During this time Faulkner was also hard at work on an even more important novel—Absalom, Absalom!—but his personal life was complicated, in November 1935, by the accidental death of his brother Dean and by the beginning of his own longtime affair with Meta Doherty Carpenter, a woman from Mississippi who was also employed in Hollywood. Faulkner usually resented his own need to work there, since his film duties interrupted his devotion to his own fiction writing, and so his relations with the Hollywood studios were often fitful and stormy. His drinking did not help, and Estelle herself had also acquired a strong taste for alcohol. Nonetheless, Absalom, Absalom! was published to impressive reviews (but less impressive sales) in October 1936, and by the end of the year Faulkner was finally able to pay off the mortgage on his Oxford house. In 1937 he spent time working in Hollywood, doing his own writing back in Mississippi, and visiting (and drinking) in New York. Indeed, he drank so heavily while there that he passed out in his hotel room and was severely burned when he lay, unconscious, with his back against a scalding steam pipe. Recuperation was lengthy and painful, but Faulkner remained productive: His latest novel, The Unvanquished, was issued early in 1938, and screen rights for the book were quickly sold. Faulkner purchased a large farm near Oxford (on which he planned to raise mules), all the while continuing his work on various writing projects, including a new novel titled The Wild Palms, which was published to significant commercial success at the start of 1939. By this time he had been elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and by the end of that year his short story titled “Barn Burning” had been awarded a major literary prize. More stories were written in 1940, and in addition a new novel (The Hamlet) was published that year, followed in early 1942 by a collection of fiction (Faulkner called it a novel) titled Go Down, Moses.

By this time, of course, the United States had entered World War II. Faulkner found himself back in Hollywood (always a source of income, if also of frustration), where he worked intermittently throughout the war. By the time the conflict ended in 1945, a well-known critic named Malcolm Cowley was hard at work on an anthology—to be titled The Portable Faulkner—that he and Faulkner hoped would call important attention to the significance of Faulkner's body of work. When the book was published in 1946, it did just that, and in fact Cowley's collection is often credited with reviving Faulkner's reputation by reminding American readers of a novelist who enjoyed far more acclaim in Europe than in his native land. In any case, by 1948 Faulkner had published a new book, Intruder in the Dust, which became his best-selling novel to that point; screen rights for this work were quickly purchased, and by the end of the year its author had been elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters. In 1949 the film version of Intruder in the Dust premiered in his hometown; one of his short stories won a major prize; and a collection of short fiction was issued late that fall. By summer 1950 Collected Stories of William Faulkner was published, but by far the major event of that year was the announcement that Faulkner had been awarded the Nobel Prize in literature. Both the award itself and the inspiring speech Faulkner made in accepting it won him widespread new attention and respect. Finally he had achieved, in his own country, the kind of serious recognition he had long enjoyed abroad. From now until his death little more than a decade later, awards, academic positions, speaking invitations, government assignments, and other kinds of distinctions would flow in upon him. The man who had never finished high school had become one of his country's most distinguished writers. He also increasingly became a widely published commentator on social affairs, especially on matters related to the racial problems of the South. Faulkner favored voluntary integration of the public schools and was generally liberal in his attitudes toward racial issues—a stance that often annoyed less progressive whites, especially in his native state. In other ways, however, his social views were often traditional and conservative.

Throughout the 1950s Faulkner continued to be productive, despite frequent back pain, various injuries, and persistent problems with alcohol.

In 1951 he published a partially dramatic work, Requiem for a Nun, on which he had worked with Joan Williams, a young admirer with whom he had become romantically involved. In 1954 he published a new novel, called A Fable, on which he had been laboring for many years; it won the National Book Award for fiction in 1955. That same year he published Big Woods, a group of stories about hunting. Meanwhile, his romantic entanglement with another young woman—Jean Stein—complicated his personal life and helped provoke his wife to offer a divorce (an offer he refused) in 1957. During that same year, his newest novel (The Town) received a mixed reception from the critics, but by this point Faulkner was receiving increasing respect from academics (becoming writer in residence, for instance, at the University of Virginia) and was also being asked more and more to represent the United States on goodwill trips abroad. While living in Charlottesville, Virginia, he began to spend greater and greater time participating in the hunts on horseback organized by wealthy local residents, even though he occasionally suffered serious injuries in accidents and falls. In the meantime, his latest novel, The Mansion, appeared in late 1959, followed in 1962 by his last novel, The Reivers. During these last years of his life, Faulkner spent much of his time hunting, traveling, dealing with back pain and other ailments, and (unfortunately) drinking excessively. In his final months both the pain and the drinking continued, so that when he died of a heart attack on July 6, 1962, his death put an end to a considerable amount of suffering. It also, unfortunately, ended a literary career that still held much promise, even if its most fruitful period was now decades in the past. By the end of his life Faulkner had risen from total obscurity to worldwide prominence. He had produced not only more than a score of important books but also a whole new kind of American writing. As ERNEST HEMINGWAY did (but in a much different manner), he had created a distinctive style and had explored a distinctive set of themes and subjects and had thereby helped, in the process, to win for American literature broad international recognition and respect.

The Sound and the Fury* (1929)

This experimental novel, which is highly innovative in structure and technique, deals with the breakdown of the southern Compson family, which is headed by a cynical father and a self-pitying mother and consists of a loving, lovable daughter named Caddy, a mentally retarded son named Benjy, his intellectual brother named Quentin (who eventually commits suicide), and their self-centered, sarcastic brother named Jason. All three brothers are preoccupied, in one way or another, with Caddy, whose adolescent sexual involvements lead to a pregnancy that results not only in estrangement from her family but also in a daughter also named Quentin, whose relationship with her uncle Jason is eventually full of tension and conflict. Ultimately the teenaged, female Quentin escapes what is left of the family, leaving behind a frustrated, embittered Jason, who strongly contrasts with Dilsey, the family's old black cook—the one character throughout the book who consistently shows herself to be wise, kind, stable, and loving.

Although The Sound and the Fury was Faulkner's fourth novel, it is widely considered his first truly significant work, and indeed many readers regard it as his best piece of writing. It is, initially, a very difficult book to understand, especially in the first two of its four sections. Section 1, which is titled "April Seventh, 1928," is told from the perspective of Benjy, the mentally handicapped brother, whose thoughts are highly random and disjointed: His thinking constantly shifts, without warning or explanation, between the present and the past. Indeed, the title of Faulkner's novel derives from a famous speech near the beginning of act 5, scene 5 of Shakespeare's play Macbeth in which Macbeth declares that all of human life is merely "a tale / Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, / Signifying nothing." This quotation seems especially relevant to the first section of the novel for at least three reasons: (1) Benjy is considered a literal idiot by most of the other characters; (2) he is in fact often angry and frustrated, but his ability to express himself to others is limited mostly to inarticulate howls; (3) it may seem easy to conclude that the events Benjy perceives are merely chaotic and meaningless.

This impression of confusion and disorder seems, if anything, to intensify in the second section of the novel, titled "June Second, 1910"—a section in which events are described from the perspective of Benjy's older brother, Quentin. Although Quentin is not an "idiot" (in fact, he is a highly intelligent student at Harvard), his obsession with his sister Caddy is, if anything, even more intense than Benjy's and results in extreme psychological confusion and, eventually, suicide. Ironically, Benjy's section seems relatively simple and straightforward when compared with Quentin's, which is full of odd allusions, fragmented syntax, and complicated disruptions in the narrative. The first half of Faulkner's book will therefore not only puzzle most readers but frustrate many.

In contrast, section 3—titled "April Sixth, 1928"—is not only much easier to follow but also often laugh-out-loud funny, offering a refreshing change in tone and technique from the first two parts. The perspective here belongs to Jason Compson, who is in some ways a much simpler character than either of his two brothers. Appropriately, therefore, his section is presented in a much simpler, more straightforward fashion than theirs, and for many readers this portion of the book will be a welcome relief after the tangled (and, in some respects, not especially interesting) knots Faulkner ties in the first two sections. Jason is bitter, sarcastic, brutal, and biting, and all these traits give his section a strong, clear narrative thrust as well as an enormous degree of perverse energy and vitality. Reminiscent, in many ways, of Shakespeare's Iago and King Richard III, Jason is an essentially evil, self-centered character who is nonetheless highly entertaining; in his snide cynicism he anticipates (and probably influenced) some of the equally misanthropic characters later depicted by Flannery O'Connor. It is hard to imagine a mind quite as dark and derisive as Jason's, but Faulkner brings him to vivid life, and the plot picks up a kind of acerbic briskness and buoyancy whenever he dominates the scene. In section 3, therefore, Faulkner reveals that he was not simply a daring experimenter but also a conventionally talented writer. The same is true, to a lesser degree, in section 4, which is titled "April Eighth, 1928” and differs from the three earlier sections because it is reported by an omniscient narrator. Jason is still a central figure here (as is Quentin, his adolescent niece and constant antagonist), but in many ways the central figure is now Dilsey, the old black housekeeper who has devoted her life to caring for the Compsons and who is the clear standard by which we can measure that family’s flaws and failures. Dilsey is, in particular, the polar opposite of Jason; she possesses all the kindness, selflessness, compassion, and strength he lacks, and she is (even more obviously than Caddy) the true heroine of Faulkner’s novel. Ironically enough, the cynical, caustic Jason is finally himself an object of both Faulkner’s and the reader’s derision, whereas Dilsey is the one character in the book who seems to earn the unqualified respect of both the author and his audience. Paradoxically, then, the true aristocrat of this novel—at least in moral terms—is not any of the relatively privileged Compsons, with their large house and long lineage, but an old black cook who is far less simple than she seems. Thus Faulkner’s novel, in spite of its innovative structure and unconventional techniques, is (in its underlying ethical values) a highly traditional book: It implicitly endorses many of the most orthodox ideals of old-fashioned Judeo-Christian morality.

The “plot” of the book, such as it is, is rather straightforward and even banal: When the Compson siblings are youngsters, they are playing near a creek when Caddy muddies her underpants. Later she climbs a tree while her brothers, watching from below, glimpse the dirty drawers. The soiled underwear eventually becomes, at least in the fevered mind of her brother Quentin, a symbol of Caddy’s later loss of sexual “innocence”—a loss he cannot tolerate because it symbolizes the loss of his own intensely close attachment to her. For Quentin and for Benjy, Caddy has provided the kind of love and caring they have never received from their self-involved mother or their remote and cynical father. Caddy, too, of course, suffers from this parental indifference or neglect—and so, in his own strange way, does Jason. Each child responds differently from the others to this fundamental sense of isolation: Benjy and Quentin become obsessed with Caddy; Jason becomes obsessed with himself; and the teenaged Caddy ultimately seeks attention from a series of boys, one of whom finally makes her pregnant. In response, a marriage is hastily arranged to a youth from Indiana, but not before Quentin tries to preserve his relationship with Caddy by falsely telling his father that he and his sister have committed incest—a claim the father dismisses. Realizing that his links with Caddy (as well as his romantic illusions about her) are now fundamentally lost, Quentin kills himself by plunging into a river in Massachusetts. Meanwhile, Benjy (who is 33 when the novel opens but who has the mind of a three-year-old) spends his time roaming the grounds near the family home, moaning whenever anything upsets him or reminds him of Caddy. Benjy is usually accompanied by one of the blacks who work for the Compsons, but the only person who truly seems to care about him (after Caddy leaves) is the ever-reliable and fundamentally compassionate Dilsey. Jason, certainly, feels no real love for his disadvantaged brother: When Benjy menacingly approaches some neighborhood girls, the family has him castrated, and Jason would like nothing better than to have him also committed to an insane asylum. In the meantime, Jason himself hoards the money that Caddy sends each month to help provide for Quentin, the illegitimate daughter she has had to leave behind. Jason tries to control every aspect of the rebellious girl’s behavior, including her involvement with boys, but at the end of the novel she defeats him by breaking into his locked room, stealing the money he has hidden away, and running off with a worker from a traveling carnival. As does her mother, then, she finally escapes (at least geographically) from the bizarre influence of the Compsons, among whom Benjy seems in some ways the least unstable (or most innocent) of the bunch.

Faulkner claimed that he was inspired to write the novel by his own love of Caddy, whom he seems to have regarded as a symbol of kindness and love. If he had told the story in a “normal,” conventional fashion—with a clear chronological progression and with a consistently omniscient third-person point of view—the book would be simpler to read, easier to understand, but not (for many readers, at least) nearly as interesting. Instead, Faulkner elected to use two techniques that were just beginning to come into widespread use among avant-garde (or cutting-edge) novelists: stream of consciousness and interior monologue. As the very term implies, in stream of consciousness fiction the mind of the character spills out onto the page haphazardly and without obvious or conventional structure. Practitioners of the stream-of-consciousness technique tended to believe that the mind itself was extremely complex, consisting not merely of conscious thoughts and rational ideas but also of largely unconscious yearnings, fears, moods, sensations, memories, and associations. The purpose of using the stream of consciousness method was therefore to evoke, on the page, the complications, inconsistencies, dead ends, and puzzling gaps typical of actual human thought. Just as the mind works in random, unpredictable, and disordered ways, so Faulkner's novel—at least in its first two sections—tries to convey some sense of that chaotic complexity. The same effects are achieved by his reliance on another avant garde technique—interior monologue. As the term implies, this technique emphasizes the individual character's responses to the world rather than emphasizing the external world itself. We see, hear, and feel everything from the highly subjective point of view of single characters: An explicit authorial voice is absent. We are “inside the head” of the character, perceiving what he or she perceives, feeling what he or she feels.

Faulkner, then, is less interested in telling a straightforward story than he is in suggesting the complexities of individual psychological experience. Any encounter with “reality” is, necessarily, an encounter from some particular, limited, biased, and conditioned point of view, and Faulkner is more interested in exploring these various viewpoints than he is in pretending to offer a simple, objective, “authoritative” narrative. His method implies that there is no single, simple “truth”—or that if there is, we have no easy access to it. For this reason he often returns to the same “events” again and again, allowing us to perceive them from many different angles and perspectives. In The Sound and the Fury this method is especially relevant to some of his main themes, since the book is largely about the absence of shared outlooks, the breakdown of collective responses, and the growing isolation of alienated individuals. Benjy is cut off from the rest of the world by his mental retardation; his brother Quentin is cut off by his hypersensitivity and excessive intellectuality. Jason, meanwhile, deliberately cuts himself off from others through his monumental egotism—a trait he has inherited from his equally solipsistic mother, although her egocentrism is expressed in more passive-aggressive ways. Mr. Compson, the father, is mostly a scoffing bystander and then is mostly absent (thanks to his early death) from the later sections of the book, while Quentin, the rebellious teenage girl, is cut off from the rest of the family because of the circumstances of her illegitimate birth, because of the physical absence of her mother, and because of her refusal to kowtow to her manipulative uncle Jason. Only the black members of the household—centered on Dilsey—seem members of a real community with a clearly shared outlook, a solid chain of authority, and a relatively “normal” family life, and it is significant that the narrative is never presented solely from the perspective of any of the black characters (not even Dilsey's). Precisely because Dilsey (and, to a lesser extent, Caddy) is capable of genuine selflessness, the book never allows us to see events merely from her single, isolated point of view. Her perspective, after all, is never truly single or isolated, and so it should not surprise us that a section devoted exclusively to Dilsey's outlook is missing from the novel.

Many of the secondary themes of the novel are related to this larger theme of isolation or alienation. The racism taken for granted by so many of the characters (and expressed with such explicit and contemptuous language by Jason) is, for example, merely one of the many means by which characters are cut off from one another in this novel. Jason assumes his own superiority not only to most of the other people in the book (including his own mother) but especially to all of the black people—an assumption, paradoxically, that makes him even more essentially isolated. Likewise, his aggressive economic competitiveness, like his monetary greed and his disdain for his niece's lower-class suitor, only reinforces his fundamental alienation. It hardly seems an accident that he never marries or is never shown even courting a woman: He is much too self-involved ever to feel the need for love, a wife, or children. More than one analyst has suggested, in fact, that his obsession with his niece (and particularly with her love life) implies more than a touch of incestuous feelings, and, if this diagnosis is accurate, such an interpretation would only reinforce the view that the thoughts and feelings of most of the characters in this book are self-enclosed and claustrophobic. Certainly the feelings of Jason's brother Quentin toward their sister, Caddie, fit this description, and although Quentin and Caddie are not guilty of the literal act of incest, Quentin is certainly guilty of a kind of "love" for his sister that is fundamentally rooted in his own self-love. His geographical isolation (during much of the book) from the rest of the family when he is in Massachusetts is therefore entirely appropriate, for Quentin is essentially a "distant" character even when he shares the same space with other people. Like his mother (who spends most of her time confined to her bed in her own room), and like his brother Jason (who carefully keeps his own room locked and shut off from the rest of the family), Quentin is detached, solitary, aloof, and disconnected. Most of the people in this book are in fact cut off from anything or anyone outside themselves, whether it be family, community, the church, or God. Only Dilsey and her children enjoy any kind of vital contact with these larger sources of meaning and happiness. Only Dilsey, in the end, escapes the tragic, existential isolation that is Faulkner's main theme in this book.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Jason, in this novel, with the character named Julian in Flannery O'Connor's short story "Everything That Rises Must Converge." How are they similar in their personalities, their ways of treating other people, their ways of expressing themselves, and their ultimate fates? How and why are they funny at the expense of others, but how and why is the joke finally on them? In particular, discuss each man's relationship with his mother.
2. How does this novel resemble and/or differ from THORNTON WILDER's play Our Town? In what ways are the characters in both works fundamentally isolated? What does each work imply about the importance of the family, both positively and negatively, in individuals' lives? What do both works suggest about the relations of past, present, and future? How are both works technically innovative in similar ways?
3. Read Faulkner's novel in conjunction with the novel by W. E. B. DuBois entitled The Quest of the Silver Fleece. How do the works compare and/or contrast in their depictions of race relations, in their techniques of characterization and narration, in their description of life in the South, and in their resolutions and final tones?
4. Discuss in detail the first three paragraphs of the novel. How are they typical, in phrasing and method, of the novel as a whole? How does Faulkner use them to create interest, to imply a specific geographic and temporal setting, and to suggest already the nature of relationships among the characters? How does the very opening of the novel foreshadow the novel's conclusion?

As I Lay Dying (1930)

After the death of Addie Bundren, a poor white wife and mother in rural Mississippi, her husband (Anse) and children (sons Cash, Darl, Jewel, and Vardaman and daughter Dewey Dell) laboriously transport her body 40 miles to Jefferson to fulfill her desire to be buried with her kinfolk. Her final days, her previous life, and the process of hauling the corpse are all described and commented on in a succession of 59 short chapters narrated by 15 different characters, including all the members of the family and a variety of people they meet along the way as the body, putrefying in a homemade wooden coffin, begins to stink and attract buzzards. Eventually the family arrive in Jefferson, where Addie is buried, where Dewey Dell is seduced while seeking to abort her pregnancy, where Darl is committed to an insane asylum, and where Anse, having purchased a long-sought set of false teeth, immediately takes up with a new woman.

Like The Sound and the Fury (the novel that immediately preceded it), As I Lay Dying is a technically innovative and challenging book. Both works reject the traditional use of an all-knowing third-person narrator, employing instead a modernist “stream of consciousness” technique in which the story is told from a multitude of often-conflicting points of view. However, whereas Faulkner, in The Sound and the Fury, had presented the perspectives of a relatively small number of characters in only a few lengthy sections, in As I Lay Dying the sections are much shorter and much more numerous, reflecting the viewpoints of a much wider cross section of personalities. The later novel thus seems, at least in structure and design, more fragmented than the earlier book, although the “plot” is actually easier to follow, partly because the chronology is simpler and fewer distracting flashbacks are employed. In addition, the speaker of each chapter is clearly mentioned at the beginning of each section, making the later novel seem less confusing than its predecessor. The styles of the various chapters of As I Lay Dying vary in accordance with the personality and mind of the character speaking in each section, and Faulkner leaves it to his readers—as he so often does—to piece together a coherent narrative. He is (as usual) less interested in telling a simple, straightforward story than in suggesting the multitude of ways in which any event can be perceived, interpreted, and presented.

Admirers of this novel have praised it for a number of stylistic and technical traits. They have applauded it, for instance, for the ways it blends comedy (including humor that is often macabre and ironic) with more serious and even tragic elements, and they have also commended the novel for its combination of cutting-edge narrative techniques with convincing vernacular diction and dialogue. Faulkner, in other words, writes in the most up-to-date modernist fashion, but his characters think and speak (for the most part) in language that any person from the backwoods of the Deep South would have instantly recognized. The book is thus modern in method but traditional in the personalities, social relations, and values it presents. Many readers find the characters vivid and intriguing, and analysts have also often praised the sheer variety of types of characters presented, with their multitude of different outlooks, motivations, and responses. The lengthy, arduous journey has been compared to the kind of plot often found in such classical epics as Homer's Odyssey, while the book has also been admired for the sheer suspense it creates: Will the Bundrens succeed in their journey? Will the rapidly decaying body survive the trip? Will the family hold together after the burial? Will Dewey Dell have an abortion? How will the characters respond to—and be treated in—the city of Jefferson? By implying such questions, Faulkner holds the attention and interest of numerous readers, who find the Bundrens sometimes laughable, sometimes pathetic, and sometimes even noble in their dedication and commitment to finishing the task they have undertaken. Simply as a piece of writing, As I Lay Dying has been extolled for the ways it creates and communicates emotion, for the ways it sustains interest by withholding or postponing meaning, for its effective use of imagery, and for the ways it forces readers to take an active role in trying to make sense of what is happening and why. Faulkner has been praised for creating a variety of convincing voices and viewpoints and for using contrasts among these differing perspectives to create a novel that is kaleidoscopic in its ultimate effects. Not all readers, of course, have been uniformly impressed by this book. Some critics, for instance, have found both the characters and the plot tedious, arguing that the Bundrens are merely simplistic caricatures and thus fail to arouse much authentic sympathy, compassion, or even interest. For the most part, however, commentators find the book's plot, people, and methods fascinating and engaging. Whether the Bundrens are regarded as buffoons, heroes, or some mixture of the two, they do interest many readers.

At least as interesting, to many critics, as the characters themselves are the themes the book explores. Many commentators, for instance, have discussed the ways this novel reveals the impact the dead can have on the living or the influence the past can exert on the present. The surviving Bundrens struggle mightily to make sure that Addie's final wish is fulfilled—even if (as some analysts have argued) her wish was motivated less by a yearning to rest beside her kinfolk than by a desire to impose her vengeful will on a spouse and children with whom she was never really happy. Indeed, for many analysts a main theme of the book is the fundamental loneliness of most human beings—their essential isolation from one another even (or perhaps especially) when they are members of the same families. Each Bundren participates in the common enterprise of getting Addie moved and buried, but each Bundren has his or her private (and often selfish) reasons for doing so. Thus the book shows (at least according to some readers) how even acts of apparent solidarity can involve an immense sense of solitude, and the styles and structure of the novel emphasize the self-enclosed isolation of characters who interact with one another without ever really sharing a true common purpose or a larger point of view. On the other hand, for some readers the novel conveys a more optimistic message: It shows the ability and willingness of human beings to struggle, overcome obstacles, endure, and even prevail in the face of enormous difficulties. It would have been easy enough for the Bundrens to ignore Addie's wishes and conveniently bury her closer to home, but instead they honor their obligations, showing a kind of respect for the dead that implies that life is not without meaning, purpose, or dignity, even when the people involved are poor, uneducated, simple, and somewhat crude. Conversely, for other readers the journey the Bundrens undertake illustrates the absurdity of life—its lack of any ultimate purpose and the impermanence of human attachments and identities. At the end of the book, after all, Darl has been committed to an insane asylum and Anse has suddenly acquired not only new teeth but a new partner. Addie herself, meanwhile, seems quickly forgotten. It is tempting, then, to read the novel as a description of a long, mock-epic journey that leads to nothing of any great consequence or significance.

Comments on the various characters of the novel have focused mostly on Addie, Anse, and Darl. Addie, for instance, has sometimes been viewed as a victim of a male-oriented power structure who, through the way she lives and through her final wishes, tries to repudiate that power and take vengeance on it. She has been seen as a sexually frustrated woman who defies her husband by having an affair, but she has also been interpreted as a woman who, in her desire to be buried in Jefferson, is motivated by sincere devotion to her own original kinfolk. Although some commentators have found Addie too stereotyped or caricatured to be a convincing character, others have regarded her as a genuinely tragic figure who inspires true devotion in her children and who exercises far more influence over them, even after her death, than their father does. Indeed, Addie has often been compared to Caddy in The Sound and the Fury: Both women exert a powerful sway over many of the male characters even though both Caddy and Addie are technically absent from their novels for long stretches of time. Addie is as much a focus of the male characters' obsessions as Caddy was, and certainly she seems a more substantial and serious figure than her husband, Anse. Anse, in fact, has rarely been the subject of positive comments from the novel's analysts. Sometimes he is seen as a self-interested clown and sometimes as a real villain, although occasionally commentators have argued that other critics have been too hard on Anse. He has been depicted as lazy, stupid, hypocritical, greedy, and selfish and also as a master manipulator, but at least one commentator has attributed any "defects" in his character to his real physical afflictions (symbolized by his aversion to working up a sweat). In general, however, while for some commentators Anse merits derisive ridicule, others regard him as genuinely despicable. Finally, one more character has been the subject of extensive critical discussion: Darl, the second-oldest son of Addie and Anse and the figure who narrates more chapters (19) than any other character in the book. It is Darl who tries at one point to incinerate his mother's decaying corpse by burning a barn in which her coffin is temporarily housed, and it is Darl who is declared insane and imprisoned by the end of the novel. For many commentators, Darl is a tragic figure whose incarceration confirms his perception that life is cruel—a cruelty underscored by his unrequited love for his mother, whose personal favorite among her children is Jewel, the product of her extramarital affair with a local preacher. Jewel, in fact, is the object of much of Darl's jealousy. He appears in every one of the many chapters narrated by Darl, including the first chapter, in which Jewel is indeed the very first word. Nevertheless, despite this obsession with a particular brother, Darl has also been seen as the most comprehensive character—the one who has the most insights into the others and the most responses to them, and indeed the character whose point of view most closely resembles the narrative perspective of the author himself. In fact, Darl's language (which, among other traits, abounds in metaphors but is relatively lacking in similes) has sometimes been criticized as sounding too authorial, too sophisticated in diction and tone, and thus the realism of Faulkner's depiction of Darl has sometimes been faulted. As has Quentin in The Sound and the Fury, Darl has sometimes been seen as greatly resembling Faulkner himself in his concerns, thoughts, and language, but Quentin, at least, was a highly educated person from whom complex thoughts and sophisticated phrasing might have been expected. Other commentators, however, have defended Faulkner's presentation of Darl by arguing that achieving an effect of mere realism was never Faulkner's main aim in this book—a book that many readers consider one of his best, most complex, and most intriguing.

For Discussion or Writing

1. JOHN STEINBECK's novel The Grapes of Wrath also deals with a lengthy, arduous journey by a group of poor white southerners in the same general period in which Faulkner's novel is set. Compare and contrast the two books in terms of style, characterization, narrative technique, and themes. For instance, how does Addie Bundren resemble and/or differ from Ma Joad? How is each book innovative in the ways it tells its story? What "message(s)" or meanings does each book seem to imply? Does one book appeal to you more than the other? If so, explain why.
2. How does the family life depicted in Faulkner's novel resemble and/or differ from the family life depicted in RICHARD WRIGHT's novel Native Son? Discuss the roles of the mothers in both books and the relations of the siblings. Discuss the impact of the different settings—rural and urban—presented in each book; how are the characters shaped by their environments? Discuss the impact of race and social class in each novel.
3. How does the culture of the poor southern whites described in this novel compare and/or contrast with the culture of the poor southern blacks described in ZORA NEALE HURSTON's book Mules and Men? Which are greater: the similarities or the differences? Which book offers a more convincing depiction of the cultures it describes? How are the techniques, purposes, and styles of the works affected by the differing genres to which they belong?
4. Choose one of the main characters and trace his or her development throughout the novel. How is the character presented in ways that make him or her seem both complex and consistent? Is there a particular episode in which this character is involved that seems especially revealing or important? Does the character change in any significant ways as the novel develops?

"A Rose for Emily" (1930, 1931)

A narrator who speaks with intimate knowledge of the town of Jefferson, Mississippi, tells about the life of Miss Emily Grierson, an elderly, isolated, strong-willed spinster who has recently died after living alone for many decades in a large, decaying, dust-filled house in which her only regular contact was with an old black servant named Tobe. When Emily was a young woman, her domineering father discouraged suitors; after his death, she took up with a visiting Yankee construction worker named Homer Barron, but their relationship caused a scandal in the town; eventually he vanished, and after his disappearance Miss Emily retreated into seclusion. After Emily is buried, a delegation from the town opens a room in her house that has not been seen for 40 years; in it, they discover the skeletal remains of Homer Barron, dressed in his nightshirt, on a bed, with a strand of Miss Emily's graying hair on the pillow beside him.

"A Rose for Emily" is one of Faulkner's most widely read and widely admired stories. It exemplifies his typical interest in the small fictional southern town of Jefferson (modeled closely on his own town of Oxford, Mississippi) and reveals his frequent concern with eccentric characters, cultural decay, the way the past impinges on the present, and bizarre, often perverse relationships, especially within families. Faulkner often likes to deal with the strange skeletons in people's closets, and in this case the metaphor almost becomes a literal fact. The story is an example of the "gothic" in literature: It emphasizes dark settings, a gloomy tone, an eccentric character, an air of mystery, and a touch of horror. Miss Emily's life has obviously been warped by the influence of her domineering father, and it seems significant that no other close relations are ever mentioned: the words mother, brother, and sister do not exist in this story, and the only relatives of Emily who are referred to (besides her father) are cousins who live in distant Alabama. Emily has been isolated by her father, and, after his death and the disappearance of Homer Barron, she deliberately isolates herself. Ironically, her weakness in relation to her father ultimately results in strength and indomitable willpower in her relations with the rest of the town. By rejecting connections with the rest of the community, she paradoxically fulfills her father's desire to keep her cut off from any real influence but his own, and it seems fitting that at her funeral a crayon portrait of her father (presumably drawn by Emily herself) looms above her coffin. Although Mr. Grierson's relationship with his daughter may not have been physically perverse, it certainly seems symbolically incestuous, at least in the way he dominates and isolates Emily. In one way or another, her final decades are overshadowed by her obsessive relations with dead men.

Although commentators on this story often view Emily as a bizarre figure, she also has been seen as a character more sinned against than sinning—as an example of a woman whose whole life has been distorted not simply by a particular overbearing father but by the whole patriarchal culture of the traditional South. Critics often see her as being simultaneously intimidating, pitiable, admirable, and pathetic; she is often interpreted as a woman whose isolation and conduct lend her a kind of tragic dignity. Some critics contrast her with her servant, Tobe, who seems more noble, more normal, more healthy, and more humble than his oddly murderous mistress; and commentators also tend to contrast her with the anonymous narrator, whose tone and attitudes seem sane, insightful, and sympathetic. Homer Barron, meanwhile, is as mysterious in life as he is in death: We never learn the details of his motivations or the exact nature of his relationship with Emily. Even (or perhaps especially) at the end of the tale, when we glimpse the startling remains of Homer's unexpected corpse, Faulkner keeps us guessing, and "A Rose for Emily" is rightly regarded as one of the most tantalizing mystery stories in American literature.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this story with one or more works by Flannery O'Connor that also deal with domineering parental figures, such as "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," "Everything That Rises Must Converge," or "The Artificial Nigger." In what ways are the tones and underlying messages of those stories similar to and/or different from the tone(s) and message(s) of Faulkner's story? How and why are O'Connor's stories "comic" in ways that Faulkner's story is not? What role (if any) does religion play in O'Connor's stories and in Faulkner's?
2. Discuss the role of isolation in this story and in the three major autobiographical essays of GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN (Zitkala-Ša)—"Impressions of an Indian Childhood," "The Schooldays of an Indian Girl," and "An Indian Teacher among Indians." How is the isolation, in both cases, somewhat self-imposed? How is it affected by the gender, class, and ethnic backgrounds of the protagonists? How does each character respond to (and cope with) her isolation?

3. How does Faulkner build and maintain suspense in this story? How does he keep his readers off-guard, and how does he keep us guessing? What questions remain unanswered by the end of the tale? What are some possible (and plausible) answers to those questions? What evidence in the text supports those possible answers? What evidence conflicts with those answers?
4. Discuss the ways in which this story reflects changes that were taking place in southern culture during the decades described in this tale. Do some historical research and then discuss the ways the story reflects its era. How are the different generations described in this story typical of their times?

Light in August* (1932)

After a long journey (much of it on foot), pregnant Lena Grove arrives in Jefferson, Mississippi, in search of Lucas Burch, the father of her child, who is living there under the name Joe Brown; instead of finding Burch, however, Lena encounters a friendly man named Byron Bunch, who immediately takes a kindly (but also romantic) interest in her and who seeks advice and help from his one real friend, Gail Hightower, a former minister who now lives in isolation, having long been ostracized by the town because of an obsessive personality that led to the scandalous death of his unfaithful wife. Burch (alias Brown) is the junior partner in the illegal sale of alcohol by Joe Christmas, a bitter, violent man whose entire life has been warped by the suspicion (never confirmed) that his father was black; Christmas and Burch live in a cabin on the property of Joanna Burden, an aging, isolated spinster with whom Christmas has a complicated relationship full of passionate sex and psychological tension. When Burden one day threatens Christmas with a gun, he kills her with a knife, sets fire to her house, flees, is pursued, and takes refuge in the house of Gail Hightower, where he is eventually found, shot, and castrated by a fanatical racist named Percy Grimm; meanwhile, as the book concludes, Lena, having by now given birth to her baby, continues her search for Lucas Burch, accompanied by the ever-faithful Byron Bunch.

Despite its often melodramatic plot and its sometimes implausible characters, Light in August is widely considered one of Faulkner's best novels, particularly because of the ways it explores the racial tensions that shaped the southern past and continue to affect the southern present. Joe Christmas is the obvious symbol of this central theme: His entire life, from his earliest childhood until the moment of his death, is warped and twisted by the mere possibility (which is never actually confirmed) that his father may have been black. Although Joe looks white enough to pass easily as a Caucasian, he is haunted by the private suspicion (and the public rumor) that he may possess black blood—a possibility that subjects him not only to internal torment but especially to social prejudice and persecution. Thus, through the depiction of Christmas (but also through the depictions of such other characters as Gail Hightower and Joanna Burden), Faulkner deals with one of his favorite themes: the inevitable impact of history on the present moment. Christmas's life is distorted by the whole tradition of American racial prejudice, especially in the South; Hightower's life is distorted by his preoccupation with the allegedly glorious deeds of his long-dead Confederate grandfather; while Joanna Burden's life is deformed by the teachings of her own northern ancestors, who long ago instructed her that blacks are an inescapable burden for whom whites are responsible. Her family's attitudes have alienated her from the town in which she lives, and those attitudes also ultimately lead to her own violent death when she tries to force her views on Christmas, the "black" man with whom she has been having a clandestine affair. In his presentation of all these characters (as well as others, such as Percy Grimm, a violent racist, and Simon McEachern, a religious fanatic), Faulkner shows how attitudes inherited from the past almost inexorably affect the present, often in highly destructive ways. Human beings, in Faulkner's novels, are hardly ever entirely free or totally independent agents; instead, they are almost always trapped in sticky webs spun in the often-distant past. It is this emphasis on the profound effects of history that so often makes the tone of Faulkner's works so gloomy and so tragic.

The impact of the past on the present is, however, only one of a number of important themes emphasized in Light in August. For instance, another key problem explored in this book is the struggle to achieve a whole and satisfying sense of identity. This dilemma is, in fact, the key challenge facing Joe Christmas, who is the most conflicted and therefore in some ways the most complex and fascinating character in the novel. From the beginning, Joe has never known exactly who he is: His father was killed (by Joe's own racist maternal grandfather) before the boy was born; his mother died in childbirth; his earliest days were spent in an orphanage; his later years were spent with foster parents; and even his name—Joe Christmas—was invented off the cuff to reflect the day on which he arrived at the orphanage. Joe's background, personality, and motivations always remain somewhat mysterious, both to him and to Faulkner's readers, but Joe is only one of a number of characters in this novel who seem to lack stable and consistent identities. Joanna Burden is another example: At first an isolated spinster, she soon evolves into Joe's sex-starved lover, then becomes suddenly frigid, then reverts to a kind of religious and social fanaticism that leads, eventually, to her bizarre attempt to kill Joe and herself—an attempt that ultimately results in her own violent murder. Joanna (like Joe, whose name resembles her own) is an enigmatic personality who can sometimes appear so strange that she can occasionally seem unreal or unconvincing—a mere figment of Faulkner's overheated imagination rather than a recognizable human being. Still, the fact that both Joe and Joanna are often so difficult to know or comprehend also contributes to another important theme of Light in August—the theme of isolation. Many of the characters in this book are cut off from society either literally, figuratively, or both: Joe lives in a rundown shack where his only companion is Brown/Burch, with whom Joe frequently fights; Joanna lives alone in a distant house, where her only significant contacts (with Joe) are often violent; Hightower is an exile who, ostracized by the community, shuts himself off in a lonely dwelling; and Byron Bunch, kindhearted as he is, is mostly a loner until Lena unexpectedly enters his life. Like many other characters in various other Faulkner novels (such as The Sound and the Fury and As I Lay Dying), the important characters in Light in August are often cut off from satisfying, meaningful relationships. Human isolation is one of the most frequent and significant themes in many of Faulkner's best books.

Other themes commonly emphasized elsewhere in Faulkner's fiction also appear in Light in August. The tragic legacy of southern racism, for instance, is one of the most important aspects of this novel. Joe is the obvious victim of this legacy: The mere possibility that he may be of mixed-race parentage corrupts his relations with his family, his friends, his lovers, and his society, and it also undermines any chance of his ever achieving a confident sense of coherent selfhood. His life, ironically, might be easier if he were entirely black; he would then at least belong to one defined and established community. Instead, he is the perfect embodiment of the traditional character type known as the tragic mulatto. In his case, however, the ironies of this status are even greater than usual since it is not even certain that he is indeed of mixed blood. He suffers (psychologically as well as socially) because of a status that may, in his case, not even be "real." People's opinions of him change instantly for the worse as soon as they suspect that he may be partly black, and corrupt characters (such as the dietitian in the orphanage or the greedy Lucas Burch) are easily able to use his allegedly mixed parentage against him. By depicting such behavior, Faulkner also implies that "race" is as much a social construction—as much a matter of interpretation—as it is a biological "fact": It matters less who Christmas actually is than who he is perceived to be. However, the fact that he is the victim of such vicious prejudice seems all the more ironic because of the presence of another important theme: corrupt Christianity. Christmas lives, after all, in a society nominally devoted to a god of love, mercy, and compassion, yet some of the least attractive features of that society result from religious fanaticism. Christmas's grandfather and foster father both pervert the true spirit of Christianity in highly unattractive ways; each man is vicious partly because he believes such conduct reflects God's will. Faulkner shows how Christianity, far from being an inevitable antidote to racism, often served to reinforce it.

Faulkner makes his treatment of Christian themes in this novel all the more tantalizing by hinting at various parallels between Joe Christmas and Jesus Christ. Obviously they share the same initials, and Joe's name also associates him explicitly with the birthday of the Christian messiah. Other resemblances also exist. Thus, the true identity of each man's father is a matter of concern and speculation; each man attracts a seemingly loyal follower who ultimately betrays him in pursuit of money; each man is captured on a Friday; and each man is 33 when he dies. Yet the differences between the two figures far outweigh any similarities: Joe is selfish, violent, sullen, and often vicious; he lacks any sense of a higher calling or any conviction of a deeper identity; and his death lacks any transcendent or transformative meaning. Joe is, then, in some ways the reverse image of Jesus, and any parallels between them merely help call attention to their far more important distinctions. Yet the character with whom Joe most strikingly contrasts is Lena. Although these two figures never actually meet and are hardly even aware of each other (certainly Joe never learns of Lena's existence), obviously their stories are the two central strands from which the novel is woven, and just as obviously Faulkner juxtaposes these two narratives to highlight their differences. While Joe is complex, Lena is simple; while Joe is tormented, Lena is uncannily self-assured; whereas Joe is grim, violent, deadly, and ultimately dead, Lena is serenely optimistic, full of goodwill, literally full of life, and finally a nursing mother. Lena is essentially a comic figure in both senses of that term: Sometimes her actions and words (such as the very last words of the novel) provoke real smiles, but always her presence provokes a sense of the most positive and most hopeful aspects of human existence. She is kindhearted, gentle tempered, somewhat naive, and completely guileless, and she almost always draws out the best in the many people she encounters during her journey. Her positive impact on Byron Bunch is extreme in degree but is not unique in nature: Her mere presence inspires him to acts of generosity, compassion, and self-sacrifice, and she has a similar impact on various other characters (including Gail Hightower) with whom she has contact. If anything, it is Lena—not the intriguingly named Joe Christmas—who comes closest to exemplifying (and evoking in others) the virtues often associated with Christian faith, and it is largely thanks to the presence of Lena that Light in August is not entirely dark and grim. Indeed, despite the fact that it features a near-beheading and an actual castration, this book is in some ways one of the sunniest of Faulkner's major novels. Lena Grove—whose last name itself implies an abundance of green life—is in some ways the embodiment of Faulkner's underlying optimism about the fundamental, eternal rhythms of nature and life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Joe Christmas in Light in August with Jim Casy in John Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath. In what ways does each figure resemble and/or differ from Jesus Christ? How and why does each author seem to employ allusions to the story of Christ? How do such allusions contribute to the tone, resonance, and meaning of each work?
2. Read Faulkner's novel alongside NELLA LARSEN's novel titled Passing. Discuss the roles of race, and of race mixing, in each work. How do geographical settings affect the "mixed-race" characters in each novel? How are their lives affected by their different genders and social classes? How does each character deal with the challenges posed by his or her ethnic background?
3. How are the themes of isolation and of social pressures explored in Faulkner's novel and in EUGENE O'NEILL's play The Hairy Ape? How are the positions, attitudes, and responses of Joe Christmas and Yank comparable and distinct? What roles do women play in the lives and fates of both of these characters? How are the deaths of the two characters comparable and/or different?

4. Choose a particular chapter in the book and discuss its significance in the entire narrative. What characters, themes, settings, and patterns of imagery does that chapter emphasize, and how are all those factors connected to the larger narrative? How does the chosen chapter relate to the chapters that precede and follow it? How would the book seem different if a reader skipped the chosen chapter? What would the reader lose by doing so?

Absalom, Absalom!* (1936)

After a mysterious outsider named Thomas Sutpen arrives one day in the early 19th century in the north Mississippi town of Jefferson, he proceeds to buy a huge tract of land, on which he and his slaves eventually build an imposing house; Sutpen then marries Ellen Coldfield, who bears him a daughter named Judith and a son named Henry. When Henry attends college, he befriends a charming but mysterious figure named Charles Bon, to whom his sister eventually becomes unofficially engaged, even though Thomas Sutpen privately expresses his strong disapproval to Henry. Only when Sutpen eventually tells Henry that Charles is not only Henry's brother (from an early alliance Thomas had in Haiti) but also partly black does Henry kill Charles to prevent the marriage—an act that ultimately leads to the destruction of all of Sutpen's ambitions for power, prestige, status, and an heir to help establish a lasting dynasty.

As so often in Faulkner's fiction, the most interesting aspect of this novel is less the plot itself than the styles, structures, and techniques the author employs to tell the story. In this work he uses four different main narrators to relate the "facts" of the plot, but these narrators are so distinct in their personalities, so diverse in their biases and motives, and so varied in their actual familiarity with the events and people they describe that readers, by the end of the book, can easily come away confused—confused not only about what, exactly, "really" happened but especially about the significance (if any) of the events the narrators relate. The first narrator is Miss Rosa Coldfield, an elderly spinster whose sister Ellen was Sutpen's wife. At the time she tells her tale, Miss Rosa still strongly detests the long-dead Sutpen and regards him as almost demonic, and her fevered account of his acts and character, which she relates decades after his demise, is obviously colored by her contempt and disdain. Miss Rosa tells her story to young Quentin Compson, the Harvard undergraduate who is also a central character in Faulkner's novel The Sound and the Fury, and Quentin himself also becomes a chief narrator of the Sutpen saga. In addition, Quentin collects information and perspectives on Sutpen from his own father, Jason Compson III, who in turn heard reports from his father, General Jason Lycurgus Compson II, who actually knew Sutpen and was indeed one of Sutpen's few real friends. Finally, yet another perspective is added by Quentin's Harvard roommate, a Canadian named Shrevlin ("Shreve") McCannon, who at first seems to mock the tale Quentin tells him but who soon becomes so caught up in it that he eventually narrates events he could not possibly know about directly. To make matters even more complex, the novel opens (deceptively) with the voice of a seemingly all-knowing third-person narrator, who quickly introduces Rosa and Quentin and then just as quickly disappears for long stretches at a time, appearing again only intermittently, so that the story is told mainly from the limited perspectives of Rosa, Quentin, Quentin's father, and Shreve, not to mention in letters written by a number of different characters. Other factors contribute even further to the narrative complexity (or confusion). Thus, sometimes Faulkner uses quotation marks to indicate clearly who is speaking; sometimes he does not. Sometimes he employs italics for one purpose; sometimes he employs them for another. Moreover, the standards of strict chronology are often ignored; it is not until late in the book, for instance, that we learn why Sutpen felt the need to build a grand house and found a dynasty, and likewise it is not until long after we hear of Bon's murder that we discover the probable reason for his death. Thus, in this novel as so often elsewhere, Faulkner deliberately makes matters difficult for his readers; he wants us to work and strain to untangle whatever meanings or significance his story may possess.

Part of his point, of course, is to make us not only think about but also actually feel and experience the difficulty of making sense of any events and personalities, especially those from the past. All narration, all history, necessarily involves large elements of subjective interpretation, and we can never be entirely sure that our own interpretations—or those of anyone else—are ever entirely accurate or reliable. Paradoxically, the more some of Faulkner's narrators (such as Miss Rosa or Shreve) insist on the truth of their accounts, the more skeptical we, as readers, must be, and by the end of the novel we cannot be entirely sure who (if anyone) has anything like an accurate understanding of what has happened or why. Faulkner thus re-creates in his readers some of the same kind of uncertainty and insecurity felt by many of his characters. Just as the characters must rely on their memories of the events they have either experienced or heard about, so must we, and just as the characters often draw conclusions based on incomplete or conflicting evidence, so do we. As numerous commentators have remarked, Absalom, Absalom! resembles a highly elaborate detective novel in which readers are forced to try to piece together not only the basic elements of the story but also the natures of the characters and the meanings of their actions. Yet Faulkner's book, unlike most detective fiction, lacks any neat resolution or ultimate sense of tidy meaning. The basic story is told over and over again by each new narrator, but each new narrator adds his or her own perspective while also supplying information (or making claims) not heard before. Thus the novel becomes more and more complex as it develops, until finally we cannot be quite sure whom or what (if anything) to believe. In one sense the work does build to a climax—We finally do discover why (apparently) Henry kills his stepbrother—but in another sense our understanding of events becomes less certain as each new voice is heard and as each new sentence unravels. If Absalom, Absalom! is indeed a mystery novel, it is one that is in some ways even more mysterious at its end than at its beginning.

The process of reading the book has also been compared to that of working a crossword puzzle, but this analogy is flawed, since the process of working a puzzle results in clear, correct, and definite answers. In contrast, a reader of Absalom, Absalom! feels less certain, less sure of its meanings at the end of the book than at the beginning.

It is easy, then, to view Absalom, Absalom! as a book that “deconstructed” itself long before the term deconstruction was ever invented. In other words, the book seems to illustrate perfectly the recent idea that textual “meanings” are inevitably deferred and postponed and that interpretive certainty can therefore only be an illusion. Nevertheless, commentators have discovered in Faulkner's novel many themes or motifs that, they believe, help give the book coherence and significance. Certainly the common Faulknerian themes of incest, racial tension, race mixing, conflict between siblings, conflict between parents and children, and connections between sex and death are all present in this book, and likewise the novel also illustrates once again Faulkner's continuing concern with moral corruption, with the decay of southern society, and with the ways such corruption has contributed to such decay. As with many works by Faulkner, this novel also shows how strongly the past impinges on the present, and it likewise demonstrates how one's view of the past is always inevitably affected by one's present (and inevitably limited) perspective. The book not only explores but also makes a reader participate in the uncertainty of human knowledge, especially knowledge of the deepest motives of other people. And, as in much of Faulkner's fiction, this novel shows how often and how closely issues of race and issues of family are intertwined. Many commentators have remarked how ironic it seems that Henry is apparently willing to allow his sister to commit incest by marrying her half brother but cannot tolerate the thought that she might marry a man whose ancestry is partly black. Analysts have noted that just as the Civil War was fought because southerners would not admit blacks to full membership in society, so Henry kills Bon because he cannot tolerate having a black in the family. Of course, a few skeptical commentators have wondered why Thomas Sutpen did not simply tell his children of Bon's black ancestry from the beginning and thus prevent all the complications and tragic consequences that ensued from keeping the matter secret for so long. In this respect, as in a number of others (such commentators have argued), the novel is unrealistic. Mere realism, though, was rarely Faulkner's main concern; he is more often interested in suggestive symbolism than in simple plausibility.

It goes without saying that most of the commentary about this novel's characters has centered on Thomas Sutpen himself. He is indeed a highly intriguing figure and has been the subject of extensive critical discussion. For some analysts he is the embodiment of every flaw of the Old South—the personification of all the corruption, abuse, selfishness, and exploitative impulses that finally resulted in the destruction of the prewar southern system. For other critics, in contrast, Sutpen is an interloper who is the antithesis of all the best aspects and potential of southern culture. He is calculating, rationalistic, opportunistic, and driven by a desire for money and status; for these critics, in other words, Sutpen is a kind of closet Yankee who symbolizes the rise of forces that would eventually undermine any hope for a civilized southland. Likewise, while some critics (resembling Miss Rosa) see Sutpen as almost totally evil, others view him as a dynamic, almost mythic personality—larger than life, full of energy, heroic in his ambitions, and tragic in his flaws. For some commentators Sutpen resembles a figure from ancient Greek tragedy—a figure doomed by the very qualities of character that make him stand out. For other analysts Sutpen is the epitome of self-centered American individualism—a man driven by greed to succeed at any and all costs, a man determined to stamp his own overbearing identity on the land, on other people, and on history itself. He is a person so full of pride, arrogance, and self-regard that he treats other people merely as disposable instruments in the pursuit of his own grand design. Ironically, his ambition was born when he felt lack of respect as a youth, but he then proceeds to spend a lifetime treating others with massive disrespect, often provoking their hatred and their desire for vengeance. Bon, for instance, desires little more than recognition and acknowledgment; it is partly Sutpen's refusal simply to confess his paternity to Bon that makes Bon want to destroy his own father.

However one reacts to Sutpen or interprets the novel as a whole, and however one responds to the structural or technical innovations the book exhibits, there seems little denying the stylistic energy and inventiveness of Faulkner's language here. From the first page until the last, the book is a linguistic tour de force: The phrasing is memorable and often mesmerizing in ways that seem less consistently true of some of Faulkner's earlier important novels. The sentences frequently roll on and on, clause added to clause, word piled upon word, often without concern for conventional punctuation but frequently fresh and vivid and often even startling in their combinations and ranges of resonance. Take, for instance, the first half of a long sentence that describes a sudden appearance by Sutpen: "Out of quiet thunderclap he would abrupt (man-horse-demon) upon a scene peaceful and decorous as a schoolprize water color, faint sulphur-reek still in hair clothes and beard" (Absalom, Absalom! 8). Among the various strengths of this sentence, one notes especially the surprising paradox of "quiet thunderclap"; the invented, inventive verb ("abrupt upon"); the vivid, jumbled imagery ("man-horse-demon"); the concocted but convincing adjective ("schoolprize"); the newly coined noun ("sulphur-reek"); and the clutter of unpunctuated, jammed-together substantives ("hair clothes and beard"). Any of these features, taken by itself, would make us sit up and pay attention; run together, as they are, in a single sentence, they attract particular notice. The important point, though, is that there are literally thousands of such sentences—thousands of such startling moments—in this novel, and the even more important point is that for the most part such sentences do not seem mere stunts or tricks. For the most part they contribute to the power and effectiveness of the book and to the credibility of the characterization. In this novel more, perhaps, than in any other, Faulkner shows himself to be the kind of prose poet—the lover and master of sounds, rhythms, images, symbols, and meanings—that he always aspired to be. In this book his linguistic inventiveness and sureness of step are almost Shakespearean, and one concludes the novel feeling that whatever the book may or may not mean, it adds immensely to our sense of the potential and resources of the English language.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Faulkner himself compared this book to Wallace Stevens's poem "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird." In what ways is the comparison appropriate? How are the two works similar in structure, technique, purpose, and meanings? How do they differ, especially in terms of style? In what ways do both works reflect the tendencies of modernism in literature, not only in the ways in which they are written but also in what they seem to assume about reality and truth?
2. Compare and contrast Faulkner's book with THORNTON WILDER's novel The Bridge of San Luis Rey. How do both works deal with the problem of trying to explain historical events and personalities? How are the works similar and/or distinct in the moral stances they imply and in the styles they employ? How does each work try to re-create, in convincing and credible ways, a particular culture and historical period?
3. How is Thomas Sutpen similar to and/or different from Wolf Larsen in JACK LONDON's novel The Sea Wolf? Discuss the two men in terms of their education, their personalities, their ambitions, their ways of treating other people, and their final fates. In what ways does each figure reflect his culture and his historical era? In what ways is each figure simultaneously attractive and repellent? What are each man's strengths and weaknesses?
4. Choose a small passage from the novel (a paragraph or less) and discuss the effectiveness of its phrasing. What, precisely, makes the language vivid and memorable? How does the chosen passage use such techniques as imagery, rhythms, sound effects, and sentence structure? What, precisely, makes the passage "worth reading" and worth recommending to other readers?

"Barn Burning" (1939)

Named after a legendary Civil War figure, Colonel Sartoris Snopes—or "Sarty"—is actually the 10-year-old son of Abner Snopes, a onetime horse thief and habitual barn burner who moves his poor white family from one sharecropping job to another, usually after he is expelled from the previous community in which his arrogant, vengeful character has earned him enemies. Although most members of Sarty's family (with the exception of his mother and aunt) seem untroubled by Ab's destructive habits, young Sarty feels increasingly torn between loyalty to his "pap" and an inherent sense of what is right and proper. Finally, when Ab sets out one night with the intention of burning the barn of Major de Spain (his wealthy current employer), Sarty breaks free from his mother's confining grasp, runs to the major's mansion, warns the major of what is about to happen, and then runs away, knowing that he may have put his father's life at risk and knowing, too, that in any case he has forever broken his links with his family.

"Barn Burning" is often read as a coming-of-age story in which Sarty faces a crucial moral dilemma and makes the right ethical choice despite the personal sacrifices that choice entails. Although Sarty admires his father (partly because he thinks Ab performed heroic service during the Civil War, when in fact Ab was a thief who stole horses from both sides), eventually Sarty realizes that he must place his obligations to the community and to higher standards of conscience above his loyalty to his own kin. The story can therefore be read as a tale of moral maturation in which the 10-year-old Sarty is actually more of an adult (in all the crucial senses of that word) than his own abusive, domineering, and hate-filled father. Some critics, however, feel a certain sympathy and understanding for Ab; rather than regarding him as a complete villain, they argue that he is a man of immense willpower, determination, and self-regard who protests, in his own destructive ways, against real injustices and inequalities in the social and economic systems of the traditional South. From this perspective, Major de Spain is not an entirely blameless victim; he is the beneficiary of a rigidly hierarchical social structure that oppresses not only all blacks but many poor whites as well. One problem with this reading, however, is that Ab seems full of contempt and abuse toward practically everyone, regardless of race, class, or family background, and indeed the most frequent victims of his abuse are the members of his own family. With his fierce pride, crippled foot, and love of fire, he is clearly in many ways a Satanic figure, and certainly he repeatedly disrupts any chances his family (not to mention the surrounding communities) may have for peace and stability. Ab's moral handicap is far more serious than his physical affliction, and although he is constantly on the move, he never grows or develops. He is an essentially static character whose self-assertiveness leads to self-imprisonment, whereas Sarty changes and develops, moving from passivity to activity and from actual childhood to real ethical maturity. His separation from his father and family will, ironically, make it possible for him to join (and become a productive member of) society as a whole. His disloyalty to his "pap" signals his growing allegiance to values more important than simple security, convenience, or comfort.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Ab Snopes with the father figures in such stories by Sherwood Anderson as "Mother" and "Death in the Woods." How does Ab resemble and/or differ from those fathers? What admirable traits, if any, do these fathers possess? Why does Faulkner refrain from making Ab a total villain? How would the story be less effective if Ab displayed absolutely no redeeming qualities? What redeeming qualities does he in fact possess?
2. Discuss the relations between father, mother, and children in this story and in Zora Neale Hurston's novel Jonah's Gourd Vine. How are the fathers in both works presented in ambivalent ways? How do the mothers in both works resemble and/or differ from one another? Discuss the roles of race and class in both works.
3. Compare and contrast Ab Snopes with Emily Grierson's father in "A Rose for Emily." How is each child's life shaped by the influence of his or her father? How does Sarty's response to his father differ from Emily's to hers? What are some possible reasons for the differences in their responses?
4. How are women presented in this story? How do the female characters differ from and/or resemble one another? What functions do they have in the narrative? How and why are their relations with the male characters significant or revealing?

"The Bear" (1942)

The story describes the participation of young Ike McCaslin (who is 16 during parts of the story but younger and older in other parts) in yearly hunting trips in the Mississippi woods with a number of older men, including a primitive woodsman named Boon Hogganbeck and a highly talented, half-black, half-Indian hunter named Sam Fathers, who teaches Ike the proper attitudes and skills needed to survive and succeed in the forest. Each year the men hunt a huge, wily, and ferocious black bear known as Old Ben, whom Ike glimpses on several occasions but who seems immune to the hunters' efforts and weapons; only when the bear is pursued by a huge, half-wild dog named Lion does Boon finally succeed in killing Ben with a knife, after which Sam himself dies. In the fourth section of the five-part story, an older Ike repudiates his inheritance of property—an inheritance that he considers morally tainted by his family's and his region's ethical corruption—and in section 5 Ike becomes increasingly aware of the destructive impact of humans on the vanishing wilderness.

"The Bear" exists in two main versions: a four-part story (focusing mainly on various hunts) originally published in the Saturday Evening Post, and a five-part work (in which an added fourth section is almost as long as the other four sections put together) that was published as part of Faulkner's book Go Down, Moses. The added section is immensely complex in style and content; by providing extensive background about Ike McCaslin's family, it adds greatly not only to the length of the entire work but also to its moral implications and historical resonance. To make matters even more complicated, Faulkner insisted that Go Down, Moses was a coherent text (a novel, in fact), thus implying that any interpretation of “The Bear” had to take into account the relations between that narrative and the rest of the book. Faulkner’s publishers, however, labeled Go Down, Moses as a collection of stories, and in fact most critics tend to treat the five-part version of “The Bear” as a generally self-sufficient work, coherent in and of itself. At the same time, however, they also acknowledge that “The Bear,” like many of Faulkner’s writings, is part of a larger, more comprehensive narrative that focuses on the same small part of northern Mississippi and that features many of the same characters, events, and themes. Interpreting “The Bear” (in short) is no easy task, and efforts to make sense of the work have resulted in much critical disagreement.

Most analysts, however, do concur that the story is a tale of maturation, education, and initiation, in which Ike McCaslin develops from a young boy into a young man. Most cultures around the world have “rites of initiation” in which girls and boys (but especially boys) are encouraged or forced to put their childish ways behind them and develop into members of the adult community. In Faulkner’s story, Ike’s participation in the hunting trips serves this crucial function; as he learns the skills of a woodsman, he also learns the values and qualities of character that should permit him to function as a successful and respected adult. His mentor in this process is the aptly named Sam Fathers, who clearly functions as a kind of paternal figure in this work. Unlike many other fathers in Faulkner’s fiction, Sam is a worthy role model for his surrogate son, and the bond that forms between Sam and Ike (despite their different racial backgrounds) exemplifies Faulkner’s ideal of the brotherhood that might ideally exist between all people of maturity and goodwill, whatever their cultural differences. By participating in the hunts under Sam’s tutelage, Ike learns valuable lessons about himself, about nature, about other people, and even perhaps about man’s proper place in the universe. From this perspective, then, Old Ben the bear symbolizes nature itself—wild but beautiful, sometimes threatening but worthy of our respect and veneration. It is significant that neither Ike nor Sam participates in the actual killing of Ben (although each has opportunities to kill him), and it is also significant that Ben’s true nemesis is the dog named Lion—another force of nature. Boon finally kills Ben not with a gun (a mechanical instrument) but with a knife (a more primitive, “natural” weapon), and he is prompted to act partly by his desire to save Lion, the dog to whom he has become attached. In the end, though, Ben, Lion, and Sam all die as a result of this crucial hunt, and Ike is left behind—not only older but also wiser. By the end of the five-part tale, both Ike and we realize that the deaths of Ben, Lion, and Sam helped symbolize the passing of old values and old ways of life: At the conclusion of the narrative, the wilderness itself seems to be disappearing before Ike’s very eyes. The lessons he learned from Sam (and also from Ben) are perhaps becoming less and less relevant in a world that is rapidly changing under the force of modern technological “progress,” in which nature is exploited rather than respected, raped rather than loved.

Concerning the foregoing points, most commentators are agreed. There is much less agreement, however, concerning the lengthy fourth section of the narrative, which appeared when the work was published as part of Go Down, Moses. That section—in which Ike hunts not for a bear but for the truth about his family’s past, and in which he learns not so much about external nature as about the nature of human corruption—culminates in Ike’s decision to repudiate his right to inherit his family’s property after he learns that his grandfather not only fathered a half-black daughter but that he then later committed incest with her. Ike thus feels that his inheritance (like the South itself) has been tainted by a legacy of racial injustice and dehumanizing abuse, and so he turns his back not only on his own property but on the very idea of private property in general. For some critics, Ike’s decision is virtuous and heroic: Having learned courage and wisdom of one sort in the wilderness, he now displays courage and wisdom of another sort in his rejection of the heritage of his family

- help intensify or reinforce? What has been the attitude toward incest in most cultures throughout the world, and how and why might these attitudes have affected Faulkner's treatment of the theme?
- Trace the depiction of female characters in at least three different works by Faulkner. What continuities exist from work to work? What differences exist? How does Faulkner tend to depict females in symbolic ways? How are his depictions of them affected by such issues as race, class, and historical period?
 - Black characters frequently appear in Faulkner's fiction. Are there any patterns in the ways they tend to be presented? How do Faulkner's depictions of blacks reflect the attitudes of his era and region? How (if at all) do his depictions of blacks go beyond conventional stereotypes? How and why is race such an important theme in Faulkner's fiction? What symbolic functions do blacks sometimes serve in his writings?
 - Faulkner is famous for often writing exceptionally long, incredibly complex sentences. Sometimes these sentences go on for a page or more. Choose one of these sentences and analyze it in detail. How is it organized? What kind of structure, rhythm, diction, and sound effects does it display? How is the sentence effective in creating particular rhetorical effects? Are the length and structure of the sentence justified or is the sentence merely a gimmick? What do long, complex, tangled sentences imply about the nature of the experiences they describe?
 - Read a good, detailed biography of Faulkner; focus on one fairly limited period of his life. After doing this research, study one of the works he produced during this limited period. How (if at all) does the work seem to reflect the life Faulkner was living at the time he produced the work? How does the work seem to reflect events, concerns, personalities, and/or feelings you recognize from your study of that period of Faulkner's life? Is knowledge of an author's life necessary to a proper understanding of his works? Why or why not?
 - Choose one particular work by Faulkner and then ask yourself what particular set of ethical values (if any) seems to be implied by that work. What kind of conduct does the work seem to suggest is valuable, worthy, or right? What kind of conduct does the work seem to suggest is detestable, blameworthy, or wrong? Does the work in fact endorse—either explicitly or implicitly—any kind of moral code? Support your argument with detailed evidence from the text.
 - Choose one of Faulkner's most stylistically and technically innovative works, such as The Sound and the Fury, As I Lay Dying, Light in August, or "The Bear." Explain how and why (if at all) the unconventional stylistic and technical features of the work contribute to the work's effectiveness. How and why would the work be less effective if it had been phrased or structured in more traditional ways? What does Faulkner gain (and/or lose) by departing so radically from traditional methods of storytelling?
 - How would you defend Faulkner against the potential charge that his fiction is too narrow and too parochial—that by focusing so much on the past and present of a tiny part of the South, he neglects to deal with broader, more universal issues and concerns? What themes or features of his writing make it relevant to nonsoutherners? Do some research to determine how and why readers from outside the South and even outside the United States have responded positively to Faulkner's fiction.
 - Choose one common theme of Faulkner's fiction—such as the history of the South, the relationship between past and present, the process of cultural decay, the conflict between distinct classes, the tensions within families, or the tensions between different races—and trace the appearance of that theme in at least one work from at least three different decades. What continuities and/or differences exist in Faulkner's treatment of the chosen theme? How does the theme contribute to the coherence and success of the selected works? How does Faulkner avoid the risk of merely repeating himself in dealing with the chosen theme?

10. Faulkner greatly admired Ernest Hemingway's short novel The Old Man and the Sea. Try to explain why Faulkner might have had such high regard for this work. How and why might the themes, setting, characterization, and "moral" of Hemingway's novel have appealed to Faulkner? How do the style and techniques of Hemingway's work differ from the typical style and techniques of Faulkner? Compare and contrast Hemingway's novella with Faulkner's work "The Bear." How are they similar in plot and theme but dissimilar in phrasing, structure, and other characteristics?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Blotner, Joseph, and Noel Polk. "Chronology." In Novels 1930–1935: As I Lay Dying, Sanctuary, Light in August, Pylon. By William Faulkner. New York: Library of America, 1985.
- Cox, Leland H. William Faulkner: Biographical and Reference Guide. Detroit: Gale, 1982.
- Faulkner, William. Absalom, Absalom! New York: Random House, 1936.
- . Collected Stories. New York: Random House, 1950.
- . Novels 1930–1935: As I Lay Dying, Sanctuary, Light in August, Pylon. Edited by Joseph Blotner and Noel Polk. New York: Library of America, 1985.
- . Novels 1942–1954: Go Down, Moses, Intruder in the Dust, Requiem for a Nun, A Fable. Edited by Joseph Blotner and Noel Polk. New York: Library of America, 1994.
- . The Sound and the Fury. Edited by David Minter. New York: Norton, 1987.
- Karl, Frederick R. William Faulkner, American Writer: A Biography. New York: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1989.
- McHaney, Thomas L. William Faulkner: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1976.
- Padgett, John B. William Faulkner on the Web. Available online. URL: <http://www.mcsr.olemiss.edu/~egjbp/faulkner/faulkner.html>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Volpe, Edmond L. A Reader's Guide to William Faulkner. New York: Noonday, 1964.

Robert C. Evans

F. SCOTT FITZGERALD (1896–1940)

It eluded us then, but no matter—tomorrow we will run faster, stretch out our arms further. . . . And one fine morning—So we beat on, boats against the current, borne back ceaselessly into the past.

(The Great Gatsby)

During his lifetime, F. Scott Fitzgerald was a celebrity of sorts. Despite never graduating, he remains one of Princeton's best-known alumni. He and his wife, Zelda, embodied the ideals of the roaring twenties (and the Jazz Age, a term coined by Fitzgerald) through their carefree and extravagant lifestyle. They spent money freely, moved around the United States and Europe almost constantly, and both broke down famously and tragically. Although he did spend time among the expatriate community in Paris, Fitzgerald's works remain quintessentially American, concerning themselves with such subjects as the American dream, failed illusions, and Hollywood.

Francis Scott Key Fitzgerald was born in St. Paul, Minnesota, on September 24, 1896. Young Scott was spoiled by his mother, Mollie, who had inherited money from her father, an Irish immigrant who had become one of the most successful businessmen in St. Paul. In contrast, Scott's father, Edward, was largely unsuccessful. The family moved regularly, but they had a good standard of living because of Mollie's money.

Scott was a voracious reader and a writer from a young age. Although he was always small, he dreamed of athletic success and, throughout his life, worshipped star athletes. In addition, Scott desired popularity and respect from his peers. He was good-looking and always dressed well. Scott played with the children of the wealthy in St. Paul, but he considered himself an outsider: "his sense of differentness in St. Paul sharpened his skills as a social observer and shaped his lifelong self-consciousness" (Brucoli 25).

In 1908, Scott started at St. Paul Academy, where he played football and baseball and was labeled a show-off. His desire for recognition and his tendency to boast sometimes annoyed his peers, but he was very socially active, always organizing activities at the center of a large group. He published his first story in the school magazine in 1909.

From the beginning Scott was a poor student; although he enjoyed writing, he found school assignments dull. In 1911 the family decided that he needed more discipline and he was sent to the Newman School, a Catholic boarding school in New Jersey. While at Newman he was unhappy and unsuccessful, but he was drawn to the idea of Princeton University and to the excitement of New York. During the summers in St. Paul he wrote, directed, and performed in plays; each year these were quite successful.

Despite his poor academic record at Newman and an unimpressive showing on the entrance exams, Scott was admitted to Princeton in fall 1913. He loved it at Princeton; he particularly approved of the focus on social success and the hero worship accorded to star athletes. He tried out for football but did not make it past the first week. He turned instead to the Princeton Tiger, the humor magazine, and the Triangle Club, an organization that produced original musical comedies. He made friends, but once again he was a bit of an outsider because he was from an obscure prep school.

Throughout his Princeton career Fitzgerald did poorly in his classes, and his frequent failures put him in the position of having to take extra makeup classes. In the beginning of his junior year, he failed his makeup exam in qualitative analysis and therefore was ineligible for campus offices, including the presidency of the Triangle Club. Fitzgerald never recovered from this disappointment: "To me college would never be the same. There were to be no badges of pride, no medals, after all. It seemed on one March afternoon that I had lost every single thing I wanted." (The Crack-Up, qtd. in Bruccoli 60). In November Fitzgerald was in the infirmary twice and, after Christmas, he dropped out of college for the rest of the year to recuperate. He was adamant that he had not been expelled for his academic failures, although this was indeed partly the case.

He returned to Princeton in September 1916 to repeat his junior year and continued in the same pattern, finding his classes boring and throwing himself into extracurricular pursuits. He published a play, four stories, three poems, and five book reviews in a magazine called the Lit. After America entered World War I, Fitzgerald signed up for a military training program. Home for the summer, he took the exam for an infantry commission and then reported for training in November 1917. He spent much of his time during training camp writing a novel, because he expected to be killed in battle and wanted to leave a legacy. He finished the book, which he called "The Romantic Egoist," in February 1918 and submitted it to Charles Scribner's Sons. Scribner eventually rejected the work, although the rejection letter said that the book displayed a great deal of originality.

In March Fitzgerald reported to his infantry regiment in Kentucky. The regiment was soon transferred to Montgomery, Alabama, to prepare for overseas service. It was in Montgomery that Fitzgerald met 18-year-old Zelda Sayre, one of the most popular and sought-after belles of the town. During summer 1918 Fitzgerald managed to become Zelda's primary suitor, although she continued to date other men.

The war ended before Fitzgerald's regiment could leave for France, and he was somewhat disappointed at "missing" the war and a chance to prove himself. By the end of the year he had decided he wanted to marry Zelda, but she hesitated to marry an unpublished writer with little money. Therefore, after his discharge from the army, Fitzgerald went to New York to try to earn enough money so that Zelda would marry him. He worked for an advertising agency and spent his nights writing stories, accumulating rejections in the process.

After a failed attempt to convince Zelda to marry him immediately, he quit his job and decided to return to St. Paul to buckle down and write a novel. He holed himself up in his parents' house and wrote steadily. The typescript of This Side of Paradise (much of which was transferred, and still more reworked from "The Romantic Egoist") was accepted by Scribner on September 16, 1919. The novel was published on March 26, 1920, and the first 3,000 copies were sold within three days. Fitzgerald became famous almost overnight (as he had always expected). Although the novel sold extremely well and was in fact Fitzgerald's most popular book, the sales did not make him rich. Most of Fitzgerald's income in 1920 was from stories; throughout his career, he always regarded short story writing as a way to make money between his novels. He also began the custom of borrowing money from Harold Ober, one of his publishers at Scribner.

Scott and Zelda were married on April 3, 1920, in New York and were immediately swept into a new life of celebrity. They drank, went to parties, and spent money wildly. After a month of living in hotels, Fitzgerald needed a place to work without distractions, and the couple rented a house in Westport, Connecticut. Their life did not settle down entirely, however; there were weekend parties and frequent excursions to New York.

In September 1920, Scribner published a volume of Fitzgerald's stories called Flappers and Philosophers. The book sold well, although reviews were mixed. Fitzgerald continued to work on his next novel, The Beautiful and Damned. Zelda found out in February that she was pregnant, and, after traveling in Europe for three months, the couple settled in St. Paul, where they would stay until late 1922. Their daughter, Frances Scott Fitzgerald (called Scottie), was born October 26, 1921. The Beautiful and Damned was published in book form (after having previously appeared in installments) in March 1922, to a disappointing critical reception, although it did sell reasonably well. In 1922 Fitzgerald wrote an ultimately unsuccessful play, The Vegetable, and Scribner published his second collection of stories, Tales of the Jazz Age, in 1923.

The family moved back to New York, renting a small house in Great Neck. Fitzgerald began drinking more frequently. He continued to write stories, now needing to publish for the money. In April 1924 the Fitzgeralds moved to the French Riviera. There was a near-crisis in their marriage when Zelda became involved with a French aviator named Edouard Jozan, but they reconciled. Fitzgerald's feelings about Zelda's betrayal influenced his portrayal of lost illusions in his next novel, The Great Gatsby. The typescript of Gatsby was sent to Scribner in October 1924. The novel was published in April 1925 and received excellent reviews, despite not selling very well.

After 1925 Fitzgerald found it increasingly difficult to devote extended periods of time to writing. That spring in Paris, Fitzgerald met ERNEST HEMINGWAY, whose chronicle of their meeting in A Moveable Feast portrays Fitzgerald as a drunk. Fitzgerald was always awed and intimidated by Hemingway (especially because of his reputation as a war hero and an athlete). Through Hemingway Fitzgerald also met GERTRUDE STEIN and other expatriate writers. The Fitzgeralds became well known in Paris for various (often drunken) stunts and fought frequently (and publicly).

The family returned to America in December 1926. Their two and a half years abroad had generally been a failure. After staying briefly in Montgomery, Zelda and Scott spent two months in California, where Scott had been invited to write a movie treatment; they hoped to make a good amount of money from this. Instead, the treatment was rejected and they spent much more than the amount of the advance. They settled in a rented house in Delaware and, for the most part, continued their lavish lifestyle. The Fitzgeralds decided to return to Europe in spring 1929 when the lease on their Delaware house expired. During this period Zelda published several stories, partly to pay for ballet lessons, into which she threw herself with increasing fervor. Her behavior started to become somewhat strange. At one point she accused her husband of being a homosexual, a charge for which there was no evidence and that deeply hurt him. Several of the stories Fitzgerald wrote in 1929 explore the theme of marital problems. In Paris Fitzgerald continued to drink and to get into trouble. He did also continue to work on the novel that would eventually become Tender Is the Night, which would be published in 1934.

Zelda continued to exhibit the strain of her intense ballet training and grew nervous and anxious. In April 1930 she entered the Malmaison clinic outside Paris, discharged herself in May against her doctor's advice, and, after trying to resume her training, experienced hallucinations that led her to attempt suicide. She was diagnosed as schizophrenic in June and entered a clinic on Lake Geneva. Fitzgerald split his time between Paris and Switzerland so that he could be close to Zelda, and they exchanged hundreds of letters during the time she was in the clinic. During this period Fitzgerald wrote stories and did not work at all on the novel. Zelda had made a partial recovery by April 1931 and was discharged from the clinic in September, when the family returned to America.

They settled for a time in Montgomery. Scott received an offer to go to Hollywood to write a screenplay; although he did not want to leave Zelda or to delay his novel, he eventually accepted when MGM raised the offering salary. He stayed for five weeks and earned $6,000, although ultimately his screenplay was not used. Zelda's condition worsened again in early 1932, and, in February, Scott took her to a psychiatric clinic in Baltimore.

During this time Scott was working on Tender Is the Night and felt threatened when, after Scribner had published her mostly autobiographical novel, Save Me the Waltz, in fall 1932, Zelda began work on a novel dealing with madness. Tender Is the Night was published serially in early 1934, and then in book form in April. It was not (as commonly believed) a failure, although it was a failure in terms of Fitzgerald's expectations. It sold reasonably well for a novel during the depression.

In February 1934 Zelda was transferred to a sanitarium in New York, but she failed to improve there and in May was admitted in a catatonic condition to a hospital outside Baltimore. She attempted suicide repeatedly while in the hospital. At this point Fitzgerald seems to have accepted that she would never fully recover, and, although he would never consider divorcing her, he basically considered their marriage to be over.

Fitzgerald's fourth story collection, Taps at Reveille, was published in March 1935. The reviews were mainly favorable, but the book did not have huge sales. In 1935 Fitzgerald's tuberculosis had become active, and he spent the summer in North Carolina in a treatment area. He had an affair with a married woman, Beatrice Dance, that summer, but he made it clear that he would never abandon Zelda and ended the affair with a firm letter after Beatrice left North Carolina.

He continued to write stories during 1935, but "Since he was now writing to raise fast money for pressing debts, Fitzgerald was submitting what were really working drafts" (Brucoli 400). In November he returned to North Carolina and wrote a series of confessional essays: "The Crack-Up," "Pasting It Together," and "Handle with Care." Other writers (such as Hemingway) found these pieces embarrassing, and indeed they did somewhat undermine Fitzgerald's reputation, as he had admitted he was a broken man. By summer 1936 he was struggling to sell any stories and was $9,000 in debt to Scribner. By June 1937 he had not sold a story for over a year and his situation was growing desperate. He was drinking frequently and was fairly depressed.

In 1937 he was hired by MGM to work on a movie portrait of himself, and so he went to Hollywood, hopeful that he could launch a new career and rid himself of the more than $22,000 in debt he had accumulated. He worked hard for MGM, but his only screen credit in 18 months was on a film named Three Comrades, based on a novel by Erich Maria Remarque. He did earn a good salary and did not live extravagantly, but he still had very little in savings once his paychecks stopped in 1939.

In July 1937 Fitzgerald met Sheila Graham, a 28-year-old English Hollywood columnist, at a party. They began a relationship that would last until Fitzgerald's death. Fitzgerald had ambivalent feelings about his relationship with Graham: Although he grew to depend on her, their relationship still made him feel guilty. During the time he lived in California Zelda remained in the hospital in Baltimore; he visited her occasionally and they wrote each other frequent letters.

In 1939 he became a freelancer and, without the discipline of a regular job, began drinking steadily again. In what would turn out to be the last time he saw Zelda, they went on a trip to Cuba, where he was continuously drunk. His tuberculosis was also active again at this point. In spring and summer 1939 he returned to short story writing but, after 120 stories, his "ability to write fresh, well-constructed commercial stories was irrecoverable" (Brucoli 457).

In 1939 he began planning a novel about Hollywood, which he thought of as based on the life of the MGM producer Irving Thalberg. It was published posthumously (and unfinished) in 1941 as The Last Tycoon.

Zelda was discharged from the hospital in April 1940 and went to live with her mother in Montgomery. Fitzgerald sent her an allowance every week, but he never considered taking her out to Hollywood.

In December 1940 Fitzgerald had a heart attack at a drugstore and was ordered to rest in bed. He died of another heart attack on December 21 and was buried in Maryland. Zelda continued to live with her mother, voluntarily returning to Highland Mental Hospital during periods of depression. She was there in March 1948 when a fire broke out, and she was one of nine patients who died. She was buried with her husband in Maryland.

This Side of Paradise* (1919)

Fitzgerald's first novel is also his most autobiographical. It traces the life of handsome, rich Amory Blaine, spanning from his childhood through his time at prep school, at Princeton, and in the First World War, with a brief period of aimless drifting afterward. It ends when Amory, only 23, gains some self-awareness after a period of disillusionment; however, returning to Princeton and standing in front of its gates, he demonstrates that this is not sufficient when he cries, "I know myself—and that is all!" (308).

The novel's main subject is the development of Amory's character as he progresses to maturity through a series of disappointments. Amory, like Fitzgerald himself, is influenced primarily in childhood by his mother (indicated by the title of the first chapter, "Amory, Son of Beatrice"). While Beatrice Blaine spoils her son in much the way that Mollie Fitzgerald spoiled Scott, Beatrice has wealth, beauty, style, and a glamorous lifestyle that young Scott only wished his mother possessed.

Amory begins the book with "a sort of aristocratic egotism" (21), combining a sense of his own superiority with the desire to assert this over others: "Vanity, tempered with self-suspicion if not self-knowledge, a sense of people as automatons to his will, a desire to 'pass' as many boys as possible and get to a vague top of the world . . . with this background did Amory drift into adolescence" (22). In his early days at Princeton, Amory's attitude is "I want to be admired" (54).

Throughout his young life, Amory is motivated by dreams of success and greatness, but "It was always the becoming he dreamed of, never the being" (21). Indeed, his initial relationships with girls focus on the conquest rather than the possession; once Myra St. Clair has let him kiss her once, he is no longer interested. The most passionate part of his relationship with a girl named Isabelle takes place before they kiss, and this long-delayed moment is described as "the high point of vanity, the crest of his young egotism" (100). Of course, this achievement is immediately ruined by Amory's failure to be sufficiently sympathetic about the small mark his shirt stud has left on Isabelle's neck, and he no longer views her in the same way after this incident. In the short section "Heroic in General Tone," Amory achieves a small part of the success that Fitzgerald himself never attained when he scores the only touchdown in a prep school football game, and this becomes "a high point in Amory's memory" (36).

Amory's dreams of being a "big man on campus," as did Fitzgerald's own, come crashing down when he fails a makeup exam and is left ineligible, and Amory's reactions to this disappointment are chronicled in the section titled "Aftermath." He realizes that this failure represents a regression to "the fundamental Amory, idle, imaginative, rebellious" (110). Monsignor Darcy recognizes, however, that Amory is developing: "This has given you time to think and you're casting off a lot of your old luggage about success and the superman and all" (115).

Monsignor Darcy, who was based on Father Sigourney Fay (to whom Fitzgerald dedicated the novel), is a key influence on Amory throughout the novel. Scott met Fay in 1912, and "Fay was the first important person who responded to Scott and encouraged his aspirations" (Brucoli 37). In the novel, Fitzgerald presents Darcy and Amory as having a surrogate father/son relationship, but he also depicts them as intellectual equals: "The priest seemed to guess Amory's thoughts before they were clear in his own head, so closely related were their minds in form and groove" (116). It is Monsignor Darcy who introduces Amory to the idea of the "personage," which influences the way he views himself and others.

After the war Amory is bored and restless in a way that he feels embodies the attitudes of his entire generation. He changes rapidly after his heartbreak with Rosalind: "it was already hard for him to visualize the heart-whole boy who had stepped off the transport, passionately desiring the adventure of life" (237). He engages in self-reflection, narrated by Fitzgerald as a literal question-and-answer session in the chapter "The Egotist Becomes a Personage." By the time of Monsignor Darcy's funeral, there is clear development in Amory's view of himself as he realizes what he really wants in life: "He found something that he wanted, had always wanted and always would want—not to be admired, as he had feared; not to be loved, as he had made himself believe; but to be necessary to people, to be indispensable” (290). In the last chapter of the novel, Amory accepts his selfishness—an acceptance that is a part of his final journey to self-knowledge.

Another important aspect of the novel is the way in which Fitzgerald acts as a social historian; the novel documents trends of the era such as the “petting party” and the changes in behavior and expectations of the new, rebellious American girl. This book is often considered the first realistic American college novel and is also praised for capturing the feelings of a generation “grown up to find all Gods dead, all wars fought, all faiths in man shaken . . .” (307).

An interesting stylistic feature of the novel is its blend of many different kinds of writing techniques, most notably the drama format of the chapter “The Debutante.” The dramatic sections of this chapter allow for the development of the characters (Rosalind, most importantly) through dialogue and stage directions alone; the absence of any narrative perspective also means that narrative judgment is omitted. At the actual moment when Amory and Rosalind meet, the characters are reduced to “HE” and “SHE,” a technique that serves to universalize them and this scene of flirtatious conquest.

The novel is a montage of different scenes and “poses” for Amory; it is episodic, focused not so much on plot as on development of character. This aspect of the book is illustrated by sections like “Snapshots of the Young Egoist,” which presents a series of isolated incidents from Amory’s childhood in Minneapolis in order to give the reader the opportunity to assemble an overall picture.

Fitzgerald’s use of titles for the short sections within each chapter creates an important organizing principle. Occasionally these titles self-consciously refer to function rather than content, with titles like “Historical,” “Descriptive,” or “A Damp Symbolic Interlude.” The titles also allow Fitzgerald to comment more directly on Amory’s actions than the third-person narrator can, as when he uses the title “The Superman Grows Careless” for the chapter in which Amory fails the makeup exam.

Fitzgerald’s lyricism is particularly evident in the novel in descriptions of Princeton, in which there is always a sense of nostalgia. We must remember that Fitzgerald’s time at Princeton did not end happily, and he clearly felt a strong desire to recapture the magic of his initial time there. Amory describes the seniors singing on campus at night: “The early moon had drenched the arches with pale blue, and, weaving over the night, in and out of the gossamer rifts of moon, swept a song, a song with more than a hint of sadness, infinitely transient, infinitely regretful” (47). Perhaps most poignant is the section entitled “The End of Many Things,” when Amory and Tom spend their last night at Princeton.

For Discussion or Writing

1. This novel is an example of a bildungsroman, or novel of formation, which traces the growth of its protagonist from childhood to maturity. Compare the growth experienced by Amory in this novel to that of the protagonist in another bildungsroman, such as J. D. Salinger’s Catcher in the Rye or Mark Twain’s The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. To what extent has each character reached maturity by the novel’s end?
2. Trace Amory’s relationships with young women throughout the novel. Do you see any progression in his interactions with Myra, Isabelle, Clara, Rosalind, and Eleanor? Does Amory seem to learn anything from each successive relationship and, if so, what?
3. Trace Amory’s intellectual development throughout the novel by focusing on one particular idea (e.g., wealth, the class system) and his discussions with other young Princetonians on the subject.

“The Ice Palace” (1920)

“The Ice Palace” is one of several stories in which Fitzgerald considered the differences between the North and the South, a difference personally relevant for him because of his marriage to the famed southern belle Zelda Sayre. In the story, Sally Carol Happer, a young southern debutante, decides to marry Harry Bellamy, a northerner, because she feels that everyone in her Georgia town lacks ambition. However, during a trip north in January to visit Harry and his family, Sally becomes lost in an ice palace and, as a result, decides she belongs in the South; the story ends as it began, with Sally Carrol lazily waiting at her window on a beautiful day.

The South is presented as slow moving but familiar. In particular, the end of the story suggests the repetition of a routine that Sally Carrol knows well, and that has perhaps taken on added significance for her (and for readers) after her adventure in the North. Clark Darrow, one of Sally Carrol's suitors, seems to embody the life of many of the denizens of their southern Georgia town. "Clark had 'a income'—just enough to keep himself in ease and his car in gasolene—and he had spent the two years since he graduated from Georgia Tech in dozing round the lazy streets of his home town, discussing how he could best invest his capital for an immediate fortune" (49).

In contrast, the North is presented as more stiff and formal. Sally Carrol finds the women of the Bellamy family particularly lacking in charm and even hostile. Even Harry at one point lets slip his opinion that southerners are "degenerates" (62). Roger Patton, the only northerner in the story who seems to have any self-awareness, explains to Sally Carrol his theory that people in the North are slowly "freezing up" (59).

The ice palace, although beautiful and a novelty for Sally Carrol, represents the coldness in personality that she begins to see as typical of the North, and her getting lost also shows the isolation she feels there: "She was alone with this presence that came out of the North, the dreary loneliness that rose from ice-bound whalers in the Arctic seas." (67). Earlier in her trip, she had reflected that "sometimes at night it had seemed to her as though no one lived here—they had all gone long ago—leaving lighted houses to be covered in time by tombing heaps of sleet" (64).

Sally Carrol's true feelings about the South (and the Old South in particular) are illustrated in part 2 of the story when she takes Harry for a walk in the cemetery. When her eyes fill with tears while observing the Confederate graves, Sally Carrol reveals her reverence for the Old South: "Oh, Harry, there was something, there was something I couldn't ever make you understand, but it was there" (54). This side of Sally Carrol also becomes clear when, during her stay in the North, she is strongly affected by hearing an orchestra playing "Dixie." Although she claims otherwise in the early part of the story, it is clear that Sally Carrol's nostalgia for the Old South means that she will be incapable of settling in the North.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Sally Carrol's idealized view of the South with the viewpoint presented in William Faulkner's "A Rose for Emily." Consider, in particular, the relationship that each female main character has with the Old South and how this affects her fate.
2. Compare the northern characters in this story with characters in Henrik Ibsen's Ghosts or Hedda Gabler. Do you think Roger Patton's theory about the North, that its people lack "infinite possibilities for great sorrow or joy" (60), is correct? Justify your response with specific details from the text.
3. Do you think the story presents a stereotypical view of the North and/or the South? If so, what might be Fitzgerald's purpose in portraying such stereotypes? Discuss some specific examples of this kind of stereotypical presentation.

"May Day" (1920)

"May Day" takes place in New York over the course of one day, through to the early hours of the following morning, and tells three separate stories of the downfall of Gordon Sterrett, a Yale alumni dance, and a May Day riot. The three incidents become linked through characters crossing among them. The intercutting sections of the story alternately narrate these events from different points of view.

Fitzgerald said of the story that he was trying to capture some of the effect of spring 1919 in New York, when what he later called “the Age of Jazz” was born. The opening section of the story, with its allegorical description of “the great city of the conquering people” (97), poetically invokes the postwar jubilation of New York. Fitzgerald also depicts the celebratory atmosphere of the Yale dance (and its aftermath) by portraying the increasing drunkenness of Peter Himmel and Philip Dean, who, by the story’s end, have been transformed, to their own great hilarity, into Mr. In and Mr. Out.

There is a striking contrast between this atmosphere, exemplified by the extravagance of the dance and the rowdy crowd at Childs’ the following morning, described by Gus Rose as “a colorful circus of beauty and riotous pleasure” (132), and the frightening chaos of the riot in the newspaper office, when Edith “felt the push of warm bodies under rough cloth, and her ears were full of shouting and trampling and hard breathing” (130). Fitzgerald also creates contrast in the story through the juxtaposition of the wealthy socialites and the two former soldiers, Carrol Key and Gus Rose. These two live in a different world and are only able to glimpse the fashionable lifestyle when hidden in a janitor’s closet at Delmonico’s. They are easily swept along in a crowd; the beating of a small Jew and subsequent rush toward Tolliver Hall foreshadow the more serious riot later in the story, when their willingness to follow has tragic consequences for Key.

Gordon Sterrett’s relationship with Edith Bradin is sadly ironic. He remembers her fondly when he hears that she will be attending the dance, and the shifting narrative perspective allows Fitzgerald to reveal that she secretly loves him: “Edith Bradin was falling in love with her recollection of Gordon Sterrett” (113). However, from the moment Gordon cuts in on Edith at the dance, she can tell he has changed: “She loved him—she knew she loved him—then for a minute there was silence while a strange feeling of uneasiness crept over her. Something was wrong” (117). When she sees the condition Gordon is in now, Edith is repulsed by him:

“As he talked she saw he had changed utterly. . . . Revulsion seized her, followed by a faint, surprising boredom” (118). Gordon’s experience with Jewel Hudson has left him a broken man, unable to experience what might have been with Edith.

It has been argued that Gordon “is an obvious projection of Fitzgerald’s despair during the days when New York was celebrating the birth of the Jazz Age” (Brucoli 99). Gordon, like Fitzgerald himself in early 1919, is a failed artist, and his description of the reasons for his failure sound like early criticisms of Fitzgerald as a writer: “I tried, a little, but my stuff’s crude. I’ve got talent, Phil; I can draw—but I just don’t know how” (101). The decline in Gordon’s lifestyle since his graduation from college is first indicated by his clothing, which is now ragged and soiled, while “only three years before he had received a scattering vote in the senior elections at college for being the best-dressed man in his class” (99). Gordon’s desperation is evident from his manner when he first encounters Philip Dean, when he “collapsed unexpectedly upon the bed; [and] lay there inert and spiritless” (100). After Dean denies his request for money, we observe Gordon only through the narration of others, such as Gus Rose and Edith Bradin, until the abrupt final section of the story ends with his equally abrupt suicide.

For Discussion or Writing

1. “May Day” was influenced by “Fitzgerald’s temporary interest in the school of naturalistic or deterministic fiction” (97). Compare the story to a naturalistic novel such as THEODORE DREISER’S Sister Carrie or RICHARD WRIGHT’S Native Son, focusing on the way each work reveals the harsh side of life and the indifference of the universe.
2. Edith Bradin seems to be a typical Fitzgerald woman in many ways—beautiful, popular, and cruel. Compare Edith to Judy Jones, Rosalind Connage, or Daisy Buchanan. Does Edith’s experience with the riot at her brother’s office seem to change her in any way that might make her stand out from the Fitzgerald stereotype of the rich young socialite?

3. Choose one of the characters and trace the ways Fitzgerald portrays this character through the eyes of others in the different sections of the story. What new insights into the character do you gain by seeing him or her from these differing points of view?

“Winter Dreams” (1922)

This story focuses on Dexter Green, growing up in Minnesota, and his “winter dreams,” which eventually revolve around the rich, beautiful Judy Jones. He manages to become one of Judy’s many beaux, but she does not show any special interest in him until after he is already engaged to another girl, and their brief fling at that point is satisfying for no one. Eventually Dexter ends up in New York, where seven years later he hears news of Judy’s unhappy married life, and the story ends with his grief that the illusion of Judy is gone and he cannot even mourn this loss.

The story was written just before the publication of The Great Gatsby and has some similarities to the novel. Dexter’s ambitions to win Judy Jones mirror Gatsby’s quest for Daisy Fay. Dexter, like Gatsby, is not of the same social class as the object of his affections; it is significant that he first encounters Judy when, as a young girl, she is playing golf at the club where he works as a caddy. However, Dexter differs from Gatsby in that he eventually realizes the futility of his dream: “He loved her, and he would love her until the day he was too old for loving—but he could not have her” (233). Another difference is that this story employs a third-person omniscient narrator, allowing Fitzgerald to focus on Dexter’s feelings while still giving the impression of an outsider’s perspective.

Dexter’s “winter dreams” also differ somewhat from Gatsby’s. They initially concern success and fame among the rich patrons of the Sherry Island Golf Club: “But do not get the impression, because his winter dreams happened to be concerned at first with musings on the rich, that there was anything merely snobbish in the boy. He wanted not association with glittering things and glittering people—he wanted the glittering things themselves”

(220–221). It is only later that Dexter’s dreams become associated with Judy Jones, and, perhaps more important, with the illusions she creates.

At the end of the story, Dexter’s reaction to hearing about Judy (“The dream was gone. Something had been taken from him” [235]) reveals that what was important about Judy was his continuing illusion of her perfection, not Judy herself (who was already lost to him), and it is this loss that he tries, but fails, to lament: “Even the grief he could have borne was left behind in the country of illusion, of youth, of the richness of life, where his winter dreams had flourished” (235–236). The story is thus also about growing up, as the dreams and illusions of youth are lost as Dexter grows older.

Another illusion that is exposed in the story is that of the American dream, of which Dexter’s business success—he becomes rich from humble origins through hard work—is a clear illustration. His golf game at Sherry Island Golf Club is indicative of his social rise. However, the end of the story implies that this success has not led to happiness. Wealth and beauty are similarly unsatisfying for Judy: “‘I’m more beautiful than anybody else,’ she said brokenly, ‘why can’t I be happy?’” (232). The report from Devlin about Judy’s marriage also confirms this reality.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine closely the similarities and differences of Dexter Green and Jay Gatsby, particularly with respect to the way each goes about pursuing his dream. What does the different understanding each has of the reality of his dream suggest about the personality differences between the two men?
2. Compare the descriptions of winter in this story to those in “The Ice Palace.” How does Fitzgerald make use of specific language to give a nearly opposite impression of winter landscapes in these two stories?
3. Look closely at the description of the first meeting between Dexter and Judy (end of part 2 of the story), paying particular attention to the repetition of key phrases and the intensity of the physical description. What impression of this moment is created by Fitzgerald’s use of language?

The Great Gatsby* (1925)

Fitzgerald's most famous (and most widely studied) novel was written after a period of struggle in his marriage; perhaps his feelings of betrayal found their way into the novel's sentiment of lost illusions. The novel tells the story of Jay Gatsby, an idealistic young man who re-creates his whole life to recapture the love of Daisy Buchanan. The novel is narrated by Nick Carraway, Daisy's cousin, who happens to move in next door to Gatsby's grand mansion in West Egg and who therefore becomes involved in Gatsby's dreams. The novel's climax occurs in a scene in the Plaza Hotel in New York when Daisy, after seeming to fall in love with Gatsby once more, ultimately decides to remain with the security and "old money" of her husband, Tom. On the way home from New York, the car driven by Daisy strikes and kills Tom's mistress, Myrtle, whose husband, George, murders Gatsby, believing he was the driver of the car.

One of the novel's key subjects is the importance of dreams and illusions, and Gatsby himself, with his overriding quest to win Daisy back, is its most important dreamer. At the climactic moment of the book, Gatsby is personified by his dream; the man fades away as "only the dead dream fought on" (128). Gatsby's "incorruptible dream" (147) and his seemingly infinite capacity for hope are what make him "great," in Nick's view. When Nick first meets Gatsby, this hope is evident in his description of Gatsby's "rare [smile]," which showed that he "believed in you as you would like to believe in yourself" (49). Nick defines Gatsby's "greatness" as "an extraordinary gift for hope, a romantic readiness such as I have never found in any other person and which it is not likely I shall ever find again" (8).

Although Nick feels that Gatsby's hope is unique, the use of the first person in the optimistic closing lines of the novel suggests that this characteristic also reflects a general human tendency to dream. Nick ends the novel by raising the possibility that "one fine morning—" "we" may be able to grasp the dream that "eluded" Gatsby (172), and the uses of dashes and ellipses in this sentence add to the sense of hope. Some critics see Gatsby as a representative of the struggle to live the American dream, but also of the failure of this dream to provide happiness.

Gatsby's dreams are revealed as being unattainable, even from the first moments of his reunion with Daisy. Nick realizes that the extent of Gatsby's dream made it impossible for it to ever be attained: "there must have been moments even that afternoon when Daisy tumbled short of his dreams—not through her own fault, but because of the colossal vitality of his illusion. It had gone beyond her, beyond everything" (92). Here it becomes clear again that it is the strength of the dream that drives Gatsby, even more than the reality of Daisy herself.

Gatsby's dreams are inextricably linked to his misconception that he can control time. During his reunion with Daisy, Gatsby is trying to recapture their past relationship, and Fitzgerald uses the clock in this scene to illustrate Gatsby's failure to impose his will on time. Although Gatsby catches the clock when it topples, Nick says that "we all believed for a moment that it had smashed in pieces on the floor" (84). At the end of that scene, Gatsby is described as "running down like an over-wound clock" (89), a phrase once again suggesting that time does not function as he wishes it to. When talking to Nick later in the novel, Gatsby reveals his attitude toward time directly when Nick tells him he cannot repeat the past: "'Can't repeat the past?' he cried incredulously. 'Why of course you can!'" (106). Gatsby's illusion that no time has passed since he and Daisy were together is shattered, however, by seeing Daisy's child, the physical manifestation of her relationship with Tom.

Gatsby's dream is also illustrated by the symbol of the green light. Its first mention in the novel is simultaneous with the first appearance of Gatsby himself; when Nick returns from his first evening at the Buchanan home, he sees his neighbor, who "stretched out his arms toward the dark water in a curious way," while Nick can see nothing but "a single green light, minute and far away" (25). Later when Jordan tells him the background between Gatsby and Daisy, Nick realizes the significance of this moment: "Then it had not been merely the stars to which he had aspired on that June night"

(76). However, for Gatsby, the light stands not only for Daisy herself, but also for the dream of recapturing her love; that is why it loses its meaning for him after his reunion with Daisy: "it had occurred to him that the colossal significance of that light had now vanished forever. . . . Now it was again a green light on a dock. His count of enchanted objects had diminished by one" (90). Nick, however, continues to associate the green light with Gatsby's capacity for hope: "Gatsby believed in the green light" (171).

There is a similarity between Gatsby and Myrtle Wilson as dreamers, and the repeated descriptions of Myrtle's "vitality" (28, 66, 131), the same word used to describe Gatsby's dream, illustrate the power a dream can have; it literally gives Myrtle life, which has to be violently ripped from her: It appears "as though she had choked a little in giving up the tremendous vitality she had stored so long" (131). In contrast, George Wilson represents what happens in the absence of a dream. He is described as "a blond, spiritless man, anaemic" (27) and "one of those worn-out men" (130). He is easily manipulated by Tom, and the discovery of his wife's infidelity makes him physically ill.

The dreams of the novel often manifest themselves as the typical American dream of money and success. To achieve this dream, for the sole purpose of winning Daisy's love, Gatsby reinvents himself, becoming a literally "self-made" man: "Jay Gatsby of West Egg, Long Island, sprang from his Platonic conception of himself" (95). Ironically, as a result, his unknown background leads to all the rumors that circulate about him. The rumors enter the novel the first time Nick attends one of Gatsby's parties (35), becoming most extreme with the assertion that "he killed a man once" (45). Tom Buchanan calls him "some big bootlegger" (104) and "Mr. Nobody from Nowhere" (123). Rumors also swirl around Gatsby's death—rumors that are "grotesque, circumstantial, eager, and untrue" (155). This constant speculation, and indeed the concern with Gatsby's background, is one way in which Fitzgerald criticizes the upper class of American society, perhaps pointing out the irony in the fact that those who achieve what should be the American dream are then shunned by the truly wealthy.

In keeping with this irony, and with the way dreams are often revealed to be false throughout Fitzgerald's works, it becomes clear that hard work and the accumulation of money are not enough; there is an insurmountable distinction between "old money" and "new money," and this difference is a large part of the reason that the relationship between Daisy and Gatsby is doomed to failure.

The split between old and new money is also made clear in some of the novel's many geographical contrasts, such as the difference between West Egg and East Egg, which exhibit a "dissimilarity in every particular" (10). East Egg is the domain of those with old money, while the newly rich occupy West Egg. There is a striking contrast between Gatsby's mansion, described as a "factual imitation" and "spanking new" (as is Gatsby's money) under a "beard of ivy" (10), and the Buchanans' colonial house, described as "glowing now with reflected gold" (12) and with a "frosted wedding-cake" (13) ceiling. When Daisy finally attends one of Gatsby's parties, the difference is clear to her: Daisy "was appalled by West Egg" (103). Even Nick finally describes Gatsby's mansion (albeit after his demise) as a "huge incoherent failure of a house" (171).

The East-West dichotomy also manifests itself on a larger scale. Nearly all of the novel's characters originate in the "Middle West." However, after college (in the East) and the war, Nick notes that "the Middle West now seemed like the ragged edge of the universe—so I decided to go East and learn the bond business" (9). Not only does the war create in Nick a desire for a more exciting life, but it is obvious to him (and to "everybody [he] knew" who was already in the bond business) that this type of excitement can only be found in the East. However, the "riotous" East is too much for some of the characters; George Wilson claims that "my wife and I want to go West" (118) after finding out about her affair with Tom, and Nick ultimately returns to the relative innocence of the Middle West at the end of the book.

This geographical contrast is also linked to the American dream in the sense of exploring; the novel provides a reversal of the idea of manifest destiny in that prosperity is sought eastwards in the “fresh, green breast of the new world” (171). By the end of the novel, Nick can see, through his exposure to Gatsby’s dream, what the dreams of the original settlers—“the last and greatest of all human dreams” (171)—were like, and in that moment the novel is not just about Gatsby’s dream but about the fundamental dream that defined America as a country. The idea of the characters as trailblazers, conquering a new territory, is reinforced when Nick, early in the novel, gives directions and feels like “a guide, a pathfinder, an original settler” (9).

Another geographical contrast in the novel is between city and country (the “country” in this case represented by Long Island). New York City is seen as a place of adventure (57), where “anything can happen” (67), containing the “wild promise of all the mystery and the beauty in the world” (67). It is also described as ironically pastoral and idyllic (30), and it is where Tom Buchanan takes his mistress, where Nick gets drunk for just the second time in his life, and at the same time the setting for the climactic final confrontation.

In between the city and the country is the desolation of the “valley of ashes” (26), which symbolizes death and decay. It is a fitting place for Myrtle’s gruesome end, and perhaps a fitting place for Tom’s affair to begin. As discussed, George Wilson is also metaphorically “dead.” The valley exists under a billboard featuring “Doctor Eckleburg’s persistent stare” (27); although we might hesitate to associate the eyes of this faded advertisement with the eyes of God, as Wilson does (152), they certainly suggest a constant watchfulness (and perhaps judgment) and are the most important manifestation in the novel of the motif of sight. However, we later see the ineffectiveness of sight, as Gatsby is left outside the Buchanans’ house the night of Myrtle’s death, “watching over nothing” (139). The eyes also illustrate the omnipresence of consumerism in the increasingly commercial American society of the 1920s.

Fitzgerald also criticizes contemporary society through his portrayal of the rich. His (and Nick’s) harshest criticism is reserved for the Buchanans:

“They were careless people, Tom and Daisy—they smashed up things and creatures and then retreated back into their money or their vast carelessness, or whatever it was that kept them together, and let other people clean up the mess they had made” (170). Tom Buchanan is described consistently throughout the novel as brutish, cruel, and powerful (both physically and behaviorally). He is “always leaning aggressively forward” (12), and Nick notes a tone of “paternal contempt” (12) in his voice. He does not hesitate to break Myrtle’s nose when she taunts him with the name of his wife (39), and he manipulates Nick as easily as he controls a weakling like Wilson: “Tom Buchanan compelled me from the room as though he were moving a checker to another square” (16). His lie about Daisy’s being Catholic (36) shocks Nick, and it provides another means for Fitzgerald to criticize the insincerity of the rich. The only real break in Tom’s powerful image occurs immediately after Myrtle’s death, when he “whimpered” and let out a “low husky sob” (135).

In striking contrast to Tom, Daisy (along with Jordan) is initially described as ephemeral (“the two young women ballooned slowly to the floor” [13]), and her consistent connection with the color white reinforces this perception. Daisy can never be separated from her money, beginning with her “white girlhood” (24) in Louisville when “the largest of the banners and the largest of the lawns belonged to Daisy Fay’s house” (72). Listening to her voice makes Nick think of her as “High in a white palace [like] the king’s daughter, the golden girl” (115), and Gatsby sees her “gleaming like silver, safe and proud above the hot struggles of the poor” (142).

Because of this constant association, Gatsby hits the nail on the head when he says that her voice, a key image throughout the novel, “is full of money” (115). Perhaps this is the indescribable quality that makes Daisy’s voice so fascinating, even to Nick: “her voice compelled me forward breathlessly as I listened” (19). Daisy’s voice (and, by extension, her money) becomes her most important attribute, the one thing that “couldn’t be over-dreamed” (93). However, it also makes Jordan suspect possible infidelity: “and yet there’s something in that voice of hers" (75)—another subtle way in which Fitzgerald is able to criticize the rich.

Gatsby's party guests are portrayed as equally impersonal and unconcerned: "sometimes they came and went without having met Gatsby at all" (43). Even Gatsby himself is wasteful; the image of the fruit used for his parties suggests an almost parasitic consumption: "Every Friday five crates of oranges and lemons arrived from a fruiterer in New York—every Monday these same oranges and lemons left his back door in a pyramid of pulpless halves" (41). Gatsby's extravagance is also illustrated by his shirts (89), his car (the "circus wagon" [115]), and the books in his library. The books also show the unreliability of appearances (as his guests expect them to be false) and the fragility of his created world: "if one brick was removed the whole library was likely to collapse" (47). In contrast to the Buchanans, however, Gatsby seems to be forgiven for his excesses, at least in Nick's perspective, as they are all in the service of his "great" dream.

Indeed, the narrative perspective is a key stylistic feature of the novel. Nick is certainly a biased, and perhaps even an unreliable, narrator because of his emotional involvement with the events he describes. He is a snob, believing that he is "inclined to reserve all judgments" (7), although throughout the novel we see him judge nearly all of the other characters. When retelling the story of Gatsby's background, he invents or fills in details: "I suppose he smiled at Cody—he had probably discovered that people liked him when he smiled" (96). He also imagines Gatsby's last moments: "I have an idea. . . . If that was true. . . . He must have looked up" (153). It is also difficult to know what to think when Nick tells us that he is "glad" to have told Gatsby that he was "worth the whole damn bunch put together" (145) and then, in the same breath, says that "I disapproved of him from beginning to end" (146). As a result, a reader must be constantly aware that the events of the novel are presented through a biased lens.

For Discussion or Writing

- Gatsby, like other classic works such as Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman and JOHN STEINBECK's Of Mice and Men, is commonly seen as a study of the concept of the American dream. Examine how Gatsby reveals the impossibility of the dream of achieving success and happiness solely through hard work.
- Read Fitzgerald's story "The Rich Boy" and compare the attitude toward the rich expressed in this story to that expressed in Gatsby. How, in both texts, does Fitzgerald illustrate his view that "the lives of the rich had greater possibilities, but he recognized that they failed to use these possibilities fully" (Brucoli 232)?
- Trace the color imagery used throughout the novel. You may wish to focus on a particular color, or a certain color's associations with a single character (for example, white with Daisy). How does the use of colors allow Fitzgerald to make the novel come alive?
- Read T. S. ELIOT's The Waste Land, focusing particularly on the figure of Tiresias and the description of the landscape of the wasteland, and then discuss the extent to which you agree with the following claim: "A more probable source for the Eckleburg figure (who 'sank himself down into eternal blindness') and for the valley of ashes was T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land, which Fitzgerald greatly admired. Eckleburg can be read as a Long Island version of the blind seer Tiresias, and the ash heaps are actually and symbolically a waste land" (Brucoli 209). In what ways can Dr. T. J. Eckleburg be compared with Tiresias?

"Babylon Revisited" (1931)

In this story, the American expatriate and recovering alcoholic Charlie Wales, now a successful businessman, returns to Paris, where his young daughter has been living with the family of his sister-in-law, Marion Peters, since his wife, Helen's, death some time ago. Now that he is sober, Charlie desperately wants to reclaim his daughter and some semblance of a normal family life. However, after initially agreeing to grant him custody, Marion recants after some of his old friends, drunk, arrive unannounced and unexpected at the Peters' house, and the story ends with Charlie realizing that he will have to continue to live alone, at least for the time being.

Change and a nostalgia for the past are evident throughout the story, beginning with the initial dialogue, when Charlie learns that many of his former acquaintances are no longer in Paris. It is clear to him that the days when American expatriates in Paris "were a sort of royalty, almost infallible, with a sort of magic around us" (619) have passed. These societal changes parallel the changes in Charlie's personal life since losing his family and giving up drinking. Even when he happily plans his future life with Honoria, he cannot help growing sad, "remembering all the plans he and Helen had made" (628). However, although he often thinks about the past, Charlie has no desire to go back, as is evident through his rejection of Lorraine and Duncan. For him they symbolize all of the negative aspects of his earlier life.

The story is full of Charlie's regret for the wasted days of alcoholism, and especially for the loss of Helen. Even when he remembers her fondly and imagines her supporting his desire to care for Honoria, the poignant description suggests that she is slipping ever further away: "She said a lot of other things—very friendly things—but she was in a swing in a white dress, and swinging faster and faster all the time, so that at the end he could not hear clearly all that she said" (628). Charlie is also anxious about his relationship with Honoria, in particular that she will grow up without him and he will "miss" influencing her life: "Charlie was more and more absorbed by the desire of putting a little of himself into her before she crystallized utterly" (623). The story is autobiographical in these respects, as Fitzgerald also experienced anxiety about his bouts of alcoholism and his daughter, Scottie (from whom he was often separated). It is surely no accident that Charlie is 35—Fitzgerald's age when he wrote this story.

Not everything in Charlie's life has changed, notably Marion's distrust of him. The story suggests that she will eventually succumb, but at the moment she is torn, preserving her loyalty to her sister. However, our sympathy remains firmly with Charlie through the story's moving final sentence: "He was absolutely sure Helen wouldn't have wanted him to be so alone" (633).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Does Charlie deserve what he gets at the end of the story? The fact that his chance to have Honoria back is ruined by old friends from his drinking days could suggest that he is continuing to pay for the sins of his past; do you agree with this interpretation? Support your argument with details from the story.
2. The exact circumstances of Helen's death are left unclear in the story. What do you think happened to Helen? How closely was it connected to the incident when she was locked out in the snow by Charlie, and does your answer to this question affect whether you sympathize more with Charlie or Marion?
3. Research the city of Babylon and discuss why Fitzgerald might have chosen it as a representation of Paris in the title of the story. How does this title relate to the story's theme of the unrecoverable past?

Tender Is the Night (1934)

Fitzgerald's fourth novel traces the collapse of the marriage of Dick and Nicole Diver, a wealthy expatriate American couple living on the French Riviera. In a later, revised version of the text (which Fitzgerald claimed to prefer), the novel begins when the two first meet in 1917, when Dick is a psychiatrist and Nicole a mental patient, suffering the negative effects of a childhood sexual relationship with her father. The narrative then jumps forward in time to after their marriage and, for a time, adopts the point of view of Rosemary Hoyt, a young American film star who falls in love with Dick while vacationing on the Riviera. Dick's—and, to some extent, Nicole's—dissatisfaction with their life together grows, the marriage falls apart, and, at the end of the book, Dick has returned to America, his exact whereabouts unknown.

Tender Is the Night is often considered a classic example of the “breakdown” novel, which became a common genre in American fiction of the 20th century, often focusing on a fall from grace. In particular, Fitzgerald was interested in portraying the way the “breakdown” intervenes in and ruins the glamorous and perfect facade of wealthy American life. Hints of this theme are evident throughout the novel with incidents like the duel, the shots in the train station, the corpse in Rosemary’s bed, the Divers’ car accident, and Dick’s imprisonment in Rome.

This revelation of the falseness of glamour is one way in which Tender Is the Night illustrates Fitzgerald’s characteristic focus on false illusions and failed dreams, including the failure of the particularly American dream of success. This failure is most evident for Dick, who begins the novel full of potential. He arrives in Zurich as a young, successful doctor, with illusions explicitly linked to the American experience: “the illusions of eternal strength and health, and of the essential goodness of people—they were the illusions of a nation, the lies of generations of frontier mothers who had to croon falsely that there were no wolves outside the cabin door” (6). Even early in the novel, Dick is beginning to understand the problems inherent in the ambitions of his youth: “he used to think that he wanted to be good, he wanted to be kind, he wanted to be brave and wise, but it was all pretty difficult” (26). After his father’s death, he regrets some of what he has not achieved: He is described as “wishing he had always been as good as he had intended to be” (257).

Dick’s success as a psychiatrist is called into question by the fact that, for much of the novel, he does not practice, and perhaps also by his failure to “cure” Nicole. For a short period he does jointly run a clinic in Switzerland (significantly, however, this is only possible with the Warren family money), but this endeavor goes downhill after he begins drinking. His aspirations to publish also never play out in the way he had hoped, and his long-delayed breakthrough work becomes a symbol of his unachieved potential. This kind of failure continues even after his split from Nicole; she hears that he “always had a big stack of papers on his desk that were known to be an important treatise on some medical subject, almost in process of completion” (391).

The title of book I—in the revised text “Case Study”—emphasizes Nicole’s status as a patient at the beginning of her relationship with Dick, and her instability (and initial reverence for Dick) is revealed through her letters. Their relationship is manipulated by Nicole’s doctors, who advise Dick not to see her again after it becomes clear that she is in love with him. Dick initially complies, but afterward he realizes his emotional involvement and succumbs to her advances when they meet again in the mountains. He seems to accept their mutual complicity: “when he left her outside the sad door on the Zürichsee and she turned and looked at him he knew her problem was one they had together for good now” (55), and the word problem here also suggests that Dick is aware of flaws from the moment of the relationship’s beginning.

There are also illusions inherent in the relationship between Dick and Rosemary: “They were full of brave illusions about each other, tremendous illusions, so that the communion of self with self seemed to be on a plane where no other human relations mattered” (159). Dick’s illusions about Rosemary’s innocence are shattered when Collis Clay tells a story about her on the train with Hillis, and this image continues to haunt Dick, as is indicated through the repetition of his imagined accompanying dialogue: “Do you mind if I pull down the curtain?” (176).

Many critics consider this novel to be very autobiographical, and indeed it was written after Fitzgerald’s wife, Zelda, began to break down mentally. By this point in his life Fitzgerald had realized as well that the glamorous life of celebrity he had always assumed he would lead when he became a famous author was not all it appeared. Whether or not the Divers are intended as direct representations of the Fitzgeralds, the novel’s portrayal of the careless, often carefree lives of wealthy expatriates reflects Fitzgerald’s keen observations on and criticism of the upper class in American society. Fitzgerald criticizes the wealthy “life of leisure” by employing Rosemary's (comparably) innocent perspective: "Rosemary envied them their fun, imagining a life of leisure unlike her own. She knew little of leisure, but she had the respect for it of those who have never had it. She thought of it as resting, without realizing that the Divers were as far from relaxing as she was herself" (187). Dick realizes early on the superficiality of social poses, "starting awake at night" to ask himself with chagrin, "am I like the rest. . . ?" (25). However, even this awareness does not stop him from behaving "like the rest" after his marriage to Nicole. The party Dick hosts in Paris, featuring the car of the shah of Persia, symbolizes the extravagance of their lifestyles, and even Rosemary, from the glamorous film world, is impressed: "Rosemary appreciated how different it was from any party in Hollywood, no matter how splendid in scale" (161). The "grand stage" of Europe provides an elaborate playground for the expatriate community.

However, Fitzgerald never allows this splendor to continue long without exposing its illusory nature. In describing a large gathering of Americans at the train station, the narrator emphasizes the inaccuracy of our initial perceptions: "When there were enough Americans on the platform the first impression of their immaculacy and their money began to fade into a vague racial dusk that hindered and blinded both them and their observers" (169). Immediately after this description, the alluring atmosphere is disrupted by the sudden shooting: "The shots had entered into all their lives: echoes of violence followed them out on to the pavement" (172). Similarly, Rosemary's initial illusion of the idyllic existence of the Divers ("Rosemary was thinking that the Villa Diana was the centre of the world" [99]) is dispelled immediately at this first party by the "scene" Violet McKisco observes in the bathroom and the subsequent duel.

Another subject of the novel, and a key factor in Dick's "breakdown," is the necessity for separation between life and work, a separation Dick has trouble maintaining. As Nicole's problems recur and he deals with her as a patient, it becomes difficult for Dick "to distinguish between his self-protective professional detachment and some new coldness in his heart" (210), and this seems to be a factor in the cooling of their marriage. Dick expresses a growing unhappiness with the way his caring for Nicole is affecting his life: "The dualism in his views of her—that of the husband, that of the psychiatrist—was increasingly paralyzing his faculties" (238). When Dick takes a leave of absence in book 4, it is from both the clinic and Nicole, suggesting that these two facets of his life can no longer be separated.

"Escape" is a fitting title for this book, which represents the turning point for Dick. The leave of absence is a sort of midlife crisis in which Dick breaks away from the confines of the marriage, realizing that he has changed: "But Dick had come away for his soul's sake, and he began thinking about that. He had lost himself—he could not tell the hour when, or the day or the week, the month or the year" (253). It is appropriate that it is during this trip that his father dies, and that his affair with Rosemary is finally consummated—"what had begun with a childish infatuation on a beach was accomplished at last" (269). Book 4 also features one of the more distressing intrusions into the glamorous lives of the characters: Dick's drunken arrest in Rome, which ultimately involves Baby Warren and Collis Clay as well.

By his return in book 5, Dick understands the permanence of the change: "I'm not much like myself any more" (326). This change is also symbolized by his failure to lift the man on the surfboard (355), and even Rosemary has heard rumors that "he's not received anywhere any more" (358). After one of the final arguments between Dick and Nicole, the close of the chapter is particularly significant: "The case was finished. Doctor Diver was at liberty" (375). The medical terms used here suggest that the failure of the marriage is in fact due to his failure to separate life and work.

Nicole's corresponding realization occurs in book 5, when she reencounters Tommy Barban after already feeling disillusioned with her relationship with Dick. After Dick's return, she tells him that "you used to want to create things—now you seem to want to smash them up" (334). Giving the camphor rub to Tommy symbolizes that she now values him above her own family (symbolism that is not lost on Dick), and indeed shortly after this incident she yields herself to him as well. The breakdown of the marriage is now complete.

The style of the novel, in particular its focus on description and use of idealized, poetic language, is a reflection of Fitzgerald's attempt to portray the beauty and glamour of life. Moments such as the description of Dick's arrival on the train platform in Paris show the glamour conveyed by Fitzgerald's lyricism: "Dick Diver came and brought with him a fine glowing surface on which the three women sprang like monkeys with cries of relief, perching on his shoulders, on the beautiful crown of his hat or the gold head of his cane" (168). The novel is not driven by action; rather, the structure is episodic, and the isolated incidents of action exemplify the ugliness that occasionally interrupts the facade of beauty. This type of interruption is also apparent during scenes involving drinking, when the narration becomes disjointed or confused to simulate the impressions of drunkenness.

The novel's shifting narrative perspective is another interesting stylistic feature. The brief section of first-person narration from Nicole's perspective at the beginning of the revised book 2 covers the early years of the Divers' marriage quickly, in a stream of consciousness style. Its rapid jumps and sometimes childish language illustrate Nicole's still unstable state of mind, and Fitzgerald is also able to convey both her moments of despair, such as after Topsy's birth when "everything got dark again" (62), and of rapturous happiness. Aside from this section, the point of view is always third person, but it shifts frequently so that the omniscient narrator adopts the focus of each of the major characters (and even minor ones like Abe North and Baby Warren) for a time. The majority of the novel is narrated in this fashion from Dick's point of view, establishing him as the protagonist (and making his effective disappearance at the end of the novel more poignant), but the shifts allow Fitzgerald to give readers varying perspectives on the characters and to create sympathy for Dick, Nicole, and Rosemary in turn. The most significant shift is the large section told from Rosemary's perspective. The description of the Divers and their friends from the innocence of Rosemary's point of view allows Fitzgerald to develop these characters as they appear to an outsider, and to glorify the Divers before this illusion of perfection is shattered. Although the reader is aware of the dark background behind the Divers' marriage from book 1, Rosemary remains unaware until much later.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the effect of the multiple points of view Fitzgerald uses to narrate the novel. In particular, what is the effect of the introduction of Rosemary's perspective on the Divers in book 2?
2. Compare Nicole and Rosemary, in terms of their personalities and respective relationships with Dick. You may also wish to consider each woman's relationship with her parent. Do you find it significant, particularly in comparison with Nicole, that the film that has made Rosemary famous is titled Daddy's Girl?
3. Compare this novel to other "breakdown" novels, such as Saul Bellow's Herzog or J. D. Salinger's Catcher in the Rye. How are the breakdowns of the central characters similar and different?
4. The novel's epigraph is taken from John Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale." Read the poem and examine the connections you see between it and the subject of the novel. Why do you think Fitzgerald chose this epigraph, and do you find it appropriate?

FURTHER QUESTIONS ON FITZGERALD AND HIS WORK

1. Trace the uses of geographical contrasts throughout Fitzgerald's works. You may wish to consider in particular his use of characters originating in the "Middle West" (Nick Carraway, Jay Gatsby, Nicole Warren, Amory Blaine, Dexter Green)—Fitzgerald's own birthplace—and the seemingly inevitable transfer of these characters to other locations.
2. Discuss the significance of the city of New York across Fitzgerald's fiction. You may especially

- wish to consider how the city compares to other locations in works like Gatsby, This Side of Paradise, “Winter Dreams,” and “May Day.”
3. Compare Nicole Diver to Daisy Buchanan. How are their personalities similar? Is there any similarity between the affairs they have (with Tommy Barban and Gatsby, respectively)? Research Zelda Fitzgerald and discuss to what extent each woman could be seen as a portrayal of Zelda. You may also wish to consider whether any of Fitzgerald’s other female characters incorporate certain characteristics of Zelda.
 4. Consider the appearances of automobiles throughout Fitzgerald’s fiction. How does Fitzgerald make use of the automobile as a symbol, and what is suggested by the frequent occurrences of automobile accidents in his works?
 5. Explore the significance of the First World War throughout Fitzgerald’s works. Although the war never plays a primary role, perhaps because Fitzgerald’s regiment did not actually go to Europe before the war ended, its symbolic significance and effects are clearly felt in a number of works, from the presence of the soldiers in “May Day” to the deaths of several of Amory’s Princeton friends in This Side of Paradise. Compare Fitzgerald’s treatment of the war to that of other American writers of the 1920s, such as Ernest Hemingway or JOHN DOS PASSOS.
 6. Consider the ways in which Fitzgerald’s works concern themselves with the idea of a loss of innocence. You may wish to compare the degree to which characters such as Nick Carraway, Rosemary Hoyt, Amory Blaine, Sally Carrol Happer, or Edith Bradin experience a loss of innocence and what leads to their respective losses.
 7. Read Fitzgerald’s “The Crack-Up” and consider to what extent the breakdowns of various characters in Fitzgerald’s fiction (Dick Diver, Gordon Sterrett, Charlie Wales) can be seen as reflecting the author’s own experiences.
 8. Read one of Horatio Alger’s novels, such as Luck and Pluck or Tattered Tom, and consider how Alger’s 19th-century presentation of the American dream compares with the portrayal of this dream throughout Fitzgerald’s works.
 9. Fitzgerald greatly admired the poetry of John Keats and tried in his own writing to “become a prose Keats, imitating the poet’s rhythms and enriching his own style with lush Keatsian imagery” (Brucoli 73). Read some of Keats’s poetry, such as the known Fitzgerald favorites “Ode to a Nightingale,” “Ode on a Grecian Urn,” and “The Eve of St. Agnes,” and consider the extent to which the more poetic passages of Fitzgerald’s novels and stories successfully achieve this goal.
 10. Read “Bernice Bobs Her Hair,” an early story in which Fitzgerald considers the importance of social success and popularity (especially among young women), and compare his treatment of this theme in that story with its treatment in This Side of Paradise and in later stories like “May Day” and “Babylon Revisited.”

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Brucoli, Matthew J. Some Sort of Epic Grandeur. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1981.
- Bryer, Jackson R., and Cathy W. Barks, eds. Dear Scott, Dearest Zelda: The Love Letters of F. Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 2002.
- The F. Scott Fitzgerald Society. Available online. URL: <http://www.fscottfitzgeraldsociety.org>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Fitzgerald, F. Scott. The Great Gatsby. London: Penguin Books, 1950.
- . The Short Stories of F. Scott Fitzgerald. Edited by Matthew J. Brucoli. New York: Scribner Paperback Fiction, 1989.
- . Tender Is the Night. London: Penguin Books, 1955.
- . This Side of Paradise. Edited by Ruth Prigozy. New York: Washington Square Press, 1995.
- Hemingway, Ernest. “Scott Fitzgerald,” “Hawks Do Not Share,” and “A Matter of Measurements.” In A Moveable Feast. New York: Scribner, 1964.
- Meyers, Jeffrey. Scott Fitzgerald: A Biography. New York: HarperCollins, 1994.
- Mizener, Arthur. The Far Side of Paradise. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1951.
- Prigozy, Ruth. Illustrated Lives: F. Scott Fitzgerald. London: Penguin Books, 2001.

Rebecca Strong

ROBERT FROST (1874–1963)

[A poem] begins in delight and ends in wisdom . . . it runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion.

(“The Figure a Poem Makes”)

During his lifetime, Robert Frost became not only one of the most respected but certainly also one of the most popular of serious American poets. He received more Pulitzer Prizes (four) than any other writer of verse has ever won, and he was also the beneficiary of numerous awards, scores of honorary degrees, many academic appointments, a variety of presidential recognitions, and healthy sales of his books. During a time when poetry had seemed to become increasingly remote and distant from the audience of “common readers,” Frost was one of the few poets to win both the respect of critics and the affection of a large and admiring public. Although his success occurred late (he was nearly 40 when his first book was published), once it arrived it never left, and the fact that Frost lived into his eighties meant that by the end of his life he had become a national icon—one of the most famous and best-loved writers of his time. In the years since his death his reputation has only grown, even though darker sides of both his personality and his verse have received increasing emphasis.

Most of the details of the poet’s life and career are outlined in the exceptionally helpful “Chronology” prepared by Richard Poirier and Mark Richardson. Although Frost would eventually become most famous for poems often set in New England, he was actually born on the other side of the continent—in San Francisco, California. His father, William Prescott Frost, Jr., had been born in New England and had graduated from Harvard, while the poet’s mother (Isabelle Moodie) had been born in Scotland but had been raised by an uncle in Columbus, Ohio. After the couple met while serving together as teachers in Pennsylvania, they married in March 1873 and soon moved to San Francisco, where William worked as a journalist and where Robert, their first child, was born on March 26, 1874. Although William had some success as a writer and editor, his taste for alcohol and gambling led to tensions in the marriage; the couple’s daughter, Jennie, was born in 1876 when Isabelle was temporarily back in Massachusetts, but eventually she returned to San Francisco, accompanied by a number of female relatives and friends. Not long after their arrival, William Frost was diagnosed with tuberculosis, but his condition did not prevent him from participating, during the next few years, in local politics. As a parent, however, William Frost was often harsh, and partly as a result young Robert became nervous and sickly and often had to drop out of school because of stomach pains. Nevertheless, as he grew older he also developed a streetwise tougher side, even while, under the influence of his highly religious and literate mother, he was cultivating an interest in reading literature and in hearing poetry read aloud.

When William Frost finally died of tuberculosis in 1885, his wife and children were left almost destitute. His widow had little choice but to take her son and daughter back to Massachusetts to live for a time in the town of Lawrence with her husband's parents. By 1886, however, the small family had taken up residence in New Hampshire, where Isabelle Frost taught children in grades 5 through 8, including her own son, who had now developed a lively interest in reading. In the coming years Robert would increasingly distinguish himself as a student, especially after he transferred to Lawrence High School. His own first poems were published in that school's Bulletin in 1890, and indeed by 1891 he had been elected its editor. By this time, too, he had met and fallen in love with Elinor Miriam White, another accomplished student at the school, and by 1892 they had in fact become privately engaged. Although Frost had been accepted by Harvard, his grandparents—who were paying for his education—determined that he would instead attend the less-expensive Dartmouth College, but Frost's time there lasted merely a semester. Regimented education bored him, but he continued to study on his own even as he worked a number of low-paying jobs as a mill worker and teacher. In 1894 he was able to publish some poems in a New York newspaper, but he was unable, at first, to persuade Elinor finally to marry him. Depressed, he traveled (perhaps with suicidal intent) to the aptly named Dismal Swamp in North Carolina, but before long he was back in Lawrence, working as a journalist, teacher, and tutor. Eventually, on December 19, 1895, he and Elinor were married, and on September 25, 1896, their first child—a son named Elliott—was born. Meanwhile, Frost continued to teach, write poems, and pursue an amateur interest in botany, and he also made plans to resume his formal education by entering Harvard.

Frost's studies at Harvard began in 1897 and continued, despite ill health, until March 1899, when he withdrew despite having had some real success. His daughter Lesley was born on April 28, and Frost—partly to earn a living and partly to rebuild his health through manual labor—decided to begin raising chickens. Nevertheless, after the death of young Elliott in July 1900, Elinor became depressed and Frost's own physical and mental health continued to deteriorate, but he continued to write poems even after his grandfather bought him a 30-acre farm in Derry, New Hampshire. Most of the work there was actually done by a friend, and when Frost's grandfather died in 1901, the poet was left with a yearly income of $500—an arrangement that left him time for his writing despite his commitment to the farm. By 1903, in fact, he had managed to unite the two pursuits by publishing prose pieces in various poultry magazines, although poetry remained his primary literary love. He often wrote at the end of the day, after his duties on the farm were done. Meanwhile, as children continued to arrive (son Carol in 1902, daughter Irma in 1903, and daughter Marjorie in 1905), Frost felt an increasing need to supplement his income, and so in 1906 he began teaching again, this time at the local Pinkerton Academy. He was an active, effective, and innovative teacher, and his success at Pinkerton eventually led, in 1911, to a position as a college instructor. By this time, however, he had begun to feel an increasing yearning to write full-time in a new environment, and so in the late summer of 1912 he and his wife and children abandoned their life in New England and set sail for England itself. London at this time was the center of a lively literary scene, and it was not long before Frost was making the acquaintance of many notable writers, including EZRA POUND, the dynamic American expatriate. Conceited but at the same time generous, Pound was always ready to help promote other writers of talent, and when Frost's first book—A Boy's Will—was published by a small London firm in April 1913, Pound was one of a number of reviewers who hailed it as an important work. In the meantime, the reception of Frost's next book—North of Boston, published in May 1914—was even more enthusiastic. Indeed, many critics still consider this work Frost's best. Not long after World War I began in August 1914, Frost had moved his family back to the United States (they arrived in February 1915), and by the time of their return it had become clear to practically everyone who cared about poetry that a major new voice had arrived on the scene.

North of Boston and A Boy's Will were soon published in American editions, and both books quickly met with many highly positive reviews and with gratifying sales. Frost had now begun to attract the kind of attention and respect in his own country that he had never enjoyed before; in 1916, for instance, he was elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and in that same year he was invited to teach at Amherst College (with which he would now enjoy an on-again, off-again relationship for many years). Invitations to speak and to read his poems began to arrive on a regular basis, and in November of that year his newest book—Mountain Interval—was published by the same major New York firm that had reprinted his first two volumes. In 1917 one of Frost's poems won a major prize; in 1918 he himself received an honorary degree; in 1919 he was elected president of the New England Poetry Club. Thus, as the 1920s dawned, Frost's career was definitely on the rise, although he continued to favor a rural life when he might easily have moved to a large city. In 1920 he began to plan to raise apples on a farm in Vermont, although in 1921 he also began a long-standing relationship with the University of Michigan, and in 1922 he undertook an extensive lecture tour in the South and Midwest. In 1923 his Selected Poems were published, followed later by a book titled New Hampshire, and during that same year he was invited back to Amherst. Success thus followed success: In 1924 New Hampshire won a Pulitzer Prize; in 1925 friends celebrated his birthday with a major dinner; and during this same period Frost was being wooed both by Amherst and by Michigan. In 1926 Amherst made him an offer he could not refuse, and in 1928 he signed a highly lucrative contract with his New York publisher. During these years, however, all was not entirely well: Frost's own health and the health of some of his children were often poor; tensions with his wife were increasing; his adult children were beginning to encounter problems of their own; and Elinor was more and more depressed. His relations with his fellow poets (whom he often viewed as competitors) were frequently strained, and Frost, despite his prominence, was often worried that his status would not endure, despite the publication of a new book (West-Running Brook) late in 1928 and the simultaneous reissue of an expanded version of his Selected Poems. Nevertheless, despite his worries, his Collected Poems (which soon won him another Pulitzer) was published in 1930, the same year he was elected to membership in the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Meanwhile, another major award (from the National Institute of Arts and Letters) followed in 1931.

Despite the painful illness and death of his beloved daughter Marjorie in 1934 and the declining physical health and growing depression of his wife, Frost in the early 1930s (when he was now approaching his sixties) was still an active figure on the American literary scene. He continued to travel both frequently and widely to read his poems (an activity that helped build his national audience), and in 1936 he not only gave a series of prestigious and popular lectures at Harvard but also published a new book (A Further Range), which sold well and soon won him yet another Pulitzer Prize. That book, however, attracted some of the first seriously negative criticism Frost had ever received as a writer; some commentators considered him old-fashioned and out of touch with the economic and social conditions of modern life. Since late 1929 the country had been suffering through the most severe economic depression in its history, and Frost, with his focus on rural landscapes and country people, seemed (at least to some readers) naively nostalgic or even worse. Indeed, his fairly right-wing political opinions put him at odds with many intellectuals (and also with much of the voting public) at that time, while his respect for custom and convention in the writing of poetry (including a preference for clear meter, regular rhyme schemes, plain language, and traditional themes) made him seem conservative not only in his politics but also in his writing. Frost never, though, really lost his popularity with the broad reading public, and any objections to his work from professional literary critics actually helped stimulate fruitful defenses and debate. He thus remained an important fixture on the American literary landscape.

The death of Elinor on March 20, 1938, was a major blow, for despite the frequent tensions in their relationship, she had been a major part of his life since his late teens. Now, without her, he became severely depressed and, almost on the rebound, proposed marriage to a young woman named Kathleen Morrison (who at the time was married to a friend of Frost's and who was also the mother of several children). She refused his proposal, but they did begin a secret long-term affair while she officially served as his secretary for many years. Frost was proud of his continued sexual vigor, and he often boasted about the affair to male friends (Meyers 245–246). In the meantime, literary accomplishments continued and literary recognitions piled up, including a gold medal from the National Institute of Arts and Letters in 1939 and an appointment at Harvard that same year. Frost had even, by this time, chosen Lawrance Thompson as his official biographer (with the proviso that any book not appear until after his death). It was, however, the death by suicide of his own son, Carol, that was most on Frost's mind in 1940—an incident that was just the latest in a long line of sad events that often made his family life so different from his professional career. In the 1940s that career continued to prosper: another appointment from Harvard in 1941, a new book of poems (The Witness Tree) in 1942, yet another Pulitzer Prize in 1943, an appointment from Dartmouth that same year, another book (A Masque of Reason) in 1945, an updated edition of his Collected Poems in 1946, the publication of two new books (Steeple Bush and A Masque of Mercy) in 1947, a new appointment at Amherst in 1948, and publication of the Complete Poems of Robert Frost 1949 (to positive reviews and good sales) at the end of the decade. Likewise, the 1950s saw many further distinctions and achievements. In 1950 itself, the U.S. Senate honored Frost with a resolution of praise; in 1953 he won a major fellowship from the Academy of American Poets; 1954 included an invitation to the White House and a major dinner in his honor, not to mention the publication of a new collection of poems (Aforesaid); in 1955 the state of Vermont named a mountain after him; while in 1957 he was awarded honorary degrees by both Oxford and Cambridge universities in England. While visiting in Britain to receive these awards, Frost was widely praised, and the following year—1958—included another invitation to the White House and several new official distinctions, followed by a major celebration of his 85th birthday in 1959. Congress awarded him a gold medal in 1960, but perhaps the highlight of Frost's national recognition was his selection, by the newly elected president John F. Kennedy, to read his poetry at the inaugural ceremony in January 1961. A major trip to Russia (where he met the Soviet leader) followed in 1962, but by this time Frost's health was in serious decline, and by the end of the year he was in the hospital, where doctors diagnosed cancer. Even in his waning days, however, he was awarded one last major honor (the Bollingen Prize for Poetry), and on January 29, 1963, he died. His public career as a poet had begun late but had lasted long and had been extraordinarily successful, and, unlike many writers who are prominent in their own days but whose reputations subsequently decline, Frost has continued, even after his death, to live a vigorous and well-respected life in the many vital poems he composed—poems that remain both widely read and widely admired.

“The Tuft of Flowers” (1906, 1913)

The speaker is working alone in a field, turning over the grass that has been mowed earlier in the day by another worker, whose companionship the speaker misses (even though he realizes that the essential human condition is one of fundamental loneliness). Just when the speaker has reached this conclusion, however, he notices that a butterfly is circling around a tuft of flowers that the mower, out of an innate appreciation for their beauty, decided to spare. Responding to this gesture, the speaker suddenly feels a sense of brotherhood with the mower and with other human beings, who are linked not only by their common labor but also by their shared appreciation of natural loveliness.

This poem is not only one of Frost's earliest but is also one of his most typical. As do many of his works, it uses plain, simple language and clear, straightforward sentence structures. The diction is ordinary and uncomplicated; the tone is understated and undramatic; and the pace (like the pace of the worker the poem describes) is deliberate and unhurried. As is common in Frost's works, the setting is rural, and the behavior the work depicts is normal and prosaic; the poem uses a highly traditional structure (rhymed couplets) and employs one of the most common of all English poetic meters (iambic pentameter, in which 10 syllables occur in each line, with the even syllables usually accented and the odd syllables usually unaccented). The iambic rhythm is perfectly regular and steady for the first nine lines; only in the first syllable of line 10 does Frost violate this predictable arrangement. Likewise, until we reach line 8, all the previous couplets had ended with periods; thus, when Frost departs from this pattern in line 8, the statement he makes there and in the next two lines has extra emphasis. As it happens, it is precisely in those lines that the speaker stresses a theme—human loneliness—that is central not only to this particular work but to many of Frost's other poems. The key word ("alone"; l. 8) is accentuated through rhyme, through placement at the end of a line, and through the unusual punctuation that both precedes and follows it. Thus, despite the surface plainness of his writing, Frost also demonstrates his subtle skill and craftsmanship. The details of his poems are always more carefully chosen than is first apparent, and the regular patterns he establishes help emphasize any departures from them.

In line 12, for instance, the phrase "a bewildered" not only disrupts the normal iambic pattern of the line but also mimics, through that disruption, the very bewilderment the phrase describes. Likewise, the same kind of meaningful disruption occurs with the use of the word tremulous in line 18. Examples such as these reveal that Frost had a sensitive ear for the sounds of poetry—a trait also revealed (for instance) in his use of quadruple alliteration in line 22 ("At a tall tuft of flowers beside a brook"). This line, of course, deserves special emphasis because it offers the first reference to the crucial fact of the surviving flowers, and Frost highlights this key moment not only through his stress on similar consonant sounds (all those ts and fs and ls and bs) but also through his immediately subsequent use of a memorable metaphor (the "leaping tongue of bloom," which compares the colorful flowers to a flame; l. 23). Although the poem is not without its flaws (such as the cliché of "as far as eye could see"; l. 17), on the whole it is impressively successful, particularly in the way the final lines not only echo but reverse the conclusion earlier stated in lines 9–10. In this respect, as in so many others, the work reveals the kind of careful craftsmanship that makes Frost such a reliably accomplished writer.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the depictions of man's relationship with nature in this poem and in Jack London's short story "To Build a Fire." In addition, discuss the ways both works present the relations of human beings in a natural setting. How does the speaker of Frost's poem differ, in his attitudes toward other people, from the central character of London's story?
2. How does this poem resemble and/or differ from Ezra Pound's poem "The River-Merchant's Wife: A Letter" in its treatment of such themes as loneliness and the desire for companionship? How, in both works, do we see a change in the speaker's attitudes and feelings over time? How do the conclusions of the poems differ?
3. Discuss the use of irony in this poem. For example, how and why is it ironic that the cutting of the grass reveals the brook? How and why is it ironic that the flowers are identified as weeds? How is the speech at the very end ironic?

"The Pasture" (1913)

The speaker announces his intention to perform various farm-related tasks, but then, after each announcement, he invites an unidentified addressee to join him on his rounds.

In this very brief but highly intriguing text, Frost displays many of the traits that make him such a memorable poet. In some respects the poem seems, at first glance, unremarkable. It uses, for the most part, the iambic rhythm so common in English poetry—rhythm that Frost himself considered close to the rhythms of typical English speech. In iambic rhythm, each even syllable is accented, while each odd syllable is not, and “The Pasture” employs this rhythm without variation in the first three lines of each stanza—a pattern that helps the poem seem both simple and traditional in its music. The work also employs (again in the first three lines of each stanza) the highly common pentameter (or five-foot) line length so frequently used in so many poems written in English: Each of those lines is exactly 10 syllables long (no more, no less). Once again, then, Frost writes in a way that makes his poem appear, at first, highly conventional and unremarkable. In its subject matter, too, the poem seems almost mundane: The speaker will clear some leaves from a spring, and then he will go to fetch a calf. In short, at first there seems nothing at all unusual about this poem.

But then, of course, Frost catches us completely by surprise, for in the fourth line of each stanza, he not only drops (without warning) from 10 syllables to eight, but he also departs completely from the rhyme scheme the poem had seemed to be establishing: The first three lines lead us to expect that the fourth line will rhyme with the first (abba), but instead the fourth line rhymes with nothing that precedes it (abbc); likewise, a similar surprise awaits us at the end of stanza 2, where the rhyme scheme is as follows: decc. This kind of structure is highly unusual (to say the least), and it helps reinforce the speaker’s sudden shift, at the end of each stanza, from his own intentions and activities to the desired presence of the unnamed person he addresses. Frost, in other words, uses simple diction, simple rhythms, and a structure that at first seems completely predictable to produce a poem that is nonetheless startling in its inventiveness and effect. Each fourth line gets maximal emphasis, not only because of its brevity and departure from the expected pattern of rhyme but also because of Frost’s wonderful combination of assonance (emphasis on shared vowel sounds) and alliteration (emphasis on shared consonants) in the repeated and heavily accented words “gone long” and “You . . . too” (ll. 4, 8). Although the speaker at first seems totally focused, in each stanza, on his rural tasks, each last line makes it obvious how much he values and yearns for the companionship of the unnamed person he addresses. By leaving the identity of this addressee unclear, Frost adds to the mystery, charm, and intrigue of the poem. We cannot be sure whose company the speaker wants, but on one level the you must surely be the reader himself (or herself). The poem (which was often printed as a prefatory lyric at the head of collections of Frost’s verse) functions, in one way, as an invitation by the poet to the reader to enter the poet’s rural world. The imagery of the pasture, the spring, and the tottering calf suggests an idyllic world of calm, peace, plenty, and life, and the fourth line of each stanza extends and intensifies that sense of harmony when the speaker, in his understated way, offers a hand of friendship both to the anonymous addressee and to the reader as well.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with the poem by William Carlos Williams titled “This Is Just to Say.” How are they similar in the kinds of actions they depict, the kind of language they use, and the ways they include an unnamed addressee as part of the “plot” of the poem?
2. How does the effectiveness of this poem depend, in part, on its brevity? How and why might the poem be less effective if it consisted of 10 similar stanzas rather than just two? How might such lengthy repetition change our perception of the speaker? In terms of the poem as it presently exists, what kind of person do you imagine the speaker to be? Explain your response by pointing to specific evidence in the text.

“After Apple-Picking” (1914)

Having spent an entire day picking apples, the speaker is exhausted from his work; he describes the labor involved in picking apples and anticipates the troubled sleep that will soon descend upon him.

As many of Frost’s poems do, this one blends tradition and innovation and fuses the conventional with the unusual. It describes a common activity in a familiar rural setting, yet it is also strangely suggestive—as if the poet implies more than he openly states. Likewise, the poem is provocative in form and techniques as well as in subject matter and theme: It uses rhyme and meter, but it does so in highly unpredictable, unorthodox ways. At first glance, it seems merely to use realistic details to depict mundane activities, but on closer inspection it also seems highly suggestive. Thus, in the same way that dreams often blend credible data with imaginative coloring, so does this poem.

The poem opens with a seemingly simple fact: “My long two-pointed ladder’s sticking through a tree” (l. 1). The line describing the long ladder is itself unusually long (12 syllables), and although the line can be forced into a regular iambic pattern (in which even syllables are accented and odd syllables are not), the rhythm sounds less regularly patterned. That fact, combined with the apostrophe-plus-s of ladder’s, helps create an immediate impression of a relaxed, unassuming speaker describing a literal, everyday scene. But then, of course, Frost surprises us in the second line, which adds that the ladder is pointing “Toward heaven still.” Here the use of the word heaven (rather than, say, the sky) gives the line metaphorical resonance; the speaker no longer seems simply to be describing facts but to be using figurative language. The extreme brevity of the second line (which can be read as having only three syllables) also catches our attention, especially since the first line had been so lengthy. In the space of just two lines, then, Frost has already set the tone for the rest of this unusual poem: He has combined the mundane and the metaphorical, the literal and the imaginative, and he has also shown a willingness to play freely with form. All these traits will appear repeatedly as the poem proceeds: Rhyme will be used, but the rhyme scheme will be completely unpredictable; line lengths will vary radically and without warning (reaching a radical minimum of just two syllables in line 32); and sometimes the speaker will seem to be describing simple data while at other times he will seem to be implying something more—although the exact nature of what he may be implying will never be precisely clear. This, in short, is a puzzling and intriguing poem.

Frost’s freedom with form in this poem means that when he does revert to regularity (especially in rhythm), his phrasing has maximum impact. Line 6, for instance, is especially memorable because it is the first clear example of regular iambic pentameter to have appeared up to that point: “But I am done with apple-picking now.” The steady beat lends a sense of strong assurance to the line—an assurance that contrasts with the irregularity of much of the rest of the work. And in fact throughout the poem Frost continually surprises us, alternating between present and past, the real and the remembered, the literal and the figurative. At one point, for instance, he mentions looking through a “pane of glass” (l. 10), but it soon becomes clear that this “pane” was not real glass but merely a sheet of ice. At another point (lines 18–36), it is not clear at first whether the speaker is already dreaming or whether he is describing remembered events. Even when the speaker mentions the “load on load” of apples coming in (l. 26), the phrasing can be read both literally and figuratively, and throughout the poem Frost blurs distinctions between what is strictly “real” and what is metaphorical. Is the poem simply about the process of picking apples, or is it about any kind of human labor? Is it about labor merely, or is it about the larger process of living? Is the sleep mentioned merely sleep, or is it also death? Should we be reminded, when reading this poem describing the labor involved in picking apples, of the curse of labor that resulted after an apple was picked in the Garden of Eden? Frost never makes the answers to any of these questions (or numerous others) blatantly clear, and ultimately that sense of mystery is part of both the charm and the power of this poem.

For Discussion or Writing

1. CARL SANDBURG’S poem “Child of the Romans” also describes a worker’s pause after long labor. Discuss the similarities and differences between that work and Frost’s poem, paying particular attention to such matters as setting, characterization, point of view, and tone. How does the purpose of Frost’s poem seem to differ from the purpose of Sandburg’s? Which poem would you describe as more reflective, and which poem

- would you describe as more propagandistic or political? Explain your response by pointing to details from both works.
2. Discuss the kind of weariness described in this poem in relation to the kind discussed in LANGSTON HUGHES's poem "The Weary Blues." Discuss the use of sleep imagery in both poems; discuss the points of view used in both works; and discuss the social and political implications (if any) in both texts. How does Frost use the form of his poem to create a kind of "dreamy" impact? What kind of impact is created by the use of form in Hughes's poem?
 3. Discuss the relative absence of punctuation at the ends of lines 1–5 and its heavy presence in lines 6–8. Why did Frost want those latter lines to be so heavily punctuated? Why does he shift away from such heavy punctuation in lines 9–12? How do such alterations contribute to the effectiveness of the poem and prevent any sense of predictable monotony?

"The Death of the Hired Man" (1914)

When a farmer named Warren returns to his house after going to the market, his wife, Mary, informs him that Silas, an old and somewhat undependable laborer who has worked on their farm in the past, has returned and wants to work there again. Warren is reluctant to rehire him, but Mary is more forgiving and stresses the old man's physical weakness and emotional vulnerability. After the couple reminisce about Silas's character and past behavior (including his frustrated attempts to mentor a young bookish fellow worker named Harold), Warren's attitude begins to soften, but when he goes to talk to Silas, he discovers that the old man has died.

In many ways this lengthy poem of 175 lines resembles an accomplished short story or even a brief play. Written mostly in iambic pentameter blank verse (with lines ranging in length from eight to 13 syllables, although usually containing 10 or 11), the poem moves with the ease and clarity of lucid prose and contains many elements of effective drama, particularly since much of the work consists of straightforward dialogue. All four main characters are deftly sketched, and the comments by Warren and Mary about Silas and Harold tell us as much (if not more) about the married couple and their relationship as about the workers they describe. Mary at first seems the more gentle-natured and forgiving of the two, whereas Warren seems more judgmental and sharper edged. By the end of the poem, however, Warren's thinking and feelings have evolved—a fact that makes the death of Silas all the more sadly ironic. Just when Warren seems prepared to greet the old man with compassion and understanding, both he and we discover that Silas is dead. Of course, the title of the poem foreshadows his death from the very beginning, but suspense nevertheless remains, since we do not discover until the last lines the exact circumstances of his demise or the precise nature of its impact on Warren and Mary. Indeed, it is not even clear until the very end whether the "death" referred to in the title will be literal or simply metaphorical, and in some ways it is metaphorical before it becomes a literal fact. Thus the poem maintains an air of uncertainty despite its title, especially since the work's main interest derives less from the fate of the hired man than from the subtle nuances of the interaction between the married couple. The poem is at least as much about them and their relationship as it is about Silas.

In numerous ways this poem is highly typical of Frost's writing. It emphasizes, for instance, the often hard and lonely lives of New England farm folk (and, by implication, says much about the essential loneliness of the human condition). As do the couple who speak in this work, Frost himself combines realism with sympathy in his response to Silas; he refuses to mock the people he writes about, but he also refuses to present them sentimentally. Thus Silas's death is presented quickly and without explicit comment, either from Warren or from Frost; a lesser poet would have been tempted to engage in maudlin moralizing. Warren never has a chance to welcome Silas home or even extend a bit of sympathy and understanding, but Frost, in his typically laconic fashion, feels no impulse to spell out any lessons about missed opportunities—or any lessons at all. Instead he offers a convincingly level-headed and unromantic work that offers a believable “slice of life” (and of death) in credible and effective phrasing.

It is, of course, the detailed phrasing of any poem that makes it worth reading, and this work by Frost offers many adroit details. Line 11, for instance—in which Warren exclaims, “When was I ever anything but kind to him?”—shows effectively how Frost can gain extra emphasis by playing the rhythms of speech off against his underlying iambic pattern, and the same line also shows how he sometimes lengthens or shortens lines to give them added impact. Likewise, in line 18 he uses metrical variation to emphasize the key word Off; and he uses the same technique in line 23 to stress the crucial word fixed. Throughout the poem, in fact, Frost shows a similar attention to precise detail, as in Warren’s effectively brief “I’m done” (which is contrasted with an exceptionally long preceding sentence [ll. 25–30]); or in Mary’s glancing aside (“You needn’t smile”; l. 37), which implies Warren’s thoughts without openly stating them; or in Mary’s two-word reply (“But little”; l. 46) when asked what Silas had said, so that her own brevity matches his. Throughout the poem Frost skillfully foreshadows its conclusion (see, for example, the references to “nodding off” in line 44, or the reference to “sleep” in line 60, or the image of the falling moon in 106), and he also subtly suggests the key final theme of missed chances in lines 80, 89, and 105. In addition, the poem is full of sly ironies: Thus Silas, considered a failure by so many others, presumes to offer advice to the ambitious and successful Harold (l. 100), while it is, ironically, his own family (rather than his employers) who can least tolerate his worldly failings (l. 147). Likewise, Warren ironically proclaims that Silas’s working days are done (l. 160) just moments before he discovers that all of the old man’s days have ended. Irony, however, is just one of many features that contribute to the complex tone of this work, for Frost combines such irony with such other techniques as prosaic statements, lyrical phrasing (see, for instance, lines 106–113), and epigrammatic reflection (as in the famous competing definitions of home in lines 122–125). However, in addition to offering tonal complications, the poem features complex characterization. Mary, for instance, can be both tender and assertive, while Warren can seem both cynical and kind. Even Silas himself is multifaceted (especially in his attitudes toward Harold—attitudes that seem to combine jealousy, injured pride, and almost paternal concern). Frost, in short, has created a poem that is rich on numerous levels; it is a work that well rewards rereading.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with Edwin Arlington Robinson’s “Richard Cory.” Discuss the similarities and differences between the lonely title figures of the two works; how do they respond differently to the challenges they face? How are they similar and/or different in their relations with other people and in their social positions? How do their deaths differ?
2. In what ways does Silas resemble and/or differ from the main character of SHERWOOD ANDERSON’s story titled “Hands”? In what ways are both characters somewhat inscrutable? Discuss their relations with people younger than they. What does each man seek from such relations? How is each man disappointed by such relations?
3. Discuss in detail Frost’s use of various literary devices in the opening 10-line section of this poem. How do these devices contribute to the effectiveness of the passage and thus make us want to read further? For example, why does Frost use alliteration so heavily in the opening sentence? How does he create suspense? Why are the spoken comments so brief? Discuss the significance of the actions and gestures depicted. How do various details in this passage subtly suggest the class of the people described?

“Home Burial” (1914)

This poem explores the marital tensions that result from the death of a couple’s baby and its burial

(by the husband) on their rural property, in a small family burial plot within sight of their house: The wife, burdened by grief, accuses the husband of callousness, especially because of an offhand remark he made in the immediate aftermath of burying the child; meanwhile, the husband is baffled, frustrated, and even angered by her accusations and coldness, which he considers unfair. At the end of the poem, as the wife prepares to walk out of their house in anger, the husband threatens to retrieve her by force.

Like many of Frost's other successful long poems, this one is written in blank (or unrhymed) verse and uses a basically iambic rhythm (in which even-numbered syllables are accented) and basically pentameter lines (consisting of 10 syllables each). As "The Death of a Hired Man" does, this poem features a lengthy conversation of a married couple, but the differences between the two works are as significant as their similarities. That poem dealt with the death of an old man; this one deals with the death of a baby. That poem presented a reasonable if sometimes strained conversation between a genuinely loving couple; this one presents an often-heated debate between a husband and wife whose personalities and basic assumptions seem fundamentally at odds. In "Death" the wife had seemed full of sympathy, charity, rationality, and forgiveness; in the present poem the wife seems cold, judgmental, and unreasonably harsh. In "Death" the husband had seemed the harder edged of the two, but in "Home Burial" the husband, although sometimes inept in choosing his words, nonetheless seems desperate to accommodate his wife and achieve reconciliation. Finally, whereas the husband had softened in his attitude by the end of "Death," in "Home Burial" the husband's harshest words are the last ones he speaks. These are just a few of the many differences between two poems that nonetheless also resemble one another in numerous ways. It is almost as if Frost wrote a pair of companion pieces in order to illustrate the breadth of his poetic range. Whatever the case, the two poems are mutually illuminating.

The poem opens with a perfectly regular iambic pentameter line ("He saw her from the bottom of the stairs") that also shows Frost's skill in the use of enjambment—the technique of running a sentence past the end of an unpunctuated line. In the present case, the opening sentence concludes with the significant phrase "Before she saw him," but that important fact is delayed until the beginning of line 2. The delayed phrase is also metrically irregular, giving it even further emphasis. Frost's craftsmanship in the use of such sound effects is likely to be unnoticed by the casual reader, but it is precisely this kind of craft that makes him such a noteworthy poet. He had an excellent ear and a superb sense of rhythm, and it was his ability to create apparently plain and simple speech while subtly employing all the sophisticated devices of meter and other sound effects (such as enjambment) that helps make his poetry so accomplished in such understated ways. Frost is not a "flashy" poet who calls overt attention to the artfulness of his art; it is, indeed, the seeming artlessness of his verse that so often makes it so impressive. Thus the physical positions of the couple in these opening lines (she is above; he is below) seem both perfectly mundane and appropriately symbolic: At the start of the work, the wife is both literally and figuratively in the superior position and looks down on her husband in both senses of the term. Meanwhile, his movement up the stairs is both entirely natural and effectively symbolic, and by the end of the poem he has assumed a position that is both literally and figuratively domineering. Also worth noting, moreover, is the way Frost uses the first 30 lines of the poem to put us, as readers, into the same position of confusion and uncertainty as the husband: Just as he is not sure what his wife is talking about, neither are we. Frost could easily have made clear from the very beginning that the wife was preoccupied with her dead child; instead, by withholding that information for the first quarter of the poem, he makes his readers share in (and feel) the husband's uncomprehending bafflement. As in any good poem, then, part of the power of this work derives not merely from what is said but from the way the poet shapes the unfolding structure of the work; the work's meaning, in other words, is not simply a matter of content but of form.

Other examples of Frost's technical skill are easy to cite. For instance, when the wife urges the husband not to mention the dead child, her apparently simple phrasing—"Don't, don't, don't, don't," she cried" (l. 31)—not only receives exceptional metrical emphasis but can also be interpreted as simultaneously pleading, threatening, angry, pained, and/or desperate (to mention just a few possibilities). Thus, what seems on the surface a perfect example of plain, mundane, and unadorned speech seems, on reflection, one of the most highly artful moments of the poem (especially since this example of repetition also resembles the famous "Never, never, never, never" in act 5, scene 3 of Shakespeare's King Lear [Meyers 49]—a moment that also deals with the profoundly felt loss of a loved one). Later, when the husband urges his wife, "Don't—don't go. Don't carry it [i.e., her grief] to someone else this time" (ll. 59–60), his words subtly echo her own earlier outburst, but now the emotional overtones are quieter and more pathetic. Through such subtle links and contrasts, Frost crafts a poem as interesting for its poetic skill as for the tense interaction it describes. A less skillful poet could have depicted the very same events and themes and produced a much less effective work. It is Frost's talent as an artist that brings the poem to vivid and memorable life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the ways marital tension is depicted in this poem and in Edwin Arlington Robinson's "Eros Turannos." How do the wives in the two poems differ? How are the husbands in the two poems unlike? How do the sources of tension in the two poems contrast? What similarities exist between the characters and circumstances the two poems depict? Discuss the forms and points of view used in these poems.
2. Compare and contrast the marriage presented in Frost's poem with the one described in SUISIN FAR's story "Mrs. Spring Fragrance." How are the tones of the two works different? How do the relations between husband and wife in the two works reflect the different cultural backgrounds of the two sets of couples? Discuss the endings of the two works; how do the differences in these endings reflect the differences in the genres of the two works?
3. Discuss the various ways in which dashes are used in this poem. What are their specific purposes and effects in various particular instances? For example, how does the dash in line 7 differ in purpose and effect from the dash in line 116? Why are dashes used so frequently in this poem? How are they relevant to some of the main themes of the work?

"Mending Wall" (1914)

The speaker begins the poem by noting that walls—especially those marking divisions of property—are difficult to maintain and seem destined to fall: They inevitably collapse, are undermined by natural processes, or are vandalized by humans. Even so, when the speaker tries to convince his neighbor that the wall dividing their rural properties is not worth repairing and maintaining, his neighbor insists, "Good fences make good neighbors," and so each spring the two of them repair the wall that not only separates them but also marks their continuing connection.

As many of Frost's poems do, this one has a rural setting and focuses on relations between country neighbors and indeed on the concept of neighborliness itself. The two men in the poem are simultaneously connected but separated, linked but also distinct, and in that sense they symbolize the common human condition, for in Frost's works human beings are often outwardly aligned yet also fundamentally alone. The speaker's desire to cease repairing the wall can thus be seen, in one sense, as reflecting a deeper desire for a more fundamental kind of friendship and communion, but part of the paradox of the poem is that it is the yearly ritual of repairing the wall that helps bind these two men in conversation and community. Fixing the wall gives them a common project; it gives them something to do together and something to talk about, and it does not seem an accident that the only people mentioned in the poem are two men. Two women would probably find it easier to talk to one another; two families (especially two sets of children) would probably feel less separated by the wall than the male speaker seems to feel. The fact that no wives or children are mentioned enhances the sense of loneliness and isolation that is one of the underlying themes not only of this poem but of many of Frost's works. The wall, paradoxically, is the means by which these two men are both divided and united. While some analysts argue that Frost sides with the speaker's skepticism about maintaining the wall, and while other commentators contend that Frost endorses the neighbor's commitment to repairing the wall, most critics suggest that the poem (like the wall itself) is ambivalent—that Frost lets each man have his say, sees merit in the arguments of each, and finally (as so often in his poems) leaves the issue unresolved.

Whatever the final "meaning" of this poem, its particular techniques are often memorable and effective. It opens, for instance, with a blunt, plain statement of theme that the rest of the poem will then proceed to complicate and perhaps even undermine (just as the seemingly solid wall itself is undermined by natural and human forces). The opening statement, like much of the rest of the poem, is typical of Frost's writing in its simple, common diction; critics have noted how few of Frost's words (here and elsewhere) are derived from Latin roots and how many can be traced to Anglo-Saxon origins—a trait that helps give Frost's phrasing its air of blunt directness. To say this, however, is not to imply that the poem lacks subtlety or craft, for indeed part of the impressiveness of Frost's achievement is his ability to combine apparent plainness with understated art. In the poem's first few lines, for example, he parallels and juxtaposes two emphatic verbs—sends in line 2 and the similarly positioned spills in line 3—to stress destructive actions from below and from above, the one associated with cold and the other with heat. Meanwhile, the hyphenated phrase "frozen-groundswell" (l. 2) mimics the very swelling it describes, while the words gaps and pass in line 4 combine both assonance (repetition of vowels) and alliteration (repetition of consonants). In all these ways and in many others, therefore, Frost shows a keen attention not only to the "plot" and "theme" of the work but to its rhythms, structure, and sounds; he never forgets that the importance of a poem lies less in its meaning than in its craft.

Further craft is demonstrated later in the poem, for example, in its heavy use of parallel phrasing (as in lines 10, 14–15, 16, and 17). Such parallelism, by its very nature, reinforces the poem's key idea of things that are similar yet separate, connected but distinct. Yet Frost employs numerous other devices to prevent his plain diction and blank verse from seeming merely mundane or prosaic. He sometimes uses near-rhymes, for example, to keep the poem sounding "poetic" (as in the way the word out at the end of line 33 echoes the word cows at the end of line 31, or in the way the word trees at the end of line 42 echoes the word me at the end of the preceding line). Or he uses metaphors, as in the nicely succinct statement "He is all pine and I am apple orchard" (l. 24). And he uses a sly and humorous play on words, suggesting that to build a wall is to risk giving "offense" (i.e., a fence; l. 34). In all these ways and in many others, Frost gives the poem the kind of richness we associate with poetry more than with any other genre, but he does so in ways that keep this work (like much of the rest of his writing) simultaneously unobtrusive yet still intriguing.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the symbolism of the wall in this poem with the symbolism of the "western gate" in Edwin Arlington Robinson's poem "Luke Havergal." How do both poems deal with the theme of separation? What are the differences between the separated characters in the two works? How do the tones and conclusions of the two poems differ? How and why is humor used in Frost's poem but not in Robinson's?
2. How and why is wall imagery used differently in this poem than in H. D.'s work titled The Walls Do Not Fall (especially sections 1 and 43)? What do walls symbolize for H. D.'s speaker? What do they symbolize for the speaker of Frost's poem? One poem is set in a peaceful rural environment; the other poem is set in a war-torn urban area. How do these contrasting contexts of the walls help determine the significance of the wall imagery in each work?

3. How and why might a Marxist critic respond to this poem? What does the poem suggest about “private property”? What is the probable class of the two men featured in this poem? Does their focus on maintaining boundaries seem ironic in any way from a Marxist perspective?

“Birches” (1916)

The speaker notes that white birch trees, especially when they are bent, present a striking contrast to nearby darker trees, and although he would like to think that playing boys have bent the trees by climbing in them and grabbing their branches to descend back to the ground, he knows that the branches have actually been bent by ice storms that have weighed them down and forever altered their shapes. After describing the storms and their effects, he returns to his fantasy of boys climbing the trees and bending their branches by holding them to return to solid ground. Musing on life's troubles, and recalling that he himself once swung from birch trees, he wishes that he could now climb toward heaven but then descend gently back to earth on bending branches.

As so often in his long poems, Frost here uses blank (or unrhymed) verse consisting mostly of 10 syllables per line, although sometimes he uses 11 syllables and occasionally 12. The first four lines of the work use perfectly regular iambic pentameter meter, in which the even syllables are accented and the odd syllables are not. Afterward, however, the meter of the poem becomes much less predictable and much more erratic; in a poem that deals so insistently with motion, movement, and literal swinging, this kind of frequent departure from metrical regularity is often effective, allowing Frost to emphasize key syllables, words, or phrases, as in the heavily accented phrase “As ice storms do” (l. 5), or the word Loaded (l. 5), where the first syllable receives unusual stress, or the heavily emphasized phrase “hung limp” (l. 2), where the rhythm mimics the sense. Frost, in other words, shows his usual skill in orchestrating the sounds of a poem to reflect and reinforce its meaning, and the fact that the meter in this work is so unpredictable helps contribute to the heavily conversational style of the lyric—a quality also enhanced by the absence of rhyme, the frequent use of enjambed (or run-on) lines, the repeated use of unaccented final syllables, the repeated references to “I,” the stress on personal memories and personal aspirations, and the implicit inclusion of readers themselves in the experiences the poem describes (as in the your of line 45). The structure of the poem seems loose rather than rigidly patterned, as the speaker himself explicitly concedes in lines 21–22: The work begins by offering one possible (and fanciful) explanation of the bent birches (ll. 1–3), then suddenly shifts to a more realistic explanation (ll. 4–20), then shifts back to fantasy that also seems to combine elements of personal memory (ll. 21–40), then makes the emphasis on personal memory explicit (ll. 41–49), and then concludes by focusing on wishes and hopes for the future (ll. 50–59). The speaker expresses highly personal recollections and aspirations, but obviously he also speaks for any person who has ever enjoyed the carefree play of childhood, or experienced the disappointments and worries of adulthood, or longed for a way of recapturing simple joys in the midst of life's complexities. In the poem's last line, Frost moves closer than he usually does to stating an explicit theme, lesson, or “moral,” but for the most part the speaker resists any didactic impulse. Ironically, though, by speaking so convincingly of and for himself, he also speaks for numerous readers, as the enduring popularity of this poem attests.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss this poem in relation to THORNTON WILDER's play Our Town. In particular, discuss the relations between past and present and between youth and age in both works. How do both texts try to avoid sentimentality? How is childhood presented from a double perspective in both texts? What do both texts suggest about the process of loss through maturation?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with Jack London's story “The Law of Life.” How is nature presented in both works? How is man's place in nature described? In which work is the emphasis on man's place in society more strongly emphasized? How do the tones and conclusions of the two works differ?

3. Why and how does the speaker use the word you so often in the first 20 lines of the poem? How does his use of that word contribute to the poem's tone and effectiveness? How does his use of that word help to involve the reader? In what other ways does the tone of the poem seem casual and conversational, and what other devices does Frost use to help create that tone?

"An Old Man's Winter Night" (1916)

In the darkness of the night, an old man is alone in a storage room in his empty house; he has entered the room with a lantern, but now he cannot remember why he went there. The sounds of his clomping feet disturb the quiet night, but eventually he falls asleep, and the poem ends by emphasizing the theme of human isolation.

As in many of his best poems, Frost here uses blank verse and a basically iambic pentameter meter that allows him to create subtle and effective variations once the iambic pattern has been established. The opening line, for instance, is strictly regular in its iambic beat: Each even-numbered syllable is accented, while each odd-numbered syllable is not. Then, in the second line, both of the first two syllables are unaccented, so that the next two ("thin frost") receive extra emphasis. Frost's skill at using meter, however, is only one of the traits that make him an effective poet. In the present work, for instance, the title uses three key words (Old, Winter, and Night) to create immediately a melancholy mood—a mood the poem then develops and sustains. That mood is instantly reinforced by the word darkly (l. 1), an adverb that is both a literal description of the lack of light and metaphorically appropriate to the sad and somewhat ominous tone of the poem. Although Frost uses personification when describing nature (not only in line 1 but later on as well), that technique is ironic in this work, for the whole point of the poem is to emphasize man's separation and isolation from nature, no matter how often nature is described in human terms. As the poem proceeds, Frost continues to pile on words that enhance the overall sense of coldness and alienation, including "frost" (l. 2), "separate" (l. 2), "empty" (l. 3), and "loss" (l. 8). Loss, of course, is an especially important word in this poem; the old man is "at a loss" not only in the sense that he cannot remember why he entered the storage room but also in the sense that his whole life is now in a process of decline. In his isolation, however, he is also paradoxically a symbol of the common human condition—a fact that Frost makes clear by the end of the poem when he uses the technique of subtracting a word to emphasize the incapacity not only of this "One aged man" but of any "one man" in general (l. 26). By the end of the work, the sleep of the old man not only is literal but also symbolizes the larger sleep of death that will overtake all people during the literal and metaphorical "winter night" of old age and death.

As in all of Frost's best poems, this one is full of specific moments of beauty and poetic skill, as in the memorable image of frost droplets as "separate stars" (l. 2), or in the rhythmic repetition of "What kept" in lines 4 and 6, or in the near-rhyme of "gaze" and "age" in lines 4 and 7, or in the use of onomatopoeia in the double use of "clomping" in lines 10–11, or in the staccato use of alliteration in the description of the old man's footsteps "beating on a box" (l. 14). Describing the house as a "box" emphasizes its empty lifelessness, while using the past tense of know in 16 underscores the old man's sense of loss. Frost likewise shows his skill in arranging syntax (or sentence structure) when he begins line 15 by saying, "A light he was" but then ends the sentence by adding "to no one but himself": The poet gives with the first four words but then takes away with the final five. He uses a similar technique a bit later when he first mentions (in neutral terms) a simple "moon" (l. 18) but then appends a deflating adjective: "the broken moon" (l. 19). Likewise, Frost shows his talent for delaying key facts by appending a simple two-word phrase ("And slept") at the end of an unusually long sentence (ll. 18–23) and by putting that phrase at the very beginning a line, where it not only has extra emphasis but also catches us by surprise. In all these ways and many others, Frost shows that he can take a tried-and-true theme (human loneliness) and make something fresh and original of it.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with T. S. ELIOT's poem titled "Gerontion." Discuss the works in terms of such matters as setting, point of view, characterization, imagery, symbolism, form, and style. How would you describe the differences of the poems in terms of purpose and impact?
2. Discuss this work in relation to ERNEST HEMINGWAY's short novel The Old Man and the Sea. What differences exist between the two old men? How are the settings and actions described in the two works fundamentally distinct? How are the social situations of the two old men different? Which old man is more pathetic, and why? What is the ultimate effect of each work?
3. Analyze the poem's use of various sound effects, such as assonance and near-rhymes. Where does Frost employ such methods, and how do they contribute to the continuity, flow, and effectiveness of the poem? Analyze their impact, for instance, on lines 1–7.

"Out, Out——" (1916)

A boy living in idyllic rural New England has been cutting wood with a power saw for his family's stove; just when he is about to stop work in order to eat supper, he loses control of the saw and realizes that his hand has been cut off. Later, after he has been anesthetized by a doctor, his strength ebbs away and he dies. The people who witness his death soon return to their own routines.

Like many of Frost's narrative poems, this one is written in blank (or unrhymed) verse with a basically iambic meter. The title alludes to lines from Shakespeare's Macbeth ("Out, out, brief candle! / Life's but a walking shadow" [5.5.23–24]) and thus foreshadows the work's emphasis on the fleeting nature of human existence. In this case, that existence is especially fleeting, since the victim of accidental death is only a boy—yet a boy trying to be a man by helping with the family chores. Frost begins the poem with words whose cacophonous music imitates the sounds of the tool they describe ("The buzz saw snarled and rattled"; l. 1), and he soon repeats the key words—"snarled and rattled, snarled and rattled" (l. 7)—not only to emphasize them but also to mimic the repetitive sound of the saw. The verb snarled makes the saw sound almost like a living beast, while the word rattled implies a more mechanical effect but may also suggest the sound of a dangerous snake. Yet this is a poem that is full of ironies, and so while Frost immediately makes clear the danger of the saw, he also complicates the effect by giving it pleasant associations as well. Thus the saw produces "Sweet-scented" pieces of cut wood (l. 3) that will be used to stoke the family stove, and in the background of the cutting the boy can glimpse "Five mountain ranges one behind the other / Under the sunset far into Vermont" (ll. 5–6). The setting and mood are almost pastoral, but on second reading we note the irony inherent in the reference to the "sunset" and the similar irony of the ensuing comment that the day "was all but done" (l. 9). This is a poem, after all, in which a boy will die, and so such references to passing time are not insignificant. Similar irony results from the fact that the fatal accident occurs when the boy is called to a nourishing, life-sustaining "Supper" (l. 14), and the fact that the call is given by the boy's own sister simply gives the irony one more agonizing twist. A poem that might easily have become maudlin or sentimental (on the one hand) or merely gruesome and grotesque (on the other) instead strikes a difficult balance: Frost allows us to sympathize with the victim without himself descending into manipulative pathos. Indeed the ending of the work—in which the bystanders, having witnessed the boy's death, are simply said to have "turned to their affairs" (l. 34)—has been interpreted by some readers as a sarcastic indictment of indifference and by others as a stoic recognition that life must go on. Whichever reading we choose, neither reading makes either Frost or the poem seem sentimental.

As always with Frost, there are wonderful examples of technical skill. Thus the line describing the seemingly mundane end of another mundane day is composed in perfectly regular iambic rhythm (l. 9); later, however, the key verb “Leaped” (l. 16) is metrically emphasized; and a crucial phrase is repeated (after an interruption) with an ominous addition: “the boy saw all—/ . . . / He saw all spoiled” (ll. 22, 25). Frost can be eloquent by using a sentence consisting merely of a single word (“So”; l. 27); he can use rhythm and sentence structure to masterful effect (l. 32); and he can use near-rhyme, in an unrhymed poem, to create a powerful sense of finality (“there” and “affairs” in lines 33–34). In short, what makes this poem great is not the event described (which could easily have been mishandled by a lesser poet) but Frost’s skill and craft. But these traits, as always, are subtle and unobtrusive.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem about death with Wallace Stevens’s lyric titled “The Emperor of Ice Cream.” How do the poems differ in style, tone, and attitude? What differences in plot and characterization help to account for these other differences? What elements make Frost’s poem more “tragic” than the poem by Stevens?
2. Read this poem in conjunction with “The Dead Baby” by WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS. Which of the two works is more sad or pathetic? Why? How do the poems differ in structure, diction, tone, and method? How does the opening stanza of the Williams poem resemble the closing lines of the Frost poem? Which of the two works is more obviously sarcastic?
3. Discuss the implied depiction of gender roles in this poem. What assumptions seem to underlie the poem’s presentation of the activities and responsibilities of males and females? How do you interpret the tone of the final lines? Justify your response.

“The Oven Bird” (1916)

The speaker describes the song made by a kind of warbler known as an ovenbird because the nest it builds—made of mud and vegetation—resembles a small oven. The bird is heard most often (the speaker claims) in midsummer, and he associates its singing with the passing of spring and the transition to fall.

Because this poem consists of 14 lines, most commentators would label it a sonnet, although its rhyme scheme (aabcbddccdeeffgg) is highly unusual, fitting none of the standard patterns found in traditional sonnets. In this respect, the poem is typical of Frost, who liked to use traditional forms while also giving them his own distinctive twist. The poem opens with a strictly regular iambic pentameter line (“There is a singer everyone has heard”; l. 1), in which the even syllables are accented and the odd ones are not, but this regular beat only helps emphasize the irregular rhythm of the succeeding line, especially the key word Loud, which (given its meaning) gets appropriately unusual stress not only because it is accented but also because of its initial position. Here as so often, then, Frost shows his alertness to the musical quality of his poems—a trait especially relevant in a poem about birdsong.

The speaker associates the song of the ovenbird with mutability—particularly with the transition from spring to fall: “He says that leaves are old and that for flowers / Mid-summer is to spring as one to ten” (ll. 4–5). The song of the bird is linked, then, with loss, decline, and diminishment—with falling flowers, with literal darkness, and with the onset of autumn (ll. 6–9). By line 10, with its reference to “highway dust,” the song of the bird has become associated not only with the kind of modernization that destroys nature but also with the death that is the inevitable fate of all living things; the use of the word dust, in particular, reminds us of the biblical idea that we come from dust and return to it when we die (Genesis 3:19). As is often the case in Frost’s lyrics, the tone of this work is dry, objective, and matter-of-fact: He does not lament the fact of death; he merely calls it to our attention. The poet himself, then, is a kind of ovenbird: Part of the purpose of his singing is not simply to celebrate nature and life but to note their inevitable fragility. Paradoxically, by calling attention to their passing he makes us value and appreciate them all the more; it is thanks in part to the singing of the ovenbird that we realize more intensely the beauty of both spring and summer and even the rapidly passing beauty of autumn itself. In describing the ovenbird, the speaker calls attention to his own function as a plain-spoken herald of fundamental facts—as a poet who “knows in singing not to sing” (l. 12) and who, through the skill of his art, manages to make something beautiful and memorable even of “a diminished thing” (l. 14).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with MARIANNE MOORE's poem “What Are Years?” How does each work deal with the issues of mutability and mortality? What is the tone and/or “message” of each work? Which work more obviously has a message? How is bird imagery used in both works? How do the works differ in point of view?
2. Discuss the way the passage of time is treated in this poem and in EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY's lyric titled “First Fig.” Why is Millay's poem so much briefer than Frost's? How is the brevity of the poem appropriate to its theme? Which of the poems is more meditative? Which is more hortatory? What details of the poems account for these differences in stance and tone? How would you describe the personality of the speaker of each work?
3. Where and how does Frost use repetition to emphasize variation in this poem? How does the poem resemble (but also not resemble) a standard Shakespearean sonnet in its final two lines? How do those lines relate to the rest of the work?

“The Road Not Taken” (1916)

During a walk through a forested area in autumn, the speaker came upon diverging roads—one seeming slightly less traveled than the other, although the difference was not very great. After wishing that he could walk down both roads at once, he finally chose the road that seemed slightly less worn, telling himself that someday he would explore the other road (although he doubted that he ever would). The speaker then imagines that a long time in the future, he will be telling people of this choice of roads and will be suggesting that the choice he made was highly significant.

This extremely well-known, highly popular, and seemingly straightforward poem is much less simple than a casual reading might suggest. The poem, in fact, has been interpreted in highly different and often contradictory ways. Some readers, for instance, take the speaker completely at face value, while others believe that the speaker is being mocked by Frost. Some readers believe that the poem endorses unconventional individualism, while others contend that the work offers no such message. Some analysts argue that the poem must be read in light of extra-textual, biographical evidence that suggests that Frost used the work to poke gentle fun at an indecisive friend (his fellow poet Edward Thomas), while other commentators believe that the poem can and should be read on its own terms, without appealing to any special knowledge from outside the text itself. Meanwhile, still other commentators assert that Frost himself initially explained the poem as satire of Thomas but later changed his mind, although this claim itself has been disputed. Thus a poem that initially seems uncomplicated—with its simple diction, its solid rhyme scheme, and its generally iambic meter spread across eight to 10 syllables per line—appears, on closer examination, more complex than a superficial reading might suggest.

The poem begins with a definitive statement of fact: “Two roads diverged in a yellow wood” (l. 1), and indeed few if any complications appear in the rest of the opening stanza. There is a nicely abrupt shift in the first four words of stanza 2, and in fact it is in this second stanza that the poem's real complications begin. At first the speaker seems to make a clear distinction between the two roads (one seemed less well traveled than the other [l. 8]), but then he immediately subverts that distinction, suggesting that the two roads were very much alike (ll. 9–12). It is easy to see, from these lines, how Frost might be mocking the indecisive speaker—a speaker who finds it difficult not simply to choose between the two roads but even to describe them with any real sense of certainty or consistency. The speaker's indecisiveness continues in lines 13–15, so that—ironically—a poem supposedly dealing with irrevocable choice is actually a poem about the difficulty of making up one's mind. Even the famous final lines of the poem seem ironic. Thus the speaker imagines himself asserting, sometime in the distant future, that of the two roads before him, "I took the one less traveled by, / And that has made all the difference" (ll. 19–20). Line 19, however, plainly contradicts lines 9–10, and so even as the poem concludes, the speaker seems uncertain and confused, even when making an apparently definitive statement. Of course, if the poem is read as mocking the speaker, this final confusion only adds to the subtle satire.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the decisions (or decision-making processes) described in this poem and in Theodore Dreiser's short story "The Second Choice." Compare and contrast the central characters in the two works. What role does irony play in each text? How are the conclusions of the two works similar and/or different?
2. Discuss this poem in relation to SHERWOOD ANDERSON's "The Book of the Grotesque" in Winesburg, Ohio. How do the works resemble and/or differ from one another in their treatment of the tendency to make choices and in their presentation of the results of those choices? Does one work present the idea of choice more positively than the other?
3. How do you read the poem—ironically or not ironically—as a piece of satire or as a straightforward meditation? Is there some third possibility? Justify your response. Archetypal (or "myth") critics argue that great literature often deals with standard human desires, fears, and circumstances. How and why might an archetypal critic find this poem intriguing?

"Design" (1922, 1936)

The speaker notices a well-fed white spider holding a white moth on a white flower that is normally colored blue. He wonders how all these examples of whiteness happened to be together in such a perfect conjunction, and then he suggests that the conjunction may have been the result of an appalling design or intent.

This work exemplifies Frost's interest in the sonnet form as well as his ability to use that form in unusual ways. The poem is a Petrarchan sonnet, consisting of an octave (the first eight lines) followed by a sestet (the final six lines). In structuring the octave, Frost followed the standard Petrarchan rhyme scheme of abbaabba, but then, instead of creating a new set of rhymes in the sestet (as would have been expected), he continued to play with one of the rhyme sounds already so strongly established: acaacc. Finding appropriate rhyme words is more difficult in English than in Italian (Petrarch's native language), and that is one reason that Petrarchan sonnets present special challenges for English-speaking poets. In this poem, however, Frost not only accepts the challenge but ups the ante: It is as if he deliberately sets out to make his task as tough as possible. In one sense, of course, he is playing on the poem's title, calling attention to the elaborate "design" that is at the heart of his own text. The fact that the rhyme design of this poem is so rigid, inflexible, and even potentially monotonous may indeed be relevant to the "meaning" of the work—a meaning that itself implies the possibility of a universe that is rigidly designed down to the very smallest details.

The poem begins with the speaker's discovery of a spider, which he describes almost as if it were an attractive baby rather than an unappealing insect: The spider is "dimpled," "fat," and "white," but the effect of such description is paradoxical, for the same adjectives that might be pleasing in one context seem grotesque here: Dimpled implies a close-up, almost microscopic, view of the insect; fat implies that this predator has had success in killing; and white makes the spider sound unnatural and perhaps even sickly. Likewise, the fact that the spider appears on a white flower that is normally blue again suggests an unnatural, sickly pallor, and by the time we reach line 4, the speaker's concern with "death and blight" has become explicit. The spider, flower, and moth seem like “the ingredients of a witches’ broth” (l. 6)—phrasing that again implies unnatural and even malign influences. At this point, however, the phrasing sounds almost fanciful or unrealistic; witches, after all, do not “really” exist, and so the tone of the poem at this juncture can sound almost whimsical or witty, especially when the wings of the dead moth are compared to “a paper kite” (l. 8).

By the time we reach the sestet, however, the tone of the poem considerably darkens. The speaker reminds us that the name of this sickly looking flower is, ironically, the “heal-all” (l. 10), and he wonders what force or forces were responsible for this deadly meeting of flower, spider, and moth. In line 13 (a number conventionally associated, appropriately enough, with misfortune) he suggests that a malevolent “design” (perhaps even a malicious deity?) engineered this “design of darkness” in order to “appall.” The conjunction of the words darkness and appall is part of the poem’s wit, for darkness suggests blackness, whereas appall implies making pale by provoking disgust, dismay, or shock. Typically, however, Frost shows both his cleverness and his sophistication by pulling back, in line 14, from any obvious or unequivocal moralizing: This final line raises the possibility that design in small matters may be merely illusory. In other words, the conjunction of spider, flower, and moth may simply have been an odd accident and may lack any larger meaning at all. In the final line, then, the poem leaves open the chance that there is no real meaning—not even a malign one—in the ironic union the poem describes.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss this poem in relation to “Credo” by Edwin Arlington Robinson. How does Robinson’s poem make explicit concerns that are only implied in Frost’s work? How do the two poems differ in their views of the possibility of divine design? How do the endings of the two works differ? In what ways is Robinson’s poem somewhat self-contradictory?
2. How do the views of God implied in Frost’s poem compare or contrast with the views enunciated by Wolf Larsen in JACK LONDON’s novel The Sea Wolf? How do both works reflect the rise of Darwinism as an intellectual influence in the late 19th century? How is the last line of Frost’s poem in some ways even bleaker, in its implications, than the line that precedes it?

3. How do the final six lines of the poem attempt to engage the reader directly? How and why is such engagement an effective strategy? In other words, how does it add to the impact of the poem? How does the speaker attempt to anticipate potential objections from his readers? How does the speaker implicitly characterize himself as he describes the objects of his attention? What kind of person does this speaker seem to be?

“Nothing Gold Can Stay” (1923)

The speaker points to various data (particularly from nature) to argue that while beauty can only be temporary, change and decline are inevitable.

The title of this splendid little lyric immediately announces its main theme: Nothing precious can endure. The brevity of the work—with its clipped trimeter (or six-syllable) lines, its quick couplets, and its short overall length—exemplifies its argument: The poem is finished almost before it begins, thus illustrating its own claims about the briefness of beauty. Yet this poem, however short, is exceptionally well designed; every detail contributes to its coherence and success, and thus part of the paradox of the text is that Frost, while arguing that beauty is fleeting, has himself created an enduringly beautiful work of art. In some respects, then, the very existence of this superbly crafted poem refutes (or at least qualifies) the poem’s own claims.

Frost begins with a line in which each key word receives maximum metrical emphasis: The first syllable of Nature is accented, as are the words first and green; only in the very last two syllables of the opening line does the poem settle into an expected iambic pattern (in which even-numbered syllables are accented and odd-numbered syllables are not). The iambic rhythm of the first line’s last two syllables, however, puts powerful stress on the key word gold, so that the first line is a model of epigrammatic compression: Frost manages to state the main argument of the whole poem in just six syllables. The opening line, however, also has a kind of paradoxical force: How, after all, can “green” be “gold”? The meaning of this claim seems to be that the very first springtime buds of growing plants are especially precious, valuable, and beautiful, but the juxtaposition—indeed, the metaphorical identification—of green (associated with organic life) and gold (associated with something that is precious but inanimate) contributes to the paradoxical power of the opening claim. Yet even as the poem begins with a strong and vigorous assertion, this opening assertion also contains (in the word first) the seeds of its own undoing: The word first, after all, implies the very change that is the real subject of the poem, and this emphasis on change becomes blatantly obvious by line 2, which states of nature’s gold that it is “Her hardest hue to hold.” Frost here combines heavy musical alliteration on the consonant h with use of practically every vowel available (e, a, u, and o), so that pronouncing the line involves a vocal workout that reinforces the idea of the difficulty of holding on to beauty. By personifying nature (calling it “Her”), Frost also begins a process that the rest of the poem will expand, as he shows the relevance of natural change to human existence.

Line 3 is another paradoxical metaphor: The speaker claims that nature’s “early leaf’s a flower.” How can a leaf be a flower? Indeed, we usually think of leaf and flower as opposites. By using such paradoxical phrasing, Frost makes us think; the poem is not simply an expression of emotion but a provocation to thought. A leaf, for instance, “is” a flower in the sense that it unfolds as a flower does, and in the sense that a flower results from a leaf, and also in the sense that a leaf is merely a temporary thing of beauty, as is also true of a flower. In any case, Frost reinforces the poem’s overall emphasis on change by using the adjective early (which echoes the previous adjective first from line 1) and also by writing “leaf’s” rather than “leaf is.” Partly, of course, he is required to use the apostrophe and s by the demands of his metrical pattern, but the contraction inevitably also helps create and convey a sense of speed. That emphasis on speed is then explicitly reinforced in line 4, which states that although a leaf may be a flower, it is “only so an hour.” In most plants, of course, leaves endure much longer than a mere hour, but Frost exaggerates (using hour to imply brief time) to emphasize the undeniable point that change and decay cannot be stopped. Frost uses the older meaning of the verb subside (implying to sink down, to settle to the bottom) when he states that “leaf subsides to leaf” (l. 5), and once again the swiftness of the poem’s movement contributes to (and reinforces) its meaning: Only two lines earlier, the leaves were being born; now, a few syllables later, we see them falling and piling on top of one another.

Up until this point the poem has seemed to describe merely natural processes, but in line 6 Frost vastly expands the emotional range and significance of the work by stating that just as leaves fall, “So Eden sank to grief.” In a few simple words, Frost suddenly makes clear the human implications of his poem. He associates natural change with the unnatural sin that supposedly unleashed all the forces of decay his poem describes; he implies that change is not something that simply affects external nature but is also an inevitable aspect of human life that causes deep human pain. The verb sank echoes the preceding verb subsides, and both verbs foreshadow the ensuing phrase “goes down” in line 7. That line once again masterfully combines assonance and alliteration; ironically, then, this very sad poem is also splendidly musical—a trait also seen in the final line (“Nothing gold can stay”), which not only repeats (and confirms) the title but also echoes (in its ns, gs, sts, and long as) the line with which the poem began. The repetition of the key word gold also helps move the poem full circle, giving the work a strong sense of symmetry, and indeed the essential message of the entire text might be summed up by juxtaposing line 1 and line 8: “Nature’s first green is gold,” but “Nothing gold can stay.” The word Nothing has special metrical emphasis because it violates (for the first time in six lines) the standard iambic pattern, and the entire final line receives extra emphasis because it is the only line in the entire poem that constitutes a single sentence. By using all these elements of careful craftsmanship, Frost creates a poem that comes close to subverting its own central argument, since the poem itself seems an instance of something “gold” that will indeed “stay” or endure.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with Wallace Stevens's “Sunday Morning,” particularly its final stanza. What do both poems imply about nature? What do both poems imply about man's place in nature? Which poem is more celebratory? Which one is more elegiac? Discuss the role of religious imagery in each poem.
2. Read this lyric alongside CARL SANDBURG's poem “Prairie Waters by Night.” How are these two works similar and/or different in form, techniques, themes, and ultimate effects? What feeling(s) are you left with after reading Sandburg's poem, and how do those feelings resemble and/or differ from the results of reading Frost's poem? Justify your response by pointing to specific details in both texts.
3. Discuss the heavy use of periods in this poem. Why, in a lyric so short, are there five periods? How does this kind of punctuation affect the rhythm of the poem, and how is it relevant to the poem's theme and meanings? Discuss the use of verbs in lines 5–7. What similarities are there (and what differences) in the use of verbs in those lines, and how do those lines differ, in their use of verbs, from the poem's other lines?

“Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening” (1923)

The speaker, while traveling in a horse-drawn conveyance on a road beside a forested area, pauses to contemplate the vision of the woods “fill[ing] up with snow,” but as he stops, he also thinks about the owner of the woods (who lives in the village) and about the presumably puzzled reaction of his own horse. Finally, responding to the apparent impatience of the horse as well as to his own sense of obligation, the speaker decides to continue his journey and leave the woods behind.

