

AMERICAN

An Encyclopedia of Nonconformists, Alternative Lifestyles, and Radical Ideas in U.S. History

Edited by
Gina Misiroglu

COUNTERCULTURES

AMERICAN COUNTERCULTURES

An Encyclopedia of Nonconformists, Alternative Lifestyles, and Radical Ideas in U.S. History

Edited by
Gina Misiroglu

SHARPE REFERENCE
an imprint of M.E. Sharpe, Inc.

SHARPE REFERENCE

Sharpe Reference is an imprint of M.E. Sharpe, Inc.

M.E. Sharpe, Inc.
80 Business Park Drive
Armonk, NY 10504

© 2013 by M.E. Sharpe, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright holders.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

American countercultures: an encyclopedia of nonconformists, alternative lifestyles, and radical ideas in U.S. history/Gina Misiroglu, editor.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-0-7656-8060-0 (hardcover: alk. paper)

1. Counterculture—United States—History. 2. United States—Social life and customs. 3. Popular culture—United States—History. I. Misiroglu, Gina Renie.

HM647.A44 2009

306'.1—dc22

2008026227

Cover images (clockwise, starting in upper left corner) provided by the following: Bob Gomel/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images; Silver Screen Collection/Hulton Archive/Getty Images; John Olson/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images; Library of Congress; Stringer/Getty Images; Library of Congress.

Printed and bound in the United States of America

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of American National Standard for Information Sciences
Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials,
ANSI Z 39.48.1984.

(c) 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Publisher: Myron E. Sharpe
Vice President and Director of New Product Development: Donna Sanzone
Vice President and Production Director: Carmen Chetti
Executive Editor and Manager of Reference: Todd Hallman
Executive Development Editor: Jeff Hacker
Project Manager: Laura Brengelman
Program Coordinator: Cathleen Prisco
Text Design: Carmen Chetti and Jesse Sanchez
Cover Design: Jesse Sanchez

AMERICAN COUNTERCULTURES

Table of Contents

Introduction: American Countercultures–Nonconformists, Alternative Lifestyles, and Radical Ideas in U.S. History

A-Z Entries

Abbey, Edward \(1927–1989\)

Abolitionism

Abraham Lincoln Brigade

Absinthe

Abstract Expressionism

Acid Rock

Advertising

African Americans

Afrocentrism

Alcoholics Anonymous

Alcott, Amos Bronson \(1799–1888\)

Algonquin Round Table

Ali, Muhammad \(1942–\)

Alice's Restaurant

Alison, Francis \(1705–1779\)

Altamont Free Concert

Amana Society

American Indian Movement

Amish

Amphetamines and Speed Freaks

Anarchism

Anarchist Cookbook, The

Anderson, Laurie \(1947–\)

Anderson, Margaret \(1886–1973\)

Andrews, Stephen Pearl \(1812–1886\)

Anti-Freemasonry

Anti-Globalization Movement

Antinomianism

Apocalypse Culture

Apple Computer

Armory Show

Ashcan School

Asian Pride

Astrology

Atheism

Aurora Commune

Austin, Texas

Baby Boomers

Backus, Isaac \(1724–1806\)

Baez, Joan \(1941–\)
Baker, Chet \(1929–1988\)
Baker, Josephine \(1906–1975\)
Baldwin, James \(1924–1987\)
Baldwin, Roger \(1884–1981\)
Baraka, Amiri \(1934–\)
Barnes, Djuna \(1892–1982\)
Barnum, P.T. \(1810–1891\)
Beach, Sylvia \(1887–1962\)
Beat Generation
Beatles, The
Bebop
Be-Ins
Bellamy, Edward \(1850–1898\)
Ben & Jerry's
Berkeley, California
Berkman, Alexander \(1870–1936\)
Berlin Heights Commune
Berrigan, Daniel \(1921–\), and Philip Berrigan \(1923–2002\)
Bethel Commune
Bicycles
Bierce, Ambrose \(1842–1914?\)
Biker Culture
Birth Control Pill
Black Arts Movement
Black Mountain College
Black Muslims
Black Panthers
Black Power Movement
Blavatsky, Helena \(1831–1891\)
Bloggers
Blue Man Group
Blues Music
Body Arts
Bohemianism
Bookstores, Alternative
Boston Marriages
Bowery B'hoys and G'hals
Bowie, David \(1947–\)
Branch Davidians
Brando, Marlon \(1924–2004\)
Brautigan, Richard \(1935–1984\)
Brisbane, Albert \(1809–1890\)
Broadside
Brook Farm
Brown, H. Rap \(1943–\)
Brown Berets
Brownson, Orestes \(1803–1876\)

Bruce, Lenny \(1925–1966\)
Buddhism
Bukowski, Charles \(1920–1994\)
Buntline, Ned \(ca. 1823–1886\)
Burning Man Festival
Burns, Otway \(1775–1850\)
Burroughs, William S. \(1914–1997\)
Cambridge, Massachusetts
Carlin, George \(1937–2008\)
Carmichael, Stokely \(1941–1998\)
Carroll, Jim \(1950–2009\)
Carson, Rachel \(1907–1964\)
Cash, Johnny \(1932–2003\)
Castaneda, Carlos \(1925–1998\)
Catcher in the Rye, The
Catholic Worker Movement
CBGB
Cedar Tavern
Chautauqua Movement
Chávez, César \(1927–1993\)
Cheech and Chong
Chelsea Hotel
Cherry Lane Theatre
Chicago Seven
Chicano Moratorium
Chicano Movement
Chicano Theater
Chick, Jack \(1924–\)
Chomsky, Noam \(1928–\)
Christian Science
Circus and Carnival Culture
City College of New York
City Lights Books
Civil Rights Movement
Claflin, Tennessee \(1846–1923\)
Clapp, Henry \(1814–1875\)
Clare, Ada \(ca. 1836–1874\)
Cocaine
Coffeeshouses
COINTELPRO
Collins, Judy \(1939–\)
Columbia University
Come-Outers
Comics, Underground
Communes
Communism
Communitarianism
Con Artists

