As the speech progresses, Douglass speaks about the Fourth of July as an important occasion; he addresses the audience directly, saying that the holiday is “the birthday of your National Independence” (117, emphasis added). He put some distance between the members of the audience, who are mainly white, and himself, as the representative of slaves who cannot speak for themselves. He recounts the story of the war for independence that ended barely more than 70 years previously, noting the courage of “your” Founding Fathers and making the point that they wanted independence from British fetters to establish their own freedoms. While we do not know how the audience reacted to this, they would almost certainly have been struck by Douglass's position as a former slave who speaks with authority about the liberty that is the founding principle of the nation, a principle that supports core rights granted members of the white audience listening to him, whom he calls “Fellow Citizens” when, in fact, he was not legally recognized as a citizen even while he stood at the podium speaking these words.

Just as he reaches the midpoint of the speech, Douglass asks, “Fellow-citizens, pardon me, allow me to ask, why am I called upon to speak here today? What have I, or those I represent, to do with your national independence?” (123). The tone of the speech becomes more stern, more angry as he firmly asserts that this day is not a celebration for him; it is a day to celebrate the freedom of white Americans and therefore does not include him. With an anger that is fully justified, Douglass demands, “Do you mean, citizens, to mock me, by asking me to speak today?” (124). And to add to the shock many members of the audience must have felt at this point, Douglass launches into a logical, heartfelt tirade against the injustice being done to slaves throughout the Southern United States.

Although he was addressing an audience who had invited him to speak, Douglass took the opportunity to use his speech to condemn American citizens more widely. He attacks American clergymen whom he sees as hypocrites, saying, “The American church is guilty, when viewed in connection with what it is doing to uphold slavery; but it is superlatively guilty when viewed in connection with its ability to abolish slavery” (125). He points out that the Church of England assisted in abolishing slavery even after it took part in the slave trade, but the American churches “are all on fire at the mention of liberty for France or for Ireland; but are as cold as an iceberg at the thought of liberty for the enslaved of America” (126).

To end the speech Douglass asks, “What, to the American slave, is your 4th of July? I answer: a day that reveals to him, more than all days of the year, the gross injustice and cruelty to which he is the constant victim” (127). He tells the audience that no matter where in the world they travel, “for revolting barbarity and shameless hypocrisy, America reigns without a rival” (127). After he delivered his last word, the audience rose to its feet and gave Douglass a long standing ovation.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights. Why did Douglass think that these documents did not apply to him? How do these documents aid his plea for emancipation of the slaves? What effect do you think this speech had on its live audience? What effect would it have had on reporters covering the speech?
2. Read William Lloyd Garrison's editorial, published in his antislavery newspaper the Liberator, titled “John C. Calhoun, Daniel Webster, and the Compromise of 1850” (published March 15, 1850). Compare this editorial with Douglass's speech. Are both pieces written for the same audience? Which do you think would have been more effective in the cause of abolition?

My Bondage and My Freedom* (1855)

My Bondage and My Freedom is a later version of Douglass's narrative of his life as a slave. Expanded and told in more detail than the Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass (1845), this second of three autobiographies had been somewhat neglected until the 20th century, when scholars such as William L. Andrews made the case that this volume is an even deeper look at the heart of American slavery than the first.

During the 10 years that separated the publication of his two narratives Douglass had become a celebrity, so when My Bondage and My Freedom was published, there was no need to include the letters from Garrison and Phillips that confirmed Douglass had actually written his book by himself. Also, in the meantime, Douglass had distanced himself from Garrison's band of abolitionists because they were too controlling. Instead of letters of authenticity from abolitionists, Douglass included a lengthy introduction by James M'Cune Smith, a black New York doctor and activist who was "the son of a self-emancipated bond-woman" (137), who lauded Douglass and declared the work "an American book, for Americans, in the fullest sense of the idea" (137).

The difference between this version of Douglass's narrative and the original is apparent from the first few paragraphs. He writes richer prose that provides greater detail, especially when he is establishing his family lineage and describing the conditions of his childhood. Particularly striking are passages such as this, in which Douglass makes it clear that although they are children, young slaves are still slaves: "Children have their sorrows as well as men and women. . . . Slave-children are children, and prove no exceptions to the general rule [of how slaves could be treated and sold]. The liability to be separated from my grandmother, seldom or never to see her again, haunted me" (143).

My Bondage and My Freedom was not a shocking book for audiences because they were already familiar with Douglass's Narrative, but, in the words of Douglass biographer William McFeely, it was "its author's declaration of independence. . . . The reader . . . will find a Frederick Douglass of a far more critical and analytical mind than the one in the Narrative" (181). Douglass retells most of the events of the previous narrative and includes details that make the people and circumstances seem even more real. Readers might have wanted to know more about Douglass's escape from Baltimore to the North, but, as in the original narrative, he was unable to reveal more because of the risk to other slaves who were using the same route and the risk to the whites and free blacks who were helping them escape. This is nonetheless a more active autobiography than the original Narrative, as Douglass discusses more about how he felt and addresses the reader directly many times to plead for the rights of blacks in the United States. He answers many of the questions readers of the 1845 narrative must have had but still strongly advocates the cause of abolition. Douglass included other writings and speeches in an appendix that demonstrate not only what he had been doing for the past 10 years but also how he had become a leading abolitionist voice in both the United States and abroad.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Who was the intended audience of My Bondage and My Freedom? Is it the same audience as that of the Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass? How do you know this?
2. Read the speeches in the appendix of Henry Louis Gates, Jr.'s one-volume edition of Douglass's narratives. Can you imagine how the audience for this book would have reacted when they heard Douglass speak? Explain your response.
3. What do you think would have been more effective in the fight against slavery: Douglass's books or speeches? Why?

The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass Written by Himself* (1881, 1892)

The third and final version of Frederick Douglass's autobiography was published in 1881. A second edition with an introduction by George L. Ruffin, the first African American appointed to the Massachusetts judiciary (1883), appeared in 1892. Ruffin's differs from the introductions of the other narratives of Douglass's life in that it is the first written after the abolition of slavery and so is able to assess Douglass's experience in a very broad context. Ruffin celebrates the fact that Douglass's "rank as a writer is high, and justly

PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR

He sang of love when earth was young,
And Love itself was in his lays.
But, ah, the world, it turned to praise
A jingle in a broken tongue.

(“The Poet”)

Paul Laurence Dunbar was the first African-American writer to make an impression on the literary establishment of post-Civil War United States. Unlike most of his predecessors and contemporaries, Dunbar was able to make his living primarily from his writing. In a historical moment when U.S. culture denied depth of feeling and dignity to African Americans, Dunbar’s work spoke for the value of African-American culture.

Dunbar represents the first generation of African Americans born after the Emancipation Proclamation. His parents were both born into slavery. His father, Joshua Dunbar, a slave in Kentucky, had escaped to Canada and then returned to serve in the Massachusetts Fifty-fifth Infantry Regiment and later the Fifth Massachusetts Colored Cavalry Regiment during the Civil War. Dunbar’s mother, Matilda, was also born in Kentucky and was freed by the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863. Paul was born in Dayton, Ohio, on June 27, 1872. Joshua was 20 years older than his wife, and the marriage did not last; they divorced in 1874, leaving Matilda with Paul; his baby sister, Elizabeth (who did not survive the year); and Robert and William, two children from her previous marriage. Paul continued to see his father occasionally until Joshua’s death in 1885. Both parents were literate and loved books. Parental influences on Dunbar’s writing included a love of storytelling, received from both parents, and a love of music and poetry instilled by his mother. Dunbar began reciting poems as early as age six and gave the first public reading of his own poems at age nine.

Though Dunbar’s mother was their washerwoman, Paul made friends with the brothers Wilbur and Orville Wright. They both attended Dayton’s Central High School and were prominent in school activities. Despite being the only black student in the school, Dunbar was a member of the debating society, the editor of the school newspaper, and president of the literary society. With the Wright brothers’ help, Dunbar published his first poems in a community newspaper. While he was still in high school, Dunbar and Orville would work together to publish the Dayton Tattler, a community newspaper directed at African Americans.

Dunbar was unable to attend college after graduating from high school in 1891. He worked as an elevator operator in a Dayton office building, using his free time to work on poems. Through a former teacher, Dunbar was invited to speak at the meeting of the Western Association of Writers when they met in Dayton in 1892. This exposure, and the scattered publication of poems in newspapers like the Dayton Tattler, caught the attention of patrons such as James Newton Matthews, who penned a letter praising Dunbar’s poetry that was reprinted by a number of regional newspapers. James Whitcomb Riley, a popular midwestern writer of poems in dialect, took notice of Dunbar and helped spread awareness of his work. Matthews and other white patrons helped Dunbar get his first book, Oak and Ivy, published later in 1892. He continued to work as an elevator operator and sold his book to customers. He was invited to recite his work at the World Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. There he met FREDERICK DOUGLASS, who praised Dunbar as “the most promising young colored man in America” (Wiggins 40). He also met James Weldon Johnson, a recent graduate of Atlanta University, with whom he would have a lifelong friendship.

Dunbar moved to Toledo, Ohio, in 1895. His patrons, Charles A. Thatcher, an attorney, and Henry A. Tobey, a physician, brokered readings for him at local libraries and literary clubs. They also provided funds for the publication in 1896 of his second book, Majors and Minors. Dunbar attempted with this title to escape the clutches of dialect—his “majors” were poems in standard English influenced by Robert Burns, John Keats, and Robert Browning, while “minors” were the poems in Negro dialect, influenced by HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW, John Greenleaf Whittier, James Whitcomb Riley, and other popular American rhymers. When Majors and Minors attracted to the attention of WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, the novelist, critic, and editor of Harper’s Weekly, he praised it in an editorial column, coincidentally on Dunbar’s birthday in 1896. Overnight Howells’s review raised Dunbar’s visibility to the highest literary circles. Dodd, Mead and Company published Lyrics of Lowly Life, also in 1896, a volume combining Oak and Ivy and Majors and Minors with an introduction by Howells. Though Howells’s laudatory introduction all but ignored Dunbar’s “majors,” his praise for Dunbar’s verse in black dialect made the young writer a literary star.

In 1897 Dunbar took a trip to England to promote his work there. Although the tour was disappointing—he was presented as an exotic figure, often on a program including such novelties as the dwarf Tom Thumb—he met the Anglo-African composer Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, who set seven of his poems to music as African Romances. Dunbar discussed African-American spirituals with him and probably influenced Coleridge-Taylor’s absorption of African, African-American, and Afro-Caribbean elements into his compositions. In 1898, when the composer visited the United States, they would again work together on Dream Lovers, an Operatic Romance, for which Dunbar provided the lyrics.

When he returned home in spring 1898, Dunbar took up residence in Washington, D.C., where he worked as a reading room clerk in the Library of Congress. A short time later, on March 6, 1898, he married Alice Ruth Moore, whom he had begun courting by correspondence in 1895. Dunbar had proposed to her before his trip to England. Their marriage was filled with tensions. Alice was a writer also, but unlike the dark-skinned northerner Dunbar, she was a light-skinned southerner from Louisiana and a college graduate. Her family disapproved of the marriage, and Alice disapproved of Dunbar’s dialect poetry. In addition, Mother Dunbar lived with them. The couple struggled financially, neither generating sufficient income from writing alone. The dusty atmosphere at the library exacerbated Dunbar’s poor health, and he resigned his position there in late 1898, relying thereafter on his readings, occasional articles, and sales of his books for income.

Dunbar moved his family to Denver, Colorado, in September 1899 and took a job at a newspaper. But his growing dependence on alcohol to deal with what was soon diagnosed as tuberculosis made it impossible for him to carry out his duties, and after a few months they moved back to Washington. Despite these health problems and marital tensions, Dunbar continued to write, producing poetry, essays, and fiction prolifically. He wrote four novels: The Uncalled (1898), The Love of Laundry (1900), The Fanatics (1901), and The Sport of the Gods (1902). He collected his short fiction in Folks from Dixie (1898), The Strength of Gideon and Other Stories (1900), In Old Plantation Days (1903), and The Heart of Happy Hollow (1904). He wrote three plays (unpublished) and completed lyrics for two of the earliest black ragtime musicals, Clorindy, or the Origin of the Cakewalk (1898) and In Dahomey: A Negro Musical Comedy (1902), both produced successfully in New York. And all of this was in addition to the steady composition and publication of books of his poetry: When Malindy Sings (1896); Lyrics of the Hearthside (1899); Candle-Lightin' Time and Poems of Cabin and Field (1901); Lyrics of Love and Laughter (1903); Li'l Gal (1904); Chris'mus is A-Comin' and Other Poems, Howdy, Honey, Howdy, and Lyrics of Sunshine and Shadow (1905); A Plantation Portrait and Joggin' Erlong (1906). During his career, Dunbar was published in the most prominent literary journals, such as Harper's Weekly, Lippincott's Magazine, and the Saturday Evening Post, as well as in newspapers like the Denver Post, the New York Journal, and African-American journals and newspapers.

In his short lifetime Dunbar produced about 500 poems, less than half of which were in dialect. Major frustrations in his life were the insistent preference of critics, readers, and audiences for these “minors” and their underappreciation of the poetry in standard English into which he poured his deepest feelings. Howells, whose judgment was echoed by other critics, had praised his “minors” and helped launch his career. But, Dunbar early on realized the two-edged quality of white writers' evaluations of his “authentic” dialect poetry. He wrote in a letter, “One critic says a thing and others hasten to say the same things, in many cases using the identical words. I see very clearly that Mr. Howells has done me irrevocable harm in the dictum he laid down regarding my dialect verse” (Braxton xvii).

Dunbar represented a counterargument to the racist ideas then in circulation. He was evidence that African Americans could express the most refined human emotions in the most disciplined expression of language: poetry. He was a counterimage to the working-class, ignorant, uncomplicated, and unsophisticated figure of the black American that dominated public discourse in that day and remains a significant part of it in our day as well. He was especially praised as a man of apparently unmixed African heritage who could master the power of language, thereby contradicting the racial wisdom of the day that cast only African Americans of mixed heritage as capable of approaching such cultural mastery. Dunbar became a symbol of black ability, a potential force of inspiration for black Americans, and a reproof to post-Reconstruction ideas of black intellectual and spiritual incapacity.

Tragically, the tensions in Dunbar's marriage could not be sustained. Recent research reveals that under the influence of alcohol he was abusive and violent to Alice on more than one occasion. When, after four years of marriage she could no longer endure it, he moved out of their Washington house. Alice refused to see him ever again despite his repeated written entreaties. After the separation from Alice in 1902, Dunbar traveled to Chicago with his mother to visit his half brother Robert, returning at last to Dayton in 1904. Depressed over the failure of his marriage and increasingly alcoholic, Dunbar died of tuberculosis on February 9, 1906, at the new home he had bought for his mother. He was not quite 34 years old.

“When Malindy Sings” (1896)

In what is arguably his finest dialect poem, Dunbar presents a speaker who analyzes the aesthetic experience. In the voice of an uneducated African American, he compares the “natural” production of African American art—Malindy's singing—to that of the musically literate white mistress that is derived from book learning. The poetic burden—that is, the weight and value of poetic creativity—is a major theme in Dunbar's work, both dialect and nondialect. The speaker in this poem asks the listeners to acknowledge not only the superiority of Malindy's singing but also the spiritual superiority of Malindy's black cultural production over Miss Lucy's European music making.

This poem is, like many works by Dunbar's favorite writers—Robert Burns; Alfred, Lord Tennyson; and Robert Browning—a dramatic monologue. The poem dramatizes, in the voice of a participant, a dramatic situation, in this case, the speaker's experience of and commentary on Malindy's singing. While most dialect poetry in the late 19th century presented the speaker of dialect as the sole voice of the poem, not many put the speaker into a dramatic situation that, as in this poem, tells a story of its own.

In “When Malindy Sings” Dunbar celebrates the artist, Malindy the singer, who produces transports of the religious sublime in her audience. Many 19th-century poems celebrated the aesthetic experience of landscapes (William Wordsworth’s “Tintern Abbey”) and ancient artifacts (John Keats’s “Ode on a Grecian Urn”), but also of art and music. Dunbar’s exploration of the transcendent effect of Malindy’s art is thus another expression of his own artistic insistence that African Americans are fully capable of the highest sort of spiritual and artistic feelings.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Describe the dramatized situation: To whom is the narrator speaking? Is this a pre–Civil War or post–Civil War moment? What are the speaker’s feelings toward Malindy? Toward Miss Lucy? What passages reveal these feelings?
2. How many figures of the artist, other than Malindy and Miss Lucy, are presented in the poem? Explain how this adds to the poem.
3. How does the speaker connect art and religion? What elements of the poem are most dramatically realized? What elements seem most sentimental? Explain your answer.

“Frederick Douglass”(1896)

Dunbar’s poem memorializes the African-American leader Frederick Douglass, who died in 1895. Dunbar corresponded with and met Douglass a few years before his death and respected him greatly for his generosity and sincere interest in furthering his career.

Dunbar’s poem takes the form of an elegy, a poem of mourning that celebrates the survival in fame and honor of the deceased. Literary models for this kind of poem include John Milton’s “Lycidas” and WALT WHITMAN’S “Oh Captain! My Captain!” Dunbar’s poem exhibits the three traditional movements of the elegy: a lamentation for the deceased, a praise song for his accomplishments, and a declaration of solace for the reader-survivor because of the spiritual immortality of the deceased. “Frederick Douglass” balances its two opening stanzas of lamentation against six stanzas of praise and ends with two stanzas of solace.

In his long life Douglass had been, among other things, an escaped slave, a fiery abolitionist speaker, an author, and a newspaper editor. Before the ascendancy of Booker T. Washington, he was undoubtedly the best-known African-American leader. Dunbar reminds the reader that it is Douglass’s people, poetically figured as “Ethiopia,” who mourn his passing. He then goes on to detail the vigorous spirit of Douglass’s resistance to racial injustice.

Douglass is presented throughout the poem as a warrior, a hero engaged in metaphorical physical combat “who died in action with his armor on!” In the final stanzas the military warrior spirit is transferred to the African-American people, and Douglass is imaged less literarily and more literally, as a powerful public speaker and writer who inspired others “to seek the heights, nor faint, nor fail.”

For Discussion or Writing

1. Dunbar apparently thought that such a serious subject called for poetic techniques hallowed by ancient usage. The poem is full of not only old-fashioned martial spirit but also old-fashioned figures of speech and diction. Locate and evaluate what you think are some of these archaic words, expressions, and sentence structures. Do they work to make the poem especially effective? How or how not?
2. Research Douglass’s life and accomplishments. Does Dunbar do justice to his subject? Explain your response.
3. Compare “Frederick Douglass” with Whitman’s “Oh Captain! My Captain!” Notice particularly how the diction differs and how each poem positions the reader in relation to the death the poem laments. Explain how these differences relate to the aims of the poem and the audience for which the poem was written.

“We Wear the Mask” (1896)

Dunbar's poem addresses the situation of African Americans who were forced by U.S. racism to wear the mask of accommodation to the system that tried to reduce them to mindless smiling automatons.

Unlike so many of Dunbar's other nondialect poems, “We Wear the Mask” is straightforwardly modern in its poetic manner. The diction mainly avoids inversion of word order for the sake of rhyme and does not use the archaic thee, thy, and thou of poems like “Frederick Douglass.” And while the poem never names the cause of the shame and dissembling it describes, Dunbar's audiences recognized the African-American face as the one behind the mask and “the world” as their white fellow citizens. The poem proceeds from bitter observation to anguished outcry, reinforced by the insistent i rhyme and the title phrase used as a refrain.

From far back in the history of African-American enslavement, slaves were constrained in expressing their anger and resentment at their condition. Revealing such emotions might lead to painful punishment at the hands of their masters. In post-Emancipation America, with the increasing pervasiveness of race prejudice and segregation sanctioned by law as well as custom, African Americans prudently covered their resentment, anger, and anxiety from whites—and from one another. Dunbar's poem ironically wears a mask itself; the poem never explicitly addresses the issue of race prejudice. The bitterness and anger grounded in racial experience can thus be embraced or sidestepped by the reader, who can put a “universal” interpretation on the poem.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How does the tight rhyming of the poem (lies/eyes, guile/smile, etc.) add to its effectiveness?
2. Notice how many one- or two-syllable words there are in the poem. Explain why you think Dunbar may have placed two polysyllabic words so close together in the final line of the first stanza.
3. Compare this poem to STEPHEN CRANE's poem “Do Not Weep, Maiden, for War Is Kind.”

Describe the way each poet makes use of irony and the way each evokes powerful emotions.

“An Ante-Bellum Sermon” (1896)

The speaker in this poem is a pre-Civil War African-American preacher. In proper preacherly fashion he illuminates a passage from the Bible, making it relevant to the condition of his audience.

While poems like “Little Brown Baby” and “When Malindy Sings” are somewhat ambiguous about their historical setting, allowing the reader freedom to consider them as addressing pre- or post-Emancipation life, “An Ante-Bellum Sermon” is specifically addressed to pre-Emancipation experience. At the time of the poem's composition in the late 19th century, African-American religion was considered naive and childlike, with no relation to the politics of liberation pursued by such African-American leaders as Frederick Douglass, Booker T. Washington, and W. E. B. DuBois. Dunbar's poem develops insight into how an African-American leader, in the period before the Civil War and Emancipation, might have conveyed the message of the Bible but also inspired his listeners with the hope of liberation. Dunbar's speaker repeatedly disavows that he is “preachin' discontent” and insists that he is “talkin' bout ouah freedom / In a Bibleistic way.” He must be careful not to alarm the slave masters. But, the ironic subtext is clear: As a just God sent Moses to defeat Pharaoh's slavery, he will send a Moses to free the African-American slaves.

Another example of Dunbar's use of the dramatic monologue, “An Ante-Bellum Sermon” is rich with ironies that lie in the presupposition of the stereotypical ignorance of the speaker, which is revealed to be both spiritual wisdom and practical prudence.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Locate the sources of humor in this poem. There are no jokes, but the poem does make the reader smile. How? How does the poem indicate the preacher's intelligence?

2. Research the Bible story and discuss the ways the preacher adds to it or otherwise changes it in his retelling. How is the preacher's version here like or unlike the version of the Negro spiritual "Go Down, Moses"?
3. In what ways does the preacher in Dunbar's poem make use of a rhetorical strategy similar to that which William Shakespeare used to structure Mark Antony's speech after the death of Julius Caesar in act 3, scene 2 of The Tragedy of Julius Caesar?

"Little Brown Baby" (1896)

In this poem in African-American dialect a father teasingly plays with an infant, a child seemingly old enough to walk and play outside the house but not yet able to talk. The speaker first praises and then frightens the child before putting him to bed with final reassurances of his security in his father's love.

"Little Brown Baby" is one of Dunbar's poems that most effectively subvert the idea of African-American inferiority that was so widespread at the time of its composition in the 1890s. The loving relationship between the father and child, the apparently intact and happy family, the recognizable human psychology, and the gentle good humor of the poem work to dispel the notion that blacks differed significantly from whites in the depth and breadth of their humanity. The poem portrays a common American family moment: a father returned home from work, dirty and tired, but pleased to play with his child—"pappy's pa'dner an' play-mate an' joy"—before putting him to bed.

In a historical period when small children often died of fevers and infections, poems about children were very popular. Dunbar wrote many poems involving children, some clever and funny, such as "The Making Up," and some conventional and maudlin, such as "Two Little Boots." Several of his poems about children feature adoring or mourning fathers, a rarity in the context of the mother-focused work of his contemporaries.

For Discussion or Writing

1. The reader must infer the speechless infant's response from the father's behavior toward it. How does the infant respond to the threat of the "buggah-man" (bogeyman), a traditional figure of fairy tales and children's stories? Do you think the father is too free with his emotional teasing? Why?
2. What do you imagine the father foresees for his "little brown baby" in the last three lines of the poem?
3. Compare this poem to "Death of an Infant" by Lydia Sigourney. How do the poets communicate the contrasting emotions of their speakers?

"Sympathy" (1899)

In "Sympathy" Dunbar expressed one of his most constant themes: the obstruction of the free expression of feeling by social forces of limitation and control. In figuring the speaker as an observer of a situation he apparently cannot change, "Sympathy" speaks of both Dunbar's frustration as a poet and his frustration as a citizen.

"Sympathy" is typical of much of Dunbar's poetic work that is not written from behind the mask of dialect. He was heavily influenced by the English romantics of the early 19th century, John Keats in particular, from whom he adopted his nature imagery and poetic diction. Keats and Percy Bysshe Shelley used songbirds as symbols of the poet; Dunbar here uses the caged bird as both a symbol of the poet and a symbol of his people. The first two stanzas speak of the general oppression of African Americans in the period, while the third stanza more specifically addresses the situation of the poet, whose work is presumed to be "carol[s] of joy and glee" that will be consumed by the majority reader. Dunbar, in fact, wrote dialect verse that seemed to many to maintain the white minstrel and plantation traditions of portraying African Americans as mindless and artless. Dunbar was often thought to demean the African-American image in his dialect poems and stories. But, in poems like this that speak "from his heart's core," he is clearly critical of the social larities and differences between the two works. Is Dunbar making similar statements about art?

2. Consider the similarities and differences between “We Wear the Mask” and “Sympathy.” How does the we of the first poem differ from the I of “Sympathy”? Do you think Dunbar read these poems only to African-American audiences? Or, do you think white audiences interpreted them differently?
3. Compare the view of poetry and poetic creativity expressed in Dunbar’s poem “The Poet and His Song” to the view of music and musical creativity in “When Malindy Sings.” Is it the poet or the singer who is more richly rewarded for his or her art?
4. Compare the rhetorical strategy of Dunbar’s poem “The Debt” to that of “We Wear the Mask.” What else do these two poems have in common? Are these characteristics common in other poems by Dunbar?
5. Dunbar composed a number of poems about celebrated individuals. Some of them are elegies for the dead; others celebrate fellow artists. Compare “Frederick Douglass” to Dunbar’s poems about Alexander Crummell, John Greenleaf Whittier, John Boyle O’Reilly, or HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON

(1803–1882)

Meek young men grow up in libraries, believing it their duty to accept the views which Cicero, which Locke, which Bacon, have given; forgetful that Cicero, Locke, and Bacon were only young men in libraries when they wrote these books.

(“The American Scholar”)

Ralph Waldo Emerson is commonly regarded as one of the most significant intellectual and literary figures in the whole history of the United States. A prolific essayist as well as a tireless and extremely popular public speaker, he literally gave voice to many of the key ideas of his era—ideas that at first were controversial but later became enormously influential. Early in his career, for instance, one of Emerson’s speeches so offended the sensibilities of opinion leaders at Harvard College that he was not invited to speak there again for another three decades; nevertheless, by the end of his life Harvard had given him an honorary degree and had made him a member of its Board of Overseers. Emerson was a major figure in the American transcendentalist movement, and his essentially romantic, optimistic emphasis on lofty emotions, the intimate bonds between man and nature, and the importance of individual self-reliance influenced many other significant writers (especially HENRY DAVID THOREAU and WALT WHITMAN).

Many of the most important details of Emerson’s life are helpfully laid out in the comprehensive “Chronology” prepared by Harold Bloom and Paul Kane (in their edition of Ralph Waldo Emerson), which can be usefully supplemented by the “Illustrated Chronology” and biographical essay printed in Joel Myerson’s Historical Guide (252–290). Emerson was born in Boston on May 25, 1803—near the very beginning of the century he did so much to influence. His father, William Emerson, was a prominent minister who also edited a significant magazine, while Emerson’s mother was the daughter of successful merchants. Emerson, then—along with his five brothers and two sisters—was born into circumstances that were economically and socially fortunate, but his life took an unlucky turn when his father died in 1811. The Emerson children, moreover, were afflicted with various forms of ill health: Emerson himself would later suffer from poor eyesight, rheumatism, and lung problems, and a number of his siblings would die of tuberculosis. Nevertheless, Ralph, or Waldo, as he later preferred to be called, grew up with multiple advantages. He was able, for instance, to attend the Boston Latin School (which he entered in 1812), he had the time and opportunity to read widely, and in 1817 he was able to enter Harvard College, where he received assistance in paying his tuition. Although never an especially distinguished student (he graduated in almost the exact middle of his class), he nonetheless had already begun to write and think seriously while still in college, and he would eventually become far more distinguished than his higher-ranking classmates.

After graduating in 1821, Emerson taught and later supervised a girls’ school until the end of 1824; then, early in 1825, he himself entered the Divinity School at Harvard, although problems with his eyes soon interrupted his studies.

By fall that year he was teaching school yet again; by fall 1826 he had become licensed to preach by the Unitarian Church, one of the most liberal branches of American Christianity. Health problems, however, intervened once more, leading him to spend several months in the warmer climate of South Carolina and Florida, but by spring 1827 he was back in Boston, had resumed his preaching career, and by December had also met a captivating 16-year-old, Ellen Louisa Tucker, who would soon become his wife. They became engaged a year later and were married on September 30, 1829, even though it was already clear by this time that Ellen was afflicted with tuberculosis. By this time, too, Emerson had become an ordained Unitarian minister, serving the congregation of the Second Church in Boston. When Ellen died on February 8, 1831, Emerson was devastated, and this crisis in his personal life was soon matched by one that affected him both spiritually and professionally: By 1832 he had become increasingly disenchanted with traditional forms of religious thinking and traditional forms of worship, and in September that year he offered his church his resignation because he was no longer willing to serve communion. Although many members of the congregation wanted him to remain as their leader, a majority voted to accept his resignation. Suffering once again from poor health, he departed for Europe on Christmas Day 1832.

Emerson's trip to Europe was good both for his physical well-being and for his psychological health. He traveled in Italy and France, but his most fruitful experiences occurred in England, where he met many of the country's most important writers and began a long friendship with Thomas Carlyle, one of the masters of 19th-century English prose. Returning to the United States in September 1833, Emerson began a new career as an itinerant preacher and lecturer. In 1834 a financial settlement from the estate of his late wife helped ease his financial worries, but the death of a beloved brother of tuberculosis in that same year stung Emerson deeply. Meanwhile, he continued to develop a reputation as a popular lecturer on literary and intellectual topics, and he continued to preach independently, declining an offer in 1835 to become a regular pastor. Additionally in 1835 he bought a house in Concord, Massachusetts—the town near Boston with which he would become so much identified—and he also married his second wife, Lydia (whom he called Lidian) Jackson, on September 14. Although their relationship was less romantically intense than his marriage to Ellen, Emerson and Lydian lived a long and quietly happy life together. Unfortunately, however, this new happiness was temporarily offset by the death of another of Emerson's brothers, who succumbed to tuberculosis on May 9, 1836.

Yet, 1836 also saw the publication of Nature, one of Emerson's most important books and a key to much of his so-called transcendentalist thinking. As the title of this work suggests, Emerson and other transcendentalists—some of whom now began meeting as an informal group—were struck by the beauty and harmony of the physical universe and by the supposedly close bonds among God, man, and the totality of God's creation. Humans, these thinkers believed, could rely on instincts and on highly personal insights as reliable guides to truth; these transcendentalists also tended to deemphasize older Christian ideas about the pervasiveness of sin and innate human corruption, replacing them with a more optimistic view of human nature and human potential. Emerson was a leading figure in this new movement, and, indeed, he was now becoming an increasingly well-known intellectual. Nevertheless, his Phi Kappa Kappa oration at Harvard in 1837—an address in which he issued a call for intellectual independence from slavish devotion to dead or dying traditions—offended many, as did a subsequent lecture given at Harvard's Divinity School. In general, listeners to Emerson's speeches over the years had varying reactions: Many felt inspired and enlightened, some were angered, and some were simply confused.

In 1840 Emerson, along with his friend MARGARET FULLER, began publishing a magazine called the Dial; its first issue included work not only by its two editors and other transcendentalists but also by Thoreau, whose writing Emerson would encourage and whose career he would help promote. In the meantime, Emerson's own career took a major step forward in 1841 with the publication of his first set of Essays, in which he laid out many of his key ideas. This piece of good fortune was soon followed, however, in 1842 by the death of his young son, Waldo—an especially painful loss. Waldo's death contributed to the darkened tone of some of the pieces included in the second set of Essays Emerson published in 1844, and throughout the 1840s Emerson's thinking was also becoming increasingly troubled by the dark and sickening spectacle of American slavery. By the end of the decade he had become a more and more fervently outspoken abolitionist, but he had also—with the publication of his Poems in 1846—won attention as a significant writer of verse. Thus, by the time he set sail once more for England in 1847, he was recognized both at home and in Britain as a leading American “man of letters,” and during his time abroad he met and mingled with some of the most prominent of his fellow intellectuals in Victorian England.

After returning from Europe in summer 1848, Emerson resumed his active career as a writer and as a popular figure on the U.S. lecture circuit. A new book, titled Nature; Addresses and Lectures, appeared in 1849, followed in 1850 by Representative Men. After the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law in that latter year, Emerson also became an especially vigorous and eloquent opponent of slavery, and his attacks became more frequent as the 1850s wore on. Politics, however, was neither his sole nor even his main interest; his reading, thought, and writing were all wide-ranging. It was Emerson, for instance, who in 1855 was one of the first to hail Whitman as a major new voice in American poetry. Meanwhile, in 1857 he himself published a significant new prose work titled English Traits, which was followed in 1860 by a work called The Conduct of Life. By this time, of course, the Civil War seemed plainly imminent, and Emerson actually welcomed the conflict, seeing it as an opportunity to end slavery in the United States once and for all.

In the years after the war Emerson was increasingly recognized as one of his country's leading public figures. Harvard granted him an honorary degree in 1866, his career as a lecturer was at its height, a new book of poems was issued in 1867, and in the latter year he was also (ironically enough) appointed to Harvard's board of supervisors. His career as a lecturer continued throughout the 1860s. A new book, Society and Solitude, appeared in 1870, and although his health weakened in the ensuing decade, his social status and public fame continued to grow. In 1872–73 he traveled abroad for the last time, visiting not only Europe but Egypt, and in 1875 he brought out a book of prose, Letters and Social Aims, while also continuing to revise his poetry. By the late 1870s, however, both his physical health and his mental strength were in decline, and when he died on April 27, 1882, his best days had long been behind him. Nonetheless, during his lengthy and highly productive lifetime he had not only won respect for himself but also contributed substantially to the developing intellectual life of the young but increasingly self-reliant nation his thinking had helped shape and transform.

Nature* (1836)

In this early and somewhat lengthy essay (consisting of an introduction and eight chapters), Emerson discusses many of the core ideas of his transcendentalist philosophy, especially his notions about the intimate connections among humans, nature, and God. In one of the most famous passages he ever wrote, Emerson claims that when a person truly contemplates nature, “all mean egotism vanishes. I become a transparent eyeball; I am nothing; I see all; the currents of the Universal Being circulate through me; I am part or parcel of God” (Portable 11). The essay discusses nature in terms of its “commodity” (or usefulness), its beauty, its function as a kind of language, its value of as a source of discipline, and its relation to idealism and spirit.

Emerson begins characteristically by rejecting his era's alleged overemphasis on the traditions of the past. He calls instead for a more immediate, more personal approach to knowledge and life: “The foregoing generations beheld God and nature face to face; we, through their eyes. Why should not we also enjoy an original relation to the universe? . . . Let us demand our own works and laws and worship" (Portable 7). Crucial to the kind of worship Emerson has in mind is a direct, unmediated approach to the physical universe, which is also, he thinks, a universe imbued with spirit and meaning—a universe to which each thoughtful person feels intimately connected: "The lover of nature is he who whose inward and outward senses are still truly adjusted to each other; who has retained the spirit of infancy even into the era of manhood" (Portable 10). Humans are at home in a universe created, and presided over, by a benevolent spirit: "The greatest delight which the fields and woods minister is the suggestion of an occult relation between man and the vegetable" (Portable 11). Nature, moreover, is also useful to man: "Beasts, fire, water, stones, and corn serve him" (Portable 12). Yet, nature is beautiful, too, and its beauty contributes to our physical, mental, and spiritual health: "The tradesman, the attorney comes out of the din and craft of the street and sees the sky and the woods, and is a man again. In their eternal calm, he finds himself. The health of the eye seems to demand a horizon. We are never tired, so long as we can see far enough" (Portable 14). But, the relationship between humans and nature is not one-sided: "Nature stretches out her arms to embrace man, only let his thoughts be of equal greatness" (Portable 17). God creates nature; nature's beauty stimulates man; man creates art, inspired by nature's beauty; and thus the "beauty of nature re-forms itself in the mind, and not for barren contemplation, but for new creation" (Portable 18).

Nature, indeed, is full of meaning if we know how to read it correctly, and all vital language has its roots in natural things or facts. Yet, in addition, "Every natural fact is a symbol of some spiritual fact. Every appearance in nature corresponds to some state of the mind, and that state of the mind can only be described by presenting the natural appearance as its picture. An enraged man is a lion, a cunning man is a fox, a firm man is a rock, a learned man is a torch" (Portable 20). Nature, however, not only inspires our thoughts and shapes our language but also disciplines our understanding and conduct by imposing real limits on our assumptions and behavior. It thereby forms our common sense and teaches us practical lessons: "Water is good to drink, coal to burn, wool to wear, but wool cannot be drunk, nor water spun, nor coal eaten" (Portable 26–27). Nevertheless, nature not only imposes limits but "is made to serve. It receives the dominion of man as meekly as the ass on which the Saviour rode. It offers all its kingdoms to man as the raw material which he may mould into what is useful" (Portable 28). Here, as always in Emerson, the relationship between man and nature is close, but this, finally, is simply because the "world proceeds from the same spirit as the body of man. It is a remoter and inferior incarnation of God, a projection of God in the unconscious" (Portable 43). Thus, to know nature is to know oneself as well as the origin of both.

Nature is a more carefully structured piece of writing than many of Emerson's works of prose, although it is also more abstract (and at times more turgid and obscure) than some of his more "popular" works, such as "Self-Reliance." Emerson himself considered it flawed, or "cracked," since it never quite makes clear whether (or how) we can know that nature exists independently (that is, outside our own perceptions). More "realistic," "analytic," or "logical" thinkers of all stripes are likely to see problems in the piece if it is considered as a serious work of philosophy, although other thinkers (especially those in the "idealistic" or "pragmatic" schools of thought) have found the work genuinely stimulating and valuable, and certainly its influence on the thinking, mood, and intellectual and literary culture of the 19th-century United States was immense. Stylistically it is highly typical of Emerson: It proceeds mostly by rhapsodic pronouncement rather than by careful, painstaking logic. It is hard to imagine how one might rationally dispute much (if anything) that Emerson says, because little of the essay seems to engage in deliberate, discriminating argumentation. Emerson never indicates how his "arguments," which are really little more than bald assertions, might possibly be falsified;

although definitive in tone and rhetoric, his claims seem mostly and simply suggestive. His assertions about God, for instance, would never be taken seriously by any thoughtful atheist, and many of his more mystical pronouncements about nature would seem literally nonsensical to anyone who did not already share his basic premises or assumptions.

As a work of literature—that is, as an artfully crafted piece of language—Nature is typical of Emerson's style. It is frequently poetic in its vivid use of metaphors, similes, imagery, and rhythm. It moves swiftly, with sudden shifts, and despite its numbered, titled sections, it is not nearly as logically or clearly organized as one might hope or expect of a traditional "philosophical" essay. Emerson rarely develops carefully structured trains of logical thought; instead, he offers flash after flash of abrupt, intuitive insight, which one can either take or leave. Not surprisingly (especially given the fact that many of his essays began as notes for lectures), he writes as if speaking from a pulpit or a stage, and his sentences are full of aphorisms, epigrams, and self-coined proverbs. He wanted his works to develop organically and seem spontaneous, as does nature itself, and he deliberately rejected stodgy, conventional, and predictable structures or phrasing. In Nature as in so many of his works, he functions less as a philosopher than as a poet, prophet, or priest; his purpose is less to argue than to rhapsodize, celebrate, and excite.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare Emerson's portrayal of city and countryside. Does he show a bias? Is he fair?
2. Compare and contrast Emerson's thoughts about nature with the way nature is presented in Wallace Stevens's poem "Sunday Morning." How does Stevens's poem seem to reflect some of Emerson's ideas? How does the poem try to guard against the allegedly simplistic or excessively optimistic aspects of Emerson's influence? How, in other words, does Stevens try to make his poem at least partly unsentimental and realistic? Does Emerson himself ever try to do the same thing?
3. Read Emerson's Nature alongside Thoreau's Walden. What assumptions do they seem to have in common? How are they comparable or different in style, method, tone, and genre? Explore the meanings of the word romantic as it applies to 19th-century literature, and then discuss the ways in which both works seem romantic. Does one work strike you as being more effectively written than the other? If so, explain why, and provide specific examples.

"The American Scholar" (1837)

Delivered as the Phi Beta Kappa address at Harvard University in 1837, this famous lecture has often been seen as a declaration of intellectual independence from the excessive influence of Europe in particular and the past in general. Emerson rejects any view that scholars should rest content as uninspired and unoriginal bookworms: "Meek young men grow up in libraries, believing it their duty to accept the views which Cicero, which Locke, which Bacon, have given; forgetful that Cicero, Locke, and Bacon were only young men in libraries when they wrote these books" (Portable 56). "Books," he declares, "are the best things, well used; abused, among the worst. What is the right use? . . . They are for nothing but to inspire" (Portable 56).

Written in a clear, direct, and much more consistently coherent and accessible style than Nature, this lecture was highly controversial at the time but also proved enormously influential. It memorably enunciates many of Emerson's most typical ideas. It is, in a sense, a call for intellectual self-reliance; thus Emerson declares that "the one thing in the world, of value, is the active soul. This every man is entitled to; this every man contains within him, although in almost all men obstructed and as yet unborn" (Portable 56). Skeptics, of course, will and did question Emerson's apparently blithe, undefended, and unqualified confidence that the "soul active sees absolute truth and utters truth, or creates" (Portable 57), and it is when he issues broad-brush statements such as this that it becomes hard to take him nearly as seriously as he apparently took himself. It would be one thing if he had suggested that an active soul may see part of the truth, or merely a partial truth; instead he claims (without explaining why or how) that such a soul sees “absolute truth”—a claim that risks sounding especially irresponsible when delivered by a “scholar” to a scholarly audience. “Books,” Emerson asserts, “are for the scholar’s idle times. When he can read God directly”—by contemplating nature or engaging in self-reflection—“the hour is too precious to be wasted in other men’s transcripts of their readings” (Portable 57). Yet, he concedes that the best books do have real value: “They impress us with the conviction that one nature wrote and the same reads” (Portable 57). In other words, they convince us that all people share fundamentally identical characters and perceptions and that this essential identity is rooted in their common origin as creatures of nature, which itself is a creation of God. Thus, man, nature, and the “best” books all reflect the mind of God so that the reading of such books, as does the contemplation of nature, promotes not simply knowledge of the universe but knowledge of oneself: “The world—this shadow of the soul, or other me—lies wide around. Its attractions are the keys which unlock my thoughts and make me acquainted with myself” (Portable 59).

For Discussion or Writing

1. This essay is sometimes cited as being the starting point for a truly U.S. literature. What is American about “The American Scholar”? Where is Emerson being notably nationalistic? What for Emerson constitutes being “American”?
2. Compare and contrast Emerson’s essay with T. S. Eliot’s work “Tradition and the Individual Talent.” How does each man approach the cultural heritage of the past? What assumptions do the two men share? How do their attitudes and arguments differ?
3. Do some research and reading about the scientific method, and then discuss Emerson’s essay in relation to that method. How is Emerson’s understanding of scholarship different from and/or comparable to the kind of scholarship implied by the scientific method? What guidance, if any, might a modern scientist (or even a modern writer of history) find valuable or useful in Emerson’s essay?

“Self-Reliance” (1841)

“Self-Reliance” is perhaps Emerson’s most popular and influential essay. In it he encourages readers to trust in themselves rather than in traditions or institutions—to discern and develop their own individual connections to and understandings of God, nature, society, and the universe. “Whoso would be a man,” he says, “must be a nonconformist” (Portable 141).

Emerson’s essay is one of the most uncompromising assertions of individualism in the English language, and perhaps the best way to convey its meaning and capture its tone is by offering a few representative quotations. “To believe in your own thought,” Emerson declares, “to believe that what is true for you in your private heart is true for all men—that is genius” (Portable 138). “Trust thyself,” he counsels; “every heart vibrates to that iron string” (Portable 139). “Society everywhere,” he asserts, “is in conspiracy against the manhood of every one of its members. . . . Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of our own mind” (Portable 141). In a passage that can easily shock (or even disgust) readers with more traditional notions of morality, Emerson avows, “No law can be sacred to me but that of my nature. Good and bad are but names very readily transferable to that or this; the only right is what is after my constitution; the only wrong what is against it” (Portable 141–142). In a passage that ironically echoes the Christian gospels, Emerson maintains that “the doctrine of hatred must be preached, as the counteraction of the doctrine of love, when that pulses and whines. I shun father and mother and wife and brother when my genius calls me” (Portable 142). He even condemns indiscriminate charity (Portable 142–143), and he rejects any idea of virtue as a means of atonement for imperfection: “I do not wish to expiate, but to live. My life is not an apology, but a life” (Portable 143). Discussing the various inhibitions that prevent people from living autonomous existences, he mentions their fear of being inconsistent, and in one of the most famous sentences he ever wrote, he sweepingly maintains that “a foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines” (Portable 145). He proclaims that “the essence of genius, the essence of virtue, and the essence of life” is “Spontaneity or Instinct” (Portable 149). “Insist on yourself,” he advises; “never imitate” (Portable 160). And then, in the final two sentences of the piece he announces, “Nothing can bring you peace but yourself. Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of principles” (Portable 164).

That final word—principles—is important, because it implicitly helps qualify and limit the extreme egotism and adolescent narcissism seemingly endorsed by much of the rest of the essay. Emerson believed that the independent, self-reliant person would somehow also be virtuous; he felt that the true individual should (and would) act in accordance with the will of God and in line with the dictates of an ultimately benevolent nature. Exactly how and why this would happen are never spelled out very fully or explicitly, and it is easy to see why so many critics of Emerson have regarded him as an amoral (if not actually immoral) defender of the unbridled ego—a kind of New World Nietzsche. His essay is not a reasoned piece of careful argument, nor does it really invite or facilitate a rational response: One either agrees or disagrees with his claims, depending on one's personal temperament. Emerson offers little in the way of “proof” or “demonstration” as those terms are conventionally understood, nor does he really take the time to dispute potential objections. The essay is mainly a series of aphoristic assertions, often memorably and vividly phrased, and certainly they have long appealed—and are always likely to appeal—to self-respecting, self-regarding readers everywhere.

Thematically the essay is typically Emersonian: It extols individualism, it endorses both democracy and heroism, it celebrates instinct and intuition, it brims with optimism, it rejects authority, and it dispenses with traditional ideas about the inherent sinfulness and potential evil of man. Some readers will inevitably find the essay's ideas juvenile and naive and will regard its tone as pompously bombastic—the secular sermon of a self-appointed sage, a supremely self-confident man intent on tossing overboard most traditional ideals of humility, self-doubt, self-questioning, and adherence to exacting standards of reason, logic, and conventional ethical behavior. Other readers, in contrast, will find the essay exciting, liberating, and inspiring—a welcome declaration of independence from bothersome constraints imposed by past ideas, present institutions, and even other people.

Whatever the essay's strengths or defects as a work of philosophical argument, there is no denying its power as an artistic rendering of language. It is full of lively phrasing, memorable imagery, striking sentences, and robust rhythms. Defending the virtues of inconsistency, for instance, Emerson in a single paragraph employs many of the most potent weapons in the arsenal of rhetoric. He uses a concrete analogy and metaphor: “The voyage of the best ship is a zigzag line of a hundred tacks.” He directly addresses the reader he is trying to persuade: “Your genuine action will explain itself and will explain your other genuine actions.” Sometimes his phrasing is aphoristically brief: “Greatness always appeals to the future.” Sometimes it bubbles with alliteration: “The force of character is cumulative.” Other times Emerson asks questions and then immediately answers them: “What makes the majesty of the heroes of the senate and the field, which so fills the imagination? The consciousness of a train of great days and victories behind.” Sometimes he uses repetition and reversal: “We worship [honor] today because it is not of today.” Sometimes he employs balanced syntax: “We love [honor] and pay it homage because it is not a trap for our love and homage.” And, sometimes he indulges in paradox: Honor is “of an old immaculate pedigree, even if shown in a young person” (Portable 146–147). Reading Emerson's individual sentences is rarely a boring experience; usually there is something striking, surprising, memorable, or even unforgettable around every turn—however abrupt those turns often seem. Emerson had a gift for coining epigrams and for inventing metaphors, similes, and maxims; he was rarely at a loss for the right word or the right rhythm. Taken as a series of startling and refreshing suggestions designed to provoke thought, “Self-Reliance” can be exhilarating. Taken as a work of literary art, it seems vital and energetic. Taken, however, as a rational argument or as a prescription for actual living, it raises far more questions (some of them quite morally troubling) than it ever actually answers.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Emerson’s essay closely, and then ask yourself how Emerson could logically condemn the “self-reliance” of a person such as Adolf Hitler, Joseph Stalin, Pol Pot, or even some less dangerous egotist, such as an obvious bully in the local school. By what standards or criteria could Emerson validly criticize the actions or characters of such people?
2. The literary critic Yvor Winters commented negatively on “Self-Reliance” in his book titled In Defense of Reason. Track down that book, read its discussion of Emerson, and then explain whether or not you think Winters’s criticisms of Emerson seem fair or justified. How might Emerson defend himself against Winters’s charges?
3. Compare and contrast the ideas Emerson expresses in this essay with the ideas that underlie Whitman’s poem “The Song of Myself.” In what specific ways does Whitman seem to have been influenced by Emerson? Are there any significant differences between Whitman’s thinking in that poem and Emerson’s thinking in this essay?
4. Youth is an important concept in “Self-Reliance.” What does youth represent for Emerson? What favors youth over age?

“An Address on the Emancipation of the Negroes in the British West Indies” (1844)

Delivered to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the abolition of slavery throughout the British Empire, this address is one of the earliest and most important of Emerson’s attacks on slavery—an institution whose continued existence in the United States increasingly disgusted not only him but also a growing number of other Americans. Emerson recounts the rise and eventual triumph of abolitionist ideas among the British public and governing class, especially as the British became more and more familiar with the actual horrors of slavery. Clearly, Emerson hopes that abolition will occur in the United States as well, and in fact he expresses confidence that slavery must eventually be defeated, since it so fundamentally contradicts the laws of God and the moral qualities of human nature.

As in some of his other pronouncements on slavery, Emerson manages in this address to combine intense moral indignation with a confident trust in the eventual triumph of right over might. Both slavery and the defense of slavery were rooted, he thought, in the basest, most materialistic, and least noble of motives, and he believed that slavery was not only abusive to the slaves but corrupting and degrading to the slave owners themselves. His speech vividly describes the inhumane and indeed inhuman treatment of the slaves, but it also shows how slavery has caused the slaveholders to live in fear of violent revolts and how it has robbed their children of the traits of initiative, hard work, and moral self-respect. Although he shows again and again that the impulse to own slaves results from monetary greed, he also suggests that the institution continues, in part, because of an even more sinister element in human nature: a love of power that leads people to enjoy the idea of completely dominating and controlling others. Nevertheless, he also argues that slavery contradicts the best and strongest aspects of human character, and so, for that reason alone it must eventually die out as the inevitable (if sometimes slow and unsteady) march of human progress proceeds. Emerson marshals plenty of evidence to argue that slavery is not only unethical but also impractical, uneconomical, inefficient, self-destructive, and self-degrading.

One of the most interesting sections of the address is near its end, when Emerson describes the emancipation of blacks in the British West Indies, praises their dignified and astonishingly nonviolent response to their new freedom, and welcomes blacks in general into the broader narrative of human progress. Emerson expresses enormous confidence in the contributions that freed blacks will now be able to make to the advancement of humankind in general, and he also expresses deep admiration for the generosity of spirit and the lack of vindictiveness they demonstrated in the immediate aftermath of their emancipation. Despite the ugly abuses they suffered, they emerged from the ordeal of slavery with their own dignity and decency intact.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the account of slavery offered in Emerson's address with the description provided in The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass, one of the greatest autobiographies ever written by a former slave. Does FREDERICK DOUGLASS's book provide any evidence to support and/or qualify any of Emerson's claims?
2. Examine Emerson's confidence about the future of freed blacks by comparing his views with those later expressed by Booker T. Washington (especially in his autobiography Up from Slavery and in his "Atlanta Compromise Speech"). How do you think Emerson would have reacted to Washington's ideas and to Washington himself as a human being? Provide evidence from Emerson's essay to support your views.

"Experience" (1844)

This essay, written in the aftermath of the death of Emerson's young son, seems darker and less optimistic in tone than some of his earlier writings; as its title implies, it is often seen as more "realistic" than certain of his other works. "Every roof," Emerson notes, "is agreeable to the eye until it is lifted; then we find tragedy and moaning women and hard-eyed husbands and deluges of lethe, and the men ask, 'What's the news?' as if the old were so bad" (Portable 268). The tone of the work is not entirely bleak, but in general this essay will provide a welcome relief to anyone who occasionally tires of Emerson's more Pollyannish writings.

"Experience" will strike many readers as one of the wisest works Emerson ever penned; it seems rooted in the actual ups and downs (especially downs) of life in ways that seem less true of some of his more famous and more fanatical works, and it can be profitably read for the sensible advice it offers about how to live a satisfying (if somewhat stoic) life. The essay lacks the sometimes embarrassing enthusiasm of many of Emerson's better-known texts (such as Nature or even "Self-Reliance"); it seems more sober, more settled, and in general more sensible. Emerson acknowledges the brevity and distractions of ordinary human existence: "So much of our time is preparation, so much is routine, and so much retrospect, that the pith of each man's genius contracts itself to a very few hours" (Portable 268). If Emerson had been writing these words at a different time in his life or in a different mood, he might now launch into an exuberant, enthusiastic celebration of the power of the exceptional spirit to lift us out of such doldrums, and indeed at one point he seems close to doing exactly this: "The intellect, seeker of absolute truth, or the heart, lover of absolute good, intervenes for our succor, and at one whisper of these high powers we awake from ineffectual struggles with this nightmare. We hurl it into its own hell, and cannot again contract ourselves to so base a state" (Portable 272). For the most part, however, Emerson in this essay avoids such exalted (and exulting) rhetoric, and in its place he instead usually offers more modest, more practical advice: "To fill the hour,—that is happiness; to fill the hour and leave no crevice to a repentance or an approval. We live amid surfaces, and the true art of life is to skate well on them" (Portable 275). Or this: "To finish the moment, to find the journey's end in every step of the road, to live the greatest number of good hours, is wisdom" (Portable 275). Or especially this: "I compared notes with one of my friends who expects everything of the universe and is disappointed when anything is less than the best, and I found that I begin at the other extreme, expecting nothing, and am always full of thanks for moderate goods" (Portable 276). It is, indeed, the very moderation of this essay—in its assumptions, in its thinking, and in its tone and rhetoric—that will make it appealing to readers who find the more enthusiastic Emerson hard to take. The Emerson of “Experience” is a man who seems aware of his own (and of humanity’s) limitations and who even seems aware of man’s flaws, hypocrisies, selfishness, and sins (Portable 286). There is a humility in this essay that often seems missing from some of his other, more famous works, and for that reason alone “Experience” should be high on the list of the essays by Emerson that are most worth reading.

For Discussion or Writing

1. At one point in this essay Emerson suggests that we are often far more prone to find fault with others than with ourselves (Portable 286). Do you agree with this? Why or why not? You might examine this idea in relation to stories by NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, such as “The Birthmark” and “Young Goodman Brown.”
2. Read this essay in conjunction with Emerson’s more famous essay titled “Self-Reliance.” How are they comparable and/or distinct? In what specific ways does the present work correct or modify the earlier one?

“The Poet” (1844)

Emerson considers the ideal poet not simply a talented writer or even merely a kind of secular prophet or priest but as a kind of representative human being: “He stands among partial men for the complete man, and apprises us not of his wealth, but of the common wealth. The young man reveres men of genius because, to speak truly, they are more himself than he is” (Portable 242). The best poets, in other words, are the best persons because they reveal most fully the potential of humanity and because they allow other persons to glimpse and appreciate the beauty, truth, and goodness of the universe.

Emerson values great poets (as opposed to mere wits or versifiers) not only because they reveal eternal truths but also because they capture, and give expression to, the spirit of the particular eras in which they live: “The experience of each new age requires a new confession, and the world seems always waiting for its poet” (Portable 245). Indeed, historical periods are remembered not so much for their political, economic, or scientific achievements as for the great writers they produce so that “all that we call sacred history attests that the birth of a poet is the principal event in chronology. Man, never so often deceived, still watches for the arrival of a brother who can hold him steady to a truth until he has made it his own” (Portable 246). The true poet frees our minds and liberates our souls and emotions, and the day on which a great poet is born is “better than my birthday: then I became an animal; now I am invited into the science of the real” (Portable 247). Emerson, then, associates the great poet both with timelessness and with the fullest expression of contemporary life, but he also makes it clear that the arrival of a great poet is a rare event—an event, he felt, that had not yet occurred in the America of his time. Part of the purpose of his essay, in fact, seems to be to summon forth such a bard—to encourage any American writers who might aspire to such a role and to prepare Americans to welcome properly such a figure if and when he does arrive. (Emerson would later feel confident that such a poet/prophet had indeed appeared when he first read the works of Walt Whitman.)

Clearly the kind of poet Emerson hopes for is a writer like him—an enthusiast, a romantic, indeed a “transcendentalist”: “I think nothing is of any value in books excepting the transcendental and extraordinary. If a man is inflamed and carried away by his thought, to that degree that he forgets the authors and the public and heeds only this one dream which holds him like an insanity, let me read his paper, and you may have all the arguments and histories and criticism” (Portable 258–259). At the same time, while Emerson values an exalted, elevated, and almost crazed or irrational spirit, he endorses the idea that a great poet can (and should) write about topics that might otherwise seem quite “common” or “ordinary”: “Banks and tariffs, the newspaper and caucus, Methodism and Unitarianism, are flat and dull to dull people, but rest on the same foundations of wonder as the town of Troy and the temple of Delphi, and are as swiftly passing away" (Portable 262). The great poet Emerson calls for, predicts, and partly aspired to be would reveal the fullness of life, truth, and beauty in all these things and thus help them all live into the future.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Emerson's essay with two essays by EDGAR ALLAN POE—"Philosophy of Composition" and "The Poetic Principle." How are the works of these two writers similar and/or different in their basic assumptions, purposes, styles, and methods? Which of the essays might be most useful to a practicing poet and why?
2. Read some of Emerson's poems. Does he live up to his own ideals as expressed in this essay?
3. Read some poems by Whitman. How does Emerson's essay seem to anticipate and justify the kind of poetry Whitman wrote and the kind of poet Whitman wanted to be?

Representative Men (1850)

In this series of essays Emerson discusses six historical figures whom he considers "representative" not only of their specific eras, cultures, and nations but also of particular potentials latent within the human race as a whole. The figures he chooses to discuss lived during the ancient period, the Renaissance, and the quite recent past, and the nations represented include Greece, Sweden, France, England, and Germany. Each figure illuminates various aspects (often positive, sometimes negative, and usually some combination of both) of human possibilities: Plato, the philosopher; Emmanuel Swedenborg, the mystic; Michel de Montaigne, the skeptic; William Shakespeare, the poet; Napoléon Bonaparte, the man of the world; and Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, the writer.

In these essays Emerson writes in the more lucid, logical style he was capable of employing when he was not being excessively lyrical, high-flying, or "transcendental." At the same time, the essays clearly express the same fundamental ideas he explored and developed elsewhere. The essay

"Plato" is a good case in point. He considers Plato the most important and influential philosopher who ever lived—a man who managed to combine the best thinking of the various cultures and traditions available to him (including the thought of both the West and the East), to transform it through his own individual genius, and in the process to make it relevant to practically every issue or problem that has ever interested mankind in all the centuries since he lived. Emerson argues that Plato everywhere dealt with the fundamental perception that lies at the base of all philosophy: the fact that the universe is somehow both enormously varied and ultimately unified. "These two principles," he says, "reappear and interpenetrate all things, all thought; the one, the many" (Portable 302). Plato managed to grapple with this problem more persistently and consistently, and across a wider intellectual landscape, than anyone else who has ever lived, and he combined an exceptional range of intellectual and rhetorical gifts with a powerful common sense. If his works are defective in any ways, it is perhaps because his expression is too literary and his thinking is insufficiently systematic. It is hard to resist the temptation to conclude that in describing Plato, Emerson is also attempting to describe himself.

Emerson's admiration for Plato could easily have been predicted, but his many positive comments about Napoleon are more surprising. He seems to have admired Napoleon as an opponent and underminer of the dead, conservative past—a revolutionary figure who symbolized the rise of a more vigorous, more inventive, more democratic age. Napoleon knew what he wanted to accomplish and knew how to achieve his goals, and he demonstrated a kind of pragmatic energy that Emerson clearly admires. Unfortunately, however, Napoleon—as did the middle class he was from and represented—pursued goals that were ultimately materialistic and therefore superficial. We can admire his determination, his skill, his competence, his commitment, and even many of his practical accomplishments, but in the final analysis his spirit was "the spirit of commerce, of money and material power" (Portable 326). To make matters worse he lacked the nobility that makes a person truly admirable: “He was thoroughly unscrupulous. He would steal, slander, assassinate, drown and poison, as his interest dictated. He had no generosity, but mere vulgar hatred; he was intensely selfish; he was perfidious” (Portable 343). He was, in short, a man who exercised far greater worldly power than Plato, but he was a man whose character was less nobly human and humane than Plato’s and whose accomplishments were therefore finally less admirable and less permanent.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How do Emerson’s accounts of the persons discussed in Representative Men resemble and/or differ from Benjamin Franklin’s account of his own life in his Autobiography? What traits of Franklin’s life and character would Emerson have admired and why? Which aspects of Franklin’s achievements would Emerson have been less likely to extol and why?
2. In his book titled A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, Thoreau (as does Emerson in Representative Men) comments on Goethe, but he also offers an extended discussion of the English poet Geoffrey Chaucer. How does Thoreau’s thinking about Goethe resemble and/or differ from Emerson’s? How does Thoreau’s discussion of Chaucer resemble and/or differ from Emerson’s discussion of Shakespeare, especially in its topics, tones, and underlying assumptions?
3. Many scholars find the section on Montaigne to be especially interesting. How was Montaigne similar to Emerson as a writer?
4. Which figure profiled in this series does Emerson seem to admire most? Why?

“An Address to the Citizens of Concord on the Fugitive Slave Law” (1851)

The Fugitive Slave Law, passed by the U.S. Congress in 1850, required legal authorities in all states (including in the North, where slavery had long been outlawed) to cooperate in the capture and return of any slaves who had managed to escape and flee from their Southern masters. The law highly inflamed many Northerners, including Emerson, who considered it immoral and felt contempt for the previously much-admired Massachusetts senator Daniel Webster, who had lent his support and prestige to the passage of the bill. Emerson attacked the law as unethical, illegal, and unnatural; he declared that all good persons should and would disobey it; and he proposed that the nation abolish slavery as soon as possible, even if doing so involved enormous monetary expense.

As does an even more powerful address he delivered on the same topic in 1854, this speech demonstrates Emerson’s exceptional effectiveness as a public speaker; the address is clear, direct, coherent, and well argued (in ways that are not always characteristic of some of his more abstract and abstruse published essays). Lucidly structured and rhetorically compelling, the address poses none of the problems to simple comprehension occasionally raised by some of the essays: Transitions are clear, arguments and reasoning are transparent, and what the address may lack in figurative language (when compared to various essays), it makes up for through its strong ethical passion. Emerson argues that the law will ironically hasten the end of slavery, since Northerners like him will no longer be able to avert their eyes from such an abominable institution; by attempting to force Northerners to assist in kidnapping, the South would, he predicted, vastly increase the number of committed abolitionists. Central to Emerson’s argument is the contention that no person is obligated to obey an immoral law and that no law can truly be considered a law if it is in fact immoral. Emerson expresses disgust for anyone—especially any self-proclaimed Christian—who could approve, obey, or assist in implementing such a law, although he recognizes that a desire by some Northerners for good commercial relations with the South may lead people to cooperate with evil. Even a desire to preserve the Union should not, he insists, lead people to obey or acquiesce in such an affront to justice, humanity, and human nature. Instead, the people of the North should be willing to sacrifice financially to help transfer enough income to the South so that Southerners can emancipate their slaves, who might perhaps be encouraged to immigrate to Liberia. Any money spent to buy the freedom of one's fellow men would be a small price to pay, Emerson suggests, not only for the liberty of the slaves but for the self-respect and integrity of free men in both the North and the South.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read this speech alongside Thoreau's 1849 essay titled "Civil Disobedience." What principles do the two works share? Compare and contrast the circumstances that prompted each work. How are they similar in method and tone?
2. Read Emerson's "Address" of 1851 in conjunction with his speech of 1854 on the same topic (Portable 541–557). How are the two works similar and/or different? What factors prevent the later speech from being a mere echo of the earlier address? How, if at all, had Emerson's thinking evolved over the course of the intervening three years?
3. What makes the writing in this address more direct than Emerson's writing elsewhere? Provide and analyze specific examples.

"Fate" (1860)

In this carefully balanced essay Emerson at first stresses the darker aspects of existence before ultimately emphasizing a more typically optimistic note. The first half of the piece explores the many inflexible, harsh, and often even fatal constraints the universe imposes on all forms of existence; "Nature," Emerson concedes, "is no sentimentalist,—[it] does not cosset or pamper us. We must see that the world is rough and surly, and will not mind drowning a man or a woman, but swallows your ship like a grain of dust" (Portable 349). Later, however, he emphasizes that human freedom is as much a part of the universe as human limitations and that our liberty, imagination, and creativity allow us to shape life and nature at least partially to our advantage.

"Fate" resembles the essay titled "Experience" in its bluntly realistic assessment of the grimmer aspects of life, and for that reason alone it is likely to appeal to readers who find Emerson's more usual cheerfulness naive and sentimental. Emerson pulls no punches (at least in the first half of the essay) in describing the risks, dangers, and sternness of life not only for humans but for all living creatures. If his more usual rhapsodies about nature can seem excessively romantic, here he instead describes a universe that is dripping with blood from tooth and claw; nor does he shy away from implicating human beings themselves in the general carnage: "You have just dined, and however scrupulously the slaughter-house is concealed in the graceful distance of miles, there is complicity, expensive races—race living at the expense of race" (Portable 349). Nor is the nonliving universe any less harsh: "At Lisbon an earthquake killed men like flies. At Naples three years ago ten thousand persons were crushed in a few minutes" (Portable 349). Humans are limited by many facts and factors, including their genetic inheritance, and indeed, Emerson himself can seem quite harsh in assessing the alleged flaws of his fellow men. Thus, for the person born with a "little fatty face, pig-eyed, and [with a] squat form," all "the privilege and all the legislation of the world cannot meddle or help to make a poet or a prince of him." Likewise, some people are born merely to eat and breed, and the "more of these drones [who] perish, the better for the hive" (Portable 351). There are times and places in this essay when Emerson sounds like a social Darwinist (and in fact like a Darwinist in general) at a time when Darwin's key book had only just been published.

In the second half of the essay, however, Emerson returns to his more typically upbeat tones and ideas, confidently declaring that "intellect annuls Fate. So far as a man thinks, he is free" (Portable 358). By exercising their intelligence, creativity, and inventiveness, humans can at least partially overcome the limits the universe imposes on them, and the whole history of humankind is a history of material and intellectual progress—a history of humanity's growing freedom from the constraints of fate: "The water drowns ship and sailor like a grain of dust. But learn to swim, trim your bark, and the wave which drowned it will be cloven by it and carry it like its own foam, a plume and a power” (Portable 363). Fate is thus tamed by the very fate that produced the human mind.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Emerson’s view of the human condition with the view implied in Jonathan Edwards’s famous sermon titled “Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God.” What role does God play in the universe as Edwards imagines it, and what role does God play in the universe as conceived by Emerson? What kinds of “fate” does Edwards stress that are relatively ignored by Emerson?
2. How does the present essay complicate and darken the picture Emerson offers in Nature? Are the darker aspects of “Fate” anywhere foreshadowed in that earlier work? What changes in Emerson’s own life may have influenced the less sunny view of existence offered in “Fate”?
3. Is fate unavoidable? If not, can we say that Emerson does not believe in free will? Is Fate compatible with ideas of freedom?

“The Sphinx” (1847)

In Greek mythology the sphinx was a creature with the face of a woman, the body of a lion, and the wings of a bird; she posed a perplexing riddle to passersby and killed anyone who could not solve it, but when Oedipus correctly answered her puzzling question, the frustrated sphinx killed herself. Emerson obviously alludes to this myth in the title, plot, and conclusion of his poem, although the final meaning of his work has been much disputed. Emerson’s sphinx poses riddling questions (apparently about man’s imperfection); she is answered by a confident, assertive poet; she responds to him in turn; and then she disintegrates and is transformed into various natural phenomena.

This poem about a literally puzzling creature has always seemed something of a puzzle itself. Even some readers who otherwise admire Emer-son’s poetry have dismissed this lyric as unclear or even incoherent, arguing that Emerson made many of the same points more lucidly in other works, such as “Each and All.” Other readers, however, have greatly admired the poem, and clearly Emerson himself highly valued it, as is clear from the fact that he chose it as the lead work for his first published collection of verse. Obviously much of the obscurity of the work is deliberate and was probably meant to be thought-provoking, mysterious, and intriguing, although many readers will probably think that Emerson went too far.

There are at least four separate voices in this poem (Collected 5–8): the voice of the speaker-observer; the voice of the sphinx; the voice of a “great mother” (line 57), who seems to be Mother Nature; and the voice of the poet, who is a character within the poem. The speaker begins by introducing and describing the sphinx in the poem’s first four lines, which are straightforward and clear. The sphinx herself begins to speak in line 5, and her phrasing soon brims with paradoxes and oxymorons; the complexity of man, nature, and man’s relations with nature is quickly implied as the sphinx suggests the standard Emersonian theme that existence is a concordance of opposites—an abundance of individual multiplicities that nonetheless reveal an underlying unity. Only humans (or at least human adults) seem somewhat out of tune with this universal harmony, and when the voice of the “great mother” briefly enters the poem (she is quoted by the sphinx), she laments that humans seem to have lost some of their original innocence (ll. 61–64). The speaker of the poem then quotes “a poet” (l. 65), who is also a character within the poem. This poet-within-the-poem seems full of optimism and self-confidence, he seems to be able to find a silver lining within any possible dark cloud, and he also seems to emphasize the innate desire of humans to pursue what is perfect, even if that pursuit is never quite satisfied or fulfilled. He emphasizes love as a basic human impulse, and he finally dismisses the sphinx as slow-witted, tedious, and imperceptive. The sphinx, however, gets the last word, although the exact meaning of her response is (as usual) difficult to decipher. So is the precise significance of her final transformation. Some critics have argued that Emerson sympathizes with the cocky poet; others think he endorses the final views voiced by the sphinx; still others are not sure what, if anything, the poem ultimately signifies. This is a poem that is always likely to have detractors as well as admirers; it is a work that is always likely to stimulate a perhaps irresolvable debate.

For Discussion or Writing

Do some research into the Greek legends of the sphinx and discuss the ways in which Emerson draws upon, modifies, and/or subverts those legends. Why do you think Emerson wanted the phrasing, tones, and meanings of this poem to be so riddling and ambiguous? Why did he not express his ideas with more obvious clarity? What advantages, if any, are there to the obscurity of this poem?

“Each and All” (1839)

This poem argues that we value individual aspects of experience best and most when we relate them to other aspects of experience—that is, when we see the part (“each”) in relation to the whole (“all”) (Collected 9–10). The speaker gives example after example to prove that “All [things] are needed by each one; / Nothing is fair or good alone” (ll. 11–12). By the end of the poem, when he is tempted to reject variable beauty in favor of apparently permanent truth, he ultimately realizes that the two are finally inseparable.

The poem begins by seeming to emphasize separateness and distinctions, but already it also implies connections: The “red-cloaked clown” (or peasant) may not realize that he is being observed, but he is nonetheless making an impact on the observer (ll. 1–2); the cow is not aware that it is charming a distant hearer when it “lows” (l. 4), although it nonetheless has that effect; nor is the church sexton in the Alps conscious of the fact that the bell that he rings delights Napoleon (the great conqueror) as the latter leads his troops through the mountains. Yet, peasant, cow, and sexton all have an impact on others, even if it is an impact none of them deliberately intends. After establishing that everything in the universe inevitably has some relation to and impact on other things, the speaker in the second part of the poem (ll. 13–36) shows repeatedly that each thing diminishes in charm or interest when it is abstracted or separated from its original context or environment. A bird (for instance), when taken home from the natural surroundings where it was originally found, continues to sing, but its song no longer seems as compelling as it seemed at first, “For I did not bring home the river and sky;— / He [i.e., the bird] sang to my ear,—they sang to my eye” (ll. 17–18). In the very memorable second half of line 18, Emerson effectively employs the techniques of paradox and synesthesia (the latter a technique in which one kind of sensual response is described in terms of another—in this case, the paradoxical idea of an eye’s being able to hear). These techniques themselves embody the very kind of union they describe, and so they are especially appropriate to this poem. For the most part, however, Emerson works his way through the rest of his examples in a more straightforward fashion; the poem lacks the kind of vivid imagery found in “The Snow-Storm” or the kind of complex texture evident in “Hamatreya.” “Each and All” seems, finally, a poem in which Emerson states fairly plainly some of the basic elements of his transcendental philosophy—a philosophy that stresses the unity and interconnectedness of all things.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Emerson’s discussion of Plato in Representative Men, and then explain how that essay may help illuminate this poem, and vice versa. Which problem did Emerson consider the key to Plato’s entire philosophy, and how is that problem relevant to “Each and All”?
2. Read Emerson’s poem in conjunction with Whitman’s poem “There Was a Child Went Forth.” How are they similar in the assumptions they make and the ideas they express? How do they differ in form, tone, and technique?

3. How does “Each and All” define transcendentalism? Is it more effective in doing so than Emerson’s essays?

“Hamatreya” (1847)

The meaning of the title of this poem is much discussed and much disputed. Some critics think the title refers to the name of a Hindu god who warned against human pride; others think it may derive from the Greek words for “Earth-Mother”; still other critics have suggested additional possibilities. In any case, the basic meaning of the work itself is clear enough: The poem emphasizes the immortality of the earth, the mutability of humanity, and the foolishness of human claims to own or possess nature.

This splendid poem opens by listing the names of various early settlers of Concord, Massachusetts (Collected 28–29). The fact that their precise identities are presently unknown or largely forgotten is, of course, part of Emerson’s ironic point: Men who were once important landowners are now mere historical footnotes (if they are remembered at all). Emerson is not entirely dismissive of such men; he does, after all, acknowledge the real productivity of their genuine “toil” (l. 2). Nevertheless, he implicitly mocks their arrogance in lines 5 through 10, when he quotes a representative of one of these “landlords” (l. 4) at length as he declares his supposed lordship over the land he thinks he permanently possesses. Words such as mine, my, I, me, and we proliferate in these six lines, inevitably making them “smack” of egotism (l. 10). The quoted landlord regards nature almost as a domesticated, obedient “dog,” and although he claims to “sympathize” with the earth (l. 10)—and thus might expect to win Emerson’s approval—in fact he regards the land and everything on it as mere possessions and thus earns Emerson’s contempt.

After offering these six quoted lines of excited, exclamatory egotism, Emerson abruptly shifts to a new stanza and just as abruptly pricks the landlord’s balloon with four mere monosyllabic words: “Where are these men?” (l. 11). They are, he immediately answers, “asleep beneath their grounds,” but the word their suddenly seems ironic: The men who once believed they possessed the earth now lie within it, and, as if to enhance the irony, “strangers, fond [foolish] as they, their furrows plough” (l. 12). Once more the word their is double-edged: Does it refer to the previous “landlords” or to the present owners? The answer does not really matter, since the present owners will soon be as dead as the owners they succeeded. All persons who think they actually own the earth are merely “boastful boys” (l. 13)—a phrase whose alliteration mocks the immaturity it describes. And, with equal cleverness, just when Emerson mentions “the grave” (l. 15), a large gap opens in the line, violating the regular, expected pentameter design, much as the grave itself puts all our expected routines and rhythms at a sudden end.

“Hamatreya” is full of these kinds of effective local details. In lines 19 and 20, for instance, the arrogant landlords are quoted once again: “We must have clay, lime, gravel, granite-ledge, / And misty lowland, where to go for peat.” Line 19 echoes the earlier line 3: Both of them list the ways the earth can be treated simply as a source of economic productivity. The first half of line 20, then, is initially a bit of a surprise: The emphasis on “misty lowlands” seems at first to suggest an appreciation of nature’s beauty, but then the second half of the line undercuts that impression in turn: The lowlands are merely a place “to go for peat.” “Hamatreya” is a carefully crafted work, and the craftsmanship continues into its intriguing second half, when the meter, tone, diction, and syntax all shift as the earth itself begins to speak. Ambiguity is effectively used in lines 28 and 29; alliteration is skillfully employed in line 43; and lines 50 and 51 move logically from the very specific (“The lawyer”) to the more general (“the laws”) to the even more general still (“the kingdom”) as Emerson emphasizes the inevitable march of everything human into “the grave,” the poem’s appropriately final words (l. 63). Did Emerson know that the number 63 was historically associated with the “grand climacteric” and was thus linked with mortal danger? Is he, in line 63, perhaps also echoing a famous passage (ll.

30–32) from Andrew Marvell's famous poem "To His Coy Mistress"? No discovery concerning the artfulness, subtlety, or skill of "Hamatreya" would seem very surprising. Surely it is one of Emerson's most genuinely accomplished poems.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Emerson's lyric with the poem titled "Ozymandias" by Percy Bysshe Shelley. How are they similar in theme, tone, and technique? Discuss their differences in length; how is the very brevity of Shelley's poem effective? Discuss the use of multiple points of view in each poem.
2. Read Emerson's poem alongside the poem titled "Thanatopsis" by William Cullen Bryant. Discuss the tones of the two works. How are their purposes similar and/or distinct? Which is more consoling? Which is more sarcastic? What do both works suggest about the inevitability of death?
3. Why does Emerson begin his poem by listing the settlers of Concord? What effect does this have on the reader?

"The Rhodora" (1834)

In this poem—whose perhaps unnecessary subtitle is "On Being Asked, Whence Is the Flower?"—the speaker describes his encounter with a beautiful shrub, related to the rhododendron, which he found blooming in an isolated part of the woods (Collected 31). Why, he wonders, does such beauty exist where few people are likely to see or appreciate it? He responds by answering that beauty is its own justification and that the same power responsible for creating humankind and revealing the flower is also responsible for creating the flower and putting the speaker and flower together.

This work is built around a series of apparent opposites—opposites that the poem attempts to reconcile and harmonize. The opening words—"In May"—immediately suggest a peaceful springtime setting, yet the rest of the line ("when sea-winds pierced our solitudes") immediately complicates the tone. Nature (those ensuing words suggest) can sometimes be active and forceful, and indeed the whole first line sets the tone for the rest of the work by implying its main theme: the interaction and connections between nature and man. In the first line nature makes contact with man; in the second line man makes contact with nature. In the first line nature seems full of force and power; in the second line its calm pastoral beauty is emphasized. With the appearance of the verb to please in line 3, Emerson already begins to personify nature, implying that the flower, as man (and, most specifically, as the poet), desires to share its beauty. The next few lines are filled with colors, sensations, and further personification, and at the exact midpoint of the work, as the lyric shifts from its first half to its second, the speaker directly addresses the shrub as if it were not merely alive but also capable of thought.

This heavy use of personification helps prepare for the conclusion of the work, in which the speaker emphasizes the intimate bond between man and nature by stressing their common source: "The self-same Power that brought me there brought you" (l. 16). The word brought is double-edged, since it refers not only to the coming together of this speaker and this flower, but also to the creation of both as representatives of all humans and all of nature's beauty. Typically, Emerson does not explicitly identify the "Power" as God (as an earlier, more orthodox Christian poet might have); instead, he simply implies that there are a design and meaning to the universe, and that central to both is the close connection of humans and their environment. Thus the speaker addresses the flower as if it were simply another member of the family (see esp. line 11). "Beauty," the speaker memorably declares, "is its own excuse for being" (l. 12)—a declaration that justifies not only the existence of the isolated flower but also the existence of poetry itself. By the end of the poem, Emerson has linked land and sea, woods and flowers, plants and birds, profound wisdom and a deceptively "simple ignorance" (l. 15); he has linked man and nature, and, above all, the entire human and physical universe and the "Power" responsible for it all.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What are Emerson's views of the relationship between man and nature and their creator, as expressed in this poem? How (if at all) does Emerson prevent his views from seeming naïve and sentimental?
2. What does Emerson's poem have in common with William Cullen Bryant's lyric titled "The Yellow Violet"? How are they similar in theme, tone, techniques, and purpose? Is one work more effective than the other? If so, why and how? In addition, discuss Emerson's poem by comparing and contrasting it with Philip Freneau's lyric titled "The Wild Honey Suckle."

"The Snow-Storm" (1835)

The speaker describes the onset, results, and aftermath of a snowstorm, which quickly creates a world of astonishing new appearances—a world the speaker describes by using architectural metaphors. When the storm has passed, man is left to contemplate its wonderful effects and feels inspired to attempt to imitate them (however slowly and imperfectly) in architectural creations of his own.

The poem begins on a literally majestic note: The arriving snowstorm is implicitly compared to an arriving king or demigod (Collected 34). Both literally and figuratively the storm descends from above, and the first line and a half is particularly effective in the way it delays the appearance of the word snow, thus giving that noun maximal emphasis. The first five lines describe the effect of the falling snow on nature. Then, the next four describe its effects on the humans who have shut themselves inside, "enclosed" (as the speaker puts it in a nicely paradoxical phrase) "in a tumultuous privacy of storm" (l. 9; italics added). The storm disrupts normal human activity, but it thereby also promotes human intimacy and togetherness: "all friends" are "shut out," but "the housemates sit / Around a radiant fireplace" (ll. 7–9). The storm thus transforms the external landscape even as it encourages (in fact, forces) humans to renew their attentions both to each other and to nature.

Indeed, the second stanza begins by establishing an explicit bond between speaker and readers: The speaker addresses us directly ("Come see"; l. 10), as if he and we are among the "housemates" who look out and witness the storm's effects. The speaker paradoxically compares snow (soft, delicate, and ultimately impermanent) to masonry and hard white marble. The common, everyday features of a normal farm are transformed, by the snow's effects, into a kind of architectural wonderland, so that the storm becomes a symbol of the larger creative (and re-creative) powers of nature itself. Emerson, through his use of metaphors, similes, images, and other kinds of figurative language, demonstrates his own creativity—a creativity inspired by the storm whose results he so vividly describes. Fittingly, then, the poem itself exemplifies the very process it calls for and predicts in its final lines: The speaker there suggests that man, inspired by nature, will now attempt to "mimic, in slow structures, stone by stone, / Built in an age, the mad wind's night-work" (ll. 26–27). Man will thereby re-create, in a more permanent fashion, what the speaker calls (in a memorable oxymoron) "the frolic architecture of the snow" (l. 28). In the meantime, the poem itself has re-created the beauty of the storm; Emerson himself thus fulfills his prophecy even as he issues it.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the relationship between man and nature as it is depicted in this poem and in Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." How does Frost's use of snow as a symbol both resemble and/or differ from Emerson's? How are the tones and ultimate meanings of the two poems similar and/or different? Which poem is more obviously "romantic"? Which is more obviously "stoic"? Explain these distinctions.
2. How is winter imagery used in this poem? What is its effect on the reader? You might also discuss the use of sound effects.

“Merlin” (1847)

Emerson actually wrote a pair of poems with this same basic title—“Merlin I” and “Merlin II” (Collected 91–94). In both works poetry itself is the major subject, and both lyrics offer Emerson’s typically exalted view of the powers and responsibilities of the bard. In “Merlin I” Emerson calls for a kind of lofty verse that goes far beyond mere versifying; in “Merlin II” he emphasizes the complex but ultimately balanced contrarities that pervade every aspect of existence.

“Merlin I” opens by rejecting poetry that is trivial in subject matter and routine or mechanical in form; instead, he celebrates a kind of verse whose power resembles the power of nature—a kind of verse that is capable of stirring the deepest human emotions. “The kingly bard,” the speaker proclaims, “Must smite the chords rudely and hard” (ll. 9–10), and Emerson, in line 10, obviously tries to imitate rhythmically the very sort of force he praises. Great poetry will provide insights into every aspect of existence, from the natural to the human, from the earthly to the supernatural. The greatness of the poet’s art reflects (and depends on) his own greatness of character, and his transcendent thoughts allow him to rise to a heavenly height and dispense with the tired, uninspired mechanical rules of conventional verse. Through the power of his poetry he spreads joy, tames tempests, soars above common limits, and creates with almost godlike force. His sublime skill makes him almost a supernatural (and certainly in some ways a superhuman) being.

“Merlin II” begins by emphasizing once more the powers of the ideal poet, but it quickly announces its own major theme: “Balance-loving Nature / Made all things in pairs” (ll. 3–4). For many of the ensuing lines, the speaker lists example after example to illustrate this claim: Things both on and above the Earth reveal an all-pervasive balance, and this trait of the universe is found even in human thoughts and thinking. In this sense all of existence “rhymes”; symmetry is everywhere—from the shape of the human body to the generative combination of male and female. In this poem, therefore, as in so many of his other writings, Emerson emphasizes how the many combine to form the one—how each is part of a greater all. Male and female, man and nature, nature and the supernatural, creation and creator—all are part of a complex harmony. Every aspect of existence has its complementary opposite, without which it would be incomplete and unbalanced. “Merlin I” exists side by side with “Merlin II,” and the poet, more than any other mortal, is the being who celebrates the balanced harmony that underlies the whole.

For Discussion or Writing

Discuss these two poems in connection with Emerson’s own essay titled “The Poet.” What do these poems and that prose work have in common, particularly in terms of their ideas, imagery, aspirations, and tones? How does Emerson himself, in the “Merlin” poems, try to live up to the ideals announced both in the essay and in the poems themselves? To what extent does he succeed and/or fail to function, in these poems, as the kind of poet he himself celebrates?

“Concord Hymn” (1837)

This poem—also titled “Hymn: Sung at the Completion of the Concord Monument, April 19, 1836”—was written to commemorate the establishment of a permanent memorial to the Battles of Lexington and Concord, which occurred on April 19, 1775, and were crucial events in the American Revolution (Collected 125). The speaker alludes to the battles, notes that the men on both sides are long dead, but expresses the hope that the monument erected in honor of the American patriots will long endure, despite the ravages of time.

The speaker begins by mentioning the “rude” (that is, primitive or rudimentary) bridge that once stood near the battle site in Concord. This emphasis on an unsophisticated structure sets the tone for the entire piece, for Emerson wants to stress, especially in the first stanza, the fact that “common” or “ordinary” men nevertheless once performed an extraordinary deed. Just as the “rude bridge” once “arched the flood” (l. 1), so these amateur, relatively untrained soldiers—these

3. Examine two different passages from two different prose works by Emerson. Choose one passage that you consider rhetorically effective and one passage that you consider rhetorically less effective. How do you explain the differences between the two passages? What particular elements make one passage powerful and the other less powerful? Discuss such matters as imagery, word choice, sentence length, sentence structure, and figurative language.
4. Consult a number of different reference sources—including encyclopedias, dictionaries of literary terms, and The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (available online)—and read their definitions and discussions of transcendentalism. Then choose one work by Emerson and discuss the degree to which (and the ways in which) it exemplifies transcendentalist ideas.
5. Read Emerson's essay titled "The Poet," and then discuss the ways in which the essay seems relevant to several of his own poems. How does Emerson try to practice in his poems what he preaches in his essay? To what extent, and in what ways, does he succeed and/or fail?
6. Choose one of the titular topics of one of Emerson's essays—such as "Love," "Friendship," "Prudence," "Art," or "Politics,"—and then trace the appearance of that idea in the Essays as a whole. What consistencies and/or inconsistencies emerge in Emerson's various discussions of the chosen topic?
7. Choose a particular year in Emerson's adult life, and then try to track down as many different examples of Emerson's writings from that year (such as poems, essays, lectures, notes, letters) as you can find. What historical events or conditions were important during the chosen year? How do Emerson's writings from that year seem connected to those events or conditions?
8. Explore the history of Emerson's reputation. During certain eras he has been highly praised, and during other eras he has been vigorously mocked or criticized. What kinds of factors seem to have influenced the praise and criticism he has received? Should a writer's literary reputation be affected by whether a reader agrees or disagrees with the writer's ideas?
9. Read an essay (such as the one in Myerson's Historical Guide) that discusses various biographical treatments of Emerson's life. How have biographers disagreed in their basic views of Emerson? How and why are their disagreements important in affecting the ways we read Emerson's writings? Is biographical information about an author really important to an understanding of his literary works?
10. Read through Emerson's Essays and then discuss his comments about women in particular and what it means to be female in general. (For instance, does he tend to describe nature in male or female terms?) What do his comments reveal about the status of women in his own society and era? Is there any consistency to his comments? Do his comments in any way suggest or reflect changes that may have been taking place in the role of women in his time? What were his explicit views about the rights and responsibilities of women?

FANNY FERN

(SARA PAYSON WILLIS PARTON)

(1811–1872)

I want all women to render themselves independent of marriage as a mere means of support.

(New York Ledger, June 26, 1869)

In 1855 the New York Ledger broke newspaper salary records by hiring a regular columnist at the unprecedented rate of $100 per column. Surprisingly, the sum went not to a man but to the first woman newspaper columnist in the United States Sara Payson Willis Parton, who wrote under the pseudonym Fanny Fern. Fern's columns, novels, essays, and children's books established her as one of the best-known female authors, feminist voices, and social critics of the mid- to late 19th century. Her columns ran for 21 years and were the most widely reprinted of the 1850s. Her final article appeared on October 12, 1872, two days after her death.

Fern's work was both wildly popular and controversial during her lifetime. Her columns were widely read, but contemporary critics attacked her for her unfeminine frankness, for her unfavorable depictions of her family members, and for her outspokenness about social issues. Ironically, scholars in much of the 20th century attacked her for the opposite reason, often dismissing her writing as too sentimental, too domestic, and too short of serious substance. One critic called her "the grandmother of all sob sisters" (Fern, Ruth Hall x). While some of Fern's work may be classified as sentimental, she dedicated the majority of her career to condemnation of hypocrisy and discrimination against women. Fern may well have engaged in sentimental writing because it was seen as an "appropriate" genre for women and thus helped her get a foot in the door of the publishing world. Some of Fern's works that have been misread as purely sentimental, most notably her first novel, Ruth Hall, actually contain significant undertones of feminist criticism and early realism. Most recently, literary scholars have resurrected Fern's work and reestablished her reputation as an outspoken activist and satirical voice with regard to 19th-century political and social institutions. Many of her texts contain analytical observations about issues such as marriage, employment, motherhood, family, publishing, religion, law, education, women's suffrage, sexuality, class, and, most important, financial independence for women.

Born on July 9, 1811, in Portland, Maine, Sara Payson Willis was the fifth of Hannah and Nathaniel Willis's nine children. The family soon moved to Boston, where her stern Calvinist father founded the first religious newspaper in the United States, the Recorder. After an education at Catharine Beecher's Female Seminary, where she was a lively and spirited student, Sara returned to Boston, where she worked (without pay or acknowledgment) writing articles and helping edit her father's paper. In 1837 she married a banker, Charles Eldridge, and the happy union produced three daughters, Mary, Grace, and Ellen. Misfortune overturned her happy life from 1844 to 1846, when Sara experienced a series of personal tragedies: Her mother, sister, daughter Mary, and husband all died within two years. Eldridge died burdened with massive debts that left Sara and her two remaining daughters in financial ruin.

Left with no means of support, Sara married her second husband, Samuel Farrington, in 1849 at the urging of her father, but her new husband was jealous and abusive, and Sara immediately regretted marrying out of necessity rather than for love. In a move highly atypical for a mid-19th-century American woman, Sara left Farrington in 1851, incurring the wrath of her husband, his family, and her own father, who had presumed her marriage would absolve him of responsibility for her welfare. The scandal surrounding Sara's exit from the marriage caused her husband and his brother to strike back by spreading false malicious rumors about her character, although the brother later recanted. Sara's father refused to help financially, tried to bribe her by threatening to take away the children, and attempted to force her back to her husband. Farrington obtained a divorce two years later on the grounds of desertion, ironically voiding any claim he might have had on Sara's subsequent earnings as Fanny Fern.

Desperate to keep her children, Sara attempted to provide for her family on her own. After failing to secure a job as a teacher and finding seamstress work inadequate to support herself and her daughters, Sara was forced to give her former in-laws, the Eldridges, custody of Grace. In desperation, Sara began writing newspaper articles. She sought help from her brother, Nathaniel Parker (N. P.) Willis, himself a well-known writer and editor of the New York Home Journal. Despite the fact that he had helped other unknown female writers establish themselves, N. P. refused to publish his sister's work, calling it vulgar and indecent because of its candid tone. Stung by her family's rejection, Sara went to several other newspapers and finally secured her first publication; her essay "The Model Husband" appeared on June 28, 1851, in the Olive Branch. Her reputation soared, and soon papers clamored for as many articles as she could produce. After publishers began to seek out her popular articles and publish them regularly, Sara adopted the pen name Fanny Fern. The alliterative pseudonym satirized the verbose flowery language favored by female writers at the time, and Fern used it both personally and professionally from then on.

Fern's articles appeared regularly in the Boston papers Olive Branch and True Flag and were reprinted without permission by other newspapers as well. Once she had achieved a measure of fame, the publisher Oliver Dyer lured her away to New York to write for the Musical World and Times, edited by her brother, Richard Willis, at a salary twice the combined amount paid by the other two publications. The regular articles in Musical World established Fern as the first professional female columnist in the United States. Graciously, Dyer excused her from the exclusivity of their contract, and her work began to appear once again in the Olive Branch and True Flag, where circulation had dropped as a result of her departure. Fanny Fern soon became a household name and a collection of her articles, Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio, was published in 1853. The best seller was well received in both the United States and Britain. Later that same year, Fern published her children's collection, Little Ferns for Fanny's Friends; her second series of Fern Leaves followed in 1854. Fern moved to New York with her daughter Ellen in 1853, and the financial stability provided by her writing allowed her to regain custody of her daughter Grace shortly thereafter.

Fern soon put her newspaper career aside to concentrate on Ruth Hall (1854), a novel based largely on the events of her life. William Moulton, editor of the True Flag, responded to the novel's thinly veiled characterization of him with a series of articles designed to expose Fern's real identity. Moulton's attack backfired, however, when revelation of the characters' true identities piqued public interest and the book's status as a roman à clef contributed to its success. Despite notable sales figures, response to Ruth Hall was not entirely positive. Critics charged Fern with "unfeminine" conduct in her biting satire of society's indifference to the predicament of women forced to earn a living. Some saw her attacks on her father, in-laws, and brother as vicious and spiteful. Social convention dictated that a woman keep her domestic problems out of the public sphere, even in cases of grievous wrongdoing. Overall, however, Ruth Hall was a success, and Fern published the serial novella Fanny Ford in 1855. Her second novel, Rose Clark (1856), sold well but never achieved the success of her first. Fern dedicated the rest of her career to nonfiction essays and articles and wrote a regular column for the Ledger for 16 years.

Fern's personal life also took a dramatic turn around the time her career began to flourish. In 1856 she married James Parton, a young writer and editor 11 years her junior. In keeping with her belief in the importance of women's financial independence, the now-wealthy Fern insisted that Parton sign a prenuptial agreement that gave her exclusive right to her own work and any subsequent revenue. At the time, Parton was an editor at N. P. Willis's Home Journal and reprinted Fern's articles until Willis put a stop to his efforts. Parton then quit.

Fern died of breast cancer on October 10, 1872, and is buried in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Despite her dramatic personal life and its influence on her career, Fern is best understood as a tireless social critic who championed women's rights and opposed inequality and hypocrisy. Her work appealed to a wide spectrum of American society, regardless of gender or social standing. Her straightforward prose defied convention and helped change stylistic restrictions for women writers. Other interesting facts about Fern include her origination of the phrase "The way to a man's heart is through his stomach" (Warren, Fanny Fern 3), her public praise of WALT WHITMAN, and her brother N. P.'s fictionalization as "Mr. Bruce" in HARRIET JACOBS's Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl. Despite scholarly neglect for most of the 20th century, Fern has reemerged as a notable force in the arenas of journalism, literary style, and social activism.

Ruth Hall* (1854)

In Ruth Hall, a fictionalized account of Fern's first marriage and her struggles after the death of her husband, a young widow finds that society provides no opportunities for women to support themselves. Menial labor cannot pay enough to feed her children; politics and the family's fear of shame prevent her from obtaining a job as a teacher; her miserly father and cruel in-laws refuse to help her financially. Initially abused by the newspaper editors where she applies for employment, including her own brother (based on N. P. Willis), Ruth through determination and hard work eventually establishes herself as a successful newspaper columnist and gains her hard-won financial independence.

When Ruth Hall first appeared in 1854, Fern, whose true identity was soon maliciously revealed, was attacked as "unfeminine." Her unflinchingly stark portrayal of her family members led critics to accuse her of writing the novel purely for revenge. That a woman would show disloyalty to her family, even in spite of their pitiless treatment, scandalized readers. By pointing out the brutal inequities that allowed women to fall into poverty, Fern tore away the veil of delicacy that surrounded most 19th-century women's writing. Her style was straightforward, and her criticisms were overt and specific. In addition, her presentation of religious hypocrisy generated charges of sacrilege. Fern's gender made Ruth Hall unforgivable for its outspokenness and satirical edge. One critic went so far as to say, "If Fanny Fern were a man . . . Ruth Hall would be a natural and excusable book. But we confess that we cannot understand how a delicate, suffering woman can hunt down even her persecutors so remorselessly. We cannot think so highly of [such] an author's womanly gentleness" (Fern, Ruth Hall ix). While male authors were praised for self-reliant heroes who fought on the side of justice and fair play, Fern was simultaneously condemned for her heroine's indelicacy and lack of submissiveness. Initial reception of her work denounced her for behaving in a manner unsuitable for a woman. Ironically, however, for most of the 20th century critics dismissed Ruth Hall on the contradictory grounds of being "too flowery" and tearfully maudlin. Contemporary critics now acknowledge the tension between these two points of view as one of the defining strategies of the text.

Ruth Hall begins where many traditional novels end, with a marriage. However, rather than offering marriage as the solution to all women's problems, Fern illustrates how even a loving marriage cannot provide complete security. The night before her wedding finds Ruth wondering whether marriage will truly make her content, opening the door for possible critique. Despite a loving husband, Ruth's jealous and disapproving new in-laws make her married life difficult. Their indifference and hypocrisy contribute to the death of her first child, and they leave her destitute when her husband, Harry, dies. Notably, at the point most narratives end and the characters live "happily ever after," Ruth's troubles are just beginning.

Fern's novel criticizes the inequities of marriage as a social institution by showcasing a wide array of marriages, almost none of which offers a rewarding condition for women. Ruth's happy marriage is marred by her in-laws' interference and cut short by her husband's unexpected death and business debts. Her own mother is dead, and her father shows little affection or concern for her welfare. Her in-laws lead a dour, colorless life and bicker constantly. Ruth's friend, Mary Leon, who has married for financial stability, is treated as nothing more than a decorative object by her husband. When he tires of Mary, her husband commits her to an insane asylum, where she dies alone. The working-class Mrs. Skiddy is deserted when her husband runs off to California. Her comic reply to his request to return home is "N-e-v-e-r." In each of these cases, Fern undermines the sanctity of marriage and reveals the ways in which, both legally and socially, marriage denies women autonomy. In a final twist, the end of the novel subverts conventional 19th-century expectations when a scene with a fire and handsome fireman ends not with the death of the unconventional heroine or romance, but with Ruth's daring escape and platonic friendship with her rescuer. These harsh depictions of marriage illustrate the importance of women's individual and economic liberty, a prominent theme in Ruth Hall and many of Fern's works.

Among the institutions Fern holds accountable for second-class treatment of woman is the publishing and print industry. Her thinly disguised characterizations of well-known editors, especially Hyacinth Ellet, whom she based on her brother, N. P. Willis, satirize the impersonal and cutthroat publishing world. Furthermore, Ruth Hall shows the industry's inherent sexism as newsrooms were solely man's domain and editors routinely paid female writers less than their male counterparts.

Ruth Hall also proves significant in terms of stylistic technique. The structure of Fern's chapters, the change in tone after Ruth's husband dies, and the use of plain vernacular diction set this novel apart from other examples of supposed sentimentality. The critic Joyce Warren argues, "The tone of the novel shifts constantly and suddenly; each description of Ruth's earlier happiness is immediately undercut by a satirical scene portraying the other characters' sour comments or unfeeling behavior" (Fern, Ruth Hall xxvii). Scenes of domestic bliss are followed by examples of cruelty and hypocrisy, and Ruth's overblown romantic rhetoric found early in the novel transforms into concise and straightforward syntax and diction as her circumstances change. This shift reflects both Ruth's disillusionment at her ever-worsening situation and the increased use of a terse journalistic form of prose realism.

Despite the fact that Ruth Hall was seen by some readers as "monstrous" and "unwomanly" (Walker 51), Fern's novel sold well. Her unconventionally assertive heroine and straightforward, conversational writing style appealed to a wide audience and gave her a platform from which to discuss gender inequality. Ruth Hall's unflinching look at the social and economic predicament of women and children in the middle of the 19th century paved the way for an increasingly open dialogue concerning women's self-sufficiency, work, and fundamental civic and individual rights. As a result of increasing scholarly interest, the novel was republished by Rutgers University Press in 1986.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Look up the literary term sentimentalism. Which portions of Ruth Hall seem sentimental? How, specifically, does the novel conform to or deviate from the conventions of sentimentality?

2. What is Ruth's attitude toward religion? Point to specific passages where you see her beliefs expressed. How many different religious attitudes does Fern present and in what characters? Which model does she appear to endorse and why?
3. Consider the structure of the chapters in Ruth Hall. Look at several consecutive chapters and choose two you believe engage in a dialogue with each other. How are the issues in one chapter juxtaposed with those in the other? How do you read one chapter differently in light of the other? What is the effect of placing these two scenes together?
4. NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, who infamously called most female writers of the 19th-century a "damned mob of scribbling women," admired Fern's work for its outspokenness. Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter involves a woman, Hester Prynne, who, as does Ruth Hall, transgresses the boundaries of social convention. Do a comparative study of these two characters.

Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio* (1853)

After her enormous success as a newspaper columnist, Derby and Miller Publishers approached Fern about collecting her work in a book. The published text, Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio, contains more than 100 articles, some previously published and some new, on topics such as marriage, motherhood, and religion. In the preface Fern explains that she "never had the slightest intention of writing a book" and that she wishes the "leaves" she presents in the volume were "worthier of your regard." Though such humble and self-effacing explanations were typical of 19th-century writers, women relied on them to a greater extent than male authors in an attempt to show their femininity alongside the public, and therefore more masculine, act of publishing a book. Most of Fern's early columns center on family life, the everyday interests of women, and the sorts of misfortunes Fern encountered in her personal life, mainly widowhood and the death of a child.

Although its subject matter is largely domestic, Fern Leaves does approach some social and economic issues as well. In "A Practical Blue-Stocking" Fern sets out to correct the stereotype of a literary woman, or "blue-stocking," as a slovenly person who neglects her appearance, housekeeping, and family in order to write. Fern turns the male narrator's expectations upside down when he arrives at the home of a friend to find a beautiful "blue-stocking" wife and an immaculate house. Seeing he is surprised, the husband then describes how his wife's writing saved the family when they encountered difficult financial times. Similarly, "A Chapter on Literary Women" finds a bachelor who laments that "these literary women live on public admiration—glory in seeing themselves in print . . . [they] are a sort of nondescript monsters; nothing feminine about them" (176–177). By the end of the tale the bachelor has unknowingly fallen for a well-known female writer and renounces his earlier opinion, saying, "A woman may be literary, and yet feminine and lovable" (179). Fern argues here that women who write benefit rather than harm family stability.

Along with women's writing as a profession, Fern tackles class and economic issues associated with widowhood. In "Thanksgiving Story," one of her more sentimental pieces, two young impoverished girls reminisce about the Thanksgiving Day that took place before their father's death when they feasted with the extended family that has now deserted them. Their mother, sitting in the next room, hears them, and "the simple recital found but too sad an echo in that widowed heart" (60). Many entries, such as "The Widow's Trials," "Summer Days," and "The Wail of a Broken Heart," comment on the devastating effects of widowhood on women and children. Still other entries attack the same issue with a satirical tone. "The Model Widower" begins to think of wife number two immediately after the death of number one and "marries a playmate for his oldest daughter" (323). Clearly this "model" is not to be emulated but instead represents the gender inequity typically found after the death of a spouse when a husband could remarry a younger woman with ease but a wife might be left without financial support.

Though Fern takes on some difficult subjects in these entries, the editors of this first collection included a disproportionate amount of Fern's more sentimental columns rather than her satirical and overtly controversial works. Although Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio has not been reprinted since its original publication in 1853, the full text is available online and several individual entries have been collected in literary anthologies.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In her preface to Fern Leaves the author notes, "If the reader will imagine me peeping over his shoulder, quite happy should he pay me the impromptu compliment of a smile or a tear, it is possible we may come to a good understanding by the time the book shall have been perused." What sort of understanding do you think she means? What kind of reaction does she want from the reader and why? What do you make of the fact that the reader is referred to as "he" instead of "she"?
2. Look at several entries about marriage. What are the messages Fern tries to convey in these pieces, and how does her tone vary from piece to piece? Which do you think has the most effective tone and why?

Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio, Second Series* (1854)

The popular first series of Fern Leaves was quickly followed by a second series in the following year. As does the first, it contains both previously published and newly composed entries. Although Fern treats many of the same issues presented in the first series, the second moves from domestic matters to more expansive social and economic concerns. The tone is less cautious and subtle and more satirical and cynical. As her career progressed, Fern became increasingly outspoken and sardonic in her critique of social injustice.

Perhaps Fern's most famous work is "Apollo Hyacinth," a sharp indictment of a dandyish writer whose selfishness and hypocrisy lead him to associate only with those who can further his social position. Because Apollo Hyacinth considers himself a gentleman of fine breeding, he "never says an uncivil thing" (382). But, Fern skewers his character, noting his "sins of omission" as he avoids the troubles of others and feigns ignorance after the fact, thus not sully his reputation by neglecting his family and friends. William Moulton's exposure of Sara Parton as Fanny Fern revealed the true identity of Apollo Hyacinth to be Fern's brother N. P. Willis. Fern's portrait of the indifferent and self-absorbed character lurking under her brother's elegant exterior satirizes those who appear cultured and refined but in reality lack "moral excellence."

The second series also contains more direct criticisms of an unfeeling social hierarchy that allows citizens to fall into hopeless and desperate poverty. In "Dollars and Dimes" Fern notes, "An empty pocket is the worst of crimes" and mockingly reflects that without money one will not be well received by "good people" (212). She also indicts capitalism for causing a moral decline in those who attempt to climb to the top of the financial ladder. "Our Street" sympathetically describes the honest working-class men and women, starving homeless people, and child laborers of New York who walk among its more gentrified residents.

Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio, Second Series has been republished twice, first in Ayer Publishing's American Fiction Reprint Series (1971) and then in the Michigan Historical Reprint Series (2005). In addition, the full texts of both series are available online from several sources.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider the ethics involved in exposing the faults and flaws of a friend or family member as Fern does in "Apollo Hyacinth." When is it appropriate to condemn that person publicly for undesirable behavior? When is it not?
2. Several articles in the series illustrate the despair and misery of poverty. Does Fern identify the causes of such financial hardship? If so, what are they? Does she offer any solutions?

“Hints to Young Wives” (1852)

“Hints to Young Wives” begins with Fern’s saying she would like to take all conduct books written for married women, which generally encourage them to be submissive and excel at housekeeping, and throw them on a bonfire along with the authors. The article describes a fictionalized “poor little innocent fool” (2,102) whose fawning, servile behavior toward her husband does nothing but earn his contempt since he knows he has her unwavering devotion. Fern suggests that the husband who does not turn tyrant with such treatment is rare. To illustrate this point Fern relates an incident when she is mending “Mr. Fern’s” coat and finds a love letter in his pocket, proof that obsequious behavior will cause a man to lose interest. While most 19th-century advice book authors emphasize the importance of homemaking and the supportive role of the wife toward her husband, Fern counsels quite the opposite. Not only does she warn that subservient behavior will harm the wife, leaving her with chattering teeth and a dislocated wrist, but she places responsibility for men’s dismissal of their wives partially on the wives’ ill-informed behavior. The marital power dynamic clearly demands that a woman maintain autonomy so her husband will not “turn on his heel and march off whistling ‘Yankee Doodle’” (2,102). An inequitable relationship, it seems, draws out the worst in all parties.

Further, Fern’s tone assumes an intimacy with the reader as she confesses her own failings in marriage, such as her willingness to drop everything to mend her husband’s coat, despite a “crucifying headache.” The anecdote establishes a conversational familiarity with the reader as well as Fern’s authority and credibility with regard to the subject. Similarly, vernacular phrases such as “them’s my sentiments” and “fiddlesticks” make the author’s persona seem approachable, more like a regular woman with common problems than a celebrated author.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What portions of “Hints to Young Wives” might have been perceived as scandalous at the time of its publication? What does Fern mean when she advises the woman whose husband treats her as a housekeeper to “fill that place and no other” (2,102)?
2. Given that Fanny Fern is a pseudonym, what do you make of the fact that she relates an incident about “Mr. Fern” that puts him in an unflattering light?
3. Fern writes that when she found her husband’s letter, “I dropped the coat, I dropped the workbasket, I dropped the buttons, I dropped the baby” (2,102) and then looked at herself in the mirror and warned herself not to be a fool again. How might you read this passage symbolically?

“Independence” (1859)

“Independence” begins on the Fourth of July with Fern’s protesting, “I don’t feel patriotic” and declaring that although the United States promotes individual freedom, “as a woman, I shouldn’t know it” (2,107). She goes on to posit that “some orator” must have told her of her freedom, implying that while liberty is an admirable idealistic goal of American democracy, the possession of such independence for women is an illusion. She then asks a series of rhetorical questions such as “Can I go out of an evening without a hat at my side?” and “Can I be a Senator?” the obvious answer to all of which is no. She ends by griping, “Free! Humph!” (2,107).

Fern’s analysis of women’s roles here concentrates primarily on appearances in the public, rather than the domestic, sphere. Questions regarding what she cannot do are based on society’s expectations of her performance on the street, at a lecture, on a bus, and in politics or other public spaces. Her argument equates freedom and patriotism with participation in a public arena where she may openly acknowledge her opinions and rely on herself, as opposed to male guardianship. “Independence” ends by implicating the reader in Fern’s complaints, stating, “Can I even be President? Bah—you know I can’t” (2,107). By assuming the reader’s agreement with her statement, Fern reveals what she intimates her reader already knows: the truth of her grounds for feeling less than patriotic on Independence Day.

women today? How do we see these issues in modern society? Which 19th-century problems are no longer challenges today? Which continue to perpetuate inequitable gender roles?

2. Fern was not the only 19th-century woman writer concerned with social issues. Look at another female nonfiction writer from that period (for example, MARGARET FULLER or LYDIA MARIA CHILD) and compare her work with one or two of Fern's articles in terms of style and content.
3. Humor is an important part of satire. Where does humor come into play in Fern's writing? To what effect is humor used? Where is it most often employed (in relation to what subjects)?
4. Research the "cult of true womanhood" or "cult of domesticity" as it pertains to gender roles in the 19th century. How does Fern's work adhere to or defy the "cult's" expectations that women be pious (religious), domestic, sexually pure, and submissive?

MARY ELEANOR WILKINS FREEMAN

She felt like a queen who, after fearing lest her domain be wrested away from her, sees it firmly insured in her possession.

("A New England Nun")

Mary Eleanor Wilkins Freeman was one of the most popular and successful women authors of late 19th-century United States. Although she wrote poems, plays, children's fiction, novels, and essays as well, Freeman is best known as a writer of regional or local color stories that feature dialect, detailed descriptions of authentic regional details, and a realistic depiction of relationships in small rural communities. A type of fiction that grew in popularity after the Civil War, local color fiction reflected the public's growing interest in all regions of the United States, along with an increasing awareness of the ways in which industrialism, immigration, the expansion of railroads, westward migration, and the rise of urban centers such as New York and Chicago were changing the customs of small, isolated communities. As other local color writers did, Freeman sought to capture the flavor of the small villages of rural New England. Instead of glorifying the settings and people of New England, however, Freeman tried to present them realistically by showing their intolerance and rigid ways of thinking as well as their kindness toward each other. In the 40 years between her earliest and last collections of stories, A Humble Romance and Other Stories (1887) and The Best Stories of Mary E. Wilkins (1927), Freeman became for many readers a truthful recorder of the hard lives of New England's isolated rural communities.

Mary Ella Wilkins was born on October 31, 1852, to Eleanor Lothrop and Warren Wilkins in Randolph, Massachusetts, a small mill town only 14 miles from Boston. (Mary later changed her middle name to Eleanor, to honor her mother.) Both parents were descended from families who had lived in Massachusetts for many generations, but business reversals when Mary was 15 prompted Warren Wilkins, a carpenter, to move the family to Brattleboro, Vermont, where she attended high school. In 1870 she entered Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, but as had EMILY DICKINSON, who had attended the school in 1847, she stayed only one year. At age 21 she met and fell in love with a navy ensign, Hanson Tyler, and although her affections were not reciprocated, this experience of unrequited love colored her depiction of similar feelings in her later fiction, according to the critic Perry Westbrook. During this period, Mary had also begun to write poetry, some of which appeared in the children's magazines Wide Awake and St. Nicholas, and by 1886 she had published three books of literature for children. (She published under the name Mary E. Wilkins until her marriage in 1902.) Her career as a major writer of local color fiction began with the publication of "Two Old Lovers" in Harper's Bazaar in 1884, but, as Freeman later recalled, the story was nearly rejected when Louise Booth, the editor, mistook her handwriting for that of a child. Since by this time her mother, younger sister, and father had died, Mary returned to Randolph and moved in with her childhood friend Mary Wales and her family, an arrangement that for the next 20 years allowed Mary time and space to write.

"Two Old Lovers" was quickly followed by other stories published in Harper's Bazaar, Harper's New Monthly Magazine, and other major outlets. Reprinted in A Humble Romance and Other Stories, "Two Old Lovers" tells of an elderly couple who spent years "keeping company" because the man was too bashful to propose, one of many Freeman stories that depicted long courtships and delayed marriages. Among others included in the same collection are several that feature what would become her trademark characters and themes: the rigidity of the New England conscience, influenced by its Puritan heritage; the limited choices available to the rural poor; the moral conflicts raised and hypocrisies exposed by the attempts of characters to find a place for themselves in a harsh environment; and the endurance, courage, and resourcefulness of characters confronted with those choices. Freeman became especially renowned for her portrayals of what were called at the time "old maids" or "spinsters," single women who supported themselves, often by sewing and working in the houses of others, yet were not accorded the respect due to married women. A later collection, often considered Freeman's finest, is A New England Nun and Other Stories (1891); in addition to the title story, it includes such tales as "A Church Mouse," in which the impoverished elderly woman Hetty Fifield barricades herself inside a church and defies the community of churchgoers, who claim that they can find no place to give her food or shelter. A similar act of defiance is the subject of "A Village Singer": The title character, Candace Whitcomb, is dismissed from the choir because she is too old; stung by the loss of status and community that this represents, she sings so loudly in her house beside the church that services are disrupted. "The Poetess," another story in the collection, likewise shows a woman artist discarded by her community. Betsey Dole, a spinster, writes sentimental poems that console grieving parents for the deaths of their children, yet when a new minister informs her that her poetry is "jest as poor as it could be" (115), she submits to his evaluation of it and burns her poems.

By the late 1890s and early 1900s Freeman's personal life and her fiction had taken different directions. Her career was thriving: Her local color fiction had been favorably reviewed by the critic WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS and others, and given the critical praise she had received, she ventured into writing different kinds of fiction as well as the stories that had made her famous. In Silence and Other Stories (1898) Freeman took her subjects from history, featuring tales of the New England past. Her next work, The Heart's Highway (1900), again drew on history, this time a story of old Virginia. She had begun moving in this direction with Giles Corey, Yeoman (1893), a closet drama (a play meant to be read rather than performed) that she based on the actual Giles Corey, a Salem resident who was pressed to death when he refused to speak after being accused as a witch during the 1692 witch trials. Almost as stubborn are the characters in Freeman's first novel, Pembroke (1894). Based on a real incident in her mother's family (Westbrook 70), the novel, according to Freeman, is "a study of the human will . . . in different phases of disease and abnormal development" (Westbrook 72). As in "Two Old Lovers," in Pembroke the courtship of Barnabas Thayer and Charlotte Barnard fails to result in marriage for many years. During the course of an evening's visit Barnabas Thayer quarrels with Charlotte's father, Cephas, and refuses to set foot in the house again despite his love for her, initiating a state of separation that continues until it is nearly too late. Jerome, a Poor Man (1897) likewise depicted the consequences of sticking to one's irrational vow, in this case, Jerome's promise to give away $25,000 if he ever should receive it, as he does despite his own poverty. Other novels addressed more contemporary concerns; for example, The Portion of Labor (1901) features social issues such as women's education and a labor strike in a mill town, and Madelon (1896) places its mixed-race heroine in a plot filled with passion and violence.

After 1900 a change in Freeman's personal circumstances contributed to changes in her writing. On January 1, 1902, after an on-again, off-again five years' engagement, Mary Wilkins married Dr. Charles Manning Freeman and moved to his home in Metuchen, New Jersey. Although Freeman joked that she was happy to be married after depicting so many old maids, the marriage was by all accounts unhappy, in part because of Dr. Freeman's alcoholism and later addiction to drugs, which led to his commitment to a mental institution and the couple's separation in 1922. Equally serious is the pressure that Mary felt, from Dr. Freeman especially, to make more and more money with her writing. As Leah Blatt Glasser comments, "When Charles saw Mary baking a cake in the kitchen, he was quick to object: 'Making a cake when the same time would produce a story worth five hundred!'" (174). She had always been unusually productive: Westbrook quotes one source as saying that she kept two typewriters, each with a different manuscript in progress, and worked on one when she hit a difficult passage in the other; in this way, she could "turn out seven thousand words a day" (110). Yet, despite some fine work published after 1902, critics have agreed that the overall quality of Freeman's work suffered under such pressure. Among the best works written after her marriage is The Shoulders of Atlas (1907), which also relieved some of the financial pressure she felt. The novel was written in response to a widely publicized Anglo-American literary contest sponsored in 1907 by the New York Herald in which Freeman wrote a realistic New England novel and the British author Max Pemberton wrote an English romance; readers voted in droves for Freeman's novel, and she won $5,000.

During this period, Freeman also ventured into mystical and supernatural fiction. As she later wrote to the critic Fred Lewis Pattee, she had earlier wanted "more symbolism, more mysticism" in her fiction but "left that out" because "it struck [her] that people did not want it" (Kendrick 382). Freeman's mysticism was sometimes spiritual, as in By the Light of the Soul (1906), and sometimes symbolic, as in Six Trees (1903) or Understudies (1901), in which human beings are linked symbolically to plants and animals. The Wind in the Rose-Bush and Other Stories of the Supernatural (1903) explores this mysticism in the form of some of Freeman's most memorable ghost stories, including "Luella Miller" and "The Lost Ghost," in which the supernatural elements are used to explore issues of community and family relationships. Among the best of Freeman's later stories is "Old Woman Magoun" (1905), a disturbing tale about a grandmother's love for her barely adolescent granddaughter, Lily. When the two walk to town and are confronted by rowdy men, including Lily's dissolute father, Barry, Mrs. Magoun fears for Lily's safety, a fear seen as justified when Barry threatens to give her to one of his friends to pay a gambling debt. On a later walk home Mrs. Magoun remains silent as Lily innocently eats the deadly berries of the nightshade plant, preferring death for her granddaughter to the degradation that would befall her at her father's hands. Another unusual story is Freeman's contribution to the composite novel (a novel written by several authors) The Whole Family, a story about a courtship in which each author was to write a chapter based on one of the novel's characters. Given her special affinity for writing about "old maids," Freeman was assigned the character of the maiden aunt to the newly engaged girl, but she upset the editor's expectations and changed the direction of the novel when she made the aunt—who was, she reasoned, still attractive in her early thirties—a flirt and a rival for her niece's fiancé's affections.

The last few decades of Freeman's life contained both personal difficulties and professional recognition. Her final novels include The Yates Pride (1912), in which the heroine, as do so many in Freeman's early fiction, tries to conceal her poverty out of a sense of pride, and The Alabaster Box (1917), which recounts the cruelty of a small town toward an embezzling banker. Freeman returned to her old subjects in her short stories, too, writing about children in The Copy-Cat and Other Stories (1914) and about interconnected characters in a small village in Edgewater People (1918). Yet, her personal life grew difficult when Dr. Freeman voluntarily entered the New Jersey State Hospital for the Insane in 1920, escaped, and in 1921 was involuntarily committed; released in 1922 and separated from Freeman, he lived with his male secretary until his death on March 7, 1923. He had left all his money to his family and his secretary, leaving Freeman only a token one dollar, a circumstance that forced her to contest the will, as she did successfully. Her professional life was happier: On April 23, 1926, she was honored by being the American Academy of Letters' first recipient of the Howells Medal for fiction, an award given to her by her old friend and fellow local color writer Hamlin Garland. After several months of poor health, she died of a heart attack on March 13, 1930, and was buried in Metuchen.

With the advent of modernist writers such as Ernest Hemingway and F. Scott Fitzgerald, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman began to be considered an old-fashioned writer by the 1920s, and her work was little read in later decades. Notable work on her fiction from the 1930s through the 1960s includes Perry Westbrook's Acres of Flint: Sarah Orne Jewett and Her Contemporaries (1951; second edition 1981) and Edward Foster's biography Mary E. Wilkins Freeman (1956). In the 1970s and 1980s the revival of Freeman's works began in earnest with The Revolt of Mother and Other Stories (1974) and the feminist scholar Marjorie Pryse's edition The Selected Stories of Mary E. Wilkins Freeman (1983), both collections of stories that emphasized Freeman's independent female characters. From the 1980s through the present Freeman's work has been the subject of numerous critical studies, especially those that pair her with the New England writer with whom she was often paired during her lifetime, SARAH ORNE JEWETT.

"A New England Nun" (1891)

"A New England Nun," the tale of Louisa Ellis and her choice to live alone rather than marry her longtime suitor, is one of Freeman's finest stories. First published in A New England Nun and Other Stories (1891), it features several characteristics of Freeman's best fiction: an ethically complex situation in which the character must choose one of two imperfect solutions; an independent unmarried woman who weighs the benefits of marriage against the potential loss of her independence; detailed descriptions of the story's setting in the circumscribed space of a house, garden, and village; and an intrusion by a representative of the larger world beyond this peaceful space who threatens its existence by bringing with him the social expectations of the outside world.

The story opens with a vision of peace and order: In the late afternoon sunlight, amid an idealized country landscape reminiscent of Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," Louisa Ellis slowly and deliberately puts on her hat, ties on her apron, picks currants for her tea, and strips the currants from their stems, "collecting the stems carefully in her apron . . . [and] look[ing] sharply at the grass beside the step to see if any had fallen there" (Reichardt 39). With these few brief strokes, Freeman establishes the life that Louisa has chosen to lead. The late afternoon setting symbolizes Louisa's age: As a woman in her early thirties, she is an "old maid" by the village's reckoning. Moreover, established rituals govern all her movements, and the care she takes to shield herself from nature by donning hat and apron—as the reader learns later, she is wearing two other aprons underneath, making this the third covering that protects her against the world—is matched by her conscientiousness in cleaning the natural setting as she would her house by picking up the currant stems. Louisa's sense of being "a guest to her own self" (39) is also established in the first few paragraphs as she carefully arranges the materials for her supper of light biscuits and currants, served in her best china cup and saucer and placed on a white linen cloth. What Freeman establishes prior to the main action of the story is that Louisa is no ordinary dissatisfied old maid, content to give the best part of her life to others and to keep the crumbs for herself; rather, by describing the way in which Louisa treats herself as her own guest, the story shows her contentment with the life she has made for herself. Louisa, like HENRY DAVID THOREAU at Walden Pond, is a community of one.

Given such perfect order, it is inevitable that the source of the story's major conflict will soon appear, and indeed it does in the person of Joe Dagget, Louisa's fiancé, who had gone to Australia for 15 years to make his fortune and has now returned to marry her. Freeman establishes Joe's unsuit-ability for Louisa through a series of contrasts: He “seemed to fill up the whole room” (40) and upsets the order of two books on her table. When Louisa replaces them in her precise way, placing the gift book on top and the album underneath, Joe asks, “Now what difference did it make which book was on top?” (41). The detailed descriptions of Louisa’s actions have initially convinced the reader to see her actions as reasonable, even admirable, but Joe’s question is a fair one, and it invites the reader to take a new perspective. Viewed logically, from the position of the outside world, there is no reason why such a precise positioning of the books is necessary, yet in Louisa’s world, where her preferences do matter, replacing the books is a natural action. But, Louisa’s housekeeping rises to the level of artistry, for she has “the enthusiasm of an artist over the mere order and cleanliness of her solitary home” (45) and distills flowers and herbs into essences purely for pleasure. To give up her rituals is to give up her art. The story’s conflict thus lies in Louisa’s need to choose between these two worlds: her own, where daily rituals help to obscure the passage of time, and the world of change beyond her doorstep, where larger and time-bound rituals such as birth, marriage, and death take precedence over individual preferences.

In addition to making Joe Dagget a representative of this world of change, Freeman uses animal and architectural imagery to symbolize Louisa’s state of mind. Her usually placid and happy canary awakens and flutters madly in its cage when Joe enters the room, a symbol of the ways in which her caged emotions awaken in alarm at his presence. Louisa also has a dog, Caesar, a mild-mannered creature who despite his imposing name has been kept chained in a little hut for 14 years after once biting a neighbor. Louisa feeds him only corn cakes lest meat inflame his “dangerous temper” (46), but Joe declares that he will set Caesar free. Freeman makes explicit the connection between Louisa’s concerns about Caesar and her fear of passion and sexuality: When Louisa “looked at the old dog . . . she thought of her approaching marriage and trembled” (46). She fears that Joe might set free not only Caesar, but, as Freeman suggests, her own repressed emotions. In addition, the story abounds with references that contrast inside and outside. Louisa prefers to look at life through a glass window that separates her from others, and both the canary and Caesar are encased in structures that keep them in check. Feeling like a bear in a china shop, Joe can only be an intruder when he enters Louisa’s house and, symbolically, the self that her house represents. In addition, Joe’s muddy shoes and rough ways will disturb the housekeeping that represents her artistic vision. Yet, she sees no way out of her dilemma, for having promised to marry Joe, she cannot think of a good reason to refuse to do so.

Significantly, when Louisa does venture into the world beyond her doorstep, she finds a solution to her problem. Walking one night under a full moon, she sits near a wall where the disorder of nature runs rampant in the form of fruitful vegetation such as wild cherry trees and old grapevines, a contrast to her carefully distilled and bottled natural essences. She then hears Joe Dagget and Lily Dyer, a “tall and full-figured” girl from the village, profess love for each other—a natural courtship, in contrast to her and Joe’s artificial one motivated by a sense of duty. After Joe declares to Lily that he must marry Louisa despite his feelings, Louisa returns home and breaks the engagement the next day. Freeman presents this decision in a manner that allows multiple interpretations:

Louisa, all alone by herself that night, wept a little, she hardly knew why; but the next morning, on waking, she felt like a queen who, after fearing lest her domain be wrested away from her, sees it firmly insured in her possession. . . . That afternoon she sat with her needle-work at the window, and felt fairly steeped in peace. . . . If Louisa Ellis had sold her birthright she did not know it, the taste of the pottage was so delicious. Serenity and placid narrowness had become to her as the birthright itself. She gazed ahead through a long reach of future days strung together like pearls in a rosary, every one like the others, and all smooth and flawless and innocent, and her heart went up in thankfulness. Outside was the fervid summer afternoon; the air was filled with the sounds of the busy harvest of men and birds and bees; there were halloos, metallic clatterings, sweet calls, and long hummings. Louisa sat, prayerfully numbering her days, like an uncloistered nun. (49)

This passage emphasizes a significant theme in the story. Louisa is once again safely inside her house, shut away from the noisy world of “men and birds and bees,” the “birds and bees” suggesting once again sexuality and Louisa’s relief at not having to confront it, an idea reiterated through the image of Louisa as a nun.

The ending of the story has spurred some disagreement, primarily due to its other religious reference to the “mess of pottage.” This story appears in Genesis (25:29–34), in which Esau, the older twin of Jacob, returns home hungry from hunting and asks for pottage, a kind of red lentil stew. Jacob replies that he will give Esau the stew in exchange for his birthright, the father’s blessing traditionally given to the eldest son. Esau “sold his birthright unto Jacob,” an action often used to signify the selling of something valuable for a trivial or spur-of-the-moment impulse. Louisa’s “birthright” is to be married, yet she values the unchanging, if earth-bound, luxury of keeping her own house instead of marrying and having children, savoring the pottage of everyday life rather than the continuity of generations that is her birthright. Although some have interpreted the “mess of pottage” to mean that Louisa has given up a more valuable life for a narrow life of sexual repression, most critics, including feminist critics, see her choice as a positive if unconventional one for the time. In this reading Louisa, by remaining a “guest to her own self,” makes a conscious choice to live the life she would like to lead as an independent woman and never missing the life of marriage and children that 19th-century norms agreed was essential for a woman’s happiness.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Louisa is not the only woman pictured in the story: Joe’s mother and Lily Dyer are also significant characters. Discuss the ways in which they affect the plot, especially the ways in which Lily is portrayed as a contrast to Louisa.
2. How does the relationship between Joe and Louisa differ from the relationship between Joe and Lily?
3. Do you think that this story has a happy ending? Did Louisa make the right choice, or will she regret settling for such a narrow way of life? What evidence in the story would support your position?
4. In what ways does the Louisa Ellis character in “A New England Nun” resemble the New England women Emily Dickinson describes in her poem “What Soft—Cherubic Creatures—”? How are both Freeman and Dickinson attempting to point out dangers women face when they subscribe blindly to social expectations?

“The Revolt of ‘Mother’” (1890)

“The Revolt of ‘Mother’” is another of Freeman’s best-known and most frequently anthologized stories. It was first published in 1890 in Harper’s Bazaar, later appeared in A New England Nun and Other Stories, and was the story that reintroduced Freeman to a new audience in the Feminist Press edition The Revolt of Mother and Other Stories in 1974, which helped to foster the revival of critical interest in Freeman. “The Revolt of ‘Mother’” fits the pattern identified by Mary Reichardt in her introduction to A Mary Wilkins Freeman Reader:

Freeman’s protagonists are frequently those most trapped by social or religious customs, by circumstance, or in constricting relationships—women, the elderly, the impoverished, the outcast. Of the sixty-nine stories written between 1882 and 1891, the majority involve women protagonists who must resort to some unexpected or even extreme behavior in order to preserve self-respect. (ix–x)

Sarah Penn, the protagonist, fits several of the criteria that Reichardt defines: She is a woman in her late fifties or early sixties; her life is somewhat impoverished, though more through her husband's choices than through her own actions; she lives in an environment in which religious doctrines determine a woman's place; and she takes an unexpected action to resolve her problem. As if to emphasize the ways in which Sarah Penn's voice has been silenced by her culture, the story begins with Sarah's questioning of her husband Adoniram's actions:

"Father!"
 "What is it?"
 "What are them men diggin' over there in the field for?"

Adoniram refuses to answer at first, finally telling her in a growl to "go into the house an' ten' to your own affairs" (Reichardt 121). The house is her domain, he implies, and the barn is his, a division that echoes the 19th-century idea of separate spheres, which meant that women belonged in the private sphere of the home and men in the public sphere of the marketplace.

But, Sarah will not be silenced: She refuses to retreat to her own sphere until he explains to her the business of his: "I ain't goin' into the house till you tell me what them men are doin' over there in the field" (121). Quite literally, she stands her ground, "as immovable to him as one of the rocks in his pasture-land" (122), until Adoniram concedes that the men are digging a cellar for a new barn where he had promised to build her a house, 40 years earlier. In this emphasis on voice and territory Freeman undercuts the idea that the space and language of the domestic and public sphere are entirely separate. Sarah knows, as she must, how to read Adoniram's silences and growls if she is to function in her own sphere, and his building of the new barn on a plot of land reserved for her house is an encroachment of the marketplace into her private sphere of the home—the obliteration of it, in fact. To add insult to injury, Sarah finds that her son, Sammy, has known about the barn all along but, like his father, is reluctant to discuss it with her. The lines of communication and partnership thus fall within gender boundaries, with men sharing their plans only with other males and refusing to discuss them with women. Worse still are the denial of the marriage partnership and subversion of the natural lines of authority within the family, for in confiding in Sammy, Adoniram has undercut his wife's authority with her own son, placing himself in partnership with Sammy instead of with the woman who is supposed to be his wife and helpmate.

Yet, Sarah does not rebel immediately, as a modern woman might, for she understands and largely accepts that her position is to be subordinate to her husband. This is shown in Sarah's conversation with her daughter, Nanny, who voices Sarah's objection of a few minutes before:

"Mother, don't you think it's too bad father's going to build that new barn, much as we need a decent house to live in?"

Her mother scrubbed a dish fiercely. "You ain't found out yet we're women-folks, Nanny Penn," said she. . . . "One of these days you'll find it out, an' then you'll know that we know only what men-folks think we do, so far as any use of it goes, an' how we'd ought to reckon men-folks in with Providence, an' not complain of what they do any more than we do of the weather." (123–124)

Sarah's actions in scrubbing the dish "fiercely" betray her anger and frustration, but she recognizes that women's words have no effects on men's actions. In her role as an individual and as Nanny's mother, Sarah may wish that circumstances were different, but in her official role as "Mother"—a role emphasized by the quotation marks Freeman placed around it in the title—she is part of the socialization process and as such has to teach Nanny the rules of engagement where men are concerned. Sarah continues to perform this role of "Mother" for the rest of the morning, loyally defending Adoniram and their cramped house against Nanny's complaints about the shabby parlor and silently making mince pies because "however deep a resentment she might be forced to hold against her husband, she would never fail in sedulous attention to his wants" (125).

Her momentary capitulation means that she has conceded the battle but not the war. In her longest speech in the book, Sarah uses both voice and space to make a case for her new house, making different kinds of appeals as she points to the different rooms. Showing him the parlor and its dirty wallpaper, she appeals to family pride, noting that all of Nanny's friends have better parlors for their beaux than Nanny has for hers. Pointing out the tiny bedroom the two have shared for 40 years, she appeals to sentiment and the lives of their children as she reminds Adoniram of the children she has borne there, including the two who have died. Opening the door to the "small, ill-lighted pantry," Sarah appeals to Adoniram's business sense; since this cramped space is all she can use for a buttery, or a room in which to skim the milk and make the butter, how, she asks, does he expect her to take care of the milk of even more cows if she can barely complete her tasks in the room she has now? Finally, she appeals to his love for her, reminding him of the promise of his youth to build her a house, and to his love for Nanny, who is too frail to keep house for herself and must live with them after she marries. In describing Sarah's use of language, the narrator comments, "she had pleaded her little cause like a Webster" (127), a reference to the great orator Daniel Webster. Yet, to all this Adoniram has but one answer: "I ain't got nothing' to say" (128). To engage Sarah in speech would mean to acknowledge the justice of her arguments—as Sarah says, "You can't say nothin' without ownin' it ain't right" (127)—so Adoniram falls back on his only defense: refusing to engage women in conversation at all.

The conflict is resolved by Nanny's chance remark that "we might have the wedding in the new barn" (128), an idea that sparks Sarah's imagination. When Adoniram receives a letter from Mrs. Penn's brother, Hiram, inviting him to look at some horses to buy, he leaves the farm for a few days, an act that Sarah interprets as providential permission to put her plan into action, for "unsolicited opportunities are the guide-posts of the Lord to the new roads of life" (130). To the astonishment of Sammy and Nanny, she moves their furniture into the new barn and claims it as her own, a feat "equal in its way to Wolfe's storming of the Heights of Abraham" (131), a reference to the Battle of Quebec in 1759, in which English troops under General Wolfe defeated the French general Montcalm by scaling the steep cliff that served as part of the French defenses. Another battle is before her as Sarah must confront another figure of male authority in the person of Mr. Hersey, the minister, who presumably carries the weight of God's power as well as the community's opinions on his side. Sarah defeats him with an appeal to history, referring to the nation's origins in revolution over issues of individual rights and property. She tells him, "I think it's right jest as much as I think it was right for our forefathers to come over from the old country 'cause they didn't have what belonged to 'em'" (133), standing on the barn threshold as if it were Plymouth Rock, another symbol of national heritage. Once more language has been used in a struggle over space, and once again Sarah wins, as Mr. Hersey retreats in confusion.

Sarah's third and final battle in her revolt is also fought using space and language when Adoniram returns from his horse-buying expedition. Her actions in moving their household to the barn speak loudly as he first stares in amazement and then reverses the terms of their discourse by asking Sarah a question rather than the other way around: "What on airth does this mean, mother?" (134). This time it is Sarah who does not argue, although she does explain that she's "goin' to live here" and that he must "put in some windows and partitions" (134). Before such a reversal of roles Adoniram is helpless: Continuing the imagery of battle used elsewhere in the story, the narrative voice reports that he is "like a fortress whose walls had no active resistance, and went down the instant the right besieging tools were used" (135). As Martha J. Cutter writes, Sarah "has reclaimed language not only for herself but also so that her husband and family can now speak in a more meaningful and open way" (291). Years after this story was published, Freeman commented that it was not truthful, that a New England woman like "Mother" would have lacked the nerve and imagination to move to the barn. In presenting this vision of a strong woman, however, Freeman linked independent womanhood and the interests of the nation in ways that look ahead to greater freedom for women in later centuries.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine the speech and actions of the secondary characters in this story. Do they change as Sarah Penn does?
2. Is it plausible that a man as rigid and authoritarian as Adoniram would have a change of heart at the end of the story? What evidence in the story might support this change of character?
3. Discuss the way that RALPH WALDO EMERSON would evaluate the conduct of Sarah Penn in "The Revolt of 'Mother.'" Use Emerson's essay "Self-Reliance" as the basis for Emerson's assessment.
4. Is Freeman's criticism that Sarah would never have behaved that way a valid one? Is Sarah's action logically motivated and supported within the story?
5. What does the position of Sarah Penn reveal about the social codes of 19th-century women's roles? Look up some information about women's rights at this time. Would she have been within her rights to build a house of her own on the designated spot, for example?
6. Many farm families might agree that the livestock is most important, since it is responsible for the family's financial security. Can you make an argument for Adoniram's point of view? Has Sarah been rash in making this move?
7. Do you think that Sarah wrote to ask her brother Hiram to draw Adoniram away from home so that she could execute this plan? What evidence in the story does or does not support this hypothesis?
8. Why do Sarah and Adoniram call each other "mother" and "father" rather than by their given names? What does this say about their commitment to their social roles?
9. What kinds of "ownership" does this story explore? What kinds of "partnerships" does it portray? Do men and women in this story have different ideas of ownership and partnership?

"Luella Miller" (1902)

"Luella Miller" was first published in Everybody's Magazine in December 1902 and later reprinted in The Wind in the Rosebush and Other Stories (1903). It is unusual within Freeman's body of work in that it uses a frame story (a third-person narrator who introduces a first-person narrator) and combines the traditional rural New England village setting of local color fiction with supernatural elements of vampirism and ghosts more suited to an EDGAR ALLAN POE tale than to the realistic stories for which Freeman was known. Yet, as "A New England Nun" and "The Revolt of 'Mother'" do, "Luella Miller" calls into question the domestic roles that women were required to play in the 19th century, and the supernatural elements in the story allow Freeman to suggest that these could be deadly for men and women alike.

Luella Miller's story is told to the reader as a tale already legendary in the village: Because she has been dead for a long time, we never see Luella except through the eyes of the elderly Lydia Anderson, who lived across the street from Luella and whose first-person narrative dominates the story. According to Lydia, Luella is a "slight, pliant sort of creature" (Reichardt 249) with beautiful fair hair and a helpless air that attracts both men and women to fly to her aid. Luella is hired as a teacher, but one of the older girls in the class, Lottie Henderson, does all the work for her before wasting away and dying. She next marries Erastus Miller, who does all of a man's work and a woman's work, too, keeping house and working himself to death in her service. After his death, his sister Lily lives with Luella, but although she is vigorous and rosy-cheeked at the start, she, too, falls ill. As Lily grows thinner, Luella grows plump and rosy by eating the food that the neighbors give her for Lily. The story repeats itself with Lily's aunt Abby Mixter, who cares for Luella as if she were a baby but goes to her grave protesting that Luella, not she, needs all the care and attention.

By this time it is plain that Luella is a spiritual vampire, sucking the life out of all who care for her so that she can live in ease and harmony. Furthermore, she is not an innocent victim of a force over

3. Define what you see as the ideal of home that Freeman imagines as she presents different female characters who struggle to make their home an environment that provides them peace and comfort. Compare and contrast that sense of home with the home that HARRIET BEECHER STOWE describes in the “Quaker Settlement” chapter of Uncle Tom’s Cabin.

MARGARET FULLER

(SARAH MARGARET FULLER)

(1810–1850)

I have urged on woman independence of man, not that I do not think the sexes mutually needed by one another, but because in woman this fact has led to an excessive devotion, which has cooled love, degraded marriage, and prevented either sex from being what it should be to itself or the other.

(Woman in the Nineteenth Century)

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE sailed with her and joined her on long, lakeside walks. RALPH WALDO EMERSON, according to Hawthorne, proclaimed that she was “the greatest woman, I believe, of ancient or modern times, and the one figure in the world worth considering” (Miller 231). She had a dalliance with the great Ludwig van Beethoven, whom she addressed in correspondence as “My only friend” and to whom she went on to write, “Oh blessed master! Like a humble wife to the sage or poet, it is my triumph that I can understand, can receive thee wholly, like a mistress . . . thou art all I want” (Miller 232). The influential transcendentalist and educator Bronson Alcott further sang her praises by stating, “She had the intellect of a man inspired by the heart of a woman, combining harmonious marriage of the masculine and feminine in her genius. We have no woman approaching so near our conception of the ideal woman as herself” (Miller 231–232). Perhaps not surprising, considering the high regard in which she was held by some of the greatest minds of her age, Margaret Fuller showed complete agreement with their consensus: “I know all the people worth knowing in America, and I find no intellect comparable to my own” (Memoirs 1:65).

Even though effusive praise of her was written by almost every significant thinker of her day, Fuller was viewed by scholars as deserving little more than a literary footnote for her Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1843) until the modern feminist movement of the 1970s elevated her to the status she enjoyed during the early to mid-19th century. As more and more scholarly research is done on her social, literary, and intellectual contributions, as well as her personal and literary influence, she has emerged as a central figure of early 19th-century American culture and a major figure in the development of the women’s rights movement.

Given Sarah Margaret Fuller’s unusual childhood, it is easy to see in her earliest years the embryonic promise of genius. Her early education took place under the stern tutelage of her father, Timothy Fuller, a Harvard graduate who was both a lawyer and a politician. Fuller was taught Latin and by the age of eight was reading Ovid in its original language. She then learned Greek and soon moved on to Italian, French, and German. Before she was old enough to enter eighth grade, she had devoured William Shakespeare, Geoffrey Chaucer, and Miguel de Cervantes. Soon her father recognized he could not instruct her alone and arranged to have her tutored by scholars from Harvard. Though women were not allowed to enroll in the male-only Harvard College, Fuller became the first female ever admitted to the school library, where she read avidly while continuing her home studies, becoming a masterful writer and an expert in Italian, German, and, of course, American literature. Indeed, so gifted and accomplished was she that Emerson, the most esteemed philosopher and intellectual of the period, called her one of his “luminaries”: “A woman,” he said, “who seems to have learned all languages” and whose mind was “wise, magnificent . . . gifted” (Memoirs 1:215). The erudition, however, had a price. Later in life, Fuller was to suffer health problems, including nearly disabling headaches. She blamed her father for this and felt he had pushed her too hard and had in many ways cost her her childhood. In Memoirs Fuller wrote that children “should not through books antedate their actual experiences, but should take them gradually, as sympathy and interpretation are needed” (2:44).

With the death of her father in 1835 Fuller was thrust into the position of being the primary breadwinner for her family, which included her mother, a sister, and five brothers. Though she would later bemoan her youth in the unfinished “Autobiographical Sketch,” stating that she realized she had become a “prodigy by day, and at night a victim of spectral illusions, nightmare, and somnambulism” (Portable 161), her sense of duty led her to a teaching position at Temple School in Boston. Founded by Bronson Alcott, the father of LOUISA MAY ALCOTT, Temple School stressed individual progress, searching for a higher moral purpose, and practiced what for the time was revolutionary: racial integration. It was during this period that Fuller began to develop relationships with many of the leading intellectuals in New England. The Alcotts were social activists and saw in Fuller a kindred spirit they happily introduced to such notables as Hawthorne, Emerson, William Henry Channing, and George Ripley. The transcendentalist movement (ca. 1835–60) was just beginning to gain prominence. A philosophical and literary system permeated by romantic idealism and inspired by both the German idealist philosophers and the romantic poets such as William Wordsworth and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, transcendentalism proved a seductive siren to the facile mind of the young Fuller. The combination of her rich humanities background, her newly acquired skills in education, and the emerging confidence she gained from becoming more and more independent allowed her quickly to become an influential force in the movement. In the end the movement would be remembered for the major literary accomplishments achieved by writers such as HENRY DAVID THOREAU, Hawthorne, Emerson, HERMAN MELVILLE, and WALT WHITMAN and for the influence it exerted in the political sphere (abolition, women’s rights). And, Fuller was in the thick of it all.

One of the most significant relationships Fuller developed during these heady times was with Elizabeth Palmer Peabody, a pioneer in female education. At a time when male exclusivity was the order of day and women were not allowed in universities, legislatures, or even on tours as paid public speakers, Fuller and Peabody were asked to join the Transcendentalist Club. This shocking invitation solidified in the public’s mind the radical nature of the movement, while it also facilitated an ever-widening circle of friendships that profoundly influenced Fuller’s thought and future conduct. Though she never joined any of the utopian communities that sprang from the movement, she did visit her fellow club member Ripley’s Brook Farm, and it was here that she met Hawthorne. Over the next decade Fuller and Hawthorne would spend much time together, often engaging in conversations regarding politics, culture, and literature. Indeed, when Hawthorne’s The Blithedale Romance appeared, “readers quickly concluded that the exotic Zenobia was the fictional counterpart of Margaret Fuller” (Miller 239).

The freshness of all these new ideas was a bit too much for some. An open approach to learning and the use of a Socratic method that encouraged the questioning of traditional institutions drew Temple School so much public criticism that enrollment dropped. Fuller realized that as the least senior member of the faculty she might be laid off and so tendered her resignation.

Paradoxically, this loss of a job for Fuller would lead to what many scholars argue was her most productive and significant period. Taking a position at the Greene Street School in Providence, Rhode Island, she immersed herself in the busy job of teaching rhetoric, Latin, French, poetry, and history to 60 boys and girls. She was especially excited about awakening the minds of the girls to the possibility of going beyond the restrictions society had heretofore placed upon them. Fuller refused to let the students sit passively and take notes on her lectures, nor did she encourage the common practice of rote memorization. She explained, "A lesson is as far as possible from being learned by heart when it is said to be, it is only learned by body. I wish you to get your lessons by mind" (Kornfeld 23). Her fundamental classroom rules were "let nothing pass from you in reading or conversation that you do not understand, without trying to find out" and "let not your age or shame of being thought ignorant prevent you from asking questions about things or words you do not understand" (Kornfeld 23). Clearly, Fuller was beginning to discover her great passion. She wanted to teach people, especially women, to think for themselves. This process of being able to ascertain what was important and made sense to the individual would constitute the earliest stages of what she would later describe as "self-culture." Always a person who enjoyed writing and considered it important to record one's thoughts, Fuller faced a great conundrum: Should she continue a vocation that allowed her to touch the lives of a few individuals profoundly on a personal level, or should she pursue a course that would take her ideas to a broader audience?

Teaching was a wonderfully fulfilling and rewarding profession, but as many teachers before and since have discovered, it takes all of one's time and energy to do it well. Contemplating her love of teaching and her desire to write, she mused: "I cannot serve two masters." Of her teaching she finally concluded that to continue would mean to keep on "fulfilling all my duties . . . except to myself" (Letters 1:327). And so, in December 1838 Fuller left the Greene Street School to return to Boston to see whether she could enter the public arena as a writer. It was a decision that was perhaps as important as any in American history in regard to the awakening of the women's movement.

When Fuller again took up residence in Boston, she began two major undertakings. She established a Conversation Club for women in November 1839, and together with Emerson she founded the transcendentalist journal the Dial, agreeing to serve as the publication's first editor. Both endeavors were to occupy her until she left New England in 1844 and would ultimately shape her historical persona.

As so often happens when necessity and desire meet intelligence and creativity, great art was born. Though Fuller may never be celebrated as a writer on par with her male contemporaries Emerson, Hawthorne, and Thoreau, no one can doubt the profound influence of her conversation series on the nascent women's movement. The fact that she enjoyed a public venue for discussing her developing ideas about feminism through her mystical meditations on beauty and spiritual power during her conversations, as well as a political and literary forum to state her views in the Dial, arguably made her one of the most powerful intellectual voices in mid-19th-century United States. Fully 20 years later, Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony named Fuller in the dedication of their famous History of Woman Suffrage, stating that she had "possessed more influence upon the thought of American woman than any previous to her time." Indeed, Stanton, one of more than 200 women who attended the conversations over the four years they were held, concluded that ultimately they became "a vindication of woman's right to think" (Kornfeld 26).

Never was this made more clear than when Fuller drew upon much of what she had been discussing with these women to write an article published in the Dial, in July 1843, entitled "The Great Law-suit: Man versus Men; Woman versus Women." This would later be expanded upon and published as the book Woman in the Nineteenth Century, a work that would become part of the canon of transcendental literature as well as a cornerstone for the future women's movement and would ever after be viewed as Fuller's magnum opus.

Exhausted from essentially working for three years at two jobs as a lecturer-conversationalist and editor, Fuller took a well-deserved vacation in summer 1843. Her dear friends James and Sarah Clarke invited her to accompany them on a trip west to the Great Lakes and the Wisconsin Territory. From this experience she wrote Summer on the Lakes, in 1843. America was at the time enthralled by “travel books,” and her work enjoyed modest success. What quickly became apparent, however, was that unlike the vast majority of the writers who published in this genre, Fuller could not have cared less about describing fauna and terrain as suitable subjects in and of themselves. Instead, she used them as a means of challenging her readers to explore their own inner “territory” (Summer 13).

Woman in the Nineteenth Century and Summer on the Lakes, in 1843 caught the attention of the powerful Horace Greeley, who offered Fuller the job of literary critic for his New-York Daily Tribune. In December 1844 she accepted the position and moved to New York City. In many ways this move would mark the end of her tenure as a key figure in American transcendentalism. Just seven years after leaving Greene Street School, Fuller had successfully transformed herself from a provincial “schoolmarm” into a widely recognized contributor to U.S. literature. Interestingly, just as it appeared that she had found her niche as a writer of long-format nonfiction prose, she switched her primary focus. From this point until her untimely death five years hence it would be as a journalist that Fuller would make her mark.

During the short time from late 1844, when Fuller moved to New York City and began her journalism career, until the 1846 publication of her influential article “American Literature, Its Position in the Present Time and Its Prospects for the Future,” it was becoming clear that even though Fuller still appreciated the realm of literature and its purity in terms of the written word, she also fully understood the emerging power of the press. Whereas her years of leading the Conversation Club in Boston never reached more than a few hundred New England women (albeit many of great influence), her front-page columns in the Tribune reached close to 30,000 readers every day. As a woman who had been forced to support herself during most of her adulthood, Fuller had a very real pragmatic side to her life, visible even when considering questions of art. She had long maintained that life should be a balance between thought and action, and now she had an ideal vehicle to espouse her doctrine and simultaneously address the myriad social causes dear to her heart. Fuller pioneered new techniques in investigative journalism by visiting and analyzing the city’s prisons and mental asylums as well as writing about rapidly emerging urban problems such as prostitution. She wrote more than 250 articles during this highly productive period. Her growing interest in exposing contemporary social problems and suggesting practical reforms separated her from many of the transcendentalists such as Emerson, who tended to focus most of their energy on abstract theories. Fuller was not even daunted when Emerson questioned her seeming abandonment of the transcendentalist movement to pursue journalism, writing that “the Newspaper promises to become daily of more importance, and if the increase of the size be managed with equal discretion, to draw within itself the substance of all other literature of the day” (Letters 2:87). It was with this idea ringing in her head that she decided to accept the offer by Greeley to become America’s first foreign correspondent by traveling to Europe and sending back her impressions, or “dispatches,” as she saw fit.

Fuller’s life would be a roller coaster from this point on. She sailed to England in August 1846 as one of America’s first foreign correspondents and while there met the Italian patriot Giuseppe Mazzini. She also met other writers, such as the English writer Thomas Carlyle and the French novelist George Sand, but it was her meeting with Mazzini that sparked her interest in the Italian revolution and led her to take up residence in Rome during summer 1847. Fuller immersed herself in the revolutionary efforts of the Italian people and in her dispatches to the Tribune called for Americans to support the republican uprising. It was also during this period that she met the marchese Giovanni Ossoli, with whom she had a son, Angelo, in September 1848. Fuller and Ossoli probably married in 1849, the same year that Rome fell to French troops, after which they fled to Florence. From there Fuller, her new husband, and their baby son set sail for America in May 1850 (Kornfeld 66). Two months later, a day before they were to arrive in New York City, their merchantman, the Elizabeth, encountered a fierce storm off Fire Island. The young family of three perished. The body of one of the most influential female voices in the formative early life of American literature, philosophy, and women's rights was never recovered.

A great outpouring of grief followed the news of Margaret Fuller's death. Tributes were written by many of the luminaries of the transcendental movement as well as the women's rights movement. Her works were compiled and published by Emerson himself, and she enjoyed a brief moment of posthumous recognition. The turbulent times of abolitionism and pre-Civil War friction quickly pushed discussion of her works to the side, however, and it would not be until the feminist movement of the 1970s rediscovered this clarion voice from the 19th century that her works began to receive the serious attention they enjoy today.

“Letter to Sophia Ripley” (1839)

In a letter written to her friend Sophia Ripley, the wife of the social reformer and Brook Farm founder George Ripley, we can see the incredible range of Fuller's thinking, as well as her command of personal correspondence. Though the letter is essentially a discussion of the Conversation Club Fuller would conduct in Boston, it is in many ways a proclamation of what she considers most important about being human. She tells Ripley she believes the idea of the discussion forum will be “noble” if it forces the participants to ask, “What were we born to do?” and “How shall we do it?” before “their best days are gone by” (Letters 2:86–89).

Throughout the letter, but especially at the beginning, Fuller enumerates the reasons that she feels her proposed Conversation Club will make a positive addition to the lives of women. Statements like the following point to Fuller's belief that women in her day led isolated, dreary lives: “I have heard many [women], of mature age, wish for some such stimulus and cheer, and those younger, for a place where they could state their doubts and difficulties, with a hope of gaining aid from the experience or aspirations of others” (Letters 2:86–89). Sentiments like these suggest that even at this earliest stage of Fuller's life as a public figure she was motivated by a desire to expand women's awareness of their true potential. This same desire would emerge with far greater force five years later in Woman in the Nineteenth Century.

Knowing that the responsibility to make the enterprise work rested squarely on her shoulders, Fuller realistically assessed the task before her: “I look upon it with no blind enthusiasm, nor unlimited faith, but with confidence” (Letters 2:86–89). Finally, after some discussion about mundane issues like who should be invited and what topics covered, Fuller touches on an area central to her view of life: women's active participation in the world around them. Here we see her sentiments expand from a meditation on pedagogy to a far more significant view of what it takes to grow as a human. She writes, “No one will be forced, but those who do not talk will not derive the same advantages with those who openly state their impressions and consent to learn by blundering as is the destiny of man here below” (2:86–89). Though this missive is a musing to Ripley on what Fuller would wish to see during her Conversation Club series, her words might have been the siren cry of a lifetime she would dedicate to getting all people, women especially, to engage intellectually in the world around them and actively speak their minds.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Voicing deeply felt opinions is often easier when using figurative language or when addressing an audience that is familiar and wholly supportive. How do you see Fuller's voice emerging in her personal correspondence with her good friend Sophia Ripley?
2. In what ways does Fuller's initial explanation of the need for the kind of communication she hopes to provide through her Conversation Club define the experience of women in Boston at the time she was writing? Locate language in the letter that you think defines Fuller's view of the lives most women led.

3. Identify the parallels that link the perceptions of New England women that Fuller presents in her letter to Sophia Ripley with the view EMILY DICKINSON promotes in "What Soft—Cherubic Creatures—." Do you think that Dickinson, like Fuller, is aiming to improve the lot of the women about whom she writes?

Summer on the Lakes, in 1843* (1844)

Fuller may justly be thought of as a surprisingly prolific writer if one considers that she began to view herself as an author relatively late in her sadly shortened life of 40 years. Though she had written many articles for the Dial that had gained her fame, it was the publication of Summer on the Lakes that introduced her work to a wider audience and ultimately opened the door for the reworking of a previous Dial article into the book Woman in the Nineteenth Century. Summer on the Lakes was Fuller's first original book, and in many ways it was a novice effort. It neither adheres to an established travelogue format, nor is it fully realized. As she acknowledges near the end, "What I got from the journey was the poetic impression of the country at large; it is all I have aimed to communicate" (Summer 47). Nonetheless, it certainly gave notice that Fuller saw the world differently than the vast majority of published writers of the day and gave her a forum to discuss topics that she would explore in print for the remainder of her life.

One of those topics was the role of women in the formation of any newly emerging society. What she observed about the West was "the unfitness of the women for their new role" (Summer 16). Though she appreciated the hard work the women put forth, she thought their "city education had imparted neither the strength nor skill now demanded." Still, she hoped that over time the European traditions adhered to by their mothers would give way to a new, liberating perspective for younger women so that "a girl really skilled to make home beautiful and comfortable, with bodily strength to enjoy plenty of exercise, the woods, the streams, a few studies, music and the sincere and familiar intercourse . . . would afford happiness enough" (Summer 28).

Another of the topics she discusses in Summer on the Lakes that would resurface in her later writings are the different effects nature produces in individuals. Niagara Falls, one of the great natural wonders that provoked awe and wonder in the hearts of many 19th-century Americans, provides the first encounter with nature that she discusses in the book. Oddly, she writes that she is not especially moved by the grandeur of the famous natural wonder because of her previous knowledge of it through etchings and myriad written accounts. Still, she recounts that as she sits on a bench close enough to feel the mist of the thundering waterfall, a man "walked close to the fall, and, after looking at it a moment, with an air as if thinking how he could best appropriate it to his own use, he spat into it" (Summer 17). This incident would prove pivotal in the tone and direction of her narrative. After seeing the man's action as contemptuous of nature and as an effort to seek dominion over it, her work became far more a meditation than a travelogue. Indeed, by her own admission, she was a poor judge of distance and topography and thus was not "particularly anxious to give the geography of the scene" so much as to communicate "the poetic impression of the country at large" (Summer 29).

In the end, however, it was neither the descriptions of natural wonders nor observations of rugged individualism embodied by settlers on the American frontier that made Fuller's work noteworthy. Her achievement emerges through troubled musings about the plight of the women who seemed to have become enslaved by codes of domesticity so rigid that they could never gain inspiration from the majesty of their surroundings. Fuller saw white female settlers as so completely preoccupied with the unrelieved drudgery of rural existence that the poor become "slatterns" and the better off "struggle under every disadvantage to keep up the necessary routine of small arrangements" (Summer 31). She became one of the first writers to chronicle not just the wearisome conditions of white women in the West but of Native American women as well.

She refused to accept the degradation of the Indians as a consequence of their “lack of civilization,” the widely held opinion. By placing a quasi-autobiographical fictional character she calls Mariana in the middle of her book, she provides a means to analyze the gender constructions that in her view entrapped all women. Whether it was the institution of marriage, the male exclusivity of higher education, or the secondary roles in terms of decision making assigned to females in every society she examined, it raised her ire, and she focused upon these perceived inequities. In so doing, she asks her readership the revolutionary question “Has the Indian, has the white woman, as noble a feeling of life and its uses, as religious a self-respect, as worthy a field of thought and action, as man?” (Summer 46). For Fuller this almost Socratic method of rhetorical questioning was central to a much-needed American debate. Shortly following the release of Summer on the Lakes came the widespread publication of her second, and most influential, book, Woman in the Nineteenth Century, and just such a national examination of values was joined.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In what ways did Fuller’s “travel book” Summer on the Lakes, in 1843 differ from other such narratives?
2. Clearly Fuller was dismayed by what she encountered in the West regarding the role of women and the Native American. What conditions did she find? Might she have anticipated better? Do you feel there are “territories” in our current world that would be especially eye-opening to similar first-person investigation? Explain.

Woman in the Nineteenth Century* (1845)

As ponderous as was the title of her 1843 Dial essay, “The Great Lawsuit: Man versus Men, Woman versus Women,” it proved to be the genesis of the very short book Woman in the Nineteenth Century. By almost every account this work poses singular challenges for readers. Characterized more by a sense of urgency than by a carefully sequenced argument or narrative of events, it reads more like an impassioned call to action than a calm discourse urging the extension of equal rights to both sexes. An example of this appears in the closing pages, where Fuller appeals directly to the women of America. “Women of my country!” she exhorts. “Tell these men that you will not accept the glittering baubles, spacious dwellings, and plentiful service, they mean to offer you by these means. Tell them that the heart of woman demands nobleness and honor in man, and that, if they have not purity, have not mercy, they are no longer fathers, lovers, husbands, sons of yours” (Woman 98). Despite the work’s sometimes incoherent structure, pedantic diction, and at times off-putting erudition, what cannot be denied is that regardless of stylistic weaknesses, it was an enormously influential contribution to the budding women’s movement in the United States. Stylistic missteps may in part be attributed to Fuller’s daring to challenge patriarchal norms in the absence of literary precedent. As do other pathbreaking writers, Fuller had to feel her way a step at a time. In a sense what she had to say was finally more important than the way she said it, and women readers responded positively to her efforts. The first printing sold out within a week, and the basic tenets espoused in the work would become foundation blocks for the documents that emerged from the 1848 Seneca Falls convention, widely seen as the birth of the American women’s rights movement.

As historically significant as Fuller’s tract has become, for a contemporary reader it can require patience. Without a firm grasp of biblical allusion, classical mythology, American transcendentalism, William Shakespeare, and myriad literary and historical references, understanding her prose is difficult. A good strategy is to stay focused on main themes and concentrate on Fuller’s clearest illustrations. Bear in mind, for instance, that she includes many references to women from the past in order to provide evidence for her contemporary readers that women can assume and have actually assumed important public roles. Some of these women, such as the Greek Panthea and Madame Necker de Saussure of Geneva, will strike modern readers as obscure because history has traditionally focused on the actions of men, casting a shadow over female contributions. Drawing attention to these women necessarily involves shedding light on the dark corners of history.

One of Fuller's most useful and clear conventions is a technique she experimented with in Summer on the Lakes: the introduction of a female protagonist through whom we view many of the dialectical musings of the author. One such character is Miranda, a female intellectual who clearly parallels Fuller. This is especially evident when Miranda explains that she has been given an excellent education because her father saw her not "as a plaything" but "as a living mind" (Woman 33). This homage to the supportive father is perhaps Fuller's way of atoning for her more critical early assessments of the incredibly rigid and demanding study schedule her own father imposed on her when she was a child.

Her tone of reconciliation of the sexes is also far different from the more aggressive repudiation of male presumption and indifference so evident in Summer on the Lakes. In Women in the Nineteenth Century Fuller makes the case that both men and women must appreciate that they are part of one whole, humanity, and that transcendence can occur only when their collective potential is realized. "The growth of man is two-fold, masculine and feminine" (Woman 99), writes Fuller near the end of her book. She continues, stating that there "cannot be a doubt that, if these two developments were in perfect harmony, they would correspond to and fulfill one another" (Woman 100). After a discussion of the often unharmonious struggle to achieve a balance of male and female power, she concludes: "Whenever the poet or artist gave free course to his genius, he saw the truth, and expressed it in worthy forms, for these men especially share and need the feminine principle. The divine birds need to be brooded into life and song by mothers" (Woman 101).

Once the challenges posed by the text are met, Woman in the Nineteenth Century can actually be read as the optimistic, focused counterpart to Summer on the Lakes. Whereas Fuller communicated considerable skepticism regarding the supposed promise of westward expansion and the unfulfilled Jeffersonian dream of social harmony and individual freedom in Summer on the Lakes, she is almost effulgent in Woman in the Nineteenth Century, where she concentrates on the potential for both men and women to attain spiritual progress. Indeed, she speaks of "a clearer version and better action" when "man and woman may regard one another as brother and sister, the pillar of one porch, the priest of one worship" (Woman 101). Interestingly, even though she had become despondent after witnessing the horrible conditions and lack of opportunities for frontier women, her new hopes for American progress centered on the liberation of women and men from the very gender constraints she had seen as so prevalent in the West. The basis of her argument in Woman in the Nineteenth Century is that men and women are both part of a "great radical duality" that gives them the capacity to experience the whole spectrum of human thought, feeling, and action. In language reminiscent of Eastern religious thought, she postulates that there is a unifying force for male and female and that "they are perpetually passing into one another. Fluid hardens to solid, solid rushes to fluid. There is no wholly masculine man, no purely feminine woman" (Woman 68–69).

At other times in the text, Fuller uses a conversational give and take to expose the sexist assumptions embedded in a patriarchal culture where men have been encouraged to speak for women. In one notable example that appears in the early pages, Fuller engages her readers by staging a radical dialogue between a representative husband and a defiant female voice. The narrative voice acts almost as a lawyer conducting a subtle cross-examination in which characters are pumped for information with the aim of revealing widely held assumptions about the sexes that Fuller seeks to overturn. Here the presumptuous husband presents observations about the condition of his wife (and presumably all other wives), stating, "She is happy enough" (Woman 15). When pushed to state whether he has actually asked her if she feels completely self-actualized, he replies, "No, but I know she is. . . . I will never consent to have our peace disturbed by any such discussions." The arch interrogator then answers, “Consent—you? It is not consent from you that is in question, it is assent from your wife.” “Am I not the head of my house?” asks the taken-aback husband. “You are not the head of your wife. God has given her a mind of her own,” concludes the voice of the dauntless female (Woman 16). And with this statement Fuller leaves what she once referred to as “her footprint” on the annals of U.S. literature by initiating the conversation about the rights of women as citizens, wives, and intellectual and religious free agents that has now continued for more than 150 years.

It is not solely the rights of women that are the focus of the work, however, but also those of the African American and the American Indian. As an abolitionist tract, the book appears fairly tame when compared with the more fiery works that would soon follow. Still, Fuller minces no words in stating unequivocal support in exactly the same manner she had used previously when she repudiated the fictitious husband's audacious stance. She writes, “If the Negro be a soul, if the woman be a soul, appared in flesh, to one Master only are they accountable. There is but one law for souls . . . God” (Woman 20).

In a passage that appears immediately prior to the one just quoted, Fuller extends the equality of souls to the equality of bodies and minds, going so far as to argue that perceived differences between the sexes and among the races arise from environmental circumstances rather than inherent abilities. In one of her most daring passages Fuller illuminates the extent to which prejudice regarding female physical endurance has blinded Americans to the actual behavior of women and their suitability for public service outside the home. She begins by presenting the conventional male view of women assuming roles traditionally assigned to men: “The beauty of the home would be destroyed, the delicacy of the sex violated, the dignity of the halls of legislation degraded by an attempt to introduce them there” (Woman 18). Fuller responds with a bitingly ironic female counterargument:

But if, in reply, we admit as truth that woman seems destined by nature rather for the inner circle, we must add that the arrangements of civilized life have not been, as yet, such as to secure it to her. Her circle, if the duller, is not the quieter. If kept from “excitement,” she is not from drudgery. Not only the Indian squaw carries the burdens of the camp, but the favorites of Louis the Fourteenth accompany him on his journeys, and the washerwoman stands at her tub and carries home her work at all seasons, and in all states of health. Those who think the physical circumstances of woman would make a part in the affairs of national government unsuitable, are by no means those who think it impossible for the negroes to endure field work, even during pregnancy, or the sempstresses [sic] to go through their killing labors (Woman 19).

By revealing the actual physical labor completed by women of all races, Fuller exposes the extent to which American culture perpetuates an inaccurate view of female ability by looking only at the diminished physical capacity of middle-class women who have been artificially confined within the dull inner circle of the home. As to the danger that women would somehow surrender the distinctive beauty of the female form by playing a role in public discourse, Fuller replies as follows: “We should think those who had seen the great actresses, and heard the Quaker preachers of modern time, would not doubt, that woman can express publicly the fullness of thought and creation, without losing any of the particular beauty of her sex” (Woman 24). In this manner Fuller urges readers to trust to their own senses as providing the strongest argument supporting the equality of the sexes.

After regaling her readers with multiple powerful women, such as Joan of Arc and Queen Elizabeth I, who proved at least as capable as men at directing the ship of state, Fuller concludes with a note of conciliation, brilliantly implying that her requests are in truth modest and need not be seen as threatening the fabric of American culture. She does this by clearly stating that her aim is to expand the options for female self-expression, not impose a new artificial order. This expansion of potential occupations will not prevent women from deciding to continue as they have. “I have no doubt,” Fuller acknowledges, “that a large proportion of women would give themselves to the same employments as now” (Woman 103). Neither is she opposed to women and men living meaningful lives together: “I have urged on woman independence of man, not that I do not think the sexes mutually needed by one another, but because in woman this fact has led to an excessive devotion, which has cooled love, degraded marriage, and prevented either sex from being what it should be to itself or to the other.” Her aim is to grant women the exercise of strengths they already possess and that will add to the overall growth and stability of American culture: “I think women need, especially at this juncture, a much greater range of occupation, to rouse their latent powers” (Woman 102).

Despite her prevailing sense of urgency, she assumes a muted, patient stance at the end. Admitting that she has now reached middle age—“the sunny noon of life”—Fuller accepts that “objects no longer glitter in the dews of morning” and that her youthful sense of a glorious destiny has significantly diminished. “Yet,” she writes in one of the truly great declarations of enduring commitment, “enough is left, even by experience, to point directly to the glories of that destiny; faint, but not mistaken streaks of the future day” (Woman 104). Thus, Woman in the Nineteenth Century, one of the most unconventional, unprecedented, and daring books ever written, ends on a note of humility

1. Examine the way Fuller’s sense of the challenges of her day overlapped with and differed from those HARRIET BEECHER STOWE addresses in Uncle Tom’s Cabin.
2. During parts of Woman in the Nineteenth Century the prosecutorial narrator calls forth historical personages such as Isabella of Spain, Elizabeth I of England, and the French author George Sand (Amandine-Aurore-Lucile Dupin) in order to establish the prowess and intellectual equality of women. Do you consider this as central to her argument that “those who think the physical circumstances of woman (domestic drudgery) would make a part in the affairs of national government unsuitable, are by no means those who think it impossible for the negroes to endure field work, even during pregnancy, or the [seamstresses] to go through their killing labors”?
3. Fuller’s invocation of the Muse, her use of a character modeled on herself such as the female intellectual Miranda, and her writing sections in the voice of Minerva added great variety to the narrative flow of the work. What are the positive aspects of such experimentation in one’s writing? What might the downsides be?
4. It has been said that Fuller claimed for women the same principles that Emerson claimed for men. What might those principles be? Examine Emerson’s Nature and Essays, First Series to compare the moral issues he raises with those Fuller discusses in Summer on the Lakes, in 1843 and Woman in the Nineteenth Century.

“American Literature, Its Position in the Present Time, and Its Prospects for the Future” (1846)

In many ways Fuller’s article “American Literature, Its Position in the Present Time, and Its Prospects for the Future,” from her 1846 collection of pieces written for the Tribune—Papers on Literature and Art—is as timely a piece of writing as she ever penned. Though she has been labeled a snob by some because of her classical training and obvious appreciation of European culture, she was very much an American and wanted her country to create a literature unique to its experience. Yet, she observes, “We cannot have expression till there is something to be expressed” (Margaret Fuller, Critic 241). She was certainly not ignorant of the writings by Americans, but her contention was that they still parroted too much the sort of literature that best suited Great Britain “with her insular position . . . her limited monarchy” (223). What is especially significant is that Fuller addressed the question of race and recognized the power of diversity a century or more before it received much serious consideration as a factor in developing an American literature. In her article she stresses that the paradigm of British literature cannot be applied to the New World of the Americas because it “does not suit a mixed race, continually enriched with new blood from other stock . . . with ample field and verge enough to range in and leave every impulse free, and abundant opportunity to develop a genius, wide and full as our rivers . . . impassioned as our vast prairie” (Margaret Fuller, Critic 226).

Clearly, development of a sense of place and a sense of self were the first steps Fuller considered necessary for the nation to begin the process of creating a fully developed American literature. She argues that only when these essential requirements are met can the recognition of what is true and special to our circumstances begin to be realized. For, she writes, “truth is the nursing mother of genius” and “no man can be absolutely true to himself . . . without becoming original” (Margaret Fuller, Critic 227). And it is this originality that Fuller believes will ultimately ensure the future “prospects” she references in the article’s title.

None of this will occur in her mind, however, “till the fusion of races among us is more complete” (Margaret Fuller, Critic 230). Sounding equally high-minded and far-sighted on other aspects of national character, Fuller warns that true U.S. literature “will not rise till this nation shall prize moral and intellectual, no less highly the political freedom” (230). When that eventuality comes to pass, she states, then we will be on our way to obtaining a national literary voice.

Her final thought in the article goes beyond the question of what constitutes a national literature to the very essence of honest expression itself, and it is here, perhaps more than in anything she ever wrote, that Margaret Fuller shows her own genius and greatness:

Writers have nothing to do but to love truth fervently, seek justice according to their ability, and then express what is in the mind. Publishers are afraid, authors are afraid; and if a worthy resistance is not made . . . there is a danger that all the light will soon be put under bushels, lest some wind should waft from it a spark that may kindle dangerous fire. (Margaret Fuller, Critic 242)

For Discussion or Writing

1. After reading this essay do you agree with Emerson’s criticism that Fuller abandoned the transcendental movement by moving to New York City and becoming a journalist?
2. Is a journalist ethically obligated to present all aspects of a topic under investigation? Do you think Fuller’s passionate hope for reform prevents her from presenting a balanced assessment of the state of literature in the United States? Or do you believe that all writing is inherently biased? Support your contentions by citing examples from any of Fuller’s newspaper articles.

Things and Thoughts in Europe (1850)

The year 1846 was a time of technological advancements, when it became possible to have a report shipped across the Atlantic from Europe to the East Coast of the United States in 10 days. With newspapers now being voraciously consumed on a daily basis, the hunger for news from abroad made for a very competitive market. Fuller became not simply the United States’s first female international correspondent but in some ways one of its first media stars as her literate, passionate offerings were widely read and discussed. Already a feminist and social activist, Fuller’s established interest in cultural upheavals fueled her segue into analysis and discussion of the rich and rapidly changing worlds of European society, literature, and politics. She was invited into the houses of the famous (William Wordsworth, George Sand, Ludwig van Beethoven) while also continuing her practice of exploring the most destitute and troublesome areas in the countries she visited.

Examining the language of Fuller’s European dispatches, one is drawn to the incredible passion she feels for the causes she is covering, while also seeing that she is perhaps more comfortable with her voice and style than at almost any previous point in her career. Ultimately, Fuller sent home 37 dispatches, published as Things and Thoughts in Europe, between August 1846 and January 1850. By way of a warning to her readers, she let them know that her bent was not to give a history lesson of past European glories nor provide a travelogue through countries she explored such as England, Scotland, France, and Italy, but instead to listen closely to and report on “the convulsions and sobs of injured Humanity!” (Kornfeld 209). This perspective is not only clear in the New-York Daily Tribune dispatches; it is also evident in many of the letters she wrote to friends and relatives during this period, most of which were published posthumously.

It was what lay beyond the cultured realms of art and high society that finally captivated the now fully confident and engaged reformer and writer. By 1848 she had become swept up in the dramatic revolutionary movements that were rocking the European continent. She was deeply moved by Giuseppe Mazzini, the exiled Italian revolutionary who was working to unite his country under a republican government. Abandoning her other assignments, she moved to Italy to report firsthand on the instability in Rome. Feeling personally drawn to Mazzini’s vision of a new Roman republic, Fuller penned some of her most descriptive and engaging prose. In a dispatch dated March 29, 1848, and printed in the New-York Daily Tribune on May 4, 1848, Fuller seemed to draw on her transcendental background while explaining to her readers the spirit of the movement:

Nature seems in sympathy with the great events that are transpiring: with the emotions which are swelling the hearts of men. The morning sun is greeted by the trumpets of the Roman Legions marching out once more, but now not to oppress but to defend. The stars look down on their jubilees over the good news which nightly reaches from their brothers of Lombardy. This week has been one of nobler, sweeter feeling of a better hope and faith than Rome in her greatest days ever knew. How much has happened since I wrote! (Kornfeld 210)

Further in the same dispatch she describes how she witnessed the response by Romans of every walk of life to the news that uprisings around the country were leading the way to a new kind of republicanism that called for the enlistment of recruits ready to fight against the various conservative regimes that would resist these new stirrings. She writes:

With indescribable rapture these news releases were received in Rome. Men were seen dancing, women weeping with joy along the street. The youth rushed to enroll themselves in regiments to go to the frontier. In the Coliseum their names were received. Father Gavazzi, a truly patriotic monk, gave them the cross to carry on a new, a better, crusade. (Kornfeld 212)

This “crusade” she thought would lead to the transformation of a new nation, “rich and glorious by nature as ever, capable, like all nations, all men, of being degraded by slavery, capable as are few nations, few men, of kindling into pure flame at the touch of a ray from the Sun of Truth” (Kornfeld 213).

It is not hard to detect the enthusiasm Fuller was feeling. What is not as apparent is that the “headaches” about which she complains earlier in the dispatch were probably caused by morning sickness, as she was in the first trimester of a pregnancy she might not have even acknowledged herself.

In some ways she became a latter-day practitioner of first-person engaged reporting that would be seen as revolutionary 100 years later when such journalistic investigators as Truman Capote and Hunter S. Thompson immersed themselves personally in their stories. So completely, in fact, did Fuller become “part of the story” that she fell in love with an Italian Catholic nobleman, the marchese (marquess) Ossoli, who was one of the key leaders of the revolution, and they became the then unmarried parents of a baby boy. Even while pregnant, Fuller continued to send her work back to the Tribune. When finally unable to hide her pregnancy from public scrutiny (easily done at first because of the prevalent fashion of hoop dresses), she retreated to the mountain village of Rieti for the birth of the baby on September 5, 1848.

Two months after giving birth, Fuller left her child with a nursemaid and returned to Rome, where she sent a jubilant dispatch to the Tribune dated May 27, 1849: "The struggle is now fairly commenced between the principle of democracy and the old powers, no longer legitimate. That struggle may last 50 years and . . . be watered with the blood and tears of more than one generation, but the result is sure. All Europe . . . is to be under republican government in the next century" ("These Sad . . ." 117). This unbridled excitement about the new order was soon tempered when she passed a battlefield hospital and "for the first time" saw what "wounded men suffer." She acknowledges that she witnessed "the terrible agonies of those dying or who needed amputation, felt their mental pains and longing for the loved ones who were away" ("These Sad . . ." 118). Apparently, Fuller must have undergone a sort of epiphany at this point, for her submissions sharply dropped off, and her personal involvement in the struggle escalated.

A letter written by the then American chargé d'affaires of Rome, Lewis Cass, Jr., provides insight into Fuller's experience during the hectic days of 1849 when she was most immersed in the republican cause. Writing to Fuller's younger sister, Mrs. W. Ellery Channing, Cass provides a clear picture of Fuller's final days in Rome before the fall of the new republic forced her to flee with the husband she had quietly married and the ill-fated voyage to America they undertook. Cass writes his letter at Channing's request for information about Fuller's last days in Italy after having been informed of the young family's death: "In compliance with your request, I have the honor to state succinctly the circumstances so connected with my acquaintance with the late Madame Ossoli, your deceased sister, during her residence in Rome" (Memoirs 2:17). Cass informs her that he encountered Fuller several times "during the entire siege" and that "Miss Fuller took an active part" in the "noble" work of ministering to the sick and wounded "in the Hospital of the Trinity of the Pilgrims, which was placed under her direction" (Memoirs 2:18).

After the July 1849 defeat of the revolution forced Fuller to abandon her journalistic post and depart Rome, she sent one final correspondence to the Tribune from Florence. Entitled simply "Italy," this last dispatch from Europe has the reflective tone of one who has seen much but still brims with the power and strength of conviction that marked Fuller's life. She waxes philosophic about "the rose-colored Aurora Borealis" and a slight powdering of snow "scarce enough to cover a Canary bird's wing" (Deiss 122). As the entry goes on, however, she gains momentum and her old fiery voice returns as she scolds the victors for their smug response to the repression of republicanism: "Do you laugh, Roman Cardinal, as you shut the prison-door on a woman weeping for her son martyred in the cause of his country? Do you laugh, Austrian officer, as you drill the Hungarian and Lombard youth to tremble at your baton?" (Deiss 123). Finally, perhaps in some strange way sensing that she was penning the last words ever to be published in her lifetime, she returned to the overarching themes of her lifetime concerning the need for love and peace:

Joy to those born in this day: In America is open to them the easy chance of a noble, peaceful growth, in Europe of a combat grand in its motives, and in its extent beyond what the world ever before so much as dreamed. Joy to them; and joy to those their heralds, who, if their path was desert, their work unfinished, and their heads in the power of a prostituted civilization, to throw as toys at the feet of flushed, triumphant wickedness, yet holy-hearted in masking love, great and entire in their devotion, fall or fade, happy in the thought that these come after them greater than themselves, who may at last string the harp of the world to full concord, in the glory of God in the highest, for peace and love from man to man is become the bond of life. (Deiss 129)

Shortly after filing her last article, Fuller departed Europe to return to the United States with her husband, Ossoli, and their two-year-old son, Angelo. Within sight of New York Harbor the ship carrying them home was swept up in a hurricane and shipwrecked off the coast of New York. Fuller, Ossoli, and Angelo all drowned.

The public, who had so closely followed her European exploits, turned out in great numbers to pay their respects. Emerson and others compiled and edited many of Fuller's works, which were published in 1852 as Memoirs of Margaret Fuller Ossoli, thus safeguarding the legacy of a woman Emerson called "one of the noblest" writers in American literature.

For Discussion or Writing

1. At what point, if ever, does a journalist have a moral obligation to remove himself or herself from a story being covered? Are there examples from Fuller's European dispatches that speak to your contention?
2. Sometimes following your convictions can put you in harm's way. Do you agree with the decisions Fuller made to pursue the causes she believed in? Might you have done some things differently? Cite examples to support your point of view.
3. Examine the journalistic writings of Walt Whitman (many are available online) and compare his style and emphasis on issues to those of Fuller during her career with the New-York Tribune. What similarities exist in their use of voice?

"Autobiographical Sketch" (1852)

In The Memoirs of Margaret Fuller Ossoli, which her friend Ralph Waldo Emerson helped edit, is found a short but highly informative piece entitled "Autobiographical Sketch." In it Fuller addresses the forces that shaped her early childhood years and gives insights into a love affair she began to develop with Rome that would last until her death.

No one had a greater influence in making Margaret Fuller who she would become than her father, Timothy, a Harvard-trained lawyer. Though Fuller refers to her mother as "angelic" and sings her praises, she makes it clear that her mother had little input in her daughter's education.

An event that really cemented the intensity of study that would define Margaret's childhood was the death of her baby sister. "My first experience was one of death," writes Fuller of this sad occasion. "I was left alone" (Memoirs 2:66). Immediately, Margaret became the center of attention in the family, and her father set up a rigorous course of homeschooling.

"I was put at once under discipline of considerable severity" and "had a more than ordinary high standard presented to me." Even when her father worked long hours, he demanded that Margaret recite to him every evening no matter how late he arrived home. Fuller remarks that this high expectation was a great source of personal anxiety. She writes that the "consequence was a premature development of the brain, that made me a 'youthful prodigy' by day, and by night a victim of spectral illusions, nightmare and somnambulism." Ironically she predicted she would go "to a premature grave," though it was the taxing nature of her study rather than a storm at sea that she thought would be the cause. She proclaims, "I had no natural childhood!" (Memoirs 1:73).

What she did have was an experience so demanding and lacking in childhood entertainments that she says she "was driven for refuge . . . to the world of books" (Memoirs 1:56). Many of these were assigned texts that she was compelled to digest and report on to her father, who "had no belief in minds that listen, wait, and receive" (Memoirs 1:55). Thus, she honed her speaking skills and her ability to discourse on a wide variety of topics with precision and clarity. Painful as the acquisition may have been, these skills would later serve her well during the period she conducted her Conversation Club in Boston.

Finally, she dedicates a large section of the "Autobiographical Sketch" to her infatuation with all things Roman. She loved Ovid for his ability to make "Gods and Nymphs" come alive. Latin became second nature. She devoured Dante's The Divine Comedy. What really inflamed her, however, were the tales of the great men of Rome and their passion for action. She states, "In vain for me are men more, if they are less, than Romans" (Memoirs 1:76). Perhaps not surprisingly, Margaret would, many years after this period, fall in love with Giovanni Ossoli, a wild-eyed Italian revolutionary leader, during the siege of Rome.

CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN

(1860–1935)

In my judgment it is a pretty poor thing to write, to talk, without a purpose.

(The Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman)

Charlotte Perkins Gilman—a leading intellectual of the women’s movement at the turn of the 20th century—foresaw the needs of our modern age. Her vision for a more “human world” defines her entire life and literary career as a social reformer. Even as a child, she realized that through her imagination “I could make a world to suit me.” As a writer, editor, publisher, and lecturer, she wrote and spoke for a “purpose,” as she was often known to say, challenging many facets of women’s subjugation. Gilman championed “important truths, needed yet unpopular” (Living 304), promoting women’s emancipation in an era when women’s place was firmly in the domestic sphere, and marriage and motherhood were sacrosanct. Gilman advocated equal education, women’s suffrage, women’s autonomy, payment for housework, meaningful work outside the home, dress reform, marriage on the basis of love over economic necessity, and community child care—the most radical part of her agenda. Many visionary ideas that Gilman predicted for women have become realities in this millennium.