This poem is probably Frost's most famous and best beloved work, and it is one of the poems on which he certainly hoped and thought his reputation would rest. It has many of the hallmarks of a “typical” Frost lyric: the plain, simple, often monosyllabic language; the rural setting; the seemingly straightforward and uncomplicated “plot”; the thoughtful but understated speaker; and the theme of man's relationship with nature and man's position in the universe. The poem invites serious reflection but is not preachy or didactic; part of its impact derives from Frost's willingness to let readers draw their own conclusions about the ultimate “meaning” of the work. Is the speaker afflicted with a “death wish”? Does he in fact contemplate suicide? Is he tempted—at least temporarily—to abandon his responsibilities? Does he wish (at least for a time) that such responsibilities did not exist? Are his journey and his contemplated sleep merely literal, or are they metaphorical (implying, perhaps, the larger journey of life and the final sleep of death)? Frost's poem intriguingly raises many such questions without ever providing clear or simple answers, and it is partly the poem's ability to seem simultaneously simple and complex that makes it so hauntingly memorable.

If one effect of the poem is to lull us into a contemplative mood so that we share in the speaker's own thoughtfulness, that effect is partly the result of the strikingly regular (but strangely subtle) iambic rhythm. In every single line of the work, the even syllables are accented and the odd syllables are not, yet the poem never sounds tediously predictable or metronomic. Likewise, every line of the work consists of exactly eight syllables—no more and no fewer—and yet (once more) the poem seems anything but stale or monotonous. Frost has chosen the perfect meter and rhythm for a low-key, quiet, and contemplative work such as this, and his heavy use of monosyllabic words (only 18 of the poem's 108 words consist of two or more syllables, and only one of those words is trisyllabic) is completely appropriate to a speaker whose character seems as direct and forthright as his language. At the same time, despite its highly unadorned and unelaborate phrasing and despite its extraordinarily regular meter, the poem also has an exceptionally unusual rhyme scheme: aaba, bbcb, ccac, dddd. Numerous commentators (including Frost himself) have discussed the inventiveness of this pattern of rhyme and have called special attention to the way the pattern is both broken and completed in the final line, where the unexpected repetition (not only of a rhyme word but of an entire line) gives the conclusion exceptional emphasis. Thus the form of the poem (which is simultaneously simple and complex) mirrors many other aspects of the work, for the speaker himself seems, on one level, an uncomplicated rural character while also seeming both highly self-conscious and unusually contemplative. Similarly, the landscape, too, seems both predictably mundane and highly symbolic. These woods, for instance, seem both a credible forest and yet also a symbol of something mysterious and intriguing, while the snow and cold seem both literal and metaphorical. Likewise, the journey seems both real and emblematic: The speaker moves through a believable rural landscape, but he also progresses along the larger road of life itself.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Frost was a great admirer of Edwin Arlington Robinson, and he especially admired Robinson's poem titled "Mr. Flood's Party." What resemblances and/or differences can you see between that poem and "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening"? Discuss the poems in terms of such matters as setting, theme, symbolism, and the characterization of the protagonist. Discuss the issues of isolation and the motif of making a journey as they are used in both works.
2. Compare and contrast Frost's poem with LANGSTON HUGHES's lyric titled "Mother to Son." Discuss the way both works deal with the theme of obligations and responsibilities. Discuss how they both use the idea of physical movement in symbolic ways. Is one work more clearly affirmative or positive than the other, or is each complicated in its own way? Discuss the forms the poets choose for their works and the tones and attitudes of the speakers.
3. Why is the speaker concerned with being seen by the owner of the woods? What other evidence is there for the speaker's self-consciousness? Discuss the attitude of the speaker toward his horse. What are some effects of describing the horse as "little"? What do the speaker's observations suggest about his own personality?

"Once by the Pacific" (1928)

After describing large waves of the Pacific Ocean advancing with destructive force toward a shore, the speaker interprets them as symbols of an even larger kind of cosmic destructiveness.

Although this poem consists of 14 lines, it is not a sonnet in the usual sense. It is written in seven iambic pentameter couplets, thus lacking the standard divisions into either the octave (eight lines) and sestet (six lines) characteristic of Petrarchan sonnets or the three quatrains (four lines) and final couplet associated with Shakespearean sonnets. The frequent use of punctuation at the ends of lines (and in particular the fact that all the periods occur in that position) gives the poem a kind of tightly confined, highly controlled quality that in some ways seems to conflict with its chaotic subject matter, which concerns dangerously destructive natural forces. Yet the poem does exhibit many stylistic and technical felicities, including the combination of paradox, alliteration, and onomatopoeia (in which sound imitates sense) in the phrase "shattered water" (paradoxical because how can a liquid be "shattered"?) or the combination of sound, sight, and even tactile sensation in the phrase "misty din" (l. 1). Assonance and double accents are used to emphasize the "Great waves" mentioned at the beginning of line 2, while the phrase "looked over" in that line introduces the technique of personification that is one of the major features of this poem. The idea that nature might be capable of "thought" (l. 3) makes nature seem possibly malign and thus even more potentially dangerous than usual, and Frost enhances this sense of potential danger by vaguely saying that the waves thought of doing "something" to the shore (l. 3). The word something is just the right term to create a sense of mystery and foreboding, especially when the next line implies that whatever the water intends to do, the action will be unprecedented and unique. Also effective is the memorable (indeed, almost unforgettable) imagery of “hairy” clouds (l. 5)—an adjective that at first makes them seem almost animalistic until the effect is softened in line 6. Even when Frost seems to falter—as he appears to do in his use of meter in line 8—he only proves that it is unsafe to second-guess a major poet: Why does he write “in being backed” when he could have written “to be backed” and thereby preserved metrical regularity? Because the phrasing he chooses emphasizes the key verb backed, and in addition it creates an effective repetition in line 9. Here, as usual, Frost knows what he is doing.

By the time we arrive at line 10, the vague “thought” of line 3 has evolved into an apparently “dark intent” and the imagery (especially of colors) is growing noticeably more menacing and the overtones are beginning to imply a cataclysm or an apocalypse. Then “dark intent” metastasizes into “rage” (l. 12), and finally Frost not only possibly alludes (in a potential example of black irony) to the broken water associated with birth (l. 13) but definitely alludes, in line 14, both to God’s “Let there be light” in Genesis and to the words Othello pronounces just before killing Desdemona in Shakespeare’s great tragedy. The allusion to Genesis is ironic; the allusion to Shakespeare seems highly appropriate to the murderous destructiveness that is the main theme of this poem. Meanwhile, the imagery of “water broken” moves the poem full circle by reminding us of the “shattered water” mentioned in line 1. Yet that reminder only accentuates how much the mood of the poem has changed—how dark it has become and how much its resonance has broadened. Frost is no longer merely describing waves breaking on the beach; he is suggesting the end of the world by depicting the fury of an ironically named Pacific (or peaceful) ocean.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with Edwin Arlington Robinson’s poem titled “Credo.” How do they differ in purpose, tone, and final effect? How does the final line of Robinson’s poem contrast with (but also resemble) the imagery Frost uses? Although both poems are 14 lines long, how and why does Robinson use one of the traditional sonnet forms effectively? Which of the poems is more personal in its phrasing? Which one is more concrete and vivid in its imagery?
2. Read this text alongside the poem titled “Oread” by the poet H. D. (Hilda Doolittle). How do the poets use sea imagery to radically different effect? What are the mood and tone of H. D.’s poem, and how do they compare to the same aspects of Frost’s? What attitudes toward nature are implied by the two works? In particular, how do the endings of the two works differ?
3. How is it appropriate, in writing about ocean waves, that Frost chose to use seven couplets rather than a more traditional sonnet stanza in this 14-line poem? Since many 14-line sonnets have often dealt with the subject of love, how is it ironic that Frost chose that number of lines for this poem?

“Provide, Provide” (1934, 1936)

The speaker points to an ugly old woman who was once beautiful, young, and tantalizing, and he uses her as an example of the way mutability and old age inevitably overtake anyone who does not die young. He advises readers that in order to avoid this fate they must either die young or make provisions to become rich, powerful, or respected so that they will not be insulted or lose their dignity in old age. Even if they have to buy friends, they should provide for the future ravages that will overtake them when they are elderly.

In some respects this poem is humorous, whimsical, and ironic; in other ways it is deadly serious. The speaker jokes about old age, but by the end of the work it is clear that old age is not entirely a laughing matter. At first the work seems entirely fanciful: It mentions a “witch” (a description quickly echoed, through assonance and alliteration, by the phrase “withered hag”; l. 1) who finds herself in the undig-nified position of having “To wash the steps with pail and rag” (l. 2)—a statement that makes clear that the woman is a “witch” not in the fairy-tale sense of being a woman with vast mystical powers but rather in the opposite sense: old, unattractive, and socially impotent. To add to the irony, the speaker then reveals that this ugly, elderly crone “Was once” (figuratively, if not literally) “the beauty Abishag”—a stunning young woman in the Old Testament who was so exceptionally attractive that she was chosen to lie in bed beside the aging King David to keep his old body warm. After David nevertheless died, one of his sons was so smitten with Abishag that he sought permission to marry her, but King Solomon, another of David’s son’s, suspected that the request involved treason and so had the petitioner put to death. Abishag, then, is a triply ironic beauty: Not only was her beauty incapable of preventing David’s death, and not only did her beauty lead to the death of her suitor, but, in Frost’s poem, she herself has grown old, ugly, and pathetic.

Yet the poem soon suggests that the speaker’s concern is not with the real, historical Abishag but with Abishag as a symbol of feminine beauty anytime and anywhere—including even (or especially) in “Hollywood” (l. 4). In the jump from the first stanza to the second, the poem also jumps from the mythical or legendary past to the real if glitzy present. Then, to place the work even closer to home, the speaker directly addresses the poem’s reader in line 6, thereby making it clear that the perils of aging are directly relevant to the audience of the work. Suddenly we are no long smiling at the witch. The speaker then proceeds to offer advice that can be seen as either preposterous or gruesome, telling readers either to “Die early” (an event over which individuals have no control except by suicide; l. 7), or, if they are “predestined to die late,” to make up their minds to “die in state” (i.e., with real social power or public dignity or acclaim; ll. 8–9). He then gives unrealistic advice that ends with further irony: Few people can hope to become fabulously wealthy through the stock market, and fewer still can hope to “occupy a throne,” and even if those who hold royal power cannot publicly be called crones, their status as crones is not at all affected by such public niceties (ll. 10–12). In the next stanza the speaker offers more practical advice: One can win respect either through knowledge, ethics, or authenticity, but even in this stanza the prospect of achieving respect by these means is merely something that “might” happen to the reader (ll. 13–15). As the poem winds to its conclusion, the speaker opines that old age is inevitably “hard” (l. 18), especially if one is alone and friendless, and the work concludes with advice that can seem either cynical or bluntly realistic: It is better to buy friends than to have “none at all” (ll. 19–21). In some ways the poem (with its quick lines, brief stanzas, and triple rhymes) seems singsong and merely flippant, but in other ways it is grimly, bleakly honest. The ability to combine such tones with such craft is part of the measure of Frost’s poetic talent.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Jack London’s short story “The Law of Life” also deals with the subject of growing old. How do the tones and attitudes of the two works differ? Which treatment of the theme is grimmer? Which work expresses greater sympathy? Discuss the presence and/or absence of humor in each work.
2. The process of aging is an implicit and explicit topic in JOHN STEINBECK’S book Travels with Charley. How do Steinbeck’s thoughts and depictions of aging in that work compare and contrast with the ideas and descriptions presented in Frost’s poem? How could both works have easily been sentimental, and how (and with what success) do both writers guard against the risks of sentimentality? How would you describe the personality of Frost’s speaker?
3. How and why are lines 9–12 especially ironic? How are the solutions suggested there not as simple as the tone of the lines would suggest? How and why is the word dignified ironic in the context of this poem?

“Desert Places” (1936)

The speaker describes snow and night falling on a deserted field surrounded by woods—observations that lead him to meditate on loneliness and nothingness. He ends by noting that although outer space is usually considered terrifying because it is so empty, a more frightening kind of emptiness exists on Earth, where human habitation ironically makes any loneliness seem even more painful.

In its imagery, setting, and “plot,” this poem invites comparison with Frost’s exceedingly famous work “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening.” Both works involve isolated speakers provoked to thoughtfulness by a snowy rural scene, but the present poem seems both darker and bleaker than its predecessor. The speaker here is more isolated (he mentions no other people and is accompanied by no domesticated animal); his perspective is literally more cosmic and his thoughts are more explicitly frightened and frightening; and at the end of the poem there is no expression of a stoic determination to move on; instead the speaker seems frozen, immobile, in a landscape that offers no hint of consolation. Indeed, by the end of the work the speaker seems less concerned with this particular landscape per se than with an inner, deeper emptiness.

There is already some irony in the title of the poem, for although the word desert usually suggests an arid, sandy, sun-baked setting, Frost’s poem is set in fields and woods, with “Snow falling and night falling fast, oh, fast” (l. 1). “Snow,” “night,” and the first syllables of both uses of the word falling receive strong metrical emphasis here, and although most of the words of this line are objectively descriptive, the interjected oh already implies the speaker’s emotional response. Although in some ways the landscape reveals some beauty (“the ground almost covered smooth in snow”; l. 3), the reference to “a few weeds and stubble” complicates the picture, suggesting ugliness and decay (l. 4). By the time the poem reaches lines 7 and 8, however, the focus has shifted from the bleak external setting to the speaker’s own internal moods: His only connection to the environment is to feel as lonely inside as the surrounding setting appears. To emphasize his point, Frost repeats versions of the word lonely four times in three lines (ll. 8–10), but by the end of this series Frost has moved from a milder kind of loneliness to one that is more intense; the repetition (in other words) helps emphasize the change from one mood to something even darker, just as the “blacker whiteness” of line 10 is more depressing than the snow mentioned in line 1. By the time we reach line 12, the mood of the poem has become literally nihilistic, implying a kind of existential nothingness. The speaker seems less concerned with the specific wintry place in front of him than with the march of time and the process of inevitable decay. Indeed, by the very end of the poem the focus of this speaker’s thoughts has shifted from the external environment to his own character, nature, and spirit. It is a shift from something out there to something “in me” (l. 15). The most truly significant “desert places” (Frost suggests) are the ones we carry around inside.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read this work alongside Wallace Stevens’s poem “The Snow Man.” Discuss the use of imagery in both poems, and discuss their comments on the idea of nothingness. How do their tones and points of view differ? Discuss Frost’s use of the word I and Stevens’ use of the word one. Does one poem appeal to you more? If so, explain in detail why.
2. Compare and contrast this work with the poem titled “Spring and All” by WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS. How are the works similar and/or different in imagery, tone, and meaning? How do they differ in form and in point of view? Who is speaking in Williams’s poem? Why does Frost’s poem emphasize an individual speaker?
3. Discuss the effectiveness of the repetition in line 1. In what respects is the speaker’s movement in line 2 both literal and metaphorical? Weeds and stubble are normally considered unimportant or even worthless, but what makes them seem of some value here? Why is the verb smothered especially effective?

“The Figure a Poem Makes” (1939)

In this rambling and sometimes disjointed essay, Frost argues for the importance of variety, sounds, themes, and “wildness” in poetry, contending that theme is particularly important in achieving the other goals. He emphasizes both the pleasure and the profit a poem can provide and suggests that a poem briefly staves off chaos. He also suggests that if a poem is to create specific emotions in its readers, those emotions must first have been aroused in the poet himself, and he ends by suggesting that a good poem never loses its freshness.

Anyone who has read Frost’s poetry carefully will not be surprised when he argues that the sound of a poem is “the gold in the ore” (Collected 776); Frost, after all, is one of the master technicians of sound in modern verse. Nor should anyone be surprised when Frost contends that “the object of writing poetry is to make all poems sound as different as possible from each other” (Collected 776). Frost practiced this maxim through his own close attention to variations in meter, rhyme, assonance, alliteration, and numerous other devices. What is a bit surprising, perhaps, is the emphasis Frost places on theme (or what he calls “context—meaning—subject matter” [Collected 776]) in achieving variety of sound. He never fully explains why or how variety of sound is promoted by “subject matter” other than to say that the “possibilities for tune from the dramatic tones of meaning struck across the rigidity of a limited meter are endless” (Collected 776). Also somewhat surprising (although more immediately comprehensible) is his claim that the theme of a poem can help tame its “wildness”: “Theme alone can steady us down” (Collected 776). Presumably this means that a poem’s theme helps impose order and discipline on writing that might otherwise be chaotic and uncontrolled. Frost, in fact, seems to emphasize the crucial importance of the meaning of a poem when he argues that a poem “begins in delight and ends in wisdom” and when he also contends—in one of the most famous phrases from this essay—that a poem is “a momentary stay against confusion” (Collected 777). In this phrase, the word momentary is crucial: Frost does not contend that a good poem provides perfect and immutable wisdom; rather, he suggests that a good poem gives compelling but temporary order to an existence that might otherwise seem purely meaningless and random.

Much of the essay is devoted to describing how poems are written—the evolution of a poem in the poet’s own mind and emotions. Using fragments, Frost declares, “No tears in the writer, no tears in the reader. No surprise for the writer, no surprise for the reader” (Collected 777). He suggests that the writing of a poem is largely an unconscious act; certainly it is one (he suggests) that cannot be planned or controlled with total deliberation. The act of writing a poem is an act of unexpected discovery for the writer, as the act of reading one is for the reader. If a poem seems fresh to the writer as he is composing it, it will remain fresh to its readers, no matter how often it is read: “Read it a hundred times: it will forever keep its freshness as a petal keeps its fragrance. It can never lose its sense of a meaning that once unfolded by surprise as it went” (Collected 778).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this essay with T. S. ELIOT’s “Tradition and the Individual Talent.” How do the works differ from and/or resemble one another in argument, method, clarity, and tone? How does Frost’s essay itself exhibit the kind of spontaneity and “surprise” the essay extols?
2. Read Frost’s essay in conjunction with Wallace Stevens’s poem titled “Of Modern Poetry.” What assumptions do the two works share? How do they differ? How—if at all—does Stevens’s poem illustrate any of the arguments made by Frost?
3. Discuss the ways in which Frost, in this prose essay, effectively uses devices often thought of as “poetic,” such as metaphor, simile, imagery, and rhythm. For instance, how and why is his reference to “a hot afternoon in the life of a grasshopper” effective? How might he have stated the same idea in a less memorable way?

“The Gift Outright” (1942)

In this public poem, the speaker meditates on the relations between America and Americans—between the land and the people who inhabit it. He focuses on the nation's past, describes its evolution, and speculates about its future development.

The speaker of the poem speaks explicitly not simply for himself but for the American people in general, and it is partly this openly public stance that makes this work so different from so many of Frost's other best-known poems. The speaker begins by proclaiming (in language that involves, as does much of the language of this work, a good deal of repetition), "The land was ours before we were the land's" (l. 1). In other words, people possessed physical territory in America before they were really "Americans" in the deepest sense of that word: They lived on the land and owned it but did not yet fully identify with it or see themselves as part of it—as emotionally bound to it. In the next line and a half the speaker elaborates on this point, but the fact that he now uses personification ("She" and "her") to refer to the land already suggests a stronger bond between the inhabitants and their territory. At this point, however, the speaker still describes the relationship between the land and those who lived on it as a unilateral relationship—as a relationship between possessors and possessed, owners and owned. The original settlers lived in America but still thought of themselves as Britons; politically and psychologically, they were still "colonials"—still tied, emotionally and legally, to a distant motherland. They possessed what they were unpossessed by (l. 6): That is, they owned property in America but felt no deep bond to that property; they were "Possessed by what [they] now no more possessed" (l. 7). In other words, they were still legally citizens of Britain, even though they no longer lived there. Here and throughout, the diction of the poem is clotted, repetitious, paradoxical, and ironic; through using such techniques, Frost wants to suggest the complications involved in the range of possible relations between any land and the people who inhabit it.

Only when the inhabitants of America "surrender[ed]" themselves to the land by breaking their ties with Britain and embracing their identity as Americans did they truly find "salvation" (l. 11). Appropriately enough, the language here has religious overtones, and once again the phrasing is paradoxical: By surrendering, the people are saved; by sacrificing, they succeed. Of course, the paradox is even greater, since it was only through literal military victories over England that this kind of metaphorical "surrender" was possible; it was only by achieving independence from Britain that Americans were able to codify the new bond they now felt with the lands they had long inhabited. As the poem continues, however, the language remains punning, paradoxical, and complex: The "deed" (meaning act, but also legal title or proof of ownership) by which we gave ourselves the country was "many deeds of war" (l. 13)—phrasing that reminds us of the fact (without making it very explicit) that the process of creating America often involved the dispossession of the Indians, the original Americans. Frost's "ours," "we," and "ourselves," however, seem mainly to imply the white, European settlers; except for the passing reference to "deeds of war," he seems little interested in the fate of the native peoples. In a poem full of deliberate ironies and paradoxes, there is, then, perhaps an unintended irony in the idea that the white settlers "gave" themselves to the land (l. 12) by moving westward—in the process taking territory that was not theirs.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the version of American history presented in this poem with the version stated or implied in various works by GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN (Zitkala-Ša). How do you think she might have responded to Frost's poem, and why? Use specific passages from her works to support your arguments.
2. Compare and contrast Frost's work with the poem by CLAUDE MCKAY titled "America." How are paradoxical ideas and language used in both works? What do the works imply about America's future? In what ways does each work present a complex view of the relations between the land and the people who inhabit it?
3. Multiculturalist critics stress the significance of different ethnic, racial, sexual, and other minorities in the creation of and response to literature. How might a multiculturalist critic respond to this poem, especially to its references to "ours,"

10. In relation to various modern poets you have read, what do you think are Frost's distinctive strengths and most serious weaknesses? How would you rank Frost in relation to such other important modern poets as Eliot, Pound, Stevens, or Williams? Which of these poets do you think will be most esteemed 100 years from now? Explain and justify your answer.

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Cook, Reginald L. "Robert Frost." In Sixteen Modern American Authors: A Survey of Research and Criticism, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 323–365. New York: Norton, 1973.
- . "Robert Frost." In Sixteen Modern American Authors. Vol. 2, A Survey of Research and Criticism since 1972, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 360–403. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.
- The Friends of Robert Frost. Available online. URL: <http://www.frostfriends.org>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Frost, Robert. Collected Poems, Prose, and Plays. Edited by Richard Poirier and Mark Richardson. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- Gerber, Philip L., ed. Critical Essays on Robert Frost. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.
- . Robert Frost. Rev. ed. Boston: Twayne, 1982.
- Greiner, Donald J. Robert Frost: The Poet and His Critics. Chicago: American Library Association, 1974.
- Meyers, Jeffrey. Robert Frost: A Biography. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1996.
- Nelson, Cary, and Edward Brunner. Modern American Poetry: Robert Frost. Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/Maps/poets/a_f/frost/frost.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Poirier, Richard, and Mark Richardson. "Chronology." In Collected Poems, Prose, and Plays. By Robert Frost. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- Potter, James L. Robert Frost Handbook. University Park: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1980.
- Tuten, Nancy Lewis, and John Zubizarretta, eds. The Robert Frost Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.

Robert C. Evans

H. D.

(HILDA DOOLITTLE) (1886–1961)

I know, I feel / the meaning that words hide; / they are anagrams, cryptograms, / little boxes, conditioned / to hatch butterflies

(The Walls Do Not Fall)

Hilda Doolittle was rechristened H. D. in 1912 by her good friend (and onetime fiancé) EZRA POUND when he sent off a batch of her startling new poems to be published as the first examples of “imagist” verse. The new name stuck, and for the rest of her long life Doolittle was known as H. D., not only to her readers but even to most of her friends. The initials gave her an allure of mystery, making her seem not so much a real person as a remote oracle, speaking in the cryptic but beautiful verse one might expect from an ancient Greek prophetess. The name also forever linked her with the imagist moment and style in modern poetry—sometimes to her frustration and annoyance. During the course of a lengthy career, she produced much more than the carefully crafted brief poems that first made her famous; she wrote novels, memoirs (including a notable account of her psychiatric sessions with Sigmund Freud), and other kinds of prose. It is as a highly innovative poet, however, that she is best (and justly) remembered.

Most of the facts of Doolittle’s life are available in the detailed (if unfortunately undocumented) biography by Barbara Guest; other facts (along with a different perspective, detailed notes, and a helpful chronology) are available in the complementary book by Janice S. Robinson. The future poet was born on September 10, 1886, in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, the daughter of Professor Charles Doolittle and his second wife, Helen Woole. The professor and his first wife (Martha Farrand) had already produced two sons (Eric and Alfred) before Martha died in childbirth; Charles’s marriage to Helen (Hilda’s mother) occurred in 1882, and four children arrived in the decade from 1884 to 1894: Gilbert, Hilda, Harold, and Charles Melvin. Hilda, then, grew up surrounded by brothers, but although she seems to have been her father’s favorite child, she remembered him mainly as a somewhat distant figure. A highly regarded scientist who taught astronomy and mathematics at Lehigh University from 1875 to 1895, he became a distinguished professor of astronomy at the University of Pennsylvania and first director of its Flower observatory in 1896. Thus, at age nine Hilda moved to a large house in Upper Darby, a Philadelphia suburb, where she attended various schools before entering Bryn Mawr College (in 1905, according to Guest [19]; in 1904, according to Robinson [xvii]). She withdrew from Bryn Mawr in 1906 because of poor health and never completed a college degree (the only one of the Doolittle siblings to fail to do so).

By the time she withdrew from Bryn Mawr, however, Doolittle had already met and become involved with Ezra Pound—an involvement that was always, for anyone who knew him well, an education in itself. Hilda was 15 when they met at a Halloween party in 1901; Pound was just a year older, but already he was a student at the University of Pennsylvania, and already he was absolutely obsessed with literature and determined to become a great poet. Even at this early age, he was enormously well read and was reading ever more widely all the time, educating himself and educating, through his excited conversation, all his friends in the process. Pound loved to talk, and he especially loved to talk about his own ideas; he was (even at this young age) exceptionally self-confident. Many of his fellow students found him insufferable, but some, such as WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS (also at Penn) and Hilda Doolittle were intrigued. Hilda, in fact, was more than intrigued by Pound; in 1905 they became engaged (much to the displeasure of Hilda's father), and although the engagement was soon broken (Pound had also given a ring to another young woman at around the same time), the connection between them was not. Between 1905 and 1907 Pound composed poems for her and put them together into a volume he called "Hilda's Book," and although in the next few years his life was peripatetic (he taught briefly in Indiana, lost that job, went off to Venice, went to London, and then in 1910 briefly returned to New York, having visited many other places besides), he never lost his interest in Hilda; nor did she lose interest in him (despite her close relationship with another woman, Frances Gregg [Guest 22–24]). When Pound (now recognized in London as an emerging writer) returned to New York, Hilda arranged to meet him, and soon their "engagement was unofficially—or as she later wrote, 'equivocally'—renewed. There was an understanding; they were to be married. After a four-month tour of Europe in 1911 with Frances Gregg, and her mother, [Hilda] settled in London. She had at least made her decision to leave home and be with Ezra Pound" (Robinson 24).

Although her planned marriage to Pound never took place (he eventually married someone else and later took a mistress in addition to his wife), Hilda remained his good friend and occasional literary collaborator, and she spent most of the rest of her life in London or elsewhere in Europe, returning only rarely and briefly to the United States. In 1911 she married Richard Aldington, an Englishman whom she met through Pound (as she met most of her English friends), and in fact the three traveled together in the first half of 1912. It was in that latter year—when she, Pound, and Aldington were talking in the tea room of the British Museum—that she happened to show Pound some poems she had recently written. Pound was impressed; he told her, "this is poetry" (quoted in Robinson 28), and although he could not restrain a characteristic impulse to edit a bit, at the end of the process he scrawled H. D. Imagiste at the bottom of the page and promptly sent the poems off to Poetry magazine in Chicago, of which he was then the foreign correspondent. When the poems were published in January 1913, "imagism" had in effect been born. The new "movement" (which as yet consisted only of H. D., Pound, Aldington, and a few others) rested on a few simple principles, including the following:

1. Direct treatment of the "thing" whether subjective or objective.
2. To use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation.
3. As regarding rhythm: to compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in the sequence of the metronome. (qtd. in Robinson 27)

In 1914 Pound edited a collection of poems (including some by H. D.) titled Des Imagistes; Aldington, meanwhile, in that same year became assistant editor of a journal called the Egoist, thus providing yet another platform for their new ideas and poems. "Imagism" immediately excited great interest, including the interest of the wealthy American poet Amy Lowell, who soon pronounced herself an imagist and who toured London to meet H. D. and arrange for the publication of a series of further imagist anthologies. Pound, annoyed by this transition to "Amygism," quickly lost interest (instead he took up his next new thing, "Vorticism"). Never, however, did he break his connection with H. D.; nor did she ever lose touch with him; they remained friends for the rest of their lives. Even after Pound married Dorothy Shakespeare in 1914, he and H. D. continued to be literary comrades, although increasingly her career and status became independent of his.

The most important event of 1914, of course, was neither Pound's marriage nor H. D.'s growing fame in literary circles as a pioneering imagist but was rather the outbreak of World War I in August. The war affected everyone, and its impact was eventually felt by H. D. in numerous negative ways. Its first immediate impact was felt in 1916, when Aldington joined the army and was thus forced to spend increasing time away from his wife. Their marriage had initially been happy (despite the loss of a child in a miscarriage in 1915), and their literary fortunes had prospered in the first years of the war: H. D.'s work was being included in anthologies, and in 1916 she published her first independent book (Sea Garden—a collection of poems) as well as translations from Euripides' ancient play Iphigeneia in Aulis. In 1917 her relations with the important (and already married) English writer D. H. Lawrence, whom she had met several years earlier, became literally closer: He and his wife took up residence in H. D.'s apartment, and indeed Robinson argues that he and H. D. had a life-altering affair. Whether or not they did, it does seem clear that in 1917 Aldington became involved with a woman named Dorothy ("Arabella") Yorke, and that by 1918 H. D. had herself been involved with several other men, including John Cournos and Cecil Gray. When she became pregnant that year, Aldington realized that the child was not his. Robinson suggests that the father was Lawrence; Guest suggests that it was Gray; Aldington, in any case, was sure he had not been involved. Despite her husband's own affair(s), H. D. was thus in a difficult position, especially legally—particularly if she tried to attribute paternity to Aldington. He and H. D. separated in 1919, not long after the birth of the child (named Perdita), but they did not officially divorce until nearly 20 years later. Within a few months of the end of the war, then, H. D. had become an essentially single mother: She was separated from her husband and cut off from the father of her child (whose precise identity she never revealed). To make matters worse, her favorite brother had been killed in the final year of the war, and her father died in 1919. Furthermore, H. D. herself had been deathly ill during the final stages of her pregnancy. Little wonder, then, that she found this period so depressing and reflected on it in many of her later writings.

All was not entirely grim, however. In 1918 she had been approached by a young Englishwoman named Winifred Ellerman, who had read H. D.'s first book and had fallen in love with the poems and (by extension) with the poet. Ellerman, as it happened, was the heiress of one of the greatest fortunes in Britain; she could thus afford to be extremely generous not only to H. D. but also to numerous other artists and causes. Calling herself Bryher to assert her independence of her family, she now took an almost obsessive interest in H. D. She helped nurse H. D. back to health, helped begin to raise Perdita, and in general became H. D.'s constant companion (and sometime-lover) for the rest of the poet's life. Although the relationship was often strained, and although H. D. felt that Bryher's influence was frequently controlling, the two women remained extremely close from this point forward (often traveling together around Europe, to the Mideast, and to the United States), even though Bryher married in 1921 and again in 1927. H. D., meanwhile, continued to write: Hymen (a collection of poems) appeared in 1921; Helidora and Other Poems was published in 1924; and in 1925 an important New York press issued the Collected Poems of H. D. Palimpsest (a novel) was published in 1926, followed by Hippolytus Temporizes (a play) in 1927, Hedylus (a novel) in 1928, Red Roses for Bronze (a collection of poems) in 1929, Kora and Ka (a novel) in 1934, and The Usual Star (a novel), also in 1934. Interestingly enough, in 1930 both H. D. and Bryher had also appeared as actresses in a film (Borderline) they had helped produce. Throughout the 1920s, then, and into the 1930s, H. D. had been prolifically creative.

She had also, however, been psychologically troubled, and so in 1933 and again in 1934 she met for extended analysis in Vienna with Sigmund Freud—sessions she later described in her Tribute to Freud (published in 1956). Although the famous psychiatrist and his patient did not always see eye to eye, the sessions apparently helped her not only make sense of her troubled past but also prepare for an eventually productive future. She published The Hedgehog (children's fiction) in 1936 and a translation of Euripides' Ion in 1937. She was also at work on a novel and autobiography (not published until much later), but in general the late 1930s was a fallow period. She and Aldington finally divorced in 1938, and for several years little was heard from H. D. as a published author. The outbreak of World War II in 1939, however, would soon inspire a new wave of creativity. She lived in London during the worst of the bombings and deprivations, and in response to the destruction (but also the heroism) she witnessed all around her, she began writing an important series of poems. Before the war had even ended (in 1945), she began publishing again. What Do I Love? (a collection of poems) appeared in 1944, followed by the significant poetic trilogy The Walls Do Not Fall (1944), Tribute to the Angels (1945), and The Flowering of the Rod (1946). She also issued a collection of poems and prose titled By Avon River in 1949. Clearly the fallow period had ended; H. D. had found her voice once more, and although her health was in decline during the 1950s, she managed to write her epic poem Helen in Egypt between 1951 and 1956 and witnessed the publication of her Selected Poems in 1957. In 1960 her autobiographical novel Bid Me to Live appeared, and in that same year she received the highly prestigious Award of Merit Medal for Poetry from the American Academy of Arts of Letters—the first woman to receive it. She continued to work on other projects, but the last major publication to occur in her lifetime was the appearance of Helen in Egypt in 1961, which was printed shortly before she died on September 27.

In the years since her death, many previously unpublished works by H. D. have appeared in print, including several novels and memoirs, collections of letters, and various poems. Her Collected Poems, 1912–1944 was issued in 1983, and much material (including diaries, correspondence, and notebooks) remains in scattered archives. Although interest in H. D. had waned somewhat during the 1950s and 1960s, in the past several decades she has been the subject of intense attention. Despite the fact that the full range and quality of her work remain to be explored and assessed, she certainly produced some of the most memorable and accomplished poetry of her time.

“Oread” (1914, 1924)

The title of this work, which refers to the mythical wood nymphs of ancient Greece, implies that such a creature is the speaker of the poem. Using language associated with the forests she knows so well, she summons the sea to rise up and fall down onto the surrounding rocks, covering the land—and presumably the nymphs as well—with its wetness.

This brief lyric, which is one of the most famous H. D. ever composed, is typical of her writing (and especially of her early imagist style) in numerous ways. The phrasing is clear and simple; no unusual words (except perhaps the title) are used; most of the words (except three) consist of single syllables. In short, nothing about the language itself makes this poem difficult to understand, although the imagery is often striking, especially the metaphorical comparison (in line 2) of ocean waves to “pointed pines.” It would be natural, of course, for an oread, so closely associated with the land and vegetation, to imagine the sea as a kind of forest, and so the metaphors of lines 2, 3, and 6 perfectly fit the character of the presumed speaker. They do not, however, seem arbitrary or merely idiosyncratic: Once we hear them, the comparisons make sense. Large waves—in their height and sharpness—can resemble “pointed pines”; vast green forests, seen from above, can resemble “pools of fir” (l. 7). The effectiveness of the poem depends, then, on imagery that seems both initially surprising and ultimately apt. As does any great writer, H. D. here achieves the so-called shock of recognition, in which we are made to think in ways we have not thought before and then instantly conclude that these thoughts are convincing.

The poem begins with an emphatic verb, and emphatic verbs occupy the opening positions of five of the work's six lines. This brief lyric thus brims with energy, and the language seems alive in numerous ways. The sea is addressed—or, rather, it is summoned and invoked—as if it were a living thing, and the energy implied by the verbs is matched by the urgent tone of the speaker's commanding and/or imploring voice. The first four verbs—Whirl, whirl, splash, and hurl—all imply rapid, powerful movement, while the final verb (cover) suggests a calm, comprehensive stasis. The speaker at first seems as excited as the movements she attempts to summon; in the final line, however, she seems to surrender to a desire for rest. The poem (with its “pointed pines”) has an almost sexual rhythm of mounting to climax and then subsiding into relaxation: The first few lines imply surging waves, but the last line stresses the “pools” of undisturbed water. In a few brief lines, H. D. uses many vivid sound effects to bring the poem to life. These include anaphora (repeated opening words, as in the “Whirl” / “whirl” of lines 1–2), internal rhyme (as in the echo of “whirl” and “hurl” in lines 2 and 4), end rhyme (as in the repeated “pines” in lines 2–3), alliteration (the repetition of consonant sounds, as in the “pointed pines” of line 2), and even onomatopoeia (where the sound of the word imitates the thing described, as in the “splash” of line 3). The oread’s excitement matches the energy of the sea and inspires excitement in H. D.’s readers, and the poem ends (in expert imagist fashion) with one last striking picture that sticks in the mind. The poet offers no comment, no interpretation, no assessment; the images and words speak for themselves and leave a quick, crisp impression.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this “imagist” lyric with Ezra Pound’s poem “In a Station of the Metro.” How are the works similar in diction, imagery, purpose, and structure? How do they differ in tone, rhythm, final effects, and points of view?
2. Carl Sandburg’s poem “Grass” uses many of the same techniques as H. D.’s “Oread,” including direct address, repeated words, and a heavy emphasis on verbs. Nevertheless, how do the poems differ in subject, stance, mood, and overall effect?

“Leda” (1919, 1921)

The title of this brief poem alludes to the name of the woman who, in Greek mythology, was raped by Zeus (the king of the gods), who had transformed himself into a swan to accomplish that very purpose. The present poem, however, depicts the swan in lovely, alluring language and describes Leda as a “gold day-lily,” while the sexual encounter of swan and symbolic flower seems anything but violent. Instead it seems rapturous, blissful, and beautiful.

The poem opens with calm, peaceful imagery that immediately sets the tone for the rest of the work; the speaker describes a place “Where the slow river / meets the tide” (ll. 1–2). The drawn-out “long o” sound of slow mimics the relaxed movement of the river, while the depiction of the freshwater river meeting (and blending with) the gently rising saltwater sea foreshadows the later encounter of other opposites (swan and flower, god and mortal). The language of the poem is typical of H. D.’s best work: It is simple, clear, colorful, and sensuous, but it is also full of restraint, understatement, and subtlety. This poem could easily have been melodramatic or sentimental; the fact that instead it is simultaneously so gentle, so vivid, and so deeply but delicately erotic is a tribute to H. D.’s art. Her famous commitment to imagism—to quick, sharp pictures; brief but flowing lines; and crisp but suggestive diction—is everywhere evident in this poem, while she also achieves many rich musical effects, especially by using such techniques as assonance, repeated words and phrases, and even an occasional rhyme. Thus “beak” in line 4 is echoed through assonance by “feet” in line 7, while “feet” itself is then rhymed by “heat” in line 9. Likewise, “breast” in line 13 is rhymed by “crest” in line 15, while “lifting” in 16 is echoed by “drifts” in line 19. None of these effects, however, is clumsy or obtrusive. H. D. had a sure ear and is a master of sound effects.

The structure of the poem is also subtle: Line lengths are unpredictable (ranging anywhere from just two syllables to eight), and the four stanzas are likewise of uneven shapes, consisting (respectively) of seven, eight, seven, and then finally 11 lines. Yet the structure never seems erratic, arbitrary, or contrived; the line breaks often coincide with units of sense: New lines often begin with prepositions (such as of, to, among, beneath, and through [ll. 6, 9, 10, 17, 20, 27, 32, 31, 33]), conjunctions

(such as and and where [ll. 1, 4, 5, 14, 19, 28], and verbs [ll. 2, 8, 12, 18, 29]). The poem unfolds with a natural rhythm, reflecting the cadences of a real speaking voice. Often the line rhythms are conventionally iambic (with each unaccented syllable followed by an accented one, as in lines 4–5, 7, 10, 14–15, 19–25, 27, 30), but these “regularly stressed” lines thereby help emphasize any departures from regularity. Often, for instance, H. D. ends lines by jamming two heavily accented syllables together, followed by an unaccented one, as in such phrases as “slow river” (l. 1), “deep purple” (l. 8), or “slow lifting” (l. 16); sometimes she places heavily accented, single-syllable verbs as the first words of her lines (as in lines 2 and 18); and occasionally almost every word in a line seems equally stressed (as in line 3, “a red swan lifts red wings,” with its wonderfully balanced syntax). The poem is brimming with vivid adjective-noun combinations (such as slow river, red swan, red wings, darker beak, purple down, and coral feet—all from just the first stanza [ll. 1–7]). The contrasts and combinations of colors are striking and memorable, making the poem a kaleidoscope of reds, purples, golds, and yellows. H. D. subtly implies that the poem is set at sunset (l. 11) on a lazy summer day, and the entire pace of the poem—including the final understated (and partly symbolic) sexual encounter—is unhurried. Although the idea of a swan copulating with a woman (or even a lily!) seems bizarre by modern standards, nothing in this poem seems unnatural. The eroticism is always understated. The images of waters, birds, flowers, and sedge-covered landscape (l. 28), along with the imagery of gently juxtaposed light and darkness and the sensation of comforting warmth during summer dusk, all combine to create a sense of almost idyllic peace and beauty. If the encounter between Zeus and Leda has often been depicted as a rape, here it seems a mutually satisfying consummation.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss some of the sound effects used in this poem. Where and how (for instance) does H. D. use alliteration (repetition of consonants) for emphasis? Why is the phrase “old deep” (l. 26) so heavily accented? How is the rhythm of the very final line effective? How are assonance and alliteration combined in line 30? How is the use of one long word and two short words in that line effective?
2. Compare and contrast this work with WALLACE STEVENS’s poem “Peter Quince at the Clavier.” How are the poems similar yet different in subject matter? How do they resemble yet differ from one another in form and technique? How do the poems differ in purpose, tone, and final effect?

“At Baia” (1921)

The title of this poem alludes to an ancient Roman resort town; perhaps, then, the poem’s speaker (who seems to be a woman) is a long-dead resident of that town who is addressing a beloved person (whether male or female is unclear) of the same city and era. Their relationship seems to have been loving but not sexual, and the woman wonders why, in her dreams, the other person has never at least presented her with orchids or expressed love explicitly in a note.

As many of H. D.’s poems do, this one combines clear language and vivid images with an air of vague mystery. We cannot be precisely sure who is speaking or to whom, what the nature of their relationship is, what exactly is the message or purpose of the address, or how we are meant to respond to the communication. The poem alludes twice to dreams (ll. 2, 17), and the work itself has the kind of sharp-but-hazy, precise-but-indefinite quality of a dream or reverie. The odd, paradoxical nature of the phrasing is epitomized by the speaker’s yearning for something that is both “lovely” and “perilous” (l. 3), and the dreamlike atmosphere of the poem is also exemplified by the rambling, repetitive sentence structure of the second stanza. That stanza—with its reference to the “fragile” hands of the anonymous, mysterious beloved (l. 14)—raises the strong possibility that the speaker is addressing another woman. If so, this might account for the repeated use of the word perilous in the speaker’s descriptions of the imagined orchids (ll. 3, 20). Openly lesbian relationships, however they were viewed in classical Rome, were still regarded with widespread distrust and disapproval in H. D.'s day; if the relationship imagined in this poem is indeed tinged with lesbian desire, that might help explain the sexual restraint or inhibitions to which the speaker alludes. The imagined lover, after all, has so far left the speaker's "throat unknissed" (l. 8); their hands have never touched (ll. 9–10); and at the very end of the poem we are reminded explicitly that so far there has been "no kiss, / no touch" (ll. 28–29). The poem is energized, then, by erotic yearnings that have been suppressed, denied, sublimated, or postponed; appropriately, the work is full of richly sensuous details, including the "blue veins" of the speaker's "throat" (ll. 7–8), the fragile "hands" of the beloved drifting "so carefully" over "the orchid heads" and "gently" touching "the fragile flower stuff" (ll. 11–16), and the repeated image of "orchids, piled in a great sheath"—a word that itself contains hints of peril because of its usual associations with swords (ll. 4, 21). The mysterious tone of the poem is enhanced by the fact that we never hear from the beloved in the beloved's own direct words; everything is presented from the speaker's point of view, even the imagined (but never-sent) notes with which the poem concludes. The poem, then, has a dreamlike focus on a single consciousness (the speaker's); all thoughts, feelings, and facts are filtered through her perspective; and if in the end we know little about the actual relationship, we do know much about the speaker's own yearnings and frustrations.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with Ezra Pound's poem "A Virginal." In particular, discuss such matters as setting, imagery, tone, and theme. How are the works different in their treatment of physical contact? How are they similar in their use of personal address? How are they distinct in the forms they employ?
2. Do some historical research to determine how, in fact, lesbianism was viewed in ancient Rome. How was it regarded in H. D.'s day? How might the facts of H. D.'s own life be relevant to the present work? Is there any reason to think that the beloved in this poem is not a woman? Why should we assume that the speaker of the poem is female?

"Helen" (1924)

Helen was the wife of the ancient Spartan king Menelaus; her adulterous affair with Paris, a prince of Troy who took her back to his city, unleashed the bloody Trojan War described in Homer's great epic The Iliad. For 10 long years the Greeks battled Trojans outside the walls of Troy, seeking to reclaim Helen and thus avenge her husband. This poem describes the hatred the Greeks feel for Helen, the cause of so much bloodshed.

The poem begins with a startling juxtaposition of hatred and beauty. The brief opening line, which describes the bitter contempt the Greeks feel for Helen, consists of three heavily accented monosyllables. Every word is emphatic, and H. D. effectively stresses the verb ("hates") by putting it last in the line. The next line, however, is longer and its rhythm is more relaxed; it emphasizes not the passionate emotion of the Greeks but the "still" (i.e., quiet, calm) beauty of Helen. The opening lines, then, pit raw emotion against impassive beauty, and H. D. stresses the ironic juxtaposition through the near-rhyme of "hates" and "face." The rest of stanza 1 is devoted to elaborating on Helen's physical loveliness and her cool, unexcited passivity; while the Greeks burn with hatred, she merely "stands" (l. 4), literally and figuratively unmoved, protected either by the Trojans (during the war) or by her status as Menelaus's wife and reclaimed prize (after the conflict ends).

The second stanza seems at first simply to repeat the ideas contained in the first, but (as is usual with H. D.'s work) the repetition involves variation. Now all Greece not only "hates" Helen but "reviles" her (l. 2). Hatred can be an unexpressed feeling, but to revile means to abuse in language, to curse or condemn openly in words. Yet the second stanza is also varied in other ways as well. Helen's face, for example, is now described not merely as “white” but as “wan” (ll. 7, 9), a word implying sickly weakness or pallor. Although Helen “smiles” (l. 7—in an ironic rhyme with reviles), perhaps she is not entirely impervious to the hatred of the Greeks: Perhaps her “wan” color contradicts her “smiles,” and perhaps it suggests fear, a guilty conscience, or maybe both. In any case, the Greeks hate her even more when they see her face lose its color, either because they think her reaction shows insufficient regret for the suffering she has caused, or because they associate the whiteness with the beauty that led to so much bloodshed. Paradoxically, the very loveliness and/or vulnerability of Helen makes the Greeks feel all the more contempt for her, especially when they remember “past enchantments / and past ills” caused by her beauty (ll. 10–11). Or perhaps it is Helen herself who does such “remembering” (l. 10): The syntax of the poem permits either interpretation and thus exemplifies the complexity that often lies beneath the apparent simplicity of H. D.’s phrasing.

Finally, in the concluding stanza, it is the Greeks rather than Helen who seem rigid and static: They are emotionally “unmoved” either by her delicate beauty, by her status as the daughter of Zeus, or by her varied associations with the emotion of “love” (l. 13). They might indeed be moved to “love . . . the maid” (a word ironically associated with unmarried virginity and innocence; l. 16), but only—in one last paradox—“if she were laid, / white ash amid funereal cypresses” (ll. 17–18). Only (in other words) if Helen were dead and cremated (as so many Greek and Trojan soldiers died and were burned on funeral pyres) could the Greeks love her at all. This is love with a literal vengeance, and in the closing lines of the poem H. D. achieves a powerful sense of ultimate irony as well as a stunningly vivid final image. Only if the beautiful white skin of Helen’s body became the “white ash” of her charred flesh could the Greeks be happy.

As so often in her poems, H. D. here shows consummate restraint. She does not comment or interpret; she merely describes. We see both the beauty of Helen and the hatred of the Greeks; H. D. does not take sides, and she resists any impulse toward melodrama or sentimentality. She communicates through images and implication, not through moralizing statement. Helen is not condemned, but neither are the Greeks. Their hatred is understandable even as her beauty remains undeniable.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Helen is mentioned or depicted in many of H. D.’s writings, particularly in her late long poem Helen in Egypt. Compare and contrast her depiction in the present poem with her depiction elsewhere; what similarities or differences do you see? Do some research into H. D.’s life; why did she find Helen such an intriguing figure?
2. Do some reading about H. D.’s writing, being careful to compile a list of her typical themes and her characteristic techniques and traits of style. Having assembled such a list, discuss how the present poem is a representative work by H. D. How is it typical in its setting, its phrasing, its form, and its subject matter?

The Walls Do Not Fall (1944)

Inspired by the destruction visited upon London by German bombs during World War II (and evoked also by the destructiveness of that war, and all wars, in general), this poem marvels at the endurance of the human spirit, even as it also wonders about the meaning and purpose of human life. The speaker explicitly and implicitly compares current events to historical happenings in past civilizations (especially events in ancient Egypt). The speaker indicts modern corruption, celebrates ancient and enduring wisdom (which transcends particular cultures and religions), and ends by anticipating the possibility that humanity may someday “reach haven, / heaven” (ll. 877–878).

In this splendidly rich work, H. D. combines a variety of tones and stances in an attempt to do justice to the complex experiences she has witnessed and the complicated feelings these evoke. Sometimes the poem is vividly descriptive in depicting the ruins of wrought by war (as when the speaker, wandering through the devastation left by bomb blasts, describes “another sliced wall / where poor utensils show / like rare objects in a museum” [ll. 28–30]). Sometimes the tone is horrific, as when the speaker describes flesh “melted away, / the heart burnt out, dead ember, / tendons, muscles shattered, outer husk dismembered” (ll. 46–48). Sometimes the tone is satirical, as when she attempts to explain the appeal of the evil that resulted in the war (“I’ll promised adventure, / Good was smug and fat” [ll. 54–55]). Sometimes the speaker offers practical advice for survival in a hard and dangerous world (“be firm in your own small, static, limited // orbit and the shark-jaws / of outer circumstance // will spit you forth” [ll. 125–128]). The tone alternates between humility and prophetic self-confidence, between confusion and uncertainty, on the one hand, and visionary boldness, on the other. The speaker is sometimes ecstatic, sometimes weary and withdrawn; sometimes the message is inspired and inspiring, while at other times it is caustic and sardonic. She speaks as the latest in a long line of prophets, summoning readers to value old wisdom that is never out of date, but she also condemns narrowness of all sorts, including the narrowness not only of dogmatic religious bigots (who reject any traditions but their own) but also of the modern utilitarians who dismiss the value of poets and prophets, with their spiritual visions and complex language. “[I]f you do not even understand what words say,” the speaker asks at one point, “how can you expect to pass judgement / on what words conceal?” (ll. 209–211).

The Walls Do Not Fall, in other words, is epic in its range of tones and subjects, and it is therefore not surprising that H. D. later extended the piece by adding two additional sections (Tribute to the Angels [1945] and The Flowering of the Rod [1946]) to form a larger work eventually published as Trilogy (1973). Yet all three collections, with their brief, crisp lines, their frequently meditative moments; their constant shuttling between description and direct address; and their absence of continuous narrative, seem more lyric than epic, and indeed part of the effectiveness of all three works is that they so often achieve the heightened movement of inspired songs. It is in their detailed phrasing, not in their general messages or meanings, that the poems attain their true value; a less talented poet could have expressed the same ideas in language that lacked all life. It is finally in the specific words, sounds, and rhythms of these poems that H. D. shows her genius and makes her views compelling. Without her talent for phrasing, the poems would seem merely puffed-up New Age pomposities. It is, ultimately, in the individual words that the poems succeed or fail.

Take, for instance, a passage from early in The Walls Do Not Fall. “Pompeii” (the speaker declares) “has nothing to teach us” (l. 31). Immediately, in a single line, the speaker thereby juxtaposes the past and the present (a common technique employed everywhere in this work): A great disaster of the ancient world highlights the disaster of the present, just as throughout the poem the past is used to situate current happenings into a larger, broader perspective. Moreover, by using the word us, the speaker makes common cause with her readers; the disasters she describes are disasters she and her readers have experienced—and endured—together (if only in our readerly imaginations). The speaker thus becomes our representative, our voice. She speaks not only to us but for us, and by adopting this role, she increases the likelihood that we will listen sympathetically when, later, her tone becomes more challenging, more critical, more strangely prophetic. For the time being, though, we are enchanted simply by the power of her language, as when she next declares, “we know crack of volcanic fissure, / slow flow of terrible lava, // pressure on heart, lungs, the brain / about to burst its brittle case” (ll. 32–35). The subtle, internal rhyming of know, slow, and flow; the onomatopoeic effect of “crack” and “burst” (in which the sound of the word imitates the thing described); the clotted, heavy assonance of “slow flow” (in which the long o sounds are strongly emphasized both by their initial positions in the line and by the use of a spondee, or double accent); the combined alliteration of bs, ts, and ss in the phrase “about to burst its brittle”—all these techniques, and many others used elsewhere in the work, exemplify the skill - of writing she subsequently did? How was her thinking similar to Freud's? How was it different? How are the similarities and differences reflected in her poems?

5. How are women generally depicted in the writings of H. D.? Are there any consistent patterns? Are women presented differently in the poems than in the prose? How may H. D.'s own life have influenced the ways she presents women?
 6. Read one or more of H. D.'s novels and then compare her work in that genre to her work as a poet. Why is she remembered mainly as a poet rather than as a novelist? Is she equally effective in using both forms? What similarities or differences exist between the styles, themes, and techniques of her novels and her poems?
 7. Compare and contrast some of H. D.'s poems with some poems by Emily Dickinson. How do their works compare in style, structure, tone, and technique? In what ways can H. D. be seen as an "heir" of Dickinson? Is there any evidence that she even knew of and/or responded to Dickinson's works?
 8. Track down one of H. D.'s translations of a classical work, and then find at least one other translation of that same work (preferably use a fairly "literal" translation, such as the ones in the Loeb Classical Library). Compare and contrast H. D.'s rendering with the more literal translation. What similarities or differences do you see? What choices did H. D. make in her renderings? Are her choices effective?
 9. Read some of H. D.'s poems and then read some of the "poems" contained in GERTRUDE STEIN'S Tender Buttons. How do both writers use such techniques as striking images, repeated phrases, simple diction, and a variety of sound effects? Do you find one writer more appealing than the other? If so, why? Is there any evidence that they knew (or knew of) each other and/or were influenced by one another?
 10. Read WALLACE STEVENS's poem "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird." Does it remind you of H. D.'s work in any way(s)? If so, how? (Be specific: Discuss such matters as structure, style, and techniques.) How and why might Stevens's poem be considered an imagist work? Is there any evidence concerning how the two poets felt about each other's writings?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Bloom, Harold, ed. H. D.: Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1989.
- Burnett, Gary. H. D. between Image and Epic: The Mysteries of Her Poetics. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Research Press, 1989.
- Dodd, Elizabeth. The Veiled Mirror and the Woman Poet: H. D., Louis Bogan, Elizabeth Bishop, and Louise Glück. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1992.
- DuPlessis, Rachel Blau. H. D.: The Career of That Struggle. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Friedman, Susan Stanford. Penelope's Web: Gender, Modernity, H. D.'s Fiction. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Guest, Barbara. Herself Defined: The Poet H. D. and Her World. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1984.
- H. D. Collected Poems, 1912-1944. Edited by Louis L. Martz. New York: New Directions, 1983.
- . Helen in Egypt. New York: Grove, 1961.
- . Psyche Reborn: The Emergence of H. D. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1981.
- Hernandez, H. H. D. Home Page. Available online. URL: <http://www.imagists.org/hd/index.html>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Quinn, Vincent. Hilda Doolittle (H. D.). New York: Twayne, 1967.
- Robinson, Janice S. H. D.: The Life and Work of an American Poet. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1982.
- Robert C. Evans

ERNEST HEMINGWAY (1899–1961)

For a true writer each book should be a new beginning where he tries again for something that is beyond attainment. He should always try for something that has never been done or that others have tried and failed. Then sometimes, with great luck, he will succeed.

(Nobel Prize speech)

Ernest Hemingway's importance in the history of American (and, indeed, world) literature is difficult to challenge. Even readers who do not especially admire his subjects or style must concede his enormous influence. His ideals of clarity, concision, understatement, and simplicity are widely considered hallmarks of effective writing, while the themes he repeatedly explored—such as the ways people demonstrate “grace under pressure”; or the ways they discharge their responsibilities, face their fears, or master some skill; or the ways they cope with pervasive loneliness, uncommon love, widespread despair, frequent danger, and inevitable death—are never likely to lose their interest. Finally, Hemingway will remain significant simply as a highly representative figure of his era. He voiced the ideals, aspirations, frustrations, and disappointments of millions of his contemporaries; among serious writers, he became one of the most popular and iconic figures of his time. He became associated not only with distinctive themes and a distinctive style but also with a distinctive approach to living.

Hemingway's own life began on July 21, 1899, in Oak Park, Illinois, a comfortable suburb of Chicago, where his father, Clarence, was a respected doctor and a lover of the great outdoors and where his mother, Grace, was a somewhat domineering wife. Grace was a crucial influence on her son's life—an influence he later often despised—and there was little doubt in anyone's mind that she was the stronger willed of the two parents. Because she liked the idea of having twins, for instance, she often dressed young Ernest in the same girl-ish clothes as his older sister, and she held the sister back from school a year so that she and Ernest could begin first grade together. Ernest, however, enjoyed many of the normal pleasures of American boyhood, thanks especially to the influence of his father, who encouraged his son's interest in hunting, fishing, hiking, camping, boating, and athletics. Many of the boy's happiest days were spent on long vacations at the family's cottage on Walloon Lake in Michigan, where he could indulge his interest in nature to his heart's content. Nevertheless, back in Oak Park, he did well in school, receiving a fine literary education while pursuing his growing interest in authorship of all sorts, including writing for the school newspaper and composing stories for the literary magazine. By the time he graduated from high school in 1917, his interest in (and talent for) writing was strong enough to win him a job as a cub reporter for the highly distinguished Kansas City Star. He tackled the job with typical energy and enthusiasm, readily embracing the Star's emphasis on short sentences, vigorous phrasing, clear diction, and plain syntax. He later claimed that these rules were the best he had ever encountered as a writer. He worked at the Star from October 1917 until the following April.

By this time, of course, the United States had entered World War I, and many young men were joining the military. When Hemingway was rejected because of his poor eyesight, he joined a Red Cross ambulance unit assigned to service in Italy. Bored with such duty (which was too far from the front), he volunteered for canteen service to be closer to the action. He discovered just how close he was when, on July 8, 1918, a large incoming shell peppered shrapnel into his legs, which were also hit by machine-gun fire. Hemingway nevertheless behaved heroically, assisting another injured man, but the physical and psychological aftereffects of the experience persisted for years. While recovering in Milan, the 19-year-old Ernest met and fell in love with a beautiful 26-year-old nurse named Agnes von Kurowsky, with whom he became infatuated. When he returned to the United States in January 1919, he assumed that Agnes would soon follow and that they would marry, but within a couple of months she wrote to say that she had fallen in love with someone else—a development that first depressed Hemingway and then made him angry. Eventually, though, he returned to his first love (writing), composing stories and hoping to have them published. A chance encounter with the wealthy mother of a handicapped son who was a year younger than Hemingway led to a job in Toronto, Canada, where Ernest would be the boy's companion and where he soon found additional employment as a reporter for the Toronto Star. When this job ended, however, he was soon living back at the family's cottage on Walloon Lake, where he spent much time fishing and enjoying himself—much to the frustration of his mother, who considered him disrespectful and unambitious. Not long after his 21st birthday, therefore, she handed him a note telling him to leave the cottage and not to return until he had learned to behave with greater maturity.

Ironically, this expulsion became a positive turning point. He moved to Chicago and lived with friends while looking for work, and although he soon found a job (with a commercial magazine), the most important development was his involvement in the thriving Chicago literary scene, where he made the acquaintance of such rising talents as CARL SANDBURG and SHERWOOD ANDERSON. Anderson, in particular, was a beneficial contact; genuinely impressed with Hemingway's talent and potential, he did much to promote the younger man's career. He not only encouraged editors to print Hemingway's work but also advised Hemingway himself to go to Paris, where Anderson had a number of influential friends. Besides, Paris was, at that time, the center of an international literary renaissance. Meanwhile, in Chicago Hemingway had also met and fallen in love with Hadley Richardson, who was several years his senior and was from a comfortable family in St. Louis. They married on September 3, 1921, and her sizable trust fund meant that their financial condition was far from desperate. Nevertheless, he took a part-time job with the Toronto Star, intending to write stories about Europe, and in December they set off for Paris. Armed with generous letters of introduction from Anderson, Hemingway soon got to know many of the most notable American literary figures living in the French capital, including GERTRUDE STEIN, EZRA POUND, and Sylvia Beach (the owner of a splendid little bookstore visited by many of the most important modern writers, including James Joyce, whom Hemingway also met). With his keen intelligence, lively personality, and total devotion to writing, Hemingway quickly made a positive impression (at least at first), becoming particularly close to Stein, whose stylistic experiments he admired and emulated. Meanwhile, Pound—not only a talented poet but also an extremely energetic impresario—soon became another one of Hemingway's champions, and while Hemingway covered big stories for the Toronto Star, he also tried to find time for his own creative writing. Unfortunately, many of his early manuscripts were stolen when Hadley briefly left them unattended in a suitcase on a train.

This theft helps to account for the slim pickings in Hemingway's first published book—the revealingly titled Three Stories and Ten Poems, printed in 1923 by a newly founded avant-garde press. This thin book was soon followed in 1924 by another short collection, titled (with fashionably lowercase letters) in our time. Hemingway was not (at this time) trying to make money with his creative writing; he was trying to win critical attention and respect, and that was something he had certainly begun to do. Admirers of serious literature quickly recognized that his was a new and distinctive voice—a voice that emphasized crisp, curt sentences; plenty of vernacular dialogue; and a hard-boiled, no-nonsense approach to any subject it discussed. Hemingway was giving birth to one of the most influential styles in the history of literature. Meanwhile, on October 10, 1923, Hadley gave birth to their first child—a son named John. Although Hemingway had had some qualms about becoming a father, neither marriage nor parenthood slowed him down much. By 1924 he had been named associate editor of the transatlantic review, and by 1925 he had made the acquaintance (and won the friendship) of such rising literary figures as F. SCOTT FITZGERALD and Archibald MacLeish. He had also met an Englishwoman named Duff Twysden (who sexually excited Hemingway and many others), and he had met as well an American named Pauline Pfeiffer, who became a friend of his wife and would soon become her replacement. In the meantime, however, 1925 also saw the U.S. publication, by Boni and Liveright, a major press, of In Our Time (capital letters this time), which reprinted most of the earlier in our time, plus much else besides. It was Hemingway's first major book and won him much admiring attention.

Another reason 1925 was important was that it was the year when Hemingway, while visiting Spain (where he was quickly developing a passionate interest in bullfighting), gathered much material for the book that would become his first significant novel—The Sun Also Rises. He had finished the manuscript by the fall, by which time the prestigious Scribner publishing house had expressed a strong interest. Hemingway, however, was under contract to Boni and Liveright, which also published Sherwood Anderson, who was their prime author. Therefore, Hemingway, to free himself from the contract (and to take a mocking jab at Anderson, whom he now viewed as a competitor), quickly dashed off The Torrents of Spring, a novel parodying Anderson's style. Boni and Liveright, of course, refused to publish it, and so in 1926 it was brought out by Scribner, which also, that October, issued The Sun Also Rises. To salve his conscience, Hemingway assigned the royalties to Hadley, whom he nonetheless divorced in January 1927, marrying Pauline Pfeiffer in May. Along with his new wife he gained new-found fame, for The Sun Also Rises was instantly recognized as a pathbreaking book. In a few years, then, Hemingway had gone from obscurity to widespread recognition. The publication of his collection of stories titled Men without Women in 1927 only confirmed his growing prominence.

In 1928 Hemingway began work on a new novel—A Farewell to Arms—that would soon make him even more popular with critics and the public alike. By this time he had moved to Key West, Florida, where he wrote in the mornings, fished in the afternoons, and otherwise spent his time in bars. On June 28, Pauline gave birth to Hemingway's second son (Patrick), but this good news was offset by the end of the year, when Hemingway learned that his father, ailing physically and financially, had shot and killed himself on December 6. The younger Hemingway regarded the suicide as cowardly (although later he would be better able to understand it). In any case, by 1929, having finished his novel, he was back in Europe. The book was published and sold well, even after the stock market crashed in October, inaugurating the economic catastrophe soon known as the Great Depression. Hemingway, however, was living relatively well; he was back in Key West, continuing to pursue his interest in deep-sea fishing and now also planning to go on safari in Africa. He also, however, spent time on a ranch in Wyoming (while writing a book about bullfighting, published in 1932 as Death in the Afternoon), and in 1931 Pauline gave birth to his third son, Gregory. A book of short stories titled Winner Take Nothing appeared in 1933, the same year Hemingway and Pauline also returned to Europe and then finally made good on their long-delayed plans to go on an African safari. This trip provided Hemingway with raw material for some fine stories, but it also, as usual, drew out his fierce competitive streak, both toward Pauline and toward their guide.

Back in the United States in 1934, Hemingway, having ordered a custom-designed yacht and christened it the Pilar, now devoted himself even more enthusiastically to deep-sea fishing. He also, however, was at work on a new book, published in 1935 as Green Hills of Africa, which was followed in 1936 by such famous stories with African settings as “The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber” and “The Snows of Kilimanjaro.” Yet 1936 was important for other reasons as well: Civil war had broken out in Spain, a country Hemingway loved, and Hemingway had met a talented journalist named Martha Gelhorn, who was attractive, self-confident, and at least as interested in the Spanish war as he was. By 1937 Gelhorn and Hemingway were in Spain together, covering the war and having a passionate affair. In the same year he published a novel titled To Have and Have Not, which was followed in 1938 by a collection of short fiction (which included a play) titled The Fifth Column and the First Forty-Nine Stories. By 1939 he was living in Cuba with Martha, was awaiting a divorce from Pauline, and was hard at work on a massive new novel set during the Spanish civil war: For Whom the Bell Tolls. When the book appeared in 1940, it was an instant and massive best seller and was also a huge critical success. After he divorced Pauline, his marriage to Martha occurred on November 21, but all was far from bright. By this time the Second World War—a conflict he had foreseen and warned against—had been under way for more than a year, and it was obvious to nearly everyone that the United States would soon be dragged into the fight.

When the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, the conflict became truly global. For a time, Hemingway’s contributions to the war effort consisted mainly of cruising the Caribbean on board the Pilar, ostensibly searching for German submarines, which he planned to attack with bazookas and bombs. Martha, however, suspected that his main interest was still fishing; the “sub-hunting” missions allowed him to escape wartime rationing of gasoline. As strains began to appear in their marriage, she convinced Hemingway to go with her to Europe in 1944 as a war correspondent. Because of his prominence, he arrived before she did—giving him enough time to meet and become enamored with Mary Walsh (a reporter for Time who would soon become the fourth and final Mrs. Hemingway), as well as enough time to become involved in a drunken car crash. Martha was not amused, and their marriage essentially ended at this time. For the duration of the war, the two saw themselves as rival writers, although Hemingway (in violation of the Geneva Conventions regarding war correspondents) also took an active role in combat. With the war winding down and an allied victory assured, he returned to Cuba early in 1945 to prepare for his divorce from Martha and his marriage to Mary (who, however, first had to divorce her own husband). After his marriage to Martha officially ended in December 1945, his wedding to Mary occurred the following March.

By this time Hemingway was at work on a new and extremely lengthy novel, which would eventually be published—long after his death—as The Garden of Eden. He was also back to his old habits of hunting, fishing, drinking, and eating. Although he was only in his late forties, his health was becoming so bad (and his weight so great) that he put himself on a diet and managed to drop both some pounds and his blood pressure. He and Mary traveled to Europe in 1948, and it was there that he became smitten with a much younger woman (who was nearly 19) named Adriana Ivancich. Although their relationship never became physical, he saw her as a kind of muse, and his infatuation helped inspire his next published novel, Across the River and into the Trees, which appeared in 1950. Unfortunately, most critics considered the book a disaster, but Hemingway did not give up. He began work on a new novel (not published until 1970) titled Islands in the Stream, but it was in 1951, after a visit to Cuba by Adriana and her mother, that he produced his final masterwork, The Old Man and the Sea. When the book was initially published as a special issue of Life magazine in 1952, over 5 million copies sold in just two days. The book was also selected for publication by the Book of the Month Club, and Scribner brought out its own edition. Popular with both critics and the general public, the novel soon won Hemingway the 1953 Pulitzer Prize for fiction and helped him win the 1954 Nobel Prize in literature.

Before then, however, Hemingway had returned to some of his old stomping grounds. In 1953 he was back in Spain, watching more bullfights, and later that year he was once again on safari in Africa. In 1954 a plane in which he and Mary were riding while in Africa crashed, and then, the next day, the rescue plane crashed as well. Hemingway was significantly injured in both wrecks and was even reported dead, but these were just the latest in a long line of accidents that had occurred over the years—accidents that often involved major injuries to his head. Nevertheless, despite growing problems with his physical and psychological health, he continued to travel and write. In 1956 he was back in Spain, watching the bullfights, and later that year he was back in Paris, where the chance discovery of two trunks full of his old clothes and some of his writings from the 1920s helped inspire him to begin working on a set of memoirs that would eventually be published (in 1964) as A Moveable Feast. Hemingway, however, was increasingly moody and depressed, and his spirits were not improved by the growing political instability in Cuba, where a revolution would soon topple the corrupt government. Before that happened, however, Hemingway's own house was actually searched in an early morning raid by soldiers looking for a fugitive insurgent. Although Hemingway himself was not injured, his dog was shot, and by the end of the year the writer and his wife had rented a house in Ketchum, Idaho, where they settled permanently in 1959. As usual, serious tensions had long since developed in this latest marriage, and they became worse as Hemingway's mental health deteriorated. Depressed, unable to sleep, and even suffering from paranoia (he was convinced that the Federal Bureau of Investigation [FBI] was plotting against him), Hemingway by 1960 was being treated for mental illness at the Mayo Clinic—even undergoing electroshock therapy, which helped relieve his depression but also robbed him, for a time, of his memory. Less and less able to write, he became more and more depressed; one day in April 1961, Mary found him pointing a gun at his head. Hospitalized both in Ketchum and again at the Mayo Clinic (where he once again received electroshock therapy), he managed to convince his doctors (but not Mary) that he had recovered sufficiently to return home. He was back in Ketchum on June 30, but he survived just two days: On July 2, he awoke in the morning, went to the basement, retrieved a double-barreled shotgun, leaned his head against it, and fired.

In Our Time* (1925, 1930)

This innovative collection of short fiction consists of alternating stories and vignettes; the latter, ironically called chapters, are very brief (often just a single paragraph long), are printed in italic type, and deal with such matters as war, bullfighting, and crime. They provide an intriguing counterpoint to the stories themselves, many (but not all) of which deal with the physical, emotional, and psychological maturation of a character named Nick Adams, who develops from a boy living with his parents in the Midwest; to a young man dealing with his friends, girlfriends, and random strangers; to a solitary fisherman, remembering his past while communing with nature. The remaining stories, in which Nick is not the main character, often deal with characters who resemble Nick in some way, or they deal with themes first enunciated in the stories that focus on Nick.

As a group of interrelated stories unified by the appearance of the same (or similar) characters, by a set of connected themes, and by a prevailing mood or tone, Hemingway's collection resembles James Joyce's Dubliners as well as Winesburg, Ohio, a similar work by the American writer Sherwood Anderson. Anderson's writings were highly influential at the time Hemingway composed his collection, and Hemingway himself admired Anderson before he later mocked and parodied Anderson's style in his novel The Torrents of Spring (1926). Early reviewers of In Our Time praised the work for its lean, hard-boiled style—especially its simple, often monosyllabic diction, its emphasis on concrete visual details, its sparing use of adjectives, its effective use of dialogue, its avoidance of overt interpretation and analysis of characters' emotions and motives, and its presentation of convincing characters speaking a credible American vernacular. Some reviewers did find the characters dull, thin, and mostly humorless, but in general reaction to the volume was very positive; most reviewers believed that a major new presence had arrived on the American literary scene. Hemingway was welcomed as a significant spokesman of the younger generation—a generation that had been permanently scarred by World War I and a generation that had to cope with all the challenges of a chaotic modern world.

Later commentators have mostly taken the stylistic value of the collection for granted and instead have tended to focus on two main matters: (1) how (or even whether) the stories and chapters are coherently interconnected, and (2) thematic interpretations of the various tales. Some commentators have argued that the stories and chapters are not coherently linked and that the randomness is deliberate; according to this view, Hemingway wanted to replicate, in the structure of his book, the chaos and disorder he saw all around him. The movements from one story to the next, as well as the alternations between stories and “chapters,” are thus meant to be disorienting and disturbing; no underlying unity was intended, and none should be sought. Most analysts, however, have indeed sought to explain how the stories are linked and how the stories and the “chapters” interrelate. Such analysts have argued (for instance) that the “chapters” cover a discrete chronological period (1914–23, inclusive); that war tends to be the focus of the first seven chapters, that bullfighting tends to be the focus of chapters 7 through 14, and that chapters 8 and 15 focus on crime; and that nearly all the chapters deal with issues of manhood—of what it means to function as a man in a world that has lost its moral and psychological bearings. According to this view, the early chapters, dealing with war, show the destruction of traditional values, while the later chapters, dealing with bullfighting, illustrate a search for a new value system—a system rooted in individual courage, technical skill, and aesthetic grace. Hemingway never pretends that this new system of values will be widely or easily achieved (and indeed the final brief chapter of the book can be read as one last sardonic, ironic thrust), but many critics seem to agree that the book implies that it is only through private effort and individual integrity that one can hope to achieve a proper relationship with nature, with others, and with oneself.

Just as the brief “chapters” have been interpreted as suggesting a general movement from meaningless violence, extreme disorder, and tragic absurdity to a fragile but valuable sense of dignity and meaning, so the stories themselves have been seen as following a similar pattern. According to this view, most of the stories chart Nick Adams's slow, painful movement from innocent boyhood to disillusioned adulthood—with all of its physical pain, psychological suffering, and literal and figurative death—until he finally achieves, in the story titled “Big Two-Hearted River: Part II,” a kind of inner serenity and satisfaction while fishing alone and communing with nature. Meanwhile, the stories in which Nick is not the main character serve (according to this view) to reinforce many of the themes, attitudes, and tones first enunciated in the Adams stories. Such themes include, for instance, relations between fathers and sons, between men and women, between male friends, and between humans and nature. Additional themes include the disappointments of marriage and the demoralizing effects of war. The collection opens by focusing on Nick as a boy in rural Michigan; then it shows him as a student and soldier in Europe; and then it concludes (except for the final “L'Envoi”) by moving him back to rural Michigan, but now Nick is an adult who has achieved a kind of peace with himself and his world. The stories are thus organized (as Clinton S. Burhans, Jr., persuasively argued) by a movement from “youth to maturity, from innocence to experience, from peace to war to peace again, and from America to Europe and back to America” (see Reynolds 91). In the process of charting this journey, Hemingway offers us a vision of numerous individuals faced with a multitude of challenges, but he also thereby offers a vision of a restless, tormented world—a world in which real happiness is rare and therefore precious.

Part of the power of the book derives from its diversity of topics, styles, and techniques. In “On the Quai at Smyrna,” for instance, Hemingway skillfully imitates the tone and vocabulary of a smug British officer, while in the extremely brief “Chapter I,” he adopts the colloquial manner of a common American soldier. In “Indian Camp” a third-person narrator suddenly yanks us back from firsthand accounts of warfare to describe, instead, an innocent boy’s exposure to bloody cesarean childbirth and equally bloody suicide, while in the cryptic “Chapter II” we are back in the midst of a firsthand account of foreign warfare, only to be returned, in “The Doctor and the Doctor’s Wife,” to the wilds of Michigan to witness an entirely different view of the physician (Nick’s father) who was first described in “Indian Camp.” The entire book alternates—in subjects, methods, characters, and locations—in just this way, producing a bewildering sense of disorientation and confusion but producing, as well, a fascinating kind of suspense and curiosity. We can never quite be sure what will happen next, and so the impulse to continue reading is strong. The collection achieves a high degree of variety but also an underlying unity of tone—a tone that is mostly bleak and somber but one that is also punctuated by brief moments of kindness, friendship, peace, joy, and even love.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the character of Nick Adams in In Our Time with the character of George Willard in Sherwood Anderson’s Winesburg, Ohio. How are they similar and/or different in their experiences, attitudes, changes, and final developments? Discuss their relations with their parents, friends, and communities. In what ways is each character a reflection of his era and his region?
2. Read Hemingway’s collection alongside Gertrude Stein’s work titled Three Lives. How did each author try to be and succeed in being an innovative writer of fiction, especially in terms of style, characterization, plot, and structure? Which book is more unconventional? Which, in your opinion, is more interesting to read? Explain your response in detail.

3. JOHN STEINBECK’s collection The Red Pony deals, as does In Our Time, with a recurring character—a young boy who is initiated into the facts of life and death. How is Steinbeck’s character similar to, and different from, Nick Adams? Discuss the chronological range covered by both sets of stories. Discuss the protagonists’ relations with other characters, especially their parents but also other role models. What kinds of lessons does each youth learn as he matures?
4. Do some research into literary modernism, and then discuss the ways in which In Our Time is a modernist work, particularly in terms of style and structure. Pay special attention to the role of the “chapters.” How does Hemingway’s collection compare, as a modernist piece of writing, with WILLIAM FAULKNER’s novel The Sound and the Fury and/or As I Lay Dying? Which of these writers is the more relentlessly modernist of the two? Explain your response in detail.
5. Choose a particular theme—such as war or bullfighting or maturation—and trace it over the course of several sections of the narrative. How does the theme change or develop (or fail to do so)? How does each section provide a distinctive perspective on the chosen theme? Is there any consistency in Hemingway’s treatment of the selected topic?

“A Clean, Well-Lighted Place” (1926)

As an old deaf man sits late one night in a deserted Spanish café and consumes drink after drink, two waiters—one younger, one older—discuss his circumstances: Although he is economically comfortable, he recently attempted suicide, and he likes to stay as late as possible in the café, whose cleanliness and light provide him with some sense of security and comfort. Unlike the older waiter, the younger waiter cannot understand the old man’s lonely feelings, and because the younger man is impatient with the delay and wants to go home to bed with his wife, he finally urges the deaf man to leave the café. Later, alone at a bar, the older waiter reflects on the pervading sense of nothingness and alienation that helps explain the deaf man's dislike of the dark and his desire for order and companionship.

Despite the brevity of this work, it manages to imply a great deal, not only about the characters depicted but also about the fundamental tragedy of human life—a tragedy rooted in the sense of feeling utterly alone in a world that lacks any deeper meaning or purpose. The story opens by emphasizing the “late” hour as the “old man” who is “deaf” sits in the “shadow” cast by dim electric lights (Complete 288). All these details are clearly symbolic: The man, who has recently been rescued from a suicide attempt, is nevertheless (as is everyone) inexorably moving toward death. His advanced age simply means that death will occur sooner for him than for everyone else. Meanwhile, his deafness simply makes him even more isolated than all people already are. He is, then, merely an extreme symbol of the common human condition; all of us are alone in the shadows, awaiting death, cut off from any real communion with others, and trying in the meantime to find some comfort in pleasurable sensations and surroundings that, by their very nature, can only be temporary. When the younger waiter asks the older waiter what has caused the old deaf man enough “despair” to make him attempt suicide, the older waiter responds by saying, “Nothing” (Complete 288)—a reply that is far more significant than it seems at first. It is indeed a sense of nothingness or nihilism (a sense that nothing really matters in life; that human existence has no ultimate meaning or purpose; that there are no objective, transcendent values that give fulfillment to our lives; and that we are finally alone in a universe without a god or any other source of grand significance) that helps explain why this old deaf man, or indeed any human being, might consider killing himself. Despair of this sort was increasingly common during the era in which Hemingway wrote—an era in which thoughtful people were increasingly less confident concerning all the old, traditional values (such as religion, patriotism, or faith in progress) that had once seemed to give meaning to human existence. The older waiter, near the end of the story, uses the Spanish word nada to express this pervasive sense of nothingness, and the older waiter is clearly presented as more insightful and perceptive than his younger colleague, whose responses to the old deaf man are more shallow, superficial, selfish, and cruel. However, despite the gloomy philosophy that underlies the story, the work is not entirely pessimistic. The old man himself displays a quiet dignity in his loneliness; he never becomes drunk, self-pitying, or angry, and the older waiter, through his actions and attitudes, demonstrates compassion, understanding, and empathy. In a work that might easily have become sentimental or preachy, Hemingway quietly implies that human life need not be entirely solitary or lacking in generosity. The older waiter represents a kind of moral ideal, for in spite of his awareness of the underlying darkness of life, he continues to try to find some light and to share that light with others.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with T. S. Eliot's poem “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock.” How are the works comparable in tone, atmosphere, setting, and philosophical implication? How does Prufrock compare and/or contrast with the older waiter? What does Eliot's attitude seem to be toward Prufrock, and what does Hemingway's attitude seem to be toward the old waiter?
2. Read this story alongside WALLACE STEVENS's poem “Sunday Morning.” What does each work seem to imply about the status of religion, and of belief in God, in modern life? What does each work suggest about possible alternative sources of meaning, value, and purpose? Which work is more affirmative in its view of existence? Discuss the role of humor in each work.
3. Choose a relatively small section of the story and analyze, as closely as possible, how each detail of that section contributes to the tone, atmosphere, coherence, and effectiveness of the story as a whole. For example, why, in the opening paragraph of the story, does the narrator stress that it is “very late”? Why does the old man sit in “shadow”? Why is the light “electric”? Why is the old man just “a little drunk” rather than completely inebriated? Discuss the implications of each of Hemingway’s descriptive choices.

The Sun Also Rises* (1926)

Jake Barnes, a young American journalist who is now impotent as a result of a wound suffered in World War I, describes his relations with a number of acquaintances while they live in France and travel in Spain in the early 1920s. Central figures of the group include Lady Brett Ashley, a highly sexed and free-spirited Englishwoman to whom most of the men in the novel are attracted; Michael Campbell, a Scotsman whom Brett plans to marry after her impending divorce is final; Bill Gorton, a successful American writer who is a friend of Jake; and Robert Cohn, a Jewish-American writer and former boxer whom most of the other characters despise, especially because of his desperate fixation on Brett. Brett herself becomes infatuated with a young Spanish bullfighter named Pedro Romero, but by the end of the novel she decides that it would be wrong to continue the affair she briefly began with him.

General assessments of The Sun Also Rises will inevitably depend on more particular responses to the novel’s plot, characters, themes, and style. While some readers, for instance, have found the plot tedious and trivial, far more have praised the work for convincingly depicting the lives of American and British expatriates in continental Europe and for memorably presenting the aftereffects of World War I on the so-called lost generation—a generation who were often crippled (physically, psychologically, or both) by the pointless destruction unleashed during that ironically named “Great War.” Certainly the novel communicates a vivid sense of what it was like to be young, relatively wealthy, and generally rootless in the years immediately following that massive conflict. Simply as a historical document, then, the novel retains a good deal of interest, for Hemingway manages to convey what life was like for a small but highly influential subset of the population of an important historical era. Meanwhile, although many of the characters themselves have struck various readers as shallow, superficial, and self-absorbed, other readers have found Hemingway’s people intriguing, engaging, and sometimes even sympathetic. Jake, for instance, strikes some readers as a sensitive, thoughtful, and vulnerable man whose physical injury denies him the love that might make him whole again, while Lady Brett—despite her hard-drinking, tough-talking, sexually promiscuous ways—often strikes the same readers as a mostly sympathetic victim: Having lost her fiancé in the war and having been denied the chance for a completely fulfilling love with Jake, she has already made two bad marriages and seems about to make another. Pedro Romero, in the meantime, seems an admirable and appealing character by almost any standard; he inspires lust in Brett and respect in Jake, in most readers, and probably in Hemingway himself. However, even readers who consider most of the characters unappealing may find themselves admiring the novel for depicting such unsavory types so vividly.

The obvious themes of the book give it, to many, an appeal that is equally obvious. The novel raises a number of perennially important issues, including the following: What is love? What is friendship? What kind of life is most worth living? What qualities make a person worthy of respect? What is the ultimate significance of human life? What are the best ways to cope with loss? What values can replace old certainties that no longer seem reliable? Can mere material or physical pleasure make for a satisfying existence? Whether or not Hemingway does full justice to these themes was once (and may to some extent remain) a matter of debate, but perhaps the ultimate touchstone for the success of this book (or of any literary work) is the success of its style. If the book were not skillfully written, it might not seem worth reading, no matter how inherently interesting its ideas. It is as a stylist, in fact, that Hemingway is perhaps most important, and The Sun Also Rises reveals many of the stylistic traits for which he has most often been praised.

The language of the book is generally simple, clear, straightforward, and unadorned. Sentences tend to be short; adjectives, adverbs, metaphors, and similes tend to be few; and the tone is flat and largely objective, relying greatly on understatement and subtle irony. Moreover, a huge proportion of the book is given over to dialogue, and much of the novel's success depends on Hemingway's talent for convincingly catching the diction, rhythms, and sound of actual speech. Even readers who may find the book unappealing for other reasons nevertheless often concede Hemingway's skill in creating credible dialogue. If that dialogue often seems trivial, drab, monotonous, and rambling, that is partly because Hemingway is imitating the actual sounds of mundane conversation.

Occasionally the dialogue seems dated, phony, and almost quaint. At one point, for instance, Brett enters a bar and addresses Jake and some others in her typically breezy, slangy style:

“Hello, you chaps.”

“Hello, Brett,” I said. “Why aren't you tight?”

“Never going to get tight any more. I say, give a chap a brandy and soda.”

(Sun 22)

The fact that Brett uses the word chap in referring both to the men and to herself is partly a reflection of her British nationality and partly a reflection of her gender-bending personality: She acts, talks, and wears her short hair in ways that would have made her seem somewhat masculine in the 1920s, and her tendency to speak of herself as a “chap” implies that she partly thinks of herself (and certainly presents herself) as “one of the boys.” During her own era she would have seemed a startlingly “liberated” woman and would thus have symbolized the profound changes that were beginning to take place during that period in relations between the sexes. Nevertheless, in the passage just quoted (and often elsewhere) her speech now sounds old-fashioned and even affected, and perhaps even in Hemingway's day it was deliberately intended to suggest Brett's self-conscious pretensions. She is less self-confident and less happy than she pretends to be, and her need to adopt such poses implies the essential hollowness at the core of her psyche.

Although Brett considers herself a sophisticated woman of the world, her discussions with Jake are often gushingly sentimental and self-pitying (as in “Oh darling, I've been so miserable”; Sun 24). Moreover, her explicit self-assessments are often both melodramatic and self-deceptive. At one point, for instance, when telling Jake about her sudden infatuation with the athletic young bullfighter Pedro Romero, she announces, with her usual maudlin effusiveness, “I'm a goner. I'm mad about the Romero boy. I'm in love with him, I think” (Sun 183). Real love, of course, is hardly the issue: She has merely glimpsed the sexy matador in his snug green tights, and her libido has been aroused. Her words to Jake illustrate the shallow theatricality that defines her personality, and later, even Brett herself realizes that her feelings are almost predatory. Of course, her change of heart does not occur until after she has already gone to bed with the much-younger Romero, but her belated attack of conscience at least allows her to indulge in her trademark vulgarity, which is supposed to signal her tough-as-nails sophistication: “I'm thirty-four, you know. I'm not going to be one of these bitches that ruins children” (Sun 243). Later still, congratulating herself on her decision to put the young man behind her, she announces, “You know I feel rather damned good, Jake. . . . You know it makes one feel rather good deciding not to be a bitch” (Sun 245). Individual readers will have to decide for themselves whether or not Brett actually attains this lofty goal, but many readers, apparently, found Brett not only an appealing character but a worthy role model. For various reasons, however, it is hard to take her nearly as seriously as she takes herself.

A plausible case can in fact be made that Hemingway's novel satirizes not only Brett but also most of the rest of the book's personalities, including even Jake (but excluding Romero and his fellow Spaniard, Montoya, who respects the artistry, skill, character, and values that Romero so strikingly embodies). According to this reading, much of the book is ironic, and we are never meant to admire most of the people in it as much as they admire themselves. Hemingway (from this perspective) describes the aimless existence of a group of shallow hedonists not in order to endorse their frantic, frenetic lifestyle but precisely to expose its hollowness and limitations. Certainly there are passages in the book that can suggest such a reading. Almost at the very end of the novel, for instance, just after Brett has proclaimed her noble intention “not to be a bitch,” she immediately adds, “It’s sort of what we have instead of God.” To this, Jake at once responds: “Some people have God. . . . Quite a lot.” But then Brett just as quickly retorts, “He never worked very well with me” (Sun 245). Jake seems almost wistful for the consolations provided by traditional religious belief—consolations others possess but ones that Jake himself seems unprepared to embrace with any real enthusiasm. (His own Catholic faith is mentioned in passing but seems merely nominal.) His comment does remind us that alternatives do exist to the egotism symbolized by Brett, but Brett’s snappy comeback, as well as Jake’s immediate abandonment of the subject (“Should we have another Martini?” Sun 245), suggest that Hemingway is not seriously proposing religion as an answer to any of the problems the novel presents.

If anything, the answer (if there is one) lies in the cool professionalism, innate humility, and stoic bravery of Pedro Romero, who constantly faces death with the kind of courageous, unassuming nonchalance that Hemingway would increasingly admire as the decades wore on. Romero is the sort of secular hero featured in many later works by Hemingway—figures such as Robert Jordan in For Whom the Bell Tolls or Santiago in The Old Man and the Sea (to mention just two obvious examples). Next to Romero, most of the other characters in The Sun Also Rises seem petty and pitiful (not to mention self-pitying), and if the book is indeed a satire, then Romero is the standard by which the other characters are measured and found wanting. Romero, however, does not enter the book until it is nearly two-thirds complete, and he quickly disappears from the main action. He is, moreover, a mostly silent character, little given to all the superfluous talk typical of most people in this novel. That reticence, of course, is one of his virtues, but it also means that as a foil to the others he is mostly inarticulate: He does not speak on behalf of an alternative set of values but merely (and quietly) embodies them. However, if Romero has a more troubling flaw as a moral standard, that flaw lies in the fact that he responds at all to the ironically titled “Lady” Brett (who has memorably been called a “tart with a title”). It is hard to imagine what he finds appealing about this rapidly aging, rather prurient party hound; if Romero had simply turned away and laughed her off, it might have been more obvious that Hemingway himself was mocking her. After all, when Hemingway so desired, he could be quite blatantly satirical and ironic (as he had already proven in the story “Mr. and Mrs. Elliot” in In Our Time). However, the satire and irony in The Sun Also Rises—if satire is there at all—are much more subtle, muted, and implied. Perhaps Hemingway does indeed intend to undercut the pretensions of Brett and her crew, and perhaps he even intends to satirize Jake for serving as Brett’s pimp and procurer (since it is Jake, after all, who facilitates her liaison with Romero). If these are Hemingway’s intentions, however, he mostly leaves it to his readers to connect the dots.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast The Sun Also Rises with NELLA LARSEN’s novel titled Quicksand. How are the social settings of the novels similar? How are the works similar in tone? How do both novels present the experiences of Americans living abroad? How do the books compare and contrast in the ways they deal with issues of race? In which novel is the central character more appealing and sympathetic? Explain your response in detail.
2. Read The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas by Gertrude Stein and then discuss its relations with The Sun Also Rises. How do both books describe the world of expatriates living in Europe in the 1920s? How is Hemingway presented in Stein’s book; are her comments about him relevant at all to his novel? How does Hemingway’s style

- in Sun seem to have been influenced by Stein's ideas about style? How are the tones, moods, and atmospheres of both books similar?
3. Compare and contrast the values, social relationships, and kinds of characters depicted in The Sun Also Rises with the same aspects of THORNTON WILDER's Our Town. How does Hemingway try to prevent his novel from being excessively cynical? How does Wilder try to prevent his play from being excessively sentimental? Does one work achieve a better balance than the other? How are the styles of the two works similar? How does Hemingway's novel resemble a play, and how does Wilder's play resemble a novel?
 4. Choose a relatively minor character (such as Count Mippipopolous, Bill Gorton, Mike Campbell, or Montoya) and trace that character's appearances in the book. How does that character help illuminate the themes of the novel? How does he or she help cast light on one or more of the major characters? How would the book be significantly different if the chosen character were absent?

“Hills Like White Elephants” (1927)

As an unnamed American man and a young woman he calls “Jig” sit at a train station in a valley near the Ebro River in Spain, they drink alcohol and have a tense discussion. Although the word abortion is never explicitly mentioned, it soon becomes clear that the man is trying to persuade the reluctant Jig to end her pregnancy. After their discussion reaches an intense pitch in which Jig threatens to scream at the man, the tension eventually subsides, and at the very end of the story, with their train approaching, Jig claims to feel “fine.”

This story—one of Hemingway's briefest and most famous—illustrates many of the most typical traits of his writing. The phrasing is simple and clear; much of the tale is given over to terse, colloquial dialogue; the unobtrusive narrator offers few explanations and no interpretations but instead merely relays facts and reports conversation; and the work ends without a clear or simple resolution. The story presents itself as a straightforward, objective, slice-of-life description; it offers no moralizing comments, depending instead on readers to draw their own conclusions about the psychology, motives, and emotions of the two main characters. The work relies on implication and suggestion rather than on explicit authorial explanation. Nevertheless, Hemingway provides plenty of subtle, understated imagery and symbolism to guide interpretation of this seemingly simple story. Perhaps no other work of his better illustrates his “theory of omission” or “iceberg principle”: Just as only the tip of a massive iceberg is visible above water, so a truly effective piece of writing depends for its power on what it suggests and implies rather than on what it overtly states. By the time we have finished reading “Hills Like White Elephants,” we have a far deeper insight into the relationship of Jig and the American than either of them has openly expressed. The story is extremely well designed, but the subtleties of its craftsmanship become fully visible only in retrospect.

The skill with which the story is crafted begins at once. The narrator opens by mentioning that on the side of the valley where the characters are sitting “there was no shade and no trees and the station was between two lines of rails in the sun.” One part of the landscape, then, is lifeless and barren; as the narrator later reports, on this side of the valley “the country was brown and dry” (Complete 211). In contrast, we learn later that on the opposite side of the valley there “were fields of grain and trees along the banks of the Ebro,” and that the river is visible through the trees (Complete 213). Clearly, then, Hemingway has placed these characters in the midst of a highly symbolic landscape—a landscape in which one side is associated with blank sterility and the other is associated with teeming fertility and life. Obviously this setting is appropriate to a story about abortion, and it soon becomes evident that Jig is attracted by the distant, fertile side of the valley and associates abortion with the bleak desert that presently surrounds her. She finds herself at both a literal and a symbolic transition point in her life; she must choose, both literally and figuratively, which direction she will take. A train will soon be arriving from Barcelona and will then proceed to Madrid; should Jig board it and presumably have the abortion? Or should she refuse to board the train and thereby risk ending her relationship with the American? By the very end of the story, the narrator leaves it tantalizingly unclear just what Jig has decided, or even whether she has decided anything, but during the course of the story he manages to convey the enormous pressures she feels.

Among those pressures, the heat is symbolically important. As the couple try to find comfort in the train station's "warm shadow" (a nicely paradoxical phrase), the narrator reports that "it was very hot and the express from Barcelona would come in forty minutes" (Complete 211). Not only is the climate uncomfortable, then, but Jig and the American also feel the added pressure of the ticking clock to reach a quick decision about this life-altering matter. Little wonder, therefore, that they soon begin drinking heavily—behavior that not only typifies the life of random sensual pleasure they have been leading up till now (a life of which Jig has grown increasingly tired), but will also help explain Jig's later angry outburst. In the meantime, however, Jig seems the more passive of the two; the discussion opens with her asking a question, and throughout most of the dialogue she seems more hesitant, more uncertain, and more desperate to please. Her tone often sounds like that of a pleading little girl, and indeed her comment comparing the hills to white elephants is intended to be "bright" and pleasing (Complete 212). Yet even this seemingly offhand remark is revealing: A white elephant was conventionally considered a possession unwanted by its owner but one that is difficult to dispose of, or as something rare and valuable but also difficult to maintain.

For the American, the baby is an unwanted burden; for Jig it seems to offer the promise of a new, more settled, more satisfying kind of existence. Ironically, the more that the American insists that the "operation" will be "simple" and "natural," the more complex and unnatural the prospect seems to Jig; physically the procedure may be simple (although the American's claim that the operation merely involves "let[ing] the air in" seems either hopelessly naive or brutally cynical), but emotionally and psychologically it seems exceptionally complex, especially for a relatively inexperienced young woman who was living during a time when abortions were anything but accepted or routine. Although the American claims that the pregnancy is "the only thing that bothers us" and is "the only thing that's made us unhappy," Jig seems to think and feel differently. She seems increasingly dissatisfied with their life of shallow sensation seeking—a life in which their main activity has been to "look at things and try new drinks" (Complete 212). She has grown weary of the life of random travel symbolized by their suitcases with "labels on them from all the hotels where [in a splendid choice of verb] they had spent nights" (Complete 214; italics added). Jig clearly wants a more permanent existence with a stronger sense of commitment from her partner, but when she tells him that they could have "everything," the couple cannot even agree on a definition of that word. For her it implies a rooted life; for him it suggests continued travel (Complete 213). Although he insists that he does not want her to do anything she does not desire, she easily realizes that this claim is just another manipulative tactic. The discussion, then, reveals not simply their disagreement about abortion but their fundamentally different personalities, values, and goals: The American considers himself a rational, logical being (as when he emphasizes his interest in proof or when he admires the other passengers for waiting "reasonably" for the train), whereas Jig realizes that her nature is more romantic, emotional, and intuitive (as when she says, "I just know things"). If Jig finally seems frustrated, depressed, and angry, it is partly because she now understands how little she and her partner have in common and how improbable it is that an abortion will solve any of the deeper problems in their relationship. Thus her very last comment—"I feel fine. . . . There's nothing wrong with me. I feel fine" (Complete 214)—seems painfully ironic. Whether she has the abortion or elects to keep the baby, it seems highly unlikely that Jig will ever feel "fine" in the ways she once hoped for or imagined. Her simple final word—which is also the final word of the story as a whole—seems (as does so much else in this story) exceptionally double-edged.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the relationship depicted in this story with the relationship presented in Ezra Pound's poem "The River-Merchant's Wife: A Letter." How do the personalities, values, and desires of the two women resemble and/or differ from one another? How are the two works similar in their use of implication, symbolism, and imagery? What kind of future do you foresee for the two women?
2. Read this story alongside Katherine Anne Porter's "The Jilting of Granny Weatherall." How are Jig and Granny obviously different, but what do they also have in common? In what ways, and for what reasons, is each woman frustrated? How do they differ from and/or resemble one another in their personalities?
3. Discuss this tale in relation to John Steinbeck's story "The Chrysanthemums." How are landscape and setting used symbolically in both stories? How do the men in the stories compare and/or contrast? How and why do both stories end without a clear resolution?
4. Discuss the appearances of the old woman in this story. How does her presence add to the impact of the narrative? What does she symbolize or represent? Discuss her interactions with the two main characters; how are those interactions significant? In particular, discuss the way Jig interacts with the old woman. What do those interactions reveal about Jig?

A Farewell to Arms (1929)

Frederic Henry, a young American lieutenant who is volunteering as an ambulance driver for the Italian army during World War I, enjoys his relations with his lively Italian comrades, including a friendly young doctor named Rinaldi, a thoughtful young priest, and a variety of other colorful characters. His life becomes more complicated, however, when he meets and quickly falls in love with Catherine Barkley, a British nurse's aide whose former fiancé suffered a brutal, fatal injury earlier in the war and whose good friend, a nurse named Ferguson (nicknamed "Fergie") disapproves of Catherine's new relationship with Frederic. Frederic is injured when the Austrians shell his camp; while recuperating at the hospital he becomes even more involved with Catherine; she becomes pregnant; the Italian army retreats; Frederic deserts; he and Catherine escape to Switzerland, but Catherine dies while being delivered of a stillborn baby.

Hemingway's first novel, The Sun Also Rises, had dealt with the aftereffects of World War I on a group of feckless Americans and Britons living in continental Europe, while this next novel, A Farewell to Arms, describes the impact of the war itself on Americans, Britons, and Italians in the final years of the conflict. This emphasis on the so-called Great War—also ironically termed, by optimists at that time, the "war to end all wars"—is entirely appropriate, since the First World War was one of the most important events in human history. It had an undeniably major impact not only on Hemingway himself (who, as had Frederic Henry, had volunteered as an ambulance driver, was wounded, and fell in love with a nurse) but also on his entire generation. This was the group whom the writer Gertrude Stein (Hemingway's onetime friend) dubbed "the lost generation," and her adjective has always seemed apt for a number of reasons. In the first place, millions upon millions of young soldiers were literally lost as a result of the war—killed in bloody, vicious battles in which thousands of men often died on a single day merely to acquire or hold a few yards of territory. The war had begun almost by accident, but because most of the European powers were also global empires, it eventually involved the entire planet. It was fought with all the latest technological innovations (such as tanks, airplanes, poison gas, and highly destructive machine guns), and it eventually unleashed profound political and social changes, including the Russian Revolution, the collapse of the German monarchy, the breakup of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and the rise of the United States to world-power status. Most important for Hemingway and his generation, however, it helped destroy confidence (especially among artists and intellectuals) in such old-fashioned values as patriotism, nationalism, religion, and idealism. Traditions of all sorts came under withering suspicion; the young people who returned from the war (many of them mentally and physically crippled) often felt not only disgusted and disillusioned by their experiences but also betrayed by the older generation, who had let this seemingly pointless conflict occur. The mood of these young men and women was often cynical and bleak, and so they were “lost” in the additional senses of feeling rootless, aimless, skeptical, and embittered. As both its title and its plot suggest, A Farewell to Arms reflects the desire of many of Hemingway's generation to put war—and especially “the” War—behind them. Yet most of them also intuited (correctly, as it turned out) that the end of the First World War might soon lead (ironically enough) to a second and even more destructive conflict. Indeed, it was partly the pacifism at any price bred by the First World War that helped make the Second inevitable.

War, then, is one of the major themes of A Farewell to Arms; love is another. Some readers (including the novelist F. SCOTT FITZGERALD as well as Maxwell Perkins, Hemingway's editor) thought that the two themes were not sufficiently integrated, but most readers have had few complaints. Hemingway juxtaposes chapters about the war with chapters about the developing affection between Frederic and Catherine, showing how love provides a source of meaning, happiness, fulfillment, and inner peace in a world that otherwise seems chaotic, maddening, brutal, and senseless. Despite the urgings of the Italian priest, Frederic can find no source of consolation or stability from such traditional sources as religion, and so, as the novel develops and his own character matures, his relationship with Catherine (which he treats at first as a kind of game) becomes the source of much of his genuine joy and satisfaction. The fact that she ultimately dies—and that she dies while trying to give birth to his child—therefore makes the ending of the novel all the more bitter, painful, and ironic; Hemingway suggests (here as so often elsewhere) that life is not “fair,” that joy can only ever be temporary, that the best people often die soonest, and that human love is precious precisely because human life is so precarious. By the end of the novel, Frederic has been wounded physically, but the far more serious wound is to his psyche and soul. The tone of the novel is elegiac, and the elegy Frederic offers is not only a tribute to Catherine's vitality and beauty but a far deeper tribute to the courage and selflessness she personifies. Ironically, Hemingway's “war novel” is most famous for its vivid depiction of a notorious Italian retreat from war, and the truest example of courage in the book is not provided by the men at arms but by the leading female, who faces her death with the kind of stoic resolve that Hemingway always admired.

Of the novel's leading characters, in fact, Catherine has always attracted not only a good deal of admiration but also a fair amount of controversy. Analysts have praised her vivacity, spirit, and capacity for love, but some have also found her—especially in the book's early sections—needy, immature, overwrought, and selfless to the point of being self-neglectful. Feminists have often seen her as an eager doormat, all too willing to sacrifice her own interests and finally even her life itself on the altar of serving Frederic's pleasure, and some analysts have even argued that if her death seems almost foreordained, that impression is due less to fate or circumstances than to Hemingway's general desire to keep his male heroes free of entangling involvements with women (especially women who might compromise male autonomy by becoming mothers). Other analysts, however, have argued that Catherine is far less subservient than is sometimes assumed; they note, for instance, that when Frederic first tries to kiss her, she slaps him (Farewell 26), and they also note that even after the relationship has lasted for a long time, Catherine at one point openly objects when she feels that Frederic has made her feel like a “whore” (Farewell 152). Most significantly, defenders of Catherine argue that as the novel develops, so does she—that she is a far stronger, braver, and more self-reliant person at the end of the book than at the beginning, and that the way she faces death is particularly heroic. There seems no denying, however, that Catherine (as do many of Hemingway's women) seems almost sentimentally immature; she often resembles a little girl, even to the point of sounding mawkish. As she is straining with her labor pains, for instance, she turns and addresses Frederic: "Don't mind me, darling. Please don't cry. Don't mind me. I'm just all gone to pieces. You poor sweet. I love you so and I'll be good again. I'll be good this time" (Farewell 322). Sounding sometimes like a dotting mother and sometimes like a tearful infant, Catherine is frequently too saccharine for her own good (or the good of the novel). But at least she seems capable of true love, and the mere fact that she is a nurse (combined with her various other generous traits) demonstrates that she is capable of devotion to causes larger than her own momentary pleasures. In both respects she is a definite improvement over Lady Brett Ashley, the female lead in Hemingway's previous novel, who managed to combine a brash, hard-edged exterior; melodramatic self-pity; and shallow, hedonistic egotism in a way that makes Catherine by far the more attractive of the two.

Critical comment on Frederic Henry is often as mixed as responses to Catherine. As Catherine does, Frederic shows his concern for others (as well as a considerable degree of bravery) simply by having volunteered for military service—even if his service is mostly confined to driving an ambulance. He is well liked and well respected by his subordinates and comrades (especially Rinaldi), and despite being seriously injured, he willingly returns to the front. It is only later, when the entire Italian army is in wholesale retreat and he is falsely suspected of spying for the enemy and faces possible execution, that he decides to desert and makes his own "separate peace" (Farewell 243). Frederic, however, is admirable for other reasons as well: He is a more sensitive and thoughtful soldier than many of his mates, resisting (for instance) their tendency to bait the priest, and he eventually develops an affection and respect for Catherine that transcend a simple appreciation of her physical beauty. Nevertheless, Frederic has often been criticized for an alleged selfishness that supposedly keeps him aloof and apart, and his relationship with Catherine (especially in its early stages) has often been seen as exploitative. Some critics consider Frederic immature and self-pitying and argue that he lacks a firm core of stable identity; others, however, see him as a typical representative of his time—a figure who is alienated, unsure, rootless, lonely, and finally alone. Many readers believe, however, that he is a more mature man by the end of the novel than he was at the beginning and that he owes his maturation largely to the beneficent influence of Catherine. Certainly Frederic is a more ethically attractive figure than just about any non-Spanish male in The Sun Also Rises (with the possible exception of Jake), and by the conclusion of the book Frederic seems truly capable of a kind of genuine love that seems foreign to the thinking of almost any of the characters in the earlier novel.

Finally, no discussion of the characters of A Farewell to Arms should fail to mention Rinaldi. One of the most lively, funny, and memorable people Hemingway ever created, he almost always adds wit, good humor, vitality, and a spirit of affectionate friendship to the novel. He shows that his creator was capable of fashioning highly vivid characters (as Hemingway would later prove again when he concocted the equally memorable Pilar in For Whom the Bell Tolls), and Rinaldi also demonstrates that not all the admirable men in Hemingway's fiction are dour, buttoned-up tough guys. Rinaldi is a highly competent surgeon, but he is also full of life and laughter; he knows his stuff, but he also knows how to have a good time (even, unfortunately, to the point of contracting syphilis). Frederic's conversations with Rinaldi are far more consistently credible than his conversations with Catherine: The joking, the swearing, the boasting, the insults, even the affection seem easier to believe (and often easier to take) than all the terms such as darling, fine, good boy, lovely, or dear, brave sweet that so often make the exchanges by Frederic and Catherine seem so unbelievably sentimental. Hemingway often had trouble depicting relations between the sexes convincingly, but in describing same-sex friendships he was far more reliable, and nowhere better than in depicting the bond between Frederic and Rinaldi.

In characterization, plot, theme, and style, A Farewell to Arms struck a number of its initial readers as a definite advance over The Sun Also Rises. Later critics have sometimes disagreed, but it seems hard to deny that in its range of characters, events, tones, settings, imagery, and symbols, Farewell is the more capacious book. Simply in terms of phrasing, it has much to recommend it, for although Hemingway here (as elsewhere) shows his debt to the repetitive plainness he borrowed from Gertrude Stein (as in a brief passage full of such deadpan descriptions as “very nice,” “very fine,” “very handsomely,” and “very glad”; Farewell 5), elsewhere the diction is far more memorable and inventive. Thus at one point Frederic explains something “winefully” (Farewell 13); at another point a car is described as “looking disgraced” (Farewell 16); later still a character is advised to “chew some coffee” (Farewell 40); and, when Catherine asks Frederic early in their relationship whether he loves her, we get his classic response: “‘Yes,’ I lied” (Farewell 30). Consistently the language is intriguing and inventive (or at least far more consistently than in The Sun Also Rises), and the characters also seem more complex, both morally and psychologically. (When Catherine slaps Frederic, for instance, he is not entirely disappointed: “I felt I had a certain advantage” [Farewell 26].) At any rate, there are not only more characters in this book but more kinds of characters; a far broader sweep of humanity is represented here than was present in The Sun Also Rises, and the challenges these people face are also more serious and consequential, often involving matters of literal life and death. All in all (except in some maudlin scenes of romance), this novel seems more mature than its predecessor: The characters are more interesting, the plot is more substantial, and the style is more complex. A Farewell to Arms also represents, in many ways, a farewell to the shallowness that sometimes made The Sun Also Rises cloying and annoying.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast A Farewell to Arms with E. E. CUMMINGS's novel The Enormous Room. How do both works present World War I, especially life away from the front? How are their presentations of secondary characters similar and/or distinct? What attitudes toward the war do the two works seem to have in common and/or how do they differ in this respect? How do both works present social relations among soldiers?
2. Read A Farewell to Arms alongside Ezra Pound's poem “The River-Merchant's Wife: A Letter.” Discuss the ways developing affection is presented in both works. How does the relationship between the Chinese merchant and his wife differ from and/or resemble the relationship between Frederic and Catherine? Is one relationship more sentimental than the other?
3. How is the relationship between Frederic and Catherine similar to and/or different from the relationship between Janie and Tea Cake in ZORA NEALE HURSTON's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God? How are the couples similar and/or distinct in the reasons they are attracted to each other, in their relations with one another, and in their relations with the outside world? Discuss the similarities and/or differences between the conclusions of both relationships.
4. Trace the role played by Rinaldi in this novel. How does he contribute to the effectiveness of the book? What themes or values tend to be associated with him? Why and how is his relationship with Frederic illuminating? How does his relationship with Frederic differ from Frederic's relationship with Catherine? What finally happens to him in this book, and how is his final fate significant?

“The Snows of Kilimanjaro” (1936, 1938)

Harry is a talented American writer who has gone on safari to Africa with a wealthy woman named Helen; although he had hoped someday to produce writing worthy of the memories he carries within him, an accidental scratch has now led to a severe case of gangrene that threatens his very life. As his condition deteriorates and as he and Helen wait for a plane that may possibly carry him to safety,

Harry ponders all the topics he had hoped to write about, and he regrets that he has allowed a life of easy living to prevent him from achieving his full literary potential. When the plane finally arrives, it takes him on a flight past the beautiful snow-capped summit of Mount Kilimanjaro—or at least it seems to do so in his fantasy, for in the middle of the night Helen awakens and finds Harry dead in his cot.

In this well-known story, Hemingway deals with issues that were obviously relevant to his own life. Like Harry, Hemingway himself was a noted writer who feared that he might never achieve all that he was capable of accomplishing. Also like Harry, Hemingway himself had spent much time hunting in Africa, had fallen severely ill there, and had waited anxiously for evacuation by a plane (although Hemingway, unlike Harry, actually was rescued). Finally, Hemingway, like Harry, worried that his goal of producing serious literature might be compromised by the seductions of a wealthy, comfortable lifestyle, including the enervating effect of a domesticating marriage. The story, then, can be read partly as a cautionary self-portrait—as a warning by Hemingway to Hemingway about the risks of failing to hold himself to high literary and personal standards. Yet the work would hardly be worth reading if it were merely an autobiographical memo; its real merit derives from its lively dialogue, its generally convincing characterization, its effective evocations of setting, mood, symbolism, theme, and tone, and especially its alternation between straightforward narrative (rendered in a normal roman typeface) and italicized stream-of-consciousness flashbacks, in which Harry remembers and ponders all the topics he had hoped someday to turn into powerful prose. Part of the irony of the story, of course, is that whereas Harry is denied the chance to achieve these ambitions, Hemingway himself uses the flashbacks as crucial components of a story that is both well written and skillfully designed. Harry's fears of failure thus become grist for the mill of Hemingway's own creative achievement, so that the story is a kind of literary tour de force: It is a highly successful meditation on the risks of not succeeding.

Harry, at the beginning of the story, is not an especially attractive character. He picks petty quarrels with Helen, becomes sarcastic when she offers help, and seems determined to blame her for his own lack of accomplishment. Such frustrated irritability and irresponsibility are, however, exactly what one might credibly expect of such a personality in such circumstances, and by the end of the story he seems to have mellowed and matured, at least to some degree. Spiritually and psychologically, then, he seems less sick by the conclusion of the tale than he was at the beginning; although he continues to decay physically, he recovers some lost moral ground when he shows a growing ability to appreciate Helen, treat her with some kindness, and cease blaming her for his own shortcomings and mistaken choices. He never completely changes or shows her any genuinely deep affection, but such a transformation not only would have been inconsistent with his hard-nosed personality but would also have been mawkishly sentimental. The story already flirts dangerously enough with sentimentality as it is, especially in some of the dialogue between Harry and Helen in the second half of the tale, and a syrupy reconciliation between the couple would only have ruined the work. Instead, Hemingway chooses a surprise ending resembling the conclusion of Ambrose Bierce's famous short story "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge": Just when we think that the protagonist may have miraculously cheated death, we are brought up short, presented with a corpse. Although the endings of both stories have sometimes been criticized as contrived (one critic called Hemingway's conclusion "a slick magazine exit" [see Smith 358]), in both cases the authors subtly prepare us for the "surprise," thus adding an extra level of craftsmanship to their works. In Hemingway's story this kind of craft is all the more important, because it helps to demonstrate once more the distinction between Hemingway the skilled author and Harry the frustrated writer.

Much commentary about "The Snows of Kilimanjaro" has centered on the italicized epigraph with which the story opens, which describes Mount Kilimanjaro itself and reports that the mountain's western summit is known as “the House of God.” Even more intriguingly, the epigraph notes that close to that summit “there is a dried and frozen carcass of a leopard. No one has explained what the leopard was seeking at that altitude” (Complete 39). Clearly Hemingway is inviting his readers to connect the epigraph and the story, but the nature of that connection has been a matter of dispute. Some critics, for instance, have seen the leopard as a symbol of Harry’s materialistic desire to live a “high life” of luxurious comfort and privilege—a desire that ultimately leaves him stranded, desiccated, and dead. Other commentators, in contrast, have more plausibly seen the leopard as a symbol of lofty aspiration—of the desire to transcend mundane limits. Interpreted in this way, the leopard can be viewed as symbolizing Harry’s own artistic ambitions, although there is disagreement about whether or not the symbolism is ironic. Is Harry (in other words) comparable to the leopard in having finally attained some type of transcendence? Or does Harry contrast with the leopard because he never achieves the kind of hard-won prominence and immortality the leopard finally attains? Each position has its advocates, and the debate has led some analysts to argue that Hemingway should be faulted for leaving the final significance of his symbols unclear. Most readers, however, seem satisfied with the story as written—a story that resembles “The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber” not only in its African setting but also in its focus on a character who lives most intensely right before he dies.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Harry in Hemingway’s story with the title character of EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON’s poem “Richard Cory.” In what ways does each man seem to have many material advantages and thus many reasons to feel satisfied with his life? Why does each man seem, however, not to be satisfied? In which work is the reason for dissatisfaction made more clear? How does each man cope with his dissatisfaction? Which character is more sympathetic?
2. Read this story alongside Gertrude Stein’s book The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas. How do the two works depict the roles, responsibilities, and aspirations of the artist? How does each writer use his or her work to comment on himself or herself? How does each writer depict his or her relationship with his or her closest companion?
3. Compare and contrast this story with Hemingway’s “The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber.” Discuss the works in terms of setting, characterization, theme, and technique. How are the relationships between the two married couples similar and/or different? In what ways do social class and economic status play important roles in both works? Which story has the happier ending? Which of the two works strikes you as the more interesting? Explain your response.
4. The previous discussion mentions the story’s “generally convincing characterization . . . [and] its effective evocations of setting, mood, symbolism, theme, and tone.” Try to find one passage in the story that especially illustrates all of these aspects of the work’s effectiveness, and then discuss that passage in detail.

“The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber” (1938)

Francis Macomber and his wife, Margot, are wealthy Americans in a troubled marriage who are on safari in Africa, where their guide is a British professional hunter named Robert Wilson. When the inexperienced Macomber flees after being confronted by a lion he has wounded, the sarcastic Margot treats her husband with contempt; she even makes little effort to disguise the fact that she has slept with Wilson. The next day, after Macomber demonstrates surprising courage while hunting, he seems to be a new and much more self-confident man, but as he is about to be attacked by a wild buffalo he has been pursuing, he dies when Margot fires on the animal (even though Wilson later insinuates that she was really aiming at Macomber himself).

This is one of Hemingway’s most famous and most controversial stories. Most of the controversy surrounds the final scene, in which a shot from Margot's rifle strikes Macomber in the back of the head just as he is being charged by the wild buffalo. Did Margot, as Wilson suggests, intentionally kill her husband because she feared his new-found courage and self-confidence and was worried that he might divorce her? Or did she genuinely seek to save her husband's life by taking aim at the buffalo, killing Macomber merely by a horrific accident? Opinion concerning these questions has long been divided, although commentators now most often argue that Margot did indeed intend to save her husband. The narrator, after all, explicitly states that "Mrs. Macomber, in the car, had shot at the buffalo" (Complete 28), and analysts increasingly have been inclined to accept this statement at face value. Wilson (these interpreters argue) is an unreliable commentator whose assessment of Margot's actions is biased not only by his own cynicism but also by his awareness that if Margot reported him to the authorities for chasing buffalo from a moving car, he could lose his license and thus his career. From this perspective, then, his closing attacks on Margot are meant to intimidate her into silence about his own professional misconduct, and in fact some critics have even suggested that Wilson intentionally engineers Macomber's death—that he deliberately creates the conditions that make it likely that Macomber will be shot by his wife.

Hemingway, however, leaves the ending of the story effectively ambiguous. Margot never denies Wilson's charges; instead, she merely repeats the phrase "Stop it" again and again, as if she cannot bear to hear his words and cannot think of a more effective answer. Nor does the narrator himself intervene to make a stronger case for Margot; instead, Wilson literally has the last word, and as the story closes, Margot seems desperately defenseless. Perhaps she feels guilty, not for having intentionally killed Macomber but for having betrayed him by sleeping with Wilson, or perhaps she is momentarily too overcome with shock at his death to muster an effective refutation of Wilson's charges. Perhaps she senses that on some subconscious level she did in fact seek or desire her husband's death, so that even if she did not deliberately aim her gun at him, she did hope to be rid of him.

In other words, her conscience may be deeply troubled even though she may be technically innocent of any crime. Hemingway, in short, has crafted a masterfully complex conclusion to an exceptionally complicated tale. Instead of providing clear answers and a pat ending, he leaves us with nagging questions about the moral and psychological complexity of all three major characters.

Macomber himself, for instance, certainly seems increasingly complex (and thus increasingly interesting) as the story proceeds. Although he is relatively young, is physically fit, is an accomplished athlete, and is a highly skilled fisherman, as the story opens he has "just shown himself, very publicly, to be a coward" (Complete 6). It might be easy, then, to sympathize with the disdain that Margot (and, to a lesser extent, Wilson) adopts toward Macomber, but, as the story proceeds, Wilson feels growing sympathy and respect for the novice hunter, not only because Macomber seems genuinely remorseful for fleeing from the lion but also because Wilson sees him as a victim of his bitchy, unforgiving, and self-centered wife. Ironically, the more Margot throws herself at Wilson, the less respect he seems to feel for her. In addition, the more she condemns Macomber, the easier it is for all readers to feel sympathy for him. This is especially the case when we learn that even the Africans have a proverb "that says a brave man is always frightened three times by a lion; when he first sees his track, when he first hears him roar and when he first confronts him" (Complete 11). Macomber's fear of the lion, then, hardly seems inexplicable (especially since this is his first lion hunt). Meanwhile, his willingness to go out the next day in pursuit of buffalo also helps to rehabilitate him not only in Wilson's eyes but also in the eyes of most readers. His courage in facing and killing three wild buffalo (including shooting the biggest one entirely on his own) further enhances Wilson's (and the reader's) respect for him. Most important, however, that act helps renew Macomber's respect for himself. His abrupt and surprising death, then, occurs at the most ironic of all possible moments: Macomber dies just when he is feeling most alive—just when he is most looking forward to the future. If at the beginning of the story he seemed a weak cuckold, by the end of the tale he has evolved into a far more intriguing character. How might he have dealt with Margot and her infidelity in light of his new-found self-regard? Hemingway leaves the answer to that question tantalizingly unclear. Macomber's death is one of the most ironic in American literature, since he dies when he feels most vital.

Margot herself is also a fascinating character, who becomes even more complicated as the tale proceeds. Sometimes she seems weak; sometimes she seems hard-hearted and passive-aggressive. Sometimes she seems to feel sorry for her husband; sometimes she treats him with contempt. At times she seems sexually promiscuous in an almost smugly taunting way, while at other times she wins sympathy as an aging beauty trapped in a fundamentally unsatisfying marriage in which she lacks any real autonomy. A different, lesser kind of writer might have made Margot an object of sustained sarcasm and might have depicted Macomber himself with a total lack of compassion; Hemingway, instead, implies the complexity of each character and the inevitable complications of their relationship. He manages to take their complexities and, rather than letting them seem a bundle of inconsistent contradictions, he makes rounded, credible characters from them. By the end of the tale, neither the husband nor the wife seems a shallow caricature, and the same is also true of Wilson. Although often he has been seen as a kind of spokesman for Hemingway himself (particularly in his stoic attitudes toward death; in his cool, businesslike approach to hunting; in his respect for Macomber's eventual courage; and in his disdain for Margot's bitchiness), Wilson has also increasingly been seen as a morally unreliable judge of others' characters and even (by some) as a scheming hypocrite. He is willing to bed a married woman while viewing her as a kind of slut, and he prides himself on his professionalism while being willing to break professional rules. Yet he also shows himself capable of giving Macomber his due and of discerning the intricacies of the Macomber marriage. In short, all three major characters are convincingly complicated personalities, and they are enmeshed in a plot that is itself so complex that one's immediate impulse, upon finishing the story, is to read it again.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Hemingway's story with Nella Larsen's novel titled Passing. In particular, discuss the ways both works describe complex marriages; the ways they present sudden, unexpected deaths; and the ways they conclude with compelling moral and psychological ambiguities. What is the evidence for and against the "guilt" of the two surviving women? What are their own attitudes toward the deaths they witness?
2. Discuss the depiction of gender roles in this story and in JACK LONDON's novel The Sea-Wolf. In what ways is Humphrey Van Weyden, in that novel, similar to and/or different from Francis Macomber? How do both characters evolve in similar ways? In what ways is Margot in Hemingway's story similar to and/or different from Maude Brewster in The Sea-Wolf? How does Wilson in Hemingway's tale resemble and/or differ from Wolf Larsen in London's novel?
3. Discuss the issue of criminal and moral guilt in this story and in THEODORE DREISER's novel An American Tragedy. How does the situation of Francis and Margot Macomber parallel the situation of Clyde Griffith and Roberta Alden? What differences exist between their circumstances? Discuss the intentions of Clyde and Margot, and discuss the role of accident in both works.
4. How and why is the African setting effective in this story? Why do you think Hemingway chose to place his characters in such a "primitive" environment, and why did he make one of the major antagonists in the story an animal rather than another human? In what ways does this story deal with "primal" emotions and ancient, almost primeval human passions and concerns?

For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940)

Robert Jordan, a young American professor who has returned to Spain during its civil war to support the side of the Republicans against the fascists, has been assigned to work with local partisans to blow up a bridge that will be crucial in a coming offensive. While living in the remote mountains with a group of republican peasants (headed by the unreliable Pablo and his feisty, courageous wife, Pilar), Jordan falls in love with a beautiful young woman named Maria, who has recently been gang-raped by the fascists. After much preparation, many delays, and numerous dangers, Jordan succeeds in destroying the bridge, but he dies in the fighting that immediately follows.

Just as Hemingway set A Farewell to Arms in the midst of World War I, so he set For Whom the Bell Tolls in the midst of the civil war in Spain, which immediately preceded World War II and which, as many people foresaw, was really the opening salvo of that later conflict. The Spanish civil war was not only the first major armed struggle between fascist and anti-fascist forces, but it also gave the major Fascist powers (such as Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy) the opportunity to aid their allies while also testing new methods of warfare, including heavy reliance on airpower and the wholesale bombing of civilian targets. For numerous people in Hemingway's generation, defeating the fascists in Spain was considered crucial to preventing the spread of fascism elsewhere, but, even before Hemingway's novel was published, the Spanish Republicans had been crushed and the Second World War (which had been widely feared but just as widely expected) had already begun. Within a year the United States itself would enter the fight, after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. Hemingway's novel, then, was both an elegy for Spain and a call to future arms: It celebrated a Spanish cause that had already been defeated, but it was also meant to inspire courage and resolve on behalf of the even larger struggle now under way.

Responses to Hemingway's newest novel varied right from the start. Most critics immediately praised the new book; they saw it as a return to its author's earlier strength after he had produced a number of books in the 1930s widely regarded as disappointments. For Whom the Bell Tolls was greeted by many reviewers as proof that Hemingway could still write major narratives, and indeed some reviewers considered this work his best novel so far. Most reviewers praised it for its length, its complexity, its vivid characters, its greater variety of style, its moral seriousness, its political relevance, and its skillful blending of exciting physical action and suspense with a touching story of genuine love. The book was an immediate best seller, and film rights for a major Hollywood movie were quickly purchased. Hemingway had thus produced a novel that pleased not only most professional commentators but also the public at large. Nevertheless, critics did (of course) disagree on some points, and the disagreement continues to this day. Some analysts, for instance, found the novel too openly political and propagandistic; they believed that Hemingway wrote too much as a partisan of a particular cause, and they therefore argued that the characters were often too abstract, too thin, and too wooden. Other critics, in contrast, argued that the book was not political enough; they thought that Hemingway had failed to clarify the social ideas and ideals that motivated the fighting he described. Instead (these critics contended) he tended to focus too much on individual personalities, leaving obscure the larger causes at stake. Still other reviewers, however, praised Hemingway for his objectivity—especially for his ability to suggest that atrocities had been committed by both sides and his willingness to show that even the republican cause, with which he obviously sympathized, was not without its flaws, especially because of the assistance it received from Soviet Stalinists. For many of the book's initial reviewers, then, the book was politically controversial: Some considered it too stridently political, some felt that its politics were fuzzy and indistinct, while others felt that Hemingway had struck a delicate balance, producing a work of enormous political relevance while not sacrificing his ability to depict credible characters.

Characterization, in fact, was another point of controversy among the earliest reviewers of the book. Many readers (indeed, probably most) thought that Hemingway had managed to present a beautiful and moving account of the rapidly developing love (and frequent lovemaking) between

Robert Jordan and Maria, the Spanish peasant. Their romantic involvement, which becomes physical almost immediately and which develops forcefully over the course of a mere three days, struck many readers as charming, convincing, lyrical, honest, and profound. Other reviewers, however, considered the affair too abrupt, too conventional, too sentimental, and too much a reflection of an almost adolescent male fantasy in which a beautiful woman immediately offers her sexual favors. Jordan does not even need to court Maria; instead, she quickly presents herself to him, climbing at once into his sleeping bag for a night of passionate lovemaking. One Spanish reviewer, Arturo Barea, found Maria's behavior literally incredible; he argued that no self-respecting Spanish woman of Maria's era, class, and circumstances would behave in this way and expect to keep her reputation. He also argued that Jordan's constant tendency to call Maria his "rabbit," as a term of tender affection, would have been laughable to most Spaniards, since that term in Spain is a vulgar reference to a woman's genitals. Hemingway's slip, in this respect and many others, reflected (according to Barea, who knew Hemingway personally) his relatively shallow knowledge of Spanish society, customs, and phrasing. Barea asserted, for instance, that the language attributed to the Spanish characters is often stilted and pompous, and that Hemingway, in attempting to convey the true flavor of Spanish speech, had offered only incredible distortions (see Meyer 350–361). On the other hand, most English-speaking reviewers found the diction of Hemingway's Spaniards (particularly their obscenities) vivid and convincing, and the book does in fact remain one of his most popular in Spanish-speaking countries. If Hemingway's rendering of Spanish dialect is indeed inaccurate, most readers seem untroubled by that fact, and if the term rabbit seems objectionable to any English-speaking readers, it is probably because the word sometimes, ironically, gives the love scenes a tone that is occasionally too sugary. The problem, then, is not vulgarity but sentimentality.

Arturo Barea, the Spanish commentator who objected to Hemingway's depiction of Maria, also criticized the ways he describes Pablo and Pilar.

Spanish peasants from the mountains would never (Barea alleged) accept leadership from a couple as foreign to their parochial culture as Pablo and Pilar—especially not from Pilar herself, who is a Gypsy. For most readers, however, Pilar is one of the most memorable and appealing characters in this book; like Ma Joad in John Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath, she is vigorous, earthy, opinionated, and full of spirit, and more than one early reviewer compared her to Shakespeare's Falstaff both in her size and in her gregarious self-assurance. Occasionally a reviewer objected that Pilar was overdone and overexposed, but for most readers she remains one of the best aspects of the book, contributing a vitality it might otherwise lack. As were a number of the other "secondary" characters (especially El Sordo and Anselmo), Pilar was praised for giving the novel a range and depth often missing from some of Hemingway's earlier fiction, and although some reviewers complained about the novel's allegedly excessive length, most praised it for its substantial exploration of a multitude of interesting characters facing a host of daunting moral, physical, and psychological challenges. Robert Jordan struck many reviewers as a more thoughtful, intelligent, and reflective hero than many earlier Hemingway protagonists, and the novel in which he is the central character was greeted as mature and full of meaning—a story in which much more is at stake than who beds whom, who drinks what, who slugs whom, how many fish are caught, how many bulls are killed, the skill one shows in the techniques of fishing, or the courage one shows in fighting bulls.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Hemingway's depiction of Spain with THORNTON WILDER's depiction of Peru in The Bridge of San Luis Rey. What techniques does each writer use to try to make his presentation of a foreign culture seem authentic? How do the works differ and/or resemble one another in their styles of language and in the kinds of characters they present? Discuss the symbolic functions of the bridges in both works.
2. How are the attitudes toward war in this novel similar to and/or different from the attitudes toward war in Hemingway's A Farewell to Arms? What factors made World War I seem, in the minds of many of Hemingway's contemporaries, a different kind of conflict from the struggle against fascism? How are the hero and heroine in For Whom the Bell Tolls similar to and/or different from the hero and heroine in A Farewell to Arms? How do the plots of the two books—especially their conclusions—compare and contrast?

3. Ambrose Bierce's story "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge" also deals with a man's effort to destroy a bridge during wartime. How is Bierce's protagonist similar to and/or different from Robert Jordan? What differences are there between the causes the two men represent? What is the nature of each man's relationship with the woman he loves? Why is it significant that Jordan acts as a member of a group whereas Bierce's protagonist acts as an individual? What is the implied attitude of each author toward his protagonist?
4. Discuss the characterization of Pilar. What does she contribute to the book? How (if at all) does she detract from its success? How does the presentation of this character reflect the strengths (and perhaps also the flaws) of Hemingway's general method in this novel? Compare and contrast Pilar with Maria. Why does Robert Jordan admire them both? What do they have in common despite their obvious differences?

The Old Man and the Sea* (1952)

Santiago is an old Cuban fisherman who has gone almost three months without making a significant catch—a fact that causes many of his fellow villagers to consider him pitiful, laughable, or unlucky, and a fact that also causes the parents of Manolin, a boy who assists and adores the old man, to put their son to work on another boat. One day, however, Santiago's bait is taken by a huge marlin; although the old man's struggle with the fish endures for two days, he finally succeeds in outlasting the creature and claiming his prize. Unfortunately, however, as the old man heads back to port on the third day with his enormous catch, the marlin is attacked and almost entirely devoured by sharks. Nevertheless, at the end of the tale Santiago feels enormously tired but not entirely defeated.

When it was published in 1952, this short novel (or novella) helped restore Hemingway's faltering reputation. In the immediately preceding years, many critics had begun to feel (perhaps along with Hemingway himself) that his best days as an author were behind him, but The Old Man and the Sea was greeted with enormous critical and popular acclaim. WILLIAM FAULKNER considered it Hemingway's best book, and it was certainly not a coincidence that Hemingway was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature just two years after this novel was published. In the years since its first printing, the reputation of the novel has declined somewhat, but the work remains one of its author's most widely read, widely taught, and best-loved books, partly because it deals with issues of such timeless concern and partly because it focuses on a central character who seems to be a kind of modern Everyman. Practically all readers can identify with Santiago's extended misfortune, his growing isolation, and his sense of being overtaken and undermined by age, while most readers would clearly also like to respond to such challenges with the kind of courage, dignity, and determination that Santiago displays. Unlike the hedonism, disillusionment, and nihilism so tiresomely emphasized (if accurately reported) in such earlier works as The Sun Also Rises, the values articulated and implied by The Old Man and the Sea are life affirming and even inspiring, and the issues the later book deals with seem of broad existential relevance. In The Sun Also Rises Hemingway deals with characters who are shallow and rather spoiled; in The Old Man and the Sea he presents a protagonist who might symbolize anyone confronting the kinds of difficult challenges common to most human lives.

Certainly Santiago, on one level, symbolizes the aging Hemingway himself, and the old fisherman's struggle to tame and subdue the powerful marlin is almost an allegory of Hemingway's own struggle to produce a major, enduring piece of writing.

From this perspective, then, the voracious, scavenging sharks represent the hordes of literary critics who are always willing to descend on a dedicated author's work and tear it to pieces. If this were the story's only significance, however, the book would not only be of limited relevance but also run the risk of being highly sentimental and self-pitying. Admittedly, even when it is viewed as the story of an old man worshipped by a boy and bested by nature, the tale does sometimes veer in the direction of maudlin melodrama (especially when the old fisherman is compared, a bit too heavy-handedly, to the suffering, crucified Christ), and some major critics have in fact found the story far too mawkish. Generally, however, Hemingway guards against this danger through a number of mostly successful means. For one thing, Santiago rarely really thinks of himself as a victim; he never asks for pity, and he usually deflects it when it is offered. He stoically accepts his fate (whatever that fate may ultimately prove to be), and in his struggle with the marlin (and even more in his angry, violent combat with the sharks), he shows a tough pugnacity that allows him to preserve his own respect while winning the respect of the reader. At the same time, he evinces a kind of humility that prevents him from seeming excessively "macho": He is keenly aware of his own flaws, mistakes, and foibles. He is, in short, a fairly complex character beneath a veneer of primitive simplicity, and the fact that the book's only real love interest is the taciturn love between the old man and the boy means that the novel lacks the often syrupy romance that sometimes makes some other Hemingway novels too sugary. There are no "rabbits" or "darlings" or even "bitches" in this book to mar its understated tone; instead, Hemingway keeps his focus squarely on one person's struggle to live, succeed, and endure. It is hard to imagine a reader who could not empathize with such desires on one level or another.

The style of this book, like the style of Hemingway's writings in general, is simple, clear, and straightforward, but, if anything, the phrasing here seems even more clean and classic than before. Gone is the sophisticated, cynical wit often employed by the pretentious characters of The Sun Also Rises; gone, too, is all the babyish love talk of A Farewell to Arms. Also gone are the vivid but sometimes quaint attempts of For Whom the Bell Tolls to capture Spanish speech in English diction (all those thees and thous, not to mention the unfortunate rabbits). Instead, as the very title of The Old Man and the Sea suggests, the emphasis in this book is on universal, elemental facts presented in plain, almost pristine language. Hemingway never lets us forget that the speakers are Cuban (he occasionally uses foreign terms and foreign sentence structure), but the language rarely sounds abnormally remote from everyday English speech. Nor does it seem afflicted or affected by the repetitive, Gertrude Steinian style that sometimes mars some of Hemingway's early works (with all those phrases such as "very nice" and "very good" and "very fine" that quickly become so tediously predictable). In this book, Hemingway lets his words do whatever they need to do in any particular instance; he seems less interested than before in making the style conform to preconceived patterns. Stylistically, a reader can never be quite sure what may be coming next, and so, simply in terms of phrasing, the book is rarely monotonous.

In terms of plot, as well, the book sustains interest. The basic story—an old man struggles with a giant fish far out at sea—is inherently suspenseful: Will the fisherman succeed? Will the fish escape? Might the fisherman die? Indeed, our focus is so much on Santiago's initial battle with the marlin that it does not occur to us that he might win that battle but lose the war—that the giant fish, once caught, might itself be assailed by sharks. The abrupt arrival of these predators is a surprise (even though, of course, it should not be), and then the suspense begins all over again: Will the sharks entirely consume the marlin? Will Santiago himself fall victim to the sharks? How will Santiago finally react if the sharks do succeed in stealing the marlin that means so much to him? Thus, although the plot of the book is simple, one's interest rarely lags, and although most people cannot (of course) relate in any personal way to the struggles of a deep-sea fisherman, most humans can easily identify in general terms with the kinds of hopes, disappointments, and challenges Santiago faces and with the spirit he tries to sustain.

4. Read In Our Time as a book that foreshadows later aspects of Hemingway's career in its style, themes, techniques, and characterization. How does this early work anticipate one or more of his later writings in one or more of these ways? How is Nick Adams a precursor of later Hemingway figures? How are relations between male friends, or relations between males and females, or relations between the young and their elders depicted in In Our Time in ways that shed light on Hemingway's later works? How is the final tone of In Our Time similar to and/or different from the final tone of The Old Man and the Sea?
5. Hemingway's stories and novels have often been turned into films. Choose one of the filmed versions of one of his works, and compare and contrast the film with the original text. How does the film depart from the text? Are the departures effective? Why may such departures have seemed necessary to the screenwriter or director? What are the strengths and weaknesses of the film when it is compared with the original text?
6. Choose one of Hemingway's lesser-known and less well-regarded novels (such as Across the River and Into the Trees, Islands in the Stream, or The Garden of Eden) and discuss the effectiveness of the work. Why is the book less respected than other works by Hemingway? In what ways is it successful or unsuccessful? How does it resemble and/or differ from his other writings?
7. Choose one of Hemingway's novels, and then select several of his short stories written at roughly the same time. What similarities and/or differences do you see between the longer work and the shorter ones? What do they have in common in terms of themes, plot, characterization, style, structure, or techniques?
8. Choose one relatively brief passage from a work by Hemingway—approximately a page in length—and analyze that passage in as much detail as possible. For example, discuss the denotations and connotations of particular words, the length and structure of particular sentences, the implications of particular images, or the effectiveness of the characterization and dialogue. How does the chosen passage contribute to the work as a whole? How is it typical of the entire work? How does it look back at, or forward to, other portions of the larger text?
9. Discuss the ways women are presented in at least three different works by Hemingway. What similarities and/or differences do you see in the way female characters are depicted? What traits do various women characters seem to symbolize or represent? Does Hemingway present women effectively and convincingly? What generalizations, if any, can you make about the ways he depicts women?
10. Read a biography of Hemingway, and then discuss the ways in which his own experiences, ideas, and personality are reflected in one of his works. Is knowledge of Hemingway's life important to a proper understanding and interpretation of the work you selected? If so, why? If not, why not?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Hemingway, Ernest. The Complete Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway: The Finca Vigía Edition. New York: Scribner, 1987.
- . A Farewell to Arms. New York: Scribner, 1929.
- . For Whom the Bell Tolls. New York: Scribner, 1940.
- . In Our Time. New York: Scribner, 1958.
- . The Old Man and the Sea. New York: Scribner, 1952.
- . The Sun Also Rises. New York: Scribner, 1954.
- The Hemingway Resource Center. Available online. URL: <http://www.lostgeneration.com>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- The Hemingway Society. Available online. URL: <http://www.hemingwaysociety.org/#welcome.asp>. Accessed April 7, 2009.

- Hoffman, Frederick J. "Ernest Hemingway." In Sixteen Modern American Authors: A Survey of Research and Criticism, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 367–416. New York: Norton, 1973.
- Meyer, Jeffrey. Hemingway: The Critical Heritage. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1982.
- Reynolds, Michael S., ed. Critical Essays on Ernest Hemingway's In Our Time. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1983.
- Sandison, David. Ernest Hemingway: An Illustrated Biography. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 1999.
- Smith, Paul. A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989.
- Stark, Bruce. "Ernest Hemingway." In Sixteen Modern American Authors. Vol. 2, A Survey of Research and Criticism since 1972, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 404–479. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.
- Tyler, Lisa. Student Companion to Ernest Hemingway. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- Wagner, Linda W. Ernest Hemingway: Six Decades of Criticism. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1987.

Robert C. Evans

LANGSTON HUGHES (1902–1967)

[M]y best poems were all written when I felt the worst. When I was happy, I didn't write anything.

(The Big Sea)

Langston Hughes burst upon the American literary scene in the 1920s with prodigious force. He was quickly embraced as one of the most talented black writers of his day, and his early poetry, in particular, was accorded immense and widespread respect. Although he never (in the eyes of some critics) lived up to the enormous potential of his youth, he is still considered one of the most important and most influential of all African-American authors.

James Langston Hughes was born on February 1, 1902, in Joplin, Missouri, the son of James Nathaniel Hughes and Carrie Mercer Langston, who had married in 1899. Almost immediately the boy was called Langston, and almost immediately, too, his father absented himself from the life of his wife and son, moving to Mexico because of a job and deciding to stay there to escape the pressures of racial discrimination in the United States. Relations between young Langston and his own mother were often strained, and for much of his youth he lived with Mary Sampson Patterson Leary Langston, his grandmother, while Carrie sought employment in various locations. Although Langston, his mother, and his grandmother traveled to Mexico to meet Langston's father in 1907, no reunion of the family resulted from the visit, and Langston grew up in various cities in the United States, including Lawrence, Topeka, and Kansas City, Kansas, as well as Cleveland, Ohio, and Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Most of the first decade or so of his life, however, was spent in Lawrence with his grandmother, but then, in 1915, after her death, he moved to Lincoln, Illinois, to live with his now-divorced mother and her new husband, Homer Clark, whose son (Gwyn "Kit" Clark) became Langston's new stepbrother. Already at this early age Langston was showing definite literary talent and was chosen class poet by his fellow eighth graders.

After moving to Cleveland in 1916 and beginning high school there, Hughes continued to develop his interest in literature; he read the writings of a variety of American poets and published his own verse in the school magazine. By 1918 his mother had separated from her husband and moved to Chicago, where Hughes visited her that summer, but he made a more important (and more distressing) trip in 1919 when he visited his father in Mexico, where conflicts, especially concerning Langston's ambitions to become a professional writer, soon emerged. Hughes's father, who had an important post with a power company, believed that his son should set his sights on a more practical and profitable goal than being a poet; tensions between the father and son became so severe that Langston actually became physically ill and had to be hospitalized. Nevertheless, on returning to Cleveland, Hughes received an allowance from his father and continued to succeed at school. When he graduated in 1920, he had already begun to write some of his most notable poems (such as "When Sue Wears Red”), and while making a second visit to his father in 1921 he composed one of the lyrics for which he is still best known (“The Negro Speaks of Rivers”), which was soon published in the Crisis, one of the most prominent African-American journals. Hughes’s father, however, wanted his son to become an engineer, not a poet, and so the boy’s second visit to Mexico was not much happier than the first.

Despite these tensions between father and son, the elder Hughes did agree to pay for his son’s education for one year at Columbia University in New York City. The move to New York could not have been more auspicious for Langston, since the mid-1920s became the years of the so-called Harlem Renaissance, that great outpouring of literary, musical, and artistic talent by blacks who had been flocking to New York for some time. Although financial pressures played a part in Hughes’s decision to withdraw from Columbia in 1922, in 1923 he was living, working, and writing in Harlem, all the while making contacts with other significant writers and earning a growing reputation for his own works. His time in Harlem was interrupted, however, by several expeditions abroad as a sailor on merchant ships, including trips to West Africa in 1923 and to Europe (including Paris) in 1924. These journeys and sojourns—which were full of adventure and new and exciting experiences of all sorts—helped contribute to the tone and substance of Hughes’s increasingly unconventional verse, which was also influenced by the jazz and blues music so popular during this time. After returning to the United States, he briefly took up residence in Washington, D.C., where he worked in various low-paying jobs, including as a busboy. Nevertheless, he was still in contact with various writers and intellectuals, and when he heard that the famous poet Vachel Lindsay would be reading his work in Washington, Hughes went to the hotel where Lindsay was staying, presented three of his own poems to the great man in the hotel dining room, and later had the pleasure of learning that Lindsay had read and praised the poems in public, thus winning them and their author the attention of the press. (Ironically, Hughes himself could not attend the reading because of his race.)

In 1925, too, Hughes won a literary prize offered by the magazine Opportunity, and his work was also published in a number of significant venues. His contacts with other black authors and intellectuals were also broadening, and, with the support of a wealthy white patroness (Amy Spingarn), he was able to enroll at all-black Lincoln University in Pennsylvania in 1926. The most important event of his life during that year, however, was the publication of his first collection of poems, The Weary Blues, which was issued by the distinguished publisher Alfred A. Knopf. The poems of that collection shocked many readers (including many black readers), not only because of their substance (especially their focus on what some considered the less savory aspects of black urban life) but also because of their style (which was often colloquial, jazzy, and vulgar in a variety of senses of that word). Hughes vigorously defended his work from the attacks it provoked, but the poems also received widespread praise—so much, in fact, that in 1927 he published another book of verse (Fine Clothes to the Jew), which created even more controversy. By now Hughes was recognized as one of the most important African-American writers of his day, and by this time he had also won the patronage of yet another patroness—a rich, eccentric white woman (Charlotte Osgood Mason) who took a strong interest in black culture and in supporting (and sometimes trying to control) the careers of young black artists. Hughes welcomed Mason’s support but eventually chafed at the strings to which it was attached.

By 1929 Hughes had graduated from Lincoln University and had finished a novel titled Not without Laughter, but these two strokes of personal good fortune were offset by the onset of the Great Depression, the enormous economic downturn that overtook the country in the fall of that year and created gloom and despair throughout the 1930s. Meanwhile, Hughes’s personal fortunes took a downturn of their own when he quarreled with Mason in 1930 and when he also, that year, entered into conflict with a fellow black writer, ZORA NEALE HURSTON, with whom he had been cowriting a play. Nevertheless, on the plus side, 1930 saw the publication of Not without Laughter as well as Hughes's selection as a recipient of an award from the Harmon Foundation, an organization established to encourage the work of black authors. In 1931 he was also awarded a travel grant from the Rosenwald Foundation; this allowed him to tour the southern states, where he gave poetry readings and (unfortunately) came face to face with blatant examples of racial discrimination and injustice. By this time his politics (like those of many American intellectuals during the Great Depression) had become distinctly left-wing, and even somewhat Marxist; in 1932 he even traveled to the Soviet Union to participate in a planned motion picture, and by the end of that same year he published an extremely controversial poem titled "Goodbye Christ" in a black Marxist journal. The poem sparked outrage among many readers for many years, and Hughes would never quite escape the controversy it inspired. Also appearing in 1932 was a book of children's verse titled The Dream Keeper as well as Scottsboro Limited: Four Poems and a Play.

For Hughes, life in the 1930s was characterized by travel. Returning from Russia, he passed through Soviet Asia and also visited Japan, Korea, China, Hawaii, and California, settling for a time (with the support of another patron) in 1933 in the beautiful town of Carmel-by-the-Sea. He had to flee that community in 1934, however, because of threats arising from his reputation as a communist, but 1934 was also the year of another literary triumph—the publication of a well-reviewed collection of stories titled The Ways of White Folks. Meanwhile, further travel took Hughes to Mexico (to settle the estate of his now-dead father), back to California in 1935 (where further protests dogged him), then to Ohio to visit his mother, and then to New York to witness the production of a play of his titled Mulatto. He was also at work on other plays during this time, including Little Ham, When the Jack Hollers (written in collaboration with Arna Bontemps), and Angelo Herndon Jones (which in 1936 won a contest sponsored by New Theatre magazine). Hughes's commitment to drama was also affirmed by the staging, in 1937, of his plays Drums of Haiti and Joy to My Soul and by his decision to establish, that year, the Harlem Suitcase Theater, which put on his newest play (Don't You Want to Be Free?) in 1938. He wrote further dramatic works (including The Organizer, Young Man of Harlem, and Front Porch) that year, in addition to publishing a collection of left-wing poetry titled A New Song. By 1939 he was at work on two different film scripts in California (God Sends Sunday and Way Down South), and 1940 saw the publication of his important autobiographical novel, The Big Sea. After a bout of serious ill health in 1941, he was soon back at work. He continued to show a strong interest in theater, founding the Skyloft Players in Chicago in 1941, working on a musical called The Sun Do Move, and even writing radio scripts in 1942 to support the American cause in World War II. Shakespeare in Harlem, a new book of poems, appeared that year, but a significant new development for Hughes began in 1943, when, in a series of newspaper columns he had begun publishing earlier for the Chicago Defender, he introduced the character of Jesse B. Semple, whose wry commentaries on the lives of blacks in the United States would eventually make him one of Hughes's most popular creations.

Merely to list the works of Hughes's final two decades shows how productive he remained throughout his life. His collections of poetry included Jim Crow's Last Stand (1943), Fields of Wonder (1947), One-Way Ticket (1949), Montage of a Dream Deferred (1951), Selected Poems of Langston Hughes (1959), Ask Your Mama (1961), and The Panther and the Lash (1967). His works based on the Jesse B. Semple character included Simple Speaks His Mind (1949), Simple Takes a Wife (1953), Simple Stakes a Claim (1957), The Best of Simple (1961), and Simple's Uncle Sam (1965). Other prose works included Laughing to Keep from Crying (1952), I Wonder as I Wander (1956), Tambourines to Glory (1958), and Something in Common and Other Stories (1963). Hughes produced eight books for children in his final two decades, edited (or coedited) eight anthologies, authored (with Milton Meltzer) A Pictorial History of the Negro in America (1956), and worked on numerous plays. He was, in short, a comprehensive man of letters, and although he tends to be best remembered for the work he did in the 1920s and 1930s, during the course of his career he produced enough work to keep critics busy for decades. By the time he died (after undergoing surgery, on May 22, 1967) he had become one of the most visible and successful African-American authors of the 20th century. He had left a rich legacy in words and deeds and had earned his stature as one of the most respected black writers of his time.

“The Negro Speaks of Rivers” (1921, 1926)

The speaker of the poem acts as the spokesman for the whole black race and its ancient and recent history; he mentions the associations between blacks and a variety of famous rivers, including the Euphrates in the Middle East, the Congo in tropical Africa, the Nile in the Egypt of the pharaohs, and the Mississippi at the time of Lincoln. The speaker associates the history of his people and their souls (and his own soul) with the timeless flow of such rivers.

This poem (one of Hughes’s earliest and most famous) announced an unusual new voice on the poetic scene—a voice that would speak with enormous self-respect about the black experience and its distinguished historical roots. The speaker is identified in the title as a spokesman for his race, and the title equates black people with one of the most ancient, archetypal, and mythic features of the planet’s geography. The poem implies that the history of black people is as ancient, varied, and vital as rivers themselves. Rivers existed long before humans arrived on the planet, and blacks (the poem makes clear) have played important roles in human culture since the beginnings of recorded time. The poem fluctuates between the abstract and the specific: Its first three lines deal with rivers in general; its next four comment on four rivers in particular, from the most distant to the nearest, both in time and in space; its final three lines move back to the general again, repeating earlier phrasing and ending with an exact repetition of line 3, which now functions as a kind of refrain.

The Euphrates is a river associated with the beginnings of human civilization; the speaker (giving voice to archetypal black experiences) claims to have bathed in those ancient waters (l. 4). The phrasing here implies humans’ complete immersion in nature. Next the speaker claims to have built a “hut” near the Congo (l. 5)—phrasing that implies another stage of human development. Then the speaker claims to have “raised . . . pyramids” above the Nile (l. 6)—yet another advance in the progress of civilization, although the poem leaves tantalizingly unclear whether the black builders of the pyramids were their designers or were slave labor exploited to construct them. Finally, in the next line (which is, appropriately, the longest and most meandering in the poem) the speaker refers to the Mississippi—a reference that cannot help but remind us of the enslavement of blacks (l. 7). Yet the inevitable implied allusion to slavery is balanced by an explicit reference to “Abe Lincoln,” who was instrumental in ending slavery, and the line is further balanced, in effectively complex ambiguity, when the speaker claims to have seen the “muddy bosom” of the Mississippi “turn all golden in the sunset” (l. 7). Darkness is balanced against light; muddy waters are seen as beautiful. The river is personified, as if it were an old mother or a young lover, and Hughes, in his loving appreciation of the beauty of nature and the history of America, shows here (in substance, style, and form) his clear debt to Walt Whitman. The depth of the speaker’s soul is implied not only by the breadth of his historical memory but also by the absence of mere bitterness in his reference to the Mississippi; the simplicity, clarity, and directness of his language (which flows smoothly, as the rivers themselves do); and the profoundness of his appreciation of nature and natural beauty.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with two poems by Carl Sandburg—“Prairie Waters by Night” and “Grass.” How do all three poems use imagery of nature? Which poem by Sandburg most resembles Hughes's poem in tone, technique, and style? How does the tone of "Grass" differ from the tone of Hughes's poem, and why? Which of the two works is more ironic and cynical? Which is more lyric and celebratory?

2. How does Hughes's poem resemble and/or differ from W. E. B. DuBois's "Song of the Smoke"? Discuss the poems in terms of rhythm, imagery, tone, and the implied characterization of the speaker. Is one poem more obviously "political" than the other? If so, explain why.
3. Discuss the use of repetition to stress variation in this poem, especially in lines 1–2 and 4–9. Discuss, in particular, the variation of verbs in the latter set of lines. How does such variation imply the complexity and capacities of the black race?

"Mother to Son" (1922, 1926)

In this poem a loving, wise, and presumably wizened old mother speaks to her young son, telling him of the repeated challenges she has faced and the persisting endurance she has displayed. She encourages him to emulate her own example—to continue struggling forward and not to give up in the face of disappointments.

Although the southern dialect used in this poem suggests that its speaker is black, the title of the work (and the sentiments the poem expresses) might refer to any mother and any son. The bond between parent and child is one of the most deeply rooted of all human attachments, and mothers in particular are archetypally associated with selfless love and compassionate wisdom. Using fewer than 100 words and only 20 lines, Hughes successfully creates a credible voice and implies a profound depth of experience; as in many of his poems, the language is simple, clear, direct, and colloquial. The first line immediately establishes an intimate tone and personal point of view; it is as if we are eavesdropping on a particularly private exchange. The second line effectively juxtaposes the conventionally ungrammatical language of the mother ("ain't been no") with a symbol of the grand, easy life from which she feels so distant. In the next four lines (as elsewhere in this poem) Hughes not only uses anaphora (repetition of initial words) and paratactic construction (repetition of the same kinds of clauses) to create a convincing effect of actual speech, but he also enlivens the lines with precise and vivid images that serve as effective metaphors for the pains and obstacles the mother has faced. Especially effective is the sudden shift from line 6 (which is exceptionally long) to line 7, which consists of the single word Bare. That word thus receives enormous emphasis—emphasis that seems all the more appropriate when we realize that this single word sums up the essence of the mother's materially impoverished existence. The fact that Bare also rhymes with stair from line 2 exemplifies the subtlety of Hughes's music; the poem moves in the rhythms of natural speech, but the structure of the work is far from artless. The irregular line lengths, the general lack of rhyme, and the generally straightforward sentence construction all help make the poem seem appropriately artless and realistic, but the repeated words and repeated patterns of phrasing (such as "And reachin' . . . / And turnin' . . . / And sometimes goin'" [ll. 10–12]) also give it splendid rhetorical force. The repetition of verbs (just quoted) not only contributes to the dynamic vigor of the poem but also reflects the very persistence the mother extols: She repeats patterns of phrasing just as she persisted in patterns of determined behavior, and the catalog of "And / And / And" in lines 10–12 (which describe her continuous movement upward) nicely answers and balances the earlier pattern of "And / And / And" in lines 4–6 (which described the obstacles she faced). In her diction and grammar the mother may seem simple and unsophisticated, but in her feelings and attitudes she embodies the wisdom of the race, in both senses of that word.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the character of the speaker of this poem with the central character in NELLA LARSEN's novel Quicksand. How do their backgrounds, attitudes, tones, styles of speech, and final outlooks differ? How are the conclusions of the two works different in effect? How have issues of race and gender affected the lives of both women, and how have they responded in different ways?

2. Read this poem alongside some of the autobiographical writings of GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN (Zitkala-Ša), such as “Impressions of an Indian Childhood,” “The School Days of an Indian Girl,” and “An Indian Teacher among Indians.” How do the poem and the prose works differ in spirit, tone, and implied purpose? Do you find one of the speakers more appealing or admirable than the other? If so, explain why. What role does anger play in the Hughes poem and in Bonnin’s prose?
3. How is this work similar to (and/or different from) Hughes’s poem “The Negro Mother”? Discuss the two works in terms of characterization, structure, form, tone of voice, point of view, and diction. In your opinion, is one poem more effective than the other? If so, explain why, being careful to discuss precise details. Is one poem more sentimental than the other?
4. Discuss the ways this poem is divided into distinct lines. Why does Hughes break up the lines as he does? How and why would the poem be less effective if it contained the same number of words but fewer lines? How do the structure and length of the poem mimic its message and its central metaphor?

“The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain” (1926)

In this essay, first published on June 23, 1926, Hughes begins by describing the remark of another young and talented black writer who told Hughes that he wanted “to be a poet—not a Negro poet” (DeSantis 31), a remark Hughes interpreted as implying that the man essentially wanted to be white. In the rest of the essay, Hughes laments the ways black people often are encouraged to devalue the beauties, achievements, and potential of their own race, and he celebrates the black common folk, who simply live their lives, without worrying about whether whites will approve. Hughes looks forward to the day when black artists of all sorts will proudly embrace their racial identity and use the abundant raw material at their disposal to create art that is true to the full richness of the black experience.

Written in the direct, clear, and accessible style that characterizes much of Hughes’s prose, this essay is obviously a kind of personal artistic manifesto. It helps justify and explain the kind of creative writing that Hughes himself had already begun to practice. The essay is, in a sense, a response to the critics (especially the black critics) who objected to the kind of poetry Hughes himself preferred to write—poetry that featured the actual slang, dialect, rhythms, subjects, and attitudes common in the colloquial speech used by African Americans of the “lower classes.” The essay explains why Hughes values such speech and the perspectives and experiences it represents, and yet the essay also shows how skillful and articulate Hughes can be in employing the kind of language, logic, and attitudes associated with people who are highly educated and highly literate. Hughes admires “the low-down folk, the so-called common element” (DeSantis 32), but he can more than hold his own when arguing with people who consider themselves superior to such folk. Yet his tone (as is characteristic of Hughes) does not seem hectoring, belligerent, or unduly argumentative; the essay exemplifies the very kind of self-confidence, self-possession, and self-respect it advocates. Near the very conclusion of the piece he writes, for instance, that “We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. If white people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, it doesn’t matter. We know we are beautiful. And ugly too” (DeSantis 36). Those last three words are typical Hughes: On one level they amount to a joke; on another level they are thoroughly serious. In one sense the words are an implicit but taunting reply to all the critics who alleged that Hughes wrote unduly about the “ugly” side of black life. In another sense the words simply acknowledge the plain fact that all life has an ugly side, and that to be fully true and complex, great art must deal with the ugly as well as the more obviously beautiful. Hughes here implies that his deepest commitment is not so much to a particular race as to truth itself, and he also implies that the best art about black people will be art that treats them simply as people, with all the inevitable complications that word connotes.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with T. S. ELIOT's essay "Tradition and the Individual Talent." How are both authors concerned with the relationship between the individual writer and other writers of the past and present? How, why, and to what extent does each essay deal with sociological matters or economic concerns? How do you think Eliot would react to Hughes's essay, and vice versa? Support your arguments with specific evidence from each text.
2. How does Hughes's essay resemble and/or differ from the comments on African-American art in W. E. B. DuBois's The Souls of Black Folk? What values, aspirations, or attitudes does Hughes seem to share with DuBois? How (if at all) do they seem to differ? Discuss the style, tone, and argumentative methods of both works.
3. Discuss the rhetorical effectiveness of the opening sentence of this essay. How does that sentence immediately command attention and create interest? How and why does it make the reader want to read further? Rewrite the sentence in a way that would make it much less forceful—perhaps by dividing it into a number of separate sentences. By the same token, discuss the rhetorical effectiveness of the final four sentences of the essay. In particular, discuss their tone and attitude. How do both factors contribute to the final impact of the essay as a whole?

"Mulatto" (1927)

This startling poem opens with an impassioned exclamation by the mixed-race son of a white southern man; the son asserts his connection to the father, but the father, in angry and ugly tones and phrasing, rejects any link. The racist father sees black women in the rural South merely as opportunities for sexual exploitation; in illiterate and vulgar language, he repudiates any deeper bond with blacks in general and with his own son in particular.

Part of the effectiveness of this poem derives from the stark contrast between the beauty of the rural Georgia setting—with its "turpentine woods" (l. 3), its "Great big yellow stars" (l. 10), and its "scent of pine wood [that] stings the soft night air" (l. 18)—and the ugliness of the racist father's vulgar language. The poem is simultaneously lyrical and dramatic, lovely and bitter, and its complicated imagery of color also contributes to its force. Appropriately enough, the text is full of images of light that are juxtaposed with images of darkness, with the color yellow (often associated with the stars) mediating between white and black and thus symbolizing the mixture of the races. As many of Hughes's poems do, this one uses repetitions to great effect; rhyme, on the other hand, is used only infrequently, so that when rhymes do occur, they have the impact of the unexpected. Here as so often elsewhere Hughes demonstrates a gifted musical ear; very long lines often alternate with very short ones; the meter follows no prescribed, monotonous pattern; the poem moves along according to its own rhythms and logic, seeming spontaneous and unpredictable but also (thanks to the repetitions and refrains) seeming ordered, artful, and anything but shapeless. As usual in Hughes, the language is simple, colloquial, bold, and direct, with touches of dialect and more than a touch of crudeness and profanity. Hughes wisely refrains from explicitly commenting on, responding to, or sermonizing about the vicious outbursts of the racist father; he lets the man have his say, feeling no need to spell out any obvious lessons derived from the ugliness of the father's words and feelings. The son's tone can be read both as angry and as pleading, while the father's words can be read both as highly personal and private and as representative of broader racial prejudice. On the one hand, the poem depicts the confrontation between one son and one father; on the other hand, it symbolizes the whole history of American racism, especially the widespread mixing of the races. At the beginning of the poem, the voice of the son seems defiant and bitter, but at the end of the work our last glimpse of him is of “A little yellow / Bastard boy” (ll. 44–45). In this transition, as in so many other respects, the poem manages to combine anger and pathos, satire and sadness, repulsive ugliness and affecting beauty. The ugliness prevents it from seeming sentimental; the beauty prevents it from seeming entirely cynical, depressing, or grim.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How is this poem comparable to, and/or different from, Nella Larsen’s novel titled Passing, particularly in its depiction of the lives of mixed-race people and their relations to the dominant racial culture. Discuss such issues as the impact of economic class, the importance of regional settings, the genders of the central characters, and the significance of the conclusions and concluding tones. Is one work more pessimistic than the other? Is one work more private or personal in focus than the other? If so, are these differences significant in what they imply about the place of mixed-race persons in American culture?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with WILLIAM FAULKNER’s short story “Barn Burning,” paying particular attention to the ways the two works present relations between fathers and sons. How are the fathers similar in their attitudes, tones, language, and behavior (especially in their treatment of blacks, women, and their own children)? How are the attitudes of the sons complicated and ambivalent? Compare the imagery used at the very end of Faulkner’s story with the imagery of Hughes’s poem. How do the works differ in their points of view?
3. Discuss the connotations and significance of line 3; what meanings does it imply? How does Hughes structure the poem so as to create maximum curiosity? In particular, what is the function of the early passages describing the landscape? Discuss the ironic juxtaposition of line 35 and line 36. How is the poem as a whole built around such juxtapositions?

Not without Laughter (1930)

This novel describes the maturation and family life of a young boy named James “Sandy” Rodgers, who lives in a small town in Kansas with his hard-working and deeply religious elderly grandmother (“Aunt Hager”) and his mother, Annjee, while his carefree father, Jimboy, travels the country in search of work. Aunt Hager has two other daughters: the rebellious Harriet, who runs off and joins a carnival, flirts with prostitution, but ultimately becomes a successful singer; and the distant and ambitious Tempy, who is proud of her hard-won economic and social status and who disdains the lower-class values and behavior of the rest of her family. After Aunt Hager dies, Sandy (now a teenager) is taken in by his aunt Tempy and her husband, who try to groom him according to their upper-middle-class values; eventually, though, he goes to live with his mother in Chicago, where an encounter with his now-prosperous aunt Harriet helps ensure him the chance at a fuller education that he so desires.

This book, which was the first of only two novels by Hughes, was widely praised when it first appeared. Contemporary critics (whose comments are reproduced by Dace) admired the work for presenting a cross section of black society—from the old to the young, from the poor to the relatively well off, and from the traditional, pious, and accommodating (such as Aunt Hager) to the rebellious and often bitter (such as Hager’s daughter Harriet). By structuring the novel around the literal, mental, moral, and emotional growth of Sandy, and by using Sandy mostly as a detached and fair-minded observer of the older characters, Hughes was able to create a convincing sense of what it was like to grow up as a sensitive black in the opening decades of the 20th century. In addition, he was able to convey a sense of the conflicts and tensions involved in the transition from one generation (a generation whose members, such as Aunt Hager, had often known slavery from their own experience) to a new generation—one that was often eager to break with the past, either by the pursuit of pleasure (as Harriet does) or by strict self-discipline and the determined acquisition of status and wealth (the path chosen by Tempy).

Reviewers who commented on the novel when it first appeared often praised the book for offering a different view of African-American life than the views frequently presented in novels set either in sophisticated (or squalid) Harlem or in the gothic (or moonlight-and-magnolias) territory of the Deep South. Hughes was frequently commended for depicting "ordinary," credible blacks who reflected the typical lives of average African Americans; the characters in his book (it was often said) were neither all saints nor all sinners but usually a bit of both. A number of early commentators praised Hughes for his simplicity, directness, avoidance of melodrama, and ideological restraint; the novel was extolled for dealing with difficult issues without degenerating into mere propaganda, and the tone was often seen as neither sentimental nor simply sarcastic. Reviewers praised Hughes for creating characters who were not political props but convincing human beings. The dialogue, dialect, and glimpses of popular culture and popular entertainment (especially the snatches of songs Hughes often quoted) were applauded for adding credibility to the book, and Hughes was commended for presenting most of his characters with objectivity, understanding, and even compassion. As its title suggests, this is not a fundamentally angry book, although it does contain scenes that arouse the anger of both characters and readers—especially the scenes that depict the often subtle yet crude manifestations of racist discrimination, which seem particularly repulsive when (as often here) the victims are children.

Not all the early reviewers, of course, praised the novel completely; some even had serious reservations. Some found the book's pace too slow (especially in its early pages), and some found its ending too rushed. A number of readers complained that the work lacked a compelling plot, depending too much on characterization and too little on intriguing or revealing incidents. Some claimed Sandy was an underdeveloped character, while others found the same fault with most of the other people in the book, whom they considered stereotypes rather than fully rounded people. Although almost all readers found Aunt Hager a memorable, vivid, and attractive personality, at least one reviewer dismissed her as too much an old mammy type and wished that more attention had been paid to Annjee, whom he considered potentially more complex than the other characters because she was closer to seeming real. Even readers who praised Hughes's lively and endearing depiction of Aunt Hager (and they were numerous) sometimes regretted that the book (in their view) lost much of its force and interest after Hager's death, while others thought that Hager, even when alive, sometimes hurt the book by philosophizing too much. Although objections to the novel were much less common than praise, objections did exist, and even Hughes himself (in his later autobiography The Big Sea), felt that he had been less than fully successful in rendering the characters he had imagined (228–230).

One of the oddest complaints about the novel (at least to a modern reader) was that of a black reviewer, Lillian Lewis Feurtado, who worried that white readers might think "that segregation is justifiable" after having to suffer through "chapter after chapter of contact with immoral, vulgar, low-down, 3rd rate Colored people." She considered the book to be full of "vulgar suggestions and some plain talk that makes for nasty thought," and she thought that Hughes's focus on such characters and such language was "too bad, for we do have some girls of lovely characters and fine instincts who think of something besides sex and jazz." However, because Hughes was such a talented writer, Feurtado worried that white readers would find his depiction of the ugly aspects of black life convincing and typical and would never know that among African Americans there actually existed "some young men with high aspirations" to match the girls with lovely characters (see Dace 151). Interestingly enough, Feurtado sounds, for all the world, like the novel's own Aunt Tempy and thus is living proof that people like Tempy did actually exist. This is not a trivial point, for one of the persistent notes of controversy in early comments on the work concerned Hughes's presentation of Tempy: Critics disagreed about whether she was a credible character and whether she had been presented fairly. A number of the novel's first reviewers found Tempy a caricature rather than a believable human being (Dace 142, 147, 160), and at times it is hard to disagree with this allegation. One early reader, however, thought that Hughes had drawn Tempy with "sympathy and understanding" and that, in any case, "it is upon her kind that the progress of the race depends" (Dace 150). Feurtado's review shows, if nothing else, that people like Aunt Tempy were not merely figments of Hughes's imagination. Tempy, in any case, is a more complex character than she has often been given credit for being, and the same seems true of most of the other characters, who merit more analysis than they have yet received.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Hughes's work with Zora Neale Hurston's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. How do the various husbands in that novel function in similar ways to the various sisters in Hughes's book? How do the geographical settings of the works affect the tone of each book? In which book does setting play a more prominent role? What is the relative importance of plot and characterization in each novel? How are the experiences of the main characters affected by their different genders?
2. Read Hughes's account of his own youth in his autobiography The Big Sea and then discuss the similarities and differences between his own life and the life of "Sandy" Rodgers. How do the two boys differ from and/or resemble one another in such matters as family backgrounds, interactions with relatives, experiences with racial prejudice, fundamental aspirations, and essential temperaments?
3. Trace the character of Aunt Tempy throughout the book and discuss the strengths and weaknesses of her characterization. How did Hughes succeed in presenting her? How (if at all) did he fail? How might he have made her a more believable character? Do you agree or disagree about the faults some critics have found in the ways she is presented?

"I, Too" (1932)

In this poem the speaker begins by announcing that he also sings (that is, writes about or even celebrates) the United States, even though he is treated as a second-class citizen, who is separated from whites, especially on important occasions. In spite of this discrimination, he nurtures himself and prepares for the future, when, because of his newly developed strength, no one will dare to treat him with less than respect. In that future time, whites will finally recognize the merits of blacks, and in their consciences they will regret their past treatment of blacks.

In its opening and closing lines and in its general subject matter (especially its identification of an individual voice with the American nation as a whole), the poem recalls the work and attitudes of Walt Whitman, a poet Hughes greatly admired. By echoing Whitman in tone and technique, the poem cannot help but remind us of the distance between Whitman's democratic ideals and the actual degrading existence of blacks in the United States at the time Hughes wrote. The allusion to Whitman, then, is not merely a matter of similar phrasing; instead, it also helps highlight the contrast between Whitman's optimistic celebrations of personal freedom and national idealism and the sad realities most black Americans faced. Yet the tone of Hughes's poem is not as bitter as one might have expected. The lyric opens, after all, by proclaiming that the speaker "sing[s]" America" (l. 1), and although there is a hint of a threat in line 11 ("Nobody'll dare" mistreat the speaker after he has grown strong), in general his mood is one of vigorous, vital self-confidence; self-respect; and even generosity in his assumptions about whites. The speaker's vitality, for instance, is symbolized by the ways lines 5–7 answer, and undercut, lines 2–4; his self-confidence is symbolized by the ways lines 8–14 balance and respond to lines 2–7. His generosity, meanwhile, is implied in lines 15–17, in which he gives whites credit for having both a sense of beauty and a sense of ethical responsibility; the shame whites will someday feel will actually be, ironically, a testament to their own moral attractiveness. The transformation the poem predicts

(and implicitly calls for) is implied by the subtle change of phrasing in the final line, which functions as a kind of refrain: Whereas the poem began by asserting that the speaker “sing[s] America,” it ends by announcing (and prophesying) that the speaker will be America: He will not simply stand apart from the country and celebrate its best ideals; he will instead be part of its very fabric, embodying those ideals and exemplifying them in the everyday facts of his life.

In its plain diction, simple rhythms, generally short lines, and generally declarative sentences, the poem exemplifies many of the most typical traits of Hughes's poetry, just as in its fundamental optimism it reflects the best qualities of the national spirit. In poems like this, Hughes speaks for himself, for his race, and for the worthiest instincts of his country as a whole.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the similarities and differences between this work and Hughes's poem “Mother to Son.” In what senses might the present poem almost be considered an address from son to mother? Discuss the poems in terms of the speakers presented, the tones adopted, the attitudes implied, the diction used, and the other techniques employed.
2. Read Hughes's lyric alongside CLAUDE MCKAY's poem titled “Outcast.” Discuss the works in terms of the forms used, the diction chosen, and the focus emphasized. Which poem focuses on the past? Which one focuses on the future? How and why is this difference significant? Which poem seems more bitter? Which one seems more resigned? Which one seems more determined? Which one, ironically, seems more traditional or conventional in structure?
3. Discuss the connotations of the idea of eating in the kitchen. What two kinds of people might typically “eat in the kitchen / When company comes”? What is the symbolic relevance of both kinds of persons to this poem? What are the connotations associated with one of those kinds of people, and what are the connotations associated with the other kind? How might the poem suggest an eventual transition from one of those kinds of persons to the other kind?

“The Weary Blues” (1932)

The speaker describes hearing a man perform, playing a piano and singing a melancholy “blues” song on a dark New York night. The man's song emphasizes his loneliness but also his resilience, yet the end of the song stresses his fundamental dissatisfaction, and even a measure of despair. After concluding his song, the singer's body sleeps while the song “echoes through his head” (l. 34).

This poem, like many by Hughes, is both a tribute to and an imitation of the blues tradition in black American music. The speaker (who may or may not be black himself, since his racial identity is never made explicitly clear) obviously appreciates the beauty of the blues, and just as obviously he employs many “musical” features in his own poem. He begins, for instance, with emphatic alliteration (or repeated consonants) in the words “Droning a drowsy” (l. 1). In fact, alliteration is a prominent feature throughout the work, especially in a phrase such as “pale dull pallor” (l. 5) or in a line such as “He made that poor piano moan with melody” (l. 10), with its repeated ms and ps. Assonance (repetition of vowel sounds) appears less often than alliteration, but it does show up, as in such phrases as “sad raggy” (l. 13) and especially in line 23 (“Thump, thump, thump, went his foot on the floor”)—a line that not only combines the assonance of the repeated u and o sounds with the alliteration of th and f, but also achieves (in the first three syllables) the effect of onomatopoeia, in which words mimic the very sounds they describe. Throughout the poem, Hughes uses repetitions of lines, phrases, sounds, and ideas to give his lyric a highly musical quality, and he achieves the same effect by alternating line lengths, by employing rhyme, and by inserting exclamatory interjections. He often emphasizes verbs by placing them at the beginnings of lines and accenting their key syllables (as in “Droning,” “Rocking,” “Swaying,” and “Coming” [ll. 1, 2, 12, and 15]); he sometimes runs strings of heavily accented syllables together (as in “pale dull pallor” and “old gas light” [l. 5]); at other times he makes us wait for the accented syllable by putting two unaccented ones before it (as in “To the tune o’ those Weary . . .” [l. 8]). In short, in any number of complicated and subtle ways, Hughes makes his own poem literally lyrical—literally like a song. The poem does not simply describe, celebrate, or quote from the blues; it becomes itself an example of the art form it extols.

Another technique the poem effectively employs is the juxtaposition of opposites. Thus the drawn-out sound of drowsy is set immediately beside the bouncy rhythm syncopated (l. 1); or the piano-player’s “ebony hands” are set against the piano’s “ivory key[s]” (l. 9); or the word moan (implying pain) is linked with melody (implying beauty); or the self-pity of lines 19–20 is offset by the resolve of lines 21–22. Of course, the most significant form of juxtaposition involves the pairing of the poem’s speaker (who seems educated and conventionally literate) and the blues singer (who relies on dialect and other examples of nonstandard English). Without making an explicit argument, the poem implies the universal relevance of “low” or “popular” culture (such as the blues) to all people, no matter what their race, their class, or their level of education. The poem shows the speaker’s bond with the singer, and the poem implicitly endorses a larger bond among speaker, singer, and readers as well.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How does Hughes’s lyric resemble and/or differ from WALLACE STEVENS’s poem “Peter Quince at the Clavier”? Discuss such matters as tone, diction, imagery, point of view, and purpose. How does each poet use music as both a subject and a technique? Which poem seems more clearly an example of high culture? Which seems more clearly an example of popular culture? Discuss the specific aspects of the poem that support your answers to the previous two questions.
2. Compare and contrast this poem with Claude McKay’s sonnet “The Harlem Dancer.” Discuss such matters as the central characters (both are black performers), the attitudes of the observer(s), the forms and styles of the poems themselves, the appropriateness of the forms and styles to the subjects of the works, and the appropriateness of the diction used.
3. Discuss the various ways in which the musician might accurately be described as “a musical fool.” In particular, what are some possible connotations of the noun in that phrase? How does the use of dialect add authenticity to the poem, but how do the words in dialect nevertheless express universal human emotions?

“The Blues I’m Playing” (1934)

When Mrs. Dora Ellsworth, a very wealthy New York widow and patroness with no children of her own, hears about—and then hears for herself—the talented piano playing of Oceola Jones, a poor young black woman from Harlem, she instantly decides to sponsor the young woman: She pays for further lessons, provides her with a nice apartment, eventually sends her to Europe for further study, and in general tries to manage both her artistic career and her personal life. She dislikes Oceola’s interest in jazz music and other forms of popular culture, and she particularly dislikes Oceola’s romantic involvement with Pete Williams, a young black medical student. When Oceola, despite Mrs. Ellsworth’s warnings, decides to marry Pete, Mrs. Ellsworth makes it clear that she will have little more to do with the young woman, but their break is preceded by one last performance, in which Oceola defiantly launches into a loud and spirited rendering of a sensuous blues number.

This story, with its obviously autobiographical roots in Hughes’s recent troubled experiences with his own patron (Charlotte Osgood Mason), runs the risk of seeming merely two-dimensional and even a bit vindictive. Mrs. Ellsworth (in other words) can be interpreted too easily as a merely manipulative villain, while Oceola can be perceived as a simple saint who suffers for her art in ways her domineering patroness cannot imagine. Hughes does, however, manage to complicate a potentially black-and-white (or black versus white) story in a number of interesting ways. For one thing, he suggests that while Mrs. Ellsworth's attitude toward Oceola is partly "motherly," there may also be elements of an erotic attraction. This is especially the case when he describes how the two women would sometimes sleep in the same bed, with Mrs. Ellsworth "aware all the time of the electric strength of that brown-black body beside her, and of [Oceola's] deep drowsy voice. . . . such a hard young body!" (Miller 78). Phrasing such as this implies that the roots of Mrs. Ellsworth's behavior may be more complex than she realizes, while descriptions elsewhere of her life as a young woman, and of her relations with her late husband, suggest that she may have repressed (or been forced to repress) potentially romantic and even rebellious aspects of her own nature (Miller 80, 84). There are hints, in other words, that Mrs. Ellsworth may not be a totally uncomplicated ogre who is subtle only in her unconscious racism; she may be a more complex human being than she or anyone else in the story understands. However, another way in which Hughes avoids simple (and simplistic) polarities in the story involves his descriptions of classical music. Clearly the story makes a case for the value and vitality of jazz and the blues, but Oceola's talent and tastes are clearly eclectic: "She played the Rachmaninoff Prelude in C Sharp Minor. She played from the Liszt Études. She played the St. Louis Blues. She played Ravel's Pavanne pour une Enfante Défunte" (Miller 73). Obviously her repertoire is determined in part by the demands of her audiences, but just as obviously she is a gifted and committed performer of the classics (otherwise she would never have attracted Mrs. Ellsworth's attention), and her personal love of "art" music is implied when Hughes tells us that she could not understand how "white folks . . . [could] imagine that Beethoven had nothing to do with life, or that Schubert's love songs were only sublimations." Her own interpretations of the classics are "warm and individual" (Miller 80). Thus, just as Hughes partially resists the temptation to make Mrs. Ellsworth simply a kind of evil stepmother, so he also partially resists the temptation to make classical music merely the art of oppressive whites and jazz merely the art of oppressed blacks. Indeed, in one of the most complex moments in the whole story—the last sentence—Hughes even raises the possibility that Mrs. Ellsworth may be more open to the appeal of the blues than either she or Oceola had suspected (Miller 84). But that is another story altogether.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read the discussions of music in W. E. B. DuBois's book The Souls of Black Folk. How do his comments on music seem relevant to Hughes's story? How is DuBois's view of music complex? Are the views about music in Hughes's story similarly complicated?
2. Read Hughes's autobiography The Big Sea, particularly its closing discussion of his relations with his patron Charlotte Osgood Mason. What similarities or differences do you see between Hughes's own experiences with Mason and Oceola's experiences with Mrs. Ellsworth? In which work is the patron presented in more complex, sympathetic, and credible ways?
3. Read the opening two paragraphs of the story and discuss their contrasting tones. How does the second paragraph undercut and complicate the first? What are the various methods Hughes uses to accomplish this ironic effect? How does the beginning of the story (especially the second paragraph) already foreshadow the story's conclusion?

The Big Sea (1940)

This book, the first of Hughes's two autobiographies (the second is I Wonder as I Wander [1956]), traces his life from childhood to the 1930s and the traumatic break with his wealthy white literary patroness, Charlotte Osgood Mason. The work is divided into three sections. The first describes Hughes' life until the age of 21 and focuses especially on his tense relationship with his disapproving father. The second section describes his life as a sailor, his voyages and visits to Africa, his time in Europe (particularly in Paris), his return to the United States, and the real beginnings of his serious literary career. Section 3 describes his experiences in New York during the black Renaissance in Harlem, his experiences as a student at Lincoln University, his various travels in the South and in Cuba, and his initially gratifying but ultimately troubled relationship with Mrs. Mason.

This volume of autobiography is appealing in numerous ways. It not only provides crucial insights into his own personality, values, conflicts, and development, but can also be read as an intriguing work of social and literary history, especially in its treatment of the Harlem Renaissance, in which Hughes was an active participant while serving also as a perceptive eyewitness. As the thoughtful, surprisingly objective observations of a highly intelligent African American—observations set down in response to some of the most important decades of black American history—the book provides an “inside narrative” of how it actually felt to grow up under the heavy burden of racial discrimination. In addition, simply as a highly colorful travelogue the book is also of great interest: Hughes provides a black man’s view of black Africa, and he also happened to be in Paris during one of the most significant periods in the cultural history of that ancient city. Finally, the book is of interest for its depiction of the often-complicated relations between parents and children (especially between sons and fathers) and for its personal telling of the oft-told stories of an artist’s growth and an individual’s achievement of independence and maturity. On all these different levels, then, and for all these different reasons, the book is innately interesting, but it is also worth reading for the clarity of its writing, the sharpness of its observations, and the even-handed generosity of its assessments of other people. Even when Hughes proclaims that he hated his father (McLaren 62), he hardly seems full of hate, and even when he had good reason to feel contemptuous of other people, he rarely seems to have looked on the world with bitterness or contempt. The final impression left by this book is of a man who enjoyed his life, was capable of enjoying others, did not take himself too seriously, and almost always exhibited great sanity, attractive modesty, and calm self-respect.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How is this autobiography similar to and/or different from Black Boy, by RICHARD WRIGHT? Does one book seem more credible than the other? If so, why and how? How are the tones of the books affected by the geographical and economic circumstances the authors faced in childhood and later?
2. Read Hughes’s book alongside two other notable examples of autobiography by African Americans: BOOKER T. WASHINGTON’s Up from Slavery and the autobiographical sections of W. E. B. DuBois’s The Souls of Black Folk. Does Hughes seem to have more in common (in background, values, and goals) with one of these men rather than the other? Does he have any qualities shared by both of his predecessors? How is his book different precisely because it is the work of a younger man—a man of a newer generation?
3. Why is it symbolically significant that Hughes begins his own book by describing how he discarded books written by others? Why is it symbolically significant that the one book he particularly mentions was written by a white man (H. L. Mencken)? Why is it symbolically significant that Hughes’s book opens when he is 21? What does that age traditionally symbolize? Why is it symbolically significant that Hughes begins his book by describing an ocean voyage that takes him away from America? Discuss other instances of possible symbolism in this autobiographical work.

“Theme for English B” (1949)

The speaker tells of being given an assignment in an English class—an assignment to write something expressing himself, since self-expression will necessarily be true. In the course of reflecting on this apparently simple (but actually fairly complicated) assignment, the speaker reveals details of his life: He is a young black who has emigrated from the South to attend college in New York; he lives in a room at the Harlem YMCA; his desires are ordinary; his tastes are broad; but his life and experiences are inevitably affected by his race. Despite their important differences (especially the difference of race), he and his instructor are both Americans, and each has the potential to learn from the other.

In this deliberately prosaic poem (in which the poetry, appropriately enough, comes close to sounding like unadorned, nonfiction prose), the speaker first responds to the assignment by reporting the external details of his life, including his age, his place of birth, the college he attends, the crucial fact that he is the only black in his class, and the neighborhood and building in which he resides. When the “theme” (or essay) itself begins with line 16, the tone becomes more personal and complex; now the speaker not only directly addresses the teacher, but he also begins to focus less on the external facts of his existence and more on his thoughts, feelings, desires, and uncertainties. As befits this new focus, this section of the poem becomes more irregular and unpredictable in every way. Whereas lines 7–15 were of roughly equal length (at least in appearance on the page), the shape of the poem from line 16 to the end is far less predictable. The rhythms and the sentence structures are also more varied, but perhaps the most striking difference between the introductory section of the work and the “theme” itself is that in the theme portion the speaker directly addresses his instructor and (by implication) the reader of the poem as well. The you continually mentioned is both the teacher in the poem and the reader outside it, and although the speaker has been asked to write about himself, to express his own authentic truth, he realizes that a self rarely if ever exists in isolation—that crucial to any individuality is the individual's relations with others. This is especially the case if (as in this example) the individual is treated as less than fully equal by those who enjoy superior power. The speaker was assigned to write autobiographically, and he realizes that to do so most effectively, he must try to create a dialogue. The assignment called for self-examination by the speaker, but the poem encourages self-examination by the reader. The speaker is realistic enough to acknowledge the differences that separate him from his instructor (“you’re older—and white— / and somewhat more free” [ll. 39–40]), but despite his youth he is also mature enough to understand that he and the instructor (and the reader) are indissolubly linked by the common fate of being Americans together. The instructor is only “somewhat more free” (l. 40)—a wonderfully resonant line. On the one hand, the line seems subtly ironic and even sardonic in one respect (since the white instructor is significantly more free than the black student in the America of Hughes's time simply because the instructor is white). On the other hand, the line simply acknowledges a plain fact: No human being is completely independent or autonomous. All humans exist in relations to others, whether they want to or not. Hughes's debt to Walt Whitman is evident in this idea, and it is particularly evident when the student tells his instructor, “You are white— / yet a part of me, as I am a part of you” (ll. 31–32). In simple, plain, straightforward language, the speaker produces a “theme” that is as much about his instructor (and his reader) as it is about himself.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How is Hughes's poem similar to Booker T. Washington's famous “Atlanta Compromise” speech? In particular, what do both works suggest about the inevitability of relations between whites and blacks in the United States? What techniques do both works employ in addressing white audiences? What do both works suggest about the underlying similarities between whites and blacks, despite their obvious differences? What do both works suggest about the ability—and the necessity—of both races to learn and profit from one another?
2. Discuss Hughes's poem alongside “The School Days of an Indian Girl,” by GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN (Zitkala-Ša). Compare and contrast the works in terms of tone, attitude, purpose, and literary techniques. Do you find one speaker more appealing than the other? If so, why? Which of the two speakers seems to have faced a more difficult life? Which speaker seems more bitter?

3. How and why is it symbolically significant that the college is up on a hill and that Harlem is down below? What does the speaker's residence at the "Y" suggest about his social circumstances? Discuss the significance of line 21. How and why would this line resonate with most readers? Discuss the speaker's musical tastes, especially his liking for Bach. What does his liking of Bach suggest about him? Line 26 is not grammatically correct, but how is it therefore credible in a poem of this sort?

"Dream Boogie" (1951)

The poem uses the bounce and diction of boogie-woogie music—"a rhythmically complex and experimental kind of jazz characterized by dissonance, improvisation, and unusual lyrics" (Emanuel 145)—to imply the complex feelings of American blacks, including both their capacity for joy and celebration and their frustration with the postponement of full freedom.

This brief and highly energetic poem begins on a literally bright and emphatically joyous note: "Good morning, daddy!" (l. 1). The word daddy here almost certainly does not refer to the speaker's literal father but is, instead, quite probably already an example of the jazz talk that permeates the poem. A "daddy" in this sense is simply another person. Yet this word, like the other two of the opening line, is clearly upbeat and affirmative, implying a close bond between speaker and addressee, including the poem's own readers. The tone remains light until the end of line 4, where the sudden appearance of the phrase "dream deferred" implies a particularly pervasive concern of Hughes's writing here and elsewhere—a concern with the risks of postponing the achievement of treasured ideals and the dangers of putting off the fulfillment of solemn promises. In a mere four lines, then, Hughes has managed to enrich and complicate a work that might otherwise have been merely upbeat; now, and for the rest of the poem, there is a darker undercurrent. In retrospect, even the earlier word rumble (l. 3) takes on a slightly ominous connotation: On the one hand, the word can merely seem an example of onomatopoeia (in which the sound of a term echoes its sense). That is, the word rumble echoes the very kind of low, heavy, rolling sound it describes. On the other hand, rumble by this point had also become a slang term for a street fight between urban teenage gangs, and the most common such fights occurring in the United States at the time Hughes wrote were fights between gangs of blacks and whites. A poem that seemed to begin as a joyous celebration has now turned into a kind of subtle warning; the speaker does not even need to repeat the phrase "dream deferred" (a phrase that is clearly implied, but not openly stated, in line 13) in order to suggest the danger inherent in continued, continual postponement of full civil rights for a huge segment of the national population. The last seven lines of the poem are emphatically affirmative, but they also seem ominously superficial. The tensions the poem has suggested remain unresolved; the joyous conclusion is belied by the disturbingly vague reference to "something underneath" (l. 12).

For Discussion or Writing

1. How is this poem similar in its methods, brevity, and concluding tone to ERNEST HEMINGWAY'S short story "Hills Like White Elephants"? In both cases, what is the importance of what is left unsaid? How do both works use indirection and implication rather than overt statement? How do both works end on notes that seem falsely cheerful? How do both works manage to suggest more complex human relations than they ever make explicit?
2. Compare and contrast this work with Hughes's poem titled "Harlem" (whose first line is "What happens to a dream deferred?"). Pay particular attention to the tones, diction, structures, and conclusions of the two works. How and why are questions used effectively in both works?
3. How is the poem all the more effective because it is explicitly addressed to the "daddy" mentioned in line 1? How does such drama contribute to the energy of the poem, and how does it also involve the reader? By what means does Hughes create curiosity and suspense? Where and how does the poem seem especially ambiguous?

“Harlem” (1951)

The poem begins by asking what happens when an ideal remains unachieved or a promise remains unfulfilled. After using a number of metaphors and similes to suggest some possible results of such a situation, the poem ends by suddenly raising the possibility of a violent and destructive outcome.

The title of this poem refers to a section of New York City that was (and still is) most heavily populated by African Americans. In the 1920s it had briefly been the center of a remarkable creative outpouring by blacks (including Hughes himself) in literature, music, and many other arts, but by the time Hughes wrote this poem, the neighborhood was more often thought of as a slum characterized by poverty, unemployment, and widespread discontent. These latter connotations of the word Harlem are the ones that seem most relevant to the present lyric—a lyric that gains impact from its brevity, directness, and repeated use of vivid, probing questions. Hughes does not preach; instead, by directly interrogating the reader, and by raising a number of alternatives, he actively engages us, encouraging often-disturbing thought rather than providing simple, easy answers.