Conceptual Art
Conroy, Jack \(1898–1990\)
Conscientious Objectors, Draft Dodgers, and Deserters
Consciousness Raising
Conspiracy Theories
Cooperatives, Consumer
Cooperatives, Producer
Coyote, Peter \(1941–\)
Crumb, Robert \(1943–\)
Cults
Cummings, E.E. \(1894–1962\)
Cushman, Charlotte \(1816–1876\)
Cyberpunk
Daughters of Bilitis
Davis, Andrew Jackson \(1826–1910\)
Davis, Angela \(1944–\)
Davis, Miles \(1926–1991\)
Dean, James \(1931–1955\)
Debs, Eugene V. \(1855–1926\)
Deep Ecology
Deganawidah \(ca. 1500–ca. 1600\)
Delany, Martin R. \(1812–1885\)
Democratic Party
Dial, The
Dick, Philip K. \(1928–1982\)
Disco
Doonesbury
Douglass, Frederick \(ca. 1818–1895\)
Draft, Military
Drag
Drifters
Drug Culture
Du Bois, W.E.B. \(1868–1963\)
Dyer, Mary \(ca. 1611–1660\)
Dylan, Bob \(1941–\)
East Village, New York City
Eastman, Max \(1883–1969\), and Crystal Eastman \(1881–1928\)
Easy Rider
Eckankar
Ecstasy
Electrical Bananas
Ellison, Harlan \(1934–\)
Emerson, Ralph Waldo \(1803–1882\)
Emo and Hardcore
Encounter Groups
Environmentalism
Ephrata Cloister
Erhard Seminars Training \(est\)

Esalen Institute
Eugene, Oregon
Evergreen Review
Existentialism
Exorcism
Extrasensory Perception and Parapsychology
Farm, The
Farmers' Alliance
Fashion
Father Divine \(ca. 1877–1965\)
Federal Art Project
Federal Theatre Project
Federal Writers' Project
Feminism, First-Wave
Feminism, Second-Wave
Feminism, Third-Wave
Feminism, Social Justice
Ferlinghetti, Lawrence \(1919–\)
Fetish Culture
Film, Cult
Film, Hollywood
Film, Independent
Fitzgerald, F. Scott \(1896–1940\)
Fitzgerald, Zelda \(1900–1948\)
Flappers and Flapper Culture
Flower Children
Folk Music
Foster, Charles H. \(1838–1888\)
Fox, Kate \(1838–1892\), Leah Fox \(1814–1890\), and Margaret Fox \(1833–1893\)
Freaks, Freak Shows, and Freakatoriums
Free Love
Free Speech Movement
Free Universities
Freemasonry
Friedan, Betty \(1921–2006\)
Fruitlands
Fugs, The
Fuller, Margaret \(1810–1850\)
Fuller, R. Buckminster \(1895–1983\)
Fundamentalism, Christian
Gangs and Gang Culture
Gangsta Rap
Gangsters
Garrison, William Lloyd \(1805–1879\)
Garvey, Marcus \(1887–1940\)
Gay Liberation Movement
Gaye, Marvin \(1939–1984\)
Generation Gap

Generation X
Generation Y
Ghost Dance
Ginsberg, Allen \(1926–1997\)
Glam Rock
Goldman, Emma \(1869–1940\)
Gonzales, Rodolfo “Corky” \(1928–2005\)
Gonzo Journalism
Gorton, Samuel \(ca. 1592–1677\)
Goth Culture
Graffiti
Graham, Sylvester \(1794–1851\)
Grange, National
Grateful Dead
Gray Panthers
Great Depression
Greeley, Horace \(1811–1872\)
Green Party
Greening of America, The
Greenwich Village, New York City
Gregory, Dick \(1932–\)
Groupies
Grunge Rock
Guerrilla Girls
Guerrilla Theater
Guthrie, Woody \(1912–1967\)
Hackers
Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco
Hair
Happenings
Hare Krishna
Harlem Renaissance
Harmonialism
Harmony Society
Harris, Thomas Lake \(1823–1906\)
Hasidim and Hasidism
Hatch, Cora Scott \(1840–1923\)
Hawthorne, Nathaniel \(1804–1864\)
Haywood, William “Big Bill” \(1869–1928\)
Health Foods
Heaven’s Gate
Heavy Metal
Hecker, Isaac \(1819–1888\)
Hefner, Hugh \(1926–\)
Hells Angels
Hemingway, Ernest \(1899–1961\)
Hendrix, Jimi \(1942–1970\)
Heroin

Hester, Carolyn \(1937–\)
Hip-Hop
Hippies
Hitchhiking
Hoffman, Abbie \(1936–1989\)
Holiday, Billie \(1915–1959\)
hooks, bell \(1952–\)
Hopper, Dennis \(1936–\)
Hot-Rodding
Houdini, Harry \(1874–1926\)
Hughes, Langston \(1902–1967\)
Hurston, Zora Neale \(ca. 1891–1960\)
Hutchinson, Anne \(1591–1643\)
Huxley, Aldous \(1894–1963\)
Icarians
Indie Rock
Industrial Workers of the World
Ingersoll, Robert \(1833–1899\)
Internet
James, C.L.R. \(1901–1989\)
Jazz
Jefferson Airplane
Jehovah's Witnesses
Jemison, Mary \(1743–1833\)
Jesus People
Jews
Jews for Jesus
John Birch Society
John Reed Clubs
Joplin, Janis \(1943–1970\)
Kerouac, Jack \(1922–1969\)
Kesey, Ken \(1935–2001\)
King, Martin Luther, Jr. \(1929–1968\)
Kitchen, The
Knights of the Golden Circle
Ku Klux Klan
Kunstler, William \(1919–1995\)
Latino and Latina Culture
Le Sueur, Meridel \(1900–1996\)
Leary, Timothy \(1920–1996\)
Lee, Ann \(1736–1784\)
Lennon, John \(1940–1980\)
Lesbian Culture
Liberator, The
Lippmann, Walter \(1889–1974\)
Living Theatre
London, Jack \(1876–1916\)
Los Angeles, California

