judgements, your jealousies, your gods, your worship, your prayers, your rituals, everything comes to an end. The brain, which has carried immemorial memories and tradition and thoughts, that brain lacking oxygen peters out. That is the 'me' which has collected so much, the 'me' is the collection of all this - right? That is obvious. The 'me' is my fear, the 'me' is my attachment, my anger, my jealousy, my fears, pleasure, my attachment, my bitterness, my aggression - that is the 'me'. And that 'me' is going to come to an end. That 'me' is projected by thought which is the outcome of knowledge, the knowledge of my fifty, sixty, or thirty or twenty or eighty or a hundred years, that is the factor, the knowledge, the known. The ending of the known, which is the freedom from the known, is death, isn't it? No?

And so one must find out whether the mind can be free from the known. Not at the end of thirty years later but now. The end of the known, which is 'me', the world I live it, all that. The 'me' is memories, please listen to all this, the 'me' is memories, experiences, the knowledge which I have acquired through forty, sixty, thirty, twenty, or a hundred years, the 'me' that has struggled, the 'me' that is attached to this house, to this woman, to this land, to this child, to this furniture, to this carpet, the 'me' that is the experience that I have gathered through a number of years, the knowledge, the pain, and the anxieties, the fears, the jealousies, the hurts, the beliefs as being a Christian, love of Jesus, love of Christ, all that is 'me'. And that 'me' is just a lot of words - no? A lot of memories.

So can I be free from the known, end the known now, not when death comes and says, "Get out old boy, it is your time". Now. But we cling to the known because we don't know anything else. We cling to our sorrows, we cling to our life, the life which is pain, anxiety - you know all that, you know all this, that is our daily, miserable life. And if the mind doesn't cling to it at all there is an ending to all that. But unfortunately we never end. We always say, "Yes, all right, I'll end it but what is going to happen?" So we want comfort in the ending - do you understand sirs? So somebody comes along and says, "Old boy, believe in this, that will give you tremendous comfort." All the priests throughout the world come and pat your shoulder and hold your hand when you are crying, they give you comfort, the love of Jesus, he will save you, do this and do that. Do you understand? We are saying the ending in which there is no time, the ending of time, which is death - you understand?

So what takes place when there is the ending of 'me', the known, and when there is freedom from the known? Is that ever possible? It is only possible when the mind has understood and put everything in its right place so there is no conflict. When there is freedom from this known, what is there? Do you understand my question? Do you ask that question? I'll end my attachment to this house, to that woman, or to that boy or to that girl, I'll end it, then what? Don't you ask that? If you do ask it, 'then what', you have approached the whole problem inadequately. You will never ask that question, 'then what'. The very question, 'then what', implies that you have really not actually dropped, ended something. It is the lazy mind that says, 'then what'. Climb the mountain and you will find out what is on the other side. But most of us sit in our easy chairs, and listen to the description and are satisfied with the description. Finished. Right.

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH PUBLIC TALK

SEPTEMBER 3RD 1978

There are a lot of people and I hope some of you understand what is being said. You know we have been talking over together for the last week our human problems; not only talking over together as two friends but what each one of us has discovered for himself in our conversation, and in our exploration and investigation. It must become quite obvious for most of us, if we are at all serious and not treat these Gatherings as a kind of festival, a little more serious than the Pop Festival, or other kinds of festivals.

This morning it will be good to talk over together, as we have talked over fear, pleasure, sorrow, pain and death, I think we ought to talk over this morning the very complex and subtle problem of what is meditation. It is quite a serious issue and perhaps some of you will kindly pay sufficient attention to what is being said, if you care to.

This word is now becoming so common, even the governments are beginning to use it, even the people who want money are trying to meditate more to get more money. They are trying to meditate in order to become quiet so that they can do better business. And the doctors are practising meditation because it will help them to operate properly, and so on and so on and on. And there are different kinds of meditation - Zen, Tibetan and the ones you invent for yourself, and with all this in mind, the Indian type of meditation, the Tibetan, the Zen, the Encounter Group meditation and the aspiration to have a still, quiet, silent mind, bearing all this in mind, let us try to find out, if we can this morning, why one should meditate and what is the significance of meditation.

This word has recently been popularized from India. And people go to India and to Japan and to other places in order to learn meditation, in order to practise meditation, in order to achieve some kind of result through meditation - enlightenment, better understanding of themselves, have peace of mind, whatever that may mean, and generally they have a little peace, not a peaceful mind. And the gurus have invented their type of meditation and so on and on and on - right? I am sure you are aware of all this.

And of course there is the passing fad which is called transcendental meditation. It is really a form of siesta in the morning, siesta after lunch, siesta after dinner or before dinner, so that your mind kind of becomes quiet and you can do more mischief afterwards. (Laughter).

So consider all this, the various types and practices and systems, and question them. It is good to have doubt, it is good to be sceptical up to a certain point. It is like a dog on the leash, you must let the dog go occasionally, run freely: so doubt, scepticism must be kept on a leash all the time but often it must be allowed to run free. And most of us accept the authority of those who say, "We know how to meditate, we will tell you all about it".

So please we are together examining the whole problem, or the whole question of what is meditation, not how to meditate, for then if you ask how am I to meditate, then you will find a system to meditate; the 'how' implies a method. But whereas if you are enquiring into this question of what is meditation, and why should one meditate, then you will never ask how to meditate. The very questioning, the very asking is the beginning of enquiry which is the beginning of meditation.

As we said, this is a very complex problem and we have to go very slowly and hesitantly but subtly into this question. As we said during the last week, we are investigating, we are enquiring into it so that you are not listening to the speaker, you are asking the question of yourself and finding the right answer without accepting any kind of authority, specially the authority of the speaker sitting on this unfortunate platform. It doesn't give him any authority because he sits on a platform and talks. There is no authority in so-called spiritual matters, if I can use that word 'spiritual', in the matter of the spirit, in the matter of enquiring into something that demands very, very careful examination. So we are doing this together, not meditating together but enquiring what is meditation and from that discover for oneself as we go along the whole movement of meditation. Is this all right?

First I think one must be careful in observing that meditation is not something that you do. Meditation is a movement into the whole question of our living. That is the first thing: how we live, how we behave, whether we have fears, anxieties, sorrows, or if we are pursuing everlastingly pleasure, whether we have built images about ourselves and about others. That is part of our life and in the understanding of that life and of those various issues involved in life and being free from those, actually being free, then we can proceed to enquire into what is meditation. That is why we have, for the last ten days or the last week, we have said we must put order in our house - our house is ourselves - complete order. Then when that order is established not according to a pattern, but when there is understanding, complete understanding of what is disorder, what is confusion, why we are in contradiction in ourselves, why there is this constant struggle between the opposites and so on, which we have been talking about for the last ten days or last week. Having put that in order, our life in order, and the very placing things in their proper place is the beginning of meditation. Right? If we have not done that, actually, not theoretically, but in daily life, every moment of our life, then if you have not done that then meditation becomes another form of illusion, another form of prayer, another form of wanting something - money, position, refrigerator and so on.

So we are asking now: what is the movement of meditation? First of all we must understand the importance of the senses. Most of us react, or act according to the urges, demands and the insistence of our senses. And those senses never act as a whole but only as a part - right? Please understand this. If you don't mind enquiring into this a little more for yourself, talking over together, but all our senses never function, move, operate as a whole, holistically. If you observe yourself and watch your senses you will see that one or the other of the senses becomes dominant. One or the other of the senses takes a greater part in observation in our daily living, so there is always imbalance in our senses - right? May we go on from there?

Now is it possible - this is part of meditation, what we are doing now - is it possible for the senses to operate as a whole; to look at the movement of the sea, the bright waters, the eternally restless waters, to watch those waters completely, with all your senses? Or a tree, or a person, or a bird in flight, a sheet of water, the setting sun, or the rising moon, to observe it, look at it with all your senses fully awakened. If you do, then you discover for yourself, I am not telling you, I am not your authority, I am not your guru, you are not my followers - followers are the most destructive people and the gurus too - if you observe this, if you observe this operation of the whole senses acting you will find there is no centre from which the senses are moving. Are you trying this as we are talking over together? To look at your girl, or your husband, or your wife or the tree, or the house, with all the highly active sensitive senses. Then in that there is no limitation. You try it. You do it and you will find out for yourself. That is the first thing one has to understand: the place of the senses. Because most of us operate on partial or particular senses. We never move or live with all our senses fully awakened, flowering. Because as most of us live, operate and think partially, so one of our enquiries into this is for the senses to function fully and realize the importance and the illusion that senses create - are you following all this? And to give the senses their right place, which means not suppressing them, not controlling them, not running away from them but to give the proper place to the senses. This is important because in meditation, if you want to go into it very deeply, unless one is aware of the senses, they create different forms of neurosis, different forms of illusions, they dominate in our emotions and so on and so on. So that is the first thing to realize: if when the senses are fully awakened, flowering then the body becomes extraordinarily quiet. Have you noticed all this? Or am I talking to myself? Because most of us force our bodies to sit still, not fidget, not to move about and so on - you know. Whereas if all the senses are functioning healthily and normally, vitally then the body relaxes and becomes very, very quiet, if you do it. Do it as we are talking.

Then the question arises: what is time? what is the place of time in meditation? And what is the place of control in meditation? You understand? May I go on? I hope we are meeting each other, are we? First let's state whether it is possible to live a life, daily life, not occasionally but live a life without any form of control - which doesn't mean permissive activity or doing what one likes, rejecting tradition - you know all the modern young people are doing. That is no regret, no restraint, no control, do what you want - which the old people do anyhow only you think it is their prerogative, something they have invented.

Now we are asking a question, please consider it seriously: whether it is possible to live a life without any form of control, because when there is control there is the action of will - right? Are you following? So what is will? I will do this. I must not do that. Or, I should in the future do that, and so on. The operation of will. So we have to enquire what is will. Is not will desire? Is not will the essence of desire? Right? Please look at it. Don't reject it or accept it, enquire into it. Because we are now asking whether it is possible to live a life in which there is not a shadow of control, in which there is not a shadow of the operation of will. And will is the very movement of desire. We went into the whole question of what is desire. I won't go into it now because I have a lot to cover this morning. Desire is contact, perception, seeing, contact, sensation, from that arises desire and thought with its image - all that is desire, which we went into but I won't go into now.

And we are asking: is it possible to live without the action of will? Most of us live a life of restraint, control, suppression, and so on, escape. And we have to ask: who is the controller? When you say, "I must control myself, my anger, my jealousy, my laziness, my indolence" and so on, who is the controller? Is the controller different from that which he controls? Or are they both the same? The controller is the controlled. Is it all right? Do we understand? After all you have listened to me for a week, ten days, by now our language, our use of words must be quite common and understood. So as long as there is a controller he is exercising his capacity to control. And we are saying the controller is the essence of desire. And he is trying to control his activities, his thoughts, his wishes and so on and so on. So realizing all that, can one live life which is not promiscuous, which is not doing what you like but a life without any form of control, either sexual and not indulgence, the will to control what you should, should not, and all the whole problem of control. Very few people have gone into this question. And the whole eastern form of meditation is partly control. And personally I object to the whole, their system of any form of control, because the mind then is never free, always subjugating itself to a pattern, whether that pattern is established by another or by oneself.

So the senses, the control: then we must ask: what is time? Not the scientific fiction, science fiction of time. What is, in our daily life, what is time? What part does it play in our life? How important is it in our daily activities? You understand my question? Of course there is time by the watch. There is time according to the sun, the setting and the rising of the sun. There is time as yesterday, today and tomorrow. There is time as something that happened in the past, remembered and shaping the present and the future - right? So there is physical chronological time and we have also psychological time - I will be, I must, I am violent, I will be non-violent. All that implies a movement of time - right?

Movement means time. Please understand this really very carefully because we are going to enquire into meditation, which is whether the mind can be absolutely quiet in which time as movement doesn't exist at all. You are following all this? Are you interested in all this? Even as intellectual curiosity? Because this is very important to understand, whether time, not chronological time but psychological time, can that come to an end? Or must there be always until I die this movement of, I will be, I must not be, I should be, I shall not be - you follow? - the whole psychological activity in which time is involved. That is, can time come to an end? Please see why it is important. Because our brains are conditioned to time, our brains are the result of a million years and more - it doesn't matter - immemorial, centuries upon centuries the brain is conditioned, it has evolved, grown, flowered, it is a very, very ancient brain, and as it has evolved through time - evolution implies time - as it evolved its functions in time - you understand? I wonder if you understand all this? The moment you say, "I will" it is in time. When you say, "I must do that" it is also in time. Everything that we do involves time and our brains are conditioned to not only chronological time, sun, rising sun, setting, but also to the psychological time. So the brain has evolved through millenia and the very idea, the very question whether it can end time - you follow? - it is a paralysing process. I wonder if you understand this? It is a shock to it. Does somebody understand this?

Because we are going to ask presently whether the brain itself can be absolutely quiet. You understand? Not your body, not your breathing, not your eyes and thought, the brain itself, which is constantly chattering, constantly thinking about this, that, the other. Whether those very brain cells can be absolutely quiet. So therefore we must understand the nature of time. That is, psychologically, inwardly we are caught in a network of time. I am going to die, I am afraid. I shall be. I have been. And I remember the happy things or the painful things. And the brain is functioning, living in time - right? You can see this yourself. These are obvious facts.

So part of meditation is to find out for oneself whether time can stop. You can't do this saying, "Time must stop" - it has no meaning. But to understand the whole structure and the nature and the depth of this question - right? That means: is it possible for the brain to realize that it has no future? Do you understand what I am saying? We live either in despair, or in hope. Right? Don't you? Hope is part of time. I am miserable, unhappy, uncertain, I hope to be happy - do you understand? Part of time is this destructive nature of hope, or the invention of the priests throughout the world - faith. You suffer but have faith in god and everything is all right. Do you follow all this? Again that is, faith in something involves time. Can you stand - stand in the sense, can you tolerate that there is no tomorrow psychologically? Can you? That is part of meditation, to find out that psychologically there is no tomorrow.

We were once talking with somebody quite intelligent, quite learned, about this question. And it was a real shock to him when we said: hope, faith, movement of the future as tomorrow is non-existent. He was appalled at the idea and said: "I shan't meet you tomorrow, whom, I love" - do you understand what I am saying? I may meet you, I probably will but the hope, the pleasure, the looking forward to something, all that is involved in time. Which doesn't mean that you discard hope, which means that you understand the movement of time. If you discard hope then you become bitter, then you say, "Why should I live, what is the purpose of life?" and all that nonsense begins - depression, agony to live without anything in the future - do you understand all this?

So one has to go into this question not verbally, not theoretically but actually to find out psychologically in yourself if you have the slightest sense of tomorrow.

The next question in meditation is: whether thought as time can stop? Thought, as we have talked a great deal about it, is important, important in its right place. But it has no importance whatsoever psychologically. I wonder if you see this? I see I must go briefly into it.

Thought is the reaction of memory, it is born from memory. Memory is experience. Experience as knowledge stored up in the brain cells themselves. You can watch your own brain, you don't have to become a specialist - I am not, I just observe myself very carefully. The brain cells hold this memory. It is a material process. There is nothing sacred, nothing holy about it. And everything that we have done, going to the moon, planting a silly flag up there, going down to the depths of the sea and living there, thought has created all this immense complicated technology and its machinery. Thought has been responsible for all this. Thought has also been responsible for all wars - right? It is obvious, you don't have to question it even because your thoughts have divided Britain, France, Russia - you follow? And thought has created the psychological structure as the 'me' - right? That 'me' is not holy, something divine. It is just thought putting together the anxieties, the fears, the pleasures, the sorrow, the pain, the attachments, the fear of death, it has put all this together which is the 'me'. It is this 'me' with its consciousness - right? I wonder? May we proceed? You are following all this? This is 'me', this consciousness. This consciousness is what it contains. Consciousness, your consciousness is what you are - it is your anxieties, your fears, your struggle, your moods, your psychological despairs, pleasures and so on. The content of your consciousness is its content - right? Again there is nothing to argue about it, it is very simple. And that is the result of time. Right? I have been hurt yesterday, psychologically, you said something brutal to me, it has wounded me, and it is part of my consciousness. I have had pleasure and so on. So consciousness is involved in time. When we say can time end, it implies the total emptying of this consciousness with its content. It implies that. Whether you can do it or not that is a different matter. But it implies that.

When you are enquiring into time, whether the immovable layers of this consciousness, sensation, desire and all that, layer after layer, the whole structure of it, whether that consciousness which is a result of time, yesterday I was hurt and so on and so on, whether that consciousness can empty itself completely, therefore time psychologically ends? I am putting first this question for you to look at. Then we can ask: is it possible? Do you understand my question? You are aware of your consciousness, aren't you, you know what you are, if you have gone into it sufficiently, at least for the last week you might have done it somewhat. But if you have gone into it you will see that all this travail, all this struggle, all the misery, uncertainty is part of you, part of this consciousness, your ambitions, your greed, your aggressiveness, your anger, your bitterness - all that is part of this consciousness, which is the accumulation from a thousand yesterdays to today. And we are asking whether that consciousness which is the result of time, psychological as well as physiological, can empty itself so that time has come to an end? You have understood the question first? Please somebody say 'yes' or 'no' - please. Don't go to sleep.

We are going to find out if it is possible. If you say it isn't possible then you have closed the door, then you might just as well walk out, don't sit here and waste your time if you say it is not possible. And if you say it is possible you have also closed the door. But whereas if you say let's find out, then you are open to it, you are eager to find out - right? Please this is not an intellectual game. This is not an entertainment of a Sunday morning. This is not a sermon either. I must tell you a lovely story about it. There was a preacher with his disciples and every morning he used to give a sermon for ten minutes, quarter of an hour. And all the captive audience listened to it. (Laughter). And one day he gets on the rostrum and begins - just about to begin and a bird comes along, sits on the window sill and begins to sing. And the preacher doesn't say a word. At the end of ten minutes or five minutes, the bird after singing flies away. The preacher then says, "The sermon is over for this morning" - (Laughter). I wish I could say that too! (Laughter).

So the question now is, if you are serious enough to go into it:

whether it is possible to empty totally the whole content of ourselves, the content of our consciousness, this consciousness which has been built through time? Is it not possible - please listen to it - is it not possible to end one of the contents of your consciousness, your hurts, your psychological wound? Surely you know what that means. Most of us psychologically have been hurt from childhood, parents, cruel - our whole existence we are hurt. That is part of your consciousness. Can you end that hurt completely, totally wipe it out without leaving a mark? You can, can't you? If you pay attention to the wound, know what has caused it and the wound is the image you have about yourself that has been wounded, and end that image that is wounded - you can do that if you have gone into it very, very deeply. Or if you are attached to somebody, if you are attached to your wife or your husband, it doesn't matter what it is, attached to a belief, to a country, to a sect, to a group of people and so on, to Jesus and so on, can you not completely logically, sanely, rationally end it? Because you see attachment implies jealousy, anxiety, fear, pain, and having pain you become more and more and more attached - seeing the nature of attachment, the perception of attachment is the flowering of intelligence. That intelligence says, how stupid to be attached - it is finished. You understand this?

So go into it. Or you have a particular psychological habit, thinking always in a certain direction. That is part of your consciousness. Can thought move away from the groove, from the rut? Of course it can. So it is possible - please listen - it is possible to empty totally, completely the content. Now if you do it one by one, that is, attachment, your hurts, your anxiety and so on, it will take infinite time. See what is involved if you do it one by one, it will take time. So we are caught in time again. I wonder if you see this? Whereas is it possible to empty it without involving time instantly, as a whole, not parts? I'll show it to you, don't shake your head, or agree or disagree. Do you understand my question? When you do it part by part you are still involved in time. If you really see the truth of it then you won't do it partially - right? Naturally.

Then you move to a different question which is: can it be done in its entirety? That is, is there an observation of this consciousness which is not mine really, it is not my particular consciousness, it is the universal consciousness. My consciousness is like your consciousness, or somebody else's consciousness, because we suffer, we go through agonies, etc. etc. There may be a few who have said "Out" - they have flowered out and gone beyond, that is irrelevant.

So we are asking: is it possible to observe the thing in its entirety, wholly, and in the very observation of that totality the ending of it? You understand my question? So is it possible to observe your hurt, or your anxiety, or your guilt or whatever it is, totally? You understand my question? Suppose I have guilt. I feel guilty - which I don't, but suppose I do. Can I look at that guilt, how it arose, what was the reason for it and how I am dreading further and so on - the entire structure of guilt, can I observe it wholly? Of course you can - no? You can observe it only wholly when you are aware of the nature of being hurt. You can be aware of it and the guilt and so on, all the various things that we have collected, you can be aware of it if there is no direction or motive involved in that awareness. Have you understood this? I'll explain, I'll go into it.

Suppose I am attached to something or somebody: can I not observe what are the consequences of attachment, what is involved in attachment, how that attachment arose, can't I observe the whole nature of it instantly? I am attached because I am lonely, I want comfort, I want to depend on somebody because I can't stand by myself, I need companionship, I need somebody to tell me you are doing very well, old boy. I need somebody to hold my hand, I am depressed and anxious. So I depend on somebody and out of that dependence arises attachment and from that attachment arises fear, jealousy, anxiety - right? Can't I observe the whole nature of it instantly? Of course you can if you are aware, if you are deeply interested to find out.

So we are saying that instead of doing it piecemeal by piecemeal, it is possible to see the whole nature and the structure and the movement of consciousness with all its content. The content makes up the consciousness, and to see it entirely is possible. And when you see the entirety of it, it disintegrates.