The “dream” mentioned in line 1 is almost certainly the dream of full civil, political, and economic equality for blacks—a dream that many Americans (both black and white) had assumed would result from the triumph of the Union in the Civil War. Instead, by the time Hughes wrote this poem, nearly a century after that conflict, blacks were still suffering from severe discrimination, much of it sanctioned by government authority. Blacks, however, were increasingly unwilling to tolerate second-class citizenship. Riots had broken out in various cities in the late 1940s, but they were as nothing compared to the storms of racial violence that would eventually overtake the country in the mid- to late 1960s. In light of these later developments, Hughes’s poem seems eerily prescient, and its final line seems prophetic.

Lines 2–3 raise the possibility that a dream deferred may “dry up / like a raisin in the sun” (ll. 2–3). This simile (a comparison using like or as) is memorably effective, for whereas grapes are full of life-sustaining juice, raisins are black, withered, shriveled, and on the verge of desiccation. The ensuing imagery, however, is even more disturbing: The speaker wonders whether a dream deferred might “fester like a sore— / And then run” (ll. 4–5). At least the transition from a grape to a raisin is still somewhat hopeful: A raisin is still edible and pleasing. In lines 4–5, however, the process implied in lines 2–3 is reversed: Instead of a transition in the direction of dryness, the imagined sore becomes wet and swollen with pus, and then (as if to make the imagery even more disgusting) the pus runs. The lines suggest an infection or uncleanness that has begun to spread. Having affronted our sense of sight, Hughes next repulses our sense of smell by asking whether a dream deferred will “stink like rotten meat” (l. 6)—an image that implies not only sickening corruption but also wasted potential. Hughes now invokes two more senses—the senses of touch and taste—when the speaker asks whether a deferred dream may “crust and sugar over— / like a syrupy sweet” (ll. 7–8). As with the comparison to meat, the imagery here implies something valuable squandered through lack of proper or timely use. Finally, after one more simile that seems deliberately less vivid than the ones before it (as if the speaker has begun to run out of possible comparisons [ll. 9–10]), the poem suddenly switches to a short, sharp, and frightening metaphor: “Or does it explode?” (l. 11). The abrupt shift to italic type catches us by surprise, much as an explosion itself might, while the rhythm of the line mimics the meaning the line describes: The final syllable bursts forth with exceptionally heavy emphasis. All the processes described earlier in the poem are gradual; they unfold slowly in time. By using the italicized word explode, however, Hughes implies that time for remedies or improvement may soon—or may already have—run out.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Hughes’s text with Claude McKay’s poem “If We Must Die.” Discuss the works in terms of technique, diction, imagery, tone, and use of implication. Who are the main implied readers of both works? In other words, whom is McKay mainly addressing, and

8. Choose one brief work from each of the decades of Hughes's public career—the 1920s, 1930s, 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s. In each case, choose a work that somehow typifies the decade in which it was written. For instance, from the 1920s choose a work that seems representative of the Harlem Renaissance. From the 1930s, choose a work that seems relevant to the Great Depression. From the 1940s, choose a work that seems to reflect American involvement in World War II. From the 1950s, choose a work that seems connected in some ways to the cold war. From the 1960s, choose a work that seems to reflect the Civil Rights movement. What continuities exist among these diverse works? What fundamental differences (if any) do they reveal? How do they reflect the evolution of Hughes's career?
9. Choose two different poems by Hughes of roughly comparable length and on roughly similar themes; choose one poem that you think is successful and another that you consider a relative failure. Then, in as much detail as possible, explain your reactions to each work. Explain why you think one work is effective and the other ineffective. Pay attention to such matters as structure, diction, rhythm, imagery, and tone.
10. Compare and contrast the depiction of black urban life in Richard Wright's Native Son and Black Boy and the various works written by Hughes that feature the character Jesse B. Simple. Are there any comic dimensions to Wright's works? Are there any darker dimensions to Hughes's stories? In what respects do these authors' depictions of the lives of blacks in northern cities conflict with and/or reinforce one another? How do the works reflect the particular times during which they were written?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

Bloom, Harold, ed. Langston Hughes: Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1989.

Dace, Tish, ed. Langston Hughes: The Contemporary Reviews. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

De Santis, Christopher, ed. The Collected Works of Langston Hughes. Vol. 9, Essays on Art, Race, Politics, and World Affairs. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.

Emanuel, James A. Langston Hughes. Boston: Twayne, 1967.

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., and K. A. Appiah, eds. Langston Hughes: Critical Perspectives Past and Present. New York: Amistad, 1993.

Hubbard, Dolan, ed. The Collected Works of Langston Hughes. Vol. 4, The Novels: (Not without Laughter and Tambourines to Glory.) Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001.

Hughes, Langston. The Collected Poems of Langston Hughes. Edited by Arnold Rampersad and David Roessel. New York: Knopf, 2000.

Jemie, Onwuchekwa. Langston Hughes: An Introduction to the Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1973.

Leach, Laurie F. Langston Hughes: A Biography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2004.

McLaren, Joseph, ed. The Collected Works of Langston Hughes. Vol. 13, Autobiography: The Big Sea. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.

Miller, R. Baxter. The Collected Works of Langston Hughes. Vol. 15, The Short Stories. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.

Nelson, Cary. Modern American Poetry: Langston Hughes. Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/maps/poets/g_l/hughes/hughes.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes. Vol. 1, 1902–1941, I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

———. The Life of Langston Hughes. Vol. 2, 1941–1967, I Dream a World. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Robert C. Evans

ZORA NEALE HURSTON (1891–1960)

Even in the helter-skelter skirmish that is my life, I have seen / that the world is to the strong regardless of a little pigmentation / more or less. No, I do not weep at the world— / I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife.

(“How It Feels to Be Colored Me”)

Although during her lifetime Zora Neale Hurston won a certain amount of recognition as a writer, in the decade following her poverty-stricken old age and death she was largely forgotten. After dying in a welfare home in rural Florida, she was buried in an unmarked grave, and her surviving manuscripts were nearly burned as trash. Only in the 1970s was the rich legacy of Hurston’s work really rediscovered, and in the years since then, her reputation has soared. She is now considered one of the preeminent authors of the so-called Harlem Renaissance, the brief but highly important efflorescence of creativity among African-American artists in the New York of the 1920s (and 1930s), and certainly she is the most important black woman writer in the first half of the 20th century. As a novelist, essayist, folklorist, short story writer, and theatrical director and producer, she left behind a wonderfully vibrant body of work, full of wit and wisdom. She had discerning ears and eyes, a vivid sense of style both in her prose and in her clothing, and an immensely appealing sense of humor (often laced with stinging sarcasm). She is an author who richly deserves all the renewed attention she is now receiving.

Hurston’s own autobiography, Dust Tracks on the Road, is a superbly well-written book, and it is necessarily the primary source of much information about her early life. It is, unfortunately, also unreliable in some of its claims. Thus, for strictly accurate accounts of Hurston’s life, readers should turn to the various scholarly biographies that have appeared since the mid-1970s. Most of the solid facts are laid out nicely in the highly detailed “Chronology” prepared by Cheryl A. Wall, which reports that Hurston was born on January 7, 1891, in Notasulga, Alabama. (Hurston herself claimed to have been born in Florida, and she sometimes misreported the year of her birth.) She was the fifth child (and second daughter) of John Hurston and his significantly younger wife, whose maiden name had been Lucy Ann Potts. Lucy had alienated her family (especially her mother) by marrying Hurston, whom they considered lower-class, but John was a hardworking and ambitious man. In 1894 he moved his family (which eventually consisted of eight children) to the small village of Eatonville, Florida, which was the first all-black town to be officially incorporated in the United States. Zora and her siblings grew up in an eight-room house on five acres of land in the town, where their father, in addition to doing manual labor, was a local minister and where he also eventually served three terms as mayor. Zora was a lively child (sometimes too lively for her exasperated father, who favored his quieter daughter); she attended a local school and also learned at her mother’s knee, but she particularly enjoyed listening to the adults talk, joke, and tell stories on the front porch of a local store.

Zora’s early childhood was playful and happy, but her life changed significantly when her mother died on September 18, 1904. Zora was soon sent off to school in Jacksonville, where she performed well (especially in spelling), even though she had to do manual labor to help offset her tuition expenses, which her father had begun to neglect to pay. Her father had quickly remarried, and his new wife had little interest in raising his children; although Zora was sent home from school (after her father had failed to pay for her return), she did not stay there long. Instead, she and some of her siblings were sent to live with relatives (some of the older siblings had already left home on their own), and Zora blamed her stepmother for this breakup of the family. After returning to Eatonville in 1912, she actually fought with the stepmother physically, and for the next several years she had to support herself by doing domestic work, even after she moved in with an older brother in Memphis. In 1915, however, her life took another of its radical turns. She was hired to be the personal maid of a singer with a traveling musical production, and her involvement with this troupe of entertainers not only took her around the country but also gave her a kind of second family. When she became ill in Baltimore in 1916, she had to leave the show, but in 1917 she began attending an evening high school (claiming to be 10 years younger than she really was) while supporting herself as a waitress. Her father died that same year in an automobile accident. She gained encouragement from various teachers and school administrators who recognized and admired her intelligence. In September 1917 she entered Morgan Academy (the high school branch of the college now known as Morgan State University), graduating in 1918 after impressing many people (as she always did) with whom she had contact. One of these people suggested that she should think of attending Howard University, a prestigious all-black college in nearby Washington, D.C., and so in the summer Hurston moved to Washington, entering Howard's preparatory program in the fall while working as a manicurist in a black-owned barber shop that served a strictly white clientele. Once again she impressed people; her white customers often tipped her generously to help support her schooling.

In 1919 Hurston began taking regular college classes at Howard, receiving her associate degree in 1920. Although she took classes at Howard until 1924 and was a member of a sorority there, she never received a B.A. She did, however (as usual) impress her teachers, including Alain Locke, a philosophy professor who was later a crucial figure in fostering the growth of African-American literature. Hurston herself, in fact, now began to publish fiction and poetry and to associate with other writers, including a number of the most prominent and/or talented black authors of the day. By 1924, in fact, she had published a story in a significant black magazine headquartered in New York, and it was largely thanks to the encouragement of its editor that she moved to New York in 1925, just as the Harlem Renaissance was coming into full bloom. Hurston, with her lively personality and literary gifts, was quickly at the center of developments. She began winning literary prizes, and she also won the friendship and patronage of important figures, including a number of prominent whites with a strong interest in black culture. Thanks mainly to their support she won a scholarship to Barnard College (the women's division of Columbia University), where she was the only black student at the time. At Barnard she soon attracted the attention of the famous anthropologist Franz Boas, who encouraged her to become an anthropologist herself. Meanwhile, she was also heavily involved in the Harlem literary scene, having gained the friendship of many significant figures, including such up-and-coming younger writers as LANGSTON HUGHES.

In 1927, in fact, Hurston accidentally reencountered Hughes in Mobile, Alabama, while she was on a funded anthropological research trip to the Deep South to collect folklore data. The two drove back to New York together in Hurston's car (nicknamed "Sassie Susie"), stopping off at numerous southern locations and cementing the friendship they had already developed in New York. Earlier in the year, however, Hurston had already married Herbert Sheen, whom she had met much earlier as a fellow student at Howard, but they spent most of their time in different places (partly because he was studying medicine in Chicago), and eventually they divorced. Perhaps the most significant person to enter Hurston's life in 1927, however, was an elderly (and wealthy) white New Yorker named Charlotte Mason (Mrs. Rufus Osgood Mason), who was earning a reputation as a generous if somewhat demanding and eccentric patron of black artists and writers. Hughes was already one of her clients, and Hurston now also joined the fold. Mason had a forceful and intriguing personality; she insisted that her support be anonymous, but she also insisted that “her” artists literally sit at her feet and address her as “God-mother.” Both Hughes and Hurston seem to have felt genuine affection for Mason (besides being thankful for her financial support), but eventually both also chafed at their dependency. In the meantime, however, Hurston prospered even further thanks in part to Mason’s encouragement. She was able to collect southern black folklore with funding from Mason and other sources; she published widely and often provocatively; she earned a B.A. from Barnard in 1928, the same year she also studied hoodoo in New Orleans; she began working on a lengthy manuscript based on her folklore findings; and in 1929 she not only began planning to write a play with Hughes but also traveled to the Bahamas for further anthropological research. Meanwhile, her relationship with Mason was growing increasingly complex, while her relationship with Hughes was becoming more and more tense because of disagreements about the play (tentatively titled Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life).

By 1931 an open (and permanent) break with Hughes had occurred. Each artist felt betrayed by the other, and Mule Bone was not produced until long after both writers had died. In 1931 Hurston’s support from Mason also suffered a decline, and by that year, too, it had become obvious to everyone that the United States (and indeed the world) was in the grips of the Great Depression, the severe economic downturn that had begun with the stock market crash of October 1929. Just when Hurston was most full of creative energy, then, Americans had the least amount of disposable income ever. If she never made much real money from her writings during the next few years, the depression was largely to blame. The depression also hampered her repeated efforts during the 1930s to stage black-inspired and black-acted theatrical and musical productions; Hurston often had to scrape together the funds to pay actors. Nevertheless, despite her own poverty, she was preoccupied with the idea of theatrical production (in several senses of that term) during this period, and her obsession led her all over the country during this decade, seeking jobs connected with drama and seeking venues for a musical production called From Sun to Sun. Ultimately, though, it was her prose (both fiction and nonfiction) rather than her drama that would win her the most recognition and reward.

In 1933 Hurston published a wonderful story titled “The Gilded Six-Bits” in a national magazine. This story was seen by a number of significant New York publishers, who wrote and asked her to consider submitting a novel. She wrote back to the most prominent publisher, promising to send him something soon, and by spring 1934 her first novel, Jonah’s Gourd Vine, was in print. The publisher also offered her a contract for her folklore book (which appeared as Mules and Men in 1935), and indeed later in 1934 a wealthy Chicago foundation offered to pay her tuition if she decided to pursue a Ph.D. in anthropology at Columbia University. Back in New York, she began her academic work but was more interested in creative writing than in pure scholarly research and publication. The foundation therefore withdrew much of its promised funding, but Hurston, always resourceful, found other sources of support, including a job with the Federal Theatre Project in Harlem and a Guggenheim Fellowship to study the black culture of Jamaica. By this time she had fallen deeply in love with a somewhat mysterious and much younger man (having officially divorced from Sheen in 1931), and it was partly in response to this love affair that she composed her most important novel, Their Eyes Were Watching God, toward the end of 1936. The book was published by fall 1937, receiving mostly positive reviews despite some objections from a few black critics, including her old friend and mentor Alain Locke as well as the rising young author RICHARD WRIGHT. Hurston, meanwhile, continued to support herself through jobs on government-funded writing and editing projects, through brief academic positions, and through the spotty earnings of her various books, including Tell My Horse (1938), which was published in England in 1939 as Voodoo Gods: An Inquiry into Native Myths and Magic in Jamaica and Haiti. Her novel Moses, Man of the Mountain also appeared in 1939, the same year in which Hurston married Albert Price, a much younger man, whom she divorced the following year.

Perhaps the most significant event for Hurston in the early 1940s was the publication of her splendid autobiography, Dust Tracks on the Road, in 1942. During these years she also did further anthropological research, briefly worked in Hollywood, lectured at various black colleges, published essays and articles, taught creative writing, bought and (lived happily on) two different houseboats, received recognition for her award-winning and profitable autobiography, was awarded various honorary degrees, and published a number of highly controversial statements about race and racism in America. Some fellow blacks found her comments too conservative and accommodating, and indeed by this time Hurston had staked out a position for herself to the right of most other black intellectuals. By 1948 her latest novel, Seraph on the Swanee, had been published, but in that year, too, she also suffered perhaps the most devastating event of her life: She was accused (almost certainly falsely, it seems) of child molestation. Unfortunately, the accusations received wide attention in the national black press, and for a time Hurston, depressed and uncertain about how she could possibly prove her innocence, even contemplated suicide. In 1949 the charges were dropped, but significant damage—to Hurston's reputation and to her psyche—had been done. She never really recovered from these events, and although she did continue to write (and sometimes publish an occasional article) throughout the 1950s, she never recaptured her earlier fame. Her weight was increasing; her health was declining; her funds were increasingly meager; and more and more she began to rely on charity. She ended her days living in a small, concrete-block house, using orange crates as a desk and shelves. Her personality was still often lively, but by the end of the 1950s, she was largely a neglected and forgotten figure. When she died on January 28, 1960, in Fort Pierce, Florida, few people noticed or cared. Not until the 1970s was her unmarked grave tracked down (by the rising young African-American writer Alice Walker) and properly honored. In the decades since then, however, Hurston has been fully restored to life thanks to her richly vibrant writings.

“Spunk” (1925)

When the townspeople inform Joe Kanty that Joe's wife, Lena, once again has been seen walking in the streets with her lover, a big and fearless man called Spunk, the reluctant Joe finally decides that he must take action: He approaches Spunk with a drawn razor, but Spunk shoots and kills him and is later acquitted, since the killing is judged an act of self-defense. Although Lena soon moves in with Spunk, Spunk begins to be troubled by various ominous signs: He thinks that a howling black bobcat he has spotted near his house is actually Joe, back from hell to haunt him, and he thinks Joe's spirit has pushed him in the direction of a buzz saw at the sawmill where he works. When Spunk later does in fact fall into the whizzing saw, he blames Joe's spirit again and, before dying, vows to take vengeance when he meets Joe in hell.

This story, one of Hurston's earliest published works, is typical of her writing in many ways. It is set in the small-town rural South; it heavily features African-American characters (in fact, in this work no whites appear at all); it effectively employs the dialect of rural southern blacks; and it explores the complexities of romance, violence, and superstition. In addition, the story makes clear the importance of the local community in the lives of Hurston's characters (another common feature of much of her fiction), and the tale deals with such archetypal figures and themes as the powerful and sexually aggressive male, the unfaithful wife, and the intimidated cuckold; the force of lust, jealousy, and community pressure; and the power of a guilty conscience and poetic justice. In fact, the next-to-last sentence (with its reference to “the funeral baked meats”) has been read as an allusion to Shakespeare's play Hamlet, which deals with many of the same issues and presents many of the same developments of plot. Hurston's story, then, deals with people and actions that have been staples in much great literature of the past, but she gives these standard characters and personalities her own distinctive stamp, thereby creating something fresh and new.

The name of the title character—Spunk—also implies his personality: As a noun, the word suggests mettle, spirit, courage, or pluck, but as a slang term it could also refer to seminal fluid. As a verb, spunk could mean to stand up or assert oneself, or to blaze up in fire or passion. All these meanings seem appropriate to the central figure of Hurston's tale, who initially radiates masculine energy and self-confidence. The fact that he literally rides a log at the sawmill is obviously symbolic, suggesting his phallic potency; the fact that he later loses his self-confidence and becomes, if anything, even more fearful and nervous than the man he has killed is one of the story's great ironies. The story may imply that moral qualms (or perhaps mere superstitions) are finally more potent than physical strength; by the end of the story, Spunk has lost his spunk as well as his life. Meanwhile, the rather amoral community—which had egged on Joe to challenge his rival—are gossiping just as much in the final paragraph as they had been at the beginning of the tale. For them, the conflict between Spunk and Joe has merely been a source of much-needed excitement and even entertainment.

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of this tale is the way Hurston complicates our initial impressions of Joe and Spunk. At first, Joe seems merely cowardly: He challenges Spunk only when he feels pressured by the gossips. Later, however (after Joe has been killed), a character named Walter points out that in some respects Joe had more real courage than Spunk: "Lookit whut he [i.e., Joe] done; took a razor an' went out to fight a man he knowed toted a gun an' wuz a crack shot, too; 'nother thing Joe wuz skeered of Spunk, skeered plumb stiff! But he went jes' the same" (Novels 953). By the end of the tale, it is Spunk who actually seems the more easily frightened of the two men—at least until, in his dying breaths, he vows revenge: "Ah'll git the son-of-a-wood louse soon's Ah get there [i.e., to the after-life] an' make hell too hot for him" (Novels 954). By the concluding sentences of the tale, however, Hurston's focus is not on any imagined afterlife but on the everyday existence of small-town communities, in which people eat, drink, and gossip.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the small-town existence Hurston depicts with the small-town life depicted by THORNTON WILDER in his play Our Town. Consider such matters as race, class, and gender and such techniques as diction, dialect, and tone. How do both works deal with the afterlife? How does each work feature "choral" characters who comment and explain?
2. Discuss this story in relation to EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON's poem "Eros Trannos." How is the title of that poem relevant to both works? How is marriage presented in both texts? What is the role of the community in each work?
3. Trace and discuss the pattern of ironies and foreshadowings Hurston has built into this story. For example, discuss the comment that Spunk "ain't skeered of nuthin' on God's green footstool" or the reference to his skill at the sawmill (Novels 949). How do such ironies contribute to the resonance and complexity of the story?

"Sweat" (1926)

Delia Jones is a hardworking, deeply religious woman who takes in laundry to earn income, while her husband, Sykes, is a crude, abusive philanderer who enjoys tormenting Delia while flagrantly cheating on her with a large rival named Bertha. Knowing Delia's intense fear of reptiles, Sykes one day takes home a rattlesnake in a wire-covered box and leaves it on their porch; Delia is terrified, but Sykes merely laughs. The marriage continues to deteriorate, and one night, when Delia finds the snake in her laundry basket, she flees to the nearby barn; when a drunken Sykes himself stumbles home in the darkness, he is bitten by the snake, and as the tale ends, Sykes glimpses Delia as Delia watches him die.

Here, as in many other works, Hurston deals with relations between black men and women, especially husbands and wives. As in many of her tales, the rural community plays an important part; the other men in the small town cannot understand why Sykes neglects Delia to consort with the hefty Bertha, whom one of them memorably describes as looking like “a hunk uh liver wid hair on it” (Novels 960). As this comment suggests, part of the pleasure of reading this story—as of reading much of Hurston’s fiction—results from her use of vivid imagery, memorable dialogue, and convincing dialect. Meanwhile, Delia Jones (like many of Hurston’s women) is a strong, appealing, resourceful, and stoic character; she stands up to Sykes when she needs to, but in general she prefers not to fight. Despite his abusive treatment of her, she retains her self-respect and thus earns the respect of the community at large. Hurston deals here, as she often does, with elemental emotions, such as sexual desire, sexual jealousy, and the tensions between husbands and wives. Thus the story, although set in a remote and somewhat unfamiliar locale, and although populated with characters whose speech and actions are tinged with a certain degree of “local color,” never seems merely quaint or exotic.

If the story seems faulty in any way, it is perhaps flawed in its depiction of Sykes, who is close to a simple, unidimensional villain. From the moment he enters the tale, he seems sadistic, abusive, and mean; it is difficult to understand why he is as full of hatred (especially for the long-suffering and compliant Delia) as he is. Occasionally Hurston implies that he resents the fact that his wife must wash the clothes of white people; perhaps, then, his mistreatment of her is a way of striking back at whites. In general, however, he displays the kind of “motiveless malignity” that Coleridge once attributed to Shakespeare’s Iago, but unfortunately Sykes does not seem anywhere near as complex a character as Iago is. He is, for the most part, merely an uncomplicated “evildoer,” and it is hard to feel any sympathy for him as the story ends. This is especially true since it seems quite likely that it was Sykes who deliberately placed the snake (a fairly obvious symbol of evil) in Delia’s laundry basket, intending to kill her. Although some critics have suggested that Delia, ironically, takes on some of her husband’s evil personality by the end of the story (since she fails to help him and watches him die), it would be hard to expect her, with her well-known fear of snakes, to enter the rattler-ridden cabin. Besides, the narrator notes that “Delia could not move—her legs were flabby,” and the narrator also reports that despite her inaction, Delia nevertheless does feel a “surge of pity” for Sykes (Novels 966). Delia, in other words, does not seem much more complicated than Sykes himself: He is a fairly simple villain, and she is a fairly simple (and almost completely sympathetic) victim. The story therefore runs the risk of seeming merely melodramatic but is rescued by Hurston’s talent for re-creating convincing, lively speech and by her skill at sustaining suspense. From the moment the snake enters the story, we cannot help but wonder—and worry—about how the tale will conclude. That it concludes with Sykes’s death is a nice (but perhaps too neat) bit of poetic justice.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss this work in relation to the story “Barn Burning,” by WILLIAM FAULKNER. How does Sykes resemble Abner Snopes in personality and behavior (despite their differences in race)? What motivates each man? In what ways is each a complex character? What similarities or differences do you see between Delia and Sarty?
2. Discuss the moral complexity of the characters. Is Sykes nothing but a simple villain? Is Delia nothing but an abused wife? Is Bertha nothing but an unappealing (and unattractive) hussy? In what ways does Hurston give the story ethical and artistic complexity?

“How It Feels to Be Colored Me” (1928)

In this brief autobiographical essay, Hurston announces her pride in her race and her pride in her own personality; using reminiscence, personal narrative, and a healthy dose of humor, she describes how she first realized that she was different from most Americans in her skin complexion, but she insists that she does not feel “tragically colored.” She feels (she says) unhampered by her race in her determination to succeed in life; indeed, her color (and the relatively recent freedom of her people) gives her a challenge that makes life particularly exciting; instead of bemoaning the past, she looks forward to the future, and she says that she would rather be black (with everything to gain) than white (with the constant fear of loss). She does concede that blacks do differ from whites (in their impassioned response to jazz, for instance), but in the final analysis, she thinks of herself as first and foremost Zora, and she cannot comprehend why anyone would deny himself or herself the joy of getting to know her.

This essay exhibits many of the traits that make Hurston such an attractive prose stylist—traits that also, by all accounts, made her a delightful personality and an instant friend to practically all who met her. From the very first sentence of the essay, for instance, she displays the directness, the candor, and the disarming ability to laugh at herself (and at others) that make her writing seem so honest, unpretentious, and trustworthy. She shows a fine flair for paradoxical phrasing (as when she says, “I remember the very day that I became colored”; Folklore 826), and her childhood memories of life in her small (and all-black) Florida town are the sort that immediately make her an appealing figure, partly because of her ability to mock herself without sacrificing her self-respect. She describes, for instance, how whites passing through her town would often give her small gifts of money when she performed amusing antics for them—generosity “which seemed strange to me for I wanted to do them so much that I needed bribing to stop” (Folklore 827). By teasing her earlier self, Hurston makes her present persona all the more attractive and thus makes her current essay all the more winning. It is difficult to imagine being able to justify discrimination against a person who is so obviously articulate, intelligent, wise, and full of life.

Hurston in this essay displays many of the traits any person would wish for in a child, a friend, or himself. She is resourceful, stoic, optimistic, and determined; at one point, for instance, she proclaims, “No, I do not weep at the world—I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife” (Folklore 827). That single sentence epitomizes many of the best traits of her writing, here and elsewhere: It is crisp; it is clear; it is unforgettably vivid in its imagery; it is self-confident without being at all arrogant; it is, in short, an expression of the vitality of the mind and spirit that produced it. Hurston is frank in her ambitions (“The game of keeping what one has is never so exciting as the game of getting”; Folklore 828), but her ambitions are never unattractive, because they are the normal and healthy human ambitions of wanting to make the best of one’s life and talents and leave behind a record in which one can feel a sense of accomplishment. One rarely senses, either in this essay or in most of her other writings, that Hurston is asking for more than she would willingly grant to others; she is merely asking (or, rather, taking for granted) the right to prove herself. Ultimately she sees herself as an individual, and as an individualist: When she is feeling most confident, the “cosmic Zora emerges. I belong to no race nor time,” and she simply cannot imagine how anyone “can deny themselves the pleasure of my company!” (Folklore 829). The frankness of this nonegotistical egotism cannot help but make one smile, laugh, and ultimately like Zora.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this essay with BOOKER T. WASHINGTON’s autobiography Up from Slavery and with RICHARD WRIGHT’s autobiography Black Boy. With which of these other works does Hurston’s essay have most in common? Discuss the tones, attitudes, and credibility of the three works. How do the three writers use humor?
2. Read this essay in conjunction with one of Hurston’s fictional works, such as Their Eyes Were Watching God or Jonah’s Gourd Vine. How are the attitudes expressed in this nonfiction essay reflected in Hurston’s more obviously “creative” writing? Do the main protagonists of her novels seem to share any of the attitudes expressed in the essay? Given the social circumstances of American blacks in Hurston's day, is the essay at all naive or simplistic?

3. Discuss specific instances of Hurston's use of humor in this essay. How, in particular cases, do the touches of humor contribute to the persuasiveness and rhetorical effectiveness of the piece? What does Hurston's humor imply about her attitudes toward herself, others, and life in general? How and why are such attitudes appealing?

"The Gilded Six-Bits" (1933)

Missie May and her husband, Joe, a young black couple living in the rural South, enjoy a happy, playful, sexually fulfilling marriage; they take pleasure in each other's company, and in fact one evening they visit an ice cream parlor newly opened by Otis D. Slemmons, a prosperous black who has recently arrived from the North—a man whom Joe admires for his wealth, his success with women, and even his prominent pot belly. Missie May, however, cannot understand why Joe thinks so highly of Otis, whom she finds much less physically appealing than Joe himself; nevertheless, when Joe returns home early from work one day, he finds Missie May and Slemmons in bed together. Although Joe's first impulse is to laugh, the infidelity opens up a silent chasm between the couple: Missie May feels deeply guilty and Joe largely keeps his distance as well as his own counsel, but eventually the breach is mostly healed when Missie May gives birth to a child who is clearly Joe's.

In this exceptionally fine and complex story, Hurston manages to create an utterly persuasive picture of domestic joy. The opening scenes of Joe and Missie May, which are full of genuine tenderness as well as palpable sexual energy, are among the best ever presented of a happy marriage—a fact that makes the later destruction of that happiness all the more powerful and tragic. Hurston makes Missie May's initial disdain for Slemmons so convincing that readers are just as shocked as Joe is to find his loving wife and Slemmons in bed together. Even more surprising, however, is Joe's response:

"He was assaulted in his weakness. Like Samson awakening after his haircut. So he just opened his mouth and laughed" (Novels 991). Just when we might expect Joe to launch into a vicious, vindictive assault on his wife (he does, after all, beat Slemmons), he merely puts "Slemmons' watch charm in his pants pocket and [takes] a good laugh and [goes] to bed" (Novels 992). Joe, however, is not an implausibly noble saint who merely turns the other cheek; instead, he commits small acts of psychological vengeance, even treating his wife at one point as if she is a whore who has earned her wages of sin. For the most part, though, Joe and Missie May handle the crisis in their marriage with admirable maturity: She shows commendable sorrow, while he shows commendable restraint. Readers miss their evening romps as much as Missie May does, but eventually they do begin having sex again, although even then Joe cannot resist punishing her by leaving Slemmons's gilded coins underneath her pillow the next morning (Novels 994). In this story (unlike in some others by Hurston, such as "Sweat") nothing ever seems simple. Instead, the story is full of rich and complex characterizations—a fact that makes the comment of a white merchant near the end of the tale seem especially ironic: "Wisht I could be like these darkies. Laughin' all the time. Nothin' worries 'em" (Novels 996). The shallowness of this comment is highlighted by the depth of the preceding story—a depth that also lends added ironic dimension to the first words of the text: "It was a Negro yard around a Negro house in a Negro settlement" (Novels 985). These words imply a completely stereotypical setting for a totally predictable tale. In contrast, Hurston gives us something much richer, more knotted, more vivid and vital—a story every bit as complicated as life itself.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with ERNEST HEMINGWAY's story "The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber." In particular, discuss such matters as marital relations, sexual jealousy, male psychology, and moral complexity.
2. How do you explain Missie May's affair and Joe's reaction to it? How are both the affair and his response to it surprising? How, in particular, do you explain Joe's relatively passive reaction? Why does he seem generally willing to forgive his wife? How might a less talented writer have depicted Joe's response?

Jonah's Gourd Vine* (1934)

This novel traces the rise and fall of John Buddy Pearson, a strong and resourceful black youth who is born into poverty in turn-of-the-century Alabama, where he is loved by his mother, Amy; abused by his stepfather, Ned; and respected and admired by a lively community of blacks and even by a local white plantation owner, Alf Pearson, the man from whom he takes his last name and the man who may indeed be his biological father. Much of the novel describes the growing love and gradual courtship of John and a beautiful young girl, named Lucy Potts, whom John finally succeeds in marrying; unfortunately, however, despite his real affection both for Lucy and for their ever-increasing number of children, and despite his new-found prominence as a popular preacher in a thriving Florida church, John engages in one extramarital affair after another—a pattern of behavior that breaks the spirit of the long-suffering Lucy. When Lucy dies, John cannot stop his pattern of womanizing, and this behavior leads to a bad second marriage, a messy divorce, loss of his church, and a plunge into poverty, until he is rescued by his marriage to the prosperous and affectionate Sally Lovelace—a marriage, however, that still does not prevent him from lapsing into his old ways just before his untimely end.

This remarkably well-written first novel was composed in just a few months in response to the invitation of a publisher who had been impressed by Hurston's story "The Gilded Six-Bits." As is that story and much of Hurston's other fiction, the novel is set in the rural and small-town South and paints a convincing picture of numerous aspects of African-American life, including the joys and tensions of communal existence, the pleasures and frustrations of relations between the sexes (especially in marriage), and the complex interplay between blacks and whites. Whites, however, tend to be mostly a marginal presence in this book (as in much of Hurston's work); her chief interest is in the lives, loves, hopes, worries, happiness, and disappointments of the people she knew so well, and indeed this particular novel is loosely based on the life of her own father. In fact, a character named Isis, closely resembling the young Hurston herself, also appears in the book. One need not know this autobiographical background, however, to appreciate the riches of this novel—riches that include exceptionally vivid use of dialogue, imagery, folklore, and African-American dialect. Hurston makes it possible for readers to feel, taste, smell, see, and above all hear what it was like to live as a poor southern black in the early decades of the 20th century, and some of the impressions she creates in this work are indelible.

The novel begins, for instance, with a memorable description of the "grumbling" thunder of an approaching storm—a sound that leads Amy, John Buddy's mother, to remark of God that "Ole Massa gwinter scrub floors tuhday" (Novels 3). The remark is typical of dialogue in this novel in many ways. It alludes, for instance, to the long history of slavery that continued to shape African-American thinking well after the official end of that practice. It also reveals the tendency in black folk culture to describe nearly everything (even the weather) in anthropomorphic terms. Thus, God is not simply an abstract force or even a mystical personality; he is a powerful and unpredictable "Ole Massa." At the same time, however, the imagery is typically homespun, mundane, and unpretentious: Thunder means that God is scrubbing floors, not that he is engaging in any grand, awesome, or incomprehensible conduct. God, then, is distant and powerful, but in his actions, feelings, and thoughts, he is also kin to the people he has created, and indeed in the folk world Hurston describes, practically everything seems vital, alive, familiar, and approachable. God scrubs floors just as everyone else does, and when he speaks, he speaks in the same kind of dialect as Amy herself.

That dialect is one of the most appealing aspects of the novel. By lovingly reporting and recording it, Hurston performs a role that T. S. ELIOT considered one of the most important any poet could discharge: She keeps the language fresh and alive, revivifying and renewing it (and doing so, in this case, by returning it to its roots). Examples of Hurston's skill in re-creating the actual speech of the people she describes are too numerous to mention; memorable phrasing occurs in practically every paragraph of the novel, especially in its first two-thirds. At one point, for instance, when Amy reproaches her husband (John Buddy's stepfather) for constantly criticizing the boy's mixed racial heritage, she accuses him of "always washin' his face wid his color" (Novels 4), and later the stepfather himself uses memorable phrasing when he tells Amy to "git dat punkin-colored bastard outa dis house" (Novels 10). As both of these examples will attest, Hurston pulls no punches in honestly reporting even the least attractive aspects of life among her characters (including a good deal of intraracial prejudice, as well as a good deal of violence, especially against women), but the important point is that her language is almost always equal to whatever task she sets for herself. She rarely hits a false note, and she can convincingly re-create the speech both of upper-class whites and of lower-class blacks, just as she can use standard English every bit as effectively as dialect. It is the dialect, however, that makes this novel live. We hear it, for instance, in various examples of folk poetry (such as "See yuh later, and tell yuh straighter"; Novels 16); we hear it in folk sayings (such as "Ah'll betcher Alabama wid uh fence 'round it"; Novels 24); we hear it in the vivid imagery of common (and comic) phrasing (as when Lucy tells John, "Hug me till mah dress fit tight"; Novels 47); and we hear it in the colorful syntax, or sentence structure (as when John's brother asks him, "Where at de bread is?"; Novels 56). Again and again, Hurston makes these characters live through the words they use; speech and characterization are at least as important to this novel as plot, and readers turn its pages in eager anticipation of the next bit of vivid phrasing Hurston will employ.

Further examples of Hurston's lively language include her use of invented words (such as shickalacked, to describe the sound of a moving train; Novels 16); her skill at characterization (as when she says, "The teacher was a stodgy middle-aged man who prided himself on his frowns"; Novels 25); her effective use of fragments (as when she describes a school ceremony as follows: "Opening prayer. Song. Speech by white superintendent. Speeches rattled off like beans poured into a tin can"; Novels 35); her striking skill with metaphors (as when she notes that "the things left unsaid laid a steamy blanket over talk"; Novels 41); and her splendid sense of comedy (as when Lucy, wanting John to stay as long as possible at her parents' house for supper, "cut peas in two and split grains of rice" while they are eating; Novels 60). Hurston enters the minds of men as well as women; she conveys the thoughts and emotions of the young as well as the old; she reports the latest cultural developments (such as the mass migrations of blacks to the North touched off by World War I), but she also deals with ancient, enduring facts of life (such as sexual maturation, tensions between parents and children, and the complexities of marriage). The book is full of wisdom and comedy, pleasure and pain, happiness and regret. John achieves his goal of marrying a good, beautiful, and supportive young woman, and then he unaccountably destroys the life he has made for himself. In one sense his behavior seems inexplicable; in another sense it seems all too familiar. Hurston's novel is one more variation on the ancient theme of "paradise lost": John works to achieve and then ruins his achievement. Yet Hurston offers no simple morality tale; like Lucy, she is tolerant of John's misjudgments because she appreciates his many strengths.

Lucy is one of Hurston's most memorable creations, and the book loses much of its appeal when she dies two-thirds of the way into the novel. John himself is most interesting when he is courting and living with Lucy, and, after she passes, the novel weakens: The language becomes less lively, the plot seems rushed, and the characterization seems less rich than before. Hattie (John's new wife) is unappealing but is treated too obviously as a mere villain, while the saintly Sally not only seems too good to be true but (more important) is introduced and depicted so quickly that we never get to know her well enough to be greatly interested. John's behavior, meanwhile, is much harder to understand in the last third of the novel than it was earlier, nor does Hurston make much effort to explain it. The church members who scheme against him are almost cartoonish, and the rival preacher they bring in to challenge John seems too inept to be a credible contestant. It is as if Hurston herself lost much of her own earlier interest in the book when Lucy (the character modeled closely on her own mother) departed from it, but to say this is not to imply that the novel fails. It simply becomes less good in its final third than earlier, but the first two thirds of the book is impressively strong and refreshing.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Hurston's book with W. E. B. DuBois's novel The Quest of the Silver Fleece. Discuss the works in terms of characterization, diction, use of dialogue, and plot. Which novel seems to have a more explicit political purpose? Which is more effective as a work of art?
2. Read Hurston's novel alongside CLAUDE MCKAY's book Home to Harlem. Discuss the works in terms of their settings, their use of dialect, their depictions of race relations, and their conclusions. How are the main male characters alike and/or different?
3. Discuss the moral codes this novel seems to imply or take for granted. What kinds of attitudes and behavior (if any) does the novel seem to endorse? What kinds of attitudes and behavior (if any) does it seem to censure? Which characters seem most—and least—admirable, and why? How does Hurston complicate her presentation of her characters, so that they do not seem merely superficial or stereotypical?

Mules and Men (1935)

In this innovative anthropological report on African-American folklore, Hurston herself becomes a character and narrator as she returns to her hometown in Florida (and journeys to New Orleans) to collect and record the stories, sayings, jokes, songs, and customs of southern blacks, including “hoo-doo” practices in Louisiana.

Now considered a classic of American anthropology, Mules and Men was (and remains) a path-breaking book, not only because of its content but especially because of its methods and style. Previous students of African-American folklore had often been white outsiders who never succeeded in truly penetrating the depths of the culture they had been sent to study. They faced polite reticence from blacks, who distrusted their questions and their motives. As Hurston herself remarks in describing the response of her fellow blacks to the typical folklore researcher, “We smile and tell him or her something that satisfies the white person because, knowing so little about us, he doesn't know what he is missing. The Indian resists curiosity with a stony silence. The Negro offers a feather-bed resistance. That is, we let the probe enter, but it never comes out. It gets smothered under a lot of laughter and pleasantries” (Folklore 10). As this passage illustrates, Mules and Men is another of Hurston's typically well-written books: The language is clear, precise, and vivid. She gives to her scientific task all the gifts of a talented prose stylist, and indeed the book is valuable not only for the numerous tales and sayings it reports but also for the vivid narrative (and often dramatic) style in which the reports are offered. Mules and Men reads as a good piece of fiction rather than a dry anthropological report; both the narrator and the characters come alive as distinct personalities, so that Hurston does not simply describe a culture from the outside but instead re-creates it from within. She does not merely record tales; instead she shows how the tales arise from, and function within, the culture that gives them birth. She writes as a trusted “insider” and even as a participant in many of the events she describes, and just as she quickly wins the trust of her black southern subjects, so she soon establishes the same bond of trust with her readers. It is easy to understand why her subjects “opened up” to her, since the personality she presents in this book is so obviously appealing and inviting.

The success of the book derives, however, not only from its manner but from its matter. The stories, events, and practices that Hurston describes are almost invariably interesting (and entertaining) in and of themselves. Often the stories are funny; often they are charming; frequently they are wise. Many of the tales are extended jokes, as in the story about the slave owner who told a judge that he owned a black who smelled worse than a goat. The judge, curious to see whether this was true, first asked the man to bring in the goat, which smelled so bad that the judge fainted. After the judge was revived, the black was brought in, who smelled so bad that the goat fainted (Folklore 82). Hurston reports such stories (using language that would be considered highly racist today, at least if used by a white person) without apology or defensiveness; she obviously delights in all the facets of her people's complex culture. Her book suggests the ways African Americans used humor to cope with a history and lives that were often full of pain. The book reveals a rich, vibrant culture (full of friendship, comedy, imagination, and inventiveness) existing outside the awareness of most white Americans; it makes that culture accessible to everyone and thus helps promote a richer national heritage for all.

Although Mules and Men obviously reflects the experiences of a particular subset of the human population, it also deals with many of the most common and widespread of human concerns, such as relations between the sexes, relations between the young and the old, relations between different cultures, relations between man and nature, tensions within communities, and relations between humans and the supernatural or divine. Indeed, one reason the book is so interesting is that it presents the responses of one specific culture to these broad concerns. The book allows readers to compare and contrast the responses of African-American culture to these timeless preoccupations with the responses of other cultural traditions. Doing so not only provides a better appreciation of the distinctiveness of the black American heritage but also offers a fuller sense of cross-cultural similarities. The fact that readers of all sorts can find the book's jokes amusing, its fables charming, and its insights wise suggests that Hurston has done something more than describe the legends and lore of one particular culture; apparently, by doing so, she has also tapped into some deeper truths of human nature. On the one hand, her book is an introduction to a wide variety of forms of African-American discourse (including prayers, sermons, fables, jokes, poetry, and the forms of everyday conversation); on the other hand, the work also speaks to something broader and more universal. Reading the book is like getting to know more deeply a branch of one's family that had never before seemed so familiar.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Mules and Men alongside W. E. B. DuBois's pathbreaking sociological treatise The Philadelphia Negro. How are the two works similar and/or different in their purposes, procedures, methods, and styles? What are the advantages and possible disadvantages of the distinctive approaches used in each book? What kind of picture emerges of African-American culture in each book? What similarities and/or differences are there between the urban culture described by DuBois and the mainly rural culture depicted by Hurston?
2. Compare and contrast the southern black culture described by Hurston with the kind of culture depicted in Richard Wright's autobiography Black Boy. How do the two works complement one another? How are they similar and/or different in style, substance, purpose, tone, and attitude? How do the differences between the two works reflect and/or help explain the tensions that existed between Wright and Hurston?
3. Read this work as if it were (as it partly is) an autobiographical portrait. How does Hurston present her own personality and character? What consistencies emerge in her comments about herself? What attitudes does she display? What kind of coherent picture emerges of Hurston the individual?

Their Eyes Were Watching God* (1937)

Janie Crawford is an adolescent African-American girl being raised by her grandmother, Nanny, in impoverished conditions in the rural South; when Nanny (who has suffered in the distant past from sexual abuse herself) realizes that Janie is reaching sexual maturity, she quickly marries the girl off to a much older man named Logan Kendricks—a relatively prosperous black farmer but a man in whom Janie herself has no real interest. Thus, when a younger, more attractive, more articulate, and more ambitious black man named Joe Starks comes along, he has little trouble persuading Janie to run off, marry him, and help him build a prosperous business in a newly founded all-black town, where he quickly becomes the mayor and leading citizen, but where he also (eventually) begins to treat Janie more as a workhorse than as a beloved wife. After Starks dies, the now-wealthy Janie meets a lively, attractive, much younger black man nicknamed Tea Cake, with whom she falls into passionate love and with whom she lives a happy life farming in the Everglades—until a natural disaster leads to a tragic conclusion to their previously joyous relationship.

This novel is generally considered not only Hurston's best but also one of the finest novels by any African-American writer. Its emphasis on the growth of an increasingly independent and self-assertive female spirit—especially a spirit faced with various kinds of male oppression—has made the book a favorite of feminists, while its focus on both the discrimination suffered by blacks and their resilience in the face of racist conditions has made it a popular work among people of color. Some black males, however, have objected to the novel's depictions of the abusive husbands (even the normally charming Tea Cake sometimes beats Janie), while some African-American political activists have suggested that the novel underemphasizes the destructive impact of white racism and lacks the kind of liberating political force it could have had. Hurston, however, could plausibly reply that Their Eyes does possess a more obviously political dimension than her first novel (Jonah's Gourd Vine), and she could also claim that although violence by black males against black women is a feature of both novels, the main character of Their Eyes is less a passive victim than had been true in the earlier book. Janie, in fact, seems to embody many of the best traits of the young Lucy, who had been only a secondary (but highly appealing) character in Jonah's Gourd

Vine, but Janie also epitomizes many strengths and virtues that Lucy lacked. By the end of the novel Janie has become the kind of character seldom featured in previous fiction in the United States (or anywhere else, for that matter): a woman of color who is not merely (or even mainly) a tragic victim but who has lived a rich, full, and complex life and has also learned and grown in the process.

Hurston's second novel features many of the same traits that make much of her fiction attractive. She is adept at characterization; she employs dialogue effectively; she uses humor to offset and intensify sadness; she is psychologically insightful; she shows an unsurpassed skill in rendering the black dialect of the rural South; she takes readers inside the internal workings of small black communities; she draws on the resources of folklore and folk culture while also offering a credible depiction of modern life; and she depicts settings (especially natural settings) in ways that are both convincingly realistic and highly evocative. Their Eyes is richer in self-conscious symbolism than Jonah's Gourd Vine; it begins, for instance, with a highly lyrical passage comparing human existence to a vision of ships at sea; it uses imagery of a flowering pear tree to suggest Janie's sexual awakening; and its later depiction of a destructive hurricane makes the storm seem almost apocalyptically powerful. Above all, however, the novel is alive with the kind of vivid phrasing that is "poetic" in all the best senses of that term: It is fresh, crisp, suggestive, and precise. Repeatedly Hurston uses language that leaves a memorable impression. When Janie first appears, for instance, her nosy neighbors are so transfixed that "nobody moved, nobody spoke, nobody even thought to swallow spit" (Novels 176). Anyone might have written the first two phrases, but only Hurston (or someone with a comparable imagination) could have conceived the third. Later, when Joe Starks enters the novel, he is deftly characterized as a man "who walked like he knew where he was going" (Novels 196), and thus Hurston, in fewer than 10 simple words, efficiently conveys the essence of his personality. A little later he is described (with effective alliteration and wordplay) as someone who "spoke for change and chance" (Novels 197), and later still another character threatens to kill someone "cemetery dead" (Novels 235). It would be easy to compile a long list of examples of Hurston's language that sticks in the mind and rolls off the tongue. Her writing is essentially an oral art, based on long years of listening closely to the way words are actually spoken by street-corner poets and front-porch raconteurs.

The structure of the book is straightforward: It opens in the present, when Janie mysteriously returns to town after a long absence, thus provoking not only curiosity in her gossipy neighbors but also suspense in Hurston's readers: Both the neighbors and the readers want to know what Janie has been up to and why she has returned. The story then deals, in turn, with three significant deaths (those of Nanny, Joe, and Tea Cake) and with three distinctive kinds of husbands (an old man, a less-old man, and then a man much younger than Janie). Each husband is a symbolic figure: Killicks is a relatively prosperous farmer who represents the traditional rural economy; Starks eventually becomes an even wealthier symbol of the rising merchant class; while Tea Cake is a relatively poor but almost entirely carefree symbol of vibrant, youthful masculinity; he is associated with nature, with music, with sexuality, with life—a fact that makes his sudden, violent death, and its even more tragic circumstances, all the more powerfully ironic. He is the only husband Janie actually chooses for herself, and although he sometimes beats her (when he submits to traditional notions of masculine power and authority), for the most part their relationship is one of healthy mutual respect and affection. As in Jonah's Gourd Vine, Hurston here shows a splendid ability to depict the true joys (both physical and emotional) of genuine love in a good marriage. Yet the book is rarely, if ever, saccharine or sentimental. In its tone as in almost every other respect, it is a remarkably well-balanced book: It is complex but comprehensible. Even in dealing with men and with whites it seems to have no special ax to grind; its focus is more on explaining Janie's growth and development than on indicting other characters. Hurston obviously sympathizes with Janie, but not to the point of lacking objectivity; few (if any) of the characters are presented either as simple villains or as simple saints.

Janie's grandmother, for instance, might easily have been depicted as a merely villainous character; after all, she thwarts Janie's youthful romantic dreams, forces her to marry a man she does not love, and even slaps her face when Janie resists (Novels 186). Yet it is obvious that the grandmother also loves the girl and wants to protect her from harm, and it is equally obvious that her protectiveness is rooted in painful recollections of her own hard life. Thus she tells Janie, "De nigger woman is de mule uh de world so fur as Ah can see. Ah been prayin' fuh it tuh be different wid you. Lawd, Lawd, Lawd!" (Novels 186). Later she memorably explains herself by telling Janie, "Ah can't die easy thinkin' maybe de menfolks white or black is makin' a spit cup outa you: Have some sympathy fuh me. Put me down easy, Janie, Ah'm a cracked plate" (Novels 190). In depicting the grandmother, as in presenting most of the other characters, Hurston reveals a good deal of charity and generally avoids sarcastic caricature. She puts her people in their places—not in the sense of standing over them in judgment, but in the sense of situating them in complex settings and circumstances that help us understand their tangled motives and complicated behavior. It is easy, for instance, to sympathize both with Janie and with her first husband when Janie explains to her grandmother why she finds the man physically repulsive: "Ah hates de way his head is so long one way and so flat on de sides and dat pone uh fat back uh his neck." And when her grandmother replies, sensibly enough, that the husband cannot be held responsible for his appearance because he "never made his own head," we can nevertheless laugh at Janie's sharp reply: "Ah don't keer who made it, Ah don't like the job" (Novels 193). In exchanges such as this one, Hurston reveals the illogic often found in human responses while presenting them sympathetically, and she also catches the real rhythms of the ways people actually think and speak.

If the book does have a villain, it may be Joe (or "Jody") Starks, Janie's second husband. The irony, of course, is that he is the man Janie herself selects as a way of escaping from her loveless first marriage, and although their own union quickly deteriorates as Starks becomes more and more taken with his own power, authority, and prosperity, they stay married for many years. As he eventually lies on his deathbed, Janie rebukes him with all her pent-up frustration over years of abusive treatment, but even at this moment, she is able to see him with some balance and perspective: “Listen, Jody, you ain’t de Jody ah run off down de road wid. You’s whut’s left after he died. Ah run off tuh keep house wid you in uh wonderful way. But you wasn’t satisfied wid me de way Ah was. Naw! Mah own mind had tuh be squeezed and crowded out tuh make room for yours in me” (Novels 244). The pathos of this scene derives from the fact that Janie’s anger is fueled by her sense of lost love: She is bitter at Starks because she so clearly remembers the man he once was and because she so strongly regrets the ways he has squandered the opportunities for real happiness they might have shared. Her treatment of him as he is dying is cruel from one perspective but perfectly understandable from another, and when he finally does die, Hurston writes that Janie “was full of pity for the first time in years. Jody had been hard on her and others, but life had mishandled him too. Poor Joel!” (Novels 245). The complexity of Janie’s emotions here is a sign of her psychological maturity, as it is of Hurston’s insightful and balanced characterization.

Finally, just as Hurston resists demonizing either Janie’s grandmother or her first two husbands, so she also resists turning Tea Cake into an entirely implausible saint. Yes, he is charming, handsome, sexually potent, and even musically talented, but he can also be dishonest (as when he steals Janie’s money soon after they run off together, although he quickly wins it back by gambling), and he also beats her at one point—if only to prove his authority to others (Novels 294). Oddly enough, Janie’s response to this beating is not reported, but we know from elsewhere in the book that she can fight back when she feels the impulse, as when she and Tea Cake battle each other over his apparent attraction to another woman:

They wrestled on until they were doped with their own fumes and emanations; till their clothes had been torn away; till he hurled her to the floor and held her there melting her resistance with the heat of his body, doing things with their bodies to express the inexpressible; kissed her until she arched her body to meet him and they fell asleep in sweet exhaustion. (Novels 287)

It is a typically complex passage, as complicated in its sentence structure as in the actions it describes; it is full of violence and affection, resistance and attraction, power and love. It mixes activity and passivity, anger and lust: In some ways the action seems a rape and in some ways it seems a mutually satisfying expression of shared desire. It is a passage, in other words, that exemplifies the kind of complications that make Hurston’s novel as a whole so compelling and provocative.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How does Janie resemble and/or differ from Melanctha in the second section of GERTRUDE STEIN’s work Three Lives? Discuss these characters in terms of their motives, their behavior, their romantic involvements, their styles of speech, and their ultimate fates.
2. THEODORE DREISER’s novel Sister Carrie also deals with a young woman’s maturation and romantic involvements. How do the two novels compare and contrast in setting, style, characterization, and plot? How do such issues as race and class affect the works? What motives drive the two main characters? How do the endings of the novels reflect the values of the heroines?
3. How does Hurston’s novel compare and contrast with Richard Wright’s Native Son? Consider such matters as the protagonists, the plots, the settings, the outcomes, and the implied purposes of the two books. How are men and women presented in the two novels? How important is race in each work?
4. Read Hurston’s book alongside Nella Larsen’s novel Quicksand. How are the heroines comparable and/or different, especially in their backgrounds, their basic attitudes, their involvements

9. Discuss the ethical or moral dimensions of one or more of Hurston's works. What kinds of ethical ideal(s) seem to be implied by the work? What does Hurston seem to suggest about the ways people should treat one another, and why? How does Hurston present characters in morally complex ways (that is, as combinations of good and bad rather than as all good or all bad)? How does moral complexity contribute to the artistic effectiveness of a novel or story? How does a simplistic approach to moral issues detract from the artistic impact of a work?
10. Examine one of Hurston's lesser-known works (such as one of her less-known short stories) and discuss the work in detail. Does it deserve to be more widely recognized? If so, why? If not, why not? What are its strengths and weaknesses? How is it typical or atypical of Hurston's writing?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Zora Neale Hurston. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.
- , ed. Zora Neale Hurston. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.
- , ed. Zora Neale Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1999.
- Boyd, Valerie. Wrapped in Rainbows: The Life of Zora Neale Hurston. New York: Scribner, 2003.
- Campbell, Josie P. Student Companion to Zora Neale Hurston. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., and K. A. Appiah, eds. Zora Neale Hurston: Critical Perspectives Past and Present. New York: Amistad, 1993.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Folklore, Memoirs, and Other Writings. Edited by Cheryl A. Wall. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- . Novels and Stories. Edited by Cheryl A. Wall. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- Newson, Adele S. Zora Neale Hurston: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987.
- Wall, Cheryl A. "Chronology." In Novels and Stories. By Zora Neale Hurston. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- Zora Neale Hurston. Available online. URL: <http://www.zoranealehurston.com>. Accessed April 7, 2009.

Robert C. Evans

NELLA LARSEN (1891–1964)

[S]urely it is more interesting to belong to one's own time, to share its peculiar vision, catch that flying glimpse of the panorama which no subsequent generation can ever recover.

(letter to Carl Van Vechten, qtd. in Wall 93)

Nella Larsen has always been, and remains, one of the most mysterious figures in the famous Harlem Renaissance, the brief but effervescent outpouring of creative writing by African Americans in the 1920s that centered around the Harlem neighborhood of New York City. Larsen is remembered, on the strength of two surviving books, as one of the best novelists of the movement, but her personal life has always been somewhat obscure, and in her final decades she virtually vanished from the literary scene. Fortunately, the publication of George Hutchinson's massive biography of Larsen in 2006 has answered many lingering questions and cleared up much previous confusion, and any student of Larsen's life is necessarily indebted to Hutchinson's research and should begin by studying his huge and impressively detailed volume.

According to her birth certificate, Larsen was born as Nellie Walker in Chicago on April 13, 1891, the daughter of a white Danish immigrant named Mary Hansen and of Peter Walker, an immigrant from the Danish West Indies whose own parentage was racially mixed: Walker's father was probably a West Indian white man who had impregnated a black mistress. Although Walker (a cook) had a reasonably good job for a "colored" man in the racially prejudiced United States of the 1890s, at the time of Nellie's birth he and Mary (whom he apparently married in 1890) lived in an especially unappealing area of Chicago. Unfortunately, Peter Walker either died (as Larsen herself believed) or disappeared from Nellie's young life for some other reason; Nellie's mother soon became involved with (and probably married to) a white Danish immigrant named Peter Larsen, and in July 1892 Nellie's white half sister, Anna, was born. Claims that "Peter Larsen" was really "Peter Walker" passing as a white man have been effectively refuted by Hutchinson (24); in this case, as in many others, Nella Larsen's own accounts of her life seem more trustworthy than those of some later biographers.

Nella's childhood and adolescence cannot have been easy, not only because she experienced racial discrimination but also because her parents were never prosperous. There is some reason to think that her white stepfather found her something of an embarrassment (at one point he apparently failed to report her existence to a census taker), but, on the other hand, there is good reason to believe that she was much loved by her mother. For one thing, her mother took both Nella and Anna with her on a return visit to Denmark when both girls were quite young, and when they returned to Chicago in 1898, Nella was enrolled in school and in fact eventually received a better education than Anna. Hutchinson argues that Nella's mother realized that her racially mixed child would face greater challenges than her white daughter and so made an extra effort to ensure that Nella would be as well prepared as possible for her future. The available evidence suggests that young Nella was a particularly bright child; she was able to skip various grade levels, and when she entered a largely white high school in 1905, she was one of a very small minority of Chicagoans of any race able to avail themselves of a high school education. Her half sister never had this opportunity; nor did she go to college (as Nella did). Through her own gifts and efforts and through the extra income provided by her mother's work as a dressmaker, Nella thus became a well-educated and highly articulate young woman, but in the America of her era all her talents were less important than the simple fact of her race. Chicago was becoming increasingly racially segregated during Larsen's youth, and she must have realized that life for her parents and sister would have been easier (or at least less awkward) if she were not a member of the family. Hutchinson convincingly argues that this early recognition of her difference shaped Larsen's psychology for the rest of her life.

Larsen's awareness of racial discrimination would have increased vastly when she enrolled at Fisk University, a traditionally black college in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1907. Suddenly she was living in the South, where legal and de facto segregation was a pervasive fact of life; she and her mother, for instance, could not have sat beside each other on public transportation (Hutchinson 53). Nashville had a much higher proportion of African-American citizens than did Chicago, and Fisk itself (at least in its student body) was entirely black. Larsen's time there did not last long, however, for in June 1908 she was one of nearly a dozen students who were expelled from the university, apparently for objecting to its rigid dress codes and other restrictions on student conduct. The self-assertiveness that would increasingly become a feature of Larsen's character had now begun to manifest itself, but if her expulsion from Fisk was a disappointment to her mother, it provided an opportunity of sorts for Nella, for during the next four years (except for a brief return trip to the United States) she was able to live with relatives in Denmark, where racial prejudice was much less common than in America and where she seems to have been cordially received. Although some biographers have questioned Larsen's claims about this sojourn in Denmark, Hutchinson argues persuasively that (once again) Larsen's own accounts can be trusted. This extended stay abroad, especially since it occurred during the crucial years of her late teens and early twenties, helped radically to shape her sense of herself as a cosmopolitan outsider—familiar with many different nations, cultures, classes, and ethnicities, but not entirely “at home” in any. Larsen and her family may even have assumed for a time that she would live permanently in Denmark, and perhaps it was this assumption that helped account for the fact that she was not reported as being a member of her family's Chicago household in the 1910 census.

In any case, Larsen was back in the United States in 1912 and had soon enrolled in a nursing school in New York, where she received rigorous training and where (as before and later) she excelled in her work. In January 1915 she graduated as one of the top nurses in the program and quickly found employment as head nurse at the Tuskegee Institute, perhaps the most famous black college in the world at that time. At Tuskegee, however, she was expected to work long and punishing hours (especially as a result of an epidemic of grippe that hit the school during the winter season), and she was also expected to conform to a rigid code of conduct—a code Larsen soon found oppressive and exploitive, and one with which she quickly became disenchanted. Resigning from her position in fall 1916, she eventually returned to New York, began teaching at her old nursing school, and earned certification in the rapidly developing and increasingly important field of civil service nursing. In the early summer 1918 she began working for the Bureau of Preventable Diseases, earning impressive pay raises and taking a leading role in helping to combat the infamous epidemic of Spanish flu that spread throughout the globe that year—one of the most deadly epidemics in world history. Larsen had a real talent for nursing and a passionate commitment to it, and these facts would stand her in good stead when her later literary career suddenly collapsed. For the time being, she remained a nurse until 1921, by which time her salary had increased substantially.

On May 3, 1919, however, she had married Elmer Imes, a black man who not only was a member of a noted and well-connected family, but also had the distinction of being only the second African American in U.S. history to earn a Ph.D. in physics (Hutchinson 124). Elmer and Nella soon became active in the social and cultural life of Harlem, and Nella in particular became involved with a local library and began to consider becoming a writer. Resigning her position as a nurse, she became a librarian and then enrolled in library school—one of the first blacks in the country to do so. Once again she quickly distinguished herself, especially in her performance on the job, and pay raises and promotions rapidly followed. By the mid-1920s, however, she was as much interested in writing books herself as in tending to books written by others, and her growing connections with other black intellectuals and writers, as well as the increasing interest taken in her by such white literati as Carl Van Vechten (author of the famous novel Nigger Heaven) helped encourage her ambitions. Interest in black literature, music, dance, and art was at a high point during this period; whites visited Harlem to take part in its active social life, which centered around nightclubs and jazz. Larsen's first published work of fiction, a story titled "The Wrong Man," appeared in print in January 1926, followed in April by another, titled "Freedom." In was in early 1928, however, that her first novel, Quicksand, appeared. Partly autobiographical in theme and plot, this novel won Larsen wide acclaim, and by the end of the year she had already finished a second novel, titled Passing, which some readers considered even better than her first. Despite her growing professional success, however, her marriage had begun to fail—a fact reflected in the plot of Passing.

Although charges (probably accurate) that Larsen had deliberately plagiarized a story called "Sanctuary" damaged her reputation in 1930, she had nevertheless begun working on a new novel, and in the spring of that year she learned that she had been selected to receive a highly prestigious Guggenheim Fellowship, which would allow her to travel to Europe to work on her new book. The fellowship occurred at a welcome time, since Larsen could now confront Elmer with her knowledge of his affair with a white woman who worked at Fisk University, where he had recently become a high-paid professor. Although their marriage did not end immediately (since the wrong kind of scandal would have cost not only Elmer his job but Nella any chance of adequate alimony), her time in Spain and France, which began in fall 1930, gave her an opportunity to work on her book, gather her thoughts, and perhaps (or so Hutchinson suggests [372]) conduct an affair of her own with a young white man. Her third novel, however, pleased neither Larsen nor her publishers, and the book never did appear in print. Adding to her disappointment was the fact that she was expected, upon her return to the United States, to move from New York to Nashville to take up residence as the faculty wife of her adulterous husband. Although she did indeed move to Fisk, she was quite unhappy there—a feeling exacerbated by the fact that many blacks on campus sympathized with Elmer. During her time in Nashville she apparently suffered (or took) a fall—an incident that some have interpreted as either a real or phony suicide attempt. In any case, by the end of August 1933 she was granted a divorce (with ample alimony) on grounds of Elmer's alleged cruelty. The alimony payments, which continued until Elmer's death in 1941, gave her a measure of financial security during the depths of the Great Depression.

By the mid-1930s Larsen had begun to withdraw from many of her previously closest friends, and by the late 1930s she had broken with most of her former acquaintances. Few of them had any idea where she now lived or how to contact her. The breakdown of her marriage (which had been publicized in the press) had demoralized her, while the failure of her third novel must also have been depressing. Hutchinson suggests that she may have become dependent on drugs and/or alcohol in the final decades of her life (450, 469–471), and perhaps by pulling away from her former friends she sought to hide this or other problems. The alimony payments from Elmer allowed her a certain degree of economic freedom, but in the years immediately following Elmer's death on September 11, 1941, Larsen became a bit more accessible, although she maintained her distance from most of her old associates. Early in 1944 she began working as a nurse at Gouverneur Hospital in New York, and, as in the past, she quickly won promotions and raises. By 1947 she had become chief nurse and night supervisor, and throughout the 1950s she worked diligently, earning the respect of numerous colleagues. Even when she was assaulted and robbed in early 1960 while on her way to her job, she nevertheless proceeded to work, but she seems to have lived a largely isolated life, keeping to herself and breaking with friends when (for whatever reasons) they disappointed her. In September 1963 she was forced to retire because she had worked beyond the legal age limit, and in late March 1964 she was found dead in her apartment, apparently of a heart attack. The woman who had once found fame as a leading light of the Harlem Renaissance died, alone and lonely, obscure and largely forgotten.

Quicksand (1928)

Helga Crane, the young, talented, well-dressed, and well-educated daughter of a white mother and black father, finds herself unhappily employed at Naxos, an all-black college in the South, but she soon quits her job, returns to her hometown of Chicago, makes her way (with the support of a wealthy black patroness) to New York City, and there becomes involved with a group of comfortable, sophisticated blacks living in Harlem, the center of African-American cultural and social life in the United States during the 1920s. Eventually, though, after she grows disenchanted with her circle of black friends, she moves to Denmark (her mother's home country) for several years, but she soon becomes frustrated with the patronizing, calculating attitude of the Danes (who find her merely exotic), and so she yearns to go back to the United States. After her return and after some romantic disappointments, she impulsively marries an unkempt, exploitative black preacher, who moves her to Alabama, where she lives in poverty, remains constantly pregnant, gives birth to several children, nearly dies in childbirth, and ends the novel depressed, disillusioned, and pregnant with a fifth child.

Larsen's first novel, which is obviously autobiographical to a great degree, opens with a poetic epigraph by LANGSTON HUGHES (another significant writer of the Harlem Renaissance) that already implies several of the book's main themes. The epigraph's first line ("My old man died in a fine big house") foreshadows the novel's sometimes satiric depictions of upper-class life among both blacks and whites; meanwhile, the second line ("My ma died in a shack") anticipates the grim ending of the book, which describes the continually pregnant protagonist suffering in rural poverty. Meanwhile, the epigraph's final two lines ("I wonder where I'm gonna die / Being neither white nor black?") announces the novel's central concern with racial division, racial tension, and personal alienation. Helga Crane is "neither white nor black" not only because she is racially mixed by birth but also because she feels fully at home in none of the cultures she tries to inhabit. She is rootless, bitter, and constantly on the move; her dissatisfaction with one place and one circumstance after another generates much of the forward movement of the plot and most of the shifts from one symbolic location to another. As she moves from Alabama to Chicago to New York to Denmark and then ultimately back to Alabama, she tries out not only a series of possible homes but also a series of potential identities, finding fulfillment or happiness in none of them. The book is partly a meditation on the old theme of the "tragic mulatto," but more broadly it is a depiction of a woman whose life is defined in large part by rigid definitions of race, class, and gender. More broadly still, it is a novel that deals with the fundamental modern problem of existential alienation—of the inability to feel at peace, at rest, or at home anytime or anywhere.

The first sentence of the book is highly revealing: "Helga Crane sat alone in her room, which at that hour, eight in the evening, was in a soft gloom” (35). Helga’s name is immediately suggestive: Her Christian name already implies her part-Scandinavian roots, while her last name is plain and nondescript. Even her name, in other words, suggests her mixed cultural background, while the fact that she is “alone” symbolizes her essential condition: She is alone at the beginning of the book, will be essentially alone (even when surrounded by others) throughout much of the rest of it, and will be even more fundamentally alone and lonely when the novel ends. It is not an accident, then, that the book opens in literal darkness and “gloom”: That word sets the tone for much of the rest of the novel. Helga, in these opening pages, is surrounded by abundant material comforts, but she never feels comfortable in her own skin; nor does she ever really feel at home with other people. It is not long, for instance, before she is remembering the day’s “distasteful encounters and stupid perversities” (36–37), a phrase that epitomizes many of her assessments of most of the people and events she encounters throughout the book. Helga is intensely unhappy with Naxos (an ironic anagram of Saxon), the white-funded and white-controlled institution of higher education for blacks (modeled on BOOKER T. WASHINGTON’s famous Tuskegee Institute)—a place she considers to be “smug and fat with self-satisfaction” and a place that “tolerated no innovations, no individualisms” (39). But Helga, unfortunately, is no more satisfied with her biological family than she is with her coworkers: Remembering her relatives in Chicago, she reflects that they “feared and hated her. She pitied and despised them” (41). From now until the end of the book, no matter where she is or who surrounds her, Helga will never know joy, for (as the narrator notes), “She could neither conform, nor be happy in her nonconformity” (42).

Quicksand, then, is a book with a deeply unhappy and (it must be said) a fairly unpleasant and even unappealing central character. Helga rejects Naxos (with typical melodrama) as “a place of shame, lies, hypocrisy, cruelty, servility, and snobbishness” (48), and she compares it to “some loathsome, venomous disease” (53), but she rarely stops to consider that the roots of her dissatisfaction may lie in her own bitterness as much as in her surroundings, and (more to the point) Larsen rarely invites us to regard Helga with this sort of critical irony. Perhaps Helga was too close to Larsen’s own personality for Larsen to achieve any kind of significant distance from her, but in some ways the novel suffers from its almost suffocating focus on a character who seems, in many respects, so self-centered, uncharitable, and essentially immature. Everything is seen from Helga’s perspective; everything is filtered through Helga’s consciousness; there is relatively little of the dialogue and drama and conflict of viewpoints that help make Larsen’s second novel (Passing) an arguably better book. Helga and many of her friends (especially when she arrives in New York) can appear pretentious, affected, self-centered, and unsympathetic in both senses of that word, and sometimes Larsen’s own writing lapses into awkward affectation. At one point, for instance, she reports, “Having finally turned her attention to Helga Crane, Fortune now seemed determined to smile, to make amends for her shameful neglect. One had, Helga decided, only to touch the right button, to press the right spring, in order to attract the jade’s notice” (69). Occasionally Larsen seems to mock the materialism and hedonism of the people she describes, but she rarely achieves the kind of ironic, satiric, or humorous distance from those values that would make the book seem either warmer, more complex, or more substantial. In the final analysis Helga Crane is (sad to say) a character about whom it is difficult to care very deeply; her suffering seems largely the result of her own self-centeredness. As Charles Larson puts it, “The problem is Helga herself: her restlessness, her feelings of superiority, her deeply rooted sense of insecurity about her blackness, all the seemingly contradictory aspects of her personality. Self-hatred can manifest itself in many ways, and certainly one of the most common is to disdain everyone else” (Invisible Darkness 73). It is not clear, however, that Nella Larsen shares Charles Larson’s penetrating diagnosis of Helga Crane; too often the novel seems to invite us to pity Helga, and to share her perspective and attitudes, rather than to achieve much critical distance from them. Helga takes herself quite seriously, and Larsen unfortunately often seems to follow Helga's lead.

To say this, however, is not to deny the importance of Larsen's achievement in this book. She has been praised, for instance, for her "depiction of a memorable protagonist, her adept narration, and her skillful development of the novel's central metaphor" (Wall 116), and although most critics consider Helga's sudden marriage unconvincing and the novel's ending abrupt and flawed, most have also agreed with the original judgment of W. E. B. DuBois, who considered the book one of the best novels by a black person written up to that point (see Davis, Nella Larsen 280). The book might benefit from greater distance from (and about) its protagonist, but there is no gainsaying the talent Larsen reveals—a talent (it seems possible to argue) that would soon be on even greater display in her next novel, Passing.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the somewhat autobiographical protagonist of this work with the autobiographical protagonist of Booker T. Washington's book Up from Slavery. Pay particular attention to such matters as tone, attitude, character, and implied values. How do you think each writer would have responded to the other's book, and why? Discuss the significance of race, class, and gender in each work.
2. Both this novel and the short story "Mrs. Spring Fragrance" (by SUI SIN FAR [Edith Maude Eaton]) deal with minority women who must find a place for themselves in an ethnically distinct majority culture. How do the works resemble and/or differ from one another in such matters as style, genre, technique, and final effect? What role does social and economic class play in each work? Discuss the depiction of marriage in each text.
3. Read W. E. B. DuBois's work The Souls of Black Folk and then discuss the reasons DuBois may have admired Larsen's novel. How does her book reflect some of the ideas discussed by DuBois? Why would the style, manner, and subject matter of her writing have been likely to appeal to DuBois? What personal traits or experiences did the two authors have in common?
4. Compare and contrast Helga's experiences in different geographical and cultural settings (for instance, the North versus the South and America versus Europe). What similarities and/or differences do you see? Is there any place where Helga seems particularly happy or at home? Where might she have had the greatest chance to lead a satisfying life?

Passing (1929)

Irene Redfield, a comfortably upper-middle-class and light-skinned black woman living in New York in a somewhat strained marriage with her husband, Brian, and their two young sons, chances to renew contact with Clare Kendry, a very light-skinned, very beautiful friend from her youth who has in the meantime married a wealthy white racist named Jack Bellew and who is "passing" as a white herself. Clare, however, is eager to spend time among the blacks of Harlem without her husband's knowledge, and, as the vivacious Clare insinuates herself into the social circle of Irene and Brian, Irene becomes increasingly worried that Brian is becoming attracted to the adventurous interloper and that this attraction may threaten the Redfield marriage and, with it, Irene's economic security. When Bellew unexpectedly stumbles across reason to believe that his wife is indeed black, he traces her to a party (also attended by the Redfields) in a six-story building; when he angrily confronts Clare, Irene rushes to her side, but Clare falls (or jumps, or is pushed) from a large open window nearby, and Irene, distraught and worried, is left suddenly anxious and alone.

The complexity of Larsen's splendid second novel is already implied by its title, which obviously refers to the phenomenon of racial "passing" but also carries numerous other possible meanings and implications. Irene herself, for instance, is "passing" in certain respects: She is living an outwardly comfortable life, but she realizes that her economic security depends greatly on the continued existence of a marriage that is increasingly unhappy. She also passes as a friend of Clare, even though she feels growing hostility toward her old acquaintance. Worried that her marriage and her lifestyle may be at risk of passing away, Irene tries to imagine means to remove the threat of Clare from her life, and, at the very end of the book, when she may indeed have shoved Clare from a window to a death that others consider simply an accident, Irene may be in the conscience-stricken predicament of spending the rest of her life passing (or posing) as an innocent person who may actually be guilty of murder. Some critics have also suggested that there is an undercurrent of sexual attraction between Clare and Irene, in which case these women may to some degree be “passing” as devoted wives who nevertheless feel more complicated emotions. Finally, other analysts have suggested that many of the middle-class black characters in the book are “passing” by imitating the lifestyles and values of wealthy whites, while various wealthy whites themselves may be “passing” as friends of blacks by visiting Harlem on the weekends for exotic adventure without ever really abandoning their fundamentally racist assumptions. Larsen, in short, has created a novel that is full of psychological and social complications. A number of the individual characters (especially Clare, but also Irene and Brian and even Clare’s racist husband) are morally and emotionally complex, and the plot itself (especially the conclusion) is full of suspense and intriguing ambiguities.

Many of the same thematic elements dealt with in Larsen’s first novel (Quicksand) are dealt with again in Passing, including the social and psychological distortions caused by overrigid definitions of race, class, and gender, especially as they affect the lives of women in general and of African-American women in particular. But although the setting of Passing (which basically centers on New York City, with a quick side trip to Chicago) is more confined than the multiple locations of Quicksand (which travels from the South to the Midwest to the Northeast to Europe and then back to the South again), Larsen’s second novel somehow seems more expansive than her first. For one thing, the basic focus is not confined to the consciousness of a single character; for another, the characters in Pass- ing seem more interesting and more sympathetic than those in Quicksand; finally, much of the narrative in Passing is carried along by crisp, rapid, and usually vivid (if sometimes mannered, pretentious, or dated) dialogue. Larsen has a more nuanced, more distanced, more critical perspective on all her characters here than she seems to have achieved in Quicksand, and this is especially true of her perspective on Irene, who emerges as an exceptionally complicated personality. On the one hand, it is easy to feel sympathetic to Irene, who cares about her sons and is anxious to preserve their security as well as her own; it is also easy to see why she feels threatened by the vivacious and somewhat amoral and calculating Clare. On the other hand, by the end of the book, Irene has allowed her fears to lead her to become fairly calculating and amoral (if not actually immoral) herself. Passing (it can be argued) is a more ethically complex novel than Quicksand; the moral dilemmas it raises would be interesting no matter what the color(s) of the characters, and the characters themselves would seem intriguingly complex no matter what their race or class. Quicksand (as its title implies) dealt more obviously with passive victimization; Passing (as its title suggests) is more concerned with conscious choices for which the characters can be held responsible.

As with Quicksand, Larsen has been criticized for the ending of Passing; some analysts consider the conclusion too abrupt, too melodramatic, and too quickly convenient in the way it disposes of Clare and moves the novel to a rapid finish. All these criticisms have some merit, but the final pages of the book can also be defended in various ways. Consider, for instance, Jack Bellew’s verbal attack on Clare when he bursts unexpectedly into the party: “‘So you’re a nigger, a damned dirty nigger!’ His voice was a snarl and a moan, an expression of rage and pain” (271). His words are ugly, but his anguish is real, and Larsen manages to capture the complexity of his emotions, which are fueled by hatred and (ironically) by love; he feels bitter in part because he feels deceived, and although he is hardly a sympathetic character, he is not merely a cheap villain, either. This becomes clear when Clare later falls from the window and Bellew emits

“a sound not quite human, like a beast in agony. ‘Nig! My God! Nig!’” (271). “Nig” had been his nickname for his darker-than-usual “white” wife, and when he shouts that name now we are repulsed by the word but nonetheless touched by his sense of loss. In some ways he is indeed a “beast,” but he is also a “beast in agony.” A lesser writer would have made Bellew merely evil; Larsen, to her credit, achieves something more complex. Complexity, in fact, is the hallmark of her writing throughout the novel, even in its somewhat contrived ending. Thus, although Irene lovingly remembers Clare’s beauty, “Irene wasn’t sorry” about Clare’s fall (272). And as she rushes down to view the body, her greatest fear is not the sight of the mutilated corpse but another possibility altogether: “What if Clare was not dead?” (273). Whether or not she actually pushed Clare, Irene is glad that Clare is no longer a threat; striving to preserve her marriage, her family, and her respectability, Irene has become a kind of moral monster; she is full of selfish calculation, but she is also like a frightened child. When Irene faints in almost the last (somewhat melodramatic) sentence of the book, Larsen writes that “everything was dark” (275), but the sentence is redeemed when we realize that the darkness can be explained not simply by a loss of consciousness but also, symbolically, by a loss of conscience. Irene may (or may not—even this much is not clear) get away with murder, but if she does, her experience with “passing” is only just beginning.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Irene Redfield in Passing with Bigger Thomas in RICHARD WRIGHT’S novel Native Son. How do their social, economic, and racial circumstances differ, but how (at the end of both works) do they face comparable moral predicaments? Is one character more ethically appealing than the other? If so, why?
2. Read ZORA NEALE HURSTON’S novel Their Eyes Were Watching God, and then discuss the similarities and differences between Janie Crawford and Clare Kendry. What motivations and other traits of character do they share? How are their lives affected by their marriages and their racial backgrounds? How does a yearning for freedom and autonomy affect both characters?

3. Both Passing and THEODORE DREISER’S An American Tragedy (1925) climax with deaths whose circumstances are ambiguous. How are the descriptions of these deaths comparable and/or distinct? Discuss the circumstances and motivations that lead to both deaths and the aftermaths that ensue. What role do larger social forces play in both deaths?
4. Focus on the theme suggested by the title of the book and trace its different appearances throughout the novel. Discuss as many different instances of as many different kinds of “passing” as you can find. How does this theme, almost by definition, contribute to the complexity of the book’s characterization? How does this theme help guarantee that the characters will not be mere stereotypes?

“Sanctuary” (1930)

In a remote area of the poor rural South, a large black man approaches the isolated cottage of aging Annie Poole (also black); when the man enters the cottage, Annie sees that he is Jim Hammer, a friend of her son Obadiah, although Annie herself dislikes him intensely. However, when Hammer reveals that he is being pursued by the local white authorities for having impulsively shot someone in a panicked escape from an attempted robbery, Annie agrees (because he is her son’s friend) to hide him; she knows that he is unlikely to receive fair treatment at the hands of the local whites. Even after the white sheriff arrives and reveals that it is Annie’s own son who was shot and killed, Annie keeps Hammer hidden; when the whites leave, however, she expels Hammer from her house and makes it clear that she kept his secret only because he was a black being pursued by whites.

This effectively written story—the only surviving work by Larsen set entirely in the South, and the only one so full of southern dialect—caused enormous controversy soon after it was published, when a reader alleged that the text seemed to be

5. Track down a copy of Carl Van Vechten's famous work Nigger Heaven—a work Larsen admired and defended. Why do you think Larsen was attracted to this book? What features does it have in common with her own work? What were Van Vechten's purposes in writing his book, and why might Larsen have been sympathetic to his purposes and his achievement?
6. Choose one specific passage from one work by Larsen and analyze it in as much detail as possible. Discuss it in terms of such matters, for instance, as plot, characterization, theme, diction, dialogue, imagery, and symbolism. How is the chosen passage an effective piece of writing? How does it contribute to the larger success of the work of which it is a part? How is the chosen passage typical of Larsen's writing as a whole? How does the chosen passage help justify the recent renewed interest in Larsen as an author?
7. Discuss the role of some of the white characters in one or more of Larsen's works. What are their practical as well as their symbolic functions? Are they depicted convincingly, or are they merely caricatures? Is there any observable pattern in Larsen's use of such characters, or is each such character depicted in a unique and complex way?
8. Discuss the presentation of lower-class blacks in Larsen's fiction. What practical and/or symbolic functions do they serve? What are their relations with the upper- (or upper-middle-) class blacks who are the central figures in Larsen's two surviving novels? Compare and contrast Larsen's depiction of poorer African-American characters with the depiction of such characters in the fiction of Richard Wright.
9. Do some research into the "tragic mulatto" character in American fiction. Read (for instance) Kate Chopin's story "La Belle Zoraode" and other such works, and then discuss the ways in which Larsen echoes or departs from previous depictions of mixed-race persons in American fiction. How does she reinforce and/or subvert any stereotypes associated with such persons?
10. Compare and contrast the writings and careers of Nella Larsen and Zora Neale Hurston. How are the works and lives of these two writers similar, and how are they distinct? Discuss such matters as theme and style, the autobiographical elements in the fiction they produced, and the final fates of both women.

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Ammons, Elizabeth. Conflicting Stories: American Women Writers at the Turn into the Twentieth Century. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Davis, Thadious M. "Introduction." In Passing. By Nella Larsen. New York: Penguin, 1997.
- . Nella Larsen, Novelist of the Harlem Renaissance: A Woman's Life Unveiled. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994.
- Hutchinson, George. In Search of Nella Larsen: A Biography of the Color Line. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2006.
- Larsen, Charles R. "Introduction." In The Complete Fiction of Nella Larsen. By Nella Larsen. New York: Anchor, 2001.
- . Invisible Darkness: Jean Toomer and Nella Larsen. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1993.
- Larsen, Nella. The Complete Fiction of Nella Larsen. Edited by Charles R. Larson. New York: Anchor, 2001.
- McLendon, Jacquelyn Y. The Politics of Color in the Fiction of Jessie Fauset and Nella Larsen. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1995.
- Nelson, Emmanuel S. "Nella Larsen (1891–1964)." In African American Authors, 1745–1945: A Biographical Sourcebook. Edited by Emmanuel S. Nelson. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2000.
- Regents of the University of Minnesota. Available online. URL: http://voices.cla.umn.edu/vg/Bios/entries/larsen_nella.html. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Robert C. Evans

JACK LONDON (1876–1916)

Don't loaf and invite inspiration; light out after it with a club, and if you don't get it you will nonetheless get something that looks remarkably like it.

(qtd. in Sinclair 32)

Jack London, who eventually became one of the most popular American writers in the world, was born in humble circumstances in San Francisco on January 12, 1876. His mother, Flora Wellman, had been involved with a traveling astrologer named William Henry Chaney, who quickly abandoned her when she told him she was pregnant. When her son was born, she named him John Griffith Chaney, but by September 7, Flora married John London, a widower with two daughters of his own, and Flora's son became John Griffith London. In 1876–85 the family lived in straitened circumstances in various places in or near San Francisco; in 1878 (for instance) they moved to Oakland (across San Francisco Bay) to escape an epidemic that nearly killed Jack and Eliza, an older stepsister who helped take care of him until she herself later married. By 1881 the family was living in Alameda; by 1886 they were residing in San Mateo County and then in the Livermore Valley; by 1886 they were back in Oakland, where Jack became a frequent user of the public library while also helping to support his family through a variety of menial jobs. After graduating from grammar school in 1891, he worked briefly in a cannery but then borrowed enough money to buy a small boat and become an oyster pirate in San Francisco Bay. In 1892, however, he was hired as a deputy patrolman for the California Fish Patrol. By 1893 he had signed up as a sailor on a ship that sailed, for more than half a year, to the North Pacific, Hawaii, and Japan. Then, when London returned to San Francisco, he not only did heavy labor for little pay but also began his career as a writer by winning top prize in a contest sponsored by a local newspaper. His winning entry was based (as was much of his later work) on his own experiences at sea.

In 1894 London joined a group of other unemployed California workers who were making their way east to protest in Washington, D.C., but London left the group in Missouri to do some traveling on his own. He visited the World's Fair grounds in Chicago before winding up in Niagara, New York, where he was arrested as a vagrant and spent a month in jail. Back in Oakland, he attended high school for a year; there he wrote and published in a school publication while trying to get ready to enter the University of California at Berkeley. In 1896 he joined the Socialist Labor Party, earning a reputation as the "Boy Socialist," before being admitted to the university that fall. Forced by financial hardship to leave college in 1897, he tried at first to earn his living as a writer before turning to work in a laundry. Later that year, however, he made one of the most momentous decisions of his life: He and a brother-in-law joined the "gold rush" that had begun in Alaska. He spent a rough winter in a small cabin in the Yukon until sickness forced him to abandon his plans. After rafting down the Yukon River to the Bering Sea, he worked as a sailor to earn his passage home to San Francisco, where he arrived by late July, only to discover that his stepfather had passed away during his absence. From this point on, London was more and more determined to earn his living as an author, and by 1899 he had begun to achieve real success with writings based on his experiences in Alaska.

In 1900 London's first book, The Son of the Wolf (set in Alaska), was published, and in the same year London also married a woman named Elizabeth (Bess or Bessie) Maddern, with whom he settled back in Oakland. Their daughter Joan was born early in January 1901, and London himself won his first job as a journalist. He received only a few hundred votes when he ran for mayor of Oakland as a Socialist, but he did succeed as an author once more by the end of the year with the publication of another book of tales set in Alaska, The God of His Fathers. In 1902 his first novel (A Daughter of the Snows) was published, as were two additional books (Children of the Frost and Cruise of the Dazzler); his second child, Bess, or Becky, was born; and he traveled to England to collect material for yet another publication. In 1903 The Kempton-Wace Letters (a book about love he cowrote with Anna Strunsky) appeared, as did not only The People of the Abyss but also The Call of the Wild, which was an instant success and remains one of his most famous works. During this same year, however, he also separated from his wife after falling in love with Charmian Kittredge, whom he had met in 1900. In 1904 he was a war correspondent in the Far East, while, back in London and New York, his publishers issued a new collection of tales (The Faith of Men and Other Stories) as well as one of his most notable novels, The Sea-Wolf. During this same year, his wife filed for divorce, citing her husband's involvement with Anna Strunsky as one reason for the breakup. The divorce was finalized in November 1905, and the next day London married Charmian Kittredge. Also in 1905 he ran again (and again without success) as a Socialist for mayor of Oakland, and also in that year he bought a large California ranch. Despite this new status as a substantial landowner and successful author, he also in 1905 published a book of essays called War of the Classes and additionally lectured at Harvard and elsewhere advocating socialism. More books of fiction—Tales of the Fish Patrol and The Game—also appeared that year.

More lecturing on socialism occurred early in 1906 in such diverse places as Chicago, New York, New Haven, North Dakota, and Jamaica, although illness soon led London to end these appearances and return to California. While he was there, three new books were published: Moon-Face and Other Stories, Scorn of Women, and the particularly notable White Fang. Perhaps his most significant non-literary project of 1906, however, was his decision to begin building a schooner, the Snark, which he planned to sail around the world in a trip that would last seven years. The craft was finished in 1907, and in late April London and Charmian set off for the South Pacific, arriving in Hawaii in late May. They stayed there until October, then visited a number of other islands, including Tahiti. Meanwhile, books written by London continued to spill from the presses, including (in 1907 alone) Before Adam, Love of Life and Other Stories, and The Road, followed in 1908 by The Iron Heel. London was briefly back in California at the beginning of 1908, but the South Pacific voyage soon continued, taking him to Samoa, the Fiji Islands, the New Hebrides, the Solomon Islands, and Australia before he was stricken by sickness and, in late November, felt compelled to give up the trip. By mid-1909 he was back at his California ranch after traveling through Central America and the American South, and he now spent much of his time improving his property (and adding to it). His ambitious novel Martin Eden appeared that year, followed, in 1910, by Lost Face, Revolution and Other Essays, Burning Daylight, and Theft: A Play in Four Acts. Unfortunately, a daughter born that same year died within a few days, but London soon turned his attention to his plans to construct an elaborate home ("Wolf House") on his newly expanded ranch.

London's taste for new adventures continued in 1911, when he, Charmian, and an employee spent their summer driving a four-horse carriage to Oregon and back. Meanwhile, four new books appeared that year: When God Laughs and Other Stories, Adventure, The Cruise of the Snark, and South Sea Tales. By late December London headed for New York, and by the beginning of March 1912 he and his wife were on a voyage from Baltimore that would take them on a sailing ship to Seattle by way of a trip around the Horn of South America. London was back at his ranch by August 1912, a year that saw the publication of still more books: The House of Pride and Other Tales of Hawaii, A Son of the Sun, and Smoke Bellew, which were followed in 1913 by The Night-Born, The Abysmal Brute, John Barleycorn, and The Valley of the Moon. Unfortunately, during July of that year, after undergoing surgery for appendicitis, London learned that his kidneys were diseased. As if to compound this misfortune, a month later the Wolf House was destroyed in a mysterious fire. Nevertheless, by midfall London had the distinction of seeing his book The Sea-Wolf presented on-screen as the subject of the first feature-length movie produced in the United States. By early 1914 he was back in New York but soon left for Mexico with his wife to report on the revolution there, although by midsummer illness forced him to return to the California ranch. The Strength of the Strong and The Mutiny of the Elsinore appeared that year, followed by two fantasies, The Scarlet Plague and The Jacket (otherwise known as The Star Rover), in 1915. During this latter year London, battling extreme rheumatism, traveled back and forth twice between California and Hawaii, hoping that the change of climate would help his health, but to little avail. He quit the Socialist Party early in March 1916, disappointed with its moderation, and, despite his stay in Hawaii, his health did not improve. He entered a California hospital for treatment of his rheumatism in September, but by November 22 he was dead of uremia. Although this death may have resulted from an intentional drug overdose (Pizer 994; Nuernberg xx-xxi), some scholars consider this possibility is unlikely (Lundquist 73).

In the year of his death, London was as prolific as ever: In 1916 The Acorn-Planter: A California Forest Play, The Little Lady of the Big House, and

The Turtles of Tasman were published. Yet even after he died, books by London continued to pour from the presses, including The Human Drift, Jerry of the Islands, and Michael, Brother of Jerry in 1917; The Red One and Hearts of Three in 1918; On the Makaloa Mat in 1919; Dutch Courage and Other Stories in 1922; The Assassination Bureau, Ltd. in 1963; and, in subsequent years, collections of his war reportage, articles on sports, fantasy fiction, uncollected stories about Alaska, miscellaneous articles, and multiple volumes of letters. Even this list is hardly comprehensive, for London was one of the hardest-working and most productive writers of his or any time, and, although it is usually conceded that his works are of uneven quality, many were instantly popular and have always remained so, and some have won increasing critical respect.

“The Law of Life” (1901)

Old Koskoosh, an elderly Indian who was once the chief of his tribe but who is now blind and decrepit, sits outside in the cold weather, listening as his son (the new chief) and the other young members of the tribe break camp and prepare to move to a new location. It soon becomes clear that they plan, in accordance with custom, to leave Koskoosh (protected merely by a temporary fire) behind to meet his fate, for he is too old now to help either himself or his people. After the tribe departs, Koskoosh thinks back to his youth, when he watched an old moose, separated from its herd, eventually lose the battle for life with a pack of wolves; as he ponders the fate of the moose, he realizes that he is himself now surrounded by snarling wolves and that resistance can only be brief and futile.

Thematically, stylistically, and in nearly every other way imaginable, this story is a typical work by Jack London. Its very title already suggests his characteristic concerns with the immutable facts of existence—facts no living thing can afford to ignore. The setting is the Klondike territory, which was the breeding ground of London's earliest ambitions as a writer and the landscape where so many of his most distinctive tales take place. Against this backdrop he depicts (in stark, unsentimental terms, and in clear, simple, straightforward language) the inevitable fact of death in a world in which individuals are of no intrinsic importance. They matter only as members of groups, and they matter only as long as they contribute to the group's survival. Here as in so many works by London, nature is not so much pitiless, cold, or cruel as blankly indifferent: Nature is not (as it was for many romantics) a beautiful home but an often grim and dangerous testing ground, an obstacle course in which creatures either survive or die. The influence of Darwinism on London's thinking is especially obvious in this tale: Koskoosh has long since fulfilled his basic natural functions (he has survived to maturity, mated, and produced offspring), and now he not only serves no obvious purpose but (what is more important) can no longer struggle successfully to survive. The main "law of life," paradoxically, is that all life must die.

The opening sentence of the story is already full of significance: "Old Koskoosh listened greedily" (365). The crucial fact about Koskoosh in this tale is his age, and so London emphasizes that detail in the story's first word. Meanwhile, the name Koskoosh, which immediately sounds exotic to Western, American ears, alerts us to the fact that here (as in so many other works by London) we will be focusing on a human being whose cultural background differs from our own, but one whose existence is likely to resemble ours in ways we might not at first imagine. London often sets his stories in remote or "primitive" locales, but the tales almost always deal with facts that are basic to any human life—facts we ignore at our peril, even in our supposedly civilized urban environments. The fact that Koskoosh "listened greedily" already suggests, for instance, our basic human need to depend on our senses, and on the strength of our flesh, to survive. Koskoosh is almost literally hungry for information, but neither his eyes nor his limbs can help him now. London never lets us forget that our minds are embedded in bodies and that our continued existence depends largely on simple physical strength. Old as he is, Koskoosh still possesses a keen and "glimmering intelligence" (365), but intelligence alone is not enough to guarantee his survival. Indeed, part of his tragedy (if we can use such a potentially sentimental term) is that his mind and memory have outlived his body. In this respect, of course, his fate is quite common, and so London makes the life and death of this obscure Klondike Indian implicitly relevant to any reader. London's writings interest us because they deal with seemingly exotic and unfamiliar people and events, but also because (on another level) they deal with facts we may fear, may try to ignore, but must ultimately acknowledge.

Stylistically, too, "The Law of Life" exemplifies many of London's most typical traits. Thus, in calling the female character Sit-cum-to-ha, Koskoosh's "daughter's daughter" (365), London not only again uses an intriguingly exotic name but also uses a kind of foreign dialect to refer, in a strange but exceedingly precise way, to a person we would merely (and more vaguely) call the old man's "granddaughter." London's diction is rarely complicated, but it often (as in the example just mentioned) subtly implies a significantly different and remote way of looking at the world. Likewise, his syntax (or sentence structure) is rarely complicated, but it is often more artful than a quick reading might suggest. Thus, when London writes that "the long trail waited while the short day refused to linger" (365), he not only skillfully balances long trail and short day but also uses the alliterative l sound with understated musical effect. Similarly balanced, alliterative, and indeed almost rhyming language is used later in the emphatic description of a portable lodge's being "rammed and jammed" into place (365), while the techniques of both personification and foreshadowing are employed when London writes, "Death waited, ever-hungry and hungriest of them all" (366). Such phrasing not only looks forward to the story's final paragraph but also looks back to its opening reference to Koskoosh's own greedy listening. Yet London's diction never calls undue attention to its own artfulness; if it did, it would distract us from his focus on facts that exist beneath and behind any mere literary style.

"The Law of Life" is, then, skillfully but unobtrusively crafted. London knows, for instance, how to use brief sentences for dramatic effect (as when he deftly notes the tribe's departure by suddenly and simply reporting, "They were gone" [366]). And he also knows how to use authentic-sounding dialect (as when Koskoosh's son tells his father, "There be wood beside you" [366]). And London knows how to use dramatic juxtaposition, as when he no sooner describes one young brave as "the craftiest of hunters" than he immediately reports that this same youth died suddenly when he "fell through an air-hole on the Yukon" (369). The implied point is swiftly and effectively made: Nature is unforgiving, and even the strongest and most cunning can instantly vanish. Finally, London knows how to use both parallelism (the old moose is taken down by wolves, just as old Koskoosh will be) and symbolism (the old man's fire "sizzled and went out" just before Koskoosh himself meets a similar fate [371]). But always, in London, the emphasis is less on the words themselves than on the facts they represent. For London, words do matter, but facts matter more.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the depiction of nature in this story with its depiction in "Sunday Morning," a poem by WALLACE STEVENS. For example, focus on the final passages of both works, and discuss the ways in which Stevens's view of nature seems more "romantic" than London's.
2. Compare and contrast this story with T. S. ELIOT's poem "Gerontion." In particular, discuss the works in terms of their treatment of old age, their use of points of view, their choices of diction, and their ultimate clarity.
3. Compare and contrast the use of nature imagery in this story and in ZORA NEALE HURSTON's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. In particular, relate this story to the description of the storm in the second half of Hurston's novel. What do both works imply about man's relations to the elements, to animals, and to other people in extreme situations?
4. Discuss, in detail, the effectiveness of the opening paragraph of this story. How does it arouse interest and make us want to read further? How does it foreshadow central themes of the tale as a whole? How does it already begin the process of complexly characterizing the central figures of the tale? How does it use setting and diction effectively?

The Call of the Wild (1903)

Buck, a large dog, had been living a comfortable life on a California farm before he was stolen and sold off to pull sleds in the Klondike. Through struggle, suffering, and the will to survive and prevail (especially in conflict with a dog named Spitz), he eventually learns to function well under a variety of human masters. Eventually he is lucky to find, in John Thornton, a master who treats him with love and kindness—a master whom Buck can love in turn—but when Thornton is killed, Buck joins a wolf pack, becomes its leader, and heeds the ancient, instinctive call of the wild.

This novel, considered by many readers to be London's best, is also highly characteristic of his work in general. As do many of his other writings, it shows the kinds of transformations that occur when any individual is taken out of a familiar, comfortable environment and plunged into strange and challenging surroundings. In this case, however, the individual is not a human but a dog named Buck, who, owned by the kindly Judge Miller, "lives the life of a sated aristocrat; he had a fine pride in himself, was even a trifle egotistical, as country gentlemen sometimes become because of their insular situation" (6). As this sentence suggests, part of London's purpose is not simply to tell the story of a dog but to draw parallels between its life and the lives of human readers. What happens to Buck could happen to anyone; the lessons Buck learns are lessons any person ignores at his or her own peril. London often writes about animals, not because he wants to sentimentalize them or treat them as humans but because he sees humans themselves as merely animals of a different sort. Influenced by the thinking of Charles Darwin and Herbert Spencer, London believed that people share much of their psychology and physical nature with other beasts, and so it made perfect sense for him to explore common “human” problems by showing animals facing similar challenges. Thus, just as Buck’s egotism will eventually be humbled, so will our own. We will soon take a great interest in this dog because we will soon recognize that his circumstances could (and do) easily resemble ours.

On the night Buck is stolen, the “Judge was at a meeting of the Raisin Growers’ Association, and the boys [the Judge’s sons] were busy organizing an athletic club” (7). In this clever sentence, London already implies how California, once part of the untamed frontier, was now becoming prosperous, effete, and civilized: Raisins, after all, are luxuries, not necessities, and the fact that there are enough raisin growers to need an “Association” suggests that life in California was becoming as commercialized and organized as in the East. Meanwhile, the fact that the Judge’s sons feel the need to organize an “athletic club” again suggests the encroachment of civilized values in a previously untamed landscape: A few decades earlier, any settler in California would have had plenty of athletic exercise merely by working, but now life has become so easy and relaxed that artificial exercise must be invented and organized. Although London’s works are more often read for their plots than for the subtle details of their phrasing, such subtlety does exist, and the sentence quoted is an example. London does, to be sure, often blatantly spell out the philosophical meanings of his works, but his writings are strongest when they work by implication, challenging readers to think rather than simply digest preformulated thoughts.

Buck’s journey to the Klondike begins, significantly enough, during the same year as London’s own: 1897 (6). In describing Buck’s adventures, London thus surely is also describing aspects of his own unsentimental education, and just as Buck is forever transformed by his experiences, so was London. Both Buck and London, however, are themselves merely single instances of London’s larger concern with what would happen to any human (or any creature) suddenly shifted from a relatively comfortable routine and forced to confront elemental conditions, particularly the struggle for survival and the survival of the fittest. Inevitably, economics is key to everything that now happens to Buck, just as economics (for London) is key to everything in any human existence. When Buck is sold into slavery, he hears how “the money chinked between” buyer and seller (7), and surely the cold brevity of the transaction implies London’s view that in capitalistic societies, people themselves can be (and are) disposed of as dogs are. London’s novel, then, reflects not merely his Darwinism but also his socialistic creed that a society rooted in profits is inevitably crude, vicious, and uncaring. In one sense, Buck travels to a remote, exotic place, but in another sense, he merely arrives in a landscape where the brutal but familiar energies of exploitative capitalism are most obvious and transparent.

In his new environment Buck first survives, then later thrives, not merely because of his physical strength but also because of his real, and realistic, intelligence. It takes only one severe beating, for instance, for Buck to learn “that he stood no chance against a man with a club” (12). The lesson does not break him (he does not react as other “beaten dogs that fawned upon the man, and wagged their tails, and licked his hand” do [12]), but neither is he foolish enough to rebel openly (for “he saw one dog, that would neither conciliate nor obey, finally killed in the struggle for mastery” [12]). Here as often elsewhere, Buck both chooses and embodies a middle course: Just as he eventually becomes both half-dog and half-wolf, so he steadily learns to steer a middle passage. He bides his time and picks his fights, realizing that intelligence is no less crucial to survival than instinct. Nowhere is this strategy more obvious than in his dealings with the hypocritical Spitz, the dog he must eventually challenge, who seems “friendly, in a treacherous sort of way, smiling into one’s face the while he meditated some underhanded trick” (13). As Buck watches Spitz attack a weaker dog and then smile as the other dogs kill it, Buck draws a valuable conclusion: “So that was the way. No fair play. Once down, that was the end of you. Well, he would see to it that he never went down” (16). The simplicity of the diction and the brevity of the sentences drive home the elemental force of the lesson—a lesson that London, both Darwinist and socialist, could easily embrace. Spitz embodies the kind of deceit, meanness, and egregious selfishness that London despised and that he always associated with exploiters intent on dominating others, not merely living their own lives. The Call of the Wild can be read, in part, as an education manual intended to show anyone (but especially the downtrodden) how to survive in a world populated and controlled by beings like Spitz. As Buck learns, we learn; as Buck's insight grows and develops, ours does, too. We profit vicariously from his education.

Spitz eventually meets his end when Buck, surprised but prepared, is challenged for the last time. The two dogs fight, and although Buck "fought by instinct, . . . he could fight by head as well" (35). Once more, then, what makes Buck finally superior is his versatility, his combination of strengths, his ability to adapt. Buck's story is indeed the story of the survival of the fittest, but in this case fittest means not merely most strong but most capable of fitting the right talents to particular circumstances. At the end of the battle, as the other dogs tear into the fatally wounded Spitz, "Buck stood and looked on, the successful champion, the dominant primordial beast who had made his kill and found it good" (16). Surely the ironic echo of the opening chapters of the Bible is intended here: The Hebraic, Christian God created, and then found his creations good, and now Buck kills and finds satisfaction in killing. A different kind of writer might have recoiled from such irony, but London merely implies that death is a part of life, that some must die if others are to live, and that beings such as Spitz, in particular, deserve little mercy and no pity. Darwin is behind such thoughts, but so is Friedrich Nietzsche, the German philosopher who taught the doctrine of the Superman, for whom pity is weakness and for whom strength is essential to life itself.

With Spitz gone, Buck soon asserts his leadership of the other dogs—a leadership acknowledged both by them and by their present human masters, a pair of tough but affable French Canadians who use the dogs to haul mail. After being turned over to another master (a "Scotch half-breed" [40])—phrasing that implies London's tendency to describe humans in animalistic terms, just as he describes animals as if they were humans), the dogs are eventually purchased by a trio of callow, superficial, and ludicrously out-of-place adventurers consisting of two preening men (Hal and Charles) and one preening woman (Mercedes). Their presence allows London to mock (without much subtlety) both "civilized" affectations and the cruelty, selfishness, and naïveté of the so-called cultured class. Hal, Charles, and Mercedes symbolize much that London considered weak, wicked, and ultimately doomed in the pretentious, artificial society of his day—a society unable to withstand any true confrontation with genuinely harsh realities. The trio quickly descend into petty bickering, and they abuse the dogs. Finally, they all stagger "into John Thornton's camp at the mouth of the White River" (55). It does not take long for John (with his plain, blunt name and his plain, blunt manner) to become disgusted with the greenhorns, especially with their abuse of the dogs. When John eventually threatens to kill Hal if Hal strikes Buck again, Hal quickly backs down, and, in a somewhat melodramatic touch, we soon witness the trio and the other dogs plunge to their deaths through a break in the ice as John, unconcerned, comforts Buck (58).

Thanks to John Thornton, Buck's life changes dramatically: "Love, genuine passionate love, was his for the first time" (59)—not only John's love for Buck but especially Buck's love for John. Buck finally serves an "ideal master" (60), who genuinely cares for Buck's well-being and who thus earns his deep affection and respect. It is hard not to see, in John, London's own notion of an ideal human type: John has mastered both his physical environment and his own worst instincts. He is comfortable both with others and with himself. He is capable of both giving love and inspiring it; his needs are simple, his outlook is wise, and his manner is unpretentious. The life Buck leads with John reflects genuine loyalty but also increasing freedom, for Buck now begins to explore the surrounding woods and make contact with the surrounding wolves, to whom he finds himself increasingly attracted. Buck, then, is leading an idyllic existence that allows him to satisfy both aspects of his double nature. With John he enjoys the love of a human, and with the wolves he can satisfy the increasingly urgent “call of the wild” he feels growing within him. Of course, in most works by London, any idyllic existence can never last long, and Buck’s idyll is soon shattered when he returns to camp one day only to find the other dogs, the other humans, and John himself slaughtered by Indians. Filled with fury, Buck exacts his revenge, even using his intelligence to trick the marauders into firing deadly arrows at each other (82). Thus the Indians, inadvertently, cause Buck’s final break with humans: “Man and the claims of man no longer bound him” (84). And yet Buck’s link with man is not entirely broken, for each year he returns to the site of John’s death and issues a mournful howl (85–86).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this novel with London’s White Fang, which describes how a wild dog becomes domesticated. In particular, discuss the works in terms of plot, characterization, and theme. Pay special attention to the characters of John Thornton and Weedon Scott; what do these characters imply about London’s social ideals?
2. Study Jack London’s own experiences in the Klondike in 1897–98 and discuss how they compare and contrast with those of Buck. What were London’s own experiences that year with nature, with other people, and with animals?
3. Compare and contrast John Thornton in this novel with Wolf Larsen in London’s novel The Sea-Wolf. Specifically, discuss the two men in terms of their attitude toward love, their treatment of others, and the ultimate success of their lives. Which character do you think London admires more, and why?
4. Compare and contrast the opening chapters of the novel with the closing chapters. Using specific examples, discuss the ways in which Buck’s “personality” has changed between the beginning of the book and its conclusion. How is he different at the close than he was at the start of the book? What lessons has he learned, and how have they affected his attitudes toward others and his interactions with them?

The Sea-Wolf (1904)

When Humphrey Van Weyden, a prosperous man of letters, is shipwrecked while crossing San Francisco Bay, he is picked up by a ship full of seal hunters commanded by the imperious and brutal Wolf Larsen, who decides to make “Hump” a cabin boy to replace a dead crewman. During the ship’s long voyage, the once-weak Van Weyden is forced to become physically and psychologically tough in order to survive the harsh treatment he both witnesses and receives, meanwhile engaging in spirited philosophical debates with the intelligent, articulate Larsen, whose view of life is hard, unsentimental, and uncompromising. After the poet Maud Brewster is also rescued at sea, she and Humphrey manage to escape and begin building a new life together on a deserted island, but the unexpected reappearance of Larsen, who is now sick and dying, not only introduces new threats but also gives the lovers one more chance to return to civilization.

As do many of London’s other tales (especially The Call of the Wild), this novel takes an untested, complacent character who has been living a comfortable, predictable life and suddenly plunges him into a strange environment full of harsh challenges and threats. The character must (and does) learn to survive, but only by sacrificing many civilized illusions. Here as in so many other works, London implies that civilization is merely a veneer covering a more basic primitive reality—a reality no creature can afford to ignore if it hopes to continue living. The Sea-Wolf, however, is an especially powerful and interesting treatment of London’s familiar themes, and much of its effectiveness derives from London’s creation of the fascinating character of Wolf Larsen. On the one hand, he is crude, brutal, mean, and even vicious; on the other, he is thoughtful, well read, and supremely capable of both asserting and defending his highly unconventional beliefs. He is both physically strong and mentally agile, sophisticated in his thinking yet primitive in his impulses, and his debates with “Hump” are among the most interesting passages in the book. In many ways this novel is much more complex than The Call of the Wild; there are a greater diversity of characters, much greater emphasis on both dialogue and dialect, and considerably more stress on irony and sardonic humor. The ship functions as a small world—a microcosm that is not only unfamiliar to most readers (and therefore inherently interesting) but also inherently unpredictable, both because of the sea in which it sails and because of the diverse crew it contains. London shows real skill at characterization, and the fact that the story is told from Van Weyden's perspective gives the work a good deal of its interest. On the one hand, the narrator is laughable, effete, and pretentious, but, on the other hand, we cannot afford to mock him much, because few of us would be any better prepared to confront a man like Wolf Larsen than Van Weyden is. As the story proceeds, Van Weyden increasingly wins the respect of Larsen, the other crew members, and the novel's readers, especially when he bravely tries to hold his own in debate with the confident captain. Larsen is a fascinating figure: His ideas and actions are often repellent, but his views are not easily refuted, and they constantly provoke thought. To a much greater degree than in The Call of Wild, the reader feels mentally challenged by The Sea-Wolf: London is not merely philosophizing here but is challenging Humphrey (and us) to respond. We can never predict what Larsen will say or do, and his penchant for brutality makes him a dangerous but compelling figure. Like Humphrey, we can never be sure how to respond to Larsen: One minute he seems repulsive, the next minute sympathetic. Certainly he is one of the most intriguing and memorable characters in American fiction.

Unfortunately, the novel suffers greatly when Maud Brewster arrives. It seems implausible, to begin with, that of all the people Larsen might happen to rescue on the open sea, he would rescue a famous woman poet—someone, moreover, who already knows (and is known by) Humphrey Van Weyden. The dialogue between the supposedly great poet and the allegedly great critic seems insufferably stilted and pretentious, and their growing love for one another seems sentimental in the extreme. When Humphrey, late in the novel, says of Maud that “she was spirit, first and always spirit, etherealized essence of life, calm as her calm eyes, and sure of permanence in the changing order of the universe” (696), it is hard to take either him or London seriously, especially after everything that has gone before in this book. Also implausible is the sudden reappearance of Larsen near the end of the novel, as well as the ability of the inexperienced Humphrey and Maud to refit a badly damaged ship. However, if the second half of the novel often seems contrived and unconvincing, the first half (especially the sections dominated by Larsen) is powerful, intriguing, and full of fascination. Larsen is a kind of demented Nietzschean Superman—a supreme egotist whose belief that might makes right leaves him, by the end of the book, utterly isolated and ironically vulnerable. Dark, brooding, destructive, and finally self-destroying, he is one of the great antiheroes of American literature.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Many critics have attacked the final half of the novel, which describes the love affair of Humphrey and Maud. Can you justify this portion of the book, especially in terms of characterization, diction, and plot? Is it effective in any of these respects?
2. Wolf Larsen has sometimes been compared to Satan in John Milton's Paradise Lost. Examine books 1, 2, and 4, 5, and 6 of that poem, and then discuss the similarities and contrasts between the two characters. For instance, discuss their motives, their philosophies, and their treatment of others.
3. Compare and contrast The Sea-Wolf and Melville's Moby-Dick, paying special attention to such matters as the ways both books combine adventure with philosophizing, the ways both works create complex social worlds, and the ways Ishmael both resembles (and differs from) Humphrey Van Weyden.

“To Build a Fire” (1908)

An unnamed gold miner, with only a year's experience in the frozen Klondike, decides to take a shortcut from the main path as he walks (accompanied only by a husky dog) in severe subfreezing temperatures toward a camp and the comfort it will provide. Having ignored warnings from more experienced men about traveling alone in such cold, the miner prides himself on his skill—until, suddenly, he falls through thin ice into water and feels his feet instantly begin to freeze. Although he successfully builds a fire to warm himself and dry out his socks and shoes, the fire is abruptly extinguished when snow falls from the tree beneath which the fire was built—a mistake that dooms the man first to frantic fear and then to a slow death as the dog watches and wonders.

This story, which is perhaps London's most acclaimed piece of short fiction, is one of many tales he set in the Far North, drawing on his own familiarity with that territory when he was a gold miner there in 1897–98. As does much of his fiction, this work focuses on humans' relations with a natural environment that can seem both literally cold and figuratively cruel but that is actually indifferent and uncaring. London's skill as a writer is already evident in the story's first sentence, which begins by reporting that "Day had broken" (a statement that might at first seem to imply hope and promise) but then continues to note that the day was "cold and gray, exceedingly cold and gray" (a statement that immediately undercuts any initial hint of optimism [462]). The main character is identified simply as "the man": His name and his unique personal identity are unimportant, for in the present context he is merely a representative human trying to survive in circumstances that may seem extreme in one sense but are entirely typical in another. All human beings (London implies) are, like this man, on an ultimately lonely journey in a forbidding and unforgiving environment—a journey that will inevitably end in death. This man, however, has mistakenly decided in several senses to "go it alone": He unwisely departs from the main path, and he foolishly ignores advice to travel with a human partner. Moreover, he shows no affection or concern for the dog who accompanies him and thus, in the end, can expect none in return. Like many of London's works, this one is strengthened by the presence of the animal and the animal's point of view: Animals (London often implies) see life more clearly, less sentimentally, than humans do. They are more in touch with the elemental facts of life than are most humans, who are misled either by their emotions or by their reason. Animals rely on instincts born from generations of close contact with nature, and so animals are, in many ways, wiser than the humans, who pride themselves on rationality or fine feelings.

Here as in so much of his writing, London's prose is dry, objective, clear, and precise. A certain degree of suspense is naturally built into the tale (we wonder from the beginning what will happen to this man and this dog in such a dangerous climate and landscape), and that suspense instantly intensifies when the man steps through the ice and begins his frantic struggle to survive. Yet London avoids melodrama, sentimentality, or cheap theatrics: He merely describes what happens and what each character (both human and canine) thinks and feels. We can recognize the man's foolishness and yet still sympathize with his plight; we can be shocked by his final plan to kill the dog (in a desperate bid to stay alive) and yet still understand his primitive logic. Moreover, while London's skills as an objective, almost relentless reporter are evident throughout the story, other skills become obvious as well. Among these, for instance, are his penchant for irony (particularly in such quick, crisp statements as "The fire was a success. He was safe" [470]), and his talent for presenting perceptions from the elemental perspective of the dog (who tends to think of humans simply as "food-providers and fire-providers" [478]), or his ability to imitate action through sound (as in the alliterative statement "the spittle crackled" [463]). Here as in his other work London also effectively employs dialect (as in the description of the inexperienced man through use of the Indian term chechaquo [462]), and he likewise skillfully uses implication (as when, referring to the human heart simply as a "pump" [469], he robs it of all its conventionally romantic associations and emphasizes instead its vital, mechanistic function). Larger implications seem at work as well when, for instance, London describes the man's treatment of the dog as a mere "toil-slave" controlled (in some typically ironic

6. Examine the ways religion is discussed in The Sea-Wolf and then discuss the depiction and relevance of religion in The Call of the Wild, “The Law of Life,” and “To Build a Fire.” How (if at all) is religion presented in these works? What is implied about the nature of reality by the way(s) religion is or is not discussed in these works?
7. Compare and contrast the presentation of women in The Sea-Wolf, The Call of the Wild, “The Law of Life,” and “To Build a Fire.” Discuss the ways women function in these works as symbolic characters, how the works are affected by the presence or absence of female characters, and the kinds of women London seems to admire or disdain.
8. Compare and contrast the presentation of Indian characters in “The Law of Life” and The Call of the Wild. For example, discuss the complexity of London’s presentation of Indian culture(s) and characters in both stories, the ways Indians are used symbolically, and the relations between Indians and physical nature and animals.
9. Compare and contrast Captain Ahab in Melville’s Moby-Dick and Wolf Larsen in London’s The Sea-Wolf, especially in terms of their treatment of their crews, their guiding philosophies, and their ultimate fate. What is each man’s attitude toward God?
10. From his own day to the present, Jack London has always been one of the most widely read and widely admired American authors in other countries. How would you explain this enormous international appeal? In particular, discuss any aspects of The Call of the Wild that would make this book of great interest to non-

American readers. How does the book explore themes of universal interest?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Auerbach, Jonathan. Male Call: Becoming Jack London. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Hedrick, Joan D. Jack London and His Work. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1982.
- Hodson, Sara S., and Jeanne Campbell Reesman, eds. Jack London: One Hundred Years a Writer. San Marino, Calif.: Huntington Library, 2002.
- Jack London Foundation. Available online. URL: <http://jacklondonfdn.org>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- London, Jack. Novels and Stories: The Call of the Wild, White Fang, The Sea-Wolf, Short Stories. Edited by Donald Pizer. New York: Library of America, 1982.
- Lundquist, James. Jack London: Adventures, Ideas, and Fiction. New York: Continuum, 1990.
- Nuernberg, Susan M., ed. The Critical Response to Jack London. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1995.
- Pizer, Donald. “Chronology.” In Novels and Stories: The Call of the Wild, White Fang, The Sea-Wolf, Short Stories. By Jack London. New York: Library of America, 1982.
- Reesman, Jeanne Campbell. Jack London: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1999.
- Sinclair, Andrew. Jack: A Biography of Jack London. New York: Harper & Row, 1977.
- Tavernier-Courbin, Jacqueline, ed. Critical Essays on Jack London. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1983.
- The World of Jack London. Available online. URL: <http://www.jacklondon.net>. Accessed April 7, 2009.

Robert C. Evans

CLAUDE MCKAY (1890–1948)

I believe that whenever literature and art are good and great they leap over narrow group barriers and periods to make a universal appeal.

(qtd. in Hathaway 46)

Although Claude McKay was born and raised in Jamaica and although he spent many years of his adult life living and traveling in Russia, Western Europe, and North Africa, he also spent a good deal of time residing in (and writing about) the United States. He is generally considered one of the most significant black authors in America in the first half of the 20th century. In his poetry, fiction, memoirs, and nonfiction prose he established a reputation as a creative and often controversial figure who was never shy about expressing himself, even when doing so meant alienating friends or allies and creating new enemies. He moved from an early sympathy with communism to a strong anticommunist stance, and he also moved from a career that seemed to hold enormous promise to a life of relative poverty and neglect.

Most of the details of McKay's life are available in the superb study by Tyrone Tillery and especially in the excellent and lengthy biography by Wayne F. Cooper. Born on September 15, 1890, in the small village of Sunny Ville, Jamaica, McKay was the youngest of eight children produced by Thomas Francis McKay and his wife, Ann Elizabeth. Although the parents were peasants, and although they were black in a society in which people of mixed race ranked above blacks but below whites, Thomas and Ann were respected and influential members of the local community and church. Economically they were better off than most of their neighbors; they were also better educated and more ambitious and were particularly devoted to Baptist Christianity. Thomas was a serious and somewhat distant figure, whereas his wife was more relaxed and loving; Claude's ties with his mother were, in consequence, especially strong. When he was eight, however, his parents sent him off to live with his oldest brother, Uriah Theophilous ("U'Theo"), a full-time schoolteacher and occasional journalist who lived with his wife near the resort town of Montego Bay. U'Theo's library was well stocked and U'Theo's own thinking was open-minded, and it was while living with his brother that young Claude fell in love with learning and began to distance himself from the simple faith of his parents. During these years he had no contact with them, and by the time he (along with U'Theo and his wife) returned to Sunny Ville when Claude was 14, Claude already felt somewhat distant (or at least distinct) from the rest of his family. Although he could be friendly, a kind of reserve characterized his relations with most people throughout his life, and his sense of independence often put him in conflict with friends and foes alike.

Although Claude began training in 1901 to become a schoolteacher, in 1906 he won a stipend to begin three years of study at a trade school in Kingston. Early in 1907, however, an earthquake struck the city, and so Claude soon moved to a smaller town to prepare for certification as a maker and repairer of wheels. Nevertheless, after two years of training in that profession, he returned home, briefly tried his hand at farming, and then, after the death of his beloved mother, moved once more to Kingston. After working briefly in a factory there, he joined the local police force, where he seems to have bonded closely with some of his fellow officers. Tillery even suggests that McKay fell in love with one of them (7–8), and certainly later in life he had sexual relations with both men and women, with perhaps a stronger inclination toward homosexuality. In any case, by this time he had begun writing poems, and after he quit the police force he was fortunate to make the acquaintance of a middle-aged Englishman named Walter Jekyll, a resident of the island, whose interest in Jamaican verse had led him to publish a well-regarded book on the subject. Jekyll took an immediate (and perhaps romantic) interest in the young poet and encouraged his work, particularly his poetry written in the Jamaican dialect. Thanks in large part to Jekyll's support, McKay in 1912 published Songs of Jamaica—a book that not only sold well but won him a literary prize. This book was soon followed by Constab Ballads (1912), which reflected his experiences on the police force (or constabulary). By the time he was in his very early twenties, then, McKay had already begun a noteworthy literary career.

However, 1912 was an important year in McKay's life for other reasons as well. By the summer of that year he had left Jamaica for the United States, intent on earning a degree in agriculture at the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, the famous all-black school founded and directed by BOOKER T. WASHINGTON. Nevertheless, although McKay admired Washington, he soon tired of the rigid lifestyle at the school itself, and so he quickly left and instead began studying agriculture at Kansas State College. He remained there for almost two years, but by 1914 he had decided that farming was not his future. Fortunately, early that year a generous gift of several thousand dollars (probably from Jekyll) allowed McKay not only to leave Kansas for New York City but also to marry there a Jamaican woman, Eulalie Imelda Lewars, with whom he had been corresponding for some time. Their marriage occurred on July 30, 1914, when Claude was 23, but within six months a pregnant Eulalie had returned to Jamaica. There she gave birth to a daughter (Rhue Hope McKay), whom McKay never met. McKay never married again, although he was involved with various men and women throughout his life.

With his gift of money gone by 1915, McKay needed to find some way—any way—of supporting himself, but this was not an easy task in a country in which employment opportunities for black males (even educated ones) were hardly abundant. He took a succession of menial jobs—“porter, fireman [to coal-burning boilers], waiter, bar-boy, houseman” (qtd. in Cooper 77)—but during all the years from 1915 to 1919 his main hope was to become a writer. He began submitting poems (usually conventional sonnets) to various publications and eventually saw a few of them published. In 1917, for instance, two poems—including one called “The Harlem Dancer”—were printed in a small but influential magazine, and from 1917 to 1919 McKay himself was based in the Harlem neighborhood of New York City (although he spent most of his time working as a waiter on the railroad). Harlem, in fact, would soon become the center of a renaissance in black creativity that affected all the arts, but especially literature. By this time McKay had attracted the attention and support of Frank Harris, an influential white editor, and by this time as well McKay had also begun to make an increasingly outspoken commitment to left-wing political causes. In 1919 he had met and won the patronage of Max Eastman, the wealthy but radical editor of a magazine called the Liberator, which now began to publish McKay's vocally political poems. These included a sonnet called “If We Must Die,” which soon won McKay widespread fame as a fierce opponent of racial discrimination. From this point forward, McKay became known as a significant black writer with a strong commitment to economic and political radicalism, both at home and abroad.

Later in 1919, in fact, McKay was able to travel to London through the support of some socialist friends, and while there he became more and more interested in Marxism and began working for an English socialist periodical. In 1920 he published in London a collection of his poems titled Spring in New Hampshire, but by 1921 he had returned to New York, where he now became an editor of the Liberator. His book of poems Harlem Shadows appeared in 1922; in that same year he resigned from his post at the Liberator (after a disagreement with a more strident Marxist) and undertook a momentous journey to the newly formed Soviet Union, which was now the center of international communism. Although representatives of the American Communist Party at first opposed any official recognition of McKay, the Soviet government soon accredited him as a representative to the international communist congress, and McKay not only spoke to the group on behalf of American blacks but also received highly friendly receptions from the Soviet people. Back in western Europe in 1923, he was treated for a severe bout of syphilis and began a 10-year voluntary exile from the United States, living mostly in France but also in Spain and Morocco. Ironically, during the very decade when black writers, intellectuals, and artists in Harlem were beginning to attract widespread attention, both from other blacks and from whites, McKay was abroad, living in rather poverty-stricken circumstances. He did write a novel ("Color Scheme") in 1925, but he destroyed it. In 1928, however, his novel Home to Harlem was published with great success, even though some of the more conservative members of the black community found it shocking and distasteful. In 1929 a second novel—Banjo—appeared, followed in 1932 by a collection of stories (Gingertown), which was in turn followed in 1933 by Banana Bottom, the novel that many critics consider McKay's best. Unfortunately, none of the books after Home to Harlem earned McKay much money, partly because by the early 1930s America and the world were in the depths of the Great Depression. Financial conditions were desperate for everyone, and especially for McKay.

In 1934 he finally returned to the United States, hoping to find work but instead finding himself compelled to take up temporary residence in a welfare camp for the unemployed, many of whom turned out to be alcoholics. Given such circumstances, one might have expected him to become even more closely associated with communism than he had been in the early 1920s, but instead, just the opposite happened. As the 1930s wore on, McKay became increasingly anticommunist, partly because he had grown disenchanted with Stalin's brutal Soviet dictatorship and partly because McKay had by now been involved in numerous skirmishes with homegrown communists, who, he felt, were often hypocritical, racist, and/or unscrupulous in their treatment of anyone who was not a true believer. In his 1937 autobiography, A Long Way from Home, he tended to downplay the extent of his own earlier infatuation with communism; by now he had become more an advocate of black self-reliance and self-help than of international socialism. When Soviet Russia signed a peace pact with Nazi Germany in 1939 (allowing the two nations to carve up Poland when World War II broke out), McKay's distrust of communism seemed vindicated, but by this time he was no longer a very influential voice on the African-American scene. His prickly personality had alienated many former friends, and his days as a major creative artist now seemed behind him. In 1940 he did publish a book, Harlem: Negro Metropolis, and he also continued to write essays and poems. In the early 1940s, however, his health began to fail, and he turned increasingly for friendship and support to friends who were deeply involved in the Catholic Church. After McKay suffered a stroke while working in a shipyard in 1943, his reliance on his Catholic friends became even stronger, and in spring 1944 he moved to Chicago to work for Bishop Bernard Sheil as an adviser on both communism and blacks and as a lecturer on social topics. By the fall of that year McKay had himself become a Catholic, a decision he explained in various writings published in 1945 and 1946. Partly his decision was motivated by his anticommunism; partly he was grateful for the church's recent support; partly he believed that Catholicism was the one organization best equipped to resist tyranny and promote racial justice; and partly, no doubt, he hoped for literary patronage from a well-endowed source of funding. In any case, when McKay finally died of heart failure in Chicago on May 22, 1948, his funeral was Roman Catholic, but for a final commemorative service his body was sent (appropriately enough) home to Harlem.

“Harlem Shadows” (1918, 1922)

Harlem was (and is) a section of New York City inhabited mainly by African Americans. In this poem the speaker describes and laments the degradation of young black women who feel compelled to earn their income as prostitutes.

The poem opens by describing “the halting footsteps of a lass” (l. 1). Appropriately enough, not only this line but most of the poem (which describes literal streetwalkers) is written in the regular rhythm of iambic meter, in which even syllables are stressed and odd syllables are unstressed. The regular rhythm of the poem almost mimics the movement of walking and thus suits the poem’s subject matter, but the work is also skillful in other ways as well. The word lass, for instance, seems almost deliberately archaic and even romantic; lass (which refers to a girl or young woman) is a word used mainly in northern England and in Scotland and thus seems somewhat ironic in the present context. The word also suggests innocence and youth and thus again seems ironic, since the young women McKay describes are earning money in ways that quickly rob them of both traits. Not until the fourth line does the emphasis on prostitution become obvious and explicit; for the first three lines, then, the poem postpones this crucial information, so that when the information arrives we feel a sense of loss—a sense of vanished innocence. The sudden realization that the “lass[es]” mentioned in line 1 are actually prostitutes enhances the poignant and ironic reference to them (in line 5) as “little dark girls in slippered feet”—phrasing that makes them seem almost delicately childlike. That irony, in turn, is underscored by the immediately ensuing reference to their “prowling through the night” (l. 6), phrasing that makes them sound almost like animals looking for prey. In the short space of six lines, then, the women have been described as lasses, then as prostitutes, then as “little . . . girls” (l. 6), and then almost as beasts. The constant shifts in the ways they are described imply the speaker’s complex responses to the lifestyle he describes—responses that mix affection and dismay, pity and repulsion.

The rhythm and other sound effects of the poem become more complex in the second stanza. McKay had already used alliteration (repetition of consonant sounds) in stanza 1, especially in the phrase “bend and barter” (l. 4). In stanza 2, however, he combines both alliteration and assonance (repetition of vowel sounds) in the phrase “know no rest” (l. 8), and he also effectively emphasizes the words “long night” (l. 7), not only by accenting both words but by preceding them with two unaccented syllables. He then echoes “long night” in the subtly varied phrase “lone night” two lines later, just as he uses the phrase “street to street” as a kind of refrain in the final line of each stanza. The poem, in other words, reveals a sophisticated sense of music, and this kind of artistry is enhanced by its subtle use of imagery as well. In the second stanza, for instance, the speaker makes it clear that the setting is in winter, and although the falling snow makes the landscape beautiful, it also makes the “slippered feet” of the girls (mentioned earlier; l. 5) seem woefully unprotected. As the poem proceeds, in fact, both the tone and the imagery become progressively darker and more depressing; thus the first stanza refers to “little . . . girls . . . in slippered feet” (l. 5), while the second stanza refers to “half-clad girls of tired feet” (l. 11), and then the third excludes any reference to “girls” at all, focusing instead simply on their “weary, weary feet” (l. 17). Likewise, the feet at first are described as “prowling” (which at least suggests animal vigor and vitality; l. 6), then as “trudging” (which implies an almost lifeless weariness, but at least a sense of direction; l. 12), and then finally as “wandering” (which suggests an absence of any aim or meaningful purpose; l. 18). Through the use of such subtle shifts, and especially through the constant and constantly changing references to feet, McKay reveals real poetic skill, and if the poem sometimes seems too effusively romantic and too much focused on the speaker rather than on the girls (as in the “Ah’s” of lines 13 and 17 and the phrase “heart of me” in that latter line), these minor flaws do not outweigh the work’s general accomplishment.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with McKay’s sonnet titled “The Harlem Dancer.” What are the similarities and differences in the depictions of women in both works? Why are women (rather than men) used as symbolic figures in both poems? How is Harlem portrayed in these two poems?
2. Discuss the depiction of prostitution in this poem and the way(s) it is depicted in W. E. B. DuBois’s sociological study The Philadelphia Negro. How do the two works illuminate one another? Why is prostitution a potent symbol for the more general conditions blacks have had to suffer in America?
3. Why do you think McKay chooses to focus on the feet of these women rather than on other parts of their bodies? How do the references to feet contribute to the unity and coherence of the work? Discuss the use of color imagery in this poem. How do the various colors add a sense of variety to the poem?

“If We Must Die” (1919, 1922)

In this poem (which won McKay instant fame when it was published), the speaker exhorts his fellow sufferers of oppression, urging them not to surrender to their persecutors but to offer courageous resistance.

Here as in other poems, McKay ironically uses a highly traditional form (the Shakespearean sonnet, with a rhyme scheme of abab / cdcd / efef / gg) to give expression to highly defiant content: The attitude of the speaker is almost revolutionary, whereas the form of the poem is strictly traditional. McKay thus shows that he can appropriate the legacy of Western culture and use its standard forms for his own purposes; he demonstrates that he is deeply familiar with the conventions of Western art, even as he employs those conventions to resist the worst aspects of Western culture. No one, therefore, can accuse either McKay himself or the speaker of this poem of being uneducated or illiterate, and indeed part of the power of the poem derives from the fact that the speaker expresses ideals of freedom, courage, and self-respect that are often considered central to Western culture. The poem’s form and even its content thus imply the ways in which whites, by persecuting blacks, have betrayed the deepest values of their own cultural heritage.

The effectiveness of this poem depends as much on the skill with which it is written as on the ideas it expresses. McKay effectively varies the meter of the poem (for instance) to emphasize the verbs Hunted and penned in line 2, just as he also uses double alliteration, near-rhyme, and metrical variation to stress the connection between Making and mock in line 4. In addition, McKay uses repetition in the opening halves of lines 1 and 4—repetition that therefore stresses the distinct contents of the second halves of each line. Likewise, he effectively employs enjambment (in which the sense of the phrase runs beyond the unpunctuated end of the line), making use of this technique not only in lines 1–2 but especially adeptly in lines 6–7, so that the phrase “In vain” has special stress. (The speaker suggests that blood may indeed be shed—but at least it will not be shed “In vain.”) Especially potent is the strong double-accented emphasis on the key word deathblow in line 11, while metrical stress is also used with special effectiveness in the final line, in which Pressed has unusual emphasis, and in which the double stress on syllables 4 and 5 gives the line a memorably tight and tangled rhythm.

In addition to employing sound and meter skillfully, McKay uses individual word choices to great effect. Thus the speaker urges his fellows not to behave like hogs (animals often thought of as fat, stupid, and dirty; l. 1), while he compares their persecutors to “mad and hungry dogs” (l. 3), thus making them seem irrational, inhuman, and out of control. Dogs, however, are at least familiar creatures and are sometimes well behaved; later the enemies are described as “monsters” (l. 7), phrasing that makes them seem unnatural, abnormal, deformed, hideous, wicked, and cruel. Then, later still, they are called a “cowardly pack” (l. 13), phrasing that is almost contemptuous in implying that they are innately weak and unheroic, their temporary strength depending on sheer numbers alone. They operate as a stupid, unthinking unit rather than as a collection of autonomous beings, unlike the “men”—the true human beings—the speaker tries to rally. The irony, of course, is that it is the “dogs” and “monsters” who, by trying to treat others as beasts, behave as mere beasts themselves.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with Booker T. Washington’s famous “Atlanta Compromise” speech. How do the works differ in tone, spirit, and purpose? To which audiences are the works addressed? How is each persuasive in its own way?
2. McKay’s poem was first published in 1919. Do some historical research in order to try to recover the original historical contexts of the work. What was happening in American race relations in 1919? How is McKay’s poem partly a response to those circumstances? Why did the poem have the kind of immediate impact it did? Can the poem speak to other situations besides racial conflict? Is there any evidence that it has proven its appeal in such broader circumstances?

“The Lynching” (1919, 1922)

The title suggests that the poem will describe one of the illegal public hangings that were often used by mobs to persecute and punish alleged wrongdoers—hangings that were especially employed by whites against blacks (particularly in the South) in the decades after the Civil War. Very quickly, however, the language suggests that McKay is comparing such a lynching with the crucifixion of Christ. By the end of the poem the focus returns more obviously to a contemporary lynching, but the analogies between the two events are now clear.

The poem is cast in the form of a sonnet with the following rhyme scheme: abba / cddc / effe / gg.

The title suggests that the work will describe the kind of lynchings that were becoming increasingly notorious as examples of the racist abuse suffered by American blacks, especially in southern states. The opening line, however, especially because of the capitalized word Spirit, implies that the poem may be describing the immediate aftermath of Christ’s crucifixion. This possible reference to Christ seems confirmed by the next two lines, but then line 4 introduces momentary confusion, since it mentions an “unforgiven” sin, whereas the whole point of the crucifixion was to redeem mankind from its sinfulness. In line 5, though, McKay seems to allude to the star of Bethlehem, and lines 6, 7, and most of line 8 also seem appropriate as descriptions of the crucified Christ. The last word of line 8 is briefly ambiguous: Does char mean a small cart, wagon, or chariot (as in the famous spiritual “Swing low, sweet chariot,” to which the line may allude)? Or does char refer to something burned or charred? Both meanings of the word were acceptable in McKay’s era, and perhaps both meanings are simultaneously acceptable in this poem. The first meaning would seem to refer most clearly to Christ, while the second meaning would seem most appropriate to the lynched body of a black man, since lynched bodies were indeed often burned. In the single word char, then, McKay may combine and epitomize the double meanings already suggested by the title and by the first eight lines.

The double reference seems to continue in lines 9 and 10 and the first half of line 11: The hanging body, the gathering crowds, and the interested women could all be appropriate in describing either Christ’s crucifixion or a lynching, and certainly the irony of the phrase “Day dawned” (which would normally carry hopeful connotations; l. 9) would apply to either event. By the second half of line 12, however, the poem’s focus seems to have shifted clearly to a modern-day lynching, and by the end of the work that modern focus seems particularly clear. In any case, it seems dreadfully ironic that women and children (often symbolically associated with innocence and compassion) are the ones described as either unmoved by, joyous about, the dead body. Such phrasing makes the poem seem all the darker in its final tone, since these lines imply little hope for the future. The mothers and their children either are indifferent to the ugly sight (“never a one / Showed sorrow”; ll. 11–12) or are actually filled with “fiendish glee” (l. 14). The work ends, then, on a thoroughly ironic word that epitomizes all the paradoxes suggested by the poem as a whole.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read this work alongside RICHARD WRIGHT's story “Big Boy Leaves Home.” How are lynchings presented in each work? Is one work more memorable or effective than the other? Explain your response in detail, paying special attention to such matters as genre, point of view, imagery, and the lengths of the two works.
2. Compare and contrast this poem with ERNEST HEMINGWAY's novella The Old Man and the Sea, paying particular attention to the ways both works use religious imagery, allusions, and symbolism. What are the advantages of employing religious references in works that otherwise seem to deal with secular issues? How does use of such references contribute to the range, resonance, or depth of a work?
3. Why might lines 2–3 seem particularly disturbing or unsettling? What might those lines imply about the nature of God? Discuss the relationship between those lines and line 7. What is the “awful sin” mentioned in line 4? How is the reference to “women” in this poem especially ironic in view of traditional depictions of Christ's crucifixion?

“Exhortation: Summer, 1919” (1920, 1922)

The poem is set explicitly during the year just after the end of World War I, when many African-American servicemen were returning from the conflict, hoping for new opportunities, and when many of the blacks who had emigrated to the North from the South to work in wartime industries were hoping for a new and better phase in their lives. Instead (unfortunately), various destructive and violent riots broke out in response to racial discrimination in a number of northern cities; many blacks died, and McKay's poem—which prophesies the dawning of a new day for blacks (a new day linked with the rise of Africa)—is therefore simultaneously hopeful and ironic.

This work differs from many of McKay's other poems in several important respects. In the first place, it is not a sonnet; instead, it consists of 26 relatively long lines, ranging in length from 11 to 16 syllables each. In appearance, language, and rhythms, the poem seems indebted to the work of Walt Whitman; it is as if McKay thought that he could not do justice to his prophetic message here in the shorter, more constricted, more conventional sonnet form. As its title suggests, the poem is a kind of formal public speech summoning the spirit of a group to encourage proper attitudes or action; the sonnet would not have been the most appropriate genre to use for such an extended hortatory purpose. However, another way in which this poem differs from many others by McKay is in the very explicitness of its racial rhetoric. In some of his sonnets (such as “If We Must Die” or “America”), McKay never openly mentions racial conflict (although such contexts are often implied); in the present poem, however, the references to Africa and Ethiopia, along with the context implied by the title itself, make the racial message unmistakable. The poem is primarily addressed by one black person to other blacks. Finally, another difference between “Exhortation” and many of McKay's other poems lies in its peculiar structure. Not only does McKay here abandon the sonnet form, but he also abandons regular, predictable stanza structures altogether. Thus, the first stanza consists of only four lines; the second consists of nine lines, while the third consists of 13 lines (although six of those 13 are repeated, with one slight variation, from the preceding stanza). The poem thus has a cumulative structure: The stanzas grow in length and intensity as the poem proceeds, and the heavy use of repetition gives the work an almost chanting, songlike cadence. In its rhythms, shape, and rhetoric, this is one of McKay's most distinctive poems.

Here as in many of his other works, McKay reveals a discerning ear. From the first line to the last (for instance), it is clear that he will not be content with using straight iambic meter (in which each even syllable is stressed and each odd syllable is unstressed). Instead, in this poem the very first word is accented, and throughout the work McKay shows an unusual willingness to play with (and vary) the rhythms of his lines. The first syllable of the word rumbles, for instance, receives exceptionally strong stress because the two syllables preceding it are unaccented (l. 1), and indeed this technique is one McKay employs frequently elsewhere in the poem. One particularly striking use of this rhythm occurs, for instance, in line 5, in which three unaccented syllables precede the heavily accented new dawn, which thus receives all the more stress because of the preceding unstressed words. (The same tactic is employed in the reference to a “strong new world” in line 11, where three heavily stressed syllables are preceded by three syllables that are unstressed.) However, McKay also effectively employs other sound effects, such as assonance (echoing vowel sounds, as in “rumble” and “thunder” in line 1), internal rhyme (such as “quake” and “break” in line 2 or “birth” and “earth” in lines 8 and 21), and alliteration (repetition of consonants, as in “Sons of the seductive night” [l. 15]). It is as if McKay, in this work, sought a new kind of music that would be appropriate to the new day he called for and predicted. In this work more than in many others (with the obvious exception of “If We Must Die”), the speaker functions as a kind of public bard—as the historian, conscience, and voice of an entire people.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with McKay’s sonnet “If We Must Die.” How are the poems similar in rhetoric, intent, tone, and diction? How are they different in form, meaning, and final effect?
2. What does this poem imply about the relations between Africa and African Americans? How does the poem perhaps reflect new thinking about Africa that was beginning to arise in the first decades of the 20th century? Who, for instance, was Marcus Garvey, and how might he be relevant as part of the historical context of this poem?

“America” (1921, 1922)

The speaker describes his paradoxical relationship with the land in which he lives: On the one hand, he feels oppressed by his country (probably because he is a member of a racial minority, although this point is never openly stated); on the other hand, he feels that such oppression strengthens him by forcing him to achieve a tough resilience. In any case, he anticipates the day when the country that oppresses him will collapse as history takes its inevitable toll.

Here as in so many other works, McKay uses the sonnet form (this time with a rhyme scheme of abab / cdcd / efef / gg) to give emphatic brevity and point to a fairly bitter and sardonic poem: The work would be less potent if it were lengthy and less controlled. The initial line uses effective delay, becoming openly ironic only when we reach the final word, while the second line enhances the intensity of the poem as the speaker shifts from an image of being fed to an image of being attacked and even eaten. Line 3 begins with an emphatically stressed verb, while line 4 concludes the opening sentence with a surprising paradox: In spite of everything, the speaker loves the “cultured hell” (an effective oxymoron, or union of words with opposite meanings) that “tests [his] youth.” The word youth makes his status as victim of oppression seem all the more unfortunate, but the same word also suggests his strength, his resilience, and his willingness (even his eagerness) to face a challenge.

The next few lines, however, seem the least successful in the work (ll. 5–10). The similes (comparisons using the word like or as) seem undistinguished; the imagery seems mostly unmemorable; and the ensuing claim—that the speaker feels neither “terror” nor “malice” and offers no “word of jeer”—seems refuted by the existence of the poem itself, especially the opening two lines and the final couplet. In any case, in the final four lines the speaker prophesies the collapse of America; he predicts that it will suffer a kind of national shipwreck, and he compares its ultimate fate to a vision of “priceless treasures sinking in the sand” (l. 14). The speaker does not say whether this fate is a kind of divine punishment or whether it is simply the sort of decline that has befallen all once-mighty nations. He takes no unequivocal joy in the decline he predicts, but neither (for obvious reasons) does he express any regret. Instead he seems indifferent to the fate of a nation that has, after all, shown him only contempt and even malevolent hatred.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read McKay's poem alongside “The School Days of an Indian Girl” by GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN (Zitkala-Ša). How is America depicted in both works? How do the works compare and/or differ in tones, attitudes, and rhetorical strategies?
2. How does McKay's sonnet compare and contrast with CARL SANDBURG's poem titled “Chicago”? Discuss the works in terms of form, technique, tone, and purpose. What are the fundamental attitudes of the two works?
3. Discuss the specific metaphors and similes and other figurative language in this poem. In what cases, and for what reasons, do you find them either effective, ineffective, or some combination of both? Discuss the tone of lines 8–10; do you find that tone effective or ineffective? Explain your answer.

“Outcast” (1922)

The speaker, who feels like an alien in a foreign culture, longs for the language, heritage, peace, and freedom he associates with Africa, the land of his ancestors.

Like many of McKay's poems, this one is a sonnet consisting of three quatrains (or four-line stanzas) and a concluding couplet (two rhyming lines). The rhyme scheme is thus abab / cdcd / efef / gg. Ironically, then, McKay uses a highly structured poetic form—one with a long history in Western literature—to lament the bondage imposed on blacks by Western culture and to extol freedom from Western influences. The poem begins by referring to Africa as “dim regions”—a phrase in which the first two syllables are emphasized by being doubly accented, and a phrase in which the word dim is meaningful in several different senses. Africa is “dim” (unknown, obscure) not only because it was as yet a relatively unexplored continent, but also because it is a place about which the speaker himself has little personal knowledge. Yet it is the place “whence my fathers came” (l. 1)—a phrase in which the noun refers not only to the speaker's direct ancestors but also (more broadly) to the ancestors of his race as a whole. When the speaker describes his “spirit” as being “bondaged by the body” (l. 2), the alliterated phrase not only alludes to the ancient Christian belief that the soul is imprisoned in the flesh, but also refers to the literal bondage endured by African Americans during several centuries of slavery. Meanwhile, the ironic juxtaposition of conservative phrasing with radical content continues in line 4, in which the speaker mentions his desire to “sing forgotten jungle songs,” even as the rhythm of the line (and of the lines before and after it) is a perfectly regular example of iambic pentameter verse (in which the even syllables are accented and the odd syllables are not). The very form of the poem, in other words, exemplifies the extent to which the speaker has mastered the discipline of a kind of poetry associated with the culture he partly rejects.

As does any talented poet, however, McKay uses metrical regularity to establish predictable patterns—patterns that will then emphasize any departures from them. Thus, when the speaker describes how the “great western world holds” him in bondage, every syllable except the third is stressed, so that the meter not only accentuates the power of the West but also mimics the kind of pressure by which the speaker feels himself enthralled. A similar effect is achieved in the final line, where the phrase “white man's menace” receives unusually heavy metrical emphasis on the first three syllables. The fact that most of the poem is highly regular in its iambic rhythms makes any such moments of metrical irregularity stand out. In this way and in others, therefore, McKay reveals a sure ear for sound effects, just as he also shows a solid sense of the varied connotations of words. In line 8, for instance, the speaker refers to the “alien gods” to whom he must bend his knee. If he had referred to a god (singular) rather than to gods (plural), the line might have seemed a direct attack on Christianity; instead, gods can suggest not only the Christian God but also the various idols worshipped in the West, especially the false gods associated with materialism. Likewise, when the speaker says that he feels like “a thing apart” (l. 12), the word thing (which is indefinite and vague) not only implies that he feels less than fully human but also suggests that he is treated as less than a true person by the surrounding culture. In this work as in any good poem, the important thing is not the meaning itself but the skill with which that meaning is communicated.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read this work alongside T. S. ELIOT’s poem “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” and then discuss the theme of alienation in both works. What is the basic source of alienation in each poem? How do the speakers differ in their backgrounds and attitudes? What implied attitude does each poet take toward each speaker? How are Prufrock’s problems more individual and “personal” than the problems of McKay’s speaker?
2. Compare and contrast this work with LANGSTON HUGHES’s poem “The Negro Speaks of Rivers.” In particular, discuss the forms, tones, imagery, and diction of the two works. How do both works effectively use simple, clear diction?
3. Discuss the ways references to gender are used in this poem. Do you see any consistency in those references? How and why might a feminist object to those references? How might McKay respond to such possible objections?

Home to Harlem (1928)

When Jake Brown, a vigorous, friendly, and open-minded young black man goes AWOL from the army and returns to Harlem, he chances to meet and spend the night with a beautiful and generous young prostitute, Felice, who refuses to accept payment for their encounter. Although he unfortunately loses touch with her, he thinks of her often during the rest of the novel, which describes his encounters with various other lower-class blacks as they work at various jobs while looking forward to chances to drink, party, and spend time with members of the opposite sex. While working, Jake befriends Ray, an intellectual young black who lacks Jake’s carefree attitudes; eventually Ray departs, but by the end of the book Jake has reestablished his connection with Felice, and as the novel concludes, they look forward to a happy life together in Chicago.

McKay’s novel is often considered one of the seminal works of fiction of the Harlem Renaissance, the flowering of artistic creativity by African Americans living in or near the Harlem neighborhood of New York in the 1920s. The book created significant controversy when it was published: Some black opinion leaders thought that the work played into white prejudices by giving so much emphasis to so many of the seedier aspects of African-American urban life, such as violence, prostitution, drinking, and even drug abuse. W. E. B. DuBois famously wrote that the novel made him sick and left him feeling in need of a shower, but other blacks—including such up-and-coming young writers as Langston Hughes—had the opposite reaction. For them the novel was refreshing in its honesty, its realism, and its commitment to telling the truth even when the truth might prove unappetizing to the more “refined” segments of the black community. For these readers, McKay seemed a conscientious artist rather than a mere political propagandist. DuBois, however, argued that even the best black art could and should have a propagandistic dimension; it should help improve the lives, and advance the cause, of black people, rather than merely describing the ways in which many of the less conventionally successful members of the community lived.

McKay’s determination to present an unvarnished picture of some of the less appealing aspects of existence is signaled by the novel's first sentence, which describes the protagonist's life as a worker on a ship: "All that Jake knew about the freighter on which he stoked was that it stank between sea and sky" (1). Since much of the novel deals with physical sensations of one sort or another, it seems appropriate that it should open with this strong emphasis on the sense of smell, even if the smell is repulsive. Jake, however, is an infinitely adaptable character; nothing depresses long, and it is clear that McKay admires and respects his hero's resilience. Jake is not even bothered very much by the insects that bite him as he tries to sleep: "'Nip me all you wanta, Mister Louse,' said Jake. 'Roll on, Mister Ship, and stinks all the way as you rolls. Jest take me 'long to Harlem is all I pray. I'm crazy to see again the brown-skin chippies 'long Lenox Avenue. Oh boy!'" (3). This passage is typical of the book in several ways, including in its strong emphasis on nonstandard English dialect, its use of slang from the 1920s (such as chippies), and its stress on irrepressible sexual energy. Jake is dynamic, vital, and lacking in any kind of hypocrisy; chippies, for instance, was a slang term for prostitutes, and so McKay makes it clear that Jake is not even interested in finding a real girlfriend so much as he is interested in immediate, casual sex. Neither Jake nor his creator feels any need to hide or apologize for the character's strong sexual drives. In the 1920s this kind of frank emphasis on sex—and particularly on illicit sex—would have been considered far more scandalous than it seems today.

Another feature of McKay's novel that made it startlingly unusual in its own time was its explicit emphasis on the beauty and attractiveness of black people. Whereas many blacks during this period derived their standards of beauty from the majority white culture, and whereas many lighter-skinned blacks even tried to "pass" as whites, McKay celebrates the seductiveness of dark-skinned people. At one point, for instance, Jake fantasizes about the women he will encounter when he returns to Harlem: "Brown girls rouged and painted like dark pansies. Brown flesh draped in soft colorful clothes. Brown lips full and pouted for sweet kissing. Brown breasts throbbing with love" (8). In passages such as this, McKay shows his unabashed, unapologetic pride in the distinctiveness of his own race; Jake never yearns for white women, just as he never submits in other ways to the standards of "white" culture; instead he is (both literally and metaphorically) comfortable in his own skin.

At the same time, another aspect of the novel that created some controversy was the book's repeated descriptions of the variations in skin color among African Americans, as when McKay depicts all the many different "layers of brown," such as "low-brown, high-brown, nut-brown, lemon, maroon, olive, mauve, gold. Yellow balancing between black and white. Black reaching out beyond yellow. Almost-white on the brink of a change" (57). Black writers who wanted to emphasize the sameness and solidarity of black people in order to forge a strong sense of political and cultural unity had to contend, then, with McKay's emphasis on the differences among "blacks," and indeed McKay's stress on a wide variety of distinctive skin tones is related to his general interest in the individuality of his characters. As usual, he resists the impulse (or the externally imposed compulsion) to paint in broad strokes: He suggests that just as "black" people are diverse in their physical appearance, so they are diverse in their personalities, their values, their interests, and their motives. Some of the black characters in McKay's novel are admirable; some are unappealing; some are merely ridiculous. McKay feels no need to make all the blacks virtuous or noble, and even the occasional white character is sometimes presented in an appealing light. At one point, for instance, Jake asks his new friend Ray (whom he meets when they both work in a railroad dining car) how Ray "like[s] waiting on them ofays." "'It isn't so bad,'" Ray replies. "'Most of them are pretty nice. Last trip I waited on a big Southern Senator. He was perfectly gentlemanly and tipped me half a dollar'"—a sizable sum in the 1920s (138–139). Ultimately McKay seems more interested in people as individuals than as members of groups, for as Jake says at one point, "We may all be niggers aw'right, but we ain't non-etall all the same" (159).

6. Do some research and discuss McKay's response to GERTRUDE STEIN, especially his reaction to the "Melanctha" section of her book Three Lives. In what ways does that work by Stein remind you of McKay's works? In what ways are the works of these two writers different in purpose and effect?
7. Trace McKay's evolving political positions (focusing, for instance, on his changing responses to communism). Are his changing attitudes reflected in his creative works? If so, how? Should knowledge of a writer's political ideas shape our responses to his or her works? If so, why and how?
8. McKay is often discussed as both a poet and a novelist, but he is little discussed as a writer of short fiction. Find some of his short stories and discuss them in detail. Is any of them particularly successful as a work of art? Is any of them particularly unsuccessful? Why are they not better known? How are they comparable (in such matters as themes, style, settings, and techniques) to McKay's novels and/or poems?
9. McKay set a number of works in countries other than the United States. How do his "non-American" writings compare and/or contrast with the "American" ones? How do the settings of these various works affect such matters as characterization, dialogue, dialect, plot, and tone? How is the issue of race affected by different settings?
10. Track down some of McKay's nonfiction, especially his writings about art. How do these writings help us understand his own artistic purposes and achievements? What was McKay trying to do in his "creative" writing? To what extent, and in what ways, did he succeed or fail in attaining his announced objectives?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Cooper, Wayne F. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance: A Biography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- Giles, James R. Claude McKay. Boston: Twayne, 1976.
- Gosciak, Josh. Claude McKay and the Romance of the Victorians. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2006.
- Hathaway, Heather. Caribbean Waves: Relocating Claude McKay and Paule Marshall. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999.
- James, Winston. A Fierce Hatred of Injustice: Claude McKay's Jamaica and His Poetry of Rebellion. New York: Verso, 2000.
- Maxwell, William. Modern American Poetry: Claude McKay. Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/Maps/poets/m_r/mckay/mckay.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- McKay, Claude. Complete Poems. Edited by William J. Maxwell. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004.
- . Home to Harlem. 1928. Reprint, Chatham, N.J.: Chatham Bookseller, 1973.
- Ramesh, Kotti Sree. Claude McKay: The Literary Identity from Jamaica to Harlem and Beyond. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2006.
- Stephens, Michelle Anne. Black Empire: The Masculine Global Imaginary of Caribbean Intellectuals in the United States, 1914–1962. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2005.
- Tillery, Tyrone. Claude McKay: A Black Poet's Struggle for Identity. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1991.

Robert C. Evans

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY (1892–1950)

My candle burns at both ends; / It will hardly last the night; / But ah, my foes, and oh, my friends— / It gives a lovely light!

("First Fig")

Edna St. Vincent Millay—known as “Vincent” to her family and friends—was born in Rockland, a small town in coastal Maine, the eldest of three daughters. Her father left the family when she was seven, though he did remain in regular contact with them. Edna grew up in what was basically an all-female household, an environment that played a role in her lifelong independence and strong sense of self. Millay, her sisters Kathleen and Norma, and her mother, Cora, maintained a tight (as well as a literary and highly musical) family unit until her mother’s death in 1931. Edna was recognized early at her school for her writing talents, and her work (signed E. Vincent Millay) was frequently published in a national young people’s magazine, St. Nicholas. She won the magazine’s Silver Badge in 1909 and a cash prize the following year. When she turned 18, however, that association ceased.

Millay lacked the financial means to attend college, but she did get involved in local dramatic troupes. Then at age 19, during a stay with her ailing father, she began work on the poem that would change her life (Milford 58–59). She submitted “Renaissance” to a new literary anthology, the Lyric Year. Though destined for fame, the lengthy poem was very nearly discarded by the two men who were culling the thousands of submissions. The poem was notable for such arresting images as “The creaking of the tented sky / The ticking of eternity” (ll. 43–44) and for the opening of its final stanza: “The earth stands out on either side / No wider than the heart is wide; / Above the world is stretched the sky, / No higher than the soul is high” (ll. 203–206).

The year 1912 was a fortunate time for the poem to appear. It was a revolutionary year not only for Millay, but also for the arts in general. Cubism in painting, the rejection of tonality in music, the rise of imagism in poetry—all of them were products of modernism, the general term for a large-scale artistic revolution in the opening years of the 20th century. Most readers recognized the poem’s freshness and vitality, and they condemned the editors who had awarded it a mere fourth place. (Fourth place also meant no cash prize, a sore disappointment for Millay and her struggling family.)

A certain Mrs. Caroline Dow heard Millay read the poem at the Whitehall Inn, a summer hotel in Camden, Maine. Dow was dean of the Young Men’s Christian Association (YMCA) Training School in New York and an influential Vassar alumna. She became determined that Edna would attend her alma mater. Before long, funds were being raised on Millay’s behalf, and soon she was spending a college-preparatory year at Barnard College in New York. It was a city whose vitality she was to love, and to which she would return after her college graduation.

The following year, at age 21, she became a member of Vassar’s class of 1917, choosing Vassar over

Smith College, even though Smith had offered her a full scholarship. As she told her mother, she preferred Vassar because of the wide range of international students there, while “there isn’t one ‘furriner’ in Smith.” In addition, it was apparently a tradition that “Lots of Maine girls go to Smith; very few to Vassar. I’d rather go to Vassar” (Milford 79). This sentiment was clearly another early sign of Millay’s independent spirit, as well as a lifelong interest in that wider world beyond America’s shores.

Once matriculated, Vincent continued to devote herself to poetry, but she also again became deeply involved in college dramatic productions, this time both as writer and actor. She excelled in both arenas. She performed as Marie de France in A Pageant of Athena, in celebration of the college’s 50th anniversary. Her Deirdre in Synge’s Deirdre of the Sorrows was remarkable enough to bring reviewers from several New York newspapers. A poem, “The Suicide,” that she had written in 1914 won first prize in 1916 from the Association of Northern College Magazines. ROBERT FROST served on the committee that awarded the prize.

She also became an ardent suffragist, committed to the movement that was demanding the right to vote for women and that led to the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920. She also took a woman’s right to independent choice and behavior seriously on a more personal level. For one thing, she acquired several lesbian lovers, taking full advantage of the era’s new commitment to sexual freedom, including free love. She herself later admitted she was “far from unsusceptible to a woman’s charms” (qtd. in Milford 379). She also hotly rejected many of Vassar’s rules and customs (mandatory class and chapel attendance in particular) and was nearly disqualified from Vassar’s graduation ceremony by some off-campus antics.

She had a firm supporter in Vassar’s new president, Henry Noble MacCracken, a progressive educator who winked at much of Vincent’s misbehavior. He wrote later that he had assured her, “I don’t want to have any dead Shelley on my doorstep and I don’t care what you do.” He also recorded her reply: “Well, on those terms I think I can continue to live in this hellhole” (qtd. in Milford 138). In short, her college years encouraged Millay’s iconoclastic tendencies, in both behavior and belief. She rejected what she considered Christianity’s strict doctrines and proclaimed a woman’s right to total freedom, both intellectual and sexual.

She did receive her diploma and moved to New York’s Greenwich Village, whose bohemian lifestyle and freedom perfectly suited her. She continued to write poetry, performed with a new theater group (the Provincetown Players), and either fended off or encouraged the attentions of many suitors, male and female. Three years later, Millay left America for Europe, where she earned money as a foreign correspondent for the Saturday Evening Post.

After her 1922 return to America, she finally settled on a husband: Eugen Boissevain, a handsome Dutch widower who had been married to another Vassar alumna (also an active suffragist). He proved to be the perfect match for Millay, deeply committed to her physical and mental health and remarkably tolerant of her occasional romantic and sexual involvements. The most intense of these was with the young, probably gay, poet George Dillon, whom she had met on a fall 1928 reading tour in Chicago. Their affair produced an unprecedented outpouring of sonnets from Millay, and the 52 sonnets were later gathered into a volume called Fatal Interview. It sold an astonishing 33,000 copies within 10 weeks of its April 1931 publication (332).

Millay and her husband retreated to a house they built in the Berkshire Mountains, “Steeple-top.” Along with their purchase of Ragged Island near her old home in Maine, it became her primary residence for the remainder of her life, though the couple also traveled widely.

Most of Millay’s best writing was completed by the late 1930s, including Wine from These Grapes (1934), Conversation at Midnight (1937), and Huntsman, What Quarry? (1940). An effort was made to publish her Collected Poems in the early 1940s, but critical appraisal had begun to turn against her work. A review of the proposed volume suggested that “If [her artistic merit] is not taken quite seriously . . . today, it may be that she was taken too seriously twenty years ago.” It suggested further that “the direction of her progress has been from legend to success” (qtd. in Milford 464).

Though afflicted with a series of both nervous and physical ailments throughout her life, she remained an admired performer of her work. Making use of her remarkable dramatic gifts, including a vibrant speaking voice, she conducted exhausting national tours to read from each new volume of poetry she produced. Millay was the first poet to be given eight Sunday evenings to read her poetry, live, on a national radio hook-up. She also served until 1939 on the prize committee of the Guggenheim Foundation, helping to determine each year which new poets deserved financial encouragement.

Her health prevented her from continuing her reading tours after 1939. To combat various ailments, Millay became a prey first to alcoholism and later to drug addiction, particularly addiction to morphine, for which she unsuccessfully sought rehabilitation. She never retreated, however, from national life. As she said, “Poets are deeply aware of world conditions. In fact, they have a tendency more than other writers to become world-conscious” (qtd. in Milford 420). In her first years in New York, she had been a defender of Floyd Dell, who, besides being a theatrical entrepreneur, was one of the editors of the radical magazine the Masses, which had been indicted by the government under the 1917 Espionage Act. After two trials, Dell and his fellow “conspirators” were acquitted. Millay accompanied him to court every day, in a show of support. Later Millay became deeply but unsuccessfully involved in the defense of Sacco and Vanzetti, two convicted anarchists from the 1920s, in whose innocence many believed. She wrote to the Massachusetts governor, Alvan Fuller, on the eve of their 1927 execution, “I cry to you with a million voices: answer our doubt. Exert the clemency which your high office affords” (qtd. in Milford 298). She later became a determined voice warning Americans of the impending threat from Hitler’s Nazi regime in Germany. She was particularly sensitive to that threat when her husband’s property in the Netherlands was seized by the invading Germans.

She is best known for her volumes of poetry, the most famous of which are Renaissance and Other Poems (1917), A Few Figs from Thistles (1920), Second April (1921), The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems (1924), The Buck in the Snow (1928), Fatal Interview (1931), and Wine from These Grapes (1934). She also wrote (and performed in) several plays in the 1920s, and even composed the book for one opera, The King’s Henchman, with music by the eminent music critic and composer Deems Taylor (1927). It proved to be a splendid Metropolitan Opera premiere, and book sales of the play were massive. She also wrote several short stories for Ainslee’s Magazine under the pen name of Nancy Boyd. The one genre at which she failed was the novel.

Her favorite poetic form was the sonnet. She preferred it to the increasingly common use of free verse. She liked its tight structure and rhyme schemes. She once exulted: “What formal grace and method of procedure as of a ritual most precise and perfect of high ecstasy restrained” (qtd. in Milford 459). Her word ecstasy is a reminder that love is a sonnet’s usual topic—its intense pleasures as well as its complex emotional challenges. In 1922 she was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in literature. This gratified her enormously, both as an artist and as a feminist, as she was both the first woman and first poet to earn the prize. In 1940, she was elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

Millay was very much a part of her times and was either intimately or informally acquainted with the major writers of her day, including Deems Taylor (music critic, composer, and collaborator); the critic Edmund Wilson; the novelists Pearl Buck, JOHN DOS PASSOS, and Somerset Maugham; the painter Georgia O’Keeffe; the playwright Susan Glaspell; as well as her fellow poets Elinor Wylie and Rebecca West. The English poet and novelist Thomas Hardy once said of her, “There are two great things in the United States: the poetry of Edna St. Vincent Millay and our ‘recessional buildings’ [skyscrapers]” (qtd. in Milford 290). If ZELDA and F. SCOTT FITZGERALD were the prototype Jazz Age couple, Millay was its liberated young woman. She gave the age, as her biographer Nancy Milford asserts, “its lyric voice” (33).

“First Fig” (1920)

My candle burns at both ends;
It will not last the night;
But ah, my foes, and oh, my friends,
It gives a lovely light.

This is the most celebrated Millay poem, the one that opened her second collection, Some Figs from Thistles (1920). That title suggests that while life can be full of thorns and will not last forever, beautiful moments can happen. The four lines offer a concise and clear metaphor for the speaker's (and in this case also the poet's) take on life, a strong argument that one should carpe diem, Latin for “seize the day”: Pursue life's intensity.

The phrase “burning one's candle at both ends” has entered our language as an expression of living life to the fullest, but with the awareness that such a course may not be the most healthful. It conveys perfectly a young person's philosophy on living life. (Millay was in her twenties when the poem was written.) One weakness in the poem derives from the two interjections, oh and ah. One would expect that since they are addressed to two opposing groups—“my friends” and “my foes”—they would express differing emotions or attitudes, but actually the two interjections are interchangeable. What cannot be denied, however, is that both words convey the speaker's pure enjoyment of the self-indulgence with which s/he was seizing the day, as well as the pleasure and “illumination” she was giving herself and her world. But coupled with this delight in those double pleasures is the awareness, characteristic of Millay (not to mention many great poets from Shakespeare or the medieval French poet Villon, to Marvell and Housman), of life's brevity and time's passing. The speaker knows full well that the light he or she is generating may not even last through the night. Self-indulgence in Millay is often shadowed by the knowledge that time is flying.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Scan the poem (mark its accents, light and heavy, and its rhyme scheme). Also pay attention to its use of alliteration and its vowel sounds.
2. Examine how the sounds, meter, and rhythms contribute to the poem's effectiveness.
3. Summarize in a few sentences the speaker's philosophy for living life. Then respond in a lengthy paragraph to the poem's recommendations for living. Do you approve? What do you find appealing about those recommendations? What dangers might result from living life this way?
4. Compare the philosophy of life voiced by the speaker to that of the speaker in Andrew Marvell's “To His Coy Mistress.” Which poem is potentially the more ironic? In which does the poem's content do more to undermine the speaker's apparent views? Explain how such irony is achieved. Which poem is the more successful as a work of art? Explain why. Compare and contrast the philosophy implied in this poem with the one implied in Robert Frost's poem “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening.”

“Recuerdo” (1922)

This poem consists of three six-line stanzas and recounts another apparent night of romance, this time outdoors and this time less explicitly physical than the experiences described in some of Millay's other poems. It was written early in Millay's career, possibly during her “college-prep” year at Barnard (1913).

As a sonnet does, the poem relies on a careful structure. The first two lines of each stanza are identical, and their recurrence reflects the “back and forth” experience of the ferry the couple apparently rode all night. Furthermore, the third, fourth, and fifth lines of each stanza list pleasures the couple experienced during the night. In the final stanza, the kindness and generosity the lovers display are not so perfect that they forget to be practical: They save enough cash to go home on the subway.

The poem does a fine job of suggesting a night (a long night) of romantic adventure and pleasure, and the details are just poetic enough (the ferry, the table, the smells, the fruits) to suggest a real-life experience. The second stanza also ends with a brilliant and captivating image of the sun as it rises “dripping, a bucketful of gold” (l. 12).

There are, however, some less appealing features of the poem. Each stanza’s opening couplet consists of a feminine rhyme (“merry” / “ferry”), one that consists of two syllables, not the usual one. In English, the practice can produce a singsong effect. The poem also relies too heavily on an irregular anapestic rhythm (in which two unaccented syllables precede an accented one), which disrupts the regularity of its flow. Finally, line 15 employs some unnecessarily archaic diction (“we hailed, ‘Good morrow, mother’”), which undercuts the fresh naturalness of its diction elsewhere. The line does use an effective synecdoche, however (in which head stands for “woman”).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Mark the stressed and unstressed accents of the opening couplet. How does the rhythm of the lines contribute to their meaning or effectiveness? Which words or syllables receive special emphasis, and how can that emphasis be justified?
2. To what activities do you suppose the speaker is referring in lines 3 through 6 and in line 11? What can we infer about the couple’s tastes, interests, and values from these activities?
3. The word recuerdo in Spanish means “memory.” How do you think the couple is feeling about this one-night adventure? Do you imagine they will view it differently in 10 years? If so, why?
4. Compare the speaker’s experience of a night and dawn on a New York ferry with the experience recorded by Walt Whitman in “Crossing Brooklyn Ferry.” How and in what ways do the poem’s respective tones, attitudes, and vocabularies either compare or differ?
5. Compare and contrast the romantic relationship depicted in this poem with the one presented in T. S. ELIOT’s “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock.” How is sexuality dealt with in each work? How do the tones of the speakers differ?

“I, Being Born a Woman” (1923)

Millay is one of the comparatively few women poets who have mastered the sonnet form. Her wit and craftsmanship in this handling of a sonnet in the Petrarchan mode are impressive. She describes a distinctly physical encounter with a man that, while it has produced no lasting emotional bond, still seemed unavoidable and felt to a degree pleasurable, at least at the time.

This sonnet resembles Shakespeare’s number 138 (“When my Love swears that she is made of truth / I do believe her, though I know she lies”) as a knowing, wise, and in fact cynical take on a dying or dead relationship, this one from the woman’s point of view. The opening five lines constitute a rather ironic or self-critical analysis of the man’s expectation that she wants him. She is “urged by your propinquity” to feel attracted to the man; any attraction results less from any inherent merit or appeal in him than from “the needs” of her “kind” (ll. 2–3). The speaker accepts, not with total enthusiasm, that women need sex from men.

One of the poem’s most brilliant insights is the very unfeminist suggestion that women are almost designed, by nature, to crave thoughtless and meaningless sexual intimacy. It is the way females are made, the speaker strongly implies. She warns the man clearly that the moment has meant nothing. She in fact looks at three steps in the process: First her pulses grow clear (l. 7), which in this context means that she is filled with desire for him; when that happens, her mind grows cloudy (she loses her calm powers of reason); and the final result (l. 8) is to be left abandoned. He has simply used her, and she has for the moment participated, allowing herself to be thus used. Line 4 contains the possibility of another interpretation. Either she is declaring that she “feel[s] a certain zest,” or the word feel goes back to “urged by your propinquity,” which would suggest that she does not truly feel it but is forced to respond that way by her body’s desires. Good poets put into their poems these double possibilities, these potentially ambivalent interpretations, forcing the reader to think about both choices and to decide for himself or herself which meaning is the more likely.

The speaker's insights about her physical responses and loss of self-discipline in line 7 are nicely repeated in lines 8–9, when she speaks of “the poor treason / Of my stout blood against my staggering brain.” Their night (or perhaps merely an hour) of passion is no reason for him to expect her to talk to him next time they meet. Of course, as with any poem worth its salt, that final couplet can be taken a second way, creating an interesting ambivalence. She may be implying that, next time, once again, there will be no need for any chat—just one more encounter of passionate but meaningless sex.

Given that Millay was a woman who was a firm believer in women's rights and talents, the persona (the speaker) of this particular poem may seem surprising. “She” seems convinced that women have unique “needs and notions” that drive them into unwise choices of lovers, as if they have little control over their desires. This work is a reminder that a good poet will often create a speaker who represents a certain type of personality and may not speak for the poet herself. Millay is portraying human psychology, not judging it.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What do you think is the most likely meaning of propinquity in line 3? What is the effect of Millay's use of this particular word, rather than a synonym? How does her choice of diction, and the tone it creates, contribute to our sense of the speaker's personality? How would you interpret line 7?
2. In line 13, define the noun frenzy. How and why is that noun effective? Discuss some alternatives to that word. How might those other choices have changed the line's connotations?
3. Compare and contrast the attitude toward sexuality of Millay's speaker with that of the central character of ZORA NEALE HURSTON's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. How is sexuality presented in complex ways in both works?
4. In a substantial essay, compare this speaker's analysis of an unsatisfying love relationship with that of the speaker in Shakespeare's Sonnet 138, “When My Love swears. . . .” What common attitudes to an imperfect relationship do both sonnets share?

“What lips my lips have kissed” (1923)

In this sonnet, the speaker, in a mood both coolly philosophical and melancholy, lies in bed late at night and recalls the many men whom she has loved, recognizing that she has forgotten most of them. The poem ends with a sad realization that many of the pleasures that she has known have fled and that she somewhat regrets that loss. The sonnet reflects the speaker's life of romantic self-indulgence as well as the indifference to particular loves that can result from such frequent pleasures.

The octave (a Petrarchan sonnet's first eight lines) describes the speaker's state of mind as she considers how many young and apparently needy men she has loved and realizes further how many of them she can no longer even recall. The phrase “quiet pain” (l. 6) suggests ambivalent feelings. The speaker knows that she has outgrown the attentions of men, but she cannot stop herself from feeling upset at that more “mature” insight. The sonnet's sestet (its final six lines) consists of an extended simile in which she compares herself to a tree in winter. She recalls the joys of summer, seeming to recognize that her previous days of love and pleasure, even though the individual lovers are no longer recalled, were a lovely time in her life. She also senses, however, that they are likely never to recur, though summer, being part of the natural cycle, may offer a subtle hint that one part of her hopes a season of love will eventually return. As many of Millay's poems do, this one contains an echo of Shakespeare. The “vanished . . . birds” and the “summer” that “no longer . . . sings” in her echo the reference in his Sonnet 73 to tree branches in late fall, which that speaker terms “bare ruined choirs / Where late the sweet birds sang.”

For Discussion or Writing

1. Mark the poem's rhyme scheme and from that try to determine whether this is an Italian or a Shakespearean sonnet. How does the sonnet form—especially the division between octave and sestet—contribute to the poem’s meaning? How do a sonnet’s brevity and tight construction add to the work’s impact?

2. Discuss the relationship of the poem’s final six lines to the dramatic situation described in its first eight lines. What role does that relationship play in the development of the poem’s argument?
3. Compare Millay’s simile likening the speaker to a tree in winter to Shakespeare’s image of a tree in his Sonnet 73 as “bare ruined choirs where late the sweet birds sang.” Compare the effects of the two similes in their respective poems.
4. Write a substantial paragraph that analyzes the speaker’s attitude toward her past “loves.”

“Love is not all” (1931)

This appealing sonnet has the complexity and ambivalence one looks for in a satisfying work of art. It traces the speaker’s analysis of the nature and benefits of love, as well as its wide range of inadequacies. But at its resolution, it considers two possible conclusions to the lovers’ night of love—“I might be driven to . . . / . . . trade the memory of this night for food. / It may well be. I do not think I would” (ll. 13–14).

The poem takes for its cue a clever premise. As does Shakespeare’s “My mistress’ eyes are nothing like the sun,” it begins with a look at love’s inadequacy, listing all it cannot achieve. But most of those items are either physical (“It is not meat nor drink”) or medical (it cannot heal one’s “blood” or “lung” or “fractured bones” [ll. 1, 5–6]). Nevertheless, the speaker is quick to admit that men may die without love. The sonnet’s last six lines (its third quatrain and concluding couplet) turn the attention to the speaker herself, address her relationship with her lover, and focus on a particular night; she looks carefully at the possibility that she might be disloyal but is fairly certain she would not.

The poem also shows considerable technical facility. This is especially evident in its use of caesura (the grammatical pause in the middle of the first and last lines) and its use of enjambment (in which the end of one line flows without punctuation into the next, as between lines 3 and 4). Both techniques work to break up the regularity of the iambic rhythm. The poem also takes the rather daring step of devoting one full line and part of another to the alternating repetition of the verbs rise and sink, and it ends, significantly, on the latter.

Another part of the poem’s originality (or at least its experimenting with the traditional sonnet form) is that it chooses not to make use of the “three quatrain plus couplet” structure of the typical Shakespearean sonnet in order to present three different aspects of love. Instead, it devotes its first six lines to negative descriptions, then moves in lines 7 and 8 to another facet—men who die for lack of love. Those two lines form a transition to the speaker’s own involvement in love, when she contemplates the possibility that she might sell “your” love for peace of mind. The poem concludes with the suspense of ambiguity: Would she sell the memory of their night of love? She leaves the possibility open, thus ending with an honest appraisal of love’s indefinable and emotionally wrenching power.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Mark this sonnet’s rhyme scheme and meter, comparing them to the rhyme and meter of “What lips my lips have kissed.” Discuss the ways in which these two techniques contribute to the meaning and effectiveness of both poems. Which syllables or words receive special metrical emphasis, and how?
2. In a paragraph, identify and then analyze the various forces that might drive the speaker to “sell your love.” What is the speaker’s tone? To what degree is it appealing or sympathetic? Explain your assessment. How does the attitude of the speaker in Millay’s poem compare or contrast with the attitude of the female speaker in EZRA POUND’S “The River-Merchant’s Wife: A Letter”?
3. Draw a conclusion as to the speaker’s analysis of love: Is it really something humans can do without, or will it have a lasting effect on the speaker’s life? How does the speaker ultimately

- Falck, Colin, ed. Edna St. Vincent Millay: Selected Poems. New York: HarperCollins, 1991.
- Gould, Jean. The Poet and Her Book: A Biography of Edna St. Vincent Millay. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1962.
- MacDougall, Allan Ross, ed. Letters of Edna St. Vincent Millay. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1952.
- Majerus, Elizabeth. "Modern American Poetry: Edna St. Vincent Millay." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/maps/poets/m_r/millay/millay.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Milford, Nancy. Savage Beauty. New York: Random House, 2001.
- Nierman, Judith. Edna St. Vincent Millay: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977.
- Patton, John J. "A Comprehensive Bibliography of Criticism of Edna St. Vincent Millay." Serif 5 (September 1968): 10–32.

Jamie Spencer

MARIANNE MOORE (1887–1972)

Poetry—I, too, dislike it.

(“Poetry”)

The best authority on Marianne Moore is of course the author herself. In an October 7, 1951, interview for the New York Herald Book Review, Moore reveals quite a bit about herself. In her own words she presents herself as an average American who enjoys “the theater, tennis, sailing, reading, and the movies—animal documentaries, travelogues, an occasional French film, and the newsreel” (14). The terse list of her personal favorites includes “country fairs, roller-coasters, merry-go-rounds, dog shows, museums, avenues of trees, old elms, vehicles, experiments in timing like our ex-Museum of Science and Invention’s two roller-bearings in a gravity chute, synchronized with a ring-bearing revolving vertically” (14). Such a list mirrors her ability as a poet to paint a picture by using only a few details. Moreover, her declaration that “I am fond of animals and take inordinate interest in mongooses, squirrels, crows, [and] elephants” emphasizes the central role animals and animal imagery play in many of her poems (14).

Most of the key facts concerning Moore’s life are laid out in Charles Molesworth’s fine biography. Born on November 15, 1887, in Kirkwood, Missouri, Marianne Craig Moore was the second child of Mary Warner Moore and John Moore. However, John Moore never took an active role in Moore’s or her older brother’s lives. In fact, it appears that Marianne Moore never had the opportunity to meet her father and that her mother made every effort to prevent the Moore family from having contact with her children (Molesworth 1).

Together Mary Moore and her two children formed a tight family unit that became a powerful force in Moore’s poetry. Mrs. Moore may have been Moore’s most severe critic, but the close relationship between mother and daughter cannot be denied. Although Moore and her brother did experience sibling rivalry, their relationship was built on a mutual respect for each other’s accomplishments. When Moore’s grandfather died, her mother decided to support financially and raise her children on her own. She and her two children moved to Carlisle, Pennsylvania, where she taught English at the Metzger Institute. Moore’s mother had been college educated, and she instilled in both of her children a great knowledge of literature and culture. While many hypotheses have been offered to explain why the Moores moved to Carlisle, it is clear that the change afforded Marianne Moore a better education. Her daily lessons at the Metzger Institute may not have prepared her adequately for college, but the tutoring of a friend, Mary Norcross, helped Moore pass Bryn Mawr College’s entrance exams in summer 1905. Once there, Moore studied literature but was advised against majoring in English because her essay writing was marked by the unconventional organization that became the hallmark of her poetry. Although she edited and published short stories and poems in the college literary journal, Tipyn O'Bob, she majored in history and politics. In 1909 she graduated from Bryn Mawr and enrolled in Carlisle Commercial College to master secretarial skills.

Her first job, however, was not as a secretary or even as a writer. Instead, in 1911 she became a teacher at the United States Industrial Indian School of Carlisle, Pennsylvania. As an employee at a government-funded program intended to help Native Americans assimilate into American culture through education, Moore bore a heavy workload for small wages. Somehow, however, she did make time to write and began to publish her poetry, with several poems appearing in national magazines in 1912 and 1913. But in 1915 Moore published an astonishing 20 poems and gained some significant literary notice. Seven poems were published in the Egoist, a literary bimonthly edited by H. D. (Hilda Doolittle), a well-known imagist poet, who befriended Moore and supported Moore's developing talents through a balance of praise and criticism. Four others were placed in Poetry: A Magazine of Verse. EZRA POUND, an editor and contributor to that journal, "was one of the first to notice Moore's unique talent, and was later . . . to begin a correspondence with her" that marked the beginning of a lifelong friendship (Molesworth 111). Moore may not have been able to make a living by her art alone, but the recognition and professional associations H. D. and Pound offered were important steps on her journey as an author.

In 1918 Moore and her mother moved to New York City. The family dynamic was changing and challenged by Moore's mother's recent remarriage, but the valued relationships among Moore, her brother, and her mother were not severed. Moore's move to Greenwich Village created a new source of support through the literary circles she encountered there and through expanding connections to other modernist poets, including WALLACE STEVENS, WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS, and T. S. ELIOT. In fact, New York City, along with Mount Rainier and Virginia, became one of the central themes of Moore's poetry.

In Moore's first decade in New York, she was very busy. Molesworth reports the literary parties, trips to museums, and lectures she and her mother attended. But her life there was not entirely enjoyment; she also worked to support her mother and herself. Her first position (as a secretary at a girls' school) seems irrelevant to her developing literary identity. Her part-time position at the Hudson Park Branch of the New York Library has often been connected to her penchant for categorization and lists in her poetry. Lasting from 1925 to 1929, her full-time position as an editor for the Dial, a literary magazine, widened her literary connections and assured her that her literary tastes were valuable. Her poetry was also gaining wider acclaim. In 1921, her first volume of poetry, Poems, was collected and published by H. D., Winifred Ellerman (known as Bryher), and Robert McAlmon through the Egoist Press, but it was not noticeably reviewed. In 1923 Moore oversaw her first publication of her own work, and this chapbook of verse was widely reviewed by key modernists, including T. S. Eliot and Richard Aldington. The capstone to this decade's literary publication, however, was the Dial Press's publication of Observations in 1924. After its publication, Moore in 1925 won the annual Dial Award of $2,000 for a writer's overall contribution to art. Sharing her title with Van Wyck Brooks and William Carlos Williams, she had established her place in literary modernism.

After the closing of the Dial, the literary magazine she not only edited but where she published the greatest number of poems in the 1920s, Moore now began supporting herself through publication of her works. Devoting her time and resources to her art, Moore began a long series of publications that reflect her connection to other poets as well as her own development as a poet, including her need to revise and republish works until she believed they clearly conveyed her intended message. In 1935 she published Selected Poems, which draws from two of her previous publications, Observations (1924) and Poems (1921). T. S. Eliot's introduction praised her work and career, and his suggestion that she reorganize her poems so that the works from Observations appeared first helped provide the order Moore would use in later replications (Molesworth 267–268). In the next year, she published Pangolin and Verse, a small, limited-edition volume of five poems. This volume, regarded as her masterpiece, reflects her ability and range as a modernist poet. Later publications, however, included What Are Years? (1941); Nevertheless (1944); Collected Poetry (1951), which received the Pulitzer Prize, National Book Award, and Bollingen Prize; Like a Bulwark (1956); O to Be a Dragon (1959); Eight Poems (1962); Occasionem Cognosce (1963); The Arctic Ox (1964); A Talisman (1965); Dress and Kindred Subjects (1965); Le mariage . . . (1965); Poetry and Criticism (1965); Silence (1965); Tell Me, Tell Me: Granite, Steel, and Other Topics (1965); Tip-top's Tiger (1967); and the Complete Poems (1967), which received the Edward MacDowell Medal, the Poetry Society of America Gold Medal, and the Croix de Chevalier des Arts et Lettres.

To think of Marianne Moore only as a poet, however, is to neglect her other literary work. For instance, in 1945, Rock Crystal: A Christmas Tale by Adalbert Stifter was published in translation from the original German by Elizabeth Mayer and Marianne Moore. Furthermore, in 1954 Moore published her own translation of the Fables of La Fontaine. Considered “her largest single project,” the “Fables continued her interest in the dynamic relationship between nature and culture” (Molesworth 304). She also published Puss in Boots, The Sleeping Beauty, and Cinderella: A Retelling of Three Fairy Tales Based on the French Tales of Charles Perrault, illustrated by Eugene Karlin, in 1963. Although not a literal translation as her renderings of the works by Stifter and La Fontaine were, Moore’s versions of these three fairy tales emphasize her wide scope of reading and her ability to find value in what others could easily discard. The Absentee: A Comedy in Four Acts (1962), a play based on Maria Edgeworth’s novel of the same name, similarly shows Moore’s command of a wide variety of genres and indicates her willingness to attempt new challenges. Other publications—including Predilections (1955), a collection of essays and reviews; Idiosyncrasy and Technique: Two Lectures (1958); The Accented Syllable (1969); and her contribution to Homage to Henry James (1971)— not only reveal her own theories of writing and reading but also underscore the characteristics she valued in art.

Moore also played an important role, however, as a mentor to younger poets. Her relationship with Elizabeth Bishop, for instance, was of key significance to both poets’ careers. Bishop approached Moore for advice while still a student at Vassar. The public record of their connection reveals a distinctly professional relationship. In 1936 Bishop introduced Moore to Louise Crane, the heir of the Crane Paper Company, who would support Moore financially and with legal advice and would become the executor of Moore’s estate (Molesworth 292). Moore similarly helped Bishop nearly 10 years later by recommending that she receive the Houghton Mifflin Award for her first volume of published poetry, North and South. Moore’s January 4, 1937, letter to her brother indicates her fondness for Bishop; she claims to “like Miss Bishop better than any of our friends—of the friends we have adopted, & are not beating off. But my whole feeling of enthusiasm is tempered by her tendency to be late” (Selected Letters 376). Her letters to “Dearest Elizabeth” and her use of pet names (like those Moore used with her mother and brother, such as “Master of Minnows”) reveal the closeness of their friendship (Selected Letters 378–379).

During her lifetime, Moore received widespread recognition for her poetic skill. Included in her long list of awards are a Guggenheim Memorial Fellowship, the National Institute of Arts and Letters Gold Medal, two Poetry Society of America Gold Medal Awards, an Academy of American Poets Fellowship, a MacDowell Medal, appointment as the chevalier of the Legion of Honor, election to the Order of Arts and Letters, and recognition as a Woman of Achievement by the American Association of University Women.

Nevertheless, Moore was the people’s poet as well. In her final years, she was named an “Unknockable” by Esquire in June 1966 and was honored as Senior Citizen of the Year at the New York Conference on Aging in 1969. The photograph of a small figure of an elderly woman in a black tricorne hat throwing out the opening pitch at Yankee Stadium in 1966 seems comic, but baseball was one of her favorite pastimes. When Marianne Moore died on February 5, 1972, America lost more than a poet; America lost an icon.

“The Fish” (1921, 1935)

“The Fish” is one of Moore’s many poems about nature and animals. As in “To a Snail,” the poem’s meaning and development are more complex than the title implies. Although the poem describes the fish of its title, the description provides insight into Moore’s intricate rhyme and stanza schemes, which Moore uses to mimic the complex setting of the fish her poem describes.

Each stanza consists of five lines. In all of the stanzas the lines create a rhythm through a repeated metrical pattern. The first line of each stanza has only one syllable; the second has three syllables; the third has nine syllables; the fourth has six syllables; and the last line usually has eight syllables. Essentially the rhythm mimics the rise and fall of waves.

The rhymed lines also mimic the ebb and flow of the water. The first line’s syllable rhymes with the final syllable of the second line, and the third and fourth lines’ final syllables rhyme as well. The fifth line is left unpaired and confronts the silence of the line breaks between the stanzas. As do the waves of the water, the first two lines have a short rhyme, mimicking the rocking beginning of a wave. The third and fourth lines build up to the crest and roll of the wave. The last line is the surge and rush of the water to shore, followed by the silence of the receding water.

Throughout the poem, Moore describes in detail the world beneath the sea. “The fish wade / through black jade” of dark waters full of life (ll. 1–2). Hidden beneath the waves is a brutal, but beautiful, world. While the sea creatures dance with “spotlight swiftness” (l. 13) in the glorious light and color of the kaleidoscope of life beneath the sea, they are rooted to the “defiant edifice” (l. 29) of the scarred surface of the dead chasm. Complicating the contrast between life and death are the natural color and vibrancy associated with life and the man-made dynamite and hatchet associated with the dead chasm. In the last lines, Moore emphasizes the contrast between life and death: “Repeated / evidence has proved that it can live / on what can not revive / its youth. The sea grows old in it” (ll. 37–40). Figuring out what Moore means by it is her challenge to her readers.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Moore’s intricate use of stanza, meter, and rhyme is integral to this poem. How do these poetic devices work to establish mood and meaning?
2. Moore provides a vivid, detailed description of the underwater scene. Are these details realistic or fanciful? What effect do these details have on the poem?
3. The contradictions of the poem build up to the image of life and death contained in the final stanza. How do these contradictions lead you to explain the challenging lines of the final stanza?
4. Compare and contrast this work with Robinson Jeffers’s poem “Birds and Fishes.” What does each work imply about nature and beauty? How do they differ in tone and theme?

“Poetry” (1921, 1935)

Among the first poems Moore published, “Poetry” is an odd start to a poet’s career. Included in Poetry (1921) is a 29-line poem that begins with the startling declaration “Poetry / I, too, dislike it: there are things that are important beyond all this fiddle,” which seems to devalue the author’s work and poetry in general. If the author does not like poetry, then why should a reader like the author’s verse?

Even more startling may be the reception “Poetry” received from other poets, who understandably could have been insulted by Moore’s work. William Carlos Williams wrote to Moore with praise, claiming that she was “the only one who sees any use in using his brain” (qtd. in Molesworth xviii). In the Egoist of August 1916, H. D.’s essay on Marianne Moore’s poetry claimed that “Miss Moore helps us” (118) through her poetry.

If Moore's poem truly impressed two well-known modernist authors, one of whom was her earliest publisher, then she cannot be discarding all poetry.