Today, Gilman is best known for her landmark short story “The Yellow Wall-Paper” (1892), a striking portrayal of a woman succumbing to madness due to the confines of rigid Victorian American society. This story, rediscovered in the 1970s at the start of second-wave feminism, helped secure Gilman’s place in the contemporary literary canon.

Regrettably, however, “The Yellow Wall-Paper” has come to define Gilman—a simplification that overshadows the complexity and impressiveness of her life and oeuvre, which includes novels, poetry, short stories, essays, an autobiography, journalism, and theoretical works.

Gilman first earned her reputation as a poet, writing civic satire that garnered praise from luminaries including Upton Sinclair, George Bernard Shaw, Woodrow Wilson, and WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS. At the turn of the 20th century she was best known for Women and Economics (1898), a treatise about women’s suppression that gained her international acclaim. Gilman was also a tireless lecturer and editor, who single-handedly wrote and produced the Forerunner (1909–16), a journal with a marked socialist slant devoted to women’s rights.

Born on July 3, 1860, in Hartford, Connecticut, Gilman, née Charlotte Anna Perkins, regrets in her autobiography that she was born on the eve of America’s Independence Day; she believed the “glorious Fourth” (Living 8) would have better characterized her revolutionary spirit. Both of her parents, Mary Fitch Westcott and Frederick Beecher Perkins, were members of prominent families, but Gilman was fiercely proud of her Beecher relatives; the educator Catharine Beecher and HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, author of Uncle Tom’s Cabin, were her great-aunts, and the noted evangelist Lyman Beecher was her great-grandfather. Charlotte's parents married in 1857 and had four children (two died in infancy; Charlotte was the third child); they divorced in 1873.

Deprivation and perseverance characterize Gilman's childhood. She never experienced a secure home life: Her father deserted the family when she was young, stigmatizing Charlotte and her older brother, Thomas; in fact, she recounts in her autobiography that "my childhood had no father" (Living 5). She often sparred with her emotionally undemonstrative mother and lamented her "uncuddled childhood" (Living 78). Gilman also experienced chronic poverty; depending upon the kindness of relatives, Mary Perkins, continually plagued by debt, moved her family 19 times in 18 years.

Although Gilman received little formal education, she claims in her autobiography to have inherited a sense of duty from her mother and an appetite for knowledge from her father (Living 44), who became a librarian. She was a bright and precocious learner. By age five she had taught herself to read; by age eight, she began to write imaginative tales. An avid reader, she enjoyed the fiction and essays of her favorite authors: Charles Dickens, George Eliot, EDGAR ALLAN POE, and HENRY DAVID THOREAU. In 1880 she completed a two-year art course at the Rhode Island School of Design in Providence, enabling her to earn a modest income as a commercial artist and private teacher. However, she yearned for a more independent life, to contribute to humanity as a "world servant," not a "house servant," to use Gilman's own words. During this period she had a close friendship with Martha Luther, the first of a number of significant female friendships in her life that ended upon Martha's marriage in 1881.

In Providence at age 21 she met the artist Charles Walter Stetson; a marriage proposal soon followed. Although she initially declined to devote her life to her "world's work," after a turbulent two-year courtship, she reluctantly agreed to marry Stetson. They wed on May 2, 1884. Before marriage the conventional Walter pledged that he would not object to her writing, a promise he failed to keep; she soon found that marriage and motherhood hampered her ability to do meaningful work. She claims in her autobiography and diaries that she objected to the conventions of Victorian marriage, not to Walter per se, whom she describes as loving, devoted, and tender. She later turned her misgivings about the private home into poetry collected in In This Our World (1893): "In Duty Bound" critiques the restrictive domestic sphere, and "The Mother's Charge" and "To the Young Wife" both lambaste the private home as the source of women's subjugation and marriage as a crippling institution.

After the birth of her only child, her daughter Katharine Beecher Stetson, and only 10 months into her marriage, Gilman experienced severe depression. Chilling is her diary entry of August 30, 1885: "Every morning the same hopeless waking. Every day the same weary drag. To die mere cowardice. Retreat impossible, escape impossible" (Diaries 1:332). She weaned her baby, traveled west to visit her father and brother, and then stayed in Pasadena, California, with her old friend Grace Ellery Channing (who became Walter's second wife in 1894). Cured upon her return, she soon grew despondent again, realizing, "Now I saw the stark fact—that I was well while away and sick while at home" (Living 95).

In spring 1887 Charlotte Stetson, then age 26, agreed to undergo a one-month rest cure at the Philadelphia sanitarium of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, a noted neurologist. Mitchell described her condition as neurasthenia (also called nervous prostration), a breakdown of the nervous system, not uncommon among women in the Victorian era. Sigmund Freud, also trained as a neurologist, approved of Mitchell's rest cure, which aimed to heal the mind by treating the body; the five components of the cure were excessive feeding, bed rest, seclusion, massage, and electricity. Well known is Mitchell's parting advice: "Live as domestic a life as possible. Have your child with you all the time." . . . "Lie down an hour after each meal. Have but two hours' intellectual life a day. And never touch pen, brush or pencil as long as you live" (Living 96). Following Mitchell's prescription, Gilman found her condition worsened; she teetered on the brink of a total nervous breakdown. She could not simply abandon her sense of social purpose to live with her traditional husband; they separated in 1888 and divorced in 1894.

Upon separation she moved with Katharine to Pasadena, where she immediately experienced improved health. Walter followed her to Pasadena two months later and remained there for a year, but they never reconciled. In California Gilman launched her writing career to support her and Katharine, publishing articles and stories, including "The Yellow Wall-Paper" (1892). In 1893 she lost her mother to cancer; published her first collection of verses, entitled In This Our World; and edited a short-lived magazine sponsored by the Pacific Coast Women's Press Association (PCWPA) called the Impress.

In 1894 Gilman sent her daughter east, relinquishing custody of Katharine to Stetson just before his second marriage, to Grace Channing, whom Gilman considered her "co-mother." This living arrangement, which seems strikingly modern, led to harsh criticism. Some of her contemporaries dubbed her an "unnatural mother" and cancelled her speaking engagements when they realized she had given up her daughter. The Impress lost its backing from the PCWPA, as Gilman was considered a liability because of her divorce and unconventional mothering. However, relinquishing her maternal responsibilities enabled Gilman to dedicate her whole life to serving the community at large. Thus, 1894 also marks the date when Gilman achieved her life's ambition to give full and earnest attention to her professional career. She wrote and lectured prolifically across the United States and eventually in Europe. Whether writing verse, fiction, or nonfiction, she made a case for social change to improve the lives of women and benefit society.

Although she had not intended to remarry, she changed her mind after renewing an acquaintance with her first cousin, Houghton (Ho) Gilman, a New York patent attorney. In 1900 she married Houghton, who supported her career by attending her lectures, assisting with her research, and reading her work. In fact, the next two decades were highly productive ones for Gilman, who found a way to balance an active career with a lasting marriage. She wrote several influential books: Concerning Children (1900), The Home: Its Work and Influence (1903), Human Work (1904), and The Man-Made World: Or, Our Androcentric Culture (1911). Gilman also founded the Forerunner (1909–16), declaring in her autobiography: "If the editors and publishers will not bring out my work, I will! And I did" (Living 304). Her monthly feminist publication, which she wrote and published single-handedly, featured poems, short stories, articles, and serialized books and novels, including What Diantha Did (1910), The Crux (1911), and her utopian novel, Herland (1915). She had subscribers from Europe, India, and Australia, as well as from across the United States.

In 1916 Gilman ended the Forerunner. Her readership was waning. Times were changing. The women's movement dwindled after suffrage. Post-World War I audiences were put off by Gilman's dual allegiances to socialism and feminism. In 1922 she completed her final social treatise, His Religion and Hers (1923), which received mixed reviews. Gilman lamented her fallen popularity and feared that society had made poor progress in attaining the widespread reforms she had envisioned for women. Still eager to retain her audience and "make a world to suit" her, she completed several projects late in her career to ensure that her legacy would continue but was unable to find a publisher for them. These included, A Study in Ethics; another anthology of poetry, entitled Here Also; and her lone feminist detective novel, Unpunished (ca. 1929), which remained unpublished at the time of her death. In this final significant work of feminist fiction Gilman turned to a genre popular between the two world wars to create a "whodunit" with a satirical twist: In Unpunished she makes a strong case against domestic abuse decades before this term even entered the U.S. vocabulary.

In 1932 Gilman was diagnosed with breast cancer. She devoted her final years to her autobiography, The Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman (1935), published posthumously with an introduction by the author Zona Gale. Houghton died unexpectedly of a cerebral brain hemorrhage on May 4, 1934. After Houghton's death Gilman moved to her former home in Pasadena, to be near her daughter, Katharine, and her grandchildren. Her close friend Grace Channing Stetson, now widowed, joined her in California. As her disease progressed, Gilman planned her suicide, arranged for her cremation, and left instructions for Katharine to scatter her ashes in the Sierra Madre. On August 17, 1935, she took her life by inhaling chloroform. Her dying, like her living, was marked with conviction, spirit, and dignity.

Herland* (1915)

After "The Yellow Wall-Paper," Gilman is best known for Herland, a utopian novel published serially in Forerunner. Through Herland Gilman made "a world to suit me" and achieved her vision of "human progress" by creating a utopian world of "highly civilized women" (Herland 25). In Moving the Mountain (Forerunner 1911), an earlier "baby utopia" (as she called it), men and women participate equally in a socialized economy; in Herland there are absolutely no men at all. Motherhood is socialized and desexualized: No longer dependent on two genders for fertilization, women have evolved to reproduce through parthenogenesis (virgin birth), giving birth to girls only; a genuine community of women raises the children of Herland, who have no last names since their identity is collective, not linked to the private home (which Gilman considered a source of oppression). While aspects of the novel, such as parthenogenesis, seem fantastic today, Herland remains a keen social commentary: In it Gilman exposes sexism and attempts to redefine traditional gender roles by showcasing women's capabilities and natural superiority to men.

Akin to Edward Bellamy in Looking Backward (1888), a book that Gilman admired, Gilman in Herland transports a character of a conventional world into the uncharted territory of an all-female paradise. At the opening three American explorers—the rich playboy Terry Nicholson, the sociologist Vandyck Jennings, and the poet-botanist Jeff Margrave—land their plane and stumble upon a utopian world populated by strong, athletic, calm, short-haired, comfortably clothed women (in typical Gilman fashion, their clothes have pockets, too). The novel is set on the eve of World War I. The location of Herland is never revealed: Gilman describes it as an island with a dense forest and refers to the women as Amazons, leading some to suggest the country is in South America, but she compares the climate and soil to those in California. Gilman presents the utopia through male eyes: Van narrates the story; as a man of reason, he serves as intermediary between the male chauvinist Terry and the sentimental Jeff, who idealizes women. Impressed by this civilization, the three men declare: "There must be men. . . . Let's find 'em" (11). Instead, the Herlanders capture the male intruders and attempt to civilize them. While Jeff totally embraces the humane values of Herland, and Van expands his consciousness to recognize Herland's merits, the sexist Terry Nicholson sneers at the idea of woman-centered culture.

The Herlanders possess qualities that, in 1915, were typically associated only with men: power, courage, inventiveness, assertiveness, and physical agility. In giving Herlanders these favored attributes, Gilman wittily queries whether human traits are inherently masculine versus feminine or, rather, culturally determined. Their culture is scientifically advanced. The country's capital looks like a model for contemporary urban planning. There are no wars, no kings, no aristocracy, no criminals, no overpopulation, and no poverty. The country is clean and beautiful. Sickness is virtually unknown to them. The women are highly educated, tall, healthy, beautiful, strong, vigorous, and contented. Their standards are peace, comfort, health, beauty, and progress (68), and they are vegetarians—pacifism extending into their eating practices. Much of Herland reads as a sociological treatise rather than science fiction. To complete the men's education about this near-perfect civilization, Gilman describes kinship structures (all Herlanders form part of one cooperative), reproductive and child-rearing practices (only certain eugenically fit women, called “Over Mothers,” bear children, and women gifted in child care raise the children in a kibbutzlike collective), religion (the Herlanders favor a benign, matrilineal religious practice, a maternal pantheism), and education (considered an art and entrusted only to the most skillful).

Herland is also a utopian romance novel. Reversing traditional gender dynamics and courtship rituals, Gilman wittily makes Van, Terry, and Jeff sex objects: They compete for the attention of the beautiful, wise Herlanders, who have no understanding of the term lover, never experience jealousy or bisexual desire, and do not blush or flirt. Conceding that dual parentage might be a higher reproductive process than parthenogenesis, the Herlanders agree to attempt “the Great Change” (89), and each of the men is selected by a partner willing to “re-establish a bi-sexual state for our people” (88). Three marriages ensue—Jeff with Celis, Van with Ellador, and Terry with Alima—but the outcomes vary. Jeff, who wholeheartedly adopts the views of his new society, treats Celis with a devotion that puzzles her, but they engage in sexual relations for procreation purposes only and remain in Herland, helping to usher in “the Great Change.” Van, a true sociologist, observes the society carefully and undergoes a slow, believable conversion. Van and Ellador experience a friendship in marriage based on mutual respect, rather than passion. However, Terry’s marriage to Alima proves disastrous. Sticking to “his pet conviction that a woman loves to be mastered” (132), Terry is convicted of marital rape and expelled from utopia. At the end of the novel Van and Ellador, eager to see the rest of the world, accompany Terry into exile, a strategic move that initiates Gilman’s sequel, With Her in Ourland (Forerunner 1916). This sequel, though far less regarded, creates an innovation in the utopian formula by putting a native of utopia into the social confusion of our world on the brink of war.

Herland gained the attention of second-wave feminists after its reprinting in 1979, with an introduction by Ann J. Lane. Gilman’s creation of a humane, peace-loving world that exposes the absurdities and inhumanity of early 20th-century America still resonates today.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Why does Gilman leave the location of Herland a mystery? What aspects of Herland culture are most appealing to readers today? What aspects are least appealing? Does Gilman seem insensitive to any group of Americans or present ideas considered politically incorrect today? Look up the term eugenics in a reference book.
2. Why do the Herlanders concede that dual parentage is a higher reproductive process than parthenogenesis? Are you prepared for this change, or does it read as a device to move the plot along?
3. If you were to illustrate the novel, what aspects of the utopia would you choose to illustrate? How would you depict the women of Herland? Identify qualities that you would have in your own utopia, and describe them or illustrate them. What would you call your utopia? Does Gilman’s title suit her work?

“The Yellow Wall-Paper” (1892)

Although Gilman created a prodigious output of poetry, fiction, lectures, novels, and theoretical works, her literary reputation stands on her best-known and best-written story, “The Yellow Wall-Paper.” Ironically, in her autobiography she dismisses this remarkable example of psychological realism as “no more ‘literature’ than my other stuff, being definitely written ‘with a purpose’” (Living 121). Superior artistically to her other, often hurriedly written fiction, “The Yellow Wall-Paper” deftly employs two devices: first-person narration and writing as therapy. The reader follows a diary or journal chronicled by a woman undergoing a three-month “rest cure” for nervous depression, seemingly brought on by the birth of her child, in today’s clinical term a postpartum depression. As Elaine Hedges notes in her “Afterword” to the 1973 Feminist Press reprinting of the story, “The story is one of the rare pieces of literature we have by a 19th-century woman which directly confronts the sexual politics of the male-female, husband-wife relationship” (Golden, Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s The Yellow Wall-Paper, 89–90).

As the 12 diary entries progress, we witness the graphic consequences of women’s subordination in patriarchal marriage, driving the female protagonist from neurosis to madness. The narrator, who refers and defers to John in the initial entries, remains nameless in this story, although John condescendingly refers to her as a “little girl” (Golden, Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s 138) and “a blessed little goose” (133). Required to rest in a former nursery, the narrator, who very much wants to write, must hide her journal from her physician/husband, John, who “hates to have me write a word” (133), and her sister-in-law, Jennie, who “is a perfect and enthusiastic housekeeper, and hopes for no better profession. I verily believe she thinks it is the writing which made me sick!” (135). In the third entry Gilman names and indicts the eminent neurologist Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, who treated her in his Philadelphia sanitarium: “John says if I do not pick up faster he shall send me to Weir Mitchell in the fall. But I don’t want to go there at all. I had a friend who was in his hands once, and she says he is just like John and my brother, only more so!” (135). Here Gilman blurs the lines between fiction and reality: The friend she mentions is a veiled reference to herself and her dissatisfaction with Mitchell’s treatment of her nervous depression.

At first repelled by the flamboyant wallpaper in the nursery, the narrator grows fond of it and discovers it to be a “palimpsest” with a dominant and muted pattern: The dominant front design takes the form of bars, and a second muted pattern resembles a formless figure at first, then a woman trapped behind the dominant design. Eventually, the narrator tears the wallpaper to free the trapped woman, merging her identity with a figure that is seemingly a product of her own hallucination, arguably a reflection of herself: “I pulled and she shook, I shook and she pulled, and before morning we had pulled off yards of that paper” (143). The pronouns I and we are significant in this passage, as are her subsequent actions of locking John out of the room and crawling on the floor. The fate of the nameless narrator crawling endlessly in circles over her fainting doctor/husband defies a simple explanation. Well over 100 years after its first publication, “The Yellow Wall-Paper” continues to captivate and puzzle audiences today.

It might surprise readers to learn that Gilman had difficulty publishing the story with which she is most readily associated. Gilman wrote “The Yellow Wall-Paper” in Pasadena, California, during a heat wave in summer 1890, shortly after she and her first husband, Walter Stetson, permanently separated. Although conflicting versions exist about its publication history and early critical reception, modern critics generally concur that it took about 18 months to place the story. Gilman solicited help from the author and former editor of the prestigious journal the Atlantic Monthly, William Dean Howells: He had written to her in praise of her poems of civic satire, such as “Similar Cases” (1890). After receiving Howells’s “unforgettable letter” of June 9, 1890, she “felt like a real ‘author’ at last” (Living 113). Howells, in turn, sent Gilman’s story to the current editor of the Atlantic Monthly, Horace Elisha Scudder; memorable is the second, final sentence of his curt rejection letter: “I could not forgive myself if I made others as miserable as I have made myself!” (Golden, Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s 27).

How did the story find its way into print? In her autobiography Gilman claims that she sent her story to a literary agent, Henry Austin, who placed it in New England Magazine but pocketed the publication fee (he denied this). Conversely, Howells, who reprinted the story in The Great Modern American Stories (1920), states in the introduction to his collection that he “corrupted” Edwin Mead, then editor of New England Magazine, into publishing the story; Mead may well have complied because he was grateful to Howells, who (as husband of Mead’s cousin) helped him enter the publishing field. If Howells’s story is accurate, did Gilman know of his role, or did she prefer to forget it? Gilman is not always accurate in her autobiography: For example, she lists the story’s publication date incorrectly as May 1891.

The story actually appeared in the January 1892 issue of New England Magazine with three black-and-white illustrations by a staff illustrator, Jo. H.

Hatfield. This relatively conservative Boston-based publication featured stories, poems, travel, history, and biography. In 1899 Small, Maynard and Company issued a small chapbook edition of the story without its original illustrations; however, the paper board covers boast a flamboyant sulfur orange-yellow design, making vivid the pattern of the ubiquitous wallpaper. The manuscript, or fair copy, version is also now in print.

While one must not read any story as a mere reflection of an author's life, "The Yellow Wall-Paper" has invited biographical readings for two reasons: In the story Gilman names and indicts Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, the eminent physician who treated her for neurasthenia (or nervous prostration) after the birth of her daughter. In 1887 Gilman traveled to Mitchell's sanitarium to take his famous rest cure. Second, Gilman based the story on difficulties she experienced during her first marriage, to Stetson, resulting in what we might now call a postpartum depression. Biographers and scholars frequently note the palpable biographical elements underpinning Gilman's story of a forceful husband forbidding his intelligent wife to write and requiring her to rest in a nursery/prison, a symbol of patriarchal marriage. Just as the window in the narrator's room has bars, symbolic of the restrictions on women in 19th-century society, the conventionally minded Stetson limited the vision of his socially minded wife, who longed to contribute to a more "human world." Before they married Stetson had assured Gilman he would not object to her writing and presented her with pens and blank writing tablets to affirm the promise, a promise he did not keep.

In The Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Gilman records that "The Yellow Wall-Paper" "is a description of a case of nervous breakdown beginning something as mine did, and treated as Dr. S. Weir Mitchell treated me with what I considered the inevitable result, progressive insanity" (118–119). Despite its merits, the Mitchell rest cure had a decidedly punitive edge. Following Mitchell's prescription to live a domestic life, limit her intellectual activity to two hours a day, "and never touch pen, brush or pencil as long as you live" (Living ing 96), Gilman reports crawling under beds and hiding in closets to escape from a "profound distress" (Living 96). Although Gilman states in her oft-quoted 1913 Forerunner article "Why I Wrote 'The Yellow Wallpaper?'" that she never objected to her wallpaper or had hallucinations as the narrator in the story did, she declares that she "sent a copy to the physician who so nearly drove me mad" (Golden, Charlotte Perkins Gilman's 46). In her autobiography she also states her reason for writing the story: "But the real purpose of the story was to reach Dr. S. Weir Mitchell and convince him of the error of his ways" (Living 121). She attests she avoided madness by rejecting her doctor's "sage" advice.

After its 1892 publication "The Yellow Wall-Paper" "attracted a cult of readers" as the biographer Gary Scharnhorst notes in Charlotte Perkins Gilman (18). Numerous reviews appeared after the 1899 edition and the tale's subsequent reprinting. Two aspects of the story—its horror and the wallpaper itself (including its possible arsenical qualities common in period wall decorations)—caught the attention of contemporary reviewers, some of whom called for the story's censure. In fact, 19th-century critics who read the story as a gothic thriller or horror tale often likened it to the work of EDGAR ALLAN POE; this connection continues, leading the tale to be anthologized in collections of gothic horror and suspense. Although many feminist critics of the 1970s and 1980s note that the sexual politics of female subjugation were not appreciated by Gilman's contemporary reviewers, some did remark upon the narrator's restricted lifestyle in a patriarchal society as a significant factor driving the narrator to madness, although these critics did not employ the terms of modern feminist criticism (for period reviews, see Golden, Charlotte Perkins Gilman's 81–87).

Since the 1973 Feminist Press publication, "The Yellow Wall-Paper" has received near-unprecedented international attention and achieved iconic status in feminist circles. Reprinted in European countries including Great Britain, France, Sweden, Germany, and Spain, it is one of the most widely anthologized texts in the English-speaking world. Part of the contemporary canon, it finds its place on syllabuses in literature, history, women's studies, and American studies courses. It is the focus of major publications in respected scholarly journals and the subject of numerous sourcebooks, collections, and doctoral dissertations. Critics in a wide range of disciplines have read the story from numerous theoretical perspectives: feminist, psychological (Lacanian, Derridean, Adlerian, Freudian), sociological, linguistic, historical, reader response, queer theory, and a combination of theoretical perspectives. Scholars have frequently analyzed the themes of madness and regression versus liberation and empowerment, the diary format, first-person narration, symbolism, discourse of diagnosis, the narrator's psychic evolution, and the ambiguous ending.

We must read criticism of any work in relation to its own historical moment. Groundbreaking legislative triumphs for women's rights, such as the Roe v. Wade (1973) decision, and victories in equal opportunity in education and employment may well have influenced 1970s feminist critics to read the story optimistically, sympathetically. Likewise, concerns with political correctness and global feminism—with its attention to issues of color, ethnicity, and social class—have led critics since the 1980s and 1990s to notice repugnancies and prejudiced elements in Gilman's oeuvre, bleeding into the color and odor of the ubiquitous wallpaper, as well as to challenge the story's canonical status. Since the 1990s "The Yellow Wall-Paper" has found a niche in gay and lesbian studies, textual studies, and approaches to teaching. In the early 21st century, interest in the story continues to grow and shows no signs of waning.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What is the significance of the narrator's namelessness? What do the nailed-down bed and the figure of the woman trapped behind the dominant pattern of the wallpaper symbolize? Why does John insist the narrator rest in a room that was a former nursery? What kind of character is John: Is he a controlling patriarch or villain, or, rather, a well-intentioned and sympathetic doctor/husband simply following the medical wisdom of his time? To support your responses look up "the doctrine of separate spheres" and the "cult of true womanhood" in a reference text. Compare Gilman's view of women's subordination to the views of her American contemporaries, including KATE CHOPIN and Edith Wharton.
2. How does the narrator's reaction to the wallpaper change over time? Does the color of the wallpaper evoke bodily excrement, feminine sexuality, decadence, and/or the "yellow peril" (at the turn of the 20th century, the color yellow was used to describe undesirable groups, including Italians, Jews, eastern Europeans, and Asians)? Is the narrator, who is denied any other form of paper, reading the wallpaper to figure out its pattern, as she vows she alone can do? In discovering a woman trapped behind the bars of the wallpaper, has the narrator installed herself in the realm of the imaginary? Does the narrator's changing perception of the wallpaper suggest that her neurosis gives way to full-blown psychosis, or does it, alternately, suggest that she is gaining an awareness of the restrictions of her patriarchal world? Is her tearing down the bars of the wallpaper an act of madness or of liberation?
3. Interpretations of the narrator's fate swing widely from liberation to defeat. Has the narrator succumbed to madness, gained a form of higher sanity, or achieved a dubious victory in gaining a more forceful sense of self despite, or perhaps because of, her madness? At the end of the story is the narrator simply trapped in a room that signals patriarchal repression; alternately, in locking John out of the room, has she attained what Virginia Woolf claims all women need: a room of her own? Is the narrator's creeping at the end of the tale animalistic (is she a groveling beast on all fours)? Is her crawling an act of infantile regression or rebirth, as babies crawl before they learn to walk? The narrator triumphantly declares in the 12th entry: "'I've got out at last' . . . 'in spite of you and Jane! And I've pulled off most of the paper, so you can't put me back!'" (Golden, Charlotte Perkins

- Gilman's* 144). But who is Jane? In the 19th century Jennie was a nickname for Jane; is Jane a reference to her sister-in-law, called Jennie throughout the story? Or, is Jane the narrator's hitherto unmentioned name? If so, is the narrator rejecting her traditional Jane self, gaining freedom from her roles of wife and mother?
4. The story unfolds as a diary: How can the narrator finish the tale if she is descending into madness? Do we read the journal entries as an interior monologue, or, rather, do we assume she has recovered sufficiently to conclude the tale herself? How would Jennie or John tell the story? What of John's fate? Is he dead or alive? If John is merely fainting at the sight of the narrator creeping on all fours, what will happen when John revives? Will he lock the narrator away, likening her fate to that of other 19th-century characters filled with madness or rage—of whom Bertha Mason of Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre (1847) is a prime example?
 5. In the third illustration the narrator resembles raving Bertha of Jane Eyre. In contrast, in the first image she looks like a respectable Victorian woman presumably writing in her journal the story we are reading. After examining the original black-and-white illustrations by the New England Magazine illustrator Joseph Henry Hatfield (Golden, Charlotte Perkins Gilman's 128, 137, 145), consider how the narrator's visual characterization influences a reading of the ambiguous ending. Do the three illustrations cumulatively suggest the narrator is insane, defeated? Gilman does not indicate a change in the narrator's appearance, but Hatfield transforms the narrator from a respectable-looking Victorian woman, hair tied into a neat bun, into a madwoman, wild hair flowing down her back as she creeps over John. What is the significance of these changes, and how might the illustrations have affected the original line of response to the story as a Poesque tale? Can you identify other features of the story that situate it both in the traditions of gothic horror and of American realism?
 6. Alternately to the previous question, do 21st-century readers see an emerging power and freedom in the image of the narrator pressing the swooning John into the floor, her hair unleashed from a restrictive bun? If you were the illustrator of the story, would you choose these same three scenes to illustrate? How would you draw the narrator and the enigmatic wallpaper itself?
 7. The story's style is taut, the paragraphs brief, many composed of only one sentence. How do these features and the breaks between diary entries augment the narrator's fragmentation or sense of psychic degeneration? The narrator also appears to be an inventive language user. The timid narrator initially defers to John and refers to herself as "one" (a pronoun the linguist Otto Jespersen calls a disguised I); as the story progresses, she increasingly uses and prominently places the nominative case pronoun in the defiant sentences she authors (for example, "'I've got out at last,' said I, 'in spite of you and Jane.'"). Look up objective case and nominative case pronouns in a grammar book to consider the significance of these changes. Moreover, how do we read the various spellings of the word wallpaper (wall paper, wall-paper, wallpaper, and paper)? Do these variations reflect Gilman's notoriously inconsistent spelling, or do they signify the profoundly changing wallpaper itself?
 8. How do we reconcile the increased authority in the narrator's language with her progressively more crazed actions? Construct two opposing interpretations of the story. To argue that the narrator succumbs to madness, trace how the muted figure of the woman trapped behind the bars of the wallpaper gains more definition (for example, the once "formless sort of figure" becomes a "woman" to her) over time; does the enhanced clarity of the narrator's delusion translate into actions of madness during the final four diary entries when she attempts to free the woman seemingly born of her own hallucination? In contrast, to argue for the narrator's liberation or dubious victory, analyze how her language grows stronger precisely at the point when the narrator dramatically creeps on the floor, tears the paper from the walls, and seemingly condemns herself to madness.

Women and Economics* (1898)

At the turn of the 20th century Gilman established her international reputation as a social critic and authority on women's subjugation when she published Women and Economics. In this book she critiques the socioeconomic system that restricted turn-of-the-20th-century women to the private home, making them wholly dependent on men. Women remained in a state of arrested development both intellectually and emotionally, a situation that proved damaging to men, women, and society as a whole. In her treatise she sketched out broad themes related to women and work, kitchenless homes, social motherhood, and "baby gardens" (child care centers) staffed by professionals. These very ideas provided material for future books (such as, Concerning Children, The Home: Its Work and Influence) and copious articles that she wrote well into the 20th century.

Gilman lived at a time when women were expected to remain in the domestic sphere as homemakers, mothers, and sexual partners; men were the sole providers. In fact, American women did not have the right to vote until the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920 (although some individual states granted suffrage sooner). Throughout the 19th century a woman's ability to hold any property depended on the state in which she lived. Disturbed by these facts, Gilman explored in Women and Economics the origin of women's economic dependence upon men and, akin to Thorstein Veblen, advanced the view that female oppression dates to prehistoric times, when men used their physical superiority to subjugate women, exploiting them for their domestic labor. The socialism of Edward Bellamy and the evolutionary theories of Charles Darwin influenced her vision for social change in this classic feminist text. Gilman aimed to liberate women from economic dependence; freed from domestic bondage, women could contribute to the work of the world and the worth of society.

Gilman coined the term sexuo-economic condition to illustrate how in the case of human females, sexuality had an economic function: A woman's success was measured by her ability to attract a mate, and she was bound to her mate for her very survival. To Gilman this situation was contrary to nature, and she believed that the human female—in contrast to females of a range of animal species—had, as a result, grown completely dependent on the human male: "We are the only animal species in which the female depends on the male for food, the only animal species in which the sex-relation is also an economic relation" (Women and Economics 5). As a result, women are viewed as chattel, not valuable members of society. In her preface she proposed to remedy "the worst evils under which we suffer, evils long supposed to be inherent and ineradicable in our natures, are but the result of certain arbitrary conditions of our own adoption, . . . by removing those conditions, we may remove the evils resultant" (xiii). Restructuring society along feminist and socialist principles became Gilman's answer to improving the lives of both men and "the thinking women of today" (xiii).

Literary reviewers and women intellectuals of her day praised Women and Economics, which became a popular college text in the 1920s. A June 8, 1899, review in the Nation compared it to John Stuart Mill's "The Subjection of Women," and in July of that same year Charles Lummis dubbed it "an enduring meteor in the sky, a flaming sword which wise enemies will shrink from" in Land of Sunshine (qtd. in Scharnhorst, Charlotte Perkins Gilman 55). By 1911 it had gone through seven English editions, and it was also translated into seven languages: French, German, Dutch, Italian, Japanese, Hungarian, and Russian. It stopped selling when, after World War I, Gilman lost much of her influence. In 1966 at the onset of second-wave feminism, Carl Degler reprinted Women and Economics, redirecting attention to a work that women's rights advocates still praise for its many insights about the status of women.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How would you define Gilman's term sexuoeconomic condition? Gilman coined this term in 1898; is it still relevant today now that women are wage earners? Which of Gilman's ideas to improve society—kitchenless homes, child care centers, dress reform, women and work, or others—are most appealing?
2. What reforms that Gilman proposed at the turn of the 20th century would still benefit men and women today? Does Gilman direct her reforms to all of America or to a distinct community within American culture? If so, how would you define that community?

The Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman, an Autobiography* (1925)

Gilman wrote her autobiography, The Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman, after World War I, when her reputation was waning. By 1925 during the twilight of a remarkable career, she had written all but the final chapter. The autobiography narrates her oft-noted impoverished and trying childhood; her sustained desire to contribute to humanity; her marriage to Walter Stetson and subsequent breakdown after the birth of her only child, Katharine, whom she sent to live with Stetson just before his remarriage; her productive years as a lecturer, writer, and editor; her second marriage, to her first cousin, Houghton Gilman; and as she lost her audience, her final frustrated efforts in writing and lecturing as she aimed to continue her life's work during a climate of increasing conservatism. She wrote the final chapter just weeks before her death in 1934 having placed the book with a publisher, Appleton-Century.

Some chapter titles reveal hardships of her life—for example, “The End of Childhood,” “Girlhood—If Any,” and “The Breakdown.” Nonetheless, the passage of time seems to have softened some of her memories, such as of her marriage. She creates a loving picture of Stetson but also details her depression in being married to that conventional man, whom her biographer Ann J.

Lane suggests served as the prototype for John in “The Yellow Wall-Paper.” Two chapters—“The Breakdown” and “Pasadena”—offer insight into Gilman's creation of her best-known story. Gilman, in “The Breakdown,” vividly re-creates her nervous depression after the birth of Katharine, which resulted in a debilitating melancholy. She describes her trip west, a prescription for recovery that she repeatedly prescribes for her fictional characters, including Jacqueline “Jack” Warner of Unpunished (ca. 1929). Of significance also is her recounting of her stay in the Philadelphia sanitarium of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, whom she names and indicts in “The Yellow Wall-Paper.” In “Pasadena” Gilman presents the publication history of the story, including its early reviews; some of this history appears in her well-known 1913 Forerunner article “Why I Wrote ‘The Yellow Wallpaper?’”

Although autobiography is now a growing genre among women writers, Gilman granted herself authority as an autobiographer at a time when few women authors chose to do so. Gilman recounts her “living,” not her “life.” Her biographer Gary Scharnhorst suggests we read Gilman's line in His Religion and Hers (1923) as explanation of the title of her autobiography: “We should not say ‘life’ as a noun but ‘living’ as an active verb” (Scharnhorst, Charlotte Perkins Gilman 114). The present participle speaks to Gilman's aim to involve her readers actively in the “living” of a writer now recognized for her contributions to American literature and feminism. Although her autobiography is about her dynamic living, it is also a remarkable achievement that while she was dying, she completed her text, revised it, edited it for publication, chose the illustrations, and arranged for a foreword to be written by her friend the author Zona Gale. Critics now recognize The Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman, published posthumously (October 4, 1935), as an enduring part of her literary legacy; excerpts appear in a range of collections about her life and work.

FRANCES ELLEN WATKINS HARPER

In her the down-trodden slave found an earnest advocate; the flying fugitive remembered her kindness . . . little children learned to name her with affection, the poor called her blessed.

(“The Two Offers”)

Frances Ellen Watkins Harper is what we might call a neglected writer, neglected not because her work has been ignored—it has not—but because, often, literary critics refuse to take her on her own terms. Harper was one of the most prominent African-American writers and thinkers of the 19th century and, arguably, the most prolific. She produced numerous volumes of poetry; wrote four novels, which appeared between 1868 and 1892; authored the first African-American work of short fiction; penned essays on subjects ranging from Christianity to racial justice to women’s suffrage; and regularly lectured on pressing social subjects of her time. She was a founding member and vice president of the National Association of Colored Women (NACW), established in 1896, and an executive member of the National Women’s Christian Temperance Union. An active antislavery worker before the Civil War, she served as director of the American Association for the Education of Colored Youth during the aftermath of Reconstruction. In the postwar years Harper traveled throughout the South as a lecturer for the African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church, which had been founded in Philadelphia in 1787 by Richard Allen and Absalom Jones. Harper’s speeches and essays often underscored her philosophy of morals, which she melded with the concept of democratic citizenship and the call to Christianity. In every sense of the term Harper was a tireless public intellectual, whose poetry, fiction, essays, and speeches echoed her thought through imagery, allegory, and, occasionally, polemic.

In spite of this, Harper’s work has generally not been received in a consistently positive light, neither during her lifetime nor in the century that has passed since her death. In The Black Man: His Antecedents, His Genius, and His Achievements (1863), the African-American novelist and autobiographer Williams Wells Brown cites Harper with some reserve, in spite of their long friendship: “All of Mrs. Harper’s writings are characterized by chaste language, much thought, and a soul stirring ring that are refreshing to the reader” (525). Yet, she was praised by Phebe Hanaford as one of the representative Daughters of America; or, Women of the Century (1883). Of the attention given her writing by early 20th-century critics, most appear to follow the lead of W. E. B. DuBois, who, when Harper died in February 1911, marked her death in the April 1911 issue of Crisis magazine, the official organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). For DuBois, Harper’s legacy was readily summed up in few words. To his mind, she was “not a great writer, but she wrote much worth reading.” James Weldon Johnson, in the preface to his landmark collection The Book of American Negro Poetry (1921), writes of Harper as an “obvious” poet who “merit[s] consideration when due allowances are made for [her] limitations in education, training and general culture” (872). J. Saunders Redding, in his seminal book of criticism entitled To Make a Poet Black (1930), gave perhaps the most damning reading of Harper’s work. He concluded with some disappointment that Harper “was apt to gush with pathetic sentimentality over such subjects as wronged innocence, the evils of strong drink, and the blessed state of childhood” (40). Though he deemed her use of language in her collection of poetry Sketches of Southern Life (1872) “fine,” he judged her prose “less commendable than her poetry” (43). He dismisses what many critics consider Harper’s strongest attempt at fiction, the 1892 novel Iola Leroy: Or, Shadows Uplifted. Redding calls it “a poor thing as a novel, or even as a piece of prose, too obviously forced and overwritten, too sensational to lift it from the plane of the possible to the probable” (43).

Recent recovery of Harper’s work has largely been by African-American women scholars, such as Frances Smith Foster, Maryemma Graham, Hazel Carby, and Melba Joyce Boyd, who in some instances see the harsh critical reception granted Harper by Redding and others as the short-sightedness of male critics. In the 1970s, at the height of the male-dominated black arts movement, the critic Addison Gayle, Jr., continued to assail Iola Leroy, calling it a “disastrous” case of literary assimilation wherein the thought of Harper’s contemporary, the radical black nationalist Martin R. Delany, was not at all taken into consideration (31). Working deftly to extract Harper’s novel from such an attack, Carby, in 1987, countered that the novel constituted an important representation of life during the Reconstruction era. Further, she argued that Harper’s work was not as deeply steeped in the tradition of 19th-century sentimentality as Redding and Gayle contended. Iola Leroy served as proof that Harper was intent on subverting the conventional lives of women. She believed it to be the responsibility of the African-American writer to take on these topics, and by way of treating such subjects as racism, morality, citizenship, and male-female relationships, the writer would be in a position to address holistically the concerns of the African-American community.

In this way Harper was an intellectual of her time. Born Frances Ellen Watkins, in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1825, she lived during the age of what was called the “peculiar institution”—slavery. Though she and her parents were free people of color, they inhabited a state well known for its harsh practices of enslaving African Americans. Harper’s parents died when she was only three years old, but fortunately she was not left to fend for herself in the wilderness of slavery. She was taken to live with her uncle, William Watkins, and it was there that she was inculcated with the ideals of Christianity, the central principles of which remained with her throughout her life and left a mark that may be seen in all of her work, no matter the genre. Her uncle and his family were devoted members of the AME Church and were involved in local politics. William Watkins ran a school that Harper attended and where she excelled in oratory and writing.

As did most young people of her generation, Harper left school early to obtain employment. By age 13 or so, she was working as a domestic in Baltimore while continuing to read and practice her writing. Her employer was a book merchant, who gave her access to his library, and she took full advantage of his collection, reading and drafting works of poetry. Her compositions began to appear in newspapers, and, when she was 21, she was sufficiently polished to complete a book of poems, entitled Forest Leaves (and sometimes referred to as Autumn Leaves), which was published in Baltimore in 1846. No copy of this first volume is known to exist.

Harper soon grew weary of living in the slave state of Maryland. She longed to live and die in what she memorialized in one of her poems as a “free land.” With this in mind, she moved to the free state of Ohio, where she took a position as an instructor at Union Seminary, a school founded by the Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1847. Union would be dissolved in 1863, when the AME bishop Daniel Payne purchased property on which to build Wilberforce University, whose faculty and student body would absorb that of Union. Harper served as an instructor there from 1850 through 1851.

In 1852 she took a position teaching in Little York, Pennsylvania. The Fugitive Slave Act had taken effect in 1850, and in 1853 Harper's home state of Maryland passed a law stating that any person of color who entered the state by way of its northern border could be sold into slavery. Effectively, this meant that Harper could never go home again. In Pennsylvania she became involved with the Underground Railroad, and it was during this time that she published the poem "Eliza Harris," which appeared both in William Lloyd Garrison's Liberator and in Frederick Douglass's Paper in December 1853. A dramatic poem of 14 quatrains, "Eliza Harris" echoes the theme of HARRIET BEECHER STOWE'S Uncle Tom's Cabin. Emphasizing the indelible ties between mother and child, Harper exposes the shame of slavery, a stain on her country's "glory" and a mockery of its "star spangled banner." In an era during which pro-slavery agitators insisted that black women were incapable of love for their children (and thus that it was no shame that these children were regularly sold away from them), Harper, basing her poem on an incident that had occurred in Cincinnati, Ohio, insisted otherwise. She would emphasize her determination to critique and historicize slavery's cruelty in "The Slave Mother: A Tale of the Ohio" (1856), which dramatizes the true story of Margaret Garner. Garner, whom Harper depicts as drawn toward the state of Ohio by the brightly shining "northern star," fled there with her four children in search of freedom. Her quest was thwarted by the Fugitive Slave Act; as she faced recapture, Garner determined that her children would be better off in death than in a life of perpetual servitude. Indeed, Harper insists that Garner fulfilled her motherly duty toward her children: "I will save my precious children / From their darkly threatened doom, / I will hew their path to freedom / Through the portals of the tomb" (A Brighter Coming Day 85). Garner succeeded in killing one child, the infant, before she was subdued and captured. Harper closes the poem thus: "Sends this deed of fearful daring / Through my country's heart no thrill, / Do the icy hands of slavery / Every pure emotion chill? / Oh! If there is any honor, / Truth or justice in the land, / Will ye not, as men and Christians, / On the side of freedom stand?" Garner's American tragedy and Harper's appeal to American conscience would be echoed in the modern work of Toni Morrison. Morrison fictionalized the plight of Margaret Garner, and, by extension, America's plight, in her Pulitzer Prize-winning novel Beloved (1987). She also penned the words to the libretto of the opera Margaret Garner (2005).

By the time Harper poetically historicized the tragedy of Margaret Garner, she had printed a second book of poetry, Poems on Miscellaneous Subjects (1854). She had also entered the realm of speaker on the antislavery lecture circuit. She spoke throughout the state of Maine, as well as in parts of Canada. Mary Ann Shadd Cary, the expatriate African-American newspaper editor who had taken up residence in Ontario (in order to escape the reach of the Fugitive Slave Act), remarked upon Harper's popularity and effectiveness as a lecturer, referring to her as "the greatest female speaker" ever to visit her area (Boyd 45). While Harper was on tour, she sold copies of her books, donating a portion of the proceeds to the cause of the Underground Railroad. She continued her work on the lecture circuit until her 1860 marriage to Fenton Harper, a widower with three children. Their marriage produced a daughter, Mary, born to them in 1862.

Fenton, however, died in 1864, leaving substantial debt that Harper was called to offset through her own efforts. Once again, she took to lecturing, and she was well received. She had not been silent during her married years, though she had remained ensconced on her husband's farm outside Columbus, Ohio. She had, in fact, published a poem on motherhood and another commemorating "President Lincoln's Proclamation of Freedom," and had given a few lectures. When Harper returned fully to public life, she became a member of the newly established Equal Rights Association. There, she became associated with not only FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Sojourner Truth, but also Harriet and Robert Purvis, Susan B. Anthony, Lucretia Mott, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Harper soon found herself at odds with her new colleagues. She could fully agree neither with Douglass's insistence that the quest for freedom for all African Americans and suffrage for black men trumped the suffrage demands of women, nor with Anthony, Mott, and Stanton, who saw Douglass as something of a traitor to their feminist cause. They insisted that to grant freedom to blacks and suffrage to black men was to imperil white women gravely. While Harper often saw herself as a mediator between the two camps, she could not help but see Douglass's point and called for the immediate emancipation of persons of African descent as a more urgent need than woman's suffrage. In her poetry and fiction she in turn called upon African-American men to be "true" men and to protect the rights and virtue of African-American women.

With the end of the Civil War in 1865 began nominal freedom for African Americans, nominal because while they were free by law, they were certainly not free in truth. They continued to suffer degradation and discrimination and were made to endure the terrorist onslaught of the Ku Klux Klan and other racist organizations. The year 1865 marked the beginning of a brief period of Reconstruction in the South, and the founding of the Freedmen's Bureau offered Harper glimmering hope that the nation intended to shepherd the newly freed slaves through a period of transition and into full enfranchisement. Thinking that the sacrifice of her friend John Brown (who had led the ill-fated raid on Harpers Ferry in Virginia in 1859) had not been in vain, Harper quickly headed south to see to the needs of the emancipated slaves while maintaining her ties to the North. She taught and lectured, preaching a doctrine of humanism to persons of both races. It was during the Reconstruction period, in 1869, that she published her most striking work of poetry, Moses: A Story of the Nile. A book-length narrative poem divided into nine chapters, this work marks a sharp departure from Harper's earlier compositions. In it she neglects the form of rhyming quatrains that had characterized so much of her poetry in favor a free verse form. Moses, a Christian archetype who appears in a number of Harper's works, plays a prominent role in her formulation of a symbolic system, whereby the plight of African Americans was allegorized through the plight of the Hebrews. Harper's poetics shine forcefully in this work. It is, perhaps, the pinnacle of her compositions.

Of her four novels only one was initially published in book form. Her first novel, Minnie's Sacrifice, appeared in 1869 as a serial publication of the Christian Recorder, consisting of 20 chapters published over a six-month period. It clearly reflects the Moses archetype so prevalent in Harper's poetry and developed at length in Moses: A Story of the Nile. Her second serialized novel, also in the Christian Recorder, is Sowing and Reaping (1876–77). Appearing near the close of Reconstruction, the novel is, in Harper's words, a "temperance story" with minimal focus on race that cautions against excessive alcohol consumption and immoral behavior. The final serialized novel is Trial and Triumph (1888–89), whose heroine resembles in some ways Harper herself. The heroine, Annette Harcourt, is orphaned at a young age and lives with her grandmother, Mrs. Harcourt. The grandmother's death leaves the girl bereft, and she is placed in her uncle's home to live with him and his family. Unlike the loving environment Harper enjoyed in her own uncle's home after the death of her parents, Annette finds neither acceptance nor love in her new situation. She enters womanhood under the guidance of her teacher, Mrs. Lasette, who schools her in writing, oratory, and morals and warns her, and the reader, against aggressive materialism and impiety. These three novels have been collected and edited by Frances Smith Foster and appeared in book form for the first time in 1994. Iola Leroy; or, Shadows Uplifted is Harper's best-known work. It is her only novel to appear initially in book form and was published in 1892. Situated around the time of the Civil War and its immediate aftermath, Iola Leroy examines questions of race and color, class and education, and the right path for an emerging African-American middle class.

Before her death in 1911 Harper would go on to publish five more collections of poetry: The Martyr of Alabama (1894); Atlanta Offerings (1895); Poems (1896; reprinted in 1898 and 1900); Idylls of the Bible (1901), which contains a reprint of Moses: A Story of the Nile; and The Sparrow's Fall and

Other Poems (no date). In many ways Harper epitomizes Ralph Ellison's ideal writer, though Ellison himself never analyzed her work. In her writings Harper treated the African American, both slave and free, as a symbol of humanity, a literary gesture Ellison considered to be "organic to 19th-century literature" (32). Harper's attentions to the ironies and tragedies attendant on 19th-century America underscore her insistence upon the moral responsibility of U.S. literature. She was not, however, content with being an "armchair" intellectual and moralist. Instead, she shaped her thought into praxis. She insisted on active engagement with American society, male as well as female, black as well as white.

"The Slave Mother" (1854)

This poem, appearing in Harper's collection Poems on Miscellaneous Subjects (first published in 1854, with revised editions in 1857 and 1874), solidified Harper's reputation as a poet. It was immensely popular, and she was regularly called upon to recite it. The poem takes up themes close to Harper's heart: motherhood, the ties between mother and child, and the horrors of slavery. Harper eschews the popular meter of iambic pentameter in favor of alternating lines of verse written in iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter. The first two lines of the opening stanza are written in iambic trimeter, and thus they are read quickly: "Heard you that shriek? It rose / So wildly on the air." The reader is by this means plunged into the poem's narrative suspense, and emphasis is placed on these lines as conveying the central action around which the poem revolves. As we continue to engage lines of alternating meter, we are carried along by the relatively quick tempo of the poem, our eyes falling down the page until we reach the final stanza, which concludes the narrative thus: "No marvel, then, these bitter shrieks / Disturb the listening air: / She is a mother, and her heart / Is breaking in despair." By moving us along so quickly, yet never relenting in the intensity of her message, Harper's use of meter works effectively with the meaning, for while we are briefly uplifted by the poem's imagery in the seventh stanza ("His love has been a joyous light / That o'er her pathway smiled, / A fountain gushing ever new, / Amid life's desert wild"), we are swiftly carried along the stream of the slave mother's despair.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Critics such as J. Saunders Redding have argued that Harper's poems evince "errors of metrical construction which, missed when the poems are spoken, show up painfully on the printed page" (44). Considering the first two lines of the poem, which are written in a different alternating meter than the poem's remainder, write a paragraph defending Harper's use of meter in "The Slave Mother."
2. Though Harper's use of meter draws the reader's eye swiftly down the page, her metrical feet progress slowly enough to resemble natural speech patterns. Given Harper's use of this poem in her antislavery lectures, how might the speech rhythms of the poem have contributed to its power?
3. Consider the ways in which Harper's poem "The Slave Mother" may be compared to the characters Eliza Harris and Cassy in Harriet Beecher Stowe's novel Uncle Tom's Cabin. Pay particular attention to chapters 7 and 34 in the Stowe novel.

"On the Twenty-fourth Anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society" (1857)

This essay is a valuable statement of Harper's politics near the middle of the 19th century. It is not widely anthologized, nor widely read, yet it occurs at a crucial moment in the history of African Americans. In 1857 the United States found itself in the throes of financial panic, thereby placing utmost importance on the institution of slavery as an economic engine. Slavery formed the backbone of the nation's burgeoning industrial revolution, and any attempt to abolish it was seen as a great threat. This was, in addition to the fear of race mixing and racial equality, a matter that motivated slaveholders to block all attempts at emancipating the slaves. The position of slaveholders seemed to be supported by the 1857 ruling in the now-infamous Dred Scott case. The Compromise of 1850 had sought to assuage the sentiments of Southern slaveholding states, establishing a balance of power between North and South through the passage of the Fugitive Slave Act. However, the compromise proved an insufficient temporary measure; it set the slaveholding South in a mode of great vigilance and political posturing, just as it encouraged Northern abolitionists to battle more diligently for the eradication of slavery. The Dred Scott decision, which occurred shortly before Harper gave this essay as a speech, added fuel to the sectional tensions and, it may rightly be said, furthered the nation along the path to civil war. Dred Scott, a slave who had been taken by his master from the slave state of Missouri to the free state of Illinois and then again to Missouri sued for his freedom in a Missouri court. He based his case upon the fact of his temporary residence in a free territory; because he had lived on free soil, he asserted that he had a right to liberty. The case slowly made its way from the Missouri court system to the United States Supreme Court. It was there that in a decision rendered with the support of seven Supreme Court justices (two of the jurists dissented), Chief Justice Roger B. Taney declared that African Americans were not citizens and thus had no legal recourse to the justice system. At the same time the justices nullified the Missouri Compromise of 1820, which had forbidden slavery in that part of the Louisiana Purchase north of the latitude 36°30', except in Missouri. It is this infamous decision of the nation's highest court that Harper references when she quotes Taney, writing, "You are a negro [sic]; you have no rights which white men are bound to respect."

This essay is as remarkable for its emphasis upon the failing economy of the 1850s as for its critique of the North. Harper's economic analysis of slavery is of a piece with that put forward by the abolitionist and orator Frederick Douglass. His masterpiece of oration "What to the Slave is the Fourth of July?" (1852) foreshadows Harper's words. Moreover, her critique of the North seems to have been conditioned by the thought that it might be morally profitable for the North to separate itself, politically, from the South; in essence, Harper called for the "disunion" of North and South. During summer 1857 Harper, along with her friend the 19th-century African-American autobiographer, novelist, playwright, and abolitionist William Wells Brown, would present her ideas on "disunion" before a convention assembled to debate the point.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Douglass's essay "What to the Slave Is the Fourth of July?" Compare this essay, which Douglass read before the Ladies Antislavery Society of Rochester, New York, in 1852, to Harper's essay. Comment on the historical period and the audiences to whom the essays were delivered. Give some attention to rhetorical devices and effectiveness.
2. Research the Dred Scott decision, and write an essay that analyzes Harper's speech through the prism of this historical judicial proceeding.

"The Two Offers" (1859)

"The Two Offers" was Harper's first attempt at short fiction, and it is considered by most scholars to be the first short story written by an American of African descent. Published in 1859, it echoes themes that are to be found in other works by Harper, most notably her second novel, Sowing and Reaping: A Temperance Story (1876–77). The story is first and foremost a tale of morals. It concerns two cousins, Laura Lagrange, the only daughter of a rich family, and Janette Alston, a young woman born to a family of modest means. While Laura has been doted upon, Janette has made her way alone in the world since the death of her parents.

Harper introduces the characters immediately after Laura has received two offers of marriage. Laura eventually chooses one of the two men, and we meet the cousins again after the passage of 10 years. The central ideas of the story take shape as Laura lies on her deathbed, neglected by her husband, and passes mercifully from this life to the next. Like Sowing and Reaping, “The Two Offers” is a temperance story. Laura dies of neglect by a husband who is taken to drink and loose living. Even the birth and death of their child do not draw the husband back to the fold of the home, and this is because he had not been “blessed” with a home that was “the birthplace of high resolves, and the altar upon which lofty aspirations are kindled” (A Brighter Coming Day 111). The narrator condemns the husband’s mother for his shortcomings, for her duty was to teach him “how to produce the grandest of all poems—the poetry of a true and noble life” (110).

While Laura soon loses her zest for living, her cousin Janette has remained unmarried, withstanding taunts regarding her status as an old maid. The biography of Harper probably enters the story through Janette. Harper was 34 years of age when she composed this story and did not marry until the year after its publication; thus, it is likely that the moral she presents to her reader echoes the moralizing process of her own life. As Janette turns from Laura’s deathbed, we note that the “higher and better” (114) goals of Janette’s life had taken shape in Harper’s own life work: “In her the down-trodden slave found an earnest advocate; the flying fugitive remembered her kindness as he stepped cautiously through our Republic, to gain his freedom in a monarchical land, having broken the chains on which the rust of centuries had gathered” (114). The author’s final caution is in these lines: “True happiness consists not so much in the fruition of our wishes as in the regulation of desires and the full development and right culture of our whole natures” (114).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider that Harper uses this story to comment upon the role of women in 19th-century society. How does Harper construe marriage, motherhood, and the private space of the home?
2. Harper positions Janette and Laura as opposites in this story. How do their differences (of wealth, marital status, employment, etc.) serve to move the plot forward?
3. The narrator speaks of mothers as “artists,” who should be capable of “writing on the soul of childhood the harmony of love and truth” (110). Consider the convergence of motherhood, poetry, and idealism in this story.
4. In what ways does Harper’s short story “The Two Offers” exemplify women’s writing of the mid-19th century? Compare and contrast Harper’s story with the final chapter of HARRIET JACOBS’s nonfiction work Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl.

“Bury Me in a Free Land” (1864)

This is the poem through which Harper has become known to readers today. Critics generally refer to the poem as Harper’s epitaph. In a composition of eight quatrains, each stanza of the poem develops a scene that reinforces the poem’s overall meaning, which is, in short, a call to abolition. The major devices that move the poem along are rhyme and repetition. The end rhyme scheme Harper uses is aabb; she employs both pure rhymes and slant rhymes. Pure rhymes make up the largest part of the rhyme scheme, existing in such pairs as will/hill, grave/slave, and lash/gash. Slant rhymes, in which sounds are closely related but not identical, occur in such combinations as bay/prey and high/by, and even these are quite close to pure rhymes. The rhyming combination of grave/slave repeats in the second stanza, and the word slaves closes the poem. Harper’s use of repetition is dramatic, as she places a narrator in the text to convey a vividly imagined set of scenes. The most constant repetition in the poem is a variation upon the first-person pronoun, I. None of the stanzas lacks this pronoun. Stanzas 2 through 4 employ anaphora, in other words, they commence similarly: “I could not rest,” “I could not sleep,” “I could not rest.” With each recurrence we are reminded of the poet’s dying wish for peace in death, yet we are also compelled to examine that which conditions her wish, the prevalence of slavery in the land of her birth. Thus, birth and death are juxtaposed; the recurrence of the I in the poem keeps us quite aware of the narrator’s existence and subjectivity, and with each recurrence we are just as aware of the imminent proximity of her death. With each stanza, with each recurrence, a new aspect of her dilemma is presented to dramatically different effect.

For Discussion or Writing

1. The poem ends in a rhyme scheme similar to that which closes the first stanza. How does this technique lend significance to the poem?
2. When a poet repeats a pattern, she or he wishes to evoke a certain response. In this poem each stanza forms a complete sentence. Write a brief essay discussing how Harper uses patterns of syntax in this poem to influence the way the reader experiences the composition.

“President Lincoln’s Proclamation of Freedom” (1865)

This poem, written about 1865, is a composition of nine quatrains. In lyrical expression of hope for the future, the strongest structural characteristics of this poem are rhyme and repetition. The rhyme scheme is abcb. We have, of course, seen such a scheme in much poetry from Harper; however, in this poem Harper insists upon pure rhyming elements. The rhyming pairs of each quatrain are years/tears, bright/light, Caroline/shine, crime/time, key/free, light/light, dust/just, away/day, light/sight. The first point we are led to notice is the absence of slant rhyme. Slant rhymes can be great innovations; they often insist upon the unexpected. Pure rhymes are clear and bold; they call attention to the poet’s versification and intentions. The pure rhyming pairs are metronomes; they establish a pattern, both aural and visual. They are neither opposites nor synonyms; by themselves, they establish no true sense of meaning. Their purpose appears to lie in their ability to call attention to the meaning that inheres in each stanza. In this way they work in concert with the repetition of certain elements of the poem. The word shall, which appears 15 times in the poem, sharply underscores the poet’s emphasis on a determined future for the newly freed slaves. It appears in all but one stanza and is connected to images of light and processes of enlightenment that, the poet intimates, attend emancipation. The reference to “the sun-kissed brow of labor” should be read in light of Harper’s poem “Free Labor” (discussed later). Self-determination, freedom to participate as workers in the public marketplace, and the moral attributes of labor (through which one contributes to society) are all emphasized in the poem. The use of anaphora in the poem (primarily through the repetition of the phrase “It shall” in the first three stanzas) grants this piece the quality of an anthem. Though the anaphora breaks off in the middle of the poem, the rhythm reminds one of the strident tones of Julia Ward Howe’s “The Battle Hymn of the Republic” (1862).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Research the condition of free laborers and artisans of African-American descent during the Reconstruction period, and write a paper that expands upon the concept of “free labor” expressed in Harper’s poetry. One book that might be helpful to such a project is Black Reconstruction in America: 1860–1800 (1935), by W. E. B. DuBois.
2. Explain the way Harper personifies oppression in this poem (see stanzas 6 and 7). How does her use of personification add strength to her poem?
3. Discuss the sorts of imagery at work in this piece. How, for instance, are colors used? What effectiveness lies in the imagery of mountains? How are light and darkness juxtaposed?

This poem exemplifies Harper’s ideas regarding the intersection of her Christian beliefs and her poetic leanings. She bases this poem on a scene from the first chapter of the Book of Esther in the Old Testament. Harper’s focus is not on Esther, an orphaned Jewish maiden who became queen of Persia and thus was able to save the Jews from persecution. Instead, Harper focuses on Esther's predecessor, Vashti, who relinquished her crown in lieu of debasing herself before a throng of royalty. This poem allows Harper obliquely to expound her beliefs in both temperance and "true womanhood," for the biblical verses she expands upon tell us that Vashti's husband, Ahasuerus (Xerxes), king of Persia, was inebriated ("The king was merry with wine," Esther 1:10). Vashti's refusal marks her as a woman of honor in Harper's eyes. More important, her refusal to unveil herself led the king to issue a decree that would strengthen male dominance in his provinces, demonstrating that he and his counselors felt threatened by Vashti's defiance. Although the unknown author of this historical book of the Bible grants Vashti no voice (she does not speak there; she only—but importantly—defies Xerxes), Harper uses her 17-stanza poem to grant Vashti speech. In alternating stanzas of iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter, Vashti speaks and acts through an abcb rhyme scheme. The swiftness of the poem underscores the urgency of her situation and reinforces her right to stand upon her moral principles: She would rather give up her diadem than live in shame as queen. She refuses to be objectified as merely one of the king's possessions. Though the Bible does not depict Vashti's actual departure, Harper shows her leaving under the light of grace, a "woman who could bend to grief, / But would not bow to shame."

For Discussion or Writing

1. Harper's poem about Vashti may be called an encomium, or a laudatory poem that celebrates a historical person. Compare the first chapter of the Book of Esther to Harper's poem and explain the importance of voice in the poem.
2. Read a few works by Harper (the short story "The Two Offers," along with other works mentioned here, will suffice), and identify core elements of Harper's style. What sorts of words does she enjoy using? How does her word choice, along with her use of poetic structure, convey her values?

"An Appeal to the American People" (1871)

Like "Free Labor," "An Appeal to the American People" was probably written during the Reconstruction era in the year 1871, though it differs from "Free Labor" in form and theme. It consisted of seven sestets and uses a rhyme scheme of aabbcc. The poet calls for the maintenance of democratic rights achieved in the aftermath of the Civil War and the abolition of slavery. Obviously, the poet responds to the threat of the Ku Klux Klan when she writes of the "traitor who stands / With the crimson on his hands, / Scowling 'neath his brow of hate, / On our weak and desolate, / With the blood-rust on the knife / Aimed at the nation's life." In penning these words, Harper took a risk that, in real terms, could have jeopardized her life. Ida B. Wells, who had documented lynchings by the Klan and lynch mobs, would be driven from her newspaper office in Tennessee by threats against her life in the 1890s. The racist hatred of the Klan would be infamously memorialized and glorified in 1915 by the filmmaker D. W. Griffith, whose film Birth of a Nation depicted Klan members as the restorers and protectors of the nation's ideals. Harper's work would provide a counterargument to the diatribe of Griffith, and her lectures and poetry served as an example to Wells, who traveled to England to gain support for her antilynching campaign. Forcefully Harper's poem speaks to the democratic moral sensibilities of the American people. In this spirit she appeals to the reader not to allow the "traitor" to "write above our slain / 'They have fought and died in vain.'"

For Discussion or Writing

1. Do a library search for the work of Ida B. Wells-Barnett, and write a paper discussing the role of Harper and Wells-Barnett as 19th-century black feminists in the antilynching movement.
2. Identify those elements of this poem that provide the basis for Harper's use of the word traitor. In what ways do the injustices that she details in the poem constitute traitorous conduct? Can you identify groups in contemporary American society that might qualify as traitorous in the same sense?

“Aunt Chloe’s Politics” (1872)

Published in Sketches of Southern Life, “Aunt Chloe’s Politics” is one of a number of “Aunt Chloe” poems. In them Aunt Chloe emerges as a plainspoken moralist and appears to be a composite sketch of wise African-American women Harper encountered during her travels through the South. The Aunt Chloe who appears in this collection of poetry undoubtedly serves as a model for Aunt Linda, a character who figures importantly in Harper’s most accomplished work of fiction, Iola Leroy: Or, Shadows Uplifted (1892). It is reasonable to assume that the women Harper encountered during her visits to the South, and who served collectively as the basis for the characters of Aunt Chloe and Aunt Linda, did not match up well with some of the standard features of Harper’s usual poetic style. While she maintains her use of iambic meter and alternating lines of three and four iambic feet, she seems to have relinquished her use of anaphora, traditional imagery of light, and so forth. In its place we find the consistent play of black vernacular speech. Aunt Chloe’s language is ripe with such commonplaces as double descriptives (“mighty ugly,” found in the first stanza, and “honey-fugle,” appearing in the second stanza). It is important to note that while these were commonplaces in the everyday speech of the African-American working class, they were ingenious innovations in Western poetic forms. Chloe’s expressive use of the structure “looking (someone) in the face” foreshadows Zora Neale Hurston’s use and discussion of the phrase “to kill (someone) dead.” In Hurston’s essay “Characteristics of Negro Expression” (1934), the writer, anthropologist, and sociolinguist (whose most famous work is the 1937 novel Their Eyes Were Watching God) notes that the repetitive nature of such phrases is purposeful, serving as both a flourish of language and an underscoring of the action involved. Certainly, one would expect that if we look at someone, we look at that person’s face unless we indicate otherwise; similarly, if someone is killed by whatever means, that person is dead. The repetition in “kill dead” is superfluous but lends an emphatic character to the language. The phrase “to school our children,” appearing in the fourth stanza, is an exemplary verbalization of a noun; this usage is seminal to African-American vernacular expression and spread in prevalence from primarily African-American communities to general use throughout the South. With her series of poems on Aunt Chloe, Harper won praise from even her harshest critics. J. Saunders Redding, who had roundly criticized her poems as lacking in force and originality, saw Harper’s vernacular poems as groundbreaking. Harper had, Redding reluctantly admitted, anticipated PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR’s use of dialect and James Weldon Johnson’s attention to folk speech. Further, she had done so without becoming ensnared in what Redding, Johnson, and others called the trap of dialect poetry. According to these critics, dialect poetry could do little more than express humor and pathos. Harper had succeeded in moving beyond the limitations of dialect poetry as a literary convention.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Zora Neale Hurston’s essay “Characteristics of Negro Expression,” and use Hurston’s argument to explain Harper’s incorporation of vernacular expression in this poem.
2. Analyze Harper’s poem for its use of metaphor and other instances of figurative language. Consider especially the ways her use of figurative language further establishes Aunt Chloe as a practical person who shrewdly draws on familiar experiences in establishing her point of view.
3. Read the Aunt Chloe poems from Sketches of Southern Life and discuss development of this character. How does Aunt Chloe serve as a voice for Harper’s ideals of womanhood, morality, equality, and Christianity?
4. Explain how the references to selling one’s race and “buying up each other” function in this poem. Think especially of the historical and cultural context in which Harper was writing.

“Free Labor” (1874)

Appearing in the collection Poems on Miscellaneous Subjects, “Free Labor” undoubtedly attends to the dilemma of the newly emancipated African-American worker. It is not, however, a poem that has received broad critical attention, nor is it widely anthologized. “Free Labor” constitutes a rare moment in Harper’s poetic output when the import of the composition’s title is not readily reflected in the poem itself. We are called to deduce the relationship between title and poem by way of interpretation. Harper uses seven quatrains to present a narrative poem, the movement of which is guided by a speaker, I. The tone is gentle, and one has the sense that although Harper here uses a rhyme scheme of abcb and alternating lines of iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter, we are not led through our reading by a sense of urgency. Indeed, the title, “Free Labor,” imparts a sense not simply of ease but also of relief and autonomy. This sense is established by the first stanza: “I wear an easy garment, / O’er it no toiling slave / Wept tears of hopeless anguish, / In his passage to the grave.” The voice is that of the freed slave, employing his labor for his own sustenance and not for the leisure of a master who does not work himself. The freedman’s sentiments are channeled through the garment he wears, which is personified to some extent. The ease of the garment, its amplex, its freedom from burdens, all reflect the emotions of the speaker. The garment the speaker wears as he works, free from oppression, reinforces the speaker’s sense of liberated subjectivity.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Each stanza of this poem recounts an instance of degradation from which the speaker has been freed. Discuss Harper’s use of such moments in light of the title of the poem, “Free Labor.”
2. This poem was written at the height of the Reconstruction era. Research this era and the questions regarding labor that were important at this time, and write a paper that places this poem in a political and economic context.
3. Read the poem closely for elements that repeat, such as “light” or “lightly,” and discuss the meaning Harper intends to convey through such repetition.

“Woman’s Political Future” (1893)

One of Harper’s more widely anthologized essays, this piece was given as a speech before the World’s Congress of Representative Women as part of the World’s Columbian Exposition. Christianity, temperance, family, and human rights are all themes that Harper forcefully exerts in this essay, which may be one of her finest.

The fair, which took place in Chicago 28 years after the close of the Civil War, was intended by U.S. industrialists such as the steel magnate Andrew Carnegie to demonstrate America’s progress and prowess since the Civil War. Carnegie considered world’s fairs to be bloodless fields of international striving upon which each nation contended for artistic, scientific, and technological supremacy. The fairs were also meant to be material displays of white men’s social and political power, although white women were also designated a single building dedicated to the display of their work and advancement. Significantly, the Women’s Building was designed by a woman architect, Sophia Hayden. Further, it must be noted that, after much agitation by Frederick Douglass, Ida B. Wells, and others, African Americans were given a small exhibition space inside the Women’s Building and were allowed as visitors to the fair on one day alone: August 25, 1893. Yet, it has often been remarked that the very layout of the fairgrounds was meant to underscore the supremacy of white men in all realms of life: The Women’s Building was situated at the edge of what was called the White City and could be found near the entrance to the Midway Plaisance. The Midway was home to displays of persons of color from around the world, largely those of colonized countries. It also provided space for the amusement of visitors to the fair; while the White City displayed the height of technological knowledge and military might, the Midway granted one the leisure of observing that which was considered uncivilized. The linear arrangement of the fairgrounds—from the White City of men, to the Women's Building (which enclosed the Negro American exhibit) on the margins of the White City, to the flamboyance of the Midway (where the people of color were themselves on display in makeshift villages and the like)—was yet another way of announcing the ideal order of things in America.

Harper begins her essay by subverting the assumption that lay at the center of the fair's organization—that is, the dominant conviction that all serious cultural advancement was white and male. Because of their ability to contribute morally and spiritually to the advancement of the nation, women, she argues, remain central to not only American but global society. "Mind is more than matter," Harper insists, and because "the highest ideal" is "always the true real," woman, the possessor of true sentiment and knowledge, Harper seems to say, surpasses man in her intellectual purity. As a consequence, woman has the opportunity to lead the world to "grander discoveries" than those made by Christopher Columbus (436).

Of course, Harper's rhetorical posturing here is on point, as the World's Fair that year was held in honor of Columbus's "discovery" of America. (Harper would certainly question the claim to "discovery," as Native Americans had erected a civilization that was already thriving upon Columbus's arrival.) She insists that America was standing "on the threshold of woman's era" (437), an era in which the cultural work of women would open a whole new world of cultural possibilities. It was up to women to build a stronger national character, not only through the rearing and educating of children (this is made clear in Harper's poetry), but also through direct participation in the social sphere. Harper saw voting as supremely important, and she also called upon woman to enter the workforce and claim "at least some of the wealth monopolized by her stronger brother" (437). As her own life evidenced, Harper saw women's future as flourishing beyond the sphere of the domestic. Indeed, she actively advocated the participation of women in political as well as economic realms and called upon them to temper the avarice and immorality of some male leaders with what she referred to as the distinctive feminine virtues of temperance, Christianity, and universal human rights.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In this essay Harper sounds many of the warnings given by another African-American feminist of her time, Anna Julia Cooper. Cooper also presented a lecture at the 1893 Congress of Representative Women, entitled "The Intellectual Progress of the Colored Women in the United States since the Emancipation Proclamation: A Response to Fannie Barrier Williams." Read Cooper's essay, and identify the similarities to and differences from Harper's essay.
2. Research the role of African-American and European-American women at the 1893 fair, and write an essay commenting on the social and political positions espoused by these two groups.
3. Ida B. Wells, Frederick Douglass, and other African-American activists compiled a collection of essays entitled The Reason Why the Colored American Is Not in the World's Columbian Exposition (1893). Wells contributed an essay entitled "Lynch Law" to this collection. Read her essay, and discuss how it elaborates on one of the last lines of Harper's text: "How can any woman send petitions to Russia against the horrors of Siberian prisons if, ages after the Inquisition has ceased to devise its tortures, she has not done all she could by influence, tongue, and pen to keep men from making bonfires of the bodies of real or supposed criminals?" (439).

"An Appeal to My Country Women" (1894)

"An Appeal to My Country Women" was written in 1894 and appears in the volume Poems published in 1895. Here, Harper employs a poetic mode that is less common to her work, that of alternating lines of anapest tetrameter and trimeter. In general, it is rare to find poems written in this syllabic pattern, and for this reason we understand that Harper wishes this poem to grasp our attention and hold it rapt. The poem moves forward at a swift, marching pace, and it seems no coincidence that the “Star Spangled Banner” (1814) is written in the same meter and accent pattern. “An Appeal to My Country Women,” too, is a patriotic composition. The poem appeals specifically to the white women of America, urging them to join the newly freed slaves in empathy and sympathy. Comparing the lot of African-American men and women to that of the “sad-eyed Armenian” and the “exile of Russia,” Harper places the plight of African-American Southern laborers within a global context. Strikingly, she adopts a tone that is rare for her work, one of warning against a gathering threat. The poem practically constitutes a jeremiad (a prophetic warning of divine punishment), yet it does not list complaints alone. Consider these lines: “Weep not, oh my well-sheltered sisters, / Weep not for the Negro alone, / But weep for your sons who must gather / The crops which their fathers have sown.” Echoing the title of her second novel, Sowing and Reaping, Harper calls her female readers to take heed of the impending consequences of what she refers to as criminal acts in the wake of emancipation. The speaker in this poem assumes a public voice through which she speaks, as a feminist and social activist, on behalf of those who suffer from a common experience of degradation. The viewpoint the poet espouses is transparent; her tone makes it clear that the reader must make a difficult, but necessary, choice. Such is underscored by her use of conceit, or extended metaphor, in the last quatrain: “Tis the judgment of God that men reap / The tares which in madness they sow, / Sorrow follows the footsteps of crime, / And Sin is the consort of Woe.” The conceit consists in the extended imagery of men reaping that which they have sown. Harper refers to the “madness,” “crime,” and “Sin” inherent in their sowing and the “judgment” of “sorrow” and “Woe” that results. In her admonishments to the reader, Harper risks alienation. The greater hope and the greater benefit, however, lie in capturing the sympathy of the audience and in compelling them to take moral action.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Poems written in the anapestic meter are rare because it is difficult to match the subject of the poem to the composition’s meter. Reread the poem, analyzing it for meter, syllable pattern, and cohesion. Note any irregularities in meter or accent pattern, and discuss the way these irregularities illuminate important features of the poem and enhance its effectiveness.
2. Harper makes effective symbolic use of what may be called the “perceptual field” in this poem; that is, in this poem she uses visual images that may be taken for symbols—they stand for more than themselves. Analyze the poem’s use of visual symbolism, noting symbols that may be judged to be archetypal, or universal. Also note those symbols that seem to you to be personal to the poet.
3. Do some research on the World’s Columbian Exposition of 1893, held in Chicago. That year Harper presented a lecture, entitled “Woman’s Political Future,” before the World’s Congress of Representative Women, which had gathered at the exposition. Discuss how the themes of “An Appeal to My Country Women” dovetail with those of “Woman’s Political Future.”

“A Double Standard” (1895)

“A Double Standard” appears in the collection Atlanta Offerings: Poems (1895). In it Harper revisits a theme familiar to her work, that of the equality of the sexes. While the first stanza may give the reader the impression that the poem refers to love lost (“Do you blame me that I love him / If when standing all alone / I cried for bread a careless world / Pressed to my lips a stone”), the poem actually laments the dual standards employed in judging the morality of men and women. Harper makes the case that women are held to a higher standard of morality than are men; women, unlike men, are not allowed casual relationships between the sexes. If they engage in such relationships, they inevitably are ostracized, even as their male counterparts are welcomed in the most exclusive homes. The poem

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS (1848–1908)

Here come Brer Rabbit pacin' down de road—lippity-clippity, clippity-lippity—dez ez sassy ez a jay-bird.

(Uncle Remus)

In 1882 at the home of George Washington Cable, a southern writer famous for his New Orleans dialect, a group of children gathered with hushed excitement, waiting for their promise to be fulfilled—namely, that Joel Chandler Harris, known to America as the lovable plantation storyteller Uncle Remus, was going to read the famous Tar-Baby story. How fascinating it must have been for the children in the moments before Harris's entry to conjure up visions of this dignified slave with a knack for entertaining through witty tales who was about to recount for them the stories of Brer Rabbit and Brer Fox from his own lips while they pretended to be the nameless little white boy whom Uncle Remus instructed in Harris's tales. However, the children were not prepared to discover the true extent that the fictional narrator of a story may differ from its actual author. As Harris entered, he was greeted with cries of dismay and the unrestrained bluntness of children: "Why, he's white!" Their astonishment registered the fact that for the children of Harris's day the fictional slave narrator Uncle Remus was as tangible as their own parents.

The children's disappointment serves as a testament to the artistry and accomplishments of Harris, who, from his boyhood days, developed a keen ear for dialect and an ability to reproduce aptly the poetic cadences of African-American vernacular speech. His achievement extends beyond being a pioneer in writing dialect: He also anticipated the discipline of folklore through his tales, captured a passing moment in U.S. history with his depiction of the old plantation South, and, most important, drew an authentic portrait of an enduring character who firmly holds his place in the minds of children. Despite the controversy surrounding Harris's own racist views, in 187 Uncle Remus tales, he succeeded in placing an African American at the forefront of American literature. Today, Harris stands as a force within the literary world and as quintessential a southern writer as any. In his own day his fame was second only to that of MARK TWAIN (Samuel Langhorne Clemens).

Harris, however, would never possess the same flair and social aplomb that Twain did. In fact, on the day he visited Cable's home to read to the children, Harris declined to recite any tales. Even with children as the only audience, Harris felt nothing but awkward and embarrassed. Just a few months prior Harris had rejected an offer from Twain to partner with him on a lecture tour across the country. An unparalleled opportunity to most, the tour represented unbearable exposure to a pathologically shy man from the middle Georgia region. Harris's feelings of insecurity, shame, and vulnerability were deeply rooted in his illegitimate birth. Born in 1848 to the unwed Mary Harris in the immensely conservative area of Eatonton, Georgia, Joel Chandler Harris never knew his father, who was probably an Irish day laborer who absconded soon after Harris's birth. Harris's stars never seemed to shine very favorably on him in his youth. With his mother working as a seamstress, he grew up in utter poverty; physically, he was short, clumsy, and marked with his father's flaming Irish red hair. He spoke with a slight speech impediment, which, when provoked by public situations of embarrassment, could turn into a stammer.

The love of his mother helped stabilize the imbalances of a chaotic childhood; she taught Harris to rely on his talents, one of which was fostered by her reading to him Oliver Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield. Harris later recalls that his desire to write stemmed from his mother's reading this book to him as a child. Mary Harris also sent her son to the local grammar school, where Harris became the stereotypic prankster as a way to deflect attention from his red hair and freckles. Often truant at school and never an exceptional student when he did attend, Harris was celebrated for his mischievous deeds. One market day he loosed scads of pigs onto Main Street and terrified them so much that their squealing spooked the horses, creating general chaos. Oftentimes, Harris would be smitten with the neighbor's crops and organize a gang of friends to steal melons and peaches from the local fields. Whatever the pranks, Harris would consistently use them as a shield for his self-consciousness. As Harris's grammar school education approached an end in his early teens and Mary Harris was in desperate need of financial support, Harris, who frequented the post office to read discarded newspapers and magazines to feed his active mind, stumbled upon an ad that would propel him into a career of writing and mold immutable shapes into his later fiction: "Wanted: An active, intelligent white boy, 14 or 15 years of age, is wanted at this office, to learn the printing business."

Incontrovertibly, the experience at Turnwold Plantation, a relatively benevolent plantation where he began work in the "printing business" became the birthplace for the Uncle Remus tales. Between printing jobs on Turnwold, young Harris had plenty of leisure time to indulge his gifts and ambitions on the 1,000-acre plantation—hunting rabbits and foxes among the wooded areas, visiting the one-room slave cabins, listening to animal stories told by the slaves, and engaging his capacious wit in a plantation library full of classics. There, he became a voracious reader of Geoffrey Chaucer, Charles Dickens, William Shakespeare, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, and EDGAR ALLAN POE; there, he could freely observe life in the South, and perhaps discover that his own self-consciousness and feelings of isolation provided a common bond with the slaves. No doubt Harris projected himself into the slave fables that told of an oppressed underdog figure who triumphed at the end of the day through tricks and pranks. That his experience as a young white boy raptly listening to the stories of the older slaves left an indelible imprint on Harris is made stunningly clear when he invented the Uncle Remus tales 10 years later. At Turnwold a fatherless Harris sought father figures in the plantation's owner, Joseph Turner, who provided young Harris with years of support and instruction in writing, and in one of Turner's slaves, known on the plantation as "Uncle" George Terrell. Harris would later comment that Uncle Remus was a composite of several slaves on Turnwold Plantation. Harris soon began publishing short pieces of humor and poems in the style of Poe in the Turnwold newspaper, the Countryman, but his humorous pieces garnered him most attention and approbation of Joseph Turner, which fueled his desire to be a writer. In short, at Turnwold he had everything at his disposal, and the seeds were planted that would later ripen into the Uncle Remus tales.

While no single event shaped Harris as a writer more than the experience at Turnwold, Harris was forced to move into other endeavors after five years there, when the emancipation of slaves following the Civil War caused the downfall of plantation life. After the Countryman, Harris continued work in the newspaper business and accepted an offer at the Macon Telegraph, where, after only a few months, he was troubled by his coworkers' compulsion to jeer at his red hair. Perhaps to avoid ridicule, perhaps to search for more lucrative opportunities, Harris moved to New Orleans in 1868, but the shy Georgia boy found big city life and the cultural melting pot overwhelming and perturbing at times. He moved back to middle Georgia after less than a year away. After taking menial jobs at various dwarf-sized newspapers, Harris landed a giant-sized job for the times—to be paid $40 a week—as an associate editor for the Savannah Morning News in south Georgia. Harris would settle in Savannah for almost seven years, marrying Esther LaRose there on April 20, 1873, and gaining a statewide reputation for his editorial accomplishments, particularly his paragraph commentaries. Harris's work in Savannah and later in Atlanta was characterized by his penchant for racial joking. Pandering to a predominantly racist audience, Harris's newspaper paragraphs were more subtle than slurring: "The colored people of Macon celebrated the birthday of Lincoln again on Wednesday. This is the third time since last October" (Bickley, Joel Chandler Harris 27). To modern sensibilities Harris's attitude is more than a little discourteous toward African Americans, but placing him in the time of Reconstruction in the Old South, we find his beliefs to be prejudiced but progressive for his day. As for his Savannah life, disaster struck in 1876 when an epidemic of yellow fever spread through the city and forced Harris and his family (by then he had two children) to uproot, but Harris would never again live outside Georgia.

Harris's next move positioned him in Atlanta, a place where he found permanent employment until his retirement in 1900. Working for one of the New South's best known newspapers, Atlanta's Constitution, Harris happened across an article entitled "Folklore of the Southern Negroes," published in a leading magazine. This essay by William Owens included an animal fable called "Buh Rabbit and the Tar Baby." This fortuitous discovery prompted a wealth of Harris's latent memories to rise to consciousness. Never before had Harris considered his own experiences with Southern slaves worthy of publication. Owens's article taught him differently, and within a year's time Harris was publishing stories under the title "Negro Folklore" in the Constitution. While Uncle Remus first appears in the Constitution in 1876, it was not until 1879 that Uncle Remus tales made use of the narrative frame that presents Uncle Remus as an elderly plantation slave telling stories to an inquisitive young white boy sitting on his knee. The Uncle Remus sketches instantly established Harris as a major regional writer. Shortly after he was approached by D. Appleton and Company, Harris's first collection of Uncle Remus tales, and what would turn out to be his most famous, was published in 1881 as Uncle Remus: His Songs and His Sayings, which included not only the tales but also aphoristic phrases and songs of Uncle Remus.

While Harris blossomed as a leading writer in the South, writing Uncle Remus sketches for the paper year after year, the teasing he had experienced throughout his life and his omnipresent insecurity returned in full force. Staff members of the Constitution would occasionally compose epic poems in Harris's name and leave them lying around the office for everyone's entertainment. One notable example parodied Harris's red hair and cited the difficulty the fire brigade had in quenching the burning flames that Harris used to illuminate his desk at night so that he could continue reading. Appropriately written in red ink, the poem further compared Harris's hair to a lighthouse beacon that guides ships through stormy nights. Quick to smother his coworkers' mockery, Harris took to wearing a hat indoors and was rarely seen without one at the Constitution. Harris's physical camouflaging was matched by his own humble remarks about his work. Harris consistently undercut the value of his writing, citing himself as a mere recorder of tales and believing his tales had little historical value.

Perhaps his lifelong involvement with journalism—in which yesterday's news is quickly forgotten—fostered his erroneous sense of the ephemeral importance of language in general and his Remus stories in particular, but one must wonder whether by the time of his death Harris had finally realized his own achievement and place in American literature. By the end of his career Harris had published numerous other collections of Uncle Remus tales, including Nights with Uncle Remus, Uncle Remus and His Friends, The Tar-Baby and Other Rhymes of Uncle Remus, and Told by Uncle Remus: New Stories of the Old Plantation. He had also broadened his writing repertoire and written novels—The Romance of Rockville, A Little Union Scout, and an autobiographical novel titled On the Plantation—not to mention a score of other significant sketches. In 1902 he received an honorary doctorate in literature from Emory College; a few years later he was the only southern writer to be elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters, which included writers such as WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS and Twain. President Theodore Roosevelt hosted a banquet for Harris and proclaimed him a “genius” who never “wrote anything which did not make a man or woman reading it feel a little better” (Julia Harris 42). Harris died at his home in 1908 of acute nephritis and cirrhosis of the liver; he will stand as one of the most influential local color writers, whose works have now been translated into more than 40 languages.

“The Wonderful Tar-Baby Story” (1881)

As a prelude to the Tar-Baby story, Harris begins with a suggestive tale called “Uncle Remus Initiates the Little Boy.” In it Brer Fox orchestrates a scheme whereby Brer Rabbit is invited to dinner—not to eat but to be eaten. However, the shrewd rabbit, under the pretense of finding some calamus root, escapes, yet this ending disappoints the white boy listening to Uncle Remus’s fable, who wishes the fox to consume the rabbit. When Harris refers to Uncle Remus as “the old darkie, chuckling slyly,” he hints at Uncle Remus’s agenda in telling the boy these fables as methods of instruction for living in a racially divided society (Uncle Remus 16). In the Tar-Baby story, as with most of the animal fables, Harris sublimates his own views as an author in order to comment allegorically on race relations in the American South. The animal fables, then, represent a social system divided between whites (the fox) and blacks (the rabbit) and explain how conflicting values and emerging classes can be conjoined in a New South. A subordinate figure to the other creatures’ brute strength, Brer Rabbit roams unfettered and uses his wits and tricks to survive in a hostile world where he would otherwise be devoured. The oppressed rabbit no doubt echoes in the consciousness of slaves who had little means of rebelling against a monolithic plantation system except through subversion and cleverness. The lessons Brer Rabbit teaches reflect a universal truth all too well known to slaves who were governed by their masters’ whips: Being sly and shifty is better than being honest. Contrastingly, the little white boy views the fables from his own privileged perspective and identifies with the fox, an assertive, self-sustaining predator.

At the opening of the Tar-Baby story the boy reveals how much initiation he must undergo with Uncle Remus when he asks, “Didn’t the fox never catch the rabbit, Uncle Remus?” Wishing the predator would devour the prey, the boy seeks to maintain a social order that dominates a weaker race and eradicates threats to the system. As the educator and propitiator, however, Uncle Remus uses his own wits to spin stories that mask his subversive social aims through the rhetorical device of the children’s tale. In effect, Uncle Remus encourages social change by teaching the boy to empathize with Brer Rabbit’s plight and appreciate his resourcefulness in surviving.

Through the Tar-Baby, Uncle Remus advocates realignment of the dominant social structure to include the upstart rabbit, Brer Rabbit, that is, to integrate a supposedly weaker race into mainstream white society. Uncle Remus’s critique of society suggests that, with a large free-roaming presence of recently emancipated slaves, society cannot remain rapacious as a fox does. However, any precipitous attempt to achieve harmony in a society characterized by such aggressive values and attitudes would lead to dissension and chaos. Consequently, Uncle Remus addresses the downfalls of slaves who become too prideful. When the Tar-Baby says nothing despite Brer Rabbit’s repeated promptings, Brer Rabbit becomes enraged and positions himself on top of a hierarchy: “I’m gwineter larn you howter talk ter ’specttubble fokes” (9). Brer Rabbit becomes figuratively and then literally “stuck up” when he disregards all manners and swings at the Tar-Baby. With this scene Uncle Remus exposes racial pride, emotional eruptions, and demands for immediate respect as flawed methods for achieving slave acceptance in Southern society; these approaches would only entangle the newly freed slaves in a self-created shackle of tar. Uncle Remus implies that racial mobility won after the Civil War may be in jeopardy if racial equality is sought too soon. With Brer Rabbit's assault on the Tar-Baby, Uncle Remus shows that pushing too hard to upset social boundaries may backfire.

On the other hand, the excessively passive Tar-Baby is also a searing allegorical attack leveled at those slaves who remain unobtrusive and obsequious even after the collapse of plantation life. These slaves are immobile, silenced, oppressed, unassertive, uneducated, and victimized, so they would never denounce the injustice of roles to which they have become so inured. The Tar-Baby serves as the antithesis of Brer Rabbit's fiery arrogant attitude, suggesting that newly emancipated slaves should adopt a middle ground between the extremes represented by these two opposing figures.

To represent the old plantation life accurately Harris scrupulously verified all of the details for his fables, using stories he learned from Southern slaves when he was at Turnwold and interviewing freed slaves while working as a journalist. Much scholarship surrounds the mysterious and debatable origins of the Tar-Baby and Brer Rabbit. On the surface the tales originated in African folklore, as Harris himself suggests, deriving from the rich cultural heritage of animal fables that slaves carried across the Atlantic to the Americas, but the closeness of these fables to similar fables from other cultures complicates this simple observation. For example, the African fables hinge on Brer Rabbit as a trickster figure, a guileful and mentally agile character who, though oppressed, survives through his wits. The trickster character embedded in African folklore appears as an anthropomorphized animal and is not an invention by Harris; however, the trickster crosses all cultures and time frames. Typical tricksters for North American Indians include the coyote and the raven; for Brazil, the tortoise serves the same function; and fables from India tell of a double-dealing jackal. Perhaps these similar tales arose independently of each other, implying that the trickster figure can be explained as an archetype, or perhaps through the course of history cross-cultural exchanges among Africans, Indians, and South Americans spread these stories, preserving them for generations in each culture's oral tradition. Whatever the case, Africans' introducing stories, like that of the Tar-Baby, to the United States would unavoidably lead to the modification and reinvention of portions of the tales to reflect current conditions better. These unaccounted-for, unknowable amendments are now immortalized in Harris's published versions of the fables.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Why does Harris write the Tar-Baby story in dialect? Does it show a poetic imagination, or is it a mocking exploitation of black language? Why does he feel a need to tell the story as authentically as possible? Explain.
2. Select a person who speaks with a noticeable dialect and record a short conversation with him or her. Try to transcribe the tape in a way that best captures the distinct dialect. What observation can you make on this process, and how does this enlighten your understanding of Harris's work? Explain your response.

“How Mr. Rabbit Was Too Sharp for Mr. Fox” (1881)

As part of his rhetorical strategy, Uncle Remus finishes the Tar-Baby story without solving the climatic dilemma and suspensefully ends the story with Brer Rabbit caught in the Tar-Baby but not yet eaten by the fox. Just as Harris kept readers of the Constitution in anticipation for several weeks before publishing a conclusion to the story, so too does Uncle Remus control the storytelling experience of his eager white listener. He exercises his narrative power and casually pretends to have forgotten the need for an ending when questioned by the boy. Here, Harris psychologically portrays the subtle use of African narrative to augment the boy's interest and allegiance to the rabbit. Uncle Remus knows the underlying theme that runs through his fable insists on the acceptance of freed slaves into a dominant white society. Appropriately to engender social change, Remus speaks to his ideal audience—a young white boy, who, when he grows into an adult, will need more than a passive tolerant attitude toward freed slaves. Uncle Remus's storytelling goal is to train the rapacious fox while he is at an impressionable young age so that he will learn to embrace a diversified society with compassion and charity.

If the Tar-Baby story lays bare the destructiveness of Brer Rabbit's pride, then "How Mr. Rabbit Was Too Sharp for Mr. Fox" epitomizes his creative cunning. Harris carefully manages the tale so that Brer Rabbit's triumph merits praise from the stronger race. Since the animals operate in a lawless society, Uncle Remus emphasizes allegorically that in a world where cheating, deception, and devouring are the common order of the day, men must be self-reliant. Indeed, as Uncle Remus suggests, from an African perspective the world is lawless and chaotic. Freed slaves must be their own defenders; they must rescue themselves from danger, for none will go to their aid since Southern society is pitted against them. Accordingly, Brer Rabbit enmeshes himself so much in the tar that he stands helpless as Brer Fox mocks him with laughter: Only his own actions will save him from his self-created prison. Ironically, Uncle Remus ends the Tar-Baby story with the notion of possible salvation for Brer Rabbit: "Some say Jedge B'ar come 'long en loosed 'im—some say he didn't" (Uncle Remus 11). However, as the conclusion makes emphatically clear, there is no deus ex machina for Brer Rabbit, and this makes his ultimate witty escape all the more admirable. Through Brer Rabbit and Brer Fox's mutual mockery, the story also satirizes human faults of pride, overconfidence, and imperceptiveness. Brer Rabbit's final exclamation in "How Mr. Rabbit Was Too Sharp for Mr. Fox," "Bred en bawn in a brier-patch, Brer Fox," taunts Brer Fox and undermines any lesson that Brer Rabbit may have learned from the Tar-Baby episode (Uncle Remus 19). At the end, he may still be boastful, but he is free and "ez lively ez a cricket in de embers" (19).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read selected tales from Geoffrey Chaucer, specifically the "Nun's Priest's Tale." What kind of device did Harris borrow from Chaucer in his conclusion to the Tar-Baby story, and what kind of literary influence did Chaucer have on Harris's work? Discuss.
2. Compare the trickster figure of Brer Rabbit to a trickster from another country, such as India's Jackal in "The Tiger, the Brahman, and the Jackal," or the French fox named Renart in the works by Michel Rodange. Do these other tricksters also address issues of prejudice based on race and class, or is Harris unique in this aspect of his trickster figure? Discuss your response.

"Free Joe and the Rest of the World" (1884)

No other story from Harris matches the pathos that envelopes "Free Joe and the Rest of the World." Any reader would identify with its rejected, shamed, and pathetic protagonist. Originally published in Century in 1884, "Free Joe" tells of the isolation and tragedy of a free black man who suffers with humility. As a freed slave in the antebellum South, Free Joe is alienated from every social caste. Harris's explanation reveals the irony in Free Joe's name: "He realized the fact that though he was free, he was more helpless than any slave. Having no owner, every man was his master" (Free Joe 55). Free Joe's freedom becomes his curse. As his encounter with "Spite" Calderwood attests, Free Joe longs for acceptance within a white community, which evokes the envy of other former slaves even while the white community expresses its reluctance to accept free blacks. As a consequence, Free Joe becomes a drifting outcast accepted by neither ex-slaves nor whites. As Harris addresses the gray area of the lives of freed slaves during Reconstruction, he complicates Free Joe's character by making his passivity ambiguous. Is Free Joe, like the Tar-Baby, a critique of silent, unassertive slaves, or is he made into a tragic figure, helpless to resist the waves of white brutality? Many critics answer the dilemma of "Free Joe" by asserting that the message reinforces slavery. As Free Joe dies alone, not even with his dog at his side, these critics see Harris as advocating slavery over freedom for blacks.

In contrast to this view, Free Joe's illusion of freedom suggests Harris's sensitivity to the actual experiences of freed blacks as they integrate into society after the Civil War. With "Free Joe," Harris anticipates the icy trek of freed slaves as they confront the cold reception of an impenetrable and unwelcoming white society. As Harris shows, the Emancipation Proclamation is only freedom in words and not in the hearts of many of America's people. "Spite" Calderwood, a plantation owner who exercises as much control as he can over Free Joe, typifies Harris's depiction of a white society's antipathy to freed slaves. Symbolically shackled by Calderwood ripping his permission note and reproaching Joe for being near his plantation, Free Joe cannot even cross the property line to meet his wife, Lucinda; instead, he must wait patiently while his dog, Dan, calls on her. Here, Harris emphasizes Free Joe's societal restraint with the most subtle of symbols—Free Joe's dog. In Harris's hierarchy of Southern culture, even Free Joe's dog has more mobility and assertiveness than Free Joe himself. The permission slip that would represent his freedom is nothing but empty signifiers, for the only freedom Free Joe ever experiences results ironically through his death. Instead of affirming a need for slavery, Free Joe's death is Harris's acknowledgment of the many difficulties along the road to meaningful freedom. At the end, Harris invites us to pity Free Joe's self-delusion by recognizing that this vision may be the closest some former slaves ever get to being free.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What clues can you discover in Harris's use of dialect or content that might suggest that "Free Joe" was written by a white author? Mention some and discuss why they lead to your conclusions.
2. In "Free Joe" how does the dominant society impose stereotypes on the weaker, and what do the ex-slaves have at their disposal to undermine their former masters' attempts? Cite some examples and discuss each.

FURTHER QUESTIONS ON HARRIS AND HIS WORK

1. Harris reworked the original title to the opening of Uncle Remus: His Songs and Sayings and finally settled on "Uncle Remus Initiates the Little Boy." Why is this title important to begin his collection of Uncle Remus tales? Discuss your answer.
2. How does Harris depict lower-class whites? How does this lack of sympathy relate to Harris's own background? Explain your responses, citing evidence from the text.
3. Compare slave life in Harris's stories to slave life as depicted in stories by CHARLES WADDELL CHESNUTT, such as his Uncle Julius stories or "The Goophered Grapevine." Are Chesnutt's slave characters more well rounded than Harris's, or does he present slave culture as more varied than Harris does? Defend your answer, citing examples from the texts.
4. Analyze Alice Walker's 1981 essay "Uncle Remus, No Friend of Mine." How convincing is Walker when she claims that Harris stole important artifacts of black heritage and usurped opportunities for blacks to publish these stories themselves?
5. Compare Toni Morrison's novel Tar Baby to the Uncle Remus tales. Though she claims to owe no debt to Harris, do you notice similarities in the dialect, story line, or characters?
6. What suggestions do you find in Harris's writing that suggest he knew that he was writing art that would have a fixed place in American literature and culture?
7. Watch Disney's 1948 Song of the South, a film that adapts the Uncle Remus tales to a cartoon version. How does Disney appropriate Harris's tales, and what does this do for Harris's reputation, both popular and literary?

BRET HARTE (1836–1902)

All sentiment was modified by a strong sense of humor.

(“Tennessee’s Partner”)

More than any other writer, Bret Harte discovered the literary possibilities of the American West, and he worked his claim with varying degrees of success over a period of 40 years. As founding editor of the Overland Monthly (1868–70), he was also instrumental in sponsoring the careers of an entire generation of western writers, including Charles Warren Stoddard, Joaquin Miller, Prentice Mulford, Ina Coolbrith, and AMBROSE BIERCE. His sometimes friend MARK TWAIN (Samuel Langhorne Clemens) once acknowledged in a letter to Thomas Bailey Aldrich that Harte “trimmed and trained and schooled me patiently until he changed me from an awkward utterer of coarse grotesquenesses to a writer of paragraphs and chapters that have found a certain favor.” A pioneer in western local color, Harte earned a national reputation early in his career with a series of eight stories and a few poems set in the mining camps and boomtowns of gold rush California and published in the Overland. Lured east by the promise of fame and fortune in February 1871, he signed the most lucrative contract in the history of American publishing to that date—$10,000 for 12 months—to contribute exclusively to the Fields, Osgood & Co. family of magazines. A prototype of the man of letters as a man of business, Harte learned through painful experience how to trade on his name. Though he soon fell from the first rank of American writers, he enjoyed a long and lucrative career as a magazine writer and editor until his death.

Born in Albany, New York Harte was educated in small upstate academies. In 1849, at the age of 13, he worked as a clerk in New York City, where as a member of a local militia he helped to quell the Astor Place riots. In 1854, in company with an older sister, he sailed for San Francisco and settled with his mother and her second husband in Oakland, California. He opened a small school in Tuolumne County, which failed for lack of students in spring 1855, whereupon he spent a few weeks at placer mining with little success. Over the next five years he worked as a Wells Fargo agent, a druggist’s clerk, a tutor in Humboldt County, and a printer’s devil for the weekly Northern Californian newspaper. Early in 1860, temporarily in charge of the paper, Harte wrote an editorial critical of an American Indian massacre near Eureka. The ensuing outrage among local residents forced him to flee to San Francisco a few days later.

He seriously aspired to a literary career from the age of 23. Since 1857 he had contributed occasionally to the Golden Era, a weekly San Francisco literary paper, and within a week of his arrival he joined the staff of the paper as a compositor and columnist. His writings in the Golden Era caught the attention of Jessie Benton Frémont, who invited Harte to her Sunday salon; introduced him to such local celebrities as Thomas Starr King, minister of the First Unitarian Church in San Francisco; and found sinecures for him in the offices of the U.S.

Surveyor General, the U.S. Marshal, and the U.S. Mint. Harte married Anna Griswold, a contralto in the choir at King's Church, in August 1862, and with the help of Frémont and King he placed his first story in the Atlantic Monthly, "The Legend of Monte del Diablo," in October 1863. The following spring he cofounded the weekly Californian, and in December 1865 his first book, an anthology of California poetry entitled Outcroppings, was published to mixed reviews.

During the mid-1860s Harte also wrote a series of so-called condensed novels, short parodies of novels by James Fenimore Cooper, Wilkie Collins, Charles Dickens, Victor Hugo, and Charlotte Brontë, to great acclaim. He collected these pieces in a volume published in New York in 1867. He also became the California correspondent to two Massachusetts papers, the Springfield Republican and the Boston Christian Register, the weekly paper of New England Unitarianism. In the 39 articles he contributed to these papers, Harte often criticized the residents, the political corruption, even the landscape of California. He wanted to resettle in the East, where his literary ambitions were more likely to be realized.

Nevertheless, he agreed to edit the Overland Monthly when it was established in 1868 by the San Francisco bookseller Anton Roman. For a modest salary, about $100 per issue, Harte selected the contents, reviewed books, and contributed an occasional story or poem. Harte and Roman had very different designs for the magazine, however. Harte planned to assemble a first-class literary monthly, if possible; Roman thought the Overland should "serve to advertise the economic future of the West Coast." In the short run Harte prevailed. The magazine was a popular success if not from the first issue in June 1868 then from its second, which featured Harte's "The Luck of Roaring Camp." The story was hailed by reviewers in both the New York Nation and the Springfield Republican, and James Fields solicited similar stories for the Atlantic. KATE CHOPIN later wrote that the story "reached across the continent and startled the Academists on the Atlantic Coast." By July 1870 the Overland was sold as many copies in the East as in the western states of California, Oregon, and Nevada. The success of "The Luck" enabled Harte to write fiction and poetry for the Overland without any interference from the counting room. But, he was no literary realist: He depicted the West through a filtered lens and in soft light, and his stock characters—dandy gamblers, rough miners, whores with hearts of gold, genteel schoolmarms, gruff stage drivers—rarely transcend the stereotypical.

Despite the critical and commercial success of the Overland, Harte quarreled with John Carmany, who had bought the magazine from Roman in 1869. Meanwhile, Harte was courted by several rival publications, among them the Galaxy, the New-York Tribune, Putnam's, and the Lakeside Monthly in Chicago. To entice him to remain in San Francisco, he was offered a professorship in modern literature at the new University of California at Berkeley, but he spurned the job. He resigned from the Overland after editing its first five semiannual volumes and moved east. So widely reported in the press were his movements across the continent that WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS later compared the trip to "the progress of a prince" in the "universal attention and interest" it attracted. In Boston in early March Harte agreed to contribute no fewer than 12 poems and stories during the next year to the Atlantic Monthly and Every Saturday. The publishers, Field, Osgood & Co., needed a marquee name to attract subscribers back to the Atlantic, in particular after the controversial publication in the magazine of HARRIET BEECHER STOWE's "The True Story of Lady Byron's Life" in September 1869.

Technically, Harte fulfilled his obligations under the terms of the contract, submitting 14 pieces during the year, even sending the publishers two extra poems two years after the contract had lapsed. But, the quality of these pieces was decidedly inferior to that of the best of his work for the Overland. According to a joke popular at the time, Harte reversed the path of the Sun, rising in glory in the west and setting in darkness in the east. Notoriously poor at paying his bills, he also racked up huge debts after leaving California.

As his writing career spiraled downward between 1872 and 1875, he tried to capitalize on his waning popularity by delivering his lecture "The Argonauts of '49" dozens of times in cities across New England and eastern Canada to the Deep South and as far west as Omaha. Within the space of two years Harte went from the highest-paid writer in America to an improvident freelance contributor to Sunday newspapers.

Undaunted, he contracted to write a play for the comic actor Stuart Robson in spring 1875. The following September he estimated that a performance of the completed draft of the farce Two Men of Sandy Bar would last more than four hours. Predictably, the play was panned when it was produced in Chicago and New York in summer and fall 1876. The New York Times, for example, concluded that Harte had not written a script but a "nondescript." The New York Herald compared the play to a dime novel struck by lightning. Ab Sin, the play Harte wrote in collaboration with Twain the following year, fared no better. To the end of his life he was haunted by memories of the hardscrabble winter of 1877–78, when he and his family lived literally hand to mouth.

Finally, partly through the intervention of Howells, Harte was offered a diplomatic appointment to the U.S. Commercial Agency in Crefeld, Germany. He sailed for Europe in June 1878, never to return to the United States. Though he would support his wife, Anna, until his death, he would not see her again for more than 20 years. After two years in Crefeld he was reassigned to the U.S. Consulate in Glasgow. In both offices he entrusted most of the work to his vice-consuls. In 1885, after a change of administrations in Washington, D.C., Harte was summarily dismissed from the consular service for neglect of duties. James G. Blaine, the secretary of state, remarked in 1889 that he had been "the worst consul" on record.

Fortunately, Harte had hired a literary agent, A. P. Watt of London, in 1884. In the end Harte became the writer the literary market made him. For a small percentage Watt adroitly managed his career for the next 18 years by selling his stories to the highest bidder, arranging for favorable publicity, and sometimes advancing him money. Watt peddled Harte's tales by the column inch to the newspaper syndicates that solicited them. As a result, Harte increased his productivity, often writing 1,000 words per day. He published a book of new fiction every year from 1883 until his death, by far the majority of the 23 volumes of his collected works. He wrote on average about 100,000 words and earned about $10,000 per year during the final decade of his life. To be sure, his fiction was more popular in England and in translation on the Continent than in the United States. As Wallace Stegner later observed, Harte was always more popular among readers the greater their distance from California. But, as his friend HENRY ADAMS also noted, Harte to his credit insisted on "the power of sex" in his late stories "as far as the magazines would let him venture."

Even late in his career he repeatedly tried his hand at playwriting in a vain attempt to escape from the magazine grind. Between 1882 and 1897 he wrote (often with a collaborator) 11 plays and two librettos. Only one of these plays was professionally produced, however. Based on his tale "The Judgment of Bolinas Plain" (1894), Sue, written with his friend T. Edgar Pemberton, was staged in New York and London in 1896 and 1898 with the American actress Annie Russell in the title role. But, the play earned Harte and Pemberton almost no money.

Several of Harte's final stories (for example, "The Convalescence of Jack Hamlin") betray his worries about his failing health. When Hamlin Garland visited him in London in May 1899, Harte was "affable and polite" but looked "old and burnt out, his eyes clouded, his skin red and flabby," as Garland confided to his diary. A lifelong smoker, Harte died of throat cancer at the home of his "hostess," friend, collaborator, and mistress Mademoiselle Van de Velde in Surrey in May 1902. Since his death, especially since the advent of the New Criticism, his reputation has declined precipitously. Bernard De Voto expressed a consensus view in 1932 by dismissing him as "a literary charlatan whose tales have greatly pleased the second-rate." But, at his best Harte was a delightful satirist, a critic of sham sentiment, and an elegant stylist. His disappearance from standard contemporary anthologies of American literature speaks more to the shifting tides of academic fashion than to the merits of his best writing.

“The Luck of Roaring Camp” (1868)

Harte contributed his unsigned story “The Luck of Roaring Camp” (August 1868), often considered a modern retelling of the Gospel account of the Nativity, to the second issue of the Overland Monthly. In this version “the Luck” is a type of Christ and the mining camp a “city of refuge”—the phrase refers to asylums for accidental killers during the period known as the Mosaic dispensation—gradually redeemed through his influence. Cherokee Sal, the village prostitute and the only woman in the camp, dies in childbirth (“the primal curse”) with the identity of the baby’s father a mystery and is buried in a “rude sepulture.” Her son is “swathed in staring red flannel,” nourished on ass milk, and adopted by the hundred or so miners in the camp—Kentuck, Stumpy, Jack Hamlin, French Pete, and others of their ilk, many of them criminals or fugitives from justice and all of them “reckless.” They decide not to hire a nurse because they do not think any decent woman could be persuaded to settle in Roaring Camp, and “they didn’t want any more of the other kind,” their “first spasm of propriety” or “the first symptom of the camp’s regeneration” (Luck 20). They christen the child Tommy (Thomas)—a name reminiscent of the doubting apostle—and “almost imperceptibly a change came over the settlement” as the miners begin to observe “stricter habits of personal cleanliness” and landscape their claims (22). The expressman, the only outsider admitted to the camp, reports that the miners have “vines and flowers round their houses,” “wash themselves twice a day,” and “worship an Ingin baby” (25). The tale ends, however, as the camp is washed away in a spring flood of biblical proportions and little Tommy Luck is drowned.

Rather than a sentimental revision of the Nativity account, “The Luck of Roaring Camp” humorously evokes the birth of Christ to make a very different point. Harte cautions the reader in the opening paragraphs to beware of appearances: The “greatest scamp” in the camp “had a Raphael face,” “the coolest and most courageous man was scarcely over five feet in height,” the “strongest man had but three fingers on his right hand,” and “the best shot had but one eye” (17). A “very sinful woman” who is “dissolute, abandoned, and irreclaimable,” Cherokee Sal is an ironic or anti-Madonna; as the narrator suggests, “perhaps the less said of her the better” (16). Tommy Luck’s father is unknown, but not because he is born to a virgin. Similarly, the miners are ironic Magi whose gifts to the child include stolen silverware, “a gold specimen,” “a gold spur,” a tobacco box, and a silver-plated revolver. The miners christen the child at a “mock altar” in a “ludicrous” ceremony that burlesques the traditional service. Tommy Luck, in other words, is not an incarnation of Christ but a false messiah. To be sure, the child thrives in the “invigorating climate of the mountain camp,” and that “golden summer” the mines “yield enormously.” In these “flush times” the “Luck was with them” (24). But, what is the net effect of this program of civic improvement? Merely that the saloon (“Tuttle’s grocery”) is remodeled, the men begin to bathe and to forswear cursing, and the “shouting and yelling which had gained the camp its infelicitous title were not permitted within hearing distance” of the Luck’s cabin (23). Preternaturally wise, with “an infantine gravity about him” and “a contemplative light in his round gray eye” (24), the child seems even to converse with birds, much like the Christ child of the apocryphal Gospel of Thomas. He is a natural child in a fundamentally romantic sense of the term. “Nature was his nurse and playfellow,” the narrator observes.

For him she would let slip between the leaves golden shafts of sunlight that fell just within his grasp; she would send wandering breezes to visit him with the balm of bay and resinous gums; to him the tall redwoods nodded familiarly and sleepily, the bumble-bees buzzed, and the rooks cawed a slumbrous accompaniment. (24)

A century later the New Critics disparaged such a passage as a textbook example of the “pathetic fallacy.”

Though “Nature took the foundling to her broader breast” (21); in an ironic if not artful reversal of the trope, the flood that destroys Roaring Camp in winter 1851 seems nothing less than a judgment of God. “Every mountain creek became a river and ever river a lake,” Harte writes. “Each gorge and gulch was transformed into a tumultuous watercourse that descended the hillsides, tearing down giant trees and scattering its drift and debris,” and “in the confusion of rushing water, crushing trees, and crackling timber,” nothing could be done to prevent the camp from scattering (25). Kentuck and the “cold and pulseless” body of the Luck are found in a torrent two miles below the camp. In the last sentence of the story Kentuck clings to the “frail” body of the babe, who, like a wisp of straw, “drift[s] away into the shadowy river that flows forever to the unknown sea” (26). These adjectives hardly valorize his martyrdom or sacrifice; on the contrary, they suggest that the (blind) Luck’s death is a random event in a world without design or purpose. The luck of Roaring Camp is, in the end, all bad. The story is subtle biblical parody, a 19th-century version of Monty Python’s Life of Brian.

The story was so controversial that it was very nearly killed in proof. The proofreader for the magazine was offended not by the biblical satire, however, but by the portrayal of Cherokee Sal and the profanity of the miners (“the d——d little cuss”). She protested to the printer, who expressed reservations to Anton Roman, the publisher, who in turn apparently asked Harte to replace the story with other material. To his credit, Harte did not fold his cards. He recalled later how he had read the tale to his wife, Anna, “and took heart and comfort” from her tears over it—a predictable response, given the death of their infant son 10 months before—“and courage to go on and demand that it should be put into the magazine.” Harte made it a condition of his continued employment as editor of the Overland that the story appear “without emendation, omission, alteration, or apology,” and Roman soon capitulated to his demand. While the reviews of the story in the local press were cool, those in religious periodicals were aggressively hostile and urged local advertisers to withdraw their support from the magazine. The tide turned in Harte’s favor only when news of the favorable reception of the tale in the East reached San Francisco in October 1868. Samuel Bowles, the editor of the Springfield Republican, praised it (“a genuine California story,” one “so true to nature and so deep-reaching in its humor, that it will move the hearts of men everywhere”). Bowles reprinted the story in its entirety even before learning that its author was “our old friend Harte.” The New York Nation applauded the tale (“one of the best magazine articles that we have read in many months,” with “pathos and humor” that “take it out of mere magazine writing and give it a place in literature”), and Mark Twain puffed it during his brief stint as co-owner of the Buffalo Express (“the best prose magazine article that has seen the light for many months on either side of the ocean”). James Fields, the editor of the Atlantic Monthly, offered to publish anything Harte “chose to write, upon his own terms.” Suddenly a marquee name among American authors, Harte played his hand like a poker-faced gambler. As the San Francisco Bulletin bragged in 1870, “The Luck” was “by general consent of Eastern critics” the “most original story of the year.” Or, as Harte explained in 1894, “Since Boston endorsed the story, San Francisco was properly proud of it.”

Harte collaborated with a friend on a theatrical version of “The Luck of Roaring Camp” in 1882. The first act, as he wrote to the impresario Augustin Daly, was “an almost literal dramatization of my original story, except that the child is a girl instead of a boy.” Though he offered the completed play to several producers, including Daly, Charles Frohman, Dion Boucicault, David Belasco, and John L. Toole, his high hopes for the script were ultimately dashed. It has never been staged.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How realistic is a story such as “The Luck of Roaring Camp”? Do the details about the mining camp seem authentic?
2. Define the pathetic fallacy and identify passages in “The Luck of Roaring Camp” that express it. Compare Harte’s treatment of nature with STEPHEN CRANE’S in The Red Badge of Courage.

“The Outcasts of Poker Flat” (1869)

The ensemble of characters in “The Outcasts of Poker Flat,” first published in the Overland for January 1869, are victims of blind chance and freak disaster like the Donner party who perished in the mountains near Reno during the winter of 1846–47. Set in late November 1850, only two years after the discovery of gold at Sutter’s Mill near Sacramento, the story opens with a tableau of “the pastoral village of Poker Flat,” an outpost of civilization jealous of its dignity. The settlement has already begun to assume “Sabbath” airs. The local economy is not based on mining, as in Roaring Camp, but on gambling, a step up the ladder of social evolution. Ironically, John Oakhurst, the chief outcast, is banned not because he gambles but because he is too successful a gambler. He accepts his sentence of banishment “with philosophic calmness,” too much the gambler “not to accept Fate,” aware of “the usual percentage in favor of the dealer” (Luck 28). Each of the outcasts, in fact, is expelled in “a spasm of virtuous reaction, quite as lawless and ungovernable as any of the acts that had provoked it,” by the local vigilance committee and “forbidden to return at the peril of their lives” (28). All of them—Oakhurst, a virtuous prostitute named “the Duchess,” her madam “Mother Shipton,” and the thief and drunkard Uncle Billy—vainly head for the village of Sandy Bar, “distant a day’s severe travel,” which had not “experienced the regenerating influences of Poker Flat” (28). Unfortunately, they tarry en route. Though Oakhurst does not drink, his companions do, and “they were furnished with liquor.” Soon Uncle Billy is in a stupor, “the Duchess became maudlin, and Mother Shipton snored” (29). In the “steep mountain range” halfway between the two towns, the outcasts meet young Tom Simson (“the Innocent”) and the sylvan “damsel” Piney Woods, who have eloped. Oakhurst urges Simson to hurry on to Poker Flat, where he and Piney plan to wed, but the Innocent offers to share his provisions with the outcasts and camp with them overnight. By morning, the group has been trapped by a blizzard—all save the devilish Uncle Billy, who has skipped out with the mules and horses.

Though they have enough provisions for 10 days, Oakhurst, the Duchess, and Mother Shipton understand that they are doomed. The Innocent and his virgin fiancée understand neither the gravity of their plight nor the character of their associates. In a state of nature, however, the outcasts are reformed, and sinful and sinless become virtually indistinguishable. “The Duchess blushes at Piney’s remark that she must be ‘used to fine things’”; Oakhurst “doesn’t say ‘cards’ once”; all three of them join the Innocent and Piney in a “rude camp-meeting hymn” to while away the time (33). As Harte writes, “The pines rocked, the storm eddied and whiled above the miserable group, and the flames of their altar leaped heavenward” (33). When song fails to amuse them a few days later, the Innocent offers to narrate the principal events in the Iliad as he remembers them from Pope’s translation. “And so for the rest of that night the Homeric demigods again walked the earth. Trojan bully and wily Greek wrestled in the winds, and the great pines in the cañon seemed to bow to the wrath of the son of Peleus” (35). Oakhurst is quietly amused at the adventures of “Ash-heels,” as the Innocent called “the swift-footed Achilles.”

Barred by law and prevented by the storm from returning to Poker Flat, Oakhurst and the painted women during the last days of their lives become models of moral rectitude. Even with the snowbanks towering 20 feet over their heads, “no one complained.” The Innocent and Piney “looked into each other’s eyes and were happy,” while Oakhurst “settled himself coolly to the losing game before him” (35). Mother Shipton gives her entire ration of food to Piney before starving to death. Tom Simson sets off on snowshoes for Poker Flat to get help. That night Oakhurst piles enough wood beside the cabin “to last a few days” before “handing in his checks” and committing suicide. (He would be resurrected from the snowbank, where he dies at the end of the story, however, to appear in a pair of subsequent tales from Harte’s pen.) That night Piney and the Duchess “read their fate,” and Piney, “accepting the position of the stronger, drew near and placed her arm around the Duchess’s waist” (36). The next morning the Duchess rests her head on Piney's shoulder, "the younger and purer pillowing the head of her soiled sister upon her virgin breast" (36). When their frozen bodies are discovered by the rescue party Tom Simson has enlisted, the narrator adds, "You could hardly have told from the equal peace that dwelt upon them which was she that had sinned" (36). The outcasts are regenerated, but like Tommy Luck and the miners of Roaring Camp, they die as the result of natural disaster. Like the ostensible rehabilitation of Roaring Camp, their reformation is finally meaningless. "The Luck" has the virtue of parody and satire, however, whereas "The Outcasts" merely builds to a contrived and pathetic conclusion.

Still, Howells considered "The Outcasts" the "more representative" of Harte's "most characteristic" work and reprinted it in his 1920 edition of Great American Short Stories. Frank Norris parodied it mercilessly in his so-called perverted tale "The Hero of Tomato Can" (1897). It was adapted to film three times: a silent version in 1919 directed by John Ford and talkies in 1937 and 1952, the latter starring Dale Robertson and Anne Baxter. A standard entry in American literature anthologies between the 1920s and the 1980s, it has also been translated over the years into no fewer than 12 languages.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In this story, is life in the West presented as harsh and unforgiving, or is the West presented as an opportunity to discover interior resources of spiritual and moral strength?
2. Examine Harte's depiction of dying in the story. How do the deaths of the Duchess and Piney differ from the death of Little Eva in Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin? Why does the gambler Oakhurst kill himself?

"Miggles" (1869)

Harte's tale "Miggles," first published in the Overland Monthly for June 1869, also takes off from a biblical source. Loosely based on the life of the actress and dancer Lola Montez after her retirement from the San Francisco stage in 1853, the tale features in the title role a figure Howells later called one of "the edifying Magdalenes of the mining camps." The narrator, in company with six other passengers, meets Miggles, a "bright-eyed, full-throated young woman" (Luck 44), when his stagecoach is diverted to her cabin during a storm. Even before he meets her, the narrator describes Miggles as "our rock of refuge," an allusion to Psalms 71:3 ("Be to me a rock of refuge to which I may always go"). She had kept a saloon (or brothel) and dance hall in Marysville, where, as she admits, "everybody knew me there, and everybody had the right to know me" (45)—apparently in the biblical sense. She had sold her business six years earlier, however, and moved to the California outback to nurse her friend Jim (aka James, the brother of Jesus, according to oral tradition, and another of his disciples), a syphilitic and "prematurely old and wrinkled" invalid. Jim "used to know me" and had "spent a heap of money upon me" before his illness, she explains, and though he "would never get better" and "would be a baby all his life," she refuses to abandon him (46). "I was rich then, for I was popular with everybody" and "gentlemen like yourself" (46) visited her. She has atoned for her sins by a life of selfless devotion. The narrator explicitly compares her to the biblical Mary Magdalene when the next morning the moonlight "seemed to baptize with a shining flood the lowly head of the woman whose hair, as in the sweet old story," recounted in the gospel of Luke 7:36–50, "bathed the feet of him she loved" (47).

The story of Miggles, with her sexually indeterminate name, is also unique among Harte's fiction for its satire of traditional gender roles. A tale of ironic role reversal, it portrays a type of rugged woman who is economically independent and who protects a helpless man. They live together not in marriage but in an unconventional relationship sanctioned by mutual affection. As Miggles explains, "If we were man and wife, now, we'd both know that I was bound to do what I do now of my own accord" (47). She also punctuates her conversation with expletives, unlike the speech of most of her sex. In fact, "Her very frankness suggested a perfect sexual equality that was cruelly humiliating to the younger members of our party,” the narrator admits (44). The men stranded in her house unwittingly behave as stereotypical women do when they privately crowd together, “whispering, snickering, smiling, and exchanging suspicions, surmises, and a thousand speculations” (44) about Miggles and Jim. Miggles is, in the end, a far more sympathetic figure than any of the prurient men who gossip about her.

Significantly this tale was reprinted in 1870 in one of the early issues of the Boston Woman’s Journal, the most important suffragist paper in the country.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What biblical allusions do you detect in “Miggles”? How do these influence your understanding of the story?
2. In what ways does this story encourage readers to distinguish between gender and sexual identity?

“Tennessee’s Partner” (1869)

“Tennessee’s Partner,” first published in the Overland for October 1869, represents the highwater mark of Harte’s fiction. On the surface it seems a perfectly transparent story of loyalty and friendship. After the highwayman and petty criminal Tennessee elopes with his Partner’s bride, the Partner seems to take “the loss of his wife simply and seriously, as was his fashion” (Luck 50). When Tennessee returns to Sandy Bar alone, however—the woman “having smiled and retreated with somebody else”—the two men are immediately reconciled, much to the dismay of the miners, “who had gathered in the cañon to see the shooting” (50). After Tennessee is arrested for robbery, his Partner appears at his trial and, while ostensibly testifying on his behalf, lays out the case against him as eloquently as any prosecuting attorney: “He lays for a stranger, and he fetches that stranger. And you lays for him, and you fetches him; and the honors is easy” (53). The Partner tries, to no avail, to bribe the judge and jury with $1,700 in gold if they will simply release the defendant. After Tennessee is found guilty and hanged, the Partner claims his body and buries it in the garden plot of their cabin. At the most superficial level the tale seems to evade the issue raised by Tennessee’s theft of his Partner’s wife. As a result, “Tennessee’s Partner” became something of a whipping boy for the New Critics in the 1950s. According to Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren in Understanding Fiction (1959), the story seemed to epitomize all that was wrong with mid-19th-century American literature. It was doggedly sentimental, they argued, valorizing the Partner’s undying friendship for the rascal Tennessee: “Bret Harte is so thoroughly obsessed with the pathos of the partner’s loyalty that he has devoted no thought to the precise nature of that loyalty.” Even Mark Twain wondered why Harte has the Partner “welcome back a man who has committed against him that sin which neither the great nor the little ever forgive.”

Read through the lens of southwestern humor, however, the story contains a trap for the unwary set by the author. Harte deftly structures the tale around the Partner’s elaborate scheme to avenge his loss of a wife, the act of victimization central to southwestern humor. The narrator betrays no more emotion in relating the story than the poker-faced Partner reveals in plotting revenge on the man who stole his wife. The miners in Sandy Bar who expect the Partner to shoot Tennessee on sight might have vented their indignation “in sarcasm” but for a look in the Partner’s eye “that indicated a lack of humorous appreciation. In fact, he was a grave man, with a steady application to practical detail which was unpleasant in a difficulty” (50). The Partner has already begun to hatch his plot and bides his time. With Tennessee under arrest, the miners of Sandy Bar “were ready to listen patiently to any defense” of his guilt, and the Partner exploits the opportunity to serve frontier justice when he appears in court at precisely the moment Tennessee’s trial has become “irksomely thoughtful” (52). The legal contest becomes something of a card game, with Tennessee folding his hand and the Partner in the role of the dealer. When he offers a bribe to the judge and jury, the court is suddenly galvanized, for the “unparalleled insult” erases “any wavering determination of Tennessee’s fate”—at which point Tennessee laughs, congratulates his Partner with the words “Euchred, old man,” and shakes his hand (54). The gesture is neither one of gratitude for the failed attempt to save his life nor one of friendly parting, but a sporting gesture, in effect congratulating the Partner for playing the trump card.

After Tennessee is found guilty and hanged, the Partner unceremoniously hauls the body of “the diseased” in a donkey cart usually used “in carrying dirt” to a shallow grave at an “unpicturesque” site near his cabin. He buries the body in the earth he had cultivated during “the brief days of [his] matrimonial felicity” with the woman Tennessee stole from him. In his eulogy to the assembled miners, the Partner emphasizes his own fidelity to the friendship Tennessee betrayed. “‘It ain’t the first time that I’ve packed him on my back, as you see’d me now. It ain’t the first time that I brought him to this yer cabin when he couldn’t help himself; it ain’t the first time that I and Jinny have waited for him on yon hill, and picked him up and so fetched him home, when he couldn’t speak and didn’t know me’” (56). In effect, he asks the assembled mourners who can blame him for wishing this man dead?

After the funeral (or “fun,” as the Partner calls it), the crowd disperses. Seen from a distance, the Partner sits “upon the grave” with his face swathed “in his red bandanna handkerchief” (57). But, is he weeping or laughing? As the narrator notes, “You couldn’t tell his face from his handkerchief at that distance, and the point remained undecided” (57). He is, more probably, sitting on the grave in triumph over his erstwhile partner and rival. From the day he interrs Tennessee, however, “his rude health and great strength seemed visibly to decline” (57) and he dies the following spring. As Roger Chillingworth in The Scarlet Letter by NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, one of Harte’s favorite authors, the Partner has only lived to avenge his cuckolding. If he is reconciled with Tennessee in heaven, as the end of the story implies, they, as have Chillingworth and Arthur Dimmesdale, “have found their earthly stock of hatred and antipathy transformed into golden love” in the Great Beyond.

“Tennessee’s Partner” has proven over the years to be one of the most durable of Harte’s stories. It has been translated into no fewer than 11 languages, including Romanian, Serbo-Croatian, and Vietnamese, and it remains a chestnut in modern anthologies of American literature. A loose adaptation of the tale starring Ronald Reagan, John Payne, and Rhonda Fleming was released in 1955.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Which interpretation of “Tennessee’s Partner” seems more reasonable: the straightforward, sentimental account of the two men’s partnership in the mines or the satirical account of the Partner’s quest for revenge? What objections to the satirical reading might discredit it?
2. Identify the ways that Partner’s relationship with Tennessee parallels the relationship of Roger Chillingworth and Arthur Dimmesdale in Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter?

“The Idyl of Red Gulch” (1869)

Harte literally invented the stock character of the eastern schoolmarm who travels west in “The Idyl of Red Gulch,” first published in the Overland for December 1869. Miss Mary, as she is named, is the lineal ancestor of such vestals of the cult of civilization as Molly Stark Wood in Owen Wister’s The Virginian (1902) and Amy Fowler in Stanley Kramer’s High Noon (1952). Like others of the type, Miss Mary is a pretty young arrival who has moved west “for the sake of health and independence” (Luck 63) and who serves as a civilizing agent on a settlement only one or two removes from barbarism. Her influence in this story is most evident in the reformation of a local dissolute miner named Sandy, a “blond Samson” with a “corn-colored silken beard” who is quite “amiable-looking” when sober. Sandy confesses “he came to California for excitement” and had “lived a wild life” but “was trying to reform” (63). He takes a bouquet of azaleas to the school and fills a barrel outside the door with fresh spring water every morning. Predictably, Sandy and Miss Mary fall in love. But, on the afternoon of the last day of the school term, Mary is visited by the “overdressed” mother of one of her pupils—another of Harte’s whores with a heart of gold, with her “war paint,” “gorgeous parasol,” and “lilac-gloved hands”—who begs her to “take my Tommy” away from “this wicked life, this cruel place, this home of shame and sorrow” and enroll him in “some good school, where you can go and see him, and help him to—to—to forget his mother” (65). When he is older, Tommy’s mother explains, Mary might tell him “his father’s name”—Alexander Morton, “whom they call here Sandy!”—who “when I first knew him was a gentleman” (65). Repelled by the revelation of Sandy’s sin, the teacher agrees to assume custody of the boy and resolves to return east with him. She adjures the mother to tell Sandy that “he must never see—see the child again. Wherever it may be, he must not come; wherever I may take it, he must not follow!” (66). She leaves on the Slumgullion stage the following morning for Boston, never to return. Whereas both Molly Wood and Amy Fowler compromise their genteel principles and capitulate to love, Miss Mary abandons Red Gulch to its vice and corruption, much as Harte would escape California for New York and Boston at the close of his tenure as editor of the Overland Monthly a year later.

Adapted to television, a version of the story starring Teresa Wright, Franchot Tone, and Jayne Meadows was broadcast on the U.S. Steel Hour in June 1955. Vladimir Nabokov apparently saw the program and worked an allusion to it into his novel Lolita (1955).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Is Miss Mary in “The Idyl of Red Gulch” justified in her flight from the West? Or, does she simply fail to adapt to the less rigid moral codes of the West?
2. What moral qualities does Harte associate with the West and the East? Were these views widely held?

“The Iliad of Sandy Bar” (1870)

A companion piece to “Tennessee’s Partner,” “The Iliad of Sandy Bar” dramatizes Harte’s feud at the time with his rival and sometimes friend Mark Twain. When the story first appeared in the Overland for November 1870, the two men had been “off” for “many months,” the result of a squabble over Harte’s failure to receive a review copy of Twain’s The Innocents Abroad (1869). Set in a mining camp built upon the “fatal quicksands,” as is the house built by a “foolish man” Christ mentions in Matthew 7:26, the story describes the bitter and “inexplicable” quarrel of two partners who had once been “singularly devoted to each other,” Matthew Scott (Harte) and Henry York (Twain), owners of the Amity Claim, who had once earned by their “amiability and grave tact” the title of “The Peacemakers” in a “community not greatly given to the passive virtues” (Luck 87). Even though their common claim (that is, California local color fiction) seems “worked out” and “worthless,” they contest their rights to it in a court battle. Before a courtroom filled with “all of Sandy Bar,” Scott wins the verdict, “which York instantly appealed. It was said that he had sworn to spend his last dollar in the struggle” (90). Each of them harasses the other, and “the fact that they had ever been friends was forgotten.” York buys land below Scott’s new claim, which required Scott “to make a long detour” to reach his property, whereupon he “retaliated by building a dam that overflowed York’s claim on the river” (91). The feud escalates into rival campaigns for the state legislature, a contest Scott also wins after he embarrasses York by declaring that “for three years, gentlemen, I was that man’s partner!” (94). That fall Scott went to Sacramento, and “York went abroad,” much as Twain joined the Quaker City excursion to Europe and the Holy Land in 1867, “and for the first time in many years, distance and a new atmosphere isolated the old antagonists” (94). Three years later York returns to Sandy Bar, or Riverside as the camp has been renamed, and meets the drunken and derelict husk of his former friend. The story ends with a deathbed reconciliation of the two men, though Scott insists in his last words that “thar was too much saleratus in that bread" (97). Read in context, the tale seems a poignant reminder of Harte's fondness for Twain, their silly estrangement, and an open invitation to him to bury the hatchet. In fact, the two would temporarily resume their friendship in the East in 1872.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How does "The Iliad of Sandy Bar" function as a companion piece to "Tennessee's Partner"? Compare and contrast the pairs of mining partners in the two stories.
2. Identify the features of the story that qualify it as an example of California local color fiction.

"Plain Language from Truthful James" (1870)

Published in the September 1870 issue of the Overland Monthly, Harte's "Plain Language from Truthful James," or "The Heathen Chinese," became an overnight sensation. It was immediately reprinted in dozens of newspapers and magazines across the country and appeared in three illustrated chapbook editions. Ironically, however, though Harte intended the poem to satirize prejudice among the Irish, who were competing with the Chinese for jobs, it was read by many a xenophobic reader as a satire of the inscrutable Chinese. Rather than indict bigotry, the poem seemed to license it.

"For ways that are dark" and "tricks that are vain," the "heathen Chinese is peculiar," the narrator, Truthful James, opines (Luck 216). With his "pensive, "childlike," and "bland" smile, the laundryman Ah Sin seems an easy mark to the card shark Bill Nye. But Ah Sin turns the tables on the Irishmen by concealing "twenty-four jacks" in his sleeves and marking them with wax. Nye declares, "We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor" before "he went for that Heathen Chinese" (216). Though the poem omits any mention of overt violence, the illustrations that often accompanied it pictured such violence explicitly. On the surface the text constructs a racial Other in stereotypical terms; only when read against the grain does it resist or subvert the stereotype. Readers tended to identify not with the "heathen" Ah Sin but with his presumed racial superior, Bill Nye, the ostensible victim of his trickery.

"Plain Language from Truthful James" was soon appropriated for a variety of purposes. It inspired a short-lived school of western dialect poets that included Mark Twain and John Hay. It was parodied dozens of times—for example, to satirize the New Woman ("Plain Language from Truthful Jane"), the presidential ambitions of Horace Greeley ("The Heathen Greelee"), and the Treaty of Washington ("Plain Language from Truthful Bull"). It was also, of course, soon adapted to the campaign against Chinese immigration. It was cited on the floor of Congress in January 1871; the virulently anti-Chinese senator Ernest Casserly of California wrote to Harte to thank him for joining his cause; and Allen Thurman, the Democratic candidate for vice president in 1888, quoted it in his stump speech to prove his support for the Chinese Exclusionary Act.

At the nadir of his career in the late 1870s Harte also exploited the popularity of the poem for commercial purposes. His play Two Men of Sandy Bar (1876) featured a Chinese laundryman in a small comic role. Twain later reminisced that with the "perfectly delightful Chinaman in it" the play "would have succeeded if anyone else had written it." In 1877 Harte and Twain together wrote a script entitled Ah Sin centered on the character of the Chinese laundryman, and the result was one of the most disastrous collaborations in the history of American letters. The play closed after three months.

Tropes from "Plain Language from Truthful James" continued to be appropriated well into the 20th century. Harte resurrected Ah Sin to ridicule the free silver plank in the 1896 Democratic Party platform in the poem "Free Silver at Angel's." As late as 1923, Charles R. Shepherd depicted the unscrupulous and inscrutable "heathen Chinese" in his book The Ways of Ah Sin.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What internal evidence is there that “Plain Language from Truthful James” was written with a satirical purpose?
2. Compare Harte’s representation of race in this poem with the way JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS represents race in “The Wonderful Tar-Baby Story.”
3. Explain why readers in Harte’s day found it easier to sympathize with the Irish than the Chinese when they encountered this poem.

“Wan Lee, the Pagan” (1874)

While “Plain Language from Truthful James” failed as a satire of anti-Chinese prejudice, Harte’s story “Wan Lee, the Pagan” was a more explicit and utterly unequivocal indictment of racism. Published in Scribner’s for September 1874, the ostensible “true story” was based at least in part on acts of mob violence perpetrated against the Chinese in San Francisco that Harte remembered from his years there. In his “California Letters” to the Springfield Republican in 1867–68, he had deplored the “late riots and outrages on the Chinese” and the way “the youth” of San Francisco “throw stones” at the Chinese “in the streets.” (At about the same time, Mark Twain wrote a news story for the San Francisco Morning Call excoriating the stoning of a Chinese man by Irish schoolchildren; his editor killed the article on the grounds that it would alienate Irish subscribers to the newspaper.) The narrator of “Wan Lee,” a genteel newspaperman like the author, introduces the reader in the opening paragraphs to a “grave, decorous, handsome” Chinese patriarch fluent in French and English whose character is radically at odds with the prevailing stereotype of the unscrupulous and inscrutable Oriental. “I doubt if you could find the equal of this Pagan shopkeeper among the Christian traders of San Francisco,” the narrator adds (Luck 125). This grandfatherly figure entrusts the impish Wan Lee, whose life has been threatened by “the younger members” of the “Christian and highly civilized race who attend the enlightened schools in San Francisco,” to the narrator, who lives in rural Humboldt County (128). Though Wan Lee escapes for a time the prejudices he suffers in the city, the narrator, his guardian, takes a job in San Francisco and returns there two years later. The narrator concedes that “I do not think he contemplated the change with pleasure” (135). Wan Lee befriends the white daughter of a widow with whom he lives, an episode that hints at the racial toleration of some children. “This little girl was quite content to fill him with her own Christian goodness” (136), according to the narrator. The story to this point is mere prelude to its pathetic ending. “There were two days of that eventful year which will long be remembered in San Francisco, when a mob of her citizens set upon and killed unarmed, defenseless foreigners because they were foreigners, and of another race, religion, and color, and worked for what wages they could get” (136). Some “eminent statesmen” in California went so far as to “think that the passage in the Constitution which guarantees civil and religious liberty to every citizen or foreigner was a mistake” (136). No puzzling or ambiguous assertions by Irish day laborers in this tale (unlike “Plain Language”) that “we” are “ruined by Chinese cheap labor” (216). Wan Lee, an innocent victim of mindless violence, is stoned to death by a “mob of half-grown boys and Christian schoolchildren” (137) taught by their parents to hate Asians. Not to put too fine a point on it, the term pagan in the title of the story, in sharp contrast to the references to “Christian,” drips with irony.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Is “Plain Language from Truthful James” or “Wan Lee, the Pagan” the more forceful indictment of racial prejudice? Which strategy—satire and irony or explicit moralizing—seems more effective?
2. Why does Harte choose to narrate “Wan Lee, the Pagan” from the point of view of a young journalist?
3. “Wan Lee, the Pagan” is the only story in this selection that Harte wrote after he left California.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE (1804–1864)

Upon my honor, I am not quite sure that I entirely comprehend my own meaning in some of these blasted allegories.

(letter to James T. Fields, April 13, 1854)

Already in his own lifetime Hawthorne was recognized as one of the most important writers of fiction the United States had yet produced, and his status as a classic American author has only grown in the century and a half since his death. If he had written nothing other than The Scarlet Letter, his stature would still be high, but he also penned a number of other significant novels as well as some of the most studied of all American short stories. He helped inspire HERMAN MELVILLE and was much admired by HENRY JAMES; his dark vision of human pride and sin influenced the work of many 20th-century writers, including Flannery O'Connor. Through his example as a dedicated and professional writer of fiction, Hawthorne helped create the role of the serious author in American culture, and by his emphasis on allegory, symbolism, and the exploration of profound moral issues, he helped establish a tone and approach that would chart a path for many later writers.

In view of his later importance to American letters, it seems only appropriate that Hawthorne was born on the Fourth of July (in 1804). Yet not only the date but the place of his birth seems symbolic: He was born in Salem, Massachusetts, a town infamous as the setting for the notorious “witch trials” of the late 17th century. In these proceedings (which were often little more than kangaroo courts), innocent persons had been persecuted, prosecuted, tortured, and often executed because of alleged demonic possession, and these injustices had been committed at the behest of some of the same Puritan Christians whom Hawthorne numbered among his ancestors. Indeed, one of Hawthorne’s great-great-grandfathers had been a prominent judge during the trials, and one of the judge’s victims had supposedly pronounced a curse on him and his descendants before she was executed. Nathaniel Hawthorne certainly never forgot the darker side of this early Puritan heritage, and much of his fiction (including The Scarlet Letter) can be read as an effort to come to terms with—and perhaps atone for—the proud, judgmental, and self-righteous legacy of his own ancestors. Troubling guilt, secret motives, and hidden iniquity are frequent themes in his writings, and, given his own family history, this fact seems hardly surprising.

Hawthorne’s father, however (who was also named Nathaniel, although he spelled his last name Hathorne), earned his living not in a courtroom but at sea. He was a ship’s captain, and it was on a voyage in the South Atlantic that he died in Surinam of yellow fever when his only son was a mere four years old. Elizabeth Manning Hathorne, the captain’s widow, then moved young Nathaniel and his two sisters into the home of her parents in Salem, where her profound grief for the loss of her husband only deepened, if anything, her attachment to her children. Surrounded by numerous members of the Manning clan (and particularly watched over by his uncle Robert, his mother's brother), Nathaniel enjoyed a basically happy childhood and began, even at this early age, the habit of devoted reading that would last a lifetime. An athletic injury in 1813 kept him out of school and confined at home for many months, thus deepening his ties to his mother and sisters and giving him even more time to read on his own. By 1818 he and his mother and sisters had moved briefly to Raymond, Maine, where Nathaniel enjoyed exploring the outdoors, but by 1819 he was back in Salem again, living with the Mannings once more and preparing to begin college. In 1821 he entered Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine, where he made a number of important friends, including Franklin Pierce (who would later become president of the United States) and Horatio Bridge (who would later take an active interest in promoting Hawthorne's literary career).

After graduating from Bowdoin in 1825, Hawthorne again returned to the Manning household in Salem, where he lived with his mother, sisters, and other relatives for the next dozen years, staying in the upper room he had inhabited throughout his youth. It was during these early years back in Salem that he changed the spelling of the family name to Hawthorne, and it was also during this period that he began to devote himself to the idea of becoming a serious writer. In 1828 he personally paid for the anonymous publication of his first novel, Fanshawe, although he later destroyed any copies he could locate and never acknowledged or republished the book while he lived. When not writing, he traveled with an uncle on business, although he also spent a good deal of time reading, researching local history, and working on various pieces of short fiction, which began to appear in print in the early 1830s. Many of these works were published anonymously, and none of them earned the young author much money. He worked briefly in Boston as a magazine editor in 1836, but when the magazine went out of business, he was soon back in Salem again. In 1837 (with financial help from his old college friend Horatio Bridge) he was able to publish Twice-Told Tales, a collection of nearly 20 of his stories, and it was in 1837, too (after his unsuccessful courtship of another woman), that he first met Sophia Peabody, who eventually became his wife. Although Hawthorne was now attracting increasing attention and respect as an author, he knew that it would be difficult to support himself (let alone a wife and family) independently on a writer's income. Thus, in 1839 he began working at the Boston Customs House—a position, however, from which he resigned in 1841. He took refuge for a few months at the experimental Brook Farm community in West Roxbury, Massachusetts (a place designed to promote social ideals and cooperative agriculture), but by the end of the year he had soured on his experiences there and would eventually satirize the undertaking in a novel called The Blithedale Romance.

By this time Hawthorne was becoming increasingly prominent (if not financially successful) as an author. In 1841 he published such works for children as Grandfather's Chair, Famous Old People, and Liberty Tree, and 1842 witnessed the publication not only of Biographical Stories for Children but also (more significantly) of a much-expanded edition of Twice-Told Tales. In 1842, as well, Hawthorne finally married Sophia Peabody (to whom he had secretly been engaged since 1839), and by all accounts the early years of their marriage were very happy. The newlyweds rented a house in Concord, Massachusetts, known as the Old Manse, and during their time there they became friendly with the local transcendentalist group, which included RALPH WALDO EMERSON and HENRY DAVID THOREAU (among others). As had also been true at Brook Farm, Hawthorne tended to be more skeptical about human nature than were his optimistic new acquaintances, but his contact with these energetic intellectuals helped stimulate his own thinking and certainly did nothing to harm the growth of his own literary status. At home, too, good things were happening: Although Sophia had suffered a miscarriage in 1843, in 1844 she successfully gave birth to a daughter (named Una), who was followed in 1846 by a son (named Julian). Also in 1846, Hawthorne was appointed surveyor in the Custom House in Salem (thus providing him a reliable income), and during the same year he published another significant collection of stories, this time titled Mosses from an Old Manse. It was this book (which contains some of Hawthorne's finest work) that would, before long, prompt an enthusiastic review by Herman Melville, who eventually considered Hawthorne a kindred spirit.

By 1849, however, Hawthorne's fortunes had taken a darker turn: Because of political changes at the national level, he lost his patronage appointment at the Custom House, and, even more distressingly, he also lost his mother, with whom he had always had a particularly close relationship. Both events probably contributed to the somber atmosphere of his newest novel, The Scarlet Letter, which he began writing during that fall; it was published in 1850 and was quickly recognized as an unusually remarkable book. Although some early readers considered it immoral, many others praised both its style and its substance, and today it is regarded as perhaps the first great American novel. It was not long before Hawthorne produced yet another masterpiece—a novel titled The House of the Seven Gables, which was published in 1851 (the same year that saw the birth of his daughter Rose). This book was soon followed, in 1852, by yet another novel (The Blithedale Romance), a collection of stories (The Snow-Image and Other Twice-Told Tales), a work for children (A Wonder-Book for Girls and Boys), and a campaign biography for Franklin Pierce (Hawthorne's old college friend, who was now running for president). Pierce's election helped win Hawthorne appointment to the lucrative and prestigious position of U.S. consul in Liverpool, England, where he and his family lived from 1853 until 1857. These years saw the publication of Tanglewood Tales for Girls and Boys (1853) and the printing of a second, revised edition of Mosses from an Old Manse (1854). Hawthorne also compiled detailed notebooks during his time in England, but these were not published until well after his death.

When Pierce's term as president ended in 1857, so did Hawthorne's position as consul. In 1858 he and his family traveled in France and Italy, taking up residence first in Rome and then in Florence, although the almost-fatal illness of the Hawthornes' daughter Una was soon followed by the family's return to England in 1859 and then by a final relocation to the United States in 1860. During that year Hawthorne's latest novel, The Marble Faun, appeared in print, but by this time, too, the tensions that would soon lead to the Civil War had become almost unendurable. For the next half-decade the country would be plunged into extreme turmoil, and during this period Hawthorne's literary career also began to falter as his health steadily declined. He did publish a collection of articles titled Our Old Home in 1863, but most of his attempts at fiction were stillborn. Friends who met him during these last years of his life were struck by the change in his appearance and manner; the once-handsome and vigorous young man had now lost much of his earlier vitality, and by 1864 both Hawthorne and his family sensed that his end was near. He died in his sleep on May 19 and was buried in Concord, Massachusetts, four days later. The same minister who had married Nathaniel and Sophia more than two decades earlier now conducted Nathaniel's funeral, which was attended by many of the most eminent figures of the New England literary community. They clearly understood what most others have also realized: that during his nearly 60 years of life, Hawthorne not only had managed to create one of the most enduring and influential legacies of any American author but had also helped take American writing to a new level of maturity and international respect.

“My Kinsman, Major Molineux” (1831)

An 18-year-old youth named Robin journeys from his home in the country to a city (perhaps Boston), where he hopes to profit from his contact with Major Molineux, a wealthy and powerful relative who had once taken an interest in Robin's future. While searching for Molineux's house, however, Robin encounters a series of often hostile and sarcastic Bostonians, who laugh whenever Molineux's name is mentioned and who refuse to offer Robin any assistance. As Robin—hungry, tired, and frustrated—sits on the steps of a church, he hears a noisy procession approaching, and in the midst of the mob he sees Major Molineux—tarred, feathered, and mocked by the unruly crowd. Although Robin himself briefly joins in the general laughter, he quickly grows disillusioned by the spectacle and by his journey to the city.

This story is typical of Hawthorne's fiction in many ways. It is set in the New England past; its heavy emphasis on allegory and symbolism makes it seem something other than a merely realistic account of mundane events; it features characters and physical settings that are obviously meant to be suggestive; yet the ultimate meanings of the work are ambiguous and mysterious. The tone of the story is generally somber and gloomy (although it is lightened occasionally by literal laughter, touches of comedy, and hints of sarcasm and irony); the meanings of the plot, like the motives of the characters, are shrouded in uncertainty; and thus the story achieves an effect of confusion and suspense. By the time readers reach the end of the story, they will often have felt as mystified as Robin does, and indeed part of the power of the work results from the way Hawthorne continually postpones and delays the crucial, final revelation. That revelation itself provokes as many ambivalent and puzzled reactions in readers as it does in Robin himself, and for the central character as well as for Hawthorne's audience, the story ends on a note of perplexity and ambiguity.

Hawthorne's tale has often been read as a "coming-of-age" story—one of the most common fictional plots. In such tales an inexperienced character (often a young man) leaves the secure, familiar place where he has grown up (usually surrounded by supportive family and friends) in order to venture off into strange territories where he encounters new and often bewildering experiences, including personalities who are sometimes threatening and situations that are often highly tempting. In the course of confronting these dangers and temptations, he often makes false assumptions and crucial mistakes and frequently feels bewildered and confused, but by the end of such tales the protagonist has usually also learned some valuable lessons about life, about other people, and about himself. He has undergone various rites of passage; he has experienced a process of initiation; and as a result of his experiences he has usually emerged as wiser and more mature but also as less innocent and naive. Obviously Hawthorne's story conforms closely to this archetypal pattern, and Robin is in some ways a symbolic "Everyman" figure whose painful initiation into the often-disillusioning facts of life is a process with which most readers will be able to identify.

However, in addition to being read in this broadly psychological way, the story has been interpreted in more narrowly political and historical terms. Hawthorne clearly invites such a reading by emphasizing topical factors in the story's first paragraph. Readers who emphasize the historical and political dimensions of the tale often see Robin as a symbol of colonial New England or as representing a youthful, developing America—an immature but growing country that had to work out its proper relationship with its British overlords, here symbolized by Major Molineux. From his extensive reading in colonial history, Hawthorne knew that the 18th century was often a time of enormous tension between the restive colonists and the British authorities; the revolution that finally resulted in the birth of a new nation was preceded by decades of rebellious and often violent outbursts, especially after the colonists lost their earlier rights to elect their governors and instead had governors imposed upon them by the British Crown. According to this kind of political interpretation, Robin's eventual disillusionment with the relative whom he once respected (and from whom he had once hoped so much) parallels the maturation and growing cynicism of the American colonists, while the rebellion that Robin witnesses at the end of the tale obviously foreshadows the American Revolution itself.

Although this political reading of the story seems almost undeniable, Hawthorne nevertheless can hardly be accused of simple-minded patriotism; the story is anything but an exercise in jingoistic propaganda. The colonists are hardly presented in entirely attractive ways; they often seem bitter, cold, calculating, and misanthropic, and when the major finally appears near the very end of the tale, he can partly be viewed as a figure to be pitied as well as derided. Presumably the colonists feel entirely justified in having tarred and feathered him and in parading him through the streets, but, if so, the story certainly never makes entirely clear the crimes of which he is guilty. As so often in Hawthorne's writings, the "moral" (if there is one) is darkly ambiguous. The tale seems to invite a moral response, but we can never be quite sure what kind of response is expected.

Perhaps the most perplexing aspect of the entire tale involves Robin's own laughter when he finally sees his tormented kinsman. As Hawthorne describes the chortling mob, he reports that the "contagion was spreading among the multitude when, all at once, it seized upon Robin, and he sent forth a shout of laughter that echoed through the street; every man shook his sides, every man emptied his lungs, but Robin's shout was the loudest there" (Tales 17). The laughter here is described (with Hawthorne's typical sense of paradox) as almost a kind of infection or sickness, and Robin's participation in it almost seems involuntary (since he is "seized upon" by the "contagion"). How do we explain his laughter? Is it a sign that he has freed himself, in a healthy way, from the influence of his "kinsman"? Or is it a sign that he has capitulated to the influence of the mob? Is he laughing at the major, at the crowd, or perhaps at his own earlier foolishness and naivete? Is his laughter a laugh of genuine joy or of dark disillusionment? Hawthorne, characteristically, leaves the matter unclear; readers are not given a neat and tidy final "moral" but are given, instead, a good excuse to ponder and reflect.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this tale with Hawthorne's story "Young Goodman Brown." In particular, discuss the use of journeys in both tales, the emphasis on young men's facing strange and disorienting experiences, and the moods of final disillusionment. Compare and contrast the settings of both works (the town in one tale and the forest in the other); discuss the ways women are presented in both works; and discuss the political dimensions of each text.
2. Read this tale in conjunction with Willa Cather's story titled "Paul's Case." How are the youths in both works similar or different, particularly in their values, their dealings with other people, and their final experiences? Which of the characters (if either) is more sympathetic? Which of the two characters is more fundamentally isolated and lonely?
3. How might "My Kinsman, Major Molineux" be read as an initiation story that charts Robin's growth from naïve youth to adult? Do you think that Robin changes as a result of his experiences in the city? If so, how would you describe and evaluate his changes?
4. Compare Robin's development to development of the title character of MARK TWAIN's (Samuel Langhorne Clemens's) Huckleberry Finn. How do the tones of the two works fundamentally differ? What kind of moral choice does each character face at the end of the work, and how does each character respond?

"The Minister's Black Veil" (1835)

The Reverend Mr. Hooper is the respected but unexciting parson of a small New England town, but he shocks his parishioners one Sunday by preaching before them while wearing a black veil that covers the upper half of his face. The veil mystifies everyone who knows Hooper, including his fiancée, Elizabeth, and the mystery deepens when Hooper refuses to remove the dark cloth, even on the day (many years later) when he dies, attended by several persons, including another minister as well as Elizabeth, who had long ago refused to marry him. Although some people believed for years that the veil symbolized Hooper's own secret sinfulness, he himself seems to consider it a symbol of the hidden sins of humanity in general, and as he dies, he seems full of bitterness because he has been shunned by people who have hidden their own sins far more effectively than the veil had obscured his face.

As do many of Hawthorne's other works, this one features mysterious behavior, the growing isolation of a central character, and a powerful preoccupation with sin and guilt. The story does not present itself as a fully "realistic" tale; rather, it employs Hawthorne's trademark devices of allegory, symbolism, and evocative imagery. At the same time (again as do many of Hawthorne's other works), the story raises more questions than it answers, particularly about the motives and effects of Hooper's apparently strange behavior. Is Hooper a sincerely committed Christian minister who chooses the veil as a way of making an impact on sinners who might otherwise ignore his message? Is Hooper himself (as many of his congregants suspect) hiding some secret transgression, so that the veil is a badge of a guilt he refuses to confess fully? Is his decision to wear the veil a sign of self-sacrificing humility—an emblem of his willingness to make a public spectacle of himself in order to reach hardened hearts? Or is the veil in fact a symbol of his spiritual pride, particularly of his presumption in passing judgment on the secret guilt of others? Is Hooper worthy of respect, or is he a kind of spiritual sadomasochist who, while inflicting pain on others, also endangers his own soul, isolating himself from his community and from the woman who was once willing to be his wife? Finally, what should we make of his final words—his concluding claim that everyone figuratively wears a veil to hide his or her sins, and that Hooper has been ostracized only because he has been willing to call attention to his own secret sinfulness? As usual, Hawthorne effectively creates an air of mystery and uncertainty, and although various readers have offered definitive answers to all the questions the story raises, Hawthorne himself seems less interested in providing answers than in provoking thought. If the story succeeded in encouraging any reader to examine his or her own conscience, Hawthorne probably would have been satisfied.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this tale with Flannery O'Connor's story "Everything That Rises Must Converge." How do Hooper and Julian similarly isolate themselves? How do they relate to the important women in their lives? How do their fundamental temperaments resemble and/or differ from one another? Which character is more sympathetic, and why?
2. Read this story alongside Herman Melville's tale titled "Bartleby the Scrivener." How do both tales create a sense of mystery and suspense? How and why does each main character isolate himself from the rest of humanity? How do Bartleby's motives and personality differ from those of Hooper? How do the tones of the two works differ? In particular, how does Melville's use of comedy contribute to the effectiveness of his story? Would humor have been appropriate in Hawthorne's text?
3. Perhaps the most obvious thematic concerns of the story are the nature and effect of human sin. Some interpret the veil as a sign of "secret sin." What, finally, seems to be the meaning of Hooper's "sermon" on sin? What does he want to say about human sinfulness? How successful is his attempt to turn himself into a walking sermon? Do you think that Hawthorne's point in the story is the same as Hooper's?

"Wakefield" (1835)

The narrator recounts the story of a man he once read about in an old periodical—a man he calls Wakefield and whom he describes as a middle-aged husband living a routine, uneventful life in London. One day, for no obviously pressing reason, Wakefield decides to leave his home and his marriage, and for the next 20 years he lives an equally quiet and uneventful life in an apartment close enough to his old home so that he can keep a close watch on his wife, who grieves at first when he does not return but who then lives a quiet life, essentially as a widow. Although she once encounters him on the street, she does not recognize him in his disguise, and it is only in response to a sudden rain storm that he one day abruptly takes shelter in the house he once left, just as abruptly, so many years before.

Like many of Hawthorne's characters, Wakefield is a person who chooses to separate himself from society, isolating himself from normal human satisfactions and affection. Often the (usually male) characters who behave in this way in Hawthorne's fiction (such as Hooper in “The Minister’s Black Veil,” Warland in “The Artist of the Beautiful,” or the title character of “Young Goodman Brown”) have some deeper purpose for behaving as they do, but Wakefield’s purpose seems merely whimsical and egotistical. He moves (as more than one commentator has remarked) from one monotonous, unexciting routine to another, and neither his reasons for leaving nor his reasons for returning are entirely clear. He is (like many of Hawthorne’s protagonists) a somewhat mysterious character, but in his case the mystery lacks the kind of dark, intriguing overtones associated (for instance) with the main character of “The Minister’s Black Veil.” The story has often been read as a sort of allegorical illustration of one of its most famous sentences: “It is perilous to make a chasm in human affections; not that they gape so long and wide—but so quickly close again!” (Tales 78). In other words, the story may show how easily a person may be forgotten if he breaks his ties with his past, and indeed the tale ends with sentences that almost point a neat, straightforward moral: “Amid the seeming confusion of our mysterious world, individuals are so nicely adjusted to a system, and systems to one another, and to a whole, that, by stepping aside for a moment, a man exposes himself to a fearful risk of losing his place forever. Like Wakefield, he may become, as it were, the ‘Outcast of the Universe’” (Tales 81–82).

The story, however, may be more complex in its ultimate implications than either of these warnings suggests, for perhaps the most surprising aspect of the tale to a modern reader is the fact that Wakefield, after a 20-year absence, can presume to walk in through the front door of his old home again and resume his old life and old lifestyle. Although critics have often seen the ending of the tale as ambiguous (Hawthorne never tells us exactly how Wakefield is received by his long-suffering wife), the opening of the story suggests a happy outcome: “He entered the door one evening, quietly, as from a day’s absence, and became a loving spouse til death” (Tales 76). Feminists might find this tale intriguing for what it suggests about Wakefield’s blithe confidence that he can so easily take the loyalty and affection of his wife for granted. His thoughts and behavior both imply a male-dominated culture in which the feelings, happiness, and legal status of married women mattered far less than the whims of their often self-centered husbands.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Evaluate Wakefield as a character. Does he grow as a result of his “self-banishment”? What elements of his character are responsible for his growth or the lack thereof?
2. Study the isolation of Wakefield in relation to the isolation of Hooper in “The Minister’s Black Veil” and in relation to the isolation of Brown in “Young Goodman Brown.” In what ways, and to what degree, is the isolation of each character freely chosen and/or socially imposed? To what degree and in what ways do we sympathize with each of these characters? How does each character relate to the woman in his life? What does each tale imply about the social status of women?
3. Some commentators have questioned whether “Wakefield” is in fact a story; some see it, instead, as lacking the basic elements of fiction (such as plot and characterization) and forming instead a kind of sketch designed to illustrate a point. What is your position concerning this debate?

“Young Goodman Brown” (1835)

As night descends on the 17th-century village of Salem, Massachusetts, a youthful newlywed named Young Goodman Brown bids farewell to his innocent young wife, Faith, and heads out on a mysterious walk through the darkening forest, where he soon meets an older stranger, whose appearance, conduct, and attitudes resemble those of the devil. As Brown reluctantly heads farther into the forest, he thinks he sees more and more of his fellow townspeople (including respected elders whose virtue he had long trusted) assembling for a Satanic ceremony, but the greatest shock occurs when he thinks he perceives his own wife at the perverted meeting. Calling out to her and urging her to resist the very evil by which he himself is so obviously tempted, he suddenly finds himself alone in the forest, but when he returns to town, he has become an embittered, suspicious, and judgmental man—estranged for the rest of his life from his wife and from the rest of his community and convinced that he is surrounded by sinners.

As does much of Hawthorne's fiction, "Young Goodman Brown" brims with symbolic characters, an allegorical plot, pungent irony, evocative names, and suggestive images. Here as so often elsewhere, Hawthorne is mainly interested in the moral implications of the events he describes and in the spiritual dimensions of the personalities he depicts. By exploring Brown's temptations and his encounter with evil, Hawthorne creates a tale that is typically ambiguous and unsettling—one that resists any simple interpretation, and one that leaves readers, if anything, even more mystified than Brown himself. Uncertainties, irony, and symbolism are present right from the start: Brown departs on his journey at "sunset" (a detail that already suggests the descent of literal and figurative darkness), and he is a citizen of "Salem village" (a town famously associated, because of its notorious trials of alleged witches, with an irrational obsession with the supposed evil of other people). As Brown bids farewell to his allegorically named wife, Faith (who obviously symbolizes both his marital bond and his trust in the teachings of his religion), he notices that she is wearing "pink ribbons," which clearly associate her (at least at this point in the story) with delicate feminine beauty and an almost childlike innocence. Faith's parting hope that Brown will "find all well" when he returns is powerfully ironic in light of the cynical, suspicious attitude he displays at the end of the tale, while Brown's assurance that "no harm will come to [Faith]" if she remains confident in God is also richly ironic, especially in view of his own present and future rejection of the very kind of trust he urges her to display. Brown seems simultaneously naive and arrogant at this point in the story; as he departs on his journey of initiation into darkness, he blithely assumes that he can easily return, assuring himself that "after this one night I'll cling to [Faith's] skirts and follow her to heaven" (Tales 65). Of course, this confident assumption about his future proves false: Although he returns physically to his village, he never returns to his earlier faith (or Faith). By the end of the story he has become pessimistic and misanthropic, and his earlier confidence in his Faith has been replaced by an egotistical assurance of the sinfulness of others and of his own self-righteous authority to sit in judgment of them.

Ironies and ambiguities abound in this carefully crafted tale. Thus Brown worries about the dangers posed by "devilish Indian[s]," rather than fearing either his own planned encounter with the devil or the evil impulses embedded in his own sinful nature (Tales 66). He overconfidently assumes that his Puritan ancestors and contemporaries are incapable of sin ("We are a people of prayer, and good works to boot, and abide no such wickedness"), thus displaying the kind of spiritual pride that inevitably precedes a fall (Tales 67). Quickly forgetting that the devil is a master of illusions who can easily deceive the senses, Brown naively assumes—merely because he finds a few pink ribbons in the forest—that Faith must have succumbed to evil, and when he proclaims, "My Faith is gone! . . . There is no good on earth, and sin is but a name," he reveals an impulsive extremism, a willingness to leap (without thinking) to hasty and drastic conclusions—a willingness that already foreshadows the inflexible self-assurance he displays at the end of the story (Tales 71). He already begins to partake in what is later called "the mystery of sin," in which humans become "more conscious of the secret guilt of others, both in deed and thought" than of their own (Tales 74). By rashly rushing to the conclusion that Faith and the townspeople are guilty of sin and hypocrisy, and by unmercifully judging them rather than examining his own failings or scrutinizing his own conscience, Brown turns his back on the trust, hope, charity, and forgiveness that are the essence of the faith he has himself betrayed. By the end of the story, he symbolizes a kind of rigid legalistic judgment, an unbending spiritual arrogance, that alienates him from the very people (including his wife) he might have learned to love and forgive, whatever their real or supposed flaws. Instead of learning from his real or imagined experiences in the woods that all human beings (including, and perhaps especially, him) are inevitably imperfect, he sets himself up as a merciless judge, hypocritically convicting others of hypocrisy. Like the Salem judges (including an ancestor of Hawthorne himself) who felt confident in condemning alleged “witches” to death, Brown becomes obsessed with others’ sins rather than seriously confronting his own. He moves from a kind of naive faith at the beginning of the story to a kind of naive self-righteousness at the end. His ultimate outlook is both hopelessly simplistic and simplistically hopeless.

Hawthorne crafts the story with careful attention to detail, patterning the work around such symbolic contrasts as the opposition between light and darkness, town and forest, good and evil, and reality and appearance. The plot is fairly simple and straightforward, with relatively few characters, no digressions, and a rising sense of suspense that builds to an effectively puzzling climax. Just as Hawthorne plays on Brown’s suspicions and uncertainties, so he similarly perplexes his readers, particularly by raising the distinct possibility that the whole account of the convocation in the forest, which he had just so vividly described, may actually have been only an illusion: “Had Goodman Brown fallen asleep in the forest and only dreamed a wild dream of a witch meeting?” (Tales 75). Ultimately (Hawthorne suggests) the “reality” of the meeting is unimportant. What matters, instead, are the moral and spiritual choices Brown makes in response to the events, whether those events were real or merely imagined. The ways Brown chooses to treat others (and to regard himself) are far more significant than anything that may or may not have happened in the dark and lonely woods.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this tale with Hawthorne’s “The Minister’s Black Veil.” In particular, discuss the initial motives and ultimate fates of the two main characters. Discuss, as well, their relations with the women in their lives and their attitudes toward their communities. Is one character more sympathetic than the other? How do both stories effectively use mystery?
2. How does this story resemble and/or differ from Hawthorne’s “The Birth-mark” in its focus on the tendency to find fault in others? How and why do both stories end in tragedy both for the male protagonists and for their wives? Which story is more tragic? Which husband is a more sympathetic character? What do both stories suggest about Hawthorne’s ideals of marriage?
3. One could read “Young Goodman Brown” as an allegory of faith. In the midst of his forest experience, young Goodman Brown declares, “With Heaven above, and Faith below, I will yet stand firm against the devil!” Does young Goodman Brown lose his faith? If so, why? What, according to Hawthorne, are the consequences of losing faith?

Owen Warland repairs clocks in a small New England town in the early 1800s, but his main and in fact obsessive interest is in trying to create something intricate, beautiful, and highly distinctive—an interest that isolates him from the more practical, materialistic citizens of the town, including three persons in particular: his former mentor, Peter Hovenden; Hovenden’s daughter, Annie (to whom Owen is romantically attracted); and his childhood friend, a bluff, friendly, and respected blacksmith named Robert Danforth. Hovenden ridicules Warland’s impractical obsession with creating artistic “toys” and is happy when Annie chooses instead to marry Danforth, although that event (along with Hovenden’s criticism) discourages and depresses Warland. Eventually, however, after many years of effort, Warland manages to create an astonishingly lifelike and extremely delicate mechanical butterfly and proudly shows it to Hovenden, Danforth, Annie, and the couple’s young child. Annie in particular is impressed, and although Annie is horrified when the infant accidentally crushes Warland’s creation, Warland himself seems less troubled by the loss than one might have expected.

Here as in so much of Hawthorne's fiction, the allegorical element is strong: Warland is obviously a symbol of the artist; his acquaintances are just as obviously symbols of society in its various forms of response to artists; and the butterfly is equally obviously a symbol of the complexly beautiful creation for which the serious artist strives. Less obvious, however, is the precise meaning of the tale. To what degree does Hawthorne sympathize with Warland? To what degree does he disapprove of the artist's isolation from the community as a whole? To what degree is Warland responsible for that isolation, and to what degree is he a victim of the indifference, hostility, and/or shallowness of the people who surround him? Is Warland an egotist with an unhealthy addiction to impractical dreams? Or is he a dedicated artist whose perfectionism and desire to create a thing of beauty deserve our respect? All these questions have been answered in various ways, with some commentators arguing that Warland is an immature personality whose development as a human being remains stunted because of his self-imposed isolation (a frequent theme in Hawthorne's writings), while other critics contend that Warland is an admirable idealist whose commitment to his art is worthy of respect and whose isolation results more from the narrow prejudices of his community than from his own personal limitations. Other students of the story, however, find faults both in Warland and in his circle of acquaintances (especially the belligerent Hovenden). According to this kind of interpretation, none of the characters achieves the sort of balance between practicality and imagination that Hawthorne would have considered ideal. Warland's final reaction to the destruction of his butterfly suggests, however, that he may have attained the kind of self-reliance, self-respect, and self-contentment he has been missing for most of his life. Having finally achieved the ability to create something truly beautiful, he seems satisfied with that spiritual accomplishment and seems relatively untroubled by the loss of the material manifestation of that beauty. His indifference to the loss of the butterfly, and his final indifference to Hovenden's scorn suggests that he now possesses a kind of inner strength and confidence he has previously lacked. As he often does, however, Hawthorne the allegorist refuses to spell out any simplistic message; his goal is to provoke thought rather than to render real thinking unnecessary.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Warland with another man who is in some ways equally obsessed: Aylmer in Hawthorne's "The Birth-mark." How are their obsessions similar? How do they differ? Are there any other characters in the two works who seem comparable to one another? Discuss the roles of the women in both stories.
2. Read Ralph Waldo Emerson's essay "The Poet" and then discuss the ways in which Warland either resembles or differs from the kind of artist discussed in that work. Given Emerson's ideas about art, how and why do you think he would have responded to Warland's behavior and achievements?
3. Does "The Artist of the Beautiful" comment upon the ethical dimensions of art and the artist? Does Owen Warland bear any blame for the destruction of the butterfly in the final scene?

"Rappaccini's Daughter" (1844)

After opening with a whimsical introduction, this story describes how a young Italian, Giovanni Guasconti, takes up residence in the city of Padua, where he has arrived to study at the university; looking down from his apartment window one day, he can see a garden owned by a famous doctor named Giacomo Rappaccini, and in the garden he eventually sees the doctor's beautiful daughter, Beatrice, who helps her father cultivate many strange and intriguing plants. Despite warnings from Professor Pietro Baglioni (an old friend of Giovanni's father and a great rival of Rappaccini), Giovanni becomes increasingly involved with Beatrice, whom he often meets, secretly, inside the garden's walls. When Giovanni begins to suspect that Beatrice (thanks to her father's experiments) is literally poisonous and that he himself is also slowly being transformed into a similarly poisonous creature under her influence, he angrily confronts her and gives her an antidote concocted by Baglioni, but the antidote quickly kills her, leaving all three men gazing at her beautiful corpse.

As Hawthorne himself implies in the humorous preface to this tale, this story is another example of his penchant for allegorical plots, symbolic settings, and emblematic characters, although (as is also typical of Hawthorne) the ultimate meaning of all the symbolism and allegory is less than wholly transparent. Each of the main characters has been interpreted in both positive and negative terms, and indeed some commentators see all of them as complicated mixtures of both good and evil. Even Beatrice, who is usually regarded as a pure-hearted, innocent victim of her father's manipulative experiments, has been criticized for failing to appreciate the dangers she poses to Giovanni and for failing to warn him about her father, and Hawthorne himself was apparently unsure whether he would ultimately depict her as an angel or as a demon. Eventually he decided that she was angelic (and in fact he eventually makes this point quite explicit, in a move that some critics have regarded as clumsy and unsubtle). For most of the tale, however, readers are as puzzled by Beatrice as Giovanni is (and as Hawthorne himself was at first)—a fact that contributes to the suspense and mystery of the work. Equally mysterious, for most of the story, are the character and motives of the seldom-seen Rappaccini and more intrusive Baglioni: Does the doctor have the best interests of his daughter at heart, or is he simply a conniving, malevolent, and almost Satanic figure? Is Baglioni genuinely motivated by a desire to assist his young friend, or is he driven mainly by rivalry and envy? Are the two older men as talented as they think they are (and as they are widely considered to be), or is each, finally, a bungler in his own way? Should we sympathize with Giovanni, or is he (as some commentators think) a shallow, unfaithful, selfish meddler—a naive manipulator who is unworthy of the love of a selfless, thoughtful, and generous-hearted woman? As usual, Hawthorne raises many questions but provides few obvious answers, and it is precisely this ability to stimulate thought without offering neat or tidy resolutions that appeals to this author's many admirers. However else one responds to Beatrice, she is clearly one of the many women in Hawthorne's fiction who are either dominated, exploited, or (at the very least) insufficiently appreciated by the men in their lives. In this respect she resembles Faith in "Young Goodman Brown" and especially Georgianna in "The Birth-mark," a story that also features a "talented" scientist who is more than willing to conduct dangerous experiments on someone he fails to love with simple affection and acceptance. In "Rappaccini's Daughter" as in so many of his other works, Hawthorne shows the tragedy that often results when people (usually males), driven by arrogant pride, fail to treat others (usually women) with full respect and dignity. Beatrice dies because her father presumes to act as a kind of false god in an artificial Eden of his own superficial devising, and it is far from clear that Baglioni is a genuinely selfless would-be savior. Hawthorne ends the story abruptly with Beatrice's death, leaving readers to ponder the final significance of the events and characters he describes.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read some definitions and discussions of gothic literature, and then discuss the ways in which this story displays the traits of a gothic tale. In particular, discuss such matters as setting, characterization, imagery, symbolism, mood, tone, and conclusion. How is Rappaccini himself a gothic character? How does Beatrice fit the standard gothic pattern? Choose a particular passage from the story and discuss the ways all its elements contribute to a gothic atmosphere or effect.
2. The narrator refers to Doctor Rappaccini as a "man of science," and "Rappaccini's Daughter" clearly seems a cautionary tale about science. What elements of scientific practice does Hawthorne seem to criticize in the story? Why?
3. Hawthorne clearly uses poison as a metaphor in "Rappaccini's Daughter." Analyze the language of poison and poisoning in the story. How does Hawthorne use the idea of poison in the text?

“The Birth-mark” (1846)

Aylmer is a distinguished 18th-century scientist who marries a gentle-natured and beautiful young woman named Georgiana; only after their marriage, however, does he begin to be troubled by the small pink birth-mark on her cheek—a mark that many men consider one of her most attractive features, whereas jealous women condemn it. Aylmer eventually becomes so obsessed with the idea of removing the mark (and his treatment of Georgiana eventually becomes so subtly disdainful) that she insists that he attempt to rid her of this supposed defect. Despite the fact that so many of his earlier experiments have only partially succeeded, Aylmer undertakes this new one, and although he does succeed in removing the mark, he kills Georgiana in the process—an outcome mocked by his crude but pragmatically sensible lab assistant, Aminadab.

“The Birth-mark” is one of Hawthorne’s most pervasively ironic tales, and although the outcome of the story is almost predictable, the ironies are so frequent and so pungent that the story never loses its interest. Aylmer is a scientist for whom science is a kind of religion; he thinks of himself (and is thought of by others) as possessing almost god-like powers. The first paragraph already begins to emphasize the sort of religious language that runs throughout the story; Hawthorne speaks of Aylmer’s era as a time when science “seemed to open paths into the region of miracle,” and he speaks of obsessive scientists as “devoted votaries” who believed that the successful scientist might someday be able to “lay his hand on the secret of creative force and perhaps make new worlds for himself” (Tales 118). Such language already smacks of blasphemy and of overweening pride, and the story can obviously be read as an allegory about the dangers of human presumption. Aylmer presumes to sit in judgment of his beautiful wife, paying unhealthy attention to her one small physical flaw while, in the process, not only ignoring but also exemplifying his own ethical and spiritual shortcomings. By attempting to remove her alleged bodily imperfection, he displays the imperfections of his own mind and soul.

The story clearly implies that beauty (or, in this case, ugliness) is clearly in the eye of the beholder. Most men find the birthmark attractive, but Aylmer “select[s]” it as a symbol of his wife’s imperfection; his “sombre imagination . . . render[s]” it a “frightful object” (Tales 120; italics added). The birth-mark may indeed be a sign of imperfection, but Aylmer clearly fails to realize that all people are imperfect when judged by a standard of absolute flawlessness, and that his own tendency to judge his wife in this fashion makes him guilty of a far more serious spiritual imperfection than any minor physical blemish she may possess. By the middle of the story, practically every sentence becomes ironic. At one point, for instance, Georgiana begs Aylmer, “Either remove this dreadful hand, or take my wretched life!” (Tales 121). He will, of course, eventually manage to do both. Likewise, when Georgiana asks Aylmer to “save [his] poor wife from madness” (Tales 121), Hawthorne’s phrasing invites us to consider which of the two may truly be insane. In any case, whether or not Aylmer is actually crazy, he is certainly a monumental egotist, as the long string of personal pronouns in the following sentence suggests: “I feel myself fully competent to render this dear cheek as faultless as its fellow; and then, most beloved, what will be my triumph when I shall have corrected what Nature left imperfect in her fairest work! Even Pygmalion, when his sculptured woman assumed life, felt not greater ecstasy than mine will be” (Tales 121–122; italics added). Ironically, of course, Pygmalion at least managed to create a living woman, not kill one.

Although Aylmer installs Georgiana in artificially attractive chambers that resemble a kind of ersatz heaven, his own scientific laboratory resembles a sort of hell, and he does indeed display a kind of Satanic pride in his willingness to deceive his wife: He experiments on her without her full knowledge or complete prior consent, failing to inform her completely of the risks involved, and failing also to acknowledge the long string of his own previous scientific mishaps. He ironically urges her not to “mistrust” him (Tales 125), but it is clearly he who mistrusts her; and both the irony of the story and the religious language reach a high point when, as Georgiana dies, the fading birthmark is compared to “the stain of the rainbow fading out of the sky” (Tales 130). The rainbow, of course, is usually regarded not as a “stain” but as a symbol of rich beauty, and it is also traditionally considered a symbol of God’s bond or covenant with man. Likewise, the narrator ultimately describes Georgiana’s birthmark as “the bond by which an angelic spirit kept itself in union with a mortal frame” (Tales 130). By refusing to accept the inevitable fact of imperfection—not only Georgiana’s but also his own and that of all earthly things—Aylmer not only sacrifices an innocent life but also ruins his own chance for real (if imperfect) happiness. By attempting to expunge a sign that he interprets as the symbol of another’s flaw, he manifests a far deeper, more repulsive flaw of his own.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Look at this story from a modern feminist perspective, and then discuss the degree to which you think Georgiana herself is partly responsible for what happens to her. How, ideally, might she have responded differently to Aylmer’s urgings? However, how might her historical circumstances—including her early training, her legal status as an 18th-century wife, and other cultural and social pressures—have prevented her from responding differently than she does? How do you think most modern women would respond to a husband like Aylmer?
2. Compare and contrast Aylmer with Angelo in William Shakespeare’s play Measure for Measure. To what degree is each character guilty of pride, presumption, and hypocrisy? How does each tend to set himself up as a little god, sitting in judgment of others? To what degree is each character conscious of his hypocrisy? What biblical passages seem relevant both to Shakespeare’s play and to Hawthorne’s story? In particular, discuss the possible relevance of Matthew 7:1–5.

The Scarlet Letter (1850)

Set in Boston in the 1640s, the novel describes how the town’s rigidly Puritan community punished an attractive young woman named Hester Prynne for committing adultery and for giving birth to an illegitimate daughter named Pearl. Hester’s much-older husband had sent her from Europe to America with plans to join her later; when he, however, did not appear after a long time, he was presumed dead, and Hester secretly became involved with a young and highly respected local minister, Arthur Dimmesdale. Although the tormented preacher cannot make himself admit his affair with Hester publicly, Hester herself is willing to keep his secret, even though she must bear the public badge of her adultery in the form of a large scarlet letter A sewn onto her clothing. When her old husband (passing himself off as a doctor named Roger Chillingworth) unexpectedly and secretly appears on the scene, he soon suspects Dimmesdale’s guilt. Swearing Hester to silence about his identity, Chillingworth befriends Dimmesdale and begins a long process of psychological torture—a process that eventually leads not only to Dimmesdale’s public confession and sudden death but also to a brief but meaningful connection with Hester and with Pearl, who earlier had withheld her affection until he admitted his sin.

The Scarlet Letter is universally regarded not only as Hawthorne’s masterpiece, but as one of the most important novels in the history of American literature. The book has never gone out of print since its very first publication, and its status as a significant work of art was recognized almost immediately. Even the relatively few early critics who disliked the book (because of its alleged immorality, historical inaccuracy, and use of personal satire in the introductory “Custom-House” section) nevertheless paid it the compliment of serious attention, and most of Hawthorne’s initial audience was impressed (as have been most subsequent readers) by the profound moral issues the book raised, by its shrewd ethical and psychological insights, and by its memorable characters, skillful symbolism, and suspenseful plot. With the publication of The Scarlet Letter, American literature had at last come of age, and the book was perhaps even more warmly greeted in Britain than it had already been received in the United States.

The novel opens with a long introductory section titled “The Custom-House”—a section added at the suggestion of Hawthorne’s publisher, who thought that the novel was otherwise too short. Based in part on Hawthorne’s own experiences working in the Custom House in Salem, Massachusetts, this section has always been one of the most controversial portions of the work. Many early reviewers thought that Hawthorne had used the introduction mainly to take satirical revenge on his personal political enemies, whom he blamed for the loss of his job as a customs officer. Other readers, meanwhile, have considered the introduction an unnecessary addition to the main text, and teachers sometimes advise students to skip this segment and proceed directly to the main narrative. The more common recent tendency among critics, however, is to explore the various ways in which the introduction is relevant to the main body of the book, particularly in the ways both the introduction and the book itself focus on relations between the individual and society and especially on the impact of political power on private lives. According to the excellent summation provided by Kimberly Muirhead, recent critics often cite thematic similarities between the two works that link them (such as isolation, alienation, guilt over sins of the past, and tensions between solitude and sociability, the past and the present, public and private interests, and artistic and social responsibilities); [in addition, such critics] show how Hawthorne’s personal and political experiences during and after the Custom-House scandal [in which he was fired from his job] parallel Hester’s and Dimmesdale’s experiences in the novel; and they frequently extend those comparisons by illustrating that Hawthorne projects his own artistic temperament, personality, or state of mind onto one or more of his primary characters. (xxvi–xxvii)

In all the ways and for all the reasons just mentioned, then, “The Custom House” is well worth including in any serious reading of The Scarlet Letter. Certainly the occasional humor of the introduction adds an extra dimension to the book. Meanwhile, the narrator’s claim that he discovered historical manuscripts describing the basic events on which the plot of the novel is based was a typical device of fiction writers in the 17th through 19th centuries, when creative writers often tried to give their fictional works historical credibility. Hawthorne, with his keen interest in New England’s Puritan past and his ambivalent attitudes toward his own Puritan ancestors, had special reasons to want to set his book in early colonial times, especially since the Puritan era was a period when matters of sin, guilt, and moral responsibility (key themes in much of Hawthorne’s fiction) were central to the public culture. By setting his story in the remote past, Hawthorne (paradoxically) could not only explore his interest in history and give his narrative plausibility but also gain a measure of imaginative freedom: His text would not be tied to the mundane facts of everyday life in an all-too-familiar 19th-century America; instead, the book could take on legendary coloring and an imaginative tone by describing events set in a bygone era. The past thus provided him an anchor, but it was also a source of creative liberation.