The question then is - we are asking this question: as the content is part of our daily life of our consciousness, and that consciousness is the accumulation through time, whether that time can stop, which means is there an ending of all the struggles, you know, all the rest of it instantly? We say it is possible. I have shown it to you. It has been shown through examples. That is, to have a complete insight into the whole nature of consciousness - right? Insight means, implies without any motive, without any remembrance, just to have instant perception of the nature of consciousness and that very insight dissolves the problem. Have you understood this somewhat?

Then we can go to the next thing, which is: we are occupied with measure - right? I am tall, I am short. I must be different from what I am. Measure - you understand? Which is comparison, following an example. Our whole technological development is based on measure. If you had no measurement there could be no technological advance. That is, knowledge is movement in measure. I know, I shall know. It is all measurement. And that measurement has moved into the psychological field. Follow all this sir. Are you following? Watch yourself, how it works, you can see it very simply.

And so we are always comparing psychologically. Now can you end comparison, which is also the ending of time - right? Measure means measuring myself with somebody and wanting to be like that, or not like that. The positive and the negative process is a part, through comparison, of measurement. I wonder if you see? Are you getting tired? Go into it for yourself and you will see it.

So is it possible to live a daily life without any kind of comparison? You do compare two materials, one corduroy colour against another corduroy colour, but psychologically, inwardly to be free of comparison completely, which means to be free of measurement. Measurement is the movement of thought. So can thought come to an end? Do you follow all this? You see most of us try to stop thinking, try to, which is impossible. You may for a second say "I have stopped thinking" but it is forced, it is compelled, it is a form of saying "I have measured a second when I was not thinking". So we are asking something, which all the original real people who went into this question, who said, "Can thought come to an end?" That is, thought born from the known - you understand? - knowledge is the known, which is the past, can that thought come to an end? Can there be freedom from the known? Do you understand my question? Because we are always functioning from the known and therefore we have become extraordinarily capable and imitative, comparing, and this constant endeavour to be something - right? So can thought come to an end? Thought itself, when it is aware of itself, knows its limitation and therefore it has its place. I wonder? Are you doing all this while we are talking?

So we have talked about measurement, control, the importance of the senses and their right place - all this is part of meditation.

And we are asking next: when one has come to a certain point, the senses can develop extra sensory perception, because they become extraordinarily sensitive, telepathy, reads other people's thoughts, control various forms of clairvoyance and so on and so on. They are still within the field of the senses - right? So they have not this colossal importance that man is giving to them. Right? I wonder if you see this. The speaker has been through all this. Forgive me for entering personally, I have been through all this and one sees the danger of it, caught in all that sensory excitement, all that. It is stupid. So though these things there are definitely, but they are irrelevant.

We are asking now another question which is: man is always seeking power - right? The politicians, the priests, the everyday man and woman wants to dominate, wants to control, wants to possess. Power has become extraordinarily important. The two super powers. That means power in the hands of the few, to dictate what others should think - the Christian Church has done this excellently at one time. The heretics, the torture, the Inquisition and all that. Control man through propaganda, through books, through words, through images, controlling him through his fear and reward and punishment. Any form of dissent is either tortured, expelled, concentration camps, or burnt. Right? This is the history of man's stupidity, whether he calls it patriotic, religious. Now we are asking: is it possible to live without any sense of power? You understand what I am saying? Are you following all this, interested in all this? Which means, can you live in total anonymity and total humility? You may have a name, you may write a book, or talk, and be somewhat famous, notorious, whatever word you like to use, but nothing behind it. So we are not seeking power through clairvoyance, through telepathy, all this can be used by governments to control the captain in the submarine - they are all experimenting with this. For god's sake be aware of all this. And can one live without any sense of power? You know there is great beauty in that, to be totally anonymous. And the whole world is seeking identity, power, position.

Now the next question is: can the brain - please listen to this - can the brain, which is millions and millions of years old, so heavily conditioned, so full of all that man has collected through centuries, and therefore it is acting mechanically all the time, can that brain be free from the known, and can that brain never, never get old - old in the sense physically? Do you understand what I am talking about? Don't you ask these questions? Do you? Perhaps you do when you get old, when you are somewhat incapacitated, when you have lost your capacity to think, you are losing your memory and then you say, "My god, I wish I could go back and be young again, to have a fresh mind, a young mind, a decisive mind" - don't you ask this sometimes? Whether this brain can lose its burden and be free and never deteriorate? Don't say "Yes" or "No", find out. Which means - please listen if you are interested in this - which means never psychologically register anything - right? Do you understand? Never to register the flattery, the insult, the various forms of impositions, pressures, never. To keep the tape completely fresh. Then it is young. Innocence means a brain that has never been wounded - right? That is innocence, that knows no misery, conflict, sorrow, pain, all that, which is all registered in the brain and therefore it is always limited, old as it grows physically older. Whereas if there is no recording whatsoever, psychologically, then the brain becomes extraordinarily quiet, extraordinarily fresh. This is not a hope, this is not a reward, either you do it and discover it, or you just accept words and say, "How marvellous that must be" - "I wish I could experience that" - and you are off the mark. Whereas if you do it you will find out.

So the brain then becomes, because of this insight, which we have talked about, because of that insight the brain cells undergo a change. It is no longer holding to memories. It is no longer the house of vast collected antiquity - right? So that is that.

Then also we must ask the question: is there anything sacred in life? Is there anything that is holy, untouched by thought? Do you understand my question? Please understand the question itself. That which is holy, sacred, we have put them in the churches as symbols - the Virgin Mary, the Christ on the cross - and go to India, there they have their particular images, go to Buddhist countries they have their own images, and that has become sacred, the name, the sculpture, the image, the symbol. In certain places, churches, temples and so on, in the mosques - naturally there are no images in the mosques but lovely writing, which has become an image also.

Now we are asking a question: is there anything sacred in life? Sacred being that which is deathless, timeless, from eternity to eternity, that which has no beginning and no end - do you understand? We are asking this. You can only find that out - no, you can't find it out, nobody can find it out - it may come when you have discarded all the things that thought has made sacred - the pictures, the museums, the music, the churches and their beliefs, their rituals, their dogmas, all that is understood and discarded completely. There is no priest, no guru, no follower. Then in that tremendous quality of silence you may find out - in that silence there may come something that is not touched by thought, because that silence is not created by thought.

So one has to question, go into the whole nature of silence. There is silence between two noises, there is silence between two thoughts, there is silence between two notes in music, there is silence after noise, there is silence when thought says, "I must be silent" and creates that artificial silence and thinking that is real silence. There is silence when you sit quietly and force your mind to be silent. All those are artificial silences, they are not real, deep, uncultivated, unpremeditated silence. We said silence can only come psychologically when there is no registration whatsoever. Then the mind, the brain itself is utterly without movement. Then in that great depth of silence, not induced, not cultivated, not practised but in that silence there may come that extraordinary sense of something immeasurable, nameless. This whole movement from the beginning to the end of these talks is part of meditation. Finished.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST SEMINAR MEETING 12TH SEPTEMBER 1978

Krishnamurti: I believe we are going to talk over together the question of what is the meaning of being a light to yourself - what is the meaning of being a light to yourself. If you don't like that subject we can change it to something else that you want. And I think it would be good if I may suggest that we all talk, not one or two of us talk, but each one of us share in the discussion or in the talk. Is that all right? All of us take part in it.

So do you want to discuss that, or any other subject, that is, be a light to yourself. I believe I have said that before so it was suggested that we talk about that. If that is not what you want we can talk about something else.

Questioner: What does it mean to be a light to oneself?

K: That's what we are going to discuss, we are going to go into it, if that is what you want to talk over. May I set the ball rolling and then we can... please this is not a talk, or a sermon, by me, but rather we are all going to partake or share in our discussions, so each one of us, if I may most respectfully suggest that we all talk, each one of us expressing what we want to say, contradicting each other, doubting each other, questioning each other to find out the truth of whatever we are saying, not only the speaker but all of us. So may I start the ball rolling?

I think most of us are slaves, either to religious concepts, beliefs and symbols, or to some kind of experience, or slaves to institutions, and concepts. And being prisoners to all that how can one be a light to oneself? You understand? I am just starting it. If one is committed to a certain pattern of life, a certain way of living, if one is a businessman or a scientist, or a philosopher, one is caught in that, one becomes completely absorbed in it and the rest of life flows by. We are concerned in our discussion with the whole of life, not just one part, one segment, or one particular tendency, or one's profession. So does one realize, including myself, that one is caught in a routine, which naturally prevents freedom. We can discuss what freedom is, we can go into all that. It prevents freedom and so one can never be clear in oneself. One can never understand the depth of oneself, or when one is dependent on something one cannot be a light to oneself. That is the general outline, we can go very much into detail, and we should, if you want.

So that is what we are proposing to discuss whether the human mind, our mind, your mind and my mind, can be completely free from all institutions, from all the impositions, the pressures of religions, their symbols, their ideologies, their theories, and their dogmas, all of that is superstition, can one be free of that completely? That's one point.

Then can one be completely free from the imposition of language? Language drives us, shapes our thinking, forces us to a certain course of action. So is one aware of that, and be free of being a slave to language? We can go into all this.

The next question: can one be free of ideologies and so on, because all these make our minds narrow, limited, prisoners to society, to social environment, economics and so on and so on. If that is so, how can one be a light to oneself? Do we discuss this, or do you want to talk about something else?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I think we all heard that, I don't have to repeat it. Right. How do we start discussing this thing, exploring it in ourselves, not exploring some other person. How can I explore myself, understand the depth of myself, without understanding how one's mind has become slavish, dependent and so on?

Q: Does the way we are educated, does it make our minds slavish?

K: Does education, the way we are educated, does it make our minds slavish, conforming, accepting the pattern, or establishing a new establishment and becoming a slave to that, and so on.

Q: Well a certain part of education is conditioning itself.

K: Go into it sir. I don't know how to discuss this matter or go into it, find out, sir, first, if that is what you want to discuss. I am not imposing what we should discuss but that was just suggested. But if there is something better than that please put it forward and we can go into it.

Q: Can we ask the question, what is the instrument of enquiry because there seems a contradiction between not knowing and enquiring. Enquiring always seems to be some sort of direction, a means to something. What is this contradiction?

K: What is the instrument of discussion which is capable of discussion. Is that it?

Q: He is asking what is the instrument of enquiry.

K: Yes, what is the state of the mind, or thought, or what you like, that can freely enquire. Right? What is your state, sir? Don't ask me. Find out, what is your state of mind that is capable of enquiry?

Q: When you talk about the state of mind...

K: Stick to one thing, sir, don't - we have understood the meaning of that word. What is your state of mind that says, I must enquire, that wishes to enquire?

Q: Krishnaji, could be go into exactly what you mean by being a light to yourself. Does it mean simply being free of words, and being free of institutions?

K: No, it means...

Q: Or is there more?

K: Doesn't it mean that we depend on the light of others. Right? The Christian world has been conditioned, for example, that Jesus and so on, that person will be your salvation, so you are relying on that person, idealized, made divine by the priests and so on and so on, to depend for one's salvation - I am using the old fashioned word which we will explore - to depend on an external agency for our freedom from sorrow, pain, anxiety, and so on and so on. The church, the Catholic church has done that, the Hindus have their own pattern of thinking, so have the Tibetans, so have the Buddhists and so on. Along the same pattern, only a different set of words, different set of phrases, different symbols and so on, but always depending on external agency, thinking that external agency is different from us. We have created the external agency, the outside agency. So we have divided ourselves from that and say, that will save me from my anxiety, fear, sorrow and all the rest of it. We have created that. Right? And having separated ourselves from that then we say, how am I going to be saved - in quotes. So can one be free completely from external agency for all that - for happiness, for enlightenment, whatever words we like to use.

Q: Sir, but surely nowadays many people will say that they don't believe in god, so they reject that, so they have no obvious external agency.

K: Then if you reject the outside agency, in what manner, how will you free yourself, in what manner will you be free from all your entanglements, from all your sorrows, pain and so on, if you don't depend on anybody, including K, including the speaker?

Q: Sir, I think many people have independence of their god.

K: No, either that freedom is intellectual, theoretically accepted, or actually one has put that aside completely.

Q: Would being a light to oneself give you freedom?

K: I haven't understood. Please answer her, don't wait on me, discuss it.

Q: I don't think he means freedom as opposed to anything else - opposed to political freedom, or non-freedom, just freedom per se.

Q: Surely we are talking about freedom which is deeper than political freedom.

K: No. First of all is it possible to act rightly, accurately, truly without any guidance from outside? You follow my question? To think very clearly inwardly and outwardly, and act outwardly, without any imposition, without any pressure.

Q: What usually happens when somebody hears that is that if you realize you don't want to be a slave to a guidance from outside, you think OK I will have my inner guidance.

K: First of all if you hear that and reject that, and then depend on your inner guidance, what does that mean?

Q: Well you feel like you want to gather more experience and formalise your concepts about life.

K: Which comes to the same thing.

Q: Yes.

K: Eventually - when you reject the outer as your guide you must also reject the inner as your guide.

Q: Yes, so can we go into that?

K: It becomes very complex, that's why I want to explore it, if you will.

Q: Also, sir, it is also complex in the sense that most people, many people today would say that they have no guide. Or they would not think in those terms of having an outer guide or an inner guide. They simply go on living.

K: Therefore if you reject the outer god and the inner god, and then what?

Q: Obviously they live a very confused life.

K: Yes, so, live confused, unhappy and all the rest of it. Is that we are doing, what you are doing? Surely this is...

Q: We have your words.

K: Ah! Throw those out. You don't have my words, throw them out.

Q: I was going to say that.

Q: We have your words.

K: No, sir, then you become prisoner of those words.

Q: If I stand up and I say, well I am going to throw away everything, all my dependencies, all my external relations, my crutches, everything I have used to get to where I am and go by myself into the world...

K: You can't.

Q:... what am I left with?

K: Nothing! Intellectually you have nothing left. If you intellectually reject, verbally say, well I have got rid of the church, I have got rid of god, I have got rid of Jesus, I have got rid of Krishna, I have got rid of the Buddha, I have got rid of this and that, including Jehovah, then have you done it intelligently or merely verbally.

Q: How can I do it intelligently?

K: That is what we are trying to find out. When I see something dangerous, stupid, can't I see the danger and the stupidity of it and discard it - which is the awakening of intelligence.

Q: If I see something that is hurting me...

K: Not you, not only you, humanity.

Q: Well, yes, humanity itself.

K: Which is part of you. Humanity is...

Q: Which is part of me.

K: Therefore?

Q: Then I have to throw it away.

K: No. Not 'have to'. Do you...

Q: If I don't I am crazy.

K: Probably we are.

Q: We are.

Q: It is not an intellectual process. If it is an intellectual process, it's not discarding, it just stays in the mind. When you see the truth of something you don't say whether you have finished with it or not, you either have in fact, or you haven't, it doesn't become an intellectual question.

K: Yes, sir, that's just it. Is this what you want to talk about? Please. Or do you want to talk about something else? Do you want to talk about your personal problems?

Q: That is a personal problem.

K: Wait, sir. You have said it. Do you want to talk over your personal problems, or personal problems but make it impersonal, put it that way.

Q: The great thing is, sir, that it is a personal problem but it is everybody's problem.

K: May I suggest something? Can we ask the right question? What do you mean by 'right', and what do you mean by 'question'? The right question will inevitably bring about the right answer. But if we ask a wrong question, that wrong question evaporates into nothingness. So can we ask the right question which will awaken our own intelligence, our own native perception? I don't know how to put all this into words.

All right, let's begin with something. Are we sceptical?

Q: Generally only when things are bad.

K: Or have we a quality of doubt which is not cynical, which is not born out of bitterness, or negligence, but a capacity to question. Not fanciful questions, not romantic questions, but questions about the way we live, the way we think, our actions, question the whole of our existence, as we live. Have you got the capacity to do that? Can we begin with that at least? The way we live, our actions which have become mechanical, our feelings, our reactions, our fears, our pleasures, the whole of our existence, can we question the way we live. Can we begin with that? What would you like to begin with, for god's sake?

Q: One thing struck me, you mentioned that we are a slave of institutions, and all these questions, there should be one about the nature of us which makes us become a slave.

K: Tunki, we are old friends. Do you realize the way you live - I am not being personal - do you question the way of your living, of your life, what you are doing, why you think this, why you feel that, why you have certain reactions, sexual and otherwise, do you question the whole thing, do you? Or do you just trot along in your old pattern which you have established for yourself, or a pattern which your father, your grandfather, your environment, has said, do this, and you follow that?

Q: I think that basically we follow most of the time because we have fear of making mistakes.

K: Before you awaken to fear do you question the way of your life? Do I question my way of life? I talk everywhere, do I question it, or do I say, it is part of my routine, I have done it for fifty, sixty years, and I'll carry on. Or do I say, my god, what am I doing? What am I doing?

Q: Sir, I think people generally don't question.

K: At all. Partly, when it suits them.

Q: I think their minds are mainly concerned with physical survival.

K: Yes, so can we here, the first day, learn the art of questioning.

Q: Wouldn't it be better to say, or question what is stopping you from getting out of that rut.

K: No, no. I want to learn the art of questioning myself. There is art in it, isn't there. I must do it the right way, or the wrong way. There must be a way of questioning that awakens the whole nature and structure of myself. The way I look at it, the way I understand it, the way I see the whole operation in movement, I must question it.

Q: Why must there be a way?

K: Why must I question.

Q: No, why must there be a way? Why must there be an art of questioning? You said there must be an way of questioning, why must there?

K: Of course, if I put a wrong question to myself I won't find out - I'll have a wrong response. No?

Q: You mean I'll only respond to pain.

K: No, sir, not only to pain. Isn't there an art in the way you walk? Isn't there an art in the way you talk, you know? So mustn't one learn the art of questioning, or not questioning, but the art of observing - if you like to put it that way.

Q: Is there an art of seeing that you ask bad questions?

K: Oh, yes it can become a lovely art too.

Q: You are saying that there is an art to questioning, to ask the right question.

K: Sir, does it appeal to you to find out? To find out together the right way of questioning so that out of that questioning intelligence can arise? Intelligence. Can we do that? I don't know how to push this heavy weight.

Q: What is the question without motivation?

K: I can't hear.

Q: Without motivation.

K: Well, let's find out. If I have a motivation in questioning I have already directed my questioning. Right? I've already set a line according to which I will question. Therefore I shall never put the right question if I have a motive. So I have to go into it and say, have I a motive in questioning. Or in observing, or in listening to myself, listening to what is going on around me and the world and everything.

Q: Isn't wanting to find out a motive?

K: No, no, that's not a motive. I see in my enquiring, in observing, if I have a motive I have set a direction. Right? So I can never be free to discover the right observation if I have set a course. So if I see that then I am already intelligent, am I not. Somewhat intelligence. So it's dropped. Isn't this clear?

Q: You can ask a question. Experiment. You can say, I am going to ask a question to myself which has a motive in it and see what happens when I have a motive.

K: That's right.

Q: Then find out what it is to ask a question without a motive.

K: That's right, do it. Let's do it now. Have I a motive in my questioning, in my observation? I see in my observation what the religions - I am taking that as an example, I'll expand it much more - I see what religions have done, they have enslaved man. Right? Do I see it because I am antagonistic against Jesus, or the Pope, or some reason for which I say, that's nonsense? Or is it so, independent of me, independent of my prejudices? Or go to India, they have all these enormous superstitions, like the Catholics, like everybody else. And have I thrown those away because I have accepted other forms of superstitions, which are more pleasing, and therefore I have got rid of the Hindu superstitions. But my question is, have I got rid of all superstition? Have I seen the nature of superstition, how superstition arises, fear, reward, punishment, hell and heaven - hell and heaven has been going on for millennia. Right? All this we all know, historically. So am I free of one superstition, one set of superstitions, and fall into another? Or have I superstitions in myself? You follow?

Q: To look at one superstition, or one motivation, is quite easy, but if we are trying to look at the nature of superstition itself or the nature of motivation itself that is quite different.

K: Which is the nature of superstition: I am frightened, I want to be comforted, I want some external agency to help me.

Q: But what is that process by which - or how is it that a person can go from looking at a single example of something like superstition to seeing all superstition?

K: Do you see what is superstition? Let's understand what do we mean by that word superstition?

Q: Belief.

K: Which means what, belief in something which you hope to be true.

Q: Hope or suspect or fear.

K: Yes, hope, that will give you comfort, that will protect you, that will help you to get over certain fears and so on. Right? Which is, thought invented some kind of figure, some kind of agency outside yourself which will help you. And all the complications of it. And when you see how absurd, how nonsensical it is, which is superstition, that nonsense you see in every form of religion.

Q: But, sir, isn't there a possibility of a deception in that. For instance the mind may take it as a fact that a certain scientific something is true, and you base your action according to that because you are healthier; but how does the mind perceive a fact in the external world and see the difference between that and a superstition which you have also been told by someone that it is a fact - I don't know what - that you don't do something on the 13th of the month, or whatever the superstition is, how does the mind make a perception between them.

K: Yes, I understand that question. Please answer her, I don't have to answer her.

Q: It is a very basic, I think, human difficulty in this notion of saying religion, there is a sense of divination, people have said that certain things were real. Now the mind either says, oh yes, it must be so and accepts it, or says, no. But how do we draw the line between perception of the fact and perception of something that has great authority in other people's lives.

K: Answer her, please.