A close reading of the longest version of her poem reveals what Moore dislikes about poetry. In the second and third stanzas, the speaker suggests that the most prominent problem is not poetry alone, but interpretation. When critics use "high-sounding" words and "become so derivative as to become unintelligible" (ll. 7–8), then a poem loses its power because the general audience can no longer understand it. With the fourth stanza, Moore introduces another complication—"half poets" (l. 19) and poets who are not "literalists of / the imagination" (ll. 21–22). Neither can effectively portray their messages in their poetry because they are caught up in form, not content. As the final stanza reveals, only those who have distilled poetry to its raw material in search of the genuine can appreciate and write poetry. All the rest is false poetry, and it is false poetry that Moore dislikes.

As she did with many of her texts, Moore returned to "Poetry" to revise and distill the essence of her work. The resulting version, which appeared in Selected Poems (1935), is far briefer than the original. Its three lines appear in the first stanza of Moore's original version of the poem. As the need to revise suggests, defining the difference between genuine poetry and everything else was a preoccupation throughout Moore's career.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Do you like poetry? Think beyond a simple yes or no and, as Moore does, describe what it is you like or dislike about poetry. Do you like or dislike this poem in particular? Explain your response in detail.
2. How does "Poetry" help Moore's readers understand her definition of her art? What, according to her definition, must a poem do to be genuine? How does her own poem accomplish that task?
3. The three-line version of the work included in Selected Poems (1935) is meant to represent the same principles articulated in the original version. How does the later version differ from the earlier version? Moore has distilled the details from the original version of the poem, but does the revised work still relay the same message to her readers?

"To a Snail" (1924)

First collected in Observations (1924), "To a Snail" is a quintessential Marianne Moore poem. As many of her other works do, "To a Snail" focuses on nature and the animal kingdom. Also as do many of her poems, it includes a quotation without providing its author or source. However, as in all of her volumes after Observations, Moore provides an index of her poetry and notes to explain references made in her poems.

In these "Notes," Moore attributes the opening line of "To a Snail" to Demetrius on Style as translated by W. Hamilton Fyfe. Thus, a poem with a title that seems to suggest that it will be merely a fablelike animal tale quickly becomes a study of composition. Both the snail and the poem achieve "grace of style" through "compression" (l. 1). The snail, small in stature, compresses itself within its shell, displaying the dual virtues of contractility (an ability to limit itself) and modesty. The shell is much more than a pretty covering for the snail's slimy, sluglike body. For Moore the shell becomes the symbol of the snail's ability to use something beautiful. Similarly, in order for a poem to be powerful, it must limit itself and present its message directly. The style, or shell, of the poem is much more than a beautiful covering that hides the supple existence of a poem of many meanings. Style is not adornment but a trait that makes every word count in the creation of the poem and its message.

Nevertheless, Moore is not asking for simple or unadorned poetry. As the snail moves without feet, the poem should move without our needing to count its feet and meters. A poem's movement is determined not by the number of lines or rhymes, but by the feeling it conveys and the reaction it receives. The snail's "curious phenomenon of your occipital horn" (l. 12), or its eye, allows it to see "a knowledge of principles" (l. 11) as it travels along its glistening trail. Essentially then, "To a Snail" is not merely about a snail. By pairing her description of the snail with advice on rhetoric and style, Moore has complicated our understanding of both a poem and a snail. By analyzing the characteristics they should share, Moore develops a subtle definition of poetry that emphasizes not what is said, but the way one should say it.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What other animals or insects could Moore have chosen to represent “compression” through her poetry? Why do you think she chose to write about a snail instead of other possible subjects?
2. In terms of the theories of composition Moore outlines in this poem, is “To a Snail” a successful poem? Why or why not?
3. Compare and contrast this work with Robinson Jeffers’s poem titled “Vulture.” In particular, discuss form, tone, point of view, and theme. What does each poem imply about beauty?

“What Are Years?” (1941, 1967)

“What Are Years?” is Marianne Moore’s way of asking, What is history? Moore was a history and political science major with an interest in philosophy during her college career; this poem is clearly connected to the concepts she thought about as an undergraduate at Bryn Mawr. Far more sophisticated in language and topic than her college publications (which focused on college dramas that reveal the identity of the artist) and written long after Moore graduated, the poem moves beyond the immediacy of the present moment and looks at the significance of the individual’s moment within the context of all of history.

The opening allusions to innocence, guilt, nakedness, and safety reveal a beginning to mankind that closely parallels the conditions described in Genesis in the Bible. Cast out of paradise for eating of the Tree of Knowledge, Adam and Eve lost their innocence, experienced guilt both for their actions and for their nakedness, and were no longer safe. Here the rewriting of the Bible ends. Rather than focus on their sins, Moore emphasizes their courageous actions. Both had the courage to ask unanswered questions, to doubt without yielding, to call without speaking, and to listen without hearing; essentially Moore claims that both were thinking human beings. Courage is finding strength to question, and questioning strengthens the soul.

By connecting the questioning soul of mankind with the sea and a bird, Moore complicates the image of courage. (Moore’s use of masculine pronouns is a reflection of her times; her poem is meant to include both men and women.) The sea, with its constant ebb and flow and fathomless bottoms, is compared to the soul’s imprisonment in ignorance. Regardless of how many times the soul rises up with a courageous question, it can never break free of the confines of mankind because man has a limited capacity to know and understand the world. Like the water of the sea, man must recognize his limits in order to survive. By recognizing and achieving what it is capable of, the soul achieves freedom regardless of captivity.

As has the caged bird, the now free soul has a new challenge. Breaking free of the confines of its captivity by recognizing his or her limits, the individual must share the knowledge he or she has acquired. Through singing his song, the bird grows. Through spreading his message, man “steels / his form straight up” (ll. 21–22). Accepting the status quo, or satisfaction with life as it is, brings man down. Joy results not from singing and spreading knowledge or accepting limitations, but from the questioning that leads to knowledge.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Moore’s poem about history contains few if any historical references. How then does she establish her poem’s focus: the history of mankind?
2. Moore’s last lines claim, “This is mortality / this is eternity.” What is this and how can it be both mortal and immortal simultaneously?
3. Is there another motive or message in Moore’s poem, or is it simply about history? Explain your response.
4. Compare and contrast this poem—in theme, tone, attitude, and image—with ROBERT FROST’s “The Road Not Taken.”

“The Mind Is an Enchanting Thing” (1944)

Essential elements of the beauty of “The Mind Is an Enchanting Thing” are the complex, rhythmic rhyme scheme and syllabic structure. All stanzas are six lines long and follow the same rhyme scheme (abaccd), although Moore uses slant rhyme when it is needed. Such an innovative rhyme scheme may be difficult enough to master in one poem without any added structural complexity, but Moore also closely monitors the number of syllables in every line. All of the stanzas follow the same pattern: Line 1 has six syllables, line 2 has five, line 3 has four, line 4 has six again, line 5 has seven, and line 6 has nine, except in one case. (In a nice bit of wit, line 24, which mentions “inconsistency,” has 10 syllables, thus violating the consistency of the pattern.) The repetition of the number of syllables and use of rhyme create a sing-song feel to the poem, enchanting the reader with sound as well as words.

The words Moore selects similarly enchant the reader. In the first stanza, Moore captures her readers by mentioning glazed katydid wings and by including references that call for identification although none is provided by the author. Walter Gieseking, a celebrated pianist who reportedly played every performance flawlessly even though he never physically practiced the music, and Domenico Scarlatti, an 18th-century composer of more than 500 complex pianoforte sonatas, are both presumed to be well-known persons. It seems that the mind is an enchanting thing because of people like Gieseking and Scarlatti, whose astounding skill and creativity display two of the many feats the human mind can achieve.

Using a technique that mimics stream of consciousness, Moore moves from the easily identifiable and explainable allusions to the musicians to the convoluted complexities of memory and the way it works. Although the bird imagery deserves closer scrutiny since Moore's use of animals in her poetry is always complex, the development of memory as the magic of the mind is the significant theme of the third, fourth, and fifth stanzas. Memory allows us to “hear without / having to hear” (ll. 14–15) and see with “conscientious inconsistency” (l. 24) what never was. The double-edged sword can keep alive a moment we do not want to forget or recreate—a moment from our past to reflect our own desires. Although we rely on our minds to store our life experiences, Moore, the librarian, reminds us that the mind may be the best natural means we have for storing data, but it is not objective or reliable. It is this very unreliability and flexibility that grant the mind its greatest power. The ability to change is what makes the mind an enchanting thing.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Moore refers to several birds and parts of birds throughout the poem. What significance do the kiwi, dove, beak, and wing have?
2. Moore overtly uses hearing and seeing in her discussion of memory. Are the other senses—taste, touch, smell—included in her poem? Why or why not?
3. Moore alludes to three key men—two positively (Gieseking and Scarlatti) and one negatively (Herod). Who is Herod, and what was his oath?
4. Compare and contrast this work with WALLACE STEVENS's poem “The Plain Sense of Things.” What does each poem imply about the mind? Compare them in terms of tone, attitude, and imagery.

“Nevertheless” (1944)

The title poem of Moore's 1944 volume of poetry, “Nevertheless” appears to be an unassuming work that is merely an exercise of form, but its very form contributes to its challenge. By using the form to shape the visual representation of the poem, Moore teases the reader into the disadvantage of ignorance. The first word of every line (except one) is lowercased, so that the stanzas begin in the middle of sentences. Thus, it seems as if Moore's speaker invites the readers into a conversation he/she has already started with someone else. Moreover, the couplets that end every three-line stanza end midsentence as well, causing further confusion by halting the conversation as if the speakers were interrupted. Without a linear, logical exchange of ideas, it seems impossible to make any sense of the obscure references to fruits and vegetables or achieve any immediate comprehension of the topic at hand. How does any of these images have anything to do with the word nevertheless?

Moore explains the connection between the title and its imagery in the last stanza of her poem. Nevertheless (according to Moore's understanding of the term) implies fortitude. The unstated refrain of each stanza, then, is that even these representatives of the plant kingdom that are limited in mobility and have no critical thinking skills have managed to find a way to overcome the insurmountable obstacles they confront in their daily existence.

The stalks of kok-saghyz, a central Asian plant in the dandelion family, are confronted with potentially damaging frost. Nevertheless, they have found a way to thrive where other plants would die. Although the frost may kill the fragile leaves, the roots have thrust deep into the soil for protection. The prickly pear of stanzas 5 and 6 is suspended by barbed wire. Nevertheless, a root grew in search of the anchorage provided by the ground. Although far from the soil, the root system extended two feet in order to find what the plant needed to survive. Neither the kok-saghyz stalks, which are weeds, nor the prickly pear, which is a cactus, looks inviting, but through Moore's poem they have managed to earn our admiration. Their perseverance has allowed both to thrive in the natural world despite all the odds against them.

It may have been simpler if Moore had declared that nevertheless suggests fortitude in the face of adversity, but the images she uses to explore such fortitude are integral to understanding her definition of the word. The weeds and cacti, not the lovely rose and sweet carnation, are nuisances because they have the tenacity not only to survive, but to thrive. From Moore's perspective, such characteristics endow these plants and others like them with heroic qualities.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Do "Nevertheless" and its association with perseverance and fortitude apply to plants only? Explain your response.
2. Is Moore's portrayal of the strength of fortitude and perseverance positive or negative?
3. How is Moore's depiction of nature in this poem similar to (or different from) the depiction of nature in Wallace Stevens's poem "Sunday Morning"? In which poem is the presentation of nature more complex?

"Baseball and Writing" (1961, 1966)

Laden with allusions to baseball, "Baseball and Writing" combines Moore's favorite American pastime with her poetic craft. According to Molesworth, "In 1964, three years after 'Baseball and Writing' appeared in The New Yorker, she said in an interview in Harper's that it was the display of 'dexterity—with a logic of memory that makes strategy possible' that made baseball especially appealing to her" (393).

As her poem begins, Moore pairs baseball and writing by emphasizing the excitement they both generate. Excitement results from unpredictability as "You never can tell with either / how it will go / or what you will do" (ll. 3–5). Although both activities produce excitement in Moore, as a poet she feels excitement from shaping the poem as it is created. As a baseball fan, she is excited by watching the game unfold. Essentially, then, excitement can be achieved by the players who shape the game and by the reader of the poem who watches it unfold. More important, in order for baseball and poetry to be exciting, there must be both a doer and a receiver. Without both, there is no excitement in the game or the art.

As the poem continues, it seems as if the first stanza alone links baseball and writing, but a close inspection of the descriptions of the men referenced throughout her lines reveals many of the characteristics Moore valued in baseball and, by inference from the poem's title, in poetry. Elston Howard emphasizes the good of the team. Roger Maris and Mickey Mantel of stanza 3 stretch themselves to their physical limits. The winners of the pennant won it together because they are "all business, each, and modesty" (l. 46); each works to complete his job on the team to his best potential and knows that he could not win the series without the team's other eight men. Although each play is controlled by two men, the pitcher and the batter, there would not be a game if all the members of each team did not give their all. As baseball players must, the words and lines of a poem must join and work together for the overall success of the poem. And "yes, [both are] work . . . but [you] enjoy it while you're doing it" (ll. 76–78).

Again Moore closes her poem with a complication. The stadium becomes "Studded with stars in belt and crown" (l. 82). It is the new Pleiades twinkling in the sky with Orion. Mythical sisters of ancient Greece captured in the night sky will no longer hold fame or fascination for people. The new stairway to fame is "the Stadium" (l. 83). The accomplishments and fame of these bright nine will continue to shine long after they have left the field.

For Discussion or Writing

1. If the baseball players are the Pleiades (a cluster of nine stars), then who is Orion?
2. Is Moore's comparison valid? Can a sport, such as baseball, really be compared to an art? What qualities could a sport and an art form share? What differences exist between a sport and an art form?
3. As an American pastime, baseball has been immortalized by many other authors and in many other genres. THORNTON WILDER'S Our Town, WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS'S "The Crowd at the Ball Game," and CARL SANDBURG'S "Hits and Runs" (among many other works) refer to or focus on baseball imagery. Chose one work to compare and contrast it to Moore's "Baseball and Writing." Examine what the sport symbolizes in each work and how the author conveys the social significance of the sport.

"Granite and Steel" (1966)

In 1929 Moore and her mother moved across the Brooklyn Bridge to leave Manhattan, Greenwich Village, and the literary circles of the Dial for the "domestic tranquility" of 260 Cumberland Street, Brooklyn (Molesworth 248). The poem captures Moore's imagistic rendering of the causeway between her professional life as an editor and her career as a poet.

The Brooklyn Bridge project spanned nearly two decades; 1866 saw the initial legislation in support of the bridge, which opened to the public on May 24, 1883. Suspending a 14,680-ton structure 135 feet above the East River are approximately 3,600 miles of steel cable manufactured at the New Jersey factory of John Roebling, the chief engineer of the Brooklyn Bridge project. At the time of its completion, the Brooklyn Bridge was the largest successful suspension bridge in the United States. Moore's poem, published nearly 60 years after the first nickel was paid to travel across its span, commemorates the ingenuity and beauty of the granite and steel of this modern marvel.

Moore's word choices paint a picture of both the bridge and the men who built it. "German ingenuity" (l. 7) allowed men to find a way to overcome the once-impassable distance between cities. Described as "silvered by the sea" (l. 1) and "grayed by the mist" (l. 2), the steel cables and wire become insubstantial and natural elements invested with a magical strength. The granite towers and steel cables join to create the "Climactic ornament, a double rainbow / as if inverted by French perspicacity" (ll. 26–27).

As "John Roebling's monument" (l. 28) the bridge is a testament to this individual's accomplishments as an engineer and manufacturer, but it also is a large tombstone testifying to the cost of scientific progress. Mankind has learned how to use the "'catenary curve' from tower to pier" (l. 8) in order for "Liberty to dominate the Bay" (l. 3). However, such knowledge has a grave price. Before the bridge was even under construction, it claimed its first fatality. On July 6, 1869, John Roebling's foot was crushed at the Brooklyn Fulton Ferry Slip. After a partial amputation of his foot, Roebling suffered from an infection and lockjaw, which eventually killed him on July 22. The Brooklyn Bridge truly is a monument honoring John Roebling's life work.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Moore is often considered a poet of locales. How does knowing that she lived near the bridge for

- Bryant, Jen. Call Me Marianne. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans Books for Young Readers, 2006.
- A Concordance to the Poems of Marianne Moore*. Edited by Gary Lane. New York: Haskell House, 1972.
- The Critical Response to Marianne Moore*. Edited by Elizabeth Gregory. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003.
- Engel, Bernard F. Marianne Moore. 1964. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
- Kalstone, David. Becoming a Poet: Elizabeth Bishop with Marianne Moore and Robert Lowell. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2001.
- Marianne Moore*. Edited by Harold Bloom. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1987.
- Marianne Moore: Comprehensive Research and Study Guide*. Edited by Harold Bloom. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.
- Marianne Moore: The Art of a Modernist*. Edited by Joseph Parisi. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Research Press, 1990.
- Molesworth, Charles. Marianne Moore: A Literary Life. New York: Atheneum, 1990.
- Moore, Marianne. Complete Poems. New York: Penguin, 1981.
- . Idiosyncrasy and Technique. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1958.
- . A Marianne Moore Reader. New York: Viking, 1961.
- . The Selected Letters of Marianne Moore. Edited by Bonnie Costello. New York: Knopf, 1997.
- . "Some of the Authors of 1951 Speaking for Themselves." New York Herald Tribune Book Review, 7 October 1951, p. 14.
- Nitchie, George W. Marianne Moore: An Introduction to the Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969.
- Page, Dave. Marianne Moore. Mankato, Minn.: Creative Education, 1994.
- Tomlinson, Charles. Marianne Moore: A Collection of Critical Essays. Engelwood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1970.
- Willis, Patricia C., and Cary Nelson. "Modern American Poetry: Marianne Moore." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/MAPS/poets/m_r/moore/moore.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.

Nichole Bennett-Bealer

EUGENE O'NEILL (1888–1953)

What I am after is to get an audience to leave the theater with an exultant feeling from seeing somebody on the stage facing life, fighting against the eternal odds, not conquering, but perhaps inevitably being conquered. The individual life is made significant just by the struggle.

(transcript from Eugene O'Neill, PBS documentary)

Before Eugene O'Neill, American theater consisted largely of light comedy and melodrama. More than any other playwright, O'Neill established America's place in the realm of literary drama, introducing an intensely American dramatic realism and psychological focus to theater.

A master of applying his often painful life experiences to playwriting, O'Neill transformed his experiences inside and outside the theater—as gold prospector, sailor, journalist, derelict, stage manager, and member of a dysfunctional family—into characters of shattering psychological depth and realism. He was also one of the pioneers of expressionism, which he saw as being more “spiritually true” than classical realism. The only U.S. playwright to win the Nobel Prize in literature, O'Neill also won Pulitzer Prizes for four of his plays.

O'Neill was immersed in the theater from birth. The son of a handsome, successful actor, he was born in a Broadway hotel room. He spent much of his early childhood touring with theatrical companies, together with his mother and his older brother, Jamie. Their only stable residence was a house in New London, Connecticut, where they stayed during summers. His father, James O'Neill, Sr., was a successful Shakespearean actor who left literary theater for a more lucrative lead role in The Count of Monte Cristo, a melodrama. This choice made him famous but bitter. Eugene grew to share his father's disdain for “the old, ranting, artificial romantic stuff” (qtd. in Gelb and Gelb 64), and this was a factor in his own quest to create plays that offered depth and insight into the human condition.

Eugene's mother, Ella, loved her husband and children but disliked the theater and its people. Her unhappiness was a factor in her morphine addiction, which began at Eugene's birth. Her addiction had profound effects on both her children. The pain of Eugene's childhood and its lingering consequences would be retold in his most autobiographical play, Long Day's Journey into Night.

Irish Catholicism was another influence on O'Neill's early life. Like his parents, O'Neill was proud of his Irish ancestry, though by 15 he had abandoned the Catholic Church. Instead, he found his ethical foundations in philosophy and experience. After attending a series of Catholic and non-sectarian boarding schools, he entered Princeton in 1906. He made little effort to study the required curriculum, though he read Nietzsche, Strindberg, and JACK LONDON voraciously. These works proved influential in his writing. When heavy drinking, low motivation, and a student prank led to his suspension after a year, he chose not to return.

He became secretary of a small mail-order jewelry house in New York but became bored with that quickly. At his family's instigation, he joined a gold-prospecting expedition in Spanish Honduras. His father hoped the trip would separate him from his girlfriend, Kathleen Jenkins, of whom the family did not approve. He married her secretly before leaving, because she was pregnant, but they never lived together as a married couple.

O'Neill's experiences in Honduras were an inspiration for his play The Emperor Jones, set in Haiti. He discovered no gold but contracted malarial fever after just six months, which convinced him to return to the United States. He made no attempt to see his wife, though he did visit his son.

Next he sought adventure as a seaman. Between voyages he lived destitute on the waterfronts of New York, Liverpool, and Buenos Aires, occasionally taking short-lived jobs. These experiences offered good inspiration for the sea plays he wrote in later years, including Bound East for Cardiff (1914) and The Moon of the Caribbees (1917). He claimed that his "real start" as a playwright occurred when he "got out of an academy and among men on the sea" (Gelb and Gelb 156).

O'Neill suffered from shyness and depression, and much of his life during those years centered around drinking. In New York he roomed at Jimmy-the-Priest's boarding house and saloon, living on free soup and five-cent whiskey. His closest friends were unemployed sailors, prostitutes, and other marginal characters. Many of these would be represented in such plays as Anna Christie and The Iceman Cometh. Though he was not politically involved, he had close friends who were, including the founder of the U.S. Communist Party, John Reed.

In many ways 1912 was his saddest year: a year of derelict wanderings, divorce, a failed attempt at journalism, a diagnosis of tuberculosis, and endless nights in bleak saloons. At his lowest point, he attempted suicide by overdosing on Veronal. Fortunately he was discovered by friends who took him to a hospital in time to save his life. His father sent him to a private sanatorium, which turned out to be a much-needed place of rest and rediscovery of literature. He once claimed that without this experience he might never have become a playwright.

After his discharge from the sanatorium, he began writing plays in earnest. At his father's expense, in 1914 he attended the 47 Workshop at Harvard, where he studied literature for a year.

He learned to write scenarios before fleshing out dialogue, and he studied the use of dialect in Irish plays. Both skills would be put to good use.

In this first period of his writing, he focused on realism with touches of naturalism. He sought to represent characters and events as realistically as possible, including the sometimes colorful ways in which his characters spoke. Because of his intimate knowledge of life at sea and in waterfront dives, he was able to offer theatergoers a glimpse of this very different world. Naturalism added emphasis on the effects of heredity and environment.

His closest friends remained derelicts, and he often lived on the one-dollar allowance that his father gave him. One friend was Terry Carlin, who convinced him to go to Provincetown, Massachusetts, where a group of like-minded artists had opened a theater company that featured their own plays. His Bound East for Cardiff (1914) was accepted, and it was a success. According to O'Neill, it was the first of his plays that had merit. This play was light on plot but progressive in dialogue, as it introduced the use of dialect into American drama. It began his life as an established playwright. He had friends who believed in him, and he had a job in the theater, where he sometimes acted bit parts.

The Provincetown Players opened a theater in Greenwich Village, New York, and nine of O'Neill's one-act plays were produced there, starting in 1916. As depicted in the movie Reds, he had a short affair with Reed's wife, Louise Bryant. Some claim that she broke his heart. In 1918 O'Neill married his second wife, Agnes Boulton. She was a writer of novellas and short stories, and they lived artists' lives in New York. In 1919 they had a son, Shane. When Louise tried to tempt him back, he declined; he was content.

Delighted that Eugene seemed to have settled down, James O'Neill bought them a home in Provincetown. In 1920 both parents attended the successful performance of O'Neill's first full-length play, Beyond the Horizon, on Broadway. It won his first Pulitzer Prize. During this time, Eugene O'Neill began to know and understand his parents better, though the reconciliation was short-lived: His father died of cancer later that year. O'Neill also renewed his acquaintance with his first son, whom he had not seen since the child was a baby.

Also in 1920 The Emperor Jones was produced. This production was notable for having an African-American lead, an innovation in American theater. This was done at O'Neill's insistence, and it opened the way for African-American actors in theater and musicals. This also marked the beginning of O'Neill's expressionist period. Expressionists are more concerned with inner realities than outer realities; actions and dialogue portray life the way one or more characters perceive it, which may be radically different from the way life really is. In 1922 another expressionist play, The Hairy Ape, was released.

By 1922 O'Neill was clearly living the life of a successful playwright. He wrote more and more daring, successful plays, including Anna Christie, which won his second Pulitzer Prize. In 1923 he wrote All God's Chillun Got Wings, a daring play about an interracial couple for whom love is insufficient for happiness. In 1924 he wrote Desire under the Elms, another powerful play that focused on passionate people who spiraled to their own destruction. He now had a large house and estate in Connecticut. Yet he was not at peace. Among other things, he needed quiet to work, while his wife wanted liveliness.

O'Neill's mother finally recovered from her addiction, but she died in 1922. After her death, Jamie O'Neill, Eugene's brother, returned to alcoholism and died in a sanatorium. Needing an escape, Eugene and his family moved to Bermuda, where his daughter, Oona, was born. The change proved insufficient to save the marriage, however. In 1927 O'Neill resumed his friendship with Carlotta Monterey, who would become his third and last wife in 1929. His literary productivity continued. In 1928 Strange Interlude won his third Pulitzer.

His last marriage proved his happiest. They first lived in France, where Carlotta protected his privacy and helped him find enough peace to enjoy the company of others. A brief stint with psychoanalysis also gave him a taste for Freudian psychology, which had played a role in the creation of the intensely psychological Strange Interlude (1927) and in the writing of Mourning Becomes Electra (1931).

The O'Neills returned in 1931 to the United States, where Carlotta was even more protective than she had been in France. In 1932 he wrote his only full-length comedy, Ab, Wilderness. In 1934 he wrote Days without End, the last of his plays to be produced on Broadway during his lifetime. He suffered a nervous breakdown that required a six-month rest. One factor was a degenerative disease similar to Parkinson's, which made his hands shake. This made writing very difficult, since his creative process required handwriting. He produced no more plays for 12 years. In 1936 he received the Nobel Prize in literature. In 1937 the O'Neills moved to California, where they remained. In 1939 he wrote The Iceman Cometh, which was produced in 1946. In this period he finally came to terms with parts of his past and he wrote his most autobiographical plays, A Long Day's Journey into Night (1941) and Moon for the Misbegotten (1952). This marked his third and last literary period: a return to realism.

He and Carlotta separated a few times but always reunited. His relationships with his children were more strained. He estranged himself from Oona when she became an actress, then disowned her for marrying the elderly Charlie Chaplin when she was only 18. He and Oona never reconciled, and he never spoke her name again. He also disinherited his son Shane for becoming a heroin addict. Shane committed suicide in 1950. In 1951 his eldest son, Eugene, Jr., also committed suicide. His suicide note showed that he also succumbed to the family curse of alcoholism: "Never let it be said of O'Neill that he failed to finish a bottle" (Eugene O'Neill, a Steeplechase Films Production).

O'Neill himself died in 1953. Ironically, he died in a hotel room, as he had been born, and his last words lamented that fact: "Born in a hotel room—and goddamn it—died in a hotel room" (Eugene O'Neill, a Steeplechase Films Production). Despite his wishes, Carlotta made A Long Day's Journey into Night available to theaters in 1956, and she requested that it be published. The publishers at Random House already had the copy that O'Neill had sent, but they refused to publish it early, in respect for the playwright's wishes. Carlotta then took it to Yale University Press, which published it immediately. It won O'Neill's fourth Pulitzer Prize and gave his fans an essential insight into the forces that shaped his genius. In all he wrote 62 plays, of which 45 were produced. He remains one of the most widely translated and produced playwrights in the world.

The Emperor Jones* (1920)

The debilitating effects of industrialism on humanity are starkly portrayed in this play about an African-American porter who escapes from prison, travels to a Caribbean island, and persuades the inhabitants to crown him emperor. In his inevitable fall from power, he confronts memories from his own past as well as the historical past.

In some ways The Emperor Jones is one of O'Neill's more dramatic plays. The play draws on events in Haitian history, though the playwright sacrificed historical accuracy for dramatic effectiveness. The work was so successful that long lines formed at the box office for the second night's production. Subscriptions to the Provincetown Theater, where it was produced, doubled. The production moved from off Broadway, where lesser plays are produced, to Broadway itself by the end of the year, then to major world capitals, including London, Paris, Berlin, and Tokyo. This success made O'Neill an internationally known playwright—the first American playwright to earn this kind of recognition.

Originally titled "The Silver Bullet," The Emperor Jones was O'Neill's first experiment with expressionism, a style that emphasizes internal realism over external realism. It inspired O'Neill to go further with expressionist techniques in many of his later plays, such as The Hairy Ape.

The Emperor Jones was groundbreaking in other ways. It was the first Broadway play to feature an African-American actor in the leading part. Previously African Americans had not been considered capable of major theatrical roles; African-American characters were typically acted by white actors in stage makeup. O'Neill felt strongly that his character should be played by an African American, and Charles Gilpin became the first African-American actor to star in an all-white theater. Gilpin's powerful performance helped open doors for all African-American actors.

Brutus Jones is, as his name suggests, a brute: He was in prison for killing a man over a craps game. Yet he is also a victim. His strength and cleverness had few outlets in early 20th-century American society, and his only avenues to real power involved crime. As with many bullies, Jones might have channeled his strengths into more positive results if he had had the opportunity: Where society limits an individual's potential, the results can be devastating. One inspiration for the character was Adam Scott, a black bartender whom O'Neill admired in New London. Gelb and Gelb note that Scott's strength, bravado, superstitions, and influential personality were translated into Jones (203).

The play opens in Emperor Jones's throne room. Jones claims to be unconcerned about an impending revolt. He has convinced the Haitians he can only be killed by a silver bullet, and he already has escape plans and a substantial stock of cash. By scene 2, his plan is problematic. He begins to see "Little Formless Fears," or hallucinations. In scenes 3 and 4, he confronts the ghost of the man he killed as well as his fellow convicts and prison guards from the United States. In scene 5, the hallucinations become historical memories: He sees an auction block where slaves are bought and sold, and he is one of the slaves. The Auctioneer describes Jones as a "good field hand" (26). The technique of showing what Jones imagines he sees, rather than what actually exists, demonstrates both expressionism and psychological focus.

By scene 6 Jones has fired so many bullets at hallucinations that he has only one silver bullet left, symbolically the last vestige of his power. In scene 7, a Witch Doctor tells Jones he must be sacrificed to a ghost-crocodile. He spends his last bullet on the beast. By the final scene Jones is back where he started: His fear has caused him to run in a circle, and he is killed. The Emperor Jones shows the debilitating effects of racism in the United States and other countries. Even Jones uses terms such as “ign’rent bush n-----s” (13) to describe the native people. As do many in power, he believes the less powerful are innately inferior, and O’Neill memorably demonstrates the danger as well as the inaccuracy of this view.

Smithers, a white man who had previously held a position of power on the island, is openly racist. On hearing that Jones will be overthrown, he crows, “Serves ’im right! Puttin’ on airs, the stinkin’ n-----!” (6–7). Despite Jones’s evident strength and intelligence, his confidence is easily shaken: When Smithers suggests that his rise to power resulted more from luck than from ability, Jones fears that this is true, even though Smithers himself is unable to deny that Jones did most of the “brainwork” (8) that put Smithers himself in power. Whereas Smithers was content with petty crimes, Jones had a larger vision, albeit a corrupt one. Jones also had the perception to see that larger crimes are likelier to be unpunished: “For de little stealin’ dey gits you in jail soon or late. For de big stealin’ dey makes you Emperor and puts you in de Hall o’ Fame when you croaks” (9). At the end he recognizes the evil of his ways, as when he calls out, “Oh, Lawd, pertect this sinner!” (30), but it is too late.

Thematically the play shows O’Neill’s attempt to “probe the collective consciousness of the black race” (Ranald 206). Inspired by his readings of C. G. Jung, the Swiss psychoanalyst, O’Neill used Jones’s hallucinations to show the complexity of the psyche, including the collective unconscious. Thus Jones can reach back to events that he did not personally witness but that are still a part of his character, such as slavery and the early rituals of witch doctors. The white and black cultures are in opposition, and Jones must choose between the new gods and the old ones. The consequences, as the play demonstrates, can be dramatic.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the importance of hallucinations in showing Brutus Jones’s character. Compare and contrast these with dreams presented in James Thurber’s “The Secret Life of Walter Mitty” or Ken Kesey’s One Flew over the Cuckoo’s Nest.
2. List examples of racist attitudes and language shown by Jones, Smithers, and at least three minor characters. How are these important in developing themes?
3. Discuss how the staging and special effects of this work contribute to characterization and theme. Compare and contrast with another work in which nonrealistic effects are used to communicate something about reality, such as O’Neill’s The Hairy Ape, Nikolai Gogol’s “The Overcoat,” or Gabriel García-Márquez’s “A Very Old Man with Enormous Wings.”

The Hairy Ape (1922)

The brutally hard work of stoking coal furnaces on a steamer can reduce humans to the level of animals, but Yank finds the insult of an upper-class woman more painful than backbreaking work. His search for revenge can only lead to disaster.

The dehumanizing effects of modern society are graphically shown in The Hairy Ape, in which physical characteristics as well as internal traits demonstrate the effects of industrialism on human beings. This play is O’Neill’s first major venture into expressionism, extending the experiment he began with The Emperor Jones. It also represents greater experimentation with language, going beyond the slang he had used in earlier plays to include a dialect that reflected the exact way characters talked—including words hitherto considered too crude for the theater. O’Neill was greatly influenced by the works of the Swedish playwright August Strindberg, who believed that the internal realities of life were best expressed by moving away from the external realities. Expressionist artists such as Strindberg exaggerate certain features—scenery, events, and/or characters—in order to portray a more memorable, more emotional internal reality. These techniques are clearly seen in The Hairy Ape, where unrealistic descriptions and events offer important insights into reality itself.

The play is drawn from O’Neill’s experiences on the SS New York, which he described as “no place for a man who wanted to call his soul his own”

(qtd. in Gelb and Gelb 164). According to the stage directions, the title character (Yank) and other representatives of the lower classes have degenerated into a near-animal state: "The men themselves should resemble those pictures in which the appearance of Neanderthal Man is guessed at. All are hairy-chested, with long arms of tremendous power, and low, receding brows above their small, fierce, resentful eyes." At the other extreme, the upper classes have degenerated into a pale, weak version of humanity: "incongruous, artificial figures, inert and disharmonious, as if their lifeblood had been sapped" (644).

The play is divided into eight scenes. In scene 1, Yank is immediately established as the leader of a group of firemen on a transatlantic steamer. O'Neill uses dialect to establish the men's low educational levels and the primitive way in which many of them communicate. When Yank cries that he is "tryin' to t'ink," his comment is almost laughable: He has little capacity for thought since he is rarely called upon to think. Emphasizing the irony, O'Neill shows him sometimes assuming the position of Rodin's statue The Thinker. "Drink, don't think!" the voices chant in a chorus (645). Drinking is the only escape from the harshness of life that some can find. The oldest fireman, Paddy, can remember the time of clipper ships, when the laborers at sea could still enjoy the beauty of nature, but that time has passed. Their work has divorced them from nature.

Scene 2 introduces the contrasting world of the wealthy. O'Neill's inspiration for this was his experience on the SS New York, a luxury liner. He found the attitudes of wealthy passengers to be worse than the job itself. On the promenade deck, the wealthy people in the play pass their time in idle conversation. Mildred claims she wants to help the poor, but her pretense at social conscience is shallow. Her wardrobe is white, symbolizing her colorlessness and artificiality. She wangles permission to visit the boiler room so she can "investigate how the other half lives" (649). In scene 3, she gets her wish. The sight of hairy, half-naked men bent over roaring furnaces and the sound of Yank's angry voice so horrify her that she faints, though not before crying out, "The filthy beast!" (651).

The gap between her and the workers is too large for her to bridge.

Yank's rage at being called a beast leads to taunts by the other firemen in scene 4. When Paddy suggests that Yank has fallen in love, Yank retorts, "Hate, dat's what. I've fallen in hate, get me?" (651). Long, the most politically inclined fireman, uses the exchange as an excuse to argue that workers must rise against capitalists, but few in the room have the mental capacity to understand his arguments: The Marxist notion that the workers will rise against the bourgeoisie is seen as unlikely at best.

Scene 5 takes place three weeks later, when Yank and Long are searching New York for their revenge. They pass through crowds that ignore them entirely until the end of the scene, when Yank punches an elderly gentleman. The gentleman does not react at all to the punch but is angry that Yank made him miss his bus, for which Yank is sent to prison in scene 6. The nonreaction to a vicious punch is another example of expressionism: Showing an elderly wealthy man unaffected by a punch makes clear that physical strength has little value in industrialized society; inconvenience has greater repercussions. For all Yank's strength he is powerless to harm Mildred or any of her class.

While in prison, Yank learns about the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), a socialist group that fights against industrialists. Yank attempts to join the IWW in scene 7, but he cannot communicate his passion for the cause. When asked for his name, he answers, "Lemme tink," since it has been so long since he was called anything but Yank. This response demonstrates the way in which industrialism can dehumanize. Yank can only enunciate his desire to cause violence to industrialists, causing the IWW secretary to reject him as "too stupid" at best, a "rotten agent provocator" at worst (659).

In the final scene, realizing that he belongs nowhere, Yank finds himself in the monkey house of a zoo. He hopes that there, at least, he can belong. But Yank is a man, not an animal; he does not belong. He is killed by the ape he hoped might be a brother.

A recurring O'Neill theme is that people need to belong, but that industrial society has torn too much of the social fabric for this to happen easily. Yank fits nowhere: He is rejected by other firemen, passers-by in New York, cellmates, the IWW, and an ape. As many moderns cannot, he cannot find meaning within his social role, but neither can he break out of it. His role, like the coal dust that surrounded him on the ship, is part of his being.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the worlds of Yank and Mildred. Discuss how their physical appearance offers insights into the worlds that formed them.
2. Find as many references to animals as possible, both in stage directions and in dialogue. Compare and contrast this animal imagery with that in George Orwell's Animal Farm, where animals are given human characteristics.
3. Compare and contrast the way that expressionism is seen in The Hairy Ape and The Emperor Jones. How do expressionist techniques aid in developing the themes in each play? How do O'Neill's applications of expressionist techniques differ from those of Strindberg?

Mourning Becomes Electra* (1931)

The Mannon family is tormented by inappropriate romantic attachments as well as a historical legacy of past wrongs. Ezra, Christine, Orin, Lavinia, and Adam must choose between revenge and forgiveness. They must also decide whether to follow their hearts or social conventions. O'Neill's most complex and ambitious work, Mourning Becomes Electra is a trilogy of three plays: The Homecoming, The Hunted, and The Haunted. Unlike in other dramatic trilogies, each part of the larger work is really incomplete without the other two. This fact does not make production easy, since presenting all three plays unedited takes more than six hours. O'Neill's fondness for long plays increased with time, and theatergoers became accustomed to seeing the first part of an O'Neill play, taking a dinner break, then returning for the final act or acts. In creating these works, O'Neill drew inspiration from ancient Greek tragedy as well as contemporary Freudian psychology. His intent was to create a modern psychological drama using a plot from Greek tragedy. He chose the Oresteia, also a trilogy of tragedies, as the model for Mourning Becomes Electra. To emphasize the parallels, the Mannon house is described as "of the Greek temple type" (454).

The first play of O'Neill's trilogy, The Homecoming, establishes the strange and complicated family relationships of the Mannons. The parallels with the Oresteia are particularly clear in the first play of Aeschylus's trilogy, entitled Agamemnon. Aeschylus wrote about the return of Agamemnon, king of Thebes, to a wife who wishes he had died in the Trojan War; since he did not, she plots to kill him. In O'Neill's trilogy, Ezra Mannon—very similar in sound to the name Agamemnon—is returning from the Civil War to a wife, Christine, who hates him, though for very different reasons than Clytemnestra hated Agamemnon. Agamemnon was responsible for the death of their daughter, for which Clytemnestra cannot forgive him. Brant, Christine's lover, is the parallel to Aegisthos, Clytemnestra's lover; Christine loves him because he is "not a hypocritical Mannon" (491). Both Clytemnestra and Christine kill their husbands when their lovers are unwilling to help, and their children discover that the emotional consequences of their parents' acts have a permanent effect on their lives.

An equally dark theme in both plays is the love that the daughters feel for their fathers and the hatred they feel for their mothers. Lavinia reveals her hatred for her mother when she quietly accuses Christine of having an affair and attempts to blackmail her mother into curtailing the illicit relationship. Angry at the daughter she never really loved, Christine flaunts Ezra's affection for her, then poisons him in the marital bed.

In each trilogy, the brothers are torn. Electra's brother, Orestes, is pulled two ways: He loves his mother but must avenge his father. Ezra's son Orin—similar in sound to the name Orestes—is also pulled, as he loves his mother overly much but also loves his sister, who causes the mother's suicide.

Additional twists in the Mannon family history are revealed in the first play: Adam Brant is actually Ezra's cousin, a Mannon who had been dispossessed over a squabble concerning Adam's mother, and his seduction of Christine was motivated by hate and revenge. As in his other plays, O'Neill suggests that the effects of parentage, environment, time, and chance are virtually inescapable. Each personal tragedy has clear roots in at least one of these factors, and the characters seem powerless to break free. Each character has moments that inspire sympathy, as when the normally cold and harsh Ezra tries to regain his wife's love, but each quickly returns to the original role.

An understanding of Freudian and Jungian psychology is very helpful to understanding both trilogies. Freud wrote about the Oedipus conflict and Oedipus complex, which describe the strong feelings that children have for the parent of the opposite sex; both terms are derived from the Oedipus trilogy, by Sophocles. According to Freud, sons unconsciously desire their mothers and see their fathers as competitors for that love. This explains the conflict that fathers and sons often experience: They are in competition for the same woman. In normal development the male child matures and transfers his affections to females of his own age, but if the Oedipus conflict is not resolved, it becomes a complex. The adult may not be able to leave the parent of the opposite sex, or he or she may be drawn only to adults who strongly resemble the parent. Freud used the term Oedipus conflict/complex for both genders, but Jung introduced the term Electra complex for a woman's inability to resolve her attraction to her father and her competition with her mother. In many ways Electra is the better representative of both genders: The tragic Oedipus did not know that the woman with whom he fell in love was his mother, nor that the man he killed was his father, since he had been raised by strangers, while Electra understood quite clearly that she loved her father and hated her mother. O'Neill protested when critics referred to his use of Freudian psychology, since he was more strongly influenced by Jung, but both schools influenced him.

The role of fate is established in the first play and continued throughout the second and third plays of the trilogy. In the second play, The Hunted, the battle of affections focuses on Orin, who is back from war. Lavinia and Christine vie for Orin's affection and sympathy, but Orin loves his mother "better than anything in the world" (533), just as Christine loved her father. Orin refuses to believe that Christine poisoned Ezra until he is confronted by evidence of her affair, but even then his anger is focused on Brant, whom he kills. His hope is to go away with Christine, but upon learning of Brant's murder, she kills herself.

This play not only bears strong similarities to Aeschylus's second play, The Libation Bearers; it also recalls the Oedipus trilogy. In this parallel, Orin is Oedipus, who loved his mother, Jocasta. Christine is Jocasta, and Ezra is Laius, who is killed by her. Brant, who resembles Ezra, is also a Laius figure.

In the third play, The Haunted, the townspeople are convinced that the Mannon house is cursed. Here O'Neill returns to the notion that heredity and environment are inescapable: The sins of the parents are now visited upon the children, physically as well as emotionally. Lavinia and Orin now resemble their parents in appearance and dress. Neither is capable of a healthy relationship. Orin is now attracted to Lavinia; he comments, "You don't know how like Mother you've become, Vinnie" (579). He makes an indecent proposition but is repelled when she admits to having had a relationship with an island man—symbolic of her desire for paradise. Her chances with this man, Peter, are ruined when she accidentally calls him Adam (Brant). Orin kills himself, the only way he can resist fate, and Lavinia becomes a recluse in the old house. The Haunted bears only general similarities to the last play in Aeschylus's trilogy, The Eumenides, which centers on a court case in which gods debate the ethical issues, a premise not easily translated into an American post-Civil War setting, though some critics suggest that the parallel still exists: Ethical issues are argued, albeit not by gods, and revenge is shown to be destructive.

Though clearly influenced by Greek tragedy and Freudian psychology, the trilogy also focuses on issues that are more clearly American. Critics note that the word Mannon is also similar to mammon, or worldly gain, and money has cursed this family. The family's strange pathologies can be traced back at least as far as David Mannon, Ezra's uncle, who married a beautiful Canadian woman, Marie Brantome, who was not of his class. This decision completely estranged him from his family. When David fell on hard times and needed help, Ezra chose financial profit over family responsibilities, a decision that ultimately led to Marie's death. Had the Mannons accepted the American notion of class mobility—or at least valued family over materialism—the tragic events would not have been set in motion.

Modern psychology, Greek tragedy, and American history combine to create powerful drama in Mourning Becomes Electra. The plays add interesting changes in the Greek tragedies: Electra, not Orin, is the major figure, and drives, not gods, motivate actions. Throughout the plays the townspeople function as the Greek chorus, offering perspectives on the events and people portrayed, and these perspectives are very American. The plot was particularly daring for the period, as it included notions of incest and adultery as well as the more classic honor and revenge.

For Discussion or Writing

1. To what extent can the characters control their destinies, and to what extent are they victims of their past and their environment? Compare and contrast the role of fate in this play and in Long Day's Journey into Night.
2. Compare and contrast Mourning Becomes Electra with the Oresteia. Consider plot, character, and themes.
3. Discuss the importance of Freudian and Jungian psychology to the themes in Mourning Becomes Electra. Explain how understanding this psychology contributes to understanding characters' motivations and actions.

The Iceman Cometh (1939)

The characters at Harry Hope's saloon are all failures in some way, but all have dreams that sustain them. They are waiting for Hickey, a hardware salesman who goes to Harry Hope's saloon every year and treats everyone to drinks. This year is different: Instead of offering just a temporary escape, Hickey wants to help them achieve their dreams, with very unexpected consequences.

Though it is long on dialogue and short on action, the power of the play was such that it was recognized as one of O'Neill's finest. It would be the last play produced in his lifetime. As in many other plays, O'Neill observes the Aristotelian unities of time and place: All action takes place within a single place, in a single day. It also begins with extensive stage directions, including very precise physical descriptions for each character. For O'Neill this precision had a price: He saw his characters very clearly, but as a result he tended to be disappointed in the actors who took their roles—they were rarely exactly as he saw the characters in his imagination. The play is set in 1912, one of the saddest and most significant years in the playwright's life. Harry Hope's saloon is modeled on three bars that O'Neill frequented: Jimmy-the-Priest's, the Hell Hole, and the Taproom of the Garden Hotel—bars where the playwright himself dreamed of a happier future. O'Neill believed that dreams are essential to life, often the only things that keep humans "fighting, willing—living" (Gelb and Gelb 5).

Act 1 establishes the characters and their pipe dreams. The characters live for tomorrow, when they pretend they will take action to improve themselves. All depend on a pipe dream, the belief that tomorrow they will make something of themselves, to maintain their connection with each other as well as their belief in themselves. Most of the dreams concern a tomorrow that will never occur: Cora will never leave prostitution and marry. Others have illusions about today as well as tomorrow: Rocky imagines he is a manager rather than a pimp because he does not beat his employees, and he believes he will one day be successful. Still others have illusions about yesterday as well as tomorrow: Harry Hope imagines that his dead wife was a wonderful woman, and he believes he will have the confidence to go out into the world instead of hiding in his bar.

Larry, one of the central characters, claims he lost his pipe dream. He lost his belief in “the movement,” yet he still dreams, imagining that tomorrow he will pay his bar bill and lead a more respectable life. For Larry and Parritt the movement is the radical labor movement known as the International Workers of the World, or IWW. The same political organization appears in The Hairy Ape. The IWW sought to unionize workers to empower the working class to rise against the wealthy industrialists, but ultimately its dream was no more successful than Larry's. All eagerly await Theodore Hickman, known as Hickey. Hickey is popular not only for his generosity but for his sense of humor. When he finally arrives, however, he has changed. Instead of dreaming with them, he intends to show them “what real peace means” (611). Through him O'Neill describes the many do-gooders whose intentions backfire.

In act 2, Hickey goads the others into trying to achieve their dreams, but they are resistant. Rocky complains that “everybody's gettin' a prize grouch on,” though he claims that the “bums” do need to relinquish their pipe dreams (619). Hickey claims they will be happier when they can lose the “grandstand foolosopher bunk” (620), but dreams are the cement that holds the characters together, both individually and collectively. They are diminished without them. When Parritt is driven to admit that he turned in his mother to the legal authorities, he does not find peace; instead, he begins the spiral to his own destruction.

Act 3 shows the deterioration of the once-cohesive group as they begin to see the unreality of their dreams. Since Parritt's revelation in act 2, his bond is diminished with Larry, the other anarchist. Parritt reveals that his reason for betraying his mother was not political commitment but desire for the money, combined with jealousy that she loved the Cause better than she loved him. His honesty costs him Larry's friendship. As each dream disappears, sadness or loss follows. Cora realizes that she and Chuck are unlikely to make a happy married couple. Wetjoen has claimed to want a real job to earn his passage back to South Africa, but he must admit his past actions preclude his return. Finally,

Hickey admits that his wife did not just die, as he suggested in act 2; he killed her.

In act 4 Hickey explains that he murdered his wife because she always forgave him for his failings and she believed in him. Ironically, that left him with a guilt that became too oppressive to handle. He loved her and hated her at the same time. This drove him to kill her: He was saving her from his own unfaithfulness. His admission does not give him peace. Parritt's repeated begging for understanding also backfires. Larry believes that suicide is Parritt's only respectable escape, and ultimately he persuades Parritt of this.

What allows the others to resume their pipe dreams is Hickey's confession that he murdered his wife to give her peace: They grasp at the notion that he must be crazy, and therefore when Hope asks “with a groping eagerness” whether Hickey has become insane, they all grasp at this—including Hickey himself. If he is insane, they all have a reason to continue their pipe dreams, and then their attempts to set aside their dreams were ill-fated attempts to follow the bad advice of a crazy person. They can return to the happiness of their pipe dreams. Symbolically, the stage setting in this act is exactly as it was in act 1, representing the return.

The title of the play is taken from a bawdy joke that Hickey likes to tell about his wife: that she cheats on him with the iceman. Symbolically the title implies much more. Ice is suggestive of death: Corpses were once preserved in ice, and in the slang of O'Neill's time, to ice someone meant “to kill.” Larry makes this clear when he says, “Death was the Iceman Hickey called to his home” (667). Ice is also suggestive of inaction: To freeze means to cease action, and freezing preserves things exactly as they are. In a sense the characters are frozen in both ways: They are unable to change and escape their ruts, and they are likely to stay there until death.

Critics as well as theatergoers complained about the length of the play—it lasted somewhere between four and five hours—but O'Neill was adamant that he would not cut it. Lawrence Langer complained that O'Neill had made the same point 18 times in the play, but O'Neill retorted, “I intended it to be repeated 18 times” (qtd. in Bogard 408–409). There are many repetitions in the play, but all are important. On the surface the redundancy is realistic, since drunks tend to repeat themselves. If we dig deeper, we see that the repetitions emphasize the patterns that the characters are unable to escape—the recurring excuses, poor choices, and dreams that make up their lives.

The names are symbolic. Harry Hope houses people who live their lives on futile hopes that nonetheless sustain them. Hugo Kalmar, the former political radical, represents Karl Marx: His last name is a condensation of those two words. The former policeman, McGloin, takes his name from the Tenderloin section of New York, where the police were particularly known for corruption. The greedy barman is Pioggi, a name very close to *pigg*y. Hickman is hick-man, one who innocently offered a very false salvation.

The critic Cyrus Day has pointed out the many parallels between the play and the Bible. He notes that Hickey, the would-be savior, has 12 disciples. They drink wine in a grouping that the stage directions suggest is like the Last Supper. One is a betrayer, like Judas: Parritt. The supposed savior, Hickey, will go to his death.

One of O’Neill’s strengths as a playwright is the ability to portray beauty in the darkest aspects of life. He believed that “vices are often nobler than . . . virtues, and nearly always closer to a revelation” (Gelb and Gelb 3). In this play, characters’ vices are the vehicle for important revelations about the human condition. O’Neill shows that dreams can be as important as accomplishments. Forcing people to face harsh realities is not always a kindness: It can be a cruelty that leads to psychic or physical death.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the ways in which characters in The Iceman Cometh depend upon pipe dreams with the way characters in other dramatic or novelistic works do so. Examples might include Tennessee Williams’s The Glass Menagerie or F. SCOTT FITZGERALD’S The Great Gatsby.
2. Discuss how events in the past have influenced the present and future for Mary, Jamie, and Tyrone. To what extent are these influences inevitable? To what extent do the characters have more control than they imagine?
3. Compare and contrast the ways in which the characters deceive each other and themselves. Discuss how O’Neill uses symbols to clarify these deceptions.

Moon for the Misbegotten (1943)

A farmer and his queen-sized daughter are masters at comic deception, whether they are deceiving their landlord, a wealthy neighbor, or each other. Josie discovers that deception in the name of love can be a kindness for the deceived but a profound sacrifice for the deceiver. One of O’Neill’s more autobiographical plays, Moon for the Misbegotten is the playwright’s expression of love for his older brother, Jamie. The character Jim Tyrone is clearly Jamie O’Neill, Eugene’s older brother, and Josie is one of the women he loved.

The play is notable for its excellent balance of comedic and tragic elements. It was not immediately appreciated, partly because its three-dimensionality was not recognized and partly because its bawdy humor was more than audiences could handle at the time, but it was later praised as a masterpiece.

The play is set in the period after A Long Day’s Journey into Night, and it picks up where that play left off. The action takes place within a 24-hour period, from noon until the dawn of the following day. Set in an impoverished New England farmhouse, the interactions between characters are comic in the first act but increasingly tragic in the following three acts.

One problem for theatrical producers was the character of Josie, who was particularly difficult to cast in the 1940s, when young actresses were expected to reflect conventional notions of female attractiveness, which excluded larger women. According to the stage directions, Josie is “so oversize for a woman that she is almost a freak—five feet eleven in her stockings and weighs around one hundred and eighty. Her sloping shoulders are broad, her chest deep with large, firm breasts, her waist wide but slender by contrast with her hips and thighs . . . immensely strong . . . more powerful than any but an exceptionally strong man" (857). These descriptions are central to the play, because Josie is blessed and cursed by her own anatomy: It allows her to prevent her harsh father from controlling her, but it also radically reduces her chances for romantic love.

The irony is that Josie is delicate in spirit and romantic at heart. She has the strength to return sarcastic remarks as well as physical blows, but she lacks confidence in herself as a woman. She sees herself as an "ugly lump of a woman" (870), a "great ugly cow" (923). She is both tough and vulnerable, proud and ashamed of her strength at the same time. She pretends to be a coarse woman of loose morals when in fact she is a virgin.

Jim Tyrone is also a study in contrasts. He is a gregarious loner—one who loves the comradeship of a bar but must drink heavily to feel that he belongs. As Jamie does, he drinks to escape his guilt over his behavior after his mother's death. Like Josie, Jim is a lost soul who needs love but lacks hope. Like her, he is judged on externals—in his case, his drunkenness and wealth—that have little relation to the man inside. He pretends to be a shallow cosmopolite interested only in fun, while in truth he has a profound need for closeness and understanding. He is the only one who sees through Josie's facade—he knows she is really a virgin—and the only one who perceives her genuine beauty.

The father, Hogan, is five inches shorter than Josie but still powerful. A harsh man who is readier with a blow or an unkind word than with a kindness, he is slowly revealed as a person capable of love, though only with those he respects. Josie helps him partly because he is her father and partly because he is the only person who seems to care for her.

The play is a series of deceptions that move from the comic to the tragic. In act 1, Josie deceives her father to help her last brother, Mike, escape from the farmhouse. Mike is a self-righteous prig, but she loves him because she remembers the child that he sive to him, and Josie is the only one who can stand up to the father, physically as well as emotionally.

Josie joins her father, Hogan, in deceiving the landlord into forgetting the rent, and they recount stories of times they deceived other farmers by selling them damaged livestock. The family's banter often has a hard edge, but it also shows the closeness they share: They are people who can express their affection only through insults. In the most comic section of the act, Hogan and Josie turn the tables on a wealthy neighbor, Harder, who has arrived to complain that their pigs are bathing in his ice pond: They berate him for endangering their livestock. (Hogan is based upon one of James O'Neill's tenants, who pulled precisely that deception. Harder is based not on O'Neill, Sr., but on a wealthy man of O'Neill's acquaintance.) Harder is such an unlikable character that the deception seems just.

The deceptions in act 2 are more complex. Through many convoluted arguments, Hogan finally convinces Josie that she should trick Jim Tyrone into marrying her. He claims that doing so is necessary to prevent Tyrone from selling their farm to Harder. Because Josie loves Jim—and because she believes Jim might sell their farm—she deceives herself into thinking that her deception would be fair.

Act 3 concentrates on the ways in which various characters deceive themselves. Jim reveals his understanding of Josie's self-deceptions about her character. He knows she is not a slut but a virgin with a tender heart. He reveals that he finds her beautiful and desirable, but he believes that he does not deserve her goodness. Jim suffers from the classic virgin/whore dichotomy: He cannot understand that women can be pure at heart yet have a sexual side. As a result, he cannot reach out to Josie as a potential mate, however much he needs to do so. He shares with her the guilt that has wracked his soul—his behavior after his mother's death, when he sought out a prostitute to escape the pain, just as Jamie O'Neill had. Like Jamie, he is unable to forgive himself. Jim reaches out to Josie for maternal comfort, but that need is complicated by another need: He also desires her as a woman. Each time his sexual feelings for her arise, he represses them with self-loathing. Josie recognizes that his guilt is causing him to drink himself to death. Because she loves him, she gives him the material comfort he seems to need rather than staking a claim on the more mature romantic love that she needs.

Act 4 establishes that the play is more tragedy than comedy. Hogan reveals that he deceived Josie to give her a chance at happiness. His love for her is made clear. Josie hopes that Jim Tyrone will be able to find peace in death, as she realizes that he cannot find it in life. The challenge of this play is understanding the tragedy and psychological complexity that overlie the humor. This challenge also faces producers of the play, since the comic deceptions cannot take precedence over the psychological deceptions; nor can the romantic elements be over-emphasized, lest the play become the type of melodrama that O'Neill detested. Hogan is a tyrant and a cheat, but he loves his daughter. Jim is a drunkard with a penchant for self-destruction and an inability to reconcile the virgin/whore dichotomy, but he is a sensitive soul who understands Josie's beauty and delicacy and who is more generous to Hogan than Hogan deserves. The bawdy-mouthed Josie is a partner in her father's deceptions, but she chooses Jim's needs over her own, and she protects her brother Mike even as he insults her.

As Bogard observes, the play is "an act of love, supplying through its romantic fiction a blessing for a damned soul" (446). Hinden suggests that O'Neill may also have been seeking absolution through this romantic portrayal for his own abandonment of his alcoholic brother. Whatever the reason, the result is powerful theater.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss how Josie's appearance has shaped her life choices. To what extent has her appearance been an advantage, and to what extent has it harmed her? Compare and contrast her challenge with that of Pecola in Toni Morrison's The Bluest Eye.
2. Compare and contrast the inner and outer strengths of each of these characters: Josie, Phil, Mike, Harder, and James.
3. Discuss the ways in which a character's sacrifice can work against his or her own happiness. What lessons does O'Neill mean for the audience to take away? Compare and contrast Josie's choice with that of Edna in Kate Chopin's The Awakening or Hester Prynne in Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter.

Long Day's Journey into Night (1945)

Four members of an Irish-American family blame fate as well as each other for what went wrong in their lives, yet they love each other even as they trade emotional barbs. The Tyrones face the same challenges with which O'Neill grew up: His mother's drug addiction and depression, his older brother's alcoholism and wild life, the father's stinginess and regrets, and his own tuberculosis and ill-fated emulation of his brother.

The dedication to Long Day's Journey into Night provides an essential insight into the play as well as into the circumstances that created it. Writing to Carlotta, O'Neill's third wife, on the occasion of their 12th wedding anniversary, O'Neill describes the play as one of "old sorrow, written in tears and blood," meant as "a tribute to your love and tenderness which gave me the faith in love that enabled me to face my dead at last and write this play—write it with deep pity and understanding and forgiveness for all the four haunted Tyrones" (7). Through this play he forgives himself as well as his family for the wrongs that were done.

This is O'Neill's most autobiographical play. James Tyrone, simply called "Tyrone" in the play, is his father, James O'Neill. Jamie is Eugene's older brother, Jamie, and Edmund is Eugene himself. Mary Tyrone is his mother, Ella; Ella's given name was actually Mary. Recognizing the pain that this play could cause his family, O'Neill stipulated that it not be published or produced until 25 years after his death, though his wife chose to release it just three years later. It won a Pulitzer Prize, O'Neill's fourth, and it is counted among his most successful works.

The entire play takes place in a summerhouse much like the one where the O'Neills spent their summers. O'Neill observes the classical unities of time and place, as presented in Aristotle's Poetics: The time span of the play consists of 24 hours, and the setting is a single place. The past, however, is always present: The dialogue makes clear that past events heavily color the present.

As the title suggests, the play involves a movement from light into darkness, both figuratively and literally. It begins in the morning and ends at night. The characters frequently retreat into denial, continually referring to dark memories that affect their present and cast clouds on their future.

Act 1 opens with a gesture of affection, as Tyrone walks with an arm around his wife and they exchange loving words. Yet there are undercurrents to suggest that something is not quite right. Mary loves him but is unhappy with him. Her inability to stop her hands from fluttering is symbolic: She is unable to control herself physically or emotionally. When Tyrone compliments Mary for having gained 20 pounds, it is clear that her health is an issue. It soon becomes clear she is a morphine addict: She would like to break the addiction but cannot do so. When she means to "take advantage of the sunshine before the fog comes back" (41), she cannot. Fog is a recurring motif, and it is also figurative and literal: Just as fog obscures people's ability to see far ahead, destructive practices obscure people's ability to understand and move ahead.

The other central conflicts and motifs of the play are also introduced here. Denial of personal responsibility for existing problems, refusal to move beyond the past, and escape into alcohol and narcotics are examples of the Tyrones' destructive behavior. Jamie blames his father's miserliness for the health problems faced by his mother and brother, since Tyrone hired only the cheapest doctors. Tyrone blames Jamie for weakening Edmund's health by introducing him to a life of dissipation. Jamie, Tyrone charges, is a "healthy hulk" (33) like him, while Edmund is delicate like his mother. Mary blames everyone but herself for her addiction: Tyrone for hiring the cut-rate doctor who prescribed the morphine; Edmund for causing the birth pains that necessitated drugs; Jamie for infecting their youngest brother, Eugene, with his own childhood measles, thereby causing the baby's death and increasing the mother's depression. While each family member argues against the accusations, each nonetheless accepts the guilt. Act 2 begins at lunchtime. Throughout the play, characters use the excuse of drinking or drugs to say things they would not say when sober. Mary alternately berates her family and finds excuses for their failings, aiding in the pattern of denial: Whiskey can be useful in generating an appetite when someone is ill, an impoverished childhood can lead to difficulty in spending money later in life, and so on. Though she knows it is "inconsiderate . . . to bring up the past" (67), she cannot help it any more than the others can. This is a recurring theme: The past indelibly marks the present. As in The Iceman Cometh, it is essential to have faith in something, religious or otherwise. Mary regrets the loss of the happiness she felt in her convent days, when she had faith. For Tyrone his sons' rejection of Catholicism put them on the path of destruction. He believes that if Mary had more faith in God and the church, she would have the strength to fight her addiction.

The loneliness that has plagued Mary's married life is emphasized in act 3. Mary cannot bear to be alone, and she keeps Cathleen, the maid, with her by plying the girl with whiskey. Ironically Mary is still alone, since each character discusses very separate personal concerns. Mary speaks eloquently of the rheumatism in her crippled hands, the loneliness of being an actor's wife, the loss of her girlhood faith, the alcoholism of the men in the family, and her inability to protect Eugene from death. Inability to handle more pain is her excuse for the morphine. When Edmund tries to tell her about his tuberculosis, she angrily hushes him, denying the problem.

The dialogue makes clear that the playwright has reached an understanding of his own mother's tragedy. While he does not excuse her addiction or her denial of her sons' problems, he understands them: Sometimes an individual's pain is too great for the person to reach out to others for help. When Mary retreats to her room at the end of the act, supposedly to rest, the others know that she is going to use drugs, and they know they cannot stop her. Sometimes it is simply futile to offer help.

The love that Tyrone feels for Mary is particularly evident in this act. When she recalls the time that they first fell in love, Tyrone must blink back tears. When he tells her that he will love her “always and forever” (112), it is clearly true.

Act 4 focuses on the loneliness of the male Tyrones. Near midnight Tyrone is already drunk. He laments to Edmund that he is still affected by his impoverished childhood, when he was deserted by his father. His resulting miserliness has hurt him as well as his family. Though he is a great melodrama star—a matinee idol—this was never his dream. He once had a chance to fulfill his dreams, since even the great Edwin Booth commented on his great talent for Shakespeare, but he chose the “big monemymaker” (150) instead. Here O’Neill expresses his understanding of his own father’s tragedy at being typecast in The Count of Monte Cristo. Tyrone is embarrassed by his work and angry at himself for abandoning his dream in order to ensure a dependable income. He is hurt that his wife speaks of her convent childhood as the happiest time in her life. Though he denies it, his wife is equally tormented by wasted talent: She was recognized as a brilliant pianist. Tyrone knows he is at least partly to blame for his own loneliness. Thus, he drinks heavily, though, as with O’Neill, Sr., his constitution could handle large quantities of alcohol, and he never misses performances.

Next Edmund talks about his own loneliness, sense of meaninglessness, and need to escape from his own pain, all of which correspond to O’Neill’s own experiences. When he says, “The fog was where I wanted to be” (131), he is talking about more than his walk outside. While he was at sea, he felt a sense of peace he was unable to find at home: “I belonged, without past or future, within peace and unity and a wild joy, within something greater than my own life” (153). At home, he feels the fog—the loneliness and lack of clarity—and he is “always a stranger who never feels at home” (153). He fears what tuberculosis will entail, and he suspects that Tyrone means to pay for only the cheapest care. His suspicions are correct, though by the end of the act, Tyrone has agreed to send him to a private facility. Edmund blames his father for Mary’s inability to break her addiction, while he recognizes that both Jamie and Tyrone blame him for it. When Jamie enters, he is equally drunk and equally inclined to talk about personal regrets. He describes his evening with Fat Violet, a prostitute who was about to be dismissed because of her weight. She is similar to Josie in Moon for the Misbegotten, though much less developed as a character. Feeling sorry for Violet, Jamie hired her for the evening and made her feel loved and appreciated.

Speaking more freely as a result of the alcohol, Jamie reveals that he cannot forgive their mother for her addiction. Her inability to break her habit gives him little optimism of recovering from his own alcoholism. He fears that Edmund, his closest friend, will die in the sanatorium. He confesses that he led Edmund into bad habits, such as drinking alcohol and patronizing whores. In part he acted from jealousy, since he failed to develop his own talents, and in part he acted from anger that Edmund’s birth had begun Mary’s addiction, though he knew that the latter was not Edmund’s fault.

Even more than in the first three acts, the characters bare their souls, but they also bare their teeth. They love each other, but they are well skilled in hurting each other and better skilled at hurting themselves.

At the climax, Mary enters, wearing a blue dressing gown. The gown is symbolic: The blue represents goodness while the nightgown represents the precedence of dream over reality. Mary has taken so much of the drug that she does not know where she is. She imagines she is still a convent student, dreaming of being a nun, though she carries her wedding dress. Her hopelessness and sadness are summed up in the last line, when she remembers one spot of happiness in her life: when she fell in love with Tyrone and was “so happy for a time” (176). Earlier in the act Tyrone said, “My name is Might-Have-Been” (168); clearly he spoke for them all. In creating his characters, O’Neill recognized his own failures—his own might-have-beens—as well as his family’s, and the play provides beautiful absolution for all.

Henrik Ibsen's Ghosts, Fyodor Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment, Margaret Atwood's The Handmaid's Tale, or any other full-length literary work in which guilt plays an important role in motivating action.

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Alexander, Doris. Eugene O'Neill's Last Plays: Separating Art from Autobiography. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005.
- Black, Stephen A. Eugene O'Neill: Beyond Mourning and Tragedy. New Haven, Conn., and London: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. Eugene O'Neill: Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.
- Bogard, Travis. Contour in Time: The Plays of Eugene O'Neill. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- Day, Cyrus. "The Iceman and the Bridegroom." Modern Drama 1 (1958): 3–9.
- Dugan, Lawrence. "O'Neill and the Wobblies: The IWW as a Model for Failure in The Iceman Cometh." Comparative Drama 36, nos. 1–2 (Spring–Summer 2002): 109–124.
- eO'Neill.com: An Electronic Eugene O'Neill Archive. Available online. URL: <http://www.eoneill.com>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Eugene O'Neill*. A Steeplechase Films Production for American Experience, 2006. WGBH Educational Foundation and Steeplechase Films, Inc. Transcript. Available online. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/amex/oneill/filmmore/pt.html>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Floyd, Virginia. The Plays of Eugene O'Neill: A New Assessment. New York: Ungar, 1985.
- Frenz, Horst. Eugene O'Neill. Translated by Helen Sebba. New York: Ungar, 1971.
- , ed. O'Neill: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1964.
- Gassner, John. Eugene O'Neill. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1965.
- Gelb, Arthur, and Barbara Gelb. O'Neill. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.
- Hinden, Michael. "O'Neill and Jamie: A Survivor's Tale." Comparative Drama 35, no. 3 (Fall 2001): 435–445.
- Houchin, John H., ed. The Critical Response to Eugene O'Neill. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- Johnson, Janice. "A Long Dark Journey into Light." Humanities 27, no. 2 (March/April 2006): 38–41. Available online. URL: <http://www.neh.gov/news/humanities/2006-03/darkjourney.html>. Accessed July 7, 2009.
- Krasner, David. "Whose Role Is It Anyway? Charles Gilpin and the Harlem Renaissance." African American Review 29, no. 3 (Autumn 1995): 483–496.
- Manheim, Michael, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Eugene O'Neill. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- O'Neill, Eugene. The Emperor Jones. Selected Plays of Eugene O'Neill. New York: Random House, 1967.
- . The Hairy Ape. A Treasury of the Theater: From Henrik Ibsen to Robert Lowell. Edited by John Gassner and Berhard F. Dukore. 4th ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1970.
- . The Iceman Cometh: O'Neill: Complete Plays 1932–1943. Edited by Travis Bogard. New York: Literary Classics of the United States, 1988.
- . Moon for the Misbegotten: O'Neill: Complete Plays 1932–1943. Edited by Travis Bogard. New York: Literary Classics of the United States, 1988.
- . Mourning Becomes Electra: Selected Plays of Eugene O'Neill. New York: Random House, 1967.
- Ranald, Margaret Loftus. The Eugene O'Neill Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.
- Sheaffer, Louis. O'Neill, Son and Artist. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.
- . O'Neill, Son and Playwright. Boston: Little, Brown, 1968.
- Siebold, Thomas, ed. Readings on Eugene O'Neill. San Diego: Greenhaven, 1998.
- Tornqvist, Egil. A Drama of Souls: Studies in O'Neill's Super-naturalist Technique. New Haven, Conn., and London: Yale University Press, 1969.
- . Eugene O'Neill: A Playwright's Theater. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004.

Terry Mackey

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

(1890–1980)

I am a passenger on that ship.

(Ship of Fools)

Katherine Anne Porter was notoriously secretive and mysterious about the details of her life. For instance, for much of her life she gave a false birth year. In fact, she was born on May 15, 1890, in Indian Creek, Texas, the fourth of five children. Her mother and father were Harrison and Mary Alice Jones Porter, and she claimed that Daniel Boone was her ancestor. As a child she was named Callie Russell Porter, only changing her name when she began to write. Her mother died in 1892, when Callie was very young; the children went to Harrison's mother, Catherine Ann Porter, in Kyle, Texas, to be reared. At age six Callie wrote and illustrated a "nobble" in crayon titled The Hermit of Halifax Cave and was upset when her grandmother and the neighbors laughed at it. The grandmother died in 1901, leaving the family to move to San Antonio. During this time Callie had free access to many books and read widely from such authors as Shakespeare, Dostoyevsky, and Tolstoy. She and her sisters attended convent schools, although the family was Methodist. (She converted to Catholicism in 1910.)

In 1906 at age 16, Porter eloped with John Henry Koontz. In some accounts the marriage lasted only until she was 19, but they did not divorce until nine years after they married. After she left him, she supported herself with a variety of interesting jobs, including newspaper work at papers in Fort Worth and Denver, movie work in Chicago, and ghostwriting in New York City. She had a bout of tuberculosis and spent some time in a sanatorium in 1915, and she contracted influenza in October 1918. Near death, she recovered and used her experience as the basis for the story "Pale Horse, Pale Rider," written many years later. Both of these illnesses made her keenly aware of the need to be serious about her purpose in life: Her chosen profession was art, specifically writing. She became preoccupied with the idea of death, partly because a favorite niece died shortly after Porter's own near-death experience.

In 1920 she made her first visit to Mexico. She spent the next several years there, on and off, studying art while also writing. She published "María Concepción" in Century magazine in 1922. During her time in Mexico she came face to face with the Obregón revolution, the first of five Mexican revolutions she witnessed. This was the culmination of violent insurrections that had begun in 1910; Pancho Villa, Emiliano Zapata, and various landowners joined the wealthy reformer Francisco Indalecio Madero to overthrow the longtime ruler Porfirio Díaz. This was an exciting time for Porter, who thought she could make a difference in the world in a significant way. She spent her time with artists and intellectuals and showed a decided interest in Mexican politics, analyzing events for Mexican and American newspapers. Her affiliation with communist ideals would continue for some time, but eventually she recognized that artistic expression was being squelched in favor of mainline party rhetoric, and she broke off her relation to communism. It is unclear whether she was actually a member of the Communist Party; if so, it was probably only for a brief period during her stay in Mexico. In 1925 her story "Rope" was published in American Caravan. This work was based on a relationship with an Englishman named Ernest Stock. (There are conflicting reports as to whether she actually married him or not.) During this period she also had experiences that later resulted in episodes in "Flowering Judas" and Ship of Fools.

In the mid- and late 1920s she was a book reviewer for the New York Herald Tribune, the New Republic, and the Nation. She worked at length on a biography of Cotton Mather that was never completed or published, although she would continue to work on it for many years to come. Meanwhile, the story "He" appeared in New Masses in 1927, and "The Jilting of Granny Weatherall" was published in transition in 1929. Politically she was involved in protesting the Sacco-Vanzetti case, in which two anarchists had been sentenced to death. She later claimed that this affair was "one of the important turning points in the history of this country" (quoted in Unrue 109). In August 1927 she marched in the picket lines and was arrested several times, all to no avail—the anarchists were put to death. At this point Porter began to have serious doubts about the value of organized political movements. A major literary break occurred for her in 1930 with the publication of "Flowering Judas" in Hound and Horn. From that point on critics regarded her work as serious literature, and although she did not publish a great volume of literary work, each piece she produced received close attention. She eventually became a member of the literary intelligentsia, associating with such figures as Allen Tate, Delmore Schwartz, Carson McCullers, Eudora Welty, WILLIAM FAULKNER, Flannery O'Connor, Truman Capote, SHERWOOD ANDERSON, Edmund Wilson, Christopher Isherwood, W. H. Auden, Stephen Spender, Louis MacNiece, Robert Lowell, Lincoln Kirstein, Gilbert Seldes, Yvor Winters, Mark and Carl Van Doren, and Diego Rivera.

In 1930 a collection of stories, Flowering Judas, was published. (It was expanded in 1935.) She received a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1931, writing in Mexico and Europe. She had a falling out with the poet HART CRANE, also in Mexico on a Guggenheim, where he was her housemate and neighbor. They had been fairly close friends, despite her distaste for his flagrant homosexuality. Both of them had a bit of a diva streak, however, and when they finally blew up at each other, over a misunderstood time for a dinner appointment, each held a grudge. Her trip from Mexico to Europe provided her with much of the material for Ship of Fools, and some critics claim that the scene in which a man dies after jumping overboard was inspired by Crane's suicide by jumping from an ocean liner in 1932. In Europe she lived in Berlin, Paris, and Basel and met many political figures, including Hermann Göring. (She never met Hitler, though she later claimed she had.) Her personal life in the 1930s included marriages with Eugene Pressley in 1933 and Albert Russell Erskine in 1938. After marrying Erskine, she lived primarily in Louisiana. They separated in 1940 and divorced in 1942. In 1933 she collected and translated songs for Katherine Anne Porter's French Song Book. She won a Book-of-the-Month-Club award in 1937, and her collection of three novellas Pale Horse, Pale Rider appeared in 1939. This book includes "Old Mortality," "Noon Wine," and "Pale Horse, Pale Rider." A fourth short novel, "Promised Land" (later called "No Safe Harbor") was to have been included, but it was not finished; this novella became her life work, Ship of Fools, weighing in at 500 pages and taking more than 20 years to complete. She liked to point out that she did not work on it "full time," as she was obliged to earn a living. Rather, she wrote on it when she could get a few minutes here and there. At any rate, it was not published until 1962.

In the 1940s Porter worked briefly as a scriptwriter in Hollywood and lived in California. World War II affected her politics, and at this time she turned against communism, becoming a political moderate. Her interests turned to teaching writing and practicing literary criticism, and she taught at Stanford in 1948–49 and at the University of Michigan in 1953–54, among several other schools. During this period she published The Leaning Tower and Other Stories (1944) and won several honors, including the first annual Gold Medal for Literature from the Societies of Libraries of New York (1940) and election to the National Institute of Arts and Letters (1943). She translated The Itching Parrot by Fernández de Lizárdi in 1942.

In 1952 her collection of essays The Days Before appeared, and she continued to receive awards and grants throughout the 1950s and 1960s, including election as vice president of the National Institute of Arts and Letters (1950–52), an Emerson-Thoreau Award from the Academy of Arts and Sciences (1952), a Fulbright Lectureship at the University of Liège (1954), a Ford Foundation Grant (1960–62), the National Book Award for fiction (1966), and the Pulitzer Prize for fiction (1966). Ship of Fools finally appeared in 1962 to mixed reviews. It concerns an Atlantic crossing in August 1931, in the years before World War II, and in addition to presenting the intricately intertwined relationships of some five dozen main characters, not counting the “eight hundred and seventy-six souls in steerage” (SFxii), it implies hints of impending political doom. By 1962 critics considered the material “stale,” but commercially the book was a great success, and in 1965 a Hollywood movie appeared starring a large cast, including Vivien Leigh in her last film role, Oskar Werner, Simone Signoret, Lee Marvin, Jose Ferrer, George Segal, and Elizabeth Ashley. Porter earned quite a bit of money from the film, and she became more of a household name than she had ever been. In 1965 riding this new wave of publicity, The Collected Stories of Katherine Anne Porter appeared to great acclaim. Her National Book Award and Pulitzer Prize were for this book.

In the 1960s and 1970s Porter lived largely in Washington, D.C. She published The Collected Essays and Occasional Writings of Katherine Anne Porter in 1970. The Never-Ending Wrong, a memoir of the Sacco-Vanzetti case, was published in 1977. In 1976 she experienced a series of strokes that left her bedridden; her health continued to deteriorate through the late 1970s. Mentally she became cranky and suspicious, turning on her friends. For instance, she became convinced that Malcolm Cowley was plotting to publish her letters to him without her permission. She died at age 90 on September 18, 1980, and her ashes are buried beside her mother's grave in Indian Creek, Texas.

Of course many of Porter's stories are based on episodes from her life. Nevertheless, her point always is to delineate a particular character or characters in relation to a universal theme. The “Miranda” stories depict a recurring character at different ages who is supposed to represent the young Porter, and various other stories center on her grandmother's farm or her life in Mexico. However, her primary interest is in psychological analysis, and a specific understanding of the particular events of her life is not necessary to an understanding of what she was aiming for in these stories. In general, her style is compressed, economical, and forthright. Her characters use everyday language, yet the overall effect is of brilliant subtlety and control. Descriptions can be elaborate, displaying a close attention to detail. Her sensitivity to language, particularly in dialogue, is precise yet unpretentious. Much of her work is funny, and characterization is her forte. Her major themes include the relation of past to present in the mind, cultural displacement, the death of love, the idea of a fate that dooms one to suffering and disappointment, the nature of reality, and courage in the face of fear and failure, all of which demonstrate modernist concerns. Katherine Anne Porter is considered a major figure in American letters, despite her relatively small output.

“The Jilting of Granny Weatherall” (1929)

“The Jilting of Granny Weatherall” first appeared in the magazine transition in 1929 and is collected in Flowering Judas and Other Stories. It is a masterpiece of shifting point of view, not so much among characters as among different times within a single character's consciousness. Alternating between limited omniscient narration and stream of consciousness in Granny Weatherall's thinking, Porter employs flashbacks to make the reader piece together who Granny Weatherall is.

Once the reader distinguishes between present events and Granny Weatherall's wandering memories, the plot is fairly simple. Granny is sick, and the doctor has arrived. She thinks he is a whipper-snapper and wants to give him a piece of her mind. She does, here at the beginning and again later. At first he reacts, but later, although we hear her diatribes, it is clear from his and the nurse's reactions that they do not. She addresses people in the room, people who are long dead, and herself, both her present self and an earlier version. Eventually we can surmise that the children and the priest have arrived. Granny is worse off than she has realized. Much of the plot concerns flashbacks to the time when she was left at the altar by George. She seems to have married anyway—"I want him to know I had my husband just the same and my children and my house like any other woman" (Porter, Flowering Judas 131)—married the man who caught her when she swooned at the wedding after George failed to appear. It is telling that she wants her children to find George and explain that she has forgotten him. (She has not.) Many of her memories concern the everyday things she did to take care of the house and the children and above all the things she did to be prepared. She does not like surprises, but there is one last one for her at the end of the story—a surprise left to the reader to figure out. Granny has been jilted at the altar again, a second time, at the very end of her life.

Porter's technique is very modernist (dense, cryptic, compact), leaving a lot of work for the reader to do. For instance, near the end of the story Granny snaps at the priest, who is tickling her feet and murmuring in Latin (FJ 134). It is left to the reader to infer that he is performing last rites. Throughout the story the pillow rises and floats; it is up to the reader to understand that Granny's head is sinking deeper and deeper into it. Even with sensations like the doctor's whispering, Granny cannot decide whether leaves are rustling or newspapers are swishing or what. She concludes that her daughter and the doctor are whispering loudly into her ear, even as she recognizes that what they are saying is not meant to be heard by her. Clearly we cannot trust Granny to analyze correctly what is going on, and much of the humor in the story results from her unawareness of the gravity of her situation. She says to the doctor, "Ah, I'll never be young again—but I'd be happy if they'd let me lie in peace and get rested" (FJ 130), never realizing that "Rest in Peace" is exactly what she'll do at the end of the story. The end, however, will not be all that peaceful for her.

Despite the novelty of the stream-of-consciousness technique, the point here for Porter always seems to be characterization. We get a real sense of who Ellen Weatherall is and how she got to be that way. (Of course, the symbol of her last name is not to be missed.) In imagining seeing her husband again, a husband who has preceded her in death by some years, she thinks:

Why, he couldn't possibly recognize her. She had fenced in a hundred acres once, digging the post holes herself and clamping the wires with just a negro boy to help. That changed a woman. John would be looking for a young woman with the peaked Spanish comb in her hair and the painted fan. Digging post holes changed a woman. (FJ 126)

Her repetition of "changed a woman" sounds as though she is either trying to convince herself that she has changed or trying to reason out why she has changed. Her incessant worrying about the future indicates that she does not want to be caught off guard by sudden change. It is ironic that she has spent 20 years thinking ahead and preparing for her death yet only recognizes late in the story that it is actually happening to her now. "Granny closed two fingers around Jimmy's thumb. Beads wouldn't do, it must be something alive" (FJ 135). That religion cannot help her foreshadows the betrayal at the end of the story.

Porter's command of voice and her use of juxtaposition help make this story a resounding success. The tight pattern of recurring descriptive symbols (such as Cornelia's voice described as a tilting cart [FJ 134, 136]) and repetitive phrases like “my time has come” (FJ 131, 133) lead the reader to the true sequence of events in the work. More than that, however, they provide clues to Granny Weatherall's psyche and give us a view of her take on death, a surprise that no one wants to admit is about to occur. Granny meets death as she has met life, with hard work, a chip on her shoulder, and a sense of entitlement—God owes her; her entire life has been spent putting the pieces together after the first jilting, and it is a shattering image, for her and for the reader, when God fails to appear.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What happens at the end of this story? Trace the light/flame imagery throughout. Why does Granny Weatherall blow out the light in the last sentence? What does her action mean?
2. Name Granny's children. Why is there no name-sake for her husband, John? What has happened to Hapsy? (How do you know?)
3. Have a look at the tenses in the story. Note instances of past perfect, usually indicating flashbacks. Can you identify the order of her flashbacks? Trace the “real” time of the present events, realizing that Granny is not a reliable narrator here. Also check to see where the idea of “tomorrow” is mentioned. What can you infer from these instances?
4. How is Granny Weatherall jilted twice? Explain the last paragraph in light of the allusion to Christ's parable of the bridegroom. (See Matthew 25:1–13.) What bridegroom is missing here?
5. Compare and contrast this work with Flannery O'Connor's story “A Good Man Is Hard to Find.” Discuss the grandmothers in both works (especially their relations with the families and their deaths). Which work has a more positive ending? Why?

“Flowering Judas” (1930)

“Flowering Judas” was a pivotal story in Porter's career because it first made critics notice her as a serious literary figure. It first appeared in Hound and Horn in 1930 and is collected in Flowering Judas and Other Stories. The story is a tightly written account of incidents in the life of a young American expatriate during the Obregón revolution in Mexico. There is speculation that Laura, like the Miranda character in many of Porter's stories, is a stand-in for the author herself, but Porter insisted that Laura was based on a friend and was an amalgamation of several acquaintances.

Laura has several potential lovers: the young captain she goes riding with, the shock-haired boy who sings to her at her window and to whom she makes the mistake of tossing a rose, and Braggioni, a bigwig in the revolution. When we first see her, she is painfully enduring Braggioni's advances—he is serenading her with a guitar, and she is disgusted by him. He is described as a “gluttonous bulk” (Porter, Flowering Judas 141) “heaped” on a chair (FJ 139) “flaunting a yellow silk handkerchief” doused with Jockey Club cologne (FJ 144). She fancies herself a revolutionary, and we later find that she is tolerating Braggioni because he is an influential figure in the cause. Her motivations are unclear to him, and he imagines that she must be working so hard for the revolution because she has a lover involved in it, but she denies this notion.

The story displays masterful descriptive characterization, especially in depicting Laura. Porter is descriptive but selective here: To piece together what is going on and how Laura feels, the reader must pay close attention to small clues. One big clue is the symbol of the Judas tree in her yard. Legend has it that Judas became a redbud tree after betraying Christ, and it is easy to see how Laura feels she has betrayed Eugenio, who has been languishing in prison, waiting for Braggioni to do him the favor of getting him released. Laura has given him the pills he ultimately uses to commit suicide. When he appears as a Christ figure in her dream and calls her “Murderer! . . . and Cannibal!” (FJ 160), her trademark “No!” has new and dramatic meaning. Throughout the story she has been reluctant to commit herself to love, even seeming to be incapable of feeling any fondness for her little students. She keeps repeating, “No. No. No” (FJ

151) to amorous advances. By the end of the story, however, she shows some feeling and observes, “It is monstrous to confuse love with revolution, night with day, life with death—ah, Eugenio!” (FJ 159). She has been dead to life and love, and now because of her dream of Eugenio, she wakes up, “afraid to sleep again” (FJ 160). The implication is that she might finally learn to love, accepting the sacrament of the “warm bleeding flowers”—but she still cries “No!”

For Discussion or Writing

1. Explain the “cruelty,” “vanity,” and “vast cureless wound of [Braggioni’s] self-esteem.” Who killed Eugenio, and why? Explain the title “Flowering Judas.” What has Laura known all along that Braggioni is going to ask of her?
2. Comment on the implication of Braggioni’s “tenderness,” “amplitude,” “eternal charity,” and “excess” of self-love. What does his name suggest?
3. How would Laura’s possible gift of a “box of colored crayons” be appropriate for the young captain’s declaration of love?
4. Explain the reason for Laura’s stoicism and her “negation of all external events.” How is her mantra of “No” appropriate or inappropriate?
5. Compare and contrast this work with Flannery O’Connor’s short story “Good Country People.” Discuss similarities or differences between the heroines, the tones of the works, the uses of religious imagery, and the final situations of the central characters.

“Noon Wine” (1937)

Published in 1937 in Story magazine and also brought out that year as a separate book in limited publication, “Noon Wine” is the middle novella in Pale Horse, Pale Rider. Its setting is a “Small South Texas Farm,” and it covers the years 1896–1905 (Porter, Pale Horse, Pale Rider 93). A farmer and his family have trouble making ends meet until a stranger appears. The stranger not only whips the farm into shape but stays on as a worker for many years. When a bounty hunter appears and demands that the farmer turn the worker over to him, the farmer defends the worker with tragic results.

The first sentence immediately introduces three central characters: “The two grubby small boys with tow-colored hair who were digging among the ragweed in the front yard sat back on their heels and said, ‘Hello,’ when the tall bony man with straw-colored hair turned in at their gate” (PHPR 93). As is usual with Porter, even the smallest detail gives a wealth of information. That the boys are digging is a central point—they are real pests, always into things, and their curiosity and lack of self-control eventually set a key factor in the plot into play. The taciturn stranger will also set into motion the chain of events that results in the story’s shocking ending. We already get a sense that the farm is somewhat rundown, with ragweed allowed to thrive in the front yard. The stranger will change all that.

The two boys are Arthur and Herbert, sons of the dairy farmer Mr. Thompson and his sickly wife, Ellie. Mr. and Mrs. Thompson have different ideas as to discipline for the boys, with the result that the boys are basically uncontrolled. Mrs. Thompson is particularly indulgent, but at the same time she feels guilty for being so. She makes excuses for the boys and often takes the path of least resistance when faced with a conflict between them and her husband. For instance, she says the fastest possible dinnertime blessing, rather than enforcing the rule of waiting until the prayer is over to reach for the food.

Mrs. Thompson clasped her hands, bowed her head and said aloud hastily, “Lord, for all these and Thy other blessings we thank Thee in Jesus’ name, amen,” trying to finish before Herbert’s rusty little paw reached the nearest dish. Otherwise she would be duty-bound to send him away from the table, and growing children need their meals. Mr. Thompson and Arthur always waited, but Herbert, aged six, was too young to take training yet. (PHPR 108)

Of course six is not “too young to take training.” At the same time that she makes an excuse for

Herbert in her mind, she feels guilt about the situation. She knows that if she does not outpace him with the prayer, there will be consequences and she will have to be the one to enforce them. That she includes Mr. Thompson in her mental description of what happens seems to indicate that she is feeling guilty or responsible to someone besides him for her family's potential bad behavior—perhaps toward the God she is so hastily thanking. Her shame eventually finds as its object the mysterious stranger who has arrived in the first sentence.

Mr. Helton, the stranger, is a cryptic, silent Swede who seems stubborn and has the one passion of his treasured harmonicas. He becomes their hired hand. In actuality he is a very hard worker and turns the farm around fiscally, suggesting improvements and doing all sorts of chores that Mr. Thompson eschews as “women's work.” Mrs. Thompson has not wanted him there at first, jumping to the conclusion that he will be lazy or cause her trouble, but she soon recognizes that he has made her life easier. She feels even guiltier when the boys pester him or get on his nerves. In one alarming incident, she observes him shaking Arthur and concludes that the boys must have done something to deserve it. Although she is unnerved by his taking disciplinary action as his responsibility, she gives him the benefit of the doubt until she hears the full story. (This is a new development. Throughout the story people jump to conclusions about character that sometimes prove to be false and sometimes prove to be true. Mr. Thompson will have a “gut instinct” about another stranger at the end of the story that will be correct.) It turns out that the boys had played with and ruined Mr. Helton's precious harmonicas. Mrs. Thompson, trying to make small talk when she first met him, had recognized this as a possibility and warned him to keep them up on a shelf, out of harm's way. She fully understands his anger and is unnerved only by the sudden violence and total silence of the scene. This is the only hint we get that Mr. Helton may have had a violent past.

The point of view in the story shifts back and forth from Mrs. Thompson to Mr. Thompson, and it is somewhat of a surprise when Mr. Thompson becomes the dominant voice. Nine years pass, and the boys grow up to be decent young men (one gets the impression that this happens through Mr. Helton's influence and no thanks to their parents' lenience). Then one day, another stranger, Mr. Homer T. Hatch, appears, nosing around for information about the Swede. Mr. Thompson is immediately suspicious of him, and they have a long conversation before Mr. Hatch gets to the point. He is trying to collect a bounty for Mr. Helton, who he claims “jus' went loony one day in the hayfield and shoved a pitchfork right square through his brother” (PHPR 144). It turns out that the brother had also borrowed and lost a sacred harmonica. Mr. Thompson is immediately on his guard and wants to defend Mr. Helton, and events quickly escalate—we see some real action for the first time in the slow-paced farm life. Mr. Helton appears; Mr. Hatch charges at him; Mr. Thompson, thinking the Swede has been fatally wounded, crashes an ax down on Mr. Hatch's head, killing him. The tragedy is that Mr. Helton has not been murdered. The posse sent for him kills him as they try to take him into custody. The remainder of the story deals with Mr. and Mrs. Thompson's psychological responses to this jarring event. Although Mr. Thompson has been acquitted with a self-defense plea, he experiences terrific guilt and feels the need to make the rounds to the neighbors, telling his side of the story. It is clear that most of them either do not believe him or just do not care. Mrs. Thompson is required to tell the white lie that “she saw and heard it all” (PHPR 165)—when, in reality, she had walked around the corner a split second after the incident.

Mr. Thompson's shocking suicide at the end of the story is the culmination of a confusing series of events. As with much of Porter's writing, the beauty of this story lies in its descriptive detail and psychological portraiture. Recognizing the shift in point of view is essential to a full understanding of the story's meaning: Different participants perceive different versions of an event, and in the retelling, either to oneself or to others, an event and its motivations change even further. Reality is a slippery concept, and if one loses grasp of one's own version of it, all hell is liable to break loose. The story concerns themes of guilt and innocence, knowing the difference between right and wrong, and doing something about that difference.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Trace the subtle shifts in point of view. Whose story is this, ultimately? How do you know?
2. People often seem to miss Mr. Thompson's meanings and intentions. Find at least three of these passages and analyze them, explaining why people respond to him as they do. Explain the ending, particularly the last line. How does it relate to Mr. Thompson's personality?
3. Trace Mrs. Thompson's difficulty seeing—both literally and figuratively. How does it relate to the end of the story?
4. How does the title relate to the story? Clearly it is a reference to Mr. Helton's harmonica tune, but explain what that song means to the story itself.
5. Compare and contrast this work with Flannery O'Connor's story "The Displaced Person." How do the works compare in plot, theme, characterization, and setting?

"Pale Horse, Pale Rider" (1938)

"Pale Horse, Pale Rider," which first appeared in Southern Review in 1938 and is the final novella in the collection Pale Horse, Pale Rider, is based on a real incident in Porter's life. She contracted influenza in the epidemic of 1918 and almost died. Both the boy and the dreams depicted in the story were real, but even her own accounts vary as to how well she knew him and whether she was in love or not. (This is one of the Miranda stories in which the recurring character stands for Porter herself.)

The plot is uncomplicated. Miranda, who works as a newspaper reporter in Denver, has contracted the flu close to the end of World War I. She has fallen in love with Adam, a young soldier who is to be shipped out within a matter of days and whom she has only just met. He takes care of her, disappears when the hospital workers arrive to take her to the hospital, and then, she later learns, dies of the flu himself. The story is considered to be one of Porter's best, not because of the plot, but because of the skill with which she explores Miranda's consciousness. The story begins with a hallucinatory dream about a mysterious rider trying to persuade her to go with him—an obvious symbol of death. Miranda wakes from the dream, but it is not until later that we realize the waking episodes of the story may be occurring "out of order" in Miranda's fevered reconstruction of events. The dream sequences throughout point to Miranda's encounter with death.

In addition to describing her own near-death experience, the story explores Miranda's reaction to the tragic irony of Adam's death. She loses him twice, and the first time she has trouble in her fevered state understanding what has happened. He has stepped out to fetch her some ice cream when the orderlies arrive for her. They will not wait for him, and at the hospital she keeps asking for him, only to be told that he has been by to see her and left a note, a note that explains that the doctors are not allowing him to visit her. At this first "loss," Miranda goes back into the daze of her fever while she observes the shadows of two figures behind a screen making a bed. This Platonic shadowy dream world seems to be "an entrancing and leisurely spectacle" (Porter, Pale Horse, Pale Rider 248), in which she sees figures bowing and curtsying to one another, but once the screen is removed, she blithely observes that there is a dead man on the bed. This episode leads into a complicated stream-of-consciousness dream involving the doctor and the battlefield.

After a brief waking episode, the continuation of her dream involves "granite walls, whirlpools, stars" (PHPR 252), concrete images that dissolve into a "fiery motionless particle," which in turn flattens into a rainbow that Miranda looks through. Porter said in an interview that when she almost died in 1918, she "felt a strange state of—what is it the Greeks called it?—euphoria" (quoted in Hendrick and Hendrick 59); Miranda's extended vision of some sort of afterlife is an attempt to represent this state. That her long-dead acquaintances “cast no shadows” and have been transfigured into “pure identities” suggests that Miranda has arrived in Plato’s world of Forms. However, she is jangled back into waking life by the din of celebration of the Armistice.

A major irony occurs when Miranda, now somewhat recovered, gets around to reading her letters. She finds one reporting that Adam has died of the flu—her second loss of him. She has struggled back to life, resisting the temptation to go into the light; when she returns, the Armistice promises a happy ending for the two of them, since he will not be shipped out after all, and yet he has died. Her zombielike reaction to the news and her going about mundane tasks to resume regular life underscore the futility of love and being. In the last paragraph the dead images of life after her illness and after the war—“dazed silence,” “empty streets,” “dead cold light of tomorrow” (PHPR 264)—indicate her spiritual death, even as her body has recovered.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Explain the title of this story. How does it relate to the first episode?
2. Trace Miranda’s dreams/hallucinations. Do you see any recurring themes? Examine closely Miranda’s long internal monologues about death near the end of the story. What conclusions can you draw from her images?
3. Make a timeline of the events of the story to sort out flashbacks and stream of consciousness from present action. When does her waking up/getting ready occur?
4. How does the juxtaposition of her waking up and the celebration of the Armistice work in the story? Explain the line: “Adam, she said, now you need not die again, but still I wish you were here; I wish you had come back, what do you think I came back for, Adam, to be deceived like this?”
5. Compare and contrast this work with Porter’s story “The Jilting of Granny Weatherall.” How are the works similar and/or different in setting, theme, characterization, and narrative technique?

Ship of Fools (1962)

Porter’s only novel, Ship of Fools, was published in 1962. It is a massive work, defying summary. (There are so many characters to keep track of that she provides a list of them in the front.) Basically, a diverse group of people is traveling on a ship from Mexico to Germany on the eve of World War II, in August and September 1931. Porter draws the reader in, with a big crowd milling about before they embark. Through detailed description of each one’s appearance we get to know them one by one and then in combinations of two and three as their story lines become entangled. There are literally dozens of characters, at least 10 of whom can be considered major figures. In fact, the point of view shifts in such a fluid way that it is difficult to tell who is a protagonist, even at any given moment. The characters are from Germany, Switzerland, Spain, Cuba, Mexico, Sweden, and America, not counting almost 900 Spaniards in steerage who are being deported from Cuba. So, in addition to class differences between upper and lower decks, there are distinctions in nationality among the passengers—distinctions that are especially important in light of the ominous political developments in Germany in the early 1930s. The issue of anti-Semitism, for example, figures in more than one of the subplots.

Of course, in a crowd this big, there are also love issues—problems with marriages, love triangles, unrequited crushes, pimps and whores, innocent flirtations, full-blown affairs, and lechery. In addition to romantic relationships, there are simple cabinmate squabbles to keep track of. For the most part, those sharing cabins have been assigned their roommates randomly, creating interesting problems and tensions. The situation in the first-class dining room is a little more structured—such matters as who is privileged to dine at the captain’s table and who is shunned are based on class as well as on the elite’s changing perceptions of individual values. For instance, one character is “banished” from the captain’s table when it is discovered that his wife is Jewish.

A central episode of the book points to the allegorical nature of the work as a whole. An artistic woodcarver in steerage jumps after a spoiled first-

7. During a panel discussion on southern fiction held at Wesleyan College in 1960, Porter stated, "Symbolism happens of its own self and it comes out of something so deep in your own consciousness and your own experience that I don't think that most writers are at all conscious of their use of symbols. . . . I have a great deal of religious symbolism in my stories because I have a very deep sense of religion and also I have a religious training" (quoted in Givner 54). Find and explain a religious motif or theme in one of Porter's works. Do you think it was conscious? Why or why not?
8. Porter is often compared with Eudora Welty, particularly since they are both southern women writers who favor the short story as a genre. Compare and contrast one or more of Porter's and Welty's characters, themes, or techniques. How do these two authors differ?
9. Porter's stories, especially the Miranda Gay works, also have much in common with the stories of the New Zealand author Katherine Mansfield. Read Mansfield's "The Garden Party" and discuss the idea that both Porter and Mansfield use young female protagonists who stand for them. Would you know that fact without being told? Why or why not?
10. In a 1965 interview with Roy Newquist, Porter discussed the unfavorable reception of Ship of Fools. She states, "I don't blame them if they don't like Ship of Fools. But isn't it odd that they can read Burroughs' Naked Lunch, they can read Hawkes' scene in The Lime Twig, about that man in the dark cellar beating a woman to death with a sandbag . . . but they hate Ship of Fools. Nobody's going to identify with that man in the cellar—that's all sexual daydreaming. They know it doesn't apply to them. However, Ship of Fools is about live people, and if they don't take care, they're going to see themselves" (Givner 112). In your opinion, has Ship of Fools worn well? Does it seem tame? Dated? Sensationalistic? Real? Support your assertions with specific examples from the text. Address whether her perception that Ship of Fools is unpopular because it hits too close to home emotionally is still valid.

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- DeMouy, Jane Krause. Katherine Anne Porter's Women: The Eye of Her Fiction. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1983.
- Givner, Joan, ed. Katherine Anne Porter: Conversations. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1987.
- Hendrick, Willene, and George Hendrick. Katherine Anne Porter. Edited by Kenneth E. Eble. Rev. ed. Twayne's United States Authors Series 90. Boston: Twayne [G. K. Hall], 1988.
- Katherine Anne Porter Society. Available online. URL: <http://www.lib.umd.edu/Guests/KAP>. Accessed April 8, 2009.
- Lopez, Enrique Hank. Conversations with Katherine Anne Porter: Refugee from Indian Creek. Boston: Little, Brown, 1981.
- Porter, Katherine Anne. The Collected Stories of Katherine Anne Porter. New York: Harcourt Brace & World, 1965.
- . Flowering Judas and Other Stories. New York: Modern Library [Random House], 1935.
- . The Leaning Tower and Other Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1944.
- . Pale Horse, Pale Rider: Three Short Novels. New York: Modern Library [Random House], 1939.
- . Ship of Fools. Boston: Little, Brown, 1962.
- Stout, Janis P. Katherine Anne Porter: A Sense of the Times. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.
- Unrue, Darlene Harbour. Katherine Anne Porter: The Life of an Artist. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2005.
- , ed. Critical Essays on Katherine Anne Porter. Critical Essays on American Literature, edited by James Nagel. New York: G. K. Hall [Simon & Schuster/Macmillan], 1997.
- Warren, Robert Penn, ed. Katherine Anne Porter: A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by Maynard Mack. Twentieth Century Views. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1979.

Catherine E. Howard

EZRA POUND (1885–1972)

Let it stand that from 1912 onward for a decade or more I was instrumental in forcing into print, and secondarily in commenting on, certain work now recognized as valid by all competent readers.

(Make It New)

Ezra Pound's importance in the history of both American and even British and Irish literature is hard to overestimate. A gifted if sometimes eccentric poet, he was also a revolutionary taste-maker: He helped found, formulate, and propagate modernism, not just in literature but in all the arts. A generous friend, discerning critic, and tireless champion of other artists (at least the ones whose work he approved), he was often the whirling center of new and radical approaches to writing and thinking. William Butler Yeats, though older and more experienced than Pound, valued the advice and example of his new young American friend, while T. S. ELIOT, WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS, H. D. (Hilda Doolittle), and a host of other eventually important authors were strongly influenced by Pound's ideas, personality, and personal advocacy. Pound's increasingly extreme economic and political views—which eventually led him to embrace Mussolini, fascism, and anti-Semitism—posed a dilemma for his many admirers, especially after he was indicted for treason after World War II and then committed to a hospital for the insane. Yet even readers who could not stomach Pound's politics often found his poetry undeniably important, both in its own right and in the influential example it set for so many other writers.

In his superbly detailed “Chronology” Richard Sieburth outlines the main facts of the poet's life. Ezra Loomis Pound was born on October 30, 1885, in Hailey, Idaho, the son of Homer Pound and Isabel Weston Pound. Pound's father was a government official, whose own father had been a successful Wisconsin businessman and flamboyant congressman, and when the Pounds moved east in 1887, Ezra's father again eventually found work with the government—this time with the U.S. Mint in Philadelphia in 1889. Ezra grew up in the Philadelphia suburb of Wyncote, where he attended local schools, entered a nearby military academy, and eventually enrolled at the University of Pennsylvania at age 15. Already well read, highly opinionated, and unusual in both dress and appearance (with his wild reddish hair), he soon also showed the talent for winning friends (and annoying bystanders) that would be so significant to his later career. While still in Philadelphia he befriended both Hilda Doolittle (whom he would later rechristen H. D. when he was championing her poetry) and William Carlos Williams, both of whom would eventually have significant literary careers of their own—thanks in part to Pound's enthusiastic support. After transferring to Hamilton College in Clinton, New York, in 1903, Pound maintained his infatuation with literature of all sorts, from the most modern to the most ancient, while also cultivating his interest in foreign languages, including Greek, Latin, Anglo-Saxon, Italian, Spanish, and French. Indeed, this interest was so strong that in 1906 he received his master's degree (from the University of Pennsylvania) in Romance languages and immediately set off for Europe for further academic research.

Pound, however, was never a conventional academic. Although he was hired in 1907 as a professor of Romance languages at Wabash College in Crawfordsville, Indiana, he was dismissed the next year for allowing a destitute actress to stay in his rooms overnight—scandalizing his landladies and the college. Rejected in 1908 by one young woman (Mary Moore) when he asked for her hand, and rejected as well by Hilda Doolittle's father as an unsuitable potential son-in-law, Pound, with the support of his father, made the momentous decision that year to set his sights on Europe, and in a sense he never looked back. After spending time in Venice (where he self-published his significant early collection of poems titled A Lume Spento), Pound soon moved to London, quickly making friends with a wide spectrum of other writers. There he published his important collection Personae in 1909 and followed it immediately with more poems in Exultations (1909) and The Spirit of Romance (1910). By this time Pound had befriended (or been befriended by) such notables as Ford Madox Hueffer (the novelist and editor better known as Ford Madox Ford); T. E. Hulme (the literary theorist); Wyndham Lewis (the novelist and literary radical); D. H. Lawrence (the novelist and poet); and W. B. Yeats (the great Irish writer), to mention just a few. Pound also found, in 1910, support from a wealthy patroness who guaranteed him a substantial yearly income (at least for the time being), and for the next few years his life was a whirlwind of travel, translations, social interactions, and original literary productiveness. His collection titled Canzoni appeared in 1911; his translations of The Sonnets and Ballets of Guido Cavalcanti were published in 1912; and Ripostes, his collection of mostly original works, was also issued in 1912. During the latter year Pound learned, however, that his publisher was bankrupt and that his patroness had killed herself, but the year proved auspicious in various other respects, particularly through his association with the newly founded Poetry magazine, edited in Chicago by Harriet Monroe—a magazine for which Pound soon became foreign correspondent. This position gave him a prominent soapbox from which to expound his own tastes and enthusiasms, and he quickly took advantage of the opportunity by announcing the existence of a new school of poets, the “imagists,” consisting mainly of H. D. (who was now living in London); her new husband, Richard Aldington; Pound himself; and a few others.

The impact of imagism (which favored brevity, directness, simplicity, and crisp images) was immediate and profound. Pound himself, however, would soon abandon the group, partly because he distrusted the influence of one of its newest members (Amy Lowell) and partly because of his interest in a new approach to writing (“vorticism”) that emphasized dynamic energy as opposed to the more static approach of the imagists. In the meantime, he was throwing himself, with his characteristic energy, into all sorts of literary and artistic projects, including helping to promote the careers of ROBERT FROST and James Joyce, championing the sculpture of Henri Gaudier-Brzeska and Jacob Epstein, serving as an editor of the Egoist, contributing to such other magazines as the Smart Set and the New Age, promoting vorticism, assisting T. S. Eliot in being published, and developing an interest in Chinese poetry and Japanese drama. In April 1914 he also found time to marry Dorothy Shakespeare, but by late summer 1914 World War I had broken out—a conflict that unleashed profound destruction. Gaudier-Brzeska, for instance, was soon killed in action, an event that inspired Pound to publish Gaudier-Brzeska: A Memoir in 1916. Nevertheless, despite the war, Pound's own literary productivity continued to be prodigious; his collection of poems titled Cathay had been published in spring 1915, followed by an expurgated edition of his collection titled Lustra in 1916 and by Certain Noble Plays of Japan that same year. In 1917 a fuller version of the Japanese plays was published, followed also by a fuller version of Lustra. Meanwhile, Pound continued to be a vigorous advocate and midwife for other now-famous-but-then-obscure writers, especially Eliot and Joyce. Yet the destructiveness of the war continued to have personal impact: For instance, the battlefield death of T. E. Hulme, whose literary ideas had been such an important influence on Pound's own thinking, occurred in 1917. Pound's growing interest in offbeat economic ideas (an interest that would eventually lead him to become an apologist for fascism and would fundamentally ruin his life) can be attributed, in part, to his disgust with the political and economic causes and results of World War I.

In the decade following the end of the war (which concluded in late 1918), Pound was as vigorous as ever as an author, promoter, and innovator. Umbra: The Early Poems of Ezra Pound, appeared in 1920, as did Hugh Selwyn Mauberley, a work in which he signaled his growing disenchantment with London. He now began to spend more time in France (especially Paris), becoming acquainted with many eventually notable French and American writers (including GERTRUDE STEIN and E. E. CUMMINGS), helping to promote the careers of the Romanian sculptor Constantin Brancusi and the American poet MARIANNE MOORE, and befriending the young ERNEST HEMINGWAY. His own Poems 1918–21 appeared in the latter year, but perhaps his most significant activity at this time involved his editing, in early 1922, of Eliot's revolutionary poem The Waste Land, which Pound helped transform into a highly influential masterpiece. By this time Pound himself had also begun working on a series of poetic "Cantos"—a project that would last for the rest of his life. In 1925 A Draft of XVI Cantos was published, and by that time Pound had also begun to spend most of his time in Italy, not only with his wife, Dorothy, but also with his mistress, Olga Rudge, who bore him a daughter that year. Not to be outdone, Dorothy bore him a son in 1926, but Pound (predictably) seems to have been less interested in his flesh-and-blood children than in his literary and artistic offspring, which included an opera staged in 1926 and a poetic collection titled Personae published that same year. By 1927 he had begun editing his own journal, the Exile, in which he printed such significant writers as Yeats, William Carlos Williams, and Louis Zukofsky. In 1928 A Draft of the Cantos 17–27 as well as Pound's Selected Poems were published, followed in 1930 by A Draft of XXX Cantos and by Imaginary Letters. His advice on How to Read was published as a book in 1931, but by this time his writings had also become increasingly preoccupied with politics and economics, often exhibiting a fascist and anti-Semitic tone. His ABC of Economics appeared in 1933, followed in 1934 by an ABC of Reading and by Make It New (both works of literary commentary) as well as by Eleven New Cantos XXXI–XLI. The increasingly political preoccupations of his poetry can be seen in the latter work, and they appear as well in Alfred Venison's Poems and in the prose work Jefferson and/or Mussolini, both published in 1935 during the depths of the Great Depression, the worldwide economic downturn that made the 1930s so bleak.

By this time Pound was an open supporter of fascism—a fact reflected in The Fifth Decad of Cantos, XLII–LI, which was published in 1937 (the same year as his Polite Essays). His important prose work titled Guide to Kulchur appeared in 1938, and during a brief return to the United States in 1939 he met with various politicians in an effort to promote peace (at least according to his own definition)—doing so at a time when most people were expecting a new world war. His fascist politics created unease among his friends and controversy with others, and when Cantos LII–LXX appeared in 1940, certain anti-Semitic lines were blacked out. By late 1939 the long-dreaded war had finally begun, and by spring 1940 Fascist Italy was in the thick of it, allied with Nazi Germany. Pound now made the fateful decision to begin broadcasting for Radio Rome—eventually delivering well over 100 Fascist and anti-Jewish diatribes, although he continued to think of himself as a highly patriotic American with the best interests of his country at heart. This was true even after the United States entered the war late in 1941. His broadcasts, however, were now being transcribed by the U.S. government, and in mid-1943 he was indicted for treason. Nevertheless, he continued to speak over the air, and in 1944 the now-retreating Fascist government even managed to publish six volumes of his Italian writings. By spring 1945, though, everything was lost: Mussolini was dead, the Germans had surrendered, and Pound was imprisoned by American forces in Pisa in a literal cage—an experience that led to mental collapse in a man whose sanity had been in doubt for some time. Nevertheless, he was able to compose his Pisan Cantos (often considered among his greatest works). In fall 1945 he was in Washington, D.C., awaiting trial as a traitor. By the end of that year, however, he was diagnosed as suffering from paranoia and was declared mentally unfit to stand trial. Now began his long confinement in Washington's St. Elizabeths Hospital for the criminally insane.

During his long years of confinement, Pound was (as usual) a highly paradoxical figure. On the one hand, he was a political embarrassment; on the other hand, many considered him one of the greatest literary figures of the 20th century, and he was visited in St. Elizabeths by many of the most notable writers of the day as well as by many younger writers who worshipped his work. His writings continued to appear in print—including The Pisan Cantos, published in 1948. When this book was awarded the first annual Bollingen Prize of $10,000 (given in the name of the Library of Congress), all hell predictably broke loose. The highly distinguished judges declared that poetic merit alone should determine the awarding of the prize, but many citizens obviously disagreed—and disagreed vociferously. The award did stand, but the Library of Congress was stripped of its authority to offer similar prizes in the future. Meanwhile, throughout the 1950s Pound continued to produce translations and original work, the most important of which were published in 1955 as the Rock-Drill cantos. During this period numerous important writers called for Pound's release from imprisonment, and eventually, in 1958, the treason charges were dropped on the grounds that Pound would never be mentally fit to defend himself. Returning to Italy (where he at first seemed an unrepentant Fascist), he began to lapse into depression. Nevertheless, the Thrones cantos (96–109) were published in 1959, and although his mental and physical health was unsteady throughout the 1960s, he was more and more recognized and honored for his early work, including both his own writings and his efforts on behalf of others. Increasingly dejected and increasingly doubtful about his value as a writer or political thinker, he nevertheless remained an intriguing and controversial figure. Drafts and Fragments of Cantos CX–CXVII appeared in 1969, but when the American Academy of Arts and Letters proposed to award Pound a major prize in 1972, the plan was vetoed by its executive council. When he died on November 1 of that year, he himself was far less sure of the value of his work than were his far-flung and numerous admirers, who considered him one of the major authors of his era.

“Portrait d'une Femme” (1912)

The poem describes a presumably middle-aged and apparently unmarried woman who has lived in London for at least 20 years; during that time she has met and conversed with many intelligent people, who have sought out her company, especially when no better company was available. Her long history of interactions with interesting persons has thus made her, derivatively, interesting herself; she is like the Sargasso Sea, a calm area of the Atlantic Ocean where seaweed is abundant and where odd and unusual items that have been tossed from ships, lost from them, or swept up from wrecks can be collected, examined, and appreciated. The woman has no really independent identity, yet she is fascinating nonetheless because of her long and rich exposure to others.

In its title as well as in its phrasing and manner, the poem is reminiscent of the fiction of the novelist Henry James—a writer whom Pound greatly admired and who was famous for his subtle, understated, but probing depictions of people of leisure. Certainly the woman depicted here seems Jamesian in her interests, habits, and lifestyle; she is apparently under no great pressure to earn a living by strenuous work, and so she has been able to spend most of her days merely observing, listening to, and remembering all the interesting people with whom she has had contact. It is not an accident that it is her “mind” that the speaker values (l. 1), and by mind he seems mainly to mean her memory, her recollections: She is less important for any of her own thoughts, insights, or reflections than as a repository of information about others. There is some irony, then, in the poem's title, since the subject of the portrait is not so much intriguing in her own right as a reflection of others. Ironically by being so open to the lives of others, she has not lived much of an independent life herself; she has not developed much of an autonomous existence or separate identity (there is “Nothing that’s quite [her] own” [l. 29]); like the Sargasso Sea itself, she is fascinating but somewhat stagnant. On the other hand, she has avoided the worse fate common to the lives of many women of her era; she has not been the mere appendage, through marriage, of “One dull man, dulling and uxorious, / One average mind—with one less thought each year” (ll. 9–10). In short (and in typically Jamesian fashion), her life has been ambiguous and complex; in some ways she has profited (and been a source of profit to others); in some ways she has lost. As a good portrait does, Pound’s poem presents a subtle mixture of light and dark shades, making us admire this woman even as we somewhat pity her.

With its blank verse, mainly iambic meter, clear phrasing, and occasional touches of rhyme, this fairly traditional poem is entirely in keeping with its subject; it is restrained, cultured, and sophisticated. The speaker acts as a representative of (and spokesman for) the community of London’s intelligentsia; his tone is by turns genuinely appreciative and slightly ironic or biting, as when he says, “Great minds have sought you—lacking someone else” (l. 6). The blank verse, leisurely rhythms, and long lines allow Pound to achieve a conversational cadence that is entirely in keeping with the subject and setting of the poem; it is as if we are overhearing the actual spoken words (or at least the actual thoughts) of a real member of this sophisticated milieu. In some ways, the poem is reminiscent of the blank-verse monologues of Robert Browning; in other ways (such as in the use of the extended metaphor comparing the woman at great length to the Sargasso Sea), the poem recalls the use of conceits (or highly detailed comparisons) common in the poetry of such metaphysical writers as John Donne. As is true so often in so many of his early poems, Pound here is deliberately adopting a persona; he is taking on an identity independent of his own; he is trying out a distinct and distinctive style, manner, and point of view, and part of the effectiveness of the poem derives not only from his vivid portrait of the lady but also from the convincing self-portrait he offers of the speaker. The poem is even richer than a painting would have been, because every word used to characterize the woman also characterizes the speaker himself.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read T. S. Eliot’s poem “Portrait of a Lady,” and then read the poem of the same title by William Carlos Williams. Discuss the similarities and differences of the three poems in terms of such matters as style, diction, setting, point of view, and theme. Which of the three poems appeals to you most? Be careful to explain why, by pointing to particular details of each work.
2. Compare and contrast this work with EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON’s poem “Eros Turannos.” In particular, discuss such matters as a woman’s isolation, the speaker as spokesman for the community, the use of sea imagery, and the implied dangers of marriage. Discuss the relevance of social class in both poems, and discuss the forms (including line lengths and degree of rhyme) each poet chooses.
3. How does this poem characterize the speaker? What does it reveal about the speaker’s values, ideals, attitudes, and personality? Is it a safe assumption that the speaker is a male? What can we assume about the speaker’s social class and habits of mind?

“A Virginal” (1912)

In this sonnet the unidentified speaker addresses an unidentified interlocutor, urging that person to leave the speaker (who seems to be male) alone so that the speaker can enjoy his memories of a very recent encounter with a beautiful woman. Merely being in her presence (he feels) has brightened his life, and he does not want that brightness to diminish by contact with anything less attractive.

The title of the poem refers to an archaic musical instrument—“a small rectangular harpsichord . . . popular in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries”

(Froula 41). The title seems appropriate in several ways: first, because the poem itself is a small work, a kind of miniature finger exercise in which Pound (as was his habit) impersonates a speaker from an earlier era; second, because in its sonnet form and archaic diction (such as “hath” and “aye” [ll. 3, 11]) the poem harks back to a previous historical period and an ancient poetic style; and third, because the title suggests the presumably virginal woman herself, so that the poem becomes a song about a woman of virginal purity. The poem exemplifies Pound's exploration by imitation of whole swaths of literary history; here he adopts the style, tone, diction, mentality, and mannerisms (as well as one of the favorite forms) of a Renaissance poet. His sonnet rhymes abba / cddc / efg / efg—a variation on the standard Petrarchan form (in which the first eight lines would normally rhyme as follows: abba / abba). As in most Petrarchan sonnets, there is an emphatic division between the octave (the first eight lines) and the sestet (the last six); the transition is signaled in Pound's poem by the repetition of “No, no!” at the beginnings of lines 1 and 9. In addition, the imagery of seasons and plant life in the last six lines helps set off that section of the poem from the rest of the work. The imagery of the first eight lines (especially the references to “sheath[s]” and “sheath[ing]”; [ll. 2, 8]) seems less clear than the imagery of the sestet, sometimes making the meaning of the octave difficult to follow. On the whole, however, the poem shows Pound as a skillful technician, particularly in his use of meter. In many lines (such as ll. 2, 5, 7–8, and 14) he takes full and obvious advantage of iambic rhythm (in which an unaccented syllable precedes an accented one); this solid iambic base allows him to play expert variations, as in the use of spondees (two heavily accented syllables) at the start of lines 1 and 9, or in his use of trochaic substitutions (where an accented syllable precedes an accented one, as at the beginning of line 4). Pound, in other words, plays with his words much as a master performer might manipulate a virginal's keys, and indeed one of the most technically daring aspects of the sonnet is the unusual music that ends each line. Every single line concludes (appropriately enough, in view of the subject of the poem) with a feminine rhyme—that is, with a rhyme in which the final syllable of each rhymed word is unstressed. The decision to use so many feminine rhymes in one poem was typical of Pound's poetic daring; the proliferation of such rhymes makes the poem sound somewhat mannered and old-fashioned—which was, of course, precisely the effect he was seeking.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Pound's use of the sonnet form in this work with its use in various poems by Claude McKay (such as “The Lynching,” “If We Must Die,” “Outcast,” and many others). Discuss the poems in terms of theme, tone, style, diction, and purpose. How is McKay's choice of the sonnet form both ironic and appropriate in view of the history of sonnet writing in English? How does Pound's sonnet represent only one aspect of that history (the aspect that focuses on romantic love)?
2. Discuss the treatment of love in this poem and in Pound's “The River-Merchant's Wife: A Letter.” In particular, pay attention to such matters as point of view, the relationship between speaker and addressee, the use of natural imagery, and the role of sexual contact or relations. Do you prefer one poem to the other? If so, explain why in specific detail.
3. What is the meaning of “spoil my sheath” (l. 2)? Why do you think Pound used that phrase rather than something more clear and simple? Why does he use the verb hath rather than has? Aside from the title of the poem, what other indications are there that the speaker is from an earlier time? How are the attitudes he expresses, as well as the language he uses, typical of an earlier era? Whom do you think he is addressing?

“In a Station of the Metro” (1913, 1916)

In this extremely brief but highly influential poem, the speaker compares the appearance of random faces in a packed subway station in Paris to the appearance of flower petals against a backdrop of the dark wet bark of a tree.

This poem is one of the most famous of all the texts associated with imagism—the phrase invented by Pound to describe the kind of precise, crisp, clear, and highly visual poetry he and several of his friends were trying to achieve in the years preceding and following World War I. The brevity of the poem contributes to its impact: The work records and then re-creates a vivid mental impression, and then it ends. If the poem were longer, it would be less effective, since elaboration would ruin the effect of transience—of beauty suddenly glimpsed and then just as suddenly gone. It is both ironic and appropriate that the poem is set at a subway “station,” since that word implies a place of stasis, a place where movement ceases. The irony of this setting is that the “metro” itself is a place whose whole purpose is devoted to movement. The appropriateness of the setting, however, is that the poem itself freezes a moment in time. It provides a kind of impressionistic snapshot of an instant glance that is now preserved forever. Yet the setting also seems ironic because we do not normally think of a busy, noisy, crowded urban transportation hub as a place where beauty is likely to present itself. That, of course, is part of Pound’s point: Beauty can be found anywhere if an observer is alert enough to see it.

The poem is full of implied opposites. These include not only the station (associated with stasis) and the metro (associated with movement) but also the urban, man-made setting of the metro and the rural, natural language of petals and trees. Such oppositions also include the juxtaposition of individual faces and the impersonal “crowd,” as well as the juxtaposition of the soft, light (or colorful) petals and the hard, dark wood. Simple, plain, monosyllabic Anglo-Saxon words are juxtaposed with the Latinate term apparition, while the first line depicts the fact the speaker wants to convey, even as the second line provides the metaphor that communicates his response to that fact. However, just as the poem is complexly and subtly structured, so its individual words are precisely chosen. The term apparition, for instance, not only means “appearance” but also connotes a startling or unexpected appearance, just as it likewise suggests the appearance of ghostly or supernatural beings, thus creating an impression of the people briefly glimpsed in the subway as transient phantoms. Meanwhile, the word these creates a sense of immediacy; it makes readers feel almost present at the act of seeing, as if we are almost cowitnesses rather than a distant audience to whom the vision is later recalled. The vowel of the word crowd is echoed later in the word bough, so that the poem achieves a kind of rhyme without really rhyming. In all these ways, then, the poem is a skillful, nuanced work of art. Its simplicity is deceptive; it is a finely carved miniature whose subtleties become ever more apparent the more closely it is examined.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with William Carlos Williams’s poem “The Red Wheelbarrow” and/or “This Is Just a Say.” How are the poems similar in technique, diction, purpose, and effect? Are there any significant differences, such as in structure or point of view?
2. How is this work similar to and/or different from WALLACE STEVENS’s poem “Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird”? What similarities are there in diction, structure, and tone, and how are the works different in purpose and final effect?
3. Scan the meter of this poem: Which syllables are accented, and which are not? What patterns do you detect? How does the first line differ metrically from the second? Why does Pound contrast the meters of the two lines so strikingly? What effects does he thereby achieve?

“A Pact” (1913, 1916)

The speaker (presumably Pound himself) offers a “pact” (or “truce” in the poem’s first version) to Walt Whitman, the great innovative American poet of the 19th century. For a long time the speaker has detested Whitman as one might detest a stubborn father, but now the speaker feels mature enough to appreciate Whitman’s genuine contributions to American poetry without feeling any impulse to imitate them slavishly. He can assimilate and appropriate Whitman’s innovations while also trying to improve upon them and advance beyond them.

This poem speaks in the direct, plain, brusque, and colloquial manner that Pound often favored both in his poetry and in his prose. Significantly enough, the first word is I, and this emphasis on the self is true of four of the poem's nine lines. Despite his well-known generosity, Pound was usually at the very center of his own mental universe, and so it is not surprising that the poem focuses at least as much on him as on Whitman. Pound saw Whitman as a poet who, as did Pound himself, sought something new, daring, and different in the history of his country's often conventional literature. He recognized that Whitman had been a great revolutionary and innovator, and he recognized that many of Whitman's innovations had pointed in his own direction—that is, in the direction of plain speech, freedom from ossified tradition in form and phrasing, and liberty in breadth of subject matter. By the time Pound was writing, however, Whitman had himself become a part of the acknowledged literary tradition in America. Pound, then, found himself in the paradoxical position of having to admit that Whitman had once been a revolutionary, even as he recognized that Whitman's influence could now seem suffocating. In this poem Pound makes his peace with his great predecessor: He concedes that Whitman has done important work because he “broke the new wood” (i.e., cleared the forest for habitation), but this activity, however essential, was also somewhat crude, requiring more brawn than any deep intelligence. In Pound's view, however, “Now is the time for carving” (l. 7): In other words, the time has arrived for more subtle, artful, skillful writing than Whitman himself produced. It is a measure of Pound's maturity and self-confidence that he no longer feels threatened by Whitman. He thus offers Whitman a “pact”—a word that in its etymology (or history of development) connotes not only an agreement but also a fixing, a fastening, a process of making something solid, and a process of creating peace (from the Latin word pax).

Fittingly, Pound addresses his great predecessor in precisely the kind of abrupt, straightforward language that Whitman himself favored and could appreciate. He uses “unpoetical” language (such as “pig-headed” [l. 4])—undignified language of the sort that Whitman himself had helped make acceptable. With his typical self-confidence, Pound addresses Whitman man to man, as an equal. The line lengths of the poem are unpredictable, and the poem lacks rhyme—traits that Whitman himself could appreciate. Pound, as had Whitman, speaks here as a literary democrat, and he pays tribute to Whitman not only in what he says but also in his very manner of saying it. Significantly, a poem that began with the word I ends with the word us, while the word commerce implies a freely chosen exchange of things of value in which each party profits.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How is Pound's poem relevant to the ideas expressed in T. S. Eliot's essay “Tradition and the Individual Talent,” in which Eliot discusses the relations between modern poets and their predecessors? How, in their own creative writings, did Pound and Eliot try to assimilate the work of earlier writers, especially through such techniques as allusion and citation?
2. Compare and contrast Pound's poem with Mark Twain's famous essay “Fenimore Cooper's Literary Offenses.” How are the poem and the essay similar in basic intent, and how do they differ in approach, style, and tone?
3. Discuss the use of pronouns in this poem, especially the very first and the very last. What kind of progression is there in the use of such words? How, in the use of line lengths and in the overall brevity of the poem, does Pound still assert his independence from the kind of writing we typically associate with Whitman? What does this poem imply about Pound's view of poetic tradition and of the relationship of newer poets to their predecessors?

“The Rest” (1913, 1916)

The speaker of this poem (presumably Pound himself) addresses the fellow artists he has left behind in his own country (presumably America); he speaks from his present perspective as an expatriate or exile. He expresses pity for them because of the obstacles, discouragements, and oppressions they face, even as he praises their integrity and intelligence. He ends the poem by offering himself as an example of an artist who has persisted despite discouragements and who has achieved.

In his typically excited, prophetic, and even somewhat melodramatic fashion, Pound presents himself as a survivor who has managed to escape the oppressive conditions of an America hostile to true art. However, although he criticizes most of his fellow citizens, he still thinks of himself as a patriot: He still considers the United States his own country (l. 1), and he definitely sees its best artists as its best hope for national redemption and renewal. The poem is addressed primarily to those artists and is intended to give them heart, but it also addresses indirectly the country at large, implicitly pleading with Americans to value properly their most creative and insightful minds. The double exclamation of O at the beginning of the first two lines implies a multitude of emotions, including pity, anger, frustration, concern, and perhaps even a touch of fear for the ultimate fate of the brave remnant of artists; they are left behind in an America that seems alternately ignorant of, indifferent to, and even hostile toward them. These “enslaved” artists (surely a histrionic adjective) are “lost in the villages”: That final word suggests not the ideally comforting community of small towns but rather a sense of isolation and provincialism—the narrow confines of a limited and fundamentally parochial culture (ll. 2, 4). These artists are not simply isolated but are “mistrusted” (this word is repeated twice: ll. 5, 16); they are “spoken-against” and even “Hated” (ll. 5, 16). Yet despite all the obstacles and hostility they face, the best American artists remain true to themselves (and thus, ironically, also true to their country’s best ideals); they refuse to wear themselves out by “persisting to successes” in the conventional sense of that term (i.e., financial or material success). Instead, they seek a deeper, more satisfying, more spiritual success by remaining devoted to their art. Moreover, just as these artists reject the tempting allure of American commercialism, so they also reject the conventional role of the successful artist in America: They refuse merely to repeat and imitate what is already acceptable; they refuse to lapse into the mere “reiteration” that might win them popular approval (l. 11). These artists, after all, are men and women who have it within them to “know at first hand” (l. 14)—that is, to think and feel for themselves rather than conforming to approved, traditional habits of thought and expression. In the final stanza, Pound urges them not to “take heart” but (significantly) to “Take thought” (italics added; l. 17), and he ends by presenting himself as someone who has “weathered the storm” and “beaten out my exile” (ll. 18–19). If the reference to “weather[ing] the storm” seems, ironically, somewhat conventional and pedestrian, the final line seems more original and fresh, and clearly Pound sees himself as the best hope of the best hope—that is, as an artist who has it in him to inspire not only his fellow artists but his nation at large. The poem began by exclaiming, “O . . . / O” (ll. 1–2); it ends by emphasizing “I . . . / I” (ll. 18–19). Ultimately Pound assumes the simultaneous roles of both prophet and savior.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How do early poems such as this one already possibly foreshadow Pound’s later involvement with fascism? What does a poem like this imply about his attitudes toward democracy, the “common people,” and the ideal role of artists in the life of a nation? After World War II Pound was diagnosed as suffering from paranoia; are there already hints of paranoia here?
2. How does Pound’s view of small-town America relate to the view offered by THORNTON WILDER in his play Our Town? How does Wilder try to protect his play against possible charges of offering a sentimental view of an American village? Is Pound’s poem sentimental in its own ways?

“The River-Merchant’s Wife: A Letter” (1915)

The speaker is a young Chinese woman (16 or, at most, 17 years of age) who is writing to her absent husband, who is probably not much older. As young children they innocently played together; when she was 14, they were married, and her initial attitude was one of reserve; by the time she was 15 she had fallen deeply in love with her husband; when she was 16, he left on a trip (presumably connected with business). Now she writes to suggest how much she misses him and how eagerly she looks forward to his return.

This poem, adapted by Pound from an original by the Chinese poet Li Po (701–762), who was known in Japan as Rihaku, exemplifies Pound's interest in the literature of an enormous range of nations, cultures, languages, and eras. Pound was both well and widely read to an enormous degree, but behind his reading was always the hope that he could use his massive learning to breathe new life into the English-language poetry of his own day, which he considered somewhat ossified and stale. His goal as a writer was always to “make it new” (the title of a 1935 collection of his essays), even if “making new” meant returning to ancient examples. Pound himself recognized that the original Chinese poem he worked with here was similar to the dramatic monologues of the English poet Robert Browning, but the delicacy, subtlety, and gentleness of the present work almost seem in a class of their own. The use of indirection and implication, of understated symbolism and restrained imagery, makes this work an altogether different kind of reading experience than such other poems by Pound as “A Pact” or “The Rest.”

The opening line of the present work, for instance, does not state a specific age for the young woman; instead, the line implies her youth by referring to the style of her haircut. The childish activities described in the opening lines seem both enchantingly exotic and deeply familiar, and indeed the entire poem (although set in the China of centuries past) deals with experiences and feelings with which all humans can deeply identify. The language of the poem is simple, clear, plain, and precise. The statements are direct, but they are also often heavy with implication. The sudden shift from childhood to marriage, for instance, in line 7 suggests that the marriage was probably arranged rather than freely chosen; the mere fact that the girl refers to her slightly older husband as “My Lord” suggests a rigidly hierarchical and patriarchal society. Obviously, however, this couple have by now fallen deeply in love, and indeed one of the most beautiful things about the poem is the sense that they both perform their duties and behave as expected, while feeling so much more than simply a dutiful connection.

At first the woman seems shy, perhaps even sexually reticent, but just as the transformation from girlhood to marriage was sudden, so is the transformation from marriage to love and even to sexual fulfillment (ll. 11–14). By the end of the first half of the poem, the couple have bonded completely, but once again a sudden shift takes place: In the very middle line 15 the husband's departure is described, and in the ensuing stanza Pound uses some of his most effectively evocative language. The husband has gone to (or by way of) “the river of swirling eddies” (l. 16), phrasing that surely implies the wife's own disorientation and unsettled mind and emotions; similarly, when she thinks of his long absence she remarks, “The monkeys make sorrowful noise overhead” (l. 18). The monkeys, of course, are not sorrowful; it is she, in her pain, who interprets their noise as expressing sadness.

It is not only the woman, however, who feels the pain of separation: When the husband left, he “dragged [his] feet when [he] went out” (l. 19). The final stanza is full of imagery of decay, transience, and mutability: Moss grows, autumn leaves fall, and even though the butterflies are still paired (unlike the speaker and her husband), they, too, age. In the final lines, however, the speaker does not recall the happy past or mourn the lonely present but instead anticipates a joyous reunion; in the poem's final words she is ready to become active—to meet her beloved as he returns. The poem ends, however, not on a note of sentimental melodrama but with practical plans and a precise geographical fact. In this way as in so many others, Pound not only depicts delicate restraint—he enacts it.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read this work alongside John Donne's famous poem “A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning.” How are the works comparable in “plot” and theme? How are they different in point of view,

8. Read one or more of Pound's political or cultural writings (such as ABC of Economics, Jefferson and/or Mussolini, If This Be Treason, or Impact: Essays on Ignorance and the Decline of American Civilization), and then discuss one or more of his poems (preferably written at around the same time) in light of one of those prose works. How are the prose work and the poem(s) relevant to one another in such matters as themes, style, purpose, and tone?
9. Choose a favorite work by Pound, and then discuss the ways in which that work has been analyzed and interpreted by five or more critics. Which analysis or interpretation do you find most helpful or convincing, and why? How does each critic muster evidence to support his or her particular reading of the poem? On what points do the critics agree and/or disagree? Is there any way to resolve their differences, or are the disagreements entirely a matter of personal opinion?
10. Choose an artist in some other medium (such as music, painting, sculpture, or the novel) who reminds you most of Pound in terms of values, goals, styles, methods, and achievements, and then compare and contrast their works. For instance, in what ways (if any) does Pound remind you of Picasso or Stravinsky or Joyce or Brancusi? What contacts, if any, existed between them? What comments, if any, did they have on each other's work? How are they comparable figures in the history of their own art forms?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Ackroyd, Peter. Ezra Pound. London: Thames and Hudson, 1980.
- Alexander, Michael. The Poetic Achievement of Ezra Pound. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979.
- Bell, Ian F., ed. Ezra Pound: Tactics for Reading. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1982.
- Espey, John. "Ezra Pound." In Sixteen Modern American Authors: A Survey of Research and Criticism, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 445–471. New York: Norton, 1973.
- . "Ezra Pound." In Sixteen Modern American Authors. Vol. 2. A Survey of Research and Criticism since 1972, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 519–597. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.
- Froula, Christine. A Guide to Ezra Pound's Selected Poems. N.p.: New Directions, 1982.
- Nadel, Ira B., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Ezra Pound. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Nelson, Cary. "Modern American Poetry: Ezra Pound." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/maps/poets/m_r/pound/pound.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Pound, Ezra. Poems and Translations. Edited by Richard Sieburth. New York: Library of America, 2003.
- Sieburth, Richard. "Chronology." In Poems and Translations. By Ezra Pound. New York: Library of America, 2003.
- Wilson, Peter. A Preface to Ezra Pound. London: Longman, 1997.

Robert C. Evans

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

(1869–1935)

If a man's work is good for anything it will find a way to those who read it; and if it isn't it won't.

(Selected Letters 41)

Edwin Arlington Robinson is widely considered one of the most important American poets of the early 20th century, although interest in his work has diminished greatly in recent decades. In his early years he faced frustration, disappointment, poverty, and family tragedy; by the end of his life he had achieved great recognition and acclaim. Ironically, his early sufferings may have benefited his writing by contributing to his distinctive themes and tone, while his later success may have hurt his work by allowing him to write long, somewhat diffuse poems—poems often considered far less successful than his earlier, briefer lyrics. Robinson mastered many traditional poetic forms (especially the sonnet), and he frequently employed rhyme and conventional meters; all these traits can make his work seem old-fashioned when compared to the writings of such later poets as T. S. ELIOT or EZRA POUND. At the same time, he often used plain, unadorned diction and wrote about “unpoetic” topics in ways that clearly distinguish his works from the mannered, precious artificiality of much earlier verse. In some ways, then, he is one of the first “modern” American poets, while in other ways his roots are firmly in the 19th century.

Robinson was born in Head Tide, Maine, but spent most of his early life in nearby Gardiner, a town on which he later modeled a fictional village (“Tilbury”) in which he set many poems. His father was a successful businessman, his mother was fairly cultured, and both parents had deep roots in New England. One brother became a doctor; another was trained for business. Edwin, whose interest in poetry was strong from an early age, was able to study at Harvard for two years before his family suffered in an economic downturn in 1893. Robinson's father had died the year before; meanwhile, Dean, the brother who had become a doctor, had also become a drug addict and eventually committed suicide; then in 1896 Robinson's mother died of a highly infectious disease. That same year saw the publication of his first book of lyrics, The Torrent and the Night Before, which was printed at his own expense; the same was true of his next book, Children of the Night (1897), which contains altered versions of many earlier poems. Neither book succeeded, either critically or financially, although both contained some of his most justly admired works, including “Luke Havergal,” “Richard Cory,” and “Credo.” Robinson, now living mainly in New York City, was financially badly off and increasingly tempted by alcohol. In 1902 his collection Captain Craig was printed but met with little success. The title poem, in blank verse, describes an eccentric, humorous, and stoic failure. Other poems in the volume (such as “Isaac and Archibald” and “The Book of Annandale”) also depict distinctive characters, as do many of Robinson's later writings.

In 1903 and 1904 Robinson was employed as a time checker during the construction of New York's first subway, and his mood was increasingly gloomy. His fortunes improved, however, in 1905, when President Theodore Roosevelt happened to read The Children of the Night, which had been shown to him by his son. Roosevelt (who sometimes shared Robinson's poems at cabinet meetings) not only published a favorable assessment of the book but also arranged for Robinson to receive a government job, which he held until Roosevelt left office in 1909. Finally relieved of financial pressure, Robinson worked on two plays (Van Zorn, a failed comedy, and The Porcupine, a more successful tragedy), but neither work made much of a mark. In 1910 he published a third volume of poems (The Town down the River), which contained "Miniver Cheevy" as well as other notable works. In 1911 he spent his first summer at the MacDowell artists' colony in Peterborough, New Hampshire—a place he found so appealing that he returned for 23 successive summer visits. It was not until 1916, however, that he achieved his first major success, with the publication of a new book of poems titled The Man against the Sky. Among notable works printed there are "Ben Jonson Entertains a Man from Stratford" and especially "Eros Turannos," regarded by many commentators as among Robinson's very finest poems. Critics now began to pay increasingly favorable attention to his work, and from 1917 to 1922 he even began receiving financial gifts from anonymous admirers. Also in 1917 Merlin, the first of a trilogy of long narrative poems updating the legends surrounding King Arthur, was published. (Similar works included Lancelot [1920] and the enormously successful Tristram [1927]). In 1919 Robinson's 50th birthday was commemorated by the publication, in the New York Times Book Review, of a host of favorable commentaries on his career, while 1920 saw a new book of lyrics (The Three Taverns, including a number of dramatic monologues and dialogues), followed in 1921 by Avon's Harvest. The title poem describes Avon's macabre, obsessive memories of an acquaintance from his youth—memories that eventually lead to Avon's bizarre death. The volume also contains such noteworthy poems as "Mr. Flood's Party" and "Rembrandt to Rembrandt." Most significantly in 1921 Robinson's Collected Poems appeared. At nearly 600 pages, this book contains most of the nine volumes of verse he had released until that point, and it won him the very first Pulitzer Prize for poetry. Robinson had now obviously arrived quite firmly on the national literary scene; many (though hardly all) informed readers regarded him as the best American poet then writing.

And write he did. Unmarried, childless, and mostly uninterested in the literary limelight, Robinson devoted himself relentlessly to his art. In his last decade or so he turned out one book after another, often writing quickly (some would say lazily), in the process producing most of the long narrative poems that many readers consider far less effective than his earlier lyrics. In 1923, for instance, he issued Roman Bartholow, which is sometimes regarded as his least appealing work but is typical in its focus on the complexities of romance and a suicidal character. More successful was The Man Who Died Twice (1924), another narrative, this time focusing on a failed composer, for which Robinson won his second Pulitzer. Dionysus in Doubt (1925) is a collection of lyrics (including, notably, the title work and such other important poems as "Karma" and "Maya"), while Tristram (1927), the final volume in the Arthurian trilogy, was a stunning commercial and critical triumph. Endorsed by a major book club, it sold nearly 60,000 copies in its first year, and it also won Robinson (remarkably) a third Pulitzer Prize. The work marks the high point of Robinson's public career, although he continued to produce books almost yearly for the rest of his life.

In 1929, for instance, he published Cavender's House, which delves into the psychology of a husband who slays his wife; in 1930 he issued The Glory of the Nightingales, which describes the complex, murderous relations between two men. Matthias at the Door (1931) depicts, in transcendental terms, the relations between the title character and a symbolic rock formation, while Nicodemus (1932) describes various real or legendary personalities. In Talifer (1933) Robinson attempts a comic depiction of romance involving two couples, while Amaranth (1934) presents a talentless painter who nevertheless achieves self-understanding. Finally, in 1935, Robinson (although dying of cancer) was nevertheless hard at work putting the finishing touches on his final book, King Jasper, which seems to have been inspired by the Great Depression of 1929 and the rise to power of Franklin Roosevelt. The poem can be read as an economic allegory, although it (along with much of Robinson's later verse) is in fact seldom read in any way today. It seems fitting, however, that Robertson was working almost until the moment he died. As Hoyt C. Franchere has written, Robinson's "business was the writing of poetry. His poetry was concerned almost exclusively with people: not so much with what these people did but with what they thought and how and why. His own quiet way of living, his humility, his genuine warmth, his capacity for friendship, his large humor—all are exemplary" (147).

Robinson died as a famous and respected man, but interest in his work declined sharply in the second half of the 20th century. His traditionalism proved unappealing to many later, younger writers, while the long poems on which he expended so much time during the height of his fame have done little to enhance his subsequent reputation. Nevertheless, Robinson remains a highly significant writer, not only because he helped usher in a whole new tone in American poetry (a tone that was often dry, laconic, witty, ironic, understated, and plain-spoken), but also because his poetry had a distinctive focus on often everyday characters facing the trials and tribulations of everyday life. These characters often fail in worldly terms while sometimes succeeding in other respects, whether by gaining in self-understanding or simply enduring the challenges they confront. Alienation (that modern buzzword) is Robinson's special theme, and indeed James Dickey (a later admirer and himself a significant poet) has written that no poet ever understood loneliness or separateness better than Robinson or knew the self-consuming furnace that the brain can become in isolation, the suicidal hellishness of it, doomed as it is to feed on itself in answerless frustration, fated to this condition by the accident of human birth, which carries with it the hunger for certainty and the intolerable load of personal recollections. He understood loneliness in all its many forms and depths and was thus less interested in its conventional poetic aspects than he was in the loneliness of the man in the crowd, or alone with his thoughts of the dead, or feeling at some unforeseen time the metaphysical loneliness, the angst, of being "lost among the stars," or becoming aware of the solitude that resides in comfort and in the affection of friend and family—that desperation at the heart of what is called happiness. . . . The acceptance of the fact that there is no way, that there is nothing to do about the sadness of most human beings when they are alone or speaking to others as if to themselves, that there is nothing to offer them but recognition, sympathy, compassion, deepens Robinson's best poems until we sense in them something other than art. A thing inside us is likely to shift from where it was, and our world view to change, though perhaps only slightly, toward a darker, deeper perspective. (86)

Any poet who wrote as well as Robinson often did on so many central concerns of the human experience is unlikely ever to be forgotten. Out of the pain of his own life and the lives he saw around him, he managed to produce a handful of truly memorable lyrics that will surely be read and admired for as long as poetry itself survives.

"Credo" (1896)

The title, which literally means "I believe" in Latin, refers to a creed or system of beliefs. Ironically, however, the speaker here seems at first to deny the existence of any such system; implying instead an absence of any obvious source of significance, he almost welcomes death. Nevertheless, finally the speaker asserts that a "far-sent message" does indeed give existence meaning, and he ends by proclaiming "the coming glory of the Light!" (l. 14).

In its conclusion (at least) this is an unusually and overtly affirmative poem by Robinson, although he always claimed that despite his apparent surface pessimism he was an idealist or optimist at heart. The poem resembles his other writings in its basically plain, clear, simple phrasing; in its initial emphasis on loss and darkness; and in its functional use of generally uncomplicated imagery of sight and sound. The poem also displays Robinson's mastery of the sonnet form—one of the most respected, but also one of the most overused and abused, of all poetic types. Robinson, moreover, here chooses an especially difficult sonnet pattern: He uses the so-called Petrarchan form, in which the standard 14 lines are divided into an eight-line octave followed by a six-line sestet. Petrarchan octaves are especially challenging to write in English because they use only two rhyme sounds, structured abbnabba. The sestet, which introduces new rhyme sounds, is also usually more flexible in structure than the octave; in the present case, Robinson chooses a cdecde rhyme scheme. In "Credo," the octave is one long sentence, as is the sestet. However, while the sestet's first three lines at first seem simply to restate the dark, somewhat pessimistic argument of the octave, the last three lines point the work in an entirely new, emphatically affirmative, direction. Robinson thus uses form to reinforce meaning. The final line of the sonnet completely reverses the impact of the poem's opening assertion, although it must be confessed that the speaker provides little specific, solid evidence to make us share his own final (and somewhat abrupt) belief in the "coming glory of the Light" (l. 14). That claim risks seeming a bit wishful rather than anything the poem convincingly proves.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Imagine that Robinson chose to end this poem on a less optimistic note. Rewrite the final three lines in a way that would be typical of Robinson's apparent pessimism in other works. How does the overall structure of this poem (and especially its conclusion) compare and contrast with that of Robinson's "Richard Cory"?
2. Are there any lines in this poem that strike you as either particularly effective or particularly ineffective? Which lines are they, and how would you justify your opinion of them?
3. Compare and contrast this poem with John Donne's sonnet "Death Be Not Proud." Which of the poems is more affirmative, and why? Which of the poems is more coherent, and why?

"The House on the Hill" (1896)

In this brief, simple, but evocative poem, an unidentified speaker (who nonetheless seems to speak for a larger group) describes an empty house whose former inhabitants have departed, leaving the residence "shut and still" (l. 2)—a desolate place through which winds now "blow bleak and shrill" (l. 5). Although no one at present can say anything good or bad about the former inhabitants, people nevertheless continue to visit the house, even though the speaker confesses that any words spent describing it are "wasted" (l. 14) and that "There is nothing more to say" (ll. 3, 6, 9, 15, 18). However, the fact that the speaker makes this assertion in five separate lines suggests that he is, in some ways, haunted by this house and that he hopes to haunt his readers, too.

This poem is representative of Robinson's work both in its phrasing and in its subject. As so often in his writing, loss is a major theme: The house is no longer a home, and its former residents have vanished. The phrasing is deliberately monotonous, especially in its rhymes, which revolve around merely two different sounds; here as in other poems, Robinson uses repetition with great impact, creating an effect of paralysis, lassitude, and apathy. The speaker seems almost as listless and lifeless as the scene he describes. The diction is plain and simple; few words have more than one syllable, and those that are longer tend to be depressing (including "nothing" [ll. 3, 6, 9, 15, 18]; "broken" [l. 4]; "sunken" [l. 11]; "wasted" [l. 14]; "decay" [l. 16]; and "away" [l. 18]). The speaker makes no effort to ascribe any grand, sweeping significance to the scene he describes, although clearly the poem symbolizes Robinson's view of everyday life as often dreary, frustrating, and perhaps even meaningless. The speaker, however, merely states facts as he sees them; as so often in Robinson's works, understatement and reticence are major features of this poem.

The opening word (They) is both precise and vague, and indeed vagueness is used effectively throughout. The former residents of the house have "all gone away" (l. 1), but we are never told why or how. Have they simply moved? Have they died? The speaker never says, and indeed he paradoxically insists—again and again—that "There is nothing more to say," thereby crafting a poem out of his repeated confession that no poem is necessary and that no account of his subject can be adequate. As is common in Robinson's works, the speaker asks questions without ever attempting to provide clear answers ("Why is it that we stray / Around that sunken sill?" [ll. 10–11]); the subject of the poem is a mystery and the tone of the poem is mysterious. The sense of "ruin and decay" (l. 16) mentioned in the final stanza is typical of Robinson's verse, and the same is true of the craftsmanship with which the final stanza (now consisting of four lines rather than the expected three) ties everything together, including the poem's title, its main themes, and the refrains from all the earlier stanzas.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with Edgar Allan Poe's short story "The Fall of the House of Usher." How are the works similar in tone, symbolism, and imagery? Contrast the endings of the two works; which is more dramatic, and why?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with the ancient Anglo-Saxon lyric "The Ruin," particularly in terms of symbolism, imagery, and diction. How are the poems alike in theme and final effect? Why and how do both works use buildings as symbols?
3. What (if anything) do you think the house and its departed inhabitants symbolize? In what way are the themes of the poem relevant to the lives of nearly all humans? Why does Robinson want to create a sense of mystery, and how does he achieve that effect?

"Luke Havergal" (1896)

A voice from "Out of a grave" (l. 17) speaks to the mournful title character, whose loved one has apparently died. The voice tells Havergal that if he goes to a mysterious "western gate" (l. 1), he will be able to hear the woman's voice among the sounds of falling leaves, and the voice from the grave even seems to insinuate that the only way for Havergal to reunite with his beloved is by joining her in death, perhaps through suicide. There is (the voice assures Havergal) just "one way to where she is"; although that way is "Bitter," it is "one that faith can never miss" (ll. 21–22).

This poem is one of Robinson's most admired works; President Theodore Roosevelt, in particular, thought so highly of it that it was one reason he was moved to help Robinson find a government job. Roosevelt confessed, however, that although he found the poem effective, he was not quite sure precisely what it meant, and many subsequent readers have agreed. Certainly the poem creates an air of intriguing ambiguity that seems perfectly appropriate to its literally haunting subject matter. Certainly, too, the poem is one of Robinson's most typical works, both in themes and in style. His poetry often concentrates, for instance, on particular people, and especially people in pain, and surely Havergal is one of these. These characters are often lonely and isolated and have often suffered some profound loss, and Luke qualifies on all these counts. The tone of many of Robinson's poems is dark and desolate, and suicide is a frequent topic. Robinson's language is often plain and straightforward (as is true here), and when he does use imagery, he tends to use it symbolically, as is clearly the case in "Luke Havergal." Repetition is often a major feature of Robinson's style, and nowhere is this trait more obvious than here, not only in the repeated images of gate, wall, wind, and leaves, but also in the way the first line of each stanza is repeated in each seventh line, and then in the way each eighth line echoes the last few words of the line before it. Robinson was a master of stanzaic form, and in this poem he strikingly combines rhyme and meter to reinforce meaning powerfully. Each stanza rhymes in an aabbaaaa pattern, thus giving the poem an almost claustrophobic insistence—an effect amplified by the repetition used in each stanza's brief final phrase. In each of the four stanzas, the first seven lines consist of 10 syllables, while the abrupt eighth line is all the more emphatic by using only four syllables. In another unusual move, Robinson makes sure that each first syllable of each stanza is heavily accented. In all these respects this poem (like many of his works) is very carefully and lovingly crafted.

Here as in so many works by Robinson, nature provides no consolation to suffering humans, and religious consolation is notable mainly by its absence. Indeed, the only explicit reference to God seems to suggest a model for possible self-destruction (“God slays Himself in every leaf that flies” [l. 13]), and the only reference to “faith” (l. 22) also seems to associate that word with suicide (an act forbidden by conventional Christianity). The “western gate” toward which the ghostly voice of the poem repeatedly urges Havergal clearly seems linked with death; it seems a place of transition that is forbidding and perhaps also forbidden. In an earlier era the poem's seductive voice would clearly have been associated with a Satanic tempter. It is typical of Robinson, however, that he never condemns the voice; nor indeed does he pass any obvious judgment at all. He merely lets the voice speak and lets each reader judge for himself or herself what to make of the dark counsel it offers.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How is this poem similar, in theme and phrasing, to such other classic works by Robinson as “Richard Cory” and “Eros Turannos”? Discuss the tones of the two works and the sense they convey of mystery and ambiguity.
2. Compare and contrast this poem with Robinson's “Mr. Flood's Party.” How do they contrast in tone, point of view, and final effect? In what ways is isolation an important theme in both works?
3. Compare and contrast this poem, in theme and style, with Edgar Allan Poe's “The Raven.” How do both poems create and sustain an air of ambiguity? How are the voices of the two works similar and/or different?
4. Do some research into Robinson's attitudes toward religion and relate those attitudes to this poem. How were Robinson's views typical of those of his era? What historical factors influenced his thinking about religion?
5. What do you think Robinson meant by the phrase “hell is more than half of paradise”? Why does he not make the meaning of the phrase more simple and clear? What is the effect of making its meaning suggestive rather than obvious?

“Reuben Bright” (1896)

The first-person but unidentified speaker begins by directly addressing his audience, remarking that although Reuben Bright was a butcher, we should not therefore assume that he was any less tenderhearted than the speaker or we are. As proof of this claim, the speaker reveals that when Reuben was informed of his wife's impending death, he wept as an infant does, causing women who witnessed him to weep in response. After his wife had passed away, Reuben took care of the funeral expenses, stored and perfumed her belongings, and (somewhat surprisingly) “tore down the slaughterhouse” (l. 14).

Like “Credo,” this poem is a Petrarchan sonnet, thus revealing once more Robinson's strong commitment to conventional forms and to the traditions of rhyme and meter that many poets of his time had begun to reject. Robinson uses the octave/sestet division effectively, and he also packs one of his not infrequent surprises into the final half-line. In other ways, too, the poem is typical, particularly in its focus on an individual character facing a traumatic experience and suffering, as a result, a feeling of desolation and defeat without any real source of spiritual or philosophical consolation. All the while this character is observed and commented on by a representative of the community, but this speaker offers no overt “moral” to the story he reports, although commiseration and compassion are implied, particularly by line 8. The style, as usual, is plain, simple, and matter-of-fact; the tone is flat, laconic, and realistic. Robinson lets us draw our own conclusions about why Reuben Bright “tore down the slaughter-house” (l. 14); perhaps death, which had once been his stock in trade, was now something he could no longer stomach. In any case, Robinson employs a form (the sonnet) often associated with romance, prettiness, and affected language and uses it to offer a grim, unflinching slice of life and death, but one rooted in deep love nonetheless.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How (if at all) does line 2 make sense in light of the implied logic of lines 1, 3, and 4? Why is the simple, general word things in line 11 effective? Choose other specific details of the poem’s diction and explain how they contribute to the effectiveness of the two works.
2. Compare and contrast the use of the themes of death and marriage in this poem and in Kate Chopin’s short tale “The Story of an Hour.” What is implied about the relations of the couples in the two works? What is the difference between the reactions of the grieving spouses? How does each work use its ending to give the work maximum effectiveness?
3. Compare and contrast this poem with another famous sonnet—Elizabeth Barrett Browning’s “How do I love thee?” How are the poems similar and/or different in tone, imagery, structure, and final effect? Which work is more “romantic,” and why? Do you prefer one work to the other? If so, explain why.

“Richard Cory” (1896)

This poem (perhaps the most famous Robinson ever wrote) describes a wealthy, good-looking, well-groomed, courteous, and eminently fortunate man who is an object of fascination and even envy among the people of the town in which he lives. Cory seems to possess every material advantage a person could desire, and thus it shocks both his fellow citizens and Robinson’s readers when we learn, in the final line, that one night Cory “Went home and put a bullet through his head” (l. 16).

The poem is typical of Robinson’s writings in both theme and style. As many of his works do, it deals with one person’s painful life, even if that pain is not apparent until the very end. The lyric is one of Robinson’s numerous character studies that deliberately raise more questions than they answer. It provokes thought rather than teaching a simplistic lesson. Suicide (which is often implied or suggested in Robinson’s poems) is here shockingly explicit, and yet Robinson, typically, passes no judgment and preaches no moral. Cory, despite the regard in which he is seemingly held by his fellow citizens, is nevertheless deeply alienated from them and is thus in one more respect a typical Robinson character. No religion, and indeed no secular philosophy of life, seems to offer an answer to whatever pain leads him to his death; aside from speaking in polite but superficial pleasantries, he is cut off from any genuine communion or communication with others. The poem’s diction, as so often in Robinson, is simple and plain, and here as in other works by this author the speaker represents the common citizens he describes. Imagery is kept to a minimum; the syntax (or sentence structure) is uncomplicated; the narrative is straightforward and (until the final line) unsurprising; thus, the irony of the last four words is all the more unexpected and powerful. Irony, indeed, is one of the most common traits of Robinson’s style and of his general outlook on life, and perhaps one reason this poem has been so perennially popular is that it implies that most humans carry within them painful thoughts and feelings that others might never suspect. In its meter, rhyme scheme, and stanzaic form the poem is both conventional and plain: The meter is iambic pentameter (10 syllables in each line, with even syllables accented); the rhymes alternate (abab) in a thoroughly predictable fashion; the four-line stanzas are brief and uncomplicated. In short, nothing in this poem prepares us for the potent surprise of the final line. Robinson’s craft, here as in all his best poems, is sure but unobtrusive.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read a biography of Robinson and discuss how this poem may reflect the experiences of his elder brother, Dean. Does the effect (or effectiveness) of the poem depend on such knowledge? How does the poem deal with universal experiences and emotions?

2. Simon and Garfunkel set this poem to music. Listen to their song and examine the relationship between the music and the poem. Is their music appropriate to the words? Why or why not? Is their adaptation of the work effective?
3. Explore historical facts concerning suicide in Robinson's era and discuss their relevance to this poem. Were attitudes toward suicide changing during this period? If so, why and how? Why is suicide such a common theme in Robinson's writings? What does it symbolize?
4. Why do you think this has always been one of Robinson's most popular works? How much of the appeal of this work depends on its theme, and how much depends on the craft with which the poem is written?
5. In what ways is Richard Cory unusual, and in what other ways is he typical of many people? Why would a person like Cory be more common in Robinson's era than in earlier historical periods? What kinds of changes were taking place in the culture of Robinson's time that would have made a person like Cory less unusual than (say) during the Middle Ages? Compare and contrast Cory with the title figure in T. S. Eliot's poem "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock."

"Miniver Cheevy" (1910)

This poem describes a frustrated, scornful modern man who regrets that he was not born in more exciting, less prosaic times. He fantasizes about living in the classical past, enjoying the days of King Arthur, and indulging in the excitement of the wicked Renaissance. He feels contempt for modern materialism and for the unfortunate need to earn money, but instead of trying to act according to his ideals, he merely thinks about them, as he grows increasingly and pathetically dependent on alcohol.

Many critics have seen this poem as (in part) a satiric self-portrait of Robinson himself. As does Cheevy, Robinson felt much contempt for the modern age, was steeped in the past, and was tempted by alcohol. Unlike Cheevy, however, Robinson was devoted to hard work, was capable of self-discipline, and was able to mock, with good humor, his own shortcomings. The poem is typical of Robinson's writings in its plain style, its simple diction, its colloquial language (as in the phrase "on the town" [l. 15]), and its somewhat surprising conclusion. Irony and even sarcasm are especially emphasized in this work, particularly in stanza 4 (about the Medicis) and in the undercutting comic reference to "the mediaeval grace / Of iron clothing" (ll. 23–24). Perhaps Robinson (who usually did not judge harshly, if at all, the characters he created) felt inclined to be fairly tough on Cheevy precisely because he saw a bit of Cheevy in himself. In any case, in the depiction of Cheevy we have another of Robinson's psychological character studies, as well as another of his alienated, isolated people who are disappointed with their lives—people whom the world counts as failures.

Robinson's ironic treatment of Cheevy begins with the character's oddly unusual name, which sounds too contrived to be taken seriously. The fact that he is a "child of scorn" (l. 1) implies his basic immaturity and suggests not only that he feels scorn but that he is probably scorned by others. He is, paradoxically, full of both anger and maudlin self-pity (ll. 2–3), and Robinson shows his usual metrical skill in the sudden switch, in line 4, to an abruptly briefer line. Line 4 creates real suspense in the ambiguous "he had reasons," but then we discover that Miniver's "reasons" amount merely to a bad case of nostalgia. Until stanza 5 it is partly possible to sympathize with Miniver's rejection of modern materialism, but when we learn that he would love to sin if given the chance, his moral authority vanishes. From that point forward, Cheevy seems increasingly the object of the speaker's disdain, particularly in the wonderful lines—full of verbs without action—in which the speaker reports that "Miniver thought, and thought, and thought, / And thought about it" (ll. 27–28). ROBERT FROST (himself an eminent American poet, who respected Robinson) justly admired these lines (Franchere 80), in which Robinson makes the repetitious structure of his sentence cleverly mimic its meaning.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Why is Miniver Cheevy a less sympathetic character than the title character of “Richard Cory” or “Mr. Flood’s Party”? Why and how does his scorn cause us partly to scorn him? Why is it harder to identify with him than with the characters described in those other poems?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with T. S. Eliot’s “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock.” What similarities of personality, attitude, and situation do the two characters have? How is Eliot’s work, in general, similar to Robinson’s?
3. Research Robinson’s life. How did he resemble Cheevy, and how were they also different? What might have been the psychological benefits to Robinson of writing a poem about a character with whom he had various traits in common?
4. Do any details in the poem suggest that Robinson partly shares Cheevy’s “scorn” for the modern world? How are Robinson’s views of the modern age reflected in his longer poems based on medieval legends?
5. Using a good reference work (such as the Oxford English Dictionary), explore the meaning of the phrase “on the town” (l. 15). Why, in light of your findings, is line 15 particularly ironic?

“Eros Turannos” (1913, 1916)

This poem, one of Robinson’s most widely praised, describes the loveless relationship between a woman who, fearing the prospect of growing old alone, marries a superficially charming man whom she nonetheless distrusts and knows to be unfaithful. He, in turn, marries her not because he truly loves her but because she provides security and status; however, as she grows increasingly disenchanted with her choice, she withdraws from society and perhaps even contemplates suicide. Meanwhile, the townspeople observe this domestic tragedy from afar and gossip about it, although the poem’s speaker (who is also their spokesman) admits that the full truth of other people’s lives can never be completely explained or understood.

The title of this poem refers (ironically enough) to the ancient Greek god of love, who is imagined here as a tyrant or overwhelming force of nature that overrules the woman’s better judgment. She is another in the long line of Robinson characters who considers herself (and is considered by others) a frustrated failure; her life is one of disappointment and defeat. Robinson here provides another of his many psychological character studies, suggesting the complex motivations of the woman and the man while also suggesting not only the way each is regarded by the community but also the inevitable limits of the community’s perceptions. Alienation and despair are major themes of this poem, as they are of so many of Robinson’s works, and it is typical, too, that the woman has no source of consolation, either in religion or in some secular philosophy. She lives a life of lonely pain—a life made all the more lonely by the presence of her unloving, unloved husband. The style of the poem bears all the hallmarks of Robinson’s writing: The poem uses conventional rhyme and meter to describe a topic that would have seemed highly unconventional in Robinson’s day. The phrasing is simple, plain, understated, and restrained; bleak imagery contributes to the gloomy mood and tone, and nature provides no comfort, but instead reinforces the woman’s sense of isolation and despair. Although the poem is a narrative, it contains very little “action”; here as elsewhere, Robinson creates a sense of stifling paralysis as he depicts a doomed life lacking any options or joy. Repetition of key phrases and images adds to our sense of a stagnating relationship that can end only in disappointment or death, and perhaps even self-destruction.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare this poem to the sonnet cycle Modern Love by the English poet George Meredith. How do both works depict marriage? How do both use irony? How are they similar in tone, themes, and imagery?

2. Research the position of women in Robinson's times. Why would a woman in Robinson's era feel particularly compelled to marry? How were a woman's options more constricted than a man's? Why might a woman feel particularly frustrated in an unhappy marriage?
3. Discuss some of the many ironies of this poem. For instance, what is ironic about the phrasing of the second line? How does irony contribute to the effectiveness of the poem? Why use irony rather than some more obvious method of communicating an idea?
4. Compare and contrast the depiction of marriage in this poem with the ways it is depicted in ZORA NEALE HURSTON's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. How does the main character in Hurston's novel respond to the frustrations of her early marriage? Would the woman in Robinson's poem have had the same options of response?
5. How do you interpret the first two lines of stanza 3? How have other readers of the poem interpreted those lines? How do those lines contribute to the overall impact of the work?

"Mr. Flood's Party" (1921)

This poem describes Eben Flood's journey back to his lonely home after a visit to Tilbury Town (the fictional setting of many of Robinson's poems), where he has refilled his jug with liquor. Pausing on the isolated road during the moonlit night, Flood courteously engages in whimsical conversation with himself as he remembers his happy past, contemplates his lonely present and lonelier future, and offers himself several drinks. He sings a nostalgic song, remembers long-gone friends, and ponders his present isolation.

Robinson's tone here (unlike the tone of many of his other best-known poems) is comic and somewhat playful. Yet Eben Flood (whose name perhaps suggests the "ebb and flow" of human life) is not merely or even mainly a subject of mocking fun; he is treated with some genuine dignity (as the term Mister implies), since he symbolizes many common human emotions, desires, and experiences.

These include a yearning for friendship, a love of lost friends, a fear of isolation, the process of loss that inevitably accompanies age, and the will to face life's disappointments with stoic good grace and without maudlin self-pity. Robinson uses many words implying loss, gloom, and mutability, including "Old" and "night" (l. 1); "forsaken" (l. 2), "harvest moon" (l. 9), "dim" (l. 24), "fearing" (l. 26), "trembling" (l. 28), "break" (l. 28), "uncertain" (l. 30), "time" (l. 34), "change" (l. 34), "loneliness" (l. 45), "weary" (l. 49), "last" (l. 50), "nothing" (l. 54), "strangers" (l. 55), "long ago" (l. 56), and especially "alone" (ll. 1, 17, 52), a term that is almost the keynote of the work. Here as in so many other works, Robinson emphasizes alienation and pain in a universe lacking much consolation aside from cool liquor and fond memories. Flood obviously suffers pain, but he (unlike such other Robinson characters as Richard Cory) endures his suffering without becoming self-destructive. Despite his drinking, he is an intelligent man, capable of literary allusions (as in line 11, which invokes Edward Fitzgerald's famous translation of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám) and worthy of being compared (even if a bit ironically) to the legendary (and ultimately tragically isolated) medieval hero Roland (l. 20). Flood's longing for companionship is so great that he creates an imaginary alter ego with whom he can converse and imbibe, and the humor of the tipsy but polite conversation Flood conducts with himself only underscores the pain of his loneliness. Robinson achieves a wonderful balance in this poem between the funny and the profound; by the end of the poem, Flood has earned both our compassion and our respect. The poem reminds us that life, for everyone, is a kind of journey that must ultimately end in isolation. What matters is less the outcome of the journey than the courage, good humor, and self-respect with which we proceed.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with ROBERT FROST's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." How are the two works similar in tone, imagery, theme, and final effect?

- , ed. Edwin Arlington Robinson: Centenary Essays. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1969.
- Coxe, Louis. Edwin Arlington Robinson: The Life of Poetry. New York: Pegasus, 1969.
- Dickey, James. "Edwin Arlington Robinson: The Many Truths." In Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by Francis Murphy, 77–94. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1970.
- Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Virtual Tour of Robinson's Gardiner, Maine. Available online. URL: <http://www.earobinson.com>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Franchere, Hoyt C. Edwin Arlington Robinson. Boston: Twayne, 1968.
- Joyner, Nancy Carol. "Edwin Arlington Robinson." In Dictionary of Literary Biography: American Poets, 1880–1945, Third Series. Part 2, N–Z. Vol. 54, edited by Peter Quartermain, 366–387. Detroit: Gale, 1987.
- Murphy, Francis, ed. Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1970.
- Porter, Joshua. Edwin Arlington Robinson. Available online. URL: <http://robinson.bokardo.com>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Robinson, Edwin Arlington. Collected Poems. New York: Macmillan, 1929.
- . Selected Letters. New York: Macmillan, 1940.
Robert C. Evans

CARL SANDBURG (1878–1967)

All around us the imponderable and the unfathomed—at these targets many a poet has shot his bullets of silver and scored a bull’s eye, or missed with dull pellets of paper.

(“Notes for a Preface”)

Carl August Sandburg was born in humble circumstances in tiny Galesburg, Illinois, on January 6, 1878, the son of Swedish immigrants, August and Clara Sandburg. The family lived in a small house near the main rail line. Sandburg’s father was a hardworking, deeply religious man with a no-nonsense temperament and a limited education. Employed by the railroad, he made less than 15 cents an hour, but both his politics and his personality were conservative—traits that would eventually put him in conflict with his strong-willed son. Carl’s mother was more openly affectionate and was also better educated than her husband, and it was she to whom Carl always felt more drawn. Soon after the boy began attending school, he also began calling himself by the more American-sounding name Charles—the first of many signs of his intense identification with the land of his birth. However, his formal education ceased for a time after the eighth grade, since his parents could not afford to pay for high school. From his earliest teenage years, then, young Sandburg worked, and his experiences with various forms of manual labor and service jobs would help give him a lifelong sympathy with the working class. Although confirmed in the Swedish Lutheran Church when he was 13, he never took much interest in formal religion, tending instead to derive his spiritual sustenance from faith in the best aspects of humanity and from nature’s beauty. His interest in liberal politics can also be traced to these teenage years, when he first began to identify with the Democrats (in opposition to his Republican father). Nevertheless, his lifelong admiration for Abraham Lincoln (the most famous of all Republicans) also began at this time (Crowder 21–25; Niven 1–26).

By the time he was 19, Sandburg had begun a life of restless traveling that would never really cease. He hopped a train and headed west, with no definite destination or plan in mind. During these early travels he saw the country and worked an even greater variety of temporary jobs, but now he had also begun keeping notes and writing about his experiences. Back in Galesburg, he did more manual labor before joining the state militia and heading off, in 1898, to participate in the Spanish-American War. Although he saw little military action, he did send letters back home to the Galesburg newspaper recounting a soldier’s life, thus beginning his long involvement with journalism. When he returned to Galesburg he was able, as a veteran, to enroll free for a year’s study at tiny Lombard College, and he was even offered a chance to enroll at West Point, although his performance on academic examinations was not good enough to permit him to study there. Back at Lombard, he was active both academically and athletically, and he also continued to work a variety of jobs to help support himself. Perhaps the most important aspect of his time at Lombard, however, was his contact with Professor Philip Green Wright, who taught not only English but numerous other subjects and who quickly saw in Sandburg a young man of great potential. It was Wright who first encouraged his literary ambitions and who actually published some of Sandburg's earliest poetry on a basement printing press. Sandburg always said that Wright was one of the three people who had most affected his life (the other two were his eventual wife and her brother). Wright was a relatively freethinking teacher at a relatively liberal college, and by this point Sandburg himself increasingly identified with liberal, populist, and "progressive" causes, to which he would be loyal all his life (Crowder 25–33; Niven 27–89).

Although he spent four fruitful years at Lombard, Sandburg did not graduate. Instead he left in 1902 to travel once more—this time heading east rather than west. Arrested in Pennsylvania for hitching an unpaid ride on a train, he spent more than a week in jail—an experience that allowed him to identify even more strongly than before with the less genteel aspects of American life. Back in Galesburg by 1904, he worked as a fireman and salesman and reestablished contact with Professor Wright, who that year published Sandburg's first three books of verse and other creative writing (In Reckless Ecstasy, The Plaint of a Rose, and Incidentals), which already show his enduring interest in common people and in the loveliness of nature. By 1906, however, he had begun to feel constrained in Galesburg, and so he set his sights (and hopes) on the metropolis with which he is now forever identified: Chicago. Soon after arriving there he became an editor of the Lyceumite, a journal intended for traveling public speakers, and it was not long before Sandburg himself began touring in that capacity, speaking particularly on Walt Whitman, the poet with whom he had so much in common, both in outlook and in style. By 1907 he had also begun to take an increasingly prominent role in politics, signing on as an organizer and speaker for the liberal Social Democrats. It was through his involvement with this party that he met Lillian Steichen (whom he called Paula), with whom he quickly fell in love, who would soon become his wife. Intelligent and thoughtful, she admired his character, his views, and his poetry, and for the next 60 years she would be a source of constant support and encouragement in all his varied endeavors (Crowder 33–41; Niven 90–180).

By 1909 the Sandburgs had moved to Milwaukee, where Carl continued to be involved in politics while also working in advertising and journalism and maintaining his interest in creative writing. Besides publishing a socialist pamphlet (You and Your Job), in 1910 he also issued a literary essay (Jossefy) and additionally served as private secretary to the newly elected socialist mayor. After leaving this job he worked for a liberal newspaper (the Leader), then headed to Chicago in 1912 to work first on one newspaper (the World), then another (the Day Book), then (ironically) for a business journal (the System), then for the National Hardware Journal and American Artisan, and then finally back to the Day Book at a salary of $25 per week. He now had an infant daughter to support, but despite his need to earn a living and his constant switching from one job to another, he still found time to write poetry, and in 1914 he submitted a batch of it to a recently established (but highly significant) journal based in Chicago called Poetry: A Magazine of Verse. Its editor, Harriet Monroe, soon became one of Sandburg's most vigorous champions, despite the opposition of various critics, who found his work allegedly too shapeless, rough-hewn, and vulgar to constitute as true "verse." In poetry, however (as in politics), Sandburg was deliberately radical, yet it was not long before his work was winning recognition, payment, and awards (including the magazine's Levinson Prize for the best poems of the year). His career as a poet was now firmly launched, and for the moment (at least) he was increasingly considered one of the country's most distinctive and revolutionary creative writers. He wrote in free verse on gritty urban topics and celebrated the common people in the language of the streets, and he was thus part of a general rejection at this time of the genteel tradition in American letters (Crowder 42–48; Niven 181–273).

In 1916 Chicago Poems, one of Sandburg's most important books, was published. In 1917 he joined the staff of the Chicago Daily News, a newspaper with which he would be associated for many years. In 1918 his book of poems called Cornhuskers appeared, its very title suggesting its focus on the life of common workers on the prairie. The book helped win him a prize awarded in 1919 by the Poetry Society of America; in that same year his continued interest in journalism and public affairs resulted in the publication of a book called The Chicago Race Riots. In the following year he not only began reading his poems in public on college campuses (a practice that would last most of the rest of his life), but also published a third significant volume of verse (Smoke and Steel), for which he was again honored in 1921 with a prize from the Poetry Society of America. In 1922 he published yet more poems (Slabs of the Sunburnt West) as well as his first collection of children's tales (Rootabaga Stories, followed in 1923 by Rootabaga Pigeons). By now, though, his interest in Abraham Lincoln had deepened enormously, so that in 1926 he published a massive two-volume biography (Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years) that quickly established him not only as a best-selling author but as one of the most important (if controversial) Lincoln scholars in the country. Meanwhile, his interest in American folk music resulted, in 1927, in publication of The American Songbag, while his continuing productivity as a poet and creative writer resulted in the publication of a collection called Good Morning, America in 1928—the same year he was honored both by Harvard University and by his alma mater, Lombard College. Honorary degrees were now awarded to him frequently, as his ever-prolific pen produced more books; in 1929 a study of his increasingly famous brother-in-law titled Steichen the Photographer; in 1930 two new children's books (Potato Face and Early Moon); in 1932 a biography called Mary Lincoln, Wife and Widow; and, in 1936, another volume of poems (The People, Yes). By this point in his life Sandburg was one of the most prominent writers in the country, even though many critics thought that as a poet he had begun to repeat himself and had failed to develop (Crowder 48–126; Niven 273–513).

As a biographer, however, Sandburg's best days still lay ahead. In 1939 he published a massive, two-volume sequel to his earlier biography of Lincoln, calling the continuation Lincoln: The War Years. This work was even better received than the first installment, winning the Pulitzer Prize for history in 1940, the same year in which he also received honorary degrees from five colleges or universities, including Harvard and Yale. During World War II Sandburg (a great admirer of President Roosevelt) wrote a newspaper column, made radio broadcasts, and wrote commentary for a film, using all these media largely to support the nation's war efforts. Some of these works appeared in Home Front Memo (1943), but it was not until 1948 that his next major work (and first novel) appeared. This massive historical epic, Remembrance Rock, is the one work that even his strongest admirers consider weak and disappointing. Nevertheless, in 1950 his Complete Poems was published and received the Pulitzer Prize, and in the same year his New American Songbag also appeared. In 1952 he was awarded the gold medal for history and biography by the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and in the following year he received yet another gold medal—this one for verse—from the Poetry Society of America. Also in 1953 his autobiographical work Always the Young Strangers, which covered his earliest years, was published, and in 1954 a condensed, corrected version of the Lincoln biography appeared. Various other collections and modified versions of his works were also issued in ensuing years, including Prairie-Town Boy (1955), The Sandburg Range (1957), Harvest Poems (1960), Wind Song (1960), and Six New Poems and a Parable (1961). In 1959 he was invited to speak before the government and both houses of Congress to celebrate Lincoln, and in the same year he received a medal from the king of Sweden. He was also a frequent guest on national radio and television (Crowder 126–155; 514–684).

In his final decade, Sandburg continued to be active and celebrated. A play called The World of Carl Sandburg toured the country with some success; he was employed as a script consultant in Hollywood; he was invited to the White House by Presidents Kennedy and Johnson (receiving the Presidential Medal of Freedom from the latter); and, in 1963, he saw the publication of Honey and Salt, his final volume of poems to appear during his own lifetime. He was particularly moved by an award he received in 1965 from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and in general by this time Sandburg was considered a revered national figure, even if respect for his poetic talent had now declined sharply. Although he had been hale and hearty for most of his long life, he was now increasingly frail, both in body and in mind. Death took him quietly on July 21, 1967: His last word was his wife's name, and then he was gone.

“Chicago” (1914, 1916)

This poem, one of Sandburg's most famous and most characteristic works, takes a hard, clear, but ultimately affirmative look at the city with which the poet was most associated—a city that had become one of the largest and most dynamic urban centers in the world during the era in which he wrote. The speaker acknowledges the dark, gritty, unappealing aspects of Chicago (its prostitution, its murders, its poverty), but he also celebrates its vitality, its strength, and its energy and dynamism.

“Chicago” is typical of many of Sandburg's works, both in themes and in style. Thematically the poem is characteristic in its focus on hard labor, big industry, urban corruption, and the suffering of the poor, but the poem is also typical of Sandburg in its celebration of virility, physical power, mental determination, and the sheer joy of living and creating (or what the speaker calls “Building, breaking, rebuilding” [l. 17]). The poem is a tribute to the common people, particularly the working class, on whom the strength and prosperity of the nation depend, and its affirmation of Chicago is indirectly an affirmation of America (and of the “American dream”) as a whole. Stylistically, the poem is also typical of Sandburg in numerous ways, including its unconventional, “unpoetic” imagery; its vigorous rhythms and meter; its uneven, unpredictable line lengths; its strong stress on emphatic verbs (often heavily accented on the first syllable); its forceful use of repetition of all kinds; and its love of lists.

In its free rhythms, unconventional shape, unusual imagery, and masculine assertiveness, the poem itself mimics the city it extols, and yet the poem (as does the city itself) exhibits a deeper order beneath its apparent randomness. It is built, for instance, around a variety of oppositions (including accusations versus defense, the accusers versus the speaker, the city's ugliness versus its undeniable power and even beauty), and the poem is given further order and coherence through the return, in its final lines, to the images and phrasing with which it opened. It seems significant, too, that the poem's final word is Nation, since one main purpose of the work is obviously to celebrate the essential contribution of Chicago to America as a whole. The poem implicitly extols the city as a symbol of all that is best in America but also treats it as a symbol of all that needs reform and improvement.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the depiction of urban life in this poem with that offered in T. S. ELIOT's “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock.” In particular, focus on the imagery, moods, tone, and themes of the two works.
2. Compare and contrast the style and themes of this poem with the style and themes of Walt Whitman's “Song of Myself.” In particular, discuss the works in terms of their rhythms, line lengths, imagery, and points of view and in terms of their attitudes toward common people, working life, and role of the American poet.
3. Compare and contrast the image of American life presented in this poem and in THORNTON WILDER's play Our Town. In particular, discuss the two works in terms of their presentations of big city life versus small town existence and in terms of their presentations of distinctions of class.
4. Discuss the effectiveness of specific aspects of the diction of this poem. For example, discuss the nouns used in the first three lines. In what ways are they similar? In what ways are they distinct? Discuss the adjectives used in line 3. Why are all three of those words accented in their first syllables? Why are all the admissions of lines 6–9 crucial to the later credibility of the poet's praise?

“Child of the Romans” (1916)

The poem describes an Italian workman (probably an immigrant to America) who grabs bites of an extremely simple lunch as he works to maintain a rail line. As he eats, a train whizzes by; it is filled with people wealthy enough to afford lavish meals at well-appointed tables. The Italian’s work—dedicated but unnoticed—allows these people to enjoy their meals without disturbance.

Irony is a key element of this poem, in its phrasing, situation, and tone. The irony begins with the two key words of the title. The Italian workman is, obviously, no longer a “Child”: He is an adult who must perform back-breaking labor to earn a meager income. His life is thus far from the innocence and uncomplicated joy we normally associate with children. He is, however, indeed a “child” of the “Romans” in the sense that his heritage is Italian, but the word Romans is double-edged: It reminds us of the reputations the ancient Romans enjoyed as mighty builders (constructors of aqueducts and coliseums), and thus it seems an appropriate term to use in connection with this hardworking laborer. Yet the word Romans also reminds us that the Roman Empire once ruled the world, whereas this descendant of Roman forebears must now struggle to earn his very humble daily bread. The irony becomes even more emphatic when, in the first line, the workman is called a dago—a slang insult for a person of Italian heritage and thus typical of Sandburg’s tendency to use colloquial language for harsh and shocking effect. The “dago” is not simply a worker but a “shovelman” (l. 1): His identity is bound up with the tool he uses, and he is valued by his employers merely as an extension of that instrument. His simple meal—consisting of the alliterative “bread” and “bologna” (l. 2)—contrasts starkly with the lavish fare being eaten by the wealthy people who whiz by on the train, who are oblivious to him, his work, and their dependence on both. The comfort and beauty they enjoy depend ultimately on the labor of such people as this anonymous “dago,” and it is part of the poem’s point to make the wealthy (and all readers) aware of this undeniable but often overlooked fact.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Sandburg’s poetry has sometimes been criticized as too politically propagandistic. Is this poem guilty of that charge? If so, why? If not, why not? In particular, how do you respond to line 9?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with “Mill Town,” a poem by Genevieve Taggard. In particular, discuss the poems in terms of their tones, attitudes, and implied political stances.
3. Compare and contrast this poem with EZRA POUND’s Canto XLV. In particular, discuss the works in terms of their political and economic stances, their allusions to earlier eras, and their uses of repetition.

“Fog” (1916)

This poem compares the approach and departure of fog in an urban port to the approach and departure of a small, quiet cat.

In contrast to Sandburg’s often loud, boisterous, even hectoring political poems, this one is brief, cryptic, and impressionistic. In style and theme it has much in common with the work of the so-called imagists—writers (such as Amy Lowell and Ezra Pound) who believed that the poet’s responsibility was to use quick, vivid images to convey an indelible mood by implication rather than by overt statement. Sandburg’s poem fits this definition almost perfectly, although he sets himself the difficult task of trying to paint a vivid picture of a vague, indefinite subject. The brevity of the lines, like the brevity of the poem as a whole, is appropriate to this task. The simple diction, the focus on a single metaphor (comparing the fog to a cat), and the abrupt but quiet conclusion all seem fitting to the subject, and just as the cat quietly moves on at the end of the poem, so the poem quietly moves on after a mere six lines. Whereas Sandburg’s poetry often blatantly stresses the harshness of life, the tone of this poem is subdued, understated, and peaceful, and whereas his works often emphasize shocking images and gripping diction, this poem is gentle, simple, and plain. The lyric gains added impact by its contrasts with the very different poems that surround it; it suggests that beauty and delicacy can be found even in big cities if we simply take (or are given) the time to look.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the use of fog and cat imagery in this poem and in T. S. Eliot's "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock." In particular, discuss the kinds of tone, attitude, and mood created by the use of such imagery in each poem. Why is it significant, for instance, that Eliot's fog is yellow?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with "This Is Just to Say," a brief lyric by WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS. In particular, discuss the works in terms of structure, diction, imagery, tone, and point of view.
3. Try to write a poem of your own that resembles this one by Sandburg. Use simple phrasing, simple imagery, and just a few lines to create a vivid impression. Compare and contrast your poem with Sandburg's, discussing in particular the difficulties involved in making such a poem successful.

"Halsted Street Car" (1916)

The anonymous speaker summons cartoonists (visual artists) to draw the faces of the working people the speaker glimpses on a downtown Chicago streetcar. The poem begins by emphasizing the visual appearances of these people but ends by implying their worn-out inner moods.

If the poem "Chicago" is written in an almost epic, aggressively public tone, the mood of the present work is more intimate and lyrical. The poem is typical of Sandburg in its sympathetic focus on the hard life of the urban working class, and it is typical, too, in the various stylistic devices it uses, including emphatic verbs, colloquial diction, repeated words, and contrasts between terms that are abstract and concrete. The work begins with a vigorous summons—"Come you, cartoonists" (l. 1)—that employs direct address, alliteration, and a strongly stressed opening verb. Another emphatic verb and further alliteration appear in the second line, along with two words (me and here) that instantly create a sense of personal and physical immediacy. The speaker of the poem is himself a witness to the details he describes, and he will create verbally the very pictures he urges the cartoonists to conjure with their pencils. He wants these cartoonists to draw "faces" (l. 6)—a key word, and one he repeats constantly—but by the end of the poem he will himself have sketched not merely external visages but also internal emotions and feelings. The people on the streetcar are headed to work, and it is work—hard, physical labor—that mainly defines their lives. Their work is hardly glamorous: One of them is a "pig-sticker" (a phrase typifying Sandburg's penchant for vigorous, unconventional imagery that would have shocked the more polite poetry readers of his day), while another is an "overall factory girl" (with the word overall not only describing her cheap denim clothing but also, perhaps, suggesting through a pun her versatile skills). The fact that a young female worker is included is typical of Sandburg's common emphasis on gritty, realistic details: "girl[s]" are not exempt from the need to toil in Sandburg's world (l. 9).

Repetition (always a major technique in Sandburg's verse) is used with special effectiveness in the second half of this poem, in which the mood and tone become more abstract. Emphasis continues on the key word faces, but the appearance of the words tired and empty (for instance) in line 11 prepares us for their emphatic reappearance in the final two lines, where the speaker tells us that even after a night's sleep, these workers are still (ironically) "Tired of wishes, / Empty of dreams" (ll. 17–18). By the end of the poem the vigorous tone of the opening lines has given way to a quieter, more thoughtful, more melancholy mood, not only in the speaker's subjects but also in the speaker himself.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with "Chicago," particularly in their presentations of work, youth, and women. Also, discuss why Sandburg chooses to emphasize pigs so strongly in both poems.

2. Compare and contrast this poem with Ezra Pound's lyric "In a Station of the Metro." In particular, discuss the poems in terms of their visual techniques, their moods and tones, and their presentations of urban life.
3. Compare and contrast this poem with Robinson Jeffers's "To the Stone-Cutters." In particular, discuss the poems in terms of their presentations of labor and in terms of what they imply about the relations between manual laborers and the artists who depict them.
4. In what specific senses do you think Sandburg meant the word "cartoonists" (l. 1)? Why does the speaker want the artists to focus on faces? What do faces usually symbolize or suggest? How do the people in the poem contrast with the atmospheric conditions mentioned?

"Cool Tombs" (1918)

This poem emphasizes the finality of death by mentioning a number of famous figures in American history who now lie "in the dust, in the cool tombs" (the poem's constant refrain). The work concludes by asking whether, in the end, anything is more valuable than love, especially in the face of death.

Death is a frequent theme in Sandburg's poetry, and here the theme is obvious. All people—from the most famous to the most anonymous, from the most noble (such as Lincoln) to the most tainted (such as Grant)—are finally united by the fact of the grave. Typically, Sandburg chooses American examples to illustrate his claims, and although his focus on two noted leaders of the Union in the Civil War may seem to limit the breadth of his poem, he does manage to mention an American Indian woman (Pocahontas) before broadening the focus even further in the final section to encompass "any streetful of people." This phrase is typical of Sandburg in its emphasis on urban life and the common masses, and typical, too, is the sudden shift from this concern with everyday people going about their ordinary lives to a focus on "a hero" being celebrated with "confetti" and "tin horns." Everyone and anyone, whether hero or common human, whether Indian princess or corrupt politician, ends finally in the "cool tombs"—a phrase effective partly because of its assonance and partly because of its paradoxically combining the fact of death with the suggestion of comfort and peace. Death seems to hold no terror for this poem's speaker; nor does he seem interested in any religious consolation. He can speak shockingly but dispassionately of Lincoln's being "shoveled into the tombs" (l. 1), but he can also appreciate the beauty of Pocahontas's body. His attitude seems predominantly secular: The spirit seems to die with the flesh (although there is a slight hint that the mind of Pocahontas may somehow survive in some form). Ultimately it is love (the final section implies) that may be the closest to true happiness anyone experiences in life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the presentation of death in this poem and in WALLACE STEVENS's "Sunday Morning." In particular, discuss the relations of death and beauty, death and religion, and death and love.
2. Compare and contrast this poem with HART CRANE's lyric "At Melville's Tomb." In particular, discuss the poems in terms of their diction, form, imagery, accessibility, and effectiveness. Which poem appeals to you more, and why?
3. Compare and contrast the attitudes toward death implied by this poem and by Philip Larkin's lyric "Aubade." In particular, discuss the poems in terms of tone, point of view, imagery, and final implications.
4. Discuss the use of the refrain in this poem. How and why is it effective, and how and why does the constant repetition of the phrase reinforce one of the major themes of the work? Discuss the final variation of the refrain. What is the effect of the alteration?

"Grass" (1918)

This poem, spoken by the grass that covers and eventually obscures the common graves of common soldiers, implies the waste caused by war by mentioning the sites of famous battles both in Europe and in the United States. Ultimately (the grass asserts) no one remembers the dead when the grass has done its job.

