K: No - the moon doesn't very much affect us, unless we are peculiar, neurotic - the moon does affect them. But we're not peculiar, I said it's easy to look, one may look at the moon intensely for some time, because it doesn't affect us deeply. But I can equally observe - can there be observation of our reaction without any shadow of thought? That's what we're discussing.

From that arises whether it is possible to live a life without any sense of conflict. And conflict exists wherever there is division. Right? The Jew, the Arab, the Dutch, the Malays, the English and so on, division, national division, psychological division, religious division and so on. So as long as there is a division in oneself there must be conflict. That's obvious, sir. Right? You agree, sir? If you say so, how is one to eliminate that conflict? They have tried different ways, that is, identify yourself with god, god will save you, abandon yourself to god, some principle, or surrender yourself to something greater, forget yourself. We have tried all those various systems which we hope will eliminate this conflict. Right? But it hasn't. Right? So I'm asking a question, which is, as long as there is division in the observer and the observed, there must be conflict, because there is division. Right?

Now, is that division artificially created by thought or is it actual? You follow my question? If it is actual - you understand - which is not an illusion, not a fancy, if the division is actual, then I must live for ever in conflict. One must live. Right? If the division is not true, accurate, factual, then as there is no conflict - right? - then the very thing which is being observed undergoes a change. I cannot put it more differently.

Q: Sir, what one is observing is often thought itself, so are you saying that the change comes about in thought itself?

K: Yes, sir. Can you observe - not you - can thought - please, just listen for fun - can thought observe itself?

Q: We acknowledge thoughts going through our minds.

K: No - not through our - I'm asking a question which is, is there an observation of thought by thought? Or can thought itself be conscious of its own movement? One thought can say, I'll watch the other thought moving. And so control it, shape it and so on. But I'm asking a different question, which is, can thought be conscious of itself as a movement?

Q: Are you saying that the whole of thought is conscious of thought?

K: What, sir?

Q: Are you saying that the whole of thought is conscious of thought, not one part of thought?

K: That's right. Thought.

Q: Not just the essence, the whole of thought.

K: Thought, thought is - the whole of thought.

Q: Yes, but usually we say one part of thought is conscious.

K: Of course, You've understood? One thought is part of the whole. So can thought, which is the whole, be aware of itself?

Q; That raises the problem - you have said before, thought is always fragmentary.

K: Yes, sir - no. Thought is fragmentary. Right?

Q: But not always?

K: Wait. Can thought which is fragmentary, can that thought be aware of itself?

Q: But then that thought is the whole.

K: No, wait - particular thought. Let's - leave the whole for the moment, because that leads to a little more complex. Say you have a particular thought - no. You have a particular thought, a thought, a thought. Can that thought be conscious of itself. Not, another thought is conscious of it.

Q: That thought has to be conscious of itself, but if it moves it cannot be conscious of itself. It becomes another thought.

K: I don't quite follow this.

Q: If you say thought is to be conscious of itself...

K: I'm asking, sir - let's leave out thought. Can consciousness be aware of itself? Consciousness being the whole content, thought - I say I don't want to bring in whole and all that.

Q: Can any kind of consciousness be aware of itself, or must it be a particular kind of consciousness. In other words, could the kind of consciousness which...

K: Look, Scott, just a minute. You know what your consciousness is, do you?

Q: No, not fully, no. Most of the time I'm just caught up...

K: No.

Q:... it's operating.

K: No, if you look - please, just listen. Your consciousness is made up of its content. Right? The content is your jealousy, anxiety, fear, love, hate, sexual demands, the whole of human endeavour, struggle, pain, pleasure, sorrow, death, and so on. The whole of that is made up of all these little parts. Right? Can that consciousness be aware of itself? Or is that not possible?

Q: And would you differentiate this from thought, is this something different?

K: No, I've moved away for the moment.

Q: It must be. You see, the whole of it, the whole consciousness must be aware of itself, no particular aspect of it.

K: Yes, put it that way if you like.

Q: But what in the world can that mean, the whole of consciousness being aware of its whole self - what does that mean?

K: I don't know. What does it mean to you?

Q: There are two ways...

K: No, what does it mean to you? Don't ask me.

Q: To me it means a confused entity looking at itself.

K: I give up.

Q: To me it means a confused entity looking at itself.

Q: Krishnaji, could I just ask you, isn't this a matter of seeing something, understanding something false which is going on in the mind and that coming to an end, and then the possibility of something else? If I think now about being aware of my whole consciousness, and I make effort to be aware of my whole consciousness, I mean, that's just, you know, that has no meaning.

K: You know we began by asking - Thursday morning, the day before yesterday - can we observe a fact. Right? The fact, we mean by fact that which is actually taking place. Not a second later, or a minute later, but actually that which is going on, which is happening, not happened and then observed. But the very happening itself. Right? That's what we were discussing. Let's stick, let's forget all that we've said.

Now that's all I'm asking. I'll put it in ten different ways. So that is the central issue that we're trying to talk over together, and find whether it is possible to look at, to observe that which is actually taking place. That's all.

Q: Krishnaji, can I just ask, would you say that really it's simple to do this, really in essence it's simple to do this. Would you just say it's a simple thing to do? This is what you're saying, how I interpret it or it looks like to me. Thought comes into the mind, that's all. There is the thought. That's the fact, there's no movement, nothing, just aware of the fact.

K: It's more than that, sir.

Q: Is there more?

Q: May I ask, when you say observe what is actually happening now, at first it appears that what is happening takes time, when thought comes in, then another comes in. Is that what you were talking about when you say what is actually happening?

K: I'm lost in all this.

Q: Can I...

K: Good, sir - come in and join us.

Q: Is what you're saying, that there must be a form of immediate apprehension in observation which is then followed rapidly by thought but which precedes thought?

K: That's right.

Q: Do you apprehend a feeling, then you move away from that feeling, for a thought.

K: That's right. That's right. Can you as the Professor pointed out, Mr Wilkins, can you apprehend that which is happening. It seems so extraordinarily difficult. Am I cuckoo, or what?

Q: I experience the fact that there is so much movement which rarely tells what is happening. If something's happening it's really happening.

K: Let me. Sir, look.

Q: Really happening.

K: No - we have been envious, haven't we? Now wait a bit. You know what the feeling of it is. Can you - is there an observation of that envy as it arises, just to observe that which is happening, this, called envy.

Q: Can I put it a different way? What about, let's start with envy. Now a real actual event, envy, is before any observation, in other words, it really happens.

K: That's what the Professor said, sir, that which is happening.

Q: Right.

K: Now can...

Q: Stay with that.

K: That's it, stay with that.

Q: No observing.

K: All right, I'll use another word - stay with that.

Q: OK.

Q: Don't bring time into it.

Q: It's just being a feeling, isn't it?

Q: You just feel it.

Q: It's just being a feeling.

Q: Therefore physically and psychologically there is something that may be called envy. Is that right?

Q: Just a feeling, surely just a feeling. And as soon as the thought comes in...

K: Sir, we began by asking, we were talking about fear. Can you - is there an observation of fear as it is happening? That's all. To put it very ,very simply, after a lot of words.

Q: Well, the funny thing is, as soon as I observe, it seems to go, it's hiding, it disappears.

K: Now does it disappear so that it doesn't return, ever?

Q: I don't know.

K: Or is it something, because you are observing with attention and it goes.

Q: Yes.

K: Wait, wait. So it's only when there's inattention fear comes.

Q: Very much so.

K: So, then what is that attention?

Q: It's like space, isn't it?

K: What?

Q: It's like space.

K: No, it's not like - what we're saying is, what is that attention?

Q: You have simply taken the focus off the sensation of fear and onto, and focusing on something called attention. Therefore the fear diminishes. Like looking at that wall instead of looking at that wall.

K: No. As the gentleman, as he pointed out Maria, please, don't explain it away, just see what he is saying. He says, when I attend to that fear, it disappears. And I ask, we asked, does that fear return, in another form. So doesn't that indicate - I'm just asking - that when there is attention, fear is not. So can I attend fear, which is taking place, with that attention. You follow, sir? We're putting it ten different ways.

Q: Can I put it this way?

K: No, I want to stick, not your way.

Q: No, I know, but if I am confused, and if I stick with my confusion, now the confusion may disappear but I don't know any, I still don't know anything, I'm still in the same state.

K: No. I am - one is confused. And I watch, and I attend to that confusion, look, attend, give attention to that confusion. For the moment it is not. So I've learnt something, which is, when there is attention, confusion is not.

Q: Yes, but did he put his finger on something important there, which is the fact that the way you say it, when there is attention, confusion is not, but equally there is something there that is not thought, in other words, there's a new state.

K: That's all, sir.

Q: But that new state is really thought. He seems to be going away from that.

K: What's that?

Q: He said he was in a new state, when confusion...

K: Not, he was in a new state.

Q: Right. Yes.

Q: But sir, you asked, what is this attention, this most extraordinary thing, this attention - I don't know what it is, I can't find out, but I know it is an extraordinary thing. I do not know what it is.

K: We can go into that, sir. Let me put the question differently. Can you, when there is fear, can you - is there an attention of that fear, attention. That's all I'm asking, we are discussing. When there is attention, will there be fear? So does attention contain or hold thought?

Q: No.

K: Wait.

Q: Krishnaji, there is implied when you say can there be attention there, that there is no movement of thought. So...

K: You have to find this out, sir. That is, I'm asking, is there in that state of attention any movement of thought?

Q: It merely seems to me that this attention doesn't belong to me, it's a non-physical or...

K: It is not yours, that's all - I agree. It's nobody's.

Q: But Krishnaji, here is the brain, say it's feeling fear or whatever the emotion is. Now the attention comes about. What is going on, the brain is looking at it.

K: Would you want to discuss that?

Q: Yes, I do.

K: Wait, Maria, please for god's sake go slowly. I don't know, you may be interested, but the others may not be interested. So I'm asking. When there is attention, she asked, what is going on in the brain. Don't you want to find out what goes on?

Q: Yes.

Q: I'd rather understand how attention comes about, rather than what is happening.

K: Wait. We can come to all this slowly, please.

Q: Does this attention use the brain?

K: Is attention to be learnt? Practised and repeated?

Q: No. It's there.

K: I attend, there is attention about something and that thing disappears. Then I say, 'By Jove, I've learnt something, I'll attend, I'll keep on attending, and practise attention'. Then it's nothing, then it's gone. Right?

So, Maria asks, what is the quality or the state of the mind, the brain, when there is total attention. Right? Are you interested in this?

Q: Yes.

Q: It's very active, I think.

K: What?

Q: Highly active. The brain is highly active in that state of attention.

K: I don't know, we're going to enquire, sir, we're going to - don't let's state anything definite. What do you say, Dr Bohm, and you, sir, you're all experts at this. What is the quality or the state of the brain when there is total attention?

Q: Does the brain become quiet?

K: The brain, you suggest, becomes quiet. Wait, sir, wait. Does attention spring from quietness or you're... you see.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, Tunki, don't - I don't know - we are enquiring, old boy.

Q: Sir, it's a funny thing, as soon as I have intention, why does everything disappear?

K: Wait, sir - that's not the problem. Please, we're asking...

Q: I want to look at it.

K: What is the state of your brain, the brain, when there is complete attention?

Q: Nearly nothing, quietness?

K: Why are you looking at me? The bird in the cage?

Q: Or is it attending to something?

K: I want to find out - one wants to find out what attention means, and if there is such a thing as attention, what is happening to the brain. That's one of our questions. Right? Right, sir?

Pundits?

Q: I think we must say that, the brain, the people who do research on the brain don't really...

K: What, sir?

Q: The people who do research on the brain don't understand attention, and they admit it openly.

K: What? I don't quite follow.

Q: I said that the people who work on the brain do not understand what attention is, and they admit it.

K: You see, are they working on the brain objectively, something over there, or the brain here.

Q: They work objectively.

K: Then we'll have gone off to something else.

Q: But children have attention naturally, don't they?

K: What?

Q: As children.

K: I don't know about children, don't bring in children.

Q: Sorry.

K: This is important to discuss. I want - don't you want to find out, sir, for yourself, what this attention is, and what is the quality of the brain - your brain, not objective brain under a microscope, and operation and all the rest of it - what is the quality of it when you are totally attentive.

Q: It doesn't produce...

K: Don't say - please, sir - we haven't...

Q: Don't we have the most evidence for inattention?

K: What?

Q: I think we can look at inattention, because we don't have attention.

K: All right, look at your inattention.

Q: Are we talking about a focused attention? In this case on inattention, if you like, or something. Or are we just talking about something without focus called attention?

K: Are you attending when one is speaking to you?

Q: Yes.

K: I'm speaking to you now. Are you attending?

Q: Yes.

K: What do you mean by attending?

Q: The attention is focused.

K: No - what do you - Maria, just listen carefully. Don't say, attention - just listen. You are listening now to me, which means, I hope, you're attending. What do you mean by that word 'attending'? Don't say focusing, just find out. Which means you are listening to what I have to say, we both of us know English, therefore you are able to understand the words, and you know the words are not the thing that he is trying to convey. Right? So you're not caught in words. And you are listening with your ears, and also observing what is being said through your optical nerves and so on. So your whole nervous, physical organism is alert, listening, watching.

Right? Would you call that attention?

Q: Well...

K: Keep it simple, don't say, well - there's lots more I can add.

Q: That's it, that's rudimentary attention, it seems to me.

K: Just keep to one thing.

Q: In that is left out what to me is the whole of...

K: Emotion.

Q: Well, emotion...

K: What would you call?

Q: The cerebral whatever it is going on in my mind, my eyes are not important, I can pay as much attention if I close my eyes. But what is being said is registering in the brain. And some process is going on.

K: You see, you're going off, you're doing something which - it's impossible to talk. I'm asking, when you listen totally, is there registration?

Q: Yes.

Q: No.

K: I cannot - one says yes, one says no, you say yes. Is there? Find out before you answer.

Q: Is the first stage one of a positive, open-minded receptiveness?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: That is the initial stage.

K: Yes. Open-minded, that's a rather different word, open-minded generally means a mind that is like a sieve, everything pours in, everything, you follow? But I'm asking something, very simple, sir.

Q: It seems that there is a sensory sensation, and then the words take a quite different place.

K: Sir, I'm asking, do we attend to anything, attend?

Q: If we were attending now, we would understand you.

K: Not me.

Q: Well, we would understand what is being said.

K: You'd understand your own - you'd understand what attention means, not what I mean by attention. Do you know what attention is? Maria says, attention implies focusing. You are focusing on what I am saying, and therefore you think you are attending. I say that is not attending. I may be wrong, but I want to question, presently. That is, when I listen to you, in attention, something that you are saying seriously, there is immediate - there is no registration - immediate understanding.

Q: How can there be no registration?

K: Wait, find out what I've said.

Q: I think perhaps our problem is that our thought is so quick, it comes in so quickly.

K: I know.

Q: And in a way that seems to be the problem, it's so quick.

K: Is it that we don't listen?

Q: Yes, I think we always move away one step.

K: Wait - do you listen to the fact, to this statement, I'm making a statement: can you observe - is there an observation of that which is actually taking place. That's the question, that's a statement. Do you listen to that? Or do you say, 'What does he mean by attention, what does he mean by fear,' wait - 'what does he mean by observing.' So you're off.

Q: Yes, that's what happens I think.

K: Whereas, can you listen to that statement, and the impact of that statement, and in that attention is there any registration at all? There is verbal communication, we have understood each other, English, but is there the registration of the statement, the meaning of that statement, the effect of that statement in your observation, and all the rest of it.

Q: Are you implying, to do something with what you've said. You made a statement. Now I've got to understand the statement.

K: No. No. Wait a bit, sir. I say to you, I love you. You say, 'Just a minute, let me understand what you mean. You mean love, what, sexual?' You don't go through all that circus.

Q: No, but..

K: No, I'm asking.

Q: You said, can I observe something.

K: I'm asking, no, I'm asking something. When a woman or a man comes up to you and says, 'I really love you.' And he means it, not just some kind of trick to catch you or something. When there is a statement made like that, with full meaning, 'I really love you,' - do you go through all this mental process?

Q: No.

K: I don't know, you may - probably you do.

Q: The funny thing, at such a moment, there is complete...

K: No, sir - I'm asking - it's not what is taking place. I'm asking if I may - I'm not being impatient, sir, but you're not answering my question - how do you listen to a man or a woman who tells you from his heart and means it, that he loves you. What takes place?

Do you register that statement? And remember it? And say, 'Yes, I remember you told me you loved me.' You follow, sir?

So I'm asking, in registration - I mean, in attention, is there any registration at all? In attention, when there is attention, there is already a focusing, but it is not the focusing of concentration.

Q: Does it help at all to draw a parallel between this giving out of attention and the giving out of love?

K: Aren't they both the same, sir?

Q: Yes, that's what I'm getting at.

K: Yes, aren't they both the same? When a man or a woman comes to you and says, 'I love you,' because he's so tremendously - you follow? And you say, 'Yes, jolly nice, but tell me all about it.'

Q: I'm much more interested in the lack of attention, because that's the problem.

K: What, sir?

Q: I am more interested in the lack of attention because that's the problem.

K: Lack of?

Q: Lack of attention.

Q: Attention.

K: Lack of attention.

Q: Because that's the problem

K: No, that's not the problem.

Q: It's my problem.

K: No, say it's not your problem, it's all our problem.

Q: All right.

Q: Krishnaji: could we say that when someone comes up and says very sincerely that they love you, could we say that there is an impact?

K: Yes, and then what?

Q: Well then, how does this impact differ from a registration?
In other words, this has an effect, there is an impact of some kind.

K: Look, Scott, just listen. Would you listen to me for a minute, a second. When I say to you, I really mean it, 'I love you,' is there an impact?

Q: Yes.

K: No. Is there? Or what - tell me your own thing, what takes place?

Q: There seems to be something - one wants to hold on to it.

K: Yes. So, you're not listening to what I'm saying, you're listening to your own reactions, your own responses, say, 'How very nice of him - he's a nice man, he's a beautiful man, I'm so glad.' But you haven't received what he has told you.

Q: No, I don't agree with that, I think something has happened, something actually happens when you say it, something happens, something to carry forward. There's a whole - millions of events have occurred.

K: That's right, sir. As he, Mr Wilkins pointed out, attention may be love. And when there is attention which is equal to love, do you register? Now, most of us are inattentive, not attentive. Can you move inattention to attention. You follow, that's your question, sir. Can you make inattention by some miracle, turn it into attention. Or be aware of not attention, that very awareness is attention. Capito?

Q: Yes.

K: You know, we are going off from - you see how we refuse to face a fact. That's all I'm getting at. We refuse to face the fact that we are frightened, frightened animals, or human beings, or lovely human beings. We are frightened. Can we look at that fear? Can we pay attention to that fear? (Pause) Well, sirs?

Q: Well, to do that, one must be in step with fear, pay attention to it, and then if one's in step, there's no step before, no step afterwards.

K: That's not - you know what fear is?

Q: Yes.

K: Both physical and psychological. Can you observe that fear as it is taking place? That's all.

Q: I'm always afraid when I'm not attentive.

K: So you're afraid of not being attentive. Now face that fear.

Q: That's attention itself.

K: No, look at it, don't say attention, look, this, - just find out if you can look at that fear.

Q: If I'm afraid of losing attention, I'm seeking for attention, surely.

K: Of course, then it's all gone. What do you say, sir?

Q: It seems to me that what just happened here is that there was attention when you said what you said, then somebody said they started trying to hold onto it. And it seems to me that that's there were the fear is, right when you said, 'I love you', a thousand things that happen and might be there in the fear.

K: I don't quite follow.

Q: There is fear in what happens when there is attention.

K: Look, Dr Shainberg, my question is very simple, I'm going to keep on persisting. You're all deviating from that question. Can you look at your fear? Stay with it, stay in the sense, no thought deviating from that fact, the fact being what is going on, that which is happening, the actual, the actual is the now. Can you watch it - use the word 'focus', whatever - can you observe that thing without any movement, both physical and non-physical.

Q: Sir, the difficulty is, as soon as I do that, it disappears.

K: Which means, sir - we've been through that, sir. We've been through that. It disappears because you're attentive at that moment.

Q: Then what happens?

K: Then, does that fear recur, come back? Then you say, I must be attentive and it will disappear. So you play this game. So we have learnt a trick for the moment, that being attentive to that thing, it disappears. You have learnt the trick, so you practise that trick, but that fear hasn't gone.

Q: Right.

K: Which means what, you have merely learnt a trick, a mental trick. I want - one wants to find out, if one is at all awake, intelligent, to say is it possible to be free of fear altogether, not this superficial trick of attention and disappearance and coming back and so on, that's all too - I want to ask you a much more serious, fundamental question which is, can fear disappear altogether, never to return. Otherwise I'm playing games.

Q: You automatically enter into the field of desire, I think.

K: No, fear, I don't want to enter - please, sir, stick to one word, and then go into it. When you say desire, of course desire has its fears. There are many forms of fear, desire and so on. Don't - we're talking of fear at the very root, the fear at its very root.

Q: Suppose I say no. To me the answer is no.

K: Then what will you do, just live in fear?

Q: I don't know.

K: But that's what you're doing, when you say I don't know.

Q: That's a fact - I don't know.

K: So, no, when you say, 'I don't know', the thing goes on, under you, like you're on a bridge which says I don't know but the water of fear is flowing. Now can you stop that water, fear, end it.

Q: If presumably that fear cannot be stopped, well then we automatically accept it, I can't stop it, let it go. And then that's when it disappears. But that is something we can't attain.

K: You see, you're talking of attainment, you're talking of stopping - I know, I say I want to understand the whole movement of fear, how it arises, what is its structure, nature, the whole works of fear, I can't stop it, because who is the entity that's going to stop it?

Q: Something different from fear

K: Is it? You see, you just invent these things, you don't - we've been through that, the entity that wants to stop it is part of fear. So he's playing a trick, he's mesmerized, living in illusion, when you say, 'I'll stop fear,'

Q: Sir, being attentive twenty four hours a day.

K: I never said that, sir.

Q: But I am saying that, that will end the trick, because then it won't come back.

K: So be attentive the whole twenty four hours.

Q: Sir, isn't it related to doing nothing?

K: Do nothing - Tunki, you pick up a phrase out of its context and say, 'Do nothing.'

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, Tunki, this is my point. May I repeat it again. One is afraid, there is a great deal of fear in life, of many, many kinds. We are not dealing with the many kinds, but fear itself. Just a minute. And what is this fear, how does it come into being, whether it is possible to end it, not I stop it - is it possible to end it. That's my whole question. How does it arise, what is the root from which it springs. Right? What is it's beginning. I know what the ending is, darkness, you know, all the rest of the ugliness of fear.

So I want to find, is it possible to find out the root of fear. What do you say is the root of fear?

Q: The sense of identity.

K: No, root, sir, root. Identity takes place when there is fear. Because I'm afraid to run, afraid of this thing, I must cling on to something which will get rid of it. I'm asking, please, sir, what is the beginning of fear?

Q: Being inattentive.

K: No, don't use...

Q: Sir, isn't it when you feel insecure in any way, that fear?

K: Is it - is the root of fear the desire for security? The root of fear, to find some absolute, indestructible security? And as there is no such thing, so, you're back again: what is the beginning, the root, the source of fear?

Q: Thought.

K: Who says it?

Q: I do.

K: What, sir?

Q: Thought.

K: Have you found this out for yourself? Or are you repeating what this person has said. What do you say, sir?

Q: I say that, when you say something to me and I really listen to you, there is an event, that at that moment fear is born, that's all I can say.

K: No, look sir.

Q: There is an event.

K: No, no - don't call it an event. Just between the two of us, talking casually or seriously, I say, Look, Dr. Shainberg, what is the beginning of it? It seems to be, everyone has it, the child, the grown-up man and the young man, and every human being has some kind of this tribulation, this movement, which we call fear. We both of us agree what it is. And I say, look, what is the beginning of it? Like a river, you know where it begins, the source, it gets wider and wider, or narrower and narrower and dies. But we're talking about the river, which widens, goes on. And I say, where does it begin?

Q: Deception, isn't it deception? Illusion.

K: Is it from illusion? Illusion of what, who has created this illusion? Who has created this deception? And the gentleman said, the real root of fear, the source, is thought.

Q: Fear comes with time, the idea of time.

K: What?

Q: When thought is time, that's...

K: No, thought - just hold on - for a second - is that so? I've stated many times, I may be wrong, but I've stated it, and I wanted to prove that I'm an idiot and live in an illusion, that the whole movement of fear comes through thought. Thought which says, I must have security, thought says I must be attached otherwise I'm lost, thought would say, where is there security? And invents beliefs, gods, Jesuses, Christs and the Buddhas, you follow? All that. So we say, the root of fear is thought. Show it to me, sir.

Q: Well, my sensitivity is that you can say that to me, and that doesn't add one inch to my illumination of the fact that when you say to me, 'I love you'...

K: No, you're not listening to this. No. You're not listening to it. It is as potent as 'I love you.' It is as vital as the other. Which is, thought is the source of fear. Do you listen to it? No. You've all kinds of conclusions - that's all. I said I may be wrong. I want you to show me I'm wrong. Which means that you first must listen. And you can't listen if you say, 'Sorry, I disagree with you, you're this and you're that and you...'

Q: I think the only suggestion I have about your being wrong is that maybe that the thought, that it is lack of love which precedes the thought, rather than the other way round.

K: All right. If it is the lack of love, then how am I to get it?

Q: That's a miracle.

K: No, I think there is. It's not a miracle. I won't say Jesus will save me, mankind has not been saved by any Jesus's

Q: I'm not suggesting the miracle is impossible, but it seems to me that you are suggesting that there is a possible miracle.

K: There is, but we don't capture it, we don't listen to it.

Q: The way we are listening now, there is no fear, but the moment we rest, I'm wondering what's happening.

K: No, that's not what I'm saying.

Q: It comes in.

K: No, I'm saying, the source of fear of every kind that human beings have is born from thought. Will you listen to that statement, as you will listen when I say I really love you? Because it's too simple your mind immediately says, 'No, that's too damn simple, it's not, it is much more complicated than that'.

Q: Actually my mind says it's too complex.

K: What?

Q: I say, if you want to know what my mind actually says, 'That's too complex' my fear.

K: Yes. So - no, I'm interested to find out the source of it, not the river that is flowing, the source.

Q: In thought being the source, it implies behind that is the self-preservation.

K: I said - is it self-preservation. We said that. Self-preservation, all right. Is that the source of it, that is, security, physical security. Is it possible to have complete physical security? Never to be ill, never to have to go to the dentist. (Laughter) I have been there a dozen times - never go to the dentist, doctors, the organism functioning healthily all the time, which is to have complete physical security. Is that possible?

Q: That's what thought is trying to do but thought fails.

K: Thought says I must - that's right, sir - thought says that - I'm asking, we're pointing out something, sir, I want to find - perhaps if you can tell me what the source of fear is and I listen to you with great attention, because I want to, really want to find out if fear can disappear totally from my whole thinking, living, acting. Then you say, thought is the source. I listen to you, I don't dispute it, I don't say it is right or wrong, I'm going to find out. But first I must listen to it without any abstraction. Then I'll see how extraordinarily complex it is, and in the complexity of it, I may lose it's simplicity.

So I say, thought is the fear. Thought is fear. Thought is time. Thought is measure. I have lived, I have had no pain, now I'll go to the dentist and have pain. It has measurement, and therefore I'm frightened. And thought is time, because tomorrow, I've had pain yesterday and I hope to god tomorrow I won't have it. Time. Right?

I'm afraid of death, which is, I'm living now, death may happen. Or I'll invite death and live with it, life and death, I say, are together, I can play all those kind of tricks. But it's still thought. Thought has invented all the churches, all the contents of the churches, the symbols, the Jesus's, the rituals, the dogmas, everything. And the Christian world, Jesus will save, save quotes. Then I'm afraid that Jesus doesn't exist, ho's going to save me? You follow? Thought has built the most marvellous cathedrals, and the most absurd religious illusions inside.

So, show me, as we said, I may be totally wrong, show me.

Q: It seems that thought combined with the instinct of self-preservation.

K: No, show me if I'm wrong, Tunki.

Q: Well, you can think of something else...

K: No, I'm asking a simple question - answer it directly. If I'm wrong, I like to destroy what I think is true - it may not be true but you may show me that I live in illusion - I'm willing to examine it.

Q: First...

K: Or if this is true, why don't you take it.

Q: There is some..

K: No, don't argue with this - why don't you, if it is true, then what is truth you also must take. If you want to find out the ending of fear.

Q: What is the source of animal's fear?

K: What, sir?

Q: What is the source of animal's fear?

K: Not animals - please, sir, it may be thought, it may be there but only instincts - don't enter into animals, please.

Q: I think it's the truth, what you say. What's the next step?

K: What, sir?

Q: I think what you say is the truth. What is the next step.

K: Next step is, if that is the truth, and I say it is the truth, don't accept it, please, for god's sake - I'm not your guru, or your philosopher or your analyzer. I say, that is the truth. Then, the whole question arises, can thought come to an end.

Q: But for me it's not true.

K: Tunki, look, I'm asking - don't go off to something else, Tunki, old boy.

Q: About fear, I mean, its not fully so.

K: What is not fully so?

Q: There are things which we don't like, like say, we don't know.

K: What?

Q: There are things which you don't want, you don't like.

K: You don't what?

Q: We don't want, we don't want, we don't like.

K: We don't like and what?

Q: Say pain, physical pain.

K: Can you - you've been to the dentist?

Q: Yes. I have also great fear of dentists.

K: Can you at that moment of pain, just remain with that pain, not think about it and say, 'My god, tomorrow', just say, 'Yes, he's drilling, pulling' - all the stuff that goes on,' hold it. The last two months I've done this. Sir, just a minute, Dr. Bohm asked a question, which sir, they don't, they won't listen, they go on with their own ideas. Dr. Bohm asked if that is so, that is, thought is the source of all evil, fear - then what is the next question. The next question is, this movement of time as thought, and thought as movement of time, can that stop?

Did you listen to that? Won't you ask naturally that question? If thought is the very root of this fear, then can thought come to an end? Not how can I stop thinking. Now will you tell me the way or the method to end thought, but if you see the truth that thought is the root of this fear, all fear, then your next question would naturally be, healthy question: can this movement of thought as time, time as movement of thought, can this whole movement come to an end, unwind itself?

Q: I find myself asking another question, which is in a sense, Krishnaji, is the other side of the side of that coin, it's the same question. How does thought begin?

K: What?

Q: How does thought begin?

K: Oh, that's fairly simple, sir. What is the beginning of thought. I don't have to tell you, you can watch yourself. The pleasant experience is registered, brain, unpleasant thing is registered. So all registration is the beginning of thought.

Q: Yes, but I keep registering.

K: No, therefore you ask, is it possible to end registration.

Q: If thought is always time or future, if you only operate in the actual, you're not actually beginning thought.

K: I haven't understood, sorry. What does she say, sir?

Q: She was saying that thought is the past and the future, so..

K:... it's time. I said that.

Q: Yes, but if you are operating in the actual, you are operating without thought. But I think the problem is, for me the problem is, that I am continually up against registration.

K: Sir, we are asking first - is that statement, the root of fear is thought, is that statement valid. You haven't found that out. Or am I imposing on you, a statement which may be false, which may be inaccurate, and therefore illusory. So you're caught up in that illusion, if you accept. If you don't accept, and say, 'Look, is that so?' Go into yourself, find out.

Q: Shouldn't one distinguish between different types of fear, psychological fear and other types of fear which may be natural like survival fears or...

K: Yes, sir.

Q:... fire and that kind of thing?

K: I said fear. If violence comes tomorrow and hits me, all right, I'll take it. But to be afraid that it might. Dr. Shainberg you have disagreed with it. I know if you agree with it, all your analytical structure collapses. Forgive me.

Q: Does agreement...

K: No, wait - forgive me, he's talking, he's going to say something.

Q: I don't have anything to say.

K: What? Would you please, this is really important. I must stop now because I said we must stop at one o'clock and now it's past one. We'll continue tomorrow, but this is really an important question. If fear comes from the beginning of thought, which is, the beginning of thought is registration, the registration is the memory, collected through millennia, or the memory gathered through the last few days, from that arises thought.

Then the whole question arises, is there a possibility of not registering, psychological events?

Q: Do you think it is possible, sir, that I register because my listening is focused.

K: No, no, Mr Jenkins, please, I'm asking a question - you have to think about it, you can't just say yes or no. It is something, a scientist puts forward, you don't say, yes, right, wrong and no, I don't - you follow? He puts it out for you to study it and say, look, you're wrong, you're nonsense. What you're saying is so absurd. I haven't said the whole of it, I've just stated one simple fact: as long as thought moves psychologically, there must be fear. That's the root of it. And thought is the whole movement of registration in the brain. So can - I'm asking a question - is it possible not to register, psychologically, anything?

Q: That can only happen if you have understood.

K: No, no. Sir, just, not - if you have understood.

Q: When.

K: When you have understood - no. Just see the truth of it. Either the truth or the falsehood. Then from truth you can argue, you can explain, it will always be true. But if it's false, equally your explanation will be false.

I think we'd better start tomorrow, don't you?

BROCKWOOD PARK 5TH SEMINAR MEETING 17TH SEPTEMBER 1978

Krishnamurti: I think we began by asking ourselves, in the first dialogue we had here, whether one can be a light to oneself. And that problem was never touched upon. Then from there we went to the question of relationship, what actually our relationships are with another. And we went into that question rather briefly and from that observation of our relationships, we talked about fear, fear of losing somebody, not being attached to somebody, and all the misery and confusion and the broken-hearted affairs that come about. I don't know why you call it broken heart, but it's rather silly. And so on.

Then we talked about fear, what is the root of fear. And somehow I feel we are not facing the problem, which was, can one observe the fact, the happening, the actuality which is the now, whatever the reactions, the attachments, the fears - can we face them. And I'm afraid we've never gone into that question, we've never held onto it, investigated it to find out for ourselves if it is possible at all to observe what is actually taking place, the happening, whatever that happening is, whether that happening is imaginative, actual reaction, the potentiality of it, or the possibility of it, and so on. We never stayed with that question.

So can we go into that this morning? Do you want to go into it? Please, sir, it's all up to you.

Can we face, for example - we'll leave fear, we'll come back to it later - face the problem that we're attached to somebody. Attached, cling to, look to, hold on to some belief, to some dogma, to some ritual, some belief, some experience, or some person. Can we observe the actual implications, the actuality, of attachment. I don't know - please, sir.

One is attached to - we'll go through the whole business of it - one is attached to one's experience, from which there is certain remembrance, knowledge, and holding on to the knowledge, experience, the memory of it - holding on, never letting go. Or some ideal, cling to those ideals; all the politicians, all the priests, all the bishops and all the rest of the whole business, they all have ideals. And we all, some of us have ideals too, and we hold onto them, which is a form of attachment, form, other forms of belief, certain routine and so on. And principally in our relationships we are attached to a person. Can we watch, stay with that fact that we are attached and watch it. And let the attachment, the whole nature of attachment, reveal itself instead of you telling one must be attached, one must not be attached and so on. Can the story of attachment, can it be revealed by observing it. I don't know how to put it. From which arises fear. I might lose. And from that loss, I feel hurt, broken-hearted, or wounded, jealous, anxiety, the whole nature of attachment. Can you remain, watch that, and let the story involved in that reveal itself? (pause)

Perhaps that might be very complex and rather difficult. Can you watch, observe and remain with what is going on, what is happening, such as fear. And why is it we find it so difficult to remain with a fact?

Q: Krishnaji, I think one of the difficulties with watching attachment in relationship is something you brought up on the first day, I think, and that is that the very participation in the relationship obscures the fear, somehow or other, as long as the relationship is there, the real facets somehow are covered over. It's like, let's look at it very practically, you go into a day and you experience things in a strange way, and then the relationship is there to run back to. You can always hide in the relationship.

K: Yes, so what are you trying to say, sir? I don't quite follow.

Q: I am trying to say that relationship acts like an umbrella, under which all experience occurs.

K: In that, under that umbrella of relationship, isn't there attachment?

Q: Yes.

K: Now can you, can one stay with that, watch it without any deviation, and let the thing that you are watching tell its story, rather than you tell it what it should be. You follow, sir, what I mean? Can you do that? Can one do that? So that it reveals everything. Like a flower, when you watch it very, very closely, there it is, you see everything in its detail, the delicacy of the vein, you know, the beauty of the whole thing. In the same way, perhaps, if we could watch this burden of attachment - I won't even call it a burden, attachment - it may contain an extraordinary beauty in it, and go, from that move. But apparently we can't do it. Why not?

Q: Sir, could we go into just what's happening in that observation?

K: Slowly, slowly - would you kindly tell me.

Q: Because in itself, the definitions of thought in all this, is hard to understand. If you observe something, you let the thing as you say, speak to you, unfold and reveal itself. But in that process it would seem, at least to me, that there is a moving of thought, taking it in, seeing it, examining it, seeing the different parts, the different action of it. Now is that what you're talking about as thought, the destructive element of thought. Because to watch the action one has to feel it, one has to see it working.

K: No, Maria, I'm talking of something else. Just a minute.

Q: Well, what do you mean by thought?

K: I want to, go into it - may we go into all this, or are you not...

Q: Yes.

K: Don't you watch a flower in the bud, then as it blossoms fully, and then a few days later dies, collapses, vanishes. In the same way, perhaps, if we could watch this sense of attachment, let it flower, without you telling it, thought telling it what it should do.

Q: Then, do I understand you correctly, that where the word thought that you are using in this sense, is a sort of censor coming in.

K: Yes, the censor coming in - put it that way.

Q: And there is something else which for want of a better word I'm calling thought which is that seeing.

K: I don't, I have no feeling, I have no thought, I'm just observing.

Q: But what if you're observing something that isn't an outside thing like a flower, you look at it and it's there. You're looking at something within yourself. Therefore there is a movement of that attachment or whatever it is, going on in the mind, in order to look at it. Now is that thought or not?

K: No.

Q: Krishnaji, I think Mary is raising an important point. If you are actively involved in attachment, who's going to do the watching? I'm attached, I'm quite clear here, every part of my life is organized by the attachment, now how am I going to watch that? I have been watching attachment but there's always going to be a piece that's going to get away, as long as I am in that situation of attachment.

K: All right, sir - let's go into it slowly.

Q: We can't...

K: You answer him, please.

Q: Let me ask Dr Shainberg, can you see that very thing happening? Can you see that involvement, as part of the whole thing you're looking at?

Q: No, that's just what I'm saying, I don't think you can, as long as there is always ingredient, in other words, in many observations it's almost that the urgency of life is absorbed by that attachment. And it's only if you stop the attachment, that's a different thing, then that's removed. but as long as the attachment is there, I don't think you ever see it, because you're attached.

K: Are you saying, sir, the very attachment prevents you from observing?

Q: Right.

K: Is that what you are saying?

Q: That's it, in simple terms.

K: Is that so?

Q: I just see the problem being that the past immediately rushes in, it seems to automatically habitually rush in.

K: Yes, I understand, but, Dr Shainberg is asking a question which is, when one is attached to somebody, when I'm attached to you, can I be aware of that attachment? You follow? Go on, sir, you answer me, please - I am attached, one is attached to somebody. Do I know I am attached? Or I discover I'm attached through pain. Let's go slowly - through pain, through jealousy, through anxiety, then I realize I am attached. Right, sir? I have realized that I am attached, which means I know I'm attached. No?

Q: No, I think that your experience of the pain, jealousy, and anger is a reaction, not a real awareness, you're reacting to the loss, the moment that you have lost the attachment.

K: How do I know I'm attached, sir? Let's begin with that. How do I know I'm attached? I'm very friendly, etc., etc., and I live like that. And how do I know, how does one know, that one is holding on, having put a hook in somebody, holding on to that. How does one know it? You tell me, as a friend, 'Look, you're going, be careful, when you get involved with tremendous attachment, you're going to pay for it.' Right? I don't pay much attention to you, because I like this attachment. I like this feeling that somebody owns me, I own somebody, you know, possessed and be possessed. And there is a sense of gratification in that. How do I know that it is attachment? The actual fact, not the word. How do I know? I don't know till something happens in that relationship.

Q: But Krishnaji, don't I know because my attention is drawn in one direction, it's not in...

K: No, I'm not interested, in whether I am in one direction or another. Let's stick to one thing, sir. That is, I only know when there is some kind of discomfort, some kind of pain, some kind of, you know, quiver.

Q: Insecurity?

K: Insecurity. Call it what you like. Now it's only then I say, 'I am attached, this is coming from that.'

Q: But Krishnaji, I think what Dr Shainberg is saying, if I've understood correctly is that what you're seeing is not the attachment, you're seeing how you are reacting.

K: So, wait - I've said that, which is, we are explaining to each other, that is, the reaction I have as pain, in attachment. So this whole process, can I observe, is there an observation of this whole thing, this happening, whatever word you like to use, the actual state and the nature of it, instantly? You follow, sir? Or must I go through years and years of pain and I at last give it up - for goodness sake. Break it. You follow, sir? Now, I'm asking, that is a fact, there is pain, there is the reaction, which is, the reaction to attachment. Right? Does one realize all the implications of attachment by observing it, not letting thought wipe it away or distort it. Just watch it. Can't you? Is that not possible?

Q: Isn't the potential of pain immediately there if you examine attachment?

K: Pardon?

Q: If you look at attachment, you immediately perceive the possibility of pain in it.

K: So - That's what I'm asking, why is it we can't see the whole implication of attachment instantly, and finished. Where is the difficulty in this?

Q: Are you saying that attachment we see from its consequences, and therefore we infer the attachment - but you are asking that we might see the attachment unfold from the bud.

K: I don't quite follow you, sir.

Q: You said that we see attachment through its consequences - right? Not directly.

K: Yes, consequences.

Q: And infer the attachment.

K: So through consequences we realize attachment.

Q: But on the other hand, is there the origin of attachment, the bud from which it unfolds - are you suggesting that we see it from the inception?

K: Yes.

Q: Directly.

K: That's what I'm asking. Why can't we see it, the whole nature of it, instantly?

Q: From its inception. From the point of its inception.

K: From the point of inception, the whole story of it.

Q: Yes.

Q: In point of fact, though, because we see it from consequences, we don't go to it direct, we go to the solution.

K: Yes, sir, I know, that's what - yes. Either through consequences we realize we're attached, or we have instant realization what attachment implies and end, finished. Which is it we do? I wish you would stick to this.

Q: Do we really want to end the attachment, because surely...

K: Sir, wait - I'm not asking whether we end it - why don't we see the nature and the structure of attachment instantly, all its implications. That's apparent, we can't do it. But what we generally do is consequences, and then realize I'm attached and therefore pain.

Q: And then fix it up.

K: What?

Q: Fix it, Fix it up, in other words.

K: Yes.

Q: I think pain is the obstacle in every direction, because surely we became attached in the first instance because we felt here is one person who's not going to hurt me. And then when we feel we've lost that, we're going to be exposed to other hurts, we've got no refuge.

K: Yes, sir, but can you watch your attachment, sir? You or any of us, can we watch our attachment?

Q: Sir, this implies that we have to learn to watch.

K: Do it now, sir, not learn and then - see. learning implies, doesn't it, that you have accumulated knowledge and then watch with that knowledge.

Q: Are you going to suggest that there's another kind of learning where you listen and observe and learn?

K: Yes. You see, sir, what is happening now? We are dissipating by talk, by words, by explanations, so we're not actually saying, 'Yes, I am attached, let me look.'

Q: Krishnaji, when I try to do that my mind immediately brings an abstraction of what it is, and then I find myself looking at that, I'm not looking at the real thing.

K: So, which is, that you're making an idea of attachment and not the actual fact. Is that what you're doing? Or that is just an idea for you. Is that what you are actually doing and not looking at attachment.

Q: That's what is happening and perhaps we could go into how that happens, how can one step out of that.

K: I don't know. Let's first watch it and then see what happens, whether it continues or whether it stops. Let's first remain with that fact and let the fact tell its whole story. Gosh, how difficult this is. I am attached to my wound, psychological wound, suppose. I like that wound, I hold on to it, it gives me some anchor around which I can worry, I can fuss around, you know, carry on the game. Can I watch that wound which I have received from childhood and let the whole thing flower, without you making it flower or denying it, controlling it, loving it, holding onto it. Let that thing flower and see what happens.

Q: It's a very painful thing to do.

K: Is it? You see what you've done - you've told it. You have told, 'That's painful'. It may not be. I said, let it tell the story, not you say it is painful.

Q: Pain is surely a completely subjective thing, I just feel pain, full stop.

K: What?

Q: Pain is such a subjective thing, psychologically, that I just feel pain.

K: Pain is the consequence or the effect of attachment. So when you say it is painful, are you watching the thing, or you have said, 'It will be painful'.

Q: Isn't there a chain in all this, the attachment is arrived at as a defence against another thing, pain, whatever it is, so that there's a series of attachments.

K: Yes, but - please, can you remain with the fact.

Q: Attachment is so many things - we are attached to so many things.

K: No, please.

Q: I don't know which fact to stay with.

K: I am trying to ask, if I may, etc., etc., ask whether the mind can remain quietly observing the fact, observing 'what is'.

Q: My curiosity must be greater than my defences.

K: What, sir?

Q: My curiosity must be greater than my usual defences.

K: You see, you are telling, you are again talking what you might - your curiosity, your effort - you're not observing it.

Q: That's what I meant by being curious, to see, to look, rather than the automatic.

K: That's it - look, look.

Q: The looking comes out of curiosity to see.

K: No, there is no curiosity, sir. What is the difficulty in this. I'm at a loss.

Q: It was our first question, Krishnaji. We said why can't we, or why don't we look at a fact.

K: That's all I'm saying.

Q: We're not any closer, or I'm not any closer to seeing why.

K: I think, sir, we are using, we are trying to avoid the issue.

Q: Yes.

K: I think we are trying to, because there is a sense of apprehension about it. What might happen, which again, you follow?, which prevents you from looking at the fact.

Q: Are we saying that fear prevents us from looking at facts then?

K: It may be fear, may be that you're not really concerned about watching. Or you like the state in which you are. You follow? Don't disturb me, for god's sake. I am attached, I am wounded, I am this - don't disturb that because I'm used to it, and I like that, I am wounded or attached, that gives me a certain sense of security. You follow? Don't disturb that security. Is that what is happening? No? Then what is happening, why can't we look, without all this verbiage.

Q: One problem is, it's very difficult to see the attachment here, in this room. In this room the attachment is sleeping.

K: Throw out attachment, sir, you have something or other, why can't your own feeling of anger, jealousy, whatever it is, just watch it.

Q: It's the same problem, whether its jealousy, or attachment or whatever - you're in the room, you're in a certain state of attention, and the attachments are outside, when you go out.

K: You see, you're not watching.

Q: I agree.

Q: I think one of the problems, Krishnaji, is I don't think we can get at it by going from consequences. It seems that there has to be another kind of watching.

K: There is, but you're not willing to. I think the watching through consequences is absurd, it has no meaning.

Q: That is a deviation in itself.

K: Yes. Whereas, I've said all this, sir, now please watch. Can you watch the fact, because I think this is very important, if we can understand this very seriously and integrally, the thing that we call fear may disintegrate through its own flowering. You follow? Look, sir: I am - one is angry. And when we are angry, at the second of anger, there is no identification with it at all. A few seconds later the whole business of identification, I should, should not control and all that arises. But in watching without any movement of thought, actually, watching, then in that watching let anger - anger flowers, blooms, expands, and withers away. That is what I want to get at. So that instead of suppressing it, which makes it stronger, by watching it, it expands, the chapter comes to an end, the book comes to an end.

Q: But as he said, we can see that as an abstraction quite easily.

K: What?

Q: As he said, we can see that as an abstraction.

K: What?

Q: The problem, the anger, here and now we can see anger as an abstraction - but we are not angry.

K: No, I took that as an example.

Q: Yes, but it's the same for whichever example you take.

K: What?

Q: It's the same for whichever example you take.

K: Yes. What are you trying to say, sir?

Q: If we are angry - right? - the problem is we're caught in the anger and the reactions of the anger and so on. OK. Here we are not angry, here we are not attached.

K: What are you doing here - all right. What are you doing here? Would you kindly tell me, what you're all doing here?

Q: Maybe we could look at the fact that we're not quite meeting, understanding each other.

K: No. I'm asking, why are you here? Absolute silence.

Q: To understand oneself.

K: Comment?

Q: Se comprendre soi-meme? To understand.

K: Comment?

Q: To know oneself?

K: Is that why you're here?

Q: To learn.

K: What?

Q: To learn.

K: To learn. But you're not learning. You repeat. Learning implies that you listen. Right? Learning implies that you're sufficiently curious, sufficiently intense, sufficiently eager to find out, learn. But apparently you're not, because you have been telling me what the flower is. Right? We're not learning at all, we're not learning from each other, we're telling each other what each one of us thinks.

Q: So we are attached to what we think.

K: That's all.

Q: And what you think.

K: What I think.

Q: I think we are...

K: I haven't told you what I think.

Q: Oh yes, you have.

K: I have not. I have not told you what I think.

Q: Oh yes, you have.

K: All right, sir - since you know it, would you kindly tell me what I think. (Laughter)

Q: I know that game. (Laughter)

K: That's a very good question - please think it out, why are you here. You're free, you came here - why? As Mr Maroger said, to learn about oneself. Have you learnt anything about yourself?

Q: Yes.

K: Learnt what? At a superficial level? The top layer? You don't have to come here to learn the top layer. You follow? So have you learnt about yourself, learnt all about yourself, not just one layer of yourself - the whole content of yourself. Now, the whole - can you watch - coming back to the same thing - can you watch the whole content of yourself? Don't throw it away with a lot of words. Can I know myself totally - all my anxieties, fears, sorrows, pain, my psychological wounds, my attachments, my hopes, my fears, my longings, my loneliness, my - you follow? - the whole of it.

Q: Can you?

K: Do you want to learn about it?

Q: If you can. If you did. It seems so difficult.

K: No, my question, sir - you said you came here to learn about yourself. I say, have you learnt anything? Or have you just scraped the surface and say, yes, I've learnt a little bit. That's not, that's not good enough. So I'm asking in return, can you learn all about yourself, not over the years, the months and days till you die. Can you learn about yourself completely now, as you're sitting here.

Q: That means we'd have to see the root of ourselves.

K: No. You see, you're going off to something else.

Q: Sir, perhaps we could go into what happens when you ask that question.

K: Yes, sir, ask yourself. I'm asking you, again, can you learn about yourself, which is very complex, intricate, subtle thing, completely.

Q: But I can't answer yes or no. Right? I can't, I have no means to proceed.

K: No, I've asked a question, sir. Do you want to learn about yourself completely?

Q: If you say, do you want to learn - of course.

K: Wait - what is your reaction to that question. Can you say, of course?

Q: Is it possible - one asks, is it possible. You've asked a question...

K: Yes, I've asked the question.

Q:... do we want to learn about ourselves. My response to that is, how is this possible?

K: If I say yes, what will you do?

Q: I still don't know.

K: So you want to learn about, learn - no, learn whether you can have an insight into the whole nature of it. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: Then you can learn. Right? Is that what you're...

Q: That's one thing.

K: Yes, sir, I'm asking generally. Is that what you want to do, learn - please listen carefully - learn the whole nature and the structure, which is a movement of yourself. That's why we have come together. Is that it? Right?

Q: Yes.

K: Right, sir? Right. Now who is going to teach you? Please listen carefully. Who is going to teach you? The man sitting here?

Q: No.

K: Why do you say no?

Q: Because I have to learn for myself.

K: What do you mean by that? You see, you're not, you're not carefully watching what you're saying. It's extraordinary. You say, you've said, no - you can't learn the entirety of yourself from me, from the speaker. One has to learn from oneself. Is that so? Wait - remain with the question for two seconds. Is that so?

Q: I think the trouble is we are relying on someone else to do the work for us.

K: I beg your pardon?

Q: I think we say we want to learn about ourselves, and understand ourselves. But actually we want somebody else to do the work for us.

K: Yes, you're saying, really, I can't do it by myself, you tell me all about it.

Q: I think that's what happening, yes.

K: Yes, that's it. You want me to do all the work and then you listen to it, and then you take it home with you or not.

Q: And in that way we make it into an idea.

K: Yes, so, are you depending on me?

Q: Yes, I think we are.

K: Why?

Q: Because we feel we can't do it on our own.

K: No - why? Why are you depending on me to tell you, to teach you how to observe the totality of yourself? Is it a habit, depending on another? Is it tradition? Is it what you have been educated into - to accept another to help you to understand the totality of yourself?

Q: Sir, it's a state of immaturity - it's a state of being immature.

K: Immature? Yes, if you like to put it that way. But, sir, look, it's very interesting, this, if you go into yourself. Who will teach you? Or the whole question is wrong.

Q: There is no 'who'.

K: What?

Q: How can there be a 'who' to teach me. How can there be a 'who' that will teach me when I want to learn, not from information but from the inside. I'm learning about this person.

Q: Krishnaji, I think there's another piece here that you've added, I don't think you're being radical enough about it.

K: What, sir?

Q: I say, I don't think you are being radical enough about it, because what you're really saying is, no one really wants to learn.

K: That's all.

Q: But that's quite a radical statement.

K: Nobody wants to - I was being too polite. Sorry.

Q: I'd like to ask you - please don't jump on me, because...

K: I won't jump on you, old boy - I won't jump on you.

Q: I've often heard you say this about understanding, all about myself, instantly. Now I find with myself that whenever I'm approaching anything I'm approaching it in a very separated way, like I talk, I try to find out about relationship, and then I try to find out about attachment or fear. And I would like to ask whether this whole approach is wrong - this whole approach is self-repeating, approaching things one by one, because there are so many things, you know, one can go on and on in this way. Or whether there is a stage where one prepares oneself to learn how to question, learn - you use the word 'art' of questioning, to learn how to approach things, to learn how to see.

K: What are you trying to say, sir?

Q: I'm trying to say, I'm trying to ask you whether before one can see, come to this point where one is looking at everything together...

K: Yes, looking at something holistically, as a whole. Is that what you are trying to say?

Q: I'm asking whether there is something that happens before that, one prepares oneself for that.

K: No, there's no preparation. You see, you're going off to something else. I'm not jumping on you, forgive me - if anybody thinks I jump on anybody, if I do, please forgive me. Do I want to learn about myself? Do I want to know, actually, not theoretically, is it my deep committed, irrevocable interest to know myself? Is that it? Is that what you have? Irrevocable, that you are so completely committed.

Now, just a minute, sir. What is there to learn about myself? Nothing. Right? There's absolutely nothing to learn about myself, because myself is nothing. I've put lots of things on it, on this nothing I have education, science, philosophy, all the things, you follow? - piled it on, all the things religions have said, which are the most destructive things, what religions have done - they have put all this on me, on this essentially nothing. And we're battling, struggling, on these things, you follow? - about these things, changing from one thing to another.

What have I to learn about myself? That I'm crooked, that I don't think straight, that I'm vain, that I'm arrogant, I am proud, I am this - what does it all mean? Words, don't they, memories, ideas. Have ideas any content, except what thought gives to that idea? I wonder if you capture all this. No, this is too radical, as you said.

Q: Sir, when you say nothing, I have the feeling of an empty room.

K: Oh, sir, you follow - you know the meaning of the word 'nothing'? Not a thing.

Q: That is why it is so difficult because we are still attached to all these things.

K: What, sir?

Q: If we were not attached to things there would be no problem, but being attached to all those things...

K: That's right.

Q:... we don't learn.

K: If you understand, sir, the whole of my existence, the whole content of me, is put together by thought. Right? And thought is memory. Right? So I am living, I am a whole structure made by memory. And I can't touch it. I can't, there's nothing to say. It is totally unreal, living on memory. This is too radical, so I won't go into it.

Q: Sir, it seems to me that the interesting question is how I have made the illusion that I am something. You see, it appears in ordinary life, to each person, he is really something.

K: Yes.

Q: And he creates somehow that illusion.

K: Yes, the illusion created by thought.

Q: Yes.

K: Which is, I am something.

Q: Yes and what?

K: Yes, I am something. When that thing, when that thing is not, I am nothing. And therefore it is still - sir, when I say I'm nothing, it is still thought. It is not an actuality.

Q: Because there is that illusion that...

K: Of course.

Q:... thought is always creating.

K: So, how do we accept this illusion, why do we accept this illusion, about which we must learn. You follow, sir? Spend years, spend money, books - what? No, this is too radical, I won't go into this, much too...

Q: Not too radical.

Q: It's not too radical, we want to go into it.

K: You don't understand it, then. You understand that it means one has to reject, psychologically, everything that thought has put together. Right, sir? And that's why it's too radical, you won't, I mean, it doesn't - it sounds nice, it looks, it feels, by Jove, there's something in it, but one has to go into it very, very deeply, you can't just say, well, go into it.

So here we are. We all say, I'm interested. Why, I ask. We asked the question, why are you all here. To learn, about oneself. And you say, have you learnt anything about yourself, while you're here? That you are jealous, anxious, fearful, have a position which you must maintain, you have got a, you have been wounded and cling to that wound, and so, kind of - you know, live in that, which becomes totally neurotic and all the rest. Have you learnt anything? Or are we all playing tricks with each other?

Q: Sir, when we say we come to learn about the nature of the self, we are really learning, I mean, learning takes place on that score, it is learning about the nature of illusion.

K: Sir, I am asking a question. Why are you here? I know why I'm here, I'm very clear. Can we be, can you be - just a minute - can you be as clear as that? I'll tell you why I'm here. I want to tell you a story. I want to tell you something which is tremendously important, all the rest of it. I know - K knows exactly what he wants to do. Are you clear? Or you've got innumerable motives.

Q: Innumerable contradictory motives.

K: Yes, that's it - innumerable contradictory - anyhow, have you? Sir, how can we communicate with each other, you follow, sir?

Q: Krishnaji, I feel that the basic difficulty is that to learn, the learning process is twisted, so if we continue in this twisted process we won't, I mean, we won't be able to learn.

K: All right, now, wait a bit - can we take up learning, go into it completely, what is implied, and actually find out what it means to learn.

Q: Because I think implied in the learning process we carry out day to day are the tricks we play with ourselves.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: So we'll be playing tricks all the time.

K: Wait, that's why, I'm asking, do you want to learn?

Q: I would say, to learn about the process.

K: No, to learn - no. What does it mean, the act of learning?

Q: How can you learn if you are attached?

K: What?

Q: Can you learn if you are attached?

K: I can't hear.

Q: Can you learn if you are attached?

K: Oh yes, no, sir - forget attachment for the moment, don't bring that in. Do you want to find out, sir, the art of learning, the art, what it is, you know, the whole business of it. Do you want to learn? What am I to say? If you want to learn, if you want to learn the art of learning - right - what price do you pay for it? Seven pounds a day?

Q: Our reservations.

K: What, sir, look, sir - you go to the cinema, pay ten pounds, five pounds, three pounds, to be entertained, for an hour, two hours. And you come here, and you pay something for lodging. I'm not talking of that kind of paying. What are you willing to pay, not in coins, not in paper, actually, that you say, 'Look, I'll give everything to find out.'

Q: That's a point.

K: Or, you say, 'Sorry, I can't give everything but I'll give you 50% of it, or 25%. Don't ask me 100%. I'll give you 10%'. Is that what we're doing?

Q: I hope no one is coming up against a reservation.

K: I don't - I'm asking, sir - don't tell me. I'm asking you. There's someone who says to me, 'I'll give everything I have to learn, to find out.' Nobody has said that to me, here or in India or anywhere else. Perhaps one or two have. But I'm asking you, out of politeness, kindness, etc., respect, what do you pay for something which is unpayable. So, sir, I'm asking, we come back, how much pay are you giving, how much are you giving to find out for yourself, to stay with the fact. I'm taking, going back to that one thing, because that's very important.

To stay with falsehood, you follow, sir? - with an illusion and don't call it an illusion but to stay with the fact that one is caught in some idea, you follow? - and live in that idea, work for that idea, sacrifice everything you have for that idea. What amount of energy, which is the pain, are you giving to it, to stay with one fact.

Because, sir, you see, if you want to go into the question very deeply and it's necessary to go into this very deeply, then meditation is to remain so completely with the fact, with what is happening, it is totally dissolved, every reaction allowed to flower, wither away, so that there is no psychological, inward reaction to any challenge. I wonder if I'm talking...

Q: To become totally aware of one's quality or the condition of one's...

K: Yes, sir, can you, can I or you be aware totally of our conditioning, not bit by bit, bit by bit, but the nationality, the superstition, the beliefs, the educated, sophisticated self, you know, the whole thing. There's so much to go in.

Q: Implied in staying with the fact, is the disillusion of the illusion, but the illusion itself is trying to survive.

K: No, it won't, illusion only tries, illusion survives because you are strengthening it by fighting it, by saying I must be free of illusion. But if you say, yes, what is an illusion? You understand? What do you call an illusion. What's the meaning - the word, what does it mean, sir?

Q: The word is ludere, to play, it's to act falsely, to have a false play really.

K: Yes.

Q: That's what is meant.

K: Now I'm asking, what do you call illusion?

Q: A nothingness.

K: Oh no, that is illusion. For you it is an illusion. Do you know, if you go to church, if you are all Catholic, Protestant, all Christians here, except a few, do you know the whole of that is vast illusion?

Q: Are we in church now?

K: No, sir, we are saying, those of us who go to church, or have been brought up in this religion, Christian religion, with their symbols, with their saviours, with their Virgin Marys, with their rituals, etc., etc., is that not an illusion? I'm asking. Would you say anything thought has created, psychologically, is illusion? Right sir? Are we living in that illusion? Now, can you remain with that illusion, let it flower, don't say, 'What is an illusion, what is not an illusion, how can I get rid of it, isn't it good to have a little bit of illusion,' you follow? But just to say, yes, I see I am in illusion which is psychologically, thought has created something which - understand - all that, is totally unreal, reality being that which is touchable, you understand, taste and so on. So anything thought has created psychologically is illusion. Can one remain with that fact, and not say, not let thought move away from that? Of course if you told that to the Archbishop or the Pope, he'd say, 'Don't be silly, I'd lose my job'.

Q: However, it seems at first sight that the self is touchable, it has a sense.

K: What, sir?

Q: It seems to be the illusion that the self is touchable.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: You said reality is touchable, but I think one feels that the self is also touchable.

K: That's right. You see if there is only an observation of the fact, of the happening, don't you remove all conflict? Look, I am attached, I've seen how attachment arose, all that business. Now I'm just watching being attached to that person. I've seen the whole consequences of attachment, the pain, the jealousy, the suffering, the so-called, absurd broken heart and all that business. Now I'm just watching. And in watching won't it expand? And therefore wither away? So there is no conflict. You follow, sir? Because when we are attached we say we must be detached, and the struggle to be detached. So I've learnt something out of that: attachment and detachment are similar. Right? I wonder if you see.

So if I remain with that fact of attachment, see how quickly it withers, sir? I wonder if you see this, if you do it, actually do it.

Q: I wonder if there's a problem, you see, it's clear what you mean by watching something outside but in a sense it's not so clear what you mean by watching something inside.

K: You understand? Dr Bohm is asking, there are two different kinds of watching: watching something outside of you, and watching inside of you. Isn't there a difference? Now how do you watch - please, discuss - how do you watch something inside yourself, inside of yourself?

Q: To remain with it.

K: No, no - you haven't - I'm asking you, how do you watch it, look at it, observe it, hear the noise of it, the music of it, the story of it. You understand the question, sir? Please understand the question first. It is easy to watch outside. Right? Something outside, like the moon, the trees, the birds, the water, the stray dog or your pet dog, and so on, or your wife, your husband - it's easy to watch. But is it as easy as that to watch what is happening inside? That's a question, you understand, sir - answer it, find out.

Q: It's not done with the senses, when we watch something outside.

K: Why do you discard the senses?

Q: Sir, I pose a thought, and then I feel some reaction, this is the only way I can watch, I can't watch, I don't watch a whole movement.

K: Look, sir - you've been wounded, haven't you, psychologically?

Q: Mm.

K: Don't say mm. You have, haven't you? Can you watch that wound?

Q: At that time or now?

K: Now, now, don't...

Q: So I must recreate the wound.

K: No, it is there.

Q; I don't see it.

Q: Oh, but it's there.

K: That's just it.

Q: Inside you.

K: Listen to the very interesting thing that is said. He said, 'I don't see it.' Which means what, it is there but he doesn't see it. Why? I have a wound, psychologically I've been hurt, suppose. And that wound is there. I may forget it, I may not think about it, I may have thought of it and don't know, what to do with it, so I say, 'Keep quiet, old wound - I can't do anything.' So, but it's there. So he says, 'I can't see it.' Why? The wound is psychological, inside - why? You're not...

Q: You only know that you have the wound if you think about, it or something prompts you to think about it.

K: So only when you think about it you know that you have a wound. Is that it?

Q: Yes.

K: So when you don't think about it, it's not there?

Q: It's there, even though you haven't thought about it. It's still there, you still carry it.

K: It's still there, even though you haven't thought about it.

Q: Even though it hasn't come awake.

K: Yes, that's right. The moment you think about it, it becomes alive. If you don't think about it, it is dormant.

Q: Dormant.

K: So it's there.

Q: It's still there.

K: Now, can you see that wound, psychological wound, not physical wound or physical disability, can you watch that wound as it is now? This is a common factor, isn't it, sir? Everybody in the world is wounded. Some cling to it and worship it and adore it and say how lovely it is. Others say, dormant, the thing is dormant, only occasionally it wakes up, and all the rest of it. As it is a common problem, can we all, can each one of us observe that which is common in each one of us. Watch it, I've been, you've been wounded. Is that wound a reality? Reality, let's begin clear: reality in the sense, anything that thought has put together is reality, whether the reality be an illusion, the wound, the architecture, anything that thought has put together is reality.

Q: Yes, it's real.

K: Reality, real.

Q: It is.

K: Yes. So this wound is a reality. Right? Can the mind watch this reality, and let that wound flower, not control it, suppress it, run away from it, just watching it. I see you can't do it.

Q: I don't think - I haven't understood. If we are only aware of the wound when we think about it, are you saying it's possible to be aware of it without thinking about it?

K: So, think about it, think about it, and it's there then. Right? Now can you watch that thing. And let it come out, you follow? Let the wound tell you all its story, from the first word to the last chapter.

Q: Do we watch that also with the senses? Can we watch that also if the senses - you said before the senses may take a part.

K: Of course.

Q: Could you explain that.

K: You explain it, sir.

Q: I mean, do you feel the sense of the wound, when you recall it.

Q: You mean the physical sense?

Q: Yes.

K: Sir, that brings a very interesting question - I don't know, this may not be the right occasion. The psychological state, is it the result of senses at all?

Q: What do you mean - it's not clear.

K: You understand my question? That is, have the senses put the thing there, or it lives apart from the senses.

Q: Perhaps it lives in memory.

K: I don't want to go into it for the moment, it's too...

Q: It is a part of the senses - the psychological state is a part of the senses.

K: I'm sorry - don't - forget what I said - let's go back to this.

Sir, I want to find out how to look at my wound, not the physical wound, that's fairly easy, I can observe it, it pains, it hurts, you can do something about it, but the psychological wound, the more I do something about it, the more I try to avoid it, the wound survives, begins.

Now can I watch that wound, which is not an illusion, because thought has created that wound. So therefore it is a reality, a reality as real as the things that exist in a church. Right, sir? Both are real. So can I watch the reality of the wound.

Q: Sir, I can bring that feeling up inside me, I've done that, I've remembered a specific occasion, I've brought it up in me, the feeling how I felt. But you talk about going a stage further, where you've read it from the beginning.

K: Watch it, take time. You follow, sir? You're wounded, aren't you sir, all of us, like all small children, from childhood, the wound has grown, this human relationship, the world and everything is intent on this wounding each other. Or praising each other, you follow - same thing. Now can you watch that. If you watch, doesn't it grow, flower? Doesn't it tell you how it came into being, how it...

Q: It doesn't have the same power, it doesn't hurt so much, just by being with it.

K: Who is very badly hurt here? All right, I'll take it. I'm very badly hurt, I'm not but I'll take that - I am very badly hurt, psychologically, I have done all kinds of things to avoid it, suppress it, control it, resist other people hurting me more, built a wall round myself, isolated myself, and hoping thereby nobody will hurt me. But in that isolation there is always fear. Right? This is all the flowering, because I'm watching it. I wonder - you follow? It's all the story which is being told by watching the wound, how it arose. It arose because I had a good picture of myself, and that picture has been hurt, the image, the idea of myself has been hurt. And the hurt is, you've told me that I was naughty, that I was ugly, that you must be better than your brother, that you must be a saint, you must be a businessman - you follow? By watching the wound, the wound is telling me the whole thing. Right? Is it, with you?

And so I am giving it freedom to open itself up, you follow, sir? Because of that freedom, it opens and withers away. So there is no wound. I wonder if you see it.

Q: So the wound is there because one has inhibited it from flowering.

K: What?

Q: The wound is still there because one has inhibited the natural flowering of that wound.

K: The wound is there, but you have never looked at it.

Q: That's right.

K: That's what - you've never looked at it, and said, 'Look, old boy, I'm hurt, let me look at this hurt.'

Q: I think you under-estimate the fact that approaching the wound hurts itself.

K: Of course, sir.

Q: There is tremendous pain on approaching the wound.

K: That's why I talked previously, I said how do you approach a problem, do you come to it freely or with a prejudice, etc., a conclusion, this must be, this must not be, I must - or do you come to it, you follow, freely. Then the problem is like a wave that breaks down, withers away.

Q: Yes, but Krishnaji, the fact is, I have the feeling you want to stay with the fact, the fact is that when you approach it there is tremendous pain.

K: Is it?

Q: Yes.

K: I question it. You know, sir, this...

Q: I think it's more than pain.

K: Wait, he's saying - it's more than pain. I agree. He's asked a question which is, he says, the very approach awakens fear. That's what Dr Shainberg says. I say, is that so? Or I have an idea that it might cause pain and therefore I'm afraid. You follow, sir? Therefore I'm not approaching it at all.

Q: Isn't that what fear is about, the idea that I will have pain?

K: Yes, that's an idea.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Therefore I'm not approaching it. Sir, look, I want to know, or anybody, any religious man wants to know, if there is god. Right? In India that's the eternal song, and also in this country if you are religious, Christian, all this business, don't you want to find out if there is god? Or do you say, yes, I believe in god. I mean, that means nothing. To find out you must come to the problem freely, without any conclusion, your belief, your prejudice, your conditioning. Right?

So your conditioning is the god. You follow? No, you don't get all this.

Q: But you move away again, I think you move away. Let's stay with this issue of the fear on approaching the wound.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: Let's stay away from god.

K: I brought in god, because that is fairly demonstrable. All right. I am psychologically wounded, if I am. And what is my approach to that wound. What's your approach to the wound that you have, if you have any? Come on, sir, tell me what's your approach?

Q: There is no approach, that's just it. We just run away from it.

K: I'm asking. Running away is your approach?

Q: It's not an approach.

K: It's not an approach, I agree, but the fact is you run away from it.

Q: Yes.

K: So I'm asking, what is your approach? Your approach is that you are running away from it.

Q: The fact is that I am.

K: That's all. How is your approach? Won't somebody tell me.

Q: We think about it.

K: What, sir?

Q: We think about it.

K: You think about it. That's your approach. How do you think about it?

Q: There's a whole picture of it.

K: Tunki, how do you approach your wound? You see how we avoid every question. For god's sake.

Q: Well, I know this is a process but after a while it's not. After a while it stops and is a stumbling block and it won't go further.

K: So your approach is that you have a block. That is - keep it there. Your approach is you can't approach it, because you have a wall.

Q: Right.

K: All right. And others?

Q: It seems to have formed already certain conclusions about this problem.

K: So your approach is that you come to certain conclusions about this problem.

Q: And then no longer am I able to see it.

K: So, I'm asking, your approach is with conclusions, another is with ideas, the other is to run away from it. So our approaches are preventing you looking at it. Right? Now if you want to look at it, want to observe the fact that you're wounded, then you have to be free of your conclusions, you can't run away from it, you can't approach it with an idea. Can you approach it freely? If you are reading a detective thriller, if you know the whole plot before, you'd throw the book away, but if you don't know it, and it's rather exciting, you go through the whole book.

Here in the same way, you're hurt, and you really want to watch it, see what happens - for god's sake, find out what happens. To find out you must come to it with the same curiosity, with the same eagerness, if you read a good book, a novel, then you watch it and see what happens. You don't even do that. Because then you may totally eliminate altogether conflict. That means, a very sane mind.

Q: So is it that we are not afraid of the wound itself but what happens if the wound disappears.

K: Partly. Because the wound has given me some sense of identification. You follow? I am somebody with a wound, without a wound, I'm nobody.

Q: Can it be said that the wound is caused by - we would like to have a pleasant image...

K: About yourself.

Q: From other people.

K: And yourself.

Q: Yes.

K: Mostly about yourself.

Q: Right.

K: So that pleasant image you have about yourself gets a pin prick. Somebody puts a pin into it.

Q: That's right.

K: Then you get hurt.

Q: Yes, but I think there is a basic craving and wanting to be accepted by others.

K: What?

Q: There is a basic craving in us.

K: Basic craziness?

Q: Craving.

K: Which is - rather good, quite. (Laughter)

Q: No, a basic craving that we have to be accepted by others.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: That's why we conform with this image.

K: Yes, sir, we've got basic craziness, sir.

Q: Not craziness.

K: Yes. (Laughter) We are basically crazy, quite right, sir. I think we'd better stop, don't you?

Q: Being crazy?

K: You see, sir, it shows that we cannot remain with something and let it tell the whole story.

Q: Well, isn't that's how we're doing now - my mind tells that story. My main problem is that I can conform to the acceptance of the surrounding, but...

K: Wait, Tunki, we've been through all that.

Q: Yes, but how am I to drop this.

K: I said, just watch it. That you are - just say, take one fact, for god's sake, Tunki, which is, that you are influenced by your parents, by the school, by teachers, you are being influenced all around. Can you watch - just listen to it, Tunki - can you watch this influence being a pressure on you? Just watch it.

I'm afraid we must stop. We'll do it tomorrow.

BROCKWOOD PARK 6TH SEMINAR MEETING 18TH SEPTEMBER 1978

Krishnamurti: I believe this is the last discussion or dialogue. Tomorrow morning at the same time there's going to be a dialogue between Dr Bohm, Dr Shainberg and myself, and those who want to, can join us, to really discuss, the rest can observe.

Can we now go back to what we were talking about the first time, which is, to observe what actually is happening, to observe actually what is taking place in our relationship, with each other, whether it be husband and wife, girl, boy and so on. Can we go into that. Or as this is the last discussion or dialogue, what would you like to talk about?

Questioner: I came in here this morning and I saw quite a few people and myself thinking over what was going to happen when the discussion came about, what we were going to talk about. And it came to me: what we really are here for, what we are creating within ourselves, and what's going to become of us.

K: That's quite a different matter. What's going to become of you, when you leave here. Is that it?

Q: Well, out of what we have done here and what we have talked about.

K: What have you learnt here, what have you found out for yourself.

Q: Yes.

K: What you will do with it, or how will you carry on from where you are now.

Q: Yes.

K: Yes. Do you want to discuss that? Or do you want to go back to what we were talking about the first day, which we haven't really touched on at all. Which is, be a light to yourself, and not depend on anybody else. That's what we began to talk about. Are you avoiding relationship, discussing relationship? Frightened to open that Pandora Box? Please, just tell me which you want to discuss.

Q: Are they both related?

K: Both?

Q: Related.

K: Maybe.

Q: Could we discuss both of them?

K: I mean, not discuss - as we said yesterday, can we remain with the fact, without any deviation, without the interference of all the accumulated memories of the past, which is thought, to observe what is taking place without all that, the past, thought acting as a barrier in observation. That's what we were discussing.

Now can we talk over together the question of relationship, and if it is possible to be a light to oneself, not dependent on anybody. Is that possible, to be so completely, totally free from all influence, from all propaganda, from all the tradition man has built, superstition, and so on, every form of influence, both external and inward? And then only it is possible to be free from all pressure, and so discover what it is to be a light to oneself. Either that or we can talk over together this question of relationship. It's up to you.

Q: I would like to talk about the possibility of being a light unto oneself.

K: What do you want to do?

Q: If we talk about relationship to begin with, then come to the other.

Q: The other way round, it seems to me...

K: Which came first, the egg or the chicken and so on. Is this a game you are playing, Tunki?

Q: The actual problem is relationship, obviously.

K: Do you want to go into it?

Q: Yes.

K: Now wait a minute. Do we know - let's start - do we know exactly what our relationship is now. Are we aware of it, it doesn't matter, with my mother, with my father, with one's father, wife, husband, mother, sister - relationship, intimate and not intimate, far and near. Are we aware - please, this is not a talk by me, join in this. Are we each one of us aware what our relationship is with another.

Q: As we pointed out yesterday, we are aware when there's pain.

K: Aware?

Q: We are aware when there's pain.

K: No, no. I'm sorry, I'm not making myself clear. You are related to somebody, aren't you? Are you aware of the significance of that relationship? What it means, what is involved in it, what are the reactions, pressures, you know - whole interaction between two people. Are you aware of it? Possession, domination, being possessed, and liking to be possessed, belonging to somebody. And attachment, the pain in attachment, the fear, the pleasing another and the other liking to be pleased and so on, the whole area of our relationship. Are we aware of it?

Come on, sir.

Q: Well, we can think about it.

K: Not think about it, no. Then you project what you might like, or what you - just actually what is our relationship.

Q: It includes the intrinsic loneliness of life.

K: What?

Q: It includes the intrinsic loneliness of life and the desire for a companion.

K: All that's implied. Are we aware of all the implications and the consequences of our relationship, sexual, non-sexual, companionship - all that. Do I know, do you know, each one of us, know what exactly our relationship is with each other? Or is it all superficial, casual, merely sexual or a resistance, an avoidance of relationship.

Q: I think it includes a bit of everything.

K: I beg your pardon?

Q: I think it includes a bit of everything. A little, it includes all that you said.

K: All right. Are you aware of it?

Q: No. I don't think we are aware of it at all.

K: Then what do you mean by the word 'relationship'. You are related to somebody - what does it mean?

Q: I have contact with them, with almost everyone I meet, I have some kind of contact.

K: You know, sirs, this is a dangerous subject, you understand, sir? Right? Agree? It's a very dangerous thing, because...

Q: I think it also means sharing.

K: What?

Q: Sharing things together. Sharing.

K: Sharing. Yes, all that's - don't - we know. Are you aware of it? Are you aware actually what is going on in your relationship with another, actually?

Q: I can't be, or I wouldn't have asked the question I asked.

K: No. So I'm asking - if you have a girl friend or a husband or a wife, what is your relationship with them, with each other? Sexual, superficial, companionship, each separate from the other, each concerned with their own ambitions, vanities, pleasures and the other also, in a different way. So separate movements.

Q: You relate in different ways with different people.

K: Don't describe it any more, we know - I'm asking, two separate movements coming occasionally into contact sexually, but keep the two movements separate. Is that what our relationships are?

Q: Yes, it seems to be that.

K: What, sir?

Q: It seems that we are separate.

K: What?

Q: It seems it's as you described it. Separate things that come at this moment.

K: Yes, separate, but not only coming together occasionally, but sustaining this separation, maintaining it, nourishing it, creating it, driving along these separate paths.

Q: That's one feature of it, Krishnaji. I think there's another feature, that in many relationships there is also a movement where there is a kind of sinking in, sort of merging where everything becomes one.

K: Do you merge with another? Just a minute, sir. What do you mean merging?

Q: Where there is no separation, where everything is sort of mixed up, it is joined.

K: Is it, everything is mixed up. Right? Merging, separating, companionship, no companionship, follow? - it's all a jumble. Would that be right, correct?

Q: It is so, it is as you describe it.

K: Not as I describe it.

Q: Well, not to repeat the whole description, but there is another problem, that one of the related people might be interested to change this whole relationship. And the other might not be interested.

K: Yes, I am interested - you are interested in going to church and your husband, wife is not interested in it.

Q: No, I mean that one is interested, one finds that this kind of relationship is a problem that has something to be done about, and the other just continues like that, so he doesn't find...

K: Yes, but do I - madam, you're not answering my question. Forgive me for repeating it. Forgive me if it's a boring thing, but I'm asking you, are we actually aware, the happening in our relationship. Apparently we don't seem to be.

Q: In certain relationships, yes. In certain relationships, yes.

K: In certain relationships.

Q: Yes.

K: In all relationships - you don't - you see how we are...

Q: Krishnaji, I think we're superficially aware, but we're not deeply aware of all the implications.

K: No. All right, are you aware that your relationship is confused, mixed up, one moment this, next moment that - it's a kind of, you know.

Q: I think to that extent we are aware.

K: Are you? Now just begin with that simple thing. Are we aware, each one of us, that in our relationship there is a great deal of confusion. Right, sir? Would you accept that? Not what I'm telling you.

Q: No.

Q: So I'm aware of that at some moments but most of the time I'm not aware of it.

K: Now, sir, I'm just asking now, are we aware that our relationship is so mixed up, so unclear, so confused, so, you know, nothing - all the rest of it. If we are aware of that we know - if you say I know, my relationship is really quite confused, I am this at one moment, next moment something else and so on. So there is never clarity in it. Would we say that? Could we - no?

Q: Yes.

K: You don't agree with that? What don't you agree with?

Q: Because I think I am clear about certain relationships.

K: Certain - I said in all. I said in all relationships, I may be very clear, in my relationship to - what? - to my father?

Q: Yes.

K: To your father, it might be clear. But with your boy friend, if you have any, with your boy friend it's mixed up. It is mixed up, is it confused, is it not as clear as pure water.

How can we move if we're not facing what actually is?

Q: Sir, I'm clear about it at some moments. I am more aware of this as we speak about it. But I don't remember it. If I remembered this all the time, I would always be...

K: No, sir, it's not a question of remembrance, it's a question of what actually is going on.

Q: But I'm not aware of what is going on.

K: Therefore, which means you're confused.

Q: That's right, but I don't know I'm confused because I'm not aware of it.

K: All right, can you, can one be aware of it now? You see what you're all avoiding? I told you, this is really a very serious subject, and we don't want to enter into the complexities of it, the fear of it, what might happen, whether I will lose my wife, husband, all the rest of it.

Q: Sir, I'm afraid we do not understand what it is, being aware.

K: Know, recognize, actually see what is taking place, what is actually happening - not all the time but say now. How can we go forward if we're not aware or know, recognize, cognizant, conscious of what is the movement in our relationship, whether it's that movement is distorted, confused, wobbly and so on. See how difficult it is?

Q: Sir, are we looking at the entire problem of relationship, including the relationship to nature, to...

K: I beg your pardon, I can't hear.

Q: Are we looking at the whole problem of relationship, or relationship with our fellow man in certain fairly close...

K: No, Maria, I'm asking you, are you aware, do you know, recognize, conscious, all the rest of it, what your relationship is actually? What is happening in that relationship?

Q: To whom or what?

K: To you.

Q: No, I mean my relationship to what or whom?

K: To your husband, son, wife, boy friend, girl - relationship.

Q: In other words, other human beings?

K: Of course, I said that at the beginning.

Q: And is that only close relationships or...

K: Close, I said intimate - I've been through this, intimate, personal, extended, far, near - all that is involved in relationship. What's my relationship when I go to India, or America, and, the whole problem of it.

Q: It seems to me I do see the difficulties and the motives.

K: Comment?

Q: It seems to me that I do see all this but still it goes on, it doesn't prevent the difficulties. It is still difficult, relationship. Is it because I don't see it really?

K: How shall we deal with this problem? Each one of us has a different opinion about it, haven't we? Different explanation, different approach, different attitudes and values and so on. Now what is the common factor in relationship? As it is, not as it should be, romantic, lovely, beautiful, love, I love you, darling, you love me, darling - no, I don't mean all that. Just actually what do you - I give up.

Q: Two separate people.

K: I said all that, sir. Two, between you, your mother, between you and your wife, between you and your friend, and so on.

Q: But essentially separate.

K: I don't, I'm asking you what...

Q: If there is a relationship...

K: What's your relationship to your mother, or to your father?

Q: Everyone seems to admit that there is at least some confusion.

K: Right, could we start with that, sir. Dr Shainberg could we start with that? Could we start with that? Or is my relationship absolutely clear? That I quarrel with my wife, that's very clear. I dominate, I want to possess my wife, she is my wife, I'm going to hold on to her - that's very clear. I depend on her, sexually, physically, as I'm weak and she's strong, so I depend on her. That's very clear. Do we know at least that clarity?

Q: Yes.

K: Then what takes place, if you are so clear? You're very clear that you love, in quotes, a woman or a man. And in that love you depend on her, you're attached to her. Just take those two: you depend on her, you are attached to her. In that, isn't there pain, anxiety, disappointment, hurt? And she might throw you away, get rid of you one day and you are hurt, your heart is broken, whatever that silly word means, and so on - you cry over it. Right? Do you want to live in that kind of relationship?

Q: I see it's worth nothing. It's worth nothing, this sort of relationship.

K: I'm asking, each one of us - talk about it, sir, I'm not talking all the - talk about it, sir. Do you want, does one want to live that way? To know what it is to live that way and to know it and to pursue it is the essence of neuroticism. No? What, sir?

Q: It's a fearful existence.

K: No, isn't that...

Q: A fearful existence.

K: Look, I know I'm attached, suppose, one knows one is attached, and also you've seen that attachment, dependence, holding on, great pain, suffering, anxiety, and fear. Knowing that, and to live, continue that way, is neurotic. No? Are you neurotic?

Q: I must be.

K: Sir, come on.

Q: Sir, the question that comes up is, how can a man and wife, if we're talking about that relationship, be related in any other way?

K: No, if this is not the right way to live, in that relationship - fear, attachment, all that - why don't you drop it?

Q: That's easily said.

K: What? What is that?

Q: He said, that's very easily said.

K: Is that very easily said? If you see that certain action leads to pain, and you keep on acting in that way, what does it indicate? Either one is completely idiotic, or you like to act that way, that's perfectly all right. But here we're trying to be serious, to find out. You follow?

Q: It seems there's more pain in acting - it seems we think there is more pain in doing something else.

K: But that's again not facing what actually is going on. We went through all that yesterday and the day before. You project what might happen and therefore be afraid of what might happen and pain and all that. You don't say now, this is my actual relationship with another. I'm attached, I depend on her, physically, morally, sexually, you know - depend on her, so I am attached to her. And in that attachment the sequence of that thing is pain, all the rest of it. And this is the actual fact. Right?

Q: Isn't that taking us back to what we were saying before, yesterday, Krishnaji, that we are unable to face the fact?

K: That's what I'm asking.

Q: We haven't really seen it.

K: That's just what I'm saying - we are unable to face something actual. Why? Listen to it - why? I mean, if I have great pain and it may be cancerous, I must do something about it.

Q: Krishnaji, I think there's one thing that comes in there immediately is the fact that the very relationship itself is attempting to deal with a pain. That the relationship itself is embedded in a protection, is a protection from another pain.

K: So you call all relationship pain?

Q: No, I'm saying, relationship is functioning to protect from pain. And then creates more pain.

K: Wait, sir, therefore what does it mean? You protect yourself against pain and in protecting yourself against pain you create more pain. What does that mean?

Q: It is.

K: What, sir?

Q: I said it is. It's no protection at all.

K: Apparently we are not facing this fact. As Mrs Porter pointed out just now, we are unwilling to face a fact. So what do we do? Wait till that person leaves, then the whole thing - follow, sir? Wait till the calamity takes place? Psychological earthquake?

Q: With the pain always comes the pleasure, and I think that because there's pleasure involved in it, we accept the pain as part of it.

K: I see. You like, in this relationship there is greater pleasure than pain, and so you accept this relationship. Is that it? Is that a fact, is that so, is that what you are facing? If you are facing that, that there is greater pleasure and not so much fear, then the greater pleasure eventually ends up in fear.

Q: Yes.

K: Obvious.

Q: Why is it so obvious?

K: Ask Dr Shainberg, he agreed with me, so ask him. I'll take a rest!

Q: No, I think that the whole thing of creating a relationship to protect against pain gives the pleasure of the relief from the pain, and then the frustration of that or the stopping of that gives more pain. In other words, first is the pleasure of relief, then there's the pain of not getting the relief. So the initial relief is a pleasure and a continual pleasure.

K: So you see that, actually see, not verbally, that where there is pleasure and the pursuit of pleasure in relationship, it will inevitably end in greater pain. It's so obvious. Because you are giving another great pleasure, and therefore he holds on to you. Right? He won't let you go, he wants to possess you, he wants, he says, 'she's mine'. And if you both like this thing, one day it's going to - you follow?

So are you actually aware, know, face the fact of what your actual relationship is now? You see, we've spent, how long, half an hour about something which is so obvious, which we are unwilling to face. And that's why you slither all around.

Q: What can a person do if he finds he is unwilling to face it?

K: What?

Q: I said, what can somebody do if he finds that he is unwilling to face it?

K: To face pleasure?

Q: Yes, to face the problem.

K: I can't do anything. His own intelligence, discussion, talk, observe what is happening must show him this.

Q: But Krishnaji, David has raised a good point, because if I could say, the drug addict goes down to the corner and takes some heroin, his consciousness is blurred to see what he's done, he's got a kick out of it.

K: All right.

Q: The same thing with relationship.

K: All right. Are we in that position?

Q: Yes.

K: Are we in that position, that we are drugged?

Q: No, sir.

K: Our brains are affected. Maybe - sir, don't deny it so quickly. Maybe.

Q: Personally, I am not certain. I am not.

K: That's one of the most difficult things to say, I am not. I may be.

Q: I think that in a way we are because, we want to be in a certain way but we are trying to keep certain forms, and we are afraid to open up, and change to be something else that we don't know anything about. And therefore we keep to what we are even if we are in pain or in fear.

K: So, sir, I'm asking, can you face the fact of it, the actuality of it, not the description, not the word, but the actual state that you are this in relation to another. Come on, sirs.

Q: I think from what I see of myself is that one can be awake and very clear of certain facets of certain relationships, but as to the totality of the whole basis inside of oneself, it's much harder, although one can awaken at certain times to certain facets of certain relationships, it's still a fragmentation, but realizing the whole, and a direct whole, it's a much harder thing.

K: Sir, how can I comprehend the totality of relationship, the wholeness of relationship and the real extraordinary beauty of the totality of feeling, unless, if I'm not clear at the beginning, now, what it actually is? You follow? From there I must move. I must go forward in this realization, I am, my relationship is actually this.

Q: And that one can sense it.

K: And face it. Not avoid it, not dodge it, not push it away or run away, just face it. And then see what happens when you face a relationship which actually is attachment - let's use that word for the moment to cover a whole field - face that attachment, without the interference of thought, without any motive, without any direction. Then see what takes place. We are not willing to do that.

Q: I am simply...

K: That is what I'm sticking to, I won't move from that, till you, and I understand it and go beyond it.

Q: We agree to face a thing when it is important to us.

K: What?

Q: We agree to face things when they are important enough.

K: That's up to you. As Dr Shainberg pointed out, a man who takes heroin day after day - habituated to it, he's involved, committed to it, and he says, 'What are you talking about? I want my heroin, everything's all right, give me that.' Are we in that state, because one has lived with one's girl or husband, wife, say for God's sake, everything is perfect here, leave it alone. Apparently you don't want to join in this. You see, sir, what I am trying to say, what one is pointing out is, that when you face a fact, without the interference and the barrier of thought, the very thing that is being observed undergoes a fundamental change. You won't try it.

Q: Perhaps the question, Krishnaji, is that we actually do know what our relationship is, if we're very honest.

K: That's right, sir.

Q: But we also have a trick whereby there's an idea that it really shouldn't really be that way, and we ought, it ought to be different, and we like to believe it's different, and in that way we kind of, we falsify the evidence.

K: And we say, 'Yes, it should not be that way,' and just carry on.

Q: Quite.

K: So I am saying, face the fact that it should not be that way and look at it.

Q: It seems to me that discussing the fact is not facing it, because we can't go on.

K: That's right, sir. So what shall we do? We've come to an impasse each time because we are refusing to see, to face the thing. Sir, have you ever watched an ant, or a bee, closely? You must have. There you're not telling what the bee should do, or the ant should do. Just watching. Can you do the same thing about your reaction in your relationship with another? Just watch it without any interference. Apparently you can't - that's one of the most difficult things, apparently.

What shall we discuss, then?

Q: Is it possible, Krishnaji, is it possible to discuss the point before relationship. It was said that there was a pain which relationship was being used to cover up. Is it possible to look at that point before relationship gets involved, and see how...

K: I see. Are you saying, can one be aware, know, etc., the words, that in relationship there might be pain, therefore understand the whole nature of pain, before you are related. Is that what you are saying?

Q: No, it was said, I think Dr Shainberg said, that some, many relationships were painful but we stuck with the relationship because we were trying to cover up another pain, or another inadequacy.

K: Yes, that's - yes.

Q: It seems we should perhaps give attention to that first inadequacy.

K: So, you are trying to cover up other pains? And establish escape through relationship?

Q: Sir, It seems to me, the separate streams of life are distinct, come together occasionally, only partially...

K: Sir, I'm asking...

Q:... relate wholly when we come together.

K: I'm asking, one is asking, sir, I keep on, I'll keep on till you get bored with me and throw me out. Are you facing the fact of your relationship? Or are you avoiding it?

Q: Excuse me, that seems to be how the relationships come.

K: What, sir?

Q: That seems to be how the relationship takes place, how it comes about.

K: Now, just a minute. Here we are, all of us. What is your actual relationship to the speaker? Do you know it?

Q: Sir, I have been asking myself that throughout the meetings, and I have reached an impasse, I cannot go further, I cannot go through a block.

K: I've asked, sir - what is your relationship with the person who is speaking here, on the platform, the actual relationship, not invented - what do you - you must be related otherwise you wouldn't be here. So what is your actual relational with this person?

Q: Well, I've told you, sir, I've reached this block, I come to a position where I cannot experience it.

K: No, so, you've come - no, sir, please, sir, you've not, or I haven't made myself clear. There you are and here I am, two people. Why have you come?

Q: To listen to something we don't know.

Q: I think there are a couple of reasons for coming. One is there is a sense of sharing in investigating together into how we don't see. That's one. In other words, to tear down together.

K: Are you rationalizing, sir, just a minute, sir. Dr Shainberg, you and I have met for years, talked to each other a great deal etc.,. Now what is your relationship with this person?

Q: Immediately...

K: Don't flirt around it. I'm sorry to pin you down.

Q: That's all right. I have a feeling of going together or working together in some way.

K: I'm not talking of doing something.

Q: Yes, that's what I first said.

K: I'm not talking of that. I am asking you, before we do something together, what's our relationship?

Q: There are no words for it.

K: No, come off it, you're full of words, Doctor - don't - come off it. (Laughter) Don't say there's no word for it.

Q: Sir, can I try to answer it for myself. I have come to get something from you.

K: Yes, So - that's good enough, sir - that's good enough. You want something from me. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: What is that relationship?

Q: I cannot get it because...

K: No, no, please, sir - I come to you to get something from you, whether it is money, sex, psychological freedom, etc., I want something from you. Then what is my relationship to you?

Q: Attachment, dependence - attachment.

K: What?

Q: Attachment and dependency.

K: No, no. I want something from you.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, Tunki, be simple. It's a merchandise.

Q: There is no relationship.

Q: Utilitarian relationship.

K: I want something from you, I'll give you this, and you'll give me that.

Q: A transaction.

K: It's a transaction, all right.

Q: It's worse - I don't even give anything.

K: No, but, you see what I'm trying to get at. You're not willing to face something actually, which is really important, and you are missing the whole thing. Why don't you ask me what is my relationship to you?

Q: Ok, sir, we'll ask that question: what is your relationship to us?

K: I put it, not you. (Laughter) You see, that's...

Q: You put the idea in my head.

Q: You care.

K: What?

Q: You care.

K: You care. Do I?

Q: Yes.

Q: No. (Laughter)

K: No, you're playing - no, sir, this becomes too serious. I'm not going to play games with you. What's your relationship to the man that's speaking here? Is it a transaction, is it a business thing, that you give me this and I give you that, you have something and I want that something from you?

Q: But that's not so, you don't want anything from us - we haven't got anything to give, and if he says he wants something from you, then surely his relationship to you is one of depending on you.

K: That's just what I'm pointing out. So am I facing the fact that when I want something from another, that brings about the great pain of dependence, which we are unwilling to look.

So how can one be a light to oneself if there is any kind of dependence? Right? Now, which is more important, the light to oneself or dependence? Which is more vital, energising, passionate?

Q: How do you distinguish that from pleasure? We are trying to distinguish the fact that you're saying, you know, which one is going to give me the more pleasure?

K: Yes, put it - which is more pleasurable, to be a light to oneself, the implications of that, to be a light to oneself is quite, you follow? We haven't gone into it, it is a tremendous thing, light to oneself, will that give me greater pleasure than the other?

Q: Can I say until I am a light to myself?

K: Therefore, what will you do. You want to find out, don't you?

Q: Of course, yes.

K: You see, you want to find out, don't you, if being a light to oneself, the implications of it most of us don't understand, but will that give me greater comfort, greater strength, greater energy, greater, much more vitality and passion, than dependence. Will dependence give me vitality? Deep abiding strength? Or it's going to waste away my energy? And so I think dependence may be greater pleasure, so I pursue that till I am awakened to it through pain. Then I say, 'My god, I must struggle to be independent,' or that person is not right, I'll go and take on that person. Right? This person has the same, in the same field as the other, because that person is going to cause the same problem.

So I'm asking, as Dr Shainberg pointed out, does dependence give great pleasure?

Q: One realizes that dependence is limited, then it stops.

K: No, do you realize in the sense, the actuality of dependence and see the whole consequence, step by step what is involved. Not imagine, not forecast what might happen, but actually, the truth of dependence, the insight to dependence.

Sir, don't you depend on your wife, husband, girl, or whatever - don't you? No? Then we are all marvellous saints - finished.

Q: We're all on heroin but everybody is unconscious of it. Everybody is on heroin.

Q: I don't think everybody is unconscious of it - I know I'm dependent. I may not see the full, all of it, but I certainly do see that I am dependent on others.

K: All right, don't you see, in that dependence, that there is a great deal of pain? Though it may be pleasurable for the time being, in that pleasurable state for the time being, see the pain going on at the same time. Then why don't you drop it.

Q: I'm afraid that relationship will stop, if we drop it.

K: What?

Q: Are we frightened that relationship will stop when we drop it.

K: So relationship...

Q: I think the relationship is based on that pain, on getting that, because...

K: That's what Dr Shainberg was pointing out.

Q: That's why I don't drop it, because if I drop it, then that is the basis of the whole relationship.

K: If you drop it, there may be a different kind of relationship.

You follow, you're not facing the issue.

Q: Sir, what on earth do you mean when you say, 'Drop it.'

K: What on earth do I mean - it's very simple, sir. Don't you drop something when it is dangerous, drop, that is, put it aside, avoid it.

Q: What do you mean, put it aside? I don't understand at all.

K: All right. I see dependence implies pain. Right? Do I want more pain in this dependency? A continuous pain for the next thirty years?

Q: I think this is a confusion of words, Krishnaji.

K: I know, sir, I know.

Q: When you say can we drop it, we're probably thinking can we drop relationship.

K: No.

Q: You mean, can we drop the dependence.

K: Yes, can we drop - drop in the sense, be free of it. All right. Not relationship, but be free of dependence.

Q: What does that mean, be free of? What do you mean by being free of? That's the difficulty.

K: No, it's not the difficulty. Free of, in the sense, if you have a pain, physical pain, what do you do - you try to get rid of it, don't you? By talking of pain or going to a doctor or dentist, whatever it is. So in the same way, psychologically dependence breeds pain. Do you see that? Don't say what do you mean by seeing - can you face it? Can you face that in dependence there is pain?

Q: This is what I see.

K: See it, feel - you know, realize it, know it, it is so, it is an irrevocable law. Right? Now if you like pain and hold on to that attachment, then it's perfectly all right. But if you see it is useless, it's not worth it, don't you let it wither away, dependence?

Q: I think there's a step missing, you see, that a person may stick to something that is painful if he feels that he needs, that he has a necessity for it. One does not always drop the painful thing because one may feel one has to have it, one needs it.

K: Oh, I see. One needs pain?

Q: Not pain but whatever, one needs the dependence that produces the pain.

K: One needs the dependence..

Q: One needs to depend, you see, that's my point.

K: I see, I understand. Do you need to depend? I need to depend on the postman. Right? As things are. I depend on the dentist, as things are. And so on. On this corner petrol station, I depend on it. Now psychologically...

Q: A person may be convinced that he is too weak to stand alone, for example.

K: Much better. One is convinced - you see, when you say one is convinced, one is convinced that one cannot stand alone, therefore I depend on you. How do you know you can't stand alone? Who told you? Psychologically - you don't stand, that's obvious. How do you know you can't stand alone?

Q: Experience seems to indicate that.

K: What?

Q: Experience seems to indicate that.

K: What?

Q: Experience seems to indicate that.

K: That you can't stand alone. Experience - whose?

Q: Well, of our own.

K: No, Scott, go into it a little bit. Has your experience told you that you can't stand alone?

Q: In a sense, yes.

K: Not in a sense - face it. Your experience has told you, my friend, you can't stand alone.

Q: It has told me that I haven't stood alone, that as I live my life, I don't live it very intelligently, and so I am not a light unto myself. So I come to depend on others.

K: No, no. As Dr Bohm pointed out, we are afraid to stand alone. Right? And that fear makes us rely on another. Right? How do you know or aware or recognize, what tells you that you can't stand alone? Is it our education, our religions, our society, your mother, your father, say, 'You can't, you can't, you can't, you must depend.'

Q: I think all those things have happened.

K: Have happened.

Q: Yes.

K: Yes. Therefore, what do you do. Don't you test it out? Why should - sir, the churches have said to you, you can't be a light to yourself, you can't be, you must depend on Jesus in the West. Why do you accept that statement. Who tells you, the priest, the whole seven million Catholics, they may all be absurd - why don't you test it out?

Q: Sir, could you deal with the fact of being alone, what happens when you are alone.

K: You've not - you see. I'm asking, sir, is it because you are afraid that you cannot stand alone, that you depend.

Q: It's not right to say that you're afraid of standing alone, because we've all stood alone at various times. What happened in that state...

K: All right, what happens in that state when you have occasionally stood alone, can you face that fact and look at that thing, see what happens?

Q: But you've got to want to stand alone.

K: Not got - all right, don't you want to? To use your own phraseology - want to - don't you?

Q: Not until you really dislike and are uncomfortable in your dependence.

K: Not until you have pain, then you - madam, I'm not being personal - but haven't you had pain?

Q: Yes.

K: Then why can't you stand alone?

Q: I think I'm starting to stand alone. Because I don't want any more of that particular pain.

K: So.

Q: Until you see a worse pain.

K: Comment?

Q: The very nature of the dependence, makes you perceive any examination of that is too scary, too painful.

K: So any examination of dependence is impossible.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's it, you're saying, I depend on you, Maria, therefore I am incapable of examining that dependence. Is that it?

Q: More or less.

K: I won't, I don't see the reason of it.

Q: The reason is that, any action that upsets that is perceived as a disaster or a worse danger.

K: You're going back again, you see - that's what I'm saying, you're not facing the fact, you're projecting what might happen.

Q: Right, but that is the nature of the dependence.

K: Therefore I say, face the fact.

Q: I mean if I see that pain comes out of dependence and I avoid becoming dependent, that doesn't...

K: I said, not avoid, face the fact that dependence means pain, look at it. Be in total contact with that fact. You see, you can't do it. What am I to do? I can't hit you on the head and say - face the fact. That is meaningless. I can't persuade you, I can't give you a reward, so what are we to do? And this person is saying that's one of the major factors in which, if you do this, conflict totally ends, completely, in life. You don't test it out. And if you like conflict and say, 'Yes, all nature is in conflict, the trees are in conflict, seeking light,' you follow? - that's a different argument altogether.

Q: Sir, your relationship with another will be as I feel it, just now, will be completely different when you are free of dependence. I mean, you're not trying to get anything, you're not trying to acquire anything from them, you're not...

K: We've been through all that, sir. All right, let's leave that. Apparently you can't face it. Let's face the other fact. What does it mean to be a light to yourself? Why is Dr Shainberg, I've known him, so I can address him directly, dependent on analysis? Why doesn't he throw the whole thing away and say, 'Be a light to yourself. I will talk about that, help you to be completely free from all this, so that you stand alone. So that there is no Jesus, no Christ, nothing, nobody, except you. And nobody is going to help you. They'll give you comfort, hold your hand, take you to their church - wipe away all that and say, look'. Can you do that?

Q: When you stay with that fact, there's no thought, no question of it, stay with that fact, there is no thought.

K: No, sir, look. man historically, politically, even religiously said, 'I must be free.' Right? There must be freedom in life. There must be, as they put it, individual, who is not controlled, shaped, driven. Man has always sought freedom, from the most primitive till now. So many are rejecting the churches, all the rest of it. Freedom means to be alone, to stand alone. Right? Which means, freedom - this becomes very complex if you want to go into it - freedom from the known.

Q: Just facing the fact.

K: What?

Q: Just take the point of facing the fact. You are facing the fact. Whatever that may be, you're facing the fact.

K: Yes.

Q: So you stay with the fact.

K: Yes. I'm not describing, I'm stating...

Q: That's right, you - I'm just using words - you stay with the fact, no words involved. You're with the fact.

K: Yes, sir. The fact is, there must be freedom from the known. Wait - that's a fact to me. Not to you. The known is all the memory. Right? The past, which is knowledge, that is the known. Now to be, to be a light to oneself, or to stand by oneself, the past with all its tradition must totally vanish.

Q: So you stay with the fact and its implications, totally.

K: Which means, sir. Look, which means, what has been registered on the tape of the brain, that registration must end, the past, and no present or future registration must take place. Sir, you don't know what this means, you see, this is one of the most...

Q: Sir, you can say all that now, what it means. I want to know what it means.

K: What?

Q: I have to know what it means, I'm interested to know what it means.

K: I'll tell you what it means.

Q: Whatever you tell me what it means...

K: Therefore you can find out for yourself, not from this person, find out for yourself how tremendously important it is to stand alone, which doesn't mean isolation, which doesn't mean non-cooperation. You follow, sir? To stand alone means to live a life without any pressure from outside or inside. Oh, you say, that's impossible. When you say it's impossible, you're not facing - follow? - you've just projected an idea that it is impossible. Find out whether it is possible for a human being, who is the representative of all humanity. Right? That's a fact, because every human being suffers agony, goes through all this business. So you are like the rest of them, that's a common factor, therefore you are the entire humanity. And the entire humanity has said, 'I must depend,' right? They say in India, I must depend on god, on this or that, on this deity, on the book, on that, this or that. And in the Christian world they say that.

So our conditioning is this tremendous dependence. Right? And completely be free of that conditioning, so that you're really a whole, undivided individual. Now, that means, no external imposition by another, whether it be Jesus Christ, Buddha, anybody. One has to face that fact that one is imposed upon. Right? That is a fact. Through education, through constant repetition of the Mass and so on. And to see the absurdity of it and wipe it out. Then you ask, is it possible to be a light, not only to yourself, because you are the humanity, therefore light to humanity. You follow? I wonder - right, sir? I don't think you capture this.

Q: There's one important thing you said, you switched over from saying can I be independent, to saying can any man be free.

K: Yes.

Q: Making it universal.

K: Yes, that's right.

Q: Therefore it becomes, as long as you say, 'Can I be free?' then you're stuck.

K: Of course. That's why I said, I am as a human being, I'm the rest of mankind. When I said, can I be a light to myself, I am talking, I am saying, can I be a light, representative of humanity. Therefore can I be a light globally, not for my petty little backyard light. My backyard light is just electricity. Right? Which can be switched off and switched on from the main dynamo. But I'm not talking of such a thing. I don't know if you have gone into this at all. Which means, to be free of all institutions, political, religious, economic institutions. That does not mean I don't have money, of course one has to have a little money. But the conformity to an institution. Otherwise how can one come upon something which is true, which is the truth, irrevocable truth. You understand my question? Not your truth or my truth, Jesus truth or Mr Freud's truth, but truth. How can one perceive that thing, if one is not free.

You see, most people in the modern generation have displaced Jesus in the Western world for a guru from India. It's the same thing.

Could we, at the end of this gathering, discussion or dialogue, could we say to ourselves, 'I have faced a fact.' It may be the most unpleasant fact or the most pleasant fact, but at least I have faced one thing, and discovered what actually takes place when I've faced one thing. Could we at least say that, the least thing.

I think we'd better stop, don't you? Five minutes to one.

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC TALK 1ST APRIL 1978

I am very sorry not to have these meetings in the Oak Grove, perhaps next Saturday it might be possible.

If I may ask, and please give your attention to it, that we meet here to talk over things that concern the whole of life, not any particular part of life, or a segment of life, but the whole content and the beauty and the greatness of life, the whole of it. But our minds unfortunately are educated, conditioned to deal with parts of it. If we are artists, we are only concerned with the world of art, if we are business people we are concerned with business, politics, if you are a scientist your mind is specialized in a particular way and you do not take the whole of life. Even the so-called religious people do not take the whole content of life. And if we may during these talks here and discussions, we are going to concern ourselves with the totality, the integrity of the whole of life. So if you are expecting a solution for a particular part of life, like a physical pain, or some particular personal emotional problem, or if you are going to concern yourself with the intellectual part, I am afraid we shall not be able to meet each other. As I said, we are concerned with the whole of life. So please if I may ask we will deal with the particular later as we go along, whether it is a problem between man and woman, whether it is an economic problem, or a social problem, or an ethical problem, or economic and so on and so on, we will deal with that as we go along. But I think it is very important, if one may point out, to observe and learn about the whole movement of life. So it becomes very difficult for those of us who are specialized or concerned with one particular part, whether it be sexual, romantic, occult or seeking a fanciful fulfilment, I am afraid we shall not be able to communicate with each other. I hope this is clear that we are concerned deeply with the whole of life, whether it is sexual, all the various forms of occult powers, which I am afraid are inundating this country, or a particular relationship between man and woman. So let us be from the very beginning very clear what we are talking about so that we can communicate with each other, so that we can in our talks meet each other.

Our brains, our brain, are very, very old. That's a fact. And throughout the millions of years it has evolved, grown, experienced, recorded, stored up various forms of experiences, knowledge. If you have observed that you can see it for yourself very clearly. So it is conditioned very, very deeply. Our reactions are very old, our fears, our desires, our pleasures, our sorrows, are older than all the hills and the mountains and the rivers. So we are conditioned through the ages to perform, act, think in a particular way. And we are going to examine together, please when we say together, I mean together, you and I are going to explore together, not that I talk and you listen, but we are both of us going to examine, explore into the whole content of our mind, the conditioning of the brain and the nature and structure of the self, the 'me', which is as old as the hills.

Please, I must keep on repeating this, because most of us are accustomed to listen to a talk, to accept or reject what is said, but what we are trying to do, what we must do together is to examine together, explore together, find out together, learn together, otherwise these meetings have no value whatsoever. We can repeat phrases, or some acquired knowledge, but when we are walking together the whole issue becomes entirely different, doesn't it? Walking together in a lane perhaps we see the same things together, the same shadows, the same outlines of the hill, the majesty of a mountain, the swift flowing river, when we see it together our communication becomes extraordinarily simple and clear. But if you are looking at the stream and considering what a bore it is to walk, or this or that, then we are not walking together. So please, if I may repeat it over and over again, and I will during all these talks, that we are working together to find out, to learn together.

So learning together means that there must be a common interest, a common enquiry, a common urge to find out, not to be told because we are not an authority, though the speaker sits on a platform it is merely for convenience, it doesn't give him any status. So having no authority, and you obviously if you are at all enquiring have rejected all kinds of authority, which we shall presently go into it. But it becomes very important that you and the speaker move together, find out together. Then communication becomes not only easy but also we are not driven by language. Most people are driven by the language they use. They are compelled, forced, their reaction is according to the verbal language they use. Please, this is again very important to understand. I hope you are also working as the speaker is working. We use language to communicate, to inform, to see clearly. But when language uses us, when you use the word 'socialism' in America, it has all kinds of implications, and that word with its reactions which awakens the reactions makes us act in a particular way. Right? So you are driven by language, compelled by language, you react to language. And when we do that communication becomes extraordinarily difficult. After all, language is an instrument, and the instrument mustn't drive us, we must drive it. Is this clear? No, please, see it for yourself not because the speaker is saying something which you perhaps have not thought about. But if you could observe it in yourself, that is, how any word, specially a word very loaded like socialism, or communism, or Catholicism, or Protestantism, Hinduism and so on, they have a particular influence, pressure on you, so the instrument is using us, we are not using the instrument. You can only use the instrument if you understand the exact meaning of words, unemotionally, without any reaction. Say for instance, when you use the word 'communism' generally that word makes us antagonistic to that word, if you are a Capitalist, or whatever you are. But if you observe the word, use the word without any emotional content, without any reaction, the word 'communism' becomes very simple because both of us understand, if you know all the implications of that word, what it denotes, as it is, totalitarianism, Marxism, Maoism - if we use those words knowing their meaning, their content, then the word is not using us but we are using the word. Can we go on from there? I hope you see this point very clearly because we are going to see how language acts as a great pressure on us. And this pressure distorts communication. Right?

Is this the first time that you are hearing all this? If you are, please learn about it, find out whether the word is using you, or you are using the word. If you are using the word, which is the language, which is communication and so on and so on, if you are using the word, then if you use the word knowing what it means without the emotional content, without the reaction to that word, then - and I also use the word in the same way as you do - then communication becomes very simple. Right? But whereas if you have certain reactions to the word, and the speaker may not have it, then communication is not possible. Clear?

So one of the factors in our life is that language acts as a great pressure on us, and therefore distorts not only communication but the clarity of thinking. Any pressure, whether economic, social, moral, idealistic, or the pressure of authority, or the pressure of language, is a distorting factor. May we go on?

If you have a pressure, a weight on you all the time, physically, you cannot walk straight. But if you have pressure, emotional, linguistic, economic, social and so on, any form of pressure distorts action. This again is obvious. If one is married, or has a girl friend, or a boy friend and the man or the woman is constantly exercising pressure on another, then communication is not possible, and his pressure is reacting against the other pressure. Right? So there is this constant pressure in which we live. Our whole moral, ethical, religious, political, economic, structure is based on this principle, pressure. Do you see this? There is pressure not only climatically, but there is the pressure of a linguistic reaction, the pressure between man and woman, the pressure, economic, social, ethical, religious, ideological pressures, we live, all of us, under pressure: weight, strain, and therefore our action is always distorted. If you are acting under pressure you cannot act freely or rightly, or accurately. So we are going to, together, explore if it is possible - please listen - if it is possible to live our whole life without any kind of pressure. Don't say, it is not possible - then you have blocked yourself. Whereas if you begin to enquire, find out, go into it very, very carefully, then you might find it is possible, entirely, urgently possible to live without any kind of pressure. Therefore when there is no pressure there is freedom. And it is only in freedom there can be total observation of the whole totality of life. I hope we are together in this.

First of all we said, there is the pressure of language, the whole commercial pressure through language - buy this, buy this - on television, you know, that's what goes on in this country. Unfortunately America is becoming the standard of the rest of the world - most unfortunately. So please bear in mind that we are not doing propaganda, the speaker is not trying to convince you of anything, trying to persuade you, trying to dominate you, trying to frighten you. But together you and the speaker are going to examine these pressures in life, and whether it is possible to be totally and entirely, absolutely free of pressure. When there is the cessation, when there is no pressure whatsoever, the brain itself undergoes a radical change, which we will go into it as we go along, which is part of meditation. Don't go off to sleep now, I am not talking about meditation. I am afraid the people who have brought it from India, or from Asia, or from Tibet, their type of meditation is no meditation at all. Please, I am not being prejudiced, not dogmatic, or assertive, but we will enquire into it as we go along. The whole idea of meditation practice is too mechanical, too absurd, too childish. And in this country you have swallowed the whole thing without examining it, paying lots of money and all the exploitation that goes on with it, the racket. The gurus have become industrialized, which is inevitable in this country.

So we are going, together happily, easily, if I may use the word, affectionately, to see if it is at all possible to be entirely and completely, absolutely free of every kind of pressure. Then one can live happily. Is pressure necessary at all? Do you understand my question? First we live under pressure, that's obvious. Then the question is: is it necessary? What would happen if man, or woman, if a human being - I use the word 'human being' implying man or woman, I won't differentiate, that's too silly, human being - why does he live under pressure? Is it ethically right, correct, socially necessary? Is it necessary, this so-called pressure, through religious images, concepts, conclusions, beliefs and rituals? That's what is happening in the world, constant pressure. And we are asking, is it necessary to live under those conditions. What would happen if you did not live under those pressures? We are going to find out.

So we must keep, have a mind that's enquiring, not accepting, not rejecting, not saying, 'It is possible' or impossible. We are going together to observe these facts. When you observe, what actually takes place? When you observe yourself or another, do you actually see 'what is', or do you imagine what you see, or interpret what you see, or in the observation twist what you see? You understand my question? We are asking, is observation possible which is without any distortion? And distortion takes place if you have pressure: that you must see, that you must understand, that you must go beyond this, that you must become a great success in your observation. Again, the American way of life

- make a success of everything. Do you understand?

So we are asking, is it possible to live without any pressure and why do we support, why do we acquiesce, why do we live under pressure? Is it because it has become a habit with us? Please, we are enquiring, so go into it with me. Is it that we are accustomed to it, we are conditioned to it, from childhood, through school, through college, through university, if you are lucky to go through university, from the very childhood there is a pressure - through examinations. And learning has become a pressure. I hope you are watching all this. Why do we accept it? Is it natural? Or is it unnecessary, abnormal? Is it if we are free of pressure of every kind we might face great danger and fear because we are so accustomed to live in pressure, under pressure, it gives us, perhaps, a false security? So we would rather accept what is known, which is, the various forms of pressure, and rather frightened of the unknown in which there is no pressure. So we must find out for ourselves, each one, what is the truth of this - not your opinion, or my opinion, the actual truth why each one of us accepts this tremendous pressure of society, tremendous pressure of so-called learning, the pressure of knowledge. Do you understand all my questions? We accept it probably because we are conditioned to live with it. The pressure the woman exercises on the man, and the pressure the man exercises on the woman - you know that very well. And each person accepts it because that may be a way of living in which there is no love, there is no sense of deep communication and it has become a habit, a normal thing in our daily life. So that is a fact, that is 'what is', and can you observe it without distortion, without becoming romantic, foolish, you know all the imagination, just to observe actually 'what is: that you are living under various kinds and forms of pressures, weight, strain. And wherever there is any kind of pressure, it doesn't matter what it is, there must be a distortion. If you have great pressure on your tummy - put stone, it must react, it is not normal. So in the same way a brain under pressure cannot be normal, it becomes extraordinarily neurotic, distorted, deformed. And probably we are all deformed, and we don't see it.

And our intention in this meeting is to learn to observe: to observe the fact, actually see what is going on. Therefore there is no propaganda, no sense of being convinced, or making you believe in anything. So we said, one of the great pressures in life is the usage of words, how language drives us, the instrument of communication has become more important than what we are seeing. So can you please not tomorrow or when you go home but sitting there actually observe how unfortunately the instrument of language has made us react according to its conditioning. If you observe it very closely then you can ask the question, why has it become such pressure, and is it possible to use language, the word, with its content, knowing its content, without any emotional, romantic, psychological pressure. You understand this? Please do it now as you are sitting there, watch how words act as pressure. And is it possible not to let the instrument use us, but we use the words. So you are free of one extraordinary weight. It's like the cello, the musical instrument, the cello weighing down on you. But if you use it, quite a different action takes place. Right?

Then there is the pressure - which would you like to take, instead of my telling you? Don't immediately answer, find out.

Q: Ideology.

K: Ideology. Right. Most people have ideals. Why? The Marxists, the totalitarian attitude, the future is all important, not the present. The ideals of Lenin, Marx, Mao; why have ideals, the Christian ideals and so on and so on, why have ideals become so important, and why do they act as an extraordinary pressure on us? Don't they act as a pressure on you? So why do you accept the pressure of ideals? Go on, sirs, it's so simple. Please, perhaps at the end of the talk, or at another time, we can discuss it, you can ask me, but let me talk for a while. Probably you haven't thought about these matters at all. Perhaps it may be something totally new and your mind is already rejecting it. Or you say, 'What would happen if I had no ideals? I have lived so long with ideals, they have given me comfort, they have guided my life, they have acted as a solace and so on and so, the mind being used to ideals, and when it is challenged it recoils, and reacts. So please don't do it. Just find out, learn about it, not from me, not from the speaker. The speaker is teaching you nothing. He is just pointing out, showing you-take it, or leave it. It doesn't matter to me. But it's very important for you to find out why ideals have become of such extraordinary importance.

Ideals are always in the future, something in the distance, which indicates, doesn't it, that you are not concerned with actually what is. Right? You are observing 'what is' through the ideals of a future, so you have never come into contact directly with 'what is'. The ideals of a good life, the ideals of an American way of living - whatever that may mean - the ideals of having no war, peace, the ideals of love, the ideal of perfect marriage, perfect relationship.

Now who has created these ideals? Who has created this whole monstrous society, this immoral society? Obviously thought. No? Thought - please observe, learn, don't reject, don't say, no, it's not like that, go into it. After all you are here, perhaps some of you have come a long way, you are here to find out. You know your own thoughts, you know your own reactions, you know your own way of thinking. So you are here to find out what somebody else has to say, so listen to the poor chap! Don't say, no, it's all wrong. So thought not being able to deal with the present - please listen carefully - to 'what is', creates an ideal in the distance, hoping that ideal will help to understand the present, to deal with 'what is' and there is this constant battle between 'what is' actually and 'what should be'. This battle, this conflict is one of the great pressures of our life. Right? Why? Why do you have pressures of ideals? If you knew, or when you understand how to deal with actually 'what is', then ideals are not necessary at all. Right? Please investigate what the speaker is saying, don't reject it. That is, why should you live in conflict between 'what is' and 'what should be', why? If you understand 'what is' then the conflict ceases between what is actually happening and what should be happening, which is so ridiculous. So our question is then: is it possible to observe clearly without any pressure 'what is'? There is a pressure if you want to change it. Right? There is pressure if you say, this is ugly, brutal, and I must change it to something else. That becomes a pressure. So can you look at 'what is' without, again, using a word which drives you? I wonder if you understand all this. Look: if one is greedy, or angry, jealous, the word 'jealousy', 'anger', 'greed' have their associations of condemnation, rationalization, saying, it's all right, why shouldn't I be jealous, and so on and so on - so the language is driving you. Right? Do you see that? Can you observe that feeling which you call greed, which you call anger or jealousy, without using the word? If you don't use the word 'greed', 'jealousy' and 'anger' then what takes place? The weight, the pressure of language has ended, stopped, therefore you are looking at a feeling which has no name, and therefore can go beyond it. Right? Have some of you understood all this? Or shall I go into it much more?

Q: More.

K: More. All right, sir. You see the ideal has become a part of knowledge. Right? So knowledge has become a pressure. I'm an American, or I'm a Hindu, or whatever it is, some idiotic name. And that acts as a great pressure, and that pressure divides people - the Arab and the Jew. A very good example - the Indian and the Muslim, the Hindu. You follow?

So as most of us unfortunately live in the future called the ideal, we are never capable of observing actually what is going on. Either we are living in the past - the past is our knowledge, accumulated through millions of years, which has conditioned our mind, our brain, and so we are either living in the past yesterdays, or in the future yesterdays. The future is the past yesterday passing through the present, modified and going on. It is still yesterday. I wonder if you see all this. We are not talking about philosophy. I particularly don't like philosophy. It means - philosophy means the love of life, love of truth, love of wisdom, not theories, not ideals, but actually the love of wisdom. But you cannot love wisdom, something in the future. But you can only love something that you look at, what actually is in your hand. And to observe what is actually in your hand with all your heart, with all your capacity to look, without naming it, then the thing that you look at becomes extraordinarily beautiful, or something that has no value at all. Are you following all this? Are you doing all this? Or am I talking to an empty wall?

So can you be free of ideals and the pressure of the conflict that comes about between actually what is and what should be? It's a cruel way of living, isn't it - twisting your whole life into 'what should be' - your education, your religious institutions, everything has made you accept the pressure of ideals and live with it. Right? So are you free of that so that you are capable, that you have energy to look at 'what is'. You have no energy if you are wasting it in some ideals. That's real wastage. It saps your energy because ideals bring about conflict: your ideals, my ideals, somebody else's ideals - it's too complicated and too silly.

Now, can we move away from that? Move away in the sense that you have understood it, you have grasped it, learnt about it, therefore it has no value any more, and you are a free human being who is only observing 'what is' and nothing else. Right?

Then there is the pressure of institutions - democratic institutions, republic institutions, labour institutions, totalitarian institutions, educational - you follow - we live, and our life is built in institutions, we become part of institutions. Right? Haven't you noticed this? If you live in India, you are a Hindu, that's an institution. The word 'institution' implies to stand, and when you identify yourself with an institution and you become that institution - most of our brains are institutionalized - therefore you stand, it's safe in an institution. And that institution is a great pressure. Institutions, I mean by that word, routine - go to the office, do this, do that, live according to a routine, which doesn't mean when you leave institutions you do nothing, or do whatever you like, which is too equally absurd. Institution means routine, status, the presidents and down the line, and also it means conforming to a pattern, whether it is the American pattern, or the religious pattern, and all that. It's obvious, you can see this very clearly.

So we are saying, any form of institution is a distorting factor in life. When the brain has accepted the institution as a means of safety, security, status, a position, then it functions mechanically. And to live mechanically we think is the safest way. Right? The national institution, the nation - the American nation, the Russian, the Indian, German, French, English, they are nations, with their institutions, with their tradition, with their hierarchy, with their - all the rest of it. And we live in those institutions, we have become the institutions. You understand? I wonder if you see this.

Meditation has nothing whatsoever to do with any kind of institution. There must be freedom from any routine, from any sense of position, achievement. We will talk about it as we go along: the importance of meditation and where every form of pressure has gone. It's only then the mind can really ecstatically meditate.

So are you as a human being - please listen - are you as a human being who represents the entire humanity, which is a fact - as a human being, you as a human being represent the whole world, the whole world of humanity because you suffer, you go through anxiety, jealousy, fears, despair, moods, elations, sorrow, like everybody else. So you are actually the representative of all humanity. This is not an intellectual idea, it's not an ideal, but it's a fact. So what happens to you is happening to everybody. And if there is fundamental deep transformation in you, you are transforming mankind. I wonder if you see all this.

So wherever you go, institutions have become more important because the brain thinks it can function effectively if it is caught in a routine - right? - if it acts mechanically all the time. Therefore we accept the President, the Vice President, you know, all the way down, and all the way up - the pope and down to the poor parish priest, and from the parish priest up to pope. It's an institutions. They are good institutions, some of them, but the good becomes the bad when it becomes an institution. You understand what I am talking about? So are you living, living with an institutionalized brain? Marriage has become an institution. Right? And those who don't marry live with a girl or with a man, and say, 'That's an abomination, I won't, that's just a piece of paper. I won't go to church, and all the rest of that, it's nonsense. But we, who live with a girl or a man, are free of institutions.' Rubbish! Because that has become another institution. Which means - please understand, go into it, for God's sake, it's your life - which means, what is the common factor between the two, married and unmarried - both have become institutions. The common factor between both is possessiveness - it may be temporary, and it is also in the married life temporary, you can divorce, convenient, sexually pleasing, comforting, you can rely on each other, attachment, each person living inwardly, his own life, but saying, 'My darling, you are part of me'. Don't laugh, these are actual, unfortunate miserable facts. So what is the common factor? They are both the same, whether you get married through a paper, or live with another person, the common thing is the same. Which means what? No love at all. When you live with another and derive comfort, escape from loneliness, become attached, jealous, how can you have love when there is jealousy, anxiety, fear of losing, attachment, how can you have love. So find out for yourself.

So it is very important to discover for oneself whether your whole attitude, your way of life, your way of thinking, your actions, are the result of institutions. This is a tremendous question, you understand. It isn't just, yes and no, it's a very complex thing. How to live a life without belonging to anything, belonging to no institutions, whatever. Which means you must have a different kind of mind. And you cannot have a different kind of mental, or cerebral action unless you understand how we are a slave to institutions.

What is the time sir?

Q: Five past one.

K: So we have talked for an hour and five minutes. You know we can go on talking about these things, it is like a man ploughing, ploughing in the sand and never sowing. Most of us are so accustomed, our habit is to go a meeting and learn something, or be told, or be informed, but I am afraid this kind of meeting is not like that because we are both investigating, exploring, learning, finding out. Finding out how language has become such an appalling weight on us. The instrument is using us, we don't use it properly, accurately. And also how the ideals - the extraordinary thing is really, wherever you go, as I happen to go, ideals are the first thing they talk about. The philosophers, the theoretical politicians, the experts in theories as the Marxists, the Maoists, they have theories.

Think of it. And one finds very, very rarely a human being who has no ideals whatsoever, but is only living with 'what is', actually, so that he lives then without conflict. If you see 'what is', how can you have conflict? You understand? Only conflict arises when you want to change 'what is'. When I want to change jealousy into something else then conflict arises. But if I understand, look at jealousy, as I would listen to a child who is telling me about himself, about his ideas, his feelings, I would listen to it, I wouldn't interrupt, I wouldn't say it is right or wrong because it is a child, and he wants to tell me all kinds of things. So in the same way 'what is' is telling me enormous things, if I know how to listen to 'what is', or see 'what is'. But we haven't the patience or we do not want to see what actually is because our minds are so conditioned, we must change 'what is', it isn't right to be jealous. Or we say, 'Why shouldn't I be jealous?', rationalize it.

So to look at 'what is' without any distortions, which means without any pressure - the pressure of ideals, the pressure of wanting to change 'what is'. Do you understand all this? Then you begin to have an insight into something which is not the action of memory - we will go into it another day, tomorrow perhaps - which is not the action of remembrance, but an insight which is totally divorced from thought, from memory, from experience, that insight gives you an extraordinary release. That insight also, if you go into very deeply, transforms the very structure of the brain.

So at the end of the talk, of our talking over together, have we understood, or learnt, or seen, how language uses us, and the pressure of language; how ideals with their enormous pressure are distorting life, deforming our actions; and how institutions, whatever they are, which is a routine, and we think there is safety in routine, in being mechanical. Now we are saying it is possible to be free of all pressure if you know, if you understand the nature of pressure and what it means to observe. There must be freedom to observe. Look, if I am married, or if I have a girl, and I want to understand her, I must look at her, I must listen to her, I must find out, but I cannot find out if I have an image about her, if I think she is this, which is, all the words that have been accumulated through the past, which has become knowledge and that knowledge is observing. Can I look at my wife, or husband, or the tree, or the mountains, or the lake, or the beauty of a flower, without the word - the word being the image. And the image is a tremendous pressure too.

So at the end of the talk, conversation rather, have we understood this simple fact that to live under pressure of any kind brings about distortion of fact, distortion of action?

It's over. We will meet tomorrow.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 2ND APRIL 1978

I hope you can hear me clearly. May we go on talking about what we were discussing yesterday morning? I hope I may continue with that.

We were saying that any form of pressure on the brain affects our whole way of life. We were also saying that this pressure affects our activities, our attitudes and our character and our way of living. The pressure, economic, social, ethical, and religious pressure invariably distorts, not only our actions but the quality of the brain. And we went into the question of the pressure of language. Language uses us, rather than we use language. The instrument, which is the language, influences our action, our attitudes, thought and so on. We don't use language, language uses us, and therefore language becomes an extraordinary pressure. I do not know if you haven't noticed it in your daily life. When you say, 'My wife', there is already a certain pressure.

And we were saying also that when we use language, words, clearly, without the association connected with that word, either imaginative, romantic, or reactionary, then that word will convey exactly what one means. Therefore communication becomes much easier when we realize that the word is not the thing, that the description is not the described, then language doesn't act or bring about a change in our attitudes and actions. We went into that yesterday sufficiently.

And also we said, ideals affect, oppress and act as pressure upon our daily life, and is it possible not to have any ideals but only deal with actually what is, then there is no pressure whatsoever. I do not know if you have thought about it, gone into it since yesterday, and I hope some of you have, then you will find out for yourself what effect ideals bring about: a conflict, a confusion of thought, contradiction, and therefore perpetual struggle between 'what is' and 'what should be'. And we also said, is it possible to live without ideals whatsoever. Which doesn't mean that one becomes 'non-idealistic' - in quotes. On the contrary, one lives with facts, with 'what is', and therefore our action is always accurate, correct, in relation to 'what is'. We talked about that too yesterday.

And then we also went into the question of institutions, how all our life is controlled, shaped, directed by institutions, whether it is democratic, religious, republican, labour or socialist or totalitarian structure. I do not know if you have examined it further for yourself since yesterday, and if you have you will see, you must have found out how institutions control our life, direct our life. Therefore there is no freedom - institution being routine, hierarchical outlook, status, position and control by various directors, secretaries, presidents and all the rest of it. So is it possible to live a life without institutions, which doesn't mean that one leads a sloppy life, a shoddy life, but when one understands the nature and the structure of institutions, has an insight into it, has comprehension in its full depth, then life becomes much more rigorous, much more orderly, and there is a certain quality of freedom. We talked about that yesterday.

And also we talked rather briefly about meditation. You know that word means not only to ponder over, to think over, but also it comes from the root, Sanskrit, as well as Latin and so on, to measure. And the whole western world is based on the Greek idea of measurement, the western world is built on that - right? - which leads to extraordinary technological advancement. Whereas in the east, measure was considered an illusion because to comprehend the immeasurable, the whole, the mind must be free of measurement. We will go into that when we talk more about meditation.

Also if one may point out, we are sharing this thing together, we are examining this thing together. You are not merely listening to a talk, to a series of ideas, or conclusions, because the speaker has no conclusions, no ideas, but merely is stating what actually is, and if it is possible to go beyond. So when we are talking over together it implies that you and I share, partake in what we are examining. It is not the speaker is examining and then you receive, then you become a disciple and I become the authority. I do not wish to become your authority, nor your guru and all the rest of that nonsense. But whereas if we both of us share in our examination then there is no hierarchical attitude at all, both are learning.

So we must go into the question, if I may, of what is learning, what is the actual fact of learning. Learning implies, doesn't it, accumulation of memory, of facts stored up in the brain. All our schools, colleges and universities train us with facts, which are stored up in the brain, which becomes memory, and act skilfully according to that memory, or unskilfully. This is a fact. Right? You go to school to learn mathematics, or geography, or history, register it in the brain, and as you go along to college, university, that registration becomes more and more and more, and then you have all the facts, all the information, and according to that information you get a job, and in that job you act skilfully or not.

That's what we generally call learning.

There is also learning by doing. The totalitarian attitude, which is go out, act, then learn. I don't know if you know about all this. Which is both; that is, accumulate facts, learn all about mathematics and so on, accumulate knowledge and act according to that knowledge. The other the totalitarian other attitude is, go out and act and from there learn. Both are accumulating knowledge. Knowledge then becomes important to act skilfully.

Perhaps there is another way of learning also, which is not either of these two.

Are we meeting each other? Please, if I may point out, this is a serious gathering. If you are not serious it is not worth listening, but if you are serious in the sense that you want to live a totally different kind of life, not the life that we are leading, which is constant struggle, battle, violence, antagonism and so on in all our relationships, if one really is committed to find out if there is a different way of living, then one is serious, then you apply your capacities to think clearly, your energies in exploration. And those who are really serious live and those who are not, they do not live. So if one may point out, please, this is not an entertainment, this is not something you play with for a few days, and then drop it. It is not something intellectual, theoretical, problematical, hypothetical, we are dealing with actual daily life. And perhaps some will radically in understanding themselves bring about a different quality of mind. We also said yesterday, each human being, each one of you, if I may point out, represents the whole of mankind. That's an extraordinary thing to realize, because wherever you go, whether to the totalitarian states, Europe, or America, or India or Asia, human beings, the common factor of every human being is that they suffer, agony, despair, loneliness, unhappiness, a great deal of sorrow, fear and so on. So you are actually the representative of all humanity. When you realize it, not verbally, not theoretically, not hypothetically as an ideal, but as an actual fact, then you cease to be an individual. You understand? Individual implies, the meaning of that word, indivisible, not a human being who is broken up, as most human beings are, fragmented, broken up. Such human beings, humanity which is broken up is not an individual. So please bear in mind when we are exploring, we are exploring the whole nature of man, including woman of course. And in the exploration you are not only exploring yourself and therefore exploring the whole of humanity. It gives you such depth, width and a great sense of energy. In that there is no despair, depression. I do not know if you have realized all this. Probably some of you have travelled, but we travel for amusement, or to have better food in France, or to see the latest pictures in museums, but you don't look at man, human beings all over the world. If you do then you will see how important it is that your consciousness, which is the consciousness of the whole of mankind, when you realize that there is a certain quality of depth in it.

All right. So we are going to investigate together not only the ideological pressures, the pressure of institutions and language, but also we are going to enquire deeply and in detail if we can, into the pressure of knowledge. May we do that? Because there are various forms of pressure, we are taking one by one as we go along. Because until the mind is free of pressure there is no new way of living: you may join communes, start a new way of cooking and all the rest of it, but that is not freedom from pressure. This requires a great deal of investigation into the whole nature and the movement of pressure. So we are examining together, if I may repeat the word 'together' over and over and over again, there is not the speaker who is examining but together you and the speaker are investigating into this question of pressure, whether it is possible at all to be free of all pressures - the pressure of relationship, the pressure of fear, the pressure of the pursuit of pleasure and the ultimate pressure of god. Right? Really a greater pressure than god is oneself, which is the ultimate pressure. So we are going to examine all these very, very carefully, reasonably, logically, and realize that reason, logic cannot solve these problems. A different quality is needed, which we are going to examine as we go along.

So we are going to enquire into the question of what is knowledge, the nature of knowledge, the movement of knowledge and whether it acts as a pressure, and so on. So please together. What is the function of knowledge, and what is knowledge? Is knowledge wisdom? Is knowledge the means of the ascent of man? Is knowledge going to free man? Is knowledge going to bring about love? Don't agree, or disagree, we are going to examine. Will knowledge bring about a radical change in our relationship with each other, man, woman? So what place, what importance, what is the use of knowledge. We are going to look into it. Please, don't depend on my investigation because if you depend on the investigation of another, then you are investigating according to the other person's investigation, therefore it won't be your own. If you are going to examine yourself, the pressures, according to some psychologist, however renowned, however famous, then you are merely imitating his concepts, his ideas, his conclusions. Whereas if you examine your own pressures, disregarding what the others say, then what you discover becomes an extraordinarily reality. It doesn't mean you cling to your conclusions, which the philosophers and psychologists do. You then are constantly moving, constantly examining, and you cannot examine if you are frightened, if you say, 'This is not right, it shouldn't be'. Like a scientist, like a good scientist, not the government scientists, but a good scientist, or not the scientist who is part of the institution of a university, if you are good scientists you examine through a microscope 'what is'. In the very observation of that 'what is' the thing is undergoing a change. We will go into that as we go along.

Am I acting as a pressure on you? I feel I am. Because the speaker is intense about all these matters. I mean intense. And one feels very strongly about these matters, and being energetic, asking each one to do now what should be done, what must be done, that may act on you as a pressure, which I do not in any way wish to do. Then it becomes propaganda, worthless.

So we are going to examine together the whole structure of knowledge. Knowledge, as far as one can observe in oneself and in others, knowledge is the outcome of past registrations. Right? The original ape, anthropoid ape, registered danger. You are following this? Like a computer registers on tape, so the original anthropoid ape registered danger, pleasure, fear, the so-called instinctual protection of its young. That registration is the beginning of knowledge. Right? I wonder if you see this. Right? Please don't agree with me, but see it for yourself. When an incident takes place, that incident is registered on the brain, when it happened. When a word which you do not like to be used against you, that is registered. When somebody flatters you, that is registered. When somebody hurts you, that is registered. When somebody is cruel, that is registered. So the brain is a recording instrument, recording all the incidents that are going on, whether it is conscious or unconscious, whether it is waking hours or sleeping hours. The sleeping hours are the continuation of the waking hours. I wonder - am I going to quickly? Right, sir? I hope not. So knowledge is the accumulation of various experiences, various incidents, accidents, dangers, and so on, registered as memory. Right? That memory is stored up in the brain, in the very cells of it, which is the whole structure of knowledge. Right? And according to that knowledge we react, or act. So knowledge is always in the past. Right, sir? So when we are acting, we are acting from the past. When we say, we are living, it is from the past. Or, we say, we are living according to the future, which is the past, modified through the present, which becomes the future. All that is based on knowledge, which is the past. So our life is essentially, basically based on the past. So - I must go slowly, I mustn't jump. I want to jump.

So what place has this enormous accumulation of knowledge, knowledge gathered through millions of years, stored up in the brain, instinctual, instinctive and remembrance. So the brain is extraordinarily old, conditioned according to its memories. Right? We are challenging that very conditioning, whether that conditioning is necessary. If it is not necessary then what place has knowledge? You understand all this? So we are asking, our life, our actual daily life is based on the memories of the past, our relationship with each other, man and woman, friends and so on, is based on the past. I must go slowly.

So what is the relationship between thought and knowledge? Do you understand my question? All our activities, all our social, moral, religious, the gods, the pictures, the images, the cathedrals, everything is based on thought. Thought has produced them - the paintings, the culture, the things that are made out of marble, marvellous things, like Michelangelo and so on and so on, they are all based on the movement of thought. Right? Isn't that so? Those who worship Christ, those who regard various gods in India, are created by thought. You may say, well, they lived - but you thinking about him, that Christ, or that image you have, is self-created and so it is the result of thought. If you say there is god in you, that's created by thought. Or if you say, there is nothing but materialism, that's also created by thought. I wonder if you see all this.

Thought has not created nature - the mountains, the rivers, the trees, but man thinking about them makes use of them, like the chair. So thought has created the world in which we actually live. Right? That's obvious. And can thought see the whole movement of life? You understand my question? Perhaps I must explain a little more. Must I?

Let's begin: thought, we said, is the response of memory. Right? Without memory there is no thought. You cannot function radically, or sanely, or logically, or illogically, without thought. Thought has created illusions, which are also reality. You may think that you are god and you may act or think or do according to what you think god is, but yet it is the product of thought. We must be very clear on this point, that everything that we do, the most beautiful architecture, the greatest paintings, the marvellous music, the great scientific inventions, the marvellous, beautiful poems that are written - not modern poems, sorry! - are based on thought. And thought, we said, is the accumulation of knowledge as memory, and according to that memory, responding according to that memory is thought. Right? So thought is fragmented, broken up. I wonder if you see that. This is important, please, this is really important to understand this. A fragment, a broken piece, which is thought, says, I will understand the whole universe. It will understand the universe according to what it has created, but not the actual extraordinary nature of the universe. I wonder if you see this. Please, we must clearly explore this question very, very carefully, that thought in itself is broken up. Why? Because its memory is always limited. Right? It's very narrow, memory cannot contain the whole universe. So memory in itself is limited, therefore thought is limited. And thought means, the movement of thought means time.

Any movement from here to there, both physically as well as psychologically, implies time. Right? Any movement. Movement means time. So thought is a movement, so it is part of time. So it is limited, it is part of time, therefore it is incomplete. Right? Have I made this clear, sir? Yes? Good! Somebody has got it.

So being limited, being broken up, being part of time, thought is never complete. But it thinks it is complete, so it has created gods, which thought says, 'They are complete'. So whatever - however extensive, however deep, however wonderful, thought is limited, broken up, is based on time, therefore entirely limited - whatever it creates is limited. So thought is the outcome knowledge, therefore knowledge is limited, however much you may accumulate as knowledge, it is always limited. So can thought understand itself - please follow this - can thought see itself limited and therefore places itself in its proper place? Am I conveying anything? All right, I'll do it. It's my job to explain it.

Now first of all, to learn the art of learning, the art of listening, the art of seeing - the art of seeing, the art of listening, the art of learning. We mean by that word 'art' not the institutionalized idea of art, which is to paint, write poems, you know, all that - and we do not consider those people who live, or paint, that they are real artists, because art means in its root meaning, to put everything in its right place. Right? The meaning of that word 'art' means to give everything its proper place. So if that is clearly understood then has thought its right place? Not that thought puts itself in its right place - please understand this. Do you understand my question? Are you used to this kind of thinking? Are you used to this kind of exchange? I'm afraid not. All right, I'll go into it again.

As we said, learning about art, that is the way of living where everything has its right place, therefore complete order. You understand? If you put everything in your kitchen in its right place there is order, you don't have to chase around looking - which we are doing in the new house. If thought puts everything in its right place, then can thought see itself putting itself in its right place, everything in its right place? You understand my question? Can thought put everything in its right place, thought being fragmentary, broken up, can thought put anything in its right place? You understand my question?

Look: we have seen that thought itself is limited. Right? Can that which is limited put anything in its right place? Then the next question is, does thought itself realize that it cannot? Or, thought says, I can, tell me how to do it. You understand the question? Are you moving quickly?

So we are asking: does thought know itself limited, and therefore when there is to be order thought cannot bring about that order. Right? Is this complex, or too subtle? I don't know, I have lost you.

Q: No.

K: Right, if I haven't lost you then we can proceed. Then what brings about order? You understand my question? Whatever thought has created, being limited, being a fragment, broken up, being the past, whatever it does must create disorder. I wonder if you realize this. Whatever it does - all the political promises, all the economists saying, this is the solution, all the philosophers saying, do this, all the psychologists with their extraordinary capacity to analyse - they don't really analyse because they don't know what analysis means, because there is a division between the analyser - I won't go into that for the moment. And whatever thought has done, or is doing, killing animals, whales, dolphins, baby seals, worshipping in a marvellous cathedral, the beauty of the Roman Catholic mass, all that is created by thought. And therefore whatever it has done must create disorder. Right? Do you see that? No, not as an idea, but actually. Look, thought has created nationalities, hasn't it - American, English, German, French, linguistically driven each one in a different direction and so on. So thought has created nationalities. So thought says, 'I will bring nationalities together', United Nations, so it is disorder. I wonder if you realize this.

If thought has created disorder, what will bring about order? You understand my question? So man says, 'We cannot do anything about this disorder, god will bring about order'. An external agency, the guru, the priest, somebody will bring about order. The nobler the entity, the imagination, the god, that external agency will bring order, therefore let's pray, let's attend the churches. It is all the movement of thought. I wonder if you see this. So thought, whatever it does, is disorder. If one realizes that, sees that, that is, the perception of that is intelligence, isn't it. I wonder if you see that. The perception that thought, whatever it does, has created, and is creating disorder, that very perception is insight, which is intelligence. Right? So that insight brings order. I wonder if you see this. We will go into it.

So we are asking: what is the relationship between knowledge, which is the outcome, which is the past, out of the past comes thought born of memory, stored up in the brain; the brain depends for its security on the past, because memory gives it security, survival - so what relationship has knowledge to order, which must be absolute, not relative? Because the universe is in perfect order, and the scientists are trying to find out what that order is. Then the order they want to find out thought is investigating, therefore the investigation into order will bring further disorder. I wonder if you see all this. Do you? Somebody, please.

Audience: Yes.

K: Not that I want your agreement, or disagreement, do you see it actually? So we are saying, what has knowledge, which has become of such importance, all the scientists are accumulating it and praising it and saying, through knowledge we will ascend more and more and more - what is the relationship between knowledge and order? Do you get it? Or is there no relationship at all?

We are saying order is only possible, complete order inwardly, therefore outwardly, complete order is only possible when thought has realized its limitation and therefore accepts that limitation which has its proper place. Got it? No, please, this is rather a complex question, go into it very slowly. Can that which is limited, broken up, realize itself being broken up? Or thought says, I am broken up? You see the difference? Oh, no. I'll keep at this until you understand this.

We said thought is limited, broken up, part of time, which is the movement of knowledge, therefore utterly, completely limited. And whatever that thought does, being limited, must be continuous disorder. That's an absolute fact, irrevocable. You can see it: they talk about peace and they are preparing for war; they talk about united nations and they are all separate nations, fighting each other, wanting this, that and the other. Look at the division thought has created in religion, the Baptists - I won't go into all that. Thought is really the most mischievous thing in life, the greatest criminal. And what place has that limited thought, what relationship is that to order? Thought cannot bring about order because it is self-limited. Does thought realize that it is limited? Or, thought says, I am limited, which is still the movement of thought. Do you see that? So how is it possible for thought to realize that it is limited, without thought saying, I am limited? Therefore thought then says, let me proceed to find out how to break down that limitation - which is still thought. Right?

So, we are asking - please listen - the art of listening. To listen implies that your mind is not occupied with your own thoughts, with your own prejudices and you say, 'Yes, I understand it, get on with it', or draw a conclusion. But to listen as you would listen to a small child who is telling you all about his troubles, you don't interrupt him, you don't say, 'That's enough, for goodness sake, I am getting bored', you hold his hand, or cuddle him, put him on your lap and you listen to all the things he has to say, you don't interrupt. In the same way, listen, which means care, attention, affection. If you listen that way then the problem is solved. The problem is this - your problem: realizing that thought has created an awful mess of the world, thought says to itself, I must bring about order. The order according to Marx is totalitarianism, probably there is order there; no poverty, there are no flies, they are honest, everybody is drilled, frightened, obeying. That is disorder. And in the western world, the same thing, disorder. So thought, whatever it does, is disorder. That's one point.

Now my next question is: what will bring order? Because without order life becomes a confusion, a conflict, a miserable state. So can there be - please listen - can there be absolute order, not relative order, order depending on the presidents, or your guru, complete order. So thought can, whatever it does, create more, more and more disorder. And one realizes intellectually perhaps, or verbally, that there must be order. So is it possible to bring about order without the operation of thought? You get it? You understand the question? Without the movement, the functioning of thought? Because thought itself is confusion. I'll go into it. If you don't mind listen to it.

How have you approached this question? You understand? That is, order and disorder, disorder created by thought. And thought cannot bring about order. Now how do you come to it? What has been your approach to this question? Because on your approach depends the answer. You understand? This is simple, isn't it? If I approach it with fear, with anxiety, with wanting to understand, fight, fight, I won't see the full significance. Therefore I must be very clear, you must be absolutely clear how you approach the question. So we are examining how you are approaching this question: order and disorder. Are you approaching it in order to solve a problem? Therefore you are more concerned with the solution rather than with understanding the problem itself. Or are you approaching it with a desire to bring about order, which is the operation of thought? So please investigate for yourself how you are approaching this problem. Through fear, through expectation that somebody will tell you therefore you will bring about order? Or you don't know, therefore you are groping to find? Has your approach a motive? Because if you have a motive, that motive is going to dictate the answer. Right? I wonder if you see all this.

So one must be very clear how you approach. If you approach it totally freely, freedom, without wanting something out of it, then you can investigate whether thought can bring order, if thought cannot bring order, the very realization that thought cannot bring about order is intelligence, isn't it. I wonder if you see that. You see that, don't you?

Q: Yes.

K: That thought, which has created disorder, to see that thought in itself is the mischief maker, that is an extraordinary revelation. That is insight, isn't it. Therefore insight has nothing to do with memory, has nothing to do with thought, nothing to do with the past. So that insight is going to bring order. I wonder if you understand this.

Now just a minute: if you have an insight that institutions, whatever they are, will not resolve our problems, do you realize it logically, rationally? Or you have an insight into it? You understand my question? If you have an insight into it you are free of all nationalities, the feeling of belonging to a particular nation. So in the same way, when you listen to the fact that thought cannot bring about order, that very act of listening is an insight to the fact. That's why it is tremendously important to listen. So that insight, which is totally unrelated to memory, brings order. And that order is the order of the universe, complete, total, irrevocable. It's not order one day and the next day mess.

Have you got some of this? So we will go on with it perhaps as a discussion the day after tomorrow, or next Saturday or Thursday. I hope it will be in the Grove, which will be much nicer. Right.

(clapping) Please don't clap. You are clapping for yourselves. You are not clapping for me. (clapping and laughter).

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 4TH APRIL 1978

Krishnamurti: I believe this is a dialogue or a conversation between us. We are not offering one opinion against another, or one thought against another, or one judgement or conclusion against another, but what we must do, I think, is to talk over as two friends our problems, friends who are concerned with their life, with their problems, with their relationship, with the whole of life. So what would you like, if I may ask, that we should begin to discuss or have a dialogue about?

Questioner: Some of us have written a question here.

K: Before I answer this what would you like to talk about or have a dialogue or conversation about? Yes, sir?

Q: I was wondering if you could elaborate on how to create interest in students to learn something they are not interested in.

K: The questioner asks, how to create an interest in something that you are not interested in. Right, sir?

Q: I wonder if we could go into the question of the mystical, mysticism and so forth.

K: You want to discuss mysticism, occultism, telepathy, levitation and what else, kundalini - is that what you want to discuss, sir?

Q: I want to discuss education, especially the different ages of children, how they should be educated at different ages because I think they are not all the same.

K: How children of different ages should be educated. Yes, sir?

Q: I want to discuss how do you listen to the movement of thought without getting caught.

K: How does one listen to the movement of thought without getting caught in the meaning and the associations and so on.

Q: The gentleman who preceded you said that he felt that moving here was the most important thing he did in his life. Can you tell us how we each can make every moment in our life the most important thing?

K: Are there questions enough? Yes, sir?

Q: I have fear and isolation.

Q: Could you talk about meditation and whether it is good to set a time to practise every day, keep a kind of schedule, to put aside other activities?

K: If I understand it rightly, the questioner asks, is it possible to meditate without giving a special time to it and not putting other activities aside. Is that right?

Q: I think it is obviously possible to relax but I am asking is it also beneficial to set aside a time every day.

K: Is it also beneficial to set aside a period of time every day to meditate. Yes, sir?

Q: How to live without belonging to anything.

K: Now that's enough.

Q: You have said that to observe you have to be free, but isn't it also true that to be free you have to learn how to observe. So could you comment on that and also perhaps on the context in which you use these words which might have created a conflict between those statements.

K: How to?

Q: To be free, you say, one must observe, but to observe one must already be free. How can that be?

K: Which came first, the egg or the other? Now that's enough if you don't mind. Which of these questions would you like to talk over together? The questions are, if I can repeat them: if there is no interest how is one to create interest. Right? That was one of the questions. How to meditate, is it beneficial to meditate at certain periods of the day and all that; and would you also talk over mysticism, occultism, telepathy - what else is there - kundalini and levitation. Would you also talk over how to educate children at various ages. What else?

Q: Observation.

K: Observation, how to observe without association, without remembrance. Right? Now which of these questions would you like to talk over together?

Q: Observation without association.

K: Would you like to discuss observation, perception, seeing without introducing words with their associations? Do you want to discuss that?

Q: Yes.

K: Why?

Q: Why not?

K: You say, why not. Are you interested in this question, does it mean anything to you to find out seriously how to observe - is there a way of observing without the interference of words with their association, with their condemnations and approval, the whole movement of verbal remembrances. Are you deeply interested in this, does it mean anything in your life? Because if it does then we could discuss it seriously. May we go into that, is that what you want to discuss?

Audience: Yes.

K: You are quite sure? Isn't one of our difficulties when you listen to a statement to make an abstraction of it, to make an idea of it - isn't that a fact that one listens to a particular statement or opinion or judgement or evaluation and immediately there is a conclusion away from the actual statement. Has one observed that? Which is, making an abstraction of a fact into an idea. Right, sir? So when we talk about observing, is that observation an abstraction or an actual perception, seeing? You understand? I hope I am making myself clear. You tell me to observe without the association that observation brings about. I hear that and from that I make an idea and from that idea ask myself, please tell me how to do this. Which is, I have moved away from the fact to an idea and want to find out how to carry out that idea. So let us be very clear right from the beginning, if one may point out, are we making an abstraction, that is, away, to abstract, away from observation, making an idea of it, a conclusion of it? Or one wants to discover the actual, if I may use the word, purity of observation. I wonder if I am making myself clear? Which is it that we want to do, which is it that we are doing? Are we making an abstraction, or do we want to find out for ourselves the act of observation, what is involved in that? Not the idea of observation. Am I somewhat making myself clear?

So if we are not running away or abstracting or moving away from the act of observation then we can ask, what is the act of observation. What is the actual fact of observation? Do we see anything, the hills, the mountains, the rivers, the sky, the wife, the husband, the girl and the boy, the nation, anything without the idea interfering with it, without the image coming in between, without my conclusion about it? Now which is it we do? Is there an observation without interference, interference of thought, the thought being the word, the word awakening the associations connected with that word and denying the associations and trying to go beyond the word and therefore now in that process you never observe. Can we go on from there? So which is it that we do actually? Do I observe those flowers, does one observe those flowers without naming them - look at them, you will see how extraordinarily complex a problem it is - to observe them without naming them; the moment you name them there comes the association of like and dislike, that they are carnations and I don't like that particular colour, or I like that colour, all that interferes with the actual seeing. Right? In the same way, can I look, observe my friend, my wife, the girl and so on - not mine, one's - observe without the interference of the various imaginative, thoughtful associations that I have had with that person? It is a very complex problem this because for most of us observation is always through an association, through memories, through images.

Then the problem arises - won't you discuss with me, I might make a statement and then you can discuss with me - then the problem arises: is it possible not to create images, pictures? You understand my question? Because they interfere with the clarity of perception. So one asks is it possible not to have these images, these pictures. You understand?

Q: Up to a certain point there is clarity of observation but some mechanism at some certain time takes over and clarity disappears.

K: That's right. At some time the mechanism of thought, the mechanism of images, takes over and clarity disappears. That's what you were saying, sir.

Q: My condition is that the associations are there, one is becoming aware of them all the time. Then what, in the sense of observing without association?

K: Can we go into this very slowly and carefully, in detail, then perhaps we can understand each other. Please I am not persuading you to think the way I observe or I think, I am not fostering something upon you. We are together looking into the whole complex problem of perception. First of all there is the perception through the optical nerve and so on, and then you see. When does the mechanical process of creating images about what you see take place? When? You asked that question. Sir, let's make it much more simple. In your relationship with another intimate, or not, when does the mechanism of creating an image about that person take place? How does it happen? You understand my question?

Q: Possibly when the mind first recognizes something and creates part of the relationship and brings it back into the foreground, that's when the images may take over, or memory.

K: Sir, look: let's keep it very simple, still simpler. One meets a person, is introduced to that person, then that name, the face is remembered, recorded. Then when you meet that person next time that recording says, you are so-and-so, I met you the day before yesterday. That's this whole mechanical process of registration, which interferes with perception. Right? Go slowly. Wait a minute, lady. Right, sir? Are we clear on this point? You insult me, it is registered, and when I meet you next time I am a little bit nervous, withdrawn; or you flatter me, it is registered, and I say, how nice of you. We are friends. So this kind of registration is going on all the time. Right? Which obviously, logically, reasonably, shows all this interferes with observation. Right?

Now the question is - please, let's find out - the question is, how is it possible - not 'how' - is it at all possible to observe without the whole mechanical process of remembrance interfering?

Q: It should be possible.

K: It should be - I am hungry, you should be able to eat, but there is no food!

Q: What I mean is you should be able to learn how to do that.

K: We are going to find out.

Q: It doesn't have to be a question, sir, that's all.

K: We are going to find out. That's why I want to go step by step into it.

Q: Sir, it seems to me that as long as we are concerned with the accumulations surrounding the perception we cannot.

K: Yes, we are stimulated and so on. All that is another form of remembrance, registered and that registration is memory and that memory interferes. Sir, you are married, some of you, or you have got girls, or boys, haven't you images about that person? Don't those images interfere with your actual relationship with that person? Right? Obviously. Now we are asking, the mechanism which is constantly operating, can that mechanism stop for a few seconds even? You understand my question? Am I making it clear? Please I want to get on with this because it is very complex as we said.

So one sees there is the registration taking place when the name is remembered, the face is remembered, the particular association with that person is remembered. Right? That goes on all the time, pleasant or unpleasant, dangerous or safe and so on. So we are asking, can this mechanism come to an end so that I can look?

Q: It is impossible to observe without making a judgement, or naming it, and accept it for what it is.

K: No. Is it possible to observe without judgement, just to look at 'what is' - is that it? Is that the question? Right? We are doing that, we are exploring that. Why does this mechanism operate? You understand my question, sir, just listen to my question first. I am not stopping you from discussing or have a conversation with the speaker but I am asking, why does this mechanism of creating images, conclusions, opinions, why does this mechanism operate, why?

Q: If we don't pay attention then the mind starts to move.

K: Yes, sir, but we are saying, why does this mechanism function instantly?

Q: Experience.

K: Are you sure it's not guesswork?

Q: Sir, when I have a strong emotional reaction, only then if I hate someone or admire someone, or am afraid of someone, then the image persists. Otherwise if there is no reaction the person is new to me every single moment. Now the emotion, if I ask myself why do I have the emotion, then I have to ask myself why do I have hands and feet.

K: No, no, why do I have hands is different from why do I have emotions.

Q: But I have them, they are just there.

K: Why? We have emotions of anger, hatred, resistance and so on and so on, why? Is it inherited from the anthropoid apes, right from the beginning? Or is it a temporary passing thing? You understand? Please go into this a little bit. You are going too far ahead.

Q: Is not love a faculty equal to hands and feet which we have allowed to atrophy?

K: Is not love, like any other faculty, been atrophied. You see, sir, we are talking about perception, sir, love is something which we have to go into it, if I may suggest, perhaps after this question.

Q: But sir, I am answering you question. You asked why, where does it begin, where does the mechanism begin. I say it began when love was atrophied.

K: Yes, it began when love was denied, was dead, was killed.

Q: I don't think it is dead.

K: Atrophied, all right, it is paralysed, any other word you like to use. Are we answering that question, sir, if I may ask, why does the mind, the brain create images? The images are very active.

Q: From fear.

K: Fear, which means what? As the gentleman suggested it may be because in remembering, in association, in the image there is great security. Right? Somebody has robbed another of his things, that is registered, the next time you meet that person you are very, very careful, which is security. So is the brain registering all these things in order to have security?

Q: Sir, if someone can rob me of something that provides me with security, am I not already lost?

K: Lost? What do you mean by that?

Q: If I establish myself on a basis of something, if I have my security involved in a thing which somebody can rob me of, am I not already lost?

K: Yes, sir, probably. If somebody takes away all your things you are obviously lost, but we are not discussing for the moment that. We are asking why does the brain register at all. You follow? Please go into this, please, for a few minutes. This is very important because we are always living in the past and the past is the registration movement. Right?

Q: As the future.

K: As the future or the past.

Q: Anything to do with time.

K: So do we all understand clearly that this registration takes place because the brain can only function when there is security properly, clearly, efficiently. Right? No sir?

Q: I am not sure I understand that. Security...

K: When it is safe, when it is not damaged, when it is not hurt.

Q: Physically you are saying?

K: Both physically as well as psychologically. If it is hurt then you behave neurotically, if it is damaged in any way all its actions will be deformed. So the brain says to itself, thought says to itself, there must be security. Right, sir? No?

Q: But isn't it that the desire for security is seen as being hurt.

K: We are going to find out, sir. Of course. First see how the brain demands, asks that it should be completely secure, whether it is secure in actuality or in an illusion, in a fancy or in 'what is'. One might find security in a belief - it has no validity, I believe the earth is flat, but the belief in the earth being flat gives it security until you come along and say, 'Don't be foolish it is round'. I am frightened, then I begin to investigate and say, 'Yes', and in that I also seek security. This is simple and clear. So the brain - have you watched a child, it wants security from its mother and so from the original ape the instinct is to be protected, to find safety, to have somebody to hold you so that you are comfortable. You have seen all this in a baby.

Now what do we mean by safety? You understand? What do we mean by being secure? Right? We say the brain must be secure, must have security to function efficiently. Right? Has it found security?

Q: No.

K: I am asking, sir. Has it found security?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes? Physically? Has it?

Q: Physically.

K: No, just listen, sir, has it.

Q: I think it probably hasn't.

K: Not your particular brain, your particular brain is the result of millions of years of evolution, growth, it is not your particular brain, it is the brain of man, of a human being. And - just a minute, let me finish what I am saying, forgive me - we are saying, it needs security, it must have security, but has it? It has said there is security in tribalism. Right? Belonging to a tribe. Glorified nationality is the continuation of the tribal instinct. Now when there are nations separate from each other and each group belongs and says, I am safe here, then is there safety? There are wars, so you are not even physically safe.

Q: There is just an idea of safety.

K: That's what I am coming to. So what are you saying when you say the brain needs safety, at what level, at what depth, or vertically, horizontally, is there any safety at all in what we are doing? The rich and the poor. You follow? The whole social structure, does it give you safety, not for your particular period of life, it may be thirty years, of fifty years, or a hundred years, but for the brain of a human being, of humanity, of which you are.

Q: Sir, we are discussing, I believe, the fact that the brain wants self-preservation.

K: Yes.

Q: Then I have briefly security. But also the brain, I believe, strives more than this, and that is self-perpetuation.

K: We are coming to that.

Q: It is coupled with the problem of acquisition, wanting more.

K: Self-perpetuation because in perpetuating itself in another, separating itself and thinking it is separate and perpetuating in another, that idea gives it safety.

Now we are asking, is there safety in what we are cultivating, what we are demanding, what our society, politicians, economics, etcetera, etcetera, is creating around us - which we have created, not somebody else has created it but we in our desire to be secure, the brain has created this extraordinary society which thought etcetera, etcetera. Yes, madam?

Q: I wanted to ask is there security, psychological or physical, because what we are doing all the time is creating these images which are at variance all the time. Our life is false security from illusions.

K: I understand. Look, madam, is it an illusion when you have got a husband and a wife and each person seeks security in the other? Actually face it. Do you call that illusion? This is what we are doing. I wish you would go step by step. All right.

So we are saying the brain needs security. It has found security in religion, in conclusions, in concepts, in ideas, in images, which prevent seeing clearly. Right? That is our question.

Now can this desire or the urge or the compulsion to be secure, can the brain activity stop for a few seconds even? Do you understand my question? Am I explaining myself clearly?

Q: How can we answer that question without it already being a conclusion from a previous experience?

K: No, no. That's why, if you conclude it is from a previous experience, so we are saying without conclusion. Sir, can you observe that flower without conclusion, without naming it? Can you observe your girl or your boy, the politician, the priest, whatever it is, can you observe without some kind of opinion, reaction, judgement, evaluation, jumping and interfering with your observation?

Q: It seems to me that all we are concerned about is stimulation.

K: Yes, sir, it is part of simulation. We all agree. But would you please consider this for a few minutes: that's why we asked from the very beginning if you are serious in the pursuit of this question you will have to find out for yourself whether this perception can ever be clear, not distorted. It can only be clear, not distorted when there is no interference from the past, the past being the remembrances, the associations, the ideas, the images and so on and so on. So to make it very simple now: can you observe without the past? That is, can you observe your friend, your girl, your husband, your wife, or your man, without all the remembrance of the past interfering with your observation? Yes, sir?

Q: Without the past I wouldn't be able to understand a word you are saying.

K: No, sir. Look, sir, may I put it differently. The observer looking at that flower, the observer who looks, is not the observer the past? Is that clear? You observe, you observe your wife, the observer, the 'I' who says, I am observing, is not that observer made up of all the images, of all the remembrances, of all the insults, of all the pleasures, of all the sexual etcetera, etcetera, which is all the past, so is not the observer the past? Right? That's simple. Now, so the past is looking at the flower and saying, that is a chrysanthemum, that's a rose, that's pink, that's violet and so on, so the past is always observing the present. Right? I don't know yet, sir. We are asking when one sees the observer is the past, which interferes with perception, then one asks, is it possible for the past, the observer, to end and look? This is complex and if you want to go into it I will go into it much more deeply. We must come to this point first. So the past with all the memories, hurts, insults, happiness, boredom, tears, everything is the past, that is the essence of the observer. Now the observer then says, that is a chrysanthemum, names it and thinks it has understood it, thinks it has seen it. Right? Now I am asking, can that observer come to an end? I have asked the right question therefore it must be the right answer, you will get it in a minute. Do you understand my question? Am I making myself clear?

So is love a remembrance? No, don't shake your head, please. Go into it, see what we are all doing. So I won't bring in love, because that's complex. So can that observer come to an end so that there is clarity of perception? It can come to an end only when the observer says, when the observer realizes that which he is observing is the observed. The observer is the observed. You understand? Right, sir? No. Go slowly. Now wait a minute, sir. How do you listen to that idea, to that statement? The speaker said just now, the observer is the observed. Right? It is a statement. You don't understand it, you say, what the devil are you talking about. But how do you listen to it? Do you listen to find out or you are listening saying, I don't understand? Are you resisting? Are you trying to make it into an idea? You follow what I am saying? Which is it that you are doing? When the speaker makes the statement that the observer is the observed, how do you listen to that, how do you approach that statement?

Q: You don't want to approach it. You don't want to listen.

K: All right, don't approach it. Who cares? Don't listen.

Q: When the observer is the past, the accumulation, the memories, the hurts, everything from the past, then you say the observer is the observed.

K: I said to you, sir, how do you listen to it? How do you listen to any statement which you have not heard before?

Q: I see images.

K: I am asking a question: how do you listen to some statement or some fact which you have never heard or listened or seen, how do you come to it, how do you receive it?

Q: With joy.

Q: I believe it.

Q: It seems that the way I look on it is that I form an image, you say, the observer is the observed, I form an image of something which is the observer.

K: Therefore you have already come to a conclusion. Therefore you are not listening. I am not saying you should.

Q: No, I don't know what listening means.

K: No, sir. Look, may I put it in a different way: how do you approach a question which you have not heard before, a statement which you have not listened to before? How do you approach it.

Q: Sir, it seems a little odd to look for an answer.

K: What is your actual approach, because your approach is going to dictate the answer. Right? If you are frightened your answer will be a thing that will be frightening; if you approach it saying, I must get agitated about it, your answer also will have no meaning. So you must find out for yourself, if I may ask, what's your approach to a statement like, the observer is the observed?

Q: Sir, one is with the observed, on the same vibration.

K: Look, sir: how do you observe your wife, or your girl friend, or your boy friend, how do you observe them? Please, I am asking you. You are observing the image that you have created about that person. Right? So the observer is the observed which is the image. Do you see that? It's very simple. Don't move away from it for the moment, please hold on a minute, you can discuss it a little later, I am not preventing you from discussing or contradicting, or saying, you are rotten, what you are talking about. But I am just asking, when you observe your boy friend or girl friend or your husband or wife, the observer is the past, the memories, all that, when he observes the wife, or the girl or the boy, he is observing, the observer is the observed, is the picture. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: Wait, wait. So the past has created the present, which is the wife or the girl or whatever it is. All the churches are filled with this. The past has created all that and when you observe the past is observing. So the observer is the picture, is the image which he has created. Clear? Have you got it? This is really very important once you get this. So the observer is the observed, which means there is no longer the difference between the observer and the observed. Right? And so you remove the conflict, the division. Right? Is this clear? May we go on with this? I am working, I hope you are also working.

So we have found something extraordinary. Right? You have found something extraordinary, which is, you have removed the cause of conflict which arises when there is division - the Arab, the Jew, the Muslim, the Hindu, you follow?, the communist, socialist and so on. So you have removed the conflict that comes about when there is division. Right? That is, when the observer realizes that which he is observing is himself. Right? So we are left now with the fact that the observer is the observed. Right? The fact.

Q: So what takes place with the observer?

K: We are coming to that. First see the fact, sir, what happens. So the observer is the observed. Right? Then what happens to the observer? Listen, I have put you a question, if I may, what happens to the observer?

Q: He becomes the observed.

K: Look at yourself. You have a girl friend and so on, I don't have to repeat this eternally, you have an image about her and the image is the past and the observer is the past, so the observer when he looks at her or him is seeing himself as the observed. Right?

Then what happens? Go slowly. Then what happens actually?

Q: There's...

K: No, sir, go into it very slowly, patiently.

Q: If you make a judgement you create another conflict.

K: So don't make judgements. You don't struggle with it, so it is. Right? So it's a fact for the first time you are seeing, a fact.

Wait, go slowly, what happens?

Q: Sir, after a judgement is made a person, a mind, is no longer able to enquire anything about the observer.

K: Look, let's move in another direction for a second. The thinker is the thought. Right? If there is no thought there is no thinker. Right? So the thinker is the thought. So before he divided thought and the thinker. We said the thinker is the thought, without the thinker there is no thought. So there is no division between the thinker and the thought. Right? There is only thinking, not a thinker. Right? Now wait a minute, go slowly. The experiencer is the experience. Now you are going to rebel against this! Right? Go into it carefully because most people are seeking experience, super or physical experience, various forms of experience, thinking that the experiencer is different from the experience. Right? But we are saying, the experiencer is the experience. The experiencer, if he doesn't recognize the experience it has no meaning. Right? He can only recognize and explain the experience according to the past memory, so the past is the experience. Right? I wonder if you see this clearly. So there is no seeking of experience. You won't like this! Right? Before you went out seeking experience, went to India, followed the gurus, did all kinds of silly nonsense thinking that was experience, but when you realize that the experiencer who is the past, with all the memories, goes out there, he recognizes the guru or the experience according to his conditioning, the past. So the past is that which he is experiencing. No? So the mind then says, I have seen this, I am not asking any further experience. This is a tremendous thing if you discover this. Then you are a light to yourself - I won't go into that, leave that for the moment.

So we said, the past is the observer who thinks he is separate from that which he is observing and so he says, I am looking, I am examining, I am drawing a conclusion. Right? All that is the action of the past. So when one realizes the observer is the observed then what takes place?

Q: No more images.

K: Sir, talk from direct...

Q: If I observe the flowers with an image, do we mean I am in contact with the image and not the flowers, then I am the image?

K: No, sir. If you understand, if you realize that you, that the observer is the observed we have gone into it enough for the moment - when you realize that as a fact then what takes place?

Q: I become the observed.

K: Then what takes place?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, go slowly, madam, you are too quick.

Q: The tension of accumulation round the observation ceases to be added to. There is no additional accumulation around the observation.

K: So what does that mean?

Q: To go beyond.

Q: That means we are free to...

K: Not, we, not we.

Q: When this happens to me my mind relaxes.

K: Please, you haven't really seen this. You haven't actually seen, realized, as you realize pain, hunger, sexual demands, you haven't seen the actual fact that the observer is the observed. Then what takes place?

Q: We are no longer taking any more sickness into our body. Then the sickness that is present in our body at the moment is not being added to. There is no more sickness, there is only that that is. We are not reinforcing the accumulation, we are not reinforcing the sickness any more.

K: Do please, if I may request you most kindly and respectfully, do you actually see the fact that the observer is the observed?

Q: Sir, if I see that, then at that moment there would be a...

K: No, not, 'at that moment'. Always.

Q: I see that fact and I don't know what to do with it.

K: Not, 'what you' - you see you have separated yourself and said 'I don't know what to do with it'. So you are acting still as the observer.

Q: When you say, observed, you mean the observed as image?

K: Yes, sir. We said from the beginning, sir, that the observer, when you observe your wife or your girl friend, the observer is made up of the past, past memories, past hurts, past insults, the image that you have made about her. When you observe those images, those hurts, those remembrances are observing, you are observing that, not your wife, not your girl, you are observing that, so the observer is that. Right? Just a minute. If that is absolutely clear then what happens?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, madam.

Q: I feel alive.

K: Who is 'you' feeling alive?

Q: There is aliveness.

K: You haven't gone into this. Look, this is part of meditation, you want to know about meditation, this is the beginning of meditation, the vitality of meditation, if you don't understand this you can go off into meditation and go off into all kinds of illusions and silly nonsense. Because we are eliminating totally the division between the observer and the observed who creates conflict, me and you, we and they, the Arab and the Jew, the American, the Russian, the Indian, and the Muslim, we are eliminating totally all that if you see the observer is the observed. Look: the Hindu in India and the Muslim in Pakistan divided by a boundary, divided by nationality, divided by language, divided by their religious beliefs, all that is created by thought. Right? The thought is memory, the past. So when you see that, that one is conditioned by belief, whether it is Hindu, Muslim, Jew, you are then observing the belief. So what happens when the observer is the observed because there you have eliminated - there is the elimination, not you have eliminated - there is the elimination of all conflict.

Q: There is no direction.

K: Oh, no, you are guessing, madam, please.

Q: Doesn't the mind become quiet?

Q: There is silence.

K: I don't know, sir. I don't know what happens, you have to find out.

Q: At this moment there is a feeling one must experiment with this more.

K: There is no experiment. May I go into it a little bit? Please, I am not trying to influence you, I am not trying to make you think the way I think - I don't think. If you think, you are going your own way. There is only the observation of the fact that the observer is the observed. Right? That's the fact. And that realization has come because I have carefully examined the whole process, it was not a stupid conclusion, an illusory conclusion, a desired conclusion, it has been logically, reasonably, sanely examined. And that examination shows the observer is the observed. Right? So what has happened? Before the observer tried to do something about the observed, he tried to control it, he tried to shape it, he tried to deny it, he tried to suppress it, he did everything to conquer it one way or the other. Here there is none of that because he realizes the observer is the observed. So the central point of conflict has been eliminated. Right? Have you? Therefore what has taken place? Through conflict you have wasted energy. Right? The mind in conflict which is division, the observer and the observed, in that division energy has been expanded, wasted. Right? Through conflict. When there is no conflict what takes place? There is no wastage of energy. Right? So what happens? Then that which is observed, because there is only pure observation not the image observing itself. I wonder if you see all this. Look, sir, when there is no observer, there is only observation, isn't there. Not conclusion, not opinions, not fixations, just observation. Then when there is that observation that which is being observed undergoes a change. I wonder if you see this. Look, sir, take a very simple example - you are interested in all this?

Audience: Yes.

K: Good, good. Am I stimulating you? I am afraid I am. That's why, you all have depended so much on stimulation and you add another stimulation to it, but I am not acting as a stimulation at all, I am just showing it to you, and if you want to look at it, look at it, if you don't, don't. It's very simple.

I am greedy, let's suppose, I am greedy. So far my conditioning has said, I am different from greed. Right? I can control greed, I deny greed, I say, what's wrong with being greedy. But when there is the realization that the greed is me, of course, right?, then what takes place? There is the observation of that reaction which has been named as greed. Right? There is only observation of that feeling, of that reaction which has been named as greed, I don't name it now, I just observe it. In the observation that feeling is undergoing a change. I wonder if you realize this. So the thing that has been called greed is non-existent. I wonder if you see this. This requires - right, sir? The very thing you observe - the very thing that is being observed undergoes a radical transformation if there is no observer. We don't change fundamentally as human beings because we have divided the observer different from the observed. Right? So there is no fundamental change. But there is a fundamental change radically and at great depth when the observer is the observed so there is only pure observation. When there is that pure observation that which is being observed undergoes a radical change because there is no naming it, no conclusion about it, no abstraction, no escape, just observe. Have you got this? Are you doing this?

Look, sir, let me put it round another way: we are used to self-analysis or professional analysis. Right? Introspection, or inspection by another, which is called analysis, professional analysis or self-analysis. Now is the analyser different from the analysed? I am sorry, there are here some psychoanalysts, I hope I am not pulling the rug from under their feet. This is a fundamental question even the analysers must ask. I am analysing my greed. Right? Is greed different from me? Obviously not, I am greed, then what am I examining and who is it that is examining? Right? So the analyser is the analysed. No? So I don't analyse. There is pure observation of that which before was being analysed. Right? So there is no analyser at all. Right, sir? That means you are denying the whole concept of division, the analyser and the analysed, you are my patient and I am analysing you, or you are analysing me. But when you and I realize that the analyser is the analysed, that greed is me, how can I examine the `me'. I can only examine the `me' if there is a higher `me', which is another part of my invention. I don't know if you follow this. So I invented god, or super ego, or super consciousness which is examining. That super consciousness, or super self, or super god, is still me. Right? So I stop analysing - not, I stop, analysis stops. Then what happens to that reaction which I called greed? You follow? I have analysed greed and I say, it is right, wrong, good, bad, why shouldn't I and all the rest. Now I realize - not, I realize - there is the realization that greed is the observer. So there is observation of that thing called a feeling. Right? Just observation. When there is this clear observation that feeling undergoes a radical change, it must because you are not naming it, you are not denying it, you are not suppressing it, that changes. I wonder if I've made this clear. Right, sirs? Have I made this clear? Not, I - do you see it clearly for yourself, therefore you are out of this conflict, greed and not greed, you follow, the battle that goes on inwardly all the time.

So when this takes place there is always clear observation without any motive, without any conclusion, just to observe. Sir, you don't know what it means. To observe a flower without naming it, to observe the person whom you think you love, to observe. Perhaps the lady or the man won't like it because you have suddenly brought about a radical transformation in yourself.

Now to observe without association, that was the question. This is part of meditation, to remove totally the observer who is seeking god, seeking enlightenment, seeking, fighting, fighting, fighting. Right? So meditation comes then as you live - we will talk about it later.

Is it time, sir?

Q: It's five to one.

K: I hope it will not rain Thursday and we might meet in the Grove or another place. May I go?

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 6TH APRIL 1978

Krishnamurti: This is a dialogue, a conversation between two people, but unfortunately there are too many people to have a conversation with two people. When we have a conversation of this kind we are talking over together as two friends perhaps our innermost deep problems that concern our daily life, not some theory, not some speculative ideas or hypothesis, but rather be concerned with something that affects our daily constant life. And so we are not opposing one opinion against another or one theory against another theory or hypothesis and so on but rather as two friends who know each other fairly well so there is a certain sense of affection, care, attention to what each one is saying to the other, and with that I hope we can talk over together any question, any problem that we have. So what would you like to talk over this morning?

Questioner: Krishnamurti, when you become aware that you have just had a reaction, some thoughts, do you ever go back and look at all the thoughts that comprise that reaction?

K: When you have a reaction of a particular kind must you trace it to all the other reactions one has - is that the question, sir?

Q: The question is actually, do you look at all the thoughts that bring that reaction about?

K: To look at the whole content of thought that brings the reactions. Is that right?

Q: Right.

Q: I'd like to hear your thoughts concerning what you consider telepathy to be, suggestion, magnetism, also what you think of the idea that the present, like I can talk and learn differently as to what the present is and how you differentiate that from the past, sort of why you make a difference. Also why you many times make a part of the whole thing, such as the experiencer, there is a difference there between the experiencer and the word experience, to me the experience is the whole actuality, the experiencer only perceives a relative portion of that actuality, and I'd like to know why you see no difference between the parts and the whole, and concerning telepathy, suggestion and magnetism.

K: Yes, sir. I don't really quite understand your question. Would you make it brief?

Q: What is the difference between a part and a whole, and what are your thoughts concerning telepathy, suggestion and magnetism, and this is kind of three questions, you've had two of them there, and this is the third, how do you distinguish between the present and the past?

K: I've got it, sir. That's enough. You are asking, how do you differentiate between the present and the past.

Q: No, what do you think the present is.

K: What is the present.

Q: A simple idea of 'what is', as I've been taught. The past is only memories, it does not any longer exist, the same as the future does not exist, it's only today, it's only here and now.

K: Yes, sir, I understand your question. So you are asking, what actually is the present.

Q: Yes.

K: And the other is about magnetism.

Q: Magnetism, telepathy and suggestion.

K: Ah, magnetism, telepathy, occultism, mysticism, all that is implied in that question. And the first one, sir?

Q: What is the difference between a part and a whole.

K: Oh, yes, what is the difference. That's enough.

Q: When you say that the observed is the observer, and I then take that to other psychological relationships to the observer, such as anger, envy, grief, I believe I see what you are saying. I have difficulty with only short glimpses of what you refer to, as when you really see that the observer is the observed and there is pure observation, that there is an immense release of energy. I see only footling bits of it. Is it that it is so terribly difficult to really see what is involved?

K: All right, sir. The questioner asks - have you heard all of his question? - so I don't have to repeat it, have I? No? All right.

Q: The question in my mind is that when one is investigating it's clear then and one begins to see how to translate this seeing into an action which is not somehow in the confusion and disorder, perhaps the mind becomes occupied with communicating this seeing or formulating an action, and the action itself turns out to be destructive.

K: I don't follow your question, sir.

Q: Well it seems that the mind can either see or it can communicate, formulate, and when you see and somehow relate this to other human beings, the mind can do one or the other but to translate the seeing into an actual action which has an effect in the world seems to be a very difficult thing to do.

K: I don't quite follow it. If somebody else follows his question would they make it clear for me?

Q: The different between thinking and clarity and putting it into action.

K: What is that, sir?

Q: He felt it was difficult to express the clarity that he is thinking about in his everyday life, how do you translate it into action.

K: When you see something very clearly how do you express that clarity in daily life, which is through action. Is that it?

Q: This follows the question that was being asked, in the matter of the observer and the observed there seems to be a fear that exists that one will be overwhelmed by what one sees in that way. Could you comment on this - overwhelmed by whatever one is looking at, in particular fear.

K: Right.

Q: Sir, I'd like to extend upon a topic we discussed this last weekend about pressure and what sort of pressure becomes ambition exerts on the brain; and the next part of this question involves self-improvement because I have noticed that within the past ten years in America, and especially here in California, there has been a vast proliferation of many sorts of methods of self-improvement. I can separate these into two basic categories, you have the psychological area where many people report that new creation and reality by certain visualization techniques, and the others are in developing motor skills and technical experiences, things like that; also the question is, all these sorts of meditation systems put pressure on the brain and that included with the pressure to become successful in life, and that type of pressure.