Q: I think if you have a scientific education then your judgement will be based on that fact is non-verifiable, but you cannot verify the existence of god therefore there is no reason to believe in god, that would be the scientific answer to that problem. There would be no reason to believe in god if you had received a modern education because it is a non-scientific fact - not a fact - it is a non-scientific premise, supposition.

K: Science also can be mistaken.

Q: Of course. But in answer to that particular problem, many people today would say that god does not exist, or they would say it is stupid to have superstitious.

K: Galileo, you know, Galileo says the earth goes round the sun, and the church said that is a heresy, we will burn you. He said, all right, all right, the earth doesn't go round the sun, but I believe it, I know it. And before that they believed the earth stood still and the sun went round it.

Q: But that doesn't change anything because Galileo was right.

K: No, but you follow. Mrs Zimbalist is asking how do you differentiate between fact and superstition.

Q: Well...

K: Wait. Find out, I want to be clear for myself, I am trying to think it out for myself what she said. The fact and the idea. Right? Let's put it that way. The fact and the idea about the fact. Go slowly. Don't jump on me. Don't jump on me yet, go slowly. The idea about the fact, and the fact itself without the idea. Is there such a state?

Q: Well the fact is seen...

K: Don't answer, find out. Say for instance, I am frightened, fear - is that an idea, or is it a fact? If it is an idea it is a superstition.

Q: Then there is no...

K: You are not examining sir, find out.

Q: Sir, something goes on, and we call it fear. Perhaps the calling it fear is the idea.

K: That's what we are saying.

Q: But something is actually going on, which is a fact. But somehow we take from facts - we give more credence to the name that we give the fact than what is actually going on. Even with what Mrs Zimbalist said I think in science we take many things as facts which may be just working hypothesis.

K: Quite, quite, that's it. Can I differentiate the word from the fact? Knowing the door is not the word. If I cling to the word and worship the word I am living in superstition, I have moved away from the fact.

Q: But most of us have to live our daily lives surrounded by facts unverifiable by us.

K: Yes.

Q: So there is a margin in there of everyday life.

K: That certainly. But I am talking about the facts about oneself, not whether the moon is made of cheese or rocks and all the rest of it, but I am concerned whether I am living in a world of make-believe, superstition, in a world that has been imposed on me, which I have invented, and then in turn have been a slave to that, I want to find out that. That is, I want to enquire into facts as they are.

Q: Well, I can see that some facts, I can see that I do live in a world like that, but I only see the particular. You see, I see particular fears, or particular superstitions, but I don't see all of fear, or all of superstition. And that is a jump to go from the particular to the general.

K: Now wait a minute, Scott, do you question why you don't see the whole nature and structure of fear? Or do you say, I don't see, I only see part of it, not the whole of it? Do you question why you don't see it?

Q: Yes.

K: When you ask me why don't I see it, you are depending on me.

Q: I have questioned why I don't see it.

K: You might have questioned casually, you might have questioned wrongly, or you might say, it is terribly important that I find this out.

Q: Isn't it connected with authority actually, psychologically?

K: Yes, yes.

Q: The superstition and so-called scientific fact are based on authority, some verifiable and some not.

K: Sir, I can't verify what the moon is made of. Right? The scientists and the astronauts and all the rest of it have told me what it is. All right, yes it is made of rocks, or dead earth, or whatever it is. All right, why should I believe or not believe, I don't know. Maybe. Like those people who believe intensely in flying saucers - they come to me and say, do you believe in it, I say, I don't know. But to me we are moving away from the most relevant facts, which is the world I live in, the actions I do, the way I think, feel, all that I am concerned with, which doesn't mean I am selfish, that I disregard the world. I am concerned because I am the world. The world is not different from me, I am the world.

Q: There seems to be hierarchical ideas, that some things are more important. The idea that the moon is made of rocks may be more voracious than the idea that there are flying saucers, or it may not be. And aren't religions like that, essentially they have said something quite high about human existence, and we hear them, and we don't know whether it is true or not but it is important that somebody has said that.

K: Yes, I understand. But is it that one is more and more dependent, looking outwardly - you follow, sir - the baby is born out of a tube, the moon, astronauts and all that is going on around us is so tremendously interesting, and may be tremendously dangerous, and we are fascinated by all that and so we forget about ourselves, our world, our life. And I say, for god's sake that exists, let's come back here. From here we can go out there and perhaps do something about it.

Q: But it seems important for me to know that things are made of patterns, and made of tiny particles of energy so that one knows with one's mind that creation exists out of energy. That seems to change things, one isn't taken in by the senses.

Q: Sir, are you saying that we concern ourselves with these questions outwardly just in order to escape looking at ourselves?

K: Maybe, maybe.

Q: I know I find it very hard to hold to what is actually going on.

K: I mean you pick up a newspaper every morning, if you read it, and you read what is happening everywhere, the floods in India, the butchery in the Korean war, this, that, you know, and you say, my god, I've spent the whole morning, and you go off to your job, again something else, and come back, and again the evening news, and keep living eternally, until you die, out there. Is that what we are doing?

Q: If you read the paper in the morning, you can be aware that you are responding to what you are reading.

K: Quite right, sir, quite right. I understand. Mrs Zimbalist's question was, how do I differentiate the fact, the actuality and superstition, something non-fact. If I live in make-believe, non-fact, it is inevitably superstition - that somebody is going to save me, which the whole of Christendom is based on. Then I live in appalling superstition, because I have created that Jesus. I don't know if you follow all this.

Q: Krishnaji, is it how you differentiate between the fact and superstition, isn't it in the way you approach it? If you say there is a fact and you accept it because some authority says so.

K: Of course, of course. All right. Let's find out. How do you approach any problem, human problem, I think it applies to the scientific too, how do you approach any problem?

Q: We can only look without motive.

K: No, how do you approach it, sir? One can - how do you actually approach a problem? If you are a scientist, how do you approach it? Your problem in science, in physics, in that and so on, how do you approach it, what is the quality of your mind that approaches a problem, whether it be scientific, business, a problem of relationship and so on, how do you come to it?

Q: By questioning.

K: No. Find out, sir, find out how you approach it.

Q: Well I begin to ask questions about it, that's what I do.

K: Is that the way to approach it?

Q: If you are bringing whatever competence you have in that field to it, otherwise you can't even enter the field.

K: Maria, I am asking a question, you are not... I am sorry I am not making myself clear then. Suppose I have a problem, one has a problem of relationship. One quarrels with one's wife, or with one's husband, or girl, a problem in relationship, how do you approach that problem?

Q: Look at it. You stay with it.

K: No, no. How do you come to it, sir? If you say, stay with it - that's one approach.

Q: But I want to explain what I mean. You asked how I come to a problem. Do you want me to sit here and look at in myself. I am aware of how I come to a problem. Do you want me to speak out and say how I come to a problem?

K: Go ahead, go ahead.

Q: If I come to a problem with relationship I am aware of the response, the response that comes about after that relationship or that contact has taken place. It comes into my mind, I see that there has been a problem.

K: That's right.

Q: So I stay with it.

K: Stay with it, I understand. Now how does another approach it?

Q: I approach it with a feeling that there is something that I can do.

K: Yes. So you see, one says I approach it with a mind that says I won't escape from it, I will look at it, I will stay with it; the other says I can do something about it. And so how does each one of us approach any of these problems? Isn't it important to find out our approach.

Q: I think first of all we have to be clear of the problem.

K: I am not talking of the problem.

Q: No, no, I mean approaching, when there is a problem you...

K: Look, Tunki, old boy, I am asking you, how do you approach a problem - approach, not the problem. How do you come to it?

Q: I think if we set our self aside, if the ego says, the problem is separate from me, and we make a separation between that problem and our self, it is an ego that is approaching.

K: Yes, all right. So you are saying I approach the problem, I approach realizing the problem is not different from me. That's your approach, approach, not the problem. Am I making this clear, or am I dumb?

Q: Krishnaji, I think this is a false distinction to make between the approach to the problem and the problem.

K: No. All right. State your case, sir. Go on.

Q: Well I think it might be a wrong question initially to say how would you approach the problem, because as far as I am concerned personally my initial awareness is how I become aware of the problem. How do I know it is a problem. I use some kind of benchmark, something is not right, I say, feel in myself, something is incomplete.

K: Sir, there is this whole world around us, right, of which I am a part. Right? I have created this monstrous society of which I am part. Right? Right, sir?

Q: Yes.

K: Now I know it exists there because I am part of it, it is there. I am not talking about the problem at all. I say, how do I look at it, how do I approach it, how do I - what is my mind, or the state of my mind when I look at it, knowing the problem is not different from me, and all the rest of it. Is this difficult?

Q: An open mind without prejudice.

K: Now what do you mean by an open mind?

Q: A mind which is not burdened by any thoughts.

K: So you mean a mind that is not burdened by opinions, by one's own accumulated knowledge, one is not approached by fear. So are you - not being personal, sir - are you free from fear, personal prejudice and opinions and conclusions so that you are approaching it, approaching whatever the problem is, that thing, freely?

Q: How can you approach any problem, free of the problem, without any knowledge at all?

K: What?

Q: Without knowledge. How can one approach something without any knowledge?

K: No, no. Do I approach the fear that I have with previous knowledge of fears? I am asking a question, please answer me. Is this so? Do I approach the present fear with the memories, remembrances of other forms of fear which I have had in the past, which have become memories, with that memory approach the present fear? Just answer me that question. Do we do this, which is natural.

Q: We do.

K: Now wait a minute. If we do, then are we approaching it rightly? That's all I am asking. What one does may be right, but I am questioning whether it is right.

Q: It seems it is clearly not right, but is it possible to approach without the past?

K: You are asking a question: is it possible to approach the problem of fear as though for the first time, without the remembrance of other fears which you have had. Whom are you asking? General assembly? Ask them.

Q: All of us together.

Q: I think when we have a problem there is no space, our mind is stuck to the problem. When there is space there is some seeing.

K: I have asked a question, madam, which is, we generally approach a particular fear with the remembrance of other fears. That's all. If we could stay with that for a minute and examine whether that resolves the problem of fear. Or is it possible to approach without the past remembrances of fear and can that be done? If it cannot be done, it is nonsense.

Q: The fact that we have fear is already an operation of the past.

K: Yes, so are you...

Q: How can it be that you observe it without the remembrance?

K: Ask her. She has listened to me for a number of years, ask her to answer you. I can take a rest! Good. I'll help you. You teach English, so teach him.

Q: All right, I'll...

K: Teach her, tell her, sir. You've escaped, I am coming back to you.

Q: Approaching the problem of fear and you are asking yourself what is fear, how do I recognize fear, what do I call fear. You look at what you call fear, and you feel what the fear is, what you name as fear, and if you stay with it with real interest to learn about it, you could find, or should find, or may find that the thought or the idea will separate from the feeling and then you are with the feeling and you stay with that. And then you come to the point of saying, who is observing this feeling, what is this that is looking at this feeling. Then there is something, the dissipation of fear.

K: Tunki, you answer it, I am keeping out of this.

Q: While your idea is there, thought is there, there is a separation - fear is in that separation.

K: Please.

Q: If you have got a feeling of fear and you look at that feeling, you stay with the feeling so that there is nothing but the feeling, what else is there but the feeling.

Q: What is looking at the feeling? What is aware of the feeling?

Q: Nothing. There is the sensation of feeling.

Q: There's something looking at it. You have got to find out what is looking at the feeling, that's the separation, that's where the feeling comes in.

K: Quite right, sir.

Q: Wanting to do something about it

Q: There's something looking at the feeling, there's something observing the feeling, and when that is seen - well, you just ask the question then, what is looking at the feeling, and then there is a different state altogether. Then is there a separation? And you find the separation is the looking at the feeling, being separate from it. This is where it is a bit hard to explain, you have to do it. You have to actually see that the thought and the feeling are separate. Then you live with the feeling, looking at the feeling as it is, not running away from it, you are looking at the feeling, then what is looking at the feeling.

Q: I don't understand what you mean by thought and feeling are separate.

Q: I am not going to be able to explain that. Krishnaji is much better.

K: That's a dirty trick!

Q: You just have to do it.

Q: I don't really understand what you mean. When the mind hasn't moved off from it, which is what usually happens, it doesn't stay with it and it moves on to something else outside. But when I have been able to do it I see that they are not separate because if I think something the feeling is there too, it comes immediately. I don't see them as two separate things but rather thought/feeling is happening at once.

Q: You can experience the feeling without a thought. You can experience the feeling on its own without a thought, then you are just stuck with what is looking at the feeling.

K: Sir, if I may ask, are you helping me - helping in quotes, after all no authority - are you trying to help me to look at fear properly? Is that what you are trying to do?

Q: Yes.

K: Now, you have told me something that there is no separation and so on, is that an idea to me or an actuality which I realize?

Q: Are you asking me that question?

K: I am asking generally. I have heard you say this, I realize what you are saying, perhaps there is truth in this. And do I listen to find out the idea of it, or do I listen to find out if it is actually me. You follow what I am saying? Have I listened to you, made an abstraction of what you have said, which becomes an idea? Or what you are saying is immediately applicable in myself? Is that applicability taking place in me? Now which is that we are doing now? All of us. Are we making an abstraction of it, an idea of it; or, yes, it is so, so, by Jove, I realize what I have done - I have separated myself from fear, I am acting upon it, which is I see the falseness of it, and that fear is me. Is that a fact to me, or is it an idea to me? You follow, sir? If it is an idea then I am lost. Then I enter into all kinds of theories, superstitions, you know, I play with the words. But if it is so then, that I am not separate from fear, what takes place in me? So are we dealing with ideas, conclusions and theories, or, as Mrs Zimbalist wanted to know, with facts and not with theories?

Now I want to find out how I approach this, you follow? Whether I am living, actually realizing or theory. Now these are the two facts, they are both facts. Right? Conclusions, theories, beliefs, and facts. Now how do I see this thing in myself, how do I approach it? Sorry if I labour that point. How do I approach it, this question, am I making theories of it, verbalizing it, intellectually saying, yes, a marvellous idea, and trotting off in that direction, or do I say, now let me look? Right? Let me look, which is I am approaching it. You follow sir? I have discarded that, I see the stupidity of what I have done, making a theory of it. Now if I don't make a theory of it then I am with the fact. Which is, I have separated myself from that. Is that so? Or am I still playing with words?

Now leave fear for the moment. Let's take something else. That may help to kind of widen this thing. Do I realize that I am the total of humanity, the totality of humanity? Not the theory of it, you follow, sir, not the verbal idea that I am the world, but the actual feeling, the real state that I am, as a human being, I represent the whole of mankind - which we can go into. Because mankind suffers, mankind goes through all kinds of illusions, pressures, agonies, and all the rest of it, and so do I, so does every human being. So the world is me. Is that a theory, a lovely idea, an emotional, romantic, you follow, all that nonsense, or is it an actual fact in my life?

Q: Well I can understand that intellectually, but...

K: Wait. The moment you say, I can understand intellectually, what do you mean by that? You mean you understand verbally. You understand the English language which you and I speak, perhaps I speak badly, but we understand the language and you say, intellectually I grasp it.

Q: It is the whole idea, it is so. The whole idea is true but I don't feel it.

K: But is it so?

Q: Yes. Intellectually it is true, but I don't feel that way.

K: The moment you say 'intellectually' you are merely accepting the words. And 'intellectually I understand' becomes rather, you know, arrogant, rather silly.

Q: How do we recognize whether we understand or not?

K: No. I am asking about this one thing: do you see actually the reality of it or the idea of it?

Q: How can we see whether we perceive an idea of it, or we perceive the actuality itself?

K: All right. How do you listen to this statement? How do you listen to it actually? Tell me, how do you listen to it. Or anybody listens to it. There is a statement made.

Q: Well, sometimes it is are you the world, or what have you, and I say...

K: Not 'what have I'.

Q: Or whatever the statement.

K: No, sir, I'll make it clear. Every human being, it doesn't matter where they are, psychologically, inwardly, they go through exactly - more or less - the same thing as you do. They suffer, they are uncertain, they run away from family, they dislike their mother, they love their father, there is separation, there is pain - everybody goes through this. That's the common factor of mankind. Right?

You may say, that is not so, all right let's talk about it.

Q: No, I haven't said that.

K: Wait. This person has stated that, a statement has been made, whether it is true or false we will discuss. How do you listen to it? That is, how do you approach it, how do you look at it? Does my brother suffer like me, actual brother? Does my father go through the same agony that I am going through? Does that man in India go through the same thing that I am? Perhaps a little variation, but basically, fundamentally the common factor of mankind, whether he lives in Jerusalem, or in Mecca, or in Moscow, or in Washington, here, there, anywhere, it is the common thing. No?

Q: Can I realize that everyone is going through exactly the same thing as I am?

K: Aren't they?

Q: Can I realize whether they are or not?

K: Find out, sir.

Q: Not by thinking about it, but by feeling it.

K: No, but seeing the fact.

Q: Feeling it the whole time.

K: Seeing in the sense, this is so. Whether you live in France or somewhere else, you are a human being, with all the things that are going on inside you. And the man living in Spain has the same agony going on inside him. And we say this is the common factor of mankind. Therefore mankind is me.

Q: The division and isolation continues.

K: It won't continue the moment it is a reality. How can you say, I am isolated? I am the world, all this thing that I have created. So that's why I have been asking how do you listen to this statement? What does it mean to your mind, to your heart, to your feelings, what does it mean when you make a statement of that kind? Do I intellectually argue about it, rationalize it, tear it pieces, is this so, is it not so, it is partly, it is not partly, and so on and so on? Or do I immediately test the depth of it?

Q: I doubt if you will ever get an answer to that question. If I ask why the sun is out there, nobody is going to answer.

K: First of all, do you doubt that statement, do you say, what nonsense you are talking about? I am different from my brother, I am different from that Arab, filthy, ugly, uneducated, I am educated, I have been to Oxford, I have been to Harvard, I have been to this or that, I have got a good business, and there is that filthy little man in India who is nothing at all, I am certainly different from him.

Q: Am I?

K: I am questioning, sir. Are we judging these differences by education, by clothes, by dirt, by having a bigger house, lesser house, outwardly? Or are we saying, look, I know I am different, that man is not educated, I am educated, but he has the same poverty in himself? You follow, sir? The same sense of isolation, frustration, all that, as me. Apparently you don't see this. If you do then a totally different thing takes place. If you don't, I say, what am I to do, rationalize it, explain it ten different ways. I am willing.

Q: I can see when I look at other people's behaviour and talk to them and so on, how we have the same problems, the same emotions.

K: Exactly.

Q: And yet it doesn't make me feel responsible.

K: So does it mean your isolation, your egotism, your sense of importance is so colossal, consciously or unconsciously, that you say, that is not me?

Q: Or do we really see it in ourselves? I think perhaps it is easier to see it in somebody else, but do I - most of the time I am not even aware of the complex problems, I mean I cover them up so easily.

K: Sir, is it also that we like to identify with something greater? A professor, a marvellous engineer, or the admiral, you know something tremendous, we think powerful, and poor little chap down there in the street, throw him out.

Q: Well, that doesn't come into for me.

K: No, I am just saying, I am asking, is this what you do. Identify with something ennobling, powerful, prestigious, or the little man.

Q: But he is doing that and so am I.

K: So that goes on. So you are like that poor little man, empty inside, insufficient and all the rest of it, and so is the admiral, probably. I don't know how to convey this. Why don't you see this? Not see it verbally, intellectually, ideas and so on, but why don't you actually see it? What's wrong? Either it is wrong, what I am saying is totally wrong. You have every right to say, what nonsense you are talking about. And if you say it is not nonsense then why don't you see the thing actually, as a fact?

Q: It is a fact, Krishnaji, but it doesn't seem to do away with the fact that our whole existence is based on separatism.

K: Yes, sir, that is egotism, your arrogance, your sense of 'look, I am powerful', I assert myself, so you more and more emphasize yourself, give importance to yourself and so you refuse to see what is taking place. So what will make you, or help you to see the truth of it? Knock on the head? Drug? Pain, suffering? Man has been through all that, and yet we keep this thing going.

Q: It is all probably the self.

K: No, if it is so, does the self exist in the sense that we have given it importance. You follow my question? When I realize actually, not theoretically, not as a belief, actually I realize that I am mankind, haven't I really lost an extraordinary sense of my own importance?

Q: Is it our sense of self importance that keeps us from seeing this, Krishnaji?

K: Perhaps.

Q: What makes somebody miserable is the same for every man.

K: My misery may come about because I have lost my money, or another is miserable because his wife has run away, another's misery may be because his son is not fulfilling what his father wants, and so on and so on. It is misery. Isn't it? Not the expressions of misery, it's misery.

Q: Yes, but in the depth - these are the first reasons of the misery - but in the depth isn't there something that is common to all these miseries?

K: Which is, my misery is equal to your misery. Now why don't I recognize that I am the rest of mankind, the rest of the stupid, you know, this miserable thing that I am, like the rest?

So let's now, we are going to meet every morning at eleven thirty, now we are dispersing, you follow, sir, we are not putting our minds together over a particular thing and resolving it. Not carry on next year and meet again, repeat, repeat, repeat. But can we take something together that is common to all of us and dissolve it, be free of it, your know either one way or the other. You follow? Can we do that?

Q: I don't know.

K: No, I am asking, sir. I would like to discuss something, one particular thing, and you may like to discuss something else, and another something else. So can't we find out together, altogether, what it is we would like to talk over together, not verbally, but seriously so that it really affects my daily life.

Q: Why do we need to be different from our neighbour and what can we do to stop it?