Lost Generation
Lovecraft, H.P. \(1890–1937\)
Love-Ins
Lowriders
LSD Research and Advocacy
Ludlow, Fitz Hugh \(1836–1870\)
Luhan, Mabel Dodge \(1879–1962\)
Lumpkin, Grace \(ca. 1891–1980\)
Lyceum Movement
Macfadden, Bernarr \(1868–1955\)
MAD
Madison, Wisconsin
Mafia
Magazines, Little
Magic and Magicians
Malcolm X
Manson Family
Mapplethorpe, Robert \(1946–1989\)
Marcuse, Herbert \(1898–1979\)
Marijuana Masses, The
Mattachine Society
Max, Peter \(1937–\)
MC5
McCarthy, Eugene \(1916–2005\)
McCarthyism
McKenna, Terence \(1946–2000\)
McLuhan, Marshall \(1911–1980\)
McPherson, Aimee Semple \(1890–1944\)
Me Decade
Media, Alternative
Medicine, Alternative
Medieval Reenactment
Menken, Adah Isaacs \(1835–1868\)
Mennonites
Men's Movements
Merry Pranksters
Mesmerism
Millay, Edna St. Vincent \(1892–1950\)
Miller, Henry \(1891–1980\)
Miller, William \(1782–1849\)
Mills, C. Wright \(1916–1962\)
Mod
Mod Squad, The
Modern Times
Mole People
Moonies
Moore, Michael \(1954–\)

Moravians
Mormonism
Morrison, Jim \(1943–1971\)
Morrison, Toni \(1931–\)
Morton, Thomas \(ca. 1576–1647\)
Mother Jones
Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlán
Ms.
MTV
Nader, Ralph \(1934–\)
Naropa University
Nation, The
National Lampoon
Native American Church
Native Americans
Neolin \(ca. 1720–ca. 1766\)
New Age
New Left
New School, The
New Thought
Newport Folk Festival
Newton, Huey \(1942–1989\)
Noyes, John Humphrey \(1811–1886\)
Nudism and Nudist Colonies
Nuyorican Poets Café
N.W.A.
Oberlin College
O'Brien, Fitz-James \(1828–1862\)
Ochs, Phil \(1940–1976\)
O'Keeffe, Georgia \(1887–1986\)
Omphalism
Oneida Community
O'Neill, Eugene \(1888–1953\)
Onion, The
Organic Farming
Outsider Art
Outsider Music
Owen, Robert Dale \(1801–1877\)
Pacifica Radio
Pacifism
Palahniuk, Chuck \(1962–\)
Palmer, Phoebe \(1807–1874\)
Patchen, Kenneth \(1911–1972\)
Peace and Freedom Party
Pentecostalism
People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals
Peoples Temple
Perfectionist Movement

Performance Art
Performance Space 122
Peter, Paul and Mary
Peyote
Pfaff's Cellar
Phish
Physical Culture Movement
Pilgrims
Piñero, Miguel \(1946–1988\)
Pirate Radio
Pirsig, Robert M. \(1928–\)
Poe, Edgar Allan \(1809–1849\)
Polar Bear Clubs
Pop, Iggy \(1947–\)
Pop Art
Populism
Pornography
Poster Art
Pound, Ezra \(1885–1972\)
Presley, Elvis \(1935–1977\)
Presses, Small Book
Priestley, Joseph \(1733–1804\)
Prohibition
Provincetown Players
Pryor, Richard \(1940–2005\)
Pseudoscience
Psychedelia
Psychobilly
Public Enemy
Pulp Fiction
Punk Rock
Puritans
Purple, Adam \(ca. 1932–\)
Pynchon, Thomas \(1937–\)
Quakers
Queer Nation
Radio
Ramones, The
Rand, Ayn \(1905–1982\)
Randolph, A. Philip \(1889–1979\)
Rankin, Jeannette \(1880–1973\)
Rap Music
Rastafari Movement
Rave Culture
Ray, Man \(1890–1976\)
Realist, The
Recycling
Reed, John \(1887–1920\)

Reed, Lou \(1942–\)
Regulators
Reich, Wilhelm \(1897–1957\)
R.E.M.
Rexroth, Kenneth \(1905–1982\)
Rice, Thomas Dartmouth \(1808–1860\)
Riot Grrrl
Ripley, George \(1802–1880\)
Rivers, Larry \(1923–2002\)
Robbins, Tom \(1936–\)
Robeson, Paul \(1898–1976\)
Rock and Roll
Rocky Horror Picture Show, The
Role-Playing Games
Rolling Stone
Rolling Stones, The
Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In
Rubin, Jerry \(1938–1994\)
Sacco and Vanzetti Case
Salinger, J.D. \(1919–2010\)
San Francisco, California
Sanger, Margaret \(1879–1966\)
Santería
Saxton, Alexander P. \(1919–\)
Schools, Alternative and Experimental Science Fiction
Scientology
Seattle, Washington
Seeger, Pete \(1919–\)
Settlement Houses
Seven Arts, The
Sex Trade and Prostitution
Sexual Revolution
Shakers
Shakur, Tupac \(1971–1996\)
Simpsons, The
Sinclair, Upton \(1878–1968\)
Ska
Skateboarders
Slang
Slave Culture
Sloan, John \(1871–1951\)
Slow Movement
Smith, Joseph \(1805–1844\)
Smith, Patti \(1946–\)
Smoking, Tobacco
Smothers Brothers
Snoop Dogg \(1971–\)