K: I am lost! I am sorry, you are asking, sir, are you, would we discuss more deeply the whole question of pressure, is that it?

Q: Yes, pressure.

K: Yes, that is, are you asking, sir, could we discuss this question of pressure and its effect on the brain and when there is a release from pressure is there a different structure in the brain - is that what you are asking?

Q: Yes, and also the fear involved of not getting on this escalator of pressure, when you jump off of it. Do you still follow?

K: I don't quite follow it, sir. Put it just simply, very simply. Sir, would it be helpful if we discussed this question of pressure and go into it in detail, in detail, then perhaps your question will be answered fully?

Q: Yes.

K: Right, sir. Could we discuss that, do you want to discuss this question of pressure?

Q: I would like to go into why you say the body must be light and sensitive in order to be attentive.

K: The body must be light and sensitive - mustn't the body be light and sensitive to pay complete attention. Not too many questions, sir because...

Q: And how one can become light and sensitive, to be attentive without taking time.

K: Yes. Sir?

Q: Sir, I can understand all that you are saying and what you write and lecture, but to transform it in actuality becomes very difficult in the sense when you say investigate and be aware of experience, it becomes an action but the experiencer as me is always there, and it is becoming rather than being all the time.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: How do I get free of this, it's like a dog chasing a flea all the time and I'm caught.

K: Yes, I understand. Please, that's enough questions - I am not preventing you from asking your questions, sir, but there are so many questions I don't know what question you would like to talk over together. There is the question of pressure: could we discuss that in our daily life, how that pressure and the various forms of pressure affect our actions, distort our way of life, perverts or deforms the total comprehension of life. Could we discuss that? Perhaps all the other questions will be included in that. Would it help if we discussed that?

Q: Yes.

K: You are sure? I wonder what we mean by the word 'pressure', to exert pressure, to weigh down by a burden, by a weight, by propaganda, by various assertions of people that this is right, this is wrong, this should be, this must not be - the weight of nationalistic attitude, religious pressures, economic pressures, the pressure of knowledge, the pressure of tradition, and so on, do you want to discuss that?

Will it affect our daily life, which is our daily action, if we understand the nature and the structure - we are using the word 'structure' as a movement, not a physical edifice. So we are trying to find out together in a conversation what pressure does on our action, how it deforms the activity of the brain, both physically as well as psychologically - can we go into this. Is this what you want to discuss?

So we are asking, what do we mean by pressure, the word, the actual word not the result of it? You may mean one thing and the speaker may mean a different thing, so we must both have the same meaning to that word, must give the same significance to that word. We mean by pressure, an imposition, a weight put on one, put on the brain and therefore on thought, on feeling and all the rest of it. Pressure in the sense of forcing you to a particular direction, compelling you to act in a limited way, making you do something that you may not totally agree with. The economic pressure of a society that is broken up, there is the pressure of the climate, the food, the coarseness, the insensitivity of one's organism and so on - do we agree to the meaning of that word together? Is this what you and the speaker mean when he uses the word 'pressure'? Right? Are we clear on this? So first of all are we aware, know, conscious that we are acting under pressure? Whether it be religious pressure, economic pressure, climatic pressure or the pressure in relationship with each other and so on, are we aware that we live under tremendous pressure, tremendous strain? We mean by 'aware' very simply, know, recognize, see, observe, feel. Are we? This is a discussion please, this is not a conversation with myself.

Q: Could you repeat what you said?

K: I'm afraid I can't but I will put it differently. Does one know for oneself, without being told, that you are under pressure, does one know for oneself that your whole life is lived actually under pressure? The word 'pressure', we know what we mean by now, because we both understand the meaning of that word. Don't at the end of the talk, discussion, say, I didn't agree with you. If we don't agree with the meaning of that word now let's be clear on that point.

Q: We are not referring mainly to physiological pressures.

K: Both physiological as well as psychological.

Q: Well I think most of the times that you refer to the psychological, social life pressures and a little bit more than that is that if we choose to live without those pressures, how can we go about it.

K: We will find out, sir. We will find out first of all if it is possible to live without pressure, and then how will we act if we are not under pressure, both physiologically as well as psychologically. So that's the first question: do we know, recognize, be conscious, be aware that we are living under pressure?

Q: Most of the time, no.

K: Perhaps not, most of the time, part of the time. But it is really most of the time, but it doesn't matter, we will begin with part of the time. Are you aware that you are aware, know, recognize, see that you are under pressure? Then if you recognize it don't you ask yourself, why do I live under pressure. Right? Do you?

Q: Is it possible to live not under pressure?

K: We will find out, sir. We will find out later if it is possible or not possible. First of all we are asking, do you know, if you do know that you are under pressure, don't you ask yourself, why do I live under pressure? Does the society demand this pressure around you? We are just asking, don't say, yes, or not, we are going to find out, we are going into it very deeply. Does society act as a pressure? If you say, yes, is society different from you? The society has been created by you - not by you actually, by your grandparents, by your past - so the past with all its traditions has created this society, of which you are a part, you are not different from society. I wonder if you see that. Do we see that? That you are society. So don't say, I am acting under the pressure of society. So if that is very clear, please I am not forcing you to think in one particular way at all. I am not exercising pressure. I am trying to point out.

So we say society is exercising pressure, economic pressure, national pressure, colour prejudice pressures, black and white and blue and yellow, all the nationalistic, racial, communal pressures. Right? Are we aware of them? Right? Are you aware of the pressure of the past? Which is, tradition, that tradition may be two days old or ten thousand years old, or a million years old, the past - (noise of clocks striking twelve) I was once speaking in Rome and there are a thousand churches there! And you can imagine what happened! Shall I go on? Yes, sir?

Q: I wonder if you might add in your discussion the pressures brought by lack of unity within an individual? There are different centres for things in man, emotional, intellectual, in his mind and well whatever else you want to add. Can you include that perhaps?

K: Yes, sir you can include all those. Please, if we leave out one kind of pressure it doesn't mean that we are not taking that into consideration, we said, pressure implies all this, pressure. The pressure of those bells, and the reaction to those bells and so on and on. Is this a joke? Is somebody pulling our leg?

Now if we are aware of these various kinds of pressure, which is the pressure of the past, the pressure of relationship, the pressure of not knowing and wanting to know, the pressure of emotions, desires, fears, all that, if you are aware of them, don't you then ask, why does one have to live under this kind of pressure? Is it that we so easily accept, that we are so conditioned to live with these pressures it has become a habit, it has made us dull, therefore we don't break away from that pressure? So what is the fact, or the truth, why do human beings right throughout the world, wherever you go, live under pressure? Why? Why do you as a human being representing all humanity, which is an actual fact, why do you live under pressure?

Q: If we broke away from it we would be afraid.

K: If you broke away from this pressure, are you saying that you would be frightened?

Q: In some cases it is because of a threat to life, many people live under pressures and for others it is because they enjoy pressures.

K: Some people escape from one kind of pressure but live under other pressures, or others may enjoy the pressures. They must be a little odd if they enjoy the pressure which brings about neurotic activity - then if they like that kind of activity, they are welcome to it - we can't discuss that now. But we are asking: why do we live under pressure? Ask yourself please and find out why, the truth of it, not the opinion of yours or somebody else's, why? Is it habit? Is it that we are lazy, indolent and that's the easiest way to live? We have never even probably questioned it, and perhaps this is the first time you are questioning it. And if you are questioning it for the first time, what is your reaction?

Q: Sir, I feel myself to be the pressure.

K: Yes. That is, you are saying there is no outside pressure but the very essence of pressure is myself. Is that what you are saying?

Q: Yes.

K: Is that so? I am not saying it is not. We are enquiring, we are exploring into that.

Q: Perception of that pressure, like you can't really say, that's pressure and the self is only a part.

K: Sir, we said there is the social pressure, there is the family pressure, there is the pressure of the girl or the boy, the husband over the wife, and the wife over the husband, the pressure of knowledge, the past, the pressure that is exercised by the propaganda of churches, of various religions, of various gurus, of ideals and so on and so on, does all that include the pressure in oneself? You understand my question, sir? Is the nature of pressure essentially the nature of desire? I am just asking, I am not saying it is. Wanting to be something, or not wanting to be something? Because it is very important, it seems to one, that we understand the nature of pressure and find out if it is possible to be free of pressure and what is the state or the quality of the mind, the brain, that is no longer functioning under pressure? These are the questions. Because a person who is living under pressure of any kind is not free. Right? If one lives under the pressure of a philosophy, which is the pressure - philosophy means the love of wisdom, the love of truth - if that love of truth acts as a pressure because it is just a theory then that also brings about a distorted action.

Q: What is the difference between that and passion? You talk about passion.

K: No, not quite sir. Is that what you mean, passive awareness?

Q: Not passive, passion.

K: Passion. Not quite.

Q: Passionate more than pressures.

K: It all depends what you call passion, what do you mean by that word? Do you mean by that word, lust?

Q: No, I think what you referred to as passion...

K: Just a minute, sir, I am exploring that, it's not what I mean but what we together mean by that word passion. Does it imply lust? Or there is a passion of a person who wants to make a tremendous lot of money. There is a passion or desire or the urge of wanting sexual release, or wanting to be somebody or other. We mean by passion, at least what the speaker means by that word, there is passion when there is the ending of sorrow. We won't go into that for the moment, if you don't mind.

So are we aware of these various forms of pressure? If we are, why do we accept these pressures? Is it that we are indolent? Indifferent? We have got used to them and therefore we accept them? This constant repetition on the television, commercially, buy, buy, buy, buy, that acts as a pressure. So why do we live with pressures? Is it that we don't see what pressure does?

Q: Is it that some are positive, whereas some are negative?

K: No, there is no negative or positive pressures, there is only pressure.

Q: Can't you see the difference between destructive and constructive?

K: Just as minute, sir, by using the words constructive and destructive, we are then emphasizing there is a pressure which is constructive, a pressure which is destructive; we are talking of pressure, not whether it is creative or not creative. If you are under pressure obviously you cannot be creative, whatever that word `creative' may mean. If you are under pressure whatever you do will be destructive.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir, that's what I am asking you, sir, pressure. Now if one is aware of it, one has asked the question, it is absurd to live under pressure - not absurd, see first of all the reason, the logic, the sanity of being free from pressure. Right? Because one has exercised reason, logic and being sane about it, you say, is there a way of living in our daily life, which includes business action and all the rest of action, without pressure? Which means, is there a way of living completely free from every form of pressure?

Q: Perhaps we should be free of our expectation.

K: The pressure of expectation?

Q: You would have to be in a spiritual state if you want to be free of all pressures.

K: No, sir. First of all find out, sir, please be good enough to listen.

Q: I have, I have thought of these things that you have already talked on, and like I said, I know some people, we have made decisions concerning what pressures we desire and what ones we don't...

K: Yes, sir. You may like one form of pressure and you don't like other forms of pressure. We are saying any form of pressure, any form whether you like it or don't like it, whether it is pleasant or unpleasant, whether it is profitable or not profitable, to live under pressure is to act not only defensively but also your actions will inevitably be deformed, incorrect, not actual.

Q: The air pressure helps hold up our corporate form, keeps our physical form in place, there are gravitational pressures and physical pressures in the universe.

K: We said that, sir. First of all do we see clearly that to act under a pressure brings about a deformation of action, it is not straight action.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir. First of all, pressure exists, and then do we react to those pressures.

Q: That's what the discussion is about.

K: Wait. That's what I am saying. Do we react to those pressures, some pressure you like which is pleasant, another pressure which you don't like and therefore avoid it. Sir, please let's be clear. We said every form of pressure, pleasant, unpleasant, good, bad, psychological, physiological and so on and so on, any form of pressure must deform action. That's all. If you say, I don't agree with you, then we can discuss that: I think you are talking nonsense, then we can talk about it. But don't say, certain pressures are necessary, certain pressures are not necessary.

Q: Pressure is life and if we are life then we are pressure, and the fact that we respond to pressure.

K: We said that. Pressure exists.

Q: Yes, they exist without a reaction.

K: Yes. First of all, do you see pressure exists and then your reaction to those pressure, that you like some pressures and you don't like some other pressures.

Q: No, I don't see that. I just see pressure.

K: Yes, that's all I am saying, just pressure.

Q: Sir, would we be able to have a meeting like today without pressure, from our side perhaps the pressure of wanting to know, from your side perhaps the pressure of wanting to communicate?

K: Did you come here under pressure? Did somebody force you to come here?

Q: No, but it is the internal pressure.

K: Wait, wait. That's what we said too, internal or outward pressure exercised by another or your own desire, any form of pressure is distorting. That's all I am saying, you may agree or disagree, go into it, let's go into it.

Q: Could you go into as I didn't quite grasp your idea of the difference between the pressures in form and those that deform. One pressure puts together, it brings an ideal...

K: Sir, wait a minute, perhaps mechanically or technically or welding together two metals, it's under great pressure. And the other is the pressure exercised by each one on each other, does that bring about a union.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We said, sir, if you were there the other day when we were discussing in that little hall, the observer is the past. You may disagree with that, you are perfectly welcome to disagree, let's talk it over, don't say, I disagree with you, and walk out, or shut yourself and resist. We are saying the observer is the past, the past projects and that which is projected the observer sees. That's clear, isn't it? No? So the observer is the observed.

Q: There is a sense of separation between the two.

K: When there is a separation between the observer and the observed then there is conflict. That conflict acts as a pressure, or the division itself is the cause of pressure. Take, sir, what is happening in the Middle East, in the Far East, there are the Israelis, the Jews and the Arabs, the division, racial, communal, religious, territorial division, so where there is division there is pressure: the Muslim and the Hindu, that goes on all the time between various nationalities, this pressure. As long as there is division between man and woman, or between a group of people against another group, that very division creates pressure. Under that pressure we act, as an Arab, as a Jew, as a Hindu, as a Buddhist, as a Christian. So we say, any form of pressure which brings about division will inevitably be incorrect action. That's one problem, division. Division in myself. Right? Division in one's ideas, the ideal - I am this, I must be that - which is a division, therefore conflict, therefore pressure. I wonder if you see. Right? Pressure under communists brings about conflict.

So we find, again logically, reasonably, observing factually, that where there is division that division brings pressure, as, I am a Hindu, or I am a Christian, I am a Jew, or I am an Arab, a Muslim and so on, that brings inevitably a division, that division brings a pressure because I believe in this and you believe in that. So out of that pressure there is effort, conflict, and we live under that conflict, with that conflict which acts as a pressure.

Q: Are we saying that our likes and our desires of society are invalid?

K: Yes, I am questioning the whole thing, sir.

Q: If you say there is an incorrect action, you must have an idea of what correct action is.

K: Yes, all right. If you say, this is wrong action, incorrect action, you are asking what is correct action. Right?

Q: Your idea of it.

K: Not 'my idea', sir. You see.

Q: You have to know it if you are to recognize it.

K: Sorry, it's not 'my idea'. You want to know what correct action is. If I tell you what value would it be?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir, just look, listen quietly, first find out what the poor speaker has to say.

Q: Well, I agree with this lady in observation, I would not see something if it was not a question of sensation, although I am in the present and I may be only seeing the past around me because it has taken time. But you exist in your present at that point, and I exist in my present here, perceived in the past or having a memory of the past. The past is what has been and not 'what is'.

Q: Give the speaker a chance.

Q: I thought this was a discussion in which I thought everyone was to be talking back and forth. Perhaps many other people have no thoughts and are not thinking, or just following the sentences as they go along and have not thought about it.

Q: Mr Krishnamurti, assuming one has completely realized and understood what you are pointing out to us about all the pressures and even though one can throw the television set away, and try and dispose of as much as one can, there is still society. I personally have the same conflicts, if I go out with my friends there is always the pressure and then the only way for me to escape it, not to escape it, is to walk away from it. It's just instead of exchanging for one pressure to become a recluse which would create pressure again, just to walk away from it. But it's again pressure because then I miss people.

K: Yes, of course. Quite. So would it be right if I suggested that, or said, put into words, does one see the danger of pressure, as you see the danger of a precipice, or the danger of a snake? If you see something is dangerous both physiologically as well as psychologically then it is a danger, you don't go near it. But apparently it is extraordinarily difficult to see the danger about something with which we are completely identified. If the speaker is totally identified with India, with all the superstitions, with all that goes on there then he belongs to a group of people opposed to another group of people. This division is the most dangerous thing. Right? If I see the tremendous danger of it I drop it, I am not a Hindu. That's all I am pointing out. I am sorry if you are cold.

Q: I am sorry if you are.

K: I am not, I am talking, it makes you warm.

Q: This dropping bit that you speak about it sounds very easy but the vision that I recognize is not to say that I am this or I am that, but to say that I am.

K: Instead of saying I am that, I am this, just say, I am. You know, just a minute, sir, when you say, I am, I wonder if you realize the meaning of such a word, those two words, I am. I believe, or rather I have discussed this point with some people, well-known scholars and religious people, only god, according to them, can say, I am. Right? And nobody else can. If you are god, then it's all right.

Q: Well, all right. Is god separate from myself?

K: Sir, then you have to enquire, what are you, when you say, I am, what are you?

Q: I don't really know that.

K: We are going to find out. You can't leave it to god, so you will have to find out when one says, I am, what does that mean? The name, the form, the bank account, if one has one, the attachments, whether to furniture or to a person, attachment to an idea, all that and more is what you are. If you say, I am not all that, then what are you? An idea? A conclusion? A supposition? Then it is the result of thought. So as long as you think, you say, I am; if you don't think, what are you? This is an old problem, this.

Q: Sir, it may be right to say that I am a manifestation of man.

K: All right, sir, what does that mean? Why do I have to assert, I am, and then give a meaning to it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Find out, madam, what it means. First of all, do you see the danger of it, that's all first. Do you actually see the danger of it, or is it an idea that it is dangerous?

Q: I think it is the idea.

K: That's right, sir. Like you don't actually see the danger of nationality, if you saw the real danger of nationality you would not belong to any nation, or to any group. Right? So do you actually see the danger of pressure? Don't include the pressures to everything, just pressure. One pressure is good enough, if you understand the danger of one pressure.

Q: I don't know how to actually see.

K: Sir, actually see it. What do you mean by that?

Q: I see ideas, intellectually I can see the danger of nationality.

K: Now wait a minute, if you see the danger of nationality are you free of it? You may carry the passport.

Q: I think I see only the image of nationality but I do not see the actual danger.

K: We will go into it, sir. Nationalities imply, don't they, glorified tribalism. Right? That means different tribes calling themselves different nationalities bring about one of the causes of war. Right? Don't you see the danger of war? Is that an idea? Or is it an actuality, people going about maimed, all the horror of war? That's not an idea. If you go to a veterans' hospital you will see the appalling things there. You see that is one of our difficulties, sir, that when we hear a statement we make an idea of it but we don't actually see the fact without the idea. That's one of our conditionings. Right? And also the word `idea' I believe in a dictionary means to observe. You understand, sir? The word `idea' has its root in seeing, it means to see, to observe, not conclude, not make a conclusion of what you see. Right? So if you see the danger of nationality, it's finished. Though you may carry a passport you are no longer a citizen of a particular group of people, of a country. Right? Now in the same way, does one see the fact, not the idea, that division brings about conflict: your belief and my belief. Right? Your conclusion and my conclusion, your god and my god, or your guru opposed to my guru, if I have one, thank god I haven't got any. So this division will inevitably bring conflict. Now if you see the danger of conflict, it's finished. If you see the danger of falling down a precipice you are very, very watchful of precipices, therefore it is not a temporary danger, it is a permanent danger.

Q: We don't see the danger of a lot of pressures.

K: That's it, you don't see the danger of pressures. That's all my point. Q: Isn't it a little bit easier to see the division between nationalities, races, those kind of external things, but I don't see how there is not a division between the observer and the observed.

K: Oh, you don't see that. Sir, the division between the observer and the observed exists, doesn't it?

Q: Yes.

K: When there is that division there is conflict between the observer and that which he has observed.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Watch it, sir, just look at it, sir, just consider for a minute. When the observer says, I am greedy, or, I am angry, then the observer acts upon anger. Right? Either he suppresses it, rationalizes it, runs away from it, he is acting upon it, therefore there is conflict. Isn't that so? So is that conflict necessary?

Q: Sir, if that action is not taken...

K: We will find out, sir, we will find out. If you see when there is conflict, out of that any action will be distorted. So if you want - if one wants to act correctly with regard to that greed then one has to find out why this division exists at all, division between the observer and the greed. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I question it.

Q: It is impossible.

K: Is your anger different from yourself?

Q: It is part of that response.

K: It is part of you. You say that, do you, actually it is part of you, therefore there is no division.

Q: But then there is something else.

K: Ah, the something else is the good old idea that there is some super consciousness.

Q: No, I don't mean that. I mean, well, I feel I am greed, and I know that is part of my personality at the moment, but I also feel myself as an actor who can possibly act.

K: All right, at the moment of anger, at the moment of anger are you different from anger?

Q: At the moment of anger I don't think I am completely conscious of myself.

K: That's it. Which means what? You are anger.

Q: Anger is that which...

K: Wait, there is that state of anger.

Q: Yes, it's my consciousness.

K: That state, don't bring in consciousness and all that because then we go off into something else. So at the moment of anger there is not me who is angry, there is only that state. Then a second or a few seconds later the division takes place: I have been angry.

Q: Yes, but...

K: Wait, go step by step. I have been angry, so division has taken place immediately. Why? Why does this division take place?

Q: Because that which says, I have been angry, that I is dependent on that anger.

K: That's what I am saying, sir. When you say, I have been angry, the I who says, I have been angry, is different from anger, is that so?

Q: It seems to be because at the time when there was anger there was only anger, later on something else says, I have been angry.

K: Yes. What makes you say that, that I have been angry?

Q: Bad feelings.

Q: No, it's not even the bad feelings.

K: Wait, don't please accept what I am saying. Why should you say, I have been angry, why bring the division in?

Q: Because that anger destroys the process.

K: No, go into it, sir, look into it a bit more.

Q: I feel that I should not be angry.

Q: At the moment of anger there is an active threat.

K: At the moment of anger, sir, there is not you who says, I have been angry, there is just that feeling, that reaction. Then a few seconds, or a few seconds later you say, I have been angry.

Q: My ego.

Q: You mean that when I say, I have been angry, that is merely another thought?

K: No. Just find out, sir. First of all when you are totally angry there is no division. Division takes place when you use the word 'anger', because at the moment of that feeling you don't say, I am angry, there is only that state; then you recognize it, the recognition, the process of recognition is through words. You recognize, or put it differently, you recognize it, you can only recognize it by knowing that you have been angry, which means the past. So the past, which is the observer, says, I am different from anger. This is so simple.

Q: If we said, I am anger, would that be no pressure?

K: At that second there is no pressure. I may be wrong, find out. Sir, which indicates something extraordinary, if you go into it: facts, 'what is' can never be under pressure, doesn't bring pressure.

Right, sir? Say when I say, I am jealous, the feeling at that moment has no pressure, later on when you say, I have been jealous, then you try to do something about it, then that is a pressure. So facts have no pressure. Like seeing the fact that nationality is a danger is not a pressure.

Q: Direct action.

K: Direct action takes place when there is no distortion of pressure, you act according to facts. What time is it?

Q: Five minutes to one.

Q: There's an answer to the question and it's quite simple and it's just one word - which came first, the chicken or the egg, and there is an answer, which came first. It makes quite a lot of sense. And it fits. It's a question which has been asked for a long time, many people ask it and never bother to answer it. It's almost the difference between nationalism and nationality. To me nationality is a world that people come from, it's just a geographical location where a person is born and does not create a conflict, but nationalism is a travesty of one's nation's state over another and brings us into conflict and division. To the question, which came first, the chicken or the egg.

K: The egg or the chicken?

Q: Yes.

K: I don't know.

Q: There were eggs before there were chickens, reptiles laid eggs.

K: It seems that it is rather an irrelevant question which came first, the egg or the chicken.

Q: Not in the whole logic of the thinking involved in any of the questions about conflict.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Look, sir, is there an observation of that feeling without naming it? The moment you say, anger, it is violence. Right?

Q: I don't know what is happening, but it is violence.

K: What we are saying, sir, is when we use the word 'violence' is has got so many associations with that word, that you must not be violent, you should be violent, under certain circumstances you must be violent and so on and so on, whereas is it possible to observe that feeling without naming it. You can if you are really aware of the thing taking place. I think we had better stop now, don't you.

Q: How do you observe without bringing in the observer?

K: By not naming. By looking at something, sir. Experiment with it, try and find out, whether you can look at something without naming it.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 8TH APRIL 1978

I am very glad that you have got a lovely view of the mountains with snow. I hope you are looking at it.

We have had the last Saturday and Sunday two talks, and some of you may not have been there so I am afraid one has to go over what we talked about, and I hope those who heard it will not be bored by my going over what we talked over together.

If one may point out, we are considering rather complex problems of life, our daily life, and we are not in any way concerned with theories, hypotheses, speculations and ideas. We are going over together, and I mean together, the whole problem of the weight, the pressure, that exists all around us - socially, religiously, ethically and politically and economically and so on. This pressure, if one goes into it as we shall, affects our whole conduct. It brings about a different kind of reaction, not natural, but rather abnormal. I do not know if you have gone into this question: whether it is possible to live in this world without any kind of pressure, and therefore with complete freedom. And that's what we are going to talk over together again this morning. And if I may again point out, you are not listening to a talk, you are not gathering some ideas, or be told how to act, how to behave, how to live properly, but rather we are going together to examine this problem, which is very, very complex, and needs a great deal of attention, and reason, logic, into this question that human beings right throughout the world, it doesn't matter what nationality they are, what religious group they belong to, what institutions they accept, they are always acting under different kinds of pressure. I do not know if one is aware of this. And if you are aware of it, why is it that human beings support, or hold on to these pressures.

As we were saying the other day, there is the pressure of language. I hope you don't mind if I go over it again. There is the pressure of language. Language uses us but we don't use language. The instrument uses us rather than we use the instrument. A word, like communism, socialism, in America has a tremendous significance and a great antagonism to it. And so the word, if you will kindly listen, the word shapes our thinking, shapes our reactions, controls our attitudes. The word drives us. But we don't use language, language uses us. I do not know if you are aware of this. And if we use language correctly, without all the emotional content which is attributed to words, then if we do that, you and the speaker use words without reactions, without prejudice, without any kind of emotional content attributed or given to that word, then communication between you and the speaker becomes very simple, very clear, and can be understood very easily. That means we partake, share together in the examination, in the exploration, together into this whole question why human beings right throughout the world live under a great deal of pressure, strain, weight.

First of all we also said there is the pressure of institutions - the democratic, the republican, the labour, the socialist, the communists, and the Mao and so on, various forms of religious, economic, social, political institutions. The word 'institution' means to stand, not move, to accept direction, to obey certain rules, which gradually become, however lightly accepted at the beginning, become routine; and a mind which belongs to institutions becomes mechanical. If you will consider that and go into it, which we did last Saturday and Sunday, perhaps you will then see how it important it is for human beings not to belong to any kind of institutions. Which implies that to solve our problems a different kind of mind is necessary, not a mind that is mechanical, not a mind that has accepted rules, regulations - which doesn't mean that you disobey laws - but psychologically accept the implications of institutions, the hierarchy, status, position, rules and so on.

And also we talked about, together, the pressure of ideologies, ideals. Most human beings throughout the world have unfortunately accepted ideals. Perhaps you also have many, many ideals. And to have ideals is considered highly respectable, highly noble, gives one great character and so on, this phrase right throughout the world - a man of ideals. I wonder is the function of ideals at all, if you have any. The speaker hasn't any because ideals imply, if you go into it very carefully, the avoidance of 'what is', what actually is going on. You are translating what is going on according to 'what should be'. The 'what should be' is not the actual. The 'what should be', the ideal, brings about a conflict between 'what is' and 'what should be'. And we live within this field of conflict which exists between ideals and what is actually going on. Most of us are concerned with the transformation of 'what is' in terms of ideals, in the context of ideals. These ideals are projected by thought - thought being the response of memory, response of experience, knowledge, stored up in the brain, recorded, and according to that record thought projects the ideals. And thereby thought thinks it can deal with 'what is'. I hope we are communicating with each other. The speaker hopes that he is making the thing clear.

Please bear in mind, if I may again point out, this is not a lecture, we are trying together, I mean together, you and the speaker, together explore, go into, investigate into this question of pressure, why human beings, you who represent all humanity, live from birth to death under pressure. And one finds that the ideals act as a great pressure on human beings, and so they are always living in constant conflict, in trying to change 'what is' according to 'what should be'. If one is angry, the ideal is not to be angry. So using the ideal as a means to change anger there is always a conflict, a battle, a strife. One hopes this is made perfectly clear. And also I hope you are not cold. If you are you can lean against each other and look at the mountains, or if you want to listen, listen.

You know there is the art of listening, the art of seeing and the art of learning. The art of listening implies, to listen not to your own thoughts, not to your own reactions to what is being said, not to conform to a conclusion, but rather knowing what you think, what you feel, what your ideals are, putting those aside, listen to the speaker, if you can do that, then we are in communication. But if you go on with your thoughts, with your reactions, with your memories, then there is no communication, then there is misunderstanding, then there is mere repetition of what the speaker said, either accepting or denying, agreeing or not agreeing. So there is the art of listening. The word 'art' means according to an excellent dictionary, to put everything in its right place. When you have put everything in its right place there is no confusion, there is no disorder. It's only when you have not put everything in its right place there is disorder. The speaker means by 'putting everything in its right place', to learn for oneself what is right, what is correct, what is actual. And that's why it is very important to learn the art of seeing. We have talked about the art of listening, we are now talking about the art of seeing.

Most of us actually do not see. We see through the image which we have projected. Please do consider what the speaker is saying. You look at that mountain, the beauty of those lines, that snow, and the trees, and the valleys, with the image that thought has created about them. That is, the word interferes with your observation. And you look at another, your friend or your wife, or your husband, girl, or boy, through the image that thought has projected about them. Don't you do that? If you have observed closely yourself, if you are married you observe your wife through the image that thought has created for ten days, or thirty years. So there is no actual observation, seeing the wife, or the girl, or the boy. You are always looking at each other with the images that thought has created about each other, so there is no actual seeing. Which again is an absolute fact. When you observe a fact there is no disagreement, it is so. You all agree to say, that grass is green. That is a fact. But if you like to say it is all a matter of illusion, if we both agree it is an illusion, then it is also a fact. So one learns the art of observation is to observe clearly without the image, so that image doesn't act as a pressure. Right? Are we going along together. I am sorry we are not closer together, and I hope the speaker is making things clear.

Then there is the art of learning, which is a little more difficult. Learning for most of us is memorizing. From school, to college, to university, if you are lucky enough to go through that conditioning, or unlucky enough, there you accumulate facts, cultivate memory, store that memory about those facts and act skilfully or unskilfully according to the knowledge that you have acquired. That's one kind of learning. And then there is the other; which is to go out, act, and from action learn. That is, both accumulating knowledge and then acting, the other, acting and accumulating knowledge from acting, both imply the accumulation of knowledge. The art of learning implies to put knowledge in its right place. And there is the other kind of knowledge, other kind of learning, which is non-mechanistic, non-accumulative, but learning constantly. Therefore learning becomes extraordinary, a movement of vitality, not merely routine. I won't go into this now because we have other things to deal with.

So there is the art of listening, there is the art of seeing, there is the art of learning. If we do not put everything in its right place then there is confusion, and that confusion acts as a great pressure on our life. If you don't put money in its right place and make money as though it was the most important thing in life, then inevitably you create, bring about confusion. If you do not put knowledge in its right place, knowledge, to act skilfully, to think clearly, in its right place, then knowledge becomes a tremendous burden, a pressure. And if you do not put sex in its right place, then all life, all our existence is based on pleasure. If you do not put politics, which is the government of people, and if the people are not able to govern themselves then there are these extraordinary people called politicians who rule our lives. And as one observes what is happening in the world they are creating more and more confusion, more and more wars, bitterness, anxiety, tears, division. So to learn that institutions have no place for a mind that can learn the whole of existence, not through any specialized groups or teachers and so on. Now that is what we discussed, more or less, last Saturday and Sunday.

Now if we may go on to another thing. We are talking about pressure. There is no good pressure and bad pressure, pressure that is necessary, pressure that is not necessary. We are talking about pressure, not the opposites of pressure. There is the pressure of relationship, pressure of family, pressure of children, the pressure of the husband over the wife, and the wife over the husband, the girl over the boy, and the boy over the girl. Where there is this pressure there must be conflict. Now, please don't accept what the speaker is saying at all. We are examining together the facts of our life, our daily constant life. We live in this pressure of families, of relationship with each other. Don't you? Or am I talking to myself? There is the sexual pressure, the demand over each other, the possessive, dependence, attachment, jealousy, anxiety, hatred and so on. This exists, these are actual facts in relationship. Why do we live like this? Why do we accept this way of living? I do not know if you have considered it, if you are serious enough to find out a way of living in which this conflict ends, completely, totally, not for a few days, not for a week, but entirely, absolutely the ending of conflict in relationship. We are going to examine that - rather you and the speaker are going to examine this thing together, why you, as a human being, live like this. When we use the word 'human being' we mean by that word you are the representative of all humanity because all humanity lives like this, in constant struggle, constant effort, jealousy, anxiety, fear, the pursuit of pleasure and so on. So you as a human being, please do listen to this, and don't translate it into an idea, but as an actual daily fact, that you are the representative of all human beings, which again is a fact of tremendous significance.

So why do human beings throughout the world live like this? Is it because they are lazy, indifferent, callous, they talk about relationship and they don't mean a thing by that word, is it habit, is it tradition, is it that we do not know how to break through this? And perhaps that may be one of the reasons why human beings do accept so easily to live in this conflict. Which again becomes a tremendous pressure on our brain, on our life.

What do we mean by that word 'relationship', to be related, to be in contact with. When you use the word 'contact with', not only physically, sexually, but psychologically much more, to be in contact, psychologically with another implies that you are actually in contact psychologically with another. Is that so? Or you are in contact with the image that you have projected about her, the image that thought has created during a thirty year or forty year relationship, intimate and so on, or a relationship that lasted for ten days, you create an image about that person; and that image is projected by memory, by experience, by the knowledge that you have accumulated about her, or him. That knowledge is stored in the brain, and that becomes memory, so you are looking - please listen - you are looking at the woman or the man from the knowledge that you have acquired about her. You project that knowledge upon her and you see the image that you have projected, and you think you are in contact with that person, but actually you are only in contact with the image that thought has projected about her or him. Right? This is not mere analysis. This comes when you observe. Observation is entirely different from analysis. Analysis implies a duality: the analyser and the analysed. The analyser is the analysed. Right? I wonder if you see that. This duality between the analyser and the analysed is encouraged by the psychologists, by the psychoanalysts. All right, sir? Forgive me if there are any psychologists and psychoanalysts and the rest of the specialized group, if there are some here, forgive me. The analyser thinks he is separate from that which he analyses. Is that so? Is anger different from you, or you are angry? You are angry, not you think you are angry, or you realize that you have been angry after that emotion is over. I hope you are following all this. Do follow it for your own sake because then you will live a totally different kind of life with absolute order, and therefore a mind that is not caught in any routine, in any ideologies, in any community, in any nation, in any group, in any sect, religious or otherwise.

That is, the thinker - please listen - the thinker thinks he is separate from thought. Right? Because the thinker says, 'I can control thought, I can shape thought, I can alter thought, or suppress, control, direct thought'. But is the thinker different from thought, or the thinker is the thought? You understand my question? If the thinker is the thought then there is no division. Wherever there is division there must be conflict - the Arab, the Jew, the Hindu, Muslim, the American against somebody else, and so on and so on, the black and white, and purple and blue. So when one sees the fact that the thinker is the thought, the thinker doesn't exist without the thought, so when you see that, when you realize that, as you realize danger, when you see this the whole movement of thought has a totally different meaning. May I go on? I hope you are following all this, or I am making myself clear.

So thought has made itself - no, sorry. Thought in itself is broken up because memory can never be complete, and thought is the response of memory. Right? And thought has created this extraordinary mess in the world, including the religious confusion, all the images that churches and the temples, and the mosques have. Thought, when it has created these images in temples and churches, is worshipping itself. I wonder if you see that. So thought in our relationship with each other has created this image about each other, and therefore there is no relationship at all.

Relationship implies being completely in contact with each other. Not only as is generally translated sexually but much more deeply, more profoundly in contact. And that contact with each other implies no division. And perhaps then one can use the word 'love', though that word is so abominably misused.

So is it possible not to create images about the other? First of all one must realize that we do have images. Then to ask, how do these images come into being. We explained that, that thought in its very nature is a broken up thing, a fragment. It's like a vase which is a marvellous thing and is broken, and a little piece of that vase thinks that it can put together the totality of life.

So thought, which is born of memory, memory being knowledge, experience, thought is in its very essence the past, and so when you observe another through the eyes of the past you are not observing at all. Now is that possible not to observe through images, through your projection of another? It is possible only if you are interested, if you are serious, if you really want to find out a way of living that is entirely different, then this mechanism of bringing about images, one has to go into that very carefully. How does this mechanism come into being? You understand my question? How does the image-making come into being? Now you ask that question, if you ask it at all, and how do you approach that question, any question? Do you approach it with previous knowledge, with a conclusion, with fear, with asking somebody to tell you? How do you approach a question which is a human, deep, fundamental question, how do you come to it? Because how you come to it, what your motives are, dictates your answer. That's obviously a fact.

So how do you approach this question: why does the mechanism of making images come into being? And can that mechanism have its right place, and not interfere or project in relationship? Do you understand my question? Do you?

Q: Yes.

K: Thank god, somebody does! If you do, then you have to ask, what is the function of the brain. We don't have to be specialists of the brain, you don't have to read books about the brain. You can observe it yourself, how you talk, how you listen, how you see the whole operation of the movement of the brain, you can see it in yourself. The function of the brain is to register, like a tape recorder. The tape registers, so does the brain. It registers in order to acquire knowledge and to be safe, secure. The brain demands that it be completely secure from danger, so it registers. And in that registration it seeks security. The registration is a means of finding security. Then there is security in the past, because there is no security in the future, you don't know what's going to happen in your relationship. So the image is formed the moment you register any incident, any word, any insult, any flattery, that exists between man and woman, that is immediately registered, and that becomes the memory; and according to that memory projected, you observe the other. Now we are asking - please listen to this, if you care to - we are asking, is that registration, which is necessary in certain places like driving a car, technological knowledge, reading, writing and so on, is it necessary to register when your wife, when the girl or the boy insults, flatters, hurts, says something which is ugly, why should the brain register this? Do you understand my question? If it doesn't then there is no image made. Right? Right, sirs?

Now the question is: can that registration come to an end without effort, because you have put the necessity of registration in its right place? Which is, when you drive a car, you have learnt after several lessons how to drive a car. That is, you have registered, the brain has registered the knowledge of driving a car; the care, the brakes, and all the rest of it. That is its right place, to register what is necessary, technological knowledge, driving a car, learning a language and so on, in its right place. And we are asking, the registration of an insult or a hurt is not necessary, why should it be necessary? It becomes a necessity, or it is inevitable, when you, when you have an image about yourself. Are you following this? That image about yourself is hurt. If you think you are a marvellous speaker, or a marvellous person, highly evolved and terribly intelligent and all the rest of that blah, when you think all that and you create an image about yourself as an American - the American way of life, American freedom, American abundance and so on and so on - you have an image about that, about yourself.

And that image is hurt. Can you live without an image? You understand my question? Can you? Don't say, no, yes, sir. It implies a great deal. Which means thought doesn't create, or build, the image that is me. The 'me' being all the ambitions, corruption, status, position, ambition, all that is the 'me'. The essence of the 'me' is conflict. Can one live without any of those attributes? Which means to be totally, completely free of self-created images.

Then in relationship there is no division, not you and I, I seeking my particular ambition, my particular position, my particular desires, and she also doing the same thing according to each other's images. So when there is no image there is actual relationship. Which may be called, if one can use that word without its ugly content, love. Love has no pressure. Everything else has pressure. That's one point.

And also we ought to consider the pressure of fear. Most human beings throughout the world are frightened, about their physical existence, about their, you know, outward fears. And also there are deeply rooted fears which are embedded in the psyche. You know most people in the world say, 'Why bother about all the investigations into something psychological, depth and all that, why don't you live with the things around you happily'. That's what America is trying to do: have more things, enjoy your life, more money, more cars, everything outward. You know you can't live just outwardly, there are all kinds of problems if you live outwardly, if you are totally, completely caught in the worldly things. Because one is caught in the worldly things there is going to be more and more confusion, more wars, more misery. Do you understand this question? You know Marxists, and the Mao's, and all the rest of those people, say, control the environment, the outward circumstances and you change man. It has never happened? You can't change man through control of the environment. They have tried it for centuries in different parts of the world; man has never been changed through compulsion, through dictatorship, or through what is called 'non-socialism'. So one has to go into this problem of fear, not only the outward insecurity of physical existence, but also the deep layers of fear, of which one may be conscious or not. But one has to investigate, go into it. Will you? Will you go with the speaker and investigate your fear? Your fear is not your own, it is the fear of mankind. Man wants physical security, so do you. That physical security is denied if you have wars, with all your talents, your industry is geared to war. Right? For god's sake, how can you live this way - I don't know.

So you seek physical security by accepting nationalities, accepting little groups, little communities, little groups together, little families together. And when you do you are separating yourself, and that very separation brings about conflict not only outwardly but inwardly, which ultimately projects itself in war. War is not only for economic reasons, political reasons, geographical reasons, but also essentially because man is violent. You know all this. So we are concerned with the examination, with the investigation, to see if man, you, can go beyond all fears. Right?

What is fear? One is most familiar with that sensation of fear, which we name as fear, what is that, how does thing come about in our relationship, however intimate we are with each other? What is the source of fear? What is the beginning of fear? You know man throughout the ages has never gone into this question of ending of fear, but always looked to some outward agency called god, or some means of escaping from that terrible burden, that burden that brings about darkness, paralysis, incapacity to think clearly, we run away from it, and we are very good at cultivating the net of escapes that we are caught in. So what is fear? Not a particular form of fear. If you understand the nature of fear, how fear arises, how fear dominates, consciously or unconsciously our life, then if you understand the nature of fear then you can deal with the particular. But by talking about the particular, the fragment of it, you can never understand the totality of fear. Am I making myself clear on this point? Yes? Good. So we are concerned not with the particular fear, which we will understand or be free of when we understand the whole tree of fear, with its roots, with its leaves, with its flowers, with its expressions, all that, the totality.

What is fear, how does it come about? Is it based on the past? Does it spring from the past? Or does it have its source in the future? Or is fear in the present, now? You understand my question? Does it come out of the past, or the future is so unknown therefore fear, or is the fear now? I don't know how to put it. Is the fear unrelated to the past or to the future? That's better. You understand my question? Yes?

Audience: Yes.

K: That is, does the source - the beginning of fear is in the past - please listen - or the future and what is the future? Is the future different from the past, or is the past modified through the present, through the incidents and accidents, exigencies of the present, modifies itself, the past, and becomes the future. You understand? So the past is continually moving to what is called the future, modified. I wonder if you see all this. So we are asking, the past is the source of fear. Right?

Q: Not always.

K: Generally, sir. Don't say, not always. Look at it, consider it, don't reject or accept. Look at it, first observe it, not with your conclusions, your judgements, your evaluations, just to observe those mountains, you know, look at it. In the same way, look at fear. So when you look at fear, we are asking, does it come from the past, and not from the future, as we think of the future, because the future is the movement of the past through the present. One loses a job, the memory of that losing, unemployment, and all the rest of it, is cultivated by thought as memory: I have had the job, I have lost it, I hope to get another. And the fear comes when I have lost the job, and I hope to have the job tomorrow. I may not and there is fear. Right? So the source of thought is in the past - the past being the experience of having a job, losing it, the knowledge of it, the pain of it, the anxiety of it, and the fear of not having another job. So from the past the whole movement of fear takes place. One has had a toothache, been to the dentist, no pain, but the memory of that pain is stored up, and again you are afraid that pain may return. So there is this constant movement from the past, physical, physiological as well as psychological - psychologically one did something, one said a lie and one is frightened and so on, all from the past. The past is knowledge. Right? You are following all this?

So thought is the outcome of the past. Right? Thought which is the outcome of the past, thought engenders fear. Right? Fear of death, that is, fear of dying in the distant future, it may be tomorrow, or ten years later. Thought has projected the idea of coming to an end and afraid of coming to an end. It has lived in the outcome of the past, projected itself into the future as coming to an end and is frightened of it. So thought, which is the outcome of the past as fear, so thought is fear. I wonder if you understand all this. So can fear come to an end? Now, please I am asking you that question, the speaker is asking you that question, can fear come to an end? How do you listen to that question? Do you make an abstraction of it, that is, draw a conclusion from it, an idea of it, or do you actually listen to it without a conclusion? You understand my question? Which is it that you are doing: do you actually listen without conclusions, without ideas? If you do, then as you are listening, at the moment, there is no fear, naturally. But when fear arises from the past, can you look at it without any reaction, to observe it? Then you will find both consciously as well as unconsciously that thing which was born out of the past comes totally to an end, though it is deeply embedded in the recesses of one's mind.

Now how do you examine, or explore into the hidden parts of the brain where fear may exist. Do you understand my question? Do you? You think you understand fear - may be consciously. But there are unconscious fears, deep down, how do you examine those, how do you look at those? Can you bring them all out, expose them, not through analysis, not through going to a professional and lying down on a couch and saying all - I don't mean that, that's all too childish. Forgive me. But to open the content of your consciousness and see where the fear lies. Now this becomes very difficult perhaps and subtle, so please listen.

Can consciousness - you know what consciousness is? To be conscious of the mountains, to be conscious of the green grass, to be conscious of the person sitting next to you, to be conscious of the colour, the beauty of the hills and so on, to be aware, to be cognizant, to know. All that is implied in the word 'consciousness'. Consciousness is made up of its content. Right? Without its content there is no consciousness. Its content is fear, jealousy, anxiety, saying, I am an American, not an American, I am a Russian, Jew - part of that also, all the ambitions, greed, envy, hurts, fears, pleasures, so-called love, sorrow, death, all that is the content of that consciousness. Now we are asking - please listen - can that consciousness become aware of itself? Can it look at itself, as it were, in a mirror? You see yourself, your face, your figure, in a mirror. You may say, I like, I don't like it, I must be thinner, I must be fatter, I must have longer hair, shorter, whatever it is, you can look at yourself in a mirror. In the same way - please listen, I'll show you something - in the same way, can this consciousness, which is made up of you, you are that consciousness, you are not separate from that consciousness, you are that, can that consciousness see itself - not partially, not in little bits, as anger, jealousy, this, or that, but see.

We are saying, can that consciousness, yours, that consciousness is the consciousness is the consciousness of mankind, your consciousness is not different from mine or somebody else's, consciousness with its content is like every other human being. One may call oneself an American, or a Hindu, or a Buddhist, or a Catholic, but it is still part of that consciousness, conditioned according to climate, culture, position and so on and so on, but it is still within that area, within that field. So can consciousness see itself as you see yourself in a mirror, your face? I don't know if you ever put that question to yourself.

Then we would like to ask the question, who is the observer who is looking at that consciousness? Is the observer different from that consciousness? I hope you are following all this. Is the observer the higher state of consciousness which is looking at the lower state of consciousness? Is the higher state of consciousness projected by thought, which thinks there is a different state of consciousness, but thought has put the content of its consciousness, which makes up consciousness. It may invent a super consciousness but it is still the product of thought. Right? I wonder if you follow all this.

So we are asking can consciousness observe itself totally? That is, is consciousness alive, active, and can you observe anything active, moving, changing, reforming, reforming and forming itself again, this constant movement is going on. Therefore it is extraordinarily alive. And can that consciousness watch itself in action, in movement? Am I making the question clear? How do you answer it? How do you answer it, not me answer it, not the speaker answer it, how do you answer a question of that kind? Because that's your life. Your life, your daily life is composed of this, fear, pleasure, sorrow, pain, hurt, jealousy, ambition, greed, envy, all that. Can all that observe itself? Or is there an observer who is totally different from the thing which we call consciousness? So man has said, yes, which is god. And god becomes one of the greatest pressures in life. You understand?

Because again that is an invention of thought.

Now the thing is, it is only possible to observe the totality of consciousness - or rather when the mind is totally, completely silent, without any movement, then any movement can be watched. I wonder if you understand this. We are going into something which is called meditation, not all the silly nonsense that has been spread around by the industrialized gurus, that's not meditation, that's just some form of mental tricks and habits, and the cultivation of new habits. Meditation is nothing whatsoever to do with all that. We are saying, a mind that is completely quiet, totally quiet, can watch any movement. And it's only in that state, in that quality of silence consciousness can be watched completely. Then the problem is, is it possible to bring about a mind that is totally quiet?

I am afraid it is time to stop. You must be frozen and if you want to go into this further we will do it tomorrow morning. Perhaps it won't rain and there will be more sun. May I get up and go?

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 9TH APRIL 1978

May we continue with what we were talking about the last three meetings that we have had.

First of all I think it should be made quite clear that we are not doing any propaganda, to propagate any series of ideas, or a way of life, but rather together each one being free, independent, to observe very clearly what is taking place, not only in the external world but also what is happening inwardly. I think it is becoming more and more obvious for those who are at all aware, and concerned with the world, which is gradually deteriorating, disintegrating morally, ethically, and if I may use the word, spiritually - observing all this, no obvious solution for the confusion and the misery and the sorrows of the world are present. What is required, if one can so point out, which is based on reason, logic, and clear thinking, that a new mind is necessary, a mind that is not reformed, or reconditioned, but a mind that is totally new so that it can face the political, religious, economic, social problems of the world, a totally different kind of mind, not put together by thought. And therefore it behoves us, if I may again point out, the importance to find out for oneself what is the movement of thought: how it arises, what is its nature, whether thought can transform itself at all. Or that in the very approaches of understanding the whole movement of thought, perhaps that very observation might bring about a different quality of brain and mind.

As we said before, if we may again point out, that this is not a lecture, the speaker holding forth on some speculative, theoretical, hypothetical ideas, but rather we are thinking together, not agreeing together, not accepting anything that the speaker says, but together freely, without prejudice, examine the nature of thought.

As one observes, thought has created the modern world with its extraordinary technological advancement, thought has divided the world into nationalities, into particular groups, one nation against another nation, one group against another. Thought also has divided the world into various religions: the Christian, the Buddhist, the Hindu, the Muslim, the Islamic world, and this is the product of thought. The contents of the churches, the temples and the mosques, are put together by thought. That again is fairly obvious for those who want to go into this question whether it is possible for a new mind to come into being. So it behoves us and becomes important to find out whether thought, the whole process of thinking, can solve all our problems, both domestic, international, family, religious and so on. Thought, as we pointed out earlier, is broken up, thought can never comprehend or perceive the total, because the fragment can never understand or see the totality of existence because thought in itself is a fragment, is a broken up thing. We said thought is broken up because it is based on memory, and memory can never be complete, you can always add to it, or take away from it, extend it, but thought, which is the outcome of memory, knowledge, experience, can never, under whatever circumstances, comprehend the totality of existence. It can understand one fragment of it, or one piece of life, and try to alter it, disfigure it, reform it, but it is still a fragment, a broken up thing, because it is based on knowledge, on time, on the process of evolution. I think this must be clear for each one of us if we are going to understand, communicate with each other whether thought, the whole movement of our thinking can solve any problem, any psychological problem, any problems of relationship and so on.

And also one must be clear that thought has not created nature, the tree, the mountain. But thought has made use of nature. So thought, whatever it creates, is a reality, the actual. Thought can create illusion - that's also actual, real. But it cannot possibly bring about or understand what is truth. That truth is not yours or mine or somebody else's, belonging to a church, or to a group of people. That truth can only be understood when we comprehend totally the whole movement of thought. That is, to give thought its right place, and for thought to realize for itself its own nature, its own fragmentary quality. And that is one of our difficulties, that thought cannot possibly understand that it is a fragment. It can imagine that it is a fragment, it can think that it is a fragment, but to actually perceive, to actually go into the question whether thought is a fragment, to observe its movement as fragmentary, broken up, is that possible?

As we have said before in all the talks, previously and now, we are examining together. It is not that you are accepting what the speaker is saying, you are free to get up and go, or free to listen. But if you do listen please be good enough to listen without prejudice, without some conclusion, without some pet opinion, because we are not opposing one opinion against another, one conclusion against another, one hypothesis against another. Together, you and the speaker, are examining, exploring, whether it is at all possible, observing what is going on in the world, and the confusion, the mess, the misery, the wars, the economic condition and so on and so on, whether it is possible to bring about a new mind, because the old mind, the conditioned mind cannot possibly solve these problems. Thought cannot solve these problems, because thought itself has created these problems. If this is absolutely clear, not because the speaker says so, but because you yourself clearly see for yourself, therefore there is no divergence of opinions. You are only dealing with facts, and not your fact or my fact, but the fact, the actuality, what is happening in the world. From that, in that observation one realizes completely that a new quality of mind is necessary, not a mind that is reconditioned to a new pattern but a mind that is totally free, therefore a quality of a creativeness that is so necessary.

If you have observed, a new culture can only come out of a religion, not the orthodox religion, not the religion of thought, not the religion of images, of beliefs and authorities, dogmas and rituals, but a religion that is capable of perceiving what is truth - not your truth or the speaker's truth, or somebody else's truth, the philosophical or psychological truth, but the absolute truth which is the essence of religion. We are using the word 'religion' in the sense of gathering all energy, not dissipated, not controlled, not given a certain direction, but this quality of energy that comes into being when there is total freedom. And that energy is only capable of enquiring totally into what is truth. In that sense we are using that word 'religions'. Not the institutionalized religions, with their priests, with their dogmas, with their rituals, with all their imaginative, romantic states.

So to understand all this, as we said, the mind, the brain must be free from pressure because if there is any kind of pressure, both physiologically as well as psychologically, any kind of pressure, there is distortion. That's clear and very simple. It's not a matter of acceptance, it is so. If I push you in a certain direction, whatever you do will be according to my pressure. Or if you yourself have your own pressures, your own demands, your own desires, which act as pressures, then whatever you do will be deformed, distorted. That again is a simple fact.

So we are going together to examine, as we said, the pressures of language, the pressures of ideologies, the pressures of institutions, the pressures of family, the domination of one over the other, and also we discussed yesterday about fear. We should also go into the question together of the whole problem of desire, which is perhaps the greatest pressure one has. If I am too intent, please forgive me, I can't help it. One must be passionate, one must have intensity, otherwise you can do nothing. We have destroyed that intensity, that passion, through perversiveness, through all kinds of idiotic pursuits, we have destroyed that capacity of great intensity through following somebody, through accepting various fads, religious fads with their gurus and all the rest of that nonsense - we have lost all that. Perhaps in enquiring together into this whole question of pressure we may come upon that intensity, not eventually, not just before you die, but in the very process of enquiry that passionate intensity can come about. It can only happen when there is no pressure whatsoever, of any kind, outwardly or inwardly. Actually there is no difference between the outer and the inner, it's one unitary movement, but we have divided the world as the outer and the inner. But when we see the inner has created the outer - the inner being the whole movement of our thoughts, our fears, our greeds, our anxieties, and our pleasures, we have created this world, the world doesn't come into being by itself socially. That's what we have created. So the outer and the inner are one constant interrelated movement.

So we must also, as we said, examine together the question of desire. To enquire into that we must be clear that the word is not the thing. The word 'desire' is not the actual feeling, the actual emotional urge, or the reaction. So we must also be very clear that the description is not the described. One can describe the mountain, most beautifully, all the shades and valleys and depths, and the dignity and majesty of mountains, but the word, the description is never the actual. The painting, the poem, the statue of the saints that thought has created through words is not the actual. So we must be very clear when in examination, in investigation, that the word 'desire' is not the actual. We are now examining the actual, not the word. But we must also be very clear that the word 'desire' is not driving us. I wonder if you understand what this.

So what is desire? Because for most of us it is one of the most important pressures. Desire to be successful, desire to have more money, desire to obey, desire to follow, sexual desires, the desire of pleasure. So as it's one of the most important pressures in our life - not precious - you understand, it is not precious, but pressure. Perhaps my English may not be the American English, so please forgive. We are talking about pressure.

What is the nature of desire? How does desire arise? Why is there such urgent constant desire to fulfil, to become, to achieve? So we are looking into the nature of desire. What is the relationship of thought to desire? Are they related, or are they interrelated? Is desire and thought a movement? Or is desire something separate from thought? So we are asking, what is desire? We have gone into the question, what is thought. We said thought is the response of memory, experience, knowledge, stored up in the brain, and there in the very cells is contained the memory from which thought arises. So what is desire? Is desire brought about by thought? Or is desire independent of thought - please listen to this - or in the movement of perception, seeing, in the seeing thought takes control - which we will go into as we go along. All right, sir?

What is thought? How does it come into being? As I said, please, don't accept a thing that the speaker says, there is no authority here, though unfortunately he has to sit on a platform for the convenience of others, it doesn't give him an authority, a position, a status. When we are examining together there is no status, there is no authority, there is no conclusion. So we are looking together into this question of what is desire. How does desire arise? I do not know if you have ever enquired into that question. Or you are so accustomed to the expression of desire, and whenever desire arises there is this fulfilment of desire. (Pause while bells ring) May we continue now?

We are asking what is the nature of desire, and how it arises. (Further pause for bells) Imagine when you are in Rome where there are three hundred churches or more, one round every piazza, every via, all of them ringing for some time. I hope your Christian reactions are fulfilled!

I hope we can start again enquiring seriously, not facetiously, not for the time being, but as it is a very important factor of our life to go into this question of what is desire, and what is its place in life, and what value has it, and so on. If you have observed most of the religions have said, deny desire, control desire, subjugate desire, deny desire in the service of god. The monks throughout the world, of different colours, have said, don't have desire. But when you deny desire, suppress desire it has greater strength, greater vitality, so inwardly burning with desire, outwardly have a calm face, read the book, don't look at a woman, don't look at the beauty of the world, nature, the marvellous earth, because that might awaken desire, so don't concern yourself, you are a monk, don't look at anything but the book. And when you do look at a woman, consider her as your sister, your mother, anything but what she is. This has been the way of the monks throughout the world. But we are not saying suppress, control, deny, run away from desire, on the contrary, we are trying to understand the nature of it. And when we have comprehended fully its structure, its nature, then it has its right place, then it doesn't fill your horizon, your whole life, therefore there is neither denying it nor suppressing it.

So it is important to understand the nature of desire, what is desire. Surely desire is a reaction from a stimulus. The stimulus is when you see something, in a shop window, when you see a woman or a boy, or a man, or a beautiful car, or a dress and so on. So desire arises through perception, seeing - please observe it for yourself, it is not because I say so - seeing, then contact, then sensation, then thought creates out of that sensation the image, and that very creation of that image is desire. Right? Please don't accept what the speaker is saying, observe it in yourself. You see a beautiful dress, shirt, trousers, or whatever it is, and seeing it, touching it, then the contact, the sensation, and thought creating the image of you wearing it and desire arises. Right?

Please, as we said, this is not analysis. This is observation. When you observe, analysis has no place. When you observe the movement of sensation, the sensation, whether it be sexual, whether it be any kind of sensation, arises through seeing, the optical seeing; the observation, the contact, the sensation, and the image-making. That is the whole movement of desire. Right? But the problem is, that movement demands fulfilment, demands that it should gain what it wants, should buy, or whatever it desires. Now the problem is, where does thought come in and make it into a desire, into that desire demanding fulfilment? Where does thought come in? You understand the question? I must make it clear.

You see a beautiful car - I am taking the car, it may be a woman, it may be a man, it may be a marvellous picture, piece of furniture, piece of jewellery, whatever it is. You see a car. Then the contact with it, the sensation to own it, the sensation, and thought creating the image of you sitting in the car and driving it. Then the whole problem arises whether thought can separate itself from sensation. I wonder if this is clear. No, it is not, I'll make it a little more clear. You see the car; sensation, and desire, you sitting in the car, driving it. And if you haven't got enough money to buy a car you are jealous, you are anxious, you want it, you do all kinds of things, you steal cars. I believe that's the latest thing, you know, going on in this country. So the problem arises when desire demands fulfilment. Right? You see a beautiful woman, or a beautiful man, sex, urge, all the rest of it. The desire always wanting its fulfilment. The desire is constant, the objects of desire may vary, but desire is constant. I don't know if you follow this. And then the struggle begins: I must not desire, I must desire, the edict of religions - if you pay attention to that kind of thing any more - or because you desire you fulfil whatever you want, this permissiveness of this country, which is spreading unfortunately throughout the world. You are setting the standard unfortunately.

So this constant struggle to do whatever the desire demands. It may bring pain, it may bring satisfaction, it may bring pleasure, it may bring all kinds of things, but it is a constant struggle. Where there is struggle there is expenditure of energy. Right? So the monks have said, don't waste that energy, therefore withhold desire, that energy is necessary to serve god - or whatever it is, Jesus Christ, and all the rest of it. All put together by thought. I am sorry we are speaking next to a church. So how to prevent the conflict, is the question. You understand? Desire is always creating conflict. You may be satisfied with one fulfilment of a desire, but that satisfaction demands more, so there is constant pressure, constant drive, which brings about a great deal of conflict. The question then is, is it possible to prevent this conflict? Because one realizes conflict is a wastage of energy, when you are related with another, man, woman, to be in conflict with each other is so futile, meaningless. And in the same way, one must find out whether this wastage of energy through conflict, which desire inevitably brings about, whether that conflict can end. Have I made this clear? I can go on.

How does this conflict arise in the movement of desire? Are we together in this? Please. We are understanding each other. Some of you perhaps will, some of you don't, it doesn't matter, it's up to you. We are asking, where does conflict arise in desire?

Observation, sensation, contact, sensation. If that stops there then there is no conflict. Right? I wonder if you see that. You see the car: contact, sensation. That's normal, natural, you see a beautiful thing, a beautiful mountain, beautiful trees, lovely morning, sensation, but thought says, I wish such a beautiful day will continue tomorrow without rain. So is it possible - please listen - is it possible to be so alertly aware for sensation to stop and not let thought interfere with it? That is, have you ever observed the sea, or the mountains, or your friend, or your boy, or girl, with total awakening of all the senses, not just the eyes, or the ears, with all your senses to observe? I wonder if you have ever done it. Then you will see there is no division between the observer and the observed. That is, when you observe totally, with your heart, with your mind, with your eyes, with your ears, with all your senses awakened, with all the senses observing, then there is no desire as thought interfering with sensation. I wonder if you are seeing this. Do try now, as you are sitting there, to observe, it doesn't matter what, the tree with all your senses, not only with your eyes. If you do, the sensation of seeing colours, the sparkling leaves in the sun, the clarity of the blue sky, the sensation, if you so completely observe there is no centre from which you desire. I wonder if you have got it.

So we are asking: when thought interferes with sensation then desire begins and the demand of desire to achieve, to fulfil. If you see this very clearly then there is no suppression of desire. Which doesn't mean you fulfil desire. You have to go into this. If you are listening you will be doing it and therefore you will understand it; if you are not listening, in the sense we are using the word 'listening', when you listen you listen with all your heart, with all your mind, with all your being, and not make an abstraction, an idea of what is being said. Then you are doing it, then you will see for yourself that desire, as we know it, has very little importance.

From desire there is the whole movement of pleasure, which is gratification, satisfaction, both sexually and otherwise. The pursuit of pleasure, which man throughout the world is doing now, it is becoming more and more exaggerated. The more sophisticated, the more civilized we become the greater the pleasure apparently, the pursuit of it - sexually, entertainment, football, you know, the whole cultural pressure which is based on pleasure. And what is pleasure. Why does man pursue everlastingly pleasure? We are not denying pleasure, we are not saying it is right or wrong, but why does man, wherever you go, pursue eternally this pleasure? The pleasure of achievement, the pleasure of worship, the pleasure of being a great man, a success, a reputation, the whole urge to pursue that which you have enjoyed yesterday and give it time and then pursue it. Don't you know all this? It's your life. Your life is based on this: pleasurable experience, pleasurable thoughts, pleasurable actions, gratifying. And the pleasure of attachment, the pleasure of possessing something, whether it is a furniture or a person. This is what is actually going on in all of us all the time. And when there is no pleasure there is anger, there is violence, there is destruction, hatred. Again these are facts, not my invention. And when there is no pleasure you get hurt. And when one is hurt from childhood - this actually goes on throughout life - when you are hurt you resist, you build a wall round yourself, you isolate yourself. And action from isolation is neuroticism, incomplete, incorrect, destructive. That hurt is not having, not pursuing pleasure, but somebody preventing you from pursuit of that pleasure, and so on and so on and so on.

So one must go again into this question of what is pleasure. Is love pleasure? Is love desire? What is the relationship, if there is any, between pleasure and love, or desire and love? If there isn't any, why does man pursue this everlastingly, pleasure? You understand? Why do you do it? Your search for god is pleasure. All the things that you have created by thought, through sensation, gratification, satisfaction, is the pursuit of pleasure. Those of you who follow gurus, go to India and all the rest of that nonsense, is to have the greatest pleasure, which you call enlightenment. So we must enquire, if you are at all serious, what is pleasure. Because pleasure is also becoming very destructive: the pleasure of belonging to a certain group opposed to other groups, little sect opposed to another sect, the pleasure of being somebody in this world. You follow? All that. So it is very important, is it not, to understand what is the nature and structure of pleasure, how does pleasure arise, and has it any relationship with love. We will find out if there is any relationship between pleasure and love if we enquire into pleasure, joy and ecstasy, and their relationship to love. But merely to try to find out what love is without understanding pleasure it will lead you totally to a different kind of illusion.

So what is pleasure? How does pleasure arise? Is pleasure the expression of desire in its fulfilment? You have had a marvellous evening yesterday, sexually or otherwise, that is remembered, the brain has recorded that event, it has been put on the tape, and thought says, 'I have had that marvellous time yesterday, I hope we shall another evening like that.' Right? You have seen a marvellous sunset, clear, golden, radiant, filling the earth with such marvellous light, there is tremendous enjoyment of it, delight in it, there is the remembrance of it. That very remembrance and the pursuit of that remembrance is pleasure - or sexually and so on, you can imagine all the rest of it.

So pleasure, at the moment of pleasure there is no registration. Right? I wonder if you have noticed it. The moment you say, I am happy, you are not happy. Happiness - we will use that word just for convenience-at the moment of being happy you are totally unaware. But a second later you say, 'I have been happy'. The remembrance of that thing a second later registers, and the registration of that happiness, which is gone, which is dead, that registration is thought remembering that incident, and demanding more of it. Right? So thought remembering an incident, however marvellous, beautiful, exciting, that incident has been registered, then thought takes it over, remembers it, and then demands more of it. And the 'more of it' is the pleasure.

So joy happens by itself. It occasionally, if you are lucky, quiet, unaware, not concerned with your little self everlastingly, it happens. Then remembrance of it, and the pursuit of that joy which merely becomes a pleasure. Joy is not pleasure.

Now the problem is, modern civilization is encouraging, commercially, in other ways, to pursue this pleasure, more, more, more, waste and so on. We are destroying the earth, we are destroying nature, we are destroying ourselves. And the problem is, seeing the operation, the function of pleasure - again can one observe an incident like a beautiful sunset and end it, not say, 'Well I must have it tomorrow'. You understand my question? That is, see something extraordinarily beautiful and that's an end of it. Why carry it over for the next day? Which means, to observe totally with all your senses, then there is no registration. It is the registration, the remembrance of that incident, or that happening, and the pursuit of that is pleasure, with all its conflicts, with all its pain, you know all the rest of it.

Then we are asking, what is the relationship between pleasure, desire and love? Is there any relationship at all? And why has man made love so pleasurable? You understand my question? So one has to ask, go into the question of what is love. That word is so heavily loaded, so misused, so corrupt. Love yourself, love your soap, love your hair - all that nonsense of commercialism. So one has to, really if you are serious, find out what love is, because without that you are going to destroy everything in life. What is love? Surely a man who is ambitious has no love. Right? But you are ambitious. You want to be somebody. Or if you are not, you hate somebody, belittle somebody, and a man who is aggressive has no love. Obviously. A man who is completely concerned with himself, as most people are, and they may talk about love, surely there is no love. A man who is jealous, who is greedy, who is possessive, and attached, a woman who is attached to a man, or a woman, attached, is that love? Please, sir, don't agree or disagree. Just enquire, find out for yourself. Does attachment with its misused word of responsibility, is that love? Attachment implies owning somebody, fear of losing them, being attached you are afraid to lose, and become lonely, frustrated, miserable, so more and more and more you attach - it may be a person, it may be a house, it may be a furniture, it may be some belief, all the rest of it. Is that love? Attachment breeds fear, attachment breeds anxiety, attachment breeds guilt because you then become responsible for that person, if you are not responsible you feel guilty. Is all that love?

And if you are serious, you see all that is not love, then put aside all that. Then you have that extraordinary quality of that flame, the real thing, not the word. Then love has no relationship to pleasure. It is not related to desire, because desire is based on sensation, sexual or otherwise. Pleasure is the pursuit of a remembrance, and love is not a remembrance, love is not something to be cultivated by thought. And that's why it is important to understand the nature and the structure of thought.

So when you see all this, not verbally, not theoretically, but actually in your daily life, then out of that comes not only love but a different kind of mind, totally new. It is only such a new mind that can solve our various complexities of our problems.

May we get up? May I get up and go?

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 11TH APRIL 1978

Krishnamurti: I think it would be good if we could talk over together as two friends who are not too opinionated, too dogmatic, too assertive or aggressive, but rather in friendly spirit without any animosity or antagonism, to talk over together their daily problems, not some abstraction, not some theoretical ideas but rather their daily unhappy, sorrowful, frustrating life. So could we have a dialogue about such matters. So what would you like to take up this morning?

Questioner: How does materialism affect clear thinking? There's a lot of thought in people's minds about the material world, and we are told by certain people that we should give up material things in order to find clearness of thought.

K: Does a material way of life or existence, money, work and so on, does it affect a different way of life - is that it, sir?

Q: Well not so much that but as to say if you are thinking on ideas in general, the problems in your life, when I make a decision about something or when I try to find an answer to the speaker's question.

K: I don't quite follow your question, sir.

Q: It's hard for me, I'm nervous speaking to you. I see people and I see myself, when I try to make a judgement or form an opinion, I find that it is coloured and shaded by my desires here in the physical world.

K: Your opinions, your ideas, your thoughts change according to the environment and so on - is that it?

Q: I think so.

K: All right, sir. Good lord!

Q: The life that we have put together, wired together, the game that we all play is materialism that the gentleman was talking about, is it possible to be clear and yet have to continue along the way we are going now?

K: Could one live a clear life, with clarity, the way we are living - is that it, sir? Obviously not.

Q: Do you have to give up everything?

K: We will discuss that, sir. We will go into it.

Q: There is a large amount of time I spend looking for someone to help, and then there are periods of time when there is apparently a communication between someone and myself, and there is a communication, a rapid fire of communication between a large number of series of people and it seems to be communication but it always comes out, help - help me in the way I need it. What is the difference between helping in the way I see it and the helping a way a person asks for? What is the quality of help?

K: What is the quality of help. I am not the chairman. Yes, sir?

Q: Sir, I'd like to know if we can discuss today these questions and begin with: can intelligence, not mental capacity, and maturity not related to time grow through right questioning and right enquiry? And if it can grow will this growth ever bring forth a flower that is a total transformation of the mind?

K: What is the question, I can't quite make it out.

Q: It's can intelligence and maturity, intelligence that is not linked to capacity and maturity that is not related to time, can this sense grow through putting the right question.

K: Is there maturity, right thinking which is not involved in time but constant questioning. That's enough, sir, one question at the time. You don't mind?

Q: I don't mind.

K: All right.

Q: I find desire for transformation leads to tremendous conflict, yet without transformation I keep projecting violence and hatred. What is the solution if transformation is not possible?

K: Can transformation, a different quality of mind come about without conflict - is that it? That's enough, please.

Q: You said biologically man needs through the brain security and order, I want to know at what point does this demand begin to create disorder and insecurity, and why at that point does the brain not see the danger of it?

K: I'm afraid I can't make it out.

Q: There is a biological demand by the brain for security and is there a conflict as a result?

Q: At what point does the brain begin to create disorder?

K: Just let's keep to that. How does disorder come about - is that the question? At what point, or what is the beginning of disorder. Yes, sir?

Q: Could we go into this problem of acting with integrity in a society that is becoming desert, that is rapidly deteriorating and is fragmented, and the problems of being an oasis in that desert?

K: Could we go into the question of integrity in a society which is rapidly declining, deteriorating.

Q: I want to find out is it possible to come sweeping without effort upon inaction?

K: Is there a way of living which means action which doesn't involve effort - is that it?

Q: Well, a way to sweep forming a corridor.

K: Yes, quite right.

Q: I want to find out if it possible.

K: Is it possible to live a life without deep conflict - is that it, sir? Is that your question?

Q: May I try again? Is it possible to come sweetly, effortlessly, without decision upon an ending to former activity.

K: I am afraid I can't make it out, sir.

Q: Without decision, without choice.

K: Without choice. Right. Sir, look there are so many questions what shall we take? Yes, sir?

Q: Boredom. What is boredom?

K: Yes, can there be an end to boredom.

Q: Sir, I must find out, when my mind is quiet action comes with a word, and I do not know how to go beyond the word, because my answers always come in words and thoughts. I don't know how to go beyond the word. Do you understand?

K: Not quite, sir.

Q: I reason in words, and I find that words are useless, I don't know what to do about it.

Q: He wants to know how to go beyond the word.

K: Is it possible to go beyond the word. Is that it?

Q: How?

K: Now, look, which of these questions shall we take so as to cover most of the questions?

Q: About integrity.

K: Integrity.

Q: Boredom.

K: Boredom. Which question which would include all the others so that we can go into that one question which will cover all the others.

Q: Is it possible to be without conflict?

K: Yes, I think that may be it, may we take that up, sir? Do you want to say something special, sir?

Q: Just along these lines, I want to know if there is any action we should make at all from an ego centre?

K: Could we take that one question and go into that, which is: is it possible to live a life without choice, without conflict, without division? Could we discuss that? Would that cover all the other questions, including what does it mean to help others and so on, could we take that? Would you agree to that? I am not particular about that question, any question would do which would cover all the others. So if in exploring this other questions would be answered then it would be worthwhile. If you all agree then we can go into this one question. May we? Shall we?

Audience: Yes.

K: Right. First of all why is there choice? And what does choice mean? To choose between this and that, between certain material for a cloth and other materials, why is there this emphasis, this constant choice going on? And we are asking, we think that where there is freedom there is choice, choice to go from one job to another, from one town to another, from one idea to another, from one belief to another, one from one guru, system, this and that to another. So why is there choice? Please, we are exploring it, I am not telling you what to think, or trying to persuade you to think in a particular direction. So we are asking, what do we mean by that word `choice'? Choose between this road and that road, between the right action, what is right action, what is this constant endeavour on our part to choose? When does this choice come into being, what is the beginning of choice? I am not talking by myself, so please join me in the game.

Q: Would it be out of confusion?

K: We are going to find out, sir. You are saying, are you, where there is choice, or rather choice springs from confusion. That is, if one does not know a particular road, then you ask somebody, then there is no confusion, but if you are confused between this road and that road then you have to choose. Are you saying, sir, that where there is confusion there is choice? Is this, if I may most respectfully ask, is this out of your own discovery, or you have read about it? Because otherwise if you are merely repeating what somebody has said, including the speaker, then you are not entering into the game, you are not playing tennis, you are not playing the game.

Q: I know you have said it but before I knew about you I saw this.

K: Good. So you are saying where there is confusion there is choice. Where there is clarity there is no choice. So what do we mean by that word `confusion', disorder, uncertain. What do we mean by confusion? Please, sirs.

Q: One is confronted by two of several different things and one doesn't know which one to try.

K: That's right, sir, out of that comes choice. But we are asking, what is the origin of disorder, what is the origin of confusion.

Q: Desire.

K: Conflicting desires, opposing desires - does that make for disorder?

Q: That is disorder.

K: We are trying to find out a common meaning so that we all see the same thing together. What is the origin, how does disorder arise?

Q: From desire.

K: Now, may I ask, does one live in disorder? Right? What do you mean by that word 'disorder' in your life? Is your room untidy, you have not put things where they belong, socks, shirt or whatever it is, and so there is disorder in your room; there is disorder in the world. Right? One group against another group, one nation against another nation, one set of ideas, opinions against another and so on and on. So we are asking: what is the origin, the beginning of disorder?

Q: Thought.

K: It is suggested by that lady that thought is the origin of disorder. Is that so?

Q: Thought creates the possibility of the idea.

K: Yes. Before you jump straight off into thought, is one aware, if I may ask, this is not a group therapy or a confession, but one should ask oneself, do I live in disorder, both outwardly and inwardly; then what does that mean, not the origin of it yet but what does it mean when you say, yes, I live my life inwardly as well as outwardly in disorder? Right? Are we aware of that disorder? Or is it just an idea to say we live in disorder? You understand? Which is it we are talking about it: the idea that it is disorder, or the actual disorder?

Q: The actual disorder.

K: The actual disorder. Now are we aware of it?

Q: No.

K: Quite right. Now if one is not aware of actual disorder in one's life how is one going to be conscious of it, who is going to make you conscious of it? Another war? Somebody telling you, hitting you on the head? Somebody you forcing you to see that you live in disorder? How will one become aware that one lives in disorder? Is it a deception - you follow - one deceives oneself so easily, thinking I live in disorder. So deception, a conclusion, an idea, is not the actual fact of disorder. So is one actually aware of this disorder? If one is then we can proceed from there. You understand my question?

Q: Don't we have to know first what order is?

K: No, first disorder. When we understand the whole nature of disorder, out of that comes order. You don't have to seek order. I don't know. All right, sir, let me put it this way: if we negate what is not order, negate, see what is not order then out of that perception comes order. If I see what is disorder, disorder is conflict. Right? Disorder is constantly deceiving myself, constantly living in a confusion, in illusion, escaping from actuality, thinking I have achieved something when actually I am rather silly. All these deceptions bring about disorder and other factors. Now am I aware that I am living in an illusion? I am taking that for the moment. Illusion being something which is not actual. You understand? Deceiving myself, hoping that I will be different and acting actually differently. So am I aware that I am living in an illusion, in a make-belief?

Q: Sir, if we are aware that we are in the illusion when we question it, but other times when we don't question it we are not aware that we are in the illusion.

K: Yes, sometimes we are aware that we live in disorder and then question it, at other times we are not aware that we are in disorder. Now wait a minute, sir, please, let's look at that question. Which is, sometimes I am, sometimes I am not aware of disorder. Do you consider generally - not you particularly, sir - do you consider living in disorder is a danger? Actual danger, like meeting a rattler, or some poisonous insect or a dangerous animal, then when you are faced with that animal, or insect or snake, you know it is the most dangerous thing. So in the same way, does one realize living in disorder is essentially dangerous? Not say, I occasionally am aware of the danger; you are not occasionally aware of the danger of a rattler, you are constantly aware of the danger of a rattler. So in the same way, is one aware of the danger of disorder? By disorder we mean confusion, self-contradiction, saying one thing, doing another, thinking one thing and hoping differently; disorder comes where there is division, where there is duality, me and you, we and they, my belief and your belief, my god and your god, my guru and your guru and so on. So do we realize where there is division, nationalistic, religious, belief, ideals, wherever there is a division between man, woman and so on and so on, there must be conflict. And the essence of conflict is disorder. If this is clear we can proceed. You may question it, I am not saying I am right or wrong, we are putting this forward for you to examine, explore, find out.

Q: By division don't you mean more than a separation?

K: Doesn't division mean more than separation, both separation, division in the sense psychologically.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir. Superior. When I think I am superior, I know and you don't know, that is division, that is separation. But if we both start not knowing and enquiring there is no separation. So we have made it clear that where there is psychological division, belief, nationality, gods, rituals, my country, your country and so on and so on and so on, that division brings conflict and the essence of disorder is conflict, nationally, politically, all the rest of it. Are we together in this? I am not asking you to believe what I am saying. Yes, sir?

Q: Most people never get to that point, it seems.

K: You asked that question, I didn't ask that question. When a question was asked, sir, what is the origin of disorder, why is there conflict, what do we mean by helping somebody who needs help, all that is involved when we talk about disorder. You asked it, I didn't. I observe personally throughout the world there is constant psychological as well as physical difference, and out of that division, out of that corridor of opposites, power (noise of bells) - shall I go on in spite of that? You can hear it all right.

Audience: Yes.

K: Good! One noise I hope is not fighting another noise! So we are asking, is one aware first of all of one's life being in conflict, is one aware that this conflict arises from disorder and disorder exists because of division in oneself - I desire one thing and I am opposing that very desire, I want to achieve something and I know

I can't, I want to be the queen of England, I can't, and so on and on and on. So I am asking, is one aware of this? If one is aware, when one is aware what is the next step? You understand my question? I am aware - suppose I am aware that I live a disordered life then what is the next thing I have to do? One knows that one lives in disorder - one deceives oneself, one says one thing, one tries to be frank with another, all the time wanting to exploit another and so on and so on, then what is the next step?

Q: It is important to recognize the danger.

K: It is important to recognize the danger of it.

Q: Can we go into that a little bit?

K: There are now three noises - your noise, my noise and that noise! It becomes rather difficult. I believe that's a tape recorder! Can't something go wrong with it!

Q: It seems to be that we can't go any further until we recognize the danger of it.

K: Yes. You cannot go further until one recognizes the danger of it. Now, wait a minute, sir. What do we mean by the word 'danger'?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's right, sir, that's right. What do we mean by danger? A car is coming towards you as you are crossing the road and you might die and all the rest of it, so you move away from it. Self-preservation. The instinct to preserve one's being, both physiologically as well as psychologically. Now is not conflict similar to that? Let's keep it very simple. Is not conflict similar to a car rushing towards you?

Q: It is certainly similar but then there is danger, there is danger to the health from smoking yet one still continues to smoke although one is aware of the danger.

K: Smoking. One is aware of the danger of smoking, it might lead to cancer of the lung, but the taste, the habit, the custom, the tradition, the advertising, all that helps you to keep up smoking, so there is contradiction, wanting to give up smoking, seeing the danger of it and yet going on with it. Now which is the most dangerous thing there, the most? Smoking, obviously. Then can one - please listen - can one give up smoking without effort? The body has got used to the nicotine and all the rest of it and it demands it. I have never smoked in my life but I am taking that. So what shall we do? How do you give up something, a habit, not only physiological but also a deeply psychological habit, custom, routine, without the slightest effort? You may never have asked this question, we are asking it now.

Q: Can you just drop it?

K: Yes, sir, find out, have you dropped a habit? I am talking not of unpleasant habits, that's easy, you drop it, but the most pleasant habit, have you ever dropped a pleasant habit easily without effort?

Q: Does one have to see the habit before you can drop it?

K: Obviously. If one doesn't see it then you are playing with words. If you actually see a habit, a habit that has been formed for a long time, to give it up completely, to drop it.

Q: Don't we get used to habits?

K: Then what will you do? You don't resist it. Go on, sir, explore it. You don't resist it, you don't fight against it, you don't suppress it, you don't run away from it.

Q: You become aware of it.

K: No, see what happens, sir, please look. You say you become aware of it. Right? Then you don't suppress it, then you don't run away from it, then you don't wish to change it even. Therefore there is no resistance. Right? Now please watch it. If you do all this what has happened to your mind which has been working in habits, in routine? You understand my question? What's happened to a mind that has lived in habits, that has functioned in routine, in methods, in systems, under pressure, when it realizes that to be free of any habit, no suppression, no running away from it, no trying to reason it out, not trying to say, I must get rid of it - all that implies conflict. So does one realize it, first that the mind is conditioned to function in habits, because then it thinks there is security in habits. But when one realizes very clearly that a routine is a mechanical thing, it isn't alive, and is there a way of abandoning that habit without any pressure? After asking that question - you understand, we have said, is one aware of the habit, then seeing it is no good escaping from it and all the rest, does one see this? Right? Not as a theory but actually does one see that it is no good escaping?

Q: We have tried that, that's no good.

K: Then what takes place?

Q: The mind becomes quiet.

K: Is that so?

Q: I begin to question.

K: No, sir, when one becomes aware that one lives in habit you have already questioned, you are questioning it right from there. Why do I live in habits, why does my function run along a particular groove and so on and so on. You have already, by becoming aware of your habits you are already questioning it.

When you are questioning it you see it is no good running away from it, no good suppressing it. So what has happened to your mind? Go slowly, sir. I have become aware that I have a habit, a belief, a tradition, an acceptance of authority and so on and so on, it's a habit, my country, your country and all that. You have questioned it and you see the danger of it. Do you see the danger? What is it that sees the danger? You understand my question? One sees the danger of war, the cruelty of it, the bestiality of it, the futility of it, the whole thing. When you actually see that what is making you see that it is terribly stupid?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, what makes you see, sir, please look at it before you answer it, what makes you see the car coming, running towards you and you hop out of the way? What makes you do that?

Q: That's self-presentation.

K: Wait, that's good enough. Which means what? There is an act of intelligence there; it is the most stupid thing to stand in the way. That's an act of intelligence. Now when you see the danger of war, the futility of war, the ugliness, the whole of it, the very perception, is that not intelligence? Right? That's all I am asking. So intelligence says, don't suppress, don't run away from it, it is there, look at it, hold it, don't make an abstraction of it, look. The very questioning, awareness, seeing the danger of it, the perception itself is intelligence. Right? That intelligence says, drop it, don't do anything. You understand what I am saying? As you didn't argue with the car coming towards you, you got out of its way. That is an act of intelligence. In the same way if you see the futility of religions as they are now, the very seeing of it is intelligence. The man who says, 'Well, I am sorry I don't want to listen to your nonsense', and goes on with his own life, he is what he is.

Q: I see the need to give up the habit, intelligence tells me that.

K: Ah! There is no giving up.

Q: Abandon?

K: No, there is no giving up. The moment you say, I must give up, it's an effort, a conflict.

Q: I don't mean it in that way but I see the danger of the habit yet - and this is the problem - there is pain, there is resistance in abandoning the habit. I am used to living in a pattern and it means I have to give up that pattern and there may be pain in giving up the pattern.

K: No, sir. Please forgive me for contradicting you, I hope you don't mind, I am not really contradicting you but we are trying - look, you have said that, please listen to what the other chap has to say. He says when you see something dangerous, that very seeing is intelligence. Right? When you see the danger of habits, it is intelligence that is saying, it is not worth it. So which is dominant, the habit or the intelligence? You understand my question? Which is the dominant factor? When you see a car coming towards you, intelligence says, move - which is the dominant factor there?

Q: Intelligence.

K: Obviously. But to you the other is not a dominant factor.

Q: Isn't there a danger of you becoming against habits, like every time you see a car you run?

K: That's not a habit. Surely, that's not a habit.

Q: Why do we function in habits?

K: Therefore, sir, you are asking a question which one has to go into much deeper. Why does the mind or the brain function in habit? Right? What is the nature of habit? I must go into it a little more deeply - shall we? Do you want to go into it more deeply?

Audience: Yes.

K: All right. Are you aware, is the brain or the mind aware of the beginning of a habit? Or is it aware after forming a habit, wanting to get rid of it and then fight it? You understand my question? There are two questions involved in it: one, is one aware of a habit being formed? If one is then you don't enter into the other. The other being, forming a habit, fighting it, trying to get rid of it, conflict and the misery and all the rest of it. So to go beyond that, is one aware of the beginning of a habit?

Q: One is aware of the beginning of a habit too, certain things...

K: I am asking, sir, please be good enough to find out do you know when habit is beginning.

Q: I am aware of it.

K: No, you are not meeting my point. I am not trying to tell you what to think, but I am saying, am I aware a habit is beginning, or I have been so conditioned that I only live in habits? As most of us are, we are so conditioned that we live in habits - I believe, I don't believe, you follow, sir, all that. So which is it now? Are we discussing a mind that is so heavily conditioned by habits, habits being belief, you know, all the rest of it, and how to be free of it, and to be free of it without any conflict, and to be free of it without conflict implies seeing the total danger, not of a particular habit but the whole structure of habit. Is one aware of the danger of habit? That awareness implies intelligence. Then that intelligence says, finished. The moment you see the danger it is finished. As the car coming towards you, the danger, you move. You don't stand there and argue with the car, I am going to run away from it, how shall I run away from it, what shall I do, is it right to do, is it wrong to do - there is no argument. There is direct perception, action. Here there is no direct perception and action because you are conditioned. That's one problem.

The other is: is there an awareness of the beginning of a habit, both physically as well as psychologically? Now which is it we are dealing with? Are we dealing with a mind that is constantly functioning in habits? That is, I am a Catholic, I am a Protestant, I am a whatever it is, I am a Hindu, Buddhist, you follow, I am an American and all the rest of it, which is all conditioned habit. If you say, how is one to be free of that, first one must see the extreme danger of it, not theoretical danger but the actual danger as that of a car coming towards you. Do we actually see the danger of it? Or is it all a theory? When there is seeing the danger, that very seeing is intelligence. And intelligence says, move. There is no conflict. I wonder if I am making myself clear.

Q: I do understand what you are saying on that yet the conditioning is still there.

K: Now, wait. So do we see the danger of conditioning? The danger of being conditioned as an American with all the problems, with all the separate nationalistic - all that problem, does one see the danger of being conditioned?

Q: Obviously not.

K: I don't know, sir, I am asking. Then if you don't see it, now wait a minute, sir, what will make you see it? We have had terrible wars, most appalling destruction both outwardly and inwardly, maimed, blind, tears, agony, despair, that hasn't shown us the danger of nationalism. I am taking that as one issue. Or the danger of dividing the world into groups. We don't see that. Our economic conflict that is going on between countries, that's a danger. If we all got together and said, for god's sake, let's all move together, it is finished. But we don't see the danger. So what will make you or help you to see the danger of being conditioned?

Q: Well...

K: Go into it, sir, look at it carefully, go into it a little bit. If you go to the Arab and say, 'Look, my friend, you are conditioned therefore you are fighting; he would say, 'Get the hell out of here'. Right? 'I am an Arab. The Jews have destroyed my country', and so on and so on. So what makes you - please listen - question the danger of conditioning? Is it because you have leisure? Leisure, you are not immediately in war, you are not immediately challenged about anything, so you say, 'Well, I have time to think about this'. Right? So you only apparently respond when something is tremendously dangerous, either act according to your conditioning, or totally differently from your conditioning. Now which is it? You don't see all this.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Which means, does it mean we are only concerned with being immediately safe, secure? You understand my question? Therefore we don't think about the world, we are not concerned what is happening in the Middle East, Far East, in Europe and in Russia, we are only concerned with our little world of our own making. Right? Is that it?

Q: I keep going back to the simple idea of the car coming at one. And the perception and intelligence and the action of moving away. There is no thought involved there, is there?

K: No.

Q: There is no thought there.

K: No, but that's a form of conditioning which has helped you to preserve yourself physically.

Q: Like that in itself?

K: That itself is part of your conditioning. That's a natural, healthy conditioning.

Q: Is there no emotion there also?

K: No, sir, only there is danger. Look, sir, you haven't experimented with the rattler. Right? You don't say, 'Let me go and play with it and learn', but you have been told for a thousand years or more, be careful of snakes. That is part of your conditioning, which is intelligence, which is natural, which is healthy, but the others are unhealthy, dangerous, and we don't see the danger of it because we are so concerned with the immediate security. Right?

Q: For me personally in my experience I lack the capacity to be able to see the chain of events that brought this destruction upon me, for example, the car, that's immediate, that's easily understood and it is completely within the capacity of my intelligence, but say, when I do an action as I recently had an accident on my bicycle, I had a bag and I placed it around the front, near my spokes in the front wheel and it eventually got caught, I had the capacity to see it.

K: So what makes you see the danger? That's what I am trying to get at.

Q: Waking up.

K: What will make you wake up?

Q: By seeing that the conflicts are what give us pain and agony.

K: My lady, I agree, but what...

Q: But we are conditioned to see pain and agony as important to life. We do not see life without pain.

K: Yes, but what will you do about it?

Q: Until I am tired of the pain and the agony you suffer.

K: So you are saying, through suffering, through pain, through sorrow you will awaken.

Q: No, you are in love with this, nothing will awake you. While each of us thinks we are conditioned about nationality, we are conditioned to enjoy suffering from the day we are born, we are taught that this is what life is. So we all cling to it, we are secure in our agony.

K: So you like your suffering, you like your agony, you like your sorrow, you like the danger - all right, have it.

Q: I don't like it.

K: That's the very essence of neuroticism.

Q: Talking about when we see things and it might be worthwhile if we examined different ways of perceiving things. The point about the car is that you can see it with your own eyes, you don't have time for thought, and when you start talking about smoking and about how we give it up effortlessly, and things like that, I think we have to examine different ways of perceiving things in a different perspective.

K: All right. So you are saying there are different ways of seeing the same thing. You see it in one way, another sees it in another way, I see it in another way and so on and so on, which is our conditioning, obviously. If I am a Hindu, brought up as a Hindu, with all the superstitions, caste, and so on, I see it only that way. That's my conditioning. And you see it your way because of your conditioning. And the opposing conditionings are our problem. So please look at it, we said, let's go deeply into the whole movement of habit-forming. Right? Now just take one incident, small, but it covers a great deal, one incident: you are hurt, psychologically, in the school, in college, university, you are hurt. The hurt comes into being when you compare. Right? When the teacher, or the mother, or the parent say, 'Be as good as your uncle, you must be as clever as your brother', or your aunt, or grandmother. So through comparison you are hurting a person. Right? I wonder if you see that, do we? Come on! No?

Q: Yes.

K: You don't see it?

Q: Yes.

K: Now the hurt has become a habit. Right? Which means that in order to prevent yourself from being hurt further you resist, you build a wall round yourself. In building a wall round yourself you are afraid to be further hurt. And gradually you isolate yourself. Right? Now that is a habit, isn't it? Just take that, a great habit which humanity has learnt: to be hurt and then resist, build a wall round yourself in resisting, isolate yourself, and never explode. Right? So that's become a habit. How will you break that habit? Do please listen to it, quietly. Let me talk for two minutes. I am not prevent you from talking, from expressing, from anything, I am just pointing out. Are you aware of being hurt, going through all the resistance, building and isolating yourself, are you aware of that? Which is a habit. No? Are you aware of this?

Q: Yes.

K: Because I point it out to you, you say, yes, I am aware of it, or are you aware of your hurt for yourself? From that hurt all kinds of neurotic illusory actions take place. Right?

Q: The next question might be, are we aware of the danger of isolation.

K: We are coming to that, sir, first see how we have come to isolation, how we have developed slowly, carefully this sense of being isolated. America is isolated, Russia is isolated, the Jews, the Arabs, the Hindus, are isolated. So do you realize, see, conscious that from being hurt this whole movement takes place?

Q: The problem is the hurt hurts.

K: I am coming to that, sir. Wait. What is it that is hurt?

Q: My image.

K: The image that you have about yourself. If I think I am a very great man and you come along and say, don't be an ass, I feel, good lord, I am hurt, because I have an image about myself, a reputation, this, that and the other. I want a reputation because I think I have found something and nobody will listen to me and so on, I want a reputation. And if I am not respected, if I am not popular, then I am hurt. So the image is hurt. Right? From that hurt all the other things take place. Are you aware of this as a habit? It is habit, a tremendous habit. Now then do you see the danger, the real danger of isolation? Then you have no relationship with anybody, you may pretend, you may say, I am married, I love you, I am this, I am that, I am really in communication with all of you, but if I am hurt isolation is inevitable. Now to see the danger of it, will you see the danger of it through sorrow? You understand?

More sorrow, more pain, more agony?

Q: By the fact that you name it, that's what the result is, and it's immediate and destructive.

K: Yes, but lady, we are asking the same thing: what will make you see the danger? Propaganda? All the magazines telling you, don't be isolated? It wouldn't be a popular magazine anyhow! So please, I am asking you, this is a serious question, what will make human beings awaken to the tremendous danger which they are creating, which they are building?

Q: No matter what we do we are creating a conflict.

K: Perhaps if a few of us understood the nature of conflict and so end conflict in ourselves it may affect the whole world. You don't see all this. So the question then is: what will make you see the danger? Apparently nothing.

Q: Sir, to overcome the point is just to increase the quality and quantity of thought, so thinking about it and trying to understand in general and not particular things but to have and hope that people are going to begin to start just thinking and trying to understand.

K: Sir, look, some of you, unfortunately or fortunately, have listened to me for many years, or you are hearing it for the first time, what will make you see the danger of this thing, isolation? Talk, my talking endlessly, you attending the talks endlessly?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Will earthquakes, lack of water, fire? What will make man transform himself?

Q: When I see even a three year old child is conditioned, it makes me want to act.

K: If you have a two years old child, how you educate, how you bring him up, whether you are conditioned, therefore you will condition the child, it's all so obvious, all this. You are not answering my question if you don't mind my repeating it: what will make you change, drop all this nonsense, which is so fundamentally dangerous for your life, for your children, for the whole world?

Q: You have to see it, not say it is isolation.

K: I am pointing it out to you.

Q: No, but why do you have to say, it's isolation? As soon as you think that don't you breed isolation?

K: Yes, sir, I am using the word `isolation' to convey all that.

Q: So if you say, isolation, you breed it, so why is it necessary to say, I am isolated - just realize it, not put it into words.

K: Then realize it, sir, without my saying it, see it as a danger, the way we are living, which doesn't mean you go and join a little community. That doesn't solve anything. The danger of the way we are living totally, economically, socially, religiously, politically, in every day it is the most desperate danger. You don't see it.

Q: Then if a few people feel like this, and if I don't, then they make their own group, then it's another group.

K: I know, I know, that's just it. Don't join any groups. I am not telling you what to do. Keep out of all groups, keep out of all institutions, keep out of all following anybody.

Q: Sir, doesn't it come down to individual effort?

K: If you like to put it that way. What will make you take interest in this?

Q: To be serious.

K: All right. You have changed the word! What will make you serious?

Q: Sir, observing your own fear.

K: Yes, sir, that's what we are saying. See it sir.

Q: Our isolation allows us no contact, no relationship with anything, not even to danger. This is perhaps why we don't see the danger so what will make us see is intelligence.

K: Do it. Will you drop your hurts, will you drop your isolation?

Q: Sir, I see that natural instinct, or natural conditioning is intelligence, which is awareness. Intelligence is awareness, which is a natural innate thing within us all that is in conjunction with natural environmental things, and to interpret that into a thought and awareness is an intelligence, which can be divided, I think, into a positive and negative.

K: Wait. There is no positive intelligence or negative intelligence, good intelligence or bad intelligence. Intelligence is intelligence.

Q: But rationalizing a habit is an intelligent awareness.

K: No, sir. It is not. Rationalizing is another form of escape from habit.

Q: So what will make us see?

K: What will make you see, sir? Do you ask it from another or from yourself?

Q: Myself.

K: Then what is our response? If you are really honest - I am not saying that you are not - but if one is really honest, and says,

'Why don't I see the danger?', what's your response to it? Go slowly, sir, go slowly. What's your response to it? Your actual response?

Q: My response is that I feel sad that I can't see it.

Q: My response is that I am afraid.

K: Afraid. We dealt with that, sir, fear, we went into it, but that gentleman, I am asking him, do you ask this question of yourself? If you do, what's your response? Now wait a minute, sir. To see danger one must be sensitive, mustn't you? Now how will you become sensitive? Wait, no please, go into it. How will you become sensitive, both physically as well as psychologically, inwardly as well as outwardly, how will you become extraordinarily sensitive to all the danger?

Q: By...

K: Wait. What, sir?

Q: Giving up the fight.

K: No, don't give up anything, sir. We have talked about it. To give up implies conflict, doesn't it?

Q: When we want, I don't know how to say it - when we give up our wants the conflict ends.

K: No, don't give up, sir.

Q: We want to give up, then there is conflict, so the only thing we can do is just lead a life of destructiveness.

K: Yes, sir. Now we said, when a car comes towards you, you are sensitive. You are not blind, you are not deaf, you are not dumb, your body isn't rigid, paralysed, you move which implies a certain quality of sensitivity. Now you don't see the dangers of other much more serious things, so I am suggesting you will see the danger if you are sensitive, psychologically. Now what will make you sensitive? Just listen to it. What will make you sensitive?

Q: By using one's senses.

K: You have used your senses, haven't you?

Q: You have to be willing to experience the feeling from the danger, or whatever.

K: Experience. That means, must you be killed? Must you get drunk until you find out what it is to be sober? Answer me, sir. You all take a drink.

Q: You don't have to do it to experience it.

K: Must you experience at all? I won't enter into that, it's a much larger field.

Q: Sir, a new way of living might create suffering for me and I may be afraid of that suffering, I think fear does enter in here.

K: That's right, sir. You are afraid by giving up your conditioning you may be in greater danger. So what is that? Thought has projected an idea of danger and you are afraid of that idea, but you don't see the danger of conditioning. So please what will make you see the danger, not a particular danger, the danger of the way of our living? I am suggesting first to be aware of the danger one must be sensitive. Right? Which means psychologically you mustn't take drinks, drugs, do things that make you dull. Right? What makes you dull?

Q: My fears.

K: Go slowly. Don't assert. What makes one dull?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do please listen. Just look at yourself, sir. Are you dull because you compare yourself with somebody else? And therefore say, I am dull? Right? I am just asking this. Do you compare yourself with somebody who is extraordinarily bright and clear and all the rest of it, and say, my god, how dull I am compared with that man, or that woman. So I am asking, has that dullness come into being through comparison? Or if you don't compare what takes place? So we have found one factor, that is, we become dull, or we are made dull through comparison. Is that so? So will you stop comparing? That's all.

Q: When I compare, will I notice I am comparing and not believe it?

K: Find out, first stop comparing. Comparing means measurement, to measure one's image against another image. Can you, can one stop comparing? My god! See what happens when you are not comparing? You have thrown off an enormous burden that is making you dull, heavy. Then imitation makes you dull, insensitive, imitation. Right? You know what that word means. Can you drop imitating somebody, following and so on and so on. So if you do these things actually then it is finished, you are extraordinarily sensitive, alive without any pressure, without any burden.

So we will meet again the day after tomorrow if you want to meet.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 13TH APRIL 1978

Krishnamurti: What shall we talk about this morning? You are very quick!

Questioner: May I ask you when there is looking during the day what prevents the attention from being total enough to end the me completely?

K: When one observes why is it not possible to observe totally during the day.

Q: And end the me completely.

K: And bring to an end the me, the I, completely.

Q: You have often referred to yourself as the speaker, but last Tuesday it seemed you weren't even bothered by referring to Krishnamurti as he. Could we examine how language affects the development of ego?

K: Could you examine the language which cultivates the ego; you referred to yourself as the speaker and on other occasions, I, is that cultivation of the 'I'.

Q: Will you please speak about meditation and what is the relation of intuition to insight?

K: Could you talk about meditation and the relationship between insight and intuition.

Q: I think I am going to ask what I asked on Tuesday, could we go into the question of living and acting with integrity in this human desert we have created? Living and acting with integrity in the human desert we have created.

K: Is it possible to act with integrity and what do you mean by that word 'integrity'.

Q: And the problems and pressures involved in doing so in the human society we have now, which we have created.

K: How can one act with integrity in a society in which we have to live. Right, sir.

Q: When I find myself in negative emotions like fear and resentment, how best can I get out of them?

K: How am I to be free myself from negative emotions. I don't know what negative emotions are, so let's go into it.

Q: You have often spoken of the metaphor of jumping away from a car that is coming at you. I have difficulty with this because I feel that instead I am in a veritable fortress of conditioning which would place me into the car in the metaphor which is racing towards a precipice and how do I get out of the car? The point being if you are in the fortress of conditioning looking out, how do you see clearly enough to get out of the fortress or leap from the car?

K: You have used the metaphor, jumping away from a car which is coming towards you and the danger of a precipice, is it possible - I am not quite clear of your question, sir, I am trying to understand it - is it possible to be equally perceptive of the danger of conditioning.

Q: To see it clearly enough when you are entrenched in it.

K: To see the danger clearly enough and jump away from it. Quite.

Q: Could we go into that silence that we talk about that is indescribable when you write because I have can see my noise.

K: I didn't quite catch that, sir.

Q: Can you go into the silence that you write about.

K: Could we go into the question of what it means to be silent.

Q: Could you go into the difference between intensity and desire?

K: Could we examine intensity and desire, what is the relationship between them.

Q: Or the difference between them.

K: Yes. Now just a minute. Yes, please, you can ask all the questions you want, but I don't know where it is going to lead us.

Q: When does the need to secure psychological security for oneself in any form, come totally and completely, to an end?

K: Is there, if I understand it rightly, is there complete and total security psychologically and physically. Is that the question?

Q: The need to secure that security.

K: The need to have that security.

Q: Will that end?

K: Yes. Can that end. The need to have complete and total security both physiologically as well as psychologically, can that end.

Q: I want to continue something you were talking about last time: you talked about is it possible to look at one's habits without direction, without wishing to change, and not compare oneself with another, and yet there is this desire to transform oneself which I find becomes an entrenched idea in the mind, a goal. And then the question of technique comes up, or how, so despite all the efforts again I find myself looking towards the 'how', the technique, and again looking in a direction.

K: Yes, I understand. You have heard the question, need I repeat it? All right. Now may I - just a minute, I am not asking you to stop asking questions, I don't know which of these questions we are going to ask, there are so many of them.

Q: Meditation, insight and intuition.

K: What were you going to say, sir?

Q: I was going to ask if right action is not according to a blueprint how can one ascertain if what one is doing is correct?

K: What is right action. Yes?

Q: What is implied in being a total human being?

K: What does it mean, or what is the significance of being totally a human being. Now which of these questions would we take?

Q: What is right action.

K: What is right action. Could we take that?

Q: Mr Krishnamurti, you speak sometimes of choiceless awareness and in other words one should be totally aware and what if one is born into slavery, and for example, Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King and these people, if they hadn't stood up and thought, in a sense, their people would be still in a much more unrespected place.

K: I understand. So what is the question?

Q: How can one be aware and be without conflict?

K: Yes, could we talk over together the question which may cover all the other questions, what is correct action, given all the circumstances, what society is, what religions are, what other people have said and so on and so on, what is correct action in our life, living in modern society? Could we discuss that?

Audience: Yes.

K: Yes, sir, what were you going to say?

Q: Please cover why we do not take right action. Why are we so confused?

K: Yes, can we take that question, which might cover all other questions: what is correct action, could we go into that? Do you want to discuss that? Yes sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I can't hear you, sir. Could we go into this question of what is correct action? Would that be worth while discussing and is that what you are really interested in? Could we go into that?

Audience: Yes.

K: Right. When we use the word `correct', don't we mean accurate, an action which is not only correct for the day or in certain circumstances, correct right throughout one's life. Would you agree to the definition or the expression of that word, correct, right, accurate action throughout life, not under varying circumstances - could we go into that? Is that what you want to discuss? Please tell me, I don't know.

Audience: Yes.

K: Good! Does accurate action depend upon opinion? Your opinion and another's opinion, or the opinion of a scientist or a person who is very well read, full of knowledge. When we talk about correct action is it a specialized action? Please, this is a discussion, a dialogue. Is it an action not based on a conclusion: you may have your own particular conclusion and another may have another, his own and therefore each conclusion and acting according to that conclusion may be incorrect action. Or your experience tells you what is correct action, another's experience perhaps different tells him, that is the correct action. So we are asking does correct action depend on knowledge, opinion, choice, experience?

Q: You said, is it a specialized action.

K: Is action dependent on a specialized attitude, specialized knowledge, specialized as a scientist, as a businessman, as a psychologist, as a religious man and so on, does it depend on specialized knowledge?

Q: No.

K: I am asking, I am not saying yes, or no. Does it depend on opinions?

Q: Sir, I am trying to get to action which does not conflict with other's actions. Or I may have my own feeling of what is right but then someone else will have a feeling what he thinks is right.

K: That's right, that's what we are saying, sir.

Q: So therefore there will be conflict if we both hang on to what we both think is right.

K: That's what we said. So we are asking, does correct action depend on conclusions, yours or another's, opinions, judgements, evaluations and conclusions. You understand? Does it depend on those?

Q: It does from the physical standpoint like the act of driving a car, for example.

K: According to one's genes? According to one's character - character being the cultivation of certain types of resistance to a particular society and so on.

Now please just listen, let's find out. I am not saying this is correct, or this is correct, I want to find out, if I may, as a human being I want to find out what is correct action throughout life.

Throughout life not just for one or two years and then slip back and so on. I want to find out for all my life so that correct action implies no conflict, no contradiction, no imposition. There is no correct action under pressure. So one must find out what is correct action. How will you find out? So we are asking, does it depend on time, culture, environment, what other people have said, including the greatest religious teachers, if there are any, and so on and so on. So what is - now wait a minute, let me put the question differently. How do you approach this question?

Q: We don't know what correct action is.

Q: We won't know until the time comes.

K: There is the question, please just listen. I am not asking or oppressing you or pressurizing you to listen, you have asked a question: you said, what is correct action in life. How do you approach this question? You understand? How you approach it will dictate the discovery of right action. So how do you as a human being approach this question?

Q: Openly.

K: What do you mean by that word `openly'?

Q: Realize we don't know anything at all about correct action.

K: So we say, I don't know what is the correct action, so my approach is, I don't know. Is that it?

Q: We may know only what is incorrect action.

K: You may know what is incorrect action. Do you? No, please, you haven't answered my question. Forgive me, sir. How do you approach such an enormous complex question of, what is correct action? That lady says, openly.

Q: May be if we knew what is action.

K: We are coming to that, madam. How do you approach either action or correct action, what is your way into it?

Q: With intelligence.

K: What do you mean by that word? I am not quibbling over words but we must be clear when we use certain words, like intelligence, openly and so on, that we understand exactly, you and the speaker and others, the meaning of that word 'intelligence'.

Q: Look for the obvious.

K: What is the obvious?

Q: We need to set a goal through which these actions come.

K: A goal? Are you approaching it with a motive, with an object in view, with a purpose, with a goal?

Q: All goals are set to be broken. If we had a goal it would certainly dictate.

K: Of course. So what is your approach? Look, sir, this is a very, very complex question because if the mind is in contradiction and I am not aware that I am in contradiction and try to answer this question it will be too silly. So I have to find out for myself how, in what manner I come to the question, in what manner I receive the question, in what way I look at that question, because the way I look at it, the way I approach it, if there is a motive, that dictates, directs my enquiry into it. So how does each one approach this question? Are we aware how we approach it? Are you and I approaching it through some conclusion? Are we approaching it through a particular opinion, fixed idea? If we are we shall never find out, obviously. So I am asking, shouldn't there be freedom from all this to find out, from prejudice, from conclusions, from opinion, from a belief and so on and so on?

Q: If you approach it with the idea that every thought you have regarding the subject comes from the past.

K: Yes, sir, that's what I am saying. How do you approach it?

Q: I would observe the thoughts that arise.

K: Do it, sir. The thought that arises, will that thought help to bring about correct action?

Q: The observation of the thought is limited.

K: So when one realizes thought is limited and exercises thought to find out what is correct action, that action will also be limited. So do we realize that thought is limited and therefore if thought approaches this question then obviously it is limited?

Q: Must we not approach it in silence?

K: Can you approach it in silence - now what do you mean by that word `silence'?

Q: A quiet heart.

Q: A mind that is not occupied.

K: Look, please, this is just theories. Are you actually doing it or just throwing out words hoping that it will be correct? You see if I...

Q: You have to develop your intuition.

K: Oh, develop your intuition - what do you mean by that word `intuition'? You see. Would you kindly find out, as this is a very complex question, shouldn't you come to it with freedom to find out? Not offer your opinions, your conclusions, your judgements, your ideas, but come to it with a freedom to find out. Can we do that?

Q: If there is a judgement or a conclusion that I am aware of, that I can bring to it, to suppress it or put it aside certainly wouldn't help.

K: Therefore you won't find out what is correct action, will you?

Q: No.

K: Therefore can't one put those aside?

Q: I put them aside but I see they creep up again.

K: No. This is an important question, isn't it? This demands your energy, doesn't it to find it? This demands that you are aware of your limited thoughts and so on and so on. So you say, as this is most important to find out, as it is essential to find out, as it is of the greatest necessity, you naturally drop the others. Don't you? If you see this is the greatest importance the others don't play any part - your conclusions, your opinions, your judgements, your beliefs, opinions and so on.

Q: Is it not necessary to go into it to find out what your opinions and ideas are?

K: If you want to. Is it not necessary, the lady asks (noise of bells)-can we go on in spite of that?

Audience: Yes.

K: The lady asks, is it not necessary to go into the question of why we have opinions, why we always function according to some conclusion, why do we have strong beliefs, all that, should we examine all that?

Q: Yes.

K: Why do you have opinions, about politics, about god, about me, about XYZ, why do you have opinions?

Q: Because we are compassionate, we care.

K: Because we have no compassion we have opinions, is that it?

Q: Because we have compassion therefore we have opinions.

K: Ah! We have compassion therefore we have opinions. What a statement to make: we have compassion and therefore we have opinions.

Q: No, that is not what I said. We have compassion therefore we care, not that we have opinions, but we are being attentive to the need of the moment because we have compassion.

Q: But how do you form an opinion - that's the question. Why do we have opinions?

Q: Well, I'm against them.

K: I didn't catch that. I missed that joke.

Q: She said she was against opinions. That lady said, why do we have opinions; and that lady said, I am against opinions.

Q: Opinions could be the illusion of security.

Q: Some people even sell their opinions.

K: All the editorials.

Q: Like a flea-market.

K: Yes.

Q: Isn't a judgement an opinion?

K: Thank god those bells have stopped!

Q: Could we just say that opinions are part of the reality of thought?

K: Would you kindly consider - I am not saying you should but would you kindly consider why your minds are so occupied that you can't look even at this question. You understand? Why you have so many ideas about it, why you should have opinions, why you should not have opinions, it is necessary, compassion, etcetera, etcetera - can't you just listen to the question first? One means by listening, giving attention to the question. You know what you think, you know what you feel, you have your own conclusion, can't you put those aside for a minute, for a few seconds even, and listen to the question itself? What does the question imply? Is there correct action at all? We want to find out what is correct action, but our minds are so confused, so uncertain, so opinionated we can't even listen to the beastly question.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am afraid I can't hear, madam.

Q: She is questioning the word `correct', she is saying that perhaps the word itself is a danger.

K: Look, madam, we don't know what that word `correct' means yet, we don't know what action means yet, we have to first listen to the question, not oppose the question, not agree with the question, or deny the question, but first listen to some question that a man has asked. He said, I'd like to find out in my life before I die what is correct action throughout my life - he is asking that.

Q: Sir, if we can listen, truly listen in freedom, there is no question.

Q: You are asking, why are you asking?

K: No, forgive me, sir, I am just asking, if you don't mind, would you listen please to the question. That's all.

Q: Can we listen?

K: Apparently you can't. That's a simple fact.

Q: What is listening?

K: When your wife or husband or girl or boy says, `I love you', do you listen? Or you take it for granted? In the same way, do you listen when a serious question is put about life, which involves what is action, and if there is accurate, true action which has no conflict, which doesn't bring regret, which doesn't bring fear, etcetera, etcetera, he is asking that question. Please listen. And you say, what do you mean by listening. I mean by listening, with attention, with care, with affection, with a sense of responsibility, which doesn't bring guilt - just listen. And apparently that is one of the most difficult things here that we are facing, that we don't listen. Now what will persuade you to listen?

Q: Understanding.

K: No, sir, just listen to the question.

Q: May I try to answer your question?

K: If you like.

Q: I tried to talk last time about perception and the way you see things; and you talk about a car coming at you and you jump. If you stop and think about the car coming towards you, it's over, there's no decision to make, there is no action to make because it's hit you. If you don't stop and think because you see what is happening, you jump. So in order to get that action which is correct for the moment for that situation you have eliminated thought. So I suggest that in order to get correct action in any situation you have to eliminate thought, you have to perceive the situation exactly as it is, your own position in the correct perspective of it, not just a part of it but perception of the whole and then there is only one action that can be made.

K: Madam, I have listened to it, I have listened to your question, your answer, but you haven't, forgive me if I point out, you haven't found out if you are listening to what the speaker has to say. He is asking, do you listen to this question at all, because - please understand this - it is a very complex question. And if you don't listen even to the question how can you answer anything about it? That's why when somebody says to you, 'I love you' and he means it, he says it with his heart, with his mind, he feels totally that he loves you, do you listen? Or do you say, 'Yes, what do you mean by that?' Or do you argue? Do you love me more than the previous girl or man? It is something he wants to tell you and you don't have even the courtesy to listen. I am not bullying you but I am just finding out how impossible this is becoming.

So, sir, what is correct action? If we say, I really don't know, then we can begin. You understand? I really don't know what is correct action in life, because that is such a tremendous question. First of all, what is action? What do we mean by action? The word 'action' means doing, acting in the present, not in the future, but our action is according to some principle, according to some ideals, or according to some standardized memory. Right? I wonder if you see. So we are never acting. The verb 'to act' means to do, to do means the movement in the present. Is there a present? You understand? Or is the present contaminated by the past? Tremendous things are involved in this question. So I must find out if what I do is based on a remembrance, on some hope, on some desperation, guilt and so on, which is all the past. So can the mind observe action which is springing from the past? That's one problem. And the other is: is one acting according to some ideal, a principle, according to some goal, a purpose, which is in the future, the Utopia? Then I am acting according to something that may be or might be in the future, which is not acting. Right, sirs? So I have to find out if there is an action that is totally in the present, uncontaminated by the past or the future. Is that possible? You understand my question?

Q: Sir, in saying that there is another question, what is now?

K: I am doing that, sir. The present is the now.

Q: That is another question, what is the now?

K: Is there such a thing as the now, what does it mean? It means it must be totally independent of the past and the future, which is, is there a time which is not a movement? I am going into it, sir.

There are scientists here, I must be very careful! First of all, time is movement, the movement from the past through the present to the future, if that movement is a movement of time then the now is non-existent. Right? Please understand this. It is non-existent. It's only when time stops as a movement then the present is. You won't understand this. Right, sir? So the now is without time. Do you see? So I see that, I apprehend it, I don't know quite if it is correct, if it is true, I just observe it, I don't say, yes, I've got it. I observe that all our actions, whatever they be, noble, ignoble, personal, communal, every type of action is based either, as it is now, on the past, memory, remembrance, or on some Utopian ideal. Right?

This is a fact. So all that implies there is no acting, you are acting according to a principle, to a memory. And I call that non-action. I don't know if you understand this. If I say, I love you, because I remember the pleasures that you have given me, or the comfort, the encouragement, this or that, is that love? Is love based on a remembrance? So then I have to enquire whether that remembrance which is bringing about action and so on, can that remembrance, the tape that has recorded stop? All that is implied in this one thing.

Then also I have to find out what is correct action. What is correct? Is it according to you, or according to him, or according to some divinity, or some idea? I don't know. So I have to say, look, what is correct action? First of all there must be no contradiction in it. Right? It mustn't come out of some fear, it mustn't come out of some pleasure, it mustn't come out of some future hope. So I must find out if my thinking can ever find out what is correct, what is accurate, or is it nothing to do with thought? You follow all this? Perhaps you are not interested in all this. So you see how very complex the question is.

Q: What am I going to look with if I am not looking with my thought?

K: What am I looking if I am not looking with my thought.

Q: What am I going to look with?

K: What am I going to look with if I don't use my thought. We have been through this.

Q: Another way to put it might be, who is going to act?

K: I am going to show you in a minute, who is going to act.

Q: Every cell in your body acts.

K: All right. Yes, we don't deny that. Are you really interested in this?

Audience: Yes.

K: I am not sure.

Q: Haven't we already done something by the time out thought is going?

K: I don't know, madam. Personally I have always been interested to find out what is correct action. Because if there is no correct action there is unhappiness, there is regret, there is a kind of saying, 'I wish I hadn't done that, I wish I had done that' and so on, this constant battle going on if I don't act truly, correctly, accurately. So I have to find out. Now how do I find out? Because it's very clear that thought is limited, thought cannot possibly find out what is correct action because whatever it does is very limited, broken up, therefore it never can be correct. Right? This is fairly obvious because you can look at it with reason, with logic, you can see it. So action born of thought can never be correct. You know that is a tremendous thing to discover. Not be told, not, you've said that, please explain it - I'll explain it but for each one of us to discover it, that thought is limited, it is limited because it is based on memory and memory can never be complete. You may gather more and more and more information, more and more facts, but it is still limited. The word 'more' is limited, therefore thought is relative, therefore incomplete, is broken up, is a fragment of something which is based on memory. Right? So thought cannot answer this question. Then what will? You understand? If thought cannot possibly answer this enormous complex question of correct action, what do we mean by correct, what do we mean by accurate, true and what is action. We are using logic not some brave ideas about it. Action can only be when there is only the acting, not, I have acted, or will act. I wonder if you see all this.

There is only acting. If that acting is based on some past memories, conclusions, hurts, fears, then it is coloured by the past, therefore that action undergoes various types of modification, therefore it is not accurate action. Therefore I say to myself, is it possible to be free of the past and act? Which sounds most extraordinary, it's idiotic, unreasonable. So I say, wait, let's find out if it is unreasonable. That is, I want to find out any action born out of some memory, that action must be incomplete. Right? So then what is action which is totally complete? You understand? I wonder if you are following all this. So what is total action? Now total, I mean by that word `whole'? Whole implies healthy, physical health, that word implies sanity because otherwise if the mind is insane, as most people's minds are, neurotic and confused, then you can find out. So I say to myself, is my mind sane, can it think objectively, not personally, not according to my pleasure, can it think clearly? So whole means having a healthy body, and also having a sane, clear, healthy mind, not drugged mind, a mind that has been ruined by drugs, by drink, alcohol and all the rest of it. Then whole means also holy, h-o-l-y. I don't know what holy is yet but I am enquiring. So is it possible to perceive action as a whole? You understand? Whole being healthy, sane and holy, is there such action which is never contradictory, from the age of twenty until you die there is an action that is complete all the time? I am talking to myself, you are following all this, I hope - not following, don't follow, but observe it in yourself.

So one has discovered for oneself that thought acting can never be whole, therefore thought whatever it acts upon or does will be incomplete, incorrect, limited. Then the problem is, is there an ending to thought? And if there is an ending what is action then? One has only known action according to some principle, some idea, some conclusion, some remembrance, hurt and so on and so on, according to that one acts. But if all that doesn't exist then what is action? You are following all this? Then action may have a totally different meaning, not, I acting. So I cannot find out action which will have a totally different significance if I am confused, you follow, all that is going on in my mind. So how am I - how is the mind to be free from its occupation? You understand my question?

Q: How is the mind to set itself in order?

K: Now is that a right question or a wrong question? Just listen. She asked a question. She says, how is the mind to set itself in order. Is that a right question, or a question that will lead to some wrong conclusion?

Q: Can the mind set itself in order?

K: Did you say that?

Q: No, that's another question.

K: Ah! That's a different question altogether. Can the mind set itself in order, that's a totally different question. Now who is to set it in order? Some external agency, the environment, the politicians, the priests, the society, the culture? You understand? All that, which is your own thinking. So can the mind - I am only asking what is correct action, not what is order yet, because when there is correct action the mind is totally in order.

So without order there is no correct action. Right? So what is order? The politicians will say, that is order; the dictators will say, this is order; and the priests and everybody says different things about order. So what is order? Is order according to a blueprint? According to the Bible, according to some figure in the Bible? Is it laid down by some religious fanatics? Is it a conclusion of some scientists? So how are we going to find out what is order? You can only find out what is order if you understand what is disorder. Right? So don't you live in disorder? What is disorder to you? You see, we are going away from this thing.

Q: The fear and conflict give it continuity, they are disorder.

K: What is that, sir?

Q: Well, if it was a whole that means it would be free of conflict.

K: How can a mind that is so confused, so disorderly, saying one thing, doing another, thinking about something and doing quite the opposite to what he is thinking, how can such a mind find out what is order? All that it can do is to say, why is my mind so terribly disorderly.

Q: We cannot use thought if we want to arrive at the place where we can seek order. This is what I hear you say, is that correct?

K: Madam, it is not what the speaker is saying, please, these are facts put before you.

Q: I see that as fact. I wanted to know if you were clear. Now if order is to be sought, what do we do? We first of all have to watch our process of thinking, and in watching that process we do not judge, we do not compare, we listen completely with attention, and then in the process of not judging, not comparing and not allowing that thought to be there, something happens.

K: Look here, madam, you have said some things which point to some other direction, which is you say when there is complete attention, when you say, 'when there is complete attention' there is no attention. Right? When I say, 'when I am attentive this will happen', which means I am not attentive now. No?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I understand, sir. Now what is the speaker to do? You are all here, and you all have expressed, what is the speaker to do? He wants to tell you something, which is, there is an action which is totally, absolutely correct right through life, and for that you have to listen to it, find out for yourself. Which means find out what is action. Is your action based on the past, on some memory, or is your action based on some Utopian ideal? If it is based on some Utopian ideals, it is such a monstrous thing to live in the future. Or it is a monstrous thing to live in the past. Are you? If you are, then you will never find out what is correct action. It is as simple as that. So how will you find out whether you are living in the past? To be aware that you are doing it. Or if you have ideals, marvellous super super ideals, perfect Utopia - you are somewhere far away.

Q: This correct action, will it be different for different people?

K: No. Correct action is correct action whether it is yours, mine or his.

Q: But what are the things that I do with my mind, and other people do, and I look at you and I say, you are acting correctly, now I am going to try to follow the way you act.

K: Then you are merely a follower, therefore a destroyer. I wonder if you have understood that? If you follow somebody you are destroying that person, and yourself.

Q: What perceives correct action?

K: What perceives correct action - it is a good question if you will go into it. Who will see what is correct action? Now we see from the past, don't we? No? And that is the 'me', I, who says, 'I observe correct action'. Right? The 'me' is the essence of the past. No? My memories, my pleasures, my mistakes, my regrets, my anxieties, my hopes, despairs, attachments, all that is the `me'.

Right? All that is based on something that has happened. Or the `me' is what I shall be, what I must be, what I am going to be. So the `me' is either in the past or in the future, the `me' never exists now. I wonder if you see that. You see that's a tremendous discovery, not just words. Is there a `me' that is neither the past nor the future?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is the `me' the result of time? Right? It is the result of time.
Time is a movement from here to there both physically as well as psychologically. So it is of time. Time is the movement also of thought. So thought has put together the `me', and the `me' is thought. This is all logic, reason, and we object to reason apparently - we call them egg-heads or something or other.

Q: Sir, when we speak isn't that based on our memories and therefore incorrect action?

K: Quite right, sir, quite right. But what you said is correct, but find out, sir...

Q: At present I am constructing the `me', that's what I am doing.
What I am now is from my memories, that's what I am.

K: That gentleman asked a question, sir, didn't you. What was the question, sir?

Q: While we are speaking we are using memories.

K: That's right, that's right, sir. When we use language, when there is the usage of language, the language is recorded, memorized and the words express that memory. Right? And all the rest of it. So language drives us. We went into that the other day, if you were there. And we, we never use language. There is a difference. The instrument uses us but we never use the instrument. It may be that we are the instrument, there is not, 'we use the instrument'. Wait, sir this is quite important. I want to tell you something so I use language; I know language is memory, cultivated, carefully learnt and stored up word by word, syntax, adjectives, adverbs and all the rest of it, verbs and so on, it is all through constant repetition of words, it has been stored up. Right? But also the word is never the thing. Right? The word 'tree' is not the actual tree. Right? So if you and I understand that the word is not the thing, that the description - I may describe the mountain but the mountain is different from the description - if you and I understand that very clearly then we are not slaves to words. I wonder if I am making myself clear? Right? We are not slaves to words therefore is there - this is too complex. I'll go on with it. Is there a talking, an expression, a saying, using the language but without the emotional, other reactions entering into the word? I wonder if I am making myself clear? No, please, this is extraordinarily difficult. Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, he asked a question, which was: aren't you speaking when you use words from memory.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I haven't understood, sir.

Q: When you go beyond the word I understand the message.

K: No. There is no message.

Q: It is a feeling, you can sense it instead...

K: I am sorry, sir, forgive me, but I can't get your meaning.

Q: Sir, I'd rather listen to you.

K: I would rather listen to the birds! You are not meeting me at all, sir. Look, sir, we have asked the most tremendously complex question: what is correct action. You have never finished it, you won't let the speaker or yourself find out, you are always projecting, projecting, you never find out. Now when we leave you won't know what correct action is. Right? As we have so far discussed you won't realize or see what is correct action for yourself because you are constant interrupting yourself.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, may I ask, if I may, have you found out for yourself what is correct action at the end of an hour and a half? Please, sir, listen, I beg of you. Have you found out for yourself, all of us, what is correct action? Have you?

Audience: No.

K: Good! Why? You have spent nearly an hour and a half talking about it, why haven't you found out?

Q: Because everyone is so full of their own questions.

K: That's right. All this indicates, if I may most respectfully point out, that you are not interested in the question at all.

Q: Sir...

K: If you were really interested, vitally, you would shed blood over this, tears to find out. I am afraid we want to lead a soft comfortable life. Yes, sir?

Q: I would say that perhaps correct action is when we do not impose our will on life.

K: Sir, that is a definition. I am not interested in definitions. I want to find out for myself a way of living which will not be contradictory, which will have no regrets, which will not be under pressure, of fear, of hope or despair, nothing, I want to find out what is correct action throughout my life.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, at the end of it I am asking you, an hour and a half nearly, have you found out? No. Why? Are you interested in this?

Q: Yes.

K: I am not sure. Interested so that it's your life you are giving.

Q: Sir we were talking about language.

K: I am not.

Q: But we were talking about language.

K: Because he raised that question, yes.

Q: May we get back to it?

K: We can do it, sir, but have you found out at the end of it what is correct action? That's what we started out with. Language, we can learn a great deal about language, the usage of words, how the words are formed, what is the root of words and so on, go into it, but does that solve the problem which we raised at the beginning which is: what is correct action throughout life? The speaker has given his life to it to find out. He doesn't want to live in contradiction, it has no meaning, or on some memory, which has awakened some regrets, hurts, all that is absurd when you want to find out what is correct action. You watch it, you observe it, you go into it with all your vitality, energy, intensity to find out.

So I am afraid you haven't found it, until you find it one lives a miserable, confused, contradictory life. And if you are satisfied with that, that's perfectly all right. I am not telling you what is correct action. If I were to tell you what is correct action it would be a blueprint. Then it would be totally incorrect action. Then it would be based on authority, or he says, that is correct action, I think it is not correct action - so we are back again. So unless you are very, very serious about this, one leads rather a shabby empty life. If that is the way you think to live, live it. May I finish now?

Q: Will you go into again at the weekend?

K: Yes, we will do it in a different way at the weekend.

OJAI 5TH PUBLIC TALK 15TH APRIL 1978

I wonder if we should apologise for the weather!

We have been talking about the pressure that one bears in so many ways, which obviously must distort our thinking, our whole life. We talked about the linguistic pressure, the idealistic, the fears, the pleasures, the desires and so on. I think we ought also to talk about other things, perhaps somewhat much more seriously. We are apt, I am afraid, to take one part of what we have been talking about and try to investigate that one part, or try to understand that one segment of life. I think we ought to understand the whole of the field of life, the whole area of our existence, from the beginning of our birth until we die.

So we ought to consider what is the wholeness of life, what is the structure and nature of our whole consciousness, its content, and what is the state of the mind that is free from all pressures and therefore can act correctly, truly, without any distortion. And that's what we are going to perhaps this morning investigate together into this question: what is the wholeness of life, the totality of life, not one part or one segment, or one fragment, a broken piece, but can we understand and go into this whole problem, not as one problem which is detached from other problems, but see that all problems of our life are totally, completely interrelated, acting upon each other, shaping the problem according to circumstances, environment and our pressures. So that's what we are going to do this morning, if we may, together, and I mean again, let me repeat, together, to investigate, find out whether one can perceive, observe, or be aware of the whole of existence - economic, social, ethical, religious, spiritual, death, love, sorrow, and the implications of meditation, and what is there in meditation that is so important. That's what, if we may, we will go into together.

The other morning, in the other place, we were talking about correct action, action not based on some memory, some hurt, fear, or an action which is based on what one likes to do, which are all, it seems to one, distorting, deforming the actual action. We talked a little bit about it; we said that action is only - the active present of that word, to act, is always now, at the moment. And we said, the past modifies that action, and if one has a future ideal one is acting according to some Utopian, conceptual, theoretical ideas and therefore it is not action. Right action is when neither the future nor the past interfere with the present. That is, when time comes to an end, which is now.

So we have to enquire into the question of what is time. May we? Is that all right? Shall we go on with this? Because that is part of our life, and perhaps that may be the whole of our life, this complex problem of time. What is time? Time surely is a movement from this to that, both physically as well as psychologically: one moves from here to one's home, that will take time, to reach a certain place, it will take time, that's a movement from here to there. And also there is the psychological time from the past, through the present, to the future. The past being modified through the present, but the past modified continues into the future. That's a movement. Is that fairly clear. And this movement is essentially the movement of thought. One is here in this hall, and it will take time to go home. And also psychologically 'what is', the actual, and 'what should be' - the pursuit of 'what should be' is a movement from 'what is', to 'what might be', 'what shall be', 'what must be'. That's a movement of thought. Thought has created the 'what is', the actual, the real, whether that reality is illusory or actual - all right, may I go on, are we all following each other? And thought projects 'what should be', that's the ideal. So there is the movement from 'what is' to 'what should be', which is the movement of time, in any direction, vertical or horizontal, subliminal, or linear, in line. That is the movement of thought. If you have noticed for yourself you will see that thought has created, brought about the actual, the real, 'what is' - my anger, my jealousy, my fear and so on and so on and so on, 'what is' - and moves to 'what should be'. Right? That movement is still time and thought. So our minds are occupied with this, with time and thought, this constant movement, this constant chattering, constant occupation, which is a movement - from the kitchen, bathroom to meditation, to relationship, jealousy, it's a movement, that's our whole life, from the moment we are born until we die, a constant restless chattering, endless movement. You must have noticed this. That is the nature of time. That is, perhaps, the whole of our life; in whatever direction we move it is still the movement from a centre to something thought has projected. Right?

That is, we are always acting from a centre. You must have noticed too, if you are at all aware, if one is at all serious, there is always a centre from which you are moving. And that centre is made up of the things which thought has brought about - the 'me', with all the desires, urges, reactions, with all the longings, the loneliness, the misery, the confusion. And from that centre we move, we act, and thinking takes place from that centre. Again this is obvious if you have observed yourself a little.

So there is this problem: time as movement, time as thought, and thought which has created the 'me', the centre, so the centre is moving constantly. Right? I want this, I don't want it, I must have it, I must not have it, I am unhappy, I must be happy, I want more, I want less - it is this endless movement of time and thought. That is the whole movement of our consciousness: I must get that, I must not get that, I want to be successful, but I am not capable of being successful - therefore there is a sense of unfulfillment, misery, confusion, jealousy, and so on. This is again very obvious. I hope we are thinking this out together.

Now, let's make this very clear: we are not analysing, we are merely observing. When you analyse there is a division between the analyser and the analysed, so that division creates conflict, the analyser saying, this is not right, this should be that. But the analyser is starting from a centre. right? The centre which is the accumulation of the past, past information, past knowledge, past analysis and that analyser is then analysing, but the analyser is the analysed. I wonder if you see this. Please, this is really very important. If you really, deeply see this, not because the speaker says so, if you see the rationality, the truth of it, that the analyser is the analysed, the thinker is the thought, the experiencer is the experience - if you once see that, analysis comes totally to an end. Then a different process comes into being. Can we go on with this? Have we understood, please I am not persuading you to think in any particular direction, I am not trying to pressure you to buy this, or not buy that, I am not a commercial person, I am not selling you a thing. But unless one understands this fundamental principle, that is, the analyser, the thinker, the experiencer, is the experience, is the thought, is the analysed. Once you have that insight into that then one can observe without analysis, let the map unfold and tell you what it is. I wonder if you see. Is this somewhat clear?

That is, we are used to tell what it should be, what it must be, describe, go into it, but we never allow the fact to tell us - no, no, the fact to reveal itself. You are always telling the fact what it must do, we never let the fact tell its story. It can only tell its story if you are listening, if you observe. Right? Then you listen with care, with attention, watching every detail, every movement, which has nothing whatsoever to do with analysis. Perhaps this may be rather difficult because most of us are highly educated, conditioned, accepting analytical process as the way out of our confusion, out of our misery, out of our neurotic habits, we are so conditioned by that, that we have never questioned it, we have never said there may be a different way altogether. One of the unfortunate facts is that we like to obey, we like to follow, we like somebody who says, 'I know, I will tell you all about it'. And you being rather gullible, if I may say so, accept it, you never question. And to question there must be doubt, a scepticism, healthy, normal scepticism, but to have this normal scepticism, doubt one must be free of fear. And also doubt must be kept on a leash, like you keep a dog on a leash, doubt must be kept on a leash, one must know when to let it go, run at full speed. And also when it shouldn't run. All this needs a great sense of awareness, attention. Right?

So when there is no analysis whatsoever - you understand, this is quite difficult for a mind that has been analysing all its life, when all the propaganda says, analyse. When the professional people, the analysts, are encouraging analysis, we laymen we are so caught in that we just accept it. But I think there is a totally different way of looking, which can only come about when one realizes the whole nature and the structure of analysis, and therefore you abandon it, let go, not fight it but letting it go, then there is only observation of the fact, and the fact tells you what it is; not you tell the fact what it is, but the fact, the 'what is', the actual, the real, tells you what it is. Then it opens itself up completely, both the unconscious as well as the layers below the conscious. I wonder if you follow this. Are we following all this a little bit?

That's what we are doing now, we are observing without analysis the whole movement of time; not only the chronological time by the watch, but also the whole psychological time which has been invented by thought - I am in despair, one day I will have hope and fulfil. You understand this? I am not good, but I will be good. The 'better' is the enemy of the good. Right? Isn't it? Goodness has no future. Right? It is good, not, it will become good. So the flowering of goodness can only take place when there is no time. At least, please, even grasp intellectually, see the reason, the logic of it, and then let the logic end and observe what is going on. You follow? Don't, if I may point out, don't let reason function all the time, because reason is just thought, and thought in order, in sequence, but when the sequence is not proper there is disorder, illogical, unreasonable, neurotic, but when the sequence is right, which is mathematics - I won't go into that for the moment - when the sequence is right then reason finds there is an action which is not based on logic, reason, conclusion. I wonder if you are getting all this.

So we are observing only the fact that thought is time, thought as time created the centre, from that centre we act. And therefore all action is illogical, is not accurate. That's one problem, whether it is possible to act, to live - please listen, find out whether it is possible to live, act, without a centre. Do you understand? One has to find out, one has to investigate, not accept it, because it demands a discipline which comes out of observation - not the discipline that you impose. You know the word 'discipline' comes from the word 'disciple', disciple who is learning. Right? Not the disciplined mind, but the disciple who is learning and the very act of learning has its own order. Whereas for most of us discipline has become an imposition, conforming to a pattern, like a soldier, highly disciplined to kill. The Roman soldier, somewhere I was told, perhaps in Italy, the ancient Roman soldier was trained to kill for twenty-five cents, it only took twenty-five cents to train him. So little. But now it has gone up into millions. That is civilization.

So we are not imposing any will in observation. Do you see that? We are not saying, 'I must observe', then there is the pressure, then your observation is distorted. So one must learn the art of observing without pressure. And in that observation one asks, is it possible to have no centre at all? And what then is action without a centre; what then is life without a centre? Please ask yourself that question, not me asking you to ask. You understand, having a centre is the very essence of sorrow. Right? Need that be explained? It has to be explained? Right. The centre creates the tomorrow, thought which is the centre, which is the movement of time, creates the tomorrow. And in the tomorrow there is hope, in the present there is despair. Right? In the present there is ignorance, in the tomorrow there is knowledge. In the centre is the attachment. Right? Am I making this clear? The centre is attached to you, and in that attachment there is pain, there is anxiety, there is fear, there is jealousy. I am attached to you, and you may leave me, you may go after somebody else, or look at somebody else, or sleep with somebody else, so in that attachment there is sorrow, there is pain, there is tremendous sense of not only guilt but anxiety. Right? This again we are observing, we are not analysing. So that centre is the essence of sorrow. Is that clear? No, not verbally clear but for yourself, in observing yourself that centre is the state of sorrow.

So you ask the question: is there an action which is not of the centre and therefore which is not of sorrow? You understand all this? Don't go to sleep, please! This is a very serious question. One observes very cautiously, hesitantly, listening to the centre, what the centre is saying; it is saying, 'I am the cause and the essence of misery, confusion, sorrow'. And the question is then: can I live without sorrow, is there a living without sorrow? Do you understand my question? Come on sirs! That is, is there a living without attachment? Is there a living without loneliness? Most of us are lonely, loneliness is the essence of isolation. And most of us whether we know it or not are actually creating, functioning in isolation. Right? So one asks, is it possible to live without isolation? Not the isolation brought about from hurt, the hurt which makes you build a wall round yourself and therefore isolate yourself. We are asking a much deeper question, which is, this sense of great loneliness, sense of deep unfathomable dissatisfaction, discontent: the dissatisfaction with everything.

Have you been through all this? Do you understand all this? Not dissatisfaction with one particular thing, but the flame of dissatisfaction, not with the object of dissatisfaction, not the cause of dissatisfaction, but the very burning of it.

And one asks, as the centre is the cause of all this, attachment with its anxiety, fear, and the struggle to be detached, and the pain of detachment, and the worry, the anxiety of being detached, wondering if you are isolating yourself, and then plunge into relationship hoping in there you will find no isolation. And this isolation, this sense of completely away from everything, realizing that, there is a sense of deep sorrow, isn't there. Right? Please, don't be mesmerized by the description. This is not a romantic, emotional extravaganza. Don't be stimulated by the speaker, he is not your opiate, or your drug, or your stimulant. Then you depend on the speaker, then the anxiety and all the rest of it. Whereas if you watch yourself, if you watch this whole movement of life from the centre, all the travail and all the anxiety, the guilt, the misery, and the deep sorrow.

So one asks, not another, there is no other whom you can ask. The other is you, who is also in sorrow. So can you ask if there is an ending to sorrow, and the ending of that centre which is the essence of sorrow, then what is action, then what is life. You understand my question? If there is no centre, and therefore no sorrow, no travail, no anxiety, then what is action?

And also you have to go into the question of space, not the scientific romance of space, but actually in our minds is there space at all. You understand my question? Or it is so occupied, so cluttered up, so full of knowledge, experience, wanting, occupied, occupied. When the mind is so completely occupied there is no space. Right? And the problem then is: can occupation end, being occupied? When the mind has leisure, leisure, then it is not occupied. You know the word 'school' comes from the word 'leisure'. You can only learn when you have leisure. You cannot learn when your mind is fully occupied, cluttered up like a disordered cupboard in which you put everything, then it cannot take in, it is full. So it is only when there is leisure, that is when there is no occupation, when the mind is not occupied then you have leisure, then you can learn. That is, our minds are occupied - with god, with mischief, with sex, with money, with god knows what, you know better than I do. It's occupied, and therefore there is no space at all. And you must have space to see. If you are too close you can't see, there must be space, a distance, a hiatus. Now in our minds there is none of that, because the mind is filled with the movement of this centre, the mind is filled with the movement of time - I will be, I must be, this must not be, I wish it weren't - time, time, thought.

Then the question arises: is it possible to end the movement of chattering? Not through volition, not through will, then you have divided this chattering into the will which is controlling the chattering. Part of the chattering is also the will. I wonder if you understand this. And without any sense of pressure, to observe the chattering, and let the chattering tell you all the story it has, and it has very little to tell you, I don't know if you have observed it. When you observe it and listen to the story of that chattering, the chattering it's telling, it's so trivial, it's nonsense, superficial, nothing at all to tell. But if you exercise pressure on it, it becomes active, it becomes deeper and deeper and deeper - at least you think it is deep. I wonder if you get all this.

So we are asking: is there a way of living without chattering, having space, not created by thought, science fiction space, but space which is the ending of occupation? Right? One is occupied with so many things: one is occupied with meditation, when you practise meditation you are occupied. Right? And therefore you have no space. Oh, I wish you would see all this.

And we are occupied with one of the factors of life, which is death. Right? Whether you are old or young there is this great occupation, consciously, or unconsciously, with death. Aren't you? The older you get, diseased, weak, feeble, a little bit gaga - perhaps we are gaga from the very beginning - and there is this great occupation with what happens after death, the whole revelation of reincarnation, the hope in that, is it true, is it not true, it must be, it must not be, there is evidence, there is no evidence - you know the thing that is going on in the world now. You know the word 'reincarnate' means reborn. Right? You understand? To be reborn. Why are you reborn next, after death, why don't you be reborn now? You understand my question? I wonder if you do. Incarnate now. (Laughter and clapping) No, no, this is not an emotional applause, or agreement, this is very, very serious. Listen to it, please. We are so occupied with death, books have been written, we read them, we are frightened of death. We see the cemetery and we say, 'My gosh' - we go through all that. And there is this eastern, Indian-India has played a tremendous part throughout the world in so-called religious and spiritual matters, and one of their concepts is, ideas is, or what they think reality is, that you, the centre, which is you, will be born next life. If you are living rightly now, next life you will have a better opportunity, either to become a millionaire, which is generally understood, or marvellous priest, or a marvellous enlightened human being. Which implies, doesn't it, what is important is not the future, but what you are now, what you do now, how you act, how you behave, what you think, what you feel now, this life. Right? And the believers in reincarnation don't pay attention to that, they say, 'I believe in that', and in the meantime lead their shoddy little life. You understand what I am saying?

So to incarnate without the future. I'll go into it in a minute. So we are occupied with this tremendous thing called death, from the most ancient civilizations to the present sophisticated abnormal civilization. Right? Every age is concerned about this, much more than how is it possible to live rightly. You understand? To live with tremendous dignity, grace and love. You know they are all occupied with what happens hereafter. And most of us also are occupied with that. To end this occupation totally, not when you are young, or when you are old but to end this occupation completely, which means to end the fear that is involved in this occupation. Why are we, if one may ask - why is one so occupied and frightened about death? Would you answer to yourself. This is not a group therapy or confessional - too many to confess - but would you ask yourself why you are afraid of death. I can understand the fear of pain, disease, the agony of some disease, cancer and others, but the ending, why is one so frightened of an ending? You are not frightened about the ending of sorrow, are you. On the contrary. Please listen carefully. The ending of death, and the ending of sorrow - the one which is the ending of sorrow you want, you crave it, you want it, you want to find out; and also the ending of one's life, when the brain, through an accident, disease, old age, lack of oxygen and so on, becomes senile, and gaga, and the ending of that. You follow my question?

Why is there fear of ending anything? Ending - please listen - ending your relationship with another. You understand this? Then you have to ask, what is your relationship with another which must continue, which under law, tradition, custom, habit, says, continue. Right, sir? And that continuity also through divorce, I divorce and continue with another.

I wonder if you are gathering all this. I am not informing you, I am not telling you, I am not giving you ideas, knowledge, but this you observe as you move, as you live. You want the ending of sorrow, the ending of pain, but the continuity of pleasure, and the ending of life as death. So we have to find out what it means to end, terminate. Right? If one grasps the significance of ending, the truth, the extraordinary quality that comes when you end, to find out what that quality is, you must enquire what it is to end. You understand? Are you asking these questions? Please do ask. What is it to end? And what is to continue? You understand? When we talk about ending, we must go into the question of what is continuity.

I am getting tired. Not tired, I don't think we are meeting each other, are we?

Audience: Yes.

K: Are you sure?

Audience: Yes.

K: I don't want your encouragement, that's not it. I just want to be clear that we understand each other.

So these two things are involved - ending and continuity. What is it that continues? The centre? Which is thought in action, accumulated experience, knowledge, the centre is the essence of all that. Right? And thought says, I must continue. Right? We want continuity only without pain. Right? Without anxiety, without the agony of uncertainty, without sorrow, without all the rest. Which is - please, continuity in pleasure, avoid everything else, pain, anxiety, guilt, hurts, fear, sorrow, but let me have this one thing. Right? Is that accurate? The description, is this an accurate description of a human mind that is only pursuing that, and saying, please take everything away from me. So that is what we call continuity. Right? The continuity of something which I have known, which one has known, delighted, taken a delight in it, the remembrance of it, and pursuing the remembrance of it, which is the great movement of continuous, endless pleasure. Is that what we want to continue, if you actually look and are honest with yourself? That pleasure may be enlightenment, in seeking god, in becoming a priest, in becoming a success, in owning something, possessing something, persons, ideas, furniture, house. Right? The continuity of the centre, with its misery, with its confusion, with its sorrow, with its fears, with its guilt, hurt. We never observe the centre and its content. Right? There is no observation, or listening to the story of the centre of that, the story which is the centre is showing you. You understand? The centre is telling you the story, which is fear, pain, anxiety, pressure, loneliness, agony, despair, hope, longing, isolation, death. You follow? Right? That is the centre, that centre says, I must never end, which is death. Right? Death is not only the organic death when the brain has not sufficient oxygen, withers away, and dying, through accident, through old age, disease and so on. We accept that as something natural, inevitable, but we don't accept the ending of this centre. This centre which is the essence of sorrow, we don't want sorrow, but we say, well I would rather have pleasure; but in the pursuit of pleasure sorrow is its shadow. Do you understand what I am saying? For god's sake.

So what is there to continue, what is there to end? You understand my question? And when there is an ending, total ending, there is a beginning. Do you see this? When one ends attachment, with all the implications of it, completely ends, then there is a totally different state, different beginning. So the ending is the beginning of incarnation. You understand? I wonder if you see this. Do listen, find out, sir, find out, go into yourself and find out. In dying there is the beginning, there is a total renewal, there is an incarnation, that is, to be born, not as Mr Smith - you understand? - with all the misery, confusion, sorrow. The ending of that is a beginning of something totally new. So is that possible, to totally end? Not a hankering, a longing of some deep memory. You understand? The ending totally of all that.

The question is then: how is to end? You understand? I see it must end, or you may not see it must end, if you see it, observe that it must, that is the only way of living because if you continue with all your memories, it leads nowhere, it leads to what is called death. But if you see the truth of this continuity, then will you ask the question: how is one to end attachment? Take one simple thing, like attachment, how is one to end attachment? You understand my question? How to end attachment without conflict, without will, without the pressure of the wife, the husband, the insurance man, and so on and so on, without the pressure of anything, is there an ending?

You understand, sir, this question is very complex, because our whole conditioning, which is the brain is conditioned - right? - conditioned after millions and millions of years. This brain is very, very old, it is very ancient. And it is asking itself - not you are asking it - it is asking itself, if you observe it, it is asking itself, can this conditioning, which is the very centre, end? Can this conditioning ever disappear, vanish, be abandoned? So the brain says, can I ever be free. You understand? Or must I enter from one conditioning to another conditioning, from one guru to another guru, from one sect to another sect, from one group to another? You follow? This is a very complex question, which is, can this conditioning with its centre, is very ancient, is very old, has been operating from childhood to now, it is of tremendous depth, so it is facing a new question, not an old question. Do you understand what I am saying? Right? It's asking itself a tremendous question. It realizes that it is conditioned, shaped, controlled, under great pressure from the ancient times, from the beginning of the anthropoid ape. You understand? Which means, can the registering process on the tape, which is the brain, the brain is registering like a tape recorder, and it's so used to registering continually, registering everything, unpleasant, pleasant, happy, joy, ecstasy, experience, it is used to registering, and it is asking, is there an ending to registration. You understand my question? Which is, can

I observe - the brain is talking to itself, I am not talking to myself - the brain is saying to itself, can I observe without registering? Do you understand my question?

You know, this is meditation, you understand, sir? For the brain to find itself conditioned, for consciousness which is the essence of the brain with all its content, misery, confusion, can all that end, otherwise there is no beginning, there is nothing new under the sun - which means, no registration whatsoever. Is that possible? One sees that, so one says, now, I see that, the brain says, yes that is so obvious. Now is it possible not to register? Not to register a hurt. You understand? Not to register somebody saying, a marvellous chap you are, that was a wonderful speech - I have been often told that. So can there be no registration whatsoever? You understand? Then what is the state of the mind, the brain that doesn't register?

It registers because in the registration, in recording there is security. And when there is no registration is there security at all? You follow all this? Because the brain can only function in security, efficiently or not efficiently, it may find security in some stupid belief, and hold on to it, in that stupid belief - all beliefs are stupid anyhow - but in that particular stupid belief it has found security - in some romantic, conceptual, mystical - you follow? And when you take drugs, whatever you do, when you take drugs it brings out certain experiences, and in those experiences there is security. And so the more you take, the more you are in illusion.

So the brain asks itself: there has been security, at least I thought there was security in those things which I have held - belief, you understand, the whole thing. And is that security, it is asking itself. Is there security in belief? You believe in Christ, or whatever you believe in, and in India they believe in something else, that belief is based on your conditioning for two thousand years you have been conditioned in that, and for five to ten thousand years they have been conditioned there. So conditioning is both the same, one is not superior to the other. So the brain says - it realizes there is no security in belief, but where am I to find that security, if there is an ending. You understand all this?

What time is it? Quarter to one.

Where is there security? The centre is created by thought, thought is so limited, conditioned, so narrow, a broken down thing, and it has discovered that in that broken up thing which has created this whole world in which we live, if there is no security there, then where is there security. You understand? Because it can only function effectively, sanely, rationally, skilfully when there is complete security. Because most of us are insecure, uncertain, confused, our actions are neurotic, confused, mischievous. You follow? And it says, I have seen - please listen to this - I have - the brain says, I have seen - thought doesn't say this - the brain itself is in operation, the brain says, I have seen that, there is no security in all this. Right? When is it capable of saying that? Do you understand my question? You understand my question?

Q: Yes.

K: When is it capable of saying, yes, I have seen all that, there is no security in all that? When it has very carefully observed, reasoned, logic, and seen that it is really empty. The perception of that futility is intelligence, isn't it. Be quite clear on this point. Right, sir? To see the illusory nature of that centre, to see the falseness and the unreality of that centre, which is verbal, which is memory, which is the past, and so on, to perceive that is intelligence, isn't it. Are you quite sure? I mean, suppose you go to a politician, and if you talk to him about the absurdity of nationality, and dividing the country into parties, into little parts, and his whole life is vested in that he won't even listen to you, he will say, you are fantastic, you are not practical, you are not this, you are not that. Right? I have talked to many politicians, I know that. Their idea is, be practical, factual, you must deal with the workers, that is you. You are confused, you are - you follow - and you help him to be confused also. So the brain is saying, I can only function when there is absolute security. I realize that I have lived in illusory security. Is that so, to you? And if it is, then that perception is the very act of intelligence. That intelligence is complete security. Right? See the sequence of it, not just casual observation, see clearly the sequence of what we are saying, therefore it is orderly. Because it is orderly it is the essence of intelligence. You understand? It is the disordered, not sequential mind that is stupid, dull, not intelligent.

So the brain has discovered for itself, not somebody has told it, that's too stupid, the brain has discovered for itself the quality of security that can never be destroyed, can never be changed, it is immovable, everything else is movable. I've finished.

I wonder if we are going to meet tomorrow, because if it rains, what happens?

Q: We can meet here.

K: We meet here? All right, sir.

OJAI 6TH PUBLIC TALK 16TH APRIL 1978

I believe this is the last talk.

As we were saying yesterday morning, we are concerned, if we are at all serious, with the wholeness of life, not a particular part, or a particular attitude, a particular conclusion, or philosophy, but rather to be concerned with all the action, with all the ways of life, which is the wholeness of life, of our living. And as this is the last talk, or conversation between us, we should also, if I may, go into the question of what is meditation.

Before we can really understand the nature of meditation we must find out for ourselves, I think, what is it that we are all seeking, searching, or longing, what is it we want. I think if one is at all serious, one begins to question the way of our living, why we live in such disordered confused, uncertain ways, why we accept conditions as they are, why the eternal wars, the division of people, the division that belief brings about, the division in religions, and so on. One must surely ask what it is that each one of us is seeking. Is it a personal search for more and more sensation, more and more excitement, more and more pleasure? Is it that we are so discontented, dissatisfied with the things around us and in us that we are seeking a way out of all this deep, abiding, flame of discontent?

As we said in our previous talks, if one may again point out, we are conversing together as two friends, neither one is trying to persuade the other to believe or not to believe. Two friends talking over together their life, their problems, their confusion, their utter lack of relationship and so on. So that's what we are doing together, so this is not a talk to which you listen, agree or disagree, and go away dissatisfied still more. But rather enquire into what it is that we are all seeking, and why we are seeking. Seeking what? Why is there this going from one saddism to another fad, to one religion, to one group, to one guru and so on and on and on? I think it is very important to understand this question, and to ask oneself, why and what we are seeking. And who is the seeker, and will the seeker find what he thinks he must have or must discover? Is the seeker projecting what he wants? Is the seeker saying to himself, I must do what I want? Because society is so confused, corrupt and immoral, and one feels, perhaps, that if one could fulfil what one deeply wants, and the fulfilment of that may be one's search.

And also if one is at all serious, one must, as we have asked throughout these talks, ask why we put up with various pressures in our life, on our brain, on ourselves, why do we accept all the confusion, and why we accept the way we are living. I do not know if you have asked all these questions of yourself. If you have - I am not suggesting that you should, or that you must, but as two friends talking over together, each points out to the other, asks questions of each other, doubt what the other fellow is saying, so there is interaction between the two, there is a communication. And communication implies not only a verbal statement, but also sharing, sharing each other's problems, each other's struggles, trying to understand each other's misery, confusion. And that's what we are trying to do here during all these talks.

So, as we said, in enquiring what we are seeking, in perceiving the various forms of pressures, one comes to the point, doesn't one, that we know so little of ourselves, we never ask what we are, we never go into the great complex problem of knowing oneself completely - which is self-knowing. Can one know ever oneself? Or is it always illusive? Or does it take time to know the whole content of our consciousness, our existence?

So before we begin to talk over together - I mean together - meditation, we must begin I think with the enquiry whether it is possible to know oneself. Because if you don't know totally the whole content, the depth, the width of oneself, or the pettiness, the narrowness, the shallowness, of oneself, without laying that foundation very, very deeply, which is the total comprehension of oneself in which there is no deception whatsoever, there is no illusion of any kind, no pretence, no sense of pride and arrogance - without knowing all that one cannot obviously lay the foundation to go much further.

So this morning, if one may, we are going to together enquire first what it is we are seeking, under what pressures we live, and in that enquiry we will begin to see the nature of ourselves, what we are, what we are made up of, not merely chemically, biologically, but much more psychologically. Because the nature of psychology, what is inwardly, inside the skin, as it were, if that is not clearly understood and delved into very, very deeply, we will live a very superficial life, as most of us do.

So we are going to enquire what it is to know oneself entirely. Will you please join in this game - this is the real search - to know oneself completely. To know what actually is without any distortion, to be aware of the actual in ourselves, the actual, without any imposition, without any deforming what is there. You understand? So to understand this very complex thing called the self, and to understand it there must be obviously a very clear free mind. If I am enquiring into something very seriously I can't come to it with a prejudice, with a conclusion, with any sense of achievement, I must first learn how to look, and how to listen.

So first I must learn the art of listening to 'what is'. I don't know what I am, I am not going to accept any philosophy, or any assertions of the psychologists, however well-known, professional, all the rest of it, because if I do accept it I investigate myself according to what they have told me, which becomes another pressure, a boredom, an acceptance of authority, which one must totally discard if one begins to enquire deeply into oneself. I hope you are doing that as we are talking: that you are not looking through the eyes of another, not enquiring according to some psychologist, psychoanalyst, some philosopher. Which means that you mustn't be secondhand. Right? And most of us are secondhand people, or third-hand people, and therefore there is never any serious deep delving into this enormous content of oneself. We live a superficial life because we accept the specialists about ourselves. And the specialists themselves have accepted the specialists of others; so it goes on, each specialist accepting another specialist. But whereas if we are enquiring into ourselves very seriously one must discard the authority of another totally, completely. Do you?

And also when one is enquiring into oneself, and the enquiry is to lay the foundation which will be totally orderly, which is not a foundation based on sand, on something unreal. And to enquire into this the mind itself must be free to observe. That is, to learn the art of listening to oneself, not tell what you want to observe, but to see or to listen what the self is saying. Do you understand?

The art of listening to oneself, not according to anybody. Right? Will you do that as we go along? Then you have no authority to tell you what to think. We are educated from childhood what to think, and the teachers and the educators, the professionals and the politicians and so on and so on and so on, the priests, everybody, tell you what to think. It's so obvious, specially in this country. It is happening all over the world but here it is becoming more and more acute, because the specialists are multiplying and we become their slaves. Please, this is very, very serious, I do not know if one realizes how serious it is. Which means that one has lost freedom. When you hand over your life to another, however well intentioned, however professional, however specialized he may be, to hand over yourself to somebody, to a guru, to a priest, to some psychologist, then that very freedom is denied, and you need freedom to enquire. I do not know if you realize what is happening in the world, slowly we are becoming slaves to tyranny. Please, this is very serious - the political tyranny, the religious tyranny and so on and so on, which is the actual pressure on our life.

And to enquire into ourselves, if one has abandoned because you see the truth that authority about spiritual matters, or psychological matters, has no place in enquiry, then you drop them naturally, easily, happily, not with regret, not saying, 'I don't know if I drop these specialists, these people who have told me, how shall I enquire?' So we are going to enquire freely, not according to the speaker, not according to your desires, not according to what you think you want, but actually 'what is'. You understand? What is actually going on within oneself - the reactions, the compulsions, the pressures, the infinite varieties of desire, the exhausting anxiety, the arrogance, the pride, the sense of assertion, aggressiveness, you know, all that. To enquire into all that one must have the sense of freedom to observe. You understand? I hope you have it now, not only while you are sitting here, but when you leave this hall to have that extraordinary quality of freedom, not to do what you like, which you have done all along - only you hide it under the cloak of religion, under morality, under culture, but freedom doesn't mean to do what you like. On the contrary, freedom implies freedom from authority, freedom from pressure, freedom from your own demands, urges, wants, so that you are able to look very, very clearly at what is going on within yourself. Right? Will you do it as we sit here?

And there is the art of seeing, not through the eyes of another, not through the projection of your own desires, thoughts, but seeing actually what is going on. That's an art - art in the sense, not a painting, not in a museum and all the rest of it, but the art of seeing which brings order. And order can only come when you put everything in its right place. Right? That's order, that is the essence of art - when you have put money, sex, knowledge, in its right place. And learning the art of seeing what actually is, without any distortion, without any motives, without any pressure. Will you do that, to observe yourself without the least pressure, which means not to achieve something, not to gain something, to become something? I wonder if you can do all this.

And there is the art of learning. For us learning implies accumulation of knowledge, memory, cultivating memory. Schools, college, university helps us to cultivate this memory, and to function according to the formula which memory has cultivated.

But there is another form of learning, never accumulating but having insight into what is seen. Now this is rather difficult, I'll go into it perhaps, if I may.

We know what learning is, don't we, accumulating knowledge, and acting according to that knowledge, therefore learning and the accumulation of knowledge becomes mechanical. You get a job, and you act skilfully or not skilfully, but you are learning, accumulating and acting. Now we are talking about learning in which there is not only not accumulating but seeing, having an insight into something which is not related to memory, because if you relate all action to memory, then it is incomplete, it is a fraction, it is broken up - because knowledge can never be complete, obviously. So what we are saying is there is an art of learning in which memory doesn't operate; you see things, you see the truth instantly. Now I'll show you an example - I am not good at examples but I will tell you one, you can take your own example and look. To see instantly the total implication of institutions - religious, political, social - to see all the significance, the meaning, the nature of institutions. Which is, everything is lived, put into a formula, into a pattern, and you function within that pattern, with the hierarchy, the higher man, the lower man, the whole of it. Or you take another instance, the institutions of religion: to see the nature of religion, to see what the priests and we have done to religion. Right? Which is seeing the truth of it, and when you see the truth of it you are finished with it. I don't know if you understand this. That it is based on belief, it is based on authority, it is based on conclusion, it is the projection of thought, that projection of thought in a church means thought is worshipping itself. I wonder if you understand all this. So you have an insight into it, not a conclusion, not brought about through argument, logic, but having an insight into the nature of what man has called religion, the whole thing of it, you can argue logically then. Having an insight, from insight you can argue, but not the other way round. The other way round is the cultivation of memory, which is being conditioned. So insight implies freedom from conditioning. I wonder if you see all this. All right? May we go on?

So there is that art of learning, which is the insight into ourselves, and the things that we have projected outwardly. Right? So what we have projected, what we are inside, is the movement of thought. Right? So thought has created the outer and the inner, interacting all the time; therefore there is no outer and there is no inner. I wonder if you get this. There is only this movement, like the sea going out and then coming in, this constant movement, which is the 'me'. I wonder if you see this. Which is the self. And we are going to investigate into that. Right.

So in our investigation we are not cultivating memory. Please understand this. Look: I look at myself, and in looking at myself I have seen that I am this and I must be that. Just go with me for a little minute. I observe what I am and I say, I must not be that. In the very observation of myself I am accumulating memory about myself. Right? That memory will examine the next movement of the self. I wonder if you see that. Do you? So there is this constant learning, memorizing, and examining. The examination then is the continuation of that memory. I wonder if you see all this. It is fun if you see all this. It is real fun because you are then entering into something very, very deep, and tremendously subtle. That is, I examine myself - because I see it is not quite clear - I examine myself, that examination of myself leads me to a certain conclusion. Right? With that conclusion I examine the next movement of myself, the next reaction of myself. And so I strengthen the memory of myself. Right? Whereas if you have an insight you don't cultivate memory. I can't explain more. Is this somewhat clear? Am I making myself clear? So that is what we are doing. We are going to examine ourselves, what we are. And it is also very important to find out how to observe.

If you observe according to somebody you are not observing, obviously. Right? Is this clear? Can we go on? If I observe according to Mr Freud, or Jung, or the latest psychoanalyst with their newest theories, I am just looking at myself with their glasses. Very simple. When I discard them totally then how do I look at myself? You understand? Am I looking at myself with fresh eyes, or am I looking at myself with memories which I have about myself? Can I look at myself each time as though it were the first time? The seeing oneself for the first time is insight. You get it now? So each insight is new, it is not a continuous insight, then it becomes a memory. Right, you are getting this? So insight implies no struggle, because it is so.

So what are we? Just look at it, I am not telling you what we are, you don't accept me instead of another guru - I abominate all gurus, including myself if I am a guru. I am not. So how do I, how does one look at oneself? Is there an observer looking at oneself? You understand? Is there an observer looking, adding something, saying, I am going to look at myself. You get the point? Please understand this. It may be a little boring, but go into it. Who is the observer? We said the observer is the past, all his conclusions, all his memories, all his experiences, all his failures, all that, and with those eyes he is observing - right? - himself. Is himself not the observer? You get the point? So the observer is observing himself, therefore there is no division between the observer and the observed. Get it? Right. So he is looking at himself. So if he is looking at himself, what is there to look? I wonder if you get this. We'll go into it a little more, some of you have caught on to it, and the others have not, so I must go into it, if you don't mind.

We said the observer is the result of a million years of accumulated memories. That's logic, sane, that's a fact. And he says, I am going to look at myself. Which means he thinks he is different from what he is going to see. Please see this point. So I am going to examine myself who is different. Right? Then you have created the division, then in that division there is conflict, saying, 'I must do something about what I see, I don't like what I see, I must change what I see'. So there is conflict, suppression, all the rest of it follows. But when the observer says, I am examining myself, he is examining himself not something outside there, or separate from himself. You have got it? Are you also working as hard as I am? You must, otherwise the ball is always in my court, not in your court. If it is in my court there is no game.

So the observer is examining itself. You understand what is taking place? That is, he is seeing himself as he is, not as something to be observed. I wonder if you see this. You know it is like looking at yourself in a mirror when you shave, or comb your hair, or when you make up your face, there it is. In the same way, the observer is watching himself. Right? Then what takes place?

Do it, please, find out. What takes place when the observer is watching himself? Isn't there - I am just suggesting, I am not saying it is, or it is not, it's for you to look to find out - isn't there a sense of observation without the observer? Right? Do you understand? Which means there is neither the observer nor the observed. I wonder if you get this. This is very important because we are leading up to meditation. Have you got this? That is, when the observer is looking at himself, the observer is absolutely silent. No? When you look at something, unless you are very silent, quiet, you can't see it. You can't observe it clearly. You may see a bird on a flight, or a tree, but if the observer is absolutely quiet you see what actually is, don't you. So there is only 'what is', not how to change 'what is'. You get it? And if you observe - if the observer is totally silent, then that which is, is non-existent because it is changing too. I wonder if you see this.

This is very important because meditation means, if I may go into it, I will go deeply further - meditation means that there is neither the observer nor the observed. Do you understand this? The observer is put together by thought. Right? The observed is also put together by thought. Anger is brought about by thought, reaction. And the observer who says, 'I am angry, I must do something about it' is also part of thought. Right? So thought has divided itself as the observer and the observed, and has brought about conflict between the two. So when there is this insight into the observer there is no conflict whatsoever. Because meditation is the total elimination of complete conflict, no shadow of conflict. I'll go into it a little later.

So the observer is not, only 'what is'. Right, do you see this?

Only 'what is'. That is, one is the result of cultural, social, ethical, religious, spiritual, economic pressure, for a million years one is that. And that is what is actual. Without understanding the actual there is no movement away from it. I can escape, but the escape becomes an illusion. You can take drugs and have an extraordinary experience through drugs, which destroys the mind, which destroys the quality and the sensitivity of the mind. Here in this country drugs have become such appalling things.

So in meditation there is no observer or the observed. Then what takes place in meditation when there is this total absence of conflict between the observer and the observed, and they both cease to be? We will go into that after we have understood a little bit of this.

So I am examining myself. I want to know myself because I see without knowing myself as I actually am, not according to anybody, actually what I am - my reactions, my miseries, my confusions, my loneliness, my despair, I have lost somebody, I am in agony and so on and so on - to know all that without the observer distorting it. Get it? Right? Can you do it? As you are sitting there listening, not to me, but to yourself, and observing without the observer, therefore - and learning, which means not memorizing, but learning the art of insight, can you observe yourself as you are. Then what you are is what actually is going on in every human being. You understand? I wonder if you see this. In every human being whether you live here or in Russia, or in India, or in China, therefore what actually you are is the rest of humanity. Do you understand? I wonder if you get this. It is not a theory, it is not a conclusion, it is not a wish, it is not a strength, etc., etc., but what actually you are. You are the representative of all humanity. Right? See what the implication is, the depth and the beauty of it. Then you are not alone. You understand? Now you are isolated, in isolation you are seeking strength. That strength is to depend on somebody, and dependence on somebody ultimately results in weakening because in that there is sorrow, misery, confusion, jealousy, all the rest of it. Whereas the fact - the fact - that you, what you are, is what all human beings are, therefore you are all humanity. You understand, sir? And there is no individuality to play with, which is an enormous discovery, and therefore gives you extraordinary vitality.

So what are you? What you are is the movement of thought, whether it is in the church, in the temple, or in the mosque, anywhere, it is the movement of thought projecting itself, saying, I am a Hindu, I am a Buddhist, I am a Christian, I am this or that - the other human being is doing exactly the same thing. So when you realize - when there is the insight into this there is a freedom from all the things that thought has put together psychologically. You understand? I wonder if you see this. Look, we will go into it a little more. Otherwise if I go into meditation you won't see this thing.

Thought has put together the external world. Right? Thought has put together the churches, the temples, the mosques, the ideas of god, the devil, evil, thought has put together all this, and it has created also marvellous cathedrals, marvellous temples, mosques, the extraordinary advancement in technology. Thought has also created war. Thought has also created the 'me' and the 'you', the 'we' and 'they' - we are more important than they. So thought is responsible for this confusion, for this uncertainty, for this insecurity, the division, the misery, the confusion, the sorrow. Have an insight into it, not a conclusion. Then thought has not created nature, the beauty of these hills, the hills are there but you can call them beautiful, but the word 'beauty' is thought, the feeling behind it is still thought, but thought has not created those excellent, marvellous, stupendous mountains. Right? Thought has not created nature, the birds and the trees, and the rivers, but thought utilizes them, and what thought has created out of them is a reality, like a chair. I wonder if you are getting this. I must move quickly, because my time is limited.

So please follow this carefully - if you will, I am not urging you to follow it. So whatever thought has created, the actual, the figure in a church, in the temple, in the mosque, whatever thought has created is the actual, is the real, which includes also the illusions. Right? The illusion that you are somebody, or you must be somebody. And so thought in that illusion finds security, safety and so it clings to it. And from that illusion all neurotic action takes place. Whether it is fashionable neuroticism, or not fashionable neuroticism - it is fashionable neuroticism to belong to some group, to some church, to some temple and all the rest of it. I wonder if you see this. Right?

So thought has created all this. But thought, has it created love? All this is the enquiry into oneself, don't forget. Please, you understand? I wonder if you see this. Thought has created the 'me' - my memories, my anxieties, my fears, my joys, and all the rest of it. That is the actual, the 'what is'. But has thought created love? Please, careful, this is very important because if thought has not created love, then why do we get so upset, so miserable, so confused, so antagonistic, so full of hatred, jealousy, when somebody says, 'I don't love you', when somebody leaves you and goes off with somebody else, or when there is the death of somebody? You understand all this? So if thought has not created love, then what is the relationship - please follow this - the relationship between love and compassion? You follow? Because one must find out all this, this is part of self-examining.

The word 'compassion' means passion for all, for all living things. If thought has not created love, which obviously it has not, when one really actually looks at it one gives the word 'love' its right meaning, which has nothing to do with desire, pleasure, sex and all that, which is the result of thought. Then does the movement of love become compassion? You understand what I am saying? That is, compassion cannot exist when there is sorrow. Right? Because sorrow is the movement of thought. I wonder if you see all this.

Then there is a further question to ask: what is the relationship between compassion and, if there is, truth. You understand? We said thought has not created love. That's an absolute fact. Love is not desire, love is not pleasure, love has nothing whatsoever to do with fear or attachment. Then that thing that is not created by thought is reality. I wonder if you see all this. That movement of the reality is compassion - truth, sorry. I must begin again. Forgive me, if I mislead you for a second. Thought has not created love, has not brought it into being - the love between a mother and child is inherited from the ape, a million years, and that you call love. We are saying love is not the product of thought. Love is the movement of compassion. Then we have said reality - you know what reality is, everything including illusion is the product of thought, that is actual, real, like the microphone is real. Then, what is truth? You understand my question? Now the enquiry into that is meditation. The enquiry into that is not based on systems, on practices; that is too mechanical, too absurd, it is totally the product of thought. Right?

So what is the quality of the mind that is not enquiring, allowing truth to appear? If I can use those words, you understand - forgive me, they are ordinary words, but for truth to take place, truth to be born, because thought cannot create it, then it becomes a fragment, broken up thing. So truth is something that must be whole, not created by thought. So now how do we enquire into something that you don't know? You understand? You get the point? I have enquired into what is known - thought, all its movement, what it has created, the destruction and so on, it is known; but how do you look into something of which you know absolutely nothing? Do you understand my question? Now this is meditation. Because practice, following systems are all mechanical, too utterly stupid to even think about it, you know, even to investigate because you can see what it is, including transcendental meditation and all the nonsense the gurus have brought into this country. They are really racketeers. They are industrialized gurus making money.

So we are saying, what is the quality of the mind that says, I must find out what is truth? You understand? You can't enquire into something you don't know. Right? Just see the very statement of it is something extraordinary, if you realize it. It can only know what is unknown when the mind itself becomes the unknown. You understand? Which is, there is neither the observer nor the observed. I wonder if you see this. Come on, sir. Look: I don't know you, because I have never met you, perhaps I have met you, shaken hands, but like two ships passing in the night. We may sit next to each other and disappear in the darkness. I don't know you, so to know you I must come to you with complete not knowing. Is that possible? It is possible only when I - you understand - when there is the enquiry into the whole movement of thought. Thought can only function within the field of the known. The freedom from the field of the known is not that you have no knowledge and all the rest of that business, but now the mind is asking what is my quality when I know nothing. You can only say that in all humility and tremendous honesty when there is neither the observer nor the observed. Which means complete silence. Not the silence introduced by thought, not the silence between two noises, not the silence between two thoughts. You understand? Those are all parts of thought. To see that which is eternal, nameless, the truth, the mind must be absolutely still. And that stillness cannot be manufactured. That's what you are all trying to do, to manufacture it through will, through practice, through all kinds of stupid things. So forgive me if I use the word 'stupid'.

So is it possible for the mind without effort, which means without will, to be absolutely still, without a single movement of thought? I said it is only possible when you have an insight into all this. Insight is not memory, it has no relationship to memory. So the mind is now absolutely quiet, therefore no time. This is not a scientific fiction or anything of that kind. It is actual, and that demands tremendous honesty, without any sense of illusion.

Because you can create all kinds of illusions.

Then what is truth? Can you describe it? The moment you put into words what is truth, it is not. The moment I say, 'I love you', the very words deny something tremendous. So that is the most sacred thing in life, not the things which thought has put together, they are just images, projected by thought. And those images you worship, and that means thought is worshipping itself. How foolish we are! But truth is indescribable. And that thing which is most sacred can only be when the mind is absolutely quiet. This is meditation, from the beginning of this talk until now, that is meditation.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 9TH JULY 1978

I am sorry the weather is so bad. It isn't our fault.

As we are going to have seven talks and five discussions, I think we should go into things very carefully, deliberately, perhaps in greater detail, taking time, going into all our problems and trying to find out if there is any solution to all of them. So those who may have heard me before please have patience.

I think most of us are concerned with ourselves, either desperately or casually or neurotically. Those who are concerned widely in relation to the world and themselves, to their little family, their responsibility to that family, to their children, and those who are already so neurotically conditioned. All of us in different degrees and different depths are concerned with ourselves, not only physically - having enough money, food, clothes, shelter, which is perhaps fairly easy to come by - but it is much more the concern psychologically which we are going to discuss, talk over together and perhaps then we shall be able to find our relationship to the world and to each other.

Why psychologically are we so concerned about ourselves? I think this question must be asked. Either you put this question to yourselves seriously, trying to find out a true correct answer, or you put that question to yourself rather superficially, casually. Only when there is a vital problem then you are concerned with yourselves, or when there is a crisis, or when there is some incident or accident that brings about misery, confusion, uncertainty, then you put that question to yourself. And so according to our conditioning, according to our temperament and experience, according to our economical social conditioning, we question about ourselves, this tremendous concern why?

If I may point out once again and I hope you will not mind, we are sharing this thing together. There is no speaker. The speaker is yourself, the speaker is only voicing your own thoughts, your own feelings, your own conditioning, your own unhappiness, sorrow, misery, fears and so on. So actually, though the speaker sits on a platform for convenience, in actual psychological fact there is no speaker, only you and I examining ourselves, exploring into ourselves greatly, deeply - or if you are very, very serious, much more profoundly. So please bear in mind, if I may point out, that we are examining, exploring, investigating together, that there is no speaker as such. And I mean this very seriously.

So we are asking why most human beings right throughout the world are so concerned with themselves - with their relationship with another, with their unhappiness, their psychological ugliness, their schizophrenic or various complexes - or they are asking themselves if they can ever find something everlasting, beautiful, true. And in their search, those who are serious get caught up in things like religion, caught up with the various gurus, caught up in some belief or in some idea or in some conclusion. All this indicates, doesn't it, that essentially we are concerned about ourselves, and therefore we, as an individual, or as a human being, become the centre of the universe, because we are so absorbed, we are so committed, we are so entangled, we are so desperately wanting something or other - happiness, enlightenment, to behave properly, what is correct action. Or, if you are neurotically minded, that neurosis becomes stronger and stronger because you are concerned about yourself. And there are all those psychological priests who are trying to help you. So one observes this fact. Why is it that human beings are so self-centred, so appallingly selfish, so caught up in their own anxieties, in their own longings, loneliness, despair and so on? This is an ordinary daily fact. Some of us may be willing to face it, and others may be evading it, or taking a flight away from ourselves and identifying ourselves with a nation, with a god, with a priest, with something or other. But this identification is still the concern about oneself. The more we are concerned about ourselves, the more our capacity to comprehend the whole becomes impossible. It is like a mountain stream that is roaring down the hill, but man has held it with cement and rock, not to overflow. And we are doing the same thing with ourselves. This concern with ourselves has a certain quality of energy. And that energy is bound, carefully canalized, and being caught in that, the more we are concerned with ourselves the narrower, the more rigid the world has become. You must have observed this.

So we are going to investigate together why human beings throughout the world are so eagerly, so subtly, in a very, very refined way if they are not brutish, if they are not callous, if they are not indifferent, in very, very subtle ways, they are concerned with their centre. And that centre, with its enormous energy, either brings about a catastrophe, or there is a possibility of breaking down these narrow walls which we have built artificially around ourselves - they may be broken down and therefore the release of tremendous energy.

So that is what we are talking about: whether it is possible for human beings, wherever they are, socially, economically, in the various forms, whether it is possible to break down the narrow walls which man, human beings throughout the world, have built round themselves. And whether it is possible without any effort, not intellectually, not theoretically, hypothetically, but actually in our daily life, whether it is possible to break down this self-centred concern with his conditioning, can it ever be broken down, and therefore releasing an extraordinary quality of energy? And that energy is needed when there are no walls at all, it is needed for meditation, for the enquiry into what is truth, for the ending of sorrow and discovering what is compassion, love.

So I hope we are serious enough, when you have taken the trouble to come here in this dreadful climate, at least this year. So let us be serious, because this is not an entertainment, this is not an intellectual amusement, or romantic, intellectual investigation. We have to put aside, I am afraid, all our sentiments, all our romanticism, imagination, sensations, the desire for more experience, and face the central fact. I do not know if we can face it because we are very clever at hiding behind a facade of theories, opinions, judgements and clinging to them aggressively, passively, or unconsciously. So it is going to be very difficult to explore easily, without any compulsion, without any pressure, without any reward or punishment, just to go into ourselves and look, and find out, if we can, why you and human beings right throughout the world, have made this a central issue, central problem. And that means having the capacity to look. To look without any distortion, because every idea, every conclusion, every opinion, every experience is a distorting factor - right? Please understand this. Your very experience, whether it be sexual, the various types of experiences stored up as memory, in investigation, in observing, become a distorting factor, obviously. Those of us who have very strong opinions, aggressively so, or judgements, again they become factors of distortion. And if you believe - whatever you believe in - according to your particular conditioning, that belief with all its associations, with all its tradition, with all the past, becomes a factor which will prevent clear observation.

So in order to enquire deeply into this enormous complex problem, there must be freedom to observe; not what you think and I think, what you feel or I feel, what your conclusions are or mine, none of those have any importance when observing, in seeing clearly why human beings are so desperately concerned with themselves - right?

When you listen to these statements of the speaker, do you actually listen? Or, do you make a conclusion or an idea about what you hear? You understand? Do you actually listen to what is said? Or in listening you have made an abstraction of it, and that abstraction becomes an idea with which you agree or disagree, or if you agree argue about that idea, or if you disagree you throw it out? But actually you are not listening. So one has to find out if you are listening to find out for yourself why this narrowing, resisting expenditure of energy, which is becoming more and more narrow, more and more selfish? And that selfishness is either so domesticated and you say it is not selfish, or you have identified yourself with something greater and say that is greater, I am not great, therefore my concern is with that, not with this. But that identification is this in a bigger way, or a smaller way.

I hope you are following all this. As we said, there is no speaker. Isn't it a marvellous idea that there is no speaker! I have just found that out. We are looking at ourselves in the mirror, and the mirror is telling us the whole story. But you must know how to look in the mirror - not how to interpret what you see in the mirror, or how to act what you see in the mirror, but if you know how to look, that very observation will bring about right action, everything falls in its right place. This is not a rhetorical statement. It is an actual fact.

So we are enquiring seriously why human beings with this marvellous world around them, the beauty, the extraordinary nature, the quality of water, the birds, the sea and the land, and the sky and the heavens above them, why they have reduced everything to this narrow little atom, small thing, and writing enormous books about it, and how to get rid of it, what to do, practise, meditate, sacrifice, deny, starve, fast, everything to get rid of the small 'me'. The futility of sacrifice, the futility of denial of the 'me' and identifying itself with something else, with the family, with the nation, with a belief, with a god, with international - you follow? - umpteen forms of identification, will not solve the problem. What will dissolve this thing that is so corrupting, that is always seeking power, position, authority, grabbing for itself everything, utilizing knowledge as a means of further success, further power, further indulgence and so on?

Can we factually observe? - not only the idea of 'me', the idea of the centre but also observe the movement of the senses, the various senses, which is actually sensations. These sensations, touch and all the rest of it, these sensations exist, are actual, they must be, you cannot deny sensations. But when thought identifies itself with those sensations then the structure of the centre is beginning to be formed - you understand? Right? Please, this is not intellectual observation, just ordinary daily fact if you observe the senses. One likes a particular form of food, drink, smoke, drugs and thought then identifies itself with that particular food, and the taste of it, the smell of it, the delight of it, and with that identification, in that identification, the centre is formed. That is obvious.