K: Is that what you want to discuss, sir? Is that the subject you really want to take up and go into seriously, at the end of the discussion be free of the separation? Of course you are taller than I am, have long hair, shorter hair, you live in a beautiful place, I don't and so on and so on. Apart from all that. Of course that may be affected if we realize that inwardly you and I are the same. Is that what you want to discuss?

Q: Why I am so important to myself.

K: Why are you so important to yourself. Is that what you want to talk about? I give up.

Q: I would like to question the idea of dependence, because it all comes down to dependence, that makes a separation. If we can overcome dependence...

K: Do I really want to talk over together with you, and in the talking over with you at the end of the discussion I am free of that totally and completely - of something. You follow what I mean? Am I serious enough, earnest, intensive enough to say, 'Look, I am going to go through this thing right to the very end and be finished with it.'? Do you want to do that? Great silence!

Q: We are bound to.

K: Do it. Do it sir. Let's do it. Say for instance, I would like personally to discuss with you meditation. Just a minute, don't jump on me. Meditation. I don't think you can. Because I have to go into it very deeply, but I don't think you can. You haven't gone into it. I would like to discuss with a person who says, I have gone that far, now let's go much further. In the same way I would like to discuss with someone who says, what does it mean to have a mind that is completely empty. Empty in the sense, it has no problems, no impressions, not any kind of imprint on it. And what is the quality of such a mind, with that extraordinary energy which is implied in emptiness. You can't. You follow what I am saying? I would like to discuss, for example, with you, what relationship really means, to be related to somebody, whether it is possible to be related without a single image about the other. You follow, sir? Will you do that? Will you say, look, let's take relationship and go through it to the very end so that there isn't a particle of contradiction between her, me and she and you? Can we discuss that? We are here for that purpose, for god`s sake.

Q: Krishnaji, this is a problem, listening to you now, you are asking the people in this room. I am very interested in solving the problem of me and the world. It's the same problem as fear and all these things because separation from the world seems to me to be the problem. Once you are the world, then you have solved that division.

K: Yes, now shall we discuss that?

Q: Go into that and finish it.

K: Sir, I am asking you. I will take anything you want - your sex, whatever it is, go to the very end of it and see where we are at the end. You see you hesitate, you go silent.

Q: Krishnaji, before going into that question, which is certainly very fundamental, can we discuss how we are going to go into it.

K: How. That's it. What is the quality of your mind - sir, we will go into it, but choose, all of us, take one subject which is common to us and work it out in detail and go to the very end of it, and at the end of it say, right, I'm out - and not always talk about it.

Q: Why this sense of isolation when we know that everybody is in the same boat?

K: Is that what you want to discuss? Will you put your guts, energy - sorry to use the word 'guts', but it is a good word - will you put your guts, your energy, your vitality into solving something? Or you just float around? I thought we were all gathered here for that purpose, that a few of us take one thing, or the other, a human problem - not the moon, or how to fly a kite, or anything - but a human problem and work it out so completely. If you don't want to, what is the purpose of our meeting?

Q: It seems that we can only discuss the problem that is really real for all of us.

K: What is that? Come on! What would you, Harsh?

Q: Can we talk about relationship?

K: Now, can we go into that and work it out, in detail, break it up, and see it, and find out how to live rightly with another, can we do that? Would that interest you?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes.

Q; Yes.

K: Can we do that tomorrow morning? You stick to it, and you mean it?

Q: Yes.

K: Right.

Q: But, Krishnaji, the question that was raised earlier seems to be very important, that we look at how we approach the question.

K: We are going to do both, sir. We are going to do all of that, sir. We are going to discuss tomorrow morning, this one thing, relationship, with all the things implied in it, everything implied in it, and in discussing see if we cannot break down this barrier between woman and man, not sexual, I don't mean that, this psychological division that man has created between themselves. Shall we do this? Right. Lunch time.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND SEMINAR MEETING 13TH SEPTEMBER 1978

Krishnamurti: Shall we go on to talk over together the thing that we wished to talk about this morning, relationship? I think the word means - please correct me - from the Latin, to refer to, to look back. I think that most of our relationships are that. And we are going to talk over together the whole significance of relationship as it is, and in the understanding of what it is actually go beyond all the implications of that narrow limited relationship into something wider and deeper. That's what we are going to discuss, talk over together.

So what do we mean by relationship? Please, this is not a talk by me or a solo, but join all of us together in this because we are all involved in some kind of relationship or another - with a wife, with a husband, with a girl, or a boy, with parents, with our relationship to society, to nature, to the whole world, our relationship to all the things that are happening in the world, the terrible things, the violence, and also the extraordinary technological advancements and science and engineering and so on. So not only the limited relationship between two people but also relationship with the whole world - have we any? And so on. Shall we start it? Will you start it?

Questioner: Sir, when you said that the dictionary means to refer back to.

K: Referee, from the Latin, to look back to, to refer to.

Q: Are you of the opinion that people generally, this is how they relate to other people? I don't quite understand what you meant by that. Do you feel that people generally...

K: Let's begin, sir. Forget what I have said. What does relationship mean to you, to each one of us? I am married - suppose I am married - I have children, what is my relationship to my wife, to my children, and what do I mean by relationship? Am I related to nature, to the world, to the ecological world? Am I related to what is happening in Nicaragua, between the Arab and the Jew, the starvation and so on and so on? So what is my relationship with the most intimate and the most far, outward? We have to begin with the near, the closest, and then work forward. So if you are married, if you have got a girl friend, or if you have no girl friend, and so on, what actually is our relationship with another.

Q: We don't seem to have any.

K: Please, investigate it.

Q: There is always a barrier whenever you meet anyone, or a separation between what is happening outside, nature, each one of us.

Q: I feel that with my family it is a succession of trying all the time, and shifting, and to a certain extent with nature, just around, and farther issues, it doesn't extend to any extent.

K: Look, madam, relationship is one of the most important things in life. Relationship between me and another, me with many others, which creates society. And in my relationship with another there is always tension, there is always a sense of division, and therefore conflict, and a sense of guilt, a sense of possession, a sense of responsibility, a sense of protection, all that is involved in it, not only with children but with each other. And that apparently from the ancient of times until now it goes on that way, constant conflict between you and me - not you and me, you know what I mean, my wife and myself or with another. Why do we go on that way? Why do we live that way? What is right, or wrong in our relationships with each another? I want to begin closest and then gradually work to the world about us, not only in England but in India, Japan, the whole world. So I must begin near to go far. So I say I see as it is now without exaggeration, without giving false values, it is a constant struggle, constant pain, constant tension, a division. If we accept that as being normal then it is all right, but if one doesn't accept it as being normal, healthy, then we have to proceed to find out whether it is possible to end that kind of relationship, in which there is no shadow of conflict with each other. Is that possible? What are the implications if it is possible, and whether one can actually in daily life do it. That's the issue we are going to talk about this morning.

Q: I have relationship with another in those moments when I am aware of them and I am aware of myself - in those moments. But as I approach it I feel fear, and I feel either pain or a threat.

K: That's right, sir. So all that is implied - pain, attachment, jealousy, anxiety, fear and the great sexual pleasure, and so on - the whole of that is implied in our daily relationship. Why do we accept it? Why don't we question it?

Let me again repeat: we are here, this gathering, the group of us are supposed to be serious people, with a serious intention to understand our problems and resolve them, not in ten years time, but here, now. Otherwise it is not worth talking about it, it becomes theoretical and nonsensical. Personally I am not interested in that kind of stuff. If I am married, if I have a problem of that kind, I want to resolve it instantly. That may be my peculiar tendency, or my way of looking it, I don't want to carry a problem overnight, specially a psychological problem, which is relationship with another. Either I say, that's normal, I can't help living that way and for the rest of my life it is that - I may change wives, I may change husbands, but the same pattern is repeated over and over again. And as I am a serious man I want to find out if it can end, what is the manner of ending it, and what is a way of living in which there is no conflict at all. That's what I want to find out. At least that we are gathered here, to do that.

Q: Can we then look at the original meaning of that word relationship, which means to carry back.

K: What sir?

Q: Relationship is something that goes out from one person and something is carried back from the other.

K: Yes, yes.

Q: Without the carry back, the re-late, there won't be anything called relationship. It can't be carried back. We have been talking so far as though one person were doing the relating only.

K: I think you heard all that so I don't have to repeat it. Please, enter into the discussion, sirs.

Q: Is it possible to look at why we do that.

K: Yes, why do we support this kind of life, why do we live this way.

Q: Is it possible to know what is our motivation?

K: No, I am questioning it now, sir. I am questioning why human beings, including us, we live that way. Is it part of our heredity, part of our tradition, part of our habit, so we have got used to it and say, yes, that's the way to live. The trees struggles, everything struggles, this is part of nature, inevitable that in our relationship there must be conflict. We can find all kinds of excuses but the fact remains which is a relationship between two people, give and take, and looking back, and all the rest of it. Now why, we are questioning, why we accept that way of life. Why we accept wars, why we accept violence and so on and so on.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: So, do you say you accept it as it is?

Q: I don't know, but not wanting to get entangled in something false, and yet not wanting to isolate oneself.

K: I don't quite follow this. I mean others may follow, please answer him, I am not the oracle.

Q: You said relationship creates conflict.

K: No, no, I didn't say that. Not, I said, what is the fact. The fact is in our daily relationship with each other, man, woman and so on, there is division, there is conflict, there is struggle and all the things involved in it, which we don't have to describe in detail because everybody knows what our relationships are.

Q: If all those things are eliminated, if all those things are acknowledged...

K: No, not 'if'. You see that is supposition.

Q: When all those things...

K: The same thing - if, when.

Q: Sir, isn't part of the tension in relationship because another can hurt you, you are afraid of this.

K: Sir, first let's see what actually is taking place and then we can move from there. If we accept that this kind of struggle in relationship is healthy, and in nature everything is struggling - a tree in a forest is struggling to have light, a tiger is chasing a deer. You follow, there constant struggle. And you may say to have this conflict is healthy, helps us to grow, all kinds of things, and you accept it. Right? One generally accepts it unless the struggles become utterly intolerable, there is divorce, then there is the breaking up the family, which affects the children, and so on and so on. If that is a fact, and it is generally a fact, then how do we approach the fact in order to bring about a transformation in the way we are living? I can't explain. I think it is fairly clear what we are talking about, isn't it?

Q: Sir, I feel there is no true relationship if there is no love.

K: Then we come to the question, what is love. We may come to that question presently, or we may begin with that, if you wish. Then we have to enquire into what we call love. Have we love for another? One may say, I love my wife, but is that love? You follow, sir?

Q: Why is there no love in us?

K: I beg your pardon?

Q: If there is no true relationship I think it is because there is no true love in us, inside us.

K: Sir, I want to find out - I don't know why I am answering, please we are all supposed to take part in this discussion, every one of us, not me talk all the time and you listen, all of us are supposed to engage in conversation, when one question is put by another to answer it as well as we can, find out how each one of us reacts to these things.

Q: Before I can come to any consideration of love I have to somehow face the fact that I am threatened by a relationship.

K: That's what I am saying, that's what I am asking. Are we clear what our actual relationships are at present, now, not at some future if and when.

Q: We are all afraid of getting hurt.

K: So is our relationship based on fear, getting hurt?

Q: It is unconsciously based on fear, pressure and images.

K: Tunki, you have heard me talk about images infinitely, for a number of years. Are you repeating what we have said, or you have discovered that for yourself?

Q: Well, you see I need somebody and then that person does something which I like and then I would have a certain image of this person - he is named such and such, and I think, this very kind person.

K: So you are clear - it is your own discovery. I haven't told you that you have got an image about that person. It's your own discovery that you have an image about a person?

Q: Yes.

K: That's all. So it's yours, not mine.

Q: I think we do have relationship with people but they are limited because we are always looking for something to share. For example, nationalism will bring a lot of people together and they will have a sort of relationship, but the moment there is nothing that interests you in a relationship with someone, you won't care.

K: Interest brings us together because of a particular interest. Is that it?

Q: Like here we are sitting together and we have relationship because we all care about the same thing.

K: Aren't we moving away from what we are talking about? I am just asking.

Q: There is also another factor of relationship which he was talking about.

Q: Might it help, can we go back to the question of how is it that we can approach this, so that it will bring about a transformation in relationship.

K: And also the gentleman raised the question, we are anxious about our relationship because it is based on fear of getting hurt.

Q: I don't understand this 'getting hurt'.

K: We will go into it, sir. But first do we realize, if I may ask, that at present, as we live daily, our relationship is a peculiar affair - to put it mildly? A sense of division, you and me, you with your ambitions, you with your career, you with your passions, you with your ambitions and so on and so on, and me with my ambitions, and greed and so on. This is our actual daily state. I have a profession, and I spend ten hours at it, earning money, I come home, and she has also gone out to earn money and comes home, and we are both tired, irritation - you know all this, why should I discuss it. I am not married.

Q: And also we enter a peculiar relationship with very little children where one feels they can look through one, so there is a block in the relationship.

K: What I am asking, madam, is, do we realize actually the way our relationships are? Do I know my relationship with my wife, or with my girl or boy, is divisive and because it is divisive there must be conflict? That's all, I am starting from there

Q: I don't think we do know it - at least I don't think I know it most of the time. It's a sort of compulsive thing until I can allow it to be different, then I have got no choice.

K: Now how do we discuss, madam, this problem? Nobody seems to want to join except a few of us. All of us, it is all our problem, why don't we talk about it, why don't we go into it. Are we afraid to go into it? Wait, sir. Are we afraid to go into the fact?

Q: I think we are.

K: That's just it. We are afraid to go into the fact, and face the fact, and the very facing of the fact may produce certain reactions, and of those reactions we are afraid. Is that it?

Q: I am nearly crying when I think about it.

K: So what shall we do? Just verbally talk about relationship? And keep our fears and let things go on as they are?

Q: That's what we generally do.

K: I know, sir, is that what you want?

Q: No.

Q: How can we at every moment recognize division? It seems that we see it in retrospect afterwards, but at the moment we have our barriers. How can we recognize this division every second?

K: I don't have to recognize something, it is there. Why do I have to say I have to recognize that I am in conflict with my wife? It is there.

Q: Because I am afraid of saying so.

K: Therefore, is it a question of fear that we don't talk about our relationship?

Q: Yes, in case...

K: If it is fear, let's tackle fear. Let's go into the question of fear.

But if you say, sorry, I don't want to discuss any kind of relationship with my wife, or with the world, or with anything because I am afraid if I do go into it something may happen in our status quo, therefore let's leave that alone and let's talk about god and golf, or the beautiful days. Is that what you want? If you want to talk about god and the beautiful days or something or other, cut me out. It's very simple.

Q: Well for me, I again come back to the level of getting hurt.

K: All right, sir. Do I really want to find a relationship with somebody in which being hurt is impossible? Is it possible never to be hurt? Even that, to discuss it.

Q: Well you ask is it possible never.

K: Of course.

Q: Never to be hurt?

K: Never to be hurt.

Q: Not physical wounds?

K: In all relationships.

Q: But I sometimes feel hurt.

K: I don't quite follow.

Q: Sometimes.

K: Why should I be hurt? Why should another hurt me? Why should my wife hurt me? Or my children, or my boss, or anybody, it doesn't matter who it is, why should they hurt me?

Q: They do.

K: No, why, I know they do. I know we have been hurt.

Q: Because you have different feelings and different thoughts.

Q: It seems we have a self, and that self is what gets hurt, and that self is what prevents us from having any relationship.

K: Either we accept being hurt, that's inevitable; or there is a way of living in relationship where there is no hurt at all.

Q: It is all a bundle of hurts.

K: Apparently you don't even find out.

Q: It's also that you don't want to hurt the other person.

K: What do we know, sir? Do you want to go into this question of being hurt?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes.

K: Which means, a way of living with another, intimately or not intimately, in which there is no possibility at any time of being hurt. Right? Is that possible? So let's find out. Right?

Q: It's not possible.

K: If you say, not possible, then it is finished.

Q: I didn't say it was not possible.

K: No, if you say it is not possible you have closed the door on it.

Q: It is possible.

K: If you say it is possible you have also closed the door. Let's find out. Do you really want to go into this?

Q: Yes, I have never thought about it.

K: No, all of us, not you and I but all of us, is this a problem that you want to discuss, go into and resolve it, not next year start again and say, 'I am hurt, please tell me how to get rid of it' - that becomes too silly.

Q: Probably I want to find out because I don't like being hurt.

K: If you want to go into this question of being hurt, what is hurt? When you say, I am hurt by my wife, or by somebody, what is the thing that is hurt?

Q: Some feeling about it.

K: Examine it, madam, don't answer me. Forgive me. Find out for yourself what is the thing that is hurt.

Q: One can see if one looks at it that there are areas of rigidity in oneself that are hurt.

K: Rigidity. All right. You say that. Please, all of us take part in this, for god's sake.

Q: It is the self, Krishnaji, that's hurt.

Q: What is the self?

Q: It's the self images, it's what you consider to be you.

K: No, sir, look, I want to find out, I am hurt for various reasons - we can find out what has hurt me, but I want to find out what is the thing that is hurt. You understand sir? Is it my thought, is it my body, is it my image about myself, is it a sense of wanting not to be hurt and therefore being hurt. You follow? So what is it when you say, I am hurt? Is it physical hurt, or a psychological hurt?

Q: It's a psychological hurt we are talking about.

K: I am asking you, sir, please tell me, or tell each other.

Q: We are talking about psychological hurt because physical pain I can understand.

Q: But doesn't psychological pain give you physical pain as well?

Q: In the sense do you mean that if you are tense.

K: I am married, or you call me a fool, and I am hurt. My wife says something to me and I get hurt. Right? Or you call me a perfect fool, an idiot, and I get hurt. Now I am asking you - please stick to this one point - what is the thing, when I say, 'I am hurt' - what is hurt?

Q: It seems to me that I am hurt because I have a certain idea of myself.

K: All right. Leave it there. An idea about myself. Right?

Q: An interpretation about myself.

K: Keep to that one thing, don't add more to it, we will come to it. I have an idea about myself. Right? I think I am a great man, with tremendous reputation, and you come along and say, you are a perfect ass, and I get hurt. Right?

Q: That's not the primary observation. The first observation is sensations in the body, and heat.

K: No, no. I am hurt because you called me a fool. Right? Now, what is the thing that is hurt? When I say, I am hurt, what is this 'I' that is hurt?

Q: There are certain things that compose our self. Our conditions, our ideas, everything our self is made up of, so for that matter we have certain desires, certain goals, certain ideas. If someone comes along and contradicts what I think, what I know is myself, is my knowledge, is my idea, is my condition and breaks it at a certain limit, well then it is for me - not for him, because he has other ideas and other conditionings.

K: So for you - leave the other fellow alone.

Q: For me it is not enough, the line is broken at that point.

K: So you have a certain idea.

Q: I have a certain goal.

K: Certain idea - keep to that word 'idea' which that gentleman suggested. That idea is broken, is modified or shattered. And that idea, being shattered, hurts you.

Q: Well, yes, of course.

K: Keep to that, don't expand.

Q: OK, yes, of course.

K: So what is hurt is the idea about yourself. Keep to that simple thing.

Q: What is hurt, yes, is my idea.

K: Keep to that simple thing. I have an idea about myself, or I have an idea, or a belief, or a conclusion and so on and so on, you come along and break it, kill it, or chip it, break it up.

Q: Modify it.

K: Modify it. So I get hurt.

Q: Yes.

K: That's all. That's all. Keep it there. So what happens? You come along and break my idea, or you give a shock to that idea and I get hurt, I shrivel up. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: That's all. Right, sir?

Q: It's not just an idea I have about myself, it's the idea I have of the other.

K: Oh no, how could I have the idea of the other?

Q: Because I have an idea - I don't get hurt if people I don't care about, don't respect, say that I am a fool, it's only if there is someone says this that I care about, something that is between us, or that I respect his opinion.

K: It is still my idea.

Q: It's my idea, but not entirely only inwardly about myself, it is also...

K: It is still my idea about her.

Q: Well, yes. If I have an idea and you come along and chip off half of it, or say, if I think I am something, and you say I am something else, I don't necessarily have to be hurt. I can say, well, he's the fool, I am not the fool. He's a fool for saying I am a fool because I am not a fool and therefore I avoid the whole issue.

K: Which means I have an idea I am not a fool. I don't see why we scramble all over the place for a simple thing. I have an idea. And you come along and chip that idea, break it up and I get hurt. That idea gets hurt.

Q: But she is saying that not necessarily one will get hurt.

Q: Is the point that one is depending on other people to keep this image?

K: Partly, sir. I am dependent on you, or on my wife, or on somebody, and I am afraid that dependency might break down and therefore I am frightened, and so I get more dependent on her, or him. It is still me getting hurt. I am asking you what is the 'me' that gets hurt?

Q: It seems like desire, ideas come out of desire.

K: No, you are going off to a little more complex thing. Have you an idea about yourself which can be hurt? You have, haven't you? Now that is, you have a picture, you have an idea, you have an image, or conclusions about yourself, and that image, conclusions, ideas, get hurt. Right? Then the next question is: why do you have images about yourself? Why do you have a conclusion about something or other? You don't go into all this.

Q: To give the self a meaning.

Q: That's a conclusion.

Q: Well, conclusion is a meaning.

Q: What is looking for meaning?

Q: To give it importance, to have the idea that one is important.

Q: I think it is for security.

Q: Somehow there is an energy that tries to be important.

There's something that wants importance.