Snyder, Gary \(1930–\)
Social Gospel
Socialism
South Park
Spiritualism
Spock, Benjamin \(1903–1998\)
Sports
Squatters and Squatting
Stein, Gertrude \(1874–1946\)
Straight Edge Culture
Streaking
Students for a Democratic Society
Studio 54
Suffragists
Surfing and Surfer Culture
Surrealists
Survivalists
Swedenborgianism
Talking Heads
Taos, New Mexico
Television Temperance Movement
Theater, Alternative
Theosophy
Thoreau, Henry David \(1817–1862\)
Tramps and Hoboes
Transcendental Meditation
Transcendentalism
Transsexuals
Transvestites
Trekkies
Turner, Nat \(1800–1831\)
Twain, Mark \(1835–1910\)
UFOs
Unabomber Underground Railroad
Unitarianism
United Farm Workers
Universal Negro Improvement Association
Up Against the Wall Motherfucker
Utopianism
Vegetarianism
Venice, California
Vietnam War Protests
Village Voice, The
Volkswagen Beetle
Vonnegut, Kurt, Jr. \(1922–2007\)
Voodoo, Hoodoo, and Conjure

Vorse, Mary Heaton \(1874–1966\)
Ward, Nancy \(ca. 1738–1822\)
Warhol, Andy \(1928–1987\)
Waters, John \(1946–\)
Watson, Thomas E. \(1856–1922\)
Watts, Alan \(1915–1973\)
Wavy Gravy \(1936–\)
Weathermen
White Supremacists
Whitman, Walt \(1819–1892\)
Whole Earth Catalog
Wilkinson, Jemima \(1752–1819\)
Williams, Roger \(ca. 1603–1683\)
Witchcraft and Wicca
Woodhull, Victoria \(1838–1927\)
Woodstock Music and Art Fair
Woolman, John \(1720–1772\)
Wright, Frances \(1795–1852\)
Wright, Richard \(1908–1960\)
X-Files, The
Yippies
Yoga
Young, Brigham \(1801–1877\)
Zappa, Frank \(1940–1993\)
Zines
Zoarites
Zoot-Suiters

Primary Documents

The Trial of Anne Hutchinson \(1637\)
John Woolman's Journal \(1757\)
Message by Nancy Ward to the Cherokee Council \(1817\)
The Confessions of Nat Turner \(1832\)
"Plan of the West Roxbury Community" or Brook Farm \(1842\), Elizabeth Palmer Peabody
The Declaration of Sentiments, Seneca Falls Convention \(1848\)
"Where I Lived, and What I Lived For," Walden \(1854\), Henry David Thoreau
Hand-Book of the Oneida Community \(1867\)
Woman's Christian Temperance Union "Do Everything" Policy \(1893\)
Speech at Founding Convention of the Industrial Workers of the World \(1905\), Eugene V. Debs
The Woman Rebel \(1914\), Margaret Sanger
"I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier \(1915\)"
"Anarchism: What It Really Stands For" \(1917\), Emma Goldman
Harlem Renaissance Poetry \(1922\)
House Committee on Un-American Activities, Testimony of Screenwriter Albert Maltz \(1947\)
Port Huron Statement \(1962\)
"I Have a Dream" \(1963\), Martin Luther King, Jr.
"The Times They Are A-Changin'" \(1964\), Bob Dylan
"An End to History" \(1964\), Mario Savio

Unsafe at Any Speed \(1965\), Ralph Nader

Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee Position Paper: On Vietnam \(1966\)

Black Panther Party Platform and Program \(1966\)

National Organization for Women, Statement of Purpose \(1966\)

"A Walk on the Wild Side of Stonewall" \(1969\), Robert Amsel

Master Bibliography

Books and Articles

Web Sites

Filmography

Introduction: American Countercultures—Nonconformists, Alternative Lifestyles, and Radical Ideas in U.S. History

Provocative, protean, and elusive, the term counterculture defies pat explanations as surely as those who have participated in counterculture movements have defied the customs and conventions of their time and place.

It is useful to begin with the dictionary. Culture is defined by the American Heritage Dictionary (2006; fourth edition) as “the totality of socially transmitted behavior patterns, arts, beliefs, institutions, and all other products of human work and thought.” The prefix counter- means, of course, contrary to or opposing. A counterculture, then, is a movement that stands in opposition to the conventional “products of human work and thought.” It is a culture in its own right, but one whose core values and lifestyle stand outside the mainstream and that, actively or implicitly, seeks to change the status quo.

Another way of understanding the concept is by example. Today, most people associate the counterculture with a specific period in history—the 1960s—and the youth movement that flourished during that time. In fact, countercultures in the truest sense have played a prominent role in American history from the very beginning. And, as the entries in this work convey, countercultures may be essentially political, social, religious, or artistic in character.

This is not to say that the realms of interest cannot, or do not, intersect. Thus, for example, the Puritan settlers of colonial New England in the early seventeenth century, themselves separatists from the Church of England, established the civic and social authority of the Massachusetts Bay Colony as well the religious orthodoxy. Likewise, the temperance movement of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries began as a social reform effort—to improve public morals—and culminated in the political groundswell that enacted national Prohibition in 1919. In the post–World War II era, the Beat Generation of the 1950s and early 1960s, followed by the hippie movement of the 1960s, were at once countercultures of radical literature and music, nonconformist lifestyles and social impropriety, and antiwar politics.

Examples throughout the course of U.S. history—the full range of which are represented among the A–Z entries in this encyclopedia—underscore another characteristic that both muddles and animates the concept of counterculture. This is the very concept of change. Sometimes a counterculture becomes part of the dominant culture and thus becomes itself subject to opposition. Sometimes its ideals and leaders become the foundation of a whole new opposition movement. Sometimes it just fades away.