Now can you observe - please listen to this, it is very interesting if you go into this - can you observe the movement of the sensations whether it be sexual, whether it be taste, hearing or seeing, can you observe the movement of those ordinary natural sensations without identifying? Do you understand this? Am I saying something strange, or neurotic, or bizarre? It is very important to understand this because we will go into this problem of identification. Where there is no identification there is no centre - right? It is this constant identification with my senses, with my body with my thoughts - you follow - the whole movement of identification, identification being attachment, inseparable attachment and with all its associations, and so this identification is movement of energy and that energy becomes more and more limited, which is the centre - right?

So we are asking: is there an observation of the senses without any form of thought identifying itself with a particular sensation? You understand? Sensations are natural. If you have no sensations you are utterly paralysed - perhaps most of us are, only in one particular direction, sexual or another direction. But we are talking of the movement of all senses, not one particular sense. If you see the logic of it, the reason of it, that the moment thought identifies itself with a particular sensation, or with all the sensations, that identification is the movement of building this vast energy into a narrow channel. Right? Have I explained? Have I made it clear? Not I - there is no speaker, only in conversation between ourselves, as two human beings, we are discovering this - you are discovering, not the speaker, there is no speaker. So you are discovering that any form of identification, not only with the senses, with the family, with the nation, with ideas, with conclusions and so on, is the beginning of narrowing down this vast energy and limiting itself, therefore resisting the vast movement of life - right?

So we are asking as you are sitting there: can you observe your senses without any identification? Identification with the body - look, it is very, very serious what we are going into, if you don't want to listen don't listen, think about something else. But if you listen, listen with your heart, with your mind, with your whole being, as we are going into this question of releasing the tremendous energy, which is now canalized into a very, very small narrow prison, from which we act. And there is not only the identification with the senses, therefore with the body, then identification with the name, of course, even if you give yourself a new name, or a new number that is still identification - which the monks do and so on. Why does thought constantly identify itself with something? You understand my question? - which you are doing, my wife, my son, my family, my girl, my boy, my house, my quality, I have experienced so much I must hold on to that experience, I am identifying myself with Christ, with Krishna, you know, the whole gamut of objects of identification. Why does thought always identify with something or other?

Don't you, if I may ask, not as a speaker, you are asking yourself, don't you ask yourself why? Why do I identify myself with the form, with the name, with all the experiences which I have gathered, or the future identification? Why does thought do this all the time? My house, my wife, my belief, my god, my country, I am British, you are French, I am German, you are Russian - you follow? Why? Is it because thought being in constant flux - please find out, I am just enquiring, find out - being in constant flux, movement, needs security about something? You are enquiring, asking yourself this. When you say "It is my house", that gives you certainty, stability, security. When thought identifies itself with a house it is necessary - isn't it? - it gives it security, shelter, safety, protection, the physical identification with the house gives it security. But watch it. That movement of identification with a physical necessity is taken over psychologically - right? There it is physically necessary, but psychologically it may not be necessary at all. But we are constantly doing this - from the necessity, that includes, although I may not identify myself with my trousers, or shirt or whatever one wears, but the attachment, the physical needs and from that need move into a psychological ground and say "It is necessary there too" - and it may not be. You are following this? I wonder if you are?

Doesn't this take place always, generally from the purely physical, the need for food, the need for clothes, the need for cleanliness and all the rest of it, that movement spills over into the psychological area, and the spilling over from that to this may be totally unnecessary, it may be an illusion. There is only that and not this. I wonder if I am making myself clear? We will go into this very carefully. After all, what is the ground, the area, the field of the psyche? You understand? We understand more or less the physical. One needs food, clothes and shelter, that is obvious. And the danger comes when we identify ourselves with that. We say, "It is my clothes, it is my property, don't touch it". Now that necessity has been identified by thought as mine, and it is that same movement from the physical to the psychological: my experience, my desires, my longings - you understand? I wonder if you are understanding this? Because you see what we are trying to point out is there is no speaker. In the mirror if you observe very carefully, you might see that what is necessary physically, that same idea has been brought over into the psychological realm and that has become much more important than the other. One can have very little food, not be concerned, but don't interfere with my power - I want position, I want this, I want that psychologically - you understand what I am saying? Are you discovering this in the mirror for yourselves? Or I am pointing it out and you observe it and accept it? That accepting is merely a form of persuasion, a form of pressure. Where there is pressure, acceptance, there is no investigation.

So we come to something else, which is: can you be free of pressure? You understand? To observe the pressure of institutions - right? The institution of the church, the institution of the government, the institution of so many things. The word 'institution' comes from the Latin and so on, to stay, be put where it is, don't move. So we are generally under great pressure of institutions: perhaps you may not be aware of it, but if you observe you are. Institutions democratic, totalitarian, socialist, economic - you follow? - this constant pressure. Then there is the pressure of ideologies, the ideal, which is perhaps more deadly than the economic pressure; the pressure of theories - right? Do you know all this? Are you aware of all this? The pressure of books, the pressure of knowledge, the pressure of authority, the pressure of a family, the pressure of the wife or the husband, the girl and boy - this constant pressure. And the pressure of experience, of knowledge - do you understand? It isn't just the pressure of somebody over you, the government or somebody, but inwardly this enormous pressure of having acquired experience, knowledge, and that knowledge is putting pressure all the time, do this, don't do that, this is right, that is wrong, you must have more knowledge, is one aware of all this? I am afraid not. And the pressure of relationship - right? We won't go into all that. We will a little later as we go along.

So we are saying: you cannot observe this extraordinary structure of the centre, the concern about the centre, and to observe that freely without any pressure there must be freedom to look. But most of us are under pressure. Most of us when we observe have a motive, the motive becomes the pressure. "When I observe I must understand it, I must get beyond it, there must be a reward at the end of the beastly show". You understand? This great constant pressure through motive, through desire, through reward, avoiding punishment and so on; as long as there is that weight, observation into the cause why human beings have reduced themselves to such narrow little human entities, so concerned about themselves from morning till night. Otherwise you wouldn't have gurus. Otherwise you wouldn't have priests and religions. Otherwise you wouldn't have all these enormous complex psychological priests - you understand? All that indicates naturally this concern about oneself.

And can one live without this concern at all? Then only there is peace, then only there is love and compassion. Where there is a centre held by thought as the 'me' in a narrow groove there must be suffering, and the violence and the brutality, the cruelty, the hate, the whole of that is centred there. That is an actual fact.

Then the next question is: is it possible to break it down? Not with a chisel and hammer, as most of us are apt to do, psychological hammer, psychological chisel - making an effort, discipline, control, sacrifice, denial - which are all hammer - right? So we are asking: is it possible to break it down, these walls that one has built round oneself, without a single movement of effort? Because if you make an effort you are identifying yourself with what will happen when you break down the wall - you understand? Which is still another structure of the narrow self, I wonder if you see all this? Yes? Right? So can this be broken down? That is the problem. That is really the central issue for all humanity. There is no other issue, politically, religiously, economically, than for man to end this colossal self centred thought, this subtle selfishness which breeds division and all the rest of it. That is the central issue. And that is the central issue of religion, not all this circus that is going on in the world, in churches, in mosques, in temples, in religious gatherings. The essence of religion is the ending of the self, totally, completely.

If you have looked into the mirror carefully, seriously, not merely at your face, or your hair, or your eyebrows, your colouring and all the rest of it, but look without any direction, because the direction is a distortion. Please understand this one thing and then you will be able to see in the mirror very clearly. We are always acting in a particular direction - success, you know all the rest of it, I don't have to go into details. So can you observe without any movement - the movement being thought looking? I wonder if you see that. When you look at anything, it doesn't matter what it is, thought is looking. Have you discovered that? Or imagination, fancy, memory, the past - right? Can you look without the movement of all that? Otherwise you can't see clearly. See the logic of it, the reason of it. If you see the reason, the logic, the sanity of it, that very sanity will put that aside. You understand? It is the unhealthy that bring all this in. It is the healthy that look because they are sane. Which means sanity is not possible when you remember all your illnesses, all the past pains, but when those are put aside you can look very clearly without any difficulty. The looking then pushes aside all those things which are not sane - you understand what I am saying? The very urgency of looking puts aside those things that prevent actual looking - right? Is this clear? One thing clear. The very urgency of something - you understand? - you forget about everything else. The urgency of someone dying, of fire, the urgency dispels totally the movement of the past: you act.

Looking in the mirror, and you are looking in the mirror without any persuasion, without any pressure because there is no speaker but you are just observing yourself in the mirror - and the reason, logic has told you the world with all its violence, brutality, insanity is brought about by this centre in the name of peace, in the name of Christ, in the name of nationality, brotherhood, and all the rest of it. Can you look? And the intensity and the urgency of watching dispels any interference of thought, with all its images, associations. Are you doing it? Or are you listening to the speaker when he says there is no speaker? You understand? There is no speaker, and I mean this desperately, passionately. And I say this with great affection, love, because then you are looking at the mirror yourself, not the speaker is influencing you, coercing you, urging you, persuading you. So you are here, if one may point out, not to listen to the speaker, but to listen, observe yourself in the mirror. And the whole history of mankind is revealed there. And when you look with intensity it becomes so very simple.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 11TH JULY 1978

May we continue with what we were talking about the day before yesterday? Before we go into that, I would like to ask if I may, with all due respect and all the rest of it, why you are here? Why you come to these talks and discussions? Is it out of curiosity? Is it that you have nothing better to do, therefore you might just spend an hour or so here? Or since you have apparently taken a lot of trouble to come, you must be fairly serious? If you are serious how far are you willing to go? Not another long journey physically, but inwardly, psychologically, inside the skin as it were, how deeply you are willing to go? One can go very deeply only, if you are willing, not with an intellectual concept of depth, then if you have an intellectual concept of depth, then it takes time to travel into that depth. And you may be serious enough to find out for yourself whether you can observe this whole movement of time, the measurement, height and depth, climbing and descending, enquiring into depth, which requires also a great deal of time and energy? Or there may be a totally different action, which doesn't involve physical expansion, the travelling from this country to India to find some ugly guru or beautiful guru, but rather to have a quick perception into things, to have an insight, an immediate understanding, immediate contact with actually 'what is'. Not with what you think 'what is', or what you might want it to be, but actually perceive in its entirety what actually is taking place. When one observes so totally, holistically, then that gives an insight. From that insight you act; therefore insight and action are immediate, not a postponement of action. So that is what we are going to enquire, if we may this morning, if you are willing, and if that is what you want to discover.

And as we were saying the other day, why throughout the world human beings are so occupied with themselves, with their groups intellectually, with their physical beauty, or whatever it is, and psychologically, inwardly, so anxiously occupied with themselves, with their understanding, whether they are meditating properly, whether they do the right posture, whether it is the right thing to do, what one should do - this constant expanding enquiry and occupation about themselves. If one discovers for oneself the danger of such occupation, the actual, not only psychological as well as physiological danger of this centralized occupation, then perhaps one can clearly and easily go into the question 'why'. Why human beings, of which we all are, and every human being if you enquire into it more deeply, is the representative of all humanity, and that is very important to understand because every human being right throughout the world suffers, is anxious, uncertain, in despair, elated and confused, attached. So all human beings are that. So you, when you look at yourself very carefully, objectively, non-personally, then you will see that you are like the rest of humanity. And that discovery that you are actually, truly, irrevocably the representative of every human being, that gives you an extraordinary sense of vitality, strength. This is not mere sentiment, a romantic concept, an intellectual idea but an actual daily fact.

So we were saying the other day, this occupation limits energy. And when energy is limited, narrowed down, canalized, it begins to lose its pristine vitality, energy. And from this narrowing down of self occupation with oneself, if one observes, this has created a lot of misery in the world, when each person is occupied with himself, with his ambitions, with his fulfilments, with his despairs, with his fears and so on and so on, you have no relationship with anybody else. You may think you have but actually you have no relationship when the whole of your mind is occupied with one's own progress, with one's anxieties, with one's problems and so on. It is so obvious. But though it is very obvious we do nothing about it. On the contrary we work at it, improve it - it is called self-improvement, to become better, but always within the narrow limits.

So, that is what we were talking about the other day. Perhaps some of you are new to this, so if you are new to what is being said, don't say to yourself, "Oh, that is old stuff. We have heard all this in different ways before". Or say that he is repeating what somebody else has said. Or you don't quite understand the vocabulary - we are using ordinary English language, no jargons, no specific meaning to special words, but ordinary, daily English. And if we both are speaking English communication becomes easy, but verbal communication is not nearly enough. You can understand that it is a lovely day, fortunately, but when one goes deeply, enquires extensively, wisely, hesitantly, the words are not enough. Words are never the thing, the description is never the described. So one must be not only aware of the meaning of the words but also the word is not the thing.

Then one begins to enquire very, very deeply, slowly, hesitantly, without any conclusion - right? Like a first-class lawyer or a surgeon, he doesn't bring all his concepts, he first enquires into the case - the case is us, we are the problem. So we must be very clear what is our problem, which I begin to question whether we are. We are so diffused, emotional, sentimental, so we are always colouring the problem, looking at it from a very, very narrow, limited point. Isn't that so? So one has to be very advisedly careful that in our examination into why human beings are so destructively occupied with themselves, in enquiring into that, and whether it is possible to be totally free from the occupation, completely. Freedom is the complete dissolution of the self. Then there is freedom. We are going to go into all that.

Does one see the actual danger of this self-centred occupation? That occupation may identify itself with a nation, with a group, with a particular ideal or belief. It is the same process. I hope this is clear. When I identify myself with a group, with an idea, with a belief, with a conclusion, that identification is the very essence of being occupied with oneself - right? When one is occupied with say, internationalism, you have moved from occupying yourself with yourself to something with which you identify yourself. Therefore that identification is still the occupation with oneself. Is this clear? When I identify myself with Christ or Jesus, or Krishna, or whatever it is, I am still in the process of identifying myself with that, but it is still occupation with myself. I wonder if this is clear? Can we go on if that is clear?

So this central issue is whether one can exist healthily, sanely, harmoniously without identifying with anything? Not only outwardly but inwardly. Identifying myself with my experience, identifying oneself with the family, with beliefs, with institutions and so on. That means can one live in this world with no identification? Which means can one live harmoniously, both with the outer and the inner without any sense of occupation and identification? Is this clear? Let's be clear of the problem first before we operate on it. When one is occupied with oneself, with one's body, with one's beauty, with one's eyes - you know, this constant occupation with oneself, you deny actually all relationship, though you may sleep with another, you may hold hands with another, say "Darling how are you" - all that, but the identification process separates human beings. And from that, violence, wars, division of races, everything takes place - right?

Now the next question is: whether it is possible to live in this world daily without any sense of identification? Not only with the senses, with the body, but with the day, with all the past, the heredity - you understand? - the Englishman, the German, all the history of all the past, to be completely free from all that and yet live in harmony with activity in daily life. Is this problem clear now?

First of all there is no speaker. As we pointed out the other day, you are speaking to yourself, you are looking at yourself. The speaker may be the mirror, but the mirror has no value. You use the telephone to speak, but the telephone itself has very little importance. What you say in the telephone is important. So similarly, there is no speaker here. You are talking to yourself, you are observing yourself, you are observing your occupation with yourself, and the result of that occupation in your daily activity, which is creating such chaos in the world. When people identify themselves with Russia, with a certain ideology, you become terribly brutal, you are willing to torture people and so on - we won't go into all that, everybody knows about it, every magazine, every newspaper goes into all this.

So the next question is: can the mind totally dissociate not only with the knowledge which it has acquired and stored up to which it becomes attached, but also can the mind remain not in isolation, because when one thinks, if one is not occupied oneself you have no relationship to others. You are so totally isolated. Those are all concepts, conclusions, theories. So what we are saying is: can the mind, including the brain, the senses - when we use the word 'mind' we are including all that, the brain, the movement of thought, the experiences accumulated as knowledge, memory, the whole momentum of thinking, and the senses, all that is the mind, which is essentially consciousness - right? - can that mind, which has been so conditioned through millenia, because our minds, brains are very, very old, it is not something new that we have acquired when you are born, it is a tremendously old mind heavily conditioned to occupy itself with itself. Can that mind free itself completely from the past, which includes knowledge, tradition, heredity, all that, and actively, sanely, live in daily life harmoniously? Is this possible? Right? You understand the problem? The identification between the Jew and the Arab in the Middle East, what happens when the Russians are occupied with an ideology and forcing man to shape himself according to that ideology, the authoritarian totalitarianism, which is destroying and so on and so on and so on. Does one see this centralized occupation is an enormous danger that is going to destroy man?

Then the problem is: how to disentangle, how to unravel all this and put it all away? Right? Now what is your answer? I am not answering it, you are answering. You are looking in the mirror. There is no speaker. You are looking and asking this question. If you ask this question looking in the mirror you might say "It is not possible" - that is the instinctual response, to say it is not possible. If you say it is not possible then you have blocked yourself - right? That is natural, isn't it? But if you say it is possible, that also means you have blocked yourself. Both negative and the positive is a way of avoiding the issue - right? So you are looking at the mirror, there is no speaker, and you are neither accepting nor denying, saying it is, or it is not possible, but looking.

So here comes the problem: whether you are actually looking, or you are looking at an idea which you have projected. You understand my question? Whether you are actually looking in the mirror, or you are looking with the conclusion or idea, or a hope and through that hope, through that idea, through that conclusion looking at yourself. You understand? When you do that you can't see. If I am prejudiced about you because you wear a white shirt, or a blue shirt, or crinkly hair, or this or that, I can't - it is silly, if I want to have any contact with you it is not possible. But to look at oneself in the mirror and find the answer for yourself in the mirror, because nobody is going to answer it, then you might say, "Why are we here? If you don't answer this question as the speaker, what the dickens am I sitting here for?" Which would be a natural response. But as we said, we are human beings. There is this immense problem confronting us, a crisis, danger, destruction, and sane, healthy serious people must answer this, find an answer out of all this. So looking at the mirror where there is no speaker, you say is this possible at all, to move out of this habitual constant, apparently irrevocable movement of this occupation? Right?

So, are you looking at the mirror? Or looking at the idea that you have a mirror in front of you? You see the difference? Do you? The idea, which is not the fact. The idea is an abstraction of the fact, a movement away from the fact. So if it is terribly important that you find the answer urgently, seriously, then ideas have no place, you are actually looking. Then what takes place?

Here comes a different problem: whether you are looking as an outsider in, or you are in it, not outside. That is, are you looking as though you were different from that thing which you see? You have understood? This is fairly simple, isn't?

Now I am going to begin differently: which is, when you are jealous, greedy, angry, violent, are you different from that violence, greed, envy, anger? Are you? Or you are that anger? That greed? That violence? So can you observe yourself in the mirror not as an observer but only the thing that is being observed, without the observer? Does this become rather difficult? Or is this old hat that you have heard before umpteen times and you say, "Well, please get on with it"? But this is very important to understand, because as long as there is a division between the observer and the observed - you understand? - there must be conflict, there must be effort, there must be a sense of either conquering it, suppressing it, or avoiding it. So to totally eliminate altogether effort there must be no division - right? If there is no division between the Jew and the Arab, it is finished. From North Ireland to South Ireland - it is over.

So in ourselves there is this division, the observer and the observed, which is dualistic - you follow? And we are conditioned through education and culture and all the rest of it, through religion, so-called religion, to maintain this division, to see god. You are nobody - you follow? - this whole division, which is the corridor of opposites. And when there is the corridor of opposites there must be conflict, effort, practice. So it is absolutely necessary to understand that there is only observation, not the observer trying to control the observation, that which is observed. Is this clear? Can one do this? You may hear this. You may say, "I see the gist of it, I have a feeling for it, I think what you are saying is true", but it avoids you, it escapes, but it is yours, you have to find out. Which means that as there is no division between yourself and anger - right? - you are anger, at the moment when you are angry there is no observer, you are only that. Later on you say, "I have been angry" - then you say, "I shouldn't be angry" - or you give reasons, explanations for being angry. Or you suppress anger. The moment of anger, of greed, of violence, there is no division. This is a fact. So similarly, is there an observer at all? Please give your mind, your attention, your love, your care to understand this because we are totally, completely eliminating conflict, if you understand this. One can live a life in which there is not a shadow of conflict, not only within yourself but outwardly. And this is immensely important to understand, because, as we said, the manner of your observation in the mirror - there is no mirror, you are watching yourself, but for the moment we invent the mirror. Who is the observer? You understand? When you say, "I observe the tree, the stream, I observe you and I observe myself", who is this observer? That is very important to understand before we begin to understand the observed - right? Are we coming together?

Are we communicating with each other? Say yes, or no, for goodness sake. Are you all asleep?

So who is this observer? When you say "I have been angry" or "I have been violent" - who is that entity that says, "I have been"? That entity is the observer, isn't it? Who says, "Yes, I have been angry" Is not the observer the past, who says, "I have been angry"? Right? Not only in that instance, but whenever he observes, the whole observation is the movement of the past. I observe a Frenchman - because I have been told he is a Frenchman, you follow? - the conditioning, the past, knowledge - right? So this whole movement of observation is born from the past. So the observer in essence is the past. Right? Don't accept what I am saying. That is a fact. Looking in the mirror there is no speaker, because you are questioning desperately, anxiously, passionately, you are questioning. I hope you are!

So the observer is the past - past memories, past experiences, past knowledge. With the past he is observing himself in the mirror - right? So you have created a division between what you see now and what has been. So there is a division between the observer and the observed - right? Are you getting this? So the conflict begins. In your occupation with yourself, don't you have a conflict with another, however intimate your relationship be? So to totally eliminate that conflict permanently, everlastingly, one must understand the nature of the observer - right? And as you observe and enquire, and learn, the observer is the past, so the past is always divided - right? I am a Jew and you are an Arab. The Jew is tradition, propaganda, belief, certain mode of life and so on and so on and so on; and the Arab has his own mode of life and so on - right? So wherever there is division there must be conflict, not only outwardly but inwardly - right? Is this clear? That is, if you are serious, if you want to live completely without contradiction, without effort and therefore live in peace, live in love and compassion. If that is to be, you must eliminate totally the division in yourself outwardly - have you understood this? This is not an idea, an intellectual concept but actuality.

So can you look at yourself in the mirror without the observer? This is the real issue in which identification ceases and therefore division. You understand? Where there is no identification there is no division. So can you observe your anger, your violence, your hurts and all the rest of it, without bringing in the past memories, past knowledge, past struggles, just to observe without the observer? Then what takes place? I am not asking the question, you are asking the question yourself. Then what takes place when you are looking at the fact? Not with the memories about the fact - right? Is this possible? Can you do it? If you can't you cannot go further, because this is a very important issue as man has lived millenia upon millenia, constantly in battle with himself, with the devil and god, with the lower self and the higher self - you understand? This battle, this conflict, you see it in all the ancient pictures, drawings, the division between that which is good and that which is bad, constant battle. And why should we live in this way?

So we are going to enquire and find out if it is possible to live totally in a different way. That is if you are serious. So do you see the truth, not the idea, but the truth, the fact, the reality, that the observer is the past, accumulated memories, knowledge, and so, he never perceives the present? To perceive the present there must be the absence of the past, obviously. And there is no effort involved in removing, or putting aside the observer, because you see it is so - you understand?

Let's put it differently: is love a remembrance? What do you say? Is love something that you have remembered and then you say, "I love you"? So if it is a remembrance, a thing that is past, then it is merely pleasure, and that pleasure says, "I love you" because it wants more of that pleasure - is that love? The speaker is not here, you are asking this question yourself, you have got to answer it, you can't sit there and deliberately think about it. You have got to answer it.

So can you observe this fantastic enduring occupation with yourself? Observe it without the observer - you understand? Then is there an occupation? I wonder if you see this? Occupation with yourself is the movement of the past. "I have been that, I must be different from what I have been. I am a failure, I must be a success. I am depressed, I must be happy. I am not good but I will be good. I am not virtuous but I will have virtue. I will understand" - you follow? This whole movement of identification and occupation is born from the past. Because if you don't identify yourself with something, with a human being, with an idea, with a country, with a family, with something, with a rock, what are you? So the fear of being nothing makes you identify, makes you occupied - right? Face it. That is a reality, it is not an intellectual structure. If you are not identified with your country, with your body, with your god, with your knowledge, with your wife or girl-friend, or boyfriend, you are empty, aren't you? Right? If you are empty, in that emptiness there is tremendous energy. But we are so frightened of this emptiness, this void in oneself. And to avoid that void we occupy with god, with society - you follow?

So the next question is: are you listening to the mirror which is telling you that there is no observer, that the observer is the past, and most of us live in the past? "How beautiful I was when I was young. How quickly I could walk when I was young. What a lovely time I had, I ate so much, I enjoyed so much." - you know the past, living, living in the past. That is the observer. So the observer creates the division, and the whole conflict begins. Now do you see the truth of that? Not the words of it, not the meaning of the words, but the fact of it? If you don't, why don't you? Is it that you are incapable of thinking, observing, watching, or your brains have gone so old, or you are not concerned?

So is it that you don't actually see this fact: the observer creates the division, which is the past - the Jew and the Arab, the Hindu and Muslim, the Catholic and the Protestant - the past creates this division and conflict, both inwardly and outwardly? Do you see what danger that is for humanity, for you and your children and all the rest of the stuff?

Then when there is no observer then there is only observation; the observation of the senses, without identifying with the senses - you understand? Can you observe without identifying yourself with the senses, can you observe the movement, the activity of the senses, whether it is sexual senses, taste, smell and all the rest of it, the activity of the senses? From which arises the question: is there an observation of the whole movement of the senses? Not one particular sense. Are you meeting all this? Then when there is an observation of the whole movement of the senses, there is no centre which identifies itself with the senses.

Am I talking to myself? If I am talking to myself I will go in my room. But I am not, you are talking to yourself. There is no speaker. So this requires no discipline, no practice - right? When you practice, again there is a division - right? But to see instantly the fact, the truth, that is insight, which we began this morning talking about having insight; having an insight into the whole movement of identification.

To observe the whole movement of the senses without identification, which means, is it possible to observe without forcing yourself, without disciplining yourself to watch, to practise? Because when you do, again you have brought in this whole dualistic effort. And can you disassociate, can the mind disassociate with its tradition, with its conditioning of identifying, which creates duality? You understand? Do it! Can you disassociate and not identify with your girl-friend? Can you be free of attachment, which is identification, obviously? Attachment to your country, to your group, to your family, to your children - you follow? - attachment, holding on to your name, to your ideas, to your conclusions. Does that non-identification with another, does it end in isolation, does it end the fact of love? Do you understand my question? Do we know what love is? Not know intellectually, verbally, volumes have been written about what love is, good god! Can we, looking in the mirror, ask these fundamental questions? When there is no identification or attachment with another, does it mean the end of affection, the end of tenderness, the end of love? Because now when you are attached we say, "I love you". You have to look at it, answer it.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC TALK 13TH JULY 1978

I am glad it is such a lovely day. We ought to be in the woods.

We were saying, weren't we, the last two times that we met here that this identification with our bodies, with our experiences, with the house, with the family, with the nation, with a particular ideology or belief has brought about the emphasis on the self, the 'me', the ego. And that has cultivated this idea - and I am using the word 'idea' in its proper sense - the idea of an individual, that we human beings are separate, distinct individuals apart from everybody else. This emphasis on individuality has created a lot of mischief. It has destroyed families - I don't know if you are aware of that - it has brought about excellence in achievement, in technology, a sense of highest endeavour on the part of a particular human being, the individual, the individual enterprise. Opposed to that there is this whole ideology of the totalitarianism. So we have these two opposites. On the one side freedom, so-called freedom; on the other no freedom at all, except for the few. And as one observes throughout the world, the excellence of the individual has brought about certain beneficial results, not only in the technological world, but also in the artistic world. And though the individual thinks he is free, is he free actually? And on the other side of the coin, is the totalitarianism where there is no freedom at all, except for the few.

Now what is the truth of this? It is obvious there must be freedom. What do we mean by that word 'freedom'? Again let us be very clear that we are asking this question of ourselves, that the speaker isn't asking, you are asking. As we said, there is no speaker here. You and I are the speakers. You and I - this person talking - are enquiring together into this question: on the one side the enormous importance given to individuality with all its identification, nation, house, family, capitalism and socialism, whatever it is; and the other identification with the ideological society. Society there becomes all important according to the few. And in enquiring into this we must first ask, if I may suggest, what is it we human beings are trying to do? What is it that we human beings, not Mr So-and-so, Mrs So-and-so, as human beings without labels, without nationalities, without all the rubbish that has been pushed down our throats by other people as well as by us over other people, what is it that we human beings are trying to do in this world? What is it that we are seeking, that we are searching, that we are longing for? And one of the questions involved in this is: what is freedom? We think we are free because we can travel, go to America, go anywhere you like if you have money and the inclination. And on the other side you can't travel, you can't leave the borders, they are controlled.

So what is freedom? Perhaps most of us, at least those who are serious and thoughtful, aware, must inevitably ask this question: what is freedom? Is freedom to do what you like, as an individual? Is freedom a permissive activity? That is, each one wants to do what he wants to do. If he wants to believe in god, he believes in god. If he wants to pursue and take drugs and sex and all the rest of it, he is free, if he has the money and if he has the inclination and all the rest of it, to go with it. And we have considered this kind of activity freedom, to do what one likes to do, what one wants to do, what one wants to fulfil. Or trying to find in freedom identity. You know all this. So is this freedom? Or, is freedom something entirely different? We think of freedom as being free from something, from poverty, from a person you have married that you don't want any more and you are free to divorce and all the rest of it. Free to choose your activity in the business world, or in the psychological world, or free to believe what you want to believe and so on and so on and so on. One is free, one thinks, in our choice to become a Catholic, or a Protestant, or not to believe in anything at all. You know all this.

So is that freedom? Please ask yourself this question, not me. You are facing the mirror, looking at yourself, investigating into the whole psychological structure of yourself. And our conditioning has been to do what we want to do. And we have never enquired into what it is that urges us to do, either to go Left, Right, or whatever it is. And as long as there is identity with a nation, with a family, with a husband, with a girl, with this belief, with that dogma, ritual, tradition, is there freedom? You are following all this? You are asking these questions. I am only voicing your enquiry. As we may point out again, we are not authoritarian here, there is nobody as far as the speaker is concerned with any sense of authority, any sense of superiority. There is no dogmatism, there is no belief. And if the speaker is rather emphatic, it is not an assertive, aggressive expression, it is his natural self.

So we are enquiring if there is freedom in its total sense, not from something to something else, or from something else to something else? We are enquiring into this whole feeling of freedom, if there is such a thing. And as long as the mind, thought, sensation, emotions identify themselves with a particular object, a piece of furniture, a human being or a belief, is there freedom? Obviously not. The moment you identify yourself with something you are denying freedom. If I, because I like the idea of some supreme being and all the rest of it and I identify myself with that and pray to that, worship that, is there freedom at all? So we are discovering that there is no freedom as long as there is an identifying process going on - right?

Please, words are dangerous, don't, if I may suggest, don't translate what is being said into your own words, into your own language, into your own opinion, but actually listen to the words we are using, because then we are in direct communication. All right, let me put it this way: language, that is the usage of words, the meaning of the words, the syntax, language drives most of us - right? When you say, "I am a Frenchman" - the word is active and forces us in a certain pattern. So language uses us - right? I do not know if you have not noticed it. When you use the word 'Communism', or 'Socialism' or 'Capitalism' or a Catholic, a Protestant, a Hindu, a Jew and so on, these are the words which act upon us and force us to think in a certain way - right? So language is driving us, using us. I don't know if you are aware of it. And if you use language, not language drive you, then we are using words without any emotional content. Then there is a possibility of exact communication. Are we getting somewhere together? Please understand this because we are going to go into something which I think, I am not sure yet, which will come out of all this in our enquiry into freedom, in our awareness that identity destroys freedom, curtails freedom, limits freedom. And if you are satisfied with that limitation of freedom then you must also be aware of its consequences, which is separation, which is continual lack of relationship, effort, war, violence and all the rest of it follows.

And in enquiring into ourselves we must also be very clearly aware that language is not driving us. That when we use the word 'Communism' we kind of withdraw from it emotionally. Or if you are socially inclined the Capitalist world of America and so on, again the same thing. So one must be aware very seriously, if you at all want to go into all this, which I am not urging you to do, then being aware that language is not driving us, then we can use words in their simplicity, in their meaning without any emotional content. Then you and I are in constant communication - right? Can you do this? Not tomorrow, now? Then we can proceed together, not at a slow pace, but galloping along.

So if freedom is not all that; that is, there is only freedom when there is absolute non-identification with anything, with the church, with the gods, with beliefs, with a statue - you follow? - with nothing, then what are we, as human beings? Do you follow my question? I will go into it.

If we are not attached to anything at all and therefore under no influence - right? - and under no pressure, then what is the whole meaning of existence? I wonder if you follow all this? Do you understand? Does somebody understand what I am talking about? I am sorry if you are Spanish, or Italian, or French, that you can't understand what is spoken in English, but perhaps this afternoon or tomorrow it will be translated in your own language, so please have patience.

We have filled our minds with all kinds of ideas of what we are

- you are noble, ignoble, we are divine, we are experts - you know
- filled ourselves. And this acceptance of what we are is the result of the movement of thought. Right? We will have to go into this again.

If you have observed, whatever we do, act, emotionally or non-emotionally, all our activities are based on thought. Now thought is limited. I do not know if you accept that, or if you are aware of it.
Why is it limited? We think it can do everything, climb Everest, go to the Moon, go to the depths of the sea - thought is the most active, most important, vital thing in our life. All our education is to cultivate knowledge and encourage thinking clearly, if you can, and act from thought. And thought has created not only the technological world, but also it has created wars, not only marvellous surgery but also thought has created conflict between two human beings. These are facts. Thought has created the quick transportation. Thought also has created the destruction of all human relationships. And one must, if you are at all serious, go into this question: why thought has become so urgently important?
As we are talking together you are thinking - right? You are following verbally. So the activity of thought is going on; trying to understand what is being said, trying to judge whether it is right or wrong, what value has it in daily life - you are all the time enquiring with the instrument of thought. And thought has created heaven and hell, not only the Christian world of Hell and Heaven, but also actual hell and heaven. The enormous poverty, the misery, the confusion, the uncertainty of existence.

So how is it that thought has created these problems, and thought thinks it can solve these problems - right? And all the politicians are trying to solve our human problems through thought, either cunning stupid, devious, dishonest, but still thought. Can thought solve this problem, which thought has created? Right? You understand my question? So one must ask: what is the meaning of thinking? What is the source of all thought, not only yours, mine, or somebody else's, the root of thought? If the root is limited, the outcome of that must also be limited - right? You can't think thought will do something extraordinary, if the root is limited all its activities must be limited - right? So what is the root, the very source of thought? Find out sirs. I have asked the question, don't wait for me to answer it. Then you accept what I am saying, that would be disastrous. But whereas if you are really passionately, urgently demanding to find out, you will find out what is the essence, the beginning of thought. I will point it out, don't accept it.

The beginning of thought is the brain registering danger or not danger, the pleasure and the fear - right? The original man - or the ape from which we have come, or same source from which we have come - that the brain which is very, very old, ancient beyond words, it must have registered danger, death, fear, security - right? So the beginning of thought is the process of registration, which is memory - right? We are not saying anything extraordinary, these are facts. And what has been registered is knowledge, knowledge of danger, knowledge of pleasure, knowledge of the fear between the two. And this accumulating process of knowledge, which is constant registration, day after day, centuries upon centuries, registration, which is the accumulation of knowledge, that knowledge is in the brain, and that knowledge, which is memory, and from that memory thought is born - right?

Questioner: Rubbish.

Krishnamurti: One moment. Sir, if you are disagreeing with me it is all right. Don't agree or disagree. We are not arguing, showing off who is clever, who is less clever. But we are just enquiring, not asserting anything.

So memory, knowledge is the outcome of the past - right? So the past is limited, knowledge is limited. You may have more, more, more but it is always limited. And there have been people who say man can ascend only through knowledge, rise higher and higher and higher. The philosophers, the speculative romanticists, say that knowledge is the essence of growth. Which is, the past will always remain, the past, by accumulation, is evolution. As an acorn, a little thing grows into a marvellous huge oak tree, so that same attitude, or that same example is transferred to this accumulated knowledge, growing, growing, growing. We have never asked whether knowledge is limited and therefore can knowledge end and something begin? You understand my question?

So thought born of memory, knowledge, is always everlastingly limited. And our activities therefore are always limited, based on thought. Right? It is not my argument. It is not what I posit and start from there. But if you go into this yourself, not according to some professor, not according to some theoretician, psychologist, then if you do you become secondhand human beings, which you are. But whereas if you look into yourself and go at it surgically, not emotionally, then you will find out that thought because of its very limitation has created all the problems - right? Is this clear between us? Is this clear to yourself, not between you and me? All the scriptures, all the poems, all the literature, all the rituals, the gods, the images, everything is the product of thought. Horrible idea, isn't it, when you realize it?

So when there is identification with something, thought is a process of identification, therefore that identification limits, limits the energy, and that energy is used as an individual. Therefore the individual becomes more and more limited, and his action then will be limited, obviously. Which is what is happening. England on one side, Europe on the other, America, Russia, racially, politically, religiously, in every way - all that is based on thought. And is there an action - please, we are enquiring - is there an action which is not based on thought? Therefore an action which is not limited, confined, which means is there an action which is not based on knowledge, on memory, on remembrance? Don't say, "That is impossible", or "It is possible" - we don't know, we are enquiring, we are asking. Because in limited action there is regret, mischief, pain, anxiety, whether you have done the right thing or the wrong thing - all that follows from limited activity, which is called the individual. And the individual, limited, is seeking the infinite. Theoretically they can assert there is the infinite, but to find out, to come upon that infinite, that thing which is not measurable, one must go into the very, very depths of thought. And is there a possibility of action without registration? Got it!

You understand? You tell me something, you use cruel words and you call me a name. I am hurt. And most human beings in the world are hurt, not only physiologically but much more psychologically. You are hurt, aren't you? And from that hurt we do all kinds of things - resist, withdraw, fear, violence, bitterness and so on and so on and so on. This hurt is, if you examine it very closely, is the movement of thought in the formation of the image - right? Thought has created an image about oneself, that you are beautiful, that you are intellectually marvellous, that you are etc. etc. And when you use an ugly word, angrily point it out, that image gets hurt; which is, thought - please follow all this - that thought, which has created an image about itself, that image gets hurt. Which is: can one live right throughout life without a single hurt? Then only is there freedom, then there is only sanity.

So is it possible not to register the hurt? You understand my question? All our brain is in constant registration, and when you say something ugly to another that is registered, that is called hurt. And is there a possibility of not registering at all? Do you follow my question? Therefore we have to go into the question: why the brain registers certain things and avoids other registration? And it never avoids the individual concepts, images, structures, ideas. One must obviously register when you want to drive a car, to do certain kinds of skills you must register. If you want to be a good technician you have to have a great deal of technological knowledge stored up in the brain, which is a process of registration - right? So knowledge as a process of registration is, in certain fields, absolutely necessary - right? That is clear.

Then why should there be any other form of registration? Do you understand my question? I have identified with myself, with my image; that image is put together by thought, the thought of another, parents, education, whatever it is, society, culture. That image has been put together by thought, which is a continuous process of registration. And is that necessary? You follow my question? It is your question. Why is there psychologically, inwardly this constant activity of accumulating round the centre, which is the self? Right? Which is obviously limited, which has been cultivated by thought and therefore essentially limited. When I think about my own occupation, how I must be happy, how I must be a success, I must be this, I must be that - it is all the movement of thought which is bringing about constant limitation, throttling, narrowing down, which we call individual. And that individual has activities, naturally, which activities are essentially mischievous because they are limited.

Now we are asking, knowing logically, sequentially, reasonably, that any form of registration, apart from the registration of necessities, technological knowledge and so on, every other form of registration limits action, and from that limited action comes all our misery. And that limited thought says, "I am going to meditate, I am going to practise, I am going to find god", or whatever you like to call it. You might just as well call it dog, it is as good. So thought is the registration of an incident, accident, anything that is registered must be limited, and that limitation, in its action, will create a great deal of mischief. So we are asking whether it is possible not to register, except in certain fields, not to register at all? This is real meditation, you understand? Nothing else is meditation. Because when there is no registration the whole brain cells themselves have become transformed. It is not the same old brain cells, new things are taking place, because there is no need for registration - you understand?

That is, thought is measure - right? Thought is the out come of time, which is the accumulated memory of five, ten million years, centuries - whatever. It is the result of time - right? So thought is time. Time is limited, obviously. That is, there has been yesterday, today, and tomorrow. But thought can say there is still further, but it is still the movement of thought in time. Right?

So we are asking: is there a possibility of no registration at all, except there? What is your answer to that question? You understand? This is a tremendously important question. Don't brush it aside as an intellectual something or other of this or that. Because so far we have lived in action which is always bringing sorrow, misery, confusion, uncertainty and fear, regrets - right? We have lived that way. It is our heredity, it is in our genes, it is our conditioning. And is it possible never to register at all, and therefore no identity with anything? You understand? The moment thought identifies with something, with a piece of furniture, with a shirt, with a blouse, with a house, with a wife, with a husband, girl, or whatever it is, that limits thought and therefore that limitation is born out of registration. That is, as long as you remain a Catholic you are limited. As long as you say, "I am an Indian", or I am this or that, you are limited. And any action, action of love, any action must be limited.

So if you are serious you are asking this basic question, a fundamental question, which you must answer: is there a possibility of not registering at all? That is, is there an action not born of thought? Do you understand my question? All our action is based on thought, with all its consequences. Now we are asking: is there an action, is there a way of living in daily life, in which thought doesn't operate? You understand this is very serious, it isn't a question that you just play around with and discuss and all the rest of it, one has to find out. That means you must put passion into it, vitality, energy to find out. Those who do research, scientific research, or technological research, they love it, it is their life, their blood, their bread-and-butter, everything is first, and their wife, their family comes second. In the same way we are asking, passion, is it possible? I say it is, I will show it to you. Please don't accept it because you don't know what it means, so don't come to any conclusions, don't translate what is going to be said into your own terminology - then you are lost! Then you are driven by the language which you know. Therefore you become a slave to a language. But we are using language, not your conclusion, my conclusion or his - just words without any circus round it. Then we can communicate happily and easily.

There is an action, a total, complete, holistic, whole action in which thought doesn't interfere at all. Are you waiting for me to tell you? That's rather cheap! I do all the work, the speaker does all the work and you just listen and say, "Yes, I agree". What is the point of that? But whereas if you really, you know, desperately want to find out, like an unhappy man, a drowning man - you know there is desperation to find some kind of thing to hang on to, so he can be saved. There he exerts all energy. And that is what we are doing.

First of all, do we see very clearly, each one of us, wherever we are, whatever our situation, whatever our conditioning, however neurotic we are, and most of us are, do we see very clearly that thought under all circumstances is limited? Not a verbal acceptance of it, but an actual fact, which you in your blood see it, irrevocably? Then if you see that, not as an idea, not as a conclusion, not a thing reasoned out and therefore it is still thought. So when you realize that thought is completely, totally wholly limited, and from that limitation all our activity, whatever type it is, must be limited and therefore in human relationship it creates havoc, misery, from there you ask the question. You understand? Not if you haven't done all this. And you can do all this instantly, not take time, years, months. Then you can ask: is there a perception devoid of memory, devoid of remembrances, totally divorced from the past, is there an observation and therefore out of that observation action? Do you follow what I am saying? You all look puzzled. All right I will take it up again.

You understand our action is based on memory. Either ideological memory, a Utopian memory, or memories of past actions which have left certain marks on the brain, and all such activity must be continuously destructive in human relationship. If I love you because you have been pleasant to me, which is, you have given me something, sexually or in this way, or that; which is from memory, with the pleasure of it I say, "I love you." So is there a love which is not born of memory, which is not the result of give and take, which is not sensation? Obviously there must be. There should be. Or is this all we know? Let us put it that way. This thing that we call love is all this. And that love breeds jealousy, anxiety, possessiveness, attachment, you follow? And out of all that there is great misery. And is that misery love? Don't say "No" or "Yes". If that is not love, and you have totally abandoned jealousy, anger, all that, that which is left completely, that is love - right? So in the same way, if one understands the whole movement of thought, as measure and time, and born out of the past and therefore endlessly curtailed, limited, narrow, if you see that very clearly and therefore abandon it, then you have what one may call insight. I am going to go into this very slowly.

Insight: insight, we mean by that word, according to the dictionary, to have a sight in something, an immediate perception of truth in that which is being talked about. That is, you have talked to me about the limitation of thought. You have talked to me. I have listened to you with all my energy because perhaps there is a new way of living, a new way of action, and I have realized my actions have always been bringing such sorrow, confusion and misery. I have listened to you. And you say to me, "Have you really seen the truth that thought is limited?" - the truth of it, not the idea of it. Seeing the truth of it, is to have insight. Have you got it? That insight is not memory, is not idea, is not something out of the past. You see directly the truth of it and from that there is action, which is complete.

So do you, as a human being, and you who are the representative of all humanity - so you are the world - if you see the truth of this then that truth will act in the world. You don't act.

So we have seen the mischief of thought which is limited, which has created the individual, and the opposite of non-individuality which is totalitarianism and all the rest of it. We have also seen that thought, stored up in the brain as memory, knowledge, those very brain cells have become limited. For god's sake see this. Of course, obviously. But when you have an insight into all this, the very brain cells are no longer limited. The brain cells are functioning totally differently. Do this, please, do it. Don't say, "Yes, how marvellous". "What a wonderful speech that was" - which is all romantic nonsense, emotionalism. That has nothing to do with actuality. Can you see the truth that knowledge has its place, technologically, and has no other place psychologically, which is to register? So if you see the truth that registration, like hurt, brings narrow action, limited action, from which hate, violence and all the rest follows. To see the truth of it, then you have an insight into the whole movement of thought. Therefore thought then limits naturally itself and remains there. You don't have to say, "I must stop thinking" - that is too silly. When you understand thought as measure, measure being comparison and the whole - oh, there isn't time now. I must stop. So, if this is clear then we will talk about other things on Sunday.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 16TH JULY 1978

Probably this morning there are some new people who have come for Sunday and I hope they won't treat this as an entertainment, or some intellectual, oriental, romantic nonsense. At least for some of us this is a serious meeting, those of us who are committed, involved in trying to find out a new way of living, not based on some ideological belief, on some authority, on some speculative conclusion and so on. We are concerned, as we were saying the other day, about freedom. And also we were pointing out that we were influenced, shaped, controlled by the environment, by institutions, ideas, beliefs, and conclusions. And also, as we were saying the last three meetings here, we are driven by language, and this is very important for us to understand how language, the words control us, shape us and drive us - which we went into sufficiently deeply and I'm sorry we are not going to go into it again this morning.

And also we said where there is identification, not only with the family, with a belief, with a nation, with a group, or identifying oneself with a particular object, whether it is handmade or created by the mind, to be attached, to be identified with any of these things prevents complete freedom. And that freedom is necessary, as we pointed out in our investigation together, which doesn't mean doing what one likes, fulfilling one's own desires but freedom from all the things which are binding us, like jealousy, fear, pleasure, beliefs, identifying oneself with a particular group or idea, guru and ideology, practices and so on. That is more or less what we have been talking about the last three times that we have met here.

I think this morning we should go into something which is part of what we have been talking about. Most of us are afraid to use reason, to think clearly, objectively, non-emotionally, not from a particular centre, either the centre outwardly or inwardly. And to think clearly implies that there is no centre from which you are operating in your thinking. I think we should go into this problem fairly deeply.

Most of us think along a particular line: if you are specialized you think along those grooves; if you are committed to a particular religion, an ideological structure, again your thinking is conditioned by that. So we begin to lose the capacity to reason. Reason implies a certain quality of scepticism, doubt, not accepting anything, either from the psychologists, professors, or from the sacred books - there are no sacred books, they are only printed books, like other books, but we give them importance because they happen to be old, people have said they have been uttered by saints or by some teacher, and so we give to a printed word tremendous importance, which is to be driven by a language. So where language drives us we cannot reason properly, sanely. Or we cannot possibly reason logically if you are committed to a particular belief, or to a particular ideology because then, if you are committed or identified, you go round and round that circle, round that particular ideology or belief. You don't think wholly, completely, deeply. So reason we thought is something intellectual and anything intellectual we throw out - that is the latest fashion! Whereas we need this capacity to reason, which I said implies doubt, scepticism, the freedom from every form of authority, including that of the speaker, specially so, because the speaker is rather intense about these matters therefore you may be influenced by that. So don't. Think clearly for yourselves, and to think clearly you must have no motive, or goal, a direction. If we have a motive that controls your thinking, if you have a goal, a purpose, a direction that controls your thinking. And you may logically, reasonably think along those lines, but they are conditioned thinking, narrowing thinking - right? Is this clear?

So as we said, the other day, there is no speaker here. We are looking at ourselves and our activities, our beliefs, our fears, pleasures and the whole problem of life in a mirror. The mirror is objective - if your face is clear, it reflects exactly, if it is a good mirror, your face. Similarly, we are together exploring, together going into - as we have done in the previous talks - our human ordinary daily problems. Because if those are not very clear, if those are not established deeply we cannot go any further. It is like building a house on sand.

So as we said, we are talking to ourselves. We are questioning ourselves, whether we think logically, reasonably, and therefore sanely; or our thinking is illusory, based on some belief, based on some ideals, or on some past experience. Then if it is so you can't discover anything new.

And also we were saying the other day, all our activities are based on thought - whether you build a marvellous building, the technological extraordinary advancement, and thinking in your relationship with each other, every action is based on thought. And we said thought is always, under all circumstances, limited. We went into that very carefully, why it is limited. Because thought is the outcome of knowledge, which is the past. So thought is time binding - right? We are using ordinary, daily English. This is not a special jargon. So thought is time binding, time being the past and thought is the outcome, response of knowledge, memory stored up in the brain. This is obvious. Think for yourself, observe for yourself, it becomes very clear. We are not brain specialists. But we can see that the brain is an enormously ancient instrument, very, very old, conditioned by recording danger, pleasure, fear and so on. So thought is the movement of time, and thought is measure: "I will be better. I think I am this but tomorrow I will change to something else" - all this is a matter of measurement. The more, the less, depth and height, horizontal and vertical, is all this movement of measurement - right? Measurement implies comparison. Most of us compare ourselves with somebody else, always something much greater, not with the poor people, but higher, more intellectual and so on. So thought is limited under all circumstances, therefore thought is never free, thought is a movement in measurement.

And we asked ourselves the other day the question: as all our action is based on measurement, the past, the present and the future, and therefore limited, and any action that is limited is bound to bring about great sorrow, great conflict, travail, anxiety, fear and so on; and we asked ourselves: is there an action which is not based on thought? Probably none of you have asked this question. Some may have asked it casually when you yourself perceive that thought has brought about certain troubles, certain fear, then you begin to question it. But you don't go very deeply into it. You say, "Yes, is there a movement, is there a state of mind in which thought as measure, as time, in action doesn't operate?" - right? We went into that very carefully. We said that there is an action which is not based on memory, which is not based on knowledge, which is not the result of some wish fulfilling, but when one understands the nature, the structure of the whole movement of thought, not intellectually but factually, that thought has its right place - when you want to go to your home, when you want to drive a car, when you are involved in technological business, there thought is necessary. But is thought necessary in human relationships? You understand my question?

We are going to ask this now: is thought in our relationship with each other, man, woman, intimate, not intimate and so on, in that relationship what place has thought? Or, thought has no place whatsoever. We are going to enquire into this together and find out, not speculatively, but factually, actually in daily life.

So we are enquiring into relationship, to be related to another. Is relationship a movement of identification - you understand? I am asking these questions for you. You have to answer it for yourselves. You are related to somebody, no one can exist without relationship. In your relationship with your wife, or with your girl friend, with your boy friend, or whatever it is, is it based on thought? Or you say, "No, it is not based on thought, it is based on love". That is the most phoney word ever used because through that loaded word 'love' we escape. We never face the fact. The fact being whether in our relationship with each other, intimate or otherwise, is thought bringing about this relationship? If it is not thought is it senses? Sexual sense, sense of the feeling, the sensation of being together, companionship and so on and so on, all based on thought. The senses become the instrument of thought. Thought then identifies itself with the senses - right?

Please don't go to sleep, don't meditate. You don't know what that word means, we will go into it. You are investigating, you are exploring, you are searching to find an answer to this. You can't just go off into some kind of dreamy state. Because all our life is based on relationship, whether that relationship is very near or very far. And also may I request you - I am not forbidding it, I am just asking you - if you take notes you can't pay attention to what is being said. That is obvious. What matters is that you listen, ardently, passionately to find out, listen. Then if you want to find out, no guru, no system, you have to throw all that out to find out. Which means, you have to find out on what basis your relationship is. If your relationship is based on thought, which actually it is if you investigate deeply, then thought being limited your relationship with another must be limited. And hence two limited relationships bring about conflict. Don't you know in all our relationships we are in conflict with the other - no? The wife, the husband, the girl and the boy and so on.

Therefore to find out what relationship is, not only must we enquire into what it actually is, which is based on thought, conflict, quarrels, jealousies, fears, domination, possessiveness, identification, and all the rest of it, we have not only to find that out, be aware of all that, but also one must enquire: is it possible to be free of all that in relationship? You understand my question? Right? Please, I am not talking to myself. We are together, and we mean together. It is your life. Together we are trying to find out - no, not trying - we are finding out, there is no trying. That is another lazy word. "I am trying to do my best" - which means nothing! But we must find out if there is a relationship which is not based on thought, thought being remembrance. You have hurt me, I remember that. And you have given me pleasure, sexually or otherwise, I remember that. And also you have hurt me, you have praised me, you have given me comfort, all that is stored up as memory, and on that memory thought is born and I say I am related to you. This is normal daily life.

And we are asking - or rather you are asking: is there a way of living where thought, which has its place, naturally, even in relationship - but in actual relationship is there the absence of thought altogether? That is what we are going to find out. You understand? I hope we are making the question clear to each other. That is: one is related as in most cases, which is a relationship of pain, anxiety, identifying oneself with that person, quarrels, nagging, jealousy, annoyance - you follow? Those are the daily, common, routine facts. If one is aware of that very, very clearly, not escape from that, then we can ask the question: is there a relationship with another which is not based on thought, that is on remembrance - right? Are you also working? Not casually. You are working so that you are perspiring? To answer that question you must investigate why the brain records. That is, you have said something to your boy or girl, or husband or wife, some ugly words you have used in annoyance, or you have used a pleasant word to each other - all these words are registered. You follow? That is the process of the brain to record in order to protect itself, because the brain can only function in perfect security. It is only when it is insecure that it acts neurotically. Right? Or being insecure you find somebody, a guru or some priest, or some psychologist, and accept him as your authority, and the brain says,

"Yes, that is quite safe" - do you follow?

So we are asking - please listen to this - is it possible in your relationship with each other, in one's daily activities of relationship, is it possible not to register either the insult or the flattery? Not to register at all. Find out. If you don't register your relationship is entirely different. Right? Now is that possible? It sounds a marvellous theory, an extraordinary idea, a way of saying "By Jove, if one could live this way it would be very simple". Now please don't translate what is being said into an idea, into some kind of visionary, hopeful, happy theory. We are actually trying to find out if it is possible not to register either the sexual remembrances, which makes one further sexual, the pictures and all the rest of that business that goes on with regard to sex, and that is remembered, stored up, encouraged through the cinema, films, pictures, the whole western world which is spreading all over the world, encouraging this memory. Can you as a human being find out for yourself why a hurt, a pleasurable incident, is registered? From that registration thought begins - you understand? Is that possible? It is only possible when there is attention, non-identification is relationship. Am I making something clear?

One takes one's wife, or one's girl, or one's husband for granted. Right? No? You get used to it, it is part of you and you have got used to so many things, and so you add another addition to this. Now to be attentive, and that is only possible when you don't identify yourself with that woman's or boy's mind. Right? Can you do this? Non-identifying oneself with another, and therefore being free to be attentive. Not attentive and then free, non-identification. But non-identifying first and then out of that comes attention. You understand?

Now can one, as a human being, non-identify yourself with another? Not only with another but with ideas, with a group, with a sect, with a guru, with the whole business of it, which means you are free? Out of that freedom there is attention. How can one be attentive if I have identified myself with you? You may be most affectionate, most kind, I may want your kindness because I am lonely, I feel desperate, so I identify, you encourage me, you say, 'That is nothing, you will get over it tomorrow old boy, get on with it' - you give me comfort, you give me sex, so instinctively I identify myself with you. The moment you identify yourself with another you bring about a separation. Right? Obviously. So when there is separation there must be conflict - right? So can you find out now sitting here, not tomorrow, not when you go home, actually now, find out if you have identified yourself with her or him. And extend that identification extensively - ideas, beliefs, dogmas, with Jesus, or with Buddha, this or that, or ideologically, nationally and so on. Begin with the nearest and expand - you follow? We are apt to begin extensively but not near.

So can you find out if you are identifying yourself with another? The moment you use 'My girl' or 'My boy', you are caught. So the 'My wife, my girl, my husband' - the words are driving you, because those words are emotionally explosive. So you are being driven by words, whereas if you are free from identification and therefore from the emotional content of 'My wife, my husband, my girl or boy', then you can use words normally, unemotionally, sanely. I wonder if you get all this?

So can one not identify? And why do you identify? You understand my question? Why? Is it that through identification with another you are escaping from yourself? Go into it, please. Are you? Or you may identify yourself with another because you are lonely, or you are frightened to be nothing. You understand? To be absolutely empty, psychologically, I don't mean biologically, food, I don't mean that. Are these the reasons that you have never asked this question and if you ask this question is it that you are frightened to face yourself as you actually are? Therefore identification with another becomes a means of escape from what you are. So then you ask: what are you? Of course you are your name, your form, the body, the organism, the face, but that is a biological or physiological nature. But what are you? Are you not the result of all the structure and the movement of thought? Don't say, "I am the higher self" - if you do say that, that is part of thinking. Or if you say, "I am divine inside, covered up with a lot of muck," that is also thinking. So are you, apart from your face and curly hair, or dark brown, black or purple or whatever it is, apart from that, stripping yourself of words, are you not the result of words? "I am British" - or French, "I am a Russian", "I am a Catholic", "I am following this guru" - so are you not the result of thought? And we said thought is limited. So what you are is very limited. That limited entity says "I am this, I am that, I have got millions of dollars, or I have a jolly good life, or I have a miserable life, or I am this or that" - but it is still in the narrow, limited area of thought. The Hindus, the ancient Hindus invented a very good thing. They called it the Atman, the Higher Self, the Supreme thing. And that supreme thing is still born out of thought. But people are so gullible, so unreasonable, like to live in illusions and make-belief, they accept all this.

So we are saying: when you strip yourself of your conclusions, of your words, of your experience, what are you? You are nothing. You are empty. So consciously, or unconsciously, the feeling that you are nothing, you get frightened of it and then you begin to identify. Then you fill that emptiness, at least you think you can fill that emptiness with lots of ideas, with lots of relationship, with lots of knowledge, etc. etc. Right?

Now, just a minute: can thought, can the mind observe that emptiness and not move away from it? You understand my question? That is, one must understand something here. Are you getting tired? If you are, it is all right. We must go into something else here. which is: most of us are accustomed according to tradition and conditioning to be active, to do something - right? So we are accustomed to what is called positive action. Anything that is not positive action is called negative action - right? You are following this? Our brains, our minds, our habits act according to this positive action, to do something: I am afraid, I must control it; I am greedy, I either act to fulfil it or control it. So most of us are trained to act, which is called positive. And in that positive action there is also negative action which is not to do anything about it, go off to sleep, or cover it up, run away from it. But there is another action, which has nothing to do with the positive - I wonder if you understand all this? - which is no action at all. You understand? The one is to act: I am lazy I must get up, force myself. I must do yoga, I don't want to do it this morning but I must do it, it's good for you. You know the word yoga - I won't go into it now, sorry, we will go into that another time. That is an exploiting, moneymaking concern, that word.

All right. So we are trained, our habit, our tradition, our conditioning is to do something about what we feel. And in that positive action there is negative action, not to do anything about it, just to run away from it. Now there is, we are suggesting, enquire into it, please don't accept it, we are saying there is another kind of action unrelated to the positive, which is non-action. We will go into that in a minute. You understand? The non-action is not the opposite of action. That action is very limited because it is based on thought. Whereas non-action, not being related to the opposite, is entirely different, which we will enquire into presently.

So our question is this now: one has heard, if you have paid attention to it, one has heard that identification with another brings about separation, because that identification with another is based on your own emptiness, on your own loneliness, on your own desire to escape from yourself, but the escaping from yourself, your loneliness, is always there. You understand? It is always there, you may identify yourself with another but it is there. Therefore that creates separation - you understand? And hence quarrels and all the rest of it follows, divorce and everlasting struggle in relationship. Now can you observe this identifying process and the cause of identifying without any positive action? Without doing something about it? You have understood what I am saying? I will go into it, if I may.

One becomes aware if you have listened to it very carefully, that you are identifying, that is an actual fact. And the actual fact is that you are identifying because you are frightened, you are lonely, you are empty, you feel anxious, therefore you identify. Now can you observe that without any action? Just to observe it, as you observe the majesty of the mountains, the running waters, just to observe. Then if you so observe, which is non-action, then the thing that you are observing undergoes a fundamental change. It is only when we are positively acting about it, then we are acting as a separate entity and therefore conflict. I wonder if you get all this? Right?

Now, let's go into something else, which is: most of us, probably all of us in some measure or other, are frightened. Our life is so uncertain, specially now. There is uncertainty of livelihood, uncertainty of wars, uncertainty of these pressures of the world, the enormity of two powers, what is all going to come out of it, and so on and so on, politically, we are anxious. That means we are frightened. You may lose your job. Physiologically as well as biologically one may get ill - again there is fear. And psychologically, inwardly there is the fear of loneliness, fear of not succeeding, fear of not being loved whatever that may mean, fear of dark - you know, fear, with all its many, many branches. Right? If you are not afraid - good Lord! There is no guru, there is no authority, there is no search, you are a marvellous human being.

So we are going to find out, enquiring together, not me alone, find out whether it is possible to have no fear whatsoever, both physically as well as psychologically. Are you interested in this? I am not asking for encouragement. Because to live under fear is the most appalling thing, it is living in darkness, it brings a sense of shrinking, isolation, you cannot solve this thing, therefore you withdraw. And from that withdrawal, fear, all kinds of neurotic actions, ill health, psychosomatically it reacts - right? So you must, if you are at all serious, go into it very deeply, you must find out for yourself if fear can end.

If one may ask, are you aware of your fear? This is not group therapy - you understand? We are just enquiring for each one, not a group of us enquiring, that is too meaningless. I am asking you: are you aware of your fears? If you are, do you see the consequences of it? The running away from it, rationalizing it, suppressing it, or avoiding it and the identification becomes greater and greater and so on? Now what is the root of fear? You understand? Not, I am afraid about something, or because of something, or I am afraid that you might do something, but apart from that, the very root of it? Do you want to find out the root of it, or are you waiting for an answer? I can answer it. But then what happens you either say, "Yes, that is so", you accept it and it becomes an idea and you have gone away from the fact. So you have to ask this question for yourself. What is the root of all this enormous sense of fear, in our relationships, in our activities, in our jobs, in our future life - you know, the whole business? Do you ask it, ask the question to totally cut the root, or you are asking intellectually? You follow? I wonder if you understand? Look, I will explain it.

I want to find out why I am afraid. I can find out the various causes of it, that is fairly simple. I am afraid because I have done something I shouldn't have done, and you might discover it, therefore I am frightened. Or I am afraid I might lose my job, I want a better job, and so on and so on. Or I am so attached to my wife, I feel at any moment she might leave me and I am frightened - you follow? The whole business of fear. Am I actually in contact with fear? Or am I in contact with the idea of fear? You understand? Which is it? The idea of fear? Or, actual fear? Come on somebody. Please, madam, don't take notes for the love of Pete. If you take notes, you can't listen. It is your problem. The writing down is not at issue now. But to find out.

Now I can investigate, analyse the cause - right? The cause and the sequence. I can analyse it. But analysis doesn't solve the problem. You must know that. Because the analyser thinks he is different from the analysed - right? You may have heard this before so don't get bored with this, or smile and say "He is going back to the old stuff" - but you have to understand this. If you understand it, if you see the truth of it, then you will do something. We are not analysing but observing. Analysis is entirely different from observation - right? Observation implies without the observer, to look. Whereas if you analyse the cause why, and the reasons and go on analysing, analysing, there is implied several things. Which is: that the analyser is thinking that he is different from the analysed, and that involves time, an endless process of analysing, analysing, analysing, and at the end of your life you are still analysing, without bringing about a fundamental transformation. Whereas if you observe, just to observe, that is, without any analysis, just to look, which is negative action. The positive action is to look, analyse, do something about it. Whereas the negative action, which is totally different from the positive action, is to observe - right? Then that observation not only tells the story of what is being observed, it tell you the story of what is being observed, and also that observation itself brings about a movement of change in that which is being observed. Right? Do get this. Even the so-called scientists are agreeing with what we are talking about, so we are quite safe! That is, if you watch through a microscope some cell, if you come to it with a conclusion, with wanting to use it for further purposes and making money, or whatever it is, then you don't see the movement of the cell itself changing. You understand this? So to observe without any movement of thought, any movement of trying to change it, any movement to go beyond it, just to watch. When you watch so closely, without any sense of direction, motive, the thing that you are watching itself undergoes a fundamental change. Full stop. Are you doing it? Not agreeing with it. Can you watch your fear in this manner? It doesn't need practice. That is one of our pet theories. If you are interested, if you are concerned in the freedom of fear, you observe. And that observation is passionate. It is not just casual, intellectual observation.

So can you observe the fear, the root of it, which we will go into in a minute, without any analysis? Now what is the root of fear? All fear? What do you think it is? Is it not time? Right? I might be ill. I might lose my job. I might be discovered in the wrong things which I have done. I am afraid of death, which is in the distance. I am afraid my wife might get angry - might. Just look at it. I am not asking you to accept it. Just observe it. First reason, logic, non-personal and therefore look. Is not fear the movement of time? Movement means time, from here to there, from the past to the present, from the present to the future. All that is movement, which is called time. Now, is that movement of time not thought? I think I might lose my job. I think my wife may be angry, or my wife may discover that I have looked at another woman, and so on and so on. So can you observe the movement of time, which is thought, which is the root of fear, observe it without trying to do something about it? It is like a scientist looking through a microscope, and if he projects what it should be, or what it might be, that remains as is, because he is dictating what it should be. Whereas if he is not dictating, if he is just looking, that very thing at which he is looking through a microscope begins to change, begins to move. You understand?

Are you doing this? Which means: observation implies the absence of the observer, who is the past, who has got theories, conclusions, hopes, fears, directions and so on and so on and so on. To look without the observer. That does not need discipline, that does not need practice, just to look without you wanting something out of it. Then you will see, if you so look, the very root of fear is beginning to completely change. That means the root, observing so carefully, alertly, with passion, the root begins to dissolve, which is the action of negation. Have you got something of this? You know this is part of meditation. Meditation is not repeating some words, sitting quietly cross-legged for 20 minutes in the morning, 20 minutes in the evening, all that nonsense. How can a mind meditate if it is full of fears? Or is attached to something? The understanding and the freedom from fear is part of meditation, it is totally, entirely related to daily life.

We have been talking over together the question of fear and whether after hearing it, after hearing our conversation together over this weight of fear, if one is at all free of it. Or one has merely heard it, saw the reason of it, the sanity of it and cannot do anything about it, and then just drift along. I wonder what one actually has done, each one of us with regard to that question of fear, and the identification of oneself with one's friends, family, furniture, house, country, ideas and so on. Whether after these four talks one has actually ended all identification and therefore there is a great deal of freedom, not relative, but freedom.

And when one asks these questions of oneself, whether we ask superficially, intellectually or as you would ask a question that affects you most profoundly, most seriously. (sound of an aeroplane) I am afraid, we are going to have lot of disturbance today; it's a lovely day for flight. And after asking these questions of oneself, and if we are at all serious, getting the house in order - our house, which is you. And when we put things in order in our house we are free, we have more energy. It is only when there is disorder that we waste energy. And order implies that one has understood deeply what are the movements of disorder in oneself, why we live, perhaps even in our own rooms, in such disorder. Or having in one's house order, in oneself there is such abiding deep disorder, uncertainty, why such human beings live in this disorder, from the moment they are born until they die - why? Why do we tolerate to live in such conditions?

I wonder if you have asked yourself these questions. If you have

- perhaps some of you have - and discovering that one is in disorder, mechanically sets about to put everything in oneself in order. Thereby one cultivates discipline, follows a pattern, a pattern laid down after two thousand years, or ten thousand years, or the patterns laid down by some guru, some priest, some specialist in so-called spirituality. Or try to escape from this abiding, endless, seemingly endless, disorder, try to identify oneself with something that is supreme order, which is the cosmos, the heavens, the whole universe. I wonder what you, looking at yourself in the mirror which tells you exactly what is, I wonder what you do about this disorder? Is one aware that one lives in disorder? Is one aware that one lives in contradiction? This constant conflict between 'what is' and 'what should be'.

(sound of an aeroplane) I told you, it's going to be a difficult morning. If one asks oneself these questions, are you listening for an answer from yourself? Or are you listening for an answer from somebody else? I am afraid most of us are inclined to find order, not understanding disorder, in investigating what is order we easily accept some specialist, some authority, some priest, some guru who will tell us what is order. So our minds are becoming more and more mechanical because we accept a pattern of order, like a soldier drilled day after day, day after day, month after month, drilled, the drums beating out his brains. So we follow, accept, obey, conform. Is not that conformity, obedience, acceptance the very root of disorder? As we said, please do not accept anything whatsoever the speaker says. And I really mean it. These are the questions you are asking of yourself.

So does one discover for oneself how extraordinarily mechanical our actions are, our attitudes are, our reactions are? And so our brains, our whole existence becomes a routine. And that routine has made our minds - I mean by mind the brain, the thought, the whole content of our consciousness, the senses, all that I mean by the word, is conveyed by the word 'mind': consciousness, the senses, the movement of thought, the content of our consciousness, all that is the mind. I am using that word in that sense. We may alter later on, next year or tomorrow use a different word, but for now we are using mind to convey all that. If you observe in the mirror, don't you find that your mind, the whole content has become extraordinarily mechanical? You are Christians, or if you have given up your Christianity, you belong to something else, or if you have given that up you belong to something else. Or you follow a certain routine, a certain way of thinking according to your opinions, experiences, which always function within a narrow limit - right? Have you noticed this, that your mind is mechanical? Because please, we are going into something which is perhaps rather difficult. I don't know where it is going to lead us. It may become a little more complex therefore please give a little attention.

You know when you have a small child with you, you listen to the cries, you listen to the words, the murmur, you are so concerned, you listen - you may be asleep but the moment he cries you wake up. And you are all the time attentive because the child is yours, you must care for it, you must love it, you must hold it, and so you are tremendously attentive even though you are asleep, you wake up. Now could you so listen with that same quality of attention, affection, care, listening to every movement of that child? Could you do it in watching the mirror, not me, you are not listening to me, listening to the mirror, which is yourself, to what it is telling you, with that extraordinary concentrated affection, care? Will you do it?

So we are asking: why have human beings become so mechanical? That mechanical habit obviously produces disorder because if you are all the time functioning within a narrow limit, in that narrow limit there is always this energy limited and therefore it is struggling to break through, which is the essence of conflict - you understand? No, don't understand me, understand what the mirror is saying, there is no speaker here. So can you observe with that care, with attention, which is the feeling of great affection for what you are going to listen to?

We are talking about disorder. And we live in disorder, of habits, of beliefs, of conclusions, of opinions. This is the pattern we live in, which naturally, being limited, must create disorder. Now when one is in disorder to seek order is wrong, obviously, because the mind that is confused, unclear, seeking what is order will also be confused, will also be uncertain. That is clear. But whereas, if you look into disorder, if you understand the disorder in which you live, the causes of it, the movement of disorder, in the very understanding of it, out of that understanding comes order naturally, easily, happily without any compulsion, without any control. You understand what I am saying? This is what the mirror is telling you: that to understand, not verbally, intellectually or emotionally, but to understand the movement of disorder in oneself, why this disorder comes about, and you can discover the causes instantly if you give attention, that attention which you give to a small, defenceless child, which is to have an insight into disorder.

So what is the root of disorder? The root of it. There are many causes of disorder - comparison, comparing oneself with another, comparing oneself with what he or she should be, imitating an example, example being somebody who is a saint - you know, all that stuff, I don't have to go into all that nonsense. Or conforming - right? Conformity, imitation, adjustment to something you think is beyond that which is - right? So there is always conflict between 'what is' and 'what should be'. Got it? Which is to compare, which is the movement of thought: I was this, or I was happy and some day I will be happy again. So this constant measurement between 'what has been' or 'what is' and 'what should be'. This constant evaluation brings conflict and that is one of the basic reasons of disorder - right?

And another cause of disorder is operating from the past. Now is love a movement of time, of thought, of remembrance? You understand? Do you understand my question? The question the mirror is asking you, in which you are looking. And is this love, so-called love, not creating such extraordinary disorder between human relationships? Right? Look at it yourself, for god's sake.

Now what is the root of disorder? You can see the causes and we can add more, that is irrelevant. In examining what is the root of it don't analyse, we have been through that, just look. If you look without analysis you have an immediate insight into it. If you say, "I will examine, I will deduct," or from outside analyse, induction and deduction, it is still the movement of thought. Whereas if you can observe with that care, with that deep attention in which is involved a great deal of tenderness, affection, then you have an insight. So we are asking: what is the root of it? Go on sirs, find out. What is the root of our disorder, inward disorder and therefore outward disorder? You can see what terrible disorder there is in the world, agonizing disorder, people are killing each other, and the dissidents are being tortured, put into prison - you follow, all that is going on. We tolerate all that because our minds accept things, or try to change a little bit here and there. So what is the root of disorder? Which means you have to go into the question: what is our consciousness? You understand? What is your consciousness? As you look at yourself in that undistorted mirror, what is your consciousness? And that may be the essence of disorder. So we have to investigate together what is our consciousness.

Our consciousness is a living thing, a moving thing, it is active, not something static, closed, locked up - it is not like that. It is a thing that is constantly changing, but changing within a small limited border. It is like a man thinking he is changing when he changes a little bit there, in one corner, and he doesn't transform the rest of the field. So we have to understand the nature and the structure of consciousness. We are doing that to find out if that is the root of our disorder. It may not be. We are going to find out. So what is our consciousness? Is it not everything that thought has put together? The form, the body, the name, the senses with which thought has identified itself, the beliefs, the pains, the tortures, the agonies, the discomfort, the depressions and elations, the jealousies, the anxieties, the fears, the pleasures, my country and your country, I believe in god, I don't believe in god, Jesus is the most important, Krishna is much more important - and so on and so on and so on. Is not all that your consciousness? No? You can add more to it, in detail - I am brown, I wish I were lighter, I am black but black is beautiful and so on and so on. The past, the tradition, the heredity, the whole tradition of mankind is based essentially on this, its mythology - all that is the content. If you were born in India, or in Africa where Christianity is not the fashion, they have their own gods, their own images, their own forms of worship, that is part of their consciousness, as you have it here, only they call it by a different name, but essentially it is the same pattern. Right? And as long as one is unaware of the content of consciousness and acts, then that action must be limited and therefore disorder - no? You understand? Thought in its movement must create disorder unless thought has realized its proper place, which is knowledge. Knowledge is limited and therefore it has its proper place. That is clear. We have gone into this. I won't go into it over and over again.

So thought born of yesterday, or ten thousand million yesterdays, is limited, and the content of our consciousness is therefore limited, and our consciousness, however thought may say that this consciousness isn't limited and there is a higher consciousness, it is still a form of consciousness. You have got it? So thought which hasn't realized its proper place is the very essence of disorder. Right? Do you understand? This is not something romantic, vague, nonsense, but you can see for yourself if you are logical, sane, clear, that thought, being limited, must create disorder. Like a man who says, "I am a Jew", or "I am an Arab" - or a Chinese - he is limited, and therefore closing himself, resisting and therefore wars and all the misery begins. Right? Do you actually see this fact? - not as an idea, not something that somebody is telling you, but see it for yourself as you see, hear the cry of the baby. Then you act. You get up.

And part of our mechanical way of living is born out of this limited consciousness - right? So is it possible not to expand consciousness? Do you understand the meaning of that word? To expand, to enlarge it, to add more things to it, more knowledge, more experience, more moving from one corner to another, trying to enlarge it. There are schools which are doing this, by practice, by discipline, control, all that. So when you are trying to expand consciousness there is a centre of measurement. You understand? When you try to enlarge anything, enlarge a house, there is from a small foundation, a large foundation, you enlarge, there is a centre from which you enlarge. Similarly there is a centre from which there is an expanding, which is measurement. It doesn't matter if you don't understand: look at yourself. Aren't you trying to expand your consciousness? You may not use that word. You may say, "Well, I am trying to be better" - "I am trying to be more this or that" - or to achieve. So as long as there is a centre from which you act there must be disorder.

Then the problem arises: is it possible to act, function naturally, happily without a centre, without the content of consciousness? Do you understand these questions? We are putting fundamental questions. You may not be used to that. Most of us put questions rather slackly, or indifferently and move off. But we are asking questions that you must answer, must find an answer, go into it to discover for yourself the answer. Is it possible to act, to live our daily life without the centre? - which is the essence of disorder.

That is, in your relationship with another, however intimate it may be, if you are all the time concerned about yourself, your ambitions, your personality, your beauty, your habits, you, in your relationship with another, and the other is also doing the same naturally there is conflict, which is disorder.

So is it possible not to act from a centre? We have gone into what is the centre. The centre is this consciousness with its content, and the content is all the things which thought has put together, with its sensations, with its desires, with its fears and so on and so on. Right? What is that action in which there is no contradiction, no regret, no reward or punishment, therefore an action that is whole - you understand? We are going to find out. We are going to find out, not I find out and answer it, tell you, but together we are going to find out, remembering that there is no speaker but only the mirror in which you are looking. To understand it we must go into the question of what is love. Because if we can find the truth of what is love that may completely dissolve the centre, completely bring about a holistic action. So we must go into it very, very carefully, if you are willing. That means are you willing to listen? You have your opinions about love, obviously. You have your conclusions about love. You say love cannot exist without jealousy, love exists only when there is sex, love exists only when you love all your neighbours, love the animals and all the rest of it. You have a concept, an idea, a conclusion about what love is. If you have then you cannot possibly investigate - right? If you already say, "This is so", you are finished. It is like one of those gurus who says, "I know, I have reached enlightenment" and you being gullible follow him. You never question him.

So here there is no authority, there is no speaker, but we are asking a very, very serious question, which may resolve the conflict, the control, the constant battle between oneself and with another. And to find that out we must go very deeply into this question of what love is, not what compassion is. I am talking of love. Don't bring in another word and then confuse it. We are just talking of what human beings call love. Love their animals, their pets, love their garden, love their house, love their furniture, love their girl or boy, love their gods, love their country - you follow? - this thing called love, which is so loaded, which is so trodden upon. We are going to find out what it is - right? Don't go to sleep! Or take notes. I believe you are going to have cassettes, which you can hear afterwards, if you want to. But to take notes while the baby is crying, that is a good simile for you, you will understand it, saying why is he crying, writing it all very carefully! (Laughter). So please pay a little attention, that is, to hear, that means the art of listening. You know that baby when he cries, you are listening with all your mind. The art of listening means - the word 'art' implies to put everything in its right place. If you understand the meaning of that word really, that is the real art, not painting pictures and all the rest of it, that comes secondary, or tertiary. But the art of putting your life in its proper place, which is to live harmoniously, when you have put everything in yourself in its right place you are free. That putting everything in its right place is part of intelligence. Then you say you are giving a new meaning to that word 'intelligence'. One must. Intelligence implies reading between lines, between words, between two silences, between speech, listening, so that your mind is all the time alert to listen. You not only hear with your ear, but also you hear without the ear.

So we are asking: what is the meaning and the beauty, if there is beauty, of love? That gives me an idea - not an idea. Have you ever considered what beauty is? What does beauty mean? Is it connected with desire? Don't deny it, look at it, carefully listen, find out. Is beauty part of desire? Is beauty part of the senses? You see a marvellous building, the Parthenon, an ancient Greek or Egyptian, or one of these cathedrals, marvellous buildings - your senses are awakened by the beauty of that. So is beauty part of this? And is beauty the face, the colour, the shape, the bones in the face, the clarity in the eyes and the skin and the hair, and the expression of a man or a woman? You understand all these questions? Or there is another quality of beauty which may transcend all this beauty, which when that is part of this life then the form, the face, everything has its place. Whereas if that is not captured, if that is not understood, the outward expression, the outward - all that becomes all important - right? So we are going to find out what that beauty is. If you are interested.

You know when you see something like that marvellous mountain against the blue sky, the vivid bright, clear, unpolluted snow, the majesty of it drives all your thoughts, your concerns, your problems out of it. Have you noticed that? You say, "How beautiful it is" and for two seconds perhaps, or for even a minute you are absolutely silent - right? Haven't you noticed it? Which means what? The grandeur of it drives away for that second the pettiness of ourselves - right? So that immensity has taken us over - right? Do you understand this? Like a child with an intricate toy - for an hour he is occupied, he won't talk, he won't make any noise, he is completely absorbed in that. Which means the toy has absorbed him - you follow this? I am getting tired. You understand?

So the mountain absorbs you and therefore for the second, or the minute you are absolutely quiet, which means there is no self. Now without being absorbed by something - you understand? - either a toy, a mountain, or a face, or an idea or this or that, to be in oneself completely without the me, is the essence of beauty. Do you understand all this?

So we are going to find what is love. Because if we can find that out our life may be totally different. One can live without conflict, without control, without any form of effort. We are going to find out.

First of all, as we said the other day, there is positive action, an action which is non-action - I went into that, right? Need I go into it again? In positive action there is doing something about it, controlling, suppressing, effort, dominating, avoiding, explaining, rationalizing, and in the very process of analysing, rationalizing, there is an action which is considered positive, doing something about it. Right? And we are saying there is non-action, which is not related to positive action, it is not the opposite of it, which is to observe without action. Then that very observation, as we pointed out, brings about a radical transformation in that which is being observed, which is non-action. Do understand this, a little bit. It doesn't matter. It is your life. We are so used to doing positive - right? "I must", "I must not", "This is right", "This is wrong", "This is correct", "This should be", "This must not be", "I'll suppress it, I'll control" - all this is struggling with the me, which is the essence of disorder, which is the essence of conflict. If you see that, not verbally or intellectually, or optically but actually see the truth of it, then there is non-action, in which there is no effort. Mere observation itself changes that which is being observed.

So we are asking: what is love? And we said that we have got so many opinions about it: opinions of specialists, opinions of gurus, opinions of priests, your wife says or your girl says, "This is love", or you say, "This is love", or you say it is related to sex and so on and so on and so on. Is it? Is it related to senses? From the senses arises desire. Have you followed this? Desire is the movement, the concentrated movement of desire, the movement of the senses is desire, obviously. Don't look puzzled! I see a beautiful thing, which is the senses are awakened and I want it. Come on! Look at it for yourself. You see we are saying when there is the movement of the total senses, the whole senses, not a particular sense, then desire is non-existent. You think it out.

So is love the movement of the senses with its desire? Right? Is love, to put it differently, desire? Sexually senses are in operation, the remembrance, the pictures, the images, the sensations all the time. And that movement of all that is considered love. Love, as far as one can observe, is part of desire. Go slowly. We haven't enlarged it. Don't look puzzled or say, "No, that can't be" - we are going into it. Is love attachment? You understand? I am attached to my girl or boy. I possess. So is attachment love? And our whole life is based on attachment - attachment to property, attachment to a person, attachment to a belief, to a dogma, to Christ, to Buddha, whatever it is, attached. Is that love? When you are attached, in that attachment there is pain, there is fear, there is jealousy, anxiety, you may lose. So we are asking: where there is attachment is there love? When you observe it and you are concerned deeply, most profoundly to find out what love is, then attachment becomes unimportant, it has no value, because that is not love.

So it is not desire. It is not remembrance. It is not attachment. Right? It is not that I am telling you and you accept it. It is so. And is love pleasure? Don't look so depressed. I am sorry. It doesn't mean you can't hold the hand of another. But we will find out, if you understand this. You see desire, the outcome of sensation, sensation attached to thought, thought attached to sensation, and from that sensation desire, and that desire wants to fulfil and we call that love. Is that love? Is attachment love? In attachment there is conflict, there is uncertainty and therefore the more there is uncertainty the more the fear of loneliness, the more you become attached, possessive, dominating, asserting, demanding, and hence conflict in relationship. And this conflict you think is part of love. And we are asking: is that love?

And is pleasure love? Pleasure is the movement of a remembrance - right? Don't memorize this phrase. Just listen to it. I remember how nice you were and how pleasant, how tender, how comforting, how sexual, this, that and the other - I remember that, and I say, "Darling, I love you". Is that love? And is pleasure to be denied? You must ask all these questions I am asking. You must ask, find out. Doesn't it give you a pleasure to look at the waters of a stream? What is wrong with that pleasure? Doesn't it give you pleasure to look at a solitary tree in a field? Doesn't it give you pleasure to see the moon over the mountains as last night, you saw it perhaps, some of you? A great delight wasn't it? What is wrong with it? But the trouble begins when thought says, "How beautiful this is, I must keep it. I must remember it. I must worship it. I hope to have more of it." - then the whole movement of pleasure comes into operation. And that pleasure we call love.

The child, the baby with the mother, she is full of that tender affection, the feeling of holding, is that love? Please don't jump on me, I am asking. Or that love is part of your heredity. Have you seen the monkeys holding their babies? The elephant caring for the little one infinitely. It may be that we have inherited this instinctual response to a baby. And then, "It is my baby". No, don't shake your head. "It is my baby, it has got my blood, my bones, my flesh, I love it". And if you do love your baby so greatly you will see he is properly educated, you will see that he is never violent, he is never killed or kills another. But you don't care. You only care for that little baby until he is about four, five, six and then throw him to the wolves - right?

So is all this love? Now the positive action is to say, "No. I will no longer have sex," I will no longer - you know, I will do this, I will get rid of this attachment, I will be free of attachment, I will work on attachment - you follow? Work, do something about it all the time. Whereas the negative action is to see it in its entirety, therefore have an insight into it. Then you will see that love is not any of these things, but because there is love, from that love all relationship changes. You know the ascetics, the monks, the sannyasis in India, in Europe and monks all over the world, they have said "No desire, no sex, don't look at a beautiful woman. If you do, think of her as your sister or your mother. Or, if you do look concentrate on the divine" - you follow? And all the rest of that. And they are burning inside. Outside denying but inwardly burning. And that is what they call a religious life; which means they have no love. They have an idea of what love is. The idea is not love. The idea, the word is not love. But only when you have seen the whole movement of desire, attachment, pleasure, then out of that depth of perception comes this strange flower with its extraordinary perfume. That is love.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC TALK 20TH JULY 1978

What shall we talk about? If I may, I would like to go into the question of what does it mean, not merely words or ideas, that a human being, as we are, should bring about a deep profound change in himself. What does that mean? We are using the word 'change' not from this to that, but rather bringing about a transformation or a mutation in the very structure of our consciousness. That I would like to talk about, if you will permit me, because we human beings seem to remain in our tradition, culture, social, economic structure, and psychologically, inwardly follow a certain pattern for the rest of our lives, whether it be sexual, imaginary, fanciful, mythological, or a very matter-of-fact worldly life. That seems to be the pattern of our existence. Either we are very worldly - I mean by that word 'worldly', very superficial, living only at a level of the senses, with money, position, freedom, casual freedom, indulgence and so on, superficially, and recognising what society is, what the economic structure is; there are those who want a bloody revolution along a certain ideology, a physical upsetting of the whole apple-cart. You know what I mean by the apple-cart? Not actually apples, but the idea of it. And they have tried every kind of physical, economic revolution. And apparently that hasn't brought about a change in man - control the environment, impose certain economic laws, impose according to totalitarian beliefs and ideologies and so on and so on. They have tried every form, every means, or every structure, economic, social, cultural, to bring about a fundamental change in man. Religions have tried it - right? They say, "Forget yourself and give yourself over to Christ" - or this person or that person. Or, surrender yourself to some guru - which is very convenient for the guru. And so on. And apparently from everything one observes, and this observation is not casual, or according to one's desire, but if one has observed very closely, deep down, fundamentally man has not changed for millenia upon millenia.

Now, we are asking: is it possible to bring about a fundamental psychological revolution? Not just trimming the tree here and there, but deep, abiding, enduring, irrevocable change, transformation? Because we are not happy as we are. I don't know why we live the way we do. We are generally miserable, in conflict, jealous, anxious - we have been through all that. We accept all that. We are conditioned according to that. If you live in a totalitarian state, after a certain time you get used to it. You accept all the restraints and the compulsions and the terror and all that. So, is it possible for a human being to bring about an enduring transformation? That is what we are going to - if I may - talk about.

One should ask this question of oneself: why we human beings live the way we are doing? And can we live in this world, bringing about this fundamental, psychological revolution or transformation and yet live in this world, sanely, and rationally with an occupation and all the rest of it? May we go into that? - if you are interested in it, and I hope you are.

First of all, the Western world has divided consciousness, the unconscious, deeper, and the superficial, conscious. And one may temporarily bring about a modified change in the obvious superficial consciousness. That superficial consciousness can adjust itself to anything; to terror, to wars, to all the travail of human beings, superficially. And the unconscious, the deeper, the hidden layers of the mind - the mind being consciousness and we are using that word 'mind' which we have explained carefully, we won't go into that further - and that deep unconscious entity is part of the race, part of the deep unconscious demands, fears and a sense of deep sorrow. I think it is a great mistake to divide consciousness into these departments: conscious and the unconscious. Consciousness is whole. You may divide it for convenience, for exploration, for investigation, but as long as one maintains this divisive consciousness, the consciousness which is broken up into the deeper and the higher, there is not only conflict but also, if one goes into it, a sense of the abiding past, always controlling, shaping the present.

Now please, as I said, as we said, the speaker is not here. You are asking these questions yourselves. And we are using words that are common. And we are not being driven by the words. You have read psychological books and have certain jargons, certain ideas, and those ideas, those words, drive you, control you, control your thinking, control your reactions and so on. If you do that our communication with each other becomes extremely difficult. Whereas if we use the word without all its associations, which our education, our reading has brought about, emotionally or not, if we can use the word plainly, simply then we are in communication with each other. Right? And I hope you will do this while we are talking together.

Now can the unconscious, the deeper, be revealed? Or revealed totally, completely, exposed to the bright light of perception? Or must it be investigated through dreams, through occasional hunch, occasional intimation, or some form of intuition? I personally don't like that word 'intuition' because you can have an intuition about anything, it may be your own desire, prompting you to have certain feelings about something. So we are not using that word at all. So is it possible to investigate without analysis the whole content of the deeper layers of one's mind? Do you understand my question? Please follow this. It is your life, not mine.

Since the psychologists have divided this, the conscious mind thinks it can investigate into the unconscious. It can then proceed to analyse its dreams, its superficial activities, its reactions, always from the superficial. From the conscious delve into the unconscious - right? And in that there is a great deal of danger because the conscious mind is full of imaginary sensory demands, beliefs and so on. With all that, it is trying to investigate something which is hidden. You are following this? And there are those people who try to investigate their reactions, their actions and so on, in a group, telling each other, which is the same as talking to oneself. You are following all this? And this division is always maintained. So there is always conflict between the outer and the inner: the outer being conscious, the superficial and the deeper. I do not know if you have not noticed all this? You don't have to go to any psychologist, philosopher or any professional specialist in psychology, you can observe all this in yourself if you know how to read yourself. And most of us haven't got either the energy or the interest, or the demand that says "I must find out". But when there is a crisis then we go to some specialist hoping he will solve our problems. So we are always dependent on somebody. And he on whom you depend is equally conditioned, perhaps much more divisive, a little more neurotic and has to be analysed by another analyser and so on, the game goes on. This is what we are doing: depending on somebody to tell us what to do, how to think, how to move out of our own problems, out of our own desperate crises.

Now is it possible to observe our consciousness, not at two broken levels, but totally? You understand my question? Can I observe my consciousness, not as the unconscious and the conscious but as a total unity, not divided, but a thing that is intrinsically whole? Right? Is it possible to so observe? You understand my question? It is only possible when I understand very clearly that this division is artificial, perhaps convenient and perhaps it might explain certain neurotic activities, but actually it is totally brought about by man, by thought. Are we following each other? You are asking these questions yourself, I am not asking you to ask them.

So we are asking: is it possible to observe without any direction, without any distortion, this whole movement of consciousness? It is possible only when you have no direction. Which means the moment you have a motive you give it a direction - right? The moment you want to get something out of it, it becomes distorted, you say, "Well I must go beyond this limited entity" - the very desire that wants to go beyond this limit is born out of its own conditioning, therefore it is still distorted. I hope you are following all this. So is it possible to observe without direction, without motive, without reward and punishment - is that possible? Don't say, 'yes' or 'no'. One has to find that out for oneself, for yourself. Can you observe your wife, your girl, whatever it is you are observing, without a motive, without a direction, without wanting something out of it? Which means then your whole attention is there, there is no deviation. You are following this? Then you are completely alert and aware. And then only it is possible to observe this whole phenomena of consciousness in action. And can you observe without all that? So we say, "As it is not possible to do it instantly, I will practise and gradually, day after day, cultivate attention" - right? Practise a sense of awareness which is the essence of sensitivity. To be so tremendously sensitive. If you are not sensitive you can't be attentive, so you practise sensitivity, a kind of - you know. We are monkeys really. Which means we haven't basically understood that wherever there is an intention, a desire, a cultivation in order to do something then that kind of mentality is devoid entirely of sensitivity, attention. I hope you are doing all this. Are we doing this as we are talking to each other? Not tomorrow or another day, but actually as you are sitting there, talking together, will you do this? Are you doing it? No direction, no motive, no desire for reward, for doing something, if you don't do it punishment, to be totally out of that field altogether.

Then is there an observation of the whole nature and the structure, the complex movement of consciousness as a whole? Then only it is possible to bring about real deep fundamental transformation, because in that there is no positive action. We explained that, what we mean by positive action. That is, try to do something about your consciousness, try to force it, try to control it, try to expand it, suppress it. Consciousness means all its content, your angers, your desires, your sexual demands, your beliefs, dogmas, belonging to a certain culture, all that is part of consciousness. To observe it, as most people are, if they do observe it, try to do something about it. That is, I must be free of the Church and in freeing themselves from a particular organized religious body they topple into another religious body and think they have changed tremendously. It is the same pattern repeated over and over and over again.

So can you observe this whole movement? Or must you take each reaction, bit by bit? You understand my question? I think it is clear. I am making it clear. If I am sexual, I am concerned about that. If I am worried about my relationship to my wife, not only sexually but in other ways, I am concerned about that. I am concerned about my health. We lay emphasis on one thing and neglect the others - right? We must have perfect health and therefore you become a vegetarian and god knows what else and become neurotic about it. This is what we are doing all the time. Go to India to find god, or enlightenment. You know there is a lovely story from India: a young man leaves his family and goes to various teachers all over India and asks them to teach him truth. He wanders about thirty, forty, fifty years and doesn't find it. And ultimately as an old man he comes back to his house. And he knocks on the door and the door is opened by somebody and just then he sees the truth! You understand? It is there, not over there.

We were talking the day before yesterday, about the whole question of what love is. And can this totality of consciousness, which is made up of the incidents, accidents, knowledge, practice and beliefs and so on and so on and so on, can this consciousness live or understand what love is? Our consciousness obviously is put together by thought. And thought, if you have gone into it, is limited, time-binding, and so can this consciousness, which is the result of centuries of various reactions and dangers and so on and so on, pleasure, fears and so on, can that consciousness contain the thing that we call love? You understand my question? Or love lies beyond that consciousness? Which means, thought has no relationship whatsoever with love. Right? Do you see the truth of it, not the idea of it, the actuality of it? Therefore it becomes extraordinarily important if you want to find out what that extraordinary thing called love is. There must be a transformation in our consciousness. How is this possible? Without effort, that means motive, without any strain, without any exercising of thought in order to go beyond itself - is this possible?

You know, to find this out is part of meditation. That is, can this consciousness become completely empty, except in the area where knowledge is necessary? Do you understand? Are we meeting each other, some of us at least? That is, can thought, with all its activity, end, except in that limited area? That is the art of perception. The art of perception, the seeing, is to give everything its place.

From this arises another question, which is: consciousness contains mankind's sorrow. That is, you as a human being are part of the world. You are the world. Not an idea, not something that has intellectually been put together by reason and you say, "Yes, quite right", but the reality, the truth of it that you represent, as a human being, the rest of humanity. You suffer, you are anxious, you are uncertain, confused, miserable, fearful, hurt, everything, and every human being has this. So your consciousness is the consciousness of mankind. If that is the truth to you, not an idea, then what takes place? You understand my question? One has lived as an individual, fighting, struggling to express oneself, demanding - you follow - as a limited, contained, narrow individual. And it is very, very difficult to see the truth that you are the rest of mankind, that in you is the whole of man and therefore his fears, his anxieties, his mischief, his arrogance, his pride, his violence, all that, and his sorrow - right? And mankind has lived with this sorrow - right? Lived with sorrow, has accepted sorrow as part of his life, and if he doesn't accept it he runs away from it through every form of entertainment, religious and otherwise. Or he personifies this sorrow into an image, which the Christians have done, and think they have solved this problem.

Now our question is: can this sorrow, not only your particular little sorrow but the sorrow of mankind, end - you understand. What an enormous perception that is if you see it, that your sorrow is not yours, it is the whole of mankind's. Then you don't cry. Then you don't shed tears about your little wounds, your little failures, your little anxieties and so on. But when you realize you are the representative of all mankind it brings about an enormous sense of vitality, energy. It is only when you are thinking about yourself, your sorrow, that vast energy is limited into a small little channel, and it becomes rather dirty. Now is it possible for sorrow to end? If there is an ending in one human being - please go with me for a little while - if there is the ending of sorrow in one human being who is the representative of all humanity, that ending affects the whole consciousness of man. You understand? Stalin has affected the whole consciousness of man - no? Hitler and all the rest of those world people, national people. Through the priest the idea of Jesus Christ has affected mankind - right? You will accept that more easily. So when there is a fundamental ending of sorrow in a human being who is the representative of all humanity, then that brings about an action in the totality of mankind - I wonder if I am making this clear? Have you understood something sirs? Not what I am saying. Do you see the truth of this, the fact of this?

That is, most of us have some kind of sorrow, either we are unhealthy, or our children are not what they should be and so on, or we can never reach the other side of the river, or we can never be as intelligent as somebody else, or there is the love of someone who dies - the sorrow of thousands of people who have been killed in the wars. Now what can a human being, you, do, or not do to end this? Take an ordinary everyday incident of death. Someone whom you so-call love dies; old age, disease, accident and so on, dies. And you have lost him or her, and you shed tears of loneliness, shed tears of sudden loss, irrevocable loss, nothing can bring him back, or her. You are left completely, suddenly isolated because you are so attached, given yourself over to that person so completely and when that person ends you suddenly discover how empty you are. There are tears of self pity, tears of loss, tears of loneliness - right? Which we call sorrow. And can that sorrow end? It doesn't mean that you are callous, that you are indifferent, that you become totally isolated from everything and therefore self protected. Is it possible to end sorrow? - not the sorrow of somebody whom you lose but the whole meaning of that word grief, the depth of it, the enormity, the weight of it. It is possible only when you as a human being, who are etc., when you observe without action, without doing something about it, just be entirely with it. You understand? Your wife or your girl friend has left you.

You are jealous, angry, vicious, hating and you realize that, if you are at all intelligent, aware, then you say, "I must get out of this". But to remain with it, to remain totally without any movement with your jealousy, with your anger, with your hate, you understand, completely one with it. Not identifying yourself with it, because you are that, but to remain with it without any movement. I wonder if you are capturing something?

Then you will see that there comes an extraordinary transformation. The transformation that comes about with the ending of sorrow is passion, not lust. Passion is something entirely different. If you have no passion you are non-existent. So you will find, if you actually, without moving away from that thing called sorrow, a totally different movement takes place. And that movement is this extraordinary endless passion - right? And that passion is compassion. The word 'compassion' means passion for all things, for birds, trees, for human beings, for the rock, for the stray animal. But when there is compassion for one person then it is limitless because in its very nature it includes all things. Right? Don't go to sleep please. Or don't go off into some kind of imaginary, mystical, romantic idea. Compassion is not romantic. It is not intellectual. It is not sentimental.

From that we ought also to talk over together the common factor of all mankind, which touches every human being, young and old, which is the ending of life, which is called death. Right? We should go into that. It is really a very complex question, like all human problems, it is very complex. And man, every human being or woman in the world, has tried to find a way out of it, tried to immortalize himself, or her, through some action, through some book, through some way of life. So that this idea of ending has become a terror, has become something that man must avoid at all costs, postpone it as long as possible. And there have been a thousand explanations, rational, irrational, based on belief, conclusion and hope, because man doesn't want to end, because he says, "I have gathered so much experience. I have cultivated my house and my garden so carefully, inwardly and outwardly. I have accumulated so much knowledge. I have lived so clearly and why should I, who have gathered so much, end all this, what for? And if that is all then I might just as well live very superficially, enjoy myself, do whatever I want and call the whole business a jolly good life." You understand, the two extremes, the one who doesn't care, the one who has had many experiences, of every kind, sensuous and otherwise, and he says at the end, "All right, dust to dust." The other says, "Why should I die?" - you follow all this? "I have loved, I have known beauty, I have swam against the current, I have followed nobody, and I have tried to live as a human being who is not second-hand". And unfortunately most of us are secondhand.

So we must find out for ourselves what it means to end, not the ending of death, that is one of the things, but what does it mean to end? The ending of man's life, ending, not what happens after I end, we will find out. Ending my desire, my longing, my frustrations, ending my hurts, ending the desire to fulfil, ending it - right? You understand? The ending of something psychologically, and even physiologically. The ending of your attachment to another. The ending of your belief, the ending of not belonging to any institution, the ending of it. What happens? You follow what I am saying? If we understand one thing then we can move to the ending of what we call life, which is death. The ending of attachment, because most of us are attached to something or other - right? To our bodies, to our looks, to our husband, to our girl, to our belief, to our gods, something or other, attachment. Now can you end attachment, not say, "I will get something out of it", just cut it, surgically, rationally, seeing all the causes of what is implied, which we went into, we won't go into all that, and to end it completely? Have you ever done this, ending something completely? Specially attachment, do it now as we are talking. Become aware of your attachment, end it. And see, observe, then what takes place? You cannot observe very clearly if you don't end something. What happens? Right?

Say for instance, you are attached to nicotine, smoking. I am taking that very ordinary, rather stupid example. What happens, without fear, you end it because it is irrational, why waste money and all the rest of it. If you end it because it affects your heart, your lungs, then you are not ending it, you are ending it out of fear. But being aware of all the results and so on, the causes of smoking, drop it completely, today, now. Then what has taken place? Isn't there not only freedom from smoking, but isn't there a new sense of freedom, a new beginning? You are following this? If you end your attachment to the country, you know, attachment, to a piece of furniture, if you end it completely then there is a new beginning isn't there? No? There is no new beginning if you do it out of fear, if you do it out of rationalized careful analysis. But if you see the whole nature of attachment, what is involved in it, completely, and end it, then you will see there is totally a new beginning. Because the ending is the past, and when you are ending the past then there is not only a new observation but a sense of extraordinary freedom and movement not born out of the past. I wonder if you get all this? Do it and you will discover this for yourself.

And death: we are all going to die one day or another. If everyone of us lived for ever and ever, amen, think what the earth would be like! Filled with ghastly, old, decrepid - you follow? So I am asking myself, and you are asking yourself, why shouldn't I die? Not commit suicide, that is too silly. Why shouldn't I die, what's wrong with death? Why is there this colossal fear about it? I know very well what it means to end smoking. Right? I took that silly example. I know, there is an awareness of ending attachment to a guru, to ideas, to a pattern, ending. What happens when I end? There is such a great sense of freedom and beauty in it. So why shouldn't there be an ending, ending to what? You understand my question? I know I can end smoking, ending attachment, but ending which is death, what is this ending? You are following this? Does it interest you, all this?

So I enquire into what is living - you understand? Not what is ending, what is living? It is odd that you should all be listening to this man, isn't it? So we are asking, what is living? Can there be an ending to this thing called living? Right? Then I am asking, what is this living? The daily living, monotonous routine with all the problems, that is my life, your life - not mine, sorry. Your life. Not that I am separate, I don't enter into it. What is this ending? Ending to what? Ending to my attachment to my husband, wife, girl, boy, ending knowledge, ending experience, ending all the sensations, ending sex - right? Ending this constant battle in oneself and with others - right? This thing is what we call living - right? It is not my idea, this is what you are doing. Now is there an ending to all that? Ending to your sorrow, ending to your ambition, your pride, your vanity, your arrogance, violence, can you end all that? Of course you can. As you have ended smoking, as you have ended attachment, you can end your ambition, your vanity, your hurts, you know the whole thing, I don't have to go into it, you can end it.

If you have ended it actually, not theoretically in daily life, then what is death? Death is then the ending of sensation, ending of the brain cells - you understand? Ending. Like a leaf in the autumn. That leaf in the autumn has beautiful colour, full of colour, in that leaf the whole universe is, not theoretically but actually. So if we end the way we are living, then there is a totally different beginning; not I begin totally differently, because when you left attachment completely there was no I beginning, there was a state of total freedom from a particular thing, and in that freedom there was a great sense of release, a great sense of freedom, a totally new beginning without the anchors of attachment.

So can you end what you call the living, the worries, the problems, ending the problem, never to carry it a single minute over, because if you have a problem and you carry it over and over, day after day for another year, that deteriorates the brain. So we are asking if you end the way one lives now, there is a new beginning without the 'me'. And then death has no meaning. Then you don't ask what happens after my life - right? Because you have ended the thing that you call living, which is me, with all my problems, my anxieties, my worries, my pride - you follow? Will you do it? Or say, "Yes, it is a marvellous idea" and carry on your daily monotonous useless life?

When you understand the whole meaning of death and the ending of what it signifies, time as such has come to an end. I am just talking to myself, unless you do it. Time in the sense of non-movement of thought. And this whole enquiry is really a profound meditation, not sitting cross legged and doing all kinds of silly stuff. Because then in this total ending creation takes place. Then there is really an extraordinary sense of tremendous passion and energy, which is not a reward.

SAANEN 7TH PUBLIC TALK 23RD JULY 1978

I believe this is the last talk. There will be discussions, or dialogues, or conversations - whatever you may like to call them - on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday. Then we can bombard each other with a lot of questions and try to find answers for them!

During the last six talks we have talked over together a great many things. We talked over how we are influenced by institutions, controlled and shaped by them. We also went into the question of ideals, how they distort our lives, making us violent, ineffectual, not dealing with realities of life. And also we talked about the pressure of knowledge: knowledge we said is always in the past, how that knowledge controls, shapes our thinking, our actions, and we are influenced by that greatly, by the past; the past being experience, accumulated as knowledge in the brain and the response of that is memory. We also talked about the pressure of ideas - ideas in our relationship with each other, what must be, what should be and so on. We also talked about the various forms of illusion in which we live. And we talked about fear, and whether fear can end, completely, totally, eradicated from our very depths, so that a human being is totally free from that darkness. We also talked about the pursuit of endless pleasure, pleasure being the response of the senses as desire and the expression of that desire in the present from the past, and to the future.

We also went into the question of whether human beings can ever end their sorrow, not only their momentary passing grief, but also the deep sorrow of man who has faced wars, destruction, endless conflict without any meaning to life. And we also went into the question of what is love, whether a human being can love another without all the problems that is involved in it: ambition, personal concern, jealousy, antagonism, domination, attachment and so on. We went into all that. And where these things exist, we said, there is no love. And when our action is based on merely thought, which is memory, then that action is incomplete, and being incomplete it must invariably bring about conflict. Any action that is not total, whole, holistic, complete, must breed contradictions. We went into that very carefully.

And the other day we talked about the ending of sorrow, and with that ending, compassion. And I think we ought to talk about various other things too, this morning. I hope you are all comfortable, it is pretty hot!

We ought to ask ourselves, I think, why we follow another, which apparently you are doing. Why we become disciples of somebody. If there were no disciples there would be no teachers; and because of disciples the teachers multiply; and the disciple then destroys that which he started out to look for. He wants to find out, if he is a really serious person, he wants to find out what truth is, if there is freedom, if there is a sense of timeless existence. And if you follow another, whether it be the priest, a book, a guru, an authority, then you will never, under whatever circumstances, find all that. So can one ask oneself seriously why we follow another? This is really very important because it denies freedom. And one has followed the priest in western Europe as well as in Asia for thousands and thousands of years. We are still in agony, uncertainty, miserable, unhappy, in conflict, endless travail. And it may be essentially the fault of the disciples, of the one who follows, either the book, the word, or the person. And when you follow you deny your own investigation, exploration into truth. And so, if one may suggest, don't follow anybody, including the speaker. I have made that very clear from the very beginning, that we are talking to each other, that the speaker is not here, that you are looking at yourself, and discovering all the problems, the confusion, the uncertainty, the extraordinary demand of desire and so on. You are asking these questions of yourself, therefore there is no teacher and no disciple, only learning; not learning from another, but learning about yourself, looking into yourself. You cannot possibly look into yourself objectively without any directional motive if you are all the time consumed with your own importance, with your own ambitions, with your own problems.

I wonder if you have ever asked yourselves why you have a problem of any kind - perhaps a mathematical problem, scientific problem, problems of knowledge, but psychologically why do you have problems? And if you have a problem, why do you not end it immediately and not carry it over and over and over again for the rest of your life? You see when the problem presents itself to you and you do not solve it instantly, and you think about the problem, worry about the problem, that deteriorates the brain cells, obviously. To solve a problem, human problem, psychological problem, the problem of relationship, it matters enormously how you approach it. Do you understand? Please, We are talking to each other. There is no guru, there is no teacher here, there is only the problem, and how you approach the problem, because in the approach to the problem may be the solution. You understand what we are saying?

Suppose I have a problem: if I approach it with a desire to end it, I'm already coming to it with a determined purpose, which may distort the problem itself. If I come to it with a motive, the motive will dictate the answer of the problem. We are following each other? I am not talking to myself, we are talking to each other. We are sharing this thing together. Or rather, you are investigating and discovering this thing for yourself, that you cannot solve a human problem if you approach it wrongly. There is a correct approach, which is: without a motive, without trying to end the problem, otherwise you approach it with a conclusion, with already premeditated intention, so the problem remains. Whereas if you can free yourself from the motive, from the direction, the desire to find an answer, then you come to it freely, whatever that problem is. Even if it be the most scientific, complex problem, because the free mind doesn't create a problem, it meets a problem, then answers it, but it doesn't create a problem. But whereas we create problems, and having created it we approach it with fear, with anxiety, consult others, you know, go through all the movements of trying to solve it. Or you investigate the problem very thoroughly, observing it, let the problem tell you the whole story of itself, then perhaps during the day you find a complete freedom from that problem.

So what we are saying is: our human minds, the brain, the mind, the thought, the emotions, the senses are millions and millions of years old. It is heavily conditioned and that is creating the problem. And as long as the brain is still thinking of ways out of it, it is still furthering the problem, enlarging the problem. Are we making this clear for ourselves?

So we are going to discuss, non-problematically - you understand, it is not a problem, nothing is a problem until you make it - we are going to investigate, not make it as something that you have to solve. And please understand this, it is very important because we are going to enquire into this whole question of what is a religious life, whether it is terrible, or possible to live that religious life in this world. That is one of the problems - I won't call it a problem - that is one of the things that we are going to look into. And we are also going to enquire into the whole movement of the mind, the brain, not only during the day but when it is asleep. We are also going to enquire and not make an issue of it, into the question of time, the question of space, distance, and the very complex problem - not problem - the very complex state of mind that is capable of real meditation.

We are going to go into all that, and as we said let us approach it without wanting to find a solution for any of it. You understand? Then it becomes fun. Then there is a certain sense of joy in enquiry.

First of all let us enquire, look, observe, what is the movement of our life when we are awake during the day, and what is that movement when we are asleep. We have divided sleeping and waking, which may be entirely wrong. One must sleep, darkness is necessary for nature, so we need to have sleep. But we have separated sleeping and waking. And we have never enquired into the state of the mind that is not sleeping, that is awake - I won't use the word 'awake', that is not sleeping, let us put it that way. And the state of the mind that is asleep during the night. Right? Because it is important to understand this because - not because, sorry - it is important to understand. What is the state of the mind in which is included the senses, the desires, thought, memory, experience, knowledge and all the movement during our waking hours, what is that state of mind? - not how to get out of it, or how to resolve it, but to look at it. You understand? You look at a flower by the roadside, there you are looking at it, seeing the beauty of it, the quiet state of its existence, the colour and the perfume. And you just look and you go by. In the same way let's look at the movement of our life during the waking hours, just like that, without wanting to resolve any of the complexities, any of the issues that are involved during our day. During our day in which there is constant relationship, whether in a factory, office, or in the house, everything, it is based on relationship. And why has everything become a problem? I hope you are asking this question of yourself. Why we take on certain roles, follow certain people, carry on their message, all that filth - I call it filth because it is not reality, it is not truth, it is just an evasion from enquiring into the enormous complexity of our existence.

And does that same movement, which is during the day, carry on when we are asleep? You understand my question? Please put this question to yourself, although I am putting it to you, you are putting it to yourself. Does the daily movement of reactions and responses, all the things that are going on in our daily activity, both technologically as well as in human relationships, the observation of the beauty of a mountain, the running waters, the still sky, and the majesty of a mountain, and the solitary tree in a vast field, all that movement does it go on when you are asleep? How will you find out? It is important to find out. Obviously, if you have an issue, a problem, something that has not been resolved, you carry on that problem during the day to the next day, and so on, that problem goes over and over and over during the day and during the next day and so on, which means, the problem is carried over during the sleep, obviously. A problem implies disorder - right? Any problem you have, human problem, especially human problems, implies that there is a state of disorder in your mind, in your way of thinking, looking, and so that disorder is carried over during the sleep and continues the next day - right? I am not stating this, you are discovering this for yourselves.

Now the brain is constantly active with one, or a dozen, problems, and the brain can only function clearly, efficiently, intelligently, with all its energy, when there is order. That is obvious too. When you have order in your life, or even for a day, or an hour, you feel full of energy. So the brain demands order - right? But during the day we have problems, we have disorder, and the brain during the sleep has to bring about order, otherwise it can't function the next day properly. And the speaker is not a brain specialist, thank god! But he has observed this phenomena in himself, watched it.

So can there be order during the day? Order being: any problem that arises, dissolve instantly. If you are jealous, solve it, get free of it immediately, as it arises. To be so totally free of it, look at it. That is, look at it not as an observer separate from the thing he has observed, as jealousy, but the observer himself is jealous otherwise he couldn't recognize it. You are following all this? I hope you are. It doesn't matter if you don't. It is your own life. If you are envious, as most people are, and in being envious there is comparison, imitation, conformity - then end envy immediately. Which means to look at it and not run away from it, translate it, justify it, just look at it as you would look at that wayside flower, with its colour, with its beauty, with its life, with its extraordinary strength, growing out of poor soil. In the same way, look at it. You cannot look if you say, "That is jealousy, that is envy" - which means you are looking at it with the word, which is a means of remembering that you have been jealous, been greedy, envious. So you are looking at it with the eyes of the past - right? You are getting all this?

So when there is complete order during the day the brain then hasn't to work, work while you are asleep to bring order. Then when there is complete order - I mean absolute order, not relative order - then the brain is renewing itself and the dreams, which for so many people become so extraordinarily important, do not take place, except very, very physical, superficial dreams. You understand all this? Unless you test this, test it, go into it, find out for yourself: if you accept this, then you become a disciple, then you become something utterly useless.

So the brain, which is very old, so heavily conditioned, in disorder - right? - look, if you have seen those ancient pictures in the caves, or seen the pictures of them, the problem exists between good and bad, evil and right, fighting, fighting, fighting, symbolized, and so on. Man throughout the ages has lived with enormous problems, and therefore there is never a renewal of the brain. We are talking about the transformation, the mutation of the brain cells themselves, which can only happen, which we went into the other day, when there is direct perception and action; not perception, then later on action, which only creates a problem. The insight into any problem, into any issue - insight, which is not memory, which is not an intuition, which is not a something that you have stored up and act; insight is not a continuous thing. It is only from moment to moment. When it happens there is an insight into it and there is action in it and resolve.

So we are talking about the nature of our action during the day and that same action taking place during the night; when there is complete action during the day, which means no disorder, then the brain becomes, during the night, it can function totally differently. We are going to go into that when we talk about meditation.

Then also we should understand the whole nature, the whole concept man has of time. There is not only the time according to the sun, but also psychologically, inwardly we have developed time. Right? "I will do this tomorrow. I will arrive at a state of beatitude, or happiness, or enlightenment" - or whatever you like to call it - "Give me time, give me a sense of practice, discipline and I will have it". Time, which is to evolve. You understand? "I am this. I will, through time, evolve". So there is the question of evolution, which means time. Perhaps man has developed this idea of evolution through watching a little bush grow into an enormous tree, the baby into manhood, the developing of a muscle, that muscle is weak but practice and exercise and it gets strong. So this idea of evolution, growing, psychologically thought has taken it over saying, 'I need time to become something'. I don't know if you are following this? Not me, you are watching yourself. Is that a fact? We have accepted it. We live by it. We are accustomed to it.

It is our habit: "I can't do this", psychologically, "Tomorrow I will work at it. I will try", which means you have developed a duality: "I am this, but I will be that". - right? "I am angry, but I will get over it", which is, the little seed growing into an enormous tree, the baby growing to manhood, the little animal which hasn't the strength to walk, run, will take time. So that same observation has entered into the psychological field and there we say we will be born, we will become. Is that so? You understand? That is, there is physical time and we have cultivated the psychological time. Now why have we created psychological time? You are following all this? The baby is crying in the nursery and you are half asleep and you instantly wake up and run to the baby. Right? The mothers and the fathers know about this. You might say, "How do you know about it?" Because I have watched, I have taken care of a baby for four or five days, I know about it. Not my baby, somebody else's baby. Probably when you are looking after a baby you do it much more attentively than the mother! So in the same intensity, with the same urgency, with the same immediate action - you don't let the baby cry, you keep on, you jump out of bed and run, change its diaper - so in the same way look at this problem, with the same urgency at this question. Which is, why has man created, cultivated this psychological time, which he calls evolution, which is, "I will be better. I will attain" - why? And when you have that spirit everybody is willing to exploit it - right? The gurus are excellent at this exploitation, the priests are excellent. And of course the politicians love this - why? What is the truth about it? Please listen to what I am suggesting. What is the truth about it? Is truth a matter or argument? Is truth a matter of opinion? Is truth a matter of experience, arguing, opinion, knowledge, hoping you will find truth? Will these things point out what truth is? Or is truth not related to thought, not related to memory, not related to past experiences? - and so on and so on. You understand my question? Because if truth is related to the past, it is time-binding - right? I wonder if you understand all this? Or is truth something entirely different? And to find out the truth, whether there is psychological time at all, will you argue about it, the pros and cons, and the clever quotations, people saying, "It is", people saying, "It is not". Or you want to find the truth of it, so you come to it without any prejudice - right? - without any conclusion, without being attached to this idea of evolution; which means truth can only take place when there is absolute freedom to observe.

So can you so observe without your conclusions, saying, "Yes, it is possible", "It is not possible", "What nonsense you are talking about", or finding out from books, from your teachers - all that, throwing all that out, free to look. That is, to have an insight into the problem, into this issue, why man has cultivated the psychological time. When there is insight into it, the brain cells, which have been conditioned by the idea of evolution, psychological evolution, the brain cells themselves undergo a change. Don't accept what we are talking about. Find out. Test it. That means you have to be free to observe, to observe without any wish, any longing, any pressure - you know to observe as you observe a lovely flower. Then you will find that time psychologically has ended. There is no becoming, or "I am" - which is the same.

Then also we have to find out, as we said, what is space. It is important to have space. Nothing can mature, grow, live, if you don't have a space. Physically it is becoming less and less space. We live in cities - unless you happen to live in the country and I hope you do - if you live in cities there is hardly any space physically. And perhaps out of that lack of space there is violence. That violence is increasing day by day, and one of the reasons of this multiplication of violence is perhaps that there are no wars - you understand? If you had a war you can go and explode in violence. Now you have no wars, you are crowded in cities, you live practically in a drawer, these high rise buildings, and so you have no space. And also you have no space in your mind because you are all the time occupied with something or other - right? The wife with the cooking, her utensils, cleaning and all that, the husband occupied with the work, with the office, with whatever he does, or he is occupied with his own ambitions, with his own vanity, with his own success. And she with her own beauty, with her own enjoyments and so on and so on, with sex - occupied. Have you noticed how occupied you are? And your guru tells you, "Be more occupied. Only not with that, with this." And you, so gullible, say, "All right, I will do that", which is still occupation. I am not reacting to the gurus. I was a guru myself, long ago - thank god - and that is all too silly. You have been under the pressure of the priests for two thousand years in this country and you are bored with it and take on the guru from the East, who is equally the same and you love that, you think you are achieving some nonsense.

So if one sees space is necessary - obviously, - what will you do? That is, space between you and another is necessary, which doesn't mean isolation from another. Space. Space implies independence. Space implies non-attachment. Space implies a consideration for each other, to allow them space. And you must have space in the mind, which means, the mind is never completely occupied with anything. Can you do it? Test it out. Test it. Don't accept the speaker - you are not accepting what I am saying because I am not here. And I mean it. The speaker, K. is not here. You are learning from yourself, by observing, so there is no authority.

So why is the mind occupied so endlessly? The businessman with his business, the artist with his painting, the pianist with his - you follow? And you and I, ordinary people, have a dozen occupations - why? Is it fear of not being occupied? If you are not occupied, what? What are you then? You follow? If you are not thinking about yourself, how you look, how you dress, how you walk, your feelings, your desires, your ambitions, your vanity, your arrogance and all the rest of it, if you are not occupied with all that - you might be occupied with the United Nations, which is the same thing. (I won't go into the United Nations, it is not very pleasant.) So we are occupied with something or other - sex, good or bad, and all that - why? Is it because - please, look find out, ask, find out - is it because if you are not occupied you are absolutely nothing? And, realizing I am nothing I say, "My god, I must fill that, I am frightened."

So can you be nothing, actually which you are? You may call yourself by a name, your particular face and so on, bank account, house, but strip all that, what are you? Strip your knowledge, your occupation, your endeavours, all that - those are memories, words, remove the words, remove the memories, consciously, you know, not become insane or lose your memory, or senility, but actually when you are alive, full of energy, which is being wasted in occupation, when that is not occupied, when there is no occupation, there is tremendous energy in nothingness. Test it out. Don't accept a thing from anybody.

So we said problems, time, space. Man or woman - when I say man it includes woman, so don't be Women's Lib. - when we say man and woman, they have always sought power - power over themselves, controlling themselves, which gives a certain sense of power in oneself, if you can completely control yourself - you understand? - you feel very strong, a sense of power; or the power of a politician whom you have elected, or, like in the totalitarian states, they have assumed power. And power is one of the problems of man - you understand?

And there is the other power, which is clairvoyancy, reading thoughts, all that, so-called the occult. You understand? So there are these two types of power: physical, psychological power over another, the power that comes when there is complete, absolute control of oneself; and then there is the hidden power, persuasive power, the power of propaganda, the power of authority and those who are in authority are always seeking to entrench themselves more and more in power - right? Why does man demand power? You understand? Why? Why do you want power over another? Wife over husband, or husband over the wife, or the girl, or whatever it is, why? Which is, power means arrogance, power implies vanity, "I know, you don't know. I am the boss and you are not. I am the acknowledged guru, and you, poor chap, you are a disciple down below." - why? Why do we accept this? Because that is destroying man, you follow? Because again it emphasizes the 'me' - the 'me' which has identified itself with a nation, with a group, with a country and in that identification I feel very strong - you follow? All that follows. And man has never been able to solve this question of power, which means man doesn't know what it means to have humility. You understand? Because without humility you can't investigate, you can't look, without humility you can't love another, without humility there is no compassion. The man who has power tries to become compassionate, tries to love. That is obviously nonsense. Like a man who is ambitious, he cannot love.

So humility comes into being when you understand the nature of power. You can't cultivate humility. Then what you are cultivating is vanity under the cloak of humility - right?

So it is the same thing, man now, it is one of the fashions, a passing phase, to talk about the occult, wanting to find out. The speaker - I am sorry to bring the speaker into this - knows quite a bit about all that. They are part of the senses. If you are highly sensitive you can almost read somebody - no? Of course. If you are sensitive to your boy friend or your husband, or your wife, you know exactly, almost quickly before she tells you something, or he tells you something. And you can cultivate that - you follow? - and have that peculiar power of reading people's thoughts. Please, when the speaker is talking about this, he is talking of what he knows, what has happened, and the speaker considers all that childish, absolute childishness. You may be able to read other people's thoughts, you may be able to do all kinds of extreme extra sensory perception, extreme extra sensory perception - E.S.P. with all the business involved in it. If you are caught in that trap, walk out of it, completely. It is the most dangerous trap, because it is only the extension of highly sensitized senses.

Then having established all this in our life, order, which means the art of learning, the art of putting everything in its right place - sex in its right place, money in its right place, everything - and you can only do that when there is freedom from thought which is always creating problems, issues because thought is limited. So put thought in its right place. Then we can proceed - or rather from putting things in their right place we are beginning to meditate. Shall I go into all that? Do you want me to go into all this?

Now first of all, that is a new word introduced into the west - right? It has existed in India for thousands of years. So there are different forms of meditation: from India, the Hindu type of meditation, there is the Buddhist type of meditation, there is the Tibetan type of meditation, there is the Zen meditation, and the gurus that invent something new but along the same line. So there are different types of meditation in the world. And there is that absurd transcendental meditation with all that nonsense. So we are going to find out what is meditation. We are new - you understand, we are new to it, we haven't been conditioned by what people have said about meditation and practice - all that is too absurd and too childish. But we are going to find out what is meditation, what is implied in it. If you have not put everything in its right place, to find out what is meditation is impossible, because then you will get caught in some illusion - right? That is, if the mind is not free to look into what is meditation, how can you learn about it, how can you understand it? You must come to it like a child who goes for the first time to learn how to write. He goes to it fresh, innocent, curious. But if you already say "This is meditation, you must sit in a certain way, you must stand in a certain way, breathe in a certain way" - then the trivialities become all important.

So we are going to find out what is meditation. And why is it so important to meditate? Why has the east given such extraordinary importance to it, which is now gradually sweeping over the west? It is a very complex problem this. If you have time and the energy to listen, listen, if you don't it doesn't matter. You can observe that the Grecian evolution, Grecian culture from Greece, ancient Greece, has swept over the west - I am not an historian but I can see it, you can observe it. To them the intellect mattered enormously, their theories, their discoveries, their arguments, their democracy - you follow? That is, thought was tremendously important for them. That is, thought being measure. Go into it. You can see it. Thought is measure. That is, measure means from here to there. Also it means comparing, measuring. So the west has cultivated enormous technology. If you had no measure there would be no technology - right? Obviously. And the other side, the Asiatic in India, the Indians said, "All measurement" - the ancient Hindus, not the modern ones, they are all as crooked as the rest of the world, including the gurus - the ancients have said, "Measurement is illusion" - consider it, see the reason of it. They said, "To find the immeasurable the mind must be free of measure". One side measurement, the other side, non-measurement. Right? To find that which is eternal, which is timeless, which is immeasurable, which is nameless, which is Jehovah, which is God, Brahman, and all the rest of it, there must be no measure. That means no comparison - they don't say that, I am saying it, the speaker is saying it - no comparison.

So the west laying complete, all emphasis on thought, memory, knowledge, experience and through knowledge ascending more and more and more. And the other said, no measurement; but to find that which is immeasurable they began to think about it, they began to evolve, grow - you follow? - practise, do this, don't do that - which is all based on thought. Only here technology, there non-technology. But technology is now conquering India too. So you have this problem. Can the mind be free of all measurement? Measurement is to think in terms of the past, or the future. The present being measured by the past, modified by that measurement and that measurement continuing into the future, which is our life. Measurement. Yesterday I was, today I may change, tomorrow it will be something different.

So the movement of meditation is to live in daily life without measurement. Which means, without the movement of thought, which is measure. The ending of time can only come into being, which is the ending of time as thought, as movement, all that, when thought has discovered its own limitation - right? - and puts it in its right place. Are you following all this? It has been one of our problems, of man and woman, he has been always asking if there is an end to time, stopping of time. Not the stopping of time in science fiction, which you can imagine and all the rest of it, but actually the ending of thought, which is the movement of measure, which is the movement of time. I don't know if it interests you - not interests, it is part of life. As we said, the art of listening, the art of seeing, the art of learning, consists in understanding the word 'art' - art means to put everything in its right place, the actual dictionary meaning of that word. When everything has its right place, then the mind is completely at rest - right? Because it is obvious.

So from that there arises the question: what is awareness, and what is attention? Is awareness part of attention? Is awareness part of concentration? You aren't tired of all this? You should be. It doesn't matter. Or is attention nothing to do with concentration or with awareness? So we have to examine those three things because - not because. Meditation is involved in this. Awareness is to be aware of the things around you - right? To be aware of the mountains, the rivers, the shadows, the snow, the birds, the ravens, the people, the things they wear, and so on and so on, to be aware of this tent, the shape of it. But in that awareness your prejudices enter, your opinions enter, "This isn't right, it should be that way, I don't like that colour but I like the other colour" - you follow? You are aware of this constant choice, constant evaluation. So can you observe, can you be aware without reaction? Which doesn't mean that you don't have reactions. Just to observe the mountain without any reaction, to look at it, just to look at it. The moment you bring in your prejudice, anxiety and all the rest of it, you are not aware, you are caught in your own net.

Concentration implies exclusion and giving all your energy on a particular point - right? "Don't look out of the window but pay attention to the book" - that is what we are told in school. But if you are the teacher and you say, "Look, when you are looking out of the window do look at it completely, don't be frightened of looking" - you understand?

So attention is freedom from every form of evaluation, measurement. Because in that there is no centre - I don't know if you have discovered it for yourself. If you attend completely to something there is no centre. There is no 'me' being attentive, that is too silly. If you see that, see the fact of it, then you realize there is no practice, there is no system to be aware, to attend, to concentrate. That is all again so extraordinarily silly. The moment you see, understand this whole business of awareness, concentration and attention, then you are attentive. That attention may last two seconds or five minutes, and you may lose that attention but don't go back and say, "I must be attentive". You understand? Attention came because you knew what it meant - you follow? There was an understanding of it, deep understanding, not intellectual, of what attention is, so it came naturally. But if you begin to say, "I must have constant attention during the day", you are being terribly greedy and it is no longer attention. It is a desire to have something, which you call attention.

So when there is such attention the mind, because there is no centre from which to attend, the mind is completely quiet. Not that you train the mind to be quiet, which all of them practise to be quiet. One has often heard this phrase, "I must have peace of mind" - they will have a piece of mind but it is not peace - you understand? It is just a little piece of something!

So when there is complete order in our life, which is the beginning of meditation, and one understands the nature of awareness, concentration and attention, then all effort has come to an end. All effort. When you put everything in order there is no effort. So the mind becomes extraordinarily quiet, uninvited, not cultivated, something totally new.

And religion, not this nonsense that is going on around us, with all their priests and ceremonies, and all that circus that goes on, then religion means the ending of the self, the 'me'. It is only then that the mind can be absolutely, irrevocably, quiet, and therefore silent, which means the ending of thought as time and measure. Then if the mind has gone that far, in that silence which is vast space and energy there is totally a state which cannot be put into words. But if you put everything in order and so on, it will come to you without your invitation. You cannot invite truth, there is no path to truth, there is no intermediary or gateway, or anything between you and truth. If the field is right then that thing comes to you with such glory. That is ecstasy. In that there is great sacredness. That is holy.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 26 JULY 1978

I believe this is a discussion, or a dialogue, or a conversation between ourselves. I don't know what questions or subjects you want to talk over together but I would suggest, not that you must accept it, I would suggest that we are not exchanging opinions, we are not trying to convince each other of anything, we are not trying to persuade or coerce or subtly control each other's thinking, or trying to be clever with each other. I would suggest that before asking questions, any problem, any issue, we should be clear in ourselves who is going to answer the question. Do we, in our conversation, dialogue or discussion, discover for ourselves the answer, the fact, the truth of the matter, or expect someone to answer it for you? And if one expects the speaker to answer the question, or the issue, then I am afraid you are going to be disappointed. But whereas if we could talk over together, find out the answer for oneself, then that question, the issue, will have meaning.

So please bear all this in mind, that we are not trying to convince each other, that we are not doing propaganda, that we are not trying to persuade each other to believe or not to believe, to follow or not to follow; but in our conversation we are going to find out for ourselves the correct, the truthful solution to the issue.

So what shall we talk about this morning?

Q: It appears that one of the biggest barriers to perception, to insight, to relating to a fact is that when we see the fact of our self interest at work, our self-centredness, that we mind. That we can see, and therefore we do not go into what we see.

K: I understand. When we observe, the questioner asks - and if I am putting it wrongly please correct it - the questioner asks: any issue, or any problem into which we have to have an insight, or a perception, is controlled by the mind, and it is not the perception, it is not the insight, but the quality of the mind that is capable of insight. Is that right sir? Have I put it wrongly?

Q: Not quite. The point seems that there is the nature of our self-interest that we are investigating, and when we look, when we admit momentarily to our self-interest at work, we wake up to what is actually happening, we mind what we see, we don't like what we see each time. Sometimes we do observe it clearly but the problem is when we will not look clearly at our selfishness, at our self-centredness.

K: We do not see our problems, our selfishness very clearly. That is one of the questions we want to discuss. Any others?

Q: When we are aware of people there can possibly be compassion, or there can be very cold awareness. What is the relationship between awareness and compassion?

K: What is the relationship between awareness and compassion.

Q: We generally intellectualize everything we hear, or when we read something, a statement of any kind, we immediately translate it into an intellectual process. Why does this happen and can that end?

Q: I perceive that I can be conscious of my conditioning, of certain conditioning, yet this will keep on coming up and up, and it feels that though I am aware of it I am still caught in it, and I can't seem to free myself from it.

K: When I am aware, or observe my conditioning, I think I am somewhat free of it but I come back to it again over and over and over. Is that enough for this morning?

Which of these three questions, or four questions, should we take? Why, as that gentleman asked, we don't have a deep insight into our selfishness and be free of it? Then the other question was, what is the relationship between awareness and compassion? And the other question is, why does the mind always intellectualize and therefore avoid the main issue? And the other is, one is aware of the conditioning and one perhaps slightly loosens up the weight of the past but it recurs over and over again? Now which of these four questions do we take up and go into? No answer?

Q: The last one.

K: The last one? Perhaps the other questions can be included in the last question of this person, which is: it seems to happen that occasionally when one is aware and one is interested that this conditioning of many, many centuries is broken down somewhat, but it comes back again and again. What is one to do? Shall we discuss that?

First of all if we go into it seriously, and I hope you want to go into it seriously, we must be very clear not only of the question but also how we approach the question. The approach matters enormously, perhaps more than the question itself. May I go into that a little bit?

There is this question: whether it is possible for the mind to uncondition itself completely and not occasionally? That is the question. How do you approach that question because the manner of your approach will find a solution? But if you approach it with an intellectual concept, then your answer will also be very superficial. Right sir? Or you want to be completely free of this conditioning and therefore your desire to be free of it is much stronger than the problem itself. Right sir? Or is it a problem to you at all? A real problem, a real issue, like wanting food, or is it merely a superficial, casual question you put while you are here, and then you forget all about it and say, 'Well next year we will trot it out again'?

So do you approach it intellectually, conceptually, do you approach it with a desire to find an answer? All this indicates you are giving a direction to your enquiry. You are directing your enquiry, you are not free to enquire, so you will never find the answer because you are directing what the answer should be. So first please, if you are serious at all, find out how you approach this problem, the question, which is: is it possible for the mind to completely uncondition itself and not occasionally think it is free? Now how do you approach it? The approach is serious and the problem is urgent, demanding, and the problem says you must find a way out of this - right? That means you are deeply concerned with it - as you demand sexual fulfilment, as you demand money, hunger, demand it. Or do you say, 'Well, let's talk about it casually while we are here, and afterwards we will forget all about the beastly thing'? So if you are serious then let's investigate together. I am not investigating, you are investigating, you are enquiring, you are not accepting a thing - right?

So what do we mean by conditioning? Education in certain ways conditions us - going to school, college, university, if you are lucky, or unlucky. And conditioning by the environment in which you live - the economic condition, the political condition, the cultural condition, the religious conditioning, the conditioning of what you eat, which obviously conditions you, and your relationship with another, intimate or not intimate is a factor of conditioning. So this is what we mean by conditioning. Is that also your perception, understanding, not intellectually but actually, that is the nature of conditioning. That is, if the speaker is born in India and is conditioned by the superstition, by the culture, by the family, and so on and so on and so on, that conditioning is part of the mind, part of the brain, part of his actions, part of his reactions. Now can one be aware of all this? That is the first question. Can I be aware that I have been brought up as a Hindu, with all the superstitions, with all the certain qualities of excellence and so on and so on? Is one aware of that?

Then what do you mean by being aware, conscious, know? Is it an intellectual comprehension - I have understood my conditioning intellectually, which means verbally. That is, when we use the word 'verbally', we mean by that, you hear the statement that you are conditioned, probably you have never even thought about it before, you hear that statement and make that statement into an idea - right? I hope you are following this. Into an idea, and pursue that idea, that you are conditioned. The idea is not the fact - right? So what is it that you do when you say, 'I know I am conditioned', is that an idea with which you are familiar, or is it an actual fact, fact, that you are conditioned as a Christian, as a Swiss, as a Frenchman, an Englishman, or whatever it is, with all the religious superstitions and so on and so on? If you are aware, or if you know you are conditioned as a fact, are you aware of it - not an entity who is aware of something - you follow? You see the difference? I wonder if you do. When you are hungry you say, 'I am hungry'. That hunger is not different from you - right? Is that right? Is what we are saying, is that correct? I am hungry. You don't say, 'I am different from hunger', you see the fact and you say, 'I am hungry' - right? The 'I' is not separate from hunger. Is that a fact? Please discuss this, go into it, I may be wrong. Let's find out the truth of the matter.

When you are angry is that anger different from you, or you are that, at the moment you are that? Later on you say, 'I have been angry'. Therefore later on you disassociate yourself from anger. Right? So are you aware, or know, or cognizant of the fact that you are conditioned? You are conditioned, not conditioning is different from me. You understand the question? This is really important, if you don't mind, go into it patiently. We will go into it in different ways. Let us stick to this one thing so that we are very, very clear about the matter.

If I say to myself, 'I am different from my conditioning', then I act about the conditioning - right? Then I do something about the conditioning. I work on it, I say, 'I must be free from it', so there is conflict between me and the conditioning. Right sir? Are you doing that? Or you are that conditioning? You have understood? You are not different from the conditioning because you are Christian, you are the result of all the things that go on round about you, so you are that. You are not separate from your conditioning. This is a very complex question because one has to go deeply into it. One's thinking is the result of the conditioning. Right? Please discuss it, don't accept anything I am talking about. This is not a talk by me. We are discussing the thing together, talking over together. The

'me' that observes the conditioning, that 'me', or the observer who thinks he is observing, looking into the conditioning is not different, he is part of that conditioning. If he is different you take a positive action about the conditioning, you say, 'I must get rid of it', 'I must be free of my religious conditioning'. So how am I to be free, what will happen when I am free, will I fall into another conditioning, what will I do, what practices must I do to get rid of my conditioning. All that takes place when the 'me', the observer, says, 'I am different from my conditioning'. Is this clear? Not clear for me, clear to you. It has been clear to me since I was twenty.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, it is not a question of identification. I don't identify myself with my conditioning.

Q: But I am not that conditioning.

K: No, madame. First of all madame, do you know you are conditioned? What do you mean you know you are conditioned? That you are a Catholic, Protestant, or a Socialist, Liberal, or belonging to this Institution or that Institution, that you believe and don't believe.

Q: I can see it but I cannot verbalize what is me.

K: Now wait a minute. I understand the question. I cannot verbalize what is the 'me'. Can't you? The 'me' is your senses with which you identify. Or you belong to somebody, or you have identified yourself with a particular nation, with a particular name, with a particular family, with a particular group of people, with a particular series of conclusions, ideals. If you are none of these, actually none of these, then you are free from the conditioning.

Q: If I see astrology I feel that is true also.

K: I am afraid I don't understand what you are saying. You are not explaining clearly madame. What is it you want to say?

Q: We are just playing at something, acting in life, but it is not that. There is an unconscious conditioning as well, a deeper conditioning.

K: Do you mean, consciously you are not conditioned, but deep down you are? Is that what you mean? If you don't know what you mean, I give up.

Please, this is an important subject because if you can understand very profoundly this question, whether the mind can be really completely free of conditioning; if it can then all our problems will be resolved, both economic problems, social problems, and so-called psychological problems, the outer and the inner, by understanding the whole nature and the structure of conditioning and being completely free from it, then the whole thing becomes entirely different.

So what we are saying is: are we aware, know, conscious, recognize that we are conditioned? That is the first thing. If you are conditioned, and you say, 'Yes, I am', is the 'I' that says, 'I am conditioned', is that 'I' different from the conditioning, or both are the same? This is an important question you have basically to understand. The 'I', the observer who says, 'I am conditioned', that observer is not different from the thing which he calls conditioning. He is that. Without that conditioning what are you? If you have no name, don't identify with your body, no group, no nationality, no belief, no religion, you follow, if you discard all that, where is the 'I' with all the selfishness, ambition? It is washed away. So this is a very important question, if you are at all serious, to go into.

So if you see that the 'I' is separate from the conditioning then you act upon it. This action is called positive. The positive action of this kind is to struggle with it, to find out the causes of conditioning, how deeply you are conditioned, whether you can do something about it, or go to somebody and ask them what to do, they will tell you what to do, which is practice, you know all the rest of it. Whereas the actual fact is the entity that says, 'I am conditioned and I want to be free from it', that entity is also conditioned. Therefore there is only conditioning, not 'I am conditioned'. You have understood this simple fact?

So the battle is over between me and the conditioning. Then we can examine without division. You understand, sir? Have you got it, really got it? That you are part of that conditioning, you are not different from that conditioning, therefore you cannot analyse that conditioning - right? If you analyse there is the analyser and the conditioning - you follow. So if you see the actual fact that the analyser is the analysed - please, I happened to discuss this matter, the analyser and the analysed, with a lot of professional analysts, very clever, top people, they immediately said, 'We don't understand this, please go and talk somewhere else' - because it means they lose their job - don't laugh, we are all in that position - lose their job, their position, their victims or patients, and so on and so on. So this is really a very, very serious question.

The conflict between the analyser and the analysed gives strength to the analyser, which is the 'me'. The analyser is the past, the past is conditioning the analyser - right? Do see this. The past is conditioning, or has conditioned the analyser, and the analyser then says, 'I am going to analyse my conditioning'. So he is going round and round in circles. So to realize the absurdity, the fallacy of analysis is to break down this division. Which means, the conditioning is me. The conditioning isn't over there, it is here.

So then arises the question which is really important from there: then if I am that, what am I to do? You have understood sir? I am not persuading you to anything, don't accept it, find out these facts for yourself.

Q: I don't accept anything. Why does the observer separate himself?

K: Why does the observer, the analyser, or the experiencer, or the thinker, why does he separate himself - right? Why?

Q: He wants to be free from it.

K: He wants to be free of it. That is, the analyser wants to be free of the analysed, therefore he separates himself.

Q: To make himself more strong.

K: That's all. No, go into this question, it is important too. Why is there division between the analyser and the analysed? That is what we are discussing. The conditioned and the entity that says, 'I am not conditioned but I am going to uncondition myself'. So what is the problem? We are saying, why is there this division? Go on.

Q: The analyser is the fact, he is actually in the present.

K: But why is there this division?

Q: Because we always want to identify.

K: Don't throw out ideas, guess.

Q: Shouldn't the analyser accept his own conditioning?

K: Madame, let's put the analyser differently. Is the experiencer different from experience? Is the thinker different from thought? If there is no thinker there is no thought. Or there may be a totally different state. The experiencer says, 'I am different from the experience, I must have that experience, because I am different'. We are asking, why is there this division between the experiencer who says, 'I must have more of that experience' - sexual experience, or the experience of power and so on and so on - why is there this division?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do you know, or are you merely guessing? Please find out. If you know why the division exists, is it an intellectual conclusion, an argument, a deduction, from that deduction you say, 'It is so'? Or you say, 'I really don't know'?

Q: Sir, there seems to be no space in the consciousness. When I observe the observed there seems to be no space.

K: I see. So by creating space between the observer and the observed have I understood the whole business? Have I? You have space between the observer and the observed. You have space when you say, 'I want that experience', there is space.

Q: Why does it matter, why do you have to find out?

K: I will tell you. Why do you have to find out? Are you asking this of me, or of yourself?

Q: Myself.

K: If you are asking yourself, why do you ask it? Just out of curiosity?

Q: No, I was thinking..

K: No, just see. When there is a division there is conflict, isn't there? When there is division between the Arab and the Jew, between the Catholic and the Protestant, or the North Irishman and the British, division in any form must bring about conflict. So when there is a division between the experiencer, the analyser, the thinker and the thought, the experience, there must be conflict. Right, sir? So it is a law that where there is division there must be conflict. If there is a conflict between me and my wife it means there is no relationship. Right? There is conflict.

Q: Sir, the other day you told us that when we are in sorrow and we are not trying to escape from it, but just watch it. But you warned us too when we are watching our sorrow not to identify ourselves with the sorrow. It seems for me quite impossible just to watch it. While I am watching my sorrow I am watching with a part of me. With what part of the mind do I have to watch my sorrow?

K: That is what we are going to find out, sir. You use sorrow and myself. I am different from sorrow. And if there is that division then I do something about sorrow. I work at it, I say, 'I must not be sorrowful, what is the reason for that sorrow' and so on, analyse. The moment I begin to analyse it I separate myself from the thing I am analysing. Is this clear?

Q: It is very easy to look at the manifestations of your conditioning. But what we are trying to do here, if I have understood it: I, inside myself, am trying to look at my own conditioning inside myself. That is a different question. My consciousness is trying to be conscious of itself. I am conditioned to say something.

K: Yes, what are you asking, sir?

Q: I am just pointing out that the conditioning we are trying to look at is not really an outer manifestation. We are looking at the conditioning in here, if you see what I mean.

K: I am afraid it is an outward manifestation. When I am a Muslim and I hate the Hindu, my conditioning brings war.

Q: But that is not the problem.

K: That is one of the problems.

Q: That is one of the consequences of being conditioned.

K: That is what I said, sir. That's right. One of the consequences of being conditioned.

Q: But the truth is one is conditioned, and we are trying to look at what is conditioned, not the manifestations of that conditioning.

K: I must not only observe..

Q: All right, I will put it in a question. Can my consciousness be conscious of itself, and will that promote a proper change within me?

K: Yes.

Q: Is that a promise?

K: Oh no! It is not a promise. How can I promise somebody will be free? What a ridiculous question that is.

Q: Then it is a ridiculous answer.

K: Probably.

Q: Sir, may I say something. Many of us have been here many years.

K: I agree!

Q: Many times, probably thirty or maybe twenty years. I am exactly where I was on the very first day.

K: That's right, sir.

Q: What I feel about it is that you have made the present point over and over again in different words - I am sorry if I am talking too long, because when you cover your face I know you are impatient, I don't want that. Can you hear, because I can speak a little louder if you can't.

K: The gentleman says, he has been here a number of years, hearing over and over and over again the explanations, the various forms of analysis, all that, and he says after these number of years he is where he is - as most of us are.

Q: May I continue a little bit, sir? Because that is not really my question, that was a preamble. What I feel is that you have got a certain point to make, and you are making it in a multitude of different ways, whether it is the observer and the observed, the thinker and the thought, experiencer and the experience, and so forth, it is all really one point. If we can't understand that point when you put it in one set of words we are not going to understand it if you change it into another set of words. What you want to do - and I don't blame you because you are impatient with us, sitting here asking the same old stupid questions again and again and again, you want to get off and in a very little while from where you reached a little while ago where you pointed out that the mind that was observing the conditioning was itself conditioned and therefore couldn't do a thing about it. That point seemed to me to be the crux of the whole issue.

K: Quite right sir.

Q: If we really see that in five minutes we are with you on Cloud 9, we have seen the lot. If we don't see that we will come back here tomorrow and every year thereafter. We are obviously very stupid people because you have evidently done something on your own without having to be pushed and goaded into it. We are impervious to being pushed and pushed, and goaded, but if you really want some chance of this point which you have been trying to make for fifty years, to get across to us, I am afraid you will have to be a lot more patient because it is no use your continuing from the point which you reached, thinking we have got that far, we haven't got that far.

K: So what shall I do, sir?

Q: It is a very big problem, sir, I don't know what you should do. Next year we will be exactly in the same position. If we delude ourselves that we have understood something, but actually we have understood nothing.

K: So here we are. We have come to an impasse. You have heard the speaker for ten, thirty years, or two years, or a day, and we haven't met each other at the central point. And the speaker makes this in ten different ways, using a new set of words, speaking in Dutch or French or whatever it is, but the central point has not been understood by each one of us and there you are. It is an impasse. So what shall we do? Why don't you walk out? I am asking, why don't you say, 'Sorry, this is impossible, nonsense' and walk out?

Q: I see we are conditioned by your presence.

K: The lady says, we are conditioned by your presence. I will walk out. I think we are playing with words. Madame, just a minute, please. That gentleman raised a very good question. We have heard you for a number of years, we haven't changed. Perhaps a little bit, a little bit here, a little bit there, but actually we have not changed at all. We are not totally unconditioned ourselves. And if there is a total unconditioning the thing is over - we shall live differently, there will be etc. etc. So what shall we do? Would sitting together quietly uncondition you? No. Talking about it has not unconditioned you. Whose fault is it? Not fault, whose responsibility - without the word responsibility involving guilt, remove that word guilt away from responsibility. Whose responsibility is this?

Q: It is our responsibility.

K: Then if it is your responsibility, what are you doing about it?

Q: Do you wonder whether it might be yours in part?

K: I am asking myself. I said to you, is it my fault, is it partly the speaker's impatience, the speaker's presence, the speaker's dominance, the speaker's personality?

Q: The way you put it.

K: The way I put it. The way I put it. How shall I put it? Please tell me how I should put it. I'd be delighted to know.

Q: I would say we are taking the wrong approach. It is not a cause. I think we are looking for the cause of us being here. I..

K: You are not helping me, sir. You are not saying something.

Q: I am saying why have you made it into a problem?

K: I have not made it into a problem. Please sir, just a minute. I am not making a problem.

Q: Isn't it a fact that all this talking here of us, is just the talking of the 'me'? And the 'me' actually has to vanish.

K: Quite right, sir.

Q: The one who talks with the 'me' receives extra benefit, though he makes suggestions, he never makes suggestions of any such thing. So these talks we cannot say anything about it. But the one who is speaking only becomes stronger so he talks like this.

K: I know sir. Could we put it very, very simply. We are selfish people - right? Our actions are selfish.

Q: Totally?

K: We are selfish people. I didn't say totally, or not totally.

Q: I want to put it: totally or not?

K: You may be occasionally unselfish.

Q: We must leave that aside, but the drive is within one, to be, to have, not to do.

K: All right. To be, to have, to possess, that is part of selfishness.

Q: That's why I ask, is it total.

K: All right, if you want me to put it that way. That is essence of our existence. That is the total drive, as you could call it. Now is it possible - I am just putting it quietly, gently - is it possible to be free of that tremendous drive of wanting to be, wanting to become, wanting to possess, wanting to identify with something, can all that drive end?

Q: That drive also goes with the direction of the next year, a higher year, the ending being a higher year.

K: No, no, no. That is where you and I part company. You insist on going higher and higher, becoming more and more refined. I say that is still the same drive.

Q: I say the same.

K: Madame, just listen. The same drive refined, but it is still the same. So I am asking, is that drive, which is the essence of the self, selfishness, and all the rest of it, can that end?

Q: At which point does that question become clean?

K: Clean? What do you mean by that, I don't understand?

Q: Every step that one takes poses a question: is there any point where the question is clean of that drive?

K: Yes. There is a point when the drive cleanly ends.

Q: Ok.

K: There is no Ok! Please listen carefully. Either you are trying to find out whether that drive can end, or you are just arguing.

Q: I asked the question for me. The drive and its perpetuation and its ending seem totally unrelated to each other.

K: Maybe. But do I know the limits, the expanse, the extension, the extent of that drive? Because in that drive there is every form of violence and so on and so on. So I am asking myself, or you are asking yourself, can that drive end?

Q: I ask, who is asking the question? And I know for myself who is asking the question.

K: Obviously, you are asking yourself.

Q: The drive continually takes a step back, it tries to simulate a disinterestedness, an objectivity, which is not inherent in its nature.

K: Madame, what are you to do? You insist on one thing. Perhaps, if I may respectfully point out, you have perhaps not listened, you are sticking to your point. You may accuse me that I am sticking to my point.

Q: No, I am prepared to say that here we part company. Let's put it this way: that here we part company.

K: Look, please, as I said before and I repeat again, I am not trying to convince you of anything. I am not telling you what to do. I am not your guru, or a subtle form of - you know, all that stuff. I am saying because we are conditioned, from that conditioning all problems arise. That's all. From that conditioning there is a certain drive - to use her word. The drive is more and more to be separate, more and more violence, as objectively it is happening in the world and so on and on and on. A man, a woman, who is serious, says, 'Will there be an end to all this?' - that's all. Or must this go on in a refined state, more and more subtle ways of violence, more and more subtle ways of conflict, more and more subtle ways of keeping up the division and so on and so on. That is what it comes to, essentially what that lady says.

The speaker says, for himself, not that you must accept, don't accept, he says there is a total ending of this drive, which is in essence the self. Then you will say, 'How does it manifest itself in daily life?' I say to that, 'Find out'. Find out to what extent you are selfish, to what extent you are self-centred, concerned about yourself both inwardly and outwardly - find out. And see if that is not causing tremendous harm in the world, when each human being is occupied with himself, which is our conditioning. If you want to find out if one can live harmoniously, happily, supremely intelligently, outwardly and inwardly, you have to find out for yourself whether you can be free of this drive. Which means, are you willing to give time, energy - you follow? Apparently, although you may listen for ten years, or fifteen, or a week, apparently this doesn't exist. And to that you may say you are using wrong words, you may use different expressions. To that we will say, we are using ordinary, everyday language.

Q: All that you have said up to now belongs in the same package.

K: Of course madame. Of course it belongs in the same package. But to explain the content of the package one must use words.

Q: Yes, that is the content. The different aspects all carry the same ego.

K: Yes, madame, understood.

Q: The examination is no different to the content.

K: What will you do, madame? You know the content as well as I do, and most of us know what the content is, what we are carrying in the bag for the rest of our lives, most of you know. Then why don't you, or another put it aside?

Q: No, it can't be done.

K: Well it is finished. Madame.

Q: Because I putting aside is for the same purpose.

K: You say it can't be done. Wait. That's enough.

Q: Now when there is tremendous effort, in whatever disguise, one can wait for the full scheme of self improvement. Ok Now we leave that aside.

K: I don't know what you are talking about.

Q: Drop it. But when you say to me, 'Why don't you drop it?', I say, 'First of all I am not interested in making efforts to drop. If my shoes pinch I will buy another pair of shoes'.

K: But madame, that is not the question.

Q: It is the same thing. You say to someone, drop it, it doesn't happen that way. It can't be done that way. Everyone here knows that it doesn't happen that way. I don't know what makes it different, why it should happen, when it should happen, it doesn't seem to have any cause, any reason, it seems to be unrelated to all that rubbish, or desire, or being so objective about it.

K: If a particular diet doesn't suit me, I change the diet.

Q: I know why I change the diet.

K: Wait madame.

Q: You always want to go away. You always want to go and seek in terms of changing the diet. You think it is a clean action. It is not.

K: You say you cannot change. You cannot radically bring about a transformation, it is impossible. All right, finished. Then why do you stay here?

Q: Go home.

K: No, please.

Q: I find again and again, and you yourself reiterate the point, there is nothing you can do. Only when the observer is the observed then, only when there is no experiencer, the first step is the last step. You yourself point this out again and again.

K: The conversation between us ends.

Q: I didn't understand one thing. I am conditioned (inaudible)

K: I don't know quite where I am, do you?

Q: I feel that I am seldom free of my conditioning and of my replies, I don't know if I am existing any more.

K: What will happen to me, the questioner says, if I end the drive? We are using a new set of words. What will happen, will that be the end of me? Probably.

You see apparently any amount of our talking together doesn't do anything. You can cleverly oppose what one says, or say, use different language, different expression, this and that, but as we said we are using ordinary common English. Now we have come to a point when apparently the words - knowing the word is not the thing - the word and the description - the description is not the described - knowing all that, we are confronted with a simple problem, which is: we human beings are very selfish, limited, and from that limited state of mind our whole problem arises. We are destroying the earth and so on and so on, which all of us know. Now what shall we do? To me, personally, if I listen, that is enough for me. If I listen accurately, that is enough for me. To me, personally, someone says to me, 'Is it possible to end this drive of the self?', which is the selfishness and all that, will you end it, is it possible to end it and will you end it if you find it? If I hear it completely, as I do, then the very statement of that is acting on me. I don't argue, I don't say, 'Show me'. I have learnt the art - not learnt - the art of listening. That's all. If I listen accurately the thing is embedded in me, it works.

Now this morning we have talked an hour and twenty minutes. Where are we? Are we going to say, 'I am in exactly the same place as I was ten years ago' - or the same place, not the actual physical space, in myself, I haven't moved. I am still appallingly selfish. I am still being driven by that. All right. Is that what you have learnt this morning? Is that what we have learnt, that we are terribly selfish people, that this selfishness is the drive in our life, and there is no answer to it? We will go on our way as we have been doing for millennia. If that is so, we can't communicate with each other because the speaker says, it is not only an absolute necessity to end that drive because it is creating havoc in the world, and also he says, yes, it can be done. Will you listen to that? Or say, 'No, I have listened to you for ten years and nothing'? Will you listen with your heart, with your mind, to something - when you love something you listen? Right. When you love your little baby you listen to it. So can you listen so carefully, so attentively, with affection, to this statement: that we are being driven by selfishness and are you aware of it, can you end it? Let's find out whether it is possible. If you don't want to end it, it is perfectly all right. Nobody is asking you to end it. If that is the way you want to live - conflict, wars, you know all that is going on in the world, one superstition against another, which is called religion, one nationality against another - if you want all that it is your affair, go on. But if you say, 'That's all wrong, that is all the drive of the self, is there a different way of living?' I say, let's talk it over together. That's all.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 27TH JULY 1978

Before we begin to bombard each other with a lot of questions and arguments, I wonder if you read in the newspaper - I don't generally read newspapers, I look at the headlines - that the world every year is spending four hundred billion dollars on armaments. That is four hundred thousand million dollars. I don't know what that sum means but that is what is being spent on trying to kill each other. I wonder, after reading such a statement, what will make human beings change? Yesterday, that gentleman on my left put a question: he said I have listened to you for so many years, listened to your talks, listened to your tapes and so on, and I am exactly where I started when I began. I think it would be important if we could go into that question rather seriously. Perhaps most of us are in that position - perhaps.

What will make a human being change very deeply? This has been a great problem for those people who are concerned with the transformation of man. What makes us change? If you put that question to yourself seriously, and ask with all depth of your being, what will make you change? Will an external event bring about a crisis in your life and that forces you to do some radical thinking and change? A death in the family, an incident or an event, or a happening, that is devastating, psychologically as well as physically - will that bring about deep change? Or must you go through great pain, great sorrow, great agony, brought about by external events, and forces you, forces a human being to alter his course, his drive, his direction, his selfishness, his limited brutal thinking? We have had several wars and most of us have perhaps lived through two wars, devastating wars, millions have been killed. Think of the misery, the confusion, the enormous sorrow of those people who have had great losses, not only physical losses but their sons destroyed. And apparently superficial events, however great they are, don't seem to bring about a freedom, say, 'This cannot happen again' - do you understand?

So I am asking you, this has been a question which we have considered many, many times - will external events change man? That is one problem. That is, superficial events. And apparently that has not changed man - change in the sense we mean, a real deep transformation of this selfish drive, identified with groups, with nations, with beliefs, dogmas, religion, and all the rest of it. And apparently - please follow this - apparently some superficial event, like the death of one's husband, wife, children, does bring through great pain and sorrow a certain change in oneself. I do not know if you have not noticed it. Does that mean we must depend on external events - death, war, somebody leaving you and so on and so on and so on, external devastating events, will that change you? Which means that you must depend on outward things, which will then put you through great agony and suffering and out of that you come, bringing about perhaps a deep mutation - right?

It seems to us that that is the most appalling thing, even to say, that we must go through suffering to bring a change. That's inconceivable, but yet that is what happens, apparently. It is like a man who is driving a car rather carelessly, kills others and survives, and afterwards he says, 'I am going to be awfully careful how I drive' - he is intelligent after the event. You follow? Is it possible to be intelligent before the event? You understand my question? Intelligent meaning, not become more clever in this instinctual survival of selfishness, of that drive of desire and so on and so on, but that intelligence that is born out of the perception that superficially events do not fundamentally change man, but that change must come totally inwardly, without any pressure, without any incident, event, to perceive that is part of intelligence. To perceive the truth that if I depend on outward pressure, outward events which puts me through a great deal of sorrow and anxiety, I will either become cynical, bitter or escape into some form of entertainment. So in that there is no deep change. To see that is part of intelligence. The materialists, the communists, the totalitarian people say, change the outward events then man changes. But that has been tried through millenia - right? And apparently man has not changed.

And also there is this statement made by several gurus and teachers in the east, and perhaps in the west, that surrender yourself then all your problems are solved. You again surrender to something outside, or surrender to something which you have created - you follow all this? I wonder if you understand. Please, are we understanding each other? This is very important after the question of that gentleman yesterday. He said, 'I have listened to you for so many years and I have not changed. I am where I started out.' You know to hear such a statement you cry inwardly. You understand? I wonder how many of you cried inwardly. And what will change him, or you, or another? Is it, as we said, an external event, devastating, which brings about sorrow, and then sorrow if it is deep it shatters everything that you have had, and then perhaps you say, 'I can't live this way anymore' - so you are again depending on an external event? And external events can be vast - wars, earthquakes, and so on, external events. Realizing that these religious - can I use the word exploiters? - these religious exploiters - with your consent I am using that word - say, give yourself over, surrender. You understand the implications of it? Surrender naturally to the guru, to the man who says, 'Surrender', but inwardly do you eliminate this drive, this self-centredness and so on and so on? You understand? Again the same phenomenon, which is outward pressure, now you are exerting inward pressure to submit to somebody else. Have you understood this? Can we go on from there?

Now do you listen to all this - that outward pressure is not going to change, inward giving yourself over to a presence, a reality, to god, to this, or to that, is still the desire which drives you to forget yourself, but the self is still there only covered up. So do you listen to these statements - right? Or it doesn't mean a thing at all? So perhaps the root of the matter lies there: intellectually, verbally you see reasonably, logically, the statements we have made just now, very clear, unless you want to change the words, but the essence of it is that the outward pressure through sorrow, and the inward pressure to escape from yourself - right - which again is another form of pressure. Do you listen to this so that you see the truth of it, that whether it be pressure from outside or from inside there is no change. To see that, to hear that and see that fact, that is intelligence. You understand? So are you, forgive me for asking this question, are you, who have listened to this this morning, clearly exposed, logically, sanely, do you see the actuality of it, the truth of it and therefore there is intelligence? Therefore that intelligence is the denial of the outer or the inner, and therefore moving from where you are. Do you understand?

Now have you listened this morning, taken in, seriously gone into it, as we did just now, and seen that pressure outward or inward, in different ways, in different forms, will not bring about the radical mutation? To hear that and see it is intelligence. Do you see it? Do you have that intelligence? Therefore that intelligence acts before the event so that man has not to go through sorrow. If you discover that, it is something - you follow - it is a divine gift. Sorry to use the word divine. It is a great, enormous gift because before the event, catastrophic devastating event, that brings sorrow, or any pressure outward or inward will not change man, when he realizes that, sees the truth of that, that intelligence is operating wherever it is - whether in your daily life, whether it is in an office, you follow, all the time that is operating. Right?

Now let us discuss, or let's talk it over, if you want to.

Q: (In French)

K: He says, I am very glad I came here to listen to all this, I am very grateful.

Q: What is loneliness?

K: Any other?

Q: Yesterday we arrived half way to this idea of being free from conditioning. We stopped at the point one is aware that one is conditioned. My question is what happens after you are aware, and why does it seem that one is overtaken by this conditioning process?

K: Shall we go back to that? Are you bored with it?

Q: This question of conditioning, I would like to see if the body itself is conditioned. What is the relationship of the conditioning and identification?

K: What is the relationship between conditioning and identification, with the body, with an event, and so on?

Q: Is the body itself conditioned?

K: Obviously. Right sir? What was the other question that lady asked?

Q: Loneliness.

K: Shall we start with that and work into this question of whether it is possible to understand this question of conditioning, not only the actual fact of being conditioned, what takes place when the mind is not conditioned. That is more difficult.

What is loneliness? Is loneliness separate from solitude? I am not quibbling about words. You understand my question? To be alone is different from being lonely. Alone means all one. I am using the English language. The dictionary says, the word alone means all one. See the significance of that: aloneness, solitude and loneliness. So we are asking, what is loneliness? Have you ever discovered for yourself what is loneliness? Or you have never lived with it long enough to see what it is? Or being frightened of loneliness you move away from it and try to fill that loneliness with amusement, literature, you follow, music and yoga, whatever it is. So there is loneliness, solitude, aloneness. How does this loneliness come about? You asked that question, madam, don't take notes - you won't be able to pay attention while you are taking notes - forgive me for pointing it out.

That is, most of us are unconsciously or consciously lonely - right? How does this loneliness take place? How does it happen? Aren't we in our actions in daily life, in our relationship with each other, acting for ourselves - no? - for our selfishness. We are all the time acting, living, driving, creating, moving, from a centre - our reactions are from a centre - right? So this constant activity, which is essentially either withdrawal or resistance, must inevitably create the thing called loneliness. You understand? Look: I am married - I am not! - One is married or one has a girl, or a boy, or whatever it is. Are you really related to that person? Or there is always a barrier, a distance, an interval, a space - I am using the space in the sense a withdrawal from the other - right? That is, you are concerned about yourself, your progress, your success, what you are doing, your ambitions, your vanities, your aggressiveness and so on and so on - right? And she is also concerned in a different way about that, so how can there be a relationship between the two when each person is concerned about themselves? It is very simple. That is a fact. Right? Now just a minute, listen carefully. That is a fact, that fact creates conflict - jealousy, dominance, identification with the other, that identification is part of that desire to avoid, run away from oneself, all that. You have listened to it, haven't you. Now you have listened to it. Have you listened to it, or you are translating what is being said in your own terms so that you are actually not listening, therefore you are avoiding - avoiding facing the fact that there is this separateness between you and your wife, girl, boy, and therefore there is this constant tension, constant effort, constant struggle? Right? Do you listen to that. Which means by listening to it very carefully you are beginning to find out for yourself that this loneliness is a movement in which all relationship with another has ended, with nature, complete isolation. Now do you see that intelligently and therefore the division ceases? I wonder if you do. And therefore there is no loneliness. You have understood this, actually, don't theorize about it, end it.

Then there is the question of solitude - right? Solitude, it's a lovely word, in which is implied when you are walking alone in the woods, not carrying all your troubles, your problems, your anxieties, you are just walking, looking at the trees, the clouds, listening to the birds and the running water, you are absolutely alone, in solitude you are enjoying it. And when you are alone, completely alone, you have left everything behind - you understand? - your girls, your husbands, your wife, your belief, everything 'is down the river'! In that aloneness there is actually, if you have gone very carefully into it, no division. Right? Do you listen to this, or is it romantic - you know, what a lovely thing that is! Or you have seen the enormous danger of loneliness, brought about by our own self-centred reactions? If you have seen that you can go on. Right.

So let's talk about conditioning. As the gentleman pointed out just now, we went to a certain extent and we were rather driven off our course. It was like that gentleman asked, I have listened to you for a number of years and there is nothing. I must tell you a lovely story about this. A pupil goes to a teacher and says, 'Teach me what is truth', and he says, 'All right, stay with me and we'll have a conversation about the universe, about the beauty of the land and so on and so on, and perhaps you will see truth'. So the teacher talks to him everyday and goes into various things. At the end of fifteen years, he says, 'Master, I have lived with you for fifteen years, watched you, listened to you, seen how you act, do this and do that, but I haven't got truth. So I am leaving you. There is a man a few miles further away where I am going to learn from him the truth.' So the teacher says, 'Certainly'. So he is away for five years and comes back to the original teacher and he says, 'I have found it'. And he says, 'Really, have you found it?' He says, 'Yes, there is that river', they were standing on the banks of a river, 'There is that river and I can walk across it. I have found it'. The teacher then says, 'You have taken five years to learn this and more?' 'Yes'. And the teacher says, 'There is a boat, if you pay a cent you can cross it' - right? Got it? Most of us are like that! We pay enormous efforts to do things where it is so simple.

Now let's start about conditioning. We explained very carefully what is the meaning of that word. Physically we are conditioned, you are a woman, I am a man. You are short, I am tall, or brown, white, pink or whatever it is. That is so, that is part of our conditioning. That is normal, healthy, natural. We are talking about psychological conditioning, which is the mind being conditioned - the mind being our feelings, our sensations, our emotions, imagination, and the intellectual concepts - the fears, the anxieties, the guilt, the hurts and so on and so on. Is all that part of our conditioning psychologically, which may be called consciousness? We are using ordinary words, if you want me to use different sets of words I can use them, but let's stick to the ordinary original meaning. The mind, which includes thought, feeling, imagination, romanticism, and the sensations. So it is limited, that is, limited by the culture in which it lives - the country in which it lives, the tradition, the superstition, the religion, the economic condition, the social structure - do this, don't do that, this is right, this is wrong, from the family, etc. All that is the content of our mind, the content of our consciousness. That's clear and simple. So a mind that is cultured, that is brought up in a limited sense, which is the conditioning - when you use conditioning it implies limited, conditioned, it is not extensive, it is not universal, global, it is limited, conditioned - right? Now when one's mind is so conditioned, and your mind is so conditioned, there is division. Obviously. I am an Arab and you are a Jew - both Semitic races but divided by language, by race, by prejudice, by beliefs, by dogmas, I believe in the Prophet, and you believe in something else, and I am willing to fight you, kill you and you are willing. That is part of our conditioning.

Now we are asking - please just listen, don't agree or disagree, just find out - I am asking you, or you are asking yourself, do you know you are conditioned? Or somebody is telling you, you are conditioned - you see the difference? I wonder if you see the difference. Do you see the difference? Is it your own discovery, or somebody has discovered this and tells you about it, with which you agree? See the difference? Long before the world war, the second world war, a very famous journalist came to see me, to see the speaker. And we were talking about various things that were happening in the world, he was a very, very intelligent man, very well known, and I brought up this questioning of conditioning. And he said, 'Only the Indian mind can think that'. You understand? We were talking about the conditioning of man, he never applied it to himself but, 'It is the capacity of the Indian mind that goes into such subtleties'. You follow? So I am asking you whether you are being told about it, and therefore you realize it; or you realize for yourself that you are conditioned? If you are told about it and agree, that has one effect, a superficial effect, a devious effect, a doubtful effect, a sceptical effect, you say, 'Yes, you say so, but so-and-so doesn't say so. I prefer the other.' Or if you yourself realize it, it is so, it is so. It doesn't matter, a million people can say, 'Nonsense', it is so. It's like being hungry, others can say, 'You are not hungry, old boy, you are pretending', but if I am hungry I know it. You see the difference. So let's be very clear that we see the difference. Now if you see the difference that you yourself by looking at the world, at what is happening in the world - the culture, the tradition, the superstition, the religious nonsense and so on and so on - and you realize 'I am that'. Right? Wait, let me finish, a moment, what we are talking about conditioning, you can then argue, or question if you wish.

So let us be very clear that the condition is not imposed on you, persuaded by another, logically, illogically, or rationally, or merely he wants to tell you a story. That is one thing. The other is for oneself to see the danger of being conditioned. You understand? Do you see that for yourself?

Q: Yes, I see this for myself.

K: All right. The gentleman says, yes, you don't have to tell me, I know I am conditioned.

Q: If you see something.

K: Yes, we went into that yesterday.

Q: How can you see the conditioned when you are conditioned?

K: How can you know that you are conditioned if I am conditioned? You follow the question? He says, how do you know, are aware, that you are conditioned, if you don't observe it as something separate from you then you can say, 'I know'. But if you yourself are conditioned, how can you say, 'I am conditioned'? You see the problem? No? I'll have to explain it. Everything has got to be explained.

You see the difficulty. If I see that the entity that is speaking is conditioned, how do I know that I am conditioned? It is only when I look at it as something outside of myself then I can say, 'I am conditioned'. Am I explaining your question properly, sir? This is not being subtle, it is being simple about it. How do you know that you are in pain? Somebody tells you that you are in pain, or is pain separate from you which says, 'I am in pain'? You follow what I am saying? Somebody puts a pin in your leg and you have pain, pain through nerves and so on to the brain and you say, 'There is pain'. You know pain for itself - right? - caused by a physical accident, or pain or grief and so on and so on. So you know when you have pain. So can't you know equally that this conditioning is there? Either you approach it from the outer - the results of conditioning from the outer, wars, division, conflict, you are a Muslim, I am a Hindu, Catholic, Protestant, from the outer move to the inner, and see logically this sense of separation, which is the conditioning, creates pain, conflict. So then you enquire what are the reasons of this conflict. Then you discover it is because human beings are conditioned - Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Muslim, Arab, Jew and all the rest of it. So there is an awareness that conditioning itself, like pain, is there - right? Have I made myself clear. So let's proceed from there.

Now the next question is - that is nobody is telling you, you know it, as you know pain - then why not leave it alone? Why not leave this conditioning alone? There are some good conditionings, as that gentleman said yesterday, I'll keep those good conditionings and reject those unpleasant conditionings. Please see this. I will reject the unpleasant conditionings and keep the pleasant ones. Right? That is what he said. Now who chooses? You understand my question? This I will keep, this I won't keep. Again the entity who is conditioned. So choice is conditioning. I wonder if you see that. Do you see that, sir? Any form of psychological choice is conditioning: I will keep these and reject those, which is based on choice. The choice is the result of either pleasure, gratifying, or it is painful so I will throw those away. We are talking of the total conditioning, not just the pleasant ones and the unpleasant ones.

From that the next question is: is it possible, having listened to all this very carefully, understood everything in detail that we have described, then you ask, is it possible to be unconditioned, both at the superficial level of consciousness and also at the deeper layers, deeper, the greater depth of consciousness, that is totally? You asked this question not out of idle curiosity but you see what conditioning has done in the world - right? Four hundred billion dollars every year spent on armaments, do you realize what it means? I don't think you do. That is the conditioning - each protecting himself.

Q: Why don't we throw away our conditioning?

K: Throw it away, have you? She says, just throw it away. Is it so easy? As you throw a dirty handkerchief, or a dirty piece of paper, you throw it away. Is it so easy? I wish it were. Do you mean to say a man who has been a Catholic, or a woman who has been carefully baptized, brought up in Catholicism, practising Catholicism, soaked in it, that is his conditioning, do you say, 'Just drop it, old boy'. Will he do it? Please.

Q: It seems to go beyond that perception. I can perceive the reality of it, yet it recurs.

K: I am going into that, I am going into that. It recurs because one doesn't see the complete danger of it. It never recurs if you throw yourself down a precipice, does it? Once you see the danger of a precipice it is finished. You never say, 'Well, I'll try again'! So the question is, why don't you see totally, completely the danger of conditioning, the entirety of it, not just little bits of it? Because you are still in that position, keeping some which are pleasant, and putting away the others which are not. So you are playing a game with yourself. Right? So can you see for yourself - and the seeing of it is the essence of intelligence - that conditioning is a tremendous danger to man? You have a very good example: human beings are spending four hundred billion dollars every year on armaments. And you can say, 'What can I do about it?' But you elect the politicians. If you felt the tremendous danger of conditioning you act, you don't argue. Right sir? Now the question is: do you see the danger of it, if you don't, why? Look: the danger of ambition, the politician trying to govern the people, politely but tremendously ambitious to come on top of the heap. There was a prime minister who spoke at a Union - a Union of students - saying, don't be ambitious! You understand, the joke of it? Because he is right on top, and says, don't be ambitious. But we don't see the danger of ambition, which is to have power, which is to have position - right? If you saw the immense danger of it, it is finished, you don't argue, you don't say, 'What happens after if you have no ambition?' You have no ambition because you are intelligent.

Right, sir?

So we are asking why don't you see the immense danger of being held within a small narrow space - which is our conditioning? Why don't you? Is it you must have a disastrous event, then you say, 'By Jove, I will give it up'. That means you are waiting for an external event to take place and shake you, which will give you a great deal of pain and sorrow, and you say, 'Yes, I understand it now'. Which means you are not intelligent; you are waiting for an incident to make you intelligent, but no event can make you intelligent. Got it? You understand it?

So you see, I'll go into it a little further. One realizes, if you are serious, I hope you are all serious, one realizes that one is conditioned. And one realizes the danger of it, logically. Then you say to yourself, how am I to give it up, how am I to break down the narrow walls which I have created, which culture has created, and so on and so on, how is the mind to break down this? Right? I don't know, so I come to you. I say, 'Please, how am I to break this?' Listen carefully. And you begin assuming that you are a great man, or this, or that, and he says, 'I'll tell you what to do'. That is, do this, do this, do this, and you will break it, which means again I am depending on the external person to tell me what to do. So I realize the stupidity of going to another to help me to break down the walls which I have built round myself. So what am I to do? Are you in that position? What am I to do to break down this wall, which I have built, society has built, and society is my relationship with another, so I have built it, it is my desire, my ambition, my sensations, my will that has built this enormous limited prison. Now what am I to do? I realize whatever positive act I do about it is still the action of a mind, a thought, which is limited. Whatever I do. You understand? I hope you are following this. Is it time, are you getting tired? No, it is not, I have got another ten minutes.

So I realize it is no good depending on another - the other may be a guru, the priest, or the idea that you surrender yourself to all that nonsense. So what am I to do? My conditioning is - please listen to this - my conditioning is to do something about it. I have been to the priest, I have been to the guru, I have been to the professor, the analyst, which is again doing something about it. Or I say it is too troublesome, I'll leave it alone, what the heck does it matter? Right? But if I don't my conditioning is to act, I am positive in that action, at least I feel I am doing something about it, which is part of my conditioning, my culture, my tradition, my education, and here is a man who comes along and tells me, don't do anything. Do you understand? Don't do a thing. Because I realize that positive action is totally inaction, whereas to be with it and not act: I know I am conditioned, I won't act but I will watch. You understand? Watching, alert, aware, and I see every response is from that conditioning, I observe, I don't do anything.

So when there is non-positive action you don't give energy to the conditioning, that dies by itself, when you don't give it a push, or suppress it, or run away, but when you are aware of it and don't act, because you realize non-action is intelligence. Action is unintelligence. Do you follow all this? So if you do this - if this takes place it is all over. That's why we talked about the other day the positive and action which is what is happening in the world - Russia says, 'I must build up armaments stronger than America', and every country is being supplied by them. Which is to take positive action to keep power, position - I am bigger than you - right? See all this, the stupidity of man, see it and leave it alone, then the leaving it alone is intelligence which will act, which is unconditioning. Have I made this clear sir?

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 28TH JULY 1978

K: What shall we talk about this morning? No questions?

Q: What does meditation mean in daily life? Would you explain that please.

K: What does meditation mean in daily life - is that the question, sir?

Q: What is the personality?

K: I really don't know.

Q: (In French)

K: I understand. I think, as far as I can make out, the questioner is asking: as I am walking along something happens in me, and that moves me very much, and gradually that disappears. Again it comes. He is hurt by what he sees around him. He sees there is suffering and he goes through it.

Q: No, he sees contradiction, he says when he saw someone smoking as soon as you leave the tent he feels the contradiction between what has been said and what is actually taken place outside.

K: He is hurt, shocked, suffers, when he sees what actually is going on around him outside, and this contradiction: what is said here, and what is actually going on outside. What is one to do? That's it?

Any other questions?

Q: How can consciousness be conscious of itself totally?

K: How can consciousness be aware of itself? I was going to talk about that a little bit this morning, if you want.

So there are these questions, any more? One, what place has meditation in daily life? One sees the world in such contradiction, what is going on around us, there is so much suffering and so on and it is quite the opposite of what is being said here, what is one to do?

Q: Why is man afraid of truth?

Q: Could you say a few words about the healing energies?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The first part of the question I understood, sir, but the second part I don't quite follow. He has been initiated - please don't laugh at this - he has been initiated into something which Guru Maharajji, that is the boy has initiated him. And though he has lived with it he is not liberated, he is unable to surrender. All right. That's enough.

What is meditation in daily life; why is man frightened of truth; can consciousness be aware of itself; and why is it when we are here together in the tent and when we go out we see such contradiction and that makes one anxious, suffer; and also the last question, which is being initiated by somebody and he is unable to surrender himself to what he thinks he should surrender to - that's what the gentleman says? Now which of these questions would you like to go into?

Q: Can consciousness be aware of itself?

K: Would you like over together the question, which that gentleman raised, can consciousness be aware of itself? Would you like to go into that? That is, can thought - we will begin slowly, go into it slowly - can thought be aware of itself? That is, can thinking be aware of the root of its thought, the movement of thinking, and all the process of thought, can that movement be aware of itself?

That is the question that was raised, not only by that gentleman, it was also raised by somebody over there yesterday morning. The same question: can the mind, with all its content, which is never still, which is always active, moving, can that movement be aware of itself?

Why do you want to know? Why do you want know such a problem? Is it just, I want to find out? When you put that question, why are you putting it? Because if you are serious about the matter it demands a great deal of attention to find out whether thought, the thinking, can be aware of its own movement. Either you have put it out of curiosity, just some question to ask; or you are asking that question to eliminate totally the division between the thinker and the thought. Do you understand my question?

Perhaps we will go into this when we also consider what place has meditation in daily life. And can you surrender yourself to somebody - that is what that gentleman asked.

Can we dispose of that last question. That is somebody with some - you know, all the rest of it, these gurus - they come and say, 'Surrender yourself to me. I know, you don't but give yourself over to me and I will help you. Give away your property, your money, everything, and you won't have any money problem after that' - you follow? This is the actual fact that is going on in the world. We are so terribly gullible. The same pattern has been repeated by the churches all over the world - surrender yourself to God, to Christ, to this, give over everything that you have, we will look after you. And they promise this. And at the end, where are you? No money. Many people have come to the speaker with this problem, given over everything they have - houses, property, money - you understand - left their homes, and then the man is off, the guru is off in some kind of a lovely house and you are stuck. So the first thing is with regard to that, don't accept any authority - right? There is the authority of a first class surgeon; but in so-called spiritual matters, in matters of the mind and psychology, there is no authority, so nobody can initiate you into something. That is just one of those tricks that human beings play on others.

The next question is: what place has meditation in life, in daily life? Or meditation is something separate from daily life. Or you introduce the idea of meditation into daily life. There are three problems, and more, involved in this. That is, you are introducing the idea of meditation - the idea - and trying to find out what place that idea has in daily life. First of all, is it an idea - that you must meditate, that you must do this, that you must do that - come to a conclusion and introduce that concept into daily life - right sir? You have understood that question? Or try to find out what relationship action has with the total awareness of consciousness? That is, why should one meditate at all? We lead our daily life rather unhappily, shoddily, conflict, misery, suffering, deceived by others and so on. That's our daily life. Why do you want to introduce meditation into that? Or in the understanding of conflict, sorrow, arrogance, pride, and so on, in understanding the meaning, the structure of these things, the reactions, that is part of meditation. Not you meditate and then introduce into action, into daily life, but rather during the daily life, when you go the office, when you are working in the factory, or ploughing a field, or talking to your wife, or husband, girl, or boy you are aware of your reactions, and the comprehension of those reactions, the understanding not intellectually but why you are jealous, why this state of anxiety exists in you, why you accept authority, why you depend on another, in the investigation of those things that exploration itself is meditation - not the other way round. If you meditate and then introduce what you think is meditation in daily life there is conflict. You think this is so, and you are bringing that into action, into daily life, so there must be contradiction. Whereas if one is envious, as most of us are, what is the nature of envy, why are we envious, not right or wrong, we should not be, or should be, why does this envy arise? In enquiring into that, and freeing through enquiry greed, envy, that is the movement of meditation. In that there is no conflict, you are enquiring constantly - right? This demands your attention, this demands that you must be serious, not just play with words.