Hawthorne’s decision to set The Scarlet Letter in the legendary past was also appropriate to the particular kind (or genre) of work he was writing. Although the book is often referred to as a novel, in the strict sense it is more accurately labeled a romance. Of these two kinds of works, novels were expected to be more realistic in setting, plot, characterization, and tone. Novels, in fact, often described the daily lives of people not much different from those of the people who read them. Romances, on the other hand, afforded their authors greater range and flexibility; a romance writer could approach his materials in a more imaginative, less literal fashion; he could include elements of fantasy and the supernatural (although not to excess). Above all, he needed to be less concerned with presenting absolutely credible facts and more adept at depicting the “truth of the human heart” (the phrase Hawthorne himself memorably used when justifying romances in his “Preface” to The House of the Seven Gables, 1). The writer of romances is less concerned with reporting external data than with probing the inner workings of his characters' minds and emotions, and the writer of romances also tends to be more concerned with larger, more universal, more timeless issues than with a merely accurate description of the daily life of a particular time and place. All these characteristics are especially relevant to the kind of work Hawthorne was composing in The Scarlet Letter, which is not only a romance but also a romance with strong gothic elements. Gothic fiction often features a tone that is grim, gloomy, and foreboding. Mystery, suspense, and even aspects of the supernatural are often traits found in such writings, which frequently contain at least one major "evil" figure whose often puzzling behavior threatens the well-being and often even the sanity of more sympathetic characters. Gothic writing often explores the dark inner recesses of the human psyche and frequently involves a fascination with characters who are both intriguing and morally repellent. The people in gothic works are often socially isolated and psychologically tormented, and certainly in all these ways The Scarlet Letter is a classic example of gothic fiction.

Hawthorne's decision to write a "gothic romance" also gave him license to employ many of his favorite fictional techniques, including a heavy emphasis on symbolism and allegory, strong patterns of repeated images (especially images of light versus darkness), the use of evocative settings and suggestive names, and a decided stress on ambiguity and mystery. All these features and devices helped him create a work that relies prominently on suggestion, connotation, indirection, and implication to convey its often shadowy and ambiguous meanings. The Scarlet Letter is a memorable book as much for the questions it raises and the speculation it provokes as for any answers it offers; it is effective as much for the mysterious moods it creates as for any straightforward "meanings" it definitively provides. Each of the main characters, for instance, is given an evocative name, yet none of the names completely explains the full complexity of the characters Hawthorne creates. Hester's name associates her with the psychological strength and physical attractiveness of the biblical queen Esther, who was famous for keeping a secret; Dimmesdale's name links him with the darkness and gloom that increasingly characterize his own perception of himself; Chillingsworth's name implies the coldness at the heart of his dealings with other people; Pearl's name suggests something both beautiful and precious but also purchased at a great price. The names are obviously, in some respects, allegorical: They encourage us to think of the characters not as completely realistic individuals but as persons who are symbolic to one degree or another. Yet the names do not begin to exhaust the full significance of the characters to whom they are attached—characters who exist partly as credibly rendered persons and partly as figures in a highly evocative and symbolic narrative. The same is obviously true of the novel's varied settings: The novel's Boston is, in various respects, a believable recreation of the actual early New England town, but in other ways it also symbolizes the constricted, ordered life of a tightly knit community, in which the society's values can be harshly imposed on any individual who dares to question or reject them. Likewise, the woods that surround the town are in some ways merely a credible forest, while in other respects they also symbolize the freedom (but also perhaps the wildness and moral dangers) that result from distance from communal supervision. Hester, significantly, lives most of her existence outside the confining borders of the town and just at the edge of the forest, and in this respect, as in so many others, she is a marginal being—someone whose existence calls attention to the very same social constrictions she partially manages to evade.

When we first glimpse Hester, of course, she is anything but unconfined or unconstricted. She has just emerged from jail, carrying the infant Pearl in her arms and wearing a bright scarlet letter A sewn onto the breast of her dress. She is soon taken to a public scaffold, where she is subjected to hours of public display and humiliation. The scaffold, in fact, is one of the most important and most pivotal of all the settings described in the novel; "scaffold scenes" appear at crucial points throughout the book, thereby providing a sense of continuity and structure while also helping to advance the plot, usually by placing many of the main characters together in one location while also setting the stage for some significant change in the action. The scaffold, as a symbol of public exposure and punishment, is at the figurative heart of this Puritan community, and scenes involving the scaffold are often juxtaposed with scenes involving the forest (the symbol of privacy and mysterious secrets). Hawthorne's use of the scaffold scenes typifies the economy and skill with which the novel is structured; the design of the work is relatively simple, with no elaborate subplots, no huge cast of characters, and no wide variations in atmosphere or tone. The mood of the work is consistently somber and serious, as befits its central concern with issues such as sin, guilt, hypocrisy, and revenge. The repeated scaffold scenes, as do the repeated alternations between the settings of town and forest, help give the work an impressive symmetry and coherence, while the relatively small cast of characters and the general absence of exciting physical action help keep the focus where Hawthorne clearly wants it: not so much on what the characters physically do as on their thoughts, emotions, motives, and psychological complexities.

Each of the four major characters has been analyzed in multiple ways. Chillingworth, for instance, has generally been seen as an almost Satanic personification of evil and revenge. He is associated with frigid rationality and with the mind rather than the heart, and in his desire to torment Dimmesdale he has often been interpreted as the dark villain of the book. In his obsession with discovering and punishing the secret sins of others, he becomes ever more sinful himself, and as his character degenerates, his body also becomes literally more distorted and crippled. As with Satan in Milton's Paradise Lost (a book to which Hawthorne alludes frequently), Chillingworth's physical degeneration matches his increasing moral corruption, and it is clearly ironic that he adopts the role of a physician. Rather than caring for others or helping to cure them, he tortures and sickens them, both psychologically and physically, and in the process he himself descends into a kind of mental and moral illness. He wins only a paradoxical victory in the end of the book, for although he succeeds in destroying and even (in a sense) killing Dimmesdale, he himself soon dies, unloved and alone. He is both literally and figuratively a "leech"—a word synonymous in Puritan times with "physician," but a word that also implies Chillingworth's role as a kind of blood-sucking parasite. He is the moral and metaphorical vampire in this darkly gothic novel. And yet it would be far too crude to see Chillingworth as a villain pure and simple; he is, after all, also the victim of Hester's adultery and of Dimmesdale's secret hypocrisy, and his desire for revenge is, unfortunately, an all-too-human and all-too-common response to perceived injustice. Few readers can honestly or completely distance themselves from Chillingworth's darker impulses, but in his elaborate and subtle persecution of another person's corruption, Chillingworth only makes himself seem the more fundamentally corrupt of the two. Paradoxically, in his efforts to scourge and afflict Dimmesdale, Chillingworth ultimately helps lead the minister to a kind of redemption, and so he becomes a kind of spiritual physician almost in spite of himself.

Dimmesdale, by the end of the novel, has become a more sympathetic character than he was at the beginning; his guilty conscience and his physical, mental, and emotional suffering, combined with his final public confession, help make him seem something more than merely the weak and frightened hypocrite he might have appeared to be at the start of the book. As Hester does, he feels the full force of external pressures to conform to rigid social expectations, yet he, of course, lacks her strength of character and her willingness to face the public consequences of their mutual sin. He is, in some ways, the weaker and even the more conventionally "feminine" of the two sinners, but just as Hawthorne is able to convey skillfully the complexities of Chillingworth's position, so he is able to do the same with Dimmesdale. Dimmesdale is not a character for whom we can ever afford to feel mere disdain, for just as Chillingworth is full of a vengefulness most people will recognize in themselves, so Dimmesdale embodies familiar fears and common internal struggles. Like all the major characters of the book, Dimmesdale is a complex figure whose dilemma should stimulate complicated reactions rather than simple, self-righteous censure.

Pearl, too, is another of Hawthorne's complicated creations, although commentators have often seen her as the most allegorical and symbolic (and thus as the least fully rounded) of the four major characters. She is obviously the living embodiment of her parents' sin, and perhaps that is partly why she seems so willful, so mischievous, and so difficult to control. At the same time, however, she is also beautiful and intelligent, and of all the major characters she is the one who seems the least secretive, the least calculating, and the most impulsive. As a child who has been raised mainly on the outskirts of the town, she is the character who seems least concerned with the opinions of the community, and she is the character who is least conflicted by the need to adopt public postures. As does Chillingworth, but in a different way and from different motives, Pearl plays a major role in Dimmesdale's eventual confession and redemption, and Pearl herself seems transformed in positive ways by her father's final transformation. At the end of the novel, it is Pearl who inherits Chillingworth's money and who manages to escape the restricted life of Puritan New England: As the work concludes, she is living a prosperous and apparently happy life as a wife and mother in Europe.

Of all the characters Hawthorne created, however, it is obviously Hester Prynne who is the most memorably complex, and it is certainly Hester who has been the subject of most of the critical commentary and debate the novel has inspired. Commentators have often been attracted by her independence, her dignity, her strength and resilience, her defiance of social prejudice, her practical ability to cope with hardship, her devotion to her sometimes-difficult daughter, and her enduring commitment to protecting the complicated man she loves. Hester has often been seen as more sinned against than sinning, and many critics (especially recent ones) have viewed her as a kind of feminist heroine—a self-assertive woman whose desire for autonomy wins the respect of both Hawthorne and his readers. Hester's initial rejection of (and by) society has been seen by some as symbolizing the rise, during Hawthorne's day, of a new kind of woman (one who would no longer be content with the confining strictures of the past), but Hawthorne's attitude toward these new developments has been the subject of intense debate. Some commentators argue that the novel adopts a generally profeminist stance, while others contend that Hester is never as much a "feminist" as some critics claim, and that Hawthorne himself was, in any case, deeply skeptical of any kind of unbridled, romantic individualism. According to some analysts, even if Hawthorne did sympathize with Hester's rebellion, he effectively "tames" her by the end of the book, after an absence of many years taking her back to Boston, where she resumes living in her small cottage, devotes herself to public charity, and wins the widespread respect of the very community that long ago persecuted her for her rebellious ways. According to this interpretation, Hawthorne ends the work by neutralizing Hester's radical or revolutionary potential, either because he lost his nerve or because he never fully sympathized with her rebelliousness. Others, however, argue that Hester remains a subversive figure to the very end, particularly in the way she assures other troubled women (who go to her for counsel) "of her firm belief, that, at some brighter period, when the world should have grown ripe for it, in Heaven's own time, a new truth would be revealed, in order to establish the whole relation between man and woman on a surer ground of mutual happiness" (166). According to this reading, Hester at the end of the book is a kind of feminist prophet. Other readers, however, argue that at the conclusion she is a far more conventional figure than she was at the beginning.

The fact that both Hester and the novel's conclusion are open to such diverse interpretations should not be surprising, since many issues raised by the book have been the subject of much discussion and sometimes even heated debate. Is Hawthorne's attitude toward the Puritans mostly negative, or is it more subtly ambivalent? Does the novel imply a consistent political philosophy, or does it tend to sidestep political questions? If the book does have a political agenda, is that agenda "liberal," "conservative," or some complex mixture of the two? How, if at all, is the work relevant to the tense sociopolitical controversies of Hawthorne's own time, particularly the controversy over slavery (a debate that would soon result in civil war)? How does the novel position itself in relation to contemporary disagreements over transcendentalism, a popular philosophy of Hawthorne's time, and to what degree is the book skeptical of almost any claim to truth rather than simply skeptical about particularly rigid and dogmatic judgments? What is the central theme of the text? Is that theme sin, love, or something else? Is the text fundamentally ambiguous, or does a coherent, consistent meaning emerge? How does the novel reflect Hawthorne's own personality and character, and what (precisely) were his personal traits and attitudes? Was he a relatively well-adjusted and happy man, or was he a deeply, darkly tormented soul? Finally, can the work profitably be read in light of recent interpretive theories, such as Freudian psychology or postmodern analysis? Or should it be read primarily in the context of its own particular time? These are just a few of the many questions that have been raised about the book in the century and a half since it was first published, and no doubt the discussion and debate will continue. One key trait of any literary classic is that it continues to provoke thought and stimulate dialogue (and even fierce argument). By that standard alone, The Scarlet Letter is definitely a classic, and although a few critics have faulted the book as a work of art (criticizing, for instance, its allegedly excessive emphasis on symbolism and the supposed artificiality of its characters and style), most readers have roundly disagreed. The Scarlet Letter has long been considered perhaps the first classic American novel—and certainly one of the most important—and that status seems, if anything, more secure today than at any time in the past.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Hester Prynne is one of the great characters in American literature. How are we to feel about Hester? Does Hawthorne seem to admire her or condemn her? Why does she choose to remain in Boston instead of escaping?
2. Read The Scarlet Letter alongside Edith Wharton's The Age of Innocence, paying particular to the ways in which the lives of the central characters are shaped and restricted by the societies in which they live. What are the central value systems of those two different societies? How does each society attempt to impose control on its members? How does each central female character deal with those attempts at control? How are the chief male characters in each novel comparable and/or distinct? What is the implied attitude of the narrators toward the societies they describe?
3. In what way is Roger Chillingworth a kind of Satanic character? How, and for what reasons, is he a source of pain and torment to others? Does he change as the novel progresses?
4. Compare and contrast The Scarlet Letter with Zora Neale Hurston's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. Discuss the personalities and experiences of the two heroines. How are the lives of both women shaped by their communities and by their relationships with older husbands who try to control them? What attracts each woman to a younger man? What options are open to each woman in her respective society? Discuss the ways both works present contrasts between distinct physical settings, particularly between life in towns and life outside towns.
5. Examine the nature and function of each "scaffold scene" in The Scarlet Letter. What elements do the scenes have in common; how are they distinct; what kinds of progression occur from one such scene to the next?

Preface to The House of the Seven Gables (1851)

In this "Preface," Hawthorne makes a clear distinction between romances and novels; the former are less strictly tied to realism and mundane facts than the latter. Hawthorne offers his book as a romance, not a novel, and although he argues that the text does offer a moral meaning, he also stresses that its moral significance is not presented in any obvious or mechanical fashion.

Hawthorne's distinction between novels and romances is important not only to an understanding of The House of the Seven Gables but also to a proper appreciation of his other fiction, as well, including his shorter tales as well as his longer works, such as The Scarlet Letter. Hawthorne wanted to make it clear, in this “Preface,” that his writing should not be judged by the standards appropriate to a completely realistic, documentary kind of fiction writing, particularly not the kind of writing associated with the “novel of manners,” whose purpose was to recreate the details of daily life (especially contemporary life) in a believable and convincing fashion. Hawthorne, instead, seeks “a certain latitude” in his fiction; his goal is emphatically not to adhere to “a very minute fidelity, not merely to the possible, but to the probable and ordinary course of man’s experience” (1). His focus instead is on an inner, deeper truth—“the truth of the human heart,” which the writer of romances has “a right to present . . . under circumstances, to a great extent, of the writer’s own choosing or creation” (1). Hawthorne seeks a flexibility, especially in creating the atmosphere, symbolism, overtones, undertones, and imagery of the book; he does not want to be tied to a strict, unimaginative realism. At the same time, he is conscious of the dangers of departing too far from the mundane and credible, and so he advises the writer of romance to “make a very moderate use of the privileges here stated, and, especially, to mingle the Marvellous [sic] rather as a slight, delicate, evanescent flavor, than as any portion of the actual substance of the dish offered to the Public” (1). The imagery here is significant: Hawthorne is imagining the writer as a kind of chef who should have a right to depart from ordinary, predictable cuisine, but who should not depart too far from public tastes.

One widespread expectation among readers (and critics) of fiction in Hawthorne’s era was that a work of creative writing (whether a romance, novel, poem, or story) should convey some moral meaning. Hawthorne argues that The House of the Seven Gables does indeed contain a “moral”—“namely, that the wrong-doing of one generation lives into the successive ones”—and in fact he adds another moral for good measure: “the folly of tumbling down an avalanche of ill-gotten gold, or real estate, on the heads of an unfortunate posterity, thereby to maintain and crush them” (2). Once again, however, Hawthorne makes a case for flexibility, subtlety, and nuance: A work of fiction teaches most effectively not by making blatant arguments but “through a far more subtle [subtle] process” (2). If a work of creative art is to have a powerful moral impact, that impact must be achieved by indirection, implication, suggestion, and delicate shadings, not by open or crude sermonizing. The writer of a romance is an artist, not a preacher, and so Hawthorne rejects any impulse “relentlessly to impale the story with its moral, as with an iron rod—or rather, as by sticking a pin through a butterfly—thus at once depriving it of life, and causing it to stiffen in an ungainly and unnatural attitude” (2).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Flannery O’Connor was a great admirer of Nathaniel Hawthorne, and she, too, claimed to be writing in the tradition of “romance” as he defines it. Choose one of her works (such as the story “A Good Man Is Hard to Find”) and discuss the ways in which it is a “romantic” work in Hawthorne’s sense. How does the story depart from strict realism? How does it use symbolism and subtlety to convey a message about “the truth of the human heart”? How does it convey a moral without merely preaching?
2. Discuss whether and how accurately Herman Melville’s novel Moby-Dick might be considered a “romance” by Hawthorne’s definition. In what ways does Melville use symbolism, imagery, atmospheric effects, and “the Marvellous” to tell a story that transcends mere realism? In what ways does Melville explore truths of the human heart in his book rather than focusing on details of common, mundane behavior?

The House of the Seven Gables (1851)

In the late 1600s in New England, greedy Colonel Pyncheon acquired land for a large, imposing house, apparently by suggesting that the unsuspecting landowner, Matthew Maule, was guilty of witchcraft; however, just before Maule was hanged for this alleged offense, he pronounced a curse on Pyncheon—a curse that reverberated down through the decades, affecting not only the colonel (who soon died) but also his descendants. In the first part of the 19th century, one of those descendants, an elderly unmarried woman named Hepzibah Pyncheon, lives in the decaying house with her broken brother, Clifford, who has recently returned from serving a lengthy prison sentence for a murder he did not commit. To make ends meet and to preserve her financial independence from a greedy relative named Judge Jaffrey Pyncheon (the true but secret murderer), Hepzibah reluctantly opens a small shop in the house, where she is assisted by a cheerful young relative named Phoebe, whose romance with a man named Holgrave (a secret descendant of Matthew Maule) eventually helps lift the dark cloud that has hung over the occupants of the ill-fated House of the Seven Gables.

Although The House of the Seven Gables is commonly considered a novel, Hawthorne himself described it as a “romance” (see the previous essay on the “Preface”). A romance, in Hawthorne’s view, was less tightly tied to strict realism than a novel was; it could afford to be more symbolic, more allegorical, more speculative and philosophical, and more closely aligned with suggestive fantasy than with merely plausible or mundane “fact.” Hawthorne was generally less interested in depicting the external features of the familiar, everyday world than he was with delving into life’s deeper meanings—especially the moral meanings that lay beneath the surface of characters and events. This concern with ethical significance is especially obvious in The House of the Seven Gables, with its heavy preoccupation with matters of human sin. Not surprisingly, the book’s focus on sin—and particularly on pride, greed, and hypocrisy—naturally lends itself to a dark and gloomy tone and atmosphere, and those traits in turn help make this text a gothic work. Gothic fiction often centers around old, decaying houses or mansions, and it also often involves mysterious, gruesome deaths and other sorts of bizarre misfortune. Suspense, horror, and even elements of the supernatural often play a large role in gothic writing, which also often features lovely young heroines and grim, powerful, and threatening older men. Family curses, hidden sins, strange omens, and persistent, puzzling mysteries all often play additional roles in gothic texts, and all these features, taken together, help to make The House of the Seven Gables a classic example of the gothic genre. Hawthorne, however, is less interested in producing exciting melodrama than he is in exploring the moral significance of human behavior. His book rises above simple, obvious suspense through its reflective, philosophical tone and its broad range of ethical and social themes.

A concern with sin is one of the most obvious themes of this particular text, as it often is in Hawthorne’s fiction in general. Hawthorne believed that humans possess an innate capacity for evil, and in The House of the Seven Gables he shows how a sin committed in the distant past can reverberate for generations. Yet sin, in this book, is not an impulse humans simply cannot control; instead, it is a freely chosen act for which each sinner bears personal responsibility. Colonel Pyncheon is a sinner in his greed and deceitfulness, and so is his distant descendant, Judge Jaffrey Pyncheon, yet Jaffrey Pyncheon is hardly the victim of some sort of irresistible or inevitable genetic curse. Rather, he simply chooses to violate the laws of proper moral conduct in much the same way as his ancestor did. Thus, if various Pyncheons sin in ways that prove disturbing and destructive, it is not because they have no choice, but, on the contrary, because they repeatedly yield to the same corrupt temptations. If there is a “curse” on the Pyncheon family, it is a curse that some of them freely cooperate in perpetuating. Only when a Pyncheon deliberately chooses to sin does evil result—often for others, but also often for him. Thus, both the colonel and the judge are found suddenly dead just when they seem most powerful. The universe, in Hawthorne’s fiction, is ultimately a moral place in which few sins are unpunished long. Sin can be hidden or disguised for a time, but eventually its ugly consequences are felt—and often they are felt first and foremost by the sinners themselves.

This contrast between hidden sin and public reputation is, indeed, a central theme of Hawthorne’s book. In fact, The House of the Seven Gables is generally concerned, in numerous respects and on numerous levels, with the contrast between external appearances and inner reality, particularly in the way it presents the colonel and the judge. Both of these men enjoy great social status and a respectable reputation, yet each is morally corrupt, and each is guilty of conscious hypocrisy. The judge's attractive smile masks an inner evil that the virtuous Phoebe nevertheless instinctively intuits, and it is one of the many ironies of the book that this corrupt and hypocritical man is in an official position to sit in judgment of others. Yet this kind of contrast between external appearance and inner reality figures in the book in other ways, as well. Thus the elderly Hepzibah, despite a physically unattractive appearance (since her face is distorted by a permanent but involuntary scowl), is capable of appealing kindness, while Holgrave, the young man who lodges in Hepzibah's house, is finally revealed as a direct descendant of the very man—Matthew Maule—whose unjust death led to the “curse” on the Pyncheon family. Part of the whole purpose of Hawthorne's book is to encourage his readers to look beneath the surface of reality and to attempt, instead, to explore its inner depths; he tries to stimulate his audience, when reading the book, to exhibit the same kind of probing intelligence that led to the book's creation. Hawthorne is less interested in stirring up and satisfying superficial suspense than he is in provoking moral reflection.

To stress the moral dimensions of this book, however, is not to deny its social and political elements. Indeed, numerous commentators have read it as Hawthorne's meditation on the transition from an outmoded aristocratic culture (rooted in elitism, isolation, and feelings of smug superiority) to a newer kind of social arrangement—an arrangement grounded in the more democratic, more republican values he associated with the best revolutionary American ideals. According to this reading, most members of the Pyncheon family represent a kind of atrophying elitism that was becoming increasingly irrelevant in Hawthorne's day; Phoebe and Holgrave, by contrast, ultimately represent the less pretentious, humbler attitudes of a younger generation that was both more vibrant and more vital than the dying aristocracy of the decaying past. The death of the older-style Pyncheon family values therefore symbolizes (according to this reading) the passing of an often-regrettable era in American history, and Hawthorne's sympathies are wholly with the rise of the newer, more open, more generous, and more public-spirited attitudes he associates especially with the young and optimistic Phoebe. Even Hepzibah, by the end of the novel, seems to have left some of her old ways of thinking behind and has embraced a new attitude toward her place in her society. It is not surprising (according to this view) that at the end of the text most of the surviving characters abandon their ancient, ancestral home, since the history and values associated with that dilapidated house now seem increasingly irrelevant to the lives they plan to lead in the future. By the end of the book the central characters (especially Phoebe and Holgrave) move beyond the self-centeredness that had resulted either in death or in stunted, disappointed lives for so many persons earlier in the text. Hawthorne thus reveals his sympathies with a democratic future rather than with an arid, aristocratic past.

However one chooses to interpret the meanings of the book, its success as a work of art obviously depends on the skillfulness of its style, structure, techniques, and craftsmanship. The House of the Seven Gables would not be worth reading as a work of literature if it did not possess strengths in all these areas, and indeed commentators have praised the work for virtues in all the respects just mentioned. The book has been commended, for instance, for the ways it combines realism, poetic phrasing, and vivid depictions of life in a particular region (a kind of writing known as local color). In addition, the work has been admired for its ability to blend history and humor, lyricism and satire, as well as brooding terror with a touching story of developing young love. The characters have been acclaimed as memorable and diverse, and the book has also been applauded for its effective use of symbolism—especially symbolism involving the house, the garden, and even the family chickens, whose decrepit condition reflects the

2. Although Hawthorne was sometimes openly or implicitly critical of Puritanism, he often expresses a different attitude toward Christianity in general. In what ways can Hawthorne be called a “Christian writer”? How do his works illustrate common Christian values and precepts? Do his works ever conflict with those precepts?
3. Choose two short stories by Hawthorne and then compare and contrast those stories with one of his novels. How are all three works similar and/or different in such matters as themes, characterization, imagery, symbolism, dialogue, and diction? Are there any traits that all three works seem to share? In other words, are there any characteristics that seem relatively “typical” of Hawthorne?
4. Compare and contrast the relative effectiveness of two works by Hawthorne—preferably two works of the same genre (such as two stories or two novels). What specific factors, in your opinion, make one work more or less successful than the other as a work of literary art? Which of the two would you eagerly read again? Which of the two would you hesitate to recommend to a friend? Explain your responses in detail.
5. Discuss the theme of good and evil in several different works by Hawthorne. What motives, traits, or behavior, in Hawthorne’s view, seem to count as “evil”? What motives, traits, or conduct does he seem to consider “good”? Are distinctions between good and evil simple and clear-cut in Hawthorne’s fiction, or does he sometimes make it difficult for us to decide who is good and who is evil? Does he ever present characters who seem to embody both qualities at the same time? Support your arguments by providing detailed evidence.
6. Although humor is perhaps not as prominent a feature in the work of Hawthorne as it is (for instance) in the works of Herman Melville or MARK TWAIN (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), humor does sometimes play a role in Hawthorne’s writings. Discuss, for instance, the role of humor in “The Birth-mark,” or in “The Artist of the Beautiful,” or in “Rappaccini’s Daughter,” or in The House of the Seven Gables. What functions does humor serve in any one of these works? What similarities and/or differences exist in the kind of humor each work employs? Why do you think Hawthorne tends to use humor so sparingly?
7. Read the opening paragraph of “Rappaccini’s Daughter,” in which Hawthorne mockingly describes his own style of writing, and then discuss the ways in which his description might be applied to one or more of his works. To what degree, and in what respects, is the description an accurate assessment of the traits of Hawthorne’s fiction? Give specific examples from the work you choose. To what degree, and in what respects, does Hawthorne fail to do justice to his own accomplishments as a writer?
8. Read a few essays by Ralph Waldo Emerson, and then discuss the ways in which Hawthorne and Emerson seem similar or different. Which author seems more “optimistic” and which seems more “pessimistic”? How do these differences manifest themselves, and how do you account for them? How do Hawthorne’s main themes and concerns differ from those of Emerson? How do their styles differ? Do the characteristic thoughts of one writer appeal to you more than those of the other? If so, explain why.
9. The Scarlet Letter has been filmed a number of times. Compare and contrast at least two of the films with each other and with the novel itself. Which film does more justice to the book? What are the strengths or weaknesses of each film considered in and of itself? How, if at all, does each film reflect the particular period in which it was made?
10. Read a reliable biography of Hawthorne, and then discuss the ways in which his fiction seems to reflect aspects of his own life and character. How does knowledge of the writer’s life enhance or complicate the reading of his fiction? Is knowledge of an author’s life necessary to a proper appreciation of his writing? How, if at all, did your reading about Hawthorne's life alter your understanding of his creative writing?

WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS

(1837–1920)

But let fiction cease to lie about life; let it portray man and women as they are, actuated by the motives and the passions in the measure we all know; let it leave off painting dolls and working them by springs and wires; . . . let it not put on fine literary airs; let it speak the dialect, the language, that most Americans know—the language of unaffected people everywhere—and there can be no doubt of an unlimited future, not only of delightfulness but of usefulness, for it.

(Criticism and Fiction)

Although the reputation of William Dean Howells has suffered over the last 100 years, at the end of the 19th century he was the most powerful and prominent figure in the American literary establishment. He wrote more than 100 books, and his writings included plays, poems, short stories, travel literature, children's literature, memoirs, and more than 30 novels. As editor of the very influential Atlantic Monthly, and later a columnist for Harper's Monthly, he was in the position to make or break writers' careers by choosing works to publish and in reviewing books. Usually generous in his critical evaluations, he used this power primarily to forward careers; the beneficiaries of his influence constitute a who's who of late 19th-century American literature and include MARK TWAIN, (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), HENRY JAMES, BRET HARTE, EMILY DICKINSON, MARY ELEANOR WILKINS FREEMAN, SARAH ORNE JEWETT, Hamlin Garland, STEPHEN CRANE, CHARLES WADDELL CHESNUTT, Frank Norris, Edith Wharton, PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR, and Abraham Cahan. The visibility of most of these writers has eclipsed Howells's own, but an upward reevaluation of his work seems to be under way, especially by critics interested in the relation of literature to politics and society, one of his central concerns.

Howells was born in 1837 in Martinsville (now Martin's Ferry), Ohio, a small village not far from what at that time was the frontier; Howells ever after clung to a sense of himself as a "westerner." His father was a printer and editor, who repeatedly moved his family from town to town as he worked for or published various Ohio newspapers—newspapers that often advocated abolitionist, socialist, and reformist points of view. Never especially successful at these endeavors, he was barely able to support the family, which grew to include five boys and three girls. Starting at age nine, Howells worked for his father setting type in various newspaper print shops—rather than going to school. As a young man he began writing for his father's papers and for other journals, publishing poems, columns, reviews, stories, translations, and news reports. If, as Howells later wrote, his father did not characteristically think about "things that make for prosperity," he did educate Will in literature and publishing, as both vocation and business; he also imparted staunch antislavery views, a commitment to social justice, and a nascent faith in socialist principles.

After his poem "Andenken" was accepted for publication in the Atlantic Monthly in 1859, Howells took a chance and traveled to Boston, managing to obtain a meeting with James Russell Lowell, editor of the Atlantic, with whom he had corresponded about his poem. After that entry into the world of literary Boston, he met other figures of Boston's legendary literary elite—including James T. Fields, owner of the Atlantic, and Oliver Wendell Holmes, the well-known Harvard University physician and writer. He then traveled to Concord, Massachusetts, where he met NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, and HENRY DAVID THOREAU, and from there he made his way to New York, where he met WALT WHITMAN. Although these introductions did not have immediate effects on his plans to become a writer, the connections eventually helped further his career.

Back home in Ohio, Howells met and courted Elinor Mead, who would become his wife. And, asked to write a campaign biography of Abraham Lincoln, he dashed one off in a month. On the basis of this book, and in an attempt to secure some sort of stable livelihood, he petitioned the Lincoln administration for an appointment as a foreign consul and was awarded an appointment to Venice, where he arrived in December 1861. His loneliness there—he never quite gained entry to Venetian society—probably hastened his proposal of marriage to Elinor early in 1862; she crossed the Atlantic in late 1862, and they were married in Paris on December 24. They settled happily in Venice and grew to love the city. Their first child, Winifred, was born there in December 1863. They remained in Venice until August 1865—four months after Robert E. Lee surrendered at Appomattox; Howells had lived in Venice throughout the Civil War.

Venice transformed the Howells into cosmopolitans—and this made a return to provincial Ohio unattractive. So upon arriving back in the United States, they set up house in Boston. After a brief try as a staff member of the Boston Daily Advertiser, Howells again called on Lowell, Holmes, and Fields—hoping for help with employment, but not getting it. After some desperate searching, he broadened his job hunt to include New York, where he landed a job, in November 1865, with the Nation; for this literary magazine he wrote book reviews and a regular column. Impressed with this work, James Fields, in January 1866, offered Howells an assistant editorship at the Atlantic—which, after some misgivings, he took. The Howells moved to Cambridge and became ensconced in Boston's literary social elite, becoming friends with such people as Fields, Lowell, HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW, Charles Eliot Norton, HENRY JAMES and William James, HENRY ADAMS, and John Fiske. There followed a period of extraordinary literary productivity, during which the Howells family grew, too. John Mead Howells was born on August 14, 1868. Their third and last child, Mildred, was born September 26, 1872.

Howells had published a book of poems in 1859, without much success. But shortly after their move to Cambridge he published Venetian Life (1866), a book about Venice that he had worked on during his consulship; it became an immediate success. He followed it with Italian Journeys (1867) and then Suburban Sketches (1871), the latter about life in Cambridge. He was praised by critics for his capacity to describe common life and common things with insight—an evaluation that would become a hallmark of Howells's work. Common, here and almost always in Howells's work, meant life from a decidedly white, middle-class point of view; servants—Irish immigrants and African Americans—and poor people were treated as others. As Howells continued to write, however, the question of connection and sympathy across class and ethnic distinctions became a central and vexing concern.

During the time of his Atlantic editorship—as assistant editor from 1866 to 1871, then as editor from 1871 to 1881—he divided his time between his own writing and his work for the magazine. His first novel, Their Wedding Journey, came out in 1871. A story of the honeymoon trip of Basil and Isabel March—two characters with similarities to the Howellses who would reappear in later novels—the novel resembled his nonfiction writings through its emphasis on travel description, sketches of contemporary scenes, and details of marital life. Novels that followed also capitalized on his travel-writing successes, situating stories of courtship concerning young, middle-class American women within sketches of travel abroad: A Chance Acquaintance (1873) recounts a young woman's aborted romance during a trip to Canada; A Foregone Conclusion (1875), again about a young woman's romances, uses Italy as a backdrop; The Lady of Aroostook (1879) uses a trip to Venice as the context for the courtship and marriage of a Massachusetts schoolteacher. Intertwined with these novels about “average” Americans, Howells’s essay-length reviews for the Atlantic—themselves an innovation—promoted fictions of “humble” American life, stories that focused on characters rather than on intricate or outlandish plots, that advanced through plain-spoken dialogue rather than through a narrator’s intrusions, and that provided recognizably “real” and “unaffected” people and incidents. Although Howells’s developing conception of literary “realism” was certainly capacious, even incoherent according to some subsequent critics, his persistent terms of evaluation were “truth” rather than “artifice” and “every-day life” and fidelity to the probable over melodrama. As he said in reference to the work of his close, lifelong friend Mark Twain, “Let fiction cease to lie about life; let it portray men and women as they are. . . ; let it speak the dialect, the language, that most Americans know—the language of unaffected people everywhere—and we believe that even its masterpieces will find a response in all readers” (“The Truthfulness of Mark Twain’s Fiction,” in Selected Literary Criticism, Vol. 2, 1886–1897 49–50).

In 1881 Howells resigned his editorship at the Atlantic and devoted himself to writing—having secured, as a regular source of income, an agreement with the Century magazine for serial publication of his novels. Another very productive period followed, as he completed and published nine novels altogether in the 1880s, in addition to works for the stage (mainly farces but also lyrics for an operetta) and magazine writing. Among the novels was The Rise of Silas Lapham (1885), often considered his best novel and certainly the one most familiar to us. But also important were A Modern Instance (1882), which gained some scandalous notoriety because it dealt with a relationship that ends in divorce; Indian Summer (1886), focused on a romance between a middle-aged man and a young woman, Americans, again, in Italy; The Minister’s Charge (1887), about a Boston minister who meets a young, poor rural poet and encourages him to go to the city to pursue a writing career, then suffers guilt as the young man seemingly founders; Annie Kilburn (1888), about a woman who returns to her poor country town with the philanthropic aim of helping the local factory workers, whose misconceived efforts run aground; and A Hazard of New Fortunes (1889), which has the goings-on of a magazine at its center but builds drama through the conflict between the millionaire owner of the publication and a socialist staff member and ends with deaths during a violent strike of streetcar workers.

As these nutshell plot summaries might suggest, Howells became more and more concerned with class divisions in the United States, and his writing became more pointedly political. This was related to Howells’s reading, in the mid-1880s, of the works of Leo Tolstoy, whose literary realism Howells admired, and whose Christian socialism rekindled his own interest in social justice, the problems of class difference, and the economic exploitation of underpaid workers.

These concerns catapulted Howells into national controversy in 1887 through his writing about the so-called Haymarket Riot. During a labor-union strike in support of an eight-hour workday, when the police moved to disperse a meeting of strikers, a bomb was thrown into the police ranks. The police opened fire, at the end of which seven officers and four civilians lay dead and hundreds were wounded. Seven strikers were arrested, then prosecuted in a trial that Howells thought (and most historians agree) was an unjust railroading of the defendants that resulted in their deaths (four of them were eventually hanged). After the initial trial Howells wrote to the governor of Illinois asking clemency for the defendants, and after their appeal was rejected by the Supreme Court, he wrote letters to the New York Tribune protesting their unjust treatment. He was not joined by other members of the literary establishment, and in a social climate predominantly hostile to political radicalism, he endured sharp criticism for his stand. The experience left him feeling alienated from an American society he saw as propelled by unbridled capitalism and disregard for social injustice. While it would be wrong to characterize Howells as an out-and-out political radical—he called himself “a theoretical socialist and a practicing aristocrat”—his sense of class division, and the disparity between his own comfortable prosperity and the poverty he saw everywhere, colored his view of America for the rest of his life.

A number of his writings of the 1890s engaged other troublesome social issues. In The Quality of Mercy (1892), a businessman embezzles money and throws his company into default, then flees to Canada to avoid prosecution, setting up a situation for Howells's criticism of a "commercial civilization" that produces such failures of morality and character. The Coast of Bohemia (1893) raises the question of a woman's place in a male milieu—in this case, a female art student's struggles in the New York art world—and hints at a lesbian relationship. In An Imperative Duty (1893), a young woman who has been raised as white learns of her African-American ancestry, providing the occasion for Howells to think through the problems of segregation and miscegenation. And in A Traveler from Altruria (1894), Howells fantasizes a visitor from a utopian republic called Altruria, an egalitarian socialist society founded on the principle of altruism, who challenges the social beliefs and assumptions of a group of middle-class vacationers at a summer resort. As the decade closed, the Spanish-American War roused Howells's denunciation of American imperialism and his opposition to war in general; in the wake of this he wrote the often-anthologized story "Editha," about a young woman caught up in ideas promoting the glory and valor of war who sends her fiancé off to fight—and die—and whose illusions about war are countered by the more clear-eyed point of view of the soldier's mourning mother.

After his break from full-time magazine writing and editing, Howells returned to such work when he agreed to write the "Editor's Study" column for Harper's Monthly, which began in January 1886 and ran through March 1892. In 1889 he moved to New York and, in 1892, wrote briefly for Cosmopolitan, a magazine he was drawn to because of the socialist beliefs of its editor. Then in 1895 he began contributing a regular column called "Life and Letters" to Harper's Weekly, which he continued until 1898. Thereafter, for most of the rest of his life, Howells concentrated on his magazine writing, especially through return engagements at Harper's Weekly and Harper's Monthly. In this magazine writing Howells took up a range of topics, from literature and language; to art, architecture, and music; to politics and social problems. But perhaps his most influential literary criticism was written during the first Harper's Monthly period—a collection of which was published as Criticism and Fiction in 1891. In these pieces he developed his conceptions of literary realism as a kind of literature that should represent—and should be measured against—ordinary middle-class life; the people and the problems they deal with should be recognizable, and the ethical dilemmas they confront should be pictured in a way that illuminates the difficulties of moral reasoning. It is perhaps as a promoter and theorist of literary realism that he may be best remembered.

Howells's daughter Winifred had tragically died in 1889 after long struggles with illness and with 19th-century treatments for what doctors thought was a nervous disorder but that today sounds very much like anorexia nervosa. Howells's wife, Elinor, died in 1910. Howells himself died in his sleep on May 11, 1920. By this time younger writers, presenting themselves as rebels against the literary establishment that Howells represented, denigrated his writing as placid, tame, unexciting, prudish, quaint. But one wonders whether they truly read his books, which show us a writer who grappled with the compelling issues of his time and bring that time vividly to life for us.

The Rise of Silas Lapham* (1885)

Silas Lapham fits the profile of a self-made American businessman: He arose from humble roots in rural Vermont to become a successful, wealthy paint manufacturer. He moves his family to Boston, settling initially in the unfashionable South End, and starts to build a mansion on more fashionable Beacon Street. He wants his family—his wife, Persis, and their daughters, Penelope and Irene—to make their way into established, old-money Boston society. After the Lapham women meet the patrician Corey family during a vacation in Canada, a relationship develops between the two families, partly because the Coreys' son Tom is interested in a job with Lapham's paint company, and partly because the Laphams mistakenly think that Tom is interested in the beautiful Irene—though there really is a mutual attraction between Tom and the less attractive, older, but more intelligent and witty Penelope. Despite the Coreys' distaste for the socially inferior, uncultivated Laphams, they invite the Laphams to dinner after Tom takes a job with Lapham's paint company. Penelope refuses to attend, and Silas becomes drunk at the dinner and behaves boorishly. When Tom calls on the Laphams the next day, only Penelope is home, and he takes the occasion to declare his love; knowing of Irene's infatuation with Tom, Penelope tells him never to visit her again. Meanwhile, Silas encounters business problems, partly due to competition from a West Virginia paint company. To compound his troubles, he visits the Beacon Street house, which he cannot bear to sell, and leaves a fire burning in the fireplace; the house burns down, just when its insurance has expired. In the final financial twist, Lapham, feeling guilty over having edged his former partner out of their paint business, loans him money, accepting as collateral some property soon to suffer devaluation. Given the chance to sell this property before the devaluation at a large profit, Lapham wrestles all night over the ethics of the deal, misses the chance to sell, and is financially ruined. The family moves back to the Vermont farm. Tom Corey goes to work for the West Virginia paint company, which decides to send him to Mexico; he finally persuades Penelope to marry him, and they leave Boston, free of the social distinctions that had kept their families at odds.

The novel is set in a period—the 1870s—when the American economy was still primarily agrarian, and most Americans were accustomed to a small-town world, but when there was a steadily increasing migration to the cities. The Laphams are representative of this movement, and representative, too, of an anxiety that accompanied this movement—that the republican ideal of the honest, self-sufficient farm family, with felt obligations to known neighbors within the stable structure of the rural town, would be lost amid the anonymous, volatile, dog-eat-dog life of the city. The period was also one of change in American business, from an era dominated by small, family-operated concerns, when a single owner-manager, working perhaps with a few partners, made all the economic decisions, to an era in which transportation, mass production, and marketing enabled the creation of centralized, large-scale manufacturing, national markets, and giant corporations. Silas's career crystallizes these changes too, as he begins with a small, farm-based paint business and turns it into a paint-manufacturing empire. As he says, when he returned from the Civil War, "I found that I had got back to another world. The day of small things was past, and I don't suppose it will ever come again in this country." Silas, however, sustains elements of the older way: He retains personal control over all aspects of his business and cannot bear to have a partner, and unlike the emerging corporations that tapped capital by issuing shares of stock and limited investors' liability for debt, Silas derives his capital from personal savings and has unlimited liability for debts. It is arguably his adherence to these older ways—and finally to a business ethics rooted in personal responsibility—that causes his financial downfall and moral "rise."

The novel also focuses on the social tension between the old-money gentry of "Brahmin" Boston and nouveau riche families, like the Laphams, who seek entry into the higher levels of the urban social hierarchy. The Coreys represent a set of traditions, education and cultivation, and codes of etiquette that they feel are being assaulted by such vulgarians as the Laphams—and that they use to maintain their social distinction and superiority. Much is made of the Laphams' bad taste—in architecture, clothes, kinds of tea, literature, and so on—and of their bad manners, depicted most painfully at their dinner with the Coreys. At the same time, if the Coreys stand for elite social values that form a bulwark against the crude aggressiveness of a man like Silas, they also have a snobbism and, in the case of Bromfield, the father and idle aristocrat, an anemic and useless aestheticism that pales beside the simple and forthright ambition and practicality of Silas. Howells evinces an ambivalence about the contrasting values that the Coreys and the Laphams represent, while he scrutinizes their clash.

Finally, the plotline of the romance between Penelope and Tom—and the romantic disappointment of Irene—raises questions of femininity and its stereotypes at the same time that it offers a criticism of popular romantic literature and the unrealistic behavior it models. At the dinner at the Coreys' house, for instance, discussion turns to the popular novel Tears, Idle Tears, and one of the guests, the Reverend Mr. Sewell, denounces as “ruinous” and “noxious” such books “with old-fashioned heroes and heroines,” which put unrealistically disproportionate emphasis on the “whole business of love.” But the avid reader Penelope, who is not at the dinner, devours the book and appears to act according to its plot, in which the heroine self-sacrificingly gives up her true love to another who loved him first. If Howells sets up his love plot according to recognizably stereotypical conventions—with the beautiful, insipid, “light” Irene contrasted to the plucky, intelligent, “dark” Penelope, and with the weepy, “feminine” self-sacrifice of Penelope—the novel undoes the formula. When Silas and Persis consult Mr. Sewell about their daughters' dilemma, he articulates a pragmatic, antiromantic “economy of pain,” in which Penelope's self-sacrifice is wrong because it makes three people, rather than one, unhappy. And in the end the heartbreak that Irene suffers transforms her from a beautiful but empty feminine stereotype into a mature and complicated woman, while Penelope gives up her romanticized and self-idealized self-sacrifice. And thus Howells's novel pointedly strikes a “realistic” contrast to the romantic, sentimental, and melodramatic literature against which he persistently campaigned.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Think about various aspects of “realism” in the novel. For example: Realists stressed that stories should have actual and verifiable settings. How does Howells specifically locate his story? Are the characters in the novel realistic according to Howells's terms—that is, are they “mixtures of good and bad”? Do the lives and events in the novel seem “ordinary” and “probable”?
2. Look carefully at the discussion of Tears, Idle Tears. What points of view are aired about this popular fiction? Are there criticisms of the book that sound as if they were being made by Howells the realist? In what ways might Tears, Idle Tears pertain to the story of the lovers in Silas Lapham?
3. Critics have noted Howells's use of paint and architecture as metaphors in this novel. Collect the references to each. What meanings do they have?
4. It is usually said that Silas loses everything except his honor, that he finally attains a moral victory. Do you agree? If so, try to describe what is involved in his moral conflict and the nature of his moral victory. Also, try to trace the steps in his financial fall, noting its causes. How might his financial fall be related to his moral rise?
5. The theme of conflict between “old money” and newly rich people—and between the values each of these groups represents—is a key concern in The Rise of Silas Lapham and in Edith Wharton's The House of Mirth (1905) and Willa Cather's A Lost Lady (1923). Compare the ways these writers treat this theme, considering especially the similarities and differences in the values associated with the established rich and the parvenus.

“Editha” (1905)

When “Editha” was published in Harper's Monthly in January 1905, it appeared in the wake of the Spanish-American War, the four-month war that the United States waged against Spain in 1898, most of which took place near the Spanish colonial possessions of Cuba and the Philippines, and which Howells considered an imperialist adventure, an effort at territorial expansion of which the United States should be ashamed. The context for the story, however, is the war fever that possessed so many Americans on the eve of the war, and Howells's concern is with the way glorification of war operates—and exacts its costs—at the level of individual ethics by drawing people into its illusion and rendering them complicit with its wrongful tragedy. Editha Balcom is the focus of the story, a young woman who is caught up in notions of the glory and valor of war. She mouths the justifications for the Spanish-American War—that it is a war of liberation for people who have been struggling against colonial oppression, “a sacred war,” a war for “liberty, and humanity”—at the same time that she is conscious of “parroting the current phrases of the newspapers.” (And, indeed, American newspapers, especially those of William Randolph Hearst and Joseph Pulitzer, exuberantly promoted the war and enflamed fears of Spanish forces in the nearby Caribbean.) Editha urges—or rather, manipulates—her fiancé, George Gearson, to enlist, and thus to do the honorable manly thing and be a hero worthy of her love. Gearson, doubtful and hesitant, with an inclination to think all war “stupid,” nonetheless becomes drunk and signs up, then ships out—and is killed. Ready now to play the role of the bereaved lover, sentimentally laid low and sickened by the death of her noble hero, Editha visits George's mother, who rebukes her for sending George to war and bitterly thanks God that he was killed before he had a chance to kill the reluctant conscripts of the other side, “the sons of those miserable mothers and the husbands of those girls that you would never see the faces of.” Initially shocked, and “groveling in shame and self-pity,” Editha has a conversation with another woman, who extols the good the war has done for the country and calls the reaction of George's mother “vulgar”—drawing Editha out of her “darkness” and enabling her “to live again in the ideal.” A pointed antiwar story, “Editha” also exemplifies many of the features of Howellsian literary realism, as it contrasts illusory ideals to plainspoken realities, explores the particulars and nuances of self-deception, and places at its center the difficult dilemma of ethical choices colored and plagued by noxious cultural assumptions.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What does Editha do to try to make George think as she does about the war? What are the psychological subtleties of their conflict?
2. In what ways do ideals of femininity and masculinity enter into the story? In reference to war, what are the differences in feminine and masculine “ideals”?
3. Think about the ending of the story, and the declaration “The mystery that had bewildered her was solved by the word [that George's mother's attitude was “vulgar”]; and from that moment she rose from groveling in shame and self-pity, and began to live again in the ideal.” What are the various ways, here and throughout the story, in which Editha seems to deceive herself? What are the sources and causes of her self-deception? Does she ever have a moment of clear-sightedness?
4. Consider “Editha” in relation to Stephen Crane's The Red Badge of Courage (1894), thinking particularly about the ways in which Howells and Crane treat illusions about war and its realities, but also thinking about the complicated self-deceptions the main characters embody.

Criticism and Fiction (1891)

Criticism and Fiction is a collection of the influential literary criticism Howells wrote in his column “The Editor's Study” in Harper's Magazine from 1886 to 1890. It represents an important period in the development of his conception of literary realism. The basic tenets are all here—the importance he placed on fiction that represented everyday life in America, the ordinary speech of the people, the simple and average truths of human nature that we all recognize: “fidelity to experience and probability of motive” and the aim of “life-likeness” rather than “book-likeness,” that is, judging fiction by comparison to life and not by comparison to other literature. This realist agenda meant, for Howells, a move away from the adventure and romance and the “fantastic and monstrous and artificial things” that he thought characterized so many novels of the earlier 19th

2. At the beginning of The Rise of Silas Lapham, Silas is being interviewed by the journalist Bartley Hubbard. Derisive and condescending, Hubbard writes the interview in a way that makes fun of Silas but, as he says, not in a way “that he’ll ever find out.” Hubbard also reappears in A Modern Instance, where journalism is more fully treated as a dishonest and cynical profession. Compare the views of journalism in these two novels, then relate these views to Howells’s conceptions of truth and realism in literature.
3. The Reverend Sewell, who in The Rise of Silas Lapham explains his theory of “the economy of pain,” reappears two years later in The Minister’s Charge, where he explains his crucial theory of “complicity,” concerning the way in which people are socially interconnected and therefore bear responsibility for each other. Think about Sewell as a moral spokesman for Howells, and think about the relation between his ideas of “the economy of pain” and “complicity.”

HARRIET JACOBS

(HARRIET ANN JACOBS) (1813–1897)

I have promised to tell you the truth, and I will do it honestly, let it cost me what it may.

(Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl)

Harriet Jacobs's Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl was the first autobiography to be published by a formerly enslaved African-American woman. The stated purpose of the narrative was practical: Jacobs wanted to "arouse the women of the North to . . . the condition of two millions of women at the South, still in bondage, suffering what I suffered" (1). However, Incidents is far more than just a political statement. In order to describe the mental, as well as physical, struggles of her early life fully, Jacobs departs from the prescribed slave narrative formula by incorporating some techniques more commonly used for writing fiction. For this reason, Incidents has been embraced by modern scholars interested in the development of African-American fiction, particularly fiction by and about women. Although Incidents shares many characteristics with other antebellum slave narratives, its creative synthesis of narrative styles and forthright discussion of female sexuality sets it apart from any other narrative of that time.

Harriet Ann Jacobs was born in 1813 in the town of Edenton, North Carolina. Jacobs's mother, Delilah, belonged to Margaret Horniblow, the invalid daughter of the proprietors of Horniblow's Tavern in Edenton. Jacobs's father, Elijah Knox, was a talented carpenter who was allowed to hire himself out and earn money on his own as long as he paid a certain amount to his owner. This allowed him to live in town with his wife and children rather than on the plantation. Harriet tells us that she and her brother, John, enjoyed the unusual privilege of living in a "comfortable home" with both of their parents (5). This family circle was broken in 1819 when Jacobs's mother died. Delilah's mistress promised that she would care for the children. She taught Jacobs to sew and, more importantly, to read and write. However, at her own death in 1825 she did not free either child. Instead, she willed Harriet to her three-year-old niece, Mary Matilda Norcom, while John went to her mother. That same year, their father was recalled to his owner's plantation. He died a year later, having never realized his dream of purchasing his own freedom and that of his children.

After the death of her parents, the most important person in Jacobs's life was her grandmother, Molly. Although she was a slave, Molly was greatly respected by many of Edenton's influential white citizens and was able to run a successful baking business in her spare time. After her mistress died, Molly used her savings, and the legal aid of some of the town's white inhabitants, to purchase herself and her son, Mark. Molly's home was to become Jacobs's refuge from the increasingly intolerable conditions she encountered in her life as a slave in the Norcom house. Her grandmother's characteristic strength and dedication to her family would be an inspiration to Jacobs for the rest of her life.

Although Jacobs had been willed to Mary Matilda Norcom, she was actually under the control of the three-year-old's father, Dr. James Norcom. Historical documents testify to Dr. Norcom's love of power and control; his treatment of his family as well as his slaves could be hard and unforgiving (Yellin 23). His wife, Maria Norcom, was a difficult and demanding mistress. When Jacobs was 15, Dr. Norcom began sexually harassing her, demanding that she become his concubine. Jacobs refused his advances, but Norcom continued to pressure her. In 1829, faced with Norcom's increasing harassment and her mistress's violent jealousy, Jacobs made a difficult decision. In order to avoid her master's sexual persecution and to assert her own control over her life, Jacobs accepted the advances of another white man, Samuel Tredwell Sawyer. Jacobs describes Sawyer, a young lawyer, as "kind," and she firmly believed that he would, given the opportunity, purchase her and any children she might have (54–55). When Norcom discovered that she was pregnant by another white man, he flew into a passion and Mrs. Norcom ordered her not to return to the house. Jacobs moved in with her grandmother and there gave birth to her son, named Joseph. She continued her liaison with Sawyer and in 1833 had another child, a daughter she named Louisa Matilda. Both Sawyer and Jacobs's grandmother made attempts to purchase her and the children, but the doctor refused to sell them.

Norcom continued to harass Jacobs throughout this period and often became violent. Finally, in 1835, Norcom gave Jacobs an ultimatum. She could either yield to his demands and become his concubine or be sent to his plantation to be "broken in." Jacobs chose to leave her children with her grandmother in town and go to the plantation. She worked there until June 1835, when she heard that Norcom planned to send her children out to the plantation. Jacobs had often had reason to rejoice that her family lived in town, where fear of public opinion and her grandmother's friendliness with influential whites had restrained Norcom's violence. In her narrative she writes that if she had grown up "on a remote plantation, or lost among the multitude of a crowded city, I should not be a living woman at this day" (35). Afraid of what would happen to her and her children once away from the supportive town community, Jacobs made a second difficult decision. On Sunday night, June 28, Jacobs ran away. Friends, both black and white, hid her during the first weeks after her escape. Finding that there was no safe way to send Jacobs north, her family contrived a more permanent hiding place in the attic of her grandmother's house. The space was tiny: nine feet long and seven feet wide, and only three feet tall at the tallest point. The only light and fresh air she had were through a hole that was barely an inch square, and she had to remain silent in order to escape detection. Jacobs's only comfort was that she had guessed correctly: Norcom had lost interest in the children after her disappearance and had finally sold Joseph, Louisa, and Harriet's brother, John, to a speculator who was acting for Sawyer and Molly.

Jacobs spent almost seven years in that small attic, which she dubbed her "loophole of retreat," crawling around the floor for exercise, suffering extremes of heat and cold, and listening to her children grow up in the house below. Norcom became convinced that she had escaped north and traveled to New York twice in search of her. He also regretted his hasty decision to sell John and the children. John had escaped from Sawyer two years previously, during a trip to New York, but the children were still living with their great-grandmother. Norcom claimed that, since the children had belonged to his daughter rather than him, their sale was illegal and they still belonged to her. In light of this, Jacobs agreed to let Sawyer send Louisa to New York to live with his cousins in Brooklyn, although she was uneasy because he did not legally free Louisa first.

Finally, Jacobs's family found an opportunity to smuggle her out of Edenton and send her north. In June 1842, Jacobs escaped by boat to Philadelphia, and from there she made her way to New York City. There she was reunited with Louisa, who was acting as a servant for Sawyer's cousins rather than being given the schooling she was promised. Jacobs wished to take her away to a home of her own, but economic circumstances forced her to leave Louisa where she was and go to work. Jacobs found employment as a nursemaid in the family of Nathaniel Parker Willis, a well-known writer and editor. Willis had proslavery tendencies, but his British wife, Mary Stace Willis, was firmly opposed to the institution. When Jacobs discovered that Norcom was searching for her in New York, she confided in Mrs. Willis, who encouraged Jacobs to take Louisa and flee the city. John, who had just returned from a whaling voyage, escorted them to Boston. There Jacobs sent for her son, Joseph. They settled in Boston for a year, but then Jacobs received the news that Mrs. Willis had died and Mr. Willis wanted Jacobs to take charge of the baby during a planned trip to England. Jacobs left her children with her brother in Boston and accompanied Mr. Willis and the baby, Imogen, to England, where she enjoyed comparative freedom from persecution and color prejudice. Once she returned to Boston, Jacobs received harassing notes from the Norcom family, insisting that she return to slavery.

In 1849 Jacobs sent Louisa to boarding school and went to Rochester to join her brother, now a prominent abolitionist, who wanted to open an antislavery reading room in the city. While she was in Rochester, Jacobs met Amy Post, an abolitionist who would become a very close and dear friend. The reading room did not prosper, so Jacobs returned to the Willis family to look after the baby of the second Mrs. Willis, Cornelia Grinnell Willis. In 1850 the Fugitive Slave Law, was passed, which made it legal for a slave owner to go north to the "Free States" and recapture any escaped slave. Jacobs's son and brother both left Massachusetts for California to participate in the Gold Rush and to escape recapture. From California they went on to the Australian gold rush. Disappointed at his luck, John left to become a sailor. Joseph remained there, but eventually disappeared and was presumed dead. Jacobs continued to work for the Willis family but had to flee the city in 1851, and again in 1852, with the aid of her employer, Mrs. Willis. After the second episode, Cornelia Grinnell Willis insisted on buying Jacobs's freedom so that she would be spared any more persecution. By then old Dr. Norcom was dead and Jacobs's young mistress was happy to sell her missing slave. Jacobs was finally free, but she was never able to reunite with the members of her family in Edenton. Her grandmother died in 1853, without having seen either her grandchildren or great-grandchildren after their escape from the South.

After achieving her freedom, Jacobs continued to work for the Willis family, but she maintained her connections with the abolitionists she had met, particularly Amy Post, to whom she wrote often. It was Amy Post's suggestion that Jacobs publish her autobiography in order to help the antislavery cause. After some hesitation, Jacobs agreed. Uncertain of her own literary powers, her first thought was that she might commission HARRIET BEECHER STOWE to write the story for her. However, Stowe refused to deal directly with Jacobs (writing instead to her employer, Mrs. Willis) and seemed uninterested in the story except as it might add to her soon-to-be published Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin. Jacobs, irritated and hurt by Stowe's patronizing attitude, refused to have her story co-opted as part of another project and determined to write it herself. In 1853 she published her first writing, three anonymous letters published in the New York Tribune regarding the terrible conditions of slavery, and she started her autobiography.

Finding time to put her story on paper was difficult. In March 1854 Jacobs wrote to Post that she had begun writing but that "as [of] yet I have not written a single page by daylight"; the demands of her job meant that she had "but a little time to think or write" (Yellin 129). Writing at night and in odd moments during the day, Jacobs finally finished her manuscript in 1858. She tried unsuccessfully to sell it in England and in Boston before finding the firm Thayer and Eldridge, who agreed to print it if she could persuade LYDIA MARIA CHILD, a famed white abolitionist, to supply a preface. Jacobs met Child through her abolitionist connections, and Child agreed to act as general editor and supply the preface. Although she did alter the manuscript, she writes in her introduction to the text that it was "mainly for purposes of condensation and arrangement" (3). The publishing firm became bankrupt in 1861, but Jacobs managed to raise enough money to pay to have her book printed. That same year her brother John, who had moved to England and married an English woman, published his own narrative, "A True Tale of Slavery," in the Leisure Hour, a British periodical. In 1862 a British edition of Harriet's narrative was published under the title The Deeper Wrong.

Jacobs spent the years of the Civil War working for relief agencies among the former slaves who were refugees in Washington, D.C., and Alexandria, Virginia. Louisa joined her in 1864, and together they opened the Jacobs School in Alexandria to teach the newly freed people. During her time in Alexandria, Jacobs sent letters and reports to her friends and contacts in the North, many of which were published in the Freedman's Record, the Liberator, and other antislavery publications. After the war ended, Harriet and Louisa went south to Savannah to aid in relief efforts, but they returned north in 1866, feeling anxious about the future of their people because of racist violence and governmental policies that blocked the freed people's access to land, education, and enfranchisement. In one letter that Jacobs wrote from Savannah to the Freedman's Record about the state of affairs there, she closes by noting ominously, "We shall be badly off when the military protection is withdrawn" ("From Savannah").

Back in the North, Harriet and Louisa became interested in the American Association for Equal Rights, but they soon became disgusted by the racism of white feminists, particularly their verbal attacks on black men. In 1868 Harriet and Louisa went to England to raise money for an orphanage and old-age home for the freed people, to be built in Savannah, but the conditions in the South were so bad that the money they raised could not be put to its intended use. After this disappointment, Jacobs gave up her active relief work and settled down to run a boardinghouse in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Harriet's brother John returned from England in 1873, but he died shortly thereafter. Four years later Harriet and Louisa moved to Washington, D.C., where many of their activist friends had settled. Harriet again opened a boardinghouse, while Louisa tried to find work as a teacher or government worker. In 1892 Jacobs sold her grandmother's house in Edenton, which she had inherited. She had only returned to the town twice after the war and had decided that she could not resettle there. Jacobs's health was failing, and Louisa became her mother's full-time nurse. On March 7, 1897, Harriet Jacobs died in Washington, D.C. She is buried in Mount Auburn Cemetery, Cambridge, Massachusetts, beside her brother John. Louisa lived until 1917 and is also buried at Mount Auburn.

Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl* (1861)

In her autobiography Jacobs tells the story of her life, beginning with her childhood and ending with the purchase of her freedom by Cornelia Grinnell Willis. Although she is telling a true story, Jacobs chose to substitute pseudonyms for the real names of all of the characters in her narrative and leave the places in the South unnamed because, as she said, "I deemed it kind and considerate towards others to pursue this course" (1). Jacobs also chose to publish the book anonymously, so that the only name appearing on the title page was that of her editor, the prominent abolitionist Lydia Maria Child. These choices, combined with the almost-incredible events of Jacobs's life, led many early scholars and historians to believe that Incidents was a work of fiction invented by Child and should be classed with other fictionalized slave narratives, such as Richard Hildreth's The Slave: or Memoirs of Archy Moore (1836) and Martha Griffith Browne's Autobiography of a Female Slave (1857). According to the historian John Blassingame, Incidents was "too orderly" and "melodramatic" to be an authentic narrative (373). However, extensive research by scholars, most especially Jean Fagan Yellin, has uncovered and verified the identities of most of the characters and places in Jacobs's narrative, and Incidents has since taken its rightful place as one of the most important antebellum slave narratives in existence today.

Using the name Linda Brent, Jacobs opens her autobiography with the classic phrase "I was born a slave," but she follows up this declaration with the description of her happy childhood home, where she was cared for by protective and loving parents. This opening sets up a theme that Jacobs will carry throughout her narrative, which is the systematic destruction (or attempted destruction) of families by slavery. By placing the family at the center of her narrative, Jacobs is tapping into an important cultural ideal of 19th-century America. During that period most social structures were built around the idea of the patriarchal family, with father, mother, and children each playing a specific role in the functioning family unit. Supporters of slavery even tried to cast the institution as offering slaves a stable and supportive family environment. For this reason, as Donald Gibson writes, “the analogy-to-family argument became one of the chief and most frequently employed to justify slavery,” and the supposedly paternalistic nature of the institution was one of the falsehoods that antislavery activists worked hardest to eliminate (Gibson 158). Jacobs engages with this debate from the beginning of her narrative by contrasting her loving family home with the harsh realities of the auction block, where enslaved families are broken up and individuals sold to the highest bidder. In a dramatic scene, Jacobs describes how Dr. Norcom attempts to sell her grandmother although it was widely believed in town that she had been freed in her mistress’s will. His plan fails, and from that point on, Jacobs’s grandmother becomes a dominant symbol of family values and respectability in the narrative. Molly spends the rest of her life struggling against the slave system to create security and legal freedom for her remaining family members in Edenton, such as Harriet and her children, but she is constantly thwarted by the callous and vindictive Dr. Norcom. The enforced fragmentation of Molly and Harriet’s close-knit family due to their owners’ abuse, debt, and death is meant to make the reader vividly aware of the unnatural and antifamilial nature of the institution of slavery.

Jacobs’s narrative also reflects the ongoing debate over the role of the church, another important cultural institution, in a society that supports slavery. During the antebellum period, churches were deeply divided over the question of slavery, some members embracing it as a biblical institution and others claiming that it was completely antithetical to the teachings of Christianity. Speaking from her own experience, Jacobs focuses her discussion around the hypocrisy of slaveholders who also claim to be Christians. “There is a great difference between Christianity and religion at the south,” she writes. “If a man goes to the communion table, and pays money into the treasury of the church, no matter if it be the price of blood, he is called religious” (74). By setting up this distinction between “Christianity” and “religion,” Jacobs is able to contrast the whole-hearted piety of the African-American community and its religious traditions with the half-hearted efforts of the white community. Among them is her first mistress, who taught her to read the Bible but then failed to acknowledge her as a free soul. Looking back on that period, Jacobs wryly notes, “I was her slave, and I suppose she did not recognize me as her neighbor” (8). Jacobs uses these moments in her text to encourage her readers to think more deeply about the nature of Christianity aside from the trappings that surrounded the practice of religion. Although she clearly has strong religious feelings, most of Jacobs’s spiritual experiences are centered on her private reading of the Bible rather than its presentation by white ministers of the established church.

In her story, Jacobs does not just comment on the religious hypocrisy of white people in her community but also makes the Bible a point of literal contention in her narrative, dramatizing its contradictory position in the slavery debate. In a chapter entitled “The Church and Slavery” she describes how, the day after he became a confirmed member of the Episcopal Church, Dr. Norcom attempted to combine allusions to the New Testament text “Servants obey your masters” with the idea of Old Testament concubinage to convince Jacobs that giving in to his sexual demands was a Christian act. When she answers that “the Bible didn’t say so” (presumably referring to the commandment “Thou shalt not commit adultery”), Norcom responds, “How dare you preach to me about your infernal Bible!”

(75). Although this exchange centers on the specific topic of adultery, it acts overall to destabilize the Bible as a uniform source of truth, particularly as the self-serving interpretations of biased slaveholders are contrasted with the spiritual empowerment African Americans gain from reading and interpreting Scripture for themselves.

Harriet Jacobs's familiarity with the Bible, which gives her the authority to "preach" to Norcom, is just one of the many examples of the power of literacy in her narrative. For many slaves the ability to read meant unprecedented access to religious and political knowledge, and it is often credited by them as the first step toward freedom. For this reason, the governments of most slave states discouraged owners from teaching slaves to read and write, and some even made doing so illegal. In Incidents Jacobs recognizes the central importance of literacy in her own struggle for freedom. Her ability to read not only gave her a sense of personal independence, but also allowed her to engage with and resist her master on the level of language. At one point she mentions that "he knew that I could write, though he had failed to make me read his letters; and he was now troubled lest I should exchange letters with another man" (40). Once she goes into hiding, Jacobs uses her ability to write to lead Norcom on a wild goose chase by sending him letters postmarked and written as though she were in New York City. These letters represent a new form of active resistance to slavery that extends beyond the physical confrontations more often described in slave narratives.

This strategic use of literacy in Jacobs's narrative highlights the importance of writing by African Americans, be it newspaper articles, autobiographies, or speeches, in the fight for abolition. By taking up the pen, Jacobs and others like her insisted that they not only have the opportunity to share their stories, but to write them themselves, thereby taking an active, rather than passive, role in their fight for equal rights. Jacobs's fight to determine the shape of her own life did not end with her escape from slavery but extended into her decision to publish her story. After rejecting Stowe's offer to publish bits of it in her Key, Jacobs set herself to the task of improving her writing style and crafting her story. The anonymous letters she wrote to the Tribune can be seen as exercises in storytelling, as Jacobs experimented with the most effective way to tell the story of her own life and the lives of those around her.

This is not to say that Jacobs was able to publish the book entirely on her own. As were other writers of slave narratives, Jacobs was informed that her work could only be published if it were accompanied by an introduction by a famous white abolitionist. However, letters written by Jacobs and her white editor, Lydia Maria Child, have given us insight into the extent of Child's influence on the finished product. According to a letter of August 1860, Child's input was limited to "transposing sentences and pages, so as to bring the story into continuous order, and the remarks into appropriate places." The language, Child wrote, was "wonderfully good" and needed almost no alteration (266). We can tell from these letters that the unique aspects of Incidents can be attributed to Jacobs herself. With its publication, the book signified Jacobs's literary and verbal triumph over both Dr. Norcom and the well-meaning but patronizing abolitionists like Stowe who would deny her the power to narrate and control her story and her life.

Jacobs's success in writing and publishing her own book with only minimal editorial alteration becomes even more significant in light of the central conflict of her story. Sexual abuse was not a topic that was commonly discussed in slave narratives. Some narrators, such as FREDERICK DOUGLASS, alluded to it, and melodramatic tales of miscegenation and beautiful, tragic slave women were not uncommon, but no narrative had ever explored from a factual point of view the complex pressures and choices that made up the life of the sexually abused slave woman. The closest attempt was Louisa Picquet, the Octoroon, a narrative based on a series of interviews the editor, the Reverend Hiram Mattison, had with Louisa Picquet about her life as a young slave, who was almost raped by her master and then sold into concubinage around the age of 14 or 15. Published in the same year as Incidents, the narrative of Louisa Picquet forms an interesting contrast to the story Jacobs tells. Mattison's prying and almost pornographic interest in the details of Picquet's physical and sexual abuse dominates the text and allows the reader only glimpses of Picquet's own feelings and thoughts about her situation. By writing her own story, Jacobs avoided that kind of editorial control and was able to produce a much more thoughtful and balanced view of the physical and psychological aspects of the experiences that she shared with so many other enslaved women.

Jacobs knew from the beginning that the sexual aspects of her narrative, which she had previously only dared to confide to her friend Amy Post, could potentially cause female readers to shun her book as too improper for public consumption. In order to combat that kind of reception, Jacobs carefully adopted some language and conventions from the sentimental novels of seduction and resistance that were popular female reading at the time. Nevertheless, as Frances Smith Foster points out, "Hers was not a tale of a naïve or headstrong maiden who falls victim to the wiles of an unscrupulous man, then dies" (103). Instead, Jacobs carefully portrays her unwilling initiation into "the evil ways of the world" and her spirited attempts to retain her purity in the face of Norcom's harassment (54). Rather than being the melodramatic story of a sexual victim, Jacobs's account of her affair with Sawyer is filled with images of reasoned intelligence and self-control. Feeling herself to be out of other options, Jacobs began the affair with the younger, kinder, and, she hoped, more impressionable man after making a "deliberate calculation" about its possible consequences for her and any children she might have. Her pragmatic approach to the affair is paired with a sense of limited spiritual liberation. She claims, "There is something akin to freedom in having a lover who has no control over you, except that which he gains by kindness and attachment" (54–55). Although at the time she felt a sense of humiliation and shame at the path that she chose, Jacobs refuses to reject her decision or acknowledge it as a permanent fall. Instead, she presents it to the reader as a successful evasive action taken by a desperate woman, redirecting the guilt to the institution of slavery, which condones the sexual exploitation of African-American women.

By doing so, Jacobs redefines purity as something that is dependent on social circumstances, not solely on a woman's character. White women, she explains, can rely on family, community, and the law to help them resist attacks on their chastity (54). As her master, Norcom is given the legal right to isolate Jacobs and remove or negate all of these potential external sources of strength. After describing all of these circumstances, Jacobs feels justified in stating, "I feel that the slave woman ought not to be judged by the same standards as others" (56). This statement, made during a period when African-American women were almost always portrayed as somehow falling short of a universal moral standard, stakes out a new territory for them to occupy. Jacobs backs up her claims for her own respectability and that of other women in her situation by repeatedly portraying women like her grandmother, who were "neither ladies nor broken blossoms" (Yellin 25). Rather than fall into the binary either/or depiction of women so popular at that time, Jacobs carves out a third space for herself and other African-American women who were deprived of the protection of law and custom in America.

When Jacobs describes her sexual experiences, she highlights the color line: White women are afforded protection that women of color are not. However, when she describes her experiences as a mother, she builds a bridge across the color divide. She intends her narrative to be a special plea for "the thousands . . . of Slave Mothers that are still in bondage . . . [and] their helpless Children" ("Harriet Jacobs to Amy Post" 264). It is her role as a mother that she stresses throughout most of her narrative, and as she describes incidents involving her children, she often invites the mothers who might be reading her story to imagine themselves in her shoes.

Even though she is much more conventional in her representations of motherhood than of womanhood, Jacobs does not accept the passivity that is often linked to the character of the “good mother” or the “true woman.” Her grandmother, Molly, a single mother of five and caretaker of her grand- and great-grandchildren, is an important symbol of womanhood and motherhood in the text. However, her brand of maternal devotion is not the one finally embraced by Jacobs. When Jacobs talks of running away from Norcom, Molly states her opinion that temporary abandonment of one’s children, even if it is for their own later good, is an unforgivable breach of motherly responsibilities (Foreman 88). Nevertheless, when Jacobs decides to run away, she characterizes that decision as an extreme act of mothering, since it is meant to distract Norcom from his plans for her children and focus his attention on finding her. She tells her readers that “it was more for my helpless children than for myself that I longed for freedom” (89). This active, rather than passive, construction of motherhood allows Jacobs to fulfill her own goals as well as her goals for her children. It also links her with the northern women she had met, like Amy Post, who were both activists and mothers.

Although Jacobs clearly makes an effort to bridge the color line in her narrative, she does so in a way that resists the objectification or marginalization of African-American people, and especially African-American women. Their self-respect, she insists, is just as important to them as their physical freedom. As Frederick Douglass in his Narrative or Harriet Wilson in Our Nig does, Jacobs argues that racism in the North is as much a problem as slavery is in the South. The ending of her narrative reflects her unease with northern race relations by breaking the behavioral patterns her readers would have been expected to follow. She stresses her departure from the sentimental novel by stating, “Reader, my story ends with freedom; not in the usual way, with marriage.” However, she insists that for a former slave, even freedom is a qualified blessing in a state overshadowed by the Fugitive Slave Law. She is also not willing to pretend that simple physical freedom is her ultimate goal. She wants “a home of [her] own” around which to gather her scattered children (201). The domestic nature of this wish fits with the motherly character she has given herself throughout the book. However, it signifies more than just her own personal desire. By drawing attention to her unfulfilled version of the American dream, she gestures to the broader economic and social barriers that stood between all free African Americans and their ultimate goals.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the traditional roles women were expected to fill in 19th-century America. How does Jacobs seem to accept or resist these roles? What different kinds of female behavior does Jacobs model in her narrative? According to Jacobs, what is the definition of “true womanhood”?
2. White women played an important part in the abolitionist movement. What role do they play in Jacobs’s narrative? How does she portray the relationships between white and African-American women?
3. Examine the ways male and female characters are depicted in the narrative. Construct an argument in which you make the case that Jacobs gives priority to females over males because she is appealing primarily to a female audience. Then decide whether or not you think she is justified in doing so.
4. What kinds of appeals does Jacobs use to construct her argument against slavery? Why did she choose them?
5. Look at the way Eliza Harris’s story concludes in the final pages Uncle Tom’s Cabin and contrast it with the way Linda Brent’s story ends in Incidents. How do the differences in these endings serve differing authorial purposes?

“A True Tale of Slavery” (by John S. Jacobs) (1861)

This narrative was written by Harriet Jacobs’s activist brother, John S. Jacobs. In many ways, John’s narrative is a more typical example of a slave narrative than that of his sister. This difference is primarily due to gender. As do the other male slave narrators before him, such as William Wells Brown or Frederick Douglass, John “sounds the notes of anger, militancy, and humor that the 19th century assigned to men” (“Through Her Brother’s Eyes” 48). The more feminine gender conventions of melodrama, sentiment, and confessional are as irrelevant to his narrative as they were important to his sister’s. For this reason, John’s narrative, although it covers much of the same territory as his sister’s, provides a different perspective on her life and experiences and highlights ways that differences in gender and audience can affect the way a story is told.

Whereas Harriet’s narrative was explicitly directed at sympathetic women of the American North, John’s narrative was written for a British audience that would have included adults and children of both genders. The Leisure Hour, the periodical that published “A True Tale of Slavery,” claimed on its masthead to be “a family journal of instruction and recreation.” The contents of the paper ranged from the adventures of a family of pioneers in Canada, to rags-to-riches stories, to essays on natural science. Elements of John’s narrative make it clear that he was thinking about the paper’s focus as he was writing. While he primarily narrates his physical journey from slavery to freedom, he also stresses his mental journey from ignorance to knowledge. Once he has reached the free states, he informs the reader that he “soon began to feel my responsibility, and the necessity of mental improvement” (220–221). Resolved to be a useful member of society and an aid to his family, he decides to educate himself while on a whaling voyage. He succeeds by making “the best possible use of [his] leisure hours on board” (221). In this way, he sets himself up as a model to his readers, not only as an escaped slave but also as a self-made man.

The overall structure and style of John’s narrative reflect the expectations of the serial-reading audience as well. His narration is pragmatic and episodic, rather than emotional, reflective, and novelistic as his sister’s is. His focus is on the physical drama of capture and escape and the material injustice of the slavery system, rather than the emotional and spiritual conflict that drives Harriet’s text. The scene when Dr. Norcom tries to sell their grandmother makes a good point of comparison. Harriet stresses the affective side of the scene, describing her grandmother’s pride, Norcom’s shame, and the dignity of the elderly woman who purchases her. John, on the other hand, focuses on the practical side, such as the way his grandmother saved the money that was to free her and enlisted white townspeople to help her manage the business. Like John, Molly is meant to represent a model of practical self-improvement under adverse circumstances to which readers, male and female, can relate.

Gender is the other main influence on John’s narrative. As an enslaved man, he approaches his life and experiences from a different angle than Harriet does hers. An example of this can be seen in the different ways that they describe their parents in their texts. Harriet’s memories of her father are fond, and she credits him with instilling a sense of freedom within his children, despite the fact that he could not give them freedom itself. However, her true point of connection throughout most of the narrative is with the memory of her mother. John, on the other hand, has “a slight recollection” of his mother but identifies very strongly with his father. “To be a man, and not to be a man,” John writes, “—a father without authority—a husband and no protector—is the darkest of fates” (207). John credits his hatred of slavery and determination to escape almost entirely to his father’s teaching, whereas Harriet describes a variety of inspirational figures, male and female.

John’s characterization of himself and others also follows the model of other male slave narratives. As does William Wells Brown, John portrays himself as a reformed trickster, who only acted dishonestly in order to escape the unjust violence of slavery. Subterfuge, John insists, was necessary if he hoped to escape bondage, and “Unpleasant as it was thus to act, yet, under the circumstances in which I was placed, I feel that I have done no wrong in so doing” (215). However, his humorous depictions of pulling the wool over his master’s eyes reflect a less contrite emotion. He clearly revels in the kind of verbal trickery that enabled him to get the better of his master, and his tone is more often triumphant than humble.

This characterization extends to Harriet as well. In her narrative, she describes her decision to run

HENRY JAMES (1843–1916)

I have an inalienable mistrust of the great ones of the earth and a thorough disbelief in any security with people who have no imagination.

(quoted in Edel, Henry James: A Life 179)

At first glance, the fiction of Henry James appears to be about people at the center of high society. On closer examination, many of James's characters struggle to enter high society from less fortunate backgrounds. Some do enter the privileged social center, while others remain marginalized. James's own life appears privileged from the outside, but examined closely, he, as his characters, wandered between the social center and its margins. James lived among people who possessed great wealth, held positions of power and influence, married, and had families—all hallmarks of success in mainstream Western society. James himself never married and never had a family; he always worried about money, he held no positions of authority, and his writing never achieved popular success equal to the writing of his peers.

Fortunately for his fiction, these experiences instilled in James a sense of difference and complexity, viewing high society as he did from both within and without. He appreciated in a way few male writers of his or any time did the lives of women and could write about them in a style that still wins critical acclaim even from feminists. But he could also write about men who do not participate in the social center, who do not themselves marry or have families, or who are afflicted with physical abnormalities that prevent them from living out the expected life of a male.

Henry James, Jr., was born in New York City on April 15, 1843, the son of Henry James and Mary Robertson Walsh. James was raised in a home where money was not a concern. James's father had inherited a fortune of several million dollars, and so work for him could be more of a diversion than a necessity. Henry, Sr., spent much of his life experimenting with different religious experiences, abandoning the strict Calvinism of his father and finally settling on the teaching of Emanuel Swedenborg. Rather than promoting a particular religious dogma, James's father invited open discussion and debate on a wide variety of issues. He also allowed his children to decide whether or not to attend church. Henry, Jr., would later lament that he wished for more direction from his father, but the result was that James grew up free to experiment with ideas and ways of living. He was not trapped in a particular mode of thought but could observe styles of life different from his own and appreciate them for what they were. This gift of appreciation for people and experiences other than one's own would become a significant theme in his fiction.

Henry, Jr., had an older brother, William, who would achieve greatness as a psychologist and philosopher. Henry idolized his older brother, who epitomized for him the successful American male. More than one biographer has argued that Henry was taught from an early age to be submissive, while William favored an active role. Henry tried to match William's achievements in grade school and later at the university, but was often left feeling inadequate. In retrospect, Henry described his mimicking of William as picking up the "crumbs" of his brother's "feast" and listening to the "echoes" of his accomplishments (qtd. in Edel 18). William remained in America, close to home, choosing a life in the rugged mountains of New Hampshire. He enjoyed the comforts of a wife and several children, in addition to considerable fame and wealth during his lifetime as a philosopher and psychologist. Compounding Henry's sense of inadequacy, William offered biting criticism of Henry's written work. William clearly enjoyed his position as adviser and severe critic of his younger sibling, simultaneously placing high expectations on Henry and reminding him of his inferiority.

Meanwhile, James had been observing as his father, Henry, Sr., a man secure in his position in society, tried for years to recover from a severe emotional crisis that occurred when the younger Henry was only a year old. The source of his father's crisis was not external but internal. Henry James, Sr., called his crisis a "vastation" and described the experience as follows: "The thing had not lasted ten seconds before I felt myself a wreck; that is, reduced from a state of firm, vigorous, joyful manhood to one of helpless infancy" (qtd. in Edel 7). As in Robert Frost's poem "Desert Places," James learned firsthand as a boy that the things that terrorize one the most are rooted in the mind. A person can feel on top of the world one moment and crash into despair the next. This sense of precariousness would haunt the younger James, who later in life experienced something akin to what his father had, in the form of a nervous breakdown.

When James was less than one year old, his family moved to Europe, living in London and then Paris for nearly two years. Then again in his early teens, James accompanied his family to London and Switzerland, living in Europe for about three years. James was deeply affected by what he saw and experienced; the greenery of England, the lights of Paris, the majesty of the Alps, all provided scenery that would color nearly all of his fiction. Unfortunately while in Europe the young Henry took ill, suffering from one of several illnesses that would afflict him throughout his life. Unlike his brother, William, who was robust and active, Henry led a life of relative physical incapacity, suffering at various times from typhus, gout, shingles, constipation, nervousness, and depression.

James would return with his family to Europe and then alone as an adult, determining in his late twenties to reside there permanently. Once again James assumed a position more at the margin than at the center. As an expatriate, he joined an elite group of people who had left their native land, in some cases never to return. This status worked to great advantage artistically, for James acquired a unique vantage point, allowing him to view American culture from a distance and at the same time experience in depth the much older culture of Europe. He could write with facility about either Europe or America and work literary wonders when mixing the two cultures together, as he did to great effect in much of his fiction.

While James admired America for its energy and innocence, for himself he chose Europe for its lack of innocence. Europe provided an escape from the confines of a still Puritanical America. As Leon Edel, James's great biographer, wrote, James decided that America "could not offer him the sense of freedom he had won for himself abroad" (Edel 537). At some level James shared a prevailing prejudice held by American elites, especially expatriates, that Americans lacked any measurable culture when compared with Europeans. Europe offered the American expatriate of James's day supreme freedom; one could lose one's self in the vast history of Europe, whereas America's relatively shallow history could imprison a person. In Europe the expatriate American male could roam wherever he wished in a sea of visual, physical, and emotional delights.

What really piqued James's curiosity, and what would be reflected in his writing, were people like him, American expatriates. These were the people he knew who would fill his fiction: beautiful young women who went to Europe with their families and in the process fell in love with European men.

Or handsome American men who fell in love with wealthy European women, some of whom were royalty. In many cases, the American would be wealthier than the European suitor, giving to the relationship newly won American dollars to replace the fading fortunes of old-money European families. American expatriates fell in love with Europe and European ways or were terrified by the tremendous difference, but in either case were forced to confront it. On the other side, Europe was fascinated by Americans, with their energy and vitality and above all their innocence.

At the time of the Civil War, while living in New York City, James suffered another bout with ill health, this time in the form of a physical wound. In helping to fight a fire, he injured himself. The details of the injury are notoriously vague, leaving biographers scrambling to determine its true nature. The intentional vagueness of the injury reveals much about James. He created an identity that revolved around the wound. James had, after all, wanted to fight in the Civil War, but his father had discouraged him from military service. The wound, however slight, allowed him to identify at least in his imagination with the men who did participate in the war. The wound seals his identity as a person of marginal health and illustrates the use he made of his imagination in his life as well as in his fiction.

James never married, though he fell in love with one woman, oddly enough, after her death. His cousin Minny Temple suffered from a severe lung disorder, and during James's visits to Europe, they would correspond with each other, he from Europe, she from her sickbed in the United States. He felt deeply saddened when she died at the age of 24 and wrote in a letter to his mother shortly thereafter, "It comes home to me with irresistible power, the sense of how much I knew her and how much I loved her. It is no surprise to me to find that I felt for her an affection as deep as the foundation of my being, for I always knew it." He also wrote, "Twenty years hence we shall be living with your love and longing with your eagerness and suffering with your patience" (qtd. in Edel 109–110). James's biographer Leon Edel interprets this letter as evidence that Minny and in fact most women posed a threat to James in life but in death could be worshipped as "an idea, a thought, a bright flame of memory" (109). He was a young man and Minny a young woman when she died, and the intensity of emotion he felt for her increased after her death and would remain with him throughout his life.

He developed strong emotional ties to several women in his adult life, but as at least two biographers, Leon Edel and Fred Kaplan, have noted, these women functioned for him much as they would in his fiction, as confidantes, people in whom he could confide. These women friends affirmed his sense of himself. Some offered deep affection and admiration, others simply listened, and others entertained him. Some may have anticipated romance where none could be found. His confidantes included Grace Norton, with whom he enjoyed vivid correspondence; Isabella Gardner, who shared James's passion for the fine arts; Fanny Kemble, a source for his novel Washington Square; and Edith Wharton, a writer of considerable fame and fortune and the beloved companion of James's later life.

Another friend, Constance Fenimore Woolson, the grandniece of the American adventure novelist James Fenimore Cooper, offers a particularly interesting glimpse into James's relations with women. Woolson sought out the company of James for his knowledge of Europe, and moreover his brilliance as a writer, as she herself had ambitions to become a writer. This relationship epitomized James's relations with women. He basked in their admiration but could not return even a hint of romantic inclination. The friendship with Woolson continued for over a decade, until Woolson began to expect more attention than James could give. This strained their relationship; then, some years later, tragedy struck in the form of her apparent suicide. While suffering from influenza, Woolson threw herself from a second-story window in Italy. This tragedy affected James for years after as a painful reminder of expectations he could never fulfill.

In some ways, James preferred the company of men. He was deeply fond of his brilliant older brother, William, and in later life James surrounded himself with men his own age and also some much younger. At least one of these men fell in love with James, but out of respect for social mores, James felt unable to return the young man's love physically. Looking over the span of James's life, it was in his elder years, from about age 60 on, that James felt comfortable enough with his feelings to allow himself to enjoy the company of these male friends. From that time forward, James acted more honestly, even courageously for his day. He allowed himself to find comfort in a community that society would not recognize—a community of bachelor men in England who surrounded him with love and affection. These men, young and old, provided for him a sense of domesticity. One friend, Howard Sturgis, could embroider and knit with skill: "He would sit with his thick golden hair beautifully brushed, his small feet daintily crossed, . . . working on some large golden-threaded design" (Edel 576–577). With men such as Sturgis, James discovered a form of home life that he had heretofore lacked.

He sought respectability through most of his life, though less so in later years. He held that one's perception in the community as upstanding and well mannered was one of the greatest virtues. Respectability was important in itself because it meant one respected social mores on which the fabric of society depends. This may be why he has the reputation of being a bit of a prude. What went on behind closed doors was not of concern to James, but what went on in public should be discreet, exhibiting good taste. Manners meant the world to him. He understood their value in the high society he enjoyed in life, the same society he preferred to write about in his fiction. But James also saw respectability as useful, as social capital. As James was not particularly wealthy, his good manners assisted him in circulating in a society that would otherwise have been forbidden to him. His infinite respectability also allowed him to go to the aid of people who had forsaken social mores in divorce or adultery. James could vouch for their good character because of his own good name.

As much as James sought respectability, he never yearned for power. He feared the "great ones" of the earth. Theodora Bosanquet, his secretary, said that of all the people she knew, James was the least tyrannical. He went out of his way not to assert his authority over other people. He would, if asked, give his advice, but he would never coerce or even cajole. It was not his way. He held tyranny to be one of the greatest sins of humankind, as people exert their force over someone else simply because they can. His books are filled with characters who act without tyranny. In fact, their great struggle is to avoid becoming pawns of other people, to say in effect, "I will not let you do this to me." James was this kind of person himself, not coercing others, but also wary of people who do impose their will on others.

James never realized financial success from his literary work. He once wrote that in business matters he felt "like an old maid against the wall on her lonely bench." He always felt inadequate when he compared himself with his social peers. James knew from his youth financial dependency, first on his parents and then, embarrassingly, on his older brother, William. James's sense of financial crisis reached a fevered pitch when he decided to purchase a residence called Lamb House in a remote coastal region of England. His brother, who handled all James's financial affairs, condemned the purchase as extravagant. In one of his few assertive acts against William's will, he purchased the house anyway. His comments at the time tell much about his sense of financial precariousness when he compared himself to his literary peers: "My whole being cries out loud for something I can call my own . . . when I look round me at the splendour of so many of the 'literary' fry" (qtd. in Edel 499).

One of these "literary fry," his good friend Edith Wharton, profited enormously from her literary work. Whereas James sold some 404 copies of The Ambassadors in the United States and England, Wharton's The House of Mirth sold more than 100,000 copies, earning its author some $20,000 in 1905 dollars and becoming a best seller. In a humorous anecdote, James purportedly said that with the proceeds of another of Wharton's books she had purchased a new Packard automobile, while with the proceeds of his The Wings of the Dove he had “purchased a small go-cart, or handbarrow, on which my guest’s luggage is wheeled from the station to my house.” He continued, “It needs a coat of paint. With the proceeds of my next novel I shall I have it painted” (Seymour 237).

James attained critical but not popular success. Even his greatest achievements in the eyes of critics never became best sellers. James’s failure to achieve popular success triggered his depression. An emotional low point occurred for him with the critical and popular failure of his one attempt at playwriting, Guy Domville. On opening night James did not attend his own play but instead attended a production of Oscar Wilde’s critical and popular success An Ideal Husband. He witnessed the enthusiastic response of the audience to Wilde’s play, and then heard that his own play, Guy Domville, had been booed out of the theater. Apparently when the last light of the play went out and the line “I’m the last, my lord, of the Domvilles!” was delivered, someone in the audience jeered, “It’s a bloody good thing y’are” (qtd. in Edel 420). James subsequently descended into what he called some of “the most horrible hours of my life” (qtd. in Edel 425).

He would on one other occasion experience such emotional lows, with the publication of the New York edition of his novels. These beautifully bound editions, complete with prefaces written by the author, failed to achieve any measure of popular readership, after which Edith Wharton recalls finding James a broken man. “I could hardly believe it was the same James” as he “cried out to me his fear, his despair, his craving for the cessation of consciousness, & all his unspeakable loneliness & need of comfort, & inability to be comforted” (qtd. in Seymour 123). James had experienced a nervous breakdown.

His writing of fiction continued up until the end of his life, long after he developed a pain in his right wrist that prevented him from writing. The typewriter became widespread by the 1880s, and in early 1896 James engaged a stenographer, William MacAlpine, who soon started taking dictation on the typewriter. James wrote to his friend Morton Fullerton about his fascination with composing fiction and correspondence with the typewriter: “I can address you only through an embroidered veil of sound. The sound is that of the admirable and expensive machine that I have just purchased for the purpose of bridging our silences” (qtd. in Edel 456). Arguably his greatest novels were written in this period of dictation. James ultimately could not create without the soothing sound of the typewriter keys. Some people criticized James for relying on dictation through a scribe and typewriter. Without a doubt, James’s fiction became even more circuitous, more labyrinthine, even more identifiably Jamesian, through dictation. As Leon Edel has noted, dictation permitted “verbal music,” greater use of colloquialism, and further elaboration of metaphor (Edel 456). These years resulted in works of astonishing sophistication: What Maisie Knew, The Turn of the Screw, The Ambassadors, Wings of the Dove, and The Golden Bowl.

In his last years, James anguished over the reluctance of the United States to enter World War I. His anguish translated into a desire to change his citizenship from American to British. In an unpopular move, James became a British citizen a few months prior to his death. He died in Great Britain in 1916.

Daisy Miller* (1878)

Daisy Miller tells the story of a young American woman abroad in Europe for the first time. A member of a family of recently acquired wealth (“new money”), she fails to conform to the standards of decorum set by the American expatriate society in which she finds herself.

James published the story Daisy Miller in 1878 to an appreciative audience. The story appeared first in magazines and then as a separate pamphlet that sold 20,000 copies. This after the publisher James first approached rejected it as an “outrage on American womanhood.” It turned out to be “the most prosperous child” of James’s works (Edel 216). It has become one of James's most famous works of short fiction, widely anthologized and frequently read by high school and college students. The story appeared in 1974 as a mildly successful film starring Cybill Shepherd.

Daisy Miller illustrates James's interest in the contrast between the innocence of America and the worldliness of Europe. It is important to note, however, that unlike most of his "international" works, such as The American and Portrait of a Lady, this story does not offer so much a contrast between Europeans and Americans as between "old money" American expatriates in Europe and those of "new money." James lets us know that Daisy Miller has new money, not only by what she does, but equally by the way her mother and younger brother behave. Her brother Randolph says to Winterbourne, "My father's in Schenectady. He's got a big business. My father's rich, you bet" (James, Daisy Miller 275). Meanwhile, Daisy's mother shows appropriate concern for Daisy's health due to her going out in the evening but fails to see as Winterbourne does the social sin Daisy has committed in being seen in the company of an Italian man of lower social rank. Mrs. Miller also betrays her new money status in her conversation. Her speech is coarse, as in "I ain't used to going round alone" and "They've got going at the piano; it seems as if they couldn't leave off" (307).

Daisy herself betrays her new money roots in a more appealing way, interpreted first by Winterbourne as "innocence." He is attracted to her energy and vitality, and it does not hurt that she is physically beautiful, graceful, and well dressed. Somehow the coarseness of her mother and outbursts of her younger brother are tempered in Daisy.

Nonetheless, Daisy fails to conform to social norms, and this raises key questions in the story. For example, does Daisy fail to conform because she will not or because she cannot? Her language and behavior throughout suggest a flaunting of convention, as when she accuses Winterbourne of being stiff and then will not let him stand in the way of her meeting Giovanelli alone. She also openly flouts convention when she refuses to enter the carriage with Mrs. Walker. So, on the one hand, Daisy chooses to disobey social mandates.

Yet the question remains as to whether Daisy could ever escape her commonness. Even with the best behavior, Daisy would still be from new money and thus be labeled common. Winterbourne's aunt uniformly dismisses Daisy and her family: "They are hopelessly vulgar. Whether or not being hopelessly vulgar is being 'bad' is a question for the metaphysicians. They are bad enough to dislike, at any rate; and for this short life that is quite enough" (294). Well into the story, Winterbourne himself is swept away by the idea that there may be some fundamental ill breeding in Daisy's background, something that she cannot escape. He goes "back to the question whether this was in fact a nice girl. Would a nice girl—even allowing for her being a little American flirt—make a rendezvous with a presumably low-lived foreigner?" (301). And later, "he asked himself whether Daisy's defiance came from the consciousness of innocence or from her being, essentially, a young person of the reckless class" (314). Daisy may be incapable of conforming to society, and her own realization of this could then invite her frustration and open flouting of convention. Her mother and younger brother, her father's new money, her roots in Schenectady—all indelibly stamp her as socially deficient.

But the story is not only Daisy's. It examines the value and morals of a society that rejects someone on the basis of standards that deny personal freedom and honest expression. Daisy's freshness and vitality—the very traits Winterbourne initially admires—would need to die before Daisy would find acceptance by the group. Of course, the nature of any group is that it demands a degree of conformity among its members. James in his own life accepted this fully, understanding that high society and fine conversation ride on the wings of exclusivity.

Nonetheless, the story turns a critical gaze on Winterbourne and his society. Mrs. Costello suggests to Winterbourne that his living in Europe for so long has made him lose his sense about American women. Oddly she uses the word innocent to describe his situation. "You have lived too long out of the country. You will be sure to make some great mistake. You are too innocent" (282). This statement will haunt Winterbourne later on, when he considers, in an often-quoted line, "I have lived too long in foreign parts" (321). His statement resonates with a meaning far different from that intended by his aunt. His statement evokes not innocence, but the loss of innocence, of freshness, of vitality. The death of Daisy symbolizes for him another death, the death of his "American" self.

Here James weighs in not only on the social differences that distinguish one society from another, but also on the moral differences. Winterbourne succeeds in high society in a rarefied expatriate Europe where Daisy fails—mortally so. But in a moment of dramatic irony, when the moonlight falls on Daisy and Giovanelli in the Roman Coliseum, the light also illuminates Winterbourne: "It was as if a sudden illumination had been flashed upon the ambiguity of Daisy's behavior. . . . He stood there looking at her—looking at her companion, and not reflecting that though he saw them vaguely, he himself must have been more brightly visible" (317–318). Symbolically James has placed Winterbourne under the microscope. The reader is asked to assess Winterbourne, to question his seeming impregnability. From the viewpoint of his aunt and Mrs. Walker, Winterbourne is a great success. For the reader, his momentary reflection on living too long in Europe should be a point for prolonged meditation.

That Winterbourne is the one watching Daisy, much as we are watching Winterbourne, deserves some attention, for it represents a technique common in James's work. James skillfully lets us see his protagonists through someone else's eyes, such that the perspective becomes as interesting as the protagonist. In this case, Daisy is the apparent protagonist. The reader watches her precipitous decline, but that decline is all through the eyes of the only character whose thoughts the reader can access directly, Winterbourne. Never once is the reader privy to Daisy's thoughts. This limited omniscience characterizes James's work. Unlike other works of his day, in which the reader enjoyed access to multiple characters' thoughts, roaming as freely as the mind of God, James sought a psychological realism where access could be had only through a single perspective. This is not true for all of James's work, but it is characteristic of some of his best work. The effect is startling, for the reader struggles to apprehend the "truth" of the story, only to realize that the truth must be pieced together through one's imagination and critical acumen. In this story, the narrator is reliable only insofar as one can account for his character and experience. In the telling of the story Winterbourne brings with him all the advantages and liabilities that a man of position and respectability can, no more, no less. He is not to be dismissed because of his privilege, but that needs to be acknowledged as he describes a young woman in a completely different station whose thoughts he can but imagine. In the end the story is Winterbourne's, a story he creates and one that reflects on him.

To heighten the contrast between the story's two main characters, James chose contrasting names. The name Daisy evokes springtime, youth, vitality, and above all innocence. Winterbourne evokes the end of the year and dying—age, loss of vitality, wisdom, and loss of innocence. The names perfectly describe each character. Whereas Daisy enters high society full of energy and vitality, Winterbourne looks upon life with a jaundiced gaze. Much as Winterbourne might like to help Daisy, the bridge he cannot cross to meet her is precisely that of his awareness of societal demands and ultimately his respect for them. He is like an old man, "stiff," as Daisy calls him. He cannot loosen up, because his long residence in Europe has predisposed him to respect a strict social code, one that has rewarded him with a position of considerable respect and privilege.

Gender widens the gulf between Winterbourne and Daisy. As a wealthy male of good breeding, Winterbourne comes and goes as he pleases. As much as the story describes the wide gulf that separates old money and new, good breeding and “commonness,” so it illustrates the difference between a man in high society and a woman. No one questions Winterbourne’s passing from one romantic conquest to the next, or his being seen in mixed company or walking around at night free of social obligation. The onus is on Daisy to conform. She is considered coarse and common and even vulgar because she goes out at night and chooses the company of an Italian lawyer rather than that of a count or marquis. Daisy resists the confines of her allotted station. It is her resistance to these gender confines that sets her apart from the other female characters in the story. Whereas Mrs. Costello and Mrs. Walker express horror at her walking about town at all hours, she finds it comical. Her resistance is demonstrated in her refusal to enter Mrs. Walker’s carriage. Mrs. Walker is described in terms that suggest her ultimate submission to feminine decorum: a “lady, smiling sweetly” with “devoutly clasped” hands (303). When Daisy refuses to enter Mrs. Walker’s carriage, she is also refusing the feminine decorum on which Mrs. Walker insists.

Daisy expresses her ultimate refusal to adhere to gender norms when she prevents Winterbourne from interfering with her friendship with Giovanelli. She says, “I have never allowed a gentleman to dictate to me, or to interfere with anything I do” (300). This refusal goes right to the heart of the situation, for women in this society generally did submit to the whims of men very much like Winterbourne, men who could enjoy romantic encounters and nights out on the town and walk alone through the streets of Geneva and Rome with little consequence. For a woman, each of these situations spelled death to her reputation, symbolized in Daisy’s physical death after wandering through the Coliseum against the advice of society.

At the story’s conclusion, a theme is touched upon that is developed more fully in others of James’s works: that new American wealth seeks out European sophistication, while European sophistication and depleted wealth seek American money in any form available. Giovanelli remains in the shadows of this story, an undeveloped character. He speaks but a few lines. This, after all, is Winterbourne’s story, and Giovanelli cannot play a significant role in a story where he is hardly recognized as human, let alone an equal. Giovanelli, however, sees the whole situation with startling clarity. He exemplifies the wise European of James’s stories as he sees Daisy first of all as a possible source of wealth through marriage, but then becomes quickly disillusioned. After Daisy’s death, the “subtle Roman” says to Winterbourne, “If she had lived, I should have got nothing. She would never have married me, I am sure” (321). In this moment we see a typical situation in James’s fiction, when a European of relatively modest means seeks out an American fortune, unconcerned about the history of the finances, so long as they are intact.

Giovanelli, as the one who knows, augments James’s contrast of American innocence and European sophistication. But Giovanelli’s knowledge does not prevent him from grieving over Daisy’s death. “Giovanelli was very pale; on this occasion he had no flower in his button-hole. . . . At last he said, ‘She was the most beautiful young lady I ever saw, and the most amiable. . . . And she was the most innocent’” (321). His emotional response rings truer to the situation than Winterbourne’s. His honest emotion is one more reminder that Winterbourne has indeed lived too long in foreign parts. James’s story speaks to a specific combination of foreignness and privilege that robbed Winterbourne of the freshness and spontaneity Daisy struggled to maintain.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Find another story or novel by Henry James with an American in Europe as the main character. How does the protagonist in that story negotiate Europe similarly or differently than Daisy? Consider factors such as manners, class, wealth, speech, and gender.
2. Some critics contend that today’s readers cannot relate to James’s stories of manners and high society of the Victorian era. What about this story seems to you to be dated? How so? What about this story remains relevant even today?
3. To what extent do you find Daisy to be a sympathetic character, that is, a character who deserves our liking and sympathy? To what extent is Winterbourne? Are there any clues that suggest who has the sympathy of the narrator (the I mentioned at the beginning of the story).

The Portrait of a Lady* (1881)

The Portrait of a Lady is James's best-known novel; as does Daisy Miller, it tells the story of a young American woman abroad in Europe for the first time. Unlike Daisy, the protagonist of this novel, Isabel Archer, demonstrates courage and determination in the company of people far more sophisticated than she who would use her for the considerable fortunes she has inherited from her father and her uncle. Isabel exhibits great powers of imagination, typical of James's heroes, as she discovers and begins fully to comprehend the true nature of people she once considered to be her friends.

This novel explores as fully as any of James's works the paradoxical nature of great wealth. As the possessor of considerable fortune, Isabel is liberated from the need to be married and therefore not bound by one of the prevailing social forces that served to constrict female freedom. Whereas in Victorian Europe and America most women had to choose between marriage and the convent (the convent does appear, after all, in the novel, in the subplot about Isabel's stepdaughter, Pansy), Isabel is independently wealthy and so is free to remain single if she so desires. She remarks, "I don't see what harm there is in my wishing not to tie myself. I don't want to begin my life by marrying. There are other things a woman can do" (James, Portrait of a Lady 139). She has the confidence to go it alone, in part, because she trusts her own intelligence: "I don't need the aid of a clever man to teach me how to live" (146). She also has emotional support, on the one hand, from her close friend, Henrietta Stackpole, who has herself chosen not to marry. She also has a friend in Ralph Touchett, who does not push her into marriage, as he enjoys seeing her exercise her freedom. He says to her, "I shall have the entertainment of seeing what a young lady does who won't marry Lord Warburton" (138). Ralph is the agent of her freedom in persuading her uncle, Mr. Touchett, to give a sizable portion of his fortune to her. Isabel herself acknowledges the great freedom that money has given her.

But money is also the source of Isabel's greatest sorrow. She wants to share her great wealth with Gilbert Osmond in an attempt to help him realize his dreams as a fledgling artist. In a typical James scenario, the wealthy American Isabel Archer shares her fortune with the more "European" Osmond by marrying him. The marriage changes everything, as Isabel realizes that part of Osmond's dream is his wish to control her completely. Money has given to Isabel not only freedom, but marital obligations with grave consequences.

James takes the question of money and intertwines it inextricably with another important theme in the novel, the question of gender. Can a woman be as free as a man in a society such as the one portrayed by James? Isabel pushes the envelope, for James adorns her with every advantage to see how far her freedom can take her. In addition to great wealth, Isabel possesses high intelligence and a vivid imagination. "It was because she felt too wide awake, and wished to check the sense of seeing too many things at once. Her imagination was by habit ridiculously active; if the door were not opened to it, it jumped out of the window" (30). She also possesses an intact ego that bristles when people take advantage of her. Indeed, critics have praised James for creating in Isabel one of the most complex female characters in American fiction. (She remains popular even with feminist critics, for she exhibits not only great virtues but egotism to a fault.)

But is Isabel really a liberated woman? The novel has been criticized for allowing Isabel to remain in an unhappy marriage. But James makes the point that Isabel chooses to do so, at least in her own mind. First of all, she takes complete credit for marrying Osmond, against the advice of Ralph: "It was impossible to pretend that she had not acted with her eyes open; if ever a girl was a free agent, she had been . . . the sole source of her mistake had been within herself. There had been no plot, no snare; she had looked, and considered, and chosen" (374).

Now that she finds herself unhappily married, no one expects her to remain with her husband. The countess, Osmond's sister, begs her to be "wicked" for once, to act selfishly and desert her husband (504). And yet Isabel stays. One could say that Isabel is a victim of social norms insofar as she cannot see an honorable way out of her marriage. Isabel believes that "when a woman had made such a mistake, there was only one way to repair it—to accept it. One folly was enough, especially when it was to last forever; a second one would not much set it off" (374). In stubborn insistence, Isabel remains in an unhappy condition of her own volition. James pushes the freedom of a woman to its extremes, at least for Victorian times.

The theme of personal freedom pervades the novel. Ralph Touchett suffers from a terminal disease and so feels he would rather leave his inheritance to someone who is free to enjoy it. Ralph then in his own estimation is not free to live a normal life, so instead he vicariously enjoys watching the freedom of Isabel, a freedom he has helped to create by passing his fortune along to her.

Madame Merle is no freer than Ralph. She has disobeyed the social code by having an affair that produced a child, Pansy. Much like Ralph, she is unable to enjoy personal freedom, and so she focuses on finding a fortune for her daughter, Pansy. Unlike Ralph, however, Madame Merle works from a position of economic powerlessness. She is unmarried with a checkered past and without a fortune. If she succeeds on behalf of Pansy, it is only because of her wits. She must outwit Isabel. Both characters have the good fortune of a vivid imagination and a powerful mind, but Isabel, working from a position of relative freedom and power and, one might say, the goodness to match, soundly defeats Madame Merle. One cannot in the end separate Isabel's goodness from her freedom to choose, or Madame Merle's sinister qualities from her sense of entrapment.

Gilbert Osmond is like none of the other characters in terms of freedom. He does not bear the cross of gender or of physical disability but instead wills a life of idleness in the form of a failed artist. James portrays in Osmond the incarnation of the decadent American expatriate, corrupted by Europe.

Osmond contains the impulse to artistic expression, however flawed, but more so a refinement of taste that is matched only by his need to control Isabel. Osmond desires to surround himself with European history, avoiding whatever is modern, industrious, and, in his view, barbaric. After living in Europe for more than 20 years, he has developed a "great dread of vulgarity," "like a prince who has abdicated in a fit of magnanimity, and has been in a state of disgust ever since" (230). As a darker version of Winterbourne in Daisy Miller, Osmond has nearly erased his American identity.

The greatest tension in the novel is between Osmond's Europeanness and Isabel's Americanness. These words describe the essence of the struggle: "Her notion of the aristocratic life was simply the union of great knowledge with great liberty; the knowledge would give one a sense of duty, and the liberty the sense of enjoyment. But for Osmond it was altogether a thing of forms, a conscious, calculated attitude. He was fond of the old, the consecrated, and transmitted" (397). The "European" Osmond yearns for control. The American Isabel flies the flag of liberty coupled with a profound and even troubling sense of moral duty that some readers may question. Whether or not she should stay with Osmond is open for debate, but the choice is one she makes freely, out of a sense of duty and a profound sense of pride and self-respect. She says to Henrietta Stackpole, "One must accept one's deeds" (450). Isabel continues to the last in possession of a goodness that James saves for the Americans of his stories.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Edith Wharton's novel The Age of Innocence deals extensively with the theme of social codes. How does Isabel Archer's adherence to social codes in Portrait compare with that of key characters in the Wharton novel?
2. What is the point of view used in this novel? From whose perspectives are we allowed to view the action? How does this viewpoint contribute to the effectiveness of the novel?
3. Compare the characters Henrietta Stackpole and Isabel Archer. How does each function as a representative of the liberated woman?

4. Do you think Isabel made the right choice in staying with Gilbert Osmond? Why or why not?

“The Lesson of the Master” (1892)

This tale of Henry James’s maturing phase exemplifies James’s interest in the relationship of life to art. The story could well be called “The Lessons of the Master,” for the protagonist, Paul, is to learn several lessons before the tale’s conclusion. As in the story “The Real Thing,” but here with much higher stakes, James asks his protagonist (and the reader) to choose between the world of the imagination and the “real thing.”

The life of the artist, according to St. George, the “Master” in the story, depends entirely on one’s maintaining independence from relationships that would restrict the imagination. St. George encourages Paul to maintain his independence in order to maximize his artistic potential, possibly producing a work of “perfection” (James, “The Lesson of the Master” 592).

In direct opposition to the strenuous dedication to art that he recommends for Paul is the life St. George has actually created for himself. Replete with spouse, family, wealth, and popularity, St. George’s lifestyle appears to embrace the very material comforts that he urges Paul to avoid. In front of Paul, St. George condemns this life harshly. He argues that his life has destroyed his ability to create art. He points to the study that his wife has commissioned for him: “a room without windows.” “Isn’t it a big cage, to go round and round? . . . My wife invented it and she locks me up here every morning” (583). This image suggests a life of constricted vision and thus limited creativity. By this means, St. George presents Paul with what amounts to an either/or proposition. He argues that for truly great art, one must forgo a spouse and family, offering his own career as evidence of this. Paul finds it impossible to disagree, for in his estimation, too, St. George has not realized his full potential.

Curiously St. George does not practice what he preaches. He implores Paul, “Don’t become in your old age what I am in mine—the depressing, the deplorable illustration of the worship of false gods!” (566). Yet when his wife dies, he marries again and abandons writing entirely. He pushes the entire artistic burden off onto Paul.

To complicate matters further, it is impossible to forget the all-too-real encounter Paul has with the young woman Marian Fancourt at her home. The conversation he has with her there offers a rare glimpse at a nearly perfectly matched couple. The story leaves little ambiguity here: In sharp contrast to the posturing St. George, “their tone was genuine, their emotion real; they were not posturing for each other or for someone else” (578). James offers a glimpse of one of life’s moments approaching the perfection of art. Paul recalls the encounter as an artistic image: “He has still a vision of the room, whenever he likes—the bright, red, sociable, talkative room, with the curtains that, by a stroke of successful audacity, had the note of vivid blue” (578). At this moment, the line between art and life is blurred.

Blurring the distinction still further, Marian Fancourt asks Paul, “But what is art but a life—if it be real? I think it’s the only one—everything else is so clumsy” (556). Indeed, St. George’s life, surrendered as it has so completely to creature comforts, is at best a dull and unenviable existence. Paul’s task as the artist will be to see the truth amid the conventionality and convey that to his audience.

The story suggests Paul has made a great sacrifice for his art. What the reader is left to puzzle over is whether his sacrifice has been worthwhile.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Do you agree with St. George that Paul should make the sacrifice necessary to be a great artist? Why or why not?
2. To what extent do you agree with St. George that art is hampered by home and family—the comforts of a conventional existence?
3. SARAH ORNE JEWETT and Sherwood Anderson portray characters essentially isolated from society because of a particular sensibility. Can you see any similarities between these fictional characters’ lives and the lifestyle advocated by St.

George in “The Lesson of the Master”? How does the characters’ isolation figure into the story? Explain your response.

“The Real Thing” (1892)

Henry James once commented that art makes life. He then added that art creates importance, or meaning, in life. James in a sense values art over life, or at least values an existence colored by art over one that is devoid of art. In the story “The Real Thing,” James depicts a contest between life (the “real thing”) and art (a representation). The contest is stacked in favor of art, for the end product in the story is the manufacture of magazine illustrations, themselves works of art. More precisely then, James in this story asks whether the lived life is better than a contrived one designed as a model for artistic portraits. The larger theme revolves around the value and place of art when compared with life, or “the real thing.”

The husband and wife who visit the narrator, who is an artist, are in search of work as models, but they have no professional experience as such. James twists the story a bit, by creating in the Monarchs characters whose lives (the real thing) are themselves contrived. The major and Mrs. Monarch have very little money and so rely on their good looks and fine manners to pass in high society as if they were rich. They have then been models all along, living a life of make-believe.

The story’s irony deepens when the Monarchs’ penny-pinching finally reaches such a state that they must look for additional income, and the job they choose is modeling for illustrations. When they are professional models, their usual success at passing (pretending) fails them. The Monarchs do not convey that peculiar something that makes art, even though their lives of pretending would seem to predict their complete success. The artist finds Mrs. Monarch to be “too insurmountably stiff.” She was the “real thing but always the same thing” (James, “The Real Thing” 118). A model should be flexible, evoking the essence of a character or mood in a facial expression or simple turn of the head, such that the artist can capture it in the illustration. Successful illustrations result not from the real thing but from the artful pretense. In other words, art is not reality, but pretending at reality. A far cry from the Monarchs, Miss Churm (from a much and unabashedly lower social class) could succeed as a model because in a moment she could transform herself, chameleonlike, into almost anything the artist wants her to be: “The value of such a model as Miss Churm resided precisely in the fact that she had no positive stamp” (119). What the artist fears most of all is the “type,” a model who cannot become what he needs him or her to be. Worn by the stamp of the gentleman and gentlewoman, the Monarchs cannot be anything but themselves.

In a comic twist, the Monarchs become scullery maids in the service of the artist and his professional models. They cannot work as models even when they pose as the upper-class people they strive to be in life, and so are reduced to the penury of the scullery. As the narrator observes, “If my servants were models, then my models might be servants” (134).

Like the sleight of hand practiced by a magician, art is a great pretender, giving a better rendering of life than life ever can give of itself. It would seem in this story, then, that art trumps life. Or does it? The narrator’s friend Hawley says that the narrator has been permanently harmed by the Monarchs; something in them has troubled his career as illustrator. Yet the narrator concludes, “I’m content to have paid the price—for the memory” (134).

For Discussion or Writing

1. James was writing within a literary movement now identified by literary critics as realism. That is, he and other writers such as WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, Edith Wharton, Theodore Dreiser, and STEPHEN CRANE were interested in depicting the reality and even the harshness of human existence. How do this story’s themes play on the literary realism of that time? Discuss your answer.
2. What does it mean in this story to be the “real thing”? Explain your answer.
3. The narrator’s friend Hawley claims that the major and Mrs. Monarch did the narrator “permanent harm,” getting him into “false ways.” What might he mean by this? Why?

The Turn of the Screw* (1898)

The Turn of the Screw begins as a ghost story told to friends around a fire. The story is taken from an account written by a young woman who agrees to be a governess for a wealthy man’s young niece and nephew on condition that she not bother the guardian once she takes charge. Her experience proves to be terrifying, as she believes ghosts are trying to possess the children.

The inspiration for this tale was an incident related by the archbishop of Canterbury to Henry James in 1895. The archbishop said he had once heard of two children in a remote place who were in danger of possession by the spirits of two former servants who had been evil in life. The spirits tempted the children to go to them. James wrote later in his notebook, “Note here the ghost-story told me at Addington (evening of Thursday the 10th) by the Archbishop . . . the mere vague undetailed faint sketch of it” (qtd. Edel 427). James works this vagueness into his version of the story.

The horror in James’s story results in part from things left unsaid. For example, the relationship between Quint and Miles is described in terms that leave much to the imagination of the reader. Mrs. Gross tells the governess, “It was Quint’s own fancy. To play with him, I mean—to spoil him” (James, Turn of the Screw 32). There is only the implication of something extraordinary in their relationship. Apparently Quint and Miles developed “so close an alliance” from being “perpetually together” (42). And of Quint himself the governess can only imagine in the vaguest terms: “things that man could do. Quint was so clever—he was so deep. . . . There had been matter in his life, strange passages and perils, secret disorders, vices more than suspected, that would have accounted for a good deal more” (33). The reader is never to know the precise nature of those passages, perils, and disorders. The vague terminology heightens the terror as the reader is invited to imagine the “badness” or “evil” that may have in fact occurred—if indeed any occurred at all. This is the genius of the story, that so much is left uncertain. The reader dwells, as the governess does, in a world of the imagination.

The vague description that invites the imagination shows itself strikingly as well in the governess’s account of Miles’s misbehavior at school. This description reaches near-maddening dimensions as the reader is left to discern what happened. The only concrete fact is that Miles was sent home prematurely from school. Beyond this we have but the governess’s description of what the school administration says. She tells Mrs. Gross (the reader is, like Mrs. Gross, at the mercy of the extraordinary imagination of the governess), “They [the school administrators] go into no particulars. They simply express their regret that it should be impossible to keep him” (14).

Then the governess does what will be a hallmark of this story, and what makes this story a psychological thriller. She interprets for the reader and Mrs. Gross the vagueness, or rather the lack of evidence. Lacking any concrete evidence, she not only makes a guess, she makes a statement of great certainty, that the school’s (vague) statement “can have but one meaning,” that Miles is “an injury to the others” (14). The danger in the governess’s statements is that they make great sense, and might well be conjectures the reader would make, only with greater certainty. Regardless, the seeds of suspicion have been planted, such that when the issue is revisited later in the story, the reader, like Mrs. Gross, is primed to suspect the worst. Late in the tale, Miles tells the governess about what happened at school. “I said things,” he reports to her (101). Again, note the intentional vagueness of the tale. Seeds of suspicion have been planted, but with no concrete evidence. The reader is left, with the guidance of the governess, to piece together what occurred. And the implication leaves us floundering between complete innocence or striking precocity. Miles says that he said “things” only to those he “liked” (101). What this means the reader is left to imagine. The story’s horror is due in part to leaving so much to the imagination.

The lens through which we see the events is itself problematic. The story is a written account, recorded some years after the supposed events. The governess writes, "I have not seen Bly since the day I left it, and I dare say that to my present older and more informed eyes it would show a very reduced importance" (13). In addition, this belatedly written account is read to an audience expecting a ghost story. This is a story within a story, the outer story involving several friends who are gathered "round the fire, sufficiently breathless," waiting to hear the promised tale that has been written "in old faded ink and in the most beautiful hand" by the governess of the sister of a member of this group of friends (3, 4). Already removed from the "events" of the story, the narration acquires an aspect of unreliability. Further increasing this remove, the reader is told that the present version of the story is a second transcript "made much later" by the first-person narrator present at the gathering around the fire (6). Add to all this that the governess to whom the events happened and who recorded them initially is herself an unreliable storyteller. The governess is unreliable because she is by her own admission predisposed to distort the facts of the case with her hyperactive imagination. She writes of her "dreadful liability of impressions" (30). This would not be cause for alarm for the reader except that the reader is dependent entirely on the governess to receive the events of the story. Typical of James's finest tales, the story is told through limited omniscience. In this case, the reader never sees into the mind of any resident of Bly except the governess.

The governess's hyperactive imagination becomes a major theme of the story. Her imagination suffuses the story at the moment she accepts the job, when she imagines herself meeting a difficult challenge with courage and skill. The children's uncle challenges her by asking her never to contact him about anything. "That she should never trouble him—but never, never: neither appeal nor complain nor write about anything" (9). The guardian's request is odd. Odder still is the governess's response to his request. Even as she begins her drive to Bly, her imagination's mental landscape overwhelms the narrative: "I remember the whole beginning as a succession of flights and drops, a little see-saw of the right throbs and the wrong" (9). Her perception of Flora is not just of a little child but rather of "the most beautiful child I had ever seen" (10). She employs adjectives like beatific, radiant, and angelic to render her charge from the guardian extraordinary, for in her mind she is protecting not just children but the best of all children. When the governess intuits that Mrs. Gross will support her in her efforts to protect the children from the terrors of Bly, she feels herself "lifted aloft on a great wave of infatuation and pity" (18). The governess feels not only emotion, but an excess of emotion, inspired as she is by an imagination that interprets her task as extraordinary.

The governess's imagination finds its greatest inspiration in the fundamental charge of the uncle never to disturb him. Even after she has determined to protect the children, her focus remains on the uncle: "It was a pleasure at these moments to feel myself tranquil and justified; doubtless perhaps also to reflect that by my discretion, my quiet sense and general high propriety, I was giving pleasure—if he ever thought of it!—to the person to whose pressure I had yielded" (19). Her imagination drifts always toward this initial charge, the source of her regulation, but also of her greatest pleasure. Her imagination has transformed a wage-earning job into a high commission: "What I was doing was what he had earnestly hoped and directly asked of me, and that I could, after all, do it proved even a greater joy than I had expected" (19). Always it is her imagining of her assignment that fuels her motivation, rather than the assignment itself.

This perception of her job, that it is a high commission, transforms her from being a protector of Miles and Flora to being their interrogator. After her encounter with the ghost at the lake, the governess says to Mrs. Gross, "I don't save or shield them! It's far worse than I dreamed. They're lost!" (40). This shift in role from protector to interrogator—she wants the children to confirm her suspicions about the ghosts—helps to explain why she nearly abandons them at the church. In her frustration about Miles's contacting his uncle and thus threatening her position, she is driven to abandon her charge altogether. Of course, she does not leave, but she tries to leave. Her foremost concern resides with her imagined perception of her commission from the guardian—essentially that she take charge of everything and remain in complete control. Once this vision is threatened, her impulse to complete her assignment vanishes.

This intensity of imagination, and the resulting unreliability of the narrative, of course help to create a masterful ghost tale. The horror arguably arises more from the governess's perceptions than from any actual ghost at Bly. James pays homage in his fiction to the powers of the imagination to be used for great good, but also to precipitate great harm. One of the great questions in this tale is where the horror really resides. Quint and Miss Jessel are horrible enough, real or imagined, but the governess herself concedes that she is a source of another and possibly even greater horror. Flora is so terrified of the governess that Mrs. Gross removes her from Bly. Miles is terrified of her, too. Just before his death, the governess thinks, "It was as if he were suddenly afraid of me—which struck me indeed as perhaps the best thing to make him" (97). Fueled as she is by her imagined calling, she pushes onward. "I was infatuated—I was blind with victory" (101). For a moment she concedes how much she is implicated in the horror at Bly. "I seemed to float not into clearness, but into a darker obscure, and within a minute there had come to me out of my very pity the appalling alarm of his [Miles] being perhaps innocent. It was for the instant confounding and bottomless, for if he were innocent what then on earth was I?" (101). For but a moment, she steps outside her imagined role and sees that she has been operating from obscurity rather than clarity, concealing herself as a source of potential harm.

And yet facts about the story suggest a horror beyond the imagination of the governess. Miles and Flora appear to be complicit in something, if only in their toying with her on the night she finds Miles outside on the front lawn, with Flora watching him through the window. Then there is the boat that was moved at the lake. Add to that the mysterious relationship between Quint and Miles, and between Mrs. Jessel and Quint, followed by Quint and Jessel's mysterious demise. And the fact remains that Miles was dismissed from school for something he said to those "he liked" (101). The nature of that something is left for the reader to imagine. And last, perhaps oddest of all, is the situation in which the governess finds herself: odd indeed that the guardian should insist on the governess's never contacting him when the situation at Bly has been precarious, even dangerous, with Jessel and Quint at the helm. Thus James creates in Turn of the Screw a tale as horrific as it is strange, where nagging questions remain unanswered except by the reader's imagination.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What in the story supports the view that there are really ghosts at Bly? What in the story suggests that the ghosts are a product of the governess's imagination?
2. The phrase "turn of the screw" is used twice in the story. How does the second use alter its meaning for the story?
3. Did you find The Turn of the Screw frightening? In what way(s)? Compare this story with horror stories you have read by EDGAR ALLAN POE or Stephen King, discussing the effect each is calculated to have on its audience. Cite examples and explain each.

"The Beast in the Jungle" (1902)

"The Beast in the Jungle" is one of James's most widely read stories. It was written during what is known as James's mature phase. At this time, James was dictating his stories to a secretary. He wrote in long sentences, and his stories were at their most psychological in the sense of focusing entirely on the growing self-awareness of the protagonist (usually viewed from within the mind of the protagonist, but in the third person) and containing minimal action and maximal reflection.

"The Beast in the Jungle" is also considered one of James's most autobiographical tales. He must have plumbed the depths of his soul to write the tale, for if any life lacked evidence of romantic passion, James's did. He had surrounded himself with women with whom he was unable to consummate a relationship. Platonic relationships are all well and good, but James watched Constance Fenimore Woolson kill herself, and their one-sided relationship may well have contributed to her demise. For too long he had repressed his romantic inclinations toward men. Not coincidentally, James found a circle of male friends and some sense of domesticity and romance at about the same time he wrote "Beast in the Jungle." As Leon Edel, James's esteemed biographer, writes, the story was cathartic for James (559).

This story is intensely psychological in that it is a story in which nothing happens. The subject of the story is Marcher's struggle for self-awareness, seen first through dramatic irony, as Mae Bartram discovers the "beast" of Marcher's life. The perceptive reader can guess at the secret Mae tries unsuccessfully to convey to her friend. As Mae says, "Your not being aware of it is the strangeness in the strangeness. It's the wonder of the wonder" (James, "The Beast in the Jungle" 356).

In "The Beast in the Jungle," a beautiful riddle supplants an active life. Marcher conceives of an idea so fascinating as to fill his otherwise lonely and dreary life with adventure. "Something or other lay in wait for him, amid the twists and the turns of the months and the years, like a crouching beast in the jungle" (336). But the idea is only exciting so long as it does not end. The minute Marcher discovers his beast, the adventure is over. Thus Marcher is caught up in the adventure itself, at the expense of its object. Interestingly Marcher conceives of his quest in highly masculine terms, such that no woman can accompany him. "The definite point was the inevitable spring of the creature; and the definite lesson from that was that a man of feeling didn't cause himself to be accompanied by a lady on a tiger hunt" (336–337). This thought assures the solitary nature and the continuity of his hunt: Mae can watch with him but never join him. The hunt itself is the barrier between him and Mae. Since passion, unbeknownst to Marcher, is itself what the hunt is about, the hunt sustains its own existence.

The hunt also becomes the beast, for in adhering to the hunt, Marcher loses out on the passion Mae tries to show him. Yet the question can fairly be posed, Does Marcher have a choice to love Mae? He shows not the least inclination to fall in love with her. It would be safer to say that Marcher has missed a life of passion with someone. The hunt for the beast has been itself his life's passion, yet an imaginary one.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare Mae and Marcher. Do you think Marcher treated Mae fairly? Is it fair for Mae to have expected more from Marcher than he gives? Contrast Mae's view of the hunt with Marcher's.
2. NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE wrote frequently about characters who possess a personal vision that separates them from the real world. Explain the way each author uses such characters. Can you think of a story by Hawthorne that compares in any way to "The Beast in the Jungle"?

"The Jolly Corner" (1908)

"The Jolly Corner" is another story from the mature phase of Henry James's career. It represents the full flowering of James's interest in psychology, and it offers a splendid example of James's views on the international theme of Europe versus America.

This is a story in which psychology is both technique and theme. It is a story about two lives, one lived in all its fullness, and another imagined life, one unchosen and thus un-lived. It is this second, unchosen life that Brydon yearns to witness, personified as the ghost of his alter ego. "He found all things come back to the question of what he personally might have been, how he might have led his life and 'turned out'" (James, "The Jolly Corner" 379). The life he has lived has been one of "sensations" (384). James uses the word sensation in his fiction to describe the life of a writer or artist or critic, one who deeply appreciates artistic beauty but who also appreciates life in all its infinite variety. In other works of fiction, James uses the term imagination to describe this kind of character as a person who possesses a vivid imagination and is susceptible to sensations. As a general rule, James treats these characters sympathetically. Regrettably if one relies on sensation for a career, one will probably live in relative poverty and from the perspective of material success would be considered, as Brydon describes himself, to have led “a selfish frivolous scandalous life” (381). In conversation with Alice, Brydon wonders what he should have been had he followed in the footsteps of his father, adhering not to a life of sensation but to the “rank money-passion.” He and Alice believe he might then have been quite powerful and wealthy, possibly even a “billionaire” (380).

This is not the first time that James sides with the life of sensation against the life of wealth and power. The reader can guess at this from his sympathetic treatment of Brydon and from the description of the alter ego. The alter ego has been “unhappy” and “ravaged” (402). Curiously Brydon feels that he too has been ravaged and unhappy. Perhaps life does that to people regardless of one’s wealth. But Alice adds, with reference to the alter ego, “He’s grim, he’s worn—things have happened to him” (402). Typically of James’s mature work, it is left to the reader’s imagination to discern what those “things” are. At the very least, Brydon sees that the richly adorned alter ego conceals his face, and whatever life he has led has reduced two of his fingers to stumps. The stranger, “whoever he might be,” is “evil, odious, blatant” and “vulgar” (397).

James weaves into this psychological tale a vivid contrast between Europe and America. A few years prior to writing the story, James returned to America for an extended tour that included his hometown of New York City, where this story takes place. One can imagine that the house in the story is very much like the house James grew up in Washington Square. James found all too much confirmation for why he had lived out most of his adult life in Europe. Spencer Brydon had chosen to live in Europe, as James had, and in this tale, as in much of James’ work, Europe is synonymous with art, history, and beauty, as opposed to material wealth. America is synonymous with new money, even immense fortunes. It is quite clear which side James favors.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare this story with “The Beast in the Jungle.” For example, how does the male-female interaction compare? And what about the hunt or “chase” as figured in both stories?
2. Compare this tale to another “ghost” story by James, The Turn of the Screw. How do the sources of horror in these two works compare?
3. Compare James’s technique of exploring the psychology of the protagonist in “The Jolly Corner” and other works with that used by another intensely psychological writer, William Faulkner, in works such as As I Lay Dying and The Sound and the Fury. What does the use of psychology add to the work as a whole? Discuss.

The Art of the Novel

(Henry James’s prefaces) (1905–1909)

Near the end of his writing career, between 1905 and 1909, Henry James commissioned a republishing of most of his work in handsome volumes he called the New York Edition. “I should particularly like to call it the New York Edition if that may pass for a general title of sufficient dignity and distinctness” (Edel 624). James made at least minor changes to nearly all of the works but in particular focused on raising the earlier works to the quality of his more mature work. In general, the New York Editions are the ones most commonly read today, for they received the author’s final stamp of approval.

One reason James commissioned the New York Edition was to garner additional sales during his lifetime. In other words, he needed money, but he also would have liked his works to reach a wider audience. The New York Edition did not sell. His first royalty statement amounted to a paltry $211. He panicked because of the lack of income, but his ego too was damaged. He felt physically ill and in a fit of depression gathered his private papers, including the accumulation of several decades of correspondence, acters in a more realistic fashion: That is, he attempts to get at the mind of a character by means that appear realistic. Can you identify similar techniques of character development in works of other writers of his day such as WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, MARK TWAIN (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), Theodore Dreiser, or Edith Wharton? What are they? Discuss the way(s) each adds to a realistic portrayal.

- Wallace Stevens is a poet known for his thematic treatment of reality versus the imagination. Look up a few Stevens poems on the Internet. Selecting one or two of them to justify your response, compare Wallace Stevens's celebration of the imagination with James's attitude toward the imagination in his works, such as "The Real Thing."

SARAH ORNE JEWETT (1849–1909)

Mrs. Todd never by any chance gave warning over night of her great projects and adventures by sea and land. She first came to an understanding with the primal forces of nature, and never trusted to any preliminary promise of good weather, but examined the day for herself in its infancy.

(The Country of the Pointed Firs)

Willa Cather, who met Sarah Orne Jewett in 1908, a year before Jewett's death, would later write an introduction to Jewett's stories in which she expressed her admiration in the highest terms: "If I were asked to name three American books which have the possibility of a long, long life, I would say at once, The Scarlet Letter, Huckleberry Finn, and The Country of the Pointed Firs. I can think of no others that confront time and change so serenely" (qtd. in Silverthorne 10–11). Cather was not alone in recognizing Jewett's accomplishment. WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS praised her work; John Greenleaf Whittier was a close friend and admirer; HENRY JAMES described The Country of the Pointed Firs as Jewett's "beautiful little quantum of achievement" (qtd. in Silverthorne 171). Considered by many to be the most accomplished of America's "local color" writers, Jewett also earned comparison with HENRY DAVID THOREAU for her close attention to detail and her devotion to the natural world. As with Thoreau, Jewett's regional orientation was not a source of limitation, but rather a means of concentrating attention, enabling the mind to reflect on the broad implications of lives lived deliberately. Her choice to write about average people and give voice to their daily experience situates her in the company of realist writers such as KATE CHOPIN and MARY ELEANOR WILKINS FREEMAN, who also took a great interest in the trials and triumphs of independent women.

Jewett continues to attract attention today not only because she was a great champion of women's freedom but also because she was an early advocate of environmental conservation, who expressed a deep appreciation for what is gained and lost through the process of historical change.

Theodora Sarah Orne Jewett was born September 3, 1849, in South Berwick, Maine, a village located on the Piscataqua River, which runs along the southern portion of the state's border with New Hampshire. Her family was financially secure, benefiting from the shipping fortune generated by her paternal grandfather, Theodore Furber Jewett, and the successful medical practice established by her maternal grandfather, Dr. William Perry. Theodore Herman Jewett, Sarah's father, also a medical doctor, met Sarah's mother, Frances Perry, when he moved to Exeter, Maine, in order to enter a medical practice with Dr. Perry. Sarah, as she became known, was the second of three daughters; her sister Mary was born in 1847 and Caroline in 1855. The family moved from Exeter shortly after Mary's birth and settled in an elegant colonial house the Jewett grandfather had purchased in the center of South Berwick. This is the house in which Sarah was born and where she would die of a stroke in 1909 at the age of 59. The natural beauty of South Berwick, the tidal estuary, and the village life lived close to the ocean would surface in Sarah's later writing. She would also incorporate a pronounced respect for past generations engendered by a childhood spent in the presence of grandmothers and grandfathers with long-standing familial ties to the region.

Sarah was exceptionally close to her father, who frequently took her with him on his medical rounds. One reason for these excursions was Sarah's struggle with arthritis, an ailment that would plague her throughout her life and periodically prevented her from attending school during childhood. On these trips with her father, Sarah became acquainted with local flora and fauna as well as the people of rural Maine. Her father always encouraged her to be attentive to her surroundings, and she credited him with offering advice that would shape her life as a writer: "Don't try to write about people and things," he admonished her. "Tell them just as they are" (qtd. in Silverthorne 35).

For the whole of her life, Jewett delighted in the outdoors and took as much pleasure in nature as she did in books. She was an avid hiker, loved horseback riding, and was adept at handling boats; in the winter she skated, sledged, and enjoyed sleigh rides. Even though she suffered with arthritis, Jewett enjoyed vigorous exercise and rapidly developed into an attractive girl whose good looks were widely acknowledged. Her formal education began in 1855 at the Misses Raynes' School, where she studied until age 12, when she entered Berwick Academy, from which she graduated in 1865, the final year of the Civil War, Sarah's youthful temperament was not well suited to regimented study, though she did value her education and soon became a voracious reader. Her favorite authors from this period included Jane Austin, George Eliot, and Elizabeth Gaskell, all British authors who wrote brilliantly about the characters and settings they knew intimately. The book that spoke to her most powerfully at this time was HARRIET BEECHER STOWE'S 1862 The Pearl of Orr's Island, a novel about island life off the Maine coast that led her to imagine that the people and places she knew best might provide material for her own writing. Jewett's formal education concluded in 1865, when she left Berwick Academy at age 16. Her first publication occurred just three years later with the appearance of "Jenny Garrow's Lovers," a short story printed in the January 18, 1868, issue of the Flag of Our Union. The plot is full of melodramatic twists and turns and improbable events that the more mature writer would replace with the realist's eye for accurate description and attention to the drama of everyday life.

That Jewett possessed abundant talent was evident from an early age, but she would require time to discover her true subject and voice. After three failed attempts, she succeeded in having a short story published in 1869 in one of her favorite magazines, the Atlantic Monthly. Her story, "Mr. Bruce," was accepted by William Dean Howells, who at that time served as assistant to James T. Fields, a figure who was well known in the literary world and was married to Annie Fields, Jewett's future friend and confidant. The story itself is highly artificial, lacking the grace and ease of Jewett's later writing. During this period, Jewett's letters and diary entries record her lack of confidence in her abilities and express uncertainty about the course her life would take. Thanks to the affluence of her family, Sarah felt no particular pressure to marry, and though she and her sisters led active social lives that included ample contact with young men, there is no mention of romance. Perhaps in an effort to establish a greater sense of purpose, Sarah and Mary were both baptized and confirmed in St. John's Episcopal Church in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, on November 27, 1870. In spite of her lack of confidence, Jewett continued to write and in January 1870 published her short story "The Girl with the Cannon Dresses" in the Riverside Magazine for Young People. This was in at least three respects a breakthrough publication: It was the first work she did not publish under a pen name; it marked her first treatment of nature as a nurturing presence; and it included the theme of country versus city. Though she continued to struggle with insecurity, Jewett began to see with increasing clarity that she wrote best and with greatest passion when describing the simple but admirable lives of the country people she had known and loved growing up in rural Maine.

As she became more immersed in her writing and entered more fully into the community of writers in and around Boston, Jewett formed close friendships with leading literary figures, many of whom would have a profound influence on her writing and her personal life. This group included James Russell Lowell, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, and Horace B. Scudder, as well as Fields and Howells. Sarah visited Howells and his family at their home in Boston and at their summer cottage at Kittery Point, not far from South Berwick. Howells, who was a major figure in the realist movement, encouraged Jewett to concentrate on simple plots surrounding the lives of the people who inhabited the rural settings she knew best. After accepting several of her sketches for the Atlantic, Howells urged her to produce a collection of stories. Jewett took his advice and in April 1877 published her first book, Deephaven. Whether or not the work fits together as a true novel or more accurately functions as a closely linked series of sketches remains a matter of critical debate. Formal considerations aside, the collection won Whittier's enthusiastic approval and was generally well received by critics. This volume was followed in 1878 by Play Days: A Book of Stories for Children.

In the meantime Jewett developed a friendship with Whittier that would last for the remainder of his life, and she met the woman who would be her closest lifelong associate, Annie Adams Fields. Sarah and Annie met in December 1879 at a reception for Oliver Wendell Holmes. Annie was at that time the devoted wife of James T. Fields, sharing his dedication to literature and the arts and using much of her time in assisting his efforts in the publishing world. Their home at 148 Charles Street in Boston was a gathering place for literary lights and quickly became a favorite stopping point for Jewett, who was close to both James and Annie. When James unexpectedly died in 1881, Annie was devastated. Jewett, who was still in mourning since her father's death in 1878, felt immediate sympathy and began a series of long visits to 148 Charles Street. During these extended visits the two women discovered a mutual compatibility that proved a great source of comfort and happiness for each. Together they traveled in 1882 to Europe, where they met Alfred, Lord Tennyson, and during which time their friendship deepened.

After their return from this trip they established a pattern of living together in Boston during the winter season and in Maine during much of the summer. When she was not with Annie, Sarah spent the majority of her time at her family home in South Berwick, where Annie became a frequent visitor. The precise nature of Jewett's relationship with Annie Fields has excited a great deal of scholarly conjecture, but research has yet to establish any firm conclusion as to the sexual dimension of their intimacy. Jewett took all of her friendships seriously and was known to write "as many as thirty letters in a day" (Silverthorne 105), so it is no surprise that she would refer to Annie in passionate terms that reflect deep affection. Ultimately, they entered a partnership consistent with what was referred to at the time as a "Boston marriage," according to which women shared households and entered intimate relationships but were not necessarily sexually involved. Whatever the basis of their intimate life was, both women thrived, and they were immensely popular in Boston society.

Jewett began work on The Country Doctor, her first book deliberately conceived as a novel, in 1882. The work is strongly autobiographical in its incorporation of Jewett's childhood experience of visiting country patients with her father. She modeled the kindly Dr. Leslie on her father, and her protagonist, Nan Prince, who becomes a country doctor, was an outgrowth of her own personality. When the book was published in 1884, it was compared to Howell's novel Doctor Breen's Practice and generally received positive reviews, though some critics complained that it was too devoted to detail and overly concerned with moral implications. Jewett herself was very fond of the book, perhaps because it contained so much of her and because in it she was able to develop one of her central motifs: the contrast between urban and rural values. While she was completing work on the Country Doctor, Jewett produced another novel, A Marsh Island, which appeared in 1885 through serial publication in the Atlantic. In the following year Jewett published her most popular short story, "The White Heron," along with eight other stories in a collection titled A White Heron and Other Stories. This work drew Jewett critical acclaim on both sides of the Atlantic and in many ways marked her emergence as a major writer. The title story is widely appreciated today for its skillful construction, its promotion of environmental conservation, and its feminist assertion of female autonomy.

From this point on, Jewett published widely in literary journals and produced numerous additional collections. The work generally considered her masterpiece, The Country of the Pointed Firs, was published serially in the Atlantic in 1896. As was the case with Deephaven, critical opinion was mixed as to whether or not the work should be considered a novel or a sequence of linked sketches. Critical assessments of the work's quality were, however, uniformly glowing. From the time of its first appearance to the present moment, scholars and critics have praised Jewett's skillful depiction of New England rural life. Her unnamed female narrator travels from the city to the village of Dunnet Landing, where she rents a room from Mrs. Almira Todd, a widow whose presence informs most of what follows. In Mrs. Todd we discover a woman whose unusual strength of character grows from an intimate knowledge of the natural world and close relations to neighbors and remaining family members. Her presence enables Jewett to explore the timeless quality of primary human traits that she presents as glimpses of the mythic past while also examining the difficult challenges people face as they confront historical change. After the publication of The Country of the Pointed Firs, Jewett wrote four additional stories set in Dunnet Landing. Of these, "The Foreigner" is generally considered to be the most accomplished. In it we learn how Mrs. Todd befriends a French Catholic woman who feels excluded from village life and in return learns even more about local plants and herbs. As in many of Jewett's best works, this story pivots on the power of female friendship.

In the years following publication of The Country of the Pointed Firs, Jewett's reputation continued to grow, and she enjoyed increased public recognition. One of the most meaningful acknowledgments occurred in 1901, when Jewett became the first woman ever to be awarded an honorary doctor of letters by Bowdoin College, her father's alma mater. Despite having struggled with arthritis and rheumatism throughout her life, Jewett managed to live a vigorous, physically active life up to her 53rd birthday in 1902, when she was thrown from a carriage she was driving. She would never fully recover from the injuries she sustained to her head and spine and found it extremely difficult if not impossible to write. She remained mentally alert, however, and when Willa Cather visited her and Annie Fields at 148 Charles Street in 1908, Cather was impressed by Jewett's poise and wit. The next blow to Jewett's health came in March 1909, when she suffered a stroke that left her partially paralyzed. With the beginning of warmer weather, she traveled to the family home in South Berwick, where she experienced a brain hemorrhage and passed away at 6:30 in the evening of June 24. In 1968 Mary Ellen Chase, another Maine writer, would affirm Cather's high regard for Jewett by writing in her introduction to The Country of the Pointed Firs that Jewett's "sensitiveness to people and places" sets her "apart not only from all other Maine writers, but from many, if not most writers of all time and of many a place," making "her in short, the deeply desired, if unreachable, model for us all" (xxx).

A Country Doctor* (1884)

Through the pages of this coming-of-age novel, Jewett traces the early life of Anna (Nan) Prince, who is orphaned in infancy and overcomes social opposition to become a country doctor. Nan's childhood unfolds on the farm of her maternal grandmother, Mrs. Thacher, where she enjoys unlimited access to the fields, streams, and forests of rural New England and in the process develops a love of freedom and independence. After her grandmother, dies, Nan enters the home of Dr. Leslie, who attended her mother in her final hours and who has played a role in Nan's life from the moment her mother took her to her grandmother's farm. Even before she moved to Dr. Leslie's comfortable home in nearby Oldfields, Nan had expressed an interest in the healing arts, which Dr. Leslie immediately recognized as an expression of natural ability. After she becomes his ward, he takes her with him on visits to the homes of patients and nurtures her native talent. In the chapters that recount Nan's late childhood and young adulthood in Oldfields, Jewett draws extensively from her own experience growing up as the daughter of a doctor in rural Maine, who, as Dr. Leslie did with Nan, took Sarah with him on patient rounds and had a profound influence on her development. Despite the resistance Nan encounters from conservative members of the Oldfields community, she decides to go to medical school and dedicate herself to the healing arts. It is during this period that she arranges a visit to her father's sister, her aunt Nancy Prince, a proud woman who has remained strangely detached from Nan's life. This visit to her aunt in the seaside village of Dunport proves the occasion of Nan's greatest trial. During the few short weeks of her stay, Nan faces aggressive social opposition to her medical aspirations at the same time that she feels a romantic attachment to George Gerry, a handsome young attorney and close friend of her aunt. After a period of serious soul searching, Nan emerges with renewed dedication to her chosen vocation and the conviction that for her marriage is not the path to true happiness.

Jewett structures the novel around several core oppositions, which include the contrast between town and country, as represented by pronounced differences between Dunport and Oldfields, and the contrast between natural self-expression and social conformity, as represented by Nan's rejection of the dominant social code that limits female ambition to marriage and the raising of a family. Jewett is very careful to present Nan's childhood as shaped by extended exposure to the natural world, so that the decisions she makes as she grows into adulthood surface as the unimpeded expression of her true self. This is what enables Nan to rebuff the charge of being unnatural by telling the domineering Dunport matron Mrs. Fraley, "Nobody persuaded me into following such a plan; I simply grew toward it" (Sarah Orne Jewett 327). By means of such language, Jewett draws attention to the artificiality of social expectations that are at odds with the growth process. An underlying theme that runs throughout the novel, and is repeatedly supported by scenes like this one, is the belief that American culture has advanced to the point where the differences between the sexes that were so essential to species survival in earlier times no longer apply with the same force. As a consequence, to restrict the free expression of female ambition by insisting on a continued division of labor is to risk thwarting the advance of culture. Jewett is at great pains to stress that women should be allowed to choose their futures and that for some women this will continue to include marrying and managing a home. This is why Nan tells her suitor, George Gerry, how aware she is that most women would not choose to act as she has: "I know better and better that most women are made for another sort of existence, but by and by I must do my part in my own way to make many homes happy instead of one" (355). Jewett's aim here and elsewhere is to show readers that the change she advocates through her protagonist applies only to a small segment of the population and therefore poses no threat to the institution of marriage or the continued importance of the family.

The contrast between town and country is established early when Nan's mother, Adeline, expends her last ounce of strength carrying her baby to the safety of the family farm situated outside Oldfields. Her suffering and eventual death appear to be the result of alcoholism and an advanced case of tuberculosis, both of which are linked to the corrupting influence of town life and the hostile presence of the Prince family, who are associated with the town of Dunport. Adeline's dying words to Dr. Leslie convey her regret at not having returned to her rural roots long ago and make clear her wish that Nan live with Mrs. Thacher as long as possible: "She must stay here with mother, long as she wants her. 'Tis what I wish I had kept sense enough to do"

(169). Adeline goes on to say that her sole aim is in seeing that “the baby is well placed” and given “a good chance to grow up a useful woman.” The importance of being useful that is mentioned here is central to Jewett’s argument that women be allowed to decide for themselves which direction their lives should take.

The Prince family represents the opposite of this vision of expanded female choice, and it is probably no coincidence that Jewett selected Prince as their family name. Doing so links them to male-centered dynastic aims, and the Prince family is concerned chiefly with control of family wealth achieved through marriage and female conformity. What little we know of Adeline’s marriage to Jack Prince is that she was perceived to be an unsuitable match and that her husband’s loyalties lay more with his family than with her. Her final words to Dr. Leslie are that Nan be kept out of Prince hands: “And most of all . . . keep her out of their hands, I mean her father’s folks. I hate ’em, and he cared more for ’em than he did for me.” Jewett closes the chapter in which Adeline dies with the observation. “There was no love lost between the town and the country household” (174). According to Jewett’s construction of town and country, then, the town is conceived of as a destructive influence, particularly for women, because the town is where wealth is accumulated through trade, consolidated through profitable marriages, and perpetuated through respect for social traditions. In the country, where nature has a greater influence on the course of life, women are granted more independence, and social change is easier to achieve because families have not acquired the wealth that requires the protection of fixed traditions.

Miss Prince is the principal character associated with Dunport, and it is appropriate that she sets the tone in general for the other characters we meet during Nan’s stay at her aunt’s home. During her first days at that house, Nan wonders at the “implacable hostility” that “had lasted for years in the breast of a person” she now discovers to be so “friendly and cordial in her relations with her neighbors” and so welcoming to her (298). In response to Nan’s perplexity, the narrative tells us what the young woman is “slow to recognize in her relative”: that “Miss Prince’s acquaintances called her a very set person” and though she possessed the “traits of character which are necessary for . . . an enterprising life, . . . her gifts of persistence and self-confidence had ranked themselves for the defense of a comparatively unimportant and commonplace existence.” This dedication to stability and the continuation of life as it has been rather than as it might be is the cornerstone of the society Nan enters through Miss Prince.

This dedication to the status quo is fully embodied in the person of George Gerry, the young man Miss Prince would like Nan to marry. His instinctive devotion to traditional male and female roles emerges most forcefully at the point in the novel when Nan sets the dislocated shoulder of a farmer she and George encounter while on a picnic. “I’ll be hanged if she didn’t set it,-” declares the grateful farmer, who goes on to express his admiration, telling Nan that she is “the smartest young woman I ever see” (317). The narrative then reveals George’s inner thoughts so that we see how uneasy he is at being upstaged by a woman: “He was stout-hearted enough usually; as brave a fellow as one could wish to see; but he felt weak and womanish, and somehow wished it had been he who could play the doctor” (317). The perception that George sees his manhood as dependent upon his ability to subordinate Nan is reinforced when we are later told that to his way of thinking, “all his manliness was at stake, and his natural rights would be degraded and lost, if he could not show his power to be greater than her own” (336). As readers, we increasingly agree with Eunice Fraley’s opinion that while in Dunport Nan resembled “a caged bird at a window” that watches with envy the free flight of a lark (321). For this reason, we begin to see that marriage to George Gerry is not right for Nan, and we are relieved when she at last rejects his suit. As Nan states to Dr. Leslie upon her return to Oldfields, her commitment to medicine is greater as a result of having been tested: “I shall work better all my life for having been able to make myself so perfectly sure that I know my way” (363).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Look closely at the argument that takes place between Nan and Mrs. Fraley near the end of the chapter titled “A Serious Tea-Drinking.” Explain why Jewett pays so much attention to determining what is or is not natural behavior for a woman.
2. Near the end of the chapter titled “A Sunday Visit,” Nan is described as enjoying the sights and sounds of Dr. Leslie’s summer house instead of going to church. Compare Jewett’s description of Nan with the speaker in EMILY DICKINSON’s poem “Some keep the Sabbath going to Church—.” To what extent do you think Dickinson’s poem accurately expresses what Jewett is telling us about Nan?
3. Can you explain why Jewett decided to have Nan fall in love and be tempted by marriage? Do you think her novel would have been just as effective if Nan had not experienced the romantic encounter with George Gerry?
4. Look closely at the way Jewett presents Nan’s thoughts about marriage and her future profession at the end of the chapter titled “Friend and Lover.” Explain how KATE CHOPIN’s work “The Story of an Hour” might be thought of as representing an outcome Nan might have experienced if she had yielded to the temptation to marry.

“A White Heron” (1886)

This most famous of all of Jewett’s stories focuses closely on the experience of a nine-year-old girl, Sylvia, who decides that the communion she enjoys with the natural world means more to her than monetary gain and social approval. Jewett sets the story in rural New England, where Sylvia and her grandmother, Mrs. Tilley, inhabit a poor but clean dwelling situated on a small country farm far removed from city life. We learn that Sylvia spent the first eight years of her life in “a crowded manufacturing town,” where her mother, Mrs. Tilley’s daughter, fell upon unspecified hard times and was no longer capable of caring for all of her children (Country 228). This background sets up the contrast between town and country that is an understated but important element of this story. The main tension in the story grows from the unexpected arrival of a handsome young ornithologist who spends two nights with Sylvia and her grandmother while searching for an elusive white heron. Sylvia is attracted to the tall stranger and is tempted to show him where the heron lives in order to please him and to earn the much-needed $10 he has offered to anyone who can show him the heron’s nest. Sylvia struggles with opposing impulses, wanting to win the young man’s approval at the same time that she wishes to preserve the trust and sense of kinship she has felt for the wild creatures that populate the region. By means of these competing natural forces, Jewett explores the way individual character emerges out of contesting internal and external influences over which persons have limited control. This core dynamic, plus the fact that the story is based on the lives of ordinary people, contributes to the work’s standing as an example of realist literature.

We learn early on that external circumstances play a major role in Sylvia’s life. Chance enters the story through Mrs. Tilley’s “unlikely choice of Sylvia from among her daughter’s houseful of children,” but it turns out that her decision gave the young girl precisely the environment that her undeveloped inner nature craved. Immediately upon their arrival at the old farm, the cat began to purr and Sylvia whispered to Mrs. Tilley “that this was a beautiful place to live in, and she should never wish to go home” (229). Sylvia blossoms in her humble surroundings, and her grandmother notes with delight that “there never was such a child for straying out-of-doors since the world was made!” (228). Sylvia also acknowledges the vitalizing influence of country life: “As for Sylvia herself, it seemed as if she never had been alive at all before she came to live on the farm.” Jewett opens the story with a glimpse of Sylvia after she has been with Mrs. Tilley for a year, and it is clear that she has found contentment in her pastoral surroundings. She lingers in the balmy June evening, companionably strolling home with the family cow. Mrs. Tilley tells us shortly after the ornithologist has arrived that Sylvia takes after her uncle Dan: "Sylvia takes after him," she says. "There ain't a foot o' ground she don't know her way over, and the wild creatur's counts her one o' themselves" (231). Such language points to the way Sylvia's genetic inheritance has predisposed her to flourish in the setting that she has landed in as the result of an unforeseen family crisis.

The sudden appearance of the handsome young man instantly disrupts the peace Sylvia has discovered, and it is no surprise that his presence is associated with disturbing memories from Sylvia's early life in town. We see this just before her solitude is invaded by the ornithologist's whistle, when Sylvia's thoughts are troubled by the recollection of a "great red-faced boy who used to chase and frighten her" (229). The flushed face of this male antagonist suggests heightened emotions and the possibility of passionate male pursuit that threatens Sylvia's serenity. As a consequence, when she did hear the ornithologist's "whistle, determined, and somewhat aggressive," she understandably "stepped discreetly aside into the bushes." Jewett then refers to the young man as the "enemy," setting the stage for the contest ahead in which Sylvia will have to decide between her continued independence and her wish for male approval. The gardenlike setting, Sylvia's effort to conceal herself, and Jewett's identification of the young man as the enemy define the scene as an allusion to the Garden of Eden and let us know that Sylvia has come face to face with temptation. The young man's disarming admission that he is lost and in need of "a friend" increases Sylvia's alarm because she feels her instinctive defenses relax and recognizes how hard it will be to keep her distance from him.

The danger posed by the young man becomes increasingly clear when Sylvia leads him to the farmhouse and the next day accompanies him in his search for the white heron. On his first night at the farmhouse, Mrs. Tilley quickly overcomes her initial reserve and welcomes him into her home, assuming the traditional role of hostess. After their supper, the old woman recounts her family history, giving emphasis to the hardships she has encountered. However, despite hearing that "she had buried four children" and that her only surviving son left home after an altercation with her now-departed husband, the visitor is notably unsympathetic (231). Jewett presents him as preoccupied with his own concerns: "The guest did not notice this hint of family sorrows in his eager interest in something else" (232). This indifference is immediately connected to his obsession with completing his collection of stuffed and preserved birds. "I have been at it ever since I was a boy," he says, placing particular importance on the fact that there are but "two or three very rare ones" that have eluded him. The rarity of these birds heightens his interest in acquiring them, while also making it clear that he is part of the process of human predation that will eventually lead to extinction if unchecked. When Sylvia accompanies him into the woods the next day, she has "lost her first fear of the friendly lad" and accepts his gift of a jackknife. Even though the text states that she "would have liked him vastly better without his gun" and "could not understand why he killed the birds he seemed to like so much," Sylvia is delighted with the gift and seems irresistibly drawn to him (233). She watches him with "loving admiration" that arises from a deep, instinctive attraction informed by an undeniable sexual undercurrent: "The woman's heart, asleep in the child, was vaguely thrilled by a dream of love" (233). With these words, Jewett prepares us for the dramatic climax of the story when Sylvia must decide whether she will use her knowledge of the white heron to win male approval or resist her instinctual attraction, preserve her independence, and stand on the side of environmental conservation.

Part 2 of "A White Heron" is developed against the backdrop of Sylvia's mixed emotions and demonstrates that for her the communion she feels with the nonhuman world finally outweighs her wish to please the ornithologist. During the second night of the ornithologist's stay, Sylvia can hardly sleep because she is so excited by the prospect of climbing an ancient pine "at break of day" from which vantage she will "easily discover whence the white heron flew, and mark the place" (234). She imagines the "glory" that will be hers when "she could make known the secret" later in the morning (235). At this point, Jewett interrupts the narrative to clarify what is at stake for Sylvia if she acts on her newly discovered attraction and does all within her power to please the stranger: "Alas, if the great wave of human interest which flooded for the first time this dull little life should sweep away the satisfaction of an existence heart to heart with nature and the dumb life of the forest" (235). As we soon see, however, Sylvia's fascination with the young man is countered by her discovery of the vastness of the natural world and her intimate participation in it.

With "tingling, eager blood coursing the channels of her whole frame," Sylvia begins the climb that will show her where the heron's nest is located. At first, the "sharp dry twigs" of the pine "held her and scratched her like angry talons," but as she progresses up the tree, the tree itself seems to change its attitude and welcome her presence: "Who knows how steadily the least twigs held themselves to advantage this light, weak creature on her way! The old pine must have loved his new dependent" (236). At last she reaches the vantage she is seeking and for the first time sees "the sea with the dawning sun making a golden dazzle over it," and she feels at one with the hawks that glide beneath her, "as if she too could go flying away among the clouds" (236). As readers we also marvel at the majesty of what she beholds, concluding for ourselves, if not for her, that "truly it was a vast and awesome world" (236). We are, for a time, held in suspense as we observe Sylvia undeviatingly pursuing her conscious plan of telling the young man where the nest is.

Jewett carefully composes this critical scene so that we witness Sylvia's struggle between conscious purpose and unconscious delight and find ourselves urging her to indulge her unconscious impulse. Once the sought-after bird appears and Sylvia possesses the knowledge she was seeking, the narrative is again disrupted. This time the intrusive voice instructs Sylvia to remain in the tree and behold what is to occur even though she has gathered all the information she needs: "And wait! wait!

do not move a foot or a finger, little girl, do not send an arrow of light and consciousness from your own two eager eyes, for the heron has perched on a pine bough not far beyond yours, and cries back to his mate on the nest, and plumes his feathers for the new day!" (238). Here is the bird at sunrise, preparing for the future that is the day ahead and the next generation signified by his mate on the nest. This is what Jewett wanted us to watch Sylvia watching. At first she appears undeterred in her original purpose; her immediate response is to wonder "what the stranger would say to her, and what he would think when she told him how to find his way straight to the heron's nest" (238). Once these words are uttered, however, the point of view shifts from third-person limited to third-person objective, and we no longer have access to Sylvia's inner thoughts. This is so that we can observe her behavior and see for ourselves whether her outward conduct expresses the change of heart the narrative intrusion encouraged. This is precisely what she does, but she achieves it through inaction.

When the moment arrives to tell the ornithologist where to find the nest, Sylvia remains silent. Her grandmother "fretfully rebukes her," and she herself never loses sight of how helpful the money would be and how much she would like to make the young man happy (239). Once more, the narrative guides our thoughts, stating emphatically that the girl "must keep silence!" We are told she does this because "she remembers how the white heron came flying through the golden air and how they watched the sea and the morning together" (239). The narrative intrudes in this manner for the simple reason that Sylvia could not herself explain why she has acted as she has; the force of nature that flows through her and channels her actions is not part of her conscious thought. She is a nine-year-old girl, unaware of the power that directs her conduct. Yet again, the narrative explains: Had she acted as she intended, she would have surrendered her independence and her dignity in exchange for the young man's gratitude. Yes, she "could have served and followed him and loved him as a dog loves," but she refuses to submit to this fate, acting instead on an opposing impulse emerging from what we might imagine to be her instinct for self-preservation (239).

What becomes of Sylvia after this momentous event is left ambiguous. A story written in the romantic tradition might have shown Sylvia enjoying an enhanced measure of delight when she resumes the simple life that she nearly abandoned in order to become a more conventional female who seeks to accede to male authority. But this is a realist story, and Jewett makes no claims about new joys and a deeper intimacy with nature. She raises this as a possibility but insists on leaving it open-ended: “Were the birds better friends than their hunter might have been, —who can tell?” (239). Ending the story in this way enables Jewett to return to the principles of realism that she herself may have strayed from when her narrator described the ancient pine as seeking to assist Sylvia and even having grown in that instant to “have loved his new dependent” (236). The existence of such a tree would have implied that the natural world is capable of sympathizing with human experience, and this is not the realist’s aim. We are left hoping that the woodlands will offer Sylvia their “gifts and graces” even while we know that in the meantime she remains a “lonely country child” (239).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Pay close attention to the function of point of view and the use of narrative interruption in part 2 of “A White Heron.” Explain how the commentary and commands that enter the narrative contribute to the reader’s understanding of what Sylvia is experiencing. Do you think that this way of managing the closing scenes adds to or detracts from the power of the story?
2. Contrast Jewett’s presentation of Sylvia’s relationship to the white heron that pauses for a minute on a branch not far from her with the way Thoreau presents his narrator’s relationship to the loons that he describes near the end of the “Brute Neighbors” chapter in Walden. Explain how each author manages tone in these scenes and how tone contributes to our interpretation of the events described.
3. Explain how Stephen Crane’s presentation of nature in “The Open Boat” differs from Jewett’s presentation of nature in “A White Heron.” Select specific scenes that support your observations. Is it possible to make the argument that Crane’s view of nature as indifferent to human experience is not as different from Jewett’s as might at first appear?
4. How do you interpret Jewett’s ending to “A White Heron”? Why is it important that Sylvia’s future be left uncertain?
5. Why do you think Jewett chose to write about Sylvia at age nine rather than, say, 12 or 14? Explain how her age influences the way you interpret the story.

The Country of the Pointed Firs (1896)

The 21 chapters that make up The Country of the Pointed Firs possess an undeniable coherence established through the consistent voice of the unnamed narrator and Jewett’s skillful management of primary themes and central characters. Critics have tended to view this work as Jewett’s masterpiece because in it she takes to fruition her multiple gifts as a writer, not the least of which was her sensitivity to the landscape and inhabitants of New England. Whether or not the book qualifies as a novel, however, will continue to be a matter of debate largely because the work does not present a single plot that develops chapter by chapter, leading to multiple crises that culminate in climax and resolution. Instead, the book reads more as a sequence of episodes or encounters that make a pronounced impression on the narrator. For this reason, perhaps, it makes sense to approach this work as a love story, one in which the object of love is the rural seaport of Dunnet Landing. The narrator urges such a perception in the opening pages when she observes that truly knowing “a village like this and its surroundings, . . . is like becoming acquainted with a single person” (Jewett, Country 1). When she immediately extends the village-as-person metaphor, admitting that, as with people, “falling in love at first sight is as final as it is swift”

(1–2), we begin to wonder whether what we have in store is the intimate disclosure of such a love. This is indeed what we get, but it is not the interior record of the lover's journey of discovery; rather, the narrative presents scenes that leave us in the position of explaining what it is about them that provokes the narrator's admiration.

In our initial encounter with Jewett's narrator, she is described as "a lover of Dunnet Landing returned to find the unchanged shores of the pointed firs" (2). We see her from the outside, as the "single passenger landed upon the steamboat wharf," and we join the "fine crowd of spectators" that follows her "with subdued excitement." When she admits us into the interior of her experience, as she does in chapter 2 and continues to do for the rest of the book, it is with the understanding that every detail is already dear to her heart, and that we are trusted to share her affection. In our efforts not to betray that trust, we must discover the value she perceives in the experiences she describes, seeing with our own eyes the beauty she points to but does not explain. The little we know of the narrator is that she is a writer, and this fact contributes to our efforts to account for her descriptions. We learn that she was "bound" to complete a "long piece of writing" that she cannot seem to give her complete attention because she is so captivated by the sights and sounds of village life (6). She confesses that when she listens to her landlady, Mrs. Almira Todd, she does so "with an idle pen in my hand" and attempts to escape the distraction: "I resolutely fled temptation, and walked out past the fragrant green garden and up the dusty road" (9). But her efforts are futile; she admits that for her "it was impossible not to listen," and even in the act of fleeing, her attention is drawn to the "fragrant green garden" and the "dusty road." In a last effort to complete her writing and close herself off from the world around her, she rents a schoolhouse empty for the summer, and for a time she feels "most businesslike" in her single-minded dedication. Yet even here she acknowledges that when "a sheep-bell tinkled near by," her "wandering wits" were called to it and her "sentences failed to catch these lovely summer cadences" (14–15). At last she forgoes all efforts to write and instead yields to the world that intrudes on her imagination and that she is unable to express fully through the artificiality of writing.

All of this is to say that Jewett structures her opening chapters so that we want to know what it is that so fascinates the narrator and feel relieved when we learn that the narrator will simply give us the world around her instead of attempting to contain it in her writing. This is Jewett's way of writing the author out of her story so that we learn to view what follows as what really exists, free of the constraints of literary form. Doing so defines Jewett as a realist writer, who strives to present the world in objective terms so that we see humanity and the natural world as they actually are rather than as we would like them to be or as society tells us they should be. One aim of the story is to illuminate the trials and triumphs of ordinary New Englanders, so that even as we discover what is best about them, we do so with knowledge of the hardships they must endure. The characters who appear on Jewett's pages for this reason gain what beauty they possess in the face of many struggles. Jewett's strong women characters, such as Mrs. Todd and her mother, Mrs. Blackett, demonstrate their strength by overcoming disappointments and rising above the loneliness and isolation that are so often close at hand. They achieve peace with the natural world not because it lifts them out of suffering or suddenly yields transcendent moments, but because they respect its power, regard it closely, and savor whatever delights it offers. Jewett's male characters also struggle but frequently exhibit the crippling effects of lost love or failed ambition that take them out of the present and prevent them from being grounded in themselves and their circumstances, the way the central women characters are.

Mrs. Todd is perhaps the most powerful female presence in Pointed Firs, and we are given insight into her character early in the book. As chapter 2 concludes, the narrator tells us that the older woman is a widow, who in her youth "had loved one who was far above her" (7). Mrs. Todd herself explains that “he come of high family, an’ my lot was plain an’ hard-workin’” (8). She does not bemoan her social position or begrudge her lover the life he has led; she simply admits that “them feelin’s comes back when you think you’ve done with ‘em, as sure as spring comes with the year.” We later learn that Mrs. Todd was happy with her husband, Nathan, who died before knowing that her heart belonged to another. She does not deny that her life has included sorrows, but she does not linger over them; rather, she absorbs what life holds out to her and is perhaps for that reason described as “a very large woman” who has managed to draw sustenance even from hardship (2). It is also fitting that Mrs. Todd is an herbalist, whose broad knowledge of local plants enables her to survive by selling spruce beer and herbal remedies. All these facets of her character seem to gather around her at the conclusion of chapter 2, where Jewett invests her with the timeless mystery of the ancient past that she embodies in the present: “She stood in the centre of a braided rug, and its rings of black and gray seemed to circle about her feet in the dim light. Her height and massiveness in the low room gave her the look of a huge sibyl, while the strange fragrance of the mysterious herb blew in from her little garden” (8). Here the imagery of circles reinforces her timelessness, as if to say that she is the most recent incarnation of a female figure whose presence circulates through all the ages, while reference to the sibyl gives her an oracular power here linked to her intimate knowledge of the natural world.

The male characters are less impressive, though each in his own way possesses admirable qualities. Captain Littlepage is the first male we meet, and his name expresses his limited though significant appeal. We quickly learn that he is a dedicated reader who developed a particular interest in Milton’s Paradise Lost during his many years at sea. This turns out to be a key to his character, and we begin to see that he is a person whose understanding of the world is perhaps overly filtered through the written word and seafaring lore. His initial words are a quotation from Paradise Lost, which triggers the narrator’s recollection of Mrs. Todd’s observation that the good captain “had overset his mind with too much reading” (17). The narrator herself states that he looks “as if he had suffered from loneliness and misapprehension.” A few pages after this, a swallow hotly pursued by a kingbird flies into the schoolhouse where the two are conversing and bangs against the walls before escaping, “but Captain Littlepage took no notice whatever of the flurry” (19). Unlike the narrator, who cannot hold the real world at bay in order to lose herself in writing, the captain is insulated from that world by the heightened language he has absorbed from others.

As a consequence, he is quick to condemn the younger generation as small minded: “There’s no large-minded way of thinking now,” he tells us; “the worst have got to be the best and rule everything; we’re all turned upside down and going back year by year” (21). His misapprehension, as it turns out, is his belief that life can be lived on the epic scale conveyed in the works of Milton and Shakespeare, so that all else pales in significance. It is difficult not to imagine that Jewett is poking fun at the romantic imagination, as expressed though Emerson’s famous transparent eyeball passage in the opening pages of Nature, where he states that during moments of transcendence the concerns of daily life are reduced to mere trifles. Captain Littlepage’s transcendent moment takes the form of a story he was told by an old Scotsman he boarded with while shipwrecked and recovering from a fever in the Far North. The story is about a town in the Arctic that serves as “a kind of waiting-place between this world and the next” and promises to unlock the secret of the life to come (24). Captain Littlepage believes that he “chanced to learn of one of the greatest discoveries that man has ever made,” and this knowledge casts the rest of his life in shadows; his attention remains steadfastly riveted on the “great exploit” to take place “some o’ these days” (27). Mrs. Todd’s reflection that “he used to be a beautiful man” effectively captures the way a noble life can be misdirected by literature and romantic tales distanced from actual experience (29).

Johnny Bowden seems to embody the admirable male, keeping his feet firmly planted on the ground while submitting to the authority of Mrs. Todd and happily uniting his own practical interests to those of the powerful women who surround him. We meet Johnny when he joins the narrator and Mrs. Todd as the two women make the boat trip to Green Island, where Mrs. Todd's mother lives. Mrs. Todd is clearly in charge, commanding the narrator to "let me do things my way" and declaring that Johnny is an acceptable companion because he is her "cousin's son" and "mother'll like to have him come." Mrs. Todd also points out that Johnny will "be down to the herrin' weirs all the time we're there, anyway" and will not present a burden (32). "[We don't want to carry no men folks havin' to be considered every minute an' takin' up all of our time." The subordination of male power clearly invoked in this language is further reinforced as the dory pulls away from the wharf and a male voice advises Mrs. Todd that her boat is "lo'ded bad" and "won't never get out to Green Island" (33). Mrs. Todd responds by dismissing the male speaker's judgment with such force that he walks "indignantly away."

The events that take place on Green Island forcefully illuminate Jewett's interest in the harmonious exercise of matriarchal authority. This is a theme that she has already introduced through the narrator's friendship with Mrs. Todd and that she will return to with particular force in later chapters when she presents the Bowden family reunion. Jewett's aim in these chapters is to communicate the beneficial influence of female wisdom, and readers must decide whether her doing so results in the displacement of male power or an effort to balance the social scales that have long favored patriarchy. In the Green Island chapters, readers see how men are relegated to the background so that the joys of female sociality might be more fully explored. Mrs. Todd's brother, William, is for this reason cast as unusually shy and predisposed to hover on the margins, much as Johnny Bowden does. This enables Jewett to focus our attention on the women, especially

Mrs. Todd's 86-six-year-old mother, Mrs. Blackett, who is introduced as eternally youthful and warm hearted: "She was a delightful little person . . . with bright eyes and an affectionate air of expectation like a child on holiday. You felt as if Mrs. Blackett were an old and dear friend before you let go her cordial hand" (36). We soon learn that Mrs. Blackett is a goddess of hospitality whose ready sympathy enables her to anticipate her guest's every need. In her we are reminded of Rachel Halliday, the Quaker matron of Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, who also makes her home a version of heaven on earth. As the day on Green Island concludes, the narrator acknowledges her deep contentment: "It was impossible not to wish to stay on forever at Green Island, and I could not help saying so" (52).

The theme of matriarchal harmony achieves its fullest expression in the journey to the Bowden family reunion and the reunion itself, during which the narrator "came near to feeling like a true Bowden" and therefore a member of the extended family over which Mrs. Blackett presides (110). Jewett frames this momentous event as an outpouring of primal energies that binds the simple country folk to the ancient past while enabling them to express a nobility of character that lifts them above their humble circumstances. The day begins with Mrs. Todd's carefully examining "the day for herself in its infancy," coming "to an understanding with the primal forces of nature," and concluding that the signs are propitious (83). After Mrs. Blackett arrives, they begin the wagon trip up country to the family seat, encountering people along the way who greet them with such affection that the narrator compares their journey to "a golden chain of love and dependence" that links "the far island" where Mrs. Blackett lives to "these scattered farms" (90). Once they reach the old Bowden house, the celebration assumes a ritualistic pattern described as the outward expression of a timeless human impulse: "We were no more a New England family celebrating its own existence and simple progress; we carried the tokens and inheritance of all such households from which this had descended, and were only the latest of our line” (100). At this point, the family forms a procession to the grove, where a feast awaits them and Mrs. Blackett naturally takes her position at the front. In this environment—where nature and human conduct harmoniously unite—the inner self is free to blossom. Mrs. Todd appears “as alert and gay as a girl,” and the narrator reflects on how often “a narrow set of circumstances had caged a fine able character and held it captive” (105, 107). Structuring the scene in this way enables Jewett to incorporate the realist writer’s belief that people are shaped by nature and external social forces while also suggesting that the acceptance of matriarchal influence is essential to the realization of human potential.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Describe the ways Jewett presents Captain Littlepage as a man who lives too much in his mind and fails to acknowledge the natural world and the lives of those who surround him. Do you think that Jewett creates this character as a critique of the romantic imagination that Emerson presents in the transparent eyeball passage that appears near the beginning of Nature? How are Jewett’s aims as a realist writer realized through her development of Captain Littlepage?
2. Look closely at the male characters in this book and compile a list of characteristics that you see Jewett presenting as most desirable in a man. Be sure to consider Johnny Bowden and Captain Littlepage, but also take into account the Reverend Mr. Dimmick and Elijah Tilley.
3. Make a comparison of the scenes that Jewett sets on Green Island at Mrs. Blackett’s home with the chapter titled “The Quaker Settlement” in Uncle Tom’s Cabin. Pay particular attention to the parallels linking Mrs. Blackett to Rachel Halliday. Then construct an argument in which you make the case that Jewett was or was not influenced by Stowe’s earlier work.
4. Explain why you think Jewett chooses not to name her narrator and why she presents her as an outsider who stays for the summer months only.

“The Foreigner” (1900)

This story is the fourth Dunnet Landing tale that Jewett wrote after publishing The Country of the Pointed Firs. It provides insight into the role of motherhood in that work, in addition to detailing further the hardship and isolation of life in rural Maine. Through the course of events related by the same unnamed narrator who appears in Pointed Firs, we learn the tragic experience of Mrs. Tolland, a French Catholic woman who married into an old Dunnet Landing family but was never accepted by village society. Much of the tale is related as a story within a story that is told by the narrator’s landlady, Mrs. Todd, who recalls the circumstances surrounding Mrs. Tolland that took place 40 years earlier. Mrs. Todd thinks of the previous event because an August storm that is raging outside reminds her of the storm that was blowing on the day of Mrs. Tolland’s death. She also recalls this event because Mrs. Tolland died in the absence of her mother, and Mrs. Todd is worried that the high winds and roaring waves driven by the present gale pose a danger to her mother, who lives on Green Island. In the final moments of her life, Mrs. Tolland experiences the spirit visitation of her own mother and takes comfort in the certainty of reunion with her in the next life. Mrs. Todd, who witnessed this event and actually saw the ghost of the dying woman’s mother, also takes comfort from this event. Knowledge of the reunion ahead leads Mrs. Todd to the conclusion that there is a world beyond, and our aim in this life is to bring the two worlds together: “‘We’ve got to join both worlds together an’ live in one but for the other’” (186)—which is to say that the spirit of all-embracing motherhood should be the guiding force in our mortal lives.

Mrs. Todd’s conclusion is particularly important because it first occurred to her years before she met the narrator and helps explain why she has been so welcoming of the other woman, despite the fact that the narrator is a temporary visitor to Dunnet Landing. The spirit of motherhood that so interests Jewett is most clearly expressed by Mrs. Todd’s mother, who refused to support the

6. The issue of environmental conservation plays a central role in many of Jewett's works. Explain how you see Jewett dealing with conservation in "A White Heron" and at least one other work.
7. Explain how "The Foreigner" introduces Mrs. Todd in a manner that clarifies her role in The Country of the Pointed Firs and adds to our understanding of her relationship to her mother.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

(1807–1882)

Great is the art of beginning, but greater is the art of ending.

(Elegiac Verse)

In “My Lost Youth,” the most celebrated American poet during the 19th century reminisced about his childhood in Portland, Maine. He recalled imaginative stimuli he experienced growing up in a coastal town: the “fort upon the hill” reminding the boy of frontier fights and the War of 1812; the “Spanish sailors with bearded lips” who awakened curiosity about other countries and languages; the city’s surrounding woodlands and neighboring ocean, which impressed on him a love of nature; and the comfort he found in “the friendships old and the early loves” of what seems to have been a mostly untroubled boyhood. The second son among eight children of Stephen and Zilpah Wadsworth Longfellow, Henry was born on February 27, 1807, and grew up in Portland’s first brick house. He began school at age three and saw his first poem, “The Battle of Lovell’s Pond,” published in the Portland Gazette in 1820, about the same time he passed his entrance examination for Bowdoin College. Longfellow’s adult writings drew upon influences from his childhood in Maine but also on literatures from distant countries and times. It was an old Lapland song he would invoke as the refrain to “My Lost Youth” even though the education that prepared him for college emphasized classical Greek and Latin.

Bowdoin was a small country college when Henry and his older brother entered as sophomores in 1822, yet his classmates included Franklin Pierce, a future president of the United States, and NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, who would reach eminence as a writer of fiction. Literary societies provided opportunities for writing and public speaking and inspired dreams of lives devoted to beauty among collegians responding to early stirrings of romanticism. Both Longfellow and Hawthorne conceived ambitions for literary careers even though there were as yet no models of Americans attaining practical success as authors. Although Longfellow’s father, an attorney, urged him to study law, the young man whose commencement address argued in defense of “Our American Authors” experienced a stroke of good luck when the college offered him a professorship in modern languages if he would spend the next three years in Europe learning French, Spanish, Italian, and German so that he could teach them on his return. While abroad, he met Washington Irving, read in contemporary and traditional literatures, assimilated ideas of German romanticism, and gathered impressions he would later publish in Outre-Mer (1833), a collection of prose sketches influenced by Irving’s Sketch Book.

Back in Maine, Longfellow toiled to develop teaching materials for his classes in Romance languages and German; most of his publications in the early 1830s were textbooks, though he also wrote articles about European literature for the North American Review. Even the poems he wrote in those years were mostly translations of European verse for use with his students. In 1831 he married Mary Potter, a Portland neighbor. When Harvard University offered Longfellow the Smith Professorship of Modern Languages, the young couple left Maine for Europe and another period of study and imaginative development for the aspiring poet. Unfortunately Mary Potter Longfellow suffered a miscarriage in the Netherlands and died in Rotterdam in November 1835. Her grieving widower sought distraction in study and travel. While in Switzerland, Longfellow met the family of Nathan Appleton, a wealthy Boston merchant, and fell in love with Appleton's daughter Frances, then only 17. Returning to America, Longfellow settled in Cambridge and devoted himself to his duties at Harvard even as he continued a long courtship. This was a fruitful period for Longfellow as a writer. His most ambitious prose work, Hyperion, a Romance, appeared in 1839; it drew on his European travels but offended Fanny by featuring a thinly veiled fictionalization of his pursuit of her. In poetry he concentrated on lyric poems he thought of as "psalms," which appeared in Voices of the Night (1839); shortly afterward, Ballads and Other Poems (1842) expanded his reputation with "The Wreck of the Hesperus," "The Skeleton in Armor," and "The Village Blacksmith," among other poems that would remain popular for a century or more. Many of them borrowed European verse forms and traditions and applied them to present American subject matter. In 1842 Longfellow returned to Europe, where he strengthened his acquaintance with authors including Charles Dickens. Perhaps inspired by Dickens's attacks on societal injustice, Longfellow composed Poems on Slavery (1842) on the return voyage. Although he generally kept personal control of his earnings from publication, Longfellow devoted proceeds from that book to the New England Anti-Slavery Tract Society.

When Longfellow finally married Frances Appleton in July 1843, her father gave the couple as his wedding gift the house on Brattle Street near Harvard where Longfellow had been renting a room. Craigie House had a distinguished history, having been George Washington's headquarters during the siege of Boston during the Revolution; after Longfellow made it his home and gradually improved his property, the house became a kind of public landmark known to American readers of that century, who took great interest in the homes and lives of celebrated writers. Longfellow's many admirers treasured poems like "The Children's Hour" that reflected the happy family life Henry and Fanny enjoyed with their six children. In those years both that house and their summer home at nearby Nahant were centers of hospitality for European and American guests, many of them authors. Longfellow's poems appeared regularly in magazines before being collected in The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems (1845) and The Seaside and the Fireside (1850). Meanwhile, he promoted the careers of aspiring poets with two collections, The Waif (1845) and The Estray (1846). The introductory poem for the latter was "Pegasus in Pound," which the young EMILY DICKINSON mentioned in an 1851 letter that expressed the hope that Longfellow's success conveyed to young writers "who please ourselves with the fancy that we are the only poets, and everyone else is prose" (Letters 56). Yet, Longfellow maintained his own interest in prose, and his only novel, Kavanaugh, a Tale (1849), also attracted Dickinson's admiration.

Stories could be told delightfully and memorably in poetic form as well as prose, as Longfellow had already shown with his ballads. In this same period of intense literary activity, he turned his ambitions toward book-length verse narrative in Evangeline, a Tale of Acadie (1847). Drawing on a legend reported to him by the Reverend Horace L. Conolly (a friend of Nathaniel Hawthorne, who had failed to interest the Salem author in developing this material), Longfellow told of a little-known historical injustice in colonial North America when British authorities drove French settlers from Acadia in Nova Scotia. He focused his story on the wanderings of Evangeline, who becomes separated from her fiancé, Gabriel, when the exiles are loaded indiscriminately onto boats bound for distant destinations after their lands are confiscated and their idyllic village of Grand-Pré burns to the ground.

Her search for Gabriel takes her to the bayous of Louisiana and the forests of Michigan, ending in plague-stricken Philadelphia, where Evangeline is finally reunited with Gabriel on his deathbed in a charity hospital. Experimenting with dactylic hexameter (the meter of Greek and Roman epics), Longfellow wove this story of “affection that hopes, and endures, and is patient” into a new kind of American epic that honored a woman’s steadfast courage rather than manly skill in warfare and exposed wrongs done a French Catholic community at a time when virulent anti-Catholicism and anti-immigrant hostility raged in his United States. The poem also celebrates American landscapes and the diversity of its communities. Evangeline became highly successful in Europe as well as the United States. Despite critical attacks on his choice of meter, Longfellow enjoyed tremendous popularity as this poem went through hundreds of editions over the next decades. Other lengthy narrative poems celebrating American history and landscapes followed. The Song of Hiawatha (1855) retold legends from Chippewa culture in a distinctive trochaic meter Longfellow borrowed from the Kalevala, a Finnish folk epic. This turned out to be the most marketable poem of the 19th century, outselling even Evangeline; it was adapted, performed, and parodied regularly. The Courtship of Miles Standish and Other Poems (1858) completed this group of long historical narratives with its comic tale of the courtship of Longfellow’s own ancestors, John Alden and Priscilla Mullins, in Plymouth Colony’s first winter while suggesting mythic implications for America in the maiden’s choice of the man of letters over the soldier. While writing that story from the New England past, Longfellow started work on two dramatic poems dealing with Puritan persecution of Quakers and suspected witches. These were the “New England Tragedies” that he eventually grouped within a three-part dramatic project known as Christus: A Mystery (1872), whose three sections (devoted to Christ’s time, the Middle Ages, and colonial America) allegorized the virtues of faith, hope, and charity.