Thus, the Puritans of Massachusetts came to be challenged by such dissenters as Roger Williams, Anne Hutchinson, and Mary Dyer. The cause of alcohol abstinence, at least as a definable movement, essentially died with the failure and repeal of Prohibition. And the youth counterculture of the 1960s, which challenged many of the same mainstream values as the Beat Generation before it—materialism, conformism, and middle-class social norms—would hear its rock and roll anthems used in commercial advertising before the end of the century.

At any moment in time, it may be difficult to distinguish the counterculture from the dominant culture. Why and how some live, grow, and transform, while others die or are co-opted by mainstream forces, remains something of a mystery, and an issue to consider in reading the wide-ranging articles in this encyclopedia.

Patterns and Types

While every counterculture in American history has been unique—by definition, every counterculture is different—certain patterns in the way countercultures form, the way they operate, and, in many cases, the way they fade away emerge on closer inspection. First, of course, countercultures coalesce and exist in opposition to the dominant culture in some way and represent either a rejection of that culture or a conscious attempt to reform it from without.

Second, countercultures occupy a space separate from that of society at large. Sometimes, this has meant physical separation, as in the case of the utopian communities of the nineteenth century and the back-to-nature communes of the late twentieth century. More often, however, the space is conceptual, a distance of mind and spirit that allows participants to live in ways distinct from the lifestyle of the dominant culture or to view the larger society from a critical distance. For example, hip-hop culture emerged in the physical space of late-twentieth- and early-twenty-first-century urban America, yet offered both a distinctive lifestyle and a critique of the dominant culture.

Third, countercultures offer a unique framework of ideas through which participants view their own identity and their relationship to society at large. Thus, in the radical labor-union culture of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Industrial Workers of the World allowed its members to rethink their role as citizens of a democracy, even as it offered them a new way to challenge their roles as workers in a capitalist system.

Other characteristics, while common, are not universal. Many countercultures, for example, are created and sustained by charismatic leaders, such as the colony established by Samuel Gorton, a dissident Puritan leader of the seventeenth century or, more notoriously, the homicidal cult “family” presided over by Charles Manson in the 1960s and 1970s. And while many countercultures do not seek to evangelize their beliefs, a good number either seek to recruit adherents—this is particularly the case with religious groups—or seek to change the larger society, as in the case of the temperance movement or the modern anti-globalization movement.

Finally, countercultures generally go through a life cycle, often beginning with a small group of adherents who follow the teachings of a charismatic leader. Separation from mainstream society—either physically, ideologically, or both—then takes place.

Next, the movement begins to grow, sometimes slowly and fitfully, as did that of the Zoarites, a religious society of the early nineteenth century. In other instances, the movement grows rapidly and to great size, as its ideas or lifestyle choices attract new followers. Such was the case with the populist political movement of the late nineteenth century and the civil rights movement of the 1960s.

In either case, many countercultures then go into decline for various reasons. For one, the counterculture may develop an orthodoxy of its own that repels members who, by their very nature, tend to resist conventional thinking. For example, the Puritan dissidents in the Massachusetts Bay Colony were expelled from the colony. Because many of the people attracted to countercultures are independent thinkers, ideological and interpersonal rifts may develop inside the movement that may cause it to implode; this was the case among the late-nineteenth-century populists.

Finally—and importantly—because countercultures by definition represent a departure from and a challenge to mainstream values, lifestyles, and tastes, they often attract the wrath of outsiders. These opponents may be ordinary citizens who are offended by the unorthodox ideas or behaviors of a particular group, or they may be government officials at any level who feel compelled to exert their authority to protect and preserve social convention. Thus, while the Mormon Church ultimately thrived at its desert outpost in Utah, early adherents repeatedly were driven from settlements in the East by ostracism and violence—hostility that the U.S. government failed to prevent or punish.

By their very nature, countercultures defy categories. And while most examples of American counterculture defy easy categorization, history reveals a pattern of organizing principles and orientations. The anarchist and communist movements of the early twentieth century were primarily political in ideology and goals. The producer cooperatives of the late nineteenth century were founded as alternatives to the economic structures of the dominant capitalist order.

Other groups and movements have been based on shared identity, be it race (Black Muslims), gender (feminism), sexual orientation (the Mattachine Society and Daughters of Bilitis), or age (baby boomers and members of Generation X or Generation Y). Still other movements are artistically oriented, such as the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s and 1930s, and the folk music revival of the 1950s and 1960s. More recently, the environmental movement has provided an overarching set of ideas and principles for counterculture, specifically those espoused by the deep ecology movement. Finally, of course, there is an unending succession of countercultures oriented around lifestyle choices and recreational interests, from nudists and health food enthusiasts to Polar Bear Clubs and skateboarders.

Of all the countercultures in American history, the earliest, the most ubiquitous, and arguably the most influential—from the Puritans, Quakers, and Amish of the colonial era to the Christian Scientists, Pentecostals, Moonies, and Scientologists of later centuries—have been the religious and spiritual ones. These movements have punctuated American cultural history like the “hallelujahs” of an exuberant church service.

Religious Countercultures

Because it involves the very highest of stakes—nothing less than the fate of a person’s soul and the moral strictures by which people live their lives and organize their society—religion often compels the kind of radical thinking and lifestyle choices that are at the heart of most countercultures. The first of America’s religious countercultures—arguably, the very first counterculture of any type in American history—was that of the Puritans. In many ways, it set the pattern for those that would follow.

As radical Protestant reformers in England, the Puritans had broken away from the established church. While they had been part of the larger English society, at least for a time, they created a separate social and ideological space, marrying, building friendships, and doing business among themselves. When hostile popular sentiment or government repression intruded upon that space, some members, called Pilgrims, sought physical separation across the Atlantic Ocean.