So meditation has a place in daily life when there is an enquiry into the whole nature and structure of your being - of your reactions, what is the state of your consciousness, why you believe, don't believe, why you are influenced by institutions and so on, and so on, all that is an actual movement of meditation. Right? If one is actually, not theoretically, actually doing it then you begin to understand the nature of consciousness. You are not imposing something on it, according to Freud, according to some psychologist, some guru, or somebody or other. You are enquiring into your whole being, that being is your consciousness.

So we have answered these questions and we have come to that point. So let's begin very simply and go into it, if you are willing. I wonder if you have ever enquired into the whole movement of thought, the whole activity of thinking, and whether thought, thinking, can see itself moving. You understand my question? Let's be clear that the question is clear. So please this is rather important if you want to go into it, if you are at all serious in this matter, and it is really very important to comprehend the question first. Which is, I can say, 'I am aware of my consciousness' - through my belief, through my fears, through my pleasures, through my sorrow. So the content of my consciousness I can be aware of by saying, 'Yes, I am afraid, I am greedy, I suffer, I am arrogant, I have pride' and so on, which is the content of consciousness of which I am aware - right? So there is in that 'I am different from my consciousness' - right? Does this interest you? I hope so.

So there is the 'me', the observer observing his consciousness. But the 'me' is greedy, the 'me' is anxious, the 'me' is frightened, the 'me' is full of anxiety, uncertainty, sorrow, which is my consciousness, so I am not different from my consciousness - right? Is that clear? I am not different from what I think. I am not different from the experiences I have had. I am not different or something totally opposite to my anxieties, fears, and all the rest of it. I am all that. I may think I am god, but the very thinking is part of me, which invents god. I hope you see all this.

So then we come to the question: if the observer is the observed, which is the consciousness, then the question arises, can that consciousness be aware of its own movements? To put it very, very simply: is there an awareness of the arising of anger, anger itself, so that there is not me different from anger? Please, you don't mind my going into it a little bit? Are you interested in all this?

Let's go into it: One is angry, at the moment of anger there is no recognition as being angry - right? Have you noticed? At the second, at the moment of intense anger there is only that state. Later on you call it anger - right? A second later. Which means that you have recognized from the past that which has happened in the past, and which is happening now, and you say, 'Yes that is anger' - right? Are you following? Please follow this. There is anger, at the moment of anger there is no recognition and the naming of that reaction. A second later the naming begins, the naming is from the past, the naming is the recognition from the past, the present reaction. So can you not name the present reaction, but just observe without naming it? The moment you name it you have recognized it and so strengthened the reaction. I wonder if you see this. It is very interesting.

That is, the word is not the thing. The word 'tent', the 'marquee' is not the actual fact, but we are carried away by the word and not by the fact. So to comprehend, to see that the word has become tremendously important, and see the fact, the word is not the thing. So when there is anger, which is a reaction, to observe it without naming it and so that reaction begins to wither away. The moment you name it you have strengthened it, the strengthening is from the past.

So if that is clear we can go the next step. Which is, is it possible for the senses, which is the reaction of the senses, for the senses to be aware of themselves, not you are aware of the senses, but the senses themselves open? I will go into it. If you will kindly not follow what I am saying but kindly observe in yourself the reactions of the senses - right?

Now our senses function separately - seeing, tasting, hearing, smelling and so on. They are all separate. You understand? Now is there a total movement of all the senses together? You have understood something of what I am saying? You understand, this is really quite fascinating to find out, because then you will see if there is an observation of a person, of the movement of the waters of a sea, of the mountains, the birds, anything, or your friend, or your intimate person, if there is an observation with all the senses then there is no centre from which you are observing. You get it? Please do it, do it, test it out, don't accept anything the speaker is saying. Test it out for yourself. When you smell something lovely, a perfume of an early morning, when the air is clean, washed out by the rain and there is beauty in the land and so on, is one particular sense awake, or you are observing the total delicacy and the beauty of the morning with all your senses? You understand? Yes?

Q: If I see that I am not different from the total content of my consciousness, and the question as to whether I can be conscious of my unconsciousness seems to be rather like, can a camera take a photograph of itself.

K: No, look, I am coming to that point. I am slowly leading up to that. If you don't mind. Because unless you understand the sensory responses, whether the sensory responses are broken up, or is there the response of all the senses together? If there is response of a particular sense, sensation, then what takes place? You understand? When there is only the reaction of a scent, through the nose, then all the other senses are more or less in abeyance - right? Right, sir. Test it, test it out. So I am asking, when you smell a flower, is there total response of all the senses, not only smelling, the whole organism responding with its senses? I wonder if I am making this clear. No, don't agree.

Q: (In Italian)

K: Yes, he hears the noise of that train going by - that's a very good question. You all heard that train going by - right? Did you respond to that noise completely? You understand sir? So that there is no resistance to the noise, there is no irritation from the noise. You are totally with the noise. Look at those mountains, which you have probably looked at every evening and every morning, not only with your eyes, optically you see it, but is there a perception of that mountain with all your senses? If there is, there is no centre from which you are looking. Test it out. You can't do it now. You can do if you look at the tent, or your friend, or anybody, look as though you are looking with all your being, with your senses. Then you will see that you are looking at something for the first time, not with jaded eyes and memory and so on. We will come to that.

So the question from there arises - not necessarily from there, but as we go along - can thought be aware of itself? I don't think you understand this. Or are we entering into something very, very complex and unnecessary? You are all very silent.

Q: Can we test it now by the hearing, by the total hearing?

K: Yes, but I am asking the next question sir, which is, you are thinking now, aren't you? When I ask you a question the whole movement of thinking arises - right? Obviously. Now I am asking whether that thinking itself sees itself thinking? No, it is not possible, right?

Q: We have always the impression that there is someone who is thinking but thinks it is another one. We have always this impression, here, or in another part of my body.

K: That's why, sir, you haven't probed into this matter very deeply. Forgive me for saying so, but I am just asking. You see I am asking something, which is, can one live a life without having a single conflict, a single effort, without any form of control? Please listen to this. Because we live with effort, we struggle - right? There is always achieving, moving, and so our life is lived in constant struggle, constant battle, constant contradiction - right? I must do this, I must not do that, I must control myself, why should I control myself, that is old fashioned, I will do what I want to do - all that is a movement of violence - right? Right, sir? Now if one is enquiring, is it possible to live without any shadow of control? Which doesn't mean doing everything you want to do, which is too childish, because you can't. The permissiveness - now they are turning the other way round. They see the danger of it so they don't allow permissiveness, control. Now I am asking is it possible to live without any control? Probably you have never asked this question of yourself. Now I am asking you. Where there is control there is conflict. Right? There is a battle going on, which expresses itself in many, many different ways, this battle - violence, suppression, neuroticism, and permissiveness, all that goes on. So I am asking myself and you, whether I can live a daily life without a shadow of control? To live that way I have to find out who is the controller? You understand? Is the controller different from the controlled? And if they are both the same there is no need for control. I wonder if you understand this.

That is, sir, I am jealous because you have got everything and I have got nothing. And from that jealousy arises anger, hatred, envy, a sense of violence to have all that you have, and if I can't get it I get bitter, angry, all the rest of it follows - right? So can I live without jealousy, which means without comparison? Test it out, sir. Can you live your daily life without comparing at all? Of course there is comparing when I chose this kind of trousers, I am not talking about that. I am talking psychologically not to have any sense of measurement, which is comparison. If you have no measurement at all, will you decay, will you become a vegetable, do nothing? You understand? Stagnate? Or because you are comparing, because you are struggling, you think you are living, but if you don't struggle it may be a totally different form of living.

Q: Let it happen.

K: No, not let it happen, sir, look at it. You meet a very intelligent man, erudite, scholarly, you know, well educated, good brain and all the rest of it, and you say, 'By Jove, I wish I were like him'. All our education is based on that: you must be as good as your brother, if not better - right? Examinations are based on that, and so on and so on. So can you, having been through all that process when you have compared, struggled, violent, all the rest of it, can you say, 'I see the absurdity of living that way, I won't compare'? I won't measure my own dullness, my own state with somebody else. By comparing myself with somebody who is very clever, I see how terribly dull I am - right? You understand? But if I don't compare with the man who is extraordinarily bright and intelligent, am I dull? Answer. Am I dull? On the contrary.

So can you live without comparison, without the example? So you find out that where there is control there must be the controller, who says, 'I must control this reaction', or 'I mustn't do that', but that has become a habit doing that, so I must control.

Which means I have set a standard, the standard is the measurement according to which I have measured and say, 'This is right', and I must live according to that. So measurement implies control. And if you don't measure yourself and call yourself dull compared with somebody else who is bright, you are dull when you compare, but when there is no comparison whatsoever you are something else. Right. So let's move from that.

Q: I think or I feel that the momentum of the thinking process is so strong that I cannot just set myself aside to it and say I won't think anymore.

K: I didn't say that.

Q: I am saying this. Implied in your teaching there is this idea of total transformation, a mutation of the mind. Now this is supposed to be a radical change of consciousness itself. Now I imagine this to take place as a sudden insight, a flash of understanding, a conscious experience of consciousness itself.

K: Sir, may I ask something: what are you trying to tell me?

Q: Well I am trying to tell you that I am actually getting very bored by this constant repetition of these ideas about - look at this beautiful sunset, and..

K: Sir, wait a minute. If you are getting bored, just walk out.

Q: Well I am not really that bored yet! I still have the hope that you might convey something.

K: If you are mildly bored - I don't know what you are talking about.

Q: You don't want to listen.

K: Could you kindly tell me what you want to say in a few words, sir?

Q: Well I am in a way waiting for you to explain the transformation, the insight, to the awareness of consciousness.

K: Yes, you are waiting for me to explain how transformation takes place. It's very simple. Transformation takes place when there is no control, when there is no measurement, when there is no sense of 'me' operating on things, psychologically. That's all! And if that is not clear we will go into it. And if you say, 'I am bored by the repetition of this over and over', I am sorry. If you are bored, walk out. If you are mildly bored tolerate it, and if you really want to understand it, give your attention to it. That's all. If you don't, it's all right.

Q: Is by chance permissiveness the outcome of control?

K: Yes, sir, permissiveness is the reaction to control, obviously. We have been trained from childhood, through certain period in history, Victorian it is called, that control, don't show your feelings, obey, follow, all that. Now in reaction to all that we say, out with all that nonsense, I am going to do what I like. And the parents also feel they shouldn't control, or some psychologists say it is terrible to control your children, they must do what they like. We have been through all that.

So we are saying, control is totally unnecessary, without having the other reaction which is permissiveness, totally unnecessary when you understand the whole business of control. That's all.

Q: Is that right thinking?

K: She wants to know, to live without control, is that right thinking? You follow, this becomes so! Look, sir, please listen to something. I may be wrong, let's find out. Thought is measurement, right? Thought is moving in a certain direction - no? So any movement involves time - right? From here to there and so on, both psychologically and physically. Time is measurement - right? Which is the whole momentum of thought is measurement.

Q: Can it also be only reaction?

K: No, pleasure just a minute. Now I will have to begin again. So do we understand each other when we say thought in its momentum, in its moving, in its drive, is time - the past, the past going through the present modifying itself and the future, that is the momentum of time. That is the momentum of thought. And that is also the momentum of measurement, psychologically as well as physically. This is simple enough. Right sir? Now I am asking: one lives that way, one is constantly caught in the past, one is the past, and that past modifies itself all the time, and moves forward. The past, modifying itself, going to the future. This whole momentum is time, measurement - right? That's all. So why is it that we live in the past all the time? Why is it that we are not leaving the past, which doesn't mean you forget the past, you understand the whole nature of the past, and find out what it means - I am not saying, experiment with it, test it - what it means to live completely now. Which means the momentum of the past is no longer operating.

That is, put it differently, if you want to go into it more. Which is, people have asked throughout the centuries whether time has a stop - right? Not chronological time, not whether the sun can remain perpetually in one place, but psychologically can time end? Don't you ask this question? Or you don't even observe this momentum? Which is, put it differently: knowledge has become tremendously important - right? Not only technologically, where you must have knowledge, but also knowledge as experience, more and more and more understanding. Right? So we worship knowledge. I have said this a hundred times, if you are bored by it please tolerate it, have patience, if you can't tolerate it just walk out. The speaker is interested in telling you this. He wants you to find out something different than constant repetition. Unless you do it, what he has said becomes repetitive. It is not repetitive to the speaker. I would get bored much more than that gentleman if I repeated this to myself at every talk, I would walk out. I wouldn't be sitting here. But as you enquire into it you see much more, deeper and deeper, wider. Depth is not measurement. I must be careful there!

If one sees the truth of this, how we live, that we are always functioning from the past, that our life is a momentum of remembrances, a momentum of recording and acting. Like a tape which is recording, our brain records, and from that recording acts, which is all the momentum of time.

So one asks, if you are interested, if I can put it in ten different ways, which I have done, for the last fifty years, is it possible for the brain to record what is absolutely necessary, which is technology, how to drive a car, this, that, the other thing, and psychologically, inwardly not to record a thing? When you are hurt, not physically but psychologically, inwardly, why should it be recorded? You understand my question? What is the necessity of carrying on this hurt for years and years and years, what for, why should you record it? If you can answer that one question and find out whether it is possible not to record the hurt then perhaps the brain will only record that which is absolutely physiologically necessary, nothing psychological, emotional, etc. Right?

Q: Can the question be investigated without seeing the total consciousness can be conscious of itself.

K: Sir, if you don't mind, we will deal with this question of the whole consciousness, whether it can be aware of itself, when we understand this whole cycle of movement of repetition. I can use the word repeat, but the word is not the feeling of repetition.

Q: Can't we record when we have been hurt to avoid the next time to be hurt again?

K: Don't we protect ourselves from other hurts - I have been hurt once, and I don't want to be hurt again so psychologically I build a wall round myself so as not to be hurt anymore - right sir? Is that what you are saying? Which means what? I isolate myself in order not to be hurt. Right? It is obvious. You have hurt me once, and you may hurt me again, therefore I withdraw, I build a wall of resistance, I isolate myself so that I won't be hurt. So from that isolation there is violence, obviously, fear. So why should I carry the first hurt? Is it possible not to be hurt at all? The word 'innocence' means a mind that is not hurt, that has never been hurt - not the symbol of a lamb and all that kind of stuff, but actually a mind that has never been damaged. When it is damaged it is hurt - right? Now is it possible to totally put it away, avoid being hurt? Which doesn't mean you become brutal or resist. Do you want to find out whether it is possible not to be hurt at all without becoming callous, indifferent, snooty and all the rest of it?

Q: Can I be free of the hurts that happened when I was a baby, that happened when I was two or three, that I am unconscious of?

K: Have we time to go into this, do you want to go into this now? Will you give me two minutes so that I can finish this. If you don't want to listen, don't listen, you are free to go.

One has been hurt in childhood by the parents, by other boys and girls, one is hurt in school, college, university, one is hurt. Right. Now that is, now one is fifty, that is past, the hurt is behind, and you are asking, can that hurt, ancient, old, in the past, can that be totally wiped away. Right, that is the question. Not through analysis - right? Need I go into that? That is, if you here for the first time let me briefly state it. The analyser thinks he is different from the analysed. The analyser is not hurt, but the analysed is hurt. So the analyser who thinks he is not hurt, who thinks he is separate, is going to examine the hurt. But the analyser is the hurt too - right? So analysis has very little meaning in freeing the mind from hurt when one sees the analyser is the analysed. I must go into it. Please.

So there is no analysis. Why am I hurt, why am I keeping the hurts? Why do you keep your hurts? It is part of you - right? Perhaps if you get rid of the hurts you might get rid of yourself. So the question then is: how is that hurt to be totally disarmed, not even a single scratch? Then I have to go into the question what is hurt, who is hurt? Right? The image that I have about myself is hurt - right? I think I am a marvellous man, you come along and tell me, 'Don't be silly', that hurts me because I have an image about myself as being marvellous, clever, intelligent, bright and all the rest of that rubbish, and you come along and say, 'For goodness sake, what an ass you are'. The image which I have created about myself is hurt - right? Whether that hurt is in the past or in the present. Obviously.

Then the question arises: is it possible not to have an image about oneself at all? Because as long as there is an image about myself somebody is going to tread on it. So I have to find out why the brain, the mind, has created this image about itself. Has it created it because in that image there is security? In that image there is safety? If there is no image, what am I? Therefore I am frightened, I cling to my image. And you are going to tread on it, politely, kindly, tolerantly, you are going to put your foot on it and I get hurt. So I have to find out whether there is a possibility of living without a single image - the image being my conclusions, my opinions, my aggressiveness, etc.etc., the 'me', the image. If I have no image you can't tread on it. If I have no image at all now the past hurt is not. You understand sir? Right?

Q: What about that child of two or three years old, can he be hurt because he has no image of himself?

K: No, I don't know the little children.

Q: Can you repeat the question.

K: The question was as a child one is hurt - right? Why? Your baby, your son, your girl, when she is about four or five, why is she hurt? All right. She loves that teddy bear, must take it to bed with her, loves it, kisses it, hugs it, holds it all day long. You come along and pull it away, some other child pulls it away, she begins to cry. She has taken away something which was mine - there begins the whole cycle.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 29TH JULY 1978

K: What shall we talk about?

Q: Could you please say something about the healing energies, the benediction?

K: Could you talk something about healing, laying on hands.

Q: No, the benediction that you speak about in your book, the healing energy.

K: Not laying on hands but the benediction that I am talking about. Anything else?

Q: Is it enough if I myself change when others around me set the conditions? For example I am a teacher and I want to teach in my way, but it is not possible in the long run. How do I necessarily not come into conflict with the school system?

K: I am a teacher. I would like to change myself fundamentally, and in the long run it has very little effect on the students. Is that it, sir?

Q: No, the school system.

K: Yes, the whole school system, the environment prevents it. Now just a minute. All right, sir.

Q: What do you think of the meditation in the centre of the aisle, hearing music and all that kind of thing?

Q: I have something which I would like to talk over with you personally but it seems rather difficult to talk to you individually.

K: May I say something so that we can finish with that. I used to see lots of people individually, I don't know how many thousands I have seen all my life, but I am afraid I am not doing that any more because I haven't got time, or after I have talked for an hour and a half all my energy is gone, and I have other things to do. So you if will forgive me I am not seeing individually anyone.

Q: You are not interested?

K: I am sorry, that is not the reason. If I was not interested I wouldn't be speaking here.

Q: Can you talk about physical pain, physical suffering?

Q: (Inaudible) (Repeated by audience: He says in your talks there are two different elements, one is observation, awareness, and the other is the question you ask which you call yourself the impossible question. He asks what is the relationship between the two points.)

K: Between what two points?

Q: Observation and the impossible question - what you call yourself impossible questions.

K: Don't ask impossible questions on a hot day! I don't understand the question, and perhaps we will go into it as we go along with other questions, if we may.

Q: What is doubt? And why are we suffering when we have to choose?

Q: May I put a question too? Can a person who has an innocent mind be at the same time and at the same level with a person who has a damaged brain?

K: How can one meet another human being if one is somewhat sane and the other is not? It seems to me that is our problem! You may all be very sane and I may not! So that is the problem.

So what shall we talk about this morning, apart from several questions about meditation, seeing lights, visions, and all that, physical help, how to meet people who are perhaps not so neurotic as oneself and so on.

Q: You also like to escape.

K: To escape from what?

Q: From you.

K: May I ask a question, perhaps it will include the other questions. And I am not imposing my question over yours. May I ask a question, may I? I am sure we must have asked ourselves, not in the words I am putting them in, but a very fundamental question, which is, how can one keep a brain that is constantly renewing itself - you understand my question? - that is constantly not deteriorating, not getting old, not getting senile, but that doesn't damage itself, that doesn't allow itself to be damaged, that has a quality of constant youthfulness - the brain, not sexually and all that kind of stuff? Is this an important question for any you, not because I am asking? I am asking if it is important to each one of us. Is it possible as one grows older and older to have a brain that is fresh, young, undamaged, free, so as to have a mind that is quick, not only quick in thought but in action? After all youth means decision and action. It may be a foolish decision and foolish action, but as one grows older there is always the deteriorating factor not only biologically, physiologically, but also in the brain. Would that interest any of you to find out whether it is possible to have a brain, though that brain is very, very old, millenia, thousands of years old, can that brain in spite of its age, in spite of all its experiences, the accumulated burdens of knowledge, can that brain be ever, if I can use the word young, you will understand what I mean - not young in the sense foolish, not in the sense dull, heavy and so on and so on. Shall we discuss that? Would that interest any of you? Please, I am not asking you to be interested. I am just asking - as you ask the questions of me, I am asking you the question.

Q: In spite of the physical age?

K: In spite of age, of course. Can we go into it? Perhaps in answering that, enquiring into that question we might be able to answer how to meet human beings who are vulgar, cruel, violent, self-centred, and somewhat neurotic - admitting that one is also perhaps neurotic. That is the question I would like to put forward to you, if you are interested in it, we can go into it.

Q: I would not be neurotic if everybody else was not neurotic.

K: How does a mind which is not so completely neurotic meet a mind, or behaviour of a human being who is somewhat more neurotic? That is a question that was asked. Please may I go into it?

What makes the brain, I am talking of the brain which holds thousands of years of memories - right? Because our brain is not young, we have inherited thousands of years of man's endeavour, man's struggle, what he has to face, dangers, pleasures, all the travail of existence for thousands and thousands of years. Our brain has evolved, and through that evolution, time and all the rest of it, it has acquired certain resistances, certain freedom, it has learnt what is danger, how to avoid danger, and how to pursue pleasure, and so on. So our brain, your brain is not just born, it is the result of millions of years. Right? That is obvious. I am not a brain specialist. I have watched myself and watched the whole business. Now can that brain unburden itself from the past, be free from all pressure, from all compulsion, various forms of addiction - right? I am asking that question. That is, what damages the brain? Let's begin that way. You find out. Let's talk it over together. Perhaps I may be more neurotic than you are, or I may be a biological freak. So we have to talk over together, show to each other, help each other to understand this question. Now what damages the brain?

Q: Psychological hurts.

K: More basic than that, what destroys the brain?

Q: Contradiction.

K: When there is contradiction, that is, feeling one thing, doing something opposite to that, thinking something and saying something entirely different from what you think, or there is this desire to do something, the drive, and there is also the opposing drive. Right? So this is what the gentleman means, if I understood him rightly, by contradiction. Now what takes place when there is contradiction? What takes place in your life - please think it out for yourself - what takes place when there is contradiction, opposition? One desire opposing another desire, what takes place?

Q: Conflict.

K: Conflict. Could we say then that conflict in any form, biological, psychological, or one part opposing another part, and so on, this constant conflict, this constant battle outwardly and inwardly is one of the factors of the brain being damaged? Right? Don't agree with me, please. It is important to find out for oneself whether this brain, which is not your brain, that is just it, please understand it, it is not your brain, it is the brain of all of us because you are the result of millions of years of so-called evolution, progress, accumulation of knowledge, pain, suffering.

Q: You say, referring to what you have said now, that we are all in the same position but I can't understand that the inhabitants are so different. So when you say is the brain of the whole of humankind, we are all in the same position when we were born. I want to ask you a question: when you were born you were conditioned and you free yourself after this? Or is it work you do after?

K: No, sir, don't go off into detail please, just wait a minute. Would you say your brain, which is the result of thousands of years, is different from my brain which is also thousands and thousands and thousands of years old? Or we both of us have passed through the gate of experience, of pain, of suffering, of agony and so on and so on? That brain may be conditioned in a culture which is different from another culture. It may be educated differently from another culture which has its own education. But the basic quality of the brain is that being thousands of years old it is more or less the same, similar, though outwardly it is different. We will go into that, leave that for the moment.

I am asking myself, and I hope you are asking yourself too, what are the basic elements that bring about damage? Let's forget your brain and my brain are the same - leave all that aside. We said, one of the causes of damage is this constant effort, conflict, struggle, which puts enormous pressure on the brain - right? Oh, don't agree to this. What do you say?

Q: I don't agree. I think the brain has evolved through struggle.

K: Yes, to a certain extent, the gentleman says, this is the common argument, it has evolved through struggle, through conflict, through constant battle outwardly and inwardly. And one questions - I don't say it has not, but one questions it. One doesn't easily accept it has evolved through struggle. I want to find out if that is the truth. So we are asking ourselves, if struggle is the element of its growth, then if that has damaged the brain through biological strain, the constant pressure, strain, anxiety, if these things have brought about a better brain - I am using the 'better' in quotes - after millions of years what have we achieved, what have we come to? If the brain has evolved, and become extraordinarily beautiful, marvellous after thousands of years of struggle, and what are we at the present time? That is the criteria - right?

Q: Sir, may I ask you a further question related to that. As you say the brain, our brain, has evolved over this long period of time, how long are the brains of other creatures? It seems it is not a question of the superiority of the one brain, the human brain over other brains of other species, but it is remarkable it seems that the human brain has different qualities from the rest. And that it has along with this pain the possibilities of pain and contradiction through its memories, its desire to repeat past experiences.

K: I am sorry, Sir, I can't hear.

Q: I am sorry. I was asking what the difference is between the human brain and the brains which have evolved along with it. The human brain has, it seems, acquired this possibility of suffering through anticipation, the desire to repeat past experiences, and I wonder how you can differentiate what seems to be the peculiarities of the human brain from the other brains.

K: Sir, if I may ask, we must take our brains as they are - as they are. Not say, are we different from the animals, or are we different from the little baby, or different from the extraordinary animal called the whale and so on. We are talking of the brain that we have now, not the brain of the animal, but as we are now. We are saying that if through struggle, through conflict, through millenia, man has produced this extraordinary brain, what is the actual fact, not theory, not supposition, the actual fact of what it is doing now, how it is operating now. Just a minute. I do not know if you have read in one of the magazines that we have had wars for the last five thousand years. That means historically, that means wars every other year. Right? And we are going on in the same pattern - right? Our way of killing has become much more efficient, much more complicated, you can destroy human beings by the million and keep the buildings intact. Is that the result of our excellent brain? You follow?

So we are saying, does strife, conflict, battle within and without, does that really make the brain young, fresh? There may be another way - you follow? We have accepted the norm, the pattern, that as a tree struggles to reach the sunlight in a forest or in a wood, so we must struggle to have more knowledge, more this and that and the other. So I am saying there may be another way which may bring about a different quality of the brain which is not hurt, which is not under pressure, if one understands the futility of effort.

Q: We don't know if such a state exists.

K: You don't know.

Q: Is it possible that the humankind can go without conflict or not? I don't know.

K: Sir, you are not listening to what I am saying. I said there may be another way. You don't know.

Q: I suppose.

K: I said there may be. That means in English, perhaps, a probability. So don't say, we don't know. We have said that struggle has not brought about intelligence in our life. It has become very clever to protect itself, but it is not intelligent when you have wars, wars, wars, practically every year all over the world. Obvious, sir. And I am suggesting perhaps - perhaps - there may be another way of living and perhaps making the brain much more alive, young, fresh, if we understand the futility of effort.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: The present social structure is based on this question of competition - right? That is, our present social structure with its economy and so on is based essentially on competition, fight to reach, struggle to get something. That is the nature and the structure of our society in which we live. That society is the outcome of us, we have built it. God hasn't built it. Every human being has built the society in which we live because he is aggressive, he wants position, he wants power, he is greedy, and so on and so on. So our society is competitive, our society is essentially immoral - we won't go into what is morality and all the rest of it, we will later on - it is essentially immoral, divided, upper and lower levels of power - right? So our whole education, the way we live, is based on that, and that has been our pattern for the last million years. And that may be one of the factors - I am suggesting, I am not saying it is - it may be one of the factors that damages the brain - this constant strain, this constant struggle, this constant wanting to find something, being driven towards something. Those who are seeking already know what they are seeking - clear? Otherwise you wouldn't seek it.

So we are saying that is one of the basic factors of damage. Can we live - again a probability, I am asking, I want to ask these questions because otherwise we will just remain where we are - is there a possibility of living without conflict? Otherwise our brains will always function in a very, very narrow, limited pattern. That is simple enough. Right?

Q: We have seen how the brain is so conditioned, and how is right action to come about with such a brain?

K: We are going into it, slowly let's go step by step into it. And if that is the factor why our brains, as we grow older become more and more worn out, more and more repetitive, it won't alter its pattern. It is afraid to break its pattern. If it is malicious, bitter, angry, it keeps to that, and so on. Then is there a way of living which is not this constant strain, battle? To find that out we must understand the nature and the structure of contradiction, comparison, and this drive, pleasant, sometimes unpleasant, aggressive and on other occasions easy, but this constant drive. That is, we say, damaging the brain. Even the specialists are agreeing to this. We happened to talk to one of the so-called brain specialists, he agrees with this - being a specialist you must also agree with him! Right? Because you are all authoritarian bound.

So that is one of the factors. Just a minute. What are the other factors? Come on sirs.

Q: It seems that my thought doesn't want to end itself.

K: He has said something which is important to understand - if I understand the question properly. We are afraid of ending - right? If one is attached with all the sequences and the things involved in attachment, with its pain, with its fear, all the rest of it, the continuity of the same pattern of attachment is one of the factors of deterioration. I wonder if you see this? Because that which is continuous is habitual, routine, mechanical, so the brain that has become mechanical is one of the factors of deterioration. Right? This is so obvious, no? If I was born in India and continue to be an Indian, thinking around the same way, my superstitions, my gods, my inventions, you follow - routine, routine, routine - it is obviously mechanical, traditional, and therefore it is damaging itself.

Now wait a minute, that is one of the factors: that is, struggle, effort, battle with oneself and a mechanical way of living, following the tradition, it may be two days old or ten thousands years old. That means that which is a continuous movement, in the same direction, is one of the factors of deterioration - no?

Q: Doesn't continuous movement imply struggle, isn't it the same because if I don't struggle I cannot move continuously?

K: I may continue this way, or I may continue that way.

Q: But continuation itself is a struggle.

K: Yes sir, agreed. That's understood. Struggle is what we are accustomed to, which has become a pattern, and never ending anything, which is also our pattern. If I am hurt I carry it all my life - right? I never end my hurt. So the mechanical way of living is one of the factors of deterioration - which doesn't mean that we must be spontaneous. How can a mind which has never been free, which has always worked horizontally or vertically continuously, how can such a mind which follows a pattern, have any form of spontaneity? It is impossible. It may think it is spontaneous.

Right - we have found two factors. So what are the other factors?

Q: Thought itself.

K: Wait. I will come to that towards the end, sir, before you pick thought itself go into another.

Q: To be self-centred.

K: Yes, maybe. And - wait I am coming to that - one of the factors may be this constant desire to identify oneself with something. I am asking you, don't accept it, or deny it, but find out. This constant exertion, drive, impetus, desire, to say, 'I am that' - identify myself with the country, with a belief, with a person, with an idea, with an ideal, or with a piece of furniture - you understand? This constant movement from what I am, to what I should be. And identifying myself with 'what should be', which is again a battle - right? Right, sir?

So what are the other factors: effort, a way of living in a routine, if that is broken you form another routine. Which means a mind, a brain that has been accustomed, it is its habit, to mechanically follow, mechanically accept, mechanically live - I did this yesterday, I must do it tomorrow, I had sexual pleasure yesterday, I must have it tomorrow and so on and on and on. Now there may be another factor, which is, the whole momentum of thought. With this perhaps you will not agree - not agree - we will not be able to communicate with each other. I want to communicate and you may be unwilling to communicate. You may say, use a different set of words. Words are not important when you want to communicate something. There must be the urge to understand each other, then I can use a word in Eskimo, or some language, and language won't matter. The desire to understand is more important than the word. So I am asking, is one of the major, perhaps the only factor, that damages the brain, is this constant movement of thought?

Q: Thought generates fear, and one of the fears is of communicating, really communicating. I am afraid of communicating to you now. I am communicating to you now but I am afraid somehow. It seems thought has generated that fear in me. I am communicating to you now with all these people here.

K: Thought generates fear. That fear is born because thought is afraid to communicate with you. Is that so? Are you afraid to communicate with me? I am not saying you are, I don't know. Unless you are a devotee, unless you say, 'I surrender to whatever you are, I surrender to that' - then you go to sleep. Now are we frightened to communicate with each other?

Q: One doesn't understand quite fully what you are saying.

K: No, sir, one doesn't understand quite fully what you are saying and therefore that might bring about not fear, I don't understand you, please tell me more, put it a different way. But in that there is no fear, unless one is afraid to expose oneself. Right? You may not want to expose yourself to me, and I don't want you to expose yourself to me. But you should expose yourself to yourself. See yourself - perhaps expose yourself is rather a (?) word - but you should see yourself as you are. And the function of a speaker is not important if you use him as a mirror to see yourself as you are.

Now let's proceed: we said one of the major factors, and perhaps the only factor, is this constant movement of thought. While you are awake, while you are asleep, while you are looking out of the window, or keeping still, this constant chatter, not probably put into words but imagination, looking at things and giving them names, this machinery is going on all the time. And we are saying that may be the real damage to the brain.

Then arises the question: how is it possible not to think at all? Wait a minute. Wait a minute. That is the whole idea of controlling thought so that it won't think about anything except what it is directed to think about. You understand this? That is, one realizes, if you realize, that thought is one of the central factors of the damage of the brain - thought damages the brain then one asks, why is this machinery going on all the time? You understand? What is the motive power of it, what is the petrol, what is the oil, what is the whatever it is that keeps this thing going, going, night and day?

Q: The function of the brain is to think.

K: Is it? Sir, don't posit anything, don't get definite, if I may politely ask you. Let's find out. So if thinking is the nature of the brain, and this thinking is continuously going on, then it is damaging itself. Like a machine, like a car running all the time, add new fresh oil, look after it properly, but keep it running, running, you will wear it out very, very quickly.

So is that one of the major factors of the damage of the brain - you follow? Either you think horizontally, linearly, or vertically. That is, we are used to reading books from left to right, and so our thinking is more or less horizontal; and if you read, as they do in China and Iran, and so on, that way, you are also following along certain lines, left to right, right to left. The same thing. The Arabs and so on. Now our question then is: what is the petrol, the oil, the energy, that keeps this thing going over and over again - right? What is the source of this energy which is now being used for thinking?

Q: It is supplied by the senses.

K: Is it? When you keep your eyes open and look, your senses are looking, but you can keep your eyes closed and keep on thinking. Is thinking only the result of the senses or is thinking based on another, which is memory and so on - one wants to find out what is the energy which is being used in this perpetual motion of thought - you understand sir?

Q: That means that thought is always in the past.

K: Sir, don't say it is. Let's find out. There is energy - right? Energy which is being used through conflict, which has become mechanical, routine, and we said this constant identification, all this energy is used around these lines. We are asking, why is this energy so completely used by thought? You understand what I am saying? No, don't be so quick. Find out. I don't know if I have made myself clear. To make an effort you need energy - to struggle, to battle, outwardly or inwardly, energy is necessary. To identify oneself with somebody else and so on and so on, it requires energy. And when the brain has become mechanical, routine, following a pattern, it is also using energy - right? And I am asking: why has thought become so important and using up most of our energy?

I have just stated madam, I am not clear myself whether I am telling what I am observing, putting into words. If somebody understands what I have said please carry on.

Q: We are trying to control our environment.

K: Any form of control is a wastage of energy.

Q: Perhaps it is only if you continue and follow on thinking it perpetuates permanent damage to the brain.

K: That is what want to get at: why has thought used so much energy that we have no energy anywhere else?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Go into it a little bit, if we understand each other, let's go into it a little bit. You understand what I am saying?

Q: We are always looking for security by comparing everything.

K: Yes, sir, I understand we are seeking security - security in a belief, security in a family, security in a house, security in an ideal, security in identification, all the rest of it. We want security but that is understood. Like a child, a baby, that needs security. So our brain demands security. We have been through that. And that security you may think exists in this constant movement of thought. You understand what I am saying? Discover something! That is, thought, seeking security and establishing what it thinks is secure, remains in that pattern, and thought then is using an enormous amount of energy, night and day. And we say that may be one of the factors of the deterioration of the brain.

Q: Is it thought itself, or is it the point where thought..

K: Is it thought itself or thought in action? That's right. Thought itself or is it thought in action. Right?

Q: Is it not a question of balance?

K: Maybe. You are not listening. We are not thinking together. That doesn't mean that you are accepting but let's think together on the same point, then perhaps we will come to something. Just a minute sir.

Q: I think we are afraid to be empty without thinking.

K: We have said that, yesterday or the day before, that we are afraid if thought isn't occupied with something, we are afraid to face our loneliness. And fear then is one of the factors of damage, obviously. So please.

Q: Can one say that thought has run wild?

K: You can say it! It has run wild. Technologically it has run wild, babies are being produced in test tubes and so on. Now let's come back. I want to find out a way of living in which the brain is not damaged.

Q: Can there be a way of living so as not to reduce all of the mechanical things, all of the technical things, that are peculiar as products of the human brain. Can we have those things which are the product of thought which relieve our various forms of discomfort, of fear of discomfort, our fear of personal discontinuance.

K: Sir, we went into all that during the last few discussions and talks, but I want to get at this. Please, let's find out. One observes clearly that constant effort does damage the brain, constant struggle, all that. And also this mechanical movement, which implies practice, you know, all that, which purely becomes mechanical, which is called meditation and so on. So we have found two factors. And also we said the major factor may be the whole movement of thought and its action. And we asked: why has thought become so important, using up such tremendous energy, night and day - the images, the ideals, sexual images and so on and so on, which are all the movement of thought all the time - anger, bitterness, aggressiveness, saying, 'You are wrong, I am right', you know, the battle that goes on - why has thought become so enormously important? Which apparently doesn't seem to end at all. You understand my question. So is there an ending - you follow, sir, to end something is to release energy, not in any direction, to release energy. I want to go on but apparently you don't.

Do we recognize, sir, the one central factor, that thought is in motion, is in movement from the moment you wake up until you sleep, and when you sleep it is there, all the time? And so it may be mechanical. So thought is mechanical, therefore that is a deteriorating factor. So do we recognize, do we see the fact that thought is mechanical?

Q: It seems there is more to it. This constant thinking feeds those forces which motivate the thinking itself, such as vanity, greed.

K: We said that. What is the motive. We said that, sir. We asked, what is the motive of this constant thinking. Motive means movement in a direction, or no direction. Motive means, actually the meaning of the word is a movement. We have been through all this.

I am asking, as long as this brain, our brain, has become mechanical, that may be the major factor of deterioration. That mechanical process is thought, and thought is mechanical. Do we see that? You may invent the most marvellous engines, but it is still the movement of thought. You may sit and close your eyes and think about god, it is still mechanical. Or you may say, 'I will practise, I will sit quietly, I will surrender myself to somebody with a beard, or non beard', that is also mechanical. So any movement of thought is mechanical. And we are saying that is the essence of deterioration. Because that makes us struggle - right? We are competitive, we want to reach, to want to obtain, we want to become a success, which is all the movement of thought, identification, and so on and so on. So thought is the very essence of deterioration of the brain.

Q: Thought is me.

Q: But is it not possible that there is within the field of thought another area where thought is not organical living?

K: Sir, that means we have to go into the question of what is thought. What is thought? If you had no memory you wouldn't be able to think. Memory is the accumulation of experience as knowledge - right? That is obvious. No? Please, this is, even the most profound scientist says this, so please accept it! - if you want to accept the specialists. But you can observe your own brain in operation.

So if that is so, then what is one to do? You understand? Any movement of thought deteriorates the brain, any movement. Right?

Q: How can we live without thinking?

K: We have been through all this sir, I will tell you. Isn't it time to stop?

Q: What is one to do?

K: Would you listen if I tell you?

Q: Yes. Very attentively, all of us.

K: I have already told you! So you haven't listened.

Q: What is one to do?

K: I have already told you. Either I am an idiot saying I have already told you when I haven't, or a liar, or you haven't listened. So would you kindly listen again.

That means listen to find out, listen with care, with affection, not saying, 'Well, I have heard this before'. If you have heard it before and I repeat it again, you say, 'I am bored.' But if you have listened, tested, acted, found out, you will never be bored. Every time you test it there is something new taking place. And if you merely say, 'Yes, I understand, you have said so and so, and you are repeating yourself, I am bored, or semi-bored', which means you have not tested it, experimented, looked, gone into it, and if you discover something you want to go into it more and more and more, there is never a moment of boredom. It is like those research people, they are never bored, they are at it from morning until night because they want to discover something new, new, new.

When we are confronted with this enormous complex problem, which is that thought in its very nature and structure is the major factor of the deterioration of the brain, from that you ask, what is one to do? Right? Please listen. Who is asking this question? Thought is asking that question. Right? So as long as you ask the question, which is thought says, 'What am I to do?', then thought says, 'I must find an action which will get rid of my routine, my mechanical processes, how am I to stop thinking? I can't, in life I must think.' Of course you must think otherwise you wouldn't be here and I wouldn't be here. So as long as thought has any form of movement, whatever it does will be the factor of deterioration of the brain. Now if you really understand that, really see the truth of it, you are finished. Then you have placed thought in its right place. Which is, thought being the outcome of knowledge, memory, experience, thought is necessary to drive a car, to take a bus to go home, go to the factory, but if the brain realizes that thought is the factor that is making it deteriorate then it says, 'All right, I have understood this, I have got it', then we can go into much deeper things. You follow? Now we are all surface.

So the positive action of thought, to which we are all accustomed to, is the factor of deterioration. The non action of thought, which is thought living in its right place, then the brain can never deteriorate.

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC DIALOGUE 30TH JULY 1978

We have had seven talks, and this will be the fifth dialogue, discussion, conversation. I think during these talks and discussions we have touched most of the points of human relationship - our existence, our way of thinking, looking. And if one may ask, one wonders how much or to what extent we have changed; if we are at all familiar with our prejudices, and if we are what do we do about them? Hold on to them, or let them go? Or if you find yourself attached to somebody, to some ideals, to some belief, if you are at all aware and familiar with your attachment, how far one has let them go, knowing all attachment leads to a great deal of sorrow, pain, and all the rest of it, which we went into?

And also if one is aggressive, as most human beings are, some more and some very little, if we have during these talks and discussions, or dialogues and conversations together, if we are free, or if we are aware and know how deeply we are aggressive, and whether we have changed at all. And if we are familiar with our prides, and vanities, and habits, how deeply are we free of them? Or we carry them on for another year, or for many years, and never are aware of our own peculiarities, and idiosyncrasies, our aggressions, our attachments, our prejudices, fears and so on, then we live merely on words. And words are ashes. And if you like to live with ashes, not as monks, but just live with words, then I am afraid one lives very superficially and with very little meaning.

So as this is the last discussion, what shall we talk over together this morning?

Q: What do you mean by bringing order into one's life?

K: Could you kindly talk about order and what you mean by it. Not what I mean by it, what do we mean by it.

Q: As we talked yesterday of the ending of thought, is the free energy the very essence of the image which is the content of thought? Is it that way?

K: Yes sir. What is the question?

Q: The question is, is the energy which gets free if thought is ended, is this energy the very essence of the content, that means the image that thought makes?

K: No, I am afraid we have misunderstood each other. We said yesterday going over the whole movement of thought, what is the origin of thought, the origin being the registration of an event, of an experience, of a pain, of a grief and so on, the registration which takes place in the brain, and from that memory thought arises. That's clear. Then that thought creates the image and all that energy is limited, conditioned, held within a very narrow space. And we said when we understand the whole structure and the nature of thought then thought itself finds its own limitation, and therefore releases that energy which has been canalized along a narrow groove. We explained that very carefully, we went into it.

Q: Yesterday you said the brain is collective, thousands of years old. Whether that statement is true or false I really don't know. But I am deeply concerned with what is going on in the world and I do not see how putting everybody into the same basket is going to bring about love and compassion.

K: No, we are not putting - the questioner says, I do not know how love and compassion can come about if we put every human being into the same basket. I am afraid we never said that, nor implied. So we'll discuss. What do you want to discuss, talk over?

Q: We don't see humanity. Is humanity the essence, the truth of man, and can we speak about humanity?

K: Can we seek about..

Q: Can we speak about the essence of man, that humanity that we don't see. We see the man but not the essence.

K: We don't see the essence of man but we only see the man. Now which of these shall we discuss? Would it be worthwhile to talk over together this question of order? Could we? Would it be worthwhile to discuss that?

First of all what do we mean by that word order? What does that convey to each one? When you hear that word order, what do we mean by it, what is your feeling, your response, your instinctual answer? Order, according to the totalitarian people, is to obey the few, and conform to a certain pattern they have established. I am putting it in most simplistic terms, but that's good enough to understand what we mean when we are examining the word order. That's what they mean. There will be no dissent, we all think alike, we all work for the State, whatever the State may mean, which is according to Lenin, Marx, and so on and so on. And so anybody who deviates is called dissident and destroyed. That's one kind of order. We are going to question it.

Then there has been Victorian order - if I can use the word Victorian in the sense of about the end of the 19th century, which meant keep everything outside orderly, but inwardly you might have chaos, mess, misery, but outwardly show that you are very orderly. In response to that, in opposition to that, we have cultivated quite recently permissiveness - do anything you like. Right? To the man, or woman, who is living in the permissive society order is abomination. And to the man or the woman who lives in the Victoria era order is control, don't express your emotions, hold back, restrain; and you have the totalitarian order. Right - these are very simple facts, these are daily facts of life. And inwardly - outwardly we say we must have order - inwardly we are very disorderly. Would you say we are, or we are not? Disorderly means contradiction, confusion, giving importance to one thing in opposition to other things, sex becomes enormously important and perhaps that is the only important thing, and the rest you put it aside, or delegate it to a secondary place. And inwardly there is constant struggle, battle - all that is disorder - right? This is obviously clear surely.

Now what makes for disorder, both outwardly and inwardly? And do we know, or aware, or familiar, or cognizant, that we live in disorder? Outwardly there is disorder when there is war, that is total disorder, that is total terrorism, organized, blessed by the priests and respectable. That is, total terrorism is obviously disorder, but it is respectable disorder, recognized by every human being as something necessary. And there is disorder when there are nationalities and all the rest of it. So outwardly there is disorder and inwardly there is disorder - right? Are we familiar with our disorder inwardly? We know, we are familiar when we read the newspapers and magazines and so on, that there is this monstrous disorder. Now it is much more arduous, or one has not given attention to be acquainted with our disorder - right? Now I am asking myself, and you are asking, what is the root of this disorder, why do we live this way, for god's sake - if there is god, I am sorry!

Why do we live like this? Why do we tolerate it? Why do we accept it? There is disorder between man and woman, in their relationship, however intimate, however pleasant, however comforting, however satisfying and so on and so on, there is constant struggle between man and woman, in their relationship, which is disorder - right?

Q: It isn't always so.

K: There may be exceptions, granted. One or two, or half a dozen, or a few people in the world may have a marvellous relationship with each other, but appalling frightening relationship with the world. I said, may be.

So are we first of all familiar with this? We are outwardly and inwardly. Are we inwardly familiar, know, aware, cognizant, see or observe that we live in disorder - exceptions, there may be that lady and a few others. If we are not aware that we live in disorder, who is going to tell you that you are living in disorder? Nobody cares, on the contrary they want you to live in disorder - right? It is profitable for the society, for the business, and all the rest of it, that you live in disorder because the moment you have order in yourself you become a danger.

So please, if you want to discuss this, have a conversation with each other, and go into this matter of order, please find out for yourself whether you are familiar, know, are aware, cognizant with your way of life inwardly, find out whether it is orderly or disorderly. Orderly may mean conforming to a pattern - right? Conforming to a tradition. That is generally called orderly. Conforming to what the religious people have said - the monks, the gurus, the teachers, the so-called sacred books, if you follow those, and conform to those, you say, 'I am living orderly'. Does conformity bring about order? Or it is the very root of disorder? One conforms when one puts on trousers or shirt in this country, when one goes to India one puts on different clothes. That's not conformity. We are talking of conformity psychologically, inwardly. Do we conform? Does one know, realize that you are conforming?

Q: Do we see that the cause of disorder is the same as the cause of deterioration?

K: Forget what we talked about deterioration. Don't bring it in because you are going back to the same old pattern.

First of all do you know, you are aware for yourself, that you are conforming - to the idea of marriage and not marriage, both the same, you may live with a girl or a boy and say, 'We are not conforming', but those who are married are they also conforming because they sign a paper or something or other? You follow? You have to be cognizant, aware, whether you are conforming.

Q: Any idea, any thought of conformation, because if the thought is repeating, then it conforms.

K: Don't bring in a little more complex - we will go deeper into it. Begin with this: am I or you conforming to a pattern, whether established by a society, or whether I have established it for myself, it is still conforming - you understand? I may reject the outward authority altogether, but inwardly I have the authority of my experience, of my knowledge, and to that I conform. And that is also conformity. So are you aware of this fact for oneself? If you are not then who is going to awaken you? Who is going to put pressure on you so that you say, 'Yes, I am in disorder, I have found out.' Because through pressure you won't find out, it is the pressure from outside that makes you conform, or not conform. So if one may ask again, if you are asking yourself, are you psychologically in any way conforming? Sirs, this is one of the most subtle and important points if you go into it very deeply. You have to conform to certain laws, you have to drive on the right side in Europe, and in England the left side. If you say, 'Well I am not going to conform' and drive on the right side, the policeman would be after you, the cop will come and tell you, 'Please drive on the left side.'

So I am asking - please ask yourself whether you are conforming to tradition, to your aggressive, violent responses, are you conforming to all that? You see what a tremendous problem this is. And if you are imitating, not outwardly, I not talking of the outward imitation, long hair, short hair, beards and no beards, and all the rest of it, but inwardly, psychologically imitating. Will you take time, one afternoon, or one evening, or some time during the day, to look at yourself? Right? This is what you are doing now: you are, if I may most respectfully point out, you are looking at yourself and discovering for yourself whether you are conforming, imitating, and if you are conforming to a certain pattern, another conforms to another pattern, so there is conflict between the two and so disorder. Right?

Then if you are aware, know, realize, see that you are in disorder, will you remain with it - you understand - not try to change it, not try to say 'I must go beyond it, I must suppress it, I must understand it, I must rationalize it', but just holding it in your arms, as it were, without any movement? The baby is asleep in your arms, the moment you move it wakes up and cries - you understand sir? I wonder if I am making myself clear, am I?

So that is the point: will one comprehend and bring about order in one's life by rules, by discipline, by control, by suppression; or will you observe in yourself disorder and not run away from it, not translate it into your own idiosyncrasies, temperament, but merely look it, observe it, watch it?

We said, if you have followed, if I may go on with it, we said yesterday, or in one of these discussions or talks, that the word 'art' means to put things in their proper place - right? In their proper place, not giving one or the other importance. If you give importance to technology then other ways of existence are not on the same level, therefore there is disharmony. If you give sex, as most people do, except perhaps there are exceptions, the most important, the highest, all consuming importance, the only thing that matters in life, then again you exaggerate and bring about disharmony. If you put money as all important, again contradiction takes place - or if you say power, domination is all important, again contradiction. Therefore to live harmoniously means to put everything in its proper place - will you do it? Will you do this - not give your body the tremendous importance the west gives, the western world, how they look, how they dress, you follow? This tremendous concern, which doesn't mean you mustn't dress properly, decently and all the rest of it. Will you do all this? If you don't why do you talk about order? There is no point at all. But if one wants to live in order and therefore live in harmony with a sense of great beauty, perhaps also peace, then you must have order.

Order isn't to go from window to window - window-shopping! You understand the phrase 'window-shopping'? Never buy anything but go from shop to shop, and you think that is an extraordinarily wide mind, go from one book to another, one teacher to another, one guru to another, one priest to another, one philosopher - you follow? Never, never, never staying in one place and finding out. Why do people do that? Have you ever wondered? They go to India, they are fed up with their priest here, so perhaps there is something there and that is romantic, all that nonsense. And this is called gathering knowledge, or this is called an open mind. It isn't really an open mind, it is a big sieve, with large holes, with nothing but holes in it. We are doing this all the time in different ways. So we asking, are you serious enough, committed enough, dedicated enough, to live a life of total order?

Q: It seems easier to live in disorder.

K: It is much easier to live in disorder - is it?

Q: They have not realized at all what is disorder if they like to live in disorder.

K: Please, just for an hour this morning, let's find out for ourselves if we like to live in disorder - apparently most people do - disorder in their room, and so on - if they like it that's one matter, there is nothing to be said about it. But if you say that living in disorder brings about havoc in one's life, misery, confusion, violence and all the rest of it, then obviously one must become aware, cognizant, know, familiar, with one's disorder. Do it at least for an hour, or half an hour that we have left, or three quarters of an hour, while you are sitting here quietly talking over, find out.

Not as a group therapy, which is too silly, but you know, sitting quietly to find out, to become familiar with oneself.

If you find that you live in disorder, discover it for yourself, then what is one to do - right? You understand? Right sir? To find out what to do, or what not to do, one has to go into the question: what is the very root of disorder? What is the very root that produces all this confusion, conflict, misery - you follow? Total disorder in the way we live, what is the root of it? Don't say, 'It's me', or the ego - those are words - or thought. But find out for oneself.

Q: We accept the terror of the majority...

K: Sir, throw out all that, throw out Krishnamurti and all that nonsense and find out for yourself. I am really not interested in myself, I am too old for all that kind of childish stuff.

Q: That we do not care for others, that is the source of disorder.

K: We are talking about disorder, madam. That is what I am asking. What is the reason, the source, the essence of disorder? Just a minute, don't quote anybody, including myself. Because if you do you are just answering, saying something which others have said. So throw out what others have said, including this person. Don't belong to Krishnamurti. That would be fatal. Don't form Krishnamurti groups for god's sake. Just a minute, sir, for god's sake give time to this.

What is the root of disorder? Anything that is limited, anything that functions within a very narrow space must create disorder. If I love you as one human being and hate others it must create disorder - right? If I am attached to you and I don't care for the world at all as long as you and I are perfectly happy in our little home. So we are discovering something, that is, anything that acts, lives in a very small space, in a very small shell, or the shell being enormous, it is still limited. Anything that moves, functions and acts within a narrow space must create disorder. If I belong to that guru, and not to any other gurus, then I am acting very limitedly - right? Obviously. But if I have no gurus at all, I don't follow anybody at all, then I may act widely.

So I am asking you, is disorder brought about by a limited way of life? My husband and nobody else. I say I must be kind, I must be generous, I must be compassionate, I must love others - but they are just words because my whole centre is round one person, or one thing. That may bring about disorder. So I have found that any action, any action which is limited must create disorder. That is, if I act as a nationalist it is disorder. If I act as a Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, all the rest of it, it is disorder.

Now have you looked at yourself, become familiar with yourself, and say, 'No, sorry, that is so, I will drop it, finished'? If you are interested in finding out what is order then everything that creates disorder is dropped away instantly. Like a scientist involved in research, that is the central thing he is concerned about, the rest of the things are secondary, but that is the main thing, he is giving his whole life to it. So can you find out for yourself if you are acting, living in a small circle?

Q: Do you think it is so easy to change oneself, to have an insight - there is disorder and this is the reason?

K: Is it so easy to change oneself - right? That is the central question. Is it so easy to change oneself? I say, yes. Don't believe it because you are not going to change so easily. But if you see the danger, you understand, real danger, as you see the danger of a precipice, you act. But you don't see the danger of limited action, limited way of living. Which is, I am attached to you, you are mine, and for god's sake let's live together peacefully, don't let's quarrel and let's forget the world, the world is ugly, I have to go out into the world and earn money and all the rest of it, but we two are together. This becomes too childish.

Q: Isn't there actually nothing else but order, and disorder is if I catch something out of this flow of order, so I stop it?

K: No, sir, there is no flow of order. That is just an imagination, that there is supreme order, which is god.

Q: No, no. I mean the order is everything in itself, there is order in the thing itself, if I understand, if there is an understanding of all the things around.

K: When you understand the danger of disorder in life, which is expressed in different ways - conformity, living in a narrow little groove, that groove may be very wide but it is still narrow, if you see all that, not verbally, intellectually but actually the danger of it, it is finished. There is order.

Q: I think it is not so easy to change oneself. I have the insight now, I realize the danger, then I go back to the City, I go back to my friends and I forget it.

K: The City, the business, the wife, the husband, are the most dangerous things because all that involves attachment. You understand? Wait a minute. It doesn't mean you can't be married and have a girl and all the rest of it, but please sir, see the danger of living as we are in a narrow small little circle - right? You know, sir, Saanen, this little village, they speak German, you go two miles away they speak French, and those French people won't meet each other, they keep themselves into a very small little circle. Now we are doing the same. Do you actually see the danger of that way of living? That's all. If you don't see it, how is one going to make you see it, help you to see it? Wait a minute. I don't see the danger of conformity to a tradition, to a pattern, whether external or inward, I don't see that causes disorder. You have explained to me in ten different ways, I refuse to see it. You understand? Because it is very disturbing, and I am accustomed to live in a disorderly way and your asking me to look at it, it frightens me, I am appalled by it. If you talk to those people who have lived in the totalitarian states, they say, 'Yes, we have got used to it' - right?

Q: They have not got used to it.

K: How do you know madam?

Q: One hears. Look what has happened.

K: One or two have dissented. There are exceptions. There are one or two dissidents who are sent away to camps, to mental hospitals, and all the horror that they do. But the majority of them, apparently I am telling you, I have talked to many of them, they say, 'We have got used to it'. You have got used to disorder, you have got used to wars, you have got used to quarrelling with your wife and husband. So you have got used to living in this chaos. You know, sir, this is very interesting: cosmos means order, the word, cosmos. And the universe is in order, is complete order. And we live in disorder and try to understand cosmos, the universe. I wonder if you are following what I am talking about - no. How can I understand something that is total order, without a break in it, when I myself am living in disorder? I can't, so I am not concerned with order. I am concerned with disorder and to say, 'Now, I am going to find out how to dissolve that disorder. I am going to find out, I am going to give my life' - you follow, it is important. And I see various causes that bring about disorder, that is enough. Then I say, 'All right, I am so interested, so passionately concerned with order.' So I begin with disorder and find out what are the causes, then it is simple. That is my whole concern is to live in order, as I don't know it I have to go back and find out - you follow? I spend time, energy, enquiring into it.

Don't catch my enthusiasm, or my interest, my passion, don't catch it! Because it isn't yours.

Q: I am weak, I don't have much strength. I tried one time, I found the reason of disorder which I somehow don't want to lose, so I stop there. Or I forget about it.

K: That's right. So in other words, you like to live in disorder. I am not condemning it, I am saying that is what happens.

Q: Order is inherently there, and it's our limitation.

K: Order is inherently there in human beings and it is only thought that brings disorder - you follow? This is an old statement of all the religious people: there is order, god is order, heaven is order, I am born of heaven, that little spark is in me, that will someday blossom and destroy disorder. We have played this game for a million years. You see how our minds works, which is tradition - you follow?

Q: Would you say that there is more order in your schools?

K: You see what is going on? He has gone off to the schools with which I am connected. He is not enquiring if he lives in disorder, he wants to find out if the schools are in disorder. You see the escape.

Q: It is not an escape, it is just a curiosity.

K: No, sir, it is not. I am not interested - forgive me.

Q: It is a very serious problem. If the people who are associated and working in these schools and they are dependent on your order in order to make the school function. And that's a very serious problem.

K: Oh, no. Nobody is concerned about the schools here for the moment, or the teachers. We are concerned about disorder in each of us.

Q: Perhaps your commitment is part of disorder.

K: This is what happens when you discuss with people who are off onto something else.

Q: Either you are trying to hypnotize us according to your system of getting into your kind of order. If we want to find out order we have to do it according to ourselves. I found it very difficult to accept anything you say and sometimes I doubt very seriously that you are a complete orderly human being. Sometimes you make mistakes and I find it difficult to accept that you are perfect.

K: All right, sir. May I suggest that you hire a hall and talk.

Q: You can't take a question? Isn't this a question?

Q: It doesn't interest us. You look after your own people and let the other people listen.

K: We have talked nearly an hour, almost an hour, where are we?

Q: In disorder.

K: You have a good example of disorder, this lady says. A person who goes off talking about something else and is not concerned about disorder in himself. I am not saying you are in disorder, or in order, but find out for oneself if you live in disorder, not a la Krishnamurti.

Q: I feel like the disorder is here.

K: Sir, will you give ten minutes to find out for yourself? You are here, perhaps some of you are glad I won't bombard you anymore, but for ten minutes can you find out for yourself whether you live in order or disorder, understanding what disorder is and not introducing order as a means of pursuing a conformity. I have explained all that. Can we spend ten minutes seriously together to find out if you and I live in disorder.

This disorder is prejudice. This disorder is caused by conformity, psychologically, which is to follow tradition - Catholic, the Beatles, and the opposite not to follow, is reaction, which is still conformity, and so on. And what is the root of this disorder? We said the root may be acting, thinking, in a very small enclosed area, psychologically. You may travel all over the world, but inwardly, psychologically one may live in a very, very small space; or extend that space, say, 'I must have an open mind, think, look at everything', and from that hoping to act, and all that. So can you during these ten minutes give your energy to find out if you live in disorder and the cause of it?

Please don't go off into meditation. It is there for you to look. If you find it is so, that you conform, that you are acting in a very, very small narrow circle, then can you look at it, observe it, and not try to do something about it? As we said the other day, when the good scientist, the first-class top people, when they look through a microscope at a cell, or whatever they are looking at, if they come with a hypothesis, with a prejudice, with a desire to understand it, they are projecting their ideas onto it, so they don't see the thing itself. So they have discovered that if you observe without any 'prejudice', in quotes, the thing itself begins to move, to transform itself - you understand what I am saying? So can you, in the same way, look without any reaction to what you are looking at? That is, observing disorder, the cause of it, looking at it, not you want to transcend it, go beyond it, suppress it, run away, or say, 'This is all right', nothing, just to look. Then if you so look, then the thing at which you are looking begins to transform itself. The transformation of itself is order.

Q: It is a kind of pleasure also for you, maybe.

Q: Can we be quiet now?

K: It is not pleasure for me madam.

Q: I am not so sure.

K: All right, you are not sure. All right. You have understood? Sir will you listen, please, I want to tell you something. Something - just listen, for the fun of it.

When you observe something without the past, without the prejudice, without anything, the very thing at which you are looking is living, changing, and therefore it is never still. Therefore disorder is always still - still in the sense that it is disorder all the time - you follow what I am saying. But if you watch it that disorder in itself is transforming, becoming something else. So are you watching it that way?

Q: Is recognition involved in this watching?

K: It is not recognition. I said if you recognize it, it is a memory. If you say, 'Yes, that is disorder, I am going to watch it', you have a memory of disorder, an idea of disorder, a concept, a formula and so on of disorder and with those concepts you are looking. Then you are looking at disorder extensively. But if you look without remembrance, without saying, 'That is disorder', but look like a scientist who says, 'I want to see what is happening there. I don't want to bring to it what I think should happen there.' I don't think the scientists do it, but I am saying I hope they do. Then that very thing that you are observing undergoes a tremendous transformation.

Q: Looking without memory isn't there no seeing of movement because..

K: That's it, there is no movement but only observation.

Q: Because the recognition of movement is memory already.

K: Yes. Will you do all this? Test it out, actually in daily life. That is the art of living. Which is, having put everything in its right place, then there is no disorder. But if you put everything in its right place because it is convenient, because you think you will save energy, because you think you will have order, then you are creating disorder. Right? Finished.

BOMBAY 1ST PUBLIC TALK 24TH JANUARY 1979

Sir, may I begin? It appears to me that the art of dialogue is no longer there. Dialogue means conversation between two people; two people who are concerned with their daily, life with all the problems involved in their lives, two friends talking over together not only the world problems of the world outside them, but also the problems that exist within oneself, within the skin as it were. And if one may suggest this evening that we are talking over together not only our intimate problems but to observe objectively, impersonally what is happening in the world. So we are thinking over together. This is not a mere talk by the speaker. He intends that together we explore, investigate the problems, the catastrophe that is going on in the world, the madness, the wars, the utter mismanagement of governments and all the nonsense that is going on in the name of religion and all the gurus with their absurdities and all the so-called spiritual authorities with the extravagance, with their utter lack of understanding the truth.

So we are together, you and the speaker are going to investigate together, not only this evening but in the next three talks that will be here, and if one may suggest these gatherings which are serious, not frivolous, not mere intellectual entertainment or bask in some fantastic, romantic or idealized atmosphere. So please, bear in mind that we are investigating and therefore that demands that you be very serious. It is your responsibility also, as that of the speaker, that you challenge your ways of life, your ways of thinking, the beliefs that you have, the tradition that you accept. One must challenge the whole way of our living, our daily living, not the theories, the suppositions, the superstitions, the various accepted beliefs and principles, they have absolutely no value at all; they have no meaning. The ideals that you accept are utterly destructive because we are concerned with our daily existence, that existence is relationship: relationship with each other, relationship with man and woman, relationship with your neighbour, relationship with the world and also relationship with nature.

So please bear in mind, if one may repeat that again, and I shall constantly, that we are concerned with the ways of our life, with all its turmoil, with all its fears, with its anxieties, ambitions, greed and so on. That is what we are concerned with because unless we transform our daily way of living mere meditation, trying to seek some form of enlightenment, have utterly no meaning whatsoever, because they lead to illusion.

One wonders why you are here. It will be very interesting for you to find out for yourselves why you listen to the speaker. What is it you intend to receive from him? What is it that you are demanding, questioning, challenging? Why all of you, if I may ask, have come, with what intention, with what motive, with what urge? If you can find that out for yourselves then we can establish a relationship between yourselves and the speaker. If you come, wanting some solace, some comfort, some form of escape from your daily life, some form of theoretical heaven, then I am afraid you will be very disappointed. But if you are concerned, as human beings must be concerned who are serious - the word serious means having weight, having great concern with the world, with their lives, with their reactions, but not merely, intellectually activated by some kind of speech or talk. So I think it is very important if you could find out for yourselves why you are here. Either you are here out of curiosity and that has a very limited value or you have certain ideals about the speaker, of his reputation, of all that nonsense or you want to be confirmed in your own beliefs, in your own visions, in your own concepts, or, which is more important, which is much more worthwhile, that we, you and the speaker think together, investigate together, go into the problems of fear, of pleasure, of what it is to meditate, what it is to have a religious mind, what it means to have an absolutely quiet mind.

Then, if you come with that intention, with that urge, then we can both of us meet, not only verbally with all its semantic meaning, but also non-verbally which is much more difficult, more arduous, to meet or to communicate with each other non-verbally. It requires that you and the speaker meet at the same level, at the same time with the same intensity, then non-verbal communications becomes possible, but most of us are incapable of that because we waste our energy. We have not sufficient vitality, drive and so we easily accept various forms of comfortable theories, some form of tradition, some form of leadership and follow. So if we are at all serious, and I hope we are because it is only the serious man that lives, not the man who is merely accepting some form of pattern, a way of living, but the man who is profoundly serious, deeply concerned with what is going on with the world outside and also what is going on within himself, deeply committed to find out a way of living that is totally, revolutionary, different.

We are using the word `revolution', not physical revolution because that has been tried and that has led nowhere. We are talking about psychological revolution, the revolution that is the only thing that will bring about a different world, a different human being, a human being that is concerned, that has love, that understands the nature of our minds, and hearts. So please be serious, if you don't mind, at least for an hour.

Having said that let us enquire into our lives because that is the only thing we have; not your theories, not your beliefs, not your visionary acceptance of certain concepts or conclusions, they are utterly meaningless because they do not operate in our daily everyday life. So we are together this evening, if you will, be concerned with our daily existence, with all its complexity, and we are going to investigate together why we live the way we are living: the way of sorrow, conflict, confusion, insecurity, searching for some kind of reality to which the mind can cling.

So first, let us look at our life, at your life. You know to observe you need freedom to look, that is obvious, isn't it? If I am prejudiced, if I am frightened, if I am caught within a narrow groove of my own experience, or if I have some kind of conclusion, a concept, I am incapable of observing exactly what is going on within myself or outwardly. One can observe very clearly what is going on in the world but much more difficult to observe, to perceive, or to realize actually the state of your mind, the state of your heart. Because as one observes, and the speaker has, for the last fifty and more years, seen what is happening in this country, and what is happening in other foreign geographical divisions of Europe, America and so on, if one observes it carefully not from a personal opinion then one discovers, as you must have also seen, that the world is degenerating. And it is more obvious in this country, that being stripped of all tradition, because your tradition is gone, you are only concerned, not with the search for truth, you are only concerned with money, power, possession and obviously the natural impulse of sex. You can watch yourself, if you have watched at all, how we are contradictory, we live a contradictory life: we say one thing and do another. Please observe what the speaker is saying, do not accept or reject, observe, find out.

I think everybody, at least those who have observed, who have gone into it, who are concerned realize that human beings are degenerating. They are not demanding their excellence, they are not challenging their own way of life, they have lost the energy to recreate their own existence, they have accepted the authority of the ancient books, or the authority of some guru and they have become merely followers. Don't you follow somebody? You see, you daren't acknowledge yourself to yourself. You depend on others. So when one sees what is happening in this country, as well as in other countries, one realizes that man has become what he was thousands and thousands of years ago, completely concerned with himself, he has become extraordinarily selfish, self-centred, thinking about his own problems, his own gain, his own success, his own misery, his own - all the rest of it, you know what you are all doing, I don't have to describe it, it is fairly obvious. And that is the beginning of degeneration; to degenerate, to go back to what we human beings were millions of years ago. We have not psychologically changed at all. We have better means of communication, electricity, better bathrooms, we can fly all over the world, but essentially we are what we have been with slight modifications what we were a million years ago. Right? We are selfish, we are frightened, we are self-centred, all our actions are based either on greed or fear or demand for success and so on and so on. You know all this, don't you?

First of all it requires a great deal of honesty to observe actually your way of life. And is it possible to change radically, fundamentally, deeply so that a new human being is born? That is, whether you have the energy, the vitality, the urge, the intensity, to discover for yourself, not from another, whether it is possible to change your life so that you are really a human being, unafraid, not depending psychologically, not following somebody, being unattached, free.

So one observes also wherever you go, we human beings are almost alike psychologically, whether they are Americans, Russians, Chinese, or Indians or Muslims or whatever it be. They all suffer, they all bear pain, they all have anxiety, they are all confused, they are unhappy, frightened, and every human being, you, is the representative of all humanity. You understand this? Are we communicating with each other? The speaker is saying that every human being throughout the world goes through great travail, great anxieties, great fears, great insecurities, nothing is certain any more, like you they are - please listen to this-so you are like the rest of humanity. You are not different from anybody else, psychologically, you may have little problems peripherally but deeply, inwardly you are like the rest of all human beings. This is not a theory. This is not a concept but an actuality and so if one human being fundamentally transforms himself, he affects the whole consciousness of man. One man affects the rest of the world, if he transforms himself. The Hitlers, the Stalins, all the mad people of the world have affected the human consciousness. The Buddha has affected the consciousness of mankind. So if you as a human being radically, fundamentally, bring about a change in your life, you affect the consciousness of mankind. I wonder if you realize it.

I mean by realizing, not intellectually, nor verbally, but feel the immense responsibility that you have as a human being, that you, if you can deeply transform yourself, not into something else, transform, then that transformation affects the rest of the consciousness of man. For most people this is a very difficult thing to accept even intellectually. Because they think each human being is a separate human being, an individual. Are you really individuals? Have you ever asked that question? Please ask it. Demand, find out, if you are individuals. You may have a separate name, you may be tall, dark, fair or have a bank account. Individual means a human being that is not divisible, that is, broken up, individual means a human being that is whole, complete, that is not divided, broken up in himself, fragmented. When one realizes the serious nature of this statement that you are the world and the world is you, then your responsibility becomes enormous. And so we are going to investigate together whether it is possible to bring about a change, change in our habits, change in our ways of thinking, to have a clear mind and to know what love is. So we are going to enquire into all that. First of all to enquire, to investigate, demands that you come to investigate freely. That is, free from your prejudices, from your opinions, from your conclusions, from your particular experience of what you think is god or whatever it is, otherwise you can't examine. You understand this, it's so obvious isn't it? That if you are going to investigate into your life, into the life of the society, the life of the world, you have to come to it with freedom to find out, mustn't you? Are you free from your prejudice? - that one thing, prejudice. Because to investigate implies a mind that is capable of observation, capable of action, capable of perception, seeing what is true and what is false?

Are we meeting each other? Please do tell me. Are we communicating with each other? You are all so very silent. When you observe your life, your own life, not mine, not your neighbours, not your guru's, you daren't observe the life of your gurus, because his life is pretty ugly too, he is ambition, seeking power, money, position, and all the rest of that nonsense - but when you observe, yourself what is your life? All life is based on relationship. There is no life without relationship. One may live in the Himalayas, but still the hermit is the product of the world and whatever food he eats is the product of the world. Nobody lives in isolation, they cannot possibly. So life is a movement of relationship and action. Right? Is that right sir, can we go on from there? Are we meeting each other?

So we are saying life is the movement of relationship. Now what is our relationship with each other? Have we any relationship at all with another, or is our relationship based on some concept, some imaginary memory, or certain images that we have created about each other, and we look at each other through those images? Right? Why are you all so silent? Sir, this demands your active capacity to think, not just go to sleep. We have to think together to find out, and if we do not, or if we are incapable of thinking, then we are incapable of observing what is going on. Sir, ladies, let us look what is happening in the world first? Because apparently, to enquire within yourself is most difficult for you. Probably you have never done it. You have never watched yourself as you watch yourself in a mirror to see exactly what is going on, not what you think should happen and apparently most of you have not done it.

So let us next begin by looking at the world first. That is, the world outside you is now a dangerous place to live. There are wars, governments all over the world are incapable of dealing with all the problems. If they solve one problem, the very solution of that problem creates other problems. The world is divided by nationalities, by governments, each government is preparing for war. They are spending, the world is spending four hundred, thousand million dollars a year on armaments which is totally insane and your taxes are supporting this. There are rebellions, terrorists, idealists, who want to create a Utopia and therefore they are willing to kill others. All this is spread out before you in the world and what is your relationship to that? You understand my question? How do you regard that, the terror, the utter confusion of the politicians who are obviously seeking their own position, power and all the rest of it. What is your relationship to all that? You have elected them , you have created them, and we demand that society change, become less corrupt, but society is the relationship of two human beings. If those two human beings are greedy, seeking power, position and all the rest of it, they are responsible for the society in which they live. Again it is all so very obvious.

So it becomes more and more important, more and more urgent that human beings, you, radically change. I wonder how one can convince you of this, how one can make you feel the importance of this, that we are destroying the world and ourselves. And what is a human being like you to do? What action should you take? Right sir? Enquire, challenge, ask what should you do, what can you do, as a human being living in this chaos, in this corruption, in this great dishonesty, what is your action, what is a human being to do, you, in the midst of this confusion? You understand my question? Are you interested in this question? If you are interested let us go into it. You see sirs and ladies our actions are based on our past knowledge. All our actions very carefully thought out or are based on some ideals or on some motive or on some accumulated knowledge as memory, all action is born out of that. That is obvious. So our action, as our lives, are from the past. We live in the past. The past goes through the present, meets the present, modifies itself and goes on. That is our life. The past with all our experience, with all our knowledge, with all our suffering, with all our anxieties which is our knowledge, that knowledge meets the present, modifies itself and goes on.

So our action is based on this movement: from the past, modifying itself in the present and going on. So our action is based on knowledge. Whether it is technological knowledge, go to the moon, or the knowledge where you live, the knowledge of your wife or husband, knowledge is essentially the past and all our actions spring from that past, therefore our actions are limited, they are never complete, never whole. So our actions have always got regrets, pain, sorrow, confusion and so on. Do you see this, that knowledge is the motive of our action. Technologically, to speak a language, to go to the office, to do all the work you do in a factory or office or any kind of manual or intellectual work, must have the skill of knowledge. That is essential. So the problem arises, if you are interested, if you want to go very deeply into it, what place has knowledge psychologically in our relationship with each other? You understand sir? As we said, knowledge is essentially the accumulation of experience stored up in the brain and from that brain, from that memory, all response is thinking. So our actions are based on thought and thought naturally then is limited, is fragmented, broken up, thought is never complete. So our actions are always incomplete. Is this clear?

Now, because our actions are incomplete there is anxiety, there is regret, there is pain. So one wants to find out, if you are serious, if there is an action that is not based on knowledge in our relationship. Are we meeting each other? It's up to you sirs, I am not going to ask any more if you understand. I'll go on. Our relationship with each other is based on memory. If you are married, or if you have a girl friend or whatever it is in your relationship, you have an image about her and she has an image about you. Don't you? A picture about her and a picture about him. No? Of course. An image, that is, what she has said to you in the past, what you have said to her in the past. The nagging, the quarrels, all the sex, all that is stored up as knowledge and our relationship is based on that knowledge. So we are asking, if you are serious, is relationship merely a memory? Is relationship, based on memory, love? Is love merely desire, pleasure and remembrance? Or, is love something entirely different? So we are asking a very serious fundamental question: whether there is an action which is not based on past memories. But you must have knowledge, which is the past, when you walk, when you talk, when you go to the office, technologically and so on and so on. But has knowledge any place in our relationship? Please answer, find out for yourself, because if it is then you will have no love, you may say you love your wife or your husband but if it is merely a memory then it is the love of thought and thought is not love. And in this country one watches what is happening here, the degeneracy begins when there is no love.

So is it possible to bring about a different kind of action. Right, sir? Are you, if I may ask most politely and respectfully, merely listening to what is being said or are you working it out in yourself? Are you observing your life, your daily life of relationship, and the action that is born out of this relationship, whether in the office or in business or whatever you do, are you observing this or merely hearing with the ear and just casually passing it by? Please ask yourself this question and find out. And one asks why there is this degeneration, not only in this country where it is so obvious, but also in other countries. Why? Have you asked this question why man, human beings are becoming degenerate? Why? Not the description of degeneracy, not mere economic reasons or overpopulation or bad government or this or that but what is the root cause of this appalling decay of human beings? What is the source of it? Have you asked? Please, what the speaker is going to point out, don't accept it or reject it, but listen to it. You know what it means to listen? Do you ever listen to your child, to your son? He wants to tell you a story, he wants to tell you about himself and naturally if you love your son you listen to him. You don't interrupt, you don't say it is good or bad, tell me all about it. Tell me all your story, what you think, what you feel, what you do. So in the same way listen to it. Please listen. You know, with that care, with that attention, with that love, with that affection, willing to find out. Which means you don't accept anything, you don't deny anything but just listen. That is the art of listening. As you would listen to a little boy whom you love, whether it is your son or your daughter, if you ever listen to anybody at all. So in the same way be good enough to listen.

We are asking why human beings throughout the world are going down the hill? Why? They give many, many reasons: economic, social, overpopulation, bad governments and so on, superficial reasons, but there must be a basic reason.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: We will discuss it sir. Let me first finish what I have to say if you don't mind. Then you can interrupt, question, challenge, demand anything you like, but please just listen.

The principal, the active cause of this degeneration is - don't accept it or deny it but just listen to a story which your son is telling you, or your girl is telling you - is that the intellect has become so dominant, so powerful, that the intellect with all its capacity to think clearly, to act clearly, with all its activity of thought, that has predominated the world and is predominating the world, that is the basic cause of decay because intellect is only one part of our whole being. The intellect that can argue, has theories, capable of deep enquiry, the intellect, the intellect is not the whole nature of man, the wholeness of man and because a part has become all important and therefore fragmenting the world, fragmenting your own actions and as the intellect with all its capacity to think reasonably, unreasonably, having its illusions and clarity, that has predominated, and that is the cause of our decay, because we are not acting with all our nature, with all our being. Do you understand? The intellect, that is, we are using the word 'intellect' to mean the capacity to think reasonably, logically and objectively or unreasonably, without clarity, caught in illusions - that is the intellect. And when that rules our life, and the intellect being only a part not a whole, then there are divisions between man and man, country and country, class and class, religion different from other religions. It is the function of thought to divide and that is the function of the intellect, and as that dominates the world that is the basic cause of our degeneration. Don't accept or deny it, but investigate it, look at it, find out if it is false or true, exercise your brain to find out, your brain, not the experts brain who say this cause is this and the other. Find out for yourselves.

Isn't your life dominated by thought? No? And all your actions are dominated by thought. Thought has created all the gods in the world: the rich man's god who says, 'God is good because he is affluent' and the poor man says, 'God is rather terrible'. It is all brought together by thought, the temples and the things that are in the temples, the churches and the things that are in the churches; the rituals, the dogmas, the images, the pictures, all that is the result of thought. You are a Parsi because you have been trained from childhood to accept the belief that you are that or the Hindu, the Muslim and all the rest of it. All that is the activity of thought.

So when thought predominates the world then there must be conflict because thought in its very nature is limited because thought is born out of memory. Memory is the result of experience which is knowledge. Our brain holds knowledge, experience and thought is a material process. There is nothing sacred about thought. Thought can create beauty, thought can create ugliness, thought can create the most marvellous pictures and thought can create devastating wars. Right?

So the problem arises if you are serious: is there a possibility of action, life without this constant battle, without this constant desire for something more and more and more, struggling, struggling, struggling? You know, we think we are advancing, human beings are advancing, making tremendous progress. Are we? Technologically perhaps. But are we as human beings psychologically developing, growing, flowering in goodness? Do you understand my question? Because that is culture, culture means to grow, to develop, to flower, to be excellent. Culture tied to tradition destroys the growth of human beings. So that is the cause of this degeneration that is going on in the world, from that, from the realization not the theory of it, not the verbal concept of it but the feeling, the reality, the truth that as long as one element of our being dominates, there must be decay. So one asks is it possible to act totally as a whole healthy sane human being? You understand my question sir? Is it possible to live a life without a shadow of conflict, without a shadow of fear, without the everlasting pursuit of pleasure which is desire and with all its complexity, with all its struggles and is there a possibility of ending sorrow?

Unless you answer all these questions deeply and find an answer not verbally, but actually ending sorrow, ending fear and understanding the nature of pleasure and the nature of desire, then only is there a possibility of acting as a total, whole, sane human being. This is part of meditation, not merely sitting in a corner and going off into some kind of dream. The actual meditation begins with the understanding of our daily life, to see what is false, and what is true. To see what is illusion and what is not, to see that which is false and to see the truth in the false. You understand what I am saying?

So sirs, which includes ladies naturally, what we are talking about is a very serious affair. It demands you excellent capacity to think, to exercise your brain and not merely live as we live day after day after day in a routine. We have become machines. It is part of the tradition that that has brought this about. So we are asking, is there a way of living a life which is complete, whole, sane, rational, not illogical and putting everything in order in our life and then only we can proceed much further. You know there is a great mystery, not the mystery in temples and all that kind of stuff, that's nonsense, but the mystery that is absolutely impeccable, that thought can never capture and that requires a great freedom. Because only a free mind, a healthy mind, a sane mind can be a religious mind, not all the rituals and all the circus that goes on in the name of religion. That is all a joke, meaningless. But to have a mind that is whole, complete, not broken up, divided into business, sex, money, power, you follow, how one's mind is broken up, which is obviously a destructive mind.

So we are challenging you, not just a verbal acceptance whether you can live a life and we are going to go into that to see if we can be free completely and utterly of fear. Fear of death, fear of loss, fear of attachment, fear of losing a job in a world that is becoming more and more difficult, whether man, who has carried this fear for millennia after millennia, whether he can be completely totally free of it, whether man can be free of the burden of sorrow, whether he can ever know what it means to love another. To find out all this, to go into all this, your mind must be free to enquire, to look, to challenge. So it is your responsibility, if you come to these talks, that you are thinking, actively demanding, questioning. Then perhaps we can go very, very deeply into something that is not the product of thought.

BOMBAY 2ND PUBLIC TALK 27TH JANUARY 1979

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday, no, on Wednesday. We were saying, if I remember rightly, that the root of the degeneration of mankind at the present time is this living a life on concepts, conclusions, theories, and that is an activity of the intellect, and when intellect predominates all our existence, then it must be, as we pointed out, a lopsided life that is not harmonious, complete, whole. I do not know if any of you followed all this clearly and if we may we will go on further into what we were talking about. First of all I would like, if I may, to point out that this is a serious gathering, not an amusement affair, but people who are serious, deeply concerned with what is happening outside in the world and in their own lives, the lives of conflict, confusion, misery, and before we go into further what we intend to talk about this evening, I think one must learn the art of listening, the art of hearing accurately what the speaker has to say. If you do not give complete attention to that hearing, I am afraid then whatever is said will be confusing, not effective, ineffectual.

So the art of listening implies that one gives attention. You know what you think. You know what your activities are, you know your own opinions, you know your own values, judgements, and concepts. If those interfere with what you are hearing, then you can't possibly hear what the other person has to say. So one has to learn to listen attentively. And probably it becomes very difficult for most people to give complete attention for any length, for an hour, so their minds wander off, they partially hear, they hear what they want to hear. So as we are going to talk about serious things, please, if I may ask, listen with care as you listen to somebody whom you love, if you love anybody at all. Listen with the intention to understand what the other person is saying, not only listen to the speaker, but in life, to your wife, to your husband, to your children, to listen, not only with the ear to listen, but also listen beyond the word which is much more difficult. Because to listen so intensely implies that we must both be, the speaker as well as you, on the same level with the same intensity, at the same time, otherwise you can't communicate properly and we want to talk about so many things this evening so please learn, if I may respectfully suggest, learn the art of listening. That means putting aside your own opinions, your judgements, your experiences, your wishes, your desires, your motives; just listen happily to somebody who wants to tell you something.

Because one feels that in the very act of listening, the very act of listening brings about a change because it is like a pool that is very still, quiet of an evening and you drop a stone in it and it makes waves. In the same way listen. And also, if I may point out, there is also the art of seeing. We hardly ever see actually anything completely. We have visual impressions casual or deep. But to learn the art of seeing, observing, demands again attention. When you attend to something very deeply you forget about yourselves, you forget about your worries, your problems, because in that attention there is no centre from which you are attending. I do not know if you have ever done all these things, if you have, then please this evening not only listen but observe your own thoughts, your own feelings, your own impressions, your experiences and see if they have any validity. And also there is the art of learning. Most of us learn by accumulating knowledge, facts, going to school, college, university, if you are so lucky, which is to memorize. But also there is an art of learning which is not memorizing, that comes about by listening and seeing exactly what is false and what is true. To see the truth in the false, to have an insight into that which is absolutely true.

Most of us learn and then act. You accumulate knowledge and use that knowledge skilfully in life. You act and then learn from that action and accumulate knowledge again from that action. That is, you learn first a great deal of information, then from that knowledge you act skilfully or not skilfully. And there is the other which is, you act and from that action learn, which is to accumulate knowledge. So these are both the same, that is, to acquire knowledge and then act, act and acquire knowledge; so both are the same. So we are saying something entirely different and please listen to it, you may not agree or disagree but just listen as some child who wants to tell you a great story about himself, his little experiences. With the same care, affection, listen. There is a different way of acting, not from the accumulation of knowledge but having an insight into something immediately; that is, to see, observe with all your attention that any kind of organization either spiritual or political - please listen to all this carefully - religious organizations, political organizations, social organizations are not going to solve the human problems at all. No organizations will ever solve our human problems. To have an insight into that, into the truth of that, is to act instantly, not acquire knowledge and then act. I wonder if you see this.

That is, you acquire knowledge and from that knowledge act. So there is an interval between knowledge and action and in that interval, which is time, during that interval, during that gap, all other actions come into being. So your action is never complete. Whereas if you see that no organization as an example, no organisation - political, religious organization - as an example - no organization, political, religious, the very latest organization, is not going to solve the problems of man, when you see that, have an insight into it, you act immediately, which implies that don't belong to any organization. That means that you are by your own strength, by your own vitality, by your own energy, you are solving instantly your problems. This is something probably you have not heard about. Probably you have not gone into this question of action, because life is action. Everything that you do implies action, intellectual, physical, emotional and so on. And our actions are based on an ideal, something in the future or on a principle, again something in the future, or on a concept or on some conclusion, which are all the activities of the intellect and so these actions are never whole, complete; in those actions there are regrets, they bring about confusion, uncertainty. Whereas we are saying, to have an insight, to see something instantly and act.

As we were saying the other day when we met here, intellect, that is the capacity to reason logically, sanely, is the movement of thought. Intellect is the instrument of thought and all our life is based on thought. This building is built by thought. The churches are built by thought, and the content of the churches and the temples, the Mass and so on are the result of thought. It is obvious for any persons, who sees sanely, rationally, without any personal emotions and prejudices, thoughts plays an extraordinary importance in our lives and in our relationship with each other. And thought, as we pointed out the other day, is limited because it is based on memory, on experience, on knowledge. So knowledge is always limited. So thought is limited and fragmented and the more you think about your problems the less you will be able to solve the problem, except technological problems. And we are saying, it is important to understand the nature of thought and its right place which is technological knowledge: how to drive a car, to speak English, or whatever language you speak, to go to the office, to do all the technological functions, activities demand thought but thought has no place whatsoever in the psychological field. When thought takes over the psychological field the trouble begins. This is again, as we have explained carefully, the other time and we do it now.

So we are saying, knowing oneself, what you actually are, what you think, what you feel, knowing yourself is the beginning of freedom. Please understand this because most of us have never looked at ourselves. You may have looked in the mirror when you were shaving or combing your hair, but we have never inwardly looked at ourselves and that is what we are going to do. Knowing oneself implies three things: either you know yourself from the past, from your past experience, from your past incidents, events which have accumulated knowledge, so you say, I am that. I hope you are following all this. Or you observe yourself as you are, that is, what you are actually thinking, what you are actually feeling and what you are doing in the present. In that observation there is no need for the past to interfere. Would you please do it as we are talking, not memorize it, go home and then try to remember, but as we are talking together because we are thinking together, we are sharing together, we are looking at ourselves together. So you are doing it now, not when you go home, you are then doing it from memory. I hope that is clear.

That is, you look at yourself from your past knowledge, that is simple, you all do that, or you look at yourselves as you are living, as you are thinking, as you observe your reactions now. Or you look at yourself as you might be in the future. The future is the modification of the past, passing through the present and projecting the future. Are you following all this? Because we are going to enquire into something, if you are interested because it is part of our life, which is to find out whether it is possible not to waste our energy. If you act from the past you are wasting your energy, because you are being conditioned by the past, the past tells you what to do or what to say and so there is a wastage of energy because you are not living actually in the present, which is to watch your reactions, your prejudices, your experience actually as you are living now. And you are wasting your energy when you are acting according to a principle, to an ideal which is a concept of the intellect. So to know oneself, the knowing of oneself is to be aware of the wastage of energy and the summation of energy. I am going to go into that slowly.

The self, the you, is knowledge. When you say, I, myself, your selfishness, all that is based on knowledge. If you had no knowledge, there is no self. Please see the truth of it, or the falseness of it, which means you must have the mind that is attentive, that is not prejudiced, that is not caught in its own stupid experiences, but is willing to listen. The self, the `me', my ego, my personality, is essentially knowledge. Therefore knowledge is the past. So the self is in essence the past. And when you live in the past as most people do you are wasting an enormous amount of your energy, because you need all your energy, which is the essence of religion. A religious mind is not caught in any experience, in any belief, in any concept, which are all the activities of the intellect, which is the thought and thought is memory. I hope you see all this. So we live in the past and the past meets the present, modifies itself and goes on, but it is still rooted in the past.

Now the brain is very ancient. Please, I am going to go into something, give your attention a little bit. If you want me to stop for a little while, so that you can come back from your own wanderings of thought I will stop. I want to talk over with you, the speaker wants to talk over with you something which demands your real attention and if you are tired, if your mind is wandering I will stop and take a breather and we will continue.

Our brain is very, very old, it has evolved through time. It has had a great many experiences from the ancient ape to modern times. It has accumulated enormous impressions, experiences, knowledge, reactions. It has gathered and has lived in tradition. So it is heavily conditioned, which is obvious. And the capacity of the brain is limited by its own conditioning. The conditioning is the result of time and the brain can only function effectively when it is completely secure: secure in its relationship with another - intimate and not intimate - secure in ideas, in illusions, in neuroticism, in beliefs, the brain demands that it be completely secure. It is only then it can act fully. So the brain seeks security in multiple ways. It has sought security in gods which are the product of thought. All the rituals, all the circus that goes on in the name of religion is the product of thought, and the brain has accepted that illusion and finds in that illusion security. Obviously. And the brain is constantly in action because all the time human beings are thinking, chattering, projecting or involving some political, religious, personal problems. It is everlastingly chattering and in that chattering it also finds security - of course, otherwise it wouldn't chatter. Please understand this - not how to stop chattering but see what the brain is doing - that it demands security and the constant chattering which becomes a habit, and in that habit there is security.

Belonging to a particular group, communist, socialist, this and that, a Hindu, a Muslim, living in that limited concept is security. Now is there security for the brain at all? You enquire, you challenge it, challenge yourself and find out if the brain, the brain is only part of the whole mind, the mind being sensations, the sensual responses, the emotions, the reactions, the intellect, the thought, all that is the mind, the whole mind, and the brain and its activities are part of that mind, and the mind plays an extraordinary part in our lives. So we are asking a question which probably you won't be able to answer, if you ask it really seriously perhaps you will be able to, whether the brain must always live in a conditioned area - being a Hindu, a Muslim, a Catholic or the new gurus or old gurus, whatever it is, must always live in an illusion because in that there is safety. So we are asking, is there a security for the brain which is not based on thought?

If this is too complex, too subtle, I will go on to something else, because you see you have got brains, they have been misused, the business man is only concerned with money and the romantics are only concerned with romance. He has divided life, you understand, as business, the artists, the sentimentalists, the intellectual and all that, he has broken up the activity of the brain into fragments and he is never capable of operating with the whole brain. The brain is only functioning in a very, very small area of itself, and we are saying there is a possibility of the whole brain acting, then that action is something entirely different. Now we are asking, if there is a security which is not illusory, which is not based on belief, which is not based on experience, because that becomes knowledge, then it is a fragment, then it is only part of the brain acting, whether it is possible for thought which is a fragment not to interfere in its movement. I say, I am pointing out it is possible and I will show you how it is possible, not a method, no system, no practice that all becomes mechanical, stupid.

Now take one thing: when you sleep you dream. Most people do, either very, very superficial dreams, which are the dreams of the body reactions or so-called very deep dreams. Now why do you dream at all? We dream, why? We dream because, if you investigate into yourself, which is part of self-knowing, we carry over our problems, our human problems. We carry over from day to day, our jealousies, our hurts, our anxieties, our greed, our envy, our ambitions. So the brain is kept constantly in an artificial movement of thought. Do you understand all this? Do some of you understand? Will you encourage me? I don't want your encouragement.

So one must find out whether it is possible not to dream, and I say it is possible when any problem that arises, human problem, is resolved instantly, not carry it over. You understand my question? The moment you carry over an event, a happening, an insult, a flattery, your jealousy, carrying it over keeps the brain in that movement, in the movement which is limited. Whereas if you end the problem instantly, you release the artificial activity of thought. You understand - some of you. So you dream because you are not attentive during the day, attentive to what people say when they insult you, when they praise you, attentive to your immediate sexual, or other problems, to be attentive, and in that attention there is an ending to the problem. So when you sleep, please listen, the brain has its own rhythm, its own movement, but not the movement - I call it the artificial movement of thoughts with all its problems. So when the brain is allowed to function without the interference of thought it has its own natural rhythm which rejuvenates the brain, the brain that has no pressure, where there is pressure, there is deterioration. So the brain has its own capacity of being secure in itself when it is free from all the impositions of thought.

One of the factors in self-knowing which makes the brain - distorts the brain - is fear. Now we are at home! The brain, please listen to the beauty of the activity of the brain. I am not a brain specialist. No I am not, but I have watched it. The speaker has talked to specialists and so on but they are superficial, they are all informative but they have never gone into themselves very deeply. You know, the brain is an extraordinary instrument; it is so subtle, so quick, so vital, so full of energy, if thought with its fragmentation doesn't impose itself on it. And one of the great pressures, which is most destructive for the brain, is fear. Most people are afraid - aren't you, if you are honest. If you want to be aware of yourself, if you want to resolve this enormous burden of fear which man has carried for millennia, you have to find out if it is possible to end fear: fear of god, fear of what might happen to you tomorrow, fear of losing a job, fear of somebody running away from you, fear of loneliness, fear of not becoming a great success, fear of so many, many things. Aren't you afraid of so many things - old age? Am I talking to myself? Fear, you know what fear does, don't you? It makes you cringe, it brings darkness, you can't see clearly, all your responses shrink, they withdraw, don't you know all this, when you are afraid both physically as well as psychologically?

So, there is the fear of getting hurt physically, having been hurt physically then - please listen to this - having been hurt, having been to a dentist and the fear of not having that pain again. You have to solve that psychosomatic fear. You know what psychosomatic is - it is the psyche and the body, soma and the psyche. Which is to see the pain, to have the pain and not let it carry over for the next day. You end the pain. You go to the dentist, if you are unfortunate enough to go there, you go to the dentist, he drills you, gives you a great deal of pain, and not register it, not carry it over, end it, as you leave the dentist's chair, finished, which means you are tremendously attentive. While the drill is going on and not shrink, pain is there, but watch it. You understand this? Do it and you'll find out. It is not a theory. Don't memorize. Do it. And the other is psychological pain, the inward pain of being hurt by people; when you are at school you are hurt by your teacher, at home when you are being compared with somebody who is much more intelligent than you, all that hurts you and you carry that hurt throughout life consciously or unconsciously. All that implies fear. Right?

So we are saying, fear is a great pressure on the brain, it cannot act fully. So is it possible to be completely free of fear? Fear of death, fear of being alone, fear of being lonely, fear of losing, fear of not being attached to something, fear of identifying with something, and not being able to identify with anything, various forms of fear. Do you know your own fear? I am not asking you to tell me but are you aware of your own fear. Perhaps not now but when you go home, when you are quiet, by yourself, if you ever are, then the fear comes into being. So we are asking, is it possible to end fear, not temporarily, relatively, free of fear for a few days, but completely, so that you have no psychological fear at all. That implies tremendous sanity. So many people who are frightened, that shrink, that have become hypocrites, and all the rest of it.

So what is fear? Not the objects of fear. You understand? One may be afraid of the dark, one may be afraid of politicians, one may be afraid of this or that, but the very feeling of it, the reaction of it, that sense of shrinking, what is the root of it? The root of it is time. Just examine it, don't reject it. The root of fear is time both chronologically as well as psychologically: you have had pain yesterday or a week ago, and you might get it again and you hope you don't get it and fear. That has taken time. You see that? Right? You are following this? Or you might be afraid of what might happen, which again is in the future which involves time. You are afraid of death, again you are living, but death is far away which means time. I won't go into more detail. It is fairly obvious. Time means fear, time means movement, from here to go to your home is a movement of time which covers the distance, time also implies the interval between the living and the ending. Time is this movement by the clock as well as by thought. That is clear.

So thought is time. Have you ever realized thought is never still. It is always moving, chattering, conceiving, imagining, wanting, searching, you follow? Chattering, chattering, chattering. That is a movement. So time is movement and thought is movement. So time is thought. You are following all this? So we are saying the root of fear is thought which is time. Now, please as we said at the beginning of the talk, listen to it. First listen to it. Don't argue about it, that it is, it is not, but just listen and find out for yourself whether it is true or false. Then you will ask, how am I to stop thinking. That is your natural question. If thought is the root of fear, which it is, which is time, how is thought to come to an end so that I shall not be afraid? Right? That is a natural question, isn't it? No? That is a wrong question. No. No, this is not cleverness, it is a wrong question, because you have not seen the truth that time is fear. If you see the truth of it, then thought comes to an end. Truth is that which is - I won't go into all that.

So the brain has been conditioned to act and to waste its energy in fear. And we are saying, when there is an ending to fear you are releasing a tremendous energy into the whole structure of the mind. We will go into the question of death tomorrow or on Wednesday, but first see that how we waste our energy by dividing our life, which brings conflict: the business man entirely concerned with money, money, money, and the housewife concerned entirely with the kitchen or whatever she does, and the lawyer and the priest and the artist. You know. This division is in essence a total waste of energy. To live that way brings conflict. If you divide, break up your life into departments and each department is active on its own, it must be in conflict with other departments. So where there is a conflict there is a wastage of energy. Come on, sirs, see it.

And as we said, religion, the religious mind, not all the rot that goes on in the name of religion which is absolute nonsense - a religious mind has this enormous capacity because its brain has its own rhythm and it is never under pressure. This we will go into when we talk about meditation and all that. So as we live now, our life is conflict. That is so obvious. Conflict between you, your wife, your husband, with your children, with your society, conflict, struggle, struggle. And the art of living is to find out whether it is possible to live without a single conflict. Which doesn't mean that you become dull, because we think conflict gives us sharpness, we progress and all the rest of that business, but to find out a way of living, which is the art of living, in which there is not the slightest shadow of conflict. Conflict will exist always when thought, which is the movement of fragmentation, which we went into carefully, when thought usurps the whole field of existence, then it breaks up life and therefore there must be conflict, and so the brain realizing the damage of conflict seeks security wherever it can, in illusions, in beliefs, in dogmas, in religions, in rituals, in experience, which is again a divisive process. So there is a way of living, if you go into yourself very, very deeply, there is a way of living in which there is no conflict and therefore the brain has its own rhythm and therefore it has an extraordinary capacity.

BOMBAY 3RD PUBLIC TALK 28TH JANUARY 1979

If I may, I would like to talk about many things this afternoon. As we were saying yesterday and in the previous talk, it becomes very important if one is at all serious that there should be a radical transformation of our consciousness, because the world is in such chaos, almost insane and few people apparently take notice of it. They are only concerned, it appears, with their own immediate problems, with their own particular desires, with their own little backyard and cultivating that little backyard. It appears rather rare that a group of people who are really concerned as to how to bring about a change psychologically, naturally, in the human mind. I do not know if you are concerned with it, or you are merely listening to a talk and not participating, sharing in what is being said. We are not propagandists. We are not putting out new principles, old ideas, or new ideas, new methods, new systems. But we are concerned with the transformation, mutation of the human mind because the society in which we live is corrupt and no politician, no scientist, no ecologist or economist is going to save man. This is so obvious. Nor any guru, nor your particular meditation, if you do meditate and I hope you don't, because I am sure you don't know what it means.

So if you are at all serious, and I hope you are, is it possible, ask yourself please, we are sharing this thing together, I am not talking to myself or giving a lecture, we are sharing this question, whether it is possible for our mind, for our daily life to be radically changed. One has thought that human beings would change by bringing about a physical revolution, changing the environment, dictatorship, totalitarianism, but man has remained more or less the same through millennia. His brain, his mind, his heart, the whole nature of the human being is more or less as it was a million years ago. We have made technological progress but not psychological transformation of the human mind and that is what we are concerned with.

We were saying yesterday that we waste our energy and energy is required to have a religious mind because it is only religion that brings about a new culture. Religion in the sense, not what we call religion, all the circus and the nonsense that is going on around us in the name of religion or in the name of god, but religion which is based on deep aesthetic morality, a religion that is not based on belief, on experience, on authority, whether it is the authority of the Gita, Upanishads, the Bible, the Koran or any book - and in matters of the spirit there is no authority. And if one can put aside authority - not the authority of the law and all that, but the authority of the priest, the authority of the guru, the authority of the so-called sacred books, then your mind being free we can investigate together into the nature of what is a religious life in the modern world.

And to so examine we must first look at desire, what place it has in life, what is its importance, whether desire has significance of any kind at all, and what is its right place. So we are going to talk over together - the speaker means together, that you don't listen merely to a talk and not participate, share in what is being said - so we are going to talk over together this evening, not only desire, pleasure, love, whether sorrow can end, and if we have time we shall go into the question of death, because this is part of our life, our daily monotonous life.

So we will start with desire, why religions throughout the world have said, you must control desire, you must suppress desire or transmute desire, and desire has been associated with the ultimate enlightenment and so on. So please, as we said yesterday, one must learn the art of listening, that you listen with care, putting aside your particular experience, your desire, your own thoughts, and try to find out what the speaker has to say. That is listen and in the very act of listening, share, which doesn't mean you agree or disagree but in listening you will find out for yourself whether what is being said is true or false. If it is false, don't accept it, put it completely aside, but if it is true then test it out. Test it out now as you are sitting here - because we are going to talk over things that need a great deal of attention, perception, insight, care. This has been one of the great problems of our life - desire, and why man has tried to suppress it, to control it, to give it full reign, why has desire become so extraordinarily important. So we are going to go into this question, what is desire, not the objects of desire, whether it be for a woman, for a man, for a car or for god, they are all the same. The moment you have desire, the objects - god, car, woman or a house, whatever it is they are all on the same level, because desire is driving you.

So, we are enquiring into what is desire, the nature of desire. Desire exists when there is want, when there is lack. If you lack food then there is desire, if you lack clothes, there is desire, when there is a want, there is a desire. This is so obvious. And why does man not only psychologically want, but want something which is immeasurable, which is beyond all measure.

So we are going to first ask, if we may, what is the nature of desire? What is desire and will, because most of our lives are dictated by the action of the will. So will and desire are not separate. We are going to enquire together into the nature and the movement of desire and whether will is part of desire and whether man can exist without will. All this is involved in this. What is desire? How does it arise, and why have religions, Christian, Hindu, Buddhism and so on, said that to serve god, not Buddhism, that to serve god you must give over your desire. So we are asking what is the nature and the movement of desire? Don't wait for me to answer. I am going to go into it. But you must also enquire with the speaker. Otherwise you merely hear words and you have heard a thousands years of words. Would you mind not taking notes because you cannot possibly take notes and pay attention. This is your life, not my life. So please be good enough to pay attention, if you are interested, if you are not then it is all right too.

Desire is sensation, the movement of the senses, which is to touch, taste, smell, see. The sensation - the senses in action. That is, you see, then there is contact, from contact there is sensation and in that sensation there exists also thought which creates the image for the object. Are you following all this? Just see it for yourself. First you see, perceive, then you touch, then in the very touching of it there is sensation, then the object is created by the mind with its image. I will explain this carefully. Please listen. You see a car, a nice low, speedy car - that doesn't exist in India! - and the perception, the touching of it, the sensation and the thought that creates an image, you in the car, driving it, and the enjoyment of driving it, the power and all that. That is the seeing, the touching, the sensation, then thought creating the image, you in the car, all that is the movement of desire. That is clear. Now the problem arises when thought creates the image. Are you following this? Desire for enlightenment, that is why some of you are all dressed up like this, desire for enlightenment, that is, one lives rather a shoddy life, ugly, conflicting life, and one wants something much greater, and those who have renounced the world by putting on a robe are traditionally respected because they think they are nearer to that thing called enlightenment. It is still part of desire.

So desire for enlightenment, desire for a car, desire for a woman, desire to have an important position, desire to have money are all on the same level, because they are born out of desire. One may call it noble but it is still desire. So our senses are very strong and out of those senses with their movement, with their reaction is born desire. Right? It is clear. Why has man decried desire? You understand my question? Why have you suppressed desire - if you have? It is all right to have desire for money. That is highly respected. If you have desire when you are married, for another woman, that is disagreeable. It is highly regarded and respectable, if your desire urges you towards power, position, prestige. But they are all on the same level. There is no noble desire or ignoble desire. I know this will shock most of you, but look at it, examine it.

And will is energy directed in a particular direction. Will, with which one acts, is the energy operating, driving in one direction, which is the same as desire. You are following all this. When you want to be a politician, and I hope you don't, all your energy is directed in that direction, which is the operation of your senses, thought seeing that if you achieve a certain political status you will be respected, you will be feared, you will do good to mankind and all that nonsense. So, desire and will go together and when we want happiness or enlightenment or a position, a status, that energy is being driven along a particular direction. So that is the movement of desire.

From that desire arises the acceptance of authority who will tell you what to do, because you feel you can't think so clearly as your guru or your leader or your boss, so you accept that authority because it gives you comfort, it gives you security, it gives you a sense of doing something which you think is right. This is all the nature of desire and the action of will. We are not denying or suggesting that you suppress desire. We are saying that one must understand the nature of desire. When you comprehend something then you will deal with it intelligently, but if you don't understand it, then you battle against it. You understand this naturally. When you understand something you deal with it naturally. But when you don't understand then there is conflict. So we are pointing out the nature of desire, how it comes into being and the nature of will which operates in most of our lives.

We are going to point out whether there is a way of living without the operation of will at all. I wonder if you are interested in all this, because it is very fascinating, it requires your intellectual capacity to find our logically, reasonably, sanely whether it is possible to live without the operation of will, which is energy directed in a particular direction. You understand that? First listen to that. Our life is broken up, as the business man, the artist, the lawyer, as the politician, as the householder, as the monk and so on and so on. They are broken up, and the will, which is the energy operating in a particular direction, is operating in all these departments. You are seeing this? So, is there an action which is not energy driven in a particular direction but the operation of total energy which is action itself?

I hope you are not tired. This may be something new to you, because you are accustomed to the habit of exercising will, that is your tradition, from time immemorial that is the tradition, exercise your will, control and so on. We are going to enquire if there is a different way of living without the operation of will at all, because will creates resistance. Will or desire breaks up into different categories of desire. And we are asking whether it is possible in life to live without the conflict and the resistance of desire. Please understand my question first.

We are saying that there is a different way, that when the senses are operating as a whole then there is no action of will. Go slowly. I am going to explain. The speaker comes here not having prepared his talk, so he is investigating and so are you. So we must hesitate, take time, look into it. Have you noticed that one particular sense, touch, smell, seeing or tasting, predominates over the others? Have you noticed that? One sense, one sensory response is greater than the other responses. That is so. So, in that there is division and in that there is conflict. When one sense dominates all other senses there must be inevitably resistance. When one sense uses its total energy in a particular direction the other senses are in abeyance also trying to exercise their energy. So there is always a fragmentation in our senses. And so when one sense operates with greater energy than the others, that operation is the action of will.

Right? Clear, at least to some of you.

Now we are saying there is a totally different kind of operation or function or action when all the senses are in harmony, when all the senses move together. That is, when you see the sea, the ocean, when you observe the sea, observe it with all your senses, not with your eyes only, smell it, look at it, taste it, take it completely. Then you will see there is no centre from which you are acting which is the operation of desire as will. You are getting this? This requires a great deal of testing it out. Don't accept a thing the speaker is saying. Test it out. We are saying there is a way of living in which there is no conflict whatsoever - a way of living in which will doesn't operate at all, and therefore no resistance, which doesn't mean you turn the other cheek, but it means you are living with all your senses at their highest level. Therefore no one sense is greater than the other, therefore there is no contradiction, there is no conflict. And when there is no conflict, there is no need for will. You are getting all this? I am investigating with you, now, the speaker is examining it as he is speaking. So you are doing the same, so you are testing it out.

So you find then, that there is a way of living in which there is no - please listen carefully, because what I am going to say is dangerous - a way of living in which there is no control whatsoever. Because for most of us control has become the habit, the tradition, the most respectable thing. Obviously. Your life is always controlled, and when somebody comes along and says, it is possible to live without control you immediately reject it or you say, tell me how to do it, which means you want a method, you want a system, an authority, a guru, which implies that you have not understood at all the nature of desire and will and when you give importance to one sense there must be conflict. When you understand this whole thing, then you will see for yourself that you can live without the operation of will which is essentially control and therefore conflict.

If you understand this deeply, then we can enquire into the nature of pleasure, because we enquired yesterday into the nature and movement of fear. I do not know whether you have tested out and are free of fear completely, without a shadow of it, that is real freedom, that is real moksha on earth, to be free completely, entirely from the shadow and the destructive nature of fear, then you are a free man. Now, we are going to enquire together into the nature of pleasure, because for most of us pleasure becomes extraordinarily important, either it is sexual pleasure, or the pleasure of having money, or the pleasure of being a sannyasi, or the pleasure of being a politician, having power, position, status. They are all the same. Man has said, to be a sannyasi is the noblest thing, because he has renounced the world, but he hasn't, because he is still burning with desire. He is still full of knowledge of the world, not what is happening outside him, but the knowledge of the world inside.

So we are enquiring into the nature of pleasure. What is pleasure? Think it out - because it is very important, because pleasure and fear go together. When pleasure is denied there is violence which is part of fear. So one must understand the nature of pleasure, not suppress it, control it, deny it, or run away from it, but understand it, logically, sanely, clearly. As we pointed out, when you understand something you can place it - you can put it aside or accept it - it becomes very simple. But when you do not understand it becomes a problem. Right? What is pleasure? What is the nature of pleasure? What is the nature of joy and enjoyment? Pleasure, enjoyment, joy - you are waiting for me to tell you (laughter). You see, sir, you read a lot of books, you attend talks, lectures, but you never read the book of yourself. If you know how to read the book, which is yourself, you don't have to read a thing in the world. The speaker has not read any book - book in the sense philosophy, the Gita, Upanishads and so on, they are not worth it because everything is inside you, if you know how to look, because you are the result of millions of years, and everything is there, all man's experience, all man's inspirations, desires, purposes, gods, everything is there, the illusions man has created, but you must know how to read it. But we don't want to read it, because to read it one must be free to look, but we want to live a comfortable easy life, a life of routine, so we accept authority, we accept what other people say, we read all about this, but never look at our own book which is the history of man, because you are the history of man, the story of entire manhood in which womanhood is included.

So we are asking what is the nature of pleasure? Please listen, question it. Is pleasure love? Is desire with its will, love? Is the remembrance of pleasure, whether sexual or otherwise, is that love? And where there is desire without understanding it, there is jealousy. Is jealousy love? Can love exist where there is jealousy? You understand all this? And since we have put pleasure as the most important thing in our life, we have lost that thing that we call love. Haven't you? Come on, let's be honest and look at it. Haven't you lost that thing? Do you love your wife, you may remember sexual pleasure. Is that pleasure love? Love implies no attachment because when there is attachment there is fear of loss.

So one must go into this question very carefully, which is to read yourself, read the book of your own history, of man which is you. You know, joy has nothing to do with pleasure. Have you ever noticed it? It may come unexpectedly when you are with many people, or you are by yourself somewhere, and then thought comes along and says, what a marvellous state, how happy that was. Then that thought becomes pleasure. You are following all this? Look at it for yourself, you are not learning from me, you are learning nothing from the speaker, you are learning by observing yourself in the mirror which the speaker is putting before you. And after looking in the mirror, destroy the mirror, the mirror is not important. So we are asking what is pleasure, which has dominated most of our lives, from childhood till we die. At the moment of pleasure, at the second, moment of pleasure, seeing a beautiful sunset, or a beautiful person or a lovely poem, at that moment, you don't call it pleasure, do you? It is only a second later that thought comes along and says, how marvellous that was and being so marvellous, I want more. The 'more of it' is the pursuit of pleasure. You understand it? Now if you understand it, see the truth of it, then thought doesn't interfere at the moment you see the beautiful sunset. It is finished. There is no recording of it as thought and then demanding more of it. You understand? Don't agree with it, look at it, test it out, because 'the more' is the measure, the measurement is the movement of thought, which is time. I won't go into all that for the moment.

So, to see the nature of pleasure and to observe the movement of thought as it arises, when you see a lovely mountain and as it says, I must go and look at it tomorrow, to see that the thought itself destroys the beauty of the mountain. You understand? To be aware of all this, then pleasure becomes very, very simple, it doesn't bring any problem.

So from that, that is the understanding of desire, not intellectually, in your heart, in your depth, see the nature of it, the operation of it, the movement of it, the nature of desire, the nature of will and the total movement of all your senses, then you will see that pleasure is a very small affair. There is a much greater thing than pleasure, not in measurement. When I use 'greater', it is a mere means of communication and not as measurement. That is, is desire love? Find out? Work at it. Is desire pleasure? Obviously, when there is fear, there is no love. When you fear your bosses, there is no love, obviously. When you go to your politicians, you know the game, it is not love. So, then what is love, which you have lost? You understand my question? One observes in this country more evidently, obviously, perceptibly, that human beings have lost this extraordinary love, the perfume of it, the beauty of it, the greatness of it, the enormity of it, you have lost it because you don't care, do you? You don't care for your son, and especially your daughter, do you? Specially your daughters. If you have many daughters, what happens? You know what happens? You have to find money to marry them off. So you don't want daughters, you want sons. Love implies care - care for a tree, care for your wife, the respect of your wife, or your husband. Love implies no conflict. Love has this quality of purity, because if you love you can do anything, not promiscuousness, not lust. When there is this extraordinary sense of the beauty and the greatness of this thing called love - the word is not the thing, you understand? We can describe what love is, or what love is not, but the word, the description is not that. So, don't be carried away by the word. Find out why you haven't this love in your heart. One of the reasons is, why you have lost it, is that you have given your so-called love to your guru, to your principles, to your gods which are all illusory. Watch it sir, look at it for your own self because without it you are savages.

So how can human beings come to this extraordinary flame which is called love? Ask yourself sir. And what relationship has love to sorrow? You understand my question? First understand the question. What relationship has love to sorrow? Because most human beings suffer. I do not know if you suffer, do you? Do you suffer when you see all those poor people in the world? You mean to say you don't know what suffering is? Don't you suffer when you lose somebody whom you think you love, to whom you are attached or you say, that is karma, reincarnation, and pass it by. Have you never cried? Either you have cried out of self pity or out of your immediate reaction to something that you can't get, you have lost, or you want. Haven't you ever - hasn't it been a tremendous shock to lose somebody? So we are asking probably a futile question for those who have never suffered. One cannot imagine a human being who has not suffered - not physically, the invalid, the man that has only one leg, one arm, paralysed, they are suffering, physical suffering. We are talking also of psychological, inward suffering, not only a personal disaster but the suffering of mankind, of the world. Don't you know about all that? Does the speaker cry for you or what does he do? Man has suffered, perhaps you haven't suffered. If you haven't suffered, you are the most happy, most compassionate human being in the world. But vast numbers of people suffer, consciously or unconsciously, deep down and that has been one of the great problems of humanity - whether sorrow can ever end or must human beings suffer everlastingly. Put this question even intellectually for yourself.

One part of humanity says, we suffer because of our past wrong actions, this life is to test it, but in the next life it will be better and so on and so on. Another group says, the son of god has suffered for us so he will help us and save us and so on and on. We are asking something entirely different: whether a man, you, a human being living in this world, with all the turmoil, with all the agony, with all the anxiety, uncertainty, confusion, misery, which all implies suffering, whether these human beings who are apparently so extraordinarily alive, capable in one direction technologically, whether such a human being who has got such an extraordinary brain, whether he cannot end sorrow. Do you understand my question? Because with the ending of sorrow there is compassion. If you have not known or ended sorrow you cannot have that quality of compassion and without compassion you cannot live, you are dead, you are sterile. And compassion is love.

So one must enquire very, very deeply and most profoundly seriously if sorrow can end. Because desire is part of sorrow. You understand? Pleasure is part of sorrow. Fear is part of sorrow and sorrow is also part of this terrible thing man has accepted as evolution. You understand what I am saying? You have accepted evolution, that is, a continuity, that you will evolve psychologically, you can't evolve any more biologically, you can't grow a fourth arm, or a third arm. But you have accepted the psychological growth, psychological evolution that you will evolve get better, better, and better, until you ultimately reach extraordinary nonsense, you have accepted that, that is part of sorrow. You have accepted time as a means of change, that is a part of sorrow because you are postponing, as you have accepted attachment because you are attached to your money, to your position, to your memories, to your experiences, to your ideals, you are attached to a person, to an idea, to a belief and that is part of sorrow because in that attachment there is great sorrow, whether you know it or not, because there is fear in it, you might lose. So all this is the movement of sorrow and if you haven't seen this movement, and to put an end to the movement is the transformation of your consciousness.

Is there time now to talk about death? We can do it on Wednesday and go into also on Wednesday, meditation and all that. I think we should stop now because if some of you have understood, not verbally, this movement of sorrow in our life, with all the implications involved, attachment, loneliness, failure, success, fear, pleasure and the anxiety, all that is part of sorrow, and if one doesn't end it, there is no hope for man. You understand sir, it is in our hands, not in some guru's or some fantastic leader, it is in our hands, the book is there for you to read and finish with that book. That requires a great deal of energy, attention, care, love to read your book which is the book of mankind. Then from that, when you end sorrow, then begins wisdom. Wisdom doesn't lie in books nor in your experiences nor with the gurus, they are the least wise. You know, one of the great tricks of the mind is that it has invented various paths to truth. Have you noticed that? Various paths that will ultimately lead to truth. That is one of the comforting ideas which we have accepted. Truth has no path, yours or mine. When there is a path it means that truth is a fixed thing; truth is a living thing, never the same as it was before and that is the beauty, the greatness, the absoluteness of truth. And you cannot come to it if there is no love in your heart; you can pray, you can stand on your head, you can do all the tricks man invented in order to be religious, but if you have not that compassion, haven't understood the nature of all desire and so on, you will never come upon that glory which is truth.

BOMBAY 4TH PUBLIC TALK 31ST JANUARY 1979

I believe this is the last talk here. We're going to talk about death and meditation. But before we go into that, we ought to consider time, space and what is considered 'evolution'.

I would like, if I may, to remind you, that we are thinking together. Not that you listen to a series of ideas, or words, or concepts, but we are together exploring the problem of death, time and what is the quality of the mind that is meditative. And, may I remind you that the word is not the thing. The word 'tree' is not the actual tree, the word is not the thing; nor is the description the described. One can describe the mountain, paint it, but the painting, the description is not the mountain. In exploring a very complex problem, one must have the capacity not only to use the word, the exact meaning of the word according to a dictionary, but also one must have the capacity and the quality of intensity to go beyond the word.

The other day, we were talking about the whole process of thinking. We live by thought; the things that have been created by thought - the illusions, the beautiful architecture, the lovely paintings and the enormous development of technological knowledge - all the things that are in the churches, temples, mosques are created by thought as well as the beliefs, the expectations, the aspirations, the principles, the ideals are all brought together by thought. And thought, as we have explained in the last few talks here, is limited, because it is the outcome of memory, experience and the accumulation of a great deal of knowledge. We live by thought; our actions are based on thought. And we pointed out the other day that thought, time is the root of fear. We went into that and we are not going into that again this afternoon. So the whole process of thinking has no opposite. But thought can create its own opposite.

Madam, why do you come here if you are reading a book?

Q: I am not reading a book.

Then please pay attention to what is being said. Look, sirs, ladies, this is a serious thing which we are going to discuss, talk over together. You have to give if you are interested, and if you are not interested I don't know why you are here - if you are interested, be at least serious for an hour. Because this is not an entertainment, either intellectually, imaginary or speculative. We are concerned with our life - the way we live, the way we think, the way we act. So, if one may ask, please be serious, and if you care to, give your attention to what is being said - not only to what the speaker has to say, but also to what you are thinking.

So as we were saying, thought has no opposite but it can create its own opposite; and therefore thought creating its own opposite brings about conflict. But there is only thinking, though that thinking divides itself into multiple forms, both actual, transitory, illusory and what is being perceived. And thought has put together the whole concept, conclusion, ideal. So we must consider thought as a material process. Thought has not created nature - the animals, the forests, the rivers, the mountains. But thought has made the chair out of nature. Thought has created illusion, which is also actual. So thought is reality; the thing it has created is reality - like this, this microphone. But thought cannot possibly understand, or even conceive what truth is. So bearing this in mind that thought under no circumstances whatsoever, whatever path thought has laid down, which is illusory, to truth is unreal. There are no paths to truth. Truth must come when the mind is in a state of quietness which we are going to examine presently.

First, we must investigate together - please, I mean by this together - what is time. Time is division - before and after; the past, the present and the future; time by the watch, chronological time, and time as psychological beginning and ending. You are following all this? Please, you have to understand this very, very clearly because meditation, when it is consciously done, deliberately done, is no meditation. We'll go into that. That is why it is very important that at the beginning of our talk together that we understand the nature and the whole structure of time.

Time means movement; time means division - division from here to there; not only physical time, but also psychological time. Physical time is necessary - to acquire knowledge, to work skilfully, to drive a car, to do any technological activity, time is necessary. You can't suddenly become a marvellous flyer, pilot, you have to learn quite slowly, take a year or two and so on. And man, that is thought, psychologically has created time, which is called evolution. Psychologically: there is evolution, biological evolution as the baby grows into adulthood, into a man, and dies. There is that physiological biological growth, which is obvious. You plant a little bush, a tree, and it grows into an enormous tree, it takes time. And man, which is the whole movement of thinking, has said there is psychological time; that is when we become something psychologically. If one is angry through time you will be rid of anger. We're questioning, asking if there is any psychological evolution at all.

Please think it out with me, go with me, we are working together. There is obviously biological, physiological time. To put a watch together takes time, to go from here to Delhi takes time. But psychologically, inwardly, inside the skin as it were, is there time at all? We have said there is time, that is, psychologically one is bad, but eventually one becomes good. The idea of growth. Growth implies a continuity.

Please, this may be a little difficult, go into it with me. I'll explain and go very slowly into this. We're conditioned to accept time as a means of psychological evolution - that you, will one day be a marvellous entity, you will one day reach enlightenment, one day you will have great wisdom; and to have wisdom, enlightenment, needs time, psychologically. And therefore you have systems, methods, paths, all that involves the movement of action and time, a continuity. Is this clear? Now, we are asking if that is so. Or it is a total illusion. We have accepted evolution, psychologically - the afterlife, reincarnation, a continuity of what has been, what is and what will be. A series of movements which are not broken up, but is a continuity.

I am afraid you have to use your brains. You have to think, and see the limitations of thinking. So, we are saying, or challenging, doubting: is there any continuity psychologically? Or thought has said, there is continuity because it is the outcome of memory. Memory is continuous. So psychologically we say, 'Yes, I will be better next week, if I do this and this and this'. And time implies not only the cause and the effect, and the effect becoming the cause, so this movement of cause and effect which becomes cause again, is the movement of time. If we don't understand the nature of time we will not be able to capture, or fully comprehend, not intellectually, but deeply, the nature of death. Because while we are young we don't think about death, while even middle-aged we are not greatly concerned, but as the body grows older, the mind becomes more heavy, and the eventual death comes, and there is this movement of time - being young, being adolescent, growing old, and dying, that is the whole movement of time, divided up by various experiences, activities and so on. So time is a factor in our life as a movement of avoiding, running away, or suppressing, or transcending. Are you getting all this? Sorry, you have to catch it as I talk, I can't repeat it.

As I said, man has not resolved the problem of death - what is implied in it, what is the nature of it, why man has been so frightened, for a million years, to die. To him, death means the ending. Now we are going to investigate together the whole meaning of death because in that is involved meditation also. Meditation isn't just sitting cross-legged, breathing, keeping your eyes closed and all that business, it involves a very great capacity to investigate, to explore your whole life. If your whole life is in disorder, contradictory, imitative, conforming, and you try to meditate, it has absolutely no meaning. And that's why all of you put on these strange robes, and there is no meaning whatsoever in it. But you won't take off those robes, you will continue.

So we are enquiring into the nature of death. Death is the ending of what we consider living - that is, living which is a continuity, and the ending. The continuity is broken up as time - one is young, matures and dies. So this continuity is broken up as time: success, failure - all that is involved. So, first before we ask, what is the meaning of death, we must also enquire into what is the meaning of living. If you don't understand the meaning of living, you won't be able to understand the meaning of dying. Are you following all this? So we are going to enquire first, what is the whole nature of our life, which we call living?

Living means, as we know it daily, the continuation of memory: I have been, I am, I will be. And in this movement which is called living, there is a whole complex of innumerable problems: fear with all its ugliness, anxiety, conflict with each other, greed, ambition, comparing, measuring and hoping for something better. This is our life, our daily life - going to the office from morning till night for the rest of your fifty or sixty years. Just think of the horror of it! And the difference in our relationships based on images. We never treat life as a whole. We've divided life - as the artists and so on and so on. That is our living, that's our actual daily living. And this period of time is considered a means to a further end. Right? Do you understand all this? Please don't shake your head. Go into it yourself.

We call this living. We've never questioned this living; but we've always questioned death. We've never asked, 'Why do we live this way - with all the anxiety, misery, lack of certainty, confusion, terrible disorder'. We have never asked why we do it, but we are terribly curious about death and after. Now we are going to question why we live this way first, because if you don't understand life, you won't understand death.

Our life is in disorder, and we are always trying to put order in our life, obviously. If you are at all aware, intelligent, you try to bring order. So we have to enquire, what is order. Please don't get bored with this, because all this is a movement in meditation. Your mind is now confused; and a confused mind cannot possibly meditate, it has no meaning. So, what is order? Not your order and my order, what is order? Doesn't order mean freedom? Freedom implies that everything in one's life has been put in its right place, and therefore there is freedom. Please, observe your life, look at your life - not the description I am giving, but actually look at your life, your daily life. When you look at it, obviously you will see how disorderly it is: contradictory, wanting this and not wanting that, wishing this, and not wishing that, desiring this and the opposite of desire, changing the objects of desire from time to time, this constant struggle, battle, fear - that is our daily life. Now, how will you bring order in this mess, in this chaos? Do you understand my question? Who is to bring order?

And, seeing the hopelessness of it, we turn to authority, the authority of a guru, a man or a woman, supposed to be spiritual and we conform to what they say in order to live a peaceful, orderly life. 'Tell me what to do, you know better than I do, and I will follow you'. This is the whole authoritarian world of so-called spiritual hierarchy. Because one is confused, one is uncertain, unclear, disorderly, and the guru or the authority says, do this and you will live in order. Probably, and assuredly, the guru is himself in disorder. You can watch them, you don't have to accept my word, you can see them. One year they dance, next year they have other kinds of tricks and so on. So how do you bring order?

Please listen carefully. Thought being limited and fragmented, and because it is limited and fragmented is in itself disorder. It can't possibly bring order. Thought in itself is disorder, because it is fragmented. A fragment is a thing that is broken up and thought is breaking up all the time, dividing itself - my nation, your nation, my god, your god, your belief, my belief, my guru and your guru and all that nonsense. Thought in itself is divisive, and it is thought that has brought disorder in our life. We live on thought, our whole action is based on thought. If you see that, if you see the truth of that, that thought, though technologically brings about marvellous order - perfect dynamo, the rockets that go to the moon, they must function with perfect precision, that's complete order, but thought inwardly is creating havoc. Because thought in itself is divisive, broken up, so thought cannot bring order: that is a principle, a law. So what will you do? Do you understand my question?

If there is no order in one's life, complete, total order, the mind can never be free. And you must have freedom to observe that which is most sacred - if there is something sacred, if there is something immeasurable, beyond words, the mind must be completely free, and that freedom can only come where there is absolute order. This is logic, this is so.

How will the mind, thought, bring order, because it realizes that it cannot bring order? Are you aware of this? Don't accept what the speaker is saying. Are you aware that thought cannot bring order? Look at the world around you: the wars, the terrors, the class divisions and all the rest of it is the product of thought, and so thought itself is disorder. You won't accept this. So what will bring order?

Order can only come into being when there is pure observation.

When the mind observes its own disorder - is this getting too much for you? Please, I am going to discuss what is meditation and all that, so if you get tired, we will stop for a while and rest.

To observe disorder without any motive. If you have a motive in observation, that very motive brings about disorder. That motive is put together by thought. So that is a factor of distortion because the mind is incapable of observing if there is a motive. That is, I live in disorder, my motive is to bring order, because I hope then I will be free and have moksha and all the rest of it. That motive is the movement of time, of desire, and therefore thought brings this motive into action and therefore there is distortion. Can the mind observe the disorder it lives in, without saying 'I must get out of this disorder, I must suppress it, run away from it'? Just observe. Do it as we are talking. First be aware of your life as disorder, which it is, and observe it without a single motive, without the interference of thought saying, 'I must get beyond this'.

So we are asking, what is observation? What is the nature of looking, observing? To observe without any reaction to that which you are observing. Are you doing this as we are talking? Or are you all meditating? Are you watching yourself and therefore you see your life in disorder? That if there is a motive, it distorts, and therefore creates more conflict. So, can the mind observe very closely, purely, actively? Just to observe. If you so observe, that very observation, which is total attention, and therefore all the energy is applied in that observation. When there is that great attentive observation, this thing that you are observing undergoes a change. That change is order. So the mind must be entirely, completely in order.

And also we must enquire into what is space. Our minds have no space, because we are occupied all the time, talking, chatting, doing things, you know, everlastingly the brain is in movement, so it is occupied, whether it is occupied with sex, with business, with god, with your guru, with all your dancing, shaking and all that business, it is occupied with something or other. And when you are occupied with something you call it noble or ignoble, but it is still occupation. Therefore your mind never has space. What can the mind do to have space? Do you understand how important space is? Space implies - if you will listen carefully I will go into it - space implies emptiness. When there is space, there is emptiness, and therefore in that emptiness there is tremendous energy.

We have explained what desire is, gone into the question of fear, we went into the question of death, pleasure, compassion, sorrow, and now order. That order is not continuity, for the moment there is continuity, that order becomes disorder, because it involves time.

We are now going to enquire into, not only what space is, but also what meditation is. What is meditation, not how to meditate. You've been taught, as part of your education, what to think, but not how to think. In the same way we are asking, what is meditation? Because that word is terribly loaded, every guru, every man who writes about meditation, adds, adds his own commentary, his own explanations, his own feelings, adds and then we are the result of all that. We are secondhand human beings - if you realized that, you wouldn't put on any of the robes.

What is meditation? Why should one meditate? To find that out, stop meditating. To find out what is real meditation, not yours or mine, your type and my type, or X's type, but what is meditation, to find out you can't hold on to some kind of meditation that you have and then enquire. That is like a donkey tied to a post. So you have to be free to enquire. First one can see very clearly that it is only a very, very quiet mind that can observe accurately. A quiet mind can observe accurately only, not a disturbed mind. So a quiet mind is absolutely necessary just to observe. But if you say, 'Ah, how am I to have such a quiet mind?' Then you are asking for a system, for a method, you are going to somebody whom you think has a quiet mind, and then asking him, 'Please tell me what to do.' And then you are caught in that trap because he will tell you and you will practise - if you are silly enough. But you see the importance of having an absolutely quiet mind. A mind that has no problem. We've gone into the question of problems; as a problem arises, deal with it, finish with it, don't carry on with it the next day. We went into that. So we are saying that a quiet mind implies a mind that has great space; it is not occupied with anything. It is not concerned with experience because the experiencer is the experience. A man who is a light to himself doesn't need experience because he is awake.

So a mind that is absolutely quiet demands a vast sense of space, and it has no attachment to anything. Because the moment you are attached, to your wife, to your family, to your name, to your house, anything, ideals, beliefs, dogmas - they are all the product of thought. So a quiet mind means the ending of this continuity. You understand sir? So we said - before we go into the question of meditation, I forgot about death, we must go into it.

Death means the ending - that is obvious. But the ending of what? The ending of your attachment - let us take that as an example. Can you end your attachment immediately? Suppose I am attached to - what? I don't know - a house, and I see the consequences of being attached - fear, jealousy, anxiety, antagonism, dominance - all that follows in attachment. Death says, I can't be attached when I die, so it says, 'End it'. Can I, can you, end your attachment now? Go on, sir. Work it out. Not when you are compelled, coerced, persuaded. Death does not persuade you, doesn't coerce you. Can you while you are living, end the things that you hold most important psychologically?

When you end this continuity, something totally new happens. It must, inevitably. When I give up - what do you give up? I don't know - anything, easily, happily, some extra-dimensional thing takes place. It is not my reward, it just takes place. So death is the ending of that which had continuity. It is too complex. I won't go into all that now. Our time is limited.

Man, throughout the ages, historically, has searched endlessly to find out what happens after death. Volumes have been written about it. Reincarnation is one of the happy inventions, comforting. But you've never enquired, what it is that continues? You have accepted reincarnation as a means of improving yourself, becoming nobler, better, eventually reaching godhead, the highest principle, and so on. You have never questioned this continuity. That which continues is mechanical, and that which has an end can begin with something entirely different. So, while living, end the various things that are created - like fear, end it, end your jealousy, your ambition, greed, everything, bring it to a precise end, so that there is no continuity. That is death, isn't it?

So can you, while living, with all your vigour, end the things that death demands? You can test it out. So while you are living, you are also dying? Do you understand? Then there is a totally new thing happening all the time. But if you say, 'Well, I have a future life', or 'I hope there will be', you are lost, you have gone off into something entirely different. I haven't time to go into the question of what it is that continues if we don't end.

From there we can move into what is meditation? Meditation is a state of mind in which all the things that thought has invented - the illusions, the beliefs, the dogmas, the rituals, the habits, sex - all that is no longer entering into the mind that is absolutely quiet. Now is it possible to have such a mind? Do you understand my question? I am going to examine it - we are going to examine it together. We all need a quiet mind, a peaceful mind, an absolutely silent mind without a murmur of thought. Is that possible? Possible means that we don't know. If we know already, that knowledge is the remembrance of something in the past, therefore it is not a quiet mind. So we are saying, is it possible to have a mind that is absolutely without a ripple?

We are going to find out. To discover if it is possible, first you must understand the nature of attention. What is the nature of attention, to attend? And what is the nature of inattention, not attending? And what is the nature of concentration? And what is the nature of distraction? What does one mean by concentration? That is what most people try to do - concentrate. They are taught from childhood to concentrate. In school you say, 'Look at your book, don't look out of the window.' What do we mean by concentration, and who is it that concentrates? Thought has projected an image, or an idea, a concept, or a picture, and on that you concentrate - that means, exclude all other thought. But the exclusion becomes impossible because thought itself is divisive.

There is no distraction. Thought says, 'Concentrate on that and any movement away from that is distraction.' But the movement away from it is the movement of thought. Thought says, 'Concentrate', and thought also moves away from it. The moving away from it is distraction. Thought itself a distraction because it has moved away. You are following all this? Please don't laugh because it is very, very serious if you want to go into meditation. So there is no distraction because thought itself is a distraction the moment it says, 'I must concentrate'.

And what is attention, and what is not being able to attend? You have been here for over an hour, you are tired at the end of the day, you have been listening to a lot of words, and if you have gone into yourself you become rather tired. And you cannot, when you are tired, attend.

I am going purposely slowly, so you can gradually gather your energy, so we will be able to investigate together. We've seen what is attention and what is inattention. Attention means to attend, to give all your energy to look, to absorb, to hear, to see. You can only do that for a couple of seconds probably, or a minute, and then attention goes down and there is inattention. You are not completely attentive. Attention demands that you give all your energy, with all your senses, with all your mind and heart, completely attentive. But that intense, active attention cannot be sustained by most people, so inattention comes. But when you are aware of the inattention, that you are not attending, that very perception that you are not attending is attention. Have you got it? What is important is, that there is no conflict in the mind. Never say, 'I was attentive, I know what it means, and I want to capture it again' - that whole movement is, if you are aware of it, is attention. Do you understand some of this?

Meditation implies the emptiness of consciousness, emptiness of the mind, in which there is no ripple - the ripple being thought. That is possible only when you understand the nature of concentration, with all its resistance, its limitation, and when there is concentration there is distraction, which is still a movement of thought. And meditation implies the ending of thought; because thought has realized itself, its own place, but it has no other place: think only when it is necessary, not otherwise. Do you understand? I wonder if you understand this? If you are thinking all the time, there is no space. So you see that it is necessary to have space. If you are living in a city, where everybody lives in a small place, you begin to quarrel, the violence comes from the lack of space. So there must be space, and there cannot be space if at any time there is occupation. If you understand why the mind is occupied, which is, in occupation you feel secure - the housewife occupied with her cooking or whatever she does, is occupied and therefore secure, if she is not occupied, she says, 'What am I to do?'-but if you see the truth that occupation prevents space, then when you see the truth, there is no problem. You have space.

The mind, which is all the senses fully operating, not a particular sense, but all the senses at their highest excellence, but if you have no love in your heart, you cannot meditate. There is no meaning to meditation if you don't love. Love means care, beauty, a sense of immense compassion, and having space. From that the mind is capable of being absolutely still, without a flutter of thought. If you have gone into it very deeply this can take place by the hour, not for a few minutes, for a few seconds. And in that emptiness which is full of energy there is that which is eternity. Eternity does not mean continuity. It is beyond time, where time has stopped, thought has stopped. And in that absolute quietness there is that which is nameless, timeless, measureless.

You cannot come to it by any path. There is no path to it. Only when you understand the whole nature of yourself, when you have read the story of yourself from the beginning to the ending of the book, and therefore you have total order in your life, only then you have an extraordinary sense of freedom. And then that which is most sacred, with all its blessing, comes into being.

BROCKWOOD PARK 17TH JUNE 1979 1ST CONVERSATION WITH 5 TEACHERS

A: Krishnaji, I was wondering if we could talk about the question of the educator, that is, the teacher, both in the classroom and outside, and how he is able to educate having some understanding of what the nature of education is, that is the total responsible for the life of the student and for the life of the community, and for perhaps some understanding of the place of his specific instruction, his specific knowledge in the whole scheme of things, but having only a partial understanding of the depth of things, the reality of things. How is he to proceed to bring about a different kind of understanding in a student, that is an understanding that is not just of the subject but deeper and beyond the subject, a more global understanding?

K: Would you consider the relationship between the student and the educator, what is the relationship?

A: Well so far as the subject is concerned, the teacher knows more about the subject than the student.

K: And so he informs.

A: So he imparts certain information. So that is...

K: ...fairly simple.

A: Yes, that is fairly straightforward.

K: But what is more involved in this relationship? You are the teacher and I happen to be a student. What is our relationship apart from the subject and the information involved in the subject? What is our deeper relationship, if we have any at all?

B: I don't quite understand how you are using the word

'relationship' in this context. Surely one relationship between the teacher is to instruct and is there any relationship beyond that?

K: If that is all the relationship one has, which is generally what happens in ordinary schools, then it is very simple. You inform the students of mathematics, or whatever subject it is, and you go back home, or go back to your room and forget about the whole thing. But we are not talking of such a superficial relationship, we are talking much more of a relationship where we are living in a community of teachers and students.

B: Most teachers would say that they have a concern for the student which goes beyond just instructing them in the subject, they are concerned with their well being, with their...

K: I wonder if that is so? Take an ordinary school in England, or in India, or in America, are they really concerned?

C: I think some of them are concerned but it is very difficult if you have thirty students in your class and you see them three times a week and where else do you see them?

K: That is all, that is what I am saying. If it is an ordinary school there is very, very little relationship.

C: But you might want to have some more relationship.

K: Ah, that is a different matter. If you want it how do you set about it?

A: You probably have to start a school of your own eventually; or join a school that was moving in that direction: one of the two.

B: Are you saying it is not possible in this system, the school system that we have just now to have that kind of relationship?

K: I don't see the possibility there at all. Take even Winchester College, or any of these Public schools, what is the relationship?

B: Well you would have thought that in a residential school where the teachers are living nearby and the student is there all the time, that they would be in a position to...

K: Generally they have rules, you must, must not, and there it is.

C: But surely we have to have rules?

K: Oh yes, of course we have to have rules. I am not saying that. But we are talking of relationship between the educator and the student in an ordinary Public school, or even in a Grammar School, it means very little.

D: But that seems also to be the source of a lot of dissatisfaction with teachers these days who work in ordinary schools. There is some feeling that they would like to reach out more to the people they are working with but they can't, just because of the physical circumstances.

K: Is that what it is? The system prevents it.

D: Or seems to prevent it.

K: Would you say that is so, that is a fact?

B: I don't quite see how the system prevents relationship. Surely it would be possible for a teacher to have a relationship with a student if he wanted to.

K: I wonder if it is possible in ordinary schools, in Public schools, or an ordinary Grammar school, is that possible?

B: Well let's take a teacher in an ordinary school.

K: Yes. What does he do?

B: Where he comes to school in the morning and he may be goes to an Assembly, and then...

K: There is a class subject. And he takes it for forty-five minutes in the morning, or in the afternoon, or something like that, and he tells them, and there is the housemaster, and he passes them all to him. And there is the headmaster who protects the whole system of fagging and all the rest of it, where is the relationship possible there? Relationship in the sense we are talking about, in the sense feeling responsible for the student, not only academically but morally, socially, his behaviour, his way of thinking, and so on, concerned totally. He doesn't exist.

D: Why not? Why not when they are eating meals, or afterwards?

K: But we are saying sir it is possible but it doesn't exist.

D: It is possible.

K: Anything is possible.

E: I know friends of mine who are teachers in an ordinary school, and they are really trying very, very hard to build up relationships with the students. But to some extent they are succeeding but always they are limited by the school they are in.

K: That's what I am saying. The system prevents it, the modern education is merely concerned with giving information, giving a certain amount of knowledge and helping them to get a career - right? Isn't that so?

A: Well I think ambition comes into it at some stage.

K: Of course. Of course.

A: In many schools, however well meaning the teachers are, eventually they have been there for three or four years, and they want to go on a bit further, they want a better job.

K: Of course, of course.

A: So ambition comes into it.

K: So at what level are we talking about education, about the ordinary education that the average person receives? Or are we talking, having a dialogue about a school where both the educator and the student feel totally responsible?

B: Krishnaji, we seem to be talking about education and we don't really have a very clear idea of what that means.

K: I think we have, don't we? First of all they need academic training, discipline - right?

B: Yes.

K: You all agree to that.

B: The need scales.

K: And also we want, or desire, or wish, that they should have social consciousness, socially be conscious of what is happening in the world morally, in behaviour, the way they talk, that is what I consider education. Totally educating the whole human being.

B: But attention is given to behaviour and to the moral upbringing.

K: It is all discipline, do this and don't do that.

A: I think the question comes in of being on the same level really. About the way what you are saying is conveyed in the sense that you approach it from a position of not being higher or superior to the student but rather you may point something out, but without the implication of a psychological superiority.

K: That's right. And also isn't the question here, the student comes conditioned and the teacher is conditioned, both are conditioned.

A: Both are conditioned.

K: Conditioned according to the culture and so on and so on.

And as far as one observes, one is helping them to conform or fit into the wider or narrower conditioning. Would you say that?

B: Well I am not so sure that I would say that. I would say that, as most teachers would say, they are interested in the moral upbringing in a much wider aspect. Whether they can do it is a different question.

K: The idea and the fact is different. I would like to be something but the fact is I am not.

B: Most teachers would say they are trying.

K: So what are we discussing, that is what I would like to find out? Are we talking over together the average school, either Public, or Grammar schools, or a school like this at Brockwood, where we are concerned with the total cultivation of man, or the student, and so ourselves. I don't know if I am conveying this.

D: We have all decided to come here rather than to teach at an ordinary school. So really we have to talk about this school.

K: So we are talking about this school. Then let's talk about that. Not the average and the people who want to do this but can't and so on. So let's start from here, shall we? Is that it? You all agree?

B: Yes, let's start.

K: What are we trying to do here? If we could talk frankly and openly. What are we trying to do?

A: I would say that we are trying to bring about some learning through understanding, which is not an understanding in a particular area but rather understanding per se, if we could refer to some kind of universal understanding.

K: Would you explain that, I don't understand it. Put it differently.

A: Generally knowledge is assimilated in fragments, or in parts, mathematical parts, physics, a language, we also do this here, the students learns.

K: My question is: what are we trying to do here as a community, as a teacher and the relationship with the student, and the student with the community and with the teacher, together as a body of people, what is it we are trying to do?

A: Well I am trying to work round to it by saying this. In a school, in any school, it is necessary at some point to point things out to others. That is part of one's responsibility, as I see it anyway. Now the significant thing seems to be that if you are able to point this thing out in such a way that it makes sense to the other person, that he sees the point of it, then that also becomes part of his own learning, and it is also part of your learning as well because you have learnt how to convey it.

K: Have you answered my question?

A: That is what we are doing.

K: No, what is it that we are trying to do? Have you answered my question?

A: I am trying to answer the question. I have got it in myself but I can't bring it out.

B: We might not be able to get at it.

K: We have had the school, you have been here for a number of years, all of us, what is it together we are trying to do?

C: I think part of what we are trying to do is to actually live together rather than separately.

K: Actually you are living together in the same house.

C: Yes but I mean actually we co-operate and work, all that living together involves without necessarily avoiding each other.

K: Is that what you are doing here?

C: It is a part of what we are trying to do.

D: Also when you ask that question what immediately comes to my mind is - I don't know how to express it, except perception, to begin to learn at things because we don't know how to look at ourselves, or to look at anything just clearly. We have thoughts, it seems sort of guide-lines with which we look at things. So to learn how to perceive things.

K: So what is it we are doing here, not only trying, actually doing? Trying becomes rather vague and rather indefinite. What is it actually we are doing?

B: We are looking at the way we live. We are looking at it in relationship and trying to understand how we are, what we are and...

A: I would say we are working for a common understanding, which is not a personal understanding, which is not an understanding of this person or that, but a common understanding.

B: It is very difficult to put into words.

K: You are being rather vague about all this.

D: What would that mean? It sounds nice to work towards that.

K: Sir, are we concerned, if I may ask, are we concerned, not only with the present activities of living, relationship, and academics, informing the students academically, and all the rest of it, or are we also concerned about what is going to happen to them in the future, when they leave here. What is their life, whether they are going to be absorbed into the whole mass of the average?

A: That relates to it.

K: So are we concerned, that is what I am trying to get at. Not only with the now, the now being good relationship, helping them to understand not only mathematics but understand the whole significance of life, and also be concerned with the future of their lives?

C: Surely the now is inextricably related to the future. How you look at life now.

K: That's just it. How do they look at life now? How do we look at life now? How do we help the student or ourselves to understand the now, what is happening now?

E: I was on holiday last month with two students from this school, and there were two or three children who spent some time with us who went to ordinary local schools, and they couldn't understand the relationship which I had with these students. They kept on asking, "Won't he be cross if you don't do the work?" or "Why don't you call him sir?" And so on. They sometimes just stood there watching us. They couldn't understand what was happening.

K: That is what I want to get at. Are we concerned not only with the actualities of present living, our relationship with each others, whether it is personal, or whether it is objective, whether we are cultivating the mind, the brain, the capacity to think, to think objectively, sanely and also the sense of protection, all that. And will that sustain them right through life? You follow what I am saying? Or they will be caught in these traps?

A: They will be caught after being here.

K: I want to prevent that. If I have a son and a daughter and I send them here. I would say please help him not to be caught in these traps.

A: Well, of course. Some are not caught, but some are also.

K: I want my children not to be caught in the trap, in this rat race that goes on, whether it is in India, here or in America, this perpetual struggle.

C: So surely the only way we can help them is to make sure they develop a real understanding of what this struggle is.

K: Are we doing that? Are we actually doing that? I am just questioning it. I am not saying you are not. Are we actually seeing that they have this quality of intelligence which is not the intelligence of ideas and all that but this intelligence that will help them to ward off danger, ward off, keep away from all the travail of man - you follow? Are we doing that?

E: We are certainly trying but we are not always succeeding.

K: Not with every student. Now let's come back. Are we saying that this is the purpose or the intention of this place?

A: Yes.

K: Then how do we carry it out?

A: I don't think it can be carried out in an unfailing way. That is, in such a way that there will be no casualties, so to speak, that is not possible.

K: Yes. But I am saying, we understand the basis of the school. Now how do we bring it about?

D: I think that is the question we have all been asking ourselves.

K: I am asking you.

D: We are attempting to do that but we don't quite know, we are working it out.

K: I am asking you, what shall we do? I leave my daughter and my son here - I haven't got any but if I leave them here. And I say, please sirs, and ladies, it is your responsibility to see that these two are not thrown to the wolves, are not caught in the social machine, or become mediocre, average, unintelligent citizens. I say it is your responsibility. And what shall we do? We work together as a community, as a community of teachers and so on, what shall we do? That's what I want to get at, you are not answering my question.

B: But we can't help the student if we are mediocre and unintelligent ourselves.

K: Now, so will you wait until you become intelligent, not mediocre and then become the teacher?

B: We can't because...

K: That is impossible. I mean that would be like saying, it is too stupid to say "I will wait until I make myself all right and then come to teach". So our relationship then is, I am not totally stupid, conditioned, and the student is, so we both are on the same level - right?

A: Yes, that's very important.

K: That is really important, except when you are giving information about mathematics or history, or language and so on.

A: Psychologically on the same level.

K: So psychologically we are on the same level. Now how shall we help each other to be free of our mediocrity?

B: Can we stay with this Krishnaji, because this is a tremendous thing you are saying.

K: I know.

B: We should be psychologically on the same level as the student.

K: Absolutely. I feel that.

C: Yes, I think it becomes difficult sometimes because when one is older one feels sometimes you have in a sense more experience.

K: About what?

C: Well one might say...

K: Wait. Just look at it. Sex, drink, smoking, what?

A: There are other things as well.

K: What?

A: For instance, you may...

K: Climbing the mountains?

A: No, you may also have gone through the war, you may also have been a conscious objector, you may have gone to prison.

K: Now that is a different matter. That is a different matter.

A: So you have stuck your neck out in some way probably.

K: That is a different matter. So I am saying, look if we are on the same level with the student, how shall we begin to free ourselves from the results which society and ourselves have imposed upon ourselves? That is the problem, no?

B: I am not quite sure that we see the necessity for being on the same level, that we are on the same level as the student.

K: No, it is a fact. We, as a human being, one is conditioned - would you agree to that? Then the student is conditioned by his father, by his mother, by his friends, by the society he lives in, and so on, books he read, television, he is conditioned by all that. So the teacher is also, not exactly, but they are both conditioned. Now how are we to help each other to, if I may use the word, uncondition ourselves?

A: Are all conditionings equal?

K: No, no.

A: Is it possible therefore...

K: It is a good question, sir, let's stick to it. Is there a common factor which is the actual conditioning? You follow?

A: Yes.

K: I mean as an Englishman you are conditioned in a certain way. And another as a German, or comes from India, it doesn't matter, time, the climate, the food, the language, the television, all those, religion, the superstitions, all that has made him what he is, and more. What is the common factor in all human beings who are conditioned? You follow what I am saying?

A: You mean more than the fact of conditioning itself? Or different from the factor of conditioning?

K: You are an Englishman and I happen to be born in India, what is the common factor in our conditioning? Language, is it?

A: Well it could be.

K: I want to eliminate. Is it climate? Food, literature, television, the magazines, go on sirs, don't say, no, no, no. And the upbringing, the tradition, being the British and all the pride in that word, and another born in India he has got the same pride, the same religious superstitions, only he is darker, probably not as strong as you are physically, manners and so on and so on. What is the common factor between these two?

A: So you are saying only the form is different.

K: That's all.

B: They might be proud about different things, or they might have different gods.

K: Of course but it is the same movement. So if we agree the educator and the students are both conditioned in their own way, and the central factor is to be free of this, to become human beings, not labels. I don't know if one can put it that way.

A: Yes. So the movement you speak of is a psychological movement, which is common to all. I think we perhaps ought to pause over that for a minute.

K: Obviously. After all what is the common factor to an Englishman, to a German, to a Russian, or Indian, or an American, the common factor is they all have this enormous sense of ambition. The common factor of fear, the common factor of pursuing pleasure, the common factor of suffering, struggle, anxiety, grief, lack of love, and all that is the common factor between all of us.

B: So you are saying now that the educator and the student are...

K: ...in the same boat.

B: ...are exactly the same.

K: Exactly the same.

C: But the expressions might be different.

K: Oh yes. You might express it by going to church, and another might express it by going up to his room crying. That's irrelevant. The factor is we all go through the same phenomena.

Now as an educator and as the student, that is the common factor - right? Or would you disagree there? Don't easily agree. If we both of us that is the common factor then we can do something together.

B: But why is this so important in education, the fact that both of us may be afraid but of different things? Why is that so important?

K: Because fear, whether it is in the educator or in the student, what does it do? It cripples a human being, it dulls the mind, it creates havoc in one's life. No?

E: My daughter is just seven years old and every time I see her again she has picked up things some of which are just making it not easy for her to see straight. So one has to say where do you get this from, and why, is it true, all the time.

K: If we all agree that it is the common factor for all of us, how shall we help each other to be free of all this? That is the function of the educator.

C: Surely one must want to be free of it first.

K: No, see the dangers of it. One is born in India with all the cultural, religious, climatic values, nourishment and so on and so on, and here you have the opposite, marvellous climate! Good food, you know, sanitation and all that. But you, as a human being, and he, as a human being, go through extraordinary miseries, wars, deprivations, tremendous sense of guilt, depression, you know all that. And if you are an educator, that is his function, say let's work this out, and don't let's be caught in all this.

C: But is it possible? I think there is also a feeling that in a certain sense may be it is not possible to be free of this?

K: Then you are admitting something terrible. If you say it is not possible then you are caught in this.

C: But if that is all I know how can I possibly be free of that?

K: If you only know fear don't you want to be free of it?

C: Yes but how can I if I don't know?

K: But aren't you aware that there is fear?

C: Yes

K: So don't you want to be out of it?

C: Yes.

K: So does the student. He is afraid of exams, he is afraid of a dozen things, public opinion, he may not, but fear is common to us. He expresses one way and we express it another way.

B: So now we are saying that we must help the student to be free of his fears, anxieties.

K: Aren't we, that is my responsibility. Our responsibility as good teachers.

A: Or we must understand the nature of fear itself.

K: Yes, that is what I mean.

C: So it is not just the student but both of us.

K: Because both are together, we are both in the same boat.

C: Yes. So the student might help us as much we help the student.

K: That is what I want to get at.

E: My daughter helps me as much as I help her, as well as students.

K: Is that what education is? Or is it merely to help the student to become the average, mediocre, clever, cunning citizen, ambitious, greedy, envious, fighting each other, you know, killing each other, the whole modern society?

B: But now we have to deal with all the pressures of society because we want to understand what fear is and we want to be free both the teacher and the educator wants to be free of all those things that will make life difficult. There are the pressures of earning a livelihood, of exams.

K: No, here the pressure of earning a livelihood is not for the time being.

A: Well it is in abeyance because very early on the student for instance discovers that examinations are the means to a certificate which is the means to...

K: So can we find a method, or a way of not having exams, or treating exams as though they were nothing? 'A' level and 'O' level, the whole business of it?

C: But if I feel that the only way that I can get a job...

K: No, but we might find out a way of not being afraid of exams, or - you understand what I am saying?

A: Yes.

K: Or during the whole term, or couple of terms, or whatever it is watching the students and say he is good enough, you are all right, so as to remove the fear of these beastly exams. Watch him throughout the year, the student, say look, study a little more, encourage him, all the rest of it, so that when the final horror comes he says it is not a horror at all, he goes through. Can we do that?

A: One does that but seemingly at the last moment so to speak, and the student may feel that it is nevertheless a horror. One has protected him from the horror in a sense, one has protected him from the horror but the horror is still there, the horror is still waiting.

K: Who invented exams? The Italians? The Mandarins? The people who invented this monstrous system.

E: But you obviously do need some exams at some stages, if people are going to build bridges, or be doctors, it has to be clear to themselves and to everybody else.

K: Yes, but is it possible to help the student not to be afraid of exams?

E: If you really have time to do the teaching properly, yes, you can, I think.

K: That is what I am trying to get at.

C: I think it is just a fear. I am not sure it is just a fear of exams actually. I think it goes a lot deeper than that really. It is not just a fear of examinations, it is a fear of the future, and fear of not being secure, of not having your exams.

K: So what does that mean? Fear of not being successful.

C: Yes. I think that is much stronger than any teaching you can do.

K: So we all worship the god of success.

C: That is much stronger.

K: Go into it. Then we go into it with the student and say, look, what is this whole idea of success? Why has it become so important in life?

C: It seems also allied to something to do with self-fulfilment too.

K: All that is involved. I heard the other day, "My ambition is to become prime minister" - no, no, he really meant it, not here. I met somebody and his son was saying that, "I am going to devote my life to becoming the prime minister". You follow sirs? And probably he would.

B: What puts that kind of idea into one's head?

K: Our whole culture is that. A man who is not successful, he is treated with contempt.

B: So now we are saying that we are putting ourselves against the whole of culture and society.

K: Against the whole current of this modern world.

B: We must be careful here because we aren't just talking about revolution in the sense that it is known about, destroying the system, destroying society, getting rid of exams or whatever it is.

K: No, I am not getting rid of exams. We are not getting rid. We are trying to help the student to understand the whole meaning of success, what is implied in it, and whether he is going to give all his life to this idea of becoming something in the world. Look sir, it is not only in the physical mundane world, but also spiritually, the ordinary priest is ambitious to become the bishop. And the bishop wants to become the archbishop, or the cardinal wants to become the pope. It is the same pattern.

E: For the parents just as much as the students.

K: Of course.

E: They may be saying if you don't pass your exams you can't stay on at Brockwood another year.

K: That's right. So can we as educators go into this with the student and say, do we see the danger of it?

B: This wanting to be is so deep rooted, Krishnaji.

K: I know sir, that is our conditioning.

C: I mean the educators have it themselves too.

K: That is what I am saying.

C: So surely we must start looking as well at ourselves, we can't just point it out to the students.

K: No, we have a dialogue about it with the students. In the course of the dialogue I am freeing myself, and I am helping the student to get free of this goddess! I don't know. I have watched it all over the world this extraordinary phenomenon of success. Be somebody in the world.

A: Are we also suggesting that in our discussion we would uncover something which is of greater value?

K: Of course. Aren't you reversing, sir, the whole way of thinking about oneself? Now we think I must be a businessman, I must be an executive when I grow up, even if I fail I must be the foreman of the factory, I must be the shop steward. The whole thing is this.

A: Is it that, or is it also confused because the person wants to be those things, he is ambitious, and yet he feels perhaps in the back of his mind that he would like to be free, he would like to be less bothered, he would like to have a free life but he is caught.

K: He would like to but the fact is he is caught by the throat.

A: Has this dichotomy come about in culture itself?

K: That's what I am saying. I mean you are always comparing 'B' to 'A', which begins the idea of success. So can we as educators discuss this or have a real serious dialogue and point it out to them what is involved in it.

C: I am worried by when you say point it out to them, because...

K: Point it out in the sense I am doing it, I am pointing it out to myself, I am not pointing out to them.

C: Yes.

K: In the course of the dialogue I am aware that I am also pursuing the goddess.

D: It seems to come back to what we were saying earlier, which was what Harsh was suggesting staying with, that the student and the teacher are psychologically at the same level.

K: Of course.

D: But if we both really realize that, that creates a certain atmosphere.

K: Yes. No, that creates a quality of, you know, an intensity. We are both in the same boat. And that gives us a strange sense of responsibility. It is not I row and you sit still. Or you row and I look at the heavens! We would both like to look at the heavens. Can we educate them that way? Is that possible?

C: We have said pointing out but we have not really talked about how we actually work on this.

K: Let's have a dialogue about it now.

C: Because it is all very well saying we worship success but...

K: Wait a minute. I am your student, how will you deal with me? How will you all, five of you, who are educators, teachers, how will you explain, go into this question? Pointing out the consequences, the dangers, how will you show it to them?

C: We would have to find out first what we mean by success and what it is.

K: Very simple. To be somebody, financially, bigger car, bigger house, to be somebody. Money, if you can't have money, all that, you are somebody with an enormous sense of information, scholar. Right? Being somebody implies, you know what it implies, whether you are a doctor, whether you are a surgeon, whether you are a prime minister, or just an ordinary clerk, he wants to be somebody.

C: Perhaps we will have to find out what is behind the wanting to be somebody.

K: That is again, what do you think is behind it? You are teaching me, you are helping me to understand this. We are in the same boat, don't immediately wander off. We are in the same boat, help me to understand this. What is behind all this? Why has man right through the world made this goddess so extraordinarily important?

D: It seems there is a desire within us.

K: Look at it sir, go into it. I am your student, don't just give words. Why has man right through history, it is not just now, right through.

A: It seems in some sense to be connected with survival.

K: That's right. Security.

A: Because he survived at the physical level and then as society gets more sophisticated, more developed, he feels that he needs to survive at the psychological level also.

K: And also each one wants to survive. He is only concerned with his survival. Obviously. So I want to survive at any price and my survival is laid out by my success, money, position, all the rest of it. And your's is also in a different way but both of us desire to survive, individually. Family, the nearer family, and then the nation, and so on and so on. The tribal instinct is very strong in all of us.

C: It is continued, being reinforced by everything that you do, by how you are educated.

K: The British, the British. And when you are in France, 'La France', 'La France', of course.

D: And we also seem to make the assumption since we need a physical security, we understand that, we assume that similarly we need a psychological security. We don't question that at all.

K: We never question psychological security, which may affect our physical security. So...

A: You mean by that endanger our physical security?

K: Yes.

E: Or even if someone is worried to death it works that way.

K: That's right. So can we being on the same level, at the same time, right, can we convey all this to the students and to ourselves, not verbally, just words but in depth?

A: In discussion therefore.

B: Not just in discussion.

A: Not just in discussion, but in discussion, in action, in games, in everything you do. That seems to be implied in what you have said there.

K: Yes.

A: In a variety of ways.

K: It means sir, I am very keen to find out why I worship this goddess, which has so many facets, so many faces. Why? Is it security? Individual? Then the family and so on? Or is there much more to it? There is much more to it, surely, than mere physical survival, as well as psychological survival, there is much more involved in it. Is man nothing but this? You follow? Wanting - the priest wanting to be a bishop, bishop wanting to be pope and so on - you follow? Is this all? That's what we make life into.

A: Generally by implication that is all.

K: That's just it.

B: So far Krishnaji we have said nothing about a whole range of things: about beauty, about love, about affection.

K: I purposefully avoided that because as long as I am worshipping this strange goddess I can't have the other. Obviously. I can't love...

B: ...if I am only concerned with myself.

K: Obviously. I can't see beauty if all the time I am worshipping this goddess.

B: But still I hang on to this question.

K: Sir it is right through. The painter wants to be somebody. The musician always - you follow? It is right through. So it is like a tremendous mountain which you have to climb, but it is not. If you see the truth of this it becomes very simple.

Yesterday morning we had a discussion with the students only and we went into this question of whether this hall should be used for this or that. It took fifty five minutes to disentangle it! And I said, look, let's find out if you want a room where you can be quiet. They all agreed we must have a room where we can be quiet. They said why not in the library and I said somebody is reading there. All the rest ultimately came to the point where we must have a room where we can all be quiet, or I want to come here and be quiet, each one of us. They agreed. I said from that principle work it out. You follow sirs? Not one begin to say we must have it in this room, whatever we like, jazz or whatever we like. I said, don't offer opinions, let's...

So we continue with this don't we? I think we should.

BROCKWOOD PARK 20TH JUNE 1979 2ND CONVERSATION WITH 5 TEACHERS

B: Krishnaji, there's a lot of unrest in education these days, and there's a lot of debate, and a lot of people are asking questions about it. But most of these questions seem to be about systems of education and methods of teaching and what subjects to teach. And there seems to be a lot of confusion and none of them seems to get to any point.

K: Don't you think we ought to first enquire, what is education, rather than what subjects, what books, what system, what kind of teachers and so on and so on. Shouldn't we first ask: why are we being educated? The word 'education', we know what it all means, but I mean I would like to know, to ask, if I may, why we are being educated. To fit to a system, into an establishment?

B: A lot of education at present is precisely for that.

K: So is that what is education, does education mean that? To conform to the social demand? To a particular culture, technological or otherwise which says you must fit into this, you must conform, or you must find your career, your life, in this particular system. Is that why you are being educated? To have a good career, to have capacity to earn enough money and all the rest of it, is that why you are being educated? As you say, apparently it is so.

B: Well it would certainly seem to be a necessary part of education to prepare a student to earn his livelihood.

K: Yes. Part of it. But even then I question it. Let's go into it a bit more carefully, if I may. One might educate a boy or a girl to conform to a particular culture, social demand, technologically, as a career, which is necessary, and so on, but the rest of the whole human complex existence is totally neglected. Would you say that it is so?

B: I think some attempts are made in some ways to try and include that.

D: But it is hard to see exactly where to go, what to do, it is more of a feeling that education should be more but exactly in what direction is not clear.

C: It also often involves some form of rejection that the society to which you are going, you see there is something wrong with it therefore you in some way...

K: What is the meaning of existence? Unless we tackle it on a very large scale I don't see how we are going to solve a particular small problem. What is the meaning of human existence, what is the significance of it? If it is merely to earn a livelihood, merely to get a job, merely, you know, it seems so limited, so extraordinarily narrow.

A: It is narrow, and yet it seems that those very things are becoming in fact more and more difficult, because of the very structure of society itself and its own momentum.

K: Yes. Over population, yes, need we go into all that? Over population, the destruction of real things, you know, the whole ecology and everything. Is that why we have made life so narrow and limited? As a human being, having been to Oxford or Cambridge, or whatever university, when you have got a degree, a job, and for the rest of your life, until almost you die, you are caught in that because you have responsibility for your children, you wife, you know, all that. So is that all? Apparently that is all. Or if you are slightly inclined to be religious, you go off and pop into a church occasionally and say, "I believe in God" and get on with it. Is that why we are being educated?

E: It is about all that is happening at the moment.

K: I know that's what is happening. And we want to improve what is happening - different system, different methods, different way of teaching, and so on, to do what?

B: It seems that education should be preparation for the whole of life.

K: The whole of life, instead of merely limiting it to earning a livelihood. I should have thought any serious man who is concerned with education is concerned with the whole of existence of man - man not as an Englishman, a Frenchman, or an American, as a human being.

A: You see sir, I think as religion has declined in the West, and generally, universally, often the solutions that are sought among teachers, particularly the younger generation of teachers, are generally speaking political, not necessarily party political, but they are of a political nature. I am suggesting you improve the world by adopting a certain line, or you have a non-authoritarian approach to the actual task of teaching and out of that possibly something better will happen. In other words you try not to frighten the student, or not to dominate him, and in a sense challenge the values of the society you are in, which are consumer values, sometimes going into the army, almost generally having some kind of career.

K: We are saying the same thing.

A: But this seems to be the level at which it functions.

K: In this meeting are we challenging this whole approach to life?

A: I think we are.

B: So we are asking whether it is possible in a school to educate for the whole of existence rather than just...

K: Yes, and is that possible?

B: And is that possible, yes.

D: Because one of the problems is that we haven't been educated ourselves for the whole of existence.

K: I understand that, but as an educator, how do you approach this problem? On the one hand you say you must have a career, a job and all the rest of it, and also you say no authority, and also you say we must be concerned with the whole of life. Who is concerned with the whole of life? Not the politician, obviously. Nor the priests.

A: Not even them.

B: Not the priests.

K: Certainly not the priests. Nor the army, nor the engineer, nobody is concerned with the whole of life.

A: Poets claim to be, but I think that is possibly partial too.

K: And are we exaggerating something which is accepted as an actuality if we are totally concerned with the whole cultivation of man? If we are, what shall we do?

All right sirs. If we have children and we are concerned as parents who are also educators, not just parents and then shove them off into a school, but if the parents are concerned and the professional educators are concerned with the whole development of man, how shall we set about it?

B: I think the truth is that we, the educators, are not always concerned with the whole.

K: Obviously not!

B: Because we have our immediate responsibilities, our own jobs, our careers to look after, and all the problems that beset us.

K: Are you saying, sir, that there is no such group in the world? There may be, which we don't know. Now with the whole of life I mean not only help the student to have a technological job and all the rest of it, but also concerned psychologically, inwardly, how to face problems, to understand the whole question of relationship, love, death, you know, the whole of life. Who is there concerned like that?

E: It is really very hard to teach if you don't feel like this.

K: It is not only hard, but are there such people? And if we are such people, what shall we do? We have not only to understand it ourselves, perhaps beginning verbally, intellectually, and then making it into an actuality in our lives, but how will you help the student to come to this, to the understanding of the whole of life? Because he comes to you conditioned, he is only concerned with a job, with a career, passing exams. If they don't want to pass exams and jobs, what will they do? You follow sir? What is our responsibility?

A: I think one responsibility is to ask some different questions from the ones that are normally asked.

K: We are asking each other what is our responsibility?

A: For instance one could ask how that society comes about which we see around us, how does it operate.

K: How is society like that? Because human beings have created it.

C: That isn't obvious to a lot of people. Many people would say that society has created the human being.

K: Society has conditioned human beings. Are you trying to say society suddenly existed? God created it? Some fanciful deity living in wherever he is and suddenly says, "There must be society" and bang, there is society? Or man has created it?

C: No, I am trying to say that the conditioning of society could create a human being and many people say that if you changed that society then the human being will change.

K: That has been tried by the communists, by the totalitarian people of different colour: change society, change the environment, either through brutal means or different ways. But they haven't succeeded.

D: But perhaps the response of people who went before just didn't do it well enough. This time we will do it better.

K: You say we will have such a government who will be efficient to change the outer circumstances, society and all that, and hoping thereby to create a different human being. Is that it? I believe every kind of system to change human beings from outside has been tried.

E: I think one has to start from the other end. One has to care for the student.

K: Ah, that is what I want to find out. Whether you want to start from the outside, outside in the sense change environment, change the culture, change the government, change the whole way of looking at life from the outside, through pressure, through cruel means or pleasant means, and then gradually bring about a different human being. Is that possible? And I believe they have tried every kind of system from the outside: the Greeks, the ancient Hindus, the Romans, historically it is so. And in recent years the communists, in their way, through totalitarianism, have tried to force man to be different. They haven't succeeded. They have suppressed man. They have suppressed human beings to conform to a pattern. But there is always the dissidents - you know the whole history of all that.

So that is what I want to find out. Are we trying to change the human character, the condition of man, from the outside, which is called education in a different way? Right?

B: Yes.

C: Yes.

K: Or if it is not from the outside, is it from inside, inside in the sense inside the skin, psychologically, inwardly?

B: But there has also been a movement of late which have tried all kinds of things, down to gurus, down to psychiatrists.

K: Most of the gurus, are they concerned with the transformation of man?

D: Well people seem to believe they are.

K: Are you sure sir?

B: What do you mean, sir, by the transformation of man? What do you mean when you say, transformation of man?

K: To free him from his conditioning, from his problems, from his tortures, from his anxieties, despairs and depressions and fears, you know, all the suffering. Have gurus tried this? Or have they said, "Follow this, you will achieve something or other"?

B: Well, they have claimed that they can free you from this kind of thing. They say, "Come to me, follow me, do what I say, I can remove all your suffering".

K: Wait. That means accept authority. You reject authority educationally here, and you accept authority there. I don't know if I am explaining myself.

A: That happens. But we ought to try and look at what comes about when you begin from the other way on, which is starting with the person you have in front of you.

K: Can we cultivate the human mind harmoniously?

C: I am not quite sure what you mean when you say, cultivate it harmoniously.

K: What I mean by that is not only jobs and careers and all that, but also his mind, the way he thinks, his attitudes, all that. The two streams go together, the outer as well as the inner. Or must they everlastingly be kept apart? Or is there such a thing as the outer and the inner? I don't know if you see?

A: Yes. Perhaps it is going a bit fast, Krishnaji. If we can see that the outer is the passing exams, and preparing for a career.

K: Career and living a life of constant struggle.

A: What relation does that have to an education based on care, affection, psychological understanding, etc., the things we have mentioned?

K: Can these two go together?

A: Are they, yes.

K: That's what I am asking. Or this division is artificial.

A: Is it?

K: The outer and the inner. Or there is no such thing as division, but it is a constant moving, outer and inner? I don't know if I am making myself clear.

D: I think a little more. I am not quite sure what you are talking about.

K: We have divided life as the outer and the inner. The inner is more complex, more difficult to understand, and so we have given much more emphasis to the outer. The outer is physical security, physical well being. I am not saying that that shouldn't be. Physical comforts, the whole commercialism, production, you know, all that is going on in the present world, with their terror, with their tortures, with their wars, everything; that's the outer. And the inner is, beliefs, rituals, gods, the saviours, the gurus, the hope that some day there will be some kind of peace in one's life. So we have these two.

B: Is that part of the inner life of a student?

K: The student is only what, when he comes to you? He is conditioned by his parents, by the society, the culture he has lived in, and he comes to you and he is career minded, examinations, job. That's all. It is only very rare that a student says, "Sir, there is something more than this, please tell me what there is." Like the other day the boy asked, "All right, take it for granted you must have a career, but that's not the end of everything".

So are these two divisions artificial, man-made? The one is very complex. Apparently very complex, put it that way. The other is fairly systematized, one wants security, physical security and so that has been the urge right through history, that there must be physical security first. Feed me and we will think about god afterwards! And there are the others who say, "Think of god, be with him and everything will come right. Believe in the saviour and your life will be made easy." So we have kept these two, you know, almost in water tight compartments. Would you agree to that, would you say it is so?

B: One of them we talk about much more, and the other is...

K: ...rather shy making.

B: Yes.

K: And rather, one doesn't want to expose oneself too much, so you say "Please, let's not go into that, let's concentrate on this".

A: Which is what we have done. We are doing it more and more.

K: Which is what we have done, yes. So I am just asking: is this division emphasized by education, as it is now? Sustained by acquiring superficial knowledge, and keeping the other in a cupboard, occasionally looking at it when an emotional crisis arises and you try to solve it, but that's hidden, secret.

So I am asking are these two streams, one very, very strong, all men are concerned with the one stream and so have given an enormous volume of water to it energy; and the other practically neglected. Even the most religious person is concerned not with the ending of fear, sorrow and all the rest of it, but believing in god, practising certain rituals and hoping thereby to achieve a state of mind, or giving him some kind of peace. You see what is happening? Now I am asking: can these two streams be brought together? Surely that's the purpose of education, not to keep them apart.

B: Why do you see it as necessary to bring these two streams together?

K: That's also my life, the suffering, the agony, the doubt, the guilt, the hurts, you know, all that is part of my life. Why do you give importance only to this?

B: But the two are not really separate because...

K: That's right, the two are not separate but we have made them separate.

A: So doesn't that imply that we need to concentrate on the other one, quite considerably, no?

K: No. One should be educated in both fields.

A: But the other one is already so strong, you see. It tends to dominate the other.

K: So, what will you do? If the educators were concerned and felt tremendous responsibility that the two must be brought together, I doubt if they want it personally, if they do then what shall we do together? As a group of teachers, as a group of educators, what shall we do together? The cultivation of the human mind is not only in the technological world but also in the so-called psychological and if one may use the word, the spiritual world also. And probably the organized religious people say, "That's what we are trying to do".

B: Well, that's what they say but...

K: No, they would say that. Therefore one has to go into the whole question of what is religion. Are beliefs religion, rituals, propagated after two thousand years, religion?

A: Well that is what is understood as religion normally. I think you would have to contrast that concept of religion, or that statement about religion.

K: You have to counter it, you have to find out whether it is accurate or false, or invented by the priests.

A: So you are introducing another element which is really some kind of psychological enquiry, or...

K: ...revolution.

A: ...or discussion among people as to what is the nature of things.

K: Yes. What is the nature of the psyche? What is the nature of a total human being, as it is now? And whether that total human being can be transformed, can be changed? After all you have a student who comes to you, ignorant in the mathematical system, or whatever it is, and you educate him so that he has a different mind at the end of ten years. He is either a mathematician, an engineer or physicist and so on and so on. He will take enormous trouble to do that, through schools, colleges, universities, that is what we are doing.

B: Then we must take enormous trouble too to do the other.

K: The other, now who will do it? You see, who will feel the responsibility, say, "Look, we must do this too."

B: Well as a teacher I see the responsibility, the necessity for doing that, but I know my subject and I can teach my subject but I don't know the other myself very well.

K: Yes. So what shall we do? If you see the importance of both, how will you enquire into the human existence, as it is, and whether it can be transformed, whether it can be changed? I should have thought that is education, not merely cram the student with a lot of facts about this or that, but also how to live without problems, without suffering, without fear, without the agonies they go through.

E: So you need to start paying attention to your actual life.

K: Yes.

E: One day after the other, as well as going to classes.

K: So as an educator can you do that? If the educator is not living that, is not himself involved in understanding his own life and he gets up and talks about the other, and the students obviously spot you as being rather shady. Question it, why has man denied the other side, or neglected it, or not be concerned about it, why?

D: One problem seems to be that we don't really know how to look at something for ourselves. We have always learnt mathematics, someone has told me how to do this or that, and when I am faced with the situation where I have to look at something, and nobody has told me how to look, I am lost.

K: Is that the question, is that the problem sir? Just a minute. I not quite sure that is the problem.

A: It is also where to look.

K: No, it is not that. Why has he neglected this, the other side of man, the hidden side of man?

C: Earning a living has become tremendously important, it seems the most important thing.

K: That is security. We will call that physical security. And he is asking, "Give me psychological security and I will go after it". Rather, "Educate me to find total security psychologically and then I will accept it". Is that it? He is seeking physical security, all human beings are in one form or another. And if you assure man that there is also security inwardly then he might pay attention to it. So I am asking, is the whole pursuit of man to be completely secure in both areas?

C: I don't like to do something unless I know what is going to happen.

K: Yes, secure. Surety. Give me assurity, a sense of feeling safe, protected, and I will pursue that. They have done that, haven't they? Believe in Jesus, believe in certain forms of religions and you will be safe. If you don't believe you will go to hell. Now, of course, nobody believes that kind of nonsense. So that is what I am asking: is man seeking security in both areas?

B: Not just physical security but also security in relationships.

K: Yes, security in relationships so that I will never be disturbed, security not to be disturbed, not to have fears, completely safe. In this field he is demanding it, in the physical field, in the other also he is demanding it, and so he has created the churches, the gods, the whole religious structure, with their fanciful, romantic mysticism, all that. Is that what man is seeking? And therefore if you, as an educator say, I will give you security there, completely, in your relationships you will be safe, you will have no psychological problems, you will have no fear, no anxiety, no guilt, no sense of being hurt, you will understand death and so on, then he will follow that.

B: Can we really do that for them?

K: Ah, that's what I am asking.

B: Is it possible to have complete security?

K: I think so.

C: Then aren't you offering me the same thing?

K: No. I am not. First of all I question the whole urge, structure of security. Is there security in this field, in the field of technology, in the field of career, in the field of jobs and so on and so on, is there security there?

B: There is a kind of security but it brings with it its own dangers.

K: Its own problems, its own mess, which is not security. Security means to be perfectly safe. Right? Perfectly protected, not disturbed, say, "I have a job and nothing is going to happen". No wars, because the moment there is war I am lost.

C: Whether nobody is going to take my job from me.

K: But we want it there, and we are not finding it there. Governments change, inflation, every form of dishonesty. So I am asking: when we say we want security, is there such a thing at all? As long as we call ourselves Englishmen, Frenchmen, you know, keep it isolated, keep ourselves isolated as divisions, nations and so on, races, we are not secure. What do you say to that? Because I want to be secure as an Englishman, if I am an Englishman, or an Indian, or a Japanese, or whatever it is, I want to be secure in my job, you know, physically.

A: The solutions that are sought also tend to be bigger but of a similar kind. For instance, like a European parliament, or a European nation.

K: In the meantime, when that comes into being, in the meantime I go through agony, fears, uncertainty. There are millions of unemployed.

A: I would like to get back to the question of the teacher in a school meeting a student who is the product of the society but who is not aware that he is the product of the society.

K: So I have to help him not to be a product of the society.

A: Or show him he is a product of society.

K: He is, obviously.

A: He probably doesn't see that.

K: He doesn't. As an educator it is my responsibility. That he is the result of his father and whole generations past, with their particular form of society handed down through tradition.

A: And also the present society with its own violence etc.

K: So he comes conditioned and the teacher comes conditioned - right?

A: So they are both conditioned.

K: Both conditioned. At present not realizing both are conditioned, it is the blind leading the blind.

A: If one realizes he is conditioned he is only partly blind.

K: Partly. But being partly blind isn't...

A: Isn't much good!

B: What makes us insecure?

K: Division. Division of people into races, classes, nationalities, I am a Jew, you are an Arab. This division.

B: Well we seem to encourage this division. In schools there is competition.

K: Naturally sir, because each person is concerned with his own security. That security is through small groups, large groups, identifying with one country against another, which eventually breeds wars. We never say, "Look, we are one human race, for god's sake let's all work together and create a different world."

E: So trying to find one's own security makes everyone insecure.

K: Obviously. Look at what is happening. The politician wants to be secure in his position.

Sir, we are just asking, as educators, what shall we do, or what is our responsibility when we see how grotesque it has all become. It is like developing a right arm and neglecting the left arm, which is withering, which is ultimately going to be destroyed, the whole human being. So if you see both arms must be developed, strengthened and work together, what shall we do? Would you ask that question: what shall we do if you saw the importance that the inward as well as the outer much move together?

A: I would certainly bring some deliberate attention to bear on it, spend some time with it, talk about it, even understanding it imperfectly myself because of the crucial nature of it.

K: Can you do that, sir? Will you in a class give half of your time? Half an hour for mathematics and half an hour talking over the other? Discussing, having a dialogue, pointing out the importance of both?

B: Or rather than separating them out like that, as you talk about the mathematics you are also looking at your responses to it, how the other is moving at the same time.

K: No, I am saying something more than that. Will you in your class, or whatever you are doing as an educator give time to this?

C: Isn't it rather artificial to divide the class into half for the subject and half for the other?

K: It may be artificial. How will you do it? Will you do it at lunch time?

C: Well surely as Harsh suggested by the very working together at a subject you are also working together with the relationship of the student and you. It is not just working on a subject.

K: That means you have established a relationship with the student.

C: Yes.

K: Have you a relationship with the student? That means relationship being concerned about his dress, the way he walks, the way he talks, the language he uses, cultivating his taste, manners, politeness, the whole of it. Help him to be free, help him to be free from fear and so on. Are we doing this? Which means the educator must also be enquiring himself. Or is this all so vague and uncertain and doubtful when the educator himself is conditioned to one way of life?