After resigning his professorship in 1854—partly because he had eye problems but largely because he found he could support his family comfortably by his publications—Longfellow became an increasingly public figure as the wise and beloved American poet. On July 9, 1861, however, disaster struck his family when the poet’s wife died in a tragic accident: Fanny Longfellow incurred fatal burns when her dress caught fire as she attempted to preserve her daughters’ curls with sealing wax. The poet, who rushed to her rescue, suffered disfiguring facial burns that prevented him from shaving for the rest of his life and required him to wear the full gray beard that characterized his public image. More important, he was left to raise their children and to attempt to recover poetic momentum despite intense personal grief and his country’s disunion. Longfellow’s way of coping with sorrow was to absorb himself in demanding poetic projects. In these years, he wrote collections of narrative poems based on both American and European subjects that appeared in sequential parts of Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863, 1872–73). Even more ambitious was Longfellow’s translation of Dante’s Divine Comedy (1865–67) into English blank verse, a linguistic and artistic challenge for which he enlisted help from James Russell Lowell and Charles Eliot Norton as friendly advisers who gathered for weekly readings and critique. The six sonnets Longfellow wrote to preface this three-volume edition speak eloquently of the grief underlying both his and Dante’s art and testify to his belief in poetry’s healing power.

Although neither The Divine Comedy nor Christus proved popular with the general readers for whom Longfellow had made poetry accessible, comforting, and sometimes inspiring, he remained a beloved literary figure in his later life and continued writing and publishing new poems. Meanwhile, collected editions of his work abounded and new books appeared, right up to the aptly named Ultima Thule (1880), the second part of which appeared just after he died of phlebitis in 1882.

The aging Longfellow was received by Queen Victoria and was awarded honorary degrees by both Cambridge and Oxford Universities on his last visit to Europe in 1868–69; at home his portrait hung in classrooms and his poems were memorized by generations of American schoolchildren. He was besieged by visitors and by correspondents writing for autographs. Statues of Longfellow in public parks around the country testify to widespread respect, and he became the only U.S. writer memorialized in the Poet's Corner of Westminster Abbey.

Yet the plummeting of Longfellow's literary reputation that started in the 20th century marks his career as the phenomenon of a particular point in American literary history when this humane and gentlemanly figure embodied an ideal of poetry as pleasing, readily understood, and kindly instructive. EDGAR ALLAN POE's absurd charges of plagiarism against the poet, whose chief offense was his popularity, softened into critical recognition that his ideas tended to be conventional and his stories and forms (however varied) derivative. Longfellow would represent the limitations of "the genteel tradition" in American writing by contrast with original voices like those of Poe, WALT WHITMAN, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, and Dickinson. Classified as one of the "fireside" or "schoolroom" poets along with his friends James Russell Lowell, John Greenleaf Whittier, and Oliver Wendell Holmes on the basis of their appeal to middle-class families gathered around the fireside to read for a night's diversion and of their frequent appearance in school curricula, Longfellow retained some influence. Perhaps his most important contribution was in marking out a place for poetry in the United States. One of those who responded to his inspiration was the most popular American poet of the next century. When Robert Frost titled his first book A Boy's Will for its initial publication in London, he trusted his American and English readers to recall Longfellow's haunting words, "A boy's will is the wind's will, / And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts."

"Hymn to the Night" (1839)

This poem appeared in Longfellow's first book, Voices of the Night, where it immediately followed the "Prelude" in which he recalled sweet childhood visions but recognized that he must now confront adult cares and awareness of mortality—taking into his heart and expressing in his verse "All solemn Voices of the Night, / That can soothe thee, or affright." His poems would acknowledge the fearful and melancholy moods he shared with his readers, but they would also echo the night's soothing voice more than its dismaying ones.

"Hymn to the Night" personifies Night as a goddesslike woman. Although her skirts are "sable," there is nothing gothic in Longfellow's evocation of her darkness; those skirts are "fringed with light" reflected from "marble halls" and "celestial walls" that suggest the heavenly origin of this visitor, whom the speaker hears and feels more than sees. Sensing her presence, he experiences a "spell of might" and loving comfort. Sustained by her support, he hears "sounds of sorrow and delight" but draws "repose" from the trustful mood evoked by Night's gift for mediating griefs and even transforming them into beauty. After recounting his experience in the first four stanzas, the speaker responds in the last two with prayer directed to "holy Night," a prayer of devotion and gratitude more than of invocation. Rather than asking for release from care, he gives thanks for confidence that he can "learn to bear / What man has borne before." Having experienced peace, he prays that it continue.

As a lyric poem in the romantic mode, "Hymn to the Night" recalls a setting or situation and evokes a mood. Longfellow's goal was to summon feelings of peace such as he claimed to have experienced during this night vision. The title word hymn suggests a worshipful mood, and his personification of Night lifts the reader's thoughts toward heaven or perhaps some mythic Elysium better suited to the speaker's likening of himself in the last stanza to Orestes in Greek mythology.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Why do you suppose Longfellow chose to personify night as a woman, and what textual details in this poem help you to imagine this figure? How does she interact with Care? How else might night be personified—perhaps by a gothic or a comic writer? How does the feminine presence in this poem differ from that expressed by Poe in "To Helen"?

2. Make note of all the rhymes you find in this poem. Do they seem predictable, or do you find any of them surprising? How many other rhyme words can you think of for Night, and what would be the effect of substituting one or more of those at specific points in this poem?
3. What elements of this poem remind you that it was written a long time ago? How well does it address today's anxieties and the darkness people confront today?

"A Psalm of Life" (1839)

Although Longfellow referred to several poems in Voices of the Night as "psalms," this is the only one he directly titled to show its relation to biblical tradition. As the psalms of David expressed many moods, including anger, dread, and gratitude, this poem conveys its author's sometimes contradictory feelings. It differs from scriptural psalms, however, in not being a prayer addressed to God but a sort of one-sided debate. Longfellow's subtitle, "What the Heart of the Young Man Said to the Psalmist," suggests an internal dialogue between his role as poet/psalmist and his personal feelings as an ambitious and still relatively young person attempting to find his place in the world.

The speaker's retort to advice the psalmist has presumably given in "mournful numbers" suggests to us the melancholy burden of wisdom that mature counselors sometimes transmit to youth: "Life is but an empty dream"; "Dust thou art to dust returnest." Attentive readers of Longfellow's poetry recognize in the psalmist's message the poet's knowledge of sorrows, disappointments, and anxieties that he tried to help readers endure. Yet the young man's rejoinder here speaks for Longfellow also in his determination to make his life matter for his own fulfillment and the good of those he might influence. The voice readers find heartening declares the young man's rejection of the psalmist's doleful perspective.

Longfellow used multiple poetic techniques to lend force to the young speaker's challenge. Imperative verbs introduce the poem ("Tell me not") and recur with increasing force, generally at start of lines ("Be a hero," "Trust no Future," "Let us, then, be up and doing"). Additional emphasis results from frequent exclamation points and from the driving trochaic rhythm Longfellow chose in reversal of familiar iambic patterns. Also emphatic is the speaker's habit of refuting advice that discourages hope. If the psalmist warns that life leads inexorably to death, the young man rejoins that the soul remains immortal. If life is a struggle, then he urges bold resistance. Rather than yield to anxiety, he counsels valiant action. However dispiriting the general condition of men and women may be, "Lives of great men all remind us" of human potential for noble achievement and of the possibility that one's individual quest for glory may inspire others. The poem ends with the famous exhortation to action, effort, achievement, and, a bit surprisingly, patience.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the simile of "Footprints on the sands of time" that Longfellow develops in stanzas 7 and 8. How much comfort does this figure of speech convey if studied carefully?
2. This poem reflects the "can-do" American spirit of the Jacksonian era, when it was written, but cultural historians tell us that the period was also characterized by frequent business failures, by medical and public health problems leading to widespread early deaths, and by high levels of anxiety among people striving either to better their condition or to stave off loss of status. The popularity of "A Psalm of Life" suggests that Longfellow responded to mixed feelings among his readers. How do the two voices in this poem articulate different responses to life's problems, and do you find either voice fully convincing?
3. How well do you think Longfellow's attitudes and advice in "A Psalm of Life" suit conditions young Americans face today?

“The Wreck of the Hesperus” (1841)

Storytelling emerged as one of Longfellow’s poetic strengths. Although long narrative poems such as Evangeline and The Song of Hiawatha became his most popular writings for readers of his time, his first experiments in telling versified tales took the form of ballads such as this one and “The Skeleton in Armor,” both of which appeared in Ballads and Other Poems. Romantic literary tastes reawakened interest in English and Scottish folk ballads collected by Thomas Percy and Sir Walter Scott, and Longfellow had developed a fondness for German ballads when in Europe. Such poems related stories briefly (usually beginning with an event near the plot’s climax) and dispensed with background information and descriptive detail. In “The Wreck of the Hesperus,” the narrator says nothing about the ship’s voyage before the outbreak of the storm and leaves us to guess circumstances that might have caused the skipper to risk his child’s life by taking her on this expedition. Only three characters are mentioned, though the line “Then up and spake an old Sailør” suggests a larger crew. In keeping with ballad tradition, Longfellow relied on dramatic dialogue to advance the plot: first, when the skipper ignores the Spanish sailor’s advice to seek shelter from the approaching gale and later when the daughter directs three parallel questions to her father about alarming sounds and sights. Although it is the skipper’s prideful decision that dooms the ship, Longfellow assigns him few words. We discover his overconfidence from the “scornful laugh” with which he rebuffs the sailor and the paternal protectiveness with which he reassures the child. After the reversal of the father’s death (“A Frozen corpse was he”), the daughter invokes her heavenly father for rescue—with no happier result. The reader learns her fate along with the fisherman who discovers the maiden’s body still lashed to the wrecked ship.

As do the singers of folk ballads and the authors of broadside verse, Longfellow took as his topic an event of current interest, a shipwreck that occurred on the Massachusetts coast only a few weeks before he wrote this poem in December 1839. He claimed that the poem came to him “not . . . by lines, but by stanzas” as the work of one inspiration-filled night. Seeing opportunity to cultivate an American ballad literature, he adopted the typical ballad stanza of English and Scottish tradition with quatrains composed of alternating four-stress and three-stress lines in which only the second and fourth lines typically rhymed. Rather than use simple word choices characteristic of his time, as was typical of folk ballads, Longfellow imitated some of the archaic qualities 19th-century readers would have noticed in story-songs collected from earlier periods. The poem’s musical features made it easy to remember, and “The Wreck of the Hesperus” remained popular long after Longfellow turned to less restrictive forms of narrative poetry.

For Discussion or Writing

1. A convention of folk ballads is an impersonal narrator who represents a public voice rather than his or her own feelings. How well did Longfellow follow this convention? Are there parts of the poem that make you aware of the narrator’s point of view?
2. Why did Longfellow place his emphasis on the little girl in telling this story? Does she remind you of other children in literature? What impressions does he convey of her relationship with her father? Point to textual evidence that shows the narrator’s interest in this character. If you were to develop this story, what possibilities do you see for expanding on what this brief story tells us about her?
3. Compare this poem with an American folk ballad like “Frankie and Johnny” or an English ballad like “Sir Patrick Spens.” What shared elements do you find in the ways stories are told?

“The Arsenal at Springfield” (1844)

Longfellow credited a conversation with his bride, Frances Appleton, as his inspiration for this poem.

On their wedding trip, the couple visited the U.S. Arsenal at Springfield, Massachusetts, along with Charles Sumner, the poet's most politically active and reform-minded friend. In this storehouse of weaponry, Fanny commented to her husband that the array of metal gun barrels reminded her of a vast organ likely to produce "mournful music." That simile, along with Sumner's argument that governmental resources would be better spent on education than war preparations, guided Longfellow's thoughts as he composed this poem. Another factor in his thinking may have been apprehension that his country would reproduce the tragic history of European wars that he knew about from his continental travels and remembered while writing poems he grouped with this one in The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems.

The organ image begins in the first stanza with the poet's attention to the "silent pipes" of the warehoused firearms in time of peace. Images of sound dominate the following quatrains as he anticipates "What loud lament and dismal Miserere / Will mingle with their awful symphonies." "Miserere" ("Have mercy") calls to mind Gregorian chants of European Catholic tradition, while "symphonies" represent that Continent's classical and romantic music. Choral music and its echoes move the imagery closer to the United States in the 1840s, though most imagery throughout this poem relates sounds to violence throughout the world—sounds the poet condemns for overpowering "Nature's sweet and kindly voices." His hope, in this distinctly pacifist poem, is for a peaceful future when sounds of discord yield to "holy melodies of love."

Stanzas 9 and 10 pick up on Sumner's critique of distorted priorities that favor military spending over investment in social development. Were half the resources spent on manufacturing and storing weapons invested to "redeem the human mind from error, / There were no need of arsenals or forts." By imagining citizens who valued contributions to the public good over fighting and nations that were honored for maintaining peace rather than making war, Longfellow envisaged a better future for humanity and a world more consonant with Christ's saving mission.

Longfellow's use of poetry's musical resources reinforces this poem's theme and dominant image pattern. Variants in iambic pentameter rhythm lend emphasis to opening words in several lines, while the additional unstressed half-foot that typically ends the first and third lines of each stanza contributes to the poem's quieting effect as force yields to peace. Even the prolonged vowel tones and multisyllabic words Longfellow favored in phrases like "The diapason of the cannonade" reinforced the tone of measured hopefulness appropriate to a poem envisaging conversion of weapons into books and musical instruments.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Analyze patterns of imagery in this poem by identifying and discussing images of harsh or frightening sounds. How do those relate to images you find of melodic sound? From what parts of the world and what times in history did Longfellow take his examples of sounds?
2. How does Longfellow's poem compare with Julia Ward Howe's "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" in its tone, imagery, and assumptions about religious justifications for war?
3. Does Longfellow's simile likening guns to an organ serve as effectively today as it did in the 1840s? If so, how would you adapt his imagery to fit modern weapons? If not, what other figure of speech might you suggest for armaments used in recent wars?

"The Jewish Cemetery at Newport" (1852)

As it did for many Longfellow poems, inspiration for this one arose from his travels—in this case, the surprising connection he found between memories of European cities and observations on his visit to the old Jewish burying ground at Newport, Rhode Island, during a summer 1852 vacation. Like the Touro Synagogue in Newport, that cemetery had been dedicated in the 18th century for use by the coastal city's Sephardic Jewish population. Finding this little-known offshoot of European ghettos in a New England town very similar to his native Portland, Longfellow focused this poem on historical continuities and transitions and developed his thoughts through a pattern of imagistic, thematic, and tonal contrasts.

The first contrast matches a sense of the foreign against expectations of the familiar: "How strange it seems! These Hebrews in their graves, / Close by the street of this fair seaport town." The opening stanza contrasts the stasis of this graveyard with the activity of Newport and the tidal rhythms of the Atlantic Ocean over which these wanderers sailed in their earthly exodus, which recalled that led by Moses even as it anticipated "the long, mysterious Exodus of Death." There are contrasts also between European and Anglo-American cultures, between Judaism and Christianity, and between various levels of the past and the present. Biblical names resonate throughout the poem, reminding readers of a shared Judeo-Christian past that has been differently understood by followers of two great religions of the Book. These Hebrew immigrants, as Longfellow imagines them, encountered endless exile while fleeing Spanish persecution. Although drawn to a bustling city in the most tolerant of the New England colonies just when the American Revolution established a country dedicated to belief in human equality, they seem a people without a future. The community Longfellow depicts must be reconstructed from imagination, as he observes no ongoing life of Jewish worship. Only some kindly "hand unseen" maintains these graves and suggests that the alien dead experience some slight measure of acceptance in their American haven.

Equally important are tonal contrasts between pathos and peace, despair and respect. The reader feels Longfellow's anger against intolerance as well as his gratitude for whatever peace these strangers may have found on earth or in heaven. The "certainty of faith" in immortality he attributes to these Hebrew dead, however, seems more reflective of Christian than Jewish belief. Longfellow holds out no hope of Jewish acculturation or advancement in this poem, which consigns these children of Abraham to the graveyard of "dead nations." He represents the migrants as haunted by the past, reading history backward in light of God's covenant with their people in biblical times just as readers of Western alphabets experience the reading of Hebrew (read from right to left) as "backward."

Despite the poem's gloomy tone and conclusion, Longfellow treats these buried exiles with characteristic dignity and compassion. Recurring themes of his poems were human brotherhood and commitment to tolerance—sometimes with regard to European religious persecutions and at other times with respect to New England Puritan oppression of Quakers or English-American Protestant displacement of French-speaking Catholics. Not uncommonly, he chose Jewish lore for his poems as in Judas Maccabæus, one of his dramatic tragedies, or Tales of a Wayside Inn, in which the Spanish Jew recounts "The Legend of Rabbi Ben Levi." Sometimes, even in one of the tales narrated by the Spanish Jew, he also developed story material from the Islamic world. Overall, Longfellow's poems up to "The Bells of San Blas"—written on his deathbed—reflect expectations that history will move away from divisiveness toward unity, away from violence toward peace, and away from any one religion as a dominant force.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Point out and discuss Longfellow's use of Old Testament biblical allusions in this poem, paying particular attention to his reference to wandering Jews as "these Ishmaels and Hagars of mankind" (l. 32). Is there anything surprising about his use of this particular reference? If so, what? What do these allusions add to the piece as a whole?
2. How does Longfellow's treatment of Jews as a people consigned to the past relate to treatments of Native Americans in his poems and in fiction from the 19th century? Works you might want to consider are James Fenimore Cooper's novels such as The Pioneers and/or The Last of the Mohicans, William Cullen Bryant's poem "The Prairies," or Lydia Sigourney's poem "Indian Names." Cite examples to justify your response.

"Paul Revere's Ride" (1861)

This classic of American patriotic narrative verse first appeared in the Atlantic Monthly and then in Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863), a collection of story poems loosely connected in the style of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Longfellow imagined a group of travelers entertaining each other with stories at an old inn in Sudbury, Massachusetts, just outside Concord. The landlord tells this tale, after which a student, a Sicilian, a Spanish Jew, a theologian, a poet, and a Norwegian musician all take turns. Although many of their stories originated in Europe, "Paul Revere's Ride" develops an incident from American history at the start of the revolution. Longfellow took poetic liberties with events of April 18 and 19, 1775, omitting William Dawes and Samuel Prescott, who also rode to "spread the alarm" about advancing British troops. He focused intently on one man, Paul Revere, a silversmith and member of the Sons of Liberty, as his representative heroic citizen.

After the landlord's invitation to the reader in the opening stanza, the poem divides into two main narrative sections: the first characterized by watchful waiting for the signal from the belfry of the Old North Church and the second dominated by urgent motion of horse and man. Quietness is associated chiefly with Revere's friend, who watches the enemy's movement from the church window until he discerns their strategy and displays two lanterns to signal their plan for a naval approach. Imagery in this portion of the poem focuses first on the stillness of the colonial city and its graveyard and then on Revere's restless motions as he prepares to vault into the saddle and begin his famous ride "through every Middlesex village and farm." Once Revere springs into action, Longfellow allows no further luxury of description but hurries the reader from town to town as Revere awakens farmers to rally at Concord. Urgent motion and intensity of purpose engage the poet's attention rather than the full story. "You know the rest," Longfellow's landlord tells his listeners; there is no need to tell about Revere's being captured that night or details of battles. This patriot lives in the reader's imagination as perpetually in motion.

Time figures prominently in this story on several levels. First, there is the landlord's perspective on history—the interval between the events of the revolution and memories of Longfellow's contemporaries. Then there is the psychological disparity in sense of time between the friend's savoring of the last moments of peace and Revere's eagerness to jump into action. More obviously, his progress in the night ride is marked by village clocks counting off the hours between midnight and two in Medford, Lexington, and Concord. Dark imagery dominates the night scene, with the glint of the two lanterns and the spark struck out by Revere's horse breaking the gloom as those hooves "kindled the land into flame."

For Discussion or Writing

1. Although "Paul Revere's Ride" concerns the American Revolution, Tales of a Wayside Inn appeared during the Civil War at a particularly discouraging time for Union supporters. How might circumstances of the time have influenced readers' responses to this poem and to its concluding lines?
2. Longfellow began this poem with the command "Listen," and he gave us much to attend to in the sound patterns of this poem. Read the poem aloud several times to hear the effect of metric emphasis and variation. Can you identify a prevailing beat? How well do the sounds convey the situation? Consider alliteration and repeated words and phrases in your response.
3. Another famous poem dealing with this same historical occasion is Ralph Waldo Emerson's "Concord Hymn." Compare Emerson's lyric with Longfellow's narrative poem as different ways of honoring citizens defending freedom.

“Killed at the Ford” (1867)

Longfellow’s love of America showed itself in his choices of historical subjects for many of his major poems and in his detailed representations of landscapes from the West and South as well as his native Northeast. Before the Civil War his allegorical “The Building of the Ship” (1849) celebrated national union. Fanny Kemble, one of that period’s great actresses, regularly performed sections of that poem in theatrical readings, moving audiences to tears with the concluding stanza that began,

Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O UNION, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

Later President Abraham Lincoln is reported to have wept upon hearing these lines and remarked, “It is a wonderful gift to be able to stir men like that.” Yet Longfellow held back during the war years from taking upon himself the public role of poetic chronicler that could have been his because of his literary prominence. Never a champion of war, Longfellow had little interest in chronicling battles and was absorbed and depressed for personal reasons after his wife’s tragic death. His oldest son, Charles, volunteered for the Union Army, however, and was wounded in military service. “Killed at the Ford” is concerned with bereavement caused by war.

The speaker in this poem is not Longfellow but a soldier mourning a friend from his unit. He tells the story of the youth’s last mission, his being shot from sudden ambush, and failed attempts to save him. There is no particular heroism in this narrative—simply the quick annihilation of a life that held great promise. The opening stanza, with its elegiac tone, bewails the loss of this beautiful, brave man who was evidently born for leadership: “The heart of honor, the tongue of truth.” The second shows him cheerful in the midst of danger. Clearly the nation as well as the military unit have suffered great loss. In the last stanza, Longfellow shifts focus from the area of fighting to the home front and a “vision” of the fatal bullet’s trajectory beyond the young soldier’s breast into the heart of his lover and leaves us grieving for her as well. A characteristic detail in a Longfellow poem is that the young man was humming a song in the midst of danger that seems to have been a ballad about another brave fighter from some earlier war. Sadly the “two red roses he had on his cap” and “another he bore at the point of his sword” foreshadow physical evidence of his own death when his friend observes, “Two white roses upon his cheeks, / And one just over his heart, blood-red!”

For Discussion or Writing

1. What might Longfellow have been implying when he drew a connection between roses in a ballad about youthful courage and this man’s fatal wounds? Was he making a contrast between fighting and poetry?
2. Compare “Killed at the Ford” with one of Walt Whitman’s or HERMAN MELVILLE’s poems about Civil War soldiers.
3. How effectively does this poem about personal and public loss, about the courage and mutual loyalty of soldiers, and about the effects of war speak for Americans of our time as we try to express our feelings about deaths of men and women in military service?

“Nature” (1878)

As did many other English and American poets, Longfellow often challenged himself to work within the formal limitations of the sonnet. He composed sonnets on his personal griefs in “Mezzo Cammin” and “The Cross of Snow”; sonnets on great poetic forebears, “Chaucer,” “Shakespeare,” “Milton,” and “Keats”; and sonnets relating to his translation of Dante’s Divine Comedy along with others on various themes such as this treatment of “Nature.” The form required him to develop his poem in 14 lines of iambic pentameter divided by both logic and rhyme into predictable units of

HERMAN MELVILLE (1819–1891)

To produce a mighty book, you must choose a mighty theme. No great and enduring volume can ever be written on the flea, though many there be who have tried it.

(Moby-Dick)

Herman Melville's reputation as a writer has fluctuated wildly. Although his first literary efforts won him instant popularity and widespread acclaim, this early success soon proved short-lived. The more unconventional his later writings became, the more his public standing declined, so that in the final decades of his life his works were generally unread and he himself was largely forgotten. He died in relative obscurity, and it was not until the 1920s that his critical fortunes revived. Almost overnight his huge but neglected masterwork, Moby-Dick, was widely recognized as one of the greatest novels ever composed, while Billy Budd, the much shorter tale on which he was working when he died, was proclaimed as another classic. In the decades since then, Melville's stature has continually grown, so that today he is considered one of the finest writers the United States has ever produced.

Born on August 1, 1819, in New York City, Herman was the third child (the second son) of Allan Melvill (who spelled his name without a final e) and his wife, Maria Gansevoort. Eventually the family consisted of four sons and four daughters, and life at first was comfortable. Maria, the mother, was a pious woman from a respectable family; her father had been a hero during the Revolutionary War. Allan, meanwhile, was himself of distinguished lineage and had established a successful business, importing fine French merchandise. Even in the weeks immediately after Herman's birth, however, Allan had begun to complain to relatives that business was stagnant, and although the family moved repeatedly during these years from one pleasant residence to another, Herman's father incurred increasing debt and had begun to borrow extensively from his relatives. Herman, meanwhile, began attending school at age five and, by age nine, had begun to distinguish himself both in public speaking and in mathematics; he was even selected as a leader and instructor of other students (Allen 21). By 1830, however, Allan Melvill was bankrupt, and so the family relocated to Albany, New York, home of Maria's family. There Allan took a job as a clerk in a fur store, while young Herman continued to do well in school. However, his life and the lives of his mother and siblings were forever disrupted by the untimely death of Allan Melvill on January 28, 1832, after a bout of pneumonia.

Fortunately Herman's older brother, Gansevoort (who added a final e to the family name), was now established in the fur business, and Herman, at age 13, also began working as a clerk in a bank his ancestors had helped found and operate. For the time being, the family's fortunes were stable, and Herman, during these early teenage years, worked not only in the bank but also, during the summer, on a relative's Massachusetts farm, as well as in his brother's fur store at the end of the schoolday at the Albany Classical School. At that school he showed a talent for writing, an interest in reading, and a gift for debating, and, with his whole family, he was exposed to Calvinist doctrine through their membership in the local Reformed Dutch Church (Allen 29). Calamity struck the Melvilles again, however, in 1837, when Gansevoort's business went bankrupt and Gansevoort himself suffered a lengthy nervous breakdown. By this time the family had relocated to the small town of Lansingburgh, near Albany; meanwhile, Herman tried to supplement the family income by teaching school near Pittsfield, Massachusetts, where his uncle Thomas lived. Frustrated by this brief experience as an educator, he returned to Lansingburgh to study surveying, with the intention of working as an engineer on the Erie Canal, although eventually nothing came of this plan. In the meantime, he had begun publishing short articles in the local newspaper. By this time, too, he had also begun to think of going to sea, inspired by the stories of a cousin who had recently returned from a lengthy whaling expedition. On June 3, 1839, he joined the crew of a packet ship called the St. Lawrence, which was soon bound for Liverpool, England, where it arrived on July 3. Although dismayed by the grimy, depressing poverty of Liverpool, Melville had now developed his first real taste for life as a sailor.

When he eventually returned to Lansingburgh in fall 1839, Melville found his mother's financial condition more desperate than ever. Her home was being threatened with foreclosure, and she had been forced to begin selling some of her furniture. After another failed venture as a teacher, Herman, accompanied by a friend, set out in mid-1840 for Illinois, where his uncle Thomas had moved. While there he traveled by steamboat on the Mississippi River (an experience later reflected in his novel The Confidence-Man), but he soon gave up hope of establishing himself in the Midwest, returning in late fall 1840 to New York City, where he now decided to return to sea once more. He headed for New Bedford, Massachusetts, the center of the American whaling industry, and signed on with the Acushnet, a new vessel, whose crew list described him as follows: "Herman Melville: birthplace, New York; age, 21; height, 5 feet 9 1/2 inches; complexion, dark; hair, brown" (Allen 48). The ship set sail on January 3, 1841; it headed for the South Atlantic, in search of whales, then made the dangerous passage around the southern tip of South America, eventually reaching the vicinity of the Galápagos Islands before then sailing to the Marquesas. By this point the ship had already succeeded in capturing and processing a number of whales for their oil, and by this point, too, Melville had already heard stories of a famous and deadly white whale called Mocha Dick or Moby Dick (Allen 49). Life aboard ship was sometimes exciting but also often tedious, hot, strict, and literally unappetizing, and so, not long after the Acushnet reached the Marquesas on June 23, 1842, Melville and a young friend and crewmate named Richard Tobias Greene decided to desert. In early July they managed to escape five miles into the interior of the island where their ship was anchored, and for several weeks an injured Melville lived with the Typee people while Greene sought help. His experiences with these people later formed the basis for his first (and extremely successful) novel, called Typee, which embellished some facts but was effectively written.

Soon after leaving the Typee, Melville was back at sea, having joined on August 9, 1842, the crew of an Australian ship named the Lucy Ann, also in pursuit of whales. Before long, he and more than a dozen other sailors rebelled against an unpopular first mate while the ship was anchored off the coast of Tahiti; Melville and the others were subsequently arrested and confined on shore. When the Lucy Ann set sail again in mid-October, he and his fellow rebels were set free by their indulgent Tahitian jailor. Accompanied by a former fellow crewman, Melville wandered various Tahitian islands for several weeks (an experience that provided the basis for his later novel Omoo) before he eventually signed on with a Nantucket whaler, the Charles and Henry, on November 4, 1842. The ship arrived in Hawaii on April 27, 1843, and Melville was officially discharged from its service on May 4. While in Hawaii he worked at a number of jobs (including setting pins in a bowling alley), but on August 17 he joined the crew of a U.S. Navy ship called the United States, where he witnessed severe discipline, including vicious floggings. For almost a year the ship sailed the Pacific, visiting various ports, before it eventually rounded the tip of South America and returned to the United States, arriving in Boston harbor on October 3, 1844. After being discharged, Melville quickly headed for Lansingburgh, where his family, fascinated by his tales of life at sea, encouraged him to prepare them for publication. By spring 1845 he had finished his first long narrative, based loosely on his desertion in the Marquesas. A New York publisher, while recognizing that it was extremely well written, rejected it because it seemed too improbable to be accepted as a true story; a British publisher initially had the same worries but eventually printed the work, as did a different American publisher. Thus Melville's first book (called Typee in its American edition, with a much longer title in Britain) appeared in February 1846.

Typee was generally well received by the general public and professional critics alike, although some people objected to its satire of Christian missionaries, and others found it hard to accept as a reliable account of true events. Such skepticism was partly quieted when Richard Greene, Melville's fellow deserter, was interviewed and testified to the book's basic veracity. In any case, Melville's career as a successful professional writer was now well launched, and his standing as a popular writer was confirmed with the publication, in spring 1847, of Omoo, based essentially on his wanderings in Tahiti. This book earned him even more money than Typee had and, although he was unsuccessful in seeking a full-time government job in Washington, D.C., that year, he nevertheless felt sufficiently secure financially to marry, on August 4, Elizabeth Shaw, daughter of the chief justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Court and a longtime friend of Melville's own sisters. The young couple set up residence in a home in New York City also occupied by one of Melville's brothers and his wife, by four of Melville's unmarried sisters, by Melville's mother, and, occasionally, by another brother. During these early years of his marriage Melville contributed articles to a local magazine and developed friendships with writers, editors, and publishers. Meanwhile, he read voraciously and had begun working on a new book, Mardi, also set in the South Seas but dramatically different in tone, style, and intent from his first two books. Allegorical, satirical, dark, and highly imaginative, the book, which appeared in spring 1849, disappointed the readers and critics who expected tales of lively adventure from its author's pen. Melville (who was now a father as well as a husband) quickly produced a new book, Redburn, which was designed to sell. Based on his own first sea voyage to England, it appeared in fall 1849 and was soon followed by another narrative (White-Jacket) calculated to appeal to the same readers who had admired Typee and Omoo. This latest book, which was based on Melville's service in the U.S. Navy, appeared early in 1850. Melville himself had little respect for either Redburn or White-Jacket; he considered writing them a job to earn cash rather than a serious literary undertaking.

It was during summer 1850 that Melville, while vacationing in Massachusetts, met the noted author NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, whose dark thoughtfulness made a powerful impression on his new young friend. Melville now began reading Hawthorne's works with enthusiasm; he admired what he saw as Hawthorne's unflinching determination to pursue truth in his writings, even if that truth proved tragic and disturbing. This encounter with Hawthorne could not have occurred at a more propitious time, for Melville had now begun work on a new novel—a book designed to deal with the subject of whaling. As the book evolved and eventually became the masterpiece now known as Moby-Dick, it grew to enormous proportions and developed into a work unlike anything Melville himself (or anyone else, for that matter) had ever written before. Into this massive, mighty work, Melville poured all the depths of his mind and soul; it became (in style, scope, subject, and ambition) a kind of prose epic, full of drama and adventure but also full of poetry and profound thought. Melville must have realized as he was finishing it that it would never be a “popular” book in the way that most of his earlier works had been, and he was right. After it appeared in fall 1851, it received mixed reviews: Some critics recognized its power, but many others complained about its length, its style(s), and its highly unconventional design. Thus the book that is now considered Melville's masterwork became, in his own day, the beginning of the end of his popular success.

A different kind of person (or Melville himself just a few years earlier) might have tried to recover from the relative failure of Moby-Dick by producing an appealing potboiler or two. Instead, Melville wrote Pierre: or, The Ambiguities (published in the second half of 1852)—an odd, strange novel, with a perfectly appropriate subtitle, that involves murder, possible incest, and multiple suicides. This book was an even greater failure than Moby-Dick, and Melville's wife now began to worry about the mental health of her increasingly depressed and exhausted husband. By 1853 he was the father of three children, but his future as a professional author was decidedly uncertain, and efforts to obtain other employment had been unsuccessful. When a fire at his publisher's warehouse in December 1853 destroyed most of the remaining copies of his books (books that were no longer selling well, in any case), Melville had even further reason to despair. Fortunately he was able to earn some income between 1853 and 1856 by publishing more than a dozen stories or sketches in magazines. Some of these (including "Bartleby, the Scrivener" and "Benito Cereno") were republished in book form in 1856 as The Piazza Tales, and in the previous year Melville had also published a new novel, Israel Potter. However, although both "Bartleby" and "Benito Cereno" are now considered among Melville's finest works, none of these publications did much to restore his popularity with his contemporaries, and readers of his own day were likewise unimpressed by The Confidence-Man, a cynical, satirical novel set on a Mississippi steamboat and published in spring 1857. In the next three years Melville also failed as a speaker on the lecture circuit, and in 1860 his literary fortunes had sunk so low that he could not secure a publisher for a collection of poems he had written. Another attempt to secure a government job in 1861 was unsuccessful, and in 1862 Melville was badly hurt when he was thrown from a wagon. By this time, of course, the United States was also embroiled in the Civil War, which nearly destroyed the nation. Gloom had thus settled over Melville's personal life as well as over the life of the country as a whole.

Melville responded to the war by writing a series of poems that were eventually published, in 1866, as Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War, but the major piece of good fortune in his life at this time occurred later that year, when he finally secured steady employment as a customs inspector at the port of New York. Melville held this position for the next two decades; it gave him a regular income, but his career as a prominent, published author was now essentially over. For a time in 1867 it seemed as if his wife might leave him, and in fall that year the couple's eldest son shot and killed himself (whether the death was deliberate or accidental remains unclear). Another son died early in 1886 (not long after Melville's retirement from his customs post), and the literary offspring Melville produced during these final decades were essentially stillborn: Clarel, a long poem, was published in 1876 thanks to the financial support of a friendly uncle, while his late poetic works John Marr and Other Sailors (1888) and Timoleon (1891) were privately printed in editions of only 25 copies each. When Melville died on September 28, 1891, his passing was largely unnoticed outside his immediate family, and it was not until the "Melville revival" of the 1920s that Billy Budd, one of his last and one of his greatest works of prose, was discovered among his manuscripts and published to wide acclaim. Finally, more than 30 years after his death, Melville had at last begun to achieve widespread public recognition as one of the most thoughtful, most talented, and most provocative authors his nation had yet produced.

"Hawthorne and His Mosses" (1850)

In this review (originally published in two parts) of Nathaniel Hawthorne's Mosses from an Old Manse (a collection of short stories), Melville, posing as a Virginian visiting New England, extols Hawthorne's works in ways that reflect Melville's own literary ambitions. He praises Hawthorne for his commitment to truth telling, even (and especially) if that effort involves exploring the darker aspects of human experience. In addition, by praising Hawthorne as a specifically American writer who is worthy of comparison with Shakespeare and with other great authors of the past, Melville calls for national pride in the accomplishments and potential of American literature.

Melville's essay is important in the first place as one of the first great appreciations of Hawthorne's writings. Indeed, Hawthorne's wife considered it the first published essay ever to convey accurately the true scope of her husband's achievement. However, the essay is also important for two other reasons: First, it announces many of Melville's own deepest aspirations and values as a writer; and, second, it was composed during a time when Melville, having met and been influenced by Hawthorne, was revising Moby-Dick. Thus the essay is significant in large part as a series of reflections, by Melville himself, on what he was trying to achieve in his own greatest novel. Melville praises Hawthorne, for instance, for his "contemplative humor," a "humor so spiritually gentle" that it might almost be called "the very religion of mirth" (Tales 49). These comments are important, for they suggest a good deal about the humor that pervades Moby-Dick—a humor that helps make that book so emotionally complex. Equally revealing is Melville's praise of Hawthorne for his "depth of tenderness" and his "boundless sympathy with all forms of being"—a sympathy that amounts to an "omnipresent love" (Tales 50). Clearly these comments are relevant to Moby-Dick, especially to the relationship between Ishmael and Queequeg and to the loveless, egotistic monomania of Captain Ahab. Most famous, however, is Melville's assertion that balancing and deepening Hawthorne's humor and sympathy is a darker perspective—a perspective that Melville describes as being "shrouded in a blackness, ten times black" (Tales 51), and a blackness that enhances, through contrast, the brighter aspects of Hawthorne's work. Hawthorne, in other words, was willing to face up to the fact of evil in the world; there is in his work (according to Melville) "a touch of Puritan gloom," for "this great power of blackness in him derives its force from its appeals to that Calvinist sense of Innate Depravity and Original Sin, from whose visitations, in some shape or other, no deeply thinking mind is always and wholly free" (Tales 51). In these words we sense Melville's own fascination with human evil and corruption—a fascination reflected in his depiction of such memorable characters as Ahab and Fedallah in Moby-Dick or John Claggart in Billy Budd. Melville admires Hawthorne for some of the same reasons that he admires Shakespeare: He appreciates them for being willing to confront the ugly and terrifying aspects of reality, for being willing to tell unpleasant truths. Such traits, he says, are "the things that make Shakespeare, Shakespeare. Through the mouths of the dark characters of Hamlet, Timon, Lear, and Iago, he craftily says, or sometimes insinuates the things, which we feel to be so terrifically true, that it were all but madness for any good man, in his own proper character, to utter, or even hint of them. . . . For in this world of lies, Truth is forced to fly like a scared white doe in the woodlands; and only by cunning glimpses will she reveal herself, as in Shakespeare and other masters of the great Art of Telling the Truth, —even though it be covertly, and by snatches" (Tales 53). Obviously Melville aspired to be this kind of truth teller, especially in Moby-Dick, and his essay on Hawthorne is essentially his own literary manifesto, his personal declaration of his deepest purposes as an author.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Use Melville's essay as a guide for interpreting some of Hawthorne's short stories, such as "The Birth-mark" or "Young Goodman Brown." How do Melville's ideas about theme, character, tone, and purpose seem to apply to these works? At one point Melville says that although "it is that blackness in Hawthorne, of which I have spoken, that so fixes and fascinates me," it is nevertheless possible that such darkness "is too largely developed in him. Perhaps he does not give us a ray of his light for every shade of his dark" (Tales 52). Is this comment relevant at all to the two stories just mentioned?

2. How are such Shakespearean characters as Hamlet, Timon, Lear, and Iago relevant to our understanding of Melville's fiction, especially Moby-Dick? How does Ahab (for instance) resemble Lear? How does Fedallah resemble Iago? Does any character in Moby-Dick resemble Hamlet? Do any themes from Hamlet and King Lear seem relevant to Moby-Dick?

A young man who calls himself Ishmael, bored with and depressed by life on land, decides to join the crew of a whaling ship, where he is quickly befriended by a kindly Polynesian pagan named Queequeg. Soon, however, Ishmael also encounters the grim, maniacal, but imposing Captain Ahab—an obsessive yet eloquent man who is determined to pursue and kill a famous white whale named Moby Dick, whom Ahab considers the embodiment of evil and whom he blames for crippling him by biting off his leg in an earlier encounter. Eventually, the maddened captain succeeds in tracking down and attacking the giant whale, but his obsession results in death and destruction for himself, his ship, and his entire crew—all except Ishmael, who survives to tell the tale.

Melville begins this novel—his greatest work and one of the triumphs of world literature—by focusing not on Ahab or the whale but on Ishmael and Queequeg, two of the most appealing fictional characters ever created. Most readers reading Moby-Dick for the first time, and knowing only that the book has a reputation as a dark and tragic epic, will be surprised by the wit, humor, and droll comedy of the opening chapters. Melville had a sure comic touch, and it is nowhere more in evidence than in the beginning of this book. Ishmael memorably reports, for instance, that he tends to go to sea when he finds himself feeling depressed or bitter: “whenever I find myself involuntarily pausing before coffin warehouses, and bringing up the rear of every funeral I meet,” or whenever he finds that “it requires a strong moral principle to prevent me from deliberately stepping into the street, and methodically knocking people's hats off—then, I account it high time to get to sea as soon as I can. This is my substitute for pistol and ball” (3). In other words, rather than committing violence against others or killing himself, he sails the world's oceans, knowing that “meditation and water are wedded forever” (4).

Humor of this sort proliferates in the opening chapters, but it (as does everything else in the novel) serves multiple purposes. Thus, the comedy of the book's opening helps intensify the tragedy that will eventually ensue. The self-deprecating, self-mocking humor of Ishmael helps emphasize, by contrast, the brooding darkness of Ahab when we meet him later. The early references to coffins and funerals foreshadow the deaths that eventually overtake everyone except (ironically) Ishmael himself. Meanwhile, Ishmael's humor cannot disguise (in fact, it highlights) his thoughtfulness, his wisdom, and his breadth and depth of character. From the start he seems an intelligent, perceptive, humble man—a person who is capable of appreciating the world and of laughing at himself, and thus a man who is much better balanced than the monomaniacal Ahab. As Ishmael himself later puts it with his typically understated wisdom, “A good laugh is a mighty good thing, and rather too scarce a good thing; the more's the pity. So, if any one man, in his own proper person, afford stuff for a good joke to anybody, let him not be backward, but let him cheerfully allow himself to be spent in that way. And the man that has anything laughable about him, be sure there is more in that man than perhaps you think for” (29). Surely these last words apply to Ishmael himself. He instantly seems an attractive character; we like him and want to see what happens to him, and thus Melville immediately makes us want to read further.

One of the most memorable events for Ishmael is, of course, his early encounter with Queequeg, the tattooed Polynesian harpooner (allegedly a head-hunting cannibal) with whom Ishmael is forced to share a bed in a cheap and seedy inn. When Ishmael first enters the inn (while looking for inexpensive lodging), he immediately spots an old, grimy “oil-painting so thoroughly be-smoked, and every way defaced, that in the unequal cross-lights by which you viewed it, it was only by diligent study and a series of systematic visits to it, and careful inquiry of the neighbors, that you could in any way arrive at an understanding of its purpose" (12). Obviously this painting, which dimly depicts a huge whale attacking a ship in stormy seas, symbolizes Melville's own novel—a book that, as with the painting, will yield up its secrets only in response to "diligent study" and "systematic visits" and "careful inquiry." Melville, in short, is not simply writing a straightforward and exciting adventure story (although he did produce a work of real excitement); he is crafting a book deliberately designed to suggest mystery and provoke deep and prolonged thought. He tried to create in this book (as in the painting the book describes) "a sort of indefinite, half-attained, unimaginable sublimity . . . that fairly froze you to it, till you involuntarily took an oath to yourself to find out what that marvellous [sic] painting meant" (12–13). The adjectives here are significant: Melville works his wonders by creating complexities, by crafting ambiguities, by dealing in shadows and shades rather than preaching any simple black-or-white message. His novel is so rich precisely because it is so complex. As the dim yet compelling painting does, the book both provokes and rewards close attention and "diligent study."

Ishmael's next memorable encounter is not with a literal painting but with a painted man. As an exhausted but apprehensive Ishmael tries to sleep on a mattress he thinks must be "stuffed with corn-cobs or broken crockery" (20), into his darkened room enters Queequeg, the fearsome roommate he has been awaiting. Queequeg (who has been out late, trying to sell the last of his supply of shrunken heads) is a dark, giant, quiet man who is tattooed from head to foot. As Ishmael watches this "head-peddling purple rascal" in silent fascination (21), the newcomer begins worshipping a tiny black statue—"a curious little deformed image with a hunch on its back, and exactly the color of a three days' old Congo baby" (22). In passages such as this (and they are legion), Melville reveals his wonderful gift for exact and memorable description, while this whole scene shows his talent for vivid contrasts (as in the juxtaposition of the calm cannibal and the nervous paleskin) and his thematic interest in cross-cultural encounters. When the surprised Queequeg discovers an unexpected stranger in his bed, comic mayhem erupts, but after the innkeeper reassures him that Ishmael has paid for a spot in the bed, the unlikely couple settle in for a comfortable snooze. As Ishmael comments, with splendid panache and superb alliteration, "For all his tattooings he was on the whole a clean, comely-looking cannibal. What's all this fuss I have been making about, thought I to myself—the man's a human being just as I am: he has just as much reason to fear me, as I have to be afraid of him. Better sleep with a sober cannibal than a drunken Christian" (24). Ishmael's open-minded tolerance is one key to his character: He is a man with few hardened prejudices, and thus he is capable (as the inflexible Ahab is not) to learn from experience, of overcoming his pride, and of accepting others—and life itself—on their own terms. Ishmael is the butt of Melville's (and the innkeeper's) humor in this opening section of the book, but he is already revealing a capacity for wisdom, friendship, and thoughtfulness that will stand him in good stead throughout the novel.

Few moments in American literature are as laugh-out-loud funny as the first encounter of Ishmael and Queequeg, although the scene the next morning (when Ishmael awakens to discover Queequeg's huge arm draped around him) is not far behind. Melville plays the moment for all its comic overtones, but he also begins to suggest the real bond of affection that has now begun to develop between this unlikely pair. Later, as their friendship grows, Ishmael reports how Queequeg "clasped me round the waist, and said that henceforth we were married; meaning, in his country's phrase, that we were bosom friends; he would gladly die for me, if need should be. In a countryman, this sudden flame of friendship would have seemed far too premature, a thing to be much distrusted; but in this simple savage those old rules would not apply" (51). As the novel develops, we will see that Queequeg is a man of his word: He is willing to put himself at risk not only for Ishmael but also for others, and indeed it is thanks to Queequeg that Ishmael survives the whaling voyage. Ishmael may have begun the novel feeling depressed, aggressive, and isolated, but by chapter 10 he has acquired “A Bosom Friend” (49), and Melville has begun to develop one of the novel’s major themes: the contrast between the democratic fellowship of equal human beings (despite any superficial differences of cultural background or religious belief) and the lonely, proud, tyrannical isolation and domination personified by Ahab. The affectionate bond between Ishmael and Queequeg symbolizes Melville’s best hopes for the wider human community, but the dark destructiveness of Ahab symbolizes his recognition of the dangers of egotism run rampant. By skillfully sketching the appealing bond between Ishmael and his new friend, Melville makes us realize the limitations of the kind of smugly superior “civilization” that can condemn a man like Queequeg as a “simple savage.” In addition, by making us feel (and share) the affection between Ishmael and Queequeg, Melville enhances our sense of the final tragedy of the novel, when an ugly obsession not only destroys Ahab but obliterates this beautiful friendship. Ahab’s death is tragic, but it is Queequeg’s death that opens the most painful wound.

Melville’s talent for creating memorable characters is on display again with the brief but vivid appearance of Father Mapple, an old whale hunter who now serves as preacher at the Whaleman’s Chapel, where both Ishmael and Queequeg (with many others) spend their last Sunday before heading out to sea. Mapple is a comically eccentric character: He not only climbs a rope ladder to enter a towering pulpit that looks like the prow of a ship (and then pulls the ladder up after him!), but also orders his scattered flock to congregate together by proclaiming, “Starboard gangway, there! side away to larboard—larboard gangway to starboard! Midships, midships!” (41). The incongruity of such language used by a preacher makes us laugh, but it also exemplifies one of the charms of Melville’s novel: We are entering a world with its own rules, its own customs, its own lingo—a world with all the fascination of something that is foreign to everyday existence. At the same time, this world is obviously relevant to our own experience. Melville thus manages to put us in exotic surroundings, populated with intriguingly unfamiliar characters, and yet also deal with some of the most timeless issues of human life. Mapple’s sermon is a case in point: He addresses his congregants as “shipmates” (42), and he tells the biblical story of Jonah and the whale as if it had happened yesterday to a man of his own acquaintance (as when the ancient sailors of the scriptural text call each other “Jack,” “Joe,” and “Harry” [43]). Melville thus achieves the kind of colloquial freshness and unexpected twists that help make his book so lively, yet the sermon clearly deals with larger philosophical issues relevant to human life in general and to the later plot of the novel. This is clear, for instance, when Mapple proclaims that “if we obey God, we must disobey ourselves; and it is in this disobeying ourselves, wherein the hardness of obeying God consists” (43). Obviously these words resonate with the plot of Moby-Dick: Ahab will prove himself a man incapable of obeying God by disobeying himself. Similarly relevant are Mapple’s later words when he declares, “Delight is to him—a far, far upward, and inward delight—who against the proud gods and commodores of this earth, ever stands forth his own inexorable self” (48). On the one hand, Ahab is himself an example of this sort of “inexorable self,” and to some degree he earns our admiration for his determination and courage; on the other hand, he is also one of the “proud gods and commodores of this earth” of whom good men (such as Ishmael) must be wary. Father Mapple’s sermon is just one of the many ways by which Melville now begins to complicate and darken the initially comic tone of his book, introducing grim hints of foreboding and already implying the moral and spiritual dimensions of his developing tale.

Forebodings now begin to proliferate. Ishmael and Queequeg sign on as crew members of a ship called the Pequod, which (Ishmael tells us) “was the name of a celebrated tribe of Massachusetts Indians, now extinct as the ancient Medes” (69). Likewise, the Pequod itself will eventually be extinguished. Ahab, the captain of the ship, is nowhere to be seen—a fact that already lends him an air of mystery and that makes his eventual first appearance a matter of suspense. He is described by one of the ship's owners in suitably ambiguous terms: He is "sort of sick, and yet he don't look so. In fact, he ain't sick; but no, he isn't well either. . . . He's a queer man, Captain Ahab—so some think—but a good one. . . . He's a grand, ungodly, god-like man" (78–79). As the contradictions and complexities, the assertions and qualifications, pile up, Melville stokes our interest (as well as Ishmael's) in the mysterious captain, and that interest builds to an even higher pitch when Ishmael and Queequeg are later confronted by a shabby, disfigured stranger, who, calling himself Elijah (the name of a biblical prophet), enigmatically warns them about Captain Ahab's dark past and about their own ominous futures if they choose to sail on the Pequod. Thanks to Elijah's "ambiguous, half-hinting, half-revealing, shrouded sort of talk," Ishmael now begins to feel "all kinds of vague wonderments and half-apprehensions" (93), but for the moment he dismisses them, and he and Queequeg board the ship, prepared to sail. They later discover that Ahab (appropriately enough) has already gone aboard in the darkness of night and is now holed up in his cabin, unseen by most of the crew. The ship sets sail (ironically) on a gloomy Christmas Day—a date normally associated with joy and renewal, but darkened here by Ishmael's description of the Pequod as it "blindly plunge[s] like fate into the lone Atlantic" (105). From now until the very end of the book, Ishmael and his shipmates have left dry land behind. They are now the inhabitants of a small, isolated world (populated, symbolically, by sailors from across the globe) in which a still-invisible and increasingly mysterious Ahab reigns supreme. Only after the ship is well under way does Ahab appear and announce his obsessive purpose: to pursue and destroy the huge white whale that once ripped off his leg, thereby maiming his spirit as well as his body and leaving him thirsty for revenge. Ultimately his quest leads to his own death and to the deaths of most of his crew.

Ahab is clearly one of the most complicated and intriguing figures in world literature, and much of the commentary on Moby-Dick struggles to explain or understand him. He has been compared to Satan (especially the Satan depicted in Milton's Paradise Lost) but also viewed as an embodiment of the Freudian id (uncontrolled by reason or conscience). He has been interpreted as a symbol of humans' protest against fate and limitations but also as a representative of existential suffering and despair. He has been interpreted as a symbol of American imperialism, of capitalist greed, and of the demagogues who either sought fanatically to destroy slavery or who, by compromising with slave owners, symbolically sold their souls to the devil to pursue their narrow political ambitions. On the other hand, Ahab has also been regarded more sympathetically: as a reflection of the universal fear and hatred of all that seems malign and inscrutable in the universe; as a man whose honesty, courage, and suffering make him a genuinely tragic figure; and as a kind of scapegoat who plays out a common human fantasy of slaying pain and banishing deprivation. More commonly, however, Ahab is seen in darker terms: as a totalitarian dictator—eloquent, obsessed, but driven by destructive impulses (a Hitler before his time); as a blasphemous defier of God and of a godly natural order; as the personification of a death wish that destroys others in the process of destroying itself; as an epitome of malevolent egotism; and as a person so driven by hate that he eventually loses all capacity to love. Like all the great tragic figures of Western literature (including Prometheus, Faust, Macbeth, Lear, and Manfred), Ahab seems at once appalling and appealing, repulsive and inspiring, a simultaneous focus of fear and of pity. He is one of the great dark heroes of our culture, and his obsession with the whale becomes an archetypal symbol of any fixation that leads to self-destruction. Ahab sees (or seeks) meaning in the universe, even if that meaning is black and grim. He is a dark quester, handicapped by pride, intent on slaying not a dragon but a whale.

That whale, Moby Dick, has been the subject of almost as much critical speculation as Ahab himself. Some readers have seen the whale as a symbol of the brute facts of existence, with which all humans must come to terms. Others have interpreted the whale as an embodiment of our deepest psychological mysteries, especially the mystery of evil. To some the whale seems both divine and demonic; to others the beast symbolizes fate or predestination; while to others still the whale is an example of the morally indifferent forces of nature. Critics who take a psychological or biographical approach to the novel have interpreted the whale as a symbol of debilitating parental power—imposing limits (almost to a castrating degree) but also inspiring an obsessive response. The whale can be seen as a kind of unloving God, provoking both awe and rebellion, or it can be seen as precisely the kind of nature myth that suited the 19th century: an image of nature as raw and untamed, beautiful but intimidating, and in need (at least in Ahab's mind) of being conquered and subdued. Whales in Moby-Dick are at the center of a great industrial enterprise typical of the increasingly commercial era in which Melville lived, but the white whale is the special object of the kind of mythic hunt that is as old as mankind itself—a hunt that symbolizes man's search for meaning in a puzzling universe.

Although Ishmael, the narrator, has often been overshadowed in critical commentary by Ahab and the whale, he is himself an immensely appealing and intriguing figure. Some analysts have seen him as Melville's alter ego, in both his darker and his lighter aspects (such as his tendency to depression and his capacity for humor). Many see him as the most complex character in the book—a person who, because of his openness, curiosity, intelligence, thoughtfulness, appreciation of irony, and distrust of absolutes, is able to learn, develop, and finally survive to share his complicated wisdom with his readers. Ishmael, it is often said, is the most balanced character in the book; unlike Ahab, he remains unblinkered and not only retains but enjoys a capacity for friendship and love. Unlike Ahab, as well, he can tolerate ambiguities; he feels no need to impose a single, obsessive interpretation on the universe; he is a genial skeptic, and during the course of the Pequod's voyage he leaves his opening depression behind him and learns to appreciate the value of life and love. The story of the book is in one sense the story of Ishmael's mental and moral growth, and as he learns we learn with him. He is our representative among the crew, and although (in one sense) his survival is preordained (for if there were no survivor, there would be no one to tell the tale), in another sense his rescue at the end can be seen either as an example of providence, or as a chance accident, or as a tribute to the qualities of character that make Ishmael so fine a representative of all that is best in human nature. Without intending or seeking to be so, Ishmael is the anti-Ahab, the man of sanity and moderation in a world controlled by a madman.

Moby-Dick is compelling, however, not simply because of its characters or themes or plot but especially because of its style. The range of Melville's language is immense: Sometimes it is colloquial and slangy, while it often attains a dignity and eloquence that reflect its author's intimate familiarity with the Bible, Shakespeare, Milton, and whole shelves of other Western classics. Melville is interested in hard facts (as in his detailed descriptions of the art and science of whaling), but his vocabulary is also often mythic and inspired. He can be funny, but he can also be profound; he can craft long, detailed descriptions but can also create vivid dialogue and write literal drama. Often the novel turns into a play, complete with stage directions, soliloquies, and asides; at other times the narrative suspense and excitement are overwhelming. Melville is sometimes jocular, sometimes meditative; he can spin out long, ever-flowing, ever-growing sentences, or he can be brutally abrupt. Like all great writers, he is, first and foremost, a master of the language, and as his hero Shakespeare did, he coined scores of words, revived many others, played subtle variations on common terms, and seemed (in this book at least) never at a loss for something to say or an inventive way to say it. Moby-Dick impresses us, if for no other reason, as an example of the splendid resources of the English language in the hands of a master writer. No one since Shakespeare had put the language through its paces better than Melville in Moby-Dick; no one was more alive than he was to the sound and rhythm and potential poetry of English prose.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Melville was strongly influenced by Shakespeare. Compare and contrast Moby-Dick with a great Shakespearean tragedy, such as King Lear. How are the two works similar in themes, plot, characterization, and style? What kinds of sympathy do we feel for Lear and Ahab? Is either man a more tragic figure than the other?
2. Melville was a great admirer of Hawthorne. How does Ahab in Moby-Dick resemble Aylmer in "The Birth-mark," particularly in terms of motivation, character, behavior, and ultimate fate? How do the two characters differ? In what way is each destructive? Is there any way in which each is admirable?
3. Moby-Dick has often been called an epic in prose. Examine some common definitions of the epic genre and read about some famous examples of epic poems (such as Homer's Odyssey, Dante's Divine Comedy, or Milton's Paradise Lost) and then discuss the ways in which Melville's novel exhibits epic elements. How does Ahab, for instance, resemble or differ from Homer's Odysseus or Milton's Satan?
4. Discuss how Moby-Dick deals with the ideals of democracy. In what respects is the novel specifically American, and in what respects is it relevant to people throughout the world?
5. How is Moby-Dick both similar to and different from MARK TWAIN's (Samuel Langhorne Clemens's) Huckleberry Finn, especially in its use of colloquial language, its use of humor, its use of the motif of a journey, and its presentation of relations among people of different cultures and races?

"Bartleby, the Scrivener" (1853)

A good-natured elderly Wall Street lawyer describes the eccentric people he employed in his office, including a man nicknamed Turkey, a scrivener (or copyist) who worked most effectively before noon; a man nicknamed Nippers, a scrivener who worked most effectively after noon; and Ginger Nut, a young boy who ran office errands. Deciding that he needed more assistance, the lawyer hired a quiet, withdrawn scrivener named Bartleby, who, although he performed his copying effectively, soon exasperated everyone in the office by repeatedly saying that he would "prefer not" to help with most of the normal work. Bartleby's quiet noncompliance with most of the typical expectations of life eventually led new owners of the office to have him evicted and sent as a vagrant to prison, where he refused to eat and eventually died, much to the befuddlement and pain of his former employer.

This story—perhaps Melville's best and certainly his most famous work of short fiction—is by turns funny, mystifying, and pathetic. It is full of memorable characters, and although (by design) nothing much "happens" in terms of plot, the story creates real suspense as we wonder what will eventually happen to a nonconformist as genially but firmly uncompromising as Bartleby. Much response to the story centers around efforts to determine why Bartleby behaves as he does, what his behavior may signify or symbolize, and how to assess the motives and response of the puzzled lawyer. As so often in Melville's fiction, the story raises far more questions than it answers; its value lies less in any specific points it makes than in the thought and debate it provokes. Lea Newman, in her overview of responses to the tale, provides an exceptionally fine guide to the reactions the work has elicited.

Many readers have seen in the character of Bartleby a reflection of Melville himself. According to this interpretation, Bartleby symbolizes Melville's own increasing distance, withdrawal, and alienation from the standard expectations of the society of his time. Both men are writers who prefer not to conform to the dictates of others, even if their nonconformance leads to their ostracism, financial peril, and eventual demise. Just as Bartleby is an efficient copyist at first, so (according to this line of thought) Melville was initially a popular writer who knew how to satisfy the tastes of a broad audience; and just as Bartleby increasingly retreats into a life of isolated contemplation, so did Melville exasperate his original readers by turning his back on the common literary fashions of his day. He refused any longer to be a mere "copyist" or imitator, thereby rejecting not only the standards of his era but also the ethos of commercial publishing, in which writing was seen first and foremost as a means to make money and earn a living. Bartleby thus symbolizes (for these readers) a repudiation of basic American values, in which a person's worth is measured by his or her wealth and commitment to financial success. Just as Melville became increasingly distant from well-meaning friends and family who worried about his mental health as his career as a conventional author declined, so Bartleby provokes similar concern in the lawyer through a similar withdrawal and refusal to conform.

A broader interpretation of the story focuses less on its relation to Melville's personal predicament and more on its relation to the broader problems of American society as a whole. According to this view, Melville uses this story to satirize the emptiness, pointlessness, and soullessness of the money-making business ethic that increasingly controlled American life and culture. The fact that the story takes place on Wall Street, in the very center of the main U.S. financial district (and the center of the American stock market), is, for these readers, no accident, while the fact that Bartleby spends so much of his time staring at a blank brick wall symbolizes the stultifying, soul-destroying impact (at least on any truly thoughtful person) of a life devoted merely to commerce and profit. From this perspective, the lawyer embodies many of the worst aspects of the capitalist system, including a tendency to think of other people simply in terms of their financial value and commercial usefulness, as well as a smug, self-satisfied complacency that never questions the value of a shallow, comfortable, but ultimately empty existence. The lawyer tolerates the eccentricities of Turkey and Nippers because they are literally valuable to him: These men help enrich his coffers, and, unlike Bartleby, they never rebel or pose a serious challenge to his selfish and self-satisfied way of life. They are useful, compliant cogs in the enormous machine of capitalist enterprise, whereas Bartleby, by quietly repudiating the capitalist ethic, engages in a kind of sit-down strike that leaves the lawyer-narrator frustrated and nonplussed.

Some readers, however, see an admirable evolution in the lawyer's attitude toward and treatment of Bartleby. If at first the lawyer regards Bartleby as simply a useful employee, and if he subsequently becomes frustrated by Bartleby's noncompliance and lack of productivity, eventually (and especially by the end of the tale) he regards Bartleby as a kind of friend—someone about whom the lawyer truly cares in a genuinely selfless way. He repeatedly visits Bartleby in prison, tries to make sure he is fed there, and seems truly disconsolate when he learns that the scrivener has passed away. By the conclusion of the story the lawyer has begun to demonstrate some real compassion and charity, although his fellow feeling arises (perhaps) too late and cannot prevent Bartleby's death. In his other-worldly peace of mind and rejection of mundane standards, Bartleby has been interpreted by many critics as a kind of Christ figure, and they regard his eventual effect on the lawyer as transformational to some degree. Other readers, however, strongly question whether the lawyer has really learned anything of value by the end of the tale or whether he has fundamentally changed.

In addition to being compared to Christ, Bartleby has been linked to Buddhist withdrawal and to Hindu asceticism, and his death has been interpreted as a kind of achievement of Nirvana or nothingness (Newman 58). At the same time, his utter lack of conventional motivation has been read as a kind of self-destructive psychiatric condition, resembling schizophrenia, while his maddening treatment of the lawyer has been interpreted as a sort of passive-aggressive hostility. His plight has additionally been seen as foreshadowing the ideas of 20th-century existentialism (in which each person must choose his or her own response to a world that seems fundamentally absurd and without objective meaning). From this perspective, the story reflects Melville's own growing nihilism—the philosophy of nothingness in which existence may seem absurd and in which any purposeful action may therefore seem pointless. On the other hand, the story has been interpreted by some analysts as Melville's satire of the transcendentalism so popular during the 19th century and as mockery, in particular, of HENRY DAVID THOREAU's ideals and conduct, especially his withdrawal from society and his belief in passive resistance.

The skill with which the story is written and constructed has often been praised. Here as in so many other works, Melville creates a narrator whose values and perceptions cannot always be trusted; the reader thus becomes actively involved in trying to determine the "true" meaning (if any) of the behavior described. Irony thus plays a major role in this tale, in many ways and on many levels. Meanwhile, the structure of the work has often been seen as consisting of three parts: a first section that describes the routine of the office before Bartleby's arrival, a second section that focuses on Bartleby's disruption of that routine, and a third section that reports the fate of Bartleby after the lawyer vacates his old premises, leaving Bartleby behind. The imagery and symbolism of walls (which imply confinement, isolation, limits, and the absence of natural outlets or alternatives to urban, commercial values) have been the subject of frequent comment, while one of the best insights into the effectiveness of the story was also one of the earliest, when Richard Henry Dana, Sr., writing soon after the tale was published, commented that the work "touches the nicer strings of our complicated nature, & finely blends the pathetic & ludicrous. . . . [Turkey and Nipper] relieve the picture, at the same time that they are skilfully and humorously set off against each other" (qtd. in Newman 66). Certainly the story is one of saddest but also one of the funniest Melville ever composed; it is Dickensian in its presentation of quirky characters; and the befuddlement Bartleby produces in his colleagues often provokes real laughter in Melville's readers. Full of clever dialogue, unexpected twists of plot, and growing suspense, the story reveals Melville near the top of his talent.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine the use of repetition in the story. How does it affect the story's mood?
2. How is "Bartleby" similar, in characterization and point of view, to Melville's "Benito Cereno"? In particular, how does the lawyer in Bartleby resemble Captain Delano in the latter work, and how is the lawyer's reaction to Bartleby similar to the reaction of Delano to Cereno?

"Benito Cereno" (1855)

Captain Amasa Delano and his U.S. ship the Bachelor's Delight encounter a strange Spanish vessel, the San Dominick, a slave ship that seems to be in distress and is populated by a mainly black crew. When Delano goes aboard to investigate and offer help, he hears a tale of sickness, death, and destructive bad weather from Benito Cereno, the obviously distraught captain of the Spanish vessel, who is always accompanied by Babo, a devoted slave who seems to attend faithfully to his captain's every need. Only when Delano is about to return to his own ship does a frantic Cereno jump into Delano's boat and reveal the truth: The San Dominick had experienced a slave mutiny led by the brutal Babo; most of the whites have been ruthlessly slaughtered; and Cereno has been tormented by Babo, who is himself killed as he tries to take vengeance on the terrified Spaniard.

This novella (which, like much of Melville's fiction, is based on a real historical incident) is typical of Melville's work in many ways, including such features as its focus on a central observer (Delano), whose limited perspective is part of the fascination of the tale; its ambiguous exploration of complex moral and social issues; and its concern with the way the same events can be described in different kinds of discourse (such as the third-person narrative of most of the work and the legal "testimony" of Cereno himself that consumes much of the end of the story). The novella is one of the most ironic works Melville ever composed, and it succeeds in creating an air of claustrophobic mystery and growing suspense while also generating real uncertainty about who (if anyone) deserves our sympathy in a tale that sometimes is seen as strongly opposed to slavery and sometimes is seen as reinforcing white racial prejudice. Babo, in particular, has been seen by some readers as a clever, resourceful, and even heroic figure, while others regard him as an embodiment of dark evil—a sadist who tortures both minds and bodies. As have many of Melville's works, this one has inspired intense debate and perplexed thought.

"Benito Cereno" begins, significantly enough, by emphasizing the color gray: "Everything was mute and calm; everything gray. . . . The sky seemed a gray surtout. Flights of troubled gray fowl, kith and kin with flights of troubled gray vapors among which they were mixed, skimmed low and fitfully over the waters" (Tales 182). In a story so much concerned with the complicated relations between blacks and whites, and in a tale so morally complex and so ambiguous in its presentation of limited points of view, this opening stress on such a colorless color seems perfectly fitting, as does Melville's use of such similar descriptions as "shadows," "misgivings," "clouds," "baffling," "uncertainty," "fog," "decay," "masked," and "faded grandeur," which are all employed just within the first few pages of the work (Tales 183–185). Immediately he sets a tone of puzzlement, but the complexity of the atmosphere and setting contrasts with the simplicity of Delano, whose perspective on events is limited by his "singularly undistrustful good nature, not liable, except on extraordinary and repeated incentives, and hardly then, to indulge in personal alarms, any way involving the imputation of malign evil in man." Melville, typically, leaves it to each reader to decide whether, "in view of what humanity is capable, such a trait implies, along with a benevolent heart, more than ordinary quickness and accuracy of intellectual perception" (Tales 183). By the end of the tale (in fact, long before then), it will be clear to most readers that Delano's "good nature" and "benevolent heart" prevent him from perceiving very quickly the true character of the circumstances in which he finds himself.

In her superb overview of scholarship on "Benito Cereno," Lea Newman surveys the various ways in which Delano and his tale have been interpreted. Most of the controversy, she notes, has revolved around whether the story should be read primarily as "a metaphysical examination of evil" or mainly as "a sociological exploration of slavery," and then around whether the rebellious blacks should be perceived favorably or unfavorably and therefore whether the tale should be seen as opposing or accepting the fact of slavery (130). Much of this controversy centers on the figure of Babo, who has been seen variously as a symbolic embodiment of the deepest impulses of human evil; as an almost bestial, baboonlike creature who is nevertheless capable of feline cunning; as a kind of satanic being who may, ironically, represent the darkest nature of all people; or as an implicit rebuke to any whites who naively considered blacks childlike beings—natural slaves who will passively accept their lot. Melville, according to some scholars, made the blacks in his story much less sympathetic and more vicious than they had appeared in his source, while he also made the Spanish sailors and their captain more appealing figures than they were in real life. By allegedly making such changes, he made the story (at least according to some analysts) more a philosophical meditation on evil than a political reflection on slavery (Newman 131–132).

Alternatively, many other critics have contended that Melville presents Babo in a favorable light—as an intelligent, courageous leader who does what it takes to free himself and his comrades from slavery; as a heroic liberator who is willing to die for his righteous cause; as an implied warning to Americans of the kind of leaders who would someday rise up and throw off the yokes of slavery in the United States if the country did not abolish slavery on its own; and as the first admirably assertive black militant in the history of American literature. According to these interpretations, Melville clearly shows his sympathies with the abolitionist cause. On the other hand, some critics have seen Babo as representing, for Melville, the primitive, potentially violent nature of blacks; or as reflecting Melville's tendency to use blacks merely as literary symbols rather than as fully complex human beings; or as symbolizing his worries that some whites might (like Cereno) be too lax and naive in dealing with blacks and thus be unprepared for the violence the slaves might someday attempt to unleash (Newman 132–135). Finally, some critics have seen in Melville's story a reflection of the ways in which slavery dehumanizes both the slaves and their masters. Thus the story reverses the traditional roles of Babo and Cereno by making the first an abusive tormentor and the second a cowering, terrified victim (Newman 135–136).

Not all commentary, of course, has revolved around Babo. Delano, for instance, has been viewed as symbol of a naive and philosophically unsophisticated American culture, unprepared by background or temperament to recognize or confront real evil. Many readers consider him a fool, although a few critics admire his good nature, innocence, and open-mindedness. Cereno, the Spanish captain, has likewise been interpreted in contradictory ways: Some analysts see him as a representative of Old World corruption and effete decadence and impotence (symbolized by his empty scabbard); for some readers, Babo is Cereno's dark shadow, always at the captain's side because he symbolizes the darkest aspects of the Spaniard's own character and culture. Other readers, however, find Cereno a more sympathetic (or certainly pathetic) figure, whose crucial mistake was to treat his slaves with too much trust and insufficient supervision. Interestingly enough, the same kinds of controversy that have swirled around the central characters of the story have also been reflected in assessments of its quality as a work of art. Some readers have found it a labored, overelaborate, and ultimately tedious piece of writing, but most critics have hailed it as one of Melville's finest works, especially in the way it builds suspense and integrates all the various aspects of its artistry (Newman 137–145).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Track down the historical source on which Melville based this work and compare and contrast his piece of fiction with Delano's autobiographical report. How does the story differ from the source? Why did Melville make the changes he made, and what are some of the effects of those changes?
2. Compare and contrast Melville's tale with EDGAR ALLAN POE'S story "The Fall of the House of Usher," particularly in terms of setting, atmosphere, and outcome. How does Cereno resemble Usher? In what senses are both works "gothic"? How is suspense built and employed in both tales? Does one work have greater moral impact than the other? Justify your answer.

3. How is Melville's story similar to Hawthorne's tale "Young Goodman Brown," especially in their emphasis on a confrontation with evil, in their atmosphere of mystery, and in their use of religious symbolism?

"The Paradise of Bachelors and the Tartarus of Maids" (1855)

This work, which is one of several short pieces by Melville that are divided into contrasting halves, opens by first describing the leisurely, abundant banquet and pleasant conversation enjoyed by a group of prosperous middle-aged bachelors, most of whom are lawyers (or their friends) associated with the pleasant London environs of the ancient Inns of Court, the center of the English legal establishment. In the second half of the work, the same narrator who participated in the banquet describes his harsh, midwinter journey in America to a hellish paper factory staffed mainly by poor, unmarried women. Both his journey and the machines that dominate the factory are described in terms that suggest the mechanics of sexual reproduction—a fact that has led many readers to see this part of the work as a commentary on both the economic and sexual exploitation of the poor, anonymous females the story depicts.

As Lea Newman notes in her fine overview of commentary on this work, most reactions to the tale have tended to present it, variously, as a satire of the smug self-complacency of the comfortable middle-class bachelors, as an indictment of the horrors of industrial capitalism and the poverty it fosters and depends on, and/or as a grim reflection on the biological slavery to which women are confined because it is they who must bear children (297). The landscape surrounding the factory resembles, in both names and appearance, aspects of the female body, while the machinery inside the cavernous building—with its two vats full of pulpy white liquid and the hot, steamy mill that produces paper in exactly nine minutes—obviously reminds one of the facts of sexual life, especially as they affect women. The attitude of the narrator toward the locales and events he describes has been differently interpreted; some analysts find the narrator insufficiently critical of either of the environments he depicts, while others find his views, especially toward the hellish living and working conditions of the young women, clearly satirical. Certainly Melville himself seems to satirize the inhuman, inhumane industrial existence described in the second half of the tale; it represents a common 19th-century nightmare (and an increasingly common reality during that period) of nature mechanized and distorted, of machines devoted to moneymaking destroying the finer possibilities of life. Whether or not Melville's satire is itself too mechanical and heavy-handed to be effective has been a subject of debate: Some readers have condemned the first half of the work as tedious and the second half as too obviously allegorical, but others have praised the tale for its symbolism, its final horror, and its use of effective contrasts.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this work (especially its second half) with Dante's Divine Comedy, especially in terms of imagery, setting, characterization, tone, and theme. How is the journey taken by Melville's narrator similar to the one undertaken by the speaker of Dante's poem? How are their guides similar or different? How do the ultimate outcomes of their journeys resemble or contrast with one another?
2. How do the two pieces of Melville's work relate to one another? How (if at all) does each half of the work deepen the meaning of the other half? How does the first part seem ironic in view of the second part? How implicitly critical is the narrator of the life of the bachelors? Do the bachelors deserve any blame for the conditions of the maids?

"The Portent (1859)" (1866)

This work, the opening poem in Melville's collection of Civil War verse titled Battle-Pieces, describes the swaying body of John Brown, the famous abolitionist, who was hanged in 1859 for taking part in an armed rebellion in Virginia—a rebellion designed to foment an uprising by blacks against their enslavement. The poem, which is printed in italics to set it off from the rest of the collection, suggests that Brown's conduct and execution were harbingers of the Civil War, which would begin a year later.

Embedded in the title of this poem is a pun on the etymology of the word portent, which derives from Latin words meaning "to stretch forth." Brown's body is stretched vertically by the hangman's rope, but the significance of his death also stretches forth in time, into the future, as a "portent" (a word implying something momentous, calamitous, or ominous) of the Civil War. The poem itself (see Tales 337) begins with the crucial verb "Hangings" (which can also be read here as a noun)—a word that is metrically emphasized because the accent falls on the first syllable (rather than, as is common in much English poetry, on the second). Melville immediately creates an air of mystery and of literal suspense; not until the sixth line do we discover explicitly that the poem is about John Brown. Until then we must guess the poem's subject, led on by the plain, simple diction, the vivid images, the musical alliteration and rhythm (as in "Slowly swaying" [l. 2]), and the symbolism of colors, as in the dark "shadow," symbolizing death (l. 3), which is juxtaposed with the pleasant "green," symbolizing life (l. 3), of the "Shenandoah" river and/or valley (l. 4), where Brown rebelled and was executed and that was later the site of victories and defeats by both sides in the Civil War. "Shenandoah" is an Indian word meaning "beautiful daughter of the stars"—a meaning appropriate in view of the natural beauty of the river but ironic in light of the bloody battles that would later take place there. The exclamation "Shenandoah!" (its multisyllabic length contrasting effectively with the poem's earlier emphasis mostly on monosyllabic words) can imply various meanings simultaneously, including sadness, irony, a warning of what is to come, and regret at the apparent inevitability of these grim events.

The "cap" or hood placed over Brown's head (l. 8) hides his "anguish" (l. 9)—a word derived from Latin roots appropriately suggesting tightness, narrowness, and difficulty but also implying physical (and perhaps also mental) pain. Brown's personal "anguish," however, is as nothing compared to the national anguish his death forebodes. His is the face of the valley's (and country's) future—a fact suggested when Brown is called "Weird" (l. 13), from the Old English word "wyrd" (or "fate"), a term implying something unnatural, unearthly, uncanny, strange, or bizarre (as in the "weird sisters" or witches of Shakespeare's Macbeth). The poem itself seems odd and strange, with its cryptic syntax, abrupt exclamations, and peculiar parenthetical interruptions, and it ends, fittingly enough, by emphasizing the ominous word "war" (l. 14), which is likened to a "meteor" (l. 14), traditionally an omen of an important event. Like a meteor (Melville seems to imply), war can descend unexpectedly and cause enormous destruction.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the presentation of Brown in this work with his appearance in WALT WHITMAN's poem "Year of Meteors [1859–60]." How do these depictions of Brown resemble (or differ from) one another in diction, form, rhythm, imagery, theme, and purpose?
2. Consider the ways in which John Brown's hanging might be compared and contrasted with the hanging of Billy Budd. How might Billy Budd's hanging also be considered portentous?
3. Identify features of the poem that might be interpreted as establishing John Brown as a Christlike martyr. How do you think the American public would have responded to this representation of John so soon after the conclusion of the Civil War?

"A Utilitarian View of the Monitor's Fight" (1866)

This poem, included in Melville's collection of verse on the Civil War titled Battle-Pieces, describes the response of a utilitarian (a practical person concerned with what is materially useful rather than with what is lofty or beautiful) to the famous battle on May 9, 1862, between the Confederate ironclad ship the Merrimac and its Union counterpart the Monitor. The speaker of the poem reflects on the rise of mechanized, industrialized warfare, which will replace the pomp and romance and glory once associated with older forms of battle.

Appropriately enough in a work concerned with an unromantic view of reality, the opening word of this poem is Plain—a word that correctly describes the basic intent, meaning, and phrasing of much of the ensuing text (l. 1). Yet the poem does not lack art: Melville's skill can be seen, for instance, in the fitting contrast between the word ponderous (with its heavy vowels) and the shorter, quicker, lighter word nimble (with its short i sound); or it can be seen in the way "War" (in line 3) is personified, in an archaic literary style that the rest of the poem proceeds to reject (so that by the end of the work "War" has become merely an abstract concept rather than a poetic personage); or it can be seen in the way the poem mocks, through the alliteration of "painted pomp" (l. 4), precisely the sort of ornate diction it disdains as out of date. The poem mainly rejects the typically heavy reliance on rhyme of most verse written in English before Melville's time; rhyme is "barbaric" (l. 6) in the sense of being old-fashioned, but even in rejecting rhyme the poem (paradoxically) commits it, rhyming nimble and cymbal and reminding us (through that second word) that rhyme involves two things coming together to produce a shared sound. Through clever devices such as this, Melville creates a poem less "plain" than we might have expected.

When the speaker hails a "victory without the gaud / Of glory" (ll. 7–8), the word gaud refers to an article of vulgar finery (from a Latin word meaning to be merry or rejoice), but perhaps there is also a pun on God, implying that the outcomes of modern mechanical battles do not depend on divine intervention so much as on technically superior equipment. War in a capitalistic, industrial system is now linked with "trades and artisans" (l. 12): Both its motives and its means are now increasingly revealed as rooted in economics; victory is now less the result of personal bravery than of superiority of "crank, /

Pivot, and screw, / And calculations of caloric” (ll. 17–18)—the latter phrase referring to the caloric engines invented by John Ericsson. The poem ends by prophesying—doubly and thus emphatically—that “War shall yet be” (ll. 25, 27): In other words, war will never end, but the means by which it was waged were changing fundamentally and forever in Melville’s day (as it always does), becoming ever more efficient, ever more impersonal, and ever more destructive. Warriors were now becoming “operatives” (l. 28—from the Latin word for work), and if there is a tinge of nostalgia in this poem for the days when war seemed less mechanical, more glorious and romantic, there is also a realistic recognition that those days are gone forever. “War-paint” (a phrase implying something superficial and external and thus subject to mutability, and a term not only associated in Melville’s day with the “primitive” battle paint worn by Indians but also used as slang for a ceremonial military costume) was more and more associated with a dead or dying past. The same was true of the wooden ships Melville knew so well and loved so much.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read Randall Jarrell’s World War II poem “The Death of the Ball-Turret Gunner.” How is the poem similar to Melville’s poem in diction, theme, and effect? In what ways do the works differ in tone, point of view, and final effect?
2. Explain why Melville chose to filter the events of the poem through a utilitarian perspective. How does this perspective influence the tone of the poem? What do you think Melville was trying to achieve in lines 20 and 21, where he describes a ringing that continues to sound around the world? Does his emphasis on a utilitarian perspective enhance or detract from the power of these lines?

Billy Budd* (1924)

Billy Budd is a young, strong, handsome, good-natured, and exceptionally innocent sailor who is forcibly (but willingly) taken from his service on board a British merchant ship and compelled to serve on a British warship during the time of the Napoleonic wars. Although instantly popular with almost all the crew and officers on his new vessel, he soon arouses the envious hatred of the inexplicably malignant master-of-arms, John Claggart, who eventually accuses Billy, as both men stand before Captain Vere, of plotting a mutiny during this dangerous time of war. Stunned and speechless, Billy impulsively strikes Claggart in the forehead, killing him in one blow; Vere, now stunned himself, quickly organizes an impromptu court and convinces its reluctant officers that Billy must be executed immediately in order to preserve discipline on board the ship, even though all the officers (including Vere himself) believe that Billy never intended to kill Claggart. Billy accepts his fate, even blessing Vere as he is hanged; Vere is soon killed in battle and dies with Billy’s name on his lips; while Claggart is described in a newspaper account as an admirable man and Billy is venerated in poetry and legend by his fellow sailors.

This powerful work, although unfinished at Melville’s death, was eventually published in the 1920s and was instantly hailed as a masterpiece, second only to Moby-Dick itself as an example of its author’s genius. Early critics viewed the novel as Melville’s “testament of acceptance”—acceptance, that is, of the moral complexities of life, of the inevitable injustice of earthly existence, and perhaps also of a higher religious truth in which earthly injustice seems ultimately less important than spiritual redemption and other-worldly love. Vere, according to this view, is a kind of father figure who must sacrifice, on the altar of military duty, a boy he considers a sort of son—a boy he knows to be fundamentally innocent even though he has committed the capital crime of killing a superior officer. The fact that Billy goes to his death without complaint (indeed, the fact that he blesses Vere moments before he is hanged) has indicated to many readers that Vere is a sympathetic, even tragic, figure who does what he thinks is right and proper under extraordinarily difficult circumstances. According to this view, Vere suffers even more than Billy as a result of Billy’s death; reluctantly, painfully, but with a sincere commitment to strict military discipline, Vere orders Billy's execution because there is no other choice.

That, at least, is how the story was widely read at first. Eventually, however, more and more analysts began to doubt this account and began to question both the supposed necessity of Billy's death and the supposed morality of Captain Vere. Increasingly, Vere was seen by many readers as an oppressive, manipulative, dishonest, and possibly even insane figure who was willing to sacrifice an essentially innocent man without giving him a fair or proper trial. Vere was now often condemned as the representative of an inhumane system, an abusive power structure that was indifferent to true justice and committed only to preserving its own authority. Or he was seen as a renegade authoritarian—someone who was willing to violate proper military procedure in the name of mere expediency and his own personal power. According to this interpretation, Billy Budd is a tissue of ironies, and, after finishing it, the careful reader will perceive Vere as in some ways an even greater villain (or psychopath) than Claggart. Vere corrupts the process of justice; he holds a sham trial that could easily have been postponed in order to allow for a more deliberative and judicially legitimate hearing; he overrides the objections of his junior officers, who realize that he is proceeding improperly. In short, Vere (according to this analysis) unconscionably denies Billy the right to a fair trial, killing the boy merely to make a quick example of his own tyrannical authority.

The interpretive debates provoked by Billy Budd have been some of the most intense, most persistent, and in some ways most maddening in the history of literary criticism. Strong arguments can be (and have been) made on both sides; much of the same evidence can be used to support either position; and although neither camp has shown much willingness to concede defeat, honest readers will have to admit that sometimes they must doubt their own initial interpretations. There seems no way of finally settling the issue; disagreement about the fundamental import of the book is likely to last as long as the book is read. Perhaps this deep-seated ambiguity is the strongest possible testimony to the complexity of the work and to Melville's skill as a writer. According to this argument, Melville deliberately crafted a work designed to defeat simplistic interpretation—a work he knew could be read in contradictory ways and therefore a work that is as fascinatingly complicated as life itself. Billy Budd, in other words, shows Melville at the top of his form as a writer intent on puzzling readers and provoking thought rather than offering simplistic, one-sided views of the dilemmas he explores. Certainly much evidence in the book can be used to support this view. On the other hand (and from another perspective), the seemingly fundamental ambiguity of the work may be due less to Melville's conscious intent than to the nature of language itself. Billy Budd, in other words, may not be much different from almost any text, since all language is (by its very nature) open to competing (and often contradictory) interpretations. According to this deconstructive view, Billy Budd exemplifies the difficulty of arriving at any final, definitive interpretation of practically any piece of writing, especially a work of literature. Finally, another way of dealing with the puzzling difficulties of Melville's text is to argue that the text itself is unfinished and incomplete—that Melville never lived to impose a clear and consistent order on the work. Plenty of evidence survives to suggest that the novel was in a state of constant revision and that every time Melville tinkered with it, he made it more and more complex. From this perspective, the novel is open to such contrasting interpretations because Melville died before he could impose a final, coherent form on the book. If some parts seem to contradict other parts, that is because the novel is incomplete and (in that sense) fundamentally flawed. Billy Budd (or so this argument goes) might someday have become a polished masterpiece, but Melville did not live long enough to make it one. Little wonder, then, that the book fails to yield a persuasively consistent meaning.

Certainly the surviving text of Billy Budd is confusing. When Melville died, he left a box full of manuscript sheets full of handwriting that was sometimes illegible; moreover, the sheets were covered with revisions made at many different stages of composition. Early editors of the work often disagreed about such basic matters as how the book should begin (for example, with or without an apparent preface?), the name of the British warship, or even the very title of the book. Not until 1962 was a reasonably reliable scholarly text published, but even the publication of this version did nothing to settle fundamental disagreements about the “proper” interpretation of the work. It is tempting, then, to conclude that Billy Budd might make more consistent sense if Melville had simply lived long enough to complete it and perhaps even supervise its publication. Yet plenty of evidence survives in the text as it presently exists to suggest that much of the ambiguity of the book is deliberate and well crafted, and that Melville intentionally sculpted a novel designed to provoke thought, raise questions, create doubts, and stimulate reflection rather than provide easy answers. Billy Budd is the final product of a master of mysterious effects—an author who saw existence as incredibly complex and who carefully tried to convey that complexity in this final major work of a long and thoughtful life.

Typical of the richness of Melville’s writing in this book is Billy’s impulsive outburst as he is being transferred from the merchant ship the Rights-of-Man to Vere’s warship, the Bellipotent. The narrator notes that Billy first waves good-bye to his old shipmates and then exclaims, “And good-bye to you too, old Rights-of-Man” (Tales 454). Billy intends no irony here, but Melville obviously does. Billy is indeed leaving many of his old rights behind him, but the ambiguity seems even richer when we realize that the irony of this particular moment need not support an ironic reading of the novel as a whole. In other words, while it is a fact that Billy’s rights will be severely curtailed on the warship, this fact need not imply that the novel raises any fundamental objection to military service or the larger cause the warship defends. The passage can be read as supporting a thoroughly ironic view of subsequent events, but it need not be interpreted in that fashion. In this respect, this one small incident is typical of the novel as a whole: Melville writes in such a way that the same events can be interpreted in different ways by different readers. The narrator, commenting on Billy’s exclamation, notes that to “deal in double meanings and insinuations of any sort was quite foreign to his nature” (Tales 454), but this is obviously not true of the narrator himself, who often deals in double meanings, insinuations, ambiguities, and deliberately ambivalent suggestions.

Examples abound. Thus, when an officer asks Billy to name his father, the sailor innocently responds, “God knows, sir” (Tales 456). In one respect this reply means simply that Billy himself has no idea who his father was; on a different level (of which Billy is probably not conscious), the reply suggests that if God exists, he does indeed know the identity of Billy’s father; on another level still, the phrase can also be taken to suggest that God himself may, in some sense, be Billy’s father—thus making the reply one of many moments in the novel when Billy seems to be associated, in character and fate, with Christ. Billy’s reply thus “works” on at least three different levels, and in that respect it is typical of much else in this book. Similarly, when Captain Vere is introduced, the narrator tells us that although Vere was, by blood, “allied to the higher nobility, his advancement [in the navy] had not been altogether owing to influences connected with that circumstance” (Tales 463). The equivocal phrasing here is one of Melville’s favorite devices: He gives with one hand while withholding with the other. Vere’s rise has been due partly to his own merit but partly also to family connections, but reliance on such connections would have been entirely typical of his time and thus may (or may not) fail to reflect poorly on his own character. This passage, and hundreds of others like it, can be read one way or another, and the fact that there are so many such passages in this book seems part of Melville’s very obvious and very skillful design. For every passage in the book that seems to reflect well on Vere, there is another than can be read ironically or satirically, and often the same passages can be read in fundamentally different ways.

This is especially true after the killing of Claggart and during (and after) Billy’s trial. The ship’s surgeon, for instance, begins to doubt the captain’s sanity in the aftermath of Claggart's death, but the narrator will only ambiguously comment as follows: "Whether Captain Vere, as the surgeon professionally and privately surmised, was really the sudden victim of any degree of aberration, every one must determine for himself by such light as this narrative may afford" (Tales 497). The narrator, in short, puts the ball into our court, not even promising that the narrative will afford sufficient light but only that it "may." At one moment Vere, in his concern with secrecy, is compared to an autocratic Russian czar ("Peter the Barbarian"; Tales 498); then in the next moment we are told that Vere would prefer to submit Billy's case to the judgment of his superiors; then in the very next moment we are told that he feels compelled by circumstances to act quickly in "allegiance to military duty" (Tales 498). In passages like this the book sometimes induces a kind of mental and moral vertigo; we can never be quite sure where the narrator stands, how we are meant to respond to Vere, or whether any clear and certain response is even intended. Vere's own officers sometimes doubt the wisdom of his conduct, but they never challenge him, either during the trial or after the isolated ship returns to the fleet. By the time of that return, of course, Vere himself has been killed, and so perhaps any questioning of his conduct by that point would have seemed ungracious or gratuitous. In any case, there are also passages in the book in which the narrator seems either to endorse Vere's decision or at least to comprehend (and sympathize with) his motives, especially given the dire military circumstances Vere faced. At one point, for instance, the narrator quotes an unnamed author (probably invented by Melville), who supposedly wrote as follows:

Forty years after a battle it is easy for a non-combatant to reason about how it ought to have been fought. It is another thing personally and under fire to have to direct the fighting while involved in the obscuring smoke of it. Much so with respect to other emergencies involving considerations both practical and moral, and when it is imperative promptly to act. The greater the fog the more it imperils the steamer, and speed is put on though at the hazard of running somebody down. Little ween the snug card players in the cabin of the responsibilities of the sleepless man on the bridge. (Tales 506)

Significantly, however, these are not the narrator's own words; they are offered, with typical Melvillean indirection, simply as the reflections of "a writer whom few know" (Tales 506), and we are left to draw our own conclusions about how much weight to give them or how to interpret their significance. There are (it is true) times when the narrative clearly seems tipped in Vere's favor—when the captain claims, and no one challenges him, that according to the Articles of War merely to strike a superior officer, let alone kill him, is "a capital crime" (Tales 504), in which case Billy's punishment by death seems inevitable. But there are other places where the narrative raises, quotes, or implies doubts about the wisdom of Vere's behavior. Indeed, Vere himself seems not entirely at peace with his decisions, but he claims to have no simple alternative. In the end, whether or not Vere is credible and sympathetic is a matter "every one must determine for himself" (Tales 497). What seems far less debatable is the skill with which Melville crafted a novel that, once read, produces an impact so powerful that it remains a permanent part of each reader's literary and moral memory.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Billy Budd with Shakespeare's Othello. How does Claggart resemble Iago? How does Billy resemble Desdemona? To what extent (if any) is Vere comparable to Othello? Are there any points in Melville's novel in which he seems to echo the language of Shakespeare's play?
2. What resemblances or differences exist between Melville's novel and HENRY JAMES's short work The Turn of the Screw? Discuss the works in terms of tone, characterization, and themes, and especially in terms of the interpretive dilemmas they present. How are both works similarly puzzling?

9. Although Melville is remembered mainly as a novelist and short story writer, he also composed numerous poems. How do some of the poems seem typically “Melvillean” in theme, style, purpose, and tone? Which poems do you consider most successful, and why? Why is Melville not better known or better regarded as a poet? What aspects of his poetry often make his poems seem less successful than his fiction?
10. Although Melville is often considered an exceptionally profound and “serious” author, humor is a major element in many of his works. Choose a specific text by Melville and discuss the ways humor contributes to its effectiveness and success. How does Melville use humor to add complexity and depth even to his darkest works?

SARAH MORGAN BRYAN PIATT

My mother says I must not pass / Too near that glass; / She is afraid that I will see / A little witch that looks like me.

("The Witch in the Glass")

Prior to 1993, when Sarah Piatt's "Giving Back the Flower" appeared in the Library of America's American Poetry: The Nineteenth Century, 82 years had passed since her last publication. Today many college anthologies contain substantial numbers of her poems and there are now two selected editions of her poetry, one edited by Larry Michaels (1999), the other a scholarly edition with a lengthy biocritical introduction by Paula Bennett (2001). One Piatt poem, "The Witch in the Glass," was been adopted as a popular romance novel, Loving Jesse by Joyce Myrus (2004). For a long-lost writer's fortunes to change so rapidly strongly suggests that, whatever the causes for Piatt's erasure, lack of intrinsic merit was not among them. Here Piatt will be treated as what she was: a major poet whose scope and diversity of concerns helped lay the foundations for American women's poetry.

Born in 1836 on her maternal grandmother's plantation outside Lexington, Kentucky, Sarah Morgan Bryan Piatt descended from her state's bluest blood. Her father, Talbot Nelson Bryan, was a descendant of Morgan Bryan, who migrated west with Daniel Boone in the late 1700s. The Boones and Bryans intermarried over a number of generations, making Boone Sarah's kinsman by marriage several times over. Piatt's mother, who was also from a well-established Kentucky family (the Spiers), died when she was eight, the first of many deaths whose traumatic impact reverberates through Sarah's writing.

According to southern custom, upon a mother's death, her children were parceled out among relatives. Sarah and her younger sister, Ellen, went to their maternal grandmother's Lexington plantation. After the grandmother's death, Piatt lived briefly with her father and stepmother on the latter's plantation in Versailles. She was then settled permanently with her father's sister in New Castle. Through all these changes her one constant was an elderly slave woman whom Piatt had inherited from her mother and who accompanied the poet north in 1861, caring for Sarah's children—even as she once had cared for Sarah and her mother—until her death, in or around 1870. Piatt celebrates and mourns this relationship with its double legacy of love and guilt in a number of poems but most notably in "A Child's Party."

While in New Castle, Piatt completed her formal education, graduating from Henry Female Seminary in 1855 with a solid background in the classics and a more-than-passing acquaintance with the British romantics, above all Byron, whom she, as did many young women of her day, idolized. At about this time, she started publishing poems in local newspapers, drawing the attention of George Prentice, editor of the Louisville Journal and an enthusiastic sponsor of a number of southern women poets. Prentice introduced her to her future husband, John James Piatt, a young Ohioan, also from a large pioneering family and a poet of sorts. After their marriage in 1861, the young couple moved to Washington, D.C., where, J. J., as John James signed himself, served as a minor functionary in the Treasury Department.

As a result of frequent absenteeism, J. J. lost his position at the Treasury in 1867, the first of what would become a lifetime string of such losses. Unable to find another government job, he returned with his family to Ohio, where they settled in North Bend, a rural suburb west of Cincinnati. J. J. worked for a local newspaper and he and Sarah built a house high on the cliffs overlooking the Ohio River. Other than 12 years abroad (1882–94), spent mostly in Cork, Ireland, where J. J. served as U.S. consul, it was in this house that Sarah raised her children: Marian, her first child and only daughter, born in 1862, followed by six sons, Victor in 1864, Arthur Donn in 1867, Frederick in 1869, then Guy, Louis, and Cecil, in 1871, 1875, and 1878, respectively. It was also here that she buried two, an unnamed infant, who died in 1873, a few days after birth (the subject of “Her Blindness in Grief”), and Victor, who was killed in a freak Fourth of July accident less than a year later. Ten years after Victor’s death, a third child, Louis, died in a drowning accident in Cork harbor, Ireland. In poems that placed Sarah at the brink of blasphemy, if not beyond, she recorded the traumatic impact of these deaths on her religious faith, a faith already overtaxed by her mother’s loss when she was eight.

But whereas, through all these tribulations, Sarah continued to grow as a poet, J. J. did not fare so well. Wanting a literary career at any cost, he tried to support his family by garnering patronage positions that kept him, and sometimes the entire family, shuttling between Washington, D.C., and North Bend, where he would return whenever the government failed him. Ephemeral as these positions were, he paid a huge price for them in self-respect. As resentful as he was dependent, J. J. ultimately alienated all those to whom he applied for help, even, in the end, his oldest friends, E. C. Stedman and WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS. Nor did the literary career for which he sacrificed so much flourish. Whatever creative urge J. J. had, he had expended it fully by 1872. Thereafter, his books were primarily reprints of old poems, with some new poems thrown in. Far less admired than his wife, he tried to maintain an appearance of parity between them, publishing his books with hers, sending his poems out with hers, begging reviews for himself as well as for her. None of these ploys worked, and by 1902, Howells reported to a mutual friend, John Hay, that J. J. was “quite pathetically poor” (Selected Letters 5:20). In their final years together, he and Sarah were dependent on the generosity of others to survive.

Still there was more to Sarah’s marriage than simply J. J.’s failures. If he was not half the poet she was, he was also, by that token, unable to silence her with his own genius. On the contrary, aware that editors favored her (she, for example, had 30 poems to his nine in the Atlantic Monthly, the most prestigious literary magazine of the day), he did all he could to advance her career. Similarly, hard as moving with so many children must have been on Sarah, the places to which they moved gave her access to major cultural centers here and abroad: New York, Boston, Dublin, London, Edinburgh, and Paris. Because of J. J.’s assiduous promotion of her career, moreover, she came to be known by some of the most important figures in late 19th-century Anglo-American letters: not just Howells and Stedman, but James Russell Lowell, HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW, and W. B. Yeats, who published an enthusiastic review of An Enchanted Castle (1893), Sarah’s most substantial Irish volume.

While none of these advantages erased the family debt, much less eased Sarah’s other woes, they did enrich her art. Indeed, because of the length of her career (1854–1911) and the unusually sophisticated turn of her mind, which absorbed the entirety of her culture in ways few 19th-century American writers did, Piatt was able to refract in her verse the principal social, national, and artistic concerns of more than 50 years of Euro-American culture and women’s history. In 1914 a carriage accident left J. J. severely disabled and he died in 1917 without ever regaining his health. After his death increasing ill-health forced Sarah to leave North Bend for the last time. In 1919 she died of old age in the New Jersey home of her youngest son, Cecil, who was one of only two children (the other was Guy) known to survive her.

If lack of merit was not responsible for Piatt's erasure in the early 20th century, excessive merit may have been. In strong poets like EMILY DICKINSON and Piatt, merit lies in their capacity to put a personal stamp or "signature" on their writing that sets it apart from that of others in their day. The signature component of Dickinson's poetry is her writing style. The unmatched brilliance of her figurative language and her compressed syntax allowed her to say more in 14 words than most poets could say in 14 stanzas, a point her "mentor," Thomas Wentworth Higginson, made when comparing one of his own poems to one of hers.

Piatt's signature lies in the extraordinary subtlety of her irony and in her use of multiple voices (and sometimes multiple time frames) to fracture and destabilize her poems' point of view. And just as the signature components of Dickinson's poetry make it difficult but compelling reading, so the distinguishing characteristics of Piatt's poetry also make hers difficult—and compelling—to read.

Despite Piatt's enormous popularity in her own century, it may be that we are far better positioned to appreciate her strengths today than were readers in her own day. Twentieth-century poets like T. S. Eliot and Robert Frost have accustomed us to difficult poetic strategies such as irony and fractured points of view, which demand intellectual effort of the reader. Most 19th-century readers, on the other hand, associated lyric poetry with feeling and song, and they did not know what to make of Piatt's sometimes demanding work. As reviews of her poetry make clear, what readers admired in her was not her originality, which irritated one reviewer to the point that he complained that she asked "more intelligence than is possessed by one reader in a hundred" (Scribner's Monthly 635). Rather, they praised what they viewed as her unusually skillful handling of her period's dominant style, the genteel, and it was these reviewers' misreading of Piatt as a genteel poet that led to her erasure in the next century.

According to F. Brett Cox, the genteel style is best understood as a mix of "aesthetic idealism" and "cultural conservatism" (212). The idealist point of view is concerned with perfection; Aesthetically idealist art focuses on representing perfect beauty. Culturally conservative art upholds traditional artistic styles and subjects as well as the social status quo. Piatt was not the only writer of her period who found the genteel too restrictive. WALT WHITMAN, HERMAN MELVILLE, and Emily Dickinson did also. Nonetheless, possibly because the renowned 19th-century litterateur W. D. Howells was so vociferous in his praise for Piatt as a genteel stylist, this is how she was read both in her period and later. Piatt, Max Herzberg wrote dismissively in 1962, produced "pleasing, conventional volumes," which were well-suited to the domestic, middle-class audiences of her day (877), but of no interest to 20th-century readers. How could even perspicacious readers such as Howells misunderstand Piatt?

Just as Piatt's poetry is complicated, so is the answer to this question. As poems like "Army of Occupation" and "The Witch in the Glass" attest, Piatt, when she chose, could seem just the kind of poet that Howells said she was: a writer "as delicate and purely poetic as ever was given to the world" (Atlantic 104). What Howells and others did not see, however, was that when she used the genteel, she did so with a difference. Sometimes gently as in "Witch," sometimes playfully as in "The Fancy Ball," and sometimes savagely, as in "The Funeral of a Doll," she introduced resisting voices into her poems, destabilizing genteel values and turning the style itself into a vehicle by which to explore the artistic and moral limitations of her society. That is, she ironized that very mix of "aesthetic idealism" and "cultural conservatism" that Cox describes and that defined 19th-century American bourgeois culture—the culture of solid middle-class Victorianism—in life as well as art.

That even 19th-century readers as sharp as Howells missed what Piatt was doing is not really surprising. Of all literary devices, irony is the slipperiest, the hardest to detect. Insofar as irony deals in misreading or, better, in misrecognition, it must be slippery. That is what irony is about: the gap between what we expect and what is, what we think we hear and what is actually said, what we want and what we get. In "An After-Poem," Piatt puts it succinctly: "You will read or you will not read" (114). You will understand her irony or you will not. If you do not, then she will indeed seem the poet that Howells and Herzberg describe. If you do, however, then a very different, far more complicated and compelling, but also much darker poet emerges, one whose anger at social injustice and whose highly personal religious angst are dominant motifs.

Yet it would be a great mistake to see Piatt only in terms of her most bitter or angry poems, such as "Mock Diamonds," "The Funeral of a Doll," and "Her Blindness in Grief." As poems such as "The Palace-Burner," "The First Party," and "The Witch in the Glass" suggest, she was also and always a loving poet who filtered much of her thinking through the minds of children, whom she deeply cherished and for whom she dreamed a more hopeful world than the one into which she herself had been born. Her greatest sorrow may well have been that she could not ensure this better world for them. As we confront our own fears for the future and hold out our own hopes, Piatt speaks directly to us, rewriting our nation's history not just from a woman's but from a mother's point of view. One of our few major poets of motherhood, as well as our only poet to write primarily as a mother, Piatt had what the Irish call the gift of tears, which was the gift of love as well.

"The Fancy Ball" (1866)

New readers of Piatt would do well to begin with "The Fancy Ball." Formal techniques and themes that become more complex in later poems appear here in accessible terms. The poem builds on the genre of the dramatic monologue explored by the English poet Robert Browning, in which a poem is spoken entirely in the voice of a specific character whose words, as in the case of Browning's famous dramatic monologue "My Last Duchess," reveal the speaker's psychological depths. Piatt revises Browning's innovation by staging many of her poems as dramatic dialogues, that is, scenes in which two or more speakers converse, and the reader partially overhears their conversation. Since Piatt often implies but does not state who the speakers are and what their relation is to one another, one of the challenges built into her poems is the need to figure out what is going on from the evidence available. In later poems Piatt pushed the dramatic dialogue to its complex limits—for example, staging a fight between lovers in "A Pique at Parting," in which we hear only the woman's words and have to infer what the man is saying in response. "The Fancy Ball" presents a simpler instance of the dramatic dialogue central to Piatt's overall career.

As we begin, the speaker, a woman, contemplates what to wear to a costume party or "fancy ball." Although we are not told explicitly who the second speaker is, the fact that he suggests costumes focusing on the woman's dreamy ethereal beauty makes it likely that he is her husband or lover. She speaks in stanza 1; in stanza 2, with the advent of quotation marks, we hear his voice. Readers must attend carefully to quotation marks in Piatt's poems, as they are often the only evidence we have that there has been a switch in speakers. The female voice reemerges midway through stanza 4. By this point her companion has encouraged her to go dressed as "Morning," to which she immediately objects, then "Night," "Spring," and "Snow." At this last, she blurts out a definitive "No."

Clearly his ideas of what she is or, better perhaps, of how she should present herself, are at odds with hers. As "Snow," she says, she would "melt" in that "warm, close room," her "own life's burning" smothered. The word burning indicates passion and intense feeling while "Snow" is beautiful but silent and cold. When the male speaker makes his next suggestion—"a Bird of Paradise"—she loses all patience and tells him to hush. If to be noticed in the ball's "shining world of art" means she has to pretend to be what she is not, she prefers to go as herself. That, she observes, will really get everyone's attention!

Piatt's rejection of "fancy"—a 19th-century synonym for imagination—in this poem can be read two ways. By having her male speaker suggest a string of costumes that, for all their "beauty," are ill-suited to his female partner at best, and downright silly at worst, Piatt is making fun of 19th-century romantic views of women that overridealized them at the expense of reality—for example, as in the figure of the angelic domestic woman. But fancy or imagination was also identified in Piatt's period with the poetic faculty, so that she could be speaking of the way she wants to write (and to be read) as well. Both as a lifestyle and as literary style, she rejects her culture's "shining world of art" in favor of the "real": herself.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Imagine a dramatic production of this conversation that is taking place instead between modern lovers or spouses. What costumes might embody stereotypes about women today? Imagine the conversation again with the female character suggesting costumes to her male partner. What costumes might represent stereotypes of men today?
2. What associations do the words bird and paradise suggest? Why does the speaker want to distinguish herself from such images?
3. Look up romance in a literary handbook. How is the literary definition of romance related to our modern use of the term romance for a kind of love? What might that connection say about the relationship between the characters in "The Fancy Ball"?
4. Compare the female speaker's attitude in "The Fancy Ball" with that of the speaker in Dickinson's "I dwell in Possibility – ." Would Dickinson approve of Piatt's speaker's decision to "go as myself"? Would Piatt agree that "Possibility" is a "fairer house than prose"?

"Army of Occupation" (1866)

"Army of Occupation" addresses another characteristic theme in Piatt's work: the Civil War's aftermath, in both the North and the South. The poem commemorates the sealing that September of a mass grave at Arlington Cemetery. Unlike most commemorative Civil War poems, however, Piatt's poem splits its focus between the heroism of the dead soldiers and the pain suffered by those (women, in particular) left to mourn their loved ones' passing.

Piatt closely connects the poem's form and content through motifs of music, sound, and beat. The dominant meter is iambic pentameter; although metrical variations occur throughout, the regular iambic beat is readily audible in stanza 2, an excellent stanza for scansion practice. As the poem opens, the summer "blew its little drifts of sound," an image likening the summer wind to a musician randomly playing a wind instrument. These gentle "drifts of sound" sharply contrast with the highly organized martial music whose "fierce . . . cry for blood" the soldiers answered with their lives. The marching of the weary soldiers is another beat. The word feet in stanzas 2 and 3 overtly refers to their exhausted steps, but it also alludes to poetic feet, a technical term designating metrical units such as the five feet composing each line of iambic pentameter.

The marching feet of the soldiers, captured in the marching iambic beat, make up Piatt's commemorative war music, but it is a music softened not just by the weariness of war's end but by the sound of the wind and by the Potomac's "haunted flood," which the speaker bids, "Sing tenderly." Cries for blood and songs of mourning, marching men and grieving women are braided together in the poem's music as they were in life. The speaker thus pays equal honor to the war dead and to those whose grieving, in a paradoxical twist, makes them, though living, seem dead—the "dreadful phantoms" of stanza 5. Projecting the poem into the future, she asks "if, in some red-clouded dawn, again / The country should be calling to her men, / Shall the reveille not remember these?" The military music of the reveille (from French, to wake), to which these dead can no longer respond, serves as Piatt's ironic but heartbreaking reminder of what wars cost.

In the difficult final stanza, a mysterious figure called "one" appears with "his rusted sword in his own breast." Since the poem tells us that he stands on "his lands" at "his dim fireless hearth," we can deduce that he is the Confederate commander Robert E. Lee. It was on his former estate, appropriated by the Union during the war, that Arlington Cemetery—with a deliberate irony that Piatt plays on in her poem—was established in 1864. Piatt's closing image combines national and personal grief—the cold hearth of Lee's former home standing for the hundreds of thousands of homes throughout the nation where women grieved for sons, husbands, and brothers who would never return and whose "many hands" point to Lee in accusation. In this last image one feels the full force of Piatt's ironic play on the term army of occupation, which is usually used to describe an active military force conquering and controlling foreign territory but here refers to the "sleeping army" that occupied Lee's estate not in life but in death.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Research the history of the lands that became Arlington Cemetery. How did Confederates feel about the cemetery and its fallen sons—prisoners of war who had been held by the Union forces—who were buried there? How did the image of the cemetery shift to that of a national shrine? Also research how these lands are important to African-American history.
2. Choose three words in the poem that are not in your everyday vocabulary. Look them up in a substantial dictionary. Why has Piatt used these particular words? What do they contribute to her broader themes?
3. The speaker describes the now-deceased soldiers as seeing "the dust," then joining "the moving mass." Look up the different meanings of dust in the Oxford English Dictionary. Why does Piatt choose this particular word here? How does knowing the history of how this word has been used affect one's reading of the remainder of the line? And the remainder of the stanza?
4. When Piatt tells the shores of the Potomac, "Wear flowers for such, shores whence their feet did pass," she is employing a rhetorical figure of direct address called an apostrophe. Apostrophes to nature asking it to mourn for the dead are conventional in pastoral elegies, as, for example, in Whitman's "When Lilacs Last in the Door-Yard Bloomed." Look up information on pastoral elegies in a literary handbook or glossary and discuss how Piatt's poem does or does not fit that form.

"Mock Diamonds" (1872)

"Mock Diamonds" is among Piatt's most difficult poems. However, students tackling its complex literary puzzles will be well repaid for their effort. One reason for the poem's difficulty is its weaving together of past and present using multiple speakers and multiple time frames. The shift in time frames is analogous to what happens in a movie flashback. Students may find it useful, therefore, to ponder the role that the latter plays in contemporary filmmaking since this technique formally embodies one of the poem's principal themes—the continuance of the past in the present.

"Mock Diamonds" is set at a seaside resort, the same one where the speaker (now a wife and mother) vacationed as a young woman. She has returned in order to introduce her husband (a Northerner) to the world of the antebellum Southern aristocracy where she was born. One must follow the flow of their conversation in the first four stanzas carefully if the rest of the poem is to make sense. To a question someone else (her husband) has asked—"The handsome man there with the scar? / (Who bow'd to me?)"—she answers, "Yes, slightly." From this we can surmise that her husband wanted to know whether or not she knew this man. When she answers, "slightly," he is satisfied and moves on to another prospect, cutting her off midsentence (line 7). He is looking for a particular person: as we will soon learn, his wife's former lover.

There is a teasing quality to Piatt's writing in the next two stanzas that makes the husband's jealousy-motivated description of the second man faintly ridiculous: He has a "low Southern swagger" and looks as if he belongs to the Ku Klux Klan (vividly described as a "doubtful chivalry" that holds "midnight-vengeance meetings"). The wife denies this but says the man was among those who surrendered "late"—after the war's official end—for which some have judged him harshly. Although the husband does not know it yet, he has found his man, and the speaker, using flashback, recalls for him what her relationship to this man was and how it abruptly ended when, at his mother's urging, he left in pursuit of an "heiress" instead.

At this point, the poem turns from a mocking consideration of the sex game, Southern-style, into something darker: a deconstruction of the Old South. Refusing to romanticize either her own past or that of the Old South, Piatt rewrites the "lost cause" as "insolent false glory" and rewrites Southern planter society as a victim of its own delusions. The Southern chevalier (the speaker's erstwhile lover) and the Southern belle whose "diamonds flash'd him blind" both turn out to be frauds by poem's end. As the speaker says self-mockingly in stanza 10, her husband has nothing to worry about: "Your bright child's fading mother / And that guerrilla from—the dead? / Are nothing to each other." The past is dead.

Or is it? Rising from the sand, the man stands before her, and "all the dim sea grew dimmer," his presence blocking out all else. As if picking up where they left off decades before, he makes a single remark. When she tells us that men "never" hear such bitter laughter from other men, she implies his style with her is the intimate style that arises only between lovers, present or past. The speaker assured her husband that, like the Old South, her own romantic past is dead, but this ending suggests otherwise. When in the last lines, the "guerrilla from—the dead?" reveals the truth—that like the chevalier himself, the belle, too, was a fraud—the final piece of the puzzle falls into place. The past, the speaker asserts, has now truly "Pas'd to the past forever," but we are left to wonder whether or not it ever really can.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Look up the word mock and use its definitions to help you analyze the poem. Find examples in the poem of specific words, phrases, or events that rely on either sense of the word. For example, what does "doubtful chivalry" mean? What is the effect of including these words?
2. This poem is in part about the relation between the present and the past. Identify elements of the present scene that the poem juxtaposes with what happened long ago and explain their significance.
3. Why does she call her former lover a "hero"? Was he? What evidence in the poem enables you to judge the tone here?
4. Does Piatt's staging of the Old South as a grand confidence game in which each person is out to defraud the other shed light on MARK TWAIN'S (Samuel Langhorne Clemens's) use of two confidence men, the Dauphin and the Duke, in Huckleberry Finn? Why might these two writers, both of whom grew up in the South but eventually moved to the North, have found the idea of a confidence game an apt metaphor for the antebellum South?
5. Piatt clearly has the Ku Klux Klan in mind in stanza 3 of "Mock Diamonds." Read about Klan activities in the South in the Reconstruction period. What language in the poem suggests that she is talking about the Klan? Is there any connection between what the Old South was and the rise of the Klan after the war?

"The Funeral of a Doll" (1872)

This poem can be interpreted in opposite yet closely related ways, one sentimental, the other ironic, both of which Piatt carefully crafts into the poem. Read sentimentally, “Funeral” is about a little girl’s grief over the “death” of her doll, and given the enormous popularity sentimental treatments of child death enjoyed in 19th-century literature, one can easily imagine sincere Victorian readers wiping away tears as they read the poem. Viewed thus, Piatt’s treatment of the doll’s death is little more than a replaying of the death of the doll’s namesake, “Little Nell,” in Charles Dickens’s beloved—and very sentimental—Old Curiosity Shop (1840). According to this reading, the tears the daughter sheds are the same as those adults shed, even today, when reading Dickens’s novel. Sentimental literature prized excessive feeling both in its treatment of material and in the response it sought to elicit from readers, and the little girl’s tears mimic and fulfill these expectations.

The situation with the poem’s speaker, the girl’s mother, is more complicated. As the teller of the story, she shares in its sentimentality. At the same time, however, the way she tells the story raises other, darker interpretative possibilities that distance her from the sentimental acts her daughter performs. For instance, when the speaker says that like Dickens’s Little Nell, this little Nell is “slight and still and mild, / Blue-eyed and sweet; she always smiled,” her attribution of life to what is lifeless—a wax head, a body stuffed with straw—makes the doll sound less lovable than spooky and unreal. When she adds, “and never troubled any one / Until her pretty life was done,” one cannot help but wonder, therefore, whether she is being serious or mocking. Like Dickens’s Little Nell, this little Nell sounds too good to be true.

If the speaker adopts an ironic stance toward the doll, her attitude toward the funeral is equally edgy. Calling the doll in its paper coffin “A very fair and piteous sight,” she adds, almost as an afterthought, “Enough to make one sorry, quite.” The word quite here is dismissive, implying that she is not really sorry at all. Only for a moment, in the dash marking a broken-off thought in stanza 3, when the coffin is closed, does the poem suggest that something deeper is going on in the mother. “But,” she says, “no matter”—which, of course, means the reverse: It must matter a great deal for her to use a mark as dramatic as a dash to point it out. The shutting of the doll’s coffin has, it seems, reminded the speaker of something she would rather forget, possibly another death—a real one.

If so, this helps explain why the speaker’s tone is so hard to read. On the one hand, much as she loves her daughter, she not only knows that the object of her daughter’s grief is a fake (a doll) but that the little girl herself is faking grief, insofar as her excessive display of grief is merely a miming of sentimental conventions she has learned—a “story each had learned to tell.” The mother herself, on the other hand, is old enough to know what real death is. Piatt again helps us with a graphic cue, putting the daughter’s question: “Where is she now?”—a question the mother notably fails to answer—in italics. If the mother were a sentimentalist, she would assure her daughter her doll is in heaven. The poem would have a happy ending. But unsure of an afterlife herself, she cannot pass on this consolation to her daughter. At the poem’s end, she can only stand by helplessly watching her child grieve.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Piatt’s treatment of “Little Nell” as a living-dead doll with Sylvia Plath’s treatment of the “living doll” theme in “The Applicant.”
2. Little Eva’s death in HARRIET BEECHER STOWE’S Uncle Tom’s Cabin is undoubtedly the most famous death scene in 19th-century American literature. Read Stowe’s chapter 26 and compare and contrast the two scenarios. Could Piatt’s poem be read as a critique not just of Dickens but Stowe’s handling of child death?
3. Since the doll is a doll and not a human child, what is the true answer to the girl’s question in the penultimate line? How is this implied answer important to the rest of the poem? Why do you think the speaker herself does not give it?
4. In stanza 3 the speaker breaks off her thought with a dash. What do you think that dash is about? What might she have thought that she does not say? Might this missing information fill out our picture of what the speaker is like?

5. In “The Funeral of a Doll,” Piatt’s doll exists somewhere between the categories of human and inhuman. Compare and contrast what Piatt does with a contemporary horror film of your choice involving a doll that becomes alive. Why are dolls creepy in both cases?

“The Palace-Burner” (1872)

As did Dickinson, Piatt used child speakers to explore issues that many 19th-century readers would have found alienating if addressed from an adult’s perspective. Unlike Dickinson, however, Piatt never identifies her own voice with these child speakers; nor does she make them precociously wise, as many 19th-century writers—Charles Dickens and Harriet Beecher Stowe, for example, did. Rather, her child speakers live in their own “child world” and think by the rules of their own child logic. Nowhere do these strategies show to greater advantage than in “The Palace-Burner.” Because of a seemingly innocent question posed to her by her son—would she “burn a palace,” too—the boy’s mother begins an examination of self that, concluding in ironic self-condemnation, turns the popular 19th-century image of woman as angel in the house—pious, domestic, fulfilled as wife and mother—on its head.

Inspired by an 1871 Harper’s Weekly engraving of the execution of a pétroleuse (palace-burner), Piatt’s poem considers the fate of the Paris Commune, Europe’s first experiment in communism, and of the women who, with no alternative but starvation, took their protests into the streets. The setting for the poem is a quintessentially middle-class domestic interior. Here a mother and son peruse clippings from old newspapers. Over his mother’s objections, the boy returns to one clipping in particular: an illustration of the execution of a palace burner by a firing squad of uniformed French soldiers. When the boy asks his mother whether under the same circumstances she would burn a palace also, she refuses to answer, sending him off to play instead.

In the poem’s last five stanzas, the mother ponders what her answer is. Confronted by the palace burner’s inarguable courage, this conventionally “good” woman explores who and what she is really is. In the “dusk and distance,” her soul seems “sweet,” but when she looks more closely, she discovers not goodness, but the appearance of goodness: a woman who loves “light and music” and who is “fit to kiss away a baby’s cry”—and not much else. In a society that rewards “languid and worldly” women like her with material comforts, could she, she wonders, “wear / Such utter life upon a dying face, / . . . / Such garments—soon to be a shroud—with grace?” The palace burner’s “unappealing, beautiful despair” is a reverse image of her: a woman beautiful on the outside but unappealing within. Directly benefited by the very kinds of social and economic inequities that cause the palace burner’s despair, the speaker would not lift a hand to make the world a better place. On the contrary, as we see in stanzas 3 and 4, she takes it as her duty to inculcate in her son her own non-critical obedience to authority. Is this good mother, who tells her son to “respect the laws,” whether they are right or wrong, really a bad one?

In this poem Piatt pushes the idea of the bystander’s moral complicity as far as it can go, and her target is not just her own immediate middle-class society, a society that in its complaisance made self-absorbed, materialistic women like the speaker possible. She also targets the injustice of Western society’s inequitable economic and social arrangements as a whole. Safe in their homes, as the speaker is safe, the privileged are screened from the consequences of the inequities from which they profit. What makes the poem uniquely Piatt’s is that she makes us see how wrong these inequities are by showing them to us through the eyes of the only member of this society uncompromised enough still to recognize wrong as wrong—a child.

For Discussion or Writing

1. The image of the palace burner that inspired this poem can be found in the July 8, 1871, issue of Harper's Weekly. Read the Harper's article that accompanies it in its entirety. Do you think that the journalist who wrote the story would be sympathetic to Piatt's position or not? Explain and defend your conclusion.

2. Describing the palace burner in stanzas 7 through 9, the speaker uses oxymorons, for example, "unappealing beautiful despair." Find three more and explore why Piatt might have chosen to present the palace burner in contradictory terms. Is the speaker's character oxymoronic also?
3. Look up dainty, languid, and worldly. Are these qualities positive or negative from the standpoint of the speaker? The son? The palace burner? Explain.
4. Compare and contrast Piatt's critique of 19th-century domestic female culture to Dickinson's in "What Soft-Cherubic Creatures." Consider especially the roles females play in each work.

"Her Blindness in Grief" (1873)

In a letter to E. C. Stedman, J. J. Piatt vividly describes his newborn son's death four days earlier. Healthy and vigorous at birth, the infant declined quickly, dying in his mother's arms a few days later. It was Sarah's first such loss, and she was inconsolable. Published three months later, "Blindness" supports J. J.'s description of Sarah's grief, reaching a pitch of raw personal emotion such as American women's poetry would not see again until Sylvia Plath's Ariel, 100 years later. As in Plath, however, this impression of intense personal emotion is itself a product of careful craft and should be understood as such.

In typical Piattian fashion, the speaker opens with a question that contains traces of what someone else (the speaker's husband? her minister? a solicitous friend?), has said, probably a warning that she was putting her soul at risk with her excessive mourning since it suggested a refusal to accept God's will. The speaker's response—"Sweeter than my soul was he"—indicates that her child matters more to her than her soul. "God is a silence . . . / . . . / A vision—that the seraphs see," and she wants "something I can touch." The next five stanzas develop this idea. Knowing her baby is with God and nursed "tenderly at Mary's breast" cannot assuage her grief because she wants him in the most primitive way possible: "Oh! But to kiss his little feet, / And say to them, so sweet, so sweet." If she cannot have him in this way, then there is "no comfort anywhere," whether or not he is in heaven.

The speaker is not being simply irrational or blasphemous. On the contrary, given the way the baby died, there is no rational way to come to terms with his death. The conundrum the speaker confronts is that posed by all child death: If God is all powerful and all good, why must the innocent suffer? "What could have hurt my baby? Why, / Why did he come; why did he go?" Without answers to these questions, how can she view his death as anything but a gratuitously cruel act inflicted on her by an uncaring deity: "My cry is but a human cry. / Who grieves for angels? Do they die?" To her God's humanity (or, rather, his lack of it) is the issue here.

Up to this point, the speaker had been flailing helplessly against her fate and it is hard to know how her struggle will turn out. There is blasphemy, true, but there is also an urgent need to understand. A return to faith in the concluding stanzas remains possible and because of the literary and social conventions of the era, most 19th-century readers would have expected it. But the hint of sarcasm in the speaker's question—"Do [angels] die?"—suggests a different shift instead, not toward faith but toward anger. If the speaker cannot have her baby, then she cannot make peace with God, and there can be no closure for her feelings, only the silence of despair.

So it is. Unable to submit to God's will without accepting her baby's death, the speaker instead embraces the open wound that is her loss, in some of the most powerful lines Piatt ever wrote: "The grief is bitter. Let me be. / He lies beneath that lonesome tree. / I've heard the fierce rain beating there. / Night covers it with cold moonshine. / Despair can only be despair. / God has his will. I have not mine." But we could never appreciate the brilliance and power of these simple, measured words and short declarative sentences had we not experienced the passionate struggle that preceded them. This is the craft that makes this poem great—and devastatingly human—at the same time. Only Plath equals it, in the last of the Ariel poems.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Look at the language of “touch” in stanza 2. What does the speaker mean when she says she longs for something she “can touch”? What other moments in the poem connect to this idea? What kinds of things can be touched, and what kinds of things cannot be touched? What is the point of such a distinction?
2. In stanza 4 the speaker imagines two mothers: her and Mary. In this stanza, where does she imagine her own baby? How does she feel about that? Why?
3. In the course of the poem, Piatt introduces some very grisly images. In stanza 1 she depicts her soul’s breast’s brooding on the lid of the coffin that holds her baby, while its empty eyes “stare at the dust.” In stanza 8 she imagines her baby’s hands, “as still as snows” even while its “white fingers” clutch her heart. Why might Piatt use such images? How do they contribute to the tone of the poem overall?
4. Stanza 3 opens by quoting Christ’s words to Mary Magdalene (John 20:15). The speaker then goes on to imagine that he talks to her. Read this stanza carefully. Paraphrase each line. What is the speaker’s point about how she would feel if Christ appeared to her now? In the poems of traditional religious consolation against which Piatt writes here, how might the speaker react to the same event?
5. Read Sylvia Plath’s “Contusion” in Ariel. Compare and contrast Plath’s use of language in this poem to Piatt’s use of language in the final stanza of “Her Blindness in Grief.”

“The Witch in the Glass” (1880)

Piatt’s tender side shows to best advantage in this poem, whose later history identifies it among her most popular work. Seventeen years after its original publication in 1880, “Witch” had the dubious honor of being plagiarized by Dorothea Moore in “Precocity,” published in an avant-garde periodical called the Chap-Book. Even more telling, the editor of a rival magazine remembered Piatt’s poem well enough to call Moore to account for her theft. More recently (2004), the poem makes a rather bewitching appearance, this time properly credited, in a romance novel, Loving Jesse. That an author writing today could find inspiration in the poem speaks to the kind of “freshness” that, as William Spengemann says, distinguishes Piatt’s work, allowing her poems to “remain alive in ways that those of her far more famous contemporaries simply do not” (xxiii).

One of Piatt’s shortest poems, “Witch” is divided into two stanzas, the first spoken by a young girl, the second by her wary but resigned mother. Using an utmost economy of means, Piatt captures that moment in a girl child’s life when she begins the transition to adult sexuality, her innocence still intact, but now at risk as she dreams of the life she will lead as a young woman. The imagery that Piatt employs in the first stanza—the mirror, the witch, and the “red, red mouth” of the child speaker, who seeks “the very thing [she] should not know”—could not be more spare. But insofar as these images are taken from fairy tales—most obviously “Snow White,” but also “Rapunzel,” “Sleeping Beauty,” and the rest—they do double duty. Not only do they suggest the girl’s still-lingering innocence (all she knows of love and sex is fairy tale romance), but they also remind us that sexual maturation is part of growing up.

In the second stanza the mother acknowledges the fact that her daughter is maturing and accepts her helplessness to prevent it, aware that even if all the mirrors in the land were covered, sooner or later “a bird,” a “wistful wind,” or “a rose,” sent “by some hapless boy,” “will whisper low / The very thing [her daughter] should not know.” If little girls dream their lives away reading fairy tales, just as in fairy tales, innocence will be lost no matter how hard parents work to prevent it. The conclusion is ironic, but the irony is gentle and the tone is a perfect blend of wistfulness and acceptance that speaks directly of a mother's love.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Think about the girl's relation to images from fairy tales. Which fairy tales or other children's stories had the greatest influence on you when you were growing up? Why?
2. Look up the word witch. Why does the poem use this word for the girl's image, rather than something like princess? Or is the "witch in the glass" not the girl? If it is not, who is the "witch" she sees there? Discuss.
3. Is there irony in this poem? And if so, toward whom is it extended?
4. Review the poem carefully and list all the words it uses that are related to mouths. Why does Piatt establish this pattern of images? How does it connect to the poem's theme as a whole?

"The First Party" (1882)

One of Piatt's classic dramatic dialogues, "The First Party" is composed entirely of direct quotations, making it especially important to keep careful track of who is saying what and why. The poem opens with a young girl exuberantly telling her "mamma" about the party she has just attended. It is her first boy-girl party, and it feeds a new sense of independence from her mother's judgments as she explores the pressures and pleasures of her peer group and the attractive but mysterious world of boys. In a timeless dynamic, her mother had wanted her to wear a more modest dress than the one she chose, which, with its red ribbons, caught the boys' attention. She defends herself by criticizing her saintly friend Rose for dressing too plainly (all in white) and implicitly criticizing her mother for not appreciating how important attracting the boys' attention is.

In contrast, we hear the mother's quiet voice on only a few occasions—at the start of stanza 3, halfway through stanza 4, and in the last two stanzas—but her few words contain a world of meaning. In fact, the heart of the poem lies in the gap of communication between the two, a gap in which the story of the mother's own romantic past is hidden, to be pieced out gradually by the reader but not by the daughter, who is still too innocent to understand what her mother is saying.

It is one of the impressive artistic achievements of this poem that it tells the story of two first parties at once: not just the daughter's, but the mother's as well. The most handsome boy from the daughter's party looks just like "that picture of—your brother's friend," the girl tells her mother. Piatt's poems frequently use dashes to mark either gaps in perspective or withheld information. Here we learn that the mother has not told her daughter the truth. This young man was not only her "brother's friend," but, as we learn in the final stanzas, the special handsome boy from her own first party—the "one boy" who mattered. He cannot write because he is dead; the mother keeps the bud from his grave. She does not know where he is because she does not know where heaven is or whether it is at all: "In some sweet foreign Country, it may be, / Among the palms." Who knows?

Because the daughter is still innocent, she does not catch her mother's double meanings. Taking her literally, she believes a young man (named Adam) gave the bud to her mother, when she was "in Eden." The mother, however, was speaking figuratively: "Adam" was her "first man" and "Eden" was her own first state of sexual innocence, both now long gone. When the mother says the bud is actually from his grave, the daughter no longer wants to touch it. Age, death, and loss are all unfamiliar and frightening to her. This innocent girl not only cannot imagine her mother's experiencing young love, but is blissfully unaware that like her mother's first love, her own will also be lost someday. The mother's sadness stems not only from remembering her own first heartache, but also from knowing that her daughter is retracing a pattern that will give her a similar knowledge of pain and loss.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Although this poem is in part about the mother's sadness, it is also about the daughter's excited happiness. The poem thus expresses sev- eral intense states of feeling. Find three instances in the poem where specific words and phrases reveal the mood of the speaker. Explain how these words enable you to figure out the mood.

2. Look back at all the instances in which the girl mentions her friend Rose. Analyze each in specific terms. In Robert Browning's dramatic monologues, the speaking character reveals information about himself that he does not intend to reveal. What does each of the girl's comments about Rose reveal about her?
 3. Piatt often uses dashes to indicate gaps in perspective or withheld information. Look back at line 3. Why does Piatt include a dash here? Remember that the girl is telling her story to her mother. How might this line read differently if she were telling the story to a friend?
 4. In literary studies we often use the word tone to talk about the author's attitudes, which are different from the characters' attitudes. What is the girl's attitude about the social world at her school in "The First Party"? Do you think that Piatt's tone differs from the girl's?
 5. In stanza 4 of "The First Party," the girl says, "Why don't you listen, mamma?" Use this line as the basis for writing about the theme of listening in the poem. Is the mother listening or not? Is the girl listening, or not? How might her question here be a useful window into the dynamic between them recorded by the poem on the whole?

"A Child's Party" (1883)

Although published relatively late in Piatt's career (1883), "A Child's Party" is Piatt's most detailed study of her own childhood and as such is one of the few intimate self-portraits she left behind. The portrait is by no means flattering. Set on the Spier plantation just after Piatt's mother died, the poem tells how as a child she inveigled a "dusky playmate"—that is, a slave child—into joining her in a "tea party" on the plantation's front lawn. When the two girls purloin props for the party from the house—silverware, china, clothing—they draw the wrath of the adult house slaves down upon their heads. In a letter to an admiring reader, Piatt vouches for the story's authenticity, citing it as one she told her own children about her "slave-play mates . . . when I was, as they seem to imagine, 'a little negro myself!'" (March 4, 1886).

One would expect from this letter that "A Child's Party" would be awash in the same sentimentalization of "happy" slaves and "kind" masters that characterizes most post-Reconstruction literature on the Old South, whether Northern or Southern. As in "Mock Diamonds," however, Piatt resists romanticizing the past. Instead, she manipulates point of view in order to tell her story from two perspectives at once, separating her adult self (the poem's speaker) from the child she was. This distinction between what she knew as a child and what she knows as an adult carries with it very different moral understandings of the narrative itself. Thus, for example, when the child self speaks cruel words to her playmate, the adult self says she recalls the words "with shame." Or again, when the child self dresses up her playmate in "grandmamma's most sacred shawl," the adult self says she did it to "set off [her] own transcendent bloom and grace," not to be generous, and so on. Readers must tackle the interpretive challenge of figuring out both adult and child perspectives at once.

As if the relationship between the adult speaker and her child self were not complex enough, Piatt also greatly complicates the relationship between the two children. For all her "Caucasian scorn," the speaker's child self is actually in a very weak position in relation to the slaves, even her playmate, since she knows very little about them, but they know a great deal about her. When she tries to assert her superiority over her playmate, she repeatedly stumbles as a result. The child self, for instance, thinks by dressing the slave child in grandmamma's shawl, she will establish the superiority of her own beauty, but the slave child knows that the shawl is worth far more than beauty since it is a badge of power, and she immediately starts ordering the other slave children around: "Call me Old Mistress! Do you hear?" Similarly, when the child self dismisses "brother Blair" as no

EDGAR ALLAN POE (1809–1849)

The demands of Truth are severe. She has no sympathy with the myrtles. All that which is so indispensable in Song is precisely all that with which she has nothing to do. It is but making her a flaunting paradox to wreath her in gems and flowers. In enforcing a truth we need severity rather than efflorescence of language. We must be simple, precise, terse.

(“The Poetic Principle”)

“Man is a rational animal; Man is a political animal”: These are tenets of the Aristotelian conception of humanity. But the American author Edgar Allan Poe subscribed to a different, darker vision of human nature, a concession to the irrational in humanity. Poe conceived the “imp of the perverse” as his idea of irrational “Man,” the being who succumbs to unconscious and even hateful impulses. He thereby anticipated the odysseys into the abyss of human thought by such writers as Fyodor Dostoevsky, H. P. Lovecraft, and Stephen King. When few authors, other than Shakespeare, had ventured to identify humanity as “the stuff dreams are made on,” Poe explored dreams, nightmares, fantasies, and compulsive impulses in a way to make Freud shudder. He courted the abstruse and sought to embrace an arcane medievalism, when most of his contemporaries were copying European myths and legends or trying to attach American folklore to a Puritan past. T. S. Eliot denounced Poe’s adolescent advocacy of a supernal realm of perfect beauty and intuitive understanding. On the other hand, Steven Spielberg admits that his best movies would have been inconceivable without Poe’s Icarian idealism, his eccentric search for transcendence.

Poe eludes easy categorization, since he resists being an “American” writer. His personal feelings of disinheritance appear to have permeated his tales, and he refuses to locate his narratives in an American setting. He courts the bizarre, the fantastic, the grotesque, the dangerously morbid. He indulges in necromancy, in Eastern and gothic texts, in antiquarianism for its own sake. He wants to be Merlin or Nostradamus, an alchemist after Goethe’s Faust. Yet everywhere we find references to the two seminal works that ground American literature, the Bible and the works of Shakespeare. In his own time, Poe borrowed from Charles Brockden Brown, Washington Irving, NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Lord Byron, Walter Scott, and E. T. A. Hoffmann. He liked the fictional style offered in Blackwood’s Journal. Popular culture lured him with its incursions into mesmerism and archaeology, especially Egyptology. He read minor poets and purveyors of the macabre. Drawing from the many writers in his canon, Poe added an immediacy of effect, a nervous energy that struck a new chord, decidedly musical, in his reading public. The French loved him in his own time and beyond, hence Poe’s great influence on symbolism and surrealist poets and painters, including Franz Kafka and Edward Burne-Jones, Rainier Maria Rilke, and Egon Schiele. Poe espoused a theory of the superior, aesthetic personality, and so we can see connections to Oscar Wilde, George Bernard Shaw, and Friedrich Nietzsche. The art of the detective story and his delving into criminal psychology deeply affected Arthur Conan Doyle and Robert Louis Stevenson. And few can compete with his virtuosic vocabulary, singular erudition, hard work, and mastery of the English language.

Edgar Poe was born in Boston in 1809. Two years later his actor father, David Poe, Jr., abandoned Edgar; his older brother, William Henry Leonard, age four; and his sister, Rosalie, less than a year old, in the sole care of their mother, Elizabeth Arnold, who continued to act professionally on the stage. Soon orphaned in late 1811, after the December death of his mother, Edgar received protection, but never formal adoption, by John Allan and his family of Richmond, Virginia. The Allans gave Edgar a good education, including five years abroad, in England, 1815–20. In 1826 Poe entered the University of Virginia, but he left after one year, since Mr. Allan refused to underwrite a second year of study. Allan had no patience with Poe's literary aspirations, nor with Poe's character, which Allan thought dissolute. Poe considered Allan miserly and abusive. Allan died when Poe was in his early twenties, not caring to mention Poe in his will.

Resigned to faring on his own, Poe became associated with eastern cities, Boston, Richmond, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. In Boston Poe enlisted in the army under a pseudonym, Edgar A. Perry. At the same time, a Boston publisher brought out Poe's first book, Tamerlane and Other Poems, an indication of Poe's future development. Poe attended West Point (an apocryphal story of Poe's West Point fiasco has him appearing on parade wearing only his shoes and sword!), but after his expulsion for gross neglect of duty and general disobedience in 1831 he moved to Baltimore to live with the remaining members of the Poe family, his aunt, Maria Clemm, and her daughter, Virginia. Despite what may or may not be the stuff of lore, Poe embarked in writing gothic fiction, some of which satirized German and British models. Whatever his approach may have been at the beginning, Poe soon found himself published and the winner of a prestigious prize; in 1833 the Baltimore Saturday Visitor awarded Poe $50 for "MS Found in a Bottle." This national recognition ultimately enabled Poe to secure an editorial post in 1834 on a Richmond, Virginia, magazine, the Southern Literary Messenger. Meanwhile, Poe's brother, William Henry, had died of alcoholism in August 1831, and once in Richmond Poe sent for Mrs. Clemm and her daughter, Virginia (aged 13), whom he eventually married in order to regularize his familial circumstances.

Poe's work on the Southern Literary Messenger increased its circulation 10-fold, solidifying his reputation and providing some financial security, but his ambitions began to expand beyond Richmond, even while his alcoholism had begun to intrude on his professional life. Poe fell into an unfortunate pattern, especially so far as the publishing world was concerned, for unreliability. During this period in May 1836, Poe married his cousin, Virginia Clemm. Virginia's mother, Maria Poe Clemm, entirely approved, and the three lived together as a family. In 1837 Poe either quit or was forced off the staff of the Messenger, and he moved to New York in a fruitless quest to find permanent employment. He published his one novel, The Narrative of A. Gordon Pym, an epic adventure-romance, in an attempt to expand his literary horizons and legitimize the American novel in a larger structural context, akin to Virgil's Aeneid. Pym inspired such writers as Richard Henry Dana and HERMAN MELVILLE, and possibly Joseph Conrad, to exploit the South Seas narrative as a vehicle for their own use. Pym also established Poe as the philosophical antithesis to RALPH WALDO EMERSON and HENRY DAVID THOREAU's naive optimism in nature's innate goodness. Nature, for both Poe and Hawthorne, would always be a mix of mother and destroyer, nurturer and fatal temptress.

The year 1839 found Poe in Philadelphia, an assistant editor at Burton's Gentleman's Magazine. There Poe composed several of his most famous tales, "Ligeia," and "The Fall of the House of Usher," but his drinking provoked his dismissal. When Burton's, under new management, became Graham's Magazine, Poe was rehired. The period 1839–44 had Poe at the top of his form, and, along with "The Tell-Tale Heart," "The Masque of the Red Death," and "The Pit and the Pendulum," Poe wrote "The Gold Bug," which won a $1,000 award from the Philadelphia Dollar Newspaper. Poe also embarked on literary criticism, a role that would win him friends and rivals. In 1844 he moved to New York, settling in a country house in the Bronx. He composed several more tales and critical essays and one treatise in philosophy, Eureka. His major achievement was the publication of "The Raven," a poem of anguished loss and bereavement. "The Raven" generated fame, if not wealth, and it would quickly become a standard poem in America's literary canon, a prime example of poetic "music" at a period when America had no actual composer to compete with romantic artists such as Frédéric Chopin, Robert Schumann, and Franz Liszt.

Around 1845 Poe realized his dearest wish, to become the sole editor of an influential literary magazine, the Broadway Journal. Unfortunately mismanagement and improper investment led to the magazine's demise. This melancholy period reached a tragic peak in January 1847, with the early death of Poe's young wife, Virginia, after she had suffered repeated bouts with tuberculosis. Her alternate lapses and recoveries may have contributed to the poet's equally fitful bouts of drinking; certainly her image as a frail, almost supernaturally delicate presence found its way into many of his tales and poems, such as "Annabel Lee" and "The Oval Portrait."

In 1846–47 Poe tried to rekindle his romantic life by courting a number of literary ladies; on one occasion Poe offered marriage to Sarah Helen Whitman but was rebuffed at the last minute. He decided to return to Richmond, thinking the South offered future success. The people of Richmond actually lionized Poe, acknowledging him as a major literary personage. Nearing the end of his intense but truncated career, Poe enjoyed something close to celebrity, in that he was wined and dined, quoted, and perpetually sought out for his opinions. A much-proffered photograph of the time (1849) reveals a handsome, secure, confident, and healthy man, a definite contrast to other images of him, which support his reputation as sickly and dissolute. His prospects looked good; he took a pledge to abstain from drink; he became engaged to a childhood sweetheart, Elmira Royster; and he again formulated plans to initiate another literary magazine on his own.

None of these happy possibilities, unfortunately, was to be. While Poe was returning to New York from Richmond in 1849, a series of still unexplained mishaps occurred. Poe failed to reach New York and was instead found in Baltimore, lying in a coma in the street. It was election time in Baltimore, a city rather notorious for political skull-duggery, including falsifying voters' registrations, carousing, brawling, and sexual blackmail. On October 6, Poe passed away in a Baltimore hospital. Speculation has it that Poe was either the victim of foul play or the victim of his own propensity to drunkenness. His condition had apparently devolved into pneumonia, whose signs accord with contemporary descriptions of Poe's states.

It has taken the better part of 150 years to undo a reputation built up by certain critics seeking to discredit Poe's personal and literary repute in America. More than once, Poe's complete mastery of the first-person narrator caused readers to confuse Poe with the social psychopaths and murderers he portrays in his writing. Many of his tales depict a protagonist who takes a sadistic delight in tormenting perceived oppressors. The vividness of Poe's detail has encouraged some readers to identify him with the lunatics, drug addicts, and multifarious fringe or marginal social types of his tales. But the richness of allusion and the apparent cosmopolitanism of his style reveal an urbane, cultivated individual, whose range of motifs and imagistic strategies shows him well versed in the lively arts of his day. The persistent themes in Poe—such as the odyssey of descent, often into nightmare—ally him to the continental influence of Dante and epic journeys to the underworld in Homer. As does Hawthorne, Poe explores the tenuous relationship between art and life, the often-fatal attraction of aestheticism, which would influence Walter Pater and his acolyte, Oscar Wilde. As a literary critic, Poe is well aware of his debts to Aristotle, Wyatt, Shelley, and Wordsworth, whose efforts to codify art through a deliberate approach to poetics influenced Poe's own structured manner of thinking about the aims of poetic creation. In many respects, Poe is a Roman writer in the manner of Petronius, cataloging spiritual hubris and excess in palatial settings, invoking the divine vengeance of death itself. MARK TWAIN (Samuel Langhorne Clemens) offered us A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court, but Poe takes us further back in history, into the primal, archaic night of primitive, destructive energies.

“Sonnet—to Science” (1829)

Poe composed his “Sonnet—to Science” in 1829, revising it in 1843. The octet sets the major tension in the poem: the poet’s refusal to pay homage to science, the spirit of which he conceives as predatory, a “Vulture” that both penetrates and preys upon the poet’s heart. Poe deliberately sets a neoclassical tone, in almost direct imitation of Keats’s “Ode on a Grecian Urn,” which addresses the antique art object as the “foster-child of silence and slow time” (l. 2). Here science is the “true daughter of Old Time” (l. 1), but she proves sterile, since the persona of the poem asks, “How should he love thee?” (l. 5). Science alters what it sees, and it seems to transform what Poe most venerates, the eternal world of myth and imaginative possibility. In its unsentimental analysis of nature, science would appear to have divested that very nature of its sacred mysteries. Poe’s antimeliorist position, his stance that scientific progress does not ensure a more beautiful quality of life, aligns him with several British romantics, such as Blake, Dickens, Tennyson, and even the later filmmaker, Charlie Chaplin (in Modern Times), all of whom deeply suspect that humanity’s moral life is not uplifted by science and technology. We can see something of the same disenchantment with science in Hawthorne’s story “The Celestial Railroad.”

The poet himself enjoys a classical conceit: He is Daedalus, the inventor of the labyrinth and the fashioner of those wings of wax that lifted him and his doomed son, Icarus, from Crete into the freedom of the air, having soared with “undaunted wing” (l. 8). Poe’s equation of science with the vulture likewise confirms upon the poet the status of Prometheus, who suffered the tearing of his liver by this winged emissary from an angry Zeus for having delivered to humanity the sacred fire of Mount Olympus. The vulture’s wings are “dull realities” (l. 4), bequeathing to humanity a world bereft of myth. In the sestet we reap the barren consequences of science’s invasion of our fanciful life: The Moon Goddess has been “dragged . . . from her car” (l. 9), the Hamadryad (l. 10) and Naiad (l. 12) exiled from their native haunts of wood and flood, the Elf sequestered from his green (l. 13), the poet from his “summer dream” (l. 14). That the poet can no longer wander “to seek for treasure in the jeweled skies” (l. 7) robs him of his cosmic aspirations, and the skies are stripped of metaphysical value. Several female representatives of myth have fled Poe’s universe “to seek shelter in some happier star.” Science “tears” the fabric of fruitful illusion. Moreover, the separation of the poet from his “summer dream beneath the tamarind tree” leaves him with the sobering thought of a world without illusions, a world perhaps ruled by Hades and Persephone, an eternal winter of spiritual discontent.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Is there an inherent contradiction in Poe’s appraisal of “science” if his terms are entirely mythical? Is Poe’s a “realistic” notion of science—perhaps it might be relevant to consider his “scientific” hypotheses in his visionary essay Eureka!?
2. How does Poe’s antiscientific attitude compare with Wordsworth’s stance on contemporary faith in “The World Is Too Much with Us” or with Blake’s cynical “The Garden of Love,” which also speaks of the robbing of the “green”?

“Romance” (1829)

“Romance” is a relatively youthful piece by Poe. Poe’s personification of romance as a sentient being, a kind of teacher, aligns him with the romantic movement in general (c. 1750–1850). The romantic sensibility is credited to the French philosopher Jean-Jacques Rousseau for his having conceived, in his political and social polemics, particularly Emile, that the child is educated by nature. We might recall that Poe's contemporary Nathaniel Hawthorne specifically defined romance as that "twilight" domain between hard fact and subjective fancy, almost a direct invitation to Rod Serling's television Twilight Zone series. Poe alludes to Rousseau when he claims to have learned "my very earliest word / While in the wild wood I did lie" (ll. 8–9), as if he were a feral child, a version of Rousseau's "Noble Savage." We will see these conceits attributed to Edgar Rice Burroughs's Tarzan and to Rudyard Kipling's Mowgli in The Jungle Books.

Set in two stanzas of roughly equal length, "Romance" seems similar to EMILY DICKINSON's poems in some ways. Poe may have originated the use of the dash in American lyrics as a way of pointing up emphatic emotion or rarified images. The two stanzas contrast visionary, carefree youth and disturbed, passionless maturity. The bird imagery of stanza 1 proves salutary: Romance "loves to nod and sing / With drowsy head and folded wing, / . . . To me a painted paroquet / Hath been—a most familiar bird—" (ll. 1–6). Romance is a dreamer, and its "medium" is the colorful parakeet, who "Taught me my alphabet to say—" (l. 7). When Poe's narrator claims that his tutelage under the bird was as "a child-with a most knowing eye" (l. 10), he seizes upon two common notions of romanticism, the first that proposed by William Wordsworth in his 1802 lyric "My Heart Leaps Up," where he states that "the Child is father of the Man" (l. 7). The paradox is a romantic tenet: Our earliest impressions establish our fundamental nature, our personal and collective sensibility and capacity to feel. The second concerns the "penetrating eye" or "Transparent Eyeball" of both the Masonic Illuminati and the poetic doctrines of Ralph Waldo Emerson—the idea of the "clear eyes of youth." Childhood was venerated, not only by Rousseau in Emile, but in the poetic work of the British poets William Blake and Percy Shelley and the British novelists Charlotte Brontë and Charles Dickens. The violation of childhood, of one's primal innocence, consistently warrants condemnation as the original sin.

Stanza 2 of "Romance" communicates a dire transformation: "Of late, the eternal Condor years / So shake the very Heaven on high / . . . I have no time for idle cares" (ll. 11–14). Life has taken a predatory, convulsive turn, and the "tumult" as the years "thunder by" (l. 13) more than suggests Milton's pandemonium in heaven when the forces of Satan assault God's kingdom. The orphic power of youthful vision is forfeit. Time spent with "lyre and rhyme" (l. 18), the healing powers of Apollo and the muses, are become "forbidden things!" (l. 19). When the narrator guiltily confesses, "My heart would feel to be a crime / Unless it trembled with the strings" (ll. 20–21), we can say of men, with the poet William Butler Yeats, "Their hearts have not grown old" ("The Wild Swans at Coole" l. 22). The consolation in this poem occurs at the word unless (l. 21), which suggests that musical inspiration and passion that occasionally descend upon him in "an hour with calmer wings" (l. 16) can move the poet's soul in spite of himself. The recovery of poetic insight is still possible.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What kinds of events or concerns might grab the narrator's attention when he is "gazing on the unquiet sky" (l. 15)? Why might such events divest him of his childhood freedom?
2. Compare Poe's vision of youth in "Romance" to Dickinson's view of nature in her lyric "These are the days when Birds come back – ." How are their estimations of "original innocence" comparable?

"Israfel" (1831)

"Israfel" exhibits Poe's interest in Eastern or exotic subject matter, a typical feature of romanticism, which saw the publication, in 1859, of Edward Fitzgerald's translation of The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. The "long ago and the far away" likewise pervades the novels of Sir Walter Scott and Poe's own Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym. Pym is set in the distant land of Antarctica. Several lines of the poem, as well as its musicality, point to “The Blessed Damoiselle” of Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

The title is taken from a line of the Moslem holy book the Quran, which describes Israfel as an angel “whose heart-strings are a lute, and who has the sweetest voice of all God’s creatures” (Poe’s note to the poem). We see this same conceit applied to the French preface to the short story “The Fall of the House of Usher.” In both instances, Poe takes up the idea that one’s heart is a stringed instrument consistently associated with Orpheus of Greek myth. In eight stanzas, the poem celebrates the spirit who sings unabashedly of erotic love and inflamed passions: “the skies that angel trod, / Where deep thoughts are a duty— / Where Love’s a grown-up God— / . . . // Therefore thou art not wrong / Israfeli, who despiseth / An unimpassioned song” (ll. 24–32). We might speculate that Poe’s Israfel embodies that same erotic force that Mozart’s Don Giovanni projects in the famous opera.

When Israfel sings, the very heavens become mute, beguiled by “Israfeli’s fire” (l. 19) and his “burning measures” (l. 37) that touch the full range of human emotions: “Thy grief, thy joy, thy hate, thy love” (l. 38). Poe’s use of fire imagery to describe a musical figure invokes lines in Coleridge’s “Kubla Khan,” in which we are admonished that the inspired bard possesses Promethean powers: “Beware! Beware! / His flashing eyes, his floating hair!” (ll. 49–50). No less evident is Israfel’s power to intoxicate: “None sings so wildly well / As the angel Israfel, / And the giddy stars (so legends tell), / Ceasing their hymns, attend the spell / Of his voice” (ll. 3–7). Even the moon totters in drunken ecstasy (l. 9), and Artemis, traditionally averse to men and human love, “Blushes with love” (l. 12). Poe appeals to more Eastern spirits when he invokes “the Houri glances” (l. 27), the virgins of paradise promised to the most faithful Muslims. Recall that the romantic composer Robert Schumann composed an Eastern drama of love and redemption entitled Paradise and the Peri (1843).

The turn in “Israfel” occurs in stanza 7, where it becomes clear that the earthly poet covets Israfel’s heavenly powers for his own use; the world of metaphor is not the world of reality: “this / Is a world of sweets and sours; / Our flowers are merely—flowers” (ll. 41–43). And the entire last stanza inverts the musical relation, so that Israfel “might not sing so wildly well / A mortal melody, / While a bolder note than this might swell / From my lyre within the sky” (ll. 49–52). The parallels between Poe’s persona’s desire to assume Israfel’s power and Coleridge’s narrator’s desire to appropriate the musical effect of the “damsel with a dulcimer” (“Kubla Khan” l. 37) are quite striking: “Could I revive within me / Her symphony and song, / . . . I would build that dome in air” (“Kubla Khan” ll. 42–46). The Orphic, erotic power of music to compel the heavens, “the ecstasies above” (l. 36), even the Pleiades (l. 14), to obedience and subservience permeates both visions. The poetic ego, as does Faust in Goethe’s epic parable, seeks absolute authority over the passions of men.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How does the image of “the trembling living wire” (l. 21) contribute to the “elemental” power of Israfel’s music? What does the image tell you about the role of thought and reason in Israfel’s creative process?
2. At one point, the poet calls Israfel “Best bard, because the wisest!” (l. 34). What evidence is there to support this claim?
3. Compare Poe’s lyric to Edna St. Vincent Millay’s “On Hearing a Symphony by Beethoven” and find correlations in the poets’ reactions relative to the power of music.

“The City in the Sea” (1831)

Poe wrote “The City in the Sea” in 1831, revising it in 1845. In four large stanzas, Poe seems to take his cue from Dante and describes the realm of Death, using specific images from both the Old and New Testaments of the Bible. The subject of Death’s dominion arises again in Poe’s fascinating story “The Masque of the Red Death,” wherein Death penetrates the otherwise hermetically sealed castle of Prince Prospero. Poe may have known a famous fresco, The Triumph of Death, by the 14th-century Italian painter Orcagna, upon which the romantic composer Franz Liszt based his series of brilliant variations called Totentanz, the dance of death. The last stanza, in which “Down, down that town shall settle hence” (l. 51), hints at the legend of Ys, the fabled city in Brittany that sank beneath the waves. That city was the subject of an opera by Eduard Lalo and of Claude Debussy's haunting piano prelude Le Cathedrale Engoutie.

Poe's morbid obsession with dark water reads to us as typical of his equation of tombs with wombs, the waters of amniotic fluid and protected life with the Freudian depths of the unconscious mind. Does Poe love Death or fear Death? The opening, “Lo! Death has reared himself a throne” (l. 1), has the tone of pride born of radical individualism: “There shrines and palaces and towers / . . . Resemble nothing that is ours” (ll. 6, 8). Death himself “from a proud tower in the town / . . . looks gigantically down” (ll. 28–29). Poe claims that the city of the dead lies in darkness, yes, but “light from out the lurid sea” (l. 14) still casts an eerie illumination upon the “Babylon-like walls” (l. 18). The wicked city of Babylon invites destruction by the Lord in both Isaiah 14 and 21 and Revelation 16–18. Poe seems to invoke the unholy music of such an accursed place when he tells us the unnatural light streams “Up many and many a marvelous shrine / Whose wreathed friezes intertwine / The viol, the violet, and the vine” (ll. 21–23). We are caught in the throes of what Joseph Conrad called, in Heart of Darkness, “the fascination of the abomination.” Stanzas 3 and 4 well invoke a scene from the Apocalypse: “There open fanes and gaping graves / Yawn level with the luminous waves” (ll. 30–31). We are transfixed by “seas . . . hideously serene” (l. 41).

The turn in the poem occurs in the last stanza, which immediately echoes the first: “But lo, a stir is in the air!” (l. 42). The towers of the ghostly city appear to sink, moving “As if their tops had feebly given / A void within the filmy Heaven” (ll. 46–47). The ensuing red glow that engulfs the town as it sinks heralds a perverse birth: “The hours are breathing faint and low—/ And when, amid no earthly moans, / . . . Hell, rising from a thousand thrones, / Shall do it reverence” (ll. 49–53). We are witness to something uncanny and paradoxical, like William Blake's “Marriage of Heaven and Hell.” The prophet in Isaiah utters, “Hell . . . stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth; it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations” (Isaiah 14:9). Has Death achieved some similar but unholy apotheosis? Is it indeed better, to cite Milton's Satan, to reign in hell than to serve in heaven?

For Discussion or Writing

1. Explain Poe's use of the pronoun ours in line 8. In what ways might this poem be designed to tell us something important about our present age?
2. Consider the repeated line “A terrible beauty is born” from “Easter 1916” by William Butler Yeats. How can “The City in the Sea” and the Yeats poem be said to celebrate the same event? Look particularly at Poe's second stanza and lines like “Up domes—up spires—up Kingly halls—” (l. 17).

“To Helen” (1831, revised 1845)

Poe wrote that “To Helen” was inspired by the mother of one his schoolmates, Mrs. Jane Stanard, and is composed of “lines written, in my passionate boyhood, to the first, purely ideal love of my soul” (qtd. in McMichael 541). The Helen of the poem becomes Helen of Troy, daughter of Zeus and a mortal woman, Leda, to whom he appeared as a swan. When Paris stole Helen, he caused the Trojan War, which later inspired Homer's epic The Iliad.

Poe's vision of Helen is set entirely in classical conceits within a (Spenserian) sonnet of 15 lines. Poe's strategy is to link his speaker's ardent affection to an enlightened past, extending his love over epochs. His spirit is likened to that of Odysseus, “The weary, way-worn wanderer” (l. 4) seeking “his own native shore” (l. 5). Those “Nicean” (l. 2) barks of yore musically connect the persona to a home of Dionysus, a wanderer in myth. The narrator has traversed “desperate seas” (l. 6) in search of a time to which he can belong. Always spiritually anachronistic, Poe moves restlessly in search of the stasis and repose Helen—“statue-like”—offers (l. 12). The attraction to Helen’s “Naiad airs” (l. 8) confirms her association with placid, steady waters, as opposed to the rough seas of the narrator’s long experience. She provides clarity to his mind, bearing “the agate lamp within thy hand!” (l. 13), now assuming the character of the mythical Psyche, the Soul and lover of Cupid. That Psyche could no longer love Eros when exposed to the light does not seem to daunt our narrator. When Poe invokes the “Holy Land” (l. 15) as the region of her influence, it would appear that Poe has fused classical and Christian time.

What makes the poem endure is the youthful sincerity of its images, many of which depend on sensory qualities, such as the “perfumed sea” (l. 3) and its direct relation to the “Naiad airs” (l. 8) that Helen emanates. Poe is ever the aesthete, the votary of beauty, which Helen embodies, who takes him to his true home, “the glory that was Greece / And the grandeur that was Rome” (ll. 9–10). The legend of The Flying Dutchman must have appealed to Poe, the eternally disenfranchised spirit seeking a “gentle” female figure (Senta in the German legend and Wagner’s opera) to offer him solace and spiritual roots.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare Poe’s need for a woman to guide (or lure) him home to Franz Kafka’s persistent search for a female intermediary in The Trial or to Ralph Ellison’s nameless narrator’s relation to a woman (Sybil) in his novel Invisible Man. Do you see this dependence on a woman as an expression of strength or weakness?
2. To what extent does the poem present an idealized vision of male and female roles? Explain what you see as the social and personal implications of these roles.

“The Sleeper” (1831)

Walter Pater, the British critic and aesthete, wrote that “all art aspires to the condition of music.” Poe’s poetry subscribes to this maxim, especially “The Sleeper,” which the youthful Poe composed in 1831. In four stanzas of unequal length, Poe describes another of his lunar visions (as in “To Science”) that will prove most ambiguous in meaning: At first, the narrator claims to spy “the lake” (l. 13) where “All beauty sleeps!—and lo! where lies / Irene, with her Destinies!” (ll. 16–17). Irene, one of the keepers of the seasons in Greek myth, is also the goddess of peace and wealth. While she sleeps in her chamber, a threatening throng of “wanton airs . . . Laughingly through the lattice drop— / The bodiless airs, a wizard rout, / Flit through thy chamber in and out” (ll. 20–23). Sleeping Beauty lies in danger of violation. The poem is rife with invisible powers: The mystic moon emanates “An opiate vapor, dewy, dim” (l. 3), and “bodiless airs . . . flit . . . fitfully—so fearfully— / Above the closed and fringed lid / ’Neath which thy slumb’ring soul lies hid” (ll. 22, 25–27). That the narrator recognizes the lunar scent as “opiate” suggests a drug-induced dream, akin to the vision given to Sir Thomas De Quincey (in his Confessions of an English Opium Eater), to Coleridge (prior to his writing “Kubla Khan”), and to Hector Berlioz (composer of the Fantastic Symphony). The narrator is somewhat in awe of the lady’s ability to sleep amid such danger: “Oh, lady dear, has thou no fear? / Why and what art thou dreaming here?” (ll. 30–31). The narrator would seem the protector of the lady’s peace and security: “The lady sleeps! . . . I pray to God that she may lie / Forever with unopened eye, / While the pale sheeted ghosts go by!” (ll. 37, 42–44). By the last stanza, the narrator addresses the lady as “My love, she sleeps! Oh, may her sleep, / As it is lasting, so be deep!” (ll. 45–46).

Many of the images are idyllic in character, and they might incline the reader—given their passing references to “the month of June” (l. 1), “the quiet mountain top” (l. 6), and “the ruin” that “moulders into rest” (l. 12)—to think of the relatively gentle, melancholy musings on mortality in Thomas Gray’s “Ode in a Country Churchyard.” Even the lake in the woods recalls Lethe (l. 13), the river of forgetfulness in Hades. Readers of romance will merge the lake with the sleeping Irene and form the composite image, “The Lady of the Lake.” But more sinister thoughts plague this poem. While the lady sleeps, “Soft may the worms about her creep!” (l. 47). Recall that wanton spirits and crawling worms “try the virginity” of Andrew Marvell’s “To His Coy Mistress” (ll. 27–28). The “black / And winged panels” (ll. 50–51) of the tomb suggest Nemesis with an awful power, “Triumphant, o’er the crested palls / Of her grand family funerals—” (ll. 52–53). The triumph of death also dominates Poe’s tale “The Masque of the Red Death” and provides the subject of Orcagna’s fresco The Triumph of Death (located in the Campo Santo in Pisa). Then, with what may be a particular spite in Poe, he turns his attention to the lady’s fallen childhood: “Some sepulcher, remote, alone, / Against whose portal she hath thrown, / In childhood, many an idle stone— / . . . Thrilling to think, poor child of sin! / It was the dead who groaned within” (ll. 54–60). Has the lady, in her childish irreverence, violated some sacred precinct? The declaration “She ne’er shall force an echo more” (l. 58) carries an implication of rape, of wanton violence. Has the lady been condemned to death by the dead? “Strange is thy pallor! Strange thy dress! / Strange, above all, thy length of tress, / And this solemn silentness!” (ll. 34–36). Is even the goddess of peace and harmony the fruit of man’s fallen nature? Combining possible images from the fairy tale “Rapunzel” (Grimm 1812) with his own gothic machinery, Poe creates a disturbing tapestry of sight and sound that, Sphinx-like, poses more riddles than it answers.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider the way that Poe’s concentration on the atmosphere generated by sleep allows the narrator to express inner fears and desires. What might the narrator be disclosing about his own subconscious or the inner desires of others?

2. Compare the narrative style of Poe’s “The Sleeper” to Tennyson’s “The Lady of Shalott” (1833). Do both poets envision the tensions surrounding their respective ladies in the same way? Walt Whitman composed an extended poem titled “The Sleepers.” In what ways are his musings as “ghoulish” as those of Poe’s narrator?

“Sonnet—Silence” (1840)

Poe composed his Sonnet “Silence” in 1840, revising it in 1845. Poe chooses a 15-line version of the sonnet form, a throwback to the work of Edmund Spenser. The poem asserts the double, dual character of humanity, a notion that extends from sources in the Persian, Manichean notion that the forces of darkness and light perpetually battle for supremacy. Poe chooses to characterize the tension as between the “incorporate” (l. 1) and the “corporate” (l. 10). The eternal struggle of light and dark, humanity’s “double life” (l. 2), had always been a persistent theme in literature, for example, in Shakespeare’s Macbeth, but the romantics made it their special fixation, culminating in works like Stevenson’s Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde and Wilde’s The Picture of Dorian Gray. In the world of music, for instance, the romantic composer Robert Schumann (1810–56) divided his own soul into two personalities, Florestan and Eusebius, the former his aggressive, masculine side, and the latter his feminine, poetic self. Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein betrays aspects of this same theme of dualism in human nature, and Poe might well allude to that novel’s austere setting in the arctic regions when he claims that a shadow (l. 13) of the dead “haunteth the lone regions where hath trod / No foot of man” (ll. 14–15). When Poe calls this distressing figure an “elf” (l. 13), he invokes his own invention, “the imp of the perverse,” by which he indicts Man for his capacity for mischief in this world.

Poe’s language in this poem is deliberately old and arcane, with words like bath (ll. 11, 14), thee

(l. 13), haunted (l. 14), and thysself (l. 15) the most obvious. But the entire tenor of the poem is slow and melancholy, a funeral dirge that mirrors its theme of a basic enmity between competing primal forces. Poe achieves what he always sought in his compositions, a unity of effect, a focusing of all elements of the work on a single central theme, observation, or emotion. Poe's use of the term shade (l. 4) suggests Homer, Dante, and Milton, all poets who envision the land of the dead. Poe claims the corporeal dead evince no terror and asserts that the dead man's silence is final: His name is "No more" (l. 9). The connection to the "Nevermore" of Poe's "The Raven" seems quite close. The problem lies in Poe's version, or vision, of the "incorporate" (l. 1), which constitutes "that twin entity" (l. 3), the "two-fold Silence" (l. 5). Rather than explain his assertion, Poe offers metaphors—"solid and shade" (l. 4), "sea and shore" (l. 5), "Body and Soul" (l. 6)—as manifestations of a division that "springs" (l. 3) from another schism, that of "matter and light" (l. 4).

Poe does offer one contrast, or consolation: that one of these beings inhabits "lonely places, / Newly with grass overgrown" (ll. 6–7), an indication of graves that the silent grass has freshly covered. The departed is rendered "terrorless" (l. 9) by the application of "some solemn graces, / Some human memories and tearful lore" (ll. 7–8), all of which provide the departed with a name, a history, an epitaph, and a sense of loss among those who mourn him. These "conventions" and ceremonies of death—or death's rituals—involve sound, not silence. The sounds of mourning would appear to render the Dead harmless; his death falls within the scheme of life, and so we should "dread him not!" (l. 10). His capacity for evil appears neutralized. Then Poe casts doubt on the finality of death in the last quatrain: Some element, some "shadow" (l. 13) remains unsatisfied—dare we assume that some "silence" is responsible? We do know that the "elf" (l. 13) is "nameless" (l. 13), so perhaps its very anonymity is the source of its evil power. Here we might recall those three witches in Shakespeare's Macbeth who perform "a deed without a name" (3, 4, 50). The original sin has no "first" name. The word untimely (l. 12) relates well to that play, since it is rife with words and phrases beset by the prefix un. Poe ends his poem with a veiled threat: Should you encounter this fearsome, nameless shadow figure, by dint of "some urgent fate" (l. 12), then "commend thyself to God!" (l. 15).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Identify points in the poem that demonstrate Poe's efforts to create a "unity of effect." Explain what his aim is and how his particular selection of terms supports that aim.
2. How might you compare Poe's vision of "sea and shore" (l. 5) as connected by silence to that of Matthew Arnold in "Dover Beach," which offers an image of calm as its first impression?
3. Find other sources of dualism in romantic literature; for example, the doppelgänger idea in Goethe and its echoes in works like The Double by Dostoyevsky and "The Horla" by Guy de Maupassant.

"The Raven" (1844)

Poe's most famous poem, "The Raven," was composed in 1844 and revised twice, in 1845 and 1849. While many can quote this poem verbatim, few try to discuss its meaning. It appears to concern an emotionally desolate man in the "bleak December" (7), bereaved by the death of his lost love, Lenore, who is visited by a Raven, which rather significantly perches itself atop of a bust of Pallas Athena and squawks, "Nevermore" at its outraged human host until he suffers distraction. There are 18 stanzas, each divided into groups of six lines, of which the last three lines rhyme, perhaps influenced by Dante's terza rima (interlocking iambic tercets: ababcb) for The Divine Comedy. Poe consciously chose the name Lenore to capitalize on its melancholy sound and its rhyming with many other words. With his innate ear for music, Poe likewise created poetic lines of inner rhyme, alliterative resonance, and emotional repetition that would unify the somber, even nerve-wracking effect of this bird's intrusion into a man's private anguish.

We must assume that at the poem's outset, the narrator has been pondering "over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore" (l. 2) both to gain solace for the loss of the "rare and radiant maiden" (l. 11) and perhaps to discover some arcane knowledge to restore her from the dead. The very thought that his earnest attempts at resurrection may have elicited the desired response accounts for the fact that the tapping at the door at midnight "Thrilled me—filled me with fantastic terrors" (l. 14) and had him "dreaming dreams no mortal ever dared to dream before" (l. 26). The connection to Victor Frankenstein's project of raising the dead comes to mind, and its "hellish" implications reverberate in "The Raven" when the narrator returns to his chamber, "all my soul within me burning" (l. 31). His desire for salvation from his various passions projects upon the Raven an association with "the saintly days of yore" (l. 38) when it first steps into his chamber. The bird is an emissary of nature, that eternal object of romantic pantheism to which America's first prophet-philosopher RALPH WALDO EMERSON attached the powers of religious revelation and redemption. "The Raven" will prove to be a bitter tonic to Emerson's optimistic projections about Nature, for Poe, as did his contemporaries NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE and HERMAN MELVILLE, saw not only innate goodness in nature, but simultaneously the source of evil.

Symbolically the Raven climbs "upon a bust of Pallas just above my chamber door" (l. 41), presumably offering "a higher wisdom" than the patron goddess of ancient Athens, the goddess of wisdom in Greek myth. Whether "the ungainly fowl" (l. 49) is named Nevermore or can merely repeat the word unendingly becomes a moot point, since the narrator takes up a velvet, cushioned seat "in front of bird, and bust and door" (l. 68) to listen to its interminably repetitious message, its "saintly" association transformed into a fowl "whose fiery eyes now burned into my bosom's core" (l. 74). The "trinity" of images—bird, bust, door—before the narrator sits converts the chamber into a parody of Emerson's "Transparent Eyeball," the all-seeing eye of the prescient poet. The bird has become a demon sent from night's plutonian shore (l. 47), a tempter to remind the unavailing Orpheus that his Eurydice, Lenore, can never be retrieved from Hades's clutches. The narrator suffers an emotional paroxysm of lost faith: "Tempter sent . . . tell me truly, I implore— / Is there—is there balm in Gilead?" (ll. 86, 89). The reference is to Jeremiah 8:22, itself a biblical book of lamentations. When he inquires whether his beloved Lenore has ascended to heaven, the Raven only retorts, "Nevermore" (l. 98). In his despair, the narrator calls the Raven "Prophet . . . thing of evil!" (l. 91) and orders the "bird or devil" (l. 92) to quit his door, as his room has become an emotional "torture chamber." In a variation of the Promethean image, the bird has buried its beak in his heart (l. 101), and having refused to leave, the bird seems symbolically wedded to the tormented narrator, whose soul lies prostrate in the spiritual shadow cast by the demon. Perhaps responding to an image from Coleridge's "Kubla Khan," Poe has pushed spiritual despair and loneliness to the depths, like Coleridge's "woman wailing for her demon lover!" ("Kubla Khan" l. 16).

For Discussion or Writing

1. How does Poe's narrator's reaction to the raven, to nature in general, compare to that of William Cullen Bryant as expressed in "To a Water-fowl"? Does Poe understand nature as exterior to thought or as the product of thought?
2. Consider how personal reactions to the flight of birds affect the narrators of "The Windhover" (Gerard Manley Hopkins) and "The Second Coming" (William Butler Yeats). Explain why birds are assigned such roles by these poets.
3. Discuss the rhythmic progression and interlocking sound patterns as the poem inevitably reminds the narrator of his impotence in human and metaphysical affairs. Where in the poem might a reader detect a metrical dissolution that reflects the narrator's disillusionment with transcendent consolations?

“Ulalume” (1847)

“Ulalume” exhibits many of the qualities that those who seek to reduce Poe to stereotypes assign to him: the haunted, morbid, gothic atmosphere; the compulsion to emotional extremes; the sense of an oppressive guilt; a vocabulary and scheme of allusions that seem deliberately abstruse. In several respects, these very criticisms could be laid at the feet of one of Poe’s more sarcastic commentators, T.S. Eliot. The argument has been made that the sheer sounds of “Ulalume” provide its allure and obscure its meaning. We might look to Goethe’s Faust, known to Poe through his vast readings in continental literature, for some literary model of the spiritual quest for enlightenment and absolution; Byron’s Manfred similarly takes the reader on an equally exotic odyssey of the mind, all in search of expiation for some nameless crime and unrelieved guilt.

“Ulalume” is set in nine stanzas, a narrative that would seem to reveal how the nameless narrator lost his own soul, or, conversely, how he began to realize his eternal guilt. By the time the narrator and Psyche arrive at the tomb of Ulalume, we have noted images rife in “The Fall of the House of Usher,” “Annabel Lee,” and classical mythology. The poem begins “in the lonesome October” (l. 5), and, two stanzas later, we read that the narrator and his Soul, Psyche, “knew not that the month was October, / And we marked not the month of the year— / (Ah, night of all nights of the year!)” (ll. 24–26). Shall we assume that the night is Halloween? We do see that for the first 31 lines, the dominant images are those of spiritual decline: “The skies they were ashen and sober; / The leaves they were crisped and sere— / The leaves they were withering and sere” (ll. 1–3). The weary sentiment almost literally seizes lines from Shakespeare’s Macbeth: “My way of life / Is fall’n into the sere, the yellow leaf / And that which should accompany old age” (5.2.26–28). The conversation of the narrator and Psyche is likewise “palsied and sere— / Our memories were treacherous and sere—” (ll. 22–23). Even the night was “senescent,” suggesting that aged human wits and memory are not to be trusted. When that impression is combined with the images of “the dark tarn of Auber / In the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir” (ll. 9–10), we are prepared for the themes of crime, self-deception, and unnatural revelation that we find in Shakespeare’s Scottish tragedy.

At line 32, the light breaks upon a new day, represented as the birth of a Phoenician goddess: “At the end of our path a liquescent / And nebulous luster was born, / Out of which a miraculous crescent / Arose with a duplicate horn— / Astarte’s bediamonded crescent / Distinct with its duplicate horn” (ll. 34–39). While Astarte is a fertility deity, it is “to the Lethean peace of the skies” (l. 47), the mythic river of forgetfulness, that the narrator aspires through her guidance. Psyche is less enthralled with Astarte and her association with the constellation Leo: “Sadly this star I mistrust— / Oh, hasten!—oh, let us not linger! / Oh, fly! —let us fly! —for we must” (ll. 53–56). Once more, we look to Macbeth and its hapless victim, Lady Macduff, for a spiritual parallel: “Whither should I fly?” (4.2.81). When Psyche’s plumes “trailed in the dust— / Till they sorrowfully trailed in the dust” (ll. 60–61), we are well aware that Macbeth’s ambitions, too, end with “dusty death” (5.5.26). Dismissing Psyche’s fears, the narrator “tempted her out of her gloom” (l. 74), only to be “stopped by the door of a tomb” (l. 76). When Psyche tells him the sepulcher belongs to the lost Ulalume, he suddenly recalls that “last year” (l. 87) he “brought a dread burden down here” (l. 90), presumably the corpse of Ulalume, because he murdered her or was otherwise complicit in her death. “Ah, what demon has tempted me here?” (l. 92) remains an unanswered riddle, though it perhaps explains the days when his heart “was volcanic / As the scorific rivers that roll— / As the lavas that restlessly roll / Their sulphurous currents down Yaanek / In the ultimate climes of the pole—” (ll. 14–18). The Dantesque descent complete, the narrator must face his repressed guilt, that he has sacrificed his beloved perhaps in his vain pursuit of “Hope and . . . Beauty” (l. 66).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Is it possible to identify the basis of the narrator's sacrifice of his cherished Ulalume? Is it likely that a sane man would have forgotten, in a year, the death (or murder) of his beloved?
2. Would the narrator of "Ulalume" find kinsmen in Hawthorne's "Artist of the Beautiful" or the husband in "The Birth-mark"? Consider the lines from The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam "I myself am Heaven and Hell." How might these words relate to "Ulalume"?

"The Bells" (1848)

"The Bells" appeared in 1849, three months after Poe's death; he had composed it in 1848. Set as an ode in irregular stanza lengths, each longer than its predecessor, the four sections, or "movements," of the piece celebrate a successive stage in the development of human life. Each "bell," or stage of life, has its own metal, a device Plato had employed in his "Allegory of the Metals" in The Republic to differentiate the respective "values" (to the state) of human beings. What has kept readers in thrall to this poem are its kinetic powers of onomatopoeia, its alliterative speed, and the sheer tempo of its linear transmission. Poe has the poetic line expand and retreat, and we recall the dynamics of George Herbert's metaphysical poetry. Clearly Poe intended the poem as a "performance piece," a moment of musical "theater" and verbal/oral virtuosity, worthy of imitators, such as Dylan Thomas, who would follow Poe's model.

Stanza 1 celebrates the vivacity of life. The "sledges with the bells— / Silver bells!" (ll. 1–2) convey an image of troikas (horse-drawn sleds) rushing through the snow on a winter night. The order of the world is assured; the sense of childhood faith permeating the landscape becomes spiritualized in "crystalline delight" (l. 8). Time itself, "in a sort of Runic rhyme" (l. 10), peals forth as a musical experience, charming, enchanted.

Stanza 2 captures the union of man and nature in a series of superheated images, liquid fire. We "hear the mellow wedding bells / Golden bells!" (ll. 15–16). The golden age has returned, the time of original innocence, prelapsarian Adam and Eve. "What a world of happiness their harmony foretells!" (l. 17). The bliss quickly finds consummation: "How they ring out their delight!" (19). In rather overt sexual terms, Poe lets nature take its course: "From the molten-golden notes (20) / . . . What a liquid ditty floats (22) / . . . What a gush of euphony voluminously wells! / How it swells!" (ll. 26–27). Poetic "climax" occurs on the subatomic level: "Oh, from out the sounding cells, / What a gush of euphony" (ll. 25–26). Of course, "cells" (l. 25) could suggest confinement, just as "sledges" (l. 1) could suggest the hammer blows of fate. The tenor of the stanza, however, disregards human limits and rather celebrates power and possibility: "How it dwells / In the Future! how it tells / Of the rapture" (ll. 28–29).

Stanza 3 expresses the paroxysms of approaching death, the ghastly realization of human mortality. "Hear the loud alarum bells— / Brazen bells" (ll. 34–35). That same Promethean fire that gave birth to man also consumes him. The frenzied pealing of the bells "in a clamorous appealing to the mercy of the fire, / In a mad expostulation with the deaf and frantic fire" (ll. 42–43) proves fruitless. The image is reminiscent of Macbeth's "Out out, brief candle!" (Macbeth 5.5.26). The "harmony of the world" (in Johannes Kepler's phrase) is no more. The bells "can only shriek, shriek, / Out of tune" (ll. 40–41). Poe invokes another conjunctio, another macabre consummation, but this time it presages evil fruit: "How they clang, and clash, and roar! / What a horror they outpour / On the bosom of the palpitating air!" (ll. 52–54). Where in the second stanza the "turtle-dove . . . gloats / On the moon!" (22–23), there as an object of ardor and affection; the moon in stanza 3 has become the symbol of irrational ambition: The bronze bells are heard to leap "higher, higher, higher / With a desperate desire, / And a resolute to endeavor, / Now—now to sit or never, / By the side of the pale-faced moon" (ll. 44–48). The jarring battalions of sound herald a mighty disjunction between will and necessity, personal pride and humanity's fate. This third stanza is Poe's equivalent to Dylan Thomas's "rage, rage at the dying of the light."

Stanza 4 commands us to ask not for whom the bell tolls. Both the poet John Donne and the Dies Irae from the Requiem Mass seem close at hand, and it is no accident that the Russian composer Sergei Rachmaninov set "The Bells" to music as his Opus 35, since he was himself obsessed with the Day of Judgment. "Hear the tolling of the bells— / Iron bells!" (ll. 67–68). The implacable "iron" conveys a world of apathy to humanity's suffering consciousness. We are cast into Dante's Inferno, and "They are Ghouls" (l. 85) who delight in the rolling of a millstone on the human heart, who feel "a glory in so rolling / On the human heart a stone—" (ll. 81–82). Moreover, it appears to be death, or even the devil alone, who grinds humanity into dust and despair: "And their king it is who tolls, / And he rolls, rolls, rolls / Rolls / A paean from the bells!" (ll. 86–89). We note "his merry bosom swells" (l. 90) with pride and sustenance as he consumes humanity. The ghouls themselves are "neither man nor woman— / They are neither brute nor human" (ll. 83–84), an amorphous race or half-life likewise made flesh by H. G. Wells in his novel The Island of Dr. Moreau. The music of this horror is a "muffled monotone" (l. 80) of "melancholy menace" (l. 72), and its figures inflame the ghoulish king as "he dances, and he yells; / Keeping time, time, time, / In a sort of Runic rhyme" (ll. 92–94), a parody of the springtime sentiment of childlike faith conveyed at line 10. Behind all the "hieroglyphs" of nature, in spite of Emerson, HENRY DAVID THOREAU, and their transcendental ilk, stands death, the ultimate, cosmic dancer, and the final "moaning and groaning of the bells" (l. 109) marks the knell of human aspirations.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider Poe's specific use of rhythm and meter to suggest a deterioration of bliss and personal control as the various bells signify the onrush of death and destruction. Select specific passages from the poem and explain how rhythm and meter function in them.
2. Do you see a parallel in this poem's presentation of vain ambition with words of the second apparition in Macbeth, who demands of Macbeth that he "be bloody, bold, and resolute. Laugh to scorn the power of man" (Macbeth 4.1.90–91)? What is the tone of Poe's narrator? Is he sympathetic to or disdainful of humanity?