Still, the Puritans did not oppose all aspects of the religious orthodoxy. They simply believed the Anglican Church had not gone far enough in ridding itself of Catholic impurities—hence the derogatory label of “Puritans” applied by theological opponents. Indeed, virtually all religious countercultures in American history have coalesced around the idea of either improving the faith (such as the Shakers); reforming it to meet the needs of the contemporary world (the nineteenth-century Ghost Dance movement among Native Americans); or returning the faith to its original, purer form (Christian fundamentalists of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries).

Puritanism also offered new ideas to live by and new ways of living. Predestination, the theological idea that God predetermined the fate of every human being at the beginning of time, was a radical new way to think about one's soul. Puritans could never divine God's will, but they could see signs of it in his favor. Living a morally upright life, working hard, and eschewing luxury and sin were signs that one had become a member of the "elect"—that is, those persons chosen by God to enter the kingdom of heaven. Likewise, other religious countercultures in American history, from the Quakers of the seventeenth century to the Black Muslims of the twentieth, have offered alternative ways of living and thinking that, believers hold, are sanctioned by a higher power.

While charismatic leaders were not necessarily the driving force behind Puritanism, followers did place great spiritual and secular power in the hands of their clergy. It was these men of the cloth, they felt, who best understood God's will and could interpret who was a member of the elect and who was not. Many later religious countercultures in American history, however, were organized around charismatic or even messianic leaders. Some of these leaders were relatively benign, such as Father Divine, a black Baptist preacher who created a cult following around himself in the early twentieth century. Others ultimately proved to be demonic, such as the Reverend Jim Jones, who led his Peoples Temple followers to the jungles of South America in the 1970s and presided over their mass suicide.

The Puritans settled into an orthodoxy that allowed for little dissent and was unable to adjust to the times. Such intolerance prompted a number of dissidents to break from the church and physically remove themselves from its authority. Similarly, the Mormon Church's official disavowal of polygamy—a central component of its original doctrine—in 1890 gave rise to breakaway fundamentalist sects that continue to defy public opinion and law enforcement into the twenty-first century. And, finally, while the Pilgrims merely sought separation from England, later Puritans, while not exactly evangelists in the modern sense of the word, had a larger agenda: to create a moral society that would become a model for England.

Subsequent religious countercultures generally have followed one of three models in their relationship to the society at large. A few, such as the Amish and Amana communities, following in the Pilgrims' footsteps, have sought merely a separate space for members to worship and live as they please. Most religious countercultures, however, have actively appealed for new adherents. Some have done so by setting a model of belief or establishing a way of life that others would want to join; the Quakers are a case in point. More often, however, religious countercultures have sought to bring in new members through evangelization. Examples are legion.

Political and Economic Countercultures

Political and economic forms of radicalism, in and of themselves, are not the basis for countercultures. Many adherents of dissident ideologies do not separate themselves from society at large, nor do they practice unorthodox lifestyles. For instance, the populists of the late nineteenth century, whose critique of the emerging corporate-dominated political order was radical for its (or any other) day, generally were salt-of-the-earth types: Socially conservative farmers and small businessmen of the Midwest and South made up much of the movement's rank and file.

At the same time, however, adherence to a radical ideology often does go hand in hand with a critique of mainstream social custom and practice. Some members of early nineteenth-century utopian communities—essentially economic experiments organized around communal labor, production, and surplus—also advocated and sometimes lived the doctrine of free love, which overturned traditional marriage arrangements, family organization, and sexual practices. Or, to take a more recent example, many followers of the late twentieth- and early twenty-first-century anti-globalization cause, a political movement critical of multinational corporate capitalism, also subscribe to a belief system critical of, and a lifestyle eschewing, many of the accoutrements of modern consumer culture.

This overlap aside, political and economic movements often embrace a distinct culture of their own. Sometimes, as in the case of nineteenth-century utopianists who established Brook Farm in Massachusetts, New Harmony in Indiana, and other experimental communities, the countercultural elements were explicit. These communes were set up consciously as both economic and social alternatives to the increasingly commercial mainstream culture, and participants, often following charismatic leaders, separated themselves physically from the larger society. Such communal experiments often succumbed to predictable countercultural pathologies, as dissidents within the group resisted the new orthodoxy, creating rifts that could not be healed. This was the downfall of the most recent avatars of utopian communities, the hippie communes of the 1960s and 1970s.

But explicit separation from mainstream society was not necessary for a political or economic counterculture to emerge. The rural socialists, or “red farmers,” of the late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century Midwest lived within ordinary social convention, with their traditional families on individually owned farms. Nevertheless, they developed a culture distinct from the mainstream, with their own newspapers and social networks, including periodic wagon caravans and weeklong, revival-type outdoor encampments, where they listened to orators preaching the socialist gospel and commingled with fellow believers in a party-like atmosphere. In the middle years of the twentieth century, being a Communist meant not just subscribing to a political and economic ideology; it also meant attending concerts, dances, and get-togethers with fellow radicals—sometimes featuring communist-inspired performers such as Paul Robeson—and even sending children to communist summer camps.

Identity Countercultures

For much of American history, ethnic and racial diversity was not a particularly celebrated idea. Although the country was a meeting ground for peoples from four continents—Native Americans, Europeans, and Africans from the beginning, and Asians from the mid-nineteenth century onward—persons of non-European origin were shunted to the sidelines of U.S. society and culture.

Women were second-class citizens expected to defer to their fathers until marriage, and their husbands thereafter. Persons of alternative sexual orientation, such as nineteenth-century poet Walt Whitman, risked persecution or worse for being too open with their sexual proclivities. And while all age groups obviously have been represented in American society from its origins, the idea of a distinctive culture associated with teenagers and young adults or, for that matter, the elderly, had to await the prosperity of the twentieth century, when a growing middle class and government programs made it possible for the young and old alike to indulge in age-appropriate lifestyles.