What would you do sirs if you had children of your own? After all the students are your children. What would you do actually?

BROCKWOOD PARK 23RD JUNE 1979 3RD CONVERSATION WITH 5 TEACHERS

A: I was wondering if we could consider perhaps the time span in which a student is in a school like Brockwood, say a time span of about four years, beginning at 14 and perhaps leaving at 18, and how this relates to what we were saying the other day about wanting success and some form of achievement related to psychological security, and what the interrelationship is.

K: Are you saying what is the relationship between the student and the educator when they both realize, or the educator points it out to the student that they both are conditioned - conditioned being according to their ecological, cultural, economic, racial, and all that kind of conditioning - what is the relationship between the student and the educator when they both realize that they are conditioned? Is that what you are saying?

A: That's the question.

K: What is the relationship when you and I, I the student, you the teacher, realize that we are both conditioned, and we have a short period, a period of four or five years...

A: ...in which to work it out.

K: ...in which to work it out. Now

B: Is this something that we work out over a period of time, bit by bit?

K: I doubt it. That's what I want to get at. I question whether time has any importance in this investigation.

A: We had better say what we mean about time then, because it is obvious that the student is here for a span of time.

K: A span of time being from fourteen to eighteen. Four years, or five years. Or if you have a longer period from fourteen to twenty and so on. No, I would like to question, or ask, what is the relationship between the educator and the person to be educated - educated in quotes - what is the relationship between the two? Not theoretically but actually. What is your relationship as a teacher to the student, with the student when you and he realize that both are conditioned? What is the quality of relationship? And then we can discuss whether time is necessary, a longer time or a shorter time and so on. I think that is an important thing to find out. What is one's relationship when two people realize that they are conditioned - may be conditioned culturally differently, but essentially, deeply conditioned.

B: These people are also interested in living a life that's...

K: They say, is it possible - no, before I say, is it possible, I want to find out what is the relationship between you and me when we realize that we are conditioned?

C: I am not sure I quite understand the question, when you say: what is the relationship?

K: Before our relationship was, a teacher talking down to the student, informing him, not about himself, about the subject which he is teaching. But here we are asking, apart from that, because we are concerned with the total development of a human being. That's what we began with. And we asked, what is the relationship when two people realize that they are conditioned - realize, not verbally but actually? And this conditioning keeps people apart. You understand my question?

C: If I am conditioned as the teacher then I can't actually help.

K: Not as a teacher but as a human being you are conditioned. And so is the other human being, what is the relationship between you two?

C: We are both the same, surely.

K: Yes, but I said when you realize.

B: From that point onwards you can begin to work together.

K: Yes, not only work together, but before we work together what takes place, emotionally, intellectually and all the rest of it, when you and I realize that we are both conditioned?

B: First I lose my fear of you.

K: Yes. And also - go a little deeper. What takes place between us?

D: It seems somehow or other that our images of each other are broken down.

K: No. We don't react as we did before. Would that be right?

E: You really start listening to the other person a bit.

K: We are beginning to listen to each other. There is...

C: Is that because I don't feel superior to you?

K: No, we both are in the same boat. We both are conditioned. You realize - realize, you understand, not just verbally have understood what the conditioning is intellectually means, but actually realize that you are conditioned, and another also realizes equally, then what takes place? Our reactions don't carry us away.

A: I think that in that particular relationship that is so. But the difficulty arises when one realizes he is conditioned...

K: ...and the other doesn't. But we are helping the student and ourselves to realize that we are conditioned. Let us put it this way: part of our conditioning is to react instantly. Right?

A: To whatever happens.

K: To whatever happens, to your words, to your gesture, to your language. Our conditioning is part of our self-centredness. And when you and I realize we are so terribly self-centred, then what takes place? It is obvious. No?

A: I am not sure it is so obvious. Are you suggesting that there is nothing left to achieve?

K: Look sir, you and I have to live in the same house. And you and I realize that we are self-centred. That is our deep abiding conditioning. You are self-centred and so am I. And we both realize it. Both have to live in the same room, same house. What takes place? What is the difficulty?

E: You have to be very careful because this hardly ever actually happens.

K: That's what I am going to establish with the student. I want him to realize, I want to help him to realize that he is conditioned. And in explaining what conditioning is I realize also that I am conditioned. Obviously. Unless I am dull, or anything, I realize the same thing. So we are both together in this. He is conditioned and his activities are self-centred, so is that of another. Right? So what takes place in this actual realization of two people?

B: What happens then in the relationship is no longer from the conditioning.

K: No, it is conditioned, but go on, sir, investigate.

D: It is a problem.

K: It is a problem which has to be resolved.

A: But surely it is the communication which is now the important thing, not the...

K: Yes, communication. Now how do I communicate to you and how do you communicate to me from our self-centred point of view?

A: Is there any communication?

K: There isn't any. There is superficial communication. Right? So what takes place? If you realize and I realize, what takes place?

A: We, as it were, create the possibility of illuminating this self-centredness.

K: That means what? What is our relationship?

A: Well it is one of equality.

K: What is our relationship actually?

C: Surely we both want to understand and discover together then.

K: A little more than that. Go into it. What is our relationship?

B: Then we can deal with each other with affection.

K: Go on, sir, look at it. You are conditioned, I am conditioned. And we established a relationship of mutual conditioning.

B: So we both know we are that.

K: So what is that relationship, what has taken place in that relationship?

B: We have seen something together.

K: That is, we are removing the barriers between you and me. Right? We are removing the division, this self-centredness. Right? You are helping me, and I am helping you - not helping - we are watching each other in order not to be self-centred. That is part of our conditioning. Can the educator convey this to the student and feel the responsibility of this exchange?

C: But if we said the two are equal, why is it the educator conveying to the student?

K: No, the student is not so clear as you are.

C: But doesn't that mean...

K: Clarity. I see more clearly than you do. It is not I am superior or inferior. You have more knowledge about mathematics than I have. But if mathematics are used to gain a status, then there is a difference between you and me. No?

A: That is true in that field, and it is quite clear. But the conditioning may also suggest to me that the suggestion of being conditioned is a similar factor to being a mathematics teacher.

K: Let's forget for the moment conditioning. What is the relationship between the teacher and the student? What is the relationship, actual relationship, apart from teaching a particular subject? Have you any relationship with your students?

A: Some of them.

K: What? Apart from the subject. Now what is that relationship when you realize the fact that you and he are both conditioned, both self-centred - forgive me if I use the word 'you', it's not personal - what is the relationship there?

D: Part of it seems to be that we are able to work as mirrors for each other. The student is talking to me and I am able to...

K: Are you doing that now? One has realized that you and I are both self-centred, and do we see our conditioning in our relationship?

A: Taking place in the relationship?

K: Yes. And it is only through the understanding of this conditioning in relationship there is the possibility of real communication. Communication can only exist when there is no division, when you can both share something together.

C: It seems as though we see this sometimes but now always.

K: No, the question of 'sometimes' and 'not always' is - if I may point out - irrelevant. What is relevant is, what takes place in this relationship with the student and with the teacher when they both realize they are in the same self-centred area, field? You are not answering my question. Probably you haven't thought about this. This is what is happening in Brockwood. So what then is the relationship between you and the students here?

A: One level of it is like this: I can see such and such a person is conditioned in such a way because of his cultural background - Indian. He is conditioned in a certain way, and another is conditioned in another way. I can see the elements of that, and what has brought about that picture. He may have been educated in a special way but nevertheless when he arrives the whole culture is there with him. So I can see that. And I see that...

K: Now wait a minute. When you see the conditioning in him, how the condition has been brought about do you see at the same time how that very same conditioning exists in you?

A: I see another form of conditioning.

K: But it is still conditioning.

A: It is still conditioning.

K: That's all my point.

A: But it works out that seemingly these conditionings have affinities. For instance, although we are an international school here, it is very frequent to find that the Americans go to the Americans, the English go to the English, the Germans go to the Germans, the Indonesians go to Indonesians. So their similarity draws them together. In that sense their conditioning is not equal.

K: We said conditioning is not merely the superficial manners, colour, but we went much deeper into conditioning, which is self-centredness. The desire for success.

A: And the tribal.

K: And the tribal. We went into that. We haven't tackled this problem.

E: When you are talking about conditioning to somebody, it doesn't seem to be their conditioning or your conditioning, you can look at theirs or yours at the same time.

K: At the same time.

E: It is exactly the same thing.

K: Then when you both see the same thing then what is our relationship? Our relationship has undergone a great change.

A: I am stuck on this point of actually seeing the conditioning as being the same. I can see it as being equal.

K: Yes, all right, equal.

A: But being identical.

K: Wait, sir. The Indian from India, the American, the Russian, the Englishman or French - the western, eastern and far west, their common factor is they all want success. Right? Obviously.

A: Yes.

K: Now the goddess of success has many, many faces. But the central factor is success.

A: Self continuance.

K: You might seek success as a lawyer, and another seeks success in being a carpenter, or a politician, or whatever it is.

A: How do we distinguish that from interest?

K: Interest?

A: Yes. Because that is also one of our objectives in a school like this is to help the student find an interest which will sustain him through life.

K: Is that the central factor of life, interest? He might be interested - he might say, "I am really interested in wanting to be a surgeon, that what I want to devote my life" - is that interest the central factor of life? Or is it something much greater than interest?

A: I am suggesting that the real interest is...

K: I am not suggesting anything.

A: It seems necessary to have this interest also.

K: The interest may be awakened by the social demand. Society says, you must be an engineer because you get more money.

A: But there may be a talent there also.

K: Oh yes, talent. But we are talking of interest. I say, is that the central factor of life, interest? Or ambition to achieve something? I think interest can vary, diminish, sometimes enormous interest, but it is rather feeble.

A: It is partial certainly.

K: We are trying to get at, aren't we, what is the common factor between two people who realize they are caught in the same trap? I want to move away from conditioning.

A: Well they can either...

K: If they realize they are in a trap they help each other to break the trap.

A: But seeing the contour of the trap, to see the nature of the trap is...

K: No, but if you realize you are in a trap, and that causes a great deal of pain both physically and psychologically, and another realizes it, and you two have to live in the same house, what takes place? We are helping each other to break down the trap. And the intensity of that trap, and the pain of it, is making us very active.

A: Outwardly, you mean?

K: Inwardly also.

A: Would you say this is responsible for the agitation of thought, generally?

K: Probably. So one's relationship with another is, when one realizes, the activity of relationship in which each one is helping the other to break down, to undo the trap.

C: So part of that relationship is trusting another person and not feeling afraid of them.

K: Which means what? How will you trust another if one is afraid of them? How can I trust you if I am afraid of you? If you are competing with me for the same job, or for the same whatever it is, how can I trust you? I can only trust when there is mutual responsibility about certain things.

C: But we both have to see that.

K: That's what I am saying. Do we at Brockwood, it comes down to that, help the student to see that he is conditioned, and the teacher is also conditioned, not climatically, dark brown or black or pale, but also psychologically in the sense we are both conditioned to act from a self-centred interest. If we both see it there is a definite change in our relationship, in the relationship between these two people. I think that is very important in a school of this kind.

C: I still wonder what happens if we don't both see it?

K: Therefore it is my responsibility. If you see it, it is your responsibility for me to see it.

A: Are you saying that this will become the dissolving agent which will do away with the particular conditioning? For instance, an English mentality will tend to be puritanical in some respect, either puritanical or in rebellion against that, so it has that kind of trap, kind of seized up emotionally. Or a Jewish mentality could be legalistic, for instance, and see things in those terms. And this come through in the students, the conditioning shows itself, these different aspects of the mentality. So we are suggesting now that if we meet at this common and deeper level then that will throw light on the particular conditioning rather than starting from the other way round.

K: Through the particular you can find out the whole.

A: Right. We are suggesting, or at least you are suggesting that that's not the best way to proceed but rather the other way round. Is it helpful then to point out to a student the particular conditioning?

K: No. You see, sir, I am not sure whether a collection of details, a collection of particulars is going to help to perceive the whole conditioning, or to understand the nature of conditioning, the structure of conditioning, the climatic, the food, the religion, the prejudices, the family, you follow, the whole cultural and environmental conditioning. That's why personally I would look at the principle of it rather than the details of it.

D: But in point of fact that is how we attempt to do things here, try to see the particulars first.

K: I know.

D: And all the time it makes the person more conditioned.

K: That's why when we were discussing the other day, whether they want a room where they could be quiet, silent, they began to discuss in details. I said, please, if you don't mind, first find out if you want a room like that, a quiet room. If you do that is the principle from which you can work it out. In the same way, can we work this out? That we are, as human beings, wherever we live, we are conditioned by the society, culture, religion of that particular country, or group, or community. And part of that conditioning is ambition, which expresses itself in the desire for success. Success implies security. Right? And so each one is seeking his own personal security. Right? All that is taking place in the world. Or there is the totalitarian concept, the state must be the great success, of which we control it. You know, the whole business of that.

So can we help the student to understand the nature of this conditioning as success. I am only taking that as an example.

B: We are taking that as an example because we are interested not just in that particular conditioning but we want to know what the whole nature of conditioning is.

K: Like looking at one particular conditioning we may discover the whole nature of conditioning. I don't know. Right, sir.

A: One particular conditioning being...

K: Say, success, for instance. Or take anything. We will take success because that is what most human beings want. Which when you succeed you have money, position, status, freedom - that is 'freedom' in quotes, and so on. You are respected. So why has success become so important in man's life. We said, in our previous dialogue, security. Right? It does give security. If I am a first-class fiddler, violist, I am a tremendous success. If I am mediocre or not so good I become just part of the orchestra. Even in the orchestra there is competition, the left hand man, the violist is more important than the other fellow. So success is part of our life.

B: Does success really bring security? Or do we have the idea that it will bring security?

K: I does in certain ways. Look at all the politicians, they struggle, they campaign, they make all kinds of silly things, all this goes on because they want to be a success, as Prime Minister, or member of Parliament, or whatever it is.

B: But even if you get to the top of whatever you are striving for, it is still shaky, you may fall down any time.

K: The more you strive for success, and the higher you get, nearer to god, in one direction - the popes, the bishops, the archbishops, the whole hierarchical structure of religious people. And on the other side the politicians and the businessman, in every direction it is there. Now what is wrong with success?

B: That's what I am trying to say: it doesn't bring you real security. It may bring you physical security, or you may feel wanted, or above everyone, or something like that, but at the end...

K: There is tremendous pleasure in being successful.

B: Yes.

C: There is, but there is also the fear that that success won't last.

K: It is a tremendous thing to feel, I have succeeded. And you thrive on that.

A: You fulfil your ambitions.

K: That is just it. And you are doing the same, we are all doing the same.

A: So we are fulfilling ourselves through some particular role.

K: And therefore opposed to each other.

A: Do we see that?

K: If you and I are trying to fulfil our ambitions through that particular channel, you are better than me, I begin to be jealous of you, I begin to be nasty about you. You follow. There is division, obviously, conflict between us.

A: One might put that down to market factors. For instance, the government wanted a lot of teachers at one time, so anybody who trained could be a teacher, they weren't so much in competition with one another. But nowadays there are not many jobs.

K: Because of overpopulation, you know, all the rest of it.

A: So we are saying that is a market factor.

K: I understand all that, sir. But we are trying to find out whether that conditioning which in certain ways is so destructive in our human relationship - right, we agree to that? If you and I are married, or husband and wife, and I am ambitious in one way, and you are ambitious in another, there is no relationship between us. This is so obvious, isn't it?

B: Yes.

A: Even if one is ambitious at all.

K: That is just the point.

B: People are willing to put their relationships second to success.

K: That's just it. That means, self-centred activity is more important than relationship.

C: And the whole point about success is that it seems to be at the expense of other people.

K: Of course, naturally. So can we, as educators, convey all this to the student, not verbally, but actually make him realize these things. How dangerous it is.

B: That this is the nature of success, this is what it would lead to.

K: Division, no relationship. If there is a relationship, perpetual wrangle - you don't love me, I love you - all that kind of thing that goes on. And each one pursuing his own self interest. How can you have any kind of relationship, or love in this?

D: And also the added factor that if you do become successful and you have that pursuing pleasure you don't want to lose that.

K: And the wife supports you, and says, "Go on", because she gets reflected glory from you.

B: But we are saying, Krishnaji, that we want to look at success merely as an example of conditioning, because you just don't want to understand success and put only success away.

K: No, but I see the factor, or I realize what brings about division between people.

A: I can observe it in the world also which is quite a fertile field, speaking as a teacher. I can observe it in the world as take the map of history, or take the map of current events.

K: You can see it, sir, you can see it.

A: In newspapers too.

K: It is not only individual success but also it is collective success, national success.

E: It is really quite obvious that if somebody succeeds somebody else fails. So somebody feels good about somebody else's suffering.

K: Of course. So do we as a group of educators see the nature of this: that where there is division there is no relationship. If there is a division between the student and the educator you are educating only about your particular subject. Here you are saying it is different. Here we are actually bringing about a relationship with the student which is not divisive, which has a quality of affection, love and all the rest of it.

D: That is what we are attempting to do, but whether we are actually doing that.

K: We are not doing it - there is no attempt, either you sink or swim. Sorry!

A: You can swim more or less badly. But you are still swimming.

K: Sir, what is our responsibility in all this? The parents send their children here. First of all, if I was a parent and I sent my children here I would want them to live a life that is whole, complete, not partial. Right? And I say to you, as educators, here are my two children, please help them to live that way, not only at Brockwood but right through life.

E: It is quite clear after what we have been talking about. We have to go into the conditioning with them as if it really is the most important thing.

K: It is the most important thing. Therefore I am asking you, how will you deal with my children - if I have children - how will you deal with them, what is your responsibility? They come conditioned, and the teacher is conditioned, how will you help each other to be free of this terrible trap that man has invented for himself? That's our problem. That's why we said at the beginning of this dialogue, the last two dialogues, what is our actual relationship, is it that of a teacher who is merely concerned with the subject, or he is concerned not only with the subject but the whole way of living, his thinking, his feelings, his sorrows, his ambitions, all that. Are we concerned with all that or not?

B: That's what we set out the school for.

K: I agree. That was why the school existed. So are we doing it? So that is why I am asking, what is our responsibility?

E: It is difficult to say if we are doing it when we are actually in the middle of it. But if you ask whether I would like my child to come here, or to another school, I think I would like her to come here because we are trying to do it more than other schools that I know of. Even if we are not doing it as much as we could.

K: But that is not good enough - more is not good enough.

E: I know, but I am trying to say what I actually feel.

K: I know, a little more is not good enough.

B: Even in answering this question by saying we are trying to do it, aren't we again talking about success?

K: Yes.

B: Are we succeeding?

K: That's why I said, come back to the point: what is our relationship, responsibility in this relationship? If we don't feel responsible in the sense that we are concerned totally with the whole development of the student, not subjects only, then is it possible for both of us to share that responsibility, the student and ourselves, so that we are all working together for the same end. Do you follow?

C: I think why we feel hesitant is perhaps that some people are trying to do this and others are not, or maybe one person won't listen, and then you feel that you are not doing it.

K: If you are doing it, and you feel great responsibility in the doing of it, what happens to another who is rather weak about it.

B: He is either strengthened, or sometimes he leaves.

K: You burn him out, or burn him in. I don't know.

A: There are also those who slide out, Krishnaji.

K: Sling them out too.

A: Psychologically, I mean.

K: Yes.

A: I was going to say, is the task not something like this, which is: to bring about a different mode of seeing things.

K: Yes, a different way of looking, observing, a way of learning, not merely accumulating knowledge, learning, the activity of learning, the mind that wants to learn.

A: And so therefore this would not be held within the time frame of fourteen to twenty.

K: That's right. I mean, sir, take an example: do the students know what love is? The care of love?

E: I wouldn't just ask whether the students know what love is.

K: As an educator do I know it? Or is it all emotional, romantic, physical, sensuous? Which at present it is. So how am I to convey all this to the student? And I feel terribly responsible. Which means first I must help them to listen to what I have to say.

A: Surely wouldn't that come later in a sense, after you had established a way of seeing together, moving together.

K: But that is only possible if I listen to you. It is only possible that we move together, walk together, on the same road, if I listen to you first.

A: So that is all involved: seeing, listening.

K: Yes. First I must listen to what you have to say.

E: But you are only going to listen to me if I feel fairly passionately and strongly about what I am trying to convey.

K: Yes.

A: Are you saying that love is in that listening?

K: Yes. If I love you then I listen to you, whether you tell me I am a fool or not, I listen to you.

A: Well what is the relationship of love to silence then?

K: Oh, that we are going off.

A: I am sorry.

C: I think when you say listening, I think we ought to explore a bit more about what listening means. I mean I can listen to someone who I believe in without necessarily involving love.

K: I listen. I want to tell you something: I say, human beings are very self-centred. I want to tell you that. Will you listen? Or you say, yes, I know that. That's nothing new what you are telling me. Which means that you are really actually not listening to what the other fellow is saying.

C: So by listening you are saying it is not judging whether it is right or wrong, just holding it.

K: Just listen. Listening implies, doesn't it, a certain quality of attention. No? And if I want to listen to Tchaikovsky, or someone or other, I must attend.

C: Sir, I think listening has become something that people don't do: like you put the record player on and work and you do something else.

K: No, no. I am only talking about listening. If I can learn the art of listening I would solve a great many problems.

How do you help the student to listen to mathematics? He is not interested in it. He wants to do something else while you are talking, explaining the problem. And how do you see that he really listens to what you are saying?

A: Well I might talk to him about what he is doing instead of listening.

K: Sir, just look at it. If you are passionately involved - not verbally - wholly involved in what you are saying your very passion makes me listen to you.

C: So that shows him the importance.

K: I mean if you are interested in history, and history is the story of man, anyhow, you say, look, man is you, you are the history of mankind, obviously. And you find out, not merely who was the king, this and all the rest of it, wars, but the story of man which is essentially the story of you. And I am interested, I am passionate about it so he listens to me.

A: I think he listens when he gets that point, which is that it is the history of himself.

K: Yes.

A: But when he makes that link then...

K: Yes, that is what I am saying because I am interested in what you are pointing out. History is the story of yourself - the violence, the hatred, the whole thing.

A: That is the inner content of history.

K: Yes, but what I am trying to say is, to help him to listen, that is what I am concerned about.

E: It isn't a matter of how to listen.

K: Listen.

E: It just comes out of the way you are doing things.

K: Yes.

B: To help him to listen you must listen to him carefully.

K: Of course. Naturally. It implies both. Can we do this here? I can't listen - one can't listen if I am prejudiced, if I have a certain point of view I stick to it, I can't listen to you. You may be contradicting the point of view and so I won't listen. But if you say, look let's listen, find out why you hold on to a particular point of view, let's find out. I am interested. I may be holding it, my own opinions may be very strong, I may consciously, or unconsciously be holding on to them. By talking to you I am discovering.

A: Similarly with inattention, and the other things.

K: Of course. It seems to me I have talked all the time.

B: Krishnaji, it seems we keep coming round again and again and we start talking about success and seeing how dangerous it is. We could start talking about nationalism, or many, many things. But is there a central thing?

K: Oh, yes, there is. I don't think we have time to go into that now. Let's stop.

Sir you raised a question, what was it, silence and?

A: Silence and love.

K: Oh, yes.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST CONVERSATION WITH BUDDHIST SCHOLARS 28TH JUNE 1979 'TRUTH'

N: Mr. Feroz Meta is a scientist and has written a book about a couple of years ago, 'The Heart of Religion', which was very well received. He came here last year once and he also knows Dr Rahula, who was here for last year's discussion.

K: Begin, sir.

R: Why don't you speak one word first?

K: What am I to say? I don't know. We all join in?

R: Sir, I want to ask you one thing today. You see we all talk of truth, absolute truth, ultimate truth; and seeing it and realizing it; always we talk about it. And of course in Buddhism, according to Buddha's teachings, these are very important central points, that is the essence really. And Buddha says there is only one truth, there is no second. It is clearly mentioned. But this is never defined in positive terms. That is, this truth is equated also with Nirvana. It is equated. And sometimes the word 'truth' is used in place of Nirvana, ultimate truth, absolute truth.

And then Nirvana is never defined; except mostly in negative terms. If it is described in positive terms it is mostly metaphorically, as a symbol, symbolic way. And there is a very beautiful Mahayana Sutra; of course when I use the word 'Mahayana' you all understand, I think, there was the original authentic teaching of the Buddha known as 'Theravada', that is the tradition of the elders. Then about the first century B.C., round about that period, Mahayana, which is a later development, began to grow, free interpretation of the teaching of the Buddha. There is a very beautiful Sutra written, of course it is a late work all students, followers, accept, called (.....) that is the teaching of the Bodhisatva. There is an assembly in this house of the Bodhisatvas, disciples and like this great assembly. There in that assembly the question was put: "What is non-duality?" That is, non-duality is another word for the absolute truth, or Nirvana. It is in Sanskrit called advida.

K: Adwaita, in Sanskrit, yes.

R: No, adwaita is different from advida. In Buddhism, in Buddhist terminology advida means, neither existence nor non-existence, Buddha says: "The world is duality", that means, either is or is not, either exist or does not exist, either right or wrong, that is advita, according to Buddhist teaching. That is Buddha says the world is depending on this... But the Buddha teaches without falling into this... that...

And the question was put, "What is advida?" And there are 32 definitions, why Bodhisatvas, disciples there is a long list, 32. Then... is the leading figure in this story, they said: "Sir, it is not our opinion, but we want to know your opinion." And then Sutra says, it is very interesting,... answered the question with a thundering silence.

K: Quite.

R: If you speak it is not duality. And I was asked in Oxford by a professor when I gave a series of lectures, "Can you formulate this non-duality or truth?" I say the moment you formulate, that is not non-duality; that becomes duality the moment you formulate it.

So, just as they asked..., I ask you today: what is truth, what is absolute truth, what is ultimate truth and what is that non-duality as you see it? Tell us. It is a challenge.

K: They're all looking at us.

R: Yes. Rather, looking at you.

K: At us, sir. Do you think, sir, there is a difference between reality and truth? And is truth measurable by words? And if we could distinguish between what is reality and what is truth, then perhaps we could penetrate more deeply into this question.

What is reality? The very word res, means 'things', thing. What is the thing? Could we say that everything that thought has created is reality - including the illusions, the gods, the various mantras, rituals, the whole movement of thought, what it has brought about in the world, the cathedrals, the temples, the mosques, and their content? That is reality like the microphone - it's made by thought, it is there, actual. But nature is not created by thought. It exists. But we human beings have used nature to produce things, like our houses, chairs, and so on and so on.

R: You mean to say, nature of things. Nature of things.

K: Nature.

R: Nature, yes,

K: The beauty of the earth, the rivers, the waters, the seas, the trees, the heavens, the stars, and the flowing winds, and all that.

R: And why not the beauty of this thing?

K: Oh, there is a beauty in this.

R: That's right.

K: But we were saying, I mean, a beautiful cathedral, a beautiful poem, a lovely picture, are all the result of thought. So could we say then that anything that thought has created, brought about, put together, is reality?

M: Sir, when you speak of the beauty of the object, are you including their quality of beauty as reality, or the object itself, the beauty may be some other quality.

K: The object itself could be beautiful or one can attribute beauty to the thing which may not be beautiful in itself.

M: So it's the idea of the beauty of that object that you are including in this category.

K: Yes. Both. Yes. So could we do that, sir. That reality, including the illusions it has created, as well as the material things it has created through technological knowledge and so on, so on, all that is reality.

R: Yes. May I add a little to that? That is, reality - I should say, I am explaining to you the Buddhist attitude about this problem - according to Buddhist thought, Buddhas's teaching, there is relative truth or reality.

K: Don't let's use the truth and reality, just...

R: Yes, let us say reality, reality is relative.

K: Of course.

R: And absolute. What you say is fully accepted, that is the reality.

K: That is, everything that thought has created is reality.

R: Reality.

K: The dreams...

R: Reality, even the dreams.

K: ...dreams, all the sensory and sensuous responses.

R: Yes.

K: All the technological world of knowledge, all the things that thought has put together as literature, poem, painting, illusions, gods, symbols - all that is reality. Would you accept that, sir?

F: Yes, but this word reality has its denotation; its first meaning as well as its connotation.

K: Yes.

F: And through the centuries people have tended to talk of reality more in terms of one of its connotations of ultimate reality.

K: I know, but I would like to separate the two - truth and reality. Otherwise we mix our terms all the time.

F: That is true.

S: Are you also, excuse me, are you also including nature in reality?

K: No.

S: No. Right.

K: No. That tree is not created by thought. But out of that tree man can produce chairs and so on.

S: Yes. Is there then a third category of things, which is neither truth nor reality? Or are you calling nature...

K: Nature is not created by thought.

S: No.

K: The tiger, the elephant, the deer. The gazelle that flies along, that obviously is not created by thought.

R: That means, you don't take the tree as a reality.

K: I take it as a reality, of course it's a reality, but it's not created by thought.

R: That's true. Then do you mean to say, only things created by thought, you include in reality.

K: Yes.

R: Of course that is your own definition.

K: No, I'm trying to be clear that we understand so as not to get involved in these two terms, truth and reality.

R: Yes, I can understand, yes, leave the word truth for another purpose and let us...

K: Not another purpose, let us look at reality - what is reality? The world is reality.

R: Yes.

K: These lamps are reality. You sitting there, this person sitting there, are realities. The illusions that one has are an actual reality.

M: But sir, the people sitting there are not created by thought.

K: No.

M: So could we more or less define another category for living creatures, nature, trees, animals, people?

K: A human being is not created by thought.

M: No.

K: But what he creates...

M: Yes. So the reality category of which you are speaking is man-made, in a sense.

K: Man-made. Like war is a reality. You're a bit hesitant about this.

F: Could we regard all that is apprehended through the senses, and then interpreted by the brain as reality.

K: That's right, sir.

S: At one time we made a distinction, in talking, between reality, which was anything that was created by the mind, and actuality, which is anything that could be captured by the mind, anything which existed in time and space.

K: Yes.

S: And then there was truth. Now, reality was part of actuality.

In other words, the tree was an actuality not a reality.

K: Why do you want to separate...

S: Otherwise it becomes very confusing, because if we say, look, you and I, as people, we are not created by thought, so we're not reality.

K: You want to separate actuality, reality and truth. Is that it?

S: Well I just offer that as a convenient definition of words that we used before.

K: Would we say the actual is what is happening now?

F: Yes, that's a good way of putting it. The point which arises there is that, are we capable of apprehending the totality of what is happening now. We apprehend only a portion of it.

K: Yes, but that's a different point, we can go into that. But what is actually happening, what is happening is actual. That's all. Not whether we understand, comprehend the whole of it or part of it and so on. What is happening is the actual.

F: Yes. That is the fact.

K: That is a fact.

F: Yes.

K: So, what do you say to all this, sirs?

R: I am still hesitating, I'm waiting to see more.

K: So can a mind see the actual, incompletely or completely, that's not the point for the moment. And whether the mind can apprehend or perceive or observe or see that from reality you cannot go to truth.

SS: That's quite a big jump, probably.

K: Sir, could we put it this way too. As you pointed out, sir, that all the sensory responses are the beginning of thought.

F: Yes.

K: And thought, with all its complex movements, is what is happening now when we're talking.

F: Yes.

K: And what is happening is the actual, and the interpretation or the understanding of what is happening depends on thought. All that, including illusions and the whole business of it, is reality.

F: Yes, that is so.

K: Then if we agree or accept that for the moment; then the question arises: can the mind, which is the network of all the senses, actualities and so on, can that apprehend, see, observe what is truth?

F: Provided the mind can be free of all its conditioning.

K: I'll come to that a little later. But that's the problem. To find out what absolute truth is, thought must be understood - the whole movement and the nature of thought must have been gone into, observed. And has its relative place, and so the mind then becomes absolutely still and perhaps out of that, in that stillness, truth is perceived, which is not to be measured by words.

F: Yes, there I'd agree, completely, fully.

R: Yes, I agree with that.

K: Now, this are the two - isn't it. A human being is caught in the movement of thought. And this movement projects what is truth.

F: This is the mistake that man makes.

K: Of course. He projects from this to that, hoping to find what is truth. Or projects what he thinks is truth. And the truth can be put in different words - God. Brahman it is called in India, or Nirvana, or moksha, you know, all that business. So our question is then, sir, can the mind cease to measure?

F: That is to say, the mind as it functions at present in each one of us as an individual.

K: As human beings.

F: As human beings.

K: Measurement is our whole educational environmental, social conditioning.

F: Yes.

K: Would you agree?

R: Yes.

K: Then what is measurement?

F: Limitation.

K: No. What is measurement, to measure? I measure a piece of cloth, or measure the height of the house, measure the distance from here to a certain place and so on. Measurement means comparison. Right? I'm going on talking, I don't know why you all don't join in.

SS: Well, there's also psychological measurement in all this.

K: Yes, there is physical measurement and psychological measurement. One measures oneself, psychologically against somebody.

F: Yes.

K: And so there is this constant measurement of comparison, both externally and inwardly. Right? I'm giving a lecture - what's the idea?

R: Well, I put the question to you.

K: Yes, sir.

R: As they put the question to..., I put the question to you.

K: What is the question?

R: What is non-duality? What is truth?

K: No.

R: You are explaining.

K: As long as thought is measuring there must be duality.

R: Absolutely, that is a fact. That is so.

K: Now, how has this conditioning come about? You understand, sir? Otherwise we can't move away from this to that. How has this constant measurement, comparison imitation - you know, the whole movement of measurement, why has man been caught in it?

R: The whole measurement is based on self - self, the use of measuring is done...

K: Yes, but how has it come? Why have human beings, wherever they live, why are they conditioned through this measurement. I want, one wants to find out what is the source of this measurement. You follow, sir?

F: Yes, yes.

SS: Part of it seems to be the fruit of observation, because you observe the duality of life in terms of night and day, man, woman, the change of seasons and this kind of thing, which is a certain kind of contrast, there's a certain contrast apparent.

K: You're saying...

SS: So it may seem a natural step to say that there's therefore a kind of contrast or comparison which is applicable in man's own life.

K: There's darkness, light, thunder and silence.

P: It seems the thought needs a static point to measure, and itself is moving constantly, and in a state of continuous flux or movement, it can't measure, so it creates a static point which is immovable, which is taken as the centre of the self. From there only you can measure.

K: Yes, sir. I mean, the very word 'better', 'greater', in the English language, is measurement.

F: Measurement, yes, certainly, measurement.

K: So the language itself is involved in measurement. Now, one has to find out, shouldn't one, I'm just asking, what is the source of this measurement, why has man employed this, or as a means of living? You follow my question, sir?

F: Yes. Yes.

K: One sees night and day, high mountain, low valleys, the tall man, short man, woman, man, child, old age - physically there are all these states of measurement. There is also psychological measurement, that's what I'm talking about, much more than the mere physical movement of distance and so on. Why has man been held in this measurement?

SS: Probably he thinks it's the way forward, to some extent, because, if you're a farmer and you plant to crop in a certain way, and you get this kind of result, the next year you plant in a different way, and you get that better result.

K: Yes, so it is time.

SS: It's time.

K: Go on, sir, a bit more. Time.

SS: It includes the ability to reflect, to have experience, to reflect on experience, to produce something better out of that experience in terms of probably an established notion of what is, you know what is the good, what is the better thing to have, or what is the right situation of things.

K: That is, of course, but I want to go a little further than that. Which is, why has man used time as a means of progress? I'm talking psychologically, not time which is necessary to learn a language, time is necessary to develop a certain technology and so on.

P: Perhaps the need of security of thought for itself.

K: No, time, which is measurement.

F: Do you think that our tendency is, that starting with the facts, the physical facts of difference, in size, in quantity, and so forth...

K: That's what I want to get at.

F: ...we apply that analogically to the psychological process also.

K: Yes. Or, without measurement there would have been no technology.

F: That's true.

K: Sir, I don't know if you...

N: As in science and mathematics, as it progresses, measurement becomes more and more refined, and each refinement in measurement leads to a further step of progress, computers.

K: We're not saying that, we're not denying that.

N: In one sense, measurement and refinement of measurement, do lead to a certain kind of progress, in science and technology.

K: Of course, we said that.

R: But we are not talking of physical measurement so much as psychological measurement.

K: Yes. Why has man used psychological time as a means of self growth, self aggrandisement, he calls it 'getting better', getting more noble, achieving enlightenment? All that implies time.

N: Is it, as Metah says, carried over from the day to day living of measurement signs, to the psychological field? Is it carried over, or does it exist in the psychological field without reference to this?

K: That's what we're discussing. Whether there is any psychological evolution at all.

S: Could we say that we began to apply measurement to the psychological field, one out of habit, because that's what we've been using for the physical field, but also could we have made that transfer because it's very comfortable to think...

K: Of course, sir.

S: ...that I might be in a mess now but later I'll be fine.

K: Let's be clear on this. At the technological, physical level, we need time. We need time to acquire a language, time to build a house, time to go from here to there, or time as a developing technology, science, we need time there. So let's be clear on that. So I'm asking something else. We're asking something else, which is, do we need time at all psychologically?

SN: What is it that creates time?

K: Thought, thought is time.

SN: Doesn't thought have something to do with it?

K: Which is what we're saying: time is movement, isn't it. So thought is movement, thought is movement, time is movement from here to there; one is greedy, envious, I need time to be free of it. Physical distance and psychological distance. One is questioning whether that is not an illusion - not the physical distance but the psychological distance. Is there, sir, to put it very succinctly, is there psychologically, tomorrow?

F: Only in terms of anticipation.

K: Ah, in terms, because thought says, "I hope to".

F: And in addition to thought, there is the fact of our physical experience, of day and night, and therefore the words 'tomorrow', 'today'.

K: We said that very clearly. There is yesterday, today and tomorrow; that is a reality, that is a measurement also. But we are asking, is there psychological time at all, or thought has invented time, psychological time, in order to feel that it can achieve or live in some kind of security?

R: What is time?

K: Time, sir, time is movement.

R: Yes. Time is nothing but the unbroken continuity of cause and effect, that is movement.

K: Movement, we said. Cause, effect, effect becomes the cause, and so on, and so on.

R: That is time. We give a word called time for that movement.

K: Yes, which is movement. It's now five minutes past twelve, it's a movement till it reaches one o'clock.

R: Yes, it is a movement.

K: It's a movement.

R: Movement of cause and effect, continuous.

K: Yes, that's one aspect of time. And also the aspect of time which is from here, physical distance. I have to go to London and it takes time to get there.

R: Yes, that is another conception of time.

K: Another time. We are looking at the various facets of time.

R: Yes, another time.

M: Sir, would you say that thought in itself implies time, because the action...

K: Of course.

M: ...of the mind consulting thought, going through the thought process takes, even if it's a very quick, short amount of time, it is still time.

K: Surely, because thought is response of memory, memory is time.

M: Then one has to...

K: Yes, memory is time. Right sir?

F: Yes.

K: So please don't go back and forth. Let's stick to one thing, which is, is there physical time, yesterday, today and tomorrow. Time as movement.

F: What we call chronological time.

K: Chronological time. Let's call that chronological time. Time also as from distance. Time also to put for the cause, effect - acorn, tree. To climb a mountain, time. So we are saying, time, physically exists.

F: Yes.

K: Right sir? Physically. The baby grows into man and so on. So time is necessary, time exists. That's an actuality, that is a reality. We are questioning whether psychologically there is time at all. Or thought has invented time as a means of either achieving security, or, it is lazy to completely transform itself.

F: Immediately.

K: Immediately. So it says, "Give me time". Give me time to be strong psychologically.

F: Strong in mind.

K: Strong, psychologically strong. Psychologically give me time so that I get rid of my anger, my jealousy or whatever it is, and I'll be free of it. So he's using time as a means of achieving something psychologically.

M: But then one must ask you about the use of the word 'psychological' in this instance because if a thought process is involved and we just said time is implicit in thought, how can you be without thought psychologically?

K: We are coming to that.

M: Or is the psychological realm in this discussion outside of thought, part of thought, or could be either one?

K: Isn't the whole psyche put together by thought?

SS: There seems to be a question here, whether it is or not.

K: I'm asking sir, go slow. Isn't the whole psyche the 'me'?

SS: Is that the psyche?

K: Isn't it, part of that, the 'me' - what I think, what I want, what I don't want, what I wish, I wish, and so on, the whole movement, self-centred movement of the 'me' is put together by thought.

M: If that is so, then how would it be possible for there not to be time involved in any psychological movement?

K: We're going to go into that. I want first to be clear that our questions are understood.

N: Would you make a distinction, sir, between hope and aspiration, because many people say to aspire is something noble, but hoping is...

K: Aspiring is time.

N: Yes, there is time, but...

K: Hoping is also, yes.

N: But in aspiration there seems to be the idea of something very right.

K: I aspire to become god - it's so silly.

N: In the whole religious world there is aspiration. Would you say that?

R: Of course religious traditions, there is aspiration, always. What we discuss is, I think the point is whether you can see truth without thinking or time, whether seeing truth is now, this moment, or whether you postpone it till you become better.

K: Ah no.

R: That is the question.

K: That is, the moment you introduce the word better...

R: That is what I say.

K: Of course.

R: That is what I say, that is, the other question arises. Now the question is, it is true, you see it now.

K: No, we have't come to truth yet. I am very careful, sir, I don't want to enter the world of truth yet. One wants to be clear that one's thinking, either is logical, sane, rational, or it comes to a conclusion which is illusory. And so one wants to examine this whole nature of time, psychologically. That's all I'm talking about. If there is no tomorrow psychologically our whole action is different. But psychologically we say, tomorrow is important, tomorrow I will do this, tomorrow I hope to change, psychologically. I'm questioning that, because all our aspirations, hope, everything is based on the future, which is time.

F: Yes.

N: You would say then, any aspiration, however noble it is, is in the field of reality.

K: In the field of thought, yes.

F: Yes, because it is a formulation.

K: Formulation, by thought.

F: Exactly. So would I be right in saying you are concerned with being free of the time factor totally, in psychological terms.

K: Yes, sir. Otherwise I am caught, our mind is living always in a circle.

F: Yes, that is true. We are tied to the past, to that which has become fossilised.

K: Yes, so the past modifying the present and going off. This past modifying itself into the future is time. So when one says, "I will be better", "I will understand" or "I will try", all these are involved in time. So I question that, whether it's merely an invention of thought for its own - whatever reason we can go into, and so it is illusory, and so there is no tomorrow.

F: In psychological terms.

K: Of course, we said that very clearly. So if one is envious, which is a sensory response, and therefore thought has created this envy. Now we say, generally we say, give me time to be free of that envy.

F: Yes, provided we perceive that this is envy.

K: Oh, yes, I'm envious, you've a bigger house, better dressed, you've more money, all the rest of it, everybody perceived this envy, this jealousy, this antagonism. So is it possible, being envious, to be free of it instantly, and not allow time to intervene? That is the whole point.

F: Isn't the envy, the psychical reaction to what is perceived through the senses?

K: Yes, that's right.

F: And are not the sense functionings...

K: ...actual.

F: Yes, they are. Determined by actual physical conditions?

K: Yes, obviously.

F: So psychical reaction follows the sensuous activity. And that involves the pleasure/pain drive within us.

K: Obviously. One sees you driving in a big lovely car. And I'm driving a small car, so there is comparison.

F: Yes. The comparison arises surely, partially through what others have put before us, that this is better than that.

K: Than that.

F: This is more pleasant or this is less pleasant.

K: That begins from childhood.

F: So we get into the psychological habit.

K: That begins in childhood.

F: Yes.

K: You are not as good as your brother, in examinations and the whole education system is based on this comparative evaluation of one's capacities. Now we're going, you see, we're moving away from...

R: Yes.

S: Yes, sir, didn't we just come to the fact that anything that is involved in measurement and thought cannot get rid of measurement and thought.

K: First it must realize the actuality of it. Not say "Yes, I've understood it"

S: Does it realize that with thought?

K: No.

S: So then what is the...

K: Wait, we're coming to that, slowly, wait. Do we see that we've used time psychologically and so that psychological usage of time is an illusion. First I want to see, we must be clear on that point - I will reach heaven. I will become enlightened. I will eventually through various series of lives, or one life, achieve Nirvana, Moksha, all this. All that is psychological time. We are questioning whether that thing is an illusion. If it is an illusion it is part of thought.

S: Right. Now we can't, we don't use thought in order to see all this.

K: No. Wait. Do we understand even verbally...

S: Even with thought?

K: With thought. Communication now is, between us, through words. Those words have been accumulated and so on, and we both of us speak, apparently for the moment we speak both of us in English, we understand the meaning. Now do we see - see not through argument, through explanation, through rationalization, that thought has created this psychological time as a means of achieving something.

M: So we can see that still within the thought process, still within the realm of thought.

K: Now wait.

M: Is that the seeing you're talking about?

K: No, I'm coming to that. I'm coming to that slowly, I want to lead up to it, otherwise it won't be clear. Am I all right, we are following each other, sir, or not?

R: I am following.

K: Is this accurate, sir?

R: That I can't say still. Still I can't tell you. Because I don't know where we are going.

K: I don't know where I'm going either, but this is a fact.

R: Yes, yes. That's right. That is, I am watching.

N: I think there's also some difficulty in apprehending what you're saying, because there is maturity and growth in nature, through time.

K: We've been through that, Narayan. Don't go back to it.

N: I'm not going back to it, but unconsciously you're identified with it. Is there maturity and growth in human beings, through time? There is some kind of maturity through time.

K: We said that.

N: Yes, so one gets stuck to it.

K: One holds on, is attached to this idea of time as self-improvement, not only physically but psychologically.

N: I don't even say 'self-improvement', maturity.

K: No.

N: A kind of natural growth, natural, comparing yourself with nature, as you see all over.

K: Yes, but therefore, wait, what do you mean by maturity? We may have different meanings to that word, to mature. A tree is mature at a certain age, a human being physically is mature at a certain age. And mature cheese!

N: Yes, the whole, the fruit from the bud.

K: Yes, the fruit is matured to be picked. And so on. But is there psychological maturity at all? That's my whole point.

P: Perhaps there is a factor of life, intellectual maturity which is mental level and...

K: Yes, sir, I agreed You're going...

M: Within the illusory world, psychologically there is a certain maturity, but it's still founded on thought and time.

K: Yes, but I'm just asking, Maria, do we understand clearly, even verbally, and so intellectually, that we have used time as a psychological catalyst to bring about change? Right?

R: That is...

K: And I'm questioning that catalyst.

F: May I enquire, sir: what precisely do you mean when you say, "Do we see that psychological time is an illusion", what do you mean by the word 'see'?

K: See, I mean by that word 'see', observe without the interference of thought.

F: That means, to be completely conscious, to be completely aware of time being an illusion as a fact.

K: Yes, to see this is like I see a snake, and I don't mistake it for a rope.

F: No. So you would agree that that involves - would you agree, that that involves a complete transformation of your mode of awareness, your consciousness? When you're really conscious of something, you don't have to...

K: Now wait a minute. Again, sir, the word 'consciousness' and 'conscious'...

F: Those are difficult words.

K: Those are difficult words. I see this, can I see this and not call it a microphone.

F: Yes.

K: Not call it, but see the shape, just to observe without any reflection.

F: Quite, without naming it.

K: Naming it all the rest of it.

F: Analysing.

K: Analysing it.

F: In other words, to see is a whole seeing...

K: Seeing.

F: ...almost in the sense of your being what you see.

K: No, no. That becomes then a duality, you become that. No.

F: You don't become that in the sense that you are merged into it. But you are awake in terms of a unitary whole.

K: Just a minute, sir. These again are rather difficult words.

R: I don't think that is what he means. No.

K: Sir, to observe implies - first let's look at it as it is generally understood - to observe a tree, I name it.

F: Yes.

K: I like it or don't like it. And so on, so on. But we mean by observation, seeing; is it to listen first and not make an abstraction of it into idea, and then the idea the sees. I wonder if you see?

R: Yes, yes.

K: Say for instance - I said a little earlier that psychologically there is no time, psychological time is the invention of thought, and may be an illusion. Now to listen to that without interpreting it, what do you mean, rationalizing it, or saying, "I don't understand", "I do understand", just to listen to that statement and not make an idea of it, but just to listen. As one listen that way in the same way observe, see. What do you say, sir?

R: I want to ask you what are you trying to tell us?

K: I'm trying to say, sir, that truth cannot possibly be perceived, seen, through time.

R: Right.

K: Wait a minute, you can't agree.

R: Not agree, I see it. That is why I was waiting to ask you what are you trying to say.

K: I'm trying to say that - I'm not trying, I'm saying.

R: Yes, of course. What you want to say.

K: Sorry. I'm saying that man through comparison with the outer world has created a psychological time as a means of achieving a desired rewarding end.

R: I agree.

K: No, do you see that as a fact - fact in the sense it's so.

S: Is the facility of the mind that sees that, the same facility that sees truth?

K: Look, Scott, first you listen, don't you, to that statement.

S: Yes.

K: How do you listen to that statement?

S: Well, at first I just listen.

K: You listen. Do you make an idea of it?

S: Often, later, yes.

K: No. It's a simultaneous process going on. You listen and you get an idea of it and the idea is not the actual observation. That's all I'm saying.

S: But if there is that...

K: No, this is, sir, from Greeks and the Hindus, all our whole structure is based on ideas. And we are saying, idea is not actual happening, which is the actual listening.

F: The idea is just a picture of the actual listening.

K: Yes. Which is an evasion, an avoidance of actual observation.

F: Of the immediate fact.

K: Yes, looking or listening.

SS: Then there may be something which we are evading constantly.

R: Yes.

SS: I would like to suggest that, as we've been talking about thought, and the various things which it has devised in order to create some kind of freedom or liberation or salvation or redemption, that there may be some driving factor which is part of thought, or there may be a driving factor which accounts for this, which may be sorrow.

K: Yes, sir, escape from pain through reward.

SS: It seems to apply to the most sophisticated and the more primitive civilizations, all of them.

K: Obviously. Because all our thinking is based on these two principles, reward and punishment. Our reward is enlightenment,

God, Nirvana or whatever you like to call it, away from anxiety, guilt, all the pain of existence, you know, all the misery of it all.

F: Is it not possible to be free from the idea of reward or punishment?

K: That's what I'm saying. As long as our minds are thinking in terms of reward and punishment, that is time.

F: How is it that our minds think that way?

K: Because we're educated that way.

F: Yes, true.

K: We are conditioned from childhood, from the time of the Greeks in the West, because there measurement was important, otherwise you couldn't have got all this technological knowledge.

F: And would you say that this is due to the fact that we are tied to the idea of a separate 'me', a separate 'I'. Supposing one sees, hears, touches, etc., all in terms of a wholeness, an awareness of wholeness.

K: You can't be aware of the wholeness, unless you have understood - not you, sir - unless one has understood the movement of thought.

F: Thought.

K: Because thought is in itself limited.

F: Yes, of course, which means the intrusion of the self-consciousness as a separate something.

K: Yes.

F: Otherwise it won't be there.

K: Sir, how did this self separative consciousness come into being?

F: Conditioning in the first instance.

K: It's so obvious.

F: I, you, me.

K: Of course, measurement.

F: Measurement, exactly. And that analogically inevitably gets transferred to the realm of the psyche, the realm of the mind...

K: Of course.

F: ...or whatever it is.

K: So we come to this point, you make a statement that psychological time has been used by man as a means of achieving his reward. It's so obvious. And that reward is away from the pain which he's had. So we are saying, this search for reward or the achievement of the reward, is a movement of time. And is there such a thing at all? We have invented it, it may be illusion. And from this illusion I can't go to reality - I mean to truth. So the mind must be totally, completely free of this movement of measurement. Is that possible?

F: As a short answer, I would simply say yes.

K: Yes. Either you say yes as a logical conclusion, or a speculative assertion, or a desire, concept, or it is so.

F: Yes, an 'of-courseness', is there. If there is a sense of 'of-courseness' of course it is so, then there is...

K: Then I assume it is so, but I go on the rest of my life moving in the other direction.

F: If one really sees...

K: Ah, that's what we are saying.

F: ...then one doesn't go in the other direction.

K: So that's what we're saying, do we see it, or is it, we think we see it.

F: Quite.

M: Can we go back for a moment? You said you observe, you hear the statement, you observe it. Actually what does the mind do in that observation?

K: Please, if I can put it this way: please don't accept what one is saying but let's find out. Observation in the sense implies a seeing without naming, without measuring, without a motive, without an end. Obviously that is actually seeing. The word 'idea' from the Greek, the word itself means to observe.

M: But, sir, we would probably all agree with that. And what is acting at that moment? It is a kind of logic, I think, in most people.

K: No.

M: It seems very evident what you've said.

K: Observation implies silence and not forming any conclusion, just to observe silently, without any psychological or sensory response except either visual or inward, insight without the responses of memory.

R: Without any value judgement.

K: Yes.

F: Would you say, sir, that implies without any reaction from the brain or the senses or...

K: Yes, sir, that. Wait, that's dangerous thing to bring in the brain. Because then we have to go into the whole question of, you know, I don't want to go into the question of 'brain' for the moment. It implies that, that means, thought is absolutely quiet in observation.

F: Scientists, for example, who have really new remarkable inspirations, or again great artists when they create wonderful things, this happens when everything is quiet inside, which allows this new to emerge, the new, the truly new, the pulse of creation.

K: Yes, sir, but that insight is partial. The scientist's insight or perception is partial.

F: Partial, yes. That is to say, the formulation of that insight.

K: Ah, his insight is not only formulation but the very fact of his insight, because insight implies a whole transformation of his daily life, it isn't just, I'm a scientist and I have an insight into mathematics, into matter, into the atom. Insight implies the way the man lives as a whole.

R: That is perfectly so.

F: And any insight is a particular manifestation rooted in the background of the whole.

K: Ah, no, we go off into something. I won't accept, sorry, not I wouldn't accept, it's rather, confusing, that. Sir, let us talk a little bit about insight, or seeing. Insight implies an observation in which there is no remembrance of things past, therefore the mind is alert, free from all the elements and so on, just to observe. Only then you have an insight. But that insight of which we are talking about, implies, his whole life, not as a scientist, as an artist. They have partial insight.

R: That is only a small fragment.

K: Fragment of insight, but that's not what we're talking. So it comes to this.

R: And what we talk of is whole existence.

K: Of course, man's existence.

R: Existence, yes.

F: So in that state of observation which you're talking of, there is no reaction whatsoever.

K: Of course, obviously. It isn't cause/effect reaction.

F: Quite. It's free of causality.

K: Of course, obviously, otherwise we are back in the old cause being a motive and so on.

R: And that seeing is beyond time. It is beyond time, that seeing is not limited or caught in time.

R: It is not limited, or thought in time.

K: And that insight is not involved in time.

R: That's right. And naturally it is neither cause or effect.

K: Yes. But, wait a minute. Have you, not you, sir, have we got this insight into - wait, just a minute, let me finish - into this psychological invention of time by thought, as achieving some result? Have got insight, do you see it, or it is just at a verbal, ideological level?

R: Or whether it is a fact.

K: No.

R: That psychological time necessary for seeing.

K: No, Sir. We went into this question. Man has invented time, psychologically, to achieve a desired end, purpose, reward. Does one see this as an idea, or it is so? It's so obvious it is so. Then how is man - this is the point - how is man, a human being, to totally move away from that, totally transform this whole concept of idea, of time? I say it's only possible when you have an insight into this whole thing, which doesn't involve effort, which doesn't involve concentration, all that. This is real meditation.

F: In fact, it just happens.

K: It's real meditation.

R: Indeed.

S: Sir, there is a dilemma which I think many people find themselves in when they listen to that, which is that in order to have this insight...

K: Ah, you can't have it.

S: Well, in order for this insight to occur, there must be an insight into thought. And it seems like it's...

K: No.

S: ...somewhat of a closed circle.

K: No. We went into this, sir. Thought, as we said, is response of memory, memory is knowledge, experience, and so from the past, thought is moving.

S: Yes.

K: But always from the past, it is not free from the past ever.

S: And we said that there must be a seeing, an observing...

K: Seeing.

S: ...without...

K: Seeing that.

S: Right. Now we can't see that with thought, we must see...

K: Wait, no, don't say that. I said just now - I've forgotten, sorry.

S: We were saying that there must be a seeing, an observing, which is an insight...

K: ...into thought.

S: ...into thought.

K: Wait, just hold it. Now, thought is the response of memory. Memory, stored up in the brain, through experience, and that has become knowledge.

S: Yes.

K: So knowledge is always the past. And from that thought arises. This is irrefutable, I mean, this is so.

S: Yes.

K: Now is this an idea or an actuality which you yourself have perceived: that you yourself see that ascent of man through knowledge is not so? Man can only ascend perhaps technologically, but psychologically, if he continues with the accumulation of knowledge, he's caught in the trap. Do you see that? Or do you make it into an idea and say, "What do you mean by it?", and so on.

S: But, sir, just to see that, I must be free.

K: No, observe, you first listened.

S: Yes.

K: Listening without analysis, without interpretation, without like or dislike, just listen. And if you so listen you have absorbed it, absorbed the fact that thought is the response of memory. Then you can proceed. Then can thought ever free itself from its mother, from its roots, from its source? Obviously not.

SS: But thought can be aware of its own activity.

K: Of course, we went through all that.

M: Sir, would you say that if insight comes into being at that moment, that then that insight doesn't fall back into the thought mechanism.

K: Oh no, of course not. Say, for instance, you have an insight and you act. Now let's be clear. Insight means action, instantly, not have an insight and later act. That very insight implies action. And you act. And that action is always right, right being accurate, precise, without any regret, without any effort, without any reward or punishment, it is so.

SS: That action is not necessarily doing anything, though. It may be non-action in terms of doing things externally.

K: You may have to, both externally and inwardly. If I have an insight into attachment, attachment to ideas, attachment to conclusions, attachment to persons, attachment to my - you follow? - knowledge, experience. If I have an insight into that, the whole thing is abandoned.

R: And may I put it, sir, in another way - I don't know whether you agree - to see this illusion, to see this illusion.

K: Yes. But one must be sure that it is an illusion.

R: Whether you call it illusion or whatever name you give to it, to see...

K: 'What is'.

R: 'What is'.

K: That's all.

R: Yes, see 'what is'. Don't give a term.

K: No, to see 'what is'.

R: To see 'what is' is to see the truth.

K: No, no, you see. you're bringing in truth - I'm not yet ready for that.

R: I want to get it, before one o'clock! I don't want to postpone it, but your main thesis is, don't put in time.

K: Yes, I've said, just now, at one o'clock.

R: No, no, not at one, yes. To see 'what is' as it is, is to see the truth. That's what I would like to put, to cut it short.

K: Sir.

R: And truth is not away from...

K: I don't know what it is.

R: That is what I tell you, to see.

K: I don't know what it means to see. You have told me what it means to see, but I may not see. I may think I see.

R: Yes, then you are not seeing.

K: I must be very clear that I am not thinking I'm seeing.

R: No.

K: Sir, my whole life is that - I think I see.

R: It is different from seeing.

K: You say so, but ordinary persons say, I see, yes. Which is, I think I see what you're saying. But I may not see actually 'what is'. I think I see 'what is'.

S: Krishnaji, could I, this might be a simple question but, you say that the ordinary person says, "I see, I see what you're saying," but in fact he doesn't.

K: Yes.

S: It's just mentally that he see something, or intellectually. Could we say, what is going to bring about for the ordinary person this correct seeing, this seeing without thought?

K: I explained, sir, I explained it. First I must listen.

S: Yes.

K: Ah, do we listen or we've all kinds of conclusions, so filled, full of our minds, that it isn't capable of listening. You see me, you say, "He's an Indian, what the heck get rid of him, he knows nothing". Or you say, "Well, he's considered a person," this or that. You don't actually listen.

S: Well, then the question is, I would just change the terminology, what could bring about that correct listening?

K: It has been said through suffering. It is nonsense. It has been said, make effort. Which is nonsense. You listen when somebody says, "I love you." Don't you? So can you, the same thing, listen to what you think is unpleasant.

So, sir, now come back to this question of truth. Do we have a discussion this afternoon?

M: I believe it was said 3.30, we'd meet.

K: 3.30. All right. Can we then pursue truth?

R: Yes. No. I don't want to wait for truth. (laughter)

K: You want it all in five minutes, sir?

R: Not even five minutes.

K: One minute?

R: One minute. If you can't do it in one minute, you can't do it in five hours.

K: I quite agree. All right, sir, in one second. Truth is not perceivable through time. Truth doesn't exist when the self is there. Truth doesn't come into existence if thought in any direction is moving. Truth, thought, is something that cannot be measured - measured.

R: Truth.

K: I said truth. And without love, without compassion, with its own intelligence, truth cannot be.

R: Yes, now again you have given it in negative terms, in the real, tradition of the Buddha. Yes.

K: You see, you know what you have done, sir, look. You have translated into terms of tradition, therefore - forgive me for pointing out, I'm not being impudent - you've moved away from the actual listening of this.

R: I listened, I listened very well.

K: Then you've captured the perfume of it.

R: Yes, and I captured the perfume of what you said. And that is why I wanted to have it in one minute.

K: So, sir. What then is the relationship of truth to reality? Be careful. I mean, are these two everlastingly divided?

R: No.

K: No, no.

R: No, I don't hesitate, I am not hesitating like that. They are not divided.

K: How do you know?

R: I know it.

K: No, sir. They are not divided. Now what do you mean by that, sir?

R: That is what I said, to see.

K: No, just a minute, sir. Truth and reality, they are not divided. That means, thought and truth, are always together. No? If they are not divided, if something is not divorced, separated, they are together, a unitary movement. Thought...

R: Not thought.

K: Wait, reality, that's why I went into it, sir. Reality is everything that thought has put together. We are all agreed that is so. We may use the word, terminology, the word 'reality' as something else, I don't care, but for the present we are saying, reality is all the things that thought has put together including illusion and truth, is nothing whatsoever to do with this, it can't. And therefore the two cannot be together.

R: To see, that illusion, or whatever it may be, to see 'what is', is to see the truth. 'What is' is the truth. 'What is' is the truth. There is no truth apart from that. 'What is' is the truth.

K: No, sir.

R: That is, 'what is' is the truth.

K: Sir...

R: What is not is untrue.

K: No, we said reality is the movement of thought. Right, sir? And truth is timeless. Truth is timeless, it's not your truth, my truth, his truth - it is something beyond time. Thought is of time, the two cannot run together, that's what I'm...

R: What I said is, there are no two.

K: Sir.

R: That is again duality, again you are dividing.

K: No, I'm not. I'm pointing out, sir - I may be mistaken but I'm just pointing out, that thought has created such illusion, and so many deceptions it has brought about, and it may deceive itself by saying, "Yes, I've seen the truth." Therefore I must be very clear, there must be clarity that there is no deception whatsoever. And I'm saying that deception exists, will inevitably exist if I don't understand the nature of reality.

We can continue this, sir, after lunch.

R: I would like to take this afternoon another question. Because there will be no end to this question.

K: Yes, sir, what is the question?

R: The other question we wanted to talk about, whether there is pre-existence, continuity, what people call generally rebirth.

K: Rebirth?

R: Yes.

K: Yes. Shall we do that after lunch, sir? Right.

R: I think here we have come to truth. I don't know whether you...

K: I haven't come to truth, I can't go to truth.

R: No, you see the truth.

K: I don't see the truth. There's a tremendous difference: I can't go to truth, I can't see truth. Truth can only exist, can be, or is only when the self is not.

R: That's right.

K: Let's go and eat, shall we. We'll meet here after lunch, at 3.30.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND CONVERSATION WITH BUDDHIST SCHOLARS 28TH JUNE 1979
'DEATH'

K: Sir, your question was, if there is life after death.

R: May I say a few words about it?

K: Of course, sir.

R: You see, I want to put this question to you because all religions, as far as I know, agree and accept a life after death. Of course Buddhism and Hinduism, they accept not one life but many lives before this birth and after this death. That is Hindu and Buddhist teaching. But as far as I know, Christianity at least accepts one life after death, either in hell or heaven.

K: Yes, sir, Muslims too.

R: Muslims too. I don't know about others very much, but these religions, they accept life after death, I don't know, I think Zoroastrianism accepts it. And of course, except Buddhism, in all those religions there is soul, self, Atman, with this unchanging, everlasting, permanent substance in man which transmigrates or is reincarnated. Buddhism does not accept a self, Atman or soul or ego which is permanent, eternal, everlasting, unchanging. But Buddhism accepts man is composed of five aggregates, physical; and if you put it in brief, as the Buddhist term say, name and form.

K: Name and form.

R: That you use very often. Name and form. That is name means the mental qualities and form is the physical body. But these are all energies according to Buddhism, forces. And according to Buddhism, what you call death is non-functioning of the body.

K: Yes.

R: But that non-functioning of the body does not mean the non-functioning of all other qualities and forces, like desire, will to become, to become more and more and all that. So as long as man is imperfect, that means, if he had not seen the truth. Once one sees the truth, he is perfect and there is no desire for becoming, because there is nothing to become. And when man is imperfect he has always desire, will, as you suggested this morning, time to become more, to become more perfect and things like that.

So rebirth is there for him, because he is not perfect. But whatever it may be according to Buddhism, it is not one unchanging substance that goes on, but it is the cause and effect, just as today Buddha says, every moment we are dead and reborn. And so in Buddhism it is wrong to say reincarnation, because there is nothing to incarnate.

Then transmigration also is not a good term. And we use now rebirth, which is not quite correct. In the Buddhist term it is punarjanman, the Pali, that means, a becoming again, re-becoming, it is called re-becoming, that is, continuity of re-becoming, unbroken continuity, that is the Buddhist attitude. The question is asked, in Buddhism, very often, in the many texts, is it the same person or another one? Answer is, Buddhist traditional and classical answer is, neither he nor another. That is the answer, 'neither he nor another', that is the continuity process, a child is grown up to be a man of fifty, is he the same child or another. It is neither the same child nor another one. In the same way, it is neither he nor another. That is the Buddhist attitude to rebirth.

And now I would like to know what is your attitude and what is your interpretation?

K: Sir, could we take a journey together a little bit?

R: Yes. You mean, you want me to answer or...

K: No, journey together, investigating this thing.

R: Yes.

K: Would you say that all humanity, whether the human being lives in America, Russia, India or Europe, is caught in sorrow, conflict, strife, guilt, great sense of misery, loneliness, unhappiness, confusion; that is the common lot of all men, throughout the world? That is, the consciousness of man - not super-consciousness or some other kind of consciousness, the ordinary consciousness of man is the content of all this. Would you agree, sir?

R: Yes.

K: That man, human being, I won't say man, because there are a lot of girls here too, but human beings, right throughout the world, have the same psychological phenomenon. Outwardly they might differ, tall, short, dark and so on, but psychologically they are greatly similar. So one can say, you are the world. Would you?

F: Entirely.

K: Would you agree to that, sir? You are the world and the world is you. Right, sir? Let's talk about it.

R: Yes. In a sense.

K: Not in a sense, I want to come to it. It is not partially, it is so. You are born in Ceylon, he was born in India, another born in America or in Europe, or including this island, England. Outwardly one's culture, one's tradition, one's climate, food, all that may vary. But inwardly we have the same sense of guilt; guilt, not about something but the feeling of guilt, feeling of anxiety. Right?

R: Yes, rather not guilt, anxiety, I would agree. I would agree anxiety, not guilt, feeling of guilt in a certain form of society.

K: I mean, it's guilt, unless you are insensitive, brutal, one feels guilty. But that's a minor point.

R: Yes.

SS: Perhaps more like guilt in the western tradition.

R: Yes.

SS: And something more like shame in the East, perhaps.

K: In the East they translate it differently.

SS: But the feeling is the same.

K: Karma or their lot and so on. All right, I won't take guilt. Anxiety.

R: Yes, anxiety.

K: Loneliness, despair, various forms of depression, sorrow and fear, these are the common lot of man. That's obvious, I mean. So the the consciousness of human beings is its content. Right? The content is all this. So human beings throughout the world are more or less similar, apart from their physical name and form. Would you agree?

R: Yes.

K: So one can say, not as a verbal statement but as a fact, that we human beings are alike. And so deeply you are me.

R: In similarity.

K: That's what I'm saying. And I am you.

R: Yes, similar.

K: Because each person goes through various forms of hell, tragedies, misfortunes. And so the world, the humanity is one.

Right? Would you agree?

F: Humanity is one.

K: If you see that, accept it, then what is death? Who is it that dies? The name, the form, and also the anxiety, the pain, the sorrow, the misery - does that also die? You're following my point, sir? Can we discuss this a little? That is, to me the world is actually the 'me', it's not just words. I am the world, in the sense I may have different physical contours, physical facial differences and so on, height and colour and so on, but we're not concerned with that. Psychologically we go through extraordinary miseries, tragedies and uglinesses, hurts. So that is the common consciousness of man. Right, sir? That is the stream in which man lives, psychologically. Right?

Then what is it to die? If you really accept that or see it as being real, not imagined or idealistic, but it's a fact. If you accept that fact, then what is death, what is it that dies? The body? The form, the name? The form and the name may be different from you, you are a man, woman and all the rest of it. So that is the common stream in which mankind lives, with occasional spurts of happiness, rare moments of great joy, rare moments of sense of great beauty. But that's part of our common life, this vast stream is going on all the time. Right? It's a great river. Right? Let's discuss, you may disagree completely.

M: Sir, are you saying that in that stream the whole notion which most people share of some individual consciousness is a complete illusion?

K: I think so.

M: Why does mankind have that inevitably.

K: Because it's part of our education, part of our culture, both religiously and worldly, that there is you, you are an individual, you, you know, the whole idea of it. And also the word 'individual' is really misapplied, because individual obviously means one who is indivisible. But we're all broken up. So we can hardly call ourselves individuals.

F: We are fragmented.

K: We are fragmented, fragmented, broken up. So if we see that man's consciousness is the consciousness of the world, the world...

F: ...of all humanity.

K: ...of all humanity, in that vast river which has no beginning, which is still going on, and you and another are part of that stream. I and another die. What happens to all my desires, what happens to all my anxieties, fears, longings, aspirations, the enormous burden of sorrow which I have carried for years - what happens to all that?

F: When the body dies?

K: When the body dies.

F: It comes with the world stream.

K: It is part of that stream.

F: Exactly.

M: It never was yours at all.

K: It's not mine, it's part of that stream, which has manifested itself as K., with his form. Sir, don't, this is very drastic what I'm saying compared to all the religions.

R: Now I am with the question. Now in that stream there is K.

K: Wait! There is no K. That's the whole point. There is only that stream - that stream is made up of desire, anxieties, despair, loneliness, all the travail of mankind. That is the river.

F: As well as their opposites. As well as the opposites of pain and so on.

K: It's part of that river.

F: Part of that river.

K: My pleasure, which lasts for a few days, and then I pursue it, and then I cry if I can't get it, and I'm flattered if I'm rewarded, so it's part of that vast river.

F: Would you say, sir, that that which we call the individual is a misnomer.

K: Not only misnomer...

F: Because of our ignorance.

K: It's not only misnomer, I don't think it exists: because you have a separate name and a bank account, but your consciousness is like somebody else, everybody else.

F: But sir, if we say that it doesn't exist at all, then we would have to say that humanity also doesn't exist.

K: No, I'm going to go into it. So if we see that, if we not only see it logically, reasonably, factually, it is so - you're born in India and I was born in Europe, or in America. We go through the same hell, through the same rat race.

M: So, may one, just to be sure so far, that it's clear - there is nothing apart from that in the human...

K: Wait, I'm coming to that. In that stream, man has invented gods, rituals, the saviours, the Virgin Mary, Krishnas, all that - they are all part of that stream. They've invented these.

M: But apart from the invention, the illusions, is there any other something?

K: Yes, is there anything spiritual.

M: Apart, other than that.

K: Yes. I understand. Is there anything that is not of time.

M: Of the stream.

K: Is there in the stream - you're asking, aren't you? - anything which is not man-made, let's call it for the moment. Is that what you're asking?

M: I'm not sure. If what you mean is, is there something that is not of the stream in the human mind, consciousness, whatever you want to call it.

K: Man has invented that there is something.

M: No, non-invention. Something real.

K: Not in that stream. Not in that river.

M: I'm not asking if there's a something else in the river, I'm asking if there's something else in man except the river.

K: Nothing.

M: Because...

K: No Atman, no soul, no God - nothing. Don't accept it, please.

M: There is enormous implication in that.

K: There is tremendous implication.

M: Because if that were so there would be no end to the stream.

K: That's what... but, no. The man who steps out - I don't want to go further, I want to go slowly, step by step.

If that is so, that we all, all human beings, their common consciousness is this, made up of this vast river. Right, sir? You may not accept this.

R: No, I'm not accepting or rejecting, I am thinking about it, meditating. What Mary said was a very important point.

K: Yes.

R: Then...

K: We'll answer that presently.

R: Yes. Is there no escape from...

K: I'm going to answer it presently - not escape.

R: Or whatever it may be.

K: But we are considering death. So that stream is common to all of us, our consciousness is of that stream.

SS: Are you saying, sir, that thought is common to all of us, because all this is a creation and manifestation of thought.

K: Yes, thought, not only creation of thought but creation of thought which has created illusions.

SS: And the operation of those illusions.

K: And the operation of those illusions - Christian, Buddhist, Muslim, Hindu; British, French, Russian; various ideologies, all that is part of this stream.

F: May I ask, sir, is it a case of thought as it is here with us now, and functions as it does, which has created the illusions, or is it that mind as a universal constituent, as a universal factor, in the process of thinking through what we commonly call the particular person releases these ideas.

K: Let's go a little bit slowly. I want this to be clear, that we are part of that stream.

F: Yes, that is so.

K: And when the body dies, the desires, the anxieties, the tragedies and the misery goes on.

F: Part of the...

K: I die.

F: Yes.

K: And that stream, that river is going on.

F: Yes.

K: Right, sir, or do you reject this? I don't see how you can reject it.

R: No rejection, no acceptance.

K: No, just wait - right?

R: Only waiting for the conclusion.

K: Quite right. So that river manifests itself as K.

R: Not the whole river.

K: The river, which is desire, river is that.

F: One of its manifestations is K.

K: The river manifests, not one of the manifestations.

F: Well then how does...

K: No, sorry. I'll make it a bit clear. The river manifests itself as K. That's agreed.

R: Then river also manifests as R.

K: Also? No. River manifests itself as K. K has certain capacities by tradition, by education and so on to paint, to build a marvellous cathedral. But we're talking psychologically. Look, sir, let's go back to it. The river is that, we agree.

R: I don't know.

K: What do you mean, sir, you don't know?

R: I fully agree that whole humanity without exception...

K: ...is one.

R: All these, what you describe as suffering and all that, is common.

K: Yes.

R: To all humanity.

K: That is...

R: In that sense, all are equal, not all one.

K: No equality or anything. We are of that stream.

R: Yes, that's all right.

K: I am the representative of all mankind. Me. Because I'm of that stream.

R: Well, that I don't know.

N: It's a qualitative thing, qualitatively.

K: What do you mean qualitative?

N: When you say, "I am of that stream", all the qualities of the stream are in me.

K: Yes.

N: That's a qualitative thing.

K: Yes, that's right. All the qualities of that stream.

N: Not that I'm the whole river.

R: Yes.

N: But the drop contains all the qualities of the river.

K: But the river is that.

N: Yes.

K: The river is that.

M: Would it be helpful to use the example of a wave: a wave is no different from the rest of the ocean.

K: Yes.

M: But it manifests as a wave which disappears.

K: If you like to put it that way. But this must be clear. Each one of us is the representative of all mankind, because the representative is of that stream and mankind is of that stream, therefore each one of us is the representative of the whole of that stream.

R: That is better. That's better.

K: Yes, he allows a it. I mean, yes, let's go. That stream manifests itself as K. Or as X, forget K, X. Manifests itself as X. With a form, name, but that stream also has this quality which is, in that stream there is art, there is everything is in there.

R: Not only X, there is Y.

K: Dozens, X, Y, Z.

R: Yes, that's right, that's what I want to make clear.

K: Oh yes, A B C.

R: Yes, begin with the alphabet, that's right.

K: So as long as mankind is in that stream, and one manifestation of that stream leaves the stream, for him he's completely free of that stream.

R: So you are not whole humanity, because if you leave the river, then you leave; whole humanity, then all humanity is away.

K: Just a minute, sir, just a minute. That stream has manifested in X and in that manifestation, if X doesn't free himself completely from this stream, he's back in it.

M: But, sir, this is the moment that the earlier question referred to.

K: I'm coming to that.

M: What is there? You said there was nothing separate from the stream.

K: Wait, wait. I haven't explained it. There is nothing. There is that stream. Right? It manifests itself as A. In that manifestation, with all the education and environmental influences and so on, if that A doesn't step out of that stream, there is no salvation for mankind.

M: Sir, what is there to step out?

K: Leap, finish with your anxieties, sorrow, all the rest of it.

M: But you said there was nothing except the content of the stream.

K: As long as I remain in the stream.

M: What is the 'I'?

K: I is the thing that has manifested itself as A, and A now calls himself individual, which is not factual, which is illusory. But when A dies, he's part of that stream. That's clear.

M: Yes, but if A is composed of the water of the stream...

K: Yes.

M: ...how can the water of the stream step out of the stream?

K: Oh, yes.

P: So there is some logical error in our...

K: In my explanation.

P: Yes. Once you say this, that you are the representative of mankind, humanity, which is the...

K: Is that so or not.

P: Yes.

K: Don't say yes, sir. Aren't you the representative of whole of mankind, psychologically?

R: Yes, indeed, I think that too general and too vague a statement.

K: No, it's not vague. I have made it very clear. That stream is this content of our consciousness, which is agony, pain, desire, strife, all that.

R: That is common to all. In that sense, all humanity are equal or...

K: No, I don't want...

R: All humanity is one in other words.

K: I don't want...

R: But I can't accept your attitude, your position, that I am humanity. No.

K: Of course, if I accept that stream, I'm part of that stream, therefore I am like the rest of humanity.

R: Like the rest.

K: I said that, therefore a representative of all of that stream.

R: That also I accept.

K: That's all I'm saying.

R: But you can't say "I am that stream, whole stream".

K: No, I am that stream.

M: But, sir, maybe we're being literal, but there's a concept in this somewhere of a sort of a container which contains the stream.

K: No, not container, not the ships that carry containers and all that. No, don't bring in containers.

M: What is it that can separate itself from the stream if it is only made up of the water of the stream?

K: Part of that stream is this egotistic concept. That's all.

M: No, but what can separate? How can water divide itself from the ocean.

K: You're missing my whole point.

R: Her point is this. Which is it that steps out of the river. That is the question.

K: Wait. If that is the question, I'll answer it presently, I'll answer it. I'm quite good at this. I'm only joking.

R: Yes. We understand. Yes, as a joke. I hope it will not be a joke.

K: No, sir. It's much too serious. You see, all this implies, when you ask that question, what is it that steps out, you're positing an otherness, something which is not of the stream. Right?

R: Or rather you are positing this.

K: I'm not. I haven't posited anything at all, I've only stated what is actually happening. I won't posit anything, I've said, as long as man does not step out of that stream, there is no salvation to mankind. That's all.

F: Sir, may I add a word here. I think the question which the lady asked implies an identifiable permanent entity.

K: There is no permanent entity.

F: No, what I'm suggesting is...

M: A something, I'm not making it more definite than that.

K: I know what you're trying to say.

M: There has to be X or I don't know what to call it.

N: Some aspect of intelligence.

M: Something.

N: Some aspect of intelligence.

K: That's what he's saying.

M: Something that can step out of the stream.

K: Yes, is there some aspect of intelligence in the stream?

N: Yes, which sees the...

K: Which sees the... yes, and therefore steps out.

N: Sees the futility of the stream.

K: Yes.

M: Then you're saying it is part of the stream that quality, it's in with all the other human things, something is able...

K: Just a minute.

M: ...to separate itself from all the rest of the stream.

K: A is part of that stream. Let's go step by step if you don't mind, then we won't mislead each other. A is part of that stream. That stream has manifested itself as A. So A perceives he's suffering. Obviously. Right? No?

N: Yes.

K: His anxiety, he is living and he says, "Why am I suffering? What is this?" And so he begins to reason, begins to see. Why do you introduce some other factor?

M: Can you then say that some perception that it's still part of the stream...

K: No.

M: Or some molecule, or something.

K: No. No. You are not listening, if you don't mind my pointing out.

R: May I add a word, sir?

K: Yes, sir.

R: According to Buddha's teaching, in that stream there is also wisdom which sees.

K: No. I don't know what...

R: Forget, no, I know, because in that stream, which is called, in other words, in Buddhist philosophy it is very well explained, as Mary puts the question, there is wisdom which sees the whole of thing. It is that.

N: Which sees what?

R: The whole thing. Whole view, whole thing. The reality, which sees the reality, which sees as it is, as we discussed this morning. And then is that stepping out, that seeing is the stepping out.

M: Are you saying that there is an action of stepping out without an actor?

K: Yes. Go with me. I'll explain it. I'll explain it, but you don't have to accept it. I think it'll be logical, reasonable and fairly sane, unless one is completely besotted, it can be examined. A is of that stream, with a name and a form. And as he lives he realizes what he's going through. Right? In that realization he says, "I'm suffering." Then he begins to enquire into the whole nature of suffering, and ends that suffering. I'm taking one aspect of this stream. Ends that suffering. And he is out of that stream. That entity is really unique, who is out of that stream.

S: So it's something there that wasn't there before then?

K: The moment A realizes that he's suffering, and doesn't escape from that suffering - enquires, explores without any motive and so on into the nature of suffering, and has an insight into the whole structure of suffering, that very insight ends that suffering.

R: That insight also in the stream.

K: You see, a moment - you're positing something I'm not.

R: From where you are bringing insight?

K: No, I brought in insight very carefully. A realizes he's suffering. Suffering is part of that stream.

R: A is also part of the stream.

K: Yes, that stream has manifested itself in A. A living, realizes he's suffering, he doesn't escape from it, because he wants to know the whole nature of it, the nature and the structure and what is behind suffering. So he examines it, both logically, sanely and also non-verbally. Looks into it. And the very looking into it is the insight. It's not of the stream, the looking into the suffering.

R: That looking in, from where does it come?

K: He's concerned, I said that, he's studying, he's exploring, he's questioning the whole beastly thing, he wants to know.

R: That means it was not a part of the river.

K: No.

S: Krishnaji, because we've been saying that something steps out of the river.

K: Wait. I won't use that word, stepping out.

S: No, and it seems now that what we're saying is that something comes into being which never was part of that river.

K: Yes. I said no. You follow me and see if I'm wrong, then correct me. A is of that stream, A is suffering, A says, "Why?" He's not concerned what the teacher said, he said, "I know all that," he pushes all that aside. Why is there suffering? In the very enquiry of it - the enquiry depends on your capacity to put aside interpretation, not escape and all the rest of it - in the very enquiry into the nature of suffering and the cause of it, and the effect of it and so on, in that very enquiry is insight, comes insight. Insight isn't in the stream.

S: Correct.

R: I say it is in the stream.

K: Why, sir?

R: You see, it has in itself the capacity of producing and ceasing.

K: The stream itself has the capacity?

R: Of continuing and producing and ceasing it. Stopping it. That insight is also part of that stream. Just as all that misery...

K: No, sir, I wouldn't...

R: And where does that insight come from?

K: I'm telling you, sir.

R: You say A is part of the river?

K: Yes.

R: And then A...

K: A is suffering.

R: Suffering.

K: A begins to enquire, A begins to - wait - in his enquiry he realizes enquiry can only exist when there's complete freedom from all escapes, suppression and all the rest of it.

R: Yes.

K: So in that moment of enquiry there is insight, when he doesn't escape, when he doesn't suppress, when he doesn't rationalize or seek the cause of suffering, in that very moment of examining, is insight.

N: You're implying insight is born, it is not of the stream.

K: Don't introduce born, not of the stream.

N: Then...

K: You see, you are misleading, you want it part of that stream.

N: Where does it come from, insight, then?

K: I'm telling you.

N: From enquiry.

K: From the freedom to enquire.

N: Where does that freedom to enquire come from?

K: From his own examination.

R: But he is part of the river.

K: No. You're missing the point.

S: Krishnaji, are we saying this, that A is just a form and a name, normally is nothing more than a name and a form, plus all that there is in the river. With free enquiry...

K: A begins to enquire.

S: Right, A begins to enquire and then A, if he has this insight...

K: No. He has not the insight.

S: He is no longer just a part of that river.

K: Would you just follow, step by step. A is part of that stream, A is the manifestation of that stream, a wave of that stream, or whatever you like to call it. Now A is going through agony. A examines it. And the examination is very important, because if he escapes it is not examination, not exploration. If he suppresses, it's not. So he realizes - please follow this step by step - that as long as he's not free from the blockages that prevents exploration, and therefore he puts them aside, he's free to enquire. And in that freedom is insight.

P: There is a missing link here.

K: There may be ten, sir.

P: It appears that what Narayan was saying, that if the person is part of the stream, a representative of the stream, and when enquiry begins, examination starts, freedom comes...

K: Be careful, sir. No, you see, you are assuming so much.

P: No, but I'm repeating what you're saying.

K: Yes, all right, you're repeating what I said. Right.

P: And the beginning of this, the beginning of enquiry, the beginning of the capacity to explore without any of the things of the stream, are they also in the stream?

K: No.

P: Where do they come from?

K: That's very simple. What are you all making a fuss about?

P: This beginning of the enquiry is...

K: No. Listen. You are not, forgive me, Doctor, you're not listening. I said, A is the manifestation of that stream. Let's follow it step by step, sir. Part of that stream is suffering. A is suffering, so A says, "Why, why should I suffer?"

P: At this point I will interrupt you.

K: At any point.

P: The number of human beings in the stream, the question as to "Why should I suffer?", this is the beginning of the whole thing.

K: No. Man has asked "Why should I suffer", they have a dozen explanations - the Buddhist, the Hindu, the Christian and so on. The man who is suffering says, "I see all this, the Buddhist, the Hindu, the Christian, the Muslim, I reject all that, because that doesn't leave me the freedom to enquire. I'm accepting tradition and authority, I won't."

F: Sir, perhaps could we put it this way. That the conditioned enquiry...

K: ...is part of the stream.

F: ...is part of the stream.

K: That's the whole point.

F: But the free enquiry...

K: ...is beginning of...

N: ...getting away from the stream.

K: No. Look. Now, leave the stream alone now. For God's sake.

A is a manifestation of the stream. A is suffering. A says, "Why am I suffering?" Studies Buddhism, studies Hinduism, studies Christianity, and says, "For God's sake, that world is out. I'm going to find out for myself." And he begins to enquire. And he realizes he can only explore if he's free to look. Right? Free from fear, free from reward and punishment, free from any kind of motive, otherwise he can't enquire. The moment he's in that state of examination, there is insight. This is very clear.

F: And of course very difficult to do.

K: No, I won't even accept the word difficult.

F: At first, because otherwise we wouldn't be enquiring.

K: No. Because we have not given our energy to this. We don't care, we have put up with so many things.

So leave A alone. But B is part of that stream, and he suffers, he says, "Yes, that's my nature, that's human nature, there is no way out, no Jesus, nobody is going to save me, I'll put up with it." So he is contributing to the stream.

SS: So the stream becomes more intense.

K: Yes, has more volume.

F: More drive also.

K: Of course, more volume is pressure of tremendous water. So we come to the point: what is death?

R: I want to go slowly. Now A is out of the river.

K: No, sir. A is not out of the river.

R: But he has seen, had insight.

K: He has insight.

R: Insight. So if all is one humanity, if A is the humanity then humanity has seen it.

K: No, sir, no sir.

M: So he left humanity.

F: You are looking at it, perhaps, purely logically.

K: No, not even logically.

F: What I mean is, logically but accepting the conditioned states.

K: The moment A is aware of his conditioned state and begins to enquire into it, he has got the energy to put aside.

F: Now the Buddha himself said, "Put aside with the right wisdom" - do you remember that phrase of the Buddha? "Put aside all shape and form, all sensation, all perceptions, all discriminative consciousness itself."

R: That's what I say.

F: Put it aside with right wisdom.

R: That is what I tell you. That is what I said, that he is making so complicated, whole.

F: No.

K: We're all making it complicated, it is very simple.

R: That is what I tell you, that is the statement, that is the idea, but I also...

K: May I interrupt here? Say one doesn't belong to any religion. One doesn't accept any authority. That is to enquire. If I accepted what Christ or X Y Z said, it's no enquiry. So A rejects in his enquiry into sorrow, everything that anybody had said. Will you do that? Because otherwise he's a secondhand human being, examining through secondhand eye-glasses.

R: Or you can hear somebody who has seen it and...

K: I hear what the Buddha has said.

R: Yes, you can hear it.

K: Anybody has said.

R: Said, you also can see independently as he has seen.

K: Yes, but, yes, Buddha said, sorrow is the beginning of, whatever he said.

R: Yes.

K: All right, but what 'he said' is not by me.

R: Absolutely, that is so.

K: No.

R: That is what I am telling you, but you also can see the same thing as he has seen.

K: Yes.

R: And still you know what he has said also.

K: What? Sir, the printed word or the hearsay, to a hungry man has no meaning.

R: That is so.

K: Reading the menu doesn't feed me.

R: That is what I'm telling you, it is not the menu but the food.

K: The food. The food is not cooked by anybody, I have to cook it, eat it.

R: That is not usually so.

K: Wait, I said the man who is examining the whole structure of sorrow.

R: I should say the other way, that you have to eat to get rid of hunger. Just because you have eaten, my hunger will not disappear.

K: No.

R: You have prepared the food, you have eaten and there is food. I also can eat it, and it is my food. Do you deny that?

K: No, of course not, sir. Rthis afternoon, you've eaten lunch, somebody cooked it, and they ate it, we ate it.

R: Yes.

K: But we're not talking at food level. We are saying that, as long as I accept any authority, it doesn't matter who it is, there is no insight.

R: It is not accepting authority. No.

K: Accepting descriptions, accepting conclusions, what Buddha said, what Krishna said, what A said. To me the freedom is from the known. Otherwise I'm everlastingly being in the stream. You see, that's why, sir, either we discuss this factually, and say, "Look, I will drop every authority I have." That means, knowledge, tradition - can you do that? Because that is enquiry, if you, if I am tethered to a tradition, I can't; I'll go round in circles, I must be free of the past and the rope that ties me to the post.

So B accepts suffering. Right, sir? B accepts what he is; conditioned, miserable and unhappy. You know what human being is. So he's all the time contributing to the stream. So there is no soul, no Atman, no ego, no permanent me, that evolves. Then what would the enquiry be, what is the state of the mind of the man, of the human who has had an insight into the whole nature of suffering, and therefore the whole stream? Right? What is the nature of that mind? What is the quality? Right, sir? Would that be speculative? It would.

SS: Sir, what is the position of the person who has some insight or a partial insight? He's still in there, isn't he?

K: Like the scientist, a partial insight. He may be excellent in science, but confused and miserable and unhappy, ambitious, you know.

F: Don't you think that the very term 'partial insight' means a conditioned insight.

K: Of course.

F: And therefore it's part of that stream and it's true to type generally.

K: I wonder if we see this, sir, or it is an image which we are seeing. Because now we've created the image of the river.

F: Yes, that's the unfortunate thing.

K: Yes.

M: Sir, can one use the word insight in the same sense as intelligence, is there a difference?

K: You see. Now wait a minute. Let's go into that. The stream manifesting itself as B, and in his activities he becomes very cunning, clever. Has not intelligence no relationship with cunning, cleverness, chicanery, all that, but it is essentially part of love and compassion. What do you say, sir? The love in the stream is not love. You know, we are saying things which nobody will accept. If B is in the stream, and he tells his wife or girl friend or boy friend, 'I love you', is that love?

R: As long as there is me there is no love.

K: No, no don't reduce it to the 'me'. B is of that stream. B says to his girl friend or boy friend, "I love you" - now is that love?

R: In which sense?

K: Love.

R: Love has many hundred meanings.

K: So, that's what I'm enquiring. The love of a book, the love of your particular soup, the love of poetry, the love of a beautiful thing, the love of an ideal, the love of your country, the love of jealousy, in which is included hate, envy, hurt. Is all that - I'm questioning, exploring - is all that love? And B who is the man who says, "Yes, that is love. At least it's part of love." Or he says, "Without jealousy there is no love," I've heard these statements a dozen times before.

R: Not only that, people have asked me, without the idea of self, how can there be love.

K: Yes.

R: There are people who put that question also.

K: You see, sir, are we discussing verbally all this? Or realizing, seeing the stream is you, and say, "Look, examine, end it." And so not being able to end it, we invent time: I will one day step out of that stream. So thought invents psychological evolution.

F: Could we also put it this way: thought invents psychological development through time.

K: Yes, sir, that's what I mean.

F: Instead of what really belongs to the psychological sphere, namely the immediacy.

K: That's right. The immediacy only takes place when there is insight. In that there is no regret, no saying, "I wish I hadn't done it." So our action is always at the time level.

See, sir, what is immortality? What is eternity? What is the immeasurable? All religions more or less touch on this, even the metaphysicists and the logicians and the monks have gone into this. What is immortality? That is, an author writes a good book and it becomes immortal. His name becomes immortal. Or a politician, unfortunately politicians last, endure. We have related immortality as something beyond death - mortal and the beyond mortality, beyond death. No?

F: That's the usual conception.

K: Of course. Well, sir, what do you say to all this?

R: What happened to our question?

K: Death - rebirth?

R: Yes, what happened there.

K: I've told you. Rebirth is this constant stream, manifesting itself into A, B, C, down the alphabet. I know this is most disappointing, depressing, and I say, "My God, this is too horrible, I won't listen to it."

SS: Are you also suggesting therefore death is part of that stream?

K: Yes, body dies. By usage and wrong way of living, it dies, dies, inevitably.

SS: But I meant more...

K: You see, sir, to find out what death is, one has to be with death. That means, end. End my attachment, end one's attachments and beliefs, end to everything that one has collected. Nobody wants to do that.

M: But that, that definition of death would not be in the stream.

K: What?

M: That action of death would not be part of the stream.

K: No. You see, in the man who is gone, understood this, he doesn't think even in streams, it's something entirely different. It's not a reward for the man in the stream.

M: No, it's the action of the insight, is it not?

K: Yes, the action of insight. Action of insight, you cannot have insight if there is no love, compassion, intelligence, that's part of all that. And then, it's only then there is a relationship to truth.

SS: You seem to be suggesting in some way that death is a key.

K: Yes, sir. Free investigation, not the scientific investigation - the thinking tank, you know; but investigation into this whole myself, which is me, that stream, myself is that stream. Enquire into that, so that there isn't a shadow of the stream left. We don't do this because we are too learned, we have no time, we are too occupied with our own pleasure, our own worries. So we say, "Please, leave that to the priests; not for me."

So have we answered the question? Is there reincarnation, a continuation of the 'me' in different forms? I say, no!

R: Of course not, of course not. As you say, I also say, there is no. First of all there is no 'me' to be reborn.

K: No, sir, the stream manifests and B says, "I am I", therefore I'm frightened to die.

R: Yes.

K: And therefore he invents various comforting theories, he prays, please save me and all the rest of it. But that stream, as long as B lives in that stream, his consciousness is part of that stream, he's only contributing more and more to the volume of that water. Obviously, sir, if you see that. So there is no 'me' to continue. Sir, nobody will accept this, but it's the truth.

F: You would agree then, that what is necessary is to see in this profound...

K: Yes, seeing is that.

F: Truly see, and that truly seeing is real action, creative action.

K: Is action, the moment I see, I drop anxiety. The moment I see I'm petty-minded, it's finished.

F: It is a complete transformation of the ordinary psychological process.

K: Yes.

M: Isn't it really the crux in all this and the place where people go wrong, so to speak, that they do not see in the sense you're talking about; they see verbally, intellectually, on various levels, but they don't really see.

K: No, I think mostly they don't mind being sorrowful, they say well why not? They don't see, one doesn't see one's own petty reactions. Say, "Yes, why not?"

M: Or they don't see that they don't see, to put it perhaps childishly. They don't realize that what they think is understanding is not.

K: No, Maria, I mean - not you personally - has one dropped any opinion that one holds? One's prejudice; completely? Or one's experience? Never, they say, "Please" - they won't even listen to you. Do you mean to say a politician will listen to you? Or a priest or anybody who is absolutely caught in his own conclusion. Because there he's completely safe, completely secure. And you come and disturb him, either he worships you or kills you, which is the same.

M: Or he sees that that security is a complete fabrication.

K: Then he drops these prejudices, his conclusions, even his knowledge.

S: Sir, for the man who has stepped out of the stream and is no longer a manifestation of the stream, there is something else which is operating. Could we say something about the nature of that thing?

K: Which is intelligence.

S: Which is intelligence...

K: Intelligence is love. Intelligence is compassion.

S: And from many things that you have said in the past that seems to have an independent existence.

K: Obviously.

S: Without it manifesting in him.

K: Sir, if A frees himself - not himself - if A, his consciousness is no longer of the stream, his consciousness is entirely different. It is a different dimension altogether.

S: And that consciousness existed before he stepped out of the stream, to to speak?

K: Now you are speculating.

S: Yes, I am.

K: I won't play with you.

SS: Perhaps another way to say it, would be, is there intelligence without the intelligent person?

K: I know what you are saying. That means - let's put it round the other way: wars have created a great deal of misery. Right? And that misery remains in the air. It must. Goodness has been also part of man - try to be good. There is also that enormous reservoir of both. No?

SS: Yes.

K: So what? One doesn't contribute to that goodness but one is always contributing to the other.

M: Are you saying the other exists only in the human psyche, but goodness exists apart from humanity?

K: Let's put it round this way: there is not only A suffering, there is this whole suffering of mankind.

M: Or more than mankind, there is suffering.

K: There is suffering, of course.

SS: Suffering is a universal phenomenon.

K: Sir, would you kindly explain, what is Buddhist meditation.

R: Buddhist meditation, the purest form of Buddhist meditation which has taken many forms, many varieties, the purest form of Buddhist meditation is this insight into 'what is'.

K: You are using my words.

R: No, not your words. You are using those words! Long before you, two thousand five hundred years ago these words were used. I am using them.

K: All right, then we are both two thousand years old.

R: Vipassana is insight vision, to see into the nature of things, that is the real vision.

K: Have they a system?

R: A system is, of course, developed.

K: That's what I want to get at.

R: Yes, when you take the original teaching of the Buddha...

K: ...there is no system.

R: It is called Satyabhatana (?), the best discourse by the Buddha on this insight meditation. There is no system.

K: I am listening, sir.

R: And the key point in that is the awareness. Awareness, smytri in Sanskrit. And to be mindful, aware, of all that happens, you are not expected to run away from life and live in a cave or in a forest, like a statue, all that. It is not that. And in this Satyabhatana it is - if you translate it as the establishment of mindfulness, but rather it is the presence of awareness, the meaning of that word.

K: Is this awareness...

R: Yes, awareness of every movement, every act, everything.

K: Is this awareness to be cultivated?

R: There is no question of cultivation. There is no question.

K: That is what I am trying to get at.

R: Yes.

K: Because the modern gurus, modern systems of meditation, modern Zen, you know all the rest of it, they are trying to cultivate it.

R: Yes, I'll tell you, sir. I have written an essay, it will be published in Belgium, on The Cycle of Buddhist Meditation. There I said that this teaching of the Buddha is for many centuries misunderstood and wrongly applied as a technique. And they have developed into such a technique that the mind can be instead of liberating it can be...

K: Of course. All meditation...

R: If it is made into a system.

K: Please, sir, I am asking: awareness, is it something to be cultivated in the sense manipulated, watched over, worked at? R: No, no.

K: So how does it come into being?

R: There is no coming into being, you do it.

K: Wait sir, just listen. I want to find out, I am not critical, I just want to find out what Buddhist meditation is. Because now there is Buddhist, there is Tibetan, there are various types of Buddhist meditation, various types of Tibetan meditation, various types of Hindu meditation, Suffi meditation - for God's sake, you follow, they are like mushrooms all over the place. I am just asking if awareness is something that takes place through concentration?

R: No, not in that sense. For anything we do in this world a certain amount of concentration is necessary. That is understood. In that sense a certain kind of concentration is necessary but don't mix it up with dhyani and samadhi.

K: I don't like any of those words personally.

R: But they are concentration in the principle.

K: I know, I know. Most of the meditations that have been propagated all over the world involves concentration.

R: Zen and various other things, samadhi, dhyana, Hindu, Buddhist, concentraion is the centre.

K: That is nonsense. I don't accept concentration.

R: In the Buddha's teaching, meditation is not that concentration.

K: It is not concentration. Let's put it away. Then what is this awareness, how does it come into being?

R: You see, you live in the action in the present moment.

K: Wait, sir. Yes sir. The moment you say the present moment, you don't live in the present moment.

R: That is what it says, that you don't live in the present moment. And satyabhatan is to live in the present moment.

K: No, you are missing it. How is one to live in the present? What is the mind that lives in the present?

R: The mind that lives in the present is the mind which is free from...

K: Yes, sir, go on sir, I am waiting, I want to find out.

R: ...free from the idea of self. When you have the idea of self either you live in the past or in the future.

K: The now is, as far as I, one sees, not I, one sees generally, the past modifying itself in the present and going on.

R: That is the usual.

K: Wait. That is the present.

R: No.

K: Then what is the present? Free of the past?

R: Yes.

K: That's it. Free of the past, which means free of time. So that is the only state of mind which is now. Now I am just asking, sir, what is awareness? How does it flower, how does it happen? You follow?

R: There is no technique for it.

K: I understand.

R: You were asking how it happens.

K: Quite right. I used the 'how' just to ask a question, not for a method. I'll put it round the other way. In what manner does this awareness come into being? I am not aware - suppose I am not aware. I am just enclosed in my own petty little worries and anxieties, problems, I love you and you don't love me, and all that is going on in my mind. I live in that. And you come along and tell me, "Be aware of all that". And I say, "What do you mean by being aware?"

R: When you ask me that, be aware of that pettiness.

K: Yes. So that means be aware...

R: Of the pettiness.

K: Yes, yes. Be aware of all your pettiness. What do you mean by that?

R: Be aware of that.

K: Yes, sir, I don't know how to be, I don't know what it means.

R: It is not necessary to know what it means.

K: What do you mean it is not necessary?

R: Be aware of it.

K: Yes, sir. You tell me, be aware of it. I am blind. I think that is an elephant, how am I to? You follow? I am blind and I want to see light. And you say, "Be aware of that blindness". I say, "Yes, what does it mean?" It is not concentration. So I say, look, awareness is something in which choice doesn't exist. Wait, sir. Awareness means to be aware of this hall, the curtains, the lights, the people sitting here, the shape of the walls, the windows, to be aware of it. Just a minute. Either I am aware of one part, part by part, or as I enter the room I am aware of the whole thing: the roof, the lamps, the curtains, the shape of the windows, the floor, the mottled roof, everything. Is that what you mean, sir?

R: That also is a kind of awareness.

K: That is awareness. Now what is the difference - I am not categorizing, please I am not being impudent, or inquisitive, or insulting - what is the difference between that sense of awareness and attention?

R: It is wrong to put 'sense' of awareness. Awareness.

K: All right. That awareness and attention. You see we have abolished concentration except when I have to drill a hole in the wall, I hope I am drilling it straight, I concentrate.

R: We have not excluded it. There is concentration but that is not the main thing.

K: No, that is not awareness.

R: But concentration may be useful or helpful.

K: To drill a hole straight.

R: Yes. In awareness also, it may be helpful but it is not concentration on a simple point.

K: There must be a certain sense of concentration if I have to learn mathematics.

R: For anything, sir.

K: Therefore I am just putting that aside for the moment. What is attention? To attend.

R: How do you explain, for instance, awareness, mindfulness, attention, how do you discriminate these three: awareness, mindfulness and attention?

K: I would say awareness in which there is no choice, just to be aware. The moment when choice enters into awareness there is no awareness.

R: Right.

K: And choice is measurement, division and so on. So awareness is without choice, just to be aware. To say, "I don't like, I like this room", all that has ended.

R: Right.

K: Attention, to attend, in that attention there is no division.

R: Also that means no choice.

K: Leave it for the moment. Attention implies no division, me attending. And so it has no division, therefore no measurement and therefore no border.

R: In attention.

K: In complete attention.

R: In that sense it is equal to awareness.

K: No.

R: Why not?

K: In awareness there may be a centre from which you are being aware.

SS: Even if there is no choice?

R: No, that is not awareness.

K: Wait, I must go back.

N: You are making a distinction between awareness and attention.

K: I want to.

SS: Are you saying attention is a deeper process.

K: Much more, a totally different quality. One can be aware of what kind of dress you have. One may say, "I like it", or "I don't like it", so choice doesn't exist, you are aware of it, that's all. But attention, in that there is no attender, one who attends, and so no division.

R: In awareness also you can say the same thing, there is no one who is aware.

K: Of course, that's right. But it has not the same quality as attention.

R: I don't want to go into these words, but the Buddha's teaching is that in this practise of meditation there is no discrimination, there is no value judgement, there is no like or dislike, but you only see. That's all. And what happens will happen when you see.

K: In that state of attention what takes place?

R: That is another explanation.

K: No, if you totally attend, with your ears, with your eyes, with your body, with your nerves, with all your mind, with your heart in the sense of affection, love, compassion, total attention, what takes place?

R: Of course what takes place is an absolute revolution internal and complete revolution.

K: No, what is the state of such a mind that is completely attentive?

F: It is free of the stream.

K: No, that's finished.

R: The stream is dried now, don't talk about it! It is desert now!

K: I am asking what is the quality of the mind that is so supremely attentive? You see it has no quality, no centre, and having no centre no border. And this is an actuality, you can't just imagine this. That means has one ever given such complete attention.

SS: Is there any object in that attention?

K: Of course not.

R: Object in the sense of.?

K: Subject and object. Obviously not. Because there is no division. You try it, do it, sir.

SS: I mean not merely physical object but any phenomenal object such as sorrow, or all those.

K: Give complete attention, if you can. Say for instance, I tell you meditation is the meditator.

R: That is right. There is no meditator.

K: Wait, wait, wait. I say, meditation is the meditator. Give your complete attention to that, and see what happens. That's a statement you hear. You don't make an abstraction of it into an idea, but you just hear that statement. It has the quality of truth, it has the quality of great beauty, it has a sense of absoluteness about it. Now give your whole attention to it and see what happens.

R: I think Buddhist meditation is that.

K: I don't know, sir.

R: Yes.

K: I'll accept your word for it, but I don't know.

R: And I think it is not misleading to accept my opinion.

K: No, no. I don't know.

R: Satyabhatana is that. Real satyabhatana is that. Now if you ask people who practise it, there are many meditation centres, I openly say they are misleading. I have openly written it.

K: Yes, sir, that is nonsense.

R: When you ask how it happens, I said that presupposes a method, a technique.

K: No, I am asking, can one give such attention.

R: You are asking whether it is possible?

K: Yes, is it possible and will you give such attention - not you, sir, I am asking the question. Which means do we ever attend.

F: Sir, when you say can one attend...

K: Will you attend.

F: That's it.

K: Not exercising will.

F: Quite.

K: Will you... you know, do it. If that attention is not there truth cannot exist.

R: I don't think that is appropriate. Truth exists but cannot be seen.

K: Ah, I don't know. You say truth exists but I don't know.

R: But that doesn't mean that truth does not exist.

K: I don't know, I said.

R: That is correct.

K: Jesus said, Father in heaven. I don't know the father. It may exist but I don't know, so I don't accept.

R: No, not accepting. I don't think it is correct to say that without that attention truth does not exist.

K: I said without that attention truth cannot come into being.

R: There is no coming into being.

K: No, of course not. Let me put it differently. All right.
Without that attention the word truth has no meaning.

R: That will be better. That's better.

K: We have talked for an hour and three quarters, sir. I don't know when your bus or train goes. We had better stop.

R: I think on behalf of everybody, I thank all these people, not you.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 25TH AUGUST 1979

I am sorry the weather is so foul.

I am sure many of you have come with your personal problems, and hope by these talks they will be solved; but they can only be solved if you apply self, choiceless awareness and a quality of religious wholeness. I mean - we mean by 'religion' not beliefs, dogmas, rituals and the vast network of superstition, but religion in the deep sense of that word, which only comes into being when there is this self awareness and meditation. And that is what we are going to talk about during these four talks, and two question and answer meetings, as has been explained.

To go into this matter rather deeply, not only to be aware naturally and easily, with our own particular problems, which are related with the problems of the world, because we human beings are more or less alike throughout the world psychologically, you may have different colour, different culture, different habits and customs but in spite of that all human beings go through a great deal of travail, a great deal of sorrow, great anxieties, loneliness, despairs, depressions, not being able to solve them, they seek salvation through somebody else, through various forms of beliefs, dogmas, and acceptance of authorities.

So when we are discussing, talking over together these problems if we merely confine ourselves to our own particular little problem, then that self-centred activity only makes it more narrow, more limited and therefore it becomes more of a prison. Whereas if we could during these talks and dialogues, question and answers, if we could relate ourselves to the whole of humankind, to the whole of humanity. We are part of that humanity. Over in the east they suffer just as much as you do, they have their sorrows, their unhappiness, their utter loneliness, a sense of negligence by the society, there is no security, no certainty, they are confused as much as we are here. So we are essentially, deeply psychologically, part of that humanity. I think this must be understood really, not merely verbally or intellectually or through reason but one has to feel this. It is not a sentiment, a romantic idea but an actuality that we are part of this whole of mankind and therefore we have a tremendous responsibility.

And to bring about a unity of all other human beings, it is only religion can do this, bring us all together. Not politics, not science, not some new philosophy or some expansive economy, or various organizations, political, religious, none of them are going to bring us together as a whole. I think this one has to realize very deeply, that no organization - religious, political, economic, or the various forms of United Nations organizations - will bring man together. It is only religion in the deep sense of that word that can bring us all together. Religion - we mean by that word not all that is going on in the world, the various superstitions, the make-belief, the hierarchical set-up, the dogmas, the rituals, the beliefs - religion is far beyond all that, it is a way of living daily. And if we could think over together, think together not about something, but have the capacity to be able to look, hear and think together. Could we during these talks do that? Not that we must agree with each other, or accept each other's opinions or judgements but rather putting aside our own particular point of view, our own experience, our own conclusions, if we can set those aside, and have the capacity to think together, not about something, which is fairly easy, but to be able to see the same thing together, to hear the same meaning, significance, the depth of a word, to hear the same song, not interpret it according to your like and dislike but to hear it together because I think it is very important to be able to think together, not as a group, having the same thought, the same point of view, the same outlook, but having set aside one's own particular idiosyncrasies, habits of thought, come together in thought. Say for instance we can think together about belief, we can argue for it or against it. We can see how important belief is, to have some kind of psychological security. And being desirous of that security we will believe in anything. This is happening in the world. Belief in the most ridiculous nonsense, both economically, religiously and in every way. So we can think about a belief together, agreeing or disagreeing. But we are trying something else, which is not thinking about something but thinking itself together. I wonder if I am making myself clear.

No two people apparently are capable of thinking together unless there is some catastrophe, unless there is some great sorrow, a crisis, then people come together and think together, about a war and so on. It is always thinking together about something - right? But we are trying something, which is to think together. Which is only possible if we for the moment forget ourselves, our own problems, our own inclinations, our intellectual capacities and so on and so on, and meet each other. That requires a certain sense of attention, a certain sense of awareness, that each one of us are together in the quality of thinking. I do not know how to express it more clearly. Could we do that about all our problems? We can think together about our problems but to have the capacity to think at the same level, with the same intensity, not about something, but the feeling of thinking together. I wonder if you get it?

If we could do that we can go together into many things. That means a certain quality of freedom, a certain sense of detachment, not forced, compelled, driven but the freedom from our own backyard, and then meet together. Because this becomes very important when you want to create a good society. The philosophers have talked about it, the ancient Greeks, the ancient Hindus and the Chinese have talked about bringing about a good society. That is in the future, some time in the future we will create a good society according to an ideal, a pattern, a certain sense of ideals and so on. And apparently throughout the world a good society has never come into being, there are good people maybe. It is becoming more and more difficult to be good in this world. And we are always looking to the future to bring about this good society - good in the sense where people can live on this earth without wars, peacefully, without slaughtering each other, without competition, in a sense of great freedom and so on. We are not defining what is good for the moment - the definition of the good doesn't make one good.

So can we together think the absolute need of a good society? The society is what we are, society doesn't come into being mysteriously, it is not created by god, man has created this society with all the wars and all that is going on. We don't have to go into all the horrible details of it. And that society is what we are, what each human being is. That is fairly obvious. That is we create society with all its divisions, with its conflicts, with its terror, with its inequality and so on and so on and so on because in ourselves we are that, which is in our relationship with each other we are that. We may be fairly tolerant, fairly affectionate in private relationships but that is rather doubtful, but with regard to the rest of the human beings we are not. Which is again fairly obvious when you read the newspapers, magazines and actually see what is going on. So good society can only come into being, not in the future but now, when we human beings have established right relationship between ourselves. Is that possible? Not at some future date but actually in the present, in our daily life could we bring about a relationship that is essentially good? Good being without domination, without personal interest, without personal vanity, ambition and so on. So there is a relationship between each other which is based essentially on, if I may use the word and I hope you won't mind, love. Is that possible?

Can we, as human beings, living in this terrible world which we have created, could we bring about a radical change in ourselves? That is the whole point. Some philosophers and others have said human conditioning is impossible radically to change, you can modify it, you can polish it, refine it but the basic quality of conditioning you cannot alter it. There are a great many people who think that - the Existentialists and so on and so on. Why do we accept such conditioning? You are following I hope what we are talking about. Why do we accept our conditioning which has brought about this really mad world, insane world? Where we want peace and we are supplying armaments, where we want peace and we are nationalistically, economically, socially dividing each other, we want peace and all religions are making us separate, as they are, the organizations. There is such vast contradiction out there as well as in ourselves. I wonder if one is aware of all this, in ourselves, not what is happening out there. Most of us know what is happening out there, you don't have to be very clever to find out, just observe. And that confusion out there is partly responsible for our own conditioning. We are asking: is it possible to bring about in ourselves a radical transformation of this? Because only then can we have a good society, where we won't hurt each other both psychologically as well as physically.

When one asks this question of ourselves, what is our deep response to that question? One is conditioned, not only as an Englishman, or a German or Frenchman, and so on, but also one is conditioned by various forms of desires, beliefs, pleasures and conflict, psychological conflicts; all that contributes to this conditioning and more. We will go into it. We are asking ourselves, thinking together because we are thinking together I hope, can this conditioning, can this human prison with its griefs, loneliness, anxieties, personal assertions, personal demands, fulfilments, and all that, that is our conditioning, that is our consciousness, and our consciousness is its content. And we are asking: can that whole structure be transformed? Otherwise we will never have peace in this world. There will be perhaps little modifications but man will be fighting, quarrelling, perpetually in conflict within himself and outwardly. So that is our question. Can we think together with regard to this?

Then the question arises: what is one to do? One is aware that one is conditioned, knows, conscious. This conditioning has come into being by one's own desires, self-centred activities, through lack of right relationship with each other, one's own sense of loneliness, one may live among a great many people, have intimate relationships, but there is always this sense of empty whirl within oneself. All that is our conditioning, intellectual, psychological, emotional, and also physical naturally. Now can this totally be transformed? That I feel is the real revolution. In that there is no violence.

Now, can we do it together? Or if you do it, if you understand the condition and resolve that condition, and another is conditioned, will the man who is conditioned listen to another? You understand? Perhaps you are unconditioned, will I listen to you? And what will make me listen? What pressure, what influence, what reward? What will make me listen to you with my heart, with my mind, with my whole being? Because if one can listen so completely perhaps the solution is there. But apparently we don't seem to listen. So we are asking: what will make a human being, knowing his conditioning, most of us do, if you are at all intelligently aware, what will make us change? Please put this question to yourselves, each one of you, find out what will make each one of us bring about a change, a freedom from this conditioning? Not to jump into another conditioning: it is like leaving Catholicism and becoming a Buddhist, it is the same pattern. So what will make one, each one of us, who one is quite sure is desirous of bringing about a good society, what will make him change? Change has been promised through reward - heaven, a new kind of carrot, a new ideology, a new community, new set of groups, new gurus, a reward. Or a punishment - "If you don't do this you will go to Hell". So our whole thinking is based on this principle of reward and punishment. "I will do this if I can get something out of it". But that kind of attitude, or way of thinking, doesn't bring about radical change. And that change is absolutely necessary. I am sure we are all aware of it. So what shall we do?

Some of you have listened to the speaker for a number of years - I wonder why? And having listened it becomes a new kind of mantram - you know what that word is? It is a Sanskrit word meaning, in its true meaning, is not to be self-centred and ponder over about not becoming. The meaning of that is that - mantram means that. Abolish self-centredness, and ponder, meditate, look at yourself so that you don't become something. That is the real meaning of that word which has been ruined by all the transcendental meditation nonsense.

So some of you have listened for many years and do we listen and therefore bring about a change, or you have got used to the words and just carry on? So we are asking: what will make man, a human being who has lived for so many million years, carrying on the same old pattern, inherited the same instincts, self preservation, fear, security, sense of self concern which brings about great isolation, what will make that man change? A new god? A new form of entertainment? A new religious football? New kind of circus with all that stuff? What will make us change? Sorrow apparently has not changed man, because we have suffered a great deal, not only individually but collectively as a whole mankind has suffered an enormous amount, wars, disease, pain, death. We have suffered enormously, and apparently sorrow has not changed us. Nor fear, that hasn't changed us because our mind is pursuing constantly, seeking out pleasure and even that pleasure is the same pleasure in different forms, that hasn't changed us. So what will make us change?

We don't seem to be able to do anything voluntarily. We will do things under pressure. If there was no pressure, no sense of reward or punishment, because reward and punishment are too silly to even think about, if there was no sense of future - I don't know if you have gone into that whole question of future, that may be our deception, psychologically. We will go into that presently. If you abandon all those then what is the quality of the mind that faces absolutely the present? Do you understand my question? Are we communicating with each other? Please, say yes or no, I don't know whether we are. I hope I am not talking to myself!

If one realizes that one is in a prison, that prison created by oneself, oneself being the result of the past, parents, grandparents and so on and so on, inherited, acquired, imposed, that is our psychological prison in which we live. And naturally the instinct is to break through that prison. Now does one realize, not as an idea, not as a concept, but as an actuality, psychologically a fact when one faces that fact why is it even then there is no possibility of change? You understand my question?

This has been a problem, a problem for all serious people, for all people who are concerned with this human tragedy, the human misery, and asking themselves why don't we all bring about a sense of clarity in ourselves? A sense of freedom, a sense of being essentially good? I don't know if you have not noticed the intellectuals, the literary people, the writers and the so-called leaders of the world, are not talking about bringing about a good society, they have given it up. We were talking the other day to some of these people and they said, what nonsense that is, that is old fashioned, throw it out, there is no such thing as a good society any more, it is Victorian, stupid, nonsensical, we have to accept things as they are and live with them. And probably for most of us it is like that. So you and I as two friends, talking over this, what shall we do?

Authority of another doesn't change, doesn't bring about this change - right? If I accept you as my authority because I want to bring about a revolution in myself and so perhaps bring about a good society, the very idea of my following you, instructing me, that ends good society. I wonder if you see that? I am not good because you tell me to be good, or I accept you as the supreme authority over righteousness and I follow you. The very acceptance of authority and obedience is the very destruction of a good society. Isn't that so? I wonder if you see this? May we go further into this matter?

If I have a guru, thank god I haven't got one, if I have a guru and I follow him, what have I done to myself? What I have done in the world? Nothing. He tells me some nonsense, how to meditate, this or that and I will get marvellous experience or levitate and all the rest of that nonsense, and my intention is to bring about a good society, where we can be happy, where there is a sense of affection, a relationship so that there is no barrier, that is my longing. I go to you as my guru and what have I done? I have destroyed the very thing that I wanted, because authority, apart from law and all the rest of that, psychological authority is divisive, is in its very nature separative. You up there and I down below and so you are always progressing higher and higher, and I am also progressing higher and higher, we never meet! You laugh, I know, but actually this is what we are doing. So can I realize authority with its implication of organization, will never free me? Authority gives one a sense of security. "I don't know, I am confused, you know, or at least I think you know, that is good enough for me, I invest my energy and my demand for security in you, in what you are talking about". And we create an organization around that and that very organization becomes the prison. I don't know if you know all this? That is why one should not belong to any spiritual organization, however promising, however enticing, however romantic. Can we even accept that, see that together? You understand my question? See it together, to be a fact and therefore when we see that together it is finished. Seeing that the very nature of authority with its organization, religious and otherwise, is separative, and obedience, setting up the hierarchical system, which is what is happening in the world and therefore it is part of the destructive nature of the world, seeing the truth of that throw it out. Can we do that? So that none of us - I am sorry - so that none of us belong to any spiritual organization, religious organizations, Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, nothing.

By belonging to something we feel secure, obviously. But belonging to something invariably brings about insecurity because in itself it is separative. You have your guru, your authority, you are a Catholic, Protestant, and somebody else is something else. So they never meet, though all organized religions say they are all working together for truth. So can we, listening to each other, to this fact, finish from our thinking all sense of acceptance of authority, psychological authority, and therefore all the organizations created round it, then what happens? Have I dropped authority because you have said so, and I see the destructive nature of these so-called organizations? And do I see it as fact and therefore with intelligence? Or just vaguely accept it? I don't know if you are following this? If one sees the fact, the very perception of that fact is intelligence, and in that intelligence there is security, not in some superstitious nonsense. I wonder if you see? Are we meeting each other? I am a bit lost. Would you tell me, are we meeting each other?

Audience: Yes.

K: No, not verbally please. That is very easy because we are all speaking English or French or whatever it is. Intellectually, verbally is not meeting together. It is when you see the fact together.

Now can we - we are asking - can we look at the fact of our conditioning? Not the idea of our conditioning. The fact that we are British, German, American, Russian, or Hindu, Eastern or whatever it is, that is one thing. Conditioning brought about through economic reasons, climate, food, clothes and so on, physical. But also there is a great deal of psychological conditioning. Can we look at that as fact? Like fear. Can you look at that? Or if you can't for the moment, can we look at the hurts that we have received, the wounds, the psychological wounds that we have treasured, the wounds that we have received from childhood. Look at it, not analyse it. The psychotherapists, sorry I hope there aren't any here, the psychotherapists go back, investigate into the past. That is, seek the cause of the wounds that one has received, investigating, analysing the whole movement of the past. That is generally called analysis, psychotherapy. Now discovering the cause, does that help? And you have taken a lot of time, years perhaps, it is a game that we all play because we never want to face the fact but let's investigate how the facts have come into being. I don't know if you are following all this?

So you are expending a great deal of energy and probably a great deal of money, into proficient investigation into the past; or your own investigation, if you are capable of it. And we are saying such forms of analysis is not only separative because the analyser thinks he is different from the thing he is analysing - right? You are following all this? So he maintains this division through analysis, whereas the obvious fact is the analyser is the analysed. The moment one recognizes that, the analyser is the analysed, because when you are angry you are that. You understand that the observer is the observed? When there is that actual reality of that then analysis has no meaning, there is only pure observation of the fact which is happening now. I wonder if you see this? It may be rather difficult because most of us are so conditioned to the analytical process, self examination, introspective investigation, we are so accustomed to that, we are so conditioned by it, that perhaps if something new is said you instinctively reject it or you withdraw. So please investigate, look at it.

We are saying: is it possible to look at the fact as it is happening now, anger, jealousy, violence, pleasure, fear, whatever it is, to look at it, not analyse it, just to look at it and in that very observation is the observer merely observing the fact as something separate from himself, or he is the fact? I wonder if you get this?

Am I making myself clear? You understand the distinction? Most of us are conditioned to the idea that the observer is different from the thing observed. I have been greedy, I have been violent. So at the moment of violence there is no division, it is only later on thought picks it up and separates itself from the fact. So the observer is the past looking at actually what is happening now. I wonder if you get all this? So can you look at the fact, you are angry, misery, loneliness, whatever it is, look at that fact without the observer saying, "I am separate" and looking at it differently. You understand? Or does he recognise the fact is himself, there is no division between the fact and himself? The fact is himself. I wonder if you see. And therefore what takes place when that actuality takes place? You understand what I am saying?

Look, my mind has been conditioned to look at the fact, which is loneliness, let's take that - no, we began with being hurt from childhood. Let's look at it. I have been accustomed, used to thinking that I am different from the hurt - right? And therefore my action towards that hurt is either suppression, avoidance, or building round my hurt a resistance so that I don't get hurt any more. Therefore that hurt is making me more and more isolated, more and more afraid. So this division has taken place because I think I am different from the hurt - right? You are following all this? But the hurt is me. The 'me' is the image that I have created about myself, which is hurt - right? I wonder if you see all this? May I go on? You are following all this?

So I have created an image through education, through my family. through society, though all the religious ideas have sold , individual, all that, I have created an image about myself, and you tread on that image, I get wounded. Then I say that hurt is not me, I must do something about that hurt. So I maintain the division between the hurt and myself. But the fact is the image is me which has been hurt. Right? So can I look at that fact? Look at the fact that the image is myself and as long as I have the image about myself somebody is going to tread on it. That is a fact. Can the mind be free of that image? Because one realizes as long as that image exists you are going to do something to it, put a pin into it, and therefore I will then be hurt, with the result of isolation, fear, resistance, building a wall round myself - all that takes place when there is the division between the observer and the observed which is the hurt. Right? This is not intellectual, please. This is just ordinary observing oneself. We began by saying self awareness.

So what takes place then when the observer is the observed - you understand? - the actuality of it, not the idea of it, then what takes place? I have been hurt from childhood, through school, through parents, through other boys and girls, you know, I have been hurt, wounded, psychologically. And I carry that hurt throughout my life, hidden, anxious, frightened, and I know the result of all that. And now I face, I see that hurt exists as long as the image which I have created, which has been brought about together, as long as that exists, there will be hurt. That image is me. Can I look at that fact? Not as an idea looking at it, but the actual fact that the image is hurt, the image is me. I wonder if you see? Right? Could we come together on one point at least, think together? Then what takes place? Before I tried, the observer tried to do something about it. Here the observer is absent therefore he can't do anything about it. You get it? You understand what has taken place? Before the observer exerted himself in suppressing it, controlling it, not to be hurt, isolating himself, resisting and all the rest of it, making a tremendous effort. But whereas when the fact is the observer is the observed, then what takes place? Please do you want me to tell you? Then if I tell you it will have no meaning. But if we have come together that is what I want, think together and come to this point then you will discover for yourself that as long as you make an effort there is the division - right? So in pure observation there is no effort and therefore the thing which has been put together as image begins to dissolve. That is the whole point.

We began by saying self awareness and the meditative quality in that awareness brings about a religious sense of unity. And human beings need this enormous sense of unity, which cannot be found through nationalities, through all the rest of that business. So can we as human beings, after listening for perhaps an hour, see at least one fact together? And seeing that fact together resolve it completely, so that we as human beings are never hurt psychologically. In that thinking together implies that we both of us see the same thing, at the same time, at the same level, which means love. You follow sirs? I think that is enough for this morning, isn't it? We meet again tomorrow morning.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 26TH AUGUST 1979

If one may remind you, this is not an entertainment. You are not being converted to anything. It is not a meeting of propaganda. We are met for a serious purpose, at least the speaker is, so I hope you are also very serious.

What we were saying yesterday I think should be repeated briefly because there may be new people here this morning. We were saying that self awareness, being conscious of oneself, one's reactions, one's inward thoughts and ambitions, various forms of suffering, pleasure and all the travail of human beings, to be aware of all that. Aware without any choice, just to be aware, without direction, without any kind of pressure, just to be conscious of all the inward and outward activities that are going on, specially the psychological activity of the human mind. That demands certain serious attention, not analysis but pure observation, to observe without any choice, without any direction, without any sense of pressure, that needs quite a deep attention.

And we were also saying that religion is the only factor that might bring all humanity together, east, west, north, south. But as religions are at present in their very nature destructive, disruptive, divisive, based on belief, dogma, ritual, and tradition, hierarchical outlook, all that organized religion is not religion at all - it is a vast sense of superstition, desire playing a tremendous part in it and so leading to a great deal of illusion.

Religion can only come about through meditation, which we shall go into as we go along in these four talks and answering questions. And we said too that if we could think together. Because for most of us our career demands all our thinking: if you are an architect, engineer, scientist and so on, all our thinking is directed in one particular direction. Our whole life depends on it and so we are conditioned to one strata of thinking, or one form of thinking. And it becomes very difficult for those who are caught in a particular groove of thought to be able to think not about something but the whole movement of thinking itself. That is what we were saying yesterday. And it becomes so extraordinarily important now as one is probably that human beings should come together not based on a belief, on an ideal, or on some authority but have the capacity, the intention, the seriousness to think together. Think not about something which is comparatively easy, but have the affection, care, attention and perhaps love so that we are able to communicate with each other without any barrier so that your thinking and the speaker's thinking are together.

Then we were saying we should be able to bring about a good society. The ancient Greeks and the ancient Hindus and others have talked about bringing about a good society somewhere in the future, based on some ideals, concepts, intellectual conclusions and perhaps rarely upon their own experiences that there must be in the world a number of people who will create a society essentially good so that humanity can live on this earth happily, without conflict, without wars, without slaughtering each other. And that society doesn't exist in spite of two or three or ten million years of human existence. Religions have tried to bring this about but in their very nature, by their very organization, they are separative, they are based on belief, dogma, ritual, authority and all the rest of that, it becomes really quite meaningless. Though organizations of such kind bring about a certain quality of security, that security itself becomes insecurity and it is based on illusion. I think this is all very clear if one has gone into this matter at all.

And is it possible while we are living on this earth, which is not the British, or the English, or the British or the French or all the rest of it, it is our earth. And can we live there peacefully now? Which implies not some future idealistic society based on goodness but actually in our daily life now bring about such a good society? Which means to have right relationship with each other. A relationship not based on some past images, put together by thought, but a relationship in which that which is actually happening in this relationship of reaction, to be aware of those reactions, and not build out of those reactions various forms of images which prevent actual relationship with others, however intimate or impersonal. Is that possible? Which means can the human mind which has been so conditioned for millenia, can such a conditioned mind be aware of itself, know all the intricacies and the complexities and the reactions of the human mind, based upon the senses, and becoming aware of itself bring about a deep transformation, a mutation in itself? That is the real problem. I hope we are communicating with each other. Or am I going too fast?

Perhaps most of us are not used to this kind of thinking, or this kind of explanation. Explanations are not actualities. You can describe the mountain but to be close to the mountain, see actually the beauty of it, the dignity of it, the majesty of it, is quite different from the description of that mountain. But most of us are satisfied sitting in our armchairs to be comforted or made to feel romantic about the mountain through explanations, paintings and so on. But we are actually dealing not with the mountains but with actual daily life of our life. Can that life, which is now a travail, a great deal of effort, struggle, competition, brutality, terror, you know all the things that are going on in our daily life, can that be transformed? Not in some future idealistic, when the environment is completely changed to bring this about, which is impossible, the Totalitarians tried this, change the environment and they say then the human mind can become transformed - which has been proved nonsensical. And also there are the others who say human conditioning, the condition of the human mind can never be changed, you must accept it, live with it, modify it, refine it and make it much more pleasant. But what we are saying is quite the contrary of these two: The human mind can be transformed - not to fall into another conditioning, not into another set of beliefs and dogmas and all that nonsense, but actually bring about in itself a religious quality, which is the only factor of bringing about unity among all human beings. All organizations have failed and you never apparently see such organizations can never do this, but yet we are addicted to organizations, like drugs, like whiskey and so on. We think if we could organize everything would be all right.

Perhaps some of you have heard that story which I have often repeated: there were two friends walking along the road and as they were walking along one of them picks up from the pavement and looks at it and his whole face changes, lightens, delighted and he puts it in his pocket. And the other fellow says, "What have you got? Why are you so happy about it?" "Oh," he says, "I have picked up part of truth, it is so extraordinarily beautiful." And the other fellow says, "Now let's organize it." And we think through organizations, however highly regarded, patronized, plenty of money and so on, blessed by all the Canons of the world, such organizations have never produced unity of human mind because in their very structure and nature they must be divisive, separative, based on some form of idealism or belief, and so they are essentially destructive to bring about this unity of the mind, of the human mind, which requires love, affection, care, attention, responsibility. I hope we are meeting each other, are we? Or am I talking to myself?

Questioner: May I ask you a question?

K: We will do it the day after tomorrow sir. If you are still here, if you are still interested.

So our question is, and has always been: can the human mind, human consciousness, with all its content, the grief, the sorrow, the anxiety, the loneliness, the sense of despair, the desire to fulfil and frustration, the whole of human struggle, is that consciousness with its images of god and you know, all that. Can that consciousness be transformed? Otherwise we will always be separative - please do pay attention a little bit - separative, destructive, self-centred, perpetuating wars and maintaining this everlasting division of nationalities, races, colour and all the rest of it. So if one is serious and deeply concerned with humanity, with man with all his problems - economic, social, religious - all that, can that mind be completely changed?

And the speaker says it can be, it must be. And then the question arises: in what manner can this be brought about? Does it demand discipline? All right sir? We are communicating with each other, you are following? - not verbally, not intellectually but actually becoming aware of one's own conditioning - the number of beliefs, the experiences, dogmas, you know the whole human existence - becoming aware of it, would you ask whether it is possible to transform this enormous past, with all the knowledge it has acquired, can that be transformed? Where there is knowledge in the past or the present acquiring knowledge, knowledge is always incomplete, there is no knowledge as a whole. So with knowledge goes ignorance. Please understand, this is really quite important for you to understand this. As knowledge can never be complete therefore knowledge always goes with ignorance. Part of knowledge is part of ignorance. And when we rely entirely on knowledge as a means of advance, as a means of ascent of man we are also maintaining ignorance. And so there is always this battle between ignorance and knowledge.

And we are saying as human beings live their lives in the past, their whole life is a movement of the past, if you observe it for yourself you can see how we live in the thousand yesterdays, our memories, our experiences, our hurts, our failures, you know the whole movement of time which is the past. And can that movement come to an end so that the mind is fresh, young, alive, new? Knowledge is necessary at certain levels. If you are a doctor you must have knowledge; a surgeon you must have knowledge; if you are a good carpenter you must have a great deal of knowledge of wood and the implements and so on. But knowledge is the result of experience accumulated through thousands and thousands of people through millenia. That knowledge is stored up in our brain from childhood, genetics and so on and so on. And that knowledge, based on experience, is memory. This is all very simple, this is not highly intellectual or anything. And thought is the result of that movement of memory, as knowledge is always with ignorance our memory is always limited. And therefore thought is always limited. Thought can imagine that it can perceive or see or experience the limitless, but thought in itself is the outcome of knowledge with its ignorance and therefore it is essentially, basically limited, fragmented and never possibly can conceive the whole. This again becomes very simple and clear if you go into the whole question of thinking: and our whole nature, our whole civilization, all the cathedrals, all the things in the cathedrals, the rituals, the whole circus of all this is based on thought. And so thought can never be sacred, though it can create an image and call it sacred but that thing which it has created is not sacred because thought itself is limited. And we are caught in the images created by thought. So thought - please follow - thought can never bring about a complete transformation of the human mind. Right? Because all the things that thought has put together as consciousness - are you interested in all this?

Audience: Go on, go on.

K: No?

Audience: Go on, go on, please.

K: If you are not sirs don't bother to listen because this is really very, very serious. You have taken the trouble to come here, in rather rotten weather and you want to find out what the other fellow, what the speaker is trying to say, so you have to listen, you have to find out. And in the very finding it out you test it, you don't accept anything the speaker says. Though he is sitting on a higher platform it doesn't give him any authority. We are investigating into the whole nature of man and whether that can be transformed. Because the way we are living is terrible, destructive, meaningless, going to the office everyday or factory - you know all this. From the moment you pass your school examination, or whatever it is, for the rest of your life, going to the office, struggling, struggling, struggling. And so life becomes utterly meaningless.

So we are saying: thought has created the most beautiful architecture, both in the east and in the west. And the things that have been put in it, in all the various churches, don't get angry please, I am just describing it, it is a fact. Don't resist, just look at it, just listen and if you don't want to listen shut your ears, or if you don't want to be impolite, quietly slip out. Because what we are saying is totally contrary to everything that is going on in the world. We are asking for a psychological revolution, which means the transformation of the human mind with all its miseries, the things that thought has put in there.

So we are saying that thought, do what it will, because in itself it is partial, limited, narrow, based on knowledge, and knowledge goes with ignorance, therefore thought whatever it does, it may write the most beautiful, romantic heaven, theories of god, theories of what society should be and so on, whatever it does it cannot possibly bring about a radical change. But thought has its own place. You cannot go home without knowing, without thinking. If you had total amnesia you would be lost. So thought has its right place, but thought cannot bring this change. If you once see that and grant it, even intellectually, then what is one to do? You understand my question?

Please understand this very deeply, otherwise you will miss the whole point. Man has tried in the east and in the east, depending on thoughts, the ancient Greeks, and ancient Hindus and the ancient Chinese, depending on thought and saying that will help man to change, to bring about a different culture, a different society, and thought has not brought it about. If one actually, deeply realizes that fact, not a theory, not something you come to through argument, through opposing opinions, but an actual fact, then the next question is: what is the factor that will bring about this change? If thought cannot what will? You follow? If a good carpenter has an instrument which is useless he throws it away. But we don't. We keep it. We hope somehow that it will operate through some miracle. We don't throw it away and therefore have the capacity to look in another direction, because we are frightened that if thought is not the solution for all our problems, including political, religious, economic, if thought is not the solution, and if you say, "All right, I will put thought aside, because thought has its place," then our minds are free of the useless instrument which has its own place, then it has a capacity to look in other directions. I wonder if you are following all this? I hope you are doing all this and not merely listening to a lot of words, and consider it as useless and go away.

So what is there, if thought is not the instrument of right action, then what is the instrument - right? Are we together in all this? What do you say? Our senses partially make up our whole mind, obviously. But we use our senses partially - right? One or two senses highly awakened, highly developed, the others are dormant

- right? And is it possible to observe with all our senses, not with one or two senses, with all the senses highly observant? Do you understand the question? Which means is there an observation which is not the instrument of thought? You are following this? May I go on with it? Not for your entertainment, but you are doing it with the speaker. We are doing it together. Which means we are doing it together with care, with attention, with affection, with love, together. Otherwise it is meaningless. You accept a lot of words and go away, it will just be ashes in your hands.

So is there an observation, not partial, but with all the senses observe? Which means is there an observation without the past? Senses have no past, they are acting. You understand this? This is marvellous. I am discovering something myself. The senses are responding according to every challenge, and the senses when they are functioning completely there is pure observation. Isn't it? I wonder if you see this. And that observation is not induced by thought - right? In that observation there is no centre from which to observe. There is only observation, pure and simple without all the pressure and the volume of the past - right? Which implies that one has to go into this whole question of discipline, because we are used to it. We are used to making an effort, to learn is an effort, a language or anything, one has to make a tremendous effort. And is there a possibility of living - please listen to this - is there a possibility of living without a single shadow of effort? Ask yourself please, find out the answer because we have made effort in every direction, and we have not brought about a good society where people can live happily, without fear, without terror, without uncertainty - you follow - all that is going on in the present world.

And we say through organization, making an effort to create an organization we will solve that.

So we are questioning the whole movement of effort - effort to reach god, if there is a god, effort to be noble, effort to have good responsibility in our relationship. And so effort implies the action of will. You are following? Will is desire, and there are multiple forms of desires. And desire in its activity must create effort. If I want a good suit I must make an effort. If I want to be good, in quotes, I must make an effort to be good. If I want to reach god - we won't discuss god - either I must fast, be a celibate, take vows, burn in myself, struggle, struggle, struggle, great efforts to reach the ideal, the highest principle. We are questioning that effort because we are saying that in pure observation, which I have explained a little bit, there is no effort, there is only observation and action. I wonder if you get all this. I'll go into it presently in more detail.

That is why one has to understand the whole nature of desire because we are driven by desire, whether sexual, whether ambitious - you know, all the rest of it, desire becomes the basis of our existence. So we have to go into this whole question of desire. Various monks throughout the world have said no desire - if you would reach god, the highest principle, desire must be suppressed - you know all this. Look at all the monks throughout the world, they are ordinary human beings, taken a vow to serve god and concentrate all their energy on that which means desire must be held, suppressed or transmuted and so on and so on. So one has to investigate desire. Observe desire, not control, suppress, transform - just to observe desire. You understand? Pure observation of desire. In that, if you go into it deeply, thought doesn't enter at all, as we explained just now, I hope. Need I go back to it again?

So we are saying as one of the major factors of life is desire, one has to understand what is desire, how does it dominate our lives, why? - whether it is desire for heaven or illumination, whether it is desire for a house, you know, all the rest of it, desire. How does it come into being? What is the relationship - please just follow it slowly, we will go into it carefully - what is the relationship between the senses and desire? You understand my question? The senses - seeing something in the shop window, a dress, a shirt, whatever it is, a nice piece of furniture, or a beautiful car - that is, seeing and desire. You understand my question? What is the relationship between the two? How would you find out? Read a book? Go to a psychologist? A professor? A guru? A man who says it is so? How will you find out? Because we are so dependent on another's explanation - right? We want to be told. The speaker refuses to be told by the books, by the professors, by all the hierarchical beings in knowledge. So how is one to find out? If we discard all that you are left with yourself. How will you find out what is the relationship between the activities of the senses and desire? Or must they all go always together? Do you understand my question? Are you following all this? That interests you, all this? Gosh! Please bear in mind, if you don't mind, that we are not converting you to anything, to new aspects of desire, or this or that, nothing. We are investigating together.

If you observe very closely the movement of desire: you see something in the window, a dress, a shirt, a trouser, whatever it is, the senses are awakened by that perception, by the seeing of that shirt, of that dress - right? The senses are awakened. Then you touch the material, which is contact and then sensation - right? Please follow this step by step. Seeing, contact, sensation - right? Then, observe it closely you will see it for yourself, then thought comes and makes an image and says how nice it would be for me to have that blue shirt on - right? So when thought makes the image of you having that robe, that dress, and creating the image of you in that dress and how nice you look, then desire begins. You follow this? Do please, it is very interesting if you go into it very deeply. Seeing, contact, sensation, that is perfectly normal, it is so. Then thought comes along and creates the image of you sitting in the car and driving it, and the excitement of the speed and all the rest of it, you have created the image. So thought when it dominates the senses and creates the image, then desire begins.

So the next question is, if that is so, the next question is: why does thought create the image? You understand? It is perfectly right to see a beautiful car, look at it, touch it, the sensation of it. Then thought slips in, you are sitting behind the wheel and driving it. I hope it is a fast car, in spite of the energy trouble! So thought has created this. If one understands this, not verbally, not intellectually but factually, then thought has no relationship with the sensation - you understand? I wonder if you see that. So then there is no question of making an effort to discipline desire, to suppress desire, to transform desire. Because we are accustomed, trained to make an effort, right desire, wrong desire, noble desire, ignoble desire, according to the pattern of each civilization, which civilization is put together by thought - right?

So discipline then has quite a different meaning. Discipline now means to control - right? To struggle to be what is demanded, either Victorian or Modern, permissive, or not permissive, discipline ourselves to be something, control ourselves - you follow? All that is based on an effort to be, to become, to achieve, psychologically we are talking about. So when you understand the nature of desire, what place has effort? You understand?

Psychological effort. What place has discipline? Discipline actually means to learn, it comes from the word disciple, one who is willing to learn from the teacher - to learn. The actual meaning is to learn. We have learnt. You understand? We have learnt together the nature of desire. So where is the whole movement of a civilization which says discipline? - which means conform, imitate, compare - you follow? All that is implied in discipline and much more naturally.

So is it possible to live a daily life without a single effort? You understand? Without a single sense of control. Please this is very dangerous, especially in a permissive society. we are not advocating permissiveness, or the opposite of it. We are examining the whole structure of the human mind, which has been trained to control and the reaction is, let go, do what you want, do the thing you want. On the contrary we are saying understand, look, observe, be aware of your whole existence, not just one part of it - be permissive when you are twenty. But from the beginning of life to the end, look at it, because all religions, organized religions with their dogmas and so on have always demanded this, discipline, to serve god, discipline, make effort. You can't love with effort - can you? Thought can make an effort and says "I will try to love" - but it is not love, it is still the movement of thought based upon knowledge with its ignorance, and thought can never have that quality of love which is whole.

So we are saying: the human condition, which is the human consciousness, not only the particular consciousness, that consciousness is part of the whole of consciousness - I wonder if you see this? Your consciousness, living in a town, living in a village, living with a husband, wife or a girl or boy, that little consciousness with all its problems, whether you live in a happy community or not a community, whether you are living happily with your wife, your girl or whatever it is, happily in quotes, that small particular consciousness is the consciousness of the rest of mankind because they are all particular little consciousnesses. I wonder if you see this. So your consciousness is not separate. I know one likes to think it is all special but our consciousness and its content is put there by thought right? Thought has brought about this limited consciousness. Now to observe this consciousness, however limited, to observe its activity without any direction, just to observe, not choosing "I will keep this part and let the other part go" - just to observe the whole content. When you so observe, which means there is no observer who is the past, then that consciousness has no centre. I wonder if you see this? Our consciousness now is self-centred - right? Me and my activities, me and my problems, me and my job, me and my wife, me and my other wife, other girl, me and so on and so on and so on. This consciousness is the movement of thought. Thought has put in this consciousness various activities, belief, dogmas, rituals, on the one hand, you know all that is going on, called religion, and the business activity, the activity of personal relationship, grief, sorrow, pain, anxiety, guilt - you know, all that - all that is our consciousness. And that consciousness is the consciousness of those people living in Russia or India, China, or America. So if one realizes this, that we are part of the whole of humanity, not English, British, you follow? - all that goes away. Then we become extraordinarily responsible, not to my little family but to all human beings. After all that is love, isn't it? To feel totally responsible for my children who must be educated rightly, not be conditioned to a particular form of British outlook, or French outlook, whether Russian or Totalitarian, or whatever it is, educated so that they become religious human beings. Because in that religion there is unity, which is not to be organized. And right education implies that sense of freedom from fear, from this terrible anxiety to fulfil and so on. It is not the moment to go into right education.

So when one feels that one is representative of all humanity then you become extraordinarily responsible to the whole of mankind, therefore there will be no wars. Oh, you don't see all this. There will be no nationalities. That is actual, you understand, this is not a theory, but when you feel that your consciousness is the rest of mankind, because they suffer in India as well as you do here, in America and so on and so on. So consciousness is the consciousness of mankind and in the freeing of that consciousness of its content we have responsibility to the whole. And that is essentially the nature of love and compassion.

We are going to meet the day after tomorrow. Instead of having dialogues, or discussions, which we have tried all over the world at different times, we thought it would be a good idea to have questions. Whatever question you want to ask, then we will try to answer each question. That's on Tuesday morning.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 28TH AUGUST 1979

There are about over one hundred questions! From the most superficial to the most demanding, deeper questions. I wonder why we ask questions, not because we said we would have questions instead of dialogues, but why do we ask questions? And from whom do we expect an answer? If we put the right question perhaps we should also get the right answer. And it becomes very difficult to answer all these hundred, and over, questions, so we chose some of them. Perhaps some of your questions may not be answered because there are too many of them, and don't think we have chosen what specially suits me, what is most convenient for me to answer because one can ask any kind of question that you want to ask, personal, impersonal, serious or flippant. And we have more or less covered that ground in all these hundred questions.

We will try to answer some of these questions this morning but please bear in mind, if I may remind you, that it is very easy to ask a question but to listen to find out for yourself the right answer one must be fairly inquisitive, fairly serious, fairly demanding. And in answering these questions we are not the Oracle, either from Delphi or from India, or from Washington. Or perhaps you would prefer from London! But please bear in mind that we are sharing the question together: that one may answer the question but the very answering of it perhaps will awaken in each one one's own reaction, either you oppose it or you accept it, or you deny it, or you say, "Yes, it might be true". We are investigating the question together. You understand? Together, therefore it is not I am answering, the speaker is answering and you are just listening. We are together answering the question, though the speaker may put it into words but we are sharing the question, we are sharing, partaking in the answer. I hope that is clear.

On such a lovely morning, which so rarely happens in England, beautiful blue sky, lovely trees on the lawns and the generally clean air, to talk about very serious matters is rather trying. But the first question is:

1st QUESTION: Is it possible ever to be free of self-centred activity? Is there a real self apart from the self created image?

All right. I wonder what we mean by the self. If each one of us was asked to describe in words what is the self, the ego, the personality, the centre, the basis from which we act, from which we think, from which we feel, if each one of us could be clear not only verbally as an idea but actually, what is the self? If you ask somebody what is the self, they would say, "It is all my senses, my feelings, my imagination, my romantic demands, my sense of having a house, a possession, a husband, a wife, my qualities, my struggles, my achievements, my ambitions and so on. Also my aspirations, my unhappiness, my joys, and so on" - all that would be the self. Would we agree to that? You can add more words to it but the essence of it is this centre, the me, my house, my family, my wife, my children, my bank account, what my impulse is, "I want to do this", "I am impelled to go to India to find truth" and so on and so on and so on. Would we agree to that verbal description of what we call the self? Not only the verbal description but the feeling, the me and the you - right? We and they, in which all is included, nationalities, the family tradition, the name, the form, psychosomatic approach and the intellectual capacities, the desire to have more clarity and so on. The me and the you, we and they - right?

And from this centre all action takes place - right? All our aspirations, all our ambitions, our quarrels, our disagreements, our opinions, judgements, experiences, is centred in this - right? Shall I go on? We are together so far, aren't we?

Not only the conscious self acting outwardly but also the deep inner consciousness which is not open, obvious - right? So all this is the me, the I, the ego, the person, the different levels of consciousness, all that is me - right?

Now the questioner asks: is it possible to be free of this centre - right? Why does one want to be free from this centre? Is it because the centre is the cause of division, me and you, my country and your country, my belief and your belief, my god and your god, and so on and so on. And where there is division there must be conflict - right? Can we go on? That is, when the me is the active element that is operating all the time and in you the same me with a different name, with a different colour, with a different job, with a different position, the hierarchical social structure - you are Lord so-and-so, somebody else is your servant and so on, it is the same me dividing itself into different categories - right? Socially, economically, religiously. I think that is fairly clear.

And one realizes where there is division there must be conflict - the Hindu and the Muslim, the Jew and the Arab, the American and the English, the English and the French, the French and the German, the German and so on and so on and so on. That is physically obvious. And that has brought about in the world tremendous wars, great agony of people, brutality, violence - right? The self identifying itself with an ideal, noble or ignoble ideals, and fighting for that ideal. But it is still the ego trip - right? It is like those people who go to India - I don't know why but they do - trying to find spirituality and putting on a different fancy dress and saying, "I am going to find spiritual things there". They have only changed the garb, the clothes but they are essentially the me which is operating all the time, struggling, endeavouring, grasping, denying, deeply attached, deeply attached to one's experiences, to one's ideas, to one's opinions, to one's longings. Right? And as one lives, as one observes this centre, this me, is the essence of all trouble, and also all pleasure, all fear, all sorrow. So it says, "How am I to get rid of this centre?" Is that clear. We can expand it more but that is the essence of it. There are too many questions.

So is it possible the questioner asks to be really free, absolutely not relatively, which is fairly simple. One can be a little unselfish, one can be a little concerned with social welfare, with others and so on, but the centre is always there biting hard, brutal. You all know this. So is it possible to be free of that centre.

First of all the more effort is made to be free of the centre, the more - please listen to this - the more one makes an effort to be free of the centre, that very effort strengthens the self - right? Like those people who go off into meditation of various kinds, trying to impose something upon each and that me then captures that, identifies with that and says, "I have achieved" - but he is still the centre - right?

So please first to understand whether it is possible to be free there must be no effort - right? Which doesn't mean doing what one likes. That is clear, isn't it? No? If one doesn't make an effort then let's do what we like, which is still the movement of the self.

Whether you put on a yellow robe or a purple robe or join a monastery it is the self still, identified with an ideal, and pursuing that ideal through great effort. But the movement is from the centre. I wonder if that is clear, isn't it?

So what is one to do? If you are not to make an effort because you see the truth of it, that the more you make an effort the greater the travail of the self. It is the self that is making an effort to be free of itself, and therefore it is still involved in it, imagining that it will be free, imagining that it will be etc. etc. But it is still the activities of the centre, me. Then what is one to do?

Before we go into that, is there a real self apart from the self created by thought with its images? - the questioner says. Is there a real self? Many people feel that. The Hindus have said there is the highest principle which is the self. And we have imagined also that there is a real self apart from the me. You all, I am sure, feel this. There is something else beyond this me, which is called the higher self, or the sublime self, or the supreme self. The moment we use the word 'self' or use any word to describe that which is beyond the self, the me, it is still the self. The first thing to realize is: is it possible to be free of the self? - without becoming a vegetable, without becoming absent minded, somewhat lunatic, and so on and so on, is it possible? Which means what? Is it possible to be totally free from attachment? That is one of the attributes, one of the qualities of the self - right sirs? I am attached to my reputation. I am attached to my name. I am attached to my experience. I am attached to what I have said and so on. So is it possible to be free from all attachments? Work it out sirs. If you really want to be free of the self, no attachment. Which doesn't mean you become detached, indifferent, callous, shut yourself away, which is another form of the self - you understand? Before it was attached, now it says, "I won't be attached". It is still the movement of the self.

So if a person is serious, really concerned because the world is divided, is this - the me and the you, we and they. We British and they French - or rather the Irish! The black and the white and the brown. So is it possible, without effort, to be free of attachment, to your wife, to your children, to your name - you can't very well be detached from your bank account if you have one, then the bank profits from it, but to be detached - you know what it means? - not to be identified with anything, with your country, with your god, with your - nothing. And therefore when you are really deeply basically not attached then from that deep sense of no attachment comes responsibility. Not responsibility to my wife, to my children, to my nephew, niece, the sense of responsibility - right. Will you do it? That is the question. We can talk everlastingly, put it into different words but when it comes to testing it, acting, we don't seem to want to do it. And so we prefer to go on as we are, status quo, slightly modified but carry on, with our quarrels, you know all the things that are happening in the world. And to be free from your own experience, from your own knowledge, from your own accumulated perception - you understand all this?

So it is possible if you go at it. And it doesn't take time. That is one of our excuses that we must have time to be free. When you see one of the major factors of the self is attachment and you see what it does in the world, and what it does in your relationship with another, separation and all the rest, ultimately quarrels, divorce, all the ugliness of relationship, if you see the truth of attachment, then that very truth is so, it is actual. Then you are free from it. Your own perception sets you free - right? Will you do it?

2nd QUESTION: Will the practice of Yoga as it is being done in Europe and America help to bring about a spiritual awakening? Is it true that Yoga will awaken deeper energy, which is called Kundalini?

From the sublime to the ridiculous! The so-called Yoga which the west and part of the east in India, was invented about the seventeenth and eighteenth century, the exercises, in order not only to have a very good body, healthy body, through force, you understand, through discipline, control, in order to awaken so-called higher energies - seventeenth, eighteenth century. The real Yoga, which is called Raja Yoga, King of Yogas, is to lead a highly moral life - not morality according to circumstances, according to culture, but true ethical activity in life - not to hurt, not to drink, not to drug yourself, right amount of sleep, right amount of food, clear thinking, and acting morally, doing the right thing. I won't go into all that, what is right and wrong. They never mentioned, as far as I understand after talking with a great many scholars, they never mentioned about exercise. They say exercise normally, walk, swim, all that, but their emphasis was a very moral life, a mind which is active.

And modern yoga - the meaning of the word you all know, you probably know, I have talked to the scholars too and they say it doesn't quite mean that, which is to join. The meaning of the word, Yoga, is to join, join the higher with the lower, or the lower with the higher. You understand? And modern Yoga - I don't know why I am talking about all this nonsense! - I don't know why they call it yoga, it should be called just exercise but that wouldn't appeal to you! You have to pay money to learn yoga, to breathe properly and all that. You can practise yoga, the exercises of different kinds, the speaker has done some of it for years, taught by the experts, fortunately they didn't charge! Because they also thought I was an expert!! Sorry. (Laughter) I am not an expert and so they soon deserted me! I deserted them.

Sirs, you can do this kind of yoga exercise for the rest of your life, you won't awaken spiritual insight, nor will the awakening of a higher energy come into being. You know in the east they have a word for this called Kundalini, some of you probably have read or been caught in that word. But most of the people, as far as I have discussed with them, who have gone into this matter very deeply, they are always quoting somebody else, back to the original mischief-maker - sorry. (Laughter). And none of them, please believe me, none of them have awakened this thing. They talk about it. They feel certain experience, which they call by this name. I have discussed with them very seriously and what they are talking about is a certain form of increasing energy to do more mischief. I mean that. By eating the right food, by control, by breathing properly, etc. etc. etc., you have more energy, naturally. And that gives you a sense of superiority, and you are enlightened and so on.

But there is a different form of - I won't go into it because you are all eager, I am not touching it! - that can only happen when the self is not. Then there is a totally different kind of energy to keep the mind fresh, young, alive and that can only come when there is absolutely no sense of the self - right? Obviously. Because the self, the me, the centre, is in constant conflict - right? Wanting, not wanting, creating dualities, opposing desires, this constant struggle that is going on. As long as that struggle is going on there is a wastage of energy obviously. When that struggle is not, there is a totally different kind of energy taking place - right?

There is the story of a man, a philosopher, or a patriarch, who was a well-known teacher. And a disciple came to him and said, "Master teach me to meditate". So he sat up in the right position, you know, and closed his eyes and began to breathe very deeply, trying to capture the higher webs and vibrations and all the rest of it. So the Master picks up two pieces of stone and rubs them, keeps on rubbing them. And the disciple opens his eyes and says, "Master, what are you doing?" He said, "I am trying to make out of these stones a mirror so that I can look at myself" and the disciple says, "Master you can never do that". He says, "In the same way, my friend, you can sit like that and breathe like that for ever but you will never..." - got it?

3rd QUESTION: Can there be absolute security for man in this life?

This is a very serious question because we all want security, both physical and principally psychological. If you are psychologically secure, certain, then we might not be so concerned with physical security.

The search for psychological security - please follow this - the search for psychological security is preventing physical security. We will go into this. The questioner says: is there absolute security for us, for human beings? We will answer that at the end but follow it step by step.

We must have security - right? Like a child hanging on to its mother, the child must feel secure otherwise something goes wrong. They have found this. If the mother and the father don't pay enough attention to the baby, give it all affection, etc. etc., it affects the brain, the nerves of the baby and the child. So it must have security, physical security.

And why do we demand psychological security? Do you understand the difference between the two? There is the psyche demanding security and the physical demanding security - right? This is obvious. Now is there psychological security at all? We want it, we want security in our relationship - right? My wife, my children, a sense of family unit. That unit is now breaking up. In that there is a certain security, psychological - right? So one is attached to the wife, or to the girl - right? So in that attachment there is security, at least we think there is security. And when there is no security in that person we soon break away from it and find it in another - right? This is happening. And we try to find security in a group, in the tribe - that glorified tribe is the nation - right? No? I am glad. And the nation against another nation - you follow? So thinking security psychologically is in a person, in a country, in a belief, in your own experience, all these are forms of wanting, demanding security, as one demands physical security - right?

Please we are sharing this together, you are not just listening to me. We are together examining if there is security for us human beings. And demanding the psychological security we have divided ourselves - right? The Hindu, the Muslim, the Jew, the Arab, the Christian, the non Christian, believer in Jesus, the believer in something else - in all this there is the demand for security. And this security has been found in illusions - right? Do you accept that? Right? Being secure in Catholicism, hold yourself tight. In Buddhism, in Hinduism, in Judaism, Islam and so on - you follow? That has created an illusory security because they are fighting each other. I wonder if you see this? Do you? The moment you see it you don't belong to anything.

So wait a minute. So the demand is for security. It may be an illusion in superstition, in a ritual, in a dogma, in a nation, in an economic system, in Totalitarianism, in being safe, secure, economically, like in America, completely safe, at least they think they are. So the desire for security not only creates illusion, because it is an illusion, isn't it, to belong to a tribe, or belonging to some church, so one finds security in illusions, in actualities, in a furniture, in a house, in a person. None of these, as you observe, give man security, because you have had two terrible wars - you haven't had - you follow? You want security but you create wars, which destroys your own security.

So when you see the truth that the mind, or thought has sought out security in illusions - right? - the very perception that you are seeking security in illusion, that very perception of that brings you intelligence - right? Are you following this? Are you following this? Please don't, unless I make it perfectly clear, don't agree with me.

I sought security in my belief as being a Hindu with all the nonsensical superstitions and gods and rituals and all the nonsense that goes on. I sought security in that - I haven't but suppose one does. That opposes another group of people who have different ideas, different gods, different rituals - Catholic and all the rest of it. So these are the two opposing elements, tolerated but they are antagonistic essentially. So there is conflict between the two, in which I have sought security in one or the other - right? And I realize, by Jove, they are both illusions, in which I have tried to find security - right? And to see that they are illusions is intelligence. It is like seeing danger. A man who is blind to danger is an idiot, is something neurotic, there is something wrong with him. But we don't see the danger of this - right? And the man who sees the danger, intelligence is in operation. In that intelligence there is absolute security. You get it? Do you understand this?

That is, the mind, thought has created various forms of illusions, nationalities, class, me and you, different gods, different beliefs, different dogmas, different rituals, the extraordinary religious superstitions that pervade the world, in all that one has sought security. And one doesn't see the danger of this security, of this illusion. When one sees the danger, not as an idea but an actual fact, that intelligence is the supreme form of absolute security. Right? Are we together? Are you intelligent? (Laughter) Otherwise we miss it. You may say, "I don't believe in any religions, I have no beliefs, I have no this, I have no that" - but the me is in operation, which has created all this and you are opposing all that by another word, another belief, another idea.

So there is absolute security, which means to see the truth in the false - got it? I wonder if you see this?

4th QUESTION: Emotions are strong. Our attachments are strong. How does looking and seeing reduce the strength and power of these emotions?

Right? Can we go on with that question? Trying to control, suppress, sublimate emotions and attachments in no way reduces the conflict, does it? Clear? Are we generally aware of our emotions? Are we aware of our attachments, which say emotions are very strong, attachments are very strong, are we aware of that? Do you know that you are attached? Go on sirs, find out. Are you attached strongly? And are your emotions so extraordinarily strong that they act? So first one has to be conscious, aware, know, recognize, see that your emotions are strong. And know also, be aware, recognize that you are attached. If that is so, when you are so conscious, what takes place? Do you understand my question?

I am conscious of my attachment, or my strong emotions of hate, jealousy, antagonism, like and dislike, I am conscious of it - right? Are you? Please we are sharing this together. Now do they, being so strong, overshadow, control my action? I am examining, looking, observing, the emotions and attachments which are apparently very strong, and they act as barriers to clear thinking, to clear action, to unconfused thinking. So am I aware of them? Or we take it for granted? You follow my question? Say, "Yes, I have very strong emotions, I am terribly attached, but it doesn't matter. It is part of life. I don't mind struggling. I don't mind having quarrels with everybody". There is a lovely joke but I won't go into it!

(Laughter)

So are we aware of them? Now if you are aware what takes place? Please examine it yourself. You are attached. Are you aware that you are attached? Just aware. You know that you are attached to that person, or to that piece of furniture, or to a belief, to a dogma, you know all the rest of it, attached to something. Now when you say you are aware, what do you mean by that? Know, recognize. Is thought recognizing the attachment? You follow? You say, "Yes, I am attached" - is it the activity of thought that says, "I am attached"? - you follow? Go into this please with me. Take a few minutes. Pay attention. Please sir quiet.

When you say, "I am attached", is it an idea? Or is it a fact? The fact is not the idea. This microphone, I can create an idea of it but that is a fact. I can touch, see - right? So is my attachment a concept? A conclusion? Or is it a fact that I am attached? You see the difference? Do you? Please. So when you are observing the fact, not the idea, not the conclusion about the fact, but the fact and you are aware of it, is the fact different from you who are observing the fact? You are following all this? I hope your minds are all active. It is clear, isn't it? Am I observing the fact through an idea, or through a conclusion? Or I have heard somebody say that - you follow? - therefore I look, which means I am looking through a screen of ideas. So I am not looking at the fact.

So I am looking now at the fact. I am not verbalizing the fact and looking at it. How do I look at it? As something separate from me - you understand? Attachment, something different from me? Or that is part of me? Do you understand? Don't go to sleep please. If you want to sleep, sleep but if you are serious for a few minutes, see this fact. That is, am I looking as though it was something apart from me? The microphone is apart from me, but attachment, emotions are part of me. Attachment is the me. If I have no attachment there is no me. So awareness of your emotions and attachments are part of your nature, part of your structure. So you are looking at yourself, so there is no division, there is no duality, me and attachment. There is only attachment, not the word but the fact, the feeling, the emotions, the possessions, the possessiveness in attachment. That is a fact. So that is me.

So what am I to do with the me? You understand? Now please follow this step by step. If you get tired, or if you are distracted, be distracted but come back. So when there was division between me and attachment I could do something about it - right? Do you follow this? I could control it, I could say, "No, I mustn't be", or suppress it, or do something about it all the time - right? Which we do. But if it is me, what can I do? Wait, wait. Follow it closely. If it is me, what can I do? I can't do anything, can I? I can only observe. Do you see the difference? Before I acted upon it. Now I can't act upon it because it is me, it is my arm, it is part of me. So all that I can do is to observe - right? So observation becomes all important, not what you do about it. You see the difference?

So there is observation, not I am observing. There is only observation. In that observation, if I begin to choose and say "I mustn't be attached" - I have already moved away in saying that is not me. You understand all this? So in observation there is no choice, there is no direction, just pure absolute clear observation. Then the thing that is being observed dissolves. Before you resisted it, you controlled it, you suppressed it, you acted upon it. Now in that observation all energy is centred. It is only when there is the lack of energy there is attachment. I wonder if you see this? Do you see this?

That is, when there is complete observation without any interference of thought, because you are observing. Why should thought come in? You understand the point? You are just observing the fly the thing that you call the fly, just observe. In the same way to observe so completely your emotions, attachments, then there is a gathering of all energy in that observation. Therefore there is no attachment. I explained very carefully, it is only the unintelligent that are attached. It is only the people who do not see the full implications of attachment that are attached. And they pervade the world, they are the stronger element in the world and we are caught in that. But when you begin to examine this closely, look at it, then you are no longer caught in that, so you are no longer dissipating energy in something which has no meaning, naturally. So your energy is now centred completely in observation, therefore there is total dissipation of attachment. Test it, do it and you will find out. But you have to go step by step, don't jump into something or other, you have to examine the thing very, very closely so that your mind is absolutely clear in the observation - right? It is only the unaware that jump over the cliff. The moment you are aware of danger, move. Attachment is a danger because it breeds fear, anxiety, hate, jealousy, being possessed and being not possessed - the whole of that, that is a tremendous danger. And when you see danger you act - not you act, there is action.

5th QUESTION: Why does the mind so readily accept trivial answers to such deeply felt problems?

The questioner says, why do I accept trivial explanation when a deep problem is concerned? You understand? Why do I live in words? That is the real problem. You understand? Why have words become so colossally important? No? I suffer, go through great agonies. And you come along and give me explanations and in that explanation I seek comfort. There is god, there is reincarnation, there is this, there is that, there is something else. So I accept the word because it gives me comfort. The explanation gives me comfort, the belief gives me comfort, when I am in agony, in anxiety. So explanations by philosophers, by analysts, by psychologists, by the priests, by the yoga teachers - explanations - it is on that we live, which means we live secondhand. We are secondhand people and we are satisfied with that. You use the word 'god' to a Catholic or to a man who believes in Jesus - you follow? - the word, the image, which word is a symbol, the image is a symbol. So symbols become extraordinarily important, like the flag. Oh sirs, you don't face all this.

Why does the mind do this? Is it because we read a great deal of what other people have said, we listen to what other people have said, we see in the cinema what is taking place - others? Always somebody else out there telling me what to do. So my mind is crippled by this. So I am always living secondhand. Goodness. You understand sirs?

And we have never asked: can I be a light to myself? You understand? Not the light of someone else, including Jesus or the Buddha or somebody else. Can I be a light to myself? Which means no shadow. You understand? Because to be a light to oneself means it is never put out by any artificial means, by circumstances, by sorrow, by accident and incidents - a light. Can one be that to oneself? One can only be that to oneself when your mind has no challenge because it is so fully awake. But most of us need challenges because most of us are asleep. We are asleep because we have been put to sleep by all the philosophers, by all the saints, by all the gods and priests and politicians - right? We have been put to sleep. And we don't know we are asleep, we think this is normal. So a man who wants to be a light to himself has to be free of all this. And the light to oneself can only take place when there is no self. Then that light is the eternal, everlasting, immeasurable light - right sirs.

Could we go on with these questions instead of dialogues, discussions?

Audience: Yes.

K: I thought so! I do all the talking and you - I hope not.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 30TH AUGUST 1979

We have so far one hundred and fifty questions! I don't think it will be possible to answer all of them this morning. Probably one needs a month to answer them, and you won't be here and I won't be here.

I think before we answer these questions, please remember that we are sharing the question as well as the answer. Your particular question may not be answered because there are too many of them to go into each one, but I think we have more or less chosen, or gathered together representative questions out of that hundred and fifty. So I hope you will not mind if your particular question is not answered. Most of us I am afraid ask questions and try to find an answer from others. When we do put a question one must find out why we put them. Is it a genuine, serious applicable question? Or just a fanciful question and therefore no answer that can be properly correct and true? But as we said, we are going to share together the question and the answers. And I hope that we can do that this morning. I hope you are not too hot.

1st QUESTION: The speaker has said that going to an office everyday from nine to five is an intolerable imprisonment. But in any society all kinds of jobs have to be done. Is K's teaching therefore only for the few?

You have understood? Shall I read it again? The speaker has said that human society is so constructed throughout the world that most people are occupied with jobs, pleasant or unpleasant, from nine to five everyday of their life. And he said also that it is an intolerable imprisonment. I don't know how you feel about it.

Probably you like being in prison, probably you like your jobs from nine o'clock to five o'clock, rushing, rushing back and all the rest of it. What shall we do? To the speaker he wouldn't tolerate it for a single minute - for the speaker. I would rather do something which would be pleasant, helpful and necessary to earn enough money and so on. But most of us accept this prison, this routine - right? We accept it. So what shall we do? Nobody, as far as one is capable of sufficient observation, nobody has questioned this. We say it is normal, it is the way of society, it is the way of our life, it is the way we must live. But if we all see together that such an imprisonment, which it is actually, that we all feel it is intolerable, not just verbally but actually do something about it we will create a new society - right? We will if all of us say we will not tolerate for a single day this routine, this monstrous activity of nine to five, however necessary, however good and pleasant, then we will bring about not only psychological revolution but also outwardly. Right? We may agree about this but will we do it? You might say, "No, I can't do it because I have responsibility, I have children, I have a house and mortgage, insurance" - thank god I haven't got any of those! And so you might say, "It is easy for you to talk about all this." But it is easy for the speaker to talk about it because he refuses to go in that pattern. From boyhood he refused it.

Now if we all consider that such a psychological as well as physical revolution of this kind is necessary, not bloody and all the rest of it, then we will create the society - won't we? You want others to create the society and you can then slip into it. That is what we are all waiting for. A few struggle, work, create, and refuse to enter into this rat race and the others say, "Yes, after you have constructed what you think is right society, then we all join you" - but we don't do it together. That is the whole problem.

Right? If we all had this, not idea but the fact, that to spend our life from nine o'clock to five o'clock probably before that, every day of our life for sixty years and more, we would do something about it.

As if you refuse to have wars - you understand - wars, killing other people in the name of your country, your god, whatever the ideal is, if you all refused to kill another there would be no wars - right?

But we have constructed a society, built a society, based on violence, armaments, each nation protecting itself against other nations, and so we are perpetuating wars, killing your sons, your daughters, everything. And we support it. In the same way we support, maintain this imprisonment. It may be pleasant for those who have an agreeable job but those who refuse to enter this game they will act, they will do something.

So the problem is, do we see the importance, or the necessity of this change? After all the human mind is not merely occupied with a particular job, pleasant or unpleasant. The human mind has the quality of other things which we disregard. We are concerned with the whole of life, not just a career, nine to five, how we live, what we do, what our thinking is, whether there is affection, care, love, compassion. All that is part of life. But we are so conditioned to this idea that we must work and create a structure of a society that demands that you work from morning until night. The speaker refuses to pay into that rat race. It isn't that he has got certain gifts or that somebody will look after him, but he refuses to enter that. I wouldn't go for a single day from nine to five for anybody, for anything. I might die but I wouldn't do that. In the same way I wouldn't kill another human being whatever the circumstances. I know what you are going to say - 'What if your sister is attacked?' - you know all that game. Because violence produces more violence. You are seeing that in Ireland. But we are all so timid, we are all so nervous, frightened, anxious, we want security which we think we have, which we haven't got.

So will you go into this and find out if you can free yourself from that rat race and to find out one must exercise capacity, intelligence, not say, "I won't do it". You don't do it because you are intelligent, not because you are told, or you have read in some book, or some philosopher. I think it is very clear.

And also the questioner asks: are K's teachings therefore only for the few? This is one of the questions that is asked over and over again. What do you think? If it is for the few it is not worth it. Wait a minute, just go slowly. The speaker says it is for everyone. But everyone is not serious, has not got the energy because he is dissipating it in various ways. And so gradually there are very few - you follow? So observing it, say it is only for the few. Whereas actually if you apply, go into it seriously with the spirit of investigation and wanting to live a different kind of life, it is for everyone. There is nothing secret about it. But there is great mystery if you go beyond the limitation of thought. But we don't do any of these things, we don't test it out, we don't apply, we don't eat the food that is put before us. And the few that eat it say, "We are the elite". They actually are not the elite, they are only the serious people that have applied, thought about it, gone into it, seeing that it affects their daily life. It is only then one can create a different kind of society.

2nd QUESTION: Isn't insight intuition? (You have heard these two words, I am sure.) Would you discuss this sudden clarity some of us have. What do you mean by insight and is it a momentary thing or can it be continuous?

In the various talks the speaker has given he has used the word 'insight'. That is, to see into things, into the whole movement of thought, into the whole movement, for example, of jealousy. To perceive the nature of greed, to see the whole content of sorrow. Not analysis, not exercise of intellectual capacity, nor is it the result of knowledge, knowledge being that which has been accumulated through the past as experience, stored up in the brain, therefore knowledge always goes with ignorance. There is no complete knowledge, therefore there is always knowledge and ignorance, like two horses tethered.

So then what is insight? You understand my question? You are following this? Please it is a hot morning but it doesn't matter a little bit. If the observation is not based on knowledge, or on intellectual capacity of reasoning, exploring, analysing, then what is it? That is the whole question.

And the questioner asks also: is it intuition? That word 'intuition' is rather a tricky word because many of us use that word. The actuality of intuition may be the result of desire. One may desire something and then a few days later you have an intuition about it. And you think that intuition is most extraordinarily important. But if you go into it rather deeply you may find that it is based on desire, on fear, on various forms of pleasure. So one is rather doubtful about that word, specially used by those people who are rather romantic, who are rather imaginative, sentimental and wanting something. And they would certainly have intuitions but it may be based on some obvious self-deceptive desire. So for the moment we can put aside intuition, that word. I hope I am not hurting anybody who is caught in intuitions.

And if that is not so, then what is insight? That is, to perceive something instantly which must be true, logical, sane, rational. You understand? And that insight must act instantly. It isn't that I have an insight and do nothing about it. If I have an insight, if one has an insight into the whole nature of thinking - you understand? - that is, I will explain a little bit about thinking. Thinking is the response of memory. Memory is the result of experience, knowledge, stored up in the brain. And the memory responds. Where do you live? You answer. What is your name? There is immediate response. And so on. Thought is the result or the response of the accumulated experience, knowledge as memory. That is simple. So that thought based upon, or the outcome of knowledge, that thought is limited because knowledge is limited. So thought can never be all inclusive. It must always be partial, limited, based on knowledge and ignorance. Therefore it is everlastingly confined, limited, narrow - right? Now to have an insight into that, which means, is there an action which is not merely the repetition of thought - you are following all this? - to have an insight into say organizations, let's take that. Right? To have an insight into it, which means that you are observing without memory, remembrances, without argumentation, pro and con, just to see the whole movement and the demand for organization. Then you have an insight into it, and from that insight you act. And that action is logical, is sane, healthy. It is not you have an insight and then you act the opposite, then it is not insight. I wonder if you are getting all this? Sorry to be so emphatic. That is my way of doing it.

To have an insight, for example, into the wounds, hurts that one has received from childhood. You understand my question? We are all people who are hurt for various reasons, from childhood until we die there is this wound in us, psychologically. Now to have an insight into the whole nature and structure of that hurt. Do you understand? Are you following all this? You are hurt, aren't you sirs? - wounded psychologically? Play the game with me. The ball is in your court. You are hurt obviously. You may go to a psychologist, analyst, psychotherapist, and they trace why you are hurt, from childhood, your mother was this and your father was that, or you are put in the wrong part or the right part and so on and so on. (Laughter) Don't please. Go into it. And by merely looking, or seeking out the cause the hurt is not going to be resolved. It is there. And the consequences of that hurt is isolation, fear, resistance, and not to be hurt more, therefore self-enclosure. You know all this. That's the whole movement of being hurt. The hurt is the image that you have created for yourself about yourself. right? So as long as that image remains you will be hurt, obviously. Now to have an insight into all that, without analysis, to see it instantly and the very perception of that insight, which demands all your attention and energy, the hurt is dissolved. And therefore when it is dissolved there is no further hurt. I wonder if you get all this?

If one may ask most politely, you have heard this, have you got that insight that will dissolve your hurt completely, leaving no mark, and therefore no more hurt, nobody can hurt you. You understand? Because the image that you have created about yourself is non-existent. Are you following all this? Are you doing it? Or are you just merely verbally paying attention to the words?

Questioner: I don't really understand what you mean when you say we have created this hurt.

K: First of all, who is hurt? What do you mean by being hurt? Sir, what do you mean by being hurt? You say, "I am hurt" - consciously you are aware of it or not. One is hurt. Now what is that which is being hurt? Do you understand my question? Do you understand sir? What is that which is hurt? You say, "It is me". What is that 'me'? It is the image you have about yourself. If I have an image about myself, I am marvellous, spiritual, blah, blah - eh? - and you come along and say, "No, you are a silly ass" - I get hurt. (Laughter) That is, thought - please follow this - thought has created an image about oneself and that image is always comparing: my image is better than your image, and so on and so on and so on. So as long as one has this image about oneself it is going to be trodden on by somebody. And that is called hurt, wounds, psychologically.

To have an insight into that means to see the whole movement, the cause and the image and therefore the very perception ends the image. Do you understand this? No?

3rd QUESTION: You say that organizations will not help man to find what we Christians call salvation. So why do you have your own organization?

In 1925 - perhaps some of you weren't born even - in 1925 the speaker was the head of a very big vast organization. He was the head of it and they looked up to him with devotion - you know, all that stuff, candles and all that! (Laughter) Please don't laugh, we are just stating facts. And it was considered a spiritual organization, a religious organization. And in 1925 - or was it 28 or 29, I have forgotten, it is not important - that organization called 'The Order of the Star' was dissolved by the speaker, because he said that any spiritual organization of any kind is not spiritual. And he dissolved that organization, returned the properties, the whole works of it.

Now he has - not, he has - there are several Foundations, one in India, one in this country, America and Canada. In India there are five schools, in different parts of that country, with a great deal of land. And they are schools, they are operated under the K. Foundation, which is responsible for the land, to see that the schools are more or less in the right direction - less perhaps than more! And here also there is a Foundation with a school and we are hoping the school will keep in the right direction. And the Foundation is responsible to gather all these talks, tapes, publish and so on and so on. And it is the same in America and in Canada. There is nothing spiritual about it. Right? They merely act as function. They are necessary, the law demands it. And to publish the books - you know, all the rest of it. And to see that the teachings are kept fairly pure. That is the only function of these Foundations - right? It has no other function. They are not spiritual bodies which you can join and attain Nirvana, or Heaven or whatever. It is very simple, very clear. Is that all right? So don't please next time ask about why do you have organizations. It is very simple: there are schools, they publish, tapes, arrange talks wherever I go and some of them look after the speaker physically, because the speaker has no money. When the speaker is in India they look after him, here they look after him, when the speaker is in America they do the same. Full stop. That is finished, isn't it? Shall we go on to the next question?

4th QUESTION: Is sex incompatible with a religious life? What place has human relationship in spiritual endeavour?

First of all why have human beings, right throughout the world, made sex so important in their life? Do you understand my question? Why? Now in the west it is permissive, boys or girls of twelve, thirteen, have already sex. And one asks why have human beings throughout their activities, throughout their lives made this thing of such colossal importance? Go on sirs, answer it. Put the question. We are sharing the question together - right? You are not just listening to a Delphic Oracle, but together we are investigating. It is your life. We are looking at it.

There are those gurus, and there is a whole philosophy called Tantra - part of it - is based on sex. That through sex you can reach god - whatever that god be. And that is very popular. And there are those, like the monks, the Indian Sannyasis, and the Buddhist priests, have denied sex because they have all maintained that it is a waste of energy, and to serve god you must come with all your energy. Therefore deny, suppress, burn inside yourself with all the demands but suppress it, control it. So you have the permissive, and the so-called religious suppression. And those in between who enjoy everything, both sides, they have one foot in this and one foot in the other! Then they can talk about both things and see if they cannot harmonize the two together and find god - or whatever you want to find. Probably you will find at the end of it a lot of nonsense!

So we are asking: why has man, woman, made this sex business so important? Right? Why don't you give the same importance to love - do you understand? To compassion? Not to kill? Why do you give only such immense value to sex? You are following what I am saying? Your wars, terrors, national divisions, the whole immoral society in which we live, why don't you give an equal importance to all that and not only to this? You are following my question? Why? Is it because sex is your greatest pleasure in life? The rest of your life is a bore, a travail, a struggle, a conflict, meaningless existence? And this at least gives you a certain sense of great pleasure, a sense of well being, a sense of - you know - what you call relationship, and what you also call love - right? Is that the reason why we are so sexually crazy? Go on sirs, answer yourselves. Because we are not free in any other direction. We have to go to the office from nine to five, where you are bullied, where your boss is over you - you know all that happens in an office, or in a factory, or in another job where there is somebody dominating you. And our minds have become mechanical - are you following all this? - we repeat, repeat, repeat, we fall into a tradition, into a groove, into a rut. Our thinking is that: I am a Christian, I am a Buddhist, I am a Hindu, I am a Catholic, I worship the Pope - you know, the whole thing is clearly marked and you follow that. Or you reject all that and form your own routine.

So our minds have become slaves to various patterns of existence - right? So it has become mechanical. And sex may be pleasurable and gradually that too becomes mechanical. So one asks, if you want to go very deeply into it, one asks: is love sex?

Go on, ask it. Is love pleasure? Is love desire? Is love a remembrance of an incidence, which you call sex, with all the imagination, the pictures, the thinking about it, is that love? Oh, for god's sake! Is love a remembrance?

And the questioner asks: (Oh, lord, I have forgotten where is it? Here it is.) what place has human relationship in spiritual endeavour? You see what it is reduced to? Human relationship is pleasure, sex, conflict, quarrels, divisions, you go your way, I'll go my way - you follow? That is our relationship, actual relationship in our daily life. And what place has human relationship in spiritual endeavour? Obviously the present relationship has no place whatsoever, obviously. We are jealous of each other, we want to possess each other, we want to dominate each other and so there is antagonism between each other, one is sexually unsatisfied therefore you go to somebody else, and in that sexual relationship there is loneliness - right? All this sir. And always seeking your own pleasure. Is that all love?

So you disregard, put aside that thing called love, perhaps that is the most wonderful thing if one has it, and are so caught up in this vortex or one's own desire, of one's own pleasure - right? So we are always wanting not only sexual satisfaction but gratification in every direction, which is based on pleasure. And that we call love. From that we kill each other - right? Love of the country.

So when at the end of this you say why has man, woman, given this one thing such extraordinary importance? All the magazines, you know all that is happening. Is it man, woman, have lost their creative capacity? - not sexual capacity - you understand? - creative capacity. To be able to see, to be a light to themselves, not to follow anybody, not to worship any image, illusion, belief. When you put aside all that and you have understood your own petty little desires, which is your own sexual demands, gratifications, then when you see all that, have an insight into all that, then out of that comes creation. It doesn't mean painting a picture, or writing a poem. That sense of ever freshness - you understand? Having a mind that is fresh, young, innocent all the time, not clouded, burdened with all kinds of memories, dissatisfactions, fears and anxieties, you know, when you have lost all that there is a totally different kind of mind. Then sex has its own place. But when sex becomes a means of religious endeavour - you understand what I am saying? - then we get completely bogged down.

Apparently we don't have that quality of scepticism - you understand? To be sceptical about one's own demands, to question, doubt these innumerable gurus. And doubt also becomes rather dangerous because if you don't hold it then you doubt everything and then there is no end. It is like having a dog on a leash, you must let it go occasionally, or often so that the dog enjoys himself, runs about. In the same way doubt must be kept on a leash and also allowed, take away the leash, so the mind is - you know, the mind being your heart, your brain, your emotions, everything active, not just directed in one direction which is sex, sex, sex.