Q: But can we really try to nail down what is this energy which seeks importance. Is that just a different word for the same thing we are trying to catch hold of? A 'me', an ego, an idea, an energy, what is that thing, or is there such a thing, why is there a moving towards, a generating thing?

Q: I think it creates all these ideas and gives meaning to them.

Q: So shall we try to find out what it is?

Q: I even don't know if has got something to do with my idea when I get hurt I seek violence.

K: You see you are moving away from something, which is, sir, we are talking about relationship. Relationship with my wife, or with my girl friend, or with my boy, or whatever it is, relationship. In that relationship we get hurt. Right? Is that what you are saying?

Q: Yes.

K: Or am I saying it and you are accepting it?

Q: No, we are saying that.

K: People are frightened about this matter, you know, that's why they are all very quiet, because it will open Pandora's door. You know what that is? The devil is inside, so he is frightened, he keeps it all very closed. So I want to open it for myself, you don't have to listen. I've opened it for myself umpteen times.

So I am hurt. I question, I say, why. Why am I hurt and what is hurt? As he pointed out, as many of you have pointed out, it is my idea, my belief, my conclusion, my dependency, my sense of belief and so on which I have got, which all goes to make up a picture about myself. Right? Right? I am a - what? - a scientist, a professor, a businessman, or something or other, and I have a picture of myself. Right? And you come along and say, you are not as good as I am. I have discovered much more, or I have done this, I have done that. I get a shock. So then my next question is, why do I have these pictures, images, ideas, conclusions, which can be hurt? As long as I have them they are all going to be trodden on. Right? No? No?

Q: Are we asking, Krishnaji, why do we maintain the self?

K: No, no. My question is - just listen - I have got them. Right? And I see as long as I have them somebody is going to tread on them. It doesn't matter, it may not be my wife, it may be some stranger or somebody whom I know, somebody is going to tread on it, then I get hurt. So I am asking myself, why do I have these images, pictures, ideas, conclusions about anything which can be hurt, which can be trodden on?

Q: Isn't it to build up an identity about ourselves?

K: So are you saying, I have identified myself with my belief, with my picture, with my image and so on, so I am all that. Right? And when any of you tread on any of these things I am hurt. Keep it as simple, let's keep it simple first and we will make it very, very complex as we go along.

Q: Because I feel I need to know and to be sure, to be secure

K: But it is so, isn't it. If you have no picture, madam, about yourself, I am a marvellous woman, marvellous man, I am very good at this and so on, if I have no pictures at all about myself, you can't hurt me.

Q: Then I am afraid that I might not exist if I don't have images.

K: So wait. Then you say, if I don't have these images, pictures, conclusions and so on I am nobody. So fear of being nobody creates these pictures. Right? The fear of being nobody is conditioned by society, by your parents and so on and so on, they say you must be somebody. Right? You must be good at mathematics, you must be good at being a professor, businessman, or a violinist and so on and on, and society has imposed this through education, or you have your own capacity. And so you have a picture about yourself. You say, can I live without a picture about myself, and you say, I can't, because it is too frightening to be nothing. Wait, wait. Which means what? You actually have not given that up, the picture, but you are afraid of what might be. It might be something entirely different. It's like a person who is attached to another tremendously, and won't let go because he says, my god, if I let go what will happen. 'What will happen' is creating fear, not the letting go. But if you let go then you will find out what might happen. Right?

Q: Part of the trouble seems to be you want to know what will happen before you let go.

K: Yes, yes. Before I give up I must have some reward at the end of it. This is the good old game we all play. So I am asking myself and you, why am I hurt? Can you be - can I and you be free of the idea, the image, the picture? If you can't, then get hurt and accept it, and live with it, don't say, oh, my god, is it possible to live without fear. I say it is not possible if you accept it. But if you say, look, I know I am hurt, now I see why I am hurt, you know, the reason, the logic, the sequence of getting hurt, now let us find out a way of not being hurt. That is, let's find a process or something which will completely wipe away any image I have. And I don't create future images. Is that possible?

Q: Not creating the negative, saying I am bad, I am worth nothing, therefore I can't be hurt.

K: That's a game you are playing. Do you really seriously want to find a way of living in which you cannot possibly be hurt? Do you want to find out?

Q: Yes.

K: No, no, it isn't a game you are playing.

Q: But we think that these images about our self are necessary for some reason, so we won't drop them.

K: Let's find out. Are they necessary? If you think they are necessary it is going to be hurt. Right? So anything that can be hurt is not necessary. Right? Anything that can be destroyed, trampled upon, broken up is not worth keeping. You wouldn't buy a cheap dress which would last half a day. Right? You may say it is necessary to have a dress, agreed.

Q: But sir, also along with those hurts comes pleasure.

K: I just want to keep this one thing, sir, that comes a little later. Now do we want to find a way of living in which there is no possibility of being hurt?

Q: It seems that if I have an image of myself it is because I always refer to the past.

K: Which is, the past is your knowledge about yourself, what you have accumulated, and so on. I am asking a different question, sir, if you don't mind. I am asking, do we want to discover for ourselves a way of living in which the picture is not?

Q: Is there a way?

K: Dead silence!

Q: Can we want to if we are afraid of being totally alone, totally empty, can we want to find out how to?

K: Ah! That's not the point. The point is, is there a way of living not to be hurt? Not how to be empty, what it means to be empty, what it means to be lonely.

Q: Well not to be hurt, implies to be empty, as he mentioned.

K: Look, sir, that's not the point, we are not talking about emptiness. You see, you won't face the fact. You talk about non-fact, emptiness. You don't know a thing about emptiness, why talk about it?

Q: Surely if you don't want to be hurt, that is possibly a wrong way of putting it. That seems to have a motive.

K: I beg your pardon?

Q: You see if you live and you are prepared to look at hurt, and you will get hurt, but able to look at it and say, why am I hurt, I see what I am doing, but not to avoid hurt, to live without hurt. You learn by living, and seeing all these things happening.

K: But it is happening everyday of my life.

Q: Yes, how do you solve that?

K: Why should I look at it, I know that I am hurt.

Q: But it is not necessarily a question of hurt, it is a question there is a problem has arisen, how do I solve it. How do I meet this?

K: I am showing you.

Q: But if it is recorded in the memory and it is a return always of the memory, the same words.

K: Mrs Simmons I am asking you, or we are asking each other, knowing that one is hurt, either...

Q: I don't think it is a question of hurt necessarily, I think it is a question of looking at difficult facts.

K: No, no, you are introducing something entirely different.

Q: It is the meeting of the facts that causes the difficulties.

K: I don't know how to meet the fact.

Q: Well I am finding out in living.

K: Which is, that is in living I have learnt the fact that I am hurt.

Q: Krishnaji...

K: Answer her.

Q: Well I think she was trying to say that if you say, how can I not be hurt, there is a danger of just avoiding being hurt.

Q: Yes, that's about what we are doing right now. Are we trying to move away from hurt?

K: No, Mrs Simmons is saying something entirely different. As far as I understand she is saying that as I live I begin to learn the way I am hurt, and why I am hurt, and not make a problem of it.

Q: I don't think that was what she was saying.

K: Wait, let me finish. I am trying to understand what she said. I am not hurt, but I am learning as I live that I am getting hurt, and as I am getting hurt I learn about the hurt and act upon it immediately. Is that what you are saying?

Q: That is what life is about.

K: Yes, I understand. Is that it? Is life like that? You may think life should be like that, but is it like that?

Q: I find it so.

K: Actually?

Q: Actually.

K: Actually that you find that living you are getting hurt and you are learning about that hurt, and wiping away that hurt. Is that it?

Q: You tackle one hurt after another?

K: So you have learnt about that hurt. And next time again you learn.

Q: That seems to me just putting it off.

K: No, answer her, I am not. I am trying to understand the problem as she raises it.

Q: You see you are the common problem all the time.

K: Yes, I am the common problem, which comes to the same thing.

Q: You say, what is it about me that I have got such a fantastic ego that I refer everything back to how I feel, so you begin to perhaps say, perhaps it doesn't rest with me, perhaps there is something else.

K: So you have learnt through a series of days, through a series of events that you get hurt, and that you have this enormous ego that is getting hurt through a series of days, and then tackle the problem of why you have built this extraordinary importance about yourself. Is that it?

Q: Not quite.

K: I say, why do that? Why wait till the very end to discover...

Q: No, you do it as you are living, you don't sit down like...

K: Can one do that - I am saying the same thing, probably we are saying the same thing in different words - can you as you live your daily life observe that you are getting hurt and wipe it away instantly? Can you? Will you?

Q: I want to learn more about these hurts, hurt itself.

K: I tell you, it is hurt because I have got an image, a picture about myself. You come along and say, you are not as good a pianist as I am, and I get hurt, because I have got a picture that I am one of the best.

Q: But...

K: Listen to it sir, that gentleman hasn't understood the idea that we have got a picture about ourselves.

Q: I have understood.

K: Then as long as you have that picture you will be hurt.

Q: Yes.

K: So the next question is, is it possible to wipe it out?

Q: The hurt you mean?

K: No, the picture.

K: Which gets hurt.

Q: If I can accept the hurt then that wipes out the picture.

K: No.

Q: It is no longer hurt.

K: Why should you accept a hurt?

Q: Because if I accept the hurt I am not longer hurt. It is something different if I can accept it.

Q: Is that so?

Q: Yes.

Q: As well as destroying all our images, all our conditionings.

Q: You talk about yourself as if you are able to accept hurts.

Q: No, no. My question was, the gentleman said if you accept it then it was no longer hurt, I just wanted to know if that is really so, is that a real experience of his.

Q: It is for me, yes.

K: Why should I accept anything? Why should I accept war? Why should I accept violence? Why should I accept I am hurt and it's all right?

Q: But it is the truth that is hurt, so why should I not accept it? I am hurt by the truth.

K: All right. If you are hurt by the truth, and you accept that hurt, who is accepting the hurt?

Q: Well, it is not the image.

K: No. Who is accepting the hurt? It is another image which is accepting the hurt.

Q: You don't accept it, you react to the hurt, we don't just let it pass by and say it is nothing, we are obsessed by it because it drives you to do things.

Q: Even after having discussed all this hurt will go on tomorrow I am sure.

K: What sir?

Q: Even after having discussed all this today hurt will go on tomorrow I am sure.

K: Yes. So we are hurt by the world events, by...

Q: Violence.

K:... violence, and we are hurt by our immediate friend. So we are saying, as long as we have an image, which you may discover at the end of ten days, learning about get hurt, and what is getting hurt, and so on, can't you see directly now that as long as you have an image, either the accepting image or the denying image, they are still the images, you say, all right, as long as I have an image I am going to get hurt.

Q: But it seems to me that if one is thinking only in terms of hurt, then one is rather trapped because one may convert the hurts one knows.

K: Yes.

Q: That is a possibility.

K: We can enlarge the whole thing, not just hurt. As long as I have an image there is no possibility of love.

Q: Image seems to be all there is, so why should one want to get rid of it?

K: That's all my point. As long as there is the image you are going to be trodden on.

Q: It seems that that's all there is, so what can get rid of the image?

K: What will you do?

Q: We said looking at the image.

K: So let's forget it. Let's start it again. As long as - please help me, sir - I have got an image about myself, a marvellous image. I have talked for fifty years, and I am a great man, I am extraordinarily clever, this, blah, blah, blah. You come along and tread on it. And I get hurt because I have this immense egotistic picture about myself. Right? Now please help me to be free of that picture because you have told me that as long as you have that picture somebody is going to put a pin in it. Right? Right? Now help me to understand the picture and wipe it away so that nobody can put a pin into me at all.

Q: There are so many pictures.

K: There is only one picture-maker, in Bond Street - sorry!

There are not many pictures. Right? This is not clear?

Q: There are many pictures, but only one picture-maker.

K: No, only one painter painting many pictures.

Q: Yes.

K: That's all. Right? So who is that one painter who is painting innumerable pictures: I am a great man, I must be rich, I must have a position, I must be nice - you follow - I am beautiful, I am lovely, I am great. You follow? These are all pictures.

Q: All our judgements.

K: All judgements, pictures, convictions, beliefs, dogmas, the whole circus.

Q: That's what I think of as myself.

K: Which is the image-maker. Which is what? Thought.

Q: Yes.

Q: Thought in a certain direction.

K: Yes, thought in one direction one day, the next day another and so on and so on.

Q: Well isn't thought...

K: No, Tunki, don't move. First let me understand - you have said thought - let me understand that, don't jump to something else. Is that so? Is the central painter of innumerable pictures, the one painter, who is that one painter who is doing all this? You understand my question?

Q: Yes.

K: Who is that one painter who is painting so many pictures according to circumstances, according to desire and so on and so on, who is that?

Q: It is a thing that you used to call the 'me', but I now don't know if it is me.

K: Not what I call, forget what I call it, what do you call it?
How do you look at the painter, the one painter?

Q: As I.

K: Who is the one painter? Tell her.

Q: Thought.

Q: Wouldn't you say that this painter is made up by everything, everything around me. I mean because in relationship everybody has images and it's like a whole ball of bits, whereby you put some over there and the others there and yourself on a certain place on the ball, and it seems our relationship is...

K: Look, Tunki, Picasso painted a thousand pictures, let's say, different periods, different ideas and so on. Picasso was the painter all the time. Right? Who is that Picasso?

Q: His talents.

K: What is a talent? Who is that painter? Don't reduce it to talent. Who is that painter? The talent, the greed, money, communist, the dove carrying peace, all that is Picasso, and more, his sexual appetite, his jealousy. So there is only one painter which is me, Picasso. I am not Picasso, me Picasso, thank god. Now as long as there are pictures I am painting somebody is going to come and tear it. And that tearing I call being hurt. Right? Now can I - what's the good of my repeating something all the time - I want to find out a way of living that whatever I paint can never be trodden on.

Q: Well, then...

K: Listen to my question, don't jump.

Q: Yes, it's the second time it's aroused in the conversation. I see the question very clearly. For there not to be hurt I think it is necessary for all the paintings to be eliminated.

K: Which means what? That I don't paint at all?

Q: Yes, right.

K: Wait, wait, no go into it, old boy. That I don't paint at all, that I don't act, that I don't express, that I don't give way to my talent, I do absolutely nothing.

Q: Yes.

K: I can't live like that. What are you saying?

Q: Maybe one starts with not putting a name on the picture.

Q: What do you mean by picture? The picture is the image of ourselves, right? So I mean, if you don't have those pictures.

Q: There is no self, no.

Q: Then we get the painter without paintings.

Q: No, there is no painting, there is no painter.

K: Look, old boy, that's just an idea, enjoying the expression of ideas. But you haven't helped me. I have asked you to help me. I have asked - listen, sir - I have asked you all to help me to be free of this hurt. And I also say not only these peculiar hurts, but to be completely without fear of being hurt. Help me.

Q: Well, the at the same time there is no fear to be hurt means that there are images, that there are paintings.

K: Please help me to be free from being hurt.

Q: I am doing the best I can.

K: You are not helping, you are putting it into another set of terms. I am afraid - listen to it carefully - I am afraid. Afraid of getting hurt. Now please help me how to be free of my fear of getting hurt.

Q: Nobody can help you.

K: Otherwise you stop discussion.

Q: Could be go back a little bit. There is something I don't really see well, which is we stated the painter is the 'me', and that's quite easy to say, and I could have said it, and yet I still don't see that entity, it's nothing.

K: That's just the point. You don't see the truth, the reality of it, but you have accepted the ideas about it.

Q: Which is like another painting.

K: That's what we have spend, an hour and a quarter on ideas. We haven't faced the fact, which is my fear of getting hurt. And Mrs Simmons says, learn about it as you live. Right? Learn what fear is, go into it, daily, as it happens, and learn all about it. Right? And at the end it is finished. But I am saying quite the contrary. Forgive me. Which is, don't spend a day on it, an hour on it. Look at it, understand it immediately, and wipe it away, finished. There is no choice between the two. You don't say, I like her way, or I like your way. Let's find out what is the truth of the matter is.

Q: Is it an accumulated process where I acquire knowledge about being hurt and I slowly want, today or tomorrow, to go into it day after day.

K: Talk to her, not to me.

Q: How can I begin to look at this so that I see it much more clearly? Because so far I haven't been able to do that.

Q: Can we see the perception that we create something, like a toy, hold it up to the world to show it, that we are admitting this failure but creating a nucleus which is very vulnerable and paint it red.

Q: So if we actually saw it as clearly as that...

Q: Yes, it's our fault, it isn't necessarily something that is outside, that is inevitable, but we admit that hurt psychologically, by the formation of this notion of the self, this dependence.

K: Is it that we are afraid to discuss this question of relationship? For you it is very easy, you are not involved for the moment, but if you get married, have children, then it will become a problem. So for you it is not problem so you would say, I am not afraid of it. But having married, with children, the whole business, somebody comes along and says let's talk about relationship, I am frightened because I may discover things which may be shattering.

Q: Well, there's relationship without marriage.

K: Oh, darling sir, don't. Yes, I can have a relationship with getting married.

Q: Krishnaji, doesn't it naturally refer to sorrow? That we live in sorrow, hurt is part of sorrow.

K: Yes, quite.

Q: And afterwards there arises the image.

K: Is that all. The image exists and I get hurt, not after. You see, please, sir, I am asking you a simple question, first, if you don't mind. Is it that we are frightened to discuss relationship, in which is involved dependency, attachment, and jealousy, sexual pleasures, remembrances of all that, is it that we are avoiding to look at it? That's why we are all so silent.

Q: Wouldn't you go into the question how can we get rid of the image and the image-maker, because that's the problem to me, how to get rid of it.

Q: There is a difficulty here in words - how do I get rid of it, how do I wipe it away. Surely if it is an image, I want to see that it is an image first.

K: Sir, is the image different from you? Is the picture, the image different from you? Separate?

Q: I don't know.

K: Is it, I am asking you. Or you are that picture?

Q: It seems that we have to...

K: No, I have asked sir a simple question: are we frightened to discuss about our relationships?

Q: Yes, sir, it would seem so.

K: I am just asking sir, forgive me, for just two minutes. Are we frightened to discuss relationship, in which is involved attachment, dependence, sexual pleasures, the separateness, my wife and me are two different beings, there is a division, and open up this enormous complex thing in relationship. Are we frightened to look at it?

Q: I don't know.

K: No, I am asking, is anybody frightened about it?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes, because..

K: Yes, one is frightened, so you are avoiding it are you?

Q: It seems we have to start at the beginning.

K: We start at the beginning.

Q: Which is conflict and relationship.

K: Which is conflict and relationship. You are attached to me and I like it, so as long as both of us like it there is no conflict. But suppose I begin to say, no sorry, don't depend on me, it is rather irksome, then conflict comes in you. So again, you see, I have asked this question, please answer it, loudly or to yourself: are you frightened to discuss this whole question of relationship?

Q: No.

K: My darling. Wait till you get married.

Q: Well I am sitting here and I want to talk about it.

K: Yes, I am talking. Are you frightened?

Q: No.

K: Why? Why aren't you frightened?

Q: Because I want to find out.

K: What? Verbally?

Q: It seems that there is necessarily a certain reluctance to look at it because it involves the self.

K: No, Scott, I am asking her whether she really wants to find out. She has no problem about it, she says, by Jove, I must understand this before plunging into all that. Now can she understand it? Or must she plunge - listen carefully - must she plunge into it and then understand it? Or can you look at the whole thing non-verbally and see what is involved in it and begin?

Q: How can we look at something not letting it...

K: Why not? Must I become a murderer before I find out about murder?

Q: Not unless you are a self murderer.

K: It is the same thing. It is exactly the same thing.

Q: We are talking about marriage!

K: Are you saying marriage is murder? No, you asked me whether it is possible to understand something if you are not experiencing it. To that I said, must you understand murder and therefore to understand murder you must commit murder? Must you get drunk to understand sobriety?

Q: But we all have relationships whether we are married or not, or whether we have them just as friends, we all have relationships.

K: That's the whole point, sir. If you acknowledge that this problem of relationship is one of the greatest importance in life, and I am not frightened to look at it, frightened to go into it, see the whole picture of it, what is its nature, its structure, what is involved in it. And you can only do that if you are not frightened. But at the beginning if you are frightened you can't open the door.

Q: Not to be frightened to stand alone.

K: No, no. You see you have drawn a conclusion. I said do we want to go into this question, whether we are married, or have a girl friend, or boy and all the rest of it, the meaning and the implications and the nature and the whole business of relationship. And I say if you really deeply want to go into it and understand the whole beauty of it, the greatness, the tremendous involved in relationship, you must approach it without fear. But if I am already caught in it, and my wife and I, I am afraid to open it because something might happen between her and me. I would rather remain in status quo, as we are, rather than open the door. That may be most of us.

Q: How can I know this room without sitting in it? From outside, you mean?

K: No, I am asking in return, must I get drunk to know what it means to be drunk? Must I get drunk?

Q: Yes, I think so.

K: So why should I go through that? Why should I go through being drunk? I don't want to drink. It is stupid. Why should I go through that?

Q: I can't know you without knowing you.

K: You can't know me?

Q: Without knowing you, without seeing you.

K: You can't know me. You have met me, you can't know me. You can know the picture of me, the reputation, or non-reputation about me, and so on. You can't actually know me because the thing is living. So a living thing can never be known, it is only a dead thing that can be known. So I can never say, 'I know my wife'.

Q: You can only follow the life.