"Annabel Lee" (1849)

Poe wrote "Annabel Lee" in 1849, revising the last line, "In her tomb by the sounding sea" (l. 50), to read "In her tomb by the side of the sea" (l. 50), which many editors consider an unfortunate change. Still, the poem remains among Poe's most popular lyrics, a passionate paean to his favorite theme of love and death, a conceit that extends to Romeo and Juliet, Tristan and Isolde, Isis and Osiris, and any number of Greek myths. Without being glib, we may assert that wombs and tombs define much of Poe's oeuvre and his sensibility about nature; the terms often fuse, a distinction without a difference. The music of the poem, its internal rhyme and mesmerizing use of repetition, both enchants and haunts the reader.

In six stanzas, the poet establishes a lyric narrative, a concentrated love story set as a ballad. The narrator and Annabel Lee inhabit an unidentified "kingdom by the sea" (ll. 2, 8, 10) where "we loved with a love that was more than love" (l. 9), so that "the winged seraphs of Heaven / Coveted her and me" (ll. 11–12). At two key points, the narrator finds the "reason" (ll. 12, 23) for Annabel Lee's demise to be heaven's covetousness and heaven's "envying" (l. 22) her and me. There is something defiant, idolatrous, or possibly blasphemous in the love of the narrator and Annabel Lee, and while the narrator attributes her death to heaven twice, he admits that neither "the angels in Heaven above / Nor the demons down under the sea" (ll. 30–21) can ever separate him from his great love. The possibility that dark forces could be active in her death does not dissuade him from joining her after death (though no overt demise overtakes him) “in her sepulchre there by the sea” (l. 40). If the narrator has not died—and we might well assume this from the poet’s use of active voice to tell us “I lie down by the side / Of my darling, my darling, my life and my bride” (ll. 38–39)—then the implication becomes infinitely more ghastly, with thoughts of necrophilia. We never do discover what led to Annabel Lee’s being “shut up, in a sepulcher / In this kingdom by the sea” (ll. 19–20) or exactly how the narrator gained entry to this sacred space, or temenos. Perhaps such penetrating, magical power is a factor of the spirit of youth: “She was a child and I was a child, / In this kingdom by the sea” (ll. 7–8). Perhaps Poe has assumed that William Wordsworth’s “childlike faith” provides him a kind of immunity or transparency (Ralph Waldo Emerson) to gain access to his lover’s sequestered bower.

While the passionate beauty of the poem may render futile “reasonable” attempts to decipher the amorous riddles with which it is rife, we can see that “her highborn kinsmen came / And bore her away from me” (ll. 17–18), a suggestion that social status, and not the intervention of spirits, is responsible for their separation. The narrator and Annabel Lee take a stand against those both “older” (l. 28) and “wiser” (l. 29) than they and occupy the same tomb “all the nighttide” (l. 38). The narrator looks to “the moon” (l. 34) and “the stars” (l. 36) and sees “the bright eyes / Of the beautiful Annabel Lee” (ll. 36–37). Whether this narrative is real or merely the “lunatic,” moon-struck ravings of an amorous dreamer the reader must decide.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Does “the wind” that destroys Annabel Lee represent a natural force or some punishing Nemesis that prevents the narrator from pursuing a normal relationship? Is the narrator’s and Annabel Lee’s a “reasonable” or “reasoned” relationship? Do women in Poe’s oeuvre have to be dead in order for his personae to relate to them at all? Why?
2. Shall we take this narrative on a literal, realistic level, or is the entire poem a paean to ideal love as perceived by a person suffering arrested emotional development? Compare “Annabel Lee” with Wordsworth’s “Strange Fits of Passion Have I Known”: What imagery and sensibilities do they share? Do we have a right to assume that Poe may have been responding to Wordsworth’s lyric?
3. What other works of literature that deal with arrested emotional development can you identify? Name two or three and justify your response. Would Faulkner’s “A Rose for Emily,” with its own version of obsessive love and desire, qualify? Why or why not?

The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym of Nantucket (1837)

Poe composed his only novel, The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym of Nantucket, as an apparently “unfinished” story in 25 chapters and a “Note,” using an experimental style in which early events find a parallel in later chapters of the narrative. A strangely eclectic tale, the story involves a seagoing narrator who travels on two major vessels, the American brig Grampus and another ship, the Jane, the latter of which makes its way into the Antarctic. In each case, atrocities and butcheries occur, and Pym claims that “it appears to me a thousand wonders I am alive to-day.” What begins as a fairly conventional sea adventure, in the manner of Robinson Crusoe, evolves into a gothic odyssey rife with allusions to Coleridge’s Rime of the Ancient Mariner, the book of Revelation, and apocalyptic visions of the hollow earth, concluding with the appearance of “a shrouded white human figure” who might represent death or some metaphysical entity. Poe actually involves himself in the tale, because Pym purportedly trusted Poe with the incomplete manuscript. It seems Mr. Poe “expressed interest in my statement . . . which related to the Antarctic Ocean.”

Pym early expresses his “greatest desire to go to sea.” A stowaway aboard the brig Grampus, Pym admits possessing a fecund imagination, one that predicts the future course of his experience aboard the Jane:

My visions were of shipwreck and famine; of death or captivity among barbarian hordes; of a lifetime dragged out in sorrow and tears, upon some gray and desolate rock, in an ocean unapproachable and unknown.

As does Daniel Defoe's classic narrative of sea travel Robinson Crusoe, Poe's narrative includes aspects of providential design, of ill-fated "conceptions," "labors," and thwarted "deliverances" that suggest unnatural gestations and births, often "miscarriages" of human justice. Pym will explore "events . . . of the most unconceived and unconceivable character." At one point, in chapter 10, when Pym and his few surviving shipmates are in dire straits at sea, seeking rescue, they spy "a large hermaphrodite brig, of a Dutch build." They note "three seamen, whom by their dress we took to be Hollanders." At first, their hopes embrace the vision of rescue joyfully: "our hearts leaped up wildly . . . shouts and thanksgiving to God for the deliverance." But, typically of the pattern of the novel, the scene quickly degenerates into a gothic nightmare, as the survivors have inadvertently caught a glimpse of the famous haunted ship The Flying Dutchman: "a smell, a stench . . .—hellish—utterly suffocating—insufferable, inconceivable . . . triple horror of that spectacle. We palpably saw that not a soul lived in that fated vessel." The "pilot" of the dead ship turns out to be a seagull "feasting on a corpse" standing at the wheel, a grotesque vision of nature's unholy stewardship.

In chapter 11, the survivors of the mutiny aboard the Grampus themselves devolve, by dint of hunger and privation, to cannibal measures in order to endure. They embrace a kind of "madness . . . the sad reverse of our prospects . . . Parker . . . proposed . . . that one of us should die to preserve the existence of the others." Pym himself will succumb, in chapter 24, to an explicit death wish, a spiritual collapse engendered by his own imaginative faculties, his own unnamed guilt, compounded by any number of appearances in the Antarctic of Coleridge's fateful albatross, his bird of irredeemable guilt:

the vast depths yet to be descended . . . I found these fancies [of our destruction] creating their own realities, and all imagined horrors crowding upon me in fact. . . . My whole soul was pervaded with a longing to fall; a yearning, a passion utterly uncontrollable. . . . I felt a new being. . . . We now found ourselves not far from the ravine . . . those dreary regions marking the site of degraded Babylon.

One of Poe's favorite vehicles for horrific effect, the idea of premature burial, occurs twice in the novel. The first occurrence involves Pym's abandonment to a cargo hold aboard the Grampus, on which he has secretly stowed away. His sealing in without adequate food and water finds its parallel in chapter 21, when the indigenous population has engineered a massive cave-in on the European sailors, and Poe and his mate Peters are entombed in a collapsed earthen fissure. Poe then has Pym expound the bodily and psychic terror of death in life:

We were consequently lost for ever, being thus entombed alive. . . . I firmly believed that no incident ever occurring in the course of human events is better adapted to inspire the supremacy of mental and bodily distress than a case like our own, of living inhumation. The blackness of darkness which envelops the victim, the terrific oppression of lungs, the stifling fumes from the damp earth, unite with the ghastly considerations that we are beyond the remotest confines of hope, and that such is the allotted portion of the dead. To carry into the human heart a degree of appalling awe and horror not to be tolerated—never to be conceived.

A combination of Homer's Odyssey and Dante's journey to Inferno, Poe's narrative embraces human extremes, as in his description of the race of black wild men led by Too-Wit, determined to ingratiate themselves with the European explorers only to annihilate them. "The savages . . . appeared to be the most wicked, hypocritical, vindictive, bloodthirsty, and altogether fiendish race of men upon the face of the earth." The sufferings exacted by Pym's journey might be the tragic price for the sin of intellectual pride, that same scientific curiosity condemned, respectively by Goethe and Shelley in Faust and Prometheus Unbound, their romantic critiques of overweening scientific investigation:

I warmly pressed upon [Captain Guy] the expediency of persevering, at least for a few days longer, in the direction we were now holding. So tempting an opportunity of solving the great problem, in regard to an Antarctic continent had never yet been afforded to man. . . . While I cannot but lament the most unfortunate and bloody events which immediately arose from my advice, I must still be allowed to feel some degree of satisfaction at having been instrumental, however remotely, in opening to the eye of science one of them most intensely exciting secrets which has ever engrossed its attention.

The cause of science justifies the nightmares it exacts on human souls. Pym will speak (in chapter 28) of "that vast chain of apparent miracles with which I was destined to be at length encircled." These same "miracles" will prove as perfidious as they are blessed: Poe has become ambivalent on the topic of nature. The natives of Antarctica will warrant another sort of superlative, as "among the most barbarous, subtle, and bloodthirsty wretches that ever contaminated the face of the globe," who will reap "the full and perfect fruits of their treachery." Whether Pym's final account of March 21–22, his having traveled into the heated waters of the Antarctic Ocean, "the enkindled ocean," represents transcendence or damnation remains a matter for literary speculation. If The Flying Dutchman vessel is "hermaphroditic," so too is Mother Nature's sickly womb, "warm" and "milky white," and lorded over by a menacing, male figure who appears to beckon Pym to oblivion.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare Poe's account to another piece of fantastic literature that imagines a voyage into unexplored territory, such as At the Mountains of Madness, the work of Poe's literary successor, H. P. Lovecraft. How does each author depict the most desolate of Earth's unexplored continents? What larger themes does each develop by means of these depictions?
2. Examine Poe's depiction of "native" behavior. Is he possibly being sarcastic and ironic in his vision, perhaps writing an allegorical work after Swift's Gulliver's Travels?

"Ligeia" (1838)

The tale "Ligeia," which Poe considered his finest, synthesizes a number of characteristic themes in Poe's work, not the least of which is his fascination with the theory of metempsychosis, a belief in the transmigration of souls after death. Derived from Eleusinian Orphism, the idea that the soul is immortal and can move through time and space to inhabit another form of material life finds its way into several dialogues of Plato. Between 1838 and 1850, Poe fashioned a number of stories that deal with or allude to the subject, such as "Metzengerstein," "Eleonora," and "The Oblong Box." Poe's immediate literary model appears to be Coleridge's vampire poem "Christabel" (1816), in which the conventional notions of virtue suffer a literal rape, and a demonic, female nature triumphs without pity. In her sadistic desire to preserve what time and death strip away, an aggressive Mother Nature usurps daylight values and regresses into the womb of night. Poe ascribes such power to Ligeia's indomitable will, which subjugates first the narrator and then his second wife, the lady Rowena.

What makes Poe a romantic writer, beyond his penchant for the gothic, is his absolute equation of love and death, a motif Denis de Rougemont has traced, via the Tristan myth, in his study Love in the Western World. Moreover, in his theory of poetics, Poe expressed the belief that the most perfect subject for a poem (and, therefore, by extension, a short story) would be “the death . . . of a beautiful woman” as told through “the lips . . . of a bereaved lover.” This short story fits that description perfectly. Even though the narrator marries the lady Rowena, he can never put aside, or ignore, the power of his love for the lady Ligeia, and it is possible that it is this all-abounding, all-absorbing love that helps the lady Ligeia to return to the narrator at the end of the story.

Lady Rowena is the antithesis of the lady Ligeia. She is also beautiful, but she is blonde, simple, and unsophisticated. Whereas the lady Ligeia was superior to this world, Lady Rowena, whom the narrator grows to loathe “with a hatred belonging more to a demon than to man,” is merely earthly and temporal. In contrast to the metaphysical and spiritual qualities of the lady Ligeia, whom the narrator calls “the august, the beautiful, the entombed,” Lady Rowena embodies the material and mortal qualities of this physical world. Thus, in one simplistic interpretation of the story, the narrator exchanges a world of beautiful, transcendent, ethereal reality for a world of material reality. On another plane, however, we see the tendency for Poe’s male persona to yield authority to a “fascinating” female who cannot be approached sexually except in death. Ligeia, moreover, evinces an impressive array of “masculine” qualities that convert her “Orphic” status into that of psychic rapist. While a “prey to the tumultuous vultures of stern passion,” she exerts her daunting erudition upon the passive narrator: “How singularly—how thrillingly, this one point in the nature of my wife has forced itself, at this late period only, upon my attention!” The epithets wild and fierce characterize Ligeia’s character, and the narrator persistently celebrates “her infinite supremacy” and “vast . . . triumph,” to which the narrator resigns himself “with a childlike confidence, to her guidance through the chaotic world of metaphysical investigation.” After her loss, the alchemy of their master-slave relationship reveals its inverted status: “Wanting the radiant luster of her eyes, letters, lambent and golden, grew duller than Saturnian lead.” Perhaps the entrapped male finds temporary relief in his loss of Ligeia, since he claims that “in death only, was I fully impressed with the strength of her affection.”

Ligeia presumably takes her name from Milton, in which she appears as one of the Homeric Sirens. The narrator speaks of “her low musical language,” which by degrees takes his heart in thrall. The narrator invokes an amorous blasphemy in his love, when he calls his love—or “caprice”—a “wildly romantic offering on the shrine of the most passionate devotion.” Ligeia’s attractiveness, beyond the physical, involves her uncanny erudition, a preoccupation with studies “adapted to deaden impressions of the outward world.” Oddly Ligeia has no paternal name; she seems a parthenogenetic phenomenon, self-created and creating, like Alph, the sacred river in Coleridge’s “Kubla Khan.” Throughout the tale, the epithet wild permeates every vivid memory of the narrator’s experience of Ligeia. Always the narrator’s language, his metaphors and superlative conceits, insinuates the inevitable apotheosis of Ligeia. She is more a force than a mortal woman, and she cannot be subject either to common morality or to mortality.

The tale opens in some “dim and decaying city by the Rhine” and then, after the death of Ligeia, shifts to a nameless abbey “in one of the wildest and least frequented portions of fair England.” Commentators have pointed out Poe’s borrowing from aspects of Hawthorne’s “The Birth-mark” for the description of the abbey. Its subsequent invasion by a vampiric figure easily points to Bram Stoker’s Dracula. With Ligeia’s death Poe’s narrator speaks of himself as having been “crushed into the very dust with sorrow,” imagery from Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein. The narrator subsequently trades one form of bondage for another: He becomes a slave to opium, and he speaks of his marriage to the lady Rowena as “a moment of mental alienation” attributable to his addiction, a weakness he characterizes as “child-like perversity” and “incipient madness.”

Then Poe describes the bridal chamber, whose careful detail of color imagery, its “sole window” with its “single pane . . . tinted of a leaden hue,” conjoined with the “melancholy vaulting” of the room, with its “single chain of gold with a long link,” suggest that an evil alchemy is at work, and that Ligeia’s invasive appearance well may be the result of her having discovered the philosopher’s stone. That the “stone” may have altered its form so as to undo the new wife becomes apparent when Lady Rowena drinks some wine into which “three or four large drops of a brilliant and ruby colored liquid” have invaded. The narrator forbears to mention the “poison” to Lady Rowena, since he may have been unduly influenced by “a vivid imagination, rendered morbidly active by the terror of the lady, by the opium, and by the hour.” The unholy trinity of causation trivializes Lady Rowena’s imminent demise and simultaneously imparts a “sacred” power to Ligeia’s command of dark forces. As Camille Paglia puts it, “She defies God’s law of mortality because she, not he, is the resurrection and the life” (574). The Eastern sensibility of the room, its bridal couch and “pall-like canopy,” along with the constant reference to “draperies,” convey the eerie, Byzantine admixture of betrayal and sterile constancy the narrator must enact in order to remain worthy of his true beloved, Ligeia.

By the end of “this hideous drama of revivification,” the narrator sits “rigidly upon an ottoman,” a helpless prey to a whirl of violent emotions. The shrouded form of Rowena awakes and advances toward him, and the narrator remains “paralyzed— . . . chilled . . . into stone.” His beloved Ligeia has indeed risen, but her affect is Gorgonian, for even transfixed as he is, we witness “a mad disorder” and an “inexpressible madness” as the resurrected female advances. The huge masses of long, black hair—blacker than the raven wings of the midnight—reveal the horrid truth of Ligeia’s ascension, her “black and wild eyes” causing her lover to shriek in full recognition of his dearest wish fulfilled. Medusa has entered to claim her steadfast admirer.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Poe clearly emphasizes the respective facial features of Ligeia and Lady Rowena. Some critics believe he does this in part because of his belief in the discredited “science” of phrenology. How would this explain the willing slavery of the narrator to Ligeia’s domineering spirit?
2. How might the “madness” motif in “Ligeia” be applied to D. H. Lawrence’s “The Rocking Horse Winner” and to Joseph Conrad’s Heart of Darkness? Consider the ways in which these works examine the relationship of madness to lives not governed by moral restraint.

“The Fall of the House of Usher” (1839)

If Shakespeare’s Hamlet can be categorized as “the tragedy of thought,” Poe’s “The Fall of the House of Usher” can be regarded as “the disintegration of the artistic mind.” The tale is ambitious, even for Poe, as it embraces several gothic and romantic conventions—such as premature burial—along with any number of biblical and classical allusions. The very shape of the Usher castle, juxtaposed with the phrenological details of Roderick Usher’s features, suggests that we have entered into the labyrinth of the mind, in this case, the psyche of an artist cut off from the source of his creativity. On another plane, Poe’s narrative persona offers a rare glimpse into the horrific intricacies of the pagan birth process, an incestuous relationship that precedes moral civilization, as the Egyptian gods Isis and Osiris are said to have copulated in the womb. The intensity of the epiphany afforded our narrator is a blinding truth, and he will force his visions, these “considerations beyond our depth,” downward, into the dark abyss of the triumphant tarn, the muddy world of the libidinous subconscious.

The tale proceeds as a social call: A nameless narrator answers the request of an old boyhood friend, Roderick Usher, to provide social solace from some nameless, debilitating malady that has rendered Usher neurasthenic to a pathological degree. Usher has become morbidly acute in all his senses, literally too sensitive to endure life. Both the House of Usher and its environs have no specific locale other than “a singularly dreary tract of country,” a wasteland, and the melancholy atmosphere of the House of Usher, its aura of moral oppressiveness and self-containment, has another revealing trait: the “barely perceptible fissure” that proceeds down the length of the structure of the building, a suggestion of bifurcated consciousness or schizophrenia. The narrator finds the state of Usher’s health shocking; Usher reveals that part of his moral gloom is traceable to the imminent death of his cataleptic twin sister, Madeline, “his last and only relative on earth.” The narrator indicates that the Usher family suffers hereditary physiological degeneration as a result of inbreeding, of what Poe tactfully calls “collateral issue . . . undeviating transmission, from sire to son, of the patrimony of the name.” Madeline dies and is buried in the family crypt, after which a fearful tempest arises. As the narrator and Usher spend the night reading the “Mad Trist” of Sir Launcelot Canning, life imitates art as the literary knight Ethelred shatters the hermit’s door, and we hear the death cry of the dragon; so, too, the resurrected Lady Madeline enters in full fury through the portals of the library. She falls upon her brother and kills him. As the narrator flees the scene, the “full, setting, and blood-red moon” expands the fissure of the House of Usher, and the edifice sinks below “the deep and dark tarn at my feet.”

We cannot interpret the tale realistically, as weird commentary on mismanaged real estate. Clearly the narrator has penetrated into some inner sanctum, which may well be some form of Egyptian pyramid. In Roderick Usher, the aging and withered “pharaoh,” Poe has created an archetypal creative neurotic, the model for further studies by Loris Huysmans and Oscar Wilde. The narrator notes Usher’s “passionate devotion to the intricacies, perhaps even more than to the orthodox and easily recognizable beauties, of musical science.” As the narrator proceeds to Roderick’s studio, he notes “the Gothic archway,” and then, led by a silent valet “through many dark and intricate passages,” he encounters the physician of the family, who wears “a mingled expression of low cunning and perplexity.” When we add to these descriptions Roderick’s “ghastly pallor” of skin, the “miraculous lustre of the eye,” and the “silken hair . . . with its wild, gossamer texture” that “floated rather than fell about the face,” we have indeed met the living incarnation of Coleridge’s fearful visionary in “Kubla Khan”: “Beware! Beware! / His flashing eyes, his floating hair!” (ll. 49–50).

The archway may well suggest Dante’s gate of hell, and the troubling physician whom we meet after passing by way of “meandering with a mazy motion” (l. 25) through Usher’s castle provides a “mingled measure” (l. 33) of anxiety as to the mental and moral health of the protagonists. The narrator later describes the “wild improvisations” of Usher’s “speaking guitar,” a parody of the legendary Orpheus, whose “floating hair” signifies his decapitation by the maenads. Long hours with Usher leave in the narrator no clear recollection of their character, since an “excited and highly dis-tempered ideality threw a sulphureous luster over all.” The two are dedicated to hellish rites, and the litany of words Poe invokes, such as “a want of moral energy,” “a constitutional and family evil,” a “darkness” that “poured forth upon all objects of the moral and physical universe, in one unceasing radiation of gloom,” all point to some original sin, since, as James Joyce points out in his “fire sermon” in Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, “the fires of Hell give forth no light.” The culmination of this “evil music” is Usher’s original poem “The Haunted Palace,” whose theme appears to be the fall of thought. Critics of Poe’s short story consistently point out that “transcendence” in this tale is downward, and that the grim, unnatural union of Roderick and his sister, Madeline, at the end has its source in the father-daughter incendiary bonding in Medea, and in Coleridge’s equally chilling line describing “woman wailing for her demon lover!” (“Kubla Khan” l. 16).

Madeline Usher is, of necessity, a more elusive figure. The narrator glimpses her but once, and he remarks of his “utter astonishment not unmingled with dread,” another pass at “Kubla Khan,” whose other female figure is of “a damsel with a dulcimer” (l. 37), an image more fitting for Roderick himself. That Roderick and Madeline remain androgynous figures is typical of Poe, who always wrestles with issues of sexual identity. Madeline provides Roderick’s female perspective, and he has both isolated her and violated her. His painting that most captivates the narrator is of an underground vault or tomb, illuminated by “a flood of intense rays” that “bathed the whole in a ghastly and inappropriate splendour.” Roderick depicts Madeline’s burial chamber, and its moral degeneracy is implied, so much so that the narrator compares its effect to that of the “reveries of Fuseli,” noted for his study The Nightmare. When he and Roderick place Madeline within the “dungeon” of the castle as her resting place, the narrator complains that “there sat upon my very heart an incubus of utterly causeless alarm,” a depiction of Fuseli’s vision exactly!

With the apparent death of Madeline, Roderick enters the last phase of his own dissolution, “a species of mad hilarity in his eyes.” A whirlwind combines with “the rank miasma of the tarn,” and we recall Hamlet’s disgust with things “rank and gross in nature” (Hamlet 1.2.138) after learning of the unnatural circumstances of his father’s death. As the infuriated Madeline approaches and penetrates the library, Roderick assumes his final, feminine guise by asking, “Whither shall I fly?” a direct echo of hapless Lady Macduff in Shakespeare’s Scottish tragedy (Macbeth 4.2.81). Like a Fury out of Erebus, Madeline appears out of “the ponderous and ebony jaws” of the house. “There was blood upon her white robes, and the evidence of some bitter struggle,” which captures both her breaking of the vault and her brother’s violation of her virginity. That he supposed her dead at the time only adds to the apocalyptic horror of the vision, confirmed by the “fierce breath of the whirlwind” and the final music of destruction, “the voice of a thousand waters” (see Ezekial 43:2) that marks the Ushers’ ghastly marriage as Persephone delivers the coup de grace to her misbegotten Hades.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider Hawthorne’s “The Artist of the Beautiful” as a companion piece to “The Fall of the House of Usher.” Discuss their relative views on the power and limitations of art. In what ways do these authors suggest a tension between aesthetics and morality?
2. Trace the way that Poe communicates Usher’s interior, psychological state through descriptions of architecture and landscape. With this as background, explain how the sinking of the House of Usher into the tarn makes sense as the logical counterpart to Roderick’s dissolution.

“The Black Cat” (1843)

Poe’s “The Black Cat” represents, even for such a past master of the macabre, a rare form of descent into Dante’s Inferno. A tale narrated by a condemned murderer who is to die on the morrow, it tells of a double murder, as well as chronicling the destruction of a man’s soul. While alcoholism, what the narrator calls “the instrumentality of the Fiend Intemperance,” is the apparent cause of the narrator’s downfall, he attributes a deeper, more philosophical cause to his crimes: “the spirit of perverseness.” What the narrator calls “the unfathomable longing of the soul to vex itself” drives him first to mutilate and then to hang his “favorite pet and playmate,” the black cat Pluto. Significantly after he has committed “a sin—a deadly sin that would so jeopardize my immortal soul as to place it . . . beyond the reach of the infinite mercy of . . . God,” the narrator’s house burns and, as he acknowledges, his “entirely worldly wealth was swallowed up, and I resigned myself to despair.” That the white figure of a hanged cat above the narrator’s headboard survived the fire invokes a supernatural suspicion that the animal’s spirit—or the repressed guilt of his own foul deed—laid the crime at his head.

When the narrator, who has sunk from alcoholism to the “vile haunts” and “a den of more than infamy”—obviously opium—to secure a second black cat, he soon realizes its physical resemblance to Pluto, except that the white splotch upon its breast represents “the Gallows,” the eventual fate of our doomed narrator. It is in an old house to “which our poverty compelled us to inhabit” that the narrator, in a rage “more than demoniacal,” attempts to kill the cat, finds his ax-wielding hand “stayed” by his wife, and so turns the weapon upon her and buries the ax in her brain. Burying her body in the walls of the cellar, “as the monks of the Middle Ages are recorded to have walled up their victims,” the narrator inadvertently seals the one-eyed cat in the tomb with his wife’s corpse. When the police arrive four days later, they find nothing and are satisfied to leave when the narrator, in what he calls “the mere frenzy of bravado” resulting from his sense of triumph over mortal justice, raps the wall of the tomb with a cane, evoking a response from the sealed cat. A “dozen stout arms” of policemen toil at the wall and disclose the decayed corpse, with the cat “upon her head,” its “solitary eye of fire” transfixing the narrator with his “hideous murder.” Poe, in his grotesque fusion of elements, has the cat ascendant, its mouth filled with the gore of the corpse, which stands erect, a bloody, apocalyptic vision of murder, with the cat’s one eye a perversion of the Illuminati pyramid, while nature, “red in tooth and claw,” to paraphrase Jack London, utters “strange screams of death” (Macbeth, 2.3.63).

Almost from first to last, the imagery of the tale resembles Shakespeare’s Macbeth in virtually every morbid, spiritual detail. That play, too, opens with references to witches and cats and soon evolves into a tale of usurpation and political murder; of seduction by an ambitious, ruthless wife; and of demonic promises made only to be broken, to reveal “the equivocation of the fiend” (5.5.49). This last sentiment is echoed in the narrator’s false remorse at having torn out Pluto’s eye, which he calls “at best, a feeble and equivocal feeling” that soon gives way to “my final and irrevocable overthrow.” That his wife is the one to make “frequent allusion” to the popular superstition about black cats, the belief that “all black cats are witches in disguise,” when combined with Poe’s painstaking details of mental degeneration and dementia in the narrator’s mind, leads us to the conclusion that he perceives her as a witch and the cat as her familiar. After the murder of his wife, the cat becomes the voice of her soul’s cry for justice; and its terrible, remaining eye a “solitary eye of fire” that symbolizes the “hideous creature whose craft had seduced me into murder.” Prior to his act of homicide, the narrator had succumbed to hellish thoughts: “Evil thoughts became my sole intimates—the darkest and most evil of thoughts.” How similar to Macbeth’s own pledge devoting himself to an ambition that must destroy all political obstacles: “Stars hide your fires; / Let not light see my deep and black desires” (1.4.57–58). The spot of white fur on the second Pluto—for like Macbeth the tale is rife with doubles—might be the suggestion of an innocence that the narrator has destroyed and that he can no longer countenance. For the original sin in this man’s tortured history was the desire “to consummate the injury I had inflicted on the unoffending brute.” Seduction and consummation—the chief ingredients of an unnatural lust for power over a loving creature—these constitute Poe’s version of the imp of the perverse, whose ultimate malefaction is to see the agent of spiritual violence consume himself. (See Poe’s “The Imp of the Perverse” for a full definition.)

For Discussion or Writing

1. Has the entire “mechanism” of blaming the black cats, Pluto and his brethren, become an elaborate form of denial, of guilty transference, a refusal of the narrator to take direct responsibility for the murder of his wife? Consider the plausibility of having thrown a dead cat into a burning house and why Poe might have included such a detail.
2. Why are Poe’s characters so dominated by the eyes of their adversaries? Compare Hawthorne’s “Ethan Brand” and the narrator of this tale, as each pursues “the Unpardonable Sin.”

"The Tell-Tale Heart" (1843)

Among Poe's most famous and anthologized stories, "The Tell-Tale Heart" displays a virtuoso power and synthesis: Achieving an unparalleled unity of effect, the story conveys an immediacy of feeling quite breathtaking as we witness a psychotic individual's mental unraveling before our eyes. As a performance piece or dramatic monologue, Poe's story surpasses Robert Browning's "His Last Duchess" for sheer dynamic verbal fluency in the pursuit of mad terror.

Told by an anonymous first-person narrator, "The Tell-Tale Heart" recounts, from a confessed murderer's viewpoint, his motive in killing an old man who had done him no direct harm. The narrator blames the old man's eye: "I think it was his eye! Yes, it was this! He had the eye of a vulture—a pale blue eye, with a film over it. Whenever it fell upon me, my blood ran cold. . . . It was not the old man who vexed me, but his Evil Eye." Folklore ascribes the evil eye to a form of envy, while others claim that some people can bestow a curse on victims by the malevolent gaze of their magical, Gorgon-like eye. The story alternates between images related to sight, to visual penetration, and those related to sound, culminating in the terrible ostinato (stubborn or obstinate beating) of the dead, dismembered old man's heart beneath the floorboards. The minute details of the plan of the crime dominate the remainder of the story, and it is within these images that we find some revelation of character.

All the while protesting his sanity and the clarity of his mind, the narrator delineates a terrible fixation and propensity for evil in himself. "I was never kinder to the old man than during the whole week before I killed him." A symbolic seven nights the narrator spends perfecting his entry, his own form of penetration, into the old man's closet, utilizing "a dark lantern . . . how cunningly I thrust it in!" Each night, the narrator "looked in upon him as he slept." Resemblances to Shakespeare's Macbeth, a Poe specialty, seem apt: "Come, thick night, / And pall thee in the dunnest smoke of hell, / That my keen knife see not the wound it makes" (1.5.57–59). Or equally apt is Lady Macbeth's suggestion of what might be exacted upon the sleeping king's person: "What cannot you and I perform upon / Th'unguarded Duncan?" (1.7.79–80). Several times, the murderous narrator in Poe describes his sympathy, his likeness to the old man. In his terror at an unidentified night sound, the old man cries out, "Who's there?" and remains alert. "He was still sitting up in the bed listening; —just as I have done, night after night, hearkening to the death watches in the wall." Then the narrator describes "the groan of mortal terror," the "low stifled sound that arises from the bottom of the soul when overcharged with awe" that rises from the old man. "I knew the sound well. . . . I say I knew it well. I knew what the old man felt, and pitied him, although I chuckled at heart."

Pity mixed with perverse pleasure achieved by domination provide the ghastly alchemy of the tale. Persistently denying that "madness" drove him on, the narrator ascribes his fascination with the vulture eye and an "over-acuteness of the sense," a neurasthenia, as the causes of his malice. As he carefully details his preparations for stalking and murdering the old man, a pride of individualism suffuses his language, and he opens his dark lantern upon the eye to cast by preternatural instinct a "simple, dim ray" compared to "the thread of a spider" upon "the damned spot." The old man's unfocused terror, his palpably beating heart, becomes audible: that "low, quick sound, such as a watch makes when enveloped in cotton. I knew that sound well, too." The narrator calls the heart-beat "a hellish tattoo" that grows ever louder as the death watch proceeds into "the dead hour of the night." We must assume the narrator smothers the old man, having "dragged him to the floor, and pulled the heavy bed over him." By the time the old man has been dismembered and buried in the floor, the narrator can bask in "the end of these labors" with what he calls "the wild audacity of my perfect triumph."

What remains is to gather in the ghoulish ironies of the tale. Of course, like Lady Macbeth, the narrator has not eradicated "the damned spot" at all, and as she will, he will suffer its eternal resistance: “Out, damned spot, out I say! . . . Yet who would have thought the old man / to have had so much blood in him?” (5.7.37, 41–42). The transfer of the visual eye to the aural torment of the heartbeat, “a ringing in my ears,” suggests the violation of the cult of Orpheus, whose first law is “Shed no blood.” As Oedipus does in the Sphinx myth, whose failure to achieve self-knowledge and understand his own life leads to tragic death, Poe’s narrator strangles the old man, but he cannot account for the “reason” behind his apparent madness, the riddle of his murderous fixation. He remains an enigma to himself and an object of horror to us. Ultimately in a paroxysm of despair and guilt, the possessed narrator “foams” at the police, like a mad dog, reminiscent of the “Hellhound” in Macbeth (5.8.4) who turns to face his death. Pointing to 20th-century literature’s interest in the motive force of humiliation, it is the fear of mockery that consumes him and forces his confession: “Anything was more tolerable than derision!”

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare Poe’s “The Tell-Tale Heart” to WALT WHITMAN’s “The Sleepers,” a poem both the late poet-scholar Milton Kessler and his prime acolyte, Camille Paglia, call “ghoulish” in its thematic implication that the penetrating eye of the poet can molest the sleeping souls of America. Are both these poems finally about the naive trust of Americans and their ignorance of the evil in the hearts of human beings?
2. Compare Poe’s focus on the old man’s eye with Coleridge’s use of the transfixing eye in “The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.” There the “bright” and “glittering” eye of the mariner holds fast the wedding guest while the mariner recounts his tale of betrayal and apocalyptic visions.
3. See whether you can explain why the narrator breaks down as he does in the presence of the police. What exactly is the source of the “derision” that he fears? Can you connect that fear to his obsession with the old man’s eye?

“The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar” (1845)

In this disturbing and gruesome tale, Poe casts his two favorite protagonists, death and human will, against each other in a struggle for supremacy. Poe’s psychological vehicle takes the form of an experiment in mesmerism, a technique in hypnosis named after the Austrian physician Franz Anton Mesmer (1733–1815). It was purported to be a healing technique based on the idea of animal magnetism. Part of Mesmer’s theory was that all animated bodies including those of humans were affected by a magnetic force that also mutually influenced the celestial bodies and Earth. That Mesmer’s treatments ever really helped anyone remains debatable. Poe seems to take his cue about treating M. Valdemar’s impending death as just another experiment susceptible “to the magnetic influence” from Mary Shelley’s novel Frankenstein (1818), an archetype of a scientist’s overweening pride in first creating, and then unsympathetically denying, a creature fashioned from the dead by the scientist’s own hands. Here the scientist’s obsessive desire to see “death . . . arrested by the mesmeric process” leads to a sickening recognition that he has manipulated forces beyond his power to control.

Poe’s “The Facts of the Case of M. Valdemar” is another rare instance in which we can identify a distinctly American sense of place: M. Valdemar “has resided principally at Harlem, N.Y., since the year 1839.” Valdemar, like the protagonist of “The Tell-Tale Heart” and Roderick Usher, is a distinctly neurasthenic, or nervous, type, a disposition that “rendered him a good subject for mesmeric experiment.” Like Hawthorne, in his tale “Dr. Heidegger’s Experiment” and Goethe, in his ballad “The Sorcerer’s Apprentice,” Poe always presents a moral price to be paid for vain efforts to penetrate the secrets of nature. Valdemar proves a willing subject, permitting the narrator to utilize Valdemar’s approaching death, his phthisis (wasting away), as a means to subdue “the encroachments of death” within 24 hours of Valdemar’s demise. We discover that the narrator had kept Valdemar in a state of “arrested mortality” for seven months prior to the monstrous dissolution he goes on to describe.

Poe's tale is rife with elements of black magic, such as the symbolic reference to midnight and the fact that the narrator made his mesmeric passes by “directing my gaze entirely into the right eye of the sufferer.” Optical penetration is a recurrent motif in Poe, and its equally grim effects drive the narrator of “The Tell-Tale Heart” to distraction. After he had been “subdued,” it would seem that M. Valdemar died: “A very deep sigh escaped the bosom of the dying man. . . . The extremities were of an icy coldness.” The narrator calls Valdemar a “sleep-waker” and continues, “the manipulation vigorously, and with the fullest exertion of the will, until I had completely stiffened the limbs of the slumberer.” By three o'clock in the morning, we find Valdemar's “limbs were as rigid and cold as marble.” Has the scientist converted Valdemar into a work of art? If the narrator is Pygmalion, Valdemar is an unlikely Galatea: His skin “generally assumed a cadaverous hue . . . the circular spots . . . put me in mind of nothing so much as the extinguishing of a candle by a puff of breath.” The abundance of un prefixes, together with the analogy of the candle, consign the narrator's “scientific” ambitions to the darker purposes of Shakespeare's Macbeth, who in his despair at a wasted life utters, “Out, out, brief candle!” (5.5.26). What appeared at first an admirable attempt to defy death becomes a horrid commentary (as in Macbeth) on proud and morbid ambition, a defiance of the natural order of the universe. The various images of marbled “solidity” and aesthetic rigor into which the scientist cast Valdemar will eventually yield to a primordial ooze, an “out-flowing of a yellowish ichor” that parodies the blood of the gods and, finally, “a nearly liquid mass of loathsome—of detestable putridity.”

The nature of the human will fascinated romantic, especially German, philosophical speculation, as witnessed by the writings of Hegel, Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche. Could humanity resist death purely by exertion of will? We have the question put to us again in “Ligeia,” but here Poe sees only hubris in the undertaking to retard or to neutralize physical death by mental applications. When Valdemar's “tongue quivered,” and the terrible words “dead! dead!” absolutely burst from “the tongue and not from the lips of the sufferer,” we wonder into what kind of moral universe the scientist has fallen. We recall Hamlet's words, “For Murder, though it hath no tongue, will speak with most miraculous organ” (Hamlet 2.2.579–580).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Has the scientist learned to contain his overweening scientific curiosity and desire to prolong life, or does he reveal no hindrance to his further pursuits, in spite of the putrid effects of his experiment on M. Valdemar? Which do you think is the proper approach? Why?
2. Compare Poe's “The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar” to Robert Louis Stevenson's Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. Consider whether one has a greater right to experiment on oneself than upon others.

“The Purloined Letter” (1845)

In a letter to James Russell Lowell (1844), Poe called his detective fiction “tales of ratiocination,” and the three that stand out—“Murders in the Rue Morgue,” “The Mystery of Marie Roget,” and “The Purloined Letter”—all involve his brilliant sleuth, C. Auguste Dupin.

The impulse to create a body of work dedicated to the positive, penetrating intellect and to the triumph of scientific deduction may well be tied to Poe's ubiquitous fascination with puzzles, ciphers, codes, hieroglyphics, and labyrinths, into which Theseus can provide the clarifying thread of reason and logical connection. That Arthur Conan Doyle took his formulas for the Sherlock Holmes stories from Poe's tales like “The Gold Bug” and “The Purloined Letter” seems all too obvious today. The narrator is an unnamed friend and confidant of Dupin, easily parallel with Doyle's ingenious Dr. Watson. When we discover, at the conclusion of this tale, that the villain of the piece, Minister D—, did Dupin “an evil turn” in Vienna “that I should remember,” we suspect a correspondence with Doyle’s Dr. Moriarity, an evil arch mastermind with whom Holmes has a personal vendetta, much like the protagonist in “The Cask of Amontillado.”

The mechanics of “The Purloined Letter” remain relatively simple: Monsieur G—, the prefect of police, seeks Dupin’s help in locating an incriminating letter taken from the queen by Minister D—, who wields considerable power over her by the possession and possible exposure of this letter. Power, in fact, is the central theme of the story: “The paper gives its holder a certain power in a quarter where such power is immensely valuable.” But the usual police methods, of searching scrupulously through every nook and cranny of Minister’s D—’s premises as well of his person, have failed to discover the letter. The purloined letter is presumed to lie always near Minister D—, who with his “lynx eye” had “fathomed [the queen’s] secret,” stolen the letter, and thus achieved “ascendancy complete” over the queen, and, by extension, the state. Dupin notes that the culprit Minister D— is both mathematician and poet, and that he, Dupin, indulges in poetry: “I have been guilty of certain doggerel myself.” Dupin perceives that it is the quality of imagination and not cold analysis that makes Minister D— a formidable opponent and concealer of the letter, which eludes all material searches, what Prefect of Police G— calls “the most jealous scrutiny of the microscope.”

One month later, Dupin blithely places the letter into the hand of Prefect G— for the reward of 50,000 francs. Dupin reveals that the secret of his success lies in “an identification of the reasoner’s intellect with that of his opponent.” Poe has created the first profiler in detective fiction. His knowledge that the poet is more cunning, more imaginative than the mathematician allows for the flexibility of his method: Dupin has realized that Minister D— “would be driven. . . to simplicity” as his means of deception. The letter had been “hidden in plain sight,” having become an inverted palimp-sest that had not the look of a royal correspondence. The prefect and his policemen “never once thought it probable, or possible, that the Minister had deposited the letter immediately beneath the nose of the whole world.” After having created an outdoor diversion while visiting Minister D—, Dupin had himself purloined the letter and left a gold snuffbox to assure a pretext for his return to Minister D—’s apartments. As does Theseus, or a moralistic Dante, Dupin claims he has “no sympathy—at least no pity—for him who descends.” Dupin leaves Minister D— a card, announcing his triumph, so that the redress is personal as well as political. Poe seems to take a page from his own criminal Montresor in “The Cask of Amontillado”: “A wrong is unredressed when retribution overtakes its redresser. It is equally unredressed when the avenger fails to make himself felt as such to him who has done the wrong.” In the case of Dupin, the vengeance is classical, with Dupin’s citing the murderous retribution of Atreus, who served the seducer Thyestes his own children at a banquet.

By alternating the notions of concealment and revelation, Poe fashions a genre, detective fiction, that makes a virtuoso of the cryptographer, the man who penetrates the byzantine workings of the criminal mind. Frederick S. Frank points out several psychological and stylistic ironies of Poe’s detective stories in his exhaustive The Poe Encyclopedia:

The irrational crimes and punishments of the homicidal fantasies find a counterpart in the rational crimes and punishments of the detective tales in which Poe elaborates upon the skill of . . . C. Auguste Dupin, in employing the imagination of the poet and analytic intelligence of the mathematician to solve insoluble crimes. To crack his cases, Dupin’s mind entertains a perfect balance of analysis and speculative insight rendered all the more effective by his close identification with the criminal and his thought processes. Solving the crime is not a moral act . . . but an intellectual exercise, like the writing of a beautiful poem. . . . Dupin is by design self stimulated by the exotic and peculiar and acting according to a master plan. . . . [T]he mental routine of Dupin has much in common with the inquisitive narrators of the homicidal fantasies. Completely self contained and deigning to enter the social sphere only to exhibit his crime-solving prowess to the embarrassment of the authorities, the great detective operates on a plane above the forces of law and social convention. Because the moral implications of the crime never intrude upon the ideal solution, Dupin always succeeds where moralists fail. Beautiful and perfect in conception, his solutions are works of art as Dupin has attained the sort of ideality that the killers and madmen vainly seek. (3–4)

Through a pattern of consistent imagery, Poe glamorizes Dupin, who makes a pronouncement “amid a perfect whirlwind of smoke,” like some biblical vision. Whereas the police “functionaries” are “mystified” by the problem, Dupin’s “measures were adapted to [the minister’s] capacity . . . as a coutier . . . and as a bold intriguant.” Dupin symbolically breaks “the large black seal, bearing the D— cipher” superimposed on a letter whose “address was diminutive and feminine.” If Minister D— appeared to others as “in the last extremity of ennui,” Dupin has seen beyond the veil and calls the minister “perhaps the most really energetic human being now alive” and apt prey for Dupin’s aesthetic sport. No ploy is too protean, no persona too androgynous, for Dupin to follow, identify, and capture.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare Sherlock Holmes’s methods in “The Speckled Band” with Dupin’s deductive analysis in this tale. Explain how each author uses a combination of scientific deduction and imaginative induction.
2. How do modern profilers—detectives who closely empathize with the perpetrators they seek, such as the one in Thomas Harris’s The Silence of the Lambs—morally differ from the criminals they pursue? Explain how Dupin differs from Minister G—.
3. Poe has been called the “father of American aestheticism.” Do the detective stories, especially in Frederick S. Frank’s analysis, justify this epithet? Consider especially Poe’s presentation of the relationship art maintains with questions of morality.

“The Cask of Amontillado” (1846)

According to Edward Rowe Snow, writing on Robert E. Massie, of the U.S. Regiment of Light Artillery, “The Cask of Amontillado” appears to have a source in a gravestone Poe noticed when he was a private (in 1827) at Fort Independence (Castle Island). During summer 1817, Lt. Robert F. Massie of Virginia found that a certain Captain Green had formed an enmity toward him. In a duel pursuant to a card game in which Green had accused Massie of cheating, Captain Green killed the young Lieutenant Massie. It seems that the popular young officer was avenged by his officers, who seduced Captain Green with wine and then carried him to the subterranean casemate, wherein they shackled him. Despite Green’s panicked pleas for mercy, they proceeded to seal him alive within the tomb, using bricks and mortar. In 1905 workmen repairing the old fort discovered the dungeon and its gory contents.

A classic tale of premeditated revenge, “The Cask of Amontillado” rates as one of Poe’s finest tales. Its main appeal to gothic horror is its theme of premature burial, to which the vengeful Montresor consigns the hapless Fortunato, seduced by his weakness for rare vintage wines. The persona, Montresor, only provides the word insult as the source of his malice. We assume Montresor seeks to rectify some slight to his personal or family honor, and the spirit of Caius Brutus in Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar looms nigh: “Speak, strike, redress!” (2.1.47), quotes Brutus from a letter that challenges him to defend Rome’s honor from the upstart Caesar. So, too, Montresor states, “A wrong is unre-dressed when retribution overtakes its redresser. It is equally unredressed when the avenger fails to make himself felt as such to him who has done the wrong.” In the course of the tale, Montresor will carry out his revenge in artful fashion, fulfilling the Montresor family motto: “None Shall with Impunity Molest Me.” In a series of colorfully described tableaux, Montresor and Fortunato descend—into what seems almost a parody of Virgil and Dante—into the depths of the “palazzo” that provides the only locale for this single-minded enterprise.

The story takes place somewhere in Italy, during “the supreme madness of the carnival season,” which provides a unity of setting and psychological fixation. After Fortunato has been tempted with the “pipe” of Amontillado, the very idea of the rare wine affects him as the narcotic in an opium pipe would, and Fortunato repeats the name of the wine as a mantra, whose appearance “in the middle of the carnival” assumes the character of enchantment or magic. Poe several times refers to the presence of niter in the catacombs—an ingredient in the production of black powder—which adds force to Montresor’s early stated desire to see the “immolation” of his enemy. The niter certainly exacerbates Fortunato’s cough, for which Montresor often expresses a false sympathy. But the motley-dressed Fortunato is not to die by fire: He is to be sealed in a small tomb, and so we see played out Macbeth’s notion that “all our yesterdays have lighted fools / The way to dusty death” (5.5.25–26). One of the last sounds Montresor will hear from Fortunato, besides a resigned laugh, is “the jingling of the bells” from the fool’s cap Fortunato had donned for the carnival.

Curiously Montresor confesses that “my heart grew sick” at the sound of those bells, and we must wonder whether that fatal music will always wound Montresor’s conscience, as though the family crest—of a trodden snake biting into the heel of its assailant—marks an ironic commentary on who indeed has had the last laugh.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What evidence is there that Montresor senses that by killing Fortunato in so monstrous a fashion he has annihilated his own soul? How would evidence of this kind alter or reinforce your interpretation of the story? Explain.

2. Compare the killing of Fortunato to the killing of Basil Hallward in Oscar Wilde’s Portrait of Dorian Gray in terms of the settings and means described. Are there curious coincidences? What do they add to the works as a whole?
3. Consider the one eerie moment of humor in Poe’s tale, Montresor’s pun on freemasonry as he holds up a trowel. Why should Poe mock a secret brotherhood devoted to humanity and sympathy? Is Poe making a statement about the illusion of human benevolence? If so, what is it?

“The Man of the Crowd” (1850)

Any discussion of Poe’s tale must take into account the specificity of its setting: a London coffee house at “about the closing of an evening in autumn.” Only a mere handful of Poe’s stories reveal a specific locale—more often, they exhibit a European sense of time rather than place, with the action occurring in some fantastical castle. “The Sphinx” and “Murders in the Rue Morgue” are exceptions, the former especially, because its events occur in an American location, Upstate New York.

This tale opens with an epigram by La Bruyere to the effect that misery seeks company. What follows personifies that very spirit in the form of “a decrepit old man, some sixty-five or seventy years of age” who completely absorbs the attention of the narrator, an observer of London’s human condition as it reveals “every species of infamy.” The narrator philosophizes in the opening paragraph that “some secrets . . . do not permit themselves to betold. . . . Now and then, alas, the conscience of man takes up a burden so heavy in horror that it can be thrown down only into the grave.” The melancholy embedded in this maxim might well provide the rubric for Conrad’s Heart of Darkness, which also begins in London, along the Thames. In Poe’s tale, the narrator, “peering through the smoky panes” of the coffee house “into the street,” experiences a series of visions we might well call chthonian—a descent into the bowels of the earth—the belly of the whale of London's social life. His aim is to observe “with minute interest” the variety of human types who inhabit London, indulging his “calm but inquisitive interest in every thing.”

The progression of humanity that passes along the London street soon resembles not the inhabitants of a vast, prosperous civilization, a city of a thriving, happy empire, but that London captured in William Blake's visions: a fallen, decadent, devolutionary monument to a jaded and corrupt industrialization, a mockery of the Great Chain of Being. Initially, oceanic imagery embraces “two dense and continuous tides of population . . . a tumultuous sea of human heads.” We then progress to “the tribe of clerks,” again divided into “two remarkable divisions,” and then to a “swell of pickpockets, with which all great cities are infested.” The gamblers betray “a filmy dimness of eye, and pallor and compression of lip,” and they are foul creatures of the air, “birds of a kindred feather” who “seem to prey upon the public in two battalions.” If the images of plague and predation are not enough, Poe takes us even further into the abyss, employing an anti-Semitic stereotype in the process: “Jew peddlers, with hawk eyes” and then “sturdy professional street beggars . . . feeble and ghastly invalids, upon whom death had placed a sure hand . . . sidled and tottered through the mob.” The apocalypse is at hand, and we witness that life in death of which Coleridge speaks in “The Rime of the Ancient Mariner” (part 3, l. 193). The fallen women of London town put “one in mind of “the surface of Parian marble, and the interior filled with filth—the loathsome and utterly lost leper in rags—the wrinkled, bejewelled, and paint-begrimed bel-dame . . . an adept in the dreadful coquetries of her trade.” London is a haunt for painted women, a modern Babylon or the restored Rome of Petronius, rife with dehumanizing sin and vice.

The most compelling character is the old man upon whom the narrator fixes. He possesses “a countenance which at once arrested and absorbed my whole attention, on account of the absolute idiosyncrasy of its expression. . . . Retzsch, had he viewed it, would have greatly preferred it to his own pictural incarnations of the fiend.” The impression of having confronted a singular devil figure finds confirmation in the associations the narrator makes: “ideas of vast mental power, of caution, of penuriousness, of avarice, of coolness, of malice, of bloodthirstiness, of triumph, of merriment, of excessive terror, of intense—of extreme despair.” The old man unites any number of contradictions within one bosom, hinting at Milton's Satan, immortalized in his maxim that it is better to reign in hell than to serve in heaven. The old man's clothing reveals “both . . . a diamond and a dagger,” items that solidify the narrator's resolve “to follow the stranger whithersoever he should go,” words almost biblical in their suggestion of the Book of Ruth (1:16).

The movement of the story is one huge circle, within which are a series of epicycles, as the old man wends his way from one degenerate crowd to another, “as he forced his way to and fro, without aim, among the buyers and sellers” of the town. Increasingly incidences of the word wild appear while the narrator, like some hypnotized Dante in pursuit of a tarnished Virgil, proceeds deeper into hell: “the most noisome quarter of London, where every thing wore the worst impress of the most deplorable poverty, and of the most desperate crime.” And it is precisely amid these images of filth and social depravity that the “spirits of the old man again flickered up, as a lamp which is near its death-hour.” At the first sign that the crowd is about to disperse, that he is about to be left in solitude, the old man “with a mad energy, retraced his steps . . . to the heart of the mighty London.” Finally, weary of pursuit, the narrator gives up his role of shadow to this vision of London's demimonde (underworld), but not before having “gazed at him steadfastly in the face.” The narrator concludes by categorizing the old man as “the type and genius of deep crime . . . the man of the crowd,” a “text” best not to have read too deeply.

In the spirit of allegory, Poe has wrought a tale similar to the romantics' fascination with The Fly— ing Dutchman, an apocryphal tale of a ship that wanders the seas eternally, forbidden to return home. The old man seems to embody the restless, Faustian character of contemporary London life, seeking every indulgence and temptation, afraid to have to “know thyself.” That the old man might be the original sin incarnate is perhaps not too far-fetched. The “wild history” written in the old man’s bosom may well stand for the labyrinthine intrigues that bedevil the heart of London; as Conrad does later, Poe’s narrator finds a “fascination in the abomination” of humanity’s fall.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare Poe’s tale to Shelley’s poem “Ozymandias,” which also speaks of “ye mighty” in the course of celebrating, on a lonely pedestal, the accomplishments of its eponymous subject. In what ways do both authors point to the self-destructive impulses released when human appetites are freed from moral constraint?
2. Consider Poe’s major metaphor—the soul or conscience of humanity as a forbidden book or text that should not see the light of day—to Hawthorne’s “The Minister’s Black Veil,” which likewise deals with “secret sin” and corruption in men’s hearts. Do these stories suggest that limits must be imposed on self-exploration and that a certain level of naive belief in the goodness of humanity is beneficial?

“The Philosophy of Composition” (1846)

Poe, probably America’s first medievalist, attached to American letters a gothic and antiquarian literary past it never had, being a new nation with a short cultural history. Poe also initiated America’s poetics, attaching his name to those of Aristotle, Sir Thomas Wyatt, Percy Shelley, S. T. Coleridge, and William Wordsworth in explicating the function of poetry and belles-lettres. Poe early announces his intention, to “detail, step by step, the processes by which any one of his compositions attained its ultimate point of completion.” Poe means to deny Coleridge’s notion of method (that “ecstatic intuition” and spontaneity are the sources of poetry), and he refuses to subscribe to Wordsworth’s theory of poetry’s arising from “intense emotions recollected in tranquility.” Rather, Poe (if he is sincere and not writing a parody of aesthetic rationale) insists on the calculated nature of his multifarious effects.

Poe will use his own poem “The Raven” to exemplify his thesis, which is to disabuse the reader of the notion that its result “is referable either to accident or intuition.” Poe’s work proceeds “with the precision and rigid consequence of a mathematical problem.” He addresses two elements of the creative process. First, Poe believes that all works should be short, with the exception of novels. “There is,” he writes, “a distinct limit . . . to all works of literary art—the limit of one sitting.” Poe especially emphasizes this “rule” with regard to poetry, but he also notes that the short story is superior to the novel for this reason. Second, Poe stresses good literature’s unity of effect, assuming that by carefully constructing the end of a work, the author can control his audience’s emotional response and thereby subordinate all literary elements and details—tone, setting, plot, and characterization—to the realization of this effect.

Poe argues that “the legitimate province of the poem” is to delineate beauty, and that “the contemplation of the beautiful” is the ultimate, aesthetic pleasure. The soul shall be elevated even more, Poe claims, if that beauty is attached to melancholy, particularly thoughts of death. For “The Raven,” Poe considered every aspect of the poem. He deliberately set it on a tempestuous evening, causing the raven, “a non-reasoning creature,” to seek shelter. He sets the black bird upon a pallid bust to contrast with its dark plume. The bust is of Pallas Athena in order to evoke the notion of a scholar, to match the presumed student narrator poring over his “volume[s] of forgotten lore.” The death of a beautiful woman, urges Poe, is “the most poetical topic in the world,” and the raven’s “nevermore” contributes to “the most delicious because the most intolerable of sorrows.” The term

11. How does Poe's tale "The Imp of the Perverse" bear directly on the events described in "The Black Cat"? How does "The Tell-Tale Heart" relate to the kinds of impulses murderers experience in this and other Poe tales? How do you think Poe is able to capture such impulses? Discuss your answer, citing examples of Poe's style that create such moods.
12. Compare "The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar" to "Ligeia" and explain the way each tale explores the power of the will to control material existence. For another narrative on the power of the will, consider George Orwell's "Shooting an Elephant."
13. Compare "Ligeia" to the character Eleonora in the tale "Eleonora," who ultimately forgives the narrator for having taken Ermengarde as his wife. Explain why you might consider these two stories as complementing each other.
14. Compare Poe's other narratives of entombment—"The Premature Burial" and "The Fall of the House of Usher"—to "The Cask of Amontillado." Do the motives of the protagonists in any way affect the degree to which we feel horror at the events they describe?
15. Consider "The Fall of the House of Usher" as a commentary on the dark forces in art. How do images from "Kubla Khan" or Poe's own "The Oval Portrait" confirm this hypothesis?

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE

(1811–1896)

It may truly be said that I write with my heart's blood.

(letter to Eliza Cabot Follen, December 1852)

Harriet Beecher Stowe was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, on June 14, 1811, the seventh of nine children in the family of the prominent Congregationalist minister Lyman Beecher and his first wife, Roxana Foote Beecher. Harriet was especially close to her brother Henry Ward, the best-known pulpit orator of the day; her sister Catherine, who pioneered the movement for women's education; and her half sister Isabella, who became an outspoken advocate for women's suffrage. Her father was an energetic man who carried out his religious teachings with determination and strict discipline. Entering the ministry at the beginning of the religious revival known as the Second Great Awakening, he made it his mission to convert to Christianity those souls he viewed as threatened by an appetite for materialism fostered by an increasingly secular society. As a husband and a father, however, he could be difficult to live with: His intensity and earnest religious calling seemed at times to blind him to the more immediate personal concerns of his family members. In fact, his frequently messy and disorganized personal habits could combine with a bossy, exacting nature to make life in the Beecher household very difficult—when he was home. To complicate matters even further, the already large family was rarely without the additional company of frequent and numerous visitors, who added to the confusion and made the work of maintaining the home even more difficult.

Harriet's mother, Roxana Foote, played the role of 19th-century wife and mother that has since become known as the "angel of the house." Roxana was the central figure managing an incredibly busy domestic sphere while Lyman traveled and lectured extensively in the public realm. Although reared in a highly educated and cultured family herself, as wife to Lyman Beecher and mother to nine children, Roxana had almost no time to read nor even to think about the issues of the day, much less relax or rest. The drudgery of endless domestic duties—she had no electricity, no hired help, no modern appliances, and little income—in addition to the household's administrative duties all fell on her shoulders. This proved an impossible burden that eventually wore her out. Roxana Foote died in 1816 of tuberculosis at the young age of 41, when Harriet was only five. On her deathbed Roxana described to her mourners, including her husband and children, "a vision of heaven and its blessedness." Her mother's deathbed scene became so deeply impressed upon Harriet's imagination that she made it the basis of one of the most famous scenes, the death of little Eva in Uncle Tom's Cabin.

After the death of her mother, Harriet was sent to the home of her widowed grandmother, the elder Roxana Foote, as well as her unmarried and very capable aunt, Harriet Foote in Nutplains, Connecticut. There young Harriet was embraced happily and given much loving attention. She was also taught the traditional feminine domestic skills of knitting and sewing. The time Harriet spent with these two loving, strong, and independent women provided not only the vivid image of a home warmed by maternal love, but also an alternative model of womanhood. The experience would influence Harriet's development of women characters, especially her depiction of forceful, independent women whose strength and wisdom enabled them to manage the large, complicated households so common at this time. Harriet lived with her aunt and her grandmother for little more than a year, at which time her father married Harriet Porter and young Harriet returned to her father's home. Harriet found her new stepmother to be rather distant and cold, as she had little to do with the upbringing of the children from her husband's previous marriage. Once she began having children of her own, the distance between the two Harriets grew even greater.

Harriet did, however, benefit from a good education; first, in Litchfield, at Sarah Pierce's girls' academy (1819–25), and later, at the age of 13, at the female seminary in Hartford, Connecticut, that her sister Catherine founded. She entered the Sarah Pierce school at the age of eight and flourished through the exercise of her remarkable memory and a growing interest in writing. In particular, the innovative teaching of John Brace, whose composition assignments were a regular part of his program, departed from the conventional topics of "female" virtues such as "cheerfulness" and "forgiveness" and inspired Harriet to write. She proved herself to be a thoughtful and imaginative writer from a very young age and was even selected as one of the writers for the school's annual exhibition. Later, at the seminary her sister founded, she spent eight years studying French, Latin, and Italian, as well as history and moral theology. But the stated goals of Catherine Beecher's seminary—"the building of character, the cultivation of the intellect, and the proper preparation of young ladies to enter society" (Hedrik 58)—would develop Harriet's sense of purpose and self-confidence in even more meaningful ways than her knowledge of aca-demical subjects themselves. In addition, Catherine's philosophy that women held an important place in society as the dispensers of moral sentiment became an important theme in the school, in Stowe's mission in life, and in her writings. As Catherine's sister, she was often called upon to help with the work in the school; as a consequence, Harriet began to experience a sense of her own strengths in oratory. Throughout her life, Stowe advocated education as the key to social change.

When the family moved in 1832 to Cincinnati, Ohio, where her father became president of the Lane Theological Seminary, Harriet met and eventually married the widower Calvin Ellis Stowe, a professor at the seminary, in 1836. It was also there that she and her siblings became part of the Semicolon Club, a parlor literary group that offered Stowe an opportunity to meet other writers and to discuss the books she and others were reading, but more importantly, a reason to write. Being part of the group put Harriet into contact with others who shared her literary bent so that it can be said that through this group Stowe was granted an opportunity to discuss her writings and to begin her real literary career. Her participation in the parlor group also influenced her writing style (literary realism) because it helped her develop the habit of directly addressing a specific audience, whether reading a letter or telling a story. It was during this time and in this setting, situated as it was close to Kentucky, a slaveholding state, and therefore separated from legalized slavery only by a river over which many runaway slaves escaped, that Harriet observed many dramatic scenes associated with slavery that would ignite her passion for the antislavery movement and inspire her to write on behalf of slaves. The fugitive slaves' flight to the North and to Canada was facilitated by a vast network of people, mostly black but also many whites, who provided "stations" and "depots" where slaves could rest or eat, terms arising from the system known as the Underground Railroad. The society of Quakers was particularly involved in helping runaway slaves make their way to freedom; in Uncle Tom's Cabin Stowe has her leading characters, Eliza, George, and Harry, find refuge at the Quaker home of Rachel and Simeon Halliday.

Like her mother, Harriet was burdened with the harsh realities of domestic responsibilities, but her marriage was fulfilling in many ways. Living in what was called a “companionate” marriage, in which the husband acts as an intellectual companion and tutor, Calvin and Harriet were quite happy despite the daily challenges posed by the tedious and grueling tasks of maintaining a household on a modest income. Together they had seven children, including twin girls, Hattie and Eliza, born in 1836; a son, Frederick William, in 1840; and Samuel Charles, who died of cholera in infancy. Ill health, several miscarriages, Calvin’s frequent absences, as well as a tendency toward depression must have made life very difficult for Harriet as she looked after her six young children. In a letter to Calvin, she writes, “I am sick of the smell of sour milk, and sour meat, and sour everything, and then the clothes will not dry, and no wet thing does, and everything smells mouldy; and altogether I feel as if I never wanted to eat again” (Hedrik 267). She writes about her marriage and the conditions in which she lived to the abolitionist Eliza Cabbot Fulten: “Despite these long years of struggling with poverty and sickness and a hot debilitating climate my children grew up around me. The nursery and the kitchen were my principal fields of labor” (Stowe, “Letter” 413).

When a friend tried to help her by finding a publisher who paid Stowe for her sketches, Stowe realized that she could supplement her husband’s income and relieve the family’s economic hardship. Having “married into poverty and without a dowry,” her husband possessing “only a large library of books and a great deal of learning” (Stowe, “Letter” 413), she was motivated by her small writing income to find more time to write. It was at this time that Stowe began to publish several sketches in magazines such as Godsey’s Lady’s Book and the New York Evangelist. Her tendency to preach and to instruct, a practice known as didacticism, is an obvious characteristic of her writing—but it became even more pronounced when she moved to Brunwick, Maine, where Calvin was appointed in 1850 to the faculty of Bowdoin College. In that same year, the Fugitive Slave Act was passed, prohibiting any citizen from assisting a runaway slave, a law that enraged Stowe. She realized then that she and all citizens, whether they were for slavery or against it, were implicated in what she described as “this horror, this nightmare abomination!” that “lies like lead on my heart, it shadows my life with sorrow the more so that I feel, as for my own brothers, for the South, and am pained by every horror I am obliged to write, as one who is forced to disclose in court some family disgrace” (Hedrik 414). She then became committed to the antislavery movement at the urging of her sister-in-law, Isabella P. Beecher, an activist in the cause. After witnessing a slave’s being beaten to death, Stowe was so distraught and so deeply moved that she decided to take action. Her sympathy for slave women whose babies were taken from them was fueled by her own loss of a child in infancy: “It was at his dying bed and at his grave that I learned what a poor slave mother may feel when her child is torn away from her” (Preface, Ammons viii). Her profound empathy for slave mothers, who, at the mercy of their masters, were forced to part with their children to be sold at slave auctions, became a central part of the plot in Uncle Tom’s Cabin. Published in serialized form in 1851 and 1852, her most famous work paints a composite picture of all of these events through her careful presentation of plot and character. Inspired by the vision of a bleeding slave being whipped that appeared to her while she was in church celebrating the Eucharist, a service that commemorates the suffering of Christ, she wrote with evangelical intensity. The book was so successful that it sold more copies than the Bible and was translated into several languages. Stowe was much in demand in Europe, where she was asked to speak on behalf of the antislavery movement; when she traveled there in 1853, she received many honors.

The subtitle of Uncle Tom’s Cabin, Life among the Lowly, clearly reflects the characteristics of the genre of literary realism to which the book belongs, with its concern for and validation of “the coarse, common world” (Hedrik 157). Later Stowe wrote A Key to Uncle Tom’s Cabin (1853) to accompany the novel and to counteract attacks on the accuracy of her portrayal of slavery, mapping out in great detail all of the factual material associated with her narrative.

In all Stowe wrote more than two dozen books of fiction and nonfiction, including Dred: A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp (1856), Pearl of Orr’s Island (1862), Oldtown Folks (1869), and Pink and White Tyranny (1871). In all of her works, Stowe drew on the values and experience of women to pose a radically democratic alternative to the separation between public and private, reason and feeling, that characterized the dominant patriarchal social and political structures, which were based on separate spheres of male and female authority. She was instrumental in launching the literary periodical the Atlantic Monthly and offered a serial novel, The Minister’s Wooing (1859), in the first year of the journal. She continued to advocate women’s rights in Hearth and Home, a magazine that she coedited with Ik Marvell (Donald G. Mitchell, author of Reveries of a Bachelor). In 1863 Calvin retired at age 61 while Stowe, at 52, continued her career as a determined professional writer. With the comfortable income provided by her work, they built a home in Hartford, Connecticut, where Harriet spent her final years. Harriet Beecher Stowe died on July 1, 1896, at the age of 85, surrounded by her family.

Harriet Beecher Stowe’s writing is characterized by the highly romanticized Christian sensibilities that were familiar to her 19th-century audience but have less appeal for the modern reader. Her ability to use local dialects and to describe settings and characters in clear and accurate detail makes her an effective realist. However, she is best remembered today for the historical significance of her writing. Her work expresses the concerns of the 19th-century middle class and addresses the central issues and events of her century: slavery, women’s position in society, the decline of Calvinism, the rise of industry and consumerism, and the birth of a great national literature. Despite the highly sentimental quality and Christian didacticism of Uncle Tom’s Cabin, Stowe influenced the course of American history so much that during the Civil War Abraham Lincoln met Mrs. Stowe and is said to have stated, “So you are the little woman who wrote the book that made this big war.”

The Harriet Beecher Stowe Center in Hartford, Connecticut, promotes the life and work of this important American writer and attracts thousands of Stowe enthusiasts each year.

Uncle Tom’s Cabin, or Life among the Lowly* (1852)

Harriet Beecher Stowe wrote Uncle Tom’s Cabin, or Life among the Lowly in serialized segments for the anti slavery newspaper the National Era during the years of 1851 and 1852. It was then published as a two-volume set in 1852 by John P. Jewett and Company of Boston. Stowe wrote the novel to rally others to the antislavery movement as a result of her outrage about the institution of slavery in the Southern United States. According to Stowe herself, the story took shape in her mind while she was in church, where she had a vision of a saintly black man being mercilessly flogged, yet praying for his torturers as he died. Her success in persuading readers to join her cause was in large part due to the powerful emotions aroused by her text; readers were so overcome that they cried openly over the heart-wrenching story of Uncle Tom and Eliza. Congressman Horace Greeley, traveling by rail from Boston to Washington, D.C., apparently had “to stop overnight in a hotel in Springfield, Massachusetts, because he had been weeping so copiously in public on the train as he read” (“Preface” viii). The book was the first to feature an African-American hero and certainly the first to depict him as well as the other slave characters as human beings. Humanizing slaves in this way completely changed the attitudes of her readers, who then felt profound sympathy for the plight of slaves. Initially published in a print run of only 5,000 copies, the book subsequently kept 14 presses running day and night and sold 300,000 copies in the United States alone. Translated into many languages, Uncle Tom's Cabin turned Harriet Beecher Stowe into one of the most celebrated authors in the world. On the strength of this success, Stowe became very popular as a public speaker, traveling in Europe as well as across the United States.

The character Uncle Tom is a loyal, devout Christian slave who lives on the Shelby plantation at the opening of the novel. When Mr. Shelby meets financial difficulties, he reluctantly agrees to sell Tom and his wife's favorite slave, Eliza's young boy, Harry, whose heartbroken mother decides to flee across the frozen Ohio River to Canada rather than allow him to be sold. In the meantime, Tom is sold at an auction to Augustine St. Clare, whose angelic little daughter, Eva, is saved by Tom when she falls over the side of a riverboat. These events initiate the two primary plotlines in Stowe's novel: one that leads south with Tom's eventual descent into the most hellish conditions of slavery, and one that leads north toward Canada and freedom with Eliza, her husband George, and their young son, Harry.

Although Tom misses his family, he is treated kindly by the easygoing St. Clare, and his friendship with Eva flourishes. The two share an extraordinarily strong Christian faith and become highly unlikely disciples (Eva, a white child; Tom, a black slave). However, the young girl has fragile health, and eventually she dies in one of the most memorable and sentimental scenes in the novel. Soon afterward, St. Clare is killed in an accident and Tom is again taken to the slave auction, where he is sold to his final master, Simon Legree, a brutal man who drinks heavily. Despite the evil nature of his master, Tom responds to Legree's cruelty with courage and religious fortitude. Even when tortured in Legree's attempt to gain information about two runaway slaves, Cassy and Emmeline, Tom refuses to reveal it. In a rage Simon Legree has him flogged to death. By the time young Master George Shelby arrives to free Uncle Tom and to return him to his loving family, Tom's death is imminent. George vows to continue the fight for abolition and to keep Tom's memory alive by proclaiming his cabin as a symbol of his martyrdom.

The other significant line of the plot takes Eliza and her young child Harry on a desperate flight from the slave trader Haley. Two other slaves, Sam and Andy, cross the Ohio River with them and north to freedom in Canada, where they hope to unite with their husband and father, George Harris, who is also fleeing his jealous and cruel master. The image of Eliza's leaping onto large, shifting chunks of ice to cross the partially frozen river, clutching her son tightly in her arms, is one of the most celebrated and sentimental scenes in the novel. It also works as a symbol of supreme motherhood in keeping with Stowe's political agenda to overturn patriarchal power by convincing women of their own power within the female sphere. Stowe's political purpose is further advanced when Eliza arrives at the Quaker Settlement, where she is greeted by the benevolent Rachel Halliday, whose serene "face and form made 'mother' seem the most natural word in the world" and who treats the frightened and desperate Eliza as if she were her own daughter. When they sit together for breakfast, Rachel is at the head of the table, usurping the traditionally male place of the head of the household, emanating "nothing but loving words and gentle moralities, and motherly loving kindness." The scene also enacts the Holy Communion and the ritual "breaking of bread" but triumphantly places Rachel Halliday in the position of the divine. Stowe believed that matriarchal power would create the ideal atmosphere of "mutual confidence and good fellowship" that Eliza witnesses in the Quaker household, and especially in the kitchen, where "everything went on so sociably, so quietly, so harmoniously" that "it seemed so pleasant to everyone to do just what they were doing" (Tompkins, Sentimental Power 519).

In keeping with the highly religious society of the time, Harriet Beecher Stowe takes on a preacherly and highly didactic tone in this novel in a way that suits her purposes as stated in her preface: "Every influence of literature . . . in our times is becoming more and more in unison with the great master chord of Christianity, 'good will to man'"

(xiii). In many instances, she appeals directly to the reader's sympathies by means of a conventional device of 19th-century novels, narratorial intrusion, to make her point abundantly clear. An early example occurs on the Shelby plantation in Kentucky, where Stowe insists that the "goodhumored indulgence" of some masters and mistresses, "and the affectionate loyalty of some slaves" should not be misinterpreted as a reason to condone the institution of slavery (Stowe, Cabin 7–8). "So long as the law considers all these human beings, with beating hearts and living affections, only as so many things belonging to a master, —so long as the failure, or misfortune, or imprudence, or death of the kindest owner, may cause them to exchange a life of kind protection and indulgence for one of hopeless misery and toil, —so long it is impossible to make anything beautiful or desirable in the best administration of slavery" (8). Stowe's novel is founded on basic Christian principles, particularly on paradoxes expressed in the beatitudes (Matthew 5:3): "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The atonement after death, in spirit, for the injustices in life, in body, will occur after the Judgment Day, when the victory of the spirit will be revealed. This triumphant reversal of power is at the center of her "Appeal to the Women of the United States" (Independent February 23, 1854), where Stowe urges women to influence their husbands, brothers, and other male counterparts to show true Christian compassion and love toward their slaves and in that way to contribute to the abolition of slavery.

Certain episodes, the scene at the Bird household, for example, are pointedly intended to demonstrate the real possibility of maternal power exercised in the domestic sphere overturning patriarchal power in the public sphere (and in this case, Senator Bird even makes the laws). Mrs. Bird, a timid soul, who nevertheless becomes intimidating when faced with the persecution of helpless creatures, exhibits her power when Eliza Harris arrives with her little boy Harry at the Bird home, in desperate flight from her pursuers. Mrs. Bird's empathy for them flows to her husband, who assists her in protecting them in their home, in spite of the Fugitive Slave Act. The Birds go so far as to offer Eliza and Harry the clothing that was made for their own baby, who died at birth. Such sentimental scenes appear again and again in the novel—a strategy that Stowe hopes will "awaken sympathy and feeling for the African race, as they exist among us; to show their wrongs and sorrows, under a system so necessarily cruel and unjust to defeat and do away the good effects of all that can be attempted for them, by their best friends, under it" (Preface xiii). Thus, Mrs. Bird's apparent powerlessness in the public sphere is transformed through Stowe's concept of maternal power in the private sphere so that Mrs. Bird proves able to overturn her husband's resolve to abide by the law that he himself has helped to legislate.

The most highly charged sentimental scene occurs when the golden-haired angelic child Eva lies on her deathbed. Surrounded by her family and devoted slaves, including her dear friend Uncle Tom, Eva frequently displays Christian love, affecting everyone, even the mischievous and unruly Topsy. The "child angel" scene is a common one in Victorian literature as the purity and innocence of the child serve as a powerful example of redemption for those left behind. Stowe's rendition of this device works within the Christian framework of sacrifice for the spiritual salvation of others. Little Eva's triumphant exclamation "O, love!—joy!—peace!" at the moment of her death is taken as confirmation of the reality of heaven by all of her witnesses, as anticipated by her beloved Tom: "When that ar blessed child goes into the kingdom, they'll open the door so wide, we'll all get a look in at the glory (Cabin 255). Eva's golden curls, given to all she leaves behind, are symbols of her victory over death and of the promise to live as good Christians so that they will eventually be with Eva again in heaven. In fact, all those who witness Eva's death are transformed and converted: Topsy promises to love Jesus and to be a good girl, Aunt Ophelia promises to help Topsy fulfill her promise, and St. Clare rediscovers the faith of his youth before he is accidentally killed. The Christian paradox stated in the beatitudes has been fulfilled, and, more importantly for Stowe's purposes, through the self-sacrificing power of Eva's maternal love is confirmed.

As a result of St. Clare's death, his cold-hearted wife, Marie, believes she must sell all the slaves and, once again, Tom is sent to the auction block. Just as Eva and her father enter paradise, the reader follows Tom's descent into the hell of plantation slavery. The descent into the Deep South of the lower Mississippi represented the horror of being "sold down the river" to enter into the cruelest form of slavery. If Tom is a Christ figure, then Simon Legree is the Antichrist. Tom is forced to work beyond his physical limits and is whipped mercilessly and often. His passivity, his "turn-the-other-cheek" gesture of forgiveness, infuriates Legree so that his cruel treatment of Tom only increases. The evil nature of Simon Legree serves Stowe's thematic purpose in emphasizing the implications of not respecting the power of maternal love: Legree's mother was kind and loving and raised her son according to Christian values, but her son repudiated her love and later burned the letter to him written on her deathbed, along with the curl of hair she enclosed with her words of forgiveness and prayers. When one of Legree's slaves, Sambo, returns from flogging Tom, he carries a charm that consists of a dollar given to Tom by young George Shelby and a lock of Eva's hair that Tom wears to fortify himself against pain. Legree is horrified that it might be the hair his own mother had given to him and imagines it to be curling tightly around his finger so he throws it into the fire. These events emphasize Stowe's purpose in her characterization of Legree, for because he does not have a foundation in Christian faith and because he repudiates his mother's love, his deep-seated guilt leaves him open to superstition and fear: "[Legree] tried to drink, and revel, and swear away the memory; but often, in the deep night, whose solemn stillness arraigns the bad soul in forced communication with herself, he had seen that pale mother rising by his bedside, and felt the soft twining of that hair around his fingers, till the cold sweat would roll down his face, and he would spring from his bed in horror" (Stowe, Cabin 322– 323). These very fears also work in assisting his slaves, Cassy and Emmeline, in their conspiracy to distract Legree by inflaming his fears and ghostly visions, thus assuring their escape. Stowe's theme of the power of the spirit over that of the body, the fundamental paradox of the Christian faith, is enacted again in their triumph.

The plots surrounding the slave women Cassy and Emmeline further illustrate Stowe's belief in the power of maternal love. Embittered by her deep hatred for an earlier master, by whom she has borne children, Henri and Elise, who were then taken from her and sold, Cassy sees Legree as yet another cruel master and she is vengeful enough to murder him. However, when Legree purchases the beautiful 15-year-old Emmeline for sexual purposes, separates her from her mother, and takes her to his plantation house, Cassy's feelings change. In keeping with Stowe's theme of the redemptive power of maternal love, Cassy cares for Emmeline as if she were her own child, while the young girl swears that she will always love Cassy as a mother, since she will probably not see her own again. Empowered by their mutual love, they eventually reach freedom with the help of Tom, who, when questioned repeatedly and then flogged mercilessly for information about their whereabouts, sacrifices his own life for them. And again, it is Tom's unwavering Christian faith and kindness that will convert Cassy. Uncle Tom's death scene is described in parallels with that of little Eva. The heightened sentimentality of both scenes is meant to pierce through Stowe's readers' blindnesses and objectivity and draw forth their sympathy to slaves with intense emotionality. By linking the divine nature of a golden-haired little girl with that of a faithful old slave, Stowe also emphasizes the humanity of slaves as a whole. Tom's courageous death so moves his oppressors Sambo and Quimbo that they plead with him to teach them about the Jesus "that's been a standin' by [him] so, all this night" (358). Their conversion dramatically underscores all of the previous conversions in the novel and drives home Stowe's theme of the power of the spirit: "But, of old, there was One whose suffering changed an instrument of torture, degradation and shame, into a symbol of glory, honor, and immortal life; and, where His spirit is, neither degrading stripes, nor blood, nor insults, can make the Christian's last struggle less than glorious." Holding up models of moral perfection for her readers to emulate, Stowe's theme is fulfilled in the enactment of Tom's martyrdom. Her allusions to biblical passages clearly indicate her depiction of Tom as a Christ figure. When Legree threatens Tom with death if he will not reveal the whereabouts of Cassy and Emmeline, Tom offers him Christian values of forgiveness, love, and compassion and a plea that he repent in order to avoid eternal damnation. Legree pauses but in the end does not respond to Tom's kindness, thus sealing his own fate by cruelly striking Tom dead.

The end of the novel finds George and Eliza and Harry happily living in Montreal, Canada. At this point, too, many surprising revelations effect reunions, such as that of Cassy and Eliza, who turn out to be mother and daughter. A characteristic of 19th-century sentimental novels is the use of unlikely coincidence to join various plotlines; Stowe uses the technique for the larger purposes of rewarding those who have shown Christian values of faith and sacrifice and of reuniting mothers and daughters.

Through George Harris's letter that appears in the final pages of the novel, we learn that he would rather go to Africa, to Liberia, in particular, since he feels more solidarity with the African race than with the white. In a highly oratorical letter, George expresses his desire to help establish an African nation "that shall have a tangible, separate existence of its own" (374). Topsy also eventually travels to Africa, where she works as a Christian missionary. Stowe's final plea to the reader is to "feel right" and, in doing so, to embrace Christian ideals and to effect the abolition of slavery.

Uncle Tom's Cabin has achieved canonical status despite ongoing critical debate surrounding its representation of slave culture. Black Americans have found Stowe's racial stereotypes offensive, particularly her portrayal of "Negroes" as emotional, fiercely devout, loyal, and childlike. James Baldwin's protest against such stereotypes was passionately expressed in his influential essay "Nobody Knows My Name: More Notes of a Native Son." Baldwin objected to the sterile designation of "Negro" as he wanted "to prevent [himself] from becoming merely a Negro; or, even merely Negro writer." Moreover, Stowe's characterization of Uncle Tom as a passive sufferer has become a touchstone for modern critiques of racism. But the moral force of her attack on slavery remains. By humanizing slaves through her highly sentimentalized portrayal of them, Stowe swayed her readers' hearts and profoundly changed their attitudes toward slavery.

Jane Tompkins's influential essay "Sentimental Power: Uncle Tom's Cabin and the Politics of Literary History" offers a strong and convincing defense of the 19th-century sentimental genre in which the novel was written. As Tompkins points out, critics have chosen "to disregard the power of the book because . . . [its] political message" and its "emotional [tone] made it propaganda" (511). But, Tompkins argues, "Uncle Tom's Cabin retells the culture's central religious myth, the story of the crucifixion, in terms of the nation's greatest political conflict—slavery—and of its most cherished social beliefs—the sanctity of motherhood and the family. It is because Stowe is able to combine so many of the culture's central concerns in a narrative that is immediately accessible to the general population that she is able to move so many people so deeply" (513).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Throughout the novel, the author occasionally disrupts the narrative and speaks directly to the reader, a characteristic of many 19th-century novels. What is the effect of this style? Why does Stowe do it?
2. Eliza and George Harris and their son, Harry, are characterized as attractive, intelligent, and light-skinned blacks. What purpose does Stowe have in mind by portraying them in this way?

3. There are many families described in this novel. How does Stowe portray the women in these families? In an age when women had no vote, how does Stowe describe their place in society, and how does she make an appeal to their power?
4. What is the meaning of conversion in a religious sense? How does it work in Stowe's novel? How is Topsy converted?
5. What purpose does the character of little Eva serve? Why is she linked so closely to Uncle Tom?
6. What is a martyr? How does Uncle Tom reflect the martyrdom of Christ in this novel?
7. This novel has been characterized as a sentimental novel. How does sentimentality work as a strategy to move readers' sympathy toward slaves and thus to change attitudes toward slaves and slavery in general? In other words, how does feeling triumph over belief?
8. Throughout the novel, Stowe sprinkles many generalizations about the African race. Find examples and list some of them. Discuss the negative response to her book on the basis of her characterization of blacks, in particularly of the pacifist Uncle Tom.
9. Uncle Tom's Cabin clearly parallels the efforts of women and slaves to overcome the oppressive conditions of their lives. Contrast Stowe's parallels of women and slaves with MARGARET FULLER's parallels of them in Woman in the Nineteenth Century. How do the differences reflect the different aims of the authors?

"Sojourner Truth, the Libyan Sibyl" (1863)

Born a slave named Isabella Baumfree, Sojourner Truth was a strong advocate in the women's rights and antislavery movements. She is most famous for her speech "Ain't I a Woman?" at the Women's Rights Convention in Akron, Ohio, in 1851.

Sojourner Truth met Harriet Beecher Stowe at Stowe's home, where several clergymen and abolitionists had convened. Surprised by the unexpected guest, Stowe was summoned for what she thought would be a short interview. However, she was sufficiently impressed by Sojourner Truth's presence that she decided to publish what turned out to be an extended conversation and description of the impressions Sojourner made on her. Throughout the essay, Stowe presents Sojourner in idealized terms; describing her at the outset as reminding Stowe of "Cumberworth's celebrated statuette of the Negro Woman at the Fountain," Stowe goes on to characterize her as "a living, breathing impersonation of that work of art." Stowe also points to Sojourner Truth's robust physical stature, and her projection of the sort of spiritual strength that "in spiritualist phraseology . . . would be described as having strong sphere."

What quickly emerges is the way that Sojourner Truth's personal experience conforms to the broad outlines of the slave struggle that Stowe presented in Uncle Tom's Cabin. Stowe places particular importance on Sojourner's being a "full-blooded African" who is particularly responsive to the love of Jesus Christ. The largest narrative segment of the essay is devoted to Sojourner's account of her conversion. As does Stowe's character Eliza in Uncle Tom's Cabin, Sojourner flees the horrors of slavery to find refuge in a Quaker home. Unlike Eliza, Sojourner stays in the Quaker home until after emancipation, when she faces her most severe spiritual test and finally admits Jesus into her heart. This conversion experience ultimately changes her even more significantly than her achievement of freedom, as through her conversion she successfully opens her heart to love for her fellow human beings. She announces her newfound joy by proclaiming, "Lord, Lord, I can love even the white folks!" Just as Uncle Tom discovers love for even the most degraded white oppressor, here Sojourner Truth shows that the horrors and injustices of slavery can be overcome by Christian love.

This theme is driven home in the closing lines of the essay, where Stowe inserts a telling anecdote involving Sojourner Truth as recalled by the abolitionist leader Wendell Phillips. The event took place during a public meeting at Faneuil Hall in

HENRY DAVID THOREAU (1817–1862)

The material was pure, and his art was pure; how could the result be other than wonderful?

(“The Artist of Kouroo” in Walden)

A surveyor, farmer, musician, architect, ecologist, carpenter, mason, botanist, zoologist, and teacher, Henry David Thoreau of Concord, Massachusetts, changed the world—with his pen. He published only two of his seven books in his own lifetime, but he influenced Mohandas K. (Mahatma) Gandhi and many other activists, especially through his “Civil Disobedience” essay, and he inspired countless idealists to experiment with life as he recounted his sojourn in Walden.

Christened David Henry Thoreau (rhymes with furrow), he soon switched his two first names. NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE described his neighbor memorably as “a singular character—a young man with much of wild original nature still remaining in him. . . . He is as ugly as sin, long-nosed, queer-mouthed, and with uncouth and somewhat rustic, although courteous manners” (Meltzer and Harding 91). Yet he charmed Hawthorne, LOUISA MAY ALCOTT, and the children he taught in his youth. When he died at only 44 of lung troubles exacerbated by his work with his father manufacturing pencils, Concord’s children piled flowers on his grave.

The third child of John and Cynthia Thoreau, he descended from French, English, and Scotch forebears. John, “a quiet mousey sort of man” (Harding 4), was an unsuccessful businessman, but he passed along to his son his love of the flute and of classical literature. Thoreau’s mother, Cynthia, in contrast to her small and quiet husband, was a tall, opinionated, and liberal-minded woman, active in such groups as the Concord Women’s Anti-Slavery Society. The mother of four passed along to Henry her passionate advocacy of reform and her love for roaming through the woods. Thoreau’s domestic education was broadened by the somewhat awkward stages of his formal schooling. At Mrs. Wheeler’s nursery school he stood apart from his little friends; in the public grammar school children called him “The Judge” or “the fine scholar with the big nose.” At age 11 David Henry entered Concord Academy, which, he said, “fitted or made [him] unfit for college” (Meltzer and Harding 21). In 1833 Thoreau entered Harvard on money ($179 per year) scraped together by his older siblings, parents, and aunts. There he cut a broad swath through the library’s 41,000 books, reading, for example, the 21 volumes of Chalmers’s English Poets and Eastern holy texts (Richardson, Life of the Mind 9). He was a diligent student, and surprisingly conservative: Of the 63 young men in the class of 1837, young Thoreau was one of only 19 who had no disciplinary problems, eschewing even the food fight rebellion. The Harvard years put Thoreau in touch with the intellectual leaders of his and future days and ingrained such habits as keeping a commonplace book, or journal, that grew to number more than 5,000 pages.

At Harvard, though he was still considered a little odd by his classmate John Weiss (Harding 43), he was also earning respect. RALPH WALDO EMERSON, 15 years older, recognized his young friend to be a great thinker. Thoreau was small and homely; Emerson, tall and attractive. They differed also in family background: The Thoreaus' colorful forebears had emigrated to America late in the 18th century from France and Scotland, while the long line of ministers in Emerson's family originated long before the American Revolution. Thoreau was a practical man; Emerson was not. By the time Emerson met Thoreau, he had left the church and had begun a new career in a new kind of pulpit: the Lyceum Circuit, where his speeches (later, essays) reflected the new wave of transcendentalism.

Perhaps the most successful embodiment of such Emerson works as Nature was Thoreau's experience at Walden Pond, but that would take place a number of years after his meeting with Emerson, who said, "I delight much in my young friend who has as clear and erect a mind as any I have known." The famous story that Thoreau skipped the graduation at which Emerson delivered "The American Scholar" may be only partly true, but Thoreau, who had already learned of transcendentalism on a teaching stint with Orestes Brownson, had ready access to that talk and others: Emerson's speeches circulated widely. The then-34-year-old orator/philosopher honed his speeches for publication (often after he had delivered them on multiple occasions), then printed them in the transcendentalist journal the Dial, and then in book form. Two times during his years at Harvard Thoreau withdrew Emerson's Nature (1836) from the college library, and later he bought a copy for himself. By June 1837 Emerson knew his young neighbor well enough to write to President Quincy of Harvard, (unsuccessfully) recommending financial aid for his young friend (Harding 47).

The friendship had developed soon after Emerson and his second wife, Lydia (he called her Lidian), settled in Concord in 1835; established an impressive household; and had four children in seven years. Having inherited money from his first wife and in his marriage to Lidian, Emerson was able to help support his less fortunate neighbors.

During Emerson's many absences from his home, Henry David visited the Emerson's so often that Lidian fixed a room for him. In the Emerson household Thoreau became the essential handyman/children's companion. When his favorite, six-year-old Waldo, died on January 27, 1842, Henry grieved. That profound sadness followed an even more terrible loss, that of his brother and teaching colleague John. John had the charm and good looks that his younger brother lacked.

Together John and Henry had successfully collaborated in what would be Henry's third teaching venture. In addition to the work with Brownson in his Harvard years, he had another teaching post in his own former school, the Concord public grammar school. Rather than beat any of the 52 children in his care there, as he had been instructed, he quit. In contrast, the school that he and John ran, much like Bronson Alcott's educational experiment, respected children and stressed "learning by doing," especially exploring the natural world. For three years, John taught English and mathematics; Henry taught Latin, Greek, French, physics, natural philosophy, and natural history. The school closed because of John's poor health, probably the result of the family scourge, tuberculosis. Henry then arranged a vacation with John on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers in spring 1839. Their travels were later memorialized by Thoreau in his first book, A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, a harbinger of Walden.

After the school closed, Thoreau worked on the Dial. He also worked on wooing, first Ellen Sewall, who later regretted having rejected him for his better-looking brother. He also formed a close friendship with a female in-law of Emerson's who was many years older than he, and later one with an appropriately young woman named Mary Russell. Because he never married and because he devoted a chapter in Walden to the values of chastity ("Higher Laws"), Thoreau has been the subject of inquiry about his sexual identity. However ascetic, even misogynistic, he may have appeared in later years, in his twenties he seems to have been susceptible to sweet, bright women—and several of them to him. To the amusement of some of his family, the embarrassment of Henry, and the grief of the lady involved (there was rumor that she considered suicide), Thoreau received a proposal of marriage from Sophia Ford (Harding 225–228). The marital strike-outs took place during the period Thoreau endured two losses that proved much more desperate and sad than the school failure or his disappointments with women.

The death of Henry's appealing brother, John, occurred two weeks after the death of Waldo Emerson. Although he had been ill for a long time, it was a grotesque accident that killed John, a cut that led to the excruciating pain of lockjaw. John died in his brother's arms. For two days after John's death Henry was gravely ill, his symptoms appearing identical to his brother's.

Afterward, Henry needed solace, friends, an occupation, and a home. The need for friends was met partly by the newly married Hawthornes, who filled in for the still-grieving Emersons, supplying skating parties. He and Emerson also encouraged Thoreau's writing. Regarded now as one of the greatest prose stylists of the English language, Thoreau began with small essays for the new Dial. A reflective essayist since his Harvard days, in the Dial he further honed his early style with its concrete, surprising metaphors and tone of the wise, amused, passionate observer of his world. Emerson also helped Thoreau with his other need: a place to live. He did this first by arranging a position for Thoreau in Staten Island tutoring the three sons of his brother, William Emerson. On tutoring breaks Thoreau met such leading lights as HENRY JAMES, Horace Greeley, Lucretia Mott, Bronson Alcott (later a Concord neighbor), and WALT WHITMAN (Harding 149). Interesting as it all was, when Emerson invited him to return to Concord to give a lecture, he moved back for good. What he moved to was not only a new house but the material for his two major works, Walden and "Resistance to Civil Government."

Emerson lent Thoreau part of his lot on the wide banks of Walden Pond. There he began an "experiment." On the Fourth of July 1845, when his countrymen were expressing their patriotism and supporting the war with Mexico, Thoreau declared his own independence from an act he could not support and from an economic system of which he did not approve by moving into the little house he had made with the white pine he had cleared. Using his own labor and a little less than $29 for supplies, Thoreau built the most famous little house in American history. In his 10-by-13 foot space, he had, as he said, a bed, some wood, a table, and three chairs, "one for solitude, two for friendship, and three for society" (271). Most of his daytime hours were spent on the front stoop of that house. There, as he tells us in the book, he would publish seven years later, he hoed (hoer is an anagram of hero); from there he sauntered (the word he links, semifacetiously, to "saint a terre"); on its grounds and from the banks of its pond (actually closer to a lake) he observed nature—as a scientist and as a philosopher. There he read widely and entertained whimsically. Most importantly, there he wrote.

His writing goal was to complete the book that would honor his brother, A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers. In many ways the book is a preview to Walden, which he was also writing (though he did not necessarily know it) by entering daily observations and thoughts in his journal. On their own the more than 2 million words of the journals have provided material for a musical setting by Philip Glass and numerous books excerpting portions for general readers, providing a glimpse into Thoreau's mind and writing practices. In themselves they contained finished essays in which Thoreau's "subjects are literal, his vision metaphorical" (Howarth ix), but they also show the first draft of the finished great books. The entry for his decision to leave Walden states: "But why I changed? Why I left the woods? I do not think that I can tell. . . . To speak sincerely I went there because I had got ready to go; I left it for the same reason" (Anderson 233). In the years between 1845 and 1854 he crafted that entry into the most familiar passage from Walden: "I left the woods for as good a reason as I went there. Perhaps it seemed to me that I had several more lives to live, and could not spare any more time for that one” and the stirring paragraphs that follow (439; page references to Walden and to “Civil Disobedience” from the Stern annotated version).

Walden's high rhetoric is blended with straightforward specific Anglo-Saxon language. Its first chapter, “Economy,” begins simply with a series of prepositional phrases that situate Thoreau in his world and introduce the reader to his central concern: “When I wrote the following pages, or rather the bulk of them, I lived alone, in the woods, a mile from my neighbor, in a house which I had built myself, on the shore of Walden Pond, in Concord, Massachusetts, and earned my living by the labor of my hands only” (145). Thoreau itemizes expenses, but what Thoreau really means by “Economy” is at the heart of his experiment. Economy, in Thoreau's sense means how much “of what I will call life”—drudgery and dollars—is required to pay for a deeper, richer life of meaning. In this experiment Thoreau was not exactly a hermit. Frequently he sauntered up the path to hear the news of the village. Much of that news worried the young man, who had rung the church bells to advertise an Emerson speech and defended his invitation of the prominent abolitionist Wendell Phillips (Harding 175–176). Thus, when the war with Mexico started on May 8, 1846, Thoreau took action. Although the causes of the Mexican War were complex, for Thoreau the most important cause was slavery: It might increase the slave states through the annexation of Texas. One month after the war was declared, Thoreau went to jail—and changed the history of the world. He was not the first to commit the crime that sent him to jail, a refusal on principle to pay taxes (Alcott, for example, had done the same), but he was the one who most memorably articulated the reasons for his civil disobedience, inspiring in words and action future generations to fight perceived injustice in a peaceful way.

Because the night Thoreau spent in jail has become a successful play (in 1970 by Jerome Lawrence and Robert E. Lee), most people know that some time during the night an unknown person “interfered” and paid his tax bill, depriving him of what seemed to be a pleasant experience. Who did so—Thoreau's sister Sophia and his aunt Maria are suspects—is unknown, but Walter Harding suspects the jailer, Sam Staples, who was eager to clean up the books on the brink of his own retirement. The oft-told story about Thoreau's asking Emerson why he was not in jail is apparently apocryphal. Emerson was out of town. More than a year after his by-then-famous night in jail, Thoreau explained his dramatic action to a Lyceum full of curious villagers. Voting and paying taxes, he explained, were the occasions on which he (or any citizen) was face to face with his government, and he wanted his government to know that he did not support an unjust war. He woke up his Lyceum audience and most future readers with the shocking call to chaos and anarchy: “That government is best which governs not at all” (455). Having attracted the attention of his audience and readers, Thoreau reversed course and modified the radical statement. He went on to say that governments are indeed necessary machinery for the safety and help of any civilization, but there may be a time when an individual must get in the way of the machine: “If the injustice is part of the necessary friction of the machine of government, let it go.” However, if the injustice “requires you to be the agent of injustice to another, then I say break the law. Let your life be a counter friction to stop the machine” (463). Clearly Thoreau, a few years later a defender of the martyred troublemaker John Brown, believed that his little bit of tax money and the continuation of the immense and tragic institution of slavery were connected. Elizabeth Peabody invited Thoreau to publish the speech in the new journal Aesthetic Papers, where she published it as “Resistance to Civil Government.” When the essay was included in the posthumously published Yankee in Canada with Anti-Slavery and Reform Papers (1866), it was called “Civil Disobedience.” Other than a review in a London journal praising the “meatiest portions,” the 1849 publication of the essay that was to be crucial to the world “produced scarcely a ripple” (Harding 207). It became famous when Gandhi republished the essay in India in 1907 (Stern 452–453).

Having sent off the essay to Miss Peabody, Thoreau went on with his own busy life. Between his night in jail and the publication by Peabody, Thoreau had helped his father build on a lot on Texas Street and experiment with improvements in pencil making. Much time, too, was spent on science. Thoreau had been conducting such precise scientific observations that a great deal of literary and nonliterary scholarship focuses on Thoreau’s botanical, geological, agrarian, zoological, and ecological studies. For example, Thoreau’s last manuscript, “Faith in a Seed,” showed his well-informed lover’s quarrel with the scientific community, and the foreword by Robert Richardson reviews for the layman Thoreau’s reaction to the new concepts of the Harvard professor Louis Agassiz, who was attempting to classify American plants. Thoreau became “a member of Boston’s new and energetic Society of Natural History” in 1850, and in 1859 he was a member of Harvard’s Visiting Committee in Natural History (Richardson, “Learning” 8). Approaching death, Thoreau wrote that “if I were to live, I should have much to report on Natural History generally” (Richardson, “Learning” 5), but, in fact, he had been reporting on it virtually all of his life. Sometimes his investigations were in far-flung spots. One particularly challenging adventure was his trip to Maine in August 1846, a month after the night in jail. Via boat, rail, and coach, Thoreau, a cousin, and two friends, carrying enough supplies—including blankets, pots and pans—for six men for a week, had to portage their boats and then pull themselves up the side of perpendicular falls of over 20 feet by roots and branches. The next year (1849) Thoreau took another trip, the first of three to Cape Cod, about which he would write another (posthumously published) book. He also spent a rugged week in Canada with Ellery Channing in 1859. Finally, in 1861 he asked the 17-year-old Horace Mann, Jr., son of the late educator and Mary Peabody Mann (sister of Elizabeth and of Sophia, wife of Hawthorne), to accompany him on a trip to Minnesota. Thoreau’s curiosity about the rivers, lakes, homesteaders, and, most of all, Indians led him to the Minnesota adventure.

This, his last trip, is a gauge of Thoreau’s belief in the power of nature to heal; his passion for knowledge about plants, animals, and water formations; his interest in others, particularly the disenfranchised and marginalized; and his American westering spirit. It was, in fact, his only trip west of the Mississippi. By the time the two returned home, it was clear that Thoreau was worse, not better. What they did not foresee was that the exposure to Thoreau would also kill young Mann. Although he went on to Harvard and had a brief career as a botanist, Mann would die at 21 of tuberculosis, presumably contracted from Thoreau. Thoreau himself had only a little over a year left after his return east, during which he continued to write, edit, and cheerfully visit friends. To the end he kept his sense of humor, answering a friend who remarked on his lack of gray hair by crediting his virtue and lack of troubles, “But there is Blake [a friend]; he is as gray as a rat” (Harding 461).

Work and travel had been interrupted in 1849, when the family suffered the death of his sister Helen, victim of the family curse, tuberculosis. One wonders whether he could foresee his own mortality when, at Helen’s funeral, he played the music box his brother and the family had loved. Although he spent long periods meditating and silently observing nature, he packed an astonishing amount of vigorous life into his last 13 years, after Helen’s death. As he had explained to his friend and frequent correspondent Harrison O. Blake, “I have no designs on society—or nature—or God. I am simply what I am, or I begin to be that. I live in the present. I only remember the past—and anticipate the future. I love to live.” In another letter, he advises, “Aim above [commonly understood] morality. Be not simply good—be good for something” (Stern 76).

Along with taking occasional practical surveying assignments, Thoreau continued to lecture vigorously and to write. The book he went to Walden to write, A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, was published the year of Thoreau's sister's death and of the publication of "Civil Disobedience." In Walden Thoreau joked about his publishing debacle of that first book. He bragged, "I have now a library of nearly 900 volumes, over 700 of which I wrote myself" (Introduction, A Week xv). Thoreau called "the peculiarity of my 'Week' . . . its hypaethral character, to use an epithet applied to those Egyptian temples which are open to the heavens above, under the ether" (quoted in Introduction, A Week xvii). A Week's poetic prose may be situated in the clouds, but the structure—a straightforward journey narrative broken into the seven days of a week—is simple and presages Walden's movement from summer to the following spring. However, the literary allusions, symbolism, digressions, and language of the book help to explain its failure in the marketplace. A Week cost him $290 and earned back only $15. Walden did a little better.

As did the Artist of Kooroo, Thoreau worked hard and long on his craft. Ten years separated the idyllic trip with the dying John from the printed Week (1839 and 1849); in similar manner, it took two years to live at Walden (1845–47) and seven more to complete the book and publish it (in 1854). The many cross-outs on the many drafts reveal Thoreau's struggle toward perfection. Organized chronologically through the seasons, Walden is also organized by topics that overlap with and respond to each other. The two books published in his lifetime were only a small part of what he crafted during his life as a professional writer. Steven Fink's study Prophet in the Marketplace makes the case that although Thoreau did not achieve financial success, "his involvement in his profession had a profound (and ultimately positive) effect upon both the man and his works." Fink notes that just in the years between 1837, when Thoreau began his journal, and 1849, when he published his Week, he also published book reviews, verse translations, travel narratives, and informal essays, mostly but not exclusively in the Dial (Fink 6–7).

As he lay dying after that Minnesota trip, famous writers and simple townspeople paid visits.

He rewarded them with such comments as this: "When I was a very little boy I learned that I must die, and I set that down, so of course I am not disappointed now. Death is as near to you as it is to me." The family watched his peaceful end, which occurred on May 6, 1862, when his sister reported his saying, "I feel as if something very beautiful had happened—not death" (Harding 464–466). And indeed, as every student of American literature and most political activists around the world know, it had only been one kind of death. For years the site of the cabin in the woods was decorated with stones brought by faithful readers, but the real legacy would be in the means many would choose to right a world they saw as gone wrong.

THOREAU'S SPEECHES AND ESSAYS IN POLITICAL CONTEXT

Thoreau left the woods, as he tells us, because he had "other lives to live." Those lives included travel, more work in the pencil factory, and, most significantly, speaking out about the wrenching dilemmas of his day. A few historical notes about those dilemmas are in order. Thoreau's movement from experimental hermit to fiery, vigorous, if not altogether consistent activist was not surprising. The seeds of what made Thoreau, in the words of his early biographer Henry Seidel Canby, "the woodchuck gritting his teeth until they are powdered" (382), are obvious in Thoreau's family history, which included his paternal grandfather, who served under Paul Revere. Thoreau's earliest published piece was, in fact, an obituary of Concord's last survivor of the Revolutionary War.

Most glaring of the flaws in the independent country for which they fought was the status of slaves; the Constitution outlawed slavery in the North but said nothing about its extension to territories and new states. This question, along with that of the legislation for return of fleeing slaves, gathered organized protest in Thoreau's intellectual community and in his own household. By 1837 the annual Anti-Slavery Society meeting was held in Dr. Ripley's Meeting-House in Concord. The newspaper invited "friends of the cause" to attend and “local societies [to send] large delegations.” We do not know that Thoreau attended, but the year was one in which Thoreau graduated from Harvard, taught briefly at Center School, and became a member of the “Hedge Club,” composed of the major transcendentalists. We do know that in 1844 Thoreau rang the bell to summon people to a speech by Emerson at a ceremony celebrating the emancipation of slaves in the British West Indies (Harding, Days 193). In 1845 Thoreau wrote for the Liberator in praise of Wendell Phillips’s stand on the slavery-free admission of Texas, and, of course, in 1848, Thoreau refused to obey the government by not paying taxes that would support the extension of slavery.

Meanwhile, he and his community were becoming increasingly enraged by the expansion of laws that obligated the public to aid in the return of escaped slaves. As early as 1793 legislation permitted—indeed encouraged—the federal government to punish those who helped fugitive slaves. In response, the Personal Liberty Law was passed in 1843 with the aim of reducing the government’s role, making it a crime for any state official to aid in the detention of fugitive slaves and prohibiting the use of jails (Rosenblum xx). What most angered Thoreau and others who opposed slavery was the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law as part of the Compromise of 1850. This law reversed the 1843 legislation, making it a federal crime to help fugitive slaves. Abolitionists saw this as legally obligating citizens in free states such as Massachusetts to support the institution of slavery.

Resistance to the government that would so subvert the ideals of the country pitted abolitionists such as Emerson, who declared, “I will not obey it, by God” (Harding, Days 196), against slave catchers who traveled to Boston to test the laws. Among those whose situations fired up the New England transcendental community was the runaway Frederick “Shadrach” Wilkens, who in February 1851 was seized while waiting on tables at a coffee house in Boston. Liberated by other blacks from the courthouse, “Shadrach” was probably helped en route to Canada by the Thoreau family and sheltered in the home of a Thoreau friend, Mrs. Mary Brooks. “Shadrack” was luckier than most. Every day, says Harding, “Negroes were being dragged back to the chains and cruelties of slavery. It was time to act” (Days 314). In April of that year Thomas Simms was marched to the wharf surrounded by 250 U.S. soldiers and sent back to Georgia. In September Henry Williams was bound back for Virginia when Thoreau himself helped to enable his escape. In fact, says Walter Harding, “rarely a week went by without some fugitive being harbored overnight in town and sped along his way before daylight. Henry Thoreau, more often than any other man in Concord, looked after them” (Harding, Days 316). Three years later, in 1854, a jailed fugitive slave named Anthony Burns was guarded by an entire brigade of Massachusetts militiamen. In 1855 the Massachusetts Personal Liberty Law forbade anyone to act as counsel for a slave claimant. Increasingly citizens were enraged at federal judges such as Lysander Spooner, who made it his job to enforce the Fugitive Slave Law (Rosenblum xvii–xxi). Thoreau himself called the government’s actions “maddening folly” (Kritzberg 546) and a “perfectly heathenish business” (Kritzberg 548).

The problem of the territories rankled abolitionists as much as the rendition laws. The Kansas-Nebraska Act of May 1854 left the decision of whether the Kansas territory would be slave or free to a popular vote there. Among those most angry over the attempts of pro-slavery people to tinker with the election was the 56-year-old John Brown. Thoreau met John Brown in 1857 at his mother’s boardinghouse when Brown went to Concord to raise money for his cause, and he praised Brown’s “courage to face his country herself when she was in the wrong” (Witherell 654). By this time Brown, four of his many sons, and followers had already (in 1856) hacked to death five unarmed pro-slavery settlers at Pottawatomie Creek in Kansas. The real crisis for those attracted by Brown’s passionate war on his government’s slaveholding protectionists but temperamentally and ideologically sickened by violence occurred in October 1859, when word came of Brown’s failed and fatal but heroic attack at Harpers Ferry. Along with Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Thomas Parker, Wendell Phillips, and others, Thoreau defended the man, whom he saw as a transcendentalist with “a spark of divinity.”

Three years before his own death, Thoreau, famous for espousing civil disobedience, became a passionate advocate for this militant (some thought it mad) disobedience. Whether or not this was a break with his earlier ideas is disputed by scholars. Thoreau, the individualist, did not join the societies that opposed such injustice, but he had already acted on his beliefs when he (as others had) accepted a jail sentence issued in response to his 1846 refusal to pay taxes in support of the Mexican War. What followed summed up “Civil Disobedience,” his most famous speech, and others that were spoken and published in the later years of his brief life.

“Civil Disobedience”

(“Resistance to Civil Government”) (1848)

In response to the curiosity of his neighbors about the now-famous night he spent in jail for refusing to pay his poll tax in 1846, Thoreau delivered the lecture that many believe so powerful that its influence rippled outward to change whole governments. The next year he polished the essay, then titled “Resistance to Civil Government,” for publication by Elizabeth Peabody in Aesthetic Papers. Finally, before he died, Thoreau edited the essay for inclusion in A Yankee in Canada, with Anti-Slavery and Reform Papers (1866), where it appeared as “Civil Disobedience.” For all this editing, the essay maintained the vigor of a speech intended—as is so much else of Thoreau—to wake up his neighbors.

By the January night in 1848 when he first gave the speech, the July night he spent in jail in 1846 had become romanticized in his mind and had become emblematic of the power of individual action. Famously beginning with almost a call to anarchy, Thoreau radicalizes what he cites as a “motto”—“That government is best which governs least,” changing it to “That government is best which governs not at all” (203). The reader pictures Thoreau’s listeners sitting up straighter, ready to protest or to cheer. By the end of his first paragraph, he makes clear that the (to him illegal) Mexican War is the stimulus to action. In the second paragraph, he carefully separates the government, which he relegates to “an expedient,” from the citizens who compose it; they are the freedom fighters, the pioneers, the educators. With the third paragraph he backtracks to a reasonable, practical tone: “I ask for, not at once no government, but at once, a better government,” and in the fourth, he weighs the power of a majority against the even greater power of a single person’s actions based on conscience. “The mass of men serve the state . . . not as men mainly, but as machines,” Thoreau says, echoing his introduction to Walden, where he attacks “lives of quiet desperation.” He follows this with a brief history of the revolution and of political theory and then makes a point that will be repeated in later and angrier protest speeches: “Practically speaking, the opponents to a reform in Massachusetts are not a hundred thousand politicians at the South, but a hundred thousand merchants and farmers here, who are more interested in commerce and agriculture than they are in humanity” (207).

From Walden to the latest of the John Brown essays, Thoreau’s mission is to wake up his own neighbors and urge them to consider taking “action from principle” (210). Admitting that many abuses of government may be borne with patience and inaction, Thoreau notes that there is a time when the individual must disobey. Here is the passage on which the whole essay depends:

If the injustice is part of the necessary friction of the machine of government, let it go, let it go. . . . But if it is of such a nature that it requires you to be the agent of injustice to another, then, I say, break the law. Let your life be a counter friction to stop the machine. What I have to do is to see, at any rate, that I do not lend myself to the wrong which I condemn. (211)

how he acted on this principle. “The only mode in which a man situated as I am,” he says, meets his government is “directly, and face to face, once a year . . . in the person of its tax gatherer” (212). If the uses of his tax money will, as he said, cause one to be an agent of injustice to another, as would have been the case had the states acquired through the Mexican War become slave states, he must take action: “Under a government which imprisons any unjustly, the true place for a just man is also in prison.” He urges all citizens to “cast your whole vote, not a strip of paper merely, but your whole influence,” as through such an action will the dictates of conscience be translated into meaningful action. “If a thousand men were not to pay their taxes this year,” it would be a “peaceable revolution” (213). Riffing on these thoughts for two pages, Thoreau finally tells the story about which his neighbors are curious, recalling his refusal for six years to pay his taxes, the frustration of failing to arouse his neighbors, and his “novel and interesting” night in jail. Watching the stars from his cell window was not unpleasant, and drawing out his cellmate for stories of previous occupants, Thoreau says, made it “like travelling [sic] into a far country, such as I had never expected to behold” (218).

Thoreau’s meditations on citizens and governors, on true and false conformity, on genius and its opposite, lead to a somewhat hopeful concluding image: “I please myself with imagining a State at last which can afford to be just to all men, and to treat the individual with respect as a neighbor” (224). Released when “some one interfered” and paid the tax (the guilty party is in dispute), Thoreau emerged into a Concord noontime in July only to discover that his fellow citizens remained ignorant of the justice system—the jail—in their town square. Rather than regale them with his thoughts at that time, he set off on a huckleberry party and did not broach the subject until he was asked to make the speech that “was Gandhi’s textbook for his civil disobedience campaigns in Africa and India”; that became “a handbook of political action in the early days of the British Labour party in England”; that Martin Luther King, Jr., used as a guide to his movement toward greater civil rights; and that “has probably been more widely read than any other work by Thoreau” (Harding and Meyer 42).

For Discussion or Writing

1. An inspiration for political activists, “Civil Disobedience” has the potential to cause chaos as well as progress. Discuss the implications of Thoreau’s words and actions.
2. Today we know that this document has reached around the world; to whom does Thoreau seem to be speaking? What is his tone in most of the essay?
3. How do this essay and the action behind it represent the philosophical assumptions of the transcendental movement? Which Emerson speeches, for example, would you hold up as inspiration for it or parallel to it?

A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers* (1849)

Ralph Waldo Emerson wrote to the publisher Evert Duyckinck about his friend Thoreau’s account of his trip with his brother on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers: It had “extraordinary merit,” he said, and it was “attractive to lovers of nature . . . and to poets [and to] scholars for its excellent literature, and to all thoughtful persons for its originality and profoundness” (Fink 143). Every phrase of Emerson’s words about A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers fits the great book, Walden, that was yet to appear. Like the more famous book, A Week is hard to classify. On one level it purported to be a travel adventure, but the actual activities of each “day” are a small part of the book (Professor Harding thinks about 40 percent). The rest is a complex of philosophic and scientific reflections. In its own day, even Emerson called them “big beads and ingots.” James Russell Lowell’s long review (one of some dozen) had much the same complaint, declaring that “the door of the portfolio cage has been left open, and thoughts have flown out of themselves.” Lowell voices the thoughts of many others in his observation that when Thoreau is the “Boswell of Musketaquid and Merrimack,” the book is “delightful,” but when he veers into digressions on the classics or topics like friendship, he stops us cold: “We come upon them like snags, jolting us headforemost” (Introduction, A Week xiii–xiv). Even committed 20th-century Thoreauvians found these wanderings annoying: Carl Bode says that “the original narrative [of the trip with John] has been weighted down with learned allusions and quotations” (Bode 138), and perhaps the most ardent Thoreau admirer and biographer of all, Walter Harding, says that the thoughts not related to the journey are “dumped in like plums into a pudding” (247).

One wonders at these complaints because the actual events of the Thoreau brothers' excursion from Massachusetts to New Hampshire do not seem to be the point of the book, which is not to diminish the importance of the travel memoir. Between the “plums” or “digressions”—usually at the beginning and end of each chapter—that is to say, of each day—the reader can trace the trip. The two brothers set off to great fanfare from friends on August 31, 1839. A fast-forward of their trip would go this way: to Ball's Hill for blueberries, seven miles downriver to Billerica for supper and the night, a view of Lowell city's furnaces in the night as if made for entertainment. The next day they reached the Middlesex Canal, where (it was Sunday) churchgoers literally and figuratively looked down on them; 12 miles farther they camped in Tyngsborough. That was just the first two days: The next few took them well into New Hampshire, past Manchester to New Hampshire's Concord, and on to Lincoln. They took time to climb mountains, take coach rides, stay in a hotel, and do much more. They met with rain and with high winds that “shook the foundations of the tent” (221), and they were in close contact with cows and, they feared, with bears (269). For all the complaints about the wandering nature of the book, one could easily follow the trip on a map, and, in fact, some Thoreauvians have taken this trip in memory of the brothers.

However, for some people, the better reason to read the book is not for the travel trivia but for the same whimsical expressions of the spirit that lead us to read Walden, for which A Week seems a rehearsal. For one thing, the organization of A Week anticipates the greater, later book. As Walden would move from spring through the year to the next ice thaw (though he actually lived there for two years), A Week obviously proceeds in a straightforward progression through the days of one week (though the trip took two). Thoreau may have also had another organizational principle within the straightforward Saturday-to-Friday sequence (he certainly did in Walden), as well, but topics interlace with each other so that there is a dollop of philosophy, natural science, and wry observations on human beings in each of the chapters/days. The traveler/narrator announces that almost everything within the trip and the book is metaphorical; he introduces the river, a more important character than his brother (who is mentioned very little): In his first sentence he likens “The Musketaquid, or Grass-ground River” to the Nile, and he plays with the names of all the rivers. The Grass River will be the Concord River “only while men lead peaceable lives” (3). From there topics range wide, but any reader of transcendentalism will recognize the provenance of the thoughts. Here is Thoreau, reworking Emerson, on the difference between the poet and everyone else: “Alas, the poet too is in one sense a sort of dormouse gone into winter quarters of deep and serene thoughts. . . . Other men lead a starved existence meanwhile, like hawks that would fain keep in the wing” (126). What to some (Thoreau's own sisters, for example) seemed a shocking disdain for conventional Christian philanthropy appears in many guises in the book as well: Thoreau makes a distinction between himself and most people who are “mummies in museums” and says that it was a “pleasure to escape from Reformers” (160–162). Those who want a brief introduction to the Bhagavad Gita or Upanishads will find it in A Week. Those whose tastes are for Western literature will find much on Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and others who are curious about the Fresh Water Sun-Fish will find three pages of description and analysis; those who, like Thoreau, are concerned about the history of and future of Native Americans will find much about Prince Philip's War and other historic events. Thoreau's tribute to his brother is really a continuation of the conversation he has started with himself as he tries to be unordinary and totally alive. If his attempt to extend that conversation to his neighbors, jarring them to be equally individualistic, fails, he will have other chances. The question he repeats in many ways—in his own poetry and that of others, in fable, in humor, and in preachments—is this: “What have I to do with ploughs? I cut another furrow than you see” (67).

For Discussion or Writing

1. How often do you find Thoreau speaking about the brother whose memorial this is? What picture emerges of the siblings together? How might his pages on “Friendship” in the “Wednesday” chapter give insight into the relationship?
2. As he does in all his work, Thoreau here displays his interest in puns and symbolic languages. Find examples and discuss how thinking about the many possible meanings of a word can teach you about your own creative process.
3. A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers is obviously a frustrating one for most readers (even for Thoreau scholars). It is, however, filled with paragraphs of two or three pages that contain nuggets of gold; those nuggets match others in other chapters. Select one topic of the many in this volume and trace that subject—perhaps Homer or Eastern thought or the nature of a river—throughout the book.

If “Civil Disobedience” was the most influential of Thoreau's works in changing governments and power positions, “Walking,” as the combination of two separate essays would be titled, contained the sentence that has become the famous cry—and slogan on billboards and fund-raising campaigns—of ecologists and preservationists: “In Wildness is the preservation of the world.” The reader may wonder at “Walking” in this discussion of Thoreau's radical political essays. As the discussion progresses, it should be clear that much as Thoreau echoes the Walden spirit, the definitions he gives to the words Wildness and Westering in “Walking” are indeed metaphors for the attitudes Thoreau celebrates in the other essays of this period.

To be sure, Thoreau's call for a return to and a reverence for nature, Thoreau's lifetime theme, was present in his journals from the 1840s, but by the time this essay was published, a month after his death (it was the first of his posthumous publications), it clearly anticipated the John Brown material of Thoreau's declining years. Described as “the least organized of his shorter works” (Harding and Meyer 60), the version that appeared in the Atlantic suffers, perhaps, from its hybrid origins. Part of it was taken from journal entries Thoreau had culled for lectures that he delivered frequently in 1851–52 under the title of “The Wild.” The separate essay, “Walking,” was delivered on many occasions as one of a series of Thoreau talks in New Jersey in 1852 and again in 1856. The two essays were joined for posthumous publication in the June 1862 issue of the Atlantic Monthly, in which “Walking” was the lead article. Ticknor and Fields, the new owners of the the Atlantic, had responded to Thoreau's “Herculean effort to gather, edit, and publish as many as possible of his uncollected and unpublished works” (Harding, Days 377). Knowing he was dying of tuberculosis, Thoreau worked hard to ensure financial support for his widowed mother and unmarried sister (Myerson 5).

Perhaps because of its hybrid and loosely organized nature, the essay has been read under quite different rubrics. Richard Lebeaux, who psychoanalyzed “Walking,” for example, reads the essay as Thoreau's achievement of a new self-identity. Having renamed himself (David Henry to the reverse), “he gloried in his identity as the saunterer, the bold and free crusader and observer of the ‘other Concord’ (Lebeau 128). Joel Myerson places the essay in a larger historical/ philosophical context. According to him, it is Thoreau’s “Transcendentalized version of the New World Eden and manifest destiny concepts” (Myerson 154). Demonstrably open to multiple characterizations, “Walking” begins with a paragraph that could stand as the other side of the coin to Thoreau’s meditation on community, “Civil Disobedience”: “I wish to speak a word for Nature, for absolute freedom and wildness, as contrasted with a freedom and culture merely civil, —to regard man as an inhabitant, or a part and parcel of Nature, rather than a member of society” (225). The I of this first sentence, much as does that of Walden, “occupies a midway or ‘frontier’ position between woods and village, radical simplicity and sophisticated culture,” says Myerson (134). The essay’s second sentence, too, is radical: “I wish to make an extreme statement.” Myerson notes that this extra-vagant tone and language are “a Transcendental analogue to the saunterer’s effort to outwalk the village mindset” (154).

Thoreau builds numerous puns into his second hyperbolic paragraph: The saunterer is the Sainte Terre; he is extravagant, extra-vagant, and “the greatest vagrant” is “he who sits still in a house all the time.” Nodding to the much more extensive journeys of the crusaders of years past (later he will toss out a cornucopia of literary and historical references), Thoreau builds toward the simpler subject of himself, the I of the essay, and sets off with the listener/reader (us) in tow: “If you have paid your debts, and made your will, and settled all your affairs, and are a free man, then you are ready for a walk” (226). His walks, he says, are usually four hours in length, and he will begin them at any hour lest “rust” should take over. He does not castigate his neighbors as roundly here as elsewhere, but he does say that he wonders why at that hour between four and five “too late for the morning papers and too early for the evening ones, there is not a general explosion heard up and down the street, scattering a legion of antiquated and house-bred notions and whims to the four winds for an airing” (227). As is his wont, Thoreau indulges in digressions: why and how women walk, the distinction between the way a surveyor (he was one) and a miser (he might be accused of that too) walk, the meanings of the word village; and even his own poem on one of those villages.

His rather long poem, “The Old Marlborough Road,” is too irregular to be doggerel and too full of specific names and inside jokes to be an enduring poem, but it might have made, one imagines, a song for the road. The playful verse segues into a little moral essay within the longer exploration on “Walking.” Emerson meets Robert Frost, starry abstraction meets concrete simplicity, in this paragraph:

What is it that makes it so hard sometimes to determine whither we will walk? I believe that there is a subtle [sic] magnetism in nature, which, if we unconsciously yield to it, will direct us aright. It is not indifferent to us which way we walk. There is a right way; but we are very liable from heedlessness and stupidity to take the wrong one. We would fain take that walk, never yet taken by us through this actual world, which is perfectly symbolical of the path we love to travel in the interior and ideal world; and sometimes, no doubt, we find it difficult to choose our direction, because it does not yet exist distinctly in our idea. (233–234)

He plays with the points of the compass and develops his own version of westering, his own “manifest destiny”: “I should not lay so much stress on this fact [that the better way is wilderness rather than the village] if I did not believe that something like this is the prevailing tendency of my countrymen. I must walk toward Oregon, and not toward Europe” (234). He offers an ode to westward migration, citing bird patterns and the travels of Columbus, even the setting sun. “He is the Great Western Pioneer whom the nations follow,” says Thoreau of the setting sun (235).

gestions of “westering” and of “wildness.” When he has nearly exhausted the possible implications of both, he merges the two richly suggestive words. He offers a catalog of travelers and pioneers and philosophers, all moving, metaphorically at least, westward—Columbus, Guyot, Michaux, Sir Francis Head, Linnaeus—who travel to save the wilderness: “The West of which I speak is but another name for the Wild; and what I have been preparing to say is, that [here it comes] in Wildness is the preservation of the World” (239). He defends his preference for swamps over gardens; for “the ocean, the desert, or the wilderness!” over anything civilized; and even for the desert, where “pure air and solitude compensate for want of moisture and fertility” (242).

Thoreau takes wildness and tameness beyond unmediated nature into art and daily life. And in the John Brown essays he implies that the contrast (wildness and tameness) pertains to leaders as well. In this essay he points out that “wildness is the uncivilized free and wild thinking in ‘Hamlet’ and the ‘Iliad,’ in all the Scriptures and Mythologies” (244). The “wild and free” sport through the next few pages; there are strains of wild music, wild horses, wild cattle, wild tigers and leopards, even wild names. Building toward his finish, Thoreau admits, “For my part, I feel that with regard to Nature I live a sort of border life, on the confines of a world into which I make occasional and transient forays only. . . . Unto a life which I call natural I would gladly follow even a will-o’-the-wisp through bogs and sloughs unimaginable, but no moon nor firefly has shown me the causeway to it” (251).

Finally, he, the traveler, leads his readers/companions (at the opening he had spoken to “you” who are ready for a walk) not to “hug the earth” but “to mount,” even just “to climb a tree”: “I found my account in climbing a tree once. It was a tall white pine, on the top of a hill; and though I got well pitched, I was well paid for it, for I discovered new mountains in the horizon which I had never seen before, —so much more of the earth and the heavens” (253). Thoreau now closes with a long sunset that has as much of the “super” as the “natural” about it. The ending arrives gently and takes us back, as the walks do, to the beginning: “So we saunter toward the Holy Land, till one day, the sun shall shine more brightly than ever he has done, and perchance shine into our minds and hearts, and light up our whole lives with a great awakening light, as warm and serene and golden as a bank-side in autumn” (255). About the ending’s nod to the sunset, John Dolis writes, “Don’t be deceived by all this pleasantries: everything’s directed toward the west, toward sunset and the end of things. It’s autumn now, not spring. It’s evening” (198).

For Discussion or Writing

1. In terms of this essay, in which the word is almost a refrain, how would you define the wild? Is it part of the romantic heritage of the 19th century to make the dichotomy between it (the wild) and the town or village (civilization) even sharper, or does it have other implications?
2. Considering the distressing political events taking place in Thoreau’s Massachusetts during this period, how may this essay be seen as part of a larger debate? Is the essay really about a withdrawal to a New Eden, or is Thoreau up to something else?
3. All Thoreau’s work includes names, places, events far from contemporary Concord or the Maine woods or Cape Cod. What do some of the following names of places and people do to your reading of this essay: Shanghai, Cochin, India, Nauvoo, the Moselle, the Mississippi, along with Americus Vesputius, Bunyan, Burton, Chaucer, Columbia, Confucius, Dante, Darwin, Sir Francis Head, Homer, Milton, Mohamet, Niepce, Shakespeare, and Spencer? Was he showing off his learning, or do most of these have important roles in the metaphors involving “Walking”?

“Life without Principle” (1852)

As the title of this essay suggests, Thoreau confronts readers with a radical way to live by presenting an account of how not to live. As William Cain points out, the title is also a pun on principal: As does Walden's chapter "Economy," this essay examines the costs and rewards of accommodating a commercial, unthinking world. Given at least six times in the 1850s (it was his most frequently delivered lecture) as "What Shall It Profit?" and later edited as "Higher Laws," the essay was given its punning title when the Atlantic Monthly published it posthumously in 1863. If "Walking" wanders in its logic, "Life without Principle" is "one of the most cogent essays [Thoreau] ever wrote" (Harding, Days 342). Anticipating the John Brown essays, it is, in the eyes of Len Gougeon, "a true jeremiad" (206); some might simply call it crotchety, but Thoreau himself called it "a strong dose of myself" (Gougeon 206). Not only does "Life" sum up Thoreau's philosophy, returning to the principles and prejudices of Walden and most of his essays, it also shows off most of the rhetorical strategies discussed by Richard Dillman: use of symbolic language, of synecdoche, of imagistic language blended with concrete language, of successful (not faulty) syllogisms, of a sure handling of paradox, aphorisms, and proverbs (Dillman 1–4).

The speech begins in a tone of modest levity: "There is a desire to hear what I think on some subject, though I may be the greatest fool in the country, —and not that I should say pleasant things merely . . . and I am determined that they shall have me, though I bore them beyond all precedent" (348). They do "have" him, but Thoreau's voice is boring only in the sense that it bores in against his mercantalistic neighbors. Echoing himself, he draws a distinction between the money-driven, hard-but-futilely-working mass of men ("Most men," "my neighbors"). Here he is even more pointed than in Walden: "The ways by which you may get money almost without exception lead downward" (350). Especially for a writer the exchange of labor for money seems repellent: "The community has no bribe that will tempt a wise man," he says (351), making it personal with "I trust that I shall never thus sell my birthright for a mess of pottage" (352). Of course, he was writing and speaking for money himself—or at least for the support of his family after the death he could foresee. He worried to a friend, "After lecturing twice this winter I feel that I am in danger of cheapening myself by trying to become a successful lecturer" (Myerson 87).

What follows is a series of sermonettes attacking nearly every segment of American life: those who engage in meaningless labor and those who hire them; those who seek gold and those who buy it, those who preach and those who listen to preachers without questioning them, those who are nationalistic, those who operate the criminal system and those who allow them to do so without conscience, and—here it comes—those who hold slaves. One is tempted to ask how he can bear to get up in the morning in such a meretricious, shallow, selfish, and evil world, but his attacks are so precisely stated and so neatly balanced between wit and righteous anger that the reader keeps reading and writing down the diamond-sharp sentences.

Of the intersection of commerce and politics, he rails: "And have all the precepts in all the Bibles taught men only this? and is the last and most admirable invention of the human race only an improved muck-rake? Is this the ground on which Orientals and Occidentals meet? Did God direct us to get our living, digging where we never planted?" (354). Life and gambling are one, he says: "What difference does it make, whether you shake dirt or shake dice?" (354). If work for money is spiritually stultifying, then "a man had better starve at once than lose his innocence in the process of getting his bread" (357). When he takes on the press, he sounds like his neighbor in Amherst, EMILY DICKINSON declaring that "the only news [she knows] / Is bulletins all day / From Immortality." Thoreau is not quite so pithy: "We rarely meet a man who can tell us any news which he has not read in a newspaper, or been told by his neighbor." His account of the press of his day seems distressingly familiar. News, he says, is "stalest repetition" (359) and "idle rumors and incidents of the most insignificant kind" (360). Rather than engaging in such trivia, he would have his listeners/readers return to the pleasures of “Walking”: “The sun, the clouds, the snow, the trees say so much to me. You cannot serve two masters” (359). And rather than attending with nationalistic fervor (another scourge) to revolutions afar, Thoreau urges an attention to “your own affairs in Massachusetts fields” (359). He escalates the metaphors. Those who waste time on transitory news and do not spend enough on their spiritual lives, Thoreau says, “will live [as though] . . . being drawn by dogs, esquimaux-fashion, tearing over hills and dales, and biting each other’s ears” (360). This image morphs into an even stranger, cartoonlike image:

It has appeared to my mind’s eye, that when they [the neighbors and spectators and—later in the essay—mere Jonathans] took off their hats, their ears suddenly expanded into vast hoppers for sound, between which even their narrow heads were crowded. Like the vanes of windmills, they caught the broad, but shallow stream of sound, which, after a few titillating gyrations in their coggy brains passed out the other side. (361)

Two pages from the end of this spirited and figure-filled romp, Thoreau begins to suggest what one should do among such neighbors and nitwits: “We should treat our minds, that is, ourselves, as innocent and ingenuous children, whose guardians we are, and be careful what objects and what subjects we thrust on their attention. Read not the Times. Read the Eternities” (362). Shortly before the end of the essay, Thoreau reminds us of his title and topic: “The chief want, in every State that I have been into, was a high and earnest purpose in its inhabitants” (365). Unlike the sometimes relentless and unnervingly passionate language of his John Brown essays, Thoreau’s tone returns to the light, understated tone with which he began the essay: “Why should we not meet, not always as dyspeptics, to tell our bad dreams, but sometimes as eupetics, to congratulate each other on the ever glorious morning? I do not make an exorbitant demand surely” (366).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Return to Walden and compare the metaphors and specific applications of the word economy in it and in this essay, which puns with the banking term principal.
2. The ending of this essay and the ending of Walden are also parallel. Discuss Thoreau’s use of the word morning.
3. To what contemporary civic problems might the high ideals of this essay be applied?

“Slavery in Massachusetts” (1854)

“Who can be serene in a country where both rulers and ruled are without principle?” Thoreau asked in his journal as early as 1853. The anger became public when, just a month before Walden was published, in response to the arrest and return of the slave Anthony Burns, Thoreau applied the concepts he had explored in “Civil Disobedience,” “Walking,” and “Life without Principle” when he delivered this powerful abolitionist lecture at a protest meeting opposing the Fugitive Slave Law. According to Moncure Conway, who was present at the speech, the large audience “clamored for” Thoreau (Canby 386). The meeting was called on July 4, 1854, by William Lloyd Garrison, editor of the Liberator, who used the occasion to burn the United States Constitution in “protest against the protection it afforded slavery” (Harding and Meyer, New Handbook 18). Garrison later published the speech, as did Horace Greeley’s Tribune and the National Anti-Slavery Standard. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who had been part of a failed attempt to rescue Burns, was among those who wrote to thank Thoreau (Fink in Myerson 86). Thoreau vigorously lambastes the government for allowing, much less requiring, citizens to be, as he had said in “Civil Disobedience,” “agents of injustice” to others. As it turns out, this essay was, in fact, more widely heard and read in its own time than anything else by Thoreau. It is also one of Thoreau’s most effectively organized essays, and, as Richard Dillman points out, it is remarkable for the rhetorical control over words and sentences born of terrific anger (Dillman 11).

More strident than previous essays, dealing a “blow straight from the shoulder” (Canby 381), “Slavery in Massachusetts” is nevertheless in the line of almost all Thoreau’s past work: It is a wake-up call to his neighbors—and to himself. Richard Lebeaux argues that as Thoreau dealt with the gathering pains surrounding slavery, he drew unconscious motivation from his own sense of psychological confinement (Lebeaux 207). Lebeaux may be right, but the state—particularly the governor—and the erstwhile supporters of abolition who did not protest the actions in support of the Fugitive Slave Act seem sufficient motivation to raise Thoreau’s ire. Sarcasm controls the anger as Thoreau begins his essay in the tone of a calm journalist at a Concord meeting reporting on a crowd, which, rather than talking about Burns and castigating the government, turned to discuss matters in Kansas and Nebraska.

Thoreau’s tone turns from reporter to passionate editorialist as he names some of those who disappointed him by “taking up a position” about the western states but not even mentioning the immediate human rights problem: “Our Buttricks, and Davices, and Hosmers are retreating thither,” he says, “and I fear they will have no Lexington Common between them and the enemy. There is not one slave in Nebraska; there are perhaps a million slaves in Massachusetts” (333). He attacks the cowardly “voice of a Governor,” which proves only to be “the crashing of crickets and the hum of insects.” Railing against the governor’s failure to act during the “moral earthquake” of the Simms affair three years earlier, he says, “He was no Governor of mine. He did not govern me” (334). Late in the essay he will speak of the governor’s “time-serving irresolution” (346). The railing tone continues toward the military force of Virginia, “trained merely to rob Mexico, and carry back fugitive slaves to their masters,” an act he likens to kidnapping (336). Then he scolds his fellow citizens: Their July Fourth celebration is a “broad joke” in light of the lack of liberty for the slave and his defenders (336). The press, too, he says, exerts a “pernicious influence”

(339). With the exception of a few liberal, abolitionist papers, no one is exonerated: The “editors of the periodical press” and “the people who read them [the periodical press] are in the condition of the dog that returns to his vomit” (340). Judges and lawyers are “men of expediency” who “persist in being the servants of the worst of men, and not the servants of humanity” (342).

Calling on the logic of “Civil Disobedience,” Thoreau says that “the State has fatally interfered with my lawful business,” and that he is amazed to see that so few citizens are aware of the violations the state has perpetrated on its citizens’ rights. The hope for his fellow citizens implicit in “Civil Disobedience” and “Walking” is missing here, except for the weary tone of the last sentence. The speech/essay, in contrast to the glowing conclusions of Walden and “Walking,” ends on a discouraging note: “Slavery and servility have produced no sweet-scented flower annually. . . . They are merely a decaying and a death, offensive to all healthy nostrils. We do not complain that they live, but that they do not get buried. Let the living bury them; even they are good for manure” (347). The sentence seems a precursor to the apparent acceptance of violence in the three John Brown essays.

For Discussion or Writing

1. How effective do you think the vitriol of some of Thoreau’s rhetoric might have been—or might be today if used in a parallel situation—in inspiring others to wake up and act?
2. Unlike “Walking,” this essay does not call on many historical models other than the American Revolution. Would Thoreau’s case have been stronger if he had tried to inspire his neighbors by using more examples of action against a state inspired by high moral purposes?
3. Thoreau’s rhetoric in this essay has been praised. Find examples of the perfectly balanced sentence. On the other hand, how many of the well-known problems in logic (ad hominem argument, generalizations, faulty syllogisms, and so forth) do you find in the work? Does Thoreau ever do what often strengthens persuasive essays: anticipate the opposition to his position?

What had Thoreau to do with plows? What kind of different furrow would he plow? The answers to these and many other questions are explored in the great book of Thoreau's career, one of the great books of American literature. As did the Artist of Kouroo, a story Thoreau added to the last chapter late in the writing process, Thoreau took time to shape the best account he could: seven years and at least eight vigorously edited manuscripts to prepare for the publication on August 9, 1854, by Ticknor and Fields. Although Walden is now considered a masterpiece, it did not meet with immediate success. In Thoreau's own (brief) lifetime sales averaged 300 copies a year; even though he was eulogized and his work was printed widely in essay form in the 10 years after his death, sales still failed to reach more than 3,000 copies. By the 1920s, however, largely because the book was cited all over the world, primarily in Russia and France (Turgenev and Proust both admired it), the book received the approbation it so richly deserved. It was translated into at least 24 languages; in Japan, seven translations had been published by 1970 (Shanley, "Historical Introduction" 368–369).

Part of its problem and part of its power is its unusual structure. Charles Anderson has likened the structure to a circle and a web, both centered by the pond itself (Stern 11). It may also be read as poetry. Many read it as a practical how-to book, a collection of botanical and zoological observations, a collection of ruminations on great books and great thoughts. For all these somewhat contradictory identities, each justified, it has unity in that every chapter in its own way explores the question raised at the beginning, the question having to do with economy in the broadest sense: how to live so as to get the most (knowledge, inspiration, spiritual life, physical strength, truth) with the least expense of that which has little meaning (money, clothes, large house, meaningless work). Unlike A Week, which crammed so many mixed varieties of "plums" into only eight parcels (an introduction and seven chapters: Saturday–Friday), Walden's 18 topical chapters sprinkle its plums in a more patterned manner. As in A Week the underlying movement is chronological; the move into the cabin takes place on July 4; the book ends with the ice cracking in spring, making it appear that the two years of Thoreau's habitation took one year. But layered on the seasonal progression are well-developed essays, each of which can stand alone but each of which is enriched by its placement in the book as a whole.

Before the intricate arrangement begins, the reader meets Thoreau in the first two chapters, which contain widely quoted statements on "the mass of men" who "lead lives of quiet desperation" and in the profound paragraph that follows that passage. Thoreau also offers transcendentalism-inspired thoughts on "all enterprises that require new clothes," followed by a riff on the silliness of new clothes; the puzzling identities of the lost hound, boy horse, and turtledove; the ridiculousness of following "the head monkey at Paris" in wearing "a traveller's cap"; the praise of the Bhagavad Gita; the six-page rant on philanthropy; and the magnificent statement of why "I went to the woods." "Where I Lived" ends with a passage that is at least as deservedly famous as "I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately." Each paragraph pulls us into the next; thus, following a long paragraph that begins, "Let us spend one day as deliberately as Nature" (echoing the famous "I went to the woods" passage seven paragraphs back), is this one:

Time is but the stream I go a-fishing in. I drink at it; but while I drink I see the sandy bottom and detect how shallow it is. Its thin current slides away, but eternity remains. I would drink deeper; fish in the sky, whose bottom is pebbly with stars. . . . The intellect is a cleaver; it discerns and rifts its way into the secret of things. . . . I think that the richest vein is somewhere hereabouts; so by the divining rod and thin rising vapors I judge; and here I will begin to mine. (320)

The remarkable words pull the reader into what it is that the narrator will "begin to mine": The chapter called "Reading" follows.

As in A Week, the chapter “Reading” includes a dizzying array of recommended reading and instructions on how to read “deliberately.” In these passages, Thoreau castigates his neighbors for not being intellectually able to understand or be interested in the books on the list. Assuming that reading would best be conducted in silence, the next chapter is called “Sounds” and begins with a nod toward the reading of the previous chapter and moves forward to the beginning of the catalog of sounds: the sparrow’s “trill,” the “tantivy of wild pigeons,” “the bleating of calves and sheep,” the barking of dogs, the ringing of bells of the village, “the distant lowing of some cow in the horizon,” the whippoorwills as they “chanted their vespers for an hour”; the screech owls, whose noise Thoreau attempted to reproduce for three full pages; the cock crowing; and, most remarkably, in the middle of all these natural sounds, the railroad hoot, “sounding like the scream of a hawk sailing over some farmer’s yard, informing me that many restless city merchants are arriving within the circle of the town” (247). Commentaries have noted that this “machine in the garden” is a paradigm of 19th-century American literature, and a special focus of work by Dickinson, Hawthorne, Melville, and others. Each, as Thoreau, both regrets and celebrates the invasion of the train into the pastoral idyll. Thoreau’s famous passage provides an excuse for transcendental preaching against the growing mercantilism, but Thoreau also speaks with a kind of awe and admiration for the transformation of the people who would not otherwise go “to Boston,” much less arrive promptly. The tone is cheerful. To his other playful titles—The “Sojourner” (a pun on the French for “day”) or “Sainte a terre” (“Saunterer”)—Thoreau says he would like another, one presumably metaphoric of the moralist, as “a track-repairer somewhere in the orbit of the earth” (247).

Again, at the end of “Sounds,” Thoreau gives an entry for the next chapter, “Solitude.” After 22 full paragraphs on the “Sounds” he did have, he lists those he did not have: “neither the churn, nor the spinning wheel, nor even the singing of the kettle.” Another person, he says, “would have lost his senses or died of ennui before this.” He lists more absences at the end of the chapter: “no path to the front-yard gate . . . no gate—no front-yard, —and no path to the civilized world!” So it is that he begins his chapter answering the most common question put to him during his Walden years (was he lonely?): “I find it wholesome to be alone the greater part of the time. To be in company, even with the best, is soon wearisome and dissipating. I love to be alone. I never found the companion that was so companionable as solitude” (269). In reality Thoreau walked up to the village daily and looked for company, but his discussion of solitude is as much metaphysical as actual. He compares his solitude to that of stars in the Milky Way or to his house in the woods or to “leaves and vegetable mould.” He ends “Solitude” with a reference to the goddess Hebe, “the only thoroughly sound-conditioned, healthy, and robust young lady that ever walked the globe” (270). Because she carried spring, she was a welcome visitor, and the next chapter is, of course, “Visitors.”

One of Thoreau’s “Visitors” was Alek Therien, a French Canadian, unnamed in this passage but recognizable to biographers because he is so thoroughly described as a cheerful woodsman, well built and skillful and, although unschooled, wise in what mattered (274–275). There were others: “an inoffensive simple-minded pauper,” “one real runaway slave,” and “some guests” who, apparently, arrived begging and others who arrived out of curiosity (“men of almost every degree of wit called on me in the migrating season”). Biographers discuss Thoreau’s relationship with the woodsman and his rather elitist attitude toward the “mass of men,” though he ends the chapter on a positive note, welcoming “all honest pilgrims, who came out to the woods for freedom’s sake” (283). From “Visitors” Thoreau moves to something done alone, working in the “Bean Fields,” where he is proud to be the hoer (an anagram of hero). Many see in the detailed description of the preparing of the soil, the sowing, the protecting, the picking, the eating, and the selling of the beans a metaphor for the processes of the writer. Thoreau invites such a metaphor when he says of the beans “perchance, as some must work in fields if only for the sake of tropes and expression, to serve a parable-maker one day,” and, as he says at the very end of the chapter, “These beans have results which are not harvested by me” (295).

The next chapter, “The Village,” begins by nodding back to the previous three: “After hoeing, or perhaps reading and writing, in the forenoon, I usually bathed again in the pond . . . [and] strolled to the village to hear some of the gossip” (297). This chapter, then, provides the chance for Thoreau to tell his story about meeting the tax collector and famously refusing “to pay a tax to, or recognize the authority of, the state which buys and sells men, women, and children, like cattle at the door of its senate-house” (301). “The Ponds,” which follows the account of civic life and responsibility, finds the poet/naturalist joining others to fish at the pond, to take a boat; playing the flute and watching the perch; and making of the pond—as of almost everything in his world—a metaphor. Throughout the journals (from which the book arose) and most of Thoreau’s public work, the reader finds the exactness of scientific observations—as that which begins, “It is a clear and deep green well, half a mile long” set against flights of poetry. So it is that this chapter’s description of the length, breadth, width, color, temperature, contents, inhabitants, and use of the ponds; the weather around them; and the contact of people with them are details set against the notion of Walden Pond as the “distiller of celestial dews” (311). “The Ponds” chapter is followed by the short chapter “Baker Farm,” which is most interesting for its lengthy commentary on the Irishman John Field. As do those on Therien, these comments cause some to delve into questions of Thoreau’s attitudes—toward fellow citizens in general and toward immigrants such as the first-generation Irish American John Field in particular. A passage such as this causes much comment: “Poor John Field!—I trust he does not read this, unless he will improve by it. . . . With his horizon all his own, yet he [is] a poor man, born to be poor, with his inherited Irish poverty or poor life . . . and boggy ways, not to rise in this world” (337).

Having described a real person as all but stuck in a bog, Thoreau moves in the next chapter to “Higher Laws.” Influenced greatly by Eastern thought, this chapter explores exotic texts as related to diet (vegetarianism), sexual practices (chastity preferred), and other bodily functions as the “Hindoo lawgiver” prescribes. For this, one of the strangest chapters to most people—especially to students—Thoreau is indebted to his heterogeneous reading, especially to the Laws of Menu, which he had discovered in 1840 and had published in part in the Dial in 1843. By now the reader of Walden has caught on to the way Thoreau juxtaposes topic against topic as he moves through the book. “Higher Laws,” therefore, is followed by “Brute Neighbors.” These, of course, are animals—some dozen of them—but they are preceded by the visit of “a companion,” “Mr. Poet,” who has been identified as the transcendentalist Ellery Channing (Stern 351). One species of his “Brute Neighbors” allows Thoreau a parable: that of his famous ant fight. As most students who read Thoreau in anthologies know, the battle of red and black ants stands in for the stupidity of human wars: “I never learned which party was victorious, nor the cause of the war; but I felt for the rest of that day as if I had had my feelings excited and harrowed by witnessing the struggle, the ferocity and carnage, of a human battle before my door” (359). In this chapter, too, Thoreau offers a funny description of a laughing loon and the sociability of ducks in the pond.

Cold and warmth play against each other in the next chapter, “House Warming.” By this time it is fall merging into winter, time for Thoreau to talk about his chimney and about the palaver (talk) two or more people might have near its warmth. He also turns his pen to describing all the kinds of wood one might use, introducing this section with “Every man looks at his wood-pile with a kind of affection” (376). From the hearth Thoreau takes readers on a long walk to Lincoln in the chapter “Former Inhabitants.” In “Winter Visitors” he describes Brister Freeman, “a handy Negro,” once a slave; Hugh Quoil, an Irishman who claimed to have fought at Waterloo; a wood chopper; and other locals present and past. Finally “Winter Animals” and “The Pond in Winter” lead to “Spring.” Here Thoreau’s sometimes prolix style features shorter, more direct, more vigorous sentences. There is much that is beautiful and lyrical in the long chapter “Spring,” but the passage most quoted is in the “Conclusion,” with which the book ends. Thoreau answers his neighbor’s question: “I left the woods for as good a reason as I went there. Perhaps it seemed to me that I had several more lives left to live” (439).

The “Conclusion” chapter is so densely packed with wise words that it seems the author has tried to put every well-considered thought into words before it is too late. Although he says he does not think that “John or Jonathan will realize all this,” meaning that the Walden experiment was not for everyone, Thoreau is persuasive. Many a John, Jonathan, and Jean or Judy would want to follow his lead; in fact, there was a direct connection between this book and the experiments in simpler living that proliferated in the 1960s and 1970s. And who would not be affected by the passage of which this is the nub: “I learned this at least, by my experiment; that if one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours” (440). The years at Walden, crucial as they were, were “an experiment,” an experiment in economics among much else. “If one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams,” Thoreau says; he does not say that one will necessarily reach a goal, only that in going confidently toward the direction of that goal—to write a book that will change people’s lives, for example—that success will not necessarily be the one wanted, but it will be a success—one “unexpected in common hours,” those hours when one lives an ordinary life of quiet desperation.

Finally, in the “Conclusion” we meet the Artist of Kouroo. The story, influenced by Thoreau’s studies in Eastern literature, is reworked by Thoreau so that the buzz of implication is autobiographical. The artist worked through the ages to perfect a staff: “He had made a new system in making a staff; a world with full and fair proportions; in which though the old cities and dynasties had passed away, fairer or more glorious ones had taken their places” (443). The fable is a primer for a writer, at least for the writer/philosopher/ascetic/truth-seeking Thoreau: The material is “truth. This alone wears well”; “however mean your life is, meet it and live it; do not shun it and call it hard names”; “Cultivate poverty like a garden herb, like sage . . . turn the old; return to them”; and so forth. Richard Lebeaux tells us that the story that so many take away from the book, that of the Artist of Kouroo, working his heart out with skill and patience, was not present until version number four, but the story seems a perfect introduction to the seven years Thoreau spent to complete the book (Lebeaux 215–216). That book, like the staff, was a thing of beauty and a device for support on the journey of life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider the uses of the ideas in Walden (such as civil disobedience) in the 20th and 21st centuries. What would be lost, what gained in American civilization if many people (many “Johns and Jonathans”) followed the precepts Thoreau articulates?
2. Make a list of the puns and wordplay within the book (Thoreau particularly has fun with place-names, making up etymologies for them). What does such wordplay tell you about Thoreau’s view of language?
3. Many people have set portions of this book into lines of poetry. Select at least 14 lines from any chapter that you consider most poetic; how does isolating a section of the book like this—and the individual lines—make a difference in the impact of the passage?
4. Find passages in Emerson’s essays that you see repeated and/or lived out in Walden. How does Thoreau revise, develop, amplify, or simplify Emerson’s ideas?

“A Plea for Captain John Brown” (1859)

Slavery, federal actions such as the Fugitive Slave Law that countered attempts to free slaves, and the inattention of his neighbors to the outrage Thoreau felt climaxed when John Brown was arrested for murder and insurrection after his raid on the federal munitions depot at Harper’s Ferry on October 16, 1859. That Thoreau had met him and was one of those who had encouraged the support, financially and otherwise, of what turned out to be a failed and bloody event added to the strains of Thoreau’s last three years. He was under such great emotional pressure, that, as he says in “A Plea,” he “put a piece of paper and a pencil under [his] pillow and when [he] could not sleep, [he] wrote in the dark” (401). In the end, in the three separate works in which Thoreau honored Brown, he spoke of him as a true transcendentalist, one with the courage to act against the government for the greatest good.

In his 1857 journal Thoreau had written a clear journalistic description of his meeting with Brown: Brown’s appearance, dietary habits, speech patterns, and adventures. Two years later, in the May before the raid, John Brown returned to Concord, speaking at Town Hall. Thoreau and his fellow transcendentalists, especially F. B. Sanborn, were impressed. The raid, including murder performed with weapons purchased during such visits, took place just five months later. Thoreau called a meeting in Concord on October 30, ringing the bell himself to summon citizens in support of Brown’s actions when others would not. Two nights later he repeated it in Boston as a substitute for FREDERICK DOUGLASS, who had temporarily fled to Canada (Harding, Days 418), and then again in Worcester. Although Thoreau hoped to print his essay in support of John Brown in pamphlet form to support the Brown family, the essay was actually printed in James Redpath’s Echoes of Harper’s Ferry in 1860. Meanwhile, Thoreau would write two shorter works on John Brown, one delivered at a service in Concord on December 2, the day Brown was hanged; the other written for a memorial service in New York, on July 4, 1859. By that time

Thoreau was too ill to travel, so R. J. Hinton read that third essay for him; later, Garrison’s Liberator published it (Harding and Meyer 56–59). Joseph Wood Krutch calls the John Brown writings “primarily eulogies of a man, not discussion of a principle; they are arguments ad hominem so far as they are arguments at all” (Krutch 236).

Whatever else it was, “A Plea for Captain John Brown” was courageous. The Republican Party condemned John Brown’s deed; the Liberator labeled it “wild and insane”; other papers were filled with “sensational and distorted” accounts of the raid; and most of Brown’s former supporters now thought Brown “a little unhinged” (Nelson 134). For all that, Emerson reported that Thoreau defended Brown so effectively that the people who went to Concord’s town hall “found themselves listening with a surprising sympathy” (Harding and Meyer 56). Certainly Thoreau’s speech begins in that spirit as he recounts Brown’s deep roots in American history, especially in the American Revolution. Brown, said Thoreau, was disgusted by military life and “resolved that he would never have anything to do with any war, unless it were a war for liberty” (396). Such a “war” occurred, said Thoreau, when “Kansas was made free” (397). This was a reference to a previous violent action at Pottawatomie, but Thoreau does not dwell much on that, although Brown had sent his sons to do the killing. Instead he focuses on the good citizen Brown: almost “a Puritan” (398), “a man of Spartan habits” (399), “a man of rare common sense and directness of speech,” a surveyor, who could use the training to advantage by surveying enemy territory (399).

When he reaches Brown’s “last act, and its effects,” Thoreau does not castigate Brown for his foolhardy and fatal actions at Harpers Ferry—quite the opposite—but first, as he had so often, he scolds his community for their apathy. They are “craven hearted” (402). He writes of them with sarcasm and scorn: “So they proceed to live their sane, and wise, and altogether admirable lives, reading their Plutarch. . . . They nourish themselves for brave and patriotic deeds some time or other” (402–403).

Thoreau declares that in their churches they “excommunicate . . . Christ” (403), that they are “sluggish by constitution and by habit, and they cannot conceive of a man who is actuated by higher motives than they are” (404). Now he begins the panegyric. Brown did “a brave and humane deed” (405); he is “a man of faith, and of religious principle, and not a politician or an Indian” (406). Brown is unselfish: He “did not wait till he was personally interfered with . . . before he gave his life to the cause of the oppressed” (407). As Thoreau delivers punishment to neighbors and praise to Brown, he seems to echo Emerson’s images of greatness in, for example, “The American Scholar.” This passage sounds like “Man thinking”:

He was a superior man. He did not value his bodily life in comparison with ideal things. He did not recognize unjust human laws, but resisted them as he was bid. For once we are lifted out of the trivialness and dust of politics into the region of truth and manhood. No man in America has ever stood up so persistently and effectively for the dignity of human nature, knowing himself for a man, and the equal of any and all governments. In that sense he was the most American of us all. (407)

Turning to the trial, Thoreau makes the usual transcendentalist’s distinction between the sane and insane, mocking those, including those in Congress, who call Brown mad, but noting the testimony of the jailers and others that Brown “is cool, collected, and indomitable” (409). He will return to Brown, but first he turns the word Treason back at the government for keeping “a coffle of four millions of slaves” and failing “to protect the weak and dispense justice” (411). In contrast, he describes Brown and his six sons, and his son in law—not to enumerate the others, —enlisted for this fight; proceeding coolly, reverently, humanely to work, for months if not years, sleeping and waking upon it, summering and wintering the thought, without expecting any reward but a good conscience, while almost all America stood ranked on the other side. (412)

That would have been a good conclusion, but this is a plea, and Thoreau makes his case: Brown was not mad or crazy except in pursuit of a good that should be sought by all; his death would not make America safer; and the hanging would amount to a crucifixion that would only reverberate to the detriment of the judicial system and the American government. Fearing that it is too late to save the life of John Brown, Thoreau states, “I plead not for his life, but for his character—his immortal life” (416). He invokes the suffering of Christ, the heroism of the Pilgrims, the rights inherent in the Declaration of Independence and declares that when “slavery shall be no more here, we shall then be at liberty to weep for Captain Brown” (417).

History, of course, proved Thoreau right. Nancy Rosenblum tells us that “it was through [Brown’s] agency, far more than any other’s that Kansas was made free” (Rosenblum 138). And his name and martyrdom would become an anthem to inspire the necessary action in the war that was about to begin. Reverential in parts, angry in (most) parts, logical in parts, the essay does have some major gaps. For example, as Rosenblum notes, Thoreau does not privilege John Brown’s friendships with blacks, as did W. E. B. DuBois later (xxiii), but Thoreau does not purport to give us a biography of Brown; neither does he detail the actual crimes Brown’s band committed, another gap. Indeed only four pages in a 20-page essay are about John Brown. As in so many of Thoreau’s works, most of this essay is an excoriation of his fellow villagers and countrymen. Similarly to Walden, in which Thoreau scorns “the mass of men” who lead “lives of quiet desperation,” in this essay Thoreau depicts most of New England as arrayed against John Brown; they “have no test by which to detect a noble man, no amalgam to combine with his pure gold” (409).

How accurate is Thoreau’s depiction of the historical John Brown? Compare with other contemporary historical accounts.

“Martyrdom of John Brown” (1859)

Quoting from Andrew Marvell on heroes and martyrs and Sir Walter Raleigh’s “The Soul’s Errand,” with its refrain “Give potentates the lie,” Thoreau delivered this short (four-page) speech at the memorial service for Brown on the day of his execution. He ends by quoting from his own translation of Tacitus (Harding and Meyer 58). It begins, “You, Agricola, are fortunate, not only because your life was glorious, but because your death was timely” (420), and it ends, “Whatever of Agricola we have loved, whatever we have admired, remains, and will remain, in the minds of men, and the records of history, through the eternity of ages” (421). Although it is almost entirely derivative, drawing not only from the original poets, but also from his journal, in which he had already placed these and other selections of poetry and prose, it is quietly appropriate. This work, unlike the “Plea,” showed little anger, just reverence and, almost, acceptance. Brown’s daughters told Thoreau that he reminded them of their father. Spiritually Thoreau must have felt a powerful link with a person so willing to let his life be the counterfriction to stop the machine.

Compare this speech to Thoreau’s “Plea” for Captain John Brown. How does the different tone suit the occasion?

“The Last Day of John Brown” (1860)

Thoreau wrote out a third John Brown essay, which was delivered by R. J. Hinton in New York on the following Fourth of July (1860) when Brown was interred there. “For the first time Thoreau publicly abandoned his Transcendentalist belief that all men are innately good,” say Harding and Meyers, “with the remark, ‘I have known many a man who pretended to be a Christian, in whom it was ridiculous, for he had no genius for it’” (Harding and Meyerson 58). The tone of this short piece wavers between the wry anger of that passage and mourning over the loss of “the greatest and best” man he knew. Six months after the “meteor-like” life of John Brown ended, Thoreau reports on those who were—or should have been—changed by the words and life and death of Brown. By this time the manuscripts Brown wrote in prison had been circulated, and Thoreau devotes much of the essay to marveling at the “wisdom and manhood,” the “variety of themes he touched on,” the simple style, “as simple as the discharge of a bullet” of the writing (426). Again he quotes Marvell’s ode to Cromwell: “He nothing common did or mean / Upon that memorable scene,” and so forth (427), and again he castigates the citizens, editors, and mostly the Massachusetts legislators for perpetrating or failing to stop the execution, and for failing to recognize the martyr in their midst.

Shortly after Thoreau wrote the last of his Brown essays, the young WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS paid him a visit in Concord. In his autobiography Howells recounts an almost comically awkward visit, the most interesting feature of which was Thoreau’s musing on John Brown: “It was not the warm, palpable, loving, fearful old man of my conception, but a sort of John Brown type, a John Brown ideal, a John Brown principle, which we were somehow (with long pauses between the vague orphic phrases) to cherish, and to nourish upon ourselves” (Harding, Days 434).

The Maine Woods (1864)

At the end of his own life’s journey, Thoreau’s last words were moose and Indians. He had been working on putting together four articles on the trips he made to Maine and New Hampshire in 1846, 1853, and 1857 so that they might be published as a whole. It is easy to miss the reference in Walden to the first of the trips that became this book. It occurs at the end of the chapter “The Village,” just after Thoreau’s brief allusion to his arrest for his failure to pay his poll tax. In talking about the safety of the village, he mentions that “the next fall I spent a fortnight in the woods of Maine. And yet my house was more respected than if it had been surrounded by a file of soldiers” (Walden 301). The longer story is that, along with a cousin, George Thatcher, and two guides, he left on August 31, just a month after the July 23 night in jail. The trip was an exhausting one, even for such experts in difficult explorations; only Thoreau went on to the summit of Mount Katahdin alone. Two years later he spoke on the Lyceum circuit about the trip to the mountain. Praised by Bronson Alcott and others, he worked it into an article for Greeley’s Tribune. Greeley did not publish it, but he did pass it along to another publication, Sartain’s Union Magazine, where it was published in five installments. When Greeley finally ran part of it, he called The Maine Woods “as fine a piece of unrhymed poetry as we have ever read” (Harding 230).

That was his first trip. He went on a second trip seven years later, in September 1853, with his cousin George Thatcher and a Native American guide, Joe Aitteon. They went from Bangor on a boat to Penobscot, hiked to Moosehorn Deadwater, where they made camp and from which they went on an unsuccessful moose hunt. The next day they continued on the Penobscot to the base of Katahdin, and they saw two moose looking frightened. Thatcher shot, but the moose ran away, only to be discovered, later, dead. Thatcher skinned it and gave the hide to the Indians. Thoreau was disgusted with the treatment of the moose and did not take part in a later hunt. Before they returned to Bangor, the travelers spent a night in an Indian settlement. That trip, too, he turned into a lecture; in December of that year he delivered “Journey to Moose Head Lake.” He made yet a third trip in summer 1857 with Edward Hoar and another Indian, Joe Polis. This trip to the headwaters of the Allagash River and down the East Branch of the Penobscot was as ambitious and difficult as the first two. In June 1858 a serialization of the account of the trip in Maine was published in installments. Another Maine article appeared in Lowell’s new Atlantic Monthly in summer 1860. Thoreau was in the process of working the three articles into a draft of the 1864 Maine Woods; that draft had such heavy revisions that, when Thoreau died in 1862—saying those two words, showing how much the adventures and the manuscripts were on his mind—Thoreau’s sister Sophia and friend Ellery Channing had a challenge as they took up the job of publishing the book. Not surprisingly, the edition they produced and finally published with Ticknor and Fields 18 years after Thoreau began the work is imperfect. Difficulties the two editors encountered with Thoreau’s handwriting, their lack of knowledge of the terrain Thoreau described, and the difficulties of dual editorship caused problems that awaited Joseph J. Moldenhauer’s careful editing. His annotated text of 1972 has joined the shelf of approved (by the Modern Language Association) Thoreau texts. As with most posthumous publications of unfinished work, the text remains unreliable, but in reading the more than 30 detailed pages explaining problems and editorial decisions, the reader must assume the text to be as close as possible to the author’s intentions.

Chief interests in the collected essays of The Maine Woods are the viciousness of nature and the victimization and strength of Indians. Thoreau’s sympathy for American Indians, says Robert Richardson, was fostered by reading Jesuit Relations in 1852. Thoreau checked out from the Harvard Library several of the 32 volumes by Father Paul Le Jeune about French-Indian relations in Canada in 1633. According to Richardson, “The Relations are attractive, readable, indeed absorbing books. The Jesuit’s focus is almost exclusively on the Indians: their habits, customs, manners, language, clothing, behavior, beliefs, and history” (282). Between 1850 and 1852 there were other reasons to focus on those who suffered at the hands of white Europeans: When Uncle Tom’s Cabin was published in 1851–52, the Thoreau family had already personally focused on real-life Uncle Toms and Elizas; they had assisted Henry Williams, a fugitive slave from Virginia, in September 1851. Before that, Thoreau had closely followed the plight of another fugitive, Thomas Sims, who, in spite of the good efforts of abolitionists, was returned to his owners (Harding 314–316).

The Maine Woods is composed of three chapters or articles, one for each of the trips: “Ktaadn” (83 pages of dense text), “Chesuncook” (63 pages), and “The Allegash and East Branch” (142 pages). Each follows one of the three trips in straightforward chronological and, to some, wearisomely detailed, fashion. These are followed by seven appendixes: Trees, Flowers and Shrubs, List of Plants, List of Birds, Quadrupeds, Outfit for an Excursion, and “A List of Indian Words.”

As he does in A Week and Walden, Thoreau begins his account with a straightforward description of time and place. Within the first two paragraphs, Thoreau reveals his interest in the Indian language and names. There is much about conveyances—boats and coaches—but little about people until page 13, when Thoreau introduces us to “a man just adventuring upon [the road] . . . in a rude, original, what you may call Aroostook, wagon . . . with . . . a dog asleep to watch them. . . . Here, too, was a small trader. . . . I saw him standing in his shop-door.” There was a woman, too, but most of the book is a long landscape painting. When Thoreau introduces other people—Mr. McCuaslin, Thomas Fowler, John Morrison, and predominantly “Uncle George” Thatcher—it is in the context of directions discovered or the kinds of houses or boats the people owned. Thus, when the narrator/Thoreau interposes personal thoughts and reactions, the reader pays attention. For example, he injects a dream: “In the night I dreamed of trout-fishing; and, when at length I awoke it seemed a fable, that this painted fish swam there so near my couch, and rose to our hooks the last evening.” He assesses Native Americans (this is before he read the Jesuit account), finding them to have “a remarkable and unexpected resemblance between the degraded savage and the lowest classes in a great city.” Thoreau sees these characters as inhabiting “the edge of the wilderness . . . in a new world, far in the dark of a continent.” The “newness” of world is mentioned again toward the end of this first essay when the narrator becomes ruminative on behalf of his country in a paragraph beginning, “What a place to live, what a place to die and be buried in!” The newness leads back to the oldest past of the continent: “If Columbus was the first to discover the islands, Americus Vespucius, and Cabot, and the Puritans, and we their descendents, have discovered only the shores of America.” The closing words of “Ktaadn” point to the next two trips, the next two portions of Thoreau’s Maine Woods: He recounts the places he has been and says, “Sixty miles above [the Penobscot shore] the country is virtually unmapped and unexplored, and there still waves the virgin forest of the New World” (83).

A crisp when, where, and how open “Chesuncook,” Thoreau’s account of his 1853 trip: a warm September evening in 1853 by steamer from Boston to Bangor via Maine’s islands. He does not name his companion (Edward Hoar, we learn from Harding), but he gives much attention to his guide, Joe Aitteon, illiterate but the son of a governor and knowledgeable about Maine, moose, and men. Obviously fascinated with this character (he may remind a reader of Cooper’s creation, Natty Bumppo’s fictional sidekick Chingachgook), Thoreau imitates Joe’s imitating a moose in an attempt to attract one. The meeting of three moose—a cow and two calves—is the centerpiece of this the second section of the book. Thoreau mocks his cousin the hunter (“our Nimrod”), and dwells on the sight of the “true denizens of the forest”: “They made me think of great frightened rabbits, with their long ears and inquisitive half frightened looks” (110). When the travelers find the seven-foot moose dead, Thoreau sounds like other American heroes who are sickened by unnecessary violence (Huck looking at the feud from the tree, for example, or Natty setting off to the West to avoid civilization). He distances himself from “the afternoon’s tragedy”: “On more accounts than one,” he says, “I had had enough of moose-hunting” (118). Thoreau turns his attention to a human, Ansell Smith, who inhabits the largest clearing and runs a boat business. Describing the house in great detail (only eight years earlier he had been absorbed in his own design for a house in a clearing), he admires such a winter pioneer. As they progress deeper into Maine, the little party meets lumbermen and other Indians.

Thoreau finds his stay in the logging camp disgusting. All around the camp are lines holding moose meat and skins; however, the stay in the Indian camp proved more comfortable and interesting to Thoreau, who comments on his reading in the Franciscan missionary literature and in the stories of Puritan Eliot. Even before they reach the village, Thoreau comments on the pleasant conversation among Indians, though, of course, he cannot understand it. "These Abenakis gossiped, laughed, and jested in the language in which Eliot's Indian Bible is written. . . . These were the sounds that issued from the wigwams of this country before Columbus was born; they have not yet died away. . . . I felt that I stood, or rather lay, as near to the primitive man of America, that night, as any of its discoverers ever did" (136–137). Later he comments on the cleanliness of the village ("far cleaner than such Irish villages I have ever seen"), on evidence of Christianity, and on the skin color and social customs of the Indians (146–147).

Almost as he had at the end of Walden, Thoreau ends "Chesuncook" by explaining his reason for going deep beyond the shores: "These [flowers and trees] remind us, that, not only for strength, but for beauty, the poet must, from time to time, travel the logger's path and the Indian's trail, to drink at some new and more bracing foundation of the muses, far in the recesses of the wilderness" (156). Following his own invitation, he begins the third account briskly and quickly moves to an introduction to the Indian guide for this 1857 trip, Joseph Polis. Joe Polis, who lived in a white house "as good as an average one on a New England village street," was "one of the aristocracy." Thoreau's empathy with the Native American moves him to describe Polis's reaction when a white Maine man addressed him in "a foolish and impertinent style . . . as if he were a child" (162).

So sympathetic with the Indians has Thoreau become that he asks for language lessons and spends a number of pages repeating those lessons. One night he listens to Joe sing hymns with "a beautiful simplicity" (178–179). They have a conversation about being Christian; the Indian inspires Thoreau to admit that he is Christian and draws from Thoreau (who usually did not do so) the promise to go to church on Sunday. They talk about travel (Joe expressed an interest in New York and Boston), education, medicine, the horrible mosquitoes, and the Canadian who has built a home and a life in the woods. Mostly, however, as they portage and paddle and camp, they talk: about specific trees, flowers, ferns, fish, and birds. Along the way Joe Polis becomes ill, recovers, introduces Thoreau and his companion to other Indians, and invites the white men to stay in his home, where Hoar used a razor "in very good condition" and where they beheld but did not meet Mrs. Polis in her hat and her silver brooch (and one presumes much more). How would Thoreau have finished off this collection had he lived to do so? Certainly the man who ended the first two portions of The Maine Woods in such an elevated and poetic manner would not have left unelaborated these two final sentences: "This was the last I saw of Joe Polis. We took the last train and reached Bangor that night" (279).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Literary critics differ in their interpretation of Thoreau's representation of Indians. Isolate specific passages about Indians and explain why you think his treatment is either positive or negative.
2. Much of Thoreau's presentation of the Maine woods centers on the hardships imposed on humans by the landscape and climate. Explain how Thoreau uses encounters with hardship as a prelude to personal triumph. Consider especially the ascent of Mount Katahdin, but do not limit yourself to that part of the book.

Cape Cod (1864)

The redoubtable Thoreau expert and admirer Walter Harding calls Cape Cod Thoreau's "sunniest and least profound" book (Harding and Meyer 66). As The Maine Woods was, it was edited by Sophia Thoreau and Ellery Channing from portions that had been published in Putnam's Monthly Magazine and the Atlantic Monthly and from lectures Thoreau had delivered on the Lyceum circuit. Although it shares some of the problems of The Maine Woods, it is nevertheless a good book to have at the beach, especially if the beach is on the Cape. As Joe Polis starred in the final portion of The Maine Woods, this one features a character known only as the Wellfleet oysterman. Called “the book on Cape Cod,” the book had its classic status confirmed when the 20th-century poet Robert Lowell quoted much of it in his “Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket” (Harding and Meyer 68–69).

The sunniness of Cape Cod has a counterpoint: that of the human tragedy wrought by shipwrecks along its coast, such as that of the St. John, with which Thoreau begins his book. Thoreau and his companion, Ellery Channing, arrived at Cohasset just as the 28 bodies from the steamer that had crashed in a storm were being loaded into hay wagons. As was Thoreau’s wont, the sight of the mangled dead, their clothing scattered on the rocks, and the townspeople watching sent him on a four-page discourse on death. Of the mostly Irish who died, he said, “Why care for these dead bodies? They really have no friends but the worms or fishes. Their owners were coming to the New World, as Columbus and the Pilgrims did,” but “they emigrated to a newer world than ever Columbus dreamed of” (14). Later he will talk of the placid ocean, place of commerce and beauty, turning into “sudden fury,” breaking, distending, lashing at ships and people (144). Other hard realities include the heavy hardware discovered inside poor large fish who mistook knives, jewels, and newspapers for food.

Such somber scenes contrast with lighter moods as Thoreau and Channing move up the Cape. For example, he repeats gossip—the town had a post-mistress—leading Thoreau to tease, “We suspected that the letters must be subjected to a very close scrutiny there” (28). Later Thoreau makes another misogynistic comment on “a Nauset woman, of a hardness and coarseness such as no man ever possesses or suggests.” Before another human takes the stage, Thoreau unloads much history, especially about the early Pilgrims and their religious leaders, and he observes strange seaside creatures, “sea jellies.” The Wellfleet oysterman is worth the wait. The funny meeting is conveyed mainly in dialogue. Channing called him “the wizard.” Thoreau called him “the merriest old man that we had ever seen, and one of the best preserved” (104–105). No one matches the oysterman, who tells a great story about seeing George Washington, but other people wander into Thoreau’s path: a family of giants picking blackberries; a schooner owner he calls Uncle Bill, who was sleeping in the mud until flood tide; the lighthouse keeper worried about erosion.

This book is not so replete with literary references as others, but Thoreau invokes Homer as he looks at the sea. At least twice, he uses—in Greek—a line from The Odyssey: the wine dark sea and the sunset as the shining torch of the sun falling into the ocean (173). He quotes Ovid, and, most entertainingly, he quotes an Icelandic story about Furdstrandas (a mirrorlike mirage), a story into which he manages to weave (facetiously) the derivation of his own name—as from the god Thor. The last of the 10 chapters, “Provincetown,” is almost entirely devoted to the history of the Cape—and, for that matter, all of Massachusetts and parts of Nova Scotia, but he comes around at the end to contemporary people. “So we took leave of Cape Cod and its inhabitants,” he writes. “We liked the manners of the last. . . . They were particularly downright and good-humored. The old people appeared remarkably well preserved, as if by the saltiness of the atmosphere. . . . They are said to be more purely the descendents of the Pilgrims than the inhabitants of any part of the State” (Cape Cod 301).

For almost 20 pages he affectionately introduces us to more of those inhabitants and then returns to the geography of America, a metaphor for the life that was so soon to end for him: “Here is the spring of springs, the waterfall of waterfalls . . . a lighthouse or a fisherman’s hut the true hotel. A man may stand there and put all America behind him” (319). That sounds like a pretty accurate description of Thoreau’s life at Walden Pond, linking each of the books of this prolific writer.

MARK TWAIN

(SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS)

(1835–1910)

We write frankly and fearlessly but then we “modify” before we print.

(Life on the Mississippi)

Born Samuel Langhorne Clemens, but best known as Mark Twain, this American literary icon was frank and fearless in both his personal life and his professional career. As a man driven by success in all his undertakings, Clemens was as invested in his personal financial success as he was in his professional achievements as an author. His public career as a popular author of humor and satire and as a widely admired lecturer on American life financed his personal quest for the fortune required to support his immediate and extended family. Beneath the gruff exterior of the persona he presented to the world lay a very complex and man who translated his frank and fearless experiences into fiction that would shape the American literary scene.

On November 30, 1835, John and Jane Clemens welcomed their sixth and second-to-last child into the world of Florida, Missouri. Two months premature and weighing a mere five pounds, the infant had a prognosis so bleak that Jane Clemens refused to name him. When John Clemens did name his struggling infant son, he named him after his own father, Samuel, and after a relative, Langhorne, neither of whom John regarded fondly (Hoffman 2).

The coincidence, however, of Clemens’s entrance into the world with Halley’s comet offered hope. According to Albert Bigelow Paine’s “Personal Memoranda” chapter from Mark Twain: A Biography, Clemens claimed in 1909 that I came in with Halley’s comet in 1835. It is coming again next year, and I expect to go out with it. It will be the greatest disappointment of my life if I don’t go out with Halley’s comet. The Almighty has said, no doubt: “Now here are these two unaccountable freaks; they came in together, they must go out together.” Oh! I am looking forward to that.

But according to historical biographers like Andrew Hoffman, the superstitious power associated with the comet instilled hope in Jane Clemens. Her family, with whom she was very close, saw the comet as a lucky omen and encouraged the Clemens to love and nurture their frail infant (1–2).

Four years later, the family relocated to Hannibal, Missouri, a place made famous in and by the writings of Mark Twain. A small frontier town on the Mississippi River, Hannibal offered the Clemens family multiple opportunities. While in Hannibal, John Clemens did his best to support his family by working in town as a general store owner, lawyer, and justice of the peace, while also working outside Hannibal as part of a circuit court jury. His position in town and his run for appointment as the circuit court clerk made the Clemens relatively well known in and around Hannibal, despite John Clemens’s inability to break his cycle of growing debt and financial obligation.

With the death of his father in 1847 and the completion of five years of formal schooling, Clemens began his professional career. Apprenticed to a Hannibal print shop, Clemens learned to typeset and prepare the presses for the daily newspaper. His early career not only taught him the printing trade, but also launched his informal education as a student of the world and the people who inhabited it. Before beginning his career as a steamboat pilot, Clemens tried his hand at publishing his own articles while working in print shops in New York and Philadelphia. In need of a steady and larger income, Clemens returned south in 1857 to learn how to finesse the finicky Mississippi.

Conveyed to the public through his own travel narrative of his experiences, Life on the Mississippi (1883), his career as a steamboat pilot is best captured in his own prose. The close connection between his life as a steamboat pilot and his identity as an author cannot be denied, as his pen name stems directly from the years he spent on the Mississippi: Mark Twain signifies the safe depth of two fathoms, the depth needed for steamboats to navigate the Mississippi safely. His career on the Mississippi ended as a result of circumstances beyond his control. With the outbreak of the American Civil War in 1861, steamboat traffic on the Mississippi was at a near-halt. Although Clemens joined the Confederacy in their fight against the Yankees, his involvement in the war was short-lived. In the two weeks of his training and maneuvering with the Marion Rangers, Clemens saw enough of war to decide it was not for him. Instead of fighting, Clemens took Huck's advice and "lit out for territory," following his older brother, Orion, to the Nevada Territory in the hope of striking it rich in the silver mines.

Although Clemens's aspirations for quick riches were not fulfilled, Orion's position as the secretary of the Nevada Territory provided him a wealth of connections. Such connections helped Clemens find work for the Virginia City newspaper as a columnist and worked to his advantage when he moved even farther west to San Francisco in 1864. Shortly after his arrival in San Francisco, Clemens finally achieved notable success and fame. In 1865, with the publication of "Jim Smiley and His Jumping Frog," Mark Twain's sharp wit spread across the nation as other newspapers picked up the tall tale in their columns.

His fame growing, Clemens, now known by his pen name, was sent to report on the wide world. First, the Sacramento Union sent him to the Sandwich Islands (Hawaii) in 1865. With his hallmark wit, Twain's articles revealed the civilized heathens and heathenish colonials in the clash between American interest and island culture. His observations on life and living were so invigorating that he expanded them into lectures and began his first of many well-received lecture tours. Two years later Clemens was sent over another sea, this time to observe a grand tour of Europe and the Middle East. Once again, his articles were very witty, and the fame of Twain as a humorist continued to grow. More importantly, the content of these articles would be reworked into the first novel, The Innocents Abroad (1869), attributed to Mark Twain.

One of the many myths surrounding Clemens concerns the personal significance of this journey. According to Clemens, he met his future brother-in-law, Charles Langdon, while on this trip and fell in love with Langdon's sister. Standing at the rails of an ocean liner somewhere in the Mediterranean Sea, Langdon showed Clemens a miniature portrait of his sister, Olivia. With that one glance, Clemens claimed to have fallen in love with his future bride. When the group returned to the States in 1868, Langdon introduced Clemens to his family and his sister. Two years later, Sam Clemens married Livy Langdon on February 2.

In an effort to meet the financial obligations of providing for a wife and future family, Clemens took a position as editor of the Buffalo Post. Living in Buffalo, in the three-story brick house that was the Langdons' wedding present, Livy remained close to her family and friends in Elmira, enjoying financial support from her family despite Clemens's steady income. Within the year, the Clemens's first child, Langdon, was born. Prospects for this young couple seemed bright.

Clemens's hope to earn a living from his own writing and not merely the editing of others' works prompted the family's move to Hartford, Connecticut, nearer to his publisher. The Clemenses first rented a home in the heart of Hartford's literary and artistic quarter, the bohemian Nook Farm. His literary works from this period continued to be primarily travel narratives and social commentary. Roughing It (1872), a collection of travel tales from Clemens's adventures in the American West, and The Gilded Age (1873), a collaborative effort with Charles Dudley Warner, have the hallmark sign of Twain's wit and humor, but neither can compare with the works Clemens would write in his next home, the Clemens's large house on Farmington Avenue in Hartford, which they moved into in 1874.

For the next 17 years, Clemens would write in his study in the billiard room of this house. His most famous characters, including Huck Finn, Tom Sawyer, and Becky Thatcher, all came to life on the pages he wrote in this third-floor sanctuary. The tragedy of losing his son to diphtheria in 1872 was difficult to face, but the birth of their second child, a daughter named Susy, in the same year; Clara, two years later; and Jean in 1880 kept the Clemens household full of laughter and activity.

The successful publications of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876), The Prince and the Pauper (1881), Life on the Mississippi (1883), Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), and A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court (1889), among other works, provided the Clemenses with great wealth. Unfortunately great wealth does not always equal financial security. A series of ill-thought and ill-advised investments drained Clemens's resources. Although his own publishing company, Charles L. Webster and Company, had success with the publication of Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884) and The Personal Memoirs of Ulysses S. Grant (1885), the success was not long-lived. The ultimate financial fiasco of the publishing company is representative of most of Clemens's ventures in business and investment. Either the technology, like that of the typesetter Clemens financed for use in the publishing house, was unnecessary or outdated, or the business was plagued with delays, broken promises, and untrustworthy employees. By 1891 Clemens was financially extended to his limit, and he and the family moved to Europe to economize.

Although Sam Clemens and his family were doing their best to meet the financial challenges posed by the publishing company and indebtedness incurred through Clemens's other business ventures, the publishing company finally claimed bankruptcy in 1894, leaving Clemens, its primary investor, bankrupt as well. The failed business ventures and complicated legalities of Clemens's connection as wronged investor drained Clemens of any will to write, or at least any will to write the positive social criticism of his early career. To recoup his losses, Clemens revived his alter ego and launched a lecture tour of Europe's most prominent cities as Mark Twain. Despite his ability to recover from his financial troubles, tragedy struck again in 1896. Susy Clemens, staying at the Hartford home on Farmington Avenue, unexpectedly fell ill and succumbed to meningitis. The Clemenses could not reach home in time either to tend to her or to attend the funeral. The tragedy hurt the family deeply, so deeply that when the Clemenses did return to the United States, they never went back to the Farmington Avenue house.

In his remaining years, Clemens would never personally recover from these losses. While he still had to face the death of his wife in 1903 and that of his youngest daughter in 1910, just months before his own death, the death of Susy and his struggles with bankruptcy left a bitter mark on Twain's sense of humor. His later works, which continue to focus on travel narratives, such as Following the Equator (1897), and social criticism, such as The Mysterious Stranger (published posthumously in 1916), are marked by a dark cynicism. Angry at his situation, Clemens used his pen to depict not the injustices he suffered, but the injustices he saw inflicted on others.