5th QUESTION: Can thought be aware of itself as it is taking place? Or does the awareness come after the thought? Can consciousness be aware of its whole content?

Most of us are aware after the happening - right? - after the incident, after an action. Then we say, "I should have done", "I shouldn't have done". The questioner asks: can thought be aware of itself as it arises? - not after, which is fairly simple, which is what most of us do. But the question is: can there be awareness of thought as it arises? Do you understand the question? You understand the question at least? Can you be aware - please listen - of your thought? That is, can thought be aware of itself, as it arises? You understand the question? That is, one's whole life is based on thought, thought recognizing the emotion, the sentiment, the romantic feelings, the imagination and so on, thought is recognizing all this - right? "Oh, I am very emotional" and so on. Now thought is our instrument of all action - right? Therefore there is no spontaneity. If you look into yourself seriously spontaneity can only exist when there is complete, total freedom, psychologically.

So can your mind be aware of itself as thought arises? That is, is there an awareness when you begin to be angry? You follow all this? Can there be an awareness as jealousy arises? Can there be an awareness as greed comes - be aware of that? Can there be? Or you are aware that you have been jealous, or that you have been greedy or that you have been angry? That is fairly simple, most of us do that. But to be aware so attentively you can see for yourself the anger coming in, the adrenaline and all the processes, the whole movement of anger. You can see greed come into being: you see something you want and - you follow? - reaction. To be aware of that. Of course one can as it arises.

Now the question is a little more difficult, more deep. Can thought - please listen to this - which is, you can be aware as anger arises, that is fairly simple, but is there an awareness of thought itself? You understand what I am saying? You are thinking now, aren't you? Or are you all absent minded? You are thinking now, aren't you? Now as you are thinking find out if that thinking can be aware of itself. Not you aware of thinking - do you understand the problem? I wonder if you see this. This is really great fun if you go into it. Not only fun, it is very, very serious because we can go very, very deeply into all this. That is, you are thinking about something, about your dress, how you look, what people have said, what you are going to meet, and this and that - thinking is there. Now take one thought and see if that thought can know itself. Ah, yes sir, this requires tremendous attention which you are not used to. You are thinking about the dress you have had, or you are going to buy. The thought that arises, can that thought say, "Yes, I am awake" - you understand? I see myself, itself, not you observe the thought because you are also thought. Do you understand? So you are not aware as thought arises but thought itself is aware as it comes into being. I wonder if you see this. No. Right? That is one question.

The other is: can consciousness be aware of its whole content? Do you understand? Consciousness, to put it very quickly and briefly, is its content, isn't it? Your belief, your name, your nationality, your prejudices, your opinions, your conclusions, your hopes, your despairs, your depression, your concern about yourself, you believe and you don't believe, you believe in being a British - you follow - god or no god. All that - your anxieties, your fears, all that is the content of you - right? Your sexual demands, your urges, your pleasures - all that is your consciousness, and can that consciousness - please listen to it - be aware of its own content, as a whole, not just a part? You get the point? No.

This is real meditation, you understand? Not all the nonsense that goes on. Because to see the whole of your being, not just your sexual demands because sex isn't your only life, there are fears, death, anxiety, guilt, despair, depression - you follow? - sorrow, all that is part of your life. So all that is your consciousness. Now the questioner asks: can your consciousness be aware of its whole content? That means can you observe - not you observe - is there an observation of the whole thing? One has to go very deeply into this. We haven't time but we will go briefly into it.

That consciousness is put together by time, through time, through what we call evolution. You have had incidents, accidents, remembrances, racial, national and so on, family, all that is a movement contained in consciousness - right? And is it ever possible to be completely free of that content. Do you understand? No, you are not interested in all this. This is really very important because otherwise we are always acting in the field of the known, the known being the unknown also, the ignorance. There is never freedom. That is, a man always living in the past, as you do. You may project that past into the future as an ideal, as a hope and so on, but it is still the movement of the past, modified through the present - right? So a man who is more or less living in the past, what is his mind - you understand? He may have new techniques, new opportunities to learn other forms of skills but it is essentially, in himself, his consciousness is the movement of the past. Right? So a man who is living in the past - or a woman - what happens to his brain, mind? It can never be free.

So a man who enquires into this very seriously has to find out whether this whole consciousness with its content can be seen at once, which is to have total insight into this. I don't know if you have ever considered looking at anything wholly: to look at your wife, or your girl, or your husband, whatever it is, wholly, not just her face, her this or that, but the whole quality of another human being. And you can only do that when the you is not - do you understand? When you are not centred here, me. The 'me' is very small, very petty, because the 'me' is the accumulation of all this.

So when you begin to enquire into this, whether it is possible to see the whole content, the movement of consciousness, which means the whole structure of the 'me'. That requires pure observation - do you understand? Not your direction, prejudice, like and dislike and all the rest of it, but just purely to observe the vast structure, very complex. Because of its very complexity you must come to it very simply. Right?

Shall I go on with one more question?

6th QUESTION: I have tried all kinds of meditation, fasting and a voluntary solitary life, but it has come to nothing. Is there one thing, or one quality that will end my seeking and my confusion, and if there is what am I to do?

You understand this question? Are you in that position? You understand the question? That is, one goes to Japan, Zen Buddhism, Zen meditation, the various forms of Tibetan, Hindu, the Christian, and all the innumerable meditations man has invented. And the questioner says, "I have been through all that. I have done yoga of various kinds, fasted, led a solitary life trying to find out what is truth. And at the end of it all I have found nothing". Do you understand this? Many people don't understand.

Which isn't a tragedy to you, is it?

Is there one thing, one quality that will end my seeking and my confusion? If there is, tell me what to do? You understand the full meaning of this question?

I met a man once, he was a very old man, I was quite young, grey hair, almost dying. And he heard one of the talks and came to see me afterwards and he said, "I have spent twenty five years of my life in solitude, in meditation. I have been married and so on, but I left all that, and for twenty five years I have meditated. And I see now that I have heard you that I have lived in an illusion." - you understand? Twenty five years - you people don't know a thing. And to say to oneself, "I have lived an illusion, I have deceived myself." - you understand? At the end of twenty five years to say that. Which means a wasted life, which you are doing anyhow, without meditating for twenty five years.

And he asks what is the one thing, one action, one step that will dissolve my confusion, the end to my search. You understand the question? Are you in that position, any of you? Except the questioner? You understand, you have come to the end of your tether. You have read, you have walked, you have heard, you have cried, you have meditated, you have longed, you have sacrificed - you understand? Probably you haven't done any of those things. And if you have, then what is the one thing that will resolve all this?

First of all don't seek? Do you understand what it means? Because if you seek you will find, what you find you have already sought. I wonder if you see all this? What you will find in your search is what you have projected - you being your priests, your gods, your professor, your guru, your philosophy, your experience. That, projected in the future, you will find, therefore a wise man doesn't seek. And the questioner says, what is the one thing? For that one thing there must be total freedom from all attachment, to your body, to your exercises, to your yoga, to your own opinion, judgements, and persons, and beliefs, complete freedom from all attachment - right? Don't make it a sorrowful thing, it isn't. There must be no fear - wait, this is not one thing, absolutely no psychological fear, and therefore when there is physical fear you deal with it - you understand what I am saying? When somebody is attacking you, you deal with it, but psychologically there is no fear, that means no time as tomorrow. Oh, you don't see this.

And the mind having understood the nature of sorrow and therefore freedom from sorrow, which doesn't mean that you are indifferent and all the rest of it - freedom from sorrow. Right? These are only indications, not the final thing. If these don't exist the other final thing cannot be. You understand the point? I don't think you do. Look sir, a man or a woman, a man has spent years and years searching, seeking, asking, demanding, so-called sacrifices, taking vows of celibacy - you follow? - and at the end of it all he says, "My god, I have nothing. I have ashes in my hand". Even though they think they have in their hands Christ or Jesus or the Buddha, it is still ashes. I wonder if you see all this? And such a man asks: what is the right action in my life, the right action which will be right under all circumstances? It doesn't vary from time to time according to culture, according to nations, according to education - right, precise, actual.

When all this is clear, that your mind is totally unattached to itself - do you understand? - to its own body and no fear, and the ending of sorrow, then if that is clear the one thing is compassion. You understand? Out of all this comes compassion, then compassion is not ashes in your hand, which isn't the compassion that does social reforms, social work, the saints, it isn't the compassion of the saints, compassion of the people who go out in the war and heal people, doctors and so on and so on. It is not that at all. It is the one answer that is true under all circumstances and therefore out of that right action because compassion goes with intelligence. If there is no intelligence which is born out of compassion - you understand? - then you get lost in some trivialities. And the world then accepts those trivialities as being extraordinary acts of compassion. They become saints, they become heroes, they become all kinds of idiotic recognitions of silly people. So there is one act, one quality that is supreme and that is compassion with its intelligence. And out of that intelligence there is right action under all circumstances.

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 1ST SEPTEMBER 1979

May we continue with what we were talking about last Sunday and go on further into it?

We were saying, weren't we, that the human mind and our way of living is so fragmented, broken up and because human beings make the world into what it is - a chaotic, cruel, confused, frightened world. And we were also saying that self awareness, that is, to know all about oneself, both the conscious as well as the unconscious, the deep down and the open mind, so that in knowing oneself completely, and it is possible to know oneself completely, then we can approach the world and ourselves as a whole. Our life, as it is now lived, of which we know very little about ourselves, and perhaps the psychologists, the therapists and the psychoanalysts tell us what we are, but to find out what we are we can't listen to them because they are like us, equally confused, equally uncertain, equally frightened in various different ways. So one has to rely completely on oneself, and not look to another to tell us what to do, including the speaker, naturally.

Can we know ourselves so completely? The wounds, the fears, the anxieties, the uncertainties, the very complex network of pleasures, death, love and if there is a continuity after we die. And also we should be aware and know and understand what is meditation. All that is our life, our education, our jobs, our way of thinking, our beliefs, our experiences, deep strong opinions and so on. All that is our life, with all its struggles, with all its escapes, miseries and so on. Can we know ourselves completely - all that?

Then perhaps it would be possible to approach all our life as a whole, not as fragmented human beings.

So we are going to talk over together this morning whether it is possible, without any guidance from outside, because they have all led us up the garden path, they have all led us to this present state of the world, the politician, the economist, the religious people and the gurus and all the rest of the gang. And it becomes more and more imperative and necessary to find out for ourselves what is right action, irrespective of circumstances? - such action which will not bring about further confusion, regrets, sorrow, more misery and so on.

So can one, each one, know ourselves so completely? Or must we be guided, be prepared to investigate, explore with the help of others? The others however erudite, however knowledgeable, experienced are just like us, psychologically - they have more skill, greater capacity to express themselves and so on. But we are each one, as we pointed out the other day, like the rest of the world, with their sorrows, miseries, confusions, insecurities, intolerable fear and so on. Can one know oneself so completely so that there is not a spot which is not being explored, understood, gone beyond? That is what we are going to talk about together this morning.

Which is: to know oneself, all the movements of thought, the fears, hidden and open, all the pursuits of pleasure, sexual and otherwise. And find out for ourselves what love is. And understand the full significance of not only personal sorrow but also the sorrow of mankind. And also is it possible to understand the final event of our life which is death. All that is our living. And if we are not clear in ourselves whatever we do will bring about further confusion. So it behoves us, it seems to us so absolutely necessary to find out if we can know ourselves - right? We are going to begin.

Which is: the speaker is not going to investigate and you just merely listen, accepting or denying, but together. Together, think together, if it is possible, because no two people apparently seem to think together. And without pressure, without any form of compulsion, together go into this matter. That demands first of all certain attention, not concentration but a certain quality of deep interest, a mind that is committed to find out, therefore care, freedom to observe - right? That is absolutely obviously necessary. If one has certain prejudices, experiences which one clings to, then we cannot possibly think together, investigate together, or find out. So one must be somewhat free, at least for this morning, so that you begin - one begins to explore - right? We are going first to explore as we did the other day the psychological wounds that one has received from childhood. We went into that the other day.

And this morning we will first begin with fear. The fears that are deeply hidden, of which you are not conscious, know or aware, and those obvious both psychological and physical fears - right? We are following each other? Please we are together, working together. The speaker is not working by himself, talking to himself. Together we are going along the road which might help us if you are interested, if you are serious, if you want to go to the very end of it, investigate this enormous problem of fear.

There is both fear of insecurity, physically, not having jobs, or having jobs, frightened to lose them, the various forms of strikes that are going on in this country and so on and so on. So most of us are rather nervous, frightened of not being physically completely secure. Obviously. Why? Is it because we are always isolating ourselves as a nation, as a family, as a group and so this slow process of isolation, the French isolating themselves, the Germans and so on and so on and so on, is gradually bringing about insecurity for all of us, which is obvious. So can we observe this, not only outwardly because by observing what is happening outwardly, knowing what exactly is going on, then from there we can begin to investigate in ourselves, otherwise you have no criteria, otherwise one deceives oneself. So we must begin from the outer and work towards the inner - right? It is like a tide that is going out and coming in. It is not a fixed tide, it is moving out and in all the time. I hope you are all following this.

And this isolation which has been the tribal expression of every human being, is bringing about this physical lack of security - right? If one sees the truth of it, not the verbal explanation or the intellectual acceptance of an idea, but if one actually sees this as a fact then one doesn't belong to any group, to any nation, to any culture, to any organized religion because they are all so separative, the Catholic, Protestant, the Hindu and so on and so on. Will you do that, as we are discussing, walking together, drop the things which are false, which are not factual, which have no value whatsoever? Though we think they have value, actually when you observe, nationality breeds wars and all the rest of it. So can we drop that so that physically we can bring about a unity of man? You understand sirs? And this unity of man can only come about through religion, not the phoney religions that we have - sorry, I hope I am not offending anybody. Either the Catholic, the Protestant, the Hindu, the Muslim, the Arab - you know, all those religions are based on thought, put together by thought, and that which thought has created is not sacred, it is just thought, it is just an idea. And you project an idea, symbolize it, then worship it, and in that symbol, or in that image, or in that ritual there is absolutely nothing sacred. And if one actually observes this then one is free from all that to find out what is true religion, because that may bring us together.

So if we can go into much deeper levels of fear, which is: psychological fears - right? Psychological fears in relationship, one with the other, psychological fears with regard to the future, fears of the past, that is fears of time - right? You are following this, please? We have got a lot to cover this morning. Please, I am not a professor, a scholar delivering a sermon and going back to his rotten life. But this is something which is very, very serious, which affects all our lives, so please give your attention and care. So there are fears in relationship, fears of uncertainty, fears of the past and the future, fears of not knowing, fears of death, fear of loneliness - right? Look at yourselves please, not at the speaker and the words. The agonizing sense of solitude, you may be related to others, you may have a great many friends, you may be married, children, but there is this sense of deep isolation, sense of loneliness. That is one of the factors of fear.

There is also the fear of not being able to fulfil. I don't know whatever that may mean. And the desire to fulfil brings with it the sense of frustration, and in that there is fear. There is fear of not being able to be absolutely clear about everything - right? So there are many, many forms of fear. You can observe your own particular fear, if you are interested, if you are serious. Because a mind that is frightened, knowingly or unknowingly, can try to meditate - right? - and that meditation only leads to further misery, further corruption, because a mind that is frightened can never see what is truth. Right? So we are going to find out together if it is possible to be totally completely free of fear in all its depth - right?

You know we are undertaking a job which demands a very careful observation: to observe one's own fear. And how you observe that fear is all important - right? Can we go on? How do you observe the fear? Is it a fear that you have remembered and so recall it and then look at it? Or is it a fear that you have had no time to observe and therefore it is still there? Or the mind is unwilling to look at fear? You are following? I wonder if you do. So which is it that is actually happening? Unwilling to look? Unwilling to observe one's own fears because most of us do not know how to resolve them. Either we escape, run away or - you know all the things - analyse, thinking thereby we will get rid of it, but the fear is still there. So it is important to find out how you look at that fear - right? How do you observe fear?

How do you observe fear? This is not a silly question because either you observe it after it has happened, or you observe it as it is happening. Right? For most of us the observation takes place after it has happened - right? Now we are asking whether it is possible to observe fear as it arises - right? That is, you are threatened by another belief, a belief that you hold very strongly, you are frightened about it, there is fear in that - right? Now I am challenging you now. You have certain beliefs, certain experiences, certain opinions, judgements, evaluations and so on, when one is challenging them there is either resistance, building a wall against it, or you are doubtful whether you are going to be attacked and so fear arises. Now can you observe that fear as it arises - right? Come on sirs. Right? You are following? Are you doing it? Now how do you observe that fear? The word, the recognition of the response which you call fear, because you had that fear previously, the memory of it is stored up, and when the fear arises you recognise it - right? So you are not observing but recognising. I wonder if you see this?

So recognition doesn't free the mind from fear. It only strengthens the fear. Whereas if you are able to observe as it arises then there are two factors taking place in it. One, that you are different from that fear - right? And so you can operate on that fear, control it, chase it away, rationalize it and so on. That is you doing something about that fear - right? That is the way we generally observe. In that there is a division: the me and the fear, so there is conflict in that division. Right? Whereas if you observe that fear is you. You are not different from that fear. I wonder if you get this. If you once grasp the principle of this that the observer is the observed, that the person who says, "I am observing", is separating himself from that which he is observing, whereas the fact is the observer is that fear. Therefore there is no division between the observer and the fear - right? That is a fact.

Then what takes place? Let's first hold it for a minute. Are you all following all this? As we said, are we observing fear through the process of memory, which is recognition, the naming, from that the tradition says, control it, the tradition says, run away from it, the tradition says, do something about it so that you are not frightened. So the tradition has educated us to say that we, the me, is different from fear - right? So can you be free of that tradition and observe that fear? That is, observe without the thought that has remembered that reaction which has been called fear in the past. It requires great attention - you understand? It requires skill in observation. That is also part of yoga - you understand? It is not merely doing exercises, which is not yoga at all, but the skill in observation. That is, in observing there is only pure perception, not the interpretation of that perception by thought - you understand? Please do it as we are talking about it. Then what is fear? You understand? Now I have observed someone threatening the belief that I hold, the experience that I cling to, the saying "I have achieved" and someone threatens it, and therefore the fear arises. In observing that fear, we have explained it, we have come to the point when you observe without the division - right?

Now, the next question is: what is fear? You are following this? What is fear? Fear of the dark, fear of husband, wife, girl, or whatever it is, fear, artificial and actual and so on, what is fear, apart from the word? The word is not the thing - right? Please, one must recognise this very deeply, the word is not the thing - right? May we go on?

So what is that which we call fear without the word? Or, the word creates the fear. Are you interested in all this? Because if the word creates the fear, the word being the recognition of something that has happened before, which means a word has been given to something that has happened before which we have called fear, so the word becomes important - right? Like the Englishman, the Frenchman, the Russian, the word is tremendously important for most of us. But the word is not the thing - right? So what is fear? Apart from the various expressions of fear, the root of it? Because then if we can find the root of it then unconscious and conscious fears can be understood. The root, the moment you have a perception of the root, the conscious mind and the unconscious mind have no importance, there is the perception of it - right? What is the root of fear? Fear of yesterday, of a thousand yesterdays, fear of tomorrow - right? Tomorrow death - not for you. Or the fear of something that has happened in the past. There is no actual fear now. Please understand this carefully. If suddenly death strikes one, it is finished. It is over. You have a heart attack and it is finished. But the idea that a heart attack might happen in the future - right? So is fear - please follow this carefully - is fear, the root of it, time? You understand? Time. Time being a movement of the past, modified in the present and going on in the future. This whole movement, is that the cause of fear, the root of it?

We are asking: is thought, which is time, the root of fear? Thought is movement - right? Any movement is time. So I was asking: is the root of fear time? Thought? And if we can understand the whole movement of time - right? - the time psychologically as well as physically, the time that it takes for you to go from here back home, physical time to cover the distance, and the psychological time, which is the tomorrow - right? So is tomorrow the root of fear? Right? Which means can one live - please we are talking about daily living not just theories - can one live without tomorrow? You are following this? Do it. That is, if you have had a pain yesterday, physical pain, to finish with that pain yesterday, not carry it over to today and into tomorrow. You understand the question? It is the carrying over which is the time that brings fear. I wonder if you can do all this?

So it is totally possible, and absolutely possible that fear, psychological fear can end if you apply what is being said. The cook can make a marvellous dish but if you are not hungry, if you don't eat it, then it remains merely on the menu and of no value. But whereas if you eat it, apply it, go into it for yourself, you will see that fear can absolutely psychologically can come to an end, so the mind is free from this terrible burden man has carried - right?

Then the next question is, which is part of our life, which is pleasure. Right? Are you afraid to tackle it? Because for most of us pleasure is an extraordinarily important thing. Pleasure of possession, pleasure of achievement, pleasure of fame, pleasure of doing something skilfully and so on - pleasure. Sexual, sensory and intellectual. A man who has a great deal of knowledge, he delights in that knowledge. But as we pointed out, with that knowledge also goes ignorance, because knowledge is never complete but he forgets that part and only remembers the knowledge which he has acquired. And in that there is great pleasure - sensory, sexual, romantic, sentimental, intellectual, having experiences, which are sensory. So this whole combination of various elements bring this extraordinary feeling of pleasure - right? Why shouldn't we have pleasure? You understand? Religions throughout the world have said "Don't, only have the pleasure to serve god" - you understand? All your senses, sexual, all that must be dissipated, put away. This is what the organized religions throughout the world have said. We are not saying that. We are saying investigate it, why man, human beings, demand, pursue pleasure - why? Go on sirs. There is the pleasure, physical pleasure, sexual. Seeing a lovely sunset, seeing the beauty of a mountain, the calm waters of a lovely lake, if you observe it. But having observed it, having seen it and enjoyed it, the mind has a remembrance of that enjoyment and pursues that enjoyment - right? That is the continuation of pleasure: having seen the sunset, taken delight in it, not end it but remember it, and the demand of the previous pleasure to be continued.

So thought - right, you are following this? - thought interferes with that moment of perception, then remembers it, then wants more of it. You have seen all this, sex, you know all about it. The remembrance of it, the picture, the excitement, the whole mechanism of thought operating and pursuing that - right? Why does thought do this? You are following my question? Why does thought take over an incident that is over, remember it and pursue it? The pursuit is the pleasure. You are following this? Why? Why does thought do this? Is it part of our education, part of our tradition, part of our habit, every man does this - better include the woman too because otherwise! Every human being does this, why? Go into it sirs, don't look at me. Why do you pursue pleasure? Is it that that creates isolation? You are following this? Is that what makes for the so-called individual? My pleasure and it is private. All pleasure is private, unless you go to football and all that kind of stuff. Pleasure is private, is that one of the reasons why human beings secretly pursue this pleasure? Because it gives them importance to themselves? You are following all this? Therefore pleasure may be the cause of this tremendous isolation - as a group, as a family, as a tribe, as a nation. I wonder if you see all this?

So when one sees the truth of this, the truth, not the words, not the intellectual concept, then will thought take over and make it a remembrance? You understand? Or just see the sunset - finish.

Experiment with this and you will see for yourself, if you do it, that thought, as in the case of fear, is the origin, the beginning of this conflict, both of fear and the pursuit of pleasure - right?

Then there is the question - we are dealing with the whole of our life - then there is the question why human beings throughout the world suffer. We are not talking about the physical suffering, that can be dealt with also if the mind is not continually attached, always concerned with itself - you understand? You have had a pain, disease, infirmity of some kind or other. Thought then becomes so concerned - right? And so it identifies itself with that and so the mind itself becomes crippled - right? So can the mind, thought see the infirmity, the disease, the pain - 'Yes' - you follow? Try it, do it, you will find out. When you are sitting in the dentist's chair - the speaker has done for four hours - when you sit down on the dentist's chair and the drill is going on, observe it. You will see, find out. Or look out of the window and see the beauty of the trees so that the mind is capable of observing itself with a detachment - you understand? Oh, you can't do all this.

So we are asking: why do human beings throughout the world suffer, accept suffering and live with it? There have been two wars, terrible, think of the tears that human beings have shed. And their children, their grandchildren support war. So sorrow doesn't teach man apparently - right? We worship sorrow - the Christians do. The Hindus have different explanations for sorrow, for what you have done in the past, past life and so on. I won't go into all that.

So we are asking: what is sorrow? And why man lives with sorrow? You understand? Find out sirs, give your minds to this. As you give your minds to sex, to jobs, to this or that, give your mind and heart to find out whether man can ever be free from sorrow. Is sorrow part of the egotistic attitude towards life? That is, my son is dead, or my wife has run away, or something or other, to which I am greatly attached, and he is taken away for various reasons, and I suffer. There is grief, there are tears, there is antagonism, there is bitterness, cynicism - why? You understand? Is it I am so caught up in my own problems, I am so self-centred, my son is me - right? Or my daughter is me. I am attached. I hold on. And when that is gone there is a great sense of emptiness, great sense of loneliness, great sense of lack of relationship - right? Is that the reason that one suffers? That is, the son being taken away, death or whatever it is, has revealed to me what I am, my loneliness, my isolation, my lack of real relationship. I thought I was related but it is my son - you follow? So the taking away of the son reveals my condition. Go carefully into this. And I suddenly realize my loneliness, my sense of loss, deprivation of something to which I am greatly attached. The death of the son has revealed to me - right? But that revelation, an awareness of the self, of the me, has revealed before the incident. I wonder if you see this? Right? You are seeing this?

As we said at the beginning of the talk, self awareness. Self awareness is to know one's self, one's attachments, one's loneliness, one's sense of isolation and all that, to know the totality of oneself. The incident of the son reveals that - right? That is, reveals after the incident. But if there is self awareness from the very beginning, taking away the son, the son dying, is what? - Is no longer the sorrow which is brought about through attachment. Right, you have understood? My mind now accepts it. It is no longer caught in self pity, in the struggle to be free from isolation, taking comfort in a belief, or in this, or that - right? So one sees sorrow exists so long as the self is there. I wonder if you see this? So the total abandonment of the self is the ending of sorrow. Are you following all this? Will you abandon yourselves? No, sirs. Therefore we worship sorrow, or run away from it.

And also we should go together and investigate this whole question of death. Not just for the old people like us, but also for everyone in the world, young, old or middle aged, death is one of the most extraordinary things that happens in life - right? What do you think of it? What is your instinctual response to the word and to the fact? What is death? Death is an ending - right? Please follow this carefully. Ending. Ending voluntarily, you can't argue with death, you can't say, "Please give me another week", you can't discuss, it is there, finished. So can you voluntarily end your attachment, which is death? You understand? Ending is something like death. The ending of a particular habit, not struggle, fight, anguish, end it. If you smoke, if you take drugs, if you drink - that is what is going to happen when you pop off! (Laughter)

So can we voluntarily end - do you understand? - your experiences, your opinions, your attitudes, your beliefs, your gods, end. We are afraid to end - right? To end anything voluntarily. Then you say, "What is there if I end?" That is then you are looking for a reward. You consider then ending as a punishment. So the ending being considered as pain, then you will naturally demand a reward. If I give up that then what? You don't ask that of death.

So can you end and see in that very ending there is the beginning of something new? You understand? That is, one ends attachment - attachment to furniture, people, ideas, beliefs, gods, the whole thing, end. And you end it voluntarily because it is intelligent to end - right? So in that ending a new - this isn't a promise, you understand - a new thing takes place. Try it sirs. That is, while living inviting death which is the ending. You understand? Ending to one's incredible complex way of living. So that the mind because it has ended everything, you understand, do it and you will discover it for yourself, therefore it is always new. New in the sense fresh. You know when you climb a mountain you have to leave all your furniture behind, all your problems, because you can't carry all the furniture that you have collected up the hill. So you let go and you discover for yourself that there is a quality of mind, that being absolutely free, is able to perceive that which is eternal. The word eternal is not an idea, you follow? Eternal means out of time. Death is time. I wonder if you see this?

So the mind that understands this extraordinary mystery - it is a mystery because what we are clinging to is our problems, our furniture, our ideas, all that, we are clinging to that, which is put together by time, and with the ending of that there is something totally... a new dimension. It is up to you. Right. Right sirs.

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH PUBLIC TALK 2ND SEPTEMBER 1979

I don't quite know what to talk about. It is a good beginning! I think if we are really serious we will take life as a whole, not just what suits us, what is most convenient, what is most profitable or pleasant, but life is such a complex affair, with all the travail, all the struggle, conflict and a great many pressures and demands on one's life. And we seem to take one particular point of view, or choose what is most satisfactory and pursue that. We never apparently seem to take life as a whole thing - our education, our jobs, our way of living, our relationships, love - whatever that word may mean - perhaps we might go into it this morning - and the possibility of living a very good life.

And religion throughout the ages has played an extraordinarily important part in our life. One may discard it, one may say that is all nonsense, superstition, but man, human beings throughout the world have searched, or enquired if there is something far beyond all this sensory excitement, sensory pleasures, sex and the ordinary routine of life. We have always asked about this. The more one is serious, the more one is delving deeply into one's life, one invariably asks if there is something far greater beyond this existence with its complexities, with its boredom, with its loneliness. And I hope we are serious enough this morning at least that we can go into this.

And if I may ask and point out don't make this place into a resort; something you come here for ten days and make a - you know, all the rest of it. Please don't do it. It is not worth it. There are other places where you can have a much better time. And if you take drugs and all that, don't come here, it is not worth it.

So how shall we, as human beings, set about this? You understand? How shall we begin to enquire if there is something far greater, something that is really enduring, something that is very, very immovable, something that can't be transient, changing according to circumstances, according to cultures and so on? How does one begin to enquire into this demand which man, human beings throughout the world from time immemorial have sought? - right? Can we go into this together?

If we can, the first thing is to find out how we listen, not only to what others say but to listen to oneself, listen to all the thoughts, all the emotions and the problems and the anxieties, to listen to it, without any kind of distortion, without any kind of direction. Just to listen as you would listen to a beautiful concert. So that one begins to discover as one listens the distortions that mind or thought, in its activity, twists what is actual. You understand? Because thought is always seeking more, so it moves away from the actual.

So could we this morning - as I said I didn't know quite what I was going to talk about - but since we have started on this, could we this morning so listen, not only to the speaker, which is not very important really, but the speaker is only acting as a mirror in which one sees oneself. And when you observe yourself the mirror is not important, then you can break it, throw it away, bury it, whatever you like. So could we, this morning, together investigate into this enormous complex problem of what is the meaning of life and if there is something beyond time, beyond the tomorrow, beyond the enormous burden of memory? If there is something far greater than mere superficial sensory existence. And to enquire into that we must have a certain quality of freedom; not attached to any particular experience, nor longing or asking something more.

Because then you are already moving away from the actual observation - right? Could we please do this, this morning?

That is, we are enquiring into what is called religion. We have enquired into what is fear, pleasure, suffering and somewhat into the whole question of death. And I think we should also enquire very deeply into this question of what is religion. Because man has lived by that. Man has said, in his search to find out something away from the normal, which is not abnormal, which is not neurotic, something beyond the actual - the actual happening, the actual pain, the actual grief, the actual anxiety, the actual sensory sexual demands and their experiences, if there is something far more. Right? That has been the enquiry of man and that he has called the search for god, search for truth, search for various forms in Asia, which is called Nirvana, Moksha, Liberation and so on and so on - Enlightenment. This has been the constant deep demand of serious people. And in its search he gets caught. He joins one religion, abandons it, then goes to another, abandons that, so he is caught in various traps in his search. By the end of his search when he is about to die he says, "I have found nothing" - you follow? I have been to this guru, that guru, this temple, that church, followed the various cantankerous superstitious priests and so on and so on. At the end of it all as he is about to die he realizes there is nothing, there is nothing but ashes.

So could we in our enquiry, if you are serious, leave all that?

Because all the religions which man has organized or put together by thought, and thought as we went into it the other day, is limited because it is based on knowledge and knowledge is always with ignorance, there is no complete knowledge - right? - therefore there is in it the quality of ignorance and therefore knowledge - thought is born from knowledge, experiences and therefore everlastingly limited. And all the things that thought has created, the churches, the technological advancements, science, literature, painting and the things in the churches, in the temples, in the mosques, are all put there by thought, there is no question about it. You may say the saviour put it there but it is still the movement of thought. And so on. Could we see that very clearly, not verbally, intellectually, or being persuaded, see this fact that all the things that thought has created though illusory is a reality. Wait a bit, I am going to go into this. I am using the word 'reality' in the same sense 'this is real'. The microphone in front of this person is actual, real, you can touch it. And the things that thought has created which he has called religion, and organized that which he calls religion, is an actuality, the ritual is an actuality, the various fanciful robes they put on are actual, so it is real. And the symbols, the ideas, are actual - aren't they? - as well as illusions, because thought has created illusions. You are following all this?

So illusions, fanciful ideas, all the rituals, everything that thought has put together is actual. The guns, the submarines, going to the moon, and so on and so on are all actual realities. But that reality is created by thought - right? Thought has not created nature. So nature is actual, real but it is not the product of thought, but thought can use the nature, making a chair, which becomes a reality.

So in going into this matter of what is religion, if there is something beyond, one must distinguish between the actual, the reality, in that is included illusions - right, you are following all this? - and nature. Those are all realities but thought has not created nature. So if one is very clear on that matter then we can proceed to find out: this human search for something infinite, beyond time, is that man-made, thought-made, or is there something which is not the product of thought? You are following all this? Please, we are investigating together. Please bear in mind this central fact all the time, that we are examining together. You are not accepting what the speaker is saying. He has no authority whatsoever. Therefore we are both of us seriously committed to this enquiry. You may drop off in the middle of it. That is equally right. But when once you start enquiring, go as far as you can. Probably one's own minds are not strong enough, clear enough. That is why I said at the beginning one has to listen to oneself, where one is blocked, where one is attached to an experience, to a desire and so on. So one must put aside those if you are enquiring. And in that enquiry there must be freedom to observe. You can't say, "Well, I believe in god or Jesus, or Krishna" - or whatever it is, in enquiry you can't. That is playing tricks. You can play tricks upon yourself but when you are enquiring seriously you must play the game.

So is there something that is not produced by thought - right? Which means: is there something which is beyond time? Please go slowly, we are going to enquire. We are accustomed to the idea of evolution, physical evolution first of all. That is, the seed, the acorn producing the oak, it takes infinite time, a great many years. And that same concept or actuality is taken over psychologically. That is, psychologically one must have time to learn, to understand - right? - to capture that which is much more advanced. So we are used to the idea of evolution, time - right? So we must be very clear if there is psychological time at all. There is physical time. Please you must give attention to this a little bit if you are interested in the enquiry. There is physical time from here to go to that house it takes exactly three minutes. So time is necessary physically to cover from a certain point to another certain point. That is time to cover the distance.

Now we have taken over that concept, that conclusion psychologically. I am ignorant, one is ignorant, one doesn't know, I don't know myself, I need time. Now time is psychologically put there by thought. Do you actually need time to be free say, for example, of greed? I am taking that as an example. Do you actually need time? That is, several days, time being the future. Do you need the future, time, to be free of jealousy, whatever it is, anxiety, greed, envy? Do you need time actually? No, no, don't shake your head. But we are used to that. When I say, "I will get over it" - the will is time. You understand? I wonder if you do. Don't be so dazed.

So it is our habit, our tradition, our way of living to say, "I will get over my anger, my jealousy, my sense of inadequacy" and so on and so on. So the mind has become accustomed psychologically to the idea of time, that is tomorrow, or many tomorrows. Now we are questioning that. You understand? We are saying that is not necessary. Time is not necessary to be free of greed - right? That is, if you are free of time and you are greedy there is no tomorrow. You attack it. You act, you do something immediately. I don't know if you are following all this? So psychologically thought has invented time as a means of avoiding, as a means of postponing, as a means of indulging in that which it already has. I don't know if you are following all this - right? So thought psychologically has invented time out of laziness and so on and so on.

Now, can you be free of the idea of tomorrow, psychologically? Please do go into it, look at it. Take your own anxiety, or whatever it is, your sexual indulgence, if you want that, or if you think through certain sensory activity you will reach whatever you want to reach, which is, the reaching is the movement of time. Can you see the truth of it and the very perception of that ends it? I wonder if you have got this? Right? Are you doing it as we are talking? Or is it just an idea?

So the mind has enquired into time, which is very complicated, we are making it very brief, that the concept that tomorrow is a means to an end psychologically is illusory. Therefore there is only perception and action without the interval of time. I wonder if you get this? I - one sees the danger of nationalism, the danger, because of wars and so on, the very perception is the action and the ending of the feeling of being attached to a particular group. Right? Are you doing it? When every evening the television says, 'British, British, British' or the French and French and French, whenever one is in France, and so on. To see that this division brings disaster and then "Give me time to be free from the conditioning which I have had from childhood, that I am British" - or this, or that - to see that without the idea of time and therefore action. You are following this? I wish you would do this. Therefore that ends conflict - you understand? The struggle that I must be free. We are together in this somewhat? I see you are not because this demands really a very serious mind, a mind that says, "I want to find out".

So meditation is the ending of time - you understand? Because that is what we have done just now, we have meditated, we have meditated to find out the nature of time. Time is actual, necessary to go from here to there, but psychologically time doesn't exist. To discover that is a tremendous truth, tremendous fact, because we have broken away from all the traditions - you understand? Tradition says take time, wait, you will reach god if you do this, this, that. And also it means hope, the ending of hope. You understand? I wonder if you understand this? According to Dante's Inferno, it means the ending of hope - you understand? Whereas we are saying hope implies the future. That is, one is depressed, anxious, hopeless sense of inadequacy, give me hope to advance, to learn, to be free. So when you see that there is psychologically no future, then you are dealing with facts, not with hopes. I wonder if you see this? Because hope is time - right?

So what we have done in the enquiry into time is the beginning of meditation. It is part of meditation. And to find out if there is something beyond time - beyond time, one mustn't carry any problems with us - right? - because we are burdened with problems - right? Aren't we? Personal problems, collective problems, international problems, and so on. Why do we have problems? Please ask yourself: why do you have problems? - sexual, imaginary, problems of not having jobs and so on, problems of inadequacy, problems of saying "I want to reach heaven and I can't", and all the rest of it - you know, problems. Why do you have them? Is it possible - please listen - is it possible to live a life without a single problem? You understand what that means? As each issue arises to dissolve it instantly, not carry it over. The carrying it over, which is the movement of time, creates the problem. I wonder if you see this? Right? If I have a problem - if one has a problem, first of all why has one a problem? What is a problem? A problem is something which you have not understood, resolved, finished with, but which you worry over, you are concerned, you cannot understand it and you struggle and struggle day after day, day after day, day after day. So the mind is crippled by this process - do you understand? So if there is no time - do you understand - there is no problem. I wonder if you see this? Do you really see this, actually in your heart, not up here in your mind, but in your heart, do you see that the man or the woman who has problems is caught in time? But as an issue arises if the mind is free of time it deals with it instantly, finished. I wonder if you see this. The moment you have the idea of time say, "I will resolve it", "I will take time". The movement away from the fact is the problem. Are you all asleep?

So if we are to enquire into this there must be no problem whatsoever, which is, the mind must be free to look. Right?

A problem arises when our relationships are not understood - right? Whether it is intimate, or impersonal. Why have we not understood relationship and seen the depth of it and the futility of it and go on with it. But apparently we have never resolved this problem of relationship - right? You know all about it, don't you? Why? Is it you love and you are not loved? Is that a problem?

Come on sirs. It is, it is a problem. Or you love and the other doesn't love - right? Or in your relationship with another you are possessive, you are dominant, you know, dependent, you want something from her or from him, sex, pleasure, comfort.

Somebody said to me the other day, to the speaker the other day, "If I leave who will wash my clothes?" Do you understand? I wonder if you understand all this?

So what is relationship, out of which we have made such a tremendous problem? It is to be related to another - relationship means related to another. To one or to many, or to the whole of mankind - right? To the one, or many or to the whole of mankind - you understand? Oh, you don't! Why is there not in this relationship peace? A depth of understanding of each other which brings about love - do you understand? Why isn't there? The relationship between two people, man, woman, with their sex is called love - right? Right? Oh, for god's sake don't let us be hypocrites, let's face these things. It is called love and is it love? Or is it the demand of sensory satisfaction, the demand of companionship, the demand which is born out of loneliness, the demand that says "I cannot be alone. I cannot stand this immense solitude in myself, therefore I must have somebody on whom I can depend" - psychologically only. You need the postman, the porter and all the rest of it, but psychologically in relationship between man and woman why is there this tremendous division - you understand? And is one aware of this? Aware of this great division between you and another, whom you say you love. Do we have to go into that, is it necessary? Apparently it is, all right.

Have you noticed between two people their thinking, their feeling are never the same - right? One is ambitious, the other is not, one is aggressive, the other is not, one is possessive, the other is not, one is dominant and the other is docile, which means what? Each one is self-centred in his activity - right? Are you following? Observe yourself. Self-centred in yourself and the other too is self-centred so there is division. Where there is division there must be quarrels, there must be antagonism, there must be all kinds of things going on between nationality, when there is division there is chaos - right? And this division we call love - right? You don't face it.

So in enquiring into something beyond time there must be complete sense of relationship, which can only come about when there is love - right? Love is not pleasure, obviously. You cheapen it - right? Love is not desire, love is not the fulfilment of your own sensory demands. Are you following all this?

So without love, do what you will, stand on your head and sit in meditation for the rest of your life cross-legged, put on fancy robes, do anything you like, without that quality there is nothing. So if the person wants to find something beyond time there must be right relationship completely so that no problems exist. And this quality of great affection, love, which is not the result of thought - right? - that must exist.

Then we can proceed to find out. See how difficult it is. Because most of us are so indulgent with ourselves, most of us are so petty - right? - so small in our outlook. So your mind must be free from all this self-centred anxious movements - right? Because that creates the problem, and when the mind has problems it cannot possibly see clearly. The mind that is everlastingly chattering, such a mind is not a quiet mind - right?

Then the problem arises: how am I to stop chattering - you understand? Listen to that very carefully. You realize your mind is chattering, then you say, "How am I to stop it?" The moment you have put the question you are already entered into the time element. I wonder if you see that. Yes? So the 'how' means time, and because you ask the 'how' the other fellow invents the system, invents the method, the practice, put on the yellow robe, blue robe, or whatever it is. So see the mind chattering and you are not different from that chattering. Your mind is chattering and your mind is you. So when you have that principle, that actual truth that you and the problem are one, you and the chattering are one, then all your effort to change it comes to an end. Then you are facing the fact that your mind is chattering, that you are chattering. So when you so observe what takes place? In that observation you have brought all your energy to observe. That energy has been dissipated by saying, "How am I to stop it?" You understand this? I wonder if you understand this? Can we go on?

So the problem is: can the mind, that is, the mind being the senses, the feelings, the reactions, the emotions, the intellect, all that is the mind - right? Can that mind, including the brain, can that mind be absolutely quiet? You understand my question? Because that is part of meditation, to bring about, as people try to do, to bring about through various systems, methods, controls and so on, so the mind is absolutely quiet because it is only when the mind is quiet completely that you can hear, that you can see. So there are various forms of meditation - the Tibetan, Hindu, the nonsensical T. M. meditation - you know, Transcendental Meditation, a nice word spoilt, isn't it? Transcendental is ruined by this cheap nonsense. All these various forms of meditation have tried, through control, through relaxation, through self-hypnosis, by repetition, repetition, to bring about a quiet mind, which means - listen to it - which means allowing time to bring this. You understand? One's mind is not quiet now but I will practise, I will control, I will be aware and through time it will come about - right? But when there is the understanding of the truth that time is illusory, you can't change it, time will not change - you understand - then you are faced with the fact that your mind is chattering.

When you are observing a fact completely with all your energy the fact changes. You will see, if you do it you will see it. Because you have brought your energy into the observation, and that energy has been dissipated when you are trying to change 'what is'. Look, I will show you! Human beings are violent - right? - for various reasons, we won't go into it for the moment. And human beings have invented non-violence - right? The non-violence is a non-fact - are you following this? The fact is violence but when you try to pursue non-violence you are pursuing a non-fact and also pursuing, allowing time. And when you realize time does not change, bring about change, then you are faced with the fact, which is violence. Not how to change it. There is this fact of violence. Now can the mind observe this fact of violence without any direction, without any pressure, just to observe it? You understand? Observe it. In that observation the mind has pulled together all its energy - right? So that energy is like light, focused on the thing called violence and that violence dissipates. Don't go to sleep please.

In meditation, which is to bring about a mind that is absolutely quiet, any form of effort is futile - right? I wonder if you understand this? To make an effort to meditate which means time, which means struggle, which means achieving something which you have projected. So can there be an observation without effort? Without control? Please listen carefully. I am using the word 'control' with a great deal of hesitation because we live in a permissive society - right? And one does what one likes, the more idiotic the better, drugs, sex, putting on clothes that are so meaningless - you follow? The sloppiness of it all. And the speaker is using the word 'control' in the sense when there is pure observation there is no need to control. Don't deceive yourself by saying, "I am observing purely therefore I have no control" and indulge yourself, which becomes nonsensical. Unless you hear carefully that a mind that is under control, that control brought about by thought, that thought being limited and out of its limitation it is desiring something, and therefore it says, "I must control", such a mind has become a slave to an idea - you understand? - not to a fact, to a concept, to a conclusion. Like those religious people who believe very strongly about something or rather, they are incapable of talking about anything else, thinking freely. The speaker was once travelling in India, in a train, and there was a European, an Englishman in fact, and a very learned Indian was in the same compartment. The Englishman was telling the Indian that their religion was all nonsense, stupid - you know, went on at him, for some time. And the Indian said, politely, "But you also have your beliefs, don't you? You believe in Christ and in the Virgin Mary". "Oh," he said, "that is a fact" - (Laughter). That is the end of the conversation. And most of us are that way.

So we are saying: a mind that is in conflict, either brought about through control, through will, which is desire, a mind that has problems, a mind that has not resolved relationship and therefore no love, such a mind is incapable of going beyond. You understand? It can only go to what it thinks is beyond within its own circle. And it might invent that it is going beyond, but it is not. Right? So if we are serious, if we have come to this point, that the mind, all the senses, the brain and all the things that man has been caught in are put aside because there is this tremendous sense of love with its intelligence, then we can proceed to find out - right?

That means a mind that is quiet, not only physically quiet but the quietness is not necessarily sitting in a certain position, you can lie down, do what you like but the body must be absolutely quiet - right? Uncontrolled because then you impose and there is conflict. And the mind being free and therefore absolutely quiet can observe. It is not "I am observing" - you understand? Then if there is 'I observing' there is duality, there is separation but there is only observation without the 'I'. I wonder if you see all this? The 'I' is made up of many things, past remembrances, past experiences, past problems, present problems, anxiety, the 'I', that is me, that is you. If we have gone that far the 'I' is now absent - you understand? It is not 'I' who is observing but there is only observation.

Then what takes place? You understand sirs, this is real meditation now, what we have done. The sense of enquiry into your self, self awareness, knowing all its problems, knowing all the desires, pressures, conflicts, sorrow, pain, all that, be aware of all that. And that awareness can only come into existence when you are observing your reactions in relationship - right? You can't observe yourself by just going off and sitting under a tree. You can somewhat observe it but it is only in relationship all your reactions arise. So the mind is now in a state where there is no problem, no effort, no control, and essentially no will, because will is the essence of desire. I don't know if you have got it? Right? I will, I want, I must. That is, desire demanding something which is in time - right? And to achieve that I must exercise will to gain it. So the mind is free of all that.

If you have gone that far then what is there? Man has sought something sacred - right? Something holy, something imperishable, incorruptible, timeless - it doesn't matter what. And he says, "I have worked, I have taken my life, I have understood my life completely, now what is there?" You understand? What more, what is there beyond? Because all search must end too - you understand? Because the moment you are seeking how do you know what you find? You understand what I am asking? You are seeking - god, truth, or whatever it is you are seeking - it may be your own pleasure, it may be your own sexual urges, it may be your own ending to certain problems and so on, you are seeking. In that search is implied several things. First of all when you find it you must recognise it - right? In that search it must be satisfactory, if not you will throw it out. It must answer all your problems, and it won't because the problems are created by yourself. So the person who says, "I am seeking" is really quite unbalanced, because he is playing tricks upon himself. So all that now is totally in abeyance, finished. Then the mind is absolutely quiet in pure observation. Now anything beyond that is merely a description - you understand? Is merely putting together words to convey something which is incommunicable - you understand?

So all that one can do is not to describe that but to meet another with the same capacity, with the same intensity, at the same level - you understand what I am talking about? What is love? It is to meet another with the same intensity, at the same level, at the same time. You understand? Isn't it? That is love. I am not talking of physical love, I am talking of love, which is not desire, it is not pleasure, to meet somebody with the same intensity - right? - with the same sense of time and with the same passion. That is love.

Now if there is that love in another and you have this quality of mind which is silent there is communication - right? - without words. That is a communication which is really communion, complete sharing of something which is not capable of being put into words. The moment you put it into words it is gone because the word is not the thing.

So at the end of these talks, four talks and two question and answers, where are we? Where is each one of us with regard to what you have heard, what you have learned, what you have seen for yourself? Are they just mere words for your to carry? Or is there a deep fundamental change so that you are free of all your problems, free of fear and there is that perfume which can never die, which is love. And out of that action, from that comes intelligence and action - do you understand? Right sirs.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST SEMINAR MEETING 13TH SEPTEMBER 1979

KRISHNAMURTI: I'm a bit nervous. I think we all know each other, don't we? At least you know me. And perhaps we'll meet each other after the meeting here.

We chose a subject to discuss or to talk over together during this Seminar. And I hope everyone will talk, not just two or three of us but everyone of us will partake in our discussions or talks or dialogues. The subject is: we live in a world of increasing violence, and disorder, what can I, as a human being, do to change this? Does it interest all of you, this question? We chose this question because it affects not only the people here but also we were thinking about India and all the people concerned there, Europe, and America. This would be a question that would apply to all people.

So shall I read it once more or you have already read it all?

QUESTIONER: I think we've read it.

K: All right. So how shall we begin. There is the subject: what shall I do as a human being in a world that is steadily deteriorating, declining, in violence, terror and a great deal of confusion, in all the fields of life. What shall we do? What shall I, as a human being, concerned with the world, and naturally with myself, what is my action, not a rare action but a continuous daily action, what shall I do?

How do we approach this question? What is your manner of approach to a question of this kind? Do I approach it, 'I' means each one of us, do I approach it with an already formed opinion or conclusion or point of view? Or have I my own problems, my own difficulties that I cannot possibly be concerned with the world. You understand my question?

I may be having difficulties with my family, my wife, keeping a job, earning a livelihood, you know, my son and daughter are becoming so neurotic, drug ridden, and I quarrel with my husband, wife and so on, so I'm only concerned with that, with my problem, and I'm not really greatly concerned with what is happening in the world. The world doesn't interest me so much. Or the world is so imminent, so pressing, I am only concerned with the world and not with myself. You understand? How do we approach this question?

Q: Sir, the problem is so enormous that one's left paralysed.

K: I know, the problem is enormous and leaves one paralysed. So what shall I, all the same, if one is paralysed, one is finished, there's no more answer to it. One has the enormous problem, enormous crisis, and how do I approach it - first let's come to that, take that question and go into it. How does one, or you or I, approach this question? Because however I approach it may decide the quality of my attention, the quality of my enquiry, investigation and so on.

So I think it's important before we start discussing this question, how do I or you approach this problem.

Q: It must be from compassion.

K: Not must be - how do you approach it. If you say 'must', that becomes an idea, a future thing. I'm not trying to push you down, sir, but if I say 'I must, it should be' or 'if it were' it's a conditional approach, and therefore your approach will dictate your investigation.

So I'm just asking, how do we, each one of us, approach this question. Perhaps in the approach may be the real quality of investigation. I think one should be very clear before we start discussing this question.

Q: I have to look at the environment in my own daily life.

K: So you are not concerned with the world.

Q: By looking at that...

K: No. I don't know if I'm making my question clear or not.

How do I approach a problem, any problem?

Q: Isn't it important to question the presupposition, the assumptions that seem to be implicit in the way the question was phrased, because the question seems to imply that the violence is in the world external to us. That seems to require some questioning, where the violence is.

K: Is that your approach sir? Now what's your approach, Peter?

How do you approach the question?

Q: I feel rather hopeless.

K: You see, you've already, when you say, "I feel hopeless," you've already - it's no problem, it's hopeless, finish.

Q: Well, that's the way I'm feeling...

K: Is that your approach?

Q: I felt that until now I will not fight, I will not go into a war for that or for some idea, and just escaping...

K: So your approach is to escape.

Q: Yes.

K: Will that solve the problem? We are discussing this, it's not just that I'm opposing you. Will that solve the problem? If I escape from the world into some monastery, into some Utopian concepts and you know, all the rest of it, run after some guru and all that, will that solve the problem?

Q: I ask myself what is the relevance between the proposition that violence in the world, when there is a violence that I find in myself, what is the relevance, where do these two meet, do I see it? Intellectually one may see this, but does one really see it from the inside instead of just a proposition.

K: Sir, is there a problem at all, for each one of us?

Q: Am I really concerned about it?

K: Yes, is it a problem, is it something I've got to resolve?

Q: Yes, it is.

K: Or is it something I can't resolve therefore I lose all hope and I don't care. As long as I have a little money, I just wither away.

Q: We've got to do something.

K: No. Is it a problem, as hunger, a lack of money, as sex, it doesn't matter, a problem which has got to be resolved?

Q: Can we look at how all that has come into being?

K: That we can enquire, how all this mess has come about, after you are really serious, if you really want to solve it. I don't know if I'm making myself clear. That's why I'm asking - sir, sitting a little higher doesn't mean the chairmanship or anything in authority, I'm sitting a little higher because it's a little more convenient for everybody to see the speaker, I'm not the Pope.

Q: Can I just ask, I think it's not so much that I approach the thing with passion so much as with a great drive, some kind of energy, and I feel a little bit as though I've got myself into some very deep water.

K: Yes, sir. I have energy, if it is something that I've got to do.

Q: Well, it's not so much that it's something that one has got to do, I mean, I don't know how one can tell what's a violent action and what's not.

K: We're coming to that.

Q: It seems to me there's so much total disorder in the whole sphere.

K: I know, but we'll come to the understanding and the resolution of it if I say it is to me an intense, demanding, immediate problem. You follow what I mean? That may drive me.

Q: Sir, I was talking outside with Brian just now, I said this is not a problem to me, really.

K: Why? Why isn't it a problem?

Q: Sir, I think that that urgency comes second, you know - the first time that question is posed, I think we would have to see the nature of that problem, we would have to see, is it just the violence that is in Cambodia, ten thousand miles away or we have to see the nature of that violence and our relationship to it before we can muster any passion to look at it.

K: Are you saying, sir, we must examine in detail what is happening in the world, the violence or the cause of that violence?

Q: No, I'm suggesting that we would have to take a look at the nature of the violence in the world, we would have to see how we are related to it, before we could add any passion to...

K: I'm not even asking for passion - is this a problem? Peter says it is not a problem.

Q: If someone doesn't feel that it's related to them, it is not a problem to them.

K: Why?

Q: Because they might not see that it is related to them. But if that violence is part of their daily life...

K: No. he says, it's not a problem. And I'm saying, "Why?" Are you blind? You know - sorry - I'm not being personal. Are you blind, are you insensitive or don't you know, even read a paper headlines - everything indicates it. And I say to somebody who says, "I'm really not, it doesn't concern me", what's happened to you?

Q: Peter has come from Brazil and he has said that the violence there disturbs him greatly, he's come here to try to find out what is the cause of it, how he can respond, do anything about it. So I think he's under-estimating or not saying correctly what he's thinking.

K: In Brazil, appalling things are happening there.

Q: That is what he says.

K: They are murdering poor Indians and all kinds of things are going on there.

Q: But when the problem manifests itself as being so vast, don't we tend to want to push it away and pretend that it's maybe not there, so we say I don't care about it, when in actual fact we just don't know how to maybe deal with it.

K: Is this a problem for any of us?

Q: Yes It is.

K: Or is it a problem which is insolvable, so we give up? Or retreat into some kind of nice, comfortable corner and forget the rest? Am I, are you, concerned with this problem, first, that's all - and if it is a problem to each one of us, except perhaps one or two here, then how do I approach the problem?

Q: To me it seems the only thing I do want is really to quarrel when I'm angry, have a continuous quarrel, you know, like strike. And whatever makes it strike I let go.

K: But whatever disturbs you, you let go.

Q: Whatever is creeping across it.

K: But you're not answering my question, sir. Why as a human being, living in this world, whether in Brazil or Chile or Russia or here, there is violence, tremendous disorder. And we say I'm not concerned. Then I say, "Why? Why as a human being I'm not concerned with the things that are happening around us."

Q: Isn't it, sir, because we don't see the nature of that violence and how it touches, and how we are related to it, how it affects us, how we participate in it?

K: All right then let's discuss what is our relationship to the world. Right?

Q: And to that violence.

K: Yes, to the world, to the world that is in disorder, deteriorating, violence, terror, kidnapping and all the rest of it.

Q: Aren't they the products of something that is more the confusion that creates that, isn't that when it's the final thing, the violence, and something comes first, confusion within ourselves in our living.

K: No, as Scott pointed out, what is my relationship to the world. If the world is that, what's my relationship with it.

Q: Dorothy has used, confusion, because physical violence if we separate it out from mental violence, physical violence is the result of confusion. And confusion arises out of intellectual idiocy in some cases, believing things which are not necessarily truths. And any problem, whether it is the problem we are addressing ourselves to at this particular time or any other problem, is summed up in what happens in each skull, so that we are all... and it resolves around this central thing, confusion, which we all do, holding on to things which perhaps we should let go and therein lies the seeds of violence, not holding onto, but being prepared to let go in order to find something else.

K: Yes, sir, but have you, have we answered that question of Mr. Scott's, saying, what is my relationship to the world?

Q: Then we are all in a state of confusion.

K: Yes, but what is my relationship to all that is happening? In the Arab world, what's my relationship to all this?

Q: I think if one is paying attention one sees in a thousand ways in the course of the day how circumscribed one is.

K: No, you're not answering - are we answering the question, sir? I may misunderstand. Have I? Have we established for ourselves what is our relationship to the world?

Q: I think our relationships are also violent, it is of the same nature.

Q: Is it the same question, Krishnaji, to ask how do we participate in the world?

K: If you like to put it that way. Who has created this awful mess?

Q: We have to accept responsibility.

K: No, wait, sir - who has created it?

Q: We have.

K: Human beings have created it. Right? Whether they live in India or Russia or America or here, we human beings have created this mess. And what's my relationship to that?

Q: I am that. I'm part of it.

Q: We don't normally see that, we always attribute it to somebody else outside.

K: Are you answering my question? Sir - you may be but I may be deaf or not - are you answering my question?

Q: Are we really in relation, sir, or do we feel different from the world.

K: That's all I'm asking. Is the world, that's happened there, different from me?

Q: In our attitude it is. In our present attitude, it is.

K: In our present attitude it is. So let's examine that, shall we? Is that your attitude? That the world is totally different from me?

Q: I don't feel it so keenly. What is out there and what is happening close...

K: No, we're asking the question, sir - is the world different from me? The world, the scientific world, the world of misery, confusion, all that's going on, sir, in the world - is it different from me, something out there which I have nothing to do with?

Q: I think we do from time to time only realize when there is something very serious happening.

K: We are serious here.

Q: Then we realize, it touches us, we start crying to see all this misery. But then we lose sight of it, our daily life makes us lose sight of it.

K: We lost sight of this and we say, "I am different from the world." is that it?

Q: No, I don't think so.

K: Sir, let's just look at it.

Q: We do everything we can to protect ourselves.

K: So you are saying, we are different from the world.

Q: But we don't see it.

K: All right. We seem to think we are different from the world.

And very rarely we think we are the world. Is that it? Sometimes we think we are the world, and sometimes the world is totally different from us. Right?

Q: That's the truth.

K: Is that your approach? Is that your approach?

Q: No sir, we are part of the world, we are in it.

K: Yes, but is that a fact?

Q: It is.

K: A burning reality, which says, "I am the world."

Q: We are deluding ourselves that we are separate. We are always part of it, whether we like it or not.

K: So why do we lose the sight or the understanding, or the reality that we are the world, why do we lose sight of that?

Q: But what does it mean when you say, "You are the world."

K: What, sir?

Q: When you say you are the world, I mean, it means you are full of all that rubbish that's out there and violence, as well as all...

K: Wait - aren't we? You see, that's...

Q: In one sense, I like to be important, I am caught in sexual things, I'm afraid of losing my security, in that sense I feel like everybody else. But then I say I'm not joining the Army, I'm not shooting around, I would rather be shot than do that, in that sense then I stop feeling I am different, although you see its confused.

K: The Army is created by us, because we are nationalistic.

We'll answer all those questions, sir, but first, if one may be clear, what are we talking about? We're asking, how do you approach this question - the question is, in the world there is disorder, disintegration, decay going on, confusion, all the rest of it, and what am I to do? That's the question.

Q: I have to approach the question with my present attitude of mind. Unless I am clear about this.

K: All right, sir, what is your present attitude, sitting in this room, what is your present attitude?

Q: Sometimes one feels closer in relating to the things that are happening, the things that one does understand when one has suffered violence in one form or another, oneself, but then preoccupation of our usual daily demands comes in and we no longer feel with the depth of being actually related with the world. This is the fact, not what should be.

K: So you are saying, in this room, at the present time, I really don't feel so completely identified or realize that the world is me.

Q: Right.

K: That's all, otherwise we will go off. Is that what you all feel?

Q: No, it is not what we all feel, I don't think.

Q: Then what do you feel, sir?

Q: I feel vastly involved, tremendously involved in the world, and part of that confusion manifests itself in me. I am that confusion.

K: So the world, being confused, that confusion is manifested in you.

Q: Yes.

K: Just a minute. That violence, that disorder is showing that in yourself. Right? So you are different from the world.

Q: No, I'm caught in it.

K: No, sir, just a minute. If that can be manifested in you, then you are clean, healthy, and that manifests. Or is it the other way round?

Q: The feeling that you can do something about it, which is also different from...

K: Yes, sir, the moment when you say, "I can do something about it", you are different from that.

Q: Right

K: You see, that's why I think we ought to be very clear in our discussion, whether the world, with all the things that are going on, is different from you, and you, being different, by some curious process that world manifests itself in you.

Q: Why am I so gullible?

K: One might say for various reasons. Indifference, education, your own particular job which occupies all your time and energy. And you have very little time to consider what is happening in the world, so you are gradually enclosed. So you say, I can't, I don't care what happens. One must come back over and over again. All right. What shall I do in front of this?

Q: Well, if I do find it difficult to accept the fact that I am part of the world...

K: I'm not - what shall I do?

Q: ...I have to examine my relationship to it. What are my contributions to that confusion.

Q: Sir, the problem is not the world but the problem. You see what I mean, it isn't the world that arises out of the non-resolution of the problem. In a sense, all the conflict that is taking place in the world, the battling and destruction etc. arises out of problems not being resolved, that is, not being considered accurately, in the first place.

Q: Do we have to approach it that way? Can we approach it, what we should not do.

K: What, sir?

Q: What we should not do about it, just see this disorder, this world, we cannot approach it directly.

K: I can't hear.

Q: We should be concerned with what we should not do.

K: No, before what we should do or should not do, is it a problem? Sorry.

Q: We seem to be implying if it's not a problem it's because we think we are different from the world, so we have some mistaken idea about who we are, so it seems we should begin by straightening out that problem.

K: Scott, is it as much a problem to you, to us, as when you have a toothache, and you have got to go to the dentist. The pain drives you, the pain makes you act. And you put up with extra pain because of more pain. Now is this problem as acute as that for each one of us, or is it something casual, to be casually discussed without, you know, putting some vitality and energy into it. That's all my first question.

Q: I would say no, it's not the same.

K: So if it is not, why?

Q: Could it not be because we have some mistaken idea about who we are, that we are separate, that we are individuals.

K: Is that it?

Q: Sir, if somebody threatens you with violence, then it's a real problem, to you at that time. If somebody is threatening somebody else with violence, it's not a problem, unless they are your close friend.

K: So it becomes a problem if you are personally involved. Otherwise it's no problem. Right? It would be a problem if you lived in the Middle East, if you were a P.L.O. or the other, then it would be a problem. Is that what we're saying. As long as it doesn't touch you personally it's no problem.

Q: If it does touch one personally, the mind tends to particularize it.

Q: So what do you mean by touching personally - do you mean going through your mind?

K: No, touch you, somebody comes and hits you, somebody comes and tears down your house.

Q: But that is a different problem. To me it's a fact that we are profoundly connected to what is happening in the world, whether we see it or not. Somebody hits me on the head and that's a problem, another one, but that we are profoundly connected to everything that's happening is a fact and not a question of...

K: So is it a personal problem to you, this?

Q: It must be.

K: Not must be - is it a problem to me?

Q: What is a problem, sir? Why is it so important to say it is a problem, or is it not a problem?

K: Goodness!

Q: We somehow isolate or insulate ourselves from things that really do affect us because we're part of the world but we put our heads in the sand and say, no, it is not very close to me individually.

Q: I think our education, upbringing is doing that, that is the problem. We're taught to think only personally and that creates the problems.

K: Apparently to that gentleman it's not a problem.

Q: I think it is, I think that's what he is saying.

K: You think it is but he doesn't think so.

Q: I feel that the turmoil in me is the turmoil outside. Now if you call that a problem or - I don't know what you mean by the word 'problem'.

K: Sir, I don't know if you heard the question, the first question. The questioner says, not the questioner, we worked it out, the question is, "What am I to do, living in this chaotic, destructive decaying world, what is my responsibility, what am I to do?"

Q: Survival, it seems to me, is the only thing that one can go for.

K: What?

Q: Survival.

K: Is that what you're just concerned with, just survival?

Q: Sir, you said to begin with austerity.

Q: I think the problem is that we don't know what to do, that we are utterly unable to do anything. I think we all feel concerned but then we don't know what to do.

K: Are you saying that it is such a colossal, complex problem that I can't do anything about it?

Q: I feel unable to do anything.

K: Unable. I'm not sure, let's find out. Don't say it is hopeless, and give it up.

Q: No, but there is a barrier, I can't do anything.

K: Let's find out, if we can't remove that barrier.

Q: Isn't our guilt one of those barriers, because we participate with that violence via the television, constant television, so we are sort of precluded from doing something because we are guilty.

Q: Sir, if someone threatens to beat me up, then it's a real problem and I have to do something. If somebody threatens to beat somebody else up, then it's not a real problem to me, I can be intellectually concerned about the problem.

K: Yes, sir, I understand that.

Q: And I find it is not the same.

K: So you're saying, this thing is something happening to somebody else, not to me.

Q: Of course.

K: Wait, sir, let's pursue that one thing - it is happening out there, it doesn't concern me, but if it concerns me, personally, then I'll do something about it. Is that what you're saying? Which means, as long as you leave me alone, as long as I've a little corner safe and comfortable, I don't mind, I've nothing to do with that. But the moment my comfort, my security is touched, I will do something. Is that what you're all saying?

Q: I think that's the problem, yes.

Q: Sir, taking this gentleman's example, if somebody else is doing violence to somebody else, and I am watching, one can see that violence leads to violence, it can't just stop, it's a very rare occasion when violence stops.

K: I understand, sir.

Q: It will inevitably be part of me.

K: So all that you have said so far, if I have understand right, as long as it doesn't touch me, it's no problem.

Q: It's...

K: Wait.

Q: It's an intellectual problem - I can explain, I understand the reasons for the violence in the world, it's a problem, intellectually, but it's not the same quality when somebody is threatening me.

K: That's right. And that's what I'm saying the same thing - as long as it doesn't touch me, then what is happening there and being concerned with that becomes an intellectual problem. That's what you're saying. Is that so for all of us?

Q: Sir, that question of yours is so profound, one of the troubles that is going on in Ireland, if I may mention that, is that the violent people of Ireland feel that the British people will not concern themselves about the problems over there. And that really is the question which is going on here. We're really not concerned with the violence that is in the world.

K: So you are really not concerned with the world at all, what is happening, you're only concerned with yourself. Is that it? Let's come to the point.

Q: For most people, perhaps, it is aggravated by others who feel it, just as a stone at the bottom of a pool is affected by another stone being thrown in. The ripples spread, the impact of the new arrival is there. There are people who feel things like this and for them the world is them, they are the world. But the trouble is that we are caught in a trap of words, where words in one's head create associations and ideas which may be exchanged in one situation, suggesting one thing. In another situation they are subtly changed again. But the problem seems to revolve around words and what we do with them inside our own skull.

Q: I don't find it a problem, an intellectual problem, to me it's a real problem, that I am directly in touch with people, mentally in some way they are there, I don't care whether they are a thousand miles away or they are there, and it's a problem I've got, you know, I just don't know how to relate to it. I find I have no privacy, or whatever it is.

K: You're asking, I am directly in relation with the world.

Q: Yes.

K: Wait, and you say, "What am I to do about it?" That's the question, that is the real question.

Q: Yes.

K: Now here there are varieties of opinions, we'll never come together about anything, you say one thing and that gentleman says another, and somebody else says something else. So can we think together about this, first. You follow what I mean? So there is a common denominator with all of us concerned about this.

Q: Sir, I don't understand how some people here can talk about violence in other parts of the world and how it doesn't affect them. I mean surely anyone who has got open eyes can see the direct effect of violence...

K: Of course, sir.

Q: ...on themselves, quite directly.

Q: It's not just a question of affecting oneself, it's that we don't care about others, I think that's why we don't see the urgency of this, because we only care about ourselves and not others.

Q: And then perhaps we don't see the violence in ourselves.

K: Could we begin by finding out if we could all think together about this?

Q: Sir, what do you mean by 'think together'?

K: I'm coming to that, sir. Could you and I think together about something?

Q: I think it would be very difficult.

K: That's all. It wouldn't be difficult if we both of us wanted to build a house. You may disagree about the architect, the shape of the house, amount of room, but we could talk over it together, if we are agreeable we say, let's both of us choose the architect, we'll do that, we'll agree. Right?

Q: Is thinking together agreement then?

K: Yes, sir, I'm saying that. We are saying the same thing. That is, sir, think together, that means, could we both of us put aside our prejudice about this architect or that architect and say who is the best architect together. We can do that, can't we?

Q: I've never done it, sir. You probably can but I've never been able to do that sort of thing.

Q: Where there is an interest and enthusiasm in the subject, that dispels the prejudices and preferences that usually bung up a situation. In other words, you have a common interest in exploring the situation.

K: Is there a common interest here?

Q: Yes.

K: Or we have no common interest, we're all thinking about different things all the time. I want to find out for myself, what am

I to do with the world, with all the catastrophe etc., etc., what am I to do about all that? That's all my problem.

Q: Surely one can only look at oneself first.

K: Pardon?

Q: See how violence arises in oneself. I don't see how you can start...

K: Are you saying, whatever is happening there is affecting me, I have contributed to it, therefore I must see that in myself I don't give or contribute to all that. Is that what you're saying? You see we don't seem to be able to think together.

Q: But that affects only the immediate environment.

K: It's not only the immediate environment but - look, could you and I think about this subject together, look out of the same window, which doesn't mean that you and I agree, we both agree to look out of that window, we both see it's important to look out through there. Will we do that?

Q: We can only do it if we see that it's important.

K: So what am I to do, sirs?

Q: Sir, can we come back to this, the question where, we all pretty much agree that we do not feel that we are the world, and we all, from what we said, pretty much feel that that is incorrect.

K: I cannot understand - forgive me - a simple fact that the world is that because I have created it, by my arrogance, by my selfishness, by my silly activities of self-centred interests - I've created that thing. It's very clear to me.

Q: It's also clear that we don't seem to be prepared to accept that responsibility.

K: I do.

Q: Yes. I do too, sir.

Q: Isn't that the first thing we've got to look at, our self-centred activity?

K: That's very clear. Are we of the same outlook?

Q: Yes.

K: You and I may be but the others may not. Sorry. The others may say Marx has created it, or the Pope has created it, not me. Or these silly politicians have done this. It's not me.

Q: It seems the only thing we can actually agree about together...

K: We don't seem to agree.

Q: ...we can agree about the fact that there's confusion.

K: Let's agree on that. Do we all see the fact, not agree - could we all see the fact that there is terror, violence, disintegration, do we all see that?

Q: Yes.

K: Could we? Are you doubtful?

Q: Sorry to keep saying the same thing, but obviously we all can see the fact of violence and so on. We can all see that intellectually, emotionally and so on, but it's not the same as when the violence is threatening us.

K: I'm going to go step by step, sir, let's go step by step into this. If we all see the fact. Right? Wait, the fact that is happening there. Now first of all, how do you see it? As something happening out there which has nothing to do with me, or you see it because you read the newspapers, television, and that becomes an idea, a concept, something away there, nothing to do with me. So I'm asking, how do you see the fact?

Q: The fact manifests itself as...

K: How do you see the fact?

Q: ...as violence, as confusion, that manifests itself in my life.

K: No, sir, it's not - you see, sir, we're not again keeping together. How do you see the fact, is it an intellectual concept, an idea?

Q: You see it by looking, sir.

K: No, you've read the newspapers, sir, or you've been in a street fight, or in the demonstration that has taken place there is violence, you see it, you are there. Or do you see it as something happening which has nothing to do with you? How do you see it?

Q: Gut reaction.

Q: Don't many of us see it as a menace?

K: No, not as a menace, just how do you see it.

Q: That's how we perceive it often, don't we?

K: But when you say as a menace, you've already looked at it with fear.

Q: Yes.

K: Therefore you're not looking at it.

Q: I personally have never been in a war but I did go to one demonstration and I was amazed at the level, because there was so much awareness amongst people, admittedly violence was going on, you know, policemen were knocked over and things, but there were many people and there was a great deal of affection and all sorts of things going on.

Q: Except to the other side.

Q: It wasn't, I mean, something about people being in the streets, just consciousness which you don't normally see, one's normally used to television.

K: What shall we do? Could we see the same fact together.

Q: Sir, it seems that first there is a world 'out there' which I read about and somehow I separate it from the world in here at Brockwood, I feel rather safe here, it's a nice place to be, people try at least to respect each other as much as they can, at least that's how I feel. But as far as I am talking, I don't have any real concern for anybody, maybe one person or two that I like, where I help in the work but concern about the person, I don't have it. You see, I'm really indifferent whether this person dies or not.

K: All right, sir.

Q: You know it's kind of callousness.

K: You're only concerned about yourself.

Q: Or one or other person that gives you pleasure.

K: Yes, but it's still...

Q: My father, or...

K: Yes, but it's still, you're concerned about yourself - that's clear. And you don't care a hoot what happens out there, as long as you're safe at Brockwood.

Q: To be honest, that's it.

K: That's it. Keep to it, sir, keep to it, don't... Are we, do we think like that too?

Q: Yes.

K: As long as it doesn't touch me, I don't care what is happening out there.

Q: Yes, but it touches us, when I leave Brockwood and I go somewhere, then it touches me, and then it becomes a problem.

K: I don't know - to him it's not.

Q: Yes, but you are saying so when it doesn't touch him.

K: All right, you are reducing it to a personal problem. As long as it doesn't touch me, please, I'm not concerned about the world. Do you all think like that?

Q: No, no, I don't.

K: Why?

Q: When we use this self we can't live together, can we.

K: Apparently we don't come together about anything. That's one fact, at last.

Q: That's confusion, isn't it.

K: We don't seem to come to the same point together. Right? Why? The question, the subject of this Seminar is that the world is in a terrible state, what am I to do? Apparently each one has a different point of view about that. One says, as long as I'm quite safe at Brockwood or anywhere else, it doesn't touch me, therefore I don't care what is happening out there. There are others who are saying, I am part of that world, it affects me, I have contributed to it, therefore I must change, that's another point.

Others say, well, occasionally I am part of the world, and the rest of the time I'm only concerned with myself. Right? At other times it becomes an acute problem when somebody hits me. So we are all of that. Now can we all come together and see one fact together.

Q: Surely one fact that we can all see together is that we all think differently.

K: I know, we've said that, sir.

Q: Is it possible to find out the root of that confusion? If we can all agree absolutely together that...

K: No, before you start - could we all of us look at this one fact, that we are all offering different opinions. Right? Different points of view, personal, impersonal, idealistic, etc. Now do we realize this? This may be one of the major factors of the confusion in the world, because each one holds onto his personal opinion.

Q: Maybe when we say we have different opinions we again tend to confirm the division between us.

K: No, sir. Do I realize, or do you realize that we are creating terrible confusion in this room, because each one of us is saying, "I think this", "I don't care what you think".

Q: But if one does care, one expresses one's own viewpoint, one does care that others...

K: Not if - you're saying if one cares, then you're out. The fact is, here we are, sir, look what we have done for 45 minutes or 50 minutes, we haven't come to answer the question at all, each is offering a different opinion.

Q: See the confusion now.

K: In asking this question we have awakened tremendous confusion all round us.

Q: Yes. Is it possible for us just to look without knowing?

K: We are trying, we are trying to do that. Can Peter, who says, "I'm really not concerned about the world, I'm really concerned about myself as long as I'm safe, leave me alone." The world won't let him alone, it doesn't matter, he wants it, he hopes for it. So that is his opinion and he's stuck to it.

Now I say please let us drop our opinions, our conclusions, our ideas, let's consider the common factor, which is, as there is confusion between ourselves, who are supposed to be serious, we are met to discuss this thing, even here we can't clear that up. And we want to clear up, do something out there. Right? So can we clear up this confusion among ourselves first.

Q: Maybe there's a way forward. Instead of seeing it as a confusion between different...

K: No, wait, sir - can I clear up this, can I say, "All right, I'll forget myself for the moment, my opinion - let's look." Will you do that? Do it actually not just spin words and then play tricks with me, and say, "Yes, I can put aside my prejudice, my conclusion, only me that matters and hell everything else."

Come on! Can you drop that? And join me, who says, "Look, I'm not only concerned about myself, but I'm also concerned with the world." Right? Could you do that? No, not verbally - actually. I'll drop my point of view and say, "Yes, I am really concerned about my own security, my own this and that, and also I'm concerned with the world." Could we do that?

Q: Let us see.

K: Not let us see.

Q: We can't do it.

K: Can I do that? I am concerned about myself and equally concerned about the world, with the same pain, with the same anxiety, with the same intensity about the world.

Q: I just don't know. You say can we have the same intensity.

K: No. You may not know, but will you do it?

Q: All I can say is, I have to see.

K: No, do it now, not you have to see - now.

Q: That is what I mean. If we investigate now...

K: We are doing it now, sir, I am doing it. I am concerned with myself - I know that. I am fully aware of it. And also I'm concerned with the world.

Q: It feels like taking a vow, Krishnaji.

K: No, there is no vow.

Q: Krishnaji, that's the feeling I get when you put that out, because it feels like something, are we all going to do that now, can we all feel this way.

K: No, nothing of the kind.

Q: It seems like we don't have any choice. I mean, one observes that there is confusion in this room presently, externally and internally, and the one says, one is concerned about the world - does one have any choice but to jettison all of one's opinions and ideas and explore this thing, go into it, find out, see if it's possible together, to find out the root of confusion, the root of violence. Surely we have at least to give it a go.

K: But, sir, she says, "That is forcing me," forcing her into a corner and making her do something which she is not willing to do.

Q: It feels different from, say, look at it, and to say, are you concerned, be concerned.

K: No, please, you didn't listen then. I said let us - obviously looks like it - I am concerned with myself, and perhaps I'm also maybe concerned with the world. That's all. There is no violence, there is no compulsion, there is nothing.

Q: Sir, nobody is disputing that the world is falling apart. Now you have said it's a fact, the world is falling apart. You have said, shall we now look at it together.

K: That's all.

Q: Good God, can't we do it?

Q: Sir...

K: You understand that question?

Q: Yes I understand but it seems it's very easy to say, it's too easy to say, it's too easy to feel concerned about the world, but it's somehow removed from myself, it doesn't have that quality of urgency. It's easy to deceive yourself that you are concerned and so on.

Q: If you see that this group here now is a microcosm of the world...

Q: I see that as intellectualism.

Q: No, actually what is going on in the room.

Q: It's too easy to say that.

K: Sir, we said this, sir. Look, I am concerned with myself. Right? Now wait. Seeing what is happening in the world, which is a fact, it's a fact, they are killing each other.

Q: I agree but...

K: Wait - can I also be concerned with that? Or only myself and nothing else?

Q: Could we ask where this genuine concern for the world comes from?

Q: It comes surely in part in pure self-interest, because where are people going to find these little spots to be safe in the world the way it's going. You, and Brockwood aren't going to stand up against the world. I don't understand this isolation between the self and the world out there. We're part of it.

K: Dr. Wilkins pointed out a few minutes ago, this, but nobody listens.

Q: What is it in people, some of us, each one of us perhaps that thinks that we're safe, that we're separate, that the world is not going to affect us personally.

K: Maria, in microcosm, this is exactly what is happening in the world. Here we can't agree about anything, look at any fact together. If all the politicians dropped their opinions and said, "Look, what is best for the world," came together, they could solve all these problems. They won't, because they are Conservatives, Liberal and blah, blah, blah. And we are doing exactly the same thing here.

Q: Can we distinguish facts from opinions?

K: Yes, sir, very simple. Fact is which is actually happening. And the opinion is what I think about what is happening.

Q: When we say is it a fact or an opinion that everybody in this room is threatened by what is happening in the world - is that a fact or an opinion?

K: It's a fact.

Q: It's a fact.

Q: But do we all see it as a fact, or is it for many just an opinion?

K: That's just it. Peter, would you see this fact, that what is happening is a fact.

Q: What I see...

K: Wait - that is what is happening, sir.

Q: Yes, but in here, which is the world...

K: What has happened this morning, they announce Lufthanza, whatever it is, kidnapped - what is it?

Q: Highjacked.

K: Highjacked. That's a fact. But I can have an opinion, say Lufthanza deserves it. That is an opinion. So could we not offer an opinion, any opinions, any judgements, but only look at the facts.

Q: It's a fact that we're divided.

K: Wait, sir. Could we look at the fact. The fact is that we are separate and the world is separate.

Q: Each person here is also separate.

K: Yes, yes. Each one thinks, the fact is each one is concerned about himself and the world second. Right? Me first, the world second. Is that so? Is that a fact for all of us, me first and the world second.

Q: To me it is.

K: All right, I'm just asking. Could we all honestly say, "Yes that is a fact. Me first."

Q: I think it's about 50/50.

K: It's a reality, therefore let's stick to that. Now could we look at that, me first. And really the world comes second. Could we look at that fact. So we all say, "Yes, that is so." At least we are all altogether on that one point.

Q: Somebody may ask a question, why shouldn't I be concerned first?

K: We'll come to that, we'll come to that. Me first and the world second. I think that we all agree to that at last.

Now why am I so 'me first.' What is this thing, I'm so concerned, me first and you the second, the world. You are the world, you're the second, me first. Why do I lay such tremendous emphasis on myself first. Go on, sir, answer this.

Q: Well, I'm far more important, by my attitude I'm far more important, because I'm the thing that is right here.

K: Wait. You feel that's much more important - is that a fact, for all of us.

Q: Now that's our years and years of conditioning. That's us. That's what we've been conditioned to, that's what we've been brought up as.

Q: Whether we were brought up as that or whether we naturally evolved into that, we are that, it doesn't make any difference.

Q: Oh yes, we are that.

Q: We are that, so whether I feel I'm the world or I don't, I'm the centre.

Q: But can we question that? Can we say that is why the world is so wrong in the way that it is?

K: Sir, me first and the world second, that's what everybody says.

Q: Yes.

K: That's a fact. Right? The politicians, the priests, the economists, everybody says, "Me, you second." Right?

Q: What is good for me is good, what is bad for me is bad.

K: Of course, me first - all that's implied.

Q: And of course us and them.

K: Of course. Now why do I give such tremendous importance to me?

Q: Other people give importance to you.

K: No. People also, I sit on a platform, you give me importance. I'm not talking about that. Why do I give importance to myself, what is the cause of all this? Is it my education, is it my culture, is it the society I live in, is it...

Q: It is...

K: Wait a minute, I'm going slow, step by step. Is it the religion that says, salvation to you first, the trumpet, Gabriel! So society, religion, culture, everything says to me, "You first." Right?

Q: Also the survival instinct says that.

K: Yes, me first, survival, position, prestige, reputation, money, big house - me. All that's included. And you, the world, second.

Q: If nobody cares about my problems, I must do something about them.

K: Yes, yes, all that's involved. Nobody is going to solve my problem except myself.

Q: Exactly.

K: So I'm only concerned with myself.

Q: I think it's also, I find myself that I have a problem, having read some of your books, I now have the conditioning which seems more in my mind than what you say, such as choiceless awareness.

K: Scrap books and conditions, let's start freely. So I say to myself, Why? Is this the result of all this? Environment, culture, education, religion, the economic social structure which makes me consider myself first, my union...

Q: My country.

K: So - wait, wait, look at it, that's a fact, isn't it? Now who has created that? This society, this religion, this culture etc., who has created it?

Q: Well, it certainly wasn't me.

K: My grandmother, my grandfather, great-grandfather?

Q: Yes they all did it.

K: Which means what? I am the result of all that.

Q: And I'm going to create the same situation for my children.

I'm going to perpetuate this.

K: Children - same thing, education.

Q: Sir, is this self-centredness entirely the result of our conditioning?

K: I'm coming to that, first we're examining that fact, is this the result of my society, my culture, my religion, my superstition, the thing around me, has forced me to be self-centred.

Q: It's certainly also that, but is that all?

K: That's good enough, I'll begin with that.

Q: There is already a sense of self-centredness when we say...

K: Sir, the moment the child, baby says, it's my toy, it's already there. So let's begin. Do we all see that same thing, that the world, culture, society, my grandmother, grandfathers, my father, my friends, my neighbours, society, everything has said, you first. Right? Do we all agree to that?

Q: Yes. Is it just a question...

K: Do we all see the same point - just a minute, sir, go slowly. At least we can all come together on this. That's all I'm trying to say. Right? Do we all see this thing?

Now the next question is, who has created this?

Q: Me.

K: Don't go so quickly, that's an idea then.

Q: But doesn't...

K: My grandfather, my grandmother, my great - down to me, have established a society based on me, and I'm caught in that trap.

Q: But does the baby naturally of its own accord say, 'Mine' or does the mama and papa...

K: So do we all see that fact, fact, not an opinion. It's not the result, I'm not taking a vow. It's a fact. Right?

Q: Could we examine who or what is seeing that fact?

K: Fact. The roof is a fact and all that. It's a fact. How do you see it? Just look at it or say I don't like it or like it - just look. Mere observation without prejudice, that observation is seeing the fact, like a good scientist, he observes the fact, not his opinion.

Now do we all see this fact? Are you quite sure, that the society with all the culture, superstitions, the religions, the popes, the Protestants and all that, has made me into a self-centred human being. My education...

Q: My biological needs, I have to...

K: Yes, my biological needs, I said that sir - needs, sexual, everything around me, society has made me this. Do we agree, do we see this, simple and clear?

Q: Yes.

K: Right, sir? Right? Then if that is so, I am that. Right? Now comes the difficulty. That is not separate from me, that has created me, and me is that.

Q: And I'm now responsible for perpetuating it.

K: Don't go off further. That has created me, and me is that.

Q: But, Krishnaji, what this society has screwed into me...

K: Yes, yes...

Q: ...is a sense of my own self.

K: Don't enlarge, introduce new words, new screwing, but the fact is that the world, society has created me, conditioned me, made me what I am. And me is that. There is no question about it. Now do we all see that fact together. Do you?

Q: Yes.

K: Don't agree with me. Do you see this fact or it's still a vow?

Q: It may be an idea, sir.

K; That's just what I want to know, is this an idea or a fact?

Q: One can see that logically it must be so.

K: No, no - this is a fact. The microphone in front of me is a fact. I don't have an opinion about it. But if we say, let's all agree it's a giraffe, it's already a giraffe. Do we see this clearly? Do you?

Q: I have to say what she says, it's a good, logical sequence, Krishnaji.

K: What?

Q: It's logical.

K: No, it's not logical, it's a fact. Why do you make it logical?

Q: It's a fact that it's also logical, that's the problem.

Q: So there is a conflict between the feeling of separateness which one still has and...

K: Sir, either you want to look at the fact or you want to keep it to yourself. That's all right and I'm not preventing.

Q: Maybe this fact is too unpleasant.

K: It is not pleasant or unpleasant, it is so. I've got toothache, I've got cancer, it's a fact. Then I say I don't like it, I'm frightened, I don't want to be operated on, but the fact is the surgeon says, "You've got cancer." It's a fact. After X-rays, biopsy, all the rest of it, he says, "My dear chap, you've got cancer." I accept the fact. Then I say, "By Jove, I'm frightened, I might die, I'll be lonely." All the rest of it. But are we accepting the fact? It's not a logical conclusion.

Goodness. Right? Do we start from there?

Q: Krishnaji, it is easy to see that I am that, part of that, it's not so easy to see that I am that full stop.

K: Sir, you've got a different tendency from me. Right?

Different characteristics, different idiosyncrasies, right? Those are all the result of your environment, your reaction to the environment. You don't see.

But do we together see this fact, that the world has created me, what I am, the stand I take, the position I assume, my conceit, my vanity, and that world is me and I am the world full stop.

Q: The fact that you can see that, isn't full stop, it's an action in seeing.

K: Yes, I'm coming to that. Do I see that first, or is it just an idea, as she says, a logical conclusion, it has no reality. I'm not trying to put you into a corner.

Q: Krishnaji, it's like I'm talking about astrology and the stars, I can understand that they are out there, I can understand what you are saying about it, but when I leave this room and I come back to my actions are here.

K: We are saying that.

Q: And it's not in understanding about my connection with the whole, it's much lower.

K: Yes, we are saying that, we are saying, you are the result of all that, so you have to do something about yourself, because you are that.

Q: So why is it so difficult to understand so simple a fact?

K: I don't know, apparently it's very, very difficult to see a simple fact.

Q: Why should we investigate together?

K: Ask her to explain to you, why she finds it so extraordinarily difficult to see a fact, about herself, not about the stars.

Q: Sir,...

K: The fact is you were born in California - forgive me, or in England, wherever, the culture, the society, the parents, the grandparents, the education, has made her what she is.

Q: Part of that education is I am an original, separate being.

K: We've explained all that.

Q: I can see that part of it, what I can't see, it seems that there is a subtle implication in the fact that one should act in some other way.

K: No, we'll come to that.

Q: As though that is wrong.

K: First I must see that there is actually no division between me and the world.

Q: I think the difficulty is that we see the fact.

K: That...

Q: That to see the fact, we still think we are different.

K: Do you see that fact, sir, not your opinion of the fact, that I, born in India, with all the nonsense that goes on and brought to England, with all the nonsense that goes on here and so on, I am the result of all that. What's the difficulty in seeing this?

Q: How about also the part that says "I'm different and I'm important".

K: That's what the world made you.

Q: That's why the world has created us.

K: What's the matter?

Q: I told you that constantly.

K: You are the world and the world has made you think that you are the most important person. Religions have done it, haven't they, salvation. You are so, and your education says you're better than me. So all the way from the moment we are born till we die, everything around us says, "You are the first." Right? That's a fact.

Q: Right.

K: That's all.

Q: O.K.

K: My god!

Q: You have worked, sir.

K: Why has it taken nearly an hour to see a simple fact like this.

Please answer me, why?

Q: Me is too strong.

Q: Because the thing that has been pushed into shade is wiggling.

K: You see it has taken an hour, because we are fairly friendly, we are not antagonistic to each other, we said we have come together to discuss so we are fairly amicable, but even this amicability has taken us an hour to clear up some very simple points. You understand?

Q: It's remarkable it's taken only an hour. (Laughter)

Q: We relate more readily to opinion than we do to facts.

K: I have no opinion, we just see the fact that I am that. I may not like it, I may say it's most unpleasant, but it is a fact. Then my next step is, what am I to do? Knowing I am that, what am I to do, what is my action, what is my responsibility? And at what level, at what depth is my responsibility, and is my action superficial or is it out of a deep understanding of this thing?

I think we'd better stop, don't you? It's five minutes to one.

We'll continue tomorrow where we left off, can we? Right?

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND SEMINAR MEETING 14TH SEPTEMBER 1979

KRISHNAMURTI: Shall we go on where we left off? We were saying, weren't we, that this division between the world and me is really very artificial. The society that man has created is the society that we have created. And we are caught in it. And the question, the subject is: in a deteriorating world, what is one to do, what is the correct action?

We said the world is me, and 'me' is the world. I hope we all see the same fact. Do we? The Communists and the Marxists have more or less said the same thing, so they try to control the environment, manoeuvre man to their particular ideals and ideologies and so on. But we have come to a point which is perhaps totally different from theirs, which is, that you cannot possibly control man through change of environment. The environment is what we have created. Right? And unless man himself changes, environment cannot possibly change him. So that's where we are. Do we all see the same fact? Or is there still some doubt about it.

Go on, sirs.

QUESTIONER: When you say the world is deteriorating, you seem to say that's a fact, that the world is deteriorating, and yet that is the environment.

K: What sir? I can't hear.

Q: You're saying that one can't change the environment, it's ourselves that we have to change. And yet at the same time you were saying that the world is deteriorating.

K: That's right.

Q: Which sounds like the environment.

K: No, we were saying the environment can only be, environment in the sense society, the culture, the religion and all that, can only be, radically changed if man himself changes. That's the whole point.

Q: Why do you say it's deteriorating, Krishnaji, when it's really been like that since the beginning of time.

K: It has been like that from the beginning of time. So do we accept it? It has been like that through all the civilizations, through all the empires, throughout history. Me first and you second. In our relationships, in our activity, in everything that we do, it is me and you, two separate divisions, the world and me, as though they were separate. It has been like that for millenia.

And are we saying that it is impossible to change human nature, because it's been like that for so many million years. Is that what you're saying?

Q: Perhaps the important question is, how significant is the factor of the deterioration?

K: What do we mean by deterioration? Right? Go on, sir, let's talk about it.

Q: As we've defined it so far, it seems to be to go from bad to worse.

K: Not only that, sir. Our minds are becoming more mechanical, more caught in the trap, our education is - you know all about that. So what do we mean by deterioration, degeneration, decline - from what?

Q: In a way that's all we've ever really known, that state.

K: When we use the word 'decline', decline from what?

Degenerating from what?

Q: From wholeness.

Q: But there's never been a wholeness in civilization, that's only nostalgic remembrances.

K: Sir, let's all talk, please not a few of us or me.

Q: Sir, to me you touched the fundamental question when you talked of human nature. Having been an ex-Marxist for 16 years on puppet platforms and so forth, for years I saw the way as the Marxists see it that what we must do, human nature to the Marxist was determined by the material conditions.

K: Conditions, yes.

Q: Change the environment and we'll change the nature.

Fundamentally they got it wrong. Now I'm along with you, yes, it's human nature, but where do we go from there? We are human nature - what are we going to do with ourselves? Because that's what we've got to face. Do we want to face that human nature, we are that human nature.

K: Yes, but before we come to that the question was raised, what do you mean by degeneration, decay, like the Russians call the western civilization degenerate. What do we mean by that word?

Q: Separation, seeing things separately.

K: Is that what we mean by that?

Q: It sounds as though it usually means falling out of a creative state.

Q: The original question that we were supposed to consider was the world is becoming increasingly violent and disorderly. Do we want to go into a definition of whether the world is a little bit worse or not so bad, it's always been that way. Or can we accept the fact that it's rather a mess and concentrate on how we respond to that.

K: That's what I want to get at. You raised the question, what do you mean by degenerate?

Q: Do we want to go on discussing that today? Isn't that holding up the point of this discussion.

K: Up to you sirs.

Q: Why not tell them about Cambodia, which has just been published. Don't they call that degenerate?

K: What sir?

Q: What's been going on in Cambodia, isn't that degenerate? Which has just taken place and just been revealed - do they need to go any further? Or is it a wonderful world we're all living in.

Q: Sir the fact is not whether it's a wonderful world - it's perfectly obvious that it's not a wonderful world, but it seems to me that the factor of deterioration is quite significant, and it's not separate from the response that is required because if it is a fact that this deterioration is taking place, then the response is made very much more urgent. In other words, it's not a historical reflection of the condition of the world, but it's as things are happening now. For instance, many people say in so-called spiritual work that there is a break up of civilization in order that a new birth may take place. This is a very common idea.

K: All right.

Q: Doesn't the word deterioration imply that there is another state.

K: That's what I asked, deterioration from what?

Q: We can either look at deterioration as history, over a period of thousands of years or we're talking about a single life, a baby being born whole, sane and healthy, innocent, and then gradually becoming involved in this.

K: Would you say, sir, the constant violence which is spreading right throughout the world, the nationalistic divisions, wars, terror, the disorder, the confusion, all the literature, you follow, all that, would you consider all that in very good order?

Q: Not at all.

K: Can't we accept this fact, that there is disorder, violence, terror, confusion, misery. That is a fact, throughout the world. Can't we start from that, instead of defining the words, degeneration and so on. Could we start from that?

Q: Yes.

K: Could we, sir, please. All right. Then what am I to do as a human being, living in this disordered, violent society, what is my action? That is the real problem. What am I to do, knowing that I am not different from society, that I am the world and the world is me? That's a fact, to me at least, that's an absolute irrevocable fact. Then what am I to do? That is the whole issue. Can we start from there? Do we all think together on this point?

Q: Yes.

K: No, please don't casually say yes. Is it a fact to all of us? If it is a fact, then how do we deal with that fact? I am a part of that world, and the world is me, and what am I to do with my life, given 20 years or 30 years or 50 years, what am I to do? What is my action in relation to what? And what is my responsibility, to what?

You understand, sirs?

Q: Sir, our responsibility in our actions must be to everything because everything is the world. It can't just be directed to one thing.

K: Is there a holistic, an action that is whole. Or all my actions must be inevitably fragmented, broken up. That's one of the questions. So first, could we be clear on the word 'action'. Right? Could we discuss a little bit what we mean by action. Come on, sir, please.

Q: Can I ask in connection with action, it suggests to me doing something. And when one thinks of the word, I'm thinking in terms of the many and the one. Some idea of wholeness being equated with perhaps a non-existent one, because it seems to me that wherever I go, the problem that I'm confronted with is that there is the many, and it's all different from all the rest of it.

K: Yes, but what do I mean by action, action with regard to what?

Q: Couldn't we say that it's a following through of a thought.

K: No. To act, sir, to do.

Q: To do. But there has to be something that prompts the doing.

K: No, we'll come to that. First we are trying to find out what that word means to all of us. It may mean something to you, it may mean something to me. So we'll be always different. So let us find out, if we all agree about that word 'action', what is implied, what is its significance, and whether it is partial, whole, and so on. So let us go into that. May we?

Q: Yes.

K: Please sir.

Q: Action to change what? We know what the Marxist action want to change, he wants to change the environment. You say human nature. I go along with you. Now how are we going to change human nature?

K: We'll come to that, sir. First I must find out as the subject of this Seminar is, what am I to do, first, with regard to what, whether I can change myself and so change the world. But before we enter into that, mustn't we enquire into what do we mean by action. I may think I'm doing right - right in quotes. And I may be acting from an illusion, from a very prejudiced point of view, or from some conclusion which I have derived or gathered or learnt.

Or I must act according to some idealistic formula. Right? I might be a Catholic and I think this is action; a Protestant and say this is action, the Marxists would say this is action. So I think we ought to be clear about that word. What do you consider action? Come on, sirs.

Q: I consider it motion, sir.

K: Is your action motivated by an emotion, by a reward, by a punishment? You see we have to go into this.

Q: Most action is motivated in some way, generally speaking.

K: So your motive is different from mine, and hers. So our action can never to together. Right? So is it possible, is there an action which is not separative? You follow, sir? Which is not yours, mine and his. So we ought to go into that word, or the whole meaning of that word 'action,' to do. That's the question which says, "What am I to do? How am I to act?" Not only to think but to act.

Then from that we can go onto what is thinking and all the rest, but I feel we must be together in this word. Could we?

Q: Sir, are we distinguishing two types of action, a selfish action which comes from motive and a non-selfish action, or whole action?

K: How do I know what is non-selfish action? I might think I am acting non-selfishly but it might be the most selfish action.

Q: So that's one thing we know for sure, that action is not apart from self.

K: So what do you mean by action?

Q: The implications of this are that action is an unbiased movement. Our usual movements are, as you were pointing out, orientated to self-interest and identifications. So for the self, for us to imagine, or for us to move without bias - this is the problem, isn't it?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: It seems as if action is something from ourselves, that we have to do something or other, so it is always from a centre.

Q: But in order to act I have to see what I think is required.

Q: Action is to respond.

K: I mean, you're a doctor, and you say my action is to attend to the patient. Or a professor says, I must act. I want to find out, if I may ask you, I am asking myself too, what is action which is not separative, you understand?

Q: Sir, would we not have to consider what it is that is doing the acting. If we are the product of our conditioning and its only our conditioning which acts, then that seems always that it will be separative.

K: So you're saying, are you saying, sir, as long as the mind is conditioned in a particular way...

Q: As long as the conditioning is there.

K: ...it is bound to be separative, it is bound to be divisive, bound to act in contradiction with others and so on. Is that it?

Q: Yes.

K: So we then have to go into the question, why are we conditioned, are we aware of our conditioning?

Q: And also there's the question, is there something else besides our conditioning which can act?

K: That comes much later, very much later.

Q: So the action must be spontaneous.

K: No, sir - how can I be spontaneous when all my background is not spontaneous, it has been cultivated, forced, pressurized, you know, brainwashed. How can it ever be spontaneous?

Q: If action is going to be of that nature, it's not possible to act at all, unless one makes judgements, which obviously could be false. And so it seems to me that one has got to be in some kind of relationship with what other people are doing, be sensitive to it in some way. And somehow know that one is in relationship, have confirmation of that.

Q: It seems to me that usually I don't see a situation clearly and I think of an idea what I should do. And the other person picks another idea and we never agree. Occasionally I may agree with one person, but on the whole I can't go beyond that.

K: Are you saying, sir, we act according to different ideas?

Q: Or from some concept - not always but for most of the time.

Q: Until we see our confusion, can there be action?

Q: There's action all the time, we're acting constantly, whether we're in the kitchen or whatnot, it's obviously action is coming from thinking and we can't separate the two, and so we have to talk about thinking, because if you're not thinking, how can there be any action. Or can there be one?

Q: Thinking is action, too.

K: Thinking is action. So what is action then, thinking, self-centred, conditioned, partial, contradictory, idealistic, acting according to a certain pattern, Utopia, Marxist, Maoist.

Q: In action, there is simply an actor, and that actor implies will, the desire to change something, so we come back almost full circle to the predicament of being separate and yet wanting to identify the whole, so we always seem to come back to will. Is this correct?

K: Yes, sir but have we - I don't know how to approach this question, because here we are, each one has a different idea what action is. Right? Right, sir? Now is there an action which we can all, not accept, but see. Let me put it differently: is there an action which is not divisive, which is not self-centred, which is not idealistic, and so on? Or must all action be the result of our conditioning, of our ideology, of our self-centred activity?

Q: Wouldn't an action of common enquiry be non-divisive?

K: We are trying to do that now, aren't we? We are trying to enquire into what is action, which is common to all of us. Right? Not similar, not conforming, imitative. Is there an action which we can all accept, which we all see, and act according to that, not according - you understand what I'm saying - I wonder if I am conveying, I'm not quite sure I'm conveying it properly.

Q: If we are all really curious and concerned, this is an action.

K: Is there an action that is accurate, precise, and not self-centred?

Q: That must come from intelligence.

K: Wait, I'm just asking that, sir. A right action, right being precise, accurate, seeing the fact and acting, not see the fact according to my prejudice, my experience and opinion and act from that. But perceiving the fact and acting to the demands of that fact. I wonder if I am making myself clear?

Q: Yes. Yes, there is such a thing.

K: We are enquiring.

Q: If we see that acting on an idea doesn't take us anywhere, isn't that an action?

K: Is an idea a fact? Idea, from what the dictionary says, began from the Greek word which means 'observation, to observe'. Now we're coming closer. May we go on with this a little bit? That is, to observe, not draw a conclusion from that and act, but the very observation is the action.

Q: That means you have to relate. Relating to a fact can then bring an action.

K: I'm just beginning to enquire into it, sir. That is, I observe. Let's begin - I am the world and the world is me, that is, we can't go back on that, can we? We can't go back on that. Right? I observe I am violent. Right? Which is, the world is me. The me is violent, which is the expression of the world. Right?

So I observe it. Now is my observation clear, pure, or is it diluted, twisted, according to my desire, my desire to escape from it, run away from it, to suppress it - you follow? Can I observe violence without any distortion? And that very observation is the action. I don't know if I'm making myself clear.

Q: That is, from the clarity of an observation.

K: That's all.

Q: Yes.

K: Now can we all do this?

Q: Is there any more to do after that?

Q: That's it.

Q: That observation is the action. Do you mean that that observation brings the action, observation is part of it, but it also...

K: I say, observation is action.

Q: ...yes, but must it be followed by a continuation of that action?

K: Of course, first have we understood this? Am I talking nonsense?

Q: Krishnaji, if I am self-centred, full of ideas and prejudices and so on, how am I to come upon this action?

K: So you can't, you can't.

Q: That's right.

K: So you have to see the fact that you're self-centred, therefore you cannot observe, and the very observation of the fact that you're self-centred, to observe it. I don't know if I'm making this clear.

Q: Yes, very.

K: Now can we together, is it possible for all of us, to observe this fact, violence? Don't let's define the word 'violence', for the moment - anger is violence, jealousy is violence, conformity is violence. Right? Imitation is violence. Competition is violence. Being attached to a particular formula or an idea, and you the opposite, which is a sort of violence, the national divisions are violence and so on. Now do we see that all this is being covered by that word. I don't know if I'm making it clear.

Q: But is it possible for a violent mind to see its own violence?

K: To see it is violent, that's all - why not? Is it possible for you to be aware - not you, sir - but aware of one's jealousy.

Q: Does that mean jealousy being aware of itself?

K: Yes, as it arises, you can see jealousy. So we are asking, is our observation clear, pure, not twisted. That's the first thing, before I can act. Can I observe myself, myself, which is the society, and therefore can I observe myself very clearly, without any distortion, without any illusion? See myself in a mirror that is reflecting exactly what is? Come on, sirs. Could we all do this?

Q: Sir, what do you mean by a mirror, exactly what is?

K: I mean by mirror, a reaction, to see that you are violent, prejudiced, conditioned by society, by education to function along a particular line, you know, all that. Just to see what you are. Which is the world. Can we do that? And not say, "Oh, what I see I don't like or it's so lovely, I'm going to keep one part of it and discard the other part." Can I read the whole history of myself. I don't know - go on, sirs. Is that possible?

Q: I don't want to seem to quibble with words, but sometimes you can see violence but not recognise it. There seems to be a difference between our ability to see it and actually recognise it as such.

K: No, sir, look. Anger is violence, isn't it? Can you observe anger arising in you? Not in you, generally. I'll say, 'Can I observe anger as it arises, is there an awareness of this movement of anger welling up? And can I observe that anger without explanation, without saying, it's justified - just to observe it?'

Q: Sir, I think there's a difference, one can be aware of one's jealousy, for instance, but there is a difference between being able to observe it with action, which you were saying just now. The action which is the observation. It's a difference between just being aware of it, maybe partially, which means perhaps all of us, but...

K: That's the question, sir, that's what we're asking. Can I be aware of this movement of violence in me, not just one by one, anger or jealousy but the whole structure of violence.

Q: What is going to make mankind act in the way you have put forward, that there's going to be this clarity, this observation, that I see that my jealousy, my violence and I see what it's doing to the world. What is going to make man act or think or to bring about that clarity? That's the problem, as I see it.

K: I'm saying, we are saying, sir, that very observation is action.

Q: Yes.

K: Not what will I do. If I see the whole nature of violence in myself, without any distortion - that is important, because if I distort I can act from that distortion. So my question is, can I observe the whole nature of violence in me?

Q: Can I put it the other way round? What will make man put down his prejudices so he can observe that?

K: What will make man put aside his prejudices.

Q: Mankind. Yes.

K: Crisis?

Q: We have plenty of those.

K: Crisis, a challenge which you have to answer. A relationship that brings about a sense of responsibility. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: What will make man, a human, what will make me drop my prejudices?

Q: That's it.

K: Go on, sir, enquire - you're all in it, not me only. What will make us, each one of us, drop our prejudices?

Q: It seems to me that it is realizing that the prejudice is not something outside on the other person, but it's my very cherished beliefs.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: But what I really stick to is that the other person is doing the same thing and think they're good and therefore we clash.

K: I'm asking, will you drop your prejudices? What will make you?

Q: Seeing that...

K: See, sir, we are prejudiced, aren't we? No? You have your own prejudices, your own opinions, your own experiences, which are part of the whole business. Can you drop them?

Q: But the prejudices are a challenge to me.

K: Wait, look at it, I'm asking you, don't enlarge it more. I am prejudiced because I think I'm a Hindu, much better than all the rest of the human beings. Prejudiced. I think I've got a better brain than anybody else. That's prejudice. And so on. Can I drop all that? What will make me drop my prejudices? That is the question.

Q: Danger. Immediate.

K: Yes, danger. We have no danger, sitting in this room, immediately.

Q: Sir, I don't want to try to give a whole answer but aren't you missing out your catalytic action? Isn't that why we are here just now.

K: You're saying, listen to me, action is a catalyst. Maybe. Or may not be. My prejudice may be so terribly strong. Right? Just a minute, so what will make me drop my prejudices?

Q: Seeing that it prevents you from relationship, from real relationship.

K: No. Will you drop yours? Will I drop my prejudice because I see the importance of having a good relationship. Will that make me do it? You see, in all that is implied reward, a sense of if you don't do this you will be punished. That again is acting according to a desire of not wanting to be punished or be wanting a reward.

So can I drop this prejudice? Can I drop my being a Hindu so completely that I've not a particle of that idiotic idea? Sorry.

Q: If I say I am not impressed with these ideas such as if I drop the idea of myself as an Englishman...

K: I'm asking you, sir.

Q: Yes.

K: Can you drop being British, French, you know, all the things that go with it?

Q: Sir, doesn't one have to see the danger and the destructiveness of these categories because otherwise why would we look at them. The question is that the world is violent and disordered and what can we do about it. If the disorder and violence were simply lovely, we wouldn't be asking the question, would we?

K: Yes.

Q: We wouldn't be, would we?

K: Of course not.

Q: Therefore there is a certain impetus in the...

K: ...the very...

Q: ...the unpleasantness, to put it mildly.

K: He raised a point, which is, I am here to listen to what is happening, to all of you and to you, I want to listen. That may act as a catalyst. That's his point. Now can I listen to what you are saying, which is, drop your prejudice. You understand? You have said that to me. Can I listen so completely that the very listening is the emptying of my prejudice? You understand?

Q: Yes.

K: Are you doing it?

Q: There's the rub - what is going to make us do it? And I say it must be a feeling that man wants to end his inhumanity to his fellow man.

K: Yes, sir, but again that's a motive. Be careful. Sir, the point is this, if I may. You have told me, drop your prejudices. That the very putting aside your prejudices, your mind will be different. That you're telling me. And I listen to you. You follow, sir? Because I'm tremendously interested in the feeling that I might, whether I can be free of prejudice. Because I've lived with it, my fathers, my grandfathers the whole past, thousand years of Brahmanical outlook has prejudiced my mind. And I listen to you. And the very listening may be the act of purgation. I don't know if I'm...

Q: Sir, don't we have to watch each prejudice as it comes?

K: No. No.

Q: Give complete attention to it.

Q: It's clearly something you can't will.

K: No, I want to listen to you. I've listened to you to find out if I, part of society, if I can drop my prejudices.

Q: But sir, why do you listen, why do you wish to examine whether you can drop your prejudices? Why?

K: Why?

Q: Why?

K: Because, a very simple reason, I see as long as I have my prejudices, we can never meet.

Q: So is that not a valid motive?

K: No. All right, it's a valid motive. (Laughter) But it doesn't lead me any further.

Q: But it does lead you to ask, it leads you to look.

K: So there are valid reasons and not valid reasons. Then we go off into that.

Q: No, but to ask the question what will make us look.

K: What will make me drop my prejudices?

Q: If you see something stupid you drop it.

K: Go on - what will make you drop your prejudices?

Q: I must die fast. Literally.

K: I don't want time. Time is a prejudice.

Q: No, sir - I must die now.

K: I'm doing that, sir - I want to know what am I to do? I want to know if it is possible to drop my prejudices.

Q: Is there anything to do?

K: I'm going to find out, sir.

Q: I don't know. Because it would have to be an action so totally different from any action we're used to.

K: Probably.

Q: Something that I don't know.

Q: First of all I have to see I have these prejudices at all, not just because somebody has told me.

K: I've seen my prejudices, I'm not a child any more, I can't keep on repeating I must see it - I've seen it.

Q: Of course.

Q: I'm not sure I see all of mine, like for instance, I don't feel identified with the country or with the religion.

K: All right, but your experiences are prejudices. Go on, sir. You've had certain experiences.

Q: My experience is better than your experience.

K: Wait, Peter - you've had certain experiences going to India, all the rest of that business.

Q: Yes.

K: And you're entrenched in that.

Q: Yes, it makes me feel I'm a beautiful human being, but next moment I feel I'm a terrible human being - you know.

K: Do please let's finish. You're entrenched in that, in those experiences which have become part of you. And can you drop those experiences and say, "Look, I must look at life differently," perhaps or see things which may be more accurate.

Q: Prejudices create conflict because one is part of something greater than yourself, the very carrying around and acting upon that prejudice leads to conflict inevitably, and the conflict is the result of conclusion.

K: Yes, sir, but...

Q: Confusion.

K: Yes, but have I got different points of view, have I got a certain view to which I am attached, a certain concept which to me is so deeply rooted?

Q: You may have.

K: Sir, go to a Catholic, and he'll say, "What nonsense are you talking about?" Right? Because it's part of me, I accept it. You're not meeting my point.

Q: If conflict is there, then there is the inevitable recognition of becoming an observer.

K: Wait, sir. Are you aware of your prejudices?

Q: Unfortunately, yes.

K: Wait, yes, you are aware of your prejudices, can you drop them? What will make you let go?

Q: That's the question. When I become an observer which is not to often.

K: Not when you become - become, be.

Q: Exactly, but this does not happen frequently enough, but one can do it and it is fear frequently that stops it.

K: Sir, when you say 'when', that means some time later, but I'm saying now, sitting in this room, at this time, can I be aware of my prejudices and let them go?

Q: Then I have to live fully in the present.

K: I don't know what is implied, sir, but can I do it now.

Q: I don't understand your usage of the word 'to do.' I don't know if I can do it now. Doing, doing - I don't know.

K: Why not?

Q: What's involved in that specific kind of doing?

K: No, I'm not saying 'doing'. I say are you aware of your prejudice. And realize its consequences at the same time, the whole movement, not just bit by bit by bit. The whole of it, the prejudice, the consequences of it and the motive why you want to get rid of prejudice, the whole movement of this prejudice. Can you be aware of it and say, "Look, how silly it is. I'm only..." - finish?

Q: But surely, the answer most people would give would be that they don't know but they hope that it is possible, that is as far as they can get.

K: Of course, sir. I know that. But are we like that? Are we in this room saying, "I hope to eventually get rid of them, when I'm 90 and just about one foot in the grave, then I'm ready to give it up."

Q: To me it's so fundamental that we can stay with this, how is mankind going to drop these prejudices?

K: You are mankind.

Q: Yes, now to me I see it compassionately, I see it as...

K: No - you are mankind. Have you dropped your prejudices?

Q: Sir, before you seemed to be talking about the essential root of all prejudices, the structure of each of them, rather than each one in turn. Is that correct? You want us to see the whole structure, not each particular prejudice.

Q: Can I see all my prejudices alone? Many I only see in relationship with other people.

Q: Can I drop my prejudices? Is that not a wrong question to ask, one is looking at...

K: I have prejudices, of various kinds, prejudices, opinions, judgments, experiences to which my mind in memory is attached. What I think I am, what I must be - all that, and more, is the whole bag of my prejudice. Right? Now I'm asking, can I open that bag and let it go. You don't answer my question, you're all dissipating my question. As Professor Wilkins pointed out, I hope to get rid of it. Is that what we're doing? You understand, sir? If I go to a politician, in the present government, and say, "Drop your prejudices." They would throw me out. Go to Russia and say, "Please." Now we are not in that position here, you're not going to throw me out, I'm not going to throw you out. So we are amicably examining this thing.

And we're saying, "Can you and I, in the process of thinking, watching, observing, talking over together, feel the absolute necessity of dropping prejudices?"

Q: Does the word 'prejudice' mean to prejudge, it means to prejudge something before I've actually seen it.

K: Yes, Madam, don't pick on one word. Prejudices, I've said, the whole of it. The way I think, I've been trained to think along Marxist lines or Mao, or Krishnamurti - I've been trained, read conditioned. I said, "For God's sake, can I be free of it."

Q: Let me put it this way. I have dropped my prejudices, you are my friend, and I see that you haven't dropped yours. And you're a good guy etc. etc. And I want you to drop them. What am I to do?

K: All right. I'll tell you. What am I to do? Will you first listen? You understand, sir? Listen. Or are you listening partially, because those prejudices are very pleasant, very profitable, and those prejudices are profitable, pleasant, rewarding, you say, "I will prevent you from listening". Right?

So can you listen in spite of all that? Because no amount of argument is going to get at my prejudices, no amount of rewarding or punishment or anything is going to get rid of it. We have tried all those.

So sitting together in this room, talking over together amicably, because we're interested in, rather, we are concerned with regard to action in a mad world. And one of you says, "Unless you, as a human being, part of this society, drop your prejudices, your action will always be limited, it will always bring about conflict." And so on. That interests me. Because I see what the world is and instinctively I don't want to live like that.

So can I drop my prejudices, realizing all the consequences of it? Go on, Peter. As I listen to you, can I drop them, not sometime later, here in this room finish with them?

Q: But I see that you've got to instinctively feel like that.

K: What, sir?

Q: In order for me to get you to drop your prejudices, you've got to instinctively feel like you've described. That's important.

K: Whatever it is, will you drop them?

Q: I can't see how my experience, say my trip to India, is prejudice. Is it because I give it a value different to other things?

K: Look, we said, prejudice is to prejudge, opinion, have different points of view, a particular way of thinking, certain concepts which you hold dear, certain experiences which seem to you very important to yourself, and so on, various forms of illusions. All that and more can be summed up in one word, prejudice, for the moment. We might change the word 'prejudice' into something else, but for the moment, let's call all that bundle 'prejudice.'

Now can one drop that bundle, that's what I'm asking. Because, my mind, one's mind isn't free. One can't observe clearly. If I, if you have prejudice against brown skin, you won't even look at me.

Q: But if all I am is prejudice, if all my vision is prejudice, how can that see itself?

K: Wait, sir.

Q: If it can is it the prejudice vision that sees the prejudice or is it...

K: I'm going to show you.

Q: ...or does there have to be something else that comes.

K: We'll go into that, sir, in a minute, just see.

Q: It seems mutually exclusive.

K: You see, my prejudice is me.

Q: Right.

K: I am a bundle of prejudices. Now is that bundle different from me? Don't - go into it very carefully. Is that bundle, which we have described, various aspects of it, me? I am observing that bundle. Is the observer different from the bundle? Go on, sir. Our tradition says the observer is different from the bundle. Right? Our whole education, our culture, says you are different from that. So it's very difficult for me to accept that I am that bundle, how terrible. I reject that instantly, because my whole upbringing says I am different. Because it says you can then control the bundle, you can get rid of it, or keep parts of it and so on. You can act upon it. But when I really see the fact that the bundle is me, there is no observer. That's the whole point.

Q: But it's obvious that I...

K: Have you listened to this, sir?

Q: In other words, one must not interfere with that observation.

K: This is a fact, sir, look. Would you please listen, not go on with your own - we'll come to that later, which is, the bundle is me. But I reject the idea that me is the bundle, because my whole background, my upbringing, my culture, my religion says, "You must control it." Right? "You must change it, you must go beyond it."

But when you come along and say, "You are the bundle," it is a fact. So what happens, when I realize, when there is the realization, the bundle is me?

Q: What realizes that, if the bundle is prejudice, how can that prejudice...

K: Ah, you haven't listened. Forgive me, sir, I'm not criticizing, it's your business, but we don't listen. The bundle is me. So the observer is not separate from the bundle. This is important to understand, because the observer who says, "I must get rid of the bundle," thinks himself he's separate from the bundle. So he thinks he can act upon the bundle. We have removed altogether this separative action when I realize that I am the bundle. Can I observe, is there an observation of that bundle without the observer?

Q: Sir, it's obvious that my effort is...

K: There's no effort.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, I'm not making an effort.

Q: Yes, but...

K: I abhor every form of effort.

Q: It seems that something is coming up preventing this observation from taking place, so one finds oneself trying to see, which is obviously nonsense, but this is a real thing happening.

K: Sir, I've listened to you, explaining logically step by step, though I may object to logic, conclusions, your logic has forced me into a corner, naturally. I am not resisting it because I want to understand. I'm not obstinate, I want to find out. So I listen to you. You have explained very carefully what this whole nature of prejudice is, various aspects of it, and we've come to the point when we call that whole prejudice a bundle.

Now you say to me, observe that bundle. Yes, I say, I'm observing it. Which is, I am observing it as though it were something separate from me, because that's what I've been used to, that's what my education, my religion, my culture has said, "You are different from that." And so that culture, that tradition says, "Act upon it." Change it, break it down, or run away from it, suppress it. But you come along and say, "Look, you're living in an illusion, the bundle is you." Right? Which means what? There is no observer who says, "I am the bundle." I wonder if you see?

Dr. Bohm, please join us, what do you say? Give me a rest!

Q: I think that the mind has a tendency to try to prepare the ground first by saying that there is something different, that I'm not only the bundle but something more.

K: I don't know.

Q: And that's almost universal.

K: That's another trick.

Q: And therefore we prepare to bargain where there's something more, in which the observer could retreat. So I think that the attempt of logic to make sure of the ground beforehand is interfering with the thing.

K: Would you agree or see the logic of the sequence of this?

Q: I think it's a peculiar kind of logic that we are not used to, this is why it's so difficult. Ordinary logic, we think, we try to see, to form a concept of the totality...

K: Of course, of course.

Q: ...before we act. Now if you say who is going to observe or what is it going to observe, it's going to have a concept of the totality before you act and then act. Which means, you put back the observer in the place of the, whatever it is that is beyond the bundle of prejudice. So it's a peculiar kind of logic which is correct but it is not common. You don't do that, but actually just work from the statement of the fact as you have given it. I don't know if I've made myself clear.

K: Yes, sir, it's clear to me, I don't know about the others.

Q: We are not accustomed to this kind of logic because it's something in which the logic itself will change the totality...

K: No, no.

Q: ...when you observe. But by staying with the way you have put it, rather than going on to ask for what is it that will observe, then that observation can take place which will change the structure, in that very moment of observation.

Q: Don't we get confused by the original question, which was something like, "Can I be free from my prejudices?"

Q: That's the same question. Whenever you say, "Can I do this?" and they are assuming that I will continue...

K: Of course.

Q: ...through this whole process and therefore that defeats the whole thing. It seems to me that in some way - we were listening to a tape of your discussion with the buddhists, where you say that you die to that prejudice and therefore you are not the same person any more.

K: Right, sir. Sir, so what do you say to all this?

Q: I was going to say what does the bundle require so as to observe itself?

K: No.

Q: But I don't think that goes as far as what David Bohm says.

K: Yes. But I'm not saying the bundle can observe itself. It can't. But what we are saying is, you have removed the observer.

Q: Do you mean, sir, rather that the bundle discloses itself?

K: No, sir, it has been disclosed.

Q: Yes, but...

K: By words - you've explained it to me very, very carefully.

Q: ...but you're saying whereas previously by acting on it...

K: You thought you could do something.

Q: ...I thought I was changing everything.

K: Yes.

Q: Actually it remains the same.

K: Same, yes.

Q: Now by removing the observer, the bundle itself discloses it's own features.

K: No, something else takes place. That's what I want to get at.

Q: Is that always silent?

K: No, no. Have we come to this point together, at least that the bundle is me? I am not separate from the bundle, full stop. Could we come to that, all of us together.

Q: Which means there is no part of me that is free from prejudice.

K: Quite right.

Q: Whatever I say, as long as...

K: Of course, obviously.

Q: ...I don't see I am prejudice...

K: I said that whole bundle is you, your consciousness is made up of that bundle. But if you see that, that is, only the bundle, nothing else.

Q: So the observer has no escape.

K: Of course, all that's gone, sir - escape and suppression and trying to do something about it - it's all finished.

Q: Aren't we attempting to do the same thing again, which is instead of having two things, an observer and a bundle, we now think we have only got one thing which is a bundle, but we are still stuck with the idea that the entity, the bundle, will act...

K: We're going to find out.

Q: ...instead of...

K: No, something else, I want to find out if I've reached that point, what happens. We haven't reached it, but we're speculating about it. Is there an observation of this bundle without the observer? The observer is the prejudice, so when he observes with prejudice, he still remains with the prejudice

So I'm asking, do we all of us together here in this room now, at quarter to one, before lunch, see this simple point together - the bundle is me. The moment that is a fact, there is already transformation in the observing.

Q: Could you use the word 'awareness' instead of observer?

K: Same thing, sir.

Q: But I think it's misleading as observing implies some action, whereas awareness implies the state of mind which is not moving.

K: Sir, when you are observing through a telescope, you are observing the thing which is happening under the telescope.

Q: Right, but I'm observing, there isn't...

K: No.

Q: I am observing.

K: You are using the eye to observe but there is no observer who comes to it with lots of prejudices and says, 'I'm observing.' That's a top scientist - I mean, sorry, sir.

Q: You would have to become unconscious...

K: No, sir, nothing - you see, nothing of that kind. It is a simple fact that I am the observer, that I am the bundle and nothing else.

Q: But if the bundle observes itself, then the bundle disappears, surely.

K: That's what I want to come to. When there is no observer, what takes place? You don't come to that point.

Q: If there is no observer there is only observation.

K: No, that's just an idea - don't play with words, for God's sake - come to the point. Have you come to the point that you are the bundle, not that you are observing the bundle? In that observation you have dissipated energy. Right? I don't know if you follow this. Right? Can we go round with this for a few minutes? That when there is division between the observer and the observed, there is a wastage of energy, which is, he says, "I'm acting upon it, I must do something about it, I must change it and do something else." And so on, which is an indication of wasting energy.

Q: Doesn't it also make the bundle heavier?

K: No - don't - but when there is no dissipation of energy, which means the bundle is you. Right? Have you come to that point? Otherwise we can't talk any further.

Q: This whole bundle is theoretical for me - I can't grasp this bundle, it looks theoretical, I can't see it, touch it.

K: You want to grasp it, why can't you see the meaning of the word? The significance of prejudice, the consequence of prejudice, can't you see it instantly?

Q: Is it the sum of my total likes and dislikes and that's all, or is there something else?

K: You're made up of that, aren't you? Like and dislike.

Q: Like and dislike. Finished.

K: Yes, so that's part of your prejudice. I like this, I don't like that. I like you, I don't like the black people, or the white people, or the purple people.

Q: Is there anything beside this, this bundle, besides this liking and disliking?

K: I said, sir, that's the whole bundle, whole of it, my experience, my judgement, my opinions, my desires, my longing for something better - all that is part of me, it's me.

Q: What about the enquirer who is trying to find out?

K: We've enquired, we've come to this point through enquiry.

Q: Is that part of the bundle?

K: No, I'm looking, searching. And I discover I've got tons of bundles, prejudices.

Q: But it can't be a prejudice seeing that, because if it were prejudice realizing that you were full of bundles, it would still be a prejudice and you wouldn't see that as clarity.

K: No, you're missing the point, sir.

Q: There has to be something else.

K: No, you're not to do anything else but listen. Listen to somebody else, not to me only, listen to somebody who says, "How am I to get rid of my prejudices, so deeply rooted?" He's bothered with it, he's concerned. And I say, "Look, there's a way, if you listen very carefully I'll show it to you." You might say, "Go to hell." That's all right. Since we have gathered in this room for this purpose, we say, "Look, will you kindly listen to what the other fellow is saying." He says the bundle is no different from you. That's a fact.

Q: I think that people are puzzled by your saying that and at the same time saying that when you see this is prejudice you're not a bundle you see. This doesn't seem to be clear.

K: Of course.

Q: One becomes the problem.

Q: Is it that we are still hiding the subject of the verb, the 'I' now in the bundle, instead of having it separate from the bundle, we've now stuffed it into the bundle?.

K: I am the bundle.

Q: That's right, but is that correct?

K: Oh yes. Absolutely.

Q: The one is correct but in the seeing of that, it doesn't...

K: Not only in the seeing, the feeling of it, in my blood, in my guts I feel it.

Q: Yes, sir

Q: There is an 'I' tucked into the bundle - you haven't changed anything, have you? The perception of that changes the whole thing.

K: I have changed completely because I see the truth, the observer is the bundle.

Q: But can one say that it isn't that 'I' perceive that but...

K: No.

Q: ...it has occurred, thereby undoing the duality.

K: I am not perceiving the bundle, the bundle is me.

Q: So there's no longer a perceiver or the thing perceived.

K: I've made that clear.

Q: Finished.

Q: So there is perception and not who sees it or who...

K: I said that, I said there is only the realization, the fact that I am the bundle.

Q: But is not the root of the matter that if we perceive the bundle and then we disappear, we don't want to disappear.

K: Yes, of course, that's the...

Q: I don't want to disappear. (Laughter) I'm sorry to have to admit it.

Q: What has become of the problem itself, and if one has a sense of awareness, as something which seems to be separate, you know, a manifestation of, then that manifestation of whatever it is we feel, that sense of awareness is the problem, so one hasn't disappeared, they have just become something which is more involved with, in the thing itself. There is no separation.

K: Sir, look, Professor Wilkins said, I don't want to disappear. That's probably what most of us do. But the 'I' is the very centre of violence. If you are like that, asking the Prime Minister, say, "Give up your prejudices", he says, "Sorry, 10 Downing street is very profitable, nice."

No, I want to find out as a human being whether it is possible to live without violence. And I see for myself, I mean I'm not asking you to see it, I'm not persuading you or pressurizing, putting you in a corner, or brainwashing you - I say, for me the fact is I am that. When there is that absolute realization, the truth of it, something totally different takes place. If you are interested we can pursue it. We can only pursue it if you have come to the point.

Q: Sir, I am part of the society, whether in the politics, economics, so for more than 20 years I am trained up to see myself different from that bundle of incidents.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: So I listen attentively and I also see the consequence that despite prejudice, it is also the cause of sorrow and it is fortunately for me. So for more than 20 years I always try to change it, to modify it. I always try to do something because I see also it causes something that is not good for me or for others, so I always try to change it. And now I see that it is not different from me, so surely there is an action.

K: So what is the action?

Q: Because I am not different from that bundle and I am that bundle, surely I am not going to do anything any more.

K: No, no. Something else takes place, you see, that's another, that means you are now come to a state, according to you, sir, that you don't act at all. There is no action.

Q: I mean that I am not trying to change anything.

K: No, we've been through all that. I said, when you come to that point and you realize the bundle is you, there is a totally different action takes place. It's not my action or your action, it's action which will be common to all of us.

I think we'd better stop, it's one o'clock. We'll go on tomorrow.
Is that all right?

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD SEMINAR MEETING 15TH SEPTEMBER 1979

KRISHNAMURTI: Where did we leave off yesterday?

QUESTIONER: The observer and the observed.

Q: I think we left off where somebody said he didn't want to disappear, in other words, the 'me', the 'self' doesn't want to disappear. And if we really fully go on with all of this it could well mean that 'me', the self, disappears, that's the end of it. We don't want that.

K: I don't quite remember, do you?

Q: We talked about the observer and what we called a bundle.

K: Yes, oh yes.

Q: And the notion was raised that perhaps one was just placing the self into the bundle.

K: We must bear in mind the subject we started out with, which was, what is one to do in a world that is steadily declining, deteriorating, violence and all that. What can a human being do about all that? That's what we started out with.

Yesterday and the previous day, we made it quite clear that the world outside of us, we human beings have created this. And after having created it, we are caught in that trap. And we think we are different from the activities that are going on outside of us. We pointed out too, that the world with all its violence and terror and greed and competition and violence, is made by man. And we, as human beings, are responsible for that. That is, the world is me, and me is the world. I think that we made quite clear.

All the accumulated despairs, anxieties, grief, sorrow and violence, all this bundle is me, my consciousness is that. And that consciousness is part of the world. So that consciousness is the world. Right? We are clear on that point I hope. Can we go on from there?

And do we observe that bundle with all the content of this consciousness, do we observe it as though I was different from that consciousness, and can operate on that consciousness, try to modify it, change it, control it, suppress it, or run away from it. Or that consciousness, which is also the expression of the world, is me, and therefore there is no observer separate from that bundle which is the 'me'. Right? That's where we left off yesterday.

I don't know how far we have really grasped the significance of it. Could we discuss it a bit more? "When I realize", the questioner says, "When I realize that I am the world and all the happenings in the world, psychologically, have been created by my ancestors and by me, I am part of that. I am not separate from that, I am the total quantity of all that."

And there is the suspicion, probably in most of us, there is something beyond all this. Right? There is something superior or which is not contaminated. Is that so? We ought to discuss this rather carefully. I don't know if it interests you. We are following each other?

The Hindus have said that there is a superior entity, the Atman and so on, I won't go into all that, that is not contaminated, that exists in you. And that is operating, that is the witness, he is the witness, watching. Right? I don't know if any of you know anything of the Hindu mythology or Hindu superstition, but it's part of that. That is, that there is a watcher who is not touched by society, by thought. And that is trying all the time to push away the things that man has created round it. I'm putting it rather crudely and briefly. That's one idea.

And also, probably in the Christian world too, and perhaps in the eastern world, there is the soul, something that is not part of this society. Right? I don't know if you have gone into it, thought about it. So we ought to consider that too, if there is something in us, in me, in you as human beings that is not touched by the corruption of society, corruption of thought, corruption of time. Right?

Q: I've got a problem here, you seem to be implying that there is some kind of individual, indivisible sort of state of peace.

K: No.

Q: You are saying that we are the world, and it seems to me that if we are the world there's no place for a sort of private, personal, sort of subjective state.

K: I think so. I agree with you, there is no private me apart from the public me. I can deceive myself.

Q: Then if there isn't, why are you talking about the soul...

K: No, because...

Q: ...that sort of stuff, which is nonsense. I see that as being...

K: I'm talking about it because this is a prevalent idea.

Q: I don't think one can seriously think so.

K: Perhaps you have not that idea. So we can drop it. Right? No, you're too quick to drop everything.

Q: Sir, I think we might say that we don't believe in it but it's buried deep in many of our premises and the way we think.

K: No, I think, sir - look at it differently, if I may point out. Is the whole of me, my consciousness, corrupt, in the sense, there is nothing more in me, there is no spot of clarity? You understand what I'm saying?

Q: We might as well all go home if that's the case.

K: Am I the whole bundle of this and nothing else? I'm putting the question differently. I wonder if you are meeting my point. Could we discuss this? Is there in my consciousness of which I'm not aware, of which I'm not cognizant, is there in me a field, an area that is not put together by thought. You understand? I wonder?

Q: Is that the question you are putting forth to us?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: Well, would it seem difficult when you ask if there is such a thing, it does exist, beyond our cognisance, how would we know that, I mean, how could we even answer that question?

K: There is an idea, sir, that I'm not, I as a human, all that - I am not all this corruption, this time element, all the greed, envy, there is something in me which is not that also. This is the religious attitude. You understand? I don't know if you...

Q: This has been said throughout the ages.

K: Yes.

Q: It must be today the only hope of mankind, if I can dare use that word hope.

K: So if there is such a thing which is not touched by time, that given the opportunity may wipe out all this.

Q: Exactly.

K: You understand? No, you're missing it.

Q: And yet on the other hand, it might just be a wishful thought.

K: That's just it. So what do you consider? This is a discussion, you understand, we're trying to find out.

Q: You have been speaking about the objects of consciousness, I mean, is it possible if one is seriously interested to consider consciousness itself. In other words, I'm not concerned with the content. Consciousness without any content as we know it, thinking process and so forth.

K: Do we know...

Q: Is it worth looking at that area?

K: Do we know consciousness, first of all, with all its content, or only part of it, not the whole content? You understand my question? That is, my consciousness is made up of all the traditions, superstitions, belief, illusions, suspicion, anxiety, and so on, all my consciousness is that. Put there by thought. Right? Would you agree to this? Not agree, see it.

Q: I don't think I do agree with that, because I think for some time now I think I've had some kind of change, and I now see that there is no difference between what is going on inside me and the content of consciousness outside.

K: No, all right. I'm saying, the world consciousness is my consciousness.

Q: Yes, but that means you have an immediate problem like a doctor has a problem, they say there's no time for prophylactic medicine, looking into this, is there an area which is...

K: I don't quite...

Q: ...but that the situation is such that you keep saying it's so urgent that one has to deal with this, with this problem.

K: We are dealing with problems.

Q: It's so violent that even the Church, they haven't got the time to sit there, they are all worrying about being humble and all this nonsense.

K: Then I'm not following your point. Perhaps others are following it.

Q: We seem to have jumped, because you said, you asked a question and said, is there consciousness apart from thought, I think.

K: No, I didn't say that.

Q: Or not made up, part made up.

K: No, I only said, my consciousness is made up of all the things that thought has put together there. The nationalities, the racial prejudices, the beliefs, the ideals, anxieties, all that is the movement of thought, which includes emotional and all that, all that is the content of my consciousness.

Q: It's the content?

K: Wait, wait. Am I aware of that or only part of it, depending on circumstances, incidents, happenings, pressures, only part of it. Or am I aware of the whole content? And if I am aware, is there in that consciousness, something which is not put there by thought? How do I find out, because this is a question that has been put, been talked over, gone into by all the religious people, that there is God in you, in different forms, it doesn't matter. The whole Asiatic world believes that, practically, except part of the Buddhist and so on. I won't go into all that.

So I'm asking myself, therefore you're asking yourself, is there in my consciousness an area which is not put there by thought? You understand my question?

Q: We are asking, it would seem, I have a time-based mind and I'm asking now with this time-based mind, what is it like to be...

K: I don't know.

Q: ...without time.

K: I don't know what it's like, all that I know, I'm asking, because this has been one of the questions which mankind has gone into and asserted and denied, that there is something which is not put there by thought. Please, you must see this, this is not my opinion, this is what the world is thinking about.

Q: But surely this seems to implying, if you say that there is something inside, you're suggesting that there is a soul, some sort of personal subjective experience, some private space.

K: No, they don't call it private, individual, they call it something, highest principle, eternal something or other.

Q: Isn't that the same thing?

K: So we can wipe that out if you agree, sirs, we can put that aside.

Q: I don't think it is quite right to put it aside, personally, forgive me, because I haven't been here for the past few days.

K: I know, sir.

Q: If one's putting away aside the content of consciousness that's one thing, but the very immediacy of consciousness, which we cannot dismiss, which is our very being, is rather a different area. And are you suggesting that we should dismiss that as an area of investigation?

K: I'm sorry I brought this thing up, because you haven't gone into it, let's drop it.

Q: I think this gentleman is asking, sir, if there is anything in consciousness other than the content.

Q: Not in consciousness, as long as you're looking at things in consciousness, you're forever looking at things that are away from oneself and not in one's immediacy of being, it seems to me that this area that we are discussing is a sort of peripheral area whereas there is another mode, which is a mode of...

K: Sir, I'm asking, sir - all right, I won't ask. My consciousness is its content. Right?

Q: No, I don't see it that way, sir. It seems to me that it is possible for consciousness to be, for awareness to be, for me to be without thoughts, without thought processes.

K: Ah, I see.

Q: And I think there's a danger in dismissing consciousness or the objects of consciousness, dismissing one's own immediacy of being.

K: Sir, our subject was, what am I to do, act, do, in life in a world that is violent, disorderly, disintegrating, what is my action towards that? And we have been talking over it for the last two days and come to a certain point, which was, that what is happening out there is not different from what is happening from here. We all agreed to that, agreed, no - I won't even use the word 'agreed'. We said we all saw that.

Q: We saw that.

K: Just a minute, sir, let me finish. And so the world is me, and I am not different from the world. Just a minute. We saw very clearly. It took two days to come to that point of view, sir.

Q: Forgive me.

K: And we said, that being aware that I am the world, and that there is no observer different from the bundle which I am, right? - then what actually takes place? That's the whole point. You understand my point? Perhaps you haven't followed clearly, I've not explained probably clearly, much too briefly, probably.

Q: Yes, I do feel you have said the possibility of though we are the world, there are gaps in the thought process, there are gaps between the words, and if there is care so that there isn't a complete continuity of the world within us.

K: We haven't gone into the continuity of that, sir. All that we have said so far is that the world is not different from me. The me is the bundle of all my desires, depressions, anxieties, sorrow and so on. That is the bundle. Now am I observing that bundle as though the bundle is not me? You follow? Am I observing the bundle as though I was outside of it, and therefore looking at it? Then if I do that - we went into that, then there is the urge to act upon it, to control it, to shape it, to run away from it or suppress it.

But the fact is that bundle is me, there is no observer. That's where we came to yesterday. Right, sir?

Q: And what is action from there?

K: Yes, that's it. That's it. That's why I began by asking, our subject was, what am I to do, living in this world which is so destructive, disorderly and so on, what am I to do? To find out that action we have discussed the last two days and come to this point: that is, there is only the bundle and not the observer. I don't know if you have gone as far as that. Right?

It was a logical conclusion. Right? I'm using the word 'logical' in the sense, as a river flows naturally, and in the same way we have observed this whole process flowing, which is not a logical step my step conclusion. I wonder if you see. Like a stream or a river that's flowing constantly, it has its own logic. And what we have done is to follow that logic naturally. So there has been no effort. Right? There has been no definite opinion or conclusion - it's a fact. Right? We are observing the fact.

So have we really come to that point? That's my question, which is, are we looking at this bundle of consciousness with all its content as an observer looking in, or there is no observer but only this bundle? Have we come to that point, not as an idea, a conclusion, but as an actuality, as a thing that is happening. Now could we go on from there.

Q: Sir we have seen that, now what are we going to do, if we have seen that?

Q: I don't know if we have seen that.

K: No, that's why we may have seen it as an idea, as a conclusion, which is different from the actual - I dislike to use the word 'experience', it's a silly word - as an actual fact, you understand sir? - an actual reality.

Q: Perhaps we could try to go on to the difference between the seeing it as an idea and actually seeing it as a fact, or as an experience.

K: Yes. We ought to talk over that a bit.

Q: Yes.

K: That is, do I observe it, is there an observation, and from that observation a conclusion which is an idea, or without idea observe, and not come to a conclusion? Sir, I see you sitting there. That's a fact, you're there. I may draw a conclusion from it. I may say I don't like you, it becomes an idea.

So when we say the bundle is me, is it an idea, or the real, the actual realization that it is so? So we ought to talk over that a bit.

Q: Sir, the difficulty seems to be the way that we are looking. It seems that looking is struggling, because if that is so, if looking is struggling, then the answer to the question "What can I do in the world that is violent" the answer is nothing, there is nothing I can do, if looking is struggling.

K: Yes, sir. First of all, we have discussed so far, is it an idea or is it an actual fact of which there is observation. You understand?

Q: Sir, it seems that the words we have to use, which are not the thing, can be an obstacle if we think with the image of the words. It seems we have to put aside the image of the words.

K: Sir, I'm asking you a question, please find out - I may be wrong or perhaps you're already answered it. When you observe a fact, or rather when there is an observation of fact, does that observation bring about an idea, a conclusion, a concept, or merely observe the fact? Which is it that we are doing?

You see, all this comes to, is there an action without the actor? I don't know if I'm jumping.

Q: Yes, I think it's a little too fast.

K: I'm going too fast. Right.

Q: Are you saying that acting is quite different from an action, it sounds like an abstract nonsense.

K: An action, action, don't say...

Q: Acting.

K: Acting. Is there an - as Dr. Bohm says, you have jumped too far ahead so I withdraw that.

Q: I would like to ask the question, what is it we are in contact with this actual fact of the bundle, you know, if we see it we must have a contact with it, if it's an actual fact.

K: That's it.

Q: This contact.

K: Yes, that's it, put it that way. Is there an actual contact with the fact?

Q: Yes, as we can contact with an object.

K: Put it that way.

Q: - a real object.

K: Let's put it that way, instead of using experience and all that, is there an actual contact with the fact that I am the world and the world is me, and this bundle is me without the observer? Is that an actual contact.

Q: That contact is the way we live.

K: No, no.

Q: What we seem to do is wrestle with the idea, not make contact with the fact. You wrestle with the idea, and that seems to cause the conflict.

K: Sir, bear in mind, sir, all the time, we're asking what am I to do. Right? And we've come to the point when we say, "Are we actually in contact with the fact that I am the bundle?" You understand - contact.

Q: When I'm relating to you or to a person, when I'm relating, talking to a person, I see that actually there is no real relationship, there is a mess.

K: But we're not talking...

Q: Just, please - but when I go away from people, then I'm alone, somehow I still think that I know what is good, what is beautiful, what is holy, except that it's not coming through, but in the back of the mind this belief persists.

K: So what, what are you saying, sir?

Q: This, at some moments one sees that one is the bundle, when you're there but when...

K: No, when you're in touch with that, you can't say occasionally I'm in touch.

Q: We must pull out this contact. We must pull it out somehow or another. Yourself or Professor Bohm, we must pull out this question of content.

Q: Look into it.

Q: Looking into it, to me it is the way I look.

K: All right, are you directly in relationship with it?

Q: If I act.

K: No, I'm not talking of action. I'll come to that a little later, sir. I said, let's bear in mind all the time, or in the background, put it there, that the question is, "What am I to do in this world"? And we are trying to find out what is the right action in this.

And we are saying there is a right action when there is no observer. Right? That is, the observer has separated himself from the bundle. But the observer is put there by education - we went through all that yesterday, I won't go into it again. So as long as there is this division between the bundle and observer, there must be conflict, and all that.

But when there is the realization, the actual fact that I am the bundle and there is no observer - you follow, sir? - then what takes place? That is, when there is direct relationship with the fact, actual contact with the fact - I am using different words - actual embracing the fact, the fact is me. I am in complete contact with that fact. There is no part of me which says I'm different. So the fact is entirely me. I don't know how to...

Q: Then there's no interference when the fact affects whatever takes place, it must spring from the fact, because there's nothing to interfere with that relationship that you are talking about.

K: We are not quite meeting each other, I'm afraid.

Q: It seems that instead of really trying to get at that, we're already trying to project what it will be like when we have it.

K: That's what I'm...

Q: Then we have something to move towards.

K: Yes.

Q: And that seems to be part of the difficulty.

K: I've not moved from this one thing, which is, I want to act in this world, and I see whatever I do either creates more mischief, more misery more confusion, so I say to myself, "What am I to do?" I don't think you feel this.

Q: It's a shock when one sees it.

K: What am I to do? Wait a minute, sir. So in examining that I have found out for myself, the world is me, I am the world, there in no other - that's a fact. I have embraced it, I have kissed it, I have hugged it, I am in contact with it, there is no difference between that and this.

And that violence and deterioration is part of me, so this bundle is me. That's a fact. So I am entirely in contact with it, wholly, there is no part of me that is not touching it entirely. I can't put it ten different ways.

Q: Got it now.

K: Right. Then what takes place? Wait - from there there is action. My mind has reached that point, you understand? - where it is entirely in contact with that fact, then what takes place? I can tell you what takes place but I don't want to.

Then from that there is an action which is complete, for me. Therefore don't accept what I am saying. Up to now we have logically, verbally, clearly explained this fact. Now I'm asking, after two days of discussion and verbal exchange, are we in contact with it completely, so that there is no hiatus, gap, saying, sorry, part of me which is not that.

Q: But, sir, if all that goes on day and night, goes on here, what else can it be but me?

K: Have you answered my question, Madam?

Q: Sir, could we say that we have a certain contact with that fact and it's incomplete, and then look at what we can do to bring about more complete contact with that.

K: I can't do anything more. Either you see it or you don't see it.

Q: Sir, can we discuss the state of mind? It seems the only question we can talk about now is the state of mind in which this perception can take place, otherwise there's no point, I mean, it just seems that we're not getting it. Or I can only speak, maybe I should only speak for myself. It seems that maybe there is a state of mind, a perception, which is not a struggle, which is not an effort, but personally it seems extraordinarily difficult to be in that state, in that position, in that place.

K: Sir, are you answering my question? I'm sorry to stick to that.

Q: Look, sir, I see that this violence, this world which is going on throughout the world is me.

K: Now, wait, just a minute. Is that an idea or a fact to you, your breath?

Q: It's a fact, sir, I can see it.

K: Wait, wait - I want to know. Not you can see it - it is so.

Q: Feel it.

Q: Yes, I feel it and I want to do something.

K: Wait, no, then if you want to do something, you've already separated the fact from the fact. You understand? I say action will come into being when there is the realization and complete contact with the fact. From that there is a different kind of action. This is logical, please, sir, - I'm using the word 'logical' in the sense that the river that flows, it's not clear-cut, put there by thought, logically step by step, it's like a river that's flowing, flowing, flowing. It has its own logic, its own beauty, its own movement.

Q: There is shock and despair at seeing this, when you say this is me and there is nothing, with what you've got that I can do.

K: Now wait a minute.

Q: I have tried all those things.

K: You're still acting, you're still concerned with the doing, I'm not. I started with the question - what to do? - but I say I must find out if there is an action which is absolutely without regret, without - you know, all the rest of it. I want to find out. So I say, is the world different, I come to all that, I say I am the world.

Now what am I to do? To answer that question, I say to myself, "Am I absolutely in touch with the fact, or I'm imagining it, or is it an idea, or is it some hope, because I want to act properly." You follow, sir? So I'm not concerned for the moment with action.

Q: Krishnaji, we are very concerned with the action, that's part of the difficulty, we already want to act rightly before going through all the...

K: No I don't know what right action is, I said that.

Q: Yes, but I think that we assume there is a right action.

K: I don't know.

Q: And move towards it.

K: You assume but I don't know.

Q: There is a big, continual cloud of thoughts which are making assumptions about what the situation is and what to do.

K: Yes. You're not meeting this.

Q: There's really only the seeing, isn't there?

K: You can see visually, optically, but it may be not whole, not complete.

Q: I think the point where we're at is that we're not in complete contact with this fact.

K: That's all. Then if you're not completely in contact with the fact, then what will you do to be completely with it?

Q: If you state as an idea one would say, I am aware of the bundle as I, if you state as a fact, one would say the bundle is aware of itself.

K: No, sir.

Q: I think the simple fact is that I'm not at all sure that I grasp this fact of the bundle. If you could put it differently.

K: I am all that, sir. Right? I won't even call it a bundle. I am greed, I am envy, anger, I suffer, all that is me. Right? And I won't enlarge it. All that's me.

Q: But it's also a fact that anyone that I have relationship with insists that there is a me too. And I have to relate to that fact. What is the response to that? Intelligence?

K: To what?

Q: Somebody relates to me. Let's just suppose for a moment that I haven't got a 'me'...

K: I don't...

Q: ...and somebody insists there is a 'me', there is a self, you know the physical entity with a relationship.

K: Sir, what do you mean something relates to me?

Q: Oh, the rest of the world. All the people which you're talking about, that are causing all the violence, including myself.

K: Sir, the world, with all the people in it, with all their mischief, with all their conceit, with all their vanity, with their etc. is part of me. I am not in contact with...

Q: We are talking about a microphone, it's no use your telling me that you're part of me.

K: What?

Q: I mean, I know you're a different human being.

K: I have got a brown skin.

Q: Yes, but...

K: ...taller...

Q: ...you are a different entity - you know, entity.

K: You see, I am only, sir, you are missing my point, or I'm not explaining. Psychologically all human beings are similar. Right? Do you accept that?

Q: No. (Laughter)

K: Human beings, whether they live - we've been through all this - whether they live in Russia, or this, suffer, they're uncertain, they're unhappy, they're insecure, they are violent, greedy, envious, competitive and so on. They are similar, psychologically, inwardly. Modified perhaps by their culture, by environment, by the climate, but the core of it is similar.

Q: Yes, but why is it similar? Why is it similar? That's the question.

K: Why? That's been gone into too, sir. Why is it similar? Because we human beings, who have lived for a million years, have not resolved this problem.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is that the reason?

Q: Well, I think the fact that there is the problem that hasn't been solved...

K: We are trying to solve it. We are first stating - we have to go back over and over again - we are stating that the psychological similarity of all human beings, therefore the world which they have created is me. Psychologically I'm not different from you.

Q: No, but there are all these questions like Aristotle's business of substance, you know, this deprivation of being, all this that has to be related to. I mean, you know, I feel empty, we were talking about the emptiness inside oneself and all this stuff.

K: That's part of me.

Q: Someone else is feeling my empty.

K: Sir, that's part of me. I'm also empty, as a human being. I also feel terribly lonely - I don't personally - I'm saying as a human being concerned with the question which has been the subject of all of our discussions over the last two days, is what am I to do?

Q: Could I try to put it in slightly different words?

K: Yes, sir, delighted.

Q: What you are saying is that what is required is an intense realization that it is a fact that each individual is an integral part of the whole human consciousness.

K: Right.

Q: The whole human condition.

K: Right, sir.

Q: And that the differences which appear significant to us, are...

K: ...superficial, trivial. Now have you understood that, sir?

Q: Krishnaji, I feel this is the point where we always jump and you are always ahead of us and we get lost, so can I ask a question...

K: Delighted.

Q: ...and say that I feel that we come to the point when we see the bundle of memory, of violence, greed and all the limitations, but it seems here that nothing really then is fully clarified. Is there a way of exploring that more totally than we do, and is it that there is something that we don't look at that is nearer even than the content of consciousness. Is there some part of consciousness that slips through our exploration, when we try to see this?

K: I wonder, Mrs. Cadogan, if you heard what Professor Wilkins said. He said we are integral part of all humanity, though we think we are separate, we are really essentially...

Q: No, I don't think we are separate...

Q: I don't think anybody here thinks that we are separate.

Q: Sorry, could I say, once you see that we are not separate, one sees that we are not separate, then one looks at this process of consciousness, to see - not to see - but just to understand.

K: I don't quite follow - sorry. What are you trying to tell me?

Q: Well, I feel we looked at this bundle so many times.

K: No, I will drop the word 'bundle'. Take another.

Q: You look at, you see the bundle, the bundle was the fear, the greed, the doubt, the fear, the pain. But that seems almost like the symptom rather than the deep fact, somehow. There seems to be a movement of consciousness which comes before that which somehow we don't quite get to grips with, which is still causing the separation. Can we go into that any more with you? Will you help us?

Q: Sir, it seems that everybody seems to be looking about but it is not answered by it.

K: No, I don't quite follow what Mrs. Cadogan is saying.

Q: Could it be...

K: Would you explain, sir? If you have understood.

Q: Well, I think what it may be is that there is a kind of in each person as they're born, in each child there is a search for meaning begins. In each child the search for meaning begins, in each person the search for meaning begins. What does it mean?

Q: No, it's not that.

Q: No?

K: I don't think she meant that.

Q: There is no self, there is only a state of being, and what seems to be happening just now is that nobody is paying any attention to the fact that this bundle has as much capacity for good as it has for the other. And it is the awareness of this factor which to my mind suggests that there is no necessary will or desire. When one becomes aware of the fact, then the condition of being a part of also creates within its own self the ability to be one thing or the other which we are all - but the turning over within ourselves towards right action or wilful action is something which is the bundle itself.

K: Sir, are you answering Mrs. Cadogan? Are you explaining what she meant because some of us have not understood what she meant.

Q: I do not know if I am explaining that.

K: That's all I asked, sir. You're saying something different from her.

Q: I'm still...

K: First we haven't understood what she has to say.

Q: I think what she was trying to say is that, we get always stuck at this one point but there is this bundle which is made up of suffering, pain, effort - is there a step which we are missing before that?

K: Is that it?

Q: Not quite. I feel that we're not in a content of consciousness rather than the structure of consciousness. There seems to be something more vital that's not understood by us. But it's more vital than the pain or the symptoms which...

K: All right, is there something more vital than all this.

Q: That slips through, it slips through, it moves without us seeing what happens.

K: Yes, I understand.

Q: We are not aware of it.

K: I think I understand what you're trying to say. Is there something more vital behind all these symptoms. Is that it?

Q: Yes.

K: Behind all the sorrows, misery, blah, blah, blah. Is there something much more active than this?

Q: Yes, that escapes our awareness.

K: Yes, that escapes - at last we've got it. Some of you answer it, sirs.

Q: I think Mrs. Cadogan is where I am. When you were a few minutes ago and I've been looking at this in these last few minutes - is it a fact that I feel that all this which is going on in the world is me, is it a fact or is it an idea? And to me Mrs. Cadogan is saying, now wait a moment, it is a fact, but really I feel she feels that it's an idea, and she wants something in between which is going to bridge the gap between idea and fact.

K: No, not quite that. Sorry to contradict you, which is not, as far as I understood what she meant was, apart from all the symptoms, greed, envy and so on, is there something much more vital, active that we are missing?

Q: In our own process.

K: Yes, in the process of examination and investigation, are we missing something which is much more, which is deep, which has great vitality, which will wipe away all this. More or less. Right? Have I got it?

Q: Yes, yes, I mean something is not clear, you see, and one feels it so immediate, so vital each time, and its - yes, you go on Krishnaji, you explore that area.

Q: Sir, doesn't this imply that there is a division in consciousness, in what Mary is saying?

K: No, no. Sir, may I put it differently. Is there a cause, root...

Q: Root, root.

K: ...which is producing all this. Just a minute, just a minute, just a minute. Let's understand the question properly. The branches are all this, anger, jealousy, blah and so on, the root is there, if one can touch the root, then the symptoms may disappear. Is that it?

Q: It's the roots.

K: Yes, that's what I'm trying to get at. Is there...

Q: Can I ask another question? Is this really a collective thing, I mean, are we talking about the structured form of the human being, human species, I mean something, you know, some sort of, like... kind of thing, is that the kind of thing in terms of consciousness, is that what you are talking about?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes, that's why, I've made the question clear for myself, I don't know if the others understand it. If instead of always talking about pruning the branches and cutting the flowers and leaves and so on, if we could go to the very root of it, the tree would wither away. Right?

Q: Are we suggesting that this root is not...

K: I am only trying to understand what Mrs. Cadogan was saying.

Q: I thought she was implying that there was something other than content that was part of this root.

K: No - the content, sir, no, the content are the leaves of the tree. Right? Put it like that - the branches, the flowers, the fruit and all that, but the root, if we can touch the root and understand that, the symptoms and all that will disappear. That's what, if I understand rightly, that's what she's trying to convey. Is that right?

Q: The root is what seems to elude out observation.

K: Yes, is that understood? Have you understood?

Q: Yes.

K: My god!

Q: Would it be helpful to state that then if I give up the desire to see this as a fact, and if I give up the fear of not seeing it as a fact, that would help?

K: No, there is no giving up. There is no sacrifice, there is no taking of vows, but only investigating and understanding. Right? As far I'm concerned.

So Mrs. Cadogan's question is, instead of always talking about the branches and the leaves and the fruit thereof, go to the root of it. Right?

Q: Can we go to the root of it?

K: Go to the root of it.

Q: Is there a root at all?

K: Of course, must be. Answer that question, sir. You're all ready to answer - go ahead.

Q: Sir...

K: Wait - piano!

Q: I think that, you see, as long as I say to you, you know, I'm this bundle, but I keep on believing that some part of me is not that, and I keep on doing that, which is a fact. You know, I'm stuck there.

K: Yes, sir, that's your whole illusion.

Q: And that's where I stay.

K: Yes, yes.

Q: Part of me is not the bundle, part of me is good.

K: Yes, I understand that's what I tried to explain when I said at the beginning of the talk, some of us, some parts of the world believes there is something which is not this.

Q: Perhaps if we could answer Mrs. Cadogan's question, we could...

K: I'm coming back, sir - he's pursuing his own idea, he hasn't moved away from it.

Q: Yes.

K: Sorry.

Q: Could I suggest that possibly, this is only a suggestion, that what underlies the various symptoms is some sense of grief, some sense of frustration that life is an uncomprehended reality.

K: You see, Mrs. Cadogan has asked that question. He says I'm really not interested in that question but the part of me that says I am different, there is something I'm not all that. And he's repeated this three days. And he'll go on repeating it, because to him that is an experience which he won't let go. And we said that to investigate one must be free of all experiences, prejudices, knowledge and so on - to investigate. Right? If I'm a Marxist I can't investigate. If I am attached to my experience I can't investigate.

So he's playing with us. Sorry. After three days you're sticking to it. We have explained very carefully, I'm not being rude, we explained very carefully, that's also part of our illusion. And you say, why do you consider that illusion, because it's still thought says, "There must be something." The whole movement of thought we have investigated.

So to come back to Mrs. Cadogan's question, which is, if we can cut the cause, everything is simple. The symptoms will disappear.

Q: I'm not saying that, I am questioning.

K: Wait - I'm saying that.

Q: Yes.

K: So is there a cause for all this?

Q: Are you suggesting in saying is there a cause for this, I mean, it seems to me rather like saying that the bundle...

K: Cut out the bundle, sir.

Q: No, hang on!... that I will look for a result beyond it. Aren't we also assuming that there is an individual - are we talking about an individual separate, or are we talking about something deeper, which I hope is what we're talking about.

K: The individual is only superficial movement. There is no 'me' but the world.

Q: There are distinct bodies, aren't they, I mean your body is different from mine.

K: Of course, sir, don't. I mean obviously, you're short, I'm tall, brown, black, but psychologically we are all similar.

Q: We are talking about consciousness.

K: We are an integral part of humanity, I am not an individual. I like to think I'm an individual. It gives me great sense of vanity, separateness. But actually, psychologically, I'm an integral part of this world which is so terrible. Right? To me that's not an idea, not a belief, a conclusion - it's so, in my blood it is so.

So Mrs. Cadogan's question is, is there a cause which in our investigation we are missing? If we could go into that, then perhaps the symptoms may disappear - may, I don't say it does, or it will.

Q: Sir, earlier on we said that human consciousness is all the little bits that thought has put together.

K: Sir, are you answering her question?

Q: That's what I'm doing.

K: What is that?

Q: I'm saying that the branches of this tree are all the things that thought has put together. And so lower down must be the mechanics of thought.

K: Sir, what do you think is the cause of all this? Cause, not idea, not a conclusion, the root of it.

Q: I think it's the thinking process that has created all this.

K: Would you accept that?

Q: I don't really feel that, that's what I'm trying to get to.

K: What he's saying is, the root cause of all this is the whole process of thinking. Thought is the root of it. Thought being born of knowledge, and knowledge implies ignorance. Ignorance. Knowledge and ignorance go together. There is no complete knowledge.

Q: I feel this is concerned with the same thing, which is the structure of our consciousness.

K: No, no, he's saying something else. It's not the structure. The structure is the result of thinking.

Q: Which also implies time.

K: All that. He's read what I've said, a dozen times! (Laughter)

Q: I feel that we're moving away from what I was looking at.

K: No.

Q: Can I try to clarify Mary's question, I'm not quite clear - are you talking about the roots of violence, or the roots of our being?

Q: I was trying to talk about the part that slips through our awareness, almost a movement that comes. We can see our greed, our nationalism, that's easy. And we're not necessarily trapped obviously in that, but there is still something which moves too fast or too something for our awareness. So that we are still restricted in this way.

Q: That isn't necessarily the root of violence, is it?

Q: Well it may do.

Q: Yes, but I mean you are saying there is something that is escaping us, that is so immediate.

Q: Yes.

Q: But that isn't necessarily a thing of violence, the root of violence.

Q: But I wondered if Krishnaji could somehow...

K: Let's do it slowly. Are you saying, we've always talked about the symptoms, the branches, and never the root?

Q: I don't say never but at this moment...

K: Wait - never - doesn't matter. In our investigation we have always looked at the tree, at the branches, at the fruits and so on, but we have never gone down deeply, to see what is the origin of all this.

Q: Or the thing that moves so fast.

K: Yes.

Q: May I ask if the root in the question could be considered the root of thinking - is thinking a branch of this root or is it some other factor that somehow weaves its way through thought?

Q: Thinking could be a part or a branch of the tree.

K: What is that?

Q: It could be.

Q: We're looking for something deeper then, as a cause of all this human trouble, deeper than thinking, is that it?

Q: Almost more immediate than thinking.

Q: Now here we're back to the thinking.

K: What did you say?

Q: Well, I was trying to find out if in this analogy if thinking is a branch of something deeper, which we're looking for, or is thinking actually down there in the roots.

K: The cause. Yes.

Q: Is there some primal cause before thinking?

K: Yes. Right?

Q: I get the feeling that the way the discussion's going that we always get trapped in the new words, we use some words which seem to be helpful up to a point, a metaphor, I mean we had the metaphor of contacting the thing itself, and we could get into that in a way. And then we seem to come up against a block and we feel that there must be something else beyond that, we are not getting through to the thing itself. And so we come up with a new image, with a new word which seems helpful.

Q: But this is not an image to me.

Q: No, I know.

Q: To me this is something which has been there a long time in my life. It has not been...

K: But Mrs. Cadogan, what is right action? Confronted with this world, what am I to do - that's how we started.

Q: And my right action...

K: What is correct action? Which will be correct always. Not depend on circumstances and so on. And that is the question which we propose. Will the answer what to do cover this question, your question?

Q: You said, what is right action, what is right action - for me the only right action seems to be to explore this unresolved part of my consciousness, obviously there is still something which I have not understood, which is the key to going into all the things we are going into.

K: Yes, now, unexplored part of your consciousness. Right?

Q: All right, yes. Not mine, I don't think it's mine particularly, I question consciousness: -

K: Is there any part of your consciousness that cannot be explored? How do you explore the deep, hidden consciousness? You follow? I'm pursuing the deep, hidden consciousness may be the root. You understand? How am I with my conscious mind to explore that which is hidden? You're answering my question? I can't.

Q: I agree.

K: No, sir, don't agree or disagree.

Q: Well, that's how I see it.

K: No, no. It's not a question of agreement or disagreement. There are hidden parts of me and my conscious mind says I must investigate that, which may be the root of it. Right? The root of all these symptoms. Right?

Now how am I, how is the conscious mind, the mind that thinks, the mind that has knowledge, the mind that is caught in various illusions, going to investigate something which is totally hidden?

The analysts have said analyse. Right? We won't go into that. Or it will reveal through dreams, through sleep. Or it will reveal itself through meditation. I'm proposing various systems which man has put together to find the deep hidden cause. Right? Now, we deny analysis, obviously. The other is dreams. There too there must be an interpreter or the interpreter goes on while you're dreaming - it does happen, I know this - you have a dream and the interpretation is going on at the same time. And you wake up, it may not be true. Right?

So we're thrown back to one thing, meditation. Now that covers a large field, which means - wait - I'll explain briefly, which means conscious mind being absolutely quiet. Then in that quietude things may be revealed. Right? Thing being the root. Go on. You're all... right? So how shall we do this. Will you meditate - I mean this seriously - to see that your conscious mind, the thinking mind, stops completely. Then there is a possibility of the deep, hidden activity surfacing itself. Right? Possibility, I don't say there is.

Now instead of going through all these methods, systems and so on, is it possible - just a minute - to see the whole thing instantly? You follow? The cause, the symptoms, the activities of the symptoms, the totality of the thing, seeing it immediately.

Q: The whole.

K: The whole works. I say it is possible only when all the symptoms have disappeared.

Q: You're saying that?

K: I'm saying that. When all the symptoms have subsided.

Q: Sir, for me that's...

K: Nonsense?

Q: Too fast.

K: I know, I'm answering her question quickly.

Q: Because the way I hear that, we are saying that if we see the entire root...

K: No, not the entire root - the whole thing.

Q: The whole thing, the root and all the branches and all of it...

K: Is that possible, first.

Q: But Mary was saying that it is not possible because that root exists.

K: No.

Q: That's what blocks the perception of the whole thing.

K: That's what she means, too - she means that. Says, it is possible. Unless you want to go into that, that it is possible to see the totality of this whole movement.

Q: The whole consciousness.

K: The whole of it.

Q: The whole, the structure, the content...

K: Whole of it. I mean the whole.

Q: On the instant.

K: I mean the whole, the root, the branches, the whole of it, to see it. It's not a miracle, it's not - that leads us off somewhere else, for the time being.

I am left at the end of this discussion, after three days, I don't know what to do. Right? But let's be clear, when I, when there is the realization that I'm the integral part of the whole of humanity - you understand, sir, what it does? You don't. When I am the integral part of all humanity, what has taken place when there is the realization of this fact, enormous fact, you understand, it's not just words. What takes place?

Q: Could it be said that action then loses its aspects of activity, doing, and becomes the aspect of actuality?

K: Sir, I am concerned with what takes place, you follow? - before action, before anything. When I so completely realize, the mind realizes that it is part of all humanity.

Q: There is no more self-centredness.

K: No, no. What takes place?

Q: It must be compassion.

K: Look, why haven't you come to that point, that's what I'm asking. We have logically like a river, explained why haven't you come to that point, say yes, I know what it means, there is...

Q: Because the sense of separation is still operating in us.

K: So all these three mornings are wasted.

Q: Not unless I see this.

K: Because we're still living at the verbal level.

Q: Yes.

K: So I say, are you observing all this as an idea or conclude from the observation a series of ideas, or are you really in contact with reality, with that truth that you are the integral part of this whole, vast, decaying humanity?

I say if you realize that, there comes quite a different state, from that there is action.

Sir, what is love? Just a word? Doesn't this happen when you're really in contact with that fact that you are integral, that you are humanity? Gosh, something happens to you, doesn't it?

We'd better stop - lunch. Sir, I meant to ask - do we meet tomorrow or do you want a rest?

Q: No, let's meet tomorrow.

Q: Krishnaji may want a rest.

K: No, just a minute, don't - you're not giving me a rest, don't think about that. You've had three days of verbal exchange. Right?

Your minds have been drilled, pushing back and forth.

Q: You need one, sir.

K: Do you want a rest tomorrow?

Q: You need that, sir.

Q: Can we give you a rest with all of us.

K: Don't bother about me. You decide.

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH SEMINAR MEETING 16TH SEPTEMBER 1979

KRISHNAMURTI: I wonder where we are. We've had three talks. We are still concerned, aren't we, with what is one to do in a world that has become so appallingly disorderly, violent and so on. What is one to do? That is the central issue.

So we're not just indulging in lots of words or theories or holding on to one's own experiences and points of view, but those of us who are here, and I hope we are serious and not playing around with all this, that our principle question is, what is one to do?

And I think we ought also to consider what is the individual action which we think is separate from the integral part of the whole. Right? Have I made my question clear? We may think we are separate individuals and act from that self-centred intention, or from that self-centred movement, because we think we are individuals. And I wonder if we are individuals, though we have accepted that for millenia, that we are separate individuals, with its own consciousness, with its own sorrow, different from all humanity. Right?

And we have found for ourselves through all these talks that we are the whole, we are the part of the world. And our actions are like the rest of the world. Right? What we do the world is doing. So psychologically, as well as in action, we are the rest of the world - we are the world. And when we have reached that point, is there any individuality at all. You understand? We have accepted that we are individuals, separate, something unique which in its whole life has to fulfil in various forms.

And when we discover the truth that we are integral part of this enormous humanity, what place has any individual, individuality. Or there is no individuality at all. It's up to you to discuss.

QUESTIONER: The world is us and we are the world. That is no longer an idea, it is a fact. The world being us and the world is us, the action from seeing that, the full realization of that as a fact, is a different action.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: Now I don't know what that action is.

K: We're going - we're coming to it.

Q: It means no further contributing to the disorder and the violence that is going on in society. Now whether the individual comes in there or not, I don't know.

K: Sir, first, that's why I want to go into the question of individuality, if there is such a thing at all. I know it's rather, maybe you may not like to go into the question, because you may think individuality is very important, or one who is bound to that tradition, and so it's very difficult to break through that wall of individuality. But I, we are questioning whether the individual exists at all. If and when we see the truth or the fact that we are the whole of humanity - go into it, sirs.

If, no, when we see the fact that I am part of the world, I am the rest of mankind, what is the quality of my mind that has seen this fact, seen in the sense, be absolutely in contact with it, wholly, realize completely, that is integral part of that vast mankind? What happens to the mind? Could we discuss this? Or is it too...

Q: The family is one, there is love. It is your family.

K: No, no. What is the quality of your mind, sir, before we say it is the family or it is this - what has taken place in your mind, mind in the sense your emotions, your sensitivity, your quality of your senses, feelings, affection, the capacity to think clearly, all that. What has happened to that - you understand my question?

Q: Yes.

K: What has taken place in the mind that has seen that it is part of the whole, it is not separate.

Q: It has become fairly quiet then, sir.

K: No, no. Find out, let's talk about it a little bit.

Q: Sir, if the mind realizes that it is part of the whole of humanity, that it is humanity, human beings..

K: Does the mind realize it, or does thought realize it? You understand?

Q: If it is watching...

K: Wait, sir. You understand my question? Is it thought that realizes "I'm the whole, part of the whole" or the whole consciousness, which is the mind, the whole of your consciousness realizes, sees, in contact, it completely comes to the truth that it is the rest of the world. I'm asking, what is the quality of the mind?

Q: What was outside before has now become intimate. One feels from the inside, rather than just as an objective series of events one has some sort of loose connection with.

K: Are you answering my question, sir? What is the quality of your mind, your consciousness when you realize, or when there is the realization that you are part, integral part of the whole, whole of humanity? What has taken place when there is perception of that?

Q: Sir, we might not be able to answer that question, because that action, that perception is something that is unfamiliar to us.

K: That means we have to go back and go over all the...

Q: Not necessarily go over all of it, but that last activity that, because we seem to be able to go most of the way, but that last action, that last activity that sees everything, that sees the whole is something that is new to us, is something that...

K: I'm not saying that sees the whole. That has realized that it is not separate from the rest of mankind.

Q: Could I ask a question?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: Because I feel there is a difference between someone who has never experienced, who has never actually been through that and say someone who has listened to what you've said, and has already had an experience of that, of not being separate from the world and therefore has found himself...

K: Sir, may I add a word there, the word 'experience' is rather difficult.

Q: Well, I don't want to get into the semantic thing, I have got to use language.

K: So, what is the question, sir?

Q: What I'm saying, what I'm interested in is the fact that you were mentioning about two things. I have a problem here. We never seem to be able to get to it because no one will get beyond the idea that it seems that there's a kind of, "What is it like to be the world."?

K: No, sir.

Q: Or that you are the world, you are not separate from it or something of the sort.

K: Not something - we made it all very clear, up to now, that...

Q: It's not clear, that's the problem.

K: Oh glory!

Q: Sir, yesterday you were talking about, we were talking about how just before one could see the root of the separateness of the problem, there had to be some sort of subsiding of the problem or the bundle.

K: Sir, he's asking a question, that gentleman. He says, what you have been saying is not clear to me. So we have to clear it up with him. Right? What is not clear, sir?

Q: You seem to be asking what am I doing at this moment, what is my response at this moment, and yet I feel as though, I mean, if you have toothache - if I may use that metaphor - if you had toothache yesterday and you haven't been to the dentist, you've still got toothache today. And I feel as though I've got toothache, if you like...

K: You must have a bad dentist!

Q: But what am I doing about it now. I'm saying that I can't discuss that because you're talking about the first principles.

K: No, sir - look, what we have said so far is fairly simple and clear. We think we are separate, right?

Q: But I don't. I mean, for me there are problems of privacy, what happens if you are conditioned into having a private space, say mentally, I mean, how is one not to respond neurotically - included in what you are saying, if one is not an individual, is that one has no privacy, for instance, now.

K: I don't catch your meaning, sir. Sorry.

Q: He's saying, I think, that there's a physical correspondence to seeing that your consciousness is the same as the consciousness of mankind, that somehow hasn't had the physical correspondence in that you don't have a private space, or you don't have a private life. He seems to have made a logical jump there.

K: Is that it?

Q: Well, that's not only it, I mean, then - I think that the number of people who've actually done what you're saying is very few. I'm not saying that...

K: Don't bother about the few or the many, sir, but what is the quality of your mind, your mind, after examining all this? That is, psychologically we are the rest of mankind. Right? That's obvious, isn't it? What you suffer, people suffer similarly in India, in America, in Russia. What you go through, your sorrows, your pleasures, your anxieties, the rest of the world goes through that. You may be physically different, you may be taller, whiter, blacker, purple, whatever, brown, and so that is superficial. Basically, psychologically, we are the rest of mankind. Have you accepted that?

Q: Yes, I accept that.

K: Wait. Now is that an idea or an actual living fact? Stick to that one thing, sir. Is it an actual living fact or just a concept which you have gathered from the rest of us?

Q: How is one to tell the difference?

K: Oh yes, that's fairly simple - either it is an idea which you have accepted, or it is a living thing. Like breathing, like your whole being says it is so.

Q: But I don't know if at the same time it is a living thing.

K: What?

Q: I mean I don't know the relationship with what's in the mind.

K: I explained what the mind - all right, don't use the mind. Is there seeing that fact with all your being?

Q: I can be consecrated to the idea, over the fact, my action would be an act of consecration, a passion, if you like.

K: I don't quite follow that.

Q: Someone can be devoted, he can be devoted say to say the Nazis, or some of them were devoted to Nazism.

K: No, this is not, you're still devoted to something.

Q: Quite, that's what he's saying.

K: No, but...

Q: And it has an immense effect on one's life, it's still an illusion, but that illusion is also a reality.

K: Illusion is also a reality. Oh yes, we've been through that. I can accept an illusion and see, think that it is a reality.

Q: But he's saying he doesn't know how to tell the difference between the two.

K: What? Between what? The illusion and...

Q: The fact.

K: The fact?

Q: Yes.

K: Is that it, sir?

Q: Yes.

K: Between illusion and fact. All right. Help me out, please - it isn't a battle between him...

Q: It's not like that for me. I have to say, the realization of the world is me and I am the world, to me it was an idea, it's a fact, and

I know that there will be a different action - what that action will be I don't know.

K: No, just a minute, sir. He says, how do you distinguish, how do you know what is an illusion and what is a fact?

Q: I'll tell you...

K: Tell him, sir.

Q: Yes, I'll tell him. Things are not going to be the same again. My own urgency about my self-centred activity, about my business, and all the personal problems have fallen away, because the world is me and I am the world.

K: You're not answering him.

Q: There is a different approach.

Q: Yes, but how do you know that the different approach is the right approach, or the correct one, or an intelligent one, or a sensible one, or one that is not violent, one that doesn't further violence or lead to more violence?

Q: Because I am no longer going to contribute to those problems, the violence of the world.

Q: But you are those problems.

Q: Exactly, I see that I am that. And it was an idea that the world is me and I am the world. It is no longer an idea. And if it is no longer an idea with me, then I will not be acting from what I was acting from, which was self-centred activity. Now there'll be an action from something else.

K: He's asking, sir, if I understand him, how do you separate illusion and fact.

Q: Sir, could we talk about the nature of that total perception.

K: No, we haven't answered that question.

Q: That would answer it, because if we saw the nature of that and we saw the nature of illusion we would see the difference.

Q: The difference between feeling and being.

K: Then, feeling and being both may be illusion. How do you separate the two?

Q: Is illusion created by thought only?

K: Yes, illusion is created by thought, by desire and so on.

Q: If there were somehow a way to test it out, then you could tell, because a fact, I mean, if that microphone is actually there I can touch it, but if it's only an idea...

K: You can't touch it.

Q: Right.

K: But can you touch, as you can touch the microphone, the fact - that's what he wants to know, as far as I understood.

Q: But you can test it, if one thought one saw that one was the world, then you saw that...

K: No, forget the world, forget me and... He's asking a question, how do you distinguish, discriminate or find out which is illusion and which is fact? Fact is something that is actually happening. Right? Right? Right, sir? Yes? You are doubtful about it. And illusion, what I conceive or have an opinion of what is happening. I am suffering. That's a fact. And being a Christian I say, Jesus is the embodiment of suffering, I'll give it to Him, he'll save me. That is an illusion, the actual fact is I am suffering. Right? So we don't have to go back to that.

We can distinguish, or separate the two, what is actually doing, happening. I am unhappy, I am greedy, I am anxious, I am frightened - that is the actual fact. Right? And I can say that somebody will save me from this is an illusion. Right? Wait - just let's get this clear. Is this clear, sir?

Q: Yes.

K: Now wait a minute, from there we move. Which is, the world outside is put together by me, by my parents, by generations past. Right? That's a fact.

Q: It's easy to see that one has suffering, pain, these things oneself. It's not so easy.

K: Your neighbour is not suffering? That your wife doesn't go through hell?

Q: I haven't got a wife.

K: Sir, I have no wife but I can see. Good God, you don't have to...

Q: But it does look to me as though some people are happy.

Q: Is it a question of degree, is part of our difficulty the fact that some of us feel as though we have lost some of our religions, that we might have seen through religious dogma, we might have seen that physical violence is rather useless, not a good way of going about it. I feel it is a question of degree. And that the illusion is that possibly we might have lost something that they've still got.

K: To a Catholic who believes very strongly in all that business, to him it's a fact. But when you examine it closely it is illusion. So is this clear, sir? Now wait a minute. The world, which is violent, which is all that, I am also like that. Right? So I am the world, that's a fact.

Q: No, it's not - you've jumped.

K: No - all right - wait. The world...

Q: You have. There is disorder outside, there is disorder inside, but it doesn't mean that the disorder inside is anything to do with the disorder outside.

K: Sir, your neighbour is like you, psychologically. He may have a different business, different job, he may be a carpenter, he may be a professor, he may be a doctor. But psychologically, inwardly, he's like you. He suffers, you suffer. He's anxious, you are also. We've been through all this. So you are your neighbour.

Q: Sir, it's one thing to say that you are like your neighbour, because he suffers and you suffer. But isn't the difficulty that you were saying, you are your neighbour, because obviously one is not - we share certain things, we share one head and two arms and so forth, and we share things psychologically, but to say that you are that I think may be...

K: Psychologically I am my neighbour. There is no...

Q: I am like my neighbour, I share all kinds of things with my neighbour.

K: All right, I share, I share the same thing. You see, use different words but the fact is that.

Q: I think that one may feel that, it's true I share some things with my neighbour, but there may be some other things I don't share that may seem more important. For example, if one believes in individuality, one would feel, it's true I suffer but my individuality, which is more important, is not shared with my neighbour.

K: Of course, that's just it. You see, I don't...

Q: Sir, have you an objective in being here this morning?

K: Have I an objective?

Q: Being here this morning - that's what he said. A motive.

K: A motive? Have you a motive being here?

Q: I think so, yes.

K: Then why do you ask me?

Q: Because you have not...

K: I don't know, how do you know?

Q: It seems to me from your reactions that...

K: Sir, why do you bring that up, when that poor gentleman says I don't know what you're talking about.

Q: Because the turmoil in this room is affecting me, and I think to some extent you're perpetuating it.

K: What?

Q: He said, the turmoil in this room is affecting him and you are in some way perpetuating that turmoil.

K: I'm answering his question, I'm not perpetuating the turmoil.

Q: If you're not, sir, how can you ask a question?

K: He asked a question, sir. What are we all talking about?

Q: But I mean, you are stirring up turmoil, because you're trying to bring to our attention the nature of the turmoil. It seems to me a perfectly legitimate, desirable thing.

K: Yes, sir. That doesn't mean I'm in turmoil.

Q: If we examine it carefully, isn't that the difficulty, I mean, to accept something is one thing, that microphone is a microphone, it might be made out of chocolate, but in order to examine it carefully I have to see that that microphone couldn't possibly be made out of chocolate. We are very serious here.

K: Sir, would you kindly explain to that gentleman the fact and the illusion, if you have understood it. And the world is me and I am the world, that's the simple fact.

Q: But in order to see it as a fact...

K: He asks, explain to him, not to me.

Q: But I'm just saying, in order to see it as a fact, I have to go into it very carefully.

K: We have been - three mornings we've been into it, very, very carefully.

Q: Yes, but each individual has to go into it very carefully.

K: I thought we were doing it, each one of us, as we went along, step by step.

Q: But it seems that isn't the case.

K: Then what am I to do? Go all over again - I don't mind. Is that what you want, sir?

Q: Couldn't one look from another view? If one has the idea, the illusion that you are seeing, for instance, a stream, water flowing, and you really think this is water flowing and you can't tell if this is water flowing or not. But if you go out and put your fingers down into the stream you will know, this is water. Then you can tell the difference, but not while you are sitting there.

Q: It's only a fact if you test it in your life.

Q: As I feel it, the mind may fall into an illusion despite facts which should be nothing factual, to be something simply of the mind. So an illusion can always be challenged by facts, but a fact can never be challenged by an illusion and be seen to be anything but of the mind. The fact exists, the illusions are something which the mind grasps, holds onto, in many cases as a denial of the facts, as a retreat from facts. This is how it is for me. I don't know if this helps the discussion.