Native Americans, of course, had their own cultures beyond the frontier, while African Americans, both slave and free, lived by necessity in a physically separate milieu with its own distinctive culture, shackled by poverty and shunned by mainstream white society. Women had their own social networks, even if—with the possible exception of the early years of first-wave feminism—a consciously created, identity-based women’s counterculture, politically focused or otherwise, was largely unknown in America until the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Most of the early experiments in identity-based countercultural expression resulted from the same forces that produced the political and social radicalism of the era—that is, the dislocations caused by urbanization, modernization, and industrialization. The late-nineteenth-century Ghost Dance, for example, was a response to the final onslaught of white westward expansion, as tens of thousands of Native Americans put their tribal identities behind them and joined a pan-Indian movement that they hoped would help them to remove white people from their midst. Black separatism and nationalism, first emerging on a mass scale with Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association in the 1920s, was a response to the large-scale migration of African Americans from the rural South to the urban North.

But it was the post–World War II era that saw the great efflorescence of identity-based countercultures, from the civil rights and Black Power movements to second-wave feminist consciousness raising, the American Indian Movement, the Chicano Movement, and the age-based movements of hippies and Gray Panthers. Political agitation, a general easing of mainstream cultural conservatism, and growing economic abundance all were factors in the emergence of identity-based countercultures, but the process was ultimately dialectical. The various identity-based movements insisted on acceptance of alternative ways of thinking and living by mainstream society, even as that acceptance made the social and political space available for the countercultures to emerge and thrive.

Nowhere has this process been more evident than in the gay and lesbian countercultures. Once shunned and persecuted, gay men and women began to agitate for equal rights and push their alternative lifestyles into the public forum beginning in the 1950s, becoming more open about it in the late 1960s and 1970s. While this led to cultural backlash at various times, it also created a growing acceptance of gay identity, particularly among younger Americans, even as it encouraged more closeted individuals to express themselves culturally.

Art and Counterculture

American history is dotted with artistic and literary countercultures, from the circle of artists, writers, intellectuals, and other assorted bohemians congregating at Pfaff's Cellar, a drinking establishment in Manhattan's Greenwich Village, in the mid-nineteenth century to the coffeehouses of San Francisco frequented by Beat writers in the 1950s to Andy Warhol's pop art "Factory" in 1960s and 1970s New York. Indeed, artists often have been at the forefront of nontraditional lifestyles, living in bohemian subcultures on the margins of "respectable" society.

It is in their work and creative vision, however, that artists and writers have played the most influential role in the history of American countercultures. Works of art and literature are, almost by definition, countercultural expressions, as they attempt to reformulate the way people see themselves and the world in which they live. Much art and literature entails an implicit—and sometimes explicit—critique of mainstream values and lifestyles.

It is not surprising, then, that cutting-edge art, music, literature, and film frequently have been appropriated by those pursuing alternative lifestyles and visions. Henry David Thoreau's Walden (1854), a book-length meditation on the spiritual costs of industrialization and materialism, inspired many nineteenth-century utopianists, while the hot rhythms of early jazz music spoke to a generation of "flappers" eager to shed their inhibitions and to challenge traditional sexual morality.

Still, it was not until the post–World War II era that art and counterculture became most intimately connected. In the 1950s, Allen Ginsberg's Howl (publicly recited in 1955), a frenzied poetic meditation on the emptiness of modern culture, and Jack Kerouac's bohemian novel On the Road (1957), offered critiques of the kind of social conformism that the beatnik generation was eager to confront, or escape.

A decade later, the poster art of Peter Max offered a vision of how psychedelic drugs such as LSD could help liberate the mind from conventional ways of seeing. And, of course, folk music and rock and roll provided an endless stream of antiestablishment lyrics, wailing guitar licks, and pulsing drumbeats for rebellious youth of the 1960s—from Bob Dylan's protest songs "Blowin' in the Wind" (1963) and "The Times They Are A-Changin'" (1964) to the Beatles' psychedelia-influenced album Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band (1967).

Even intellectuals found their work appropriated by the counterculture. Philosopher Herbert Marcuse's call to rebel against the soul-killing effects of the bureaucracy—as put forth in such best-selling books as One-Dimensional Man (1964)—was taken up by New Left activists and countercultural iconoclasts of the 1960s and 1970s.

Lifestyle and Recreational Countercultures

Alternative lifestyles have been part of many, if not most, American counterculture movements, from the economic utopianisms of the early nineteenth century to the New Age spiritualisms of the late twentieth century. Yet some counterculture movements in the course of American history have been explicitly and primarily predicated on alternative lifestyles—either offering participants a new way of living, such as the back-to-nature communes of the 1960s, or a social network in which to indulge lifestyle choices, such as the goth youth culture that arose in the late 1970s.

The Woodstock open-air music festival, held on a dairy farm in upstate New York over three days in August 1969, was the culminating event of the 1960s hippie counterculture. More than 400,000 soaked in the music, rain, and communal vibes. (John Dominis/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

As components of larger counterculture movements, alternative lifestyles have been part of the American scene from early days. The Puritans, for example, believed that their strict adherence to biblical precepts offered an alternative way of living; the Shaker emphasis on simplicity was said to represent a distinctive new approach to material culture. Nevertheless, it was not until the post–World War II era that true lifestyle countercultures emerged in the full sense.

The key was economic growth and stability. While there have been countercultures based primarily on economic need—such as the hobo culture of the early twentieth century and the squatters movement of the latter part of the century—the broad-based prosperity afforded by modern consumer society offered the American people the leisure time, income, and freedom from financial insecurity to indulge in alternative lifestyles as a matter of choice.