Beginning (as he often does) with an emphatic, heavily accented verb, Sandburg implies the sheer numbers of the dead, who are treated as so much mere flesh to be “shovel[ed]” (l. 2) and who are thus robbed of their individuality. Just as Sandburg often deals in his poems with the masses of the living, so he deals here with the masses of the dead, killed in famous battles but now forgotten as the unique persons they once were. Significantly, no individual names are mentioned (as they are in “Cool Tombs”); the dead (both those whose sides were victorious and those whose sides suffered defeat) are united in their common anonymity and oblivion. Using Sandburg’s common technique of repetition, the grass repeatedly urges that the bodies be “pile[d]” (ll. 1, 4, 5), and, in the same way, the poem itself piles the name of one famous battlefield on top of another. The bodies (in a typical bit of Sandburgian contrast) are both “pile[d] . . . high” and “Shovel[ed] under” (ll. 2, 6). Meanwhile, grass—which we normally associate with life, with gentle growth, and with peacefulness—here seems (ironically enough) almost aggressive, malevolent, energetic, and brusque. The simple language, the direct address, the quoted questions, and the emphatic monosyllables of the final line all contribute to the force and power of this ironically memorable work. In the very act of seeming to extol forgetfulness and oblivion, the poem undercuts its surface message, implying that the dead should never be forgotten and suggesting also an understated protest against the waste of war.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with Wilfred Owen’s “Dulce et Decorum Est.” In particular, discuss the poems in terms of their speakers, their attitudes, their imagery, and their effectiveness as antiwar poems.
2. Compare and contrast this poem with Wallace Stevens’s “The Death of a Soldier.” In particular, discuss the poems in terms of their forms, diction, syntax (especially repetition and brevity), and treatments of religious consolation.
3. Compare and contrast this poem with Randall Jarrell’s poem “The Death of the Ball-Turret Gunner.” In particular, discuss the works in terms of their points of view, their imagery, and their attitudes toward death.
4. Discuss the pattern implied in the battles mentioned; how are they organized, chronologically and geographically? Why is Sandburg careful to mention battles in Europe as well as one in America? Discuss the special significance, for him and his contemporaries, of the battles mentioned in line 5.

“Prairie Waters by Night” (1918)

This impressionistic poem describes the sights, sounds, and moods evoked by its titular subject, including the sounds of birds, the sights of old stones, and moods of drowsy peace.

If Sandburg’s verse is often associated with the hustle and bustle of urban life and the turmoil and even exploitation of industrial workers, this poem typifies a different aspect of his creativity: his frequent focus on the pastoral beauties of the midwestern prairie. With its long, lazy lines; its catalog of vivid images; its repeated phrases; its emphasis on comforting personification; and its stress on the gentle aspects of nature, this is one of Sandburg’s most romantic and most Whitmanesque poems. As the romantics do, Sandburg here offers a vision of natural loveliness—a landscape almost Edenic in its peace, tranquillity, and quiet beauty. As Walt Whitman does, Sandburg here tosses conventional poetic forms, meters, and rhythms aside, letting his ideas and images dictate the shape of his work. Just as the poem’s mood is relaxed, so is its form. Yet even though the poem almost seems at times to approach the level of prose, it contains enough heightened language to give it the complexity we usually associate with poetry. Among its more obviously “poetic” devices are its use of alliteration (as in the second

- Carl Sandburg Website. Available online. URL: <http://www.carlsandburg.net>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Crowder, Richard. Carl Sandburg. New York: Twayne, 1964.
- . "Sandburg, Carl." In St. James Reference Guide to English Literature: 20th-Century Poetry. Edited by James Vinson, 398–401. Chicago: St. James, 1985.
- Golden, Harry. Carl Sandburg. Cleveland: World, 1961.
- Niven, Penelope. Carl Sandburg: A Biography. New York: Scribner, 1991.
- Sandburg, Carl. Complete Poems. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and World, 1950.
- "Sandburg, Carl." In Library of Literary Criticism: Modern American Literature. 3rd ed. Edited by Dorothy Nyren, 416–420. New York: Ungar, 1964.
- Yanella, Philip. The Other Carl Sandburg. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1996.
- Robert C. Evans

GERTRUDE STEIN (1874–1946)

It is always a mistake to be plain-spoken.

(qtd. in Bridgman 91)

Gertrude Stein was born on February 3, 1874, to Daniel Stein and his wife, Amelia, who had four other surviving children. Although Gertrude was born in Allegheny, Pennsylvania, she lived there only briefly, for by that autumn her father had moved his family to Austria for business. Although Daniel Stein often returned to the United States, his wife and children stayed in Europe, living in Vienna from 1874 to 1878 and in Paris from 1878 to 1879. Eventually everyone moved to East Oakland, California, in 1880, where Daniel pursued various business interests. Gertrude's relations with her parents, however, were never particularly close; her greatest bond was with her brother Leo, her elder by two years. She was always an intelligent and bookish child (once worrying that she would eventually run out of things to read), and even as a small girl she showed some talent for writing, although she never officially graduated from high school. The deaths of her mother in 1888 and of her father in 1891 left her even more closely attached than before to Leo, and when he began attending Harvard in 1892, Gertrude followed in 1893. She entered the Harvard Annex (soon rechristened Radcliffe College), and for the next four years she was a well-regarded student of philosophy and psychology, studying with such notables as George Santayana and William James. Even when she was an undergraduate her writing, punctuation, thinking, and behavior were unconventional; nor was she conventionally attractive (particularly because of her weight), but she made friends easily and impressed her teachers with her promise. By the time she received her B.A. in 1898, she had already entered medical school at Johns Hopkins University and seemed set on a career as a physician.

By this time Stein seems to have realized that she was a lesbian, and she was also becoming increasingly bored with medicine. Having failed four courses at Hopkins, she decided to abandon her medical studies. During the next few years (partly to escape an unsuccessful love affair), she traveled in Europe with Leo, with whom she shared a growing interest in art. While briefly back in America in 1903, she started work on the book that would eventually grow into her huge novel The Making of Americans, and then, after having returned to Europe to live with Leo in Paris, she composed a brief novel, Q.E.D., a partly autobiographical account of a lesbian triangle. With inherited money, she and Leo began buying modern paintings, acquiring (over the next few years) work by artists who would later become extremely famous, such as Delacroix, Toulouse-Lautrec, Manet, Degas, Cézanne, Matisse, and especially Picasso. Meanwhile, Stein satisfied her own creative urges by working (in 1904) on a short novel called Fernhurst and by producing (in 1905–06) a collection of stories called Three Lives, a book still considered one of her most important. She also continued working on her mammoth novel The Making of Americans, but she was now becoming even more noted for her friendships (especially with Picasso, who painted a famous portrait of her) and for the parties she and Leo hosted in their Paris apartment—parties attended by many notable modern painters, writers, thinkers, and their admirers. Stein, it was widely agreed, had an extremely lively mind, a pungent wit, and excellent taste as a connoisseur of art, and the apartment's walls were soon festooned with paintings that made it one of the most noteworthy collections in the city, if not the world. By 1907 Stein had increasingly become a champion of the latest developments in Picasso's style, much to the growing annoyance of her brother, whose tastes were less radical. By 1907, as well, Stein had met the person who would soon displace Leo as the most important figure in her personal life: Alice B. Toklas.

Toklas, who had grown up in San Francisco, had there met relatives of Stein's, who had shown her paintings by Matisse and had thus stimulated her interest in visiting Paris. After Toklas arrived in France, she and Stein quickly became friends, and by 1908 they were essentially a couple. Alice volunteered to type the enormous manuscript of The Making of Americans, while Stein herself began to write in ever-more-unconventional ways, beginning (for instance) a series of abstract word portraits of numerous friends, including Toklas herself. Meanwhile, Stein's Three Lives was finally published in New York in 1909 at her own expense, and some of the few people who read it were struck by its originality, especially in its middle section. Meanwhile, Stein's relationship with Toklas was growing increasingly close as her relations with Leo became increasingly strained. By the end of 1910 Toklas had moved in with Stein, becoming (essentially) her de facto wife and all-around helpmate. In 1911 Stein finally finished The Making of Americans, even as she continued working on her various word portraits of friends or acquaintances; two of these, "Matisse" and "Picasso," were published in a magazine in 1912, the same year in which another portrait (of the wealthy Mabel Dodge) was published in book form at its subject's expense. Stein and Toklas traveled in Europe in 1912 and in 1913 visited England, where Stein hoped (without success) to find a publisher. During 1913 Stein also wrote her first play (What Happened), but the year's most significant event was her final break with Leo, who took his paintings, moved to Italy, and never met or spoke with his sister again. He could not abide her growing enthusiasm for cubist painting; nor could he tolerate her increasing independence and autonomous fame. Although Gertrude had begun as Leo's follower, she now considered herself a true and independent genius.

In 1913 Stein published one of her most notorious works, Tender Buttons, a three-part collection of poetic meditations on objects, food, and rooms. By conventional standards these works (like many of her other recent writings) seemed ponderously impenetrable and barely coherent; they were full of repetitions, wordplay, violations of standard grammar, and an absence of any obvious logic. Many readers considered them annoyingly nonsensical, while others (particularly Stein herself) regarded them as cutting-edge innovations in perception and expression. Clearly they were comparable to the similarly radical innovations in painting, sculpture, music, and indeed almost all the arts that were occurring at this time; "modernism," in other words, was now in full swing. And then the war began: In 1914 the conflict that soon became known as the Great War or World War I was unleashed, with massive destruction descending on Europe. Stein and Toklas were in England at the time, visiting the philosopher Alfred North Whitehead (whom Stein considered, along with herself and Picasso, another genius), but by October the two women were back in Paris. In 1915 they moved to Spain for a year, but by 1916, when the tide seemed to have turned against the Germans, the women returned to Paris, where they soon began volunteering to deliver supplies for an organization designed to aid the French wounded. After the end of the war, in 1918, Stein and Toklas (who had been awarded medals for their volunteer service) eventually resumed something like their old routine, although now they were increasingly visited by young writers (such as ERNEST HEMINGWAY) who arrived to imbibe Stein's wine and wisdom. Affable, opinionated, and the friend of practically anyone who counted in the modern arts (especially in Paris), she enjoyed a growing reputation not only as a patron and connoisseur but as a writer herself. In 1922 she published a collection of prose, poems, and dramas called Geography and Plays, with a foreword by SHERWOOD ANDERSON, who was one of her swelling band of admirers. More and more, she was the subject of written tributes, admiring photographs, and the attention of sculptors and painters.

In 1924 Stein's epic novel The Making of Americans was partly printed in several issues of the magazine Transatlantic Review, and then in 1925 the entire book was published in a subsidized edition. During this same year Stein's circle of contacts expanded to include F. SCOTT FITZGERALD and his wife, Zelda, as well as Edith Sitwell, the English poet. Stein had already met WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS and T. S. ELIOT the year before, and in 1926 her fame was such that she was invited to lecture at both Cambridge and Oxford universities. During that same year she published not only this lecture ("Composition as Explanation") but also an illustrated book with the typical Steinian title "A Book Concluding with As a Wife Has a Cow, A Love Story." In 1927 she produced the libretto for an opera by Virgil Thomson called Four Saints in Three Acts, wrote a lyrical prose work titled Lucy Church Amiably, and continued producing her prose portraits, all the while maintaining her ongoing interest in befriending, cultivating, and gossiping with the newest writers, painters, and other artists. In 1928 she self-published a collection called Useful Knowledge, continued composing a work titled How to Write, and witnessed the publication of her book titled A Village [:] Are You Ready Not Yet. Meanwhile, Lucy Church Amiably appeared in 1930. Ironically, her friendship with the French writer Georges Hugnet ended when in 1931 she published Before the Flowers of Friendship Faded Friendship Faded, which Hugnet considered an insufficiently accurate translation of one of his works. In 1932 Stein's How to Write appeared in print, as did a collection called Operas and Plays. It was toward the end of that year, however, that she composed the work that would soon make her a best-selling writer: The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas. With typical cleverness, Stein here adopts the pose and persona of Toklas to write mainly about her own life, opinions, and friendships, including (of course) the important link with Toklas herself. When the book was printed in America in 1933, Stein suddenly won the fame she had long coveted. Written in an unusually accessible style and full of wit, gossip, and personal memories of the growth of modernism, the book made Stein a celebrity in her home country—a figure whom the press loved to quote, mock, bait, and debate.

By 1934 Stein was off to America for a highly publicized and highly successful lecture tour. She was widely interviewed, spoke often, was invited to the White House, and made new friends, including THORNTON WILDER. Her opera Four Saints in Three Acts was successfully staged, a shorter version of The Making of Americans was issued, and a collection called Portraits and Prayers was published. Also in 1935 she lectured, visited Hollywood, returned to her childhood home in Oakland, and published not only Lectures in America but also Narration (consisting of further lectures). In 1936 she spoke again at Oxford and Cambridge, collaborated with the composer Lord Gerald Berners, befriended (and posed for) the photographer Cecil Beaton, and then witnessed the publication (in 1936) of The Geographical History of America, followed in 1937 by Everybody's Autobiography (an account of her travels in the United States). In 1938 she published Picasso (in French) and completed a play called Doctor Faustus Lights the Lights, and in 1939 she published a children's book titled The World Is Round. By this time, however, the world was not (unfortunately) peaceful, and when the Second World War broke out in September 1939, Stein seems to have been caught by surprise. Although urged to leave France, she and Toklas stayed behind, and initially Stein (despite being Jewish) seems to have felt real sympathy for the French collaborators with the Germans. She published Paris France in 1940 and Ida: A Novel in 1941, and she began work on a novel called Mrs. Reynolds as well as on a memoir called Wars I Have Seen. In 1944 American troops liberated the small village where Stein and Toklas were living, and Stein now won even greater publicity, not only as a famous writer but as a kind of mother hen to the American troops. Wars I Have Seen was published in 1945, the same year Stein lectured in Germany, Paris, and Brussels (often speaking to soldiers), and the year in which she began an opera libretto called The Mother of Us All. In 1946 she completed that libretto, heard of the production of her play Yes Is for a Very Young Man back in California, and published an account of American troops called Brewsie and Willie. By midsummer, however, she was diagnosed with cancer, and on July 27 she died during surgery. On October 22 she was buried in a Paris cemetery, to be joined there in 1967 by the body of Alice B. Toklas, her long-beloved mate.

Three Lives* (1909)

Three Lives, which was begun in 1905 and published in 1909, is one of Stein's earliest and most accessible books; it depicts the lives of three lower-class women, including two German immigrant servants ("The Good Anna" and "The Gentle Lena") whose relatively brief stories frame a much longer central section ("Melanctha") that emphasizes the romantic relationships of a young black woman. All three tales end in the early deaths of the central characters, and all three also stress the hard lives these women lead because of their bleak circumstances. The book reflects Stein's intense interest in character types and in repetitious patterns of behavior—patterns reflected in Stein's own deliberately repetitious style of writing.

"The Good Anna" begins with an apparently conventional opening describing the relations between Anna and various tradesmen as well as her relations with her employer, Miss Mathilda, whose household Anna manages. The style at first seems simple, direct, and plain, and the key to the story's tone is set in the fourth paragraph, which asserts that "Anna led an arduous and troubled life" (69). Although Stein's later stylistic trademark of repeated phrases already begins to appear in the next two paragraphs, at first the tale emphasizes Anna's colloquial, colorful speech; her comic obsession with "canine chastity" (70); and a fairly straightforward plot involving the succession of assistants with whom she often finds fault. As the title suggests, Stein tends to be interested in character types, often using single adjectives to sum up a person's essential traits, as when she describes two subordinate servants by saying that the "pretty, cheerful Lizzie was succeeded by a melancholy Molly" (71). Stein conveys the monotonous lives of the women she depicts, including their minor spats and simmering tensions, and the tale reveals its author's ear for both dialect and dialogue. The characters' ethnic backgrounds are often stressed, so that Stein's people often seem to be representative types rather than highly distinctive individuals. The story's style is rarely vivid, powerful, or engaging; instead, Stein intentionally uses dry, unadorned phrasing to portray predictable, unexciting lives. Often the diction seems so basic and stripped down that it sounds almost awkward, as if written by a foreigner with a limited command of English: "It was pleasant that everything for one was done, but annoying often that what one wanted most just then, one could not have when one had foolishly demanded and not suggested one's desire" (77–78). The strange inversions, the repetition of one, the absence of any kind of concrete, enlivening detail—all these traits would become increasingly typical of Stein's style, and all are already apparent in "The Good Anna."

The second part of "The Good Anna" takes us back into the protagonist's past, briefly describing her time in Germany and her immigration to the United States. Here as before, Stein tends to focus on externals: Anna is described as being "of solid lower middle-class south german stock" (78), while her brother is depicted as "a heavy, lumbering, good natured german man, full of the infirmity that comes of excess of body" (79). Despite all of Stein's proclaimed interest in psychological characteristics, she rarely in this opening section of Three Lives conveys or stimulates much interest in the distinctiveness or complexity of the people she depicts—probably because she felt that few people were truly distinctive or genuinely complex. Anna tends to regard other persons as mere types (as in her thoughts on boys versus girls [79–80]), and she herself tends to be treated as such by Stein. Here as so often elsewhere, Stein shows little interest in creating excitement, suspense, or even a strong sense of a developing “plot”; there is no powerful feeling of forward movement, only the humdrum, everyday impression that this-happened-and-then-this-happened-and-the-good-Anna-reacted-this-way-or-that way. By writing this way, Stein was deliberately reacting against the conventional expectation of a “well-made tale”; her method was revolutionary precisely because she was rejecting and stripping away many of the standard elements past writers had used to create and sustain readers’ interest, such as exotic settings, shocking events, “profound” themes, lyrical phrasing, or characters who seemed larger than life. Instead she presents an “ordinary” character who lives a rather unexciting life, who thinks rather predictable thoughts, who expresses herself in rather standard speech, and who is treated—by her creator and by other characters—as a “type” rather than as a fully complicated personality. Stein repudiates the often flowery diction, the often lofty moralism, and the often high-minded characterization that make bad Victorian fiction so difficult to read; instead she chooses a style and methods that are simple almost to the point of being simplistic. Nevertheless, in the process she helped create a new way of writing that other authors (such as Hemingway) would exploit with much greater popular success.

If part 1 of “The Good Anna” focuses mainly on Anna’s relations with other servants, part 2 deals chiefly with her relations with various employers. Part 3, the brief final section, emphasizes the period when she makes her living by taking in boarders. Eventually, having grown increasingly poor and increasingly unhealthy, she dies, and the narrative ends as quietly and abruptly as it began. Stein suggests no larger meaning or significance for Anna’s commonplace life; she offers no grand interpretation of its purpose or even its lack of purpose. Anna dies as she lived: without fanfare, without any close family, with just one friend in attendance—in short, essentially alone. Yet Stein emphasizes no sense of pathos; she simply describes plain facts.

The second section of Three Lives—“Melanctha”—is widely considered one of Stein’s best pieces of writing. It is one of the first works by a white American author to focus so intently and exclusively on the lives of black characters, and although the story has been accused (even by some of Stein’s greatest admirers) of exploiting and perpetuating racist stereotypes, it has also been broadly praised for capturing so effectively the diction and rhythms of African-American speech. The story describes the friendship of Melanctha Herbert (whose first name means dark flower) and Rose Johnson. It also describes Melanctha’s romantic involvements with a young doctor named Jeff Campbell and then with an unsettled gambler named Jem Richards. The potentially offensive nature of Stein’s narrative is apparent from its opening paragraphs, in which Rose is described as “a real black, tall, well built, sullen, stupid, child-like, good looking negress” and as a character who “was never joyous with the earth-born, boundless joy of negroes” (124). Anyone writing such sentences today would instantly be suspected of racism, but although Stein probably did share some of the racist preconceptions of her era, her phrasing here is also typical of her more general tendency to view all her characters (both black and white) in terms of somewhat crude external stereotypes. Fortunately the most important aspect of her depiction of Melanctha is not her almost cartoonish description of the woman’s external traits (“Melanctha Herbert was a graceful, pale yellow, intelligent, attractive negress . . . [who] had been half made with real white blood” [125]) but rather her splendid ability to convey the rhythms of this woman’s thought and speech.

The most interesting portions of “Melanctha” involve the slowly growing affection between the title character and Dr. Jeff Campbell, whom she meets when he helps treat her sick and dying mother. As usual, Stein introduces Campbell with her standard list of simple, even simplistic adjectives and her typical neglect of common punctuation: “Dr. Jefferson Campbell was a serious, earnest, good young joyous doctor. He liked to take care of everybody and he loved his own colored people. . . . He sang when he was happy, and he laughed, and his was the free abandoned laughter that gives the warm broad glow to negro sunshine" (143). If these sentences had been written by another author, we might suspect the writer of having some ironic fun at the expense of a simple-minded, racist narrator, but such broad-brush comments about ethics, ethnicity, and personality typify the ways Stein describes practically everyone. The story achieves real distinction, however, during the long middle section, in which the dialogues between Jeff and Melanctha are quoted at length. Here, for instance, is Melanctha addressing Jeff early in their relationship:

You are certainly a very good man, Dr. Campbell, I certainly do feel that more every day I see you. Dr. Campbell, I sure do want to be friends with a good man like you, now I know you. You certainly, Dr. Campbell, never do things like other men, that's always ugly for me. Tell me true, Dr. Campbell, how you feel about being always friends with me. I certainly do know, Dr. Campbell, you are a good man, and if you say you will be friends with me, you certainly never will go back on me, the way so many kinds of them do to every girl they ever get to like them. Tell me for true, Dr. Campbell, will you be friends with me. (156)

In passages such as this, many of the odd tics that typified Stein's phrasing (including the repetitions, the comma splices, the simplistic vocabulary, the strange grammar, and the imprecise punctuation, to name just a few) seem perfectly appropriate to the characters she depicts. Much more than is true of "The Good Anna" or "The Gentle Lena," one emerges from "Melanctha" with a strong sense of the distinctive personality of the central character, partly because in "Melanctha" Stein herself often keeps quiet and lets her heroine talk for such long stretches. The result is a fascinating character portrait—certainly one of the most genuinely effective and compulsively readable pieces of writing Stein ever produced.

Unfortunately for Melanctha, her relationship with Jeff Campbell does not last. She loses interest in a man she knows is good and decent (or, as Stein puts it in her typically fractured English: "Melanctha was all ready now to find new ways to be in trouble. And yet Melanctha Herbert never wanted not to do right. Always Melanctha Herbert wanted peace and quiet, and always she could only find new ways to get excited" [217]). New excitement enters her life in the person of Jem Richards, a normally lucky gambler who soon gives her a ring and promises marriage. However, when Jem's luck fails, he sours on making a permanent commitment, and Melanctha's attempts to pressure him boomerang. Over and over again Stein repeats that Melanctha's passion for Jem has made her "mad and foolish" (230), and indeed when he leaves her, she even contemplates suicide. Suicide, however, would be too dramatic and exciting a plot development for a story by Stein, and so Melanctha, as does Anna before her, merely dies an unseen, uneventful, anticlimactic death, and once more Stein deliberately points to no moral, draws no conclusions, and indeed seems rather unmoved by the loss. A different kind of writer would have made us feel the lonely pain of Melanctha's passing or would have drawn some larger parallel between Melanctha's life and the existence of humans in general. Stein, however, deliberately avoids pathos or the suggestion of any larger meaning. Her method is one of laconic understatement and plain restraint. In creating Melanctha Herbert, however, and in letting her speak with Jeff Campbell at such great length, Stein invented some of the most memorably eloquent characters of recent American literature.

The third and final portion of Three Lives, titled "The Gentle Lena," resembles the opening section by focusing on a German immigrant servant. The portrait begins just as one might expect, with Stein's typical list of sweeping adjectives: "Lena was patient, gentle, sweet and german" (240). Once more, too, the phrasing is simple to the point of sometimes seeming banal, as when Stein describes Lena's place of employment: "This place Lena had found very good. There was a pleasant, unexacting mistress and her children, and they all liked Lena very well” (240). Stein’s style in such passages is anything but concrete, precise, or gripping; instead, it seems colorless and abstract, perhaps to suggest the relatively drab and colorless lives such characters lead. Stein describes the predictable relations Lena shares with her fellow servants, her employers, and her employers’ children. Excitement (of a sort) enters Lena’s life only when her employer decides that Lena should marry and arranges a match with the parents of Herman Kreder. A lethargic but compliant young man, he has no real interest in marrying but seems willing, at first, to follow his parents’ orders: “He did not like to see girls and he did not want to have to have one always near him,” but “Herman always did everything that his father and mother wanted and now they wanted that he should be married” (251). Small hints of suspense and uncertainty, and even a bit of pathos, enter the story briefly when Herman absconds before the wedding, but soon he is retrieved and the match occurs. Lena and Herman both perform their duties; they move in with Herman’s parents; and, despite his mother’s scolding of Lena, Herman learns to value her presence (or, as Stein puts it, “He did not care very much about her but she never was a bother to him being there around him” [263]). Another kind of writer might have milked this relationship for a good deal of pathos or even comedy, but neither sympathy nor laughter seems much on Stein’s mind. Or, again, a different kind of writer might have presented Lena’s story as an example of the oppression of women, or might even have presented Herman himself as a victim of his environment and upbringing. Stein, however, seems uninterested in any such “messages,” and the tale’s only real surprise occurs when it emerges that the asexual Herman wants to be a father. Lena, typically, does her duty, and the story’s final pages describe the arrivals of four children. During the fourth delivery the child dies, and even “Lena had grown very pale and sicker. When it was all over Lena had died, too, and nobody knew just how it had happened to her” (270). Not that anyone (including the narrator) seems to care about her death or miss her much; in the story’s final sentence, we are told that “Herman Kreder was very well content now and he always lived very regular and peaceful, and with every day just like the next one, always alone now with his three good, gentle children” (271). Stein’s phrasing, as usual, is very plain and very simple and very repetitious and very frequent in its use of the word very and it is very common for it to be using very bland adjectives like content and regular and peaceful and these no doubt are some of the very reasons that Stein had such a very strong influence on writers who were looking for a very different way of writing than had been usual before Gertrude Stein.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine Stein’s descriptions of the lives of German immigrants. How does she use dialect to depict them and other characters in the book? How does she evoke sympathy for them?
2. Compare and contrast Stein’s depiction of Melanctha with ZORA NEALE HURSTON’S depiction of Janie Crawford in Their Eyes Were Watching God. How do the women resemble each other or differ in their dialect, their backgrounds, their aspirations, their achievements, and their relations with men?
3. Richard Wright was a great admirer’s of Stein’s “Melanctha.” Read his story “Long Black Song” and then compare and contrast the two works in terms of their use of dialogue, plot, and theme. How and why does Wright use suspense differently than Stein? How do the writers seem to differ in their motives and purposes?

Tender Buttons (1914)

As its title suggests, Tender Buttons is full of odd combinations—strange juxtapositions involving words, phrases, and sentences that ordinarily seem to have little relationship. Divided into three sections (titled, respectively, “Objects,” “Food,” and “Rooms”), the work appears to be a series of brief, disconnected prose paragraphs, although it is often regarded as a collection of short prose poems. Here as in so many of her other works, Stein challenges conventional notions of genre (in other words, the different kinds of literature), as well as traditional ideas about sentence structure, grammar, logic, punctuation, and the importance of conveying meaning.

Perhaps the most profitable way to read Tender Buttons (as well as much of the rest of Stein's work) is as a series of experiments in language. In this text as in so much else that Stein composed, "meaning" in the conventional sense is relatively unimportant; she is not so much trying to convey information or ideas as she is attempting to startle, provoke, disconcert, entertain, and even frustrate. She wants readers to pay attention to individual words and to their unexpected, even apparently "nonsensical" combinations; she wants readers to linger over sounds, to listen for puns, to play (and/or watch Stein play) with words as one plays with toys: for the sheer pleasure of the activity rather than for any more "serious," "larger" purpose. Admirers of Tender Buttons find it a fascinating exercise in linguistic inventiveness; they extol its unpredictability, its suggestiveness, its microscopic attention to the tiny details of daily living, its rejection of the tired conventions of "normal," "rational" thought and inherited rhetoric. Dissenters, on the other hand, consider the work mostly monotonous, lumbering, dull, contrived, pretentious, emotionally barren, and finally both uninspired and uninspiring.

Tender Buttons has been usefully compared to the kind of abstraction common in many arts during Stein's era: Just as the cubist painters were challenging traditional methods and subjects of Western painting, and just as the 12-tone composers were undermining traditional techniques of Western music, so Stein and other writers were trying to break free of the standard practices of Western creative writing. Thus, the "poems" Stein creates in Tender Buttons do not seem poems in the traditional sense: They lack any regular patterns of rhyme or meter; they resemble short fragments of prose; and they lack any obvious coherence of theme, any standard pattern of internal development, and any clear sense of an overall "plot." It would be difficult to argue, for instance, that the fragments depend on their present arrangement to be intelligible: The current "shape" of the work could presumably be altered without doing any real damage to its "larger meaning," precisely because Stein seems uninterested in meaning of that sort. Likewise, it would be difficult to imagine the grounds on which any particular interpretation of the work could be challenged. Numerous critics, for instance, have attempted to offer explications of individual sections, but these explications frequently have little in common; nor do their authors seem engaged in meaningful dialogue, partly because Tender Buttons does not encourage such exchange. How would it be possible to argue, for instance, that any particular interpretation was "correct" or "incorrect," "adequate" or "inadequate," "convincing" or "unconvincing"? For good or ill, Tender Buttons is not amenable to such discussion. Each reader reacts to it individually, and there seem to be no means to assert that any particular reaction is "valid" or "invalid." Faced with a text like Tender Buttons, such criteria seem outmoded or pointless. And perhaps such "pointlessness" (ironically) is precisely the point.

Tender Buttons reveals Stein's ability to focus on any particular thing (including the most common domestic objects) and use that thing as an occasion for meditation and writing. The work has often been compared to a collage, and it has also often been compared to a series of painted "still lives"—the kind of painting that centers on objects but in which the objects themselves are less important than the painter's treatment of them. In Tender Buttons as elsewhere, the main "theme" of Stein's writing seems to be writing itself; the main subject is not so much any of the things she "describes" but rather the movements of her mind (erratic, associative, dissociative) as she contemplates those objects. The text is fragmented, open-ended, unresolved, and unresolvable; it depends on a method of constant surprise, of continuously subverted expectations. (Of course, once one begins to expect that one's expectations will constantly be subverted, the sense of surprise diminishes and monotony may set in.) It is a text that will intrigue many readers and frustrate many others; it is, in short, Stein at her most Steinian.

The challenges posed by Tender Buttons are apparent from the very first item in the "OBJECTS" section:

A carafe, that is a blind glass

A kind in glass and a cousin, a spectacle and nothing strange a single hurt color and an arrangement in a system to pointing. All this and not ordinary, not unordered in not resembling. The difference is spreading.

What do we make of this? The short answer is “pretty much whatever we want.” The “poem” seems to be a series of relatively free associations, and it certainly seems to spark such associations in the minds of many of Stein’s more admiring readers. The first two words of the title seem simple enough: They seem to promise that the “poem” will provide a description of an open-topped glass flask typically used for serving wine. The next two words (that is) seem to reinforce this promise: They seem to promise a clarifying explanation. The words that follow, however, are not especially clear or explanatory: In what senses is a carafe a “blind glass”? Well, certainly a carafe is (usually) made of glass, but in what senses is a carafe “blind”? Perhaps in the sense that when it is filled with dark red wine it cannot be seen through, although blind is usually a word applied to someone or something normally capable of seeing rather than to someone or something normally capable of being seen (or seen through). Already in the title, then, Stein has achieved her usual effect of being puzzling or provocative—an effect many of her readers find appealing.

When we move into the body of the “poem” itself, we discover that kind rhymes with blind—a fact commentators frequently note, although why such rhyming is important or how it contributes to the effectiveness of the “poem” is rarely made clear. The first four words of the body of the “poem” seem to continue the definition and explanation begun in the title (a carafe is indeed usually made of glass), but the word in is puzzling: If Stein had said that a carafe was a “kind of glass,” the statement would make more immediate sense (although even then it would not be conventionally clear, since a carafe is actually a kind of thing that is usually made of glass). Perhaps Stein means to suggest that a carafe is a kind of thing that usually finds expression in the form of glass; in any case, in a mere four words she has once again disrupted our normal expectations of how an English sentence usually works. Next the carafe is called “a cousin.” Commentators usually note the alliteration of carafe, kind, and cousin, although once again they often fail to explain what larger purpose, if any, the alliteration serves or how it contributes to the poem’s effectiveness or how it adds (dare one say it?) to the beauty of the piece. Commentators also often note the possible pun on the word spectacle, which can suggest “glass” put to a different “kind” of use (that is, in eyeglasses, or “spectacles,” which work against blindness). This alleged pun can also suggest that the carafe is an object of fascinated sight (a “spectacle” in the sense of being a “public spectacle”). What, however, is the point of such a pun? How is it effective? Is it in any way beautiful? Does it contribute to the overall impact of this “poem”? These are questions each reader must answer for herself or himself.

No sooner does the text describe the carafe as a “spectacle” (in the second sense of the pun) than it immediately asserts that the carafe is “nothing strange.” Thus the work seems to offer a paradox: We are presented with something that is unusual but also not unusual. The word strange is later echoed, through assonance and a kind of internal rhyme, by the word arrangement. Moreover, the idea that the carafe is “nothing strange” is later complicated by the assertion that it is also “not ordinary,” and then the sound and sense of that phrase are themselves played with in the subsequent assertion that while the carafe is “not ordinary,” it is also “not unordered.” Thus, the carafe is in some ways peculiar (it is “not ordinary”), but it is also not chaotic (“not unordered”). While noting all these kinds of echoes of sounds and all these playings with sense, commentators also often note the constant repetition of not, if only because such repetition is one of the mainstays of Stein’s style. Finally, the opening paragraph (or stanza?) of “OBJECTS” closes with an assertion (“The difference is spreading”) whose relation to everything that precedes it is not immediately clear, although perhaps the word difference relates to the prior reference to “not resembling.” Or perhaps not. Perhaps the “poem” ends with a broad metaphysical pronouncement. Or perhaps the reference to “difference” forecasts and foreshadows the method of the ensuing book. Who can say? How could one argue convincingly for any particular interpretation? By what criteria could one decide that any given interpretation was invalid or unconvincing? Is interpretation even necessary or appropriate in dealing with such a text? The only confident assertion one can offer is that the rest of Tender Buttons strongly resembles its opening paragraph (and so, in that sense, difference—ironically—is not spreading).

One phrase in the opening paragraph does seem (at least to me) memorable and striking: “hurt color.” Here the combination of words does seem to evoke a sharp, refreshing idea. One does not normally think of colors as capable of being “hurt,” but it is just this kind of odd combination of contrasting words, and of distinctive categories of experience, that Stein’s admirers value in her writing. The phrase “hurt color” is effective perhaps because it seems less abstract, less coldly clinical than much of Stein’s phrasing; here both the adjective and the noun seem more vivid than usual. This phrase does seem to refresh the English language in the ways Stein claimed she wanted to do (and in a way that her most famous phrase—“A rose is a rose is a rose is a rose”—may not). Commentators have suggested that “hurt color” may refer to the (bloody) red color of wine, or to the various colors of different kinds of wines—colors that may resemble the various shades of a bruise. Whatever the case, I find that “hurt color” does stick in my mind in ways that the rest of the “poem,” frankly, does not. This, of course, is purely a subjective opinion, but it is hard to see how writing like Stein’s can do much more than appeal to almost purely subjective reactions. Tender Buttons does not invite us to evaluate it by shared, conventional, traditional categories or by common standards of response. Like most of her works, it is sui generis—it is (in other words) a thing unto itself, its own kind of thing, something finally unique.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast one brief section of Tender Buttons with WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS’s poem “The Red Wheelbarrow.” How are the works similar and/or different in style, method, tone, and philosophical implication? What do they suggest about the importance of “common” objects? What do they imply about the role of the observer and describer of such objects?
2. Commentators have suggested that some aspects of Tender Buttons (including the title itself) have erotic connotations that make sense in light of Stein’s lesbianism. Read through the entire text and look for any imagery, phrasing, rhythms, and possible puns that might support such an interpretation.
3. Compare and contrast one brief section of Tender Buttons with EZRA POUND’s brief poem “In a Station of the Metro.” How do the works resemble and/or differ from one another, particularly in their use of imagery, in their structure, and in their use of grammar, punctuation, and syntax (sentence structure)? Which work is more conventionally “unified,” how is such unity achieved, and what does such unity contribute to the effectiveness of the work?

The Making of Americans (1925)

The Making of Americans, which Stein considered her most important work, is less significant for its plot than for its style and technique; it is a huge, rambling book (consisting of over 900 closely printed pages), and even some of Stein’s greatest admirers have confessed to being unable to finish it or even to stay awake while attempting to read it. Ostensibly it is a saga describing the lives of three generations of the Dehning and Hersland clans, with various Herslands resembling various members of Stein’s own family, including Stein herself; the narrative, however, is less concerned with individual personalities or individual conduct than with character types and recurrent patterns of behavior.

The full title of Stein's book—The Making of Americans: Being a History of a Family's Progress—suggests that the work is some kind of historical novel, and writing such a work may indeed have been Stein's original intention. By the time she had finished her project, however, she had deliberately violated most of the traditional conventions of novel writing, producing a work in which the story, people, setting, and themes take a distant back seat to the particularities of phrasing and to the very process of writing. Few people read The Making of Americans for its narrative; to the extent that the book is read at all, it is usually dipped into for samples of its style and for Stein's reflections on various topics. The work has been considered a kind of day book or journal rather than a standard novel; in other words, it has been regarded as a text in which Stein, over a period of years, recorded her thoughts on various characters and issues (particularly issues of writing, including the writing of this book itself) rather than as a coherent narrative. Both for Stein and for most of her readers, The Making of Americans is more important for the way it is written than for what it actually says or for any story it attempts to tell.

The book seems (and probably was) largely improvised; it follows no obvious plan and displays no obvious design. Although it is divided into five large sections, it lacks the kind of coherent structure—such as chapters of roughly equal length—that usually helps readers pace their progress through most traditional novels. Characters are introduced and then dropped for hundreds of pages, only to be reintroduced much later without fanfare or explanation. Because the book deals with different generations of two families, various characters share the same first and last names, but Stein makes little effort to distinguish one person clearly from another. As the book grew in length, so did its sentences and paragraphs; it is not unusual for a single paragraph to take up most of (or even more than) an entire page. As in most of Stein's writings, conventional rules of punctuation and capitalization are tossed aside; commas are often missing where they would usually be expected, or commas are often used where periods or semicolons might have made the sentence structure clearer. Rambling sentences sometimes consume entire paragraphs. Thus, just as an obvious structure is missing from the book as a whole, so the same kind of structure often seems missing from individual utterances. The book de-emphasizes many of the standard “literary” devices (such as imagery, metaphors, similes, dialogue, dialect, dramatic irony, foreshadowing, symbolism, wit, humor, figurative language, or descriptions of setting) that attract most readers to most novels and help sustain their interest.

The following paragraph, for instance, is relatively short and relatively conventional in its focus on character description (including inner personality traits) and on relations between characters; even in this paragraph, however, some of Stein's most typical stylistic traits are obvious:

Mr. David Hersland had it in his strongest living to be as big as all the world around him, it was in him, he was all it in him, it was to him all inside him, he was it and it was to him all always in him. This was the big feeling in him and then he was strong in beginning. This was the biggest time of his living, when this was strong in him his big feeling his being strong in beginning his keeping going even with impatient feeling in him, before all of it in him turned into impatient feeling. This was the big time in his living, and this was when his wife was still in him as a tender feeling, when his children were first beginning to have in them individual feeling. This was the time of such a big feeling in him and then he was strong in beginning. The world around him, all, every moment, in beginning, it was then and it was all in him, and he was strong then and full up with beginning. (136)

Here as so often elsewhere, Stein's choice of individual words seems simple and plain; she writes a kind of basic English, restricting herself to just a few fundamental words and then repeating them continuously. She rings constant variations on them, recombining them in almost every conceivable way until she seems to have exhausted practically every possible permutation of sound and meaning. Her style has often been compared, in this respect, to the style of grammar school primers (such as the famous Sally, Dick, and Jane books), in which a few basic words are reiterated incessantly, often to the point of maddening monotony. In this sense, her style can often seem deliberately naive and even childish, although obviously one of her intentions was the more sophisticated one of trying to force readers to puzzle out the complexities that can result when a few apparently simple terms are laid out, combined, and then endlessly recombined. Thus, although Stein's vocabulary is indeed usually simple, it is also usually anything but transparent; it is impossible to breeze through a Stein sentence, reading it quickly for any obvious "meaning." Instead, Stein tries to compel readers to linger over every word, even every syllable; she wants us to pay close attention to every single word as a word, rather than simply as the symbol of an idea. When read aloud, her sentences often have a rhythmic, hypnotic quality; they function more as a kind of music than as plain communication.

In the paragraph just quoted as so often elsewhere, Stein violates all the standard rules usually associated with effective writing. Rather than showing, she tells; rather than using dialogue to disclose feeling, she stands apart from her characters and externally describes their emotions in the most blatantly abstract language. Rather than using vivid imagery to create pictures in her readers' minds, she uses terms so general that they risk seeming imprecise and vague. (What, exactly, is a "big feeling"?) Rather than using just a few words to convey meaning efficiently and effectively, she often uses more words than plain sense seems to require—referring, for instance, to "impatient feeling" rather than "impatience." Grammatically she prefers to emphasize participles and gerunds (such as living, beginning, keeping, feeling, being, going, etc.), and the effect is to slow the pace of her paragraphs, de-emphasizing any sense of rapid action and thereby forcing the reader to linger, and almost to meditate, over every single word. Moreover, just as Stein violates the common rules of effective narrative, so she violates the standard prescriptions of normal grammar and punctuation. Comma splices and run-on sentences abound; parentheses and dashes (typically used for emphasis and clarity) are rarely employed. Semicolons rarely appear, and question marks or exclamation marks are also infrequent. Most of Stein's sentences are blandly declarative. She seems less interested in getting inside her characters' heads or hearts and letting them speak for themselves than in making external pronouncements about them. In short, Stein seems less interested in her characters (or her readers) than in Gertrude Stein: Gertrude Stein's thoughts, Gertrude Stein's style, Gertrude Stein's emotions. Many professional readers of Stein find this egotism refreshingly honest, and certainly in her obsession with her own responses to words, ideas, and behavior, Stein has given us one of the most detailed insights into the minute workings of one person's mind ever put to paper. Her proclaimed intention, in writing The Making of Americans, was to show how the American people had evolved, and she also said that she was interested in explaining the fundamental traits of a few basic personality types. In the end, however, the clearest picture that emerges from her book is a complex picture of Stein's own mind and personality, Stein's own thoughts and emotions, Stein's own struggles with language and meaning and narrative. The book, in the final analysis, is perhaps more a record of the making of Gertrude Stein than of anything else.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast The Making of Americans with another experimental novel that deals with the fortunes of several generations of the same family—WILLIAM FAULKNER's Absalom, Absalom! In particular, discuss the works in terms of their styles, themes, structures, and characterization. Which book would you more strongly recommend to a friend, and why?
2. Since Stein admired Henry James, compare and contrast The Making of Americans with his novel The Europeans. How do the works resemble and/or differ from one another in style, theme, tone, and structure? What do the works suggest about the traits of inhabitants of the "Old World" (Europe) and the "New World" (America)? Can you see any ways in which James may have influenced Stein in his methods or concerns?

3. Examine The Making of Americans in light of T. S. Eliot's famous essay "Tradition and the Individual Talent." What is Stein's relationship with the tradition of novel writing that precedes her? How does she help alter and transform that tradition? How (if at all) does Stein's work exemplify the kind of artistry Eliot calls for in that essay? How (if at all) is Stein the kind of artist Eliot admires? How might Stein have reacted to Eliot's ideas?

The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas (1933)

This book, which was Stein's most popular work and which is one of her most accessible, is initially presented as the autobiography of Toklas, her long-time companion; its central focus, however, is Stein herself, and, in its final pages, Stein's own authorship is made clear. Stein uses a generally lucid and straightforward style to recount, in gossipy, often witty anecdotes, her decades of life in Paris and her relations with many of the most famous names of modern art (including Matisse and Picasso) as well as her connections with such noted writers as Ernest Hemingway and Sherwood Anderson. Stein's personality traits (including her humorous egotism, her unconventional opinions, and her often peculiar habits of thought and expression) provide the main source of unity in a work that tacitly assumes that any event in the life of Gertrude Stein will naturally interest others.

People who knew Alice B. Toklas have claimed that Stein, in this book, expertly conveys Toklas's own habits of speech and thought—so much so, in fact, that some scholars have even suggested that Toklas herself may in fact have written the book. The consensus of opinion, however, is that Stein is indeed the author, and certainly it would have been typical of Stein to write about another person's life in a way that makes Stein the central figure. Just as Stein was able, in Three Lives, to imitate convincingly the speech patterns of a variety of African Americans and German immigrants, so in the Autobiography she was able to mimic the tone and temperament of Alice B. Toklas. The stylistic peculiarities of the book (such as its habit of jumping erratically from one topic or time to another, or its self-conscious references to the process of its own composition) are appropriate in a work that offers itself as an unfolding monologue expressing the mind and perspectives of one particular person. In writing the book, Stein not only conveyed aspects of her own life story in often interesting ways, but also created an interesting "fictional" character who also happened to be a "real" person. This kind of blending and subversion of traditional genres, as well as this kind of experimentation with style and point of view, are both typical of modern literature, but in writing the Autobiography Stein also created a work that has a generally interesting story to tell, that presents some often intriguing characters, and that is frequently appealing for its stylistic cleverness. In short, in writing the Autobiography she came closer than usual to meeting conventional standards of literary effectiveness. Although the book sometimes becomes tiring in its "this-happened-and-then-this-happened-and-then-Gertrude-Stein-said-this-about-that" comprehensiveness, there is no denying that the work is often fascinating and clever and that it is even sometimes both fun and funny.

One appealing aspect of the Autobiography is its emphasis on the personal eccentricities of both Toklas and Stein. A reader never knows quite what to expect from either of them, and thus the book attains a certain level of sustained suspense, since we can never predict what either woman may say or do. Both seem to be generally good-natured individualists who not only enjoy their own peculiarities but also seem interested in (and mostly tolerant of) the peculiarities of others. In the book's third paragraph, for instance, Stein has Toklas report of herself that "I like a view but I like to sit with my back turned to it" (659), and it is just this sort of emphasis on slightly off-kilter sensibilities that helps make the book attractive. Humor also adds to the book's appeal, as when "Toklas" reports (with Stein's typical disregard for conventional punctuation) that "I remember that once when my brother and a comrade had gone horse-back riding, one of the horses returned riderless to the hotel, the mother of the other boy began to make a terrible scene. Be calm madam, said my father, perhaps it is my son who has been killed" (660). The Autobiography is full of similarly clever anecdotes, and one senses that both Stein and Toklas saw life as a kind of droll pageant staged mainly to amuse and entertain them. Partly for this reason, the tone of the work sometimes seems superficial; rarely does much depth of feeling or any sense of tragedy or compassion or deeply personal revelation interrupt the flow of sophisticated chitchat. We never have much sense, for instance, of anything painful about the lives of two women, who were, after all, a pair of conventionally unattractive expatriate Jewish lesbians in a culture that often disdained Jews, mocked the fat and "ugly," and discriminated against gays. In fact, the most intimately personal aspects of the relation between Stein and Toklas are never discussed; their sexual identities are lightly implied but never confirmed. To expect such things from the book, however, would be to misjudge its purpose: It is, for the most part, a witty comedy (often resembling a play by Oscar Wilde) in which Stein gets all the good lines.

Stein makes little attempt to impose a conventional shape on the book or to hide the hinges that link its various parts. She is not trying to write a "standard" autobiography but to create a kind of drama, with Toklas as the only actor in a one-woman show—but a show in which Stein is always the main subject of discussion. "Toklas" is constantly telling us what she plans to tell us before she is distracted by another digression; the book thus conveys the sense of listening to an actual person talking. The Autobiography also contains many of Stein's standard stylistic tics (such as her emphasis on repetition), but in this case those traits do not seem as contrived or self-indulgent as they occasionally seem in her other works, since they appear to reflect the idiosyncratic character of "Toklas." At one point, for instance, "Toklas" says, "I was confused and I looked and I looked and I was confused" (668). Here the repetition seems effective, since it not only captures and conveys an individual personality, also re-creates and mimics the very sense of puzzlement it describes. Likewise, when "Toklas" later says that "Matisse worked every day and every day and every day and he worked terribly hard" (696), the repetition seems functional rather than arbitrary: It forces the reader to share the experience of incessant labor rather than merely reading about it. Whether or not Stein's book is factually reliable (and many of the people described in its pages instantly challenged its credibility), it certainly conveys the impression of plausibility, vitality, and real life; one comes away from it with a strong sense of what it might truly have been like to be alive in bohemian Paris in the early decades of the 20th century.

The Autobiography is full of memorable anecdotes and incisive observations, many of them involving some of the most important figures of 20th-century culture. It is hard to forget (for instance) Stein's brutally quick put-down of Ezra Pound (whose own ego was almost as large as hers): "Gertrude Stein liked him but did not find him amusing. She said he was a village explainer, excellent if you were a village, but if you were not, not" (856). Likewise, she later quotes Picasso as saying dismissively of Georges Braque (the painter) and James Joyce (the novelist), "they are the incomprehensibles whom anybody can understand" (869). One of the most often-quoted of these jibes concerns the now mostly forgotten Glenway Wescott, about whom Stein simply said, "He has a certain syrup but it does not pour" (875). Hemingway, meanwhile, is depicted as a kind of imitative, cowardly sycophant whose mysterious personal life is far more interesting than any of his books (872). Yet Stein was sometimes capable of genuine admiration for others, especially if she considered them geniuses (like her) and especially if she herself had played any role in calling them to public attention. (It also helped if the others in question had publicly praised Gertrude Stein.) Thus she expresses great regard for Picasso and for the painter Juan Gris, and her opinion of Sherwood Anderson seems to have been as high as his opinion of her. At times, however, her comments seem callous by modern standards, as when she writes, "Gertrude Stein

7. Choose a short work by Ernest Hemingway (such as the story "Hills Like White Elephants") and then, on the basis of your reading of that work, try to decide why Hemingway admired Gertrude Stein and how her method(s) of writing influenced his own style. For instance, how does the story reflect Stein's interest in repetition, in subtle revelation of character, and in a lack of conventional emphasis on story or "plot"?
8. If you had to choose one work of Stein's to recommend to a good friend, which work would you choose, and which three reasons would lead you to recommend it? Is there a work of Stein's that you do not particularly like? If so, which one is it? Explain specifically why you dislike the work; what three elements of the work do you find particularly ineffective?
9. Listen to the work of a recent minimalist musical composer, such as Philip Glass. For example, listen to his works called Einstein on the Beach and Akhnaten. How does Glass's music resemble Stein's writings, particularly in its use of repetition, variation, simplicity, and unexpected shifts?
10. Compare and contrast The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas with Richard Wright's Black Boy. How are the two works comparable or different in their themes, structures, styles, tones, and purposes? What are the ethical implications of each work; in other words, how does each work address issues of right and wrong in human conduct? How are both concerned with issues of art but in different ways? Is one work fundamentally more serious than the other? Is it fair to compare them?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Bridgman, Richard. Gertrude Stein in Pieces. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Hoffman, Michael J., ed. Critical Essays on Gertrude Stein. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1986.
- . The Development of Abstractionism in the Writings of Gertrude Stein. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1965.
- . Gertrude Stein. Boston: Twayne, 1976.
- Knapp, Bettina L. Gertrude Stein. New York: Continuum, 1990.
- Nelson, Cary. "Modern American Poetry: Gertrude Stein." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/Maps/poets/s_z/stein/stein.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Reid, B. L. Art by Subtraction: A Dissenting Opinion of Gertrude Stein. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1958.
- Stein, Gertrude. The Making of Americans: Being a History of a Family's Progress. Normal, Ill.: Dalkey Archive Press, 1995.
- . Writings 1903–1932: Q.E.D., Three Lives, Portraits and Other Short Works, The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas. Edited by Catharine R. Stimpson and Harriet Chessman. New York: Library of America, 1998.
- Stendhal, Renate, ed. Gertrude Stein in Words and Pictures: A Photobiography. Chapel Hill, N.C.: Algonquin Books, 1994.

Robert C. Evans

JOHN STEINBECK (1902–1968)

I have always lived violently, drunk hugely, eaten too much or not at all, slept around the clock or missed two nights of sleeping, worked too hard and too long in glory, or slobbered for a time in utter laziness. I've lifted, pulled, chopped, climbed, made love with joy and taken my hangovers as a consequence, not as a punishment.

(Travels with Charley)

John Steinbeck's status as a major American author would be secure if he had written no book other than The Grapes of Wrath, his huge, sprawling, vivid, and moving account of a simple Oklahoma farm family displaced, along with hundreds of thousands of others, from their land during the disastrous drought that made the Great Depression of the 1930s a doubly devastating period. The Grapes of Wrath is an American epic, but in addition to composing that significant and popular book Steinbeck authored Of Mice and Men (a brief novel about loneliness that is almost a drama in prose), The Pearl (a lyrical but tragic parable about a modern-day loss of innocence), and a number of short stories that are considered among his country's finest. Steinbeck also, of course, wrote much else during the course of a long and prolific career, and during that career he was showered with prizes, awards, and recognitions—a trend that culminated in his being awarded, in 1962, the Nobel Prize in literature. Yet although his works were often turned into influential films and his books remain widely read, he has never been accorded quite the same level of critical respect bestowed on such contemporaries as ERNEST HEMINGWAY or WILLIAM FAULKNER. He remains a writer whose reputation was somewhat hurt by his very popularity.

Most of the details of Steinbeck's life are laid out clearly in the helpful "Chronology" compiled by Robert DeMott. Steinbeck was born on February 27, 1902, in the town of Salinas, California, to Olive Hamilton Steinbeck (who had been a teacher) and John Ernst Steinbeck, who managed a local flour mill. The Steinbecks already had two daughters (Esther and Beth) and would later add another (Mary). Young John, however, was their only boy, and he spent his early years enjoying the pleasures of nature and developing an early infatuation with books and literature. He was a good student, and already as an adolescent he had begun composing stories and sharing them with friends. After graduating from Salinas High School, Steinbeck began taking classes in fall 1919 at Stanford University, which he attended off and on for the next several years without ever taking a degree. Meanwhile, he also worked at various practical jobs and began to develop a deep interest in science to match and balance his literary inclinations. He did publish stories in the Stanford literary magazine, but his real interest in writing did not fully surface until after he moved in 1926 to New York, where he worked both as a laborer and as a reporter. His first collection of short stories was turned down that year by a New York publisher, but Steinbeck persisted in writing, and by 1927 (after he had returned to California) he had published one story and had begun collaborating on a play. By 1928 he had completed his first novel, Cup of Gold, which appeared in print in August 1929. By this time, Steinbeck (who had been working a variety of jobs) had moved to San Francisco and was able to devote more time to writing, thanks to financial support from his father. In 1930 he married Carol Henning (whom he had met in 1928), and the two lived extremely simple lives in a number of very modest homes. Most important to Steinbeck, however, was 1930 because it was the year in which he first made the acquaintance of Edward F. Ricketts, a marine biologist who became a close and influential friend. Meanwhile, Steinbeck continued to write, producing an innovative short novel as well as a crime novel (neither of which was published). In 1931 he was also hard at work on a series of stories that were published in 1932 as The Pastures of Heaven.

The year 1933 was sad but productive for Steinbeck. In early spring his mother became severely sick, eventually suffering a major stroke. Steinbeck and his wife soon moved home to care for her, but then his father also became seriously ill. When time permitted, Steinbeck worked on stories that eventually became part of his noted collection titled The Red Pony, and indeed two of them were printed in a prominent magazine by the end of the year. Meanwhile, his novel To a God Unknown appeared in September, by which time he was also nearly finished with the first draft of a new novel—Tortilla Flat—that would soon help make him famous. When his mother passed away in February 1934, Steinbeck and his wife continued to live with his father for a time, but eventually caretakers were found to look after him, thus freeing John to devote more time to his writing. During that summer he composed nine stories, most of which were later collected in The Long Valley, but during this time he was also working on a new novel, In Dubious Battle, which was based on recent labor strife in California. Tortilla Flat was accepted for publication in 1934, and in 1935 In Dubious Battle was also accepted. Unfortunately the highly successful publication of Tortilla Flat in May was counterbalanced by the death of the novelist's father that same month. Profits from sales of the novel allowed Steinbeck and his wife to travel to Mexico, and it was not long before film rights to the book were also sold for a substantial sum. Steinbeck, in other words, had finally begun to achieve real commercial success as a writer. In Dubious Bat- tle appeared in print early in 1936, thus giving him even further visibility as an increasingly significant author.

By this time he had also begun working on one of his most famous books—Of Mice and Men. Unfortunately, his dog chewed up much of the manuscript, but Steinbeck was able to rewrite the piece rather quickly (and showed relative mercy to the dog). The revised manuscript was finished by August 1935; by then the Steinbecks had also moved into a newly constructed home near Monterey, California. The year 1935 was even more significant for other reasons, however, because this was the year in which he began researching California's migrant farm workers—research that would eventually lead to the composition of his masterwork, The Grapes of Wrath. In the meantime, however, a number of his less famous books were issued in limited editions this year, and in March 1937 Of Mice and Men was published and became immediately successful. The Steinbecks were now able to travel in northern Europe as well as in the Soviet Union, and on their return in midyear his notable collection of stories, The Red Pony, was published, to be followed in the fall by an enormously well-received stage version of Of Mice and Men on Broadway (Steinbeck himself, however, never attended a performance). Meanwhile, early in 1938 a stage adaptation of Tortilla Flat was much less successful, but in general the late 1930s were perhaps the most satisfying years of Steinbeck's creative career. In 1938 the dramatic adaptation of Of Mice and Men won the top award of the New York Drama Critics' Circle; also during 1938 Steinbeck was hard at work on the novel that would soon be published as The Grapes of Wrath. He finally finished the book in November, by which time his collection of short stories titled The Long Valley had been published and was doing well both with critics and with the buying public.

It was in 1939, however, when he achieved his greatest critical and popular success. The Grapes of Wrath appeared in April and was soon the country's best-selling novel. Even readers who disliked it recognized its political importance. Indeed, the book was too often discussed as a political document rather than as a work of art—a fact that led, for a long time, to insufficient appreciation of the work as a well-crafted novel. It was actually burned or banned in various American locales and was even denounced in Congress; farmers' associations considered it a left-wing libel, while leftists naturally embraced it. In any case, it was not long before Hollywood purchased the film rights; nor was it long until the work was turned into an unusually fine movie directed by John Ford and starring Henry Fonda, which appeared by the end of the year—at around the same time as the release of a separate film based on Of Mice and Men. Steinbeck himself, in fact, was increasingly becoming involved in motion pictures: In 1939 he collaborated on a documentary called The Fight for Life, and it was in Hollywood in 1939 that he met and began an affair with a singer named Gwendolyn (“Gwyn”) Conger. Nevertheless, his now-strained marriage to Carol would briefly continue, and during 1940 he worked on further film projects, including the script for a movie called The Forgotten Village. The highlight of 1940, however, was the news that The Grapes of Wrath had been awarded the Pulitzer Prize for fiction. (With typical generosity, Steinbeck gave the prize money to a fellow novelist to help him complete a book of his own.)

Early in 1941 Steinbeck purchased a small home back in Monterey, near Salinas. By spring he had separated from Carol, at around the same time as the publication of his newest book (The Forgotten Village, based on the script of the film). He was also now at work on a screenplay of The Red Pony, and the end of the year saw the appearance of his innovative work Sea of Cortez: A Leisurely Journey of Travel and Research, cowritten with his scientist friend Ed Ricketts. By this time, of course, the United States had been plunged into World War II, and soon Steinbeck began his own contributions to the war effort. His novel The Moon Is Down, which takes place in occupied Norway, appeared in March 1942, followed quickly in April by a staged version on Broadway and plans for a film. Steinbeck also began work on an officially sanctioned book about the U.S. Army Air Force; this soon appeared as Bombs Away: The Story of a Bomber Team. Although plans for a film of that book were soon in the works, it never appeared, but by the end of the year Steinbeck had completed the script for a new movie—A Medal for Benny—and a Hollywood film of his earlier novel Tortilla Flat was issued, directed by Victor Fleming and starring Spencer Tracy.

Steinbeck's divorce from Carol became final in mid-March 1943, and within two weeks he had married Gwyn. By midsummer he was off to Europe and North Africa as a war reporter, but his involvement was not limited to reporting: He actually took part in combat (including special operations commanded by the actor Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.) and suffered both physical and psychological wounds. Partly in response, he began working on Cannery Row, a nostalgic look back at life in prewar Monterey. Nevertheless, by the end of 1943, his war film The Moon Is Down was released (as was an important omnibus collection of his writings titled The Portable Steinbeck). In addition, early in 1944 another war movie (based on a Steinbeck novella and titled Lifeboat) appeared, and although Steinbeck himself disliked the film, even though it had been directed by Alfred Hitchcock, it nevertheless won him an Academy Award nomination. More important to Steinbeck, however, were the birth of his son Thom (on August 2) and his move back to Monterey by the end of the year. Appropriately enough, the novel he had set in that town (Cannery Row) appeared early in 1945; it was a commercial success even if many critics disliked it, and soon the novella The Pearl was completed, with Steinbeck quickly beginning work (mostly in Mexico) on turning this story into a film. Ironically, by the end of the year his relations with the Monterey community had become so sour that he and Gwyn quickly sold their house there and returned to New York, and Steinbeck would live mostly in the East from then on.

Although the major event in Steinbeck's life in 1946 was the birth of his son John (in mid-June), he also completed a novel titled The Wayward Bus, which was published early in 1947. By this time, however, his relationship with Gwyn had begun to falter, as had his own health. Nevertheless, after recovering well enough to travel, he visited France with Gwyn in midsummer and then traveled without her in Eastern Europe for much of the rest of the year. In November The Pearl appeared in book form (having earlier been published in a magazine), followed early in 1948 by the film version, which was itself followed in the spring by the publication of his book titled A Russian Journal. Unfortunately these successes were soon counterbalanced by various kinds of misfortune, including hospitalization for minor surgery, the death of his good friend Ed Ricketts, and (by October) final divorce from Gwyn. Although Steinbeck tried to distract himself from such troubles, he nevertheless began drinking too much and became severely depressed. Professionally, however, he continued to prosper; he was elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters by the end of 1948, and early in 1949 the film based on his own screenplay of The Red Pony (with music by Aaron Copland) was released. During that same year he met Elaine Scott, the wife of the actor Zachary Scott, and by the end of the year she had filed for divorce from her husband and had moved in with Steinbeck. Meanwhile, in 1950 he continued his work in film and theater, collaborating on a movie titled Viva Zapata! (released in 1953), while also seeing his latest work (Burning Bright) first produced as an unsuccessful Broadway play and then released as a novel. By the very end of 1950 he had married Elaine, but he was also hard at work during this period on a lengthy new novel—to be titled East of Eden—which he hoped would be a major book.

The novel was published late in 1952, after a period in which Steinbeck and Elaine had traveled widely in Europe. Commercially the book was a success, but critically it was less so. Despite Academy Award nominations in 1953 for his work on the film Viva Zapata! (which had been released the year before), and despite his work on other literary projects, Steinbeck during this time was depressed. Nevertheless, he was anything but paralyzed or inactive. He was moving in high society; he was writing frequently for newspapers; he collaborated on plans to turn Cannery Row into a musical; he was able to travel widely; and in 1954 his latest novel, Sweet Thursday, was published. In 1955 the film adaptation of East of Eden (overseen by the notable director Elia Kazan and starring James Dean) appeared, and toward the end of that year Pipe Dream, a musical created by Richard Rogers and Oscar Hammerstein II and based on Steinbeck's Sweet Thursday, was produced on Broadway (although without much success). Steinbeck was increasingly involved in politics (he actively supported each of Adlai Stevenson's three presidential campaigns, in 1952, 1956, and 1960), and in 1957 he actually published a short satirical novel based on the French political scene titled The Short Reign of Pippin IV. Yet much of his time during the late 1950s was consumed in foreign travel, and his health had become unpredictable. His literary production during this time was not especially noteworthy; his novel The Winter of Our Discontent, which was published in 1961, totally pleased neither the critics nor Steinbeck himself. He achieved a genuine popular success, however, in 1962 with the publication of Travels with Charley in Search of America, which recounts a long, 10,000-mile car trip he took with his dog around the country in 1960. It was also in 1962, however, that Steinbeck—to the surprise of many and the utter astonishment of not a few—was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature. Many thought that he was hardly the most deserving candidate, but this was not the first (or last) time that the Nobel award created this kind of controversy.

In the final five years or so of his life, Steinbeck functioned frequently as a kind of national cultural ambassador. He traveled widely in Europe and in the Soviet Union in 1963, received the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1964 from Lyndon Johnson, traveled in England and Ireland in 1965, and was named by Johnson to the council of the National Endowment for the Humanities in 1966. During this time he supported the war in Vietnam and in fact even traveled there in 1966 and 1967, filing positive reports about the conflict for a New York newspaper, but by April 1967 he had returned to the United States with an injured back that required surgery. Although the operation (which took place that fall) succeeded, Steinbeck suffered a stroke at the end of May 1968 and then two heart attacks in the next few months. By this time he had become disillusioned with the war, but his days as an active political commentator had now ended. When he died of heart failure on December 20, 1968, he was widely considered one of the most important American writers of the 20th century. Although, as do many great authors, he had long outlived his most creative period, he had nonetheless produced thousands of pages of memorable work. Probably none of those pages, however, were more memorable or of longer-lasting significance than The Grapes of Wrath.

“The Chrysanthemums” (1937, 1938)

Elisa Allen, a strong, capable woman with a talent for growing plants, lives with her kind but taciturn husband, Henry, on a small ranch in California’s Salinas Valley; when Henry sells some steers from the ranch, he suggests that he and Elisa go into the nearby town to celebrate by having dinner and seeing a movie. After Henry goes off to round up the steers, Elisa sees a traveling salesman approach in a beat-up old wagon; when he seems interested in the chrysanthemums she is growing, she gives him some in a pot to take with him, and she feels pride and satisfaction in the fact that she and her plants are valued. Later, however, as she and Henry drive into town, she sees the flowers tossed onto the road, but she realizes that the salesman did at least keep the valuable pot.

The story opens with imagery that already suggests the isolated, enclosed, somewhat dreary life Elisa leads with her husband on their remote farm. Elisa herself is described in ways that make her sound almost conventionally masculine: Her clothing, activities, and manner associate her with male stereotypes, although she also seems physically and psychically remote from most of the actual men on the ranch, including the ranch hand, some visiting agricultural buyers, and even her own husband, with whom her conversations tend to be abrupt and even a bit awkward. Communication does not seem to be an especially strong point in this marriage, and the fact that the couple apparently have no children, combined with their somewhat clumsy and reticent ways of speaking to one another, has led many critics to assume that their marriage is a source of sexual and psychological frustration, at least for Elisa. Her vigorous devotion to her plants, and especially to her flowers, has led many readers to assume that gardening provides her a sense of satisfaction, beauty, pride, and fulfillment that is otherwise lacking in her life. According to this view, the flowers function almost as substitute children; cultivating them gives her a sense of power, identity, and fulfillment she otherwise lacks. Likewise, the traveling salesman seems to appreciate not only her own technical skill but also the beauty of her flowers; in her discussion with him about the plants, she seems far more animated, stimulated, and voluble than in her earlier exchange with her own husband, and indeed her response to the salesman even seems tinged with a kind of sexual excitement, partly because he seems to symbolize a romantic life of travel, freedom, and adventure. To her he seems to represent the sort of autonomy and liberty denied her because she is a woman, and in fact many critics read the story from an explicitly feminist point of view, so that Elisa is seen as a victim of an oppressive, male-dominated culture. Her encounter with the salesman leads her to feel a renewed sense of self-worth and a renewed appreciation of her own sexual and feminine potency.

Ironically when Elisa, near the end of the story, sees the flowers discarded in the middle of the road, she realizes that the seemingly romantic traveler is far less thoughtful and caring than her stumbling, bumbling husband, whose compliments, affection, and concern, however poorly expressed, at least seem sincere. Nevertheless, at the conclusion of the tale, Elisa feels impotent and defeated; in our very last glimpse of her she is “crying weakly—like an old woman” (348). In one sense the story is an object lesson in the illusions inherent in dreams that are excessively romantic and insufficiently realistic; in another sense, however, the story is a sympathetic study of the alienation, isolation, and sense of constriction any human being (of either sex) can feel from time to time. Although Elisa herself can at times seem at least as distant and remote as her husband, Steinbeck succeeds in picturing her in ways that arouse compassion for her loneliness and empathy for her longings.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this story with “The Great Mountain,” the second tale in Steinbeck’s collection titled The Red Pony. Which characters in one story most resemble which characters in the other story? How and why? How are the themes of the two stories similar? How do they also resemble one another in setting and in style?
2. Read this story alongside KATHERINE ANNE PORTER’s tale “The Jilting of Granny Weatherall.” Discuss any similarities and differences between the two main characters. Which of the two (if either) is more sympathetic? Explain your response. How are the stories similar in theme?
3. How does Steinbeck use symbolism in this story to reinforce characterization and themes? In particular, discuss the ways the landscape is described, the ways the flowers are depicted, and the ways actions are presented (especially Elisa’s actions as she works with the plants and, later, as she prepares for her evening out with Henry).

“The Leader of the People” (1937)

When the grandfather of young Jody Tiflin (his mother’s father) announces his plans to visit Jody and his parents at their modest ranch, the parents have opposite reactions: Jody’s mother looks forward to the event, but Jody’s father dreads it, because he hates to listen to the old man’s endlessly repeated stories about the days when he and other explorers traveled across the United States in wagons to settle in California. One morning, when the grandfather accidentally overhears Carl complaining to Jody’s mother about the stories, the old man becomes depressed and withdrawn, partly because he realizes that there may be some justice to Carl’s complaints. Although Carl awkwardly apologizes for his words, it is young Jody who makes a real effort to comfort and appreciate the elderly storyteller.

This story was eventually included as the final work in Steinbeck’s four-part collection titled The Red Pony. Just as the first and third stories of that collection focus on young Jody’s obsession with the adventure of owning and raising a horse, so the second and fourth stories focus on his fascination with the adventurous lives once lived by old men who are now approaching death. Indeed, death—whether literal or figurative—is a major theme that unites all four works: Collectively, the stories show Jody’s initiation into an adult world of mutability and loss. At one point, for instance, when Jody is telling Billy Buck (the family’s faithful ranch hand) how he plans to kill some mice, he says, “I’ll bet they’re fat. I’ll bet they don’t know what’s going to happen to them today.” To this, Billy Buck (a spokesman for intelligent common sense in all four stories) simply replies, “No, nor you either, . . . nor me, nor anyone.” Life, Steinbeck suggests, is not only unpredictable but also often hard and unforgiving, and just as the mice can easily be crushed and killed, so can humans suddenly be robbed of their literal lives, their metaphorical vitality, or their reasons for living. Billy’s words, in fact, prove prophetic, for it is only a few paragraphs later that Jody’s grandfather feels crushed by the weight of Carl’s thoughtless words.

In addition to showing Jody’s growing acquaintance with death and disappointment, the stories in The Red Pony collection show his own growing maturation, and nowhere is he more mature than at the conclusion of the present tale. Having witnessed, with shame, his father’s wounding of the grandfather, Jody loses his earlier keen interest in killing the similarly defenseless mice. Instead, he sits on the porch, trying to comfort the old man, if only through his presence. No one else makes a similar effort: His father has already retreated; his mother has refused to intervene; and even the wise and compassionate Billy Buck has been left speechless and has hurried off. In the final pages of the story, the young boy sits and listens sympathetically to the old man, thus demonstrating his own growth toward moral maturity. This conclusion might easily have been trite and sentimental, but Steinbeck wisely refrains from implying that any problem has really been resolved. The old man's depression is not cured, but he does take some comfort in his grandson's simple presence and respect. Although the grandfather ends the story by feeling defeated and outmoded, Jody's kindness implies that a fundamental link from the past to the present has been forged and that the moral values embodied by the grandfather will pass to a new generation.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read the three earlier stories in The Red Pony collection and trace Jody's emotional, psychological, and moral growth from one story to the next. How does he mature in his relations with others, in his attitudes toward life, and in his capacity for independent action? How does Steinbeck demonstrate his own ethical maturity in the present story? How, for instance, does he prevent Carl Tiflin from seeming a mere villain even in the present tale?
2. Compare and contrast the presentation of elderly characters in this story and in JACK LONDON's tale "The Law of Life." How are the underlying philosophies of the two stories similar and/or distinct? What traits do the two old men in the stories have in common; how are they different? Contrast the endings of the two works.
3. Discuss the ways different generations relate to one another in this story. What role does the theme of past versus present play?
4. Make a list of at least 10 specific words or phrases from this story that you find especially striking, memorable, or effective, and then try to explain why they have that kind of impact. You might focus, for instance, on striking imagery, memorable sound effects, or effective bits of dialogue.

Of Mice and Men (1937)

The novel opens by focusing on two working-class drifters who are also close friends: George Milton is small, intense, intelligent, and skilled at practical survival, while Lennie Small is a huge, childlike, mentally retarded man whose affection for soft little animals (such as mice and puppies) often leads, ironically, to their deaths because Lennie has no sense of his own strength when he tries to caress them. The two men dream of someday owning a small farm together, but in the meantime economic necessity compels them to take work on a ranch populated by a variety of other lonely workmen and overseen by the small, pugnacious Curley (whose belligerence leads him into conflict with practically everyone—including, to his misfortune, the gigantic Lennie) and Curley's wife, whose prowling, flirtatious, almost predatory yearnings, combined with her fundamental loneliness, lead to her accidental death during an unfortunate encounter with Lennie. As Curley and a mob pursue Lennie with the intention of vengefully killing him, George, in an ironic act of mercy, preempts them by shooting Lennie himself—thus ending not only the life of his best friend but also his own dreams of the life they had hoped to share.

Of Mice and Men was the first work by Steinbeck to win him enormous popularity. First published as a short novel with an unusually high degree of dialogue, this playlike work was soon transformed into an award-winning drama that pleased both audiences and critics alike. Later the story became the basis of a well-regarded film. Meanwhile, the novel continues to be very widely read (especially in high schools), and the play has been adapted and filmed several times since the release of the original movie in 1939. Yet although the novel is often considered one of Steinbeck's best, it has also been subject to severe criticism over the years. Its characters have been condemned as simplistic stereotypes; its plot has been attacked as too predictable; its tone has been censured for being too sentimental; its language has been called uncouth and uninspired; and its themes have been called thin and rudimentary. Even Steinbeck himself expressed some reservations about the success of the book, but it nevertheless continues to be read, admired, studied, and praised.

As many of Steinbeck's works do, this one focuses on relatively simple working-class people who must struggle to survive. It shows the loneliness that pervades the lives of many people, but it also shows the satisfactions that can result when persons let down their guard and embrace the possibilities of friendship. Communication among the characters is often awkward, stilted, and inarticulate, but when true communication does occur, it can provide immense satisfactions. The novel reveals the genuine capacity of people to care for (and about) one another, but it also shows the obstacles that so often stand in the way of a satisfying sense of community. The novel also emphasizes the importance of dreams and aspirations in sustaining the will to continue living. As do the characters in Steinbeck's later masterpiece, The Grapes of Wrath, George and Lennie seek security, peace, and happiness by pursuing the dream of owning and working a small plot of land they can call their own, and, as with the characters in that later novel, their dreams are ultimately thwarted. Nevertheless, in both works Steinbeck implies that without dreams to motivate and sustain them, human beings suffer from desperation and isolation. The book implies the rewards that can result when people bond and cooperate, but it also suggests that friendship, communication, cooperation, and community are rare, fragile things that can easily be lost or broken.

The language in Of Mice and Men is plainer, simpler, less vibrant, less colorful, and less lively than the language in The Grapes of Wrath. Whereas that later novel is full of rich dialect and vivid imagery, the language of the earlier book seems relatively drab by comparison, as perhaps befits its relatively drab setting, characters, and themes. Occasionally, however, Steinbeck breathes distinctive life into the phrasing, as when he describes how traveling tramps “jungle-up” near a woodland pond (Novels . . . 1932–1937 797), or when bed-bugs are described as “pants rabbits” and “graybacks” (Novels . . . 1932–1937 810), or when a character reports that Curley has “yalla-jackets in his drawers” (Novels . . . 1932–1937 835). At times, too, the narrator's descriptions are nicely and precisely observed, as when he describes how George “unrolled his bundle and put things on the shelf, his razor and bar of soap, his comb and bottle of pills, his liniment and leather wristband” (Novels . . . 1932–1937 810), or when he describes how the hair of Curley's wife “hung in little rolled clusters, like sausages” (Novels . . . 1932–1937 819), or when he reports how another character “held a crushed Stetson hat under his arm while he combed his long, black, damp hair straight back” (Novels . . . 1932–1937 821). In addition, the language of the narrator is often psychologically shrewd and insightful, as when he notes that the supposedly slow-minded Lennie, in an early conversation with George, “avoided the bait” and “spoke craftily” (Novels . . . 1932–1937, 806). Lennie, then, can be more cunning and less psychologically simple than he seems. A similar psychological complexity is implied later when the narrator refers to “those Western magazines ranch men love to read and scoff at and secretly believe” (Novels . . . 1932–1937 809), and comparable insight into the complex workings of human minds is demonstrated when the narrator later observes how a black character, insulted by a sarcastic white woman, “had retired into the terrible protective dignity of the negro” (Novels . . . 1932–1937 855). At moments like these, Steinbeck peels back the layers of characters who are less simple than they may otherwise appear.

For the most part, however, the characters in this novel are not especially complicated. This is particularly true, of course, of Lennie, whose simplicity is crucial to his role. He represents a kind of innocence, decency, and kindness that would not be entirely credible—and would also seem much too saccharine and sentimental—in a normally mature human being. Steinbeck thus makes Lennie a half-wit, but by doing so, he helps us see that much of what passes for “normal” human behavior also seems crude and uncaring when juxtaposed with Lennie's fundamental decency and goodness. Although numerous characters ask George whether Lennie is crazy, one of Lennie's functions in the book is to highlight through contrast the craziness of much supposedly “normal” behavior. Curley and his wife, for instance, are much closer to being mentally disturbed in the truest sense than Lennie ever is, and much the same might be said of Carlson, a somewhat sadistic ranch hand who seems all too eager to kill another ranch hand's aged dog. By contrast, Lennie is passive, peaceful, and benevolent; any hurt he inflicts (whether on animals or later on Curley's wife) is entirely unintended. Yet his capacity for committing violence also helps make him a somewhat menacing figure and thus prevents him from seeming an entirely maudlin or mawkish character. Always lurking beneath his gentle exterior is the potential for destruction, and thus he is a natural source of suspense in the plot. At the same time, however, his killing of Curley's wife (like his earlier confrontation with Curley himself) seems almost entirely predictable. Because he lacks a full intelligence, Lennie also lacks the kind of free will and capacity for independent thought and choice that are crucial traits of a truly complicated character. In the plot of this book, Lennie is partly a wild card, partly a victim of fate, and partly a puppet (though a largely appealing puppet, to be sure) in the hands of Steinbeck himself.

George is clearly a more complicated figure. If Lennie symbolizes the body, George represents the mind. Yet George is obviously also capable of real feeling; his willingness to help look out for Lennie and help keep him out of trouble shows his capacity for kindness and even for love, and his final act of killing Lennie (to prevent Lennie from being captured and killed by a violent mob) is, paradoxically, the most compassionate deed in the book. Beneath his often gruff, sarcastic exterior, George is a romantic at heart; his dream of having a small place of his own where he can enjoy peace, security, and freedom is a romantic dream to which almost everyone can relate, while his concern for Lennie (and the many practical sacrifices he endures while acting on that concern) makes him the moral touchstone of the novel. His frequently blunt, occasionally caustic style of speech helps prevent the novel from seeming overly sentimental, as when, in exasperation with his friend's forgetfulness, he tells Lennie, "Jesus Christ, you're a crazy bastard!" (Novels . . . 1932-1937 799). At times George even adds a much-needed touch of comedy to this otherwise somber tome, as when Lennie notes that George had recently told another character that he and Lennie were cousins, to which George responds, "Well, that was a lie. An' I'm damn glad it was. If I was a relative of yours, I'd shoot myself" (Novels . . . 1932-1937 814). When we first read this exchange we laugh in sympathy with George's frustration, but in retrospect, of course, his comment seems profoundly ironic. By the end of the novel, George does indeed act toward Lennie with the kind of love one would hope for from a member of one's family, but it is not George who is shot, but Lennie. At the same time, however, by killing Lennie George also kills a deeply valuable part of himself. By acting morally to prevent pain to Lennie, he creates pain for himself. Of all the characters in the novel, he is the most complex.

Unfortunately some figures in the book amount to little more than caricatures. Both Curley and his wife, for instance, are almost cartoonish: He is a short-tempered, thuggish boor, while his wife is a vampish tart. Neither arouses or sustains much real interest; instead, both are convenient stooges, and it is hard to take either of them very seriously. Steinbeck's efforts to provoke some sympathy for Curley's desperate housewife sometimes veer toward sentimentality, and in the final analysis her death provokes little compassion either for her or even (ironically) for Lennie, partly because the wife seems so unappealing and partly because the death seems almost a foregone conclusion from the time we first see the two characters together. However, in the same way that Curley and his wife seem too simplistically debauched, Slim (a mule driver on the ranch) can seem too simplistically virtuous, sane, and sensible. He is obviously the anti-Curley—the man whom the rest of the men admire and respect; however, just as Curley represents one extreme of the moral and psychological spectrum, so Slim represents the other extreme. Neither is as intriguing a character as George (whose seemingly unselfish devotion to Lennie is in some ways as puzzling to us as it is to the other characters). In any given situation, Slim will predictably behave well and do good, in the same way that Curley will just as predictably behave badly. Less predictable (and therefore more interesting) is Crooks, the sole black ranch hand. In his encounter with Lennie, he is by turns hostile, defensive, vulnerable, pitiable, cruel, and kind. He is, in short, a recognizable human being whose complications make the relative superficiality of some of the other characters—particularly Curley and Curley's wife—all the more apparent by contrast.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Of Mice and Men alongside JACK LONDON's novel The Sea-Wolf. Discuss the ways both writers depict essentially all-male environments in which the most powerful male is often cruel and vindictive. Discuss the impact of the lone female in both environments. Discuss the similarities and especially the contrasts between Curley and Wolf Larsen. What do both works imply about the value of friendship and the perils of isolation and loneliness?
2. Compare and contrast Steinbeck's novel with SHERWOOD ANDERSON's short story titled "Hands." How do both works deal with abnormal characters or with characters who are cut off from the larger community? Discuss the themes of isolation and alienation in both works. In what ways is Lennie more fortunate than the main character in "Hands," and in what ways is he less fortunate?
3. How are male bonds presented in this work and in EUGENE O'NEILL's play The Hairy Ape? What is the role of women in both works? How do both works employ animal imagery? What are some important similarities and/or differences between Lennie in Of Mice and Men and Yank, the central character of O'Neill's drama? What similarities and/or distinctions exist between the kinds of language used in both works?
4. Discuss the structure of this book. How, for instance, does phrasing early in the book foreshadow later developments? How do the concluding scenes look back to the very beginning? Has either one of the central characters changed or developed at all during the course of the book? If so, how? If not, why not?

The Red Pony* (1937, 1945)

The Red Pony is a collection of four interrelated short stories: "The Gift," "The Great Mountains," "The Promise," and "The Leader of the People" (discussed earlier). In "The Gift," 10-year-old Jody Tiflin is presented with a young horse by his rather stern and distant father (Carl Tiflin) and the father's wise and friendly ranch hand, Billy Buck, but Billy Buck is unfortunately unable to prevent the horse from catching cold and dying. In "The Great Mountains," young Jody is approached by an old Spanish-speaking man of Mexican or Indian heritage, who returns at the end of his life to live his remaining years on the land (now owned by the Tiflins) where he was born, but when Carl Tiflin refuses him more than temporary hospitality, the old man steals an old horse named Easter (whom Carl no longer values) and rides off into the nearby mountains on the animal's back. In "The Promise," Jody is promised by his father and Billy Buck that he can raise the new colt due to be delivered by Nellie, but when the long-awaited day arrives, Billy Buck must kill Nellie in order to ensure that the colt is born safely.

The stories included in The Red Pony, like many stories about children, are essentially tales of initiation—that is, tales in which a young person is initiated into the often hard facts of adult reality and into the often painful ways of the world. Each of the stories (including the last, "A Leader of the People") deals in some way with the theme of actual or approaching death: In "The Gift" the pony dies; in "The Great Mountains" the old man is facing imminent death; in "The Promise" the mother horse dies so that her colt may live; and in "The Leader of the People," Jody's own grandfather is facing the sunset of his life. As the stories are read in sequence, Jody grows not only physically but also psychologically and morally; by the time one reads the final story, Jody has reached an important new level of maturity and shows himself capable of a kind of sympathy, empathy, and compassion that are to some degree lacking in his father, who is older than Jody in years but who in some ways seems emotionally stunted. Indeed, the relations between Jody and his parents provide much of the "human interest" of the stories—an interest that also depends on the boy's relations with Billy Buck, who provides a different kind of role model than Carl Tiflin. Billy seems more closely in tune with Jody's feelings than the boy's own father does, and in fact Billy seems to combine the best aspects of conventionally male and female behavior: He is strong, wise, decisive, and physically capable, but he is also a nurturing figure who is capable of showing tenderness and concern both to the animals he cares for and the boy he cares about. In the final story, Jody shows that he has learned well the lessons of concern and compassion that Billy Buck teaches by quiet example.

Steinbeck does an effective job of conveying the personalities of all the major characters, presenting none of them in a simplistic or unequivocal way. Carl Tiflin is the closest to seeming coldly unappealing and one-dimensional, but even he has his attractive and complicating aspects. In “The Gift,” for instance, he enjoys pretending to be stern with his son just before he gives the boy the gift of a lifetime, and when he sees how happy the boy is with the pony, he retreats in befuddled embarrassment. Carl, in other words, is not a fundamentally cold man; he is simply (like many men of his time) uncomfortable with showing the tenderness he is capable of feeling. He is a sensible, practical man, and if he sometimes seems chilly and even a bit mean (particularly in the second tale), he is also able to recognize and apologize for his shortcomings (as he does most obviously in “The Leader of the People”). Even when he is rebuked openly by Billy Buck in front of Jody (as happens at the very end of “The Gift”), he seems willing to tolerate the chastisement, and the fact that Billy feels comfortable enough with Carl to criticize his employer so blatantly speaks well (ironically) of Carl’s own character. Carl, in short, is not the simple villain he could easily have been in the hands of a lesser writer. By the same token, Billy Buck is not the kind of plaster saint that a less talented author might have created. He is in many ways an attractive alternative to Carl, but he is capable of making mistakes (as when he misjudges the effect a rain storm may have on the pony’s health), he is capable of losing his temper (as he does with Carl at the end of “The Gift”), and he is even capable of being angry with—and swearing at—a young boy when he feels frustrated at having had to kill Nellie in order to save her colt and fulfill his titular “Promise” to Jody. Billy’s anger, however, is always rooted in love—love for Jody at the end of “The Gift” and love for Nellie at the end of “The Promise.” He is a perfect example of the kind of rock-solid but kindhearted common working man whom Steinbeck especially admired. In crafting this series of stories, Steinbeck created a small but entirely credible community of real persons who reflect the kinds of thought and feeling common to their time and place while also reflecting deeper, more universal, and more timeless habits of the human heart and mind.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the life of young Jody with the life of the young girl described in Gertrude Simmons Bonnin’s (Zitkala-Ša’s) “Impressions of an Indian Girlhood.” In particular, discuss the relations of both young people with their parents and with their broader communities. How (if at all) are their experiences affected by their distinct ethnic backgrounds? How (if at all) are their experiences affected by the fact that one is a boy and the other a girl?
2. Read these stories alongside LANGSTON HUGHES’s novel Not without Laughter and then discuss the plots, themes, characters, and settings of both tales. In what ways do the boys in both stories grow up? How are their relations with their fathers similar and/or different, and how are the fathers themselves comparable or distinct? Compare and contrast the mothers in both tales. Which characters provide the main role models for the two boys, and what traits and values do those role models have in common?
3. Choose one of the characters besides Jody and discuss the continuities in the ways that character is portrayed from one story to the next. How, for instance, does Jody’s mother remain consistent from one story to another? How does she develop? Does she seem any more complex by the end of the final tale than she had seemed by the end of the first tale?

The Grapes of Wrath (1939)

When Tom Joad returns to his family’s Oklahoma farm after having been released from prison (where he served time for killing a man in self-defense), he discovers that his family, along with thousands of others, have been evicted from their land as a result of bank foreclosures sparked by a dusty, persistent, and destructive drought. Accompanied by Jim Casy, a preacher they have known for years who has now turned his back on conventional religion in favor of a simpler commitment to human welfare, the Joads (Ma, Pa, Granma, Grampa, Tom, Al, Ruthie, Winfield, the pregnant Rose of Sharon, and her husband, Connie) pack up as many of their belongings as they can cram into an old truck and begin a desperate journey, as do hundreds of thousand of other "Okies," toward California, where they have heard that jobs are plentiful. By the end of the novel, after making a few good friends but also after suffering many hardships and disappointments, the group begins to disintegrate: Grampa and Granma have died, Connie has deserted, Casy has been killed, and Tom has killed Casy's assailant and must flee, but Rose of Sharon, although having lost her baby, is able, at Ma's urging, to show compassion to a man even more needy than the Joads themselves.

The Grapes of Wrath is generally considered to be Steinbeck's best book as well as a classic of American literature. Although the novel has sometimes been criticized as too long, too sentimental, and too propagandistic, it has also been vigorously defended. Champions of the work have praised its large cast of memorable characters, its vivid language (especially its striking imagery, convincing dialogue, and use of lively rural dialect), and its structural innovation (particularly its alternation of chapters focusing on the Joads with "intercalary" chapters offering a broader picture of various social developments). When the book was first published, it was enormously controversial as well as highly popular; opponents of the work accused Steinbeck of offering an inaccurate and deliberately distorted view of the economic and social conditions he claimed to depict, while other readers found the novel realistic, credible, and profoundly moving. Some readers felt that interest in the novel would dwindle as the depression-era conditions it describes receded in memory; others, however, think that Steinbeck wrote in a timeless style about issues of enduring human concern.

It is, in fact, the style of this book that helps to make it so effective. It would not matter what topics Steinbeck wrote about if his language were dull, tedious, or commonplace, but the language of The Grapes of Wrath is brimming with energy and vitality, especially in its use of dialogue and dialect but also in its imagery, symbolism, and descriptive passages. When Steinbeck depicts people, places, or events, he usually (in this book, at least) has the power to make us see them, and when he lets his characters talk, real people seem to speak. Entering the pages of this novel is like entering a previously unknown but highly intriguing region in which persons employ language that is unself-consciously poetic in its freshness and sharp precision. Thus Tom does not simply say that his feet were tired; he says, "My dogs was pooped out" (Grapes 218). Later, explaining one effect of his time in prison, he remarks that "when you been in stir a little while, you can smell a question comin' from hell to breakfast" (Grapes 223). Casy, the preacher, later describes a girl who is "so full of the Holy Spirit that it's sproutin' out of her nose and ears" (Grapes 232). Likewise, he subsequently asks himself, "Why is it that when a fella ought to be just about mule-ass proof against sin, an' all full up of Jesus, why is it that's the time a fella gets fingerin' his pants buttons?" (Grapes 233). What (exactly) does it mean to be "mule-ass proof against sin"? Presumably it means to be stubbornly or even almost stupidly immune to temptation; in any case, the language is much more evocative than if Steinbeck had written something like "completely untempted by sin." Similarly, the metaphorical phrase "all full up of Jesus" implies that Jesus is like a brimming, nearly overflowing liquid, and the metaphor is therefore much more powerful than if Steinbeck had simply said "truly committed to Jesus." Finally, the imagery of a "fella . . . fingerin' his pants buttons" is much more precise, vivid, and memorable than if Steinbeck instead had colorlessly written, "a man becomes sexually excited." In phrase after phrase, sentence after sentence, paragraph after paragraph, Steinbeck reveals a sure command of the idiomatic English actually spoken by the real people he describes. That dialect, however, far from seeming dated or quaint, retains its power to startle, surprise, and stimulate, and one of the pleasures of reading The Grapes of Wrath is the pleasure of anticipation—the delight in knowing that each new page will reveal diction (especially spoken diction) that will seem colorful, vibrant, zesty, and yet always entirely credible. Quite simply, the novel is full of what Casy himself at one point calls “the poetry of folks talkin’” (Grapes 309).

The rural dialect of the book is, however, only one strength of the novel’s language. Similarly important is Steinbeck’s highly skillful use of dialogue, which he employs to characterize the speakers, to advance the plot, and to underscore themes in subtle ways. As with his use of dialect, examples are extremely numerous, but one instance may be taken as typical. Thus, at one point, Al works on a car while Tom talks to a one-eyed man whose whining self-pity and maudlin self-consciousness he finds annoying. As he rebukes the handicapped man, the following exchange occurs (with Tom speaking first):

“I knowed a hump-back in—in a place I was. Make his whole livin’ lettin’ folks rub his hump for luck. Jesus Christ, an’ all you got is one eye gone.”

The man said stumbly, “Well, Jesus, ya see somebody edge away from ya, an’ it gets into ya.”

“Cover it up then, goddamn it. Ya stickin’ it out like a cow’s ass. Ya like to feel sorry for yaself. There ain’t nothin’ the matter with you. Buy yaself some white pants. Ya gettin’ drunk an’ cryin’ in ya bed, I bet. Need any help, Al?”

“No,” said Al. “I got this here bearin’ loose. Jus’ tryin’ to work the piston down.”

“Don’t bang yaself,” said Tom.

The one-eyed man said softly, “Think—somebody’d like—me?”

“Why, sure,” said Tom. “Tell ’em ya dong’s growed sence you los’ your eye.” (Grapes 401)

In this vignette, each separate person is deftly characterized, not only through the words he speaks but also by the manner in which he speaks them. Tom, for instance, is typically blunt, direct, and honest; here as elsewhere, he does not mince words, although his tone here is sharper than usual. When he refers to the handicapped person he once knew, he does not call him a “handicapped person”; rather, he calls him a “hump-back.” Yet Tom can also be evasive when he needs or wants to be; thus, the prison in which he spent time is simply called “a place I was.” The profane references to Christ, meanwhile, are exactly the kind of language we might expect from such characters, while the staccato rhythms of Tom’s angry instructions mimic perfectly the cadence, inflection, and intonation (not to mention the imagery) of a real exasperated outburst. Overall the language of the passage is precise, concrete, and exact, not abstract or general (“Ya gettin’ drunk an’ cryin’ in ya bed, I bet” is much more effective than “You’re feeling depressed, aren’t you?”). Yet Tom can immediately switch from anger at the one-eyed man to a practical concern with Al’s work on the car, and Al, focused on his important work, remains oblivious to the argument. Tom can seem almost mean to the handicapped man while also seeming solicitous toward Al, and yet Tom, perhaps regretting his earlier sharpness, can also end the exchange with a reassuring joke. In just a few swift sentences, then, Steinbeck uses dialogue to depict his characters memorably, move his plot forward, and underline such important themes as the virtues of determination, the dangers of self-pity, and the value of stoic endurance.

Although much of The Grapes of Wrath (to the novel’s great benefit) advances by means of this kind of energetic dialogue, the book is also famous for its reflective and interpretive passages, in which the omniscient narrator pulls us back from our immediate focus on the Joads to give us broader insights into the conditions of the hundreds of thousands if not millions of people who were undergoing similar experiences. At one point, for instance, when speaking of these people, the narrator remarks that suddenly the machines pushed them out and they swarmed on the highways. The movement

changed them; the highways, the camps along the road, the fear of hunger and the hunger itself, changed them. The children without dinner changed them, the endless moving changed them. They were migrants. And the hostility changed them, welded them, united them—hostility that made the little towns group and arm as though to repel an invader, squads with pick handles, clerks and storekeepers with shotguns, guarding the world against their own people. (Grapes 510)

Passages such as this reveal Steinbeck's ability to use standard English just as eloquently and effectively as he uses rural dialect. Each word, each detail, is carefully chosen, and then all are assembled in a masterfully arranged paragraph. The word machines, for instance, implies an unfeeling, unthinking, inhuman power, while the word swarmed implies that the displaced people now resemble insects or animals. The constant repetition of the word changed mimics the grinding, relentless forces the passage describes, while the progression of details becomes ever-more specific: First abstract "movement" is mentioned, then more specific "highways," then even more precisely imagined and inhabited "camps along the road," then the "fear of hunger" among the people who inhabit those camps, then not just the fear of hunger but the actual hunger itself, and then, finally, not just hunger itself but the hunger of starving children. After the long series of repeated references to "change" comes a very brief and entirely different kind of sentence: "They were migrants." Three simple words sum up all that is important about their new condition. And then the focus switches from the swarms of migrants themselves to the people who have changed from ordinary, everyday citizens of "little towns" into armed "squads." The final quoted sentences are steeped in paradoxes, as "clerks and storekeepers" (who are usually anything but militant) arm themselves with "shotguns," intent—in a final paradox—on "guarding the world against their own people." If in his scenes featuring dialogue Steinbeck shows his ability to zoom in for close-ups, in passages such as the one just quoted he shows his skill at offering panoramic overviews. Much of the dynamic rhythm of the book results from this constant interaction between the specific and the general, between chapters on the Joads and chapters on the conditions they represent, but even the most "general" portions of the novel are rarely abstract, dry, or imprecise.

Steinbeck, then, uses dialect, dialogue, and exposition to great effect, but he also simply shows enormous skill in coining memorable phrases and phrasing. Thus the dust that coats a truck is compared to "red flour," while children are pacified with candy they have "whined out" of their father (Grapes 310). A young boy is "kid-wild and calfish," while a young pregnant woman has a "knowing perfection-look." Connie, when staring at his pregnant wife, "was proud" (as we might expect) but also "fearful" (a bit of a surprise). Connie himself is a "sharp-faced, lean young man of a Texas strain, and his pale blue eyes were sometimes dangerous [impression one], and sometimes kindly [impression two], and sometimes frightened [impression three]" (Grapes 311). Through such subtly complicated phrasing, Steinbeck implies the complexity not only of the characters he describes but of human beings in general: Connie cannot be easily explained, because no person is easily explainable. People are complicated, but so are physical environments and social conditions, and Steinbeck's language tries to do justice to all the complexities involved. More often than not, however, his phrasing is not only complex but also sharp and precise, conveying an unforgettable impression. Thus, one character "would raven with lust for some whore," and, having paid for three prostitutes at once, "snorted and rutted on their unresponsive bodies for an hour" (Grapes 311–312). Again and again and again, Steinbeck summons up just the right words to create whatever picture he means to impress on our memories. His general diction is thus every bit as effective as his use of dialect or dialogue.

Steinbeck uses all these stylistic strengths (and many more) in the service of a number of significant themes or key ideas. His book has been seen, for instance, as lamenting the passing of the old belief, associated with Thomas Jefferson, that American democracy would be best sustained by a citizenry composed mostly of small independent yeoman farmers. Steinbeck is clearly a “small-d” democrat (not a communist, as some of his detractors alleged) who has enormous faith in the “common people.” In this sense he is a writer clearly in the tradition of Whitman, Thoreau, and especially Emerson, and indeed Jim Casy’s notion that humanity shares one big soul is obviously indebted to Emerson’s transcendentalist idea of the Oversoul—an idea that similarly stresses the importance of the bonds that unite all people. Steinbeck’s social and political ideal, however, is not any forced collectivism (of the sort associated with Bolshevism) but rather a voluntary group cooperation, in which free individuals see the practical and spiritual advantages of joining for mutual assistance. Casy himself, meanwhile, is obviously a kind of secular Christ figure: His initials are J. C.; he has turned away from religion as conventionally practiced; he travels with a band of 12 people (including Sairy and Ivy Wilson, whom the Joads befriend on their journey); and he dies while trying to help others and while speaking words clearly similar to Christ’s last words on the cross: “You don’ know what you’re a-doin’” (Grapes 621). Because Casy’s words are repeated twice just before he dies and are then quoted twice again later by Tom (Grapes 627), the parallel with Jesus becomes impossible to miss. Tom subsequently becomes a kind of apostle of Casy’s cause, and Rose of Sharon’s final act—in which she offers her milk-swollen breasts to a man who is starving—becomes a kind of secular Eucharist (Grapes 692). The whole movement of the Joads from Oklahoma to California is an ironic reenactment of the exodus of the Israelites from their bondage in Egypt to their hoped-for freedom in the promised land, and California itself is potentially a land of milk and honey—in which, however, neither the Joads nor many others find any immediate salvation. Thus in its language, its ideas, and even its title, the book draws on the rich biblical heritage that has been central to a good deal of literature and culture in the West, and yet the novel uses that heritage to promote ends that are more secular than conventionally sacred. The book is a protest against the growing materialism, alienation, and selfishness of American life, but if Steinbeck is hopeful about a solution at all, he does not put his trust in God but in the basic decency of common people united by a sense of their own best interests.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast The Grapes of Wrath with THEODORE DREISER’s An American Tragedy. In what ways does each book try to offer an epic or panoramic overview and diagnosis of American life? How are their diagnoses similar, particularly in their assessments of matters of class and economics? How do they differ in their plots, their settings, and their lead characters?
2. Read Steinbeck’s novel alongside GERTRUDE STEIN’s The Making of Americans. What role does family play in each work? How do the styles of the two books differ? Discuss the social milieu depicted in each novel. What are Stein’s central thematic concerns, and how do they differ from Steinbeck’s? In what way does each book reflect the life and lifestyle of its author?
3. Discuss The Grapes of Wrath in relation to WILLIAM FAULKNER’s novel As I Lay Dying, paying particular attention to such matters as the emphasis on journeys, the importance of families, the significance of mother figures, the use of rural dialect, and the influence of Deep South versus western settings.
4. Compare and contrast The Grapes of Wrath (which was published in 1939) with RICHARD WRIGHT’s novel Native Son (which was published in 1940). In what ways are the books similar and/or different in their emphasis on social conditions, family life, economic pressures, and class strife? How are the rich and poor presented in each work? What political solution does each book seem to propose for the problems it presents? How do matters of race add an extra level of complexity to Wright’s novel?
5. Discuss Steinbeck’s characterization of Ma Joad. What factors help to make her an effective character? What personality traits does she exemplify? What values does she symbolize? In what ways does she epitomize Steinbeck's moral, social, and even political ideals?

6. This book is one of the most famous novels to deal with the America of the 1930s, but what factors—if any—prevent the book from seeming dated, parochial, or no longer relevant? How (if at all) does Steinbeck deal with timeless issues, perennial concerns, and standard character types? Why should a reader of the 21st century find this novel worth reading apart from its historical value?

Cannery Row* (1945)

Doc, who makes a very modest living as a marine biologist, is the most respected person living in a rundown area of Monterey, California, known as Cannery Row, whose other inhabitants include (among many others) a pragmatic Chinese grocer named Lee Chong, a generous-hearted woman named Dora Flood (madam of the nearby whorehouse), and a ragtag group of good-natured vagrants known as “the boys” and consisting of Mack (their leader), Hazel, Hughie, Jones, Gay, and Eddie. The “boys,” as does everyone else, love Doc, who is kind, intelligent, cultured, helpful, and friendly to any and all, and so they decide to scrounge up the means to throw him a party to show their appreciation. Their first attempt to stage the event ends in a drunken brawl, but their second succeeds to the general satisfaction of all concerned.

Steinbeck eventually claimed that he had written this novel at the behest of some of the soldiers he had encountered during his own service during World War II, who had asked him to write something comic that had nothing to do with the war that had sickened both them and him (Lisca 198). Certainly a personal desire to put the war at least partly out of his mind seems to have helped motivate him to compose this novel, which is a nostalgic (and some would say saccharine and sentimental) look back at prewar life on the Monterey coast. Many critics have complained about the allegedly flimsy and anecdotal plot of the book, while many others have censured the work for its somewhat syrupy characterization. The prostitute with a heart of gold is a staple of sentimental fiction, and Dora Flood and her “girls” certainly fit that description; it is they, for instance (in chapter 16), who assist Doc in treating an influenza outbreak by volunteering to sit with and comfort sick children, but their selfless behavior is typical of many other characters in Cannery Row, especially when those characters are in the presence of the noble and inspiring Doc. The “boys,” for example, may in some respects be cagey, “irresponsible” vagrants who live from hand to mouth on borrowed (or stolen) dimes, but when it comes to dealing with Doc, all their best traits of generosity and fellow feeling move to the fore. More than one character in the course of the novel openly expresses explicit love for Doc, and certainly Steinbeck goes out of his way to make him seem a highly lovable man. He symbolizes, in fact, all the traits of character Steinbeck most admired: He is smart, wise, kind, capable, sensitive, and thoughtful, but he hides all these endearing traits under an even more endearingly tough and gruff exterior. He loves to listen to classical music and appreciates great art, but he can swill beer with the best of them, satisfy multiple women, and hold his own in a fight. Many readers will feel that a character like this is too good (in several senses of that word) to be true, but Steinbeck seems to have modeled him carefully on his close friend Ed Ricketts, whom Steinbeck considered a singular pearl among men. Doc, however, is just one of the many amiable ne'er-do-wells who stroll through the pages of this book. They are people who may seem unsuccessful by the standards of a competitive, materialistic world, but who appeal to Steinbeck because of their fundamental decency, honesty, and benevolence and their indifference to worldly values. Although Steinbeck does include some suicides, corpses, meanness, hard drinking, and rough behavior to try to prevent the book from seeming unduly saccharine, the novel does (unfortunately) leave a fairly sugary aftertaste.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Cannery Row with Jack London's The Sea-Wolf, particularly in the ways

- they present mainly male social groups and the impact of women on those groups. How do the male groups in the two novels differ in spirit, attitudes, and purpose? How does Wolf Larsen differ from Doc? Are they similar in any respects?
2. How does the community presented in this novel resemble and/or differ from the community presented in Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men? How is Dora in the present novel similar to and/or different from Curley's wife in the earlier book? Is there any character in Cannery Row who resembles Lennie in Of Mice and Men? How do the tones, atmospheres, and conclusions of the two works contrast?
 3. Choose two characters from this book and discuss the ways in which (and degrees to which) Steinbeck manages to present each as a distinctive personality rather than as a mere stereotype. How is each character individualized—especially in attitudes, behavior, and speech—so that he or she seems a complex figure rather than a mere artificial creation?

The Pearl* (1945, 1947)

Kino is a young Mexican-Indian pearl diver who lives with his wife, Juana, and his infant son, Coyotito, in a small hut near the beach; although they are poor, they enjoy a basically happy life, existing in harmony with nature and with other people until one morning, when a scorpion bites Coyotito. Kino, desperate for money to pay a doctor, goes diving and finds an especially impressive pearl, but as word spreads that he owns the gem, various people try to steal it: The hut is broken into and eventually burned down, and finally Kino even kills an attacker in self-defense—a deed that causes him to flee toward the mountains with his wife and child. The trio are pursued by three trackers, but although Kino succeeds in slaying the pursuers, Coyotito is killed in the process; thus, when the bereaved mother and father return home, Kino throws the pearl back into the ocean.

This short novel (or novella), with its simple diction, simple plot, and relatively simple characters, is often considered a kind of parable—that is, a short allegorical story that teaches a straightforward moral lesson. In this case, the lesson seems to involve the risks of materialism and the dangers of greed: The pearl at first seems to be an extremely lucky find, but it soon arouses corrupting instincts, not only in the thieves who try to steal it and in the many people who envy Kino for possessing it, but even in Kino himself. At first, he sees the pearl mainly as a means of helping his young son achieve the kind of educated and prosperous life that Kino and Juana themselves have never enjoyed, but eventually the pearl symbolizes his own yearning for prosperity, power, and autonomy. Ironically, not only is the pearl unnecessary to cure Coyotito's wound (since he had largely recovered before the pearl was found), but its discovery eventually results in his death. Thus, in attempting to preserve and protect the literal pearl, Kino paradoxically loses “pearls” of far greater value, including his infant son and his previously happy life. The novel has therefore often been seen as a kind of retelling of the story of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden: Untroubled paradise (at least of a rudimentary sort) is lost when humans cannot control their selfish desires.

The novel opens with a brief epigraph, which quickly introduces the main characters and the basic plot and explicitly suggests that the story may indeed be a kind of “parable,” particularly since the tale involves “only good and bad things and black and white things and good and evil things and no in-between anywhere” (Novels . . . 1942–1952 231). Yet the book itself seems more complex and subtle than this phrasing suggests; certainly Kino is a more complicated character than this epigraph might lead us to suspect, and although the phrasing of the book is generally direct and straightforward, it is also often subtle and even sometimes ironic. As the dangerous scorpion approaches tiny Coyotito, for instance, the narrator describes how Juana “repeated an ancient magic to guard against such evil, and on top of that she muttered a Hail Mary between clenched teeth” (Novels . . . 1942–1952 235). The sentence not only nicely suggests the mixed cultural heritage of the people Steinbeck depicts (superstitious, on the one hand, and religious, on the other), but it also leaves unclear which kind of belief gives Juana the greater hope: She first turns to magic (implying that she is more superstitious than devout), but she then immediately turns to religion (implying that she may doubt the efficacy of magic alone). Juana, in short, is a more complicated character than we might at first assume. Later, for instance, she rebels against her husband (when she tries to throw the pearl back into the ocean after realizing the trouble it is beginning to cause), but at the end of the novel, she submits to Kino, allowing him to throw the pearl back into the water as the book concludes, and thereby showing not only her respect for him but also her recognition of the apology implied by his own contrite behavior.

Kino himself repeatedly demonstrates the kind of complex psychology and motives that make his story more than a simple parable. For instance, as he approaches the doctor's residence to seek help, he is said to have "felt weak and afraid and angry at the same time. Rage and terror went together," and a few sentences later, as Kino prepares to knock on the door, the narrator notes that "his lips drew tight against his teeth—but with his left hand he reached to take off his hat" (Novels . . . 1942–1952 241). His balanced actions indicate his complicated emotions. At the doctor's residence Kino is greeted by an Indian servant, but the latter, instead of responding with immediate compassion to a fellow Indian in need, "refused to speak in the old language" and shuts the gate; and when the servant does inform the doctor of Kino's presence, he calls him "a little Indian," as if to distance himself from his own ethnic heritage. Later, however, after the doctor has refused to treat the baby because Kino cannot pay, the servant leads Kino out, and the narrator reports: "And he shut the gate quickly out of shame" (Novels . . . 1942–1952 241–242). The fact that he shuts the gate quickly might at first make him seem as callous as his employer, but the fact that he shuts it out of shame shows that he is capable of moral compassion. Within just a few paragraphs, then, Steinbeck manages to create a minor but complex character: The Indian at first seems supercilious, then seems intimidated enough by his employer to want to distance himself from his own people, but then finally seems embarrassed enough by his employer to feel ashamed of the doctor's behavior. The Indian servant is thus a minor but typical example of the ways the story moves beyond the simple black versus white polarities of an uncomplicated parable, thereby becoming something more than a straightforward allegory of good versus evil.

No matter how complex the characterization, however, the book would not hold much interest if its language were dull. Steinbeck, fortunately, manages to breathe a good deal of life into the novel simply by the skill of his phrasing. Often, for example, the language has the same kind of rhythmic repetition and simple phrasing frequently found in the King James version of the Bible, as in the following passage describing Kino dreaming of Coyotito's reading: "And then darkness spread over the page, and with the darkness came the music of evil again, and Kino stirred in his sleep; and when he stirred, Juana's eyes opened in the darkness. And then Kino awaked, with the evil music pulsing in him, and he lay in the darkness with his ears alert" (Novels . . . 1942–1952 263). The repeated images and the pulsating "and . . . and . . . and" clauses make the language seem artfully artless, as if it were being spoken rather than written. Sometimes, too, the language can seem almost primitive in its simplicity, as when Juana's birth pangs are called "child pain" (Novels . . . 1942–1952 239) or the poor are referred to as "poverty people" (Novels . . . 1942–1952 240), yet sometimes the phrasing can also seem sophisticated in its poise and balance, as in a comment about four beggars sitting outside a church: "They knew every little scandal and some very big crimes" (Novels . . . 1942–1952 240). The imagery, too, is often sharp and precise (as when the narrator reports that the doctor's eye's "rested in puffy little hammocks of flesh" [Novels . . . 1942–1952 241]), and the words are also frequently rich in sound effects (such as assonance and alliteration), as when Kino, having seen the special pearl, is flooded with feelings that seem "glowing and gloating and triumphant" (Novels . . . 1942–1952 250). On nearly every page, then, Steinbeck manages to provide some intriguing linguistic nugget that resembles the pearl itself: The language of the book is smooth but is also often brilliant, and it never ceases to command our fascinated attention.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with ERNEST HEMINGWAY's brief novel The Old Man and the Sea. How are the works similar in setting, style, characterization, and theme? What is the role of struggle and loss in both stories? What is the nature of the struggle in each work, and how are the struggles distinctive?
2. Read this story alongside ZORA NEALE HURSTON's tale "The Gilded Six-Bits." How does each work deal with the theme of "paradise lost"? What role does materialism play as a motivating factor in each work? Discuss the relations between the married couples in each work. How is each tale morally and psychologically complex?
3. Read this story in relation to THORNTON WILDER's brief novel The Bridge of San Luis Rey. How does each writer cope with the challenge of presenting a "foreign" (that is, non-American) culture? What is gained by setting these works in non-American locales? How are the works similar in style and characterization? How is loss a major factor in both works?
4. Discuss the ways Steinbeck presents male and female characters in this novel. Does his presentation conform to—and/or violate—any stereotypes? If the presentations are at all stereotypical, how might that kind of presentation perhaps seem appropriate to the kind of work he has composed here? In other words, how might the subgenre of this work have affected the way he chose to present his men and women?

Travels with Charley in Search of America* (1962)

In this meditative journey of his travels across the United States in 1960 accompanied by an old French poodle named Charley, Steinbeck describes his progress from New York to New England, then his trip across the northern rim of the country, down the West Coast, through Texas, into Louisiana, and then back home to New York. Traveling in a specially outfitted truck with a camper on the back, Steinbeck moved around anonymously and was never recognized; he stayed mostly on back roads and visited many small towns in an effort to reacquaint himself with the sights, sounds, habits, and pulse of his country. He was distressed by many of the changes he witnessed, including rapid urbanization, growing materialism, and a loss of independent spirit.

This book was one of Steinbeck's most popular best sellers; many readers must have found the idea of a famous author traveling around the country with his dog inherently appealing, but Steinbeck produced a book with a sharper bite than many might have expected. The book is not a straightforward hymn to the natural beauty of the American landscape (although Steinbeck does sometimes wax lyrical, especially when describing California redwoods), and it is even less a simple celebration of the sturdy virtues of the American people. Often, indeed, its depiction of American lifestyles and manners is quite bleak, especially when Steinbeck arrives in the Deep South in the midst of the Civil Rights movement and witnesses numerous examples of ugly racism. Anyone turning to the book merely for a fuzzy, warm, nostalgic, and cheerful report about "life in these United States" must have been disappointed, for Steinbeck's own disappointment with his country is expressed repeatedly. If he hoped (as he did) that by renewing his intimate acquaintance with his country he would restock his supply of topics to write about and refresh his inspiration, he must have been a bit frustrated, at least on the second count. The book is not entirely inspiring, but for that very reason it can at least claim to be honest.

Dog lovers will of course find this book appealing (even if it seems incongruous that the companion of this hard-nosed, hard-drinking, and often rough-spoken traveling author is a poodle!), and Steinbeck tries his best to guard against the kind of sentimentality that might inevitably creep into a book on such a topic. Thus he spends a good deal of time emphasizing Charley's urinary habits, and he avoids the temptation to make Charley seem too cutely human. Meanwhile, the journey from one place to another and from one encounter to another gives Steinbeck

6. Discuss the ways women are presented in several of Steinbeck's works. Are there any continuities in the ways they are depicted? What qualities does Steinbeck seem to admire in women? Are those qualities different in any ways from the traits he seems to admire in men? Which of Steinbeck's women do you consider most memorable and/or admirable? Explain why.
7. View one or more of the numerous films and/or television productions that have been based on work(s) by Steinbeck. How well does a given film or program do justice to Steinbeck's text? What changes did the director of the film make in adapting the text for the screen, and in what ways were those changes either appropriate or inappropriate? Study one of Steinbeck's own film adaptations of one of his works, such as his screenplay for The Red Pony. What changes did he make in his own work, and why?
8. A number of Steinbeck's texts were adapted for theatrical presentation, even as musicals. Compare and contrast one of those adaptations with the original text. What kinds of changes were made in the movement from one genre to another, and what is the logic behind those changes? Is one version of the work more effective than another, or is each version effective in its own way? Explain your responses in detail.
9. Examine one of Steinbeck's lesser-known works—such as Sweet Thursday, The Wayward Bus, The Short Reign of Pippin IV, The Winter of Our Discontent—and discuss that work in relation to his better-known writings. How is the lesser-known work similar to and/or different from his more famous writings in themes, style, characterization, plot, and so forth? Does the lesser-known work deserve to be more widely read and appreciated? If so, why? If not, why not?
10. Choose a relatively brief section (a page or two at most) from any one of Steinbeck's works, and then discuss that passage in detail. How is the passage typical of Steinbeck's writings in style, theme, characterization, setting, and other characteristics? How does the passage contribute to the work of which it is a part? How does it relate to what has preceded it in the work; how does it connect to what follows? How is the passage effective simply as a piece of writing?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Bloom, Harold, ed. John Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1996.
- DeMott, Robert. "Chronology." In The Grapes of Wrath and Other Writings 1936–1941, by John Steinbeck, edited by Robert DeMott and Elaine A. Steinbeck, 1,031–1,049. New York: Library of America, 1996.
- Ditsky, John, ed. Critical Essays on Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989.
- Donahue, Agness McNeill, ed. A Casebook on The Grapes of Wrath. New York: Crowell, 1968.
- French, Warren. "John Steinbeck." In Sixteen Modern American Authors: A Survey of Research and Criticism, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 499–527. New York: Norton, 1973.
- . "John Steinbeck." In Sixteen Modern American Authors. Vol. 2, A Survey of Research and Criticism since 1972, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 582–622. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.
- Hayashi, Tetsumaro, ed. A New Study Guide to Steinbeck's Major Works, with Critical Explications. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1993.
- Lisca, Peter. The Wide World of John Steinbeck. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1958.
- National Steinbeck Center. Available online. URL: <http://www.steinbeck.org/MainFrame.html>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Steinbeck, John. "The Chrysanthemums." In 50 Great Short Stories. Edited by Milton Crane. New York: Random House, 1988.
- . The Grapes of Wrath and Other Writings 1936–1941. Edited by Robert DeMott and Elaine A. Steinbeck. New York: Library of America, 1996.
- . Novels and Stories 1932–1937. Edited by Robert DeMott and Elaine A. Steinbeck. New York: Library of America, 1994.
- . Novels and Stories 1942–1952. Edited by Robert DeMott. New York: Library of America, 2001.

Robert C. Evans

WALLACE STEVENS (1879–1955)

In poetry, you must love the words, the ideas and images and rhythms with all your capacity to love anything at all.

(“Adagia”)

Although poets are often assumed to lead exciting, romantic lives, the outward existence of Wallace Stevens was largely uneventful. He spent most of his adulthood as a prominent insurance executive, composing his poems in the time he spared from overseeing a department concerned with surety bonds. Shy, retiring, but self-assured, he shunned publicity and kept his distance from most people; certainly he was not flamboyant in the ways other notable modern poets (such as EZRA POUND or Dylan Thomas) have been. Ideas for poems often occurred to him as he walked to and from work, and it was later the job of his secretary to type the poems after deciphering his nearly impenetrable handwriting. His poetic career began late, was interrupted by a lengthy period of silence, but then developed steadily and productively, so that by the end of his life, he was widely regarded as one of the best, most distinctive, and most innovative voices in modern American literature. He is now often considered one of the finest modern poets, although his works are often so complex in phrasing, tone, and theme that he never achieved the wide public fame of writers such as ROBERT FROST or even T. S. ELIOT. He is often called a poet’s poet—an author whose true greatness is best appreciated only by other workers in the craft.

Stevens was born on October 2, 1879, in Reading, Pennsylvania, where his father was a lawyer and where his mother encouraged an interest in Christianity and music. Stevens received a solid education in the local schools, where he eventually excelled as a student and where his interest in writing (especially for the school newspaper) first developed. After graduating from high school in 1898 with various distinctions, he entered Harvard as a special student (on a three-year course of study). There he read widely, studied with noted scholars, rose to prominence on the staff of the college newspaper, and increasingly began to compose stories and especially poems. After leaving Harvard in 1900, he settled in New York, working as a journalist for various newspapers before deciding (at the urging of his practical-minded father) to study law. Nevertheless, while pursuing his legal studies he maintained and even increased his commitment to creative writing, vowing to write something each evening, no matter how little. By 1903 he had graduated from law school, and by 1904, while back in Reading, he had met an attractive young woman—Elsie Viola Kachel Moll—who would eventually become his wife. Meanwhile, he worked in New York as a lawyer, reading widely, writing to Elsie, and even composing a book of poems for her. His parents, however, strongly disapproved of this romance, considering Elsie socially inferior. Angered by their opposition, Stevens proposed marriage in 1908 and began avoiding his family during trips home to Reading.

Stevens’s early devotion to Elsie (whom he considered physically stunning) are reflected in his frequent letters to her, in his composition of another gift book of poems, and, finally, in their marriage on September 21, 1909—an event his family boycotted. Although the couple established a home in New York, Elsie was frequently back in Reading. The deaths of Stevens's father in 1911 and then of his mother in 1912 helped him reestablish some connections with the rest of his family, although for years he remained rather distant, both geographically and emotionally. Meanwhile, he was enjoying growing success in business, having begun working in the insurance business, and in 1914 he was made a local vice president for the Equitable insurance company in New York. He was at this time also increasingly writing poems and submitting them for publication. In fact, he had by now already written some of his most memorable works, particularly "Sunday Morning" (considered by many one of the greatest poems of the 20th century). He began to interact with other poets and artists and had begun to win a reputation as a significant writer. In 1916, however, the Equitable collapsed, and so Stevens was forced to leave New York to begin working at the Hartford insurance company in Hartford, Connecticut, where he would spend the rest of his life and make his name both as a poet and a highly competent executive. During this period immediately preceding and following the end of World War I, he composed a few plays, traveled on business, won several literary prizes, and broadened his connections (mostly through correspondence) with other literary figures. In 1922 he visited both Cuba and Florida, finding the latter most appealing and using it as a backdrop for some of his most famous poems. By that same year, also, he had collected some of his works and submitted them for publication as a book; this volume, eventually titled Harmonium, was issued in fall 1923 by Alfred A. Knopf (a prominent publisher), after which Stevens and his wife left on an extended vacation to Cuba, Central America, California, and then back across the United States to Hartford. Their only child (Holly) was conceived during this trip and was born on August 10, 1924.

Reviews of Harmonium were mixed. Some critics praised it for its brilliance, wit, cleverness, innovation, and exoticism, while others condemned it for some of the very same reasons, censuring Stevens for being a dandy, an aesthete, and a writer whose highly wrought style failed to conceal a lack of human substance (Sharpe 116–118). Ironically in the years following the publication of what is now considered one of the most important books of modern American poetry, Stevens largely ceased to write. He attributed this lack of productivity to the demands of his job and the constraints of his family life, but his health was also poor during this period. Whatever the reasons, during the late 1920s and early 1930s he wrote very little, although a few new works were included in a revised version of Harmonium published in 1931. By this time, of course, America was in the depths of the Great Depression, but Stevens, the successful executive, was relatively immune. Indeed, by 1933 he had purchased a large home in a fashionable neighborhood of Hartford and was employing a local woman to help look after the house and care for his daughter. Relations with his wife had been strained for some time and never really improved; the couple seemed to have less and less in common, and Stevens rarely if ever invited his few friends to visit him at home. Business associates often remembered him as aloof but industrious; many considered him ironic, reserved, yet highly competent. He could be secretly kind and openly sarcastic; he was loved and respected by people who knew him well and disliked and distrusted by others. Although he often enjoyed a good drink and a bad joke, he was hardly a "hail fellow well met," and his relations with his wife, daughter, family, friends, colleagues, and fellow artists often seem to have been stiff, distanced, reserved, and formal. Nevertheless, he did well at any task he set for himself, particularly in business, and by 1934 he had been named a vice president of the Hartford, which was now one of the most successful insurance companies in the country.

By this time Stevens had begun writing again, and in 1935 his important book Ideas of Order was issued by a small press and then reprinted the following year by Knopf. During 1936, too, occurred the one incident in Stevens's life that seems surprising: a drunken brawl in Florida with ERNEST HEMINGWAY

(in which Stevens had the worst of it), although the two men soon reconciled. Ideas of Order was well received, and Stevens was increasingly recognized as one of the country's major poets—a status acknowledged, during the coming years and decades, through an increasing shower of prizes, awards, honorary degrees, and invitations to speak on the campuses of leading colleges. The year 1937 saw the publication of his collection The Man with the Blue Guitar (with its significant title poem), and, by 1939, when Stevens turned 60, he enjoyed not only widespread respect but also the friendship of wealthy and influential people and broad connections in the literary community. Unfortunately he did not enjoy much happiness at home, where relations with his wife were as distant as ever. As World War II broke out in Europe, Stevens was entering a new period of literary productivity and was the focus of increasing attention from sympathetic critics. More and more he composed essays as well as poems, and in 1942 (with America now fully involved in the war) his book Parts of a World was published by Knopf and his poems “Notes toward a Supreme Fiction” were issued by a small private press. Ironically by 1943–44 he found himself as vigorously opposed to his daughter's choice of a mate as his own parents had once resisted his own marriage to Elsie. Nevertheless, although Stevens considered Holly's fiancé socially inferior, she married him anyway, and her marriage would soon prove even less happy than that of her parents (Brazeau 277).

In 1945 Stevens's book Esthétique du Mal was issued by a small but respected press, and further recognition of Stevens's growing status was signified when he was named a fellow of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. The next year he received a major poetry award, and in 1947 he was not only invited to speak at Harvard but received an honorary degree from Wesleyan University and saw the publication of his Harvard lectures by a private press. In 1948 he spoke at both Yale and Columbia Universities, and in 1949 he used a speaking engagement in Connecticut to read one of his most important poems, “An Ordinary Evening in New Haven.” He was awarded the prestigious Bollingen Prize in 1950, witnessed the publication of his book The Auroras of Autumn by Knopf, and was pleased when Knopf also committed itself to reprinting all of his previous books. The Auroras of Autumn received the National Book Award in 1951, the same year in which some of his prose was published in book form as The Necessary Angel. Speaking engagements and honorary degrees were now commonplace for Stevens, and he was also more and more often an official judge of others' poems for prizes and awards. In 1953 a volume of his Selected Poems was finally published in England, and the following year his monumental Collected Poems was issued by Knopf in time for his 75th birthday, which was celebrated by many of the most important writers of the time. He was offered the chance to be Harvard's professor of poetry for 1955–56 but declined, but in 1955 he did accept an honorary degree from Yale, won his second National Book Award, and was also awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Despite his growing public stature, however, his good fortune was not unblemished. His wife suffered a stroke in January 1955, and in April Stevens himself was hospitalized with intestinal troubles. Surgery revealed severe stomach cancer, and during the next few months he shuttled back and forth from his home to a convalescent facility to the hospital where he would soon die. His mood was surprisingly cheerful; his family had concealed his ultimate diagnosis from him, but he must have realized that his life was coming to an end. A priest who often visited him in the hospital later claimed that Stevens, who had always been an atheist or agnostic with a strong interest in religion (and in poetry as a possible substitute for religion), converted to Roman Catholicism shortly before his death, but that this news was withheld from his wife and daughter. In any case, when Stevens died on August 2, 1955, he was widely hailed as one of the most distinctive and important poets in the history of American literature (Brazeau 289–298).

“Sunday Morning” (1915, 1923)

A woman stays home on a Sunday morning rather than going to church, but, instead of merely enjoying herself or simply feeling guilty, she reflects on the role of religion in human life and ponders possible alternatives to it.

“Sunday Morning” is widely considered one of Stevens’s very finest poems. It opens by depicting a woman relaxing on a Sunday morning, apparently having skipped the church service that would have been considered obligatory by most people in her time. Yet even as she enjoys the physical pleasures of fruit, drink, sun, and nature, she nevertheless cannot help thinking of Christianity, which was born in “silent Palestine, / Dominion of the blood and sepulchre” (or burial place) (ll. 14–15). In this splendid opening stanza, already full of vivid imagery and mesmerizing sound effects (especially assonance and alliteration), Stevens introduces the basic thematic tension that dominates the work: Should we enjoy the world or renounce it, indulge the flesh or nourish the spirit, live for the present or focus on the past or future? The second stanza opens appropriately with questions, which in this work are far more important than answers. The woman wonders why she should renounce pleasure to worry about death or the dead; she wonders why divinity usually seems so insubstantial and why earthly joys do not seem (to most people) as precious as a merely imagined heaven. And then, as if to save the poem from a sentimental romanticism, Stevens ends the stanza by acknowledging the complexities of earthly life—its pain as well as its pleasures, its losses as well as its gains. For a brief moment the poem seems to reach a resolution in the final line of stanza 2, but the poem’s great glory is that Stevens never rests, nor ever allows us to rest or stop thinking, and so the meditation begins anew with stanza 3.

This stanza briefly surveys past religious ideas, especially classical mythology and the Christianity that replaced it. Jove (king of the Greek and Roman gods) once commanded devotion, but, because he seemed too distant, too remote and imperious, human beings imagined a different kind of god (Jesus Christ) who was both human and divine. The stanza ends, however, by asking whether it might not be possible (and might not be better) simply to dispense with gods altogether. Instead of inventing a fictitious heavenly paradise, might it not be best simply to acknowledge that earth itself may be “all of paradise that we shall know?” (l. 41). If we were willing to give up our dreams (or illusions) of supernatural perfection, nature itself might then seem more satisfying. Yes, our life here has its labors and pains, but it is also full of beauty, joy, and love, and, if we could accept the earth as our home (rather than merely as a brief stop on the way to a supposedly glorious heaven), our lives here and now might be more satisfying and contented. Once again, however, Stevens ends with only a temporary resolution, for in stanza 4 the meditation begins anew. The woman now admits that although she is indeed happy with earthly joys and pleasures, she knows they can never last. Once they fade, how can we then be happy? The answer seems to lie in the cycles of natural existence: Yes, spring ends, but it also returns, and the palpable reality of nature is far more substantial and reliable than the merely imaginary pleasures of myth or religion. But again, in stanza 5, the apparent answer is once more undercut by new questioning: Yes, the pleasures of nature may return each year, but she still longs for a personal happiness that will not fade, that will be permanent. In response, Stevens offers one of his most compelling statements: “Death is the mother of beauty”—a claim so important that he states it twice (ll. 63, 88). In other words, it is precisely our realization of our mortality and mutability that makes anything beautiful seem beautiful and precious. It is the consciousness of loss that makes us value beauty; that consciousness also makes us want to create beautiful things, whether they be works of art, acts of love, or children. The impulse to love and procreate is partly an effort to cheat and defeat death, to make beauty from mortality, to wrestle something precious from inevitable loss.

Stanza 6 amplifies this argument, suggesting that the merely imaginary paradises of myth or religion are static and sterile because they lack (or deny) change. Although they are usually described in ways that make them resemble beautiful places of nature, such heavens are unreal, and they lack the mutability that defines true, natural existence. Once again the poem states that “Death is the mother of beauty,” but now it also insists that from the realization of death are born the mothers who themselves give birth to others: Human procreation is one long, continuous chain of acts designed to defeat death by creating and re-creating life. In stanza 7 the poem becomes almost visionary and ecstatic, as the speaker imagines a time when people will praise the glories of the sun and when all of nature will be united in one large choir of celebration. The sun, however, will be praised not as a god (for to praise it thus would merely repeat past mistakes), “but as a god might be” (l. 94). Thus, in this new ecstatic vision, we will appreciate nature’s beauties without foolishly deifying nature. If human beings can accept their mortality (rather than denying it or wishing it away), they will “know well the heavenly fellowship / Of men that perish.” They will see their lives to be as beautiful (but also as brief and precious) as the morning dew (ll. 102–103). By accepting our common mortality we can begin to overcome our divisions, enjoying our brotherhood as children of the earth. Finally, in stanza 8, the poem and its meditations come full circle: The woman comprehends that the “tomb in Palestine” is not a site of divine resurrection; it is simply “the grave of Jesus, where he lay” (l. 109). It is, in other words, the final resting place of a man like the rest of us—a man precious not because he was God’s son but merely because he was our human brother. In its final lines the poem reminds us that in one respect we are fundamentally alone: In reality, no gods protect or terrorize us; we live like an island’s inhabitants, “unsponsored, free” (l. 112). But our island (this earth) is full of beauty; it is our home, and we share it with lovely creatures. Graceful sights and charming sounds are all around us. In the end, however, we must acknowledge that night follows day, that death follows life, and that finally we, like the birds Stevens so beautifully describes, must sink “Downward to darkness, on extended wings” (l. 120).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with another important modern poem on religion, T. S. ELIOT’s “Ash Wednesday.” In particular, discuss the two poems in terms of their images, tones, moods, and implied points of view. Which work seems more complex? Which (if either) seems more “convincing,” and why?
2. Compare and contrast the presentation of nature here and in JACK LONDON’s “The Law of Life” or in Stephen Crane’s “The Open Boat.” In particular, what aspects of Stevens’s view of nature make him seem more “romantic” than the other writers? How, in this poem, does he try to guard himself against excessive romanticism or sentimentalism? In other words, how does he try to ground the poem in realism?
3. Can a religious person appreciate and value a poem like this? If so, how and why? If not, why not? Is it necessary to agree with the message of a work of art in order to appreciate the work’s beauty, skill, and complexity?
4. Examine the attitude toward death in this poem. How does the work imply the value of being constantly aware of death? Is it open to an accusation of sentimentality? Why or why not?

“Anecdote of the Jar” (1923)

The anonymous speaker places a jar on a hillside in Tennessee, and this simple act transforms his (and our) perceptions.

This mysterious little poem, with its odd title and even odder “plot,” is typical of Stevens in its tendency to provoke thought without providing clear or simple answers. Its wit begins already in its title, since the word anecdote (which refers to a short narration concerning something real, but which can also imply an unreliable account) derives from a Greek term meaning “things unpublished.” Obviously, however, Stevens’s “anecdote” is published, and its inclusion in a book of poems implies that it will have some significant meaning. Who, however (besides Stevens), would think of writing a poem about a simple jar? Well, John Keats wrote a famous lyric about a Grecian urn, and surely Keats’s poem is somewhere in the background of Stevens’s work, influencing its interpretation if only through our reactions to the poems’ differences. Keats’s urn, for instance, is elaborately decorated, whereas Stevens's jar is plain and unadorned. Keats's urn is associated with the artistic glories of a great, exotic civilization; Stevens's jar, on the other hand, exists in isolation in a rural Tennessee landscape and seems to serve no present purpose, not even the utilitarian one for which it was presumably designed. Yet both Keats's urn and Stevens's jar do seem to symbolize something created, something man-made, and thus some aspect of human skill and art as opposed to uncomplicated nature, and just as Keats's urn invites our contemplation and meditation, so does Stevens's jar. A simple, ordinary object to which we would usually pay no great attention becomes an object of fascination when it is placed in an unusual context. In this sense, the speaker's "plac[ing]" of the jar symbolizes the creative act of the artist, who, by inserting something man-made into the midst of nature, alters our perception not only of the object itself but also of the surrounding landscape and of relations between the two. The poem's simple, spare language (so different from the elaborate, punning pyrotechnics we often encounter in Stevens) is perfectly appropriate to its clipped, blunt tone; its brief, declarative syntax; and its clear, formulaic structure (just three four-line stanzas, with just two sentences in each of them). The poem is simultaneously plain and provocative, ordinary and strange, clear and yet compellingly odd.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Although this poem profits from plain language and simple structure, discuss some examples of how it also employs "poetic" devices such as repetition, assonance, rhyme, structural circularity, and inverted sentence structure.
2. Taking your cue from the preceding discussion, compare and contrast this poem and Keats's "Ode." In particular, discuss the different titles of the works and their differences in length, stanza forms, points of view, tone, and meaning.
3. Compare and contrast this work with William Carlos Williams's poem "The Red Wheelbarrow." In particular, discuss the poems in terms of their lengths, themes, tones, points of view, and kinds of diction.

"The Emperor of Ice-Cream" (1923)

A burly worker is summoned to a domestic gathering where male and female youths have begun to congregate and where the worker is given the task of preparing ice cream. The gathering, apparently, is a wake for an old woman who has recently died, and whose stiff, silent body lies on her bed, illuminated by lamp light, as the ice cream is prepared.

Beginning (as he often does) with a tantalizing title, Stevens immediately arouses our curiosity: Who or what is an "emperor of ice-cream"? The poem itself commences with a commanding, accented verb and a striking image: The "roller of big cigars" is presumably a strong, "muscular" laborer whose strength makes him the ideal person to "whip" (another active, accented verb), in normal, everyday "kitchen cups," the "concupiscent" (or pleasurable) "curds" of ice cream (ll. 1–3). In a mere three lines, then, we are in the midst of a typical Stevens poem: The basic situation is unclear but intriguing and makes us want to read further; the heavy use of alliteration (especially in line 3) implies a playful tone; and the juxtaposition of opposites (such as concupiscent and curds) exemplifies Stevens's typically ironic double vision. We are unsure just what is happening, but we want to learn more. Girls (although here called by the archaic term wenches, which implies sexuality) are present, and so are boys (the word implying their youth and thus also their sexuality); the girls are dressed plainly and the boys bring flowers plainly wrapped. The scene is thus one of ordinary beauty and ordinary vitality, but it is one of beauty and vitality nonetheless. Not until the second stanza do we discover that the occasion for this gathering is a wake—a celebration of a person's life after that person's death. The dead woman (like her mourners) was presumably poor or at least lower-middle-class: Just as their clothes and flowers are unelaborate, so the dresser near her deathbed is damaged, but while she lived, she was capable of creating beauty by "embroider[ing] fantails" on the "sheet" now used to "cover her face" (ll. 10–12). Her dead body may now be cold, silent, and even ugly (ll. 13–14), but it is as much a fact of life, which must be confronted unflinchingly, as is the pleasure symbolized by the ice cream. Death happens, but life goes on; indeed, it is the fact of death that gives meaning and intensity to our passing fleshly joys. One woman has died, but the community continues and is drawn together by her passing to renew its affirmation of life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In Stevens's poem "Sunday Morning," the speaker asserts, "Death is the mother of beauty." How, specifically, is that assertion relevant to this work? In what ways does death enhance our appreciation of beauty and even lead to the creation of beautiful things?
2. Discuss all the different kinds of pleasure implied throughout this work, and then discuss how they relate to one another and how they contribute to the poem's larger theme. What role (if any) does religion play in this poem? How is the tone of this work (and its attitude toward death) different from that in EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON's poem "Luke Havergal"?
3. Research the meaning of the term carpe diem, and in particular examine some poems in the carpe diem tradition (such as Robert Herrick's "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may"). Then, discuss how this work by Stevens falls into that tradition. What is the role of sexuality in such poems?

"A High-Toned Old Christian Woman"

(1923)

An anonymous, unidentified speaker addresses the woman of the title, informing her that poetry is "the supreme fiction" (l. 1) and imaginatively suggesting that the impulse to morality and the impulse to sensual pleasure may share common roots. Indeed (the speaker implies) perhaps the people who seem most rigorous in their sensual self-denial derive pleasure from their apparent pain, so that pleasure may be the ultimate source of much human conduct, even if it bothers some persons to consider this possibility.

This poem, from Harmonium, is typical of Stevens's work as a whole, especially his early work. As often in Stevens, the title is important: Each adjective is significant, for the fact that the woman addressed is "High-Toned," "Old," and "Christian" implies that she is somewhat stuffy and pretentious; that her thinking may be traditional to the point of being outmoded and that she represents the kind of conventional, unthoughtful religion that Stevens often questioned. Although the poem is explicitly addressed to her (as the first line makes clear), she is never given a chance to reply; we hear only the speaker's side of the dialogue, but we can easily imagine the views he is critiquing. Like many of Stevens's poems, this one is explicitly concerned with poetry in particular and with the imagination in general. Stevens considered the imagination, and the arts it produced, as among the most precious of human possessions, and indeed he saw the imagination as perhaps the "supreme" feature of the human mind and life. In this poem he implicitly defends poetry against religion, implying that religion itself is largely an imaginative construct. His tone, here as so often elsewhere, is hypothetical and speculative (as in line 1), but the speaker also tries to imply the logic of his views, especially in such words or phrases as "Thus" (ll. 3, 9) and "That's clear" (l. 6). In addition, the tone is also whimsical, ironic, and even somewhat sardonic; even the repeated use of the word madame can be seen as simultaneously respectful and sarcastic. The heavy emphasis on assonance (as in lines 2, 10, 12, 18, and especially 21–22) and the even heavier use of alliteration (as in lines 2–5, 8–10, 12–13, 15–16, 18–19, and especially 21–22) are typical of the verbal playfulness and cleverness (some would say "self-indulgence" and "frivolity") so often found in Stevens's speakers, who love the sounds their words make both in the ear and on the tongue. The poem suggests, however, that earthly pleasure (even the pleasure of mere sounds) is a positive good that should not be despised in favor of "haunted heaven" (l. 3).

For Discussion or Writing

1. This poem shares similar themes and arguments with "Sunday Morning." Why, however, is the latter poem a considerably greater work of art? In particular, compare and contrast the two poems in terms of their tones, their uses of ambiguity, and the fairness with which they deal with opposing points of view.

2. Choose five words or phrases from this poem that seem to you especially striking or effective and discuss how and why they have their effect. Discuss them in terms of their denotation, their connotation, their qualities of sound and rhythm, and the ways they fit into the larger design of the poem as a whole.
3. How can you justify (or how might Stevens justify) the use of a line such as line 18 in a serious poem? How does this line contribute to the larger themes or meaning of the work, and how does it reflect the larger attitude of the poem's speaker?

“Peter Quince at the Clavier” (1923, 1931)

As Peter Quince (perhaps the comic stage manager in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream) plays at a keyboard and thinks of a beautiful woman, he is reminded of the biblical figure of Susanna, herself a beauty, who, as she bathed, once inspired dangerous lust in some elderly voyeurs. When the old men tried to rape her, Susanna resisted. The poem ends by reflecting that although merely abstract beauty fades, beauty embodied achieves immortality, if only through memory.

This poem illustrates many common characteristics of Stevens's verse. In its opening and closing stanzas it is highly meditative, even philosophical—musing on the relations between music and emotion and then on the connections between beauty in the mind and in the flesh. The two middle stanzas, meanwhile, are highly evocative; they, in particular, are full of vivid, sensuous images, so that as readers we, too, like the elders, almost become voyeurs. Quince is a kind of artist, and the poem (as do many by Stevens) partly concerns art itself and the act of artistic creation. Many commentators have suggested that the poem has, appropriately enough, a musical structure (perhaps indebted to the sonata or sonatina forms), and certainly musical imagery provides much of its unity. But Stevens also uses his characteristic emphasis on repetition of all kinds, just as he also typically exploits the full range of sound effects, especially through alliteration and assonance (see especially lines 13–15). Each section has its own shape, structure, and rhythm, from the tercets of section 1, to the alternating long and short lines of section 2, to the rhymed couplets of section 3, and concluding with the irregular rhymes and unpredictable stanzas of section 4. These alterations and variations make the work resemble even more a musical composition, yet the poem also gains unity through its underlying theme of beauty, its imagery of music, and its abiding concern with Susanna as a symbol of both loveliness and love.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss in detail some of the specific techniques Stevens uses in this poem. For instance, in the first section, how does he instantly create a sense of immediacy? In the same section, how does he introduce a sense of argumentative logic into a poem that otherwise emphasizes emotion? Why and how does he use colors in this section? Here and elsewhere, discuss the poetic effectiveness of his word choices as precisely as possible.
2. Compare and contrast Stevens's poem with the biblical episode of Susanna and the elders. How closely does Stevens follow the biblical account? What details, if any, does he change or omit? Is it possible to understand the poem without knowing the biblical report?
3. Compare and contrast the imagery used to describe Susanna with the images used to describe the elders. Discuss the connotations of the various images. For instance, why are the elders described as “red-eyed” (l. 12) and “white” (l. 62)? Why is Susanna associated with “water” that is “green,” “clear,” and “warm” (l. 16)? Discuss these and other word choices as precisely as you can.

“The Snow Man” (1931)

In this poem Stevens meditates on possible human responses to a winter landscape. He suggests that to appreciate such a landscape properly and accurately, one must not impose meanings (especially tragic meanings) upon it or derive such meanings from it.

Typically enough, Stevens begins with a double-edged title: At first we might imagine a pleasant winter scene in which children have playfully constructed a stereotypically jolly, cheerful man of snow. But this, of course, is a Stevens poem, and so the mood and tone are thoughtful and philosophical rather than whimsically quaint. Of course, because it is a poem by Stevens, we cannot be easily or precisely sure what it means, although it seems to deal with a problem his writings often confront: the relation between man and nature, the connection between the observer and the thing observed. In other words, here as elsewhere Stevens seems to be concerned with the way the imagination relates to reality. The poem has been linked by critics to ideas associated with Schopenhauer, Heidegger, William James, and Eastern Buddhism (among others), but more important than what the poem may or may not mean is its craft. The work is more significant for the thoughts it provokes than for any answers it provides. What, for instance, does Stevens mean by the open reference to a “mind of winter” (l. 1)? Does he mean a mind attuned to winter? Does he mean a mind stripped bare of preconceptions, as winter itself seems bare and blank? In any case (and these are just two possible meanings), the phrase already suggests the two poles between which Stevens’s thought characteristically moves: between the perceiving mind and the real thing or real fact (in this case, winter) that the mind perceives. Although Stevens implies that winter is a season of nothingness, in lines 2–7 he splendidly evokes it with crisp, precise images that place it before our mental sights. Not until the second half of line 7, however, does the main argument enter: It takes a particular kind of mind to resist imposing a human meaning on what is, after all, a mere landscape. The landscape’s proper viewer must be one who (1) sees clearly all that can be seen, (2) introduces nothing extraneous into his vision, and (3) can also see “the nothing” before him (ll. 14–15). Yet the poem is not merely a philosophical puzzle. If it works as a poem (as a work of art), it works because of the poet’s skill with words and rhythms—a skill that in this case involves striking imagery, effective repetition, puns, paradoxes, and an apparently simple diction that can nonetheless imply extraordinary complexity of thought and feeling.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine the depiction of winter in this poem. What does the poem imply about the relationship between man and nature?
2. Compare and contrast the depictions of landscape in this poem and in Stevens’s poem “Sunday Morning.” In particular, how do the two poems seem to differ in their attitudes toward man’s relationship to nature? Which poem is more consoling or comforting, and why?
3. Compare and contrast this poem with ROBERT FROST’s “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening.” In particular, how do the poems contrast in their views of the relationship between man and nature? How does Stevens’s speaker try to resist the kinds of thoughts emphasized in Frost’s work?

“Of Modern Poetry” (1942)

This poem is striking in its almost programmatic clarity: It both sums up and enacts Stevens’s ideas of what modern poetry (and a modern poem) must be if it is to “suffice” (ll. 2, 10), or seem credible and convincing.

Stevens asserts that poems can no longer (as they once did) merely restate conventional ideas or repeat standard social, religious, or political orthodoxies, for these no longer exist. The modern poem, like the modern people it must serve and satisfy, must be an act of continual questing, of ceaseless finding, of constant discovery and rediscovery. It must be vital and must address people living here and now: It must address crucial aspects of reality (such as war), and it must speak so convincingly, and so much in the modern idiom, that those listening will think they hear their own speech. A successful modern poem can describe the simplest actions (“a man skating, a woman dancing, a woman / Combing” [ll. 27–28]), but it must do so in language that rings true to a modern ear and a modern mind. Appropriately enough, Stevens here composes the kind of poem he commends: His language is simple and lucid; his sentence structure is uncomplicated; he writes with exactly the plainness and precision he praises. Yet the poem is not without art or craft, for it uses repetition effectively; it exploits and develops several controlling images (such as the imagery of stages and actors); it shifts between short sentences and long; and its final sentence is a fragment that both echoes and modifies the fragment with which the poem opened. In its loose structure, flexible rhythm, and unpredictable meter, the poem exemplifies the very colloquialism it calls for, so that the work is the perfect marriage of meaning and form, of substance and style.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with a more “difficult” poem by Stevens, such as “The Emperor of Ice-Cream.” What factors, exactly, make the present poem easier to understand than that other work? Which of the two appeals to you more, and why? What are the potential virtues and faults of each work?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with Ernest Hemingway’s short story “Hills Like White Elephants.” In particular, discuss how Hemingway’s story is a “modern” work of art in the ways suggested by Stevens’s poem. How does Hemingway’s story satisfy many of the criteria set out by Stevens?

“Not Ideas about the Thing but the Thing Itself” (1954)

When the speaker hears the weak sound of a single bird outside at the very beginning of a late winter day, he realizes that the sound is the first indication of the rising sun and of the coming spring. The realization strikes him as an epiphany.

Here as in other poems (as the very title of this work suggests), Stevens is concerned with the relations between the mind and reality, between the imagination and the world. The speaker is certain the sound he heard was not imaginary or part of a dream but something real, and (what is more) he associates it with even larger realities, such as the rising sun, the changing seasons, and nature’s response (symbolized by the coming “choir” of the birds [l. 14]) to both these transformations. Typically, at the very end of the poem the speaker is still somewhat tentative: He does not claim that his revelation is in actual fact “A new knowledge of reality”; instead he merely says it is “like” such knowledge (ll. 17–18). Stevens was too intelligent to think that the human mind can ever have pure, unmediated access to reality; he knew that our knowledge could only be approximate. Nevertheless, it is the business of this poem (and of his poetry in general) to help us share quick flashes of insight and revelation that seem to take us closer to the truly real. This particular poem accomplishes its goal of seeming credible through its plain, simple diction; its calm tone; and its lucid but unobtrusive structure. This work is an example of Stevens when he is seemingly most simple but also most profound.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss all the ways this poem deals with states or moments of transition or transformation—conditions of “in-betweenness.” How, for instance, does the first stanza repeatedly stress such states, and how and why is this condition relevant to the poem’s larger meaning?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with Ezra Pound’s brief lyric “In a Station of the Metro.” In particular, discuss the two poems as examples of epiphanies, or sudden, brief revelations. How are the revelations similar (especially in their implications about beauty), and how do they also differ?

“The Plain Sense of Things” (1954)

When summer gives way to winter (or youth gives way to age), things seem to become simpler and more clear, but even to perceive or describe this change still requires the shaping power of the imagination.

5. Compare and contrast Stevens's "Of Modern Poetry" with his own "Sunday Morning." In particular, discuss how "Sunday Morning" exemplifies the kind of modern poem Stevens endorses. Pay special attention to such matters as the poem's diction, the actions it depicts, its emphasis on questing and questioning, and its imagery.
6. Discuss the depiction of nature in at least three different poems by Stevens. How is nature presented differently in each poem? Are there any similarities of presentation? What symbolic functions does nature serve in each work? How is Stevens's concern with nature relevant to his ideas about the relations between imagination and reality? How do Stevens's presentations of nature seem (or not seem) stereotypically "romantic"?
7. Compare and contrast the depictions of death in "The Emperor of Ice-Cream" and in "Sunday Morning." Why do both poems emphasize the presence of young men and women? Why do both poems emphasize the idea of sensual pleasure? Why do both poems emphasize the creation of beauty? How are all these topics relevant to their larger concerns with death?
8. Drawing on the discussions of Stevens offered earlier, discuss how his poem "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" is typical of his work. In particular, discuss the poem's structure, themes, tone, attitudes, and methods, including its use of such techniques as repetition, variation, alliteration, and assonance. How is the poem typical of Stevens in its depictions of nature and in its implications about the role of the imagination?
9. Study some ideas contained in Stevens's prose work The Necessary Angel and then discuss their relevance to one or more of his poems. For example, you might focus on Stevens's ideas about the purposes of poetry, the relations between poetry and religion, the relations between poetry and the physical and social worlds, or the relations between reality and the imagination.
10. Using the poems discussed earlier as examples, what (if anything) do you think can be inferred about Stevens's social or political views? What evidence (if any) do the poems provide for believing that Stevens was a "conservative" or a "liberal," a "traditionalist" or a "progressive," and so on? To what degree do these poems suggest that Stevens was concerned with politics or society? On what specific evidence do you base your conclusions?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Brazeau, Peter. Parts of a World: Wallace Stevens Remembered: An Oral Biography. San Francisco: North Point, 1985.
- Brunner, Edward, John Timberman Newcomb, and Cary Nelson. "Modern American Poetry: Wallace Stevens." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/maps/poets/s_z/stevens/stevens.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Kermode, Frank, and Joan Richardson. "Chronology." In Collected Poetry and Prose. By Wallace Stevens. New York: Library of America, 1997.
- Serio, John N. Wallace Stevens: An Annotated Secondary Bibliography. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1994.
- Sharpe, Tony. Wallace Stevens: A Literary Life. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Stevens, Wallace. Collected Poetry and Prose. Edited by Frank Kermode and Joan Richardson. New York: Library of America, 1997.
- Sukenick, Ronald. Wallace Stevens: Musing the Obscure. New York: New York University Press, 1967.
- Vendler, Helen. On Extended Wings: Wallace Stevens' Longer Poems. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1969.
- . The Wallace Stevens Journal. Available online. URL: <http://www.wallacestevens.com>. Accessed April 7, 2009.

Robert C. Evans

SUI SIN FAR

(EDITH MAUDE EATON)

(1865–1914)

I give my right hand to the Occidentals and my left to the Orientals, hoping that between them they will not utterly destroy the insignificant “connecting link.”

(“Leaves”)

Sui Sin Far is the pen name adopted by a woman born in England and raised in Canada who lived at various times in New York, Jamaica, San Francisco, Seattle, and Boston before dying in Montreal at age 49. The daughter of an English father and Chinese mother, she had been given the name Edith Eaton at birth, but it is as Sui Sin Far that she achieved some measure of contemporary fame as well as lasting historical significance. She was the first author of serious fiction in North America to write as a Chinese person about Chinese (and Chinese-American) topics. Although her physical appearance would easily have allowed her to “pass” as white, and although most of her 13 siblings did indeed blend (and marry) into the dominant culture, Sui Sin Far chose to identify with, and speak up for, a minority population that was strongly discriminated against in her era.

In her journalism as well as in her fiction, Sui Sin Far sought to understand and depict the experiences of the Chinese (especially in America) in ways that would undermine the negative stereotypes that affected the ways they were viewed and treated throughout the English-speaking world. As an unmarried woman of mixed ancestry who struggled throughout her life to make a living, and as an author whose unconventional writing earned her little real income, she chose an independent path that provided little material comfort but that obviously answered a deeper need for personal integriety, self-respect, and empathy with an oppressed people.

Sui Sin Far’s father, Edward Eaton, was born in England in 1839; by the early 1860s he was in Shanghai, China, working as a merchant despite his interest and training in art. There he met a Chinese woman named Lotus Blossom Trefusis. Born in 1846, she had apparently been taken from China and educated in England, as a child; she may have returned to China as a Christian missionary. Despite their similarities of faith and education, Edward and Lotus Blossom were divided by race, yet they chose to defy the traditions of their nations and families by marrying. This decision, however, would have even more impact on their children than on the couple themselves. The first of their children, Edward Charles, was born in China in 1864; the second child (and first daughter) was Edith, who was born in the small village of Macclesfield, England, in 1865. Over the years, 12 more children arrived at regular intervals, and Edith (as the eldest daughter) was deeply involved in raising and supervising them. She thus knew from an early age the time and effort demanded of a mother, and these experiences may have affected her later decision not to marry or have children of her own, especially once she had decided to be a writer. However, another factor perhaps influencing her decision to remain single may have been her own experience with the sometimes violent prejudice faced by children of mixed racial backgrounds; she knew firsthand that such children were often taunted and even attacked by other children and were then later subject to legal discrimination as adults (White-Parks 39).

Some of Edith's most vivid childhood memories centered on the experience of being treated as "different" because of her mixed racial parentage. In a memoir written years later, she recalls being scrutinized as a child by curious adults, and she also recalls later being abused, through attacks and taunting, by other children. Even when quite young, she defended herself, verbally and physically, from such assaults and sought reasons to feel pride in her Chinese heritage, but her early exposure to prejudice left a lasting impact. Moreover, such exposure became, if anything, even more intense after her parents left England for North America in 1871 or 1872. Settling briefly in Hudson City, New York, by 1872 or 1873, they had arrived in Montreal, Canada, the city where Edith would spend most of her childhood and adolescence. By this point, the growing family was increasingly poor; they lived in a city divided ethnically between English- and French-speaking whites as well as by chasms of class. The Eatons lived in a section of Montreal with one of the highest rates of infant death on the planet (White-Park 21), but Edith's father seems to have been less and less interested in making a conventional living. Instead, he spent much time painting, and Edith herself, despite physical frailty, was put to work in the streets, selling lace and hawking her father's artwork. She was educated in private schools and by her parents (although she never mastered written or spoken Chinese), and by 1883 she had found work as a compositor and stenographer for a Montreal newspaper. Stenography, in fact, would be the practical means by which she would earn her living for most of her life, but her work at the paper also allowed her entry into the world of writing, which would provide the focus of her truest and deepest ambitions.

Her earliest known story, "A Trip in a Horse Car," is a human-interest sketch published in 1888 in a new Canadian periodical, the Dominion Illustrated. Over the next two years the same periodical printed seven more works authored by "Edith Eaton"; in some of these (such as "The Origin of a Broken Nose" and "Albemarle's Secret") the writer mocks romanticism, sentimentality, and unrealistic behavior; in others (such as "A Fatal Tug of War" and "Robin") her subjects and tone are darker. None of these early works, however, reveals the Chinese-oriented focus that would later become her hallmark. By the early 1890s, however, she had begun to take a deeper personal interest in Montreal's tiny Chinese community, and it is even possible that two anonymous sketches published in 1890, and focusing on discrimination against Chinese in Canada, were written by her (White-Parks 78–80). Two similar pieces appeared in 1894 and 1895, but it was in 1896 (the year she also visited New York's fairly large Chinatown) that her growing commitment to Chinese people and topics became especially obvious. During that year she published a letter to the Montreal Daily Star titled "A Plea for the Chinaman." Although the letter was signed E. E. (White-Parks 30), in a series of stories printed that same year ("The Gamblers," "Ku Yum," "The Story of Iso," "A Love Story of the Orient," and "A Chinese Feud") she began publishing on Chinese topics under the name Sui Sin Far, a phrase meaning "lily" or "water lily" and associated with love for family and homeland (Diana 74). Her career as the first significant Chinese-American writer on Chinese-American subjects had now begun.

The word career is probably too strong, for Sui Sin Far never made a successful living as a full-time professional writer of fiction. Instead, she almost always had to rely on stenography and journalism. She practiced both professions, for instance, during a brief stint in 1897 in Jamaica, where she was exposed to yet another highly complex multicultural and multiracial society (about which she wrote 30 separate pieces of journalism). It was there that she also (unfortunately) contracted malaria. By 1898 she was back in Montreal, but her doctors soon advised her to head west to a healthier climate, and so by the end of that year she had moved to San Francisco and then, eventually, to Seattle. Even in Seattle she moved at least seven times, often living in single rooms while eking out a modest living. (Throughout her life she sent home money to her parents and siblings.) Meanwhile, her exposure to the relatively large Chinese community in San Francisco (as well as to the much smaller one in Seattle) fed into her work as a journalist and author of short fiction. In 1898 she published "Sweet Sin" and "The Sing-Song Woman"; 1899 saw the publication of "Lin John," "The Story of Tin-A," and "A Chinese Ishmael" (an especially fine work). In 1900 she published "The Smuggling of Tie Co," "A Chinese Tom-Boy," "Ku Yum's Little Sister," and "O Yam—a Sketch." Most of these works of 1898 and 1899 appeared in the California-based periodical Land of Sunshine, but one appeared in the Chicago Evening Post, and increasingly Sui Sin Far would begin to attract a national audience through widely distributed periodicals. In 1902, for instance, her story "The Coat of Many Colors" appeared in the Youth's Companion; in 1904 "A Chinese Boy-Girl" was printed in the influential Century magazine; in 1905 the Chautauquan printed "Aluteh"; and by 1909 Sui Sin Far was sufficiently prominent that a national magazine, the Independent, printed her autobiographical memoir titled "Leaves from the Mental Portfolio of an Eurasian."

Nevertheless, Sui Sin Far never had as much time or money to devote to her writing as she desired. In this respect she was much less fortunate than her sister Winnifred, 10 years younger and married to a white man, who had adopted a fictitious, aristocratic Japanese ancestry (since the Japanese were less discriminated against than the Chinese) as well as a Japanese pen name (Onoto Watanna). By 1899 Winnifred had become a successful published novelist whose numerous books would be issued by major presses; Sui Sin Far, in contrast, won far less acclaim and earned much less money; most of her publications in 1903 and 1904 were small pieces of journalism printed in Los Angeles, and she apparently published nothing at all in 1906, 1907, or 1908. (Many of her manuscripts seem to have been destroyed, unfortunately, in a 1907 train wreck [White-Parks 46–47].) A steady stream of publications resumed, however, in 1909, which saw the printing of at least 20 different works (including adult short fiction, children's stories, and occasional journalism).

A similar flood of at least nine works (including some of Sui Sin Far's most notable stories, such as "Mrs. Spring Fragrance," "A White Woman Who Married a Chinaman," "The Inferior Woman," "Her Chinese Husband," and "The Bird of Love") appeared in 1910, often in major periodicals. Only one tale ("A Love Story from the Rice Fields of China") seems to survive from 1911, although that is also the year that saw the publication of a frank autobiographical essay titled "The Persecution and Oppression of Me," which has recently been attributed to her by Dominika Ferens (98–99). It was in 1912, however, that Sui Sin Far enjoyed her greatest achievement, when the A. C. McClurg publishing company in Chicago brought out 2,500 copies of a handsomely printed selection of her short fiction and children's tales titled Mrs. Spring Fragrance. Nevertheless, despite generally positive reviews and a feature article on the author in a newspaper in Boston (where she had moved in 1910), there is not much evidence that the book sold especially well (no second printing is recorded). At least two other stories were printed in 1912 ("Chan Hen Yen, Chinese Student" and "Who's Game"), and an article, "Chinese Workmen in America," appeared in 1913; after that, however, nothing else seems to survive from her pen, even though she claimed to be working on another book (possibly a novel).

At some point (perhaps as early as 1911) she seems to have returned to Montreal, and it was there that her death notice appeared on April 7, 1914. An obituary attributed her demise to heart trouble, and it also noted the irony that she had died just when her career had begun to flourish. A handsome monument was erected to her in a Montreal cemetery, but for the next 60 years she was largely forgotten. Only in the last decades of the 20th century, with the rise of feminism and ethnic studies, did interest begin to revive in the life and works of this remarkably unusual writer.

"Mrs. Spring Fragrance" (1910, 1912)

"Mrs. Spring Fragrance" describes the way the title character, a sprightly Chinese-American woman from Seattle, helps ensure that her young friend, Mai Gwi Far (also known as Laura), can marry her true love (Kai Tzu) rather than Tsen Hing, whom Laura's traditional Chinese parents have selected for her. While visiting San Francisco, Mrs. Spring Fragrance meets Tsen Hing and the woman he would prefer to marry and assures him that Laura will not object to such a match. When Mr. Spring Fragrance learns that his wife has been seen with Tsen Hing, he fears she may be falling in love with the young bachelor, but when she returns to Seattle, his misunderstandings are laid to rest, and the story ends by affirming the genuine affection between the Spring Fragrances and also by clearing the way for Laura's marriage to Kai Tzu.

This tale is Sui Sin Far's most often-reprinted work. In many ways it typifies her writing, both in style and theme, but in some respects it is not one of her strongest tales. Readers who find it flawed should not assume that it represents her at her best. In numerous respects, however, the story is indeed representative. It is set, for instance, in a genteel, middle-class neighborhood; the Spring Fragrances live between a stereotypical white family and a traditional Chinese family. Sui Sin Far thus demonstrates that not all Chinese Americans live in "Chinatown" ghettos, that not all are poor, and that not all are divorced from "mainstream" America. Both husband and wife speak English well; both are well-mannered and even "cultured" (especially the wife); and both exhibit not only respect for others but a good deal of self-respect as well. In all these ways, Sui Sin Far refutes anti-Chinese stereotypes prevalent in her day; she depicts the Spring Fragrances as, in many respects, a "normal" American middle-class couple. Nevertheless, they also typify her characters in being members of two cultures that often conflict in their values, behavior, and assumptions. Moreover, the story is also characteristic of Sui Sin Far's stories in its focus on such topics as divided identities, the power of romantic love, the complications of marriage, conflicts between children and parents, friendships between women, misunderstandings between the sexes, tensions between and within cultures, and the willingness of women to make a difference by asserting themselves, although often in subtle ways. Stylistically the story is typical of Sui Sin Far in its relatively simple and straightforward language, its use of dialect (both Chinese and American), its subtle (and sometimes not-so-subtle) ironies, its somewhat mannered dialogue, its occasional satire, and its structural sophistication. This story, however, is more consistently comic than many of her best works; its resolution seems somewhat simplistic; and its title character may strike many readers as too quaint, cheerful, and contrived (see White-Parks 165–169, 206). Readers who prefer darker, more realistic, and more "tragic" tales can find them in abundance in Sui Sin Far's other works, but this is not such a story.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the presentation of marriage in this story and in Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour." Is one work more "realistic" than the other? If so, why and how? How do the heroines of the two works differ, not only in their motivations but also in the freedom available to each of them? How do issues of economic class play important roles in both works?
2. Compare and contrast the depiction of romantic love in this story with its depiction in Sui Sin Far's tale "A Chinese Ishmael" (which is available on the Internet). Which story do you prefer, and why? Which story seems more sentimental? Discuss the style and dialogue of the two works.
3. Which aspects of this work do you find most effective, and which aspects do you find least effective? In both cases, explain why. Discuss such matters as characterization, diction, and tone.
4. Compare and contrast this story with ZORA NEALE HURSTON's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God, which also deals with a minority population. Which work seems more plausible or credible? Which seems more psychologically complex? Discuss the use (or absence) of dialect in each work.
5. How does the genre of this piece (in other words, the kind of work it is) affect the presentation of marriage? How would the presentation be different if the work were less comic? Is it fair to judge one kind of work by the standards of another?

6. Discuss the ways in which characters in this story are differentiated by such characteristics as race, class, gender, cultural background, and age. For example, how do the Chinese-American characters differ from the “Anglo” characters, and how do the males differ from the females? What do people of the same generation have in common with one another despite differences of (for instance) ethnicity?

“The Chinese Lily” (1912)

Mermei, a young Chinese woman who has been handicapped and severely disfigured by an accidental fall, lives an isolated life in the upstairs room of a dwelling house in San Francisco's Chinatown, where she is often visited by her devoted young brother, Lin John, who is her only friend and companion. One night, when Lin John cannot visit, Mermei weeps from loneliness, and her weeping is overheard by Sin Far (whose name means Chinese Lily), a young and beautiful neighbor woman who is also lonely and who gives Mermei a Chinese lily as a sign of friendship. Eventually Lin John falls in love with his sister's new friend, but suddenly he is informed one night that his sister's apartment building is on fire; as he reaches the top of a flimsy ladder (surrounded by flames), he and the two female friends realize that there is enough time for him to save only one of the girls. Thus, a fateful choice must be made.

Sui Sin Far's fiction is often most powerful when it is most brief, and the current story is a fine example of the memorable effects she can often achieve in a limited amount of space. Her style seems best when (as here) it is plain, simple, and straightforward—when it is least flowery and sentimental. This is a story that could easily have lent itself to melodrama, both in depicting Mermei and in depicting the final fate of Sin Far, but in this tale the author mostly resists any temptations to indulge in maudlin emotions. Instead, for the most part, the story depends on subtle understatement—a trait that actually enhances the emotional impact of this stinging tragic work.

To say that Sui Sin Far's style in this story is simple, however, is not to suggest that it lacks sophistication. Often, for example, she manipulates syntax (or sentence structure) in ways that give her tale maximum impact. Thus, early in the story she emphasizes the isolation of both Mermei and Lin John in a way that might at first seem improbable: “Their mother had died the day she entered the foreign city, and the father the week following” (Mrs. Spring Fragrance [1995] 102). The abrupt deaths of both parents seem, at first, too coincidental to believe, but then the sentence continues: “both having contracted a fever on the steamer.” Now the deaths seem sadly credible. Likewise, Sui Sin Far again uses syntax effectively when she explains how the orphaned children were cared for by their father's brother: “although he was a poor man he did his best for them until called away by death” (102). Thus, just when the prospects of the unfortunate children might seem to be looking up, the final five words of that sentence appear. The untimely deaths of both the parents and the uncle foreshadow, significantly, the tragic ending of the present story. In this tale (in contrast to some of her better-known works), Sui Sin Far never lets us forget how dark, unpredictable, and unforgiving life can be. The moral dilemmas faced by all three characters at the end of the story and the moral maturity all three display make this tale a brief but unforgettable gem in Sui Sin Far's body of work. The story's richly ambiguous final sentence is especially effective; it literally raises more questions than it answers and thus contributes to the haunting impact of a brief, beautiful, but finally very disturbing work.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Does Lin John make the right choice at the end of this tale? Why or why not? What would you have done if faced with his dilemma? What details from earlier in the story help foreshadow the choices made by all three characters at the end? Was there a third option that none of the characters seems to have considered?
2. In setting, characterization, tone, atmosphere, and style, how does this story contrast with Sui Sin Far's most famous tale, “Mrs. Spring Fragrance”? To which genres does each of these gender, ethnicity), is one more important than another in determining the fates of the characters? Does this relative importance change from one story to another?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Ammons, Elizabeth. "Audacious Words: Sui Sin Far's Mrs. Spring Fragrance." In Conflicting Stories: American Women Writers at the Turn into the Twentieth Century. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. American Women Fiction Writers: 1900–1960. Vol. 3. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 156–177.
- Diana, Vanessa Holford. "Sui Sin Far (Edith Maude Eaton) (1865–1914)." In Asian-American Short Story Writers: An A–Z Guide, edited by Guiyou Huang and Emmanuel S. Nelson, 73–83. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2003.
- Ferens, Dominika. Edith and Winnifred Eaton: Chinatown Missions and Japanese Romances. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002.
- Ling, Amy. "Edith Eaton: Pioneer Chinamerican Writer and Feminist." American Literary Realism 16 (1983): 287–298.
- Novak, Terry D. Available online. URL: Edith Maude Eaton (Sui-Sin Far). Accessed online. URL: <http://voices.cla.umn.edu/artistpages/eatonEdith.php>. Accessed July 11, 2009.
- Solberg, S. E. "Sui Sin Far/Edith Eaton: First Chinese-American Fictionist." MELUS 8, no. 1 (1981): 27–39.
- Sui Sin Park. "Leaves from the Mental Portfolio of an Eurasian." Independent 66 (January 21, 1909): 125–132.
- . Mrs. Spring Fragrance. Chicago: McClurg, 1912.
- . Mrs. Spring Fragrance and Other Writings. Edited by Amy Ling and Annette White-Parks. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.
- White Parks, Annette. Sui Sin Far/Edith Maude Eaton: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

Robert C. Evans

JEAN TOOMER (1894–1967)

“Th form that’s burned int my soul is some twisted awful thing that crept in from a dream, a godam nightmare, an wont stay still unless I feed it. An it lives on words. Not beautiful words. God Almighty no. Misshapen, split-gut, tortured, twisted words.”

(Cane)

Although often considered one of the most important voices in the history of African-American literature, Jean Toomer was sometimes quite ambivalent about being labeled a black person. His personal ancestry was highly complicated, and his skin was light enough that he could even pass as white, as was also true of other members of his immediate family. Toomer thus often preferred to think of himself as the first fully aware member of a new “American” race—a people derived from many different racial and ethnic backgrounds. Nevertheless, Cane—the idiosyncratic amalgam of prose, poetry, and drama for which he is almost solely famous—deals at length with the lives, thoughts, and feelings of American blacks, and Toomer himself obviously identified deeply with African-American culture.

Most of the key facts of Toomer’s life are outlined in the excellent biography by Cynthia Earl Kerman and Richard Eldridge. He was born Nathan Pinchback Toomer (he only much later began referring to himself as Jean) on December 26, 1894, nearly nine months to the day after his mother, Nina Pinchback, had married the much older Nathan Toomer on March 29 of that year. Nina was the daughter of a wealthy and influential man named P. B. S. Pinchback, who had once been elected lieutenant governor (and had even briefly served as governor) of Louisiana in the era following the Civil War, when political opportunities for blacks and persons of mixed race had suddenly (but only briefly) opened. P. B. S. Pinchback possessed skin so light that in some photos he strongly resembles the Scottish-American industrialist Andrew Carnegie, and in the Reconstruction era he was able to use his mixed racial background to political and social advantage. After his political career ended in the South, he moved his family to Washington, D.C., where they lived a life of significant privilege. Pinchback was a strong-willed and imperious man, and he greatly disapproved of Nina’s relationship with Nathan Toomer. He was not surprised, then, when Toomer, in 1895, deserted his new wife and young son. In 1896 Nina reluctantly moved back into her parents’ home and agreed to her father’s insistence that she rename her boy Eugene. During the early years of his life, young Toomer thus lived in a mostly white and mostly affluent neighborhood, under the influence of his successful but domineering grandfather—a man he would both respect and resent.

By 1899 Nina had officially divorced Nathan Toomer, who now essentially disappeared from his son’s life. Eugene’s main male influence, in addition to the imposing example provided by his grandfather, was that of his uncle Bismarck, a man who loved to read and socialize but who, as did all the children of P. B. S., never quite lived up to the old man’s expectations. From 1901 to 1905 young Eugene attended a school for blacks in Washington, and although his heart was not in his schooling, he did enjoy his friendships with other local children, especially their chances to play outdoors in an area that was still largely rural. This relatively happy life was disrupted, however, when in 1906 his mother married a man named Archibald Combes, with whom she moved to Brooklyn, New York. Then, in 1907, the family relocated again, this time to nearby New Rochelle. Young Eugene apparently disliked his stepfather, and when Nina died in 1909, the boy returned to Washington to live once more with his grandparents and his beloved uncle. In 1910 he began high school in a noted all-black institution, but by the time he graduated, his grandfather's finances were no longer sufficient to support the kind of university education both of them thought he deserved. Instead, Toomer headed off in 1914 to study agriculture at the University of Wisconsin. Although he worried that he would suffer discrimination there if people discovered he had attended an all-black high school, his light skin shielded him from obvious prejudice, and in fact he was popular with his classmates (some of whom thought he was an Indian).

Nevertheless, Toomer's college years were unsettled. He soon left Wisconsin, in 1915, intending to study agriculture in Massachusetts, but by 1916 he had arrived in Chicago to study physical training. While there, he also dabbled in atheism and socialism; by 1917 he was in New York City, taking classes at various colleges and supporting himself through odd jobs. Although he never did finish a college degree, all during these years he was actively studious, reading widely (especially the writing of Walt Whitman) and even beginning, in 1918, to produce serious literary work. His story "Bona and Paul" (later included in Cane) dates from this year, and Toomer now began increasingly to think of himself as a professional writer and intellectual. In 1920, for instance, he produced his important poem "The First American," in which he outlined his ideas about transcending standard racial distinctions, and it was around this time, too, that he met the influential writer Waldo Frank and began calling himself Jean Toomer. Frank took an immediate interest in Toomer's writings and career and helped promote both. Fortunately it was in 1921—during a brief stint as a school principal in rural Sparta, Georgia—that Toomer was suddenly inspired to begin writing most of the material he subsequently collected in Cane. Meanwhile, his relationship with Frank was prospering, and he was also gaining contact with ever-growing circles (both in Washington and in New York) of like-minded, ambitious, and unconventional young writers. Many of these new contacts were black, and some of them saw Toomer as part of an emerging "New Negro" movement that would lead to a cultural and artistic renaissance in the black community.

By 1922 Toomer was at the height of his own artistic productivity. His stories, sketches, and poems—many of them soon to be included in Cane—began appearing in avant-garde magazines around the country. By the end of that year Toomer had assembled most of these pieces into the puzzling hybrid he titled Cane, which was soon published (thanks in large part to Waldo Frank's encouragement and glowing introduction) in 1923. The book did not sell well, and Toomer seems to have been bothered by the emphasis—both in Frank's introduction and in the publisher's advertising—on his identity as a "Negro" writer. Nevertheless, most reviewers praised Cane, and Toomer seemed on the verge of a significant literary career. It was just at this moment, however, that he not only began an affair with Margaret Naumburg, the wife of his friend and patron Waldo Frank, but also became increasingly fascinated by the teachings of the Armenian mystic Georges I. Gurdjieff. Gurdjieff's philosophy—and the rigid discipline it required—seemed to offer Toomer a prospect of wholeness, of integrated identity and personal stability, that he had long felt was missing from his life. In any case, his devotion to Gurdjieff's ideas soon became so intense that in 1924 he journeyed to France to study at the master's feet. It was not long before Toomer himself became an instructor in "the Gurdjieff work," and as he became more and more preoccupied with this sort of spiritualism, his interest in creating "literature" declined. He would never cease writing, but Cane would be his one significant literary work.

By 1925 Toomer was back in the United States, spreading the Gurdjieffan gospel not only in Harlem but also in Taos, New Mexico, where he won the support of the wealthy patron Mabel Dodge Luhan. By 1926 his relationship with Margaret Naumburg had ended, but his fascination with Gurdjieff continued. In the summer of that year he was back at Gurdjieff's headquarters in France, then returned to the United States to teach Gurdjieff's ideas in Chicago, and then in summer 1927 was back in France again. The written works he did produce during 1927 and 1928 were often rejected, a pattern that continued, for the most part, into 1929, the year in which he completed a collection of short stories that remained unpublished during his lifetime. By 1930 serious tensions had arisen in his relations with other Gurdjieffians, and in the same year Toomer's autobiography was rejected. Further rejections of his literary work (including a book of poems) followed in 1931, but on October 30 of that year Toomer did marry a woman named Margery Latimer, who gave birth to their daughter (also named Margery) on August 16, 1932. Unfortunately the elder Margery died during childbirth, and so Toomer found himself a widower with an infant to raise. Nevertheless, he continued to write and sometimes did find publishers for his work, and in 1934 he also married Marjorie Content, daughter of a wealthy businessman. She would remain his wife for the rest of his life and would help raise his "Argie," his only child.

The patterns that had now been established in Toomer's life continued for most of the rest of it. He continued to write, but most of his works remained unpublished until long after his death. In 1935 he ended his close connection with Gurdjieff, although he never completely lost his interest in Gurdjieff's ideas. In 1936 he and Marjorie bought a house in Doylestown, Pennsylvania (near Philadelphia), where Toomer maintained his interest in spiritualism—an interest that led in 1939 to a lengthy journey through India. Even before leaving for this trip, however, Toomer and his wife had begun an involvement with a local group of Friends (or Quakers), and on their return to the United States they both became more and more tightly connected with the Friends movement. Toomer continued to write, and he sometimes found outlets for his work, especially in publications sponsored by the Friends. He even continued his teachings of Gurdjieff's philosophy (much to Marjorie's frustration). By the mid-1940s his health had begun to falter, but during this time his involvement with the Friends also became more and more official: He was now a speaker, adviser, and pamphleteer. By the end of the 1940s, however, his ties with the Friends began to decrease and he took up a new interest in the teachings of the Swiss psychologist C. G. Jung. By 1950 he had even become intrigued by the ideas that would eventually become known as scientology, and by the mid-1950s he was not only fascinated by nutrition and dieting but had also become heavily involved, once more, with the Gurdjieffians. By the end of that decade, however, his health was increasingly frail. His last years were often spent in nursing homes, and when he died on March 30, 1967, his passing was almost unnoticed in the literary world. It was not long, however, before his work was rediscovered by a new generation of black writers interested in the accomplishments of its predecessors, and Toomer ironically soon achieved far more recognition and appreciation in the years and decades following his death than he had ever enjoyed during his long and unsettled life.

"Seventh Street" (1922; 1923)

This very brief sketch—the opening piece in the second section of Cane—marks the book's transition from its early emphasis on rural Georgia to its new emphasis on the urban North. Seventh Street was a main thoroughfare in the mostly black section of Washington, D.C., and in a few brief brush strokes Toomer manages to suggest its chief characteristics, in the early 1920s, as a place of materialism, crime, and modernizing, mechanizing innovations.

As he does elsewhere in Cane, Toomer in this sketch uses a brief, repeated poem to frame an impressionistic piece of prose. "Seventh Street" has no real plot; it is instead designed to create a mood and set a tone. The poem's first word—Money (41; l. 1)—suggests the emphasis on materialism and acquisitiveness that will be crucial not only to this sketch but also to much of the whole second section of Cane. Seventh Street is a place of “Bootleggers in silken shirts” (l. 2)—a place, that is, where profits can be made from breaking the law, and where wealth and self-display have replaced any concern with higher or more spiritual values. It is a place where machines play increasingly prominent roles in human life—a place where “Ballooned, zooming Cadillacs” go “Whizzing, whizzing down the street-car tracks” (ll. 3–4). Seventh Street is (in language designed to be crudely blunt) “a bastard of Prohibition and the War” (41). It is, in other words, a reflection of the wholesale and widespread social changes unleashed first by World War I (one of the most catastrophic conflicts in human history) and then by the ill-fated ban on alcohol sales that soon followed (a ban that only encouraged the rise of organized crime). As Toomer attempts to convey the sensuous complexity of Seventh Street, he piles adjective upon adjective, image upon image, ignoring neatly conventional sentence structure to suggest, in kaleidoscopic prose, the sheer variety of the place: It is a “crude-boned, soft-skinned wedge of nigger life breathing its loafer air, jazz songs and love, thrusting unconscious rhythms, black reddish blood into the white and whitewashed wood of Washington” (41). Seventh Street is a place of paradoxes and contradictions, of opposites blended and contrasted, and in attempting to describe it, Toomer often lapses into phrasing that becomes (as in the heavy emphasis on alliteration in the last words just quoted) almost musical and jazz-like itself. By the middle of the passage the clarity of explanation, sentence structure, purpose, and meaning have largely broken down: “Wedges rust in soggy wood. . . . Split it! In two! Again! Shred it! . . . the sun” (41). By this point the prose has become almost hallucinatory and surreal, and indeed the tone soon becomes almost violently hectoring. Questions pile up; images accumulate; verbs are emphasized by being placed at both the beginnings and ends of fragmented sentences. Finally the prose reaches a crescendo of accusatory bluntness: “God would not dare to suck black red blood. A Nigger God! He would duck his head in shame and call for Judgment Day. Who set you flowing?” (41). The tone has become sarcastic, satiric, almost apocalyptic. And then the whole structure suddenly repeats (and closes with) the opening poem. Such symmetry, however, only calls added attention to the disordered images and chaotic emotions crammed between the two brief snatches of verse.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with CARL SANDBURG's poem titled “Chicago.” What seems to be the purpose of each poem? How do they differ in tone, effect, and point of view? Why does Toomer's text seem relatively more chaotic than Sandburg's?
2. Read this sketch alongside CLAUDE MCKAY's poem titled “Harlem Shadows.” Discuss the depiction of big-city life in both works. Discuss the ways both texts deal with the theme of materialism. Comment on the structure, design, diction, and tone of each piece.
3. In theme, imagery, diction, and tone, how does this section of Cane relate to the sections that preceded it? In all the same respects, how does it foreshadow later developments in the book? In other words, how is this section pivotal in the structure of the work?

“Song of the Son” (1922, 1923)

One of numerous poems interspersed throughout the prose of Cane (especially in the first of the book's three sections), this lyric employs many of the images, symbols, and themes that help unify the opening portion of the book. As do other parts of Cane, this poem emphasizes the theme of mutability—of time passing and conditions changing, of a vital cultural heritage being lost, but not before it can partly be preserved in art. The speaker implies that he has arrived in the South just in time to hear and re-create, through his own poem, the fading music of a once-enslaved people.

The poem begins with an emphatic, heavily accented verb that is then immediately repeated (“Pour O pour” [14, l. 1])—techniques frequently used elsewhere in Cane. The tone of the poem is both celebratory and elegiac, for the spirit that the speaker wishes to pour forth in song is a “parting soul” (l. 1). This phrasing implies a kind of life that is all the more beautiful because it is also being lost. Light-and-dark imagery, so prominent throughout Cane and so appropriate to its pervasive racial themes, is soon stressed in line 2, and so is a strong emphasis on natural rural beauty, which is also highly typical of the first section of the book. The speaker of the poem creates a characteristic sense of immediacy (as when he refers, for instance, to the “air to-night” [l. 3]), and he also (as so often elsewhere in Cane) uses repetition and refrains to good effect, as in the closing couplet of the opening stanza. All five stanzas use rhyme, but the rhyme never seems artificial or contrived; instead, the poem echoes the works of Walt Whitman in the plainness of its diction but also in the rapturous, almost prophetic tone of its voice.

The Whitmanesque elements of the poem become especially apparent later in the work, where the speaker describes himself as the “son” of the rural southern “land and soil” (ll. 9, 6). He has arrived just in time to capture, in the music of his own verse, “thy plaintive soul, leaving, soon gone” (l. 14). By this point it has become clear that the poem is intended both to echo and to elevate the dying but nonetheless compelling folk music of a “song-lit race of slaves” (l. 12). That last phrase, in fact, is typical of the subtle skill of Toomer’s own poem: It uses the technique of synesthesia to combine the senses of sight and sound in the phrase “song-lit,” and it implies that this supposed “race of slaves” has nonetheless produced a rich cultural heritage worth recording, imitating, and preserving. The poem ends on a typically paradoxical note, as it describes songs—both those of the past and this song of the present—“Caroling softly souls of slavery” (l. 23). The final effect is one of tenderness combined with pain—of beauty emerging from degradation.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this poem with W. E. B. DuBois’s lyric “The Song of the Smoke.” How are the poems similar and/or different in setting, tone, structure, style, and purpose? Which poem is more obviously “propagandistic”? Discuss the points of view and the voices employed in each work.
2. Read this poem in conjunction with Langston Hughes’s lyric titled “The Weary Blues” and then discuss the ways music is used as a metaphor in both works. How does each poem use details of setting? How does each use tones of voice? What does each poem suggest about the role of music in dealing with suffering?
3. How—in diction, structure, subject matter, and point of view—does this poem resemble the kind of spiritual songs associated with black culture in the South, and how does it also differ from those songs? Discuss, for instance, the use of such words as epoch’s, scant, profligate, and plaintive. Would such words be likely to appear in a spiritual? If not, why not? What does their appearance in this song suggest about the singer? What element commonly found in the spirituals is missing from this poem?

“Blood-Burning Moon” (1923)

This relatively long story—the concluding piece in the opening third of Cane—deals with an interracial love triangle centered on a beautiful black working woman named Louisa, who is desired not only by Tom Burwell (a black worker also known as “Big Boy”) but also by Bob Stone, son of a prosperous white family for whom Louisa cooks. Tom is a large man with a violent past and is intensely jealous of Bob’s attentions to Louisa; Bob, meanwhile, cannot understand why he is so attracted to a woman his culture has taught him to consider inferior. After Tom easily beats and slashes Bob in a fight over Louisa, Tom is hunted down by a gang of local whites and is burned alive as Louisa sings a song of pain.

“Blood-Burning Moon” comes closer than many pieces in Cane to being a conventional story, with a number of developed central characters, a relatively clear plot, and a fairly standard structure. It opens, appropriately enough, with imagery of gathering darkness, but at first the tone and atmosphere seem appealing (and thus contrast powerfully with the story's shockingly brutal conclusion). The narrator, using effective alliteration as well as Toomer's gift for coining unusual expressions, describes how dusk "soft showered the Negro shanties" in a village described, almost archetypally, simply as "factory town" (30). As do many pieces in Cane, this one revolves around a beautiful, desirable woman; here as elsewhere, Toomer implies the power women enjoy because of their sexual attractiveness, and he also sets sexuality within an environment that implies the continuity between the natural and the human, between animal impulses and personal desires. Thus, when Louisa sings, hounds yell and chickens cackle, as if stirred by the urgent rhythms of her song (30–31).

Even more stirred than the animals are Tom and Bob. Toomer takes us inside the minds and feelings of both characters, often presenting their thoughts through a kind of stream-of-consciousness technique that effectively conveys the erratic, uncertain fluctuations of their responses. Thus, Bob's thoughts are described as follows: "He was going to see Louisa to-night, and love her. She was lovely—in her way. Nigger way. What way was that? Damned if he knew. Must know" (33). Through the use of these abrupt starts and stops, these jarring fragments and clipped phrases, Toomer conjures up the perplexed, perplexing mind of a complicated character—a man who is able to think of love one second and then call his supposed lover a "Nigger" in the very next moment. This kind of contradictory, ambivalent complexity is typical not only of the main characters in this story but also of their entire culture. Toomer repeatedly finds methods in his prose to convey the uncertainties lurking within his people, as when Tom tells Louisa, "Bob Stone likes y. Course he does. But not the ways folks is awhisperin. Does he, hon?" That last, plaintive question—which contradicts and undermines all the confident assertiveness that precedes it—nicely conveys Tom's sense of psychological vulnerability despite his obvious physical strength. Tom knows that in the competition for Louisa, the mere facts of Bob's race, wealth, and social status give Bob advantages that Tom can never match, and although Tom easily defeats Bob when they fight one on one, Tom is soon defeated by his victory. A story that began by emphasizing an idyllic setting, a beautiful woman, and the easy rhythms of a relaxed rural life ends with fiery violence by a brutal mob.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read this story in conjunction with the poem titled "The Lynching" by Claude McKay. Which of the two works is more complicated in tone, topics, and point of view? Discuss the stylistic traits and technical devices used in both works. How does each work use irony to achieve its goals?
2. ZORA NEALE HURSTON's story titled "Spunk" also deals with a love triangle involving poor blacks in a small southern town. Discuss the attitudes of the women in both stories; discuss the role of violence in both works; and discuss the role the community plays in each narrative. Discuss some of the effects of Hurston's decision to make all her characters African American.
3. Discuss the use of moon imagery in this story. Where does it tend to appear? Where does it tend to be absent? How do its appearances contribute to the structure of the story? How does the imagery contribute to the story's tone and atmosphere? How and why is the imagery of a white moon against a black sky relevant to the story's plot and themes?

"Box Seat" (1923)

This piece, a story of frustrated courtship, appears in the second section of Toomer's Cane; it describes how Dan Moore, a young black man living in Washington, D.C., visits a house owned by the respectable Mrs. Pribby. Also living in the house (apparently as a boarder) is Muriel, the young woman Dan is courting, but when Dan becomes too ardent in expressing his desires, Muriel emphatically rejects him.

Later that night, after both Muriel and Dan arrive separately at a vaudeville theater, Dan nearly comes to blows with another member of the audience after Dan disrupts the show.

“Box Seat” opens with sentences that typify Toomer’s penchant for using striking metaphors, vivid images, blunt language, fragmented syntax, and unexpected shifts of tone: “Houses are shy girls whose eyes shine reticently upon the dusk body of the street. Upon the gleaming limbs and asphalt torso of a dreaming nigger. Shake your curled wool-blossoms, nigger” (59). Prose like this is close to poetry, especially in its assonance and alliteration (as in “shy eyes . . . shine”), and such inventive coinages as “curled wool-blossoms” (to describe hair). Toomer seems less interested, in this kind of prose, in simply depicting facts than in suggesting or evoking moods. For every sentence that simply relates dry details (such as “Dan Moore walks southward on Thirteenth Street”), there are many more that sketch vivid pictures and play clever games with the sounds and meanings of words:

Chestnut buds and blossoms are wool he walks upon. The eyes of houses faintly touch him as he passes them. Soft girl-eyes, they set him singing. Girl-eyes within him widen upward to promised faces. Floating away, they dally wistfully over the dusk body of the street. Come on, Dan Moore, come on. Dan sings. His voice is a little hoarse. It cracks. (59)

In passages like these, Toomer employs many of his favorite devices, such as repeated phrases, shifts of perspective, sudden irony, and quick, abrupt sentences. It is ironic, for instance, that just when Dan sings at the end of this appealingly lyrical passage his voice “cracks,” but this shift from lyricism to dissonance actually epitomizes the structure of the whole story. As so often in Toomer, relations between the sexes quickly prove tense and unsatisfying; no sooner do we meet Muriel than we begin to sense the discord underlying her relations with Dan. Toomer takes us inside the mind and feelings of each character so we can glimpse the discrepancy between what he or she really thinks and what he or she openly says. The drift of the entire story is a movement toward frustration and disappointment—a movement that has been ironically prepared for, and emphasized by, the contrast established by the appealingly lyrical opening. By the end of the story, Dan is once more walking alone, too distracted and too indifferent even to fight with the man he has repeatedly annoyed in the theater. Dan thus begins and ends the work in isolation, unable to connect either with the woman he desires or with anyone else in the tale. His alienated plight symbolizes (or so Toomer seems to suggest) the essential loneliness of most persons in modern urban culture. At the start of the tale Dan had been walking alone but in hope; at the end he is merely walking alone.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss this story in connection with Ralph Ellison’s work titled “King of the Bingo Game.” How do both works use crowded theaters to emphasize human isolation? In what ways do both works seem “surreal”? How are relations between the central character and the woman he loves differently depicted in each work?
2. Compare and contrast this story with T. S. ELIOT’s poem “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock.” In particular, discuss the themes of alienation and the relations between the sexes in both works. How do Prufrock’s attitudes toward himself and society resemble and/or differ from those of Dan Moore?
3. Closely examine the first several pages of this story and discuss the ways in which Toomer violates “normal,” conventional, traditional narrative methods. How and why would his writing in these pages have seemed highly unusual to most readers in the 1920s? Rewrite some of his passages using more conventional methods and techniques, and then discuss the advantages and/or disadvantages of the techniques he chose to use.