Q: Returning to his point about distinguishing between an illusion and a fact, all illusion is created by thought, then it is clear that the only way to distinguish between illusion and fact is to go beyond thought to some other form of apprehension which does not involve thought.

K: Is that clear, so far? He's saying, Professor Wilkins is saying that any form, any movement of thought, anything that thought has created as an idea, as a concept, a conclusion, must be illusion. Only that which is happening without the interference of thought and the observation of it, is fact.

Q: You don't mean that thought always creates illusion.

K: No, of course I don't, of course.

Q: But all illusion is created by thought.

K: I mean, I took an example that I suffer as a Christian and I as a great believer always accept Jesus or Christ as the Saviour, I leave all my suffering to Him. Somehow He will help me, save me from suffering. That is an illusion. The fact is I'm suffering, that's all I'm saying.

Now have we come to the point that we have found an answer to what is one to do in a world that is insane. Have we found the answer, what is one to do? This is the fourth morning. Right? We've got two more mornings, and I'm asking myself if we have understood the question, we have investigated the whole three mornings and this is the fourth morning, and we are asking, have we found an answer to the question, "What am I to do, what is the right action in this world?"

What am I to do? To find an answer to that, is individual action right action? Right, sir? Just a minute, I want to explore that. We have so far acted as individuals, and whatever we do or modify, somehow we say that is right action, not all the things we do, but as an individual we are trying to find what is right action. And the speaker says you can never do that, because the individual is a fragment of the whole. And when a fragment acts independently, whatever his actions be, they'll be fragmented, incomplete. That's all we've said.

Q: Man cannot do this.

K: Wait - as an individual, whatever action I do must be either destructive, pleasurable, violent and so on. It is a fragment that's acting.

Q: Yes.

K: And therefore it must create division, conflict and so on. So I say to myself, that is not right action, as self-centred human being, that's not right action. Therefore I say to myself, what is right action? Let me follow this, sir, a little bit. What is right action? I don't know. But I know this is wrong, wrong, right, please understand, quickly. So I say, am I different from the rest of the world? Psychologically, not peripheral differences, not colour differences and so on, but basically, at the root, am I different from the rest of mankind? I find I'm not, psychologically.

So then what place has individuality? You follow? If I have discarded individuality as being not capable of bringing about right action, then when I realize that psychologically I am the rest of mankind, then my individuality has disappeared. That's what I want to find out.

Q: Sir, isn't it that an illusion?

K: Wait, let me...

Q: Isn't that the illusion of individuality?

K: Yes, sir, I said that, we've said that's gone.

Q: So it's possible, I mean isn't it possible...

K: Is that so with you?

Q: Yes.

K: Or am I just talking to myself?

Q: I think you are talking to yourself.

K: Am I talking to myself - he says I am. Sir, the individual action - right? - which the world is doing, acting, each one acting for himself. Right? His own security, his own pleasure, pursuing his own experiences, his own little family, you follow? - all that, every human being is doing that. That's a fact. And that has produced chaos in the world.

Q: Exactly.

K: Right? Division, and where there is division there must be conflict. Right?

Q: The logic...

K: Follow it, sir, follow it. So any action as an individual I do is not productive, is not productive of peace, of real security for mankind. Right? So I discard, not as an idea but as a fact, I am not an individual.

Q: This is where the difficulty is, it doesn't follow logically from the fact that working as an individual has a destructive result, it does not follow that I have power to discard my individuality. This is where the question is.

K: I have not the power of discarding?

Q: Individuality, if I believe I am one.

K: No, because I perceive the truth that I am part of the whole, integral part of the whole, I see that as a fact, not as an idea.

Q: That's the step, you see to see as a fact that I am not an individual.

K: What?

Q: To see it as a fact that I am really not an individual.

Q: I can see how you can identify but I can't see how you can see it as a fact.

Q: It's a delusion to see that you are an individual, that's what you are saying.

K: Yes, that's what I'm saying.

Q: And if you see that it is a fact.

Q: I'm saying it's an illusion to identify with my mind, that I am the world, because that leads to all sorts of tortuous things and sends me to mental hospital and God knows what, as a result of making a mistake. The thing is, I don't want to make a mistake.

K: Sir, look at it the other way. You are an individual, aren't you. You think you're an individual and you are acting as an individual. Right? Each human being is acting separately. Right?

Q: Well in my present situation I find that I can't act as an individual because there's so much violence in the world, it's not possible to function hardly.

K: But the world - you're doing it, sir.

Q: Not effectively.

K: This is incredible!

Q: But you have the sense of your own individuality.

Q: Well, sometimes.

Q: Sir, isn't there some confusion which maybe we could sort out, that, I think we can all see what you're talking about, of the illusion, and being individual. I think we've followed that.

K: The word 'individual' means indivisible, obviously. But we are divided, we are broken up, we are contradictory, in ourselves. We are not individuals in the ordinary dictionary meaning. We think we are individuals. And I am saying that the very thinking that you are individual, acting separately etc., etc. is an illusion.

Q: Exactly.

K: I know this is very difficult to realize, because we are so stuck in this individuality.

Q: Isn't one of the blocks the every day sort of common sense that, the feeling that we have separate bodies, that, I mean, what you're saying is, surely you're not saying that if this illusion goes, and we no longer...

K: I don't, sir, that is an illusion, therefore it has no reality, no - so I discard it personally, I said, nonsense.

Q: But there is still a response from one human being...

K: Wait, sir, wait. I don't - you're all so - you won't step afar ahead. First - sorry.

Q: The other day Professor Wilkins said that we don't want to disappear.

K: That's right.

Q: I think that's the point.

K: We like the idea of individuality which is an illusion, but I'll hold onto it. It is part of my blood, I've accepted for generations, the world around me says, "You're an individual, you must be ambitious, you must fulfil."

Q: That's right.

K: You are separate.

Q: Because it's like dying, it's so important.

K: Yes, sir, that's why...

Q: Even if I die...

K: I am saying that. It has become part of our whole structure of thinking, part of our nature to say, "I am an individual." And somebody comes along and says, "Look at it, you are an illusion." I say, "Nonsense." So he says, "Just, before you call it nonsense, examine it, look at it." But I'm unwilling to look. Therefore there is no communication.

Q: I'm trying to look.

K: Wait, therefore you are willing, you as a human, as another person, willing to listen to. You're willing to listen. Therefore we're beginning to establish a communication between you and me. And the speaker, I say to you, since individual action throughout the world has produced such chaos in the world - right? that's obvious, is there an action which is not individualistic? That's all.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Is there an action which is not born out of the idea of the individual?

Q: Well obviously there is.

K: Obviously no.

Q: There is, there's no question. Are you suggesting that there is some kind of intelligence which means that one is in touch with...

K: We're going to find out.

Q: ...with other people, and therefore not selfish, or self-centred.

K: I can only find out if I am not living in an illusion. If I am living an illusion, any amount of your telling me there is something greater or wider, I reject, because my illusion is stronger than the fact.

So have I, have you, gone into this sufficiently and say, "Yes, I see for myself very clearly that the individual is an illusion." My God, to accept that, sir, when all the world round you is saying you're an individual, that means you're going against the current of the world, and nobody wants to listen, stand against the current - right?

So if you want to find out what is right action, I say the individual illusion must come to an end. That's the first thing, because you are the world.

Q: I think it's not merely the pressure of outside circumstances but also there seems to be the direct feeling of the reality that you are an individual. It seems that is your experience of individuality...

K: Yes, sir.

Q: It's no good if other people tell you about it.

K: Yes.

Q: And how will you see that this experience is an illusion?

K: How do you convince me or show me that I am not an individual? How will you show me, how will you help me, when all my education, all my conditioning is I am an individual. And I won't let that go.

Q: I can see that this feeling of being an individual is coming from a thought. Then it will begin to loosen. Right?

K: Yes, sir, I agree.

Q: If I don't see it coming from a thought, I don't know.

K: I agree logically to everything that you're saying. But inwardly this thing is so strong that I won't let go.

Q: But I'm also convinced that it's real, you see - that's one reason that I don't want to let go.

K: For the majority of people here, that's our position. I've lived 40, 50, 80 or 20 years as an individual, my pleasure, my fears, my possession, my etc., it is so embedded in me that I refuse to listen to you. Or I listen to you and say, "Please, I don't understand what you're talking about."

Q: I suppose one might say that something which is real is essentially non-contradictory and makes sense, and if one can draw people's attention to the fact that regarding oneself as an individual is filled with contradictions...

K: Yes, sir, we've said that. Umpteen times. But nobody wants to listen to it, because the individual is so tremendously important. You see, the painters, Picasso is an individual, you see you know, all the rest of it - I don't have to explain.

So my question then is, if one has gone so far, "What am I to do?" Is there an action which is not born out of the idea or the illusion that I am an individual? That is really the question. If we want to face it.

Q: From what you've said about people in this room, working together and turning these questions over, of communal enquiry...

K: Yes.

Q: ...then presumably this goes beyond the action of the individual.

K: Yes, sir. You see, we're not all together in this, are we? We're not thinking together are we, about this?

Q: As you've pointed out, no action, real action that will operate directly is possible while we retain the sense of separateness. It's self-defeating in this way, so there is, so far as we are concerned, there's a question, is there an action that can take place, implicit in this, is there the possibility of an action that can take place, when a sense of separateness is not operating, here? Now, this process of enquiry has been into the nature of what we regard as separateness.

K: Sir, we've come to the crossroads. Either you accept individuality and go on.

Q: That's it.

K: Or you say, "Let us look in another direction."

Q: Yes.

K: And to look in another direction you must kind of put that aside for the time being.

Q: I see that, yes.

K: All right. Are we at that point together?

Q: We have got to be serious enough.

K: Together, together, I may be or you may be or some, but together - are we at that point?

Q: Sir, can I ask you, is there any factuality at all to the individual differences - obviously there are different bodies and so on. There might be some confusion there about those obvious differences.

K: Sir, you see, you go back something, sir, forgive me. I said we've come to a cross-road, either you see that individuality brings about conflict, all that, and therefore you say, "Look, I turn my back on it and let's look in another direction." That's all I'm asking. Are we looking in another direction? If we are, then I'm saying, we have to go into the whole question of our consciousness. You follow? Our mind, which is, the world is me and all that. So is my consciousness, has my consciousness lost its sense of separateness? Because separateness brings conflict, inevitably. Britain, France, Germany you follow, sir? The Arab, the Jew and all that, the Hindus, is invariably bringing conflict.

Q: Every Peace Conference is separate - my country against your country, and they will not look in another direction.

K: I know, the politicians won't, general public won't, but we are here to find out if we can look in another direction.

So when we look in another direction it means, have I really realized that I am the world? That comes to the point. am I really in contact with that absolute fact? If I am, then what is the quality of my mind, from which action invariably comes? I don't know if I am making it clear.

Q: Yes.

K: If I am not clear, if there is not clarity in my mind, all my action will be unclear. Right?

So I'm asking myself and therefore asking you, if I may, what is the quality of your mind when you see that individuality brings conflict, all that? Therefore it's no longer holding onto that. And realizes it's a part, or integral part of the whole of mankind. So from that realization of that fact, what is taking place in the mind. You understand? That is my question.

Q: Krishnaji, the question is, what happens when I'm really in contact with the fact that I am the world and the world is I. And your question is, what happens when it is fact, and if it is a fact, then surely something will happen that is also...

K: We're going to find out, sir, we're going to find out. You see, you're all so quick. We want to find out what happens and that's why I'm asking after talking for four days, what has happened to your mind?

Q: Krishnaji, it seems that fear seems to dissolve.

K: If there is no fear - wait - then what is the nature of your mind?

Q: Peace.

K: No, go into it a little more slowly, Madam.

Q: Less problems, certainly, because no separation.

K: Surely there's something else going on. You're not - examine it a little more closely. That is, individuality has lost its meaning to me, personally. And I realize that I am part of this whole of mankind, I realize it, it means something tremendous, not just words, something enormous has taken place.

And have I lost the memory - please listen to it - the memory of individuality? I don't know if...

Q: Yes.

K: No, please, sir, this is very, very serious, don't let's play around with this. Have I lost the memory of my individuality with its experiences, with its sorrows, with etc. etc?

Q: What do you mean by losing the memory of it?

K: Oh, Maria!

Q: It's past, it's gone.

K: Memory, my remembrance of my sorrow.

Q: You mean that it's no longer active.

K: No, no remembrance.

Q: Finished.

Q: How can you have no remembrance?

K: I'm going to show you. Go slowly, Maria. First find out what I am saying first, before you say. That is, I have collected during my 80 years of life, 84 years of my life, as an individual, lots of memories. Right? Lots of experiences. The memory of sorrow, the memory of happiness, as an individual. It is there, in my consciousness.

Now when there is the realization of the truth - I'm using the word 'truth' in its right sense - absolute truth, that individuality is an illusion, with that realization, is there a loss of all the memories which I have collected during the 80 years?

Q: Sir is...

K: Just go slowly, sir. I may be crazy in saying this.

Q: Is it that there is a new mind that does not have that memory?

K: Scott, have you listened to what I've said?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Which is, have you, who have understood or seen the truth that you are an individual and therefore no longer - are you still carrying the memories, the structure, the nature of your remembrance, your past, all that, in your mind? Yes, sir, this is a real question, don't...

Q: I may be but it doesn't touch me any more.

K: No, no. That is again, maybe it doesn't touch me - what do you mean, it doesn't touch me?

Q: I mean...

K: Me is part of that.

Q: The memory may be there, you can't turn off all memory, but it doesn't affect me.

K: No, sir, no, sir - see how...

Q: Wiped out.

K: How we have translates it immediately? That is, I have memories of my sorrow, but it no longer interferes with my action.

Right? Is that so?

Q: That's how I see it. I may be wrong.

K: I have memory of being hurt as an individual...

Q: There's no more me.

K: Wait, wait, listen, sir - memory of it, remembrance of it, it's in my brain, in the cells. And when I say individuality is nonsense, have I lost the memory of the hurt?

Q: How can you lose the memory if it's in the brain cells, it may not be operating, it may not be...

K: No, I say...

Q: It is like amnesia?

Q: I think that if there is an illusion, you see, what one remembers is an illusion, when the illusion is dispelled, the memory must go. We can't remember an illusion, because it is nothing.

Q: Something is in the brain cells, is that an illusion or an actual...

Q: What has been in the brain cells can change from illusion to non-illusion, the brain cell itself must have changed, it's like waking from a dream, you're not, you know, the thing is dispelled.

Q: But you may remember the dream.

Q: In fact if you do, then you're not free of the dream, you see, that if you remember the experiencing, the experience of pain, in the illusion, then it's still the illusion.

Q: It's of the past, it's not the present. The present has nothing to do with memory, remembering...

Q: The imprint on the brain cells of certain experiences, are they...

Q: But the imprint was an illusion and when the illusion is dispelled, the imprint must go.

Q: Why?

Q: Otherwise we still have the illusion.

K: Maria, may I say something - have you heard my question? Have you investigated the question?

Q: Yes.

K: Are you reacting to the question? Wait, slowly, go slow. Have you investigated the question which I have put, or are you reacting to the question and asking out of that reaction. Go slowly, Maria, find out first. Piano, piano. I put the question to myself, perhaps you will see it. As an individual, which is an illusion, for the moment, as an individual, I remember certain incidents which have caused pain. The remembrance of it, the memory of it, the room in which the thing happened which gave pain. And all the circumstances involved in that incident.

And that has, as an individual, it has been, it is there, circulating. Right? You've followed up to now? Are you following up to now?

Q: Yes.

K: And if I drop my individuality as an illusion, will the memory still remain, I'm asking a question.

Q: You used the word 'circulate.' If...

K: My god, you're all...

Q: ...there are memories that are factually in the brain...

K: I'm going to find out, Maria, you're all too quick in your answers. I remember where it happened, the house, I can go back to the house and see it happened there. I lived in Ojai, ten years or whatever time, I can see the whole thing, but the memory of pain, that's what I'm talking about, the memory of pain - I won't listen, I won't answer you - the memory of the pain has gone. Have you listened to what I've said?

Q: May I ask a question? The memory of the pain, you say, is gone, but you've just referred to the fact that there was pain at a certain point, therefore...

K: That's only a description - please, Maria, careful, that's why you are...

Q: There is some record in the brain.

K: You see what it is...

Q: But Krishnaji, I think some of us are trying to see. One is to relieve the pain, the pain is active, the pain is there...

K: You're missing the point.

Q: It has a certain action. The other is a simple factual memory, that there was once a pain, it isn't doing anything or affecting one today.

Q: The hurt has gone.

K: No, sir, be careful, this is very, very serious, you can't...

Q: Is the pain different from the memory?

K: Oh, Lordy, don't sir, this is...

Q: Sir, could you use the word imprint when talking about pain?

K: Imprint. Answer Mrs. Zimbalist, Sir.

Q: It's possible, I think, that if this is so, then one would remember the circumstances and perhaps remember the figures, in the sense that perhaps if they were in a play, something like that, but there would be no imprint inside.

Q: To me there is a distinction between an absolute memory of one that is affecting my reactions, my life, my, whatever I am. The other is something that happened that has no meaning for me any more but I can remember it as a fact. I'm trying to find out, when you say, be without memory...

K: Wait a minute - could you put it this way, just - you're attached to somebody. I'm not asking, saying this personally. You're attached to somebody. And you see the whole business of attachment, what is involved, the whole structure, nature of it, the consequences of it. And you end it. Right?

Q: Yes.

K: Then what happens? Wait - go slowly. What happens? The person is there, the furniture is there or whatever you are attached to. What has happened?

Q: There is no longer any attachment.

K: That's all. What has taken place in the mind which is no longer attached to?

Q: I don't understand.

Q: Sir, are you saying that there is a new mind? Which is different from forgetting.

K: Sir, I don't want to suggest a new mind. I just want to see, if you have been attached to something, to a belief, to a person, to a piece of furniture, and you are no longer attached, completely, what has happened?

Q: Sort of sense of falling away.

K: She began.

Q: Well, this is...

K: What has happened?

Q: ...in your example because in the instance you have raised, the attachment is no longer there, there is no...

K: So what has happened - you're not answering.

Q: There's been a change...

K: Which means what? Have you lost the memory - quiet - please listen - have you lost the memory of having been attached? I'm not going to - please I'm going to prevent you from answering. Have you lost the memory? All the consequence, all that, when you drop completely attachment? Go ahead,

Q: You use the word memory where...

K: Use some other word. Contact.

Q: Could you say it is like a wound healing without a scar?

K: I'm using the word memory, purposely, because that is what is keeping me attached.

Q: But if it is wiped out that's the finish.

K: This is important, because if one has done this, what takes place? That's all I'm asking you.

Q: Sir, can you go back a couple of steps about the individuality and just pick up what you were saying because I've lost the thread of the argument.

K: Oh my lordy.

Q: Sir, aren't you saying that if there is a recording of the event you remember it, you have a picture of the event.

K: No, sir, I'm asking something else. I have recorded when I am attached.

Q: It's an emotional...

K: Just follow it, sir, please. Two minutes - forgive me, I'm not suppressing anybody from asking questions. When I was attached the whole mechanics of registration was taking place. Right? Now when I am not attached, absolutely, the mechanism of registration has stopped. If it has not, the attachment is still going on, in a different form.

Q: It is emotional, we're talking about emotion, emotional registration, we're not talking about recording in the same way that...

K: No, sir, of course not, memory, all the recording is memory.

Q: Yes, we're talking about emotional memory.

K: No, not only - recording. I record, you've said something and my mind records.

Q: I remember the fact that the person was standing there, I mean, obviously.

K: Yes, sir, that - have I. when the mind is free from that attachment, has the recording then been wiped out? That's my point.

Q: Of what? What recording?

K: All the memories. All the incidents.

Q: Well just now you said...

K: Maria.

Q: You've just said you remember, say, it's a person, or a place, the circumstances, but you're no longer in that, you're not, none of that is operating in you.

K: But I am not attached to you.

Q: No.

K: Just a minute - I'm being personal, I'm sorry. I'm not attached to anybody - forgive me. I'm not attached to you. I know you, you are there, you do all kinds of things. The mechanism of the whole process of attachment has completely come to an end. But you are there.

Q: That's right. But what I'm talking - I think, OK, that I do understand, that attachment is not going on, but if you say, is the memory of the attachment in the past, it's not going on, it's not active, it's not in one, in me...

K: It is not there.

Q: ...once it was and I remember the fact that...

K: For God's sake, somebody explain to her, or something.

Q: It's a kind of burden.

Q: It's gone, there's no burden, there's no attachment, there's none of that.

K: There is no memory, I'm telling you.

Q: Sir, is that the same thing...

K: There is no memory.

Q: Is it the same thing as forgetting?

K: No, I give up.

Q: Right, then...

Q: What is the difficulty in understanding this?

K: No, sir, don't say that, this is one of the most difficult - you don't know - if you say, what is the difficulty, it's simple - it's not.

Q: I think it is in this case, I think the difficulty is with me. You say the memory is different from forgetting.

K: What?

Q: Having no memory, is that different from forgetting?

K: No.

Q: It's not?

K: Forgetting is something else and having no memory is something else.

Q: All right.

K: This is enough.

Q: Isn't Mrs. Zimbalist saying, my son dies, I wipe it all out, I don't even remember that there was a son.

K: No, sir, it is not like that. Don't...

Q: Isn't it like, I remember that yesterday you called me stupid but I don't remember...

K: I didn't call you stupid.

Q: No, somebody did. (Laughter) Somebody called me stupid yesterday but I don't remember the feeling that arose or hurt any more, it's gone.

K: Good.

Q: Is that what you're saying?

K: Something like that.

Q: He remembers that he was hurt but he can't remember the hurt itself as the feeling is gone.

Q: The words, the questioner said, these words, "You are stupid." But the feeling that arose is gone, cannot be recalled.

Q: So there is no real memory of the feeling you had. So the emotional contents are gone.

K: That's right, that's right, sir. Sir, could we take another example. Suppose I've been hurt. The memory of that hurt, the feeling of that hurt is there. Now if I wipe out that hurt completely, therefore in that wiping away, cleansing, there is no feeling of ever being hurt. I know, this is difficult for people - there is no feeling ever of being hurt.

Q: I think the difficulty is that people are so used to remembering factual things, that the idea that you cannot recollect the actual hurting, the nature of the hurt...

K: All right, you cannot recollect, if you want to put it, you cannot remember, recollect what was the state of the mind or feeling, when it was hurt. Is that explained somewhat?

Now, come back. As an individual, I remember certain incidents which have caused pain or pleasure, or whatever it was. And with the cessation of the individual as an illusion, absolutely, then what is the quality of the mind which has remembered, recollected? I say it has gone. That's all.

Now what is my action, what am I to do in this world - I've lost my individuality, I mean it, I'm talking about myself, I've lost my individuality, I'm no longer separate, fighting for myself, struggling, conflict, all that. Then what is the nature of my mind which sees that I am part of the whole? The realization that I am the entire mankind.

Q: One feels a total responsibility.

K: Responsibility. One may not - Madam, do you feel that, or it's just a lot of words.

Q: No, I feel that.

K: How do you act from that responsibility?

Q: I don't know.

K: So I'm asking what is action?

Q: An action of great care, great attention.

Q: Sir, I think that any attempt to answer your question is rather speculative on our part.

K: Yes. So what will you do, how will you meet this question, how will you meet this challenge? The challenge is, what are you to do in this world, if you have lost, if you put away your ugly little individuality which means nothing.

Q: At this moment we have no basis from which to act, there is nothing of the same order from which we've acted in the past.

K: Sir, you can only answer my question, have you really put aside your individuality? Or is it just, say, "Yes, convenient today in this meeting but for the rest of the time I'll carry on."

Q: You are stopping us from answering, because how can I say I'm sure that I've lost...

K: I don't know, I'm asking, I'm just asking, I'm not asking to be sure.

Q: I think that the only thing you can be after your question is silent.

K: No, sir. After four days...

Q: Why are you stopping us answering it?

K: After four days, you're just silent at the end of it?

Q: Exactly, I am, completely.

Q: I'm not, because if we are silent nothing will change the world and we can sit here and go out, nothing has changed. But I feel, if I may, is that if you have a big feeling in yourself that you are not separate from all people, that you really want to share with other people, really want to listen to other people...

K: No, no sharing - you see, you've gone off to living with other people, sharing.

Q: Well, that's the wrong word. Could one say that before I was acting for my individual, then after this change occurs, my individual being the whole, I act for the whole.

K: What is the action that is born out of that?

Q: Love?

Q: Perhaps the realization which we actually cannot do anything ourselves, from a me.

Q: How can we say that it hasn't happened? We can't say anything, I mean this passionately but I don't think we can say anything.

Q: You see, this happens in the moment, and each moment new, free from the past, because there is no illusion of memory, there are no more illusions, there is only the reality of the moment, and that is the responsive action, the thing from which you cannot divorce yourself. So there has to be some response. It is the moment, and each moment, that is the moment, at least this is how I feel now.

K: Sir, could I put...

Q: I feel so hesitant in making any statement at all.

K: Could I put the question differently.

Q: I seem to be looking to see is this true or not.

K: Is my individuality dead? It cannot be resurrected, it cannot be called back, it is dead. Then what is my action? The mind is not recollecting, remembering the individual, feeling separate.

Therefore what is its action when it is dead to separateness?

Q: Somebody said 'love' and you said, no - I didn't understand.

K: I said no because it comes out, love is one of the easiest words that we all use.

Q: But he's right.

K: He's perfectly right, but I just wondered if it is a reality or just a word.

Q: If one has lost one's individuality, sense of separateness, one is a whole being.

Q: But am I whole when I see it?

K: You understand, sir, if you feel you are the rest of mankind - you understand, sir, it's tremendous realization.

Q: Participation.

Q: There's a tremendous different feeling.

K: From that there is action. Perhaps we'll go into it tomorrow, from that point, if we may, It's now one o'clock - sorry.

BROCKWOOD PARK 5TH SEMINAR MEETING 17TH SEPTEMBER 1979

KRISHNAMURTI: We will go on with what we were talking about yesterday. I wonder if it is fairly clear, not only verbally, but perhaps even intellectually, that individual action, as we have been indulging in, has not brought about peace to mankind, has brought about innumerable problems, conflicts, divisions, the 'me' and the 'you' and 'we' and 'they', ideological differences, with all their struggles and wars and so on. If one sees that the individual is an illusion, actually faces it as a fact, then what is the quality of a mind that has lost completely all its individuality. That's where we left off yesterday, if I remember rightly. Is that so?

Have we gone into this at all? Or does it remain merely verbal, an intellectual concept and therefore rather shallow, superficial? And without any shadow of conflict, an action which does not bring about any kind of conflict. That's what we're investigating.

And we said, too, yesterday, when the whole concept of the individual comes to an end, the memory of all the incidents of individuality also come to an end. This is rather difficult to accept or even to understand, or to be aware of its whole significance. I wonder if we need to discuss more of it. Do we have to talk more about it? Is it possible, say for example, the individual gets hurt, which we all know, and when that individuality comes to an end, is there even a memory, a scar of that hurt?

Come on, sir, please. Or if there is an attachment as an individual for another individual, for an object, for an idea, and there is the ending of that attachment - is there any recollection, remembrance, recording of that attachment? Because I think it is important to find this out, for it may lead us to some other quality of a mind that is whole, not fragmented. Won't you join me? Or am I talking to myself?

Because is love individual, or rather, can individuality love? Come on, sir, if we say, "No"...

QUESTIONER: How can we even answer that? I mean those who say 'no', I feel, even if I say "No" I'm under the illusion that I can't love and yet I'll leave this room and I'll tell someone, "Yes, I love you." I mean is it that something we can know?

K: We're going to go into that question, sir. I'm asking, one is asking, can the individual, the separate, the thought that has created this individuality, can that individuality love? Because by its very nature and structure, it is separate, at least it thinks it is separate, and it wants to be separate. And when that exclusive division exists, can that individual ever know what love is? Sir, this is a very serious question, not just to be argued intellectually or bandied about, but one has to find this out, one has to come to this.

Q: The individual and love - to this person it seems a contradiction in terms, because I seem to know everything else but the state of which you talk.

K: But we say to each other, "I love you." We say, I love the country, I love my God, I love my nation, my family, with all the responsibility involved in that so-called love. Can there be love when there is the essence of separateness involved in it.

Q: Isn't it that the separate prevents real understanding...

K: Yes.

Q: ...of the other?

K: No, I'm not talking about the other, the other is like me - right? In essence. He may be a little more or a little less greedy, little more jealous, little more ambitious, but in essence, deep down, he is like me, like another. Right? We have seen that, I hope, after five days discussion, that's clear.

And we're asking, when there is the reality that I am the world and the world is me, with that comprehension, with that realization, in all its depth, individuality has come to an end. Is that so, or is it just a lot of words which we have bandied about?

Q: I don't know if I have the critical or the mental apparatus to understand that, if that is so.

K: Understand what, sir?

Q: Understand if what you were asking is possible or true, whether one can die to the individual.

K: Yes - have you?

Q: I doubt it.

K: You doubt it. So it means what? That you haven't really investigated your relationship to the world and the world's relationship to you. You haven't really gone into it.

Q: Or at least if I have tried to go into it, there's been some kind of block, or something that has prevented me from...

K: All right - what is the block? Is it unwillingness, is it fear, is it the sense of loss, a sense of deprivation, solitude, a sense of isolating yourself and so are all those blocks? I don't know - which is the block? All of them or one?

Q: Perhaps all, yes.

K: No, sir, - all of them, let's examine all of them.

Q: But even so, if I can raise this question, even if we examine all of them, we're back in the immediate blocks. Will that free the mind of blocks?

K: Yes, the blocks will disappear. Because if you look at them very carefully - is it fear, fear of what? Go on, sir, investigate it with me - many of you may be feeling that. That is, if I lose my individuality, what am I? Except my profession, my career, my particular idiosyncrasy and so on, otherwise what am I? So I am afraid of being nothing, of being empty in the sense, individuality has filled itself with a lot of things, possessions, attachments, so many things. And when that individuality comes to an end, you lose all that, and so there is fear, fear of what might happen if you lose.

Now, have you come to that point? Or it's just playing with it?

Q: No, I haven't come to that point.

K: Then what am I to do, sir.

Q: I don't think you can do anything.

K: No, you see, then communication between us ceases.

Q: Apparently it does at a certain point.

K: No if it is a block, fear is a block. Why can't we remove that block?

Q: That is the question.

K: I'm doing it, sir. Is it I'm afraid that if I lose my individuality I face a feeling of nothingness, of not being. Is that it?

Q: Krishnaji, it seems to me that we are trying to look at something new and unknown with the old tools, the thought process, and that's why we keep coming to this point. How with the thought process can I see this? You've asked, what is...

K: But we are understanding fear, you understand?

Q: But how can you understand fear with all the continuation of the thought process? How can you understand it?

K: Then can - all right, then attack it differently.

Q: What I'm trying to ask is, you asked us yesterday and again this morning, what is the state of the mind that has seen as a fact the ending of individuality. What I want to know is, what is the state of the mind that can perceive this fact. We haven't come to that.

K: What is the state of the mind that can perceive the fact that individuality is an illusion?

Q: Yes.

K: Now just a minute, let's hold onto that. What is the state of the mind that perceives or that realizes the individuality is an illusion. Go on, sirs. I've got it.

Q: I can see clearly what it is not, but I can't just see what it could possibly be, something totally unknown.

K: First of all, we have seen the activities of individuality, where it has led us, humanity, human beings, individual as well as collective - we have explained that verbally, like a river flowing logically. And you have followed that. That is verbal communication, explanation through words, which we both understand, and in the process of explanation your mind is following the consequences very carefully, without any effort, like water flowing. So when you are doing that, what is taking place in the mind? You understand what I'm asking?

You are explaining to me something. I follow it verbally and also I feel what you're saying to be more or less true, and I'm following it without any effort, like a river flowing, I'm following it. Now what is the quality of my mind when you have shown me the picture, the map, very clearly, and I've been watching it? What has happened to my mind?

Q: I can't refer back to anything I know.

K: Right. What has happened?

Q: It's very passive. Watchful. It's very passive, it's watchful. it has...

K: All right. Watchful. You have watched, you have worked, you have listened, verbally you have understood, you have seen the consequences, it's all an even flow. Right? Without any effort. Now wait. Without any effort. Go slowly - understand this. Before you have made effort, struggle, find out, analyse, you follow? - you made great effort. Here you are not making an effort, any effort at all. Right? So what has taken place in the mind?

Q: I would say that the two minds in a sense become one, if you are tuned in on the same wavelength.

K: Yes. And also, what has happened? Before you made an effort, now you're not making an effort. Right? So what has happened?

Q: Do you mean conflict has gone away?

K: Conflict you have put aside, because there is no conflict in this, I am not persuading you, I am not pushing you, I am - we are in communication, flowing with it. Right? So what has happened? It's very simple if you look at it. Before conflict, now no conflict.

Q: So there is no...

K: Wait, wait. Isn't it? That's all. So the mind has become, is in a state of not having any conflict. Right? In this communication - that's all, you may have - we'll go into that. So what has happened?

A mind that has made conflict, and a mind that says, "I have no conflict." Because it has seen and therefore it is intelligent. The other is not intelligent, this is intelligence. I wonder - that's all. Right?

Wait a minute. So we are seeing a block. One may have a block of fear. Now examine it with the same way, you follow? That is, without effort watch the whole movement of fear, watch it, without struggle, without saying, "I must be free of it, I must go beyond it, I must suppress it," which are all efforts. Now just watch, look at that fear, the consequences - right? Now as you watch it, what is operating? The intelligence that was not functioning when you were making conflict, now that intelligence is functioning. Right? So the fear is no longer there. I wonder if you get all this.

Q: Observation without the observer.

K: No - yes - but I'm just saying, see the difference of a mind that has made an effort and a mind that is observing the flowing of the water without effort. Right? Then the block has gone.

Q: I see that very clearly but the block is coming back.

K: No it won't, it won't. It will not if you... all right, let it come back. Go slowly, let it come back and again watch it, without making an effort. You get it?

Q: I see what you're saying, we're struggling against this, trying to get to the other side.

K: Other side.

Q: So that's what is needed before one can reach the threshold of making that other step?

K: No. there is no other step. Sir, I have made an effort, my mind has made effort to get rid of this block, which is fear. And it has struggled, it has analysed, it has been to a psychotherapist and so on. It has made tremendous effort. Now somebody comes along, you come along and say, "Don't do that, just watch it." Right? And you're watching it. So there is a vast difference between the mind that made an effort and the mind not making an effort. Right? Before you were seeking a result, here you're not seeking a result. I wonder - right? A total change has taken place.

So if a block recurs, you want to find out why. Either you're so eager to reach the other end right? Can we proceed?

Q: Yes.

K: So I'm asking, we're asking each other, what is the quality of a mind that is no longer separative, that has understood the whole nature of individuality - right? - the root of it, the separateness of it, the conflict involved wherever there is separation, two nations, two people, two ideas, two opinions, you follow? - wherever there is separation, there must be the expression of individuality. The individuality as the collective, as the nation, as the Catholic, you follow? - it's all the same, in the same direction. I don't know - right?

Now if the individuality has gone, that is separative effort, then I am the world and the world is me, essentially. I may be a little more greedy than the other fellow, but he'll be a little less jealous than me, but jealousy is the same, greed. We're not talking about relative greed but greed. Right?

So, shall we proceed from there? No, don't, please, carefully - either it is an actual fact that you're facing, or you're just verbally playing with it. And don't play verbally with me, please, it's no fun.

Q: Can I make a point here, to avoid this, just words and thoughts, presumably what you've done is you've directed attention to what you might call a living situation of communication between yourself and a member of the audience.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: And then by paying attention to this, people can without having a block, can see the nature of this process.

K: Quite. You've understood that, of course. We are walking down the same path watching the river flowing. Right? The water is flowing. So we're both walking along the river, both of us, as Professor Wilkins has pointed out. Now we've come to the point, we must go on, otherwise we - not that I'm impatient or anything. So, what has happened to the mind when this individuality has come to an end? The ending implies the recollections, the remembrances of the individual activities. If that remembrance, recollections remain individuality still exists - that is the whole point. And I raise the question, can individuality love, can this entity that thinks it is separate, which is essentially an illusion, can that entity which thinks it is separate, love?

You understand, we are going against the whole current of civilizations, cultures. So is love personal and impersonal? I love my wife and I really don't care about what is happening about something. You follow? I don't care what happens. My love is limited to that one person. Please, sir, this is very serious, you understand? Is that love? Or love, not being separate is both personal and impersonal - it is love, not my love and your love, it's just love. Do we meet this?

Q: That implies no discrimination at all.

K: No, don't, moment you use the word 'discrimination' you've already separated it. I don't know if I'm making myself clear. We said, love, which is, as an individual I say, "I love you," and I see that love is not love at all, because the individual himself is separate. Right? Oh, come on, sirs, you don't see the...

And therefore that love is not love because it contains jealousy, all the activities of thought which has created the individuality. I wonder - come on sirs!

Q: It was possessive love. I love you, that's possessive.

K: I said that is not love.

Q: That is not love.

K: Therefore, no - so, then what is love? Does it discriminate? I mean, love is love, I can't say I discriminate and say, "I love you, I don't love you."

Now let's move a little further. Are we all together in this or am I just - no? Are we? No. You see, when there is the realization that I am the world and the world is me, you know, that very fact is a tremendous revolution, you understand? It has an extraordinary feeling in it. I don't know if we realize it.

Solitude is never secure, it has no security. Right? Isolation can only be insecure, the individual can only be always insecure, for him there is no security. Come on, sirs.

Q: I think, you see, since the individual is actually dependent on everybody...

K: Of course.

Q: ...he pretends he's not, he's actually very insecure, it's clear.

K: So, if when one realizes, when there is - not 'one' - when there is the realization that the individual can never be secure, can never have protection, safety, certainty, when one realizes that, and that the world is me and me is the world, in that there is tremendous sense of security. I wonder if you - because there is no separation.

Q: I think that maybe we should try to elaborate, perhaps it's not entirely obvious.

K: Let's go into it.

Q: I mean I think that first of all one may think there's material security, you know, he needs money, he needs...

K: Even material security is becoming almost impossible. Right? Individual security means, "I am British, my interests are the British, my safety lies in Britain, in this island, my security lies in opposing others," and so this division is bringing greater and greater insecurity to me. To what I want as security as an individual is being destroyed. I wonder...

Q: I don't know if I make myself clear. Several of us may see this together, but the world, we're surrounded with a lot of people in the world who don't see it and they may make us insecure.

K: What shall I do? That's it. The world round me, as Dr. Bohm points out, is thinking security lies in isolation.

Q: They may affect us nevertheless, even though we see point.

K: What?

Q: They may do something to us.

K: Yes, they see that and you and I may see in that separateness doesn't bring security. So they are going to do something to us.

Q: Then we see danger.

K: We can't do anything for them, because there are too many of them. Right? What shall I do? Come on, meet me. Look, you are all individualists, and your separateness, and there is one person who says "that's all wrong, you can't live that way." What are you going to do to that man? He's a danger to you. Right? Go and tell that to the Communists or to Mao Mao, or not Mao Mao.

(Laughter) To who? Yes, Arafat. They'll kill you. See what's happened? Either they kill you or put you on a pedestal and say you're a marvellous, he's a freak - forget him. Right?

That's what you're all going to do. You either worship him or feel this thing absolutely, you understand what it would mean?

Q: I don't understand what that would mean.

K: What is the difficulty, sir? We explained, if you are one person amongst many who think differently, who act differently, who live differently, they either kill you or say, "He's God," put you on a pedestal and forget you. Forget you in the sense, you're God, and worship, put a candle round you, but we carry on.

Q: But would things change even if there were...

K: Wait, watch it, sir. Are you like that?

Q: No.

K: No.

Q: That's a sincere answer.

K: What is the answer to my question, are you like the rest of the world, or, sorry, no - you understand?

Q: Now I do.

K: Are you like that? What would happen if many of us did that? Many of us realize there is no security in isolation, either the family or individual, there is no security in separation. Gosh, talk to the politicians, they'd throw you out. And talk to the Pope, seven hundred million people are separate. So what will you do - you see - go on, sir, investigate, find out.

Fortunately when you are talking like this, they really don't hear you. Right? You understand, sir? You understand what I'm saying?

Q: They, you mean...

K: They, the politicians, the establishment, the police, the immigration people - (Laughter) I go through that, the immigration people, none of them listen to you, fortunately. Because they are so enclosed in, they won't...

So what will you do? Come on, sir - what will you do?

Q: Surely, sir, this doesn't tell you what you will do, it removes the lines on which you did things before, so you can't say you will do this or that.

K: No. Do you realize as a human being representing all mankind in essence, an integral part of mankind, when you see isolation is the most destructive way of living - right? - what is happening in your relationship with the world, with your wife or with your neighbour? Come on, sirs.

Q: A certain clarification takes place.

K: I am married, or I have got a girlfriend, and I see isolation as the most appalling way of living, death. And she doesn't realize it. Right? Face it, sirs. What shall I do. I realize it, my wife says, "Nonsense." Right? What is my action, what am I to do, what is my responsibility?

Q: I must change.

K: My wife says, "Nonsense".

Q: I love...

K: Be British, be etc., etc., Catholic or whatever you want, because she's entrenched, bound to that. What am I to do, what is my relationship with her? Apparently you don't face all this.

Q: If I have love in my heart I will be talking to her.

K: I have talked to her and she says, "Go to hell!" (Laughter)

Q: (Inaudible)

K: But sir, you're not facing the thing. She lives an individual life. She wants that, it's in her blood, it's her education, her conditioning, all that. And I see the truth that individuality is the most terrible thing in action. I love. What happens to my relationship to her - I can talk to her till Doomsday.

Q: Yes, there is nothing to do...

K: Wait, find...

Q: What do you want me to do?

K: We're going to find out what to do - don't say there is nothing to do, I will divorce, I will do something - let's go into it for a minute.

Q: Unless she is prepared to change what can you do?

K: That's what - she's not prepared to change. Look, are you prepared to change?

Q: That is the question.

K: For God's sake, you're my wife or my husband - are you prepared to change?

Q: Fortunately there's no attachment to her.

K: No, sir - look, what is happening now - you're my wife and my husband, we are in that relationship. What is your action, what is my action?

Q: If you have love in your heart, you...

K: Sir, I have love in my heart, I don't question it, I know what love is.

Q: You have a relationship.

K: Unfortunately I have you! (Laughter) My wife, my husband - what am I to do?

Q: I keep on talking.

Q: I think there's nothing to do: the person, the wife or the husband either comes to you, trying to understand you, or if he or she cannot, she leaves. There's nothing you can do, you cannot change the mind of another person, can you?

K: I live in the same house, share the same bedroom, don't fool yourself.

Q: The fact is we have no relationship.

K: You are my wife and my husband, what is my relationship with you?

Q: It is only nominally, maybe only in name, and no more. Maybe. Maybe our communication stops at "How are you today, it's a lovely day." Maybe that's as far as we can go.

K: Is that all?

Q: Maybe. But if it is, we shouldn't run away from it.

K: Sir, look at it - between you and me, what is happening?

Q: Well, isn't there, sir, a feeling of compassion then, because you see they can't do anything.

K: Sir, put yourself in this position. You are my wife or my husband, you and I, we have a relationship, sex and children perhaps - I hope not - then what is our action? Look, here you are, sir.

Q: Your reaction is one of love.

K: Do you know what's going to happen? You may love, have that - I won't call it love - you may have lost your individuality, I haven't - so what happens? I leave you, at the end of talking, talking, talking, you're going to do exactly the same thing now.

Q: Exactly.

Q: But if that's the way it is, why shouldn't we create another image to which we should attach ourselves.

K: Sir, you're missing the point. You, the man who has lost his individuality, you're going to drive him out. Yes, sir.

Q: Unless I see the urgency of change, I can't have a relationship with him, can I?

K: But...

Q: This is an impossible question.

K: Sir, you're not facing it.

Q: I look, and I would simply be at a loss to know what to do and out of...

K: We have talked, the fifth morning, this is the fifth morning we've talked, we've gone into it very, very deeply. And you have lost, really lost individuality, because you see the consequences of it, you have an insight into it. And so you have wiped it away. And I haven't. So what takes place? I drive you out of the house, which is what you're going to do here, when you leave.

Q: Well, let's face that.

K: Sad?

Q: No, let's face that, if that is what is, let's face it.

K: You are doing that, sir, now.

Q: Exactly.

K: So let's go on. What is action without individuality. Right, sir? I want to move somewhere else. What is action without this separative concept of 'me'? You understand my question? I knew what was action from a self-centred point of view. Right? I acted from that. And you come along and point out to me, and I've listened to you very carefully, and by the very listening I'm following you, my mind has become somewhat intelligent.

And I realize that intelligence sees what the individual action has been, the consequences of it, the danger of it, the degeneracy of it, and now it says, "What is action without this separative element in my mind." You understand? Right, sir? You're following all this? What is that action? (Pause)

I don't know what that action is but I'm going to find out - I must. You understand, sir? I must find it, because that's how I started on it. What is a human being, surrounded by wolves - sorry - what is he to do? He can't kill all the wolves, and he can't become a wolf himself, so what is he to do? What is the mind that is not separative, what is his action? Oh, you're missing something marvellous - come on, sirs.

Q: Is it that he begins to learn from moment to moment...

K: No, sir.

Q: ...by seeing that moment...

K: I have been through all that. I've had an insight - please listen, sir - I've had an insight into the nature of individuality. And I've also had an insight into the organizations which that individuality has created. Right? I've had an insight into that, the organizations, that individualities, the separateness, the separative element has created - I've had an insight into it. And that very insight has put away that. Right? I don't know if you are following.

And that insight now says - doesn't say - that insight is now - sorry - that has dropped it. I'm asking a question with regard to action. Can I have an insight, can there be an insight into the nature of action, which is not individualistic? You get my point? Are you meeting me?

Q: Yes.

K: An insight.

Q: Is this a different insight, sir, or is it part of the same insight?

K: Insight is never the same. Insight is finished with that. Right?

Q: You mean it's not comparative.

K: No, no. I said, it has had an insight into the nature of individuality, and all the structures and organizations that individuality has brought about. He has had an insight into it. And therefore that very insight has abolished individuality. Right? You might say, "What do you mean by insight?" "Is it continuous, or is it from moment to moment, or is it - what? Or it has no time."

That's it.

Q: When you say...

K: Now, this is becoming difficult.

Q: That the insights are neither the same nor different, that if there is no time, the insight...

K: I can only have insight into the individuality and what that individuality has brought about, organizations, insight, which is, that insight is not a remembrance, it isn't brought about through remembrance, through recollection, through arguments, it is quick perception, and action. Therefore it is not brought about through time. Right? I don't know if you are following all this. Does it interest you?

And, I'm asking, is this insight the same as the insight there was with regard to individuality, has that insight varied when I ask the question? Is it a different insight?

Q: Now that you have asked the question?

K: No, you're all getting too - your brains are functioning or? All right, let's put it that way. Our action has been based upon time. Right? I will do, I have done, and I remember what I have done, and according to that or modifying that, I will do. It's all based on self-centred recollections, projecting into the future and so on and on. All that is a movement of time. Right? Do you disagree with that? Right? Don't let me talk to myself, please.

And I'm saying, and the next thing is, there is an action which is not born out of time, which is the action brought about through insight. Now, what do I mean by insight? Insight means a quick perception into the whole nature of individuality and its organization - quick perception of it, which is not intuition.

Q: May I ask you, sir? You said a quick perception, would it mean really quick in the ordinary meaning of time?

K: I'm going to go into it, sir. Perception which is not of time, which is not the result of careful analysis, examination or exploration. Seeing something immediately to be true. Right? You must have had all this, this is nothing strange. You hear something the speaker says, yes you quickly grasp it. That quick perception is insight.

Q: I think the trouble is the word 'quick' sometimes may mean time.

K: Quick - all right - quick means time.

Q: I think immediate is better.

K: Immediate. Immediate perception and action. Our action is understanding, analysis, allowing time, and then acting. That insight can only take place when there are no arguments, no opinions, no conclusions but seeing immediately the truth of something. Right? Can we go on from there?

Q: So insight is beyond thought.

K: Obviously. Thought has said, "Let me analyse, let me examine, let me explore and from that exploration come to a conclusion and from that conclusion act." This is what we do. Let me think it over. Whereas we are saying, perception, immediate perception takes place when there is no movement of thought. Right? Are you meeting? Of course, yes.

So I want to know, what is - you understand - what is action without this sense of individuality? You understand my question? Please, sir, come on - don't go to sleep, please. Because our question was, living in this world, which is so deteriorating, violent, all the rest of it, what is action without the individual, without the actor? Right? Now we can come to that point. Is there an action without the actor? You understand, sir? Have you understood my question? I have always...

Q: Verbally only.

K: No, no, not verbally. Just see, look, listen to the question first. I'm asking, is there an action without the actor? The actor was the individual, the actor was the entity which struggled, which analysed, which remembered, "I must do this," - I'm saying, the actor is the observer, of course. Now I'm asking, is there an action without the observer, without the - what did I say - the actor? I must have quick, I must have immediate perception of it.

Q: Sir, it seems the only one we are aware of in our lives is when there is danger. The only one we are aware of in our life is when there is danger, this action, when we can actually see danger.

K: Yes - the danger we said exists only when there is the individuality who thinks he's permanent and separate. That is the greatest danger.

Q: Yes, but we have to see it.

K: Ah! That's up to you. I pointed out the whole thing for you, laid down the map, there it is - immediate perception of it. So I say, what is action without the actor, is there an action without the 'me'?

Q: Could we say it is simply being?

K: No, sir, don't say it - first listen to the question, see all the implications involved in it. Don't exercise your mind, say 'Let's examine it,' just look at it, like a river flowing, you follow it. That is, the actor is the individual, the observer. He said, I will do this, I must not do this, this is right, this is wrong, this I will do in the future, based on the memory of the past, that has been our accepted norm of action. Right?

Now that norm has disappeared. So now there is only the question, what is action without the observer? Is there action, action not in the sense of the word, of the individual doing, but action when I am the world and the world is me. That brings about great sense of love, great sense of non-isolating existence, which is love.

Now, what is action without the actor, without the observer? You're following all this? No. Are you asleep? I'm afraid so.

Q: Krishnaji, every way I look at what you're saying seems to come from some idea already that I have. So I really don't know what the right action is.

K: We are doing it - find out, sir. But you haven't - have you had an insight into the nature of the individual and his organizations? Finished. If you have understood that, seen the truth of it, finished, it can never enter into that.

So my question is, what is action without the actor?

Q: An action which will derive from your new state of mind, which is a state of mind of compassion.

K: Have you that new state of mind? That's all my question.

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Go slowly. Have you, not M. Maroger, but I'm asking, have you dropped that individual concept, completely? You must have, it is inevitable if you realize the truth that you are the world and the world is you, in essence. What is action? Are you all tired?

Q: Immediate response to the...

Q: Krishnaji, I think we've come to a crossroads, as you mentioned the other day.

K: Last night I heard somebody for about 10 minutes about mysticism. Did you hear it? Some of you? He was a scientist and has studied science and had an experience of some kind and he's now pursuing mysticism. And dropped more or less, he says, I might go back to science but for the time being it's in abeyance. Now he's following various forms of mysticism. Now watch it carefully. He's still separate, you follow? - and he's pursuing something that is not separate. For god's sake!

Q: Could I have a go at this one, because I'm not clear about this question of your being in communication with someone else here. Then this communication involving insight or...

K: Is immediate.

Q: ...love without attachment and so on. This then is there. Now this may then lead one's thoughts in this head or another head, an action to be carried out by the individual in one sense. But this is set in motion, so to speak, by this thing which is non-individual.

K: Yes.

Q: I think, you see, where I'm a bit confused is that, I mean obviously you have this non-individual component and then you have this followed up by thought, arms and legs, which are attached to individuals, being in motion. But it seems to me, that if that state exists, then all thoughts will be springing from this sort of principle.

K: Yes, sir. Could we - now a minute, sir. When I've dropped my individuality, I haven't lost my arms, I haven't lost my face, but the quality of separateness has come to an end. Right? That has come to an end through immediate perception. And that perception and immediate action brings about a quality of intelligence, which is not thought. Right? A quality of intelligence that is not the product of environment, education, all the rest of it, but it is intelligence that has the quality of compassion, love, and the enormous responsibility involved in that compassion. Right? Responsibility.

Q: I think responsibility does introduce difficulties because it involves the idea of one individual being responsible...

K: No, no, the feeling of being responsible, not for one individual, or for a group or for some idea or some cause, but the feeling of total responsibility. Otherwise I wouldn't talk here, I wouldn't open my mouth, if there was not the feeling of immense responsibility, not to a cause, to some divine purpose, all that nonsense.

Q: Intense involvement.

K: Not quite - I'm not involved. Again that's a dangerous word. Wait. So, intelligence has taken place when there was an insight into the individual, that disorganizes - there is intelligence. Right? Now that intelligence is love, compassion, without intelligence there is no love, no compassion, they all go together.

Now, what is the action of that intelligence - that's right - what is the action of that intelligence when surrounded by a million people who are not - forgive me - intelligent, in that sense. They are all clever, they have all super knowledge, they have got immense power, position, prestige, all that. What is the responsibility of that intelligence and its action?

Q: It can only be love.

K: No, no, I've said that, Madam. Without intelligence there is no love. I mean, the individuality says, "I love you," and it's full of jealousies, anxieties, ugliness, and that's not intelligence. So what is the action of that intelligence surrounded by people who are completely indifferent?

Q: Is there any action, Krishnaji, surely it just is.

K: Therefore what does that mean? Go on - that's what I'm coming to. If you are that in a world, what will you do, what is your movement?

Q: If you are not separate from the world, then the world need must be the trigger to...

K: Sir, you are the world, just now.

Q: yes.

K: And you, X happens to have this intelligence, compassion - really I mean it, he's got it in his blood - and feels utterly responsible for everything that's happening, without guilt, without cause, the feeling, you know, you love somebody - now, when there is love, you care, there is care, there is attention, there is everything involved in it, which is - if I can use the word 'responsible', that's implied in that. You are the world. What is this X to do with you?

Q: You've just replied there. You've just given the reply: care.

K: Now, I have to go through it. (It's hot, isn't it?) You are the world, you, and the X here sitting in this chair says, "What is my responsibility towards you?" He cares, he has love, compassion, and intelligence, those three go together absolutely. And you won't even listen, you won't even care. Right? Then what is he to do? He feels responsible, you understand, sir?

Q: Doesn't he somehow touch...

K: Don't you feel, don't you feel all this?

Q: What is this person to do, what is he to do?

K: I'm asking you, sir.

Q: I've no idea, I'm not that person.

K: Why aren't you?

Q: I'd like to be.

K: Because you haven't given time, you haven't given your energy, you haven't listened.

Q: That's perhaps the case.

K: Therefore you're like all the rest of them, so what will you do with X, sitting in this chair, throw mud at him? You will, of course.

Q: I would not.

K: Of course you are throwing mud at him, obviously, because you don't care. You don't face facts. Now, X says, am I talking to you at the conscious level? You understand my question? Please follow this, sir. You go to a class, physics or learning a new language, there you are learning, listening at the conscious level to acquire a new language, learn all about science, physics or mathematics, it's all at the conscious level. Right? Right, sir? Now are we talking to each other at the conscious level?

Q: No.

K: Before you say "No" sir, find out, sir, don't...

Q: That's the problem, before, with the wife, wasn't it, why - the problem before with the wife.

K: I wasn't talking - I left my wife long ago. (Laughter)

Q: Are we receiving...

K: Sorry, poor lady - I haven't got a wife, so - anyhow. So I'm asking a different question, sir, totally different question. When the speaker is talking, is he communicating at the conscious level, as when you go to a school or to college, university, you're learning various subjects which are at the conscious level, mathematics, history, whatever it is.

So that conscious level has acquired knowledge. Knowledge can never be complete, therefore knowledge always goes with ignorance. I wonder if the scientists will agree.

Q: Yes, there is also a lot of unconscious conditioning during the learning of science.

K: Yes, I'm coming to that. So are we merely listening at the conscious level, or partly at the deeper level, partly? You understand my question? Which is it we are doing? Or is there a listening with all your consciousness, the part, the deeper, and the superficial, whole of it listening. You understand my question?

Q: This is the problem. This is the problem, because to have this kind of listening it seems that we have to have left our personality already.

K: No, no. Just to listen, sir. I'm not talking of leaving your wife, husband, daughters, etc. individual, nothing, I've moved away from that for the moment. I'm asking, we're asking each other, are we listening with the hearing of the ears, or listening with all your consciousness, with all your being, so that there is no part of you asleep, there's no part of you withholding, just listening?

Now if you so listened that listening is complete attention, isn't it? Complete attention. Professor Wilkins says something to me, and I am listening entirely, there are no barriers, there is no effort, there is no sense of "What do you mean by it?" None of that, I'm just listening to everything he says. That is, I have given complete attention. Right? Now, in that attention there is no 'me'. I wonder if you see. There is no centre from which I am listening. Do you, understand what I'm saying?

Q: Yes.

K: Explaining, rather. So if one listens in the same way, without the 'me' to the nature of the individual, the nature of his activities and his organizations, then there is no problem, you have got it, because you are listening entirely without the centre.

Q: Action without will.

K: No. I'm not talking about action without will. I'm just listening. Now in the same way, can I listen to something that I've not even thought about, that isn't even anywhere near my consciousness, which is, is there an action without the actor, without the self-centred entity who has always acted, acted, acted?

We must stop now, it's nearly one o'clock. Lunch is more important than this, for the time being.

BROCKWOOD PARK 6TH SEMINAR MEETING 18TH SEPTEMBER 1979

KRISHNAMURTI: As this is the last discussion or dialogue or whatever it is, do we sum up the whole thing, or do you want to investigate further into what we've been discussing? No answer?

QUESTIONER: Could we investigate further?

K: Could we investigate further? I think you were not here for the last two discussions. What we were saying was that there is actually no individuality at all. And if, when, not if, when the individuality is understood, its nature, its activities and its institutions, is there an ending of that individuality, because the individual is really the whole world, in essence, so there is no individuality. And if there is no individuality, does it carry the memories, the recording, the various forms of remembrances, do they exist when the individuality comes to an end. We went into that very carefully.

And, if you want to go still further, can the individual ever be complete, whole? But individuals seek that, try to integrate themselves and imagine or work, think, that they have become the whole. Isolation, which is the activity of the individual can never be complete, can never be whole. And when the individuality comes to an end, which is, it requires a great deal of investigation, which we did, and what is the quality of the mind that is no longer centred in itself? What is the action of a mind that is not self-centred. That's the whole point.

We said, to perceive this whole movement of the individual and its activities and its organizations, is to have an insight into the whole movement of it. And that very insight is out of time. I don't know if we have understood that. Insight is not a remembrance, is not a calculated, investigated result, it is not a process of recording and acting from that, and it's no longer the activity of thought, which is time. Therefore insight is the action of a mind that is not caught in time.

I don't know how far one has understood this, or gone into it even verbally or intellectually. And then, if there is that insight and that intelligence, and we said, intelligence goes, must always go with love and affection, have compassion, then what is the action of such a mind, in a world of violence, of degeneration and all the things that are happening around us? What is the action of such a mind? We've come to that so far.

And we also said, is there an action in which thought as the actor - is there an action without the actor? Can we discuss a little bit, that? The actor is the observer, the actor is the self-centred accumulation of activities, the various forms of various remembrances, recollections, the whole process of recording, as the individual. And from that we have acted. And that is separative, exclusive, and isolating. When there is isolation there must be conflict, obviously. So is there an action which is not individualistic in the sense we have described it and therefore without the actor?

All this may sound rather intellectual, verbal and perhaps nonsensical, but if one examines very closely, really earnestly and goes into it deeply, it is not. And the individual has always sought experience. Experience, not only a doctor or a surgeon who has had a great deal of experience and therefore skilful with his hands and mind and so on, that's one kind of experience. Any other kind of psychological experience implies that there is a centre which is experiencing. I don't know if you are following all this.

And the experience must be recognized, which means it has already had an inclination of it. So a mind that is free of the individual - may I go on? - has no experience. Won't somebody catch me out?

Q: Because it's experience that stabilizes the sense of individuality.

K: Sir, look - experience as a good driver, as an engineer, as a skilful surgeon, a carpenter, he has accumulated a great deal of knowledge and according to that knowledge he skilfully acts, performs. And that's one kind of experience. The so-called spiritual experience the word 'spiritual' I don't like to use, the so-called psychological experiences only exist when there is a centre from which the experiencer is experiencing. I wonder if you get it?

Q: Why is that necessary, you see - why is it necessary to have this centre.

K: The centre has been formed, has been accumulated through generations.

Q: That's memory.

K: That's memory. That is, the tradition, the various impressions, pressures, all that has created the centre.

Q: And the memory of all the pain and pleasure.

K: Memory involves pain and pleasure, obviously, which we talked about the other day. So I'm saying, sir, or asking, we have always sought mystical experiences. Right? So-called spiritual experiences, something more than the ordinary, sensory self-limiting experiences, something more. I question that whole mystical search and experience.

Q: If it's not an experience, then how do you distinguish...

K: That's just it. If it is not an experience, the doctor asks, then what takes place?

Q: Do you have the feeling, I mean, experience include the feeling, sensation - does it?

K: No. This is really - are you interested in all this?

Q: Yes.

K: Why? (Laughter) Sir we've had every kind of experience. Right? We have had different kinds of experience, sensory, emotional, romantic, experience of so-called love, intellectual, all that, experiences of cultivating knowledge. Right?

Q: Something you do, something you go through?

K: Yes, there is something we do.

Q: And we experience...

K: And there are experiences which the so-called mystics have. Right?

Q: What do they claim their experiences are?

K: I don't think it is an experience.

Q: But they say, some people say...

K: Some people say it is an experience, suddenly the whole world is me, suddenly the universe and me don't exist.

Q: Now why is that wrong?

K: Wait, I'm coming to that. I want to first get the thing clear. There is sense of universal harmony, universal something or other. That means there is a recording taking place. Right?

Q: It may.

K: No, it must.

Q: If they have a centre in it.

K: Yes, that's my whole point. As long as there is a centre which is experiencing this spiritual, this super

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 30TH DECEMBER 1978

I hope you will not mind if I do not speak as was intended this afternoon at 5 o'clock under the trees, because as it is raining it is impossible, so I hope you won't mind if we turn this into a discussion, or a dialogue. Would that be all right?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes, good. First of all what shall we talk about together? Not some fanciful, theoretical, superstitious ideals but rather something that is actually in our daily life that we can live with and bring about a different quality of mind in ourselves. So if I may ask what would you like to talk about, discuss. It is easy to ask questions, quite easy, but in the very asking of the question, if it is really a question which is serious, demanding a great deal of attention, care, such a question is worthwhile; but if you ask some kind of superficial rather obvious question then I am afraid it won't be. And to ask the right question is also very difficult, because if you ask the right question one is apt to get the right answer. So what shall we talk about?

Q: You said, give me a way of life in which there is no need for transformation.

K: Is there a way of life which doesn't demand transformation. Any other questions? That isn't the only question surely?

Q: What is the quality of innocence, and its relationship to intelligence?

K: The quality of innocence and its relationship to intelligence. Is there a way of life which doesn't demand transformation - transformation being change; and what is the relationship between intelligence and innocence. Won't you all play the game, it's in your court.

Q: How do we know transformation instantly?

K: Is that a serious question, sir - how to bring about transformation instantly.

Q: Has healthy competition a place?

K: Has healthy competition a place in society.

Q: What is death?

K: Perhaps you would ask this audience!

Q: What is the reason for poverty?

K: What is the reason for poverty.

Q: What is the purpose of life?

K: What is the purpose of life.

Q: In spite of listening to Krishnaji for a number of years violence is persisting in me, how am I to get over it?

K: I have listened to you for a number of years, why isn't there a radical change in me?

Q: Violence persists.

K: Violence still goes on. I have listened to you for a number of years - most unfortunately - and violence still goes on in my life.

Now that's enough of these questions. So let us see which is the best of them and try to answer all the questions perhaps by choosing one of them, if we could go into it seriously. You said, can there be a change, a way of living, without transformation; what is the relationship between innocence and intelligence; what is death; and what is the purpose of life, and so on. Now which of these questions would you like to take and go into it in detail seriously, if you are so inclined? Because after all this is a serious meeting, not just an afternoon to be spent in a room when it is raining.

I think if we could take the question: is there a possibility, a way of life which doesn't demand any kind of change. Could we take that? Would that be worthwhile? Isn't the question itself rather absurd? Because one wants to live, one wants to find a way of life which doesn't demand effort, change, transformation. Which means one must be totally satisfied with one's own way of living, or a way of life in which there is no conflict, no pain, no suffering. Is that it? Do you want to discuss that? Is that what you want, to find a way of living where - in which, rather - there is no need for any kind of change?

Q: Sir, why do you say that in that particular life there would be no conflict - why do you speculate?

K: I don't speculate.

Q: You said that just now.

K: I know. I said is there a way of life in which...

Q: There is no need for transformation.

K:... there is no need for transformation.

Q: It need not be so. That is the problem.

K: Just a minute, sir. I am going into the question. A way of life in which there is no need for change. Aren't most of us satisfied with our way of living? You might be a little discontented, dissatisfied, and there are slight peripheral changes, but most of us prefer, don't we, I am just asking, for things to remain as they are, status quo, hoping that it will remain that way. If you are a Hindu, or a Muslim, or a Catholic, or whatever it is, we don't want to be disturbed. We want to have our beliefs, our homes, our families completely secure. And we are satisfied with that. And that doesn't demand any kind of transformation, we are satisfied as we are. But the moment you begin to question the way we are living, the society in which we live, the so-called culture, the so-called beliefs, the moment you begin to question those you inevitably bring about a sort of disturbance. Don't we? And most of us don't like to be disturbed.

So we should in answering this question, go into why human beings remain in a narrow groove of their own beliefs, of their own rituals, of their own gods, of their own conclusions, either communist, socialist, liberal, conservative, or various forms of political principles and dogmas. Why do we live that way? Would that be a right question? Why do we accept to live a life in which there is absolutely no security, in which there is constant struggle, competition, uncertainty, confusion and so on - infinite divisions, why do we live that way? And when we perceive that, don't we ask ourselves, if we are at all serious, is there a possibility of changing all that?

Q: (In French)

K: The gentleman asks, sir, is there a way of living which doesn't demand transformation. So I am asking first, to find out if there is a way of living which doesn't demand transformation, we must begin with the life that we lead everyday. From that can we find out the way we live with all its complexities and see if there is a possibility of living a life which is totally different, without any question of transformation. So shouldn't we begin - to go very far shouldn't we begin very near? Would you accept that?

Q: Yes. The complexity is there, it is a reality.

K: What do you mean?

Q: The complexities of our life, it is there. I am not perceiving that. When I question it, I believe there must be another way.

K: No, sir.

Q: I am not postulating, when I postulate I begin to think there must be another way, whereas just seeing the complexity is there, because you are trying to speculate.

K: No, sir I am not. I am not trying to speculate anything. I am saying first, if there is a way - to answer your question - if there is a way of life which doesn't demand transformation. So I am examining the way of our life, present life, now: the way we live, the way we think, the way we feel, all our life is a constant struggle - which is an obvious fact. Now can all that be changed without any effort? That is the basic question, sir, if I understand it rightly. All right, sir?

Can we say, sir, that most of our lives, our everyday life, which is not a speculation, not a theory, not something that should be, but actually what is our daily life, and can that daily life with all its complexities be changed. Right? Do you want to go into that? Sir, please, do you want to?

Q: I don't think that is his question.

K: Then what is his question?

Q: I think his question is why don't we deal with the problems as they are, why do we change at all.

K: Why should we change at all. Don't!

Q: I don't think...

K: Sir, I said before, if you are satisfied with things as they are, be satisfied, there is nothing more to be said. But if one is enquiring into this whole human structure, human behaviour, human conduct, human way of living, if we want to enquire into that seriously, let's discuss that. That's all. If you don't, if you say, let everything remain as it is and you are satisfied with it, there is nothing more to be said.

So can we discuss, have a dialogue, a conversation between two friends who have met seriously and say, we have problems in life, various types - political, religious and so on - can we talk about those problems seriously and try to find out if these problems can be eradicated. That is the reason of this dialogue. If you are not interested in that, then what are you interested in; and if I can answer what you are interested in, let's do it.

Q: Sir, there is discontentment existing in our life all the time. And it is also pointed out that there is a discontentment existing in itself, and from that there could be a right action.

K: The same thing which we are going into now. Most of us are discontented, most of us are dissatisfied, most of us want to find a way of living where discontent, conflict, violence doesn't exist, all that doesn't exist. Now first of all, what is it we are discontented with? Is the discontentment superficial - I am asking, sir, I am just enquiring, going into the question - is it superficial in the sense, I want a better house, or more money, or better position, I want to become the Prime Minister, this or that. So I would call all those things rather superficial. But we are discontented not only with the superficial things, but also deeply, if one is serious and concerned, one is deeply discontented with things as they are - with society, with politics, with religion, in our relationship with each other, almost with everything, if one is enquiring, serious, one is totally dissatisfied.

Q: We are discontented.

K: So let's find out if one is so seriously discontented, what shall we do? Shall we become communists? Shall we become...

Q: No.

K: Listen, sir, let me go on a little bit and you will see. Shall we become communists, or join a new sect, a new guru, a new ideologist, a new Lenin, a new Marx, a new Mao, or go back to the Upanishads, the Gita, or go back to some theory? So what shall we do? You understand my question, sirs?

Q: We have come to rather a dead end.

K: I am going into it, sir. Suppose I am dissatisfied, I don't know what about, but I am dissatisfied. Suppose, I am taking that as an example. So I say, being dissatisfied I am trying to find satisfaction. That's the reaction to my dissatisfaction. So I start out with dissatisfaction, discontent, a burning sense of revolt, and I want to act, I want to do something about it. Then I join either a party, a political party, a socialist party, or ideological group and I begin to identify my dissatisfaction with that, and so hope to lose thereby my dissatisfaction. I hope you are following all this. If you are not interested, it's all right. That is, being dissatisfied I identify myself with a group, with a community, with some principle, with some belief, with some society, with some guru, or a political principal. And thereby I hope I will lose my discontent. This is generally what happens in the world. One must be aware of this, surely.

And this very identification out of dissatisfaction brings about a great division between people. Right? Please, sir, this is a discussion, this is not a discourse by me.

Q: Is this a primary identification with dissatisfaction itself?

Q: I think the suggestion is of dissatisfaction itself.

K: Of course, of course. When we say - I am going into it slowly, sir, let's go into it slowly and we will come to this question. Why do we, as human beings, identify ourselves with something? You understand? Why? Don't you identify yourself with a class of people? As a Brahmin, non-Brahmin, as an Indian, a Muslim, a Christian, a Buddhist - that's a form of identification, why do we do this? Sir, why don't you discuss this?

Q: We think we have security in that, that's why we identify.

K: So you identify yourself with the nation, as Indians, because in that there is security. And you identify yourself with a group, hoping thereby to find a security. Or identify yourself with a guru, and so on and so. So this identification is born out of the desire for security. Right? Would you accept that?

Q: Also for satisfying material needs.

K: Yes, it means that.

Q: Not only psychological needs.

K: Not only material needs but also psychological needs. If you are in a country that is purely Catholic, or communist, you identify yourself with it in order to earn a livelihood, if you don't you are thrown out, or put into a camp, or tortured, or whatever it is. So this constant desire to identify oneself with a principle, with an idea, is to find security. Now when each one of us does that, what is the result of it, the consequences of it? I identify myself with India and you identify - no. I identify myself with a Muslim, and you are a Hindu, or a Buddhist, or whatever it is, what takes place between us?

Q: Discontentment.

Q: We are broken up.

K: Just watch it, sir, what is happening in the world.

Q: Hatred.

Q: You form a suppression, and I form a suppression.

K: What happens, what is the consequence?

Q: We are not meeting at all.

Q: Conflict.

Q: There is a division, sir.

K: That's right, sir, just hold that. There is a division. And when there is a division what takes place?

Q: Conflict.

K: You see what is happening, sir. China, Russia - that's what is going on, there is division. Though they talk about being communist, in that very monolithic idea there is division. Where there is division there must be conflict - the Hindu, the Muslim, the Jew, the Arab, and so on and so on. Where there is division there must be conflict, it is inevitable. So seeing that, why do you identify yourself with India, or identify yourself with a particular group of people as the Brahmins, or non-Brahmins, anti-Brahmin, pro-Brahmin, this or that - why? Knowing that it will create division, and that division will bring about conflict which will destroy your security. You start out wanting security, and identify yourself with some group, and thereby bring about a division, and that division implies conflict, violence, brutality, torture, and so your desire for security is denied. This is obvious, isn't it sir? No?

Q: No.

K: Then why do you call yourself a Hindu?

Q: I don't, sir.

K: Wait, sir, I am asking. You don't call yourself a Hindu, all right. What do you say sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, can you be totally unidentified with any belief, with any society, with any group, can you remain that way? That means being absolutely alone. Can you? Answer sir, you started out discussing.

Q: It is possible to remain like that provided you know that all conflict stems from identification.

K: Sir, I have just explained that all conflict arises, part of it, through division. You hear that statement, that where there is division between man and woman, between human beings, black, white, purple, whatever their colour is, wherever there is division there must be conflict. That's a law. You hear that statement, you hear it with the ear, and what does it mean to you? You understand my question, sir? You hear a statement of that kind: where there is division there must be conflict, there must be violence. That's a statement, that's a law. And you hear that, and what do you do with it? Please, tell me. I am enquiring. We are enquiring, we are having a conversation with each other. What do you do with it?

Q: You compare it with our own experience.

K: No, sir, I am asking. You compare what is being said with your own experience? You know what you are saying? I tell you something, would you listen to it, or do you say, I must compare what you say with something else? So you actually are not listening. Your whole mind is occupied with comparison, so you are actually not listening - are you?

Q: Can one do anything about it?

K: Shouldn't you, if you want to live safely, to live peacefully.

Q: What could one do?

K: I am going to tell you. Don't be a Hindu; or a Muslim, or belong to any society, any group of people. That's what is happening in the world, sir.

Q: Looking into myself I find that this kind of identification is very rigorous in our daily life, that is why we are going into things.

K: God is very vigorous in one's life - what did you say sir?

Q: No. Looking into myself I find in my daily life that this kind of identification arises only in a very small measure.

K: Yes, sir, that's what I am saying.

Q: He says it exists in a very small measure in our daily life.

Q: Discontentment and conflict arises when we get into the groove that we already belong.

K: Yes, sir, agree. But I am asking you, sir, if I may, most respectfully, you hear a statement of that kind, the kind which has just been repeated: where there is division there must be conflict, there must be violence and destruction and therefore there is no security in division. And yet we maintain that division in our daily life, why do we do this, knowing division is corrupt, division brings about violence and all the rest of it, why do we keep to that division?

Q: We are not capable.

Q: There is some difficulty because of the fear of insecurity.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, look, sir, I have asked a question and you don't reply to it, you go off saying something else. I am asking sir, most gently and respectfully, you hear a statement of this kind, that where there is division there must be conflict and so the destruction of security - you hear that, what do you do with it? Do you still remain a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Vishnu-ite, or some other little god or this or that, do you?

Q: A good Christian can never be a threat to a Hindu or a Muslim.

K: Oh gosh, you see how clever we are. So you remain a good Christian and he will remain a good Hindu. And the division is kept. Sir, please, just listen, sir. Why do you waste your time? You are not interested in this, are you? To wipe away division. This is a very important question, sir. This is what is happening in the world.

Q: Sir, I remain with the division because I do not know what else to do.

K: I'll show you. First I'll go into it carefully, sir. First you must listen to it, mustn't you? You must listen to this statement. Do you listen to the statement? Or do you say, yes, that statement sounds right because some other guru has said it, or some book said it - so you are not actually listening. Are you? So first, please, I beg of you since you have come on a rainy day and are uncomfortable and all the rest of it, I am pointing out that where there is division there must be conflict and war. Now you hear that statement.

Q: Sir...

K: Wait.

Q: The reason of this division does not encourage conflict if there is no self and we have evolved.

K: If there is no selfishness then everything would be perfect. But there is selfishness. It's a lovely theory. You see, sir, this is what I am saying, you indulge in theories - if we were gods everything would be all right. But we are not gods. So I am just asking you sir, do you listen to what is being said? Then we can proceed after having listened carefully to what you are saying, then we can investigate how to live a life in which there is no division. First I must listen. It's like a seed planted in the earth, the earth must have good soil. You can't plant a seed on a rock. It is important that we understand this. And having listened carefully then we can proceed, from facts only, not from theories. The fact being you are a Hindu, and I am a Muslim. Why does this take place? Why am I a Muslim? Why are you a Hindu? Is it our conditioning? You understand my question? From childhood I have been told I am a Muslim - Muslim, Muslim - or whatever it is. And you are told from childhood, that you are a Hindu - or a Parsi, or a Christian, or whatever it is. So this division exists because we are both conditioned as a Muslim, as a Hindu - conditioned. Do you see that sirs? It is a vast propaganda. Would you agree to that?

Q: Sir, nothing and nobody can exist except with identification and in duality, and nothing can exist in unity. What can we do about it?

K: You are talking about duality, what can we do about it.

Q: He said, nothing can exist without identification, nothing can exist without duality, what can we do about it.

K: I am doing, I am pointing out something. We can do a great deal to put away this division. We are going into it. You are not.

Are you interested in this, sirs? Or is it just words, words, words? If I am a Hindu or a Muslim, and I realize that it is bringing about conflict, being reasonable, sane, healthy minded, I say, 'I won't be a Hindu' - it is finished. There is no conflict involved in it because it is so reasonable, so logical, so sane. So I put away my insanity, which is my saying, I am a Muslim. Will you do that?

Q: We are content with one conflict.

K: Wait, I am just asking that question, don't, if you don't mind, go off into another question. You have heard a reasonable, logical, sane statement, and will you put that away, being a Hindu, will you drop it?

Q: I don't know. The difficulty for me would be dropping away being a Christian. The moment I drop it I fear I am something else.

K: Yes.

Q: I am not a Christian, but I am something else.

K: The moment I say I am dropping it I feel a certain sense of emptiness, a certain sense of loneliness, a certain sense of having no relationship with others who identify themselves with something else. You understand this? My question is, sir, if you will kindly answer it, will you drop your being a Hindu? Or a Christian, or a Buddhist, or across the river, or this or that, will you drop it?

Q: We should drop it.

K: The gentleman says, we should drop it. Sometime in the future when it is convenient! Sir, you understand how serious this all is, sir. You must know what is happening in the world: every little business, every little community, every little state is breaking away, separate, they are bringing about fragmentation in the world.

Where there is fragmentation there can never be any question of living peacefully. And apparently you are not interested in it. So I am asking what is your mind, what is the quality of your mind that you won't even act when it is logical, sane, reasonable? Why don't you? What is the quality of your mind, sirs? You have taken the trouble to come all the way in the rain, and all the rest of it, and you are sitting in a hot room, I am asking, why don't you do something.

Q: I find that after many times of being asked by Indians what my religion is, when I try to explain that I identify with no one religion, I find this often causes conflict in the Indians because they identify with being a Muslim, or Hindu or Buddhist. Whereas if I say that I am Hindu or Buddhist, then it doesn't bring a conflict, because I find many people cannot understand not identifying with any one religion.

Q: He says when he is asked what religion he belongs to, and he says I belong to no religion, there is always conflict in the other because they are either Hindus or Muslims.

K: When I say I do not belong to any religion, or any political party, this or that, it causes conflict in the other. It should! I am glad it causes conflict in the other. At least he is awakening to something that he hasn't thought about it. You haven't answered my question, sir. You see, puja, which probably many of you do, is so nonsensical, meaningless. Right? Would you agree it is unreasonable, illogical, superstitious, a routine, like repeating something which you don't know the meaning of, offering some prayers to some god which you have invented - the gods are your invention - no?

Q: No, sir, they serve a purpose.

K: Are you saying your gods serve a purpose?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I give up! If one realizes the dreadful things that are going on in the world - I won't enumerate them because I have been in America, Europe and all over the world, except Russia and China, the things that are happening in the field of war, preparing for wars, the defence mechanism and all the rest of it, the appalling things that are taking place, of which very few people seem to know, or be aware of, human beings must do something about all this insanity that is going on - the insanity that is going on in this country, the lawlessness, the disorder. And when you see all this, one asks, why do human beings put up with all this? They are supposed to be intelligent.

Q: How can we be aware, know, investigate into ourselves?

K: How can you be aware, know, investigate into yourself. You understand my question, sir? This is what Mrs Jayakar is asking. How am I, who have never thought about any of these things, as most people have not, how am I going to learn? Learn, not repeat, learn how to be aware. May we discuss that a little? Would that interest you? If it doesn't, it doesn't matter.

I want to learn to know myself. Learn, I mean not imitate what other people have said about me - the psychologists, the analysts, the professors, all the gurus and all the rest of it. I want to know what I am, I want to learn about myself. Now learning is one of the most difficult things in life because we learn as a way of memorizing, learning to us is memorize, and with that memory we try to understand ourselves. You understand what I am saying? Are you following this sirs? So we must be very clear when we talk about learning what we mean by that word, and is it possible to learn without being told how to learn, what to learn, and be free of the outside influences that teach me how to learn. You understand my question, because I want to know myself, I am not interested in what Sankara, or Buddha or XYZ said, I want to know what I am. So how shall I begin? Where shall I begin? You understand my question, sirs? No?

Q: What do you mean by free myself from outside influences?

K: I am going to show it to you in a minute, sir.

Q: I mean they are there. Because when you put that technique you separate them in your mind.

K: No, not in the least. It's in your mind, it is not in my mind. I am very clear about it. I said I want to know myself. I want to know my thoughts, why I do certain things, I want to learn about myself, sir. I am curious. I am very curious to find out why I do this, why I don't do that, why I go to church, or don't go to church, why I do all these things, why I belong to a political party, why I am a Hindu - all that. Because all that is me. Right? I wonder if you understand this. So I want to be aware, learn what I am. Which means I am not going to accept any authority. Right? The authority of Freud, Jung, or your guru, or the Upanishads, the Gita, nothing, I am not going to accept a single authority. Because all these books have led me to a miserable life. Look at your faces, that's enough.

So where am I to begin to learn? I begin to learn where I can look, observe, not theories, not speculations, when I can observe. I can observe in my relationship with another. Do you understand? My relationship with my wife, if I have one, or with my husband, with my girl friend, or my friend, I observe myself in relationship to another. Because in that observation I see my reaction, that I lie, that I am greedy, that I am envious, that I am frightened, that I am lonely, miserable. In that reaction I find myself. Right? Right, sirs? So I begin to learn about myself in relationship to another, and the relationship awakens my reactions - I am jealous when I see my wife, or my husband looking at somebody else, or having fun with somebody else, so I become jealous. So I am - please listen - I am learning what jealousy is. Are you doing that as we are talking? Or are you just listening? Are you listening as I am explaining?

In my reactions with regard to my relationship with another, intimate, or not intimate, I begin to find out the state of my responses, so I discover that I am jealous, I discover I don't like people, I discover I am envious. So what am I to do? I discover that I am envious - aren't you? Aren't you envious? Don't be ashamed to acknowledge something which is so common. Now envy implies measurement, doesn't it? Or is that too difficult? I envy you because you have got a bright mind. I envy you because you have got a car. I envy you because you have got a status in a rotten society. I envy you because you write books, you talk, you are brilliant, and I am not. What does that comparison mean?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am leading to something, follow it, sir, please. Which is, in comparing myself with you who have got a house, a car, a position, money, I am envious. And envy implies comparison. Right? Right? Can I live - please listen - can I live without comparison? Have you ever tried to live without comparison? No comparison whatsoever.

Q: What happens when you are hungry?

K: You eat, if you can. Oh, you are so silly, you people.

Q: I am dominated by others.

K: You are dominated by others. Wait, you have discovered. Now just a minute, sir. You are dominated by others, your mother, your father, your wife, your husband, or whatever it is, you are dominated. Why? You learn about it, sir. Don't say it is right or wrong, you learn, find out why you are dominated. Why? Go on, sir, explain. You are dominated, aren't you?

Q: Because we are weak. I am weak.

K: Sir, I am asking.

Q: Because I am afraid of them, and I have no security.

K: Please sir, don't go back to security everlastingly. We have gone through that. I want to know myself, not according to books, not according to Isvara, or Buddha or anybody. I want to know about myself, because if I don't know myself I have no basis of any kind of lasting relationship with another. You understand? What is the matter with you? Are you all tired?

Q: Learning to know yourself implies violence.

K: I am going to point out something so please kindly listen, it may be something new you have not heard. I first said envy arises through comparison. Right? Do you dispute that?

Q: No.

K: Good. Why do you compare? I compare myself with you, and I said you are more bright, more brilliant, clever, nice looking and all the rest of it. And by comparing myself with you I make myself imitate you. Right? I want to be like you. So what does that make me? You understand? If I want to be like you what have I done to myself? Oh, for god's sake.

Q: The moment you ask that question, if I may say so, you are condemning the factor of envy.

K: I am not.

Q: If you are not condemning it and you are just learning about envy, and you are just exploring into the discovery of what I am, then envy is, it comes into being from several factors, it exists. Are you saying, can I be free of envy at this stage?

K: Yes, I think at this stage.

Q: Then you are bringing into it a totally new set of...

K: Of ideas.

Q:... of ideas and action.

K: No.

Q: If you are only learning...

K: I am only learning, the very learning is the very action. I am not separating learning from action.

Q: That is what I think.

K: Yes, I know. Sir, there are two ways of learning. Learning by accumulating knowledge, and acting from knowledge. That is, I learn to be an engineer, all the complications of accumulating knowledge of being an engineer, then I go out in the world and apply that knowledge skilfully or unskilfully. There is the other way, which is, go out, act, from that action accumulate knowledge. You understand? You have understood? So both spring from knowledge. You understand? Is this clear?

Q: Yes, it's clear.

K: Thank god, thank god somebody understands. So that is, knowledge is always in the past. Right? There is no knowledge of the future, unless you project what you have known, modified, and that becomes the future. I won't go into it.

So I am learning about envy, and I see measurement, comparison, is the beginning of envy. I am learning. And in the very act of learning there is action to end envy. I don't separate learning from action. I don't learn, accumulate knowledge, and then act. But in the very act of learning I see the enormous implications of envy and therefore end it. You understand?

Q: I hope you are not trying to end and therefore learn. In the very process of learning you have dropped envy.

K: You haven't understood what I said. Sir, you hear a statement, and from that statement you make an idea of it, don't you, and act according to that idea. Whereas pure observation, the very observation is the acting. When you see a cobra, or some poisonous animal, you don't speculate about it, you don't draw a conclusion, you act. The very perception is the action. With most of us there is perception, an interval of time, which is the idea, and the idea is not actual and so on, we get lost in that. So I am pointing out that most people are envious, envy arises through comparison, and learn to live without comparison and see what happens. Learn, and therefore act from that learning.

Q: May I ask you something?

K: Yes.

Q: Is this learning separate from observation?

K: No Oh lord. Sir, I don't want to go into all this, it is too difficult. There are three arts one must learn: the art of observation, the art of hearing, the art of learning; they are not three separate things but we divide them for convenience. There's the art of listening, which means, I listen to what you say, I don't bring in my own ideas, my own prejudices, my own opinions, I listen to find out what you want to say to me. And I observe, I don't bring opinions about what I observe. Right? So there is only observation, not my opinion about what I am observing. And the art of learning is not merely accumulating knowledge and to act, but the act of listening, the act of observing implies learning and acting, they are all one. Is this all Greek to you?

Q: That means that way of looking is a way of life?

K: Yes, sir. If you do it, that is the way of life. If you listen to your wife, or you say, 'I know her, it doesn't matter'. But if you listen to her she will tell you lots. That's why life, sir, is a way of listening, perceiving, learning. And when you know those three arts, then you live a life of complete awareness.

Now, all right. You have heard all this, where are you? Just as before? You haven't changed, or moved, you haven't learnt, or heard, are you just carrying on? I am asking sir, please kindly - I have talked, so kindly talk to me.

Q: We have learnt envy arises out of comparison. Now the moment the envy arises, then I see what happens, then I am rather confused, I want the end of envy.

K: Learning is never ending.

Q: The immediate reaction is to drop it.

K: Sir, first of all, I say please listen, sir. Listen. Not how to drop envy. Just listen. Have you ever listened to your wife? Or your husband, or your girl friend, or whatever it is, have you listened to any friend? All right. I am your friend, will you listen to me? I am not trying to convince you of a thing. I am not a propagandist. I don't care if you listen, don't listen, but since you have taken the trouble to come here have the goodness, the courtesy to listen. To listen implies you don't interject your opinions, your conclusions, your beliefs, you want to learn, you want to hear what I have to say. You know what you think, what you feel but you haven't listened to what I have to say. So first learn to listen. Can you?

Q: Yes.

K: Oh, no, sir. Sir, you say, yes. It is one of the most...

Q: Now.

K: Now, because I have put you in a corner.

Q: Put me in a corner.

K: I don't want to put you in a corner. We are learning. We are not putting anybody in a corner, forcing anybody, we are learning: learning about envy, the whole complexity of envy. When you say, I compare this building with another building, when you say, I compare this picture with another picture, when you compare this picture with that picture you are not looking at the picture, one picture, you are always comparing, comparing.

So can you live a life - listen to it, listen to it - can you live a life without comparing at all?

Q: Is it possible to see without opinions?

K: Of course, sir. Look. This is a microphone, isn't it? We both agree this is a microphone. Why do I have to have an opinion about it? Facts...

Q: I cannot see without my opinions when I look at you.

K: Why should I have an opinion about you and you have an opinion about me, why? Why do you have a conclusion about me? Otherwise you wouldn't be here, would you? Just enquire, sir, whether you can observe something, observe yourself, observe another, without saying he is a Greek, he is a Roman, he is a Jew, he is an Arab, just to observe without an opinion. Can you? Then you observe, but if you interject between your observation and the thing you are observing, your prejudice, you don't observe. It's so simple. That is the art of learning, sir.

Q: When you see humanity without comparing, without what you know before, you can't see.

K: You can. You see, please sir, you have learnt to compare, that's our conditioning from childhood. 'A' is compared with 'B', 'B' gets better marks, he is more intelligent, so 'A' is sacrificed and 'B' becomes important, and on that conditioning we are brought up. And I am saying, look, such conditioning is destructive, because perhaps if you don't compare you will find out what you are actually. But if I say, I must be like Mr 'D', I hope not, I am just imitating, conforming. You don't understand all this.

Q: Reaction comes instantly.

K: The reaction comes instantly. Sir, if you are learning about your reactions, learning, they never come quickly. You are watching, learning. You understand? I wish you would understand. I wish we could communicate with each other, it is so simple, all this. I am learning about my reactions: I am jealous, I am envious, greedy, or I want power, position, or domination, and so on. Now when I am learning every reaction, you follow, there is no quickness about it, it comes slowly as I move in it. No? Have you ever tried it?

Q: In learning what is the role of talking?

K: What is the role of talking. It is half past six. Shouldn't we stop? An hour and a half. You must be nearly asleep, aren't you?

At the end of the day.

Q: What about the mind?

K: What about the mind. You will hear it tomorrow, or Sunday, Monday, another time. First mind - I'll just explain quickly - mind includes the brain, all the retentive memories, experiences, knowledge of humanity, mind includes your feelings, your sensitivity, it includes your love, your affection, your compassion, all that, the whole totality of human existence is the mind. You might say, that is not the mind, that is the intellect. All right, include the intellect also in the mind. The intellect, the emotions, the sensations, all the accumulated knowledge, both scientific knowledge, technological knowledge, all the generations upon generations that have accumulated experiences, all that is part of the mind. And if that mind is not totally unconditioned it is no longer a mind, it is just a machine operating. That's enough.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC TALK 31ST DECEMBER 1978 'THE ART OF LEARNING'

First of all I would like to point out, if I may, that this is not a propaganda, not a new set of ideas, a new set of beliefs, or setting oneself as a guru; but together we are going to talk over our many problems. The implications in talking over together are that as there are so many of you one cannot possibly communicate with each one, but if we are able to think together, not agreeing or disagreeing, but able to think clearly, objectively, sanely, and that implies that you are not prejudiced, that you don't start out with a lot of opinions, judgements, opposing arguments. We are not dealing with arguments, or with opinions. We are trying, actually doing, trying to find out a way of life in which we understand the total complexity of our lives.

So if I may point out that to think together implies, does it not, that you approach the problems, that you approach without any previous conclusions, previous ideas, or beliefs. We are thinking together. And that implies that you must exercise your brains and not go to sleep, not accept.

First of all we must look at the problems that surround us, both outwardly and inwardly. We must first examine clearly what the outward things are, what is going on in the world. Because we have to think globally, not provincially, not with a class mind or a sectarian mind, believing in one thing and contradicting what you believe by your actions and so on. So we are together examining, clearly if we can, what is happening in the world, outside us, not only environmentally but politically, religiously, ecologically.

Because if you don't examine from the outside accurately, as far as one can, it is very difficult to examine oneself accurately. You must begin with the outer and come inwards - like a tide that goes out and comes in. It is the same movement, the world outside us is not different from us. But at least we can clearly observe what is happening around us. And we have at least a criteria from which we can work inwardly. I hope that is clear.

First we are together going to examine what is happening around us in every possible way, if we can, with the fact which we have. And we have not many facts because we are dealing with politicians, with so-called rulers, right throughout the world. And they are governing us. And if you observe each in country, a group of people are concerned about their own little area. This is obvious. And if you further examine, not only they are concerned with their own little area of a vast field, which is the world, but also that little area is broken up, fragmented more and more and more. So there is fragmentation going on in the world - nationally, religiously, politically, economically. Breaking up. It is so obvious in this country, and in the rest of the world.

So there is fragmentation, not only politically but also within oneself. We are broken up human beings, we are not whole. That's clear. And each nation is fighting the other nation - the Hindu, the Muslim and so on and so on. And one has relied, one has hoped that politics will save man. And it has not saved man. On the contrary it has brought about much more suffering through wars, through division. One has hoped through science man would break through. And that also has failed, economically and so on. We have relied on politics for the saving of man; we have relied on religions for the saving of man; we have relied on science, which is the accumulation of knowledge in action, we have relied on that, and none of these have helped man. They may have given man a little corner somewhere or other but it has been a constant struggle. It is obvious.

And we have also seen that no organization of any kind, whether of the left, the right, or the centre, the communist, the socialist, no organization of any kind is going to save man. Right? I hope you will see that. Even small communities are not going to save man, because it is a world problem, a global problem, and it must be dealt with globally, with a global mind, not with a little sectarian, parochial, narrow little mind.

So organizations have failed. Institutions have failed. The gurus multiplying like so many - what shall we say - mushrooms all over the world, and they are not going to save man. On the contrary; they make their own little whirlpool, little noise, little - you know what they are doing so I don't have to tell you all that. So what is going to save man, because we are now, when you observe what is happening in the world - preparation for war, four hundred thousand million dollars are spent on armaments every year by all the governments. All the governments put together are spending four hundred thousand million dollars every year. That is totally insane. Right?

So when you see all this, what is man to do? You understand my question? What are you to do? Where shall we start with the reformation of man? We have tried every way to resolve these problems. We have had principles, extraordinary ideals, great theories, volumes of sacred books - so-called sacred books, no book is sacred, including the Gita, Upanishads or the Bible, or even the Koran.

So we have tried everything to resolve our problems - the Mao people in China, Lenin and his group in Russia, the Capitalists, the Socialists, the Liberals, every way we have tried. So in looking at all this, with all their divisions and fragmentations, with their confusion, and every human being against another human being, one guru against another guru, my guru is better than yours, he is more peaceful than yours, he knows and you don't know, and so on and on and on. I hope you realize how serious all this is.

So this is not a gathering of an evening which you casually attend and forget. We are gathered for a serious purpose. And that serious quality depends on you, whether you are being challenged, whether you accept the challenge, or you just pass it by. Various cultures have failed, including the culture of this country. So when you observe all these outward signs of violence, terrorism, brutality, enormous cruelty and torture, and politicians fighting for power, and so on, when you see all this, and you are challenged: what is a human being to do? What are you to do? Where do you begin? Because man, human beings like you and me, we are now facing a great crisis of humanity. I do not know if you realize it. And we must respond to that crisis which is a challenge accurately.

So realizing all this, who is going to save man? You understand my question? Who is going to save you, to save you from your confusion, from your conflict, from your suffering, from your constant contradictions, from your envy, from your petty nationalism, from the gurus which you have accepted with their authority? So when you observe this surely there is only one answer. Since organizations have no value any more, since leaders cannot help us, since no book is going to give freedom to each one of us, so one can only begin with oneself. Right? I hope we are in communication with each other. Communication implies sharing; sharing in our thinking, in our feeling, in observing what is going on, and demanding of ourselves the highest capacity to act correctly. So from the outward we are moving inward. It is the same movement, the world is not different from us. We have made this miserable world. We have made it. No gods, no external agency, we human beings have created this society in which we live, with all its corruption, with all its malignant superstitions, with all its absurd gods. We have made this. The national class divisions. Please see all this.

So we must begin with ourselves. Right? Nobody on earth, or in heaven, is going to save us. No book, no guru, no system, no method, no leader, no hero, no prince. Right? We have to begin with ourselves and see if we can transform ourselves, if we can change radically from the very root of our being so that we have a free mind, not a mind that is broken up, corrupt, fearful, anxious, greedy, in sorrow. So is that possible? You understand my question? Right sir? Am I making this clear? Is the speaker making this clear?

So to go very far you must begin very near. 'Very near' is you. That's why we are asking: what is the quality of your thought, what is the quality of your mind that is willing, seeing what is happening, demanding that it must change the society in which we live, a different kind of education, different kinds of global government, and so on and so on. So are we as human beings, you, willing or desirous, or deeply serious to find out, to investigate the whole human structure, psychological and religious, to see if it is possible for every human being who is good enough to listen to all this, whether he can investigate into himself. You understand sirs? Right?

So I am asking: what is the state of your mind, your consciousness that is serious enough to investigate? You understand my question? Are you serious? Or you want to spend a pleasant evening under a tree - not that it is not beautiful after the rains, the clear sky, but do you know for yourself the state of your own existence, your daily existence, the way you think, what you feel, whether you are greedy, envious and all the rest of it, the whole human structure. Are you aware of it? Do you know what you think? And why you think? Do you know your feelings, your prejudices, your anxieties, your fears, which is our life, our daily life? Your relationship with another, intimate or otherwise, what that relationship is, whether it is superficial or deeply real? Or is it merely sexual, sensory, or in your relationship there is affection, care, tenderness, love?

So we are asking whether you are aware of your own daily life with all its complexities. And it is only from there one can start, not with some belief, with some ideal, with some conclusions - belief in Brahman, or god, or Jesus, or something or other. Those are all illusions. So one is asking - please listen - one is asking if your mind is caught in an illusion. If it is, you cannot possibly bring about a radical change in yourself because you are the world, you are not different from the rest of humanity because you suffer, and the people living ten thousand miles away suffer. They are afraid as you are afraid. They seek security and find very little both in the world and psychologically, there is very little security. They want happiness, they are unhappy. They are gullible, like you. So you are essentially similar to another human being. It is not an intellectual concept, to argue about, it is a fact. You may be brown, or black, or white, or pink, but apart from racial division every human being throughout the world goes through what you go through psychologically, and physically. Isn't that so? You are afraid of death, and so are the others. You believe in reincarnation because that gives comfort, others have their own theories about afterlife. It is exactly like every other human being in the world. So you are essentially the world.

But the realization of it is not an intellectual affair. It is not an idea, however good or bad. Unless you feel it with all your blood and brain and guts that you are the world, therefore to bring about a change in the world you have to change radically. Right? Can we start from there? Which means, is one aware, know one's thoughts, one's feelings, one's beliefs, one's ideals, one's corruption, one's fears, pleasures and all that, do you know all that? If you do, or if you don't, one has to investigate why we live as we are living, why we accept to live this way. Do you understand my questions?

So we are together, and I mean together, we are together going to examine, explore, into ourselves. And this isn't a group therapy, which is an abomination, exposing each other's faults, and hoping thereby to clear up something. We are going to talk over together, examine the quality of our minds, the quality of our hearts, the quality of our brain. To examine you must be free to look. Right sirs? Free to look into yourself. That means there must be no conclusion. Right? There must be no sense of authority. There must be no person who will tell you how to look because then you look according to him. There must be no guide. You must be free to listen to yourself, to observe yourself, and learn as you observe, and act as you observe.

So we have this problem first: to know what actually is going on, what is happening now in your minds and hearts, in your daily life. And to be able to listen to your own mutterings, your own fears, your own miseries, to listen to it. And to observe in your relationship with another the reactions, because that is the only guide. Your reactions with another, how you have respect for those who are above you, or have better position, status, power, and those below you whom you kick. Right? You see that in this country, this total lack of care, respect for human beings. So you have to find out for yourself by thinking over together as we are doing now, how to observe yourself. Not what to think, but how to think. Not my way of thinking, or your way of thinking, or the professor, or the guru, or the specialist, but thinking together without any prejudice, without any opinion. Otherwise you cannot think together. Right? Do we see this? Do we see that you have an opinion and I have an opinion, our thinking is distorted. Right? So is it possible to think without opinions? Please go into it with me, I am going to go slowly into it. Is it possible to observe without any conclusions? Is it possible to listen purely without any distortion? So we are going to go into that slowly step by step.

It's a nice evening, it's nice to sit under the trees and talk about serious things, not to forget to look at the leaves, the branches and the blue sky that is beyond, and to see the sunset and the beauty of the colour, the clouds with their light on it, and also to see ourselves exactly as we are. You can't change the clouds, you can't change the sunset. So to look at yourself without the desire to change. Because the very desire to change is born out of a motive either of greed, or to better oneself in order to meet some principle, or ideal. So can you observe yourself without a single movement of thought? You understand my question?

So first let's find out what it means to listen. Don't say, I have heard that before from you. There are many people here who unfortunately come year after year without changing. It becomes a game. They are not serious. But even though they have been here very often and heard the speaker please forget what he has said previously, totally forget all that he has said, and begin again. You know when you look at a flower day after day the flower is never the same - is it? The beauty of the flower varies from day to day. In the same way those of you who have listened to the speaker for many, many, many years, listen to it as though you were listening to it for the first time. Then you are learning, not memorizing, but you are learning about yourself. Without learning about yourself you have no basis for a correct action, for right response, for objective comprehension.

So first we are going to find out together. I am not telling you what to do, but together we are going to find out what it means to listen. Do we ever listen to anybody? Are you listening to what I am saying now? Are you? If you are honest, are you listening? Or your mind is so occupied with other things. Or you are here because the speaker has a reputation, and you are searching what he is going to say. So all these movements prevent actual listening.

Right? Because it is very important to learn the art of listening. Because if you learn that art, not memorize it, because if you merely memorize how to listen then you are not listening. So what does it mean to listen, not only to the world outside of you, but also to listen to one's own deep mutterings, the deep anxieties, fears and pleasures. What does it mean to listen? There is a listening with the ear, and also there is a listening without the operation of the nervous reactions. Do you follow what I am saying? Are we somewhat together in this? Am I speaking Greek, or Chinese, or are we understanding each other? Because it is very important to find out what it means to listen, to observe. Because we are going to observe without any distortion the actual movement of ourselves. And so to observe, to listen is a great art. And we are learning that art together. I am not your teacher. And I really mean it. I am not your authority. But as two friends talking over together their problems, their fears, their anxieties, and each friend talks about his own problems, and together they approach, they resolve the problems. So we are doing the same. Not that the speaker has resolved - he has - but we are trying to communicate, so we are sharing together.

So first, what does it mean to listen? To listen to a statement, to listen to the noise of that crow, to listen to that honking of that car, to listen to your own thought, to your own feelings. And to listen implies no interference of thought. Because the moment thought intervenes by saying, it is good or bad, I don't like that noise, I do like that noise, you are not listening. Please do it now as you are there and I am explaining it, do it now, not when you go home, then it is too late, then you haven't heard.

So the speaker is going to make many, many statements and you have to find out for yourself whether they are true or false. But if you listen with what you have learnt from books, from authority, from this or from your experience, then you are blocking yourself from actually listening to what the other person has to say. Do you understand the responsibility on your part: to listen to the world and to your own anxiety, insecurity, uncertainty, sorrow? We will go into it step by step into the whole of fear, sorrow, pain, anxiety, the whole of human existence, we will go into it. But first we must learn how to listen to all this.

Then comes also how to observe, what it means to observe. You are observing me, the speaker, how do you observe me? Examine that very simple fact: you are sitting there, the speaker is here, you are watching, you are seeing him. Are you actually seeing him, or you have images about him, conclusions, ideas? So conclusions, reputation, image prevent you from actually looking at the person. Right? Do you understand this very simple fact? If you say, he is a socialist, you don't look at him. If you say, oh, he is communist, the label prevents you from observing him. Then if you say, he is a Muslim, it is finished, for a Hindu.

So can you observe - please listen - can you observe without a single movement of your prejudice? That prejudice is put together by thought. If I want to know you I must forget all my labels, whether I like you or not, this or that, and just look at you. By observing I learn. That's the beginning of wisdom, to observe, not from books. That's one thing. Listening, observing and learning.

What does it mean to learn? From the age of five or six we go to school. There we learn facts. We learn a great deal of information and store it up in the brain as memory. Right? Right sirs? Memory stored up, and with that memory we act: to have a career, a job, money; and so we accumulate knowledge both biological, physics, mathematics and so on, and gather all that information from past researches, from all the people who have gathered information, they have handed it down to us, from generation to generation, and that is stored up in the brain. And that's what we call learning. Learning, gathering information, gathering what other people have said, about god, about heaven, about how you should live, how you should not live, what is right and so on. Gathered all that, and stored up in our brains. And that's called knowledge. That's one way of learning. Right?

There is also another way of learning: to go out and act and from that action learn, which becomes knowledge. So we are always acting from knowledge, and knowledge is always the past, that which has been. Right? That's what is called learning. Learning from other people's experience, from your own experience, from the habits, the customs, tradition handed down from generation to generation, it is stored up in the brain. Our brains are very, very, very old. And that is generally called learning. So we are acting with knowledge, which is the past. Right? Please see this because we are going to investigate into what is learning.

There is another way of learning which is not the accumulation of knowledge, which I am going to explain presently. But first we must understand very clearly where knowledge is absolutely essential - to drive a car, to do anything, speak a language, to know where your house is. So knowledge is essential. But knowledge is always in the past. So we are living in the past. Right?

And there is another way of learning which is not the accumulation of knowledge. Will you kindly listen to what I have to say? Listen, don't agree or disagree, don't accept or deny, just listen as you would listen to that bird. As I said, as the speaker said just now, we only know one method of learning, which is to accumulate knowledge. And from that knowledge operate, function, to have a job, to have a house, and so on and so on and so on. That knowledge becomes dangerous in relationship. Do you understand? If knowledge, which is remembrance, becomes important in human relationship with each other, that very knowledge divides people. We will go into it. Just listen to it.

We are saying there is another way of learning. Shall I go on? [Pause] I am not trying to be clever, making you impatient, but I want to communicate so that you really understand this, that you understand it not only with your brain but also intellectually and also with your heart. You understand? With your mind, with your brain, the quality of the brain that listens, and the intellectual capacity to reason logically, sanely, and also to have this quality of affection, care, love, because those are demanded when you want to discover something new. You understand? When you want to find out something totally new there must be complete harmony, not just intellect operating on its own, or the brain remembering all the past incidents, happenings, conclusions, and holding on to them, and also to have, perhaps which is the most difficult thing, to have care, love, affection.

So we are going to find out together if there is a different way of living which is learning and acting. Just see the difference between what I am going to say, and what we generally do: we accumulate knowledge, and from that knowledge act. There is a time interval - please listen - there is a time interval between the idea and the action. Right? You are following all this? That is, there is the ideal and you are trying to put that ideal into action, so there is a gap between the principle, the ideal, the belief and the actuality. Right? Now we are saying the interval of time between the ideal and action is non-existent. It is going to be a little difficult, please give your attention if you are interested. If you are not, carry on in your own way.

Please see what we do actually. We conceive an idea, and try to put that idea into action. So there is a time interval, a gap between idea and action. This is clear. Right? Would you disagree with that? Now we are saying there is a way of acting, there is a way of learning, in which there is no time interval, and therefore the learning is acting; not acting from previous knowledge. I wonder if you see. I am going to explain it. Go slowly. First I want to establish communication between us.

A first-class engineer is very well acquainted with the piston engine, the internal combustion machinery. And he wants to discover something new. Naturally the brain is full of what he has learnt, full of the knowledge of the combustion engine. Right? And if he wants to discover something totally new he must put that aside. He must have a mind that is free to observe, to listen, to grasp something that may be just there. So the requirement for learning, which is not merely the accumulation of knowledge, is to have a mind that is not burdened with knowledge. And all our brains are burdened with knowledge. Just see the fact. The more traditional you are, the more you have read, read, it doesn't matter what you read, it is all stored up, it is registered in your brain, and so you can never find something totally new. I was once with a friend, a very well known author, and we were talking, he was a friend of mine, and he said, "You know, I have read so much, I have read all the Eastern philosophy, the Chinese, of course the European, I know all about communism, Marx, and so on, and I have no space for the new." You understand? A mind that is traditional, like most minds are, something handed down from generation to generation, a custom, a habit, a ritual, a puja, you know, all that, how can such a mind find something new? Do you understand my question?

Therefore to find a way of learning which is not accumulation of knowledge, the other must be put aside completely. That means no tradition. Are you willing to do that? No sirs. Tradition is very comforting, caught in a routine, like a machine you go on and on.

So I am telling you something, which is, the mind, the brain, must be completely free of prejudice, of opinion, of belief, of all the things thought has put together in the brain. You understand this? Now is that possible? Are you following? A professor, a scientist, if he wants to discover something new naturally he can't keep on repeating his own knowledge. It is absolutely useless. He wants to discover, he wants to find something fresh, not put together by thought. So first to learn, which is not mere accumulation of knowledge, the mind must be free to observe. That is, the mind, though it has got tremendous knowledge, must be capable, have the capacity, have the energy, to set it aside and be free so that it has an insight, insight into what is actually going on.

You understand my question? Are you following? Am I explaining things clearly? If not please tell me, I'll go over it in different ways.

We live in the past and therefore we are always destroying the present. The past modifies itself in the present and becomes the future, but it is still the past. Right? I wonder if you are following all this. Please. So our life, our daily life is based on a routine - going to the office for the next fifty years - just think of it! And tradition, your sexual habits, your loneliness, all that is part of this enormous accumulation of knowledge. And from that knowledge, which is the past, we act. Now the speaker is saying there is an action which is not of the past. That implies a mind, a brain, that has put aside all remembrance. I'll show you, I'll go into it and you will capture the meaning of it.

No remembrance, and therefore it is capable of observing instantly and acting instantly. The very observation is the action. Not, I have learnt, and then act. Therefore that implies a time interval. In that time interval all other factors enter. Therefore in that interval there is contradiction, there is pain, and so on and so on. Whereas what we are saying is, to have insight into the whole structure of my consciousness, of your consciousness. I am going to go into it. To have an insight into your whole consciousness, and that very insight is the action which dispels the content of consciousness, which makes up consciousness. I hope you understand all this. I doubt it!

Look sirs, what is action in your life? I am sorry to go back to it, I must until this is absolutely clear. It is based on memory, on knowledge, or a motive based on some self interest and so on and so on. So knowledge has its place. And in relationship with each other, has knowledge any place at all? It is very important to find out. Which means in relationship there is mere memory, is memory, remembrance love? When you say, my wife, it is a remembrance. You have the image of her - or the husband, or the girl, you have an image of her. That remembrance is the outcome of past incidents, experiences, memory, and so in relationship when there is memory there cannot be love. Logically.

So we are saying to have an insight is not a continuation of memory or remembrance. I am going to explain what that means. Our brain - I am not a specialist on the brain, I have watched it, in oneself you watch it, if you watch you don't have to pick up a single book, you can see it all yourself - our brains have the capacity to register, register an incident, an event, a happening, an insight, a flattery, a hurt, it has the capacity to register as a computer. As long as the computer is in operation there is no sense of freedom to observe. Please listen to this. If the brain is registering and therefore retaining it as memory, and acting from that memory, then that action is born from the past. That's logic, that's so. And so between the action and the past there is an interval, therefore there is conflict, therefore there is adjustment, and a sense of constant struggle to approximate. Now can the brain - please listen to this, give two minutes concentration, or attention - can the brain register only what is necessary and nothing else? What is necessary is your physical needs. What is necessary is to have knowledge to act in daily life - where you live, what language you speak, how to drive a car, how to design a house and so on, or design a machine to kill other people. That is the function of the brain, to register. And we said register only what is necessary. And psychologically don't register anything. Try it, do it! Because that is where the trouble begins. I am attached to you psychologically, inwardly, because you give me money, you are my this or that, you give me satisfaction, comfort, sex and all that, I am attached to you psychologically.

So the attachment is totally unnecessary. Whereas the other is necessary. Do you follow all this? So can you see the importance of keeping knowledge in its right place, and psychologically have no knowledge at all? You don't understand all this. There is a great deal of fun in all this if you go into it. So your brain is capable of registering what is necessary, and psychologically nothing. So the brain is free - you understand - because it has settled what is necessary, not extravagantly necessary, what is necessary. And psychologically it has no content. You don't see the beauty of it. And so the brain then, being free, can perceive instantly, and act, the very perception is action.

Now I'll show you something. You probably belong to some kind of religious organization. Your particular organization is different from another particular religious organization. Right? So there is conflict between the two, or you tolerate the two, or you adjust between the two. But there is always the two. And therefore there must inevitably be conflict. All religious organizations have this element. Now to have an insight into it and never belong to any religious organization. You understand what I am saying? So that the very insight dispels the illusion of belonging to something, a religious organization. That is insight. Which is to observe completely free so that the whole nature of organizations is revealed, and it is finished, you never again belong to any single religious organization, or even perhaps political - much more important nowadays, because you are dealing with man as a whole, it is a global problem, not the problem of India, or America, or Russia, it is a global problem, which is the human problem.

Now if I have conveyed this to you, if the speaker has conveyed the reality of this insight - please be careful with it because it is not a continuous thing that you keep going, then it becomes memory, then it is gone, it is finished. You can't use it for personal use. You understand? To have an insight into your fear, which we will go into in a few days, as we go along. To have an insight into pleasure, into death, so that you see the truth of it, not your belief, not your prejudice, not your conclusions, not your imaginary illusory projections, but the actual truth of it. So that is the way, the way of learning which is from moment to moment. You understand? Love is that.

We have talked for a hour and twenty five minutes. That's enough, isn't it?

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC TALK 1ST JANUARY 1979

I hope you will not think me rude or impolite if I ask you with due courtesy why you are here. What is the reason? What made you come to listen to this speaker? Is it out of curiosity, is it out of old habit, out of some illusory desire? Or have you come, if I may ask, with a serious intent to hear what the speaker has to say and whether it has value, any meaning in one's daily life? And if you discover for yourself what the speaker is saying, either true or false - if it is false, then you will naturally put it aside, but if it is true, sane, logical, reasonable, then you will obviously either intellectually, which is verbally, accept and do nothing about it. But whereas if you do not merely accept intellectually what is being said, and if you accept it with all your heart and mind and with your total being, then you will naturally do something about it, then you will naturally change your life radically. Because that is what we are talking about - the total transformation of man, which is you.

And that is important because any new culture - because the old cultures throughout the world are dying, are decaying, are beginning to degenerate - a new culture can only come into being when there are really profoundly serious religious people, non-sectarian, who do not belong to any society, to any group, to any guru, to any particular religion, because religions as they are, have no meaning whatsoever. So one asks, if I may, with courtesy, why are you here? I think you should know why you are here. Whether you are adding one more illusion to the already illusory life that one leads, do you understand? Whether you are making what the speaker is saying into an illusion, into a make-belief, into a theory and being theoretical, which has very little value - so, if one may ask, why you have taken the trouble to come and listen to the speaker. Can you find out for yourself why you are here? And if you do find out, that is, if you are honest with yourself and not slightly demented, slightly neurotic, slightly hoping for some miracle to happen that will bring about a revolution, psychological revolution in society, so that you will be comfortable, you will have a nice house and everything financially, physically secure, then if you have come with that purpose, you will be deluded. You will be deceived.

Whereas, if you have come with a serious intent, and with that serious intent there must also go hand in hand with it a quality of scepticism, a quality that questions, that demands an answer, not from the speaker but the very challenge that you ask, that you put to yourself, that challenge demands an answer from yourself. I think it is important for us when the world is going to pieces, there is such anarchy, when everything around us is crumbling, it behooves us as serious people, to know what it is that we are seeking. Most of us seek physical security - money, job, a certain physical security; and there are others who don't care so much for physical security but they want psychological security, inward security and in the search of the security they fall into many traps: the do-gooders, the social workers, the narrow parochial sects, into a false sense of meditations, and so on and so on. There are a great many traps around us. So we must ask ourselves, if I may suggest, what it is that we are trying to seek, what it is that we want, what it is that our hearts and minds demand.

As we were saying yesterday, if you have followed it and if I may go back to it a little, we will continue with what we were going into yesterday - we were saying that action is part of life, the doing, the doing, the action in our daily, everyday troublesome life, and we were pointing our action born of knowledge must always be limited. Right? Because knowledge is the past, and when you act with that burden of the past, then such actions are incomplete, limited, fragmentary. And is there a different kind of action which is not fragmentary, which has no regrets, which has no sense of incompleteness? And we were saying there is such action, that is, to have total insight into the problem. We explained, if you do not mind hearing it again, that all our daily activity is either based on a principle or an ideal or a memory. See it in yourself, I am only describing, but the description is not the described. Right? Right sir? The word is not the thing. So I may describe, but what is described is not that which is actually taking place. So, don't let us be deceived by the description but the description may help you to observe what is actually taking place, knowing that the word is not the thing. Right?

If most of us are seeking psychological security, which apparently is the human endeavour, the human struggle, in our relationship with each other, however intimate or not intimate, this desire, this urge, this compulsion, to find a deep abiding psychological security which can never be disturbed, which is totally complete in itself, that is what most of us want. I don't know if you have examined yourself and if you have, psychologically, inwardly - that is what we want. Isn't that so? And we have never questioned if there is such security. In the search for the psychological security, thought has brought about all the gods. In them we have invented our urge to find security. Right? The gods, the rituals, all the circus that goes on in the name of religion, there we try to find security. And is there security in all the things that thought has put together? Right? Please, this is a challenge to you. You have to respond. You cannot all of you respond, that would be impossible, but you can respond to yourself. This challenge is put before you, and you have to answer it and not evade it, if you evade it, then the consequence of that evasion, of that avoidance, leads to further illusion, further misery. Obviously. Whereas if you face this challenge and find out for oneself whether there is security psychologically, or is all psychological security an illusion? I mean by that word 'illusion', in the course of sensory perception, when that perception is coloured by a belief, by a hope, by an unconscious desire, then that which is brought about is illusion. Have you followed all this? I doubt it.

We said, our minds are filled with a great many illusions. We have physical security, some of us, and the vast majority of mankind has very little physical security - that is another story. We won't go into it - why man has brought about this extraordinary division between poverty and riches, and every kind of physical revolution has not solved it. Perhaps there is a way of solving it, which we might discuss later on, but for the moment we are not discussing, going into that. We are saying an action born out of knowledge, knowledge being that which we have accumulated both biologically as well as psychologically, when that action is born from that which has already been experienced, known, that action must inevitably lead to further illusion. And we were saying that there is an action, as we pointed out yesterday, and if you have seriously thought about it, there is an action which is not the outcome of thought. All right? May I go on? I don't know how much you understand. I really would like to communicate this, not merely verbally, intellectually, but really out of one's heart, one's whole being, to communicate to another that there is a different way of living, in which there is no conflict, no pain, no sorrow, no fear, and a quality of intelligence that is totally, completely secure. But to find that way of living one must attend, one must give attention.

Are you all comfortable? Because if you are not comfortable, you won't be able to attend. Right? Because we are going to talk about this quality of attention. Most of us know what concentration is. Every schoolboy is taught to concentrate on a book or something or other, so that he applies his mind to a particular thing, resisting all other invasion, all movement of thought, resisting all movement of thought and concentrating. You know this, don't you? This is obvious. And the more that you can totally concentrate without any interference of other activities of thought, one thinks one has achieved something. We are saying attention is nothing whatsoever to do with concentration. Right? Exam it, critically examine what is being said. Don't accept. Don't swallow it hook, line and the rest of it. Find out if what the speaker is saying is correct or not - correct being accurate, precise, not vague, romantic, nonsensical. Concentration emphasizes, gives importance to a particular activity of thought. Right? Whereas attention is not the product of thought. Just play with it. Don't accept it. Just look at it. Because most of us know what is inattention. When you are listening to the speaker, you listen for a minute or two, or perhaps less than that, and your thoughts wander away to something else, and you try to pull it back and listen. Aren't you doing that? Good lord!

So your mind is chattering and occasionally the chattering stops and you attend, you listen. But most of the time there is constant activity, and in that constancy there is a particular demand made by circumstances, or by yourself to apply, concentrate on a particular activity and resist all other activity of thought. You are following all this, right sir? If you understand this movement, that thought is bringing about a quality of concentration, and that very thought is moving away in other directions - right? - and there is an urge, a compulsion to hold the thought in a particular direction. Right? This is what is generally called concentration. Attention, to attend, in that attention, if you really attend, there is no centre from which you are attending. Right? You all look so puzzled. Sir, it is important to understand this, because attention and inattention, there are the two things we have to face. Right? Are you following? Am I communicating something or not at all? Have you ever given attention with your mind, with your heart, with your nerves, with your whole being, to something in which there is no otherness, in which there is no sense of deviation or distraction? Sir, there are three things involved - concentration, distraction and attention. Right? Most of us, when we are concentrating, are afraid of distraction. Right? I wish we could talk to each other quietly like this. Now, is there a distraction at all? Perhaps thought itself is a distraction. I'm going to show it to you in a minute. When you say there is a distraction, it implies thought has made up its mind to pay, concentrate, on a particular object. And when there is any other kind of movement away from that, that movement is called a distraction. Now is that a distraction? We are saying there is no distraction. Right? Because, it is thought - please listen - it is thought that has said, I must concentrate on that, but that very thought is moving away in another direction, and that is called distraction. But is it a distraction because the thought has pinpointed in a certain direction and that very thought is moving away from that. And that is generally called a distraction. Right? Why do you call it a distraction? It is still the movement of thought. Right? So any movement of thought is another distraction. I wonder if you get this? No, you don't.

So, what we are trying to point out is that there are two qualities of the mind - inattention in which there is no attention, which is inattention, and attention. Right? And to be aware of inattention is to be attentive, in which there is no distraction. You get it? I wonder if you understand this. Because we are always struggling between the two - inattention and attention - and that takes all our energy. In meditation, for example - which is not the moment to talk about now - this is the battle that is going on, to be totally attentive and a second later, completely not attentive. Right? Now we are saying the inattention is not a distraction, but to be aware of that lack of attention, to be aware that you are not attending, that is good enough. So that your mind is never in conflict, because conflict is a wastage of energy. So we are coming back. Now we have explained what attention is - not explained, the fact of attention. That when there is attention there is no centre from which you are attending, as there is in concentration, which then has what you call distraction. Whereas there is attention and there is inattention. When one is aware of not being attentive, that very awareness is attention, in which there is no distraction whatsoever. I wonder if you get it sir? Even verbally have you got it?

Intellectually? Which is nothing at all, but at least it is a whisper.

Now will you so attend without concentration, without effort, to what is being said? That is, there is no distraction. You may attend, listen for a minute and wander off and be aware that you are wandering off. That very awareness of wandering off is attention. Right? Got it sir?

We were saying yesterday that all life is action, whether you are sitting in a Himalayan cave as a hermit or in a monastery or living an ordinary life. Life, the whole of existence, is action, as the whole of life is relationship. Relationship is action. And our actions, as they are now, politically, religiously, in every way, such action breeds further misery, further confusion, further sorrow, which is what is happening politically, if you observe, which is what is happening religiously with their hierarchical set up - you will eventually reach illumination, do this, this and this and you will get it. The carrot before the donkey! And we are questioning the whole activity of what is called action. You understand? We are questioning, we are saying that action based on a principle, ideal, a remembrance, a memory, knowledge, such action is fragmentary, incomplete, and therefore it will inevitably lead to further misery, further sorrow, further confusion, which is what is happening in our daily life, if you observe. Whereas there is another action - if you are attending - please attend - if you are not attending, if your thought is wandering off, be aware of it, that very awareness of your inattention is to attend to what is being said.

Have you understood?

So, we are saying that there is an action that is not based on knowledge. For that, to understand it much more deeply than yesterday, we must go into the whole question of what is thinking, what is thought, why human beings throughout the world have given such extraordinary importance to thought. You give importance to thought, don't you? Everything that you do is based on thought - the job, the technological knowledge, the gods, the churches, everything is built by thought. Right sirs? Do you question that? Thought is the outcome of memory, is the response of memory. Right? If you are in a state of amnesia, you could not think, but as you are not - I hope you are not - and as you are not, your thinking is the result of centuries of experience, accumulated knowledge which is stored up in the brain - which is so obvious. If you have looked at yourself, your actions, repetitive, occasionally free, constantly caught in a routine, in a groove, and if you observe your own thinking, you will see that your thought is a material process, which is the outcome of knowledge. Right? It is a material process. It is not something extraordinarily super spiritual. Right? Right sirs?

Thought is always active. It is never still, and man has said, you must make it still in order to - you understand - in order to find some higher spiritual consciousness, which I doubt. There is no higher spiritual consciousness, there is only consciousness. Man has invented super, super, super consciousness, but that invention is the product of thought, and people who talk about super-consciousness are worshipped, made into extraordinary gurus, because you also want super-consciousness. But you never examine that thought has produced this whole area of consciousness. Whatever it thinks is still part of that consciousness. You understand this? Are we moving along together or are you tired? If you are, let us take a rest. I can go on talking to myself, because I am investigating as I go along. If you are tired, please take a rest because we are asking your brain to think anew, to look at things afresh, not in the old traditional way, to look at your life as it is anew, afresh and that is a challenge that the brain may get tired of. It wants rest - give me a moment, let me be quiet so that I can recapture.

So, we are saying that thought has created our society and all the miseries contained in that society, the class division, the rich man, the poor man, the man of power, the man of position, the man of greatness, and the poor, downtrodden, and all that. And all the gods on the earth are created by thought; the temples in which the gods are supposed to live are the construction of thought; all the rituals, the dogmas, the beliefs, the puja which you perform everyday in the hope of having some kind of peace, and all the so-called meditations, the transcendental and other nonsensical meditations are based on thought, and thought is always limited. Right? There is no limitless thought. Thought can think it is limitless, that it can find the immeasurable, that is part of its illusion, because thought is the outcome of knowledge, memory, and therefore it is time-binding, and therefore limited. Right? Are you attending to this? Do you listen to this? When I ask a question, your thought comes into activity and it is beginning to ask, search to find the answer, and to find the answer it goes back to memory - where did I read, who told me? You follow? The activity goes on. Whereas if you are asked a question that you don't know and you cannot find it in books, from your guru, from anything, then your brain naturally says: I really don't know. Right? Are you in that position? You follow? Can you ever say to yourself, I don't know? Because that quality of mind that says, I don't know, is not seeking to know, because the moment it seeks, thought is in operation and then it will project what it wants, and will say, I have found it. You understand all this? Are you getting tired?

So, to enquire is to have a mind that does not know. And we are enquiring into an action of which we are not aware at all. We know our actions based on memory, that is simple, clear. And we know the technological activity of knowledge, the accumulation of thousands of people, scientists, working, accumulating. And from that accumulation, they have created the extraordinary things, the most marvellous surgery, the most delicate extraordinary things they are doing. And also technologically, they are preparing destructions of wars, material for war; and also thought has created the illusions - right? - I believe in god; I am a nationalist; I belong to this party which is going to save mankind; my guru is the most marvellous, and so on and on and on. All that is the movement of thought. So, whatever thought does in its action must inevitably be limited. Now, have you an insight into that? You understand? If you attend very carefully to what is being said, then you will see the whole movement of thought, the hidden thoughts, the open thoughts, the thoughts that are extraordinary secretive, hidden, does not want to be open, the whole structure and nature of thought. When you have an insight into it, thought gives itself its own place. You get what I am saying? Have you got what I am saying?

The meaning of the word 'art' means to put everything in its right place - the art of living, not the painting and sculpture, that has its own art, but we are talking about the art of living, and there art means to put all things in their place so as to give order. So, the art of living is for thought to find out its own place. Have you understood it? Can you do it? That is, to give knowledge its right place, and psychologically knowledge has no place. Have you understood madam? No? At least somebody says she does not. I am glad.

I think most of us have never looked at the movement of thought. Right? Most of us have never asked what is thinking. Why has man given such extraordinary importance to thinking. And the very process of thinking born of experience, knowledge and memory stored in the brain, that process of thinking is always limited. Right? Is that clear? Thought is limited. Thought is fragmentary. Fragment means something broken, like a vase - when you break it there are pieces of it. So thought is broken, limited. Right? Because it is born out of knowledge, and knowledge is the past, knowledge is not the whole. Right? It can never be the whole. So thought, whatever it does, must be limited, and any action born out of that limitation must have regret, confusion, feeling of guilt, anxiety and never ending conflict, because thought in its action is limited. Right? Is this clear - clear not verbally, inside, know it as you know your language, as you know your eyes, your face, you know it.

So thought can never lead to the immeasurable, that which is not measurable. Thought is measurable. Right? And therefore that which is measurable is limited. Though it can measure 100 yards it is still limited. So, when thought seeks illumination, tries to meditate, that meditation, that struggle, all that you go through is always limited and therefore broken up, fragmentary. Right, sir?

Now, we are saying there is an action that is not born of thought. Are you interested in this? Now will you pay attention? That means you have no centre from which you are listening. If you are listening from a centre, you have already brought in the sense of distraction. You understand this? So, can you attend? We are saying there is an action that is not of time. Again I mustn't use time for the moment, that leads to something else, we will talk about it. There is an action which is not the outcome of memory. I am pointing out something else. I will come back to it. In your relationship with another, however intimate or not intimate, when memory operates in our relationship, what takes place? There is inevitably division. Right? Haven't you noticed it? You are related to a husband, wife or girl or whatever it is, and in that relationship there is the whole movement of thought, which is built up out of constant contact with each other, a sense of pictures, images, which are memories. Right? And those memories, those pictures, those images, divide you and your husband, girl, or boy. So there is always a division. Right? So, we are asking from that - we won't go into more detail about it, we are asking from that: is love a remembrance? Right? When one says to one's wife or husband or girl whatever it is, I love you, is that a remembrance? Or when you say, I love your god, your image, tremendous emotional devotion, is that love? We will go into this question much more deeply another time. What we are pointing out is that where there is the activity of thought, thought itself being limited, must bring about division - national, political, religious, the whole structure of man's activity, which is destroying the world. You go up to the moon and plant a flag up there. That is a limited action. When you worship your petty little god round the corner which has been put together by thought, that is a limited action. So, when you have an insight into that - insight being the mind comprehends the whole picture, the whole structure, and nature of thought, then thought comes to its own limited place. Have you got it? Have you understood some of this? Come on sirs?

So, when thought has understood its own limited place, then action is not the outcome of thought. Then action is the outcome of that total insight of the nature of thought. Has somebody got it? Have you understood all this? Probably I should read to you the Gita and then you will all be happy, or read some commentaries on commentaries on commentaries. But this needs your active co-operation to find this out. You have to think, you have to work, which is to work to find out how you think, how your whole life is based on thinking. You have to catch a bus, but catching the bus has its right thought, right place, but when thought interferes into the whole psychological structure of man, then thought has limited the psyche of man. You understand this?

So, sirs and ladies, another five minutes more. I do not know how much you are learning - learning, not accumulating knowledge and memory - learning to find out this quality of insight from which action takes place. You see what we are really saying is that man has extraordinary capacities - woman too please! Man has extraordinary capacities, and those capacities are limited by thought. And if thought is given its right place it releases a tremendous energy, not to do more mischief, but to live a life in which there is no shadow of conflict, a life that is supremely excellent, a life that has this extraordinary quality of compassion, love. That is why one has to understand the nature of thought. Thought is not love. And when one worships the intellect, as you all do, because when you are studying or reading or being lectured to about the Gita, the Upanishads, the various commentaries, you are encouraging the intellectual capacity and therefore denying love.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 6TH JANUARY 1979

May we go on with what we were talking about when we met the last two times here? We were saying - weren't we? - that we must think together, not what to think but how to think. And we are, as we said previously, that we were taking a journey together, sharing the problems, the various incidents and happenings in our daily life. And we are not concerned with theories, probabilities, suppositions, but with what is actually going on. The word 'actually' means that which is happening, happening now, not only externally, outside of us but also inwardly. And we said one can have correct examination inwardly only when we understand what is happening outwardly, because one can deceive oneself enormously examining ourselves, our attitudes, our prejudices. But if we approach it from the outward world, then perhaps we shall have clear observation of ourselves. We said also that the society in which we live is created by us, by every human being, not by some divine edict. The society in which we live is the expression of our greed, our ambition, our sense for power, violence and so on.

So this afternoon, if I may, I would like to share together, of course, to talk about time, to investigate the nature of culture and tradition. And also we pointed out the other day, if you don't mind my repeating it again, that this is a serious meeting, gathering. I mean by that word 'serious', weighty, heavy - not casual, not something that you come on an evening, a pleasant evening, sit under a tree and listen to talk, but we are sharing together our investigation. Our concern, as we pointed out the other day, is that our society is so corrupt, so dangerously violent, and all the rest of it, unless every human being, each one of us radically, psychologically brings about a revolution in himself, then there is no possibility of bringing about a change in the world. That's what we talked about. Perhaps you might remember it.

With what we are talking about you may not agree, or you may agree: agreement or disagreement is irrelevant. We are not dealing with opinions, ideas or speculative philosophy. We are dealing with what is actually going on in our daily life, because as we pointed out again, we must begin near to go very far. But most of us start with theories, abstractions that are very far and therefore valueless, irrelevant. So, I hope that we are clear on this point, that we are not concerned with philosophy, philosophy being, as it is understood now, a series of suppositions, theories, concepts, conclusions - the word actually means the love of life, love of truth.

So, first, why have human beings throughout the world been caught up in tradition, whether it is the tradition of a day or a week or three thousand years. Why? The very word 'tradition' means - doesn't it - something handed down from generation to generation. And also the word etymologically means betrayal, treason. And this tradition is to hand over, given from generation to generation, certain values, certain beliefs, ideas, rituals, concepts, conclusions. This has been going on, handed down for century upon century. And like a steam-roller flattening the human being with these values, conclusions and so on. And when those values, conclusions, concepts, principles and so on, have been thrown aside, as is happening now, we are back to where we started. We are violent, greedy, anxious, insecure, uncertain, confused human beings. That's what is going on actually. Right? Since tradition held human beings along a certain groove, when those traditions are thrown overboard, as they are being done now, we are where we started. Perhaps we have more comforts, more bathrooms, able to drive cars, transportation and communications and so on. But as human beings we suffer, we are envious, we are violent, there is a great deal of fear, utter insecurity. The world is becoming more and more dangerous. This is all a fact. And this tradition implies - does it not - a process of evolution - from the wheel to the jet plane, there has been evolution, it has taken many, many, many centuries for the wheel to come to the jet. And in this tradition, there is so-called culture. Culture, the word implies, to cultivate, to grow, to blossom, to flower - the human mind as well as the human heart. And as human beings living in a certain tradition, have we flowered, morally, perhaps intellectually we have, more or less, that is we are spinning a lot of words, theories, principles, ideals and try to live up to them, which are all an intellectual process. Culture, as we pointed out, implies the freedom of man not to be steam-rolled by centuries of tradition, and in that there can be no culture. That is obvious. Where the mind is following tradition, rituals and all the rest of it, in that there can be no possibility of the human mind and human heart growing, developing, you know all the rest of it. Technologically, we have advanced tremendously. That is based on the accumulation of knowledge, but morally, so-called spiritually, we are almost savages, with a lot of superstition, ideals, principles which have no meaning whatsoever. Right? That is the state of our daily life. Technologically we are excellent, at least we try to be. And we have never challenged ourselves whether it is possible to live ethically at its highest. And when one sees what is happening in the world and in ourselves, that is our greatest challenge, that we each individual, each human, cultivate in freedom.

Is freedom a matter of time? Time being division in movement. Time is movement. Obviously. And in that movement there is division, as yesterday, today and tomorrow. The yesterday meeting the present, modifying itself and proceeding to the future. This is the movement of time in which there is division. To get from here to there, it takes time. From the wheel to the jet has taken centuries. Time. So, there are two different kinds of time: the biological time and psychological time. The time that a child goes through adolescence grows up to a man, and so on, that takes years, like a seed planted, it takes time to become a tree. And we are questioning whether there is psychological time at all? That is, psychological evolution, that is, to become or to be. I hope we are communicating with each other. I think this is rather important that we understand this question, that time - it is really quite extraordinary if you come to think of it - we have depended on time, we thought our whole human progress is a development in time. We have achieved technologically great varieties of excellence, and to achieve that one has to have an enormous amount of time. All accumulation of knowledge is time. And we are asking whether there is psychological time at all, that is, psychological evolution, that is, I will be something, I will achieve goodness. The very word 'achieve' implies time: I am not this but I will be that, both in the business world as well as in the so-called world of spirit, mind. Is it that we have seen a seed grow into a tree and have accepted that as a process of growth in time and therefore move with that concept, with that understanding into the psychological field? You are following all this? Psychologically we think we are growing, we are developing, we will become something, and we are questioning that very concept, very idea, very feeling that we will be. Right? All organizations are based on this, both worldly as well as so-called religious: give me time, I will achieve enlightenment through practice, through systems, through mechanical processes - which you achieve in the world, in the mechanical world - you apply the same attitude, the same approach, or come with the same approach, to the psyche.

There is no psychological evolution at all. Right? Please, don't accept what is being said, or deny, but listen first. You may have your own opinions, your own conclusions, your own beliefs, your own way of approaching the problem of time, but since you have taken the trouble to come here, obviously you have to listen to what the other fellow has to say. Listen, not casually listen, or listening interject your own opinions, your own comparative values, and so on. Just listen. Then after having listened, you can begin to examine. But you cannot examine before you have listened. That implies giving attention, not partial attention, attending one minute or a few minutes, and then thinking about something else. Right? Which implies, attention needs freedom. Because if you are investigating there must be freedom to observe. Right? We are actually doing this, I hope, not accepting what is being said and turning it into a theory or an idea, but actually listening to find out for yourself whether evolution, gradual growth, psychologically exists or not, and if it is not, then how do we deal with a problem? You understand? With a reaction, with say, for example, with fear? You are following all this? We must be very clear in this matter. Time is fear. Time is pleasure. Time is sorrow. And is love involved in time? You are following all this? We are denying the total acceptance, up to now of psychological evolution altogether.

So we are going to examine that. There is no need to examine the wheel and the jet. That's fairly clear, that's obvious. The whole of science is based on the accumulation of knowledge. And not being burdened with that knowledge, you examine more and acquire more knowledge, and you are all the time adding more and more and more knowledge - knowledge being the past. Now, we are asking, is time necessary, time being movement in division? Right? Please understand this carefully. Time is movement with divisions, yesterday, today, tomorrow, or time immemorial, time which has no beginning, and time that may end. Eternity is out of time, that which has a continuity is not eternity, it is still part of time. You are following all this? If one observes oneself, because we as a human being, as a human being, we are the representative of all mankind, because we suffer, we go through all kinds of tortures like every other human being - we are poor, we are rich, we are greedy, we are suffering, we are lonely, we have no love, all that is the rest of mankind. So, you as a human being are the rest of mankind, which is not an intellectual concept. You can turn it into an intellectual concept, but it has no value, like any other theory. But if one sees the truth of it, the actual reality of it, with your heart, with your mind, then a human being becomes an extraordinarily serious, committed human being - not an individual, because we are not individuals. Individual means indivisible, not broken up, not fragmented. And most human beings are fragmented. Right? So we are not individuals at all. We may think, because we have a name, we have a bank account, or a car, or wife or house - we call ourselves individuals. I think that is wrong usage of the word. We are human beings like every other human being living in the world with enormous problems, our relationships are very complex, our sorrows are limitless and so on.

So, when we realize that we are the world and the world is us - realize - not intellectually play with words - one has a tremendous responsibility. And that's why perhaps we avoid that responsibility by calling ourselves individuals. And being a representative of all man kind, as each human being is, and when that human being psychologically transforms himself it affects the whole consciousness of mankind. Please listen to all this. Don't accept it; look at it. Examine it. And the speaker is only concerned with that, not with theories and so on. That is, is it possible for human beings, not through evolutionary process, not through time, but fundamentally, radically, basically change, totally? Because that is our challenge, because traditions have gone, religions have no meaning any more; institutions have their limited place but cannot possibly transform men; no government can possibly change man - they may improve the outward circumstances, but deeply they cannot - as it has been shown in Russia, and all the rest of it. We don't have to go through all that.

So, understanding all that, we are asking: is there a possibility of transformation of man in which time as movement with its division has no place? You have understood my question? Because our whole ethical, moral and so-called spiritual world is based on time. In the business world, in the political world, unfortunately, the hierarchical system exists, the pecking order. And in the so-called world of the mind and heart, we have also this pecking order. This is so obvious. And, is it possible for a human being psychologically to change fundamentally, without having time at all? You understand sir? This is a very important question to ask - you may not find the answer, but one must ask it. Right? Because we have lived for a million years, probably more or less the same psychologically. There has been tremendous technological revolution and progress. So, let us find out if it is possible for a human being to be free totally of this idea of evolution, psychological evolution which involves time. Right?

Will you examine, can we examine it together? That is, your tradition says: take time. Right? All your scriptures, religions, everything is based on time. Our brains work in time. We are conditioned by time, and we are asking a question which puts aside time, which denies totally evolution. Right? So we are going to investigate whether a human being can really bring about this radical change in which time is not involved at all. Right? Are we meeting each other? Right? That is, are we sharing this thing together, are we deeply interested in this question? Or are you just waiting for me to examine it, explore it, investigate it, and you say, 'Yes that is possible or not possible, I have different opinions and conclusions', and go away? Which implies that you are not really sharing in the problem at all. Because we have lived for over a million years and more, and we are practically the same as we were, psychologically, inwardly. Right? And to reverse the whole process - is that possible?

How do you examine, in what manner or what capacity of the mind is capable of investigating something which appears totally impossible, a mind which is so heavily conditioned by time to which a new kind of proposition is put? Is it capable first of all of receiving problems, receiving the question, or it has been so heavily conditioned it is incapable of even hearing it? So, what is actually going on with each one? Do you hear the question and make it into an abstraction which means avoidance or being so heavily traditionally conditioned, you say, 'Sorry, I am not going to even listen. It does not mean a thing to me'. Or you have the quality of mind that says, 'Let us go into it - not theoretically but actually'? Which is, whether fear which is one of the reactions from timeless, immemorial time, whether that fear can totally end without involving time at all? Is that clear? Right? Perhaps, fear is a little more complex, we will take it up a little later - whether a human being from childhood who has been hurt psychologically, both physically as well as psychologically - listen to it carefully - whether that hurt, the inward hurt, which expresses itself outwardly by withdrawing, by resisting, by wanting to be more violent to another because you are hurt yourself, whether that hurt which has been gathered, which has been kept cherished, almost loved, can that hurt be totally abandoned instantly without time? Right? You see the fun of it? It is not fun, it is really very, very serious if you go into it, but the very question is so challenging and therefore demands your attention, demands your care, demands your response totally to it.

We are hurt from childhood, inwardly, psychologically, inside the skin as it were, and the consequences of that hurt are resistance, building a wall around oneself, a withdrawal not to be hurt more, always having fear of getting hurt more and more, the consequences are violence, having no actual relationship with another - because you might get hurt and so on. The consequences one sees very clearly. Now, can all those consequences, which is the beginning of the hurt, end? To find that out - are you waiting for me to answer it - to find that out, and go into it very deeply, what is hurt? You say, the 'me', the me is the image which you have created about yourself or the society has imposed on you. The society is your relationship with another which is your making. So you are hurt because you have an image. The image is the symbol, the idea, the name, the form, the whole structure of the psyche. Right? That gets hurt and our conditioning is to get over that hurt gradually, do it, go into it, examine it, analyze it, find the cause and the action, which all takes time. Right? Now, is it possible not to have an image about oneself at all? Then there is no hurt. You understand? Right? Is it possible? As long as you have an image that you are a very powerful person, dominant, aggressive, beautiful, clear intellect, and the rest of it - the image that one builds up for oneself from childhood right through old age and death - we are asking, we are saying as long as that image exists there must be hurt, superficial or very, very deep. Right? Now, can that image, seeing the truth of it, you understand, seeing that as long as you have an image about yourself you are bound to be hurt and the consequences are you are violent, you are becoming more and more dull because you are withdrawing, fear and so on - seeing the consequences, seeing that the image is hurt, seeing the truth of it, not just the intellectual concept of it, the very perception is the very ending of the image. Right? Perception. So, we have to examine what we mean by perception, seeing.

We see both optically, visually, the things around us and we name them because it is part of our training, part of our conditioning, the moment you see this thing you call it a tree. That is, the action of knowledge operating in perception. You are following all this? Is there a perception without the accumulation of the past? To observe without time? Right? That is, when we observe, we observe not only visually, optically, but when we observe ourselves, if you have ever done it, which I doubt - most of you don't, I am pretty sure - if you observe yourself, in that observation there is the observer and the observed. Right? The one who witnesses and the observed, which is, the thinker and the thought. Right? The thinker is the thought. There is no division between the thinker and the thought. You will not accept this - examine it, please. The thinker is the result of many, many, many incidents of thought, which is the past. The thinker is put together by thought. So, thought is the thinker. Right? There is no division between the thinker and the thought. That division is created by time which is the movement in division. You are getting all this, sir? No? Right sirs. At least I must see somebody who says, yes, I have got it.

Q: I have got it.

K: No, no, you can't get it so quickly as that.

You see what we are trying to point out is, our conditioning through the millennia has been to make an effort, conflict. Conflict, effort, involves time. Right? Of course, because it is a division in time. Right sir? So there is always conflict, from childhood till we die, there is always struggle, struggle, battle because of this division in time. Right? (I am glad there is at least somebody who is seeing this.) And is it possible to act without effort, without time? That is, to perceive, and that very perception is action - not idea and then interval and action, which is the division of time. In that division various other incidents take place: if I have to go from here to there, then other things are happening. So, when there is the division in the movement of time, other incidents take place, which we call problems. I hope you are getting all this. Right sir? We are asking: can the brain which is so conditioned by millennia, by a million years, perceive and that very perception is instant action? Because we have no time. We are decaying, we are degenerating, we are corrupt, and if you allow time, you will become more and more degenerate, which is what is happening. Which is, when you say, I will not degenerate but I will regenerate, you have lost it: so, we are saying, what does it mean to perceive? You understand my question sir? Which is, can I - is there a possibility of this perception of the image, which gets hurt, and perceive the danger both biologically as well as psychologically, the danger of having an image - to see it instantly and the very seeing is the ending of the image, which does not allow time? Have you got it sir? Please, intellectually even grasp it. So, if you have grasped it verbally, which is the intellectual process, and the watching with intellect, what it does, the moment you have grasped it intellectually, it has already become an idea. Right? Of course. Right sir. It has already become an idea. Therefore, you have moved away from perception.

I wonder if you see this. Right?

So perception implies the comprehension of the word, the word has a relative value which is the understanding of the intellect, and being aware of that and not letting it wander off into an idea. And perception implies the operation of the intellect, the whole reactions at their highest level, and seeing what is exactly the truth of an image, and therefore the ending of it. Are you doing it or are you playing with words? Please. We are saying something that goes totally contrary to everything that you have accepted. So what you hear, don't let that become a tradition, then you are lost; but whereas if you actually listen - because what we are saying is the truth that as long as you have an image created by your society, by your colleges, universities, by your relationship with another and so on and so on, as long as you have an image about yourself, that image is going to get hurt, and that hurt expresses itself in various forms - trying to dominate people, trying to withdraw from and so on and so on. Seeing, listening to the truth of that, listening with all your capacity, your intellect, every nerve listening, then that very listening is the perception and ending of it, which has no time. You understand this? That is, violence is one of the inherited responses from the earliest of times. Right? Man has been violent from timeless time. And we have done everything to be free of that violence. We have invented non-violence, an idea which goes overboard. We have tried every way - to be gentle, to be kind, to be generous, and yet in our hearts, in our relationships with each other we are very violent people.

And religions, what they have said, 'Try, work, forget yourself, don't be violent, don't kill,' but from time immemorial we are still doing the same thing. So we say it will take time to dissipate this violence. Such a deception, you follow, sir? We have taken over a million years and we have not got rid of it, and we think in another million years we will be rid of it, in the meantime let me be violent. That is the game we play. So we are saying: is it possible to end that violence instantly? That means the understanding that psychologically, inwardly, there is no time at all, that you don't become. You follow sir? You don't become, you don't achieve enlightenment. Which means the whole movement of time.

So, we are saying: observe violence, which is to be angry, to hate, to be jealous, various forms of violence, and don't escape into a non-violent movement, which is the opposite. So, when you observe the fact, there is no opposite. Are you following all this? I observe violence in me. I am violent. Why should there be non-violence? That's my conditioning. Right? That's my hope. That's my intellectual concept - one day I will be non-violent. So the fact of violence, the fact has no opposite. Right? Do you see that? If you see that, it is finished. You understand? Because all our education, all our religion, everything traditional has said: work at it, gradually get rid of it. Which is movement in time, which is division. Time is division. So when there is observation of violence, only violence, the observer who is watching the violence - you follow? - that very observer is violence. Right? Right? So the observer is the observed. Are you getting tired? You understand sir? The moment you have a division is the movement in time, and therefore there must be effort which is, the observer is thinking, the observer thinks he is different from the thing he observes, and so the very division brings conflict, conflict, suppression and all the rest of it. But when the observer realizes that which he is observing is part of himself, so there is no division, there is no duality at all. Right? So, can you see this fact that you are violent, and the fact has no division.

So, what has taken place in the mind? What has taken place in your mind when you are only observing the fact and not inventing the opposite? You understand? That you are jealous, that you are envious, that is the fact, and the observer is the observed, which is envy. So there is no conflict or suppression with regard to a particular reaction. The reaction is a fact. Now, can the mind totally observe this reaction which is a fact, called jealousy? You get it sir? Observe without any movement of time. The moment you have the movement of time, you have brought about division. Is this actually taking place? Because, we are saying: you eliminate totally every form of conflict in which you have been conditioned for millennia, to live without a single conflict, which means to live without a single problem. I wonder if you understand this. You may have technological problems: how to go to the moon, it took them a long time, three hundred thousand people working at that one thing, it took many years. But if we understand the nature of time, the whole structure of time, psychologically as well as physical time, then we relegate physical time to its proper place. I have to catch a bus, train, aeroplane, whatever it is, go to the office, and so on. But psychologically there is no time. Which means to live a life without a single problem. Have you ever gone into this question? Right? Meditation is not a problem which you are all making into a problem: how to sit, how to breath, you know, the system, the methods, the various gurus offering various tricks, and all that.

What is a problem? Please apply it. Test it in your life and you will see it will work. What is a problem? The problem is something that you have not resolved. There are mathematical problems, scientific problems, biological. We are not talking about them. We are talking about psychological problems between human beings, the problems that exist in our relationship with another, husband, wife - you know, and all the rest of it. A problem implies the non-resolution of it. Now, can you resolve that problem as it arises and end it, not carry it over even for a day? Because, see what happens - a problem continued makes the brain dull actually. You can test it out for yourself. The brain's activity is made slower because it is burdened, it makes itself incapacitated. It has no capacity or elasticity when you carry over a problem for many, many, many years, or even for a week. So the question is: can you end the problem as it arises? You understand? Are you interested in all this? Sir, do it. Don't accept the words but actually test it. Then it is worth it. But if you say: 'Yes, nice idea, nice thing, but I cannot do it. You tell me how to do it,' there is no how, because the how implies a method, a system. If somebody tells you what to do, you are back in the old game of tradition. Right? So, a mind that is clear has no tradition. So, one has a problem; problem implies that which has not been thought out, investigated, resolved. Our problems exist in the field of relationship. Right? And between man and woman, sexual, non-sexual, friendly - you follow - the whole communication between man and man and woman and man, the whole field of it, not just one particular problem, either sexual or this or that. We are dealing with the whole human problem in relationship, not a particular problem. Because, if we were examining only a particular problem, then we are dealing with a part and not with the whole. Is that clear? Come on sirs.

So we are dealing with the whole problem of human relationship, with the boss, in the factory, when you come home, with your wife, with your husband, sex, non-sex, domination, wanting to possess, attachment - all that implies problem. First of all, why do we have problems? Why do we live with problems? You understand? Is it we are lazy, is it that we have accepted as the norm of life to have problems, or is it that for millennia we have problems, why not now, carry on? Which means, the mind, the brain has accepted problems as part of life. Right? So, refuse to accept problems. You understand? Challenge the brain and the mind to have no problems. No, don't agree sir, you have to do it. Which means the problem arises as it inevitably will, unless you have real love in your heart - not sexual love, not love of power, position and all that nonsense; I won't go into that, that goes off somewhere else - but how to deal with a problem without allowing a single second of interval. Right?

We will go into it. A problem arises as long as there is a centre. Right? As long as there is the centre, there must be circumference, diameter - you follow? The whole circle. The whole circle is our problem. Right? To have no centre is to have no problem. Please sir see what is involved in it, not just shake your head and say: Yes, I agree with you. That has no meaning, but see what is implied in it. First of all, the depth of it, the beauty of it, the rationality of it, the sanity of it, that as long as there is a 'me' with a centre, I must have problems. Right? They may be very dangerous problems, destructive problems or superficial problems. And as long as there is a problem, there is no love. But of course that does not exist, so we can skip that. We shall come back to it later.

So, is it possible to live in a world, in the modern world, having a wife, husband, children, going to a job and all the rest of it, without having a centre? You understand sir? See the fact, the fact that as long as you have a centre, there must be problems, and if you say that's my life, to have problems, perfectly right, carry on. But if you say problems are most destructive, not only to the brain but the wholeness of the mind, the mind that is fit, alive, active, because every problem is like a blanket that smothers. So if you see the fact that the centre is to have problems - right? Not only hear it but see the truth of it - then what takes place? You understand? A mind, a being that has no centre and has to live with a wife and a husband, and the whole culture - no, not culture, I won't call it culture - the whole world, which means you are acting every minute. Life is action. Right? But when you act from a centre, you are introducing the whole problem. I don't know if you see it. See the framework of it, the wholeness of it. That is, the mind that is functioning with a centre has created innumerable problems - politically, economically, socially, and in the intimate or not intimate relationship. And having a problem is the most destructive way of living. That destroys the youth of the brain, the youth of the mind. If you listen to it and see the truth of it, it is over. There is no how. There is only the act of listening.

Tradition means - the word - to hand down from generation to generation values, rituals, dogmas, beliefs, gods, pujas - the whole thing that man is caught in, and in that tradition nothing can flourish. It is like a steamroller going over human beings, and if you accept that, all right, live with it, and be happy with it. But you are not going to answer the challenge of the world, the global challenge which is that man must free himself of everything to flower. Flowering can only take place in the soil of human relationship. Right sir? Not somewhere else in the Himalayas or in some monastery - even there, he is in relationship with his fellow beings. And culture which is to grow, to develop, to have the highest excellence ethically, is not possible when you are merely, your mind has become merely a machine, which tradition does. And tradition has said, accept time. Then, somebody comes along, like me, and says, don't, you won't find light, enlightenment, at the end of time, you will find it where you are now.

MADRAS 4TH PUBLIC TALK 7TH JANUARY 1979

I wonder often why we come together like this, listening to a speaker, half serious, curious and not really wanting to change one's life totally. One has become rather mediocre, without a flair, without any quality of genius. I am saying genius in the sense, not of any particular talent or particular gift, but the genius of a mind that comprehends the totality of life, which is our life, a vast complex, contradictory, unhappy existence. And one listens to all this, to what the speaker has to say, and one goes away with partial understanding, with no deep intention and serious attention to bring about a deep psychological revolution. And one wonders often why human beings tolerate the kind of life one leads. You may blame the circumstances, the society, the political organization, but blaming others has not solved our problems. We drift and our life seems such a waste, either going to the office from morning till night for the next fifty years or so and then retire to die or vegetate or grumble or fade away quietly.

And when one looks at one's own life with all its extraordinary beauty, the vastness of what man has achieved technologically, one wonders why there has been so little beauty in our life. I mean by that word not merely the appearance of beauty, the decoration of the outer, but that quality of great communication with nature. If one loses contact with nature, one loses relationship with other human beings. You may read poems if you are so inclined, you may read all the beautiful sonnets and the lyrical swing of a lovely poem, but imagination is not beauty. The appreciation of a cloud and the love of light in that cloud and a sheet of water along a dry road, or a bird perched on a single branch - all that enchantment we rarely see or appreciate or love because we are occupied with our own problems, with our own worries, with our peculiar ideas and fixations, and are never free. And beauty is this quality of freedom which is totally different from independence.

When you listen to all this, I wonder what you make of it. Whether we see a dog and love that dog or a rock or a stray cloud passing by, when we have not that sense of extraordinary communication with the world which brings about great beauty, we become small human beings, mediocre, wasting our extraordinary life and losing all the beauty and the depth of existence. But I am afraid we must get back to realities. Though that is also real, extraordinarily real, the branch, the shadow, the light on a leaf, the fluttering parrot, that's also actual, real, and when we understand the swaying palm tree and the whole feeling of life, then there is a great sense of depth to beauty. But we are not interested in all that. Are you? I am afraid we are not. We listen, and let it slip by. You may sound romantic, sentimental, but beauty is not romantic, not sentimental, nor emotional. It is something very, very solid, like a rock in the midst of a fast flowing stream. So, we will leave that for the moment and come back to what we were saying yesterday, and I think some of it must be repeated, and I hope you won't mind if one repeats it.

We were saying, weren't we, that where there is tradition, there is no culture. Tradition handed down from generation to generation, certain concepts, beliefs, values, principles, all laid down intellectually, and such abiding tradition of 3000 years or 10 days old, in that soil culture cannot possibly blossom. Culture means to grow, to develop, not merely the intellectual side of life, but the whole totality of one's own life. Not merely to function in one direction completely, politically or have certain genius with regard to words or with stone or painting but to develop, cultivate one's mind and one's heart. That's not possible where there is tradition, that is, values handed down - in that soil nothing can grow. And that is what we were saying yesterday.

And also we were saying time which is a very complex thing must be investigated, must be considered. We said time is movement in division. Right? Yesterday, today and tomorrow. The knowledge which man has acquired, both scientific, so-called religious, and experience is the past, and that past meets the present, modifies itself and goes on - the future. That's the whole movement of time. And we were saying yesterday too that our minds are so conditioned to accept time as a means of comprehension, as a means of becoming, developing, evolving. Our whole life from childhood is based on this idea of becoming, growing, evolving. In a certain sense, both biologically and physically, time does exist: the acorn growing in to an oak, that needs time. And we were saying that psychological time does not exist at all. The idea that through time psychologically, which is ethically, morally, spiritually, if one can use that word spiritually without being romantic or nonsensical, to really understand the religious mind, time is a destructive element. That is what we talked about yesterday more or less.

If one may, we must investigate what is order. Order - please just listen, don't agree or disagree but like the wind, breeze comes, so in the same way just listen - order is sequence in space. You understand that? No. We said order cannot exist without sequence, and there must be space. We are going to examine that because our life is disorderly, confused, contradictory. We are talking very simply. And where there is contradiction, there is no order. Where there is confusion, conflict, there is no order. And our life, as we live it daily, is a mass of contradiction, confusion and conflict and dishonesty. Right? That's a fact. And one wonders if order can be brought about in this confusion. Because without order there is no efficiency, both intellectual or if you have capacity you must have order. Order has nothing whatever to do with sentiment, with romance. Order is very, very sequential, logical, sane. So, we are going to enquire into what is order, whether we can have order, not a blueprint, not something laid down by tradition or by a guru or by a leader or by our own little desires and compulsions, but we are going to enquire in what is lasting order. Are you interested in this? How to bring about order in our life so that there is no opposite, duality, contradiction, dishonesty - politically, religiously or in our relationship with each other. You are interested in this? Or do you want me to talk about meditation? And you can go often into some kind of illusion and think that we are meditating. Because you see without bringing about order in our daily life, do what you will, there can be no meditation. So we are laying the foundation of what is meditation.

If one realizes actually what our daily life is, how disorderly it is, how contradictory it is, controlled by various objects of desire, seeking power, position, living in arrogance and vanity, and yet at the same time talk about the people, the goodness and read books and you know, you play around with all that - all that indicates, doesn't it, a terribly dishonest life, a life of total contradiction, like an excellent lawyer who is capable of arguments and beating the other side and going off to some temple miles away to worship. You understand the contradiction? And they are totally unaware of that. So, the first thing is to realize how disorderly our life is. To be aware, not how to bring order is disorder. Please listen to this - not how to bring order in disorder, but to understand the nature of disorder. Right? When I understand the nature of disorder, then out of that comprehension, out of that obvious fact, comes the beauty of order, not imposed or disciplined or suppressed or conformed, but in the very investigating of disorder, naturally out of that investigation order comes. Right? You understand this? Now, let us do it.

First, let us be aware, as human beings who have got such extraordinary capacity, look what they have done technologically - immense things have been done. And as human beings who are so extraordinarily capable, who have thought out almost every form of concept, principles, ideas, religious projections, invented rituals that are really most beautiful some of them but have no meaning at all. And the human mind - I don't know if you have gone into your own mind, if you have, you can observe it - what great quality it has. And to challenge such a mind, to demand that it shall operate at its highest excellence. Will you do it as we are talking so that your mind - your mind being not only the various forms of sensory activities, your mind being the emotions, affection, love, care, attention, the intellectual capacity, and that sense of great love - all that is the mind, the wholeness of the mind, to challenge that. Do you understand what I am saying? That it shall operate at its highest, at its greatest excellence.. Because if you don't challenge it, we live in disorder. You are following this?

So we are enquiring into what constitutes why human beings centuries upon centuries have accepted to live in disorder, politically, religiously, economically, socially, and in our relationship with each other. You understand? Why? Why have we accepted to live this way? From whom do you expect the answer? Do you understand? A challenge implies that you respond, that you respond with your highest capacity, and not wait for the speaker to respond and so how to respond. You follow? You understand what I am saying? I have challenged your mind, the speaker has said: exercise your highest capacity, exercise all your energy to find out whether it is possible to live in a world that is degenerating, corrupt, immoral, whether you can live a sane, a life that is completely whole - that is your challenge. You understand? What is your response to it? Whole, the word 'whole', means first healthy, both physically, psychologically, with all the capacities of your mind, and that is sanity. And the word 'whole' also means holy, sacred. That is the whole of life.

So we are asking whether you as a human being are aware of the total disorder and degeneration out in the world around you and in yourself, the degenerating process going on. Are you aware of it? Aware in the sense, observe what is actually taking place, not imagine what is taking place, nor idea of what is taking place, but the actual happening: the political, the religious, the social, the moral degeneration of man. And no institution, no guru, no higher principles, are going to stop this degradation. Are we aware of it?

If we are, then what shall we do? Right? Right sir? What shall we do? What is your action - not in some future date - what is your immediate action? Will you join some sect, will you follow some guru or will you go back to your old tradition, repeat something or other, which is to escape from the actual fact of the brain that is getting old, degenerating. Or will you, together, you and I, investigate, explore why human beings have become like this? It is happening the world over, it is not just the speciality of this spiritual land. Sorry to use the word 'spiritual', because you are so proud of your own culture. It is like a politician saying we are very old, our culture is ancient, then that gives him a certain sense of dignity, but in his heart he is - you know what it is, I don't have to tell you. So, what shall we do? I would suggest that we first look at our life - actually what it is, what is happening in our life, because our life in action is society. Right sir? You get it? Agreed? Our life in action is our society, and you cannot transform that society unless you transform yourself. That's so obvious. The communist, the liberal, the socialist will not alter it. Or your reading the Gita or the Upanishads will not alter it, or becoming terribly interested in what Buddhism has to say, or follow Zen meditation - none of those will solve it.

So let us look at what is happening in our life, our daily life. Our daily life is based on relationship. Without relationship you cannot possibly exist. Right? What is our relationship with each other, not you two sitting together, I don't mean that, but with your wife, with your husband, with your boss, with your factory worker, with your neighbour, what is the relationship with each other? In that relationship, is there order? Not self-centred activity, opposed to another self-centred activity - you follow that? That's contradiction. I may be married, have children, sex and all the rest of it, and if I am self-centred, concerned about my own success, my ambition, my status, worrying about my - all the rest of it - and she is also concerned about herself, her problems, her beauty, her looks, you know, and all the rest of it - how can there be any kind of relationship between the two people? You understand all this. If you have one belief and the other has another kind of belief or another kind of conclusion, another kind of dogma, there is no relationship. Haven't you noticed all this? So, is it possible to bring order in our relationship, with your wife and husband, not with the universe, not with cosmos, not with god. God is an invention of the intellect. You can have extraordinary relationship with those things that you have invented, deal with illusions. But to have relationship with your wife and husband and children so that there is no conflict between us, that's where order begins. Right? Right sir? Now, how will you bring order there? Because order is - please listen to it, listen to the beauty of it at least - order is sequence in space. We are going to examine this, what we mean by space, what we mean by sequence, what we mean by order.

If we have no relation with each other, there is fear. Either one dominates the other, either they separate but only come together in bed. So we live a brutal life with each other. Haven't you noticed all this? Don't you have all this? And in what way shall we bring order so that it is enduring - not one day order, the next day disorder? What brings about this contradiction in relationship? What brings this division between you, your wife, your husband and your children? Division is disorder. Right? Right sirs? Muslim and the Hindu, the Jew and the Arab, the communist, totalitarianism and freedom. These opposites are the essence of disorder. Right? So what brings about disorder in our human relationship, with the most intimate and not so intimate? Have you ever thought about it? Come on, sirs. Or are you frightened to look at this disorder, because, when you become aware that your wife and yourself, and the husband or the wife become aware of this disorder, either they accept it and live with it or they analyze it, go into it, and investigate it, and that may bring about a tremendous change, and there is the fear of change. You are following what we are saying? Right sir? There's my friend at least that I can talk to!

What brings about this disorder? I am saying something, please listen carefully, we are investigating. I am not saying it is right or wrong. Is it desire? I mean by desire, the sensory responses, with its images thought has created, and the action, the urge of that desire? You understand me? I mean by desire, the speaker means by desire - please investigate it as we go along, don't accept what he is saying - the perceiving, the seeing, sensory seeing, contact, sensation, and with the sensation goes the images which thought has created, and desire. You have understood this? Is this fairly clear? You see a nice thing: the seeing, the touching, the smelling, the tasting and the sensation, the sensation which is identified with the image which thought has created, and desire is the outcome of it. Right? Clear? So we are asking: is one of the factors of this contradiction this lack of relationship? I am using the word 'relationship' in its right sense - to be wholly in contact with each other, not merely sensory contact, not merely sexual contact, but in contact holistically, wholly with another. Is that prevented by desire?

So we are investigating, is desire love? Because with desire goes fear and one of the factors of disorder is fear. Right? So, we are saying: the factor of disorder is desire and fear and the incessant pursuit of pleasure. We have explained what desire is. With desire goes will. Will is the action, concentrated action of desire. Right sirs? Just investigate. And we function, our life is based on desire, will and fulfilment, and with it goes frustration. And out of this comes fear, various forms of fear: fear of not being successful, fear of losing a job, fear of being lonely, fear of not having loved, or given to you, fear of losing attachment, fear of darkness, fear of physical pain, and so on and so on and so on. You are familiar with all this, aren't you?

So we are saying: the major factor of disorder is the operation of desire, always with the picture of achievement, and fear, the fear that has not been resolved by human beings - fear of death, fear of loneliness, fear of not having the capacity to act greatly, and so on and so on. And also one of the causes of disorder is this incessant pursuit of pleasure. So we are going to examine those three things very carefully because our concern is to bring about order, and to bring about order one must understand this confusion in which we live, and the confusion is this activity of desire with its changing objects. You may not, when you are young, you may not want to have a great status, a great position, great wealth, but as you grow older the thing changes, as you approach death, you want enlightenment, god and all the rest of it. So, the objects of desire change constantly. And fear which is one of the major factors of disorder in our relationship, intimate and not intimate, and the longing, the private personal pursuit of pleasure. So, these are the major, deep factors of disorder in our life. We have explained the process of desire - seeing, touching, tasting, smelling, the sensory responses, from that sensory response sensations, with contact, then thought, saying, how marvellous it would be if I could have that. Which is the thought creating the image of a car with you driving it and having fun. So that is the movement of desire.

We are saying: what is fear? Please go with me, find out for yourself because we have lived generation after generation with fear. We have good brains. We have got capacity to resolve fear, not to live with it. To live with it is to live in darkness. To live with it is to deny the beauty of total existence, the beauty of the earth, the beauty of the sky. So, we have to understand it, not intellectually but delve deeply into the very roots of fear.

Fear is time. Look at it carefully. There is physical fear: the bodily pain, the remembering of that pain and hoping that pain will not happen again, that is duration of time. Right? You are following this? Please, if you don't give your mind to it - because it is very important for us to understand this, because the mind demands that human beings be free, because when you are free, life becomes totally different. And a person who is burdened with fear can never be free. And when the mind is enveloped with fear, there is no possibility of clarity, of insight, or pure unadulterated perception of things. So, we are saying that time is the movement of fear. I have had pain last week, the remembrance of that pain, physical pain, and there is the fear that it might come back again. Right? That is one fear. The physical fear of getting hurt, having pain, or having been ill and hoping it will never come back again.

Now, can you - please listen to this - can you, when you have pain, physical pain, when it is over totally forget it, totally non-register it? You understand my point? Have you understood what I have said? I am sure most of us have had some kind of physical pain of different kinds, varieties, multiple kinds of physical pain. When it happens, to observe it and not let that pain be registered in the brain. Will you do it as we are talking? Now let us look at it for a minute. The brain's capacity consists in registering everything that has happened to it, like a computer, it is registering. You must have noticed, obviously. The happening to the physical is registered, and then that registered happening is a remembrance, and that remembrance, that memory of that pain brings about fear that it might happen again. We are asking a very simple thing but very subtle. Go into it. You will see it for yourself. Having physical pain and not let it become a memory. You understand sir? Do you follow what I am saying?

Now. Just a minute. You hurt me by calling me a name, or praised me, as yesterday somebody did - not to register the pain or the insult, so that your brain is fresh. When you register, it is the movement of time. Right? So, we are saying, fear is the movement in time. I can understand physical pain. I know I can look, observe it very carefully when it is happening, be very, very attentive or let it happen and not be associated with it at all. I am telling you something which actually happened to the speaker. I am not inventing this. Then, fear is what might happen, or what has happened and the remembrance of it and projecting that remembrance into the future and saying: I am afraid. Do you understand? That is, the movement from the past through the present to the future. Most of us are afraid of, what? Look at yourself sir, investigate what you are afraid of. You may not be afraid of sitting there now. Obviously. But when you leave here, the fears come back, conscious or deeply hidden. What are your fears? Fear of death, fear of loneliness, fear of not achieving enlightenment, fear of not being very successful and having a lot of money, fear of being dominated by another, whether it is the husband or the wife - what is one afraid of? And can you analyze it? Please listen. In analysis several things are implied. There is the analyzer and the thing which is going to be analyzed. Right? In analysis is implied time. You follow? I have to analyze all the time, that includes time. And every analysis must be complete, otherwise, I remember, the remembrance continues, and with that remembrance you analyze, therefore, it is never complete. You understand? It does not matter. First of all, in analysis, there is the analyzer and the analyzed. The analyzer is the analyzed, right? That is, thought has divided itself as the analyzer and the thing to be analyzed. So, it has created a division. Thought in its very process is limited and therefore fragmentary and therefore has the capacity to divide. That which is limited is always capable of division, that which is whole is never, can never be, divided. I wonder if you capture all this? Please don't look at me like a guru.

So, we are saying analysis will not solve the problem. You can discover the cause, and the discovery of the cause and the effect of the cause, and the effect becomes the cause for the next happening. So this is a constant chain, the cause becoming the effect, the effect becoming the cause. Right? In that circle there is no answer. You will have to think it out for yourself if you are so inclined, because we are so used to analysis which prevents direct perception. So we are asking: what is the cause of this extraordinary fear that human beings have, both conscious as well as deep hidden fears? If you observe or look into fear, fear is never actual. Do you understand? Only you are recording either when it is over or might happen in the future. Right? I don't know if you understand this. All right, let me put it differently. Why am I working so hard for you? The other day a man asked me when I went out of the talk, he said to me: you ask us why we come, what reason, curiosity or this or that. He said: why do you speak? Do you want to know why I speak? Because sir - oh, forget it, it doesn't matter, it's not important.

Like pleasure, at the instant of pleasure there is no recording. It is only a second later that recording takes place. Haven't you noticed it? Have you? Sexual, any form of pleasure, as it is actually happening, you are totally unaware that it is called pleasure. If you have been angry, I hope you haven't, if you have been angry, at the moment of that feeling, it is just a feeling, but when you begin to name it, which is a second later, it becomes anger. Then you say, I must control. I must not be angry, and all the rest of it. So please just listen: at the moment of a pleasurable thing happening to you, there is no recording, the brain is not functioning. Only a second later, thought comes along and says: how marvellous that was, that meal was so good, that sunset was so lovely, I must have more of that kind of food, or I must see more sunsets with such delight. You follow? Are you aware at the moment of fear, at the second of the thing arising, and as it arises not to let thought come into it, recognize it from its past experience, say, that's anger, but to realize thought has no place at the moment of action? You understand all this? That requires great alertness. So, if the mind is so alert, at the moment of arising of the feeling called fear, to realize it, and the very realization of it, the truth of it, prevents thought from interfering. Have you understood this? Are you doing it?

So fear and pleasure go together. Have you realized that too? You cannot have one and deny the other. So, to delve into both, see the whole movement of fear and pleasure, and the desire which is involved in fear as well as in pleasure, see the whole nature and the structure of it, not intellectually, verbally, but actually as you see this microphone - then you come to the question that the fear or the pleasure is not different from the observer. The observer is fear. Please listen to it. There is no thinker without thought. Thought has separated the thinker and itself as being separate from the thing which it has created. Right? So, the thinker is always trying to control, shape thought. So, fear is not separate from the observer, yourself, you are part of it. And when you say, I must control it, I must have courage, I must escape from it, I must dodge it, I must analyze it, you are playing a game with yourself. Whereas if you recognize that fact, the truth that this fear is you, you are the result of time, you are the result of thought put together by various... I won't go into all this. It is fairly simple. So, fear is you, and when you have realized that, you cannot possibly act, and therefore you are observing it purely. When you observe, the very thing which you are observing undergoes a radical change. Are you doing it? Will you do it? Will you observe without the observer because the observer is the past and the observer will prevent clear, objective, direct perception. So, realizing that, the observer says: I have no place in observation, and therefore the observation is pure. When you observe fear without the observer, which is the past, then that very fear which is being observed, undergoes a radical change. It is no longer fear. At least, will you memorize this? Intellectually see what is implied? That fear and the avoidance of it or the suppression of it or the transmuting it or saying, I must struggle with it, all that will not wipe away fear because you have done all these things and it has remained with you for millennia. And we are saying something entirely different. We are saying the fear is you. You are the result of time, and can there be observation of that fear without time, without remembrance. Just to look. That is, can you look at your wife or your husband as though you are looking at them for the first time in your life without all the remembrances of the sexual pleasure, the nagging, the bullying, dominating, without any of that, to look? Because, knowledge prevents you from looking, and it is the freedom from knowledge that will end fear completely, not partly, not this fear, that fear, but the root of fear.

And in the same way, can you look at pleasure? Right? You have lots of pleasures, haven't you? Sexual pleasure, pleasure of having money, pleasure of having a position, pleasure of being somebody politically - you know all that business - pleasure of having power, pleasure of having a good mind, pleasure of having a good body, the pleasure that comes through comparison with its fear, the pleasure of imitating somebody and becoming more than that which you are imitating. Right? All these extraordinary forms of pleasure; pleasure to find enlightenment, which is the ultimate pleasure of seeking god, which is really a tawdry affair. So, can you investigate into yourself the whole nature of pleasure?

Because, as we said, pleasure is the movement of desire, broken up in time. To observe it minutely, precisely, with great precision, to observe, not to analyze.

So, we are saying: the cause of disorder is desire, fear and the everlasting pursuit of pleasure. It does not mean suppressing the delight of seeing a beautiful thing, the delight and the enjoyment of a lovely sky, looking at the morning star, bright, alone, or seeing across towards the southern cross towards the South - the very seeing of the heavens is a great delight. But the moment thought says: I must go back again on the balcony, look at that Venus, the morning star, then begins the whole pursuit of pleasure. Just to look.

So, we are saying these are the causes of disorder. When you have understood that, not intellectually but actually finished with it, so that you have joy in your heart. Joy is not pleasure, but the moment you remember the joy and say, I have had a most marvellous moment of joy, how I wish I could get back to that, then it becomes pleasure, and you have lost it. This is the sequence in our life to establish order with our family.

What is space? It is twenty five past six. I think you are too tired. I cannot deal with space. It requires a great deal of investigation. Space in the mind. That means never a mind that is occupied with any problem. But our minds are so occupied, so crowded with belief, with pursuit, with all kinds of things, confusion, illusion, so, there is no space. So, where there is no space, there cannot be sequence and order. And if there is no order in our daily life, for heaven's sake, realize this, in our daily moments of everyday life, your meditation is merely an escape from your ugly life. And escape into meditation only leads to illusion. So one must lay the foundation to find out that which is beyond thought, that which is immeasurable, that which has no word. But that cannot come into being without this sense of great order in which there is total freedom.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC DIALOGUE 9TH JANUARY 1979

Personally I don't like to sit on platforms. The little height doesn't give the speaker any authority. So this morning let us talk over together as a dialogue between two friends concerned with their life, with all the calamity of daily existence around them, their confusion, their misery; they are not talking about their theories or beliefs, they are deeply concerned to understand their own problems, their own misery, their own confusion. So if we could not discuss, or have a dialogue about theories, but actually be concerned with our daily life, then what shall we talk about together? It's up to you, sirs, this is a dialogue.

Q: Knowledge is essential and knowledge is also not essential, but living in a daily life we seek the knowledge, but as a matter of fact in daily life we must corrupt others, or we have to be corrupted ourselves. How to remove this confusion otherwise if we don't corrupt others or if we are not corrupted then we cannot have our basic needs.

K: How can one live in this world, in India, and probably he means Madras, without being corrupted amongst people who are already corrupt, how to live such a life in which there is no corruption. Any other questions? Sir, this is a dialogue between us two, between that gentleman and you, so let's all talk over, discuss, what would you like to ask apart from that question?

Q: You said psychological memory has to go altogether. Can we dispense with psychological memory altogether?

K: Can we dispense with psychological memories altogether?

Any others?

Q: You said the observer is the same as the observed, and in the same breath you ask us to observe ourselves without referring to the past.

K: The observer is not different from the observed, and at the same time you say, observe without reference to the past.

Q: Are there two kinds of observation?

K: Yes, yes, we will go into it.

Q: Your teachings, sir, are very good directives so far as individual lives are concerned, but we are today in an atmosphere where politics is dominating the whole life, not merely our economic life, social life, political life, even philosophical life. How to combat that and improve the situation so that an atmosphere is created in which individuals can continue their own psychological and other ideas as well as the aims and objectives of individual lives.

K: The questioner asks, politics dominate, all our lives are controlled, shaped by politics. And is it possible for the individual to be free from this pressure of politics. Right sir?

Q: No, how to control that controller.

K: How to control the government. Right sir?

Q: Yes.

Q: Sir, you said it is thought that creates the division between the thinker and the thought, and therefore this division can go when we operate outside the realm of thought. But at the same time you can see, sir, that thought is necessary for mechanical things like driving a car, locating a house, or taking the drive which we did yesterday. To establish this order of keeping thought in the proper place, and excluding it, it means giving up every little thing that we have been caught up in. I have been hearing you, sir, for so many years, it is an extraordinary and very difficult effort to give up every little thing to which we have been clinging to. This is the difficulty, sir.

K: Right, sir. How is one to be totally detached from all the things that man has accumulated through thought, through millennia. Is that the question, sir?

Q: Yes.

Q: You say there is no god except that which is created by thought, then what is there?

K: What is there? Since you say, the speaker is saying, since you say there is no god except that which is created by thought, if there is no god then what is there. That's enough questions.

Q: One more question. I am not indulging in a trick of words, but you say keep your memory off except for facts, and do away with tradition. But we all listened to music yesterday, for example, and that music was wholly tradition and wholly memory, without perfection of tradition and the perfection of memory there would not have been that music. How do you explain that, sir?

K: There would be no music as yesterday afternoon if it wasn't traditional, and all the content of the song were totally and completely traditional.

Q: And also memory.

K: Memory is operating. I think that is enough. Just a minute, sir. All right, sir.

Q: Can we discuss observation is an instantaneous action.

K: All right, you have stated it. Yes, sir?

Q: Truth is indivisible and unchangeable, and how can it change from day to day, sir?

K: Truth is indivisible and unchangeable, how can truth change from day to day. If you don't mind my pointing out - how do you know what truth is? You have taken it for granted that there is truth, and how to apply that truth in daily life, from moment to moment. Sir, we very carefully explained - I will go into it later.

Now there are several questions put: the observer and the observed, the thinker and the thought, is it possible to observe without the observer; governments are controlling all our lives, can we unburden ourselves of this weight of governments; and - what else? I think generally all the questions apply, come to that point. Now which of the questions would you like to go into? And please bear in mind, has this any relationship with your daily life, or are we just playing with words outside somewhere?

Q: The question about relation which this gentleman put.

K: Has that any effect in our daily life? Are you asking this question from your consideration of your daily life? Can we go on with that question, do you want to discuss that question?

Q: We can discuss about the control of the government and our day to day life.

K: The control of government from day to day in our daily life. Can we dispense with that question? No, I'll answer it, we'll discuss it. What is government? And who are the politicians who are taking the responsibility of governing the people? In a democratic society, in a free election society, you elect the government, the politicians. Right? You are responsible for the government. And if you don't want that government, pull it down. It's for you. Right?

By your vote, change the government, if you don't like it.

Q: The whole difficulty is with the majority of the people.

K: Wait. I am coming to that sir. The whole difficulty is that a few of us may desire, or want, feel the urge to change the governments, but the vast majority of people, ignorant, they don't know actually what is going on - right, sir - they are hood-winked, they are cheated, they are cleverly put into a corner where they cannot possibly respond, and what is one to do. Is that the question, sir?

Q: Though the governments are democratic they have authoritarian power, and these voters are merely individuals.

K: I know, he explained that, sir. The questioner - now first of all let's be clear. Those who are capable, desirous, wish through voting can bring about change, a few. The vast majority of people are ignorant, deceived, promised and all the nonsense of electioneering goes on, what is one to do? You and another may want to change the government, you may vote right, liberal, centre, conservative, and so on, what will you do when the vast majority of people elect somebody who is corrupt, power-minded, concerned with his own self, with his own little family, what are you to do? Answer me sir, it is your problem, not mine, what will you do? In a totalitarian government you have no choice, they are firmly fixed in their power. So what will you do? It's your problem, sir, don't just leave it to me because I am off in three weeks to Europe and America and so on, I have no vote, I don't want to vote. The whole rotten system, I don't want to come into it. What will you do? You understand, sir? This has been a human problem all along, from the ancient of times, the few want to change, live decently, not be corrupt, a few, but the vast majority is living a life of corruption, that is their way of living, smuggling and all the things that are going on. And what are the few to do?

Q: May I say a word, sir? On the lines we are discussing and on the lines we understand you.

K: No, you don't have to understand me at all.

Q: No. On the lines you want us to work.

K: No, no. We are thinking together.

Q: Yes, we work hard every day on this problem with ourselves, and yet we find thought is the stumbling block all the time, and so we continue to be clear and confused, clear and confused. That's what is happening.

K: That's what that gentleman was saying, the same thing, sir. Government is elected by the vast majority, the vast majority are ignorant - you know what they are. And the few wish to change, what will you do to bring about change in the vast majority? Please answer me, sir, it's your life.

Q: You have got to change yourself first. If you are at the centre of the change it permeates.

K: Right, sir, change yourself first. Will you? No, sir, I am not asking an insulting question or an impudent question. No, sir, please just listen, sir. It is very easy to say somebody must change, I must change - will you radically, deeply change?

Q: Why not?

K: I didn't say, why not. Will you?

Q: I will.

K: When?

Q: I am, right now. All the time I have been listening to you, yes.

K: Good, sir. Then how will you, if you change, affect the mass? That's the question, sir. That's one problem. Just listen to it. The other problem involved in governments, both totalitarian, communist, socialist, liberal and so on, is the question of power. Man desires power, both so-called siddhis as well as physical powers. Right sir? That question has not been solved. So how will you bring about a change in the cessation of power of the few, democratic, whatever party you have, and educate or help the vast majority who don't care as long as they have a little land, a little food, they are absolutely satisfied, what will you do?