K: Can you follow the life of another? All the variations, all the subtleties, all the nuances, the movements. What are we talking about. Do we want to go into the question of relationship without fear?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes? All of us, or one or two, the rest say, piano, piano! Sir, we have come together to have a serious enquiry into our relationships, into our pleasures, into sorrows, into the whole problem of existence, if you are afraid at the beginning you can't go into it. So if you want to discuss fear let's talk about it and wipe it away. Don't say, well, next year I'll come back to fear.

Q: There seems to be a question whereby this painter is still painting this image, because the human mind wants to be liked, wants company.

K: Yes, I know all that, Tunki, look, old boy I am asking something else, before you put your own question, I put it first, so give me... I asked you, do you really want to go into the question of the great complex question of fear without fear, do you want to into the question of fear and therefore enter into the whole problem of relationship. And you can only enter it if you are not afraid of it.

Q: Yet, I can see that I can only enter it with fear.

K: You can't.

Q: You can't at all?

K: It's like you can't climb the Everest with all your burden.

Q: No.

K: So you throw away lots of things and have a few things - metaphorically speaking. They carry a terrible lot of things.

So do you want tomorrow morning to discuss the question of fear? What do you say, sirs, do you want to?

Q: Is it only fear that is preventing us from going into it?

K: Yes, sir, may be.

Q: I question that, sir, because I am not so sure.

K: Then what is preventing us from going into it? Is it verbally that we don't understand English? Don't understand the expressions of the English language, and therefore you are doubtful? So let's make it very clear of every word we use, so that linguistically we understand each other. We are not doing anything but just throwing words at each other.

Q: Sir, that is part of the problems that here and now we don't have a problem with relationships because we are only talking, the problem is later. And now we can understand the words, that's quite easy, it is not necessarily fear of going into the problem that makes it difficult. But there is another kind of communication.

Q: It is not a problem right now because we don't know the right question to ask.

K: No, Tunki, that's not it. I am frightened because I have committed myself to a woman or to a man, and call that relationship, I am frightened to open that cupboard, there may be terrible skeletons in it. So I would rather discuss round it and go anywhere but say, look, I want to go into this, understand it, and go fully into it. But apparently you don't.

Q: Can we discuss tomorrow, and go into this without fear?

K: I am saying, sir, perhaps the language difficulty here is, we are saying you cannot understand the depth, the beauty and the whole complex question of relationship if there is any kind of fear in you about it. That's clear. If I am afraid to enter, to understand the relationship, what is involved, I am afraid because, you follow, god knows what is going to happen. I might leave my wife. I am not saying that - you follow. So, I say, please let's talk about relationship.

So do we talk tomorrow morning about fear? What do you say, sirs? Which means do you want to be free of fear to live differently?

Q: There's tremendous fear of going into the question, but yes.

K: What?

Q: There's enormous fear of going into the question of what is fear.

K: Yes, sir. There is fear. That's what I am saying. There is fear, and how can you examine anything if there is fear. How can I understand what love is if there is fear? I can tell my wife I love her, but that means nothing if I am afraid.

Q: Sir, may I ask a question?

K: There is no chairman here.

Q: I wonder if it is possible for us at all to approach things in this way. Like today we tried to talk about relationship and we find that when we are afraid we cannot discuss it. You see tomorrow we will talk about fear, we will find something else will stop us from talking about fear.

K: That's right, sir. That's what is going to happen.

Q: How are we going to approach all this?

K: Therefore that means you are not serious. I want to live a life without fear. I will do anything to stop my fear - give up my property, give up my wife, give up everything because I want to live without fear. You follow? That's the only way to find out. You can't just sit and talk about the mountain top, you have to climb it.

Q: As I understand that question, it is almost the same thing as saying, I want to live a life without any hurt.

K: That's right, same thing, sir.

Q: And as far as I can see we haven't really finished with that question, we haven't discovered what it means to live a life without hurt, or how one can come to that.

K: Look, Scott, I want to find out why I am hurt. Right? And I find verbally at least that I have got an image which is going to be hurt, and that image is me.

Q: But will I satisfy with just the words?

K: That's a rationalization, logic and all the rest of it, but isn't an actuality. So how are you going to make me understand and see the actuality of it? You can't do it. You can't hit me on the head.

Q: No.

K: You can't bully me into it, you can't persuade me into it, you can't give me a reward to see it; you say, well here it is, look at it.

But if you refuse to look at it what am I to do?

Q: Or, if one is unable to look at it.

K: I say, why are you unable to look at it. Stop there and find out. Don't go off to something else. Why are you unable to see something dangerous?

Q: Because of fear.

K: So it may be fear - wait - it may be habit, you have never even thought about it, you are so heavily conditioned you refuse to see it.

Q: Or the brain just keeps on...

K: Your brain may not be active enough to see it. So these are all the factors. So we then have to examine why your brain when faced with something very, very dangerous refuses to see it. Is it made dull by drink? By sexual over indulgence? You follow? Is it by continuous traditional acceptance of things? And so on. So the brain has become mechanical. Right? And so something new put in front of it, it says, I don't understand. Is that so? Is your brain like that? Is your brain mechanical?

Q: It is very mechanical. But I don't know if...

K: Stop there! If it is very mechanical, why? What has made it mechanical? Knowledge?

Q: Partly. Habit.

K: Habit.

Q: Partly.

K: Routine. Can the habit be broken without the man who says, I want to break it? Which is mechanical. You follow? So then you do all that. Not take years and years and days, now instantly, do it, completely free of habit. You can only do it when you see the fact of it, when you see the danger of a habit. Going day after day to the office, you know, habit. The mess of it all.

Q: What comes first? Free to see, or see to be free?

K: No, no. Sir, we said, why has the brain become so mechanical. You understand? Why? Is it we have accepted tradition, habit? Habit - living in a routine. You follow? So if all these are the causes of a mechanistic mind then why don't you break it?

Q: Sir, somehow the self is involved in all this.

K: Yes. Don't involve it.

Q: It survives and maintains itself.

K: That is just an avoidance of breaking the habit - the self is involved, and so on. Here is a factual thing, that is, habit in any form becomes mechanistic. Right? Habit implies mechanism, the very meaning is a habit. So the brain might have got into the habit of living this way and it says, please leave me alone, I am used to this, don't break it up because I don't know what will happen. You follow?

Q: I feel a kind of laziness to break habits.

K: Yes. If it is laziness, go into it, break your laziness. You see we all talk about this.

Shall we talk about fear tomorrow morning? Not for the fun of it, but actually say, I am afraid, I want to be free of the damn thing. Then it is worth it, it is fun to talk about it. But if you say, I am afraid, but let's talk about the window - there is no point. Right, sirs, it is time to stop.

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD SEMINAR MEETING 14TH SEPTEMBER 1978

Krishnamurti: Shall we go on discussing, talking over together, the question of fear? Do we? We were talking about relationship, and perhaps most of us are frightened to face that reality of relationship, and so, from that arose the question of fear. So that we can face our relationship, when there is no fear - that's the question, that's the point we're going to talk over together.

Is it really possible to be completely free of fear, both physiological as well as psychological? One may be afraid of death, of so many things, neurotically, and perhaps healthily, sanely, like fear when you face something dangerous physically, to meet it healthily, which is normal, not neurotically, with fear. So there is both physical fear and psychological fear. Perhaps they are interrelated, one giving emphasis to the other and so on. Can we go into all this? Why do you want to go into it, if I may ask?

Questioner: I had always thought that the way of dealing with fear, was the way Mrs Simmons spoke about it yesterday, and the fact that there might be another possibility of it.

K: Why does one, I mean, if one is afraid, do you, does one want to go really deeply inside the whole business of it, and be free of it. Does one demand that? Or we don't know how to deal with fears and so we run away from it, avoid it and explain it away. Is that it, we never really want to go into it and completely dissolve it. Is that what is the problem?

Q: I think that when one realizes that fear is one of the most inhibiting factors in life, one is bound to go into it, isn't that so?

One must first realize how inhibiting it is.

K: Yes, sir, but what I'm asking is, do we really want to go into it, do we really say, this is a terrible burden, a devastating factor in life, it brings darkness, you know all the nervous responses to fear, and psychological shrinking, withdrawing, resisting, fighting back ; all that which is a form of violence - do we really want to go into it so that our minds are completely free from it? That is the first question I would like to suggest to ask.

Q: I think the answer is no, I think we prefer to go from solution to solution.

K: I beg your pardon?

Q: We'd rather go from the solution to the solution of the fear, rather than to go into the fear.

K: That's it, we want rather a solution of it, how to, the ending of it rather than the finding out the whole movement of it, the whole contents of it, the nature of it. Is that what we're trying to do?

Q: Yes.

Q: Right here we are looking for the solution, too.

K: I beg your pardon?

Q: Right here we are looking for the solution.

K: Of course, of course. Are you looking for a solution for fear? Or investigating, exploring, finding out the whole nature of it, and so when one really has an insight into it, it's gone.

You know, I'm not a brain specialist, perhaps Professor Wilkinson, Dr Bohm can help us. I think it effects the brain, the brain cells - fear. I watch many, many people in fear, their minds, their brain is not active, is not agile, fresh, young, it's a kind of disease that eats into one's mind and one's heart, one's whole being. And if we don't understand the disease but are only concerned with the curing of it, then it will never - we are just playing with each other.

So I want, that's why I ask, if I may, of course most respectfully always, do we really want to go into it, are we deeply concerned with the resolution of it, not how to be free of it, but take step by step into it and discover the whole nature of it and understand it, have an insight into it, and then the thing dissolves.

Q: Are we really aware that fear does play such a large part in our lives?

K: I'm asking, sir. How destructive it is, because from fear arises violence, all kinds of neurotic behaviour. Please, enter the game, I throw the ball and you don't even play, return it to me, it is always in your court. You understand what I'm saying?

Q: Doesn't it have something to do with the immediate response to fear, the immediacy of response.

K: Yes, sir, but I want first to be clear that you and I and the rest of us, really want to find out the whole movement, the beginning and the ending, the in-between, the nature of it, the content of it, the destructive nature of it, the real disease of it - it's a much greater disease, more, it's a fearful disease, rather than cancer. Cancer may be partly the result of fear.

Q: I don't want to go into it, it's very ugly, it's very...

K: No, you see, you say it's ugly, I don't know if it is ugly, I'm just frightened.

Q: Fear is ugly.

Q: None of us like fear.

K: You say so. You say so. You've given a name to it, an adjective, calling it ugly and...

Q: Well, we want to get rid of fear because we don't like fear.

K: Therefore...

Q: No, I question that. No, we don't want to get rid of fear.

K: That's what I am questioning.

Q: We want a solution to fear - solution, that's different. We want to be free of fear.

Q: We want to be able to manage fear, be free of fear.

Q: OK, then not get rid of it, but free of it, control it.

Q: Be able to handle it.

K: Control it.

Q: But that's not dealing with it.

K: No, that's just it.

Q: But we don't want to deal with it, we don't want to deal with it, we just want to control it.

K: That's right, sir, let's be clear. Do we want to control it, we don't want to put our teeth into it, but waiting for somebody to help us to be free of fear - a psychologist, some incidents, some external god and so on. And so, remaining in the meantime in fear. Which is it we want? Please let's be clear on this point.

Q: I think often the fear of something is worse than that thing itself. And so that if one could find out what fear actually is, then...

K: We're doing that. Do we want to go into the whole problem, the nature and the structure of fear, which is structure in the sense, not a building but the movement of it. Structure means movement - the movement of fear, understand it, go very, very deeply into it, and resolve it completely. Or we are waiting because we want to control it, we want to escape from it and so on.

Q: Well, I think that's where we have to part from our likes and...

K: No, just - don't like and dislike, don't bring that in.

Q: Want and not want.

K: No, I don't want, that's another problem.

Q: You're asking if we want to go into it.

K: Want in the sense, sir, is that our intent.

Q: Well, then, then there is no question of like.

K: Is that our resolve, it doesn't matter what word you use. Is it our intent to go into this very deeply and resolve it, by understanding it, looking at it and so on. Or we just want to control it, suppress it, and not discover what it is. Or wait for somebody to help us to be out of it.

Q: Yes, but aren't we...

K: This is, please this is a very serious question, give your thought to it.

Q: We say that if we want to, we look at fear in order to get rid of it, then that's a bad reason for looking at it, we won't discover anything.

K: Is it our intent?

Q: What would be a correct intention? What would be a correct reason and therefore a correct approach to looking at fear? Because there's obviously some bad ones.

Q: I was just going to say, what is the fact, start with the fact of fear. If you have the intention of going into it, or do you just want to resolve, find out what the fact is in you and start from there. If you haven't got it, if you can discover that, whether you want to resolve it, then you can start from the fact. And move on from there. You have to find out in yourself what the fact is about fear, how you feel towards it, whether you want to resolve it, or go into it. That's where you start. I'm not explaining well.

K: Is this clear to each one of us?

Q: But you need space to look at and the space could be caused by an escape.

K: No. I'm asking a simple question, for god's sake! It's simple: do we want somebody to resolve it for us or - wait sir, I haven't finished yet, please.

Q: Excuse me.

K: Forgive me. Somebody to say, 'Well, do this and you'll be free of it'. Or do we want to go together into this whole nature of fear, not suppressing it, not avoiding it, looking at the whole movement of our fears, avoidance, escapes, and trying to find a solution for it and so on. Which is it you want?

Q: Are you suggesting that most people haven't got serious intention of going the whole way into it?

K: That's right, sir. That's all I'm trying to find out.

Q: I think most of us do have the intent to go into it, but we're afraid of...

K: Afraid?

Q:... of what we're going to see.

K: Yes, so still fear, it is still fear.

Q: It seems that you're saying that we cannot have the serious intention to go into fear unless we are free of fear.

K: What, sir? I can't hear.

Q: It seems to be implied that we cannot have a serious intention to investigate fear unless we are already free of fear.

K: That's right. Have we - let me put it as Dr Bohm points out, have we the serious intent to go into it. That's all I'm asking.

Q: No. Dr Bohm says, he said you first had to be free. Being serious implies that you are already free from fear. Is that true? Do you think that? Dr Bohm just said that we have to be free of fear before we can even be serious.

K: Oh, no. No. Then I'll wait till Doomsday.

Q: That's right. That's the problem, but that's what he said.

Q: But you see, you begin with apparently a serious intention to investigate fear, and then one finds that one is afraid of what one will discover.

Q: Yes.

K: This is a simple thing, I can't understand why you are making it so complicated. I'm afraid. I know I want to find somebody to help me to be rid of it. Or I'm waiting for god to help me to get rid of it, to be free of it. That's one thing. Either control it, suppress it, run away from it. Or do I want to go into the whole nature of it. You understand, sir? Put it the other way: I want to learn all about fear. Can't I do that?

Q: To be afraid without resistance, you mean? Just to be afraid, stay in it.

K: No, sir. See how difficult it is to come to some common factor.

Q: One can have the conscious intention of investigating fear, but then you've added a further thing; you said, in order to be free of it we don't know at this moment what will happen.

K: But you do know you're frightened, aren't we?

Q: Yes, I know that. And I know I want to investigate it.

K: That's all, that's all we're asking. Do you want to investigate it, or do you want somebody to say, 'Do this, and you will be free of it'.

Q: No, I want to investigate it. I want to investigate it.

K: Let's be sure, all of us, what we want to do about this, don't waste time, please.

Q: Obviously we don't want to analyze it.

K: I give up.

Q: We want to find out the whole structure, nature, mechanism of fear.

K: You want to understand it?

Q: Absolutely.

K: So, which is it, all of us, which is it that you want to do?

Q: I want to do the same. I want to understand the mechanics of it. But I am afraid of what will come or what will go, if I do understand it.

K: Yes, which means you're still frightened of what might happen.

Q: Yes.

K: So that's also part of fear.

Q: Yes.

K: So we're investigating fear. That's all. Please, sir. Look, we've talked about one simple thing for 20 minutes and we haven't come to the point yet.

Q: I want to open it up. I want to open up the whole subject, that's all I can say.

K: That's all. All of us want to do this?

Q: Yes.

K: Avanti.

Q: There we go, well, there we go, I say. We all want it so.

K: So, are we conscious, aware, of our fears and what we do with our fears?

Q: I don't think we are aware.

K: Are you Tunki?

Q: No, I think it is so deep rooted.

K: No, keep to what you were saying, Tunki, which is, are you aware, know, recognize, that you are frightened. And what you do with that fear. Are you aware of this? Tunki?

Q: Well, I can recall my past fears.

K: No.

Q: I think at the moment it doesn't jump up.

K: I'm asking, do we, each one of us, recognize our fear, know that we are frightened of something or other, and what we actually do with that fear? Do we run away from it, suppress it, control it, or accept it as part of life and drag on with it for the rest of your life? Are we aware of this? That's what I'm asking.

Q: I think we're probably all aware of the fact that we drag on.

K: Yes. Are we aware of it?

Q: Yes.

K: So you know what you do with your fear. Why do you do that? Drag on, as Professor Wilkinson points out, how we drag on with it, we go on with it. Why? We are investigating, opening up the whole box - Pandora's Box.

Q: I haven't been able to find an answer to a particular fear, real fear.

K: Not an answer.

Q: This is what I've been doing. You said, are you aware of what you do.

K: Yes.

Q: This is what I do: try to find an answer. And it hasn't really deeply dealt with the whole matter, in the past, so it's dragged on.

K: I'm asking, sir, if you are aware that you have a certain fear and how you deal with that fear, whether you control it, suppress it, run away from it, or wait for somebody to resolve it, and so on. Are you aware of your fear, and your reactions to that? That's all I'm asking.

Q: Now then, you asked another question, why do we do that.

K: What?

Q: Then you asked another question, why do we do that?

K: Yes, why do we do that? That's all I'm asking.

Q: Krishnaji, I think part of it is because we maintain a facade of ourselves that we present to others, and we want to continue to maintain this. And if we begin to face the question of fear, we will have to deal with this facade.

K: Not facade. All right. I'm just asking, if you don't mind, apart from the facade, why do we do this - that is aware of our fear, control it, suppress it, avoid it, run away from it, or wait for some incident to resolve it. Why do we wait? Why do we go through this process? You understand my question?

Q: Couldn't it be because we don't know anything else?

K: What?

Q: Couldn't it be through ignorance, we don't know how to deal with it, otherwise?

K: No. We know what we do, don't we?

Q: Yes, sure.

K: Then let's ask the question, why do you do it?

Q: Perhaps ignorance, because we don't know any other way.

K: You don't know any other way? Is that it?

Q: And also the entity which is afraid remains the same.

K: No, don't complicate it, sir, just go step by step: I am afraid.

Suppose I am afraid. I know I have controlled it, I know I have suppressed it, I know, you know, all the rest of it. And I ask myself, 'Why am I doing this?' That's all I'm asking.

Q: Somehow that fear seems to threaten something inside you.

K: What?

Q: The fear you have inside you seems to be a threat to something, which is why...

K: A threat?

Q: A threat. It seems to threaten and challenge something.

K: So, all right. So I ask myself, why do I do this and you say, it's a threat. Threat to what? Threat to my house? Threat to my relationship? Threat to my way of living?

Q: The image.

K: Please, just go into it step by step.

Q: To my whole structure.

K: Which means, threat to my whole way of living. Is that it?

Q: No, deeper I think, it's a threat to my effort to solve it. In other words, I can't go on doing this, going from solution to solution, that action will be threatened.

K: So, would you say it simple, sir.

Q: Well, you said, why do I do it.

K: No, I said, why do I live in this way, being threatened, feared because that fear may bring certain catastrophes, I ask myself, why am I doing this, who is - you follow, sir? Why do I go through the cycle?

Q: Because the whole thing will be threatened. In other words, keeping doing, if I stop doing this, I don't want to give that up, that structure will be threatened, the solution will be threatened.

K: How do I know? That's my point. You're not getting my point. How do I know that my whole structure, which I've built up, will be destroyed? Or am I projecting an idea that it might be destroyed? And therefore frightened of that. You get what I'm saying. Now, which is it we're doing - please, that's why we want to go step by step into it. Let me do it for myself, talk about it.

First, I am unaware that I'm doing this. Then I become aware. I am aware that I'm frightened. I am aware, know, that I control it, suppress it, avoid it. And I drag on this way for the rest of my life. And I am saying now, why do I do this, why do I live this way? And I find there is a threat involved in it, the threat of something that might happen. So what might happen is creating more fear, adding more to the already accumulated fear. I live this way. Right? And I say to myself, why? Why am I doing this? What am I being threatened about? You follow, we are investigating, don't accept what I'm saying, we are investigating. Threat to my relationship, with my wife, girl, boy, whatever it is? Threat to my existence? The way of my life?

Q: Yes, that you won't exist.

K: I don't know. You see, I don't know.

Q: You don't know?

K: You've already projected what might happen. But I don't know. You see the difference? By projecting it, say what might happen, it might destroy my house, my relationship, I'll lose my job - all that adds more fear. But it may not be like that at all. You follow? Threat implies that you have a certain standard of life and if you investigate into fear, that standard of life may be broken up. Therefore, you say, 'My god, I won't go into this problem at all'. You have made a picture of what might happen, and so you carry on as usual. Right? You understand?

So I'm asking, if you do not project, the idea of what might happen, but say let's investigate fear, not the future fear. Is that clear?

Q: Yes.

K: The surgeon tells me I must be operated. And I'm frightened, because I might not survive. And so the fear of not surviving adds to my already greater fear of the operation. But if I have no fear of what might happen, I can face the operation, though I am afraid. I can face it. But now I've introduced a double kind of fear: the future, what might happen, and the actual fear of being operated. So I say, please, look, I'm investigating, so I won't, I see the silliness of it, the foolishness of it, so I say, 'All right, I won't project.' I don't know, something may happen, which is quite different. So I won't project. Right? Is this clear? Can we go on from there?