Cane (1923)

Universally considered the most significant of Toomer’s surviving writings, Cane is a difficult-to-classify medley of character sketches, short stories, brief poems, and dramatized fiction. It contains no single plotline or consistent set of characters, and its style is sometimes lyrical, sometimes realistic, frequently dreamlike, and often highly experimental. The first section is set in the rural South; the second is set in the urban North; and the third and final section is set once again in the rural South, but all three parts of the work tend to focus on the complicated relations between men and women and between the black and white races.

Analysts of Cane have expended much ink trying to comprehend what kind of book it is and what kind (if any) unity it achieves. Some interpreters consider the text a miscellaneous hodge-podge—a deliberately experimental and unconventional artistic notebook to which Toomer never intended to give an obvious sense of shape or coherence. Others compare the work to similar collections of seemingly discrete pieces (such as SHERWOOD ANDERSON's Winesburg, Ohio), but those books are at least unified by a consistent narrative voice, common themes, a shared tone, and repeated images and symbols. Toomer's text, by contrast, is much more puzzling, and much less conventionally coherent, and its larger shape and deeper purposes are much less easy to explain. Some critics think that Toomer intended to contrast the spontaneity, vigor, and basic health of life in the rural South with the corruption, repression, and distemper of life in the mechanized, modernized North, but this distinction is far too simple, for Toomer shows with unblinking clarity the moral and social limitations and even sickness of southern culture. Perhaps the best way to think of the overall shape of Cane, therefore, is to consider it a kind of dream, and indeed the word dream crops up with astonishing frequency in its pages. Like a dream, the book is sometimes beautiful and sometimes nightmarish, sometimes lucid and sometimes confusing, sometimes smoothly flowing and sometimes full of abrupt and jerky transitions. Poems are mixed with prose and prose is mixed with drama, and just as dreams can be both revealing and cryptic, both suggestive and opaque, so the same is true of Cane. Dreams can be compelling and are often difficult to analyze, and much the same can also be said of Toomer's book.

Partly the work is interesting as a contribution to the local color tradition of American writing: It reveals the distinctive customs, rhythms, sights, and sounds of life in particular regions and cities of the country, especially through the use of local dialect and slang but also through its emphasis on distinctive physical settings. Notably in its sections dealing with the South, Cane reveals the impact of traditions that can seem by turns either strange, quaint, charming, ugly, or even horrific, but even in its depictions of life in the big-city North, the book can seem revealing about the particular ways in which life was lived in what is now an increasingly remote era. Toomer had a generally good ear both for rural southern idioms and for trendy, "sophisticated" northern slang, and much of the genuine interest of the book derives from overhearing its characters speak. Toomer seems to have realized this, for much of the book (especially in its second and third sections) is formatted almost as if it were a play, so that the speech of the characters emerges directly and in relatively unmediated fashion. Even when the narrator sometimes does insert explanatory comments or evaluations, these often sound like the stage directions in a play. For the most part, however, the "overheard" and literally dramatic qualities of much of the book's speech contribute to its effects of vivid directness; as we listen to the characters talk, we get a sense not only of them as individuals but of the kind of larger society in which they live and move and have their being. Toomer takes his readers to unfamiliar places and confronts us with often odd and peculiar manners of life, and he does so without much obvious moralizing or sermonizing. His purpose does not seem primarily didactic; he does not seem to be trying to teach or preach in any obvious sense. He tends, instead, to let his characters, settings, facts, and depicted customs speak for themselves.

This is not to say, however, that the voice of the narrator (or narrators) is totally absent from Cane, nor that such voices consistently refrain from overt commentary. At one point, for instance, the narrator refers openly both to himself and to the reader when he explicitly observes, “You and I know, who have had experience in such things, that love is not a thing like prejudice which can be bettered by changes of town” (18). This sort of direct address to the reader (as in “Your thoughts can help me, and I would like to know”) contributes to an unusual sense of immediate contact between narrator and audience that helps (as does much else) to make Cane seem so strangely unconventional. Ironically, the book often describes characters who seem isolated and alienated, yet the work itself frequently creates a sense of strong connection between its narrators and their audience. Not only do the narrators (who sometimes seem Toomer’s alter egos) comment openly on their own thoughts and feelings, but they also frequently speak forthrightly to the reader, as if to imply that a bond may exist between speaker and audience even if bonds are often lacking among the characters described. Thus the narrator of “Fern” states that “When a woman seeks, you will have observed, her eyes deny,” and a few sentences later he comments, “As you know, men are apt to idolize or fear that which they cannot understand, especially if it is a woman” (16). The male speaker thus makes common cause with his (presumably male) readers, and this intimate connection between narrator and audience deliberately violates the kind of distanced, objective tone that had become so conventional in fictional prose before Toomer. In this way as in so many others, Cane is a surprising and unpredictable book. A reader can never guess what, exactly, the next sentence may hold.

Nevertheless, Toomer’s style exhibits many characteristic traits. Often his sentences are short, simple, direct, and unconfusing: “Carma, in overalls, and strong as any man, stands behind the old brown mule, driving the wagon home” (12). Frequently the narrators also stress emphatic verbs: thus, Carma’s wagon “bumps, and groans, and shakes as it crosses the railroad track” (12). Fragments, or other kinds of nonstandard syntax, appear regularly, as do unexpected phrases: “She, riding it easy. . . . Nigger woman driving a Georgia chariot down an old dust road” (12; italics added). Nature, especially in the first part of Cane, is an inescapable presence, and Toomer’s imagery is often so vivid that it seems lyrical: “The sun, which has been slanting over her shoulder, shoots primitive rockets into her mangrove-gloomed, yellow flower face” (12). Here as elsewhere, Toomer’s prose is almost poetic, just as his poems sometimes have the long, loopy rhythms of prose. And, throughout, the effect is often a kind of “you-are-there” immediacy, as if events are taking place not in a recounted past but in an eternal present.

Cane opens by focusing on backwoods Georgia, where life is lived close to the land, where the influence of history is omnipresent, and where complex relations between the races and sexes affect the facts and rhythms of daily life. Typical of this section of the book is the brief character sketch titled “Becky.” As do many of the prose pieces in the opening section of Cane, this one focuses on an intriguing, somewhat mysterious woman. The sketch’s first sentence—“Becky was the white woman who had two Negro sons” (7)—is typical of much of the book in its emphasis on a female character, her implied sexual conduct, and the paradoxically intimate relations between whites and blacks in a culture supposedly committed to racial segregation. As Toomer well knew from his own biographical background, race mixing was far more common in the South than southern whites wished to acknowledge, and indeed race mixing is an important theme not only in “Becky” but in Cane as a whole. The opening sentence of “Becky,” however, is typical of the larger work not only in the topic it deals with but also in the style Toomer employs. He begins abruptly, with no introduction or explanation and no attempt to set a scene; instead, he merely states a fact, and his phrasing in this sentence is simple, declarative, and apparently uncomplicated. Yet complexities, on closer inspection, soon begin to emerge. Becky is not simply “a” white woman with two black offspring; she is “the” white woman with a pair “Negro sons.” The simple use of the word the implies that Becky is well known and even notorious; the single word thus foreshadows a central theme of the tale, which concerns Becky’s relations with the community as a whole. She is, paradoxically, both famous and mysterious, both well known and rarely seen, and the fact that she is a white who also somehow has two “Negro” sons is paradoxical in one sense but perfectly explicable in another: Even though Becky herself was Caucasian, her sons would still have been considered black in the racially segregated culture Toomer describes. As he himself knew all too well, even the merest drop of black blood could cause a person to be considered black, even if one of that person’s parents was white. The opening sentence of “Becky,” then, is typical of Toomer’s style in Cane, which can often appear superficially simple and uncomplicated but frequently implies complexities just beneath its surface.

Also typical in many ways of Toomer’s phrasing is the passage that opens section 5 of “Kabnis,” the third portion of Cane:

Night, soft belly of a pregnant Negress, throbs evenly against the torso of the South. Night throbs a womb-song to the South. Cane- and cotton-fields, pine forests, cypress swamps, sawmills, and factories are fecund at her touch. Night’s womb-song sets them singing. Night winds are the breathing of the unborn child whose calm throbbing in the belly of a Negress sets them somnolently singing. Hear their song. (105)

Here, as so often in Cane, repetition features strongly in Toomer’s writing. Reiterated words such as night, Negress, South, and song give the passage a hypnotic, almost chanting effect and help exemplify how Toomer’s prose, which is often concerned with songs and singing, is also frequently musical and songlike itself. Equally typical is Toomer’s emphasis on metaphor (as at the beginning and end of the opening sentence), sensual overtones, alliteration (such as “sets them somnolently singing”), coined phrases (such as “womb-song”), personification, natural imagery, catalogs and lists, and direct address to the reader (as in the brief final quoted sentence). In passages such as this, the influence of Walt Whitman’s poetry is clearly discernible in Toomer’s prose, and indeed that influence is even more obvious in many of the literal poems contained in Cane. In its structures and effects, in fact, Cane frequently resembles Whitman’s Song of Myself, for neither writer is concerned to abide by traditional literary structures and forms, and both try to communicate a sense of the immense complexity of the sights, sounds, thoughts, and feelings they describe.

Indeed, even when he is being most appealingly lyrical (as in the passage just quoted), Toomer never lets us forget for long the less savory aspects of human existence, especially in a society preoccupied with race. Thus, the chantlike description of night’s “womb-song” is followed immediately by this more disturbing lyric:

White-man’s land.
Niggers, sing.
Burn, bear black children
Till poor rivers bring Rest, and sweet glory
In Camp Ground. (105)

Startling juxtapositions of this sort—in which the polite word Negress is set against the crude word Niggers, or in which the soil that seems fertilized and made “fecund” by the dark night is suddenly and plainly revealed to be “White-man’s land”—are often found in Toomer’s book, and indeed if Cane has a larger method at all, it seems to consist in this kind of jamming together of unexpected combinations. Thus the inviting phrasing “Hear their song” is soon followed by the abrupt command “Niggers, sing,” and the imagery of night winds as “the breathing of the unborn child” is followed by the frank reminder that “black children” must “Burn” (perhaps as they work in the sun, perhaps as they are being lynched) in a land preoccupied with racial distinctions. Yet the imagery of burning is itself juxtaposed with imagery of rivers, and the idea of work is itself juxtaposed with the idea of rest. This whole brief passage thus illustrates, in microcosm, the artistic, moral, social, and psychological complexity of Cane.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Cane and W. E. B. DuBois's work The Souls of Black Folk. How are they similar and/or different in structure, style, point of view, and purpose? How are poor southern blacks depicted in both works? How are songs or poems used in both works? Pay special attention to the fictional sections of DuBois's work.
2. Discuss the final section of Cane (titled "Kabnis") by placing it in relation to "An Indian Teacher among Indians," by GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN (Zitkala-Ša). How do Kabnis and his experiences resemble and/or differ from the protagonist and experiences described in Bonnin's work?
3. How are northern and southern settings, characters, and culture used both in Cane and in NELLA LARSEN's novel titled Quicksand? Which work presents a more attractive image of the South? How are their presentations of the North similar and/or different? Discuss the styles, techniques, and themes of both books. Do you consider one work more effective than the other? If so, explain and justify your opinion.
4. Discuss the style, techniques, and structure of Cane in relation to the same aspects of WILLIAM FAULKNER's The Sound and the Fury. In what ways can both books be described as modernist texts? How does each work violate older ideas about the organization and effectiveness of a relatively long piece of fiction?
5. How does Cane resemble the poem titled "The Bridge" by HART CRANE (whom Toomer admired)? Discuss the works in terms of phrasing, structure, purpose, and effectiveness. In what ways are both works representative of avant-garde tendencies in modern writing?
6. Many critics think Cane is built around contrasts between the North and the South. In what ways does this seem true, and in what other ways does Toomer suggest similarities between the two regions? How and why would this book be likely to appeal (if at all) to non-American readers? How and why does it speak (if at all) to universal human concerns? Why would someone in Finland or Japan (for instance) find this book worth reading?

"Karintha" (1923)

Originally written as part of an unpublished drama and then included as the opening piece in Cane, "Karintha" describes the growth, from childhood to womanhood, of a girl who was so beautiful (even when very young) that she captivated old and young men alike. Karintha's beauty and natural grace win her the attention and deference of the entire community, and as she matures she becomes the object of increasingly obvious sexual desire among competing males. Eventually she becomes pregnant and gives birth, and the sketch concludes by suggesting that men give her monetary gifts—or payments—to win her favors.

"Karintha" exemplifies many of the stylistic and thematic traits employed elsewhere in Cane. It begins, for instance, with a four-line poetic stanza, thus emphasizing the lyricism of the entire work. The poem immediately emphasizes a woman's beauty—a major theme stressed throughout Cane, especially in the first of its three sections. The poem directly addresses its audience ("O cant you see it, O cant you see it" [3])—a technique used repeatedly in Cane to enhance the book's impact. Meanwhile, the poem's stress on "dusk" and on the setting sun already foreshadows the theme of mutability, a central motif that is emphasized throughout the entire sketch as well as throughout the book as a whole. Sexual desire is also a major theme of Cane, and Toomer highlights that topic in the first prose sentence in "Karintha"—a sentence that also illustrates the unusual syntax (or sentence structure) that makes Cane such an unconventional work. Finally, the opening paragraph of the sketch concludes with the kind of suggestive foreshadowing that helps Toomer create suspense and sustain interest both here and elsewhere in this book.

As does much of the rest of Cane, "Karintha" not only sketches a central character but also

5. Would Cane have been a better, more powerful, more effective work if it had been written in a more conventional style and manner, or would a more traditional approach have hampered the book's effectiveness? In what ways are the style and structure of Cane especially suited to its ideas, meanings, and intended impact?
6. Choose several of the separate poems in Cane and discuss how those works contribute to the larger impact of the entire book. How do the chosen poems emphasize key themes, fit into the larger structure, or relate to the pieces that immediately precede or follow them?
7. Examine some of the little-known writings by Toomer that are reprinted in the volumes edited by Darwin Turner and by Frederik L. Rusch. How (if at all) do some of these works seem relevant to Cane, either in theme, style, or both? Which of these writings strikes you as being most interesting and effective? Explain your response.
8. Although the first and last sections of Cane are often considered convincing depictions of life in the rural South, Toomer was actually raised for the most part in the North and spent only a few months in Georgia before composing his book. How does his depiction of the life of southern blacks compare and contrast with those of other black writers of his time, such as Zora Neale Hurston, Nella Larsen, or RICHARD WRIGHT, who had spent much more time in the South?
9. Do some reading, in some standard reference works, about modernism in literature, and then discuss the ways in which Cane can be described as a modernist work. What traits of style and structure and what thematic features might lead this work to be considered a modernist text? Which other modernist writings might have influenced Cane?
10. Soon after finishing Cane, Toomer became strongly influenced by the teachings of the mystical philosopher Georges I. Gurdjieff. What were Gurdjieff's basic teachings, and why might they have appealed so forcefully to the author of Cane? How (in other words) does Cane perhaps already reflect aspects of Gurdjieff's beliefs?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Fabre, Geneviève, and Michel Feith, eds. Jean Toomer and the Harlem Renaissance. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Griffin, John Chandler. Biography of American Author Jean Toomer, 1894–1967. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen, 2002.
- Hutchinson, George. "Identity in Motion: Placing Cane." In Jean Toomer and the Harlem Renaissance, edited by Geneviève Fabre and Michel Feith, 138–156. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Kerman, Cynthia Earl, and Richard Eldridge. The Lives of Jean Toomer: A Hunger for Wholeness. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- Larson, Charles R. Invisible Darkness: Jean Toomer and Nella Larsen. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1993.
- O'Daniel, Therman B., ed. Jean Toomer: A Critical Evaluation. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1988.
- Rusch, Frederik L., ed. A Jean Toomer Reader: Selected Unpublished Writings. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Scruggs, Charles. "Modern American Poetry: Jean Toomer." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/Maps/poets/s_z/toomer/toomer.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Toomer, Jean. Cane. Edited by Darwin T. Turner. New York: Norton, 1988.
- Turner, Darwin, ed. The Wayward and the Seeking: A Collection of Writings by Jean Toomer. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1980.

Robert C. Evans

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON (1856–1915)

The Negro who hates a white man is usually little and narrow. The white man who hates a Negro is usually little and narrow. Both races will grow strong, useful and generous in proportion as they learn to love each other instead of hating each other.

(The Story of My Life and Work)

Booker T. Washington was the most prominent and influential African American of his time; he was widely respected by both blacks and whites for his innovations as an educator, and whites in particular admired his emphasis on economic training, self-help, and patience in the pursuit of full civil rights for blacks. Many members of his own race, however, were troubled by Washington's "accommodationist" tendencies, and he was sharply criticized even during his own era as being too conciliatory—too willing to defer the dream of complete social and political equality for African Americans. In the decades since his death, his legacy has been highly controversial, and the title of a recent book about Washington (Uncle Tom or New Negro?) suggests that the controversy continues. Few will deny, however, that Washington was a talented and determined man who had a major and at least partially positive impact on the lives of blacks in the United States.

Washington was born a slave in spring 1856 on the farm of James Burroughs near Hale's Ford, Virginia (presently part of West Virginia). Washington himself later described the place as "about as near to Nowhere as any locality gets to be," saying that it was "a town with one house and a post-office, and my birthplace was on a large plantation several miles distant from it" (10). He never knew the identity of his father and never seemed especially interested in knowing, although the man was almost certainly a white person living nearby, perhaps even a member of the Burroughs family itself. Young Booker's mother, Jane, was an unmarried cook on the Burroughs farm; only later did she marry an escaped slave named Washington Ferguson, and only later still did young Booker adopt his stepfather's first name as his own surname. His middle name, Taliaferro, had been given to him by his mother at birth, and although a family by that name lived about 20 miles from the Burroughs farm, their connections with Booker's mother seem to have been minor or nonexistent. The boy, in short, was scarred from birth by the confusions of breeding, heritage, and parentage that were among the most common and unfortunate results of the American system of slavery.

Young Booker grew up in a tiny, ramshackle cabin with a dirt floor and with rags for bedclothes, and indeed Washington later wrote that the "first time that I got a knowledge of the fact that my mother and I were slaves, was being awakened by my mother early one morning, while I was sleeping in a bed of rags, on a clay floor of our little cabin. She was kneeling over me, fervently praying as was her custom to do, that some day she and her children might be free" (9). During his years as a slave the boy was often literally naked or poorly clothed, and although he regarded his master as "above the average in the treatment of his slaves" (since "except in a few cases they were not cruelly whipped"), an especially vivid childhood memory involved “seeing a grown man, my uncle, tied to a tree early one morning, stripped naked and someone whipping him with a cowhide” (12). When the South lost the Civil War and the slaves were emancipated, Booker and his mother, brother, and sister made the trek to Malden, West Virginia, to join his mother’s husband, who soon found employment for Booker and his brother John in the salt furnaces and coal mines, where Booker labored until around 1871. Meanwhile, he was growing increasingly interested in learning; he managed to persuade his stepfather to permit him to attend a school after he worked from four to nine each morning in the salt furnace, and he also tried not only to teach himself but also to work with private teachers at night. His mother eventually found him a position as the house boy in the family of General Lewis Ruffner, the town’s most prominent citizen, and it was Washington’s contact with Viola Ruffner, the general’s stern, demanding, but self-disciplined wife, that he later considered one of the best influences on his own development. She encouraged his schooling and helped teach him the habits of hard work, reliability, and even personal cleanliness that he later would value so highly.

In 1872, however, Washington left Malden with the hope of attending the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute, in Hampton, Virginia, a college for blacks run by a white general, Samuel Chapman Armstrong, who had commanded black troops in the Civil War. Washington was not immediately admitted to Hampton; he first had to prove his talents as a janitor before the head teacher would accept him as a student. Impressed with his sweeping and dusting, she allowed him to stay on, and for much of his time there he earned his bread and board through janitorial work. Washington immensely admired General Armstrong, later calling him “the most perfect specimen of man, physically, mentally and spiritually, that I had ever seen” (21), and he always considered Armstrong (along with Mrs. Ruffner and his mother) one of the best and greatest influences on his life. During a vacation back in Malden after two years at the institute, Washington lost his beloved mother.

He later wrote about her that “the lessons of truth, honor and thrift which she implanted in me while she lived have remained with me, and I consider them among my most precious possessions” (23). After graduating from Hampton in summer 1875, by fall Washington was back in Malden, where he became the teacher at the very school he had attended part-time in his youth, occupying that position for three years. He also taught at night and additionally taught at two different Sunday schools. He organized a local debating society and had a prominent role himself as a public speaker in a campaign to make Charleston the capital of West Virginia. In 1877 or 1878 he attended the Wayland Seminary in Washington, D.C. Although for a time he studied the law with the idea of becoming a lawyer, he thought that his true calling was in education, and in 1879, after delivering a successful commencement address at the Hampton Institute, he was invited to return there as a teacher and graduate student. He gladly accepted and soon found himself not only running a rapidly growing night school but also supervising the education of about 75 American Indians. “My daily experience with them,” he later wrote, “convinced me that the main thing that any oppressed people needed was a chance of the right kind and they would cease to be savages” (27).

The main turning point of Washington’s life occurred in 1881, when some leading citizens of Tuskegee, Alabama, contacted General Armstrong to ask whether he could recommend a white man to become principal of a new school they were founding to educate the area’s blacks. Armstrong instead recommended Washington, and the recommendation was accepted. Arriving in Tuskegee in mid-June, Washington opened the school in a dilapidated church on July 4, at first instructing 30 students (who were themselves mostly local teachers) under a roof so poorly maintained that a student had to hold an umbrella over him when it rained. Washington soon sought to acquire a more modern and permanent structure for the school so that students could live there full-time and could not only master their academic subjects but also learn good personal habits as well as useful trades. With financial assistance from Hampton, he was able to purchase a farm near Tuskegee and begin turning it into the institute that would later become so well known and highly respected. Local residents, white and black, contributed money or goods to the project and helped raise money for it, and by November 1882, with the additional help of some northern philanthropists, Porter Hall was completed. The growth of the Tuskegee Institute had begun, and Washington's personal life had also undergone a major change with his marriage, earlier that year, to Fanny Norton Smith, whom he had known since his childhood in Malden. Their daughter, Portia, was born on June 6, 1883, but unfortunately Fanny herself died less than a year later, on May 4, 1884. Despite this personal setback, Washington's school (which emphasized practical training in useful skills) was beginning to flourish: A month after his wife's death he was invited to speak before the National Education Association, and in spring 1885 Tuskegee Institute graduated its first class of students.

Students at Tuskegee were expected to work as well as study, and in fact many of the campus buildings were constructed by the students themselves from the bricks they also fashioned on campus. With further support from the state legislature, the local community, and the northern philanthropists to whom Washington frequently spoke and wrote, the institute continued to prosper, and Washington's personal life also improved in 1886, when, on August 11, he married Olivia A. Davidson, a dedicated teacher at the institute who had also been one of its most vigorous advocates and leaders. Their first son was born on May 29, 1887, and a second arrived on February 6, 1889, but tragedy again struck Washington's life when Olivia died on May 9 of that same year. Eventually he married for a third and final time, wedding Margaret James Murray (the Lady Principal of the institute since 1890) on October 12, 1892. Meanwhile, progress at the school had been rapid and substantial. Whereas enrollment had consisted of 169 students in 1884, by 1895 that number had increased to 1,013, and by 1893 the campus had grown from two buildings to 30, nearly all of them constructed by the students themselves. Even so, many applicants had to be turned away for lack of space, despite Washington's continuous efforts to raise funds in the North and despite continuous generosity from the residents of Tuskegee themselves. In a decade and a half the institute had become one of the most important centers of black education anywhere in the world. Meanwhile, Washington himself had become perhaps the most widely respected black person in America, and his fame was also growing abroad.

Washington's status was both recognized and confirmed when he was invited to address, on September 18, 1895, the Cotton States and International Exhibition in Atlanta, Georgia. On that occasion he gave perhaps the most famous address of his career—one that would win him even wider recognition and respect among many blacks and whites across the country, but one that would also ignite an eventual firestorm of disagreement and dissent among blacks who believed he had conceded far too much to the interests of prejudiced whites. In the speech Washington argued that the interests of blacks would best be served if they initially focused mainly on economic development: By mastering trades and building reputations as productive citizens, they would eventually win the respect of whites and then, having won that respect, they could hope one day to be granted their full civil and political rights. In the meantime, the races could cooperate as the separate fingers of a united hand do. This was music to the ears of many whites (especially in the South), and at first many blacks also were enticed by Washington's vision of economic progress. It was not long, however, before a reaction set in among many other black leaders (particularly W. E. B. DuBois), and Washington found himself subjected to growing criticism from his own people despite the admiration he enjoyed among whites. The Atlanta speech, more than anything else, led many blacks throughout the 20th century to condemn Washington as an "Uncle Tom."

By the beginning of the 1900s, Washington was a powerful man who consorted with other powerful people, especially in the North. In 1899 he had traveled to England, where he had tea with Queen Victoria. In 1901 he dined with President Theodore Roosevelt at the White House (a dinner that caused great indignation in the South), and in that same year he published his best-selling autobiography, Up from Slavery (one of scores of books and articles, many ghost-written, published under his name throughout his long career). In 1903 Andrew Carnegie, one of the world's richest men, donated $600,000 to Tuskegee, but this stroke of massive good fortune was offset by the publication, during that same year, of DuBois's stinging criticism of Washington in his famous book The Souls of Black Folk. DuBois himself had followed the lead of William Monroe Trotter, a black leader from Boston who had assailed Washington in print the year before. Washington, meanwhile, was not above retaliating against his opponents: He set spies on them, kept academic critics in line through his relations with the presidents of other black colleges, and, through his influence with white benefactors and black businessmen, could stifle the careers and projects of anyone he disliked. He has been compared, in his final decade, to the other political "bosses" who dominated much of American life during this period, and his behavior has sometimes been called hypocritical or dishonest. There can be little doubt, however, that he was sincerely committed not only to the progress of Tuskegee Institute but also to advancing the interests of his people, even when his notion of advancement seemed excessively tame or cautious to others. Openly preaching accommodation and cooperation, he secretly financed legal challenges to some of the most egregious forms of racial discrimination, and when he died on November 14, 1915, he was widely hailed as the most important African American of his era. No one—not even his fiercest opponents—could deny the legacy he had established in Tuskegee or the larger impact he had made on American life in general.

"Atlanta Compromise Speech" ("Atlanta Exposition Address") (1895)

In 1895 Washington was invited to address the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta, a major trade show designed to showcase and promote the economic progress of the South. Addressing a huge audience of southern blacks, southern whites, and whites from the North, Washington argued that the best immediate path to black advancement was through economic success, cultural self-improvement, and cooperation with fair-minded southern whites. Once blacks had shown themselves to be productive, responsible citizens, any reasonable objections to giving them full citizenship rights would wither away, but, until that day, blacks and whites could cooperate as the separate fingers of a single hand do.

Washington himself realized the historic importance of this speech; he reprinted it in full, and described its genesis and the responses to it, in both of his early autobiographies (The Story of My Life and Work and Up from Slavery). The reaction to the speech among the audience who first heard it was electrifyingly positive, and Washington's words were soon reprinted, with much acclaim, in newspapers throughout the country. The speech instantly made him the most recognized spokesman for his people across the nation. Whites (especially southerners) were particularly gratified by Washington's ideas. Eventually, however, a negative reaction began to set in among various rival black leaders, who thought that Washington had been too ready to compromise with white racism—that he had been too willing to postpone the achievement of complete civil and political rights for his people. Ironically, then, the speech that at first had won Washington such wide acclaim later became a main count in indictments accusing him of being an "Uncle Tom" (accommodationist).

Washington began the speech by emphasizing a central fact and deducing an important conclusion from it: "One third of the population of the South is of the Negro race. No enterprise seeking the material, civil, or moral welfare of this section can disregard this element of our population and reach the highest success" (73). After praising the exposition's managers for generously highlighting African-American contributions to southern life, Washington urged blacks to focus more of their attention on practical economic development than on ineffective political organizing. In a particularly striking passage, he proclaimed:

To those of my race who depend on bettering their condition in a foreign land, or who underestimate the importance of cultivating friendly relations with the Southern white man, who is their next door neighbor, I would say: "Cast down your bucket where you are"—cast it down in making friends in every manly way of the people of all races by whom we are surrounded.

Cast it down in agriculture, in commerce, in domestic service, and in the professions. . . . Our greatest danger is, that in the great leap from slavery to freedom we may overlook the fact that the masses of us are to live by the productions of our hands, and fail to keep in mind that we shall prosper in proportion as we learn to dignify and glorify common labor, and put brains and skill into the common occupations of life; shall prosper in proportion as we learn to draw the line between the superficial and the substantial, the ornamental gewgaws of life and the useful. No race can prosper till it learns that there is as much dignity in tilling a field as in writing a poem. It is at the bottom of life that we must begin, and not at the top. Nor should we permit our grievances to overshadow our opportunities. (74)

Although these words were enthusiastically received by most of the people who originally heard them, they later created great controversy, especially among other black leaders. These critics (particularly W. E. B. DuBois) felt that Washington had conceded too much to his white listeners, especially by placing so much emphasis on the value of "common labor" for blacks rather than on the more traditional forms of higher education. DuBois emphasized the importance of cultivating the intellectual development of the mentally gifted portion of the black population—the so-called talented tenth—who would provide crucial leadership for the rest of the race. Washington (according to DuBois and other critics) was too willing to consign blacks to the lower rungs of the intellectual, social, and economic ladder; he was (they believed) too willing to sacrifice long-term political, social, and cultural gains in favor of immediate and minor economic advantages. Washington, on the other hand, believed that true and solid progress in all these other spheres could not be made without first laying a solid economic foundation.

After urging blacks to cast down their buckets where they lived, Washington offered the same advice to whites, advising them not to depend on imported foreign labor but to make use of their 8 million black neighbors and encourage their further development: "While doing this, you can be sure in the future, as in the past, that you and your families will be surrounded by the most patient, faithful, law-abiding, and unresentful people that the world has seen" (74–75). In perhaps the most famous sentence of the speech he declared that in "all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress" (75). Indeed, the full progress of the South depended (Washington proclaimed) on the full progress of its black citizens:

Nearly sixteen millions of hands will aid you in pulling the load upwards, or they will pull against you the load downwards. We shall constitute one-third and more of the ignorance and crime of the South, or one-third its intelligence and progress; we shall contribute one-third to the business and industrial prosperity of the South, or we shall prove a veritable body of death, stagnating, depressing, retarding every effort to advance the body politic. (75)

Washington asserted that the "wisest among my race understand that the agitation of questions of social equality is the extremest folly, and that progress in the enjoyment of all the privileges that will come to us must be the result of severe and constant struggle rather than of artificial forcing” (76). He ended by looking forward to a “blotting out of sectional differences and racial animosities and suspicions” and to a “determination to administer absolute justice, in a willing obedience among all classes to the mandates of law” (76). Perhaps more than any other speech or piece of writing he ever composed, Washington’s oration to the Atlanta Exposition sealed his fate as the preeminent (but also the most controversial) black leader of his time. After delivering this speech, he became the object of growing praise by most whites and many blacks, but he also became the target of increasingly severe criticism by black leaders who disdained his emphasis on what they regarded as excessive compromise and complacent cooperation.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In composing this speech, Washington faced the difficult task of trying to appeal simultaneously to northern whites, southern whites, and blacks across the country. Examine the speech in detail and discuss specific ways in which Washington tried to appeal to each group individually and to all three groups at once.
2. What different kinds of persuasion does Washington use in this speech? For instance, how does he use humility, and how does he use implied threats? How does he use objective facts, and how does he appeal to emotion? How does he use such rhetorical devices as parables, statistics, repetition, heightened rhythm, striking imagery, literary allusions, moral arguments, practical arguments, and religious language?

Up from Slavery (1901)

Up from Slavery is not only Washington’s most famous and most influential book, but also one of the most notable of all American autobiographies. It tells the story of his life from his boyhood as a slave to his eventual success as the leader of one of the nation’s most important institutions of African-American education and as the foremost national spokesman for his people. The book appealed to early readers because it showed how much could be accomplished, in spite of enormous odds, if a person were determined, optimistic, and willing to work hard to accomplish sensible, practical goals. For all these reasons, however, many later readers have condemned the book as naive and simplistic.

Up from Slavery was actually Washington’s second attempt at a book-length autobiography. The first, titled The Story of My Life and Work and first printed in 1901, had been published for sale by subscription, mainly to a black readership. Although the narratives of both works are often highly similar, the earlier book is longer, less efficient, and less clearly structured than its sequel. It often includes lengthy excerpts from speeches, letters, official documents, and newspaper articles, and although these features give the earlier work some genuine historical interest, they detract from its narrative flow and literary effectiveness. Up from Slavery, on the other hand, is well designed, well written, and consistently interesting. Washington had help from ghost writers in composing both works: Eugene Webber, a black journalist, assisted with the first; Max Bennet Thrasher, a white journalist and public relations man, assisted with the second. In the case of Up from Slavery, however, Washington seems to have exercised firm control; he would dictate notes to Thrasher as they traveled by train; Washington would then prepare drafts based on those notes; then Thrasher would go over those drafts. Washington, however, had the final say as to content, structure, and style.

The book’s style is in fact one of its most striking features. In the preface, Washington says that he has “tried to tell a simple, straightforward story, with no attempt at embellishment” (211), and certainly that is the effect he achieves: His phrasing seems utterly lucid and impressively direct, creating the impression of an honest man speaking truthfully to others in a spirit of goodwill and common humanity. It is as if Washington has no ax to grind, no agenda to push, no grudges to nurse; by relating the facts of his life calmly and without rancor, he invites his predominantly white readers to respond sympathetically rather than defensively, encouraging them to focus on helping to build a productive future rather than dwelling on the injustices of the past. Washington does not deny the sufferings his people endured, but neither does he emphasize them in any dramatic fashion. Instead, his dry, unemotional commentary on the lives of the slaves is often stingingly understated, as when he notes, "My mother, I suppose, attracted the attention of a purchaser who was afterward my owner and hers. Her addition to the slave family attracted about as much attention as the purchase of a new horse or cow" (215–216). Readers (especially whites) cannot help but wince at such statements; Washington knew he had no need to make the point emphatic. Yet even whites will sometimes find themselves agreeing with black readers who believed Washington was sometimes excessively willing to forgive and forget. This is especially true, for instance, of his concluding comments on his white father:

Of my father I know even less than my mother. I do not even know his name. I have heard reports to the effect that he was a white man who lived on one of the near-by plantations. Whoever he was, I never heard of his taking the least interest in me or providing in any way for my rearing. But I do not find especial fault with him. He was simply another unfortunate victim of the institution which the Nation unhappily had engrafted upon it at that time. (216)

It is hard not to feel that Washington, here and elsewhere, seems too eager to turn the other cheek and that his attitudes are therefore either impossibly saintly or perhaps even calculated and insincere.

Washington's description of the tiny, rundown, dirt-floored cabin in which he spent his first years are vivid and affecting, and his account of life among the slaves and their owners, especially during the closing days of the Civil War, is detailed and complex, showing both the eagerness of the slaves for their freedom and the real affection many felt toward the whites with whom they had lived for generations. Washington is careful to reject any notion that "some of the slaves did not want freedom," for he insists, "This is not true. I have never seen one who did not want to be free, or one who would return to slavery," and he announces that he pities "from the bottom of my heart any nation or body of people that is so unfortunate as to get entangled in the net of slavery" (222). Yet a few sentences later he asserts that "notwithstanding the cruelty and moral wrong of slavery, the ten million Negroes inhabiting this country, who themselves or whose ancestors went through the school of American slavery, are in a stronger and more hopeful condition, materially, intellectually, morally, and religiously, than is true of an equal number of black people in any other portion of the globe. . . . Ever since I have been old enough to think for myself, I have entertained the idea that, notwithstanding the cruel wrongs inflicted upon us, the black man got nearly as much out of slavery as the white man did" (222–223). Such statements made some blacks feel that Washington had gone much too far in his efforts to conciliate southern white opinion.

Washington's account of his early years as a freed black is fascinating, especially when he recounts his own hunger for education as well as the widespread passion for learning among his people as a whole, or when he describes his years at Hampton, or when he details his early service as a schoolteacher back in Malden. Throughout these pages his emphasis is on hard work, self-discipline, the virtues of cleanliness, and selfless commitment to others. He extols the value of manual labor by showing its positive influence on his own life, and he candidly criticizes certain black teachers and preachers who turned to those professions merely to avoid hard work. He also criticizes blacks who relied too heavily on the federal government for assistance, or who placed excessive hope in merely political progress, or who emphasized a "liberal arts" education to the exclusion of practical training, or who engaged in wasteful spending on frivolous activities or possessions. His willingness to find these kinds of fault with his fellow blacks can, of course, be seen as part of a cynical ploy to ingratiate himself with whites, but this reading of his motives seems cynical in itself, since he makes many of the same points in The Story of My Life and Work, the autobiography written with black readers mainly in mind. His entire career, both in words and deeds, suggests his sincere commitment to the values he espouses in Up from Slavery, and in reacting to his life and writings it always is important to recall the exceptionally complex historical circumstances in which he found himself.

One passage that suggests the exceedingly complicated state of race relations during Washington's era involves his assignment, after his return to Hampton as a teacher, to instruct a large group of uneducated American Indians:

At first I had a good deal of doubt about my ability to succeed. I knew that the average Indian felt himself above the white man, and, of course, he felt himself far above the Negro, largely on account of the fact of the Negro having submitted to slavery—a thing which the Indian would never do. The Indians, in the Indian Territory, owned a large number of slaves during the days of slavery. Aside from this, there was a general feeling that the attempt to educate and civilize the red men at Hampton would be a failure. (266)

Thus, whites looked down on blacks and Indians, Indians looked down on whites and blacks, and many blacks were dubious of the prospect that Indians (who had once enslaved blacks) would ever be successfully educated! Nevertheless, despite all these crisscrossing prejudices, Washington (with his typical combination of optimism and determination) took on the task and succeeded, and in an immediately ensuing passage he makes clear his willingness to criticize whites just as bluntly as anyone else:

The things that they [the Indians] disliked most, I think, were to have their long hair cut, to give up wearing blankets, and to cease smoking; but no white American ever thinks that any other race is wholly civilized until he wears the white man's clothes, eats the white man's food, speaks the white man's language, and professes the white man's religion. (266)

This is a kind of frankness for which Washington is often given too little credit. It was in this kind of highly charged racial atmosphere—an atmosphere of multiple suspicions, mutual distrust, and reinforcing bigotries—that he had to operate, and the fact that he was able to operate so productively shows a good deal about his talent, his diligence, and his innate diplomacy.

All these traits made Washington an ideal choice to found and lead the new school for African Americans in Alabama. His account of its founding and early years is, of course, central to the narrative substance and historical importance of Up from Slavery; as he himself realized, his own life was interesting and significant primarily because of his successes at Tuskegee. Nevertheless, he also used his book as an opportunity to comment on many other matters, such as the efforts of numerous southern communities to deny blacks the right to vote. At one point, for instance, he argues that such practices are more harmful to whites than to blacks:

The wrong to the Negro is temporary, but to the morals of the white man the injury is permanent. I have noted time and time again that when an individual perjures himself in order to break the force of the black man's ballot, he soon learns to practice dishonesty in other relations of life, not only where the Negro is concerned, but equally so where a white man is concerned. The white man who begins by cheating a Negro usually ends by cheating a white man. The white man who begins to break the law by lynching a Negro soon yields to the temptation to lynch a white man. (303)

In passages such as this, as in others that might be quoted, Washington seems anything but accommodating; here as often elsewhere, his tone is more complicated and assertive than is sometimes acknowledged. Washington believed that progress for blacks, like progress for the human race in general, would be slow and incremental, but he also believed that if people lived by the values of hard work and moral decency, their progress would also be inevitable and unstoppable. At one point, for instance, Washington asserts his belief that “the whole future of the Negro rested largely upon the question as to whether or not he should make himself, through his skill,

5. Compare and contrast Up from Slavery with The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin. How do the two works resemble and differ from one another in their purposes, tones, attitudes, styles, and subject matters? What values did Franklin and Washington share? How did Washington's race make his life fundamentally different from Franklin's?
6. Frederick Douglass wrote three substantial works of autobiography. Choose one of them, and then compare and contrast it with Up from Slavery. How do the works resemble or differ from one another in the incidents they describe, the perspectives they adopt, and the implied lessons they teach?
7. Compare and contrast a section of Up from Slavery with an account of the same period in Louis Harlan's two-volume biography of Washington. In what specific ways does Harlan offer a more complex presentation of the same material than Washington offers? What motives are implied by Washington's presentation? What motives are implied by Harlan's?
8. Trace a theme throughout Up from Slavery and discuss the ways Washington's treatment of that theme shows consistency and/or development. For example, discuss his depiction of women throughout the book, or discuss his comments on religion, or discuss his comments on liberal arts education.
9. Washington is listed as the author of numerous other books besides Up from Slavery, yet these are rarely read. Find one of these books (such as My Larger Education or The Life of Frederick Douglass), read it, and then compare and contrast it with Up from Slavery in terms of its themes, style, tone, attitudes, and implied arguments.
10. In its basic plot and themes, Up from Slavery has often been compared to the novels of Horatio Alger, which usually describe a poor boy's rise from poverty to success. Read one of Alger's novels (which are freely available on the Internet) and compare and contrast it with Up from Slavery.

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Andrews, William L., ed. Up from Slavery: Authoritative Text, Contexts and Composition History, Criticism. New York: Norton, 1996.
- The Booker T. Washington Papers. Available online. URL: <http://www.historycooperative.org/btw>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Brundage, W. Fitzhugh, ed. Booker T. Washington and Black Progress: Up from Slavery 100 Years Later. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 2003.
- Carroll, Rebecca. Uncle Tom or New Negro? African Americans Reflect on Booker T. Washington and Up from Slavery One Hundred Years Later. New York: Harlem Moon, 2006.
- Harlan, Louis R. Booker T. Washington: The Making of a Black Leader, 1856–1901. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- . Booker T. Washington: The Wizard of Tuskegee, 1901–1915. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- . "Booker T. Washington in Biographical Perspective." In Up From Slavery: Authoritative Text, Contexts and Composition, edited by William L. Andrews, 204–219. New York: Norton, 1996.
- Olson, Ted. "Booker T. Washington (1856–1915)." In African American Authors, 1745–1945: A Bio-Bibliographical Critical Sourcebook, edited by Emmanuel S. Nelson, 440–447. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2000.
- Thornbrough, Emma Lou, ed. Booker T. Washington. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1969.
- Verney, Kevern. The Art of the Possible: Booker T. Washington and Black Leadership in the United States, 1881–1925. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Washington, Booker T. The Autobiographical Writings. Edited by Louis R. Harlan and John W. Blassingame. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1972.

Robert C. Evans

EDITH WHARTON (1862–1937)

My first few weeks in America are always miserable, because the tastes I am cursed with are all of a kind that cannot be gratified here, and I am not enough in sympathy with our “gros public” to make up for the lack on the aesthetic side. One’s friends are delightful; but we are none of us Americans, we don’t think or feel as the Americans do, we are the wretched exotics produced in a European glass-house, the most déplacé and useless class on earth!

(letter to Sara Norton, June 5, 1903)

With a background of wealth and refined culture, and aware of her family heritage, Edith Wharton exhibited inquisitive intelligence and a perceptive eye when she put the world of her time under a magnifying glass, analyzing male-female interpersonal relationships and revealing the weaknesses of the social hierarchy in New York City. In a literary career that lasted almost 50 years and produced novels, novellas, short stories, and nonfiction writing, Wharton described accurately and unflinchingly the world of the American upper class. She chronicled the transformation that occurred in that world as its original inhabitants, descendants of old, venerable European families, were replaced by the power brokers of New England industry. Wharton also directed her attention to more socially relevant topics such as labor and political conflicts and the rise to power of American women. As an author, Wharton enjoyed success and popularity among the literary elite and the general public. After her death, some critics began to distance themselves from her work, claiming that her focus on one particular setting and time was more a limitation than a virtue. Although one might quibble with Wharton’s choice of setting and subject matter, her ability as a writer and judge of human character attracts an ever-increasing number of admirers to her fiction.

One of three children, Edith Wharton was born Edith Newbold Jones on January 24, 1862, in New York City. Her father was George Frederic Jones, who supported his family through money earned from real estate holdings in Manhattan and Brooklyn. Her mother, Lucretia Rhineland Jones, had the reputation of being a woman devoted to the world of high society, including its parties, clothing, food, and social graces. Both parents placed great value on a traditional education and upbringing for their daughter. While they encouraged her acquisition of any knowledge and talents that would help her in her future life as a wife and mother, they discouraged her curiosity about new intellectual trends and artistic movements.

As a child, Wharton traveled extensively with her parents, and this travel ignited within her the desire to discover foreign lands and instilled in her a critical attitude toward her homeland. As an author, Wharton attempted to capture the allure of—and sense of culture and history found in—foreign lands, but she also devoted significant energy to depicting what she knew best: the good and the bad of fashionable New York society. From the days of her youth to old age, Wharton directed her attention to this milieu again and again. She was critical of many aspects of this segment of society, and her right to judge was warranted by personal experience. Wharton knew well the limitations of this group. The main emphasis of a woman’s education was to prepare her for the role of a wife, who was supposed to run a household, entertain, and support her husband in his endeavors. Wharton herself suffered under the demands of this environment, and in her writing, it is clear that her native intellectual curiosity rebelled against the pressure to conform.

In spite of her dislike for much of the upper-class environment, Wharton also enjoyed certain benefits from being born to socially prominent parents. She was taught to read at an early age and had access to her father's extensive library. She had the luxury of free time, which allowed her the opportunity to explore her own intellectual interests. Left to her own devices, Wharton also acquired the discipline required for successful self-study. Even though she was not able to experience the benefits of a formal education, she developed a taste for, and knowledge of, history, literature, foreign languages, art, and architecture.

At about the age of 12, Wharton began her first attempts at composing poems and prose. At age 13, she enjoyed an early publishing success: Some of her translations of German poems appeared in an American magazine. In general, her mother was not supportive of her writing, and mean-spirited negative comments discouraged Wharton from further attempts at prose fiction for a number of years. Her mother did, however, support her interest in poetry, it has been suggested, because she considered writing poetry a more suitable occupation for a debutante and future society wife. Wharton's mother bears a great deal of responsibility for Edith's later anxieties as an author. From letters and conversations, we know that Wharton complained of feelings of inadequacy, worrying about the quality of her work and questioning her calling to the art.

On the surface, Wharton's life might have seemed to be carefree and filled with pleasure, but it was also marked by stress and worry. Her family was not immune to the financial pressures and economic turndowns that confronted the United States after the Civil War. As a result of strained finances, George Frederic Jones moved his family to Europe in 1866. There the cost of living was lower, enabling the family to maintain its extravagant lifestyle. In 1872 the family returned to America, and in 1880 they were again forced to live in Europe. They returned in 1882 after her father died in Cannes, France. Although Wharton profited greatly from her stays in Europe, she never forgot the troubled circumstances that caused her travels, and recognition of the transient nature of security and happiness had a profound impact on her.

When Wharton's family returned the first time from an extended stay in Europe, she was subjected to rigorous preparation for life as a woman in high society. While she might initially have been spellbound by the splendor and excitement of the wealthy and cultured, she quickly noticed the drawbacks of their way of life. She observed that women, goaded on by class-conscious parents, were pitted against each other in an unnatural competition, with the prize being a man who would replace the parents and become a new captor. Afterward, a woman's life with its social obligations and expectations would resemble the existence of a valued circus animal that is expected to hop through hoops and perform other tricks on command. Surrounded by camouflaged despair and desperation, Wharton saw the impact of this unnatural struggle. Women were unable and unwilling to initiate and experience true friendship with other women, and the supposed goal of the competition, a wealthy, prominent husband, might not lead to intellectual stimulation, emotional fulfillment, and sexual satisfaction for a woman. When Wharton's family moved to Newport, Rhode Island, her outlook on life changed, and she approached her duties with renewed energy. She made her formal entrance into society in 1879 and appeared to be on the way to realizing the dream of many young women: to be admired and envied, to be wealthy, and to be advantageously married.

During the years after Wharton's debut, she was courted by a series of men, including Henry Stevens and Edward (Teddy) Robbins Wharton. In 1885 she married Wharton, older by 12 years, who was considered athletic, socially prominent, and financially secure. During the first few years of their married life, the Whartons traveled extensively, and they spent much time satisfying social obligations. Although Edith appreciated the companionship of her husband, she found his lack of interest in intellectual matters disappointing and his inability to satisfy her sexually frustrating. As her initial intoxication with her new status as wife ended, she began to seek the acquaintance of men whom she could consider her intellectual equals.

Turning her attention away from the limited social circle of New York City's elite and directing her energy toward her writing, Wharton began to experience artistic success. The Greater Inclination, her first short story collection, was published in 1899, and The Touchstone, a novella, appeared in 1900. She also authored articles and books on formal gardens, architecture, and interior design. Her first novel, a historical romance titled The Valley of Decision, was published in 1902. During this early period of artistic activity, she earned most critical acclaim for The House of Mirth, published in 1905, in which she examines New York society and highlights what a woman must sacrifice for the sake of money, marriage, and family.

In 1907 Wharton completed The Fruit of the Tree, a novel in which she left the setting of her earlier fiction to explore the changes occurring in the United States as a result of the Industrial Revolution. As Wharton widened the scope of her prose, she suffered a setback in her artistic success. Although her collection of short stories titled Tales of Men and Ghosts (1910) enjoyed critical acclaim, other works were received with less enthusiasm. In fact, it was not until 1911 and the publication of Ethan Frome, a novella set in rural Massachusetts, that Wharton again garnered praise from the literary world. In this work, as in her successful short stories and novels, she limits the subject matter of her fiction to a very specific environment and cast of characters. In so doing, she can linger in her depiction of characters' thoughts and emotions and contemplate the scenery without overwhelming or weakening the novel's focus.

As Wharton's creative life took shape, her private life was also in transition. Since her marriage to Teddy Wharton, she had been making regular trips to Europe, and shortly after the turn of the century, she decided to live in Paris to escape the emphasis on wealth and possessions that she saw in the United States. At this time Wharton met Henry James and began to correspond regularly with him. She valued his critical judgment greatly, and their friendship lasted until James died in 1916. In 1907 Wharton met Morton Fullerton, a journalist and friend of Henry James, and found herself attracted to him physically. They began a sexual relationship in summer 1909, but the meetings lasted only until the fall. During her relationship with Fullerton, Wharton experienced sexual satisfaction and physical and emotional intimacy with a man for the first time, and she began to realize the importance of those aspects of life to the creation of believable, realistic fictional characters. At the same time, Wharton's marriage to Teddy began to suffer as a result of his struggle with mental illness. In due time, she discovered that he had stolen money from her and that he lived with a mistress. As his condition deteriorated and he was institutionalized, Wharton struggled with feelings of duty and obligation, but in the end, the desire to be free of her husband's instability and harmful influence won out. Wharton filed for divorce, and the marriage was terminated in 1913.

Regardless of the personal problems Wharton faced, she found the energy to remain intellectually active and socially committed. Soon after her divorce, World War I broke out. Wharton, who had long ago acquired a love for Europe and an insatiable desire to discover as much of it as possible, decided to settle permanently in France and distinguished herself through her efforts to ease the suffering of wounded soldiers and to improve the living conditions of the many refugees who went to Paris during the war. In recognition of her valuable work, France awarded her the Legion of Honor in 1916. Wharton was the first woman to receive that honor. Her endeavors and experiences were chronicled in works such as Fighting France (1915) and The Book of the Homeless (1916).

Wharton remained active in the writing of fiction as well. Shortly before the war, she completed The Reef (1912), a novel that depicts the romantic relationship between middle-aged, respectable

Anna Leath and the American diplomat George Darrow, recording the emotional and psychological suffering brought about by Darrow's earlier affair with Sophy Viner, a young governess in the employ of Leath. The novel was criticized for many reasons, including its rather exaggerated concern for propriety and its stylistic indebtedness to Henry James. In The Custom of the Country (1913), Wharton exhibits the more admirable aspects of her literary style, including her knack for satire, her ability to capture time and place, and her willingness to create a strong story line. The novel, featuring the character Undine Spragg and attacking a preoccupation with upward mobility and the consumption of goods, chronicles Undine's efforts to use marriage to gain wealth and social prestige.

During the postwar period, Wharton remained active in the literary arts. In 1920 she completed The Age of Innocence, a novel portraying the love of Newland Archer for two women, May Welland and Ellen Olenska, and the moral, social, and cultural dilemma he faces as he tries to choose between them. In 1921 Wharton was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for her novel. Wharton also directed her attention to the creative process; The Writing of Fiction (1925) represents her most extensive discussion of a writer's craft. By the time the book appeared, she had been practicing her art for 30 years, and in her text, she relates her views concerning European and American authors, the role of tradition in writing, the choice of appropriate subject matter and form, and the traits of effective, memorable prose. Further information about Wharton's opinions concerning the education and formation of a writer can be found in her autobiography, A Backward Glance (1934).

Common wisdom states that Wharton's later writing does not live up to the strength, vigor, and incisiveness of her earlier prose fiction, and she is accused of writing too much too quickly. Novels written after 1922 are often numbered among her least successful books. Works such as The Glimpses of the Moon (1922), The Mother's Recompense (1925), Twilight Sleep (1927), Hudson River Bracketed (1929), and The Gods Arrive (1932) received at best mixed reviews. However, toward the end of her life, Wharton appeared to recapture her former skill and energy. At the time of her death in 1937, she was at work on The Buccaneers, a novel in which she portrays the life and exploits of five young American women who set out to use traditional forms of courting and marriage to take the London social world by storm. The novel appeared posthumously as an unfinished work in 1938 and was completed by Marion Mainwaring and published in 1993.

Wharton's growing disillusionment with the United States and its preoccupation with consumerism and bourgeois values made her homeland increasingly unpalatable to her. In fact, in the years following World War I, she traveled to the United States only once, in 1923, to receive an honorary doctor of letters degree from Yale University; otherwise, she remained in Europe, choosing to acknowledge from afar other awards such as the Pulitzer Prize in 1921 for The Age of Innocence and the Gold Medal from the National Institute of Arts and Letters in 1924. Wharton remained active until she suffered a stroke in June 1937. She died on August 11, 1937, and was buried at Versailles. Wharton's commitment to France and her support of the French during World War I were greatly appreciated—so much so that French war veterans served as pallbearers for her coffin.

In her own way, Wharton became a controversial figure during her career as a writer. She never hesitated to criticize the milieu of her birth and education, yet she enjoyed all the advantages that money and preferred social standing could offer. She revealed herself to be a fine judge of character and motivation, yet happiness eluded her as she suffered through unsatisfactory personal relationships. She was a sharp critic of literature as an art form (including its subject matter and mode of expression), yet she was accused of sacrificing quality in her own writing to satisfy publishers' demands for quantity. She mocked America's lack of cultural sophistication, yet she chose to remain abroad and avoid a direct role in improving standards. In the end, Wharton became known for her ability to evoke a feeling of place and time in her writing, for her psychological and emotional insights, and for her dedication to writing as an art.

“Souls Belated” (1899)

This story, taken from Wharton's first collection, titled The Greater Inclination, focuses on the experiences of two Americans, Lydia Tillotson and Ralph Gannett, as they travel through Italy during an extended tour of Europe. Lydia has left her husband in the United States and is traveling with Ralph as they wait for her divorce to become final; looking for a new life that will free her from the yoke of social convention, offer her emotional and physical satisfaction, and provide excitement, Lydia realizes, while staying with her lover at an Italian resort, that she has grown accustomed to Ralph and that their relationship is becoming predictable. Recognizing that she is fleeing from one conventional relationship to another, she tries to explain her fears to her lover, but his responses reveal that he does not regard her any differently, or with any more appreciation, than her former husband did; in the end, Lydia, who attempts to leave Ralph in order to avoid surrendering to conventionality, is observed by him as she returns to the hotel.

Using different points of view to convey her characters' thoughts and feelings, Wharton portrays two people held prisoner by social convention. Lydia seems to be the more perceptive individual, but she is unable to use her insights to break free of the chains of prejudice, social etiquette, and self-doubt. She dreams of leading an adventurous, stimulating, independent life, but she is rendered powerless by her lack of options. Indeed, she has numerous opportunities to see how guests at the Italian resort, representatives of respectable society, ruthlessly condemn and ostracize anyone who does not conform to their view of proper behavior. Moreover, society does not take a woman seriously and offers her few options outside marriage. Ralph, a product of 19th-century American upbringing, is convinced that a woman achieves identity through the man she marries. Although he is attracted to Lydia's intellect as well as to her beauty, he is willing to accept the fact that her possibilities for self-realization are limited and does nothing to improve her situation. In the end, when he sees her walking back to the hotel, he is convinced that she has rediscovered her passion for him and that her love has motivated her to return; he cannot imagine the possibility that Lydia might be returning because she believes she has no other choice and that she might be disappointed in her lack of strength and resolve to abandon the idea of socially appropriate behavior and risk comfort for personal independence. What Ralph interprets as physical and emotional desire might very well be Lydia's surrender to feelings of powerlessness.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this story with EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON's poem "Eros Turannos." In particular, discuss the ways in which both works present the social contexts of private relationships and the ways both works depict the constraints faced by women in relations with men. How were women's options limited during the era in which both authors wrote?
2. Compare and contrast the relationship described in Wharton's story with the marriage depicted in SUI SIN FAR's (Edith Maude Eaton's) tale "Mrs. Spring Fragrance." How do matters of ethnicity and class affect the relationships depicted in both works? Which of the women in the two stories seems happier with her life, and why?
3. Read Wharton's story in conjunction with "The Second Choice," by THEODORE DREISER. Discuss similarities and differences between the two works in terms of theme, characterization, setting, and socioeconomic milieu.
4. Discuss Wharton's use of phrases set off by quotation marks, as when she writes "she had made it 'do'" or when she notes that the "men would probably back Gannett to 'do the decent thing.'" What does such phrasing suggest about the relations between language and society in this story? Whose voices are being "heard" in such phrases, and what effects do such voices have on the characters in the story?

The House of Mirth (1905)

Wharton's first major commercial and critical success tells the story of Lily Bart, a member of the elite of New York City, who faces financial difficulties and must find a socially prominent, wealthy husband in order to secure her position in the only world she has ever known; Lily's search for an acceptable husband is complicated by the fact that she has a strong streak of independence, making it impossible for her to accept a man for whom she does not feel an intellectual or emotional attraction. Although Lily suffers a steady decline in social standing as time passes and is eventually forced to seek employment and move to a boarding house, she refuses to compromise her moral principles by resorting to blackmail, lies, or manipulation in order to find a husband; one man, Lawrence Selden, attracts her attention and meets her approval, yet circumstances never allow them to express their feelings for each other or even spend much time together. As Lily becomes poorer and poorer, she is rejected more and more firmly by her friends and family, including Selden, and she eventually dies of a partly accidental, partly intentional overdose of chloral, a drug she purchased to combat bouts of sleeplessness. The morning she is found dead, Selden appears ready to profess love and offer marriage, but it is too late: Their feelings for each other have been sacrificed on the altar of social demands and prejudices among New York's elites.

Critics commonly agree that life circumstances schooled Wharton during her youth and young adulthood to write a novel like The House of Mirth. As is the case with Lily, Wharton learned, from an early age, to place great value on physical beauty, decorum, and traditional female roles. Also as with Lily, Wharton wrestled with the idea that a woman should be willing to enter into a marriage that was not based on mutual attraction but rather on mutual social and financial benefits. Unlike Lily, however, Wharton eventually managed to escape from the narrow world of New York society by fighting against the constraints of marriage, taking a lover, and seeking out a life of challenge and satisfaction in her writing and charitable efforts. One can say that Wharton, in novels like The House of Mirth, is warning herself and other women with a similar background of what awaits them if they accept, and limit themselves to, the traditional upbringing offered to girls in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Works by Wharton preceding The House of Mirth include short story collections such as The Greater Inclination (1899); a novel, The Valley of Decision (1902); a novella, Sanctuary (1903); and works of nonfiction such as The Decoration of Houses (1897) and travelogues. In response to these efforts, Wharton is often praised for her eye for detail, her ability to describe vividly and accurately, and her insight into human character and motivation. In 1903 she began work on The House of Mirth, a novel that tested her ability as a writer as well as her specialized knowledge of New York high society. Critics say that Wharton, when writing this novel, put her environment under intense scrutiny, isolating and describing the manners, morals, and shortcomings of this world. Published serially by Scribner's Magazine in 1905, The House of Mirth proved to be a great success. Although commentators valued the text primarily for its nonspeculative, nonabstract style and its use of irony and sarcasm, the general reading public was more interested in the tale of romance involving Lily Bart and Lawrence Selden.

Mention should be made of another factor that played a role in Wharton's decision to write the novel and her choice of writing style: her disdain for many other female writers of her time. Wharton believed that these writers did not live up to the high standards demanded by true literature. She faulted these women for their provincialism and their unrefined way of expressing themselves. She also thought that they chose uncontroversial subject matter as a way to satisfy a prejudiced American reading public. In her eyes women writers allowed themselves to be forced to write about socially acceptable, often cheery topics. Unlike these authors, Wharton set out to avoid nostalgic generalizations, sentimental romantic vignettes, and pointless descriptions of nature and family.

Originally Wharton chose "A Moment's Ornament" as the title of her novel. With that title, the focus is clearly on Lily and the transitory, inconsequential nature of what she, in the eyes of others, can offer the world around her. Lily's world believes that women have their value as decorative statues and that marital matches should be made according to how well the woman complements the man; little thought is given to what might benefit the woman. Wharton, however, reconsidered her decision about the title and chose, instead, The House of Mirth. This phrase can be found in Ecclesiastes 7:4: "The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning; but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth." Many verses in Ecclesiastes function as reprimands or warnings, and this particular verse counsels against living solely for short-term enjoyment; a life devoted to more meaningful pursuits is advisable and preferable. In the context of Wharton's novel, the phrase from Ecclesiastes can be understood in two ways. First, it presents an ultimatum to Lily: Will she follow the example of thousands of women before her in similar circumstances and seek an existence as a beautiful, charming, witty work of decoration, thereby renouncing other aspects of life, including intellect and soul; or will she expect more of herself and her environment, daring to demand that she be offered the same possibilities as men and be judged with equal harshness? Second, the phrase "house of mirth" raises a provocative question concerning New York high society: On the surface, amid the many parties, evenings at the opera, fancy dress balls, and polite manners, life might seem to be filled with amusing diversions, but does reality match appearance?

In her novel Wharton gives a resounding condemnation of the elite of New York. For the sake of decorum, rigid principles govern the lives of members of that society. Exceptions are not tolerated. Society demands, for example, that an unmarried woman never be alone with a male who is not a member of her family except in certain circumstances. Society frowns upon women who smoke or gamble. And society discourages female initiative, bonding, and self-discovery. Rather than a happy environment as appearances might indicate, New York high society is revealed to be restrictive, inflexible, and intimidating. Noteworthy is the fact that members of this group accept the demands placed on them by tradition. Indeed, it would only take a small rebellion to change certain rules and practices, but members willingly support the status quo. Their greatest desire is to maintain the existing social order and its institutions; individuals who challenge customs or practices are marginalized quickly and ruthlessly. Members fail to see that they are being held captive in a self-created prison and that they are their own guards.

In the hands of Wharton, Lily remains a rather dubious figure. At first glance, Lily appears to be different from other women of her social class and age. She does not fully agree with the emphasis society places on social graces, and she seems ready to marry for something other than material gain. However, she is never able to leave this world completely. She views a woman's standing in society with a critical, perceptive eye, yet she is unable to turn her observations into new standards for conduct. As the novel progresses, Lily grows increasingly desperate to find a husband, and we see her doing and saying things that are incompatible with an enlightened outlook. Readers grow angry with a society that treats women as objects but also become frustrated with Lily: Although her life and thoughts could have been catalysts for change, she lacks the strength and insight to act. Only at the end of the novel does Lily experience a state of heightened self-awareness. In a condition of complete physical, mental, and emotional exhaustion, she reviews her life and passes judgment on herself; she realizes that she has become a plaything of society, making its goals her goals and accepting its interpretation of events and people as her interpretation. Even as she reaches this understanding of her life and environment, she sees the threatening possibility of a new plunge into the darkness of ignorance, a return to old habits, old opinions, old expectations. She states that she has grown tired and that sleep is what she seeks most of all. She takes chloral, knowing the risks as she counts out a higher dose than normal, but at this point, her only concern is sleep, a relief from the recognition of her failings and limitations.

Since its appearance, The House of Mirth has remained popular, attracting new admirers with each successive generation of readers. As is the case with other works by Wharton, this novel has been adapted for the big screen, most recently by Terence Davies in 2000. It is, however, questionable whether Wharton would have approved of Davies's final product since the film concentrates on depicting the romance between Lily Bart and Lawrence Selden rather than on examining the issues that were of central concern to Wharton and her time. It seems odd that a divide still exists, a little over 100 years after the publication of the novel, between those who are willing to recognize and consider the shortcomings of society or the problematic nature of male-female relationships and those who become mesmerized by the tale of romance. Wharton's statements concerning the seductive power of wealth, beauty, and class and her analysis of the influence of tradition and heritage are as timely as ever.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the depiction of women's lives in this novel and in GERTRUDE STEIN's collection of stories titled Three Lives. In both works, how are the lives of women shaped and constrained by their social circumstances? What roles do social class and romance play in both works? Discuss the differences in style and characterization employed by Wharton and Stein.
2. Read Wharton's novel in conjunction with "The School Days of an Indian Girl" and "An Indian Teacher among Indians" by GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN (Zitkala-Ša). What special pressures does the protagonist of the latter works face that are not faced by Lily Bart? What roles, if any, does ethnicity play in Wharton's novel, and what role does social class play in the works by Bonnin?
3. How do the style, purpose, and characterization in Wharton's novel differ from the same aspects in (say) RICHARD WRIGHT's Native Son? How do you think Wright might have reacted to Wharton's book, and how do you think Wharton might have reacted to Wright's? In what ways is social class important in both works? How are women presented in both novels?
4. Discuss Wharton's novel in relation to EZRA POUND's poem "Portrait d'une Femme." In what ways do the main characters of both works resemble and/or differ from one another? How are their social circumstances similar and/or different? What is the implied attitude of the narrator of each work toward the woman he presents?
5. Read WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS's poem "The Young Housewife," and then discuss it in relation to Wharton's novel. In particular, discuss such matters as social class, social setting, the roles of women, and the satisfactions of marriage (or lack thereof).
6. Choose one particular chapter from somewhere near the middle of the novel and discuss that chapter in relation to the chapters that precede it and follow it. How do the preceding chapters lead up to (or prepare for) the chosen chapter? How do the succeeding chapters follow from the chosen chapter? In other words, how is the chosen chapter crucial to the book in terms of such matters as themes, characterization, structure, and tone?

"The Eyes" (1910)

At the end of a long, enjoyable evening of telling ghost stories in the smoke-filled, cozy library of the home of Andrew Culwin, a self-appointed judge and supposed connoisseur of literature and art, it is finally the host's turn to relate a supernatural tale, and he speaks of his experiences over the last several years, during which he has been haunted off and on by two eyes that stare accusingly and relentlessly at him—eyes that appear calculating, spiteful, and insensitive. In the end, Culwin and one guest in particular, Phil Frenham, realize that the eyes symbolize Culwin's conscience, which confronts him whenever he contemplates—or is in the process of—harming someone emotionally or intellectually; our final image of Culwin is of a broken, abandoned man.

Wharton gives her well-known ghost story, first published in Scribner's Magazine and included in Tales of Men and Ghosts, the form of a framework narrative in which the present can interact with, and pass verdict on, the past. Claiming to have experienced the events he recounts, Culwin, an older man, reveals himself to be egotistical and manipulative; he does not consciously set out to harm others, but his emotional coolness and his fear of commitment allow him to abandon others at will, often when they are in greatest emotional need. All his life Culwin has been attracted to youth and youthful beauty, especially male youth and male good looks, and he enjoys the company of these young adults until they place too many demands on him. Once that occurs, Culwin severs contact with the individuals, often destroying them in the process, and in his mind, he prepares an elaborate rationalization and justification for his behavior. As the short story progresses, readers grow to know the real Culwin, whereas it appears that he entertains certain romanticized ideas about his attitudes and actions.

As the frame story draws to a close, Culwin—looking into a mirror and realizing that the eyes that have haunted him are his own eyes—is finally confronted with his callousness, coldness, and speculative ways, and he recoils from the impact. At the same time, Phil Frenham, Culwin's latest youthful male companion, catches a glimpse of the real Culwin, is overcome with fear and realization of the rejection that awaits him, and turns away from the older man. Critics respond variously to the homosexual themes in this story. Some commentators downplay this aspect of the text, focusing instead on Wharton's portrayal of an obsessive lack of trust toward oneself and others; many reviewers, however, see in Andrew Culwin a figure reminiscent of Morton Fullerton, a bisexual journalist, with whom Wharton had a brief passionate affair and whose often ambivalent attitude toward women frustrated her.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss this story in relation to the tale titled "Hands" by SHERWOOD ANDERSON. How do the two central characters resemble and/or differ from one another? Which of the two characters is presented more sympathetically? How do social values current during the time of composition affect the authors' presentation of both characters?
2. Study the use of eye imagery in this story and in Flannery O'Connor's tale titled "Revelation."

What personality traits do the central characters of both works have in common? In what ways does each character achieve a kind of revelation? How do the tones and styles of the two works differ?
3. Make a list of some of the story's allusions to other literary works, to artworks, to classical figures, and/or to foreign persons or places. How do these allusions function in the tale? How do they relate to the themes of this story? How do they help characterize the speakers who use them? What do they imply about the nature of the intended audience for this work?

Ethan Frome (1911)

His curiosity aroused about Starkfield, Massachusetts, and especially about three residents in a remote farmhouse, an unnamed narrator tells the story of Ethan Frome; his wife, Zeena; and her cousin, Mattie Silver; pieced together from the narrator's personal observations and various conversations with local residents, the story focuses on the uneasy relationship between Ethan and Zeena and dissects Zeena's jealousy and fear of Mattie. Readers learn that Ethan is dissatisfied with his marriage to Zeena and that he is attracted to Mattie, who sees in him hope for her otherwise grim future; feeling that he is caught in a cheerless marriage to Zeena, Ethan fantasizes about running away with Mattie and leaving his wife, Starkfield, and his obligations on the farm. Within a short period, he realizes that his dream will never become reality; he and Mattie make a suicide pact on the spur of the moment; and once their attempt to commit suicide fails, they are forced to return, spiritually broken and physically deformed, to Zeena and lead an existence filled with financial anxiety, emotional strain, and self-recrimination.

Destined to become Wharton's best-known work, Ethan Frome was strongly praised by her contemporaries and retains a place of honor today on university and secondary school reading lists. It is, indeed, often the only work by Wharton to which many Americans are exposed. In general, the short novel, fewer than 200 pages, is known for its effective narrative structure, its depiction of female interpersonal relationships, its treatment of sexual tension, and its comments on the pervasive influence of nature, society, and family on matters of everyday life. Also, it is said to be a commentary on Wharton's feeling of imprisonment in her unsatisfying marriage to Teddy Wharton and her yearning for sexual and emotional fulfillment elsewhere. Wharton's novel has inspired two movie versions: a film made in 1960 by Alex Segal and one in 1993 by John Madden.

Many readers are intrigued by Wharton's choice of narrator and mode of narration. She chooses an outsider to tell the story of Ethan, Zeena, and Mattie since that individual can proceed objectively and gain access to a variety of sources. In essence, the novel is as much about the narrator as it is about the main characters. Readers learn where the author's sympathies lie while analyzing the narrator's personality and his view of the role of the past in Starkfield. In general, the narrator feels admiration for Ethan and views his efforts to support Zeena and Mattie and maintain the family farm as a noble sacrifice. It is important to note that the narrator does not present a reportlike listing of events; he uses interviews, face-to-face interaction with Ethan, and knowledge of human nature to create a work that explains as well as describes the past and present.

Equally noteworthy is Wharton's nuanced portrayal of women and their emotional and psychological composition. At first, a reader might be tempted to be critical of Zeena, calling her selfish and cold, and to favor Mattie, who seems to be warm and natural. But by the end of the novel, readers, having gained insight into what causes Zeena to act the way she does, might be willing to excuse some of her behavior. Moreover, originally sympathetic to Mattie, some readers grow critical of her once they discover her quick transition to a shrew after the accident. Indeed, Mattie is just as desperate for understanding and acceptance as Zeena, and she is equally driven in her struggle for Ethan's heart and soul. Each woman sees Ethan as her only chance at a life with some happiness, autonomy, and security.

Readers are also fascinated by Wharton's treatment of determinism in the text. Within the first few pages of the novel, the narrator illustrates how the climate and the natural world exert influence on the mood of Starkfield's inhabitants, preparing the way for consideration of how family heritage, physical environment, and social class shape individuals and affect events. As the narrator relates Ethan's history, readers discover a man who feels overwhelmed by family responsibilities and who cannot free himself from what he believes to be family expectations. Even though most members of his family died long ago, Ethan senses their presence; in his eyes, the headstones on their graves, located near his farm, are like sentinels who guard and enforce family custom. The farm on the outskirts of Starkfield has been in the family possession for years; Ethan feels that it is his duty to maintain the property to his dying breath. What is more, memories haunt Ethan and cause him to feel obligated to Zeena. He remembers, for example, that Zeena took good care of his mother, and the image of Zeena looking after his sick mother reminds him that he is in her debt. In addition, the cold, stark, repressed atmosphere surrounding Ethan's everyday life mirrors the snow-covered, frozen portrait of nature. Passages in the novel dwelling on winter storms, ice-packed ponds, and mind-numbing cold are juxtaposed with descriptions of Ethan's despair and inability to act. Furthermore, the lack of social mobility in rural Massachusetts plays a role in Ethan's acceptance of the idea that he has no chance for advancement. Reflecting the frozen state of nature, the structure of society and its economy are unchanging and unchangeable; an invisible, yet permanent wall stands between the haves and the have-nots.

Wharton's text may also be read with an emphasis on sexual themes. A reader can easily view the story as a tale of inhibited sexual satisfaction. To all intents and purposes, Ethan and Zeena lead a sterile, passionless marriage. Although Ethan is described as a robust, virile, athletic farmer who is good-looking and successful in attracting the attention of the opposite sex, Zeena is depicted as sexless, shriveled, and unapproachable. When Mattie arrives to stay with them, Ethan begins to sense that he may have found an outlet for his pent-up sexual energy. While Zeena has always acted aloof and reproachful, Mattie gives Ethan admiring looks, laughs at his jokes, and encourages him to communicate with her. Wharton presents Mattie in a very favorable light when describing her appearance and personality. She unleashes feelings in Ethan that he was scarcely aware of, and he falls totally under her spell. Once Mattie realizes that she has no chance of experiencing a passionate relationship with Ethan, she proposes a suicide pact: She suggests that they go on a wild sled ride together and collide with a huge tree; the crash will kill them instantly and allow them to be together in eternity. Ethan, feeling equally desperate and frustrated, agrees. Some readers see in the description of the sled ride—a rushing, bumpy adventure ending in a head-on collision with a tree—a reference to sexual intercourse and climax. Ethan and Mattie's sled ride, however, does not provide the satisfaction or release they hoped to achieve. As Ethan and Mattie start down the hill, the image of Zeena seems to be waiting for Ethan at the bottom, and he is unable to crash the sled head-on into the tree, veering to the right instead. As a result, the two would-be lovers are cheated out of their ecstasy and eternal togetherness, and they are forced to lead the lives of handicapped people. Our final image of them as they spend the rest of their miserable lives together in the rundown farmhouse is of two failed lovers who never achieve physical intimacy.

Not all reviewers give the novel unequivocal praise. One criticism is that Ethan Frome is too bleak and that it paints a picture of a world completely without hope and without relief. Some commentators claim that the New England fall with its vivid colors or the summer and spring with their rejuvenating effects on nature are not sufficiently considered. If the frigidity of winter imprisons the residents literally and figuratively, what are the effects of spring and summer? Why does winter overshadow the other seasons? Finally, some readers quibble with the reasonableness of the suicide pact and its enactment. They cannot empathize with Ethan and Mattie's grief, their desperation, and their emotional and psychological stress, and they regard the sled ride into the tree as a fairly ridiculous way to commit suicide.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the issue of suicide (or attempted suicide) as it appears in this novel and in EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON's poem "Richard Cory." How do the motivations that lead to suicide differ in the two works? Which characters—Wharton's or Robinson's—seem to lead more desperate lives? What are the implied attitudes of the authors toward the suicide attempts they describe?
2. Discuss the use of seasonal imagery in this novel and in JACK LONDON's short story "The Law of Life." How does the imagery contribute to tone, meaning, and atmosphere in both works? Do the works share any similarities of theme? What does each work imply about the nature of life?
3. Discuss the use of rural New England settings in Wharton's novel and in ROBERT FROST's poem "The Death of the Hired Man." In each work, how does the setting contribute to the mood, tone, and meaning of the piece? What kind of life (and what kind of socioeconomic status) is taken for granted in each work?
4. Compare and contrast Wharton's book with NELLA LARSEN's novel Quicksand, especially the closing chapters of that book. What are some obvious differences between the two works in terms of setting, plot, and characterization, but how do both books end bleakly and emphasize final frustration? What are the sources of frustration in each case?
5. How, if at all, does Wharton prevent Zeena from becoming a completely unsympathetic character? How does she present Zeena so that she seems complex rather than simplistic? How, by the same token, does Wharton do the same with Mattie and Ethan? How does she darken and complicate our views of them?

Summer (1917)

Employing elements of a 19th-century sentimental tale of romance and a traditional coming-of-age

saga, Wharton tells the story of four months in the life of Charity Royall, a 17-year-old girl from North Dormer, a small town in Massachusetts, who experiences sexual awakening and independence but who eventually renounces her freedom in favor of small-town social order and security. Intellectually, emotionally, and sexually frustrated at the home of her guardian, Lawyer Royall, Charity, who works at the local library and who is ripening physically in the way fruit matures as spring passes to summer, meets Lucius Harney, an attractive, stimulating man from New York; becomes infatuated with Harney; is seduced by him; and agrees to regular meetings in an abandoned house in an orchard. Harney eventually leaves town, intending never to return, and Charity, learning that she is pregnant, decides to run away to an impoverished place called the Mountain, where her mother still lives. Once there, Charity learns that her mother has died, and, recognizing that she will never feel comfortable among the primitive, unfeeling people of the area, she chooses to return to North Dormer; trudging toward an uncertain future, Charity is met by Lawyer Royall, who offers to marry her. Although disappointed that Harney regards her as a mere summer fling, Charity does not succumb to melancholy; she makes a match with Lawyer Royall, obtaining security and social standing in the community, but she retains in her heart and mind memories of her first exhilarating experience with sexual, economic, and social freedom.

Calling Summer her “hot Ethan,” Wharton gives a clue about what she saw as the main theme of the story. While the cold, bleak, snow-filled winter in Ethan Frome freezes any outburst of human emotion and puts obstacles in the way of social advancement or change, Summer’s sense of warmth, promise, and vigor encourages the expression of sexual desire and the testing of social constraints. The physical world reinforces Wharton’s themes of romance and education. Charity is presented early in the text as a moist bud on the verge of opening. She gains knowledge of physical love through Lucius Harney, a stranger who visits North Dormer. Introducing a sense of the exotic and forbidden, he seduces Charity, and readers become witnesses to their passion when the two meet in a small home in a garden setting. Wharton avoids all comparisons with tawdry tales of sexual exploits; instead, her accounts of the meetings between Charity and Harney emphasize the spiritual and emotional benefits of mutually satisfying sex.

Some commentators claim that by writing this novel, Wharton is paying tribute to the life-changing sexual liaison she had with Morton Fullerton eight years earlier. Fleeing a marriage characterized by sexual coldness and emotional aloofness, Wharton discovered a realm of experiences and sensations of which she had scarcely been aware. Eager to incorporate this sensory world into her writing, Wharton took the opportunity to use Summer to highlight her new thematic concern. Of special interest is the way in which Wharton deals with the topic of sex. She does not present sex as a prelude to any type of idealized home life in which the woman assumes the roles of wife and mother; in fact, Charity, successfully putting all thoughts of marriage out of her mind, regards sex as an antidote to boredom and is chiefly interested in the momentary pleasure that the sexual act offers.

Just as summer must pass to fall, Charity’s relationship with Harney cannot last forever. He has fulfilled his mission of enabling her to see the world around her in a different light, to question rules of propriety, and to view her existence without pretense. As her time with Harney ends, Charity suspects that she is pregnant and must quickly find her place in the world. Although she initially experiences a period of desperation, Charity is no longer the inexperienced girl she was previously. She looks at her environment with critical, calculating eyes and discovers admirable qualities in a man she previously detested: Lawyer Royall. Royall is Charity’s guardian, and the girl Charity rails against him at the beginning of Summer in the way an uncooperative prisoner fights against a guard or warden. Originally Royall, his home, and her life there symbolize tradition, dependence, and denial. Charity’s work at the library, her relationship with Harney, and her flight to the Mountain represent rebellion against Royall. Toward the end of the novel, Charity observes Royall with a different attitude and judges him according to different standards. What she saw before as stifling tradition takes on the aura of security. What she saw as monotony turns into reliability. And what she took to be inflexibility has the positive attributes of strength.

The novel ends with Charity's accepting Royall's offer of marriage and returning to his home in North Dormer. Our final glimpse of Charity is not of a young, carefree girl or of a sex-starved harlot; instead, we find a rather contemplative figure. At this point, Charity seems to be most concerned about the welfare of her child and her own freedom from hardship. Earlier she turned to Harney for physical pleasure; now she turns to Royall for future comfort. Many critics have commented on the rather ambiguous ending that Wharton provides. Is the final image of Charity one of a woman who is pondering her inability to make significant changes in her destiny? Does she feel that Royall has taken advantage of the fact that she has few other possibilities in the rural Massachusetts community? Has Charity sacrificed adventure and personal freedom for stability and social respectability? Has she accepted limitations created by a society dominated by self-serving males? Wharton does not provide a direct answer to these questions. The reader must determine whether Charity, in the future, will behave like a young, wild woman, unable to focus her energy on accomplishing any one given task, or whether she will put the knowledge gained from her adventures of the past months to use in order to find and maintain her position in the world and pass on her spirit and zest for life to her baby.

In keeping with the idea that Summer represents Wharton's "hot Ethan," critical response to the novel has been heated, and the text is regarded as one of Wharton's most controversial works. On the one hand, critics praise the author's ability to mold characteristics of popular fiction, especially the romance novel, to form a unique work of art without creating a mawkish story that strives to bring tears to the eyes of readers. Also, Wharton does not create a nostalgic tone for the end of her novel. Readers have the feeling that Wharton wants to emphasize Charity's capacity for the future—not dwell on a melancholic Charity, who pines for the past. Furthermore, according to commentators, Wharton writes a believable text, one that points to the long-standing abuse and exploitation of young women by predatory men. On the other hand, some reviewers—especially those writing in Wharton's day—have viewed the subject matter and the incidents as shocking and inappropriate for cultured readers. Although most people in the 21st century no longer find the text and its events to be an affront to their sensibilities, Summer's subject matter and the text's language and descriptions are still used by some individuals to criticize the text; however, in this day and age the reasoning is different: Readers—especially young readers—find the text lacking in details and written too delicately and finely to satisfy their prurient tastes.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Wharton's novel alongside Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie, and then discuss the two works as coming-of-age stories. How do the two main characters differ from and/or resemble one another? How are the conclusions of the two books comparable and/or distinct? What role does geographical setting play in each work?
2. Compare and contrast Wharton's book with Zora Neale Hurston's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. How does each work present a young woman's development? How are the male characters in both works similar and/or different? How do the conclusions of the two works differ? Discuss the use of imagery of nature in both works.
3. Discuss Wharton's novel in relation to the novel titled Quicksand by Nella Larsen. How are the two works comparable and/or distinct in terms of plot, central characters, themes, and conclusions? What roles do race, ethnicity, and gender play in the two books? Which of the two central characters is more appealing and/or sympathetic?
4. Compare and contrast the first and final chapters of this novel. Discuss their similarities and/or differences in such matters as imagery, tone, atmosphere, characterization, and setting. How, specifically, has the main character changed between the opening and final chapters? What is the final “moral” or “message” or “meaning” of this book?

The Age of Innocence* (1920)

Set in New York in the 1870s, The Age of Innocence tells of the engagement and marriage of Newland Archer and May Welland, two members of high society’s most prestigious families; although Newland admires May and her standing amid the rich, cultured, and influential, he gradually develops an interest in Ellen Olenska, May’s cousin, who married a count in Europe but who has returned to New York amid talk of marital infidelity and an impending divorce. Newland feels drawn to both women: On the one hand, May represents respectability, status, and tradition; on the other hand, Ellen appears exotic and ushers in hints of passion, forbidden excitement, and freedom. In the end, even after much talk of love and desire for Ellen, Newland chooses a life with May, guaranteeing for himself comfort, security, and companionship; however, there is an opportunity years later, once May has died and Newland and May’s children have grown up, for Newland to be reunited with Ellen, but he rejects it, giving Wharton’s novel an ambiguous ending: Is Newland yielding to the power of society and its expectations, or do the many years together with May mean more to him than he at first thought?

Drawing on memories from her childhood and youth and supplementing them with knowledge gained from conversations with family members and friends, Wharton paints a realistic portrait of the social elite in New York during the last quarter of the 19th century. On occasion, the novel strikes the reader as somewhat nostalgic since members of the New York elite of the 1920s, the time when Wharton was writing her novel, bore little resemblance to the people described in Wharton’s novel. Elsewhere, she deals with the transformation that New York experiences as the elite of birth and heritage are replaced by the rich industrial barons and their families.

Some critics focus on Wharton’s commentary on New York society. All the characters—including Ellen—live their lives in the shadow of what they believe society expects of them. They see their existence as one demanding obedience to rules, fulfillment of duties, and conformity to standards of proper behavior. People are expected to sacrifice their individualism in order to preserve social order and harmony. It is important to note that the code of conduct is not written down; it has been internalized by every member of the elite. Members of this class normally do not consciously consider their actions and attitudes; they act on instinct. Characters who behave differently are considered outcasts. Newland might toy with the idea of abandoning social conventions and daydream about ignoring the demands of respectability, but he never arrives at the stage of acting on his ponderings. He unconsciously restrains himself and yields to the pressure of society. In the end, he acts as superficially well bred and refined as any other member of the elite. Ellen, too, submits to the authority of society. Although she appears to rebel, she does not have the strength to confront the power of social expectations for long. Quickly and efficiently, she is marginalized and expelled—first to Washington, D.C., and then to Europe. While she might continue to exhibit her maverick tendencies abroad, she turns out to be no match for high society in New York. Wharton’s novel is, therefore, often read as an attack on that group’s suppression of individualism.

Other commentators divide their time between analyzing Newland Archer and contrasting May Welland and Ellen Olenska. Criticism of Newland is harsh. For some people, Newland is weak and unable to break away from traditions that threaten to crush him and his chance at happiness. At first glance, Newland resembles the men around him. He dresses as they do, talks as they do, has the same type of career as they do, and worries about the same types of issues as they do. Gradually, the narrator gives hints that Newland has started to question the oppressive power of tradition and society. We learn that he hesitates to accept prevailing opinion about events of the day and the alleged missteps of other members of high society, but he never risks any type of open rebellion, fearing the cost to his reputation and future prospects. However, after he has had more and more contact with Ellen and sees how New York society rejects her, he begins to act on what he had only thought before. For example, he talks and interacts with Ellen in a public forum when decorum would dictate a type of shunning. He visits her home when others would rather cross the street to avoid contact with her. And he is less than convincing when he carries out his assignment to urge her to think of her family and friends and to put an end to her plans to divorce her husband. During the course of the novel, Newland's feelings for Ellen change from admiration to desire. Ellen symbolizes everything that is far from Newland's existence: spontaneity, emotion, independence, and defiance.

Although members of the same family, May and Ellen represent opposing types of women. May epitomizes New York society's ideal of young womanhood. Everything she says and does is in accord with that group's expectations; in fact, it is noteworthy that she spends little if any time reflecting on what is proper. May knows instinctively what is appropriate. She is aware, for example, of the proper behavior of a daughter in matters of engagement and marriage. She knows how to navigate the tricky waters of partygoing and partygiving. She also behaves automatically in the proper manner when interacting with her fiancé. Descriptions of her physical appearance and clothing praise her natural beauty and grace, but she is also made to seem like one of a mass of attractive, well-dressed, wealthy young women. Even in her place of residence, readers find that May chooses something that is luxurious but not ostentatious. After all, her acquaintances live in well-outfitted, noteworthy homes, and it would not be proper that May's house should attract any more attention than murmurs of approval. Conversely, Ellen delivers a slap to the face of society. There is no chance that she will blend in with the other young women. From childhood on, she has exhibited a streak of strong-willed defiance. She married someone not only outside the elite group of families in New York but a foreigner. She has led a high-profile existence rather than one of modesty. And she is rumored to have given in to a woman's yearning for emotional and physical satisfaction by abandoning her husband and running away with his male secretary. Even in matters of dress and appearance, Ellen is unusual. Her clothing is striking in color and memorable in cut; she exudes vitality and unrestrained physical charm. Even the way she holds her body and her manner of speech are different from what society expects. Finally, while in New York, Ellen rents a home that is not located in the fashionable part of town, and she regularly invites outcasts from high society to her home for entertainment.

Quite often, critics dwell on the view of Newland as a man caught between these two women. He professes love for both, but he is referring to two kinds of love. His attraction to May rests on his familiarity with New York and high society. By marrying her, he can assure himself of continued acceptance by that group. His interest in Ellen is tied to his skepticism about social propriety and decorum, and his pursuit of Ellen reflects his curiosity about a world with which he is completely unfamiliar. Throughout much of the novel, a battle rages in Newland's soul. Obligation to May is countered by thoughts of adventure with Ellen; understanding and compassion for Ellen are ambushed by reminders of May's stellar reputation and Ellen's failure to gain the respect of New York's powerful elite. In the end, Newland pursues a life with May, following the established pattern of engagement, marriage, and parenthood.

Many readers assume that weakness alone drives Newland to marry May. At the end of the novel, Wharton tells of the death of May and an opportunity for Newland to rekindle his romance with Ellen. Once again, Newland does not reach out to Ellen. Many readers feel that Newland is still concerned about Ellen's bad reputation in society or that he is still wrestling with indecisiveness. Other readers believe that different emotions and concerns are at work here. Even though Newland initially speaks of his marriage with May in what might sound like disparaging or indifferent terms, readers quickly learn that the bond that grew between them was strong, even if it was a bond of shared interest and mutual respect rather than one of excitement and romance. Newland might not want to be so quick to question that bond. Also, Newland has grown more perceptive with age. He realizes that some of the longing for Ellen that he experiences at the moment is really a veiled longing for his youth and the past. He asks himself what he really knows about the present Ellen and seems to doubt that one can recapture the dreams and desires of youth. The final factor in his decision not to meet Ellen is an incident recounted by his son. Newland learns that May understood him better than he thought and that she realized what he gave up for her sake; she held him in high esteem for the rest of her life, and he is reluctant now to act in a way that would dishonor the memory of their life together.

By the time the novel was published, Wharton had been traveling in Europe and living in France for several years. She was already an established writer with an excellent reputation, and The Age of Innocence shows her in top form. In fact, Wharton was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for the novel in 1921. Her novel has inspired filmmakers since its appearance; a movie version of the text was directed by Martin Scorsese and released in 1990.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Wharton's book with the novel by W. E. B. DuBois titled The Quest of the Silver Fleece. How are the two works similar in plots, themes, protagonists, and the moral choices they present? How are they dissimilar in setting, characterization, style, and the socioeconomic and ethnic details they depict?
2. Discuss Wharton's book in relation to Gertrude Stein's novel The Making of Americans. How do the books differ in style? How are they similar and/or different in their presentation of issues of social class, economic status, and family relationships? How are gender relationships, the roles of men and women, presented in both works?
3. What role does social class play not only in Wharton's novel but also in F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby? In what ways are both Gatsby and Ellen outsiders? To what degree and in what ways are both of these characters sympathetic or appealing? In what ways are the conclusions of both books tragic? How does each author depict the relations between individuals and the larger societies in which they live?
4. Focus on some descriptions of the ways people dress in the novel and discuss how their costuming is relevant to their characters or personalities. How much variation is there in the ways people dress in the book, and how and why are the differences revealing?

“Roman Fever” (1934, 1936)

Alida Slade and Grace Ansley have lunch together on the terrace of a restaurant overlooking the Coliseum and Forum in Rome. World War I has ended, and the women take advantage of the calm to discuss the present and the past. Quickly Alida and Grace reveal themselves as fierce competitors who duel spitefully over who has had the happier life.

Alida is dissatisfied with her daughter, but she feels that she is luckier than Grace because she won Delphin Slade, the man both women desired, and was married to him for 25 years; she mocks Grace by revealing a cruel joke: Alida sent a note to Grace in Delphin's name and invited her to a rendezvous at the Coliseum; Alida imagined that Grace would never respond to such a bold offer. Grace, less combative and more reserved, has produced a socially graceful, beautiful daughter who will become a leader in high society; as she is taunted by Alida, she admits that she answered the note, met Delphin at the Coliseum, had sexual intercourse with him, and as a result became pregnant by him, the latter information given in the form of a vicious stab at Alida's pride.

First published in the magazine Liberty and later in the short story collection The World Over, “Roman Fever” is generally considered a fine example of Wharton's skill and sensitivity, and it is also admired for many other reasons. Some critics praise Wharton for her ability to detail the impact of the past on the present: That is, to show that our understanding of the present depends on the way we interpret the past. If our view of the past is challenged and found to be faulty, it means that our concept of the present might be just as incorrect. Other critics take special

6. Reread the quotation at the beginning of the biographical entry. Consult relevant sections of Wharton's autobiography, A Backward Glance, and identify which aspects of early 20th-century American society are viewed by the author with disapproval. How are these negative American "tastes" treated in two of her novels?
7. Wharton often examines the role of determinism in shaping the lives of her characters. Examine her portrayal of Zeena in Ethan Frome and Ellen Olenska in The Age of Innocence. How do society, family heritage, and the physical world in which these characters live impact their present and govern their future?
8. On the one hand, Wharton is praised for her realistic depiction of women in New York City's high society during the late 19th and early 20th centuries and for her keen eye for motivation. On the other hand, she has been faulted for her reluctance to present women in meaningful, mutually beneficial relationships with one another. Examine The House of Mirth or The Age of Innocence, identify the main female characters, and evaluate their relationships with other women. How do the women interact with one another? Why do they behave the ways they do?
9. Common themes in works by Wharton include the quest for freedom and the repressive power of propriety and decorum in social intercourse. Both male and female characters are shown struggling against limitations and restrictions created by members of their social class, yet these characters ultimately acquiesce to the demands of their surroundings. Examine how Wharton treats these themes as she writes about the lead male characters in Ethan Frome and The Age of Innocence.
10. Many of Wharton's novels have been turned into movies, and film companies often choose to emphasize a social concern or plot device that readers might consider of secondary importance. Compare the book and movie versions of The House of Mirth and The Age of Innocence. Identify two issues in each novel that you think Wharton wants to highlight. View the films and list two issues that the screenwriter and director underscore. How do the differences impact one's understanding of the works in question?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Ammons, Elizabeth. Edith Wharton's Argument with America. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1980.
- Auchincloss, Louis. Edith Wharton: A Woman in Her Time. New York: Viking, 1971.
- Bell, Millicent, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Edith Wharton. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- . Edith Wharton and Henry James: The Story of Their Friendship. New York: Braziller, 1965.
- Benstock, Shari. No Gifts from Chance: A Biography of Edith Wharton. New York: Scribner, 1994.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. Modern Critical Views: Edith Wharton. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.
- Campbell, Donna. The Edith Wharton Society. Available online. URL: <http://www.edithwhartonsociety.org/index.html>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Erlich, Gloria C. The Sexual Education of Edith Wharton. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.
- Garrison, Stephen. Edith Wharton: A Descriptive Bibliography. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990.
- Goodman, Susan. Edith Wharton's Women: Friends and Rivals. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1990.
- Holbrook, David. Edith Wharton and the Unsatisfactory Man. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.
- Howe, Irving, ed. Edith Wharton: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1962.
- Joslin, Katherine. Edith Wharton. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.
- Kellogg, Grace. The Two Lives of Edith Wharton: The Woman and Her Work. New York: Appleton-Century, 1965.
- Killoran, Helen. The Critical Reception of Edith Wharton. Rochester, N.Y., and Suffolk, England: Camden House, 2001.
- Lauer, Kristin O., and Margaret P. Murray. Edith Wharton: An Annotated Secondary Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1990.

- Lubbock, Percy. Portrait of Edith Wharton. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1947.
- The Mount Estate and Gardens. Available online. URL: <http://www.edithwharton.org>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- McDowell, Margaret B. Edith Wharton. Rev. ed. by Twayne Series. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991.
- Pennell, Melissa McFarland. Student Companion to Edith Wharton. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2003.
- Singley, Carol J., ed. A Historical Guide to Edith Wharton. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Walton, Geoffrey. Edith Wharton: A Critical Interpretation. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1970.
- Wershoven, Carol. The Female Intruder in the Novels of Edith Wharton. London: Associated University Press, 1982.
- Wharton, Edith, ed. The Book of the Homeless. New York: Scribner, 1916.
- . The Buccaneers. Completed by Marion Mainwaring. New York: Penguin, 1993.
- . Collected Stories, 1891–1910. Edited by Maureen Howard. New York: Library of America, 2001.
- . Collected Stories, 1911–1937. Edited by Maureen Howard. New York: Library of America, 2001.
- . Fighting France, from Dunkerque to Belfort. New York: Scribner, 1915.
- . The Fruit of the Tree. New York: Scribner, 1907.
- . The Glimpses of the Moon. New York: Appleton, 1922.
- . The Gods Arrive. New York: Appleton, 1932.
- . Hudson River Bracketed. New York: Appleton, 1929.
- . The Letters of Edith Wharton. Edited by R. W. B. Lewis and Nancy Lewis. New York: Scribner, 1988.
- . Novellas and Other Writings: Madame de Treymes, Ethan Frome, Summer, Old New York, The Mother's Recompense, A Backward Glance. Edited by Cynthia Griffin Wolff. New York: Library of America, 1990.
- . Novels: The House of Mirth, The Reef, The Custom of the Country, The Age of Innocence. Edited by R. W. B. Lewis. New York: Library of America, 1985.
- . Sanctuary. New York: Scribner, 1903.
- . Selected Poems. Edited by Louis Auchincloss. New York: Library of America, 2005.
- . The Touchstone. New York: Scribner, 1900.
- . Twilight Sleep. New York: Appleton, 1927.
- . The Uncollected Critical Writings of Edith Wharton. Edited by Frederick Wegener. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- . The Valley of Decision. 2 vols. New York: Scribner, 1902.
- . The Writing of Fiction. New York: Scribner, 1925.
- Wharton, Edith, and Ogden Codman, Jr. The Decoration of Houses. New York: Scribner, 1897.
- White, Barbara A. Edith Wharton: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1991.
- Wolff, Cynthia Griffin. A Feast of Words: The Triumph of Edith Wharton. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977.

David V. Witkosky

THORNTON WILDER (1897–1975)

“There is a land of the living and a land of the dead and the bridge is love, the only survival, the only meaning.”

(The Bridge of San Luis Rey)

Although Thornton Wilder is the only writer ever to win Pulitzer Prizes both for fiction and drama, and although his novel The Bridge of San Luis Rey has been read by millions while his play Our Town is one of the most frequently performed dramas ever written, Wilder has not been accorded the kind of intense attention from scholars and critics that these achievements would seem to warrant. On the one hand, his very popularity has made some analysts suspect that his writing may be somewhat superficial; on the other hand, the bookish qualities of some of his works have led, over the years, to accusations that his work is too literary, too much a product of libraries, and thus too remote from everyday life. Paradoxically, then, Wilder has been accused of being both too popular and too elitist, and both charges have inhibited a fuller appreciation of his accomplishments.

Wilder, along with a twin brother who died immediately at birth, was born on April 17, 1897, in Madison, Wisconsin, to Isabella Niven Wilder and Amos Parker Wilder. Both parents were well educated and comfortably middle-class. Amos, a graduate of Yale University, was the editor of the Wisconsin State Journal at the time of Thornton's birth; he was a deeply religious but also an eminently practical man who believed both in being godly and in doing good. His commitment to public service led to his appointment, in 1906, as consul general in Hong Kong. Thornton, his mother, and his two sisters lived there briefly at first, but Mrs. Wilder and the children returned to the United States later that year, and Thornton attended school in Berkeley, California. The family was briefly reunited in 1909 when Thornton's father became consul general in Shanghai, China. Thornton and one of his sisters, however, were soon attending a school fairly distant from Shanghai, and then in 1911 Mrs. Wilder and two of her daughters (including Janet, born in 1910) moved to Italy. Meanwhile, in 1912 Thornton himself returned to California, where he and his elder brother, Amos, attended school together in Ojai before Thornton graduated from high school in Berkeley in 1915. By this stage in his life his intense interest in reading and writing literature had already manifested itself; he had already authored some short plays, and his commitment to the imagination was already so strong that his father worried that he was raising an impractical son.

Wilder entered Oberlin College in Ohio in 1915. While there he continued to pursue his literary interests; he wrote a number of plays, authored stories and poems, and had the good fortune to have contact with a particularly inspiring teacher (Charles Wager), who helped broaden his intellectual horizons even further by encouraging him to study numerous classic writers, especially the ancients and the continental Europeans. By the time Wilder transferred to Yale University in 1917, his commitment to the literary life had grown even stronger; he wrote a prizewinning play, was strongly involved with a collegiate literary society, and made friends with other campus writers. Problems with his eyesight prevented him from serving in the regular military after the United States entered World War I in 1917, but he did serve for half a year in the coast guard artillery and was always strongly patriotic. After graduating from Yale in 1920, he studied archaeology for a year at the American Academy in Rome—an experience that not only helped shape his strong view of the vastness of historical time, but also helped lead to the production of a partly autobiographical first novel, originally titled “Memoirs of a Roman Student” and later published (in 1926) as The Cabala.

When Wilder returned from Rome in 1921, his father had already found him a practical job as a teacher at a prestigious boys' boarding school in Lawrenceville, New Jersey, not far from Princeton. Wilder was a committed and successful teacher, but he also managed to find time to continue writing, publishing various short works in a number of small literary magazines. In 1925–26 he left Lawrenceville temporarily to pursue a master's degree in French at Princeton University, and he also began his long affiliation with the MacDowell Colony (a retreat for writers and other artists) in New Hampshire. When The Cabala appeared in spring 1926, many reviewers praised it. During the summer Wilder was in Paris, where he met a number of significant literary figures (including ERNEST HEMINGWAY), and by the end of that year he saw his play The Trumpet Shall Sound produced in New York. All these achievements of 1926, however, were as nothing compared to the life-transforming events of 1927. Having returned to his teaching duties at Lawrenceville, Wilder awaited the publication of his second novel, The Bridge of San Luis Rey, which appeared that fall. A brief, lyrical, and philosophical book set in a remote time and place, it was not expected to earn a wide readership, but such expectations proved spectacularly wrong. The novel was widely praised by reviewers, was snapped up enthusiastically by hundreds of thousands of readers, and soon became an international sensation. By 1928 it had been awarded a Pulitzer Prize and was already earning Wilder so much money that he was able to end his teaching career, travel widely in Europe, and, in 1929, build a large house for himself, his parents, and a sister in Hamden, Connecticut. By the end of the 1920s he was one of America's best-selling and most widely respected authors; he lectured throughout the country and, in 1930, even began teaching part-time at the University of Chicago. At the beginning of that year his new novel, The Woman of Andros, appeared in print. Wilder seemed to be riding high.

In October 1929, however, the country had suffered a stock market crash so severe that the resulting economic disaster, which quickly engulfed the whole world, soon became known as the Great Depression. Desperate times and desperate feelings lasted for much of the 1930s, and, at the beginning of the decade, Wilder was suddenly accused of being hopelessly out of touch with the realities of ordinary American life. In October of that year Michael Gold, a prominent Marxist critic, used the pages of the New Republic (an influential journal of opinion) to attack Wilder, and especially his latest novel (set in classical Rome), of catering to a taste for frivolous escapism among the leisured classes. Although many prominent writers rose to Wilder's defense, and although Wilder himself never explicitly responded to the charges at any length, the ensuing controversy damaged his reputation and may even have shaken his own confidence in the kinds of directions he had previously been pursuing. In any case, as the 1930s wore on, he turned his attention increasingly to the theater, publishing in 1931 a collection of one-act plays called The Long Christmas Dinner, staging a translation of a play by André Obey in 1932 (published in 1933 as Lucrèce), and then issuing, in 1935, his first novel set in the United States (Heaven's My Destination). By this point, too, Wilder had become friends with the eccentric but highly influential and idiosyncratically pro-American writer GERTRUDE STEIN, who helped encourage his new enthusiasm for American topics and experimental styles of writing.

During 1937 (while in Europe), Wilder was at work on three different plays: an adaptation of Ibsen's A Doll's House, an adaptation of Johan Nestroy's Einen jux will er sich machen, and a play largely of his own invention that would soon make him even more famous, even more respected, and even more wealthy. This play—titled Our Town—puzzled and perplexed many of its initial audiences, especially when it opened in Boston. With its mostly bare stage setting and its highly unconventional use of a character called the “Stage Manager” (who functions partly as a narrator and partly as an interpreter, in the manner of the ancient Greek chorus), the play proved problematic for many who first saw it, and initial audiences were also unsure how to react to the appearances of “dead” characters speaking in a cemetery at the end. Soon, however, the play—with its focus on small-town American life and its theme that humans do not appreciate the beauty of existence until they have lost it—became a sensation. After its highly successful run on Broadway, it began to be widely performed in regional theaters and by amateur companies (including those in many high schools) around the nation and throughout the world. It was released on film in 1940 and has been produced and revived almost continuously in the decades since it first appeared, becoming one of the most popular serious plays in the entire repertoire of American theater. The claim has often been made (and it seems accurate) that Our Town is always being performed somewhere in the United States on almost every single night of the year. Needless to say, the work won Wilder his second Pulitzer Prize in 1938.

Wilder would never again enjoy successes quite as striking as The Bridge and Our Town, but he remained a dedicated and productive author for another 30 years or more. In 1938 his play The Merchant of Yonkers had a brief run in New York, and by 1940 he was at work on a new play, The Skin of Our Teeth, which opened in 1942, by which time he had enlisted in the air force during World War II. Although two scholars accused the play of plagiarizing James Joyce’s novel Finnegans Wake (a book Wilder immensely admired), Wilder and most impartial observers considered his debt to the novel a case of legitimate literary influence rather than any sort of dishonorable theft. Indeed, in 1943 Wilder won his third Pulitzer Prize for the play, but most of his attention during this time was consumed by his military duties. When the war ended in 1945, Wilder worked on an updating of Euripides’ ancient play Alcestis, but his next major literary production was his 1948 novel The Ides of March, which was set in classical Rome and which was chosen as a main selection by the influential Book of the Month Club. Meanwhile, Wilder was increasingly being acknowledged by the academic world: In 1950–51 he was invited to lecture at Harvard, which (along with Northwestern University) awarded him an honorary degree, and in 1952 he won the Gold Medal for Fiction from the American Academy of Arts and Letters. In 1954 a revised version of The Merchant of Yonkers (now called The Matchmaker) was successfully staged, while in 1955 the Alcestis adaptation, titled A Life in the Sun, was staged in Edinburgh, Scotland.

By the early 1960s Wilder had become an elder statesman of American letters—a status signaled by celebrations of his work performed for the presidential cabinet (in 1962), by his selection as a recipient of the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1963, and by his reception in 1965 of the National Book Committee’s Medal for Literature, presented at the White House. Wilder, however, was not content to rest on his many laurels. In 1964 a musical adaptation of The Matchmaker (now called Hello, Dolly!) appeared on Broadway and became one of the most successful musicals ever staged, while in 1967 Wilder’s novel The Eighth Day not only became a best seller but received the National Book Award. Later, in 1973, Theophilus North, a novel loosely based on Wilder’s own experiences, was published and became another best seller. When he died on December 7, 1975, in his home in Hamden, Connecticut (in “the house The Bridge built”), Wilder was not only widely honored as an author but also widely respected as a man whose life had been characterized by enormous vitality, intelligence, generosity, and humility. Most people who met Wilder not only admired him but liked him, and even after his death he continued to receive recognition. When Our Town was restaged on Broadway in 1988—half a century after its first production—it won a Tony Award, and the play remains a staple of the American theater, just as The Bridge of San Luis Rey maintains its status as a widely read and widely respected novel. If Wilder lacks the kind of critical reputation enjoyed by some other writers of the modern period, he nonetheless enjoys the affection and regard of many ordinary readers and theatergoers, who never seem to grow tired of his two greatest works.

The Bridge of San Luis Rey* (1927)

On July 20, 1714, a Catholic priest named Brother Juniper witnesses five people abruptly plunge to their deaths when an old but very fine suspension bridge high in the mountains of Peru suddenly collapses; the event leads Juniper to try to discover whether those particular five people died purely as a result of random chance or because of some deeper fate or providence. The five included the elderly marquesa de Montemayor and her youthful and devoted attendant, Pepita; a surviving twin brother named Esteban, who had been in deep mourning for the earlier death of his identical and much beloved sibling, Manuel; and fatherly Uncle Pio, who was accompanied on the bridge by the young son of a once-great actress named Camila Perichole, whose career Pio had shaped and nurtured from her youth. Juniper's rationalistic efforts to make sense of the deaths lead, ironically, to his own persecution and death by the Inquisition, while the survivors of the victims—including the marquesa's once-distant daughter, the aging actress who lost both a son and a loyal friend, and the charitable abbess who had been a kind of mother to Pepita—are left with enriched appreciations of their lost loved ones.

Wilder's novel was something of an anomaly in the serious fiction of the 1920s in America: While other authors were producing books set in the present day and describing in often exhaustive and even cynical detail the sometimes less-than-savory facts of contemporary life (including the grimmer aspects of urban living, the psychological scars left by World War I, the realities of an increasingly materialistic culture, and the growth of looser sexual behavior), Wilder set his book in a faraway time and place and produced a highly meditative and reflective work, with religious and mystical overtones, whose central theme was the value and importance of love. The immense and immediate success of the book surprised everyone (including Wilder himself); readers were apparently ready for an alternative to documentary naturalism, with its gritty descriptions of external facts. There was (it seemed) an audience eager for a book such as Wilder's, which dealt profoundly with the mysteries of human hearts, souls, and minds and with the subtleties of human relationships—a book that tried to explore such issues as the meaning (if any) of life, the role of accident or design in the universe, and the existence (or nonexistence) of God. During an era that prided itself on its tough-minded skepticism, hedonism, and sophistication, Wilder had produced a subtle, philosophical novel celebrating morality and old-fashioned charity.

Wilder's novel has been praised, over the years, for such stylistic qualities as simplicity, grace, picturesqueness, delicacy, and restraint, as well as for its allusiveness, subtle wit, understated irony, and avoidance of sentimentality (even though it deals with issues in which sentiment plays a vital role). One passage that illustrates many of the qualities mentioned describes how the previously selfish marquesa, transformed by her sudden realization of the selfless love displayed by young Pepita, vows to live a new life:

She opened the door upon her balcony and looked at the great tiers of stars that glittered above the Andes. Throughout the hours of the night, though there had been few to hear it, the whole sky had been loud with the singing of these constellations. Then she took a candle into the next room and looked at Pepita as she slept, and pushed back the damp hair from the girl's face. "Let me live now," she whispered. "Let me begin again."

Two days later they started back to Lima, and while crossing the bridge of San Luis Rey the accident which we know befell them. (49)

Here, in miniature, are many of the typical features of Wilder's style: the plain language that sometimes becomes almost lyrical; the simple gestures (such as the pushing back of the damp hair)—gestures that are full of implied meaning; the beauty of the universe set against its apparent senselessness; the moral focus combined with a tough-minded refusal to moralize. A different kind of writer might have used this moment as an excuse to produce a sermon; Wilder, instead, simply describes, allowing readers to draw their own conclusions, if any, from the events he recounts. The gentleness of the marquesa's gesture and the fervor of her prayer are suddenly juxtaposed with the implied ugliness of her and Pepita's abrupt and seemingly meaningless deaths, yet the tone is not designed to shock but merely to recount what happened. The narrator speaks to us directly (as in his use of the word me), taking us into his confidence but never pretending to know too much.

Although some analysts have criticized the novel for being unexpectedly dull, for lacking the kind of drama that the opening might have led us to expect, and for being too bookish, too episodic, and too much the product of a self-conscious and sometimes obtrusive narrator, most readers have praised the book for its understatement, its psychological shrewdness, its effective use of dialogue, and its occasional flashes of social and religious satire. Thematically the book has been seen most often as an exploration of the varieties and complexities of human affection (from the selfish to the selfless, from the erotic to the spiritual, from the shallowest desire to the most profound kind of love), and it has also been hailed for its suggestive, undogmatic approach to the philosophical and religious questions it raises. Both skeptics and believers have found the book worth reading; Wilder never claims to offer any final answers to the complex problems he explores, although the ending of the book does imply the value of earthly love as a source of whatever deeper purpose exists in life. By the conclusion of the novel, the survivors (especially the marquesa's previously cynical daughter) have achieved a deeper, truer appreciation of the victims of the accident, and in the final words of the book Wilder suggests that between the land of the living and the land of the dead, the only "bridge is love, the only survival, the only meaning" (148).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with ERNEST HEMINGWAY'S novel The Sun Also Rises (published in 1926), which also describes life in a distant Hispanic culture and also deals with complex human relationships. Discuss the works in terms of tone, style, characterization, narrative point of view, and philosophical implications.
2. How does Wilder's book resemble and/or differ from THEODORE DREISER'S An American Tragedy (published in 1925)? Discuss the books in terms of such themes as love, chance, and destiny and in terms of such technical features as setting, style, symbolism, and characterization.
3. How and why does a novel such as Wilder's seem at variance with a book such as JOHN STEINBECK'S The Grapes of Wrath? Consider such matters as style, structure, characterization, purpose, underlying philosophy, and even sheer length. Why does Steinbeck's novel need to be so much longer than Wilder's?
4. Choose one particular passage from the novel—a passage approximately 500 words long—and then discuss the ways that passage is typical of the total effect and effectiveness of the book in terms of such matters as style, theme, characterization, tone, and atmosphere. How does that passage fit into (and contribute to) the larger design of the book?

Our Town (1938)

Set in an archetypal New England village called Grover's Corners in the decades immediately after the beginning of the 20th century, Wilder's play immediately presents a Stage Manager (a kind of choral figure who directly addresses both the audience and the other characters); he in turn introduces us to, and continually comments on, the rest of the people on stage, including not only young Emily Webb and her family but also young George Gibbs and his parents, sister, and friends. Act 1 (titled "Daily Life") depicts the citizens as they go about their typical routines; act 2 (titled "Love and Marriage") shows how Emily and George fall in love and marry; act 3 ("Death") jumps significantly ahead in time, after Emily has died while giving birth. After taking her place in a cemetery full of other dead citizens of the town, she convinces the Stage Manager to allow her to return to a past moment of her life (her 12th birthday), but she finally and painfully realizes that humans never fully appreciate the preciousness and beauty of their lives while they actually live them.

In various respects Our Town is a paradoxical work. It can be seen, in some ways, as a response to the criticism Wilder had received in the late 1920s and early 1930s for writing novels apparently remote from the lives and concerns of typical American citizens; his new play was populated with everyday folks speaking the common language of New England. Yet the play is far from merely current or documentary in its basic concerns; it is not an obvious response to the Great Depression (still in force as Wilder wrote), nor especially political in theme or propagandistic in tone, although such traits were common in the writing of the 1930s. In setting, then, the play is a departure for Wilder, but in subjects and stance it is not. In method, too, the play represents an interesting mixture of the new and the familiar. Wilder had begun to believe that drama could present life more immediately and vividly than the novel, and yet the character of the Stage Manager can be seen almost as a novelistic device—an omniscient narrator turned into a speaking theatrical presence. Various features of the play—including the Stage Manager, his unusual interactions with the other characters and with the audience, the use of a mostly bare stage with few props, and the sudden jumps in time from one era to another—made this drama a highly experimental work in Wilder's day, and yet for all its technical boldness Our Town deals thematically with such standard themes of Wilder's writings as the brevity and fragility of human existence, the value of love, the richness of even the most apparently simple lives, and the failure of most people to appreciate or savor that richness (or each other) as they live one moment to the next. Thematically, then, the play is highly traditional and even commendably old-fashioned; most of its key ideas had already been sounded in The Bridge of San Luis Rey. In some ways the play was thus a new departure for Wilder, but in other ways it clearly echoes his earlier writings. It exalts the past—particularly the American past—in a fashion that has led some critics to accuse it of sentimental nostalgia, but it was seen as a shockingly daring and even unsettling work when it was first performed. Nevertheless, in the decades since it was originally staged, it has become one of the most popular works of the American theater. In writing Our Town, therefore, Wilder had created a paradoxical work, blending the unusual with the conventional to produce a text that continues to enjoy widespread popular appeal.

Nevertheless, controversy has surrounded the play from the beginning. Critics in Wilder's time and in the decades since have found various faults with the work and have attacked both its meanings and its methods. Some have argued, for instance, that the play fails to deal with the darker aspects of small-town life, ignoring any hint of real evil and thus presenting an essentially superficial, saccharine view of middle-class existence. The reason the play has proven so popular on high school and amateur stages (these critics allege) is that it ratifies the way “average” Americans like to think of themselves and of their essentially bourgeois values; it fails to issue any fundamental challenge to “normal” ways of feeling or behaving; it glorifies mediocrity; its characters are superficial; and its tone is essentially smug and complacent. Its people lack depth; their language lacks poetry; and despite (or because of) its nostalgic emphasis on the past, it fails to engage with complex historical forces. The play has also been attacked, moreover, not only in terms of its meanings but also in terms of its style, structure, characterization, and techniques. Some critics find it insufficiently dramatic; others think the Stage Manager and lack of props are mere theatrical stunts; still others find the pace of the work hopelessly slow and its manner overly didactic. The characters (according to some critics) are merely stick figures used to illustrate a monologue by a Stage Manager who is simply a stand-in for Wilder himself; the play thus becomes a kind of lecture—and a sentimental lecture at that. Neither the characters nor their thoughts, feelings, or actions are complex; the play is simple to a fault, despite its “stagey” theatrical gimmicks. These (at least) are some of the charges leveled by Wilder’s critics.

Obviously, however, many other readers and theatergoers have strongly disagreed with these views. Thus, admirers of the play have contended that the work, despite being set in such a specifically American setting, has a universal appeal because it deals so effectively with the basic facts and rhythms of common human life. These elemental features of life include relations between parents and children, relations within a broader community, the process of individual maturation, the rituals of courtship and marriage, and the inevitable cycles of birth, aging, and death. The play thus deals with eternal human problems and truths, not with any particularly American dilemmas. Wilder sets his work in a small New England village, but the basic processes the work depicts could (and do) take place anywhere. Admirers of the play also value it for the ways it exhibits and extols the common lives of the average folk who are the social, spiritual, and material backbone of any community or nation; from this perspective, the claim that the characters lack much individual complexity or depth testifies to their representative natures: They are not meant to be complicated, idiosyncratic personalities but function, instead, as archetypal fathers and mothers and daughters and sons. Their very commonness contributes to their effectiveness; Grover’s Corners is a microcosm of the world at large, and its citizens are typical humans. The play is less a celebration of American life than of common, ordinary life as it has been lived anywhere and always, and indeed part of the point of the play is that no life is really common or truly ordinary—that all lives consist of precious moments whose preciousness is rarely grasped as we live them. In some respects the play is part of the long literary tradition of carpe diem, in which readers are urged to “seize the day” by appreciating, and making the most of, every available minute of life. Wilder implicitly urges us to value each moment of our own lives while also appreciating the lives and links we share with our friends, families, and communities. In this respect, the underlying themes of the work are not unlike the themes already sounded in The Bridge of San Luis Rey, which had been set in a time and place quite distant from 20th-century New England.

Defenders of Wilder’s play, however, admire not only the themes of the work but also its style, structure, tone, techniques, and use of characterization. The work has been praised for its gentleness, wisdom, simplicity, and humor; the language is mostly plain and therefore credible in the mouths of these plain and unaffected characters. Indeed, the very simplicity of much of the speech prevents it (in the view of Wilder’s advocates) from seeming overblown or sentimental. Wilder has been praised for his skill at crafting convincing dialogue, and even the play’s monologues, far from seeming didactic or preachy, have been defended as being consistent with the characters of the play’s various speakers. The episodic structure of the work has been praised for reflecting the haphazard, zigzag motions of life itself, while the use of the omniscient Stage Manager (who knows the future fates of all the characters), along with the abrupt shifts from one distinct historical moment to the next (focusing, for instance, on Emily as a young girl, then on Emily as a late adolescent, then on Emily as a dead parent who briefly returns to her life as a young girl), have been commended for contributing effectively to the work’s thematic concern with mutability, fragility, and the passage of time.

Meanwhile, the simple, mostly bare stage and the general absence of props have been defended as enhancing the universal significance of the work: Our Town may be set in a particular New England village, but the style of staging encourages us to imagine it as taking place almost anywhere. The absence of props helps suggest that material things are finally less important to human existence than other humans—that what we ultimately remember most about our lives are not pieces of furniture or other possessions but our interactions with friends, family, coworkers, and acquaintances. In its literal movement from the dawn of act 1 to the darkness of act 3, the play symbolically traces the movement of each individual human life, and in its simultaneous focus on past, present, and future, the play mimics the way all people experience time: as a complicated blending of memory, sensation, and anticipation. For the many admirers of Our Town, the play succeeds as an organic whole in which every element contributes to a larger effect and a general effectiveness. The continued success of the play on stage (according to this view) is not the result of smugness or complacency, either in the playwright or in the audience, but instead of the craft with which the work has been composed. Far from being sentimental, this play, in the view of its defenders, is a sobering, thoughtful, and thought-provoking work that leaves each reader or viewer with a fundamentally renewed appreciation of life and other people.

Ultimately the success or failure of any literary work depends on the specific details of its phrasing and structure, and in these respects Our Town has much to recommend it. The general simplicity of its diction as well as the complexity of its temporal perspectives are already apparent, for instance, very early in the play when the Stage Manager is describing Grover's Corners. He announces, in colloquially clipped syntax, "First automobile's going to come along in about five years—belonged to Banker Cartwright, our richest citizen . . . lives in the big white house up on the hill" (5). This single sentence exemplifies many of the most common but also most effective traits of Wilder's play, including both its plain speech and its complicated blending of past, present, and future: Cartwright will have a car, but the car has already "belonged" to him (perhaps suggesting that the Manager already knows of Cartwright's death?), but Cartwright, at the present moment, still "lives" up on the hill. Almost as God supposedly does, the Stage Manager perceives all aspects of time at once. Meanwhile, the fact that Cartwright lives in a large house distant from the rest of the town implies distinctions of class and status, but Cartwright is still "our" richest citizen and is thus still regarded as a valued member of the broader community. The fact that he is identified by his profession ("Banker Cartwright") rather than by a first name exemplifies Wilder's tendency, in this play, to treat characters as types rather than as fully individualized persons; Cartwright is more important for the role he fulfills than for any specific personality he displays. Yet even the particular phrasing Wilder uses here is more subtle than it might seem at first: There is some irony, for instance, in the fact that a man named Cartwright (a maker of carts) will own the town's first automobile (thus symbolizing the transition from an agricultural to an industrial economy), while the fact that his car will "come along" is a phrase that describes both its emergence as a historical fact and its literal movement down the street. Here and in many other places, Wilder's language is more complex, and more artistically appropriate, than a quick glance might suggest. Our Town merits more close attention to its details than it has tended to receive; for a play that ranks so high in American literary history, it has prompted surprisingly little detailed analysis.

The play, however, is full of memorable moments and wonderful lines—lines that become even more memorable upon reflection. When the Stage Manager tells us, for example, "Nobody very remarkable ever come out of [Grover's Corners], s'far as we know" (6), his comment at first seems merely a statement of simple fact. By the end of the play, of course, we realize that from another perspective all lives are remarkable, and that part of the purpose of this play is indeed to help us "know" and appreciate that fact. Likewise, young Emily's proud boast to her mother that she has "a wonderful memory" (15) will eventually seem ironic when, at the end of the play, her memory of her youth becomes a central focus of the play's pathos. Wilder's play is brimming with moments like this—moments that seem (as do the lives the play depicts) fuller and richer in retrospect. But the play is also full of lines whose impact is instantly felt, as when Emily's mother, exasperated by her daughter's repeated questions about whether she is pretty, finally tells her, "You're pretty enough for all normal purposes" (32). Inevitably this reply generates a laugh, both when reading and when watching the play, and the sure comic touch the line reveals helps contribute to the overall tonal complexity of Wilder's work. The play is, by turns, touching and wry, funny and dark, pleasing and sad. It captures (in other words) some of the genuine richness of life itself, and it helps us comprehend that richness in vivid and deeply memorable ways.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How does Wilder's depiction of small-town American life resemble and/or differ from the

8. Choose a particular passage from one work by Wilder and discuss, in as much detail as possible, the ways in which that passage contributes to the larger impact of the work as a whole. How does the chosen passage function as part of the rest of the work in terms of such matters as theme, style, structure, tone, mood, and characterization? How is the chosen passage effective as a piece of writing?
9. Track down one or more of the adaptations of Wilder's works (such as the two filmed versions of The Bridge of San Luis Rey, the Hollywood film of Our Town, or the various televised productions of that play) and discuss the effectiveness of the adaptation(s). How and why is one of the chosen adaptations successful as a realization of the potential inherent in Wilder's text? How and why is the adaptation successful in its own right, as an independent work of art? Compare and contrast two different adaptations of the same work, such as the two films of The Bridge or two filmed versions of Our Town.
10. Examine one of Wilder's lesser-known works and discuss the ways in which that work seems typical of the author of The Bridge and Our Town, the ways in which the work seems different from Wilder's most famous texts, and the relative success or failure of that work as a piece of writing. What specific features make the work either effective, ineffective, or some combination of the two?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Thornton Wilder. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.
- Burbank, Rex. Thornton Wilder. 2nd ed. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
- Castronovo, David. Thornton Wilder. New York: Ungar, 1986.
- Goldstone, Richard H. Thornton Wilder: An Intimate Portrait. New York: Dutton, 1975.
- Haberman, Donald. Our Town: An American Play. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
- Harrison, Gilbert A. The Enthusiast: A Life of Thornton Wilder. New York: Ticknor & Fields, 1983.
- Kuner, M. C. Thornton Wilder: The Bright and the Dark. New York: Crowell, 1972.
- Simon, Linda. Thornton Wilder: His World. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1979.
- Stresnau, Hermann. Thornton Wilder. Translated by Frieda Schutze. New York: Ungar, 1971.
- The Thornton Wilder Society. Available online. URL: <http://www.tcnj.edu/~wilder>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Walsh, Claudette. Thornton Wilder: A Reference Guide, 1926–1990. New York: G. K. Hall, 1993.
- Wilder, Thornton. The Bridge of San Luis Rey. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- . Our Town: A Play in Three Acts. New York: Perennial Library, 1985.

Robert C. Evans

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

(1883–1961)

In the work of the poem, the joining of phrases, the trimming away of connectives, the joining of stone to stone, as a Greek column was joined, as the Incans joined their great wall—there is virtue.

(qtd. in Mariani, 1981 597)

Although his poetry and other writings were largely ignored and/or disparaged during the early decades of his career as an author, William Carlos Williams remained convinced of his own talent and insisted (in the face of numerous discouragements) on pursuing his own independent path. He wrote novels, essays, short stories, hundreds of lyric poems, and also a lengthy verse “epic”—all the while carrying on a demanding practice as a small-town physician (delivering, for instance, more than 3,000 babies during more than 40 years as a full-time doctor). In his private letters he was often foul-mouthed and raunchy, while in his public comments he was often belligerent, arrogant, prickly, and self-defensive. Nevertheless, by the end of his life he had earned the respect and affection of many of his fellow writers and had won the loyalty of many younger poets, who saw him as a man totally committed to his art and to the ideal of constant innovation.

Most of the facts of Williams’s life are laid out in the exhaustive (and sometimes exhausting) biography by Paul Mariani, who takes the reader from the poet’s birth to his death in 770 highly detailed pages (not counting notes). Williams was born on September 17, 1883, in Rutherford, New Jersey, the eldest son of William George Williams and his wife, Raquel Hélène Rose Hoheb Williams. As her name might suggest, the future poet’s mother was partly of Jewish and partly of Puerto Rican ancestry; his father’s roots were mainly British. The future poet, however, would later pride himself on being a solidly American writer, rooted in a locale, language, way of life, and ways of thinking that sometimes struck others as narrowly provincial. He was always close to his mother (she lived past age 100 and spent her last frail decades under the poet’s roof), and his childhood seems to have been “normal” and happy. The main unusual event was a yearlong trip to Europe with his mother and his brother Ed in 1898–99; Williams was able to study in Switzerland and visit Paris. After returning to the United States, he and his brother began attending a very fine high school in nearby New York City, and it was there that the future writer first became enthralled with poetry. He began to write verse, and although he had decided to study dentistry (later changing to medicine) at the University of Pennsylvania, he never lost his ambition to be a serious author. Fortunately, his years at Penn (1902–06) put him in contact with the irrepressible EZRA POUND, a younger fellow student who was, if anything, even more preoccupied with poetry that Williams was. Pound, of course, would go on to become one of the most influential figures in modern literature, and his long if often frayed friendship with Williams was one of the most important in the latter’s life. The highly opinionated and cocksure Pound was sometimes an inspiration, sometimes a source of frustration to Williams, but the two men always remained in creative contact. Interestingly enough, Williams also at this time (through Pound) became friendly with another young person who would later make a significant literary mark—a young woman known as Hilda Doolittle, whom Pound, years later, rechristened H. D. when he was promoting her startlingly new “imagist” poems.

Although Williams was often lonely at Penn, he made solid progress in his medical studies. After graduating in 1906, he interned in New York City for the next several years, all the while producing poetry (heavily influenced by Keats) that he self-published in a volume titled Poems in 1909. During that same year Williams realized that he was in love with the very same woman in whom his younger brother was interested; when they finally asked her to choose between them, she chose Ed. Williams, crushed, within a few days proposed on the rebound to her sister, Florence Herman, who accepted. Williams, however, soon left the United States to study pediatrics in Germany, and while in Europe he also visited many other countries, including England, where his old friend Pound was making a name for himself as a highly innovative modern writer. Back in the United States by 1910, Williams began practicing medicine in Rutherford, his hometown, where he would live and work for the rest of his life. On December 12 he married Florence (whose nickname was Flossie), and although he was occasionally unfaithful to her over the coming years, their marriage endured for the rest of his life, and generally it was a happy union. The older he grew, the more he appreciated his loyal wife, and the more he also regretted his early infidelities. In the meantime, William Eric Williams, the first of two sons, was born on January 7, 1914. The year before, the boy's father had also produced his second book (The Tempers), and during 1915 and 1916 Williams also became closely connected with a group of writers involved with a “little magazine” published in New York City called Others, which was in competition with the better-established Poetry (published in Chicago). Williams spent much time in New York, getting to know a variety of up-and-coming cultural figures (including MARIANNE MOORE and WALLACE STEVENS). He was also in steady correspondence with Pound and H. D. (Hilda Doolittle), who were both now in London, but although many of his friends or acquaintances were earning recognition and praise for their writings, Williams's work failed to produce the same immediate impact. The steady stream of publications he issued in the next few years—including Al Que Quiere! (1917), Kora in Hell: Improvisations (1918), and both Spring and All and The Great American Novel (1923)—aroused little widespread interest. Certainly they aroused nothing like the interest that greeted the early publications of T. S. ELIOT, Pound's latest London protégé, for whom Williams felt instant and enduring contempt. He believed that Eliot (with his learned, allusive verse and his thorough immersion in the entire Western literary tradition) would make poetry academic rather than alive—a product of the schools, not the streets. Williams wanted to write poetry that was rooted in things, not ideas; he claimed to favor sharp perception, not meditation or reflection. His hatred of Eliot (often viciously expressed in his private letters) was one of the ruling passions of his life.

Williams was now 40 years old; he was married, was the father of two children (a second son, Paul, had arrived in 1916), and was known in his hometown mainly as a doctor, not an author. Although he published in a variety of little magazines and corresponded with a number of better-known writers, and although he considered himself (and was considered by some others) to be on the cutting edge of the avant garde, he was frustrated by his lack of obvious literary success. Sometimes he doubted his real worth, but mainly he remained stubbornly committed to pursuing the goals he had set for himself, especially the development and use of authentic “American” diction and rhythm in verse. A trip to Europe in 1924 allowed him to visit Paris, at that time the hub of world literature (Pound, of course, was already there), where he made various useful contacts, and in 1925 his well-regarded prose work In the American Grain was published by a major press. In 1926 he won a significant award from Dial magazine (although he was also sued for libel for one of his short stories), and in 1927 his novel titled Voyage to Paganry was issued by the innovative New Directions Press, which would champion his work for decades. Increasingly, then, Williams was beginning to attract attention and admirers, including the young poet Louis Zukofsky and the young novelist Nathaniel West. In 1934, the year after Williams turned 50, his Collected Poems, 1921–1931 (with a preface by Wallace Stevens) appeared, followed by An Early Martyr and Other Poems (1935), a collection of poems called Adam & Eve & The City (1936), an opera libretto called The First President (1936), a novel titled White Mule (1937), a collection of stories called Life along the Passaic River (1938), and The Complete Collected Poems of William Carlos Williams, 1906–1938. Williams was nothing if not prolific, although his letters are full of crude complaints about his patients for distracting him from his writing. At the same time, he was also known as a careful and caring doctor. In short, he was a complex man—sometimes generous and considerate, sometimes full of petty jealousies, vulgar language, and ugly prejudice.

By the late 1930s it was obvious to most people that another world war would soon begin. Although Williams often sympathized with the economic ideas of his old friend Pound (who spent the war making propaganda broadcasts for Fascist Italy), he generally considered himself either apolitical or a man of the Left. His main interest, in any case, was in his own writing, and he was especially interested in trying to develop new kinds of poetic lines and innovative rhythms. By the time the war ended in 1945, he had been devoting most of his creative energies to producing a long poem—a kind of small-town epic—titled Paterson. Book 1 of this work appeared in 1946 to notable acclaim; even critics who had never much admired Williams considered Paterson (particularly its first book) a significant achievement. Book 2 appeared in 1948; book 3 was published in 1949; and book 4 (supposedly the final section) was issued in 1951. (Later, in 1958, he belatedly added a fifth book, much to the surprise of readers, who thought the project was already finished.) Finally, then, by the late 1940s and early 1950s, he had begun to attain the kind of public recognition and honor he had long craved. He even began to make some money from his writings, and certainly he had long since ceased to pay to see his work in print. His Selected Poems (with an introduction by the noted poet and critic Randall Jarrell) appeared in 1949, and his Collected Later Poems was published in 1950 (the year in which he won the National Book Award), followed by the Collected Earlier Poems in 1951. Also in 1950 Make Light of It: Collected Stories was published, and in 1951 he issued his Autobiography. Unfortunately in 1951 he also suffered his first stroke, followed by another one (this time more serious) in 1952. Although his novel The Build-Up was published that year, Williams's ill health made writing difficult. Ironically, then, just when he began to receive widespread acclaim, his body began to fail him. Little wonder, then, that in the early months of 1953 he was confined in a mental hospital, where he was treated for severe depression. Never, however, did Williams give up his interest in literature (especially his own); even when he could only peck out poems with a single finger on his typewriter, he refused to abandon his lifelong goal of being a noted and innovative author.

The rest of the 1950s saw new publications and further recognitions. In 1953 he and Archibald MacLeish were cowinners of the prestigious Bollingen Prize (the first of which had been won several years earlier by Pound, who was now himself confined long-term to a mental hospital, having been accused of treason for his wartime broadcasts on behalf of Mussolini). In 1954 Williams's The Desert Music and Other Poems as well as his Selected Essays were published; in 1955 he issued a collection of poems titled Journey to Love; and in 1957 The Selected Letters of William Carlos Williams was published, along with "The Lost Poems of William Carlos Williams." Unfortunately, a third stroke hit in 1958, but even this did not prevent him from publishing Yes, Mrs. Williams: A Personal Record of My Mother in 1959, the same year in which his play Many Loves was successfully staged in New York. By now he had become a widely revered figure, especially among the newer, more iconoclastic wave of younger American poets, including such Beat figures as Allen Ginsberg (also from Rutherford), whom Williams “adopted” as a kind of poetic son. Williams’s way of writing was seen as a more free-spirited alternative to the highly intellectual work of T. S. Eliot and his imitators, and it was also seen as a rebuke to the more highly structured, more self-consciously formal verse of such younger poets as Richard Wilbur. Some readers, of course, continued to see Williams’s writing as relatively shapeless, unmusical, and bland, but by this point any criticism just made him all the more attractive as a father figure to the young Turks of American verse. It was a period of growing intellectual rebellion, and Williams had seen himself as a rebel for half a century. Many others now agreed.

More strokes occurred in 1961, and Williams finally had to abandon serious writing. This was also the year, however, that saw the publication of Many Loves and Other Plays: The Collected Plays of William Carlos Williams and The Farmers’ Daughters: Collected Stories. Finally, Pictures from Brueghel and Other Poems appeared in 1962. Thus, when Williams was found dead in his bed by his wife on the morning of March 4, 1963, he had departed as one of his country’s most respected poets. Later that year he was awarded both a Pulitzer Prize and the Gold Medal for Poetry by the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Such recognition had been long delayed and sometimes grudging, but by the end of his life he had become one of the most influential American poets of his time—even more influential, in some ways, than his old friend Pound. Williams was an easier poet to imitate than either Pound or Eliot or Wallace Stevens; his subjects were more commonplace than theirs, and his style and forms were both more lax. He remains a potent force—a writer clearly in the line of Whitman—and will probably always appeal to younger poets who see themselves as rebels and who disdain conventional discipline and form.

“The Young Housewife” (1916, 1917)

In this poem, the speaker describes his reaction to imagined and actual glimpses of a young married woman—a woman he seems to find erotically attractive, although his overt response to her is literally distanced and even somewhat courtly.

The poem opens with a precise reference to time, although we soon wonder how the speaker can possibly know what is happening at 10 in the morning to a “young housewife” dressed in a “negligee” “behind / the wooden walls of her husband’s house” (ll. 1–3). Presumably he knows her routine because he himself has routinely driven by her house in the past at this time and seen her emerge regularly at this hour—a presumption implied by the word again when he tells us that “again she comes to the curb” to interact with various delivery men (l. 5). The speaker, however, does not himself seem to be one of these latter types, who have a commercial interest in visiting the woman; instead, the speaker seems to be a kind of voyeur, and he turns us (his readers) into voyeurs in turn. We watch him as he watches her, and thus we watch her as well. His attitude, however, in the end seems neither predatory nor creepy; instead, he seems simply to appreciate (and perhaps yearn for) the woman’s beauty, and in the poem’s final words he even seems to pay her gentle tribute.

The speaker is distanced from the young woman in various ways. Presumably he is older than she (since he emphasizes her youth), and he is also cut off from her partly because she is married (in conventional terms, she belongs to her husband much as the house is also his). He is further separated (at first) by the walls of the house and the doors of his car. The first stanza, in particular, provides merely an external, imagined view: The woman is inside, the speaker is outside, and both are alone, or “solitary” (l. 4). Quite literally, the speaker is merely passing through; as yet, he has no contact at all with the woman.

In the second stanza she at least becomes actually visible when she emerges from the house, and so we get more details of her actual appearance as she “stands / shy, uncorseted, tucking in / stray ends of her hair” (ll. 6–8). Although her manner of dress is sexually provocative, she consciously intends no provocation: She is “shy,” and her shyness is part of her beauty and part of her charm. The “ice-man” and “fish-man” (their very titles suggesting their identification with their jobs) see her mainly as a source of income, whereas the speaker, more poetically, compares her “to a fallen leaf” (l. 9). The image implies his sense of her beauty, her fragility, her isolation, and her function as a symbol of mutability—of the passage of time. In a sense, then, she symbolizes (for the speaker) his own mortality; she is alluring precisely because she is younger than he and because her youth will pass, as his has. The poem freezes her in a moment of time, capturing her in all her unself-conscious freshness and vulnerability.

The car in which the speaker moves is thus not only a symbol of his separation from this particular woman but a broader symbol of mutability in general. Just as the car crushes “dried leaves” (as it moves with a “rush” and produces “crackling” sounds—both instances of onomatopoeia [ll.11–12]), so the woman herself, who had earlier been compared to a “fallen leaf,” will be crushed and left behind by the passage of time. All the more reason, then, for the speaker to honor her with a courteous “bow” and smile (l. 12), since she not only is young and beautiful herself but is also anything or anyone that is full of youth, full of beauty, but also subject to the irreversible passage of time.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the appropriateness of the car as a symbol in this poem. How would the poem be different in the speaker were walking by the house or pedaling by on a bicycle? How does the car symbolize modern civilization? What does the poem imply about alienation in modern life?
2. How might a present-day feminist react to this poem? In what senses is the woman here turned into an object of a man’s gaze? Is the poem at all disturbing, or is it instead a delicate expression of feelings all humans—of both sexes—can share?

“Tract” (1917)

In this relatively long poem, the unidentified speaker instructs his fellow townspeople on the proper way to conduct a funeral. He condemns the conventional elaborate trappings of most such ceremonies, preferring instead a plain, rough-hewn approach in which the reality of death is not prettied-over or denied. He wants a simple ceremony in which the mourners and the wider community participate without ostentation or polite repression.

This poem is obviously indebted to the rhetorical style and manner of Walt Whitman, Williams’s great predecessor as a democratic bard. Significantly, the first word of the poem is I, followed closely by you (l. 1), and we are never allowed to forget either the personality of the speaker or the fact that he is addressing a particular audience of his fellows. He adopts a bluff, plain-spoken, exclamatory, self-confident, argumentative, and even hectoring tone. Although he often invokes God—“For Christ’s sake” (l. 9), “My God” (l. 16), “God knows what” (l. 40), “For heaven’s sake” (l. 46)—his attitude seems fundamentally irreverent; certainly he is anything but pious in the conventional sense of that term. The deity enters the work mainly as a source and subject of expletives, and indeed the rhetoric of the poem is at once unadorned and self-important: The speaker presents himself both as representative of the community and as its loud-mouthed, self-assured instructor. One might even briefly suspect that Williams could be mocking the speaker’s cocky pomposity, except that this imagined voice sounds so much like Williams’s own in some of his least humble moments. Certainly the person speaking in this work takes himself almost too seriously; it is almost as if the funeral is more about him than about the corpse.

Through its broken syntax, its unpredictable line lengths, its abundance of dashes and exclamation points, and its heavy emphasis on questions and other forms of obviously direct address, the poem conveys the sound and rhythms of a speaking (even a shouting) voice. Sometimes the lines have all the force of the very actions they call for or describe, as in the heavily accented command “Knock the glass out” (l. 16)—an image that epitomizes the iconoclastic mood of this work). In general the poem is full of the vigor of lively speech, and although the speaker himself can sometimes seem an almost laughable combination of small-town rube and self-conscious orator, Williams seems to admire him, and he seems to want us to share that admiration. Just as Williams saw himself as a poet intent on busting up the stale conventions of traditional verse, so the speaker is a revolutionist of funerals. He speaks the kind of idiomatic “American” lingo Williams often favored, and sometimes he uses the kind of homespun vernacular Williams himself affected (especially in his letters to Ezra Pound—letters in which the two often adopted the manner of Midwest cracker-barrel philosophers). The poem gives voice to Williams’s preference for all that is plain, simple, and unaffected. Ironically, however, the poem itself can sometimes seem comically if unintentionally pretentious in its own odd ways.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with CLAUDE MCKAY’s poem “If We Must Die,” especially in terms of such matters as form, style, structure, diction, and tone. Do you find one poem more appealing than the other? If so, explain why; if not, explain how each is effective in its own way.
2. This poem is obviously a different kind of work from such other works by Williams as “The Red Wheelbarrow.” How would you characterize the differences? Do you have a preference for one kind of work rather than the other kind? If so, explain why.
3. Reread the account of the poem given here, especially its implicitly and explicitly critical comments. How might you defend the poem against such criticism? What, specifically, makes this an accomplished and effective poem?

“Portrait of a Lady” (1920, 1934)

Discerning the “plot” of this poem is difficult, partly because it is unclear who is speaking to whom or whether any “real” discussion is actually taking place. Some kind of dialogue (whether actual or imagined) seems to be occurring, with one speaker, using painterly metaphors, attempting to describe a woman and another speaker (the woman herself? the speaker himself? the speaker’s alter ego?) responding with questions. As do many poems by Williams, this one ends abruptly and (quite literally) raises more questions than it answers.

The title of the poem suggests that the text will be the latest in a long line of literary and artistic works in which a woman is portrayed. (Henry James wrote a novel titled Portrait of a Lady, Ezra Pound wrote a poem titled “Portrait d’une Femme,” and there are so many paintings with this title that it would be impossible to name them all.) The title, in other words, suggests that the poem will be highly conventional, but the actual poem is anything but. It begins with an improbable, even preposterous metaphor: “Your thighs are appletrees / whose blossoms touch the sky” (ll. 1–2). Perhaps the speaker is having some fun with the woman he presumably addresses, or perhaps Williams is having some fun at the expense of the speaker. Although the imagery here seems a bit absurd, at least the sentence structure and meaning are clear, and the fact that each line contains six syllables, combined with the fact that both lines employ regular iambic meter (in which the even syllables are stressed), implies that the poem will proceed clearly, both in substance and in form. This assumption, however, is immediately undercut in the next line with the unexpected appearance of the question “Which sky?” (l. 3). Who is speaking this question? Is it the woman herself? Is it the speaker in a moment of inquisitive reflection about the two preceding lines? Williams leaves the matter unclear, and the poem soon seems to get back on track with an answer that alludes to a famous painter: “The sky / where Watteau hung a lady’s slipper” (ll. 3–5). With that matter out of the way, the poem then seems to return to its original purpose of describing the lady, this time with an awkward rhyme and oddly contradictory metaphors: “Your knees / are a southern breeze—or / a gust of snow” (ll. 6–8). Now, surely, the speaker is the subject of mockery; it is as if we are eavesdropping on the composition of a particularly inept poem and are overhearing either the speaker’s conversation with himself or with the lady he seeks to extol. In any case, as the rest of the poem proceeds in this desultory fashion, both its form and its meaning becomes progressively less clear, especially when we reach lines 17, 19, and 22, which seem to appear almost out of nowhere. Thus a work that began as a hackneyed exercise in conventional meter and subject descends, by its end, into a kind of prosy, exclamatory chaos. It is as if we witness a kind of minor mental and artistic breakdown. Some critics have praised the wit, cleverness, and irony of the resulting poem.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this text with Pound's "Portrait d'une Femme." How do the works differ in purpose, tone, technique, and final effect? Can Williams's poem be read as in any ways a response to the kind of poem Pound composed?
2. Williams wrote a number of poems with portrait as the first word of the title. Track a few of them down, read them, and then discuss any similarities and/or differences between them. Are there any significant likenesses?
3. In what specific ways (if at all) is this poem witty, clever, and/or ironic? If you were commending the poem to a friend, on what grounds would you commend it? If you were condemning the poem, on what grounds would you condemn it? How would you defend either your commendation or your condemnation to someone who disagreed with you?

"The Widow's Lament in Springtime" (1921)

In this poem, a widow's grief for her lost husband is intensified by her observations of natural beauty.

As its very title suggests, this poem is full of juxtapositions of sorrow and beauty: The first three words of the title emphasize gloom, while the last two stress the joy of renewal. This same basic contrast between opposites helps structure the rest of the work. In the first line, for instance, the word Sorrow is juxtaposed with yard, with the first word implying pain and the second implying a relatively small grassy area, thus suggesting the continuance of life. The word yard implies, on the one hand, a familiar place (a place connected with the comforts of home), but it also implies a relatively confined and constricted place. The widow's grief has so transformed her outlook that sorrow becomes her yard; she feels bounded by and contained by her pain; it has become the psychic "place" she inhabits. The new grass metaphorically "flames" (l. 3—a paradoxical verb that mixes colors even as it suggests the dynamic energy of renewed growth), but (in another bit of paradox) the widow's mood makes the flames seem merely a "cold fire" (l. 5). That last phrase epitomizes Williams's technique in this poem: He constantly jams together contradictory images, thoughts, and emotions, and as the widow meditates on the death of her husband, she inevitably contemplates her own demise.

As in most of Williams's works, the language of this poem is plain, simple, and "ordinary." The words spoken by the widow are the kinds of words a real person might use: The diction is colloquial; the rhythms are unobtrusive; the brief lines and absence of rhyme distance the work from anything that might seem conventionally "poetic." Nevertheless, the poem does contain subtle touches that give the language a slightly intense effect; these include the emphasis on specificity (as in the references to "plumtree" [l. 9] and "cherry branches" [l. 12]), the varied references to colors (such as "white" [l. 9], "yellow," and "red" [l. 14]), the use of repetition (as in lines 10–11), and the use of the first words or initial syllables of lines to emphasize key nouns or verbs (as with "Sorrow" in line 1, "flames" in line 3, "Masses" in line 11, or the strongly stressed "load" in line 12).

Throughout the work, Williams first creates an effect and then subverts it: The poem begins by emphasizing sorrow, then it shifts to emphasizing growth, and then that growth gives way to a sense of coldness and confinement. Likewise, in the next phase the beauty of the flower trees is stressed, but then that beauty is undercut by an explicit reference to "grief" (l. 15). The "joy" (l. 17) once associated with the flowers is momentarily mentioned, but that happiness is soon forgotten (l. 19). The aging woman next mentions her “son” (who might symbolize the continuation of life, a source of consolation, and a hope for the future), and the fact that he tells her of having seen “trees of white flowers” in “meadows” at “the edge of the heavy woods” (ll.21–22, 24) again suggests a possible change in mood to something more positive. Obviously the son is trying to revive her spirits, and the lush natural language used to describe his vision does temporarily give the poem a more upbeat tone. The widow’s response can even, for a brief moment, seem almost ecstatic, as if she intends to abandon her grief by uniting with nature: “I feel that I would like / to go there / and fall into those flowers” (ll. 25–27). As befits the apparent new mood, the language becomes a bit heightened: We notice (for instance) the echo of “feel” and “fall” and the alliteration of “fall” and “flowers.” Yet the word fall is inherently ambiguous: On the one hand, it can suggest a surrender to natural pleasures, but, on the other hand, it can imply a kind of death, and it is this second mood that Williams chooses to emphasize in the poem’s last line, when the widow imagines that she would like to “sink into the marsh” near the flowers (l. 28). In its final words, therefore, the poem comes full circle: It returns to its opening emphasis on sorrow, and it concludes with a memorable image of nearly suicidal grief.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare this widow’s response to the death of her husband to the response of one twin to his brother’s untimely demise in THORNTON WILDER’s novel The Bridge of San Luis Rey. How are their thoughts and feelings similar? How are they distinct? In which case is the grief more intense? Why?
2. How does the woman here resemble and/or differ from the main character of KATHERINE ANNE PORTER’s story “The Jilting of Granny Weatherall”? What kinds of marriages are implied in both works? How are the women alike or different in their fundamental personalities?
3. Scan this poem (in other words, count the numbers of syllables in each line, and mark the syllables that are accented and unaccented). What patterns do you detect? How does Williams emphasize key words or phrases? Where and how does Williams’s use of meter seem especially subtle or skillful?

“To Elsie” (1923)

The speaker begins with a generalization about the way common people in the United States “go crazy” (whether literally or metaphorically); he then seems to focus on the inhabitants of northern New Jersey in particular, describing careless young men and filthy young women who engage in degraded sex that results in rootless, abandoned children. One such child is the “Elsie” of the title, who works as a maid in a suburban doctor’s home; physically unattractive, she wears “cheap / jewelry” to attract “rich young men with fine eyes” (ll. 46–48). The poem ends by contrasting a sense of filth, hunger, imprisonment, and aimlessness with a brief glimpse of merely imagined beauty.

The poem opens with phrasing that seems paradoxical: “The pure products of America” (a phrase that sounds hopeful and uplifting) “go crazy” (a phrase that undercuts the promise suggested by the opening words; ll. 1–2). This pattern of ironic juxtaposition of opposites continues elsewhere in the text. Thus, lines 3–6 and the first word of line 7 seem generally attractive, but that appealing tone is then immediately subverted by the reference to “deaf-mutes, thieves / old names / and promiscuity” (ll. 7–9), and this renewed bleakness continues for several more stanzas (ll. 10–24). In those ensuing lines, the speaker expresses contempt for the character, the appearance, and the basic morality of people he seems to consider social dregs, who have no taste and little sense of responsibility or ethics—people who seem driven merely by a desire for cheap sensations. He mocks their personal habits as well as their clothes, using them (apparently) as symbols of a broader social sickness, a wider failure of the national culture. When a touch of natural beauty does once again briefly enter the poem, the phrasing sounds either ironically violent (“choke-cherry”) or foreign and abstract (“viburnum”); ll.

25–26), and it serves only to emphasize by contrast the mechanical, almost predatory sex for which it provides a backdrop. When the poem's focus shifts from these disgusting generalities to the specific girl of the title, she is described as if she is something either vomited forth or washed ashore (l. 31), and she is depicted not only as ugly in her physical appearance (ll. 44–45) but as tawdry in her taste and motives (ll. 46–48). More repulsive imagery continues for a few further lines (ll. 49–54), is very briefly interrupted by a quick imagined glance at “deer / going by fields of goldenrod” (ll. 56–57), and then is followed by more depressing phrasing until the poem simply peters out. It ends with an image of aimless mechanical movement.

As a satire of cultural corruption the poem has some force, although at times its contempt for the people it describes seems to border on the vicious and misanthropic. The speaker seems not only scornful of loose-living young men and the filthy young women who submit in “numbed terror” (l. 24) to meaningless sex, but also disdainful of “deaf-mutes” (l. 8) and even of those with “a dash of Indian blood” (l. 30). Most surprising are the repellant terms used to describe Elsie herself. The speaker shows her little pity and less consideration. Presumably Williams meant to avoid any hint of mawkish sentimentality, but when we discover that Elsie was in fact a real person, was an orphan, and was indeed the Williams family's own maid, the publication of a poem about her (with “her great / ungainly hips,” her “flopping breasts,” and her “cheap / jewelry” [ll. 44–47])—a poem with her name in the title, no less!—seems more than a little cruel. Armed with this biographical information, one is tempted to regard the poem as an unintended satire on the poet himself, who can perhaps seem at least as crude as the vulgar cretins he disdains. The speaker's sympathies, in any case, seem directed more toward the hardworking middle-class people who employ Elsie (“some doctor's family” who live in a “hard-pressed house in the suburbs” [ll. 38–40]) than toward the slovenly, overweight, tasteless woman the poem presents. Indeed, the speaker even seems more sympathetic to attractive “rich young men with fine eyes”

(l. 48) on whom Elsie has set her sights than he seems toward the gross and grasping servant. If Elsie could read (or cared to), one wonders how she might have felt about the poem in which her employer so carefully immortalized her name, appearance, and character.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with T. S. Eliot's satirical poem “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock.” Discuss the works in terms of setting, tone, imagery, and form. Which work appeals to you more as a satire? Explain why in detail.
2. Read this work alongside Williams's “The Young Housewife.” How are women presented in the two works? What qualities of women seem important to each speaker? How are the views of women presented in the two works typical of attitudes commonly held in our culture?
3. Discuss the absence of periods in this poem. What effects are achieved by this absence of final punctuation? How do those effects contribute (if at all) to the success of the poem? How, in its form and structure, does the poem seem both organized and somewhat chaotic?

“The Red Wheelbarrow” (1923)

The speaker asserts that a significant connection exists between various details of an outside scene, including a rain-glazed red wheelbarrow and some white chickens.

This brief and highly cryptic poem is one of Williams's most famous works. It clearly seems to be an example of the kind of thinking about poetry that led to the creation of imagism, a style associated with the works of such writers as H. D. and the early Ezra Pound. Imagism insisted on emphasizing direct, specific, crisp, clear, brief, and unadorned glimpses of particular objects, with a minimum of commentary, interpretation, or obtrusive “artistry.” The images, if sharply enough presented, would themselves evoke a significant mood, emotion, perception, or understanding. Williams's own version of this kind of writing is often called objectivism, in which the focus is clearly on a few particular objects and in which the poem itself becomes a kind of object, like a painting or snapshot. In a poem such as “The Red Wheelbarrow,” Williams does not even seem especially interested (as the best imagist poets are) in creating an emotional epiphany or providing a moment of meaningful insight. Instead, his focus seems to be on things in and of themselves, in and for their own sakes.

In its own day, Williams's poem would have seemed highly iconoclastic. It rejects most of the features conventionally associated with poetry until then, including regular rhythms, relatively long lines, and predictable rhymes. Yet the poem is not without a certain shape and design: Each “stanza” consists of two lines; in each case the first line contains three words and the second line contains just one; each single word of each second line consists of two syllables; finally, in stanzas 1 and 4 (the two outside stanzas) the first line consists of four syllables, while in stanzas 2 and 3 (the two inside stanzas) the first line consists of three syllables. In all these ways, then, the poem does attain a high degree of symmetry and form. Yet the lyric is also highly structured in other ways as well: The first stanza, for instance, consists entirely of abstract language, while each of the next three stanzas zeroes in on a specific, discrete image. Moreover, in the second line of stanza 1 (the abstract stanza), it is the second syllable of the two-syllable word that is accented, whereas in the second lines of the three stanzas (the “imagistic” stanzas), it is the first syllable of each two-syllable word that is stressed. Furthermore, in each the three final stanzas, the line break separates an adjective (or modifying word) in the first line from a noun (or substantive word) in the second: “wheel / barrow” (ll. 3–4), “rain / water” (ll. 5–6), “white / chickens” (ll. 7–8). By breaking these lines as he does, Williams thus emphasizes each component part of a significant phrase, and the nouns in particular are stressed by their relative isolation. For a poem as brief as this one (just 16 words long, with four words in each stanza), the work is relatively colorful: Not only do the colors “red” (l. 3) and “white” (l. 7) contrast with (and thus intensify) each other, but even the word glazed implies a kind of glossy light. The poem juxtaposes a man-made object (the wheelbarrow) with rain, sunlight, and chickens (all of which seem to symbolize nature). The poem also juxtaposes stasis (the parked wheelbarrow) and movement (the presumably wandering chickens). In short, the poem is more complex than it seems; it is not as shapeless or as formless as it might at first appear.

What, if anything, does it all amount to? Surely Williams intended the work as a kind of “antipoem”—a rejection of all the grand rhetoric and grand subjects so often associated with conventional verse. This poem urges us to pause, linger over, and think about a few seemingly simple facts—the kinds of facts we too often ignore and too often fail to appreciate. As does a skillful painting or photograph, this poem invites us to notice (and ponder) small details we might otherwise fail to apprehend or enjoy. Williams chooses the most commonplace, least “lofty” sorts of objects (a wheelbarrow; chickens) and invites us to contemplate their beauty, especially when they are juxtaposed in a brief moment of time and in an appealing natural setting. The poem is thus, in some ways, a romantic poem written in an antiromantic style.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with Ezra Pound's poem “In a Station of the Metro.” How are they similar in imagery, design, and final effect? How are they different in all these ways? In which poem is the title more significant? Discuss the settings of the two works.
2. Read H. D.'s poem “Oread” and then discuss the ways in which it is similar to and/or different from Williams's poem. In particular, discuss such matters as point of view, tone of voice, use of figurative language, and use of devices of sound. Does Williams employ any sound devices? (For example, can you find any examples of assonance in his poem?)
3. This poem is often cited, by those unsympathetic to modernist poetry, as an especially memorable example of the flaws of that kind of writing. For such critics, the work seems trivial, pointless, and not especially skillful. Whether you agree or disagree with such claims, how would you defend the poem against them?

“Spring and All” (1923)

This poem describes the first awakenings of life in a bleak, deserted landscape that is full of mud and weeds—a landscape that is just recovering from winter.

The poem opens with a striking reference to a “contagious hospital” (l. 1)—that is, an institution for treating diseases easily spread from one person to the next. By the end of the work, however, the poem will have described life and vitality awakening first in one plant and then in another and another. The landscape on the road to the hospital exists under the moving “surge” (with perhaps a pun on serge, to suggest the appearance of ribbed wool) of “blue / mottled clouds” (ll. 2–3), but then all this movement stops short (ironically) with the abrupt appearance of two heavily accented words (“cold wind”) that make the tone of the work seem suddenly bleak. The ensuing details suggest a lifeless wasteland, where even the potentially life-giving water seems distributed in puny, stagnant mud holes (l. 7). Significantly, the word standing is repeated in adjacent lines (ll. 6–7) to emphasize the sense of dead stasis. Meanwhile, the language of the poem—like the landscape it describes—seems bare, naked, and nearly inanimate. The anonymous speaker makes no comments and issues no judgments; he merely describes.

Sometimes the syntax (or sentence structure) of the poem is so stripped down that it is impossible, at first, to know how lines are combined. Lines 7–8, for instance, seem to stand off by themselves, disconnected from the lines before them (thus creating a momentary confusion in the reading). Likewise, lines 9–13 amount to an extended, nongrammatical fragment, brimming with adjectives but cut off from any tight logical connection with either the two preceding fragments (ll. 7–8) or the grammatically coherent thought that follows (ll. 14–15). It is as if Williams seeks to imitate, in the broken syntax of his poem, the desolate, discontinuous setting he describes, where nothing seems quite connected except by a pervading atmosphere of forbidding bleakness. Even spring, when it makes its first hesitant appearance, seems “Lifeless,” “sluggish,” and “dazed” (ll. 14–15). And then, just when we feel satisfied that after seven lines of fragments (ll. 6–13), we finally have a complete, coherent thought (ll. 14–15), Williams disorients us again, referring mysteriously to an unspecified “They” who “enter the new world naked, / cold, uncertain of all / save that they enter” (ll. 16–18). Who are these “They”? At first the word might imply newborn humans, especially in view of the terms naked and uncertain (the latter word implying the ability to think or feel). Eventually it seems that the speaker is referring to the small plants that are now beginning to push sprouts above the surface of the ground. The momentary confusion seems deliberate, not only because Williams wants to keep his readers off their feet as they make their way through this poem, but also because he probably wants us to recognize the resemblance between our own lives and the lives of these newly budding plants—which will someday, of course, turn into the same kind of dead vegetation scattered about in the poem’s opening half.

The shift from end of winter to start of spring occurs, in fact, at exactly the midpoint of the work (thus exemplifying the ways in which Williams’s poems are often more subtly structured than they may first appear). In the closing lines Williams lists details of life that begin to counteract the details of death with which the poem opened. Significantly, the last line ends with an unpunctuated verb (“to awaken”) that is full of vitality and promise.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with T. S. Eliot’s poem The Waste Land. How are the two works similar and/or different in imagery, mood, symbolism, and diction? How is Williams’s poem in some ways a response to Eliot’s?
2. Examine Williams’s poem alongside ROBERT FROST’s “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening.” How do both poets use details of scenery to evoke mood and imply larger meanings?

- Discuss the point of view used in each poem. Who is speaking in the Williams work? What does each poem imply about the nature of life?
3. Discuss the sound effects of this poem. How does Williams use rhythm, alliteration, assonance, punctuation, enjambment, and other such devices to give the poem maximum impact? How and why is the poem more effective (if at all) when read aloud rather than when read silently?

“The Dead Baby” (1927, 1935)

The speaker of this poem urges the cleaning of a house in preparation for the arrival (from a hospital) of a distraught couple's dead baby. The body of the baby, “surrounded by fresh flowers” (l. 25), will then be put on display for friends and acquaintances who seem more like “curious / holiday seekers” (ll. 2–3) than true mourners.

Williams, who was a pediatrician himself and who delivered several thousand babies over a long career, surely had personal familiarity with many cases of stillbirths. The poem could easily have been mawkish or sentimental; instead, it seems strangely boisterous, with a strong undercurrent of sarcasm aimed at mourners who seem less interested in consoling the grieving parents than in gawking at the tiny corpse. For them, the baby is mainly a strange spectacle, a “curiosity” (l. 24), rather than a real person, whose loss is truly significant. Ironically, however, the present poem itself can be accused of much the same kind of gruesome insensitivity. The speaker seems at least as guilty as the “curious” mourners (l. 2) of treating the baby's death as merely an odd spectacle. It is the speaker, after all, who turns the death into an occasion for a poem in which the focus is as least as much on the speaker's own peculiar attitudes and tone of voice as it is on anyone or anything else. Presumably the speaker intends to impress us with his unconventional lack of sentimentality, but there are times (such as lines 18–19, with its weird echo of earlier uses of the word sweep) when his tone seems merely crude—almost as if he were making a self-conscious and somewhat clumsy joke at a most inappropriate time. Like the speaker of Williams's poem “Tract,” the speaker here sometimes seems a bit too full of himself to be taken completely seriously.

The poem begins with a vigorous and heavily accented verb (Sweep) that sets a hectic tone for much of the rest of the work. The domestic details of the first four lines are then suddenly juxtaposed with the flat but shocking announcement in line 5 that “the baby is dead”—a statement made all the more surprising and emphatic by the poem's single use of rhyme. The speaker adopts the tone of a brusque, busy observer; his one bit of emotional commentary on the scene (when he refers to the father as “pitiful” [l. 11]) seems almost insipid; certainly it lacks any kind of subtlety. The speaker seems impressed by his own take-charge fervor; he issues constant commands (“Sweep the house” [l. 1]; “Sweep the house clean” [l. 13]; “Hurry up!” [l. 20]); these, presumably, are meant to make readers feel personally involved in the action of the poem, almost as if we ourselves are being addressed. In the final analysis, however, many readers are likely to feel more “curiosity” about the oddly detached and self-absorbed speaker than about the unfortunately dead baby.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work with Williams's poem “Tract,” particularly in such matters as tone, attitude, imagery, diction, and theme. How is death treated in both works? Explain in detail your responses to the speakers of both works.
2. Read this poem alongside CARL SANDBURG's “Grass.” Discuss the roles of the speakers in both poems; discuss the use of irony in both works; discuss the tones of the two poems and the attitudes toward death implied by each.
3. Discuss the use of dashes in this poem. How do they contribute to its tone? How do they almost mimic the actions the poem calls for? In what other ways does the poem create and achieve its peculiar tone?

“This Is Just to Say” (1934)

The speaker apologizes to an unknown addressee for having prematurely eaten luscious plums that were probably being saved for breakfast.

It is easy to imagine this poem being written as a note by a shamefaced husband to a potentially disapproving wife and being taped to the door of a refrigerator (or icebox). The work is typical of Williams in numerous ways, including its conventionally “unpoetic” subject matter, its simplicity of diction and structure, its almost prosaic rhythms, and its avoidance of all the typical features we commonly associate with figurative, “literary,” “lyric” language, such as metaphors, similes, alliteration, and assonance, not to mention rhyme and meter. Nevertheless, as is often true of Williams’s works, the poem is a bit more complex and structured than it might at first appear. It consists, for instance, of three stanzas of four lines each. The first stanza focuses on the speaker; the second stanza focuses on the addressee; the final stanza (in its first line) joins the two previous subjects, but then it immediately shifts to an emphasis on the plums themselves. The poem is also more rhythmically astute than a first reading might suggest. Thus, in the first stanza the accents all fall on the key final words, which, taken together, provide a quick summary of the poem’s plot: “eaten . . . / plums . . . / in . . . icebox” (ll. 1–4). In lines 1 and 4 the accents fall on the first syllable of two-syllable words; in lines 2 and 3 the accents fall on monosyllabic words. In stanza 2, on the other hand, the accents are much more randomly distributed, whereas in stanza 3 the accents fall back into a discernible pattern: In lines 9–10 the stresses emphasize the penultimate (that is, the next-to-last) syllables, whereas in the final two lines they accentuate the final words of each line.

The opening stanza states a simple fact about the speaker’s behavior; the second stanza considers the probable (and prior) intention of another person; the first line of the third stanza briefly raises a moral perspective; but the final three lines stress the sheer physical pleasure of the eating. Sensuous joy literally gets the final word. Each final adjective (delicious, sweet, cold) becomes progressively less abstract, progressively more physical. Ironically, the poem ends with a word (cold) that often carries negative connotations but that, in this case, implies intense sensual pleasure. The apology gets two words (l. 9); the recollection and celebration of the joy of eating get eight (ll. 10–11). The poem, which appears modest and well shaped on the page, exults in a minor orgy of physical satisfaction. It is a romantic poem in a domestic setting, exemplifying Williams’s tendency to find joy (when he can) in the details of everyday life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the similarities and differences between this work and Wallace Stevens’s poem “Anecdote of a Jar.” In particular, discuss such matters as tone, point of view, imagery, and final effect. Which work is more conventional in its use of poetic devices and structure?
2. Using encyclopedias and the Internet, read several overviews of Williams’s typical stylistic traits, and then discuss—in as much detail as you can—the ways in which this poem is typical of his writing in such matters as diction, form, imagery, and tone.

Paterson (1946–1958)

Williams himself described this five-part work as “a long poem upon the resemblance between the mind of modern man and a city.” He sought to use “the multiple facets which a city presented as representatives for comparable facets of contemporary thought thus to be able to objectify the man himself as we know him and love him and hate him.” He also considered the poem to be about “the search of the poet for his language, his own language” (Paterson xii–xiii).

Even critics who have often been unsympathetic in their comments on other works by Williams have found aspects to value in Paterson—or at least in parts of it. The poem has been praised for its ambitious scope, its imaginative invention, its intriguing imagery, its suggestive combinations of verse and prose, its rhythmic energy, and its general success as a suburban American epic that explores the complexities of modern life in language that is often colloquial and vernacular. As Kelli Larson notes (66–103), analysts have commented on such matters as the ways the poem treats the conflict between the real and the ideal; the use of images of women; the autobiographical aspects of the text; the thematic emphasis on destruction, change, and renewal; the use of techniques of interlacing and juxtaposition; the interpenetration of past and present; the employment of irony, comedy, and multiple voices; the similarities between the techniques of this poem and the techniques of various modern painters; the emphasis on a specific, local, American setting; the anthropomorphic treatment of landscape (comparing a place to a human being); the emphasis on social and cultural satire; the ways the poem engages in dialogue (and sometimes conflict) with works by other modern writers (such as Eliot and Pound); the influence of Whitman and other pre-modern precursors; the poem's complex use of symbolism, especially geographical symbols; the poem's overt and implied commentary on economics; the difficulties of writing a long poem in an essentially imagist style; the poet's constant wrestlings with matters of form; the use of the so-called variable foot to structure individual lines; the poem as a meditation on the making of poetry; the appearance of "real people" (including the poet's mother) as presences in the work; the relation between the poem and contemporary theories of literature; the poem's pervasive use of wordplay and punning; the ways in which the poem is a reaction against the influence of British literature; the use of metaphors of marriage and divorce; the role of sexual symbolism; and the various kinds of unity that may exist beneath an apparently fragmentary surface. This list could easily be hugely extended, but enough has already been said to suggest the sheer complexity of the work, the ways in which it has fascinated and intrigued numerous critics, and the potential riches it has in store for any reader who is open to its style and methods. Although many critics argued (especially as the individual parts of the poem first appeared) that the work declined in quality with each successive addition, becoming less coherent as it evolved, today the poem is widely considered not only Williams's masterpiece but also one of the best long poems written anywhere during the 20th century.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read at least one book of Paterson alongside a comparably long section of Ezra Pound's epic The Cantos. Discuss resemblances and/or differences between the poems in terms of such matters as themes, techniques, styles, tones, and diction. Are there any ways in which Williams's poem can be seen as a self-conscious response to Pound's?
2. Choose one relatively short section of Paterson and then discuss that section as a "representative" portion of the work as a whole. How does the selection epitomize what Williams was trying to do and achieve in the larger work, especially in terms of theme, rhythm, and language?

"Landscape with the Fall of Icarus" (1962)

The poem responds to a painting by Pieter Brueghel the Elder (1525?–69) that depicts the fall of Icarus, a mythical youth whose father crafted wings for him that were assembled from feathers stuck together with wax. Icarus, however, despite his father's warnings, flew too near the sun; the wax melted; and Icarus plunged into the sea and drowned. In the Brueghel painting, Icarus's leg can barely be seen sticking from the water off to the side of the painting.

In this late poem, Williams uses brief, abrupt lines; they lack any punctuation, and they also lack any capitalization. It is up to the reader, then, to determine through trial and error the syntax (or sentence structure) of the work. Each stanza consists of three lines; the lines range in length anywhere from one to six syllables; and only once (in stanzas 2 and 7) is the same pattern of syllables repeated. The first stanza serves as a kind of introduction; it mentions the painter, Icarus himself, and the springtime setting. The next three stanzas then focus on that setting; the final three deal with the plunge itself. In that sense, then, the poem has a symmetrical structure—a pattern that underlies its apparently

5. Compare and contrast Williams's Paterson sequence with the wartime Trilogy by H. D. How are they similar and/or different in setting, theme, diction, techniques, and larger purpose? How is each work a response to its particular historical moment?
6. Williams detested the work of T. S. Eliot. Do some research, and then try to explain why he reacted to Eliot's work as he did. Next, choose two "representative" works by Williams and Eliot and discuss the ways in which these two particular texts exemplify the distinct styles, concerns, and purposes of the two writers.
7. Women often play important roles in Williams's poems. Choose between five and 10 lyrics by Williams and discuss the ways women are presented in them. What continuities and/or differences do you see? How might a current feminist respond to Williams's depictions of women? (Explain why.)
8. Initially Williams was not widely read or widely valued in Britain. Why? Which poets were most often admired in Britain during the early to mid-20th century? How did the writings of those poets tend to differ from the work Williams was trying to do? Does Williams's emphasis on "American" phrasing automatically limit the appeal of his poems?
9. Read through the poems discussed earlier. What kinds of social and/or political stances (if any) do they seem to imply? What role(s) do they seem to imply for the poet? How does Williams's engagement with the world resemble and/or differ from the engagements of such other modern poets as Ezra Pound or Wallace Stevens or T. S. Eliot?
10. Using the volume edited by Charles Doyle, trace the development of Williams's reputation. What kinds of faults have critics found with his poetry? What kinds of virtues have they identified? Do you see those faults and/or those virtues exemplified in any of the poems by Williams you have read? Which poem by Williams appeals to you the most? Explain why in detail.

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Doyle, Charles, ed. William Carlos Williams: The Critical Heritage. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1980.
- Larson, Kelli A. Guide to the Poetry of William Carlos Williams. New York: G. K. Hall, 1995.
- Mariani, Paul. William Carlos Williams: A New World Naked. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1981.
- . William Carlos Williams: The Poet and His Critics. Chicago: American Library Association, 1975.
- Mazzaro, Jerome, ed. Profile of William Carlos Williams. Columbus, Ohio: Merrill, 1971.
- Nelson, Cary. "Modern American Poetry: William Carlos Williams." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/maps/poets/s_z/williams/williams.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Wagner, Linda Welshimer. The Poems of William Carlos Williams: A Critical Study. Middleton, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1963.
- . "William Carlos Williams." In Sixteen Modern American Authors: A Survey of Research and Criticism, edited by Jackson R. Bryer, 573–585. New York: Norton, 1973.
- . "William Carlos Williams." In Sixteen Modern American Authors. Vol. 2, A Survey of Research and Criticism since 1972. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.
- William Carlos Williams Review. Available online. URL: <http://english.ttu.edu/WCWR>. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Williams, William Carlos. The Collected Poems of William Carlos Williams. Vol. 1, 1909–1939. Edited by A. Walton Litz and Christopher MacGowan. New York: New Directions, 1986.
- . The Collected Poems of William Carlos Williams. Vol. 2, 1939–1962. Edited by Christopher MacGowan. New York: New Directions, 1986.
- . Paterson. Rev. ed. Edited by Christopher MacGowan. New York: New Directions, 1992.

Robert C. Evans

RICHARD WRIGHT (1908–1960)

I felt that the Negro could not live a full, human life under the conditions imposed upon him by America; and I felt, too, that America, for different reasons, could not live a full, human life. It seemed to me, then, that if the Negro solved his problem, he would be solving infinitely more than his problem alone.

(Black Boy)

Richard Wright rose from a background of poverty, hunger, abuse, abandonment, and crushing racial discrimination to become one of the most highly respected and widely read authors of his day. For a time he was considered the leading black fiction writer in the United States and perhaps the world, and although his reputation eventually declined after its brief high point, he is still regarded today as one of the most important and influential of all African-American writers. His most notable novel, Native Son, was an instant best seller, as was Black Boy, his memorable autobiography. Both books were at once highly praised, and both have remained continuously in print. Unfortunately Wright's premature death when he was only in his early fifties silenced an eloquent voice that might have continued to develop and evolve. Equally unfortunately Wright never lived to see the massive social changes that his own work helped inspire.

Born on September 4, 1908, on a farm near Natchez, Mississippi, Richard Nathaniel Wright was the son of Nathan Wright, an uneducated tenant farmer, and Ella Wilson Wright, who briefly taught school before later working in a series of service jobs. Ella's family considered the marriage a mistake, and certainly the young couple struggled financially. In 1911 Richard; his new young brother, Leon Allan (born in 1910); and their mother moved in with her parents in Natchez, to be joined later by Nathan, who began working in a sawmill. It was while living with his grandparents that Richard, at age four, inadvertently set their house on fire—an incident vividly described in Black Boy. Wright claims that as punishment he was brutally beaten by his mother—one of many incidents in his young life that supposedly resulted in severe physical discipline. Even so, his relations with his mother were mostly positive, while his dealings with his father were anything but. In Black Boy the father is presented as shiftless, egocentric, and irresponsible—especially when he leaves his wife for another woman after the family had moved to Memphis in 1913. After not having seen his father for a quarter-century, Wright later describes him as a white-haired, toothless farmer, bent and broken by years of peasant labor (Black Boy 34–35).

After the father's desertion, Wright's existence was mainly shaped by contact with his mother, her parents, and her siblings. Ella Wright worked for a time in Memphis as a cook, but by early 1916, when Ella became extremely sick, Wright's maternal grandmother became a major influence on his life. She briefly moved to Memphis, and then Wright returned with her to Jackson, Mississippi (after spending a short time in a Memphis orphanage). Eventually Wright, his brother, and his mother moved to Elaine, Arkansas, where they lived with his mother's sister, Maggie, whose husband, Silas Hoskins, operated a prosperous liquor store. When Hoskins was violently killed by whites who coveted his property, Wright and his family fled briefly to West Helena, Arkansas, then for a time to Jackson, and then finally back to West Helena, where Wright's mother and aunt found work as domestics and where Wright was able to attend school for a time. However, when his mother's health deteriorated once more, he was forced to drop out of school and take odd jobs to earn money. Finally, when his mother suffered a debilitating stroke, the small family moved back to Mississippi, where Wright stayed mostly with his grandparents but also (for a time) with a somewhat distant aunt and uncle. Wright's assertive grandmother was a devout Seventh-Day Adventist, and the young boy soon found himself in constant conflict with her (and an aunt) about religion. Even at this early age he was strongly independent and resisted most efforts to make him conform to others' expectations. Nevertheless, he usually did well in school (whenever he was able to attend), and he was also capable of making friends, even becoming the unofficial leader of a small group of boys whose fun is reflected in the opening pages of his remarkable later story "Big Boy Leaves Home."

By the time Wright was an adolescent, his grandmother had ceased trying to convert him (although he did later allow himself to be baptized as a Methodist, chiefly to placate his mother). He took a wide variety of odd jobs when not attending school, and he also fell in love with reading, devouring as many books, magazines, and newspapers as he could lay his hands on. By eighth grade he had actually written a story of his own, and by the time he graduated from ninth grade in 1925 he was even selected as valedictorian—although, typically enough, he refused to read the speech the principal had written for him, insisting instead on delivering one of his own. After briefly attending high school that fall, he dropped out in order to work, but although his formal education had now ended, his informal self-schooling never ceased. Especially after he moved later in 1925 to Memphis (where he worked at various jobs, including one in an optical factory), his reading was voracious, particularly in recent American fiction. A white coworker allowed him to use the coworker's library card, although Wright sometimes had to resort to clever deceptions to get access to all the books he wanted. Once, for instance, he handed the librarian a note (supposedly written by the coworker, but actually authored by Wright) that read, "Dear Madam: Will you please let this nigger boy . . . have some books by H. L. Mencken?" When the librarian worried that Wright himself might want to read the books, he deferentially (and falsely) replied, "Oh, no, ma'am. I can't read" (Black Boy 236). However, reading had in fact now become Wright's chief obsession, and the joint activities of reading and writing would become the main means by which he would eventually move beyond his present poverty and degradation.

That transition, of course, did not happen overnight, but new horizons slowly began to open for Wright after he moved to Chicago in December 1927. After attempting in 1928 to win employment with the postal service (an attempt that failed at first because of his poor health), he eventually did secure a steady post office job in 1929—a position that not only gave him a modicum of financial security but also allowed him to make friends with various coworkers. He began associating with other local black writers, but the onslaught of the Great Depression (which hit in October 1929) eventually meant that Wright, as did many others, soon lost his steady position and was plunged into enormous economic uncertainty. Nevertheless, while working various jobs (including stints as an insurance agent and political campaigner), he continued to read and write, even managing, in 1931, to publish a short story in an African-American magazine. By this time he had also (like many impoverished Americans) become increasingly interested in communism, and by 1933, after working a further variety of odd and often menial jobs, he actually joined a group of mostly white writers affiliated with the Communist Party. He soon became prominent in the group, both as a leader and an author, and in 1934 he joined the party itself. He published widely in party journals (although he still had to do manual labor to earn an actual living), and he continued to read widely, especially in the works of great novelists. By 1935 he had himself finished a novel called “Cesspool” (published decades later as Lawd Today!), had published a number of poems, and was also at work on one of his best stories, “Big Boy Leaves Home.” He also had begun lecturing and writing on literature and politics, producing journalism, and working for the Federal Writers’ Project. Increasingly he thought of himself—and was seen by others—as a professional writer, no matter how he earned his actual income.

By 1936 Wright was centrally involved in various literary and cultural activities in the Chicago area, including the Federal Theatre Project, the Negro Federal Theatre, the South Side Writers’ Group, and the Middle West Writers’ Conference. Although still a leftist and still often using his writing to champion leftist causes, by 1937 he had become increasingly uncomfortable with the demands made on his time, and the strictures placed on his intellectual independence, by the local Communist Party, from which he became more and more alienated. His experiences in Chicago, especially his relations with his former comrades, were now frequently tense. Therefore, rejecting the offer of a comfortable and permanent position with the Chicago post office, he moved in 1937 to New York City to pursue his literary ambitions. Despite his experiences in Chicago, he worked in New York as an editor for the communist newspaper the Daily Worker, eventually writing hundreds of articles on a wide variety of topics. By this time, though, he had also produced another novel (“Tarbaby’s Dawn,” which has never been published) as well as a story (“Fire and Cloud”) that won first prize in a major national contest. By 1938 a collection of his stories called Uncle Tom’s Children: Four Novellas was published and received highly positive reviews, and by the end of the year he had finished the first version of the novel that would soon make him famous: Native Son.

In 1939 Wright received a prestigious Guggenheim Fellowship, and, although attracted to two different white women (Ellen Poplar and Dhima Rose Meadman), he chose to marry the latter. One of his stories—“Bright and Morning Star”—was now being dramatized and was also selected for inclusion in two important anthologies, and Wright had also begun work on a new novel (“Little Sister”). Most important of all, however, he had finished Native Son, which was not only published by March 1940 but was also chosen as a main offering of the Book-of-the-Month Club, instantly guaranteeing the work a huge audience. In less than a month, nearly a quarter-million copies had been sold, and Wright—the onetime impoverished and hungry grandson of former slaves—was now perceived as one of America’s most talented writers and perhaps the most prominent black author of fiction anywhere in the world. Flush with money and glowing with his new-found fame, Wright now not only began to travel but also to involve himself in projects with other prominent artists, including the director John Houseman and the great actor-director-impresario Orson Welles, who both hoped to dramatize Native Son. Meanwhile, by the end of 1940, a new and expanded edition of Uncle Tom’s Children had appeared, and another of Wright’s stories had been included in another major anthology. His personal life, however, was less fortunate: His marriage broke down, and by the end of the year he was living with Ellen Poplar. After divorcing his first wife, he married Poplar on March 12, 1941.

Besides his new marriage, Wright had other reasons to be happy in 1941. He received a major award from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; the dramatic version of Native Son was a success; work began on a new novel (“Black Hope,” which was never finished); one of his songs was recorded by the noted black bass-baritone Paul Robeson; and Wright’s book 12 Million Black Voices: A Folk History of the Negro in the United States was published to wide acclaim. By year’s end Wright had also completed the first version of yet another novel, “The Man Who Lived Underground,” which later (in a revised version) became the basis of a novella by the same title. When the United States entered World War II after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941, Wright (who could not be accepted for combat because he was his family’s sole provider) unsuccessfully volunteered for service as a propagandist. Meanwhile, in 1942 he further distanced himself from the Communist Party, even though by this point the United States had technically allied itself with the Soviet Union and even though the U.S. government would now secretly monitor Wright for the rest of his life because of his continuing Leftist sympathies. By 1943 he had begun work on his autobiography, titled American Hunger, which traced his life from his boyhood in the racist South to his eventual disillusionment with the northern communists. However, when the text was submitted to the Book-of-the-Month-Club in 1944, Wright was told that the club was interested only in the first half. Thus the section dealing with his time in the North and his struggles with communism was dropped (although some of it appeared as magazine articles), while the first half, retitled Black Boy, was issued in 1945 and became an enormous best seller. By early 1946 more than a half-million copies had been purchased, and some critics were calling the book an even better work than Native Son. Nevertheless, despite this success, Wright was becoming increasingly disillusioned with his life as a black in the United States, and so in 1947, having spent some time in France, he and his wife decided to move there for good. Thus, for the last decade or so of his life, Wright became an expatriate.

While living in Paris Wright led an active intellectual and social existence. He was befriended by many key figures in French cultural life and was as involved as ever in various literary and political groups. During the next half-dozen years he traveled widely throughout Europe, South America, and Africa, and, collaborating with a French director, he even agreed to star as Bigger Thomas in a film version of Native Son, which finally appeared (to mixed reviews) in 1951. In 1952 he completed the first draft of a new novel, The Outsider, which reflected the influence of his recent interest in French existentialism, but when the book was published in the United States in 1953, it was neither a critical nor a popular success. Even so, Wright continued to produce: In 1954 he published a book on Africa titled Black Power: A Record of Reactions in a Land of Pathos as well as a new novel called Savage Holiday (which was rejected by the prominent U.S. company that had published his previous books). In 1955 a work of political journalism was published in French and was then issued in 1956 in the United States as The Color Curtain: A Report of the Bandung Conference. In 1957 his book Pagan Spain appeared, as did a collection of essays titled White Man, Listen! Meanwhile, by 1958 he had finished a new novel (The Long Dream) set in Mississippi and had begun work on a sequel (set in France). By now his relations with other blacks in Paris had deteriorated; moreover, when The Long Dream was published in 1958, it was both a critical and a commercial disappointment. By the end of the year his mother's health had greatly deteriorated, his longtime editor had died; and Wright himself, increasingly isolated in Paris, was contemplating a move to England. However, if 1958 was bad, the next year was even worse. In January he learned that his mother was dead; his new novel was sent back with a request for substantial changes; his request for a major grant was rejected; a severe illness struck in June and then lingered; and the move to England was complicated by difficulties concerning his request for a resident visa—a request eventually rejected. Thus, 1960 found Wright living alone in France. He was facing growing worries about money, continuing poor health, and increasing disenchantment with his social and political circumstances. Nonetheless, he had been working on thousands of brief poems, had started a new novel, and looked forward to the imminent publication of Eight Men, a new collection of stories. Yet his sudden death of a heart attack on November 28 extinguished any hope of future work. He died just as the 1960s—the dynamic, transformative decade he would have been well qualified to interpret—had only just begun.

Uncle Tom's Children* (1938, 1940)

The title of this collection of stories alludes to Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous pre-Civil War abolitionist novel Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), whose title character, a loyal slave, has long been a symbol of black subservience to whites. Wright's collection not only depicts the vestiges and unfortunate consequences of such compliance, but also, more significantly, shows the growth of defiance and resistance among its African-American characters. Most of the stories describe the violence that, in Wright's view, always lurked just beneath the surface of relations between whites and blacks, especially in the "Jim Crow" South, where racism was more overt than in the North and where it enjoyed extensive legal protection.

The collection opens with a personal essay titled "The Ethics of Living Jim Crow: An Autobiographical Sketch." Wright here recounts many of the same incidents later treated at much greater length in Black Boy, his full-scale depiction of his youth. In some cases the accounts differ—a fact that has led some scholars to question Wright's fidelity to facts. In any case, here (as in Black Boy) he emphasizes the brutality of his youth (including some brutal treatment at the hands of relatives) as well as his growing distrust and fear of whites and his inevitable realization that his life down South could and would be stunted merely because of his race. In nine brief sections, he quickly recounts various incidents that educated him in the grim facts of life for African Americans, and he ends by quoting a black southern friend whose words foreshadowed the rebelliousness that eventually engulfed the region: "Lawd, man! Ef it wuzn't fer them polices 'n' them ol' lynch-mobs, there wouldn't be nothin' but uproar down here!" (237).

"Big Boy Leaves Home," the first piece of fiction in the collection, is a particularly powerful story. It opens by depicting the relaxed, jovial friendship of four young black males in the rural South; as they joke, josh, and sing, readers are lulled into a sense of complacent joy; we share in the boys' adolescent fun, taking no more seriously than they do the chance that they might really be "lynched" (as Big Boy warns [242]) if they dare to swim in a local pond considered off-limits to blacks. The story's tone suddenly changes, however, when they realize that a white woman has wandered near the pond; not only does she see them swimming, but she also sees them naked as they try hurriedly to retrieve their clothes. As she screams, her husband approaches with a rifle and, in seconds, joy gives way to horror as two of the boys are shot dead. When Big Boy tries to wrestle the husband for the gun, the husband himself is killed. The rest of the story recounts, in rapid and gruesome detail, the efforts of Big Boy, aided by his community, to escape to the North as well as the disgusting torture and execution of the other surviving boy, whose torment Big Boy overhears from his hiding place. The story's style is crisp and clear; its pace is first leisurely and then frenetic; and its second half is dominated by gripping suspense and irresistible terror. This tale offers an unforgettable opening to the collection and establishes many central themes of the entire book. It shows how easily, in the racially charged South, life can instantly shift from peace to murderous chaos. The story's characterizations are superb; its structure and design are excellent; and its style is terse and efficient.

"Down by the Riverside," the next story, is often considered a less effective tale than "Big Boy Leaves Home," partly because it allegedly relies too much on improbable coincidence. Mann, the central character, is a loving husband whose pregnant wife finds herself in protracted labor just as flood waters are surrounding their small house. A friend steals them a white man's boat, but, as luck would have it, as Mann battles the current in the dark, he happens to steer the boat directly to the home of its owner, who recognizes the craft as his and begins firing at its occupants. Desperate, Mann pulls out a pistol, fires twice, and kills the angry white man. When he finally succeeds in steering the boat to the hospital, he discovers that his wife has died, but he is immediately put to work rescuing other people from the flood. As luck would once again have it, he is sent in the boat to the home of the very same white family whose father he has recently killed; when the family recognize him, he is tempted to kill them, but luck again intervenes: The house suddenly tilts, and so Mann, instead of murdering the family, pulls them to safety. Later, however, when everyone is on dry land, the family members turn him in to authorities, and, in a desperate effort to escape, he is shot and killed. The final paragraph focuses on his outstretched hand as it trails in the surging river. Admittedly this story's plot twists are somewhat implausible and the tale itself is perhaps overlong; nevertheless, Wright does succeed in creating a memorable atmosphere; in addition, many details of mood and setting are convincing, and the tone is realistically tense.

“Long Black Song,” the collection’s next tale, is often considered one of Wright’s best works and is therefore discussed separately later; it is followed by “Fire and Cloud,” a story often praised by the volume’s first reviewers. It describes the conflicting pressures faced by the Reverend Mr. Taylor, a prominent black in a small southern city whose people are clamoring for relief from hunger during the depression. Some citizens want Taylor to help lead a communist-inspired protest march; the white mayor tries to persuade him not to lend his support; a devious figure in his own church tries to undermine Taylor’s authority; and members of Taylor’s own family offer conflicting advice. The mood of Taylor and the whole community becomes more decisive and determined, however, after he and others are brutally beaten by white thugs; only then does Taylor realize (in the story’s final words) “Freedom belongs to the strong!” (406). The work concludes with a Marxist vision of poor blacks and whites united against oppression. If the tale sometimes seems too didactic and even a bit contrived (particularly in its middle sections, where Taylor shuttles from one room to another as he tries to juggle multiple meetings with conflicting pressure groups), it nonetheless suggests the kind of political solution Wright hoped for; in “Black Boy Leaves Home,” the only alternative to oppression is escape, whereas in “Fire and Cloud” the oppressed stay and stand together.

Political themes are even more explicit in “Bright and Morning Star,” the story added to the 1940 printing of Uncle Tom’s Children. In this tale, Sue is the once-pious mother of two sons who are committed communists; one already has been imprisoned for his activities, but the other (Johnny-Boy) is out on a rainy night, informing local comrades of a forthcoming meeting. However, soon Reva (a local white girl with a romantic interest in the son) arrives at Sue’s home to inform her that the local sheriff knows of the meeting and that the Party members must be warned not to attend—a mission Johnny-Boy undertakes as soon as he returns. After he leaves, the sheriff and other whites arrive at Sue’s home, beat her when she refuses to answer their questions about her son, and then depart in search of him. When Sue later realizes that she has revealed the names of the party members to a white traitor named Booker (an obvious dig at BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, the turn-of-the-century black leader whom many African Americans considered an “Uncle Tom”), she heads out into the night, carrying a gun and looking for Johnny-Boy and the treacherous Booker. She does find her son, who has been beaten nearly to death by the sheriff and his gang; she is forced to watch as the men further torture him as he refuses to reveal the names of the party members, just as Sue herself also refuses to reveal the names despite witnessing the torture. When Booker suddenly arrives and begins to reveal the names, Sue, using the hidden gun, shoots him dead, and then she witnesses the killing of Johnny-Boy just before being executed herself. She dies, however, with the satisfaction of knowing that neither she nor her son capitulated and that she killed the traitor before he could betray anyone else. She and Johnny-Boy suffer for a cause larger than they are, and their suffering prevents the suffering of others. In place of the non-violent resistance that concludes “Fire and Cloud,” the resistance here is violent, desperate, and at least partially effective.