Q: Educate is the only way, there is no other way.

K: Educate is the only way. Then why isn't there proper education in this country? Now education is being gradually controlled by the government, both in totalitarian states as well as here. Right sir? Now how will you change a government who will bring about the right kind of education? You see you are dodging the question. You move from government, to education, to individual. So it comes down to this, sir, doesn't it, if one may point it out: that we don't take the responsibility, each one of us, to see the thing doesn't happen. Will you educate your servants, if you have them? Come on, sirs. Educate their children? Obviously you won't because you are only concerned with yourself, with your little family. Right, sir? So will you do it? Absolute silence! Therefore you are going to have the government that you want - you deserve. Right, sir? Right sir? Let's face things as they are. One sees a great many officials, members of parliament, cabinet and all the rest of it, you know the game they are all playing so I don't have to go into it. So will you, as people who have the capacity to vote, be responsible for the care of human beings? You understand sir? Right? Will you do it? That means, sir, care implies love. Right, sir? Have you that care, that attention, that love brings? Go on, sir, answer it. Which means you will educate your servants' children. You must begin very near to go very far. But you attack at the top and not begin near. Is that question answered, sir?

Q: No, sir. How can a few individuals solve the problem unless you admit as a nation that the whole vast majority changes itself into this programme of action nothing can be done. And how to change the vast majority.

K: I am telling you, sir. The vast majority - how will you change it, sir, why ask me?

Q: Because I think I can get more light from you I ask you.

K: No, sir. We are friends. Right?

Q: Yes, but...

K: Wait, wait, wait. We are friends. And I am pointing out what can be done. The vast majority must be changed, must be made - I don't know if you want to go into the question of education, how to educate the vast majority. That's another one for the moment. What am I to do, or you to do surrounded by a vast majority of people who are so ignorant, so deplorably, you know, inwardly nothing. Right?

Q: When I say a vast majority, I don't mean those illiterate people are lost, I mean highly educated, learned, moneyed, the light of the society also.

K: Yes, sir. The moneyed people, educated people, the people who are very poor, and so on, how will they change? You tell me.

Q: Sir, in the tradition individual salvation has been the goal, so those who are capable of changing society are looking after themselves and their own souls rather than caring for what is called the community, the society, the raising effect. So they are as selfish as the other man who is pursuing money, wealth and pleasure.

K: Have we answered the question?

Q: Sir, you have just now described that we don't have the care and love. I may care for my children, or my employer, employees, as well as the leaders, but there is a limit to which an individual can act, beyond that he may not have the capacity.

K: Yes sir. Has one noticed that in history, only very few individuals bring about a change, don't they? Right, sir? Will you have the energy, the capacity, the drive, the love to bring about a different world? Sir, I do not know if you have realized that it is not a provincial problem, a tribal problem as it is becoming in India, tribal, but it is a global problem. You understand, sir? And the global problem can only be solved when we cease to be nationals. Right, sir? When we cease to be Indians. But nobody wants to do this. We want the top to bring about a change and then we comfortably fit into it. And the top, the highly political power-minded people are not going to change. That's enough of this.

Now we want to discuss what is one to do in daily life the question of the observer and the observed, the two divisions. Right sir? Now in understanding that, which we shall go into, will you see the relationship with your wife, with your children, with your neighbour, with the poor, it is related to that. Right, sir? So we are going to discuss, talk over that, to find a right kind of relationship with each other, with humanity. Right? Are you interested in that? That's what you are, sir. And that is what most of you want to go in to.

First of all let's begin at a very simple level, which is, have you observed visually with your eyes, a tree? Have you? Just a tree. And when you observe the tree what is going on in that observation? There is that thing, and you call it a tree. You call it a tree because the memory has come into operation, and it is generally recognized that thing is a tree. You give it a name, from recognition, and then the name, the recognition, the memory operates. Right, sir? It's simple enough, isn't it? Now can you observe the tree without naming it? Just look at the tree, sir. Just look at it and see if you can look at it without the operation of a single word or memory, just look. Can you?

Q: Without a motive, sir?

K: Just begin, sir, begin slowly.

Q: Momentarily, yes, for a moment.

K: Now wait a minute. For the moment.

Q: Then we are in time.

K: Just a minute. For the moment. That's fairly easy, isn't it. Which implies - just listen to it, sir - that the word 'tree' is not the actual fact. Right? Right? No, sir, don't accept what I am saying, just see. The word is not the thing. Right, sir? The word 'microphone' is not this actual thing. Right? Just a minute. So a description of a tree is not the described. Right, sir? So let's be clear. The word, the description, is not the thing or the described.

Q: How has it come into being?

K: Wait, sir. Find out, sir, do it.

Q: It has gone a functional reason, it works.

K: I am coming to that, sir. Have a little patience, sir.

Q: Sorry.

K: Don't be sorry, sir.

Q: OK.

K: Don't say, OK. So the word is not the thing. Can you look at that without the word? That's all. And you say, I can. Now can you look at your wife, or your husband, without using the word 'my wife'?

Q: Very rarely.

K: You are asking, the observer and the observed, are they different, if they are not different there is only observation. And we are going into this question very slowly, step by step, because if you once understand this there will be freedom from effort. The word is not the thing, the word 'door' is not the actual door. Right, sir? Right? The name 'K' is not the actual person, the reputation is not the actual person, the description is not the actual person, the photograph is not the actual person, or the image that you have made about this person is not the person. Right? So let us be very, very clear on this point: the description is never the described. You can paint the most beautiful mountain, but the picture is not that. Right? So the symbol is not that, the theory is not fact. So can I look, can you look at your wife or your husband without the word, first?

Q: Sir, to look like that is only possible when we are in an specific state, at other times it is not there.

K: We are going to go into that, sir.

Q: My point is whether I can attain this state by some other means and start looking at things like this.

K: Yes, I'll tell you other means: drugs, alcohol. They have tried that. They have tried LSD, cocaine, marijuana, hashish, there is the latest thing which is called angel foam or angel dust, which really kills you or you see something out of this world. So there are other ways of doing it, which destroys your brain, which destroys your body. If you want to go along that way this is a free country and if you have got drugs, go to it. But we are talking of a much more sane rational way of doing this. That is, we are saying when you observe your wife - I am sticking to wife and child because that's you life, your boss, your servants, your children, your neighbour, your politicians, all of them - can you look without the word - slowly - without the word, knowing the word is not the person, and the word represents a continuous memory, continuous association with the past. Right? That's simple, isn't it, sir? Sir, are you following this?

Q: Children alone can do this before they have not learnt any language.

K: At least children, you think, can do it. We are not children, we are grown up people so don't let's go back to children. Sorry, sir, I am not being rude.

Q: Sir, even if the naming process is suspended in the act of perceiving, you are still left with the problem of assuming. We assume on many levels. To assume means to act as if something was so. We assume the universe, you assume the presence of the audience. Now we act on the deep level as if there was another world outside.

K: I understand, sir. May I go on with this a little bit, step by step. So can one observe without the association which the word awakens? You follow all this, sir? And to observe the person, intimate or not intimate, can you do it? The word, the memory, is the past. Right? The past being all the incidents, events, all that you have accumulated during one's relationship between a husband and a wife, and a family, and a neighbour, and the government. Now can you observe - is there an observation, not you - is there an observation without association?

Q: Tell me the way.

K: You want to know the way. Yes, the gentleman wants to know the practical way. That is, tell me how to do it. That means what? Just listen. When you ask, how am I to do it, you are not actually doing it, are you. Please I am not insulting, I am just asking. So you are not doing it. So you want somebody to tell you how to do it, which means somebody who has found - who has done it and says, if you do this, this, this, you will also do it. Right? You want a system, a practice, a method. Right?

Q: But a genius like you...

K: I am not a genius.

Q: But as lesser mortals...

K: No, you are not listening, please, my darling sir, please listen. Sir, if one has lived this way, that we have lived in division, and from that division arose all the conflicts of humanity - the division of class, the division of nations, division of people, division of tribes, division of beliefs, division - you follow, the whole set up of human existence is based on this. And that has brought about tremendous conflict, wars, misery. Right? So one asks, is there a different way of living? You understand, sir? In which there will be no conflict. So one has to find out - and if you say, suppose somebody has found it and he says, do it. And if he says, follow this system, this method, this way, he is putting you back into the old rut of authority, following. You understand, sir? So as I explained many times, please: I am not your authority, I am not your guru, don't follow me but as two people, friends, talking over together let's solve this problem. That's all.

So I am saying, can you observe? You can observe that thing called tree without naming, can't you. That's fairly easy, if you have at all looked at nature, looked at birds, it is comparatively easy, to observe the world outside you is fairly easy. But the moment you turn it inward it becomes extremely difficult. Your reactions are so strong, so conditioned, so instantaneous, it is very difficult to say, well, I'll hold it back. So we are going into it step by step. First, see what you are doing actually in daily life. You and your wife. Right? You separate from your wife, and she separate from you, or you and your neighbour, separate, and so on. Where there is division there must be conflict. That's understood. Right, sirs?

Q: Yes sir, but this division is a fundamental sense of being alive.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: It's fundamental to the experience itself of existence. And it gives the sense of being separate.

K: That's what we have accepted.

Q: Right, that's what we have accepted.

K: We have accepted this illusion that we are living when we are separate. And that living when we are separate has brought such extraordinary misery.

Q: What is the alternative, sir?

K: You are all wanting the alternate road.

Q: Only to understand.

K: Yes, we are doing it, sir, we are doing it. I am asking you, or we are talking over together, will you find out how to look at your wife or your husband without all the memory of twenty or five days, or thirty days coming into operation, will you find out how to do it?

Q: If I reduce myself to a mirror which has no reaction, I think one can do it.

K: Sir, if you say 'if' - when you introduce the word 'if' then we are not doing it. If I am queen of England it would be marvellous, but I am not!

Q: That is the way in which we can wipe out all this.

K: No, sir, not by saying, if I am this, but only by facing the fact. The fact is governments want to control people, governments are incapable of governing as a whole humanity. Right, sir? So face the fact. Not, if we had a marvellous government - we haven't got a marvellous government anywhere. So the fact is we have this division, and this division bringing us as separate entities has caused tremendous misery in life - wars, destruction, and all the rest of it. And we have accepted that through centuries. That's our conditioning. So somebody comes along and says, let us find out if there is not a different way of living. So he says, first can you find out why this division exists. Right sir?

Q: When we observe you there is no need talking, there is no you and me.

K: That's right, sir. You have said it.

Q: That is, we are living one way, and what we are talking about.

K: Just listen, which means you are actually listening. Wait. There is no person, you don't exist and I don't exist, but you are actually listening to what is being said.

Q: Yes, sir.

K: That's all. Leave it there. You see it is so difficult to go step by step into it when you bring in something all the time. Now one realizes our brains are conditioned to this division. Right? Do you realize it sir, are you aware of this, that you are conditioned to accept this division - me, my wife, me and my country, me and my government, me and belief, you follow, this constant division. Are you aware of this division? And the consequences of this division?

Madam, you can't hear and at the same time take notes. Forgive me for pointing out. It is so impossible to go into this. As most people don't, and as most people have accepted this conflict between two people, between a group of people of different religions, we accept it, that has become our habit, that has become our custom. And we say, help me to break that custom. Right? Right, sir? Nobody is going to help you. Right? The gurus have promised it, the books have promised it, and you are still keeping this division. So can you - please listen - can you discard your books, your gurus, all your authority and face the fact? Will you? Face the fact that this division must create a corrupt, disintegrating world. If you accept it and say, 'Look, one can't live that way', you are challenging your brain, asking it to find a different way of living. Will you challenge your mind? No. You understand, sir?

Will you? If you do then you have to find out, haven't you, not accept, not ask, 'Please tell me how to do it', it is that you have to do it. So what will you do? First see what is actually happening. Right sir? Then you ask, why does this division exist? Right, sir? Is the division created by the word? Is the division created by the image which I have built about my wife or my husband? Right? Is it this division exists because I am pursuing one line of desire and she is pursuing her own particular desire? You follow? So is it I am ambitious - one is ambitious and the wife is docile? Or is the wife ambitious and you are docile? You follow, sir? Are you aware of this?

Q: What is there to observe if there is no division?

K: We are going into it, sir. What is there to observe if there is no division. That's again, sir - you see you haven't even had the courtesy to listen.

Q: It is understood sir that only when we are aware there is no division.

K: When you are aware, if you are aware, should be aware, must be aware - it means you are not aware. So I am asking - so one is asking are you aware of this division? If one is, then why is there this division? This division has existed through millennia, through time immemorial. Right? Right, sir? Me and my god, me and my language, me and my belief. Right? From the ancient times, from the Sumerian times, that is about 7,000 BC it has been going on. And we have accepted it, and we say that is the way to live, with war, with destruction, with conflict, with faith. So we must find a different way of living, which means why is there this division, who has created it? You understand, sir? We are thinking together. Please, who has created this? Don't say, nature, god, something external, force. Human beings have created it. Right, sir? That is, what is a human being? His capacity to think. Right? So thought itself is limited, so whatever it creates it must be limited. Right? So in relationship with another when thought operates it must be limited. Right? When there is limitation there is division. When one tribe says, 'I am this particular tribe' and there is another tribe, there is a division. Right? So thought has brought about this division. Right, do you see this?

Q: Thought seems to be operative on all levels. The sensational level, and...

K: Sir, I agree.

Q: What do you mean by thought? Is it just the internal level that you are meaning?

K: Partly verbalization, partly - just a minute, I am describing the parts, but the parts do not make the whole. Right? I want to go into this a little bit.

Q: Division need not necessarily be a conflict, it can be co-operative.

K: Oh, sir, don't say necessarily, this is going on, why do you say necessarily? It's just an idea. You can't listen to sequential listening. Sir, you are here to find out what the speaker has to say. Right? You have asked this question, so kindly first listen and then you can tear it to pieces. You can throw it overboard, tread on it, do whatever you like, but first have the courtesy, the amicable attention.

First I say, why has this division existed, why has man accepted this division, who has created it, and how has it come into being?

So one sees that it's either belief, tribalism, one tribe against another tribe. Right, sir, are you following all this? One set of dogmas against another set of dogmas, one set of tribal gods against another set of tribal gods, language divides people, and so on and so on. How has this come about?

Q: Isn't it, sir, that these things you have described have brought about division, but there is a very subtle level of division, the feeling that I am something separate. This seems to underlie all these other grosser forms of division.

K: I can't hear, you have to speak much louder.

Q: The divisions that you have been talking about, tribalism, nationalism, religion, all seem to be on a somewhat gross level, and that they are things which, if you turn your attention towards them, you can see somewhat into them.

K: I am coming to that sir, first I must begin from the outside and then come inside.

Q: So what seems to me very difficult to see into is the very basic sense of separation of the self as an individual.

Q: For him the difficulty is that there is a feeling, a sense of separation as an individual more fundamental to all of these separations.

K: I am coming to that, sir. We have nearly spent an hour, and we haven't even reached the rock bottom of it.

We are saying, man has lived not only on the senses, but also much more on the intellectual, verbal, thought level. And we are saying, thought in its very activity is divisive - divisive in the sense breaking up. Is that clear? You can observe it yourself, sir. All thinking is limited, fragmentary. Thought can conceive the whole but the conception is still thought. Right? Right, sirs?

So: now can thought, which is memory, experience, knowledge, which is the past, can that knowledge not operate when you are observing? That's all. When you are observing your wife and your husband and your family, or your servant or your neighbour, can this memory associated with the wife or the husband, be in abeyance, just to look. Will you? Will you do it? Can you do it? Realizing that thought is divisive, that thought is fragmentary, that thought is born of knowledge which is the past, and so you are always looking at your wife, at your neighbour with the eyes of the past. Or, looking at yourself with the eyes of the past which gives you the traditional conditioning, which is, I am different from somebody else. Have you followed all this, sir? Are you doing it?

Q: What becomes of the neighbour?

Q: It is all ego, sir.

K: What sir?

Q: It is all the ego in here that gives us all this sense.

K: That is, that ego, you are saying, the 'me', the self, is put together by thought - your name, your form, your desires, your anxieties, your sorrow, your pleasures, your fears, your arrogance, your vanity, your desire for power, is you.

Q: Sir, as I understand, you're saying that this ego, or this division is an activity maintained by the thinking process.

K: Yes. So can you observe - I am coming back to that - can you observe your wife or your husband without the past memory intruding? If it doesn't, then what takes place? You haven't even reached that point. You understand my question, sir? I look at my wife - I have no wife, but I can look at my wife. Can I look at her without the sexual memories, without the memories of dominance, without the memory of having comfortable associations, without all the petty little impatience and all the rest of it, can I look at her as though I was looking at her for the first time? Then when you do look in that way, which means there is no observer only observation - right? - then what takes place?

Q: Absence of the self.

K: Don't invent sir. Don't say, if, when, absence. You are not doing it.

Q: I am not able to do it, the past interferes.

K: Then find out why it interferes.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Do it, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Can you look at that tree without the word? Why can't you do it there?

Q: But we are relatives.

K: Oh, you people, you don't test it, you don't work at it, you don't want to find out. You make statements. Sir, look.

Q: Pure existence. If we are aware only of existence and no division.

K: That is all just theories, sir. What are the good of theories? Your books are full of theories, your gurus, your churches, your temples, are full of theories. Where are you at the end of it? You and your country, and your people, where are you?

So, now sir, just listen to it. I have been assured by a prominent scientist when I have stated to them, the observer is the observed, they took some time to understand the verbal meaning of it, then they explained something to me. They said, when you observe without theories, without memory, without all the things, through a microscope, as you watch it the very thing you are watching is undergoing a change. Don't agree to this, you know nothing. The very thing you are watching is moving, changing, it is never the same. So - please listen - when you watch your greed, that is without the word, without the memory of 'I mustn't be greedy' and all the rest of it, when you watch that fact of the reaction called greed, that very reaction undergoes a radical change. That is the way to observe. To observe myself, my whole structure and nature of myself, with all the qualities, with all the ugliness, with all the pleasure, with all the misery, when I watch it - when there is a watching without the past association, that very watching brings about a change in what is happening.

Q: Putting it in words, in that state I am simple, humble, affectionate and loving.

K: What sir?

Q: Putting it in words...

K: Oh, no, don't put it into words. Have you understood what the speaker has to say?

Look, sir, let's look: there is violence. Right? Now it has become in the world tribal violence. Right, sir? Right? Even the so-called Brahmins - who unfortunately don't exist any more - even the so-called Brahmins have now become tribalists. So this very tribalism is creating violence. Can you look at violence - just listen to it, follow the sequence of it, I am going to explain step by step. First, you have become aware of your violence, which is anger, imitation is a form of violence, imitating somebody. When you compare yourself with somebody it is a form of violence. When you try to achieve a result, a success, it is a form of violence. So I am using violence in its widest sense, not only physical violence but psychological violence. Now when that feeling arises thought then comes and says, that is violence. Right, are you following this? Because thought can only operate through words, through pictures, through symbols, so it says, that's violence. So the past has recognized the new feeling and has called it violence. Are you following this, sir? So can you observe that emotion that has been called violence without naming it? Because when you don't name it, the very thing that is being observed changes. And in that there is no conflict. The moment the observer says, 'I am violent' then conflict begins: I mustn't be violent, tell me how not to be violent, I must pursue non-violence, and all the rest of it begins. Right, sir?

So can you test it, do it. Test it out. That when a feeling arises, anger, jealousy, greed, violence, sex, which is most important to most people, when that feeling arises watch it, observe it without bringing all the images, the pictures, the contradictions, you follow, only the fact, the fact of that feeling. Then you will discover for yourself that the fact has no opposite. Right? So when you move away from the fact the opposite comes in, and therefore conflict begins. Now we are saying just observe the feeling, and realize thought is destructive in observation. Have you understood this, sir?

Q: The last sentence I don't understand.

K: We said, thought is divisive.

Q: Thought is destructive in observation.

K: Yes, of course. When anything is divisive it is destructive.

When I say, I am a Catholic, I only believe in the saviour of Jesus or whatever that stuff is, and you say, I am a Hindu with my - and the Muslim says, with my - you are destructive, you are destructive people.

So we are saying it is possible, not in theory, actually, in daily life, it is possible to live without any conflict when there is only pure observation. That demands no discipline, no control, just to watch: which means, the basic idea, the basic concept that me is essentially different from the other.

Q: Sir, you are saying that that assumption, that concept, must be radically undermined. It appears to me that when you watch, that watching is necessary, there is a tendency from the point of view of one who hears you to strengthen the sense of the ego it has appropriated...

K: Of course, of course.

Q:... and one isolates further.

K: Of course, of course. Because when you listen to it you are not listening to it completely. You are not listening, sir. We must go into again the question of listening.

Q: That area in human consciousness...

K: Yes, sir I know all that, we know all that. Look, sir, if one knows the art of listening everything becomes extraordinarily simple. You listened to that music, some of you, if you listened to it it is very simple. But our mind, our brains are so conditioned to complexity that we don't even listen.

Now at the end of this, an hour and a quarter, where are you? I know where I am, but where are you? Have you really understood this; that there is a way of living without a single shadow of conflict? When there is no conflict then you bring about a different society. For god's sake, and therefore different governments.

Q: Sir, a moment before you said, what is the feeling, and you defined it in terms of his ability to think. Now granted that there must be some failure of listening, or some misinterpretation of what you mean by thinking, because you seem to be asking for a radical change in the manner of experience, and yet you are asking for it on the level of the mind, and that is the level on which it is done by feeling, so that we seem to step more intensively into the process of separation.

K: I understand, sir. One has to use words to communicate. If we could communicate without words, which means - just listen - to communicate without words means you and the speaker must be at the same level, with the same intensity, at the same time, otherwise verbal communication is only possible. If you cannot meet the speaker at the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity, then words must be used to communicate. Love is that. When you have real love then communication is not necessary.

So I am asking, sir, before I stop, if I may, where are you, have you understood this? Which can be only tested when you go home, when you face your wife, when you face your boss, when you are working in an office, find out, test it. And the person who is seeking experience, he doesn't realize the experiencer is the experience. Because the experiencer, when he experiences, must recognize that experience. Which means he has already tasted it before, known it before, therefore the experiencer is the experience, the thinker is the thought, the observer is the observed. Right, sirs.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC DIALOGUE 11TH JANUARY 1979

K: As we said the last time that we met here, the day before yesterday, this is a dialogue, a conversation between two friends who want to talk over any problem, any issue they have. So what would be the relevant and worthwhile question to ask, and out of that perhaps a right answer can come. What shall we talk about this morning?

Q: Sir, most people believe in things like god, religions, astrology, numerology, and the like, they spend a lot of time, money, their material resources, believing that these things will reward their efforts. How to save them?

Q: Sir, in this existence only at the point of death all our accumulations come to an end. So unless we understand death very deeply any amount of effort on our part to end the psychological memory would be absolutely futile.

K: Right.

Q: Can we discuss the relationship between time and awareness?

Q: You have often urged people to be free of violence but I really wonder what we could do if we are faced with a practical problem. Let's say somebody attacking you, when you are defenceless, so shouldn't you have to retaliate with violence?

Q: What is creativity?

Q: Can we discuss the relationship between time and awareness?

K: I have understood, sir. What is the relationship between time and awareness.

Q: Can we discuss the relationship between truth, actuality and reality?

K: The relationship between actuality and reality.

Q: It is pointed out that listening is the way of life, but the quality of listening, or observation that you point out indicate a feeling that is beyond the mind.

Q: I have a problem, sir.

K: Thank goodness!

Q: Meditation as generally understood is taking some time apart from our daily activities and concentrating the mind on some form, or some name, or some idea. Well, sir, I have practised it for years and I have found that it has had absolutely no effect on my life or on curbing any of my evil tendencies. Well, sir, could we explore the possibility of making one's daily life, including the time we spend on our activities, into one continuous form of meditation?

Q: Is not the observation in itself an instantaneous action? Can we discuss about it?

K: No, sir. Now we have had so many questions I am quite lost.

Q: Krishnaji, maybe this question would cover a lot of them. We seem to be interested in a religious life but it seems that culture and tradition get in the way. One wonders how we can live with culture and tradition or can one live with culture and tradition?

K: Can one live a religious life, in daily life, without tradition. Is that it?

Q: And culture, yes.

K: I don't quite follow your question.

Q: It seems we are interested in a religious life but we are not able to get anywhere because we are so involved with tradition and culture, and how do we live with tradition and culture, or does that have any part in religious life?

K: Has tradition and culture any part in a religious life. Do you want to discuss that?

Q: No. As we have been talking about, when there is deep profound interest thought won't interfere.

K: I can't hear, would you please speak a little louder, sir.

Q: I heard you saying that when there is profound interest thought won't interfere. Is that interest free of thought.

K: Is this a problem to any of you, all this? Just a minute, sir, there are so many questions. Perhaps if we could take the question: what place has tradition and culture in a religious life. Would you like to discuss that, would that be worthwhile? I think perhaps if we could go into that question and answer deeply that enquiry perhaps we could include all the other questions in it. May we do that? Yes, sir?

What would you think is culture? No, not theoretically, actually, what does culture mean? The word 'culture' means to grow, to cultivate, to develop, to expand, to flower, to be, or to become, and so on. Have you had culture in that sense in your life? To grow, to develop the intellect, the mind, the heart, all the very, very subtle senses and so on, that's part of culture. So that is what we mean by culture. Do we agree to that? To the meaning of that word, would you agree to all that? No?

Q: Yes.

K: Right. And what do you mean by tradition? Go on, sir. Tradition implies, doesn't it, values, beliefs, dogmas, rituals, handed down from generation to generation, handed over from father to son, to son, to son. There is the tradition of the Upanishads, the Gita, handed down, what the writer meant and it has been handed down in this country, or in various other countries, and that is what we call tradition. Is that right?

Q: The preservation of culture as well.

K: Which means culture being values, beliefs, rituals, gods, concepts, principles, ideals, all that has been handed down and you have marvellously preserved it. Is that it? As you cultivate a beautiful garden where flowers grow, the shadow, sunlight, beauty, and you preserve that. And tradition means also to hand it down - concepts, beliefs and so on. Also please bear in mind that word means treason, betrayal. Right? So what has tradition and culture to do with a religious life? Go on, sir.

Q: Is it the religious life that is being betrayed by tradition? You say that tradition is treason, a meaning of tradition. What is being betrayed?

K: What do you mean by betrayal. When you are functioning with a deep, ingrained, conditioned mind, as most people who are traditionalists, how can they betray? They are betraying the present. No?

Are you interested in all this? Or is it a nice cool morning and we can sit quietly together under the trees? You understand my questions, sirs? What has tradition and culture to do with a religious life, and what do we mean by a religious life - so we can expand it, shall we? Are you interested in all this? What do you consider is life? Your life, what is your life? Come on, sirs. Two friends talking over together, what do you mean by your life, my life?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I am asking a question, sir, if you would kindly listen to it. What do we mean by a life?

Q: A relationship with another.

K: You say it is a relationship with another - intimate or not intimate, neighbour and so on. But what is that relationship? What is that life that you daily live? Come on, sir. What's your life? For god's sake.

Q: An act of living in harmony and understanding.

K: Oh, sir, what is your daily life, actually, not theoretical.

Q: A bundle of experiences.

K: Is that it, a bundle of experiences, your life?

Q: Eating and sleeping, sir.

K: All right. Eating, sleeping and what else?

Q: Expecting something from the other.

K: Look at your life, sir. For god's sake talk factually not theoretically.

Q: And work.

Q: Conflict.

K: A most extraordinary generation.

Q: Searching for pleasure, based on sensation. That's what my life is.

K: Your life is based on pleasure, pain. You see how we are avoiding to face our life, our daily life, aren't you?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, sir, don't invent something. Your daily life, sir.

Q: It is a compulsion to completely satisfy, to alleviate pain.

Q: Facing problems, sir.

K: Facing problems. What are those problems?

Q: Changes.

K: Changes. That is, sleep, wake up, work, sex, what else?

Don't you know your life?

Q: Hatred.

K: Hating.

Q: Jealousy.

K: Go on, sir, your life.

Q: Constant search.

Q: And then in the field of work you have problems.

K: Is this your daily life, sir?

Q: At the mundane level it is, then at the spiritual level it is questioning who am I and what is all this.

Q: Constant search for pleasure.

K: Sir, I am asking you, you repeat the same thing, sir. Find out what the others say.

Q: My life is based on pleasant sensations.

K: You have said that, sir. Pleasant sensations, avoiding pain, work, seeking something more and more, physical pain, and what else?

Q: Strengthening the ego.

K: I think you don't know your own life.

Q: Following a routine in which I have already contented myself with. That's my honest answer.

K: Neither honest or dishonest, what is the actual fact?

Q: Violence.

Q: And going for a goal.

K: I give up! You are really the most extraordinary generation of people.

Q: Experiencing continuously, from moment to moment.

K: Are you doing that? Incredible! You don't know your own daily life.

Q: Sir, it is expecting something out of the other, and expecting something from you now.

K: You are expecting something from me, you are expecting from another, dependence, attachment, pain, annoyance, anger, irritation, sorrow. You know all this, don't you. This is your daily life: going from 9 o'clock or 10 o'clock to the office and coming back in the evening exhausted and so on and so on - is that your life? Going to the temple and doing some kind of noise with a bell, and doing puja, doing yoga, is that your life?

Q: Study.

K: If you want books. Please, is that your life?

Q: Let's proceed.

K: How can I proceed?

Q: We agree.

K: You agree to this? I'll ask that gentleman out there - do you agree to this, sir?

Q: Yes. One point, sir. I am interested in the part of the whole, and I see I am the whole myself.

K: Oh, good, that settles it!

Q: What is obvious doesn't need our acknowledgement, so let's proceed.

K: That we say, that is our life. Then what do you mean by religion, a religious life? You tell me. What is religion to you?

Q: Morality.

Q: Just a word.

K: Morality, just a word.

Q: Not to be envious.

K: Sir, I said, what do we mean by religion, the word. The word itself, what does religion mean to you, the word? Not what it implies, the meaning, the significance of the word.

Q: The brain.

Q: Relationship with the divine.

K: Relationship with the divine - how do you know about the divine? You see, you are so incredible. The word 'religion' comes from, etymologically, from the Latin, and Greek, which meant originally tie, to bind. Now they are denying that etymological meaning, they have given a new meaning to the word religion. Which is - if you are interested in it - it means to gather all your energy. That's all they mean. Do you understand, sir? To gather all your energy to enquire, to find. Right? Not all the nonsense of temples, rituals, and all this either, sir, what you have put on your head. You see how you all agree. Would you agree to that, the meaning of the word? That means gathering every particle of energy that you have to enquire into what is truth and what is reality, to enquire into what is meditation, to enquire into why human beings live the way we are living, to enquire if there is an end to sorrow, to enquire into what is love, whether one can live without any effort, and control, all that is implied in that word.

So we are asking - you are putting the question whether tradition, culture, can live, is tradition, culture possible in a religious life. Do you understand now? I say - I say, tradition and culture has no place in religion. Right?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I don't follow. Sir, if you want to talk, answer the question, please say it loudly, kindly.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, religious life implies also having no authority. Sir, I am saying something. Having no authority of any kind, no spiritual authority. Right?

Q: The development...

K: You go on, sir and I will go on - it will be all right, sir. A religious life implies being a light to yourself. Which means, no outside authority, except law, policeman, taxes, that's a different matter - if you have to pay taxes, or if you want to deceive the government by not paying tax and so on. We are talking about having no spiritual authority including me, the speaker. Have you any authority, spiritual authority? Have you, sirs?

Q: No, sir

Q: In the sense that we don't take it as an authority but as an experimentation and see where that leads us to.

K: Have you done it, sir?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Have you experimented and found what?

Q: I have found myself...

K: Has it in your life?

Q: For example, meditation...

K: Have you found it in your life?

Q: In some aspects, yes. I'm on the way.

K: When? Sir, you are just asking some - you are not being serious, are you sir. You know, sir, what we mean by authority?

Q: To blindly accept.

K: Oh, not in the least, sir

Q: Authority implies blind acceptance.

K: No. Please kindly listen to what the other person has to say before you answer. Authority comes from the word 'author', one who originates something. You understand, sir? One who originates an idea, a concept, a belief, a statement of his own experience and so on, he is the author - not merely the writer but he is the author, and from that word authority comes. Now you have the Upanishads, the Gita, the Bible and so on and so on, the Koran, they become your authority. Have they? You see, you don't even... Have they in your life?

Q: You seem to be the author for new ideas.

K: Do you follow a guru?

Q: I don't.

K: You don't. But do you? You see you are so frightened to answer. You have had various gurus, Mr Gandhi and so on, all the way from the sixth, fifth, fourth, third, century, down to the present. And where are you, having been led for these thousands of years, where are you? Do you want to be still led?

Q: No.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I give up.

Q: Could we approach it in a different way since you are giving up, sir?

K: Sir, you don't respond, you don't find out for yourself.

Q: I think in the beginning most people do need some guide or some teacher.

K: There is no beginning and no end.

Q: They are at a level when they do need it, and then may be through expansion.

K: Madam, I understand. At the beginning you need a guru, later on you can throw him overboard.

Q: No, find out for ourselves.

K: Yes, madam, understood. First I need somebody to help me to walk, I need a mother, a father to cling to when I am a baby, to cling to their skirt, to their trousers or whatever it is. So when one is ignorant, inexperienced, not thinking, you need somebody to help you to think, to clear away your ignorance and so on. So we say at that state we need a guru, later on we don't need it.

Q: You can do it.

K: Yes, you don't need it.

Q: You give him up.

K: Yes, madam, you don't need it. Are you in that position?

Q: I don't find my understanding is the same as when I am in your presence.

K: I am not your guru, thank god, or anybody's guru.

Q: No, no guru, but...

K: Sir, you asked a question: can tradition and culture exist, or co-exist with a religious life? And we said very carefully tradition - apply it, sir, find out - tradition means handing down certain authoritarian statements, certain values, rituals, principles, conclusions, and so on. That's what tradition means. And that word also means betrayal, treason. Culture means to develop, to grow, the mind, your heart, to flower, to have beauty in your life, all that means culture. And a life which we live now daily is constant struggle, work, gathering money, having influence, having pain, suffering a great deal, insensitive to everything about us, and only sensitive to our own little problems, and so on and on and on. That is what we call living. And religion as it was explained, means gathering your whole energy to enquire into what is truth and what is reality. Now do you want to go into all this?

Q: Yes, sir.

Q: Before we go into that, we have seen what religion is, we have seen what religion is, it is gathering our energy to enquire. We have seen what religion is, we have seen what culture is, let us see what life is and then go ahead. Let us enquire into what life is, what living is.

K: Enquire, sir, enquire what living is in your life.

Q: How? We haven't enquired into what living is; we have enquired into what culture is, what religion is, but not what life is.

K: Sir, I am telling you. What is your life?

Q: My life is my life, but what is life I am asking? What is living?

K: Are you saying what life should be?

Q: Yes, what is life? We have said religion is gathering all our energy to enquire.

K: You want to know what life is.

Q: What living is.

K: Just a minute, sir. I understand your questions. You want to know what life is independent of our suffering, of our pain, of our anxieties, or our grabbing, greed, you want to know what life is.

Q: Yes, that's it.

K: How are you going to find out? You see...

Q: I am trying to find out now, what living is. Let us enquire what life is.

K: Sir, don't repeat, sir. I understand that. How will you find out what life is? If you remove all the colouring, all the attributes and all the rest of it, will you first remove it to find out.

Q: Let us go into it.

K: You want to know what life is and we are saying you can only find what life is, which may be eternal, which may be nonsensical, which may be extraordinary, only when we understand our living, daily living, and from that daily living understand the beauty of life. So if you want to enquire into pure life, go ahead and do it.

Q: Religion has tried to deliver us from what we have just described, we might say is the failure of life. Now there has been some error of that has been communicated since the dawn of time, across all efforts. Can we attack that error? Because we must be reproducing it if we continue to suffer

K: Look, sir: you say you start with error.

Q: That is our tradition, an error. What is that error?

K: Yes. Or also you can say, what is the original sin.

Q: What's the original sin, yes.

K: It is the same thing, we are back into some kind of... Sir, we have described what tradition is. Are you free of that tradition? Because otherwise you can't proceed to find out what a religious life is. Because one must be free to climb great heights. If you want to go to Everest you must throw away all your burdens and carry very little. So I am asking, we are asking you, courteously, if you have thrown away your traditions.

Q: Yes, sir, I have.

K: Traditions being nationality, your caste, your beliefs, your rituals, going to the temples, all that - have you thrown it away?

Q: No.

K: No. Then how can you find out what a religious life is when you are blind? So you want to find out what a religious life is and yet you won't leave your little enclosure. Right? See your own tragedy, sirs. And you are slaves to certain things, and you say, 'I must find freedom' - you won't let that go to find it.

So what shall we do?

Q: We are caught by the crocodile, sir.

K: Crocodile? Like a donkey tied to a post, it can't go very far, you are tied to your tradition, and you want to enquire into something that demands a mind that is capable, a heart that can really love. Without that, freeing yourself from your tradition, your culture, your belief, how can you find out anything? You can repeat what the Gita said, or the Upanishads, or some other book, what value has it? I was told the other day, some of the gurus now give lectures, or talks on the Gita. Is that right?

Q: Yes.

K: And hundreds and thousands go and listen to it. What value has it? What are we all playing at, sirs? Apparently one doesn't see one's own tragedy. Right sir?

So what shall we do? I can go on talking, I can become another one of those people who read, who lecture on the Gita, and you will all sit down and shake your head and say, yes, marvellous.

Q: I think most of us know our own tragedy, we see it, but we can't be bothered to do anything about it. Too lazy, we don't want to see the truth.

K: One sees the tragedy, the misery, the confusion, the uncertainty and we are too lazy to clear it up. Is that it?

Q: Yes.

K: Then please take some vitamins, put some guts into you and wake up.

Q: That's the problem.

K: It's not a problem, sir, if you want to do something, you do it. You wanted to come here, so you woke up early and you took all the trouble to come here - you have enough energy to do something when you want to do it. But we don't apparently want to do this.

Q: Sir, would it not help us to know our ourselves, our mind if we read the scriptures?

K: Would it not help us if we read the scriptures and other books to understand ourselves. Please listen - you have asked that question, sir, please listen. To understand yourself must you read somebody else to tell you about what you are? If you read what they tell you, what you are, you are conforming to their idea of what you are. Right? You understand what I am saying?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You haven't even listened.

Q: You go on.

K: Look, sir, if I tell you what you are, and you try to understand yourself according to what I have said, have you understood yourself?

Q: No, sir

K: Or are you imitating what I say, what you think you are. So can you stop reading about what you are and find out for yourself what you are, what actually you are - isn't that much more simple, much more practical?

Q: Sir, even if we were to give up reading books...

K: I am coming to that. Can you first realize, if I may suggest, that our minds have become so imitative. Right, do you realize that, sir? Conforming, obeying, so that we are never original, find out for ourselves. So can you put away what the psychologists have said, what your Gita has said, what other books have said, and say, 'Look, I am going to find out for myself'? Won't you do that? No, you won't, because if you follow others you think that is the easiest way to solve life; and you have followed for millennia, and you are still where you are. Right?

Q: Sir, habit excludes creativity, and the brain and the mind are locked into patterns of habit, so people will not respond to the fresh, obviously. You are speaking about de-habitualising the mind. Now we know.

K: Yes. I'll show it to you. That means, the word is not the thing, the description is not the described, the word 'tree' is not the actual fact, so when I explain it is an explanation, but not the actual thing that is happening. Right?

First of all, forming habits, both physical as well as psychological habits, is a thoughtless repetition. Right? Why do we form habits?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir.

Q: In order to be safe.

K: Please, just listen sirs, you are all so quick to answer something which I am asking you, if you will kindly listen - why does the brain, your brain form habits

Q: For convenience sake

K: That's right. He says, for convenience, for comfort, for following daily certain routines, both physically as well as mentally, psychologically. Why? Because the mind has found the habit convenient, it hasn't to work anew again, and so habit is formed. Which means routine, a machine. The piston engine has a marvellous habit. Right? You understand, it is a marvellous habit, the piston engine. So our minds have become piston engines - repeat, repeat, repeat, repeat. Because that way you think is the easiest and the most comfortable way of living. Right? So habit is formed, good habit, bad habit. Which is the brain refuses to think anew, to work afresh. Right? Isn't this so obvious, isn't it? I am describing, you do it actually, watch your own brains. So habits are formed, which is the tradition. Habit is a tradition, there is nothing holy or unholy about it, it is just tradition. And once caught in that the brain refuses to let go. If it lets go it immediately forms another habit and it pursues that. So one has to question why the brain operates this way. You understand?

Q: Why does the brain refuse?

K: Have you followed up to now, what I have said, sir? Forgive me asking you a direct question. You see if you interrupt all the time I lose it.

So we are saying, why does the brain form habits, which is tradition, whether it is ten days old or ten thousand years old, why does it do it? You understand? You have a leader of non-violence in this country, and he establishes a certain principle, or whatever you like, and then the brain says, all right I accept that, and I will follow that. Which is tradition, which is habit, and you don't like to call it habit, you say you have principles, you are following a principle. So I am asking why the brain does this constantly - you relinquish this habit, pick up that habit, then throw that away and a new habit. Why? Sir, just think it over, sir, don't answer quickly, enquire, go into yourself, look at your brain, why does it do it.

Doesn't it do it because - listen quietly - the brain can only function in security. Because it is secure in habit, it is secure in a tradition, it is secure in a belief, it is secure in an illusion. The brain demands at all time to be secure, whether it is false, whether it is real, whether it is absurd, whether it is superstitious, it says, please I can only operate where there is complete security. So it forms habits, thinking that will give it security. Right? You have understood this? No, not description, the actual fact. Then is there such security? That is, forming a habit, living in it, breaking it up with a new habit, and then following it, breaking it up, another habit. That is, the brain wanting security but never investigating into the security it thinks it has in habits. Are you following this? No, sir you are not, otherwise you wouldn't put on this thing, sir. That's a habit we have.

So I am asking - we are saying, there is a security not in habit. Right? I wonder if you understand this. I am going to show it to you. When the brain sees that this habit-forming is the most dangerous way of living - you understand what it does. You understand, sir? I don't think you do. It is the habit to call yourself a Hindu. Right? And that habit is most dangerous because on your border there is the Muslim. Right? And on the other border is the communist. Which is their habit, and it is the other habit, and your habit, so you have got three habits, and there will be constant wars. So when the brain realizes any formation of habit, or the continuance of habit is the most dangerous way of living, which is, when it comprehends the danger, the sequence of a habit, the very perception of it is intelligence. The brain then has this intelligence, which is total security. It is not habit, it is not tradition, it is not one habit after another, but the perception, the seeing, logically, sanely, the consequences of habits. And when it sees the consequences it says, 'Right, finished'. I wonder if you understand this?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Will you do it? That is, not to be a Hindu, or a Muslim, or anything. You are a human being. This human being, has this extraordinary capacity to create an illusion, and in that illusion, like temples, like churches and all the rest of it, create and live in that illusion and say, 'I find security there'. Right? And there is the other which says there is security in Islam, and so there is a battle. And it destroys itself. You follow all this? So will you, seeing this, throw away your illusions, throw away your habits because you see the reason, the logical sequence of forming habits? Have you understood?

Q: Sir, what you described, on the level you describe things to me, referring very much to the consciousness, the mind itself is a form of habit so in effect you are asking us, you are leading to the question, can we throw away this psychological mind. Can we pursue that?

K: Yes. You are saying the mind is itself a habit.

Q: The mind orients itself towards safety, security.

K: The mind itself orients towards a habit.

Q: No. The mind orients towards security, psychological security, is a habit.

K: Yes. Sir, you see the mind, what do you mean by the word 'mind'? I know - we know what the word 'brain' means. Right? What is the mind? What is your mind, sir? Ask it. Please ask, demand, challenge, what is your mind.

Q: Sir...

K: You see you don't even ask. You don't put your guts in it to ask this question: what is your mind by which you live? Don't look at me, sirs. I am not your mind.

Q: Sir, may I respond, sir?

K: Yes, sir.

Q: It is a modification, a formation of force, of the total force that you are into certain forms.

K: Are you saying, if I may interpret what you are saying, your mind is your senses, your emotions, your sensory responses, your beliefs, your desire for security, the confusion, the sorrow, the misery, all that is your mind, which is, your consciousness is that. That is, your consciousness is the content. The content is sorrow, pain and all the rest of it. That's what we say is the totality of your mind. Out of this totality you can invent a super-consciousness, you can invent a final divine consciousness, Buddhist consciousness, Krishna consciousness, and banana consciousness. You can invent anything you like. And the more superior, the more gullible you become. So we are saying, can you observe your consciousness? Are you aware of your own mind? Are you aware of your own mind? Are you aware of your own reactions? It is twenty five to nine, sir.

Sir, you respond with one particular sense, don't you? You understand? Either the response, sexual response, which is the particular, or response to your taste, to your smell, to your touch. Please listen to this. That is, we generally operate along one particular sensory response. Right? Tasting, smelling, hearing, touching. Now can you respond all this together? You understand my question? Understand the question first. When you respond only with one particular sense, in that response there is division, breaking up. Right, sir? Now we are asking, can you respond wholly, with all your senses? Have you ever tried it, or is this something new? Something new.

Q: No, sir.

K: You don't understand?

Q: All the centres...

K: You haven't even listened. Understand the question first, sir. We have so far responded with one of the senses. Right? We are saying, is there a response with all the senses?

Q: Sir, it seems to me you are leading to something else. The super-sense is the sense of I.

K: No, no, absolutely you have gone off.

Q: Have I?

K: Yes, sir. Forgive me. Can you look at the sea - the sea - with all your senses, the tasting, the smelling, the touching, the feeling, with all of that? When you do that there is no centre from which you are holistically responding. I wonder if you've understood this.

Q: We do that when we are playing with a child.

K: Where do I put the child. You don't even do it for yourself and you talk about the child. Have you ever tried this?

Q: With a tree.

K: Look at that tree, sir. Wait a minute. Look at that beautiful tree with all your senses: touch it, smell it, taste it - you know, you can't of course - but with the feeling of all that.

Q: There is the complete cessation of the past, actually there is only observation.

Q: Sir, the use of one sense is still conditioned by a central experience - you have just said, the centre - so if you synthesize all of the senses you will still be conditioned by that centre.

K: Have you tried it, sir?

Q: I've tried it and thought gets in the way.

K: No, sir, you can't try, do it, and you will find out thought doesn't.

Q: But...

K: You see, sir. You want to try something the other fellow is saying. Don't try what the other fellow is saying, but see what you are doing, that you are responding partially, either hearing, seeing, tasting, touching, partially. I say, don't respond partially but respond totally with all your senses.

Q: Sir, my difficulty is this: you are right, it works, however I cannot conceptualize it in your terms.

K: I don't want - you see, you have introduced concepts. That means you are...

Q: But I have said that it works, sir.

K: When you make a concept you are not listening.

Have you given up your (?), have you given up your principles, ideals, and concepts, which are all habits. Right? Give one up easily. Try and see what happens.

Q: Sir, when we give up concepts, what you speak would be just sounds for our ears, we would have no way of understanding what you say.

K: One has explained very carefully how concepts are formed, ideas are formed. The speaker makes a statement, and from that statement you draw a conclusion. You don't listen to the statement without conclusions. Just listen. That's one of our habits, which is, you listen to something, instantly you form an idea, a conclusion. Now, break that habit, which means listen. Now I will make a statement, and please listen, don't make an abstraction of it, an idea of it, or say, how am I to do it, just listen. Which is, when sorrow ends completely there is love. Don't draw a conclusion, don't say what do you mean by sorrow, what do you mean by ending - you follow, all that, just listen and find out why you form a conclusion, which is a habit. So you have wandered away from the act of listening.

The question was put: can tradition, culture co-exist with a religious life? We went into that very carefully. We said, culture, tradition, cannot possibly exist with a religious mind. If one is to find out what is truly a religious life one must abandon totally tradition, totally any form of culture as it is understood. Which means, I have a free mind, the mind that is not caught in Christianity, in Buddhism, in Hinduism, Islam, or some other sect or guru, none of that. That means total freedom. And in that freedom there is tremendous energy because there is no conflict, struggle, nothing. Right, sirs.

MADRAS 5TH PUBLIC TALK 13TH JANUARY 1979 'WHAT IS A RELIGIOUS MIND?'

I would like to talk, if I may, this evening, about a religious mind. And before we communicate with each other about it I think it would be wise and necessary to go over a little bit what we have been talking about during these last four talks here. I think it is fairly obvious for most people who are at all aware of the events that are going on in the world that there is general degeneration. Though there is vast incredible technological advancement, man has, if I may use the word advance, he has advanced very little. And as one observes the decline of human capacity, affection, love, and all the essential things of human nature are gradually declining. And one can see in every country that one goes to that this is taking place. And the problems that human beings have, everyday problems, not some fantastical, romantic, sentimental problems, but actual daily problems of relationship, of hunger, of beliefs, dogmas and rituals, and intimate relationships or otherwise, are again on the decline.

And when one observes all this in different parts of the earth, all these problems are not of any particular country but it is a global problem, the problem of all mankind. And so our approach must be surely not sectarian, not nationalistic, or a class, or a particular dogma, or communism, socialism or any other political endeavour, but one has to find now a global answer, a global outlook, a global action.

And we were saying too that every human being throughout the world is the representative of all other human beings. This is not an intellectual concept to be accepted and worked at, but a reality, an actual fact - fact being that which is taking place now. And every human being goes through extraordinary agonies, loneliness, misery, confusion, every form of dishonesty, both political, religious and otherwise. And as it is not an intellectual concept, an idea, but a reality that must be not intellectually grasped but to be understood with one's heart, with one's mind, with one's whole being. And so every human being is the rest of the world and therefore he is the world. His consciousness modified is the rest of the world. And so when one particular human being transforms himself so radically, deeply, fundamentally, then he does affect the whole consciousness of mankind. Again this is fairly obvious. There was a Hitler who affected the whole of mankind, he was crazy, whatever you like, but he has affected mankind. So has Karl Marx, so has Buddha, and so on. So one human being, you, brings about psychological transformation, psychological revolution that brings about a change totally in consciousness, which affects the consciousness of mankind. We went into all this very carefully.

And we were talking also about desire, fear and pleasure, as perhaps the major causes of our confusion, contradiction and conflict, which we talked about last Sunday, if I remember rightly. And we said also, if one may again point out, that we are thinking together, not arguing together, not offering one opinion against another, not one particular dogma against another, but rather as two friends may talk over their problems, we, you and the speaker, are investigating, examining, not accepting, nor rejecting, the examination of our whole existence as human beings; why we human beings live the way we are living, with our confusion, sorrow, misery and all the rest of it, why we accept our daily life of conflict, struggle, in our relationships, why we dominate each other and so on. We went into all this.

And I think, if one may, this afternoon, go into the whole question of what is a religious mind. Would that be all right? I am glad you approve. That is not a sarcastic remark but I am glad you want to go into it.

First of all in understanding this problem, what is a truly religious mind, we must grasp the significance of the word, the meaning of the word, and realize that the word is not the thing. The word 'tree' is not the actual thing that is there, nor the description of what is a religious mind - which we are going to explore today and tomorrow. The description of it, the verbal explanation of it is not the described, is not the actual fact. But words are necessary to communicate. And we all perhaps understand English. We are using words without any slogans or jargons, but ordinary words with which one is quite familiar.

So we are talking over together, examining together, investigating together, not that I investigate and you listen, and agree or disagree with the investigation, which would be absurd. Whereas if we could go together and explore this extraordinary question, which has haunted man throughout the ages: what is religion, what is a mind that can hold, or understand, or comprehend the beauty of a profoundly religious mind. Because every form of political organization has failed, they have not solved the problems, human problems. The politicians are seeking power, position, they are not at all concerned, though they pretend with us, with other human beings. Nor have religious organizations ended man's suffering, his agonies, the wars, the appalling chaos that is spreading throughout the world, semi anarchy. On the contrary religions have separated man with their beliefs, dogmas, rituals and all that nonsense. When I use the word 'nonsense' it means no sense.

And I believe historically a new culture can only come about with a different religion - rather a new culture only can be born out of a religious mind. And cultures throughout the world are degenerating, disappearing. So religion - which we are going to examine the word and the whole sequence of it - religion becomes extraordinarily important.

And again scientists have not solved any of our human anxieties, human relationships. So when one observes all the things that the intellect has brought about, it has only brought greater misery, greater confusion. Which is again obviously taking place.

So we are together going to examine not only this afternoon but tomorrow afternoon, what is a religious mind. I am not going to do all the work, you are going to join me. You have to work too. That is, we are challenging, demanding, asking, challenging the brain, the mind, the whole nature of our mind, what is a religious person.

The word 'religion' - one has looked up various dictionaries, and they more or less say, originally, etymologically, the meaning, Latin, Greek and so on, the meaning was to bind. But many of the etymologists have denied that. Now they are saying religion implies, the meaning implies gathering all your energy to discover - they don't say what. Gathering all your energy. And we are saying, gathering all your energy to discover what truth is, if there is anything sacred in life - not the temples, churches, mosques, they are not sacred, they are illusions created by thought. But there must be freedom, complete psychological freedom to find out, or to come upon that thing that is wholly, completely, irrevocably sacred, not invented by thought, by man. So that is the meaning of the word 'religion'.

And the word 'mind' includes not only the sensory activities, all the emotional reactions, the images - I hope you are following all this - the images, the beliefs, the anxieties, the intellectual capacity to reason logically, reasonably, or unreasonably, to be caught in illusion and to see that one is caught in an illusion and to be free of that illusion - all that is the mind. Right? Right sir? When we talk of the mind it includes the brain, which is very, very, very old, ancient, beyond memory, and the brain which has been conditioned upon millenia upon millenia. The genetic conditioning and the cultural conditioning, the social, religious conditioning. That is the brain, which contains all the genetic memories, the experiences, the knowledge of man's existence on this earth. Which again is an obvious fact.

And the tradition, the values, the beliefs, the dogmas, the concepts, handed down from generation to generation is part of that brain, is part of that mind. All the knowledge which you have acquired recently, or throughout the immemorial past, all that is part of the mind. So we are using the word 'mind' to convey a holistic, a whole process of the past, with its tradition, with its culture, with its rituals, with all the things man has collected.

So we are using religion and the mind. We have explained through words what the speaker means by religion and the mind. And we are asking, or rather challenging: what is a religious mind?

You are challenging it, I am not challenging, I am not pushing you into a corner to answer. After all existence, living, is a constant process of challenge. You can duck, or run away, or answer it along a particular cultural tradition. But when you answer according to tradition or culture, or environment, then that answer will be very limited. So we are saying, we are asking, we are challenging each other to discover, to find out by careful observation, by careful examination, by investigating 'what is' and whether 'what is' can be totally transformed.

Revolution means gathering together certain incidents, concepts, beliefs, and forming a circle, which is - are you following all this? No, no. Physical revolution, either the French or the Communist and so on, are the result of incidents, accidents, concepts, ideas, conclusions, forming a circle. And that is what is called revolution. I'll explain what I mean. Are you interested in all this? Because it is very exercising of our brains because it is part of our life, because they are all talking about revolutions. Generally what they mean by revolution, the terrorists, even the idealists and the Communists, if they are really serious Communists and not totalitarian slaves, but people who are talking, investigating into what is revolution, it generally means working along concepts, conclusions, conclusions drawn from incidents, social, environmental, religious, political and thus forming a circle. That is the circle begins and then come back to the same thing. Right, you are following? You start. This is so obvious, isn't it, must I explain all this? You start, saying, Capitalism, or Socialism is wrong. Draw a conclusion, concepts, and work it out, and then bring people to accept that, which inevitably, bureaucratically becomes the same thing it was before, which is going round in a circle. Though, if you are interested in all that, I used to have a great many Communist friends at one time, their idea was thesis, antithesis, synthesis. And from synthesis, antithesis and climb, climb, climb, change. Always intellectual concepts, based on intellectual conclusions and therefore intellect being only a part of our whole mind, such intellectual action must inevitably be divisive, contradictory, destructive. We are talking about revolution not in that sense at all. We are talking about revolution in which man, the psychological structure of man is radically, fundamentally transformed. That is the only revolution. The physical revolution cannot bring about the solutions, the ending of man's utter misery. Again this is proven when you examine all the revolutions. Going round and round in circles, coming to the same point only different people in different positions.

So we are asking, challenging each other, and I hope you are challenging yourself, I am not challenging you, the world is challenging, your husband, your wife - of course the gurus dare not challenge you. The world is challenging you, the things that are in the world demanding a real answer. And you can't impose on this challenge your own particular ideas. Right?

So let's proceed to examine together, think together, what is the nature of a mind that is profoundly religious, because religion is the only solution. You see there is so much to investigate, to go into, one doesn't know quite where to begin. All right, I've got it. Either you perceive purely the whole nature and structure of the mind instantly. I mean by that the nature and the structure. We are using the word 'structure' to mean movement. Structure means movement in the dictionary. So the nature of the mind and the movement that is going on. Not my description of the mind, not my word of the mind, but the operation of your mind, the nature of it, the quality of it, the depth of it, the superficiality of it, whether it lives on opinions, words, superficial reactions, whether it is being driven by a motive, whether the motive be enlightenment or sex or money or power, or wanting to retain what you have. So we are asking, challenging, what is the nature and the movement of a religious mind. Right? Obviously to investigate the nature of such a mind, the mind that is whole, that is sacred, that is totally free, to enquire into it one must begin with having freedom otherwise you can't enquire. Any form of investigation demands that the mind observe either microscopically, or observe the whole human activity outside there, or inside, there must be freedom to look. Right?

Freedom. That is not the freedom that has an opposite. You understand? Do you understand what I am saying, what I am trying to explain. A prisoner demanding freedom while in prison is absolutely meaningless. He can imagine it. There is only freedom when he leaves the prison. Now most of us are caught in the prison of ourselves. And to enquire into one of the most ancient demands of man, which is - what is it to have a religious quality of mind - and to enquire into that you must have freedom to look. Which means you don't belong to any religion. Right? You are neither a Hindu, Buddhist, Muslim, Christian, with all their dogmas, images, all the rest of it. You don't belong to a thing to examine what the religious mind is. Right? Are you doing this? You understand, sir, this is a very serious thing to be gone into, it isn't just a thing to be played around, not made into a philosophy, which is a bundle of theories, concepts. A religious person has no philosophy because such a mind is with that which is eternally sacred.

So that is the first requirement if you are interested to examine into the question of the mind that is religious; the first thing is in an investigation of any kind, freedom is utterly important. You can't investigate in freedom now and go back to your temple. You cannot possibly go back to your tradition, to your rituals, to your puja, all that thing that goes on, this vast circus that goes on in the name of religion. Now that is the first thing if you are at all serious, not to belong to any organization, to any sect, group, community, because to enquire you mustn't be tied. It is like a donkey tied to a tether, or hobbled, it can't go very far. So that is the first thing if you are really serious, because there is no guru, no scripture, no ritual, nothing, in order to find out. It doesn't mean that one becomes lonely. It doesn't mean that you have to stand by yourself against the current. Because mankind is going in that one direction, tradition, accepting the culture they live in, the appalling things that are happening around them, they accept that. And when you break away from that you might feel that you have isolated yourself. You break away from that because that is illusion, that will never under any circumstances lead to truth. And the very observation is the operation of intelligence that says that is false. When you see that which is false, the seeing, the perception is the operation of intelligence.

Now we will have to again explain what the word 'intelligence' means. Are we all communicating with each other, or am I talking and you are just listening? I mean by the word - I won't go into the etymological meaning - not only to read between the lines, between the two printed words, but to see that which is behind the word, to understand that which is not written, that which is not said, without distortion. We will go into that as we go along. Because intelligence is the essence of compassion. And there can be no compassion without the ending of sorrow, which we are going to examine as we go along, today and tomorrow.

In this examination, in this enquiry, we will also go into the question of what is meditation. That is part of our ancient tradition.

So we said there must be freedom: freedom to observe, freedom to discover that which is false. Commentators, which is part of the Hindu tradition, the commentators of the Upanishads, the Gita, there are so many commentators, and you read them and they never help you to discover that which is false. So first to understand what is a religious mind there must be freedom. Freedom implies that you are not attached to a thing, but to observe. You have no opinions, no conclusions, no concepts, but mere observation of what is actually going on. Right sir? Will you do that? That is our communication with each other.

Who has created the gods, or only one god, or the representative of god or the god's son, or all the innumerable gods with their goddesses, who has created them, which we call religion - going to the temple, to the mosques, the churches, you know, the whole thing - who has created them? Answer it sir, answer it yourself. Man has obviously created them. Thought has brought this about. God - I am sure he will forgive us, I am only making a joke of it, please - god is the invention of man. There are the Hindu gods opposed to the Christian gods, the Muslim god, but the Buddhist have no gods but they have their own peculiar Bodhisattvas and so on.

So man has created this out of his sorrow, out of his fear, out of his death, out of his confusion, uncertainty, physical insecurity, out of this matrix the things that we have called gods have been born. And these gods have been handed down from generation to generation. If you reject all that then you create a god of yourself. Are you following all this? Your own concepts, you become an atheist, which is another form of godhood. Or because of your own uncertainty, out of your own sorrow, total insecurity, you want something continuous, something that is timeless, something that knows no death, and out of that longing you create some marvellous image for yourself. And you say, that is reality.

So one has to understand why thought does this all the time. It has done it from time immemorial. You understand sirs? Every tribe has done this. The moment man began to think, he has created the gods in heaven, or on earth, and worshipped an image, or a tree or a stone, made by the hand or by the mind. Do look into yourself because any particular religion, any particular tribal religion is not going to answer, it is not going to be the salvation of man, it has to be a global religion.

So freedom to enquire into that which is false. I am not telling you what is false. The observation of what is going on actually, that which is happening now, and seeing the false or the truth in that which is happening now is to investigate and see that which is illusory and put that aside totally. Right? That is the beginning of freedom.

Then we talked about fear, desire, and the continuous demand of various forms of pleasure - pleasure of possession, pleasure of status, pleasure of being somebody, pleasure of identification with a country, with a group, with a conclusion, the pleasure of sex, the pleasure of one's own experience, and living that experience - and ending fear, because a mind that is clouded with fear can never be religious. You understand? Obviously. How can a mind that is frightened, that says, "I must find some comfort out of my insecurity, out of my confusion"? As long as a mind is frightened it cannot possibly have the religious quality of a mind. Right sirs? Which means in the enquiring are you free of fear? Otherwise you cannot possibly have a mind that is the essence of religion. Because desire, fear and the everlasting pursuit of pleasure not only creates, brings about confusion, but also those are the elements, the qualities, that make up the self, the 'me', the centre from which all activities begin. So it does not mean that you cannot enjoy the sound of that bird, it does not mean that you cannot look at a beautiful sunset, or the sky through the leaves. That is not pleasure. The looking at the sky through the leaves, which is a delight, which is a sense of great depth and beauty, it takes place in the instant and when that is over thought comes along and says, "What a marvellous thing that is to have had. I want more of it." Then the 'more' is the pleasure, not the actual moment of the perception of something beautiful, lovely. You understand all this? Not understand verbally, in your heart you do it.

And also to understand the nature and the structure, which is the movement of a religious mind, obviously must end sorrow. I do not know - one does not know if you have gone into this question at all. Because man has carried this burden of sorrow for millenia.

And we still have it. Every human being throughout the world goes through the agony of tears, loneliness, grief, the ending of something. And every human being is caught in it and doesn't know how to put it away completely, totally. Religions haven't solved this. They said, "Think about God and forget yourself", or "The son of God, he sacrificed, he suffers for you therefore you don't suffer". You know all the religious games they play.

So we are asking, you are asking whether sorrow can end, as fear? Because fears is part of sorrow. And desire is part of sorrow. And if you go into the whole question of the whole movement of pleasure it is also part of this sorrow. Only we want pleasure and avoid the other. So we are asking, can this sorrow end, not only your particular sorrow, but the sorrow of mankind? Mankind's sorrow which is poverty, the utter degradation of poverty, class division, the constant uncertainty of life, the imminent wars, the destruction, the brutality of wars, man has never stopped wars. You understand sirs, all this? So there is not only your particular little agony but also the agony of the whole of mankind of which you are a part. So we have to resolve this. Without the resolution of it there is no religious mind, because when there is the ending of that sorrow something else comes into being - which is not a promise from me.

So we have to enquire whether sorrow can end. Which is, can fear end? Now we will go into it, bearing in mind the words are not the fact. The word 'sorrow' is not the agony that one has inside. And the description, however great, however subtle, however magnified, that description is the not the actual fear. Because we also have to understand the whole meaning of death because that is part of our life - the ending of the brain cells, the ending of everything that one has collected, gathered, held on.

Are you all waiting for me to answer, go into all this? What is sorrow? What is your sorrow? Don't answer it to me. Can you find out what your sorrow is? Is it loneliness? Is it that you have not been able to identify yourself with something or other? Is it that you have lost somebody whom you loved, or had a great affection, or companionship? Is it that you cannot have the power, the position, the prestige of someone who has? Please examine all this for yourself. Is it that you want happiness and you can't have it? You want to be loved and nobody loves you? Sir, you understand? Is it that you want to achieve some extraordinary status and you know that you have not the capacity, the brains, the essential activity, and you cry?

Now please listen. Either you take one sorrow after another, one grief after another, one particular grief and resolve it but in the resolution of it another grief arises. You understand this? Or can you observe the whole nature of this sorrow as a whole? You understand? Not a particular sorrow, because the particular can never lead to the whole, the particular is the broken piece, the broken piece is not the whole. So can you see the truth of that: the particular cannot possibly lead to the whole. And you may investigate each particular hoping thereby to come to the end of sorrow, and that is an impossible thing to do because one sorrow leads to another. Right? I wonder if you understand all this?

So can you observe the whole nature, the whole movement of sorrow? That is, to observe wholly. I mean by that word 'wholly' not only to have a very clear, logical, sane mind, sane observation, logical, clear, precise, and that precision is not diluted by your prejudice, by your longing, by your motive, so that you can observe without any distortion. Which means, can you put aside your opinions, your conclusions, or the commentator's conclusion, or the Gita's, the Upanishad's, the Bible's, put away all those conclusions, concepts, and to observe wholly the whole movement of man's agony and sorrow. You understand? Through the particular to come to the whole is false. Right? So when you see that which is false, that falls away. The very falling away of it, the disappearing, or non-existent, the very perception of the false is the beginning of intelligence. It is this intelligence, not yours, or mine, or a particular intelligence, this seeing that which is true, and that which is false - not the truth according to your conclusion, according to your prejudice, according to your tradition. You must be free of all that.

So can you observe not only your sorrow but the sorrow of mankind of which you are a part, as a whole; the sorrow of a person who is physically ill, and the sorrow of a person who doesn't believe in anything? And that person who doesn't believe in anything is the same as the man who believes. Don't agree with me, please, this is very, very serious, it is your life.

Now in the same way as we talked about it the other day, fear; can you observe not a particular fear but the root of fear? We said the root of fear is time, time is thought, thought is fear. Right? We went into that very carefully the other day. And in the same way this enormous burden of man which is called sorrow, can it ever end? The moment you have a motive that it must end in order to have something else, then you are lost. So in observation of this question of sorrow there is no motive. You understand? So when there is a motive - motive means movement - when there is a self-interested movement there is distortion in observation. Right? So when there is no motive in your examination of this enormous burden which man has carried then is that sorrow different from you? You understand? No, please sir, look at it, go into it. You understand? As you are fear, as you are angry, as you are jealous - jealous is not different from you, your greed is not different from you, that's our tradition - not mine - tradition says, you are different from you greed, therefore battle with it, fight it, control it. So we are saying quite the opposite: anger is you. Only when there is a moment of anger, anger being violence and all that, at the moment of anger there is neither you but that reaction. Then thought identifies itself with that reaction, saying, that's anger, I have been angry. Therefore thought separates itself from that thing which is called anger. I hope you are following all this. We went into it.

So we are saying, the observer is the observed, the thinker is the thought, the experiencer is the experience, and sorrow is not different from himself. You understand? When that takes place, that there is no division between you and that which you are observing, that is the observer is the observed, the man who has tears, or the woman who cries, is that sorrow himself. You understand? That sorrow is not separate from himself or herself. When there is no division, the very observation of that brings about a radical change in that which is being observed.

So is there an observation of sorrow without the observer? You understand what I am saying? I lose my son and I am lost. It is a shock, I am paralysed for the moment. Then I realize I have lost something which I have treasured, which I have held, with which I have identified myself, my son. So sorrow is the loss of that. And so I then ask, please help me to get rid of my sorrow. Or, I will meet my son next life. You follow? The avoidance and the escape from what is actually going on. The observation of what is actually going on - when one loses a son, or a husband, or wife, anything, that which is actually going on, in the observation of that, if there is no division, when the observer is the observed, then in that observation that which is being observed undergoes a radical, fundamental change. Test it out!

Because in our enquiry into what is a religious life any form of fear, any form of the activity of will, which is the essence of desire, any form of seeking pleasure, will distort your observation - distort not your, observation.

So we are saying there is an ending to sorrow. And when there is an ending to sorrow out of that comes passion, not lust, passion being compassion. So a religious mind, we are enquiring, we are not learning, we are not memorizing, you understand. The sacred books - no, I won't call them sacred - the books say, your traditional books say, the perfect man who has attained enlightenment is this, this, this character, that character, he is that kind, etc., it gives a complete description of what the enlightened man is. But the description is not the described, so you can throw away all those books. But to find out for yourself there must be freedom - freedom from fear. And pleasure is totally different from the perception of something beautiful, marvellous, a lovely sky, or a single star in the heavens, or a single tree in a field. There is in that a great beauty, great love, great joy. But when thought takes over that joy it becomes pleasure.

So we are saying there is a total ending of fear and when there is the ending of that fear there is no illusion whatsoever. And with the ending of sorrow there is passion, there is that extraordinary sense of tremendous energy. Not the energy to do more mischief but the energy of this great limitless intelligence of compassion.

And we have to stop now because it is time. And we have also to go into the whole question of death, and what is meditation, because in the understanding of that the religious mind comes into being. The religious mind comes into being when we understand the whole human existence of relationship in which there is no fear, no domination, no control, when we know what love is, then there is love. We will go into that tomorrow, because love has no remembrance, love is not the movement of desire, love is not the activity of pleasure. That's why it is so essential to understand all this because we have lost that thing, probably we never had it, that thing called love. Right sirs.

MADRAS 6TH PUBLIC TALK 14TH JANUARY 1979

I would like if I may to talk about a great many things this afternoon, and if we can together go into something very simple, but very, very complex. First we are going to, together - please bear in mind always together, I am not just going by myself galloping along - we are going into the question of if it is possible to keep the brain very young probably this has never been tackled by the scientists or by the gurus or by the religious people. I don't know, they may have, but I don't know. I would also like to go into the question of continuity and advancement and death; and whether it is possible for human beings in our ordinary daily life, to have a full heart, to know, to be aware, to have in their consciousness the quality of love. And also if we have time, to go into the question of meditation - a mind that is in meditation, not what is meditation or how to meditate, but the nature of a mind that is wholly involved in meditation. Meditation when it is done consciously, deliberately, is no meditation at all. We will go into all these things, if we can, this afternoon.

So, first of all, we are going to talk over together whether the brain, which is part of the whole mind, with its capacity to think, to store up a great deal of information, knowledge, experience from generation after generation, millennia after millennia, whether that brain, so heavily conditioned and so constantly wearing itself out, whether the brain can rejuvenate itself. That is a very complex problem, you understand the question first, because I am sure, one is sure, this question has been asked in different ways probably, but one has never gone into it deeply. And if we can be, at least for ten minutes serious giving your deep attention, not to what I am saying, not what the speaker is describing or going into, but we are together taking a journey into the whole business of this brain, which is so very old, which is so extraordinarily capable, which has infinite capacities, which through time has evolved, acquiring a great deal of experience, knowledge, and whether such a brain, yours, not mine, yours, can unburden itself of a continuity and end continuity to begin totally anew. I don't know if you are following all this.

The scientists with whom the speaker has talked a great deal, they maintain there are two parts of the brain - the left and the right. The left holding all the information, knowledge, technological, and the whole knowledge and the active process; and the other, the right, is new, not too conditioned, and the not too conditioned brain moving forward and shaping or controlling or driving the left. You understand all this? I am not a brain specialist, nor have I read all these books, but one can observe something quite different, which is the totality of the brain, not the left or the right, but the quality of the brain that has been evolved through various experiences, through various cultures, through various racial limitations, through various social, economic pressures. This brain is an extraordinary instrument. And whether that brain which controls all our thinking, all our activities, all our sensory operations and so on, whether that brain can become totally innocent. I am using the word 'innocent', please carefully, not the Christian idea of innocence, the lamb and all the rest of it, but we are using the word 'innocent' in the sense, it comes from the Latin,

'not to hurt'. Not to hurt, that is, a brain that is capable of not only not hurting others, but also not being able to be hurt. You understand?

Please don't merely agree with words. Go into it. Observe your own mind, your own brain, because we are going into something very, very subtle, very difficult and unless you are observing it yourself, you will miss the whole thing. You have to do it, you have to work with the speaker, not just listen and pass by. We are asking a very, very serious question. We are challenging the brain itself to find out whether it has the capacity, the energy, the drive, the intensity to break down this continuity of the past with all its accumulated experience and in the very ending of it, the very brain cells themselves undergo a change, a transformation. You understand my question? Please understand the question first before you agree or disagree. I wish there were only a few people with whom I could discuss.

Thought is a material process, because thought is the outcome of memory, experience, knowledge stored up in the brain, in the brain cells themselves - we will keep it to the brain, that's good enough. And it has functioned in a particular direction continuously evolving, evolving and thought is a material process. Of that there is no doubt, because memory is part of the brain; brain is material. And this brain contains the memory, the experience, the knowledge, from which comes thought. So thought is a material process and thought has its continuity because thought is based on knowledge which is the past. The past is operating all the time, modifying itself in the present and continuing, so there is a continuous movement which is the movement of brain. You are following all this? I'll go on. And in that continuity the brain has found security. Watch it yourself. A continuous tradition - values, opinions, judgements, evaluations, conclusions and so on - a continuous tradition which conditions the brain and that continuity is in time, a duration, so in that duration, in that continuity, the brain has found security. You are following all this? Watch it yourself, sir, because this is your life, for god's sake, not my life. Watch it yourself. So in this continuity it has found an immense sense of being safe, because the brain can only function when it is completely safe; either safe in a belief, safe in an illusion, safe in certain kinds of knowledge. This is what is happening to us. So the brain needs security. That is clear. You can watch it yourself, your own operation of thought, the movement of thought. Any disturbance in that continuity, either the brain becomes neurotic, when it is profoundly shaken - trauma as it is called; or when there is a great challenge, and when it cannot respond properly, then as it cannot respond properly, it finds its continuity in which it has sought in security is disturbed. You are following all this? Watch it. It is so obvious. When you go into it very carefully this becomes very simple.

So we are asking, whether a brain, which is your brain, which is the brain of all human beings evolved through immemorial time, conditioned by cultures, religions, by economic, social pressures, that brain has had a timeless continuity till now, and in that duration it has found a sense of being safe. That is why you accept tradition. Because in tradition there is safety, in imitation there is safety, in conformity there is safety, and there is also safety in an illusion. Obviously all your gods are illusions put up by thought.

So there is not only the obvious continuity, in which the brain seeks safety, but also it finds safety in all kinds of illusory activities in our daily life. Which is a belief or faith is an illusion. There is no need for belief or faith, but having a faith in God, in Jesus, in Krishna or whatever you like to call it and in that faith, in that belief, in that devotion, there is a sense of being protected, being in the womb of god, which is an illusion. So we are asking now, whether the brain can discover an ending of this continuity of time, because the continuity of time is considered advancement, progress, evolution, evolution based on the continuity of knowledge. And we are challenging that.

So we have to consider what is death. Please don't be stimulated by the speaker, because if you are stimulated by the speaker then when you leave the place your stimulation disappears. But if you are actually partaking in this challenge, in this movement, then it is yours, it will be abiding, it will stay. But if you are being stimulated, it's like taking a drug, whisky or whatever you take, it will stimulate for the time being, but it disappears. So please don't be stimulated by the speaker. If you are stimulated by the speaker then you will depend on him, then he becomes the authority, and your beastly little guru, and I am not your guru because this demands that you be a light to yourself, not the light of another.

So, we have to go into the question, because that is part of the brain, death. Death means total ending, and the destruction of the brain. Because the oxygen cannot go into the brain, and all the rest of it. Death implies an ending, ending to a continuity of life, the life which you now lead, your life, and opposed to living, the ending.

So first one has to examine the continuity of what we call living, and the ending of it which we call death. And to examine this, any form of fear, any form of opinion, judgement, evaluation has no value. We have to examine 'what is', the 'what is' of your life, your everyday life. That is a fact. And man throughout the ages has clung to this continuity - the continuity of life, the life that he leads, hoping next life will be a better opportunity, be born in a palace, or have more money, more beautiful and all that kind of stuff. So we are asking something very clear, which is, not only to observe, to examine what we call living, which is our relationship, our ambitions, our greed, our desire for power, status, anxiety, fear, pleasure, sorrow, attachment, detachment, the battle between the opposites, the contradictions. That is our life, with all the gods, superstitions, all that, the ideals, hoping one day we will all be brothers. That is our daily living and that has had a continuity, generation after generation. Please watch it, it is extraordinary what we are doing.

And what is the meaning of death, and what is the meaning of living? We have put death in opposition to life. So there is a fear of what we call living and avoiding or putting as far away as possible what we call death. So continuity in time, continuity in our sorrow, continuity in our fear, continuity in our attachments - please follow all this carefully - and when that attachment is disturbed, broken down, again another continuity, another attachment. Continuity implies time. Right? Time is the movement of thought. Time means movement. From here to there takes time, or psychologically to reach from that which is not beautiful to that which is beautiful. So the movement of continuity is time, and this movement is thought. Right? And that is our life, your life, not the idealistic life, not the life in heaven, or Moksha, or liberation, or the ideal of a non-violent life and all the inventions that thought has created in order to escape from actuality, from the actual daily living.

So, we are asking whether that living, with all its confusion, all that, can end to find out what death is. You have understood? Right sir? I'll show it to you. Go slow.

We are attached to a house, a person, to a belief, to a conclusion, to a concept, to an ideal and so on. We are attached. Analytically you are attached because inwardly you are desperately lonely, and being lonely you want something to escape from this sense of total isolation. That is called loneliness. You must have experienced it, you must have known it, if you have at least observed a little bit. And so you get attached to something, generally a person, an ideal or an experience which you have had.

Now, attachment implies continuity, does it not? The very word implies a duration. When you use the word 'relationship', having a relationship with my wife, one's wife or one's husband, the very dependence, attachment implies time, a duration. Are you following all this? Is this getting a little difficult? Thank goodness. Right sir, verbally you may be following, but the word is not the thing. The description is not the described. Please bear that in mind all the time, that the word is not the thing and if you are caught in the word, you will miss the real thing. That's what you have done. That's part of the intellect that enjoys the stimulation of words and clings to that stimulation and from that intellectual operation, you have created such havoc in the world. The intellect is only a part, not the whole. When the part dominates, there must be division, there must be cruelty, there must be violence and that is what the intellect has done in the world. The intellect has invented the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Christian, the Muslim, the Jew, the Arab and they are at each others throats. And because we have given such importance to the intellect, it has brought about great misery in this world, which does not mean we all must become dull. On the contrary, we are pointing out when the intellect is only a part and when that dominates, there must be decay, degeneration, which is what is going on in the world.

Now we are saying attachment, the very word implies a sense of permanency, a sense of continuity, a quality of duration, and in that time, duration, we hope to have a constant companionship, wholly, safety. Death says to you 'end it'. That is what death means - end your attachment completely because that is what is going to happen when you stop breathing. You are going to leave everything behind. It is like the rich man said, 'At least I can have it till the last moment'. Right? So, please watch it.

Can you know the implication and the consequences of attachment, to a house, to property, to your wife, to a belief, to a concept, to a conclusion, to an opinion, to a god - attachment? Can you see the implications of it is fear, jealousy, anxiety, you may get lost and so on, so on? Can you, listening now, end your attachment completely? Now, you won't shake your heads. That is the test and you are unwilling to test it out.

So, we are saying the brain, when it has continuity, it becomes mechanical. And all thought is then mechanical. There is no new thought, because all thought is based on memory which is the response of knowledge and so on. So there is no new thought.

So death implies the ending of attachment. It is only in the ending there is a beginning. Do you understand? This is something serious, don't play with words. Because, the moment there is an ending, something new takes place. But if there is continuity, there is nothing, there is nothing new under the sun. And it is very important, this ending, because it is only then the brain can discover for itself a quality of movement that is totally not in the past. I wonder if I am explaining all this. Right? Are you following? Are we communicating with each other a little bit?

So death implies the ending, not only the physical organism, but all the things that man has accumulated. If it does not end, there is this whole question, what happens to the mind, to the whole movement of consciousness, not yours or mine, consciousness of man, what happens to that? You understand my question? No, you don't. You see, one has to explain every little thing, you don't capture it. Sir, our daily life is like a vast river - watch it - like a vast river, and the whole human living is like that in which there is all these complexities, problems, pain, sorrow, anxiety. Everything is that river of which we are a part. When the part dies, the stream goes on. The manifestation of the stream is you, with your name, quality and so on, but you are still part of this stream. Are you following? Part of the stream. And we are saying the ending of that stream, you follow, moving totally away from that stream, never belonging to that stream, because that stream is conflict, confusion, pain, attachment, detachment, what is right, you follow, this battle that is going on. So we are saying while you are living, conscious, alive, full of your mischief, or your activities, all that, see that the ending of something voluntarily, not with a motive, ending voluntarily attachment is the beginning of something totally new. You've got it? Because the 'I', the 'me' is a continuity. The 'I' has been not only genetically, from millennia handed down, generation after generation, it is a continuity, and that which is continuous is mechanical, there is nothing new in it. Right? You see it. It is marvellous if you get into this.

Now there is another point, another thing. There is continuity as long as the brain - please listen quietly, don't agree, just listen - as long as the brain is registering. Right? You are following this? As long as I am registering the hurts, the pain, the brain is registering all this, and that gives it a continuity. That gives the idea that 'I am continuing', and that continuity is considered a progressive diminution, gradually ending the 'I'. You follow? As long as the brain registers, like a computer, it is mechanical. When you are insulted or praised, it is registering and millennia after millennia it has registered. You follow? That is our conditioning, that is our whole progressive movement. Now we are asking is it possible, please listen to the question first, is it possible not to register except that which is relevant, and nothing else? You understand this? Why should one register when you are hurt, why should you register when somebody insults or flatters? I am asking why? And when you register, when the brain registers, that registration prevents the observation of the other who has insulted. That is, you observe the person who has insulted you or praised you, with the registered mind, brain, so you never see him actually. You are following what I am saying? Oh, come on sirs. Your brain registers again. This registration is a continuity and in that continuity there is safety. It says I have been hurt once and therefore I'll register it, keep it and therefore avoid being hurt, both physically and psychologically. Physically it is relevant, but psychologically, is it relevant? Do you understand my question? One has been hurt. One has been hurt because the hurt is the movement of time which is the building up of the image you have about yourself and when that image is pricked, you are hurt. And as long as you have that image you are going to be hurt always. So is it possible not to have the image and therefore no registration? You are following all this?

Please listen carefully. We are laying the foundation to discover what is meditation. Because if you have fear, do what you will, there is no meditation. If you are nationalistic, if you are ambitious, if you are greedy, this or that, you can stand on your toes for the rest of your life, you will never know what meditation is. That is why we said very carefully from the very beginning of these talks, the understanding of ourselves is part of this meditation; the understanding of sorrow, pain, fear, anxiety, so that the mind, your consciousness with all its content is being washed out. So we are asking, is it possible not to register psychologically, but only register what is not only necessary but relevant? Because when you have established order, when there is order in our life, which we went into very carefully the other day, when there is order there is freedom. It is only the disordered mind that seeks freedom. When there is total order, then that very order is freedom. And we are saying, is it possible only to register knowledge for functioning. Please listen to this. Work it out with me. Register the relevant necessary knowledge to live an orderly life in the ordinary sense - going to the office, driving a car, recognition of your wife and husband, recognition of your name and so on, knowledge that is relevant, that is necessary. Now we are saying, psychologically, inwardly there is no necessity or anything relevant to be registered. Is this possible? You understand sir? Intellectually, logically you can see this, or verbally, but to bring, to come upon this, to see this happening in life, that is quite a different matter. I am going to go into it if I may, because I have so many things I wish to talk about that I wish I could talk to you every day. But I can't. And probably you wish that I couldn't!

So, first of all to go into this very deeply, one has to understand the nature of your consciousness. I am sorry to make it all so difficult, it isn't. What is your consciousness? Have you ever asked yourself? Your consciousness is its content. Without its content it is not. Right? You see this? Come on sir. Help me out. So the content makes up our consciousness. The content is our tradition, our anxiety, our name, our position. You follow? The content is that and that is our consciousness. And thought is dissatisfied with this consciousness and says there must be super-consciousness, above all this. But that movement from the below to the upper is still the movement of thought. Thought is a material process. Therefore, it is still part of this consciousness. You understand, have you understood it? It is part of this consciousness, though thought says there is infinite consciousness, cosmic consciousness, the highest consciousness. It is still within the field of this consciousness which has its continuity and the continuity is its content. Right? See this even verbally, intellectually, it is good enough. And this consciousness has its continuity, attachment, all the rest of it.

So, we are saying, can this consciousness with all its content, which is part of the brain, which is part of the mind, the mind being brain and all that, mind is part of this consciousness, can this whole consciousness realize its content, realize its duration and take one part of that consciousness as attachment, and end it voluntarily. You understand? That means you are breaking continuity. I wonder if you follow all this. Which means, we are asking is it possible to register only what is necessary, relevant, and nothing else? Understand the beauty of that question, the implications of that question, the depth of that question. I say it is possible. I'll explain, but the explanation is not the fact. Don't be caught up in the explanations. Through the explanation, come to the fact. Then the explanation has no value. The commentators make explanations but they never come to the fact. So we are saying, what has continuity is the movement of time, is the movement of thought, the movement of knowledge from the past, modifying itself in the present and proceeding. That is the whole process of registration, the whole movement of registration of the brain, otherwise we could not have knowledge. So that is the whole movement and we are saying that movement has taken over the psychological field. Because one sees knowledge is necessary, otherwise I could not function, I couldn't talk - I won't begin on talking, that is a different matter, that is tremendously interesting if you want to go into it, but I won't go into it now.

We said knowledge is continuity and the brain has found safety in this continuity and therefore it must register. Right? But knowledge is always limited. There is no omnipotent knowledge. So, the brain, having found security in the movement of knowledge, clings to it, and translates every incident, accident according to the past. Therefore, the past has tremendous importance to the brain, because the brain itself is the past. And your own intellect says, logically as we have explained, the intellect says - which is a verbal explanation of intellect - the intellect says, I see very clearly that which has continuity has nothing new, there is no new perfume, there is no new heaven, there is no new earth, and so the intellect says, is there an ending of continuity and not bring danger to the brain, you follow, because without continuity it gets lost. So it says, if I end continuity, the intellect says to itself, if I end that continuity what then? The brain demands to be secure, what then? If it can find something in the ending and the beginning, then it says, all right, I have got it, I am safe. You understand? Now the brain has said 'I can only function in security', whether it is false or true security, and continuity has given it security, which is the registration process. Are you following. Registering, that has given it security. And you come along and say to me, to the brain, register only what is necessary, relevant, and don't register anything else. You understand my question. It is suddenly at a loss. It says, what do you mean by it? Because it is functioning out of security, it says, give me security and I will go after it. Do you understand this?

I say there is a security, but not this kind of security, which is, to put knowledge, thought in its right place. Right? The very orderliness of life is possible only when the brain has understood that it is living in disorder, which it calls security. And when it realizes that security implies putting everything in order, which is everything relevant and nothing irrelevant, then the brain says, I have understood this, I have got it, which is, I have an insight into this whole movement of continuity. Right? You are following? It has an insight. That insight is the outcome of complete order, which is, the brain has put everything in its right place. Then there is total insight into the whole movement of consciousness. And therefore, it means the brain will only register what is necessary and nothing else. Have you got it; you have captured something? In that is implied the activity of the brain undergoes a change, the very structure of the brain undergoes a change, because the seeing something for the first time anew brings a new function to operate. You understand? Sir, your arm, this arm is developed because of its function. Right? So when the brain discovers, sees something new, there is a new function being born, a new organism is taking place. So we are saying, it is wholly necessary for a mind, for a brain to become very young, fresh, innocent, alive, youthful when there is no psychological registration at all.

And we must also go into the question, is love within this consciousness? You understand my question? Has love a continuity? Please listen to the question first. Don't agree or disagree. Just listen to it. We said consciousness is a continuity, tradition, all that. And is love part of this field or entirely outside the field? I am asking, I am challenging. I don't say it is or it is not. We are going into it. Because if it is within the field of our consciousness, it is still part of thought. Right? Because the content of our consciousness is put together by thought - beliefs, gods, superstitions, traditions, all that, fear, is part of thought. And is love part of thought, is part of this consciousness? Which means, is love desire, is love pleasure, sex and all the rest of it? Is love part of this thought process? Which means, is love a remembrance? You are following all this? Love cannot possibly exist or come into being like the fresh morning dew, if the intellect is supreme. And our civilization has worshipped the intellect. That is, worshipped it because it has created theories - there is Brahman, there is no Brahman, there is god, there is no god, you follow? It has created the principles, the ideals, the supreme one or the supreme double or the supreme triple. So we are asking you, is love part of this stream, this consciousness? Can love exist when there is jealousy? Can love exist when there is attachment to my wife, to my husband, to my children? Can love exist when there is the memory of sexual action, a remembrance, a picture, all that? Has love a continuity? Please go into it. Find out because that thing does not exist in your heart, that is why the world is in such a mess.

To come upon this love, the whole stream of consciousness must come to an end - consciousness being your jealousy, your antagonism, your ambition, your desire for position, your desire for becoming bigger, nobler and all the rest of it, or seeking power. You understand, power, either siddhis, you know, levitation, all that kind of business, or power, position politically, religiously, or power over your wife, husband, your children, all that is implied. Where there is any sense of egotism, the other is not. And the essence of egotism is the process of registration. And we said the other day, yesterday, the ending of sorrow is the beginning of compassion. But we have used sorrow as the means of advancement, becoming better, better, better. On the contrary, the ending, then there is something infinitely new takes place.

Now we can talk about meditation. Don't take postures. Don't suddenly sit up and say, I am going to meditate. Be comfortable. That is all. Sir, there are several things implied in meditation. First, there must be space, not physical space only, but space within the mind, which means no occupation. You understand this? Because all our minds are occupied. How shall I stop chattering? I must be occupied with having a space. I must be silent. You follow? This occupation like a housewife with her cooking, with her children, like a devotee with his god, a man with his occupation, with his sex, with his job, with his ambition, with his position, the mind is wholly occupied, therefore, there is no space in it. You follow? We have established order in our life, not the order of discipline, control. That is out. But we have established order because we have seen, intelligently we have seen that the order can only come out of the understanding of disorder. We have gone into it. I am not going to go into it.

So we have brought about order in our life, order in our relationship, which is very important, because life is relationship a movement, an action in relationship. If there is no order in your relationship with your wife, with your husband, with your children, with your neighbour, whether that neighbour is near or very far, forget about meditation. Because if out of having disorder in your life, you try to meditate, you will fall into the trap of illusions. So that's why we said in these talks, if you have been serious, if you have followed, we have brought about order, absolute order, not temporary order, but absolute order. That order can look to the cosmic order. It has relationship - I mustn't go into it. Just let me go into it a little bit. That order has relationship with the cosmic order. Cosmic order is the setting of the sun, the rising of the moon, the marvellous sky of the evening with all the beauty. And merely examining the cosmos, the universe through a telescope, is not order. It is order here, in our life. Then that order has an extraordinary relationship with the universe. You understand all this?

So we are saying when a mind is occupied there is no order, there is no space. When the mind is full of problems, how can you have space? So every problem as it arises must be immediately solved first, to have space. Do you understand? That isn't part of meditation, not to carry problems over day after day, day after day. I met the other day a lady who said to me, 'When you were a little boy you hurt me psychologically and I am still carrying that hurt.' Sixty years hurt. Oh, you don't see this. So is it possible not to be occupied, which does not mean irresponsibility. You understand? On the contrary, when you are not occupied, you give your attention to responsibility. It is only the occupied mind that is confused and therefore responsibility becomes ugly, and responsibility then has the possibility of guilt and all that. So please don't ask how not to be occupied. If you say, please tell me a system, a method, all that, then you will be occupied with the system, with the method, with the slogans and all the rest of it. But if you see, if you have an insight, if you see that a mind occupied is a destructive mind, is not a free mind, it has no space, if you see that, it happens.

The next question is attention, inattention and distraction. You follow - attention, inattention, concentration and distraction. Are you getting tired? We are saying there is no distraction at all. Please see that point very carefully. There is no such thing as distraction. I will explain, I will go into it. When we are attempting to concentrate, only then there is distraction. Right? That is, thought says - listen carefully to this - thought says, I will concentrate on that, the image, the picture, the idea, the word OM or whatever it is, I will concentrate on that and thought is focusing its energy on that. But thought also wanders off and then thought says, that is distraction, I must come back to this. Both are the movements of thought. Are you following all this? So there is no distraction, it is only the movement of thought. Right? And concentration implies enclosure, resistance. So we are saying, where there is concentration, which is thought focusing its energy on a particular thing, image, whatever you want to concentrate on, and in that process of concentration, thought wanders away. And that you call distraction, but the concentration and the movement away is part of thought, is thought. So don't ever say to yourself that I am being distracted, because you eliminate the conflict between concentration and distraction. You are getting what I am talking about? And we are saying if you have understood that, then attention.

To attend - are you attending now? Attend, which means what? If you are really deeply attending, there is no centre from which you are attending. Right? You understand? And that attention cannot, as you would like it to, continue. Right? You are following? The continuity is inattention. Have you understood this? I will explain. When you are attending, which means, listening - I will explain what it means, listening, the art of listening, the art of seeing, the art of learning. That is the total movement of attention. In that attention there is no centre that says,

I am learning, I am hearing, I am seeing. There is only this enormous sense of wholeness, which is watching, listening, learning. And in that attention there is no movement of thought. I don't know if you have noticed it. There is no movement of thought. Then that attention cannot be sustained, then thought says, I must find out how to come by, arrive or achieve that attention. This movement away, this movement of wanting to capture that attention is inattention, is lack of attention. You have understood this? Now to be aware, to be aware of this movement away from attention is to be attentive. Have you captured it?

So we said the mind must have great space, limitless space and that can only take place when there is no chattering, when there is no problem, because problems had been resolved, and the movement of the mind in sleep is also quiet, because it is not constantly dreaming, because you are resolving the problems as they arise. I won't go into it, it's too long. So having great space, and you can only have great space when there is no centre. The moment you have a centre, there must be circumference, there must be diameter, a movement from this centre to the periphery. Space implies no centre. Therefore it is absolutely limitless. And we are saying concentration is a distraction of thought. Thought itself is a distraction. And attention implies giving all your energy to listen, to see, in that there is no centre. Then comes a mind that has understood order, and is free of fear, ending sorrow, has understood the nature of pleasure and given its right place and so on. Then the question is what is the quality of a mind that is completely silent? Not how to achieve silence, how to have peace of mind. That is what you all want, a peace of mind, and you will only have a piece! We are saying the quality of a mind that is absolutely, timelessly silent.

Now there is silence between two notes, there is silence between two thoughts, the silence between two movements, the silence between two wars, there is silence between husband and wife before they begin to quarrel, before they begin to have all kinds of things happen. We are not talking of that kind of quality of silence, because they are temporary, they go away. But we are talking of silence that is not produced by thought, that is not cultivable, that comes only when you have understood the whole movement of existence. And then, there arises, in that there is silence, there is no question and answer, there is no challenge, there is no search, everything has ended. In that silence, if you have come to that, with a great sense of space and beauty and extraordinary sense of energy, then there comes that which is eternally, timelessly sacred, which is not the product of civilization, product of thought. That is the whole movement of meditation.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC TALK 22ND DECEMBER 1979 'THE SEED OF A MILLION YEARS'

It is a large crowd, and I hope you will understand what I am talking about.

First of all one would like to point out that we are not doing any kind of propaganda for any ideal, for any society, for any organization. We are not trying to convince you of anything. We are not trying to sell you something. But I think we can talk over together, think together, see together, and understand the enormous significance, which we seem to miss, of existence, of our daily life, our miseries, our confusions, our great sorrows, and the corruption that is going on throughout the world. And so please bear in mind, if one may point out again, throughout these talks and discussions, we are together thinking, working.

To think together is one of the most difficult things to do, because each one has his own opinion, his own prejudices, conclusions, and aspirations. And one can never meet another who is free from these, from his superstitions, from his experiences, from his knowledge which he has gathered through books, or some guru. And it is infinitely difficult, except under great crises, that we can come together to think out the problems, not only one's own problems, but the problems of human kind of which we are part.

So if we could begin this evening attempting to think together. Because we are going to go into the question of the whole structure and the nature of the mind, which directs all our lives, which shapes our activities, our specialties, our miseries, our meditations, our innumerable escapes. So, if we can, this evening, think together.

One is likely to agree to think together about something; about the nation, about oneself, about what organization to belong to, and so on. To think about something is fairly easy because that is comparatively adjustable and easy. But to think together is quite different. I hope you see the point. That is, to think about something and to think together not about something. Right? Can we go on? That means can we together forget our prejudices, put them aside for a while, if you can, perhaps permanently; put aside our experiences, because if you have your experience and you cling to that, and I cling to mine, then we will never meet. If you have your conclusions and another has his, it is impossible to think together. So one has to put aside not only one's experiences, one's knowledge, one's prejudice, one's ideals and superstitions, if you can, then we can talk together, then we can think together, because our minds then, our brains, are meeting. But if we, or each one of us, holds to his point of view because he has read so much, or he is ignorant of books, or he wants a particular answer to his own problem and so on, then it is impossible to think together. Right? I hope you will meet this point.

That is, you and the speaker are thinking together, not about something, but the quality of a mind that is capable of putting aside its own particular points of views and opinions and ideals, and meeting another who has none of those. Then only it is possible to think together without any kind of pressure.

I do not know if you have not noticed that we think together when there is a great crisis like war. When this country is fighting Pakistan or Germany, not this country, another country, then everybody is together. Because their security, their so-called patriotism, which is nonsense, their flags, which they worship, I don't know why, it is just a piece of coloured cloth, and they are willing to kill each other. And for this they come together. One has seen this all over the world. When there is a great immediate urgent crisis then we drop our own particular selfish arrogance and meet each other. And I hope we can do this not only this evening but throughout the talks, because then we can move together. Then we can touch something that is beyond all knowledge, all words, all experience. And that is after all the essence of religion. Not the organized religions of the world which are merely a lot of superstitions, and make-believe and doctrines and rituals invented by man out of his fear and loneliness; but when one uses the word 'religion', etymologically it is rather doubtful, its origin, but it is generally accepted now that it means, coming together, not physically, coming together to observe, to collect one's energy completely to see, to perceive. And that requires a great diligence, that is great care, not a mind that is negligent. That is, a mind that is capable of investigating, looking, observing, its own structure, its own nature both the conscious as well as the unconscious, the deeper layers of one's mind.

And in this gathering of this total energy is the beginning of a religious life, which demands diligence, not superstition, not all the images that man has created - the temples, the mosques and the churches and the cathedrals. They are marvellous architecturally, the structure, but inside them there is nothing.

So we are thinking together without resistance. You may be Hindus, Muslims, or Christians, or some sect, or belonging to some guru - I hope you don't. If you do then I am afraid we shall not meet each other, because this is an enquiry into the very depths of the mind, because the mind is the most important thing man has. By the word 'mind' one means not only all the senses, the sensory responses, with their emotions, with their desires, the capacity to discern, to understand, to awaken that intelligence which is not mere book knowledge, or clever argumentation. This is the mind which we all have. Our brains are very, very, very old. Perhaps you are hearing this for the first time, so please don't resist. Not that you must accept, or reject, but in the process of evolution, from time immemorial the brain has collected innumerable experiences, innumerable accidents, incidents, crises, various forms of despair, agony, anxiety, fears, seeking everlastingly security, both outwardly and inwardly; seeking that which may be timeless, which may give a total comprehension of life. This is the result of a million years, which is our brain, our minds. It is not your mind and my mind but the mind. I hope you are all understanding all this. No?

Please, you may not have thought about all this, or enquired into this. Or if you are a neurologist, or a brain specialist, not in the sense of surgery, or pain, but a professor who investigates the brain of an animal, of some other thing but never his own brain. I hope you are understanding all this. He is willing to examine the brains of others, accumulating much knowledge throughout the years, and may be a brain expert. But to understand one's own brain, one's own mind, is much more arduous, demanding infinite, scrupulous attention.

And to go into this, to examine, to understand this nature of our minds, the very core of it, and whether it is possible to bring about a mutation in the very brain cells themselves. Because unless we do this we are always operating, functioning, moving in the field of the known. Right? Our brain, as we said just now, is the result of a million years. During those time periods it has gathered innumerable experiences; it has suffered, there has been pain, mutilation, wars, despair, a sense of great sorrow. It is all there, of which you may not be conscious, but it is deeply seated there, that is the ground of the brain. You can observe this yourself very simply if you watch yourself. You don't have to study innumerable books. There is a danger in books. There are those people, the worshippers of books, who live according to books. That is, live on other people's knowledge, or experiences, and so they become secondhand people. As most people are.

So together we are going to observe, not what the speaker is saying, but what is actually going on in our brains, in our minds. That is - I hope you are all following this, some of you at least. I am not talking to myself! I can do that walking along the beach, or sitting in one's room, have a dialogue with oneself, which is fun. But here we are together, we are together to find out. To find out first what it means to observe. Not only visually, optically, but also to observe without the word, without the past, which is knowledge, to observe without any kind of distortion. That's the first thing one has to learn: to observe so precisely, so accurately, with a sense of scrupulous honesty. And that is very difficult for some people. Probably they have never been honest with themselves. Probably they have never looked at anything without the word, without the image, without the symbol, which is the memory. Please as the speaker is talking find out if you can look optically, with your eyes, look at something. And see whether you can observe without the word, without the past impinging on your observation, without the accumulated memories interfering. Can you look at a tree, at the person sitting next to you, at your wife or husband, girl friend or whatever it is, to look and see how extraordinarily difficult it is to observe someone to whom you are related so precisely, so accurately. You may be able to do it with regard to a mountain, swift running water, or a sheet of water full of light and beauty, that is comparatively easy. But to observe the activities of one's own mind, the desires, the sensory responses, the tremendous sense of insecurity, to observe that without the word. You understand what I am saying? I hope you are doing it.

As we said, that is the first thing, the capacity to observe. You know - I hope you don't mind my digressing - our capacity is based on knowledge, on experience, on specializations. Your electronic expert and your capacity has come through great study, examinations and you know, all the rest of it. That capacity of specialization is very limited. Right? Like a carpenter, a master carpenter, he has spent years with his tools and with his hands. He produces a marvellous thing. And his capacity is limited naturally; like the scientist's capacity is limited, like an engineer, his capacity is limited because it is always based on knowledge, experience, accumulation of information and so on. Right? That's simple.

There is a capacity which is not based on knowledge, which is not the result of experience of others, as well as one's own. Which we will go into presently when we begin to understand the nature and the structure and the extraordinary complexity of the mind.

And the other thing is to listen. To listen not only what is going on around one, that car going along the street, changing its gear, but also to listen to all the noise and the rumblings of the mind. Not only listen to what is being said now but also listen to your wife, to your children, to your neighbour, to the politician. In this country there are no politics, they are all ambitious men trying to achieve power. Politics means to govern, concerned with the people, with their food, clothes, shelter and their happiness. But when politicians change from one party to the other over night without any scruples, without any statesmanship, then those people are unworthy of government. And to listen to them too. And to listen to your gurus, if you have one. Have you ever listened to them? Have you ever listened to your professor, if you are a student? And if one may ask, are you listening now? Actually listening to that crowd, to the words that are spoken, to the words that have their meaning, listening not only to the word but behind the word, to capture the meaning of listening. Not only through the nervous organism of the ear but also to hear not only with the ear but to hear beyond the ear. That requires great sensitivity, that means no barrier, no resistance. Are we doing this? Or we are merely waiting for some deep revelation?

Because if we are not capable of listening we are not capable of learning. That is, not from the teacher, from the professor, from a book, but listening to the vast depths of one's own existence, one's own anxiety. Have you ever listened to your anxiety? That is, to listen to it so that you are not escaping from it, you are not trying to translate what it must be, what it should be, or trying to go beyond it. Just to listen to that feeling that comes about when one is anxious. You need to have a sharpness, a quickness because those moments of great anxiety, the moment you listen they slip away. I don't know if you have noticed all these things. But to listen to them without demanding a solution, an answer, a way out of it, an escape, but just to be with it, move with it, so that it flowers. And as you listen, as you observe, the flowering of that anxiety comes to its head and withers away permanently, if you can do this.

And the other thing is to learn, not from another, not from a book, not from those people who have accumulated, or think they have accumulated knowledge, and enlightenment and all that business, but to learn through observation, through listening. We have only learnt as a means of acquiring a capacity, a job, and that learning has become the accumulation of information and memory. I hope you are listening. And that memory is limited, as all knowledge is limited. All knowledge is within the field of ignorance. All right? Isn't it? I hope you understand all this. It is rather fun sirs, and ladies, don't be so serious. It's fun to discover for oneself. That is the beginning of creation. You see, there is learning through accumulation of knowledge, in many ways, acting, then knowledge, and further action. Accumulated knowledge then act, but they are both the same. And therefore all action which is based on knowledge must ever be limited. Right?

And our brains, our minds are the result of a million years of knowledge. Man from the beginning of time must have asked himself if there is something more than this everlasting grind of work, of thought, of suffering, of sexual desires satisfied and the agony of having more, and all the rest of it. He must have asked a million years ago if there is a reality, if there is truth, if there is something timeless, something that cannot be measured by man, however clever, however erudite, from the very beginning of time.

And that enquiry, that seed, is still with us. You are following all this. But in the enquiry, in the flowering of that seed of a million years of human longing, hoping, trying to find out, we are caught by illusions - the illusory nature of gods, the illusions that man has created, not only for himself, having created them for himself he imposes those illusions on others, which is the function of the guru. So that seed has never completely developed because we have been side tracked, we have been carried away by those who say, "I know. Do this, don't do that, follow this system, don't follow that system. I am a better guru than your guru. I know more, I am much more illumined than you". So we have been side-tracked through centuries by the priests, by believers in books, by those who say, "I know god". You know, all that. So that this seed that has been planted in man, in the brain, for millions and millions of years has never had the right soil, the right light, the right darkness. You follow? Nothing! So it is there still. I hope you are following all this.

And during these talks we are going to find out whether it is possible for that seed to grow and flower, multiply and cover the earth. That is the function, the necessity of every man because in this world there is such confusion, such violence, corruption, every form of degeneration, and if we do not find that seed and let it flower we are going to destroy ourselves.

So can we now think together, not about the original beauty of that seed or the flowering of that, but think together. That is, thinking is the capacity of the brain, the function of the brain, one of its major functions. And on thinking all civilizations are based. You can observe it. All the things that fill the earth and the air, all the things that are created by man, the churches, the mosques, the temples are the result of thinking; and the gods within them are the result of thinking. Thinking is the basis of our life, the basis of our action.

And thinking, if you have noticed very carefully, is always directional. Right? Please, we are doing it together, don't go to sleep. It is directional, which is either horizontal or vertical. Thinking, when you read a book, is linear, straight line, horizontal. So our thinking is always in a straight line, or moving forwards and backwards. You must see this, obviously. So thinking, which brings about all our action, all our perceptions, all our activity, is based on thought. And if you observe, thought is limited. It may be extended in any direction - horizontal, vertical - but it is still limited. One may be a great thinker, but the thinker, that great thinker is limited because knowledge, which is the result of experience, knowledge has come because one has had a million years of experiences, that knowledge is limited. There is no complete knowledge. Right? So thought is the result of that knowledge and experience, which is the memory, and so thought is everlastingly limited. Right? I hope we are together in this, please. Because we are going into something in which we must go together. We are working together. Not I am working and you are listening, which is generally what happens when you go to meetings. But we are working together, which is much more fun, much more alive. You are not just listening to a series of ideas, but together we are working to see how extraordinarily this thought has pervaded all our actions, all our life. And thought being limited our brains have become limited. You understand? Oh, for god's sake, come on sirs.

And when specialization takes place the brain becomes much smaller - smaller in the sense the other parts of the brain become rather dull. Have you ever talked to a specialist, whether he is a doctor, a scientist, an engineer, or a first-class master carpenter, or even to your gurus, how it is all so small. They may talk about the universe, god is love, and beauty, you know, all that kind of stuff, but it is all the movement of thought.

So thinking is corrupting our lives. Right? Because everything is based on thinking. Your meditation is the result of thinking. Your religion is the result of thinking. The sects, the gurus, all this is this immense movement of thought.

And thought has its right place, otherwise you couldn't come here and go back home, you couldn't go back on Monday morning to your work. So thought and knowledge are necessary to employ them skilfully. And on this thought mind has lived. Isn't it, have you noticed in yourself? One thought contradicting another thought, one thought trying to control another thought, one thought seeking something more and failing and then that thought says, I am frustrated. One thought says, I must become some marvellous human being, and another thought craving for money, position.

So thought is always dividing itself; one group against another group of thoughts. I don't know if you are aware of all this. And we give such tremendous importance to thoughts that have nobility. You understand? That act on principles, on ideals, on service. You know. So watch it.

So we are saying that as knowledge is limited and is always in the shadow of ignorance, because knowledge can never be complete, however distant in the future, and so all our life is limited. Just listen to that. Listen to it, not resist it, not agree or disagree, but just listen to that absolute fact that your meditation, the deliberate posture, the deliberate control, the deliberate breathing, the deliberate directive, will to achieve something, that's the thought. And so through that meditation you hope to discover something which is limitless.

So the mind, which is the senses, from the senses emotions, from the senses desire, from the senses the accumulation of experiences, knowledge, memory, thought. That's the whole content of our mind in which there is contradiction; saying one thing and doing another, wanting peace and doing everything to contradict that, wanting to be happy and destroying that by an action. Every desire opposing another desire. Haven't you known all this? So the mind - please listen to this - the mind has become so confused, so torn apart. And thought sees this and thought says, I must do something about it. Which is to control it, to go and join a guru, to become a Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, whatever it is. Are you following all this? When you are doing this the mind is becoming more and more confused, more and more uncertain, more and more destroying itself. Please realize this.

And from that deliberating process comes violence. Look what is happening in the world, you all know it. So can this course of the mind be totally altered? You understand the question? No, please just listen quietly. The mind, which is the brain, the senses and all that, has been moving through time for millennia, and getting more and more experience, more and more knowledge, and more and more the capacity to think, memory and so on. And its activity is always limited because it is of its own knowledge, it is breaking up. It is happening in this country, don't you know it? One group against another group. The group which is anti-Brahman, and the group which is Brahman, the Muslim. You follow, you know all this. And in this state the mind says, is there security? Because it cannot live, the brain cannot live without security. You understand all this? Like a child, if you observe a child, it needs security, it needs the security of the mother and the father. The baby has to be held, nourished, looked after, put on your lap and love it, protect it. Which very few mothers do anyhow. They treat the babies as their toys. That is irrelevant, that's a side issue.

So the mind, the brain has now reached a point where it is completely confused. Aren't you all confused, if you are honest to yourself, not knowing what to do, what is the right action? The right action which would be right under all circumstances; not the right action this moment and another action which is not right. An action which will be absolutely accurate under all circumstances, right. Right means precise, accurate, absolute. How can that right action come into being when the mind is so... you understand, sirs?

So we are saying can there be for the brain not security of knowledge, because in that knowledge there is no security. I don't know if you realize it, because it is in the field of ignorance. Therefore that knowledge brings about contradiction. You are following all this? Am I struggling by myself, or are you joining me? The brain needs absolute security for that seed to flower. You understand? The seed that man has sown throughout the ages to find something beyond all this confusion, misery, something that is incorruptible, something that is not measurable, something that may have tremendous ecstasy. But a mind which is so confused can never find it, can never allow that seed to flower.

So we are asking: what shall we do together? You understand, sir? What shall we, you and the speaker do together? Not the speaker for himself, but you and he together. That is, what is our relationship? You understand, sir?

It's half past six, have you had enough of it for an hour? I think you have, haven't you? If you have been working together for this whole hour, giving your attention to listening, to seeing, to learning, you must be... you follow? You must have gathered tremendous energy, and with that energy we are going to enquire. Not stimulated by the speaker, then it is like taking a drug, it will be a verbal drug. But if we have been moving together, like a river, which has tremendous volume of water behind it, then we can move together, bring about a mutation in the brain itself. Which we shall go into as we go along. That's enough.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC TALK 23RD DECEMBER 1979

My we continue with what we were talking about yesterday? We were saying how important it is to think together so that our minds meet, because the mind, as we pointed out yesterday, is the whole conglomeration of the past with all its innumerable, thousand experiences, sorrows, pleasures, and the agony of life that is fragmented and broken up. And to think together requires, if one is at all serious, that one should put aside, each one of us, our own particular point of view, our conclusions, theoretical acceptance of something which we fancy exists, to be free of beliefs and dogmas and all that, so that we can freely, happily, diligently meet each other. Because, as we pointed out yesterday also, it is easy to think about something - about that noise that is going on there. But to think not about something, but to have that capacity to think impersonally, objectively, not according to circumstances, so that our minds are capable of meeting each other freely, and in that freedom enquire into the whole problem of existence.

So if we could this evening meet as we did yesterday - I wonder if we can compete with that noise. It is good to have some humour, and not get irritated with it. Let's get on with it. We said our mind, not only the objective superficial mind which is consciousness, but also all the deeper layers of our mind of which we are very rarely acquainted, or familiar with all the activities that are going on below the ordinary daily activities of life, our mind and brain is the result of million years. It has evolved through time, through various civilizations. Our brains and our minds, and our senses, our emotions and all the responses that lie therein are the result of million years, evolved, grown, multiplied, but it is the mind of humanity, it is the mind of each one of us, it is the mind with which we live every day of our life.

As we said yesterday, and I hope you will allow me to repeat it - we are not here to exchange ideas, opinions or agree or disagree, but to see logically, reasonably, sanely, the fact - not the fact expressed by the speaker but the fact of what we are, which is the mind, with all its confusions, travail, sorrow, mischief, dishonesty, corruption, all that is the whole of our mind grown through time. This is a fact, if you observe very closely that your mind is the result of circumstances, of your culture - if you have a culture, apparently it does not exist - nurtured by the religion with all its superstitions, rituals, with the education that one has had, that is our mind. It is not your mind and my mind but the mind of man, mind of every human being, which is obvious.

And man, including the woman, throughout the ages from time nameless has always enquired deeply, if one studies history, if there is a reality, a truth that transcends all time, all circumstances, that is ageless and deathless - this has been his search, asking, groping, enquiring and in these enquiries he has created civilizations, new civilizations, as all civilizations when they are new must be born out of religion, not out of Marx or Mao or some clever philosopher, but out of religion. We explained that the meaning of the word - etymologically it means gathering together, not people gathering together as we are, but gathering together - I will explain presently - collect, be diligent, scrupulously attentive in this enquiry, not to find, not to achieve enlightenment, not to become something. The meaning now accepted etymologically is religion means gathering together all your energy, so that that energy given the right environment, right circumstances, right physical, mental, emotional balance, it can explode. That is the meaning of religion, not all that tommy rot that is going on, nonsense of saviours, gurus, the images put in the temples and so on. That is not religion. We like to think it is religion because it is pleasant to escape from our daily routine, grind, to escape into some emotional, imaginative, superstitious sensations. We are not attacking anything, neither your religion nor your gurus, nor the society that you belong to, nor your sect, nothing. As we said yesterday, we are not doing propaganda or trying to convince you of anything, and I really mean it. Nothing. But together observe the facts, if we can. To observe a fact means that one must be free to look, to look at your own gurus, your own wives, children, husbands, to look at the beauty of the earth, the skies, the marvels of the trees and the bird on the wind - to look at it. And to look at them one must be free.

So our mind are the result of thousand experiences and man, as we said, has been searching for this eternity - not immortality; immortality is merely the continuity of one's own ignorance. You accept all this? You won't. I will show you presently. And there is this deep-rooted, deep-laden seed which man has not cultivated, nourished, looked after, cared for, which is the beginning of that which he has sought. But we have cultivated every other faculty. If you observe in yourself, we have cultivated through time the idea of the individual, of the 'you' and the 'me', we and they. This has been handed down from generation after generation. Is that so? Is it a reality or a fiction or something thought has carefully cultivated? Please, as we said yesterday, please do not resist. I know you all believe in individuality, your fulfilment, your immortality, your birth after this and after that. You are rooted in this individual concept. Now we are asking if that is so. We have also cultivated various other things, and by questioning everything that we hold both consciously as well as unconsciously, in questioning objectively, sanely, rationally, and not wanting to change it, seeing things as they are, what actually is, and not moving away from that or escape from that, not wanting to go beyond it - that calls for scrupulous attention there comes intelligence. The etymological meaning of that word intelligence is to be able to understand, to be able to discern, to be able to see without direction, without pressure, what actually is going on, and in the pure perception of what is going on, there is insight into what is going on, that insight is the movement of intelligence - not cleverness, not erudition, not experience but the immediate perception of what is true. And the perception of what is true can only take place if there is no direction, no motivation, the pure unadulterated unpremeditated observation.

So that intelligence wipes away the centre from which we are acting, the 'me'. We are going to go into that. So, we have, as we said, cultivated throughout the centuries this idea of the self, the 'me' that must evolve through time, many births or saved by some saviour and live everlastingly in light. Now, we are questioning that. I mean questioning, enquiring whether it is true or it is an illusion created by our desire, created by thought, and we have accepted that image, that idea, that network from times past. You are following all this? I hope you are not going to sleep. I really mean this, it is very serious. You are not here to admire the speaker, you are not here to bask in some atmospheric spirituality. You are here to find out, not the speaker finds out and tells you, but you who are listening find out. So we must enquire into what it is, what has created it, the 'me', the self. You understand the word self? You, your anxieties, your problems, your sexual demands, your fears, your hopes, your depressions, moods, the sorrows, the pains, the jealousies, hatreds, the violence, the fear of fulfilment, and not being able to fulfil, the constant competition with each other. That word 'competition' means etymologically, to compute, which means to help to grow, to increase, not what we are doing now, fighting each other. Right? Please understand all this.

So we are enquiring diligently, with great deal of serious attention, whether the self, the 'me', which has been handed down through generation after generation from the ancient times, whether that 'me' is an actuality in the sense that it has its root in truth. One must distinguish between reality and truth. Reality is everything that thought has created. Please listen carefully. Are you following all this? Reality is everything that thought has created - the microphone, your beads which you are wearing, houses you live - all that is created by thought, obviously. But nature is not created by thought - the trees, mountains, waters, the birds. You can write poems about them. But thought has not created them. Thought has created the chair out of the wood of a tree, but the tree is not the product of thought. Please follow all this carefully otherwise you will miss the whole thing. So reality is that. Truth has nothing whatsoever to do with thought. The relationship between truth and reality is one way, reality cannot touch truth, but truth can employ, use thought.

So, we are enquiring whether the 'me' which has been created, to which mankind has clung, creating round it innumerable philosophies, whether that is rooted in truth or it is merely a reality, reality being created by thought. Right? Are you not created by thought, the 'me'? The 'me' is your name, your form, your ideas, your concepts, your prejudices, your desires, your fears, your longings, your aspirations, your sorrow, your degeneration, all that, this vast structure of the 'me' is put together by thought. Nobody can deny it. But thought has invented the super-self which is still thought.

So one has to be very alert in this enquiry that thought is the result or the response of memory, memory is the accumulated experience as knowledge, not only the experiences of your present day but also the experiences of your fathers, grandfathers, generations after generations past. That is the knowledge that one has, that is our brain, our whole structure is that. And this self created by thought, and thought itself being limited, as we explained, because knowledge is limited, there is no complete knowledge about anything, there can never be. That is obvious. And that knowledge whether in science, in our relationships with each other, is based on experience accumulated, which is stored up in our brain cells as memory. This is so, whether you accept it or not. It is so. You can discuss if you wish with professors, with brain specialists, but not with your philosophers, not with your gurus because they have already made up their mind. But if you really want to know, enquire, you can discuss with them. They will offer you their opinions, but to find this out for oneself, which transcends all information, all philosophies, all gurus.

So we are saying that thought has put together the whole structure of the 'me', the 'me' is the result of our senses, of our desires, of our reactions, and thought making an image out of these reactions as the 'me'. Right? You are following all this? Please observe it in yourself, not what I am saying, then it has no value, then you can be just another lecturer, agree or not. But if you yourself see this, which is, basically we are all the same including the philosophers, the gurus, the gods, and all that, we are essentially, basically the same, which is, we suffer, we are anxious, we have pain, we are terribly lonely people, from which we try to escape. Our relationship is based on this. You may love your wife, you may sleep with her, but relationship means - the meaning of that word, to relate, is to look back, refer to. Are you following all this, or am I going too quickly? Please tell me, am I going too quickly? It doesn't matter.

So, we have cultivated memory, which has developed extraordinary technology, terrifying, beneficial, but it is still based on thought, and thought being the response of knowledge, knowledge can never be whole, therefore, thought is partial. Please take this in. Partial, limited, and that which it has created will always be limited, will always be divisible, and thought has created the idea of the separate individual and therefore is always divisive. Look into yourself sir, don't look at my words, my face, or my gesture. Look into yourself and you will see the truth of it. Because each one is struggling, competing with another, wanting to fulfil, and this divisive activity which is self-centred is breaking up the world - divisive as a nationality, as a race, belonging to some guru, belonging to some god, belonging to some sect, wearing different robes, divisive. And the mind, thought is seeking the whole. And it will never be capable of it, because in itself it is divisive, because knowledge can never, never, never be complete, it always lives within the shadow of ignorance. Right? Have you understood this in the sense you have seen this in yourself as an absolute truth, fact?

Then the question arises: since it is so deeply rooted in all of us, free enterprise, individual enterprise, competition - as I explained the word means to grow, to help to grow, not to fight with each other, the competing countries. Sirs, you don't know what you are all doing. Can this self-centred structure be dissolved? Look: as we said yesterday, the mind, the brain is seeking security. You are seeking security in your relationship, in your jobs, security with your wife, husband. Security means that you are safe, certain in a state, not the state of a country, but state of mind, the brain must have complete security otherwise it cannot function. That is why it specializes. You are following all this? As an engineer, scientist, then it is completely safe - safe in having the capacity from that knowledge - and therefore competition arises, beating down each other politely, conveniently, comfortably or respectfully, or traditionally - and the gurus are doing it. One says I am better than the other, I am nearer, I have the way and the other fellow does not have. He is a cuckoo and you come to me. So, can this structure which dominates all our life till we die and after death there is the desire that says: will I live? And the philosophies that have been worked into it, beliefs, reincarnation, the whole of it is based on thought, and thought cannot dissolve it, because it is part of itself. I wonder if you see that. It is like a person who wants to meditate, but his meditation is the continuity of thought. There is no ending to thought. He attempts to end thought. Therefore he disciplines, again the activity of thought - to discipline, to control, to follow, to imitate, systems, practices, all that is the movement of thought.

Now the question is whether that self which is creating so much mischief in the world, because in itself it is divisive, the nationalities divisive, the groups, the sects, the races, everything in the world is now divisive, divided, broken up, and that is because of thought. Can that thought dissolve the structure which it has created as the 'me'? Go into it carefully sirs. It means if you understand, there is total, complete, psychological revolution. It is not just you are playing with words.

How do you approach this problem? You understand the problem? The problem is the self with its self-centred activity, which has created such divisions in the world, division in our intimate relationship - man and woman - division in ourselves, the constant contradiction in ourselves, the wanting, the not wanting, the whole travail, the structure, how is all that to be dissolved? That is the problem. You understand the question? Otherwise we can never be, to put it mildly, happy, you can never be whole, you can never be sane. A man who thinks he is separate from the others, he is not sane. Sanity means to observe clearly, to see what is going on, to see the facts, not to invent facts. Now how do you approach the problem? Because on your approach the problem is resolved. How you approach it - you understand my question? That is, if you approach with a motive, however noble, however pleasant or idealistic, that motive distorts the action with regard to this problem. So, has one a motive - motive means movement. So please enquire carefully what your approach is to the problem, to any problem, whether you approach with all the knowledge you have in the resolution of that problem, or you approach with a motive that I wish it will help me to get a better job or I will be free of sorrow, or I will reach nirvana, moksha, god or whatever it is. So, I have to find out accurately what your approach is, to any problem, and specially with regard to the psychological problems, the problems in oneself. So, what is your approach? Right? Not clear, sir? When you say clear, is it verbally or actually? That means you want to find out if there is an answer to this question, if there is a resolution to the question, which means you don't know the answer. If you know the answer, it is not a problem. If you have come to the answer through some divination, which is doubtful, or if you have studied some philosophies, upanishads or various books and come with that knowledge, you are approaching it with knowledge which you have acquired, which is past. Right? So your approach dictates the resolution of the problem. Please see the importance of this. This is the beginning of intelligence: to see not only verbally, logically, but to see the fact that psychological problems can only be solved in the manner how you approach it. If you approach it with any form of motive, try to escape from it, the problem will always remain. It is like having a cancer. If I had a cancer, I can't escape from it - the doctor tells me, 'On the table, old boy, otherwise you are going to die'. So I have to look at it very carefully. So I must approach this question. In the very approach is the beginning if intelligence, the intelligence that will give you insight into the whole phenomenon of the 'me'.

Do you understand this, or you are all being mesmerized? This is a very, very serious problem. It will change our whole relationship with each other, because now it is based on me and you as two separate individuals, with their images of each other, with their memories of each other, and so sustain the separation, though they come together, they are separate. You and your guru are separate. They may say, we are all one, I am up the ladder, you are down below. But actually as long as this individual activity goes on, there must be separateness and therefore there must be conflict, nationally, racially, collectively, economically, socially, in every way.

Now, is that intelligence, which is not cleverness, which is not logic but in the observation of these facts we have used logic, reason, sanity, but intelligence is not reason, is not cleverness, is not analysis, it is the quality of a mind that sees instantly the truth, the fact as it is. This intelligence is not of the book. It is not of experience. If there is this quality of intelligence, everything comes like water down the river.

So, your approach matters enormously, and it is only the sea of intelligence can wash away the 'me', nothing else - changing names, going to various disciplines, belonging to monasteries, nothing. Nothing will wipe away this structure which thought has created as the 'me', which is creating so much mischief in the world, because in itself it has no love. Thought is never love.

And so we are examining the nature of thought and its activity, not how to stop thought, but seeing the movement of thought, what it has done in the world outwardly, and also what it is doing inwardly, the two are not different. It is like the sea going out and coming in - ebb and flow, coming in and going out. But thought has separated it, the outer and the inner. The inner is the result of the outer. If you want to change society, which is corrupt, which is immoral, which is destructive, which is totally ugly as it is, one has to change the individual who has created this society - not the individual, but the human being who has created this society. But what are we doing, the politicians, the economists, communists, socialists, Maoists, all these people they want to change the structure of the society, to bring about a change in the structure they invent a new structure. But it is the same mind. Come on sirs, look at it. And we fall a prey to all that so thoughtlessly.

So, we have come to a point when we see together, not I see and you don't see and I have to explain it to you, together we see this thing, that is, we have together thought, we have exercised our brains neither accepting nor doubting, neither saying this is right or this is wrong - you cannot say this is right or wrong when you see something actually. It is so.

From that question arises another which is: what is human relationship? Because all society is based on human relationship. Because the human beings are immoral, our society is immoral. Human beings are corrupt beyond measure, we create a society that is utterly corruptible. So, we have come to a point when we ask, what is our relationship. Not yours and mine, we will come to that later, but your relationship with your wives, husbands, and children. As we explained, the word etymologically means to refer to, to look back. You understand what is the significance of that means? Our relationship with each other is based on memory, that is referring to something that has happened - sexually, something, either insult or flattery, something that has happened, stored up in the brain. You have your experience sexually in relationship with each other, and he is the same. You are following all this? So our relationships are based on remembrance. Just think of it sirs!

Which means what? Is love a remembrance? Do not accept or reject. Find out sir. Is love a remembrance? Is love the result of thought? When you say you love your wife - I wonder if you ever do, perhaps not in India but they do abroad - I don't know what that means and you don't know what it means either. So, we are asking - please, sirs, be serious, this is terribly important in life - life is relationship. Because all life being relationship, if it is based on memory, then it is only partial, your relationship based on knowledge which means sexual knowledge, the pleasurable knowledge, the irritations, the possessiveness, the jealousies, the hatreds, the anxiety between two people, the agony of not being loved and loved, all that, all that is based on memory. For god's sake, look at it. When we are asking, if that is a fact, which it is, then what is your relationship? Just words? A piece of paper says you are man and woman married either in a church or this or that? Sir, go into it, find out, don't sit there. If there is no relationship except on memory, see the tragedy of it, see the sadness of it, see the appalling condition which we have made ourselves into. Which means thought has brought about this relationship and therefore thought excludes every kind of affection and love. Therefore, there is this constant struggle between man and woman. Thought cannot bring about love. You cannot practise it, as you can practise politeness, even that is doubtful. Politeness requires care, concern for another. So, whole generation after generation of people without love, you understand sirs - so your children are not loved, your education has no meaning, everything is degenerating. After a million years we are like this.

When one observes this very closely, attentively, with care, there is not only the pure perception of these facts, but out of that perception comes this ocean of intelligence. Sir, intelligence and love go together: without love, you cannot have intelligence. And it is that intelligence that gives place to division, to quarrels, all the misery and confusion that we live in.

Now, you have listened for an hour. Where are you? I know you are sitting there. But where are we? Has your mind understood the nature of itself, conditioned by a million years, by experience, by knowledge, and that seed which man has carefully hidden, the seed of religiosity - not all the beads, that is not religion. But this tremendous demand on man from the timeless ages to find that which is eternal, nameless, that is inborn, everybody is asking, asking, asking and therefore they caught in the gurus and all that nonsense, join churches, and this and that. But they never develop this seed, this marvellous seed of religiosity, and that can only flower and cover the beautiful earth when there is this intelligence.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 29TH DECEMBER 1979

May we continue with what we were talking about last weekend? We were having a conversation between you and me, the speaker, about the nature of the mind and its extraordinary capacities. And we human beings through millennia after millennia have reduced this capacity to a very narrow limited field. This vast energy of the mind has created technologically astonishing things. They have been to the moon, under the sea, they have invented the most diabolical things. They have also brought about great benefits like surgery, medicine. And this vast energy, which we will go into very carefully a little later on, has been curtailed, limited, narrowed down into as our lives which are basically, if one observes it closely, a field of struggle, a field of conflict, an area in which human beings are against each other, destroying each other; they have not only destroyed human beings but also they are exploiting the earth, and the seas. The word exploit means to use another for one's own profit. This exploitation goes on in every field of life. The oppressor becomes the oppressed, as is happening in this country.

And one wonders why human beings live the way we are living - the battle, the conflict, the confusion, the utter misery, sorrow, pleasure, and joys that soon fade away and we are left empty handed, bitter, cynical, not believing in a thing, or we turn to tradition, which is perhaps the safe thing to do. And even that tradition is now losing its grip and if you observe very closely the mind is now living not only physically but much more psychologically on commentaries, books, scriptures, the Bible and the Koran. What happens to a mind that lives on books which we are all doing, not only in the schools, colleges and universities, but also religiously. I am using the word 'religious' in the ordinary sense of the word. And when one lives by the book, we live by words, by theories about what other people have said. And when one lives in that fashion, degeneration obviously must take place. Or you go back to the book as the Islamic world it doing, and use that as authority - brutal, dogmatic, cruel and destructive. And in this country too, the Indians, the Hindus, whatever your name be, you live by the book, what other people have said, which you have accepted, the commentaries and the commentaries on commentaries and so on and so on and so on. And when faced with crises, this civilization which has existed perhaps for 3000 years or more collapses, degeneration takes places, corruption at all levels of life - the industrialized gurus, the politicians, the businessmen, the religious people, the whole thing is collapsing.

One has asked various people what is the cause of this decay, this degeneration, they have really no answer. They give you examples of degeneration, but one never, as far as it has been possible to find out - one has discussed with various pundits, scholars, professors and all the rest of it - they do not seem to find the root of this decay. I do not know if you have thought about it. Probably you have not. If you have, if you have given serious thought to it, would it be true to say if one is really honest, that you have lived on other people's ideas, other people's doctrines, other people's beliefs, as now you are living with the western world's materialism - they are really not materialists any more than you are. Money-minded the world has become; you will do anything for money, which means power, position. And so the cause apparently, subject to correction and further investigation, is that when one lives a secondhand life, a life on words, ideas, beliefs, your mind naturally withers, the totality of the mind. You may be an excellent lawyer or a good carpenter - I doubt if any of you are carpenters here - but you are all very good lawyers, professors, businessmen and so on.

So, we are all together thinking over this problem, that is, a mind - we mean by that word all the active senses with their neurological reactions, the mind, all the emotions, all the desires, the various technological, professional knowledge and the cultivation of memory, which is the capacity to think clearly or confusedly - and this mind from the past millennia has been seeking that germ which man has planted from the beginning of time, which has never flowered, that germ, that seed of real religiosity. Because without religion there can be no new civilization, no new culture. There may be new systems, new philosophies, new social structure, but it will be the same pattern repeated over and over and over again, which is an exploiter becomes exploited, which is happening in this country.

So, why have human beings, with their extraordinary minds - I am using the word 'extraordinary' in its deliberate sense, not exaggerated at all - why human beings, with their extraordinary brain and mind, have become like this - living in a narrow groove, in narrow activities, self-centred impulses, actions, urges. Why? Please sirs, as we pointed out the other day, we are thinking together. This is not a speech or a lecture or a sermon but you are exercising your mind, your brain with the speaker to find out if it is possible to break through this, the narrow grooves in which we have settled, not only in our relationship with each other as man and woman, but also the society which we have created, the society which is so corrupt, which is so immoral, which is so destructive. You understand all this sirs?

So what shall we do? You, as a human being living on this marvellous beautiful earth with all the beautiful mountains and landscapes and the seas and the waters, lovely hills and mountains - which is not poetic, I am just pointing out. What can we do together to break through? That is, not to create new systems, new social systems, new social religious orders, new set of beliefs and ideals and dogmas, new rituals, because that game has been played over and over and over again. So to bring about a different world, if you are at all serious, the quality of goodness has to come into being. The word 'good' means to be whole, not broken up, not fragmented, but a human being that is good implies there is no sense of division. He is in himself complete, whole, without any sense of conflict. And this mind which has lived a millennia has not brought about a society which is good because we human beings are not good. Please bear in mind the meaning of that word. Not a good actor, good book, good meal, but that word implies to be whole - it originally comes from the word, good means god, not the invention the human minds have created about god, but that sense of wholeness. The word 'whole' means healthy, sane and holy. That is the meaning of that word. How can we transform this mind with its emotions, senses, and that external brain which has evolved through millennia, carrying thousands of experiences, knowledge, and every part of the brain is full of memories, not only the inherited memories, the genetic memories, but also the memories that are acquired recently, it is all there as knowledge. And as knowledge is always limited, there is no complete knowledge, it is always limited, therefore, thought will inevitably everlastingly do what you will, it will always be limited. There is no infinite thought, there is no complete thought. I don't know if you have observed it in yourself, but thought has become most important in our lives. All our meditations are based on thought and desire. All our activities are based on thought. All our sexual relationship is based on thought - the past memories, the past pleasures, the pictures that you have created, the remembrance of all this is the operation of thought. The gods, the scriptures, the Bible, Koran, everything on earth that man has created is brought about by thought - going to the moon has to be thought out precisely, every part of that machinery has to be perfect, I believe 3000 people were employed in it. Everybody thinking accurately to produce the rocket - to produce a submarine, to produce a gun and to create war. So, thought being limited and our actions being limited, and out of this limitation comes all our anxiety, all our fears, all our conflicts and sorrows.

And thought in its movement is using extraordinary amount of energy: to build a house, to have a beautiful garden you must expend a great deal of energy. The way you go to the office every day from nine to five, whatever time you spend there, the boredom, the routine, the ugliness of all that, the extraordinary amount of energy used. And thought cannot be altered. It is there. Please follow this. We are talking over together. I am not talking to myself. We are sharing, partaking the thing together which is our present crisis - not economic, social merely, but the crisis in our consciousness, in our very being and we do not seem to pay very much attention to it, we just want to live for a day or a year of 50 years and then die. There is a crisis in our consciousness, not the crisis of the exploiter being exploited, not the crisis of a new system, not the crisis of war and so on. It is a crisis in the very being of human beings. You may not be aware of it, but if you are, you must be if you are at all serious, concerned and sufficiently informed, sufficiently educated, somewhat intelligent.

And how can this, in what manner can this consciousness be transformed? You understand? Our consciousness, you are the result - the consciousness is the result of all the things that have happened to you as a human being, not as an individual, as a human being, whether he lives in America or Russia or whatever it is. His content of his mind, his action, his consciousness, beliefs, pleasure, dogmas, superstitions, illusions, believing in god or not believing in god, authority, obedience and the submission to established authority, and the everlasting search to escape from all this. So the escape is god, the book, the cinema, the meditation, the guru, the temple, football, and cricket in this country. You are doing all this. We have established a very good network of escapes, but we have not solved the problem.

So, together please, if you will this evening and the last two evenings that we met here, last Saturday and Sunday, and tomorrow and another weekend, let us think of this thing together, that is, put our hearts and minds into this to find out.

First of all, mind, the brain needs security, like a child clings to the mother, is seeking security to be safe, and the brain can only function excellently, efficiently, precisely, when it is completely safe. Our education helps to find the safety, this protection in careers, in jobs, in specialized human beings. Please follow all this, you are in it. A doctor, a surgeon, if he is honest, good, he is safe there. His brain has been educated for 10 years to be an excellent doctor, and in that the brain has found complete safety. And an engineer, a scientist. So careers, jobs, systems, are offering security, like a nation is offering security, a family, a unit is offering security to the brain. And that brain is not yours or mine, it is brain of human beings, which has evolved through millennia. And in this security, if you have observed, there is total insecurity. You will find security in a nation, as an Indian, whatever that word may mean, which is another invention of thought, with its flag and all the nonsense that goes on with it. One has found security in that, which means isolation. Please follow all this. Isolation. Another nation does exactly the same thing. So you two are at war perpetually, economically, socially, morally and religiously. But the brain needs an enormous sense of protection, safety, security, and where does one find it? Not in the family. You know what a family is, the perpetual quarrel, perpetual fighting each other, anger. There is no security in the family. There is no security in the nation. There is no security in careers, because there are thousand people after that career. There is no security in your temples, in your gods, in your beliefs, in your dogmas, in the books. Books are words. And your brain is now living on words, finding safety there, in words. I wonder if you realize all this. So where is there security which the brain must have? There is no security in tradition - you know, going back - tradire, which means to hand it down. There is no security in that. There is no security in your wife, or in your husband. You may like it, you may want to hold on, be attached, but in that there is no security either. So, one asks, you are asking, I am not asking, is there is any security at all - you understand? - for the brain to feel safe, protected, to have a sense of complete certainty.

There is security, complete, whole security. We will go into it in just a minute. We have sought security in discipline. Go into it carefully please. We have sought security in discipline. The ordinary translation of that word, which is commonly used, is submission to established authority. The soldier obeys. In that obedience there is safety involved. In the school, the discipline is to conform to the pattern. University. So, the brain is trained. Please watch your own brains for god's sake - your brains are being trained through ages to conform to established authority. Either that authority is tradition, authority of a superior who has more knowledge, the authority of power, the authority of one who says, I know, you don't know, the authority of an ideal, the authority of the priest, the authority of Christ, Krishna, Buddha, all that. So, our brain - please watch your brains - is trained, subjected, submits to established outside order or inside order, inside discipline, essentially to obey. The word 'discipline' means to learn, it comes from the word 'disciple'. Disciple is one who is willing to learn, not submit himself to some authority, but having the urge, the intent, the beauty to learn. And so what we have done it to make that word which is to learn, to conform, to obey, because there there is safety, not in learning, not in the capacity to learn, but in the capacity to obey, the capacity to conform, to imitate.

So our brains have been trained through education to conform to Marx to Engels, conform, and in that conformity there is the safety and so there is conflict. There is rebellion, revolt against authority, and that very revolt creates its own authority, and so the mind moves from one authority to another, one knowledge to another. And we think discipline in the ordinary sense of the word we are using, we think that discipline will bring order. You are all waiting to have order in this country, to have a good dictator. Right? Because there is such disorder. So you are all saying we must have discipline. Aren't you saying all that? And the politicians are shouting it.

So, let us enquire into what is order. Please listen carefully. Forgive me if I sound rather emphatic. If you have observed, we said the brain has extraordinary energy, incalculable energy, and that energy now is being used in a very narrow, limited way - obedience, fear, pleasure, the sense of individual importance, and caught in extraordinary conflicts between each other, and the eventual thing called sorrow and finally death, the ending. Now, we have examined carefully the quality of a mind that is whole, that is good, which means holy - h-o-l-y, not the holiness of priests or temples, there is no holiness in it. So, we are saying this energy is being misused and that is why there is such tremendous crisis in our lives. We are coming to a great crisis or we are in it, which is our consciousness. The content of our consciousness is our consciousness, the content being fear, anxiety, action, exploitation, grief, misery, confusion, pride, envy, all that is our consciousness. And we are asking, can that consciousness be transformed totally, something totally beyond. And we are saying it can. That is, it can be transformed, and there is a different kind of security, not the security which thought has created, which is not security. And if in listening to what is being said, and you follow it carefully, you are awakening that intelligence, in that intelligence there is complete security. We are using the word 'intelligence' in a different sense. The word 'intelligence' means ordinarily the capacity to understand, to discern, to subtly read between the lines - inter legere, which means to read between the lines, from Latin, Greek and so on, I won't go into the etymological meaning. So, we are using the word 'intelligence' in its purest sense, not the intelligence of a clever man, argumentative, opinionated, wanting to discuss, trying to find out through opinions what is truth, and all that, that is not intelligence. That is mere cleverness, which is the operation of thought. We are saying intelligence is not the product of thought.

Intelligence - please I am going into it now, please listen - intelligence is the observation of these facts, the facts that discipline has been made to submit, submit to authority. If you see the falseness of that, if you see what is the implication in that word discipline, which is to conform to authority, submitting everything to accept that, if you understand that, which is, if you understand the truth of that, that is, to learn, if you see the truth of that, you are awakening intelligence, so you no longer submit to external or inward authority. I am not saying you shouldn't pay tax, don't jump into that. Or the policeman, you cannot drive on the wrong side of the road. So if you observe how discipline has become, the ordinary word - discipline is a means of security, and you see in that discipline conformity creates conflict, and if you see that, observe it closely, and that very observation is the awakening of intelligence, which is to learn. Learning is a movement, not a static state.

So we are going to examine what is the order. To find out the order that has been created by man through thought, with the desire to be secure, and is there security in that order? If there is not, then the discovery of that which is disorder is the awakening of intelligence. So when there is this intelligence, in that there is complete and total security. That is the function of all of us here, to think this out together, what is order. I hope you are all working as hard as I am working. I don't know why I work so hard for you all. I know you will go back home and do exactly the same thing as you did before, which means that you don't take anything seriously, as long as you have your little jobs, little house, wife and a few children, and god knows what else, it doesn't matter what happens, just little corner of the vast field of humanity.

So, we are now enquiring into what is order, which one must have. All religions throughout the world have laid down certain rules: if you want to achieve god, you must be a celibate, you must be poor, you must have the capacity to obey. Haven't you noticed all this? And the church, Roman Catholic and other churches say, this is the law, and as long as you obey you are going to realize that extraordinary thing called god - it there is such a thing. That is order. Joining an organization, spiritual or worldly, joining it you feel safe, and the organization says, you must do this and you must not do that. And you are trained to obey, and this obedience is called order. If you go to the office - I do not know why you go to the office. No sir, don't laugh. Just think of it, going every day of your life for the next 50, 60 years - see the tragedy of it all. And you say, if I don't go, how shall I support my family, educate my children, I must have money, so I must be stupid. We don't want to find a new way of living. We have created this society, we human beings, and we won't change it. Too bad!

So organizations, societies, ashrams, gurus offer a peculiar kind of order, and most people, intelligent people, are rebelling against it, throwing out all that kind of order, and in their rebellion they are creating an order which is also disorder. You see it sir, drugs, drink, sex, all that in a permissive world.

So what is order, order in which there is no conformity? No - I am using the word carefully, please attend - I am using the word, no discipline, discipline in the sense submitting to authority, but discipline in the real meaning of that word, to learn. When the mind is learning, it is creating its own discipline, not discipline of conformity, the discipline that comes through attention. Sir, when you are learning, as you are doing now, I hope you are, when you are learning, as we are, your mind is soaking in, if you are alive, if you are sensitive, if you are really hearing what is being said, it is absorbing without any compulsion, without any reward, without any punishment, because we have gathered here to be serious, and your seriousness is awake, wants to find out. So, there is order where there is intelligence. The word 'intelligence' which the speaker has explained. There is no order if there is mere compulsion, obedience, conformity - you are following all this - joining organizations, spiritual this and that, ashram, dictatorships of the gurus, in that there is no order. And because human beings have done this for millennia, somebody will tell us what to do. I don't know but tell me please - that is the cry. And that very thing has created disorder.

So, one finds the fact of disorder which is our life, in understanding that disorder in our life objectively, that is not trying to change the disorder to your own particular comfort, your this or that. To observe, to see disorder in our life - disorder being contradiction, say one thing and do another, the cultivation of hypocrisy, which we have indulged in, the contradictory desires, contradictory ideals, this desire for power, position, all that is creating in our daily life disorder. If you see that clearly as a fact, then that clear observation brings about intelligence. And that intelligence wherever it is, is creating order. You are following all this? For god's sake follow it. It is your life sir.

So the mind, the brain has always sought in this confusion, the confusion created by itself, nobody has created it, you and we all have contributed to this order, and if we see this in our life, daily life, the conflicts, the antagonisms, the pride, the arrogance, the vanity, if you see that very clearly, and out of that clarity of perception comes order. That order is a living thing. It is not a blueprint; shall I do or shall I not do this, what shall I do tomorrow. It is not a blueprint, because intelligence is like a tremendous river.

So the awakening of intelligence is the beginning of the total, happy security of human beings. Nowhere else will you have security except in that. And the moment there is that security, which means all the energy which has been expended in these conflicts, in these ideas where you thought, believed you could find security, which was all wastage of energy, is now centred in intelligence. That is, in our relationship with each other, in our daily, everyday relationship with each other - the man and woman - in that relationship there is enormous wastage of energy in conflict, each one asserting his own importance, each one acting in his own self-centred way, dominated by desire, and so there is no love, no generosity, no real consideration for each other. So, relationship has become a hideous thing from which everybody wants to run away, either through divorce or trying to find another man or woman, but the same pattern is repeated. There is a man we know who has married eight times, because he wants a relationship where he can feel safe, happy, and he has not found it. And you won't either. Because relationship means - the word means, it comes from the word to relate, to look back, to refer to, to look back in memory - she is my wife, my husband, she has hurt me - all that is looking back, memory and our relationship is based on memory. Right? That is obvious, isn't it? So, in that relationship, there is no love, no happiness, nothing but this disastrous division. You hear this very clearly, you will go on doing the same thing tomorrow or tonight. So, what will make you change? A crisis? Knock on the head? Sorrow? Tears? All that has happened, crisis after crisis, we have shed tears endlessly and nothing seems to change man because you are relying on somebody else to do the job: your masters, your gurus, your books, your professors, your clever cunning people who have new theories, all that. Nobody says, I am going to find out. Because the whole history of mankind is in you, and we never read our book. It is all there, but we never take the trouble, the patience and the persistent enquiry, and we prefer to live in this chaos, in this misery.

So, what will make you change? Sir, please ask yourself, burn with that question. Because we have fallen into the habit of meditation and we won't break that habit, because we always think we are going to get something. Sir, conscious meditation is no meditation. You understand what I am saying? To deliberately sit down, repeat mantras, is nothing, that is not meditation. That is a cheap escape. So, what will make you change? Your house is burning, and apparently you do not pay attention. So, if you don't change, society remains as it is, and clever people are coming along saying society must change, which means new structure and through that structure hope to change man. And then say, yes, we are doing both: change man and the new structure, the structure then becomes more important than man, as all revolutions have pointed out.

So, after listening for an hour and five minutes or ten, is there a learning, is there an awakening of intelligence, is there a sense of order in our lives, or we are going back to the same routine? So, sirs and ladies, if you have that intelligence, that goodness, that sense of great love, then you will create a marvellous new society where we can all live happily. It's our earth, not Indian earth, or the English earth, or the Russian earth, it's our earth where we can live happily, intelligently, not at each other's throat. So, please give your heart and mind to find out why you don't change. Even little things. They say don't smoke. You get up immediately to smoke. Sirs, please pay attention to your own life. You have got extraordinary capacities. Sir, it is all waiting for you to open the door.

MADRAS 4TH PUBLIC TALK 30TH DECEMBER 1979

I wonder why you are all here. It would be rather good if we could go into that question, why you have all gathered here. To listen to this speaker, or just to be amused, intellectually activated, or seeking a new excitement, a new experience, or perhaps out of sheer curiosity to find out what the speaker has to say? Perhaps it is all of those. Also, some might be very serious and wanting to find out.

If we may, we will go on with what we were talking about yesterday. First of all, I think we should be very clear that we are not doing any propaganda, nor propagating any ideas or doing a campaign like those fellows across the way; nor are we trying to convince you of anything, and I really mean it; nor persuading you to act in any particular direction, or to think in a certain way, to a certain end. I think that should be very clear. But we are trying or hoping that we can be concerned together to enquire into the whole nature and the structure of the mind, because from that all action, all desires, all beliefs and actions, various types of action take place. Unless we understand this very complex nature of the mind and the brain, we shall not be able to find out for ourselves what is right action under all circumstances. So I hope we are together, you and the speaker, concerned, at least for this evening committed to the enquiry, to the investigation of our own minds - our minds being the result of many, many, many years, millions of years, with all its vast experience, knowledge accumulated through thousands of years and also acquired recently, inherited both genetically and being under great pressure of evolution. I hope we can go into all this together.

One wonders what length of period this evening one can maintain a certain attention - to attend continuously, sustain for this whole hour. Which means one must have the urge to listen attentively, carefully, precisely and use the speaker as a mirror in which you are seeing yourself. And when you see yourself exactly as you are, then you can break the mirror, then the mirror is not useful at all. Though the speaker is sitting on a platform, he has no authority. The platform is only for convenience. So, bearing all this in mind, we are together concerned to see exactly what we are.

If you have observed, our minds are always occupied. There is never a moment when it is quiet naturally, easily, without this tremendous exertion, conflict. Our minds are chattering, thought moving from one association to another, from one desire to another, from one longing to another, this contradiction of opposing energies. So our minds and our brains are never, never quiet. They are occupied. If you are an engineer or a surgeon or a lawyer, your mind is occupied with all those skills. You may have a few moments of leisure when you might read other things or go to your club or join some game and so on, but this constant movement, endless apparently, and so the mind is never free. It is possessed by ideas, by knowledge, by all the experiences that one has had, by the pursuit of pleasure, fear, great deal of tears, sorrow and so on. So, this mind being so occupied, both consciously as well as unconsciously, is never free. The word 'freedom', etymologically, has a very complex meaning: it means also love. And when one goes into this question of what is freedom, whether the mind is made up of words, symbols, images, ideas, filling every corner of the brain, memory, if you can observe it yourself you will find out. And also the brain specialists are saying the same thing too.

So the mind, the brain, which has evolved through time has come to a point, it has discovered for itself that there is not one corner where it is free. Only its freedom is from moving from one corner to another corner of the same ground, and imagining, thinking or desiring that it is free because it has moved from this to that. Or, that it is free in its choice, to discriminate between this and that - the choice of will, freedom of will. This has been our movement, going from one group to another, joining this sect or that sect, moving from one authority to another authority, in pain, anxiety, grief, sorrow, jealousy, anxious, that is the occupation of our minds. So, is there freedom at all? You understand my question? Please enquire with me. We are taking a journey together. I am not taking a journey by myself. We are walking together as two friends talking over things amicably, charitably, with certain sense of care and affection, not trying to browbeat each other through argument, through superior knowledge or having a great deal of experience - like two friends who are really friends, moving together with a sense of great affection, understanding each other, moving beyond the words, not just sticking to words, finding out what lies behind the words. So, if we can do that this evening, it will be marvellous. Then we can really communicate with each other not only verbally but much beyond the word, which is to have communion, where both minds meet, not only the minds, the hands, hearts, the whole of their being meet each other. With that care and attention, if we could walk beginning from very near which is where we are, because that is the only place where you can begin - very near - and then you can walk very far together because we are never alone. All our life is relationship, whether we like it or not. And if you, as an audience, kind of expect, spoofed, or you are going to receive something extraordinary, or ideas or conclusions or beliefs, then we are not walking together, and we are not sharing together the same sky, the beauty of the land, the lovely tree in a field.

So, if we could this evening unsentimentally, not being romantic, but exercising our brains and our minds and our hearts, to find out whether the mind being enslaved as we are, whether there is freedom at all for human beings, not in heaven, certainly not in hell, because without freedom there is no love, without freedom there is no order, without freedom there can be no relationship between each other. You may be married, you may sleep together, you may share the same house, have the same children, but if in that relationship there is no absolute freedom there cannot possibly be love.

So, please together we are going to find out whether this mind so crowded, this brain, every part of it storing up memories of a million years, that is the mind, the brain that lives in the known. You are following all this? Please, we are sharing this. Every part of the brain, because of its long journey of thousands and thousands of years, every part of it, every cell in it, is carrying memory; memory is the result of knowledge and experience, from which thought arises. That is the origin of thought. And within that area, ground, field of that mind there can never be freedom. You may choose, you may think you are free to choose, you may think the exercise of freewill is freedom, or you may determine that you are free, that is, by being permissive sexually, morally, socially, rejecting the established order, you think you are terribly free. I don't know if you have seen a cartoon in the 'New Yorker'. Perhaps you don't know that magazine which is published in New York. A boy and a girl are looking out the window, looking down from 10th floor, and the boy says to the girl, 'See those people down there, beards, uncombed hair, sloppy dress, those are the new establishment'.

So, is there freedom beyond? Please, this is an enquiry. This is not a statement, that there is or there is not. But one has to see very clearly within the area of the brain, within the area of the mind - mind being the senses with their neurological responses, the emotions, the various forms of sentiments, all that is the mind, mind is not separate from the brain, brain is part of the mind - so, within the mind, within this whole area, can there ever be freedom? If not, man is everlastingly slave to the known. Please understand this. There have been scientists and professors, and those people say man can ascend only through knowledge, that is, gathering more and more and more knowledge. Knowledge is always within the time limit of the past. So, one has to question whether knowledge which is the movement of the past through the present, modifying itself and proceeding, which is the future. Right? You are following all this?

This is a lovely country, no respect for anybody. As long as you do what you want to do - it is great self-concern, this immense selfishness, not be concerned with anybody. And that you call civilization. And out of that you hope to create a new culture.

So, we are asking whether there is freedom at all within the area of knowledge which is the brain, the mind, because if there is no freedom there, there cannot possibly be love. It is only a man which is completely, absolutely free from the past that can fully comprehend or be in that state of mind where there is love, compassion, intelligence. So it is very important for all of us to find out, not just the speaker alone to find out. As there is no freedom within the movement of the mind including thought, there is no freedom, so no love. And hence is it possible to go beyond the process of time? Time is movement from here to there, both physically, and a movement psychologically from 'what is', to 'what should be', or 'what might be'. This constant movement of thought pursuing the ideal, like a man who is ambitious he needs time to achieve his end, and with that same mentality, that is, one needs time to achieve a certain result, to achieve a certain skill, for a seed to become a plant. That is there is the process of evolution, that is the movement of time which is called evolution. Man has been for a million years, has acquired through thousands and thousands of years of experience, knowledge, and in that process of evolution he has come into this state of mind. All that needs time. And we think time can bring about freedom; freedom from jealousy, freedom from anxiety, freedom from fear, but not freedom from pleasure. So we exploit time as the means psychologically to achieve a result. Right? That is, I am jealous, greedy, psychologically, full of discontent, full of being hurt, and to get over all that I need time. You understand? That is, I will examine it, I will go into the cause of it, I will analyze it, introspect, examine, and at the end of it, perhaps I will be out of it. All that means time. That is the tradition of the mind, the tradition handed down from generation after generation through thousands of years, that time is a means of changing, is a means of conquering, is a means of achievement, both physically and psychologically. So the mind, the brain is conditioned to time. Examine it. The speaker is not telling you what to think. That would be catastrophic. But we are examining together, being concerned actively into the nature of the mind, which is our mind. Our mind is the mind of man, of human beings - it is not your mind or my mind, it is the mind because your mind is the result of many thousand years, the instincts, the subtle intimations are the result of years. So, you are not an individual. You are the rest of mankind. So we are not in this exploration becoming more and more selfish, more and more self-centred; on the contrary. It is the self-centred activity that is destroying the world.

So the mind which is the rest of humanity has never been able to go beyond the limits of time. Without this conditioning of time, without this sense of moving from here to there, both physically as well as inwardly, that is the result of outward evolution. Right? From a little plant which becomes a tree in a hundred years, like a banyan tree, that same sequential concept is carried over psychologically and so we say, time is necessary. Right? That is our conditioning, that is our tradition. You will eventually achieve nirvana, heaven, illumination, god, or whatever you like, if you do this, this. All that admits this destructive, corruptive nature of time. Right? Are we meeting each other? And, the question arises: is it possible not to be caught in this time? I don't know if you are interested in all this, because it is your life, not my life, and we are going into this, whether it is possible to act not in the tradition of time.

The immediate is far more important than the future: the immediate. I will show you something, which is, we are full of problems, unresolved, one problem after another, both in our relationships, personal, intimate, there are problems, business problems, scientific problems, mathematical problems. Mathematical problems, scientific problems have their own field. But we are talking about human problems. And these problems, when carried over day after day, day after day, corrupt the mind. In the sense 'corrupt the mind', we mean by that, make the mind insensitive. It is not quick, not active, rapidly responding, because if that mind carrying this heavy burden of problems - you understand what happens to a mind. So you are carrying these problems, and you say time will resolve these problems. If you analyze a problem, find the cause of the problem, go into it, and mind being caught in this tradition of time becomes lazy, insensitive, it says, well it will be solved tomorrow. So the tomorrow is the movement of time, of postponement, and in that there is no immediacy, there is nothing immediate. Now, any problem - anger, violence: this question of violence, to meet violence immediately in oneself, and not to have this idea of non-violence, which is again the tradition of time - eventually we will become non-violent, like the United Nations, all the nations together will eventually achieve brotherhood, which is tommy rot.

So, the mind has become accustomed, trained, conditioned to time. There is never any question of immediate action. And we are saying the immediate dissolves time. I will show it to you. Not dissolves time, breaks the tradition of time. If you are violent and you have to deal with it immediately, because there is no non-violence. That is a non-fact. Violence is a fact. That is what is actually going on - your anger, your jealousy, your hatreds, your competition, every sense of that self-assertive aggressive movement, that is violence, in different forms. And the mind being accustomed to time has invented non-violence, thought has invented non-violence which is non-fact, and therefore, you say, I will gradually becomes non-violent. But in the meantime you are violent. You are playing a game with yourself. Whereas violence is anger, hatred, forms of competition, and competition is destroying the world, both individual, collective, all that. It is destroying - competition. So, that is a fact and you have to deal with violence instantly, not allowing time to say, I will get over it. You have to deal with that fact immediately. See what happens to the mind which is faced with the immediacy of action. Are you doing it with me? Or are you going to sleep? Come on sirs.

You have your problems haven't you? Unfortunately. Problems of meditation, problems of love, problems of loneliness, problems of competition, problems of your wife and husband, problems of death, and old age, every kind of problem. Now if you take one of those problems, whatever your problem is, not think of the resolution of the problem, which again the time element enters, but deal with it instantly, immediately, which means the moment when you set aside time as a means of achievement psychologically, when that is clearly understood that this time element carried over from the physiological to the psychological has made the mind insensitive, actually inactive, so when you have to deal with a problem instantly, immediately, you have denied time. Do you understand what I am saying? Are you following this? No, you don't. Where are your minds, for god's sake?

I will go into it. The speaker will go into this problem, but please join me, don't wait for me to explain. Let us move together. One of our great problems is desire. The word 'desire' means the want of, the lack of, longing for something, not having, longing, because that directs most of our lives, desire. Religious people, the organized religions and the so-called religious people have said throughout the ages, desire must be stamped out. Right? You know the game, don't you? It must be killed, because if you want to serve god, you must give all your energy, both sexual desires, any form of longing, because you have not and you want, and most of us are driven by desire. Isn't that so? Desire to be wealthy, desire to be famous, desire to have a better life, desire to marry a better man or woman, desire for happiness, desire for enlightenment, you know, desire is eating most of us. And we have never, never solved the problem. The sannyasis, they put on the robes, but they are burning with desires. Like us, only he puts on a different robe. He is just like us behind that robe. Like the priests, they adorn themselves with all the extravagant robes, they are just like the rest of humanity - ambitious, greedy, wanting position, to become bishops, archbishops, the hierarchical structure.

So desire is one of our greatest problems which is bringing in our lives great conflict - one desire opposing another desire, the desire of one object, changing constantly that object. So, one has to understand the nature of desire, not suppress it, not control it, not run away from it. One has to understand, which is our problem now. Our problem, we are facing it. I hope you are facing it. It's our problem. And what is desire. What is the nature of desire? How desire comes into being. What to do with desire. That's our problem. And it must be dealt with immediately, not say, I will get over desire, I will suppress desire, I will control the desire or I will let desire run its course. You understand all this?

So we are first enquiring. When we use words like, enquiry, it means time. The very word enquire implies time. But we are not doing it in the sense we are using the word 'observe' rather than 'enquiry'. You understand what I mean? We are observing and observation is always immediate, you can't say, I will observe. It is now.

Desire causes innumerable problems, contradictory problems - conflict, misery, you know, all the gamut of desire. So, we are looking, observing, what is desire, how it arises. And what is the movement of desire. You are following all this? Please come with me. We are observing, not analyzing, not seeking the cause, we are just observing the movement of desire, not the object of desire, whether it is noble, ignoble, beautiful, ugly, none of that, but purely observing the movement of desire, and the observation of that is immediate. It is clear? Are you coming with me? Like two people watching the bird, they are both interested in what the bird is, their senses, their eyes are actively watching. So, what is desire? Desire comes through observation; seeing, then contact, touch, then sensation. Now follow it, stop there for a moment, I must go into it carefully, otherwise, we will miss the point here. First the seeing, a woman or a man, seeing the flower, smelling it, then wanting it, all that. That is, seeing, contact, sensation. That what happens? Go slowly, observe, precisely, carefully. Then what happens? You see a car, the sensation, the contact and then what happens? Then thought comes in and says, how nice to be in it, driving it, seeing the power of it. You follow? That is, seeing, contact, sensation, thought creating the image, and the moment thought has created the image, desire comes into being. You are following this, right? Is this clear? No, not verbally. You see a man or a woman, you know all the reactions. So, seeing, contact, sensation. Then thought creates the image, a symbol, whatever it is. Then from that image, which thought has created bursts desire. Please look at it for yourselves. You can see it very clearly, only the movement is so rapid. It is accelerated by the thought instantly responding. Now we are saying, watch it very carefully, and you will see the movement, how it begins.

So, desire comes through the movement of thought creating the image, and thought pursuing the image which becomes desire. So, the question is, if you have gone into it very carefully, why does thought create the image? Do you understand my question? Can thought not create the image? Because again it is the tradition of time - thought, thought is time. Right? Or have I to explain that? Oh, my lord! Thought is the movement from the past, knowledge, memory which means thought is time. So thought which has been conditioned to create images instantly flows into sensation, and from that begins desire. You have got it? No? In your heart, observe it, observe it very closely.

Now the question is can you look, contact, sensation, end there? You are following this? Not allow thought - no, can thought see itself, what it is doing? You have got it? No? Your minds are so slow because you have never exercised your eyes, your ears, you are not quick. You are too educated, that is what is wrong. You are all lawyers, engineers, scientists, businessmen, worried about your wife, and children and so your minds have become dull. For god's sake see this. And when something new is put in front of you, you don't quickly grasp it.

So, I am saying sirs, I am not being impatient, I am just stating what is happening to your minds. I am just pointing out, we are observing together, together. You are as active in your observation as the speaker. He says, look how desire arises. Now, the immediacy and the urgency to see that thought does not come into it, because the moment thought enters into the creation of desire we are lost. Then the contradictions, the conflicts, the urges, the competition, the desire. So, we are not suppressing desire. We are not cutting out desire. We are not saying it's right or wrong. We are awake to the whole movement of desire, attentive to desire. You understand what I am saying? Attentive. Therefore when you attend instantly a different activity comes into being. Right sir, are you doing it?

Now, look at the other aspect of desire, which is will. Will is energy directed in a particular direction. Right? Will which is the exertion of energy and that energy is the movement of desire: I want to be better, a collector or an engineer or a lawyer. I exercise tremendous will to become that because thought, follow it carefully, thought has seen, one has observed the people who have great will achieve - more money, car, better houses, this enormous energy driven in a certain direction, with its consequent results of conflicts, competition, ruthlessness, brutality, violence - all that is involved.

So, will in which there is choice, is the movement of seeing, contact, sensation, thought taking over that sensation through an image, and the movement of desire and the operation of will. You can see how this comes into being. So, the question then is not whether desire can be stopped - see how our minds have changed. Right sir? You follow? Are you coming with me? Our minds have undergone change the moment I have realized the nature of desire. It has moved out of the tradition that desire must be suppressed, controlled, whatever it is, transformed, and so on. We are treating desire as an energy. Right sir, you follow this?

Now as long as energy creates conflict in any direction, that energy is wasted. Energy is wasted in conflict, struggle, competition, drive, wanting to be superior, and all the rest of it. So, desire is energy, desire which is the result of thought creating the image and pursuing that image. So, one realizes if you are observing very closely as we are now, the nature of energy which has been caught up in desire and directed in a particular direction which creates conflict, and the seeing of that total process instantly is the awakening of intelligence. You are following this? The awakening of intelligence, which is going to direct that energy. You have followed all this? No, you haven't. You are all asleep. I can't repeat it.

You see sirs, ladies, to live a life without a single control, think it out - which does not mean doing what you like, a permissiveness, but to understand the nature of control instantly. Not say, well, why shouldn't I have control? If I don't I will be sexual, I will be angry. To understand why thought has brought about control and whether it is possible to live a life without a single control. Think about it. See the beauty of it. Because when you control, one thought is controlling another thought, that is all. Right? Thought which is the response of memory, knowledge, time, and that thought has broken up into itself, and one thought tries to control another, but it is still the movement of thought. So, is it possible to observe instantly and act instantly, which needs no control? You understand?

Sir, we began by talking about freedom. A mind that lives in control, lives in conflict, lives in constant desire, wanting, wanting, wanting, is never free, and therefore can never possibly love; and without that extraordinary thing called love, do what you will, you will create misery, you will destroy people. So, this observation into the mind is freeing the mind to have this extraordinary vitality of life, the energy of it. Right?

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC DIALOGUE 3RD JANUARY 1980

We are having a dialogue, not a discussion. The difference between dialogue and a discussion is a discussion implies trying to find truth or a conclusion between two opinions, between two arguments, dialectic, fanciful, imaginary, or romantic, even so-called historical. But a dialogue means a conversation - dialogos - that means conversation between two people. So this is a conversation between you and the speaker. A conversation implies two friends, I mean friends who like each other, who have a certain affection for each other, who are concerned about their personal problems and so they talk over things together, not try to brow beat one or the other by superior knowledge, or superior intellect, but to investigate together their own problems, their own difficulties, their own personal lives and so on. So please, if you don't mind, this morning we are going to have a dialogue, a conversation between you and the speaker. I see there are a lot of questions here, written questions; you doesn't write when people are walking together as two friends, you don't write questions to each other; you talk, you ask. So if you don't mind we will leave these questions aside for the moment and continue with our dialogue. So what shall we talk about this morning?

Q: Pain.

K: Physical pain?

Q: No, psychological pain.

K: Psychological pain.

Q: Pain of the heart.

K: Physical pain of the heart.

Q: No, psychological pain.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: If some one hears it very clearly, would you like to pass it on to me. I am not deaf - maybe - but I like to be informed correctly.

Q: Are impediments in the way of passive observation.

K: Psychological pain, impediments that might prevent clear, acute, passive awareness and observation. Anything else?

Q: Does diet, natural food, help intelligence?

K: Oh, dietary. You can have marvellous nuts, and marvellous fruit, and marvellous diet but you may be equally stupid. So any other questions, sir?

Q: Why do you take only the crisis of a war when people think together, there may be thinking together without a crisis.

Q: He says there may be other examples of thinking together.

K: Oh, he wants other examples of thinking together. Any other questions?

Q: We have a national crisis that we are having within our country. We want millions of people to have this passive, total observation.

K: This country is in a crisis and we ask all the millions of people to be passively observant. I am afraid even those who are here won't even listen, let alone the millions. Any other questions sirs?

Q: Sir, the energy that is produced through drugs, the stimulation in various forms, is that different from the energy that you are talking about?

K: Chemical energy, which is, drugs are chemical energy, and is that energy different from the energy that we are talking about.

Right, sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Just a minute, sir.

Q: What is that state when supreme intelligence dawns?

K: What is the state when that intelligence dawns. Now just a minute, sir, you have asked several questions, which of these shall we take? Physical, psychological pain, talking to the millions, what is the state of supreme intelligence, what is the mind, or the state which is passively observant. Now which of these shall we take?

Q: The last two.

K: Which is what?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking, sir, which would be the most comprehensive question, which would include all the other questions, to discuss?

Q: Facing a crisis.

K: Facing a crisis, do you want to discuss that, have a dialogue about facing a crisis, or what is it to be attentively - the gentleman used, 'passively observant' - seeing. Which of these two? It's up to you.

Q: Does the movement of the planets affect the brain cells? Is there an astrological influence on the brain cells?

K: Oh, yes sir. Is that all the questions? You mean to say you have no personal questions? No personal problems?

Q: Our personal problems arise out of national problems.

K: Oh! Our problems arise from national problems. No, I won't go into this question. Which would you like to talk about?

Q: How to translate your ideas into the social, economic and political world.

K: I am afraid you can't!

Q: Would you speak of love and compassion?

K: You speak of love and compassion, would you talk about it, could we have a conversation about it.

Q: Love and compassion are so abstract, why talk about those abstractions when we are concerned with our daily life?

K: You mean to say, sirs, that you exclude love and compassion from your daily life?

Q: I will have a dialogue with you, sir, if you ask me. It is so.

K: What is so?

Q: Love and compassion, I have understood what it is, and how it can be related to daily life.

K: Have you understood the question? How can love and compassion be applied to daily life?

Q: When I came here I didn't know what you were talking about.

K: Quite right.

Q: I am not trying to conclude what you are going to talk about this morning, and I am freely observing what you are going to talk about and I am ready to learn. And when I am troubled about a particular point I am stopping that.

K; Yes, sir. Do you want to talk about compassion and love, which is an abstraction? Do you want to talk about an abstraction also called observation? An abstraction between the movements of the stars and your brain? An abstraction of pain in the heart? So which of these abstractions do you want to discuss, have a dialogue about?

Q: The difference between desire and consciousness.

K: Desire and consciousness, what is their relationship.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What shall we do, sir?

Q: Sir you asked that we should ask a personal question, and my personal question is about intelligence, because I see that lack of intelligence, or absence of it, brings all the problems. If that problem is solved then all the others are.

K: We have spent twenty minutes talking about abstractions, not about actually what we are, what we go through in our daily life, our miseries, our confusions, our travail, our ambitions and competition, but we want to talk about something else quite apart. So please let's come down to earth and let's talk together.

Q: My life, and most people's life that I see, it is because of the pain that they will not look at it.

K: All right, sir, shall we discuss that? Shall we talk over that?

Q: Yes.

K: Right. Most human beings, including ourselves, you and I can we talk about that, why human beings accept, live with, continue with pain, sorrow, anxiety and all that. Shall we talk about that? Right, let's do it.

Q: We want a solution.

K: There is a solution. Sir, before we begin to go into this, will you kindly listen? Listen; I listened to you, I listened to you for twenty minutes, so kindly also listen to each other, not that we are going to find a solution immediately, or try to convince each other of anything; we are trying to find out, or learn the movement of pain, common to all human beings, the tears, the anxieties, the grief, the sorrow and all that that makes up our human daily existence. Is that all right? Shall we talk about that?

When we say we have pain, are we aware of it, know it, observe it, as it is taking place? We are going into this step by step, if you don't mind, is that all right? Are we, each one of us, conscious of the pain, of various forms of griefs, anxieties, fears, are we aware of it as it takes place; or we are aware of it a few minutes, or a few seconds later? Let's talk about it. You understand my question? I have a toothache - one has a toothache; that's a physical fact and you know it instantly. Right? That is, immediately you know that there is a physical pain. And you act, if you can, immediately because the pain is intolerable and you act. Right? Now when we say we have pain, psychological, inward, inside the skin as it were, the pain, is that pain as acute, clear as toothache? You understand my question? Or we are aware of it after it has taken place? Would you please discuss with me, I am not giving a talk - the day after tomorrow.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I asked psychological pain, not physical pain.

Q: If it is not acute we are not aware of it.

K: So as long as the psychological state is not acute, not aware, not sensitive, we are not aware of it. So that is what I am asking: is the psychological pain, which we say we have, are we sensitive enough to act instantly, immediately, or not being sensitive we postpone it, or look at it a few minutes later and then try to say, what am I to do about it? I wonder if I am conveying this? Come and sit there, sir, out of the sun. Or would you like to come sit on the platform - anybody is welcome to come and sit on the platform, you can all come!

Is it that one is not sensitive to psychological pains, as one is very, very sensitive when one has physical acute pain? You understand my question? Won't you have a conversation with the speaker?

Q: When the pain comes, like someone you love, suddenly it arrests you, and you say, why.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: And you usually want to run away from it.

K: When you love somebody, or you think you love somebody, and that somebody does something that is not according to your like, or you dislike, then you feel the pain. Right? And what shall we do about it? What do you do about it, sirs?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, don't just throw out words; just see what is happening, sir to each one of us: when somebody you love leaves you - at least, you think you love - leaves you, you go through great agony. I don't know if the Indians do. Some people do, when somebody whom you loves leaves, or you have a battle with your wife - at last you are waking up! - there is pain, there is jealousy, there is anxiety, the sense of antagonism, hatred - which are all various forms of violence - what then do you do? Come on, sirs, meet it, sir, have a discussion, have a dialogue with me; don't just sit there and wait for me to go on. What do we do when this happens - which is a crisis. It is not a national crisis, it is a crisis every day of our life, what do we do?

Q: React selfishly.

K: Yes. You react selfishly. What do you mean by that word

'selfishly'? Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's what I am saying, sir. He says, you react to that crisis through pain, jealousy. That's your reaction, it's not selfish. So when you have that reaction what do you do?

Q: I am just simple observing what is happening.

K: My darling sir, you are not meeting what I am saying. This is the crisis, sir, you won't even listen to what the other fellow has to say.

Q: You try to reduce the pain.

K: You try to reduce the pain, the anxiety and so on. What process do you go through to reduce it? Either run away from it, suppress it, or substitute and so on. Which is, in effect, run away from it. Right? Suppose I have pain because my husband has left me, and I shed tears, then I am lonely, I miss him - sexually, this way and that way and I am deeply hurt and I don't know what to do. Right? Then what happens? Not knowing what to do, I try to escape from it, I try to smother it, I try to go away to some psychologist, to some temple, anything away from the fact that I am in a great state of disturbance. Then how shall I deal with that disturbance if I don't escape? You understand my question? Do I know that I am escaping first? Or is it our natural, or unnatural response to escape? Sir, find out, go into yourself, find out.

Q: I endure it.

K: You don't endure if you have tremendous physical pain. You go to a doctor. Please kindly listen, sir. I said, endure it, suppress it, try to get out of it, escape from it. You do all kinds of things to avoid this pain.

Q: Yes.

K: Please would you mind listening before you agree. So what shall I do? Do we see the futility of escape? Not mentally, as an idea, but do we see the absurdity, the futility of any escape? If one sees that escape does not solve the problem, then what shall I do with the problem? Go slowly, sir. What shall I do with the problem?

Q: I try to accept.

K: I have just now said that madam, I said, escape from it - I included that word.

Q: Accept the problem.

K: Yes, that is endure, accept. So if I don't do any of those things what am I to do? I don't accept, why should I accept? Why should I endure this pain?

Q: In time, it will pass.

K: Yes, that is the same, escape, in time it will pass, endure it, accept it. But you don't accept physical pain.

Q: You must see what the problem is and deal with it.

K: We are going to do it sir. First that can only happen when I don't escape. But we have cultivated such a network of escapes that we don't know even that we are escaping. So I am just asking, most respectfully, do we see the fact, the truth, the fact that the moment you escape the problem still remains? I may postpone going to the doctor because one doctor, or several doctors have told me I have cancer; I say, it doesn't matter, I will put up with it, I can escape, but eventually I must be operated on, or die. So do I, do we acutely realize the fact that any escape in any form - acceptance, running away, enduring it, time will solve it - will never resolve the problem? Do we accept that? If that is so then what shall we do?

Q: Yes I do.

K: Do you?

Q: That situation has not arisen for me.

K: That you don't face the problem?

Q: He said he has not had an anxiety of any kind in his life.

K: You battle it out! This is most extraordinary. Sir, look: I realize the futility and the stupidity of escape, I realize it, the problem will not be solved, then what shall I do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Are you telling me, or am I telling you?

Q: Understand the problem and then you can deal with it.

K: How do you understand the problem?

Q: You seek for the cause of the problem.

K: Wait, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You try to understand the problem by analysing it, trying to find out the cause of it, trying to investigate it, look at it, and all that you are saying. Now, listen carefully please, if you will. I have a problem, I analyse it, try to find the cause of it - what is that? What is that process of analysing, trying to find the cause of it, what is taking place? Just watch it sir. Kindly give me two minutes. I have a problem, my husband has run away and I realize - I have shed tears and all the rest of it - and I realize I can't escape, it is there on my front door step. It is there. Then I say to myself, I must find the cause of it. Right? The cause, analyse, all that - what does that imply? Watch it sir, in yourself, don't just throw out words. Is that not also an escape? What do you say, sir, is that not an escape? Just a minute, sir, look at it, please. This is what our tradition is: I have a problem, either we escape in different forms or analyse it, go into the cause of it, there may be several causes and I have to examine each cause, there may be ten causes. So what have I done? I have moved away from the problem. Right? Do you see that, sir?

Q: How do you say that we have moved away from the problem? Are we not analysing that problem?

K: Yes, sir, I am saying exactly the same thing as you are. Which means what? Just a minute sir. Do you know what is implied in analysis? What?

Q: Finding out what has caused it.

K: No, what does it imply? What is implied in analysis?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Right. Now who is cutting it, analyzing it?

Q: Myself.

K: Myself. That is, yourself analysing the problem of my wife escaping from me, which means what? You have spent a couple of days, or a couple of months in analysing, which means what? Wait, sir, you haven't answered my question. I have analysed, I have taken a couple of years, I have been to an analyst, or done puja, or sat by myself and said, what is the cause of all that. What has happened? Have I solved the problem?

Q: It may.

K: You say, it may - have I?

Q: I have solved the problem.

K: I question it.

Q: I have, sir.

K: Good sir.

Q: In my daily life.

K: Yes, I am dealing with daily life.

Q: I think I have more intensive problems in my daily life than your respected self. I know how I am living.

K: Wait, forgive me, I have no problems.

Q: I have problems.

K: I know. I know, sir, you all have problems. I am trying to find out if you will kindly listen to me. I am trying to say that when we have a problem without escaping we begin to analyse. Right? Say, what am I to do. So I say, what is the cause of this, what is the root of this matter? Right? Then what happens? What is actually taking place when I say I am trying to find the root of the matter?

Q: I try to get clear about it.

K: That is, sir, you are analysing, aren't you? Now just let's stop there for a moment. What are the implications of analysis? Who is it that is analysing, thinking the analyser is different from the problem? Careful, go slowly, sir. The analyser thinks he is different from the problem, and therefore he is able to say to himself, I am going to understand, investigate, analyse the cause of it. That is, the analyser is different from the thing analysed. Just a minute, sir. Do you see that?

Q: I see that, but the problem is part of me and I am part of the problem. The problem and I are not different.

K: So what shall we do? If the problem is you, and the problem is interrelated, what shall we do? This is not a conversation between that gentleman and myself, please we are all involved in this.

Q: Step aside and watch.

K: Do you? You see you just throw out ideas.

Q: Stop, we would listen.

K: What am I to do sir? We don't seem to think together, we don't even look at the same thing at the same time together. Look sir, just listen to this for two minutes. I have a problem: my wife or my son or my husband has left me. It is an acute problem because I am then facing my loneliness, my lack of sexual relationship, my sense of isolation, my sense of being deserted, left. And one generally runs away from this fact. Right, sir? Runs away in different ways. Then I say, I won't run away, but then I must understand the problem. To understand the problem it is our tradition that says you must analyse. Now what does analyse mean?

Q: Well I analyse the problem and I think I will solve the problem, I don't know what else to do.

K: I am pointing this out, sir. I think by analysing I will be able to solve the problem. We haven't understood the full meaning of analysis. No, don't smile, look at it, sir. You have analysed, you are all experts at analysis, introspection, conversation, discussion, but the fact remains at the end of it, have you solved the problem? That is, by analysis perhaps you get at the root, all that is time. That is, through time we think we will have solved it, not through analysis. I don't know if you understand this. Wait, wait sir, don't be too quick. There is a problem, no escape and I analyse, one analyses, that involves time which means what? I think through time to resolve the problem, which is another escape. You don't even understand what I am talking about.

Sir, we act immediately - please listen to it - you act immediately if you have a very acute pain, physically - immediate action. Right? Why don't you do the same with regard to problems? Wait, sir, listen to it. I can answer all the questions you raise, sir. Why don't you act as acutely, shocked, immediately as you do with regard to physical pain, why don't you do the same with psychological pains? That is the real issue. Right? Listen to it. Why don't I do that? You understand, sir?

Q: Make a commentary.

K: We live on commentaries, sir. It's not worth it.

Q: Even in that freedom...

K: You are a free person, sir.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: You may take, sir, a taxi to go to the hospital. Sir, don't let's play with words. If you have pain, it may take an hour to get to the doctor, but inwardly you have acted instantly, immediately. Now why don't you do the same? That is...

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I know all this, sir, I know all these questions. I have lived with these questions for the last sixty years, everybody throws out an idea, and apparently one doesn't listen to what is being said. Listen, sir, please. I am saying, the physical pain may be compared with the psychological pain. The physical pain, you may allow ten minutes to go to the doctor, but the immediate decision is, act immediately. That action may take time, that is, ten minutes in a taxi. Is it possible, I am asking myself, to inwardly decide immediately, without analysis - wait sir, you haven't even listened and you disagree - can I decide immediately to end this problem? Not take time, not run away, not move away from that problem completely.

Q: I immediately accept it, this feeling of shock is the word.

K: This is a question I am asking, madam, find out what the question is first.

Q: I would treat it with the use of intelligence.

K: Yes, sir. When you act physically, pain, your intelligence acts. Here intelligence is not acting. And I say intelligence can only operate at the moment. So go slowly. I am asking myself, instead of going through all the process of analysis, escapes, time and all that, why can't I, the mind, say, this must be tackled instantly, immediately? Now, I'll show it to you in a minute. My wife has left me and I am terribly hurt, lonely. Right? Is it not possible to deal with that loneliness instantly? Right? Now probably you have never asked this question. Now I am pointing out how to do it, follow it - will you?

I am not - my mind is not allowing time to interfere with it. Sir, this is one of the most difficult things to do, don't just... Not to allow time as a means of the solution of a problem - time being analysis, escape, suppression, acceptance, all those imply time. Right? Right, sirs? No, not as an idea, see the fact that all those movements are away from the problem and involve time. And I say to myself, time will not solve it. It's obvious. Time has not solved the problem of war - for the last five thousand years historically there have been five thousand wars. So time psychologically, or outwardly, will not solve the problem. So I say, if I will not allow time to interfere what then takes place? Answer it, sir. It's up to you, the ball is in your court! What do you say, sir? Will you put yourself in that position of not allowing time at all?

Q: You give it your full attention.