His satiric revelations of the abuses of power in American and western European dealings with colonial holdings, as well as his caustic revelations of social injustices endured by the citizens of these so-called civilized nations, did turn some readers and publishers away. However, even in his later years he maintained a loyal following. His 70th birthday party, held at Delmonico's on December 5, 1905, was well attended by powerful men and authors who had made their fortunes alongside Clemens, as well as future authors, such as Willa Cather, who would use what they learned from Mark Twain's writings to create 20th-century modernism. During these final years, he was able to reestablish himself and build another home, aptly named Stormfield, in Redding, Connecticut. On April 21, 1910, in the presence of his faithful friend and assistant Albert Bigelow Paine, and his only surviving daughter, Clara, Samuel Langhorne Clemens passed away while Halley's comet blazed across the night sky.

“The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County” (1865)

Twain's earliest national success as an author, “The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County,” marked the beginning of Twain's career as a humorist and satirist with its publication in 1865. Examining the humor of the tale is an easy way into the intricacies of the short story's two plots. Twain uses his letter to Mr. Ward as a frame narrative that sets up the humor of the tale. The exchange between Twain and Simon Wheeler is the joke of the story.

The letter to Mr. A. Ward explains the reason for Twain's visit to Simon Wheeler. On a journey west, Twain has been asked to visit Wheeler to find out information regarding Ward's friend Leonidas W. Smiley. The joke of the frame narrative is on Twain, who fell for Ward's request and realized, all too late, that “Leonidas W. Smiley is a myth . . . that you only conjectured that if I asked old Wheeler about him it would remind him of his infamous Jim Smiley.” The letter is essential as it creates a plausible explanation for Twain's seeking and listening to the rambling stories of Simon Wheeler.

Twain sets up Wheeler's tale of Jim Smiley and his jumping frog as well. In two paragraphs he reveals quite a bit about Simon Wheeler. His monotonous narrative voice and deadpan delivery must be remembered to get the full effect of Twain's humor. Twain's recounting of Simon Wheeler's tale is rather straightforward, if outlandish.

The tall tale Simon Wheeler tells of Jim Smiley's celebrated jumping frog first establishes Jim Smiley's penchant for betting before revealing the humorous encounter with a stranger, quail shot, and a frog. Smiley's success with betting has been established through his ventures with his mare. The inclusion of the sad tale of Andrew Jackson, the bull pup, establishes the potential weakness in Jim Smiley's penchant for betting and bragging. The same weakness has landed him and his bullfrog, Dan'l Webster, in a most uncomfortable situation.

The antics that the stranger, Jim, and the frogs go through make for engaging slapstick humor. Imagining Jim, who “slopped around in the mud for a long time” to find the stranger a frog for the bet, and the stranger, who “prized his [Daniel Webster's] mouth open and took a teaspoon and filled him full of quail shot filled him pretty near up to his chin and set him on the floor” to slant the contest in his favor, adds to the physical and overt humor of the tall tale. Briefly outlining the scenes forces the reader to imagine the details of these extraordinary circumstances and involves the reader in the narrative. We are not merely listening to Twain retell Simon Wheeler's tale; we are actively engaged in the development of the plot. Unlike Twain's introduction to Wheeler's tale, which is full of narrative detail, Wheeler's narrative lacks the details that paint the picture, leaving the narrative gaps to us, the readers, to fill in with our own imaginations.

For Discussion or Writing

1. The short story has two narrators: Twain and Simon Wheeler. Why does Twain include the initial frame narrative? What role does it serve in the development of Wheeler's tall tale?

2. The animals included in the short story have historically significant names. Who were the real Andrew Jackson and Daniel Webster? How does such a connection add color and character to these animals?
3. "The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" has appeared as "The Notorious Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" and "Jim Smiley and His Jumping Frog." How does each of these titles emphasize a different focus of the narrative?

Roughing It* (1872)

An account of Clemens's travels in the American West, Roughing It blends fact and fiction to create Twain's entertaining account of life on the American frontier. Despite his claim that the work "is merely a personal narrative, and not a pretentious history or philosophical dissertation," the work has contributed to the myth of the American West and has been increasingly used as a resource in recreating life on the frontier. The "good deal of information" included in the narrative lends credence to his tall tales and fantastic descriptions of the American frontier, as well as material for his satiric wit.

The narrative can be divided into two separate works. The first half of the work outlines Twain's quest westward for instant success and riches and his ultimate failure at the hands of big business. Chapter 42 introduces the second half by asking the "momentous question": "What to do next?" The second half of the narrative then outlines new experiences as Twain comes into his own as a writer who discovers that his native abilities combined with hard work can open new doors for him, including a trip to the Sandwich Islands. It is not until the final page that Twain is able to join this doubled narrative solidly. His final moral emphasizes the distinction between the two halves of his narrative: "If you are of any account, stay at home and make your way by faithful diligence; but if you are 'no account,' go away from home, and then you will have to work, whether you want to or not." The first half of Roughing It recounts the "no account" whose quest for quick riches and easy schemes draws him to the West. The second half of the narrative recounts the importance of "faithful diligence." Although Twain does not stay at home or quickly return to it when his schemes fail, his continued attempts to better himself and make his fortune through the hard work of writing draw the greater reward. Balancing the "no account" dream of quick riches and the work ethic of a skillful writer would continue to be a struggle for Twain/Clemens throughout his life.

Of particular note in this early travel account is Twain's ability to merge biographical facts with storytelling. Sam Clemens did journey west to make his riches in the silver mines of Nevada and did travel to the Sandwich Islands as a reporter. Many of the events recorded in Roughing It actually happened to him or people he met. Twain's embellishments add satire and humor to the situations chronicled in his narrative. Figuring out what is fact and what is fiction is the challenge of reading any Twain narrative.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Critics have claimed that Twain's narrative has helped to create the myth of the American West. What is that myth, and how does Twain's narrative contribute to it?
2. Twain includes many references to people, places, and concepts important to the American West. Choose one reference and research its historical and cultural significance.

The Adventures of Tom Sawyer* (1876)

One of Twain's best-known and best-loved works, The Adventures of Tom Sawyer captures the idyllic world of childhood imagination and adventure. Although Tom and his band of friends live in the relatively calm world of the small, close-knit river community of St. Petersburg, Tom's schemes transport the boys beyond the town, the classroom, and the prim expectations of Aunt Polly. His rascality prompts him to take chances and push the limits of fantasy with his imaginative plots as he, Becky Thatcher, and Huck Finn find themselves in a series of misadventures and encounters with the fearsome Injun Joe.

Although the narrative reads relatively easily, Twain had trouble writing his first novel-length fiction. Charles Norton's study of the book, Writing Tom Sawyer, outlines the struggles Twain endured during the writing process. Not only was his writing interrupted by projects in his more familiar and comfortable vein—Roughing It, a travel narrative published in 1872, and a witty social commentary, The Gilded Age (1873), cowritten with Charles Dudley Warner—but finding the right words to portray the rambunctious Tom Sawyer and his cohorts eluded Twain for at least half a decade (2). Perseverance paid off. With the appearance of the illustrated American edition of Tom Sawyer on December 8, 1876, Mark Twain reached newfound heights of fame. His tongue-in-cheek nonfiction may have drawn a growing number of readers, but his seemingly simple fictional tale of Tom Sawyer represented his most dramatic popular success and guaranteed Twain's arrival as a major figure in American letters.

Although it is impossible to tell whether or not Twain anticipated the lasting impression this impish boy would make when he first put pen to paper, the impact of this novel, and its more popular brother, Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, is immeasurable. Norton's catalog of the novel's power only begins to outline the reach of Tom Sawyer's charismatic grin and simple tale:

[Tom Sawyer] would remain in print and continue to sell throughout [Twain's] lifetime, . . . when the Bicentennial Celebrations would occur a hundred years hence, it would be ranked by many as his second best book, ranked by some critics as his "best constructed" novel, and . . . Tom Sawyer would become one of the most widely recognized characters in American literature. (37)

Essentially, then, Tom Sawyer marks not only a turning point in Twain's career, but a turning point in American letters.

So what is so special about a narrative written from a young boy's perspective? How does a novel that combines children's risky adventures with over-the-top exaggeration and a small dose of reality become canonical? What is it about Twain's use of a simple dialect that endears the words of the novel's cast of characters to generations of readers?

An obvious answer is the simple readability of Twain's plot. The basic premises of the tale have been retold to many readers. Girls and boys have always created adventurous tales about "monsters" like Injun Joe to scare each other around campfires in woods. Men, like the childish Tom, have always bragged about their ability, cunning, and nobility. Women, like Becky and Aunt Polly, have always focused on purity of self and the domestic needs of hearth and home in order to glorify their own efforts despite their limited social status. While such a division of interests by age and gender is "politically incorrect" in today's world, Twain's ability to target all of these audiences at once ensured his novel's popularity during his time and has continued to speak to readers across time. Although modern readers may not share the same social values as the characters of Twain's St. Petersburg, the inclusion of adult and child, female and male voices encourages readers to find parallel characters in their own life experiences.

And despite his exuberant cheekiness, or perhaps partly because of it, Tom Sawyer is the all-American boy. His ingenuity, first revealed in the now-famous fence-painting scene that opens the novel, emphasizes his shrewd intelligence, an intelligence that saves him from work and makes him money. His sense of adventure, epitomized in his spinning of stories to keep Huck pirating, embraces the American quest to conquer the unknown and win the respect and admiration of others. His self-sacrifice to save Becky Thatcher from punishment is rewarded not only by the adoration of the young girl his action saves, but also in the realization that some things really are more important than pride and pure profit. In essence, Tom becomes an American hero not because he disobeys and disregards the rules of society, but because he learns when to challenge and when to accept social expectations. At his core, Tom is a good boy with good morals who recognizes that some rules—like those against hurting others or stealing from others—are cardinal rules that should never be broken even if accepting those rules precludes a new adventure.

His sidekick, Huck Finn, is similarly developed. Huck may have had a rougher life than Tom, but they share similar characteristics. Like Tom, Huck is ingenious in tracking the robbers who stole from the Widow Douglas, but his ingenuity does not necessarily save him work and make him money. Although it is Tom's imagination that pulls Huck into the adventures, Huck is more than willing to participate in most of Tom's schemes. Twain goes to great lengths to differentiate Huck from Tom in the last chapters in order to explain why Tom wins the heart of Becky while Huck never can. The great difference that divides these two friends is their understanding of civilized society. Tom recognizes that as the two boys mature into adulthood, they will have to give up part of their dreams to be pirates and robbers and instead become respectable citizens. For Huck, making that transition to respectability is much more difficult.

Despite the Widow Douglas's efforts and apparent care for Huck's well-being, he, unlike Tom, turns his back on all that she and St. Petersburg can offer. The list of the horrors the Widow Douglas forces Huck to endure seems rather ludicrous:

Huck Finn's wealth and the fact that he was now under the Widow Douglas' protection introduced him into society—no, dragged him into it, hurled him into it—and his sufferings were almost more than he could bear. The widow's servants kept him clean and neat, combed and brushed, and they bedded him nightly in unsympathetic sheets that had not one little spot or stain which he could press to his heart and know for a friend. He had to eat with a knife and fork; he had to use napkin, cup, and plate; he had to learn his book, he had to go to church; he had to talk so properly that speech was become insipid in his mouth; whithersoever he turned, the bars and shackles of civilization shut him in and bound him hand and foot.

For Huck these social expectations are too much to bear. Not only has Twain set up his next great novel, Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, with such a closing chapter to Tom Sawyer, but he has also established the significant difference between the his two young heroes. It is up to the reader to decide whether Tom's acceptance of his future in society or Huck's continued rebellion against society is the more honorable path.

Of course, any interpretation of the final scene between Huck and Tom must consider the hierarchy of rebellion. Tom's reasoning may seem purely manipulative, as his reasoning is often meant to make others act in a desired way. However, a sense of propriety distinguishes Tom's band of robbers, with their stash of weapons, from his pirates and their search for treasure along the Mississippi River. Such a self-imposed hierarchy reflects Tom's changing understanding of fundamental differences between the socially isolated, island-hopping pirates and the socially connected, community-based brethren of the caves.

Tom's experiences have changed him. Realizing the pain he has caused his family when they think he has died, Tom feels remorse that has visible repercussions on his subsequent actions. His guilt after allowing Muff Potter to be accused for the murder of Dr. Robinson when Tom had actually witnessed Injun Joe's killing him festers until he is induced to come clean. His bravery at facing Injun Joe, not only in the courtroom but also in McDougal's Cave, shows a true strength and integrity in his character.

Subtly included in the narrative are themes and motifs that enrich the dialog—and the plot—of the novel. Superstitions abound as both Tom and Huck base their actions on fantastic rules that govern their life and spur the plot's development. If they had not been in the graveyard in search of a wart cure, they would not have witnessed the central crime of the novel. If they had not witnessed the crime, then they would not have become blood brothers sworn to hold each other's secrets. The theme of romantic criminality similarly recurs. Tom's pirates and his band of robbers play with the romantic ideal of crime without committing any real crimes against others, while the true criminal of the novel, Injun Joe, represents the reality of crime and its actual impact on the community.

Such an overview is merely an introduction to this American classic. The real value of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer is what each generation of readers can add to the novel with their reading. The adventures of Tom, Huck, and Becky are not adventures of the past; nor are they merely the adventures Twain captured in his novel. Instead, they are adventure we each travel every time we read their narrative of St. Petersburg.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the development of Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn in their novels, The Adventures of Tom Sawyer and Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Pay particular attention to the way each novel ends.
2. Tom Sawyer has two alliances, one with Huck Finn and another with Becky Thatcher. How does each alliance draw out different strengths and weaknesses in Tom's character? How does Twain use setting to help develop his characters and track their growth during the course of the novel?
3. Despite the novel's relatively happy ending, Twain includes portrayals of society's less than positive elements. Drunkenness, stealing, lying, among other negative characteristics, are all portrayed openly. How do such elements shape the development of the narrative? Do they make Twain's novel more or less realistic?
4. Although the novel focuses on a child's perspective of the world, the adults of St. Petersburg are still a pervasive presence in the novel. Judge Thatcher, Aunt Polly, the Widow Douglas, and even Injun Joe are all integral to its development. Choose one of the adult characters and trace his or her impact on Tom, Huck, or Becky's development.
5. Twain's novels often included specially selected illustrations. For the American edition of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, Twain used illustrations by True W. Williams. Compare and contrast Williams's illustrations to Twain's prose. Does Williams capture the essential elements of Tom Sawyer's adventure? What would a reader miss if he or she only saw the illustrations and did not read the prose?
6. Louis B. Salomon's introduction to the Great Illustrated Classics edition of Tom Sawyer claims that "the reader of this novel will find himself transported to the almost amoral world of the child, where the only questions the protagonists have to answer for themselves are What and How, the Why is left to the unfathomable discretion of grown-ups who have somehow lost the secret of having a good time anyhow." Is such a claim an accurate overview of the novel? Refer to specific scenes to support your position.
7. Critics have argued whether Tom Sawyer is a child's story, an adolescent novel of growing maturity, or a tale meant for adults. How can each group of critics be right? What evidence is provided in Twain's prose to support all three readings simultaneously? Which do you think is right? Why?
8. Twain intended to recreate the novel as a play. Choose an important scene from the novel and develop it into a theatrical scene, including stage directions and dialogue, to highlight its role in the development of the novel's central theme.

The Prince and the Pauper* (1881)

Published in 1881 and set in 16th-century England, The Prince and the Pauper was Twain's earliest attempt at an extended work of historical fiction. Although the novel maintains Twain's focus on children, as both the primary characters and readers of his fiction, his social commentary is still evident. As do King Arthur's travels with Hank in A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court and the twins of Puddn'head Wilson, The Prince and the Pauper develops a central theme in Twain's work: the injustice of socially and economically constructed differences.

As the pauper, Tom Canty has expectations that are not high. In fact, Twain pointedly introduces Tom as unwanted by his family in the opening paragraph of the narrative and describes his life as quite bleak. Despite his bleak surroundings, however, Tom has found an escape: "As he lay in the dark on his scant and offensive straw, tired, hungry, and smarting from a thrashing, he unleashed his imagination and soon forgot his aches and pains in delicious picturings to himself of the charmed life of a petted prince in a regal palace." Realizing that life has more to offer than a bed of straw in a small hovel of a home, Tom's imagination foreshadows the main focus of the novel. The opportunity to become the prince in a regal palace and understand the benefits and shortcomings of such a life will truly change Tom's understanding of the world around him.

Prince Edward is born into a life of prestige. His birth is a joyous occasion not only for his family but for all of England. Despite his knowledge of Latin and courtly virtues, his first meeting with Tom reveals his ignorance of the real lives of his future subjects. Not only does he offer Tom the most useless advice for his station in life, he misunderstands its joys—swimming in canals, dancing around the maypole, wallowing in mud—so completely that he too makes a significant claim to further the plot. For all the joys and freedoms of Tom's life, Prince Edward would give up every royal comfort, claiming, "Twould be worth my father's kingdom but to enjoy it once!" The opportunity to enjoy the childhood adventures Tom describes and the darker moments both characters have momentarily forgotten will ultimately provide Prince Edward a better appreciation for the station he was born into and the deprivations of his people.

The exchange of social station, however, is completely accidental and both characters quickly realize that the life they dreamed of living is much different from the real experience of inhabiting a radically different social position. Neither royalty nor peasantry offers experience as idyllic as either imagined. The adventures each endures in his attempts to set society right create the memorable moments of the plot's development. Essentially, Edward's quest to return to the throne reveals the social, economic, and legal injustices of England and shapes young Prince Edward into the fair and judicious king he becomes at the end of the novel. Tom's ability to consider shrewdly and pass judgment on the conduct of the court similarly reveals the shortcomings of royal life. Through literally walking in each other's shoes, both Tom and Edward experience the unfamiliar and uncomfortable. By joining their adventures in one novel, Twain is able to critique, sometimes lightheartedly, both the upper and lower classes. The point, ultimately, is that neither class is flawless. As a consequence, Twain's primary focus is on Tom and Edward's abilities to use their intelligence to realize the shortcomings of the world they live in and to use their kindhearted natures to more equably settle the grievances they witness.

The seemingly simple tale was well received by Twain's contemporaries. Blending artistic skill and a moral message, The Prince and the Pauper was touted as a mature read that offered multiple levels of meaning. A child could enjoy the fantastic journey of Tom and Edward at face value. An adult could clearly see the challenging social commentary based on the injustices suffered by the characters and further clarified in Twain's footnotes. Perhaps most significant to Clemens was the novel's reception by his family. They enjoyed the novel so much that they staged a play based on it. The first draft of this dramatic adaptation was a thin plot summary written by Clemens with the intent of casting his children and their friends in the main roles so that they might perform before an audience of family and close friends during the Christmas holiday. The positive reaction of the initial small audience and a second, larger audience in January led Clemens to produce a version of the novel as a play in the hope of earning more than its initial publication returns.

Unfortunately Clemens's agreement to collaborate with two different playwrights to rework the novel into a professional performance led to the only long, drawn-out lawsuit Sam Clemens faced as an author. Perhaps he had not learned the same lesson as his characters about the value of riches.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Twain goes to great lengths to recount the adventures and growth of both boys. Which scenes depict the greatest challenge for both Tom and Prince Edward? How does the response of each character show his growth and development?
2. Twain includes explanatory notes for certain legal concepts in his novel. Choose one concept that Twain explains and further research its meaning and impact on history.
3. Choose one concept for which Twain does not provide an explanatory note but that needs one in order for contemporary readers to understand the development of the narrative. Write your own explanatory note, and be sure to explain why understanding this concept is central to understanding the novel.
4. Tom Canty and Prince Edward are included in a long list of literary doppelgängers, or pairings of opposites, who most often look alike. How do Tom and Edward complement each other? What are each character's strengths and weaknesses?
5. Compare and contrast the plot development of the switched twins in The Prince and the Pauper and The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson. What interesting differences and similarities do you find? Discuss how they add to the portrayals of the characters and their worlds.

The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson* (1883)

The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson is perhaps Twain's most eclectic enterprise. While Huckleberry Finn marked the beginning of Twain's own publishing house—a venture that eventually left him bankrupt—The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson joined Sam Clemens's entrepreneurial spirit with Mark Twain's dark satire. Published in 1883, the novel blends many of Twain's interests and major themes. Wilson's reliance on fingerprinting highlights the importance of science. The role reversal of Thomas a Becket Driscoll and Valet de Chambre raises questions of racism, slavery, and identity. Tom and Roxy's criminal behavior place accountability and responsibility at the fore of the novel. And underscoring all of the aforementioned themes is Twain's return to the doppelgänger, or doubled character.

Although the novel was not one of Twain's biggest sellers during his lifetime and still has not equaled in fame or readership Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, Clemens used his character's maxims, which open each chapter, in other ventures. The Century Magazine promoted Twain's latest novel with the inclusion of "Pudd'nhead Wilson's Calendar for 1884." The small pocket calendar included samples of Wilson's aphorisms and a description of fingerprinting techniques according to Twain's narrative. Such aphorisms would resurface again as a chapter in Following the Equator. The novel may not have been the success Twain had hoped for, but the character and his aphorisms have been indelibly etched in our cultural dictionary.

Set in Dawson's Landing, Missouri (another incarnation of Hannibal), The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson has three main plots. The first follows the alienated Northerner, David "Pudd'nhead" Wilson, who redeems himself in the final courtroom drama. The second follows Roxy; her beloved son, Valet de Chambre; and her master's child, Thomas a Becket Driscoll, whom she switches with her own son when they are young so that her son will never be sold away from her. The third introduces Luigi and Angelo Capello, the dashing European twins who upend the town first through their charm, then through the drama surrounding the stolen knife, and finally through their trial for Judge Driscoll's murder. All three plots are merged nicely as Pudd'nhead Wilson redeems his reputation by using his understanding of the law and study of the forensic science of fingerprinting to absolve the Capello twins of murder and reveal the switch of Tom and Roxy's true son.

Through the switch of Tom and Chambers, Twain is able to illustrate more distinctly the disadvantages and inhumanity of slavery. Roxy, the mulatto slave who could pass for white, has a child who is identical in every way to her master's child except in his social, economic, and legal status. In the opening chapters, the narrator goes to great lengths to emphasize the unjustifiable discrepancies that exist in this society. Although "to all intents and purposes Roxy was as white as anybody, . . . the one sixteenth of her which was black outvoted the other fifteen parts and made her a Negro," and her son, who was "thirty-one parts white," was also a slave.

The comparison between Tom and his half brother, Chambers, is also significantly developed. Despite their identical physical appearance, the vast difference in their clothes and treatment within the Driscoll household is clearly portrayed. Although her anguish cannot excuse her later actions, Roxy's decision to switch the children results from her realization that the difference between her son and Tom is superimposed on them by society and men like Driscoll. The only other alternative Roxy can conceive is murdering her own son and committing suicide. With such an alternative, it is clear that Roxy's decision to switch the infants is purely maternal and not intentionally malicious.

Twain, however, does not leave the novel with such a simple rendering of the condition of slavery. The novel's focus on the switch eventually becomes a question of nature versus nurture. Tom, who is really the slave, steals and murders his own uncle over debts and deeds. At the end of the novel, his actions are accounted for by his black blood and responded to by selling him down river. Chambers, the real heir to the Driscoll estate, is left a white man uncomfortable with his inherited privileges. As the narrative states: "His manners were the manners of a slave. Money and fine clothes could not mend these defects or cover them up; they only made them more glaring and the more pathetic."

The drama of the murder trial and the role of forensic science in the novel justify close attention. Both provide catalysts for the narrative's determination of when and how Chambers's and Tom's true identities will be revealed. However, as important as these other plots are, they should not overshadow the social commentary of the novel.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What is the tragedy in The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson?
2. The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson includes many of Twain's central themes. The use of science, the inequality of racism, questions of identity, issues of criminality, complexities of doubled characters are all present throughout the novel. Choose one of these themes and trace its development in the course of the novel.
3. The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson blends two narratives: the story of Roxy's twins and the Siamese twins, or those extraordinary twins. Compare the use of the extraordinary twins as they appear in the novel to their development in "Those Extraordinary Twins."
4. Several different versions (the Century Magazine, Marginal Illustrations of the 1894 publication, Harper & Brother edition illustrations in 1899, and the Édition de Luxe of 1899) of The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson included different illustrations. Compare and contrast the effectiveness of two different publications' illustrations.
5. Choose one of Pudd'nhead Wilson's aphorisms and test its validity. Does it connect in any way to the chapter it prefaces? Does it connect in any way to the novel's themes? Does it connect in any way to real life?

Life on the Mississippi (1883)

Life on the Mississippi truly unites the mythic persona, Mark Twain, with the experiences of the man, Sam Clemens, and both voices are present in this travel narrative that unfolds along the muddy waters of this most iconic of American rivers. Focusing on Clemens's personal experiences as a steamboat pilot for a brief period before the Civil War, Twain's persona treats the river with surprisingly little dark satire and irony, though the people included in this fictionalized memoir are of course fair game for Twain's acerbic wit. Twain's history of the river and his reflections on its ever-changing beauty are a testament to its importance to both the persona Clemens adopted as an author and Clemens himself. In fact, Life on the Mississippi calls attention to the direct connection between Clemens's personal life and his pen name, derived directly from his experiences piloting a riverboat, as the term mark twain signified a depth of two fathoms, the minimal depth needed for steamboats to travel safely along the Mississippi River.

In 1882 Clemens returned to the river of his childhood as a local hero. The visit, however, mixed business with pleasure. As recounted in part in the final chapters of Life on the Mississippi, Clemens traveled along the river again to recapture its beauty and tell its tale in the work while he was writing and revising it. As do all of his travel narratives, Life on the Mississippi required research in order to portray the time and place accurately. But Twain's research trip down the river revealed not only the history, geology, and people of the river, but also the deeply disturbing changes that the river had undergone since Clemens last visited its muddy banks. Trains had taken over the greater burden of transporting people and goods. The river itself had changed its course with human intervention. And lights and buoys now marked the safest trail for boats to follow. Despite these advances, there is a sense of loss. The previous chapters outlined a living river with its complicated connections to mankind and nature; now that river, the river of Sam Clemens's youth, has been lost forever.

Together with his recollections of childhood stories and adventures, Clemens's experiences on the river as part of a steamboat crew make up the central body of the narrative. The early chapters, focusing on the history of the Mississippi River and its finicky relationship with humanity, set the stage for the realistic and reliable account of the life of a riverboat pilot and his crew. As the novel progresses, Twain includes many colorful and fictive descriptions of the history of and life on the Mississippi. But throughout the narrative, there is a sense of respect and love for the river.

Twain's love for it seems to result from its continual mutability. The river is never the same river twice. No matter how many times Twain travels down the river and no matter how hard he struggles to read the signs, the Mississippi constantly changes. Bixby, his learned tutor on the ways of the river, cautions Twain not to fall prey to the changing appearance of the river. Instead, he must "learn the shape of the river; and you learn it with such absolute certainty that you can always steer by the shape that's in your head, and never mind the one that's before your eyes." The challenge of believing what you know to be true when your eyes and senses reveal a different scene altogether is the greatest challenge of a riverboat pilot. And it is a challenge that Twain continues to play with throughout his longer, fictional works as they all have elements of deception and/or confused identities.

Although it is clear that Twain's focus truly is on the river and the challenges of becoming a riverboat pilot, his work is not without adventure. The narrative develops the real tensions of guiding a steamboat, its crew, cargo, and passengers down the unpredictable river. Twain's deft descriptions of the hazards of the river and his ability to portray the concentration of Bixby when navigating the challenging passes contribute to the intriguing development of the narrative. Similarly the tall tales embedded in the narrative add a human dimension to a narrative that focuses on the precocious nature of the Mississippi. If Twain had remained in the historical past or focused merely on natural descriptions of the river in all its glory, the narrative of Life on the Mississippi would be far less than it is: a multidimensional travel narrative, which is so much more than the simple story of a trip down the Ole Miss.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What is fact and what is fiction? Twain blends the history of the river and his own personal experiences with tall tales and legends of the river. Trace Twain's use of both fact and fiction in a chapter of your choice. How does this fluid movement between fact and fiction impact the narrative's development?

2. What is fact and what is fiction in Twain's use of his own experiences? Using a detailed biography of Clemens's life, compare and contrast the version presented in his memoir of life on the Mississippi with the version presented by literary historians.
3. How do Twain's early trips on the river, when he is part of the crew of a steamboat, and his later trips, when he is a traveler on the river, change his perspective on the river? How does Twain account for the differences as more than a change in his perspective?
4. Twain spends a great deal of time discussing the changing nature of the Mississippi and its relationship with the natural world. Trace the development of a particular natural element—lightning, moonlight, sunlight, trees, fog—and its impact on the river through the dialogue of the novel, the descriptive passages, and the action of the plot.

Adventures of Huckleberry Finn* (1884)

Nearly a decade after the publication of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, Adventures of Huckleberry Finn returned readers to Twain's St. Petersburg, Missouri, this time presenting the story from a different child's perspective. But Huck Finn's adventures are anything but childish. Focusing on the difficult topic of slavery and racism and often using less than socially acceptable language, Adventures of Huckleberry Finn is a challenging read. Furthermore, the book has often faced severe criticism, both from reviewers and from the general public, and schools and libraries, many of which have banned the work from their shelves. Perhaps it is the genuine good nature of both Huck and Jim that keeps readers turning its pages. Twain himself, in a retrospective personal journal entry, noted that the central conflict of the novel is revealed when Huck's "sound heart and . . . deformed conscience come into collision and conscience suffers defeat" (Notebook number 35).

Hindsight may have offered Mark Twain such a vantage point, but while writing the novel he was often stuck with writer's block. Literary biographers seem to agree that Twain began to focus on Huck Finn and his narrative before he had finished writing The Adventures of Tom Sawyer. Both books develop his childhood memories of Hannibal, Missouri, in the fictionalized St. Petersburg and rely on the interesting and vexing contradictions in a young boy's view of the world. During the composition of Huckleberry Finn, two particular issues seem to have caused the author considerable trouble. The first—when Huck and Jim miss the fork in the river that would have enabled them to follow the Ohio north to freedom—caused a several-year block in the novel's progress. How could Twain right such an oversight that defied logic and rationality? The fog may have added a new challenge to Jim and Huck's quest for freedom, but Jim's choice to continue into the Deep South, known for its treacherous slave practices, simply could not be squared with the character or the setting. The second—the final chapters on the Phelps farm—posed a similar problem and slowed the writing process as Twain again struggled to square Jim's character. Not only is Huck's decision to accept Tom's escape plan questionable, Huck, whom we have seen grow and mature during his trek down the river, significantly falls short of our expectations of a hero. While it may be argued that Twain never really resolved these narrative defects, and instead merely persevered and pressed on, the novel's completion raised more than questions of plot defects.

In fact, Huckleberry Finn has faced severe censure. Even before the novel was published in its entirety, publishers questioned its content. The Century Magazine, a popular literary publication of the 19th century, published excerpts of the novel but made alterations to delete or change references to nakedness, dead cats, and other unsavory details (Kaplan 10). Even Twain censured the illustrations E. W. Kemble provided for his novel. Several illustrations never made it to print, and one, which was included in the first printing, had to be manually excised from every edition because of its lewd depiction of Uncle Silas (Kaplan 11). The questionable terminology and distasteful illustrations called Twain's "decency and morality" into question, even by Twain's own publishing house (qtd. in Kaplan 11). Even when Huckleberry Finn was published with its expurgated illustrations, it continued to raise questions of appropriateness. Such questions culminated in the Concord (Massachusetts) Public Library's decision to ban the book, claiming that it was "trash and suitable only for the slums" (qtd. in Kaplan 11). Other libraries followed suit, and Huckleberry Finn continues to be banned today from some library and schoolroom shelves.

Since the issues of racism and slavery raised by the novel's narrative have caused the greatest and longest-lasting concern in regard to this novel's appropriateness, any attempt at a comprehensive discussion of the work must include, if not focus on, these concerns. By the end of the novel, Twain's message appears to be clear: Slavery is a social evil romanticized by the social conscience, represented by Tom Sawyer; revolted against by the truly civilized, like Huck; and endured by the unfortunate Jim. But the hardships, especially those faced by Jim throughout his journey to freedom, and especially in the "attempted" escape from the Phelpses, are difficult for a modern reader to comprehend. It is clear that Twain has made farcical the absurd inhumanity of slavery through his darkly comic rendering of Jim's tests and trials, but it is difficult to integrate Twain's message with his method.

In fact, Twain's parody of America's struggle with the most deeply divisive social issue that characterized his historical moment draws heavily on his own life experience. As a child in a Southern town, Sam Clemens probably witnessed slave sales or at least the announcements of slave auctions. His daily life in town no doubt put him in contact with slaves and exposed him to their treatment in society and the expectations imposed on them as workers. Even within his own household and at the Quarles farm nearby, Clemens was exposed to slavery.

The Clemens family may have been struggling to put their accounts in order, but they could afford a slave to assist with the general grocery store and the household chores. The Quarleses, Jane Clemens's sister and brother-in-law and their children, lived close by on a relatively flourishing farm and owned several slaves to assist in the working of the land. Personal records of the Clemenses' and Quarleses' slaves, as is true in the case of most slaves, were not kept, so it is impossible to paint a complete picture of their treatment. Treatment, however, is a moot point when one race or group holds another bound in servitude, and society offers no legal recourse for the enslaved.

Although Clemens's portrayal of slavery in Huckleberry Finn is considered by many to be socially and morally responsible when compared to the deeply racist opinions held during the time of the novel by Twain's own contemporaries, Clemens was raised in a Southern, slaveholding household. He may not have owned slaves (although he did have hired servants) once he was out on his own, and his ideas may have been socially progressive, but his perception of race could not help but be influenced by his childhood experiences. In 1853 Clemens traveled to New York City to make his fortune in printing houses. While Clemens disappointedly returned to the South without the riches he thought he would amass, he did gain more knowledge of the printing process and revealed his social and cultural bias in his letters home. Several letters depict his stance: he describes slave sympathizers as "infernal abolitionists," claims he should "black [his] face, for in these Eastern States n—— are considerably better than white people," and writes of his homesickness for the South and the "good, old-fashioned negro" (qtd. in Hoffman 35). Needless to say, such comments reveal the limits of Clemens's progressive thought. Moreover, his very brief involvement in the Civil War as a soldier in a militia suggests a deep alliance with Southern sympathies and values. In essence, then, Twain wrote a novel portraying the negative impact of slavery despite his rearing and experiences with slavery as a member of the oppressing class.

Understanding the setting and history of the era Twain depicts is key to addressing the novel's plot and its representation of slavery. As Twain explained, the novel is set 40 to 50 years before its publication, or roughly 1835–45. The novel's focus on the issue of freedom and race is appropriate for its Southern setting at this particular time, during the height of slavery and the beginning of the earnest national discussion of slavery that preceded the Civil War. Whether Twain deals with this issue appropriately is an issue that can be and has been argued from more perspectives than can adequately be addressed here.

But to ignore the issue of slavery altogether in any classroom discussion of the novel would be a disservice to the novel's main theme and ultimate purpose. The Public Broadcasting System– (PBS) sponsored Web site Born to Trouble: Adventures of Huckleberry Finn usefully emphasizes the importance of addressing the issues of slavery and racism in the novel. Providing ample support for positive classroom discussions of this sensitive issue, the Web site lists student, teacher, administrator, and parent responses to a recent controversy over the required reading of this novel. The students' responses are especially enlightening as they reveal the lingering importance of this novel's central topic. Racism is still an issue today, and the student comments reveal the importance of studying and openly discussing Twain's novel: "We don't get enough credit for understanding things—we could have read it without all of this"; "This stuff [racism] is all over the news. We can't avoid it. . . . We already learn it outside of school, why not study it in school and get the real facts?"; and "I think the impact of this book is in the discomfort the readers feel. . . . Huck Finn is perfect to read if it's taught correctly." Thus, with the necessary framework, a rewarding discussion of sensitive topics can be achieved.

To focus solely on the issue of slavery would, however, be a disservice to Huckleberry Finn, as the novel is rich in other themes, motifs, and symbols—many of which do connect to the central focus of the novel. Through the exploration of subplots that unfold before the raft rip begins and when Huck and Jim go ashore during their journey down the Mississippi, readers can learn just as much about the principal characters, Huck and Jim, as they do through the moments Huck and Jim spend alone on the raft. The many peripheral characters, who seem insignificant in an exploration of the central theme of the novel, do further the development of Twain's commentary on society and its flaws. Beginning with events that appear to be innocuous is a convenient way to build up to the central discussion of the injustices of slavery and racism. Twain's presentation of Huck's experience before Jim enters the novel is an excellent example: When we first meet Huck, he reluctantly endures the civilizing efforts of the Widow Douglas and Miss Watson and chafes at what amounts to a form of legally enforced custody that leaves Huck less than thrilled with his lot in life. But his wisdom has grown since our last meeting with Huck at the end of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer. When Pap returns and seeks custody of Huck in order to control his money, Huck has the foresight to entrust his money to Judge Thatcher. Once Pap kidnaps Huck and the vicious circle of drinking and violence begins, Huck has the hindsight to acknowledge the benefits of life with the Widow Douglas. His escape highlights his ability to plan and scheme—an ability previously attributed to Tom Sawyer only. Thus, the opening chapters alone highlight the immense growth and development Huck has achieved since we last saw him at the close of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer. Such an exploration of Huck's struggles with his imposed custody foreshadows the much graver issue of slavery that Jim faces.

When Jim and Huck finally meet on Jackson's Island, the true crisis of the novel becomes apparent. Despite Jim's faithful tending to Huck and Huck's growing sense of responsibility for ensuring Jim's freedom, the true challenge for Huck is that of learning the value of the individual despite what his society has taught him. Huck's decision to assist Jim in his escape from St. Petersburg and Jackson's Island when he learns that the smoke from their fire has drawn attention to their hideout indicates Huck's early decision to question the justice of slavery. His scheme to protect Jim from the band of men seeking runaway slaves by claiming that Jim is ill with smallpox is a testament to Huck's growing abilities. He has now proven twice that he is a deft schemer and his lie brings into focus the concern with truth and lies that run throughout the novel.

As Huck searches for confirmation that his decision to help Jim is the right decision to make, he is forced to tell several fibs. Before they even set off down the river, Huck's skills at deception are questioned. His disguise as a girl is quickly discerned by Judith Loftus when her tests reveal his lack of basic feminine skills. Similarly his attempt to mask his identity at the Grangerfords' causes trouble. While Mrs. Loftus's trouble is merely an inconvenience because Huck must create another lie to save himself and Jim from exposure, the false identity he assumes with the Grangerfords nearly costs him his life in the senseless family feud that rages between them and the Shepherdsons. Perhaps the greatest disguise Huck dons in the novel is the innocent and naive boy who believes the Duke and the Dauphin's con game. By playing along with these darkly comic villains, Huck is able to overthrow their plot to con Mary Jane Wilks of her rightful inheritance. His ability in this instance to see through such an act ultimately complicates even further his inability to influence Tom's plan to free Jim during the final chapters of the novel.

But it is not Huck's ability to deceive others that is most important in the end. He has in fact been deceiving himself to a far greater degree than he has deceived anyone else. Throughout the novel Huck questions the very humanity of the one character who maintains a nobleness and gentility far beyond the capabilities of anyone else in the novel. This is, of course, Jim. Huck simply cannot understand the deeply human bond he shares with Jim. When Huck learns of Jim's deep love for his own family in chapter 23, Huck cannot help question the genuineness of Jim's emotional connection: "I do believe he cared just as much for his people as white folks does for their'n. It don't seem natural, but I reckon it's so." The care and concern Jim has shown for Huck since they teamed up on Jackson's Island has proven that Jim is capable of caring for others regardless of what society has told Huck to believe. Even Huck's earlier declaration that "people would call me a low-down Abolitionist and despise me for keeping mum—but that don't make no difference. I ain't a-going to tell, and I ain't a-going back there, anyways" when Jim tells him that he ran away from the Widow Douglas, turns out to be an exercise in self-deception. If he had truly believed in the values of the Southern slavery system, then he would have turned Jim in despite his promise. For Huck the value of the individual and his rights has always been more important than the value of "civilized" society. It simply takes Huck the greater part of the novel to realize and accept his moral superiority to the society that has always tried to cultivate him and to induce him to assimilate its belief system.

In fact, Twain goes to great lengths to exemplify Huck's moral superiority to his surrounding society. Chapters 21 and 22 emphasize the dangers of people's taking the law into their own hands, especially when they have no secure moral foundation. This is made clear when Colonel Sherburn shoots Boggs and when the lynch mob tries to hold Sherburn accountable. But there does not seem to be any real accountability for Sherburn's actions, as he is able to cow the mob and escape their wrath: "Your [society's] mistake is, that you didn't bring a man with you; that's one mistake, and the other is that you didn't come in the dark and fetch your masks." As has Colonel Sherburn, Huck has taken the law into his own hands. His decision to assist a runaway slave has made him a vigilante as well. However, Huck's reaction to the circus stunt in chapter 23 emphasizes the difference between Huck and the Colonel Sherburns of the world. Although Huck is later ashamed to be so taken in by the stunt, he cannot help but admit that the danger the man appeared to be experiencing "warn't funny to me, though; I was all of a tremble to see his danger." Huck has both broken the law and had such a strong reaction to the circus stunt because he is consistently more concerned with the welfare of others than with his own use and abuse of socially condoned power.

Similarly Twain juxtaposes Huck's morality with the morality of the Duke and the Dauphin during the long con targeting Mary Ann Wilks and her sisters. Spanning chapters 24 through 30, the development of the Wilks deception is second in length only to deceptions Tom and Huck perpetrate on the Phelpses and Jim in the final chapters of the novel. Huck is so ashamed by their false display and attempt to take advantage of a grieving family that he cannot help but act. The three nieces treat Huck with such kindness that he cannot help but "feel at home and know I was amongst friends. I felt so ornery and low down and mean that I say to myself, my mind's made up; I'll hive that money for them or bust." Although he uses several lies and a masterful scheme to secure the money for the Wilks family, these deceptions, like the deceptions he has used to save Jim from slavery, are good, because they help instead of hurt.

Such a distinction between positive and negative lies is dramatically situated at the fore in the final scenes of the novel. Huck may have disappointed the reader with his surprise at Tom Sawyer's willingness to help Jim escape: "I'm bound to say Tom Sawyer fell considerable in my estimation. Only I couldn't believe it. Tom Sawyer a n—stealer!" The arrival of Tom Sawyer in the final chapters is not a surprise as he has been a recurrent figure in the novel. Huck and Jim have often compared their schemes and feats to Tom's exploits. When Huck learns of Tom Sawyer's deception in the final chapters, however, we cannot help but be even more disappointed in the lack of a response or accountability for Tom's deceitful and hurtful plans. Huck's final claim that "[Jim's freedom] was about as well the way it was" is far from satisfying. By saying almost nothing at all, Huck has left it to the reader to make the final decision about a society that condones Tom's escapades. The Phelpses do reward Jim for his willingness to sacrifice his own freedom to save Tom's life, but even that rings hollow. It is enough to make one want to "light out for the territory" with Huck.

As do Twain's other social satires, Huck's narrative makes it increasingly difficult for a reader to wish to continue in civilized America. While our 21st-century readings of the novel may find greater fault in the issues of slavery and racism than Twain's contemporaries, there is some satisfaction in knowing that Twain's honest portrayal of the weaker characteristics of humanity and American history have always rankled some, if not all, readers. Perhaps that is all one can really hope for when writing such a biting novel. The fact that this novel can still make us think about and discuss the sensitive issues of slavery, racism, social equality, and the essential qualities of human experience is reason enough to read it despite the plot flaws and questionable language. And perhaps that lasting impact is exactly what makes Huckleberry Finn both an American classic and a perennial source of controversy.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the development of Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn in their novels, The Adventures of Tom Sawyer and Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Who has changed more in the intervening time between the two novels? Why?
2. How accurate is the opening frame narrative when Huck speaks to his readers directly, claiming: "You don't know about me, without you have read a book by the name of 'The Adventures of Tom Sawyer,' but that ain't no matter"?
3. In each of the stops that Huck makes along the river, he encounters new adventures that teach him about the civilization he ultimately rejects. How does each stop contribute to his final decision to "light out for the territory"?
4. Twain provides Huck with several role models: Pap, Jim, Tom, Miss Watson, the Widow Douglas, Judge Thatcher, the Duke and the Dauphin, the Grangers, the Wilkses, the Phelpses, and Aunt Polly. From which of the characters does he learn most about civilization and its expectations?
5. Superstitions play a large role in the development of the novel. Jim and Huck share a common interest in the folklore of their area, and both learn new myths from each other. Choose one example of folklore in the novel. Who tells us the superstition? Why is the superstition significant for the plot development? How does the superstition contribute to the overall development of a theme of the novel?

6. Racial inequality is not the only social inequity highlighted in the novel. Several references to gender differences are also made. How are girls Huck's age portrayed? What accounts for the difference between men and women in the towns Huck and Jim visit?
7. Throughout the novel Huck assumes several different identities and encounters characters who are not who they claim to be. Why does Twain use such elaborate schemes? How does such a play with characters' identities contribute to the development of the central theme of the novel?
8. Huck and Jim experience various truths, half-truths, and outright untruths throughout the development of the novel. How does each character react to truth and lies? How do his experiences with truth and lies help him grow and develop during the course of the novel?
9. Much has been written on the idyllic island Huck and Jim share on the raft and the less than ideal world they encounter whenever they visit the riverbank communities. What makes the raft ideal? How does Twain represent Huck and Jim's conduct on the raft as different from their behavior on shore?
10. The Duke and the Dauphin's adaptations of Shakespeare's plays overtly create literary allusions between the works cited and Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Why are such literary allusions included by Twain? What role do they have in his darkly comic farce of society? What role do they play in furthering the discussion of the novel's theme?
11. Twain's novel is set in the Deep South during the years of 1835–45. Research the history of slavery in Missouri and Arkansas during this period. Is Jim's experience an accurate representation of the life slaves endured? What has Twain fictionalized? Is such fictionalization necessary for the advancement of the novel's theme? Does such a necessity make it appropriate?
12. Appended to his foreword to the novel, Twain adds a sentence warning his reader that "persons attempting to find a motive in this narrative will be prosecuted; persons attempting to find a moral in it will be banished; persons attempting to find a plot in it will be shot." Does Twain mean for his audience to take his advice seriously? What is the danger in taking his advice and not finding a motive, moral, or plot?
13. Like many of Twain's works, Adventures of Huckleberry Finn was carefully illustrated. How do the illustrations compare with the social commentary of the novel? Are the illustrations of Jim as sympathetic as his character development and his relationship with Huck reveal him to be?
14. Jim is not the only slave in Twain's works. Closely read Aunt Rachel's tale in "True Story." How are Aunt Rachel and Jim alike and different? Does Twain's fictionalized Jim do justice to the history and experiences captured in Aunt Rachel's more-fact-than-fiction autobiography?
15. Adventures of Huckleberry Finn has been banned, removed from school and library shelves, censored, uncensored, added to or subtracted from required reading lists for all ages and in many different countries. Twain rather enjoyed the furor his novel caused. After reading the novel, write a letter to Twain and support your position on whether or not the book should be banned.

A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court* (1889)

Written over the course of several years as the piecing together of two separate plots, A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court was a struggle for Clemens as an author. According to Andrew Hoffman's biography, Inventing Mark Twain: The Lives of Samuel Langhorne Clemens, Twain's novel "blended his reading of history and of Morte d'Arthur, with a book set in Hawaii that he had begun a few years before. In the original manuscript, a practical, scientific, nineteenth-century man finds himself in a primitive world of superstition, faith, and ignorance” (333). Published in 1889 with illustrations by Dan Beard, A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court received positive reviews but relatively weak sales in comparison to Twain's other works and in light of his fame.

Although all of Twain's most noted works have an element of social satire and commentary, the story of Hank Morgan and his debacles was perhaps too caustic for Twain's American public. The plot of A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court highlights the downfall of technological arrogance. Transported to the Dark Ages, Hank Morgan assumes authority through a systematic implementation of modern marvels. Although Morgan liberally uses fantastic displays of solar eclipses and fireworks to dislodge Merlin's hold on King Arthur's court, Morgan's political power seems to be based on production, education, and communication. Factories, schools, and simple everyday inventions are used to support his quest for supremacy. Despite his use of all these respectable and respected institutions of 19th-century American life, however, Morgan's power fails because it corrupts. In the end, Morgan's final actions in sixth-century England leave him the victor over a field of the dead, awaiting the next onslaught of a new enemy. For Twain 19th-century marvels are not as civilizing as they first appear.

Twain's social commentary did not stop with the use and abuse of science and technology. Hank and King Arthur's trials as traveling peasants highlight the injustices of a society based on class divisions. Although the duo encounter many troubles and are eventually enslaved for a fight with a group of townsmen, their travels ultimately reveal the challenges faced by the lower classes. Despite Hank's repeated assertions that monarchies are limited and inferior systems of government, King Arthur's compassion for his people, once he realizes what they endure, is inspiring. Enslaved, King Arthur realizes the injustices of slavery and plans to end its practice once he is recognized and can return to his throne. His powerful character had already been established during his journeys with Hank when he had risked his own life by exposing himself to smallpox in order to carry a sick girl to her mother. Injustices may prevail, but the scenes revealing King Arthur's character imply that there is a hope for the people when their leaders can recognize society's weaknesses and address the need for positive change.

Morgan's travels are not merely about his public persona. During the years he spends in medieval England, he finds time to marry and have a child. Sandy (or Alisande), the original damsel in distress whom Morgan must help by freeing 40 “princesses” from ogres, eventually becomes Morgan's wife. Sandy is always present for Morgan's best moments. In her presence he frees the slaves from Morgan La Fay's dungeons. And with her he experiences the joy and love of being a husband and father. She and Hello Central, his daughter, are present at his organized baseball games and witness the camaraderie engendered by this American pastime. Both also momentarily realign his priorities. When Hello Central falls ill, he and Sandy travel to France, leaving the position, if not the power, Hank had acquired. Through his relationship with his wife and his daughter, Morgan becomes more than a flat character on a single-minded quest for power and glory.

But even Hello Central and Sandy could not keep Hank Morgan from his destiny. His quest for power and control over the weak-minded and backward medieval English he encountered at the beginning of his time travels draws him back to England. The return to the world he had created is bleak as the final break between Lancelot and King Arthur has left only Hank to rule the gray skies and sooty lands of an industrialized England. The Interdict, or the church's disapproval of Hank, King Arthur, and Lancelot, with its plan to destroy all of Hank's modernization and Hank as well, does not provide the welcome he had imagined.

Essentially then, A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court is a satiric and dark social commentary. The brief glimpse offered here cannot do justice to the political, social, and economic commentary included in Twain's work.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Twain's use of a frame narrative reveals that Hank Morgan's deep sleep took him back to modern times. How does Morgan's deep sleep compare to Rip Van Winkle's deep sleep?
2. The final chapters of Hank Morgan's memoir depict a dark vision of the impact of war. Is such an ending appropriate? Does the rest of his memoir build up to the apocalyptic scenes that close his narrative?
3. How does Twain's portrayal of medieval times compare to history's portrayal of medieval times? Does his use of a fictional source, Morte d'Arthur, lessen the reliability of his history?
4. Considered one of the earliest time travel novels, how does A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court differ in Twain's use of this device from its use in science fiction? Compare and contrast the use of this literary device and the message of Twain's novel with the way his contemporary H. G. Wells uses it in The Time Machine (1895).
5. Hank Morgan's inventions show the negative impact science and technology can have on society. Choose one 19th-century advancement and trace its development and impact on the medieval society of the novel.
6. A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court has been the basis for several movies. Choose one movie based on Twain's novel and compare and contrast the content of the movie to Twain's narrative.

"The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg" (1898)

Written in 1898 while Clemens and his family were on tour in Europe to recoup losses from ill-advised investments, "The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg" has often been read as a satire of American society; however, the plot also darkly reveals Clemens's own state of mind. Clemens was clearly distressed by his loss of the considerable income he had earned from his previous books and lecture tours. By focusing on the corrupting potential of large sums of money, Clemens uses his literary persona not only to address a lingering concern from one of his earliest works, The Gilded Age, but also to work through his own moral and financial dilemma.

Divided into four sections, the narrative follows a traditional plotline. In the first part, or exposition, the stage is set and the citizens of Hadleyburg are primed for the revenge of the stranger. In the second part, Twain develops the mounting tension in Hadleyburg as its principal citizens compromise themselves, their personal reputations, and the town's reputation through antics meant to win them the "hundred and sixty pounds four ounces of gold" in the sack left by the stranger. The neighbors quickly turn on one another, each trying to outthink the other; if the rightful owner of the quotation within the sack can be found, then perhaps the right words can be guessed and a share—or a claim on all—of the money obtained. The ultimate climax takes place in the third part, where the impact the discovery has had on the citizens of Hadleyburg is revealed. Set in the town hall, the discussion of the multiple and nearly exact claims to the gold makes clear the weaknesses of the town. The final part of the story resolves the central issue of character and honesty through the psychologically painful death of Edward and Mary Richards. None of the established 19 is spared, but the remaining citizens, identified as the ribald chorus from the town hall meeting, are given the opportunity to recreate themselves within a new and unnamed small town in America.

Although the narrative ends with the townspeople moving on despite the stranger's corruption of the town's morals and standing, the short story does not offer a promising ending. The reader may have learned quite a bit about the townspeople of Hadleyburg, and perhaps he or she learned quite a bit about him- or herself, but

10. In Green Hills of Africa, Ernest Hemingway claims: "All modern American literature comes from one book by Mark Twain called Huckleberry Finn. . . . All American writing comes from that. There was nothing before. There has been nothing as good since." Is such a claim valid? Why?

WALT WHITMAN (1819–1892)

What is it then between us? / What is the count of the scores or hundred of years between us? / Whatever it is, it avails not.

(“Crossing Brooklyn Ferry”)

Walt Whitman has often been considered America’s greatest poet, and the reasons for the assessment are not hard to find. The poems of Leaves of Grass—the book Whitman published in 1855 and continued to develop throughout his life—broke the traditional frames of form, meter, and rhyme that had governed poetry for centuries. Whitman’s poems, written in long, loosely rhythmical, unrhymed lines of varying length, revolutionized American poetry and began the breakthroughs into free verse and experimental forms championed by modernist and postmodernist poets of the 20th and 21st centuries. In addition, Whitman’s virtual invention of free verse was combined with his expansion of the range of subjects considered acceptable for poetry. Subjects formerly considered inappropriate, too ordinary, or unpoetic—the city, the body, sexuality, homosexuality, common objects and plants, forgotten, degraded, and despised people, and urban workers and laborers—became the focus of his work. These breakthroughs similarly foreshadowed the work of poets 50 and 150 years later.

Fundamentally Whitman wanted to be, and to many remains, the first poet of America and democracy, for his work celebrates America in all its diversity, contradictions, and idealism. The democratic embrace of his poetry invites all, “the foolish as much as the wise” (“Song of Myself” l. 330), “the wicked just the same as the righteous” (l. 373), “Southerner as soon as a Northerner” (l. 335), “Prisoner, fancy-man, rowdy, lawyer, physician, priest” (l. 348 [unless otherwise noted, all citations to Leaves of Grass are to the 1891–92 “death-bed edition”). Such inclusiveness has gained him many admirers. His celebrations of the body drew admirers among 19th-century progressives and members of utopian communities, just as they attracted admirers among the Beat, counterculture, and free-love movements a century later. Homosexual poets have found in him the progenitor of a lineage of gay American poets. Women writers of the 19th century were inspired by his affirmations of gender equality, and 20th- and 21st-century women poets have continued to find inspiration in his work. African Americans have been empowered by his radically democratic verse. Early in his career, when Langston Hughes sailed on a merchant marine ship and felt the need for a new literary beginning, he tossed overboard all of his books except Leaves of Grass. Others find his poetry profound in the breadth of its religious vision, one that was unconventional, mystical, and pantheistic. Internationally Whitman has influenced more poets and novelists around the world, including many Nobel laureates, than any other American poet.

Whitman was born on May 31, 1819, the second of nine children, in West Hills, Long Island, and he died on March 26, 1892. Walt’s father, Walter, born just after the American Revolution, had been an acquaintance of Thomas Paine’s and had been energized by radical social ideas that would influence his son's notions about democracy. Walter, however, was apparently a stern, morose man not particularly close to his son. Walt's relationship to his mother, Louisa Van Velsor Whitman, on the other hand, was close and affectionate, and Whitman was much influenced by her Quakerism. Whitman's assertion of the divinity within each human being is akin to the Quaker notion of the divine light that shines within each person.

When Walt was four, the family moved to Brooklyn, while his father made his living as a carpenter. Never really making a go of it, he moved the family frequently, and Walt later wrote that his childhood was "a very restless and unhappy one." Whitman's formal education ended after only six years. At age 11 he was apprenticed to a Brooklyn printer and by age 16 had moved to Manhattan and already published work in a number of newspapers. His budding career was cut short, however, when a fire destroyed much of the printing district of New York in 1835. He returned to Long Island, where his father had gone back to farming. Unwilling to become a farmhand, he began teaching school. After five years of teaching, he found himself unsuited for it and returned to New York in 1841 to work for again for the newspapers.

All the while, he was writing conventional poetry on popular, sentimental subjects and tried his hand at fiction as well. His first book was a temperance novel, Franklin Evans: or The Inebriate: A Tale of the Times, which sold more than any of his writings during his lifetime, some 20,000 copies. The novel warns about the dangers of alcohol as it follows a boy from the country to the city, where he becomes seduced by drink and sex and causes the death of three women. Later in his life, perhaps embarrassed by its melodramatic sentimentality, Whitman called the book "rot," claiming he wrote it in three days while sipping cocktails.

Back in Brooklyn in 1845, he became editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, where he wrote editorials on topics of local interest and reviews of works of contemporary writers such as Goethe, Carlyle, and

RALPH WALDO EMERSON. Many thought him lazy by nature, and not without some justification; he loved spending long hours walking the streets and harbors, dressed as a dandy. In 1846 he was offered the editorship of a New Orleans paper, the Crescent, and he and his brother Jeff traveled by stage, steamer, and train to the "Paris of the South," where for three months he absorbed the sights and sounds of the cosmopolitan city. But when Jeff became sick and Whitman fell out of grace with the newspaper's owners, perhaps because of his opposition to slavery, the two took a return boat up the Mississippi and through the Great Lakes, giving Whitman more exposure to the country he would celebrate in poetry.

In Brooklyn during 1848 to 1849 he edited a "free soil" newspaper, the Brooklyn Freeman. He opposed slavery, especially in the new territories, partly because of loyalty to (white) urban workers and laborers, who might be harmed by competition from free labor. He also refused to support abolition, fearing, as Lincoln did, a disintegration of the union. Over time, his views became more progressive, but even during the late 1840s, his first lines of free verse in his notebook expressed his egalitarian sentiments: "I go with the slaves of the earth equally with the masters / And I will stand between the masters and the slaves, / Entering into both so that both will understand me alike."

In the early 1850s a mysterious period in his life, Whitman was reinventing himself as a poet. He operated a printing office and stationery store, continued freelance journalism, and built and speculated in houses. Then in July 1855 he published what would become one of the most famous books in the world, Leaves of Grass. The book was so new and so unlike anything seen before that critics have wondered whether some profound personal transformation—sexual, linguistic, psychological, spiritual—took place during the preceding years, which transformed this man about town into what he calls himself in "Song of Myself," his most famous poem: "Walt Whitman, an American, one of the roughs, a Kosmos" (l. 599). He later said about the period that he was “simmering, simmering, simmering. Emerson brought me to a boil.”

This first of nine editions was printed privately in 750 copies, and Whitman set much of the type himself. It was a slim volume embossed on the cover in gold lettering with leaves and vines all over it. Surprisingly neither the cover nor the title page reveals an author’s name; the only identifying marks on the opening pages is a portrait of Whitman in workman’s clothing, his shirt open and standing jauntily, his weight on one leg, gazing directly at the reader. His name is found only in the middle of the longest poem in the book.

A preface announces the arrival of the “greatest poet,” one who would be absorbed by his country “as affectionately as he has absorbed it.” But Leaves of Grass was not absorbed by the country and had little immediate effect on the reading public. Many of the readers it did find were shocked at its celebrations of sex and the body as well as his claim that the writing was “poetry.” The book, nevertheless, inspired one of the world’s most famous literary letters, a letter that did much to gain Whitman notice. Whitman sent copies of his book to other writers and poets such as Ralph Waldo Emerson and John Greenleaf Whittier. Shocked by it, Whittier allegedly threw the book into the fire. Emerson responded more sympathetically. The “sage of Concord” and founder of transcendentalism sent this unknown poet a letter of congratulations:

I find [Leaves of Grass] the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America has yet contributed. . . . I greet you at the beginning of a great career, which yet must have had a long foreground somewhere, for such a start.

Seven days after the publication of Leaves of Grass, Whitman’s father died, and Whitman assumed more responsibility for the family. At the end of 1855 Emerson visited him, and, buoyed by Emerson’s praise, Whitman published a second edition in 1856. Without permission he had printed in gold letters on the spine the line, “I greet you at the beginning of a great career,” followed by Emerson’s name. Inside Emerson’s letter appeared along with Whitman’s response addressed to his “Friend and Master.” Furious at these brash actions, Emerson nevertheless remained a longtime supporter. Favorable reviews were also included in the book, several of which Whitman wrote himself.

This second edition reveals Whitman at his most exuberant, and its most important new poem was one of Whitman’s best, “Sundown Poem” (later titled “Crossing Brooklyn Ferry”). Interestingly at this time he also published a prose pamphlet, The Eighteenth Presidency, which excoriates American politics and its vices in tones far different from the celebrations of the poetry. In 1856 HENRY DAVID THOREAU visited, later writing that Whitman “occasionally suggests something a little more than human.”

In the late 1850s Whitman began frequenting Pfaff’s bohemian restaurant, where he met other writers, artists, and social radicals. (Some years later, he would swear off drink to lead a life more worthy of his poetic calling.) At Pfaff’s he became involved in exploring new kinds of relationships with men and met Henry Vaughn, who may have become his first lover. He was also at work on poems for a new edition and wrote in 1857 that Leaves of Grass would be “the New American Bible.” “Calamus,” one of the most important new clusters of the edition, explored what Whitman called “adhesiveness,” a bond between men he felt could hold the nation together. He later called these poems his most political, but most readers find them fundamentally homosexual or homosocial. In fact they were originally a poetic sequence titled “Live Oak with Moss,” which chronicled a romantic relationship with another man that ended tragically. When he included the poems in “Calamus,” he rearranged them, apparently to mask their autobiographical narrative, and changed the gender of some of the persons. Whitman all his life remained publicly evasive about the topic of his relationships with men; responding to one inquiry about it, he boldly asserted that he had fathered six illegitimate children.

The failure of the relationship chronicled in “Calamus” is probably responsible for the new emotional tones of the third edition, tones of sorrow, loss, despair, and death, perhaps most powerfully voiced in two moving poems, “A Word Out of the Sea” (later titled “Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking”) and “As I Ebb’d with the Ocean of Life.” Whitman found a publisher for the new edition, Thayer and Eldridge of Boston, and in March 1860 he traveled to Boston. Walking the Boston Commons with him, Emerson tried to persuade him to remove the more sexually explicit poems, but Whitman refused. Interestingly Emerson never objected to the “Calamus” poems. Displays of love and affection between men (and between women) were more common in the 19th century and did not necessarily suggest sexual relations. The 1,000 copies of the first printing sold out quickly and received favorable reviews, and Whitman found himself something of a celebrity in Boston.

In 1861 Fort Sumter was fired upon, and the Civil War began. Whitman left for Virginia in December of that year, when a newspaper notice stated that his brother George had been wounded at Fredericksburg. He found George suffering from a superficial wound, but while there he saw the true horrors of war. Outside a hospital tent he came upon a pile of corpses and amputated limbs being loaded into a cart. He soon thereafter began visiting wounded soldiers in the hospital tents, helping as a volunteer nurse, consoling friend, father figure, and letter writer for the injured soldiers. From Fredericksburg, he went to Washington, D.C., to continue this work and there contacted William Douglas O’Connor, an abolitionist who would play an important role in his life, finding him at this time a job in the army paymaster’s office. Whitman estimated that during the next year he cared for some 80,000 to 100,000 wounded soldiers, establishing close relationships with many and corresponding with some of them for years afterward. He experienced a powerful surge in creativity, and began many poems about the war, which were eventually published in a collection called Drum Taps that later became one of the clusters in Leaves of Grass.

Subsequently O’Connor arranged a clerkship for him with the Bureau of Indian Affairs, where Whitman would meet leaders of western Indian tribes. Then, on April 9, 1865, Lee surrendered to Grant, and five days later, Lincoln was assassinated. In response to this national tragedy, Whitman wrote “When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom’d,” an elegy for the fallen president and one of his most famous and moving poems.

At the Bureau of Indian Affairs, Interior Secretary Harlan read a copy of Leaves of Grass left on Whitman’s desk and dismissed Whitman from his job. O’Connor rose to his defense, finding him a new job and writing a pamphlet, The Good Gray Poet, a work that did much to change the perception of Whitman from that of a radical, obscene poet to that of a compassionate poet of democracy. Also during this eventful year Whitman met the person with whom he would have the most intimate and passionate relationship of his life, Peter Doyle—a streetcar driver and former Confederate soldier.

In 1868 a British edition of his poems was published, creating many admirers in England, some of whom would help him later in his life. One admirer, Anne Gilchrist, widow of William Blake’s biographer, fell in love with him and after an extended correspondence traveled to America to propose marriage. Whitman graciously rebuffed her advances, once admonishing her not to confuse the “Walt Whitman” of the poetry with the “very plain personage” he was in his ordinary life.

In 1870 Whitman published his most famous prose work, Democratic Vistas, and a new group of poems, titled Passage to India. Democratic Vistas is virulently critical of America at the dawn of the Gilded Age but reaffirms its ultimate promise. In 1873 Whitman faced one of his worst years. He suffered the first of a number of strokes and moved to Camden, New Jersey, to live with his brother George and George’s wife. In May his mother died. In Harper’s magazine his poem “A Prayer of Columbus” appeared; the poem begins, “A battered, wrecked old man”—revealing the depth of his despair at the time.

In 1876 a series of prose pieces, Memoranda during the War, appeared, as did a Centennial Edition of Leaves of Grass and Two Rivulets, a new collection of poems and prose. In 1881 a well-known Boston publisher began publication of the fifth edition of Leaves of Grass, but when the district attorney opposed publication on grounds of obscenity, Whitman had the volume printed in Philadelphia. Whitman's books were selling briskly now.

Also in 1881 Whitman published Specimen Days, a volume of miscellaneous prose serving as a sort of loose autobiography that still left many periods of his life undocumented. In 1883 his first full-length biography was written by his disciple Richard Maurice Bucke, a physician and mystic, who considered Whitman the greatest example of fully attained spiritual illumination and "cosmic consciousness." Whitman took a major role in producing Bucke's biography, toning down Bucke's tendency toward hagiography and even writing passages himself.

In March 1882 Whitman bought a small, two-story frame house in Camden and lived there for the rest of his life. Admirers sought him out and helped him financially, and he achieved something of the national fame he had sought with the first edition of his book. The "death-bed edition" of Leaves of Grass appeared in 1891–92, and Whitman died on March 26, 1892. He was buried in Camden.

"Song of Myself" (1855)

"Song of Myself" is Whitman's longest and justifiably most famous poem. Appearing as the first poem of the 1855 Leaves of Grass, it retained its position of primacy through all the editions, being preceded in the final edition only by the "Inscriptions" poems and the program poem, "Starting from Paumanok." "Song of Myself" has been called an American epic, an ode and hymn to democracy, a compendium of 19th-century American culture, a spiritual autobiography, a conversion narrative, a sermon, an ode to the self, a psychological dream or drama, a narcissistic fantasy, a shamanic performance, and as what Emerson said of Leaves of Grass, a "combination of the Bhagavad Gita [a Hindu spiritual epic] and the New York Tribune," suggesting Whitman's juxtaposition of the sublime and the everyday.

In its final form, it comprises 52 sections, but the poem lacks any kind of traditional narrative, chronology, or logical progression just as it lacks any formal unity or structure. Its action is psychological, spiritual, imaginative, associative. Its central theme is the "Self" and the Self's relationship to the body and the soul, to sex, to other people and things, to geographies, gods, history, America, and, perhaps most important of all, to you, the reader. Other overarching themes include unity and diversity, the one and the many, identity and interdependency, democracy and the individual.

Stylistically it is written in long, rhythmical, unrhymed lines of varying length. Its poetic and musical devices include anaphora, parallelism, repetition, assonance and consonance, and an overall sweeping, undulating rhythm that carries the poem forward like the waves of the sea. Catalogs (an epic convention) are used to list the seemingly endless images of people, flora, and fauna of America. With these catalogs arranged in lines parallel in grammatical structure, each beginning in anaphora, the poem echoes the Bible, Homer, and other ancient and religious texts, often creating an oracular, incantatory effect. The self embraces the many and merges them into the unity of his song.

Unlike most poems of epic ambitions, "Song of Myself" opens not with an invocation of the muse but with an exclamatory affirmation, "I celebrate myself." But this self is not Whitman's personal ego; it is a larger Self that includes all. At a political level, this Self affirms the equality and oneness of diverse people in democracy. At a religious level the Self is akin to Emerson's individual soul that is one with the "Oversoul," a kind of pantheistic divinity permeating all things. When writing about this poem, scholars refer to the Self as the self (or Self), the poet, the speaker, or even Whitman, since the speaker calls himself "Walt Whitman, a kosmos" at the beginning of section 24.

After the opening annunciation of the Self, the poet characteristically turns to the reader, promising that “what I assume, you shall assume, / For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you” (ll. 2–3). Throughout the course of the poem, while circumscribing the nation and the globe, he always returns to “you,” as if to anchor the Self in primary relation to the reader before launching forth again on ecstatic journeys of self-making.

The opening also differs from typical epic openings, for it begins not in war or heroic adventure but in idleness—“I loafe and invite my soul, / I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass” (ll. 4–5)—perhaps playfully mocking America’s Puritan heritage and the Protestant work ethic. The poem prizes idleness because Whitman wants to return us to Eden, to a time before “creeds and schools,” to a simplicity of being and perception now lost. He says, “Stop this day and night with me and you shall possess or origin of all poems” (l. 33), echoing Emerson’s admonition that we must find “our own original relation to the universe.”

After this Edenic start, the poem then abruptly changes focus, returning to even earlier beginnings, to the chaos before creation: “Urge and urge and urge, / Always the procreant urge of the world. / Out of the dimness opposite equals advance, always substance and increase, always sex” (ll. 44–46). In the 1855 edition a line in this section read, “As God comes a loving bedfellow and sleeps at my side at night and close on the peep of the day” (l. 52). Whitman is ever merging the religious and the erotic, suggesting that the Western division of body and soul, mind and matter, has been an error.

Section 4 works as a purification or cleansing ritual for the personality that must take place before the rebirth of the poet in the famous section 5. The poet now reviews the details of his daily life—“My dinner, dress, associates, looks, compliments, dues” (ll. 69)—but tells us these “are not the Me myself” (l. 74). Who the “Me myself” is becomes clarified in section 5, the most important section of the poem. There we return to where the poet loafs and invites his soul:

I mind how we lay in June, such a transparent summer morning;
You settled your head athwart my hips and gently turned over upon me,
And parted the shirt from my bosom-bone, and plunged your tongue to my barestript heart
And reached till you felt my beard, and reached till you held my feet.
Swiftly arose and spread around me the peace and joy and knowledge that pass all the art and argument of the earth And I know that the hand of God is the promise of my own,
And I know that the spirit of God is the brother of my own
And that all the men ever born are also my brothers, and the women my sisters and lovers,
And that a kelson of the creation is love. (ll.
87–95)

In many writings of religious mystical experience the ineffable encounter with the divine finds expression in ecstatic sexual metaphors, but here the sexual seems not merely a metaphor for the spiritual but one with it. This rebirth is a sexual awakening to the body as well as a spiritual awakening. And the tongue as the active agent inscribing its message on the heart emphasizes the linguistic, poetic nature of the transformation.

Immediately after this rebirth, a child asks, “What is the grass?” (l. 99); grass is an apt metaphor for the one-in-the-many. From the posing of this question through section 16, the poet launches forth upon a journey of exploration and identification with the people and things of America and the world, venturing forth imaginatively almost as a disembodied spirit or consciousness. He does not merely see persons and things; he “becomes” them.

From section 18 to section 24 the poem works to undo hierarchies, celebrating the equality of all persons, the wicked with the just, the conquered with the victorious, the slave with the master. Then taking on divineline qualities, the speaker says, “I know I am deathless” (l. 406), “My foothold is tenon’d and mortis’d in granite, / I laugh at what you call dissolution” (ll. 419–420). He reassures us that he is “the poet of the Body and . . . the poet of the Soul” (l. 422), “the poet of the woman the same as the man” (l. 425).

In section 24 he returns to himself, “Walt Whitman, a kosmos, of Manhattan the son, / Turbulent, fleshy, eating, drinking and breeding” (ll. 497–498), the natural man and new Adam, celebrating his body, cataloging each part, claiming each part divine. From this section until section 32 he celebrates the erotic character of human experience. In section 26 he says he will do nothing but listen. He hears the sounds of country and city and ends in an ecstatic, eroticized experience of hearing a soprano’s aria. Moving then to touch in section 28 he describes in some of the most surrealistic images of the poem an experience of autoeroticism or one of being overpowered by “prurient provokers” (l. 623), being carried to orgasm and an ambiguous denouement.

Having returned to and reexperienced his own body and senses, in sections 33 through 38 he launches forth on another journey into the particulars of the phenomenal world. In the longest section of the poem, section 33, the I embarks with a new power and vision, becoming more and more god-like: “My ties and ballasts leave me, my elbows rest in sea-gaps, / I skirt sierras, my palms cover continents, I am afoot with my vision” (ll. 713–715). What follows is the longest catalog of the poem, 80 lines. As section 15 embraced people on their farms and in cities, section 33 covers the far-flung geography of mountains, rivers, and oceans. In this and the following four sections, freed from the constraints of time and space, he visits sea battles and the Alamo, knows victory and defeat, knows the cries of the fallen, feels the lash upon the captured slave. “I do not ask the wounded person how he feels, I myself become the wounded person” (l. 845).

Then section 38 opens, “Enough! enough! enough!” He finds himself on the verge of “a usual mistake” (l. 962), and so he must resume the “overstaid fraction” (l. 967). The Self, it seems, has become overly dispersed through identification with the multitudes and lost track of how these must be woven back into the unity of the “song of myself,” where they find fulfillment in oneness. Renewed again, the poet “troop[s] forth replenish’d with supreme power” (l. 970). From now until the end of the poem, he speaks ecstatically and more directly to the reader. We learn that he is a healer (ll. 1021–1022). He takes the “exact dimensions” (l. 1028) of the gods of all religions and “bestow[s] those dimensions] freely on each man and woman [he sees]” (l. 1036). In section 43 he says, “My faith is the greatest of faiths, and the least of faiths” (l. 1097).

At the beginning of section 44 he announces, “It is time to explain myself—let us stand up. / What is known I strip away, / I launch forth all men and women forward with me into the Unknown.” He proclaims, “I am an acme of things accomplish’d and I an encloser of things to be” (l. 1148). “Afar down I see the huge first Nothing, I know I was even there” (l. 1153) (as we saw in section 3). “Immense have been the preparations for me” (l. 1157). At the same time he ends section 45 with a more conventional religious sentiment: “My rendezvous is appointed, it is certain, / The Lord will be there and wait till I come of perfect terms, / The great Camerado, the lover true for whom I pine will be there” (ll. 1198–1200), the loving bedfellow of section 3.

He continues to encourage the reader onward. “If you would understand me go to the heights or water-shore / The nearest gnat is an explanation” (ll. 1252–1253). In section 50 he seems ready to give the final word. “There is that in me—/ . . . / it is without name . . . / It is not in any dictionary, utterance, symbol. / . . . / Do you see O my brothers and sisters? / It is not chaos or death—it is form, union, plan—it is eternal life—it is Happiness” (ll. 1309–1318).

The final sections of the poem speak intimately to the reader, and there Whitman makes his famous admission: “Do I contradict myself? / Very well then I contradict myself, / (I am large, I contain multitudes)" (ll. 1324–1326). In the final section he, like the spotted hawk swooping by, "[is] not a bit tamed, I too am untranslatable, / I sound my barbaric yawp over the roofs of the world" (ll. 1332–1333). And as he takes our leave, he says, "I bequeath myself to the dirt to grow from the grass I love, / If you want me again look for me under your bootsoles." (ll. 1339–1340).

You will hardly know who I am or what I mean,
But I shall be good health to you nevertheless,
And filter and fibre your blood.
Failing to fetch me at first keep encouraged,
Missing me one place search another,
I stop somewhere waiting for you.
(ll. 1341–1346)

Our Pan-like poet departs with images of the sublime forces of nature, forces he has embodied and returned to, and he reassures us that he will remain with us even after he has gone, echoing the words of some of the world's spiritual saviors.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What makes "Song of Myself" a poem? Many in the 19th century dismissed it as not being poetry. Justify your answer.
2. Discuss section 5 of "Song of Myself." Is it shocking, even today? What gives it its power? Explain your answer.
3. From your knowledge of 19th-century American history, does it seem that the vision Whitman presents of America is an accurate one? Is his depiction more ideal than actual? Why?
4. Some critics complain that Whitman's efforts to merge all persons and things into a single oneness discount the real and important differences between people, such as differences as race, class, and gender. Do you think Whitman's project runs this risk? Why?
5. Read one of Emerson's essays, "Self-Reliance," "The Oversoul," or "The Poet." How is Whitman's vision in "Song of Myself" in accordance with Emerson's?

"Crossing Brooklyn Ferry" (1856)

"Crossing Brooklyn Ferry" is one of Whitman's most powerful and successful poems, one that offers a good introduction to his themes and strategies. Many readers believe that Whitman was most successful in his midlength poems, for these have a coherence in theme, imagery, and rhythmic development that the endlessly unfolding, spontaneous, and fluid "Song of Myself" sometimes lacks. This poem first appeared in the second edition of Leaves of Grass and was one of Thoreau's favorites, along with "Song of Myself."

Here the poet is crossing the ferry of the East River at sundown, moving between New York City and Brooklyn. He leans on the rail above the water, noticing the people on deck, the water and gulls, the ships on the water and at anchor, and the colorful sunset. Awed by the sights and feeling affectionate toward the people on the ferry, he considers the relationship of these persons and things to him and to the Self and the soul. He turns to the reader and affirms that he or she 100 years or more afterward may see these same sights just as he saw them. Out of these observations emerges a meditation on themes of time and eternity, unity and identity, standing still and moving with time, and the relationship between poet and reader. Until the very end, the tone remains uniformly serene and meditative, unlike the ecstasies and barbaric yawps of "Song of Myself." The poem is also one of Whitman's most consistently visual, painterly, and aesthetically nuanced poems.

At the start of the poem, the poet silently and affectionately says to the strangers on the ferry, "How curious you are to me!" (l. 3). And from the passengers, he turns to his readers and says, "It avails not, time nor place—distance avails not, / I am with you, you men and women of a generation, or ever so many generations hence" (ll. 20–21). Speaking directly to the reader, he creates the sense of a living voice, one that will be heard as long as someone opens his book. His words speak across time and space. They also seem uncannily to issue from beyond the grave, being voiced in the past tense: "Just as you feel when you look on the river

He tells how he “look’d at the fine centrifugal spokes of light round the shape of my head in the sunlit water” (l. 33), an image that makes him and everyone haloed, holy, godlike. Having created a voice that unites poet and reader across time and space, he then inquires about the nature of that which separates them. “What is it then between us? / What is the count of the scores of hundreds of years between us? / Whatever it is, it avails not” (ll. 54–56).

In section 6 he draws closer to the reader, acknowledging that he, too, experienced failures, losses, and shame. And in section 7 he says, “Closer yet I approach you, / What thought you have of me now, I had as much of you . . . / I consider’d long and seriously of you before you were born. / . . . / Who knows, for all the distance, but I am as good as looking at you now for all you cannot see me?” (ll. 86–91). With this loving, godlike, ghostly voice, he now asks about the nature of that which connects him to the reader:

What is more subtle than this which ties me to the woman or man that looks in my face?
Which fuses me into you now, and pours my meaning into you?
We understand then do we not?
What I promis’d without mentioning it, have you not accepted?
What the study could not teach—what the preaching could not accomplish is accomplish’d, is it not? (ll. 96–100)

In his preface to the 1855 Leaves, Whitman asserted that the message of the new American poet must be “indirect and not direct” (emphasis added). Here is one of the slyest, boldest instances of his indirection. He never says what it is that ties the woman or man to him, that connects him to the reader, that he promised without mentioning, and that we have accepted. What the study teaches is knowledge. What preaching seeks to accomplish is the listener’s salvation. From section 5 of “Song of Myself” we know that “a kelson of the creation is love” and that the poet at that moment gained a “peace and knowledge that pass all the art and argument of the earth.” The voice here seems to be working to create a relationship with the reader out of which love and knowledge and salvation, of some indefinite kind, will ensue.

Having reached the heart of the matter (without ever actually revealing what it is), in section 9 he returns attention to the ferry in celebratory, even ecstatic tones: “Flow on, river! flow with the flood-tide, and ebb with the ebb-tide!” (l. 101). Then the poem closes with one of Whitman’s most profound meditations. He concludes that all these sights are simply “appearances,” a “necessary film” that “envelop[es] the soul” (l. 121). They are “dumb, beautiful ministers” (l. 126).

We fathom you not—we love you—there is perfection in you also,
You furnish your parts toward eternity, Great or small, you furnish your parts toward the soul. (ll. 130–133)

Thus although Whitman everywhere celebrates the body and the material, physical world, in the final analysis, at least in this poem, these material things are seen to be “appearances” that “envelope,” and furnish their part, to the soul.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss how the ferry works as a symbol in the poem. Consider especially the way the poem takes place at sundown and the ferry passes from one side of the river to the other. Can you think of other symbols in poems or fiction that work in such a varied way?
2. Discuss the relationship between appearances, “the beautiful dumb ministers,” and the soul in the poem.
3. Does Whitman’s depiction of the river and the city fail to take into account the ugly and distasteful aspects of the sights before him? Why does he not include these details?
4. Why is the speaker in this poem so interested in getting closer to the reader? In what ways, if any, does this speaker’s relationship to the reader differ from the relationship the speaker in "Song of Myself" establishes in the opening sections of that poem?

"Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" (1859)

"Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" is one of Whitman's most powerful and moving poems, a poem in which he dramatizes (or imagines) the original moment of his poetic calling. With the title "A Word out of the Sea" the poem appeared in the New York Saturday Press on December 24, 1859, being presented by the magazine as "our Christmas or New Year's present" to its readers. With revisions and a new title, "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" found its permanent placement in the 1881 edition at the beginning of the "Sea Drift" cluster.

The poem opens with the poet as a boy going down to the seashore on Long Island (Paumanok) one evening and listening to the singing of two mockingbirds from Alabama. The he-bird sings carols of love to his she-bird, but soon the she-bird is lost or killed, and the he-bird's song turns to a sorrowful elegy of loss and despair. The boy interprets these sorrowful songs, and the grown poet "translates" them into the poem. From this empathic moment the boy awakens to a realization of all the sorrowful songs sung by "thousands" around the world, and he realizes what he was made for, to give voice to these sorrowful voices. Yet one thing more remains. What is the reason for this world sorrow; how does one make sense of it? The poet turns toward the sea and realizes that the sea, imagined as an old woman rocking her cradle, has been whispering the answer all the while, hissing the one "word final, superior to all": "Death, death, death, death, death."

Formally, the poem is a tour de force, masterfully employing devices from music and opera, such as pattern repetition and echoing, along with Whitman's trademark anaphora and parallelism and a rhythm that employs all of these to a climactic ending on the riveting word death. The opening verse paragraph demonstrates many of these strategies: "Out of the cradle endlessly rocking, / Out of the mocking-bird's throat, the musical shuttle, / Out of the Ninth-month midnight" (ll. 1–3)—a litany of anaphoric phrases that continue through twenty-two lines. The subject of the sentence, I, is suspended until line 20, and the verb of the sentence is withheld until the very end of this single-sentence paragraph, closing line 22 with the bardic verb sing. It is a masterpiece of syntactic suspense carried out in a rhythmically natural voice. Similarly the songs of the mocking-bird, called "arias" in the poem, employ powerful devices of echoing and repetition. Stanza 1 of the joyful song begins, "Shine! shine! shine!" The next stanza begins, "Two together!" Stanza 1 of the sorrowful aria begins, "Blow! blow! blow!" (l. 52), and following stanzas begin: "Soothe! soothe! soothe!" (l. 71); "Loud! loud! loud!" (l. 81); "Land! land! land!" (l. 90). These repetitions prepare the reader for the bird's climactic ending of his song: "Loved! loved! loved! loved! loved!" (l. 127), which in turn prepares the reader for the climactic ending of the poem: "Death, death, death, death, death" (l. 173).

Scholars have interpreted the meaning of this poem in various ways. One reading sees the poem as an assertion that "death is the mother of beauty," as the poet Wallace Stevens wrote in his poem "Sunday Morning." The sea's answer is no answer at all, only a bell tolling the inevitable, universal fact of death, and the inconsolable lover and poet can do nothing but sing, nothing but create art in response to tragedy. Others interpret the poem psychologically. According to Sigmund Freud, an infant in the womb and in early life experiences feelings of "oceanic bliss" in its relation to the mother but inevitably undergoes the loss of this blissful union. According to what Freud called the Oedipal complex the male child must eventually break from the desire to return to the mother and identify with the father to become a functioning adult. Critics who read the poem in this way see the bird's loss as a symbol of Whit-man's loss of his own mother union, or perhaps the loss of a lover (a mother substitute). But here the poet transcends his narcissistic desire for the mother by universalizing his experience through a creative identification with the suffering of others.

Still others emphasize the process of translation itself in the poem, emphasizing that the poet learns how to become a poet, how to translate personal experience into a language available to others. He finds his own voice only by translating the words of another singer, who is himself a mockingbird, imitating others. This endless process of translation becomes the ultimate meaning of the poem. In yet another reading, inflected by Whitman's transcendental or mystical vision, death in the poem is a spiritual, psychological event necessary for a (re)-birth of the poet-prophet that Whitman presents himself to be in poems like "Song of Myself." In this reading the word death then is not tragic, but transforming. Particularly important is the final line, "The sea whisper'd me" (l. 183) not "whispered to me" (emphases added), emphasizing that the self is reborn as the child of the sea, as the sea is a symbol for what Whitman calls the "fluid and swallowing soul."

Each of these interpretations finds evidence in the poem. Understood through the lens of any of these interpretations or others, "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" remains one of the most haunting, powerful poems in the language, a poem that is both an elegiac response to death and an evocative, imaginative recounting of the birth of a poetic life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the setting of the poem. The critic Harold Bloom has written that the seashore, where water and land meet, is the primordial and essential setting for the American poet. Why is this? Can you think of other poems that have this setting?
2. Find and discuss the musical and rhythmic devices Whitman uses in this poem. Consider especially his use of repetition.
3. Read Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach." How do its message and tone compare to those of "Out of the Cradle"?
4. Compare Whitman's treatment of death here with the way he presents it in "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd." Why does Whitman's call death the "word final, superior to all?"
5. "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" presents death as central to the speaker's discovery of his calling to become a poet. EDGAR ALLAN POE also links death to art and the highest aims of poetry. Compare his treatment of death in "The Philosophy of Composition" and "The Raven" with Whitman's.

"From Pent-Up Aching Rivers" (1860)

"From Pent-Up Aching Rivers" first appeared in the third (1860) edition of Leaves of Grass in the "Children of Adam" cluster, a section that celebrates heterosexual sexuality and affection. In the course of celebrating sexuality, this poem as so many of Whitman's, also seeks to court the reader as a lover. It begins with a series of parallel prepositional phrases describing the yearning for, and celebratory "singing" of, the procreative act. The poet emphasizes that human sexual desire is one with the ubiquity of sex in the natural world, and, having found affirmation in nature, he moves into a celebration of the sexual act itself, dramatized in the relations between a swimmer of perfect body and an approaching woman, their exchange leading to "the mystic delira, the madness amorous, the utter abandonment" (l. 26).

Then, in the midst of this verbal celebration of sex, the poet slyly inserts a parenthetical aside to the reader: ("Hark close and still what I now whisper to you, / I love you, O you entirely possess me, / O that you and I escape from the rest and go utterly off, free and lawless / . . .") (ll. 27–29). Whitman frequently makes such gestures to the reader. Through this brilliant conceit, he makes both a private, almost secret, gesture to "you" alone and at the same time a wildly promiscuous gesture to all of his readers. He loves only you, but as “you” can be any reader, his exclusivity is universally available. Such gestures linguistically and rhetorically unite the one and the many, the individual and the national, the particular and the universal.

The poem then changes address again, becoming a first-person account of the speaker in sexual ecstasy and climax. A second parenthetical aside provides a litany of lover's promises all designed to “(O I willingly stake all for you. . . .)” (l. 33). The final section of the poem, lines 37 to 57, offers a catalog of erotic exchanges and sexual “act-poems” (l. 48) out of which the poet's celebratory poem has been born. In the final lines we find the subject and verb of this 57-line sentence: “From the hour of shining stars and dropping dews, / From the night a moment I emerging flitting out, / Celebrate you act divine and you children prepared for, / and you stalwart loins” (ll. 54–57). The poem and its conclusion have been born from the procreative act. By linking children to poems, Whitman expresses his theme of the unity of sexual and creative desires, energies, and progeny. The 55-line buildup to the final climactic completion of the sentence mirrors the sexual act itself, again reaffirming the theme of the union of sexuality and creativity.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider what must have been the effect of this poem on the Victorian age of American history and culture. Which lines would have been the most daring? How do references to “children,” “fatherhood,” and “divine husband” influence the way sexuality is portrayed in the poem?
2. Whitman seems always to be trying to create an intimate relationship with the reader, almost as if he were trying to induce the reader to fall in love with him. Why do you think he is doing this?
3. Do you think sexuality and creativity are psychologically connected, as the poem suggests? Why?
4. Comment on the way Whitman's reference to “swimming” and a “bath” in line 22 makes less shocking his reference to “love-flesh” in line 23.

How does his use of swimming here function as it does in section 11 of “Song of Myself”?

“Here the Frailest Leaves of Me” (1860)

“Here the Frailest Leaves of Me” first appeared in the 1860 Leaves of Grass as the 44th of the 45 poems of the “Calamus” cluster. (See the preceding biographical note for a discussion of the “Calamus” cluster.) Originally the opening read, “Here my last words, and the most baffling,” a line Whitman dropped in 1867.

As one of the poems of the “Calamus” cluster, the “leaves” referred to in the title are the “Calamus” poems, rather than the poems of Leaves of Grass as a whole. The last line of this poem, which states that these poems reveal him “more than all my other poems,” makes this clear. The three-line poem is built on two paradoxes: first, the poet's assertion that his frailest leaves are his strongest; second, his claim that as he hides his thoughts, they expose him. What is the nature of this frailty and strength and this hiding and exposure? As noted, almost all contemporary readers find the “Calamus” poems to express and explore homosexual desire and affection. The tender emotions of the poems suggest their frailness, but their lasting appeal, especially to homosexual readers a century later, attests to their strength. Similarly Whitman's thoughts and desires are hidden in that neither sex nor physical intimacy between men is ever mentioned explicitly in the “Calamus” poems. The poems veil homosexual thoughts and desires but nevertheless reveal them, as demonstrated by the fact that they have been seen by and have rung a responsive cord in homosexual readers since they were written.

Stylistically this short poem succeeds by employing imagery and metaphor common to the “Calamus” cluster—the Calamus “leaves”; the suggestion of “shaded,” secluded places; the theme of exposing and exposure. The final succinct statement of the last line—that these leaves “expose me more than all my other poems”—surprises with its hyperbole and yet reveals an almost listless passivity, as though the poet has lost control of his poems. He confesses, “I myself do not expose [my thoughts].” This passivity is characteristic of many of the “Calamus” poems and shows how far the poet/speaker has traveled from the sunny ecstasies of the first two editions.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read more of the “Calamus” poems in Leaves of Grass. Do you think these poems are about homosexual love? Why or why not?
2. Discuss the tone of this or other poems of the “Calamus” cluster and compare the tone to that of “Song of Myself.” Start by comparing this poem to the opening section of “Song of Myself.”

“Beat! Beat! Drums!” (1861)

“Beat! Beat! Drums!” was written during the first months of the Civil War and appeared in the Boston Daily Evening Transcript (September 24, 1861) and was reprinted in the New York Leader and in Harper’s Weekly Magazine (September 28, 1861). It appeared in Drum Taps in 1865 and was incorporated into the “Drum-Taps” cluster of Leaves of Grass in 1871.

“Beat! Beat! Drums!” is a rallying poem, written as the war began, when Whitman felt that, although it would be tragic, war was the inevitable course of action necessary to save the union from breaking apart. Later he would see the real war on the battlefields and in the hospitals and write poems that have a more chastened, imagistic, elegiac cast, poems that seek to reveal the true horrors of the war.

“Beat! Beat! Drums!” is one of the few poems Whitman wrote in more traditional verse form. It consists of three stanzas of seven lines each, each stanza beginning with the same first line and closing with a line that echoes the closing line of the previous stanza. The poem also uses the parallelism and anaphora common in Whitman’s poetry and, although having a more traditional structure, uses free verse elements as well, employing a varied rhythmic pattern and irregular line length.

The poem is an apostrophe to an imagined parade of martial drums marching through America’s cities and countryside, rousing the people to war, admonishing them to leave their everyday tasks and join the effort, to scatter their congregations, to interrupt scholars at their schools, farmers plowing their fields, bridegrooms on their honeymoons. In the final stanza the poet commands the drums, “Mind not the timid—mind not the weeper or prayer, / Mind not the old man beseeching the young man, / Let not the child’s voice be heard, nor the mother’s entreaties” (ll. 17–19). Some scholars, perhaps reading against the grain, acknowledge the dominant rallying tone of the poem but find hints of ambiguity in the last lines, which voice peaceful pleas against going to war. These readers suggest that the lines could betray Whitman’s own ambivalence about the war. Perhaps these readings try too hard to distance Whitman from the patriotic impulse of hoping for a swift victory over the Southern slave states. One can also read the poem more simply as a patriotic performance by one who had yet to experience the truth of the coming war’s terrible sword.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Do you find it troubling that Whitman steps forward as a champion of the war when it started, after writing “Song of Myself,” in which he seems to embrace Southerners and Northerners equally?
2. Do you agree with the critics’ opinion mentioned earlier that when Whitman refers to the cries of the weeper, and the old man or the child’s and the mother’s entreaties, that he betrays his own ambiguity about his rallying all to war?

“Vigil Strange I Kept on the Field One Night” (1865)

“Vigil Strange I Kept on the Field One Night” first appeared in Drum Taps in 1865 and was later incorporated into the “Drum Taps” cluster of Leaves of Grass. It recounts an incident occurring on a Civil War battlefield where two soldiers advance together and one is killed. As the soldier falls, he and the speaker exchange a final loving glance, yet the speaker must continue onward into battle. He later returns to the scene and buries his fallen comrade.

Disagreement exists about whether the incident happened to Whitman when he visited a battlefield or whether he recreates a scene he had heard about or simply imagined. The nature of the relationship between the two comrades is also ambiguous. The speaker calls the fallen soldier “my son and comrade” (l. 2) and says, “I faithfully loved you and cared for you living” (l. 17), phrases that suggest a father and a son fighting together. The two men could also be an older soldier and younger comrade. In any event, the relationship mirrors the kind of bond that Whitman established with young soldiers in the hospital tents, a loving older man and a younger wounded or dying soldier. The homosocial aspects of this relationship find interpretation in the frequent references to the son as a “son of responding kisses, (never again on earth responding)” (l. 7).

The poem is permeated by a haunting atmosphere and tone, not unlike those of “When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom’d” and “A Sight in Camp in the Daybreak Gray and Dim,” other poems of vigillike contemplation of the dead. The speaker returns to the scene of the fallen boy and long there and then in vigil I stood, dimly around me the battlefield spreading, Vigil wondrous and vigil sweet there in the fragrant silent night,

But not a tear fell, not even a long-drawn sigh, long, long I gazed
Then on the earth partially reclining sat by your side leaning my chin in my hands, Passing sweet hours, immortal and mystic hours with you dearest comrade, not a tear not a word.
Vigil of silence, love and death, vigil of you my son and my soldier. (ll. 9–14)

The serene, mystical scene of this vigil without tears militates against the literal father-son relationship, as the lack of any real anguish is striking. Even for a relationship between comrades or lovers, the serene tone seems out of place. But in Whitman’s poems death is never a tragic event, but a mysterious force giving solace, deliverance, bliss, or leading on to some greater life. In “Song of Myself” he asserts that “the smallest sprout shows there is really no death, / And if ever there was it led forward life” (ll. 126–127). And in “Starting from Paumanok” he writes, “Nothing can happen more beautiful than death” (l. 169). In Whitman’s poetry, death is a mysterious but welcome force that produces only good.

The poem shifts in line 17, and the speaker no longer speaks to his comrade, but now about him. He recounts placing the son and comrade in a “rude-dug grave” as the rising sun bathes the speaker’s head. The shift here distances poet and reader from the fallen soldier at the moment of farewell.

I rose from the chill ground and folded my soldier well in his blanket,
And buried him where he fell. (ll. 25–26)

The abrupt ending at once pays homage to the tragedy of war and death and suggests the soldier’s imperative to march on, rejoin his troops, and continue in the ranks of war.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the relationship between the two soldiers in the poem. Do you think they are father and son, simply comrades, or perhaps also lovers? On what do you base your response?
2. Why is the fallen comrade not remembered as he was in life and mourned for? What is the effect of the strange, haunting, almost serene scene of contemplation of death over the dead comrade? What do you think Whitman is seeking to achieve here?
3. Whitman once said that the real war would never get into the books. Read his prose accounts of the war in “Specimen Days.” Compare them to his war poems. How well did Whitman do in getting the war into his books?

“A March in the Ranks Hard-Prest and the Road Unknown” (1865)

This poem was written during the Civil War, first appeared in Drum-Taps, and was included in the 1871 and 1881 Leaves of Grass in the “Drum-Taps” cluster. The writing of the poem evolved from an account of the battle of White Oaks Church reported to Whitman by a soldier in one of the hospitals he visited.

We enter the scene with the speaker, a soldier, marching at night through the woods as part of the “sullen remnant” of an army defeated in battle and having suffered “loss severe” (l. 3). The soldiers come upon a dimly lit building and discover it to be an old church now converted into a field hospital. Though the soldiers are on the move, the speaker enters the church and sees “a sight beyond all the pictures and poems ever made” (l. 7). Inside the dark church lit by a torch with its “wild red flame and clouds of smoke” (l. 9), the speaker sees wounded soldiers all over the floor in “postures beyond description” (l. 14), a “crowd of bloody forms” (l. 16), “some in the death spasm” (l. 17), the glint of surgeons’ instruments, the smell of ether and blood. He sees a soldier at his feet, “a mere lad, in danger of bleeding to death, (he is shot in the abdomen,) / I stanch the blood temporarily, (the youngster’s face is white as a lily)” (ll. 11–12). Then, as he hears the orders outside, “Fall in, my men, fall in” (l. 21), he bends down to the young man and the youth gives him a half-smile, then closes his eyes, and the speaker speeds “forth to the darkness” (l. 23), “the unknown roads still marching” (l. 25).

In a single sentence spanning 25 lines, Whitman presents this narrative with stark realism and imagism more characteristic of modernist and 20th-century writers than those of the middle of the 19th century. Without rhetorical comment or exposition, the poem creates its effects through direct presentation of details. It is exemplary of the style Whitman adopted in his Civil War poems. The narrative is subordinated to the scene, and the climax is merely a look between two soldiers, yet the poem conveys its emotion successfully making the reader feel a part of the experience.

As in most of Whitman’s war poems, the horrors of war and the terrors of amputation and death are relieved only in the compassion, love, and affection that one human being can have for another. The dying soldier with face as white as a lily in the midst of his agony and fear shares a moment of contact with another soldier. Whitman’s work in the war hospitals gave him the experience necessary to successfully imagine this scene, horrifying to civilians but common to soldiers on battlefields.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Whitman was deeply moved by the death, injury to, and mutilation of youthful soldiers in the war. Explain how he makes us feel a similar sympathy for these youthful soldiers.
2. Research some of the central characteristics of modernist writing of the early 20th century. How does this poem foreshadow the techniques of modernism?
3. Discuss the setting of this poem, a church converted into a makeshift hospital. Notice that it is positioned at a crossroads.

“When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom’d” (1865)

“When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom’d” is an elegy for President Abraham Lincoln, written during the weeks following Lincoln’s assassination on April 14, 1865. Whitman completed the poem along with several others after Drum-Taps had been printed and collected them in Sequel to Drum-Taps, a collection bound with separate pagination in Leaves of Grass in 1867. “Lilacs” was incorporated in the 1871 Leaves and found its final placement in 1881 as the first of four poems in the cluster, “Memories of President Lincoln.”

Whitman, like the Union as a whole, was traumatized by Lincoln's death. He had attended Lincoln's second inauguration and in Specimen Days described him in reverent tones. In many ways Lincoln was the political embodiment of the healer, preserver, and uniter of the nation that Whitman hoped to be as a poet. This elegy is one of Whitman's most powerful poems. Written in 16 relatively short lyrical sections, it develops three central symbols, the evening star, the lilac, and the hermit thrush. For most readers, the evening star represents Lincoln; the lilac, a perennially flowering shrub, represents rebirth and regeneration; and the hermit thrush represents the poet or visionary seer.

The first section sets the scene and presents two of the three main symbols. "When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd, / And the great star early droop'd in the western sky in the night, / I mourn'd, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring" (l. 1–3). Whitman later said that when he heard about Lincoln's death, he was in a place where many lilacs were blooming, and that ever afterward the lilac and its scent reminded him of the tragic event.

The narrative continues by interweaving sections devoted to each symbol. In the "dooryard fronting an old farm-house" (l. 12), the poet stands before a lilac bush and breaks a flowering sprig. A solitary thrush—"thrush of the bleeding throat" (l. 23)—is warbling in the secret recesses of a swamp. Lincoln's coffin travels the states, stopping for crowds to pay homage. Imaginatively as the coffin passes by him, the poet tosses upon it his sprig of lilac. But then in section 7 he moves beyond the immediate occasion and says: "Not for you, for one alone, / Blossoms and branches green to coffins all I bring" (ll. 46–47), moving the poem from a focus on the death of Lincoln into a universal meditation on death and its significance for all. This move away from Lincoln seems appropriate when one remembers what Lincoln was to Whitman—a beacon of brotherhood, democracy, and union.

Whitman's speaker says that he will take seawinds east and west as perfume for the grave and hang pictures of sights of the country on the mausoleum's chamber walls. He turns to the evening star as it "dropt in the night, and was gone" (l. 65), and as the star disappears into a cloud, he "knew death, its thought, and the sacred knowledge of death" (l. 119). Returning then to the swamp, he walks with "the thought of death" holding one of his hands and the "sacred knowledge of death" (l. 121) holding his other. He hears the thrush, the "wondrous singer," singing a carol to death itself. "Come lovely and soothing death, / Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving / . . . / When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sing the dead, / Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee, / Laved in the flood of thy bliss O death / . . . / I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O death" (ll. 135–136, 148–150, 162). He perceives in a vision myriad fallen, broken bodies; battle corpses; and skeletons of young men. And he sees that they are at rest, even though the living suffer on. This vision concluded, he departs from the thrush, the lilac, and the star, yet keeps their memory and meaning "for the sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands—and for his dear sake" (l. 204).

The poem achieves its effects partly by employing traditional conventions of the elegy: It begins with a lament and ends in consolation; nature mourns the fallen one; a funeral procession ensues, and the coffin is covered with flowers. What distinguishes Whitman's elegy is the treatment of death. Here death is not assumed to lead to an afterlife but is itself celebrated. The speaker is "laved in the flood of thy bliss O death"; the carol to death is one of joy. As in "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" and "Song of Myself," this surprising conception of death shows it not to be a fearsome thing. In the context of the war hospitals, Whitman saw death give peace to soldiers in agony, but here death not only gives peace but is ultimately greeted with joy and called blissful. Though Whitman nowhere speaks of any kind of particular afterlife, he speaks everywhere of immortality. Death for him seems to have represented an entry into universal Oneness, the individual merging with the greater Self, ecstatically, as occurs temporarily in section 5 of "Song of Myself." The living suffer on and grieve the loss of the fallen, and so while praising death, the last line of the poem also poignantly mourns the loss of America's greatest president.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Explain the significance and trace in detail the development of one or more of the three central symbols of the poem: the star, the lilac, and the thrush.
2. Since the poem speaks very little about President Lincoln, how does it achieve the poignancy one feels at the end? Compare this strategy to that used in "Vigil Strange."
3. Compare the treatment of death in this poem with that in "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking."
4. Discuss the musical, rhythmical, and other sound devices that contribute to the emotional effect of the poem. Consider particularly the incantatory effects achieved by repetition in sections 2, 6, and 8.

"As I Lay with My Head in Your Lap Camerado" (1865–1866)

"As I Lay with My Head in Your Lap Camerado" first appeared in Sequel to Drum-Taps (1865–66) and found its final home in the "Drum-Taps" cluster in the 1881 Leaves. The title displays Whitman's cleverness, playing on the fact that a reader may have the book in his or her lap. Whitman frequently asserts the identity of book and author, and he would like nothing better than to have his head in your lap.

Appearing in the "Drum Taps" cluster, the camerado is probably a soldier, and though the war is over, the camerado is urged to continue onward with the poet "without the least idea what is our destination" or whether they will "be victorious" (ll. 10–11). He warns that he is "restless and make[s] others so," echoing the words of Christ: "Do not think that I came to bring peace on the earth; I did not come to bring peace, but a sword" (Matthew 10:34). Whitman as prophet and teacher also brings strife: "I know my words are weapons full of danger, full of death, / For I confront peace, security, and all the settled laws, to unsettle them" (ll. 3–4). He will "unsettle laws" just as at the outset of "Song of Myself" he counseled that we must hold "creeds and schools in abeyance," for Whitman must speak as "nature without check with original energy" (ll. 10–13).

Refusing to end his journey, he confesses he has failed to achieve the mark of the "greatest poet" prophesied in the 1855 preface, that his country would absorb him as affectionately as he had absorbed it. Nevertheless, he says, "I am more resolute because all have denied me than I could ever have been had all accepted me" (l. 6). Neither heaven nor hell now shall stop him.

Some readers identify the unspecified character of this onward march to be the struggle to achieve a perfect union after the close of the war. Others find it the homosexual realization of "adhesiveness," the manly affection of "Calamus." Still others find it the calling of a prophet and spiritual teacher. Whitman's withholding of the exact character of the journey is characteristic of his poetic theory of "indirection" discussed earlier. Thus, whether urging his comrade on toward a more perfect union, an Arcadia of manly affections, or an endless spiritual journey, the final aim of the poem remains the reaffirmation of the intimate relationship between poet and reader, the book/head of the poet now happily in the reader's lap.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What do you think is the goal of the onward march to which Whitman calls the reader? What kind of teacher or leader is Whitman?
2. Why does Whitman say that he comes to bring not peace but strife, danger, and death? And why does he echo the words of Jesus in the Bible?

"Reconciliation" (1865–1866)

"Reconciliation" is one of Whitman's most powerful, imagistic lyrics about the Civil War. First published in Sequel to Drum-Taps, it was later incorporated in the “Drum-Taps” cluster of Leaves of Grass. The six-line poem is composed of a single periodic sentence, moving from abstraction to a dramatic scene that acts as metonymy for a reconciliation between North and South. The first three lines present a meditation on the word reconciliation. It is a “word over all, beautiful as the sky,” since the war is over and “the sisters Death and Night incessantly softly wash again, and ever again, this soil’d world” (ll. 1–3). As in many others of Whitman’s poems, death is a healing, soothing, regenerative force.

After this abstract meditation, the poem telescopes to a poignant moment in which a Union soldier looks upon a dead Confederate soldier in his coffin, leans over, and lightly kisses him. “For my enemy is dead, a man divine as myself is dead, / I look where he lies white-faced in his coffin—I draw near, / Bend down and touch lightly with my lips the white face in the coffin” (ll. 4–6). Here with remarkable understatement and reserve, the poet presents a moving scene and touching gesture without authorial comment or interpretation. The poet does not need to explain the image or gesture. After the prewar poetry of epic ambitions, proliferating catalogs, and barbaric yawps, Whitman’s war poetry moved ever toward the understated, unflinching, almost chastened presentations of images and scenes that work upon the reader not through rhetoric but through the powerful presentation of resonant visual detail. This is justly one of Whitman’s most famous shorter poems and one that foreshadows the work of more modern poets and writers.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss all the ways, in theme and technique, that this poem achieves its powerful effect in so few lines.
2. Why does Whitman use the image of a dead Confederate soldier? Would there not be a better “reconciliation” if the encounter were with a living Confederate soldier? What would the effect have been on the poem?
3. Explain how the inclusion of this poem in the same cluster that includes “Beat! Beat! Drums!” near the beginning contributes to the sense that the speaker’s view of the Civil War changes with the passage of time. How might this poem act as a criticism of the position expressed in the earlier poem?

“When I Heard the Learn’d Astronomer” (1865)

“When I Heard the Learn’d Astronomer” is one of Whitman’s best known and most often anthologized shorter poems. First appearing in Drum Taps, it was incorporated in Leaves of Grass in 1876 and found its placement in the cluster “By the Roadside” in the final editions. The poem consists of eight lines arranged in a loose, sonnetlike structure. The first four lines recount a lecture by an astronomer.

When I heard the learn’d astronomer,
When the proofs, the figures, were ranged in columns before me,
When I was shown the charts and diagrams, to add, divide, and measure them,
When I sitting heard the astronomer where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-room . . .

Gradually growing in length, the lines accumulate a disorienting array of facts, figures, and diagrams and note the applause the astronomer receives. But the speaker does not applaud.

How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick,
Till rising and gliding out I wander’d off by myself,
In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time,
Look’d up in perfect silence at the stars.

The poet goes out to experience the stars firsthand, and we witness a moment of awe before the mystery of nature presented with great understatement. After the expanding lines that depicted the lecture, these final lines become shorter and end in silence. Whitman's speaker does not tell us what he is feeling; he presents the moment, and we recall such moments in our own lives.

The sentiment echoes Emerson's admonition that we must find our own "original relation to the universe." The negative view of science presented in the poem was common in the literature of 19th-century romanticism, a mistrust of scientific rationalism that through logic and cold analysis breaks the world into pieces while remaining blind to its wonder, beauty, and mystery. William Wordsworth wrote, "We murder to dissect." For Whitman and other romantics, it is not through abstract reasoning that we find meaning and satisfaction in the universe but through a direct, personal, intuitive, emotional encounter.

Paradoxically in other poems Whitman celebrates science and progress. And though he was at home with contradiction in his poetry, we can reconcile his general embrace of science with this mistrust of a worldview corrupted by scientific rationalism by recalling lines the critic Ed Folsom has quoted from "Song of Myself": "Hurrah for positive science! / Your facts are useful, and yet they are not my dwelling, / I but enter by them to an area of my dwelling." His dwelling is that place where one stands in awe before the sublimity of the stars.

For Discussion or Writing

1. As in "Reconciliation," this poem moves from the abstract to the concrete and particular. Discuss the effect on you as a reader of abstraction versus concreteness and the combination of the two in a poem like this one.
2. Discuss the effect of Whitman's understatement in the final line. Why is understatement often stronger than overstatement in literature?

"Passage to India" (1871)

The last major work of Whitman's career, "Passage to India" first appeared as the title piece to a volume of poems published in 1871 and was first incorporated in the 1881 Leaves. According to a footnote in the 1876 preface, "Passage to India" was intended to herald a new project and new volume that would sing the "the unseen Soul" as Leaves of Grass had sung "the Body and Existence." "Passage to India, and its cluster, are but freer vent and fuller expression to what, from the first, and so throughout, more or less lurks in my writings, underneath every page, every line, everywhere." To Horace Traubel Whitman said, "There's more of me, the essential ultimate me, in that than in any of the poems. There is no philosophy . . . in that poem . . . but the burden of it is evolution . . . the unfolding of cosmic purposes" (Traubel 1:156–157).

"Passage to India" begins by celebrating three technological achievements of 1866 and 1869, which joined distant parts of the world: the completion of the Suez Canal, the laying of the transatlantic cable, and the completion of the American transcontinental railroad. Whitman perceived these technological linkages of distant peoples and places as a symbol and mark of a coming spiritual brotherhood throughout the world. He acknowledges the achievements of the past, the fables, myths, and wonders of Asia and Africa and the Mediterranean as harbingers of these greater wonders ahead. In them he finds "God's purpose from the first . . . / the earth to be spann'd, connected by network, / The races, neighbors, to marry and be given in marriage" (ll. 31–33).

The poem then telescopes to a detailed description of the completion of the Suez Canal and the transcontinental railroad, as Whitman places himself in the scenes, witnessing the events. In sections 4 and 5 he asserts that the history of the world has a purpose, which has sometimes lain hidden and sometimes heroically marched forward embodied by discoverers and voyagers. In section 5 he admits that the impulse of this march has often been a feverish restlessness in the human race, a frustrated yearning and unsatisfied want in the soul. But he announces that there will be one who shall come to soothe "these feverish children." This healer shall be the poet, “the true son of God,” who shall join race to race, human to human, and nature to humanity (ll. 104–105, 115).

Section 6 then reviews the entire history of the human race and notes again how the “seed,” the hidden purpose, has lain buried and in “God’s due occasion” shall sprout and bloom (ll. 162–163). Then in section 7 the poet turns to address his soul, and the poem shifts from the physical to the transcendental: “O soul, repressless, I with thee and thou with me, / Thy circumnavigation of the world begin” (ll. 169–170). The poet and his Soul launch forth, no longer merely circumnavigating the world, but now sailing out onto the ecstatic seas of God, until they find the “Comrade perfect.”

Reckoning head, O soul, when thou, the time
 achiev’d,
 The seas all cross’d, weather’d the capes, the voyage done,
 Surrounded, copest, frontest God, yieldest, the aim attain’d,
 As fill’d with friendship, love complete, the Elder Brother found
 The Younger melts in fondness in his arms. (ll.
 219–223)

Note how this language parallels that of section 45 of “Song of Myself.” Section 9, the concluding section, is an ecstatic call of the soul to launch ever forth onto those unknown, endless seas: “Are they not all the seas of God? / O farther, farther, farther sail!” (ll. 254–255).

One of the remarkable aspects of “Passage to India” is the way the technological wonders Whitman celebrates reflect the international origins of his spiritual vision. The circling of the globe connected America to India, West to East, present to ancient past—Columbus’s dream on the material level. This connection serves as a perfect vehicle for Whitman’s cosmic vision of a universe permeated by a universal soul or self, into which the individual soul launches forth to “fillest, swellest full the vastness of Space” to become united with the transcen-denal. This religious vision originated in, or at a minimum mirrors, the cosmology of Hinduism, the religion of India. Thus, as the technological accomplishments celebrated returned the Western world to its ancient Eastern roots, so Whitman’s spiritual vision found its roots in India, the very continent Columbus had sought to reach in his own setting out.

Surprisingly in spite of Whitman’s own comments on the poem noted earlier, comments that place the poem centrally in his work, many critics, perhaps uneasy with the poem’s religious elements, have downplayed its importance and achievement. Some have found the poem too abstract, lacking the physicality and particularity of Whitman’s early poems, even of those with a transcendental theme, such as “Crossing Brooklyn Ferry.” Others bemoan the lack of Whitman’s trademark gestures of intimacy with the reader. These are legitimate complaints. Then on a political level some have lamented the poem’s celebration of industrialized capitalism and nascent American globalization, while others have found the poem’s embrace of transcendental values to be a rejection of the materialist features of that globalization and the culture of America’s Gilded Age. But to those philosophically and spiritually receptive to its message, “Passage to India” remains an ecstatic hymn of transcendental vision unmatched in American poetry.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Unlike many of his critics, Whitman considered this one of his most important poems. Do you find the poem successful in your reading experience? Explain why or why not.
2. Most readers of previous generations of Americans had a positive image of Columbus as a great explorer and discoverer. Today many see him in a more compromised light. How do you think this changed perception of Columbus affects the reading of the poem today?
3. Compare and contrast the representations of science in this poem with those in “When I Heard the Learn’d Astronomer.”

body across his writing. Why is this theme so prominent? What does his understanding of the body allow him to say about other themes?

6. Whitman believed that the artist, and the poet particularly, had an important public role to play. What did he believe the purpose of art was? What was the proper public role of the poet?
7. Whitman often employs grass as a symbol, as in "Song of Myself." However, grass is not the only natural image Whitman uses; think of the birds that appear in "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry" and "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" and the many descriptions of bodies of water, especially when the poet is contemplating death and immortality. Examine Whitman's use of nature imagery in his poetry.

HARRIET E. WILSON (1825–1900)

She felt herself capable of elevation; she felt that this book information supplied an undefined dissatisfaction she had long felt, but could not express.

(Our Nig)

After years as a servant, seamstress, and indigent dependent on public assistance, Harriet E. Wilson turned to writing as “some experiment” aimed at “maintaining myself and my child” (Wilson 3). Using her own meager funds to publish Our Nig in 1859, Wilson hoped that revenue from the book’s sale would help improve her financial condition. As a fund-raising effort, Our Nig failed to earn enough money for her to care for her sickly son, who died within months of the book’s publication. But the text that began as Wilson’s dire “experiment” resulted in a new form of literary expression among black women: Harriet Wilson became the first African-American woman to publish an autobiographical novel.

The details of Wilson’s early life, which she used as the basis of Our Nig, are, in the estimation of one 19th-century reader, “stranger than fiction” (Wilson 73). Born March 15, 1825, in Milford, New Hampshire, Wilson was the daughter of Joshua Green, a black cooper, and his wife, Margaret, a white washerwoman who married Green after being seduced and abandoned by another suitor. Though interracial unions were socially taboo—and legally prohibited in some parts of the United States well into the 20th century—the couple wed in New Hampshire and probably had two children. Little is known about the unnamed sibling Wilson depicts in Our Nig. After her husband died, Wilson’s mother attempted to lessen her responsibilities by leaving Harriet with a nearby family. She never returned to reclaim her daughter.

For 12 years young Harriet lived as an indentured servant in the household of Nehemiah and Rebecca Hayward, prominent Milford residents who owned a sizable homestead. As practiced throughout the North, the arrangement of indentured servitude bound orphans and poor children to work for a sponsoring family in exchange for room and board. Though servants sometimes were treated almost as members of the family they served, Wilson was subjected to continual physical and mental abuse aimed at reinforcing her subjection to her white employers. At the hands of Rebecca Hayward and her daughter, also named Rebecca, Wilson was so overworked and underfed that she suffered recurrent exhaustion and sickness. Ironically Mrs. Hayward was related to the famed Hutchinson Family Singers, a Milford quartet who toured the United States in the 1840s and 1850s to protest slavery (White xxvi). Unfortunately her cousins’ songs of freedom seemed to have had little influence on Rebecca Hayward’s treatment of her young biracial servant.

Despite harsh living conditions and her mistress’s hostility, Wilson developed enduring relationships with other members of the family, some of whom encouraged her to go to school, read the Bible, and attend the local church. As the only student of color in her class, Wilson went to public school three months of the year—the minimum time that host families were expected to provide schooling for their bound servants (Dudden 21). After three years Rebecca Hayward resentfully withdrew Wilson from classes. Yet Wilson informally continued her educational and religious instruction with the help of Sally Hayward Blanchard, Nehemiah Hayward's widowed sister, who shared the house with the family, and George Hayward, one of the family's adult sons. As Wilson would describe in Our Nig, she was deeply grieved when George passed away in April 1840. His death was one in a series of disturbing events that left Wilson isolated during her youth and young adulthood.

Wilson remained with the Haywards until she was 18, the legal age at which bound servants usually dissolved their relationships with their employers. The years after her release were physically, emotionally, and financially difficult for her. She attempted to support herself by working for other families in the Milford area, but her frequent illnesses often left her bedridden, unemployed, and, finally, dependent on the aid of local residents.

After regaining her health, Wilson moved to Ware, Massachusetts, in fall 1850 to sew for a living. Her new friends in Massachusetts read the Bible and shared works of literature and history with her. Perhaps it was during this period that Wilson gained exposure to the kinds of literary works to which she later would allude in her own writing. The epigraphs that appear in Our Nig suggest that Wilson was well acquainted with classical fiction, Scripture, and popular 19th-century British and American poetry.

In October 1851 she wed Thomas Wilson, an African-American antislavery lecturer who claimed to be a fugitive slave. As she discovered after their marriage, however, her new husband never had been enslaved: He merely posed for “hungry abolitionists” who were eager to hear former slaves’ first-person accounts (Wilson 71). Within months of her marriage, Wilson was again in financial trouble, as her husband proved an unstable provider who often left his wife to fend for herself. A poem published in Milford's local newspaper, the Farmer's Cabinet, seems to express Wilson's pitiable condition. In the poem “Fading Away,” attributed to “Hattie”—the name by which Harriet Wilson was known for much of her adult life—the speaker attests to being in such poor health and emotional deterioration that she expects to die (Foreman xxiii). Appearing on December 6, 1851, the poem probably corresponds to the period of Wilson's pregnancy. During her husband's absence, she delivered her son, George Mason Wilson, in mid-1852 while living on a farm maintained for the homeless, just outside Milford.

After her husband died in 1853, Wilson was left as a single parent in a predicament similar to her own mother's. But rather than abandon her child, as her mother had, Wilson attempted to provide for her son by working as a seamstress, relying on charity, and selling hair care products. Finally, Wilson determined to write and sell a book that would allow her to capitalize on her traumatic life experiences: Our Nig; or, Sketches of a Free Black, in a Two-Story White House, North. Showing That Slavery's Shadows Fall Even There.

Published in 1859, Our Nig appeared at the end of a decade of prolific production among black authors in the United States. African Americans had been penning poetry, essays, and autobiographies since the 18th century, but black fiction first flourished in the mid-19th century. In 1853 William Wells Brown's Clotel, or the President's Daughter became the first novel by an African American; Martin Delany, FREDERICK DOUGLASS, and Frank J. Webb all published novels within the next six years after Brown. In 1859, the year that Wilson's novel saw print, FRANCES ELLEN WATKINS HARPER's “The Two Offers” became one of the first black-authored short stories. It is unclear whether Wilson realized how her autobiographical novel fit among other African-American literary “firsts” during the decade. But her preface does address Our Nig to “my colored brethren universally,” suggesting that she may have expected a black readership, especially among abolitionist circles. Wilson's novel seems not to have gained a large circulation, however, perhaps in part because many American readers were more engrossed with debates over slavery than they were with the concerns of freeborn blacks.

Because of the dearth of information about Wilson, scholars long believed that she died in the 1860s, shortly after her book was published. However, recent research reveals that a few years after her seven-year-old son died in Milford in 1860, Wilson relocated to Boston, where she thrived as part of the growing spiritualist movement in the Northeast. Spiritualists believed in communicating with the dead through mesmerism, séances, and spiritual mediums. Practiced by a number of intellectuals and activists, spiritualism often challenged the American social order by promoting medical reform, women's rights, egalitarian marriages, and abolition (Carroll 4). Given her previous disappointments with her health, marriage, and racist treatment, Wilson may have been attracted to the spiritualist community because of its progressive beliefs. By 1867 Wilson was advertising her services as a spiritualist medium and lecturing throughout the Northeast and Midwest. Wilson married for a second time in 1870, making a short-lived match with John Gallatin Robinson, a young white man she met through their religious and professional affiliation. Often called "Dr. Hattie E. Wilson" by her listeners and clients, Wilson lived most of the rest of her life in Boston, where she found a welcoming community that shared with her the affection and respect she had lacked in her early life.

During the last three decades of her life, Wilson's status as a famed spiritualist eclipsed her role as an author. The Banner of Light, a spiritualist newspaper that regularly heralded Wilson as the famed "colored medium," makes no mention of Our Nig. She seems not to have returned to writing after publishing her single book. She did, however, lecture on the themes and social concerns, such as labor issues and child welfare, that she had raised previously in her autobiographical novel (Foreman xii). Wilson continued to appear at religious meetings well into her seventies. She was 75 when she died on June 28, 1900; she is buried in Quincy, Massachusetts.

For over a century, both Harriet E. Wilson and Our Nig remained obscure names in American literary history. Early 20th-century critics who noticed Our Nig at all conjectured that its author, listed on the copyright as "Mrs. H. E. Wilson," was white. Only in the 1980s did the scholar Henry Louis Gates, Jr., verify Wilson's racial identity and confirm that she was one of the earliest African-American female autobiographical novelists. Wilson and her text have resurfaced to a welcoming revival, due in part to the increasing study of 19th-century American women's writing. Addressing issues of labor, class, single parenthood, Northern racism, and spiritual resilience, Wilson's work is an important contribution to 19th-century American prose.

Our Nig* (1859)

Set in antebellum New England, Our Nig follows young Alfrado from childhood to adulthood, chronicling her struggles to attain self-consciousness, faith, and economic stability. Orphaned after her father dies and her mother abandons her, Frado lives as a servant in the Belmont household, where she is abused and exploited by the tyrannical mistress of the house, "Mrs. B.," and her daughter, Mary. Beyond her physical and financial hardships, Frado's greatest challenge is to resist thinking of herself as "our nig," the racial slur by which her employers and other prejudiced whites refer to her. Frado eventually leaves the Bellmonts and has a family of her own. At the novel's end, Frado, now a widowed mother, struggles to provide for herself and her child. The novel offers a bittersweet portrait of her emotional resilience, as well as a biting critique of the poverty and racism that nearly, but never entirely, break her resolve to improve her condition.

The plot and themes of Our Nig draw from a number of popular 19th-century literary genres, including the seduction tale, spiritual autobiography, slave narrative, and coming-of-age tale. Before proceeding with Frado's story, the first two chapters introduce her mother, "lonely Mag Smith," as an impoverished white woman whose unwed pregnancy and subsequent taboo relationships with black men lead her “down the ladder of infamy.” Because discussions of sexuality may have offended antebellum audiences, Wilson uses the coded language characteristic of seduction plots to describe Mag’s first sexual encounter:

She knew the voice of her charmer, so ravishing, sounded far above her. It seems like an angel’s, alluring her upward and onward. She thought she could ascend to him and become an equal. She surrendered to him a priceless gem, which he proudly garnered as a trophy, with those of other victims, and left her to her fate.

The text describes Mag’s virginity as a “gem,” omitting words such as sex and pregnant.

Wilson also incorporates another trait of seduction and sentimental literature: a direct address to the reader, as though he or she is present and viewing the story’s action. Despite Mag’s “ruin” and “disgrace,” the narrator appeals to the audience to empathize with the character’s vulnerabilities. “See [Mag] as she walks with downcast eyes and heavy heart,” the narrator directs. Ostracized by the white community because of her sin, Mag “was seldom seen except as upon your introduction, gentle reader.” Wilson uses the form of direct address both to elicit sympathy and to reprove readers for any lingering class and racial prejudices they may hold. When Mag later reluctantly marries Jim, a “kind-hearted African” who overlooks her sexual past and offers to provide her a better life, the narrator warns the “gentle reader” not to object to the interracial marriage:

You can philosophize, gentle reader, upon the impropriety of such unions, and preach dozens of sermons on the evils of amalgamation. Want is a more powerful philosopher and preacher. Poor Mag.

Unlike her first relationship, Mag’s relationship with Jim is presented not as a seduction, but as an economic necessity for the young woman. When Jim dies, Mag accepts a new lover, Seth Shipley, and the couple lives together without being legally married. Mag and Seth later dispose of her children by first abandoning Frado at the “two-story white house, North,” where the novel’s central action takes place.

Frado’s experiences at the Belmont home challenge many of the conventional ideas of home as a safe, loving environment, free of the cruelties of the outer world. Contrary to the 19th-century ideal of white women as angels in the house who offer comfort and moral direction to their families, Mrs. B. is a sharp-tongued “she-devil” who manipulates her family and her servants; her temper and merciless demands drive more than one of her employees to quit. But Mrs. B. is especially hard on Frado because the girl is biracial, young, and alone—essentially defenseless. No one, including Mr. Belmont or the couple’s adult children, has the fortitude to stand up to Mrs. B. and ultimately end her torture. Frado is confined to the uncomfortable “L chamber” to sleep, ordered to do more work than physically possible for her size, and punished with “words that burn,” and frequent blows on her head.” At one point Mrs. B. also cuts off Frado’s hair to lower the girl’s self-esteem about her physical appearance. Meanwhile, the author marks off the years of Frado’s childhood by highlighting the deaths, marriages, and family visits that occur during her 12 years of service. As witness to the Bellmonts’ major life events, Frado is reminded repeatedly that while she is part of the household, she is excluded from the family.

Frado begins to associate her torment with her blackness and thus despise her racial identity. When she seems most vulnerable to internalizing Mrs. B.’s hatred of her, she attempts to find hope and self-worth through religion. By highlighting how faith empowers Frado to cope with her unfavorable living conditions, Our Nig resembles 18th- and 19th-century spiritual autobiographies—a popular genre in which narrators explained how they overcame their hesitations and obstacles to accept Christianity and spread the Gospel. One characteristic of the typical spiritual autobiography is the narrator's intense awareness of sin. Narrators often recounted the physical and emotional torment they experienced before they were assured of their salvation. In Our Nig Frado becomes more anxious, weepy, and frail while she is contemplating repentance. The Bellmonts note that she is "particularly engaged in reading the Bible; and this strengthened her conviction that a heavenly Messenger was striving with her." James Bellmont, a grown son who becomes ill during his visit to the family homestead, befriends Frado and shares his faith with her before he dies. Frado strives to accept the religion that James, Aunt Abby, and other kind Bellmonts practice. But she is repulsed by Mrs. B., who insists that salvation and heaven are exclusively for whites. Frado's decision to continue studying the Bible and attending church meetings directly defies Mrs. B.'s wishes. The young woman's increasing spirituality, which culminates in her public declaration of faith at a local church, seems to empower her to withstand her mistress.

The climax of the novel occurs when teenaged Frado demonstrates her growing confidence by resisting Mrs. B.'s physical attacks. When her mistress attempts to hit her with a piece of wood, Frado shouts, "Stop . . . strike me, and I'll never work a mite more for you." Mrs. B. stops, remembering that Frado's unpaid work as "man, boy, housekeeper, domestic, etc." saves the Bellmonts incalculable expenses. Frado realizes the value of her bodily labor, as well as her spiritual worth and humanity, and begins to act as "one who feels the stirring of free and independent thoughts." The scene recalls a moment in Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, in which Douglass refused to be beaten by the slave breaker, Mr. Covey. After his physical resistance, Douglass declared that though he might "remain a slave in form," he mentally refused to accept his subjection to whites by being "a slave in fact." As does Douglass, Frado does not assert her freedom by immediately leaving her place of work. She continues to work for the family until she turns 18, but after she threatens Mrs. B., Frado avoids being beaten and determines to "assert her rights when they were trampled on."

Frado is a free person of color in the North, but Our Nig repeatedly draws on the tradition of American slave narratives, such as Douglass's. Slavery lingers as a metaphor and a literal threat to Frado. Mrs. B. is "wholly imbued with southern principles," and her abuse of Frado in the book's early chapters recalls the brutal whippings described in tales of slavery. Frado's servitude also may be likened to enslavement with respect to the humiliation, physical deprivation, and social restrictions imposed on her. That Frado experiences such prejudice despite being legally free questions the assumption that the antebellum North was considerably more liberal and racially tolerant than the South. As the book's subtitle announces, "slavery's shadows fall even there" in the North. When Frado later travels as an adult in search of work, she is especially aware of the threat of being enslaved. "Watched by kidnappers, maltreated by professed abolitionists," she risks being mistaken for a fugitive slave and captured under the provisions of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, which declared that runaway slaves in the North could be returned to Southern bondage. By focusing on Frado's Northern experiences while paralleling them to enslavement, Our Nig exposes the complicity of white abolitionists who objected to slavery but who overlooked more immediate injustices against blacks in the North.

After leaving the Bellmonts, Frado strives to make a living, but her poor health and a failed marriage compound her economic difficulties. Significantly the novel does not portray marriage as a romantic escape or a means to upward mobility. In this regard Wilson undermines the pattern of much mid-19th-century American fiction by women. Women's fiction sometimes featured poor or working-class female characters to show how young women who practiced self-control and kindness were rewarded with domestic and economic fulfillment. In Maria Cummins's The Lamplighter (1854)—the runaway best seller that spurred NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE's epithet against the "damned mob of scribbling women" whose works sold much better than his—the white female protagonist, Gerty, begins as an eight-year-old shoeless street urchin. Yet she piously triumphs over setbacks, often with the help of generous friends. Gerty inevitably gains a comfortable home and an adoring husband in the novel's happy ending. By contrast, Frado's marriage and motherhood leave her brokenhearted and financially burdened. Motivated by “the presence of love—that arbitrary and inexorable tyrant,” Frado marries Samuel, one of the first black men she meets; because he presents himself as a kindly former slave, they seem to share a history of suffering that unites them. Frado later learns that Samuel was never a slave; he fooled antislavery supporters, presumably to gain their charity. Samuel deserts Frado and dies, leaving her to care for their son. At the conclusion of the novel, Frado seeks emotional and financial support from friends. She resolves that “nothing turns her from her steadfast purpose of elevating herself.”

Our Nig is ultimately a classic coming-of-age tale. It describes the young protagonist's first encounters with harsh reality, her feelings of adolescent doubt, her growing sense of independence, her first romance, and her grown-up determination to make a way for herself. Though Frado remains hopeful, critics have noted that the cumulative tale of her disappointments ironically questions whether a strong work ethic really yields safety and satisfaction, especially for people of color and single mothers in the 19th century.

The novel's concluding paragraphs and its appendix invited the original readers to respond by offering Harriet Wilson monetary support. As a first-time author and an African-American woman writer, Wilson thought that her story had to be verified in order to gain her readers' trust. The appended letters from sponsors thus serve to establish that Our Nig as believable and affirm Wilson as a deserving recipient of readers' patronage. In this way, Wilson reminds readers that the story of the third-person Frado merges with the author's own life and need.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the author's characterization of Mrs. B. What details of Mrs. B's appearance, actions, or speech reveal the most about her? How do other characters' impressions of Mrs. B. influence what you think of her?
2. Discuss two episodes in Frado's life that greatly impact her feelings of self-worth. Which aspect of her personality emerges most forcefully in each episode? See whether you can explain Wilson's rationale for ordering these episodes in the manner she does.
3. Using a credible online search engine or literary anthology, find out more about Thomas Moore, Lord Byron, or some of the other poets whose excerpted works appear at the beginning of each chapter in Our Nig. How do the poetic epigraphs foreshadow and enhance the action in Wilson's novel?
4. Compare the ending of Wilson's Our Nig with the ending of HARRIET ANN JACOBS's Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl. Why do you think both works close with free African-American women who face the world as mothers without husbands? Consider the ways in which each narrative makes use of the seduction plot and refuses to accept a sentimental solution to the challenges that confront African-American women.
5. Discuss the way Wilson's presentation of religious conversion is both similar to and different from the description of religion given by Frederick Douglass in Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave. Do you think that Frado has attained the same level of spiritual authority that Frederick has by the end of his narrative?
6. In her novel Ruth Hall, FANNY FERN (Sarah Willis Parton) also structures the story around her life and presents her protagonist, Ruth, as a mother who must raise her children on her own and struggle to make a place for herself in the world. To what extent do you see the same model for female achievement at work in Wilson's novel? Do you think that Ruth is happier

Chronological List of Writers Included in All Volumes of the Student's Encyclopedia of Great American Writers

Note that authors are placed in the volume that covers the period during which they published their most important works. Some authors published their works relatively early or relatively late in their lives. This explains why, for example, certain authors placed in volume 3 were actually born before certain authors placed in volume 2.

SERIES PREFACE

The Student's Encyclopedia of Great American Writers is a unique reference intended to help high school students meet standards for literature education and prepare themselves for literature study in college. It offers extensive entries on important authors, as well as providing additional interpretive helps for students and their teachers. The set has been designed and written in the context of the national standards for English language arts, created by the National Council of Teachers of English and the International Reading Association, the two professional organizations that have the most at stake in high school language arts education (see <http://www.ncte.org/standards>).

The volume editors and many of the contributors to this set not only are university scholars but also have experience in secondary school literature education, ranging from working as readers of Advanced Placement examinations, to developing high school literature curricula, to having taught in high school English classrooms. Although the volume editors all have extensive experience as scholars and university professors, they all have strong roots in high school education and have drawn on their experience to ensure that entries are stylistically appealing and contain the necessary content for students.

The set's five volumes are organized chronologically, as many literature textbooks and anthologies are. This system is convenient for students and also facilitates cross-disciplinary study, increasingly common in high schools. For example, a section on the Civil War in history class might be accompanied by the study of Walt Whitman and Stephen Crane in English class. To help students find what they need, each volume contains two lists of all the authors included in the set: one organized chronologically and the other alphabetically.

Within each volume, authors are presented alphabetically. Each author entry contains a biography and then subentries on the author's major works. After each subentry on a work is a set of questions for discussion and/or writing. Another set of broader discussion questions appears near the end of each author entry, followed by a bibliography. The entire five-volume set therefore contains more than 1000 discussion questions. These questions make up perhaps the most important and useful features of the set, encouraging further creative thought and helping students get started on their own writing. Many of the questions reference not only the subject literary work or author but also related works and authors, thus helping students to make additional literary connections, as emphasized by the literature standards.

The authors and works included in the set were selected primarily from among those most popular in the high school classrooms—that is, those often featured in secondary-school literary anthologies and textbooks; those often appearing on age-appropriate reading lists; and those most often searched for in Facts On File's online literary database Bloom's Literature Online, used primarily in high schools. In addition, we have endeavored to include a range of writers from different backgrounds in all periods, as well as writers who, though not perhaps among the very most popular today, appear to have been unjustly neglected and are gaining in popularity. No selection could be perfect, and those writers favored by scholars and critics are not always as popular in the high school classroom, but the general editor and volumes editors have attempted to make the set's coverage as useful to students as possible.

Above all, we hope that this set serves not only to instruct but also to inspire students with the love of literature shared by all the editors and contributors who worked on this set.

VOLUME INTRODUCTION

The period from 1900 to 1945 is perhaps the most important era in American literature, at least in terms of demonstrable impact and lasting influence. This period coincided with an unparalleled rise in American economic and military power. The United States, with a rapidly growing population drawn from all over the world, had at last become an undeniably significant player on the international stage. By the beginning of the 20th century, the United States was increasingly becoming a recognized center of innovation and progress in science, industry, technology, and medicine, and its democratic political system and constantly expanding economy held an enormous appeal to countless immigrants from around the globe. Millions of people were “voting with their feet”—choosing to leave the lands of their birth in order to take up residence in the so-called New World, which still seemed rich with the promise of economic prosperity and individual freedom.

Meanwhile, the horrific devastation wrought by World War I (1914–18), combined with the Russian Revolution of 1917, left Europe weaker, poorer, and more divided than ever. The United States, on the other hand, seemed increasingly rich and powerful. Until the early 1940s it faced no obvious military threats, and its own mostly minor military adventures had tended to be successful. The Great Depression of the 1930s struck a huge blow to American self-confidence, but that depression was a worldwide phenomenon that afflicted many other countries even more severely than it did the United States. Even during this dark time, the United States was able to avoid sliding into the kind of dictatorial tyranny that had been imposed in such countries as Russia, Italy, Germany, and Japan. When World War II concluded, much of Europe lay in ruins. By 1945, the two most obvious “superpowers” were the United States and the Soviet Union, and the stage was set for an even greater and more astonishing growth of American might and prosperity. The period from 1900 to 1945 had thus seen the emergence of the United States as perhaps the most influential nation on Earth.

A similar rise in American influence occurred in the literary history of this era. In the early decades of the 19th century, a British essayist had very famously, somewhat smugly, but all-too-pertinently asked, “Who reads an American book?” At that time, the answer to the question seemed obvious—and obviously discouraging to any champion of American literature. During the course of the 19th century, however, the United States began to produce a number of writers who would gain an international readership and win the increasing respect of serious readers everywhere. Edgar Allan Poe was one of these; Nathaniel Hawthorne was another; Walt Whitman and Mark Twain were two more; and Henry James (who nevertheless published some of his most significant novels after 1900) can also be added to the list. Interestingly enough, some of the most important American writers of the 19th century were not really fully appreciated (either at home or abroad) until later—sometimes much later. Thus, the first real collection of Emily Dickinson’s poems was not published until 1890, while the great revival of interest in Herman Melville did not take place until the 1920s. Kate Chopin, meanwhile, did much of her own best writing in the 1890s (she published her great novel, The Awakening, in 1899), but her works were largely forgotten until the 1960s and 1970s. Thus, some of the greatest of all American writers of the 19th century were not fully appreciated—and did not begin to exercise real influence—until well after that century had ended.

By the end of the 19th century, the United States was obviously poised to make a major contribution to world literature. It increasingly had the kind of wealth and other resources necessary to nurture and sustain an educated readership; it had a rapidly growing population for whom reading was a major national pastime (although the era of movies and radio would develop rapidly from 1900 to 1945); and, perhaps most important, it had an increasing, and increasingly self-confident, sense of itself as an important and consequential nation that deserved an important literature of its own.

American writers were not long in responding to this challenge and this opportunity. Among the authors who emerged and flourished during the period 1900–1945 are some who are difficult to classify in any obvious way, although it might be useful to think of them as “independents.” These were writers who were not necessarily connected (at least for long) with any clear-cut literary movement or any narrowly defined demographic group. They tended to chart their own idiosyncratic paths, sometimes writing in ways that now seem broadly traditional, sometimes striking out in unexpected directions, but rarely following any obviously predetermined course. Jack London (1876–1916)—with his stories and novels set in the Far North or on the broad seas—might be considered such a writer. His straightforward style and adventurous narratives have long made him one of the most popular of significant authors, both at home and abroad, and few writers are more identifiably “American” than he.

Another obviously homegrown craftsman was Carl Sandburg (1878–1967), poet of Chicago and the Midwest and one of the best-selling major poets in American history. As was Sandburg, two other authors often identified with the Midwest were the novelists and short story writers Sherwood Anderson (1876–1941) and Theodore Dreiser (1871–1945), while the poets Edward Arlington Robinson (1869–1935) and Robert Frost (1874–1963) have in common not only a strong New England background but also a penchant for writing in more traditional forms and fashions than was common during much of the modern period. The same tendency to write in familiar, fairly accessible ways can also be seen in the novels and short fiction of John Steinbeck (1902–68) and in the novels and plays of Thornton Wilder (1897–1975). None of these writers seems (either in topics, themes, or methods) an especially radical or innovative author; all are among the great writers to whom most “common readers” can most readily relate.

The same might also be said of two of the most important of all the American fiction writers of the 20th century—F. Scott Fitzgerald (1896–1940) and Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961). Few novels are as well respected and well beloved by both academic critics and popular readers as Fitzgerald’s The Great Gatsby, and although Fitzgerald never created another such obvious masterpiece, his reputation nevertheless has only grown with time. Hemingway, in the meantime, managed to fashion perhaps the most influential and most widely imitated of all American prose styles, and by the time of his suicide he had become, around the world, almost the embodiment of the iconic American writer. His death was mourned in countries everywhere, for he had come to be considered not only a significant author but also a major public figure.

William Faulkner (1897–1962)—whom many regard as the greatest American novelist of the 20th century—might also be classified as a leading independent, but with Faulkner (as also, to some extent, with Hemingway), one begins to sense that a different sort of label might be appropriate. Faulkner (more obviously than Fitzgerald) is one of the first of the great innovators or modernists—those writers who began to do unexpected things with structure, characterization, and style. Faulkner often writes as if he does not care whether he is understood; his works—like the works of many other modernists—often pose difficult challenges for their readers and depart from traditional forms and fashions in deliberately provocative ways. The Sound and the Fury and As I Lay Dying are far less accessible and far more obviously puzzling novels than anything by Fitzgerald or Hemingway (although Hemingway’s early work titled in our time poses a few of the same kinds of challenges). A similar penchant for restless innovation and experimentation can be seen in the dramas of Eugene O’Neill (1888–1953) and in the early fiction of John Dos Passos (1896–1970).

Other writers are even better characterized by the term modernist and even more difficult. Many of these writers owe obvious (and frequently acknowledged) debts to Gertrude Stein (1874–1946), who considered herself a genius and whose confident self-evaluation was endorsed by many others. Stein often wrote in ways that seem deliberately maddening and impenetrable; ease and clarity of communication were not her primary goals. Her writings often force readers (if they have the patience) to puzzle over the implications of practically every single word or syllable; her style is innovative and experimental in the extreme. Similarly experimental—especially in his later writings—was the poet Ezra Pound (1885–1972), whose influence on the arguably greater poet T. S. Eliot (1888–1965), as well as on the host of other writers whom Pound championed and defended, was enormous. Indeed the whole period from the 1920s to the late 1940s has been labeled “The Pound Era,” and the writers (usually poets) often associated with this sort of “high modernism” include such major figures as Hart Crane (1899–1932), E. E. Cummings (1894–1962), Wallace Stevens (1879–1955), and William Carlos Williams (1883–1963). Each of these authors writes in his distinctive fashion, and none of them makes many concessions to the traditional expectations of conservative readers. Their poems are often unconventional in form, diction, subject, and tone.

American literature in the period from 1900 to 1945 was, however, increasingly untraditional not only in its structures, styles, and themes but also in the kinds of authors who participated in its creation. Women, for instance, were more and more accepted as major literary figures. Of course, females had long played a significant role in the creation of American popular fiction and poetry (one thinks of Hawthorne’s complaint, in the mid-1850s, about the “damned mob of scribbling women”), but, until the early 20th century, the works of relatively few women writers were admitted into the canon of serious American literature. That prejudice began to subside as more and more talented American women writers were able to publish their works. Edith Wharton (1862–1937), for instance, wrote fiction that was often compared—in style, topics, and achievement—to that of her friend Henry James. Her contemporary Willa Cather (1876–1947), as did many other significant writers of this period, often set her novels and stories in the Midwest. Katherine Anne Porter (1890–1980) wrote novels and stories on a wide range of topics and themes. Among the poets, Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950) was one of the most accessible, Marianne Moore (1887–1972) was one of the most innovative, and H. D. (the pen name of Hilda Doolittle, 1886–1961) was talented and unfortunately underappreciated.

Perhaps the most significant change in the period was the emergence of more and more great African-American writers. Although not primarily a creative writer, Booker T. Washington (1856–1915) not only wrote a highly important autobiography but also helped inspire the confidence and unleash the creativity of his entire community. W. E. B. DuBois (1868–1963), although mainly a writer of nonfiction, also composed novels and poems. By the decade of the 1920s, African Americans had become a major and growing force in U.S. literature. Claude McKay (1890–1948) became the first best-selling black writer with his novel Home to Harlem; Countee Cullen (1903–46) wrote verse that was traditional in style but that explored unusual racial themes; Langston Hughes (1902–1967) expressed himself distinctively in a wide range of forms and genres; Jean Toomer (1894–1967) wrote one of the most innovative of all the modernist works in his combination of fiction and poems titled Cane; and Richard Wright (1908–60) produced an immensely popular and important novel in Native Son and a highly influential autobiography in Black Boy (among many other notable works). In addition, two of the most significant women writers of the period were also African American: the irrepressibly vital and talented Zora Neale Hurston (1891–1960) and the gifted Nella Larsen (1891–1964), both of whom fell silent far too soon.

Finally, two other writers discussed in this volume deserve special mention as pathbreakers. Sui Sin Far, the pen name of Edith Maude Eaton (1865–1914), is regarded today as the first significant Asian-American creative writer, while Zitkala-Ša, the pen-name of Gertrude Simmons Bonnin (1876–1938), is widely honored as one of the first great Native American authors. Both women blazed trails that other members of their ethnic groups would later explore, and each, in her different way, symbolizes the increasingly diverse and ever-evolving nature of American literature in the period 1890–1945. By the end of World War II, American literature had become—and was still becoming—almost as full of variety as the American population itself.

In 1900 American literature still often seemed peripheral or unimportant to many readers in Europe and elsewhere. By 1945, however, the impact and influence of American writers had become undeniable. The Nobel Prize in literature was inaugurated in 1901, and in the years since the founding of the prize, seven Americans active in the period covered by this volume received the award: Sinclair Lewis in 1930, Eugene O’Neill in 1936, Pearl S. Buck in 1938, T. S. Eliot in 1948, William Faulkner in 1949, Ernest Hemingway in 1954, and John Steinbeck in 1962. In the years since then, only two Nobel Prizes in literature have been awarded to American authors who wrote primarily in English: Saul Bellow in 1976 and Toni Morrison in 1993. (Isaac Bashevis Singer won in 1978 primarily for his works in Yiddish, while Joseph Brodsky won in 1987 mainly for his Russian poems.) Of course, winning the Nobel Prize is hardly an infallible sign of literary excellence, but the list of award winners does imply a great deal about the high regard in which many American writers from the first half of the 20th century were held throughout the world, in their own times and afterward. No one today would seriously doubt the literary importance of O’Neill or Eliot or Faulkner or Hemingway (although there is a bit more argument about Steinbeck). In the period from 1900 to 1945, American literature not only came of age but also began to set the pace. There were more distinct—and distinctive—voices in American literature during this period than at any previous era, and, for the first time, most of the rest of the world had begun to listen closely.

SHERWOOD ANDERSON (1876–1942)

[My mother's] keen observations of the life about her first awoke in me the hunger to see beneath the surface of life.

(Winesburg, Ohio)

Although Sherwood Anderson's status as a writer is not as high today as it once was, his work remains important not only in its own right but also because of his influence on other authors of even greater significance. Malcolm Cowley has called Anderson "the only story teller of his generation who left his mark on the style and vision of the generation that followed. Hemingway, Faulkner, Wolfe, Steinbeck, Caldwell, Saroyan, Henry Miller . . . each of these owes an unmistakable debt to Anderson, and their names might stand for dozens of others" (1). For years Anderson struggled to achieve his dream of being a significant author, and for a very brief time he was widely considered one of the best writers his country had yet produced. In his final decade, however, his standing fell, and in the decades since his death his reputation has never quite recovered. He is remembered mostly as the author of one crucial book: Winesburg, Ohio, a collection of interrelated stories that amount to a kind of novel. The book had an immediate impact when it appeared; it was eventually translated into numerous foreign languages, and it has never gone out of print. It remains today a widely read "classic" of American literature.

Anderson was born on September 13, 1876, in Camden, Ohio, as the third child of Irwin and Emma Anderson (Burbank 15). In 1884 the Andersons moved to the small town of Clyde, Ohio (which would later be the model for the fictional village of Winesburg), and it was here in Clyde that Sherwood Anderson spent his most formative years. He would later regard Clyde as (at least in part) a "nostalgic symbol of pre-industrial innocence," but the town was also "an agricultural village which, long since settled, lay stagnant between an exhausted agrarian era and a nascent industrial age" (Burbank 22–23). Anderson's attitudes toward the place were therefore always somewhat ambivalent: For him it would come to represent both the comforts and the confinements of small-town existence. Similarly ambivalent were Anderson's attitudes toward his father, a man whose financial failures often left his family in dire straits but whose gift for storytelling his son would eventually both admire and emulate. For his mother, however, young Sherwood always felt both admiration and sympathy, for she "seemed to have all the desirable qualities that his father lacked; and, as he rejected Irwin's irresponsibility, he embraced the qualities of stoic endurance, self-sacrifice, and sympathetic curiosity that, to his mind, his mother possessed" (Burbank 26–27). Partly in reaction against his father's failures, Sherwood was a determined, hardworking youth whose willingness to take on all kinds of employment, "from newsboy to stable hand," earned him the nickname "Jobby" (D. Anderson ix).

In 1895, Anderson's mother died. The following year Anderson himself left Clyde and headed for Chicago, where he worked as a laborer. In 1898

he joined the military to fight in the Spanish-American War, but by the time he was posted to Cuba in 1899 the war had already ended. Later that year he was back near Clyde, working on a farm and then taking classes at Wittenburg Academy (in Springfield, Ohio), from which he graduated in June 1900. He then returned to Chicago, where (from 1900 to 1906) he not only sold advertisements but also wrote them. At both tasks he was highly successful, and by 1904 he was able to marry Cornelia Lane, a well-traveled and well-educated young woman who had had the kind of financially comfortable life Anderson himself desired. Within three years children began to arrive, and for a number of years the Andersons' marriage was happy and their existence together was conventionally respectable. In 1906 Anderson moved "to Cleveland as president of United Factories Company, a mail-order jobbing agency" (Burbank 15), and in 1907 he moved to Elyria, Ohio, becoming president of a company that prospered by selling paint by mail. From 1907 to 1912 he wrote four novels in any time he could spare from his company: Mary Cochran, Talbot Whittingham, Windy McPherson's Son, and Marching Men. By this point he had three children, a flourishing business, and a reputation in Elyria as a solid citizen who also dabbled in writing.

It was in 1912, however, that Anderson's life changed dramatically. He had been becoming increasingly frustrated with a life divided between business and creative writing, and "one afternoon late in November, 1912, while dictating a letter to his secretary, he suddenly broke off in mid-sentence, walked out of his office, and trudged along the railroad tracks toward Cleveland, where he was found a few days later wandering aimlessly and talking incoherently" (Burbank 19). After being hospitalized briefly in Cleveland and then returning to Elyria for a short stay, Anderson left his wife and children and headed back to Chicago, where he earned his living once more in advertising while devoting his main energies to his literary ambitions. He met and mingled with many other writers who were then contributing to the so-called Chicago Renaissance, in which Anderson himself now became a main force, and in 1915–16 he composed the stories that would later appear in Winesburg, Ohio. His marriage to Cornelia ended in 1915; a new marriage (to the less conventional Tennessee Mitchell, a sculptor) began the following year. In 1916 his novel Windy McPherson's Son was published, followed in 1917 by Marching Men and in 1918 by a collection of prose poems called Mid-American Chants. It was not until 1919, however, with the publication of Winesburg, Ohio, that Anderson's fame began. The book impressed many readers and reviewers as something new in American fiction; nevertheless, it also offended less adventurous readers, who disliked its dark tone and allegedly tawdry themes. Despite (or perhaps partly because of) these negative responses, he was admired by "advanced" intellectuals on both sides of the Atlantic, and his volume began to be translated into various foreign languages.

Numerous works in varied genres followed Winesburg, Ohio, including Poor White (a novel), which appeared in 1921, along with The Triumph of the Egg, a collection of stories or impressions of life in the United States that included reproductions of sculptures by Anderson's wife and verse by Anderson. In addition, that same year Anderson met the young ERNEST HEMINGWAY (who admired him greatly, at least for the moment), and he also visited Europe, where he was warmly welcomed by such notable writers as GERTRUDE STEIN and James Joyce. He also won a prize of $2,000 given by the Dial magazine and was now able to make a break from the advertising business for good, but in 1922 his relationship with his second wife also broke down. However, a new romantic relationship—with Elizabeth Prall—had begun. In 1923 he published a novel titled (appropriately enough) Many Marriages, followed by another that same year called Horses and Men. An autobiography (A Story Teller's Story) appeared in 1924, the year in which Anderson finally divorced Tennessee and married Elizabeth Prall. In 1925 both The Modern Writer (in which he reflected on his own craft and career) and a new novel, Dark Laughter, which was soon parodied by Hemingway, were published. Yet another novel, Tar, appeared in 1926, as did Sherwood Anderson's Notebook, containing more refletions on writing and on being a writer. In 1927 he published A New Testament, a collection of poetic prose. In that same year he not only returned to Europe but also purchased a farm, house, and two newspapers in Marion, Virginia, where he hoped to live once more the small-town existence he knew so well and (to some degree) missed so much. This plan, though, did not last long, and in general Anderson felt restless and dissatisfied during this period of his life. Both 1928 and 1929 were unsettled years for him, and indeed in 1929 his marriage to Elizabeth deteriorated in the same year that America at large was entering the Great Depression. Nonetheless, during that year he published Hello Towns! (a collection of his writings for his newspapers), Nearer the Grass Roots (a pair of essays), and Alice and The Lost Novel (two reflective pieces of fiction).

In 1930 Anderson met Eleanor Copenhaver, and, with her, began to take a more active role in left-wing politics. His support of laborers' struggles made him briefly sympathetic to communism, though his views were never explicitly Marxist. In 1931 he published Perhaps Women, a miscellaneous collection of thoughts on the ways modern man was "losing his manhood to the machines," in which he suggested that "whatever hope remains for man in the factories lies in women, who are the real sources of strength in an industrial society" (D. Anderson 119–120). The next year he published Beyond Desire (another novel) and officially divorced his third wife, an event that allowed him to marry Eleanor Copenhaver in July 1933. That same year brought the election as president of Franklin Roosevelt (whom Anderson favored), and the publication of Death in the Woods and Other Stories. In 1934 Winesburg, Ohio was produced as a play in a script written by Anderson, who also that year published a group of brief prose writings titled No Swank. In 1935 Puzzled America, a group of essays based on his travels, was published, followed in 1936 by Kit Brandon, another novel. In 1937 dramatic versions of Winesburg, Ohio; The Triumph of the Egg; and Mother were issued, and Anderson was also elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters. By 1938 he was at work on various novels and had begun his Memoirs, and in 1939 he composed Home Town, a lengthy essay not published until 1940. Anderson died on March 8, 1941, at Colon, in the Panama Canal Zone, "of peritonitis, while en route to a good-will tour of South America" (Burbank 17). Even after his death, however, his publishing life had not quite ended, for it was not until 1942 that Sherwood Anderson's Memoirs appeared in print.

The fact that Anderson died while on a diplomatic mission suggests something of the status he still enjoyed, both in the United States and abroad, at the end of his life. Meanwhile, the fact that he could publish book after book throughout the 1920s and 1930s implies that there were still a decent market for his writings and a continuing interest in his opinions. Nevertheless, in the final decade and a half of his life, his career was experiencing a kind of slowly darkening eclipse; the more (and the more frequently) he published, the less he attained the kind of widespread respect he had once enjoyed, especially from major literary figures. Other, younger writers, such as Hemingway and WILLIAM FAULKNER (both of whom Anderson had known and both of whom he had significantly influenced), would eventually surpass him in critical renown and public acclaim, and Anderson would increasingly be remembered mostly for one book (Winesburg, Ohio) as well as a number of separate stories (such as "The Egg"). Even this achievement, however, deserves our respect. How many other creative writers, after all, are remembered even slightly, and how many others ever have the kind of major impact on their own contemporaries that Anderson once enjoyed? Winesburg, Ohio has never gone out of print and is never likely to do so. It is still the book on which Anderson's reputation is built, and in that respect, at least, his standing is—and is likely to remain—as solid as almost any writer could hope to achieve.

Winesburg, Ohio (1919)

Winesburg, Ohio is the work that made—and continues to sustain—Anderson's literary reputation.

A series or cycle of interrelated short stories and sketches, the book is unified in various ways. The most obvious of these kinds of unity is implied by its title: The stories are set in the fictional village of Winesburg (based on Clyde, Ohio, where Anderson was raised). Recurring places and characters appear in different particular tales, so that by the end of the book the reader has a fairly comprehensive sense of the geography, citizens, history, circumstances, and style of life of Anderson's fictional village.

The most important recurring character in the book is George Willard, a young reporter for the Winesburg Eagle newspaper, who is the protagonist (or central focus) in some tales and who is an observer or secondary character in others. Willard is absent altogether from a few stories and is mentioned only in passing in some others, but for the most part it is Willard's presence, in one way or another, that helps lend the book much of its continuity. Individual stories can be read and enjoyed in and of themselves, but when read from cover to cover the book coheres, partly because it charts the development of Willard's own character and insights. He is a more mature, more understanding character at the end of the book than at its start: Through his interaction with the other characters, he has grown in many ways. It is this growth, ironically, that makes him ready to leave his hometown in the book's brief final story, appropriately titled "Departure."

The book is also unified in other ways. Its tone, for instance, is almost uniformly dark and bleak. Little humor or joy pervades the existence of Winesburg's citizens; many of them lead lives (in Thoreau's famous phrase) of "quiet desperation," and their interactions with each other and with George are often edgy and tense. Unhappiness, loneliness, fear, awkwardness, embarrassment, dissatisfaction, and sometimes even anger are common themes; the characters often feel isolated even when they superficially communicate, and in general Winesburg seems a fundamentally sorry (and sorrowful) place. Anderson deliberately sought to present a gallery of "grotesque" characters—characters whose lives have all become, in one way or another, distorted, inflexible, or unbalanced. His book shocked many contemporary readers because of its often blunt depiction of sexual topics and its frequent presentation of neurotic, obsessive personalities. The total picture that emerges of Winesburg, Ohio, is of a place that is often unlovely and unloving, and yet Anderson's purpose is not primarily satirical. Rather, he seeks to show small-town life in America as it really was, in all its existential loneliness, and his ultimate attitude toward his characters is not one of harsh judgment but of understanding, sympathy, and compassion.

Character is more important in Winesburg, Ohio than plot. In other words, Anderson is less interested in what the town's citizens do than in who they are; his focus is less on their actions per se than on the ways their behavior reveals their personalities and psychology. In particular, he is interested in their psychological depths and complexities—in the ways their minds and motives are conflicted, torn, and complex. Stories tend to build toward moments of revelation in which characters unveil themselves in some memorable fashion, either to themselves, to each other, or to the reader. The stories are usually told from the point of view of an omniscient (or "all-knowing") narrator who shares his knowledge of the characters' pasts and presents, including his insights into their innermost thoughts and feelings. The narrator will often address readers directly (thus giving some tales an air of intimate chattiness) and will also often call attention, in other ways, to the storytelling process. The language used is generally simple, plain, and direct, often featuring short, unadorned, declarative sentences but also often emphasizing recurring key words or images, such as hands or adventure or fear. Anderson's method often involves such "oral" storytelling techniques as "the laying in at the beginning of blocks of background before the story proper is taken up; the apparent wandering away from the story because of some associational interest provoked by the mention of a name, object, or place; the frequent authorial intrusions in the form of 'insights' and self-dramatizations; the shifts in time, and the occasional stopping of the story to lay in apparently overlooked materials necessary to the 'point' of the tale" (Thurston 305). Anderson disliked plot-driven tales featuring rigid, predictable structures; his own style and structure are therefore looser, more fluid, and (like the characters themselves) highly idiosyncratic. He attempts to catch each main character “at an essential moment in time that reveals a series of brief, intuitive, but true glimpses of the anguish of the human heart. Each story reveals the essence of the central character’s life as Anderson knows it” (D. Anderson 38). Yet the characters, for all their seeming peculiarities, are also emblematic: They symbolize the lonely lives most people lead, and it is this fundamental theme of alienation that makes them and their sometimes apparently bizarre experiences relevant to the lives of Anderson’s readers.

Individual stories from Winesburg, Ohio, are discussed in the sections that follow.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Anderson’s uses of recurring characters, places, and themes with those of some other writer of short fiction, such as Kate Chopin or James Joyce. For example, compare two different stories in which George Willard appears with Chopin’s stories titled “At the ’Cadian Ball” and “The Storm.” How do Chopin and Anderson use irony in their presentation of recurring characters?
2. Trace George Willard’s evolution throughout Winesburg, Ohio; how does he develop in psychological or moral terms as the book progresses? In what ways is he more insightful, understanding, and sensitive by the end of the book than he was at the beginning?
3. The critic Lionel Trilling has written that in “Anderson’s world there are many emotions, or rather many instances of a few emotions, but there are very few sights, sounds, and smells, very little of the stuff of actuality” (480–481). Do you agree? Focus on a particular story in your discussion of Trilling’s claims.
4. Anderson’s style of writing has been compared to the techniques of impressionist and postimpressionist painters. Research their techniques and then discuss whether you think the comparison is valid. For instance, how is Anderson similar to these painters in his focus on everyday life and unheroic subjects?
5. How do Anderson’s style, tone, techniques, and attitudes compare or contrast with those found in the Spoon River Anthology of Edgar Lee Masters? For example, how do the works differ in the narrative points of view they employ? Is Anderson’s book as cynical as Masters’s work?
6. Compare and contrast the tone, technique, and themes of Winesburg, Ohio, with those of THORNTON WILDER’s Our Town. Which work presents a grimmer picture of small-town life? What “morals,” if any, are implied by the two works? Which work is more innovative in the techniques it uses?
7. Which stories in Winesburg, Ohio do you find most effective? Which do you find least effective? In both cases, explain why. Discuss such matters as characterization, style, tone, and structure.
8. Trace and analyze the use of a key term—such as hands or adventure—throughout the tales. How does Anderson use such terms for symbolic purposes? How does the recurrence of such terms lend unity to the whole work, but sometimes also contribute to the irony of the book?
9. Analyze one particular story in detail, explaining how all of its parts cohere and how they reinforce one another. For example, how does the story maintain consistency in characterization? How does it use foreshadowing and/or irony? What theme or themes help unify the work?
10. Trace one particular theme—such as loneliness or love—throughout the collection of tales. How does Anderson manage to prevent his use of the theme from becoming monotonous? How does he explore different facets of the same theme in different stories? How is his treatment of the theme affected by his presentation of different kinds of characters?

“The Book of the Grotesque” (1919)

An incapacitated old writer talks about deaths in the Civil War with an emotional old carpenter, who lost a brother in the conflict and who has arrived to raise the writer’s bed so that he can glimpse trees outside his window. After the carpenter leaves, the writer begins to imagine “a long procession of figures before his eyes” who represent all the people he has ever known and who now appear before him as “grotesques” (S. Anderson 22). The writer labors on a book discussing this vision, the essence of which is that people become grotesques when any one of them embraces only one limited “truth” to the exclusion of others, thereby turning each “truth” into a “falsehood” (S. Anderson 24).

This brief sketch forms a kind of thematic prologue to Anderson's cycle of short stories titled Winesburg, Ohio. Anderson, in fact, originally planned to call this whole volume The Book of the Grotesque but was persuaded by his publisher to give it instead its present famous title (Small 17). The present prologue nevertheless announces the main theme of the book—a book that will focus, in one story after another, on the ways individuals have distorted their lives (or seen them distorted) by limiting themselves (or being limited by their society) to narrow, unbalanced ways of thinking, feeling, perceiving, and living. Anderson implies that any approach to life that may be attractive or appealing in its own right can become a straitjacket (although sometimes even a “beautiful” or “amusing” straitjacket [S. Anderson 23]) if it dominates a person's entire existence. The old writer obviously symbolizes, on at least some levels, not only Anderson himself but also the narrator of Winesburg, Ohio, as well as George Willard, the book's main character (Small 13, 18, 21). Meanwhile, the unpublished book the old writer composes resembles, at least in some respects, Anderson's own published collection of stories (Small 21). The prologue also introduces such main elements of the rest of Winesburg, Ohio as an emphasis on human suffering (in the tale of the old carpenter), the importance of sympathetic understanding (in the response of the old writer), the importance of the imagination and of the artist's penetrating insight (in the description of the old writer's vision of the procession of grotesques), and the tendency of many of the stories in Winesburg, Ohio to move toward moments of insight or revelation (Small 21, 23).

For Discussion or Writing

1. How are the themes, imagery, or phrasing of this sketch typical of the rest of the book? In what ways are the characters of Winesburg, Ohio “grotesque” in the senses outlined here? What imagery of limitation can you find in later sections of the work?
2. In what ways is Captain Ahab, in Melville's Moby-Dick, a “grotesque” according to the old writer's definition? How is Ahab's life narrow and constricted, and how does his obsession with the white whale affect the lives of his crew?
3. What do you think of the old writer's idea that all truths are originally beautiful, including such truths as “poverty,” “profligacy,” “carelessness,” and “abandon” (S. Anderson 23)? Do you agree that everything that is true is also beautiful? Explain your logic.
4. The narrator of this sketch contends that the old writer himself was “in danger of becoming a grotesque” (S. Anderson 24). In what sense does the old man run the risk? Is it a risk that Anderson himself entirely avoided? In other words, is there any sense in which Anderson himself ultimately embraced a narrow or one-sided vision of human life?
5. How has the term grotesque usually been used in discussions of literature, and how does the old writer's use of that term resemble or depart from the usual definitions? How does the old writer's definition of the term differ (for instance) from Flannery O'Connor's understanding of “the grotesque”?

“Hands” (1919)

Wing Biddlebaum, an aging, isolated, and anxious man whose hands are constantly moving and infinitely expressive, encourages George Willard (a young reporter for the local newspaper) not to abandon his dreams but to embrace them, and he also urges George not to conform to the conventional conduct and thinking of the rest of the community. We eventually learn that Biddlebaum's original name was Adolph Meyers; that he was once an inspired, inspiring teacher in a small Pennsylvania town; that he had a habit when teaching of innocently touching the boys he taught while talking with them, but that one day a “half-witted boy of the school became enamored of” him and that this boy in “his bed at night imagined unspeakable things and in the morning went forth to tell his dreams as facts” (S. Anderson 32). A crowd of suspicious, belligerent parents descended on Meyers’s house, attacked him verbally and physically, and drove him from the town; for 20 years he has lived a lonely life in Winesburg, his existence blighted and his career as a teacher destroyed.

Anderson considered this story his earliest piece of really successful writing and felt an enormous sense of accomplishment upon finishing it (Small 30). Homosexuality (even if only implied) was not a common topic in the literature of the 1920s, but Anderson himself, although he had numerous sexual relationships with women, remembered being once suspected of homosexual tendencies and recalled especially how it felt to be viewed with such suspicion (Small 31–32). The story’s main concern, however, is not homosexuality per se (Biddlebaum certainly does not think of himself as gay); rather, the work deals with such common themes in Anderson’s fiction as loneliness, fear, social failure, and disappointed desire. Biddlebaum, like many characters in Winesburg, Ohio, is an isolated, defeated man; his particular story may be peculiar to him, but his suffering, his need for communion and communication, and his deep attachment to hidden yearnings (which are more social than sexual) are all typical of many characters in Anderson’s book, and they are also typical (Anderson thought) of the human experience in general. As many of Anderson’s tales do, this one deals with a sudden moment of transformation in which a character, either through his own choice or through the impact of some external event, becomes a “grotesque”—a distorted, incomplete figure whose life, thinking, and feelings are thereafter confined (sometimes unwillingly) to a narrow groove. The story illustrates the “loose” plotting common to Anderson’s tales as well as his penchant for a style of narration that calls attention to the narrator’s voice. In addition, the story illustrates Anderson’s characteristic use of evocative imagery and repeated symbols (particularly, in this case, the symbolism of hands themselves). The tale of Wing Biddlebaum is also significant because it is the first of many in the book in which characters are revealed (or reveal themselves) to young George Willard, who functions as a sort of alter ego both for Anderson himself and for all the book’s readers.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Trace the use of “hands” imagery not only in this tale but throughout the rest of the volume. What continuities exist in the imagery from one story to the next, and how is the imagery also used in distinctive ways in various tales?
2. How does this story establish a pattern of particular themes and phrasing that tend to recur in later stories? For example, how is the tone of this story typical of the volume as a whole? In what ways is Biddlebaum similar to other characters in the rest of the volume, particularly in his psychology?
3. How is the emphasis on “dreams” in this story ironic? What kinds of dreams inspire Biddlebaum; on the other hand, what other kinds of dreams have destroyed his life? What does the language of “dreams” imply about the relations between imagination and reality?
4. Compare and contrast the life of Wing Biddlebaum with that of the title character of EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON’s poem “Richard Cory.” How are they similar (but also different) in their social positions and in their fates?
5. Compare and contrast the idea of a sudden, life-transforming change in this story and in EDITH WHARTON’s novel Ethan Frome. In each work, how is the situation of the main character influenced by the kind of community in which he lives?

“Mother” (1919)

Elizabeth Willard, the mother of George Willard (the main recurring character of Winesburg, Ohio) is “tall and gaunt” with a face “marked with small-pox scars" (S. Anderson 39), and her lonely life is as bleak as her appearance: She helps her ne'er-do-well husband, Tom, operate an old, rundown hotel, and she spends most of her days cleaning grimy rooms, recalling her promising youth, and hoping for a better, more stimulated and stimulating life for her son. Elizabeth's relationship with George is close but awkward, and one night, when she hears her husband telling George that George must act and think more as his father does, she concocts a plan to kill her husband to protect George from his malign influence. Fortunately, however, she learns in a conversation with George that he rejects his father's plans and values, and that he hopes to live the kind of thoughtful, unconventional life that Elizabeth herself desires but cannot enjoy.

This story clearly reflects Anderson's personal relationship with his own parents and may also have been influenced by the frustrations of his own first marriage (Small 57–58). Like the main characters of the "The Book of the Grotesque" and "Hands," Elizabeth Willard is a dreamer whose dreams, ironically, not only provide a limited means of helping her escape her agony but also help perpetuate her isolation (Small 59, 62–63). She lives the same kind of repressed, oppressive life endured by many characters in Winesburg, Ohio. George functions for her (as he functions for other characters in the book) as the focus of vicarious aspirations; she, as do others, tries to guide him and teach him, and she tries to live (or relive) her life through his. For her as for others, he represents a source of hope; she wants him to avoid the wrong turns that have blighted her own existence. Like many other characters in the book, she is a literally pathetic figure; Anderson invites us both to pity and to understand her, and although her plan to kill her husband may seem an extreme reaction to her circumstances, the frustration from which the plan is born is (in Anderson's view) all too typical of modern life, whether lived in large, impersonal cities or in small, constricting towns. Elizabeth Willard represents the kind of people who appear so often in Anderson's fiction: little-known, unregarded persons who feel that life has failed them (Burbank 28, 68) and who see no possibility of personal redemption or escape. Their early hopes have been disappointed, their futures seem futile, and they cannot communicate clearly or openly their deepest feelings, even (or especially) with the people for whom they feel the most affection.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the characters and themes of this work with those of D. H. Lawrence's novel Sons and Lovers. In what ways are both works partially autobiographical? How can both works be interpreted in Freudian terms? In what ways (according to Freud) is the relationship between George and his parents typical of human life in general?
2. Compare and contrast the relationship between the husband and wife in this story with the relationship depicted in Edwin Arlington Robinson's poem "Eros Turannos." How are their relationships affected by the communities in which they live and by traditional gender roles?
3. Compare and contrast the relationship between the husband and wife in this story with the relationship depicted in SUI SIN FAR's (Edith Maude Eaton's) story "Mrs. Spring Fragrance." How do the tones of the two works differ, and what does each work imply about the nature of life in general?
4. Research Anderson's life and discuss, in detail, how this story reflects his relations with his own parents. To what extent is the story autobiographical, and in what ways does Anderson depart from the details of his own life in crafting this tale? How does George Willard's father both resemble and differ from Anderson's?

"Adventure" (1919)

Alice Hindman is now a gangly old maid of 27, but when she was 16 she had fallen in love with a young man named Ned Currie, whom she hoped to marry and with whom she was even willing to run off to a big city. One day, along the banks of a remote creek outside Winesburg, they became lovers, and although Ned had the best of intentions of making his fortune in the city and then sending for Alice to join him, eventually he forgot her, although she never blamed him for his neglect. For years and years she pined for him, considering herself his wife in all but name but also growing so increasingly lonely and frustrated that one night, in a fit of sexual and romantic frustration, she runs out naked into the rain; beseeches a deaf old man, who ignores her; and then crawls back, defeated and alone, to her isolated room.

This story may have been influenced, in part, by Anderson's awareness of his own sister's alienation and yearning for affection, but the isolation felt by Alice Hindman is also a major theme of Winesburg, Ohio as a whole. Various words, phrases, or motifs emphasized in this story—such as “narrow life,” “unable to talk,” “loneliness,” “afraid,” and “wanted to be loved” (S. Anderson 112, 113, 116, 118, 119)—also appear in many others, and indeed the title word is one that recurs throughout the larger book. It seems sadly appropriate that Alice works in a “dry goods store” (S. Anderson 115), since her own life has become desiccated and parched; it is not an accident that at the end of the tale she runs out naked into the potentially cleansing and refreshing rain. This symbolic attempt to be rebaptized and reborn fails, however, when she confronts a man even more cut off, by his age and deafness, from life and vitality than she is; he literally cannot hear or understand her, and her effort to transform her life in a dramatically unconventional fashion ends (typically enough, for an Anderson story) in embarrassment and defeat. Sexual motives and conduct play an important role in this tale, as they do in many by Anderson (Small 105), but the sexual yearnings here, as in various other works of his, are frustrated and suppressed, disappointed and disappointing. At the root of much sexual desire in Anderson's stories is an even more fundamental sense of loneliness (Burbank 73).

For Discussion or Writing

1. In what ways is Alice's frustration shaped by the fact that she is a woman? How does Ned have more options and opportunities simply because he is male? How do conventional gender roles affect the characters in other stories in Winesburg, Ohio?
2. Compare and contrast the relationship of Ned and Alice to the relationship depicted in EZRA POUND's poem “The River-Merchant's Wife: A Letter.” Which of the two works is finally more optimistic, and why? What is the role of physical distance in both works?
3. Compare and contrast Alice to the main character in Katherine Anne Porter's story “The Jilting of Granny Weatherall.” How and why would a feminist critic respond to both women? In what ways are the women victims of society, and in what ways (if any) are they responsible for their own predicaments?
4. Discuss the use of symbolism in this story. For instance, what is symbolic about the physical appearance of Alice's employer? What is symbolic about Alice's final nakedness? What is symbolic about the rainfall?
5. Discuss the presentation of religion and religious imagery in this tale. How does such imagery contribute to the irony of the story? How does it contribute to the complex tone of the work?

“Queer” (1919)

Elmer Cowley, son of Ebenezer Cowley and junior partner of Cowley & Son's store in Winesburg, grows increasingly frustrated not only by his own isolation (since he thinks he is regarded as “queer,” or odd) but also by his father's incompetence as a businessman and by the apparent normality of the apparently well-adjusted and well-regarded George Willard, whom Elmer sees as representing everything he dislikes about his hometown. After threatening a salesman with violence, Elmer walks to the outskirts of the village, pours out his angry thoughts to an old acquaintance (a contented half-wit), and then returns home, determined to escape Winesburg on the next train. Summoning the curious and friendly George Willard to meet him at the station, Elmer suddenly attacks George, hops onto the departing train, and thinks to himself, "I guess I showed him I ain't so queer" (S. Anderson 201).

Scholars have detected in Anderson's portrait of Elmer Cowley reflections not only of Anderson's brother, Earl, but also Anderson himself, who was often as chagrined by his own father as Elmer is by Ebenezer (Small 163). More generally, though, Elmer is simply another in the long list of characters Anderson created in Winesburg, Ohio, who are isolated, bitter, frustrated, and even a bit bizarre. The story is also typical of the book as a whole in its emphasis on a desire to escape, in the prominence it gives to George Willard, and in its movement toward a moment of sudden, unexpected, and somewhat shocking behavior. Elmer is obviously an ironic figure: The more he resists being labeled "queer," the queerer he truly seems—a fact driven home by the story's final sentence. The narrative illustrates "George's eager willingness to understand" the other characters he encounters, an eagerness that "marks his growing sensitivity to other people" (Small 165). A further irony, of course, is that Elmer attacks the one citizen of Winesburg who might have been willing and able to comprehend him. Stylistically the story is typical of most others in the book. Its diction is plain, its syntax (or sentence structure) is simple, and it relies on the repetition of key words and phrases (especially the word queer [Papinchak 8–9]). Midwestern dialect is also stressed, particularly in the repeated memorable phrase "I'll be washed and ironed and starched" (S. Anderson 200). In "Queer" Anderson comes perhaps as close as he ever does in Winesburg, Ohio to writing something comic, but the tone of the comedy is absurd rather than affirmative (Small 98–99).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the presentation of George Willard in this tale with the way he is presented in the little-discussed but highly effective story "Nobody Knows." How does he seem a more complicated, more ambiguous character in the latter tale? In what other ways (and for what other reasons) does "Nobody Knows" deserve more attention than it has received?
2. To what degree is Elmer a sympathetic or even plausible character? Can a story be effective if the main character is unsympathetic? Can a story be effective if the main character is implausible? Justify your answers to both of these questions.
3. Compare and contrast the "half-witted" character in this tale with the one in "Hands." Why does Anderson make each character "half-witted"? Would the character be less effective if he were "normal"? If so, why and how?

"Death in the Woods" (1919)

As a young man, the anonymous narrator saw a prematurely old, poor, decrepit woman walk into his small town from her remote, rundown farm to buy a few scraps of food for herself, her no-good husband, her no-good son, and the various scrawny animals who also depended on her labor for sustenance. As a girl she had worked like a slave for an old German farmer, who abused her sexually; later, as a wife to Jake Grimes (a self-centered thief disliked by the townsfolk), she had been treated once more as little better than a slave; and, later still, as the mother of a rough, tough, hard-drinking, and sexually uninhibited son, she had once again been treated without affection or respect. In the evening of the day she is glimpsed by the narrator, as she makes her weary way back to the farm, she rests under a tree and quietly dies in her sleep, surrounded by her hungry dogs, before she eventually is discovered and examined by the curious townspeople, including the narrator, who considers her more beautiful in death than she had ever seemed in life.

Anderson himself rather immodestly called this work "a magnificent tale, one of the most penetrating written in our times" (qtd. in Small 347). Whether or not this is true, the story has become one of his most admired (Small 353) and is certainly typical of his writing in numerous ways. Set in the Midwest and emphasizing rural and small-town life, it also emphasizes his characteristic themes of loneliness, fear, and the grotesque distortion of human potential. As in many of his other tales, the narration is rambling and digressive; the narrator

5. Choose one particular story by Anderson and discuss how (if at all) its various details cohere, creating a mutually reinforcing and artistically complex design. For instance, how is characterization reinforced by symbolism? How do different aspects of the plot relate to one another through irony or foreshadowing?
6. Discuss the strengths and weaknesses of Anderson's use of quoted speech and dialogue. Is the speech of his characters convincing? Does it sound like the speech real people would use? How does he attempt to make their speech plausible and credible?
7. Discuss the use of point(s) of view in one or more of Anderson's stories. How is one of his tales affected by the narrative perspective(s) from which it is told? How would the story be different if the point of view were different?
8. In style, tone, method, and themes, how do Anderson's writings resemble those of Jack London? On the other hand, how do the frequently exotic settings of London's stories contrast, in their implications, with the small-town setting of Anderson's stories? Why does each author choose the kinds of settings he does for the particular stories he tells?
9. Anderson wrote numerous tales besides the ones in Winesburg, Ohio. Track down several of his other stories and discuss the ways they resemble, or differ from, the ones in his most famous book.
10. Anderson read and admired the work of Mark Twain. In what ways do Anderson's style and attitudes resemble those of Twain, and in what other ways do they differ? How, for instance, do the experiences of Huckleberry Finn both resemble and differ from those of George Willard?

GERTRUDE SIMMONS BONNIN

(ZITKALA-ŠA) (1876–1938)

When I saw the lonely figure of my mother vanish in the distance, a sense of regret settled heavily upon me. I felt suddenly weak, as if I might fall limp to the ground. I was in the hands of strangers whom my mother did not fully trust. I no longer felt free to be myself, or to voice my own feelings.

(American Indian Stories)

Gertrude Simmons Bonnin, who adopted the pen name Zitkala-Ša (pronounced “shah” and meaning Red Bird) after graduating from college, is important for a number of reasons: She was one of the first American Indians to write directly about her own life and in her own words, without the intervention or mediation of editors, transcribers, or professional (that is, white) biographers. Her autobiographical writings were published in some of the most important magazines of her day and were later issued in book form, thus giving her unusual prominence and visibility. These writings, moreover, were exceptionally blunt and outspoken in their criticism of white values, white culture, white conduct, and white hypocrisy. However, even after Bonnin turned most of her attention away from writing, she remained significant for decades as an eloquent champion of the rights of Native Americans. She was a highly visible leader in a number of American Indian organizations, achieving unusual recognition in her day not only as an Indian but especially as an Indian woman.

Although no full-scale scholarly biography of Bonnin has yet been published, many of the most important details of her life are outlined by P. Jane Hafen in her introduction to Dreams and Thunder and especially by Doreen Rappaport in her detailed biography for children, which provides an extremely helpful chronology. Bonnin was born on February 22, 1876, at the Yankton Sioux Agency

(or Reservation) near Greenwood, South Dakota, only months before the famous battle of Little Bighorn (also known as Custer’s last stand), in which Indians decimated a U.S. Army contingent led by General George Armstrong Custer. Although Bonnin later claimed to be the granddaughter of Sitting Bull, the famous Indian warrior who had led the battle against Custer, this claim is untrue, and indeed much of Bonnin’s depiction of her own life must be treated with a certain skepticism, since she often failed to stress important data. She often implied, for instance, that she was a full-blooded Indian when in fact she was the daughter of an Indian woman named Ellen Taté Iyóhiwin (whose Indian name meant Reaches for the Wind) and a white trader named Felker, Ellen’s third white husband, who left the relationship before Gertrude was born. At the time of Gertrude’s birth, Ellen had already given birth to eight children, of whom four were still living: Peter, Edward, and Henry St. Pierre (the children of her first husband); and David Simmons, the son of her second husband, John H. Simmons. With Felker gone, Ellen gave Gertrude the last name Simmons. At the same time, however, Ellen (at least by Gertrude’s later accounts) taught the girl a deep suspicion and contempt of white people. In her later memoirs (especially “Impressions of an Indian Childhood”), Gertrude paints a happy picture of her life on the reservation with her mother (her real father and stepfathers are not mentioned), but she claimed that this happiness abruptly ended when she was lured away, at age eight, to a white school in Indiana, to be educated and “civilized.”

Gertrude's brother David had already gone off to attend Hampton Normal Institute in Virginia in 1878; in 1881 he returned to the reservation to work as a clerk and then as a teacher of agriculture. From 1882 to 1884 Gertrude herself had attended day school on the Yankton Reservation, but then in February 1884 she decided (against her mother's wishes) to go off to White's Manual Labor Institute, a Quaker-run boarding school in Wabash, Indiana. Her unpleasant experiences there are described in detail in her later memoir, “The School Days of an Indian Girl.” In February 1887 she returned to live with her mother, staying until September 1889 (the same year in which South Dakota became a state). In fall of that year Gertrude (once more against her mother's wishes) began attending the Santee School in Santee, Nebraska, where she stayed until June 1890—the year in which Sitting Bull was murdered and in which 300 Indians were slaughtered in the famous massacre at Wounded Knee, South Dakota. Gertrude stayed with her mother on the Yankton Reservation until February 1891, at which time she returned to White's Manual Labor Institute in Wabash, where she stayed until June 28, 1895. From there she went, in September 1895, to Quaker-affiliated Earlham College in Richmond, Indiana, where she quickly distinguished herself (as she had at White's) as a star student. In February 1896, for instance, she won second prize in the Indiana State Oratorical Contest for a speech in which she offered “a stinging indictment of white society and hypocritical Christianity” (Hafen xvi). The fact that the speech won the prize (and was later reprinted in the Earlham school newspaper) implies that not all whites were as prejudiced as some, but Gertrude nevertheless had reason to remain distrustful: During the contest, students from an opposing school hung up a banner mocking Earlham for being represented by a “squaw.”