Readers of Uncle Tom’s Children have praised the book for its lucid style, its vivid dialect, its rapid pace, its emotional restraint, its skillful dialogue, and its emphasis on dramatic action. On the other hand, the book has sometimes also been criticized for lack of variety, for monotonous characterization (particularly in its depiction of evil whites), for inept reproduction of black speech, and for sensationalism in both its action and its style. Nearly all readers have admitted, however, that the work is frequently powerful and often unforgettable, and, as Wright’s first published book, it stands as a remarkable debut.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast “Big Boy Leaves Home” with Mark Twain’s Huckleberry Finn. How are the works similar in their use of humor, their depictions of boyhood, their shifts in tone, and their concluding passages; how do they differ in their depictions of race relations, their presentations of violence, and their portraits of their central black characters?

2. Compare and contrast “Down by the Riverside” with the description of the storm and flood in ZORA NEALE HURSTON’s novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. In what ways are the two storms symbolic? What do they suggest about man’s relationship with nature? How do the storms help to advance the plots of both works and emphasize central themes?
3. Compare and contrast the presentation of political pressures and political dilemmas in Wright’s “Fire and Cloud” and in W. E. B. DUBOIS’s novel The Quest of the Silver Fleece. How do such factors as class, gender, and setting affect the presentation of these pressures? For instance, how much difference does it make that one work is largely set in Washington, D.C., and deals with middle-class characters, whereas the other is set in a small southern town and focuses on the poor? How are the scenes of interracial violence in the two works comparable?
4. How is “Bright and Morning Star” in some ways a response to, and refutation of, Booker T. Washington’s famous “Atlanta Compromise” speech? What do the two works suggest about the relations between blacks and whites in the South? What do they suggest about the most productive forms of political action? What do they imply about the role of religion in achieving full civil liberties?
5. Choose a particular theme, symbol, image, or type of character and trace its appearances over the course of more than one of the stories. How is it used distinctively in each work? How are the tales in this collection bound together? What common motifs or concerns do they share? How are they similar—and/or distinct—in style, methods, and/or effectiveness?

“Long Black Song” (1938, 1940)

This story, the third in Wright’s collection titled Uncle Tom’s Children, focuses at first on Sarah, a young black wife and mother in the rural South, who thinks of Tom (with whom she was once in love, but who is now away at war) as she and her infant await the return of her hardworking husband, Silas, who has been gone for several days, selling cotton and buying supplies. As her baby plays with a broken clock, Sarah hears the approach of a white traveling salesman; although she refuses to buy the “graphophone” he tries to sell her, she feels powerless to resist when he forces himself on her sexually. Not long after the salesman departs, Silas returns, discovers evidence of the sexual encounter, and becomes enraged; Sarah escapes, but from a distance she watches as Silas commits murderous revenge when the salesman and a companion return; Silas then uses his gun to resist the white mob who descend on his house and who burn it (with him in it) to the ground.

“Long Black Song” is sometimes considered the best story in Uncle Tom’s Children, particularly because of its skillful and complicated depiction of Sarah and its effective use of imagery. Nevertheless, the work has also been criticized for its allegedly simplistic presentation of Silas and for its purportedly overblown description of the sexual encounter between Sarah and the salesman. That encounter, however, seems tantalizingly complex; Sarah obviously dreads the prospect of having adulterous sex, especially with a white man; at the same time, and on another level, she seems lonely and desirous. From one perspective the encounter is a rape; from another perspective it is something more complicated, and Wright’s nuanced description of Sarah’s feelings and reactions makes her an especially intriguing character. On the one hand, she clearly loves and admires Silas; on the other hand, she just as clearly wonders how life might have been different—and better—if she had married Tom. Similarly, on the one hand, she tries to resist the salesman, but, on the other hand, she obviously is aroused by the encounter: “A wave of warm blood swept into her stomach and loins. She felt his lips touching her throat and where he kissed her burned” (338). In short, in creating Sarah, Wright also created one of the most complicated and fascinating female characters in his fiction. Although he is often criticized by feminists for his allegedly sexist presentations of women, it is possible to argue that Sarah is an exception to this supposed rule.

Silas's discovery of the sexual encounter has been criticized as improbable: First, he finds the white man's straw hat in the couple's bedroom, then he notices a "short yellow pencil" (an ironic phallic symbol? [343]) on the quilt of the bed, and finally he literally uncovers (in a moment reminiscent of Shakespeare's Othello) the salesman's handkerchief in the couple's bedclothes. His violent reaction is appropriately shocking but is also comprehensible on several levels: He not only feels betrayed as a man by Sarah but also feels violated as a black man by the white visitor. As a hardworking African-American male, Silas has tried to play by the rules of bourgeois society, but now he feels as if all his devotion and diligence have been mocked and undermined. However, his bloody confrontation with the gang of whites at the end of the tale is merely personal and is also literally self-destructive; unlike the antiwhite violence that concludes "Bright and Morning Star," it advances no larger cause.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Wright claimed to have admired, and to have been influenced by, GERTRUDE STEIN's short story "Melanctha" in her collection titled Three Lives. Can you detect such influence here? How are Wright's story and Stein's comparable or contrasting in their use of dialect, their depiction of black female sexuality, and their presentation of psychological complexity? In which story is plot more important, and in which are racial politics a more obviously central concern?
2. Compare and contrast the relations between African-American males and females presented in this story and in W. E. B. DUBOIS's novel The Quest of the Silver Fleece. How does each writer emphasize the complexity of those relations, and how does each imply the ways those relations are affected by social circumstances?
3. In what ways is Silas, in this story, the ideal black man as imagined by Booker T. Washington? What does the fate of Silas suggest about the ideals Washington championed in his "Atlanta Compromise" speech? On the other hand, how is Silas's situation too particular to be relevant as a refutation of Washington's ideas?
4. Discuss the complexity of characterization—and/or the failure to achieve such complexity—in this tale. How, and to what extent, does Wright succeed in making his characters three-dimensional? How, specifically, does he depict them as complicated human beings rather than as stereotypes? Which characters do you find the most—and least—successful in this respect?

"The Man Who Was Almost a Man" (1939, 1961)

Dave Saunders is a 17-year-old youth who works as a farmhand with other blacks on the plantation of a southern landowner named Jim Hawkins. Because he feels unrespected by his fellow workers and thinks that owning a gun will help him impress them, he convinces his reluctant mother to allow him to buy a pistol for his father, which Dave himself plans to shoot. While practicing in Hawkins's field one day, Dave accidentally kills Jenny, the mule; although he tries to claim the death resulted when the mule fell on its plow, his parents force him to admit the truth and his father orders him to work to repay the cost of the animal, but Dave instead decides, at the end of the story, to fire the gun a few more times and then hop a train for the North, where he hopes to fulfill his dreams of manhood.

In this often-anthologized story, racial tensions are far less prominent than is true of many of Wright's other works; instead, Dave's main conflicts are with other blacks, particularly his fellow fieldworkers and even members of his own family. Jim Hawkins, despite his status as the owner of a plantation, is not the cruel brute he might have been: Even after discovering that Dave has killed his mule, he seems more understanding than one might have expected of a powerful white man in a different work by Wright. The story thus has a broader, more universal appeal than is true of some of Wright's other fiction; it deals with themes, situations, and character types to which nearly any reader, of any color, can relate. It focuses, for instance, on the basic human transition from adolescence to adulthood and on the often complicated relations within nearly all families, particularly between teenagers and parents. Moreover, unlike many of Wright's other works, this story depicts a relatively stable, intact African-American family (with hardworking parents and two basically respectful children), and it presents that family as respected members of a relatively benign and benevolent community that includes both whites and blacks, who work together and seem to share basic values and even a common sense of humor. Ironically the only person who calls Dave a "nigger" in this story is his own mother (16), and the only other person who refers to others as "niggers" is Dave himself (11). The story features a much stronger sense of humor than is typical in work by Wright, particularly in its affectionate depiction of Dave's mother, who is presented as a no-nonsense parent who nonetheless possesses a genuine soft spot for her son. The tale benefits from many features that contribute to the effectiveness of other works by Wright, including its skillful manipulation of point of view (which shifts between Dave's perspective and that of the omniscient narrator), its convincing use of dialect, its adept use of dialogue both to enhance characterization and to advance the plot, and its "local color" realism, which communicates a strong sense of the details of day-to-day life in a small southern rural community. The abrupt shift of tone from basically comic to fundamentally serious adds to the impact of the tale, and the story benefits by seeming non-didactic: It has no obvious "message" to push or "lesson" to teach, and Dave is neither an obvious hero nor a simple victim. He is, instead, a typically complicated teenage boy whose story is presented in simple, direct, straightforward phrasing.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the frustration that Dave feels about his life in the South with the similar frustration felt by the central character of NELLA LARSEN's novel Quicksand. Ironically, how and why are other black people, in both cases, a main source of frustration? What kinds of options are open to both characters, particularly in view of such matters as age, social class, and gender?
2. Compare and contrast this story with "Queer" by SHERWOOD ANDERSON. How are the two works similar and/or different in plot, characterization, and theme? Which of the two central characters is more appealing, and why? How are they alike in their basic motivations and in their relations with other characters?
3. Compare and contrast Dave with Bigger Thomas in Wright's novel Native Son. How do the two characters differ in psychology, social circumstances, and ultimate fate? What role does an accidental killing play in the plots of both works, but how do the tones of the two works differ? How do Dave's experiences with whites seem to differ from those of Bigger?
4. What different character traits of different persons in this story appeal to you most, and why? What, specifically, makes you admire the various characters you find most appealing? What ethical traits do those characters exhibit? What kind of morality does the story implicitly endorse, if any?

Native Son (1940)

Bigger Thomas is a black youth who lives with his mother, brother, and sister in a tiny, rundown apartment in the Chicago slums; he spends much of the rest of his time with a gang of friends, committing petty robberies. Although his fortune seems to improve when he is hired to work for the wealthy white Dalton family, his life turns truly tragic when he accidentally kills Mary Dalton (the daughter) and then murders his own girlfriend to keep the first killing a secret. Eventually caught and put on trial, he is defended by a left-wing lawyer, whose lengthy pleas on his behalf, emphasizing his status as a black man in a racist culture, cannot prevent his eventual conviction and execution.

Native Son was an instant best seller; it immediately propelled Wright to the front rank of African-American novelists and made him a national celebrity. Early reviewers almost uniformly praised the book (or at least the first two of its three long sections) as fast-paced, exciting, and gripping. Wright offered insight into a kind of world and a kind of character that had previously received relatively little recognition in serious fiction; he deliberately chose to focus on a so-called bad nigger in order to preclude the kind of sentimental reaction sometimes provoked by the obvious victims featured in Uncle Tom's Children, his earlier collection of stories set in the Jim Crow South. Instead, Wright set Native Son in a large northern city and made his protagonist somewhat sullen, amoral, and even occasionally violent; rather than making the protagonist confront redneck racists bent on lynching any black who showed initiative, Wright instead placed Bigger in the home of wealthy white philanthropists ostensibly interested in helping to lift blacks out of poverty. Moreover, he made the murder victims not only a progressive young woman even more outspokenly committed to the welfare of blacks than her parents but also a pitiful young black woman whose chief desire is to please the man who kills her. In short, Native Son is a more ethically complex work than some of Wright's earlier fiction. It is hard to feel entirely sympathetic toward Bigger, and yet Wright sets himself the difficult task of trying to make Bigger not only comprehensible but even somewhat appealing.

The novel opens with a memorable scene in which Bigger and his family awake in their small apartment and begin to dress. The apartment is so confined that Bigger and his brother must look away while their mother and sister hurriedly put on their clothes, and then the females must do the same while the males also dress. Immediately, then, Wright effectively dramatizes one of his major themes: the almost claustrophobic confinement poor blacks suffer in nearly every aspect of their lives, from the moment they awake in the morning until the moment they sleep again at night. Bigger lives and moves and has his being in a world that seems cramped and narrow, both physically and psychologically. Almost instantly, too, Wright reveals his skill for often creating convincing, realistic, and fluid dialogue; each member of Bigger's family is quickly and deftly sketched through his or her words and tones. Finally, the opening scene is effective for yet another reason: Sudden dramatic action breaks out when Bigger's mother sees a large black rat and frantically begs Bigger to kill it. The wild scramble that ensues as Bigger and his young brother Buddy try to trap and destroy the intruder foreshadows the frenzied excitement that will also dominate large later portions of the novel, when it is Bigger himself who is hunted. When Bigger does eventually succeed in killing the rat by hurling a heavy skillet at it, we catch a glimpse of his own skill at violence, and when he then torments his younger sister, Vera, with the rat's dangling corpse, we briefly sense his own penchant for cruelty. In a few fast-moving pages, therefore, Wright manages to establish many major concerns of the rest of the book and to begin sketching a complex portrait of his novel's central character.

Our sense of Bigger's complexity grows as the novel proceeds. Ironically it is Bigger's own mother who offers some of the harshest assessments of him. She accuses him of often being irrational, self-centered, unmotivated, and irresponsible, particularly in seeking or accepting the kind of employment that might offer both him and his family some hope of a better life. She even prophesies his eventual unfortunate fate (452), and although Bigger has long since grown tired of her constant criticism, Wright does not immediately or obviously deny the validity of her views. Although Bigger feels powerless to help his family, and although this sense of impotence breeds the potential for violence (453), he never responds fully or cogently to his mother's sensible advice, particularly her insistence that he should seek employment and that he should definitely take the job he has now been offered. He cannot share her plain religious faith, but neither does he seem to share her confidence in a simple ethic of work, even when she reminds him that if he does not take the offered job, his family may starve. He imagines that if he takes the job, his life will be miserable, but it is hard to see how his existence could be much more miserable than it presently is (455–456). As he leaves the cramped apartment and considers his options for the day, he considers buying a magazine, watching a film, spending time in a billiards hall with his gang, or perhaps just killing time (456). The one option he does not seriously consider is acting immediately on his mother's advice. Instead, he indulges in pointless fantasies, and although he complains about lacking money, he still is not sure that he intends to take the job with the rich Dalton family (456–457). From a middle-class point of view, or even from the perspective of a member of the working poor, Bigger is not at first an especially appealing protagonist; many of his mother's criticisms seem just, and Wright has certainly achieved his announced aim of creating a central character who does not initially arouse much empathy or sympathy.

Bigger's interactions with his "gang"—whose other members are three young blacks, Gus, G. H., and Jack—add to Wright's complex characterization of his novel's central figure. Bigger and the others have long been contemplating robbing a local white merchant (having previously robbed other blacks without hesitation), but so far they have been reluctant to proceed for fear of the official retribution that might follow if they commit a crime against a white. Although Bigger is warned by his sister to stay away from the "gang," and although he realizes that he will be sent to prison (not simply a reformatory, as in the past) if he is found guilty of another theft, he does not immediately dismiss the idea of thieving once more (458). Instead, when talking with Gus, he expresses regret that because of his race he will never have a chance to be an airplane pilot (460), even though the novel has presented no evidence so far that he has ever attempted seriously to pursue any more practical ambition. Nevertheless, there is no denying that Bigger's prospects are cramped and distorted by the racism of his society, and Wright achieves one of the novel's few comic moments when he has Bigger and Gus "play 'white'" (461), as they humorously imitate the speech and mannerisms of various Caucasian authority figures. For understandable reasons, comedy and humor are not prominent traits in much of Wright's fiction (except, for instance, in his splendid story "Big Boy Leaves Home" and, to a lesser degree, in his tale "The Man Who Was Almost a Man"), but in this scene of Native Son he shows his skill in a kind of writing that adds not only to our sense of Bigger's total personality but also to the tonal complexity of the novel as a whole. When Bigger is with his young male friends, he can relax and show a more attractive (even if sarcastic) side of himself than is usually glimpsed by others.

It is not long, however, before the humor gives way to bitterness—a bitterness that seems intensified (in fact) by the preceding comedy. With his skill for authentic dialect and convincing conversation, Wright soon has Bigger complaining to Gus about racist oppression and restrictions: "God-dammit, look! We live here and they live there. We black and they white. They got things and we ain't. They do things and we can't. It's just like living in jail" (463). Some African-American readers, when the novel was first published, worried that Wright, in depicting Bigger as he does, would merely reinforce many negative stereotypes about blacks as shiftless, unmotivated, and self-pitying, and indeed a number of white reviewers (particularly in the South) did in fact condemn Bigger on precisely these grounds. His life, they alleged, is no harder than the lives of most poor people, whatever their color or background, and these reviewers also complained that Bigger makes no great effort to improve his condition. Nevertheless, it would be hard for any fair-minded reader to disagree with the words just quoted: Bigger's life is (and has been) distorted by the racism of his society, and if he reacts against his oppression with more bitterness and anger than other blacks the novel describes (including most of his own family and many of his own friends), perhaps that is partly because he is more sensitive and observant and feels a greater sense of self-respect. That, at least, is how many of the book's first and later readers reacted to his plight. For them, Bigger symbolized all the potential that African Americans had been denied by their presence in a society that refused to accord them full human rights, equal opportunity, and even basic dignity. Many of the book's initial readers wondered (as Bigger himself wonders) what the novel's protagonist might have achieved, and how differently his life might have evolved, if he had merely been given the same chances whites could assume as their birthright.

Wright adds further to our sense of Bigger's complexity when describing his discussion, with his friends, of whether or not to rob the white merchant. On the one hand, Bigger himself fears committing the crime; on the other hand, he is afraid to confess his fear, and he even shows contempt and hatred for Gus when the latter more openly demonstrates the reluctance that Bigger himself tries to conceal (468–469). This passage is one of a number in the novel that add to the psychological subtlety of the book, and the complicated nature of Bigger's personality is underlined even more boldly when he later pulls a knife on Gus and makes him lick its blade (480–481). Partly his anger with Gus expresses his anger with himself, and, in his willingness to reveal the latent violence that lurks just beneath the surface of Bigger's personality, Wright not only helps explain the novel's later events, but also shows that he is willing to create a protagonist who may not be entirely sympathetic but who is definitely complicated, interesting, and credible. In the first 50 or so pages of the novel, when Bigger is interacting with his family and friends, Wright is clearly describing a world, and a mindset, he knows intimately, from the inside out; rarely do these opening pages strike a false note, and a reader today can only imagine the sense of shock and revelation that must have been felt when the book was first published. Nothing quite like this had ever appeared before in serious (or even nonserious) American fiction, and reviewer after reviewer commented on the convincing portrait Wright had drawn of Bigger and his cramped, confining environment. For the first time the life of the black urban ghetto had been opened up and laid bare.

Wright seems on slightly less firm ground when he tries to describe the personalities and lifestyle of the wealthy Dalton family, with whom Bigger has been offered employment through a local agency. Mr. Dalton, a millionaire, has become rich partly by renting rundown apartments to Chicago's black poor (in fact he is, indirectly, Bigger's own landlord); he salves his social conscience not only by donating large sums to African-American charities but also by routinely employing a live-in black chauffeur—the position Bigger is offered and accepts. Mrs. Dalton, meanwhile, is a kindly white-haired woman who also happens to be blind (a repeated pattern of symbolism suggesting the imperceptiveness not only of the Dalton family in particular but of whites in general). Mr. and Mrs. Dalton seem reasonably kind, thoughtful, and generous; Wright resists the temptation to make them obvious villains, and he even has the white Irish maid testify positively on their behalf (497). Bigger himself finds the Daltons (especially Mrs. Dalton) appealing (502)—a fact that only enhances our sense of the tragedy that will soon ensue. That tragedy results from Bigger's interactions with the daughter, Mary Dalton, and her communist boyfriend, Jan Erlone. On Bigger's first assignment as a chauffeur, the young couple try to befriend him, but their instant intimacy seems ostentatious and even somewhat condescending. It is as if they want to prove (partly to Bigger but mostly to themselves) their own left-wing good faith rather than genuinely considering how to make Bigger feel most comfortable. They talk him into taking them to a “typical” black restaurant, make him sit there and eat with them, get him and themselves partly drunk, and then require him to drive them around a park as they become intimate on the car's back seat.

Bigger himself is stimulated by what he watches in the rearview mirror: Here and elsewhere Wright dares to describe a black man's erotic attraction to a white woman—a taboo subject in much American fiction and culture before Native Son was published. Eventually Bigger drops Jan off at his apartment, but when he arrives back at the Dalton home with Mary, she is so drunk that he decides he must carry her to her bedroom (and feels aroused as he does so). As he places her on the bed, her mother unexpectedly enters the room. Terrified by what might happen if he, a black man, were found alone in the bedroom of a “vulnerable” white woman, Bigger (in a scene reminiscent of the murder of Desdemona in Shakespeare's Othello) inadvertently smothers Mary with a pillow as he tries to stifle the noise she has begun to make in the presence of her blind mother. When Mrs. Dalton leaves the room, Bigger realizes that he has killed the girl. Desperate to dispose of the body, he hauls it to the basement and tries to stuff it into the large coal furnace; when it will not fit, he frantically hacks off its head, forces both pieces into the furnace, and stokes the fire. From this point forward, the novel's pace momentarily quickens as Bigger at first succeeds in disguising his crime and then even tries to extort money (through a concocted and somewhat improbable "ransom note") from the distressed couple. Eventually, however, his responsibility for the murder is discovered, and, as he is pursued in a huge citywide manhunt, he even kills own girlfriend, Bessie, lest she reveal his guilt. As the exciting second part of the novel concludes, Bigger has been apprehended, beaten, and thrown into jail.

In part 3 of the book, the narrative slows considerably, and many readers have complained about the abrupt shift in pace, tone, and technique. Much of this section reports the inquest and trial, and Bigger himself suddenly recedes in importance. Center stage is now occupied instead by his left-wing defense attorney, Boris Max (whose last name suggests his status as a spokesman for Wright's own Marxist views). At the trial, Max offers a lengthy (and partly tedious) argument on Bigger's behalf. He essentially indicts American racism and capitalism for the guilt of Bigger's crime; he accuses Mr. Dalton of cheap charity, and he even turns on the blind mother, proclaiming, "And to Mrs. Dalton, I say: 'Your philanthropy was as tragically blind as your sightless eyes!'" (814). Of the murder itself, Max insists, "It was the first act of [Bigger's] life; it was the most meaningful, exciting and stirring thing that had ever happened to him. He accepted it because it made him free, gave him the possibility of choice, of action, the opportunity to act and to feel that his actions carried weight" (817). This may be good existentialist philosophizing; whether it is an effective defense strategy is another question, and indeed much of this latter section of the book can sound literally like special pleading, as if Wright were suddenly less interested in convincing characterization or a credible plot than in scoring sometimes dubious political points. Meanwhile, the arguments of the prosecutor sometimes seem even less credible than those of Max; Wright for once seems to stoop to the temptation to introduce an obvious villain and bogeyman. (In his defense, however, it must be noted that he took many details of the trial and its seemingly insane press coverage from an actual trial that occurred in Chicago not long before he wrote his novel.) Given the practical shortcomings of some of Max's arguments and the fact that the system is rigged from the start against the defendant, it is not surprising that Bigger is convicted and sentenced to death. In the end, however, he accepts and even affirms his status as a murderer, arguing to a terrified Max, "I didn't know I was really alive in this world until I felt things hard enough to kill for 'em" (849).

From the beginning, Native Son provoked widespread commentary, most of it highly positive. Reviewers and critics praised the book for its realism, suspense, excitement, dialogue, dialect, crisp prose, vivid imagery, gripping terror, psychological subtlety, and general lack of sentimentality. On the other hand, the novel was sometimes variously criticized by early reviewers, who faulted its alleged melodrama, preachiness, repetitiveness, improbable plot developments (especially after the first murder), and lack of memorable or complex characters aside from Bigger himself. Numerous reviewers complained that Bigger was often presented inconsistently: Sometimes he seemed largely thoughtless and inarticulate; sometimes he seemed more reflective and eloquent than either his education, his environment, or his characterization elsewhere would lead us to believe. Some reviewers thought that toward the end of the book Bigger became merely a convenient prop to be used in Max's unconvincing speeches, while others found those speeches themselves both moving and persuasive. By some reviewers Wright was accused of slandering communists (especially Jan), while other reviewers argued that the communists were (rightly or wrongly) the true heroes of the book. Some commentators considered Bigger an unappealing thug; others found him a sympathetic victim and even, to some degree, a tragic hero. Few early reviewers, however, and even fewer critics and commentators since, questioned the genuine power of much of Wright's book.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Many critics have noted both resemblances and differences between Native Son and THEODORE DREISER's novel An American Tragedy. Discuss the two works in terms of the personalities of their central characters, the significance of the accidental killings, and the effectiveness of the trial scenes. How does race add a complicating factor to Wright's book not present in Dreiser's? How do the two works differ in their literary styles?
2. Examine the killings in Native Son. What is Bigger's motivation in each case? Is he at all sympathetic? What difference does it make that his victims are female?
3. Native Son has sometimes been compared to Dostoyevsky's novel Crime and Punishment. How are the two works similar in plot, protagonist, themes, tone, and atmosphere? How do the novels differ in the authors' attitudes toward the central figures and in the ultimate fate of both characters? What is the role of religion in each work? How is conscience presented in each novel?

"The Man Who Lived Underground" (1942, 1944, 1961)

Fred Daniels is a black man who has been forced by police to confess to a murder he did not commit; having escaped their custody, he takes refuge in the city sewer system, where he sets up residence in a small "cave" from which he ventures out on exploratory expeditions. He gains access to the basements of many different buildings and is able to observe (while being unobserved himself) the activities of many different kinds of people—a perspective that gives him a new and disillusioned insight into the life of the "normal," aboveground world. He is able to steal money, diamonds, and other objects with which to decorate his "cave," but when he eventually turns himself in to the police and offers to reveal his underground lair, an officer shoots him because he now knows too much.

This obviously allegorical story is clearly indebted to such literary predecessors as Homer's Odyssey, Virgil's Aeneid, Dante's Inferno, Dostoyevsky's Notes from the Underground, and Plato's philosophical allegory of the cave. The tale is often highly praised for its depiction of the dark underbelly of American civilization in particular and of human life in general. Although Fred Daniels is black and although he definitely is persecuted because of his race, many critics see him as a kind of Everyman figure who represents not merely the sufferings of African Americans but also the larger predicament of mankind in general, which is haunted by feelings of guilt, alienation, rootlessness, and absurdity. Wright's "message" here seems more existentialist than Marxist; in other words, he seems more concerned with the basically bleak and perhaps inescapable conditions of man's meaningless existence than with proposing any specific political or economic remedy. Daniels finally dies not because he is guilty of any real "crime" but merely because he is a potentially disruptive, subversive presence in a civilization that prefers complacency and ignorance to any sort of genuinely disturbing insight. As the officer who kills him explains, "You've got to shoot his kind. They'd wreck things" (92).

Anyone approaching this story as a "realistic" tale is likely to be disappointed. Daniels's activities in the sewers—particularly his ability to access so many different buildings so easily and so rapidly without ever being discovered, and especially his ability to determine the combination of the safe from which he steals the money and diamonds—seem almost ridiculously improbable, especially since (for much the story) he depends simply on a few matches to provide necessary light. Daniels himself is not especially interesting or complex; he is, instead, more a literary symbol to whom a quick succession of symbolic events happen; he moves in a setting that is often vividly described but that does not seem especially believable. He observes and eventually even speaks with other characters who rarely seem convincing as "real" human beings; the policemen at the end, in particular, seem to function more as props than as genuinely credible persons. However, to judge either Daniels or his story by the criteria of conventional "realism" is probably to miss Wright's intended purpose. He wanted, in this story, to deal with abstract ideas rather than with convincingly real people, events, or things, and many readers apparently find his treatment of these ideas themselves a sufficient reward for reading this exceptionally long and relentlessly event-filled allegory.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this story with T. S. ELIOT's poem "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock." Specifically, discuss the works in terms of their presentation of existence in a large city, their emphasis on individual alienation and isolation, and their use of grotesque imagery. How do matters of race and class complicate any comparison of the two works?
2. Compare and contrast this story with Dante's Inferno in terms of structure, imagery, tone, and purpose. What is the role of religious belief in each work? How is Wright's story in some ways even darker in tone than Dante's?
3. Compare and contrast this work with JACK LONDON's novel The Sea-Wolf. In particular, compare the ways both works plunge their protagonists into strange new modes of existence. Discuss how each protagonist copes with the unfamiliar challenges he faces. How does the philosophy of Fred Daniels resemble and/or differ from that of Wolf Larsen?
4. Discuss the specific ways in which Wright presents his protagonist so that the latter seems a symbol of humanity in general rather than of one race in particular. To what extent, and in what respects, does the character function in both ways?

Black Boy* (1945)

Black Boy was originally the first part of a substantially longer autobiography in which Wright described his life from his bleak early childhood to his break in adulthood with the Communist Party. However, Wright's publisher suggested that the first half of the book be issued separately with a distinct title, and so Black Boy recounts Wright's boyhood until his late teens, when he left the racist South and headed, full of hopes, for Chicago. The book emphasizes the real and threatened conflict and violence he often suffered in his dealings not only with his own family but also with the intolerant whites with whom he had increasing contact.

The opening episode of Black Boy variously sets the tone for the rest of the book. Wright recounts how, as a four-year-old, he defied the authority of his parents and other family members by literally playing with fire, thereby starting an accidental conflagration that destroyed much of the house. To escape punishment, he crawled under the burning home and hid; when his frantic parents finally found and retrieved him, his mother allegedly beat him so harshly that he supposedly lapsed into unconsciousness, ran a high fever, and was even in danger of dying. This, in any case, is the dramatic story with which the book begins, thus establishing some major themes of the work as a whole. Even at the age of four the willfulness and independence that will become major elements of young Richard's character are apparent; we see him rejecting, even then, the authority of others, particularly his family, and suffering often violent consequences. These patterns will be repeated again and again as the book proceeds.

However, the opening episode already raises some troubling questions about the book's credibility—questions that have bothered many readers. Is it believable that Wright could remember so distinctly an episode from so early in his life? Is it plausible that he could remember (and faithfully reproduce) the detailed dialogue spoken at that time? Was his mother's reaction quite as violent as he claims, and was his young life really in such mortal danger from a beating? Possibly the answer to all these questions is "yes," but many readers have found the book sometimes difficult to accept entirely at face value. Doubts have been raised repeatedly about its factual reliability; Wright has often been suspected of exaggerating for dramatic effect, of playing somewhat fast and loose with historical "truth," and of making himself seem more a victim (and more central to his own story) than simple facts or historical probability might suggest. Critics have sometimes noted that Wright's accounts of events in Black Boy contradict accounts he offered elsewhere, while biographers have sometimes found discrepancies between the narrative provided in his autobiography and the records or testimony available from contemporary sources. For some readers, these kinds of concerns raise significant problems with the book; other readers, instead, believe that Wright merely used artistic license to draw a self-portrait that, while perhaps not strictly accurate in every single respect, nevertheless powerfully conveys an inner emotional truth—a truth that effectively exemplifies representative truths about the lives of black people in general in the American South in the first decades of the 20th century.

The pattern established by the opening description of the fire is repeated consistently throughout the book: Young Richard challenges or defies authority and is swiftly punished, and often the punishment is at the hands of his own family. Perhaps even more memorable (and credible) than the fire episode is the anecdote in which Richard's father, angered by the noise a kitten is making while the father is trying to sleep, impulsively orders his young sons to kill the cat—never assuming that Richard might actually take him at his word. Richard, though, sees the order as an opportunity to defy his father by (paradoxically) obeying him to the letter. Therefore, against his younger brother's protests, Richard lynches the kitten, thus achieving a symbolic victory in a contest of wills with his unappealing parent (12–13). When Richard's mother discovers his deed, she punishes him (this time) not by beating him senseless but by playing on his guilty conscience, thus establishing another repeated pattern: Of the two parents, the mother is the more admirable (despite her occasional violence). Much more than the shiftless, irresponsible, and disloyal father (who later deserts the mother and children for another woman), Richard's mother emerges as a source of moral authority: She is hardworking, self-sacrificing, and devoted to her children, although eventually her persistent ill health prevents her from playing a major role in the narrative. Wright has sometimes been criticized for describing his mother (and indeed many members of his family) with little obvious warmth or affection, and it is true that he often emphasizes their harshness and sometimes even their cruelty. Defenders of Wright, however, have argued that we should not be surprised if black adults—living in a racist society that denied them much dignity or autonomy—sometimes exercised what may have been excessive authority in dealing with their own children. Moreover, Wright's defenders have also suggested that young Richard innately resisted nearly any and all authority, and so it was only to be expected that he would clash with the people with whom he most often interacted. To be an authentic person (Wright seems to have felt) he needed to assert his independence from everyone and everything, perhaps especially including the people who raised him.

For some readers, Wright's emphasis on the negative aspects of his own family makes the book seem more convincing, as if Wright intended to tell the whole, unvarnished truth, sparing no one in the process. However, even readers willing to accept his unattractive depiction of his relatives have often been troubled by his comments on blacks as a whole, especially since those comments are not the impulsive responses of an immature boy but the considered, retrospective reflections of the adult narrator. In one of the book's most notorious passages, Wright comments on what he calls "the strange absence of real kindness in Negroes, how unstable was our tenderness, how lacking in genuine passion we were, how void of great hope, how timid our joy, how bare our traditions, how hollow our memories, how lacking we were in those intangible sentiments that bind man to man, and how shallow was even our despair." He says that when he "brooded upon the cultural barrenness of black life, I wondered if clean, positive tenderness, love, loyalty, and the capacity to remember were native with man" (37). Wright, it is true, immediately notes that "Negroes had never been allowed to catch the full spirit of Western civilization, that they lived somehow in it but not of it," and thus that any defects in their culture resulted from their oppression. Nevertheless, many readers (both black and white) have objected to his charge that blacks lacked kindness and tenderness, arguing that the book itself implicitly refutes this view, particularly when it shows Wright's relatives responding with generosity and compassion to his mother's illness. Indeed, some readers have alleged that it is Wright himself who displays, in this book, defects of kindness and tenderness, not only toward his own family and race but also toward humanity in general and whites in particular, whom he rarely depicts in a favorable light—as if he never encountered a decent or thoughtful Caucasian. In the view of many commentators of both colors, the book is flawed by Wright's allegedly innate egotism, his tendency to focus only on his own thoughts and feelings, his lack of genuine interest in the motives and psychology of others, and his habit of making self-justification and self-aggrandizement major themes of the book. The work, these critics claim, is too unbalanced, too unsubtle, too lacking in shades of gray. Wright's defenders, on the other hand, have argued that his grim pictures of southern racism are accurate, that the narrative is presented with dignity and even restraint, and that the phrasing is clear, vivid, and at times even lyrically beautiful.

Again and again in Black Boy, young Richard resists the people and forces that try to control and oppress him. He resists his authoritarian "Granny," with her rigid views of religion, and he resists his domineering aunt Addie, who (both at school as his teacher and at home as his relative) tries to impose her narrow ideas of discipline on him. He resists the school principal who wants to dictate the content of his valedictory speech, and he resists many whites when he can do so safely (as when he refuses to sell a dog to a white woman who wants to buy it). He soon learns, however, that openly defying some whites can be dangerous, and he also learns that some whites will not hesitate to abuse their authority by seeking to intimidate blacks and prevent them from progressing. As the chapters pass and Richard ages, his detailed memories seem more credible and the book becomes more consistently convincing and effective. For instance, his account of his terrified dealings with two racist coworkers is (unfortunately) all too credible and frightening, while his description of his desperate but ingenious efforts to gain access to a local library carries the ring of truth. There is even a hint of the kind of tenderness that often seems missing from the book when Wright describes his encounters with a kindly widow and her daughter in Memphis, not long before the narrator decides to abandon the South and head for Chicago. Although this move north was not originally intended to end the book (for Wright had written a whole second section detailing his disappointments once he arrived there), in its initially published form Black Boy ends on a note of artificial optimism. Its last sentence stresses the "terror" from which the narrator "fled" (246) rather than the new frustrations he would soon face.

Reviewers and commentators have often reacted to Black Boy with strongly varying responses. Critics of the book, for instance, have sometimes suggested that the Wright who emerges from this text is so unappealingly self-involved and humorless that he makes a poor representative of his race; such readers contend that the Wright who appears in this book is so antisocial that he would have been unhappy no matter what his color. Readers who dislike the book also argue that its prose is undistinguished and that its psychology is superficial; they contend that the chronology is often unclear, that the text conveys little convincing sense of the larger era and environment, and that Wright tries to base generalizations about black American life on experiences that are far too idiosyncratic and abnormal to be truly representative. These readers often consider the autobiography a less powerful work than Native Son. In contrast, numerous other readers have praised Black Boy as a highly effective work, sometimes judging it even better than the novel in its style, psychology, and political effectiveness. The book has been praised for its accuracy, its frankness, its skillful characterization, and the insights it provides into the social and family life of African Americans, including their folklore and even their superstitions. Wright's book has been compared to European autobiographies (which tend to emphasize certain key ideas rather than merely relating one event after another), and his emphases on such concepts as language, authenticity, loneliness, tragedy, and hunger (both literal and metaphorical) have been particularly praised. Admirers have extolled the work for avoiding clichéd responses and for resisting the impulse to propagandize, while more than one commentator has expressed astonishment that Wright, in view of his impoverished environment and degrading early experiences, was able to resist turning either violent or indolent but instead turned his sufferings into the stuff of real intellectual achievement and great art.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Black Boy with BOOKER T. WASHINGTON's autobiography titled Up from Slavery. Discuss the works in terms of their underlying assumptions, their tones, their credibility, their stylistic traits, and the purposes for which they seem to have been written. Discuss the ways they present "secondary" characters as well as the ways each author presents himself. In what ways does Native Son seem to be a deliberate response to, and refutation of, Up from Slavery?
2. Compare and contrast Black Boy and W. E. B. DuBois's book The Souls of Black Folk. In what ways does Wright's book confirm many claims made by DuBois about the South? How do Wright and DuBois seem to differ in their presentations of African-American culture and society? When Black Boy was published, DuBois reviewed it and had some fairly negative things to say about the book. Which aspects of The Souls of Black Folk would lead you to expect that DuBois might dislike Black Boy?
3. Although Black Boy is ostensibly a work of non-fiction, and although ZORA NEALE HURSTON's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God is ostensibly a work of fiction, how can the works be compared and contrasted in terms of such traits as characterization, dialogue, dialect, symbolism, and imagery? Which work offers a more complex or convincing picture of life in the South or of relations between the races? How do the protagonists of each work face similar challenges? How are their problems distinct?
4. How would you defend Wright against the various criticisms the book has provoked? What are some of the specific arguments you might use?

In the final analysis, how convincing do you find the kinds of objections that have been raised to the book?

American Hunger* (1977)

This text was originally conceived as the second part of Wright's autobiography, but while the first part was published separately as Black Boy in 1945, the second section remained partially unprinted (except in excerpts) until the 1970s. The book describes Wright's arrival in Chicago, his growth as a writer, and his increasing involvement in (and eventual disillusionment with) the Communist Party. The oppression Wright describes in this work is more ideological than strictly racial, and, as in Black Boy, he recounts his efforts to assert and maintain his individuality in the face of numerous pressures to conform.

Whereas the 1945 version of Black Boy has received extensive critical attention, relatively little has been published about American Hunger, partly because the whole text was not printed until 1977, when interest in Wright's work had temporarily declined from its initial high point in the 1940s. American Hunger is also significantly shorter than Black Boy, and, because it paints a largely unattractive picture of American communism, reactions to the work have often been affected, for good or ill, by the political orientations of its reviewers and commentators. Most Americans could agree that the racism depicted in Black Boy was reprehensible, but in the 1940s and even later, many Americans were less inclined to condemn communism with equal vehemence. Wright himself, in fact, never turned his back completely on Marxist ideas, even though he suspected communists of having helped suppress the originally planned publication of American Hunger in the 1940s. Critical reaction to the book when it was finally published in the 1970s varied, but much of it was tepid. Although a few commentators considered the work as powerful, precise, and masterful as Black Boy, many others thought it lacked the impact and the skill of its predecessor. These critics found the book too dry, didactic, and autobiography depend on our ability to find the protagonist appealing in some way? What qualities, in your opinion, make an autobiography worth reading, and how (if at all) do Wright's autobiographies satisfy your criteria?

4. One of Wright's initial admirers was James Baldwin, but Baldwin later attacked Wright on more than one occasion. Research Baldwin's comments on Wright, examine the evidence he presented to support his views, and then explain whether or not you think his later opinions of Wright were justifiable.
5. Wright's political opinions differed significantly from those of Zora Neale Hurston. Research the political views of the two writers and compare and contrast their points of view. Should our political agreement or disagreement with a novelist affect our reactions to the writer's works of fiction? Is it possible to admire the work of a creative writer whose political opinions differ from our own? Discuss the relevance of Ezra Pound's political opinions to this question.
6. When Wright's Native Son was first published, it was often compared to JOHN STEINBECK's The Grapes of Wrath. Do some research into the economic and political conditions of the United States in the 1930s, and then discuss the ways in which both novels reflect the specific eras in which they were written. In particular, discuss the ways both books intervene in the political debates of the time. How do they seem similar and/or distinct in their political points of view?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Butler, Robert J., ed. The Critical Response to Richard Wright. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1995.
- Felgar, Robert. Student Companion to Richard Wright. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2000.
- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., and K. A. Appiah, eds. Richard Wright: Critical Perspectives Past and Present. New York: Amistad, 1993.
- Hakutani, Yoshinobu, ed. Critical Essays on Richard Wright. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.
- Kinnamon, Keneth, ed. Critical Essays on Richard Wright's Native Son. New York: Twayne, 1997.
- Mullen, Bill. "Modern American Poetry: Richard Wright." Available online. URL: http://www.english.illinois.edu/maps/poets/s_z/r_r_wright/r_wright.htm. Accessed April 7, 2009.
- Rampersad, Arnold. "Chronology." In Early Works: Lawd Today! Uncle Tom's Children, Native Son. By Richard Wright. New York: Library of America, 1991.
- Reilly, John M., ed. Richard Wright: The Critical Reception. N.p.: Burt Franklin, 1978.
- Wright, Richard. Early Works: Lawd Today! Uncle Tom's Children, Native Son. Edited by Arnold Rampersad. New York: Library of America, 1991.
- . Eight Men. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1987.
- . Later Works: Black Boy (American Hunger), The Outsider. Edited by Arnold Rampersad. New York: Library of America, 1991.

Robert C. Evans

APPENDIX I

Alphabetical List of Writers Included in All Volumes of the Student's Encyclopedia of Great American Writers

Adams, Henry	1838–1918	Volume 2	Collins, Billy	1941–	Volume 5
Adams, John, and Abigail Adams	1735–1826 1744–1818	Volume 1	Columbus, Christopher	1451–1506	Volume 1
Albee, Edward	1928–	Volume 4	Cooper, James Fenimore	1789–1851	Volume 1
Alcott, Louisa May	1832–1888	Volume 2	Crane, Hart	1899–1932	Volume 3
Alvarez, Julia	1950–	Volume 5	Crane, Stephen	1871–1900	Volume 2
Anaya, Rudolfo	1937–	Volume 5	Crèvecoeur, J. Hector	1735–1813	Volume 1
Anderson, Sherwood	1876–1942	Volume 3	St. John de Cullen, Countee	1903–1946	Volume 3
Angelou, Maya	1928–	Volume 5	Cummings, E. E.	1894–1962	Volume 3
Baca, Jimmy Santiago	1952–	Volume 5	Davis, Rebecca Harding	1831–1910	Volume 2
Baldwin, James	1924–1987	Volume 4	Dickinson, Emily	1830–1886	Volume 2
Bambara, Toni Cade	1939–	Volume 5	Dos Passos, John	1896–1970	Volume 3
Baraka, Amiri (Leroi Jones)	1934–	Volume 5	Douglass, Frederick	1818–1895	Volume 2
Bellow, Saul	1915–2005	Volume 4	Dove, Rita	1952–	Volume 5
Bierce, Ambrose	1842–1914?	Volume 2	Dreiser, Theodore	1871–1945	Volume 3
Bishop, Elizabeth	1911–1979	Volume 4	DuBois, W. E. B.	1868–1963	Volume 3
Bonnin, Gertrude Simmons (Zitkala-Ša)	1876–1938	Volume 3	Dunbar, Paul Laurence	1872–1906	Volume 2
Bradbury, Ray	1920–	Volume 4	Edwards, Jonathan	1703–1758	Volume 1
Bradford, William	1590–1657	Volume 1	Eliot, T. S.	1888–1965	Volume 3
Bradstreet, Anne	1612–1672	Volume 1	Ellison, Ralph	1914–1994	Volume 4
Brooks, Gwendolyn	1917–2000	Volume 4	Emerson, Ralph Waldo	1803–1882	Volume 2
Brown, Charles Brockden	1771–1810	Volume 1	Equiano, Olaudah	1745–1797	Volume 1
Bryant, William Cullen	1794–1878	Volume 1	Erdrich, Louise	1954–	Volume 5
Cabeza de Vaca, Álvar Núñez	1490–1556	Volume 1	Faulkner, William	1897–1962	Volume 3
Capote, Truman	1924–1984	Volume 4	Ferlinghetti, Lawrence	1920–	Volume 4
Carver, Raymond	1938–1988	Volume 5	Fern, Fanny (Sara Willis Parton)	1811–1872	Volume 2
Cather, Willa	1873–1947	Volume 3	Fitzgerald, F. Scott	1896–1940	Volume 3
Champlain, Samuel de	1570–1635	Volume 1	Forché, Carolyn	1950–	Volume 5
Cheever, John	1912–1982	Volume 4	Foster, Hannah Webster	1758–1840	Volume 1
Chesnutt, Charles	1858–1932	Volume 2	Franklin, Benjamin	1706–1790	Volume 1
Child, Lydia Maria	1802–1880	Volume 2	Freeman, Mary Eleanor	1852–1930	Volume 2
Chopin, Kate	1850–1904	Volume 2	Wilkins
Cisneros, Sandra	1954–	Volume 5	Freneau, Philip Morin	1752–1832	Volume 1
Cofer, Judith Ortiz	1952–	Volume 5	Frost, Robert	1874–1963	Volume 3
			Fuller, Margaret	1810–1850	Volume 2
			Gilman, Charlotte Perkins	1860–1935	Volume 2

Ginsberg, Allen	1926–1997	Volume 4	McCarthy, Cormac	1933–	Volume 5
Giovanni, Nikki	1943–	Volume 5	McKay, Claude	1890–1948	Volume 3
H. D. (Hilda Doolittle)	1886–1961	Volume 3	McMurtry, Larry	1936–	Volume 5
Haley, Alex	1921–1992	Volume 4	Melville, Herman	1819–1891	Volume 2
Hammon, Jupiter	1711–1806	Volume 1	Millay, Edna St. Vincent	1892–1950	Volume 3
Handsome Lake	1735–1815	Volume 1	Miller, Arthur	1915–2005	Volume 4
Hansberry, Lorraine	1930–1965	Volume 4	Momaday, N. Scott	1934–	Volume 4
Harjo, Joy	1951–	Volume 5	Moore, Marianne	1887–1972	Volume 3
Harper, Frances Ellen Watkins	1825–1911	Volume 2	Mora, Pat	1942–	Volume 5
Harris, Joel Chandler	1848–1908	Volume 2	Morrison, Toni	1931–	Volume 5
Harte, Bret	1836–1902	Volume 2	Morton, Thomas	1579–1647	Volume 1
Hawthorne, Nathaniel	1804–1864	Volume 2	Murray, Judith Sargent	1751–1820	Volume 1
Hayden, Robert	1913–1980	Volume 4	Oates, Joyce Carol	1938–	Volume 5
Heller, Joseph	1923–1999	Volume 4	O'Brien, Tim	1946–	Volume 5
Hemingway, Ernest	1899–1961	Volume 3	Occom, Samson	1723–1792	Volume 1
Howells, William Dean	1837–1920	Volume 2	O'Connor, Flannery	1925–1964	Volume 4
Hughes, Langston	1871–1967	Volume 3	Oliver, Mary	1935–	Volume 5
Hurston, Zora Neale	1891–1960	Volume 3	O'Neill, Eugene	1888–1953	Volume 3
Irving, Washington	1783–1859	Volume 1	Ortiz, Simon J.	1941–	Volume 5
Jackson, Shirley	1919–1965	Volume 4	Paine, Thomas	1737–1809	Volume 1
Jacobs, Harriet	1813–1897	Volume 2	Piatt, Sarah M. B.	1836–1919	Volume 2
James, Henry	1843–1916	Volume 2	Pinsky, Robert	1940–	Volume 5
Jarrell, Randall	1914–1965	Volume 4	Plath, Sylvia	1932–1963	Volume 4
Jefferson, Thomas	1743–1826	Volume 1	Poe, Edgar Allan	1809–1849	Volume 2
Jewett, Sarah Orne	1849–1909	Volume 2	Porter, Katherine Anne	1890–1980	Volume 3
Kerouac, Jack	1922–1969	Volume 4	Potok, Chaim	1929–2002	Volume 4
Kesey, Ken	1935–2001	Volume 4	Pound, Ezra	1885–1972	Volume 3
King, Martin Luther, Jr.	1929–1968	Volume 4	Rand, Ayn	1905–1982	Volume 4
Kingsolver, Barbara	1955–	Volume 5	Reed, Ishmael	1938–	Volume 5
Kingston, Maxine Hong	1940–	Volume 5	Rich, Adrienne	1929–	Volume 5
Knowles, John	1926–2001	Volume 4	Robinson, Edwin Arlington	1869–1935	Volume 3
Komunyakaa, Yusef	1947–	Volume 5	Roethke, Theodore	1908–1963	Volume 4
Larsen, Nella	1891–1964	Volume 3	Roth, Philip	1933–	Volume 4
Lee, Chang-rae	1965–	Volume 5	Rowson,	1762–1824	Volume 1
Lee, Harper	1926–	Volume 4	Susanna Haswell
Levertov, Denise	1923–1997	Volume 4	Salinger, J. D.	1919–2010	Volume 4
London, Jack	1876–1916	Volume 3	Sandburg, Carl	1878–1967	Volume 3
Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth	1807–1882	Volume 2	Sedgwick, Catharine Maria	1789–1867	Volume 1
Lowell, Robert	1917–1977	Volume 4	Sexton, Anne	1928–1974	Volume 4
Malamud, Bernard	1914–1986	Volume 4	Silko, Leslie Marmon	1948–	Volume 5
Malcolm X	1925–1965	Volume 4	Smith, John	1580–1631	Volume 1
Marshall, Paule	1929–	Volume 4	Snyder, Gary	1930–	Volume 5
Mather, Cotton	1663–1728	Volume 1	Soto, Gary	1952–	Volume 5

Stein, Gertrude	1874–1946	Volume 3	Walker, Alice	1944–	Volume 5
Steinbeck, John	1902–1968	Volume 3	Warren, Robert Penn	1905–1989	Volume 4
Stevens, Wallace	1879–1955	Volume 3	Washington, Booker T.	1856–1915	Volume 3
Stowe, Harriet Beecher	1811–1896	Volume 2	Welty, Eudora	1909–2001	Volume 4
Sui Sin Far (Edith Maude Eaton)	1865–1914	Volume 3	Wharton, Edith	1862–1937	Volume 3
Swenson, May	1913–1989	Volume 4	Wheatley, Phillis	1753–1784	Volume 1
Tan, Amy	1952–	Volume 5	Whitman, Walt	1819–1892	Volume 2
Taylor, Edward	ca. 1642–1729	Volume 1	Wilbur, Richard	1921–	Volume 4
Thoreau, Henry David	1817–1862	Volume 2	Wilder, Thornton	1897–1975	Volume 3
Toomer, Jean	1894–1967	Volume 3	Williams, Tennessee	1911–1983	Volume 4
Twain, Mark (Samuel Langhorne Clemens)	1835–1910	Volume 2	Williams, William Carlos	1883–1961	Volume 3
Updike, John	1932–2009	Volume 4	Wilson, August	1945–2005	Volume 5
Viramontes, Helena María	1954–	Volume 5	Wilson, Harriet E.	1825–1900	Volume 2
Vonnegut, Kurt, Jr.	1922–2007	Volume 4	Winthrop, John	1588–1649	Volume 1
			Wright, Richard	1908–1960	Volume 3

APPENDIX II

Chronological List of Writers Included in All Volumes of the Student's Encyclopedia of Great American Writers, by Birth Date

Note that authors are placed in the volume that covers the period during which they published their most important works. Some authors published their works relatively early or relatively late in their lives. This explains why, for example, certain authors placed in Volume 3 were actually born before certain authors placed in volume 2.

Christopher Columbus	1451–1506	Volume 1	William Cullen Bryant	1794–1878	Volume 1
Álvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca	1490–1556	Volume 1	Lydia Maria Child	1802–1880	Volume 2
Samuel de Champlain	1570–1635	Volume 1	Ralph Waldo Emerson	1803–1882	Volume 2
Thomas Morton	1579–1647	Volume 1	Nathaniel Hawthorne	1804–1864	Volume 2
John Smith	1580–1631	Volume 1	Henry Wadsworth Longfellow	1807–1882	Volume 2
John Winthrop	1588–1649	Volume 1	Edgar Allan Poe	1809–1849	Volume 2
William Bradford	1590–1657	Volume 1	Margaret Fuller	1810–1850	Volume 2
Anne Bradstreet	1612–1672	Volume 1	Fanny Fern	1811–1872	Volume 2
Edward Taylor	ca. 1642–1729	Volume 1	(Sara Willis Parton)
Cotton Mather	1663–1728	Volume 1	Harriet Beecher Stowe	1811–1896	Volume 2
Jonathan Edwards	1703–1758	Volume 1	Harriet Jacobs	1813–1897	Volume 2
Benjamin Franklin	1706–1790	Volume 1	Henry David Thoreau	1817–1862	Volume 2
Jupiter Hammon	1711–1806	Volume 1	Frederick Douglass	1818–1895	Volume 2
Samson Occom	1723–1792	Volume 1	Herman Melville	1819–1891	Volume 2
J. Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur	1735–1813	Volume 1	Walt Whitman	1819–1892	Volume 2
Handsome Lake	1735–1815	Volume 1	Frances Ellen Watkins Harper	1825–1911	Volume 2
John Adams	1735–1826	Volume 1	Harriet E. Wilson	1825–1900	Volume 2
Thomas Paine	1737–1809	Volume 1	Emily Dickinson	1830–1886	Volume 2
Thomas Jefferson	1743–1826	Volume 1	Rebecca Harding Davis	1831–1910	Volume 2
Abigail Adams	1744–1818	Volume 1	Louisa May Alcott	1832–1888	Volume 2
Olaudah Equiano	1745–1797	Volume 1	Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens)	1835–1910	Volume 2
Judith Sargent Murray	1751–1820	Volume 1	Bret Harte	1836–1902	Volume 2
Philip Morin Freneau	1752–1832	Volume 1	Sarah M. B. Piatt	1836–1919	Volume 2
Phillis Wheatley	1753–1784	Volume 1	William Dean Howells	1837–1920	Volume 2
Hannah Webster Foster	1758–1840	Volume 1	Henry Adams	1838–1918	Volume 2
Susanna Haswell Rowson	1762–1824	Volume 1	Ambrose Bierce	1842–1914?	Volume 2
Charles Brockden Brown	1771–1810	Volume 1	Henry James	1843–1916	Volume 2
Washington Irving	1783–1859	Volume 1	Joel Chandler Harris	1848–1908	Volume 2
James Fenimore Cooper	1789–1851	Volume 1	Sarah Orne Jewett	1849–1909	Volume 2
Catharine Maria Sedgwick	1789–1867	Volume 1

Kate Chopin	1850–1904	Volume 2	Countee Cullen	1903–1946	Volume 3
Mary Eleanor Wilkins Freeman	1852–1930	Volume 2	Ayn Rand	1905–1982	Volume 4
Booker T. Washington	1856–1915	Volume 3	Robert Penn Warren	1905–1989	Volume 4
Charles Chesnutt	1858–1932	Volume 2	Richard Wright	1908–1960	Volume 3
Charlotte Perkins Gilman	1860–1935	Volume 2	Theodore Roethke	1908–1963	Volume 4
Edith Wharton	1862–1937	Volume 3	Eudora Welty	1909–2001	Volume 4
Sui Sin Far (Edith Maude Eaton)	1865–1914	Volume 3	Elizabeth Bishop	1911–1979	Volume 4
W. E. B. DuBois	1868–1963	Volume 3	Tennessee Williams	1911–1983	Volume 4
Edwin Arlington Robinson	1869–1935	Volume 3	John Cheever	1912–1982	Volume 4
Stephen Crane	1871–1900	Volume 2	Robert Hayden	1913–1980	Volume 4
Theodore Dreiser	1871–1945	Volume 3	May Swenson	1913–1989	Volume 4
Langston Hughes	1871–1967	Volume 3	Randall Jarrell	1914–1965	Volume 4
Paul Laurence Dunbar	1872–1906	Volume 2	Bernard Malamud	1914–1986	Volume 4
Willa Cather	1873–1947	Volume 3	Ralph Ellison	1914–1994	Volume 4
Gertrude Stein	1874–1946	Volume 3	Saul Bellow	1915–2005	Volume 4
Robert Frost	1874–1963	Volume 3	Arthur Miller	1915–2005	Volume 4
Jack London	1876–1916	Volume 3	Robert Lowell	1917–1977	Volume 4
Gertrude Simmons Bonnin (Zitkala-Ša)	1876–1938	Volume 3	Gwendolyn Brooks	1917–2000	Volume 4
Sherwood Anderson	1876–1942	Volume 3	Shirley Jackson	1919–1965	Volume 4
Carl Sandburg	1878–1967	Volume 3	J. D. Salinger	1919–2010	Volume 4
Wallace Stevens	1879–1955	Volume 3	Ray Bradbury	1920–	Volume 4
William Carlos Williams	1883–1961	Volume 3	Lawrence Ferlinghetti	1920–	Volume 4
Ezra Pound	1885–1972	Volume 3	Richard Wilbur	1921–	Volume 4
H. D. (Hilda Doolittle)	1886–1961	Volume 3	Alex Haley	1921–1992	Volume 4
Marianne Moore	1887–1972	Volume 3	Jack Kerouac	1922–1969	Volume 4
Eugene O’Neill	1888–1953	Volume 3	Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.	1922–2007	Volume 4
T. S. Eliot	1888–1965	Volume 3	Denise Levertov	1923–1997	Volume 4
Claude McKay	1890–1948	Volume 3	Joseph Heller	1923–1999	Volume 4
Katherine Anne Porter	1890–1980	Volume 3	James Baldwin	1924–1987	Volume 4
Zora Neale Hurston	1891–1960	Volume 3	Truman Capote	1924–1984	Volume 4
Nella Larsen	1891–1964	Volume 3	Flannery O’Connor	1925–1964	Volume 4
Edna St. Vincent Millay	1892–1950	Volume 3	Malcolm X	1925–1965	Volume 4
E. E. Cummings	1894–1962	Volume 3	Harper Lee	1926–	Volume 4
Jean Toomer	1894–1967	Volume 3	Allen Ginsberg	1926–1997	Volume 4
F. Scott Fitzgerald	1896–1940	Volume 3	John Knowles	1926–2001	Volume 4
John Dos Passos	1896–1970	Volume 3	John Knowles	1926–2001	Volume 4
William Faulkner	1897–1962	Volume 3	Edward Albee	1928–	Volume 4
Thornton Wilder	1897–1975	Volume 3	Maya Angelou	1928–	Volume 5
Hart Crane	1899–1932	Volume 3	Anne Sexton	1928–1974	Volume 4
Ernest Hemingway	1899–1961	Volume 3	Paule Marshall	1929–	Volume 4
John Steinbeck	1902–1968	Volume 3	Adrienne Rich	1929–	Volume 5
			Martin Luther King, Jr.	1929–1968	Volume 4
			Chaim Potok	1929–2002	Volume 4
			Gary Snyder	1930–	Volume 5
			Lorraine Hansberry	1930–1965	Volume 4
			Toni Morrison	1931–	Volume 5

Sylvia Plath	1932–1963	Volume 4	Nikki Giovanni	1943–	Volume 5
John Updike	1932–2009	Volume 4	Alice Walker	1944–	Volume 5
Cormac McCarthy	1933–	Volume 5	August Wilson	1945–2005	Volume 5
Philip Roth	1933–	Volume 4	Tim O'Brien	1946–	Volume 5
N. Scott Momaday	1934–	Volume 4	Yusef Komunyakaa	1947–	Volume 5
Amiri Baraka (Leroi Jones)	1934–	Volume 5	Leslie Marmon Silko	1948–	Volume 5
Mary Oliver	1935–	Volume 5	Julia Alvarez	1950–	Volume 5
Ken Kesey	1935–2001	Volume 4	Carolyn Forché	1950–	Volume 5
Larry McMurtry	1936–	Volume 5	Joy Harjo	1951–	Volume 5
Rudolfo Anaya	1937–	Volume 5	Jimmy Santiago Baca	1952–	Volume 5
Joyce Carol Oates	1938–	Volume 5	Judith Ortiz Cofer	1952–	Volume 5
Ishmael Reed	1938–	Volume 5	Rita Dove	1952–	Volume 5
Raymond Carver	1938–1988	Volume 5	Gary Soto	1952–	Volume 5
Toni Cade Bambara	1939–	Volume 5	Amy Tan	1952–	Volume 5
Maxine Hong Kingston	1940–	Volume 5	Sandra Cisneros	1954–	Volume 5
Robert Pinsky	1940–	Volume 5	Louise Erdrich	1954–	Volume 5
Billy Collins	1941–	Volume 5	Helena María Viramontes	1954–	Volume 5
Simon J. Ortiz	1941–	Volume 5	Barbara Kingsolver	1955–	Volume 5
Pat Mora	1942–	Volume 5	Chang-rae Lee	1965–	Volume 5

STUDENT'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GREAT AMERICAN WRITERS

STUDENT'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GREAT AMERICAN WRITERS

VOLUME IV: 1945 TO 1970

STUDENT'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GREAT AMERICAN WRITERS

VOLUME IV: 1945 TO 1970

BLAKE HOBBY

PATRICIA M. GANTT, GENERAL EDITOR

 Facts On File
An imprint of Infobase Publishing

Student's Encyclopedia of Great American Writers, 1945 to 1970

Copyright © 2010 by Blake Hobby

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage or retrieval systems, without permission in writing from the publisher. For information contact:

Facts On File, Inc.
An imprint of Infobase Publishing
132 West 31st Street
New York NY 10001

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Student's encyclopedia of great American writers / Patricia Gantt, general editor.
v. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

Contents: [1] Beginnings to 1830 / Andrea Tinnemeyer — [2] 1830 to 1900 / Paul Crumbley — [3] 1900 to 1945 / Robert C. Evans — [4] 1945 to 1970 / Blake Hobby — [5] 1970 to the present / Patricia Gantt.

ISBN 978-0-8160-6087-0 (hardcover: acid-free paper) ISBN 978-1-4381-3125-2 (e-book) 1.
Authors, American—Biography—Encyclopedias, Juvenile. 2. American literature—Encyclopedias, Juvenile. I. Tinnemeyer, Andrea. II. Gantt, Patricia M., 1943–
PS129.S83 2009
810.9'0003—dc22
[B]

2009030783

Facts On File books are available at special discounts when purchased in bulk quantities for businesses, associations, institutions, or sales promotions. Please call our Special Sales Department in New York at (212) 967-8800 or (800) 322-8755.

You can find Facts On File on the World Wide Web at <http://www.factsonfile.com>

Text design by Annie O'Donnell
Composition by Mary Susan Ryan-Flynn
Cover printed by Sheridan Books, Ann Arbor, Mich.
Book printed and bound by Sheridan Books, Ann Arbor, Mich.
Date printed: June 2010
Printed in the United States of America

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

CONTENTS

List of Writers and Works Included	vi	Malcolm X	310
Series Preface	xi	Paule Marshall	322
Volume Introduction	xii	Arthur Miller	336
Edward Albee	1	N. Scott Momaday	352
James Baldwin	13	Flannery O'Connor	366
Saul Bellow	33	Sylvia Plath	383
Elizabeth Bishop	46	Chaim Potok	402
Ray Bradbury	63	Ayn Rand	412
Gwendolyn Brooks	76	Theodore Roethke	425
Truman Capote	90	Philip Roth	438
John Cheever	96	J. D. Salinger	451
Ralph Ellison	107	Anne Sexton	466
Lawrence Ferlinghetti	121	May Swenson	479
Allen Ginsberg	131	John Updike	491
Alex Haley	145	Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.	504
Lorraine Hansberry	151	Robert Penn Warren	521
Robert Hayden	163	Eudora Welty	535
Joseph Heller	178	Richard Wilbur	548
Shirley Jackson	191	Tennessee Williams	559
Randall Jarrell	196
Jack Kerouac	206
Ken Kesey	218	Appendix I: Alphabetical List of Writers
Martin Luther King, Jr.	227	Included in All Volumes of the Student's
John Knowles	243	Encyclopedia of Great American Writers	576
Harper Lee	252	Appendix II: Chronological List of Writers
Denise Levertov	261	Included in All Volumes of the Student's
Robert Lowell	279	Encyclopedia of Great American Writers,
Bernard Malamud	296	by Birth Date	579

LIST OF WRITERS AND WORKS INCLUDED

Edward Albee	1	“The Moose” (1972)
The Zoo Story (1959)		“One Art” (1976)
The Sandbox (1960)		“Over 2,000 Illustrations and a Complete Concordance” (1948)
Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? (1962)
James Baldwin	13	Ray Bradbury	63
Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953)		The Martian Chronicles (1950)
Notes of a Native Son (1955)		“There Will Come Soft Rains” (1950)
Giovanni’s Room (1956)		Fahrenheit 451 (1953)
“Sonny’s Blues” (1957)		Dandelion Wine (1957)
The Fire Next Time (1963)		Gwendolyn Brooks	76
Blues for Mr. Charlie (1964)		“kitchenette building” (1945)
“The Rockpile” (in Going to Meet the Man , 1965)		“the mother” (1945)
Saul Bellow	33	“A Bronzeville Mother Loiters in Mississippi. Meanwhile, a Mississippi Mother Burns Bacon” (1960)
“Looking for Mr. Green” (1951)		“The Chicago Defender Sends a Man to Little Rock” (1960)
The Adventures of Augie March (1954)		“We Real Cool” (1960)
Seize the Day (1956)		“Riot” (1969)
Herzog (1964)
Humboldt’s Gift (1975)
Elizabeth Bishop	46	Truman Capote	90
“The Man-Moth” (1936)		In Cold Blood (1965)
“The Unbeliever” (1938)
“The Fish” (1940)		John Cheever	96
“At the Fishhouses” (1948)		“The Enormous Radio” (1947)
“Questions of Travel” (1956)		The Wapshot Chronicle (1957)
“Filling Station” (1964)		“The Death of Justina” (1961)
“Sestina” (1964)		“The Swimmer” (1964)
“In the Waiting Room” (1971)

- Ralph Ellison 107
 “King of the Bingo Game” (1944)
 “Flying Home” (1944)
Invisible Man (1952)
 “Brave Words for a Startling Occasion” (1953)
 “The World and the Jug” (1963, 1964)
 “A Party Down the Square” (1996)
- Lawrence Ferlinghetti 121
 “Constantly Risking Absurdity” (1958)
 “Dove Sta Amore” (1958)
 “I Am Waiting” (1958)
 “In Golden Gate Park That Day” (1958)
 “In Goya’s Greatest Scenes We Seem to See” (1958)
 “The Old Italians Dying” (1979)
 “A Dark Portrait” (1984)
 “Monet’s Lilies Shuddering” (1988)
- Allen Ginsberg 131
 “On Burroughs’ Work” (1954)
 “A Supermarket in California” (1955)
 “Sunflower Sutra” (1955)
 “America” (1956)
 “Howl” (1956)
 “To Aunt Rose” (1958)
 “Ego Confession” (1974)
- Alex Haley 145
Roots: The Saga of an American Family (1976)
- Lorraine Hansberry 151
A Raisin in the Sun (1959)
 “On Summer” (1960)
The Movement: Documentary of a Struggle for Equality (1964)
- The Sign in Sidney Brustein’s Window (1964)
- Robert Hayden 163
 “Frederick Douglass” (1946)
 “Homage to the Empress of the Blues” (1962)
 “Middle Passage” (1962)
 “Mourning Poem for the Queen of Sundays” (1962)
 “Runagate Runagate” (1962)
 “Summertime and the Living . . .” (1962)
 “Those Winter Sundays” (1962)
 “Tour 5” (1962)
 “The Night-Blooming Cereus” (1972)
 “Free Fantasia: Tiger Flowers” (1975)
- Joseph Heller 178
Catch-22 (1961)
Something Happened (1974)
- Shirley Jackson 191
 “The Lottery” (1948)
- Randall Jarrell 196
 “90 North” (1942)
 “Losses” (1945)
 “Protocols” (1945)
 “Second Air Force” (1945)
 “The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner” (1945)
 “Next Day” (1965)
 “Well Water” (1965)
- Jack Kerouac 206
On the Road (1957)
The Dharma Bums (1958)
The Subterraneans (1958)
 “The Vanishing American Hobo” (1960)

- Ken Kesey 218
One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1962)
Sometimes a Great Notion (1964)
- Martin Luther King, Jr. 227
Stride toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story (1958)
"I Have a Dream" (1963)
"Letter from Birmingham Jail" (1963)
Why We Can't Wait (1964)
Where Do We Go from Here: Chaos or Community? (1967)
"I've Been to the Mountaintop" (1969)
- John Knowles 243
A Separate Peace (1959)
Peace Breaks Out (1981)
- Harper Lee 252
To Kill a Mockingbird (1960)
- Denise Levertov 261
"Illustrious Ancestors" (1958)
"To the Snake" (1960)
"A Solitude" (1961)
"September 1961" (1961)
"The Jacob's Ladder" (1961)
"In Mind" (1964)
"What Were They Like?" (1967)
"A Woman Alone" (1978)
"Death in Mexico" (1978)
"The May Mornings" (1982)
"Caedmon" (1987)
"Making Peace" (1987)
- Robert Lowell 279
"Colloquy in Black Rock" (1946)
"Mr. Edwards and the Spider" (1946)
- "The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket" (1946)
"Memories of West Street and Lepke" (1959)
"My Last Afternoon with Uncle Devereux Winslow" (1959)
"Skunk Hour" (1959)
"For the Union Dead" (1960)
"Night Sweat" (1963)
"For Theodore Roethke" (1967)
"Near the Ocean" (1967)
- Bernard Malamud 296
"The First Seven Years" (1950)
The Natural (1952)
"The Magic Barrel" (1954)
"Black Is My Favorite Color" (1963)
"The Jewbird" (1963)
- Malcolm X 310
The Autobiography of Malcolm X: As Told to Alex Haley (1965)
Malcolm X Speaks: Selected Speeches and Statements (1965)
By Any Means Necessary: Speeches, Interviews, and a Letter by Malcolm X (1970)
- Paule Marshall 322
Brown Girl, Brownstones (1959)
The Chosen Place, the Timeless People (1969)
"To Da-duh, in Memoriam" (1976)
Praisesong for the Widow (1983)
- Arthur Miller 336
Death of a Salesman (1949)
The Crucible (1953)
A View from the Bridge (1955, revised 1956)

N. Scott Momaday	352	Theodore Roethke	425
House Made of Dawn (1968)		“The Adamant” (1941)
The Way to Rainy Mountain (1969)		“The Light Comes Brighter” (1941)
The Names: A Memoir (1976)		“Big Wind” (1948)
		“Cuttings”/“Cuttings (later)” (1948)
Flannery O’Connor	366	“My Papa’s Waltz” (1948)
“A Good Man Is Hard to Find” (1953)		“Root Cellar” (1948)
“The Life You Save May Be Your Own” (1953)		“The Lost Son” (1948)
“A Circle in the Fire” (1954)		“Weed Puller” (1948)
“The Displaced Person” (1954, revised 1955)		“The Waking” (1953)
“Good Country People” (1955)		“Elegy” (1958)
“Everything That Rises Must Converge” (1961)		“Frau Bauman, Frau Schmidt, and Frau Schwartz” (1958)
“Revelation” (1964)		“The Far Field” (1964)
		Philip Roth	438
Sylvia Plath	383	Goodbye, Columbus (1959)
“Morning Song” (1961)		“Defender of the Faith” (1959)
“Blackberrying” (1961)		Portnoy’s Complaint (1969)
“For a Fatherless Son” (1962)		American Pastoral (1997)
“Daddy” (1962)		The Human Stain (2000)
“Fever 103°” (1962)
“Ariel” (1962)		J. D. Salinger	451
“Lady Lazarus” (1962)		“A Perfect Day for Bananafish” (1948)
“Child” (1963)		“For Esmé—with Love and Squalor” (1950)
“Mirror” (1963)		The Catcher in the Rye (1951)
The Bell Jar (1963)		“Teddy” (1953)
		“Raise High the Roof Beam, Carpenters” (1955)
Chaim Potok	402	Franny and Zooey (1961)
The Chosen (1967)
The Promise (1969)		Anne Sexton	466
My Name Is Asher Lev (1972)		“Her Kind” (1960)
		“Housewife” (1962)
Ayn Rand	412	The Death of the Fathers (1962)
We the Living (1936)		“The Starry Night” (1962)
Anthem (1938)		The Truth the Dead Know (1962)
The Fountainhead (1943)
Atlas Shrugged (1957)

- “Young” (1962)
 “Little Girl, My String Bean, My Lovely Woman” (1966)
 “Somewhere in Africa” (1966)
- May Swenson 479
 “By Morning” (1952)
 “Deciding” (1954)
 “Question” (1954)
 “The Centaur” (1954)
 “Water Picture” (1955)
 “The Truth Is Forced” (1961)
 “The Woods at Night” (1962)
 “Blue”/“A Trellis for R.” (1967)
- John Updike 491
Rabbit, Run (1960)
 “A&P” (1961)
 “Separating” (1975)
The Witches of Eastwick (1984)
 “Brother Grasshopper” (1987)
 “The Brown Chest” (1992)
- Kurt Vonnegut, Jr. 504
 “Report on the Barnhouse Effect” (1950)
 “Harrison Bergeron” (1961)
Cat’s Cradle (1963)
Slaughterhouse-Five; or, The Children’s Crusade, A Duty-Dance with Death (1969)
Breakfast of Champions; or, Goodbye Blue Monday! (1973)
- Robert Penn Warren 521
 “Bearded Oaks” (1942)
All the King’s Men (1946)
- “Gold Glade” (1957)
Audubon: A Vision (1969)
 “American Portrait: Old Style” (1976)
 “Evening Hawk” (1977)
 “Acquaintance with Time in Early Autumn” (1980)
 “After the Dinner Party” (1985)
 “Mortal Limit” (1985)
- Eudora Welty 535
 “Petrified Man” (1939)
 “Why I Live at the P.O.” (1941)
 “A Worn Path” (1941)
 “The Wide Net” (1942)
 “Where Is the Voice Coming From?” (1963)
One Writer’s Beginnings (1984)
- Richard Wilbur 548
 “The Beautiful Changes” (1947)
 “A World without Objects Is a Sensible Emptiness” (1950)
 “Ceremony” (1950)
 “The Death of a Toad” (1950)
 “Years-End” (1950)
 “Love Calls Us to the Things of This World” (1956)
 “The Mind-Reader” (1976)
- Tennessee Williams 559
The Glass Menagerie (1944)
A Streetcar Named Desire (1947)
Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1955)
The Night of the Iguana (1961)

SERIES PREFACE

The Student's Encyclopedia of Great American Writers is a unique reference intended to help high school students meet standards for literature education and prepare themselves for literature study in college. It offers extensive entries on important authors, as well as providing additional interpretive helps for students and their teachers. The set has been designed and written in the context of the national standards for English language arts, created by the National Council of Teachers of English and the International Reading Association, the two professional organizations that have the most at stake in high school language arts education (see <http://www.ncte.org/standards>).

The volume editors and many of the contributors to this set not only are university scholars but also have experience in secondary school literature education, ranging from working as readers of Advanced Placement examinations, to developing high school literature curricula, to having taught in high school English classrooms. Although the volume editors all have extensive experience as scholars and university professors, they all have strong roots in high school education and have drawn on their experience to ensure that entries are stylistically appealing and contain the necessary content for students.

The set's five volumes are organized chronologically, as many literature textbooks and anthologies are. This system is convenient for students and also facilitates cross-disciplinary study, increasingly common in high schools. For example, a section on the Civil War in history class might be accompanied by the study of Walt Whitman and Stephen Crane in English class. To help students find what they need, each volume contains two lists of all the authors included in the set: one organized chronologically and the other alphabetically.

Within each volume, authors are presented alphabetically. Each author entry contains a biography and then subentries on the author's major works.

After each subentry on a work is a set of questions for discussion and/or writing. Another set of broader discussion questions appears near the end of each author entry, followed by a bibliography. The entire five-volume set therefore contains more than 1000 discussion questions. These questions make up perhaps the most important and useful features of the set, encouraging further creative thought and helping students get started on their own writing. Many of the questions reference not only the subject literary work or author but also related works and authors, thus helping students to make additional literary connections, as emphasized by the literature standards.

The authors and works included in the set were selected primarily from among those most popular in the high school classrooms—that is, those often featured in secondary-school literary anthologies and textbooks; those often appearing on age-appropriate reading lists; and those most often searched for in Facts On File's online literary database Bloom's Literature Online, used primarily in high schools. In addition, we have endeavored to include a range of writers from different backgrounds in all periods, as well as writers who, though not perhaps among the very most popular today, appear to have been unjustly neglected and are gaining in popularity. No selection could be perfect, and those writers favored by scholars and critics are not always as popular in the high school classroom, but the general editor and volumes editors have attempted to make the set's coverage as useful to students as possible.

Above all, we hope that this set serves not only to instruct but also to inspire students with the love of literature shared by all the editors and contributors who worked on this set.

Patricia M. Gantt

VOLUME INTRODUCTION

As with the founding of the United States and the fighting of the Civil War, the period of 1945–70 was a time of civic unrest. Great writers from this era witnessed the seismic social changes taking place—everything from the sprawling of American cities to the end of Jim Crow laws—and used language to reflect the social order and to challenge it, undermine it, and change it. During this time literature became a far more democratic enterprise. Drawing upon a wide range of voices and cultures, American writers, as bards of an emerging culture, forged meaning out of isolation, suffering, violence, and pain. They recorded the turbulent past, lamented the broken present, and envisioned a better future, all the while presenting us with remarkable aesthetic creations. Literature from this period (often called the postwar period) not only helped define an age but also helped shape an emerging American consciousness. Important, socially conscious books from this period, such as Ralph Ellison’s Invisible Man and Harper Lee’s To Kill a Mockingbird, both of which were best sellers that raised moral questions and addressed sensitive issues of race, have been read by generations of American readers and writers. Other major writers of the time, such as James Baldwin, Saul Bellow, Randall Jarrell, Bernard Malamud, J. D. Salinger, Ayn Rand, John Updike, Eudora Welty, and Richard Wilbur, also raised perplexing questions. They questioned what we have known and can know and have done and should have done and what we might do tomorrow. This period contained the seeds from which our present multicultural society has grown.

When we read postwar American literature, rather than find definitive moral truths or easy answers, we confront questions: Who are we? How do we respond to global conflicts, mass genocide, nuclear proliferation, and civil unrest? How can we, as a nation in which technology and mass production play an ever-increasing role, establish more humane ways of organizing society and living with one another? It was during this 25-year span that we learned the horrific details of Adolf Hitler’s “final solution”; witnessed the Nuremberg trials; integrated public schools, colleges, and universities; met such American civil rights heroes and heroines as Martin Luther King, Jr., Malcolm X, and Rosa Parks; fought the Korean and cold wars; witnessed the sexual revolution; grew to love television; and sent astronauts to the Moon. While we prospered as a society, we confronted bitter truths about our own inhumane actions, both at home and abroad, and about the underlying issues that plagued and continue to haunt American society: xenophobia, racism, sexism, classism. During this key period of American history, authors wrestled with concerns central to our identity. Thus, the voices of great American writers from this period range from deep skepticism to unbridled optimism and encompass a variety of perspectives hitherto unknown in America’s literature: Kurt Vonnegut and Edward Albee’s comic, absurd imaginings; Flannery O’Connor and Tennessee Williams’s southern grotesqueries; Martin Luther King, Jr., and Malcolm X’s demands for justice; Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Jack Kerouac, and Alan Ginsberg’s radical “Beatnik” creations; Philip Roth’s sex-obsessed fictions; Sylvia Plath, Robert Lowell, and Anne Sexton’s confessional poetry.

To examine this literature is to confront paradox. Here we encounter literature’s wily nature, its resistance to simple interpretations, and its reflection of what we sometimes refer to as the ensuing action: the many things that are influential in history making. There is no doubt that we crave solutions, seek answers, and rely upon writers to help us identify what we might hold on to, what we might let go of, and what we need to make anew. But the literature from this period focuses on the fragmented experience of postwar America, one that differs from the experience of the first half of the 20th century. Many writers from the first half of the century employed complex systems of symbols and intricate narrative techniques while attempting to elevate art to the status of religion. These writers, whom we often refer to as modernists, viewed art as a substitute for failed meaning-making systems. Modernist writers made things new in an effort to correct what many thought was a fallen world, where our connection with the divine had been severed. Many of them thought that only art could reconnect us with what had been lost and offer a chance for redemption. Here we find William Faulkner hunting for “verities” in “The Bear,” F. Scott Fitzgerald watching above The Great Gatsby’s Valley of the Ashes, and Zora Neale Hurston weaving folklore and myth into Their Eyes Were Watching God. While such literature attempts to provide a moral corrective, postwar literature is far less attached to sacred truths.

Challenging accepted conventions and what we normally conceive of as formal literature, postwar American writers often adopted new language and employed novel forms. For example, Edward Albee’s The American Dream (1961) follows what John Becker calls “a minimalist approach to plot, characterization, stage setting, and dialogue, which is filled with clichéd phrases and meaningless exchanges.” In doing so, Albee criticizes what he sees as an illusion, the postwar American ideal of happiness, one predicated on attaining material goods, wealth, and status. In the tradition of Mark Twain, Horatio Alger, and F. Scott Fitzgerald, Albee provides social commentary, toying with our expectations, foiling them at every turn, and ultimately leading us to reimagine our lives. So too do the “beatniks”—Jack Kerouac, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, and Allen Ginsberg—refract postwar life, forcing us to look at the dark side of the American dream and speaking out on a range of issues, from drug use to the Vietnam War to the nuclear arms race to gay rights. Ginsberg’s Howl and Other Poems (1956) assails us with the percussive language of the streets, decries social injustice, and speaks for a generation disillusioned by the terror of Joseph McCarthy, who sought to purge the social order of dissidents, often labeled by McCarthy as communists. Ginsberg’s poetry survived an obscenity trial that became a landmark case for the freedom of speech. Writing about what Earen Rast calls “the control American cultural values exert on individual psyches,” Arthur Miller not only created the McCarthy-trial allegory The Crucible, but also gave us Death of a Salesman, where Willy Loman’s ideals are “embodied within the American mythos—self-reliance, economic salvation, individual freedom.” These principles, taken by many as American’s promise of freedom, become nightmares for Miller. As Rast tells us, “Cleaved from these values, Willy is an empty shell. In the final confrontation, Biff eviscerates not only everything Willy considers meaningful, but also the distinction between American ‘reality’ and American mythology.”

Known for his wit, comically absurd works, and humanitarian vision, Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.—perhaps the greatest American satirist since Mark Twain—became an icon for the “baby-boomer” generation, those born during post–World War II years. Idolized by the American counterculture of the 1960s and 1970s, Kurt Vonnegut spoke to a generation disillusioned by ineffective institutions, the nuclear arms race, and the Vietnam War. Although some consider him to be a period writer, Vonnegut’s works continue to be read and taught, especially his powerful exploration of the bombing of Dresden, Slaughterhouse-Five. Although Vonnegut abhorred being called a science-fiction writer, he created experimental, fantastic worlds populated with grotesque characters in order to address contemporary sociopolitical concerns. As Vonnegut says, “I have been a soreheaded occupant of a file drawer labeled ‘science fiction’ . . . and I would like out, particularly since so many serious critics regularly mistake the drawer for a urinal” (Wampeters 1). Questioning who we are, why we are here, and what it is that we as social beings should be doing, Vonnegut’s bitterly satirical works depict a world in which God is strangely absent, where stock characters and fantastical creations negotiate chance events, often amid alien creatures and with the aid of time-traveling machines and horrific forms of technology. Vonnegut comments on the limits of reason, the illusion of progress, the horrors of war, the absurdity of nuclear proliferation, the reality of class differences, the construct of race, and the need for human beings to erect systems of meaning, such as the religion of Bokonon in his 1963 novel Cat's Cradle. Combining high hilarity with what some consider pessimistic depictions of humanity's frailty and self-centered tendencies, Vonnegut examines the delusions that distract us from real, pressing social concerns. By lauding the power of fiction to reenvision our place in the world, and by challenging us to create a better, more humane society, Vonnegut earned himself a secure place in the canon of American fiction.

While Vonnegut addressed social concerns as a comic writer, Robert Penn Warren addressed them as a tragic writer. In his great novel All the King's Men, he uses the experience of Jack Burden to examine American society and the American political system. Jack is ambivalent about his own actions and interpretations and is ambivalent about his mentor, Willie Stark, the literary counterpart of the real Louisiana governor Huey Long. Yet Jack accepts "the awful responsibility of Time": how his own ideas, actions, and words have meanings that affect everyone joined in the "web of being." As the narrative progresses and as Jack learns about the complex web of the political world, we also learn about Willie's disillusionment and about the many questionable decisions he makes. As do Sophocles' Oedipus and many other tragic figures, Willie Stark fails to reach his potential. Ultimately, All the King's Men explores such grand themes as the way history affects the present, the inherent dangers of power (which in the novel is portrayed as a corruptive, blinding force), the alienation of the individual in the modern world, and the duty we all have to understand ourselves, come to terms with our past, and accept responsibility for our lives and the ways they affect others. These themes emerge as Jack Burden realizes his identity against the mercu-rial rise and fall of Willie Stark. History functions in the novel as the backdrop against which Warren explores our lives and the tragic nature of the human condition.

During this same period, much American poetry was confessional in nature, especially the work of Anne Sexton, May Swenson, and Sylvia Plath. By introducing unheard voices of those who suffer from roles imposed upon them by society, these authors cause us to consider the condition of women in postwar America. Sylvia Plath's novel The Bell Jar portrays a suffering woman artist fighting with her own demons, laboring to know herself, searching for an acceptable role to play, and seeking fulfillment and joy. As does the work of Samuel Beckett, Franz Kafka, Kate Chopin, William Faulkner, and Virginia Woolf, the novel speaks to those trapped with self-doubts, groping to find a way through the seemingly endless corridors of the mind. It deals with understanding, the struggle between self and other, interior and exterior, with its dream-filled visions and nightmarish pain. As Esther says near the end of the novel, "To the person in the bell jar, blank and stopped as a dead baby, the world itself is the bad dream." As Esther does, we all seek a stable self, one free of the psychological and social knots that bind us. While the novel depicts a suffocating world, it also conveys the power of art, the way it can not only lead us to empathize with others but also help us to understand ourselves. Whether we choose to read The Bell Jar as an autobiography, as fiction, as a psychological portrait, as a representation of women in the 1950s, as a sociological essay on the sexual experience of women, or for the style of the narration and construction of the novel's form, which in many ways mirrors the disjunctive experience of its narrator, we empathize with Esther, who, as we have, has an emphatic need to confront radical instability and make sense of the world.

The literature from this period includes some of the finest African-American orators, poets, dramatists, and fiction writers in the American literary tradition: Gwendolyn Brooks; Ralph Ellison; Alex Haley; Lorraine Hansberry; Martin Luther King, Jr.; Malcolm X; and Paule Marshall. Gwendolyn Brooks's 1945 collection of poetry, A Street in Bronzeville, established her place in the American literary canon. To understand Brooks's eloquence and her ability to speak not only for herself but also for the dispossessed, we might consider her poem "the mother," a powerful work that deals with the aftermath of an abortion. The speaker of the poem, the mother, is divided: On the one hand, she affirms the decisions she has made; on the other hand, she questions those same decisions, groping for words to express the clashing feelings she harbors, laboring to use language to express how "the truth is to be said." The mother's memory and imagination link her to what she has lost, leading her to conjure the things her aborted children might have done and to speak directly to them throughout the poem. In this way, the poem has a dreamlike quality; the mother grapples with reality but also fantasizes about what might have been, creating an overall nostalgic tone that is suffused with pathos, that strange artistic quality that evokes tenderness, pity, and sorrow all at once. As in many of the other poems in A Street in Bronzeville, Brooks here deals with children, the innocent who suffer in an adult world and who grapple for space in a harsh environment. Yet despite Brook's interest in children and her compassion for their plight, "the mother" focuses on the consciousness of the would-be child bearer, the one who has elected to not carry children into a bleak world. The lost children stand as reminders of the harshness of the impoverished surroundings the speaker inhabits; the mother expresses concern for those who might have been introduced to those surroundings. Richard Wright, author of Native Son and proponent of Brooks's poetry, read "the mother" and thought the subject inappropriate for A Street in Bronzeville. While Wright may have been correct about the climate of the times, it is difficult to imagine a more effective poem. By presenting a woman who has aborted her children in a stark, realistic manner, Brooks offers a moving depiction of the destitute urban woman. Even though this woman regrets her actions, she keeps the lost alive in her memory, weighing what might have been, what she believes, what she knows, what she struggles with, what she has lost, and what does not make sense to her. Thus, the mother is a complex character, a woman who inhabits a difficult world, where day-to-day survival means choosing from a host of real possibilities that defy any abstract, idealized notion of what it means to be human.

While they may differ in style and outlook, the works examined in this volume all place great demands on the reader. At times it seems as if the reader herself is responsible for reconstructing the world in which the characters live. A prime example is the work of M. Scott Momaday, particularly his House Made of Dawn, which marked the beginning of what Kenneth Lincoln calls the "Native American Renaissance." Momaday's characters are from decimated cultures. While they celebrate the heritage of their ancestors and draw strength from the wonders of the natural world, they live broken lives, ever reaching to the past and envisioning a future in which they may be whole. While American literature before this era may have imagined that the American experience was somehow universal, postwar literature recognizes the many and varied elements of American society, as well the necessity of giving voice to the voiceless. To begin this process is to know the pain of birth, the daily ritual of confronting, examining, representing, critiquing, and satirizing that describes the process of literary creation. More explicitly than ever before, the imaginative literature of the period 1945–70 is wedded to American society and culture. With this close cultural relationship in mind, this volume examines many stunning aesthetic creations and their response to and influence upon the American way of life, revealing the way great American writers have fashioned our story.

Blake Hobby

EDWARD ALBEE (1928–)

[The] health of a nation, a society, can be determined by the art it demands. We have insisted of television and our movies that they not have anything to do with anything, that they be our never-never land; and if we demand this same function of our live theatre, what will be left of the visual-auditory arts—save the dance (in which nobody talks) and music (to which nobody listens)?

(“Which Theatre Is the Absurd One?” New York Times Magazine, 25 February 1962)

Edward Franklin Albee, one of America’s foremost dramatists, was born on March 12, 1928, either in Virginia or in Washington, D.C. Two weeks after his birth, Frances and Reed Albee, the inheritor of a large stake in Keith-Albee Orpheum, a coast-to-coast chain of vaudeville theaters, adopted him. Edward grew up in their affluent home in Larchmont, New York. From the age of six Albee knew Frances and Reed were not his biological parents; he later claimed he was adopted to fulfill his ailing grandfather’s wish for a grandson. With a controlling mother and emotionally distant father, Albee felt alienated during his early years. This feeling of abandonment greatly influenced his art, inspiring the biting satire and profound sense of estrangement found in many of his works. Author of more than 30 plays—three of which garnered the Pulitzer Prize in drama—Albee led a generation of American playwrights throughout the 1960s with his overtly critical, often controversial dramas. Responding to the American dream-inspired, conformist culture of the 1950s, Albee shocked audiences, rendering the failure of social institutions—especially the family—in the moment of their collapse.

At an early age Edward was sent in the family limousine to Broadway matinees, where he developed a love for the stage. He formed an especially strong relationship with his nanny, who exposed him to opera and classical music. Edward also met famous theater performers; the Albees entertained many celebrities at their mansion, including the comedians Jimmy Durante, William Gaxton, and Ed Wynn and the Academy Award winner Walter Pidgeon. During his adolescence Albee wrote poetry; he finished his first play, a sex farce named Aliqueen, at the age of 12. Despite his literary interests and productivity, Albee was expelled from three private schools before settling in at the Choate School in Connecticut, where he wrote poems, short stories, a play, and a novel with the encouragement of his teachers there. His first published work, a poem, appeared in the Texas magazine the Kaleidoscope in 1945. Graduating from Choate, he attended Trinity College for a year and a half before he was dismissed for nonattendance (1947); the same year, his mother found out he was homosexual and forced him to leave home.

Moving to the Greenwich Village area of New York City, Albee worked a variety of jobs before he inherited the majority of his grandmother’s trust fund at the age of 30. These jobs included a program-writing stint at a radio station, an office position at an advertising agency, sales, and a job delivering telegrams for Western Union. During this time, Albee immersed himself in 1950s bohemian culture, viewing art exhibits, mingling with other writers and artists, and attending Broadway shows. Three years after he arrived in New York, Albee moved in with his lover and mentor, William Flanagan, a composer and music critic for the Herald Tribune. Though none of Albee's work from this 10-year period has been published, he purportedly wrote volumes of material. Seeking advice, Albee showed some of his poems to the noted poet W. H. Auden and the novelist-playwright Thornton Wilder. At the recommendation of Wilder, Albee decided to concentrate solely on playwriting, which proved to be a sound course.

On the eve of his 30th birthday Albee sat down at his kitchen table with a stolen Western Union typewriter and wrote The Zoo Story (1958) as a birthday present to himself. A one-hour, one-act play with two characters and a lengthy narrative, The Zoo Story script was turned down by New York producers but soon was produced in Berlin, where it was performed for the first time on September 28, 1959, in German to critical acclaim. Premiering in New York in early 1960, The Zoo Story established Albee's reputation and won him a Village Voice Obie award. Performed alongside Samuel Beckett's short play Krapp's Last Tape (1958), The Zoo Story marked the beginning of Albee's association with the "theater of the absurd" movement. This movement in mid-century drama—taking some of its inspiration from French existentialist philosophers such as Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus—focused on the failure of humanity's attempts to construct rational explanations and ordering principles of the world. According to this perspective, posing methodical and tidy answers to the larger questions we encounter as mortal, suffering beings—questions regarding our seeming lack of purpose, the absence or presence of God, and so forth—breeds ignorance, disguising the fundamental absurdity of life. The challenge for the absurdist playwright then is either to strip commonly held illusions from the action of the play or to create a play that tries to make its audience aware of the inadequacy of these illusions.

Though most of the playwrights who belong to this movement—Samuel Beckett, Eugene Ionesco, Jean Genet, Harold Pinter, and others—created plays with surrealist elements, Albee's works are often characterized as more "realistic," depicting concrete situations that are often jarring but less pessimistic than those of his European absurdist counterparts. Four months after The Zoo Story's New York debut, Albee's The Death of Bessie Smith (1960) and The Sandbox (1960) were performed. Premiering in Germany, The Death of Bessie Smith was inspired by the back of an album cover, which related the tragic circumstances surrounding the famous blues diva's demise. Dealing with racism in American culture, the play contains two interwoven plots with eight scenes in five different locations.

The Sandbox was written as a commission for the Festival of Two Worlds at the Spoleto Festival in Italy, where it was not performed. Instead, the play was first produced in New York in 1960. Rather than writing completely new material for the festival commission, Albee used characters from his work in progress, The American Dream (1961), and placed them in a different context. Lasting only 14 minutes, this play resembles works by absurdist playwrights, for instance, in the constant presence of a young man performing gym exercises in the background, who (as the stage directions indicate) represents the "Angel of Death." This fantastical figure deviates from what most theatergoers consider plausible. It is ironic that Albee's most implausible scenario at that date had the largest number of elements drawn directly from his life: Albee modeled the play's central character after his recently deceased grandmother (to whom he dedicated the play) and created dismal caricatures of his adoptive parents in the characters Mommy and Daddy. The strategy of using nonspecific names based on broad character types enhances the degree of abstraction in The Sandbox and is employed by Albee in many of his plays. The American Dream (1961) shares these autobiographical elements with The Sandbox. Both contain theater of the absurd thematic and stylistic elements.

Abandoning the realism of The Zoo Story and The Death of Bessie Smith, Albee followed a minimalist, abstract approach to plot, characterization, stage setting, and dialogue, which is filled with clichéd phrases and meaningless exchanges. The triviality and callous detachment of the characters, with the exception of the grandmother, foreground the artificial and dehumanizing nature of Daddy and Mommy's illusion—the 1950s American ideal of the modern, “normal” nuclear family. The overriding concerns of Mommy and Daddy, especially in The American Dream, center on material goods and conforming to rigid expectations. Albee attacks such indifference, implying that American consumerism and conformity create a sense of isolation.

Opening in January 1961, The American Dream was double-billed with Albee's operatic adaptation of the Herman Melville short story “Bartleby” (1853). After poor reception of the latter, it was paired with The Death of Bessie Smith. Both of these plays won the Foreign Press Association Award. In the same year Albee traveled with a production of The Zoo Story to parts of South America on a cultural-exchange program. During this trip, Albee's adoptive father, Reed, passed away. Returning to New York, Albee completed his first full-length play, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?, in January 1962. The play garnered Albee worldwide recognition and won numerous prizes despite reviewers' polarized reactions.

A psychological portrait of a delusional and dysfunctional marriage that, as Albee suggests, can be read as an allegory for contemporary America or the decline of the West, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? sparked a critical controversy. Running for 664 performances, it won five Tony Awards and the New York Drama Critics Circle Award for best play and narrowly missed winning the Pulitzer Prize. When the Pulitzer Prize drama panel voted to award Albee the year's drama prize, the Pulitzer Committee overrode their choice because the play did not represent a “wholesome” view of American life. The play's success on Broadway earned him an invitation to the White House, where he met President John F. Kennedy. A 1966 screen adaptation of the play directed by Mike Nichols and starring Elizabeth Taylor and Richard Burton received even more positive press than the play. In 1967 the cast and crew won five Academy Awards; the play was nominated in eight other categories.

After the financial success of Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? Albee championed playwrights excluded from the mainstream commercial theater. Fostering a generation of experimentalism and creative independence in American drama, he helped form the Playwrights Unit in Greenwich Village, a workshop that subsidized more than 100 performances of works by unknown young writers. Instrumental to the “off-off Broadway” movement of the 1960s, the workshop supported controversial and recognized dramatists, including the Pulitzer Prize winners Sam Shepard and Lanford Wilson.

Albee's strikingly autobiographical play A Delicate Balance premiered on Broadway in 1966 and won the Pulitzer Prize. The play centers once again on an upper-class couple resembling Albee's foster parents, but with an additional character based on his alcoholic aunt Jane. Focusing on the sanity of each character as he or she relates to the sense of familial belonging they all share, Albee returned in A Delicate Balance to themes found in his early work, especially the emptiness and frailty of social institutions that people construct to shield themselves from terrifying realities. Tony Richardson directed Katherine Hepburn and Paul Scofield in a 1973 film version of the play.

Finishing another adaptation (Giles Cooper's play Everything in the Garden) in 1967, Albee wrote his two most experimental works: Box (1968) and Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-Tung (1968), which were designed to be performed together. Box is an offstage monologue bemoaning the current state of art and society while the audience stares at a box. Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-Tung has three characters—the Long-Winded Lady, Chairman Mao, and the Old Lady—reciting monologues that are related to the Box monologue. Box was supposed to be performed before and after Quotations. Albee intended the performance to be musical in structure, the speeches functioning as notes or motifs that converge and diverge around the themes of social and moral decline in the Box monologue. This experimentation in dramatic form did not win Albee a large audience, but it demonstrated his creative independence and integrity as an artist.

The 1970s and 1980s marked a drop in Albee's prolific productivity of the prior decade. His next play, 1971's All Over, was inspired by the death of his longtime friend and mentor, William Flanagan.

Originally entitled "Death," All Over centers on the imminent demise of a doctor in his screened hospital bed. Albee explores the complex and often selfish reactions people have to death, focusing on the interactions that transpire between the doctor's attendant family and friends.

All Over's planned companion piece, "Life," was revised into Albee's second Pulitzer winner, Seascape (1975). Having the closest thing to a happy ending in Albee's work, Seascape is set on a beach where an elderly retired couple contemplates their future when they are accosted by two large lizards hoping to make the transition from sea to land. The lizards, also a couple, are invited to stay with their human counterparts at the play's close. By dramatizing a confrontation between humans and creatures on the brink of change, the play introduces the concept of evolution into Albee's ongoing exploration of life and death.

After completing two short experimental plays in 1977 (Counting the Ways and Listening), Albee wrote a number of plays that, when initially produced, were not successful: The Lady from Dubuque (1980), the 1981 adaptation of Vladimir Nabokov's novel Lolita (1955), and The Man Who Had Three Arms (1982). This, in effect, forced Albee from Broadway for over a decade. During this hiatus he wrote four plays that were performed at American university theaters and overseas. Two one-acts from this period, Finding the Sun (1983) and Marriage Play (1987), found their way to New York stages in the mid-1990s. The former play is significant in that it is Albee's first work to deal directly with homosexuality.

In 1989 Albee's adoptive mother, Frances, passed away, leaving none of her assets to him. This scathing rejection prompted Albee to write the two-act play Three Tall Women (1991), his most autobiographical work. Perhaps an attempt by Albee to put his antagonistic relationship with his foster mother behind him, the first act is set in A's (an elderly rich woman's) bedroom. Two women, B and C, attend A as she tells various stories about her past. A has a stroke at the end of act 1; the second act opens with the three characters in a hospital room gathered around a mannequin corpse. Each now represents

A at different stages in her life, and the discussion that ensues includes an examination of their stormy relationship with their son, who enters and leaves without saying a word. The conversation ends with a debate about which time in their life was the happiest. A wins the argument, insisting that the end was the happiest, prompting all three to exhale. Running for 582 performances, Three Tall Women resurrected Albee's career, winning him his third Pulitzer, the New York Drama Critics Circle Award, and an Obie Lifetime Achievement Award.

Since his reemergence Albee has written the experimental and improvisatory Fragments (1993), The Play about the Baby (1998), and a homage to the sculptor Louise Nevelson entitled Occupant (2002). Marking his return to Broadway, The Goat, or Who is Sylvia? (2002) is one of Albee's most controversial plays. The play's premise centers on Martin's estranged relationship with his wife, Stevie, and homosexual son, Billy, after Martin admits to being strongly attracted to a goat named Sylvia. Referencing the ancient Greek sacrifice of a goat to the god Dionysus that precedes tragedy, the play ends as Stevie kills the goat and takes it back to their apartment. Winning a Tony Award for best play among other distinctions, the play explores the unpredictable nature of love and its often harsh consequences. In 2005 Albee received another Lifetime Achievement Award (this time from the American Theater Wing) and published a collection of essays dating back to 1960 entitled Stretching My Mind: The Collected Essays 1960 to 2005.

The Zoo Story* (1959)

The Zoo Story (Berlin, 1959; New York, 1960) is a one-act play with two characters: Peter, a middle class publishing executive reading on a bench in Central Park, and Jerry, a lonely bohemian man in his late 30s, who says he has been to the zoo. As the two talk and Jerry asks persistent questions, the audience sees how the two characters differ. In the midst of their conversation, Jerry abandons his interrogatorlike posture to deliver a lengthy monologue entitled "The Story of Jerry and the Dog,” which deals with his landlady and her black dog Jerry has bribed and poisoned. Justifying his actions, Jerry explains that his desire to make the dog understand, through acts of love and hate, is motivated by his profound isolation from man and animal alike. Peter and Jerry then fight, and Jerry ultimately intentionally impales himself on a knife in Peter’s hands. Jerry, dying, explains he planned the whole encounter, which was a reenactment of a scene he witnessed at the zoo. Albee places many of the play’s critical lines in Jerry’s mouth. Thus, his ideas and language not only critique a character but also make social statements, harsh critiques that rang sharply in a conservative age enjoying material goods and prosperity, an age focused on the home front and terrified about the cold war and the spread of communism. Notably, Jerry’s lines target Peter’s middle-class, “bourgeois” values and the conventional role Peter plays.

Thematically, The Zoo Story deals with failed communication in a complacent society characterized by anonymity. Throughout the play Jerry tries to communicate across many socially constructed boundaries, sharing with Peter his anguish, his distinctive way of knowing. Through the subtle use of foreshadowing and Jerry’s explicit linking of the situation to his confrontation with the dog, Albee suggests that the entire action of the play lies within the confines of the zoo Jerry has visited. Thus, the two characters can be seen as animals separated from one another by cages that inhibit communication. Jerry, as he announces in his first line of dialogue, is intimately acquainted with this isolation and desperately tries to convey it to Peter, a man comfortably deceived by his middle-class nuclear family status. Through Jerry’s suicide—an act motivated by his loneliness and desire to force Peter from his complacent position—Albee comments that sacrifice is essential in overcoming and conveying an understanding of the illusions that mutually bind the characters, and, by analogy, humanity. Through the exchange the two men share, Albee renders the power of art to overcome such illusions, both the ability for language to mediate the many paradoxes that the two characters embody and the power of the stage to challenge the status quo.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Jerry is a “beatnik character,” an antiestablishment, countercultural hero who resembles characters and ideas of Beat generation writers such as Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, and William Burroughs. Consult an encyclopedia or trustworthy Web site and learn about the Beats. What Beat values does Jerry portray? What outlook on society does Jerry embody? Explain your answer, giving support from the play.
2. At the conclusion of “The Story of Jerry and the Dog,” Jerry states, “I have learned that neither kindness nor cruelty by themselves, independent of each other, creates any effect beyond themselves; and I have learned that the two combined, together, at the same time, are the teaching emotion” (Zoo Story 43–44). Beyond Jerry’s treatment of the dog, what do his actions teach? Why are his actions significant?
3. Jerry claims in his dying remarks that Peter has been “dispossessed” of his bench in the process of “defending [his] honor,” that he is no longer a vegetable anymore, but an animal like Jerry (61). The predicament the two characters are left in at the end of the play is remarkably similar to George and Martha’s relation to their dead imaginary son at the close of Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? Both Peter and George and Martha have defended their dignity in the face of severe scrutiny and lost their “bench”—in the latter case, the comforting lie of having a child. Nonetheless, Albee implies in both cases that these characters have progressed in some way to a better state. What have they gained? What should we make of Jerry’s pronouncement that, in such encounters, “what is gain is loss” (44)?

The Sandbox (1960)

One of the shortest of Albee’s plays to date, The Sandbox was written for, but never performed at, the Spoleto Festival and uses several characters who later appear in The American Dream: a hostile, cruel mother; an ineffectual, powerless father; and a genuine grandmother terrorized by her own daughter. Albee dedicated The Sandbox to his recently deceased maternal grandmother, whose dramatic likeness appears in both plays. Simple characterization, a minimalist stage setting, and surreal elements characterize The Sandbox, which, with its empty dialogue and meaningless and virtually nonexistent plot, is an absurdist play that parallels the works of Samuel Beckett. As do Vladimir and Estragon in Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot (1952), Albee's Sandbox characters engage in inane conversation as they wait. While in Beckett's play the two vaudevillesque bums wait for the mysterious "Godot," who never arrives, in Albee's play the characters wait for Grandma's death.

A one-act play taking less than 15 minutes to perform, The Sandbox takes place on a beach where a handsome Young Man exercises behind a large raked sandbox. He says hello to Mommy and Daddy, who arrive with Grandma and have a Musician to ease Grandma's dying in the sandbox, her resting place. After telling the audience about her sad past and talking with the Young Man about his biceps and acting, Grandma buries herself in sand and plays dead so Mommy and Daddy will leave. After they depart swiftly, Grandma, who resembles Winnie, the central character of Samuel Beckett's Happy Days (1960) buried in sand throughout the play, realizes she cannot move under the sand she has piled on herself. At this point, the Young Man tells Grandma he is the Angel of Death and kisses her on the forehead; she dies after consoling him about his acting ability.

Contributing to the play's absurdity, the actors break character and comment upon the play itself. In literary studies this technique is often called self-reflexivity or self-referentiality, a technique that calls attention to the way the play is constructed and breaks with realistic conventions. The result of using such techniques is that the audience reflects on the artificiality of the play. While such devices can be found in literature from all ages, including William's Shakespeare's Hamlet (1603), in which the title character enacts a play within a play to comment upon the action taking place, this technique is one of the hallmarks of postmodern style. Toward the middle of the play, Grandma, cruelly ignored by her family, addresses the audience to complain about how she is being treated (149). After "breaking the fourth wall" (a phrase referring to the usual, invisible barrier between stage and audience), Grandma proceeds to talk with the Young Man in a manner that slowly reveals that they are aware of being actors on a stage. This culminates in the Young Man's hilarious line: "Uh . . . ma'am; I . . . I have a line here" (157).

The most interesting example of self-awareness in the play is Grandma's direction of lighting cues. For example, she commands that it be nighttime by shouting offstage, "Shouldn't it be getting dark now dear?" (152). These acts demonstrate that Grandma is fully aware: When addressing the audience or controlling the set, Grandma sees past the illusion of her situation and is able to interact with it. In a play filled with the clichéd and unconvincing language of Mommy and Daddy, only Grandma's lines contain genuine emotion: Her language is expressive when she tells the audience about her suffering or uses her last breath to comfort the Young Man. Though she does not control her fate in the ceremony, a ceremony presided over by Mommy, Grandma interacts with everyone in the theater.

Defined by the initial stage note as having "names [empty of] affection [that] point up the pre-senility and vacuity of their characters," Mommy and Daddy are cruel, boring people (143). Like Grandma, they are modeled after Albee's parents Frances and Reed. Mommy, resembling Albee's descriptions of Frances, tries to orchestrate her mother's death. Daddy, who is submissive to Mommy for the entire play aside from the occasional selfish whine, captures Reed's nonpresence in Albee's life.

Neither Mommy nor Daddy is given much depth. Even their dialogue reveals nothing further about their personalities. As they sit down and wait for Grandma to die, Daddy tries to start a conversation, which ends quickly when both he and Mommy recognize they have nothing to talk about. This inability to communicate, a common thread in Albee's plays, shows how hollow people can be when they are content to accept the role society has offered them. Their complacency prevents the couple from hearing anything that Grandma says save indecipherable outbursts that sound like “a cross between a baby’s laugh and cry” (147). If regarded in terms of each character’s breaking of dramatic convention, this hollowness also prevents Mommy from controlling the scene according to her desires as Grandma does. Though the death ceremony continues onstage according to Grandma’s directions, Mommy can only hear offstage events and follow the script of a “grieving daughter.” Her lack of depth and myopic vision are clear as she repeatedly speaks “over” the audience when addressing it (148–149).

As Grandma announces to the audience, the couple do not respect her. She describes how Mommy and Daddy were “decent” enough to make a place for her under the stove in their large townhouse. Mommy and Daddy treat Grandma sadistically. As they would a troublesome pet, they put her in a pen and ignore her.

Mommy and Daddy’s cruelty and inability to communicate fully have the same source: They live exclusively in the illusion created by their social expectations. Going through the motions of taking care of Grandma and eventually laying her to rest, neither of them is capable of caring except when it is necessary for them to maintain a facade. Mommy’s fit of tears at the first “offstage rumble” is a prime example of this type of ignorance: Mommy knows her cue to start mourning, whispering through her new-found tears, “It means the time has come for poor Grandma . . . and I can’t bear it!” (153–154). As soon as daylight officially marks the end of their “long night” of mourning, Mommy and Daddy take a brief look at Grandma’s corpse, convince themselves that she is happy, and then go about their business.

The Sandbox is, along with The American Dream, A Delicate Balance, and Three Tall Women, one of Albee’s most autobiographical plays. Even after the meteoric success of the three-hour Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf?, Albee maintained in interviews that The Sandbox was his best work. Indebted to absurdist playwrights like Samuel Beckett and Eugene Ionesco, The Sandbox conveys the paradoxical nature of the human condition. Critical of American culture’s lack of authentic engagement and the treatment of the elderly, Albee presents a poignant depiction of a woman who is able to see through illusions but unable to change her fate.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In The American Dream, the Young Man is actually Mommy and Daddy’s son. How does this reflect on the interactions and similarities between the couple and the no-name pretty boy in The Sandbox?
2. George, in Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf?, takes the play to a close by dispelling illusions. He does this by symbolically killing and burying an imaginary son. Though Mommy and Daddy perform a similar ritual in The Sandbox, the insensitivity they demonstrate in the ceremony remains intact. Compare these death rituals and their respective consequences.
3. In the process of dying, Grandma seems to be the liveliest character in the play. What does Albee convey to the audience through her portrayal?
4. Explore the significance of the surreal elements in the play. As noted, the unrealistic quality of these elements distances the play from the everyday, but why does Albee, for instance, specifically choose a beach setting? Or a sandbox as a deathbed?
5. By having characters break established dramatic convention, Albee involves his audience in the action of the play. Discuss how this affects The Sandbox’s deviation from realism and its social commentary.

Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf?* (1962)

Consisting of three acts spanning more than three hours, Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? was Albee’s first attempt at a full-length play and drew much attention during its long run on Broadway. Though widely recognized as a pivotal work in American drama, Woolf has polarized critics since its debut, often provoking charges of nihilism and immorality due to the play's ambiguous ending, its profanity, its disturbing depiction of a perverse marriage characterized by vicious psychological attacks, and its scathing critique of American culture. Despite or rather because of these aspects, Wolf is one of Albee's most highly regarded works and defined the rest of his career.

Albee originally intended to call the play The Exorcism. But he recalled seeing "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" scrawled on a mirror behind a bar in Greenwich Village and changed the title while working on a draft. Seemingly random, the title, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf, is somewhat misleading: Virginia Woolf, a famous British modernist known for her innovative and groundbreaking novels, appears to have little to do with the play itself. This superficial disparity is not insurmountable: The characters in the play cope as illusion and reality are blurred and then unraveled, a characteristic shared by much of Virginia Woolf's fiction. This unraveling, painful and traumatic, forces the characters as well as the audience to question what they believe to be true.

Set in the fictional town of New Carthage, the play begins as George and Martha return home at two in the morning from a dinner party at the house of Martha's father. George is a history professor at the college that his father-in-law oversees. George does not know that Martha has invited Nick, a handsome new biology professor, and his wife, Honey, over for a cocktail. George and Martha exchange insults over a drink before the guests' arrival and, after very brief pleasantries, drag Nick and Honey into the verbal brawl as well. Massive amounts of alcohol are consumed during the "fun and games" that follow. To use George's metaphor, by the end of act 2 each character has been peeled to the bone. Profane, witty, and merciless, these exchanges get out of hand; Martha and Nick commit adultery. The melee ends in act 3 as George announces that the son he and Martha have referred to throughout the night has been killed in an automobile accident. George's announcement is intended to reveal that their son does not exist; he is a fiction they have both created as a sort of comforting "bean bag" (Albee 98). Nick and Honey then exit, leaving George and Martha to go upstairs together at dawn, unsure about the future. The question "Who's afraid of Virginia Woolf?" repeated throughout the play in recitations of a nursery rhyme is finally answered by Martha: "I . . . am . . . George . . . I . . . am." (Albee 242).

Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? primarily examines the relationship between George and Martha. The play centers on their failure to communicate and often-sadistic attempts to get through to one another. George is a run-down history professor who never made a "splash" at the college; Martha resents him for not being the protégé her aging father needs to continue his legacy. George's professional failure, according to Martha, is due to a lack of "guts," leading her to such statements as "if you existed I'd divorce you" (Albee 16). Six years George's senior, Martha is a braying alcoholic who has lived under the shadow of her father for most of her life. Desperately wanting a child, Martha frequently mentions her "son" in an attempt to cope with her inability to have one.

Conversely, Nick and Honey initially possess many of the wholesome and desirable qualities that George and Martha lack. A fit and youthful biology professor specializing in genetics, Nick is ambitious and epitomizes the qualities Martha looks for in George. Honey is similarly imbued with qualities that Martha lacks, seemingly supportive and non-confrontational. The superficial well-being of the younger couple is demolished during the course of the evening. We learn at the beginning of act 2 that Nick was forced to marry Honey by a false pregnancy and was partially motivated to do so by her large inheritance. Nick's depravity is fully realized when he has sex with Martha at the end of act 2 in order to secure his advancement at the college. Honey, an innocent victim for most of the play, is revealed to have been using birth control without Nick's knowledge because she is afraid of the pain accompanying childbirth.

All of these intimate details are made known during the four "games" that transpire: "Humiliate the Host," "Get the Guests," "Hump the Hostess,” and “Bringing Up Baby” (Albee 140, 214). Motivated primarily by vindictiveness and revenge, the games strip the illusory façade each character hides behind. George explicitly describes this process of revealing in visceral terms during the third act: the games are like the act of peeling labels off a bottle, except the games peel off layers of skin and muscle to reveal bone and, finally, marrow (Albee 212–213).

With the exception of “Hump the Hostess,” the games in Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? strip away the characters’ disguises by blurring the boundary between reality and illusion. “Humiliate the Host,” for instance, takes a chain of events and moves it back and forth across this boundary. When they are left alone, George tells Nick a purportedly true story about a college chum who accidentally kills both of his parents. Later on, Martha reveals it is the plot of George’s novel. After a pause, Martha says that the novel was autobiographical. The story moves from being real, to being fiction, and back again. George’s response, “Get the Guests,” involves the same sort of transformation: After hearing Nick’s disclosure of the circumstances surrounding his marriage to Honey, George provides the group with a summary of his second novel. The summary is exactly what Nick confided to George earlier. Again, reality and fiction meld.

The revealing function of these vicious interactions is hinted at in Albee’s title for the second act. Walpurgisnacht is a term from German folklore originally denoting a ritual congregation of witches that took place on May Day Eve. During these rites pagan gods were summoned and celebrated. After Christianity spread to Germany, the holiday represented a purging of evil spirits, coinciding with spring’s final victory over winter. Similarly, Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? is a ritual where psychological demons are unearthed.

The ritualistic aspect of the play is most clearly seen in the final game “Bringing Up Baby,” where George and Martha narrate the details of their imaginary son’s childhood while George recites a Roman Catholic burial chant in Latin from the Requiem Mass. Their fabricated story leads to a vicious argument over who is to blame for their son’s absence and leads to a sustained finale: Speaking together, George recites the requiem as Martha proclaims that the only hope she has had in the “darkness” of their marriage is their son. George then “exorcises” him, announcing that a telegram has come reporting his death.

Finally at the “marrow,” Albee leaves George and Martha with nothing: What has been revealed at their core turns out to be an illusion. All that remains after the exorcism are mutual fear and doubt. Furthermore, everything preceding the exorcism is called into question since the distinction between illusion and reality in the play has been blurred so thoroughly. The fact that George makes his son die under circumstances similar to events in his autobiography underscores this. Albee, however, does seem to hint that George and Martha will go on to construct another illusion in place of their dead “son.” But, as Martha’s ambivalent responses to George indicate, Albee leaves the ending of Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? ambiguous, open to interpretation.

The demons exorcised during this ritual are not solely autobiographical. Albee implies that certain characters—George and Nick particularly—represent general aspects of history, culture, and philosophical thought. Albee has admitted that he named George and Martha after George and Martha Washington, the first president and first lady of the United States. Nick, on the other hand, was named after the cold war–era Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev. Premiering during the same month as the Cuban missile crisis, Albee’s play contains political allusions that are impossible to miss. Nick’s namesake held the fate of the world in his hands just as the United States threatened military action against Cuba for having Soviet-manned nuclear missile batteries on its territory, an event that marked the height of cold war hostilities.

This political allusion is strengthened by George’s argument against what he perceives to be the threat Nick and his scientific colleagues represent to humanity. Once it is established that Nick conducts genetics research, George levels the accusation: “You people are rearranging my genes, so that everyone will be like everyone else” (Albee 37). He goes further, portraying Nick as an example of a new generation of scientists who will alter the human race, eradicating unwanted genetic traits, and, according to George, destroying individuality and ethnic diversity in the process. The emergence of this “race of glorious men” made in Nick’s image will produce an end to the arts as well as the chaotic “sea-changing rhythm of . . . history” (Albee 66–67). The notion that history can be made sense of through scientific reasoning, the systematic censorship of art, and the privileging of state concerns over individual rights are just a few issues common to both George’s rants against Nick and prevalent criticisms of Soviet-style communism.

Putting Nick’s namesake aside, these hyperbolic accusations redefine George and Nick’s characters in other important ways. Young and ambitious, Nick embodies the future, with the scientific drive to find and make order. Older and jaded by past failures, George embodies history and the recognition of its disorderliness. With these perspectives Albee presents two differing aspects or views of civilization: one sees (perhaps naively) inevitable progress; the other remains skeptical of prolonged success. This is most forcefully hinted at in act 2 when George recites a passage from a similarly themed philosophical text he has been reading, Oswald Spengler’s The Decline of the West (1918) (Albee 174).

The historical and philosophical allusions, though only hinted at and therefore incomplete, add significance to other elements in the play. By making George and Martha (the first couple) childless, Albee comments on the notion that there is a trouble-free existence awaiting those who blindly conform to the American dream. This allegory is particularly sophisticated because it captures a sense of the complacency and ignorance that develop from holding ideals that are impossible to attain. Until “The Exorcism” Albee’s couple propagates a lie that does not satisfy their needs because they are afraid to start over, to admit that there is nothing in their relationship but themselves. The lie causes strife and selfish conflict until it is finally purged, revealing George and Martha alone, finally communicating with one other and fearing what the future will entail. Albee suggests that American culture needs a similar purging, a reassessment during which illusions passing for truth can be reevaluated. In the process of this expurgation, a common humanity might be more clearly recognized.

For Discussion or Writing

1. When the curtains close, the end that George precipitates calls everything in the world of the play into question. After numerous illusions are shed, George reveals that what is left—the “marrow”—is in fact fictitious. This, in effect, turns the play into an illusion filled with illusions. How does this change the role of an audience? Does it place the audience closer to the characters (who are themselves an audience of sorts), or does it do something else? Justify your answer.
2. Martha’s character defies many of the prescribed gender roles prevalent in 1962. Though many of her traits would still be considered deplorable, especially her alcoholism and infidelity, in what ways does her character anticipate changes in contemporary gender roles? In what ways does Martha seem trapped in traditional ideas of womanhood?
3. Should George view Nick and his fellow scientists as enemies? The dangers of technology and how it might be misused continue to be debated, especially with regard to genetic research. Does Who’s Afraid of Woolf? have anything to offer to these debates? If so, what? Explain.
4. In Albee’s The Zoo Story (1959) Jerry speaks of “the teaching emotion.” This emotion is the product of both love and hatred. Jerry tries to evoke this emotion in Peter so that they can really communicate. There are many instances in Woolf where characters speak about communication. How does the “teaching emotion” fit into the play’s characters’ interactions? Does Peter

- , ed. The Cambridge Companion to Edward Albee. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Brustein, Robert. The Theatre of Revolt: An Approach to Modern Drama. Boston: Little, Brown, 1964.
- Cohn, Ruby. Edward Albee. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1969.
- Davis, J. Madison, and Philip C. Kolin, eds. Critical Essays on Edward Albee. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1986.
- Debusscher, Gilbert. Edward Albee: Tradition and Renewal. Brussels: Center for American Studies, 1969.
- Debusscher, Gilbert et al., eds. News Essays on American Drama. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1989.
- De La Fuente, Patricia et al., eds. Edward Albee: Planted Wilderness: Interview, Essays, and Bibliography. Edinburg, Tex.: Pan American University, 1980.
- “Edward Albee News—The New York Times.” New York Times. 27 June 2006. Available online. URL: http://topics.nytimes.com/top/reference/timestopics/people/a/edward_albee/index.html. Accessed March 25, 2009.
- Esslin, Martin. The Theatre of the Absurd. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1961, 225–227.
- Giantvalley, Scott. Edward Albee: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987.
- Gussow, Mel. Edward Albee: A Singular Journey: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999.
- Hayman, Ronald. Edward Albee. New York: Ungar, 1973.
- Hirsch, Foster. Who's Afraid of Edward Albee? Berkeley, Calif.: Creative Arts, 1978.
- Jenckes, Norma, ed. American Drama 2, no. 2 (Spring 1993). Special edition of journal dedicated to essays on Albee.
- Kolin, Philip, and C. J. Madison Davis, ed. Critical Essays on Edward Albee. Boston: Hall, 1986.
- Luere, Jeane. “Terror and Violence in Edward Albee? From Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? to Marriage Play.” South Central Review 7, no. 1 (Spring 1990): 50–58.
- Mann, Bruce J, ed. Edward Albee: A Casebook. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- McCarthy, Gerry. Edward Albee. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1987.
- Nilan, Mary M. “Albee's The Zoo Story: Alienated Man and the Nature of Love.” Modern Drama 16 (1973): 55–59.
- Paolucci, Anne. From Tension to Tonic: The Plays of Edward Albee. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1972.
- Post, Robert M. “Salvation or Damnation? Death in the Plays of Edward Albee.” American Drama 2, no. 2 (Spring 1993): 32–49.
- Roudané, Matthew C. “Communication as Therapy in the Theater of Edward Albee.” Journal of Evolutionary Psychology 6, nos. 3/4 (August 1985): 302–314.
- . Understanding Edward Albee. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1987.
- . Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?: Necessary Fictions, Terrifying Realities. Boston: Twayne, 1990.
- Rutenberg, Michael E. Edward Albee: Playwright in Protest. New York: Avon Books, 1970.
- Sarotte, Georges-Michel. “Edward Albee: Homosexual Playwright in Spite of Himself.” In Like a Brother, Like a Lover: Male Homosexuality in the American Novel and Theater from Herman Melville to James Baldwin. Translated by Richard Miller. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978.
- Solomon, Rakesh H. “Crafting Script into Performance: Edward Albee in Rehearsal.” American Drama 2, no. 2 (Spring 1993): 76–99.
- . “Text, Subtext, and Performance: Edward Albee on Directing Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?” Theatre Survey 34, no. 2 (November 1993): 95–110.
- Stenz, Anita Marie. Edward Albee: The Poet of Loss. New York: Mouton, 1978.
- Vos, Nelvin. Eugene Ionesco and Edward Albee: A Critical Essay. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1968.
- Wallace, Robert S. “The Zoo Story: Albee's Attack on Fiction.” Modern Drama 16 (1973): 49–54.
- Wasserman, Julian N. et al., eds. Edward Albee: An Interview and Essays. Houston: University of St. Thomas, 1983.

John Becker

JAMES BALDWIN (1924–1987)

For, while the tale of how we suffer, and how we are delighted, and how we triumph is never new, it always must be heard. There isn't any other tale to tell, it's the only light we've got in all this darkness.

("Sonny's Blues")

James Baldwin was born in Harlem, August 2, 1924, the son of Emma Berdis Jones and a father whose name he never knew. David Baldwin, a figure who looms large in Baldwin's life and work, adopted him three years later. This powerful figure was the source of the central conflict in Baldwin's life; Baldwin felt that he withheld his approval and love, thus fueling Baldwin's lifelong quest for approval. In one of his most famous essays, "Notes of a Native Son," he begins to gain a compassionate understanding of the difficulties of his father's life and of the lessons for Baldwin, as an adult, from that life. Furthermore, their relationship becomes a metaphor for his relationship with his home country, "America, the Land of the Free." Throughout his work, especially the early work, Baldwin insists on two things he learned in those relationships: that truth—difficult, heart-breaking truth—and love, difficult and heartbreaking, must be embraced at whatever cost.

Baldwin learned additional lessons about love and constancy in his home. He had eight younger half brothers and sisters, for whom he helped his mother care. In several accounts of his life, his mother is quoted as describing him with "a book in one hand and the latest baby in the other." His mother constantly supported him in his pursuit of learning about life beyond their narrow world, while his father (he always referred to David Baldwin as his father rather than his stepfather) disapproved of his involvement in books, movies, and "worldly" activities in general.

Luckily his mother was not his only support. Early on Baldwin attracted the attention and help of people who responded to his gifts by helping him develop and increase them.

He found his first help of this kind in Harlem's Public School 24, where the principal, Gertrude Ayer (the first black principal of the New York school system) noted his academic talent and encouraged Orilla Miller (Bill was her nickname), a young white woman assigned through work with the Works Progress Administration (WPA) to assist in this school, to give him special attention and help. His father was resistant, but, according to Baldwin, because she was white, his father found it difficult to forbid his son the opportunities she provided, such as attending plays and movies, among other "worldly enrichments." She also assisted the family, in the midst of the depression, through at least one very difficult winter. Baldwin credits this relationship with Bill Miller for preventing him from ever truly hating and condemning the white race. Bill's interaction with him and his family was an antidote to the harshness of his daily encounters in Harlem with whites such as the police.

His second set of mentor-teachers discovered him in their midst at Frederick Douglass Junior High School: Countee Cullen (a poet famous in his own right during the Harlem Renaissance) and Herman Porter (perhaps less famous but no less influential for the young Baldwin). Cullen was the adviser of the Douglass Literary Club and Porter of the school magazine, which Baldwin contributed to and edited. Cullen commented on his writing, and Porter, among other things, claimed credit for introducing Baldwin to the 42nd Street library, thus enlarging his reading sphere (also over his father's objections). By this age, Baldwin's passion for reading and writing began to blossom. Among his favorite books were Dickens's A Tale of Two Cities (1859) and Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), which he later astutely critiqued in one of his famous essays about the inherent weaknesses of protest literature. He is said to have read these two, in particular, repeatedly. He also began to read the works of Henry James and other notable literary talents during this time, all of which later provided both models and inspiration for his own work.

But it was while he was editing and writing for the DeWitt High School magazine, The Magpie, that one of his peers introduced him to a man who confirmed and validated his dedication to the arts—Beauford Delaney, an African-American painter living at that time in Greenwich Village. He credits Delaney with teaching him how to see. They remained lifelong friends, meeting again in Paris several years later.

Perhaps Baldwin's most famous mentor, however, was Richard Wright, whom he met in the early 1940s (sources cite both 1943 and 1944 as the year they met). Wright's recommendation secured Baldwin a Eugene Saxton Memorial Trust Award in 1945. Baldwin essentially followed Wright to Paris, where both writers joined a colony of African-American writers and artists. The expatriate community in Paris in those days included an international group of writers and artists. But African-American artists and musicians felt even more strongly that Paris provided them with greater freedom to pursue their arts than the United States. Once there, however, the two writers had a major parting of the ways; Baldwin published two essays in which he severely criticized Wright's Native Son ("Everybody's Protest Novel" and "Many Thousands Gone"). Before this breach, while still in the United States, Wright's influence, among other factors, helped him get his first reviews as a critic published in the Nation, the New Leader and Commentary. In 1947–48 Baldwin published 17 reviews and essays in these journals. In 1948, both his first essay ("The Harlem Ghetto") and his first short story ("Previous Condition") were published in Commentary. This work, plus the support of influential friends like Wright, helped him secure the Rosenwald Fellowship in 1948. He used the money to purchase his ticket to Paris, where he claims to have arrived with only $40 and a Bessie Smith record to begin his life as an expatriate.

In 1953 with the publication of his first novel, Go Tell It on the Mountain, his literary career began to receive public and critical attention. For the next few years, Baldwin experimented with different genres—fiction, essays, and plays—and he continued to explore questions of identity from the vantage point of his French surroundings.

Baldwin's first stint as an expatriate ended, however, in 1957, when he returned to the United States. By that time, he had successfully published two novels and a collection of essays, so his work as a writer was established. In addition, during the time he had been mostly absent from the United States (except for a brief return around 1954 to participate in the staging of his play Amen Corner by Owen Dodson and the Howard Players), the Civil Rights movement was gaining momentum from the Montgomery bus boycott and the Supreme Court ruling ending segregation in the public schools. He had read and heard about these events and was drawn to learn more about this struggle. An editor proposed that he tour the South (his first venture there) and write a series of essays about his own observations. His participation in the movement began with this trip and continued throughout the remainder of his life. He met and worked with many leaders of the struggle, from MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., and Medgar Evers to MALCOLM X. His association with these figures, as well as the interviews he conducted with the young people integrating schools throughout the South and with the people he met and listened to behind closed doors as he traveled with Evers to investigate a murder of a black man fueled his work over the next decade. His response to what he saw and heard in those days is nowhere more vividly expressed than in his The Fire Next Time, a text that earned for him the labels "prophet" and "witness." During this period (until about the end of the 1970s), Baldwin divided his time among many places, but he was in the States as much as he was out of them. He contributed to the civil rights movement by his presence as well as by extensive lecturing in an effort to raise money for the struggle. This activity in addition to his essays and continued writing (he produced another novel and two additional essay collections as well as another play—Blues for Mr. Charlie specifically in response to the Emmett Till murder) made this the period of his greatest fame.

Yet Baldwin's search for truth and identity did not end with coming to terms with his identity as an African American. Early in his stay in Paris, he noted the differences in outlook and experience of the Africans he met. He continued to ponder these differences during his many travels from continent to continent, including his first trip to Africa in 1962. Baldwin used his travels, especially his times out of the United States, as times to complete more work and as refuges for rethinking his observations and concerns about life and race relations. Even in Africa, his thoughts seemed to focus on what he was learning and beginning to understand his American identity more deeply.

Baldwin's career can be roughly divided into three parts—his early works (the late 1940s through late 1950s), the middle period (the 1960s and 1970s), and the late work (the 1980s). In the first part of his career, his exploration of identity focuses on the personal, trying to discover who he really is as a person and how that personal identity relates to anything larger. This is especially captured in the title essay of his first collection, "Notes of a Native Son." The second phase of his work encompasses the political upheaval of the Civil Rights movement and its aftermath in the black revolutionary movement. By this time, Baldwin was an established writer, adding his voice eloquently to those calling for the end of segregation and for full equality. His work during this period has a decidedly more political edge but continues to be rooted in his actual, lived experience and the contemplation of that experience. His work from this period often focuses on the experiences of other African Americans he interviewed, observed, and lived among during that time. This work also reveals a growing disillusionment with the idea that America will change its ways. Works like The Fire Next Time represent this phase. But by the third and last part of his career, he focused on young people and on necessary social change. Works like his novel If Beale Street Could Talk, with its two young protagonists, articulate his concerns for the future.

Baldwin's place in the literary pantheon was captured in the massive funeral held for him at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in 1987. Many celebrities, writers, artists, politicians, and dignitaries participated, including a representative of the French government, which had awarded him the Legion of Honor in 1986. Notably, the United States conferred no similar honor on its native son; nor was there a representative of the American publishing industry in the proceedings. Yet writers as diverse as Maya Angelou, Toni Morrison, and Amiri Baraka paid tribute to him at his funeral, acknowledging the powerful witness of his words, both spoken and written, throughout his life.

For a time, Baldwin's works were overpowered as the subject of critical study as African-American literary artists and the accompanying scholars produced a wave of work. But somewhere toward the end of the 1990s, critical interest in Baldwin's work began gaining momentum, assisted by the interest in both queer studies and in cultural studies. Intersectionality became a popular term in critical circles. An approach to sociology, cultural studies, and other social sciences connected with activism and social work, intersectionality describes how differences based on race, ethnicity, gender, religion, sexuality, and class act together. Almost all of Baldwin's work examines the connections among identities: African American, gay, American, expatriate, artist, political activist, and critic. His work is being reexamined through the lens of cross-culturalism or transnationality. This critical study is providing new and interesting ways to consider his texts as well as his life.

Baldwin left a rich body of work, including six novels (Go Tell It on the Mountain, Giovanni's Room, Another Country, Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone, If Beale Street Could Talk, and Just above My Head) and a short story collection (Going to Meet the Man). He also published four essay collections (Notes of a Native Son, Nobody Knows My Name, The Fire Next Time, No Name in the Street), two long essays (The Devil Finds Work and The Evidence of Things Not Seen), two plays (Blues for Mr. Charlie, The Amen Corner). His work also includes a children's book (Little Man, Little Man: A Story of Childhood) and two book-length conversations (A Rap on Race with Margaret Mead and A Dialogue with Nikki Giovanni) plus additional texts, 22 titles altogether.

Much of what James Baldwin writes is rooted in the autobiographical, which then becomes the occasion for meditation on broader issues. He focuses on discovering identity, on the nature and effects of racism for both the oppressor and the oppressed, on the necessity of facing our collective past as Americans and as individuals, and the power of love. He called himself a “witness” and was hailed by others as a prophet in the Old Testament tradition, calling us to acknowledge our individual and collective sins against each other, especially in the arena of race, and warning us of impending destruction should we fail to heed the call and change our ways. David Leeming, one of Baldwin's biographers, writing about Baldwin's Notes of a Native Son, identifies common themes throughout Baldwin's work: “the search for identity in a world that because of its racial myths cannot recognize reality; the acceptance of one's inheritance (‘the conundrum of color is the inheritance of every American’) as one claims one's birthright (‘my birthright was vast, connecting me to all that lives, and to everyone, forever,’ the loneliness of the artist's quest, the urgent necessity of love” (100).

Go Tell It on The Mountain* (1953)

Alfred Knopf published James Baldwin's first novel in 1953. It is one of Baldwin's best known and highest praised works, closely patterned after his own life. Set primarily in two Harlem locations—the crowded tenement apartment John shares with his family and storefront church of which they are members—this is 14-year-old John Grimes's coming of age story. The novel begins as John awakens on the morning of his 14th birthday and continues to the following morning. In the ensuing time, John has several important insights, culminating in his salvation on the “threshing floor” and ending in the ambiguous promise of new horizons for him. The key characters are John; his father, Gabriel; and his mother, Elizabeth. Other significant figures include his brother, Roy; his aunt, Florence (his father's sister); and the “saints” of the church, including Elisha.

The story of John and Gabriel locked in conflict frames and shapes the story. Gabriel is complex, a self-righteous man who has answered a call to the ministry. When we meet him, his preaching days are nearly over (he seems unable to avoid alienating everyone with whom he has contact), but he is a formidable elder in this small congregation. His favorite text is “As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.” For Gabriel this involves adhering strictly to a fundamentalist view of Christianity that forbids all worldly pleasures (such as going to movies) and limits contact with the world. With the additional restrictions imposed on life by poverty and racism, John and his whole family live in a narrow world from which he rebels, as his brother Roy does.

In the course of the novel, we discover that Gabriel married Elizabeth, whose son, John, had been born out of wedlock. John, however, does not know this, yet he is aware of the difference in the ways Gabriel treats him and his younger brother and sister (both Gabriel's biological children). Although Gabriel initially agreed to raise John as his own (and he does provide for him and labors to raise him well by his lights), he cannot seem to escape his sense of John's having been born in sin. Because of Gabriel's attitude toward him, John's life is complicated by the struggle for his father's attention and approval, both unavailable to him. John finds some relief, however, through his school life and his imaginative life (stirred by the books and movies his father would forbid him) and in the company of friends like Elisha, his slightly older role model at church.

But such relief is not enough. As the story unfolds and the pressures of his life continue to build, we become aware that John is facing a crisis. Entering puberty causes him to be acutely aware of his body, and at the same time he becomes just as acutely aware of the constraints of his poverty and race on him and his fellow Harlemites. He sees the boys and girls he has grown up with changing in front of him, menaced by the street life that surrounds them. He hears the urgent warnings of the saints about the perils and pitfalls of worldly life, and he is afraid—filled with a sense of dread and a conviction of his sinfulness. These pressures and the growing animosity between him and his father catapult John into the emotionally charged atmosphere in the church on the evening of his birthday. He is seeking safety and relief and being urged toward salvation by the joint efforts of all the saints. In response to the complex emotions at war both inside and outside him, he finds himself on the “threshing floor,” literally fighting for his life (and soul, according to the saints). When he rises, we are led to believe he has achieved a new position, but the story ends a bit ominously as he faces his unsmiling father, announcing, “I’m ready. . . . I’m coming. I’m on my way.”

This is not simply a story of one young man’s salvation, but a complex narrative providing insight into the way the past shapes the present. Baldwin accomplishes some of this through the stories of Florence, Gabriel, and Elizabeth. They, too, were young people enmeshed in a variety of circumstances from which they struggled to extricate themselves. In the present, they each continue to wrestle with private longings and contradictions as well as their inability to express the longings of their hearts clearly. Their inarticulateness also grows out of a fear of facing their demons. One of Baldwin’s concerns, one that he returns to several times, is the grief characters bring on themselves, but most unforgivably on those they love, when they willingly deceive themselves. This “willed innocence” he describes as a great sin, exploring its ramifications more deeply in his second novel, Giovanni’s Room.

Go Tell It on the Mountain also comments on religion, especially the highly emotional brand of fundamental Christianity portrayed through this storefront church. He implies some hypocrisy here and a good deal of fear. In a scene where young Elisha and Ella Mae are called out in front of the church family for their innocent attentions to each other, it seems clear that this way of worshipping driven by fear precludes normal interaction. Both young people have had spotless reputations to that point and seem simply to enjoy each other’s company. However, afterward, Ella seems hurt and distanced from the group. Baldwin also captures the enormous pressure the saints exert on John to be saved. They almost force him, it seems, to clutch at this “salvation” to save himself from the normal confusions and rites of passage of adolescence. But several questions remain: What is John being saved from? What is he really submitting to? What type of salvation is this anyway?

For Discussion or Writing

1. The final scene of the novel, on the threshing floor, is a long and complex one. Reread it carefully and identify the stages through which John progresses. How does Baldwin “mark” each stage? How does he indicate the onset of the next stage? Can you identify a “focus” for each of these stages?
2. Florence, Elizabeth, and Gabriel all have their own chapter conveying their individual stories. What patterns can you identify among them? How does a comparison of their circumstances provide a deeper insight into John’s story? Explain each response.
3. One way that Baldwin has of making the central conflict clearer is by mirroring it in several smaller scenes. For example, Gabriel’s lover and the birth of his unacknowledged son, Royal, mirror Elizabeth’s pregnancy and John’s illegitimacy. In an ironic way, the legitimate status of Deborah (Gabriel’s first wife) and her barrenness also mirror and comment on this whole issue. Locate other major concerns or issues presented in the novel that are clarified by these mirrored segments.
4. The novel is divided into three parts. Each part begins with a quote and in part 2, “The Prayers of the Saints,” each saint’s prayer begins with a different quote. Select one of these quotes:
 - (a) Explain what you think the quote means. What questions does the quote raise? What ideas about the story does the quote suggest? Use what you know about how the story ends.

- (b) Reread the section introduced by that quote. After rereading it, compare your expectations to what you found. How has focusing on the quote affected your rereading?
- The book uses references to traditional Christianity throughout. John, Gabriel, Elizabeth, Esther, Elisha, and Deborah are all biblical characters. Choose any one of them, and research their biblical counterpart. For example, Deborah is mentioned in the Old Testament. What is her story there? How does her biblical story compare with the Deborah character in the novel? What does it help you understand the points Baldwin seems to be making? Why or why not?
 - Go Tell It on the Mountain* belongs to a literary tradition called “the coming of age” story, or Bildungsroman, a novel that chronicles its protagonist’s development, his or her “education” in the world. What other stories, movies, and plays can you think of that have young characters coming of age, typically young teenagers moving toward adulthood? Identify two other stories like this (e.g., Jacob Have I Loved by Katherine Paterson or Star Wars, either episodes 4–6 or 1–3). What are the main issues with which each character struggles? Are those struggles completely resolved by the end of the story? If so, how? Can you figure out a pattern of such stories? How does thinking about this type of story help you understand the novel?
 - John goes through a crisis at the end of the novel, but in part 2, Florence, Gabriel, and Elizabeth all experience crises as well. How does each meet that individual crisis? What does the nature of each crisis as well as the way in which each character handles his or her crisis reveal about that character?
 - The big question at the end of the novel is “How real is John’s salvation?” Divide into teams to defend one of the following: “John is truly ‘saved’ in both the spiritual and the psychological way.” Or “John’s ‘salvation’ is not real. It is another desperate act that will deepen the conflicts he is already facing.” Remember to use the text as evidence.

Notes of a Native Son* (1955)

“One writes out of one thing only—one’s own experience. Everything depends on how relentlessly one forces from this experience the last drop, sweet or bitter, it can possibly give. This is the only real concern of the artist, to recreate out of the disorder of life that order which is art.” In this quotation, from the “Autobiographical Notes” in Notes of a Native Son, Baldwin describes the inspiration for all his work, both fiction and nonfiction. His essays often had a greater impact and, in general, garnered higher praise than most of his other work, with the exception of his first two novels. What continues to attract readers to these essays is Baldwin’s willingness to probe his own life so deeply, examining the darkest corners, but not in a confessional way. He examines his life experiences and his responses to them for the lessons they can teach him and for the ways they can illuminate his connection to the world.

In 1955 Beacon Press published this collection, but many of the essays in it had been published earlier. The collection comprises the following works, in the order in which they appear in the text, with their original dates of publication in parentheses:

PART 1

- “Everybody’s Protest Novel” (1949)
- “Many Thousands Gone” (1951)
- “Carmen Jones: The Dark Is Light Enough” (1955)

PART 2

- “The Harlem Ghetto” (1948)
- “Journey to Atlanta” (1948)
- “Notes of a Native Son” (1955)

PART 3

- “Encounter on the Seine: Black Meets Brown” (1950)
- “A Question of Identity” (1954)
- “Equal in Paris” (1955)
- “Stranger in the Village” (1953)

Baldwin’s biographer and critic David Leeming comments on the collection’s form and themes: “Notes of a Native Son is divided into three parts. The first is concerned with the identity of the ‘Negro’ and with the African American as artist. The second contains three essays on black life in America, culminating in the great autobiographical essay ‘Notes of a Native Son,’ which is the record of a painful search for self as well as for ethnic identity. The last part is made up of four essays written to America from the expatriate in Europe” (102).

The two essays that open the book, “Everybody’s Protest Novel” and “Many Thousands Gone,” helped establish Baldwin’s reputation early in his career; he uses them to analyze and critique the work of the literary giant Richard Wright. In “Everybody’s Protest Novel,” he examines the limits of that form for artistic expression, looking specifically at Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin and at Wright’s Native Son. Both novels had been considered “cutting edge” and were very popular in their day for almost the same reasons. Each directly addresses the primary racial problem of the particular time in which it appeared—Stowe’s protest against slavery, Wright’s protest against the economic, social, and political oppression of blacks by law and by custom. Each aims primarily at white audiences and presents an argument against these practices by dramatically rendering the extreme negative effects they can have. Baldwin takes them to task, however, for allowing their “mission” to cloud their artistic vision. He calls into question the characters presented in each text, accusing the writers of ignoring the complexities of real people in their eagerness to communicate ideas. He also particularly reviews Wright’s presentation of relations between the liberal whites of his book (as represented by Jan) and the novel’s protagonist. The acuteness of Baldwin’s critique is reminiscent of Toni Morrison’s examination of race represented in fiction in her demanding text Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination.

Unfortunately for Baldwin, Wright, who had done so much to help him just a few years before, read these essays as a personal attack. He is reported never to have forgiven Baldwin, giving rise to the accusation that Baldwin’s pattern was to seek a father/mentor figure, then, as he progressed, attack that figure publicly. To a lesser extent this happened with Langston Hughes as well, although Hughes seems to have taken it better, even returning volleys to some of Baldwin’s later works. Still, Baldwin is establishing his direct gaze and address of painful, difficult topics in these essays.

Another important essay in this collection is “Stranger in the Village,” in which Baldwin examines his experience as the only black man in a Swiss village to which he has gone as a refuge in which to write. A friend’s family has given him the use of a chateau; he arrives there the first time as a guest and returns alone the second time. It is a small village, and the villagers, while not exactly hostile, make Baldwin aware of his “otherness.” This provides him an opportunity—distance, time, space—to think again about the meaning of race, particularly of the divisions—social, historical, and psychological—between whites and blacks. One of the villagers assures him that they have a custom in which every year several of the village children dress up as blacks (using black face makeup and straw or other materials to create “wigs”) and collect money from the villagers to “buy” Africans. The idea is to provide money for missionaries striving to save African souls. The villager imparts this information to Baldwin as an attempt to show that they are kindly disposed to him and “his people.” Naturally, it has a different effect, though Baldwin takes note of the kind intent. In his reflection on his experience as an outsider in this village, he develops the “stranger” motif as a metaphor for the experience of African Americans, at least, in Western culture. He ends his ruminations with the observation that, because of the involvement of European cultures with African cultures, it will no longer be possible for the West to think of itself as wholly white ever again, announcing another Baldwin theme that African Americans and whites are permanently and inextricably interconnected.

But by far the most powerful and significant piece in this text is the title essay, “Notes of a Native Son,” a meditation on the nature of love and the price of fear and hatred. Baldwin wrote this essay as he reflected on his father’s death and the meaning of his father’s life and death in his own life: “When his life [Baldwin’s father’s] had ended I began to wonder about that life and also, in a new way, to be apprehensive about my own” (“Notes of a Native Son”). Using the lens of his own life, he probes his father’s world, struggling with the meaning of their complicated and disheartening relationship. He uses this examination to explore the nature and complications of familial love—the importance of confronting and exorcising hate, the difficult necessity of forgiveness. Furthermore, he considers the price of trying to understand as well as the price of not understanding race relations in America. For race in America, Baldwin insists, deals with family relations—desperate, intimate family relations. Therein, he tells us, lie both the hope for working things out and the tragedy should we fail to do so.

For Discussion or Writing

1. “I saw nothing very clearly but I did see this: that my life, my real life, was in danger, and not from anything other people might do but from the hatred I carried in my own heart” (“Notes of a Native Son”). Examine this quote carefully. Discuss several ways the essay shows the truth of this analysis, both literally and figuratively. For example, what are some different ways one might interpret the phrase “my real life”?
2. Consider a situation in which you have been an outsider and very aware of your outsider status. Tell the story of that situation. Who was involved? What happened? How did you come to be in this situation? Why were you an outsider? Next analyze it. When and how did you become most aware of being an outsider? What were your feelings at that time? How did you react? What do you think about both the situation and your reaction to it now? Did you learn anything from this encounter or has anything about that encounter continued to affect your attitudes and/or behavior now? Explain.
3. Baldwin said that he read Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin repeatedly as a child. It was a favorite of his. Yet in “Everybody’s Protest Novel,” he critiques it severely. Examine some book or movie from your own past that you have known well and loved that you feel much differently about today. Explain your change of opinion.
4. In these essays, Baldwin, as do many other essayists (E. B. White, Alice Walker, Anna Quindlen, Amy Tan, among others), chooses some specific personal experience and uses that as a platform from which to contemplate or comment on some related but larger ideas in the world. Think about your own experiences. Which ones do you think of as “typical” (i.e., first date, first day of school, fights with brothers or sisters)? Is there material here that you could use to examine in terms of what this experience could explain about the “way the world works” in 21st-century America? Consider the first day of school stories. How was yours the same as many others that you know? If it was your first day of attending any school, were you nervous? Excited? About what? Was one or both of your parents with you? Why? Was there some effort to “prepare” you for the day? Was it treated as a special day? If so, why? When you think back on it, how does your experience help us think about how we as Americans value education, for instance? What do the details of your experience, especially as they overlap with or are “typical” of the experiences of others, reveal about American values? How might race, class, ethnicity, or gender differences affect both the experience itself and what that experience might reveal?

Giovanni’s Room* (1956)

James Baldwin uses aspects of his personal experience to probe, question, and meditate on meaning in his works. Most notably, he investigates the idea of romantic love in his second novel, Giovanni’s Room, published by Dial Press in 1956. A daring novel for the 1950s, Giovanni’s Room explores a homosexual relationship. All of the characters are white; Baldwin clearly wants to avoid what might have become a different story about race. Instead, he fashions a story about a young American man, David, unwilling to acknowledge his love for Giovanni, a beautiful young Italian man he meets in a Parisian bar, because he is unwilling to accept his attraction to males and the fact that he has fallen for Giovanni in particular. That internal conflict becomes a meditation on integrity and the meaning of love, on what we value and what humanizes and dehumanizes us.

Giovanni's Room is told in two parts: The first part is composed of three chapters; the second unfolds in five. As Go Tell It on the Mountain does, it begins on one day and concludes the following morning. But in between Baldwin employs flashback and other devices to tell the story. Set in France, most of the narrative actually occurs in Paris. The settings include the bar in which the two men first meet and the room that becomes both a refuge and a kind of prison for David and Giovanni. Baldwin creates the sense of Parisian life as experienced at the bohemian fringe of the society—cafés, bars, and nightlife. Nobody in this novel appears to have a day job, because so much of the action revolves around a certain aspect of Paris nightlife. Yet within this exotic setting, Baldwin crafts a story about human relations, not exotic ones.

Early in the novel, for example, David gets good advice from one of the other significant characters—Jacques—who exhorts him to pay attention to and embrace this love. Jacques cautions David that such love is rare and missing it or throwing it away will have lifelong consequences for him. But David tries both to avoid acknowledging the depth of his feeling for Giovanni and any commitment to him and to maintain the relationship. That basic dishonesty and cowardice end up destroying both men, as well as causing significant collateral damage. Two deaths are attributable, at least in part, to David's behavior. His is the kind of "willed blindness" that Baldwin identified as the "unforgivable sin," because it allows the innocent to cause great harm yet deny responsibility for that harm. Giovanni's Room tells David's story as he faces the willfulness and destructiveness of his "innocence."

For Discussion or Writing

1. Even now, homosexual love is a controversial topic. It was much more controversial when this novel was first published, so much so that Baldwin had a difficult time finding a publisher. Research the initial critical reception of the novel. What do you think critics would say about it now? Compare its treatment of romantic love between two men to that theme treated in recent films such as Brokeback Mountain (2005).
2. In this novel, as in Go Tell It on the Mountain, the coming dawn signals more than just the literal new day. Examine the ironies of David's situation in view of this dawn. What "new day" is this for David? What new way of life does it usher in for him? What "dark night" does it end? How does his emotional state match the expectations one might have at this point?
3. Look at the consequences of David's "willed blindness." Besides Giovanni, who suffers because of this sin? How? How might the story have been different had David been able to face the truth about himself?
4. Trudier Harris, a critic and scholar, has written a book about Baldwin's women. Look at the women in this novel. Besides Hella, there are two or three additional female figures. Identify them. What do you note about these women and their placement in the text? How has Baldwin crafted their characters? How do they fare in comparison to other minor characters in the text?
5. Has Baldwin's treatment of homosexuality contributed to or challenged stereotypes? Gather supporting details for your opinion from the specifics of the text.
6. David's sins include what seems to be total selfishness. Everyone who has ever cared for him is sacrificed to his intense need to maintain a certain image of himself. In light of this, how do you read his final response to Giovanni's situation? Is he a man finally moved to deep compassion and remorse, or has he simply become obsessed with his own guilt and so once again become totally self-absorbed? Use the text to support your view.
7. Money or the lack of it seems to drive much of the action of this book. In what ways can you imagine a different outcome had the economic realities of the story been different? (For example, what might have happened to the relationship if Giovanni had been independently wealthy?)

"Sonny's Blues" (1957)

First published in Partisan Review in the summer 1957 issue, "Sonny's Blues" is a short story that expresses many of Baldwin's recurrent themes. It is set in a "modern" Harlem, the ghetto Harlem of the 1950s and 1960s, rather than the Harlem of the earlier cultural explosion referred to as the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s. It is a story of two brothers. The one who narrates the tale is a high school math teacher, with a wife and children, who lives in a housing project that reveals his middle-class aspirations but that on further analysis is not very different from the ghetto in which he and his brother were raised. The other is Sonny, the quintessential artist/musician who struggles with a heroin addiction.

The story opens as the brother reads of Sonny's arrest, and he tries to untangle the mystery of how they have both arrived at this day. A former friend of Sonny's has sought out his brother to give him this bad news, which he already knows. As they talk, the world Sonny's brother seeks to inhabit and the world that actually surrounds him clash. What is even clearer is the brother's willful blindness to the complexity and some of the beauty that coexist in this world. He refuses to try to help Sonny out of this present trouble, partly out of a sense that he cannot really help and partly from his sense of previous injury from being dismissed by Sonny the last time they had seen each other.

As the story unfolds, however, and the protagonist loses his own young daughter, he says, "My trouble made Sonny's real," so he writes to him. When Sonny writes back, compassionately and humbly, expressing his sorrow about Grace's death and saying how happy he is to hear from him, they begin a correspondence, which ends by his inviting Sonny to stay with his family when he is released. Sonny's brother works hard at trying to discover who Sonny is and to understand his life in the hope that he can solve the mystery of Sonny's addiction and protect him from falling again. His efforts take him back to various scenes of their youth, specifically an encounter with his mother before she died in which he learns for the first time of his father's brother. She tells him the story of his uncle's tragic death at the hands of careless joyriding whites as an explanation of his father's secret sadness and anger and as a parable warning him about the dangers that may lie in wait for these brothers. She ends by asking him to look after his brother, and when he promises that he will not let anything happen to him, she says, "You may not be able to stop nothing from happening. But you got to let him know you's there." Now that Sonny has reentered his life, he tries to make good on this promise. Yet he struggles to understand what seems to be at the core of Sonny's being, his life as a jazz and blues musician. He is equally baffled and afraid of Sonny's addiction, suspecting that the two are somehow linked.

The story reaches its climax when he attends a club at which Sonny is playing again for the first time since he has been released. It is the first time he has entered Sonny's world. Here Sonny is greeted as a "prince," a gifted artist charged with the mission of all serious artists—to help us face ourselves, even in our darkness, and bear compassionate witness to each other. The tale ends as he salutes his brother's art, finally understanding the terrible price exacted from the artist for his art (as with Robert Johnson and those who try to play his guitar in Sherman Alexie's Reservation Blues, where the physical act of playing this music literally cuts up their fingers as they make contact with the strings). As he reaches some understanding of Sonny's calling and the complexities and real dangers (past addiction) of Sonny's effort to heed that call, he also faces truths about himself as an individual and as part of the greater human family.

"Sonny's Blues" is a complex work that interweaves ideas about the role of the artist, and the twin necessities of facing difficult truths about ourselves and treating each other with compassion. Baldwin develops character through his use of dialogue and his subtle use of point of view. The story challenges our notions of what is good by making Sonny, a drug addict and felon, the central character and hero of the story. While Sonny's brother has all the trappings we recognize of a desired lifestyle, a good job, a wife and family, and a home, crucial elements are missing. From the beginning of the story, he is confused, unable to understand the lives of those around him, including the students he aims to educate. Because he does not seem able to recognize or understand their lives, he seems unable to reach them, as he has been unable to reach Sonny. Therefore, he must seek what he is missing—what he has simply been unwilling or unable to face about the similarity of all their lives. Likewise, Sonny raises questions not easily answered. Is it necessary for the artist to self-destruct in the service of his art? Is there a way to attend seriously to the “call” of art, especially within the constraints of racial and economic injustice, without succumbing to self-destruction? The story also raises questions about what we owe each other and what we can really do to assist each other on life’s journey.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine the ways in which Baldwin introduces and develops his key themes in this story. Focus on the two conversations the brothers have when they are alone: the first, which occurs after their mother’s funeral, and the second after Sonny has been released from prison:
 - (a) What is the content, the subject of these conversations?
 - (b) What is each brother’s attitude toward the other in these conversations? What words, phrases, or other details indicate this?
 - (c) Describe the changes that occur during the course of these conversations.
 - (d) How do these details reveal Baldwin’s themes?
2. Compare Sonny’s brother’s reaction to the gospel street singers he views from the window of his apartment to Sonny’s response to them, both as his brother observes him and later as he talks about that scene with him. What do reactions reveal about their different characters?
3. Baldwin chooses to tell this tale primarily through the eyes of Sonny’s brother. Look closely at the way he opens and closes the story. What effect does it have on the story to limit what we know of his view?

The Fire Next Time (1963)

Everything now, we must assume, is in our hands; we have no right to assume otherwise. If we—and now I mean the relatively conscious whites and the relatively conscious blacks, who must, like lovers, insist on, or create, the consciousness of others—do not falter in our duty now, we may be able, handful that we are, to end the racial nightmare, and achieve our country, and change the history of the world. If we do not now dare everything, the fulfillment of that prophecy, recreated from the Bible in song by a slave, is upon us: “God gave Noah the rainbow sign, No more water, the fire next time!”

(James Baldwin)

The Fire Next Time is a Baldwin classic; much of his reputation was built on this work. Published at what some call the height of civil rights activity (the march on Washington occurred in August of the year in which it was published), it marks a distinct shift in Baldwin’s articulation of his ideas about the threat of racial prejudice. In earlier works like Notes of a Native Son, he primarily examined the threats to the black psyche of living with racial hatred, describing such hatred as an infectious disease that could infect and kill the black man. In this text he enlarges on that theme and more urgently warns both black and white audiences of what may await us if we fail in this hour of need. He calls himself a witness but speaks to us in language that earned him the rightful title of prophet. Written and published after he had ended his expatriate period and begun participating in the civil rights struggle, The Fire Next Time anticipates the riots and escalating violence of the late 1960s and 1970s. Readers are struck by the ominous resonance of the quote, which ends the book.

This collection is composed of two essays beginning with an open letter to Baldwin’s nephew, his namesake. The younger James is apparently turning 15, so on this occasion, coinciding with the nation’s 100th anniversary of the emancipation of its slave population, Baldwin writes “My Dungeon Shook: A Letter to My Nephew on the One Hundredth Anniversary of Emancipation.” In this letter Baldwin announces his intention to pass on his strategies for survival in a hostile environment. More than that, he wants to offer a way for his nephew to achieve full manhood, full humanity, in a world where the odds are against him. Letters like this, from elders to the next generation, form a small genre of their own, especially in African-American writing. Baldwin’s famous one was followed soon after in 1968 by Bob Teague's Letters to a Black Boy written to his son and, more recently in 1992, Marian Wright Edelman's The Measure of Our Success: A Letter to My Children and Yours. They share a sense of urgency—the wisdom the writers seek to pass on must be passed on at this point to be useful to the recipient. They also share admonitions, especially those from the African-American community, about the necessity of achieving a fully adult, conscious, and compassionately human stance.

The second essay of the collection, “Down at the Cross: Letter from a Region in My Mind,” is a letter to the American public. It echoes and enlarges on themes sounded in the first essay, but this time Baldwin uses two important personal encounters. Revisiting lessons he learned at 14 through his own experience of salvation, he explores its aftermath and an evening with the Honorable Elijah Muhammad in Chicago at the height of the Black Muslim movement to launch his analysis of the current American dilemma. Together, the two essays move, in Baldwin's classic style, from the personal, one-on-one intimacy of passing wisdom to a beloved nephew (he reminds him never to forget that love) to a conversation with the entire U.S. populace. He evokes not only the history of black and white Americans but also their connections through that history to the West and to the whole world.

At the heart of his letter to his nephew, and therefore to all black children and children of the oppressed, are three messages: (1) Do not believe what the world tries to tell you about your worth; (2) Know your real past in order to learn who you really are; and (3) Accept responsibility but avoid hatred.

Baldwin begins with the admonition that his nephew (and nieces, too) should face a difficult but important truth: “You can only be destroyed by believing that you really are what the white world calls a nigger” (14). He acknowledges that everything in the world of a poor black boy born in Harlem is constructed to make him believe in his worthlessness and in his inability ever to overcome what he sees all around him—despair and destruction. Baldwin points out that this not only is his nephew's dilemma but has been the problem the black man has wrestled with throughout American history. His own brother, young James's father, has also struggled with this reality. The fact that the struggle remains the same and that those who cause it do not acknowledge its existence makes it so insidious:

I know what the world has done to my brother and how narrowly he has survived it. And I know, which is much worse, and this is the crime of which I accuse my country and my countrymen, and which neither I nor time nor history will ever forgive them, that they are destroying hundreds and thousands of lives and do not know and do not want to know it. . . . But it is not permissible that the authors of devastation should be innocent. It is the innocence which constitutes the crime. (15–16)

Baldwin explains this condition, explicitly naming racism as its root cause. “You were born where you were born and faced the future you faced because you were black and for no other reason” (18). He thinks it is vital that those living within the constraints of racism accurately perceive and name what constrains them and then make it their business to understand how and why. He labors to provide those answers, at least in part, through his analysis in the rest of the essay. Again he exhorts his nephew to learn about his past in order to understand the present and construct a livable future. To this he adds the most important message of all. Despite the details of black history, the documentation of oppression both personal and impersonal, it is imperative, according to Baldwin's view, that young James not give in to hatred and bitterness:

Please be clear, dear James, through the storm which rages about your youthful head today, about the reality behind the words acceptance and integration. There is no reason for you to try to become like white people and there is no basis whatever for their impertinent assumption that they must accept you. The really terrible thing, old buddy, is that you must accept them. And I mean that very seriously. You must accept them and accept them with love. For these innocent people have no other hope. (19)

He was both lauded and criticized in the 1970s and 1980s for this stance. When it was originally published, it was hailed as courageous and “straight from the shoulder.” But in the heyday of the black arts movement, critics pointed to this call for love in the face of hatred, this call for black people to “save” undeserving whites, as evidence that Baldwin was still a “Negro” rather than a black man, someone seeking the understanding (and perhaps approval) of at least the white intellectual and arts community. And while Baldwin makes an eloquent case for the necessity that his nephew and other blacks achieve the last goal, this letter fails to explain how such a thing is to be accomplished. Yet, what the next essay makes much clearer is why he thinks this is the Black Man’s Burden.

“Down at the Cross: Letter from a Region in My Mind,” the second essay, opens with the irony of the quote from Rudyard Kipling about taking up “the White Man’s Burden,” immediately followed by a quote from a hymn about seeking salvation and cleansing “down at the cross.” These two quotes establish major concerns. First, they dispel delusions whites have harbored about their relations to all non-white peoples and especially white Americans in their relations to black Americans. Second, they show the necessity of acknowledging these “sins” and taking collective responsibility to seek cleansing from them, a cleansing that has already required blood and may require more.

It is aptly subtitled “From a Region in My Mind” because the essay ranges over a large territory. The ground it covers includes personal experiences analyzed for their meanings within the context of sociological, political, historical, and ethical contexts. Baldwin examines his salvation, for example, analyzing it through the lens of the cultural factors and pressures that conspired to bring him to his knees, seeking shelter from the harsh realities that menaced him in his Harlem neighborhood. He determines that many people seek the shelter of the church for the same reasons he did—because they begin to recognize that the menace of the streets is a personal menace from which they need shelter. But, for Baldwin, the church is no hiding place; it poses the same threat—to take one’s life—but under a different guise.

Likewise, he describes an evening spent in the company of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad and a group of his followers, analyzing the ideology of the Black Muslim movement for what it offers for black Americans. As he does so, he provides an outline of the theology of the movement, a discussion of its connections to earlier similar movements, and he explores the economic factors funding the movement itself and the economic strategy it offers its followers. He also analyzes why these ideas have appealed to large groups of African Americans who were drawn to the Black Muslim camp in the 1960s, and the equally intriguing response of the white power establishment to that phenomenon. Baldwin describes the police officers assigned to keep an eye on the crowds drawn to the Muslim preachers in the parks as being afraid. He goes to some lengths to explain that he cannot argue with the truth of the Black Muslim assessment of race relations in the United States, nor with Malcolm X’s analysis that it is unreasonable to expect that black people should be any more patient, loving, and forgiving than any other humans. In fact, Baldwin himself is so critical of the inadequacies and blindness of white responses to racism that after one televised appearance, a man says that he expects Baldwin will be calling himself “X” soon.

But Baldwin argues:

The glorification of one race and the consequent debasement of another—or others—always has been and always will be a recipe for murder. . . . I am very much concerned that American Negroes achieve their freedom here in the United States. But I am also concerned for their dignity, the health of their souls, and must oppose any attempt that Negroes make to do to others what has been done to them. (112–113)

This is the crux of his argument in both letters. With his salvation story and the Elijah Muhammad story in mind, he critiques Christianity. He seeks to identify the source of the delusions that whites and blacks have succumbed to, contrasting these distortions with considerations of alternate views of history: what the Holocaust reveals about Western depravity and what the treatment of black soldiers in World War II reveals about American hypocrisy. In doing so, he criticizes white liberalism, in particular, and warns all of us about the seductions of power. In one of the most powerful parts of this text, Baldwin issues a warning that resonates in a special way in the United States after Sept. 11, 2001.

It is the responsibility of free men to trust and to celebrate what is constant—birth, struggle, death are constant, and so is love, though we may not always think so. . . . But renewal becomes impossible if one supposes things to be constant that are not—safety, for example, or money, or power. One clings then to chimeras, by which one can only be betrayed, and the entire hope—the entire possibility—of freedom disappears. (125)

This is a message readers can consider to be applicable to many current situations.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider the title of the first letter, “My Dungeon Shook,” and the quote that it is taken from, stated at the opening of the text. It seems to allude to the story of St. Paul, who, when he found himself in a Roman dungeon awaiting trial, had the miraculous experience of rescue by an angel, when his “chains fell off.” How might this story help illuminate or underline the points Baldwin makes in this essay? What other ways can you think of to interpret the title?
2. In terms of your reading of the letter to his nephew, what assumptions does Baldwin seem to make about what the younger James does or does not know about black history?
3. Select any historical event Baldwin identifies in the second essay and investigate it further. What seems to be the common way to interpret this event? For example, what are the reasons commonly given for the Cuban response to communist/socialist politics? How does this explanation fit with Baldwin’s?
4. Many writers of fiction are also essayists. Their essays are often inspired by some cause with which they are passionately aligned. Choose a well-known fiction writer who is also an essayist, such as Alice Walker, Barbara Kingsolver, or Wendell Berry. Read at least two of their essays and (a) identify the target audience if you can, (b) articulate the problem the essay outlines, and (c) detail the solutions it proposes. Compare that work to Baldwin’s.
5. Miriama Ba, a Senegalese woman, has written a novel called So Long a Letter that treats a variety of social customs and ills in the context of the story it tells. Likewise, Alice Walker’s The Color Purple is a novel written in letter form. Use one of these works or choose another—a novel written as letters—to compare with Baldwin’s nonfiction letters. What similarities and differences do you observe? How do those differences in form affect meaning or impact?
6. Consider Baldwin’s call to radical love, outside the bounds of religion, as a means to social and political salvation. Investigate other calls like his from different sources—bell hooks and Alice Walker, for example. Is there anyone on the political scene these days who espouses such a doctrine? If so, how does that person’s call compare with Baldwin’s? How is it received?
7. Look closely at Baldwin’s language in either of the letters. Identify two passages that you think express his message powerfully. Explain your response.
8. In terms of the critique he offers in these letters, how would Baldwin evaluate Hemingway’s male characters or those of Faulkner? Choose one specific novel. Identify the traits of the male heroes in that novel. What would Baldwin agree were heroic traits? Which ones would he challenge?
9. In Leslie Marmon Silko’s Ceremony, as in other contemporary tales of Native American life, the young men seek their identities. On the basis of your reading of Baldwin’s work, recast his letter to address young Native Americans. What would you have to change? What could remain the same? Why?

Blues for Mr. Charlie* (1964)

The dedication to this play “To the memory of Medgar Evers, and his wife and his children and to the memory of the dead children of Birmingham,” places it both in time and in attitude. Written and published in the wake of the Emmett Till case and after the death of Medgar Evers, Blues for Mr. Charlie was also published immediately after four girls were killed when the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham was bombed on a Sunday morning.

Baldwin returned to the United States in 1957 and toured the South for the first time out of his personal need to observe what was happening there as the Civil Rights movement gained momentum. He used this opportunity and helped finance his travels by agreeing to write his observations for Partisan Review and Harpers Magazine. During that tour, he met many leaders of the Civil Rights movement, most notably MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. He saw King in action, met with him personally, and heard him preach. Baldwin also learned about racial violence, southern style, in this and subsequent trips. These observations would fuel his writing for the coming years. The Emmett Till case, for example, inspired the play Blues for Mr. Charlie. Emmett Till was a 14-year-old black youth from Chicago visiting relatives in Mississippi during the summer of 1955. Till reportedly looked at and said something deemed inappropriate to the white wife of the store’s proprietor. Later that day, he was taken from his relatives’ home, beaten, and shot. His body was thrown into the Tallahatchie River. His case caused a sensation when his mother demanded that the casket be opened so that the world could see what was done to her son. This became a celebrated cause among civil rights activists. As early as 1959, Baldwin promised Elia Kazan a play based on this story, but circumstances had not yet come together.

In subsequent trips to the South, Baldwin’s commitment to active participation in the movement grew. On one of those trips, he met and accompanied Medgar Evers as he investigated for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) murders that were reported as being committed against blacks because of racial hatred. Evers himself was murdered three months after Baldwin left the South in 1963. David Leeming reports that “his outrage at the Evers murder spurred him on in his work on Blues for Mr. Charlie.”

Then, in September 1963, four girls (three were 14 and one was 11) died in the bombing of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham. In each of these three cases, the perpetrators were identified and arrested. But when they came to trial, all were exonerated the first time. (Efforts to bring about justice were eventually successful, but only after years of persistence. For example, Evers’s murderer was only successfully convicted in 1994, over 30 years after the murder).

These events are part of the violent backdrop for the play, as escalating violence and a growing sense of futility engendered a shift in attitude among blacks agitating for racial justice. A debate about methods, represented on one hand by the nonviolent methods of Martin Luther King, Jr., and on the other by the militant resistance of Malcolm X and later the Black Panther Party gathered momentum in the early 1960s. Blues for Mr. Charlie incorporates that debate.

The play is structured in three acts; Baldwin’s stage directions establish the primary settings as “the Negro church” for the first two acts and the courthouse for the final act. He also divides stage between two primary locations, identified as BlackTown and WhiteTown.

The play begins as Lorenzo Britten, a white store owner and family man, drops the body of Richard Henry and says, “And may every nigger like this nigger end like this nigger, face down in the weeds!” The focus of the play is bringing Britten to trial and revealing the racial injustice that has led to Richard’s murder. The play also becomes a vehicle for examining the root of this shift in the temper of the times.

Meridian Henry is the black preacher/Martin Luther King, Jr., leader figure. He is Richard Henry’s father, and Richard is the black man who has been murdered. In the first scene, Meridian is drilling a group of young people in nonviolent methods when the group is joined by another group of protesters fresh from the field of battle. One of the newly arrived protesters articulates the growing bitterness and impatience of the young people with these techniques in the face of the continuing hostility of whites:

We've been demonstrating—non-violently—for more than a year now and all that's happened is that now they'll let us into that crummy library downtown which was obsolete in 1897. . . . For that we paid I don't know how many thousands of dollars in fines, Jerome is still in the hospital, and we all know Ruthie is never again going to be the swinging little chick she used to be. . . . And we still can't get licensed to be electricians or plumbers, we still can't walk through the park, our kids still can't use the swimming pool in town. We still can't vote, we can't even get registered. Is it worth it? And these people trying to kill us, too?

Meridian's responses, including his expressed belief that the agitation of Parnell, the white editor of the local paper, will get a warrant issued for Britten's arrest, is met with skepticism and near-scorn by the black students. However, Parnell does come through though he leaves them on his way to alert Britten, his friend, that the warrant is on the way.

Baldwin strives to render the complexities of racial relations in the South as well as the complexities of individual characters. Thus, Parnell professes and tries to demonstrate his friendship for both parties. Yet Meridian challenges Parnell's motives and his willingness to pursue justice by demanding that he should seek to find out the truth about Britten's responsibility for Richard's murder and act accordingly, for his own sake. Furthermore, when Britten next appears on stage, he is holding his baby. In this intimate family scene he is a family man who really loves his wife and child, reminiscent of the people described in Gwendolyn Brooks's "The Chicago Defender Sends a Man to Little Rock," where the mob "hurling spittle, rock, Garbage and fruit" at the children attempting to integrate the high school "are like people everywhere." This is echoed in the scene in which the white community joins together to offer moral support to the Britten family. These folks are then implicated in violence in the scene of black community members' calling to warn each other that the whites are out setting bombs and in other ways seeking to intimidate, if not injure, blacks. Nor is Richard, the murdered man, the pristine hero who might have been expected. He has returned home to deal with his addiction. And though he does not initiate the hostility that ends in his death, he certainly exacerbates it in his encounter with Britten and his wife in their store.

The play ends by suggesting a limited hope in the joining of forces between the white liberals and the black community in a continued effort to seek justice. But it also leaves the challenges and questions Lorenzo voices in the beginning of the play ringing in the air. The title suggests that "the white day is done" ("Dream Variations," Langston Hughes), but it ends with no immediate achievement of that sought-for justice in sight.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Baldwin uses the scenes with intimate conversations between characters to undermine stereotyping. Look at two scenes—one between two black characters and another between two white characters. What do these characters talk about when they are alone? How do their reactions differ from what you might expect? What additional information does each scene provide about the characters? About the plot? About the themes?
2. Baldwin often asserted that the root of racial violence was in the close association of race with sex. Is there evidence of this in the play? What associations are made between race and sex? Who makes these associations? How are these connected to the violence in the play?
3. Another issue that surfaces is the connection of religion to the struggle for racial equality. What is the role of religion in the play? Who speaks for religion? How is the role of religion questioned or challenged? Look for details in the setting as well as in the dialogue to support your ideas.
4. What roles do women play in Blues for Mr. Charlie? Is there any distinction between the roles of the white women and those of the black women?

If so, what are they? If not, what meaning does this convey?

5. Plays unfold primarily through dialogue. And the success of a play often depends on how well the dialogue captures the audience's idea of how "real" people talk, how clearly it conveys the plot, and how effectively it moves the plot along. Select one scene and use these standards to analyze Baldwin's work in this play.
6. In his earliest years, Baldwin gained a reputation by denouncing Richard Wright's Native Son and Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin as protest novels that fall short of art by emphasizing "message." In his critiques, Baldwin argues that their efforts cause them to exaggerate features of their characters to embody the ideas each writer wants to discuss. Consider this critique as it applies to this play. What evidence from the play can you use to support the idea that Blues for Mr. Charlie is a protest play or that it avoids the failings of protest literature?
7. The most common themes in blues music are about love lost or the agonies of love. This play can be interpreted in this light on several different levels. That is, different kinds of love lost and gone wrong can be identified in this text. Which ones can you identify?

"The Rockpile"

(in Going to Meet the Man 1965)

"The Rockpile" is a version of an incident incorporated in Baldwin's Go Tell It on the Mountain, published for the first time in his collection of short stories. It focuses on the relationship between John Grimes and his brother, Roy. John is the protagonist of the novel; likewise, he is the central figure of this short story. Through this story, readers see his relationship to each of his parents as well as to his surroundings.

The story opens on a Saturday morning. Both brothers are sitting on the fire escape outside of their Harlem apartment, several stories above street level. They are confined to this space because they are forbidden to go down into the street to play with the other boys. They are especially forbidden to join those boys on the rock pile. The rock pile of the title is apparently the closest thing to a playground available in that neighborhood and has become a kind of proving ground for boys growing up there. It is a place where they hang out and challenge each other. In the story it is described as "a mass of natural rock jutting out of the ground," and its slippery surface provides the boys with an element of danger and some excitement to alleviate the tedium of poverty.

But Gabriel, John and Roy's father, refuses to allow them to play there. Elizabeth, their mother, agrees, but not for the same reasons. Thus we are introduced to the first set of conflicts. Gabriel will not give his permission because he does not want them associating with worldly people; for him, the boys as well as the other people in the neighborhood who are not members of his church are part of the evil temptations of the world. Elizabeth, on the other hand, refuses her permission because of the physical dangers the rock pile itself poses to life and limb. So the boys are relegated to watching other boys play there from their fire escape.

Predictably, their parents' refusal makes the rock pile alluring to both boys. However, the boys respond differently to this attraction. John fears the rock pile and the tough boys who seem to rule over it. He is fascinated with watching their play but seems happy enough to simply observe from a distance. Although he is also restless in his confinement, he seems more willing to accept this imposed safety. Besides, John has the comfort of a book, his mother not too far away, and his father out of the house for the moment. Roy is a different case altogether. We can see how Roy chafes at being forbidden this physical play and from associating with "regular" guys.

So on this particular Saturday, Roy slips out to join his friends there. They have been urging him to join them. He takes the opportunity presented when his mother is deep in conversation with a church member, Sister McCandless, to defy his older brother and join them. For his part, John does not tell his mother or try very hard to stop him. For a time, he simply watches, primarily worried for both of them should his brother be caught by their father, who is scheduled to return from work shortly. Roy is injured, however, and this injury heightens the tension of the story and reveals the depths of the family tensions.

Each individual's reactions illuminate the troubled relationships of the characters. Elizabeth's anxious anticipation of Gabriel's reaction, which surpasses her concern about Roy's injury once she ascertains that it is not life-threatening, makes readers question the nature of her relationship with her husband. Likewise, even Sister McCandless offers to meet Gabriel as he ascends the stairs in order to soften his reaction. Indeed, everyone is more concerned with his reaction than with Roy's wound after it has been established that Roy will be all right.

In this way, Baldwin creates and maintains suspense. But he also creates a character who looms over the whole story, but whom, we realize in retrospect we do not meet until almost halfway through it. Such is Gabriel's power and influence over those around him. We are affected by the growing dread with which all of the participants await his entry, particularly John. We are somewhat unprepared, however, for the explosiveness and the direction of Gabriel's response to the situation. Baldwin creates memorable characters and paints a vivid portrait of a family struggling within both internal and external trip wires. The Harlem streets, we recognize, are dangerous for these boys—physically as well as in every other way (see “Sonny's Blues”), but the story raises questions about which environment is more dangerous to them—their father's protection or the city streets.

The themes Baldwin treats here are similar to those in many of his other works—the search for identity manifested in confusion John feels as he examines himself in comparison to his brother, the neighborhood boys, and his father's expectations. He also returns to an analysis of adult relationships through the tension between Elizabeth and Gabriel. Baldwin continues, also, to question the effect of Christianity, interpreted through Gabriel's fundamentalist rigidity, on the lives of humans struggling for truth in relationships and life. This last theme is especially interesting to think about in comparison with writers like FLANNERY O'CONNOR, and Reynolds Price, and especially evoked in similar ways in Barbara Kingsolver's The Poisonwood Bible. Gabriel's rigidity and the destructiveness of his controlling efforts also evoke comparisons with Mr. in Alice Walker's The Color Purple and the Third Life of Grange Copeland.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Both brothers resist their father. Compare their forms of resistance and examine the effectiveness of each.
2. Look at the relationship of the two women (Sister McCandless and Elizabeth) to each other and in their reactions to the boys as well as to Gabriel's return home. What does an examination of their differences reveal?
3. The short story format needs to provide information about character, plot, theme, and setting quickly and clearly. That means that the details must be sharp and sometimes accomplish multiple tasks. Writers accomplish this, for example, by using one descriptive phrase that furthers the action of the story while it also provides insight into the character. Identify three or four such details in this story. Look carefully at the word choices and the phrasing. How much work is being done by each of your selections? Be specific.
4. Examine the details of the external setting (outside the apartment). How does Baldwin indicate the dangers in it? How does he indicate the dangers within the household? Who is endangered by whom and in what ways? Which dangers seem greatest to you and why?
5. Find the section in Go Tell It on the Mountain in which Roy is wounded. How is he injured, according to the novel? What details of the scene remain the same? Which have been changed? What is gained and what is lost in the different versions of this episode?
6. Compare the parent-child relationships in this story to others that you know: for example, Scout and Atticus in Harper Lee's To Kill a Mockingbird, Hannah and Eva in Toni Morrison's Sula, the mother and son in Ernest Gaines's “The Sky Is Gray,” or the grandmother and all her relations in Flannery O'Connor's “A Good Man Is Hard to

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- "American Masters. James Baldwin | PBS." American Masters. PBS. July 6, 2006. Available online. URL: http://www.pbs.org/wnet/americanmasters/database/baldwin_j.html. Accessed May 21, 2007.
- Baldwin, James. The Amen Corner: A Play. New York: Vintage Books/Random House, 1968.
- . Blues for Mr. Charlie: A Play. New York: Dial Press, 1964.
- . Early Novels and Stories. New York: Library of America, 1998.
- . The Fire Next Time. New York: Dell, 1962.
- . Giovanni's Room: A Novel. New York: Delta Trade Paperbacks, 1956.
- . Going to Meet the Man. New York: Dial Press, 1965.
- . Go Tell It on the Mountain. New York: Dell (A Laurel Book), 1952.
- . Notes of a Native Son. New York: Dial Press, 1963.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. James Baldwin. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2006.
- Campbell, James. Talking at the Gates: A Life of James Baldwin. New York: Penguin Books, 1992.
- Harris, Trudier. Black Women in the Fiction of James Baldwin. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1985.
- , ed. New Essays on "Go Tell It on the Mountain." New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Henderson, Carol E. James Baldwin's Go Tell It on the Mountain: Historical and Critical Essays. New York: Peter Lang, 2006.
- Kinnamon, Keneth, ed. James Baldwin: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1974.
- Leeming, David. James Baldwin: A Biography. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.
- McBride, Dwight A., ed. James Baldwin Now. New York: New York University Press, 1999.
- Miller, D. Quentin, ed. Re-Viewing James Baldwin: Things Not Seen. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2000.
- O'Daniel, Therman B., ed. James Baldwin: A Critical Evaluation. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1977.
- "Online Media: UC Berkeley Lectures and Events (James Baldwin Audio Recordings)." Online Media: UC Berkeley Lectures and Events. Library, University of California, Berkeley Press, July 6, 2006. Available online. URL: <http://www.lib.berkeley.edu/MRC/audiofiles.html#baldwina>. Accessed May 21, 2007.
- Porter, Horace. Stealing the Fire: The Art and Protest of James Baldwin. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1989.
- Pratt, Louis H. James Baldwin. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
- Rosset, Lisa. James Baldwin. New York: Chelsea House, 1989.
- Scott, Lynn Orilla. James Baldwin's Later Fiction: Witness to the Journey. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 2002.
- Standley Fred L., and Nancy V. Burt, eds. Critical Essays on James Baldwin. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1988.
- Troupe, Quincy, ed. James Baldwin: The Legacy. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Weatherby, W. J. James Baldwin: Artist on Fire. New York: Donald I. Fine, 1989.

Deborah James

SAUL BELLOW (1915–2005)

The novel can't be compared to the epic, or to the monuments of poetic drama. But it is the best we can do just now. It is a sort of latter-day lean-to, a hovel in which the spirit takes shelter. A novel is balanced between a few true impressions and the multitude of false ones that make up most of what we call life. It tells us that for every human being there is a diversity of existences, that the single existence is itself an illusion in part, that these many existences signify something, tend to something, fulfill something; it promises us meaning, harmony and even justice.

(Nobel Prize acceptance speech, 1976)

Saul Bellow was born on June 10, 1915, in a multiethnic suburb of Montreal called Lachine, the younger son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Lescha and Abraham Bellow. Bellow's parents moved to a Jewish neighborhood in Montreal a few years after his birth to escape their hardscrabble existence in working-class Lachine. Although Bellow was born in the New World, his family's recent immigrant past would haunt the author throughout his life. The youngest of four children, he was the only member of his family to be born in Canada; his elder brothers, Sam and Maurice, and his sister, Jane, were born and spent their earliest years in St. Petersburg, Russia, during one of their father's ill-fated attempts to start a business outside the Pale of Settlement usually reserved for Jewish habitation.

Even the author's name was marked by this immigrant Jewish past. A meddlesome Canadian border bureaucrat changed the family's name from Belo to Bellow in 1913, and Saul himself transformed his name from the more traditionally Jewish Solomon to Saul when he decided to embark upon a writing career. Most notably, though, the imprint of Bellow's early life can be felt in the remarkable innovation of his prose, which many critics have argued is inflected with the Yiddish spoken during his childhood by his parents and others in their Jewish neighborhood in Montreal. Bellow returned to this early life once and again in his prose. In works from the semiautobiographical The Adventures of Augie March, perhaps his most celebrated work, to a number of fragments of memoir, Bellow details his childhood. In a speech given in 1970, he described his early life in Canada as "blessed with a sense of the exotic." He goes on: "I don't see how this could have been avoided. Say in my case: I was born in a French-Canadian village of Russian-Jewish parents in 1915. We had Indians, French-Canadians, Scottish and Irish, Ukrainians, Jews, Russians and so on. Every language was spoken in the streets—from Iroquois to Hebrew. How could you avoid the feeling that you were in an enchanted place?" ("Saul Bellow on America and American Jewish Writers"). Bellow carried this "exotic" upbringing throughout his life, making it the prototype for many of the enchanted landscapes he would paint in his fiction, as well as the launching pad for the standpoint of alienated observer he would often adopt for his gifted raconteur protagonists.

In 1924 the Bellow family moved from this exotic multiethnic space to the great American city of Chicago—itsself a city defined by its plurality of nationalities and diversity of languages. It was the heyday of the city's industrial might, an era during which the midwestern Mecca played host to a number of waves of immigration, Jewish and other. Bellow and his siblings fit right into the Humboldt Park immigrant neighborhood where his family settled in search of higher wages and more job security. The local toughs and spectacular urban beauty that feature in Bellow's novels and short story collections from The Adventures of Augie March to Him with His Foot in His Mouth arose from the author's romanticization of his upbringing in this archetypal American city, where the smells wafting from the slaughterhouses and the many ethnic bakeries competed for attention. The fact that Chicago was simultaneously a business and manufacturing center of the United States and a locale far from the intellectual and cultural elitism of the East Coast metropolises, New York and Boston, combined to influence Bellow's democratic vision and the petty criminals and autodidactic intellectuals who swam through his work. As James Atlas has noted in his definitive biography of the author, Chicago played the urban muse for many of Bellow's most popular works.

Along with a number of would-be young Jewish artists and intellectuals from his neighborhood, Bellow attended Tuley High School in Chicago, where academic achievement and literary ambition were prized far above athletic prowess or social acumen. A competent student who wrote a newspaper column, Bellow was nonetheless overshadowed by his brilliant best friend, Isaac Rosenfeld, who had early success as a writer in New York City after college, only to die young and without the clout of his fellow Tuley grad. When Bellow was in his last year of high school, his mother, Lescha—the parent to whom he was closer—died. As Bellow puts it, “I was never the same after my mother died. . . . I was grieving” (Atlas 35). The theme of unceasing grief for a lost mother would recur in many of Bellow's later works, most notably his novella Seize the Day (1956). After high school the melancholic Bellow worked intermittently at his father's coal transport company, encountering the colorful characters and rogue's gallery of grotesques he would depict in his fiction, particularly the autobiographical The Adventures of Augie March. Bellow also became a perennial student at this time, first at the University of Chicago and later at Northwestern, where he received his B.A. in anthropology in 1937. Bellow studied with the famous anthropologist Melville Herskovitz at Northwestern; a short time after Bellow was his student, Herskovitz would compose his famous work, The Myth of the Negro Past, often seen as the foundation of African-American studies. Bellow was profoundly influenced by his professor's work on race, as well as the work of the earlier anthropologist Franz Boas, whose study of the Inuit tribes of the North inspired Bellow to write his senior thesis on what he perceived as a fascinating “primitive” Eskimo tribe. Although Bellow did not graduate from the University of Chicago and often mocked the pretensions of its Great Books curriculum, he often returned to it in both his fiction and his personal life. For many years, he served as a professor in the Committee for Social Thought at the esteemed Chicago university, developing friendships with a number of well-known academics who resided at the school, such as Allan Bloom and Leo Strauss.

After graduating from Northwestern, Bellow began graduate work in anthropology at the University of Wisconsin. Bellow's preoccupation with describing the minutiae of daily life and social interactions from an anthropological remove in his fiction resulted from this period of study. Although he was interested in pursuing graduate studies in English literature, he chose anthropology, he later said, because it was a field of study friendlier to working-class Jewish boys like him. At the time that Bellow attended university, literature departments were still primarily the domain of the White Anglo-Saxon Protestant (WASP) elite, self-conscious gatekeepers of the English tradition. Many future critics agreed that it was precisely Bellow's eschewal of the hallowed halls of the English literary tradition that led to his own literary freedom and sense of linguistic play, as well as the pluralistic viewpoint of his fiction.

After a short time at Wisconsin, Bellow dropped out to pursue his creative passions. On winter break, he married the University of Chicago student Anita Goshkin and decided to stay on with his new wife in Chicago. Bellow soon found work, a part-time teaching post at a local teacher's college that paid little but allowed the budding artist time to concentrate on his craft. It was the depression, and Bellow was happy to have a position that would allow him to leave the ranks of the city's many unemployed. Despite the fee he earned teaching, however, Bellow applied for and received federal aid from FDR's Works Progress Administration (WPA). Along with noted Chicago writers such as James Farrell, Bellow worked at the Federal Writers' Project, composing biographical entries on famous authors to keep busy. Soon after his first piece of fiction, entitled "Two Morning Monologues," was published in Partisan Review, Bellow's wife, Anita, gave birth to their son Gregory.

Dangling Man, Bellow's first novel, was loosely based on his young economically strapped married life in Chicago as the inhabitant of a claustrophobic home with his wife and her parents. Bellow finished the novel during his brief service with the U.S. Merchant Marine. The novel, published in 1944, relates the story of a young wannabe writer, Joseph, who is living with his wife and her family and dreaming of a career as an exemplar of American letters. In this novella Bellow evinced his first engagement with a theme that would recur throughout the pages of his fiction: the collision between the individual and world history. In Dangling Man, Bellow's protagonist waits in existential limbo to be drafted into war, trying to carve out an artistic life in the shadow of staggering global events. In this early work and The Victim, published in 1947, Bellow manifested his devotion and indebtedness to the 19th-century Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoevsky. Originally called Notes of a Dangling Man, Bellow's 1944 work was written as a clear homage to the Russian great's Notes from Underground, a meticulously rendered novella about one disaffected young man's search for meaning and the tortured consciousness that results from his quest. The Victim, too, tells a Dostoevskian story, this time of an individual and the doppelgänger, or double, that haunts him. In Bellow's second work—his first to be published after the global catastrophes of World War II—he hints at the offstage tragedies and mass victimization of the war, focusing on how a Jewish man named Leventhal is made a victim by his passivity and the guilt he feels about not being able to help his increasingly anti-Semitic double, Albee. In an interview with Philip Roth, Bellow later called these early short novels "apprentice works," analogous to the master's degree one must complete before beginning to work on a Ph.D. thesis. In order to impress the Partisan Review crew, the Trotskyite New York intellectuals who edited and wrote for the small, intellectually rigorous magazine and literary tastemaker of the time, Bellow also wrote and published a short story about the exile of Stalin's former second in command called "The Mexican General."