Q: Yes.

K: So I ask now, why am I doing this? That is, not the future, what might happen, but why am I carrying on this way, controlling it, suppressing it, avoiding it, waiting for somebody to resolve it and so on. Why do I do this?

Q: It seems I'm holding onto something.

K: You're holding onto something. What?

Q: The idea that...

K: What are you holding onto, actually? Do look at it. You say you are holding on. What are you holding on? Your relationship? Your money? Your way of life? Your profession, your career, your - whatever, you know, a dozen things. Are you holding on to them?

Q: All that, yes.

K: To all that. What is that, to all that? To your life?

Q: All my structure.

K: The way you are living - let's put it that way, it's simpler. The way of your life, you're holding on. And you say, 'In that way of life, fear is involved'. So you're holding onto fear. Right?

Q: There is something about that, Krishnaji, that I think that it's more than just holding on to the structure, it's as if you're holding on to the fact that if you don't have the capacity to deal with it.

K: Wait, that's the whole point. I was coming to that. You see, is it that we think we have not the capacity to deal with the fact that I'm afraid, because I've been discouraged - listen carefully - I've been discouraged that I cannot do it by myself. I've been discouraged by the religions, Jesus will save you, outside agency will save you, go to an analyst, professor, this, that, they will resolve it. So society, education, has helped me to have no capacity to deal with it. Right? Would you agree to this?

Q: Yes.

K: Oh, come on!

Q: One could also feel that one has the capacity.

K: I don't know but I reject all that, I reject somebody's going to solve my fear, Jesus or the priest or the Pope or the Archbishop or the analyst, nobody, I can see how foolish it is.

Q: But I might think I can do it myself.

K: No, I don't say that, myself. I reject that, therefore I can say I will solve it, which is another vanity. I wonder if you see this. Right, sir? May we go on from there? We are all together, are we? So what have I left now? I think I have not the capacity because I have been educated to think I have not, haven't got it. But now I am free from that educated conditioning. Right? Are you?

Q: Are you?

K: Am I?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes. I wouldn't talk otherwise, I wouldn't be a hypocrite. Sir, we said at the beginning of this discussion, that to be a light to oneself, this is a part of it - I don't want to go into it now. Have we - are we free of this educated conditioning which makes us incapable? The intellectuals have made us incapable. Right? The intellectual priest, the intellectual structure of religions, you follow, the whole intellectual world of knowledge - all that says, you can't do it, old boy, we will do it for you.

Q: It seems this educated conditioning has a life of its own.

K: No, of course it has, but don't go off into that, Tunki, forgive me for bringing it back. Are you aware that you have this educated conditioning, which destroys your incapacity, and therefore put it aside. Have you? Which means, you're no longer dependent. That's all I'm trying to get at.

Q: But if one were free of this intellectual conditioning, surely that in itself would not be enough?

K: No, just the beginning, that's part of it. Of course not, sir. So, look, Dr Shainberg raised the question that we, most of us, have not the capacity to deal with it.

Q: I did not say we didn't have it, I said, we feel like it.

K: Sorry. We feel that we have not the capacity, which is different. Quite right. So we are investigating why we don't feel capable, and we don't feel capable because of this. So are we free from that, because we can't investigate further if you are not free of that. This is rather fun, isn't it?

You see, this is different from analysis. I must make it quite clear. You are just observing this whole movement, there is no analyzer and the analyzed. I don't want to enter into that for the moment. We are just observing. We have been educated by all the priests, intellectual theologians and philosophers and so on, that we don't feel at the end of it capable. If you reject all that, what has happened?

Q: You become...

K: Go into it, sir. Watch yourself. If you reject it, the intellectual education, quotes, what has happened? First, why have you rejected it? Under my pressure? Because of logic, seen the sequence of it? Or you yourself see that you cannot possibly understand fear if you have not the capacity, and that capacity has been taken away from you, taken away from you by others. Now, if you realize that, what have you come to? Please go into it.

Q: To the insight of this?

K: Which means what?

Q: It means you're no longer dependent on someone else.

K: No, listen, go into it. We're exploring, please.

Q: You are free to learn, you are free.

K: You are free of what?

Q: This conditioning.

K: Which means what? Free. How did you get that freedom?

Let's - all right. How did you get that freedom, how did you have that feeling of being free?

Q: By doubting.

K: By doubt, by questioning, which means what?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: At the end, when you have rejected through doubt, questioning, seeing what its value is and so on, which is you have intelligence, haven't you now? Right? No?

Q: Yes. Your own intelligence.

K: Not your own. You have intelligence.

Q: Yes.

K: Which is capacity. I wonder if you see this. We've a lot to go, come on, sir. A long way to go yet.

Q: There's a quality there. You used the word 'happen'. I think that's exactly it, that you become a happening.

K: Yes, there is a movement, a happening, which is intelligence, not that intelligence which is yours or mine, it's intelligence.

Q: Which is not a function of the brain?

K: You have used the brain to see. The brain sees what people have done to it. Right? The intellectuals, the priests, the authoritarians, the philosophers, the Freudian, Freud, and all the rest of it, they have made you dull. And if you say, I see the whole thing, what they have done, and the very seeing is the movement of intelligence, it's not your seeing or my seeing, the fact that it is so.

Q: Sir, what they have actually done, religions, when you say they have made you die, I see that...

Q: Dull.

Q: Did you say die or dull?

K: I don't know what I said.

Q: I see that they have stopped you, the religions, I feel that they have stopped me from enquiring.

K: Sir, I don't know if you know in India you can be a religious person without believing, without having any god. You understand, sir? And therefore they have questioned the whole, they have doubted, questioned. In Christianity you mustn't question. You can question up to a certain point, after that, it is mysterious, mystery. So you never are encouraged to question, ask, demand, find out. Right? That's all we're saying.

Now are we in this together, now, so far? No, have you that intelligence? If you haven't you can't enquire.

Q: But, sir, one of the main things here, it seems to me, is a sense of self-doubt, a self helplessness. The insight you are talking about, doesn't one already have to come to some grips with the fear, because...

K: No, we said at the beginning, are you aware that you are afraid, do you know what your action to that is? Control, suppress, run away, resolve - we went through all that. So if you say, mustn't you have a grip on that first, I say, 'Look, you're asking a question that has been dealt with'.

Q: Well, I'm trying to suggest that the experience of fear is so tremendous.

K: And we...

Q: To have that intelligence at that moment is...

K: Not at that moment.

Q: No, but in examining. When you are fearful and you examine it, you come to that perception with extreme difficulty.

K: We are not dealing with that. Look: I've reached a point in a discussion, for each one of us, we've reached a point where our capacities which have been made dull, by rejecting those factors which make us incapable, the very rejection of it is the awakening of this intelligence. Then that's one thing. Wait. We haven't finished with fear yet. That's one thing. So I'm saying the next step is, I don't know if you - I'm talking all the time, will you please come on.

Q: Sir, I question whether one has totally rejected all that.

K: That's up to you. Haven't you?

Q: There can be no...

K: Find out, sir. Sit for two minutes, you can, a minute, you can know, if you put your mind to it. If you're sloppy you won't know.

Q: I still have the feeling that it will be a verbal game.

K: It's not a verbal game with me. You can have the verbal game, but I want - sir, I said from the beginning, are we serious enough, intent, having strong intent to go into this whole movement of fear. If you have the intent and the seriousness of it, you cannot remain verbal.

Q: Sir, it seems at this point the fear is still there. Now fear hasn't been dealt with. All you've done is put aside incapacity and the intelligence has been awakened. Once that's awakened then it can start dealing with fear. The fear is still there.

K: Of course. Sir, I'm going to deal with - we're going to go into it.

Q: Can I raise another point?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: Having got these, cleared the space, so to speak...

K: Cleared the decks.

Q:... got the intelligence, I mean, to do that didn't one need some kind of motivation, driving force, some sort of passion? And doesn't one then need that to continue the process? I mean, or are you including that in the intelligence?

K: I think that the passion, the drive is inherent in this intelligence.

Q: It has its own momentum.

K: It has, yes. To put it, no, let's use the same words, otherwise you'll give a different meaning to momentum and so on. I may too. So as Professor Wilkinson points out, doesn't one need passion, interest, a drive to have this, to bring about this intelligence, or to awaken this intelligence. I say, by observing, by looking into this whole movement of fear, as we've just begun, that intelligence has in it this passion, this intent, the drive. I won't sit still any more. If I have fear, I'll go, with that intelligence, with that energy, that drive, I'm going into it.

Q: Could I return to your point about the man having the operation?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: Then surely he decides to have the operation and run the risks of what might happen afterwards, if he's sufficiently dissatisfied with his past life before the operation.

K: Quite right, sir, that's what...

Q: Is this it?

K: You're quite right, sir. Are we dissatisfied now, as he points out, with our ordinary, mediocre, dull life, part of which is fear? So am I aflame to resolve this thing? Which immediately makes me non-mediocre - not that it gives me vanity. I'm out of that group.

Q: I think that's important. Yes, I think there's a real fear of getting out of the groove, because it puts you into a whole new space.

K: That's what the Professor was pointing out. Unless there is this feeling - look: I've lived with fear for so many blasted years, wasted my life, and I must do something about it, which immediately puts me out of society. And I don't mind. But if I say I like the pleasant, the niceties of society, dinner parties, night clubs and blah, blah, then of course there is no communication.

Q: And relationship. That's where you come back to relationship. I'd like, I know that relationship...

K: I'm coming to it, slowly. So what shall we do now? I have now - there is this intelligence operating, which is capacity. And I have started out with the discontent to live, to be, to understand this whole fear - you know, work at it. I've come to the point, I'm afraid. Right? I have fear. Are we aware of fear. Fear of what? What are you afraid of? Are you?

Q: The future.

K: I'm sorry, I'm asking her. You're a teacher. She won't answer, you see. None of us want to be put on the carpet. Right, sir? You can put me on the carpet, I'm quite willing. I'm asking, what is it you are afraid of. Afraid of loneliness, afraid of not having communication with another? The other is the only person with whom I can communicate and with nobody else, therefore I'm afraid. And therefore I get attached. So, go on, please. What am I afraid of, each one of us? My wife, losing my job, having no status in society, nobody recognizing me as a great man? Afraid of death, afraid of darkness, afraid that I might physically get hurt? Go on, sir, please, what is it that you're afraid of?

Q: Practically all those things. All those things.

K: Are you afraid of all these?

Q: Practically, yes.

Q: Getting hurt. Yes.

K: Jesus!

Q: In one form or another, yes.

Q: I'm afraid of being a... my whole life, just letting everything drop by and...

K: Wait, wait. She said, 'I'm afraid of all these things'. What does that mean?

Q: Afraid of life.

K: No, no. What does that mean? That I'm afraid of that, afraid of that, so you have separate fears. Right? Or fear has different expressions.

Q: It seems to enter into practically everything.

K: Yes - no.

Q: I'd say we're afraid of fear itself.

K: No, madam, no. I'm asking something. She said, I enumerated various forms of fear. I can add more to it, or take away, it doesn't matter, she pointed out many forms of fear. Do you want to get rid of those various expressions of fear, or the fear that creates? You follow? Desire creates many objects of desire. I want a house, I want to be famous, I want to be known, I want to have money. But it's still desire. So, though fear has many expressions, the common denominator, factor is fear. So we are dealing with not the objects of fear - I am afraid of the door, I'm afraid of light, I'm afraid of - but fear itself. Do we see this?

Q: Yes.

K: Fear I am ill, fear I may never get well, I am crippled, my arm is frozen, my god, I can't move it - I'm afraid. You follow sir? Fear. Are we aware - you know, this is an important question, please - aware of the objects of fear, or fear itself? I may be afraid of death, and so I'm greatly concerned about death, and therefore I enquire into death, go into it, and all the rest of it, and I forget fear, I've pushed it away by saying, I'm going to enquire into death. Or I might want a very good career, job, position, and I am intent on that, therefore my fear is abated, because I've concentrated on it. So we are discussing, talking over together fear itself, not the various forms of fear. Right? Can we move from there?

Q: Don't these fears indicate that one is actually afraid to be left alone?

K: Yes, sir, loneliness. Loneliness, isolation, building a wall round oneself, being hurt from childhood, build a wall round yourself and fear never to meet anybody who might hurt.

Q: There's also the fear of building the wall, not just the isolation, secondary to building the wall, the fear that you will build.

K: Of course, of course. You build a wall and then feel isolated and say, 'My god, why am I isolated?'

Q: I take it there is a deeper fear.

K: Yes, yes, of course. So are we all, can we move together in this, know that fear we are concerned with, not with fear of darkness, fear of death, fear of this, fear of that.

Q: I'm not clear on this, that I am afraid of fear. I live in a state of fear but I'm lost on this thing about being afraid of fear.

K: I don't say, afraid of fear. I only know fear; that is, later on I say the word and so on, the complications of it, and just the fact that I'm frightened.

Q: Could we take a look at the process by which a single fear arises, by which, you know, fear comes into being? And take a look at it from that point of view.

K: Take it, sir, go into it, take one fact, if you're afraid of something, take that and go into it, one fact. What would you like? Loneliness?

Q: Fine.

K: So I am afraid of being alone - not alone, this feeling of loneliness, which is isolation. Right? I'm frightened of being isolated. You want to take that?

Q: Could we start just before that though? I'm sitting down, walking around and I'm not afraid. And then suddenly this fear arises.

K: Arises.

Q: Can we look at that?

K: I'm doing that. We'll see how it comes and then we'll see how the before and the after. I'm talking all the time. I am lonely. And I try to do all kinds of things to escape from it. Right? I'm attached, I need somebody to have a conversation with - you follow - comfort and so on, I escape from it. That's a fact, isn't it?

Sir, how am I to talk to an audience if you all keep quiet.

Q: Sometimes we all agree with you.

K: Right, then if you all agree, if you all see the point, if you are all aware of this, loneliness, and running away from it, trying to cover it up, trying to fill it with various forms of entertainment, religious, football or this or that. So that's what we do. Now I'm asking myself, what has brought this loneliness about. Right? What are the reasons for it? Can we go on? What are the reasons? It may be...

Q: Probably deep comfort, probably the comfort through contact with somebody. I probably need comfort from contact with somebody.

K: No, I know, I am in contact with you, you are my friend, I have a conversation with you, I'm escaping from this fact that I'm lonely. So I escape through contacts, through entertainment, through this and through that. Am I aware of this movement away from this thing which I have called loneliness? Right?

Now I want to find out why this loneliness has come into being, how is it that I'm lonely? Right? So I question. Is it my way of life? Right? That is, the way of life, I am acting for myself all the time, in my most intimate relationships, or business, whatever it is, I'm always acting from a centre. Right? Could we go on with this? So what happens? I'm all the time emphasizing by my actions, by my thought, this void in me, this emptiness, this sense of loneliness. No? Do we all see this or not? Silence indicates we are in agreement or disagreement?

Look, sir: I go to the office. There I am battling with my superior, and I want his job, more money and so on. I'm acting there, emphasizing myself, me first, and all that. I come home and there's my wife and I go through exactly the same process there. Right? So I'm building, through my actions I'm bringing about this sense of loneliness.

Q: It is isolating itself.

K: It's isolating itself all the time. And suddenly, walking in the woods or sitting in my room or whatever one is doing, suddenly one feels tremendously lonely, isolated, having no relationship with anything. Don't you know all this? I'm not inventing all this.

So I have done everything to avoid it. Right? And I want to find out how it arose, and I see how it has come about, how through my daily actions I've isolated myself. Right? Which is my loneliness. And I suddenly become aware of it. And so instead of running away from it, I say, all right, old boy, let's see what it is about. You follow? What is the state of the mind that is lonely? Of course lonely in the sense your body is separate from mine and so on, that we're not - the sense of psychological loneliness in which there is no contact with anybody. Sense of tremendous isolation. And if you don't resolve it, and you know you can't escape from it, then you become neurotic. Because that is the only thing you have left. Before you escaped, before you did all kinds of tricks with it, now you realize that you can't do anything - those are all to no avail. So you're stuck with it. And if you don't resolve it you become every kind of neurotic human being. No? This is a verbal description, don't be deceived by the description, it's a fact.

So what shall I do with this loneliness? You've understood my question? What shall I do with the loneliness: the 'I' who has created the loneliness, the isolation, says, 'What shall I do?' I wonder if you see this. Please.

Q: Yes.

K: Thank god, somebody sees it.

Q: That's the act of trying to solve - again you're back in the solution.

K: Of course. But I've put the wrong question, that's why. I've put a wrong question to myself when I say, 'What shall I do?', or 'Tell me what to do', I'm still isolating myself. So the next question is, is that loneliness separate from me? You follow, sir? Or I am that?

Q: Who is the self?

K: Tunki, have you listened to what I have to say. We have reached a certain point, Tunki, which is, I used to escape from this loneliness, I see the absurdity of it, and so I won't escape. But there is this loneliness, this isolation. So I'm still trying to do something about it. So I must find a solution, I must operate, I'm doing something - but is that loneliness different from the actor who says, I must do something about it. Or the actor himself is that. I wonder if you see this.

Q: Yes. Isn't that fear, right at that second?

K: No, no. I have no fear yet. I'm coming to that. Mr Scott asked me, take one example, say, loneliness, and go into it. That's what we're doing, which is, I have done everything about it, run away, rationalized it, all the rest of it. And when I reject that, then I still say, 'What am I to do?' We're pointing out it is a wrong question because you are still operating as though that loneliness, isolation, is different from the actor, the doer. The doer is that.

Q: He's sustained it artificially.

K: Yes, so the observer is the observed. This is difficult for most of us to get. I'm sorry, I must keep at it.

Q: Now, when we..

K: Scott, have you got this?

Q: I think so.

K: You think so? Is it so?

Q: I can see the actor has created that. I see that the actor has created that.

K: Yes, the actor has created that and the actor is that, because he has created it.

Q: That seems particularly difficult.

K: Of course, because our conditioning is to keep the two separate. Our conditioning is to act upon it.

Q: Krishnaji, isn't that the problem, that the actor creates the symptom. And then immediately the actor continues to create a reaction

K: That's right sir, that's right.

Q: So one is continually trapped.

K: That's right. But when you see the actor is the action, you have quite a different - your mind is quite different when you see that.

Q: But may I ask, in a sense, a degree, how different, one sees that and yet one feels, in one's awareness there is an extraordinary habituated...

K: That's our conditioning. So I say, look, what am I doing. I have been caught in a tradition, educated and so on, to separate the actor from the action.

Q: I don't think that's it. I don't think that's it at all. I think something else happens, something else. It's like trying to switch something, it's not the conditioning, it's something else.

K: All right, sir. What is it? Now let's find out. You say it's not the conditioning, all right, we'll put it aside for the moment. I don't reject it - put it aside. I say, 'Is that so?' I say, 'Why is there this division?' Right? Before I've acted upon it, run away from it, suppressed it, controlled it and so on, and so on. I must have a conversation with you only, and with nobody else, and therefore I get attached to you, and this attachment has made me more and more isolated. And then I say, I'm isolated, lonely. And I say I must do something about it. Or tell me what to do about it. Which means I'm still maintaining the division. Right sir? Now is that a fact, is the division a fact? But is that not an illusion? Though we accept it as a fact, is that not an illusion? Go slow. Right, sir?

Q: You mean, this division is an illusion?

K: What, sir?

Q: You mean, what is an illusion?

K: The illusion is...

Q:... the division.

K: Yes.

Q: Krishnaji, I can see that that's an illusion, and I can, without meaning to be presumptuous, I can see that I am that loneliness, and that there is not a division.

K: So what happens? How did you come to - no, be careful - how did you come to that?

Q: Well I don't think he would talk about it if he really saw it.

K: I know, but I'm asking something else. I'm asking, how did he come to it?

Q: I don't think he came to it, that's the point.

K: All right, put it differently.

Q: I can see, I'll tell you now, I can tell you how I came to it. In listening to what you said and in seeing the entity that was, that felt that loneliness, that was the same, that was the loneliness came from the same source that felt it. So I could see in my way, what I thought was that I was the loneliness.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: But that doesn't give me any insight yet into...

K: That's the whole point. Which he is pointing out, which Dr Shainberg is pointing out.

Q: Is it that one has jumped and then you know you have jumped. But you don't know how you've jumped, yet.

K: All right. If that is so, that is, have you jumped? It doesn't matter how. Have you jumped to this fact that the division between the actor and the loneliness, the actor says, 'I must do something about it', therefore he's still in the same area of loneliness. If you see that, then there is no division.

Q: Could I pause there for a moment, because you say we are going very slowly. I see the symptom, the expression, the jump that has occurred. That's different.

K: No.

Q: From what you're saying.

K: I understand, sir. I'm asking, when you have jumped there is no conflict about loneliness.

Q: Otherwise you wouldn't jump.

K: Wait. He and I are talking for the moment. Forgive me, sir.

He says he has jumped to that. And it may be still an illusion, so I'm asking respectfully - when the observer is the observed, there is no conflict. When the observer who sees he is lonely and the observer says, 'I am that', then there is no conflict. Right? Is that a fact to you, no conflict about loneliness?

Q: It's not a fact for me.

K: And therefore that jump is not what we're talking about.

Q: I was just going to say, I think we are not so with communication. You see, if I sense that I am lonely, and in my investigation I see the fact that I am lonely because of the existence of an 'I'...

K: No, existence of various actions, in daily life, which has brought about this loneliness.