During her time at Earlham, Gertrude became an accomplished violinist, pianist, and singer in addition to being a skillful writer. After finishing her studies there in June 1897, she began working as a teacher herself in July at the U.S. Indian Industrial School in Carlisle, Pennsylvania—a position she held until January 1899, which is described in her essay “An Indian Teacher among Indians.” By the time that highly critical essay was published in 1900 in the prominent Atlantic Monthly magazine (one of the nation's leading periodicals), Bonnin had left the school, moved to Boston, adopted the pen name Zitkala-Ša, and begun attending the New England Conservatory of Music. By now she had begun publishing regularly in important journals, and in 1901 a respected Boston publisher issued her first book, Old Indian Legends. In June of that same year, however, she was back in South Dakota, working as a clerk at the Standing Rock Reservation. Although she was briefly engaged to an Indian doctor named Carlos Montezuma, by 1902 she had broken off that relationship, and on August 10 of that year she married Raymond T. Bonnin, who was also a Yankton Indian and who was employed by the Indian Service (the former name of the Bureau of Indian Affairs). Later that year they took up residence at the Uintah Ouray Ute Agency (or Reservation) in Duchesne, Utah, where Raymond had been transferred and where their only child, Raymond Ohiya (or Winner), was born in 1903. The Bonnins resided at this reservation until 1916, and in fact from March 1905 to November 1906 Gertrude taught at the boarding school there. The family did spend the winter of 1908 and spring of 1909 at the Standing Rock Reservation in South Dakota, and in 1908 they also became friends with William F. Hanson, a music teacher from Utah who shared Gertrude's cultural interests and who soon became her collaborator in a plan to produce an opera based on Indian themes. Eventually this work, titled The Sun Dance, premiered in Vernal, Utah, on February 20, 1913, and subsequent stagings took place in December 1913 and February 1914 in Salt Lake City as well as elsewhere that year in other places in Utah.

By this time, however, Gertrude's interests were increasingly social and political rather than strictly literary. Although she continued to compose stories while in Utah (many of them first published long after her death in Dreams and Thunder), more and more of her time was taken up with her involvement in the Society of American Indians (SAI), which had been organized in 1911. She joined its advisory board in 1914 and also did fieldwork for the group, and in 1916 (in the year following the death of her mother, with whom she had continued to have a contentious relationship), she was elected secretary of the SAI and became editor of its publication, American Indian Magazine. In 1917 she and Raymond moved to Washington, D.C., and during this time Raymond also served in the U.S. Army, from which he was honorably discharged in 1919 (the year after the end of World War I). In 1920 women citizens of the United States were granted the right to vote (a right still denied to Indians who were not citizens), and in the same year Congress passed a law granting Indian veterans the right to apply for U.S. citizenship. Gertrude herself had editorialized in favor of the latter move, and she had also campaigned against the use of peyote among Indians. In 1919, however, tensions within the SAI led to her resignation from the organization; in 1920 she became actively involved with the General Federation of Women's Clubs, where, in 1921, she helped form an Indian Welfare Committee and authored a brochure titled Americanize the First Indian: A Plan of Regeneration. In these years she often spoke before groups while wearing traditional Indian costumes and advocating for Indian rights. Also in 1921 her book American Indian Stories was issued by a major press. Gertrude also continued her political activism, working with the Indian Rights Association and the American Indian Defense Association and collaborating on the authorship of a major report, titled Oklahoma's Poor Rich Indian: An Orgy of Graft, Exploitation of the Five Civilized Tribes, Legalized Robbery (1924). All of her advocacy efforts helped to produce some significant fruit in 1924 when a law finally granted citizenship (and thus voting rights) to all noncitizen Indians born in the United States.

In 1926 she and Raymond (who had studied law and had been working as a law clerk) founded the National Council of American Indians (NCAI), with Gertrude as president and Raymond as secretary. They claimed that theirs was the only national Indian organization actually headed by Indians, and in fact Gertrude remained president until her death. For the next decade they traveled widely and often, organizing chapters of the NCAI on numerous reservations, but they also spent much time in Washington, lobbying on behalf of various Indian-related causes and trying to influence the two major political parties to adopt pro-Indian positions. When the Democrats swept into office at the end of 1932 (partly in response to public concern about the Great Depression), many of the reforms that had been advocated by the Bonnins were put into effect. Unfortunately, despite these successes for Indians as a group, the Bonnins themselves were not faring so well. Their financial condition was precarious and became even more so when the health of their son (who was diabetic) became so poor that eventually he, his wife, and their four children had to move in with Gertrude and Raymond in spring 1937. By this time (on a happier note) interest had revived in The Sun Dance opera, and indeed a revised version of the work was chosen by the New York Opera Guild as its opera of the year for 1938, with a performance scheduled for that spring. Gertrude, however, never lived to see the work restaged: She died in Washington, D.C., on January 26, 1938, at age 61 after succumbing to cardiac dilatation and kidney disease. As the wife of a veteran, she was eligible for burial in Arlington National Cemetery, where her headstone reads, "Gertrude Simmons Bonnin—'Zitkala-Sa' of the Sioux Indians—1876–1938" (Lukens 154). Raymond was buried beside her in Arlington when he himself passed away on September 24, 1942.

"Impressions of an Indian Childhood" (1900)

In this memoir describing her earliest recollections, Zitkala-Ša focuses especially on her relations with her mother (who deeply distrusted whites), but she also recounts her relations with her friends, her older relatives, and the wider community. She describes the typical pastimes of her people as well as her own activities and development, and then she also describes how and why she decided to leave her village in order to go off with white missionaries to pursue an education in the East.

“Impressions of an Indian Childhood” has the double advantage of seeming alluringly foreign and deeply familiar. On the one hand, it describes a culture and kind of life with which most people had (and have) little personal experience; reading the memoir therefore appeals to one’s sense of curiosity and answers one’s desire to learn about a distinct and different way of living. On the other hand, many of the experiences described in the essay are ones that will seem instantly recognizable to anyone who has ever been a child (that is, to everyone). The essay has an almost inevitably universal appeal because it deals with so many experiences that are so common and widespread, such as relations with parents (especially with one’s mother), relations with childhood friends, relations with one’s immediate community (including relatives), relations with natural surroundings, the process of maturation, and nostalgia for the simple joys and innocence of childhood. Native American readers are also likely to find the essay appealing as a firsthand and highly affirmative account of the history of their culture, while many white readers will respond to the essay with a strong sense of guilt about the history of the abusive treatment of Native Americans.

The language of this essay, like that of much writing by Zitkala-Ša, is clear and simple but can also seem mannered, “quaint,” predictable, and old-fashioned, as when the author describes herself by saying, “I was as free as the wind that blew my hair, and no less spirited than a bounding deer” (American 8). At times the writing seems sentimental (“My poor child, how I cried with her because the Great Spirit had forgotten us!”; American 10), but at the same time the tone can also be stingingly bitter (as when the girl’s mother describes any paleface as “a sham,—a sickly sham!” and declares that the “bronzed Dakota is the only real man”; American 9). There are times, too, when the writing seems to depart from strict historical accuracy. At one point, for instance, Zitkala-Ša quotes her mother as saying, “There is what the paleface has done! Since then your father too has been buried in a hill nearer the rising sun. We were once happy. But the paleface has stolen our lands and driven us hither. Having defrauded us of our land, the paleface forced us to move away” (American 10).

What this passage fails to make clear, however, is that Gertrude Bonnin’s own father was himself a paleface and that in fact all three of her mother’s husbands were white men. The passage just quoted seems to imply, though, that Zitkala-Ša’s father was an Indian, perhaps even an Indian killed by whites, when in fact he seems to have been a white man named Felker who left his wife (or was sent away) before his daughter was even born. Interestingly enough, the quoted passage is silently omitted when Deborah Rappaport, in the only full-length biography of Zitkala-Ša currently in print, extensively reproduces the rest of this account (10). It is as if Rappaport realized that including the passage might call the general veracity of Zitkala-Ša’s autobiographical reminiscences into question. Gertrude Bonnin had many good practical reasons to want to present herself as a full-blooded Indian and to present her mother as a simple victim of white maliciousness. Not the least of these reasons was a genuine desire to win sympathy for her people and thus help promote achievement of their full human rights. When we know the truth, however, her equivocation runs the risk of making her larger story seeming more generally suspect and therefore less rhetorically effective than it might otherwise have been. In a work claiming to be a reliable historical memoir, any departure from verifiable truth risks damaging the credibility of both the work and the author. A really intriguing memoir might have been written about the attitudes of Gertrude Bonnin’s mother toward Gertrude’s father (or her other white husbands), just as a truly fascinating account might have been offered of Bonnin’s own feelings about her father—feelings that must surely have been quite complicated. Instead, Zitkala-Ša chooses to present a story that is inevitably simpler, more sentimental, and finally less interesting than the truth.

Nevertheless, despite such concerns, “Impressions of an Indian Childhood” retains a good deal of genuine interest, particularly in the ways it depicts the tribal lives of Native Americans. Zitkala-Ša presents the tribe as essentially one large family in which meals are freely shared, the young address any old person as “grandfather” or “grandmother” (and are treated as grandchildren in return), and people often sit together in a “great circle” (American 16)—an appropriate image of the intimate communal life the essay memorializes. Zitkala-Ša’s memories of her childhood focus on literal and figurative warmth; the essay is mostly set during the spring and summer, and when cooler weather intrudes, communal fires provide comfort and a setting for sharing food and stories. At one point, for instance, Zitkala-Ša remembers being told “a long story about a woman whose magic power lay hidden behind the [tattooed] marks upon her face.” Nevertheless, although the tale was initially frightening, she “fell asleep before the story was completed” (American 16–17). Her sleep implies the security she feels as part of the community, even when faced with a frightening story, while the communal storytelling activity itself implies part of the impetus and model for Zitkala-Ša’s own goals as an author. She is the latest link in a long chain of tribal historians and storytellers, and her writing retains many of the features of this basically oral art. Her essays, for instance, tend to ramble a bit; they lack any sense of strict or rigid structure. Narrative threads are sometimes picked up only to be dropped, unresolved, a few paragraphs later. In this sense the essay reflects the desultory style of actual conversation.

In recounting her own life, Zitkala-Ša inevitably recounts the customs of her tribe, and while showing how she herself was informally educated by living among her people, she educates her white readers. The essay shows how she learned about nature, her people, and her people’s relations with whites, and the essay also shows the moral education of the young girl. Among the most appealing aspects of the essay are those moments when Zitkala-Ša mocks herself or shows the ability to be self-critical, as when she “snarl[s]” at her mother at one point for stopping to visit an old woman instead of hastening to a feast and then feels “shame” when she comprehends the generous motives behind her mother’s delay (American 31–32). At another point Zitkala-Ša recounts how, as a very young girl intent on making coffee for a visiting old warrior when her mother was not at home, she used old coffee grounds and warm water. When her mother returned and discovered what had happened, both she and the old warrior laughed, but “neither she nor the warrior, whom the law of our custom had compelled to partake of my insipid hospitality, said anything to embarrass me. They treated my best judgment, poor as it was, with the utmost respect. It was not till long years afterward that I learned how ridiculous a thing I had done” (American 28–29). In moments such as this, Zitkala-Ša shows a winning ability to laugh (or at least crack a thin, snide smile) at herself—an ability that tends to be missing from some of her other autobiographical essays.

Whatever sense of limited paradise Zitkala-Ša enjoyed as a young girl is lost when some white missionaries tempt the children to leave the reservation in order to pursue education at a boarding school farther east. Symbolically, they lure the children with stories of a “great tree where grew red, red apples,” telling them about “how we could reach out our hands and pick all the red apples we could eat” (American 41–42). The symbolism is obvious (perhaps too obvious): The Christian missionaries ironically function here almost as Satanic deceivers, tempting the children in ways that will separate them forever from their once-Edenic surroundings. As the essay ends, Zitkala-Ša presents herself (as she often does in her later memoirs) feeling “as frightened and bewildered as the captured young of a wild creature” (American 45), even though it was she herself, despite her mother’s wishes and advice but also with the approval of a beloved aunt, who had yearned to make the journey. Her later essays emphasize the sufferings that resulted from succumbing to the missionaries’ temptations.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine the way Zitkala-Ša depicts the individual’s relationship with the larger community. You might discuss such matters as relations between parents and children, relations between family and neighbors, and the process of informal education.

2. Discuss the ways elderly Indians are depicted in this work as compared to JACK LONDON's story "The Law of Life." There are some obvious contrasts between the two works in this respect, but can you find some interesting similarities?
3. Discuss the ways the mother is presented in the work. What kinds of advice and/or training does the mother give her child?

"The School Days of an Indian Girl" (1900)

In this sequel to "Impressions of an Indian Childhood," Zitkala-Ša describes her intense unhappiness as a student at a boarding school for Indians—a school run by white Christian missionaries whom she perceives as strange, strict, and even abusive. At the school, she feels regimented, isolated, and eventually rebellious, and she longs for the relative happiness of the life she once enjoyed with her mother on the reservation. Eventually she attends a religiously affiliated college, where she excels at oratory, wins the respect of some of her white classmates, but continues to feel alone and angry, as well as alienated from her own mother.

This essay begins, significantly enough, by mentioning at least two other Indian children by name—Judéwin and Thowin. These references are important, because Zitkala-Ša never gives names to the white people she describes. Instead, they are usually presented as distant, anonymous, often ugly, and frequently menacing figures who frighten the small (or "wee") child even when they try to be affectionate. Perhaps this tactic of denying names to her oppressors was charitable: Perhaps she wanted to avoid merely personal attacks. Or perhaps she assumed that individual names and personalities were unimportant; what mattered, instead, were the motives and deeds of the whites, not their personal identities. In any case, the tactic of denying the whites any particular names makes it easier to treat them simply as anonymous, somewhat inhuman "palefaces" (Zitkala-Ša's favorite term for her oppressors); she thus turns the tables on whites, who tended to think of Indians as undifferentiated members of an inferior group. A white person, reading this essay, experiences how it feels to be the subject of broad stereotypes and racial discrimination, and if the experience is unpleasant, perhaps that is Zitkala-Ša's intention. The essay will be uncomfortable reading for most contemporary whites, not only because they will be distressed to see the ways Native Americans were once mistreated (even by whites whose conscious intentions may have been good), but also because contemporary white readers will feel the sting of the same kinds of prejudices from which Indians so often suffered.

Only rarely are the whites in this essay presented in attractive terms, and even then the depictions are often ambiguous. At one point, for instance, one missionary tosses sweets to the new young students, and Zitkala-Ša eats quite a few. "The missionary's generous distribution of candies was impressed upon my memory," she writes, and for a brief moment it seems as if she will actually have at least one happy reminiscence of her time at the school, but then the sentence continues, and it turns out that the incident was impressed on her memory "by a disastrous result which soon followed. I had caught more than my share of candies and gums, and soon after our arrival at school I had a chance to disgrace myself, which, I am ashamed to say, I did" (American 49). Presumably she became ill from eating all the sweets and perhaps even vomited. Thus the ill-considered attempt to be kind literally made her sick—an apt if unintended symbol of much of what happens in this essay. A similar incident occurs a few sentences later: "A rosy-checked paleface woman caught me in her arms" and tossed the young girl "high in midair." The woman's rosy cheeks and enthusiastic playing might at first seem attractive and positively welcoming, but that is not how Zitkala-Ša remembers the experience: "I was both frightened and insulted by such trifling. . . . My mother had never made a plaything of her wee daughter. Remembering this I began to cry aloud" (American 50). These incidents set the tone and the narrative pattern for much of the rest of the essay: The palefaces behave in ways that are either inadvertently or deliberately upsetting and disturbing, and Zitkala-Ša—even when writing in retrospect—finds their behavior repulsive. The fact that these missionaries were Quakers (a famously gentle, generous, freethinking, and compassionate group) is never mentioned, and the benefits of the schooling (such as the literacy displayed by the essay itself) are rarely stressed. Instead, the memoir often seems deliberately to echo the most depressing descriptions of Mr. Brocklehurst's school, Lowood, in Charlotte Brontë's famous novel Jane Eyre. These resemblances include an enforced policy against "natural" hairstyles, an indifference to the health of the children (an indifference that leads, both in the novel and in the memoir, to the death of a dear friend thanks to "consumption," or tuberculosis [American 66]), and a general regimentation that robs the children of their freedom and peace of mind. Ironically, the resemblances to Jane Eyre (whether intended or not) help remind us that charity boarding schools were often harsh places for anyone in the 19th century, whether the students were Indians like Zitkala-Ša or whites like Jane. Yet the resemblances also lend an undercurrent of credibility and emotional force to Zitkala-Ša's narrative: The school she describes seems in some ways so familiar that we almost feel as if we have been there.

Practically everything about the school suggests unpleasantness and an absence of vitality: The landscape is "bitter-cold," the trees are "bare," there is a "constant clash of harsh noises," and the young girls are described as "marching into the dining room" (which should, ideally, be a place of relaxed pleasure) in "stiff shoes and closely clinging dresses" (American 52). What these descriptions lack in subtlety they make up for in consistency; even eating is done "by formula" (American 54). Natural imagery, when it is used at all, is frequently used to depict the wee Indians as "little animals driven by a herder" (American 56). Even Satan is described in ways that make him resemble a white man: He has a beard "like some I had seen palefaces wear" (American 62), and when Zitkala-Ša later dreams about him, she imagines how his "eyes were fastened upon me" (American 63)—much as the whites in the book are often described as rudely staring at the vulnerable young girl (see, for example, American 48). Ironically, then, in describing the devil ("this white man's legend"; American 62), Zitkala-Ša depicts him as an embodiment of the worst traits of whites themselves. She uses the education she receives about the white man's superstitions as a way of mocking the whites who teach her.

Not all of Zitkala-Ša's experiences with paleface education were entirely negative, however. At the end of her essay she describes her experiences at an unnamed college (which was in fact Earlham College, a Quaker school). Once more Zitkala-Ša describes this latest set of Quakers as "a cold race whose hearts were frozen hard with prejudice" (American 76), but eventually she wins their respect by performing well in a school oratorical contest. Greeted with applause and even with roses by her fellow students even before she learns that she has won first prize, Zitkala-Ša issues one of her few statements of regret about her negative attitudes toward whites: "This friendly token was a rebuke to me for the hard feelings I had borne them" (American 78). It does not take long, however, for her to face further "strong prejudice against my people" when she is sent as Earlham's representative to a state oratorical competition. Students from another school unfurl a "white flag" mocking the fact that Earlham is represented by a "squaw," but when Zitkala-Ša is awarded one of the two top prizes, the hands that held the flag hang "limp in defeat" (American 79–80). Significantly, Zitkala-Ša does not mention that her speech was highly honored despite offering fierce criticism of whites and Christianity, nor that the speech was printed in the school newspaper—facts that suggest that not all whites were as prejudiced as the flag wavers. She thus sacrifices full historical accuracy, as well as the opportunity for a fuller psychological and artistic complexity, in the interests of immediate, short-term rhetorical effect. Her reasons for doing so are of course understandable. Ironically, however, the more prominent and respected Zitkala-Ša became as an advocate for her people, the more likely it became that students of her life would become aware of discrepancies between the facts of that life and the image she offers of herself in her published works. Paradoxically, if her essays seem in some ways less credible today than when they were first published, that is partly because they contributed so effectively to the fame that made her life an object of later scholarly study. The more famous she became, the more incentive scholars had to probe the details of her life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine the way schools and schooling are described in this essay. You might compare the depiction of schooling here with that of W. E. B. DuBois's book The Souls of Black Folk. What experiences did the two authors have in common? How did their experiences differ? What are the attitudes of each author toward education?
2. In his book Up from Slavery, BOOKER T. WASHINGTON describes his own experiences as a teacher of Native Americans at a school primarily intended for blacks. How does Washington's report of these experiences shed light on Zitkala-Ša's memoir, and how does Zitkala-Ša's memoir shed light on Washington's account?
3. Compare and contrast this essay with COUNTEE CULLEN's poem titled "Incident." How are the attitudes of the two central characters similar and/or different? What do both works imply about the later importance of childhood events?

"An American Teacher among Indians" (1900)

In this third of a trio of autobiographical essays published in 1900, Zitkala-Ša describes her transition from student to a teacher herself at a school for Native Americans, but her experiences there are not much happier than earlier. She feels physically weak and psychologically drained, and she perceives herself as being treated with condescension, almost as if she were a domesticated animal. When she is sent west to recruit new students, she encounters an ugly white man, voracious white settlers, and impoverished relatives, and she concludes that education of the Indians may do more harm than good.

This essay is full of imagery of confinement and oppression. Early in the work, Zitkala-Ša describes herself traveling on a train toward her new post as a teacher at an unnamed school for Indians (which was actually located in Carlisle, Pennsylvania). She feels "tired and hot" and is surrounded by "a black veiling of car smoke" (American Indian 81), and the images do not improve much even after she arrives at her destination. The school, to be sure, is more attractive than the town itself ("The large trees among the houses [of the campus] gave the place a cool, refreshing shade, and the grass a deeper green"; American 82), but it is not long before Zitkala-Ša finds herself in her own small room, with its "ghastly walls," its curtains "yellowed with age," and its "stiff-backed chairs" (although at least the bed is "clean" and "white"; American 82). The essay, then, shows a careful attention to imagery, the connotations of which are used indirectly to reinforce Zitkala-Ša's overt declarative statements.

Particularly interesting is the way Zitkala-Ša describes her first encounter with her new employer (who remains unnamed, as does every other white in her three early autobiographical memoirs). At first she hears a "heavy tread" stop outside her door; then she encounters an "imposing figure." Initially, then, it seems as if she will be having the latest in her long line of negative encounters with intimidating whites. However, to her surprise (and ours), the imposing figure belongs to a "stately gray-haired man," who, "with the right hand extended for greeting, . . . smiled kindly upon me." Zitkala-Ša feels "awed by his wondrous height and strong square shoulders." It is a rare moment: Zitkala-Ša seems to have met a friendly, welcoming white person, and the narrative thus gains an unexpected complexity. Almost immediately, however, she senses his disappointment: "he looked into my face. I imagined that a visible shadow flitted across his countenance as he let my hand fall." He is soon calling her a "little Indian girl," and Zitkala-Ša reports that "I thought I heard a subtle note of disappointment in his voice." The fact that she says she “imagine[s]” the shadow on his face and only thinks she hears his disappointment raises the brief possibility that she is being overly sensitive and is willing to consider the possibility that her own attitude may be partly at fault, but soon she is referring without irony to the “lines of pain” on her face, to her “ill fortune,” and to her “unhappy silence” as she feels herself being “watched by those around me.” Soon, too, her employer is telling her—in phrasing she clearly considers patronizing rather than fatherly or affectionate—that he intends to “turn [her] loose to pasture” (American 83–85). In other words, he plans to send her west to recruit new Native American students. It is as if she is being treated as a sheepdog, sent out to round up new victims to be fleeced of their cultural heritage. The third memoir, in other words, repeats the pattern so well established in the first two—a pattern in which Zitkala-Ša becomes a victim of whites (often thanks to her own good intentions).

After the “intense heat” and “sticky car smoke” belching from the “iron horse” (i.e., train) on which Zitkala-Ša travels west, she is met by a white man who seems, if anything, even less appealing than the train ride. Although he is very briefly described as a “trustworthy driver,” his unattractive features soon take center stage: His “unkempt flaxen hair hung shaggy about his ears and his leather neck of reddish tan. From accident or decay he had lost one of his long front teeth.” Zitkala-Ša notes that although she calls him “a paleface, his cheeks were of a brick red. His moist blue eyes, blurred and bloodshot, twitched involuntarily. . . . His weather-stained clothes fitted badly his warped shoulders. He was stooped, and his protruding chin, with its tuft of dry flax, nodded as monotonously as did the head of his faithful beast” (American 87; italics added). Interestingly enough, Zitkala-Ša, who just a few paragraphs earlier had seemed to object to being treated as an animal, now describes the driver in blatantly animalistic terms, especially in the final quoted sentence but also in the italicized phrases. If turnabout is fair play, then Zitkala-Ša effectively retaliates against prejudiced whites by letting such readers experience the feeling of being described as beasts. Indeed the joke—whether intended or not—goes deeper, since this “paleface” is not pale, and in fact his skin is far redder than any “red man’s.” When Zitkala-Ša arrives with him at her mother’s cabin, her mother is momentarily stunned by the appearance of this man and his “jagged teeth” (American 89). Even though Zitkala-Ša had earlier mentioned that the driver had been taking passengers to the small village for “a long time” (American 87), her mother does not recognize him and seems to worry that her daughter has taken the ugly paleface home as a suitor. In this passage as in various others, Zitkala-Ša gives whites a taste of their own medicine, letting paleface readers experience for themselves how it feels to be the object of ethnic and cultural disdain.

A similar reversal occurs a few paragraphs later, when Zitkala-Ša describes the horde of “broad-footed white beggars” who have recently staked claims to lands near the reservation (American 93). Whites of the time may have liked to think of themselves as a cultivated, civilizing influence on the allegedly “primitive” Indians, but the attitude of Zitkala-Ša’s mother toward these newcomers is wholly contemptuous, and Zitkala-Ša herself writes about them with a kind of derisive pity. Once again a basic rhetorical strategy of this essay seems to be to turn the tables on any potential white racist readers, sending back to them the repugnance they have so often expressed toward Indians. Thus she describes some of her fellow teachers at the Indian school in Carlisle with bitter opprobrium: One is depicted as an “opium-eater” and as a “pumpkin-colored creature,” another is described as “stupid” and an “inebriate paleface,” and even the “few rare” whites who seem well intentioned and well qualified also seem “powerless to choose workmen like themselves.” Given these attitudes, it is little wonder that Zitkala-Ša “made no friends among the race of people I loathed” (American 95–97). Her essay seems designed to refute any condescending stereotypes of Indians (and especially of Indian women) as passive, long-suffering, inarticulate, faint hearted weaklings who had been beaten down and defeated by representatives of a supposedly sophisticated, powerful, well-intentioned, highly cultured, and ultimately charitable civilization.

In the present memoir and elsewhere, Zitkala-Ša shows that she can give as good as she gets, having learned well the old biblical axiom of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read this essay in conjunction with ZORA NEALE HURSTON's essay "How It Feels to Be Colored Me." Discuss such matters as tone, attitude, rhetorical strategies, and views of self and others. Which essay strikes you as being a more effective piece of writing? Explain why. Which essay seems more realistic? Explain.
2. Compare and contrast the attitudes toward schools and schooling expressed in this essay with the attitudes expressed in LANGSTON HUGHES's poem "Theme for English B." What views of self and others are implied in each work? What is the final tone of each text?
3. Examine the role of the white philanthropists described in this work. How are the motives and the results of the philanthropy ambiguous? To what extent do the philanthropists deserve disdain, respect, or some combination of the two?

Old Indian Legends (1901)

This collection of 14 traditional Native American tales is typical of much folklore in its emphasis on animals who talk and behave as humans do, humans who are closely in touch with nature, and people (and even anthropomorphic animals!) who live according to the ancient ways of an ancient culture. The tales provide insights into the values and customs of American Indians, the stories are frequently amusing but sometimes have darker overtones, and almost always a moral lesson of some kind is stated or implied. A particularly important recurring character is Iktomi, a trickster who has a penchant for getting into complicated predicaments and who is often punished for his deceit.

By collecting and collating various versions of the tales presented here, Zitkala-Ša sought to preserve and pass on in writing the essentially oral culture of her people; she realized that unless their culture was preserved and reinvigorated, Indians themselves might die out as a distinct (and distinctive) people. Zitkala-Ša claims to have heard the legends directly from "old Dakota story-tellers," and she says that she "often listened to the same story told over again by a new story-teller" (Old iv). The fact that she found these "renderings varying much in little incidents" (Old iv) gives her license to conflate various versions, just as it gives her license to introduce variations of her own.

The political dimensions of the collection are also implied in Zitkala-Ša's preface, where she justifies her decision to reproduce the tales in English by slyly noting that "America in the last few centuries has acquired a second tongue" (Old v)—phrasing that subtly reminds readers that Indians were the continent's first inhabitants but that they have, in the meantime, lost most of their earlier control. The quoted phrasing never mentions the horrible violence by which America "has acquired a second tongue," but the disparity between this polite terminology and the violent facts lurking behind it is deftly ironic. By retelling these legends, then, Zitkala-Ša not only seeks to preserve a sense of native culture for native peoples themselves but also seeks to show the value in (and values of) a culture that has been pushed to the brink of extinction. Paradoxically, by emphasizing the legends of Native Americans, Zitkala-Ša also seeks to show their "near kinship with the rest of humanity" and point toward "the great brotherhood of mankind" (Old v).

Although many of the tales give the appearance of being straightforward moral fables intended chiefly for children, in some of them definite adult political overtones are loudly audible. "The Badger and the Bear," for instance, is essentially an allegory about the mistreatment of Indians by whites: A kindly badger family assists a sickly, impoverished bear who asks for help. They feed him generously until he becomes so strong that he seizes their food and evicts them from their home. As a result, the badgers themselves become desperately poor; facing starvation, they ask for assistance from the bear, but he and his family turn them away and laugh at their plight. Only one ugly cub, treated as a pariah by the others, even attempts to help the needy badgers, and even he must act with cautious circumspection. Ultimately, however, the badgers perform a magic rite that raises up a powerful, avenging warrior, and it is only when confronted with this threat of force that the worried bears behave with even a pretense of decency. The “real” meaning of this tale is clear enough, but the point is cleverly made through the use of animals as characters. The appearance of the avenging warrior at the end of the story is, however, troubling in various ways. It is sad to think that the only means by which Indians will achieve justice is through force, and it is perhaps sadder to think that even this drastic solution may be only a fantasy that will never actually materialize. The miraculous warrior and the happy ending he provides are the only two elements of this tale that seem less than realistic. As Zitkala-Ša undoubtedly understood, in “real life” (unlike in fiction) satisfying solutions were often hard to come by.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the Native American folklore recorded in this book with the African-American folklore recorded in Zora Neale Hurston’s Mules and Men. What similarities do you see in terms of themes, images, plots, characters, imagery, and tone? How do black folklore and Indian folklore differ?
2. Folklore is often thought to be especially interesting to children. Explain why. What aspects of plot, characterization, narrative technique, and imagery might make these legends particularly appealing to children?
3. Compare and contrast these stories with a well-known collection of European folktales, such as Aesop’s Fables. What traits do the two collections share? How are they distinctive? Do the similarities imply anything about the possible existence of a broadly shared “human nature”?

American Indian Stories* (1921)

This collection consists of 10 items: the three well-known autobiographical tales first published in 1900, an essay called “The Great Spirit” in some versions of the book (and titled “Why I Am a Pagan” in other editions), a number of obviously fictional tales, and a concluding essay titled “America’s Indian Problem.” The items vary in tone, method, technique, and skill, but throughout them all runs a fundamental concern with protecting and preserving Native American culture.

American Indian Stories is in some ways a puzzling book. The title, for instance, suggests that the work will be a collection of fictional tales, but most scholars have treated the opening three entries as examples of relatively straightforward autobiography. While the fourth seems to be an essay, the next several do seem to be stories, and the final piece is essentially a political pamphlet that quotes, at great and sometimes clumsy length, an earlier municipal research report. To make matters even more complicated, one reprint edition of the book (with a foreword by Dexter Fisher) gives the title of the fourth piece as “The Great Spirit,” while the reprint published by Rio Grande Press gives the title as “Why I Am a Pagan.” Moreover, in the various editions this essay concludes differently: In the Rio Grande Press reprint, immediately after the sentence that ends with the reference to the “sweet breathing of flowers,” the ensuing statement concludes the piece: “If this is Paganism, then at present, at least, I am a Pagan” (American 107). The edition with the foreword by Fisher, on the other hand, omits this provocative assertion and instead ends with an extremely lyrical paragraph. To add to the textual complexity, the essay titled “America’s Indian Problem” is omitted altogether from the Rio Grande Press reprint (even though it is listed in the table of contents!). Finally, it is worth noting that while most other editors have treated the first three pieces in the book as autobiographical essays or memoirs, Cathy N. Davidson and Ada Norris, in their recent Penguin edition, treat the works as fictional stories (although they tend to do so inconsistently). American Indian Stories, in short, is a work that defies easy or conventional classification in terms of genre, style, method, or organization.

Of the more clearly fictional works included in the volume, “The Soft-Hearted Sioux” runs the - appeal to the broadest range of readers? (Explain why and how.) Choose four separate works—two examples of fiction and two examples of nonfiction—and discuss the audiences to which each work seems primarily addressed.

5. Compare and contrast the central figure of Zitkala-Ša's three major autobiographical essays (in American Indian Stories) with Helga Crane, the central character of NELLA LARSEN's novel Quicksand. How are the two figures similar in their moods, views, and basic psychology? How are they similar in their experiences, including their experiences with educational institutions and their relations with family members? How does each character tend to relate to other people? Toward whom is most of the antagonism of each character directed?
 6. Examine a collection of writings by other American Indian women authors from roughly the same period as Zitkala-Ša. (See, for instance, the book titled Native American Women's Writing 1800–1924: An Anthology, edited by Karen L. Kilcup.) How are Zitkala-Ša's works typical of the works included in such a collection, particularly in theme, style, narrative techniques, and aesthetic success? How are they atypical? With which other writers does Zitkala-Ša seem to have most in common? With which other writers does she seem to have least in common?
 7. Choose five different passages from five different works by Zitkala-Ša and discuss the effectiveness with which they are written. Discuss them, for instance, in terms of diction, imagery, tone, sentence structure, and rhythm. What are their strengths and/or weaknesses? What makes them interesting (and/or uninteresting) simply as pieces of writing? In what ways was Zitkala-Ša most talented as a writer?
 8. Does it matter that Zitkala-Ša sometimes presents herself and her life in ways that seem to be at variance with the facts? Does it matter that she sometimes seems to omit potentially significant information from her autobiographical writings? Should such matters affect the value of her works or the way we respond to them? Justify your answers in detail.
 9. What factors, aside from racial or ethnic discrimination, might help explain the tones and attitudes expressed in Zitkala-Ša's autobiographical essays of 1900? For instance, how might her relations with her mother, father, and stepfathers have affected her basic outlook on life? How might that outlook have been affected by her early experiences with poverty? How might her views be seen as typical of children of any ethnic background who are separated from their parents and sent off to boarding schools?
 10. What historical events involving Native Americans were occurring at the very end of the 19th century that might help provide significant contexts for Zitkala-Ša's autobiographical essays of 1900? How might those events help explain the tones, attitudes, and rhetorical strategies adopted in the essays? Did Zitkala-Ša ever adopt significantly different tones or attitudes in other essays? For instance, compare her earlier essay titled "Side by Side" with the autobiographical memoirs. How do the rhetorical techniques in that essay differ from the techniques employed in the memoirs of 1900?

WILLA CATHER (1873–1947)

To feel greatly is genius, and to make others feel is art.

(The Kingdom of Art)

Willa Cather was born on a farm in Back Creek, Virginia, just 50 miles northwest of Washington, D.C., on December 7, 1873. The Cather family had been in Virginia for four generations and had been divided by the Civil War, with Willa's great-grandfather James supporting the South because he believed in state's rights and her grandfather William supporting the Union cause and sending his sons, including Cather's father, into West Virginia to avoid conscription into the Confederate Army. Her mother's side of the family was similarly divided by the war: Her grandmother Rachel Boak abhorred slavery, yet her three sons served in the army of the confederacy, and one son died in its service. By the time of Cather's birth, her community, which was on a strategic highway between North and South, was still recovering from the ravages of the war.

Despite her roots in the American South, however, Cather is probably best known for her literary portrayals of the frontier landscape of Nebraska, where she and her parents and siblings moved, joining her paternal grandparents and an uncle and aunt who had already migrated west, during the spring of Cather's ninth year. The family's migration was part of a vast national postwar movement to the West that had been opened up by the Homestead Act of 1862, an act that attracted huge numbers of American citizens as well as European immigrants—Swedes, Danes, Bohemians, Norwegians, Germans, and Russians—with the promise of free land to homesteaders willing to put virgin prairies under the plow and to build and occupy their homes on those empty plains. While much of Cather's fiction expresses a deep and abiding love for the prairie landscape, her initial response had been one of horror at the difference between the plains and the Virginia hills. The prairie was, she later reflected, “as bare as a piece of sheet iron,” and “it felt a good deal as if we had come to the end of everything—it was a kind of erasure of personality” (In Person 10). But, she would conclude, “The country and I had it out together and by the end of the first autumn, that shaggy grass country had gripped me with a passion I have never been able to shake” (In Person 32). Accepting the West, and all the perils it held for an aspiring young artist, however, was not so easy for Cather as this description might suggest. For instance, in the dissatisfied days between her graduation from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln and a job offer the following spring in Pittsburgh, she felt so exiled in the West that she headed her letters from Red Cloud with “Siberia” (Woodress 104). Even into adulthood when Cather had moved away and visited the Midwest only on occasion, she continued to suffer from a “fear of dying in a cornfield” and “an unreasoning fear of being swallowed by the distances” between her and all that was going on in the world outside Red Cloud (Sergeant 49, 79).

Expressing her conflicting feelings, Cather herself concluded that Nebraska was both “the happiness and the curse of my life” (In Person 32).

In her first years on the prairies, young Cather had a special ability to make friends with many of the neighboring immigrant families, even when they could not speak much English. She felt that they shared her sense of alienation, and she credited those immigrants with offering the first taste she knew of the richness of European culture. Talking to them provided an intellectual excitement she had never before known. Later their stories would figure prominently in her fiction, as she became one of the first mainstream writers to include immigrants as a positive part of her literary landscape.

Less than two years after moving to the Nebraska farm, Charles Cather moved the family 12 miles south to the small town of Red Cloud, the site of a spur of the Burlington Northern Railroad and the county seat of Webster County. They settled there permanently, and Cather's father opened an office dealing in insurance, real estate, and farm loans. Red Cloud would inhabit Cather's imagination for the remainder of her life; later she used the town repeatedly as a setting for her fiction, accurately detailing key geographical details, even if the name had been changed—Hanover in O Pioneers!, Black Hawk in My Ántonia, and Sweet Water in A Lost Lady, to name a few. During her adolescence in Red Cloud, Cather developed friendships with key town figures: Julia Miner, the daughter of a famous Norwegian oboist, offered Cather her first experience of serious music. Dr. McKeeby, the family's physician, and a colleague, Dr. Damerell, regularly invited young Cather to go out on calls with them; on one occasion, Cather reportedly administered chloroform while Dr. Damerell amputated a boy's leg. Silas Garber, former state governor and founder of Red Cloud, and his wife, Lyra, often invited Cather to events at their home, which was as close to a Victorian mansion as the town could ever claim. Mr. Schindelmeisser, a German itinerant piano teacher, once told Cather's mother that she was wasting money on Willa's piano lessons because all the young girl wanted to do was hear stories about his musical career in Europe (Cather's mother, by the way, dismissed his concerns, saying her daughter was learning a great deal from listening to music and stories). These Red Cloud figures would all later be transformed into fictional characters in Cather's novels and short stories—testament to Cather's lifelong belief that “All my stories have been written with material that was gathered—no, God save us! not gathered but absorbed—before I was fifteen years old” (In Person 43).

During her high school years, Cather studied Latin and Greek and voraciously read Virgil, Ovid, and the Iliad in their original languages, as well as reading important authors writing in English—Shakespeare, Tennyson, Emerson, Dickens, Hawthorne, Ruskin, and Carlyle, among others. Through her associations with the town's doctors, she became interested in biology, medicine, and dissection (she identified “vivisection” and “Slicing Toads” as a “favorite amusement” during summer vacations and “amputating limbs” as her idea of “perfect happiness” in an autobiographical survey she completed in 1888). When she graduated from high school in 1890, at the age of 16, she and two classmates gave graduation speeches that were published in the local newspaper. In her speech, entitled “Superstition versus Imagination,” Cather eloquently argued: “Scientific investigation is the hope of our age, as it must precede all progress”; however, she admitted that science was not the only valid approach to “the mysteries of the unknowable.” Imagination was the necessary complement: “Microscopic eyes,” she wrote, “have followed matter to the molecule and fallen blinded. Imagination has gone a step farther and grasped the atom” (quoted in Woodress 62).

Equipped with this passion for scientific investigation, Cather enrolled, with the intention of being a premed major, at the University of Nebraska in the state capital of Lincoln that fall as a “second prep” (meaning that she was a nonmatriculated student given one year to meet the university's rigorous entrance requirements). With a population of 35,000, Lincoln—150 miles northeast of Red Cloud—was the largest city Cather had lived in so far, and she was amazed at the notable modern improvements she found there: telephone and electric-light companies, a six-story “skyscraper,” a public library, two thriving newspapers, and two theaters that, because of the city’s location on the east-west railway lines, attracted the important traveling companies of the day.

The opportunity for women to earn college degrees had dramatically increased over the course of the second half of the 19th century. Elizabeth Blackwell had been the first woman in the country admitted to medical school, but when she graduated at the top of her class in 1849, no hospital would allow her to practice in its facility. Other women in the country had earned law degrees but were then refused licenses to practice. By 1880, just a decade before Cather enrolled at Lincoln, the first Ph.D. was awarded to an American woman in the humanities. Despite opposition from scientists like the Harvard professor Dr. Edward Clarke, who in 1873 wrote that higher education exposed women to mental stimulus their underdeveloped brains could not tolerate and that such intellectual stimulation threatened their reproductive capacities, the numbers of women enrolling in universities steadily climbed, until, at the turn of the century, female enrollments nearly equaled male enrollments in more than a dozen states across the country, including Nebraska.

Although Cather had planned to become a doctor, by the end of her first year at the university, something had happened that would forever change her plans. She wrote a paper for her English class about the philosopher and historian Thomas Carlyle, and her professor was so impressed that, without her knowledge, he submitted her essay to the Nebraska State Journal, the leading newspaper in the state and an important publication in the region. Seeing her essay in print in the Sunday morning edition had a mesmerizing effect, so much so that she immediately changed her major to English.

With characteristic passion, Cather threw herself into her new field. Her first short story, “Peter,” was published in a Boston magazine in May 1892 when she was just 18. Focusing on a Bohemian immigrant and former violinist who commits suicide on his family’s homestead in Nebraska, the story—based on a true one Cather had heard from her European neighbors when she first moved to the plains—would later serve as the kernel for her 1918 novel My Ántonia. In addition to these early publications, during her remaining years at the University of Nebraska she would act in various editorial capacities on three university publications, including a stint as editor in chief of the Hesperian, the university’s premier literary magazine. Numerous early Cather short stories were used to fill the pages of the Hesperian.

During those years, Cather found ways to be paid for her writing. In 1894 she wrote a ghost story called “The Fear That Walks by Noonday,” winning a $10 writing prize at a time when that amount could buy a fine set of silverware or a steel beam plow from the Sears and Roebuck catalog. She also began a position as a paid theater critic for the Nebraska State Journal, a job that gave her a dollar a page for what she would later characterize as “my florid, exaggerated, foamy-at-the-mouth, adjective-spree period” (In Person 12). Nevertheless, she made enough money to pay $15 a month for a rented room, as well as her university expenses. In her two and a half years as theater critic, she would write more than 200 1,000-word reviews; Cather’s biographer James Woodress estimates that she wrote more during these years than in all of her later work. But the pace she kept was exhausting. She spent her days at the university, carrying a full course load and continuing for most of that year as the managing editor of the Hesperian; her evenings were spent at performances, and the early morning hours were spent at the Journal offices writing reviews about everything from melodramas and minstrel shows to Madame Modjeska. It is no wonder, then, that Stephen Crane, who met Cather when he was in Nebraska to report on the drought, remembered her as the one person he had ever known who could sleep standing up. Her work left little time for studying, and, she would later confess, it was only by inspiration that she passed her examinations during her senior year. Cather's energies were instead directed to her new vocation, reviewing performances by the best that the late 19th-century stage had to offer: Clara Morris, Julia Marlowe, Nellie Melba, Emma Calvé, Richard Mansfield, and—Cather's favorite—the famous French actress Sarah Bernhardt.

Cather's columns were part drama criticism, part biographical notes about performers, and part meditation on the nature of art. The voice of the young drama critic is filled with vibrancy and fervor; for instance, in a column about Bernhardt, she dramatically declares: "To aspire and create and conquer, to strike fire from flint, to compel the worship of an indifferent world, to make the blind see and the deaf hear whether they will or no, to win the world's highest honor and noisiest fame, that is great" (Kingdom 155). Those late nights of writing were a valuable apprenticeship for Cather, an opportunity to find and exercise her voice, to work out many of her artistic principles, to analyze the process of creation, and to observe the demands of artistic life.

Cather recognized in the reviews that the performer's profession was characterized by a sacrifice of personal life: "Art of every kind is an exacting master, more so than even Jehovah. He says only, 'Thou shalt have no other gods before me.' Art, science, and letters cry, "'Thou shalt have no other gods at all.' They accept only human sacrifices" (quoted in Woodress 74). The artist, Cather wrote, must "cling" to art, "forsaking all others, and keeping unto her as long as they two shall live" (Kingdom 407), for "domestic and artistic life do not mix well. . . . Liberty and solitude, they are the two wings of art" (World 194).

Not only was she discovering firsthand what it meant to be an artist, Cather was gaining a reputation. Her work became the reason the Des Moines Register could declare, "The best theatrical critics of the west are said to be connected with the Lincoln, Neb. press" (Kingdom 14–15). Her reviews often demonstrated an acerbic wit so fatal that one theatrical manager stated that "poor companies begin to tremble long before they get here [to Lincoln]"

(World 226). Will Owen James, Cather's managing editor at the Journal, characterized her as the "meatax" critic, adding, "Miss Cather did not stand in awe of the greatest actors, but set each one in his place with all the authority of a veteran metropolitan critic" (Kingdom 17). She had, said another editor, "a most entertaining way of crucifying ambitious actors and actresses" (Kingdom 17).

But when Cather graduated from the university in 1895, the 21-year-old was at a loss for what to do next. She applied for an opening as a university English teacher, but her application was blackballed by a former professor who failed to see her promise. Back home in Red Cloud, feeling aimless and banished from the world, she gladly accepted a job offer the following spring to edit Home Monthly in Pittsburgh. Cather packed her bags and headed east—never again to live for any extended period in the West.

The Home Monthly, however, was a short-lived women's magazine, trying to find its place in the new publication niche created at the turn of the century by the Ladies' Home Journal. Instead of writing about art and literature, Cather found herself required to produce copy on babies and mince pies, occasionally supplemented by the inclusion of one of her own short stories, usually printed under a pseudonym to disguise the fact that she was almost single-handedly writing most of the issues. When the magazine was sold more than a year later, she began reviewing for the Pittsburgh Daily Leader, where she stayed until March 1900, when she accepted a job as a teacher of Latin, algebra, and composition at a Pittsburgh high school. Her work as a math teacher was fortunately temporary: Cather had struggled with math; as an adult, whenever she was under stress, she recalled suffering from nightmares about taking math exams. However, she enjoyed teaching composition and Latin. Beloved by her students, Cather was an effective and forthright teacher who demanded the best from her pupils and did not abide sloppy or halfhearted work.

In Pittsburgh, Cather continued writing short stories and poetry when she could steal away a few hours from editing, reviewing, or teaching. She did manage to publish a modest and largely unnoticed collection of poems, April Twilights (1903), and a collection of short stories, The Troll Garden (1905), which garnered only a little more attention than her poetry. But her long apprenticeship would eventually pay off in spring 1906, when Sam McClure, publisher of the muckraking McClure's Magazine, took notice of her. McClure's—which published investigative exposés on big business and labor unions, as well as some of the best fiction of the time by the best writers of the time—was the premier periodical publication in the early century. McClure offered Cather a job, first as its literary editor and later, when she had proven herself, as the magazine's managing editor. As the only female editor of a preeminent magazine during the first decade of the century, Cather was in a unique position of power. Once again she threw herself into her tasks wholeheartedly, so much so that Viola Roseboro, Cather's colleague at McClure's, claimed that "If Willa Cather had been a scrub-woman, she would have scrubbed much harder than any other scrub-women" (quoted in Woodress 71). During her years at McClure's, Cather wrote very little fiction because she had to focus her efforts on editing and journalism. She also ghost wrote two extensive book manuscripts: the biography of the Christian Science founder Mary Baker Eddy and the autobiography of her boss, Sam McClure. Cather's job had been exhausting, and McClure, a man who reportedly "had three hundred ideas a minute" (quoted in Woodress 187), relied on Cather heavily. But as gratifying as it must have been to hold more editorial power than any other woman editor of the time, the work had exhausted Cather and taken its toll on her own literary aspirations.

One good thing that came out of her work at the magazine was the chance to become acquainted with important artists and writers. She got to know Mark Twain in his final years and acquired pieces for publication from THEODORE DREISER, JACK LONDON, and the playwright Zoë Atkins. Perhaps the most significant association of those years was with the Maine short story writer Sarah Orne Jewett, author of Country of the Pointed Firs. Jewett became Cather's mentor, advising her that her incessant responsibilities at the magazine would hinder her development as a fiction writer; that she must find her "own quiet center of life, and write from that to the world"; that what little she was managing to do suffered from her attempt to imitate other authors; and that she ought to draw upon the authentic material of her youth in Virginia and Nebraska as subject matter (quoted in Woodress 203).

It would be almost three more years before Cather could take Jewett's advice and end her association with the magazine. During her last months with McClure's, she somehow managed, in spite of a serious illness and editorial duties, to write her short novel, Alexander's Bridge, about an engineer, Bartley Alexander, who builds a bridge across the St. Lawrence River and begins an illicit love affair with an old flame. In it, Cather imitated the style and subject matter of Henry James, the most respected American novelist of the time; his work, however, was foreign territory to her. Often called "novels of manners," James's works were distinctly urban and cosmopolitan, frequently treating wealthy characters from high society who travel the world and are well connected. As much as she admired James, Cather grew to think of her own Jamesian novel as "shallow" and "conventional" (On Writing 91), perhaps because she recognized that it still failed to benefit from the advice given by Jewett to "write about your own country" (quoted in Woodress 223).

The summer after leaving McClure's Cather was exploring the cliff dwellings at Walnut Canyon, near Flagstaff, Arizona, when she had an epiphany much like that she would later portray in The Song of the Lark. She had never before seen the cliff dwellings, but she had heard of them since childhood; viewing them for the first time was a profound experience that would be translated repeatedly in her later novels. There, she relates, she "recovered from the conventional editorial point of view" (On Writing 92) and, as did Thea in her novel, fully acknowledged how discontented and unfulfilled she felt.

That summer gave Cather the clarity to realize other things, as well: She acknowledged that working with the writing of others at McClure's meant she had not given full attention to her own work and that if she were to succeed as a writer at all, she would need to recognize that the West was the real material of her art.

The result of this dramatic realization was O Pioneers!, a novel about a family of Swedish homesteaders in Nebraska, a book in which she lets the country be the hero of the novel. Cather had found her own voice at last and had also found a way to make a unique contribution to American literature; she was writing not the Jamesian novel of manners but, as she called it, a “novel of the soil” (On Writing 93).

O Pioneers! would mark a personal transition in Cather's life, as well. For the first time, she was making a living as a novelist. She had finally completed the long years of apprenticeship as theater critic, teacher, editor, and journalist. Subsequent books drew increasing fame and even international recognition. Her next novel, My Ántonia, won wide acclaim, and in 1923, she won the Pulitzer Prize for One of Ours. Her work in the 1920s with such important novels as A Lost Lady, The Professor's House, and Death Comes for the Archbishop only solidified her position as a premier American writer, among the most significant creative artists of the 20th century.

She enjoyed financial success as well. Even when the financial straits of the Great Depression hit the dozen or more drought-plagued families she still kept in contact with in Nebraska, Cather was able to send them blankets, clothes, canned food, and substantial checks. In 1936, she decided she was no longer buying gifts for anyone but the destitute farmers she knew in Nebraska. In the 1930s, the time between her publications increased, and in 1940 she would publish her final novel, Sapphira and the Slave Girl.

Cather died in 1947 at the age of 63. She is buried in Jaffrey, New Hampshire, in a small cemetery, where her gravestone is inscribed with a quote from My Ántonia: “That is happiness; to be dissolved into something complete and great.”

Since the 1980s, scholars have raised the issue that Cather may have been a lesbian whose sexual preference might have shaped her fiction. Although Cather may have been a lesbian, her sexuality was nothing she ever cared to express openly. Her sexual identity, ultimately, is a complex issue that has confounded those looking for easy answers. In her teens, Cather went through a period of identifying herself as “Wm. Cather, M.D.”—a pose that suggested not only her aspirations to be a doctor but her realization that men had more social power than did women. This period is also marked by her experimentation with male clothing styles; numerous pictures from the period show Cather with cropped hair and dressed in jacket and tie. To her credit, Willa's mother, Virginia Cather—herself someone who embodied a sense of genteel femininity—gave young Cather the space and latitude to experiment with gender roles, even to the extent of having the phase documented with so many photos. Even so, while her clothing may have been an expression of Cather's growing awareness of her sexual orientation, some critics have also placed her cross-dressing into a cultural context of young girls' mimicking the famous actresses of the time who occasionally assumed male roles.

Letters from Cather's early years hint that she had a romantic attachment to Louise Pound, a classmate at the university, and later in Pittsburgh, to Isabel McClung, the daughter of an affluent and socially prominent family. Cather did share a nearly 40-year friendship with Edith Lewis, who was named as the executor of Cather's estate and inherited Cather's property, a substantial financial portion of the estate, and royalties from her books. The intimacy of their relationship is in question.

During her lifetime, Cather had seen Oscar Wilde brought up on charges of homosexuality in a very nasty, public scandal; what she wrote about him in her theater and book reviews is therefore quite revealing. While she personally thought Wilde largely a second-rate writer who relied too much on cleverness, whose insincerity made him, she said, “a buffoon and a harlequin,” she decried his being dismissed and reviled, despite his literary achievements. Ultimately, she voiced anger at Wilde, not for being a gay man, but for the “crime” of courting unseemly public notoriety instead of having “reverence for his own gift” (World 264; see also 154 and 89–92).

Cather, who had once discussed being “married” to her art and had also proclaimed that art was “an exacting master, more so than even Jehovah,” would have been horrified to have been characterized as a “lesbian writer” rather than just purely as a “writer.” In her earliest reviews, we can also see how Cather resisted the idea that people are wholly or even significantly defined by their sexuality. In an 1899 review of Kate Chopin’s The Awakening, a landmark novel in which the main character, Edna Pontellier, ultimately kills herself because she remains unfulfilled and unhappy, Cather faults Edna for being so caught up in a sexual liaison that she forgets the finer things in life, such as art. Counting her among misguided women who are solely defined by their sexuality, Cather writes, “These people really expect the passion of love to fill and gratify every need of life, whereas nature only intended that it should meet one of many demands. They insist upon making it stand for all the emotional pleasures of life and art; expecting an individual and self-limited passion to yield infinite variety, pleasure, and distraction, to contribute to their lives what the arts and the pleasurable exercise of the intellect gives to less limited and less intense idealists” (World 698–699). In Cather’s own fiction, characters who look to sexual passion for fulfillment often meet with sad fates (for example, Marie and Emil in O Pioneers! or Marian Forrester in A Lost Lady), and the best marriages are those based on mutual respect and shared goals, not on sexual passion, which does not assume major importance in Cather’s work at all.

What is important to note, finally, is how intensely private Cather always was. Prior to her death, she attempted to gather and burn private letters she had written to friends and acquaintances—in fact, only one letter to Edith Lewis, in which she calls her “darling Edith,” is in existence. Realizing that she could not ensure that all her letters were destroyed, Cather added a codicil to her will that bars critics from quoting directly from any other previously unpublished letters that may have survived. Once calling literary scholars “information vampires” (In Person 111), Cather probably worried that her achievements as a writer would be eclipsed by speculation about her sexuality.

The Troll Garden* (1905)

A few of the stories published in The Troll Garden collection are still widely anthologized in American literature anthologies, and many readers’ first experience with Cather is found reading “A Wagner Matinee,” “Paul’s Case,” or “A Sculptor’s Funeral” from that collection. What unifies these stories—besides a sense of ultimate defeat and disappointment—is the question of whether art is possible in the West. Written during a time when Cather was struggling with her doubts about herself as a writer and with ambivalent feelings about her childhood home in Nebraska as a place of either inspiration or suffocation, the collection is thematically centered on ideas of separation between two mutually exclusive worlds—the “garden” of art (located in eastern urban centers) and the world outside art (especially as seen in the raw and rough West).

In “A Wagner Matinee,” for instance, the aging Aunt Georgiana, once a music teacher in Boston and a woman of the world, has become “semisomnambulant”—that is, half asleep—in her life as wife of a Nebraska homesteader (Early Novels 104), so when her nephew takes her to a matinee in Boston, she is profoundly shaken by how much Wagner’s music “broke a silence of thirty years; the inconceivable silence of the plains” (Early Novels 107). When her nephew tells her they must leave at the conclusion of the concert, Aunt Georgiana protests, and in a flash, the narrator understands that for her, just outside the door of the hall lie “the tall, unpainted house with weather-curved boards” and “the gaunt, molting turkeys picking up refuse about the kitchen door” (Early Novels 110). The West of the story is portrayed as a harsh place that robs people of the ecstasies of art.

While “A Wagner Matinee” focuses on a woman homesteader’s returning to the East, “The Sculptor’s Funeral” is about a western town’s response when the sculptor Harvey Merrick’s body is taken home to his small Kansas town. The story emphasizes how the mass of people of western towns are generally incapable of being sympathetic toward an artistic soul: The townspeople prefer to relish stories of Harvey’s foolishly letting cows wander away while he watches the sunset. Merrick’s childhood home was a place of “raw, biting ugliness” (Early Novels 42), a “place of hatred and bitter waters” (Early Novels 47). While Cather emphasizes that Merrick has become widely admired for his art in the cultural centers of the world, she demonstrates that the hometown folk still see him as a ne’er-do-well. Here is Cather’s concern over provincialism and its horrific effects on the solitary artistic soul.

The Troll Garden, however, does not directly deal with artists of great genius, as Cather would in later works like The Song of the Lark. Instead, the point of view is consistently centered on those who are cut off from art, as is Paul in “Paul’s Case,” Cather’s most famous story.

For Discussion or Writing

The stories of The Troll Garden are filled with images of uncrossed thresholds, gulfs, walls, and barriers of all kinds, all suggesting how much Cather, in the early days of her career, felt lay between her and the achievement of her art. Identify some of these key threshold/barrier passages in The Troll Garden stories, and discuss the importance of the images.

“Paul’s Case” (1905)

“Paul’s Case” is a deft psychological portrait of a desperate and sensitive youth. Paul, a Pittsburgh schoolboy, is not an artist, but merely an usher at Carnegie Hall, the only place, Cather writes, that he “really lived; the rest was but a sleep and a forgetting.” And while he is invigorated by the stage performances—“he breathed like a prisoner set free, and felt within him the possibility of doing or saying splendid, brilliant, poetic things”—(Early Novels 120) he can only hang about at the peripheries of art, “loitering” about the dressing rooms of young, indulgent actors, imagining what it would be like to enter their world and suffering keen disappointment when he realizes that “mocking spirits stood guard at the doors” (Early Novels 116). When his father—acting on the advice of a school disciplinary committee studying Paul’s “case”—insists that he give up his ushering job, Paul impulsively steals $1,000 from his employer and runs away to New York to live a short but enraptured life of luxury in the finest New York hotel. When his money runs out and capture by his father is imminent, he steps in front of a speeding train.

The story opens and closes with references to the bright red carnations that Paul wears in the buttonhole of his coat—flowers that symbolize his love of beauty and his attachment to the finer things in life, but that, as Paul himself does, ultimately seem faded (and fated to die) as the story concludes. By the end of the tale, Paul feels hopeless as he realizes that his rebellion has failed and that his hastily concocted escape (financed by impulsive thievery from his Pittsburgh employers) could only ever have been temporary. Now he will not only have to confront his father but to face the law—two aspects, really, of the same dilemma. A train, the method and symbol of his earlier liberation, now becomes the instrument of his self-chosen destruction. It represents the powerful, seemingly unstoppable mechanistic forces against which Paul, throughout the story, has consistently thrown himself (or from which he has sought to flee). The train is the very symbol of the sort of industrial, mechanical mindset Paul has long rejected, and so it is entirely fitting that he should be destroyed by a train rather than dying by taking an overdose of pills or by jumping from a bridge.

In the last split seconds of his life, Paul briefly realizes that he has made yet another hasty, impulsive mistake—one from which there can this time be no reprieve at all. Yet literally his last thoughts are vivid, imaginative, and even beautiful; they are the kinds of fantasies (of exotic, far-off oceans and deserts) that have, throughout the tale, helped sustain his desire to live. Cather's description of Paul's death is richly complex. We sense the waste involved, we realize (and so does he) the foolishness of his decision, and yet our final vision of Paul is of a person who is in some ways at peace. He seems a person who has been reabsorbed into the immense universe from which he once emerged, and to which we all must someday return. His death is in some respects gruesome and brutal, but Cather de-emphasizes any strong sense of pain or suffering. She depicts his death as in some ways a purely mechanical event, but in other ways as a moment almost of beauty and of a relaxing comfort—sensations of a sort Paul had never really enjoyed, for any length of time, while he lived.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the flights to the East in "Paul's Case" and in THEODORE DREISER's Sister Carrie. How do the circumstances, motives, and characters of the fleeing protagonists resemble and/or differ from one another? What does New York symbolize in each work? Discuss the final fates of Paul and of George Hurstwood.
2. Discuss your response to Paul's death in "Paul's Case." Why do you think he chose to kill himself? What other decision could he have made? What other options were open to him from the beginning of the story? Discuss the tone of Cather's presentation of his suicide. In what two ways (at least) could that tone have differed from the tone presently used? Why do you think Cather adopted the tone she chose to use?

O Pioneers! (1913)

While O Pioneers! was not Cather's first novel (see the earlier discussion of Alexander's Bridge), it was the first one in which she felt she had found her own voice and subject matter. Drawing upon the lives of the immigrant neighbors she had befriended in Nebraska, Cather wrote a story that centers on Alexandra Bergson and her family of Swedish homesteaders, who farm on a stretch of prairie called the Divide. Unlike her dull-witted brothers who want to quit the homestead when times become difficult, Alexandra has the vision to see that the prairie is "rich and strong and glorious," and, according to Cather, "For the first time, perhaps, since that land emerged from the waters of geologic ages, a human face was set toward it with love and yearning" (Early Novels 170). Alexandra does indeed make a success of the land relatively early in the novel. Here Cather temporarily shifts the story's focus to Alexandra's youngest brother, Emil, who is desperately in love with their neighbor's wife, Marie, who is also Alexandra's best friend. Their love is fated, of course, and on the afternoon they consummate it in the tall grass of the orchard, Marie's volatile Bohemian husband shoots them while in a blinding rage. The murders devastate Alexandra, and when an old friend, Carl Linstrum, returns, she finds comfort in his friendship and agrees to marry him because "when friends marry, they are safe. We don't suffer like—those young ones" (Early Novels 290).

O Pioneers! fulfills the advice given to Cather by Sarah Orne Jewett to "write about your own country" (quoted in Woodress 223). In this novel, Cather attempted what she called "a different process altogether" by writing "a book entirely for myself" (On Writing 92). Cather's "deepest feelings," she confessed in an interview, were "rooted" in the West: "I had searched for books telling about the beauty of the country I loved, its romance, and heroism and strength and courage of its people that had been plowed into the furrows of its soil and I did not find them. And so," she concluded, "I wrote O Pioneers!" (In Person 37). During the 1930s, when she looked back at the novel and what it had meant to her career, she recognized the significant break she had made from the conventional novel of manners that Henry James had made the gold standard of American literature for the time. She wrote with good humor, "I did not in the least expect that other people would see anything in a slow-moving story, without ‘action,’ without ‘humor,’ without a ‘hero’; a story concerned entirely with heavy farming people, with cornfields and pasture lands and pig yards—set in Nebraska, of all places! As everyone knows, Nebraska is distinctly déclassé as a literary background” (On Writing 94). Writing this novel was, Cather would write, “the first time I walked off on my own feet—everything before was half real and half an imitation of writers whom I admired. In this one I hit the home pasture” (quoted in Woodress 240).

For Discussion or Writing

1. In a letter to a friend, Cather wrote that she had let the country be the hero of the novel. Examine the ways in which Cather personifies the land as a hero.
2. Find and read Ovid’s story of Pyramus and Thisbe in Metamorphosis. Consider how Cather rewrites this fated love story in O Pioneers!
3. While at the center of the novel is the love story of Emil and Marie, some scholars have argued that the real love story of the novel is that of Alexandra and the land. Agree or disagree and discuss why you think as you do.

The Song of the Lark* (1915)

The Song of the Lark asks a question fundamental to Cather’s thinking in the first half of her career: Can the highest aspiration of art find its genesis in the West, a place so seemingly hostile to high art, and can someone with imagination and drive translate her experiences in the West into a meaningful artistic career that finds an audience outside that region?

The Song of the Lark, Cather’s Künstlerroman (a literary term derived from German, meaning the story of the development of an artist), centers on the life of Thea Kronborg, daughter of Scandinavian immigrants, who is raised in the small desert town of Moonstone, Colorado, patterned largely after Cather’s own childhood hometown of Red Cloud, Nebraska. The novel, which is part psychological autobiography, drawing upon elements of Cather’s own life, and part retelling of the life of Wagnerian diva Olive Fremstad, is about Thea’s struggle to rise from a small western town to fame as a Wagnerian opera diva in New York. Thea is one of many offspring of the Swedish minister and his wife, but unlike her siblings, Thea (whose name translates from Greek as “goddess”), has imagination and a significant talent for music, which is recognized by the people who act as her guides and mentors. Her mother respects Thea’s individuality and supports her talents in very pragmatic ways; her “queer, addle-pated” aunt (Early Novels 309) is astute enough to understand that Thea has gifts that will someday make Moonstone sit up and take notice; her piano teacher, Herr Wunsch (whose name means “wish”), tells her that there is only one big thing in life and that is desire—“And before it, when it is big, all is little” (Early Novels 360). Further, the family physician, Dr. Archie, advises her to seize opportunities to make something of herself in the larger world; her Mexican friend, Spanish Johnny, a performer himself, models for her the transcendent quality of art. Her primary support is derived from Ray Kennedy, a railroad man who dreams of marrying Thea, even though he knows that she is “bound for the big terminals of the world” (Early Novels 425), and who, when he dies in a railway accident, bequeaths her a modest sum of money that allows her to escape to Chicago to study music. While Thea initially goes there to study piano, it becomes apparent to her and her teacher that Thea’s real talent lies in singing. The Chicago years are marked by a struggle to accept and fulfill her fate and by a romance with a “beer prince” (Early Novels 523) and dilettante, Fred Ottenburg, who falls in love with her (despite the fact that he is already married). Fred watches out for Thea, and when she is at her lowest point both emotionally and physically, he provides a summer of reprieve at his Arizona ranch, where Thea discovers the ancient cliff dwellings of the Anasazi and contemplates the Indians’ pottery as artistic expression, akin to her own; she thus feels that her past is “lengthened,” that she is “bound” to “old and higher obligations” (Early Novels 555). The remainder of the novel concentrates on Thea's growing reputation as a Wagnerian soprano. She ultimately achieves fame and worldwide recognition and is thought of back in Moonstone as a major source of pride. Cather emphasizes that Thea's success is based on her ability to understand and portray the sorrows and aspirations of her operatic roles, which are based on Germanic legends, by exploring the heroism in her familiar West, such as that of the ancient Indians "dealing with fate bare handed" and the old man listening as the first transcontinental telegraph message taps out, "Westward the course of Empire takes its way" (Early Novels 341).

One of the challenges of the novel for readers is why the portrayal of Thea becomes less and less personal as the story progresses. In her preface to the 1932 edition, Cather explains that "in an artist of the type I chose, personal life becomes paler as the imaginative life becomes richer" and that "the Thea Kronborg who is behind the imperishable daughters of music becomes somewhat dry and preoccupied. . . . Her artistic life is the only one in which she is happy, or free, or even very real" (Early Novels 1329).

The Song of the Lark is Cather's answer to the questions she had posed in The Troll Garden stories about whether the soil of the western landscape could produce someone recognized as an important artist. Here, while Cather acknowledges the pettiness and lack of sophistication of people in rural midwestern towns, she is able to imagine that the artist can grow beyond that without bitterness, to find nobility and grace within the western experience—conclusions that a decade earlier Cather seemed unable to draw in her short stories. Unlike O Pioneers!, in which Alexandra seems eternally wedded to the soil of Nebraska, Thea goes forth from the western landscape that inspires her (the plains of Laramie, the sandhills of Moonstone, the canyons of the cliff dwellers) and seeks an attentive audience among people who seem to have stepped directly from a Henry James novel of manners.

The novel is also important because it portrays a woman whose life is not defined by a desire to marry and—even more—whose identity is not defined by the men around her. Here, as well as in O Pioneers!, women determine the course of their own lives, with marriage one of the lesser goals of their existence. This view was radically unique in American literature of the time, for even EDITH WHARTON, Cather's contemporary, examined women trapped by societal expectations to marry. In The Song of the Lark, Thea's ultimate marriage to Fred (after his wife's death) is handled almost as an afterthought; the focus remains on the possibility of her artistic achievements.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider who Thea is and what she is like in Moonstone, Chicago, and then Panther Canyon. What are the reasons for any differences you see?
2. Is the ending of the novel a happy one? Why or why not? How does Cather define happiness? Is it a concern of Cather's? You might compare and contrast this novel with Kate Chopin's The Awakening.

My Ántonia (1918)

While previous works had gained Cather ever increasing recognition, it was the publication of My Ántonia that solidified her place among the best and brightest of early 20th-century American writers and marked the beginning of a period of notable productivity and literary success.

The novel—which remains the most widely taught Cather novel at both the high school and university levels—was inspired by Annie Sadilek Pavelka, a Bohemian woman who had worked as a "hired girl" for the Miner family, Cather's neighbors in Red Cloud. In an interview, Cather identified Annie Pavelka as "one of the people who interested me most as a child. . . . She was one of the truest artists I ever knew in the keenness and sensitiveness of her enjoyment, in her love of people and her willingness to take pains." She added, "The farmer's wife who raises a large family and cooks for them and makes their clothes and keeps house and on the side runs a truck garden and a chicken farm and a canning establishment, and thoroughly enjoys doing it all, and doing it well, contributes more to art than all the culture clubs. Often you find such a woman with all the appreciation of the beautiful bodies of her children, of the order and harmony of her kitchen, of the real creative joy of all her activities, which marks the great artist" (In Person 42–49). The story of Annie's father's suicide had been one of the first tales Cather had heard when she moved to the plains and had inspired her first publication, the short story "Peter." My Ántonia is a further reworking of that material, with the focus on the daughter. Cather would remain in touch with Annie Pavelka throughout her life, even sending her family money and supplies during the difficult years of the depression.

My Ántonia is told from the first-person perspective of a male narrator, Jim Burden, who, Cather's introduction suggests, has handed her the manuscript of his memories of Ántonia essentially as printed. Jim originally moves to the plains of Nebraska from Virginia when he is just nine years old—as Cather herself had—and on the train there he meets the Shimerda family, Bohemian homesteaders who will try to make a go of it on a poor farm they have bought from a fellow countryman. Jim becomes friends with Ántonia and is privy to how desperately hard the first winter is for the family. In January Ántonia's father kisses his children, tells them he is going out hunting, and quietly walks out to the barn and shoots himself, leaving the family to fend for themselves. To assist her mother and siblings financially, Ántonia does heavy farmwork on neighboring farms—grueling labor usually only done by men. The next year she leaves the farm and hires out as a maid/babysitter for the Harling family in town, where Jim and his grandparents have also moved.

Attracted to Ántonia's spirit and emotional strength, Jim nevertheless struggles to figure out what it is that she means to him. At one point he kisses her, but the class distinctions between them that would make a romance impossible are readily apparent to Ántonia, if not to Jim. Cather subverts the typical love plot in her novel, saying in an interview that she felt her main character "deserved something better than the Saturday Evening Post sort of stuff" of formulaic romance stories (In Person 44). At another point, Jim saves Ántonia from a rape attempt by a nefarious moneylender whom Ántonia works for after she leaves the Harlings, but his rescue is not cast in the valiant heroics of some brave knight.

After Ántonia falls in love with an unprincipled railroad man who jilts her when she becomes pregnant, Jim recognizes the complexities of his own feelings and declares them to her: "I'd have liked to have you for a sweetheart, or a wife, or my mother or sister—anything that a woman can be to a man" (Early Novels 910). After a brief and equally unlikely romance with another hired girl, an enlightening period of intellectual excitement at the university at Lincoln, and a marriage to a wealthy but cold New York woman, Jim returns to Black Hawk to visit Ántonia—and finds her happy in a marriage to another Bohemian, John Cuzak. The two have seemingly innumerable children and, despite struggles, have turned their prairie farm into an Edenic place of peace and harmony that sustains them spiritually. While this couple may not be so prosperous as Alexandra Bergson is in O Pioneers!, money hardly seems to matter to them. Ántonia and her family are rich in other ways. Jim's Ántonia (for he most definitely sees her in possessive terms, as indicated by the title of the novel) has "lent herself to immemorial human attitudes which we recognize by instinct as universal and true," and she has become "a rich mine of life, like the founders of early races" (Early Novels 926).

One challenge of My Ántonia is that it does not fit the usual pattern of plot and resolution. Loosely episodic, it begins a period in which Cather was experimenting with the novel as form. In a 1925 interview, she admitted that the novel was "just the other side of the rug, the pattern that is supposed not to count in a story. In it there is no love affair, no courtship, no marriage, no broken heart, no struggle for success. I knew I'd ruin my material if I put it in the usual fictional pattern" (In Person 77).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider the narrative point of view that Cather chooses in My Ántonia. Draw some conclusions about Jim's hopes and fears, his accomplishments, his relationship with Ántonia, his motivations, and his role as narrator. Consider, too, whether you think Jim is a narrator you can trust—why or why not?
2. My Ántonia is a book in which Cather pays close attention to the environment and landscape. First, examine Cather's descriptions of human encounters with the plains, especially in the introduction and the first chapter. What kinds of word choices does she make in connection with the natural world? What is the relation of human beings to the environment, and what are their feelings toward it? Then, examine the descriptions in book 5, "Cuzak's Boys," in the same way. Has the attitude changed at all? How do descriptions of human relations to the land compare to those in the introduction and chapter 1? What do you think accounts for the difference or transformation? What has happened between those periods? Enumerate the multiple things that humans have done to change the land and change their perceptions of the land.
3. My Ántonia is the only Cather book that in its first edition included illustrations as an integral part of the book's concept. She commissioned W. T. Benda to illustrate the book with pen-and-ink line drawings and paid close attention to the ways the drawings complemented her text. If you do not have Benda drawings in your text, find one that does have them. Consider how the drawings contribute to the portrayal of Ántonia and the people around her. What significance do the drawings have?

A Lost Lady (1923)

Loss of ideals is a theme Cather continues to explore, but this time she focuses specifically on what she viewed as the loss of western ideals in a modern world. Again inspired by real people Cather knew, A Lost Lady draws upon the lives of Silas and Lyra Garber, residents of Red Cloud who had been kind to Cather and allowed the young girl a glimpse into their world. Silas Garber, one of the town's founders, had worked with the railroad during the settling of the West and had served as governor and later as founder of the bank in Red Cloud. His wife, Lyra, a beautiful and vivacious woman, was a generation younger than her husband. Together they were members of a railroad aristocracy that had arisen in the West in the late 19th century. In their ornate Victorian home, they hosted parties for important railroad men and their families who were passing through Red Cloud. Eventually Silas Garber suffered a debilitating stroke and spent his last days cared for by his young wife.

These events are reworked in Cather's novel: The Garbers become Captain and Marian Forrester, and Cather uses the point of view of Niel Herbert to examine the effect Marian has on men. For Niel and other males of his generation, Marian embodies the feminine ideal of refinement, gentility, grace, hospitality, beauty, and sensuality, and yet she is willing to "mock" the social proprieties that confine other women of the town. She exemplifies for him "the magic of contradictions" (Later Novels 43) and is a "bewitching" enigma that Niel idolizes—that is, until he discovers that Marian is having an affair with Frank Ellinger, an idle dandy visiting the Forrester home. Deeply disillusioned by knowledge of the affair, Neil concludes, "It was not a moral scruple she had outraged, but an aesthetic ideal" (Later Novels 48).

Niel subsequently witnesses the decline of Marian Forrester as she reveals herself to be quite human, not an ideal of womanhood at all. She is as pathetic as she is dazzling, and vulnerable as she is charming. When Captain Forrester is crippled by a stroke that follows the failure of his bank, Marian cares for him with tenderness and battles the gossips of the town who would invade her home under the pretext of nursing her husband. All the while, she laments the loss of their formerly glamorous lifestyle. After the captain's death, Marian stays in Sweet Water for a time, throwing parties now with the young men of the town in attendance, rather than the influential men who had once attended parties in her home. Years later, Niel hears from a former friend of Marian's second marriage and death and realizes that he has not been the only one to idealize the glamorous Mrs. Forrester.

While Marian is the central figure in the novel, Cather also develops Captain Forrester as an emblem of a passing western nobility. A man who had lived out the pioneering dreams of the early West, the Captain has experienced firsthand the days when "One day was like another, and all were glorious; good hunting, plenty of antelope and buffalo, boundless sunny sky, boundless plains of waving grass." The glory of the western myth, embodied by the Captain, is a dream: "All our great West," he says, "has been developed from such dreams; the homesteaders' and the prospectors' and the contractors'. We dreamed the railroads across the mountains, just as I dreamed my place on the Sweet Water." His experience, however, is clearly that of a passing generation at "the end of the road-making West."

In contrast, Cather offers Ivy Peters, Niel's contemporary, as a foil. Peters, who at one point has blinded an innocent woodpecker merely because he can, becomes representative of the crass and materialistic generation willing to exploit the land for its resources, unfeeling about the West's history or the refinement of people like the Forresters, a common shyster who desires power rather than aesthetic beauty. For good or ill, the Ivy Peterses of the world have inherited the great potential of the West.

For Discussion or Writing

1. It is very easy to condemn Marian Forrester for her sexual faithlessness; however, are there ways in which Mrs. Forrester is a sympathetic character?
2. Compare and contrast the two dinner parties in the novel—the Christmas party in Book I and the one Mrs. Forrester has for the boys of Sweet Water. Consider the oral narratives told at the parties—how do they contribute to character development in the novel?
3. Cather consistently uses the notion of voyeurism in this novel (for instance, the Blum boy sees Marian and Frank, Niel hears the laughter outside Marian's bedroom window, the townswomen spend time trying to discover secrets by riffling through the Forresters' closets). Why does Cather use voyeurism as a motif in the novel? What is its thematic significance?
4. In a related matter, you might also want to consider Niel's as the chief point of view of the novel. Can we trust his conclusions about Mrs. Forrester? Why or why not? If you have read My Ántonia, compare and contrast him to Jim Burden.
5. Analyze the meaning of the title: What are the multiple meanings of the words lost and lady, and how does Cather use these ideas thematically?

Death Comes for the Archbishop* (1927)

As were other American novelists during the 1920s—WILLIAM FAULKNER, for example, whose The Sound and the Fury (1929) both inspired other writers and confounded readers—Willa Cather was interested in experimenting with the novel as form. She had used a shift in voice, style, and mood in her previous novel, The Professor's House. In Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927) she took on her boldest fictional experiment yet in a work that is both modern in form and historical in subject matter.

Cather wrote to a former colleague at McClure's Magazine that Death Comes for the Archbishop was "altogether a new kind of thing." In a letter to a publisher, she said that it was "scarcely a novel," and in another letter, to a literary magazine, she wrote, "I am amused that so many of the reviews of this book begin with the statement: 'This book is hard to classify'" (On Writing 12). Nevertheless, Cather thought Death Comes for the Archbishop her most significant work to date, and, as a result, for the only time in her career, she felt that she was in the position to ask her publisher for a 1 percent royalty increase.

In a 1925 speech on the technique of the modern novel, Cather had asserted that atmosphere in a book was “invaluable,” but plot was unimportant—after all, Shakespeare never created plot but borrowed story lines from others. She also claimed that the composition of Death Comes for the Archbishop had been influenced by seeing the frescoes of the 19th-century French artist Puvis de Chavannes, who in his portrayal of the childhood of Sta. Genevieve used “absolutely the reverse of dramatic treatment . . . something without accent, with none of the artificial elements of composition.” In legends, she wrote, “the martyrdoms of the saints are no more dwelt upon than are the trivial incidents of their lives; it is as though all human experiences, measured against one supreme spiritual experience, were of about the same importance.” She was attempting at this time to exert a kind of “discipline” on herself in which she did not “use an incident for all there is in it” but instead “touch on [it] and pass on” (On Writing 9).

As a result, Death Comes for the Archbishop is, as Cather herself classified it, a quiet “narrative”—loosely episodic, digressive, and without crescendo—making it difficult for readers who expect rising action and a clear sense of climax and resolution from novels they read. The title itself is a clue to what Cather was attempting, for it announces from the beginning what the ultimate outcome of the book is, the outcome that awaits us all. And while death abounds in the book (one critic has counted as many as 96 deaths mentioned in the text), these deaths are often unaccompanied by any sense of the monumental.

Cather claims she had never intended to write a novel of the Southwest, because the region was too big and varied as subject matter, but on a trip to Santa Fe, she discovered the story of Archbishop Lamy and his friend and fellow missionary the Right Reverend Joseph Machebeuf, Catholic priests who had settled in the Southwest in the mid-19th century. These men became the prototypes for the main characters, Bishop Latour and Father Valliant, who struggle to do the work of the church within the contested space of the American Southwest, where Mexicans, Americans, American Indians, and French or Spanish missionaries all compete to claim the land and the souls of the people who live there. Although Latour attempts to introduce change in the New Mexico settlements, he ironically resists change in his own life, wishing to preserve his French ways, right down to the manner in which the onion soup is prepared. “A soup like this,” says Latour of the Christmas soup, “is not the work of one man. It is the result of a constantly refined tradition. There are nearly a thousand years of history in this soup” (Later Novels 299).

The literary episodes, often related through oral narratives, include stories of a tyrannical priest thrown from the top of the Ácoma mesa by the Indians he had virtually enslaved instead of ministering to them; a poor neophyte to whom the Virgin Mary appears; the performance of marriages and baptisms in remote villages; Father Valliant’s acquisition of two prized white mules; Latour’s visit on a stormy night to a sacred and secret Indian cave with an Indian guide; the downfall of a lecherous, corrupt priest, who is nevertheless beloved by his people; the vain woman who refuses to admit her age, even if that means she will lose a sizable inheritance; and the escape of a Mexican woman enslaved by an American family hostile to the Catholic Church who refuse to allow her to worship.

Many of these episodes are full of potential drama, and yet Cather works to pass over dramatic possibilities in a calm and quiet manner. One such story that clearly demonstrates the author’s goal to write a novel without accent is the story of Magdalena and her husband, Buck Scales. Latour and Valliant are riding their mules on a remote road when a storm forces them to take shelter in a rundown shack. The woman, Magdalena, secretly communicates to them that they are in grave danger from her husband. They hurriedly leave; soon afterward, she escapes and finds them. The life story she relates is horrific: In addition to the cruel beatings she has been subject to, her husband had murdered four previous travelers, as well as the three children

Magdalena has borne him. In a work of typical fictional form, such a confession would have been followed by the dramatic details of hunting down Buck Scales and bringing him to justice: Cather's method is different. Scales is indeed caught, but Cather undercuts the drama inherent in his capture, writing, instead: "The degenerate murderer, Buck Scales, was hanged after a short trial. Early in April the Bishop left Santa Fe on horseback and rode to St. Louis, on his way to attend the Provincial Council at Baltimore" (Later Novels 324). The plot movement from Scales's being brought to justice to the details of Latour's attending to church business occurs without so much as a paragraph break.

Much of the last part of the novel concerns the archbishop's building his church in Santa Fe. The archbishop intellectually understands and admires the local architecture and the way in which it is characteristic for the Indians to "vanish into the landscape, not to stand out against it. The Hopi villages that were set upon rock mesas were made to look like the rock on which they sat . . . [and the] Navajo hogans, among the sand and willows, were made of sand and willows" (Later Novels 419). Nevertheless, Latour envisions and builds a grand church in the classic Romanesque style of architecture. Cather does not fault Latour for this desire; nor does she seem to suggest that it is a result of great hubris; instead, her vision of Latour is as a man devoted to his work, but, ultimately and understandably, lonely and still enamored of his European culture. He emerges as deeply flawed, deeply human, and totally unforgettable.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Critics have said that this novel deals with the seven deadly sins (pride, envy, gluttony, sloth, lust, avarice, and wrath). Consider as many stories, scenes, and characters as possible that embody these sins. Speculate on why and how such elements are important to the novel.
2. Discuss Cather's portrayal of the meeting of European and native cultures (both Mexican and American Indian), especially in terms of religion. What issues of colonialism is she dealing with, and how do Valliant and Latour deal with religious conflicts? Is religion in this novel a relationship of antagonism or cooperation or something else? Discuss.
3. Miracles are very important in this novel, and Cather portrays a number of them. She also defines miracles at the end of book 1, "The Vicar Apostolic." Examine that quote and consider how significant it is to the novel as a whole. Consider, too, how the miracles in the novel are presented, especially in terms of Cather's goal to write without dramatic accent.

Shadows on the Rock* (1931)

Cather's next novel is another frontier colonization story in the tradition of My Ántonia or O Pioneers! about transforming a strange landscape into a home place, yet Shadows on the Rock is about a culture that is focused eastward on Europe, rather than on the American West, and focused on community rather than individual achievement, as was the theme of western American mythology. Set in the late 17th century in the French settlement of Quebec, this tranquil novel has minimal plot and is centered on one year in the life of the widower and apothecary Euclide Auclair and his 12-year-old daughter, Cécile, as they strive in their domestic lives to maintain French culture and manners in the New World. Most of the story takes place at the hearthside of the Auclair home. There a variety of characters tell tales of religious asceticism (the practice of self-denial) by the recluse Jeanne Le Ber within her austere chamber; the betrayal felt by the woodsman Pierre Charron, who is in love with Le Ber and hopes to marry her; the terrors of being the king's torturer in the Old World; the perils of building communities in the woods outside the city; and the personal sacrifice of a missionary's making a "vow of perpetual stability" to the Huron Indians he initially despises. The warmth of the hearthside and the domestic scene in which these often-horrific stories are told acts as a corrective, a remedy that reasserts the storytellers' place within a close-knit community. In the end, all the characters make their own form of “a vow of perpetual stability” to place, thus becoming Canadians rather than displaced Frenchmen, and the epilogue reveals that Cécile and Pierre have married and have four sons who are “the Canadians of the future” (Later Novels 640).

While this book became a best seller in 1932, not all reviewers understood or appreciated what Cather had been attempting in it, and some complained that the novel was dramatically weak. What these reviewers did not understand, Cather protested, was that her book was like loving “a small Georgian pitcher better than the Empire State Building” (quoted in Woodress 432). Responding to a reviewer who had liked the book, Cather added, “as you seem to recognize, once having adopted a tone so definite, once having taken your seat in the close air by the apothecary’s fire, you can’t explode into military glory, any more than you can pour champagne into a salad dressing . . . and really, a new society begins with the salad dressing more than with the destruction of Indian villages” (On Writing 16).

Cather’s novel also drew the charge of falling back on “escapism.” Among intellectuals of the turbulent 1930s, the belief was that if the art of the age were to be important at all, it must have a direct political message and must wrestle head on with current social turmoil. The muralist Diego Rivera, for example, claimed, “Art is propaganda, or it is not art.” As a result of this attitude, Cather’s brand of writing, which looked at past cultures and events, began to be called into question. She was accused by Granville Hicks, an influential literary critic of the time, of having “fallen into supine romanticism because of a refusal to examine life as it is”; it was obvious, he wrote in a 1933 essay entitled “The Case against Willa Cather,” that she could not go on, painting again and again the Nebraska she had once known. The West was changing. . . . The story of this new West could scarcely take the form of a simple, poetic idyll. Heroism and romance, if they existed, had changed their appearance. Characters could no longer be isolated from the social movements that were shaping the destiny of the nation and the world. She would have to recognize that the life she loved was disappearing. (142, 147)

Cather saw Hicks’s accusation as “implying an evasion of duty.” “When the world is in a bad way,” she disputed, “we are told, it is the business of the composer and the poet to devote himself to propaganda and fan the flames of indignation. . . . But the world has a habit of being in a bad way from time to time, and art has never contributed anything to help matters—except escape” (On Writing 18–19). Asserting that literature concerning itself with current social ills was “a fleeting fashion,” she said that the critics like Hicks made “a career out of destroying the past. The only new thing they offered us was contempt for the old” (28, 25). Still thinking about the issue years later, Cather said that while writing about the theories for the betterment of humanity is a noble and useful thing, it had no place, as she saw it, in the genre of fiction (quoted in Woodress 470).

What Hicks and critics like him failed to see, of course, was that Cather was in fact confronting modern problems in more subtle ways. In the years before women achieved suffrage, The Song of the Lark asks key questions about the possibility of women’s having meaningful careers. The Professor’s House offers a sound indictment of the materialism of the 1920s, Death Comes for the Archbishop confronts issues of racism and contested space in the Southwest, and Shadows on the Rock expresses many of the concerns that would become central to the nation during the depression. In Shadows, Cather demonstrates that happiness can fall apart through money or fame, that the human community is more important than isolated individuals or political agendas, that there is comfort in family and cultural ritual. While the literature of the 1930s turned outward to examine the ills of society, average Americans turned inward to home and family, and Cather’s book expressed that inwardness.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss Cather’s portrayal of the forest in Shadows on the Rock. What does it represent for the settlers, and what is their emotional response to it? Compare and contrast this portrayal with Nathaniel Hawthorne's depiction of the forest in works like "Young Goodman Brown" and The Scarlet Letter.

2. The perpetuation of traditions is important in this novel. Discuss ways in which Cather expresses this idea as theme, and consider whether or not traditions are revised and adapted to the New World environment.

"Neighbour Rosicky" (1932)

"Neighbour Rosicky" is another widely anthologized short story by Cather and a companion piece to My Ántonia, because in it Cather draws upon the same prototypes for composition. Whereas her 1918 novel had drawn upon the life of Annie Shimerda Pavelka, this short story focuses on John Pavelka, Annie's husband, who served as the prototype for Anton.

A quiet story, "Neighbour Rosicky" investigates the daily life of the aging Bohemian immigrant and his homesteading family during the early years of the Great Depression. Through stories told by Rosicky and his wife, Mary, and memories evoked, we learn about Rosicky's impoverished early life in a London slum, his lonely existence in what he thinks of as the concrete jail of New York City, and his eventual contentment on the Nebraska farm he and Mary homestead.

The story hinges on the opening statement: "When Dr. Burleigh told Neighbour Rosicky he had a bad heart, Rosicky protested" (Obscure Destinies 7). The natural question at this point might be why we need to read on, if we know what is going to be the certain end of the story—Rosicky's death. However, Cather then challenges this diagnosis throughout the story, first by offering an alternative opinion in the remembered scene where the lonely young immigrant wanders the barren, concrete expanses of New York City on the afternoon of Independence Day and "found out what was the matter with him. . . . It struck young Rosicky that this was the trouble with big cities; they built you in from the earth itself, cemented you away from contact with the ground" (Obscure Destinies 29). Rosicky's cure, of course, is to establish a kind of spiritual kinship to the land, a deep and abiding understanding of the agrarian landscape that nurtures and sustains him, so that he can look out on what will be his own gravesite with peace and contentment, feeling that it is a good place to be buried, so close to home and family and surrounded by sky and ongoing life.

In addition, what Cather guides us to understand by the final passages of the story is that while the physiological organ may be weakened by hard work and age, the "heart" as the seat of emotional and spiritual identity remains always strong, even to the end, when Rosicky suffers the final "cramp" in his chest that will end his mortal life (Obscure Destinies 59). By never identifying Rosicky's suffering as a "heart attack," Cather urges her readers to reconsider what they know about his heart and to recognize finally the ways in which Rosicky's is, in fact, a good heart. He has overcome misery and hardship with grace and good humor, placed his family's emotional well-being above financial success, and offered his American daughter-in-law undying love and acceptance. Only a good heart could do so.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Students may notice a pattern in the story's episodes and oral narratives—namely, the use of companion scenes: Cather uses two Fourth of Julys and two Christmas celebrations to create a contrast of emotions. Consider what these companion scenes have in common, or what pattern emerges from them, or what these thematically similar scenes suggest about each other.
2. Find and read Thomas Jefferson's discussion on American farmers (chapter 19, entitled "Manufactures," in his Notes on the State of Virginia 1787). How does Cather's story exemplify the ideals Jefferson discusses when he speaks of the American farmer citizen?
3. Episodes in "Neighbour Rosicky" all reinforce personal values: The doctor's memory emphasizes family harmony and hospitality; Mary's story upholds the value of grace in time of hardship; Anton's own stories prize hard work, honesty, humility, and the value of owning land. Research and record your own family's legends of holidays, winters, droughts, city life, homesteading, or hard times. Consider whether they, too, emphasize some of the same themes.

Sapphira and the Slave Girl* (1940)

Written during a period when, as Cather recognized, the world was moving toward a second world war, Sapphira and the Slave Girl is Cather's most deeply pessimistic work. It in no way shares the nostalgia for a lost past that some of her prior works had contained. As she followed in the papers the actions of Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler, she recognized that there was the possibility for true evil in the world. This work is her attempt to probe the nature of evil. In it, she reveals the ways in which a facade of grace and southern hospitality can belie a deeper reality of cruelty.

The novel opens in 1856, just four years before the Civil War begins. Sapphira, the title character, is an imperious matriarch of a southern plantation in Virginia. Her husband, Henry, is a miller and a Southerner who recognizes the inhumanity of slavery, even though he feels powerless to change it. Their daughter, Rachel Black (who is closely based on Cather's maternal grandmother, Rachel Boak), is vehemently opposed to slavery, despite her upbringing. When Sapphira decides to sell their slave, Nancy, because her husband has made the mistake of treating the slave with kindness and respect, Henry objects. Since a husband's signature is necessary for the sale of a slave—only males owned property legally—Sapphira must find another way to get rid of Nancy. She invites Henry's lecherous cousin, Martin Colbert, for a long visit and tries at every turn to provide him with an opportunity to rape the slave girl. Rachel and Nancy's fellow slaves understand what Sapphira has set up, and they protect Nancy as best they can, until Rachel declares the situation intolerable. She seeks her father's help in aiding Nancy to escape, but he is too paralyzed by Southern proprieties to assist her openly. Instead, on the night planned for Nancy's escape, he puts money into his coat pocket and hangs it near an open window, in effect forcing Rachel to "steal" money from her own father. Rachel assists Nancy's escape, getting her to people in the Underground Railroad who can see her safely on into Canada. The epilogue takes place 25 years later, when the first-person narrator, Cather herself, describes Nancy Till's welcome home.

Sapphira may be the main character of the novel, but she is certainly not its heroine. She is a woman without remorse or moral sensitivity, and her sinister actions are placed in direct contrast with her gentility and Southern manners. With most other slaves besides Nancy she is fair, even indulgent, a savvy businesswoman who, despite being a semi-invalid, has an iron will. Her handicap, identified as a crippling "dropsy" (Later Novels 783), symbolically represents a crippled society, a deformed social structure that tolerates slavery and all the horrors that accompany it.

Sapphira and the Slave Girl is the only Cather novel in which the writer draws extensively upon material from her Southern birthplace. She once declared that in this novel her ending was her beginning—a phrase that can be interpreted in two ways. The novel's epilogue is based on Cather's own childhood memory of the former slave Nancy Till's returning to Cather's Virginia home, the catalyst for the book's subject. As Cather's last novel, this book took her full circle to her earliest childhood memories.

Two other women writers confronting the issues of slavery whom readers might be most familiar with are Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), and Harriet Jacobs, who wrote Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl (1861). All three portray slavery especially in terms of its impact on women; Stowe writes a novel in which most scenes take place within a domestic sphere, while Jacobs portrays the cruelties that women slaves especially had to endure. If you know the work of either of these writers, discuss how Cather's point of view is similar or different. If you are not familiar with

I write damned little because I am interested in recording certain sensations, very rigidly chosen, with an eye for what according to my taste and sum of prejudices seems suitable to—or intense enough—for verse.

(qtd. in Parkinson 91)

Understanding Hart Crane's personal life is unusually important to understanding his poetry. Many of his poems, and especially those in his first collection, White Buildings, are obscure and confusing without a fundamental familiarity with the events of his life.

Born in Garrettsville, Ohio, on July 21, 1899, Harold Hart Crane was the only child of Grace Hart Crane and Clarence ("C. A.") Crane, who owned a maple syrup cannery and a successful candy company. (C. A. Crane invented Lifesavers but sold the rights before they became popular.) Harold was close to his mother and began to use his middle name, her maiden name, when he started writing poetry. As with many young men, he had a vexed relationship with his father, not really reconciling with him until 1930. Grace and C. A. had had a troubled marriage almost from the start, and even as a young child, Harold sided with his mother, who confided all of her troubles to him. When his parents' marriage fell apart in 1908, Harold went to live with his maternal grandmother in Cleveland. The family reunited together after Grace returned in 1909 from a "rest cure" in a sanitarium. Eventually C. A. returned as well, and he and Grace reconciled in 1911. However, the marriage was still unhappy and began to disintegrate by 1914. They finally officially divorced at the end of 1916. They almost remarried in 1917, but instead, they both married other people.

By 1914 Grace was often pulling Harold out of school to travel with her in order to get away from her unhappy life at home. He was incredibly well read as a child and a teenager, but he traveled so much with his mother that his school records are spotty. In 1916 the whole family took an extended tour across the United States. Travel suited him, and he lived in many different places in his life, including Paris and Mexico City. Part of his worries with his parents concerned his "fast" lifestyle. Not only was he homosexual, but he also liked to drink and party and got into a lot of trouble. He told his mother about his sexuality in his late twenties, but what had troubled both of his parents more than his sexual orientation was his inability to settle down to a stable career and nonpartying way of life. He had a quarrel with his mother in 1928 and never saw her again.

In early 1917, at the age of 16, he left high school and went to New York City to live alone. There, he settled into a bohemian way of life, interacting with many poets and artists. He also developed a taste for sailors as lovers. Eventually he would sustain long-term relationships, but his life was also filled with flings and one-night stands. In addition, he frequently got into drunken brawls, often in connection with trying to pick up men. One long-term relationship that was highly influential for Crane was with the sailor Emil Opffer, Jr. In 1924, soon after he met Opffer, Crane wrote in a letter to Waldo Frank, "For many days now, I have gone about quite dumb with something for which 'happiness' must be too mild a term." To Crane, Opffer was associated with the Brooklyn Bridge, which was to play an important role in his later poetry. In the same letter Crane writes, "And I have been able to give freedom and life which was acknowledged in the ecstasy of walking hand in hand across the most beautiful bridge of the world, the cables enclosing us and pulling us upward in such a dance as I have never walked and never can walk with another" (qtd. in Unterecker 355). Crane moved into a building owned by Opffer's father in order to be close to the bridge. Eventually he moved into rooms at the back of the building with spectacular views of it. He was excited to find that the bridge's architect's son, who had been struck with a crippling disease, had observed its progress during construction from the very same windows. He wrote to his mother, "Just imagine looking out your window in the East River with nothing intervening between your view of the statue of Liberty, way down the harbour, and the marvelous beauty of Brooklyn Bridge close above you on your right! All of the great new skyscrapers of lower Manhattan are marshalled directly across from you, and there is a constant stream of tugs, liners, sail boats, etc. in procession before you on the river!" (qtd. in Fisher 221). The bridge was to become his major symbol.

Artistically, Hart Crane ran in a circle of prominent figures who included Allen Tate, JEAN TOOMER, E. E. CUMMINGS, Yvor Winters, Kenneth Burke, Waldo Frank, and the photographers Walker Evans and Alfred Stieglitz, among many others. He continued to read widely and was heavily influenced in his poetry by romantics such as William Blake, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Herman Melville, Edgar Allan Poe, Walt Whitman, and Emily Dickinson; high modernists such as William Butler Yeats and T. S. ELIOT; and French symbolists such as Charles Baudelaire, Stéphane Mallarmé, Arthur Rimbaud, Paul Verlaine, and Jules Laforgue, not to mention the Renaissance figures William Shakespeare and John Donne. He had been published in the "little magazines" beginning in 1916 and by 1919 was starting to gain a reputation under the name Hart Crane. During this period he had begun to explore themes that would later appear in his "Voyages" poems. Among his many topics were loss of innocence and the differences between adolescence and maturity. His love affairs were teaching him the pains of loss due to broken promises, and in one early attempt he writes of the loss of innocence occurring at a seashore that delineates the border between adolescence and maturity. (He would later expand and develop this early poem into "Voyages I.") Even at this stage of his artistic development, the themes of love, loss, and experience and the overarching image of the sea were becoming intertwined in his work.

In 1923 his first longer poem, "For the Marriage of Faustus and Helen," was published to moderate acclaim. This was also the year he first saw the Brooklyn Bridge and was impressed enough by it to want to write a poem about it. White Buildings, a collection of several short poems and the series "Voyages," was published in 1926, and he continued to work on his masterpiece, The Bridge, off and on from then until he found a patron willing to help him publish it in 1930. Crane had been living a reckless 1920s lifestyle, and his new friends Harry and Caresse Crosby were the epitome of the F. SCOTT FITZGERALD decadence that he could not quite afford himself. Their Paris-based Black Sun Press would eventually publish portions of James Joyce's Finnegans Wake; in 1929 Crane met Harry, who inspired him to finish The Bridge with the idea that it would be published by the press. Crane spent much time with their circle of friends in Paris. In late 1929 Harry committed suicide, an act that had a profound effect on Crane. According to his friend Katherine Anne Porter, he thought that it was "imaginative; the act of a poet" (qtd. in Horton 287). Caresse published The Bridge in 1930 after some discussion of whether or not it would be finished. She was inclined to publish it as it stood, where Crane had stalled out on the writing, without "Cape Hatteras," but he insisted on being allowed to attempt to complete it. Later, he claimed that The Bridge might "turn into something like the form of Leaves of Grass, with a number of editions, each incorporating further additions” (qtd. in Fisher 402). As it turned out, his death would preclude this possibility. The work was well received by the critics, who immediately understood its scope and its novel techniques. For example, the New York Times Book Review published an article titled “Hart Crane’s Cubistic Poetry in The Bridge.”

In 1931 Crane received a Guggenheim Fellowship and went to live in Mexico City, where he knew Katherine Anne Porter and Peggy Cowley, Malcolm Cowley’s former wife. Crane was disturbed at this time and indulged in mercurial relationships with his friends. Despite his homosexuality, he became engaged to Peggy Cowley. During this period he was having trouble with writing and attempted suicide. Shortly thereafter, he and Peggy set sail for New York. On April 27, 1932, at the age of 32, he made a successful suicide attempt, jumping from the ship the morning after yet another midnight drunken brawl. An eyewitness describes his measured actions as follows:

On that ill-fated morning, one of the ship’s officers told us that Crane had been in the sailors’ quarters the previous night, trying to make one of the men, and had been badly beaten. Just before noon, a number of us were gathered on deck, waiting to hear the results of the ship’s pool—always announced at noon. Just then we saw Crane come on deck, dressed . . . in pajamas and topcoat; he had a black eye and looked generally battered. He walked to the railing, took off his coat, folded it neatly over the railing (not dropping it on deck), placed both hands on the railing, raised himself on his toes, and then dropped back again. We all fell silent and watched him, wondering what in the world he was up to. Then, suddenly, he vaulted over the railing and jumped into the sea. For what seemed five minutes, but was more like five seconds, no one was able to move; then cries of “man overboard” went up. Just once I saw Crane, swimming strongly, but never again. (quoted by John Unterecker in “Introduction” to Crane xxxvii–xxxviii)

Crane’s poem “The Broken Tower” was published posthumously in the New Republic in June 1932. He also left an almost-finished folder of poems known as the “Key West” sheaf, poems about the Caribbean. (These are available in print now in The Poems of Hart Crane, ed. Marc Simon.) Shortly after Crane’s death, his mother appointed his friend Waldo Frank to edit a collection of his works, The Complete Poems of Hart Crane, which appeared in 1933. She also decided that a biography would be in order, and in 1937 Philip Horton published Hart Crane: The Life of an American Poet. Before her collaboration with Horton, however, Grace Crane had destroyed many of Hart Crane’s letters from his lovers as well as letters from Peggy Cowley, correspondence that she deemed damaging to his reputation.

Hart Crane’s contribution to literature lies in his unique attempt to be romantic and modern at the same time. He is definitely a romantic in the strain of Whitman, though he also uses modernist themes and settings (such as urban, barren landscapes) and techniques (including fragmentation and overly obscure allusion). In addition, he combines unlikely influences such as Whitman and Dickinson or Dickinson and Eliot. Uses of the sea, the bridge as an organic symbol, and the buildings of Manhattan turned white by the sunrise point to the romantic influence of nature on his work. He remains optimistic in the face of the kind of despair common in the modern age. Judging from the progression from White Buildings to The Bridge, Crane had the talent to become one of the great poets of the century, but he died before he reached his full potential. Nonetheless, his work, especially The Bridge, retains its power and charm.

“Chaplinesque” (1921)

“Chaplinesque” is an example of Crane’s attempt to make a private symbol more universal. First published in 1921, it appears in White Buildings (1926), Crane’s early work. He had seen Charlie Chaplin’s popular movie The Kid in 1921 and was moved by Chaplin’s poignant “Little Tramp” character, making connections between that persona and the French Pierrot.

Of course, Crane himself seems to identify with the “Little Tramp,” misunderstood and down on his luck but ever persevering; however, he also wants to extend that metaphor to the human situation as a whole. In addition, according to several letters, he “made that ‘infinitely gentle, infinitely suffering thing’ of Eliot’s into the symbol of the kitten” (qtd. in Spears 15). In the modern age of 1921, human beings must make “meek adjustments” and be content with “random consolations” (ll. 1, 2), battered about by events beyond their control.

Crane himself claimed a pun on his own name in the line “What blame to us if the heart live on” (l. 18). The previous line about evading “all else but the heart” (l. 17) is also telling of the modernist project of defining some kind of identity in the face of the anonymous, mechanical modern world. Symbols like “a grail of laughter of an empty ash can” (l. 21) clearly show T. S. Eliot’s influence, especially in juxtaposition of religious imagery with the empty, dirty reality of modern life. Crane also seems in this poem, as in many others, to be influenced by the French symbolists, particularly in his graphic imagery. In the end, though, the tramp’s innocent, surprised reaction to the smirks of the policeman is defended as a valid response to the vagaries of modern life.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Watch The Kid and make a detailed list of images that Crane borrows from Chaplin’s “Little Tramp” character. Discuss how Crane adapts these quirks to a more universal theme. Exactly what is he saying about modern life and our response to it?
2. Crane indicates that the “fury of the street” could represent the modern world. Discuss how T. S. Eliot’s “The Hollow Men” uses similar images to condemn modern urban life. Illustrating with specific examples for support, compare the styles of these two poems.
3. What pun is suggested by pirouettes, and how does your answer reflect the role of Chaplin in the modern world? A famous image in William Butler Yeats’s poetry is the spiral. You might also read “Sailing to Byzantium” or “The Second Coming” and compare Yeats’s spiral images with Crane’s.
4. Browse through the poems in White Buildings for more Pierrot images. Compare and contrast these uses. Why is this such an attractive image for Crane?

“At Melville’s Tomb” (1926)

First published in 1926, “At Melville’s Tomb” appears in White Buildings, where it functions as a sort of prologue to the “Voyages” poems, which immediately follow it; the speaker looks out to sea, speculating on the remains of shipwrecks from years past and on Melville’s reaction to those remains. The sea is the major motif of the “Voyages” poems, and “At Melville’s Tomb” sets the tone for them. Melville was one of Crane’s heroes and a major influence. Here, the idea of a sea voyage that ends in death portends the voyages that will follow in the book.

The poem has been accused of being unduly difficult and obscure. Crane wrote a famous letter to Harriet Monroe, the editor of Poetry magazine, where the poem was eventually first published, to defend its difficult imagery. In addition to explaining how some of the symbols operate in the poem, Crane expounds on his task as a poet: “To put it more plainly, as a poet I may very possibly be more interested in the so-called illogical impingements of the connotations of words on the consciousness (and their combinations and interplay in metaphor on this basis) than I am interested in the preservation of their logically rigid significations at the cost of limiting my subject matter and perceptions involved in the poem” (qtd. in Horton 330). In this theory, he seems to follow the French symbolists; textual evidence in the poem also points to their influence. Such evidence includes the references to “azure steepes” (l. 14), referring to the vortex of a deadly shipwreck described as a life-giving cornucopia or beautiful swirling flower bud.

Symbols in the poem illustrate the idea of chance, the indifference of cruel nature, and the hint that religion and history hold little sway over man's destiny. For example, "the dice of drowned men's bones" (l. 2) indicates the role of chance. Crane explained that the bones were ground up into "little cubes" and "thrown up on the sand," leaving no identification. Of course, the pun on dice and bones is not to be missed. Crane elaborates, "Dice as a symbol of chance and circumstance is also implied" (qtd. in Horton 333). Religious symbols, including the calyx (in the sense of chalice), altars, passing bells, and monody (in the sense of elegy or dirge); historical symbols, such as chapter and hieroglyph; and technological symbols such as the compass, quadrant, and sextant are no match for the vast power and indifference of the stars and the sea. Man's invented systems for making sense of the universe lose their meaning in the face of the spiral images connected with nature such as the coil, seashell, calyx (in the sense of flower bud), and the implied circling of the stars and vortex of the shipwreck going down. The awe-inspiring power of nature and particularly of the sea will also appear in each of the six "Voyages" poems.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In what ways does this poem convey Crane's belief in the cruelty of nature? Support your argument with specific images, analyzing each thoroughly as you go.
2. Crane's overarching image here is of a shipwreck. In fact, the poem is difficult partly because it consists largely of this image, with little explanation of what the image means. Attempt to explain how the specific details of the shipwreck image in stanzas 2, 3, and 4 contribute to the poem's greater meaning.
3. T. S. Eliot's complex poem The Waste Land contains recurring images of the drowned Phoenician sailor. Read The Waste Land and look for these images. Compare and contrast them with Crane's use of drowned victims in "At Melville's Tomb." Do you see similarities in style or content? Where? (You might also try a comparison of religious imagery in the two poems.)
4. Write an essay in which you defend the idea that "At Melville's Tomb" is a sort of prologue to the "Voyages" poems that immediately follow it in White Buildings. Illustrate with specific examples to support your position.

"Voyages, I, II, III, IV, V, VI" (1923, 1926)

Written between 1921 and 1925, the six "Voyages" poems appear last in White Buildings. They tie together the ideas of love, death, and the sea. They were written out of order and over the course of many years; critics agree that, like that of the poems of The Bridge, their quality is uneven.

As many of the poems in White Buildings do, these poems still rely on the reader's knowing something about Crane's personal experience for a full understanding, but they are less obscure than his earlier poems and approach the universality of The Bridge poems. For example, although several of the "Voyages" poems were inspired by Emil Opffer, Crane's lover, a sailor who returned from his periodic merchant marine voyages with fantastic tales of things like underwater cities, Crane does not refer to him directly, and even the sexual references are not explicitly homosexual. The poems are unmistakably about love, though. Other allusions to Crane's personal life occur in the poems, but not recognizing them does not detract from the larger meaning of the poems. Although the reader may not know whether "Belle Isle" in "Voyages VI" is a specific reference to a real island off the coast of Labrador; or whether the term alludes to James Joyce's Ulysses, Whitman's "Specimen Days," Eliot's "Gerontion," Emerson's "Works and Days," or Baudelaire's "Un Voyage à Cythère"; or whether it is an inside reference to Crane's grandmother's plantation on the Isle of Pines in the Caribbean, the general meaning of the poem is not much diminished. That is, "Belle Isle" is a reference to all of those; Crane is deliberately obscure in his varied references, expecting his reader (as Eliot also did) to catch his allusions. However, the less astute or in-the-know reader can also take something away, even without recognizing Crane's public and private references. Thus, the poem works on several levels, more successfully on a public level than on a private one and perhaps most successfully on a general level, in which “Belle Isle” simply functions as a destination in the poem representing creativity or peacefulness. The “Voyages” poems are more mature than many others in White Buildings precisely because they work on more levels, including a general one, and are not so confessional. The poems in The Bridge will develop this tendency even further.

In “Voyages I” children play on the beach. This is the beginning of the journey. The poet implores them to enjoy the shore at the same time that he warns them of the cruel sea. The tone is sad, hinting that time will steal the children’s youthful innocence. They will grow up to “flay each other” (l. 2) with more than sand. Once the reader notes that they are playing at “conquest” (l. 3), the question becomes, What journey have they begun? Crane is deliberately obscure. The reader is left asking, Why must they not cross the line? The line to what? The edge of the sea and the passage of time are somehow tied together in a bittersweet warning.

“Voyages II” also addresses the theme of passing time. The poem discusses the sea itself as it reflects the moon, whose tides hasten the seasons. Themes include sleep, death, and desire, all of which are hurried on by the moon’s influence. The journey has now moved out into the ocean, into the Caribbean, and the phrase “the vortex of our grave” (l. 24) indicates that the voyage has death or paradise as its ultimate goal. The sea of experience is vast and beautiful but also cruel.

“Voyages III” is more abstract. The sexual imagery and separation of the lovers are clear, but the famous last line is ambiguous in its exhortation “Permit me voyage, love, into your hands.” (l. 19). The address to love here can be to the lover, the sea, or death, yet the line is fundamentally optimistic. The poem is tinged with religious overtones throughout—note, for example, such words as laved, reliquary, and transmembrment (ll. 6, 8, 18).

“Voyages IV” continues the religious theme (as in the terms chancel and incarnate word—ll. 13, 17), but its topic is geographic space, particularly the speaker’s efforts to return to the lover. This is a love letter to an absent loved one. The albatross in line 5 seems to be an allusion to Coleridge’s “The Rime of the Ancient Mariner,” and the word bridge in line 4 indicates that the bridge theme is present in much of Crane’s early work as well as in the poems from The Bridge. These images also figure in the description of vast space between the Tropics and the Pole. Here, the speaker of the poem is trying to bridge space and time to reach the lover.

“Voyages V” is much more vague. Here the reader feels a dramatic shift in mood. Images include the moon and the tide again, but this time the tide seems to separate the lovers. As Keats does in “Ode on a Grecian Urn,” Crane uses multiple negatives to set the tone, particularly in stanzas 3, 4, and 5. Images of pirates and stealing, as well as a reference to “the cables of our sleep so swiftly filed” (l. 6), point to the death of love or the death of the lover, an idea reinforced by the last phrase, “and sleep the long way home” (l. 25).

“Voyages VI” is full of sea images (such as “shell,” “leagues,” “ocean rivers” [ll. 5, 6, 3]), but the voyage is drawing to a close in an approach to the harbor. Although the love may be dead, the poet continues to strive toward the creative paradise “Belle Isle” (l. 25), which is identified with the “Word” (the poem) that is “the unbetrayable reply / Whose accent no farewell can know” (ll. 29, 31–32). In the poem, the lovers will remain united. Poetry helps the poet survive the experience of suffering and death. This poem is full of imagery of fire, light, and water. Here, the phoenix image rises not out of fire, but out of water. It is significant that “Voyages VI” reverses the nighttime theme of “Voyages V” with its bright morning imagery. Seeing and being blinded by too much light are the result. The journey has been one from childhood to maturity; no farewell can eliminate the muse of poetry, but loving involves dying. However, as the final stanza indicates, poetry itself cannot die, even though everything else does.

The “Voyages” poems, like many of Crane’s works, are heavily influenced by other authors. In homage to Blake’s Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience, Crane implies here that the voyage includes both innocence and experience. From the innocent children in “Voyages I” to the jaded or accepting lover who has experienced the death of love in “Voyages VI,” the characters in these poems have completed a journey. Along the way the poet has learned that art is limited but that it can be a mechanism for survival.

For Discussion or Writing

1. As indicated by the last line of “Voyages I” (“The bottom of the sea is cruel” [l. 16]), Crane is using shipwreck imagery again in these poems. Trace this motif and compare it to his use of the shipwreck idea in “At Melville’s Tomb.”
2. Try to tell what is happening in all six of these poems. Crane’s imagery is so dense that it gets in the way of the plot, but there is a plot, of sorts. You will also experience this problem in The Bridge. Here, make an outline of the sequence of events, as best you can.
3. What kind of journeys could Crane be alluding to in his “Voyages” poems? Emily Dickinson also discusses various trips and journeys. Read several of her trip poems and compare them with Crane’s “Voyages” descriptions. Do you see any similarity in the use of images? Where and how? Compare their styles.
4. Indicate where mood shifts occur in the “Voyages” poems. (For instance, a major shift occurs at the beginning of “Voyages V.” Why? How does Crane accomplish this effect?) What is the general tone of the series at the beginning? At the end? Find specific words and phrases to support your answers. See whether you can relate the shifts to the general meaning of the whole series.
5. In these poems, how does poetry help the poet survive the experience of suffering and death? Support your conclusion by discussing specific words and phrases.

The Bridge (1930)

The Bridge, published privately in Paris and then in America in 1930, is Hart Crane’s most ambitious work. It is a Whitmanesque conglomeration of many smaller poems collected into eight sections and an invocation. As Whitman had, he worked on his poem for some time—it was begun in 1923; he wrote the majority of it in 1926, but he continued to add to it until its publication. Some of the sections are one substantial poem, and some contain several smaller poems. The work contains 15 poems in all. They were written out of order, and critics generally agree that those composed earliest are the most vibrant, but the poems build on one another, and to get the full effect one must read the entire cycle in sequence.

The symbol of the bridge is taken from Crane’s fascination with and admiration of the Brooklyn Bridge. In 1924 he had moved into a building with a splendid view of the bridge and was very excited about the possibilities of a full poem series on that topic. As a symbol, the bridge suggests a journey not only through space but also through time, connecting the East to the vast American push westward. So the poem explores history, including examining Native American culture, the Mississippi River, and modern technology. Figures from history and legend include Christopher Columbus, Rip Van Winkle, and Pocahontas. In addition, the journey involves an exploration of love as well as of historical understanding. The country’s westward journey and the poet’s individual spiritual quest for understanding are intertwined.

Symbols running throughout the individual poems of The Bridge include music, dance, and modern machinery (such as the subway, which, having been constructed in 1908, was still fairly new when the poems were written). Crane is worried about the dehumanization caused by technology. For him, in addition to bridging east and west, the Brooklyn Bridge is a bridge from the past to the future and indicates a change in American life.

It is helpful to have a complete list of the poems and their sections. Many critics discuss this cycle piecemeal, ignoring the puzzling structure. Note that some of the sections do not contain a poem with the same title as the section and that some of the sections consist solely of a single poem with the same title. As you study the poems, keep an eye on their relative lengths, weights, and densities. Here is a complete list, with section titles in capital letters followed, after a colon, by individual poem titles. PROEM: "To Brooklyn Bridge"; I. AVE MARIA: "ave maria"; II. POWHATAN'S DAUGHTER: "The Harbor Dawn," "Van Winkle," "The River," "The Dance," "Indiana"; III. CUTTY SARK: "Cutty Sark"; IV. CAPE HATTERAS: "Cape Hatteras"; V. THREE SONGS: "Southern Cross," "National Winter Garden," "Virginia"; VI. QUAKER HILL: "Quaker Hill"; VII. THE TUNNEL: "The Tunnel"; VIII. ATLANTIS: "Atlantis."

The proem "To Brooklyn Bridge" sets the tone for the cycle. Crane is worried about encroaching technology (symbolized by "elevators," "cinemas," "subway"—ll. 8, 9, 17) at the same time that he lauds the bridge as spiritual (as is suggested by such phrases as "harp and altar," "Prayer of pariah"—ll. 29, 32) and asks the bridge to "lend a myth to God" (l. 44). Section I, "Ave Maria," presents Columbus's monologue upon his return from a voyage westward. Here we see the bridge as poetry itself, a means of spanning two worlds. Columbus links the Old World and the New, and the third world, water, "tests the word" (l. 33) by simultaneously connecting and separating the other two worlds.

In the second section, POWHATAN'S DAUGHTER, Crane uses five poems to explore the idea of Pocahontas as a symbol for America. The theme of sleeping and waking runs through several of them, including one admonishing Rip Van Winkle to hurry up and adjust to the changes that have occurred since he began to nap. "The River" continues the theme of nature versus technology with its underlying image of the train and plodding hoboes on the track who do not fully comprehend this new mechanical development. The "20th century" roars by them, and the momentum of the cycle continues in the swirling motion of the following poem, "The Dance." This poem is somewhat easier to understand than many of Crane's earlier works, primarily because the tone is more consistent throughout and the imagery is less dense and obscure. Pocahontas, standing for unspoiled nature, is fused with the West, the joyous elements in nature. The general tone of the poem is joyous and ecstatic. "Indiana" continues the overland journey of the westward movement.

Section III, CUTTY SARK, contains another major theme of The Bridge: the outcast. The sailor whom the narrator meets tells of his journeys, as the pianola, the erstwhile jukebox, intersperses snippets of popular songs. The poem "Cutty Sark" itself is quite difficult to follow, exhibiting modernist stream-of-consciousness and containing multiple obscure allusions. In line 58, the narrator says, "I started walking home across the Bridge." The poet's interior journey reflects his exterior one.

Section IV, CAPE HATTERAS, represents a change in style. This poem is a tribute to Whitman and mirrors his typical use of all-encompassing lists of details. The topic is the airplane as a technological development. Again, a theme is homecoming, and a major motif is the noisiness of the modern world.

In the next section, THREE SONGS, Crane examines women in the modern world, evoking fallen women (such as Eve, Mary Magdalene, and Venus) as well as elevated women like Pocahontas and Mary. Section VI, QUAKER HILL, shows the modern corruption of simple old-time ways of living. The Quaker Meeting House has become a new hotel (symbolizing religion corrupted by commerce), and even the Mizzentop, the palatial old hotel, has been abandoned (ll. 92–93). The tone is elegiac. The modern world is overtaking tradition.

In section VII, THE TUNNEL, the narrator continues a dark journey in the subway under the river. This poem is also very difficult to follow. The tone is despairing, and the light appears only at the very end as the narrator emerges to the harbor above. There is strong birth and resurrection imagery. Finally, in section VIII, ATLANTIS, the bridge takes him back home. Here, the bridge is a fusion of the organic with the technological. The tone in this section is ecstatic.

When it was published, The Bridge met with critical reviews, particularly from Crane's friends Allen Tate and Yvor Winters. It is still seen as uneven in quality, though always powerful in its

7. Is Crane a modernist or a romantic? In what ways is the Brooklyn Bridge an apt symbol of both romantic and modernist elements? Crane is heavily influenced by romantics and modernists of vastly different styles and national backgrounds. Choose one or two from the following list and make a case for his or her influence: Walt Whitman, Herman Melville, Emily Dickinson, William Blake, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, John Keats, William Butler Yeats, T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, Charles Baudelaire, Arthur Rimbaud, Stéphane Mallarmé, SHERWOOD ANDERSON, ROBERT FROST, WALLACE STEVENS, WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS.

COUNTEE CULLEN (1903–1946)

If I am going to be a poet at all, I am going to be POET and not NEGRO POET.

(qtd. in Early 23)

Countee Cullen began his illustrious career in high school and published his first book of poems, the critically acclaimed Color (1925), in college, followed by Copper Sun (1927) and The Ballad of the Brown Girl (1927). Cullen wrote most of these poems as an undergraduate and by the age of 26 had passed his poetic prime. But as he aged, Cullen experimented with many other genres, including novels, theater, translation, and children's literature, although none of these efforts was as well received as his poetry. At his untimely death on January 9, 1946, Cullen left more questions in his wake than answers. He seemed divided between two selves: Countee Cullen the man and Countee Cullen who represented the Harlem Renaissance to itself and the world. The question his fellow poet and sometime friend LANGSTON HUGHES asked upon Cullen's death is especially apt: "What happened to Countee Cullen?" (qtd. in Early 69).

Cullen was of a perfect age to join the Harlem Renaissance, that fraught and romantic time in New York in the 1920s. Many factors contributed to the environment of the period, not the least of which was a mass migration of African Americans from rural areas into urban environments, including the Harlem neighborhood of New York City. Another influence was the mentorship of figures like W. E. B. DUBOIS, whose concept of "the Talented Tenth"—the percentage of educated, intellectual African Americans who would represent and uplift the entire race—set a new basis for black thought. But the movement created controversy also, and thinkers both then and since have critiqued the bourgeois attitude inherent in "the talented tenth" idea and the unfortunate necessity of white patronage during the period. The Harlem Renaissance ended with the advent of the Great Depression, which was especially difficult for American minorities. Now we can see that the Harlem Renaissance was, in a sense, trapped between the too conciliatory ideas of BOOKER T. WASHINGTON's era and the more radical ideologies to be found in the later period of Civil Rights and the Black Arts Movement (see Kent).

Countee Cullen's birth on March 30, 1903, remains mysterious. Scholars are not certain who his birth parents were or where he was born. (Cullen himself variously listed his birthplace as Louisville, Baltimore, and New York City; most agree Louisville is most likely.) Sometime before 1918, Cullen went to live with the Reverend Frederick A. and Carolyn Belle Cullen, although he was still using the name Countee Porter (perhaps the name of his grandmother). By 1920 he went by Countee P. Cullen, and by the time his first book was published he was simply Countee Cullen (Early 6–10).

Cullen's foster father led the very successful Salem Methodist Episcopal Church in Harlem, was an active member of the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), and was a compatriot of DuBois. Cullen shared a close relationship with both his foster parents but especially with his father. The two traveled together extensively and Cullen wrote three poems for his father in the course of his career. "Yet," as Gerald Early says, "there must have been some tension between the two men; the father was a strict fundamentalist while Cullen experienced intellectual doubts and often expressed a kind of ongoing quarrel with Christianity in many of his poems" (17). Cullen was also a well-known Francophile, a person enamored of French culture and the French language, which he spoke very well. As did his friend and fellow black writer Jessie Redmon Fauset, Cullen spent much time in France, taught French as a schoolteacher, and remained to his death a devotee of French culture.

Cullen always did well at school. He attended the highly regarded DeWitt High School and served as vice president of the senior class and associate editor of the school's literary magazine Magpie, won the Douglas Fairbanks Oratorical Contest, and received the Magpie Cup. He also won a citywide poetry contest, and "in some sense this initial success by Cullen . . . really kicked off the literary movement called the Harlem Renaissance" (Early 19). Cullen attended New York University on a scholarship, and it was there that he cemented his love for the romantic poet John Keats, arguably the strongest influence on Cullen's own work. Color was published during his senior year. After graduating Phi Beta Kappa, Cullen went on to receive a master of arts degree from Harvard in 1926, and shortly after that he began writing his "Dark Tower" column for Opportunity magazine, which also became the title of Madame A'Lelia Walker's famous literary salon. In the words of Early, "If anyone was being groomed, being intellectually and culturally conditioned and bred, first by whites, then by blacks, to be a major black crossover literary figure, it was this thin, shy, black boy. . . . [He] was the race's first honest-to-goodness child literary star" (19). By age 24, Cullen had become a celebrity.

But Cullen's star faded as he aged, although it certainly never was extinguished. None of his other work met with the critical acclaim of Color, and in 1924 his friendship with Hughes (arguably Cullen's greatest rival for the status of Harlem Renaissance wunderkind) came to an end. "It is a testament to the accomplished secrecy of both parties that, seventy years later, we know so little of what happened," writes Steven Watson (61). The Harlem Renaissance was still in full swing in 1924, but the break between Hughes and Cullen represents a larger break between Hughes's experimental jazz-and-blues-based poetics (those that were to signify the movement) and Cullen's affection for classical forms. Thus their separation is also the beginning of Cullen's fissure from the larger group. Early writes, "In their distinct ways, both Countee Cullen and Langston Hughes . . . produced a striking and powerful new black poetry; one through suffusing essentially English poetry with race consciousness . . . and the other through elevating black folk forms with a kind of ingenious self-consciousness" (36). However, as the Harlem Renaissance continued and became tangled up with other literary and cultural experiments as represented by the modernist movement, Hughes's poetry was embraced and Cullen's began to be passed over.

On April 9, 1928, Cullen married the daughter of W. E. B. DuBois. The union between Cullen and Yolande DuBois was seen as the ultimate conjunction, a mingling of intellect and beauty, a representation of black America's future. Nearly everyone connected to the Renaissance was in attendance, and the Talented Tenth showed up en masse. Unfortunately, the marriage was a disaster. Yolande DuBois and Cullen had very little in common, and while their marriage ended officially in 1930, it really only lasted a few months. It is impossible to know why Cullen made such a poor match, but Early speculates that "he married Yolande because she was DuBois's daughter, and this gave him a particular pedigree and status, not only socially but in polite circles of black literary culture which he wanted" (53). Regardless, the divorce signified another fissure between Cullen the man and Cullen the representation of Harlem.

There has been much speculation over Cullen's sexual orientation, although none of it is backed up with proof. David Levering Lewis implies that Cullen was attracted to (and perhaps lovers with) both Harold Jackman and Hughes, and many have read a suggestion of homosexual love into some of Cullen's poems such as "To a Brown Boy" (Lewis 76, 81). Early, however, rejects such claims, stating, "There is, however, no evidence that Cullen and Jackman were lovers. There is no evidence that Cullen was engaged in any homosexual relations with any other figures of the Renaissance" (Early 19, n. 21). Despite assertions on both sides, there are only hints and whispers to suggest Cullen was gay, and yet they persist, even though Cullen was married twice, apparently quite happily the second time. Such continuing questions speak to another potential duality in Cullen's life. In truth, we will probably never know conclusively and it is probably best to follow Early's example and believe the actual evidence rather than the sensational speculation.

During the 1930s Cullen's writing branched out while also becoming less prolific: He produced The Black Christ and Other Poems (1929); a novel, One Way to Heaven (1933); and a translation of Euripides' Medea, "making him the first black American author to do a major Greek drama translation in prose" (Early 66). He seems to have been drawn strongly to drama, as he collaborated with Arna Bontemps on an adaptation of Bontemps's novel God Sends Sunday and worked on adapting his own novel for the stage as well. By the end of his life, he was also heavily and happily involved in writing stories for children, particularly a story titled "The Monkey Baboon" and a prose adaptation of his poem "The Lost Zoo" (Early 57). According to Early, "Many have speculated on Cullen's reduced output. Part of it may have been writer's block, lack of inspiration, or sheer laziness, but a part of it must have been that after 1929 . . . he no longer quite had the time to write that he had before. This was especially true after . . . he [became] a certified public school teacher, a job he was to keep until his death" (56). Noteworthy during his teaching career was Cullen's tutelage of James Baldwin, who would grow up to become another great African-American author (Early 65).

Cullen married Ida Roberson in 1940, and their marriage proved more successful than Cullen's first, despite ongoing speculation about Cullen's sexual orientation. His last years were fraught with mixed reviews and bad health, but he was still active in literature, working on compiling a selection of his poetry and more concerned about his father's health than his own when he died on January 9, 1946, of high blood pressure and uremic poisoning. Cullen's funeral was remarkably well attended, and his former father-in-law, DuBois, gave the perfect eulogy: "That Countee Cullen was born with the Twentieth Century as a black boy to live in Harlem was a priceless experience. . . . Yet, as I have said, Cullen's career was not finished. It did not culminate. It laid [a] fine, beautiful foundation, but the shape of the building never emerged" (qtd. in Watson 169).

Cullen remains a complex figure who is hard to decipher. Early writes, "Cullen defined his age and, in that sense, dominated it as much as a man of Cullen's temperament could dominate anything. . . . [He recognized] that the divided black psyche was the single most riveting riddle of the twentieth-century Western world and it was time for the white Western world to recognize it as such" (22–23). But perhaps Cullen was divided not only with the "twoness" that DuBois spoke of in The Souls of Black Folk, but also with the peculiar doubleness of those who are made too famous or too representative of something too early. The pressures put on Cullen as a very young person to represent the "New Negro" to the world were considerable and no doubt had a great effect on his personal development. Thus, Cullen the man was always divided between his individuality and the expectations of the Harlem Renaissance. What is certain, however, are Cullen's astounding contributions to American letters represented in poems that continue to define, shape, and question the African-American experience as much today as when they were first written. His words still resonate across the years.

"For a Lady I Know" (1925)

Consisting of a mere four lines, "For a Lady I Know" uses quick wit as social satire and addresses the inherent problem of mingling Christianity with the black American experience. In this poem, however, the perspective involves the mind-set of a white upper-class woman; the work thus shows Cullen's ability to manipulate other perspectives and thereby highlight his own:

She even thinks that up in heaven
Her class lies late and snores,
While poor black cherubs rise at seven
To do celestial chores. (ll. 1–4)

The format of the poem is simple—deceptively so. As readers, we quickly get the joke that the speaker is acquainted with a woman who believes race (and class) will matter in heaven, and we are meant to see this as ridiculous. Nicholas Canaday says, “Cullen was good at making short poems of social satire . . . contain[ing] some of his most often quoted lines. . . . The pervasiveness of the black experience is again apparent” (113). But there is more involved in this poem than a simple gag. Instead, Cullen's use of obvious humor makes a larger statement about white society. (At least about the upper classes of white society. It should be noted that Cullen himself was from an educated, financially stable minority—the “talented tenth”—so it does not seem surprising that he would place his white character in the class considered mainstream, and most similar to his own.)

That the woman is of a higher economic status is hinted at by the use of the word class, paired with even thinks, suggesting she is of a leisure class and believes existence in heaven will remain similar to that on earth—she assumes that she will continue to be able to sleep late. She is almost certainly white as well, given the distance placed between her and the “poor black cherubs,” and therein lies the poem's main concern. Racism and class prejudice are so deeply rooted in this woman's mind that she cannot conceive of the afterlife, or anything else, without these constructs.

We have already seen Cullen's concern with reconciling a white Christian tradition to the enduring difficulty of the African-American experience.

While “For a Lady I Know” uses humor instead of questions, it still raises an important issue: If white culture is racist, how is a black person to embrace white culture's religion? But the poem complicates this idea, too, by making a mockery of racist assumptions about God and heaven. The speaker certainly does not believe such inequalities will exist after death, and he pokes fun at the people who are so entrenched in their own thinking. While Cullen believes God is color-blind, he feels justified in ridiculing God's followers who cannot see this. In the end, Cullen insists on his equality, if not his superiority, by implicitly contrasting his own intellectual capabilities and the inferior thought inherent in the racist mind.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Look at some of Cullen's other very short, satirical poems, such as “For an Atheist,” “For an Anarchist,” “For a Pessimist,” “For Daughters of Magdalen,” or “For a Mouthy Woman.” How do they hold up next to “For a Lady I Know” as social satire? What do you think are the benefits of this brief form? How about the drawbacks? Why might a poet like Countee Cullen have chosen to write so many poems in this tight, concise format?
2. Compare and contrast this work with Langston Hughes's poem “Song for a Dark Girl.” Discuss the poems in terms of theme, point of view, setting, and tone.
3. Discuss the irony of the rhyme words snores and chores. What are the connotations of each word? How is snores a particularly ironic word choice in view of the class of the woman satirized in this poem? What are the complex connotations of the word poor?

“Heritage” (1925)

Generally considered Cullen's finest poem, “Heritage” portrays one of his most common conflicts: the battle between paganism—represented here by Africa—and “civilized” Christianity. According to Early, “What Cullen finds attractive as a writer is the basic ambiguity that exists in the meaning of his being a black Christian . . . because being a black Christian has . . . a kind of uneasy meshing of the sacred and secular” (58). “Heritage” begins by asking, “What is Africa to me?” and gives several exotic descriptions such as “Strong bronzed men, or regal black / Women from whose loins I sprang / . . . / Spicy grove, cinnamon tree” (ll. 4–5, 9). By exploring what Africa, symbolic of heritage, means to a “three centuries removed” African American, Cullen examines the nature of his existence (l. 7).

In the second stanza Cullen begins to play with his readers. Starting with “So I lie,” literally meaning “lying down,” the poet also hints at a lack of truth (l. 11). Is he, in fact, lying about what Africa means to him? About the reason for the whole poem? This will be a prevalent question throughout as he repeats this phrase five times. Cullen uses this illusion to make a statement about Christianity and the black experience. “Illusions are crucial antidotes to a pain that threatens to overwhelm,” David E. Goldweber says. “Illusions are an ironic solution to life’s problems; they are, after all, unreal” (1).

This illusive quality continues as Cullen both negates his connection to Africa—“Africa? A book one thumbs / Listlessly, till slumber comes” (ll. 31–32)—but continues to dwell on it all the same, finally admitting that he cannot escape this heritage: “So I lie, who find no peace / Night or day, no slight release / From the unremittant beat / Made by cruel padded feet” (ll. 64–67, 79–80).

But then the poet denies his connection to his African heritage: “My conversion came high-priced; / I belong to Jesus Christ, / Preacher of humility; / Heathen gods are naught to me” (ll. 89–92). Nicholas Canaday, Jr., suggests that “in that voice the poet says he is superior because his belief is ‘high-priced.’ . . . One must pay; one must give something back. . . . Besides, African gods look like Africans. Cullen’s irony is devastating because he is so well aware of what the Christian God looks like” (124). Therefore, Cullen expresses his awareness of the uncomfortable position black Christians face when choosing a “white” God.

While the poet continues to express his Christianity, he also complicates his faith further by saying that he plays “a double part” and that “Ever at Thy glowing altar / Must my heart grow sick and falter, / Wishing He I served were black” (ll. 98–101). He then transforms Christianity into a faith he can embrace: “Surely this flesh would know / Yours had borne a kindred woe. / Lord, I fashion dark gods, too, / Daring even to give You / Dark despairing features . . .” (ll. 105–109). The poem concludes with (almost) a veiled threat to Christianity and the white Western tradition, expressing how close the poet lies to pagan regression: “Not yet has my heart or head / In the least way realized / They and I are civilized” (ll. 127–128). Ultimately, the poem explores Cullen’s connection to both paganism and Christianity, and the ways in which an African American tries to reconcile these two parts of himself.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In chapter 1 of W. E. B. DuBois’s The Souls of Black Folk, “Of Our Spiritual Strivings,” DuBois discusses an inherent “twoness” in the African-American consciousness. How might Cullen have employed this idea in “Heritage”? Do you think Cullen makes a convincing case for “twoness”? Why or why not?
2. David K. Kirby suggested that “Heritage” is philosophically and emotionally comparable to T. S. ELIOT’s The Waste Land (1922), arguably the definitive poem of the literary period known as high modernism, a movement somewhat contemporaneous with the Harlem Renaissance. Read The Waste Land while keeping “Heritage” in mind. How do you think the two poems might be philosophically and emotionally comparable? Are they representative of their times? If so, how and why?
3. Enjambment is the practice of running a sentence from one line to another, rather than providing a pause at the end of a line. How does Cullen use that technique to prevent the rhythm of this poem from becoming too “singsong” or too predictable? What devices does Cullen use to engage and involve the reader? In particular, discuss the use of questions in this poem.

“Incident” (1925)

Countee Cullen’s “Incident” stands alongside “Yet Do I Marvel” and “Heritage” in both fame and prestige. This short, three-stanza poem depicts a young black boy’s encounter with racism, maybe his first, or maybe just his first involving another child like him. Many have speculated that this incident actually may have happened to Cullen, and the poem’s formal style perhaps “suggests how poetic form sometimes offers a much needed thankful distance from the experience of racial terror, particularly when the target is so vulnerable and the incident so unexpected” (Jarraway 223). Nevertheless, “Incident” retains a profound emotional quality that manages to portray the damaging effects of racism.

The first stanza sets up the scene and the narrator. He sits on a train or trolley car, “riding in old Baltimore,” heart and head “filled with glee” (ll. 1–2). Given the specification of place, it seems fair to assume the speaker is not from Baltimore. This probability sets up an early tension of difference between this out-of-towner and the “Baltimorean” (l. 3), who keeps staring at him, a tension that is played out later as it becomes clear the Baltimorean is white and the speaker is black. However, at this point all that can be deduced are the happiness of the speaker and his difference from the one regarding him. This cheerful beginning also places both the speaker and the reader in a perfect place to be knocked down.

In the second stanza, Cullen establishes the speaker’s age: He is eight years old, and the Baltimorean is “no whit bigger” (l. 6). The speaker sees a similarity in their matching ages (as well as, probably, in the other child’s stare), and so he “smile[s]” (l. 7). However, the Baltimorean displays both his childishness (by sticking out his tongue) and his racism (by calling the speaker “Nigger” [l. 8]). Here the poem becomes more complex, because the words indicate the disturbing fact of confronting such hostile racism at such a young age (and from such a young person), while the poem’s formality hints at how fully integrated racism is into society. Certainly this young Baltimorean did not learn bigotry in a vacuum but has already absorbed how to stigmatize others for the color of their skin, and he now passes that lesson on to the speaker.

In the end, the poem shows “an incongruity between what a childhood experience ought to be and what it is. There is now a sad awareness” of how racism taints everything (Canaday 115). The speaker says he spent many months in Baltimore, but all he remembers is the racist incident that occurred on his way into town. With this closing statement (“That’s all that I remember” [l. 12]), Cullen shows how psychologically damaging racism is—so damaging that it blocks out all other occurrences. But, again, because of his masterful use of both emotion and form, Cullen also makes a social statement. The poem is not a sob story but a cautionary tale, explaining to anyone who will listen how traumatizing bigotry can be.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read either (or both) ZORA NEALE HURSTON’S Dust Tracks on the Road or RICHARD WRIGHT’S Black Boy. How do these works concern children and their experiences with racism? In what ways do they complement Cullen’s poem? In what ways do they challenge Cullen’s poem? What are the authors’ objectives in discussing childhood experiences? Do they achieve those objectives?
2. In W. E. B. DuBois’s book The Souls of Black Folk, read the chapter titled “Of Our Spiritual Strivings.” Which incident described in that chapter seems most comparable to the incident described in Cullen’s poem? How do the incidents differ? Do you think one incident left a greater scar than the other? Explain.
3. Discuss the effectiveness of the last line of each stanza. How do the final lines of the first and second stanzas create suspense? What kind of impact does the final line of the whole poem have? How does Cullen try to make his poem as memorable—as difficult to forget—as the incident he describes? To what extent, and in what ways, does he succeed?

“Yet Do I Marvel” (1925)

“Yet Do I Marvel” stands as a classic Countee Cullen poem, mingling his concern with both race and Christianity, with just a touch of classical mythology thrown in. The poem begins with a musing declaration: “I doubt not God is good, well-meaning, kind, / And did He stoop to quibble could tell why / The little buried mole continues blind, / Why flesh that mirrors Him must some day die” (ll. 1–4). The poet asserts initially that God is “good, well-meaning, kind” but then points out facts that seem cruel or unfair, such as the blindness of moles and the inevitability of death, and thereby complicates our sense of God’s inherent goodness.

Cullen then mentions two figures in Greek mythology—Tantalus was condemned to eternal, unslakable thirst and hunger; Sisyphus was doomed to roll a mighty stone up a hill in Hades, only to have the stone roll down once he reached the top, forcing him to start over again. Arguably, both figures deserved their punishments, but Cullen deliberately chose two myths that highlight eternal futility. These mythological figures are, in turn, linked to the God-created unseeing mole and death.

Returning to God, the poet says, “Inscrutable His ways are, and immune / To catechism by a mind too strewn / With petty cares to slightly understand / What awful brain compels his awful hand” (ll. 9–12). Here, the poet suggests that God’s ambiguous decisions are above reproach by humans. Cullen’s choice of the word awful is noteworthy. Probably Cullen implies older meanings of the word, such as “commanding awe” and “formidable in nature or extent” (American Heritage Dictionary). We should not, however, overlook the more common meaning of “extremely bad or unpleasant.” The poem thus states the speaker’s belief in God’s goodness and infallibility even as it continues to question facts that seem unfair.

The final couplet moves Cullen’s thought process full circle. Upon admitting that he cannot understand the mind of God, he says, “Yet do I marvel at this curious thing: / To make a poet black, and bid him sing!” (ll. 13–14). We now see Cullen reacting to the inevitable struggle black Americans face, and ultimately questioning a God who would place them in this situation yet give them the drive to rise up and “sing.” It should be noted, however, that Fred M. Fetrow reads the poem quite differently, suggesting that the “punishments” mentioned are either justified or not punishments at all. Therefore, “Cullen acknowledges, even emphasizes, the difficulty for a black poet in answering that divine call to sing; but through the strategic presentation of precedent, he also claims that the black poet can still articulate his blackness and express his unique racial identity while singing his humanity” (2). However one interprets it, “Yet Do I Marvel” stands as one of Cullen’s most famous poems and as a perfect example of Cullen’s style and way of thought.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In Maya Angelou’s poem “I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings,” Angelou writes as both a woman and an African American, and she too uses the metaphor of singing. Compare the two poems. What symbolism is implied by the word sing? Why, and in what ways, do two different African-American poets use this concept?
2. Compare and contrast this work with EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY’s poem “I, being born a woman.” Discuss the theme of fate in both works. Discuss their treatments of irony. How and why do both poets use the sonnet form?
3. Compare and contrast this work with CLAUDE MCKAY’s poem entitled “Outcast.” How are they similar and/or different in theme, tone, diction, and point of view? Which work appeals to you more? Explain why.
4. Is there any irony in the use of the word quibble? What are some connotations of that word, and what does that word suggest about the different perspectives of God and the poem’s speaker? Why does the speaker mention different kinds of beings, including both animals and humans as well as legendary figures and persons presently living?

“From the Dark Tower” (1927)

“We shall not always plant while others reap” declares the opening line of Cullen’s “From the Dark Tower,” setting the stage not only for a poem dealing with race and racism, but also for one that contains a simmering anger and a veiled threat. That the anger and threat should be so subtle, or hidden behind pretty words and a contained sonnet form, has led many (especially during his own time) to criticize Cullen for a lack of political or racial consciousness. However, the fact that the poem opens Cullen’s second book of poetry, Copper Sun, and contains a bitterness and “ominous warning” not seen from him before makes “From the Dark Tower” an important poem in the Cullen canon (Canaday 117).

“We shall not always plant while others reap / The golden increment of bursting fruit, / Not always countenance, abject and mute, / That lesser men should hold their brothers cheap; / . . . / We were not made eternally to weep” (ll. 1–4, 8). The poem’s first half bursts forth with a poetically contained anger. The speaker/poet claims that while African Americans have too often settled for the status afforded them by white culture, those days are coming to an end. “From the Dark Tower” the poet observes and bides his time, and he sees a people ready to take equality by force because they “were not made eternally to weep.”

The second part becomes slightly more complicated or, if not more complicated, more dense. After having declared his brooding threat, the speaker claims there is no aesthetic difference between darkness and lightness: “The night whose sable breast relieves the stark, / White stars is no less lovely being dark” (ll. 9–10). During the Harlem Renaissance, many thinkers insisted on the beauty of the black body, perhaps for the first time in artistic history. Langston Hughes and Cullen were joined in this respect at least, for in life and poetry both stated their belief (in essence) that black was beautiful. The speaker then suggests that some things are better black: “And there are buds that cannot bloom at all / In light, but crumple, piteous, and fall” (ll. 11–12). The speaker is here presenting the evidence that legitimizes the poem’s first half. In short, African Americans are ready to claim equality because they are equal (if not, often, better).

“From the Dark Tower” concludes by saying, “So in the dark we hide the heart that bleeds, / And wait, and tend our agonizing seeds” (ll. 13–14). The phrase “So in the dark” clearly holds a double meaning—in a place without light where white culture cannot or has not seen “the heart that bleeds” (l. 13), as well as in the bodies and souls of “dark” (African-American) people. In this respect, the phrase “heart that bleeds” also contains a double meaning—it refers to the physical heart, of course, but also to the seat of emotion and passion. The final line, “. . . wait, and tend our agonizing seeds,” restates the threat. Tending seeds conjures visions of cultivating plants, and the speaker suggests that in African Americans hurt and anger will grow until they are ready to be harvested. No longer is the poet an innocent boy facing racism for the first time (as in “Incident”) but a grown man ready to speak for his people.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Countee Cullen has often been criticized for his devotion to “white, Western” poetic forms and for lack of a true political consciousness. We have seen, however, that Cullen often dealt with race in his poetry. Read some political poems by his fellow Harlem Renaissance poets Claude McKay (“Enslaved,” “White Houses,” “Harlem Shadows”) and Langston Hughes (“I, Too, Sing America,” “Will V-Day Be Me-Day Too?” and “Let America Be America Again”). Do you think the criticism of Cullen is justified? Describe, in your own words, what makes a political poem good or important. Do you think it is the business of artists to engage with politics at all? Why or why not?
2. Compare and contrast this poem with Richard Wright’s story titled “Long Black Song.” How does the ending of Wright’s story make explicit a possible outcome implied in Cullen’s poem? Is the violence at the end of Wright’s story a response merely to a single incident? In which work is the tone more ominous?

3. Discuss the irony of the term lesser men, especially in view of the racist assumptions of those very men. In what ways are they “lesser”? Given its economic connotations, why is cheap a particularly effective word? Discuss the ironic juxtaposition of the words subtle and brute. How and why would these words normally contradict each other?

“Uncle Jim” (1927)

“White folks is white,” says uncle Jim” at the opening of Cullen’s poem and thus begins a poetic musing on the essential and inherent differences between black and white, for in the poem, “the unspoken implication is that there is an impassable gulf between the white and the black experience” (Canaday 117). But while this conflict lies at the center of “Uncle Jim,” uncertainty still surrounds the poem’s subtexts, especially regarding the speaker’s white companion.

When Uncle Jim declares, “White folks is white,” the speaker responds: “‘A platitude,’ I sneer; / And then I tell him so is milk, / And the froth upon his beer” (ll. 3–4). This opening stanza gives us every reason to disregard Uncle Jim and identify with the speaker; after all, Uncle Jim uses bad grammar, drinks, and smokes (as the poem goes on), while the speaker is educated enough to dismiss Uncle Jim’s opinion with easy arguments and youthful self-righteousness. However, as the poem continues, Uncle Jim will not deign to argue with this youngster. Instead, “His heart walled up with bitterness, / He smokes his pungent pipe. / And nods at me as if to say, / ‘Young fool, you’ll soon be ripe!’” (ll. 5–8). Despite his hurt (probably stemming both from his experiences with white folks and from the speaker’s inattention), Uncle Jim knows the narrator will soon learn for himself the truth about white people.

In the second stanza the poem moves away from the scene with Uncle Jim into a description of a “friend” of the speaker “who eats his heart / Always with grief of mine, / Who drinks my joy as tipplers drain / Deep goblets filled with wine” (ll. 9–12).

In short, this friend is a kindred spirit to the speaker despite the probability that the friend is white. And therein lies the rub as the speaker ponders, “I wonder why here at his side, / Face-in-the-grass with him, / My mind should stray the Grecian urn / To muse on uncle Jim” (ll. 13–16). Even though the speaker feels the utmost affinity for his friend, he comes upon an inexplicable moment when he considers Uncle Jim’s “platitude” and cannot help wondering whether there is indeed some inherent dissimilarity between black and white.

While the major theme of the poem is relatively clear, many read a homosexual subtext, seeing the speaker’s “friend” as a lover. This interpretation adds another layer to our understanding of the poem, for it mixes romantic passion into the relationship between the black male speaker and his white male friend, a passion of which Uncle Jim (and most of Cullen’s contemporaries) would no doubt disapprove. If, however, we read the poem as a reflection on the larger theme of romantic love, Cullen may have been commenting on the complications of interracial relationships as well. For the record, most of the speculation regarding Cullen’s homosexual tendencies is just that: speculation. Nothing in either Cullen’s life or work does more than hint at this possibility. Regardless, “Uncle Jim” exhibits, once again, Cullen’s mastery of form while musing on life’s largest questions.

For Discussion or Writing

1. In one sense, “Uncle Jim” could be called a poem about differences, including such differences as black/white, gay/straight, educated/uneducated. Discuss whether or not you think there are impassable barriers between certain categories of people, and be careful to justify your thoughts.
2. Langston Hughes’s poem “Mother to Son” also deals with relations between an older black person and a younger relative. Compare and contrast the two poems in terms of diction, tone, form, point of view, and ultimate meaning.
3. How could the title Uncle have demeaning and racist connotations in Cullen’s time, and how might such connotations be relevant to this poem?

9. Despite the lack of evidence, many conclude that Cullen was a homosexual or a bisexual. In theoretical terms, “queer theory” acts on the assumption that gender is a culturally taught construction and is therefore malleable. Do some brief research into the uses of queer theory and then see whether you can “queer” one of Cullen’s poems. What issues arise out of this exercise? How do you imagine Cullen would feel about it? Can you do the same to a poem by Hughes? Claude McKay? Gwendolyn Bennett? Amiri Baraka?
10. Research two or more poets of the modernist period such as T. S. Eliot, William Carlos Williams, Wallace Stevens, GERTRUDE STEIN, H. D., or EZRA POUND. What similarities do you see between their work and Cullen’s? How were they all influenced by the period? Conversely, what differences do you see? What reasons account for these differences (race, gender, age, location, politics, class)? Does the Harlem Renaissance belong with the aesthetics of the modernist period? Does Cullen? Or was the renaissance its own movement? Explain and discuss your answers.

E. E. CUMMINGS (1894–1962)

The tragedy of life always hasn't been and isn't that some people are poor and others rich, some hungry and others not hungry, some weak and others strong. The tragedy is and always will be that most people are unable to express themselves.

(Eimi)

One of the most unconventional poets of American literature, E. E. Cummings is perhaps best known for his revolt against capitalization. His eccentricity in matters of poetic form and grammar unquestionably influenced the development of modern verse, yet, despite a steady if not extensive number of devotees, his poetry has inspired surprisingly little scholarly analysis and, among academics in particular, a reputation for superficiality (Friedman 1). Perhaps this ambivalence stems in part from its radically experimental nature, especially its striking disarrangement of words, its transformations of verbs into nouns, and its often puzzling manipulations of punctuation. Cummings, however, never seemed very concerned by mixed reviews; in fact, he constantly sought to disrupt both literary and social complacency. In seeking nonconformity, he may have risked glamorizing the scandalous, the immoral, and the delinquent, but his work nevertheless reveals an almost childlike wonder and love of beauty, a love that he was able to express in a style that is lavishly kinetic and musical.

Born October 14, 1894, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, Edward Estlin Cummings revealed an interest in poetry remarkably early in life, and fortunately, his parents were able to provide an encouraging environment. His father, Edward Cummings, a professor at Harvard and a Unitarian minister, frequently took his young son on walks across campus, while his mother, Rebecca née Clarke Cummings, well educated and a poet herself, read aloud to her young son daily. Perhaps because of the great interest both parents took in Cummings's language skills, he could read by age four, and by age six he was already composing short poems. To supplement their intellectual life, the Cummingses spent holidays in the country, mostly at Joy Farm, an old farm in Silver Lake, New Hampshire. For Cummings, Joy Farm eventually became a much-beloved retreat and an important scene of poetic inspiration.

Cummings's formal education began at age seven when he was enrolled at a nearby private primary school. Two years later, he was transferred to the private Agassiz School, where he continued to excel in all subjects but math. The precocious young Cummings soon began making a name for himself as a "writer" and "artist." At age 12 he was enrolled at Peabody, another Cambridge school, where he maintained his predilection for the arts. Although still conspicuously poor in math, he distinguished himself enough to be chosen to recite a poem at graduation. Later, at the Cambridge Latin School, his avid enthusiasm for education suffered its first slump, primarily because of the school's emphasis on conjugating Latin and Greek verbs. Nevertheless, Cummings was soon reading well in Latin, and he also began submitting prose pieces not just to his school magazine but also to independent journals as well. Not until his 15th birthday in 1909, when his uncle gave him Thomas Hood, Jr.'s, The Rhymester or The Rules of Rime, did he begin to display the first signs of his later notorious interest in experimental poetry.

In 1911 Cummings entered Harvard to study classics. Although not a uniformly outstanding student, he continued to read and write extensively—habits that impressed such fellow student writers as JOHN DOS PASSOS, S. Foster Damon, Gilbert Seldes, and Robert Hillyer. Through these new acquaintances he developed his taste for all things avant-garde, and soon his poetry began to reflect the stylistic eccentricities common among many modern writers. In 1913 he joined the editorial team of the Harvard Monthly—a position that he held until he graduated. His lifelong friendships with other members of the Monthly's staff were his most valuable acquisitions at Harvard; these dedicated young artists not only created the Harvard Poetry Society but also collaborated on a book entitled Eight Harvard Poets, to which Cummings contributed. In 1916 he graduated with a Harvard M.A.; however, he briefly continued living at Cambridge, taking advantage of the free room and board and indulging in intense bouts of painting and writing.

In 1916 Cummings joined a publishing company, where most of his duties were clerical. Although he apparently enjoyed his job and “independence” (Sawyer 101), he quickly resigned, evidently unsatisfied by his lack of creative expression. Soon, however, he voluntarily joined the Norton-Harjes Ambulance Corps, not only to seek adventure but also to avoid being drafted during World War I. On his way to Paris, he became friends with another young volunteer, William Slater Brown. Upon arriving in Paris, and having managed to detach themselves from the rest of their unit, they were detained in Paris for several months—a much-celebrated diversion that inspired Cummings's lasting passion for Parisian life. Once the two were finally deployed, they quickly gained a reputation for “insipid insubordination” (Sawyer 115). It was their letters home, however, some of which expressed sympathy for German soldiers and many of which complained of the futility of the war, that ultimately generated worse charges. The French military, after several months of intercepting their mail, arrested them for espionage. After an initial interrogation at Noyon, Cummings was interred for three months at La Ferté-Macé, “a detention center for ‘undesirables’ and ‘spies’” (Sawyer 119)—an experience he later immortalized in his first prose piece, The Enormous Room.

Once released, he briefly recuperated in Cambridge before returning to New York and his artistic career. While there, he began an affair with Elaine Thayer, the wife of a Harvard friend, Scofield Thayer. Although Thayer eventually discovered the affair, it caused no breach in the men's close friendship. Early in 1918 a reluctant Cummings was drafted and sent off to Massachusetts, where he met the unidentified young pacifist who inspired the poem “i sing of Olaf glad and big.” Fortunately for Cummings, his enlistment did not last more than eight months. By January 1918 he was back in New York, where he immediately rented a studio with William Brown and reimmersed himself in the modernist revolution. In 1919 the Society of Independent Artists in New York displayed two of his paintings, but Cummings and Elaine, still deeply involved, were also confronted with Elaine's sobering pregnancy. Cummings, completely obsessed with his art, had no desire to be a parent; both he and Thayer tried to convince Elaine to have an abortion, but she refused and eventually gave birth to Cummings's only child, Nancy (Mopsy). Although Cummings deliberately avoided any paternal obligations, he remained close friends with both Thayer and Elaine, who raised Nancy as their own child.

During the following year, Cummings began to see many of his poems published, mainly in the Dial, a magazine now owned by Thayer. In summer 1920, Cummings moved back to Cambridge at his father's insistence to finish documenting his experiences at La Ferté-Macé. As soon as the manuscript was completed, however, he turned the proofing and publishing over to his father and left for Europe with his old friend, Dos Passos. In 1922, while Cummings was in Paris, The Enormous

Room was published, to be followed four years later by his first collection of poems, Tulips and Chimneys. Unfortunately, any pleasure he might have felt was entirely eclipsed by the dismay of discovering the editors' modifications: Not only did he find numerous passages cut from The Enormous Room, but he also found various misspelled words and an extensive standardizing of punctuation.

Another significant event that occurred during this time was the divorce of Elaine and Thayer in summer 1921. By 1924 Cummings was back in New York, basking in the rave reviews of Tulips and Chimneys and contemplating Elaine's proposal of marriage. The two were married by Cummings's father, and on April 25 of the same year, Cummings legally adopted Nancy. Although Cummings and Elaine treated each other more as old friends than as newlyweds, Cummings described himself as happy. He immediately began working on two new volumes of poetry, ☺, and XLI Poems, little realizing how his relentless cycle of work and socializing would take its toll on his marriage. Two months after their wedding, Elaine informed Cummings that she was in love with another man and asked for a divorce. Cummings reacted desperately but could not persuade her to stay. In September 1924, he moved in with his old college friend Watson, at 4 Patchin Place, his "home" for the rest of his life. Although he spent most of the following year in futile legal struggles for Nancy's custody, he managed to stay fairly productive.

The next two years brought both happiness and sorrow. In 1925 he won the prestigious Dial award and also began a passionate affair with a flapper, Anne Barton. In 1926 his newest collection of poems, Is 5, received many favorable reviews. However, near the end of 1926, his parents were involved in a car accident that instantly killed his father, and his friend Thayer suffered a serious mental breakdown. In the wake of these calamities, Cummings again moved to Paris, this time with Anne. There he worked on his first play, Edward Seul, later renamed Him, which in 1928 incited enthusiastic applause from audiences and equally enthusiastic censure from reviewers. The following year, Cummings married Anne, but their marriage, despite periods of intense bliss, lasted just a little over three years. By October 1932 the two were divorced and Anne had remarried, leaving Cummings once again alone with his work. Living with Anne, however, had proved inspiring (to say the least). In the two years of their marriage, Cummings published an assortment of short stories without a title, [No Title]; a compilation of artwork, CIOPW (Charcoal, Ink, Oil, Pencil, and Watercolor); and a remarkably structured volume of poetry, ViVa (W). Also composed during this marriage was a lengthy journal that eventually developed into his second autobiographical prose piece, Eimi. Although the 1933 publication of Eimi received overwhelmingly harsh reviews, Cummings was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship that same year. It required that he spend at least one year abroad; this Cummings did with aplomb, taking with him the beautiful Marion Morehouse, actress and runway model, with whom he was to enjoy his most stable and lasting relationship.

While his personal life was improving, however, his career began floundering; unable to find a producer for his ballet, Tom, or a publisher for his manuscript titled 70 Poems, Cummings began to worry over his finances. Finally, with help from his mother and the printer Samuel Jacobs, he privately published No Thanks, a new book of poems; meanwhile, his Collected Works (1938) attracted surprisingly positive reviews, as did another book (50 Poems). In 1944 he produced I × I, which won him the Shelley Memorial Award. Also in 1944 he released his play Santa Claus and exhibited new paintings at the American-British Art Center. Whatever joy he may have felt at this new fame, however, was curbed by the hospitalization of Marion, whom doctors diagnosed with rheumatoid arthritis, and the death of his mother only three years later. Perhaps because of these tragedies and his own often debilitating back pains, he began retiring from society. He and Marion divided their time between Patchin Place and Joy Farm, he painting and writing, she immersed in photography. It was during this time that Cummings reacquainted himself with his daughter, Nancy, disclosing at last the true story of her parentage. Although she was incredulous at first, they soon bonded.

Meanwhile, Cummings found himself increasingly distracted by financial concerns. In 1948 he accepted a commission to translate part of a modern opera, but the next year he was forced to ask a friend and a relative for monetary help. He also applied for another Guggenheim Fellowship but was rejected. Yet all was not discouraging. In 1949 the American-British Art Center exhibited his work again, and in 1950 he not only won both the Harriet Monroe Prize and the $5,000 Fellowship of the Academy of American Poets, but he also published another book of poetry, Xaipe (which was, however, badly received). Nevertheless, Cummings was invited the following year to assume Harvard's annual Charles Eliot Norton Professorship, an invitation that baffled the poet, who had often mocked Cambridge traditionalism. Even so, he accepted the position and in 1952 began his famous "nonlectures," which drew crowds of enthusiastic fans. Soon many colleges began vying for a Cummings "reading." In fact, he quickly went from being a literary oddity to being a household celebrity. In 1954 his Poems 1923-1954 was nominated for the National Book Award; in 1953 his i:six nonlectures saw publication; in 1953 his satire "THANKSGIVING" was performed; and in 1965 his last completed volume of poetry, 95 Poems, appeared. No longer financially desperate, he spent his last years claiming one distinction after another, including two more poetry prizes in 1958 and a $15,000 Ford Foundation grant in 1959. Meanwhile, his work continued to be reissued, set to music, and widely translated. By the time he died of a brain hemorrhage in 1962, he had gained international fame.

"Buffalo Bill's" (1920, 1923)

This poem is at once a tribute to and a mild disparagement of the famous American icon Buffalo Bill (William F. Cody), whose circus show "Buffalo Bill's Wild West," complete with cowboys, Indians, and sharp shooting, extended its commercialized, theatrical version of the western frontier to urban areas across the United States and Europe. Written two years after Cody's death, the poem provides a brief reminiscence of Buffalo Bill and his familiar silver stallion.

Although it may appear rather simple at first, this unconventional modern elegy conveys a multitude of conflicting messages. For example, the first two lines proclaim Buffalo Bill as "defunct" (l. 2). Rather than use a more dignified, respectful term, such as departed, deceased, or even dead, Cummings uses a word that carries a distinctly negative connotation; defunct implies the demise of someone or something that is out-of-date, outmoded, or obsolete. By immediately proclaiming the entertainer "defunct," Cummings not only undermines the robust, resilient pioneering American spirit that Buffalo Bill had symbolized but also plants in the reader's mind a hint of skepticism, which taints the poem's subsequent expressions of admiration and foreshadows its concluding reference to mortality.

Yet even as Cummings subtly mocks the artificial heroism and commercialized showmanship of Buffalo Bill, he also manages to evoke a thrilling sense of nostalgia for American optimism and bravado. In fact, the opening lines may be read as an exclamation not of disdain but of regret. Perhaps the speaker genuinely admires and mourns the fallen hero. Such a reading would emphasize how the speaker swears in order to express the vehemence of his admiration ("Jesus / he was a handsome man" [ll. 7-8]) and the way he rams his words together ("onetwothreefourfive pigeonsjustlikethat" [l. 6]) to mimic the rapid, effortless shots of Buffalo Bill's astonishing marksmanship. Furthermore, the last three lines of the poem could imply that Buffalo Bill took death itself by storm, just as he thundered brashly through life: "and what I want to know is / how do you like your blueeyed boy / Mister Death" (ll. 9-11).

Nonetheless, a note of sarcasm lingers; the possessive pronoun in the poet's question ("how do you like your blueeyed boy") not only signifies Death's inexorable dominance but also draws attention to the body's inevitable demise. In addition, by ending with the word death, the poet reinforces the hollowness of fame and the fake heroism of the "handsome man" (l. 8) on his "watersmooth-silver stallion" (ll. 4-5). Perhaps the poet's cynicism stems from the suspicion that his own dashing good looks and poetic prowess may in turn survive only as a “defunct” legend. Even in his seeming repudiation of fame, then, the speaker may paradoxically reveal his own desire to be remembered. Another irony lies in the fact that the poem itself, presumably written to further the poet's career, serves only to immortalize the very spectacle that the poet labels “defunct.”

In structure, the poem typifies Cummings's vigorous defiance of conventional grammar. His blunt words, unhampered by punctuation, leap and halt and careen again across the page, creating a path very much like that of a cowboy's plunging stallion. Yet underneath its tone of audacity and bravado, the poem manages to retain a subtle sense of loss and of disillusionment.

1. Compare and contrast this work with EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON's “Richard Cory.” In particular, discuss the ways the two works deal with such issues as public reputation and sudden death. How do the deaths of Cory and Buffalo Bill differ? How is irony used in both works?
2. Read Cummings's poem in conjunction with the lyric titled “Death,” by William Carlos Williams. Discuss the tone, imagery, structure, and relative clarity of the two works. Which one do you find more effective or appealing? Explain why.
3. Discuss the relationship between the first and second lines of the poem. Discuss the relationship between the first line and the last. How and why is it ironic that Death is personified? Given Bill's final fate, why is it especially ironic that he is described as a boy?

“in Just-” (1920, 1923)

In this short, simple poem, Cummings captures the bright, carefree atmosphere of a spring day immediately after it has rained. The speaker describes not only children playing at hopscotch, marbles, and jump rope but also a crippled balloon man whistling as he hawks his wares.

Erratically spaced and punctuated, Cummings's poem is as playful visually as it is in content. The words appear strewn randomly across the page, much like scattered marbles or hopscotch pebbles. However, a closer look reveals that there is a deliberate design to what may at first seem arbitrary. The irregularities in spacing, for example, help evoke the impulsive, whimsical wonders of childhood. The shortness of the lines and the sizable spaces between words force readers to experience each word or word group in a new way, with an almost childlike wonder. Such spacing also allows the reader to sense the spontaneity of childish activity and the breathlessness that accompanies physical exertion. At times the added spacing causes fluctuations of voice or elongated pronunciation. The phrase “far and wee” (ll. 5, 13, 22–24), for example, appears in a variety of different configurations—all of which leave the lively little expression “wee” either dangling at the end of a line or standing alone, thus enticing the reader's voice to mimic the gleeful shriek of a child in motion. Extra spacing between words also mirrors the wide spaces of the outdoors and so leaves room for the imagination to seize upon the endless potential of a spring day. In fact, the very profusion of meanings one can apply to such odd spacing emphasizes again the exciting possibilities of spring and childhood.

However, the poem exhibits many other significant oddities. For instance, the lack of spacing in the names “eddieandbill” and “bettvandisbel” suggests the inseparability of these children as well as the enthusiastic loyalty of childhood friendships. The lack of punctuation creates a sense of irrepressible, unruly energy, while the variously recurring lines (“when the world is mud-luscious” . . . “when the world is puddle-wonderful” [ll. 2–3, 10]; “the little / lame balloonman / whistles far and wee” . . . “the queer / old balloonman whistles / far and wee” . . . “the / goat-footed / balloonman whistles / far and wee” [ll. 3–5, 11–13, 19–24]) provide a sense of the repetitive chants and motions of children's games. Cummings's unique expressions also add to the fun—words like “mud- / luscious” and “puddle-wonderful” suggest uninhibited creativity and naive sensual pleasure. Although relatively simple, the speaker's choice of vocabulary yet manages to convey the bustling charm of a park or a circus; the imagination is engaged not just by the sound of whistling and the sensation of sloshing mud but also by the sight of a "goat-footed" (l. 20) man, floating balloons, and children dancing and playing. In a larger sense, this fun-filled scenario holds a message: The world is full of simple pleasures like mud puddles and springtime; all that is necessary to enjoy them is a childlike wonder.

Thus, although the poem may at first seem "just" a run-on sentence arranged eclectically on the page, a slower, more thoughtful reading exposes many intriguing layers of meaning. Indeed, this evocative simplicity is typical of much of Cummings's work, as are the inventive word formations and the celebration of nature.

1. Compare and contrast this lyric with William Carlos Williams's poem titled "Spring and All." How do the poems differ and/or resemble each other in the presentations of spring? Discuss such matters as tone, structure, techniques, and length.
2. Read Cummings's poem alongside a brief portion of Tender Buttons, by GERTRUDE STEIN. How are the works similar and/or distinct in their techniques, their relationships to traditional literature, and their intended and actual effects?
3. How does Cummings use hyphens in this poem to contribute to the effectiveness of its rhythms? Why does he fail to use any punctuation? Discuss the irony of "puddle-wonderful." How does that phrase imply the ability to appreciate what is often disparaged? How is the springtime setting relevant to the ages of the various persons mentioned?

The Enormous Room (1922)

The Enormous Room, Cummings's first autobiographical prose piece, recounts his unwarranted arrest and imprisonment by the French military during World War I. Cummings and his friend B., disillusioned volunteers in the Norton-Harjes Ambulance Service (an American unit sent out to aid French soldiers), began writing letters full of antiwar sentiments, letters that eventually attracted the suspicions of the French police, who immediately arrested the two young Americans, questioned them separately, and finally imprisoned them together in a detention center called La Ferté-Macé. Before his eventual release and return to New York over four months later, Cummings endured many hardships, but he also met many intriguing characters whom he would remember affectionately for the rest of his life, and he additionally acquired a deep appreciation of human nature in its most primitive state.

Loosely structured after Paul Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, The Enormous Room uses a traditionally Christian allegorical framework to convey a peculiarly modern message. For example, the Section Sanitaire has been compared to Bunyan's Slough of Despond, C's cell in Noyon to the House of the Interpreter, La Ferté-Macé to Doubting Castle, Paris to Vanity Fair, the Directeur of the Dépôt to Apollyon, C's depression after Brown's departure to Christian's capture by Giant Despair, and C's confrontation with the wooden crucifix to Christian's encounter with the cross. Other (more obvious) references to Bunyan's work lie in Cummings's creative use of names: He calls his four favorite inmates the "Delectable Mountains" and labels many of his other characters with equally memorable epithets, such as "the Wanderer," "the Clever Man," "the Zulu," "the Bear," "the Schoolmaster"—all of which bear a striking resemblance to some of Bunyan's figurative names, such as "Mr. Feeblemind," Mr. Great-Heart, "the Ill-Favored Ones," "the Shining Ones," and "Mr. Fearing." Furthermore, Cummings's captivity could be viewed as a type of pilgrimage, his spiritual and artistic awakening a pilgrim's progress, and his destination of freedom (New York) the Celestial City. However, Cummings does more than simply echo specific locations and names in Bunyan's tale; he also imitates some of the most well-known paradoxes of Christianity. For example, physical captivity becomes the means to mental freedom, the condemned prove to be innocent, the simple become sources of wisdom just as in Christianity, earthly trials yield spiritual rewards, Innocence dies for the sin of the world, and from “the mouths of babes and sucklings” issue forth “strength” (Psalm 8:2) and “perfected praise” (Matthew 21:16).

Many critics see The Enormous Room as typical of much of Cummings's later work both in its revival of romanticism and in its choice of themes. As did the romantics, Cummings emphasizes sensory detail over clear exposition, leaving readers to make their own assumptions about the significance of his images; in fact, many of his descriptions reveal startling combinations of the visual, auditory, and tactile, as in such phrases as a “clammy, stupid distance” (58), a “slender” movement (227), “musical fingers” (67–68), a “sonal darkness” (93), a “putrescent placidity” (147), “solid . . . wisps of profanity heavily flicker[ed]” (93), a “roar bulge[s]” (94), “bells ding in the oldness of eyes” (119), “green murmurs in coldness” (174), and “candles wiggle a strenuous softness” (175). Another characteristic The Enormous Room shares with romantic literature lies in its unreal, dreamlike scenery: At one of the train stations “everything seemed ridiculously suppressed, beautifully abnormal, deliciously insane” (39); an approaching train makes the “ghastly miniature roar of an insane toy” (41); the town of Macé appears as a “city of Pretend, created by the hypnotism of moonlight” (55); a guard's “shout was not merely amazing; it was uncanny, and not a little thrilling” (90); the laughter of Cummings's fellow prisoners emerges as “unearthly smouldering” (157) from the “drooling greenish walls of La Ferté-Macé” (157); and the behavior of the prisoners themselves resembles “the ludicrous and hideous and beautiful antics of the insane” (308). Cummings also shares with the romantics an affinity for the individual, the unique, and the eccentric. His favorite inmates are the most peculiar and often the most disturbed. These include the uncommunicative Surplice, for example, with his “unobstreperous affinity for excrement” (257) or the simpleminded, massively built black man Jean Le Nègre, with his childish vanity and mercurial nature. Yet Cummings's voice carries little of the romantics' sentimentality; although he does at times rise to eulogistic exaltations of the men he dubs “the Delectable Mountains,” many of his observations remain in the witty, slightly ironic voice of a young Harvard graduate. However, other features of The Enormous Room that critics consider typical of Cummings's work include crude references to sex and excrement; startling combinations of cultured and colloquial language; scathing satires of government, leadership, and cultural norms; as well as an appreciation and celebration of the humble, the outcast, and the poor.

When published several years after Cummings's return to the United States, The Enormous Room provoked scathing reviews. Many of Cummings's critics complained that he made light of sacred religious symbols, such as the cross, and that he diminished the violent atrocities of the war; others dismissed his linguistic manipulations as annoying rather than innovative and rejected his use of vulgarity as gratuitous rather than daringly truthful. Nevertheless, Cummings himself was unmoved by the censorious reception of his first published volume; he had intentionally sought to challenge the traditional definition of the novel and of prose in general—a goal that he achieved not just by distorting syntax but also by veiling the chronological structure of his story line beneath successions of startling imagery. In addition to challenging the conventionality of previous literary structures, however, The Enormous Room challenges the conventionality of academic thought by implying that higher education and cultural preconceptions inhibit one's appreciation of the world and its myriad types of beauty. Cummings portrays civilization as corrupt, governments as unjust, and religion as hollow. Yet despite this underlying message of defiance, Cummings's allegory is both humorous and perceptive. When the enormous room of his physical imprisonment was confined to the enormous room of his mind, it became accessible to all.

“the Cambridge ladies who live in furnished souls” (1923)

In 14 abrupt lines, this poem mockingly exposes the artificiality of the “Cambridge ladies” and the smug conventionality of the academic world in which they live. Although written to resemble the traditional, highly structured form of the sonnet, the poem is anything but predictable. In fact, its number of lines seems the only distinctive feature linking it to the sonnet; the other two signature features of the sonnet, its rhyme scheme and the ending couplet found in Shakespearean sonnets, are conspicuously missing.

Cummings’s reference to the women as “Cambridge ladies” introduces the first suggestion of irony: Cambridge, Massachusetts, the home of Harvard University, and presumably a place of original thought or at least intellectual honesty, is here being used to represent stuffy “comfortable minds” (l. 2). Thus, Cummings not only mocks Cambridge but also points out the pretentiousness of those who place more value on prestigious titles than on genuine merit. The fact that these women call themselves “ladies” is in itself ironic since they meet to “coily bandy” (l. 9) gossip in a very unladylike manner. Furthermore, by referring to them collectively as “the Cambridge ladies,” Cummings implies that individual names would be unnecessary; these women have so melded themselves into their surrounding culture that one description fits them all. Another irony lies in the fact that these Christian women, candidates for the “church’s protestant blessings,” appear to have no real concern for their charity work; they are not even sure whom they are knitting for—“is it Poles? / perhaps” (ll. 8–9). They claim to love Longfellow’s poetry but are indifferent to the beauties of nature around them, such as the “moon” (l. 14), in its “sky lavender” (l. 13). Worst of all, they are blinded to reality by their overwhelming desire to see what they imagine they are supposed to see; “invariably interested in so many things” (l. 6), they are naturally drawn to none. Trends have dictated their pursuits, not personal curiosity. Thus, Cummings uses the word furnished (l. 1) to illustrate the state of their “souls” (l. 1). Just as a furnished room offers the comfort of prefabricated items predictably arranged, so these women’s minds offer nothing but comfortable, unoriginal, and conventionally organized ideas. Such “furnished souls” are “unbeautiful” (l. 2) to Cummings; they possess no individuality, no character; in fact, they are even too bland for the word ugly.

Cummings’s defiant rejection of the rules of punctuation and syntax provides a stark contrast to the ultraconservative, imitative women he is describing. It is as though by omitting capital letters and commas and periods and by rearranging normal grammatical structures, he is attempting to force his readers out of their preconceived ideas of language, thus allowing them to think in a truly original way. His poem ends abruptly with an extremely fanciful image of the “moon rattl[ing] like a fragment of angry candy”—an image noticeably at odds with the “unscented shapeless” (l. 4) Cambridge ladies (or their daughters). Candy also conjures up visions of children with sweet, sticky hands and mouths—children who, unlike conditioned adults, tend to embrace what they love instinctively and without preconceived motive. The poem's incongruous ending not only reinforces the artificiality of the Cambridge ladies but ultimately leaves the reader with a reckless sense of abandon and freedom of expression.

1. Compare and contrast this work with EZRA POUND's “Portrait d'une Femme.” Which work is more clearly satirical? How do the social situations implied in both poems resemble one another? Discuss the lengths and structures of the two works.
2. Read Cummings's poem alongside the poem by WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS titled “Portrait of a Lady.” How do the works differ in tone, technique, and clarity? If you had to recommend one of these poems to a friend, which one would you recommend, and why?
3. Why are these women described as ladies rather than as women? What are some differences in the connotations of those two words? What is implied by the adjective comfortable in describing the ladies' minds? How does Cummings's own poetry seek to create discomfort? In what senses is Christ “dead” for these women? How does the interest of these ladies “in so many things” imply their superficiality?

“next to of course god america i” (1926)

Since most of this poem is in quotation marks and since the quoted section consists mainly of muddled patriotic songs and catchphrases, it seems likely that the speaker is meant to be a politician or a military leader. However, in typical Cummings fashion, the poet satirizes the speaker's opinions; thus, while these snatches of song taken individually could demonstrate a genuine endorsement of patriotism, instead, amassed and jumbled as they are, they convey the insincerity of empty political slogans. One might assume, therefore, that Cummings is mocking not just the extremism of the patriot but the ignorance and credulity of the patriot's audience as well.

In form, the poem resembles a sonnet; it has 14 lines and an easily distinguishable rhyme scheme. However, while a traditional English sonnet usually bears a rhyme scheme of abab cdcd efef gg, this sonnet separates the lines of the anticipated couplet to form a rhyme scheme of abab cdcd efge g in much the same way that Cummings separates and rearranges his syntax (such as “drink rapidly a glass of water” [l. 14])—inversions that mimic the poem's satiric reversal of conventional ideas. Furthermore, Cummings's lack of punctuation also adds to the sarcasm of his message; the speaker appears to be talking “off the cuff,” jumbling together fleeting snippets of whatever stimulating wartime rhetoric he can remember, thus undermining his message and implicitly insulting his audience. Many of his phrases seem deliberately ambiguous, as when he proclaims, “i / love you land of the pilgrims' and so forth” (ll. 1–2). The phrase “and so forth,” suspended as it is at the end of the line, causes the reader's voice to drop slightly and diminish, thus emphasizing its vagueness. Is the speaker simply alluding to the rest of the song, or is he perhaps attempting to be politically correct, since “the Pilgrims” and their descendants have never constituted more than a fraction of the American population? Regardless of the speaker's intentions, however, the phrase serves subtly to dismiss both the song and the ensuing rhetoric as well. Throughout the poem, in fact, Cummings satirizes the speaker's imitative rhetoric; in the very first line, for example, the speaker shrewdly arranges his loyalties in the most widely accepted order, “god, america, i” (l. 1), presumably to impress the largest number of people by his morality, traditionalism, and altruism. He also tries to remain sensitive to multiculturalism, pointing out that young American men “acclaim” (l. 7) their country “in every language even deaf-anddumb” (l. 6); ironically, however, his attempt backfires when he coarsely refers to sign language as “deafanddumb.” He appears to be passionate by uttering a hearty string of exclamations—“by gorry / by jingo by gee by gosh by gum” (ll. 7–8)—yet his passion is carefully expressed in euphemisms, typical of the habitual politeness politicians seek to cultivate.

The speaker’s inconsistency presents another troubling feature of political rhetoric. For instance, the initial appeal for a calm acceptance of fate—“centuries come and go / and are no more what of it” (ll. 4–5)—is immediately followed by the phrase “we should worry” (l. 5). While in one breath soldiers are described as courageous—“the heroic happy dead / who rushed like lions to the roaring slaughter” (ll. 10–11)—in the next breath the same soldiers are described as fools: “they did not stop to think they died instead” (l. 12). The speaker’s last words, “then shall the voice of liberty be mute?” (l. 13), present the final contradiction: Although meant as a rousing call to arms, the question only draws attention to the fact that the dead soldiers are now mute forever and implies that the newly enlisted soldiers, full of patriotic zeal, are likely to suffer the same fate. The only “voice of liberty” left is the politician’s, but his words also lead to death.

1. Carl Sandburg’s poem titled “Grass” also deals with death in war. Discuss the two works in terms of tone, imagery, point of view, structure, and ultimate impact.
2. Read Cummings’s poem, and then read the poem titled “Shine, Perishing Republic,” by Robinson Jeffers. What underlying ideas or themes do the two poems share? How do they differ in tone, techniques, and point of view?
3. Discuss the contrasting tones that appear in this poem—as, for instance, in the contrast between most of line 8 and all of line 9. How do these contrasting tones prevent us from taking the speaker entirely seriously? Discuss the significance of the final action described. What does the rapid drinking of the water imply about the speaker’s attitude?

“i sing of Olaf glad and big” (1931)

Loosely inspired by a fellow soldier Cummings met at Camp Devens, Massachusetts, who was drafted into the air force and then punished for refusing to pick up a gun, the poem both criticizes the mindless violence of the military and honors the brave pacifism of men like Olaf (not his real name). In seven stanzas of varying length, the poet describes how officers and soldiers brutally tortured, beat, and sodomized the young pacifist, whose only response was to “ceaselessly repeat / ‘there is some shit I will not eat’” (ll. 32–33).

Cummings’s unorthodox use of syntax and punctuation provides an interesting parallel to his underlying message of nonconformity while also emphasizing many of the poem’s intriguing allusions. The limited amount of capitalization, for example, serves to build a visual connection between Christ and Olaf since throughout the course of the poem the only capitalized words refer to Christ, God, Olaf, and the personal pronoun I referring to Olaf. This visual connection reinforces a more abstract connection: Olaf as a symbol of Christ (or the Christian God). In fact, by singling out these two names, the poet may be suggesting that the images of Christ and Olaf are equal in significance. Indeed, the two possess some remarkable similarities: Both advocate love over violence, individual conscience over communal thinking, and pacifist suffering over forceful retaliation.