In The Adventures of Augie March (1953), Bellow dazzled readers with a new tone far from the formal one he had employed in his early works. While Bellow sought to demonstrate his capacity to mimic the masters of 19th-century European prose, such as Tolstoy and Dostoevsky, in his young prose, The Adventures of Augie March marked the moment when the author developed a voice of his own. The voice that narrates the picaresque adventures of young Augie March, a Jewish boy growing up in a Chicago neighborhood much like the one in which Bellow spent his youth, is a mature, yet rollicking one, inflected with tones of immigrant life and the spirit of play that characterized much subsequent Jewish-American fiction from Philip Roth's to Cynthia Ozick's. The Adventures of Augie March, Bellow's third novel, won the National Book Award for fiction in 1954.

During this period, Bellow began to engage with historical questions in his work, an unsurprising fact given how often he was just offstage during the major events of 20th-century world history. Bellow went to Paris on a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1948, not long after the end of World War II and the occupation of France by the Nazis. Bellow's fellowship allowed him to spend two years living in Paris and traveling in Europe, including Spain, the nation so central to the consciousness of socialists during its civil war in the 1930s. It was during this time, while witnessing the aftereffects of the war and struggling to write his later-abandoned manuscript "The Crab and the Butterfly," that he began The Adventures of Augie March. Later, during the 1967 Six Day War in Israel, he served as a correspondent for Newsday, a move that inspired his first extended nonfiction work, To Jerusalem and Back, as well as the Israeli travelogue of Arthur Sammler in Bellow's controversial 1970 novel Mr. Sammler's Planet. Bellow's next work, Seize the Day (1956), too, engaged with history. Seize the Day was a shorter work, a tour-de-force novella about the strained relationship between a father and his ne'er-do-well son and the historical forces of 1950s America that keep them stuck in conflict with one another.

Like many intellectuals of the time, Bellow was influenced by the popularity of Freud and psychoanalysis and transcendental movements, such as those led by Wilhelm Reich and Rudolph Steiner. Under the sway of these theorizers of the self, Bellow went on to write the experimental Henderson the Rain King (1959). Henderson details the adventures of a Hemingwayesque hero who travels to Africa to find himself. Henderson's encounters with an African tribe and a Western-educated Reichian African chief provide comic relief and philosophical speculation in equal measure.

While Bellow was achieving success in his career during this period, his relationship with his wife, Anita, was experiencing unprecedented strain. Bellow was plagued by romantic trouble throughout his life; his novels and stories are filled with men and women who are either terribly unlucky in love or afraid to commit themselves. Bellow married four times after his marriage to Anita dissolved in 1953 and was famous for casting his dramatic relationships in print. Soon after he divorced Anita, he married Sondra Tschachasov, the model for the histrionic Madeleine in his later novel Herzog. His son Adam, from this first marriage, was born in 1957. His marriage to Sondra soon foundered, and Bellow married the writer Susan Glassman, with whom he had his son, Daniel. Later, he shared a brief marriage with the Eastern European mathematician Alexandra Tulcea. He spent his last years married to his former student Janis Freedman, with whom he had a daughter Naomi in 2000, five years before his death.

Throughout his life, Bellow looked to colleagues and literary friends for the stability and companionship he never received from wives and lovers. In New York, where Bellow moved for a time early in his career, the author tried to reignite old friendships and to meld with the Partisan Review circle, which included the editor Philip Rahv and the young future critical superstar Alfred Kazin. It was not, however, until he moved back to Chicago and began keeping company with the writer Richard Stern and his childhood friend Sam Freifeld that Bellow truly felt at home.

Bellow returned to Chicago after he experienced great success as a writer. Herzog marked a turning point in Bellow's career. While he had some degree of renown before his 1964 novel, Herzog catapulted the middle-aged author into the pantheon of American literary stars. In 1965 Bellow was awarded the International Literary Prize for Herzog, becoming the first American to receive the prize. In January 1968, the Republic of France awarded him the Croix de Chevalier des Arts et Lettres, the highest literary distinction awarded by that nation to noncitizens. Later that year, he received an award from an organization that recalled his origins in Montreal's Jewish neighborhood when he was given the B'nai B'rith Jewish Heritage Award for "excellence in Jewish literature." Both Herzog and Mr. Sammler's Planet (1970) were awarded the National Book Award for fiction. Humboldt's Gift (1975), a thinly veiled parable about the writer Delmore Schwartz and his experiences with artistry and madness, was awarded the Pulitzer Prize. In 1976, Bellow received the Nobel Prize in literature. In his oft-quoted acceptance speech, Bellow discussed his indebtedness to great modern authors, particularly Joseph Conrad, who dealt with what he called "the essence" of things, the large existential questions that weave through and motivate much of Bellow's fiction, from the plight of the individual in a mass society to the painful split between body and mind.

When Bellow was asked whether he thought he was awarded the Nobel Prize as a "Jewish writer" or an "American writer," he replied that he thought he had been given the prize simply for being "a writer." This discomfort with being defined as a Jewish writer is a theme that runs throughout Bellow's work. In a letter to the writer Cynthia Ozick, Bellow acknowledged the ambivalence that Jewish writers of his generation felt when faced with their immigrant Jewish pasts. He admitted that he and his fellow post-World War II Jewish-American writers had been particularly uncomfortable when addressing the issue of Jewishness because of the association with the Holocaust that Jewishness carried in the postwar era. Bellow wondered: How could American Jewish authors write about the Holocaust without casting Jews as eternal victims? How could Jewish-American writers compete in the world of high literature if they always had to be representative men, rather than individuals? While Bellow remained somewhat ambivalent about being described as a Jewish writer throughout his life, he increasingly engaged with explicitly Jewish themes in his fiction and analyzed how being Jewish had affected his own path as an author. Rather than mask the ethnic orientation of his hand-wringing intellectual antiheroes, as he did in his early work, the aged Bellow began to write autobiographical paeans to ambitious Jewish men not unlike him and the friends he had grown up with in Humboldt Park. In a speech he gave in 1970, he said:

The American Jews, the Jewish writers, are descendants of immigrants of the first part of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, and they fell in love with English and American poetry and life. It was a love affair, there was nothing contrived about it. You went to school, you read these great books and poems, and you were just shot down by them. The question whether they had a right to this language and to this literature was a lively question. In their own eyes they sometimes felt that they didn't have the right because they weren't born to the manor, and American society—at least its elite Anglo-Saxon elements—told them that they didn't come by it naturally and that it didn't really belong to them. But the evidence of the streets was different, because a new life was forming in American society which belonged to nobody, and therefore there was no reason why an American writer should accept the words of Henry James in his book The American Scene, for instance, in which he was so distressed by the Jewish East Side of New York and by what was happening to the English language on the East Side. . . . That is what I did and this is what many others like me did. (“Saul Bellow on America and American Jewish Writers”)

Bellow's meditations on both the anxiety that being Jewish evoked in many young writers and the power that resulted from the fact that “a new life was forming in American society which belonged to nobody” are powerful ideas that echo in Bellow's prose.

Bellow is renowned for many aspects of his literary gift, most notably his facility with language and the spirit of play and the “street” that he gave to his fiction. The lack of fear that Bellow gathered from his childhood in an America far from the world of Henry James allowed him to become the ultimate literary Renaissance man. While Bellow is best known for his work as a novelist and short story writer, he also wrote a number of plays, including The Last Analysis and three short plays, collectively entitled Under the Weather, which were produced on Broadway in 1966. Bellow also wrote a number of works of criticism and creative nonfiction during his literary career. He published a compendium of his essays, It All Adds Up, in 1994. His criticism appeared in such renowned publications as the New York Times Book Review, Commentary, and the New Republic. After a raucous life filled with failed marriages and unparalleled literary success, Bellow died in 2005 at the age of 90.

“Looking for Mr. Green” (1951)

“Looking for Mr. Green,” a short story Bellow published in Commentary magazine in 1951, tells the tale of George Grebe, an overeducated classics instructor who finds himself delivering relief checks during the depression. Grebe, the son of one of the last liveried butlers along Chicago's wealthy Gold Coast, finds himself in reduced circumstances in Bellow's celebrated story, forced to rely upon FDR's WPA for a job during the economic downswing of the 1930s. Assigned to deliver checks to the poorest of the poor in Chicago's black neighborhoods, Grebe is admonished by his cynical superior, Raynor, that he will experience difficulty locating the aid recipients because of their distrust for authority figures, particularly white authority figures. Armed with a briefcase full of youthful idealism and little else, Grebe fails at delivering relief checks but becomes obsessed with his inability to find a particular recipient, Tulliver Green, the “Mr. Green” of the story's title. Grebe's desperate search for this man becomes a nightmarish Virgilian tour through the poorest districts of Chicago and a metaphor for the experience of aimlessness and lack of purpose experienced by the many unemployed during the era.

This short early piece foreshadows a number of the concerns Bellow explored in later works. Like Bernard Malamud, the Jewish-American author and relative contemporary with whom Bellow was most often linked, the Chicago-bred writer was deeply engaged with questions of race throughout his career. In "Looking for Mr. Green," as in Malamud's early short stories "Angel Levine" and "Black Is My Favorite Color," Bellow manifests a belief in the possibility for profound interracial sympathy. George Grebe scorns the racist Italian grocer he meets during his relief rounds and experiences a moment of poignant identification with an elderly black relief recipient and war veteran. As Malamud's was, Bellow's perception of the possibility for interracial sympathy was strongly challenged by the Black Power movement in the late 1960s. His later works that deal with race relations, most notably the controversial Mr. Sammler's Planet (1970), a novel roughly contemporaneous with Malamud's dystopian The Tenants, depict a grotesque land of urban decay where black characters are representatives of violence and the primitive.

The character of George Grebe prefigures, too, Bellow's penchant for portraying down-on-their-luck intellectuals, who are unable to prosper in a culture where "the green," money, rules. Most notably, Grebe could be likened to Bellow's famously forlorn academic Moses Herzog, but he also resembles other Bellovian heroes, such as Humboldt von Fleischer, the Delmore Schwartzesque depressive of Humboldt's Gift, and Ravelstein, the protagonist of Bellow's last novel and a character closely based on the writer's friend Professor Allan Bloom.

The philosophical speculation and engagement with the great thinkers of the 20th century for which Bellow would become known find early expression in "Looking for Mr. Green." Particularly, Bellow creates lovely moments when the youthful Grebe pauses in his relief work to contemplate whether the poverty and degradation he sees are a part of the fleeting world of appearances or something more essential and immutable. Grebe's conversations with his supervisor Raynor, in which he becomes a stand-in for the principles of idealism against Raynor's jaded cynicism, often revolve around the question of whether the world, replete with poor relief recipients and dirty city streets, is a realm of appearance or reality. The introduction of the large and noisy Mrs. Staika and her five dirty-faced children into the relief offices makes ironic these casual interrogations of the nature of reality. Juxtaposing meditations on the abstract with the might of his concrete descriptions of the poor living in what he calls the "city-wilderness" of depression era Chicago, "In Search of Mr. Green" proves an incomparable introduction to the early work of Saul Bellow.

For Discussion or Writing

1. "Looking for Mr. Green" is one of Saul Bellow's most historically informed stories. The epigraph to Bellow's story, "Whatsoever the hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might," has particular resonance in the era in which the search for Mr. Green takes place. Look up the history of the WPA in an encyclopedia or trustworthy online source and discuss the implications of George Grebe's simultaneous search for Mr. Green and a purpose in life in Bellow's 1951 story. What does Bellow suggest is the fate of the idealistic intellectual in a money-making society?
2. Saul Bellow's interest in the possibility for sympathy between people of different races is a primary theme in "Looking for Mr. Green." It is also a strong element of Mr. Sammler's Planet, Bellow's 1970 novel set in New York City. How has Bellow's attitude toward racial questions changed in this later work? How do racial questions become inscribed on the urban landscapes of Chicago and New York City in the detailed descriptive passages of these two works?
3. Invisibility is an important theme in "Looking for Mr. Green." From the always-invisible Mr. Green to the many faceless aid recipients whom Grebe cannot begin to imagine, Bellow interweaves the idea of invisibility with race, poverty, and the death of the individual in society throughout his short story. How does Bellow's use of the theme of invisibility in this story compare to the use of invisibility by his friend and contemporary RALPH ELLISON in the famous novel Invisible Man?

4. The conflict between the worlds of appearance and essence is played out in a number of ways in “Looking for Mr. Green.” This conflict is dramatized particularly in the characters of Mrs. Staika, the demanding relief recipient, and the naked black woman who appears as a proxy for Mr. Green in the last pages of the story. Using these characters, analyze the importance of the disjuncture between appearance and reality in Bellow’s imaginary universe. What do these two characters have in common? How do they support or undermine the philosophical questions introduced in Grebe’s conversations with his supervisor, Raynor? Why are both these characters women?

The Adventures of Augie March* (1954)

Bellow’s third novel was heralded as one of the most remarkable novels in the history of American letters. Moving from the staid prose and elegant formalism of Dangling Man and The Victim, Bellow composed The Adventures of Augie March as an exuberant ode to the wild world of his Chicago youth. While Bellow continued to be interested in literary modernism, The Adventures of Augie March was less interested in exploring the world of an alienated modern hero trapped in the absurdity of the modern city, as many modernist novels were, than in providing a rollicking and nostalgic romp through the world of the young rogue Augie and his family. Colorful characters and baroque, almost Dickensian, descriptions of places and people characterize this novel. Loosely based on Bellow’s early observations of his ragtag next-door neighbors in the working-class Chicago Jewish neighborhood in which he spent most of his childhood, The Adventures of Augie March tells the story of the March family, particularly brothers Augie and Simon March, and their fatherless clan. Their boarder and de facto matriarch Grandma Lausch, who rules over her adopted family with an iron fist and the help of her pet poodle, Winnie, dominates the Marches.

The plot of The Adventures of Augie March is a convoluted one. Bellow’s narration takes Augie from Chicago to Mexico and back on a series of realistic but enchanted adventures. Contrary to Bellow’s more plot-driven early novels and short stories, The Adventures of Augie March proves a chance for Bellow to demonstrate the power of his descriptive gifts. Augie’s neighborhood in Chicago is rendered in minute detail. Bellow seems to have memorized every lamppost and backyard plot in the area and given it a name. Influenced by French existentialist fiction, like that produced by Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus, Bellow’s The Adventures of Augie March focuses on the power of the individual to shape his/her own life in a landscape otherwise devoid of meaning. Young Augie’s only allegiance is to his romantic ideas of the self, ideas that, Bellow insists, are eminently transportable, unlike the business ideals espoused by others in his neighborhood.

Most strikingly, in The Adventures of Augie March Bellow abandons formal English for a playful and idiomatic Yiddish-inflected American English. The first lines of this novel are famous precisely because they herald Bellow’s embrace of an ordinary American literary voice. Bellow introduces Augie to the reader with the following words: “I am an American, Chicago born—Chicago, that somber city—and go at things as I have taught myself, free-style, and will make the record in my own way: first to knock, first admitted; sometimes an innocent knock, sometimes a not so innocent. But a man’s character is his fate, says Heraclitus, and in the end there isn’t any way to disguise the nature of the knocks by acoustical work on the door or gloving the knuckles.” (1). In interviews, Bellow said that he had written his wild third novel with its uniquely American protagonist as a lark of sorts, an attempt to get away from his stilted and unfinished manuscript “The Crab and the Butterfly.”

As does Heraclitus, the heroic figure invoked in the opening lines of The Adventures of Augie March, Augie embraces the idea that his fate is determined by character, rather than by biology or environment. Influenced by the Chicago immigrant milieu that Bellow depicts in his 1953 novel, the character-dictating-fate adage takes on added weight. Although set in the same depression era Chicago as “Looking for Mr. Green,” The Adventures of Augie March suggests that it is possible for a poor young boy to escape the bonds of his childhood into the wide world. Like George Grebe in “Looking for Mr. Green,” Augie is a man in search of his fate. In seeking a purpose in life, he tries out a series of ever-more-strange jobs, from dog groomer to smuggler and boxing coach, without ever realizing his dreams of being a teacher. Unlike Grebe’s, however, Augie’s tale is, for the most part, a hopeful one.

Bellow sees his childhood Chicago through a nostalgic veil. Grandma Lausch, boss Einhorn, Five Properties, and Dingbat, some of the colorful characters who make up Augie’s world, are directly out of Bellow’s experience growing up in the Humboldt Park neighborhood of Chicago. These characters’ every quirk becomes a part of the fairy tale landscape of the novel.

Part of what is so subversive and powerful about Bellow’s work in The Adventures of Augie March results precisely from the fact that the reader is left without a clear idea of how to classify the novel. Is it a fairy tale, as some of the characters and plot points of the novel suggest, or an immigrant saga? In The Adventures of Augie March, Bellow experimented with a number of literary forms, from the Bildungsroman (the coming-of-age novel) to the picaresque adventure tale. His combination of Yiddishisms and wild multiple noun and verb sentences with mythical and biblical allusions simultaneously locates Bellow within the pantheon of English literature and the life of the street he celebrates throughout his groundbreaking novel. In the end, however, the reader is left to question the success of Augie’s unquenchable quest for freedom. Bellow suggests that Augie’s desire for love, symbolized by his affair with Thea Fenchel, is not compatible with his driving refusal of commitment of any sort.

For Discussion or Writing

1. The Adventures of Augie March is the first novel in which Saul Bellow attempts to provide his readers with a comprehensive idea of America and American life. As many critics have pointed out, the title of Bellow’s 1953 novel, as well as the playful hero Augie, call to mind the quintessentially American novel The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Why might Bellow have sought to invoke Mark Twain’s novel and the archetypal hero Huck in his depiction of an immigrant boy’s adventures? How does the historical period in which Bellow’s novel is written necessitate a revision of the Huckish protagonist’s adventures? How might we compare these novels?
2. How does Bellow’s preoccupation with the manner in which American business culture structures the possibilities for the individual in American society emerge in The Adventures of Augie March? Using Bellow’s later novella, Seize the Day, discuss the way in which Bellow uses the relationships among family members to depict the choices available for youth in America during the time in which he was writing. How does Bellow write social conflicts onto familial relations in these two works?
3. Augie is the ultimate proponent of freedom at all costs. Any attempts by a boss or love interest to pin him down send the young, prototypically American hero into flight. How does Augie prefigure a host of subsequent American literary heroes, most notably the highly eloquent and commitment-phobic heroes of PHILIP ROTH’s oeuvre, such as Nathan Zuckerman and Alexander Portnoy? Why might such a character be appealing to a postwar American literary audience?
4. The conflict between determinism and freedom is a central theme in The Adventures of Augie March from the first pages of the novel, when Bellow invokes the classical hero Heraclitus to emphasize young Augie’s insistence on avoiding being determined by his background. Why would this theme take on particular significance for an immigrant author? How does Bellow revise this common theme of myth by locating his story in an immigrant neighborhood in depression era Chicago?
5. Many commentators have noted the muscular and vivacious prose style and narrative voice Bellow embraces in The Adventures of Augie March. How does Bellow's use of language affect our reading of the novel? How does it construct the tone of Augie's adventures?

Seize the Day* (1956)

Although one of Bellow's shorter works, Seize the Day is also one of his most ambitious. Written in an era in which business culture was king, and artists like Bellow were seen as the antidote to the crass consumerism of the masses, Seize the Day juxtaposes the high-minded idealism of art and the individual against the excesses of mass culture and the stock market. The story of the abject salesman Tommy Wilhelm that forms the crux of Seize the Day is Bellow's take on the American myth of success. Much like Jay Gatsby in Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby or Willie Loman in ARTHUR MILLER's Death of a Salesman, Tommy Wilhelm is a figure whose complete trust in the American idea of economic success and cultural prestige sows the seeds of his destruction.

Throughout Seize the Day, Bellow contrasts the sad but majestic individual, Tommy Wilhelm, against the crowd. Tommy is seen amid the rushing crowds of Midtown Manhattan and amid the successful elderly businessmen in his father's apartment complex. Seize the Day is primarily the story of a successful father and the son whom he perceives as a failure in business and manhood. Tommy is the ultimate failure. He is unable to achieve success in marriage or as a father or, most particularly, as a son. Equally impressed by high-flying businessmen and the celebrity culture of Hollywood, Tommy is taken in by a series of con men. Basing it in part on an experience Bellow had as a youth, he provides a hilarious satire of America's obsession with Hollywood when he depicts Tommy Wilhelm's audition for a shady showbiz agent. Later in the novella, the pseudopsychologist and stock market speculator Tamkin, a father figure who manipulates the praise-seeking younger man, takes in Tommy.

As in "Looking for Mr. Green" and Herzog, in Seize the Day Bellow reveals a preoccupation with larger philosophical questions, particularly the question of time and how it works. Seize the Day, with its ironic invocation of the famous Latin phrase "Carpe diem," takes place in one day. The day in the life of Tommy Wilhelm to which Bellow treats his readers stands in for all life, and the inevitable movement toward death that life carries. Seize the Day is filled with speculations about time. Tommy's interest in the stock market is about the future and his desire to control it. His interest in psychology and the psychoanalyst Dr. Tamkin arises from his parallel desire to master the past, particularly the death of his mother, about which he feels unbearably guilty because of the nature of his activities on the day she died. So, too, Tommy Wilhelm's relationship with his father is simultaneously about the past, his mother's death, and the child's ("Wilkie," as his father patronizingly calls him) past failures, and about the future, his father's impending death, and the old man's overweening fear of it.

As in David Reisman's The Lonely Crowd (1950), a book popular at the time Bellow wrote Seize the Day, the power of mass culture is seen to spell the end of the power of the individual in society. As society is ever more governed by the need for conformity, the individual's every response becomes mechanized according to the tastes of the larger public. Seize the Day is Bellow's ode to the abject man in the crowd.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In many ways, Seize the Day is a story about con men. Dr. Tamkin and the theatrical agent who promises Tommy Wilhelm a bright future as a second banana in pictures are the most obvious con men in the novella. But who else in Bellow's work might be seen as untrustworthy? Can we trust Tommy as a narrator? Is his confession trustworthy? What might Bellow be attempting to say about American culture through his use of con men in this novella?
2. What part do mourning and death play in the novel? As Bellow makes clear throughout Seize the Day, both Tommy Wilhelm and his father are in arrested states of mourning and depression. How does Bellow construct the mournful tone of the novella? What do you make of the funeral scene at the end of Seize the Day and how might it be linked to Bellow's choice to make his novella take place during the course of the day?

3. As mentioned, Bellow had an ambivalent relationship to Jewishness throughout his career. How does Jewishness play or not play a role in Seize the Day? How does the Holocaust maintain an off-stage presence in this novella about the impossibility of properly mourning?
4. In Seize the Day, Bellow explores one of the themes that recur throughout his prose, the conflict between surfaces and depth, another way to render the clash between appearance and reality that George Grebe laments in "Looking for Mr. Green." How does the role of secrets dramatize this conflict in Seize the Day? Why does everyone from the man doling out mail at the front desk to Tommy's father have a secret?
5. Like David Reisman's The Lonely Crowd, Seize the Day is deeply invested in the plight of the individual in mass culture. How might Reisman's ideas apply to Bellow's novella? How is Seize the Day a novel simultaneously about business culture and the death of the individual in society?

Herzog* (1964)

As Seize the Day does, Herzog focuses on a short time span in the life of a budding failure. Herzog, often viewed as the Bellow's midcareer tour de force, tells the story of five days in the life of the narcissistic but silver-tongued intellectual Moses Herzog, a Jewish professor and writer of Bellow's generation and a thinly veiled stand-in for the author himself. After his wife, Madeleine, leaves him for his best friend, the red-haired dandy Valentine Gersbach, Herzog descends into madness. In Bellow's hands, however, Herzog remains lucid in his madness. Between visits to the ridiculous Freudian psychoanalyst Edvig, who also has his wife as a patient, Herzog writes letters to figures from Nietzsche to God, decrying the decay of society in a manner that recalls Spengler's famous The Decline of Western Civilization, an early influence on Bellow.

After having been dispossessed by his wife, Herzog retreats to Ludeyville, where he has a small home in the Berkshire Mountains. Tormented by the filthy and disintegrating house, as well as visions of his wife's infidelity and his best friend's betrayal, Moses begins a letter-writing campaign unlike any seen before. While Herzog is primarily a comic novel, it contains many tragic elements and serious meditations on the need for Americans to return to a sense of morality and the social contract.

In this novel, as in his earlier novella Seize the Day, Bellow engages with the sorry fate of the individual within the mass culture of the period. At the same time that Herzog is a story of the death of the subject, however, it is also a tale of the misadventures of a cuckolded husband. Modeled on Bellow's own breakup with his second wife, Sondra, and his strained relationship with their child, Herzog is a wild satire that leaves none of its characters, least of all Herzog himself, unscathed. Perhaps it is for this reason that Herzog, Bellow's most ambitious and intellectual work, was also his most popular, going on to become a best seller.

For Discussion or Writing

1. The epistolary style (novel in letter form) is central to Bellow's construction of Herzog. Why does Bellow choose to evoke so much through the medium of the letter? What does it say that Bellow constructs an imaginary dialogue between his protagonist and a host of other characters to evoke the pain Herzog experiences as he laments the impossibility of true social connection in the alienated age in which he lives?
2. Throughout Bellow's award-winning novel, the reader is left to question Moses Herzog's sanity and trustworthiness as a narrator. We see the events of Herzog's marriage unfold through his eyes alone. Is Moses mad? How is the theme of madness developed in Herzog? How does Bellow's critique of psychoanalysis structure his 1964 novel?
3. When Herzog retires to his house in the Berkshires, he obsesses over the events surrounding his wife's affair with his best friend. As in "Looking for Mr. Green," Herzog focuses upon the possibility of discerning the truth beneath the world of appearances that composes modernity. Does Herzog ever discover the real details of the affair? How does Herzog's pursuit of the details of his wife's affair through interviewing his friends and reviewing his own memories say more about him than about his wife? How does Bellow deal with the theme of realities versus appearances in this novel?

4. Herzog has been described as one of the masterpieces of 20th-century American satire. Look up the definition of satire in a literary encyclopedia or trustworthy Internet source and outline the principles of the genre. What is Bellow attempting to satirize in Herzog? How does he make it clear from the first pages of his novel that he is attempting to parody his characters and themes, even as he develops them? How might the use of satire and parody be Bellow's attempt to write a novel against the tradition of modernist solemnity that he espoused in his early works?

Humboldt's Gift* (1975)

Published the year before he would receive the coveted Nobel Prize in literature, Humboldt's Gift is a masterwork on a smaller scale than Herzog. Where Herzog gives the reader a tour through much of 20th-century philosophy with the hysterical academic Moses Herzog as guide, Humboldt's Gift tells the sad, but comical, tale of foils Charlie Citrine and Humboldt von Fleischer. Humboldt was modeled on the writer Delmore Schwartz, an artist touted as the great new hope of modern poetry in the 1950s, only to die at a young age after a struggle with mental illness and substance abuse. At the beginning of Bellow's 1975 novel, Citrine is himself a middling poet, who wastes his time pursuing troubled women and the excitement of petty crime. Gradually, however, Citrine becomes Bellow's eyes and ears. He sets his penetrating gaze on the failing poet Humboldt and narrates a pitch-perfect tale of the great man's decline that becomes a meditation on the failure of modern society to support artistic genius. All the ideals of modern society, from the science-minded surveys of Kinsey and Gallup to the alienating structures of capitalism and the theories of Freud, combine to subvert Humboldt's gift, according to Citrine. Humboldt's descent into madness, which Citrine gorgeously and comically narrates in Humboldt's Gift, is a metaphor for the larger social decline that he observes in the 20th century.

The 60-year-old Citrine begins to realize that he must leave his home in Chicago and begin a quest for spiritual fulfillment, far from the maddening world that felled Humboldt. In the last pages of the novel, Humboldt sees crocuses pushing up through the cracks in the sidewalk and has a moment of awakening, an "epiphanic" moment in which he begins to see the beauty in the world around him and a means of avoiding the sad fate of the sensitive artist in the cold modern world.

For Discussion or Writing

1. At the time that Bellow wrote Humboldt's Gift, he was undergoing his own transformation, coming under the sway of the mystical school of anthroposophy founded by Rudolph Steiner. Consult an encyclopedia or trustworthy Internet site and learn about anthroposophy. How do such transcendental schools of thought and theories of essential self play a part in Humboldt's Gift? If you are also familiar with some of Freud's ideas, do you see Bellow commenting on those ideas in the novel? Why or why not?
2. As many readers of the time knew, Humboldt von Fleischer was a thinly veiled stand-in for the poet Delmore Schwartz. Look up Delmore Schwartz in a literary encyclopedia and look at his famous first work, In Dreams Come Responsibilities. Why was he such an emblematic author for writers of Bellow's generation? How does his character shine a light on the failures of society in Humboldt's Gift?
3. Again, in 1975's Humboldt's Gift, Bellow focuses on the subject of madness, this time through Humboldt's struggle with manic depression. How does madness work in this novel? How is it employed differently here than in Herzog, Bellow's other great novel of madness?
4. Gender plays an important role in Humboldt's Gift, as it does elsewhere in Bellow's oeuvre. Compare the portrayal of masculinity in this novel and in

- . “Saul Bellow on America and American Jewish Writers.” Congress Bi-Weekly. December 4, 1970. Available online. URL: <http://www.nextbook.org/cultural/feature.html?id=94>. Accessed May 28, 2007.
- Bigler, Walter. Figures of Madness in Saul Bellow's Longer Fiction. Bern: Peter Lang, 1998.
- Bloom, Allan. Closing of the American Mind. Foreword by Saul Bellow. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. Saul Bellow. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.
- Brahm, Jeanne. A Sort of Columbus: The American Voyages of Saul Bellow's Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1984.
- Cronin, Gloria. A Room of His Own: In Search of the Feminine in the Novels of Saul Bellow. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2001.
- Cronin, Gloria L., and L. H. Goldman, eds. Saul Bellow in the 1980s: A Collection of Critical Essays. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1989.
- Cronin, Gloria L., and Ben Siegel, eds. Conversations with Saul Bellow. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994.
- Eichelberger, Julia. Prophets of Recognition: Ideology and the Individual in Novels by Ralph Ellison, Toni Morrison, Saul Bellow, and Eudora Welty. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1999.
- Goldman, L. H. Saul Bellow's Moral Vision: A Critical Study of the Jewish Experience. New York: Irvington, 1983.
- Harris, Mark. Saul Bellow: Drumlin Woodchuck. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1980.
- Hyland, Peter. Saul Bellow. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Kramer, Michael, ed. New Essays on Seize the Day. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- “Literature 1976.” Nobelprize.org. Available online. URL: http://nobelprize.org/nobel_prizes/literature/laureates/1976/index.html. Accessed May 28, 2007.
- Newman, Judie. Saul Bellow and History. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984.
- The Official Saul Bellow Society Web site. Available online. URL: <http://www.saulbellow.org/NavigationBar/TheLibrary.html#augiemarch>. Accessed March 25, 2009.
- Pifer, Ellen. Saul Bellow against the Grain. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- Rosenfeld, Isaac. Preserving the Hunger: An Isaac Rosenfeld Reader. Edited and introduced by Mark Shechner, foreword by Saul Bellow. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1988.
- Roth, Philip. Shoptalk: A Writer and His Colleagues and Their Work. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 2001.
- Sicher, Ephraim. Holocaust Novelists. Detroit: Gale, 2004.
- Trachtenberg, Stanley. Critical Essays on Saul Bellow. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1979.
- Wasserman, Harriet. Handsome Is: Adventures with Saul Bellow: A Memoir. New York: Fromm International, 1997.
- Weber, Donald. Haunted in the New World: Jewish American Culture from Cahan to the Goldbergs. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2005.
- Wilson, Jonathan. Herzog: The Limits of Ideas. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Jennifer Glaser

ELIZABETH BISHOP (1911–1979)

Oh, must we dream our dreams and have them, too?

(“Questions of Travel”)

Born in Worcester, Massachusetts, Elizabeth Bishop died in Boston, a little over 50 miles from the town where she began her life. However, the relative proximity of these two locations belies the fact that Bishop was, in fact, a wanderer, a traveler, an explorer. In truth, her whole life is filled with such contradictions. Seeking a secure and stable home, Bishop was almost always displaced, in motion. Given to deep introspection, she loathed the confessional or indulgent in her own writing; working in a literary/auditory medium, she possessed a painterly eye, and many of her poems are conspicuously visual; striving to complete poems that were as close to fact as memory permitted, she often used reality as a springboard to the fantastic.

Though in her later years Bishop focused intently on her childhood, we have relatively few objective accounts of it. Most information is found either in her recollections in letters, her autobiographical stories, or her poetry. We do know that Bishop was born on February 8, 1911, to William Thomas Bishop and Gertrude Bulmer Bishop, both of Canadian ancestry. William Bishop was a prominent, well-educated builder from a prosperous middle-class family. According to letters from her father announcing her birth, Elizabeth was a welcome addition to a loving home. Nevertheless, this happiness was short lived. William Bishop died of Bright’s disease (a general catch-all diagnosis in the early 1900s for any sort of kidney-related disease) when Elizabeth was only eight months old. The reality of the loss, however, goes much deeper than Thomas Bishop’s death. While Elizabeth was obviously deprived of her father from a young age, she lost both parents with his passing. Whether her mother was mentally unstable before her husband’s death is not certain, but she suffered a mental breakdown after it and never fully recovered. As a result, Gertrude Bulmer Bishop was only a shadow in young Elizabeth’s life, and though she lived until 1934, the majority of her life was spent in institutions, and she never was able to care for her daughter.

With her father’s death and her mother’s subsequent breakdown, Elizabeth returned with her mother to live in Great Village, Nova Scotia, with the Bulmers. The time spent as a young girl under the care of her grandparents heavily influenced Bishop’s writing. Because of her mother’s frequent hospitalizations, Elizabeth saw herself essentially as an orphan in an isolated, tight-knit community, a “guest,” attended to by older relatives; Great Village later represented for her an idealized childhood and the strong family connections that she attempted to recreate throughout her life. One of the most direct accounts of Bishop's impressions of that period appears in her short story "In the Village" (Collected Prose 251–274). Set against the pastoral backdrop of the comforting, peaceful village and told from a child's perspective, the story details a mother's release from a mental institution and her subsequent return to it at the story's end. The story emphasizes the child's fears and uncertainty about her mother's intrusive presence through two primary opposing symbols: the beautiful, rhythmic clang of a hammer against a blacksmith's anvil (life in the village) and the unsettling dread contained in a woman's scream (her mother). Life in Great Village also stirred in Bishop a love for nature and the outdoors, although she suffered from numerous lung-related infections and was prone to long bouts of bronchitis. As a result, formal education was difficult.

Whatever stability Bishop might have known as a child was overturned after her mother's final hospitalization in 1916, when Elizabeth was forcibly removed from Great Village by her paternal grandparents to live with them in Worcester, Mass. Though well intentioned in their desire to see her raised in the best that they could afford her, Bishop never fully overcame the shock and loss of the life in Great Village. While she lived with her father's parents for less than a year, it marked her deeply. She recounted this sense of displacement in her memoir "The Country Mouse" (Collected Prose 13–34). In Worcester, she truly was isolated—assigned formal playmates chosen by her grandmother, raised by servants. Here she began to evidence the debilitating and chronic asthma that plagued her throughout her adult life.

In 1918 Bishop's mother's eldest sister, Maude, liberated young Elizabeth from her grandparents' household. By all accounts, they were forced to concede she was miserable with them and allowed Maude to take Elizabeth to see whether she could do better. While conditions in Maude's home were certainly not "privileged" in any respect, Bishop was always indebted to her aunt Maude's generosity and expressed deep affection for her. She also credited Maude's love of literature and her "teeming bookshelves" as early influences for her writing. Under Maude's care, Elizabeth blossomed, winning her first recognition (a five-dollar gold piece) as a writer at age 12 for an essay on Americanism. She was also able to reunite with her Bulmer grandparents, returning summers to Great Village to spend time with them. Her father's family maintained a strong, active presence in her life; a generous bequest from her father's estate financed her formal education, first at Walnut Hill School for Girls and later at Vassar, where she graduated in 1934.

Apart from completing college, 1934 was a pivotal year in Bishop's life: Her mother died and Bishop was introduced to Marianne Moore. A fellow alumna of Vassar, Moore was a graduate of the famous class of 1933, which served as background for Mary McCarthy's autobiographical novel The Group. Moore and Bishop shared a love for animals and nature, with a strong penchant toward the unusual, and their first outing together was to the circus to see the animals and feed the elephants. Animals play an important role throughout many of Bishop's poems including poems titled after their subject, such as "The Rooster," "The Armadillo," and "The Moose." Animal symbolism figures prominently also in poems such as "At the Fishhouses," where a playful seal works as a means of revelation.

Moore also encouraged Bishop greatly in her efforts toward a career as a poet, serving as a mentor and sponsor. In her memoir, "Efforts of Affection," Bishop indicates that Moore's influence left her "inspired, determined to be good, to work harder . . . never to try to publish anything until I thought I'd done my best with it" (Complete Prose 137). Like Moore, Bishop was meticulous in the execution of her work, often taking decades to produce a finished poem. Unlike Moore, however, she was reticent to present herself to the public, and it was not until her later years that she followed Moore's pattern of writing, teaching, and giving public readings; however, this course seems to have resulted more from financial necessity than from desire. Under Moore's patronage, Bishop's first poems were published in 1935 in Trial Balances, an anthology of new poets introduced by more established writers.

From 1935 to 1945, Bishop lived primarily in Key West and New York and traveled extensively through Europe, Mexico, and Morocco. Her companion and lover for a majority of this time was Louise Crane, another friend from her Vassar years. Unlike Bishop, who had limited financial resources, Crane came from a wealthy background and attracted many bright and influential people from the worlds of art, literature, and music into her circle. Through Louise Crane, Bishop met Billie Holliday, her inspiration for the poem "Songs for a Colored Singer." Crane also introduced Bishop to the woman who would later provide the most significant personal relationship in her life—Lota de Macedo Soares. Bishop kept extensive journals of her travels from this time, working and publishing poems primarily in the New Yorker and the Partisan Review. Key West gave Bishop a setting for a number of notable poems, including "The Fish" and "The Bight." The house where she lived with Louise Crane in Key West became the first of the "three loved houses" in "One Art." However, her health still caused problems, primarily due to her asthma and an ever-increasing dependence on alcohol.

In 1946 Bishop was selected to receive the Houghton Mifflin Literary Fellowship for her manuscript North and South. Bishop had received a recommendation for the award from Marianne Moore, and the honor carried with it a cash prize of $1,000 and publication of her book of poems. North and South was greeted with great acclaim and established Bishop as a major new American poet. Some of her best-known works including "The Man-Moth," "The Fish," "Florida," and "The Map" appear here.

Apart from the acclaim, an additional benefit Bishop received from the publication of North and South was that it called her to the attention of her fellow poet the literary critic RANDALL JARRELL, who reviewed the book. Jarrell introduced Bishop to her second important mentor and friend, ROBERT LOWELL. Whereas Marianne Moore had influenced Bishop in the way she approached her poetry, Lowell was a much more practical mentor. He helped Bishop understand how to obtain financing through fellowships and grants so that she could continue her work; she was awarded her first Guggenheim Fellowship in 1947. Because her family's legacy was limited, Bishop learned to rely on these monies to support her, and when they proved insufficient in her later years, she turned to teaching. Lowell helped Bishop secure and persuaded her to accept the position of consultant in poetry to the Library of Congress from 1949 to 1951, a precursor to today's poet laureate consultant in poetry.

After her time in this position, Bishop received the first Lucy Martin Donnelly Fellowship in Poetry from Bryn Mawr College. Using this money, Bishop fulfilled a lifelong desire to travel to South America with plans to sail up the Amazon. When she fell ill in Rio de Janeiro after eating the fruit of a cashew tree, she was nursed back to health by one of the acquaintances she was visiting, Lota de Macedo Soares. However, when Bishop was well enough to resume travel, Soares declared her love for Bishop, asking her to stay, promising to build her a writing studio in the home she was constructing north of Rio in the Brazilian countryside. Bishop later wrote of Soares's offer, "It just meant everything to me." Bishop lived with Soares from 1952 until 1967, moving first into Soares's home in Samambaia and later into a home Bishop purchased in Ouro Preto, Brazil. As did the residence in Key West that she shared with Louise Crane, the homes she shared with Lota de Macedo Soares would also figure in her poem "One Art" as the second and third of her "three loved houses."

With the stability and love Soares provided, Bishop entered into one of the most happy and productive periods of her life. Bishop loved Brazil—not only for the beauty of the country, but also for the warmth and generosity of the people. The freedom she enjoyed with Soares allowed her to explore new themes and forms in her work. She began to incorporate childhood memories, and she published her autobiographical short story "In the Village" in the New Yorker in 1953. She also learned Portuguese well enough to translate The Diary of Helena Morley, a classic Brazilian memoir of a 12-year-old girl from a rural mining village, published in 1957. Helena Morley was a personal favorite for Bishop, who identified strongly with the story of the young heroine's isolation and resilience; unfortunately, the book did not enjoy commercial success. Conversely, a joint effort with the editors of Life magazine, where she provided the text for a pictorial book, Brazil, published in 1962, was extremely lucrative for Bishop, but artistically unsatisfying.

Her most important work of this period occurred in 1955, when Bishop submitted her second book of poems, A Cold Spring, for publication. When the publisher feared that the 20 new poems were insufficient material for a whole volume, Bishop suggested that they be included with a reissue of North & South. The new work, Poems: North & South—A Cold Spring, included such notable poems as “At the Fishhouses,” “Over 2,000 Illustrations and a Complete Concordance,” and “The Bight.” The book was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in poetry in 1956.

Though Bishop was happy in her personal life with Soares, political strife in Brazil drove a wedge between them. Empowered by the newly elected governor of the region, Soares became consumed with efforts to reclaim a large section of land (roughly the size of New York's Central Park) and build a “people's park.” When the opposing parties in the government met her efforts with resistance, Soares turned her attention from Bishop to focus more fully on her project. However, the failed effort to construct the park ultimately undermined her health as well as straining her relationship with Bishop, who turned (as was her custom) to alcohol for relief in times of stress.

Bishop received a fellowship from the Academy of American Poets in 1964 and published her third book of poems, Questions of Travel, in 1965. This was not sufficient, however, to relieve the financial stress that Soares had placed on them. Because Soares had depleted most of their savings in her efforts to build the people's park, Bishop decided to accept a teaching offer from the University of Washington in 1966. Soares refused to accompany her to the United States, and when Bishop returned after two semesters as writer in residence, their troubles worsened. Soares was diagnosed with arteriosclerosis and her health deteriorated rapidly, forcing her to resign as head of the park project. Bishop's health was also fragile, and her heavy drinking only contributed to the problems. Doctors recommended a separation for the two, hoping it would allow Soares to recover. However, when Bishop returned to New York, Soares followed shortly thereafter and on her first night with Bishop in the United Stage took a fatal overdose of sleeping pills.

Devastated, Bishop tried to resume life in Brazil, though she was treated badly by former friends and relations there, who held her partially responsible for Soares's death. While she did not publish new work during this time, her next book, a collection entitled The Complete Poems, appeared in 1969 and was awarded the National Book Award for poetry.

Recognizing that life in Brazil without Soares was impossible, Bishop moved back to Boston, where she settled permanently. She also began to teach at Harvard, invited by Robert Lowell to teach his courses while he was on leave in England. Brazil still figured prominently in her work, however, and after years of struggle to overcome her grief, in 1976 Bishop produced her final volume of original poetry, Geography III. The book combines much of what is distinctly Bishop—precise description, dreamlike visions, and childhood revelations. Containing some of Bishop's most well known poems, “The Moose,” “In the Waiting Room,” “One Art,” and “Crusoe in England,” the book was awarded the National Book Critics Circle Award. It is dedicated to Alice Methfessel, whom Bishop met after moving to Boston, and who became the final important love relationship in her life.

That same year Bishop became the first American and the first woman to receive the Neustadt International Prize for Literature. Though she expressed a strong desire to retire, finances would not allow her to, and Bishop continued to teach and give public readings of her poetry until her sudden death of a cerebral hemorrhage in 1979. She was buried in Worcester, her gravestone inscribed with words she chose for her epitaph, the final lines from her poem "The Bight": "All the untidy activity continues, / awful but cheerful" (Complete Poems 61).

"The Man-Moth" (1936)

"The Man-Moth" is a fantastical tale of a mysterious underground creature seeking the Moon, troubled by dreams, riding backward on the subway through the night. He is part loner, part urban dweller, but in many ways he is a representation of the artist, whose vision and self-sacrifice provide the basis for the regeneration of others. Said to be inspired by a newspaper misprint of the word mammoth, the poem also uses details taken from Bishop's journal notes while living in New York City.

The world of "The Man-Moth" is a world of shadow, similar to the setting of "The Weed," where everything happens at night, in the darkness. The poem concerns two main beings: Man lives above the Earth but cannot see the Moon, aware only of the light cast by it, his shadow, "only as big as his hat" (line 2); Man-Moth emerges from his home underground to investigate the Moon, "a small hole at the top of the sky" (line 14). As does Harold Lloyd, clambering up the side of a building in the silent film Safety Last, the Man-Moth scales the skyscrapers of the city in an effort to push his head through the "pinhole" in the sky into the light beyond. Watching from below, Man knows this effort is impossible; Bishop tells us "he has no such illusions" (line 22). However, "what the Man-Moth fears most he must do" (line 23).

Though the Man-Moth's quest is futile, Bishop does not present the lonely creature as an object of ridicule. Indeed, the journey is described in cyclical terms: This happens each time, and the Man-Moth continues in the persistent belief that each time he will succeed. When the Man-Moth returns to the underground, he boards a subway train, "facing the wrong way / and the train starts at once at its full, terrible speed, / without a shift in gears or a gradation of any sort. / He cannot tell the rate at which he travels backwards" (line 29–32).

If we look at Bishop's own life and her progression as an artist, the poem is eerily prescient. Bishop knows the artist always travels looking backward; however, for her, experience and memory do not provide refuge, but troubled visions instead. In the same manner, "Each night [the Man-Moth] must / be carried through artificial tunnels and dream recurrent dreams" (lines 33–34). It is sad that, there is no destination for the creature—or for the artist; instead, implies Bishop, both are always in motion, and even in rest, there is no satisfaction. Though the idea of death, and permanent rest, is appealing as the Man-Moth rides backward through the night, in the "pale subways of cement he calls home" (line 20), he understands "he does not dare look out the window, / for the third rail, the unbroken draught of poison / runs there beside him" (lines 36–38). Death, or more accurately suicide, even though it offers a chance of escape, is seen as an indulgence. Bishop tells us the Man-Moth "regards it as a disease / he has inherited the susceptibility to" (lines 38–39).

In the final stanza of the poem as we encounter the Man-Moth directly, Bishop reveals her view of the value of the artist: "If you catch him; / hold up a flashlight to his eye. It's all dark pupil, / an entire night itself" (lines 41–43). As a reward for this contact, the Man-Moth offers up the only thing he has to give: "one tear, his only possession, like the bee's sting" (line 45). But, says Bishop, the gift is not offered easily: "If you're not paying attention / he'll swallow it" (lines 46–47). For Bishop as an artist, the willingness to offer up her "eye," the pain associated with truth, would much more easily be swallowed. She may offer her artistic vision of the world to others in the same manner the Man-Moth reluctantly offers the tear, but contained in the offering is water, "cool as from underground springs and pure enough to drink" (line 48).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Bishop's poem "The Weed." As you read it, what comparisons can you make to ideas in

- “The Man-Moth”? How does Bishop attempt to define herself as an artist in both poems?
2. Bishop introduces the third rail of the subway track, the electric rail that runs above the regular track, as a symbol of death. But just as the third rail of the subway is deadly to anyone who might touch it, it also provides power to propel the train. How does the idea of death “energize” the artist?
 3. The tear that the Man-Moth offers to anyone willing to hold a light up to his eye seems to have regenerative powers. Why do you think that Bishop shifts from a third-person view in the poem to second person at this moment? How does this work in with the idea of the Man-Moth as a representation of Bishop’s poetry or art in general?

“The Unbeliever” (1938)

Though Bishop was not religious, certainly not Christian in any traditional sense, she was grounded in Christian theology, and Christian symbols and themes populate much of her work. In “The Unbeliever,” Bishop addresses no-belief as a belief system but also suggests that faith itself is little more than willed ignorance.

Beginning the poem with a reference to the quintessential Puritan handbook, Pilgrim’s Progress, Bishop’s Unbeliever sleeps atop a mast above the sea. He knows that his perch is precarious, dangerous, but he chooses to keep “his eyes fast closed” (line 2). Contrasting the Unbeliever’s fear and desire to stay asleep, Bishop introduces two alternate points of view, illustrating how sight and perception are related to belief. First, we hear from a cloud that imagines that he is founded on marble pillars and never moves. Looking down into the sea, he has all the justification for his beliefs that he needs: “Secure in introspection, he peers at the watery pillars of his own reflection” (lines 14–15).

Next a gull supposes that the air itself is “like marble” (line 18) and that he will forever be buoyed by “marble wings on my tower-top fly” (line 20). If the cloud envisions a world where he never moves, the gull sees the world as unceasing movement toward heaven. What links the two disparate points of view is the fact that they are so obviously misguided but that they believe what they believe absolutely.

In the last stanza of the poem the gull reads the dream of the Unbeliever: “I must not fall. / The spangled sea below wants me to fall. / It is hard as diamonds; it wants to destroy us all” (lines 23–25). Though the Unbeliever is mistaken that the sea is hard as diamonds in the same way the cloud thinks he is perched atop a marble pillar or that the gull thinks his wings are marble, the Unbeliever is correct in his fears—the sea poses the threat of death and destruction.

“The Unbeliever” is unusual for Bishop, in that she never injects herself into the poem. Unlike “The Man-Moth,” where we can discern Bishop’s admiration for and identification with the Man-Moth, in this poem she chooses to give each point of view his own speech, clearly identifying each perspective, but not claiming one for herself. Though the Unbeliever is not a source of ridicule or disdain as are the arrogant, foolish cloud and gull, neither is he a source of inspiration. His choice paralyzes him; though he may have more true knowledge than the other voices in the poem, his knowledge does nothing to liberate or rejuvenate him.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Like “The Unbeliever,” Pilgrim’s Progress, written by John Bunyan, is told in the form of a dream where Christian seeks his salvation on a pilgrimage to heaven. Along his journey, he encounters many obstacles that test his faith as well as many characters who are useful in showing him the difference between right and wrong. Why do you think Bishop uses a reference to this overtly Christian text to begin her poem? How can some of the images such as “marble towers” work to identify the cloud or the gull with Christianity? Is the identification complimentary or derogatory?

- In his book on Elizabeth Bishop titled The Unbeliever, Robert Dale Parker says that the poem consciously evokes Ishmael in Moby-Dick (33). In Melville's story, Ishmael recounts the dull, almost hypnotic chore of sitting atop the mast to scan the sea in search of whales. Because of the extreme height and the instability of the perch, Ishmael warns that it is not a good job for an introspective, reflective man, who might lose himself in his thoughts and possibly fall to his death. How does this idea of introspection as danger work into themes expressed in "The Unbeliever"?
- Read "A Pit—but Heaven over It" by Emily Dickinson. Compare the ideas expressed by Dickinson to those by Bishop. What similarities are there? Where do they differ?

"The Fish" (1940)

Shortly after moving to Key West, Bishop discovered her love for fishing, and her notes from this period detail an outing when she landed a 60-pound amberjack. The excursion, which provides the basis for "The Fish," is more than just a fish tale of "the one that got away," however. When T. S. Eliot first spoke of the "objective correlative," he used the term to explain the foundation by which artists use a given external situation, experience, or object to produce an emotion that is otherwise inexplicable; as the description of the sensory experience ends, the emotional response to it commences. "The Fish," as do other poems that appeared in North and South including "Florida" and "The Weed," uses description of a particular event, place, or object to produce just such an emotional response. Unlike "Florida," however, where the description of the place is more contained and less symbolic, or "The Weed," where the representation is more obvious—"In that black place, thought I saw / that each drop contained a light, / a small, illuminated scene" (Complete Poems 21)—"The Fish" marks a step forward for Bishop. In this poem she not only uses her keen eye for detail, but also shows that she "sees" what is not directly observable: "I thought of the coarse white flesh / packed in like feathers, / the big bones and the little bones, / the dramatic reds and blacks / of his shiny entrails" (lines 27–31). As Carol Frost notes in "Elizabeth Bishop's Inner Eye," "What else is at work concerns . . . the inner eye's power to generate, focus, manipulate, and enhance visual images in the mind, and the poem shows the future of that power" (250–251).

Inserting herself into the poem through a first-person narrative point of view, Bishop moves from impartial direct observation to internal speculation and identification as she describes "his gills . . . breathing in / the terrible oxygen /—the frightening gills, / fresh and crisp with blood" (lines 22–25). In the same manner that observation leads to identification, close description of the image and events leads to transformation. In the final part of the poem, as "victory fill[s] up / the little rented boat" (lines 66–67), the fish becomes a metaphor of survival, suggesting the poet herself may overcome adversity. In this way, Bishop suggests that the act of observing and detailing, the act of creating art from experience, sets in motion deeper levels of change and new ways of being.

For Discussion or Writing

- In her poem "Poetry," Marianne Moore says that in reading a good poem, "One discovers in / it after all, a place for the genuine. / Hands that can grasp, eyes / that can dilate, hair that can rise. . ." She also exhorts poets, saying, "nor till the poets among us can be / 'literalists of the imagination'—above insolence and triviality and can present / for inspection, 'imaginary gardens with real toads in them,' shall we have / it." What does Moore mean when she says that poets must be "literalists of the imagination"? How does "The Fish" work in respect to this idea? Has Bishop created an "imaginary garden with a real toad" in her description of the fish where readers can discover a place for the genuine? How so?
- In what ways is Bishop's real fish anthropomorphic? How does she use feminine images to complement or contrast the description of the fish?

3. Bishop delighted in telling friends that the poem was as close to the actual event as she could make it, changing only the number of hooks and lines in the fish's mouth from three to five. But the poem is much more than a mere recounting of a fishing trip. How does the poem differ from a straightforward prose rendition of the event? How does Eliot's "objective correlative" apply to the poem?
4. As an imagist, Bishop used many of the same techniques as poets such as Ezra Pound and William Carlos Williams. Read Pound's "In a Station at the Metro," and/or Williams's "The Red Wheelbarrow." Why do the poets focus on a single image or item? How does description in these poems work to help us understand larger concepts?

"At the Fishhouses" (1948)

"At the Fishhouses" first appeared in the August 9, 1948, issue of the New Yorker, a product of notes Bishop made while traveling in Nova Scotia the previous summer. The poem not only marks a return to Bishop's homeland as a place for material, but also points to her interest in studying herself in relation to the landscape and the people who inhabit it with her.

In his literary biography, Elizabeth Bishop: Life and the Memory of It, Brett Millier proposes the poem marks a shift in Bishop, moving from observer (as evidenced in earlier poems such as "The Map," published a decade earlier) to geographer, a role that requires a more informed and intimate contact with the landscape. She labels her notes for the poem "GM," which Millier tells us has been suggested as "Geographical Mirror" and was "part of [Bishop's] attempt to find herself in land and sea" (182). Indeed, Bishop describes the coastal setting in terms of a mirror, early on: "All is silver: the heavy surface of the sea, / swelling slowly as if considering spilling over" (lines 13–14).

Nova Scotia had been home to her mother's family, and Bishop explored the connection to family in the poem. The narrator meets an old man who "was a friend of my grandfather" (line 33). Together, as they sit talking in the cold light at the edge of the sea, Bishop paints a Wyethesque landscape, her emphasis on the painterly visuals; she highlights such items as the rusted ironwork, decaying fish, lobster pots covered in a shining film of scales to show how time has weathered the village. While the "steeply peaked roofs" of the houses attempt to oppose the eroding effects of time, its deteriorating effects seem nonetheless inevitable. The narrator and the old man talk about "the decline in the population / and of codfish and herring" (lines 34–35).

Bishop not only focuses on the landscape around her, but also considers that which cannot be seen, which remains hidden beneath the sea. In the final lines, Bishop also confirms another aspect of her "geographical" inspection—not only does time destroy: Flux is inevitable, all around us, putting us inside history, "our knowledge . . . historical, flowing, and flown" (line 84).

In the second half of the poem, Bishop shifts her attention to a friendly, familiar seal playing in the water just offshore as she has seen him do before. Bishop notes her religious background and makes a strong connection with the seal, saying, "like me a believer in total immersion, / so I used to sing him Baptist hymns" (line 53–54). Though the reference to hymn singing displays Bishop's self-professed love of hymns, Bishop does not appear interested in immersion in the religious sense. Her desire is to be immersed in experience, the constant flow, just as the seal dives into the icy water, "Cold dark deep and absolutely clear" (63). For Bishop, the water beneath the surface is cold: "your wrist would ache immediately, / your bones would begin to ache and your hand would burn / as if the water were a transmutation of fire (lines 73–75). It is a source of truth and nourishment: "It is like what we imagine knowledge to be: / dark, salt, clear, moving, utterly free" (lines 79–80).

Whereas a mapmaker is concerned with relationships of objects in relation to one another, the geographer looks at the texture of landscape in its totality. With “At the Fishhouses,” Bishop moves into the emotional landscape of her own life experience.

For Discussion or Writing

1. During her life Bishop expressed great admiration for and a fascination with the writings of Charles Darwin:

One admires the beautiful and solid case being built up out of his endless heroic observations, almost unconscious or automatic—and then comes a sudden relaxation, a forgetful phrase, and one feels the strangeness of his undertaking, sees the lonely young man, his eyes fixed on facts and minute details, sinking or sliding giddily off into the unknown. What one seems to want in art, in experiencing it, is the same thing that is necessary for its creation, a self-forgetful, perfectly useless concentration. (Stevenson 66)

In this passage, Bishop could be describing herself as the narrative voice in “At the Fishhouses.” Where is she like Darwin: lonely, eyes fixed on facts and minute details? Can her concentration in the poem be perceived as “useless”? How does it contribute to a “self-forgetting”?

2. What part does religious symbolism play in the poem? Does Bishop use the religious symbolism ironically? How so?
3. Look at the way Bishop uses another animal, the seagull, in “The Unbeliever.” How does this compare with the seal in “At the Fishhouses”? Compare the images of the sea as it is portrayed in both poems.
4. Read Bishop's earlier poem “The Map.” How does Bishop's depiction of landscape differ in this poem from “At the Fishhouses”?
5. Look at Bradford House, painted by Andrew Wyeth. How does Bishop use language to conjure images, moods, and emotions similar to those found in the painting?

“Questions of Travel” (1956)

“Questions of Travel” belongs to the general category of Bishop's poetry that could be called travel poems. As does “Over 2,000 Illustrations and a Complete Concordance,” it uses observations made while traveling to provide a context for the poem. “Questions of Travel” is not so concerned with experience and history, however, and considers other, more personal issues such as the ideas of expectation, displacement, and home.

As the title poem of the volume, “Questions of Travel” is the third poem in the section of the book entitled “Brazil.” The poems in this section are less individualized than poems appearing in the second section: “Elsewhere,” which deal more with Bishop's childhood and other experiences that helped shape her life. However, the poems in the Brazil section are “detached” almost by necessity, as if exploring the physical landscape of her new home allowed the freedom to explore other, more private themes.

The poems that open the “Brazil” section—“Arrival at Santos” (Complete Poems 89–90); “Brazil, January 1, 1502” (Complete Poems 91–92); and “Questions of Travel”—all deal with various issues arising from living in an unfamiliar environment. While the poems may be concerned with externals of place, they do demonstrate a clear progression and Bishop's increasing identification with the country. The first, “Arrival at Santos,” published shortly after Bishop arrived in Brazil, details the contrast between expectations and reality of the traveler. We see the country through Bishop's eyes, as an outsider: “Here is a coast; here is a harbor” (line 1). Everything is viewed as an oddity, curious, strange: “So that's the flag. I never saw it before. / I somehow never thought of there being a flag” (lines 15–16). The narrator (Bishop) seems disdainful of the port city, concerned more with introducing the comforts of home into the new locale, trying to make the new place as much like the old as possible. However, if the judgment on the port city deems it “inferior,” the poem ends with Bishop's looking deeper into Brazil: “We leave Santos at once; we are driving to the interior” (lines 39–40).

The second poem, “Brazil, January 1, 1502,” details a different arrival, the landing of the first Portuguese explorers at the Brazilian bay they believed to be the mouth of a great river, which they named Rio de Janeiro (River of January). Here, though, Bishop imagines the reaction of these new arrivals to the foreign landscape, and it is not the disappointed expectations of tourists disembarking in a busy port city. Instead, these explorers see what they have expected to see and nothing more. For them, Brazil is a savage, godless setting waiting to be tamed and civilized. As “they [rip] away into the hanging fabric, / each out to catch an Indian for himself” (lines 49–50), the true beauty of the locale is lost on them. However, as they conquer the land, Bishop suggests they are not able to tame it completely and are doomed to disappointment, the objects of their pursuit “retreating, always retreating” (line 53).

“Questions of Travel” deals again with expectation and disappointment, but this time, the point of view is that of the insider—the traveler who has chosen to stay. But now, the sights have overwhelmed the narrator of the poem when she laments, “There are too many waterfalls here; the crowded streams / hurry too rapidly to the sea” (lines 1–2). Those waterfalls, like “mile-long, shiny, tearstains” (line 6) force her to reconsider her decision to travel in the first place: “Should we have stayed at home and thought of here?” (line 15). But Bishop acknowledges that “surely it would have been a pity / not to have seen the trees along this road” (line 31), to have missed the firsthand experience, to have let her impressions of place be formed by others, which she calls “the whittled fantasies of wooden cages” (line 52). Though she asks the question “Is it lack of imagination that makes us come / to imagined places, not just stay at home?” (lines 60–61), Bishop ultimately embraces her decision to travel, understanding that flux is the most permanent of conditions.

For Discussion or Writing

1. At the end of the poem, Bishop references a quote by the philosopher Blaise Pascal, who wrote, “All the unhappiness of men arises from one single fact, that they cannot stay quietly in their own room.” In the poem, she asks whether he “could have been not entirely right?” Using the poem for support, how does she demonstrate her claim?

2. Read “Arrival at Santos” and “Brazil, January 1, 1502.” How does Bishop change in her attitude toward Brazil from these poems in “Questions of Travel”? Why do you think she chose to go back in time in the middle poem? How does this add to her insights into Brazil?
3. One of the major themes in “Questions of Travel” is the idea of expectation versus reality. Read “Arrival at the Waldorf” by Wallace Stevens, which was written after Stevens returned from a trip to Guatemala. What do you think Stevens means when he says, “The wild poem is a substitute. . . . After that alien, point-blank, green and actual Guatemala.” How do Stevens and Bishop compare actual experience and art created from experience?

“Filling Station” (1964)

In her poetry in general, Bishop moves toward a rejection of what she thought of as typical “Dickinson” feminine domain: themes of love, human and divine. However, the role of the feminine still figures as a powerful force in many poems; we see just such an examination of feminine influence as a force of order in “Filling Station.” Written in midcareer, “Filling Station” belongs to the category of Bishop poetry Bonnie Costello describes in Questions of Mastery as “immediate beholders . . . record[ing] feelings and emotions in direct observation rather than detached reflection or description” (37).

The point of view in the poem is distinctly feminine, as evidenced in its opening statement, “Oh, but it is so dirty!” (line 1). Uncharacteristically judgmental, the poem introduces the masculine world of the filling station as disturbing and potentially dangerous: “Be careful with that match!” (line

6). When the owner of the station is introduced, he appears brutish, wearing “a dirty, / oil-soaked monkey suit” (lines 7–8). However, he is also introduced as “Father,” assisted by two sons, and when the narrator reveals, almost as in confidence “(it’s a family filling station)” (line 12), the tone of the poem shifts from disparaging to questioning.

Conspicuously feminine objects invade the space: a wicker sofa, a doily, a begonia. Not only do they contrast the masculinity of the station itself, with its hard cement surfaces, they seem to absorb and soften it. Bishop describes the wicker furniture as “crushed and grease-impregnated” (lines 17–18), suggesting an abiding female presence that works to counterbalance the male forces: oil-soaked, greasy, saucy. It is the appearance of the feminine that makes the narrator question what life lies within the station—why the plant, why the doily? Costello proposes that Bishop sees this feminine force as both creative and life affirming.

From the objects themselves, the narrator concludes there must be a creator—a “somebody,” as Bishop names her, who cares enough to decorate and order this world: “Somebody embroidered the doily. / Somebody watered the plant” (lines 34–35). It is the recognition of this unique feminine presence, possessed with both a desire and the ability to transform ugliness into beauty, harshness into civility, that provides the final realization for the poet. The transformative feminine force is both maternal and beneficent, and though the force is never fully revealed, Bishop takes comfort in the final notion that “Somebody loves us all” (line 41).

For Discussion or Writing

1. In the fourth stanza of the poem, Bishop notes that certain objects at the filling station are “part of the set.” How does she use this idea of artifice to illustrate her notions of intrusion and reconciliation within the space?
2. Certain objects have distinctly feminine associations or descriptions. Others, such as the “hirsute” begonia, are more ambiguous. List objects that might be more masculine in their connotations—what is the attitude portrayed toward these objects?
3. Read Bishop’s poems “Pink Dog” and “Faustina, or Rock Roses.” How does Bishop deal with gender in these poems as compared to “Filling Station”? How does the notion of class and class sensibilities work in conjunction with or opposition to ideas of gender in these poems?

“Sestina” (1964)

It may seem ironic that “Sestina” appears in Questions of Travel, since like “In the Waiting Room,” it is a memory poem of childhood. But as in another poem from the same volume, “First Death in Nova Scotia,” Bishop seems to say to us that memory is a landscape unto itself and worthy of exploration.

Originally titled “Early Sorrow,” the poem depicts a scene probably drawn from Bishop’s childhood, the time immediately after her mother’s removal from the Bulmer house in Great Village. The child in the poem draws pictures of “inscrutable” houses, while the weeping grandmother looks on and oversees the daily tasks of the household. Underpinning the poem are the unspoken loss of the unnamed mother and the inability to express grief openly. While the grandmother believes her tears to be hidden, the fact that they are reported to us makes it obvious they are not. However, the third-person narration of the poem coupled with the naïve childlike perceptions create detachment in the poem, making it difficult to discern who is speaking, unless we can identify the voice as the adult Bishop looking back on the scene. Bishop once told her friend Robert Lowell, “When you write my epitaph, you must say I was the loneliest person who ever lived” (qtd. in One Art x). This would help to explain the relative isolation of both characters, and that even as they go about their normal routines, it is impossible to overcome the sadness that permeates the world around them. Bishop seems to say that the very activities they participate in—making tea, drawing pictures, telling jokes—are futile attempts to stave off inevitable sorrow.

Using the sestina (song of sixes) form, in which six words are repeated in a rolling pattern of six stanzas and a concluding three-line envoi, Bishop places emphasis on the repeated words: grandmother, child, stove, almanac, house, and tears. The importance of these simple nouns helps the author, as the child, create a “rigid drawing” of the past. It is the child, now grown, who must attempt to express that which has been repressed and unspoken for so long.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read “First Death in Nova Scotia” and compare the first-person narrator to the third-person narration used in “Sestina.” How does the voice in each poem help Bishop inject the reader into the world of the poem? What would be the effect if Bishop inverted these voices, using first-person point of view in “Sestina” and third-person point of view in “First Death in Nova Scotia”?
2. Both poems detail loss, and in both poems, common objects demand our attention. How does Bishop use these objects to signify a greater understanding of the world?
3. Define inscrutable. Why do you think that Bishop uses that adjective to define the drawing of the house? How does the word apply to the idea of the poet trying to recapture a moment from the past and the poem as a representation of memory?

“In the Waiting Room” (1971)

Though this poem did not appear until late in Bishop’s career (published in her last volume of poetry, Geography III), its roots are in her earliest memories. Set in 1918, toward the end of her troubled stay in her paternal grandparents’ home, the incident that underlies the poem is detailed in the final paragraphs of Bishop’s memoir “The Country Mouse”:

After New Year’s, Aunt Jenny had to go to the dentist, and asked me to go with her. She left me in the waiting room, and gave me a copy of the National Geographic to look at. It was still getting dark early, and the room had grown very dark. There was a big yellow lamp in one corner, a table with magazines, and an overhead chandelier of sorts. There were others waiting, two men and a plump middle-aged lady, all bundled up. I looked at the magazine cover—I could read most of the words—shiny, glazed, yellow and white. The black letters said FEBRUARY 1918. A feeling of absolute and utter desolation came over me. I felt . . . myself. In a few days it would be my seventh birthday. I felt I, I, I, and I looked at the three strangers in panic. I was one of them too, inside my scabby body and wheezing lungs. “You’re in for it, now,” something said. How had I got tricked into such a false position? I would be like that woman opposite who smiled at me so falsely every once in a while. The awful sensation passed, then it came back again. “You are you,” something said. “How strange you are, inside looking out. You are not Beppo [her Aunt Jenny’s bull terrier], or the chestnut tree, or Emma [Bishop’s playmate and friend], you are you and you are going to be you forever.” It was like coasting downhill, this thought, only much worse, and it quickly smashed into a tree. Why was I a human being? (Complete Prose 32–33)

The poem’s construction is typical for Bishop in that it moves from detailed description in the first half to revelation in the last. However, it also marks a departure for her in that it is the first poem in which Bishop names herself as a character in the poem: “But I felt: you are an I, you are an Elizabeth” (line 60). The climax of the poem and the prose piece is a rite of passage—at once a realization of individuality, but with that realization recognition of the isolation that individual identity entails. However, with this recognition of self is a second epiphany, that of a connectedness to the world around her, specifically to herself as a woman: “Why should I be my aunt, / or me or anyone? / What similarities— / . . . held us all together / or made us all just one?” (lines 75–84).

Bishop ends the poem with the notice “The War was on” (line 95). Since the poem is set in 1918, the reference to the First World War is obvious.

Yet, there would also seem to be a second layer of conflict implied. War has been declared within the young poet, a war of individual identity and expectation for her both as a woman and as a member of the human community.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare the prose account of the events Bishop describes in "The Country Mouse" to those in the poem "In the Waiting Room." Which details has she omitted, altered, enhanced? Also, the poem seems to build to a new level of understanding not contained in the prose version. How so?
2. Look at the various ways Bishop shifts perspective in the poem, focusing our attention "inward" or "outward." How does this shift contribute to the meaning of the poem?
3. A "rite of passage" is defined as a journey from innocence to awareness. What is young Elizabeth's rite of passage? Can you recall a similar experience in your own life when you underwent a shift in your perspective to see yourself and the world in a new way?

"The Moose" (1972)

If any poem can be called definitive, "The Moose" may arguably be the definitive Bishop poem. Taking 20 years to complete, it is Bishop's longest poem and unquestionably combines notable representative elements of other poems from throughout Bishop's career. As she did with "The Fish," Bishop claimed that the events narrated within "The Moose" happened almost exactly as she relayed them, altering only minor details of the story's arrangement, and as she does in "The Fish" and "At the Fishhouses," Bishop uses interaction with nature and more specifically, an animal, as a means to revelation. She utilizes travel as a theme much as she does in "Questions of Travel" and the idea that when we are displaced, we are in some ways most at home. As in "Sestina" and her short story "In the Village," Bishop uses "The Moose" to combine ideas of family and loss. And as she does in "The Unbeliever" and "The Man-Moth," dreamy visions are a means to revelation.

The first six stanzas are one long sentence describing a bus trip from Nova Scotia to Boston—as it happens, the beginning and end points of Bishop's own life. As the bus makes its way through a richly described landscape in the late afternoon, it is portrayed as a battered traveler, with its "dented flank / of blue, beat-up enamel" (line 30). The travelers inside the bus develop an informal community, and as they look out of the bus into the early evening, they observe a variety of communities, each hinting at the lives led by the individuals who dwell in them. But the glimpses into these other worlds are fleeting: "Five islands, Five Houses, / where a woman shakes a tablecloth / out after supper. / A pale flickering. Gone" (lines 58–61). The attitude is amiable, almost adventurous, as the travelers enter the wood, the fog, the night and settle into a surreal state: "A dreamy divagation / begins in the night, / a gentle, auditory / slow hallucination . . ." (lines 87–90). In this section of the poem, the passengers are cocooned within the foggy night, within the bus, within their own worlds. A conversation identified in the poem as "Grandparents' voices" (line 96) relates personal details from a couple's life that Bishop likens to intimate exchanges that happen late at night, "Talking the way they talked / in the old featherbed" (lines 121–122). Yet the conversation is, at the same time, universal, and Bishop describes the old couple "talking, in Eternity" (line 98).

The conversation covers a catalog of disasters: "deaths, deaths and sicknesses" (line 103); there is even mention of someone "the family had / to put . . . away" (line 113–114), echoing Bishop's mother's removal to an institution. But in the list of sorrows, there is also recognition: "A sharp, indrawn breath, half groan, half acceptance, / that means 'Life's like that, / We know it (also death)'" (lines 118–120). Bishop indicates that it is impossible to avoid loss; more importantly, she says that loss does not function as a vehicle of transcendence; we need merely accept it as a necessary natural condition.

The reverie of the night is interrupted when the bus driver stops to look at a large moose that has wandered into the middle of the road. Emerging from “the impenetrable wood” (line 134), the moose becomes a symbol of home:

Towering, antlerless, high as a church,
homely as a house
(or, safe as houses),
A man’s voice assures us
“Perfectly harmless . . .” (lines 139–144)

Again, as in the earlier passages, there is a sense of shared experience and community among the travelers, but in sharp opposition to the melancholy and sadness of the earlier passages, the moose creates wonder and delight:

Taking her time,
she looks the bus over,
grand, otherworldly,
Why, why do we feel
(we all feel) this sweet sensation of joy? (lines 151–156)

But the journey continues, and though the travelers are granted one last look backward at the moose, they press on into the night, the world of the outer experience and inner reflection combined in “a dim / smell of moose, an acrid smell of gasoline” (lines 156–159).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Bishop wrote in a letter to Anne Stevenson:

My outlook is pessimistic. I think we are still barbarians, barbarians who commit a hundred indecencies and cruelties every day of our lives, as just possibly future ages may be able to see. But I think we should be gay in spite of it, sometimes even giddy—to make life endurable. (quoted in Travisano 204–205)

How does “The Moose” support the idea that we must laugh at life instead of being overwhelmed by it?

2. Since “The Moose” contains many elements common throughout Bishop’s poetry, choose one element from the poem to compare how Bishop uses that same idea or technique in another of her pieces.
3. In an article for the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, Judith Crews, a specialist in comparative literature and languages, notes that in ancient cultures “Trees and forests . . . took on symbolic divine characteristics, or were seen to represent superlative forces such as courage, endurance or immortality. They were the means of communication between worlds.” Does Bishop use the woods to represent “superlative forces”? If so, then how? Emerging from “the impenetrable wood,” can the moose be seen as a divine messenger in the poem?

“One Art” (1976)

The general theme of the poems in Geography III, where “One Art” appears, is the reconsideration of life and experience. As Thomas J. Travisano notes in Elizabeth Bishop: Her Artistic Development, Bishop asks that we see her “not in terms of that life’s particular circumstances and decisions . . . , but in terms of its chosen way of thinking and seeing, in terms of a whole bundle of latent assumptions, commitments, and predilections that bind the person and the artist” (176).

To construct the poem, Bishop chose the villanelle, a fixed form consisting of 19 lines in total. In a villanelle, composed of five tercets and a final quatrain, only two rhyme sounds occur, and the first and third lines of the first stanza are repeated, alternately, as the third line of subsequent stanzas until the last, when they appear as the last two lines of the poem. Bishop varied slightly from the form in that she did not repeat lines entirely through the poem but did repeat the final rhyming words—master and disaster.

The use of these two words points toward the underlying theme of the poem—Bishop’s desire to master both the art of creation and form as well the art of loss. The poem begins ironically, as she observes, “The art of losing isn’t hard to master; / so many things seem filled with the intent / to be lost that their loss is no disaster” (lines 1–3). The second stanza suggests that impermanence is the state of being we must all learn to accept as Bishop exhorts the reader to “lose something every day. Accept the fluster of lost door keys, the hour badly spent” (lines 4–5). However, as the poem progresses and the catalog of items “lost” increases, they become more personal and self-referential. Knowing that Bishop spent her life in motion and was a traveler by nature heightens the pathos when what is lost are “places, and names, and where you meant / to travel” (lines 8–9). The switch to second person you in these lines is not only a summons to the reader, but directly references her own loss of persons and places over time.

While Bishop notes the objects lost to her, she only hints at the greater losses they represent. Brett Millier, author of Elizabeth Bishop: Life and the Memory of It, says that in writing the poem, “the poet is giving herself a lesson in . . . losing” (506–507). The loss of a mother’s watch implies a sentimental keepsake but does not mention the sorrow over the loss of the mother herself. The loss of the three loved houses alludes to the houses themselves, but not to the life lived within them. In the final quatrain, Bishop again uses the second person, but this time it is not directed toward the reader or even herself: “—Even losing you (the joking voice, a gesture / I love) I shan’t have lied” (lines 16–17). Though some critics have speculated that this might be a reference to Alice Methfessel, her last love, it seems also to envelop the loss of Bishop’s beloved Lota. In the final lines of the poem, Bishop again addresses herself (Write it!) (line 19), confirming her reticence to address such personal matters in such a public way. However, she also seems willing, within the liberating confines of her art to do so, as if mastering this level of disclosure might be a greater, though ultimately beneficial form of losing.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Why do you think Bishop chose a fixed form for this poem? How does the form help contribute to the meaning of the poem?
2. Read Theodore Roethke’s villanelle “The Waking.” How does Roethke’s use of waking and learning compare to Bishop’s idea of mastery and losing?
3. Look at the poem “Dreams” by Langston Hughes. He urges readers to “hold fast,” while Bishop seems to offer just the opposite advice. What comments do you imagine he would offer Bishop on “One Art”?
4. Joseph Campbell discusses a ritual in which individuals relinquish items in order to pass from one stage to the next. Each item represents something of larger meaning to the person (as eyeglasses could be used to represent a love of reading). What items would you choose if you were asked to participate in the ritual of seven things?

“Over 2,000 Illustrations and a Complete Concordance” (1948)

Though the poem draws on events and recollections from her journals written at Vassar and from Bishop’s travels in Morocco in 1948, “Over 2,000 Illustrations and a Complete Concordance” did not appear until much later, published in 1955 as a part of the collection A Cold Spring.

Divided into three sections or movements, the poem details three different methods of “travel” as a means of gaining knowledge, though each carries with it a certain set of limitations. There is first the orderly study of cataloged details from the concordance; then is the hectic and untidy insight gained from direct observation and experience; finally, there is the insight gained from fictions, the imagined recollections and remembrances resulting from the first two.

The gravity with which the episodes are outlined in the concordance creates a longing in the author for the tidiness they represent. But there is also recognition that with order entails a certain including “Shampoo” and “Pink Dog.” How does the knowledge of Bishop as a lesbian/feminist writer expand her work? Or does this effort to categorize her limit her?

2. Tennessee Williams writes that The Glass Menagerie is a “memory play,” and that memory distorts and colors history. Understanding Bishop’s need for accurate detail, how would she react to this idea? Or does she engage in this filtered perception of history herself?
3. During her lifetime, Bishop did not achieve the popularity of her contemporaries Robert Lowell and Marianne Moore. Moore and Lowell both admired Bishop’s work tremendously, as she did theirs. What general comparisons might you make among these three poets? How is their work similar? What specific influences might you find of one on another?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Bishop, Elizabeth. The Collected Prose. Edited by Robert Giroux. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1984.
- . The Complete Poems: 1927–1929. New York: Noonday Press, 1979.
- . Edgar Allan Poe and The Juke-Box: Uncollected Poems, Drafts, and Fragments. Edited by Alice Quinn. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2006.
- . One Art: Letters. Edited by Robert Giroux. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1994.
- Costello, Bonnie. Elizabeth Bishop: Questions of Mastery. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1991.
- Crews, Judith. “Perceptions of Forests.” Unasylva: An International Journal of Forestry and Forest Industries 54, no. 2 (2003). FAO—Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. Available online. URL: <http://www.fao.org/docrep/005/y9882e/y9882e08.htm>. Accessed May 21, 2007.
- “Elizabeth Bishop: American Poet.” Elizabeth Bishop at Vassar College. Elizabeth Bishop Society. Available online. URL: <http://projects.vassar.edu/bishop/index.php>. Accessed May 21, 2007.
- Frost, Carol. “Elizabeth Bishop’s Inner Eye.” New England Review 25 (2004): 250–257.
- Goldensohn, Lorrie. Elizabeth Bishop: The Biography of a Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- MacMahon, Candace W., ed. Elizabeth Bishop: A Bibliography, 1927–1979. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1980.
- McCabe, Susan. Elizabeth Bishop: Her Poetics of Loss. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1994.
- Millier, Brett C. Elizabeth Bishop: Life and the Memory of It. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Montiero, George, ed. Conversations with Elizabeth Bishop. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.
- Parker, Robert Dale. The Unbeliever: The Poetry of Elizabeth Bishop. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.
- Stevenson, Anne. Elizabeth Bishop. Edited by Sylvia E. Bowman. Twayne’s United States Authors Series. New York: Twayne, 1966.
- Zona, Kirstin Hottelling. Marianne Moore, Elizabeth Bishop, and May Swenson: The Feminist Poetics of Self-Restraint. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2005.

James Driggers

RAY BRADBURY (1920–)

Video games are a waste of time . . . real brains don't do that . . . while they're doing that, I'll go ahead and write another novel.

(interview with James Hibberd)

Though he considers himself a creator of fantasy rather than of “realistic” science fiction worlds, Ray Bradbury remains one of the most famous science fiction writers of the last 100 years. A novelist, poet, essayist, short story writer, playwright, scriptwriter, and novelist, Bradbury has written over 500 works, though he is best known for two novels published early in his career: The Martian Chronicles (1950) and Fahrenheit 451 (1953). Born in the small town of Waukegan, Illinois, on August 22, 1920, to Leonard Spaulding and Esther Marie Moberg Bradbury, Ray Douglas Bradbury first fed his imagination with the fantastic stories he found in books, comics, magic shows, and movies. In 1923 he and his mother saw the film The Hunchback of Notre Dame, which had a huge impact on his young mind, an event he has recounted in several interviews. He also cites a book of fairy tales his aunt gave him at the age of five, L. Frank Baum's Oz books at six, Amazing Stories (the first science fiction magazine), Edgar Allan Poe, and Edgar Rice Burroughs's Tarzan as the foundation of his long career as a reader. In a genre that celebrates technology and futuristic possibilities, Ray Bradbury often sets his stories in his midwestern upbringing; his story lines spring from the ordinary aspects of everyday life. He juxtaposes his childhood and his imagination, planting the fantastical elements he creates in the middle of small town America. Additionally, Bradbury writes literature not set in strange worlds or alternative realities, such as Dandelion Wine, an autobiographical novel about a young boy's summer in Green Town, Illinois. These works infuse magic into Bradbury's memories, recreating the nostalgic days of the author's childhood.

Bradbury sees writing as an act of the imagination with which he amuses, purges, and entertains himself. As he states in the introduction of The Stories of Bradbury, “For I am that special freak, the man with the child inside who remembers all. I remember the day and the hour I was born. I remember being circumcised on the second day after my birth. I remember suckling at my mother's breast” (Bradbury xiv). He has verified these early details with his mother; this experience later became the impetus for the short story “The Small Assassin,” published in his first collection, Dark Carnival (1947), in which an infant possessing preternatural consciousness murders his mother and then his father. This past provides the setting for his stories, both commonplace and fantastic. Bradbury insists that his ability to see the world as a writer stems from his ability to see through the eyes of a child; he continually calls upon his childhood for inspiration.

The Bradbury family did not escape the hardships of the depression. In 1932 Leonard Bradbury moved his family to Tucson for a second time (the first was a year-long trip in 1926 that ended with the death of Bradbury's infant sister), back to Waukegan, and then finally to Los Angeles in 1934 in order to find work. Before moving, Bradbury became enamored with magic, meeting Blackstone the Magician, participating in Blackstone's act, and later becoming friends with a man called Mr. Electrico:

Reaching out into the audience, his eyes flaming, his white hair standing on end, sparks leaping between his smiling teeth, he brushed an Excalibur sword over the heads of the children, knighting them with fire. When he came to me, he tapped me on both shoulders and then the tip of my nose. The lightning jumped into me. Mr. Electrico cried: "Live forever." . . . A few weeks later I started writing my first short stories about the planet Mars. From that time to this, I have never stopped. God bless Mr. Electrico, the catalyst, wherever he is. (Bradbury xiv–xv)

Mr. Electrico's life-affirming philosophy surfaces in Dandelion Wine (1957), where the young hero, Douglas Spaulding, thrashing about in the childish fight of brothers and tasting his own "rusty warm blood," experiences a rush of emotions. As every detail of his life becomes clear, he realizes, "I'm alive." Mr. Electrico shows up a few years later in Something Wicked This Way Comes (1962), as a townspeople turned sideshow in Mr. Black's evil carnival.

By the time Bradbury reached Los Angeles in 1934 as a teenager, he had developed the habit of writing four hours a day, a habit that evolved into a one-story-a-day goal that structured his career. Bradbury knew 1930's Hollywood, filling his afternoons by searching out homes of movie stars, a habit that became quite fortuitous; after introducing himself to George Burns and Gracie Allen, he not only secured himself a seat in their first live audience, he also began writing comic skits for the show. This resulted in his first paid job as a writer: the ending scene of a Burns and Allen episode. In 1937 he joined the Los Angeles Science Fiction League and developed friendships with leading science fiction writers including Robert Heinlein, Edmond Hamilton, Henry Kuttner, and Forrest J. Ackerman. Kuttner in particular was an important influence on him, telling the young writer to "shut-up" and keep his ideas and energy for himself, and he did. At 20, Bradbury was still selling newspapers on the street; however, one year after his first paid publication for Super Science Stories, a short story titled "Pendulum," the young writer devoted himself to writing full-time. During this period, he developed a friendship with Leigh Brackett, whose writing he admired and imitated. Her technique aided Bradbury in developing his own writing style. After learning craft under her tutelage, he collaborated with her in writing "Lorelei of the Red Mist" (1946). From this period of apprenticeship, he emerged with his own distinctive style and began writing short stories for multiple science fiction publications.

Living in Arizona as a child, Bradbury loved Mexico. While visiting Mexico with his family, he, unlike the rest of his family, instinctively sought to blend in and observe. He remembers feeling embarrassed by his family's behavior and reactions to Mexican culture: His mother was offended by the images of death, his father was large and loud, and his brother simply hated it. Bradbury, however, was impressed by this first exposure to an alien culture. In 1945 he traveled with an artist friend on a two-month-long road trip to collect masks for the Los Angeles County Museum. During this time, the Mexican population was growing rapidly in Southern California and conflicts were common. The young author became interested in the prominent role death played in the culture as well as the culture's seamless union of religion, death, and sensuality and Mexico's veneration of the past. Increasingly aware of the intersections and differences between the two cultures, Bradbury wove Mexican elements and themes into his writing, first in his short story collection Dark Carnival (1947). The short story "Next in Line" explores the differing values of Americans and Mexicans. A later story, "The Highway" (1951; in The Illustrated Man), depicts a Mexican protagonist, Hernando, who lives a quiet life, occasionally interrupted by tourists who want to take his picture. In it, Bradbury contrasts the two cultures' reactions to nuclear war.

In 1947, after gaining critical attention and drawing an audience for his pulp sci-fi in Super Science Stories and bizarre fantasy stories in Weird Tales, he published Dark Carnival, a collection of dark fantasy that transcended the science fiction genre. He also received the O. Henry Memorial Award for “The Homecoming” and radio renditions of “The Meadow” and “Riabouchnska,” which aired on ABC and CBS. On September 27, 1947, Ray Bradbury married Marguerite Susan McClure, with whom he would share a 56-year marriage and four daughters. A lover of literature, Marguerite was instrumental in Bradbury’s success. In the early years of their marriage, she maintained a day job so that her husband could stay at home and continue his rigorous schedule of producing at least one short story a day. When she became pregnant in 1949, Maggie provided the impetus for Bradbury to write The Martian Chronicles (1950) and The Illustrated Man (1951), establishing his professional reputation.

In 1953 he published The Golden Apples of the Sun, a collection of short stories, and the novel Fahrenheit 451. Science fiction traditionalists derided these two books and The Illustrated Man because Bradbury did not use scientific theory as a basis for the creation of believable new worlds. However, this negative criticism did not hinder the young author, who focused on the constantly changing world around him. Unlike most of his science fiction contemporaries, Bradbury wrote metaphorically of the past while commenting on the present, depicting a bleak future consumed by a vaguely represented technologically based society. As his writing developed, he continued to move outside the science fiction genre. In 1956 he wrote a screenplay for the John Huston adaptation of Moby-Dick; the following year he published Dandelion Wine. Following that, he published Something Wicked This Way Comes (1962), a fantasy set in Green Town, and in many ways a further exploration of Dandelion Wine.

In the following years, Bradbury continued to produce fiction but also turned his eye to drama. He published a collection of plays, The Anthem Sprinters (1963), and received an Academy Award nomination for his animated film Icarus Montgolfier Wright. Next he produced The World of Bradbury (1964) in the Coronet Theater in Los Angeles, following it with The Wonderful Ice Cream Suit. In 1966 the film version of Fahrenheit 451 hit movie theaters, and Dandelion Wine the musical debuted at Lincoln Center in New York in 1967. Two years later, The Illustrated Man was also adapted for the big screen.

In the next few decades, Bradbury produced an impressive body of work, beginning with the short story collection I Sing the Body Electric (1969). He followed the collection with several volumes of poetry, plays, countless short stories and short story collections, essays on writing (Zen and the Art of Writing, 1989), and several novels. The last of these, Let’s All Kill Constance, was published in 2002. At present, the author’s works have been translated into 13 languages. He has been interviewed over 350 times, received awards too numerous to count, and been included in over 1,200 anthologies. Bradbury writes what he is—an American farm boy, raised in the quiet pre-depression era Midwest, with an imagination voraciously fueled by pulp science fiction, fantasy, scary movies, and adventure stories.

The Martian Chronicles* (1950)

After the successful publication of Dark Carnival (1947), Bradbury’s editor suggested working on a longer narrative form. Immediately Bradbury began compiling a series of stories he had previously written about the Earth’s colonization of Mars. Adding connecting events and chapters, he published The Martian Chronicles in novel form. With these stories, the author joined his dual visions of the idyllic American past, here dubbed “Green Bluff,” and the last frontier for humanity, alien worlds. Written as a series of journal entries with dates heading each chapter, Martian Chronicles focuses on action: the colonization of a planet. Thus, the characters are less developed; the sporadic protagonists rarely extend into later chapters. Episodic in form (having a series of incidents that can stand alone but are loosely connected by characters or a setting), the novel contains gaps in time and space between the chapters the reader must fill. The theme of conquest helps unify the work, connecting the plotlines, driving the action of the novel, and relating its plot to historical realities: the history of Western colonization of Asian, African, and American countries.

After a short chapter depicting a rocket launch that catalyzes Ohio's transition from winter into summer, Bradbury tells the first few stories from the Martian creatures' point of view. Telepathic, they know that the humans' arrival is imminent. After a series of unsuccessful missions, the humans dominate the planet. They unintentionally contaminate Mars, killing off the Martian population. Then an atomic war breaks out on Earth, resulting in the rapid exodus of the Martian colonists back to Earth, fearing for their friends, family, and way of life. The reader is left with a deserted Mars and an ending that marks a new beginning: a group of Earthlings who witness the final days of the war that destroys Earth.

With this initial novel Bradbury appealed to the larger literary community and garnered respect—a feat not often accomplished by pulp sci-fi writers. He also fascinated his core science fiction audience, but the science fiction elements, for example, the Martian world's physical imagery, remain on the periphery, serving metaphorical functions. Concentrating on the telepathy of the aliens and their similarities to and differences from human interpersonal relations, Bradbury conveys an earthly message, examining how the various individual interactions affect and shape the larger communities in which they operate.

In the second chapter, the reader first meets a Martian protagonist: Ylla, a married Martian woman, the first to sense the imminent arrival of Earthlings. Through a telepathic dream state she anticipates the arrival of human explorers. Her dreams are flooded with images of Nathaniel York, one of the two-man crew that is the first to explore the planet. The episode ends as Ylla's husband, out of either anxiety or jealousy (it is unclear), shoots the men on a "hunting" expedition. The following chapters expand on this telepathic phenomenon, with increasingly complicated ends to the successive human visits. The reader experiences the confusion brought about by these strange encounters from both sides of the story, empathizing with the Martian and human communities and giving both the Martian and human characters a voice. While the Martians are relegated to ghosts early in the narrative, they continue to haunt the story as it progresses.

The fourth attempt is successful, in part because the Martians were infected with chicken pox, which was introduced by the previous human expeditions. This event mirrors the genocide that occurred in the Americas when millions of indigenous peoples died in the first few years of European exploration. The reaction here is one of surprise but not horror, and, in the end, it comes in handy: "Chances are a few of the Martians, if they were smart, escaped to the mountains. But there aren't enough . . . to be a native problem." The genocide does not taint the event for the crew, and in the following chapter the settlers begin to arrive.

Before this happens, however, Bradbury provides a word of caution through Jeff Spender, an archaeologist who knows the annihilation of culture and history about to take place. Of all the crew members only he bemoans the death of the Martian race. Through him, Bradbury explores the ethical responsibility of explorers. Spender stands in opposition to the crew, who get drunk and arrogantly name locations after themselves. This act of naming becomes the symbolic vehicle for the destruction of the Martian culture: "The names we give to the canals and mountains and cities will fall like so much water on the back of a mallard. No matter how we touch Mars, we'll never touch it. And then we'll get mad at it, and you know what we'll do? We'll rip it up, rip the skin off, and change it to fit ourselves." The moral compass or conscience of the story, Spender intends well; however, his reaction to the colonization process also has its roots in American history; he is the well-intentioned frontiersman who loses himself in the alien culture—he defends the extinct Martian species.

Bradbury reexamines the concept of the pioneer spirit in The Martian Chronicles, and he portrays for his readers a reckless co-opting of land already inhabited by creatures with thoughts and feelings. The novel challenges the idea that the power or ability possessed by a particular community gives moral permission to that community to act on in order to achieve a self-serving end. He proposes that "science ran too far ahead of us too quickly and people got lost in the mechanical wilderness . . . emphasizing machines instead of how to run the machines.” Bradbury presents his readers with a hypothetical colonization, one that could be a natural extension of human nomadic exploration, which is at the foundation of American history—if only we were technologically capable. Written in the aftermath of World War II and the atomic bomb and with a prescient awareness of the increasingly imperialistic tendencies of the ever-growing United States and Russian military forces and the increasing threat of nuclear annihilation, Martian Chronicles carries a cautionary warning; however, Bradbury does not leave his characters without hope. When the Earth succumbs to a worldwide atomic war, the humans who make their way to Mars have a different intention than the previous explorers who fashioned the world into a satellite planet of Earth. The father of the initial family to return to the deserted planet Mars ritualistically burns old maps and other documents associated with Earth, explaining to his children, “I’m burning a way of life.” Bradbury first introduces a Martian, asking the readers to empathize with a creature about to be destroyed by an invading species. We feel regret for the rapid and untimely end of the Martian species. As the book’s action parallels the history of Western conquest and mirrors many events in our shared cultural past, it allows us to step outside our collective experience and see it as distinct from our own history. In this way we are able to view it more objectively and critically.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Bradbury’s novel of the future makes a comment on the American past. Consult a scholarly history source to get background information on the colonization of America. What parallels do you see between the colonization in The Martian Chronicles and the United States’ own history as pioneers of the New World? Compare and contrast the Martians’ initial reaction to the Earthlings to that of Native Americans to the first Europeans to reach North America.
2. The chapter “Way in the Middle of the Air,” in which a southern black community builds their own rockets and leaves Earth, continues to generate controversy. As did the Marcus Garvey back to Africa movement of the 1920s, Bradbury presents an image of African Americans emigrating from the United States. Discuss the significance of The Martian Chronicles chapter, in reference to the cultural context in which it was written. What does the inclusion of such an event add to Bradbury’s criticism of the American past?
3. In the chapter “And the Moon Be Still as Bright,” both Captain Wilder and the archaeologist Jeff Spender approach Mars with a level of respect that exceeds that of the general crew. Compare and contrast their reactions. Are Spender’s actions more admirable? Why or why not? Consider Wilder’s role at the end of the book in “The Long Years” as well. As one of the few characters appearing in more than one episode, what does he symbolize?
4. Even in his early years, Bradbury’s brand of science fiction stood apart from the larger sci-fi community. Compare and contrast this work with the Isaac Asimov’s I Robot, also published in 1950. Would you describe The Martian Chronicles as a work of science fiction? Why, or why not?

“There Will Come Soft Rains” (1950)

“There Will Come Soft Rains,” the penultimate chapter of The Martian Chronicles, shifts momentarily from the deserted Mars to an empty house on the dying planet Earth. This short episode takes place in an Allendale, California, house after a nuclear holocaust has ended earthly life. The chapter opens with the house’s morning alarm at seven o’clock, “Time to get up, time to get up!” Fully automated and designed to aid in the everyday needs of its inhabitants, the house cooks breakfast, reminds its absent family of important appointments, and cautions that today is a day for raincoats. As the house continues its daily rituals, the omniscient, all-knowing narrator explains that this is the only house left standing in a “ruined city” that glows green with radiation that can be seen for miles at night. Later, as the house winds down the day, creating a warm atmosphere for after-dinner repose, the voice from behind the walls recites a poem, a favorite of Mrs.

McClellan, the home's former mistress. The poem, "There Will Come Soft Rains," describes a time when humankind has perished, "And Spring herself, when woke at dawn / Would scarcely know that we were gone." Immediately after this a tree bough falls on the house, causes a fire, and, in a rushing inferno of prose and mechanical screams, the house falls; a lone voice from the sole surviving wall announces, "Today is August 5, 2026, today is August 5, 2026, today is. . . ."

This episode encapsulates the author's theme of the dangers of unrestrained technology. The poem that centers the chapter speaks of animals in harmony with the thriving natural world. This natural world sharply contrasts with the world outside the house, which, at present, lies in ruins. The poem, however, also speaks of a future in which the world, impervious to the violence enacted by human beings, will heal itself. In this sentiment Bradbury provides hope that even in this worst-case scenario of utter destruction, there is always a rebirth. The chapter provides a stark portrait of humanity, a cumbersome and unnecessary intrusion on an otherwise peaceful, self-sustaining planet. The poem describes the triumph of nature in the wake of humanity's folly. Though the Earth's most sophisticated creatures have succeeded in destroying themselves, the planet will continue to produce life.

The image of the house demonstrates Bradbury's technique of blending the fantastic with the ordinary. While the house is a futuristic design, it maintains a traditional, all-American atmosphere consistent with Bradbury's nostalgic use of his midwestern past. The kitchen makes eggs and pancakes; the living room provides a warm fireplace to sit by, a perfectly lit cigar to enjoy after dinner, and a Sara Teasdale poem popular during Bradbury's childhood. Ironically, this obsession with technology recreates an idealized past and creates more leisure time, but it also has a high price: the abandonment of ethical thinking and moral decision making. The only sentient character in the chapter, the family dog, suffering from the effects of nuclear radiation, makes his way home to die. As he seeks out his masters, he becomes both follower and victim of the human design: the only example of life on Earth, a painful reminder of the widespread suffering of the poisoned planet. A symbol for faithfulness, "man's best friend," he goes back home to be saved by the humans but is only tormented by locked doors and the smell of food. Here the narrator shows how humanity's destructiveness extends to other species, as it already has to the Martians.

Bradbury equates the rhythms of the house to religious rituals of devotees whose "gods had gone away." Robotic mice emerge from the walls to clean the house, and the kitchen serves up its daily offerings on schedule. Ironically, the human beings, gods of their own technological creations, are now a virtually extinct species. Machines designed to protect and ease human life bring about its end; the house stands like an empty shrine to a failed system. The silhouettes in the front yard are ghostly images on an otherwise blackened wall, images of the absent gods. Their presence deepens the image of reverence created by the house's lonely routine. The silhouettes depicting the family in the yard are reminiscent of the silhouettes found in Hiroshima after the atomic bomb. The use of the image is haunting and, written only a few years after the bombs had been dropped, all too real.

The poem's story tells of a rebirth, but the story in which it is framed is an ending. Immediately after the last refrain, "the house began to die," the narrator describes this death in emotional language. The house screams an alarm, "fire, fire, fire," in an effort to alert sleeping humans; however, it reads like the desperate screams of a trapped victim. Image after image supports the atmosphere of a violent and anguished death. The machine itself, representing the greater technological vehicle that consumed humanity, is the final victim.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Personification is a form of metaphor by which an author applies human characteristics to nonhuman things. Bradbury specifically applies human emotions to various attendants of the mechanized house. Identify examples of personification within the text and discuss how they affect the reading of the story.
2. Why is "There Will Come Soft Rains" central to the larger work? Compare and contrast this chap- ter with the images of Mars after the Martians have all succumbed to chicken pox.

3. The image of the dog desperately looking for his humans and trying to get at the food in the kitchen is vivid and painful to read. What is the function of this scene in the story? Discuss your impression of his homecoming and subsequent death.
 4. Compare and contrast the images provided by the poem with the images of the world outside the house as told by the narrator.
 5. Much of the chapter deals with the passing of time, which is chronicled by the house as it meets its end. What is time's function in the chapter? What does the strict routine in the house say about the family who lived there? Does this support Bradbury's critique of technology throughout the novel? Why or why not?

Fahrenheit 451* (1953)

Along with Martian Chronicles, Fahrenheit 451 helped establish Bradbury's literary reputation and earn his works a place in the American literary canon. A popular text filled with social relevance, the book was adapted for film in 1966 and for the stage in 1979. As did many of his longer works, Fahrenheit 451 started out as a short story, titled "The Fireman," which was published in Galaxy Science Fiction (1951). Set in a futuristic society that bans books and fosters complacency through mind-numbing media, the novel focuses on Guy Montag, fireman number 451, who works for a firehouse that burns homes reported to have books inside. Once, in the distant past, the station put fires out instead of setting them, but the past, especially in a world without books, without history, remains a mythical shadow.

Montag's need to discover the past drives the narrative and leads him to seek answers in books. He makes friends with a neighbor, 17-year-old Clarisse McClellan, who questions Montag about his occupation and challenges his unexamined acceptance of society, forcing him to face his own discontent. Frustrated further by his wife's commitment to their superficial world, Montag sees Mildred's suicide attempt as a consequence of their empty lives. Montag becomes obsessed with finding out about the taboo texts; eventually the firefighters target his home after Captain Beatty, the fire chief, discovers Montag's subversive activities. Seeking help from a man named Faber, a retired English professor, Montag escapes the city and finds a vagabond group of intellectuals, led by a man named Granger. They are "the Book People," readers who memorize texts, the preservers of the written word. Montag memorizes Ecclesiastes, the one book he has found and read, and joins them. Ecclesiastes is a book of the Hebrew Bible, also known as the Old Testament, that ponders human existence, takes a dark view of life, and serves as a repository of wisdom and truths. These words soothe Montag; he finds comfort in the ancient text. Just as he is calming from his flight, bombs strike the city, and an atomic war "begins and ends in an instant." The story concludes as Montag walks with "the Book People" toward the dead city, reciting Ecclesiastes to himself and looking toward a future "with everything to think about and much to remember."

At the onset of the novel, Montag is satisfied with his life. The opening chapter describes the "pleasure" he derives from watching "things eaten, to see things blacken and changed." Montag knows the power he wields and takes pride in his social status. He is a respected man, a defender of the peace. A few unexpected encounters, however, cause Montag's world to come apart. During his initial conversation with Clarisse he is uncomfortable, musing that he can literally see "himself in her eyes." Later, as he reflects upon her strange questions, the reader senses that he sees, as he looks back, his own buried discontent. Montag struggles to make sense of his world with mentor figures, his wife and a strangely close family, and through Clarisse's anecdotes. When his faith in the system shatters, he scrambles to find some direction; through much of this process he acts mistakenly and makes misguided decisions. He is an antihero, an ordinary man who is not perfect.

The overarching theme in Fahrenheit 451 is censorship. The futuristic world that Bradbury creates censors knowledge. Bradbury crafts the book with the present and the many forms of censorship that occur in our society kept in mind. Thus, while Bradbury speaks to a “present” that is now some 60 years past, the novel is darkly prophetic. Bradbury’s novel features the censorship of books most prominently but also describes a world that limits individuality, freedom of thought, and creativity. As Faber explains to Montag, the books represent dangers the society tries to eradicate: “It’s not books you need, it’s some of the things that once were in books.” The novel depicts a world opposed not only to free thought but also to intellectualism, with liberal arts—subjects such as sociology, philosophy, history, and literature—considered especially dangerous. These ways of seeing the world stimulate individual thinking, which leads to conflict, something the society seeks to prevent at all costs. As Montag demands answers to his questions about the past, his behavior becomes more erratic. After he steals a book from a job and calls in sick, Montag attracts the attention of his boss, Captain Beatty, who can be viewed as Montag’s foil: Beatty’s values and beliefs contrast with the younger fireman’s and serve to highlight Montag’s exceptionalism in the context of the story. Beatty is zealous in his support of the social structure; through him Bradbury fills in what has transpired in the past: the history of the firehouse, how books began to be banned, and how “the word intellectual . . . became the swear word it deserved to be.” An ironic character who burns books yet is also highly literate, Beatty quotes literature and knows history. He is not a numb citizen like Mildred; Beatty is a creator of the system, whereas Mildred is a product of the oppressive social order.

Beatty tells Montag that the trouble with books started when special interest or minority groups found certain passages or works offensive and sought to remove them. He describes a world of growing populations and with them, increasing amounts of minority groups living in ever-closer proximity to each other: “The bigger your market, Montag, the less you handle controversy, remember that!” Here Beatty raises the challenge of living in a diverse culture. He suggests that the differences between these splintered groups are petty; nonetheless, they disrupt the harmony of the mass population. Beatty describes how, before books began to be banned, abridged copies of various texts circulated with the controversial bits removed. The media began to address the entire mass audience in an attempt to pacify smaller groups and entertain the whole. The result, Beatty claims, is a peaceful and happy culture. Yet what Beatty calls “peace” and “happiness” translates practically into obedience and complacency. This is illustrated by the reference to Mildred’s suicide attempt as a common phenomenon in the city. What he describes is a natural progression in the shaping of culture, but Beatty does not volunteer the underlying truth that the government’s subtle yet highly effective influence has shaped the course of events. By de-emphasizing authorship and ideas and instead supporting the proliferation of mass media, the establishment numbs people to their differences rather than learning to work with them.

Beatty explains that severe abridgment of texts was the first step. It eliminated diverse and conflicting ideas. In many of these passages we can see parallels to Bradbury’s own experiences as a writer. Bradbury writes long, luxurious passages filled with detail. His images are rich and vivid. As have many widely read authors, Bradbury has often been asked to abridge his works for anthologies and has received unsolicited suggestions to change content. In the coda at the end of Fahrenheit 451 the author writes, “There is more than one way to burn a book.” He rejects the idea of condensing literary works and argues that every detail is important in his works. Through Faber, the author defends his position on high-quality literature: “The more truthfully recorded details of life per square inch you can fit on a sheet of paper, the more ‘literary’ you are. . . . Telling detail. Fresh detail.” Bradbury’s works have been considered controversial; by the time he wrote Fahrenheit 451 he had witnessed the censorship of literature from schools as well as some book burnings. Written in a time when pieces of literature such as Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin and Mark Twain’s Adventures of Huckleberry Finn were under attack, Bradbury’s novel addressed pressing issues that we still face today.

These very real issues provide the inspiration for his fantasy. The ramifications of censoring texts are horrifying. Doing so changes knowledge itself. Omitting offending details pacifies the public, but it also simplifies the content, reducing knowledge to an elementary level. Unchallenged, the citizen's intellect is numbed; ignorance evolves into fear. A significant intellectual gap develops in Montag's society. The majority of people escape through the mass media; however, a few still cling to a lifestyle associated with books. Enter the firemen. The reassignment of the firemen illustrates the intrusion of the government on ideas: "We stand against the small tide of those who want to make everyone unhappy with conflicting theory and thought."

What Beatty describes is a natural shift away from books altogether that the people demand. An examination of Mildred exposes this myth. Advertising controls her desires. Mildred listens to a constant stream of ads on the Seashell radio that fits in her ear whenever she is not in the TV parlor—even in her sleep. She seems to be satisfied with her life; however, her suicide attempt suggests that subconsciously the emptiness of her existence haunts her. The next day she cannot even recall her actions. Characters in the novel like Mildred are fragile, both mentally and emotionally. They are threatened by philosophy and literature. When Montag reads a poem to Mildred and her friends, Mrs. Phelps breaks down in tears, Mrs. Bowles becomes enraged, and Mildred is consumed with embarrassment. They distrust the strange words, and each of the three women calls the firehouse, exposing Montag to Captain Beatty.

Montag makes a deliberate break from his society; however, he also seeks safety in the perspective of an old man he had met in the park a year prior. An ostracized professor turned recluse, Faber is all too aware of this phenomenon. Fear eats away at him; he is a victim of the society and, ironically, illustrates the role intellectuals have played in the demise of academia. He is full of fear and acknowledges his own complacency as he watches the world move further and further away from books and art. While Beatty explains the inferiority felt by the layperson, Faber illustrates the sometimes-arrogant superiority of the educated. As he and Montag put together a half-baked plan to wage their own private rebellion, Faber tries to control Montag's actions through a two-way earpiece. There is a schism between Montag, who is the major actor in changing the status quo, and Faber, the academic who has all the ideas but none of the courage to act. Montag seeks him out for aid in finding his own independence, but in the moment of crisis, Faber becomes just another voice in his ear. His intentions are genuine, but he ends up functioning just as the Seashell and Beatty do. Thus, the animosity felt by the greater population for its brightest minds is warranted.

Much of what we, as 21st-century readers, experience as the past in the narrative had not yet come to fruition when Bradbury wrote Fahrenheit 451 (1953). We can now drive 70 miles per hour on the highways; advertisements fill up our empty spaces, while cell phones and portable music fill up our quiet spaces. Rural areas continue to diminish. Our culture witnesses pursuits of fugitives on television, occasionally in live broadcasts, and television is an ever-increasing part of the home. Perhaps the novel is more haunting today, not only in its portrayal of the future, but also in its similarities to the present. As do many writers and historians, Bradbury portrays a negative social phenomenon, in this case censorship, while hoping to prevent it.

The story ends with outcasts' making a new beginning. As in The Martian Chronicles, the survivors must use lessons of the past to construct a more intentional and careful future, one where the society will admit complexity and dissension rather than masking conflict with uniformity. The principal tool in that struggle is memory. The characters in Fahrenheit 451 have no knowledge of what preceded them, and that handicaps their ability to build autonomous lives. While the foundation of a new society lies in the memory of the Book People, the new society must also remember how they arrived at a place where ideas were outlawed, "the temperatures at which books burn" was Fahrenheit 451, and the simplification of mass-released texts mollified the public, making them easy to control. The book, therefore, embraces the careful recording and studying of history and argues that remembering the past is crucial to constructing the future.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How do images of the natural world function in the novel? Discuss Clarisse's connection with nature. How does this affect her view of the world?

2. Montag hides books at the beginning of the novel but does not read them. What becomes significant then is why he finally reads. Analyze the events that lead to Montag's desire to read. Consider the other characters who influence his thinking and decision making. Evaluate why he ultimately begins reading books and why reading is significant to Montag and to the novel.
3. While Beatty ultimately foils Montag and Faber's plans, do the plans the two make seem significant to the novel and its overall message? With that in mind, imagine that Beatty did not interrupt the two rebels. Would the two of them have been able to save the civilization eventually? Why or why not? Additionally, consider why Bradbury creates Beatty as a foil. Is he providing a social commentary by doing so? Why or why not?
4. Part of what makes the novel so powerful is its troubling ending. Do you think Ray Bradbury's conclusion in Fahrenheit 451 does an adequate job of conveying a message? If so, why? If not, how would you change the ending to make your message more forceful?
5. At the center of the novel lies an important issue to America: freedom of speech, a right guaranteed by the First Amendment to the Constitution. Research the First Amendment at a trustworthy Web site such as <http://www.firstamendmentcenter.org/>. After learning about what the amendment says, evaluate the novel in light of free speech in today's world and the many ways it has been challenged. With your research in mind, is Fahrenheit 451 still relevant today? Is free speech in danger? Why or why not? Write an essay on freedom of speech in the novel.
6. Compare and contrast Beatty and Faber. How does each use his knowledge? Are they both manipulative? Why or why not? What does the reader learn from the juxtaposition of these characters?
7. Considering the elements of Fahrenheit 451 that depict technology in the 21st century, is Bradbury's future possible? Why, or why not?

Dandelion Wine* (1957)

As does the conductor of an orchestra, Douglas Spaulding, the protagonist of Dandelion Wine, directs the dawning of a new summer: "He pointed a finger . . . a sprinkle of windows came suddenly alight miles off in dawn country." The summer of Douglas's 12th year is the subject of Bradbury's most autobiographical work. Memories of Bradbury's idyllic childhood fill the book, which takes place in Green Town, Illinois, during the summer of 1928. Douglas's home bustles with life and a cast of characters: parents, grandparents, great-grandparents, boarders—a community of diverse personalities. The narrative memorializes the past and depicts the process of restoring Bradbury's memories. The firstborn, Douglas, has a younger brother, Tom. Although Douglas is the principal explorer and the subject of the novel is his own discovery, it is through Tom that Bradbury remembers his feelings of admiration for an older brother, "even when that brother ditched him" (Bradbury ix). As does Bradbury, Douglas loves movies like The Phantom of the Opera and walking home by the ravine at night with his friends. He begins writing early in life. Though Douglas's writing differs from Bradbury's own early stories, Douglas records the summer, chronicling what he calls "Rites and Ceremonies" and reflecting on them in a second part, "Discoveries and Revelations." At the same time, Douglas becomes profoundly aware of existence, his own life, and eventually develops a concept of death. Dandelion Wine portrays a child losing his innocence; throughout the text Douglas transitions from child to adolescent in a community swirling in the cycle of life.

While Douglas writes, his grandfather bottles wine from the dandelions growing on the wide lawn, a bottle for every day of summer. The wine is a metaphor: As Douglas's writing does, the wine preserves things and represents the passing of time. Douglas finds, however, that the bottles do not always match his recollections—sometimes shining brighter with happy memories or other times producing dark, cloudy wine on days that were sad. Unlike Douglas's writing, the wine's preservation is temporary, stocked for the following winter to lend a little warmth to the cold seasons. It will need to be remade as the memory of the summer days fades. Douglas's grandfather cautions him of this; memories, like the wine bottles, will be replaced with new ones and those days become a blur, with one or two unusual moments standing out. Tom insists that he can hold on to every day; Douglas has begun to realize the passing of memory this summer. The dandelion, the harvest, the bottling and later drinking of the wine symbolize the cyclical nature of the seasons and the passing of time.

Memory functions as a motif—an idea or image that recurs throughout the text. It not only recurs in Dandelion Wine, but runs throughout Bradbury's works, a sign of preoccupation with preserving the past. Douglas and his friends dub Colonel Freeleigh a "Time Machine" because he tells them stories that delve into his memories and send the children back through time. Fascinated by Freeleigh's stories, the children sense their importance; the tales feed the children's imaginations and enlarge their worldview.

Machines serve as antagonizing elements in the text. Yet, although they resist the passing of time, they eventually succumb to time and use and wear down as they age. The neighbor, Lou Huffman, tries to make a Happiness Machine but ultimately realizes that family provides more happiness than any external structure. The Green Machine, an electric motorcar, symbolizes technology and its dangers. The elderly ladies who own it, Miss Fern and Miss Roberta, have an accident and believe they have killed a man. Here the past, represented by the old ladies, and the new age of technology intersect. The women decide never to use the Green Machine again, and the issue is put to rest; the town trolley, another symbol of the past, is taken off its tracks to make way for a new and faster bus system. Even the Time Machine, Colonel Freeleigh, passes away, though his family tries to protect him, and Douglas's group laments the loss of his valuable memories.

Bradbury transforms the often-troublesome dandelion weed into a symbol of life itself, creating a fantastic story out of everyday, ordinary elements. Here, the author infuses magic into an otherwise realistic tale. Dandelion Wine describes the wonder of discovery and imagination: Douglas's changing, ever-expanding view of the world. Even when the point of view shifts to the minds of adults, his voice remains; the story is filtered through Douglas's consciousness. Douglas's obsession with the tarot card witch at the traveling carnival show illustrates both his and Bradbury's obsession with enchantment. While the carnival is a rundown place with an alcoholic manager, Douglas believes it houses a gypsy fortune-teller in the body of an old wax witch. He thinks that if he can only set her free, through spells and potions found in the library, she will give him a fortune: "It'll say we'll live forever, you and me, Tom, we'll live forever." Similarly, Douglas believes in a magical cure for the illness that strikes him late in the story, a sickness that occurs after his many revelations. Douglas's friend Mr. Jonas, the junkman, has bottles of air from exotic places in the past that cool and revive Douglas. After breathing in the aromatic vapors, Douglas is restored, and his family notices the "scent of cool night and cool water and cool snow" on his breath. There is room here to interpret that the magic occurs not only in Douglas's mind but also in the collective conscious of the family and, to a larger degree, the town. If such conjuring were an accepted part of the characters' lives, it could be called magical realism, a literary term used for describing texts where unrealistic elements emerge from otherwise realistic stories. Dandelion Wine, however, deals largely with fantasy, infusing imagination into an idyllic world that, although placed in a realistic setting, does not attempt to represent the political and historical realities that can be associated with such magical realist writers as Gunter Grass, Gabriel Garcia Marquez, or Isabel Allende.

Dandelion Wine deals with realities we cannot express with scientific explanations, the metaphysical, fantastical elements of our lives: existence, time, memory, death. The more Douglas becomes aware of being alive, the more he experiences loss. Throughout the summer Douglas suffers varying degrees of loss, from the death of his great-grandmother to the relocation of his best friend, John Huff. Douglas tries to deny the existence of loss, distracting himself with the tarot, but eventually faces the inexplicable, temporary nature of our lives and our ultimate powerlessness over time when he is struck with illness. Miraculously, though, as the summer ends, Douglas still holds on to life's magical qualities and continues to see the world as a place of limitless possibilities. The story ends as new school supplies appear in store windows and Grandpa Spaulding takes the porch swing off the porch for the year. The novel concludes as Douglas looks to the next summer, which will be "even bigger, nights will be longer and darker, more people dying, more babies born, and me in the middle of it." With all of its revelations and surprises; its emphasis on growth, imagination, and wonder, the novel ends as it begins, in the third-story cupola bedroom of Douglas's grandparents' house as he puts the town to bed, "and sleeping, put an end to summer."

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Dandelion Wine with Bradbury's short story "The Man Upstairs," a work that also takes place in Green Town, Illinois.
2. The ravine is a strong figure in the story that represents a challenge to various characters. Discuss the symbolism of the ravine and the way it functions in Douglas's life. Contrast this to Miss Lavinia's experiences there.
3. Research the year 1928 and consider why Bradbury set the novel during the summer of this year. Consult a general reference source or a reliable Web site such as <http://www.infoplease.com/year/1928.html>.
4. Using an encyclopedia or trustworthy Web site such as <http://www.raybradbury.com/index.html>, evaluate why Bradbury's works have been so popular. What themes do they contain that make them appealing? What is it about Bradbury's style that draws such a large readership?
5. Both Dandelion Wine and John Knowles's A Separate Peace are coming-of-age stories in which the novels' protagonists come to terms with loss. Write an essay comparing the two works and the ways the protagonist in each copes with and eventually begins to understand loss.

FURTHER QUESTIONS ON BRADBURY AND HIS WORK

1. In literature, attempting to describe a person, place, or event with believable detail is referred to as verisimilitude. Does Bradbury achieve verisimilitude in his science fiction works? Consider the details of both the society and the physical surroundings in The Martian Chronicles and Fahrenheit 451. What does detail add to or take away from the overall themes of the works?
2. Compare and contrast Bradbury's Fahrenheit 451 with George Orwell's 1984. What do the two have in common regarding their view of the future? What aspects have been actualized in our own society today? Use a scholarly source to familiarize yourself with dystopian literature. How do reading visions of dystopias impact our view of the present world?
3. The American story is replete with successive waves of frontier settlement. Each incoming wave displaced the earlier one: pioneers displaced Indians, pushing them farther west, and led the way for poor settler families, who were later joined and supplanted by middle-class families and professionals. Compare and contrast this process with The Martian Chronicles.
4. Hugh Holman's A Handbook to Literature defines science fiction as "a form of fantasy in which scientific facts, assumptions, or hypotheses form the basis, by logical extrapolation, of adventures in the future, on other planets, in other dimensions in time, or under new variants of scientific law." Is this an apt description of science fiction? If so, how does Bradbury's work fit in?
5. See the Michael Moore film Fahrenheit 9/11, whose title is derived from Bradbury's Fahrenheit 451. Why does Moore use this title? What comparisons between the film and book can be made? Can you see why Bradbury wanted Moore to change the title?
6. See an episode of Star Trek or The X-Files. What comparisons can you make to Bradbury's works? Do you find that Bradbury influenced the writers of these two television shows? How so?

7. As a child Bradbury read about many myths, especially Greek mythology. What mythological references can you find in his works? How has mythology helped shape Bradbury's vision?
8. Read Edgar Allen Poe's story "The Fall of the House of Usher," "The Pit and Pendulum," or "The Cask of Amontillado." What comparisons can you make between Poe's works and Bradbury's? What thematic and stylistic elements do the two authors share?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Aggelis, Steven L. Conversations with Ray Bradbury. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2004.
- Aldiss, Brian W. Trillion Year Spree. New York: Avon Books, 1988, 247–248.
- Amis, Kingsley. New Maps of Hell: A Survey of Science Fiction. New York: Arno Press, 1975, 105–113.
- Attebery, Brian. The Fantasy Tradition in American Literature: From Irving to Le Guin. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980, 133–141.
- Bloom, Harold. Writers of English: Lives and Works Modern Fantasy Writers. New York: Chelsea House, 1995.
- Bradbury, Ray. The Stories of Ray Bradbury. Knopf, New York: New York, 1980.
- Brians, Paul. "Study Guide for Ray Bradbury's The Martian Chronicles." Dr. Paul Brians' Home Page. Washington State University. Available online. URL: http://www.wsu.edu/~brians/science_fiction/martian_chronicles.html. Accessed June 11, 2006.
- Cherry, Jim. "Future Tense Sci-Fi Legend Ray Bradbury Going Strong." Conversations with Ray Bradbury. Edited by Steven L. Aggelis. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2004.
- Eller, Jonathan. "The Body Electric: Sources of Ray Bradbury's Martian Chronicles." University of Mississippi Studies in English 11 (1995): 376–410.
- Eller, Jonathan R., and William F. Touponce. Ray Bradbury: The Life of Fiction. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2004.
- Greenberg, Martin Harry, and Joseph D. Olander, eds. Ray Bradbury. New York: Taplinger, 1980.
- Hibberd, James. "Bradbury Is on Fire!" Salon.com. August 29, 2001. Available online. URL: <http://archive.salon.com/people/feature/2001/08/29/bradbury/index.html>. Accessed May 15, 2006.
- Hillegas, Mark R. The Future as Nightmare: H. G. Wells and the Anti-Utopians. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- Holman, C. Hugh. A Handbook to Literature. 3rd ed. New York: Odyssey Press, 1972.
- Indick, Ben F. The Drama of Ray Bradbury. Baltimore: T-K Graphics, 1977.
- Johnson, Wayne L. Ray Bradbury. New York: Frederick, 1980.
- McNelly, Willis E. "Ray Bradbury." Science Fiction Writers: Critical Studies of the Major Authors from the early Nineteenth Century to the Present Day, edited by E. F. Blieler. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1982.
- Mogen, David. Ray Bradbury. Boston: Twayne, 1986.
- Nolan, William F. The Ray Bradbury Companion. Detroit: Gale, 1975.
- "Ray Bradbury: Celebrating a Life of Wonder and Imagination." 2001. HarperCollins. Available online. URL: <http://www.raybradbury.com>. Accessed May 15, 2006.
- "Ray Bradbury Online." 2001. Space Age City. Available online. URL: <http://www.spaceagecity.com/bradbury/>. Accessed May 15, 2006.
- Schwenger, Peter, and John Whittier Treat. "America's Hiroshima, Hiroshima's America." Boundary 2 21, no. 1 (1994): 233–253.
- Slusser, George Edgar. The Bradbury Chronicles. San Bernardino, Calif.: Borgo Press, 1977.
- Touponce, William F. Ray. Bradbury and the Poetics of Reverie: Fantasy, Science Fiction, and the Reader. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UNI Research Press, 1984.
- Wands, D. C. "Fantastic Fiction: Ray Bradbury." FantasticFiction.co.uk. May 29, 2006. Available online. URL: <http://www.fantasticfiction.co.uk/b/ray-bradbury/>. Accessed May 30, 2006.
- Weist, Jerry. Bradbury: An Illustrated Life: A Journey to Far Metaphor. New York: Morrow, 2002.
- Weller, Sam. The Bradbury Chronicles: The Life of Ray Bradbury. New York: William Morrow, 2005.

GWENDOLYN BROOKS (1917–2000)

Art hurts. Art urges voyages—and it is easier to stay at home.

(A Capsule Course in Black Poetry Writing, 1975)

The African-American poet, novelist, and autobiographer Gwendolyn Brooks was born on June 7, 1917, in Topeka, Kansas, at her grandmother's house. Soon after her birth, her parents, David Anderson Brooks and Keziah Corinne Wims Brooks, moved to Chicago, the city that became Gwendolyn Brooks's home and source of poetic inspiration. David, a janitor and housepainter, and Keziah, a former schoolteacher, read to Gwendolyn at an early age, instilling in her a love of words and music and an appreciation for the sound of language: the rhythms and cadences she wove masterfully throughout her life as a poet and teacher. She began writing poetry at age seven; by 13 she had published her first poem, "Eventide," in American Childhood magazine. In addition to the support she received from her parents, she was encouraged by James Weldon Johnson, to whom she had written, and by Langston Hughes, whom she met at the Metropolitan Community Church in Chicago. After Brooks sent Johnson some of her poems, he recommended that she read modern(ist) poets like Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, and e. e. cummings. Hughes sight-read her poetry in person, told her she had talent, encouraged her to keep writing, and later wrote about her potential in his newspaper column. By 16 Brooks had already assembled an impressive poetry portfolio of more than 75 published poems that had appeared in Chicago Defender, a newspaper serving Chicago's black population.

After graduating with an associate degree in literature and arts from Wilson Junior College (1936), Brooks worked as a domestic and as a secretary in several offices. Later, she drew upon these experiences in Maud Martha (1953) and In the Mecca (1968)—before she served as publicity director for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's (NAACP's) Youth Council in Chicago. She married Henry Lowington Blakely II on September 17, 1939, and gave birth to two children: a son, Henry L. Blakely III (1940), and a daughter, Nora (1951). In 1941 Gwendolyn and Henry attended a poetry class at the South Side Community Arts Center, a formative experience during which she sketched many of the early poems that would make her famous.

During this time she lived in Chicago's "kitchenette buildings," cramped, often-unsanitary apartments that provided the setting for her first collection of poems, A Street in Bronzeville (1954). This first collection, named for the segregated Douglas community area on the South Side of Chicago, introduced many of the themes that would occupy Brooks for the first half of her career. These include the search for dignity and happiness in a society often blind to such basic needs, the reality of racism and poverty in America, life in urban America, the plight of underprivileged black women, mother love, and the trauma of world war. As B. J. Bolden describes, "The compilation of forty-one poems forms a collage of racism, sexism, and classicism of America in its illumination of the people who strive to survive in Bronzeville. In the background of her portraits looms the shadow of the American struggle to come to grips with its diverse population by entrapping the Black community in a stagnant environment" (14). The collection is divided into three sections. The first section focuses on the community of poor blacks she knew and with whom she lived. The second section consists of five portraits, including the long poem (159 lines) "Sunday of Satin-Legs Smith," which Brooks wrote at Richard Wright's suggestion. The third and final section is a 12-sonnet sequence titled "Gay Chaps at the Bar" based on reflections about World War II by men who fought in the war, which she dedicated to her brother, "Staff Sergeant Raymond Brooks and every other soldier." Critics praised A Street in Bronzeville. With a national reputation and a critically acclaimed book, Brooks received a grant from the National Institute of Arts and Letters the following year (1946), as well as a Guggenheim Fellowship that year and then another Guggenheim Fellowship in 1947.

In 1950 Brooks received the Pulitzer Prize, the first African American to do so, for her second collection of poetry, Annie Allen (1949), which describes the life of its title character in four parts: "Notes from the Childhood and the Girlhood," "The Anniad," "Appendix to the Anniad," and "The Womanhood." Unlike A Street in Bronzeville with its vignettes and multiple-character focus, Annie Allen is a narrative in verse, often experimental, as in the "sonnet-ballads" Brooks fashions from colloquial speech and formal diction that tell of one black girl's development and struggles with poverty and racial identity, a story of dreams deferred and the trials of tenement life. Brooks details her heroine's birth, adolescence, search for self-understanding and love, sacrifices during time of war, betrayal, and growth into womanhood, when she emerges finally alone yet determined and self-reliant and calls out with maturity, wisdom, and hope: "Rise. / Let us combine." [and] "Wizard a track through our own screaming weed."

Brooks followed Annie Allen with Maud Martha (1953), a largely autobiographical novel dealing with racism, sexism, and the identity of an African-American woman before, during, and after World War II. Rounding out Brooks's early works is The Bean Eaters (1960), a collection of poems that, although rooted in similar experiences as her previous works, explores civil rights issues, which were becoming increasingly important to Brooks, and experiments with free verse. In the collection Brooks deals with such charged issues as the integration of the Little Rock, Arkansas, school system and the lynching of 14-year-old Emmett Till. But, true to her faithfulness to Chicago, Brooks also continued to write about blacks in the North. As Arthur P. Davis describes, Brooks's works through The Bean Eaters are set in a distinct locale, Bronzeville, both a realistic and an imagined space that captures much about the northern black experience:

The scene on which Miss Brooks places her characters is always "a street in Bronzeville," and Bronzeville is not just the Southside of Chicago. It is also Harlem, South Philadelphia, and every other black ghetto in the North. Life in these various Bronzeville streets is seldom gay or happy or satisfying. The Bronzeville world is a world of run-down tenements, or funeral homes, or beauty parlors, of old roomers growing older without graciousness, or "cool" young hoodlums headed for trouble, of young girls having abortions. Unlike the South, it is not a place of racial violence, but in other respects it is worse than the South. It is a drab, impersonalized "corner" of the metropolitan area into which the Negro—rootless and alone—has been pushed. (CLA Journal 90–92)

Like the city dwellers in James Joyce's Dubliners (1914), Brooks's early characters are ordinary people, many of whom are ghetto dwellers entrapped by social, economic, and racial forces they can neither control nor understand. And, as with Joyce's paralyzed Dubliners, Brooks characters ultimately fail, making choices and acting in ways, often out of fear and insecurity, that perpetuate their suffering.

During this period of Brooks's enormously productive creative life, she also taught creative writing at numerous institutions, including Columbia College (Chicago), Northeastern Illinois University, and the University of Wisconsin. While in teaching she inspired others to learn, express, and grow, she herself was inspired by key African-American writers and activists when she attended the Second Black Writer's Conference at Fisk University, where, among others, she met Amiri Baraka (formerly LeRoi Jones), Ron Milner, and Haki R. Madhubuti (formerly Don L. Lee). Brooks was impressed by these key figures' vigorous and sometimes aggressive action in pursuing social and political ends, their fight for civil rights, and their leadership in the black nationalist movement, a movement in the 1960s and early 1970s that focused on cultivating a sense of identity among people of African ancestry. With cries such as "Black Power" and "Black is beautiful," the black nationalist leaders cultivated a sense of pride. Although the movement was complex and often controversial, it emphasized the need for the cultural, political, and economic independence of African Americans, and it called for action, all of which appealed to the politically aware and socially concerned Brooks.

Not surprisingly, her next work, In the Mecca (1968), a collection of poems largely dealing with events in a Chicago tenement building in which she worked as a young woman called "Mecca," focused on experiences and language unique to black Americans. Here Brooks uses intricate phrasings, rhymes, shifting tones, eccentric characters, fallen black heroes Medgar Evers and MALCOLM X, and a local street gang, the Blackstone Rangers. These poems describe abject poverty, argue for social equality, record tragic deaths, and lament the loss of African-American spirituality. As George Kent describes, "Gwendolyn spends little time evoking the Mecca Building, the former showplace that had become a slum and served as the setting for her framework and related stories. She focuses instead upon what is happening to the holiness of people's souls in a corrupting universe" (211–212). For Muslims, Mecca signifies paradise, heaven on earth. Thus, the title of the collection, which depicted a tenement about as far from heaven on earth as could be imagined, also enshrined the beauty and sacredness of black culture. In 1968 Brooks succeeded Carl Sandburg as the poet laureate of Illinois, a position she held until her death in 2000. She used this position to encourage young writers and fight for the black cause.

Influenced by activists and young African-American voices as well as becoming increasingly attuned to the civil rights struggle, Brooks continued writing about the black experience. But to say that she wrote explicitly about the African-American plight later in her career misses the point that her subject had always been the black experience. Her next collection, Riot (1969), was written during and inspired by the chaotic, incendiary riots following the assassination of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. This collection also marked her move to Broadside Press, a black Detroit press operated by Dudley Randall, a close friend. Brooks continued in this vein, publishing over 20 works and writing children's books, an autobiography in two parts, advice to young poets, and even a collection of poems, the Near-Johannesburg Boy and Other Poems (1986), dealing with apartheid in South Africa.

From 1985 until 1986, Brooks served as consultant in poetry to the Library of Congress. She received over 50 honorary doctoral degrees, the 1988 Essence Literary Award, was inducted into the National Women's Hall of Fame, became the first black woman to receive the Poetry Society of America's Frost Medal, and received a Senior Fellowship in Literature grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. Taken together, Brooks's poems about ordinary people produce a vivid and complex picture of America's poor, with poverty both sign and symbol of racism and injustice. The poor are uneducated (or undereducated), victimized by racism and crime, trapped by society and their own inadequacies. The poet-narrator's attitude toward them is one of wistful sympathy; she herself is a part of the life she describes.

"kitchenette building" (1945)

The first poem from A Street in Bronzeville, "kitchenette building," describes life in a tenement building, where five apartments share one bathroom, and the cramped spaces and a destitute life leave little time to hope and dream. Here Brooks portrays life in the 1930s and 1940s, when those fleeing the Jim Crow South to economic freedom in the North were desperate for housing. To accommodate the population increase and to maintain a segregated Chicago, old mansions on Chicago's South Side were transformed into tenement buildings, with large houses divided into tiny compartments. Here the dwellers face disillusionment: a journey made to freedom whose end lies in low-income, segregated housing. What was to be a possibility for a new life becomes a return to lesser-than status in a northern city, where unspoken, unwritten ideas about segregation dictate that blacks live in squalor. The first poem in the sequence is a central one because it asks what the fate of a dream would be in this world. Would it penetrate the "onion fumes" of garbage and "fried potatoes"? This question hangs in the air like the smell of rotting garbage and grease; it is a haunting question that seems nearly impossible to answer. For the Bronzeville dwellers live in a world of limitations in which any higher aspirations must be put aside for immediate needs: "rent," "feeding a wife," and "satisfying a man."

The poem's dream appears as "white and violet," colors that convey lightness, intransigence, and the irony of privilege and its lack in Bronzeville. As the speaker, in this case the collective "we" voice of the Bronzeville dwellers, wonders whether a dream could take flight or even sing to those who may or may not be able to entertain a message the dream might carry, a terse response follows: "We wonder." But this moment of reveille is short-lived, engulfed by the stark realities of the tenement building, which press upon all who dwell there and confine their sense of hope to life's basic needs, those things, like lukewarm water, that still necessitate patience, resignation. This portrait of urban city life, while forming a bitter social commentary and capturing the poignancy of dashed dreams, still shows human beings making their way in a world of unfathomable odds, a people determined to survive. Regardless of the way we read the poem, "kitchenette building" records the plight of urban black life prior to the civil rights era. This poem enshrines that time when hope for a future is deferred by the reality of the present, a time when "freedom" was defined according to a set of social precepts dictated by a dominant white culture, which, despite its postwar prosperity and ability to live the American dream, literally has not made space for black America.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Locate Richard Wright's documentary book 12 Million Black Voices (1941), which contains descriptions of the plight of urban blacks after the northern migration. Note how, on pages 105–110, Wright depicts kitchenette life: "The kitchenette blights the personalities of our growing children, disorganizes them, blinds them to hope, creates problems whose effects can be traced in the characters of its child victims for years afterwards." With this portrayal of kitchenette life in mind, compare what the two have to say about urban youth. Are their thoughts complementary, or do they form two distinctly different visions of childhood? Finally, write a well-developed essay that explores childhood in the kitchenette buildings from the perspective of each author.
2. Read Langston Hughes's poem "Harlem: A Dream Deferred" (an online version can be located at <http://www.americanpoems.com/poets/Langston-Hughes/2381>). First analyze "kitchenette building" as a response to Hughes's poem, keeping in mind what both have to say about dreams. Next, think about setting. How are the settings of the two poems similar? With both the theme of dreams and the setting of each poem in mind, write a well-developed essay that deals with the urban black experience.
3. Read Rita Dove's "Teach Us to Number Our Days" (1980), from her first full-length volume, The Yellow House on the Corner (1980). Explore the way both Brooks's poem and "Teach Us to Number Our Days" deal with social inequality and dreams. After you consider what both poets have to say, write a well-developed essay on the meaning of dreams and the art of social critique in both poems.

“the mother” (1945)

“The mother” is a 35-line poem in free verse: It has no regular meter or line length and relies on natural speech rhythms and the varying of stressed and unstressed syllables. The irregular meter helps to recreate the mind of the divided mother: the agitated, unsettled mind of a woman still trying to make sense of decisions she has made. Yet Brooks does include full rhymes and some slant rhymes at the end of lines that help to unify the work and cause the last sound and image in the line to remain in the reader's ear. Although the poem deals with difficult subject matter, abortion, the poem is carefully crafted so that it achieves a lyrical sound. Immediately the first line assaults the reader, leaving no doubt about the poem's subject, but the attitude that the speaker takes toward the subject is not easily discerned, for many of the lines ring with an ambiguous, often contradictory tone. In fact, the title itself is ironic; the woman speaking, although she has been pregnant, has not birthed a child, yet she implores the reader at the end of the poem, despite the difficult decisions she has made and the accompanying guilt she has expressed, to believe that she has loved all of the children she has given up.

The mother is divided: On the one hand, she affirms the decisions she has made; on the other hand, she questions those same decisions, groping for words to express the dichotomous feelings she harbors, laboring to use language to express how “the truth is to be said.” The mother's memory and imagination link her to what she has lost, leading her to conjure the things her children might have done and to speak directly to her aborted children throughout the poem. In this way, the poem has a dreamlike quality, one in which the mother grapples with reality but also fantasizes about what might have been, creating an overall nostalgic tone that is suffused with pathos, that strange artistic quality that evokes tenderness, pity, and sorrow all at once. As in many of the other poems in A Street in Bronzeville (1945), Brooks deals with children, the innocent who suffer in an adult world and who grapple for some place in a harsh space where they are often marginalized. Yet, despite Brooks's interest in children and her compassion for their plight, “the mother” focuses on the consciousness of the would-be child bearer, the one who has elected not to carry children into a bleak world. The lost children stand as reminders of the harshness of the impoverished world the speaker inhabits; the mother expresses concern for those who might have been introduced into a cruel world.

Richard Wright, author of Native Son and proponent of Brooks's poetry, read “the mother” and thought the subject inappropriate for A Street in Bronzeville. While Wright may have been correct about the climate of the times, it is difficult to imagine a more effective poem: one that breaks with our expectations and presents a portrait, drawn from the harsh reality of street life, of a divided woman. By presenting in a stark, realistic manner, a woman who has aborted her children, Brooks offers a moving depiction of the destitute urban woman. Even though this woman regrets her actions, she keeps the lost alive in her memory, weighing what might have been, what she believes, what she knows, what she struggles with, what she has lost, and what does not make sense to her. Thus, the mother is a complex Brooks character, a woman who inhabits a difficult world, where day-to-day survival necessitates choosing from a host of real possibilities that defy any stereotype, any abstract, idealized notion of what it means to be human.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Keeping in mind that Richard Wright thought “the mother” was inappropriate for publication, evaluate Brooks's treatment of abortion in the poem. Why might the subject matter be difficult for readers in the mid-1940s?
2. Dealing again with Wright's objection, think about the purpose of art and evaluate Wright's assessment of Brooks in light of his controversial novel about an enraged black man (Native Son, 1940) published several years before Brooks's poem appeared in print. What do Wright's and Brooks's works have in common? What purpose does art serve for both artists? After learning about and/or reading Native Son, do you feel that Wright was being hypocritical in his critique? Why or why not?

3. Commenting on “the mother,” Brooks says, “Hardly your crowned and praised and ‘customary’ Mother; but a Mother not unfamiliar, decides that she, rather than her World, will kill her children. The decision is not nice, not simple, and the emotional consequences are neither nice nor simple” (Brooks, Report from Part One, 184). Thinking about this quote, compare Brooks’s poem about a mother who kills her children with Toni Morrison’s Beloved, a novel about a mother who kills her child rather than have it return to slavery. Why do both authors deal with these sensitive subjects?
4. Read Brooks’s two poems “People who have no children can be hard” and “What shall I give my children? who are poor,” both of which can be found in the “The Womanhood” section of Annie Allen (these two poems can also be found in Selected Poems). With these two poems and “the mother” in mind, write a well-developed essay on motherhood in Brooks’s poetry, analyzing what she says about mothers in general and about black mothers specifically.

“A Bronzeville Mother Loiters in Mississippi. Meanwhile, a Mississippi Mother Burns Bacon” (1960)

In her well-known poem from her 1960 collection The Bean Eaters, Brooks bases “A Bronzeville Mother Loiters in Mississippi. Meanwhile, a Mississippi Mother Burns Bacon” on a horrific historical event: the highly publicized lynching of a 14-year-old black youngster, Emmett Till. While originally born in Mississippi, Till moved to Chicago when he was two years old. In 1955, Till and his cousin traveled to Money, Mississippi, to stay with Till’s great-uncle, Moses Wright. Till’s mother was well aware of the racial tension in the South, especially after the United States Supreme Court’s 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education, to end segregation in public schools. It was a landmark case that overturned the 1896 Supreme Court ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson, which had previously allowed U.S. states and localities to mandate racial segregation.

Thus, Till’s mother had cautioned him about this racially charged area of Mississippi. On August 24, 1955, Emmett Till, entered Bryant’s Grocery and Meat Market in the town of Money, Mississippi. Till exited the store; soon afterward, so did Carolyn Bryant, the store owner’s wife. Although it is not clear exactly what transpired (sources vary), the official Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) report says that Till whistled at Bryant, who told her husband of the event several days later after he returned from a trip. According to the FBI report, which can be found at <http://foia.fbi.gov/till/till.pdf>: “On August 28, 1955, at approximately 2:30 a.m., Roy Bryant (Carolyn Bryant’s husband), J. W. Milam and at least one other person appeared at the home of Mose Wright, Till’s great uncle, looking for the boy who had ‘done the talking’ in Money and abducted Till from the home.” The men then drove to a plantation, where they beat him, shot him in the head, tied a cotton gin fan around his neck, and threw him into the Tallahatchie River. His body was recovered on August 31, 1955. This nationally reported event fueled the growing Civil Rights movement. On May 10, 2004, the Justice Department reopened the case to determine whether anyone else was liable. While the grand jury found no credible evidence that others were involved and decided not to press charges against Carolyn Bryant, the report provided some sense of closure to a case studied and written about for over 50 years. In addition to Brooks’s work, which memorializes the event, the case inspired many poignant artworks, including the first play by the Nobel laureate Toni Morrison, poems by Langston Hughes and Audre Lorde, and a song by Bob Dylan called “The Death of Emmett Till.”

Told through the point of view of Carolyn Bryant, the white mother whose husband had just been acquitted of the murder of Emmett Till, the poem describes Bryant as she burns bacon, her mind occupied with the horrific murder and imagining the story in the form of a ballad. As with lyric poetry and fairy tales, she wants the story to conform to conventions, to fit her worldview and absolve her of guilt. Thus, she thinks of herself as “The milk-white maid” pursued by “the Dark Villain” (Till) and ultimately rescued by “the Fine Prince,” figures that might, from her dim recollection, appear in a ballad. But the poet is careful to create an ironic distance, noting that she does not even remember what a ballad is. These thoughts, interrupted by the burning of bacon, soon leave her as she dwells on the boy's age and innocence:

The fun was disturbed, then all but nullified
 When the Dark villain was a blackish child Of fourteen, with eyes still too young to be dirty,
 And a mouth too young to have lost every reminder
 Of its infant success.

As an image of Till rises to meet her, the fairy tale she has woven disintegrates, leaving her with “no thread capable of the necessary Sew-work.” Her meditation on the events, however, ends with hatred not for the boy who has been killed, but for her husband. The kiss he gives her is not of love but of death: “But his mouth would not go away and neither would the / Decapitated exclamation points in the Other Woman's eyes.” The Other Woman is the mother of Emmett Till, and her presence increases the guilt of the Mississippi mother. As the poem ends, her husband pulls her close to kiss her, and she does nothing. Unlike the moment with Till, she just stands there as a hatred for her husband bursts “into glorious flower.”

For Discussion or Writing

1. “A Bronzeville Mother Loiters in Mississippi. Meanwhile, a Mississippi Mother Burns Bacon” is a long and unusual title for a long poem. In the poem, details from ordinary life, northern and southern, are interspersed with meditations on the perils of growing up black in America. What holds the poem together?
2. Compare “A Bronzeville Mother” with other poems from The Bean Eaters, such as “The Last Quatrain of Emmett Till,” “The Chicago Defender Sends a Man to Little Rock,” and the “The Ballad of Rudolph Reed.” As with a “Bronzeville Mother,” these poems are rooted in the history of racism, violence—especially lynching—and discrimination. Taken together, what stance do these different poetic voices form? What do they have to say about concrete moments in history? Finally, write a well-documented research paper that explores the historical events Brooks's poems enshrine.
3. Research the history of lynching by visiting <<http://www.withoutsanctuary.org/main.html>>, which contains photographs and postcards of lynching in America. How does Brooks's poem respond to such atrocities? What value lies in reflecting on a lynching story from a white perspective? How does this affect the tone of the poem?
4. Why do the lines grow briefer at the very end? What effect does this create, and why is this effect significant?
5. Compare this poem with Brooks's poem “The Last Quatrain of the Ballad of Emmett Till,” which reflects on Till's mother. Why does Brooks dedicate so much space to Carolyn Bryant and so little to Till's mother? Consider the style differences between the two poems. Why are these differences important, and how do they affect meaning?

“The Chicago Defender Sends a Man to Little Rock” (1960)

To understand this poem's significance, it is important to understand the cultural context about which Brooks is writing, one alluded to in the poem's epigraph, “Fall, 1957.” Brooks's poem deals with what is called “the Little Rock Nine” or “the Little Rock crisis,” a landmark moment in the history of civil rights in America. After the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Brown v. Board of Education, which declared all laws establishing segregated schools to be unconstitutional and called for the desegregation of American public schools, the NAACP worked to register students in all-white schools in the South. The NAACP supported nine African-American students, who, on September 4, 1957, were blocked from entering Little Rock Central High School by the Arkansas National Guard under orders of the then-governor, Orval Faubus. President Dwight D. Eisenhower federalized the Arkansas National Guard, demanded that they return to their armories, and sent the 101st Airborne Division to enforce the federal court order. In what most believe to be a political decision, Faubus closed Little Rock high schools for the 1958–59 school year.

The first-person narrator of the poem, a reporter from the Chicago Defender, a paper often read by blacks who migrated from the South and wanted to know about race relations there, is first struck by how unremarkable the people of Little Rock are. They bear children, “comb and part their hair, “watch want ads,” and repair their homes. They sing hymns, which they have rehearsed well and drink lemon teas, eat Lorna Doones, celebrate Christmas, play baseball, have open air concerts, love, show loving kindness to one another, and answer their phones out of courtesy. All of these observations confuse the speaker, who is attempting to understand the people who have purportedly spread hatred. Here we see the poem’s complexity. As readers, we are asked to fill in many blanks, to interject the historical context, remember what has taken place, since we are privy to knowledge that the speaker does not have. This complex way of telling creates a sense of irony; the speaker spends most of the poem observing Little Rock’s normalcy and goodness, something that the reporter/speaker knows the Chicago Defender editor will not accept. So the imagined answer of the editor hangs in the air, “Why?” While the poem never provides an answer, it makes a radical shift in the last 10 lines, with the speaker reporting on the white mass of people who spit and throw rocks, garbage, and fruit, harassing the Little Rock Nine as they make their way to the school building and who, in the final lines, are associated with the crucified Christ. Thus, in the end, the reader is left with a jarring juxtaposition, an unresolved set of observations that still need to be processed, examined, and understood.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Visit the Chicago Defender homepage, <http://www.chicagodefender.com/>, and learn about its history. Take what you learn about the paper and apply it to Brooks’s poem, thinking about the historical significance of the paper, Brooks’s role as a reporter, and her poem on the subject.
2. Visit the Web site for the Dwight D. Eisenhower Presidential Library and Museum. There you will find archival documents related to the “Little Rock School Integration Crisis”: <http://www.eisenhower.archives.gov/dl/LittleRock/little-rockdocuments.html>. Read both the personal correspondence there as well as the official press releases. Finally, write a well-developed essay that assesses Eisenhower’s role in the integration of the Little Rock school system. What struggles did Eisenhower face? How did his course of action affect civil rights history? As a point of interest, you also may want to explore the correspondence between Jackie Robinson and President Eisenhower, a famous exchange between the first African-American professional baseball player of the modern era in 1957 and the then-president of the United States.
3. Analyze the final lines of Brooks’s poem: “The lariat lynch-wish I deplored.” / “The loveliest lynchee was our Lord.” Here Brooks makes a comparison with the crucifixion of Jesus. With these final lines in mind, trace the religious imagery in the poem. Why does Brooks fill the poem with such images? What is their effect? How does this imagery cast the African Americans known as the Little Rock Nine? How do both reflect a shift in Brooks’s perspective toward race relations in America?
4. Compare this poem with Countee Cullen’s sonnet “Christ Recrucified,” noting how each poem deals with race and religion. How do the Christ images in both poems function, and to whom do they refer? Do the poems employ these images ironically? Why or why not?

“We Real Cool” (1960)

A poem that appeals as much to sound as sight, “We Real Cool” is the most anthologized of Brooks’s poetry, an indication of both the poem’s immediacy and its complexity: the layers of meaning one encounters when pondering just eight short lines. In a 1961 interview with Studs Terkel, Brooks spoke about the poem's rhythm and the way the poem should be read:

Well, ideally, for myself at any rate, the “we” is supposed to be almost an attachment to the word that precedes it, and it's to indicate a sort of lostness and a sort of bewildered clutch at identity, a sort of—a little cry: we. And yet this “we” can't come and stand up straight and tall. It's not in These pool players feel that way, although I'm sure that most of them wouldn't be able to express it. (“A Conversation with Gwendolyn Brooks,” Gayles 9)

Here we see Brooks emphasizing the oral aspects of the poem and commenting upon the pool players' identity: how the boys are revealed through careful word choices and a thoughtful reading, with the personality of the players created in the way the poem is intoned.

While what is often stressed is the rhythm of the poem, which is, of course, significant in that it predates rap yet has raplike qualities, this poem also deals with the effects of segregation. Thus, rather than merely interpreting the boys in the poem as idle loafers, which is easy to do when such stereotypes fill the news and movies, the boys can be considered as representatives of the black community, those who have been denied membership in the greater society. As Bolden describes: “The Black men of Bronzeville are not to be taken merely as ‘pool players,’ but as metaphorically indicative of the long term effects of segregation on Black Americans who are entrapped within the confines of their own poverty-stricken communities and ostracized, based upon negative racial stereotypes of the dominant white society” (130). Here, as several critics have noted, we can find an overall consistency in Brooks's works, which forms a continuum dealing with race, class, and gender issues. It is tempting to read this poem without interjecting cultural context, but when we consider the world in which these young men live, we find their own self-doubts, hesitations, and fears. In this sense, the poem speaks about collective identity, which, on the one hand, is representative of the condition of urban segregation. On the other hand, what these players lack is a sense of self, the sort of autonomous existence that would enable them to sustain themselves, find community, and act in the world.

For Discussion or Writing

1. When initially published, “We Real Cool” was banned in some West Virginia and Mississippi schools because the word jazz had sexual connotations. Brooks responded to this claim with the following:

I didn't mean that at all. I meant that these young men would have wanted to challenge anything that was accepted by “proper” people, so I thought of something that is accepted by almost everybody, and that is summertime, the month of June. So these pool players, instead of paying customary respect to the loveliness of June—the flowers, the blue sky, honeyed weather—wanted instead to derange it, to scratch their hands in it as if it were a head of hair. This is what went through my head; that is what I meant. However, a space can be permitted for a sexual interpretation. Talking about different interpretations gives me a chance to say something I firmly believe—that poetry is for personal use. When you read a poem, you may not get out of it all the poet put into it, but you are different from the poet. You're different from everybody else who is going to read the poem, so you should take from it what you need. Use it personally. (Howe and Fox, “A Conversation with Gwendolyn Brooks,” Gayles 144)

With Brooks's comments in mind, think about your first reading of the poem. How did it differ from the thoughts Brooks gives here? Thinking on the differences between your initial understanding and your grasp of the poem now and about what Brooks says about the open nature of interpretation, write a well-developed essay that argues multiple ways to read the poem, the many ways readers can internalize this particu- lar poem without applying a certain context and without the author's ideas. Evaluate these possible responses. Ultimately, weigh whether knowing what the poet intends is important or not. You might consider looking at Louise Rosenblatt's work of literary criticism The Reader, the Text, the Poem: The Transactional Theory of the Literary Work (1978), which argues that readers transact with the poem, creating meaning along with the author. After reading Rosenblatt's ideas, evaluate which critical approach you have been taking to interpreting literature and identify the approach you think is most productive.

2. You can hear Brooks reading the poem at Poets.org, the Web site published by the American Academy of Poets: <http://www.poets.org/viewmedia.php/prmMID/15433>. After hearing Brooks read, think about how her reading affects your understanding of the poem. What possible interpretations does Brooks's reading invite? After considering these questions, write a well-developed essay that contrasts the experience of reading the poem silently with hearing the author reader her own work. After hearing her read, do you feel as free to interpret as you did before, or has her reading restricted what you feel you have to say?
 3. Read Brooks's "the preacher: ruminates behind the sermon," which was also banned in a 1974 Virginia public school dispute and in Nebraska. Then, compare the two poems, looking for specific language or images that might be offensive. Can you see why others objected to the poems? Finally, identify what makes both poems unique and vital for understanding Brooks's works and write a well-developed editorial that argues against censorship, using images and quotes from the poems.
 4. Richard Wright's Native Son (1940), Brooks's "We Real Cool," and RALPH ELLISON's "Flying Home" all address social inequality and the difficulty of changing social status. After reading these works, read Jonathon Kozol's Savage Inequalities: Children in America's Schools, an indictment of the American school system. With Kozol's ideas in mind, write a well-developed essay that analyzes these three literary works through Kozol's modern sociological lens. What do these works reveal about American education? Finally, consider whether these three black authors' insights still apply to public education in American today.
 5. Read Brooks's poem "The Lovers of the Poor" and then compare it with "We Real Cool." What do the two poems have to say about social inequality, economic deprivation, segregation, and discrimination? With this questions in mind, craft a well-developed essay on the social ramifications of both works.

"Riot" (1969)

Written just two years after Brooks heard black nationalists, including LeRoi Jones (Amiri Baraka), speak, "Riot" is the title poem from a collection Brooks published in 1969 with a black press (Broadside). Opting not to publish with Harper and Row, who, no doubt, would have paid her more, Brooks went as far to donate the royalties from Riot to Broadside, which enabled the press to sell the collection for only one dollar per copy and to publish other black poets as well. As James D. Sullivan notes in "Killing John Cabot and Publishing Black: Gwendolyn Brooks's Riot", "With Riot, not only the poet, but also the publisher, the retailers (primarily African American-run businesses), and crucially the target market of presumed readers were black. The domination of the whole communicative process by African Americans greatly decreased the likelihood of anyone's reading the poem through a lens of universal white humanism" (Winter 2002 African American Review). Thus, Brooks targeted a black audience with Riot, detailing, in three sections—"Riot, The Third Sermon on the Warpland, and An Aspect of Love, Alive in Ice and Fire"—a specific moment in the history of social inequality and unrest in America, a depiction of present turbulence, and a hopeful vision for future civil rights achievements.

Written in street dialect and marking what many critics view as the beginning of Brooks's overtly political writing, Riot, in many ways, is both a tribute to fallen civil rights leaders and a call to action, a call that echoed the civic unrest America knew in the late 1960s. In the wake of Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, assassination on April 4, 1968, protests erupted across America, including Brooks's city, Chicago, which had been home to King in 1966 while he was working to understand the destitute life of South Side residents and the many racist institutions and corrupt practices still in force in the North. Riot, the collection, responds to the events following King's assassination, taking its title from the King quote Brooks uses as the poem's epigraph: "A riot is the language of the unheard." Importantly, this period marks a decided shift in Brooks's writing, as Norris B. Clark, in his essay "Gwendolyn Brooks and a Black Aesthetic," describes:

Although she has always written poetry concerned with the black American experience, one that inheres the diversity and complexity of being black and especially being female, her poetics have primarily undergone thematic developments. Her emphasis has shifted from a private, internal, and exclusive assessment of the identity crises of twentieth-century persons to a communal, external, and inclusive assessment of the black experience. (Mootry and Smith, A Life Distilled: Gwendolyn Brooks, Her Poetry and Fiction 84)

To frame the historical moment of the late 1960s, Brooks returns to the past, evoking John Cabot, the Italian navigator and explorer commonly credited as one of the first early modern Europeans to land on the North American mainland, aboard the Matthew in 1497. Cabot becomes the ideal representative of human blindness, a racist, ethnocentric figure driven by his own desires who is responsible for the oppression of African Americans. Significantly, Brooks uses Cabot, one of the founders of the "New World," to show the injustice of the new world before her: a society at odds with itself and forced to come to terms with injustice.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Learn about Amiri Baraka, one of the influential young poets at the Fisk conference that inspired Brooks, through a source, such as his Web site: <http://www.amiribaraka.com/>. Notice especially his political statements and poems, which can be found under "Writings." Next, read his poem, "Somebody Blew Up America," his poem dealing with the September 11 World Trade Center tragedy, which makes bold claims about the attacks and why they happened. While Baraka held the position of poet laureate of New Jersey, he was forced to relinquish that position because of the heated debate about this poem (to read Baraka's response, visit: <http://www.amiribaraka.com/speech100202.html>). Next, compare the sentiments expressed in "Somebody Blew Up America" with "Riot." What do the two have in common; where do they differ? Finally, assess, on the basis of your understanding of Brooks—especially as she describes race relations in "Riot"—whether she would have approved of the Baraka poem. Support everything you say with quotes from both poems.
2. In her poetry collection Black Feeling, Black Talk, Black Judgment (1967), Nikki Giovanni, a leader in the black poetry movement, captures the fervor over civil rights and the raw energy of the Black Power movement. Read several of the poems from this collection and then compare Giovanni's vision of race relations in America with the vision Brooks proffers in "Riot." Can you see how the two poets respond to the same historical situation? What makes both of their responses unique? What do they have in common; how do they differ?
3. While Brooks's early poetry has garnered more critical attention and critics such as Harold Bloom argue that her earlier writing is her strongest, it is important to consider her later works from a cultural perspective, to assess her writing as reflecting the turbulence that followed the assassinations of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Malcolm X. With this cultural context in mind, read another one of Brooks's poems from her 1969 collection Riot, "The Third Sermon." Then, think about this poem and "Riot," analyzing what both have to say about the necessity of destruction for creation. Is Brooks condoning violence? Does she approve of or see the value in the civil rights riots that have

Write a well-developed research paper on Brooks's early work, notably A Street in Bronzeville and Bean Eaters, noting what other critics have to say about this period in Brooks's life. After reading other critics, evaluate Bolden's claim, arguing for or against his stance, quoting Brooks's poetry, and citing other critics.

8. In Black Feminist Criticism: Perspectives on Black Women, Barbara Christian argues that Brooks's novel Maud Martha is a groundbreaking work in which a black woman is portrayed "as an ordinary human being in all the wonder of her complexity" (239). Christian also notes the profound influence Maud Martha (1953) had on Paule Marshall, especially her novel Brown Girl, Brownstones (1959). With the representation of black female in mind, read both works of literature, analyzing how black women characters are developed. Finally, write a well-developed essay that explores identity according to both authors. In your essay, cite as many parallels as you can between the two works, especially connections that deal with the black women protagonists.
9. Both Gwendolyn Brooks, in A Street in Bronzeville, and Rita Dove, in Thomas Beulah, write about African-American communities, providing compelling portraits that explore the condition of African-American life in the 20th century. Read both collections, noting their similarities and differences. Finally, write a well-developed essay on the African-American experience as described in the works of these two Pulitzer Prize-winning black poets.
10. In her depiction of black urban life, Brooks also observes faults of the black community. Read "The Ballad of Chocolate Marble" (1945) and "The Ballad of Pearl May Lee" (1945), both of which deal with skin color differences within the black community. What do these two poems tell us about prejudice within black society?
11. Read chapter 1 ("Of Our Spiritual Strivings") of W. E. B. DuBois's The Souls of Black Folk, whose complete text can be found at <http://etext.virginia.edu/toc/modeng/public/DubSoul.html>. Note what DuBois says about "double-consciousness":

It is a peculiar sensation, this double-consciousness, this sense of always looking at one's self through the eyes of others, of measuring one's soul by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity. One ever feels his twoness,—an American, a Negro; two souls, two thoughts, two un-reconciled strivings; two warring ideals in one dark body, whose dogged strength alone keeps it from being torn asunder.

After reading and thinking about the DuBois chapter, analyze Brooks's poem "The Sundays of Satin-Legs Smith" with DuBois in mind. To what extent does Satin-Legs Smith embody DuBois's idea of "double-consciousness"? With DuBois and Brooks in mind, write a well-developed essay on "double-consciousness" in "The Sundays of Satin-Legs Smith."

12. Read two other Brooks poems that can be viewed from the perspective of DuBois's "double consciousness," "Negro Hero" and "Gay Chaps at the Bar," both of which depict black soldiers who fight wars on two fronts: World War II abroad and a race war at home. Demonstrate your understanding of DuBois's ideas and the Brooks poems by writing a well-developed essay that interprets the poems as embodiments of DuBois's ideas. As you do this, think about the value of applying DuBois's ideas. How do these ideas illuminate our understanding of the Brooks poems?

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Bell-Scott, Patricia et al., eds. Double Stitch: Black Women Write about Mothers and Daughters. Boston: Beacon, 1991.
- Bolden, B. J. Urban Rage in Bronzeville: Social Commentary in the Poetry of Gwendolyn Brooks, 1945–1960. Chicago: Third World Press, 1999.
- Brooks, Gwendolyn. A Capsule Course in Black Poetry Writing. Detroit: Broadside, 1975.
- . Report from Part One. Detroit: Broadside, 1972.
- Callahan, John F. "Essentially an Essential African": Gwendolyn Brooks and the Awakening to Audi- ence." North Dakota Quarterly 55, no. 4 (Fall 1987): 59–73.

- Christian, Barbara. "Afro-American Women Poets: A Historical Introduction." In Black Feminist Criticism: Perspectives on Black Women Writers. New York: Pergamon, 1985.
- Davis, Arthur P. "The Black-and-Tan Motif in the Poetry of Gwendolyn Brooks." CLA Journal 60, no. 2 (December 1962): 90–92, 97.
- . From the Dark Tower: Afro-American Writers 1900–1960. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1974.
- Dawson, Emma W. "Vanishing Point: The Rejected Black Woman in the Poetry of Gwendolyn Brooks." Obsidian II 4, no. 1 (Spring 1989): 1–11.
- Evans, Mari, ed. Black Women Writers, 1950–1980: A Critical Evaluation. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1983.
- Gayle, Addison, Jr. "Gwendolyn Brooks: Poet of the Whirlwind." Black Women Writers (1950–1980): A Critical Evaluation, edited by Mari Evans, 79–87. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor Doubleday, 1984.
- Gayles, Gloria Wade, ed. Conversations with Gwendolyn Brooks. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2003.
- "Gwendolyn Brooks." Modern American Poetry. URL: http://www.english.uiuc.edu/maps/poets/a_f/brooks/brooks.htm. Accessed May 28, 2007.
- Hansell, William H. "The Uncommon Commonplace in the Early Poems of Gwendolyn Brooks." College Language Association Journal 30, no. 3 (Mar 1987): 261–277.
- Horvath, Brooke K. "The Satisfactions of What's Difficult in Gwendolyn Brooks's Poetry." American Literature 62, no. 4 (December 1990): 606–616.
- Hughes, Gertrude R. "Making It Really New: Hilda Doolittle, Gwendolyn Brooks, and the Feminist Potential of Modern Poetry." American Quarterly 42, no. 3 (September 1990): 375–401.
- Jimoh, A. Yemisi. "Double Consciousness, Modernism and Womanist Themes in Gwendolyn Brooks's 'The Anniad.'" MELUS 23, no. 3 (Fall 1998): 167–187.
- Kent, George E. A Life of Gwendolyn Brooks. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1990.
- Kufrin, Joan. "Gwendolyn Brooks." In Uncommon Women. Piscataway, N.J.: New Century Publishers, 1981, 35–51.
- Lindberg, Kathryn V. "Whose Canon? Gwendolyn Brooks: Founder at the Center of the 'Margins.'" In Gendered Modernisms: American Women Poets and Their Readers, edited by Margaret Dickle and Thomas Travisano. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.
- Loff, Jon N. "Gwendolyn Brooks: A Bibliography." College Language Association Journal 17 (1973): 21–32.
- Madhubuti, Haki R., ed. Say That the River Turns: The Impact of Gwendolyn Brooks. Chicago: Third World Press, 1987.
- Melhem, D. H. Gwendolyn Brooks: Poetry and the Heroic Voice. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1987.
- . Heroism in the New Black Poetry. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1990.
- Miller, R. Baxter. Langston Hughes and Gwendolyn Brooks: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1978.
- Mootry, Maria K., and Gary Smith, eds. A Life Distilled: Gwendolyn Brooks, Her Poetry and Fiction. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
- Poetryfoundation.org. Available online. URL: <http://www.poetryfoundation.org/archive/poet.html?id=843>. Accessed May 28, 2007.
- Shaw, Harry B. Gwendolyn Brooks. Boston: Twayne, 1980.
- Sullivan, James D. "Killing John Cabot and Publishing Black: Gwendolyn Brooks's Riot." African American Review 36, no. 4 (Winter 2002): 557–569.
- Tate, Claudia, ed. "Gwendolyn Brooks." In Black Women Writers at Work. New York: Continuum, 1983.
- Wright, Stephen Caldwell. The Chicago Collective: Poems for and Inspired by Gwendolyn Brooks. Sanford, Fla.: Christopher-Burghardt, 1990.
- . On Gwendolyn Brooks: Reliant Contemplation. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

TRUMAN CAPOTE (1924–1984)

Failure is the condiment that gives success its flavor.

(The Dogs Bark)

Novelist, short story writer, journalist, playwright, screenwriter, provocateur, and self-proclaimed father of the nonfiction novel, Truman Capote, originally Truman Streckfus Persons, was born on September 30, 1924, to Archulus (Arch) and Lillie Mae Persons in New Orleans, Louisiana. Arch, a 26-year-old drifter who periodically returned to their hometown of Monroeville, Alabama, sporting “an expensive LaSalle or Packard Phaeton when he had money, sponging off his friends when he was strapped,” married Lillie Mae when she was 17 (Clarke 5). After running out of money on their honeymoon and living with Lillie Mae’s cousins for a time, Arch sent for his pregnant wife after securing a sales job with a steamship company in New Orleans, all the while trying to convince her not to have an abortion. After Truman was born, Arch tried to supplement his salesman’s salary with a variety of schemes: managing a prize fighter, promoting variety acts, publishing magazines and syndicated columns, among others (9). Capote was never very close to Arch, despite his summertime steamboat adventures on the Mississippi with him. Capote later recalled tap-dancing for the passengers with noted jazz musician Louis Armstrong on one of these voyages. Despite these reunions, Capote described his father as untrustworthy, a man who made many promises but fulfilled few of them. None of Arch’s half-baked get-rich schemes paid off, and Lillie Mae became dissatisfied with their marriage almost immediately after Truman was born, and she began to see other men. With both parents chasing their desires, there was little time left for Truman, who, in his sixth year, was sent to live with Lillie Mae’s family in Monroeville.

The young Truman’s time in Monroeville was formative. Living with his aunts, Capote befriended his next door neighbor, future novelist NELLE HARPER LEE, and became especially close to his cousin, Miss Sook Faulk. Both of these Monroeville friends appear in Capote’s early fiction. By age five, Capote had taught himself to read and write, and by age 11 he had written and submitted “Old Mr. Busybody”—which he has described as a scandalous roman à clef—in a children’s short story contest sponsored by the Mobile Press Register (Inge 21). As Capote recounts, this was to be the first of many troubles caused by his blending of fact and fiction: “The first installment appeared one Sunday . . . Only somebody suddenly realized that I was serving up a local scandal as fiction, and the second installment never appeared. Naturally, I didn’t win a thing” (21). Despite this setback, Capote kept writing, and he started to send his stories to magazines and literary journals by the time he was 15. Already convinced that he would eventually become a famous writer, Capote’s persistence bore fruit two years later when he received acceptance letters for three of his short stories on the same day.

By this time, Lillie Mae, remarried to a well-off Cuban businessman, Joe Capote, changed her first name to Nina and moved with Truman to live in New York—only after finding out that she was no longer capable of bearing children. As biographer Gerald Clarke notes, her wayward affections were very traumatic for the young Truman: “. . . after all the years, and after her all her battles to gain custody from Arch . . . she loved him and she did not love him; she wanted him and she did not want him; she was proud to be his mother and she was ashamed of him. Her feelings toward him oscillated between polar extremes, in other words, and from one day to another, sometimes from one hour to another, he could not predict how she would greet him” (Clarke 42). Such abuse would fuel not only Capote’s insatiable desire for fame and acceptance but his fascination with the life of his most famous protagonist and mass murderer, In Cold Blood’s Perry Smith.

Truman’s unhappy home life affected his grades at the private schools his mother sent him to. After performing poorly at one school, Nina, who had always thought her son too effeminate, sent him to St. John’s Military Academy in Ossining, New York, where he was sexually abused by older, stronger boys (Clarke 45–46). When the Capotes relocated to Millbrook, Connecticut, Truman was then sent to Greenwich High School, where he was taken under the wing of his English teacher, Catherine Wood. With her guidance and advocacy, Truman began publishing stories in the school’s literary magazine. Three years later, the Capotes moved back to New York, and Truman finished his remaining year of high school at a private school on the Upper West Side of Manhattan. A year later, with the World War II raging in the Pacific and across the Atlantic, Truman found work as a copyboy at the understaffed offices of the New Yorker. Though he did become friends with the office manager and was given a slight promotion to the art department, where he sorted cartoons, the atmosphere at the magazine was cold, secretive, and gossip-plagued. After a few years, Capote attended a Bread Loaf Writers’ Conference in Vermont, where he introduced himself to the poet Robert Frost as an employee of the magazine. Later, when Truman was perceived to be sneaking out of one of Frost’s poetry readings, the Pulitzer Prize–winning poet took it as an insult from the magazine. The incident got Truman fired, and he proceeded to write full time with the financial support of his stepfather, Joe.

Comparatively free from financial burden and already intimate with wealthy and affluent New Yorkers, Capote began writing short stories for Story, Harper’s Bazaar, and Mademoiselle. These included “My Side of the Matter,” “A Tree of Night,” and “Miriam,” the last of which caught the attention of an editor at Random House, who expressed interest in whatever Capote wrote next. Although since he left the New Yorker he had been working on a novel, which was to be called Summer Crossing (posthumously published in 2006), Capote soon abandoned the project and, two years later, completed his first novel, Other Voices, Other Rooms. Published in 1948 with the help of his friend and fellow writer Carson McCullers, the book received mixed reviews from critics but benefitted from its risqué subject matter and its equally provocative dust jacket, which prominently featured a picture of Capote gazing at the camera in an attitude of seductive repose. Written in a southern gothic style, the novel is a semiautobiographical story of an effeminate 13-year-old, Joel, who is sent from New Orleans to his reclusive quadriplegic father’s rural Alabama plantation after his mother dies. Estranged from his father since birth, Joel befriends a transvestite named Randolph and Idabel, a tomboy who is loosely based on Capote’s Monroeville playmate Harper Lee.

Capote then spent the next 10 years traveling Europe and elsewhere with his longtime partner and novelist Jack Dunphy. During this time, he published an astonishing variety of works, from travel narratives and journalism pieces for the New Yorker to original Hollywood screenplays, Broadway adaptations of his fiction, and, perhaps most significantly, an experimental journalistic travel narrative called The Muses Are Heard: An Account (1956) and the commercially successful novella Breakfast at Tiffany’s (1958). The first, a literary and journalistic account of an American theatrical production performing in Russia during the cold war, appeared on the pages of the New Yorker before appearing in book form. The Muses Are Heard was Capote's first conscious attempt to produce what he considered to be a new sort of writing, a "high" journalism that retains fidelity to facts while presenting them with all of the "fictional technical equipment" a novelist has at his or her disposal (Plimpton, "The Story Behind a Nonfiction Novel" 26). As Capote himself later wrote in Music for Chameleons, "The Muses Are Heard had set me to thinking on different lines altogether: I wanted to produce a journalistic novel, something on a large scale that would have the credibility of fact, the immediacy of film, the depth and freedom of prose, and the precision of poetry" (xiv). Capote began to designate this genre experiment as the "nonfiction novel," a term whose paradoxical and contradictory nature has been the source of much critical debate (for an excellent analysis of this, see Heyn).

On November 16, 1959, Capote came across a small notice in the New York Times entitled: "Wealthy Farmer, 3 of Family Slain." Thus began Capote's five-year obsession with the brutal, apparently motiveless murder of the Clutter family at the hands of Richard Eugene Hickock and Perry Edward Smith. With his longtime friend Nelle Harper Lee, Capote immediately traveled to the small middle-American farming community of Holcomb, Kansas, to gather information and conduct interviews for what was to become his most famous novel. During the course of his investigation of the crime's mysterious causes and tragic consequences, Capote gained the trust of the criminals, the investigating officers, and many of Holcomb's residents. Capote became especially close to Perry Smith, who entrusted his interviewer with all of his personal effects and journals before his death. What resulted from these researches was one of the most commercially successful novels the publishing industry had ever produced, and Capote's words were again adapted for film in 1967.

After becoming so intimate with two condemned men and watching their repeated appeals fail to save them from the noose, Capote ceased writing and busied himself with arranging what became known as the party of the decade, the famous Black and White Ball, the guest list for which was so illustrious it was published afterward in the New York Times. This event, extravagant, public, and decadent, was to be representative of Capote's life for the next decade. Though he often claimed to be working on a "masterwork" in the same "nonfiction novel" style as In Cold Blood, which he called Answered Prayers (posthumously published in 1987), his writing habits suffered from his increasing addiction to drugs, alcohol, fame, and the distractions of the jet-set lifestyle. When Capote finally did publish chapters from Answered Prayers in Esquire starting in 1975, he alienated many of his rich and famous friends, who recognizably appear in the chapters from his work in progress revealing personal and scandalous secrets. Like his "Old Mr. Busybody," "nothing came of it:" Capote's rich friends no longer wanted to socialize with an indiscrete gossipmonger, and his attempt to turn his life into a revealing piece of artful nonfiction was never completed. In the remaining years before his death in 1984, Capote struggled with substance abuse and continued to write, publishing a novella and collection of short pieces entitled Music for Chameleons: New Writing (1983). After becoming increasingly ill and despondent, Capote died of a drug overdose in the house of Joanne Carson, the second wife of comedian and talk show host Johnny Carson, on August 25, 1984. Though no one knows if he intended to commit suicide, Capote told Mrs. Carson not to call the paramedics. In 2005, Capote's life and writings were introduced to a new generation of audiences with the success of Bennett Miller's biographical film Capote, which focuses on the author's time in Kansas researching In Cold Blood. Capote and his most successful novel are recognized for their sociological significance and for their influence on postwar American fiction and nonfiction.

In Cold Blood* (1965)

Constructed out of his investigation of the horrific Clutter family murders and the events surrounding the capture, incarceration, and execution of the two men responsible for them, Truman Capote's In Cold Blood was first published in four installments by the New Yorker in late 1965. In Cold Blood is an episodic narrative broken into small chapters of varying length—some are only a paragraph long, others relate many details in journalistic exposition—and divided into four parts: “The Last to See Them Alive,” “Persons Unknown,” “Answer,” and “The Corner.” The chapters are mostly chronological but are interspersed with lengthy flashbacks and intrusions of purportedly factual accounts, such as the psychological evaluations of Dick and Perry that are placed in the courtroom scene. Such techniques keep the reader’s interest in lieu of the desire for a revelatory and unexpected ending: Nearly all of Capote’s readers knew exactly what happened to the Clutter killers from reading numerous newspaper accounts. By presenting the story from different perspectives—the townspeople’s, the detectives’, the killers’, and the victims’—while adhering to the chronology of a chase, Capote keeps his narrative moving at a quick pace (especially if compared with a piece of conventional journalism). By slowly revealing the grotesque and shocking nature of the crime, and the equally grotesque childhood of the novel’s antihero, Perry Smith, Capote substitutes the full disclosure of every “journalistic” detail—the “why”—for the usual questions a novel might be said to answer—the “what” and the “who.”

The literary protagonist Capote constructs out of his many interviews and records is a pitiable and tragic figure. Perhaps the most unexpected development in Capote’s narrative unveiling of journalistic facts is that Perry—who, we eventually learn, did all of the shooting—seems to be much less callous than his fellow murderer, Dick Hickock, whom he ironically scolds for his lapses of moral fortitude. Whether factually correct or not, Capote’s masterful characterization of Perry yields the most disturbing contradictions of the book. Cajoling his readers into empathizing with such a despicable character by vividly describing his childhood and demented dream life throughout the novel—a harrowing tale of poverty, abandonment, abuse, bad luck, and psychological degeneration—Capote forces us to confront and make sense of a killer’s mind. Capote tricks us into sympathizing with a mass murderer by carefully omitting the most disturbing details of the killings while also retaining the chronological arrangement of a quest narrative, of a detective story where the culprit is not a person but the varied ingredients of a life plagued by frustration, disappointment, delusion, and a desire for righteous vengeance. And in many respects, Capote was well-equipped to write such a biography because of his own familiarity with adolescent distress: Both author and character had parents who drank too much, seemed always to be on the verge of walking out the door, and denied their children a loving environment in which they could flourish. Such similarities have provoked many critics to claim that Capote not only bended facts and imagined new ones in his supposedly nonfictional account but also partially wrote himself into Perry’s character. Regardless of this question (which, in all honesty, we can never answer if Capote followed through with his claim that he was going to destroy his notes), the result is affecting and disturbing. Like the citizens of Holcomb, who first looked within their community for the sinner, we as readers are forced to question our own motivations and sentiments after being seduced by Capote’s composite psychobiography of a cold-blooded murderer who has been a victim his entire life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Capote clearly empathized with Perry, if not Dick, in his deviation from the facts of the case, as Philip K. Tompkins notes in his fact-checking review of In Cold Blood (Malin 44–58). How might this deviation affect the reader’s view of the work and its significance? Does it make the book seem more sensational? Do Capote’s alterations of fact make In Cold Blood a more profound meditation on the darker side of human nature? Just as the townspeople of Holcomb looked within their community for the cause of disaster, turning inward to confront the sinful and evil side of their natures, so do readers when they are tempted to empathize with a murderer. Write a well-developed essay on the strategies Capote uses to seduce readers into empathizing with Smith.
2. Capote was often at odds with his contemporary novelists, especially those who were experimenting with creative nonfiction. New York Magazine, for instance, describes one of these critical volleys: “In 1980, Capote told an interviewer that while [the

WORKS CITED AND ADDITIONAL RESOURCES

- Capote, Truman. Answered Prayers: The Unfinished Novel. New York: Random House, 1987.
- . Breakfast at Tiffany's: A Short Novel and Three Stories. New York: Random House, 1958.
- . The Dogs Bark: Public People and Private Places. New York: Random House, 1973.
- . In Cold Blood: A True Account of a Multiple Murder and its Consequences. New York: Random House, 1966.
- . The Grass Harp. New York: Random House, 1951.
- . Music for Chameleons: New Writing. New York: Random House, 1983.
- . Other Voices, Other Rooms. New York: Random House, 1948.
- . Summer Crossing. New York: Random House, 2006.
- . The Thanksgiving Visitor. New York: Random House, 1968.
- . A Tree of Night, and Other Stories. New York: Random House, 1949.
- Clarke, Gerald. Capote: A Biography. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1988.
- Garson, Helen S. Truman Capote. New York: Ungar, 1980.
- Heyne, Eric. "Toward a Theory of Literary Nonfiction." Modern Fiction Studies 33, no. 3 (Autumn 1987): 479–490.
- Hollowell, John. Fact and Fiction: The New Journalism and the Nonfiction Novel. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1977.
- Inge, M. Thomas, ed. Truman Capote Conversations. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1987.
- Kazin, Alfred. "Truman Capote and the Army of Wrongness." Contemporaries. New York: Little, Brown, 1962. 250–254.
- Mailer, Norman. "Evaluations—Quick and Expensive Comments on the Talent in the Room." Advertisements for Myself. 1959. Reprint Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992, 463–473.
- Malin, Irving, ed. Truman Capote's In Cold Blood: A Critical Handbook. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1968.
- Ozick, Cynthia. "Truman Capote Reconsidered." 1973. Reprinted in Art and Ardor. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1983, 80–89.
- Plimpton, George. "The Story Behind a Nonfiction Novel." In Truman Capote's In Cold Blood: A Critical Handbook, edited by Irving Malin, 25–43. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1968.
- . Truman Capote: In Which Various Friends, Enemies, Acquaintances, and Detractors Recall His Turbulent Career. New York: Doubleday, 1997.
- Reed, Kenneth T. Truman Capote. Boston: Twayne, 1981.
- Tompkins, Philip K. "In Cold Fact." In Truman Capote's In Cold Blood: A Critical Handbook, edited by Irving Malin, 44–58. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1968.
- Truman Capote: His Life and Works. (A Sponsored Archive). Available online. URL: <http://www.nytimes.com/ads/capote/>. Accessed July 21, 2009.
- Wolfe, Tom. "Pornoviolence." Mauve Gloves & Madmen, Clutter & Vine. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1967, 178–187.

John Becker

JOHN CHEEVER (1912–1982)

Fiction is art and art is the triumph over chaos (no less) and we can accomplish this only by the most vigilant exercise of choice.

(“The Death of Justina”)

John William Cheever was born in Quincy, Massachusetts, on May 27, 1912. His father, Frederick Lincoln Cheever, was a member of an old seafaring family with a strong work ethic and concern for morality; his mother, Mary Lilely Cheever, was an Englishwoman who had emigrated with her parents. The facts of Cheever’s early life are sketchy, the result of conflicting reports he has provided and the fictionalization of his early life in his works. Cheever reports that his father, a successful shoe salesman, owned and operated a shoe factory until the 1929 stock market crash, after which Mary opened a gift shop and became the primary financial provider. His father’s financial ruin and his mother’s business success and subsequent blossoming independence deeply affected the young Cheever, as he stated in a 1977 interview with Ms. magazine: “I remained deeply disconcerted by the harm my mother’s working did to my father’s self-esteem.” While on one level these concerns are specific to Cheever’s family, on another level these fiscal and familial anxieties are common to the 21st century, especially in light of the second and third waves of feminism that arose after World War II and the continual struggle for women’s rights. Additionally Cheever was obsessed with a story his family told in which his father had invited an abortionist to dinner during his mother’s pregnancy, an incident Cheever included in both The Wapshot Chronicle (1957) and Falconer (1977). While the veracity of such accounts may be questioned, it is clear that Cheever felt neglected and ignored as a child, a formative experience that colored his view of the family and of the interpersonal roles family members play. Though many critics have noted the lack of didactic messages in Cheever’s stories, his works explore relevant political and social themes, such as the power relationships between men and women, the postwar American family, life in American suburbs (John Leonard called him “the Chekhov of the suburbs”), and the decline of moral values in modern society. Cheever’s Letters (1989) and Journals (1991) portray Cheever as a man consumed with guilt about his homosexual affairs. These important posthumously published sources invite readers to compare the social world and moral terrain of Cheever’s fiction with his life. Recently critical studies of his works have focused on Cheever’s bisexuality; the role his divided, often-at-odds-with-himself sexuality played in his works; and the social view of homosexuality his works present.

Cheever claimed to have begun writing stories when he was six. His parents approved of his chosen vocation, only stipulating that he not work for fame or wealth. In addition to the role his parents had in his development as a writer, Cheever was greatly influenced by his older brother, Fred. Their relationship informed several stories, including “Good-by, My Brother,” “The Low-Boy,” “The Brothers,” and the novel Falconer. Cheever expressed the intensity of their relationship when he said, “The strongest love—not the most exciting or the richest or the most brilliant—but the strongest love of my life was for my brother.” Other references to his brother occur in The Wapshot Chronicle, where the brothers Moses and Coverly leave home together just as Cheever and his brother left home and lived together in Boston.

While family dynamics helped shape Cheever’s fiction, so did his childhood in Quincy, Massachusetts. Many of Cheever’s works deal with New England’s physical setting, moral obsessions, and social traditions, so much so that some critics have falsely classified him as a mere chronicler of modern manners. Despite his religious and moral upbringing, Cheever was expelled from Thayer Academy in South Braintree, Massachusetts, for bad behavior at the age of 17; this ended his schooling. Though this may seem out of place for a writer who has been called a moralist by a number of critics, Cheever attributed his difficulties to persistent emotional troubles, which stemmed from his parents’ apparent role reversal and the negative effects it had on his father. Furthermore, Cheever’s expulsion enabled him to explore his greatest ambition—becoming a serious writer; he published his first story, “Expelled,” in the New Republic in 1930, the year after he was dismissed from the academy.

During the depression years Cheever worked in department stores and at various newspapers while he continued to write and publish. In the early 1930s, he published short stories in a number of magazines, including Atlantic, Colliers, and the Yale Review. Most importantly, however, he published “Brooklyn Rooming House” in the New Yorker (1935), beginning a lifelong relationship during which he published 121 of his 200 short stories in the magazine. After a short period of teaching composition at Barnard College, Cheever joined the army during World War II; in 1941 he married Mary M. Winternitz, whose father was the dean of the Yale Medical School. Mary and John Cheever, proud parents of three children, had a marriage Cheever called “extraordinary”; his relationship with Mary provided endless experiences and inspiration for his work.

In 1943, two years after their marriage, Cheever published The Way Some People Live, a volume of 30 stories. Though Cheever uses the historical period of World War II as the situational context for eight of the stories, he focuses primarily on human relationships and human experiences, especially the transition from civilian to military life, rather than exploring actual war experiences. Cheever set some of the stories during the depression; such stories as “The Brothers” and “Publick House” closely resemble real events in Cheever’s life, though Cheever has stated that literary works should not be considered “crypto-autobiography.” Several critics also noted the stories’ similarities to Hemingway’s realistic style, including a heavy reliance on dialogue. While The Way Some People Live received favorable reviews, several critics found the stories stilted, attributing these aesthetic flaws to Cheever’s relationship with the New Yorker, which was thought to insist upon a stipulated formula. Conversely, other critics credit Cheever with establishing the standard story form for which the New Yorker is known.

Simultaneously acknowledging and trying to dispel such criticisms, Cheever described his longtime editor at the New Yorker, Harold Ross, as a father figure and their partnership “a creative, destructive relationship from which I learned a great deal” (quoted in Grant 53). The magazine continued to publish his stories and allow him to refine his literary abilities while also sustaining him financially. In 1953, Cheever published his second short-story volume, The Enormous Radio and Other Stories, which, although it contained only 14 stories, was nearly as long as The Way Some People Live. Not only are these stories more fully developed narratives, but also they display a greater variety of settings and topics. In several of the stories, such as “Torch Song” and “The Enormous Radio,” Cheever’s more innovative narrative abilities and genre-bending talents emerge. Blending ordinary details with mythic transformations and seemingly magical, or possessed, objects, Cheever moves into a realm of extreme subjectivity, which is often cited as a hallmark of postmodern style. Here the mind’s inner reality and the world’s outer reality clash, setting off unexpected conflicts and drawing out the troubled and sometimes violent feelings that lie beneath his characters’ placid exteriors. Though the volume received more favorable reviews than The Way Some People Live, some critics, such as Paul Pickrel, noted that Cheever's stories were "too uniformly excellent," another critical stance that seemed to relate to Cheever's association with the New Yorker.

Despite his success with short story collections, Cheever was determined to publish a novel. In 1957, he published The Wapshot Chronicle, a loosely connected, episodic novel that explores the family life of the Wapshots and their attempts to reconcile their domestic lives with those of their seafaring, adventure-seeking ancestors. The novel won the 1957 National Book Award for fiction, and, until the publication of Falconer, it was Cheever's best-selling work. Many critics wrote respectfully of the work, but others connected the episodic form to his prior penchant for writing short stories. Though Cheever publicly denounced autobiographical remnants in the novel, many of the situations and familial relationships parallel his life; Cheever refused to publish the novel until after his mother's death.

Cheever published his third volume of short stories, The Housebreaker of Shady Hill, in 1958. Because all of these stories take place in the suburb of Shady Hill, other similarities of theme, place, and time have prompted critics to call the work a novel. Many of the stories explore what happens when an individual undergoes a "temporary crisis" and deliberately tries to express himself or herself differently or to test a yet-untried freedom. The individual, however, is often drawn back into the situation that initially catalyzed the temporary conflict, despite its apparent restrictive or negative qualities. Some of his most widely reprinted stories are found in this volume, including "The Country Husband," which won an O. Henry Memorial Award, and "The Five-Forty-Eight," which garnered the Benjamin Franklin Magazine Award.

In 1961, Cheever published his fourth volume of short stories, Some People, Places, and Things That Will Not Appear in My Next Novel, which met with mixed critical reception. This volume opens with "The Death of Justina" (quoted at the beginning of this entry), with its philosophical statements about art's overcoming chaos; however, Cheever also includes a false preface that states his growing frustration with many contemporary literary themes and his ideas about how literature can fail us. Many of these stories use America or Italy for their settings, though few of them contain the type of direct sociological and philosophical commentary found in "The Death of Justina." This volume contains some of his darkest work. Frank J. Warnke called it "Cheever's Inferno." Such criticism reflects the shift in tone, plot, and character development of the stories; instead of finding characters who fulfill audience expectations, as in so many of his earlier works, the reader finds characters who exist in an absurd world, one in which they have little or no hope of finding a clear way of making meaning out of their lives.

Three years later, Cheever published both his fifth volume of short stories, The Brigadier and the Golf Widow (1964), and the sequel to his first novel, The Wapshot Scandal (1969). Diverging from his earlier work, many of the short stories focus on women, and some readers see The Brigadier and the Golf Widow as a preliminary exercise for The Wapshot Scandal. However, in keeping with a significant portion of his work, Cheever explores the themes of family dynamics, suburbia, and the delicate balance between the real and the surreal. In this volume, we also find "The Swimmer," a Kafkaesque tale of a young man's attempt to realize his own heroic abilities and ultimate failure, which is the sole Cheever story ever to be made into a movie. Many of the stories also become darker and more sinister, further preparing his readers for his next novel, Bullet Park (1969), which is set in suburbia, where madness and death are ubiquitous and undeniable.

In the years after publishing Bullet Park, Cheever fell into alcoholism, suffering from alcohol-related health problems and depression, and began having serious marital problems. Despite these personal problems, Cheever published his sixth volume of short stories, The World of Apples (1973); this volume was highly praised in literary circles, including the New York Times Book Review. Several critics noted the "transfiguring experience" of the work; for the first time Cheever allows the characters' feelings, motivations, and morals to override the factual circumstances in which they find themselves, leaving the reader with an impression of optimism and rejuvenation. Under pressure from friends and family, he admitted himself to Smithers Alcohol Rehabilitation Center in 1975 and successfully gave up drinking before publishing his last complete novel, Falconer (1975).

Falconer explores the issues of justice, alienation, and confinement through the protagonist's experience in prison. The Stories of John Cheever (1978), a collection of his best short stories, earned Cheever an honorary doctorate from Harvard, the Pulitzer Prize, the National Book Award, the National Book Critics Circle Award, and the Edward McDowell Award. Cheever had begun working on a final novella, Oh What a Paradise It Seems when he died of cancer in 1982, leaving it unfinished. Nevertheless, he was awarded the National Medal for Literature just before his death. An author who has been compared to Nathaniel Hawthorne for his moral focus, to William Faulkner for his keen sense of place, and to Franz Kafka for his ability to blend subjective perception and reality, Cheever warrants recognition and further critical consideration. Despite his categorization as a moralist, Cheever's lyrical style, narrative innovations, commitment to the human truths of everyday experience, and unflinching ability to imbue the mundane with mythic undertones make him one of the most careful observers of contemporary America, a gifted writer whose works have not received the attention they deserve.

"The Enormous Radio" (1947)

"The Enormous Radio" first appeared in the New Yorker in 1947 and was subsequently published as part of Cheever's second short story collection, The Enormous Radio and Other Stories (1953). This story helped to solidify Cheever's reputation as a modern literary innovator and to build his popularity; this is his most often reprinted work. As do many of his works, this relatively early story blends fantasy with real aspects of modern family life.

"The Enormous Radio" takes place in the bustling, socially conscious suburbs of New York in the 1940s, presumably just after World War II, when Americans sought the economic prosperity, the