Q: Yes, sir. The continual operation of the 'I'. What I am saying when I use the word 'jump' is the fact that I have become aware...

K: That's all.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's a different jump.

Q: Exactly.

K: Quite, quite. So I'm asking something else, which is, do I realize the illusion I've been living in, where I have separated loneliness from me, and therefore 'me' can act upon 'it'. Right? Do I see that?

Q: I'm sorry, could you clarify, Krishnaji - you just said 'me' can act upon...

K: Yes, sir. Look: I am lonely. Let's follow slowly, step by step. I'm lonely. Realizing the terror of it, the feeling of complete lack of relationship with anything, I'm afraid of it. So I run away from it. I suppress it, control it, all kinds of things I do. And the loneliness still remains. Because then I ask myself, 'What shall I do about this?' Right, sir? I read books, I read, etc., which means what? I am still in the same relationship as I was before, with regard to loneliness.

Q: Yes.

K: Loneliness hasn't been resolved. I'm still in the same position as I was before when I went round escaping from it. And I'm still in the same position when I ask the question, 'What shall I do about it?'

Q: Yes.

K: Which means I don't see that loneliness is the action of my thinking which has brought about this division, because I thought I must be a great man, I must do this. You follow, sir?

Q: If I might just continue on that point, Krishnaji, just at that point. You see, the stumbling block, I found, the stumbling block is that from the moment of being aware of the symptom and then, as you suggested rightly, the 'I' says, 'How can I deal with it?' My point is, the question which is organic and totally asked, which the 'I' is asking, has an electrifying speed, it is born so fast that you can't get hold of it.

K: Of course, of course, because it is part of our illusion. So, you see, sir - no, please, sir, just listen. Have you see that you are escaping from loneliness?

Q: Yes.

K: Wait. Which means you are acting upon loneliness. All right. And you see you can't escape from loneliness. Wait. Next, you say now I'll not escape.

Q: Sorry, may I correct that. I'm not saying I can't escape.

K: Ah, well then we're lost. Then we're lost.

Q: What I'm saying is my escaper continues to escape from loneliness.

K: Then we have to investigate why the mind will not face the fact.

Q: Yes. That's it.

K: Will not face the fact that I am silly. Now wait a minute, go slowly. Is that fact that I'm silly the result of comparison? Take it slowly, I'm going slowly into it. You are bright, you are intelligent, you are this and that, and in comparing myself with you, I say, 'My god, how silly I am'. Wait, that's one factor, sir. One factor. I'm going into it - piano, piano. Non troppo allegro. What is the other factor?

Q: Isn't it part of the incapacity we were talking about earlier?

K: Incapacity. What is the question we are asking?

Q: Why we can't see the fact, why we can't.

K: Yes, why can't we face the fact - fact, not what I think about the fact. Right? But the fact.

Q: I don't accept being lost.

K: Wait. I'm investigating. The fact. Look, I say the fact is I am silly. Is that fact the result of comparison? Obviously.

Q: Yes.

K: Wait, no, don't agree so quickly. If it is the result of comparison, if I don't compare, am I silly? You follow, sir? If I have no comparison at all, what am I then? I don't know.

Q: Exactly.

K: Wait, wait. Which means what? I am incapable of facing the fact because you have pointed out to me that you must be intelligent to face the fact. Intelligent, without fear, or whatever the word you like to use. To face a fact I mustn't run away from it, obviously. But my whole education has been to run away from it. Why can't I face the fact? Because of education or I have lived all my life comparing myself with somebody else. I'm going slowly. Is it I cannot face the fact because I have not the capacity for it? Ask yourself, sir. I have the capacity now, you follow? I've understood what capacity is. Is it I cannot face the fact because I don't know how to look. Right? Slowly, slowly. I'm exploring, sir. Is it a fact I can't face the fact because I don't know how to look at it?

Q: Now you've already looked at the fact that you are isolating yourself.

K: That's all.

Q: You've already seen that. Now how come you can't see that fact? What happens?

K: You see - I'll tell you how I do it. Not through the observation of escapes, controls, and all that, I say, loneliness, isolation, because of that, my daily life. So my daily life changes completely.

Q: Yes, but that's the jump. That's not true, you didn't do that. You said, what am I going to do about loneliness. Yes. You yourself skipped that.

K: No, sir. I myself expressed the question of others. No, don't brush it aside, don't brush it aside. I am not lonely. I won't go through that. Cut me out as a person.

Q: Ok, forget you. Let's go back, now we have seen the isolation, then we go to - I'm going to do something about that, I'm going to go to the movies.

K: You go to the movies, but when you come back home, it's still there. So can you face the fact? That's what we're discussing. Which means, can you face the fact without running away, looking at it correctly, without any deviation, which means, can you look at it without any motive, which is deviation and so on. Can you look at a fact? Can any of us look at a fact that one is violent. Take that fact. Fact, that one is violent. Can you face it? Sexually, competitive, doesn't matter, you know, violent.

Q: But do I have to compare to see that I am violent?

K: What?

Q: Do I have to compare to see that I am violent?

K: No, I went to comparison through another matter. I'm violent. You know what violence is, getting angry.

Q: How do I know what violence is unless I have a comparison?

K: No, sir, getting angry is violent, trying to be something when you are not, is violence.

Q: You see, we're used to working through comparison, that's part of the difficulty. Part of the difficulty is working through comparing what I see of violence with what I see outside as violence. And so we work in the world of ideas. That's one of the chief difficulties.

K: Look, sir, Mr Smith, I'm asking, can you look at a fact. That's all we're concerned with for the moment. Can I look at the fact of my loneliness, not running away from it, not trying to find an answer for it, or trying to have a motive to say, 'Look, what am I to do with it?' Can you just look at a fact and keep looking at it?

Q: The point is that most people find this very difficult.

K: That's right, sir. Most people find it most difficult to look at a fact; look at the fact that you're jealous, look at the fact that you're violent, look at the fact that you are ugly, both externally or inwardly, or you may be most beautiful and look at the fact, in the mirror. To look in the mirror and not compare yourself with somebody else who is more or less. So what happens? Can you look at that loneliness, without any deviation, without any motive, just look? Now this is most difficult. You follow, sir? Because observation is the movement of thought, which is deviation. I wonder if you see?

Q: Yes.

K: I'm just discovering what I said.

Q: Well, this, Krishnaji, is again the problem, the observation of thought.

K: No, I don't want to enter into that for the moment. Just a minute, sir, purposely, because it's complicated enough.

Q: So it's always...

K: Yes, sir. Look, can I observe my loneliness. And hear all the noise, the emptiness, the silence, the inwardness of it - observing means also listening. Can I do that? It might tell me, it might tell its content, you follow? If I know how to look, if I know how to listen to the thing that I call loneliness. It may be the most extraordinary factor involved in it. But if I run away, escape, and all that, it's not telling its story to me, it's not revealing its story.

Well, sir. So you find it awfully difficult to face a fact, face the fact that I've told a lie. And not say I told a lie because this, protecting somebody, you frightened me. You follow? But the fact that I told a lie. See how extraordinarily difficult it is, sir, isn't it?

Why? Answer me, sir. Why? Why is it so difficult for most of us to face a fact?

Q: It's only difficult when it refers to oneself.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: If it doesn't refer to oneself it's easy enough.

K: That's right, sir. I am lame. I won't accept the fact. I met a man once - he had no hand, right hand. So he put out his stump, he said, 'Don't be frightened, I've no hand'. You follow, sir? He faced the fact that he has no hand, and said, 'I don't mind, shake my stump'. He said that.

Q: I think it was rather inconsiderate of him.

K: Can I face the fact that I am absolutely nothing. That's the - you follow, sir? This is really...

Q: That's the key point. The key point.

K: Can you face the fact that you're absolutely nothing? You know that is really...

Q: All the problems are solved.

K: What, sir?

Q: There are no more problems.

K: No, no, there is. No problem, but there is something much more when you come to that point. Point not verbally but actual fact - the fact that you're nothing, your clothes you've got, ideas you've got, beliefs you've got, experiences, all those are words, words, words.

Q: What makes it difficult is that you are always comparing.

K: No, sir. I'm asking, just say, I can't do it. That's simple. I cannot face the fact that I'm absolutely nothing.

Q: I've not discovered yet what you mean by nothing.

Q: Yes.

K: Oh, no, I can tell you. All the structure that you have built about yourself, the speaker, tremendous knowledge, a violinist, pianist, all this is what - what are they?

Q: You mean not nothing but a miserable human being?

K: Yes, sir. The professor says you may be nothing but you're a miserable human being. No, you don't see, that's why we never face the fact that I'm that, as he points out, I'm a miserable human being. My quarrels are petty, my relationship with my wife is so tawdry, misery, confusion, I never face it.

In India they've got a marvellous solution for this - karma, past life. The whole Asiatic world is soaked in this ignorance. In the past life I did something that was wrong, therefore I'm paying for it now. Or, I'm living in a good palace because I did very well last life.

So, why is it so intolerable to face a fact? If you tell me that I'm really an ignorant fool, actually you tell me that, and I say, all right, let me look. I am not frightened, I want to find out if I am an ignorant fool, or it's your reaction which makes you say that to me. I want to find out. Which means - you follow, sir? - I've got intensity as passion, as he pointed out, because I'm not satisfied with things as they are, in myself.

So now, can I face the fact that I'm frightened, and not do a thing about it, just face it. Can I? Can you? If you face the fact, then a whole series of enquiries begin, real enquiries, not intellectual, verbal enquiries. That is, I'm facing the fact that I told a lie last year and I'm frightened that you might discover that lie, because I've got a reputation to keep up, that I never lie. But I have told a lie and I don't want you to discover it. Can I face that fact without any sense of guilt, without any sense of saying, it was right, I should have lied because of this, that and the other? Just to know, look at it. See that gives you tremendous vitality. Has, if I may ask, has it given you that vitality, that sense of drive, with passion? Say, I've faced the fact, it's finished. I may lie but that's over, you can tell everybody about it, if you want, you follow, sir? And I'm out of it.

I think we had better stop. Tomorrow is a holiday, for everybody. For me too. I have to go to the dentist. So we meet on Saturday. Shall we go on with this fear question?

Q: Yes.

K: Right.

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH SEMINAR MEETING 16TH SEPTEMBER 1978

Krishnamurti: May we go on with what we were talking about the other day, the day before yesterday morning. How difficult it is, we said, to face facts, facts being that which is actually taking place now. The word 'actual', not the potential or the possible but as in French, what is now, what's going on. And for most of us it's very difficult to face that, without any distortion or deviation or the division between the observer and the observed, the actual thing that's going on, and the one who is watching that which is happening. That's what we came to in our talk the other day. Shall we go on from there?

Q: Sir, you said something the other day which I hope you'll go into a little bit more. You said, thought is a deviation which had many implications in seeing the fact that...

K: Yes.

Q:...is a deviation.

K: That's right. We said, yes, we'll go into that presently. May we go on with this, most of us want to? Can we, each one of us face the fact, the actual reaction which we call fear. That's what we're discussing, the whole question of fear. Watching it without the interference of thought, which naturally distorts or moves away or deviates from that which is actually taking place.

And is there the division between that which is happening psychologically, inwardly, and the one who is observing what is taking place? That's the question we must seriously go into, because where there is division between the observer and the observed, or the thinker and the thought, there must be conflict, there must be contradiction, there must be either control, suppression or running away - the observer imposing what he thinks is right according to his value, his tradition, his conditioning. So we must really understand this question very carefully and deeply, whether there is such a division between the actual reaction that is going on within us, when there is fear, and the one who says, 'I am afraid,' and so there is separation from the entity or the thinker that says, 'I am different from fear.'

Because, you see, this is a question which leads into rather complex things, which is, if the division exists, then the doer, the actor, the observer, the thinker can operate on that which he is observing. Then he can control, shape, alter. And that's what, traditionally, we have been doing. And we're asking now, is such a division between the observer and that which is actually going on, is it a reality. We have made it into a reality because it's become our tradition, our habit to divide, 'me' and the 'not me', we and they, my belief and your belief and so on. Now is this an actual fact, that that which is happening, can it be observed without the observer, without the one who says, 'I can do something about it.' Then if it can be done, then you will remove entirely and completely the whole question of conflict between this and that. I hope I'm making myself clear.

Please don't listen to me, I'm nobody. But let us, each one of us, find out the truth of it.

Q: How about the question, Krishnaji, that when something is happening you actually can't observe, you cannot observe? In other words, if I get up and I have an inclination to run down the road, or

I have an inclination to hit someone, that inclination, if I observe it, has already happened, the observation has already actually happened.

K: That's it, it's already happened and therefore the observer created it. But as it is happening, which is the fact, that's what we are discussing, not after it has happened or before it will happen, but actually as it is happening.

Sir, if we are interested, if we are concerned with the question of struggle, conflict, then we must find out if it is at all possible to eliminate in life every sense of conflict, in oneself, in one's relationship and so on. Is that possible? We say - I say it is possible only when the division between, psychologically the division between the observer and that which is actually going on, when there is no such division, then you eliminate altogether conflict. When there is such division, the observer then can analyze that which is happening, and go into the whole process of analysis and so on, which we won't go into for the moment. But if it is not, if there is no actual division, then that which is happening undergoes a radical transformation. That's all my point.

Q: Sir, in that observation, would you define, maybe say that there is a certain degree of thought in that.

K: No.

Q: But what is it....

K: You've made a statement - let's make it clear. When we observe - when there is division, then thought is in operation. Thought then can say, 'I will control it, I will run away from it, I will suppress it, I will analyze it,' and go through all that process. When there is no observer, who is the very essence of thought which is the past - I don't know if you are following all this - then there is only actually what is happening. Can that actuality, the fact, be observed without the movement of thought? If the movement of thought takes place, then you're acting from the past, and therefore distorting it, deviating it, run away from it and so on. Full stop.

Q: Sir, but can we describe that examination? We need the qualities of thought which are from the past, which are value judgements, which are associations, if we can say that when the observer and the observed are not separate, that those qualities are not present, then what is going on?

K: Find out! Don't ask me. I'll tell you, if we can discuss this, you see, if you say, what's then going on, you're asking an abstract, hypothetical question.

Q: No, I'm trying to find out if there is a, quote, thinking, not the one who is thinking.

K: There is no according to me - I may be totally wrong, I may live in an illusion, etc., etc., but I don't think so, when I say, then there is no operation of thought at all. Then there is pure observation. Just a minute. And in that observation the thing which is being observed undergoes a change, a movement, a mutation.

Q: I think you're wrong there.

K: Good!

Q: I think it's that observation - I think there is pure happening. It follows, this is followed by observation. But the pureness is in the happening, not in the observing.

K: I don't follow this.

Q: In other words, if I say to you, 'What do you see in this room?'

K: Just a minute, sir. What is it you don't agree with?

Q: I think that the happening is the primary thing, and observing is something that follows on

K: I see. That is, the happening at the moment of anger, there is no observer. Only the observer comes into operation, into function, a moment or a second later. Obviously. Then the operator, the doer, the thinker acts upon it, and then the whole problem of conflict arises. Now can you observe that happening without the whole rigmarole of thought coming into it?

Q: Only if one is interested and not on the defensive, against the fact.

K: What?

Q: Only if one is really interested to see, not on the defensive against the fact at all.

K: I don't quite understand, sir.

Q: This happened to me following your last talk.

K: Not my thought. I won't - please forgive me.

Q: Sorry, I didn't make myself clear. I was accused of something, a fact, that I'd done something I should not have done.

K: You see, the moment you say, 'I should not have done'.

Q: I was accused of something that they said I should not have done. You see. And I looked at that moment at what was being said. And it was true, what was being said. My relationship was with the truth of this observation.

K: So - no, not my relationship with truth. I am angry. Right? Suppose I am angry, there is anger, not I am angry - there is anger. Can I - is there an observation of that feeling, that reaction, without the whole movement of thought coming into it? That's all my question.

Q: Sir, for the most part there isn't. Most of the time there isn't. Most of the time there is the anger and then the observer looking at that anger, and thinking that it's separate. So could we take a look at the process by which we move from that state of the observer being different from the observed, to where the observer would be the observed. In other words, that the observer being the observed is not the normal state, is not the normal frame of mind, is not the normal consciousness. So could we take a look at how that could come about?

K: Scott, would you consider for a moment, observing that which is happening now, just to observe. Can you do it? Can I observe my jealousy, can one observe jealousy as it is taking place, not say it's right or wrong, or rationalize it, why it should not be, but just to, as it arises, as a flower blooms, just to watch it.

Q: But when you ask, can I observe...

K: Not I.

Q:... there already is the division.

K: No, that's a way of talking which is - please - not I - all right. There is jealousy. Is it possible to observe that reaction which is called jealousy without the movement of thought?

Q: In other words, can there be constant awareness.

K: No, I don't want, in other words. You see, the moment you go off into something, then it becomes - 'what is awareness' and so on - complicated.

Q: So the moment you use the word 'observe it', can one observe it or whatever, there's a duality implied.

K: I've said that, sir, observer implies a duality. Agreed. But try it. Just a minute. You are jealous, sometimes. What is your actual feeling now?

Q: Bafflement.

K: Wait, bafflement, puzzle - can you watch that puzzle, that state of the mind which is in puzzle, just watch it, not say, 'I must be clear, what he's talking about,' just watch it, see.

Q: There seems to be a physical resistance.

K: What?

Q: There seems to be at some point a physical resistance to that, to that watching.

K: Why? Is it physical? The gentleman says there is a certain resistance, physically, to watch. Because you're not comfortably seated? Or it is happening in the bus? Or when you're walking?

Q: No.

K: Are you saying there must be certain relaxation to observe?

Q: No, I meant some disturbance that you feel in the body, a physical reaction.

K: To?

Q: To be watching.

K: Why should there be?

Q: I don't know.

K: I'm asking, sir, why should there be a physical reaction to watching? Maybe, I don't know - please, all of this is supposed to be a discussion in which each one of us takes part, not one or two and the rest keep silent and listen.

Q: I'm going to ask you, actually, when you, for instance, I think you were saying, if you're looking at fear, just trying to watch it, you're saying there's a physical resistance. Is this what you're saying?

Q: Not especially of fear.

Q: Because I would have thought the reason is because you want an answer, the mind always seems to want an answer to a problem instead of just opening out.

Q: When you start staying with something, at some point there's like a refusal, physical refusal.

Q: We can't hear back here - sorry.

Q: I'm sorry. It seems that at some point when you kind of started to stay with the fact, there is a physical refusal in your body to go along with that.

K: Because that refusal may be the result of strain. Just a minute. Don't say, no. Or your body's not comfortable. Or there is a certain sense of resistance to the intensity of watching.

Q: Perhaps, yes.

K: Physical resistance to watching intensely. Because perhaps is it, that we're not used to watching anything intensely? The moon, the sky, the trees, whatever it is? To watch. Now, can we put the question differently - apparently this seems to be rather difficult, all this. Why should thought interfere with anything, psychologically?

Q: Somehow time comes in.

K: Just a minute, sir.

Q: There are the extremes of jealousy, the immediate of that seems to be, well, if I indulge the jealousy, what's the result of it.

K: All that's implied thinking, isn't it? I'm asking, can I - is there an observation - the moon - without the interference of thought?

Q: It is a state of mind. It's a state of mind, awareness.

K: No, don't, please, sir, don't introduce state of mind, awareness. I'm just asking, can you watch the moon without thought drawing a curtain across it? No?

Q: Occasionally.

K: Yes?

Q: Occasionally.

K: Occasionally? All right. Can you watch a movement of cloud, occasionally? Now can you watch your reactions in the same way?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes, this morning I have occasionally the experience of...

K: Not you, sir - just to watch something without any movement of thought.

Q: Krishnaji...

Q: Sir, a subjective experience inside oneself, isn't that of necessity a kind of thought?

K: Why?

Q: Because it's inside, it's not an outside thing that you can just look at and not indulge in thought about it.

K: Because it doesn't affect us.

Q: Well, it...

K: Unless we are lunny.

Q:.... is in a sense an abstraction, it's going on in the mind.

K: So can I - can there be an observation without abstraction? Put it ten different ways.

Q: Would it be called observation?

K: Do I give up, or do you give up?

Q: There can be and there sometimes is, but it's infrequent.

K: Sir, may I ask another question. Has it ever occurred to you, whether it is possible to live without any conflict?

Q: That's totally different.

K: No, it is not, it's not.

Q: I am not the moon, there is a division.

K: No, sir. I move the same thing, which is, we live in conflict. Right? Now I'm asking a question related to what previously we talked about, the conflict between me, the duality - I'm asking the question, is it possible to live, if you have ever asked yourself, without conflict. Have you? Between yourself, your wife, between yourself, and somebody else and conflict within yourself.

Q: Yes, and one says, why should there be conflict, one is implying...

K: What, sir?

Q: When one says, why should there be conflict, one's implying that there mustn't be.

K: Have you ever asked yourself?

Q: Not until you suggested it the other day.

Q: Yes.

Q: Not until you suggested it was possible.

K: So, I suggested it. All right. Have you found out whether that is possible or not possible?

Q: It is possible

K: No, then it is not - you're already saying, it is possible, then you've blocked it. Or if you say it's not possible, you have blocked it. But to find out whether it is possible to live without conflict implies there should be no division. Right?

Q: Yes.

Q: I do not agree.

K: What don't you agree with?

Q: The division between me and the moon...

K: No, moon...

Q: Yes, you talked about the moon.

Q: There's no conflict there.

Q: There's no conflict, that's right, but there is the division.