Cummings’s nonconformity also reveals itself in his choice of vocabulary, as when he blends formal sentence patterns with obscenities and colloquialisms. He casts the officers’ brutalities in formal, almost polite, phrasing: “the officers “stroke / with brushes recently employed / anent this muddy toiletbowl, / while kindred intellects evoke / allegiance per blunt instruments” (ll. 10–14). Olaf’s dialogue, however, he fills with obscenities, such as “fucking” (l. 19) and “shit” (l. 33). By choosing polite language to portray horrific acts of violence and harsh obscenities to express calm, thoughtful resolve (l. 2.), Cummings forces the reader to notice the poem’s subtler ironies: The West Point-educated officers, the “nation’s blueeyed pride” (l. 23), reveal a despicable absence of morals, while

Olaf, the rebel, the “conscientious object-or” (l. 3), reveals true idealism and the “warmest heart” (l. 2). Cummings’s odd use of punctuation also forces the reader to notice the poet’s word choices. For example, by simply adding a hyphen (“object-or” [l. 3]), he draws the reader’s attention to the word object, perhaps to imply that the officers see Olaf only as a convenient target, not as a serious threat. Ironically, such an observation only makes their violent treatment of him all the more despicable. Cummings’s lack of spacing also draws attention to his verbal irony. The name “firstclassprivates” (l. 27), for example, unspaced as it is, accentuates the disparity between these mindless thugs and the label first class that is attributed to them.

The poem’s striking rhyme scheme emphasizes yet another of Cummings’s unconventional techniques—his manipulation of word order. Lines such as “officers / their passive prey did kick and curse” (ll. 22–24), “noncoms . . . do through icy waters roll” (ll. 8, 9), and “Christ . . . / i pray to see” (ll. 38–39) seem particularly contrived to accentuate the poem’s end rhymes. This doggerel style, usually encountered in children’s books, seems startlingly out of place in a poem detailing a scene of brutal torture. Yet this disjunction between style and content proves effective, for it reiterates once more the startling discrepancy between the soldiers’ flippant attitudes and the redundant torture they inflict on Olaf.

1. Read Cummings’s work in conjunction with the poem titled “The Lynching” by Claude McKay. How do both poems use religious imagery for ironic purposes? What do both poems suggest about the mentality of groups and about the dark side of human nature? In which poem is victimization more strongly stressed?
2. Read LANGSTON HUGHES’s lyric titled “Democracy.” How is it comparable to and/or distinct from Cummings’s text as a protest poem? Discuss the works in terms of length, tone, imagery, and point of view.
3. How does the opening line allude to the openings of various famous epic poems? How is the allusion to epic poems ironic? In what other senses is the subject matter of this poem “epic” in its significance? How does the poem encourage us to admire Olaf’s vulgarity? What does his use of such language imply about his character? Discuss the significance of the very final line of the poem, especially its final word. In what ways do that line and that word implicate others in a narrative that had heretofore seemed externally focused?

“somewhere i have never traveled, gladly beyond” (1931)

Through a clever manipulation of the traditional images of love poetry, such as an emphasis on springtime and roses, the poet expresses the profound mysteriousness and irrepressibility of his love. Although neatly divided into four-line stanzas and evenly aligned on the left margin, the poem nevertheless typifies many of Cummings’s typographical idiosyncrasies in its lack of capitalization, its irregular punctuation, and its unconventional manipulation of sentence structure.

The very first line suggests that the poet is about to describe something “beyond” anything he has ever experienced before and thus “beyond” the familiar words and expressions of his language. In this sense, both his experience of love as well as his experience expressing that love lead him to places altogether foreign. It seems fitting, then, that the poet’s next words praise his lover’s speechless eloquence: “your eyes have their silence” (l. 2). The poet’s sense of the ineffable soon mingles with an even more overwhelming sense of the incomprehensible, as when he sees in his lover’s “most frail gesture” (l. 3) “things . . . which [he] cannot touch because they are too near” (ll. 3–4). This idea of the unknowable, impenetrable nature of love recurs sporadically throughout the poem; in stanza 2, for example, the speaker compares his beloved’s influence on his emotions to spring’s mysterious influence on flowering plants; in stanza 4 he realizes that “nothing which we are to perceive in this world equals / the power of [his lover’s] intense fragility” (ll. 13–14); and in stanza 5, he confesses, “i do not know what it is about you that closes / and opens” (ll. 17–18).

The poet’s use of synesthesia (in which stimulation of one sense produces a response appropriate to another sense, as in “hearing” a color) gives an emotional intensity to his confessions while redefining the immeasurability of his love. For example, something as abstract as his lover’s “fragility” becomes not just a tangible and visible thing but a thing so vast as to encompass entire realms: Its “texture / compels me with the colour of its countries, / rendering death and forever with each breathing” (ll. 14–16). A few lines down, the speaker describes the “voice” (l. 19) of his lover’s “eyes” (l. 19) as “deeper than all roses” (l. 19), again translating one sensory image into another in order to convey the singularity and immeasurable depth of what he is experiencing. Such examples of synesthesia also imply that the poet sees more in his beloved than anyone else could; he imagines an eternity of pleasure in the colors and textures of a body that before now has only been praised for its fragility and hears an audible beauty in eyes that have before now only held visual appeal.

The poet also uses metaphors, juxtaposition, and personification to describe his love. In the second stanza, for example, he describes himself as a flower that the “slightest look” (l. 5) of his beloved opens “petal by petal . . . as Spring opens / . . . her first rose” (ll. 7–8). Such imagery implies that his love not only is ungovernable, just as the return of spring is ungovernable, but that it is also instinctive and desirable, just as the blossoming of a flower garden is a natural and anticipated event. The poet’s use of juxtaposition also recalls the recurring seasons of the natural world. For example, his linking of the words “power” and “fragility” (l. 15), “death” and “forever” (l. 16), “closes” and “opens” (ll. 16–17) suggests the earth’s endless, inexorable cycles of birth, growth, decay, and death. Even the poet’s use of personification involves nature. For instance, the central stanza describes how the speaker’s life would “shut very beautifully, suddenly” (l. 10) at the prospect of rejection “as when the heart of [a] flower imagines / the snow carefully everywhere descending” (ll. 11–12), and in the final line of the poem he exclaims that “nobody, not even the rain, has such small hands” (l. 20). By thus associating his love with the beauty of nature, the poet is able to portray both the elusiveness as well as the timelessness of his love.

1. Compare and contrast the way the relationship between a man and a woman is depicted in this poem and in Genevieve Taggard’s poem titled “Everyday Alchemy.” How do the poems differ in tone, imagery, point of view, and basic assumptions?
2. Read Cummings’s poem alongside a poem by EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY whose first line is “I, being born a woman.” Which of the two poems is the more “romantic”? What role do intense emotions play in the two works? How do the structure, syntax, diction, and length of the poems contribute to their divergent meanings and effects?
3. Discuss this poem’s use of paradox. Where, why, and how does Cummings use that technique? How does the poem’s use of repeated words and sounds help contribute to its lyricism? How does such repetition make the poem more like a song? Which words are repeated most often in the poem? How and why is the repetition of those words significant?

“anyone lived in a pretty how town” (1940)

The poem tells the story of a man named anyone who lives and dies alone in a nameless town. The other residents of the town go about their business, marrying and dreaming, and only the children of the town “guess” (l. 9) that a woman named “noone” secretly loves anyone. When “anyone” and “noone” eventually die, the “busy” townspeople “bur[y] them side by side” (l. 27), and life continues on as though nothing had happened.

Although this poem displays Cummings’s typical inventiveness in sentence structure and syntax, it is uncharacteristic of Cummings in the conventionality of its layout. For example, not only are the lines evenly divided four to a stanza, but they are also uniformly aligned on the left margin. This balladlike format, combined with the rhythmic pattern of stresses in each line, presents a striking resemblance to the lively beats often found in nursery rhymes. Furthermore, Cummings's playful variants on common English word arrangements, such as "little by little and was by was / all by all and deep by deep" (ll. 28–29) add a fun, childish quality to the piece. Nevertheless, despite the cheerfulness of its beat and the simplicity of its vocabulary, the poem also conveys dark emotions such as futility and loneliness. In fact, the various contrasts that appear throughout the poem reflect Cummings's deep interest in the cyclical nature of the earth and the human experience. Contrasting seasons ("spring summer autumn winter" [l. 3] and "summer autumn winter spring" [34]) are complemented by contrasting weather conditions ("sun moon stars rain" [ll. 8, 36]). Contrasting phrases, which balance many of the lines ("he sang his didn't he danced his did" [l. 4], "Women and men [both little and small]" [l. 5], "and down they forgot as up they grew" [l.10], and "she laughed his joy she cried his grief" [l. 14]), are complemented by larger oppositions within the story line (life and death, love and indifference, lightheartedness and sadness). In fact, Cummings's choice of names alone creates diametrically opposed ambiguities: The phrase "noone loved him more by more" (l. 12) could be taken figuratively (an insignificant female labeled noone loved an ordinary, average man named anyone), or it could be taken literally (the town was loveless and no one loved anyone). The same double meaning could be read into the phrase "noone stooped to kiss his face" (l. 26). Even the title, "anyone lived in a pretty how town," suggests a multiplicity of meaning; some may translate the phrase to mean "how anyone lived in a pretty town" or "anyone lived in how pretty a town"—both of which introduce a sense of sarcasm since the town's prettiness apparently failed to give anyone happiness or satisfaction. Others may prefer to preserve the word order and read pretty as an adverb (as in "a pretty good dog") and how as an adjective; thus, a "how town" could be a town whose inhabitants are obsessed with the hows of living rather than simply enjoying life.

Ultimately, the poem's many contrasts serve as a reminder of life's small tragedies. How is it that a human being, a someone, can feel like a "noone"? How can "anyone" remain satisfied, or even survive at all, without companionship and understanding? Yet such lonely existences are not uncommon. By giving new roles to the most ordinary, everyday terms, Cummings allows his readers a fresh glimpse into the age-old joys and sorrows of being human.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the themes of loneliness and isolation as they appear in this poem and in T. S. Eliot's poem "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock." Discuss the relations between men and women in both poems and the ways both poems present the relations between the individual and the community.
2. Discuss the use of seasonal imagery in this poem and in WALLACE STEVENS's "Sunday Morning." How does such imagery contribute to the tones of the poems? How do the tones of the poems differ? Which poem is more celebratory and affirmative? Why and how?
3. Discuss the use of balanced words and balanced phrases in this poem. How does the repeated use of balance contribute to the tones of the poem and to its rhythms? Choose some lines or phrases that may seem particularly puzzling (for example, lines 4 and 7) and explain their presence in the poem. How do such lines contribute (if at all) to the effects or effectiveness of the work?

"my father moved through dooms of love" (1940)

Written in commemoration of Cummings's father, a Unitarian minister and Harvard professor, the poem is generally treated as an elegy. However, while traditional elegies typically convey a mournful or pensive tone, Cummings's elegy conveys a sense of energy and hope. In 17 four-line stanzas, it describes the various stages of Cummings's father's love; hints at the beauty, strength, and inspiration that such love imparts; and ends with a hopeful affirmation that love, at least the kind of love that Cummings's father shared, has the power to heal the world.

Unlike many of Cummings's other works, which rely primarily on typographical irregularities for structure, this poem achieves structure through the repetition of words, punctuation, and capital letters. For example, the phrase "my father moved" (ll. 1, 18, 34, 49) appears four times, neatly dividing the poem into four sections. The first, second, and third sections are all four stanzas long and conclude with a period. The fourth section, however, is five stanzas long and ends without a period. By leaving the beginning and end of the poem open ended (without capitalization or punctuation), the poet gives his readers a sense of perpetuity that implies both completion and endless incompleteness—a paradox fittingly reflective not just of death but of the cycles of nature as well. In fact, a seasonal pattern emerges from among the poem's long sentences, moving from spring ("his april touch" [l. 10]) to summer ("keen as midsummer's keen beyond" [l. 25]) to autumn ("septembering arms" [l. 37], "octobering flame" [ll. 41–42]) to winter ("he'd . . . build a world with snow" [l. 48]) and back again to spring ("spring / danced when she heard my father sing" [ll. 51–52]). This theme of circularity serves to emphasize the poem's underlying optimism by implying that death is merely the beginning of a new stage of life and that an act of love, as a single seed, carries the possibility of endless replication.

Cummings's deft balance of opposites provides another form of paradox. For example, many of his sentences are parallel not just in their structure ("his flesh was flesh his blood was blood" [l. 29], "his anger was as right as rain / his pity was as green as grain" [ll. 35–36]) but also in their oppositions ("dooms of love" [l. 1], "haves of give" [l. 2], "griefs of joy" [l. 18], "singing each morning out of each night" [l. 3], "no hungry man but wished him food" [l. 39], "to foe and friend" [l. 38], "to foolish and to wise" [l. 39]). Thus, the sense of equanimity provided by the parallelism is continually complicated and yet clarified by the paired opposites, just as the seeming perfection of Cummings's father becomes complicated and yet clarified by his obvious humanness. Furthermore, the ambiguity of Cummings's phrasing suggests that the beauty of his father's life is beyond words. For example, by beginning each new section of his poem with such ambiguous phrases as "my father moved through dooms of love" (l. 1), "my father moved through griefs of joy" (l. 18), "my father moved through dooms of feel" (l. 34), and "my father moved through theys of we" (l. 49), Cummings compels his readers to consider repeatedly the passion and complexity of his father's unselfish life. Such ambiguity also universalizes the poem, allowing a multiplicity of interpretations. One interpretation is that the love Cummings's father bore for his fellow man was strong enough to survive or "move through" the pain or "dooms" of this evil world and the "maggoty minus and dumb death / all we inherit" (ll. 63–64). Ultimately, the "doom" or fate of his love was to change the world for the better: "because my father lived his soul / love is the whole and more than all" (ll. 67–68).

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the relationship between parent and child as it is presented in this poem and in Langston Hughes's poem "Mother to Son." How do the poems differ in tone, point of view, structure, and imagery? What lessons does each parent provide for his or her child?
2. Compare and contrast Cummings's poem with two poems by John Crowe Ransom—"Bells for John Whiteside's Daughter" and "Here Lies a Lady." Discuss the poems in terms of structure, diction, tone, and point of view. What seems to be the main "purpose" of each poem?
3. Discuss some examples of places where Cummings achieves suggestiveness through phrasing that might at first seem confusing or unclear. For example, what are some suggestive connotations of “sames of am” and of “haves of give”? How would you paraphrase such terms? Discuss some of the ways in which Cummings’s phrasing suggests the complexities of his father’s character.

“pity this busy monster, manunkind” (1944)

The poem laments the unwarranted arrogance of humanity and its needless destruction of the earth through the “progress” of technology. It also predicts the overthrow of naturally born organic organisms by laboratory-born synthetic items and calls for the reader to pity the needless destruction of the “diseased” earth.

Although often categorized as one of Cummings’s “sonnets,” the poem possesses neither a rhyme scheme nor the expected length of 14 lines. In fact, only in its concise, controlled expression does it conform to the traits of a traditional sonnet. In all other respects, it typifies Cummings’s penchant for nonconformity. New sentences are often begun without capitalization, two words are often jammed together to form one, and semicolons and commas are often sandwiched between words with no dividing spaces. Although these eccentricities of mechanics seem at first arbitrary, other features of the poem, such as the 10-syllabic measure of its lines, suggest that Cummings deliberated over the placement of each letter and mark of punctuation. Ironically, Cummings’s typographical peculiarities serve as a reminder that he composed his poems on a typewriter, an invention created by the very technology he condemns in his poem.

The first sentence provides a terse summary of the entire poem. The speaker calls humanity a “monster,manunkind” (l. 1)—names that bring to mind both the chemical mutations and perversions of medical science as well as the “unkind,” indifferent processes of technology. By describing humanity as infected or diseased by “progress”

(l. 2), the speaker cleverly reinforces the image of a malformed or misshapen being. However, the symptoms of this illness are spiritual, not physical; they include an inflated sense of supremacy (“your victim . . . / plays with the bigness of his littleness” [ll. 3–4]), an utter indifference to the beauties of nature (“pity poor flesh / and trees, poor stars and stones” [ll.10–11]), and an exaggerated veneration of man-made objects (“electrons deify one razorblade / into a mountainrange” [ll. 5–6]). The image of a camera lens suggests not only the distortions in man’s vision, but also man’s inability to recognize the beauty of an unwarped reality: “lenses extend / unwish through curving wherewhen until unwish / returns on its unself” (ll. 6–8). Just as a camera lens inverts images, which are later reinverted by the developing process, so human beings continually invert or reverse the natural order of things, placing their greed for money and material objects above a love for nature and each other. However, whereas the frames in photography begin with the accurate layout, moving from normal to inverted to normal again, the spiritual framework of humanity began with an “unwish,” an abnormality, and thus will “return . . . on its unself” (l. 8). In this way, the metaphor itself becomes warped.

The concluding lines of the poem are set apart by a shift from third to first person, thus spotlighting the perpetrators of earth’s deformation. Ironically, the speaker chooses doctors, the supposed healers of humanity, to represent the monster manunkind, “this / fine specimen of hypermagical / ultraomnipotence” (ll. 9–11). Although the diagnosis seems grim (“We doctors know / a hopeless case if-” [ll. 11–12]), the lingering if suggests that there may yet be hope. Unfortunately, the doctors quickly change topic, preferring to start over on “a good universe next door” rather than to try to fix the one they have broken. The final irony, of course, is that there is no other universe to serve as our refuge when we have wasted the resources of this one. The poet becomes the lonely, unheeded prophet, vainly begging his people to amend their ways.

9. Humor is frequently an element in Cummings's works. Read a number of his poems and/or The Enormous Room and discuss the ways in which humor is used in his works. How does humor contribute to the tones, implications, and complexity of his writing? Discuss at least five specific instances.
10. Cummings wrote several plays in addition to his many poems. Track down at least one of his plays and compare and contrast it to some of his better-known work in the genre of poetry. Discuss his dramatic writing in terms of diction, imagery, structure, and technical devices. Discuss Cummings's prose with attention to the same matters. Are there any traits that Cummings seems to use consistently regardless of the particular kind of writing he is doing?

JOHN DOS PASSOS (1896–1970)

The mind of a generation is its speech. A writer makes aspects of that speech enduring by putting them into print. He whittles at the words and phrases of today and makes of them forms to set the mind of tomorrow's generation. That's history. A writer who writes straight is the architect of history.

(qtd. in Martin xxiii)

A writer in the lost generation tradition, John Dos Passos is known primarily for his novel trilogy, U.S.A., which he composed from 1930 to 1936 and published as one unit in 1938, and for his experimental style, such as his use in his fiction of stream of consciousness and newspaper headlines. In addition to being a major American novelist, Dos Passos was a playwright, a political essayist who wrote first in support of socialism but later against this movement as his ideology moved to the political Right, and a talented and prolific painter.

Born clandestinely in a Chicago hotel room on January 14, 1896, John Roderigo Madison, later renamed John Dos Passos, was raised by his Virginian mother, the elegant widow Lucy Addison Sprigg Madison. Sprigg Madison had been engaged in a romantic relationship with the renowned—and married—corporate attorney of Portuguese heritage John Randolph Dos Passos. Embarrassed to acknowledge his illegitimate newborn son as his own because of the social stigma of the era and unable to divorce his first wife because of her devout religious convictions, the elder Dos Passos often sent his young son and his mistress traveling overseas for the benefit of the young man's education, sending him to places such as France, Greece, London, and the Middle East. In 1910, upon the death of his first wife, Mary Dyckman Hays Dos Passos, the wealthy attorney finally married Lucy, and two years later he made young John (who was actually his real son) his stepson and gave him the cognomen Dos Passos. The boy, therefore, became known as John Dos Passos. Young John Dos Passos went to various elite schools, such as the Choate School in Wallingford, Connecticut, before attending Harvard University from 1912 to 1916. At Choate, young John was encouraged by his father to read and write; for instance, Virginia Spencer Carr notes that after the father caught a raccoon on his farm, he sent it to his young son as a pet. When the pet raccoon escaped for two days, young John Dos Passos recaptured it and took it back to his room at Choate; in a letter, the father told his son to rename the raccoon Ulysses and write a story about him (33). It is quite possible, however, that the capitalistic ideals of his father markedly affected the author's liberal politics and movement toward communism and away from the capitalistic system to which his father adhered. Dos Passos might have gone in a radically different direction because he was bitter that his father, an incessant champion of large corporate power and of capitalism, refused to acknowledge his son for 16 years and spent very little time with him and Lucy during those years.

After graduating from Harvard, Dos Passos went overseas so that he could aid the Allies (the Triple Entente) during World War I. He worked as an ambulance driver in Italy and France in the Norton-Harjes unit in 1917–18. This war experience as an ambulance driver, with the inherent horrors and bloodshed he witnessed, proved to be pivotal for the young man because it led to his disillusionment with war and his movement toward the left-wing political ideology that greatly influenced his writing for years. His friends E. E. CUMMINGS and ERNEST HEMINGWAY also worked for ambulance crews during the war. Like Cummings and Hemingway, Dos Passos was motivated by the horrors of war to write accounts of his war experiences, such as Three Soldiers (1921), and to describe the devastation he had witnessed. His war fiction probably had a profound influence upon Dalton Trumbo when he wrote his own noteworthy antiwar novel, Johnny Got His Gun (1939).

In 1927 Dos Passos wrote Facing the Chair: Sacco and Vanzetti, in which he defended the Italian anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti from the charges of having committed two murders and a robbery seven years earlier in Massachusetts. He wrote this work the same year that the two men were executed. Upton Sinclair also wrote a book about the men (Boston), and other writers and artists who protested their treatment included EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY (who wrote “Justice Denied in Massachusetts”), Ben Shahn, Maxwell Anderson, George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, Bertrand Russell, and Dorothy Parker. Dos Passos visited both alleged murderers in prison and firmly believed in their innocence; he was arrested outside the Massachusetts State House for protesting their death sentences. He was convinced that the two men had not received a fair trial and were thus wrongfully convicted because of circumstantial—and tainted—evidence. The judge, Webster Thayer, and perhaps several of the jurors were clearly prejudiced against Italian immigrants, particularly anarchists. Dos Passos’s concern with Sacco and Vanzetti manifested his interest in anarchism, his support of the poor and of immigrants, and his concern that the poor were unable to receive fair treatment in the legal system. His championing of the two poor Italian immigrants demonstrates his socialistic view that capitalism created two Americas—one for the rich and one for the poor. Dos Passos’s strong interest and personal involvement in the case tell us a great deal about him and his politics in the 1920s, which clearly permeate his fiction (such as The Big Money) and his political essays.

In 1924 Dos Passos met Ernest Hemingway in Paris. The two also met in Key West and other places; they shared similar political views, although their personalities were quite different. In 1925 Dos Passos published one of his finest novels, Manhattan Transfer, an examination of life in New York City. Dos Passos went to Russia in 1928 so that he could study communist ideals and also learn more about Russian theater so that he could employ what he learned about drama for the benefit of the New Playwrights Theatre, which was run by communists. Other important left-wing writers, such as THEODORE DREISER, had already traveled to Russia to learn more about communism. These left-wing American writers in Moscow were led by the New York Times writer Walter Duranty. According to Virginia Spencer Carr, Dos Passos felt ambivalent about communism: “His trouble in Russia was trying to decide whether he was for or against the Soviet Communist system, and even more important, what his own destiny was in relationship to it. . . . The Russian intelligentsia . . . saw him as the American Gorki, the most potentially influential revolutionary writer of the West, and were eager for him to commit his pen to Communist doctrine” (243). Although Dos Passos was very impressed with the Russian people, he remained ambivalent about Russian communism and eventually turned away from it politically.

In 1929 Dos Passos married his first wife, Katharine (Katy) Smith. On September 12, 1947, the couple was involved in a serious car accident while driving from Provincetown, Massachusetts, to Connecticut. Dos Passos had been temporarily blinded with the sun in his eyes and consequently had rammed his car (while his wife lay asleep beside him) into the back of a parked truck. Dos Passos suffered a severe eye injury in the accident and permanently lost his vision in his right eye. Even worse, Katy perished. Two years later, in 1949, he remarried, to Elizabeth Holdridge. One year later, his daughter, Lucy Hamlin Dos Passos, was born.

Dos Passos wrote a trilogy about the United States, U.S.A., which contains the following three novels: 42nd Parallel (1930), 1919 (1932), and The Big Money (1936). The novels are not necessarily separate entities, for strong connections exist between them and the plot and characters continue from one book to the next.

Dos Passos was greatly disturbed by the success of the Fascist movement in Spain in the 1930s. It is unsettling, however, that events in Nazi Germany during that time that adversely affected Jews did not claim as much of his attention. Because of his concern about Fascism in Spain, Dos Passos, along with his good friend Ernest Hemingway, cheered on the republicans (the anti-Franco forces) during the Spanish civil war. In fact, Dos Passos decided to make a documentary film about the republicans and their struggles against Franco; with Hemingway, Archibald MacLeish, and Lillian Hellman, he created the Contemporary Historians society. They hoped to show Americans how much the common Spanish people were suffering during the civil war and to drum up support from the U.S. government for the anti-Franco side. Hemingway, however, clashed with Dos Passos about the documentary because Hemingway was more concerned with showing the actual fighting between the two sides than with depicting the suffering of the Spanish people. Furthermore, Dos Passos wanted to show the atrocities committed by both factions, while Hemingway wanted Dos Passos to ignore the evils of the socialistic republicans. This split, which helped dissolve the friendship between the two men, manifested a significant difference between them: Dos Passos did not glorify war and fighting as Hemingway did.

Hemingway believed that Dos Passos's supposed wealth rendered him unsympathetic to the proletarian cause. Hemingway, however, was misguided, in that Dos Passos, despite having a wealthy father, was not rich at all; in fact, he struggled financially, particularly while he was helping to raise two children, Christopher and Jean Kaeselau, after their mother's sudden death (Carr 399). Other factors contributing to the breach between the two men were Hemingway's jealousy over Dos Passos's great success as an author and Hemingway's scornful and vigorous personality, which differed markedly from Dos Passos's gentle comportment. In addition, Dos Passos's changing politics—particularly his disillusionment with left-wing ideology—also led to his break from Hemingway. Dos Passos later expressed concern about violations of freedom of speech in the Soviet Union by Communists. The stifling of freedom of speech in Communist organizations and countries is another reason why Dos Passos became disillusioned with—and why he moved away from—left-wing politics. Communist ideologues castigated him for his work Adventures of a Young Man (1939), which manifests his movement to the political Right and his leaving behind of communist ideals.

Dos Passos won several significant writing awards. He earned a Gold Medal for fiction from the National Institute of Arts and Letters in 1957; he won the Alumni Seal Prize from Choate (previous winners had included John F. Kennedy, the Reverend Avery Dulles, Adlai Stevenson, and Edward Albee); and he was awarded the Feltrinelli Prize for Fiction in 1967. To celebrate the talent and the influence of Dos Passos, the Department of English and Modern Languages at Longwood College, in Farmville, Virginia, has awarded since 1980 the prestigious annual John Dos Passos Prize for Literature for excellence in creative writing. The selection committee looks particularly for works that include American themes and that incorporate an experimental style—two traits certainly present in the works of Dos Passos. Longwood College also publishes the Dos Passos Review in tribute to this significant 20th-century proletarian author.

Dos Passos is considered one of the greatest American novelists of the 20th century, an experimental novelist whose works offer a proverbial slice of life. His most popular and enduring writings are his works from the 1930s; although some critics might argue that the pronounced shift in his politics from a left-wing ideology to conservatism accounts for his declining popularity, one must also consider the possibility that his talent diminished after he penned his greatest texts. Dos Passos is nonetheless a major figure in 20th-century literature, but unfortunately, his influence on later writers has often been overlooked.

Dos Passos died of a heart attack in Baltimore, Maryland, on September 28, 1970, at the age of 74 and was buried in Westmoreland, Virginia.

Manhattan Transfer* (1925)

Manhattan Transfer is a novel about New York City and its effects on the lives of its inhabitants. The actress Ellen Thatcher attempts to rise socio-economically through her physical beauty and her marriages, yet she ends up unhappy because she fails to recognize that happiness does not derive from wealth. Whereas Bud Korpenning and other characters fail to thrive in this panoramic portrayal of New York City, Jimmy Herf realizes that the big city can crush its inhabitants, and thus he leaves for greener pastures.

The novel's heroine, Ellen Thatcher, aspires to be an actress and to be financially secure. A beautiful woman, Thatcher is pursued by many men. She first marries the bisexual actor John Oglethorpe, then Jimmy Herf, and finally George Baldwin, yet in her relationships with these men and the theater executive Harry Goldweiser she seems to desire money and prosperity rather than love. The only man she truly loves, the wealthy alcoholic Stan Emery, commits suicide. Dos Passos suggests that Thatcher's failed marriages and her quest for the trappings of wealth reflect at least indirectly the flaws of a capitalistic society.

Although this novel contains some intriguing characters, such as Ellen Thatcher, Jimmy Herf, George Baldwin, Bud Korpenning, and Stan Emery, the characters and plot seem less important than the location—New York City. It can be argued, however, that the characters represent New York City at the time; the characters and the city are intertwined. Dos Passos makes this clear at the onset of the novel when 25-year-old Bud Korpenning asks for directions to the action in the city, saying that he needs them because he “want[s] to get to the center of things” (4). To the author, New York City is “the center of things,” such as the theater and Wall Street. Yet, as Korpenning discovers, the big city can swallow up and destroy people; he eventually commits suicide.

Dos Passos's novel contains local color and regionalism, including vignettes that depict New York City as a melting pot. Dos Passos demonstrates, for the most part, an effective ear for dialogue. He captures New York City lingo and accents well, as when a short-order cook, who makes breakfast for Bud when he first arrives in the city, comments, “I’m goin to slip you a bit of advice, feller, and it won’t cost you nutten. You go an git a shave and a haircut and brush the hayseeds out o yer suit a bit before you start lookin. . . . I’m tellin yez, that’s all” (5). (However, the dialogue spoken by a German immigrant, who has just become a father and who goes for drinks with Ed Thatcher, seems noticeably artificial and unnatural.) Dos Passos is concerned with portraying people of different ethnicities and various social classes, from Herf's wealthy family to the unemployed and emotionally scarred Bud. One can consider Manhattan Transfer (the title derives from the name of a station that sends railcars to New York City) a tribute to a vibrant and enthralling city that overshadows the characters who live there. However, the city can be dangerous and can destroy those who are poor and weak. By depicting various interactions and situations involving the characters, Dos Passos presents a panoramic view of New York City from the onset of the 20th century until the mid-1920s. The vignettes are short and hold readers' attention, yet they make the novel appear episodic rather than fluid. Although the episodic nature of the vignettes might seem problematic, these scenes might have been written in that style to make a point about the characters' truncated relationships. Manhattan Transfer quickly switches back and forth among characters, demonstrating how erratically the characters interact with each other and thus reflecting the unstable values and social mores of the city. The novel is ambitious and experimental yet also realistic in its portrayal of the characters and New York City, even tackling issues that were controversial at the time, such as homosexuality and abortion.

The idealistic Jimmy Herf, who shuns a lucrative career in banking so that he can be a journalist, resembles Dos Passos himself to some extent. It is inevitable that this idealistic man's relationship with the mercenary Ellen Thatcher cannot last; Ellen, the successful, beautiful, and ambitious actress in a big city, is unmistakably modeled after Theodore Dreiser's Carrie Meeber in Sister Carrie (1900); Dos Passos was, it should be noted, a good friend of Dreiser. Thatcher's father, Ed, works very hard yet cannot make a good living, and Bud has trouble finding work; this problem with making sufficient money, along with the focus on labor unions, demonstrates the author's suggestion that capitalism in America destroys lives. The backdrop in New York of the stock market and the destruction of the stock broker Joe Harland add to the mystique of New York—a city that seems to destroy many people even though some thrive there.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the portrayals of Ellen Thatcher and Carrie Meeber (in Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie). What connections do you discern between the two women and the manners in which they are portrayed? What does Thatcher's failure to find true love suggest about her character, New York City, and the dangers of capitalism?
2. Discuss the portrayal of capitalism and business in Manhattan Transfer. Does the author suggest that there is hope for the working class under capitalism? How does money affect people's lives and the decisions they make in the novel?
3. Discuss who of Ellen's three husbands—Oglethorpe, Herf, or Baldwin—is the best suited to and deserving of her. What do these men have to offer her, and how compatible is she with them? Do the best qualities of the three men together make up a suitable husband? Which of the three does Ellen like best as a husband, and is there any hope for her marriage to Baldwin?
4. Compare and contrast the ways New York City is presented in Dos Passos's novel with the ways it is depicted in EDITH WHARTON'S The Age of Innocence. In particular, focus on issues of social class and status and the roles of women. In what ways is the New York of the 1870s (as presented by Wharton) similar to and/or different from the New York of the 1920s (presented by Dos Passos)?
5. Read Dos Passos's book alongside NELLA LARSEN's novel Passing, which is also set in New York during the 1920s and which also deals with issues of ethnicity and social status. Discuss the works in terms of their use of dialogue and diction and in terms of the aspirations of the central female characters.

42nd Parallel (1930)

In 42nd Parallel, John Dos Passos creates narratives of individuals who represent the wealthy and the working class. Mac is from a poor family and seems committed to socialistic causes, yet love distracts him, prompting him to abandon his well-meaning ideas. J. Ward Moorehouse marries a second wealthy woman after divorcing another one, thus acquiring the capital he needs to open his own public relations firm and become a prominent and influential man.

The title of the novel signifies that the 42nd parallel, which lies 42 degrees north of the equator, extends throughout much of the northern part of the United States, including Upstate New York, the Great Lakes region, and the city of Dos Passos's birth—Chicago. The 42nd parallel tends to be stormy, a fact that symbolizes the lives of many of the novel's characters. Furthermore, Chicago is where the protagonist, Fenian (Mac) McCreary, is raised; begins his printing career; and cultivates the radical Left political ideology that shapes his future. The title is also significant because the novel seeks to be representative of America—or at least of a cross section of the nation—from the beginning of the 20th century until World War I.

42nd Parallel follows the lives of four main characters: Mac, Janey Williams, J. Ward Moorehouse, and Eleanor Stoddard. Mac, a printer who accepts his uncle Tim's socialist beliefs, is a blue-collar worker who struggles in vain to get ahead and achieve the American dream, a sense of contentment that always seems so elusive and unattainable for the working class in 42nd Parallel and the subsequent two novels in this trilogy. As Tim remarks, poverty is "the fault of the system that don't give a man the fruit of his labor. . . . The only man that gets anything out of capitalism is a crook, an' he gets to be a millionaire in short order" (21, author's ellipsis). Mac, a character modeled in some ways on the author himself, holds a leftist political ideology and works for the IWW (Industrial Workers of the World), an international labor union that was quite powerful around the time of World War I. Mac's lack of financial success illuminates Dos Passos's argument that capitalism is an evil that hinders the working class from attaining prosperity and happiness. In San Francisco, Mac marries Maisie, who does not share his leftist ideology; she covets wealth and its trappings (the narrator even remarks that she dresses like a Gibson Girl and wears gloves as a fashion statement), and she actively attempts to dissuade Mac from following his leftist ideals. The inevitable friction caused by the conflict between his radicalism and her materialism leads to the termination of their marriage. Dos Passos suggests that love and sex can hinder one's devotion to the leftist cause.

However, readers soon realize that perhaps the problem is that Mac is not as committed to his cause as he thinks he is—a possibility that also mirrors Dos Passos's own doubts about his personal dedication to his left-wing ideals. Later, in Mexico, Mac is distracted again by a romantic relationship with a woman, a development indicating that women (and children from sexual encounters) distract socialist men from their jobs and their purpose. Donald Pizer says that in the novel, "[f]or the working-class radical, sex is a trap, since it can lead to the confinement of belief and action within the prison of middle-class marriage, as it does for Mac—first reluctantly with Maisie and then willingly with Concha" (121). Lisa Nanney claims that in 42nd Parallel and the other two parts of the trilogy, Dos Passos portrays women as being just as victimized by men as by capitalistic forces, yet she adds that "the predictability of the forces in the lives of the women—conventionality, the drive for respectability, shallow materialism—has led some analysts of the trilogy to criticize it as sexist or even misogynist" (181). One must wonder, however, whether women are actually the cause of Mac's failure to get ahead, especially since he is careless with money. (For instance, he sometimes spends it recklessly, once even wasting $15 on alcohol while he cannot afford to pay the bills to support Maisie and their two young children.)

Janey Williams, another major character, is an intelligent and talented but plain-looking stenographer. She is ambitious but is ashamed of her brother, Joe, who not only deserted his navy position but also lacks an education and a good job. She is not interested in love after the death of Alec, a boy in her hometown of Georgetown who dies young. She works for a media king named J. Ward Moorehouse, who is perhaps modeled after either the public relations giant Ivy Ledbetter Lee (who handled publicity for John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and Standard Oil) or the Red Cross leader H. P. Davidson. Moorehouse marries Annabelle Marie Strang, the daughter of a prominent doctor; even though he learns just before the wedding that she is sexually promiscuous, he marries her because he considers the marriage advantageous to his career. He leaves her shortly after the marriage, however, because she is still sexually promiscuous and unfaithful. Moorehouse then marries the very wealthy Gertrude Stamp and uses her parents' money to build his public relations empire. The marriage almost falls apart when Gertrude becomes jealous of her husband's relationship with an attractive and stylish interior decorator, Eleanor Stoddard. She even seems a bit jealous of Ward's platonic relationship with his dutiful stenographer, Janey Williams. When the war begins, Gertrude becomes worried about her husband's safety and begins to believe that her accusations about Moorehouse's infidelity were mistaken. However, the reader will discover in the next novel, 1919, that her suspicions are correct.

Moorehouse becomes greatly successful in public relations, particularly in publicly defining the relationship between capitalism and labor; this success is a concern to Dos Passos, who suggests that the media distort the truth to favor capitalism and big business. He mistrusts those who employ the media to support capitalism and, from his perspective, to hold down the working class. Donald Pizer says that the public relations icon “epitomizes the manipulation and corruption of language and therefore of belief in American life” (125). The power Moorehouse attains is troubling because many other characters are poor while he has obtained great wealth. It is possible, in fact, that Moorehouse is based not only on Lee or Davidson, but also on John Randolph Dos Passos, the author’s father, who used language and sophistry to present idealistic portrayals of large capitalistic corporations, a practice that conflicts markedly with his son’s leftist ideals. Dos Passos’s father often struggled hard to defend large corporations in their efforts against smaller interests. But Dos Passos himself employs the media, such as his Newsreels, in his novel and distorts the truth in his subjective biography segments.

The novel closes by introducing Charley Anderson (the protagonist of Big Money), who falls in love with Emiscah Svenson, is almost tricked into marrying her (although he realizes that he cannot be the father of her baby because he is a virgin), and then leaves for France to become a mechanic during World War I.

The innovative aspects of the novel—which include the use of “Newsreel” narratives, biographies of key historical figures, and subjective “Camera Eye” segments—manifest Dos Passos’s love of experimentation and his fascination with American history. However, although the historical information in some ways makes the novel more realistic, it can also detract from the realism by interrupting the narrative flow and calling attention to the text as a text.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Dos Passos’s depiction of the working classes in this novel with the ways they are depicted in EUGENE O’NEILL’s play The Hairy Ape. How do the techniques used in the novel and the play contribute to the effectiveness (and/or ineffectiveness) of their treatments of social issues?
2. Read Dos Passos’s book alongside W. E. B. DuBois’s novel The Quest of the Silver Fleece. How are the two works similar and/or distinct in their presentations of economic issues? In what ways is DuBois’s book a more traditional novel than Dos Passos’s text?
3. Does Dos Passos indicate that women are responsible for the failure of male radicals to lead a socialist revolution, or does the author suggest that the male radicals are incompetent and not fully devoted to their cause and thus use females as scapegoats for their inability to effect change that helps America’s working class? What role do women play in the leftist cause?
4. Read this book alongside Theodore Dreiser’s An American Tragedy, and then compare the ways male characters perceive female characters as obstacles in both books. How do the goals of the main characters in the two novels differ, and what kinds of obstacles do they think women pose to the achievement of their goals?
5. Critics have written about J. Ward Moorehouse as an opportunistic and amoral capitalist who employs propaganda to succeed. Is this an accurate assessment of the character, or does Dos Passos actually characterize Moorehouse in a much more positive light than these critics have claimed? How does the depiction of capitalism in this novel resemble and/or differ from the ways it is presented in JOHN STEINBECK’s The Grapes of Wrath?

Dos Passos focuses on Joe Williams, Richard Ellsworth Savage, and Eleanor Stoddard in 1919, a novel that dwells on the impact of World War I on American citizens. Joe Williams wishes to achieve the American dream but cannot because he lacks the commitment to saving money and settling down in one place with one woman; the author suggests, however, that part of Williams’s failure derives from a capitalistic society with rigid social classes. Savage uses his good looks to manipulate others, such as Daughter, whom he impregnates and then abandons in a successful effort to save his career.

1919, the middle novel in Dos Passos's trilogy, covers the time from the beginning of the United States' entrance into World War I until the Armistice. In 42nd Parallel, the reader has met Joe Williams but only through the eyes of his sister, Janey. In 1919, readers gain insight into the character of Joe from his own perspective. For instance, readers in 42nd Parallel learn what Janey thinks of her meeting with Joe outside the Riggs Building; in 1919, readers get Joe's perspective on the encounter and his evaluation of Janey and the changes in her life. Readers can now understand more about his life than they could from the cryptic comments he made in the previous novel, and they can now comprehend—although perhaps not justify—why Janey has become ashamed of him. Readers learn that he also senses his inadequacies when he is with his sister. Yet he keeps a cigar box full of mementos, including a photograph of Janey, manifesting the sentimental side of his character.

A seaman with a knack for finding trouble, Joe is arrested for attempting to enter England without a passport during wartime and for being a spy. After his release, he realizes that he must stay out of trouble, but almost immediately he is arrested again for fighting in a brothel. Many critics contend that Joe Williams is a victim of his social class and cannot get ahead because he is poor, especially since the poor are exploited by the rich. However, Janey Williams is obviously from the same social class as her brother, yet she thrives in the business world. And it is clear that Joe would have a better chance of rising socioeconomically if he had an education, if he got along better with people and did not fight, and if he did not spend all his money on alcohol and prostitutes. Della Matthews, from the same social class, who later marries him, correctly believes that Joe is "a nice boy and came from nice people and had been nicely raised and ought to be thinking of getting ahead in the world instead of being a bum and a loafer" (401). Joe falls in love with Della and decides to marry her, yet soon after making this decision to settle down, he contracts gonorrhea from a prostitute and decides to complete only half of his medical treatment. Joe's poor character traits thus undercut the argument that his failure in life derives from his social class. The reader might not have much sympathy for Joe, particularly after he has sex with a prostitute in exchange for silk stockings and then steals back the stockings after she falls asleep. Although Joe seems to be a man who is down on his luck, he creates his own unfortunate situations and ultimately causes his own death when fighting a large man in a bar: When Williams attacks a large Senegalese man, another man crushes his skull with a bottle.

Another of the novel's main characters—Richard (Dick) Savage—does not come from a wealthy family either (although his grandfather was a major general), but he makes important connections with influential people, thus ensuring his success. Dick benefits from his connection to a prominent Jersey City lawyer and politician, Hiram Halsey Cooper. Cooper, impressed with Savage and perhaps interested in Dick sexually, uses his political connections to find Dick good jobs, including a commission after Savage is recalled to the States after writing antiwar letters. Savage is amoral, having a sexual relationship with Hilda Thurlow, who, along with her preacher husband, Edwin, has befriended the young man. Savage even sleeps with Hilda on Sundays while her husband is preaching in church in a nearby town. Hilda breaks off the affair when she becomes pregnant. Although the text never indicates who the father is, the reader might assume, from details of Hilda's relationship with her husband and with Savage, that the latter is the father. Savage joins the French ambulatory unit Norton-Harjes, just as Dos Passos himself did. It would be a mistake, however, to believe that Dos Passos identifies with (or likens himself strongly to) the amoral Savage.

The war permeates all aspects of this novel. The characters are preoccupied with the war, and it thoroughly affects their behavior. Joe's virginal wife, Della, suddenly changes when the war breaks out and becomes promiscuous, sleeping with men in uniform to do her part for the war effort.

Women frequently sleep with many men, and the men are drunk often, both justifying their behavior by saying, “C’est la guerre” (passim). Similarly, when Dick Savage asks Anne Elizabeth Trent for sex, she responds, “You boys [soldiers] have risked your lives. I guess I can risk that [losing her virginity]” (675).

The initial description of Daughter (Anne Elizabeth Trent) manifests Dos Passos’s attitude toward the wealthy and privileged:

The Trents lived in a house on Pleasant avenue [sic] that was the finest street in Dallas that was the biggest and fastest growing town in Texas that was the biggest state in the Union and had the blackest soil and the whitest people and America was the greatest country in the world and Daughter was Dad’s onlyest sweetest little girl.(576)

The sarcastic tone suggests the elitism that Dos Passos believes exists within wealthy American communities and families. The living is pleasant (the street name), and everything seems ideal because the privileged have wonderful opportunities. Yet Anne has lost her individuality—and her name—and thus is called Daughter by her father; she is treated as a child, as is suggested by the use of the word onlyest. Daughter’s father is a wealthy lawyer, as was Dos Passos’s father.

Daughter goes from one romantic relationship to the next; she dates socialist activists such as Edwin Vinal and Webb Cruthers, although she never seems to care about her boyfriends’ causes. The reader might wonder, furthermore, how dedicated these men are to their causes as well. She then falls in love with Dick Savage, who impregnates her. When Savage discovers that Daughter is pregnant, he breaks off their relationship: “But, Ann Elizabeth, do be reasonable. . . . Can’t we go on being friends?” (694, author’s ellipsis); then he suggests that she trick G. H. Barrow into marrying her by sleeping with him and making him think that he is the father. Savage thus manifests his own callous and selfish nature. Daughter considers marrying the foolish and stuttering Barrow but cannot go through with it and instead goes for a plane ride with a drunken French aviator, Pierre; the plane crashes, killing them both. The death could be a suicide because she had wanted the drunken man to fly and do stunts, perhaps so that she could die in a crash. Eleanor Stoddard manipulates the press into declining to cover the story so that Dick will not be embarrassed, for his spurning of Daughter has indirectly caused the crash. Dos Passos here manifests his belief that the media manipulates, rather than reports, the news.

Eveline Hutchins’s friendship with Eleanor Stoddard cools, and both women have affairs with the public relations giant J. Ward Moorehouse. Hutchins has numerous love affairs and is impregnated by Paul Johnson, whom she does not love. Moorehouse’s infidelities (he is married to Gertrude, who lives in a sanitarium) and his smooth nature indicate Dos Passos’s disdain for people who use language and influence to distort the truth about war and business.

Dos Passos expresses his disdain for greed through his scathing biography of J. Pierpont Morgan, his contempt for deceptive public relations through the characterization of J. Ward Moorehouse, and his anger toward President Woodrow Wilson for involving the United States in World War I through the sarcastic biography titled “Meester Veelson.”

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the role that sex plays in the novel. The male characters tend to be very active sexually, and the women are very promiscuous. What points could Dos Passos be trying to make about the war or social class by introducing the theme of sexual promiscuity? What does Dos Passos’s book have in common, in these respects, with Ernest Hemingway’s The Sun Also Rises?
2. How does the author characterize left-wing radicals such as Edwin Vinal, Webb Cruthers, Don Stevens, and Ben Compton? What point is Dos Passos making by characterizing socialists as he does? What does the author suggest by giving the capitalist J. Ward Moorehouse a significantly larger role than these radicals? How do his depictions of radicals resemble and/or differ from the ways they are depicted in Ralph Ellison's novel Invisible Man?

3. Although Moorehouse seems to be a major character, readers learn about him primarily through other characters such as Eleanor Stoddard and Eveline Hutchins. What is the effect of portraying Moorehouse from the perspectives of other characters in the novel rather than directly? What is the effect of portraying Moorehouse primarily through the eyes of women rather than providing him with his own narrative (he appears in others' narratives instead)? How does Dos Passos's use of this indirect method resemble and/or differ from the methods used in WILLIAM FAULKNER's "A Rose for Emily"?
4. What role do censorship and truth play in 1919? Savage loses his position because he is a pacifist; Moorehouse succeeds by allegedly manipulating truth. What does this contrast suggest, particularly when Savage subsequently goes to work for Moorehouse?
5. What part does social class play in 1919? The working-class sailor Joe Williams and the wealthy Daughter both perish after living unhappy lives. Does Dos Passos indicate that character plays a larger role than class, or what other reasons, such as the casualties of war, explain the sad fates of characters from markedly different classes? Compare and contrast the impact of class on the characters in this novel with its impact on the characters in Gertrude Stein's book Three Lives.

The Big Money* (1936)

In The Big Money, the author demonstrates how, in the aftermath of the war, big business and capitalism have become obsessions. The wealthy increase their power and riches while the working classes cannot succeed because of their poverty and because of the manipulation of the media by the affluent. The war veteran Charley Anderson dreams of becoming successful in the aviation motor business, yet he cheats his business partners; is cheated by his wife, Gladys; and dies of injuries suffered in a car accident.

The Big Money, the last novel in Dos Passos's trilogy, deals with the aftermath of World War I and extends through the 1920s. American soldiers have returned from Europe, hoping to find economic prosperity. In this volume of the trilogy, capitalism has replaced the war as the major theme, and the characters seem more thoroughly developed than in the first two volumes of U.S.A.

The aviator Charley Anderson returns to Minnesota to find his mother dying, his unfaithful former girlfriend Emiscah Svenson trying desperately to get him to marry her (she threatens several times to kill herself by turning on the gas unless they are reunited), and his brother, Jim, and his sister-in-law, Hedwig, working for the Ford Motor Company. Jim and Hedwig dismiss Charley's plans for the future of aviation engineering and appropriate his share of his mother's inheritance when the mother passes away. To make a point about the deception of Jim and Hedwig (huge proponents of Ford) and to show the evils of capitalism, Dos Passos includes a sardonic biography of the entrepreneur Henry Ford (entitled "Tin Lizzie"). The author mentions that Ford promised high wages, but "of course it turned out that there were strings to it; always there were strings to it. . . . Ford's was manufacturing munitions, Eagle boats. . . . He announced to the press that he'd turn over his war profits to the government, but there's no record that he ever did" (809, 811). Dos Passos then proceeds to discuss Ford's vigorous and hateful anti-Semitism. Ford also dehumanizes his workers and makes them unhappy by putting them on assembly lines and dictating their conduct (they must be married, not commit adultery, and not drink or smoke cigarettes on or even off the job, for instance). Dos Passos thus manifests, through his use of biography, the deceitfulness of Jim and Hedwig Anderson; he shows their strong allegiance to the Ford Motor Company and Henry Ford's insidious behavior. (Charley, it is interesting to note, ultimately dies of injuries suffered in an automobile accident.)

Charley moves to New York and attends a party hosted by Eveline Hutchins (now Eveline Johnson), who has a baby but clearly is not happy being a mother or a wife. Her former beau Don Stevens and Dick Savage are also at the party, leading to a frosty atmosphere in the room. Stevens talks of nothing but class struggles and socialism, and he even asks Charley, whom he has never met before, “Tell us what aviators think about. Are they for the exploiting class or the workingclass [sic]?” (822). The question is silly and sophomoric, illustrating the simplistic thinking of socialists such as Don Stevens. Stevens’s silly behavior manifests, perhaps, the change in Dos Passos’s sociopolitical views and his recognition of the lack of complex and mature thought exhibited by certain left-wing radicals.

Charley courts the socialite Doris Humphries but cannot obtain her “love” because he is poor. Biding his time while he waits for enough money to win Doris’s heart, Charley has an affair with the promiscuous Eveline Hutchins Johnson, even though her husband, Paul Johnson, has befriended him in New York. As do many Dos Passos characters, such as Dick Savage and Joe Williams in 1919, Charley justifies his sexual indiscretions: “He felt bad about Paul, but after all Paul wasn’t a particular friend of his and if it wasn’t him [Charley] he reckoned it would be somebody else” (835). Anderson, therefore, justifies sleeping with his friend’s wife because Paul, although very kind to him, is not his closest friend and because he is in a way preventing Eveline from sleeping with another man by committing adultery with him instead. Dos Passos demonstrates how easily people justify their irresponsible behavior and how they lack introspection. The relationship between Charley and Eveline cools when she informs him that she wants to divorce her husband and marry him. Bored by her life and tied to a dull marriage and to a baby, Eveline commits suicide.

Charley finally meets a fine woman named Anne Bledsoe, who is compatible with him, yet he chooses to marry Gladys Wheatley instead because she has a wealthier family. Their marriage fails, and Gladys tricks him out of his money. Here Dos Passos makes a statement about the dangers and seductive quality of money. He illustrates how social relationships such as marriages are inextricably tied to wealth, thus diminishing the ability of the working class to succeed or intermingle with members of the upper class.

Another important character in this novel is the idealistic and emotional social worker Mary French, who works at the Hull House in Chicago and is inspired by her admirable father, a physician who devotes his life to caring for the poor; he dies while caring for indigent patients during the influenza epidemic. As Daughter does in 1919, French encounters a politician—G. H. Barrow—who claims to support the working class. He seduces her as he has attempted to seduce Daughter. The difference is that Barrow, an awkward man who devotes much of his time to chasing young women, is successful with French; he impregnates her in Pittsburgh and offers to marry her, but she refuses after he declines to support Gus Moscowski, who is doing the publicity for striking steelworkers. Dos Passos suggests that Barrow’s attempted seductions of women succeed or fail depending on the women’s political views. Daughter does not care about the working class, so she despises Barrow, whereas French is a strong advocate of the working class, so she admires the man, sleeps with him, and considers marrying him—until he fails to support the Pittsburgh steelworkers and thus the cause that he claims to champion. When Mary castigates Barrow for selling out the strikers in favor of the steel barons, the superficial and ignorant Barrow mistakenly assumes that her anger is caused by menstruation (“the curse coming on” [890])—not by his refusal to help Moscowski and his fellow strikers.

French obtains a job as a reporter for the Pittsburgh Times-Sentinel and is fired after she refuses her boss’s order to portray the strikers as Bolshevik-led, greedy agitators who receive good pay but avariciously covet more. Dos Passos employs this incident to convey his belief that the media, whether in the person of Ted Healy (the newspaper’s editor) or J. Ward Moorehouse, manipulate the news so that the public cannot learn the truth about the ill treatment of the working class. The incident involving Healy might serve as Dos Passos’s veiled attack on the publisher William Randolph Hearst and on dishonest journalists who are more interested in selling newspapers and making profits than in the truth. The author also suggests that the media favor the wealthy and thus negatively portray the working

- heroines? What generalizations can you make regarding his characterization of women such as Eveline Hutchins, Emiscah Svenson, Maisie, Daughter, Margo Dowling, Gertrude Stamp, Della Matthews, Janey Williams, and Eleanor Stoddard? How do the men characterize the women, and how do the women describe, feel about, and treat each other?
3. Although it is generally acknowledged that Dos Passos was a fervent supporter of the working class when he wrote the trilogy, why does he characterize so many working-class characters as unreliable men with penchants for alcohol and prostitutes? Do such portrayals undercut his argument, or does the behavior of such characters indicate what happens to the psyche of men who are downtrodden after being subjugated by the wealthy?
 4. Linda W. Martin says that “1919 is usually regarded as the most despairing of the three novels” (102) that make up the trilogy. When you compare the three novels in U.S.A., does the middle work seem the most despairing and pessimistic? In what ways is it pessimistic? What causes the pessimism in this novel? In what ways are the other two more optimistic? Do you agree with Martin’s statement?
 5. Throughout the trilogy and in Manhattan Transfer, characters share the same situations and biographical backgrounds as Dos Passos, such as serving as an ambulance driver in Paris for the Norton-Harjes, going to Harvard, and having a father who is a prominent lawyer. Although it is plausible that Dos Passos is inevitably drawing on personal experience and experiences he knew well, are there other possible reasons why he endows his characters—even the shady ones—with facts from his own personal history? How do such facts help shape the narrative?
 6. Discuss the different narrative voices that Dos Passos uses. Sometimes the narrator is an objective, third-person omniscient narrator while at other times the narrator seems to borrow the slang and even pejorative vocabulary of his characters. How do you account for the narrative shifts, and how do they affect the narrative?
 7. Discuss the significance of the Camera Eye, Newsreels, and Biographies that Dos Passos intersperses within his narratives. Which have the greatest impact and why? Do they enhance the novel, or do they detract from the plot by calling attention to the artificial nature of the books?
 8. In the novels, the virtuous characters (such as Mac and Mary French) are disappointed again and again; although idealistic, they do not succeed. Meanwhile, unsavory characters (such as J. Ward Moorehouse, Dick Savage, and Eleanor Stoddard) thrive. What points could Dos Passos be making, then, about capitalism, socialism, and ethics?
 9. Discuss the theme of abortion in Dos Passos’s novels. What do the abortions indicate about the societal and economic pressures on women and about sexual double standards? Why do these women abort their babies or induce miscarriages? How does the author link abortion to socialism and capitalism?
 10. Several characters kill themselves for various reasons and take their lives indirectly, such as Daughter in 1919, who demands that a drunken pilot take her up in a plane and perform stunts so that she can die. Is Dos Passos making any points about the pressures of a capitalist society, a nation divided between the rich and the poor, or the ennui of the wealthy? Do those who commit suicide fit certain patterns that you can identify and analyze?

THEODORE DREISER (1871–1945)

To express what we see honestly and without subterfuge: this is morality as well as art.

(qtd. in Sloane 76)

Theodore Dreiser is widely considered one of the most important American writers in the naturalistic or realistic traditions (which emphasize detailed depictions of common daily life and which stress the influence of material reality on human behavior). He was born on August 27, 1871, in Terre Haute, Indiana. By this time his parents (John Paul Dreiser and Sarah Schänäb Dreiser) already had eight surviving children, and the family was not only large but poor. Their poverty resulted mainly from the physical and psychological difficulties of Dreiser's father, whose business and body had both been damaged in an 1869 fire that destroyed an uninsured mill he had owned and operated. John Paul Dreiser, a German immigrant who still often used his native language when speaking to his wife and children, was a strict Catholic, who sought to impose his will on his children, who grew to resent and resist his efforts at control. Dreiser's mother, on the other hand, was a warmer, more obviously affectionate parent, and the "emotional dynamic of the Dreiser home during Theodore's formative years comprised an ardent desire by the Dreiser children to remain within the family to profit from the nurturing love of their mother, matched by an equally compelling need to escape the authoritarian and restrictive moralism of their father" (Pizer 9). Both the negative and the positive influences of Theodore's childhood would greatly influence his later concerns as a writer.

In 1882 the family was saved from severe poverty by Dreiser's elder brother, Paul, who had changed his last name to Dresser and won financial success as a comedic singer. Between 1883 and 1887 the family lived in a variety of midwestern towns and cities, where they were usually poor and often isolated, living a kind of nomadic, underprivileged, outsider's existence that significantly shaped Dreiser's attitudes as well as his later literature. During these years Dreiser (who was never very physically impressive) became interested not only in books and in natural beauty but also in sex, and his response consisted of "an immense preoccupation mixed with painful anxiety over whether he was attractive enough to girls and whether he could adequately perform the sexual act. . . . Dreiser's belief in his possible sexual inadequacy, accompanied by a sense of guilt attached to sex, bred doubts and fears that [later] required a constant stream of new conquests to prove both his sexual prowess and the legitimacy of sexual freedom" (Pizer 11). When he eventually began writing novels, his books were considered shocking for their time because of the openness with which they depicted sexual motives and behavior.

For the time being, however, Dreiser had not yet found a real focus for his life. From 1887 to 1889 he was living in Chicago with other members of his family and was working various menial jobs when he encountered a former high school teacher who thought highly of his potential and offered to pay his way to college. In 1889, therefore, he began attending Indiana University, but he felt intellectually unprepared (having finished only one year of high school) and socially ill at ease among the more privileged students he met, and so he soon dropped out. His later fictional focus on “the outsider seeking the rich plenty on the other side of the wall or window but uncertain of his ability to grasp it probably derives from his own first encounter with middle-class life” in college (Pizer 13). Even more disappointing than his failure at the university must have been the death of his beloved mother, who passed away on November 14, 1890. By this time he was back in Chicago, working in real estate and as a bill collector, but his life took a decisive turn in 1892 when he sought and won a job as a newspaper writer. Over the next few years he would move from one paper to another and from one city to the next (including Chicago, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, and, finally, New York), writing hard news, soft features, and sometimes fiction masquerading as fact. He was a talented, prolific journalist and soon also won employment as an editor (1895–97) of his own magazine and as a contributor to various others. It was in 1899, however, that he first turned his attention seriously to writing fiction, beginning with a series of stories but soon trying his hand at a lengthy novel.

This book, titled Sister Carrie and finished early in 1900, marks a major turning point not only in Dreiser's life but in the history of American fiction. Influenced by the experiences of one of Dreiser's sisters, the novel was affected as well as by Dreiser's own years as a big-city reporter, by his reading of such realistic European novelists as Balzac, and by his familiarity with the theories of such writers as Charles Darwin and especially Herbert Spencer, who emphasized the idea of life as a continuous struggle for survival in a universe in which both random chance and mechanistic fate left few options for genuine freedom or ultimate human happiness. The world depicted in Dreiser's first novel, as in much of his subsequent writing, is bleak and unforgiving; success depends less on moral conduct (since no transcendent moral values can exist in a materialistic cosmos) than on ambition, competition, accident, and the inexorable laws of brute matter. Dreiser describes the (largely urban) environments of his characters in relentless detail, since he believed that environment was at least as important as “character” in determining a person's fate, especially since human character was so much a product of one's social and physical circumstances. This book, clearly, was something new, and its main plot—in which a sexually adventurous woman succeeds financially while ultimately feeling unfulfilled in any deeper sense—was shocking enough even to some readers at the publishing firm that the company did little to promote the book when it was first printed. Dreiser had produced a novel that displeased many people who first read it (as he must have known it would), but it was a book that was not, at first, read by many.

Although he started working on a new novel (Jennie Gerhardt) in 1901, he now became increasingly despondent. His physical and mental health declined so much, in fact, that by 1903 he was nearly at the end of his financial rope when his brother Paul once again came to the rescue by arranging for him to be treated at a sanatorium, where Dreiser responded so quickly that by the end of the year he felt sufficiently recuperated to resume writing and editing. For the next five years he steadily climbed back to prominence in the field of publishing, and indeed in 1907 he arranged to have Sister Carrie reprinted. This new printing received good reviews, and Dreiser himself began to flourish financially. In 1911 Jennie Gerhardt finally appeared, and in 1912 The Financier (the first of three novels based on the life of Charles Yerkes) was published, as was yet another printing of Sister Carrie. The year 1914 saw the publication of The Titan (the second of the books based on the life of Yerkes), and in 1915 Dreiser published The “Genius”—a “barely disguised autobiography” that was “banned as obscene and blasphemous the following year by the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice” (Sloane xii–xiii). From 1917 to 1923 his financial success declined, so that he was forced to live once more under financial stress; nevertheless, his books continued to appear, including Free and Other Stories (short fiction; 1918); Twelve Men (biographical pieces; 1919); The Hand of the Potter (a tragedy about a pedophile; 1919); Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub (philosophical essays; 1920); A Book about Myself (autobiography; 1921); and The Color of a Great City (portraits of urban existence; 1923).

It was in 1925, however, that Dreiser enjoyed his greatest financial and critical success as an author of fiction with the publication of a massive two-volume novel titled An American Tragedy. This book established Dreiser as a major American writer. Movie rights were sold; a stage version was produced in New York; and Dreiser became so wealthy that he was able to visit Europe for an extended period with Helen Richardson, the woman with whom he had begun living in 1919 (after separating in 1914 from Sara “Jug” Osborne White, whom he had married in 1898). Increasingly involved in left-wing politics, he visited the Soviet Union in 1927 at the invitation of the communist government, but despite his traveling he continued to publish prolifically. In 1926, for instance, he issued a collection of his poems titled Moods: Cadenced and Declaimed (which was reprinted and expanded in 1928); 1927 saw the publication of Chains: Lesser Novels and Stories; in that same year he also issued Dreiser Looks at Russia; in 1929 he published a two-volume “collection” titled A Gallery of Women. In 1930 he missed winning the Nobel Prize in literature by one vote, but Sinclair Lewis, who was chosen instead, said in his acceptance speech that Dreiser, “more than any other writer,” had “opened the way to honesty and passion in modern fiction” (qtd. in Sloane xiii). In 1931, certainly, Dreiser was famous enough to publish another volume of autobiography (A History of Myself: Dawn), describing his youth and adolescence, and in the same year he issued Tragic America, an indictment of the failures of American capitalism.

Throughout the 1930s, as the United States suffered during the Great Depression, Dreiser became increasingly active in left-wing political causes, even becoming more and more closely associated with the American Communist Party and an apologist for the Soviet Union. His interest in science was also even stronger now than it had always been, as was his interest in philosophy, and he devoted much of his time as a writer to work on philosophical treatises he failed to publish in his lifetime. By the late 1930s and early 1940s he was also at work on a new novel (The Bulwark), but his only published book in 10 years was America Is Worth Saving (1941), which toed the Communist Party line concerning World War II—a line that would soon change abruptly when one dictator (the German Nazi, Hitler) attacked his fellow dictator (the Soviet Communist, Stalin), with whom Hitler had made an alliance of convenience two years before. Dreiser, however (despite the show trials and persecutions in the Soviet Union in the 1930s), remained a committed communist sympathizer to the end, and indeed in 1945 he actually joined the American Communist Party. This was the year after he had received the Award of Merit Medal from the American Academy of Arts and Letters as well as the year after he finally married his long-time companion, Helen Richardson. By the end of 1945, however, he was dead of a heart attack suffered on December 28. Books, however, continued to appear: In 1946 his novel The Bulwark was published, and in 1947 the final volume in the fictional Yerkes trilogy (The Stoic) was issued. In the decades since Dreiser’s death, numerous other unpublished works have been printed, and the University of Pennsylvania Press has begun publishing a series of carefully edited versions of his major and minor texts.

Sister Carrie* (1900)

When Caroline Meeber, at age 18, leaves her home in Columbia City, Wisconsin, in search of a better, more prosperous life in Chicago, she meets a dashing salesman named Charles Drouet, who immediately takes an interest in her and who later offers to help her when, after she works a series of menial, low-paying jobs, she suddenly finds herself unemployed as a result of sickness. After Carrie becomes Drouet’s mistress, she meets his prosperous friend George Hurstwood; he, although married and a father, eventually becomes so obsessed with Carrie that he reluctantly steals money from his employer's safe and persuades Carrie to run away with him to start a new life in New York, where at first the couple prosper and where Carrie becomes increasingly involved not only in high society but also in the theater thanks to her innate talent as an actress. However, as Carrie's career on stage thrives, George, through abrupt financial reversals, descends into poverty and destitution; when Carrie, now a major figure on the stage, essentially ignores George when he goes to her to beg for help, he eventually decides to kill himself. Although Carrie has now achieved much greater material success than either Drouet or Hurstwood, at the end of the novel she is not especially happy or fulfilled.

Sister Carrie was not only Dreiser's first important and extended work of fiction, but it is also one of his most typical pieces of writing and (along with An American Tragedy) is still the text on which his reputation mainly depends today. The book exemplifies many of his most characteristic themes and stylistic traits, and the patterns of plot and phrasing it establishes were repeated often in his later writings. Carrie's movement from a small town in Wisconsin to the huge and growing metropolis of Chicago, for instance, typifies the kind of migration to urban areas that was an increasingly common fact of life in the era in which Dreiser lived and wrote, and indeed Dreiser is important in part because of the highly detailed descriptions he provides of city life during this significant period of American history. His works are often set in large cities, and in Sister Carrie he depicts the two largest of his era (Chicago and New York) and draws on his own intimate familiarity with both places. Carrie's experiences, in fact, often reflect his own, especially in her movement from small-town obscurity to big-city prominence, but the experiences of George Hurstwood (especially his descent from material prosperity to grinding poverty) are also experiences with which Dreiser himself, with his impoverished background, could sympathize (Matthiessen 173). In fact, after the publication of Sister Carrie Dreiser personally suffered many of the same kinds of losses Hurstwood experienced in the novel, so that the book becomes a kind of odd prophecy of his own personal fate.

In addition to this novel's emphasis on urban life, many other aspects of Sister Carrie make the book typical of Dreiser's writings. Its focus on the struggle for material success, for instance, is a theme that recurs again and again in Dreiser's works; the American economy at the time he wrote was characterized by enormous social mobility, and, as the contrasting fates of Hurstwood and Carrie show, one person could move down the social ladder just as quickly and abruptly as another person could move up the ladder. Both Carrie and Hurstwood live, for a time, in poverty, and this emphasis on the grim underside of American life is another characteristic feature of Dreiser's works. Dreiser knew from personal experience what it was like to do menial, degrading labor for subsistence-level wages, and part of the purpose of his fiction is to describe the dark realities of American capitalism, a system (he believed) in which people are often treated as commodities and in which blind economic ambition, gnawing fear of unemployment and hunger, and the competitive struggle for survival play more important roles than any loftier spiritual motives. All these nearly Darwinian social pressures can be seen operating in Sister Carrie, which depicts a kind of existence involving the survival of the fittest and which also displays a kind of life in which mere chance is quite important (Elias 150).

It is merely by chance, for instance, that Carrie meets Charles Drouet, and it is merely by chance again that she discovers the talent for acting that will lead her to such eventual social prominence. Similarly, it is merely by chance that Hurstwood ultimately steals the money from his employer's safe: He had been tempted to steal it (after finding the safe unlocked), but as he attempts to put the money away (having wrestled with his conscience and decided that theft would be wrong), he accidentally locks the safe and then feels that he now has no choice but to steal after all. (A similar kind of "accidental crime" is at the heart of Dreiser's other major novel, An American Tragedy.) Dreiser considered the universe a puzzling, inscrutable thing guided by no larger discernible purpose or plan; any laws that controlled it were physical or mechanical rather than spiritual or moral. Who, at the beginning of this book, could have predicted Carrie's eventual fantastic success? Who could have foreseen the eventual degradation of Hurstwood? Life in Dreiser's fiction is unpredictable because life at large (Dreiser believed) is unpredictable as well. Much depends on luck (whether good or bad) and on the social circumstances in which one happens to find oneself. If Carrie had not had the good fortune to be good-looking, she might never have attracted Drouet; if she had not happened to meet Drouet on a downtown Chicago street (after not having seen him for weeks after their first chance encounter on a train), the ensuing chain of events might never have occurred. If Hurstwood had not happened to lose his fortune in one of the periodic business collapses to which American capitalism is prone, he might have ended the novel as a successful man rather than as a poverty-stricken suicide. Success or failure depends greatly on accident, and in America success and failure are largely judged in monetary and material terms. If Carrie succeeds, in part, through means society claims to disdain (by becoming the mistress of one man and then by absconding with that man's friend, who has become a thief after abandoning his wife and children), who, Dreiser asks, is really in a position to judge or condemn her? A passage near the end of the novel sums up the narrator's attitudes:

Oh, the tangle of human life! How dimly as yet we see. Here was Carrie, in the beginning poor, unsophisticated, emotional; responding with desire to everything most lovely in life, yet finding herself turned as by a wall. Laws to say: "Be allured, if you will, by everything lovely, but draw not nigh unless by righteousness." Convention to say: "You shall not better your situation save by honest labour." If honest labour be unremunerative and difficult to endure; if it be the long, long road which never reaches beauty, but wearies the feet and the heart; if the drag to follow beauty be such that one abandons the admired way, taking rather the despised path leading to her dreams quickly, who shall cast the first stone? Not evil, but longing for that which is better, more often directs the steps of the erring. Not evil, but goodness more often allures the feeling mind unused to reason. (368)

This paragraph is typical of the book (and of Dreiser's larger thinking) in many ways. It shows, for instance, his standard reliance on an omniscient narrator, who is frequently willing to reflect philosophically on the events he describes (Sloane 70). It shows, as well, Dreiser's common emphasis on the complexities of human existence and on the inadequacy of conventional moral, legal, or religious codes, which merely prescribe, proscribe, and condemn (Elias 157). It shows, moreover, Dreiser's own unwillingness to censure people in difficult circumstances who face hard or narrow choices or no choices at all, and it also shows his tendency to react with a kind of sympathy and pity for them that they rarely found in society at large (Elias 141–142). In addition, the passage implies Dreiser's willingness to criticize social conventions and institutions and his awareness of the desire for beauty as a major motive of human conduct. The passage further exemplifies his typical emphasis on illicit sex ("the despised path"), especially as a possible means to personal success, particularly in a society in which possessing money is at least as important as practicing private morality (Elias 144, 147, 169). Stylistically, too, the passage is revealing. The third quoted sentence, for example, displays the plain, straightforward phrasing of which Dreiser was often capable and that often shows him at his best. It must be admitted, however, that this passage also displays some of the "pompous language" that David E. E. Sloane says often "marks some of the philosophical discourses in Sister Carrie" (62)—language that Sloane sees as "representative of a midwesterner [sic] forcing higher diction" (64). In Dreiser's defense, though, it can be noted that the passage skillfully employs biblical allusions, echoing both the Old Testament ("in the beginning") and the New ("cast the first stone"), and that such allusions are highly appropriate in a passage that challenges some aspects of conventional religious thinking and proposes instead a more complex moral response. The second allusion, in particular, by reminding us of Jesus' words concerning a woman accused of prostitution (John 8:7), also exemplifies Dreiser's tendency, when evoking religion, to stress the spirit rather than the letter of the law (West 137). In all these ways, then, this one brief paragraph from Sister Carrie illustrates many significant aspects of the novel as a whole.

In some ways, however, the quoted passage is not particularly representative. It lacks, for instance, the emphasis on material facts and abundant physical detail that is so characteristic of Dreiser's usual style; nor does it describe the hustle and bustle of city life he was so often accustomed to presenting (Elias 147–48). The passage does, though, reveal his fondness for repetition (Elias 151), whether the repetition involved events, images, symbols, or, in this case, phrasing (as in the repeated “if” clauses or the reiterated phrase “Not evil”). Missing from the passage, though, is his frequent emphasis on physical settings, and also missing is his habitual stress on dialogue and colloquial midwestern speech. Nevertheless, in one respect the quoted passage is quite highly significant, for it helps explain the uproar and scandal associated with the novel from the moment it was first published. The passage reveals, after all, that “Carrie not only escaped punishment” for her irregular conduct (as would not have happened in earlier books about such a woman) and that “Dreiser did not even regard her as sinful: and this was the crux of his defiance of late nineteenth-century conventionality” (Matthiessen 170). Far more than Dreiser's skill in writing (or his alleged lack thereof), it was the events of the novel, and the narrator's attitudes toward those events, that made Sister Carrie an unusual and even pathbreaking work in American literature when it first appeared at the dawn of the 20th century.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this novel, in its plot, main characters, setting, and style, with Henry James's novels The Portrait of a Lady or Daisy Miller. How, in particular, do James's novels and Dreiser's deal with matters of social class?
2. Compare and contrast this novel, in its plot, main characters, setting, and style, with ZORA NEALE HURSTON's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. How, in particular, does racial identity affect the fate of each main character?
3. Choose one brief section of this book (a paragraph or two) and discuss all the ways in which that section is typical of Dreiser's general approach to writing. In particular, discuss the ways in which the passage is either effective, ineffective, or some combination of both.
4. Study the positions of women in Dreiser's era and discuss the ways this novel reflects the lives of women at that time, particularly the options open to them. How would Carrie's life have been different if she had lived, say, in the 1960s?
5. Read a biography of Dreiser and discuss the ways this novel reflects the details of his own life. In what ways, and for what reasons, could Dreiser have sympathized and even identified with Carrie?

“Old Rogaum and His Theresa” (1901, 1918)

Rogaum (first name not given) is a butcher who lives in New York's Bleeker Street with his wife and his children, including his 18-year-old daughter, Theresa, who has begun to disobey her father's curfews in order to spend more time out on the streets in the company of her friends, especially “Connie” Almering, a handsome, flirtatious “tough” who encourages her to defy her father and who is distrusted by Officers Maguire and Delahanty, the local cops on the beat. One night, having long threatened to do so, Rogaum finally locks Theresa out of the house to teach her a lesson, but he soon learns a lesson of his own when she disappears with Connie and when Rogaum, in his frantic efforts to find her, stumbles across the writhing body of a young prostitute who has just attempted suicide. Eventually the police track down Theresa and return her to her desperate parents, but not before giving Connie a piece of their minds and Rogaum a warning about the dangers of locking young daughters out of doors at night in a big city.

This story displays many traits a reader would expect of Dreiser. It is set in a large city; the physical details of that setting are thoroughly described; and the story is populated by characters from diverse ethnic backgrounds (German, Irish, French, etc.), thereby reflecting the status of the United States as a multicultural melting pot. Ethnic dialects are heavily (perhaps too heavily) stressed, as is the kind of street lingo (especially used by Connie) that was increasingly characteristic of the colloquial speech of Dreiser's day. Although such speech can now seem dated and almost unintentionally funny, Dreiser would have justified its use because he was interested in presenting facts and details of the actual life of his time. In his references to streetcars and police phones, for instance, we sense the growing modernization and urbanization of American life in Dreiser's era; in his depiction of the nearly dead prostitute and the politically protected brothel we have evidence of what the story itself calls "the commercialized vice of the city" (219). Dreiser was always interested in the operations of power of all sorts and at all levels, and in this case we sense his view that the commercialism and materialism at the heart of American society could corrupt everything, including sex.

While Dreiser is typically interested, however, in presenting a credible picture of life as it was lived in a specific time and place, he is also usually interested in dealing with more basic drives and conduct. Those include (in this story) "the attractions of sex, the tensions of family loyalty, the lure of the city, and the yearning for beauty" (Elias 169). Theresa is torn between her dwindling impulse to obey her father and her ever-growing instinct to enjoy the sexual excitement of Connie's company; meanwhile, Connie and the elderly Rogaum embody the age-old battle between fathers and suitors, between the old and the young, between one male and another. On one level the characters represent life as it was lived in metropolitan New York in the early decades of the 20th century; on another level they simply act out desires and fears that are deeply rooted in the physical and psychological nature of human beings from time immemorial. The violence, the sex, and the contest of wills Dreiser depicts in this story are themes (he believed) that would never become irrelevant. Young people would always rebel against the authority of elders they considered oppressive, because they had always done so (certainly Dreiser himself had rebelled); and parents (especially fathers) would always try to assert their control over the lives of their children because it was their nature to do so (as Dreiser's own father had demonstrated). The story thus deals with age-old themes as well as with aspects of life that must have seemed, in Dreiser's day, up to the minute, such as the way the young folk in this story are becoming generically "American" despite their diverse ethnic backgrounds. Arguably the story is flawed by excessive dialect, implausible diction (Theresa was "wont to betake her way upward" [202]), unnecessary verbiage ("I vill lock you oudt," he declared, in strongly accented English" [203]), and intrusive, heavy-handed philosophizing ("Now, strangely, a new element, not heretofore apparent in her nature but nevertheless wholly there, was called into life, springing in action as Diana, full formed" [210]). These alleged flaws, however, are as common in Dreiser's fiction as his various strengths, and, in that respect, this story is as typical an example of his work as one could hope to find.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Defend or attack the artistic success of this work. Pay special attention to style, dialect, and dialogue. Can you point to particularly successful and/or unsuccessful passages?
2. Compare and contrast the depiction of family life (especially the conflict between generations) in this story and in SHERWOOD ANDERSON'S "Mother." In particular, what are the functions of the fathers in both tales?
3. In her attitude toward her father, how does Theresa resemble (but also differ from) the boy in William Faulkner's "Barn Burning"? How do the fathers in the two works differ from and/or resemble each other?

The "Genius" (1915)

As Eugene Witla, the son of a salesman, grows up in Alexandria, Illinois, at the end of the 19th century, his increasing attraction to beauty leads him to a career in Chicago as a newspaper illustrator, while his increasing interest in sex leads him to involvement with one woman after another. Although he eventually marries an attractive young woman named Angela Blue, for whom he had felt a strong initial infatuation, his liaisons with other women continue as his career (now centered in New York) waxes, wanes, then waxes again. Eventually he becomes obsessed with Suzanne Dale, the beautiful and much younger daughter of a woman who is closely associated with his powerful employer; however, when Suzanne's mother becomes aware of Eugene's designs on her daughter, she uses her friendship with his employer to put Eugene's job at risk, but Witla refuses his employer's ultimatum, loses his job, breaks with his wife, soon becomes a widower, and ultimately returns to his original devotion to art.

This novel, which is obviously and highly autobiographical, caused a furor when it was first published in 1915. By the following summer the book's publisher was threatened with legal action by a New York morals group, and although the threat initially succeeded in having the book withdrawn from sale, Dreiser won the vocal support of many influential intellectuals. Some of these figures (such as H. L. Mencken) doubted the artistic value of the work, but they nevertheless championed it because of their support of free speech. Once again, then, Dreiser had made a name for himself as much for the content of a novel as for any artistic skill it possessed; he had caused another scandal, this time by writing a book that dealt so relentlessly with sex.

Aside from its blatantly erotic emphasis, however, the book is also typical of Dreiser in numerous other ways. The profession of Eugene's father, for instance, implies the industrial, commercial concerns usually found in Dreiser's fictions; his books reflect the transformation, in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, from a rural America dependent on farming to an urban America dependent on trade and industry. The Midwest setting is also typical, as is Eugene's movement first to Chicago and then to New York (a pattern also found in Sister Car- rie, as well as in Dreiser's own life). In describing the energy of Chicago, Dreiser paints his usual picture of a dynamic metropolis, but it is not long before Eugene also learns (in standard Dreiserian fashion) the importance of money in such a setting and the risks of being poor. This emphasis on the practical aspects of the struggle for survival is also typical of Dreiser, while Eugene's quick movement through a series of menial jobs not only reflects aspects of Dreiser's own early existence but also illustrates his usual depiction of the less glamorous aspects of everyday work in a competitive, capitalist America. Eugene's innate talent as an artist and his attraction toward beauty remind us of the theatrically gifted title character of Sister Carrie, while his philosophical conversations with Angela about their contrasting goals in life remind us how important ideas often are in Dreiser's fiction. When Eugene moves to New York, we see once more how, in Dreiser's writings, a huge city can seem both beautiful and intimidating, and we also see again how skillful Dreiser is in depicting the actual facts of American life in the era in which he lived, especially in his focus on New York's immigrants and its industrial economy. Eugene, meanwhile, is typical of Dreiser's main characters in his willingness to challenge traditional standards of conduct, especially where sexuality is concerned. Furthermore, Eugene also resembles Dreiser himself in his explicit interest in the Darwinian ideas of Herbert Spencer, his skepticism about the ultimate meaning of human existence, and his doubts about the institution of marriage.

Eugene's experiences as a painter in New York reflect Dreiser's own experiences as a writer in the same city: Just as Dreiser's writings caused controversy but earned him a decent living, the same is true of Eugene's paintings, and just as Dreiser's writings were often criticized for their grim portrayals of life in large cities, so the same thing happens with Eugene's art. Moreover, just as Dreiser himself suffered from psychological depression and financial failure after achieving a measure of success, so does Eugene after he returns from a trip to Europe. Here as elsewhere, then, Dreiser makes it clear that economic movement in America is very definitely a two-way street: A person can be financially successful one moment and in financial peril the next. Life in modern capitalist societies is uncertain and full of potential pitfalls; relations with other people tend to be unstable; humans are essentially isolated and alone; and their prospects for real and enduring happiness are governed far more by chance than by choice. Eugene, as do most people, acts according to certain inner compulsions he seems powerless to comprehend or control, and in acting on his drives he is willing (unlike many people) to transgress the dictates of conventional social morality. Personal freedom is a goal prized by many of Dreiser's main characters, but these characters are embedded in a complex web of social and economic relations that make it difficult for them to enjoy the kind of liberty they seek and prize. Eugene (as does Dreiser himself) seems to consider marriage in particular a kind of snare—an artificial attempt to impose limits on the sexual impulses that are among the most compelling forces of human (especially male) nature. In his final pursuit of Suzanne, Eugene learns once more (as do so many of Dreiser's other characters) that economic success and social acceptance can vanish in a flash, leaving a person, quite suddenly, both financially and emotionally needy. At the end of the novel, when Eugene sees Suzanne years after their whirlwind affair, they pass without speaking—a final example of Dreiser's typical emphasis on man's essential loneliness and alienation in a universe that is fundamentally indifferent to human happiness. No simplistic or conventional philosophy (and certainly not the Christian Science espoused by Eugene's sister as the novel closes) can make sense of the complexity and the sadness of much of human life. Only an artist like Eugene or like Dreiser, who sticks close to the facts of actual experience, can even hope to have any chance of depicting life with any kind of accuracy and honesty. This, at least, is how Dreiser would justify his own ambitions as a writer and his own achievement in this particular novel. It is also how Randolph Bourne, one of Dreiser's contemporaries, justified the book when he memorably wrote in an early review that Mr. Dreiser compels and convinces almost entirely in spite of his method. He has no distinction of style. His conversation is negligible, and at times he falls even below the level of cheapness. He is portentously wordy. He has no humor. And yet one reads him. In the 736 pages, one skips only the business and social details—which are too minute to be even good photography. One reads him because he never forgets that he is talking about life as it is lived, and because he takes it seriously. . . . He is always saved by a plodding sincerity. His people are rarely desirable or interesting. Yet they live and you cannot escape them. (245)

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast the depiction of personal ambition and of American society in this novel and in F. SCOTT FITZGERALD's The Great Gatsby. Which novel is more effective in characterization and style, and why?
2. To what degree and in what ways is Eugene a sympathetic character? Choose a specific section of the novel and discuss how and why Eugene is depicted unfavorably or favorably there.
3. Study the life of Dreiser and discuss the ways this novel reflects that life, particularly in its treatment of women. Compare and contrast the depiction of women in this book with their depictions in other works by Dreiser.
4. Compare and contrast the depiction of marriage in this novel and in ERNEST HEMINGWAY's short story "The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber." Does either work suggest a plausible alternative to marriage? What kinds of changes were occurring in the institution of marriage at the time Dreiser's novel was written?
5. Study the philosophy of Herbert Spencer (whose thinking greatly influenced Dreiser) and discuss its relevance to the themes of this novel. Choose three main ideas of Spencer and, focusing on a particular section of the novel, explain how and why they relate to Dreiser's concerns in this book.

“The Second Choice” (1918)

Shirley (last name not given) is a young woman who at first is basically content not only with her routine lower-middle-class life but also with the dull but devoted man (Barton Williams) who hopes to marry her. But then she meets Arthur Bristow, an attractive, exciting, debonair, chatty, and well-traveled businessman who introduces some excitement and romance into her otherwise humdrum existence. Shirley, smitten with Arthur, distances herself from Barton, but when Arthur moves away and indicates that he has no plans for a long-term relationship, Shirley reluctantly resigns herself to her fate: She prepares for a drab life as the likely wife of the ever-loyal but unexciting Barton.

This story opens abruptly and effectively with a letter from Arthur to Shirley in which he immediately adopts a patronizing, controlling tone as he gives her the brush-off and denies her request that he return the letters she had written to him. By the end of the second sentence he is already mentioning his “travels” (135), thus emphasizing, by contrast, Shirley’s sense of confinement, and by the middle of the second paragraph he is referring to the “great big skyscraper” visible outside his window in distant Pittsburgh, thus emphasizing (as usual) Dreiser’s characteristic themes of American urbanization, industrial growth, and commercial expansion. In this story as elsewhere in his writings, Dreiser skillfully catches the tone and rhythms of the colloquial speech of his day (particularly when the self-consciously witty Arthur is speaking), just as he also adopts, as sometimes elsewhere, an objective, distanced tone of his own in the narration. However, no philosophical disquisitions interrupt the flow of this story, as they sometimes do in Dreiser’s other works; nor does Dreiser interject his own voice conspicuously into the telling of the tale. Instead, we see everything from Shirley’s rather desperate and increasingly frustrated point of view, and Dreiser does a skillful job of conveying indirectly Shirley’s ways of thinking, feeling, and speaking.

As in many of Dreiser’s other writings, key words are repeated here to striking effect (in this case, the recurring word dull adds to our sense of the literal monotony of Shirley’s existence), and although the story ends by depicting Shirley surrounded by family and assuming her eventual marriage to Barton, it nonetheless ironically conveys her profound sense of loneliness, disappointment, failure, and defeated desire—themes all quite common in Dreiser’s writings. Despite (or rather, because of) the fact that she is left with the somewhat fawning Barton, Shirley feels like a failure (another standard motif in Dreiser’s works), and the title of the story subtly reminds us that in Dreiser’s universe very few characters have any real kind of choice, since so much depends on fate, chance, and circumstance. Characters in Dreiser often strive to “succeed” in some worldly or material sense, and they sometimes do prosper in these terms for a brief period. Usually, however, they end feeling failed and frustrated, and Shirley is no exception. Like many of Dreiser’s other characters, she is driven at least in part by a real yearning for beauty (however shallow that yearning sometimes seems), and although she seems in part the focus of some understated mockery, in other respects she seems both sympathetic and even a bit pathetic. In this story as in other works Dreiser (in the words of Claude M. Simpson, Jr.) provides “a documentation of the life of instinct and emotion” (qtd. in Elias 150); Shirley’s life is dominated by her feelings more than her intellect, and, in describing her, Dreiser displays his characteristic precision in describing reality, the mind, and the emotions. All in all, the story seems carefully plotted, skillfully written, and memorable in final effect.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast this story with Dreiser’s “Old Rogaum and His Theresa,” paying particular attention to characterization, dialogue, and style. Which story do you find more effective, and why? In particular, pay attention to the ways the characters speak.
2. Compare and contrast this story with EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON’s poem “Euros Turannos,” which also deals with an erotically frustrated woman. How are the works similar and different in style, point of view, and tone? Which of the two women is more sympathetic, and why?

3. At the end of Dreiser's novel Sister Carrie, the title character has apparently achieved success, but at the end of this story the main character apparently has failed. On a deeper level, however, how are their experiences similar?
4. Compare and contrast Shirley to the title character of T. S. ELIOT's poem "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock." How are the characters similar in their desires and final fates, but how do they also differ thanks (in part) to their different genders and social circumstances?
5. Compare and contrast the yearnings and disappointments of Shirley with those of the main character of Zora Neale Hurston's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. In particular, discuss the final fates of the two characters.

An American Tragedy* (1925)

Clyde Griffiths, whose parents are missionaries in Kansas City, works there when he is an adolescent in a large hotel, where he is exposed to the high life of money and power and where he also meets a group of friends with whom, while driving home after a party one night, he is involved first in a hit-and-run accident and then in a serious wreck as the group try to elude police. Clyde, having escaped both injury and arrest, stows away on a train and eventually winds up in Chicago, where he happens to meet a rich uncle, who offers him a job in New York State—a job that puts Clyde in contact with Roberta Alden, a fellow worker, with whom he begins a sexual relationship, although Clyde is far more interested in the rich and beautiful Sondra Finchley, who seems to promise him entry into a world of wealth and influence. However, when Roberta announces that she is pregnant and expects Clyde to marry her, he concocts a plan to get rid of her through an apparently accidental drowning—a plan he eventually rejects, only to have it come to pass, ironically, through a real accident that leads eventually to his own execution for intentional murder.

An American Tragedy is often considered Dreiser's best novel; certainly it was his most successful, and clearly it employs many of his most typical themes and stylistic techniques. The emphasis on Clyde's early poverty, for instance, is a standard feature of Dreiser's fiction, as are the initial midwestern setting and Clyde's eventual migration to New York (although here the final setting is not New York City but upstate locales). Clyde, as do many of Dreiser's central characters, starts out near the bottom of the social ladder but, through a combination of hard work and good luck, begins his ascent to prominence and "success." Indeed, the struggle for success is one of the most common of Dreiser's themes, and the same is true of Dreiser's typical focus on a young person's initiation into big-city life—an initiation that almost always involves temptations of one sort or another. It is hardly a coincidence that Clyde's departure from Kansas City involves both an automobile and a train, since both forms of transportation were symbols of the new industrial economy that was rapidly reshaping American society during (and even before) Dreiser's lifetime. Nor is it a coincidence that Clyde's first stop after he leaves his hometown is Chicago, the great midwestern metropolis that often serves, in Dreiser's fiction, as the emblem of American urbanization and as the Mecca to which countless people from all over the region (and indeed all over the world) were being drawn in hopes of better lives through better incomes and greater freedom. Often these hopes were disappointed, but Clyde, through the kind of lucky accident that is often a feature of Dreiser's fiction (and that Dreiser considered a common feature of life itself), happens to meet a rich relative who gives the youth access to a world of even greater opportunity and even greater temptation.

Clyde's journey to New York symbolizes the kind of literal and figurative mobility that was increasingly common in Dreiser's world and that is also a standard feature of Dreiser's novels. Clyde moves not only horizontally (from the Midwest to the even more powerful East) but also vertically (from menial jobs to a supervisory position and then to the possibility of real wealth and power). Both kinds of movement are common in Dreiser's books, but those books also inevitably reveal that what goes up may also come down. Before Clyde falls, however, we see him both as seducer and as seduced, and indeed seduction is another of the most common motifs in Dreiser's fiction (Elias 147). Clyde, motivated mainly by sexual appetite (one more predictable feature of Dreiser's writings because, according to Dreiser, it was a driving force in human life), sets his sights on Roberta Alden, but his willingness to engage in sex without commitment reflects not only Dreiser's own lifestyle but also the kind of erotic liberty that was increasingly common in American society and that many readers found most disturbing in Dreiser's writings. Clyde, however, not only seduces Roberta but is himself seduced by the prospect of possessing beauty, wealth, and influence through a possible relationship with Sondra Finchley. Here as in much of Dreiser's work, a character (as does much of society at large) defines success in terms of worldly prosperity rather than in terms of "moral growth, self-discovery, and awareness" (Elias 153).

Clyde's determination to avoid a forced marriage to Roberta reflects the usual tendency, in Dreiser's novels, for many characters to regard marriage as confining and bothersome. Meanwhile, Clyde's willingness, first, to seek an abortion-inducing drug, and then, second, to force Roberta to seek an abortion-providing doctor (who refuses to help them) is revealing in itself. Such behavior by Clyde exemplifies Dreiser's grim and unflinching realism in depicting life as it was actually lived in his time, when scientific and medical advances made such "solutions" more feasible than they might have seemed a century or two before. In typical Dreiserian fashion, it is only by chance or accident that Clyde stumbles across a desperate escape from his dilemma: He happens to read a newspaper article about two people who died in an accident while boating, and so he himself begins to concoct an "accidental" drowning for Roberta. To him, her pregnancy (and indeed her existence) now seems mainly a physical inconvenience to be solved in a purely mechanical fashion; in his Darwinian struggle for survival and success, she has become an impediment that needs to be removed. He therefore drives her to a distant resort, takes her out onto the lake in a small boat, and contemplates killing her. In the end he cannot bring himself to do it, but when she, sensing that he is disturbed by something, tries to touch him, he impulsively recoils and his camera accidentally hits her. Rising to help her and to say he is sorry, he unintentionally tips the boat; both lose their balance; both fall into the water; Roberta is struck on the head by the boat; and, as she calls for help, confused thoughts race through Clyde's tortured mind:

"But this—this—is not this that which you have been thinking and wishing for this while—you in your great need? And behold! For despite your fear, your cowardice, this—this—has been done for you. An accident—an accident—an unintentional blow on your part is now saving you the labor of what you sought, and yet did not have the courage to do! But will you now, and when you need not, since it is an accident, by going to her rescue, once more plunge yourself in the horror of that defeat and failure which has so tortured you and from which this now releases you? You might save her. But again you might not! For see how she strikes about. She is stunned. She herself is unable to save herself and by her erratic terror, if you draw near her now, may bring about your own death also. But you desire to live! And her living will make your life not worth while from now on. Rest but a moment—a fraction of a minute! Wait—wait—ignore the pity of that appeal. And then—then—But there! Behold. It is over. She is sinking now. You will never, never see her alive any more—ever. And there is your own hat upon the water—as you wished. And upon the boat, clinging to that rowlock a veil belonging to her. Leave it. Will it not show that this was an accident?" (531–532)

It would be hard to imagine a scene more typical of Dreiser or more characteristic of his view of the way the universe operates. In the end, Clyde's ambiguous intentions count for little; chance reigns supreme; and, just as in Sister Carrie George Hurstwood thinks about stealing, decides not to, but then does so after he accidentally locks money outside a safe, so in this book Clyde plans to kill, decides not to, and then witnesses his plan succeed almost in spite of himself. In a reasonable universe—in a universe that made moral and logical sense—events like these could not happen, but that is not the kind of universe Dreiser thought existed. Just as Clyde began his path to success through an accidental encounter with a rich uncle, so he begins his path to execution through the accidental tipping of a boat. In Dreiser's world, nothing is stable for long, and luck can be both good and bad.

The paragraph just quoted is also worth discussing for its stylistic features. The prose is more dramatic and compelling than much of Dreiser's writing, which can often be dry, clinically factual, and crammed with excessive detail. Here, though, the detail is effectively mental and emotional: Dreiser is not describing the appearance of a room or the exterior of a building but the second-by-second evolution of a person thinking and feeling under intense strain and pressure. The passage thus illustrates what has been called Dreiser's "exactitude in the use of . . . psychological details" (Elias 157), and it also illustrates his frequent emphasis on repetition (particularly in the simple but emphatic word this) as well as his admiration for a style that could be brusque, raw, powerful, and unadorned. Sometimes the phrasing here, as often in Dreiser, seems mannered or hackneyed ("And behold!"), but for the most part it is vivid, gripping, and full of irony, as in Clyde's legitimate fear that if he tries to save Roberta, they both may die. Indeed, from this point on, the novel spirals ever-downward into ever-darkening irony. Irony upon irony: That is life as Dreiser often saw it. Roberta's body is discovered; papers in her room connect her to Clyde; her imploring letters to Clyde—about the baby and marriage—are found; and Clyde is arrested and charged with deliberate murder. The wealthy, influential friends, whom Clyde had sought to impress, quickly distance themselves from him, and he is convicted of a death he wanted but did not want, a death he caused but did not cause.

Critical and scholarly response to An American Tragedy has been extensive and varied. A number of scholars have focused, for instance, on "the extent of Dreiser's dependence on court records" of the trial and conviction of Chester Gillette, whose killing of Grace Brown in 1906 provided the model for the basic plot of Dreiser's novel (Elias 152–153, 174–175). Dreiser drew extensively on newspaper accounts of the trial; sometimes the parallels between the phrasing of those accounts and the phrasing in his book are almost exact. Nevertheless, the consensus of opinion is that Dreiser heightened and transformed the basic facts of the Gillette trial. H. L. Mencken, for instance, in his introduction to a 1948 edition of the novel, argued that the concluding sections of the book, including the trial scenes, "have in them all the plausibility that made Sister Carrie a memorable event in American letters. To be sure, they stick close to the record—but surely not over-close. It is Dreiser who is telling the story, not some commonplace reporter. [The novel] offers a picture of profound tragedy seen through a suitable melancholy temperament. . . . It is not only a minutely detailed picture of one unhappy young man's life; it is a commentary upon human life in general" (11). Indeed, scholars have also studied the ways Dreiser worked many details from his own youth into the book, and, according to Mencken, the novel reflects Dreiser's own outlook on life at the time—an outlook that saw existence as "predominantly hopeless and meaningless" (12).

In addition to discussing the roots of the book in "real life" (whether the life of Gillette, Dreiser, or American society in general), scholars have discussed its themes, structure, and techniques as well as its artistic merit. They have studied, for instance, its use of wordplay and parallels (including parallel characters and scenes) and especially have debated whether or not its prose is successful (Elias 154). Critics have also discussed the relation of Dreiser's novel to past works (such as Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment, Emile Zola's Thérèse Raquin, or T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land) and to the modern novels that followed it, and they have commented on the two filmed versions the book inspired (Elias 155; West 140–141, 147–148, 151–152). Commentators have also discussed the way Clyde's attitudes and responses were shaped by the society in which he was raised as well as the way his behavior reflects

7. Both An American Tragedy and Sister Carrie have been made into films. Compare and contrast one of the books with its film adaptation(s), particularly in terms of storytelling technique and methods of characterization.
8. Explore the meaning of the term naturalism in literature and discuss the ways in which Dreiser is and is not a “naturalist.” Point to a specific passage in one of his works and describe in detail how it is influenced by naturalism.
9. Compare and contrast the theme, style, and main characters of Sister Carrie and Kate Chopin’s The Awakening. In particular, discuss the conclusions of these two works and the ultimate fates of the two main characters. What do the novels imply about the lives of women during their authors’ eras?
10. Track down H. L. Mencken’s various writings on Dreiser and discuss the reasons why Mencken both championed Dreiser and sometimes criticized his writings. Which author was himself the better stylist? Compare and contrast passages from their works to substantiate your claims.

W. E. B. DuBois (1868–1963)

(“Of the Dawn of Freedom”)

William Edward Burghardt DuBois, one of the most important African-American writers and political figures, was born on February 23, 1868, in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, to Alfred DuBois and Mary Silvina Burghardt. The couple had married in 1867 despite opposition from Mary’s family, and, when Alfred shortly relocated to Connecticut, Mary declined his invitation to follow him there. Alfred stayed apart from his wife and child and in fact may have passed away in 1870; in any case, young William was raised mainly by his mother (who was employed to do housework) and never really knew his father. Nevertheless, he thrived in elementary school and enjoyed much standard boyhood fun, although his life changed for the worse when a stroke in 1879 left his mother partially handicapped. Although DuBois and his mother never had much money, as an adolescent he earned extra income by doing various odd jobs, all the while working hard in high school, reading widely, and taking part in many physical activities and sports. By 1883 he had begun writing not only for his high school newspaper but also for newspapers in Great Barrington and New York, and he had begun to identify more strongly with the broader African-American community. In 1884 he was the only black member of his small high school graduating class, and, although he hoped someday to attend Harvard, he temporarily had to defer that dream because of concerns about his mother’s circumstances, worries about his own finances, and uncertainties about his likelihood of academic success. However, when his mother died in 1885, local churches and their ministers collected funds that helped DuBois enter the recently founded Fisk University, a black college in Nashville, Tennessee. Although a bout with fever nearly killed him during his first months there, he eventually recovered and soon became strongly involved in many aspects of college life, taking courses in languages, literature, philosophy, and science. He twice served as a schoolteacher in rural Tennessee during his summers at Fisk while also cultivating his interests both in classical European music and in the native music of his fellow black Americans.

After receiving his bachelor’s degree from Fisk in 1888, he was finally able to attend Harvard, which he entered as a junior with assistance from a grant and a later scholarship. Although his relations with his fellow (mostly white) students were somewhat distant, he studied with some major scholars, including the philosophers William James and George Santayana, all the while earning spending money by doing various jobs, by speaking to local religious groups, and by writing for a black newspaper. In 1890 he won a prize for public speaking and received his Harvard B.A. with a degree in philosophy. A speech on Jefferson Davis won national notice; a small bequest from his grandfather’s estate helped his finances, but perhaps the major event of this period was his acceptance into the graduate program in political science at Harvard, which twice awarded him fellowships. Although initially frustrated by disappointments in his efforts to find support for further study, in 1891 he nevertheless was awarded a master's degree from Harvard, and then, in 1892, he received enough funding to permit him to study in Germany and travel throughout Europe. Returning to the United States without having received his doctorate, he applied for a number of jobs at black American colleges and was eventually hired to teach classical and modern languages at Wilberforce University in Xenia, Ohio. Although DuBois grew increasingly unhappy there, it was at Wilberforce that he met Nina Gomer, whom he married in 1896, shortly after receiving his doctorate from Harvard in 1895—the first African American to attain that distinction. His doctoral dissertation, a study of the suppression of the African slave trade, was published in book form in 1896, the same year DuBois was hired by the University of Pennsylvania to undertake a major sociological study of the African-American population of Philadelphia.

By 1897 DuBois had become affiliated with Atlanta University, a black college with which he would be connected, off and on, for much of the rest of his life. He was becoming increasingly prominent as an African-American scholar and intellectual, focusing especially on sociological research and publications and studying numerous aspects of black American life. In 1899 his study The Philadelphia Negro was published by the University of Pennsylvania; however, this satisfying achievement was counterbalanced by the early death of his first son, who had been born in 1897. While living in the South, DuBois became increasingly repulsed by his experiences with segregation and discrimination, which he always resisted; partly as a result of his encounters with such prejudice, his journalism, then and later, became more and more politically outspoken. By 1900 he was active in legislative and legal efforts to oppose discrimination, and in the same year he received recognition in Europe (where he was traveling) for his scholarly work and political advocacy. Later that year, he also welcomed the birth of his daughter, Yolande. By 1902 he was more and more disenchanted with the leadership of BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, the most prominent African-American spokesman in the country, who emphasized economic progress (rather than full civil and political rights) and who stressed the need for vocational training for blacks. DuBois, in contrast, advocated broader political advancement and emphasized the need to train the most gifted black students in the same ways the best white students were trained, exposing them to the broadest possible education. His expression of these and other views in his significant book The Souls of Black Folk (1903) gained him broad national attention and established him both as one of the most eloquent spokesmen of his people and as a challenger to Washington's leadership.

Despite attempts in 1904 to collaborate with Washington, DuBois increasingly set an independent course, even accusing his rival in 1905 of attempting to suppress opposition in the black press. In that same year DuBois was himself voted leader of a newly formed organization to advocate full rights for blacks, and in 1906, responding to white-on-black violence in Atlanta, he even took up arms to defend his own home. His devotion to scholarship, journalism, and politics continued during 1907 and 1908 and culminated in the publication in 1909 of John Brown, a biography of the notorious antebellum abolitionist. In 1910 he assumed a prominent position in the newly formed National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), an organization run mostly by white liberals that nevertheless soon became one of the most important civil rights groups in the country. DuBois moved to New York to establish, edit, and contribute to the organization's monthly journal, the Crisis, although he quickly entered into conflict with other leaders of the organization because of his political assertiveness and general independence. By 1911 he had published his first novel, The Quest of the Silver Fleece, while also building the circulation of the NAACP's magazine and continuing his conflict with Washington. Increasingly seen as a prominent national spokesman for his race, he was now also rising to greater influence within the NAACP itself, although his talent for stirring up controversy (even or especially within the black community) remained unabated. In 1915 his historical study The Negro was published, and in the same year the feud between DuBois and Washington ended with the latter's death.

By this point the main patterns of DuBois's life had become established. He was a successful editor, a prominent political advocate, a controversial figure both within and outside the African-American community, a prolific journalist, and a hands-on civic organizer. He took strong positions on disputed issues (so much so that he was actually threatened with prosecution in 1918 for attacking racism in the armed forces), although he also sometimes was criticized for being too accommodating to white interests. Shortly after the end of World War I he traveled once more to Europe, where he took a leading position in 1919 in the first Pan-African Congress while also continuing his advocacy on behalf of African-American soldiers—advocacy for which he was attacked in Congress. Darkwater: Voices from within the Veil (a collection of essays published in 1920) provoked further attention and attacks, while in 1921 DuBois gained further prominence at a new meeting in Europe designed to oppose colonialism in Africa. Back home, in 1922, he opposed lynching, continued the challenge (which had begun a few years earlier) to the leadership of the black separatist Marcus Garvey, and, in 1923, made his first trip to Africa. In 1924 he published The Gift of Black Folk: The Negroes in the Making of America, and he also participated in opposition to the current president of Fisk University, his alma mater. By 1925 and 1926 he had become involved, in various ways, in the Harlem Renaissance (a significant cultural movement among blacks), and in the latter year he also visited the Soviet Union, at that time the center of international communism. On his return to the United States he praised the Soviet government, which then was less than a decade old.

During the ensuing years and decades, DuBois remained constantly busy as a writer, editor, and political activist, and even an occasional political candidate. His novel Dark Princess: A Romance appeared in 1929, and his historical monograph Black Reconstruction was published in 1935. In 1939 Black Folk, Then and Now was issued, and in the following year his autobiography, Dusk of Dawn, was printed. In 1944 he became the first African-American member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and in 1945 he published not only the first volume of a long-planned Encyclopedia of the Negro but also a political work called Color and Democracy: Colonies and Peace. In 1947 he edited a book-length collection of essays (titled An Appeal to the World) on behalf of American blacks. Meanwhile, in 1948 his often rocky, on-again-off-again relationship with the NAACP finally ended when a memo by DuBois criticizing the organization's director was published in the national press. By this point, however, DuBois had also moved much further left than many other members of the NAACP could readily accept. His involvement with organizations sympathetic to communism and the Soviet Union had also become increasingly prominent and led to much subsequent conflict with the U.S. government. After DuBois's first wife died in 1950, he married Shirley Graham in 1951 at a time when he was facing indictment for his involvement in alleged communist-front organizations, although a judge later found him innocent of these charges. His book about this experience, In Battle for Peace, was published in 1952, and his involvement with communist-oriented groups and ideas continued and even deepened. Not all of his writings, however, were narrowly political: In 1957 he published The Ordeal of Mansart, the first of three historical novels, which was followed in 1959 by Mansart Builds a School and in 1961 by Worlds of Color. By this point DuBois was in his 90s, and, although respected by many, was also a figure of great controversy. He now identified so strongly with communism, for instance, that he actually joined the American Communist Party in 1961 after years of traveling (despite the wishes of the U.S. government) in communist countries as well as in Europe and Africa. In Africa, indeed, he was considered a kind of father figure in many countries that had recently won their independence from colonialism. Thus it was no great surprise when, in 1963, he chose to become a citizen of Ghana, where he died on August 27, in his 95th year.

The Philadelphia Negro* (1899)

The Philadelphia Negro is a massive sociological and historical study outlining the conditions of African-American life in Pennsylvania's largest city at the end of the 19th century. The study was commissioned by the University of Pennsylvania, which had been approached by a group of prominent (mostly white) citizens who were concerned about the widespread conditions of poverty, crime, alcoholism, and illness among the city's blacks. By interviewing thousands of black citizens, studying nearly every relevant social institution, and compiling an extraordinary number of statistics, DuBois hoped to provide solid data that could be used to improve not only the lives of the city's blacks but also the social health of the municipality in general.

In an introduction to the book, Samuel McCune Lindsay, writing on behalf of the university, described how DuBois devoted all of his time to systematic field-work among the Negroes, especially in the Seventh Ward, attending their meetings, their churches, their business, social and political gatherings, visiting their schools and institutions, and, most important of all, conducting a house-to-house visitation in their families, through which he came in personal contact with over ten thousand Negro inhabitants of the city. (vii)

Writing 40 years after the publication of his landmark study, DuBois himself recounted his thinking at the time the work was undertaken: "The Negro problem was in my mind a matter of systematic investigation and intelligent understanding. The world was thinking wrong about race, because it did not know. The ultimate evil was stupidity. The cure for it was knowledge based on scientific investigation" (Writings 596). Although he later expressed skepticism about the motives of the study's backers as well as frustration with his own lowly status at the university (Writings 596), he threw himself into his work with passionate commitment, collecting nearly all the data himself and producing, in the end, a report almost 400 pages in length—a work that is full of graphs, charts, maps, and tables but one that is also characterized by its clear style, relentless logic, and frequent eloquence and passion. DuBois does not hesitate to criticize blacks for self-destructive behavior, but he makes it obvious that most of their problems have resulted from their history of oppression and the current climate of pervasive discrimination constantly confronting them. His tone is always rational and measured; he constantly strives to see the complexities in every situation he studies and to reject simplistic explanations. He is careful to study the background that helped create any contemporary problem, and his focus is always on practical, realistic solutions to any problem he describes. In every case the solutions he proposes involve changes in the behavior and attitudes of both blacks and whites, and he lays a special obligation on better-educated blacks to assist the struggling masses.

As the study reaches its final pages, DuBois becomes more and more outspoken about the ways racial prejudice has not only crippled the lives and spirits of black Philadelphians but also has harmed the city as a whole. At one point, for instance, he argues that the class of Negroes which the prejudices of the city have distinctly encouraged is that of the criminal, the lazy and the shiftless; for them the city teems with institutions and charities; for them there is succour and sympathy; for them Philadelphians are thinking and planning; but for the educated and industrious young colored man who wants work and not platitudes, wages and not alms, just rewards and not sermons—for such colored men Philadelphia apparently has no use. (352)

Later, in his final chapter, DuBois offers "a few plain propositions [that] may be laid down as axiomatic":

1. The Negro is here to stay.
2. It is to the advantage of all, both black and white, that every Negro should make the best of himself.
3. It is the duty of the Negro to raise himself by every effort to the standards of modern civilization and not to lower those standards in any degree.
4. It is the duty of the white people to guard their civilization against debauchment by themselves and others; but in order to do this it is not necessary to hinder and retard the efforts of an earnest people to rise, simply because they lack faith in the ability of that people.
5. With these duties in mind and with a spirit of self-help, mutual aid and co-operation, the two races should strive side by side to realize the ideals of the republic and make this truly a land of equal opportunity for all men. (388–389)

Later in the same chapter DuBois condemns racial discrimination as “morally wrong, politically dangerous, industrially wasteful, and socially silly,” and he insists that it “is the duty of whites to stop it, and to do so primarily for their own sakes” (394). Racial prejudice, he concludes, “is a disgrace to the city—a disgrace to its Christianity, to its spirit of justice, [and] to its common sense,” and he concludes by asking:

what can be the end of such a policy but increased crime and increased excuse for crime? Increased poverty and more reason to be poor? Increased political serfdom of the mass of black voters to the bosses and rascals who divide the spoils? Surely here [in the ending of prejudice] lies the first duty of a civilized city. (396)

As the quoted passages show, The Philadelphia Negro is not a turgid exercise in boring sociological jargon; it is, instead, a constantly interesting, consistently illuminating, and frequently eloquent example of nonfiction prose at its best. Social scientists consider it a landmark study, and surely it is one of the earliest and most detailed examinations of the actual lives of black Americans ever undertaken. Whatever the motives of the group that commissioned it, they received from DuBois a classic that remains as intriguing today as it was when it first appeared in print.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast The Philadelphia Negro with chapter 5 (on the city of Atlanta) of The Souls of Black Folk. How (at least according to DuBois) are the two cities comparable in their remote histories, present challenges, and potentials for future development? What role does education play in DuBois's hopes for both places?
2. Compare and contrast DuBois's depiction of the conditions of blacks in Philadelphia at the turn of the 20th century with RICHARD WRIGHT's depiction of the condition of blacks in Chicago in the 1930s in his novel Native Son. How do the books present such issues as poverty, crime, racism, and rebellion?
3. Compare and contrast The Philadelphia Negro with JACK LONDON's 1903 study of poverty in England's capital city, The People of the Abyss. Discuss the ways both authors prepared to write their books, the conditions they described, the tones they adopted, and the solutions they proposed.

The Souls of Black Folk* (1903)

The Souls of Black Folk, which consists of 14 chapters sandwiched between a brief “Forethought” and an even briefer “Afterthought,” is widely considered DuBois's most important work; certainly it has been one of his most influential. First issued in 1903, it consists of nine revisions of previously published pieces, along with five wholly new sections. Diverse in topics, methods, approaches, and styles, the work is held together by DuBois's insistence in its very first paragraph that “the problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of the color-line” (Writings 359). By exploring so many different issues in such various ways, DuBois offers not only a complex picture of African-American life at the turn of the 20th century but also a comprehensive sense of his own interests, passions, personality, and stylistic skills.

One distinctive feature of the book—and a key source of unity—is the appearance of brief musical quotations at the beginning of each chapter. These bars of music are taken from the “sorrow songs” (or spirituals) that DuBois considered not only one of the great achievements of African-American creativity but also one of the great glories of American culture in general. Often these pieces of music are juxtaposed with quotations from famous European or American poets, thus implying DuBois’s larger belief in the fruitful interaction of people of goodwill from diverse racial and national backgrounds; he himself was a man of wide cultural training and interests, and that fact is everywhere implied and demonstrated in this book. He was at heart a humanist who wanted his own people to be full participants in the greater development of humanity; he could not comprehend why the potential contributions of such a large, vital, and valuable segment of mankind would be suppressed or ignored.

The opening chapter, titled “Of Our Spiritual Strivings,” begins on a frankly personal note. DuBois describes how it feels to be treated as a living representative of a social “problem”—the problem of blacks in contemporary America (Writings 363). He recalls the day when, as a boy, he first became aware that he differed from his white playmates. The boys and girls used to exchange “gorgeous visiting-cards—ten cents a package,” and the exchanges were “merry, till one girl, a tall newcomer, refused my card—refused it peremptorily, with a glance. Then it dawned on me with a certain suddenness that I was different from the others; or like, mayhap, in heart and life and longing, but shut out from their world by a vast veil” (Writings 364). This passage typifies DuBois’s style in various ways, not only in its often elevated diction (“peremptorily,” “mayhap”) and in its equally frequent plainness and urgency (“heart and life and longing”) but also in its emphasis on the metaphor of the veil—an image DuBois emphasizes repeatedly to describe the pervasive separation of blacks from whites. Indeed, the recurring image of the veil helps lend the volume much of its thematic unity.

Another key term introduced in the opening chapter is double consciousness—the tendency of American blacks to see themselves as perceived by whites. DuBois describes it as a “sense of always looking at one’s self through the eyes of others, of measuring one’s soul by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity. One ever feels his two-ness,—an American, a Negro; two souls, two thoughts, two unreconciled strivings; two warring ideals in one dark body, whose dogged strength alone keeps it from being torn asunder” (Writings 364–365). In an especially significant paragraph, DuBois writes that

The history of the American Negro is the history of this strife,—this longing to attain self-conscious manhood, to merge his double self into a better and truer self. In this merging he wishes neither of the older selves to be lost. He would not Africanize America, for America has too much to teach the world and Africa. He would not bleach his Negro soul in a flood of white Americanism, for he knows that Negro blood has a message for the world. He simply wishes to make it possible for a man to be both a Negro and an American, without being cursed and spit upon by his fellows, without having the doors of Opportunity closed roughly in his face. (Writings 365)

In the rest of the volume, DuBois eloquently describes the various obstacles to this kind of merging, and in the process he examines the shortcomings of both whites and blacks while also suggesting the potential each race possesses to attain, individually and through cooperation, the best humanistic ideals.

In his second chapter (“Of the Dawn of Freedom”), DuBois operates mainly as a historian, seeking to study the period “from 1861 to 1872 so far as it relates to the American Negro” (Writings 372). He details the many practical difficulties facing the newly freed slaves and the haphazard bureaucracy set up to administer their affairs. One paragraph, in particular, outlines his key arguments:

Such was the dawn of Freedom; such was the work of the Freedmen's Bureau, which, summed up in brief, may be epitomized thus: For some fifteen million dollars, beside the sums spent before 1865, and the dole of benevolent societies, this Bureau set going a system of free labor, established a beginning of peasant proprietorship, secured the recognition of black freedmen before courts of law, and founded the free common school in the South. On the other hand, it failed to begin the establishment of good-will between ex-masters and freedmen, to guard its work wholly from paternalistic methods which discouraged self-reliance, and to carry out to any considerable extent its implied promises to furnish the freedmen with land. Its successes were the result of hard work, supplemented by the aid of philanthropists and the eager striving of black men. Its failures were the result of bad local agents, the inherent difficulties of the work, and national neglect. (Writings 387)

Here as elsewhere, DuBois strives for—and achieves—a balanced assessment that implies his own reason, honesty, and fairness. All these traits contribute to the persuasiveness of his analysis.

Perhaps the most notable of all the book's chapters is the third, titled "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others." Washington was the most famous black leader of his day. As the founder of the Tuskegee Institute, he was widely hailed as a champion of racial progress; his emphasis on practical economic training for blacks won the admiration and cooperation of many influential whites throughout the nation, while his tendency to de-emphasize the immediate attainment of full political rights for African Americans made him acceptable to many whites in the South. DuBois summarizes Washington's stance as a "programme of industrial education, conciliation of the South, and submission and silence as to civil and political rights" (Writings 392)—a program DuBois could not embrace. He felt that Washington's ideas had led not only to an erosion of voting rights for blacks but also to the "legal creation of a distinct status of civil inferiority for the Negro" as well as to the "steady withdrawal of aid from institutions for the higher training of the Negro" (Writings 399). DuBois, by contrast, spoke for many other blacks in insisting on (1) "The right to vote," (2) "Civic equality," and (3) "The education of youth according to ability" (Writings 400). He argues that Washington's "doctrine has tended to make the whites, North and South, shift the burden of the Negro problem to the Negro's shoulders and stand aside as critical and rather pessimistic spectators, when in fact the burden belongs to the nation, and the hands of none of us are clean if we bend not our energies to righting these great wrongs" (Writings 403). In so directly challenging Washington's ideas and leadership, DuBois strongly established his own status as an emerging black spokesman.

Chapter 4 ("Of the Meaning of Progress") recounts DuBois's own experiences, during his time at Fisk, as a volunteer schoolteacher in impoverished rural areas. He describes, for instance, the apparently enthusiastic welcome he received from a white commissioner of education, who invited him to stay for dinner: "'Oh,' thought I, 'this is lucky'; but even then fell the awful shadow of the Veil, for they ate first—and then I, alone" (Writings 407). With a novelist's touch, he vividly describes the different personalities he met among his isolated black students. He is careful not to romanticize the people he encountered or the conditions they endured, yet it is clear that he was deeply affected by his contact with these people, who shared his racial background but whose living conditions differed so greatly from the ones he had known in his youth. At one point he notes, "I have called my tiny community a world, and so its isolation made it; and yet there was among us but a half-awakened common consciousness, sprung from common joy and grief, at burial, birth, or wedding; from a common hardship in poverty, poor land, and low wages; and, above all, from the sight of the Veil that hung between us and Opportunity" (Writings 410). When DuBois returns to the "tiny community” 10 years later, his tone becomes movingly elegiac as he describes the bleak changes that have occurred in the interim.

Chapter 5 is partly a meditation on the growing city of Atlanta but partly also a lamentation on what Atlanta, like America at large, was coming to represent, with its growing emphasis on materialism and “a lust for gold” (Writings 419). In contrast, DuBois celebrates the ideal of a true university, which should be designed to pursue “one goal—not to earn meat, but to know the end and aim of that life which meat nourishes” (Writings 420). He extols the liberal arts, but he simultaneously asserts that a liberal education is not for everyone. DuBois believed in equal opportunity but not in equal abilities, equal orientations, or in necessarily equal outcomes. In some ways he was an elitist, as when he notes that the founders of many of the nation’s first black colleges forgot the rule of inequality:—that of the million black youth, some were fitted to know and some to dig; that some had the talent and capacity of university men, and some the talent and capacity of blacksmiths; and that true training meant neither that all should be college men nor all artisans, but that the one should be made a missionary of culture to an untaught people, and the other a free workman among serfs. And to seek to make the blacksmith a scholar is almost as silly as the more modern one of making the scholar a blacksmith; almost, but not quite. (Writings 421)

The object of the satire here is obviously Booker T. Washington, who (according to DuBois) had failed to address actual complexities, offering instead a simplistic solution to a complicated problem.

Chapter 6 continues the focus on education. Titled “Of the Training of Black Men,” it argues that human problems (such as racism) “can be met in but one way—by the breadth and broadening of human reason, by catholicity of taste and culture” (Writings 425). DuBois traces the history of education in the South since the Civil War, and he reiterates themes already sounded, such as his skepticism about mere vocational training for all blacks and his doubts about the overemphasis on materialism in contemporary American culture (Writings 428). His elitism is also once more evident when he argues that “Progress in human affairs is more often a pull than a push, surging forward of the exceptional man, and the lifting of his duller brethren slowly and painfully to his vantage-ground” (Writings 429). He argues eloquently that both the South and the nation will benefit from a better-educated black population (Writings 436), and he insists that the “function of the Negro college . . . is clear: it must maintain the standards of popular education, it must seek the social regeneration of the Negro, and it must help in the solution of problems of race contact and co-operation” (Writings 437).

In chapter 7, “Of the Black Belt,” DuBois describes the life of African Americans living in a part of the South known for its rich black soil, where slaves were transplanted in great numbers to pick cotton. Part-travelogue, part-history, part-sociological study, the chapter describes the land and its people and the transformations that have occurred both since the Civil War. In chapter 8, “Of the Quest of the Golden Fleece,” he maintains his emphasis on the Black Belt, focusing especially on its chief crop and the unfortunate social conditions the cotton economy has bred. Chapter 9, “Of the Sons of Master and Man,” argues that it is “the strife of all honourable men of the twentieth century to see that in the future competition of races the survival of the fittest shall mean the triumph of the good, the beautiful, and the true; that we may be able to preserve for future civilization all that is really fine and noble and strong, and not continue to put a premium on greed and impudence and cruelty” (Writings 476). He particularly advocates the right of blacks to vote (Writings 481) and laments the continuing social separation of the races. In chapter 10 (“Of the Faith of the Fathers”) he discusses the nature of black religious life and especially the social importance of black preachers, and he laments the growth of two opposed groups of blacks (“the first tending toward radicalism, the other toward hypocritical compromise” [Writings 503]), with neither group representing any true hope for the future of the race. Once more DuBois both represents and advocates a more complex position in opposition to allegedly simplistic alternatives.

Chapter 11 (“Of the Passing of the First-Born”) is the book’s most personal section, recounting the birth and early death of DuBois’s infant son. The father’s sadness at this loss is mitigated by his realization that the boy, by dying so young, has at least escaped the suffering he would have experienced growing up in a racist society—a society dominated by “the Veil” (Writings 510). However, whereas chapter 11 pays tribute to a young boy, chapter 12 (“Of Alexander Crummell”) celebrates an old man (also dead at the time the book was published), whose example as an intellectual and man had inspired DuBois, especially because of Crummell’s refusal to submit to the temptations of hate, despair, and doubt (Writings 512). DuBois extols Crummell’s dignity in the face of attempted humiliations and laments the fact that he was not better known or more highly valued. Chapter 13 (“Of the Coming of John”) is essentially a short story about two boys, playmates in a small southern town, who grow up and leave home to attend northern colleges. Both, ironically, become estranged, not only from each other but also from their own people, and when by chance they meet again, the results are tragic. Finally, in chapter 14 (“The Sorrow Songs”), DuBois turns from his own fiction to the musical poetry of his race, arguing that “by fateful chance the Negro folk-song—the rhythmic cry of the slave—stands today not simply as the sole American music, but as the most beautiful expression of human experience born this side of the seas” (Writings 536–537).

By the end of the book, then, the reader has confronted a wide swath of African-American history, personalities, experience, and culture, but the reader has also encountered one of that culture’s finest minds. The book’s unity results not only from its recurring themes (such as education) or images (such as “the Veil”) but also from DuBois’s sense and sensibility: His portrait of his people is inevitably also a portrait of himself. The book implicitly refutes the racist notion that blacks could not compete intellectually with whites, just as it also implicitly rejects the idea that solutions to the race problem would be easy or simple. DuBois’s tone is alternately analytical and impassioned, indignant and calm, touching and sarcastic. He criticizes both blacks and whites, but he also is willing to reason or debate with anyone open to hard facts and fresh ideas. His faith in reason and his commitment to humanism are indeed among his most consistent traits, and for all the ugliness his book describes, he remains hopeful for the entire human race if it honestly is willing to confront “the problem of the color-line.”

For Discussion or Writing

1. Discuss the ordering of chapters in The Souls of Black Folk. Can you see any logic in the way the chapters are arranged? How do the chapters “play off” each other, one chapter complicating or reinforcing the section preceding or following it? How, for instance, are chapters 11 and 12 related? What connections can be drawn between chapters 1 and 14?
2. Compare and contrast chapter 3 of this book with the speech by Booker T. Washington called the “Atlanta Compromise Speech” (or the “Atlanta Exposition Address”). On what precise points do the two men differ? Are there any points of agreement? Which aspects of each argument do you find most persuasive or least persuasive, and why?
3. Examine the quotations that head each chapter of The Souls of Black Folk, and then discuss the particular relevance of those quotations to the chapters they preface. How, for instance, is the quotation from Byron that precedes chapter 3 relevant to DuBois’s response to Booker T. Washington? How is the quotation from Whitier relevant to the argument of chapter 5?
4. Compare and contrast DuBois’s chapter 11 and Ben Jonson’s poem “On My First Son.” Discuss the hopes the fathers had for their sons, the ways the mothers are presented in both works, and the ways both fathers come to terms with the deaths of their sons.
5. Choose one chapter from The Souls of Black Folk and discuss the various ways in which DuBois tries to make his arguments appealing and persuasive. How does he use appeals to emotion? How does he use appeals to reason? How does he use plain language? How does he employ elevated diction?

“The Song of the Smoke” (1907)

In this four-stanza lyric poem, the voice of the black “Smoke King” proclaims its attributes and actions in strongly rhythmic, heavily repetitious, and highly alliterative phrasing. First published in the magazine Horizon in February 1907, the work is one of DuBois’s few poems. Although it is frequently reprinted, it has not been analyzed very often in much detail, perhaps because its language and meaning sometimes seem somewhat opaque.

The tone of the poem is emphatic and assertive: the word I (or I’m) is its most frequently used term, and often it wins extra emphasis by being placed at the beginning of each line. Clearly the work is an assertion of pride in being black; it stresses the power of the black smoke as well as its sheer active dynamism: Verbs are heavily emphasized, especially in the present progressive tense (which implies an action that is happening at the same time the statement is written, as in “I am swinging,” “I am wringing” [ll. 3–4]). Even the adjectives often imply action, as in the use of such words as throbbing (l. 5), trading (l. 7), and toiling (l. 17). The overall effect is to give the poem a sense of enormous energy; it is easy to imagine how this “song” could indeed be set to music with a pounding, impulsive beat. Just as smoke is in constant movement, so is this poem.

Paradoxically, DuBois’s lyric is both highly structured and extremely flexible. All stanzas begin and end in the same way, and the same basic patterns of grammar, sentence structure, and rhyme are constantly repeated. The poem’s shape on the page is highly regular yet constantly alternating, particularly in its use of patterned indentations. All stanzas have the same number of lines; usually the first syllable of each line is strongly accented; and the rhyme scheme is highly regular: abccdddeeab.

In addition, another trait contributing to a sense of predictable order is the poem’s characteristic use of alliteration (as in the references to “wringing worlds awry” [l. 4] and to “the thought of the throbbing mills” [l. 5]). In all these ways, then, the work seems tightly organized. On the other hand, standing within and against all these ordered regularities is the poem’s phrasing, which is often unpredictable and even (sometimes) seemingly impenetrable. A reader never knows for sure what new claim the poem will make about the “Smoke King” (or even quite what is meant by that phrase itself), and thus the poem is both highly regular (in sound, shape, grammar, rhyme, and sentence structure) and yet also frequently mystifying. Like smoke itself, then, the poem seems both patterned and unstable.

Lines 3–5, for instance, are clear enough in grammar and sense, but the meaning of line 6 is less obvious: What, precisely, does DuBois mean by “soul-toil kills”? Without the hyphen, the phrase would make perfect sense; with the hyphen, it seems unclear. The meaning (and relevance) of lines 14–15 is also not immediately obvious, and in general the poem proceeds in a fashion that inspires questions rather than providing answers. DuBois seems to be dealing with the two concerns that chiefly interested him as a black socialist: race and industrial capitalism. An emphasis on the grimy aspects of capitalism seems implied, for instance, in such phrases as “throbbing mills” (l. 5), “trading rills” (l. 7), “iron times” (l. 16), “the toil of toiling climes” (l. 17), “grimy hands” (l. 41), “toiling lands” (l. 42), and perhaps even “the blood of bloodless crimes” (l. 18), especially if that phrase can be interpreted as referring to the exploitation of laborers. Meanwhile, the emphasis on race seems especially prominent in stanzas 3 and 4, especially in lines 28–29 and 39–40. Finally, references or allusions to God seem to occur in every single stanza (especially in lines 9, 20, 30, and 42), perhaps implying a higher standard by which racism and capitalist exploitation can be judged and possibly even punished.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Read DuBois’s discussion of “The Sorrow Songs” (chapter 14 of The Souls of Black Folk), and then discuss how “The Song of the Smoke” is comparable to those songs in its themes, techniques, and impact.

2. Discuss some of the specific phrases of this poem and try to relate them to the work's larger meaning. What, for instance, do you think DuBois means when he says that smoke is “wringing worlds awry” (l. 4)? What do you think he means when he writes that smoke is “hearsing hearts unborn” (l. 37)?

The Quest of the Silver Fleece* (1911)

Blessed (Bles) Alwyn is a boy on his way to attend a school for blacks in Alabama when he encounters a spirited young girl named Zora who lives near a swamp; eventually, during the years both youths attend the school, they fall in love, but when Bles learns that Zora is not sexually “pure” (having been abused by local whites), he leaves Alabama and heads north, determined to make his way in Washington, D.C. While there he becomes politically influential but decides to return to the rural school after his strong ethics conflict with the political corruption of the capital; meanwhile, Zora has undergone a similar transformation: After serving as a maid to a powerful white woman (also in Washington), she had decided even before Bles to return to Alabama and devote herself to supporting and enlarging the school. As their bond strengthens through their mutual devotion to this greater cause (including their attempts to defend the school against white attacks), the couple subtly renew their affection and, in the book's final scene, Bles declares his love and Zora proposes marriage.

DuBois prefaces his novel with a note claiming that whatever the book may lack in artistry or beauty, it is at least honest: “In no fact or picture have I consciously set down aught the counterpart of which I have not seen or known” (11). This emphasis on truthfulness already implies that DuBois saw his work not merely as a piece of fiction but as an accurate description of political, social, and cultural conditions that he hoped to influence and change. Many themes already enunciated in

The Souls of Black Folk are repeated in the novel, including DuBois's strong concern with the nature of black education, his implicit criticism of Booker T. Washington, his focus on life in the cotton-producing “black belt,” his stress on the ideal cooperation of well-motivated people of both races, and his concern with matters of class. Indeed, class is almost as important an issue in this novel as race: By this point in his life DuBois was a socialist, and his novel shows not only how the desire for excessive profit allegedly corrupts people of both races but also how a genuine commitment to selfless service motivates admirable individuals on either side of the “color-line.” The novel depicts the complexities of black life in both the North and the South, but it also suggests how the South was inevitably changing in ways that would forever alter the lives not only of its black citizens but especially of its whites. The whites who were particularly being affected were the old aristocracy of planters and plantation owners, who were losing their grip on power in the face of challenges not simply from blacks but from the white poor and from white commercial interests, both in the South and in the North.

One of the most interesting characters in the book is Caroline Wynn, who does not appear until the novel is half over. Whereas some of the other figures in the work are clearly caricatures whose motives are simplistic and whose behavior is fairly predictable, Wynn is a talented, articulate, influential black woman whose personality is somewhat complex: She is selfish, but she knows and partly regrets that she is; she is cynical, but her cynicism is partly born of real pain and thus makes her partially sympathetic: “Miss Caroline Wynn of Washington had little faith in the world and its people. Nor was this wholly her fault. The world had dealt cruelly with the young dreams and youthful ambitions of the girl; partly with its usual heartlessness, partly with that cynical and deadening reserve fund which it has to-day for its darker peoples” (253). Caroline Wynn admires the idealism of Bles Alwyn, but she also seeks to exploit it; Bles, meanwhile, finds himself attracted by Caroline's intelligence, beauty, and ambition, and eventually he asks her to marry him. She agrees, but when she later discovers that Bles's commitment to his principles will ruin his political career, she rejects him. Yet her response is complex:

he to her was always two men: one man above men, whom she could respect but would not marry, and one man like all men, whom she would marry but could not respect. His devotion to an ideal which she thought so utterly unpractical, aroused keen curiosity and admiration. She was sure he would fail in the end, and she wanted him to fail; and somehow, somewhere back beyond herself, her better self longed to find herself defeated; to see this mind stand firm on principle, under circumstances where she believed men never stood. (321)

Caroline Wynn, however, is only one of a number of central female characters in DuBois's novel, and in fact the women in the book are almost always more intriguing and complex than the men. Zora, of course, is the novel's key personality, and it is fascinating that DuBois finally makes Zora, rather than Bles, the book's truly visionary figure and the chief leader of her people. Her dominant position is implied even in the novel's very last sentences, when Bles kneels before her and when it is she, rather than he, who explicitly proposes marriage (433–434). Yet by this point she also seems to have begun to symbolize, for DuBois, not only the hope of her own people but that of the working class in general: "She did not anticipate any immediate understanding with the laboring whites, but she knew that eventually it would be inevitable. Meantime the Negro must strengthen himself and bring to the alliance as much independent economic strength as possible" (398). By the end of the novel, Zora has become the embodiment of the best hopes and ideals not only of her race but of her sex, her class, and humanity at large. DuBois has created not simply a compelling black heroine but also a feminist and socialist icon.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Compare and contrast Zora in The Quest of the Silver Fleece with Melanctha, the black character who is the central figure in the central tale of GERTRUDE STEIN's Three Lives. Discuss the women in terms of their fundamental motives, the kinds of language they use, and the degrees to which they change or develop. How might DuBois have reacted to Melanctha (and why), and how might Stein have responded to Zora (and why)?
2. Discuss the symbolism of distinct places in The Quest of the Silver Fleece. What does the swamp symbolize? What does the school symbolize? What do the plantation and the city of Washington symbolize? How does DuBois compare and contrast these different symbolic locations?
3. How does the socialism implied in this novel compare and contrast with the kind of socialism embraced by Jack London? What were London's views on racial differences and racial cooperation, and how do they resemble and/or depart from those of DuBois?

"Criteria of Negro Art" (1926)

In this essay, first published in Crisis magazine in October 1926, DuBois advocates a strong African-American interest in art, which might otherwise seem a luxury compared with the apparently more pressing issues of attaining civil and economic rights. DuBois argues, however, that art cannot (and should not) be divorced from political concerns and that all art, ultimately, is a form of propaganda.

DuBois begins by asserting that art is "part of the great fight we are carrying on" and that it "represents a forward and an upward look—a pushing onward" (Writings 993). He contends that black Americans, precisely because they are discriminated against, can see both the flaws and the true potential of their country more clearly than whites can, and that blacks have therefore developed "not only a certain distaste for the tawdry and flamboyant but a vision of what the world could be if it were really a beautiful world; if we had the true spirit" (Writings 994). After describing various instances of beauty and arguing that the "world is full of it," he laments that nevertheless "today the mass of human beings

5. Compare and contrast DuBois's fictional tale "Of the Coming of John" (in The Souls of Black Folk) with his novel The Quest of the Silver Fleece. How are the two works similar in plot, theme, and characters, and how do they differ? Which is more effective as a work of fiction, and why?
6. Compare and contrast the depiction of women in The Quest of the Silver Fleece and in Richard Wright's Native Son. What consistencies run throughout both books in their presentations of women, and how and why do you think those presentations differ in the two works?
7. Compare and contrast DuBois's autobiography (Dusk of Dawn) with The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas by Gertrude Stein. How do the two works compare and contrast in topics, tone, and techniques?
8. The Philadelphia Negro included, as an appendix, a separate report by Isabel Eaton discussing black domestic servants. How does Eaton's work compare and contrast with the work of DuBois in its methods, tone, assumptions, and conclusions?
9. Compare and contrast DuBois's first published work (The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade . . .) with some of the works that followed it, especially The Philadelphia Negro and The Souls of Black Folk. For instance, how is The Suppression similar to The Philadelphia Negro in its methods and conclusions, and, in particular, how do the final summary sections of both works resemble each other? How does The Suppression (especially in chapter 10) anticipate the themes and arguments of The Souls of Black Folk (especially in chapters 6 and 7)?
10. Compare and contrast DuBois's autobiography (Dusk of Dawn) with Richard Wright's Black Boy. Discuss the ways the books treat such issues as the protagonists' regional backgrounds, class status, family circumstances, and educational opportunities.

T. S. ELIOT (1888–1965)

When I wrote a poem called The Waste Land some of the more approving critics said that I had expressed the “disillusionment of a generation,” which is nonsense. I may have expressed for them their own illusion of being disillusioned, but that did not form part of my intention.

(T. S. Eliot, “Thoughts after Lambeth”)

As an American who became a British citizen, T. S. Eliot has been claimed by both countries as part of their literary canon. Although best known for his poetry, Eliot was also a successful playwright and an extremely prolific writer of prose, in the forms of critical essays, reviews, and lectures. Eliot was a key figure in the literary movement of modernism. He became known as perhaps the most prominent man of letters of his day and was presented with many honors, including 14 honorary degrees, the British Order of Merit, the Presidential Order of Freedom, and the Nobel Prize. In 1956 he lectured to 14,000 people in a baseball stadium at the University of Minnesota, in the largest assembly ever gathered to attend a literary lecture.

Although the commonly held image of Eliot is that he was isolated and even a bit snobbish, with a formal and stiff exterior, he was described by those who knew him well as calm, generous, kind, and always deeply contemplative. Eliot wanted, paradoxically, to be “a poet who, out of intense and personal experience, is able to express a general truth” (Gordon 3), and much of his writing can best be understood as a sort of spiritual autobiography; Eliot used his poetry and prose to grapple with the intellectual and personal issues facing him throughout his life.

Thomas Stearns Eliot was born on September 26, 1888, in St. Louis, Missouri. The Eliot family at the time of his birth was socially prominent. Although his grandfather, the Reverend William Greenleaf Eliot, died the year before Eliot’s birth, his legacy remained very important in the family; Eliot’s mother stressed his ideals of self-denial and public service. Eliot’s father, Henry, was a successful manufacturer, and his mother, Charlotte, was a poet, mainly writing optimistic and didactic religious verse. Growing up with much older siblings, and with a congenital hernia that led his mother to forbid sports, Eliot had few playmates and spent a lot of his time reading (Poe became a favorite). During his childhood, the family spent summers at Cape Ann, Massachusetts, and Eliot loved the seashore. His schoolboy writings reflect the glory and heroism of the fisherman, and he once said he thought of himself as a New England poet.

Despite growing up in a Unitarian family, Eliot was not convinced by this faith, as he believed that true salvation should result from individual human effort rather than divine will. The question of true religious belief was one that would continue to trouble Eliot, and this religious questioning is reflected in many of his early poems.

Eliot attended Smith Academy, a prep school in St. Louis, where in January 1899 he brought out eight issues of his own magazine. He later claimed he knew he wanted to become a poet after reading Edward Fitzgerald’s translation of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám at about age 14. He spent a year at Milton Academy just outside Boston before enrolling at Harvard in fall 1906.

While at Harvard, Eliot became disillusioned with the decaying upper-class Boston society in which he was expected to play a part; despite connections with family members in the inner circles of this society, he felt detached from it, although he did take up aspects of its character, including “its rigid manners, its loss of vigour, its estrangement from so many areas of life, [and] its painful self-consciousness” (Gordon 27). He preferred time spent wandering the slums of Roxbury and North Cambridge to that at cocktail parties and social events. He was known as a bit of a recluse during his time at Harvard, but he did attend some social functions and joined the staff of the Harvard Advocate, a literary magazine to which he contributed some early poems.

One of the key intellectual influences of Eliot’s early years was the 19th-century French poet Jules Laforgue, whom he first encountered in December 1908 in a book by Arthur Symons called The Symbolist Movement in Literature. He was struck by the idea of a growing interest in consciousness described by Symons, and he seems to have taken from Laforgue in particular the technique of free verse (which Laforgue developed in 1885) and the “willfully defeatist figure” (Gordon 40) that was at the center of his poems after reading Laforgue. This defeatist figure appears in Eliot’s first successful poem, “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” which he began writing while at Harvard and was first published in 1915.

Eliot’s decision to go to Paris after graduation from Harvard in 1910 was not really supported by his family, and many of the poems he wrote during this year are rejections of family and Boston life. He spent nine months at the Sorbonne and was disillusioned as quickly as he had been in Boston. He found the city drab and boring and the people apathetic and again spent time “slumming.” One important influence during his time in Paris was the philosopher Henri Bergson, whose ideas about duration—the subjective and continuous lived experience of time—would figure in Eliot’s later work.

Since Paris had not provided him with the poetic inspiration he was seeking, Eliot decided to return to Harvard for graduate study in philosophy.

There, Eliot spent some time studying Indian philosophy, although he eventually focused on the work of F. H. Bradley. In his dissertation on Bradley’s Appearance and Reality (1893), Eliot examined ideas about subjective experience and perception and the impossibility of grasping absolute truth. Although he did finish his dissertation in 1916, Eliot was never awarded his Ph.D. because he did not return to Harvard to defend his dissertation.

Another key influence on Eliot during this time (and throughout the rest of his poetic career) was the poetry of Dante. He found Dante’s narration of his journey through the inferno extremely relevant to his own struggles with religious faith in modern life. Eliot wrote a group of religious poems in 1914, dealing with topics such as martyrdom and sainthood, which were never published, but he did not feel satisfied with his poetry during this period.

In 1912 Eliot met Emily Hale, and, although they never married, his relationship with Emily became probably the most important of his life. Many of the details of the relationship of Eliot and Emily are unknown and will remain so until the release of her letters in 2019. In later writings Eliot claimed that before he left for Europe in 1914 he told Emily he was in love with her, and he suggested that he had been rejected. Little is known about any contact they may have had between his departure and the time when their relationship was revived in the 1930s.

Eliot decided in 1914 to spend more time abroad and was awarded a fellowship at Oxford. He planned to spend the summer in Germany, but when war broke out, he moved to London in August and then on to Oxford, where he stayed until June 1915. Oxford during this time was very quiet, with many British young men fighting in the war, but Eliot did meet two very important influences during this year: EZRA POUND and Vivienne Haigh-Wood.

Eliot initially impressed Pound by showing him “Prufrock,” and Pound became a key supporter of Eliot's fledgling poetic career. He encouraged Eliot to remain in London, arguing that poetry from America was not taken seriously in London. Pound turned Eliot firmly toward poetry at a time when he was leaning toward a career as a philosophy professor, and he remained an important "sponsor." Pound also introduced Eliot into literary circles in London.

Eliot met Vivienne (called Vivien) Haigh-Wood, a governess working in Cambridge, in early 1915. They shared an interest in writing, and he was attracted to her adventurousness and quick wit. After the end of the term at Oxford in June, Eliot faced the important decision of whether to return to Harvard and the life of a professor or to stay in London and continue to write poetry. Pound's advice was apparently extremely influential, and, for Eliot, marrying Vivien seemed to be necessarily related to a decision to stay in London. They were married suddenly, on June 26, 1915, without the knowledge of either set of parents. The marriage, although it lasted for many years, was by all accounts a failure, and a trial for both of them. Vivien was chronically ill and often mentally unstable, and these problems exacerbated Eliot's own nervous condition.

Eliot was also relatively isolated socially during this period in London. He attempted to enlist in the U.S. Navy but was rejected because of his health problems and as a result was one of the few young men of his generation to be "left out" of World War I. He and Vivien were somewhat adrift in London society. Through Bertrand Russell, who had been a mentor to him at Harvard, Eliot became acquainted with Clive Bell, Roger Fry, Lytton Strachey, and other members of the Bloomsbury group, but he did not really fit in with them. They were put off by his proper manners and ostentatious displays of learning. He did eventually, though, develop a friendship with Virginia Woolf and her husband, Leonard, whose Hogarth Press published a book of seven of his poems in 1919. This, combined with the 1917 publication of Prufrock and Other Observations, established Eliot as a poet in the eyes of London literary society.

During the initial period after his marriage, Eliot worked as a schoolteacher, but he was not really suited to this position and did not enjoy it. During the fall and winter of 1916 and 1917 he also gave lectures on English and French literature in London. Eliot began working at Lloyd's Bank in 1917 and did enjoy the regular work of a banker. He was also extremely busy writing reviews for various journals. In 1922 he became the editor of a new literary review (the Criterion) financed by Lady Rothermere, the wife of a newspaper owner. All of these responsibilities, which he took very seriously, left him very little free time to write poetry. The continuous stresses of life in London, particularly his marriage to Vivien, led to a nervous breakdown. He spent several months in 1921 in a sanatorium in Lausanne, Switzerland, where his health did in fact improve, and where he was also able to find time to devote to his writing. On his way back he passed through Paris and left The Waste Land with Pound, who was to have a substantial effect on the poem's revision. The Waste Land was published in October and November 1922 in the Criterion.

By 1923 Eliot was ready to leave the bank, but Vivien's continually worsening health meant that he needed financial stability. He had to turn down the editorship of the literary journal the Nation because the owners were unable to give him enough of a financial guarantee. The years between 1923 and 1925 were extremely trying, and the Eliots struggled financially. By 1925 Eliot knew he needed a major change. His first thought was to leave his wife, as it was clear by then that their marriage was a complete failure. Vivien's condition grew worse, no doubt at least in part as a result of side effects of the drugs she was prescribed. In September 1925 Eliot convinced Geoffrey Faber to give him a job at his new publishing house, Faber & Gwyer, and his Poems 1909–1925 was published in November. He threw himself into the work of the publisher, reading and commenting on works from prospective writers. As a director of Faber & Gwyer (later Faber & Faber), Eliot was in constant contact with the literary scene. Under Eliot, Faber launched the careers of W. H. Auden, Stephen Spender, Louis MacNeice, and Ted Hughes, as well as publishing works by already established figures such as Ezra Pound and James Joyce.

This career change certainly affected Eliot greatly, but the major change to his life in this period was his religious conversion. He met William Force Stead, a poet and Anglican minister, who became his confidant, in 1923. Eliot was baptized into the Church of England in June 1927 and, in November, became a British citizen. After his conversion, Eliot regularly attended Mass, and he became a warden of St. Stephen's Church in 1934, serving in this capacity for 25 years.

In the late 1920s Eliot began once again to correspond with Emily Hale and probably spent time with her when she visited London during the summers. She became for him an ideal of womanly purity, as well as a nostalgic reminder of New England. Eliot's nostalgia increased after his mother's death in 1929 and eventually led to his acceptance of the Norton Professorship at Harvard in 1932. In the winter of 1932–33, Eliot took the train across the country to visit Emily Hale, who was then teaching at Scripps College in Claremont, California. This meeting, and his happiness at being surrounded by family while in Cambridge, left him feeling torn between England and the United States and helped him make up his mind finally to request a deed of separation from Vivien. When he returned to England that summer, he kept his address secret in order to evade Vivien, who refused to accept their separation and in fact never signed the papers. Eliot thought of this period as a sort of “new life,” the most important aspect of which was that Emily Hale came to England on a year's leave beginning in late summer 1934. They spent a great deal of time together, including a trip to Burnt Norton (an old house and accompanying garden, unoccupied at the time of their visit). Eliot's poem of the same name (1935) is often read as a re-creation of a transcendent experience.

Eliot's guilt over his “abandonment” of Vivien, however, left him unable to make a commitment to Emily, who returned to New England and accepted a post at Smith College in 1936. She did continue to visit England each year until 1939, when the outbreak of World War II forced her to stay in America. The deep-seated tension and turmoil Eliot felt about his relationship with Vivien were dramatized in his play The Family Reunion, in which many of his close friends were able to recognize the main character as the playwright. Vivien never stopped feeling abandoned by Eliot, and she began to suspect a conspiracy that allegedly hid him from her. When she was found wandering the streets in 1938, her brother signed the papers to have her placed in a mental institution. While Eliot did not take an active part in her confinement, he made no objection and even arranged to have Vivien's income cover the cost. He never visited her, and she died in the institution on January 23, 1947.

Vivien's death in 1947, which should have left him free to marry Emily Hale (as she and everyone else had been assuming would happen for the previous 15 years), instead caused Eliot what he called a “catastrophe” when he realized that, although he loved Emily, he did not want to marry her. A version of this conflict is dramatized in his play The Cocktail Party. He felt that he had “lost his passion” (Gordon 412) and seemed to his friends to age quite a bit in this short time. He and Emily carried on the pattern of their relationship (mostly through letters, with occasional visits) for another 10 years, and he continued to send her copies of all his works. She clearly took comfort in the familiar routine, and she therefore suffered an emotional breakdown when he married again in January 1957. His marriage was not the only betrayal; at this point Eliot broke off all correspondence with Emily as well. It seems that he destroyed her letters to him; hers have been placed in the Princeton University library with instructions that they are not to be opened until 50 years after the death of the survivor (in 2019).

Eliot's Four Quartets, written in 1940–42 (except Burnt Norton, written in 1935), explore the intersection of time and timelessness. The quartets can be seen as autobiographical, conveying unity and circularity, and it seems likely that Eliot intended these poems as his final ones. After his publication of the Quartets, Eliot became perhaps England's predominant poet and was extremely well known, even among the general public. He was in great demand and made many appearances, especially after winning the Nobel Prize in 1948. However, despite his public profile and popularity, Eliot was quite isolated. He spent much of his time either working or alone in the dark rooms of the flat he shared with his friend John Hayward, and even his closest friends were not privy to his inner thoughts.

Eliot's marriage to his secretary, Valerie Fletcher, in January 1957 took everyone who knew him by surprise. Valerie was 30 (Eliot was 68), and she had admired and felt a connection with the poet since first hearing his poetry as a girl. After his marriage, Eliot withdrew from the few friends he had at the time, but by all accounts he was extremely happy, and the Eliots lived in a very loving and devoted marriage until his death of emphysema in January 1965. Since his death, Valerie has devoted the rest of her life to preserving Eliot's papers, editing his works, and compiling his letters. According to Eliot's wishes, after his death he was cremated and his ashes were buried at East Coker, in Somerset, England, from which Andrew Eliot had traveled to Boston in 1670. His burial thus effectively returned him to the place of his ancestors.

“The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” (1915)

Although “Prufrock” adopts the narrative voice of a middle-aged man, Eliot in fact completed this poem in 1911 when he was not quite 23. It was first published in 1915 and established the young Eliot as an important poet. The poem describes the speaker's alienation and disillusionment in a lonely urban setting.

The epigraph from Dante's Inferno suggests that what is said in the poem is not meant for the ears of anyone in the world, and it may also imply that Prufrock considers himself to be in a kind of modern hell. The poem's tone is confessional, personal, and reflective, as Prufrock takes stock of his life and attempts to answer some “overwhelming question” (ll. 10, 93). The title creates irony through the unlikely combination of the romantic suggestion of “love song” and the dull, unheroic sounding name (it is perhaps interesting that T. Stearns Eliot was an early form of the poet's signature).

The “you and I” of the first line seems to indicate that Prufrock has two selves—the outward, public figure who attends social gatherings, and the inner philosopher contemplating the important questions of life. His inability to fuse the two into a coherent whole reflects his overwhelming timidity (“do I dare?” [l. 38]).

As an illustration of this timidity, imagery of paralysis runs throughout the poem, beginning with the initial simile and continuing with suggestions of the repetition of existence (“For I have known them all already, known them all— / Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons . . .” [ll. 49–50]), and the comparison of Prufrock to an insect pinned to a wall (ll. 57–58). Prufrock also reveals his insecurity, one contribution to which is certainly his isolation from society. The refrain “In the room the women come and go / Talking of Michelangelo” (ll. 13–14, 35–36) sets him apart from this type of social conversation; he is concerned with what “They” will say about him (ll. 41, 44) and does not want to “Disturb the universe” (l. 46). He is particularly uncertain in the company of women (stanza 10).

Prufrock's indecision is also key, and there is a repeated motif of delay or hesitation (even if he is “not Prince Hamlet” [l. 111]—another expression of his feelings of inferiority). Prufrock questions even the purpose of a search for meaning, and there is plenty of miscommunication (“That is not what I meant at all. / That is not it, at all” (ll. 97–98); “It is impossible to say just what I mean!” [l. 104]). Prufrock also seems to feel that his life has passed its prime (“I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker” [l. 84]) and is perhaps even afraid of death (l. 86).

The poem is commonly read as a modernist text, because of its portrayal of Prufrock's alienation, suggestions of meaninglessness (or at least of the difficulty of finding meaning), somewhat fragmented structure, and description of a disillusionment with modern society. It is also notable for its successful employment of free verse and significant allusions.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Trace the references to Prufrock's perceived inferiority or insecurity throughout the poem.

To what extent do you think this aspect of Prufrock might reflect Eliot himself?

- Note the imagery that is used to describe the city, in particular in the first four stanzas. What atmosphere is created in the poem, and how does this contribute to the portrayal of Prufrock's state of mind?
- Choose one significant allusion or set of allusions in the poem (for example, the allusions to Shakespeare's Hamlet) and examine the function of these references. How do they add to the meaning of Eliot's work?
- Compare the mood and atmosphere of "Prufrock" to those of Robert Frost's "Acquainted with the Night." In what ways do both poems suggest the alienation and isolation of their speakers?

"Sweeney among the Nightingales" (1919)

In this early poem, the title character, who is described through the use of primitive and animalistic language, encounters two treacherous women one night in a bar or restaurant. "Sweeney" is somewhat unusual among Eliot's works in that it does not employ free verse; instead, the four-line stanzas follow a (mostly) regular pattern of iambic tetrameter, rhyming abcb, and the simplicity of this pattern contrasts with the foreboding atmosphere.

The epigraph ("Alas, I am struck with a mortal blow within") is the voice of Agamemnon, crying out from the palace as he is murdered by Clytemnestra, his wife. Throughout the poem Sweeney is compared with Agamemnon. The comparison culminates in the final stanza, but the intent is not clear; perhaps Eliot is merely using Agamemnon as an example of someone betrayed by women. Eliot may also be mocking Sweeney by comparing him with the heroic Greek king.

There is a nightmarish atmosphere throughout, and a sense of foreboding is created, beginning in the second quatrain's references to the "stormy moon" (l. 5) and to "Death" and "the Raven" (l. 7). The constellations are "veiled" (l. 10), and even the reference to Orion (the hunter) could be read as a threat to Sweeney.

The women in the poem are presented as dangerous, even preying on Sweeney. The "person in the Spanish cape" (l. 11), who is not revealed as female until the "She" in line 15, is destructive, overturning a coffee cup and then seeming unconcerned with her subsequent yawn. Rachel "Tears at the grapes with murderous paws" (l. 24), and the two women are "thought to be in league" (l. 26) and operating a "gambit" (l. 28). Sweeney (the "man with heavy eyes" [l. 27]) seems to escape their clutches but then returns to "grin" at the window, and he is unlikely to be protected by the host of the institution, who is busy conversing "at the door apart" (l. 34), or by the nearby "Convent of the Sacred Heart" (l. 36).

The animal imagery in the poem is striking, serving to dehumanize Sweeney. In the first stanza alone, he is compared to an ape, a zebra, and a giraffe, and the descriptions suggesting apes (such as "Letting his arms hang down" [l. 2]) in particular suggest that Sweeney is primitive. The man in brown is called a "vertebrate" (l. 21), and Rachel has "paws" (l. 24). The nightingales singing at the end of the poem, as they had sung at Agamemnon's death, suggest ultimately that there is no difference between the ancient tragedy and the modern plot.

For Discussion or Writing

- Many critics feel that Sweeney will be assassinated sometime shortly after the narrative of the poem ends. What is your opinion about Sweeney's fate? Use specific evidence from the poem to support your argument.
- Compare the depiction of women in this poem to the way women are portrayed in part 2 ("A Game of Chess") of The Waste Land. In what ways do both poems present women as dangerous?
- Eliot's original title for "Prufrock" was "Prufrock among the Women," suggesting a possible parallel between these two poems. How are Prufrock and Sweeney in similar situations with respect to their interactions with women? How does the difference in narrative perspective between the two poems influence your perception of these interactions?

“Tradition and the Individual Talent” (1919)

Eliot first published this essay in the Egoist, and it is one of his most well-known articulations of his own literary theories. It is also often considered an expression of some of the key ideas of literary modernism. The two key aspects of the argument Eliot makes here are, first of all, the necessity of being aware of the past (“tradition”) when writing poetry, and, second, the separation between a poem and the poet who writes it. It is important to reach an understanding of the arguments Eliot makes in this essay in order to grasp fully the reasons behind the allusive nature of Eliot’s own work, and in order to consider the relationship (if any) between Eliot’s poetry and his own life.

In considering the role of tradition in poetry, Eliot rejects the common practice of praising a poet by emphasizing “those aspects of his work in which he least resembles anyone else” (Abrams 2,171). He claims that “not only the best, but the most individual parts of his work may be those in which the dead poets, his ancestors, assert their immortality most vigorously” (2,171). This assertion is somewhat paradoxical, as Eliot argues that elements of a poem that refer to or invoke the work of previous poets can in fact be the most individual creations of a poet.

However, what Eliot calls tradition is not simply a blind following of the previous generations. He considers it to be much broader, involving “the historical sense” (2,171). Eliot describes this historical sense as a consciousness of all the great writers of the past and of the fact that these great writers continue to exist and to inform the present; it is “a feeling that the whole of the literature of Europe from Homer and within it the whole of the literature of [the poet’s] own country has a simultaneous existence and composes a simultaneous order” (2,171).

This contention leads to his claim that “No poet, no artist of any art, has his complete meaning alone” (2,171). Eliot feels that any artist can only be considered and evaluated with relation to the entire tradition. Any new work of art, he argues, modifies and alters the entirety of the tradition at the moment of its creation, so that “the past is altered by the present as much as the present is directed by the past” (2,171). This claim leads him to the concept of poetry as a living whole.

Related to this idea, Eliot moves on in part 2 of the essay to discuss his idea of the impersonality of poetry. He says that “The progress of an artist is a continual self-sacrifice, a continual extinction of personality” (2,173). This is because an artist must be constantly absorbing the past and therefore surrendering himself to what is more valuable. Therefore, Eliot argues that successful art involves a process of depersonalization. He analogizes the mind of the poet to a shred of platinum, which acts as a catalyst in a chemical reaction. Through this analogy, he suggests that the mind is necessary for the “reaction” (or the writing of the poem) to take place, but that it is itself unchanged by the process. The other elements of this reaction, according to Eliot, are emotions and feelings, and one or both of these may be present in different quantities. “The poet’s mind is in fact a receptacle for seizing and storing up numberless feelings, phrases, images, which remain there until all the particles which can unite to form a new compound are present together” (2,174). In this way, the mind of the poet, according to Eliot, transforms the emotions and feelings experienced by the poet himself into those expressed by the poem, and these are not the same feelings and emotions: “Impressions and experiences which are important for the man may take no place in the poetry, and those which become important in the poetry may play quite a negligible part in the man, the personality” (2,174). Thus Eliot argues that there is a separation between poem and poet: “Poetry is not a turning loose of emotion, but an escape from emotion; it is not the expression of personality, but an escape from personality” (2,175).

Some have seen a contradiction between Eliot’s theory of impersonality expressed here and some of his later writings, in which he argues that personality is necessary for high art. However, this seeming contradiction can be explained by considering the idea of a split or double self of the poet—the outward self, which he displays in society, is that from which he escapes in poetry, but the inner, intellectual, personal self is that which is really expressed in his art.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Consider the paradox inherent in Eliot's claim that "not only the best, but the most individual parts of his work may be those in which the dead poets, his ancestors, assert their immortality most vigorously." How can you explain this seeming contradiction? Which parts of Eliot's own work might be considered "the best," according to this definition?
2. Why do you think Eliot places such importance on a consciousness of the past in his discussions of poetry? Does this seem to be particularly relevant to poetry as a genre, or do you think (and would Eliot think) that this consciousness of the past would be equally important to novels, stories, and plays as well?
3. Compare Eliot's discussion of tradition in this essay with that in the first chapter of F. R. Leavis's The Great Tradition (1960). Consider in particular to what extent Eliot would agree with Leavis's explanation of the relationship between great writers and tradition.

"Gerontion" (1920)

"Gerontion" is a dramatic monologue, fragmented in both style and content, in which Eliot's speaker contemplates the emptiness of his last years, considering a decline in Christian faith and the state of Europe in 1919. Some critics have argued that the poem was originally intended as a sort of preface to The Waste Land, and it certainly makes use of similar imagery. The extended metaphor of the mind as a house is used to illustrate the speaker's decay, disillusionment, and lack of belonging, and the end of the poem shows nature (in the form of the trade winds) driving Gerontion toward "a sleepy corner" (l. 73), perhaps his final resting place.

The poem's portrayal of a barren landscape is linked to its suggestions of the isolation of the modern condition. The poem opens with images of sterility (including "a dry month" [l. 1], "waiting for rain" [l. 2], and "the salt marsh" [l. 5]), and this idea continues with the descriptions of decay in cities such as Antwerp, Brussels, and London. The anonymous high-class foreigners who appear in lines 23–29 (and again in line 67) seem to be engaged in meaningless activities and linked with human faults (i.e., Silvero suggests money, and von Kulp may be taken from the Latin for fault). Isolation is implied not only by the allusion to the Battle of Thermopylae ("the hot gates" [l. 3]) but also by the succeeding lines' discussion of fighting, in that here Eliot may be expressing his disappointment at being "left out" of the war, which he saw as a defining event for his generation. The paradoxical condition of modern life is illustrated through contradictions such as "Unnatural vices / Are fathered by our heroism" (ll. 44–45).

Along with isolation are difficulties with knowledge and with communication. The phrase "The word within a word, unable to speak a word" (l. 18) suggests that knowledge cannot be passed on. History is personified as a deceptive woman (ll. 34–41), implying a possible reason for the current condition of the world: We have not been able to learn anything from the past. The speaker of the poem would like to communicate: "I would meet you upon this honestly" (l. 54) but has lost "passion" (l. 57) and all five senses (l. 59) and does not know how to make "closer contact" (l. 60). He thus remains alienated from society.

The second stanza begins to suggest Christianity's decline; line 17 refers to a passage from Matthew ("Master, we would see a sign from thee"), and the following line is taken from a Lancelot Andrewes sermon on this Matthew passage. However, "We would see a sign!" seems more desperate in tone than the biblical source, and the "word within the word" (a reference to the Christ child) is "swaddled with darkness" (l. 19) and "unable to speak a word" (l. 18). Instead, Christ is "the tiger" (l. 20) and thus seems threatening (as is the reference to Judas). Likewise, the reference to the Eucharist in line 22 is disturbingly inverted later in the poem, when the tiger "devours" us (l. 48), with the sentence structure of this line reflecting this inversion.

Although the house in the poem is literally a boarding house in which Gerontion lives, it is also used metaphorically, but it is only with the final two lines that we understand the connection between the house and the mind of the speaker. After this, lines such as “My house is a decayed house” (l. 7) and “I / Stiffen in a rented house” (ll. 49–50) take on added significance as illustrating that the speaker is uncomfortable with his own thoughts and feels his mind fading.

For Discussion or Writing

1. What are the similarities between Gerontion and Prufrock? Do they seem to have similar concerns about the modern condition?
2. Critics have argued that Eliot's early poems often show a distrust of Christianity. Do you think this is the case in “Gerontion”? Compare the view of Christianity presented in this poem with that presented in one of Eliot's later poems, such as “Journey of the Magi” or “Ash Wednesday.”
3. Examine closely the extended description of history in lines 36–43 of the poem. What are Gerontion's complaints about history? How are these complaints related to the poem's portrayal of the modern world as decayed and corrupt?

The Waste Land (1922)

The Waste Land was published in the same year as two other seminal modernist texts—Mrs. Dalloway and Ulysses. It is perhaps Eliot's best-known work, and certainly his most difficult. It is crucial to have an edition of the poem that is effectively footnoted in order to follow the myriad allusions. Much of the poem's difficulty stems from its lack of a coherent narrative; it instead presents a series of scenes and images from which a reader must attempt to extract meaning. Its overwhelming message (and its legacy) is of the barrenness and decay of the modern Western world, and the fragmentation of the poem reflects the confusion and uncertainty Eliot (and other modernist writers) believed characterized modern existence.

Eliot, in a general note to the poem, acknowledged that much of the work's symbolism was suggested by a book by Jessie L. Weston, in which she linked ancient fertility myths to Christianity, focusing on the archetypal story of the Fisher King. The Fisher King, whose death or illness produces drought and desolation in the land and who can only be revived by a knight who finds some form of the Grail, was, according to Weston, parallel to the Christian God. In the poem, “Eliot, following Weston, thus uses a great variety of mythological and religious material, both Occidental and Oriental, to paint a symbolic picture of the modern Waste Land and the need for regeneration” (Abrams 2,146).

The dedication to Ezra Pound, “the better craftsman,” is in thanks for the enormous amount of assistance Pound provided in editing the poem for Eliot. The epigraph refers to the Cumaean Sibyl in Greek mythology, who was granted immortality but forgot to ask for eternal youth. This is why she says, in this passage, “I want to die,” and her desire for escape is fitting as an introduction to the poem and its portrayal of the entrapments of a modern wasteland. There are suggestions throughout the poem of being trapped, some of which explicitly evoke the Sibyl's dilemma: “I was neither / Living nor dead, and I knew nothing” (ll. 39–40). Tiresias is also in this type of in-between state: “I Tiresias, though blind, throbbing between two lives, / Old man with wrinkled female breasts . . .” (ll. 218–219). Perhaps this entrapment in a difficult liminal state is one result of the modern wasteland.

The poem's bleak imagery begins immediately. The opening suggests that “April is the cruellest month” because it provides false hope; although there are “lilacs,” the land is still “dead” (ll. 1–2). This desolation is also suggested by “this stony rubbish” (l. 20) and the suggestion in the following lines that man knows “only / A heap of broken images” (ll. 21–22) and that the landscape is marked by “the dead tree” (l. 23) and “the dry stone” (l. 24). The references to dryness continue throughout, culminating just before the thunder speaks in stanza 5 in its “empty cisterns” and “exhausted wells” (l. 385). Here even the sacred river Ganges—bathing in which (Hindu legend held) would give renewal to a person—is dried up (l. 396).

Imagery specifically relating to London occurs in the last stanza of part 1, where Eliot compares the businessmen flowing over London Bridge during the morning commute to Dante's flow of the damned into hell, and again in the descriptions of the Thames in part 3. In the last half of the "Unreal City" stanza, the use of first person, the reference to "one I knew" (l. 69), and the use of Baudelaire's phrase "mon semblable—mon frère" [my likeness—my brother] (l. 76) all suggest that the speaker is in fact one of these businessmen, and Eliot himself would have known this daily ritual well from his time working at Lloyd's Bank. In part 3 Eliot takes his refrain ("Sweet Thames, run softly, till I end my song" [l. 176]) from Edmund Spenser's Prothalamion, a marriage song, adding irony to his descriptions of the river as filled with garbage and infested with rats.

The City returns in part 3 with an idyllic description of St. Magnus Martyr, a church near London Bridge: "the walls / Of Magnus Martyr hold / Inexplicable splendor of Ionian white and gold" (ll. 263–265); however, this seems to be but a brief glimpse of a lost world, and the following stanzas (which Eliot called the "Song of the Thames-daughters") return to the dingy imagery of the river.

The sterility of the wasteland world extends to the fruitlessness or lack of fulfillment in sexual encounters. This is evident in the relationship between Lil and Albert in the last stanza of part 2 (in which Lil seems to have lost her youthful good looks as a result of a drugstore abortion) and in the mention of the doomed relationship between Queen Elizabeth and the earl of Leicester in the second Thames-daughter's song in part 3. The final Thames-daughter also describes an unfulfilling sexual encounter in a canoe on the river. Tiresias observes this type of encounter between the typist and the "young man carbuncular" (l. 231); the typist's reaction after the exit of her "departed lover" (l. 250)—"Well now that's done: and I'm glad it's over" (l. 252)—illustrates a modern indifference to sexual coupling and hints at the meaningless of life in general. Even conversations are fruitless, as in the dialogue in part 2, a representative line of which is "Are you alive, or not? Is there nothing in your head?" (l. 126).

Despite its lack of narrative, the poem does feature several distinct characters. Madame Sosostri, the fortune-teller, is introduced in part 1 of the poem, reading the tarot cards for an unidentified listener. Her reference to "the drowned Phoenician Sailor" (l. 47) anticipates the "Death by Water" section of the poem. "The Hanged Man" (l. 55) symbolizes the self-sacrifice of the fertility god, who is killed so that his resurrection can generate fertility; therefore, her inability to locate this card is another indication of the barrenness of the modern world.

Tiresias makes his appearance in part 3, and Eliot, in a note, called him "the most important personage in the poem," claiming that "what Tiresias sees, in fact, is the substance of the poem." Using Tiresias as an observer is somewhat ironic, since he is blind, but in his literary appearances (as in Sophocles' Oedipus Rex) Tiresias is often portrayed as able to see (metaphorically, through his gift of prophecy) more clearly than others, despite his literal blindness. Here he "Perceived the scene, and foretold the rest" (l. 229). Tiresias is a particularly fitting observer for this modern wasteland, as he had previously observed the tragic events leading to the years of plague and desolation in the city of Thebes. Indeed, parallels like this between the historical (or mythical) and the modern are created throughout the poem, suggesting that the emptiness described here has in fact been evident throughout history.

Phlebas the Phoenician is mourned in the brief part 4 of the poem, and his "death by water" is often seen by critics as a death without resurrection. The final line of this section provides a warning of mortality for all readers. In part 5 of the poem, as earlier, there is no water (although it is imagined: "Drip drop drip drop drop drop drop" [l. 358]); there is merely "dry sterile thunder without rain" (l. 342). Ironically, the only time there is sufficient water in this wasteland, it produces death.

The final two stanzas of part 5 of the poem contain the most significant allusions to Eastern philosophy, which was a particular interest of Eliot's, although it is also referenced in the title of part 3. The Fire Sermon was preached by the Buddha against the fires of passions that, he argued, prevent people's regeneration. The title of part 5 refers to a Hindu fable in which different groups interpret the divine voice (expressed as thunder) saying DA in different ways: Datta, "to give alms"; Dayadhvam, "to have compassion"; Damyata, "to practice self-control." In the poem, these interpretations of the thunder's "DA" seem to provoke its listeners to question whether they have in fact performed any of these honorable actions: "Datta: what have we given?" (l. 401). Then, after a final stanza that may be spoken by a Fisher King figure wondering whether he can "set [his] lands in order" (l. 426), the poem ends with the repetition of "Shantih shantih shantih" (l. 434), a traditional benediction, but one that is unfamiliar to any Western audience, perhaps suggesting that any final blessing is ultimately beyond our understanding.

For Discussion or Writing

1. The first line of the poem alludes to the opening of the General Prologue of Geoffrey Chaucer's Canterbury Tales: "Whan that Aprille with his shoures swoote." In addition, George Orwell alludes to both Chaucer and Eliot in the opening of his novel 1984: "It was a bright, cold day in April, and the clocks were striking thirteen." Examine all three openings and discuss the differences in tone. How does a knowledge of the earlier works inform your reading of the later ones?
2. Research the role of Tiresias in Greek mythology, particularly as he appears in Sophocles' Oedipus trilogy. To what extent do you see Tiresias as a fitting "narrator" for this poem, based on the basis of his previous history?
3. Compare the vision of the modern world Eliot develops here with the portrayal of modern civilization in W. B. Yeats's "The Second Coming." In what ways do both poets suggest an ominous future, and does either of them provide any hope?
4. How far do you believe the poem itself fits the description "fragments shored against my ruins" (l. 431)? Can you understand the entire poem as a series of fragments assembled by the speaker in order to try to come to terms with his situation? Choose another modernist poem (for example, "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird," by Wallace Stevens) and discuss whether the same definition could apply.

"The Hollow Men" (1925)

"The Hollow Men" was written during a period in which Eliot was on leave from the bank, having suffered a nervous breakdown, struggling with his failing marriage, and contemplating his impending religious conversion, and, as was often the case, the poem seems to reflect aspects of his personal life with its bleak tone and suggestions of the emptiness and fragmentation of modern existence.

The first epigraph, the announcement of Kurtz's death by one of the natives in Conrad's Heart of Darkness, evokes the failed quest of a great man. The second refers to an English custom followed on Guy Fawkes Day and suggests the custom of burning the bearer of guilt (in this case, in the form of a straw effigy). This image directly anticipates the description of "stuffed men" "filled with straw" in part 1 of the poem.

Part 1 vividly evokes the emptiness Eliot feels pervades modern existence (expressing a typically modernist sentiment). Not only are the men described as "hollow" and "stuffed," but their minds are empty ("headpiece filled with straw" [l. 4]), and even their conversation is "meaningless" (l. 7). The use of the first-person plural illustrates that the poem's speaker considers himself one of these "hollow men."

"Shape without form" (l. 11) is a recurring image that also emphasizes emptiness and meaninglessness and links to the discussion in part 5 of the poem of the gap between the potential and the actual: "Between the idea / And the reality / Between the motion / And the act / Falls the Shadow" (ll. 72–76). The poem seems strongly concerned with the failure to realize some goal or potential (as illustrated by Kurtz and by the incomplete prayer in lines 93 and 95). The “hollow men” in the poem are those who have failed to make a decision about their own actions and therefore remain in an “in-between” state.

Part 3 of the poem describes the modern landscape as a “dead land” (l. 39) and wonders whether this barren landscape anticipates “death’s other kingdom” (l. 46). Part 4 continues this imagery of lifelessness, referring specifically to hell, with the damned “gathered on this beach of the tumid river” (l. 60), an allusion to the river Acheron described in Dante’s Inferno. It suggests blindness and darkness with phrases such as “there are no eyes here” (l. 53), “we grope together” (l. 58), and “twilight kingdom” (l. 65), and this state seems likely to continue unless Christ (alluded to as “the perpetual star / Multifoliate rose” [ll. 63–64], another image from Dante) grants salvation.

The verse opening the fragmentary part 5 of the poem replaces the mulberry bush, a traditional fertility symbol, with “the prickly pear” (l. 68), a plant found in the desert, continuing the sterile imagery found earlier in the poem. The final lines of the poem (another parody of the children’s song about the mulberry bush) suggest that the world as a whole will peter out quietly, without fanfare.

For Discussion or Writing

1. Examine the connections between this poem and Joseph Conrad’s Heart of Darkness. Do you think the poem presents an accurate portrayal of Kurtz, who is described in the novel as being “hollow at the core” (Abrams 1,802)?
2. Examine the poem’s portrayal of religion. Does the poem suggest the possibility of salvation? Consider whether you think this might relate to Eliot’s personal religious contemplations.
3. Trace the different ways in which the poem suggests a failure to achieve potential. Compare the suggestions of failure in this poem with those in Eliot’s “Prufrock.”
4. What is the effect of repetition in the poem? In particular, what do you think are the functions of the repeated images of eyes in parts 2 and 4 and of the repeated words and phrases in part 5 of the poem?

“Journey of the Magi” (1927)

Eliot wrote “Journey of the Magi” shortly after his conversion to the Church of England. A dramatic monologue, the poem adopts the voice of one of the three wise men who traveled to see the birth of Jesus, recalling the experience in old age. The speaker remembers the hardships of the journey and the way the experience changed the lives of the wise men afterward.

In the New Testament, the three wise men are from the East, and the poem evokes a contrast between the land of origin of the magi and the landscape through which they are traveling. They have traded “summer palaces on slopes” and “silken girls bringing sherbet” (ll. 9, 10) for “hostile” cities and “dirty” villages, in the “very dead of winter” (ll. 14, 15, 5). The use of anaphora in lines 10–15 (the repetition of And at the beginning of successive lines) emphasizes the accumulation of hardships during the journey, and indeed this was enough for the wise men to have doubts about their purpose, as they heard voices “saying / That this was all folly” (ll. 19–20).

The arrival of the wise men in Bethlehem is described in the second stanza of the poem with more vibrant imagery, including references to “a temperate valley” (l. 21), “smelling of vegetation” (l. 22), and “a running stream” (l. 23)—details symbolic of the new life given by the birth of Christ. However, this stanza also includes allusions to details from the later story of Christ: The “three trees” (l. 24) suggest the three crosses, and the description of men “dicing for pieces of silver” (l. 27) refers to soldiers dicing for Christ’s garments and to Judas’s betrayal for 30 pieces of silver. These allusions create some ambiguity, as the birth of Christ eventually leads to his suffering but also to salvation for mankind.

The speaker’s meditations about birth and death in the last stanza maintain this ambiguity. The birth the wise men have witnessed seems to have

WILLIAM FAULKNER (1897–1962)

. . . it still seems to me impossible to evaluate a man's work. None of mine ever quite suited me[;] each time I wrote the last word I would think, if I could just do it over, I would do it better, maybe even right. But I was too busy; there was always another one.

(qtd. in Cox 73)

William Faulkner is widely considered one of the very best American novelists (perhaps even the best) of the 20th century. His works often focus on the same large cast of recurring characters inhabiting the same small area of northern Mississippi—the area in or near the fictional town of Jefferson in a fictional place called Yoknapatawpha County. Jefferson was closely based on Oxford, Mississippi, where Faulkner spent much of his life and did much of his best writing. Nevertheless, despite his preoccupation with the people and events in one tiny portion of the American South, Faulkner won worldwide recognition (including a Nobel Prize) both for his themes and for his stylistic and technical innovations. He was a “regional” writer who appealed to an international audience, and his influence and fame (already strong during the latter years of his career) have grown even stronger in the decades since his death.

Most of the facts of the novelist's life are laid out clearly in the superbly detailed “Chronology” prepared by Joseph Blotner and Noel Polk. William Cuthbert Falkner (he added the u to his name later in life) was born on September 25, 1897, in New Albany, Mississippi, the first child of Maud Butler Falkner and Murry Cuthbert Falkner. On his father's side he was descended from a fairly prominent line of local notables, including a great-grandfather who had been a planter, a railroad pioneer, a Confederate colonel, a politician, and even the author of a best-selling novel who was shot to death by a former friend and business partner. Faulkner's paternal grandfather was, in turn, a leading local businessman and political figure, while the novelist's father was first employed by the family railroad and then (after it was sold) moved his family to Oxford, Mississippi, and started a series of small businesses. Young William (along with his younger brothers, Murry, John, and Dean) grew up in a household that included not only his parents but also his maternal grandmother and an elderly black caretaker whom Faulkner loved and admired. Although William was never much interested in conventional schooling, he was an intelligent boy who read widely and began writing poems at an early age. His writing led to a lifelong friendship with an older local boy named Phil Stone, who encouraged Faulkner's literary interests and helped introduce him to the work of significant modern writers. Meanwhile, the adolescent Faulkner had also taken an interest in a local girl named Estelle Oldham; by 1918 she was ready to elope with him even though she was engaged to someone else, but both sets of parents disapproved of her relationship with Faulkner, and so her marriage proceeded as planned. Faulkner, in the meantime, tried to enlist as a pilot in the army after the United States entered World War I, but he was rejected because of his small size and low weight. After spending some time with Phil Stone, who was studying at Yale (where Faulkner met a number of up-and-coming writers), the future novelist was accepted for pilot training in Canada by Britain's Royal Air Force. The war, however, ended before he could ever get into the air. Nevertheless, this fact did not prevent him from later claiming that he had been injured in a plane crash during his training.

Back in the Deep South after returning from Canada, Faulkner continued to write poetry and had his first significant magazine publication in 1919. After registering that year at the University of Mississippi (located in Oxford), he became involved in the campus literary and theatrical scene, even writing an experimental play, but by 1921 he had left the university for a short stay in New York City, where he worked briefly in a bookstore. By the end of the year, however, he was back in Oxford and had taken a job as the university's postmaster—a job to which he never showed much devotion but that did give him plenty of time to read and write. By 1924 he had self-published a collection of poetry (The Marble Faun), but in the same year he lost his position as leader of a Boy Scout troop thanks to his drinking, and he also lost his job as university postmaster because of his lack of serious attention to the job. Faulkner, however, was not brokenhearted at this loss, memorably remarking that “I reckon I’ll be at the beck and call of folks with money all my life, but thank God I won’t ever again have to be at the beck and call of every son of a bitch who’s got two cents to buy a stamp” (qtd. in Blotner and Polk, “Chronology” 997). By 1925 he was living in New Orleans, where he made the acquaintance of SHERWOOD ANDERSON (the influential novelist who had helped promote the careers of so many young American writers) and where he began contributing frequently to local periodicals. By this time he had written a novel, which Anderson recommended to his own New York publishers. Before the book was accepted, however, Faulkner set off on a freighter bound for Europe, where he spent much of his time in Paris, visiting art galleries, doing his own writing, and taking occasional side trips, including a brief journey to England. By the end of 1925 he was back in the United States and was awaiting publication of his novel, Soldiers’ Pay, which appeared in February 1926 to generally good reviews. Nevertheless, despite Anderson’s role in promoting this book, by this time his relationship with Faulkner had become strained (thanks, in part, to Faulkner’s role in contributing to a book that mocked Anderson’s writings).

In 1927 Faulkner’s second novel (Mosquitoes) was published and he was working on two other books, including a work he planned to title Flags in the Dust. The latter book, however, met with repeated rejection from publishers to whom Faulkner submitted it in 1928—a fact he found discouraging, but a fact that also prompted him to begin to work on a new book written mainly for his own satisfaction. Although Flags in the Dust (now titled Sartoris) was eventually published by a major New York press early in 1929, it was Faulkner’s newest manuscript, titled The Sound and the Fury, that would help change the course not only of his career but of modern American fiction. Highly innovative in structure, style, and technique, that book remains one of the most influential of all modern novels, and it was always the work of which Faulkner was the most proud. The book was quickly accepted for publication, but the same was not true of his newest novel, Sanctuary, which publishers initially considered too scandalous to print. Undeterred, however, Faulkner quickly completed another novel, As I Lay Dying, which was as pathbreaking in its own way as The Sound and the Fury. That latter book had been published in early October 1929 (not long before the stock market crash that ushered in the Great Depression) and was receiving good reviews even if few copies were being sold. Nevertheless, Faulkner (who was now working at the university power plant in Oxford) had a major reason besides literary achievement to be pleased: In the midsummer of 1929 he had finally been able to marry his old sweetheart, Estelle Oldham, whose first marriage had ended in divorce. By the beginning of the 1930s, then, he had thus become not only a rising novelist but also a husband and the stepfather of Estelle’s two children.

Given his new responsibilities, Faulkner became increasingly concerned in the 1930s with earning a decent living. He began to write short fiction for national magazines, sometimes earning more for a single story than he had for any of his novels. With this income he was able to buy a large but dilapidated house in Oxford, which he began repairing. Meanwhile, there was also good news on other fronts: Both British and French publishers had begun to show interest in his work; As I Lay Dying was printed in October 1930, and even Sanctuary—once considered too shocking to publish—was accepted and was issued (after extensive last-minute revisions) in March 1931, receiving good reviews and generating healthy sales. Furthermore, a collection of short stories, also published in 1931, also sold well; new publishers were courting him; he was making a wide range of new friends among the New York literary establishment; and his income was growing. Not all the news was positive, however: Early in 1931 the Faulkners had lost a newborn daughter, and by the end of the year Faulkner (always a heavy drinker) was so afflicted by his addiction to alcohol that he had to be retrieved by Estelle from New York (where he had been visiting) after friends became concerned. Nevertheless, Faulkner remained productive: Early in 1932 he finished Light in August (another masterpiece), and by spring of that year he found himself in California, where he began his long association with the Hollywood film industry as a scriptwriter and script consultant. The death of his father at the end of that summer meant that Faulkner now became the chief financial supporter of his widowed mother, but the money he was earning from his involvement with the movies (including sale of the screen rights to Sanctuary) was good for that era and even helped him continue with the renovations on his house in Oxford. Indeed, Faulkner soon had enough disposable income that he finally realized his longtime dream of becoming a pilot in 1933, even buying his own plane, and he was also able to purchase additional property in Mississippi. The best news of 1933, however, was the birth of his daughter, Jill, on June 24.

In 1934 a new collection of short stories appeared; further profitable work in Hollywood ensued; and another novel (Pylon) was completed.