Thus, beginning in the late 1940s, America saw a proliferation of lifestyle-based countercultures, though they took a variety of forms. Back-to-nature communes, the hippie culture in urban enclaves from San Francisco’s Haight-Ashbury to New York City’s East Village, and others represented a rejection of abundance, as participants concluded that consumption and materialism were not the roads to happier, more fulfilling lives but rather obstacles to them. Other countercultural lifestyles were about purifying the self. Nudists dispensed with clothing, advocates of the Physical Culture movement emphasized athletics and clean living, and health food aficionados sought to rid the body of adulterated substances.

Not surprisingly, however, many alternative lifestyle cultures have been hedonistic in orientation—more about indulging the senses and reveling in materialism than denying those aspects of modern capitalist abundance. Central to contemporary American life, automobiles, along with motorcycles, have featured prominently in alternative lifestyles, from aficionados of hot-rods and lowriders to members of the Hells Angels.

Cabinet of Wonders

As revealed by even a cursory look at the contents of this work, the history of American countercultures is about many things—not just movements and people, but places (from academic Cambridge, Massachusetts, to hedonistic Venice, California) and events, whether occurring over many years (the civil rights movement), lasting just a few days (the Woodstock music festival in 1969), or recurring on a regular basis (the annual Burning Man Festival). It is also about forms of artistic expression, whether entire genres (punk rock and outsider art) or specific works (The Catcher in the Rye, 1951, and The Rocky Horror Picture Show, 1975); ideas and ideologies, whether political (pacifism and McCarthyism), economic (socialism and advertising), philosophical (existentialism and transcendentalism), or spiritual (Theosophy and Unitarianism); consumer products (the Volkswagen Beetle) and substances (marijuana); or that most un-counter-cultural phenomenon—the institution (the Democratic Party and the Apple Computer Company).

The history of American countercultures generally has reflected the political and social left wing (the Free Speech Movement and Weatherman), but from time to time it has included right-wing reactionaries (the Ku Klux Klan and white supremacists). In short, American countercultures have been as complex and diverse as the America they have critiqued, opposed, and, in many ways, irretrievably altered.

If, then, the dictionary definition that began this introduction provided a useful first step in understanding the nature and dynamics of American countercultures, the rest of this encyclopedia takes readers on a long and fascinating journey through time, space, and a wealth of bold ideas. A subject as kaleidoscopic as this can best be understood in all its diversity and elusiveness through the accumulation of historical example—a cabinet of wonders as engaging and informative as American Countercultures.

James Ciment

Abbey, Edward (1927–1989)

Novelist, essayist, and activist Edward Abbey was one of the most influential and radical environmentalists of the twentieth century. He is said to have introduced the Earth Day generation to the desert Southwest, describing the area's vast publicly owned wildernesses not only as spaces of pristine natural beauty, but also as touchstones of freedom. For Abbey and his hundreds of thousands of avid readers, the most important way to oppose the cancerous growth of industrial capitalism was by defending nature, humanity's first home.

Born on January 29, 1927, to a socialist farmer and a schoolteacher in the town of Indiana, Pennsylvania, Abbey developed a unique version of environmentalism. He rejected the Stalinism of the Communist Party in favor of the ideas of Russian anarchist Peter Kropotkin. In his master's thesis at the University of New Mexico, Abbey commented on the morality of political violence, concluding that sabotage is acceptable so long as no human is hurt.

Like many World War II veterans, Abbey had left behind the crowded East Coast, sinking new roots in the American Southwest. The lonely deserts of the Four Corners states (Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona) embodied for him a kind of individual freedom he found lacking during the 1950s of the conformist Dwight D. Eisenhower administration.

Western cities were doubling in population every decade, and Abbey came to believe that a corporate ideology of growth for growth's sake threatened the land he had come to love. From the moment he burned his first billboard, Abbey devoted himself to protecting the wilderness of his adopted home. While he did participate in the kind of direct action he called "night work," it was his environmental writing that mounted the most effective challenge to land development.

In his twenty-one books of fiction and nonfiction, Abbey developed a unique cross-pollination of anarchism and environmentalism. Desert Solitaire, published in 1968 at the height of the 1960s counterculture, describes his experiences as a ranger at Arches National Park outside Moab, Utah. (Abbey served as a park ranger and fire watcher for the U.S. National Park Service from 1956 to 1971.) The book's polemical and lyrical essays show how close, firsthand knowledge of a specific place can inspire a deep environmentalist commitment.

Abbey was an instinctive contrarian, never shying away from an extreme stand. In his best-selling novel The Monkey Wrench Gang (1975), which inspired the founding of the radical environmentalist organization Earth First!, Abbey tells the rip-roaring tale of a band of four saboteurs who pull up survey stakes, sabotage road-building equipment, and derail coal trains, all to defend the deserts against profiteering by malignant energy corporations.

Likewise, in an infamous speech delivered at the University of Montana in April 1985, "The Cowboy and His Cow," Abbey accused Western ranchers of dependency on state subsidies and characterized the land as overgrazed. Indeed, he said, it was cow-burnt, covered with "hordes of disease-spreading brutes who trample soil and grass into dust and weeds."

Abbey's ideological pugilism sometimes led him, especially late in life, to take reactionary positions. In a widely reprinted article titled "Immigration and Liberal Taboos" (from his 1988 book One Life at a Time, Please), he argued for closing the border with Mexico, blaming poverty in the United States on Latin American immigrants. He concluded by recommending that people attempting to enter the United States be armed with rifles and sent back home to overthrow foreign governments put in power by Washington, D.C. In a similarly reactionary spirit, Abbey's remarks on gender frequently alluded to Social Darwinist ideas about the naturalness of male sexual dominance.

Despite his often controversial positions, Abbey remains a prominent counterculture icon in the American West. He is credited with inaugurating the radical environmentalist movement and introducing an entire generation to the canyons of the Colorado Plateau—an area that has since come to be known as "Abbey Country."

Until his death on March 14, 1989, Abbey remained a complex figure. He offered the following as his writer's credo: "Why write? Among many other reasons, to defend the honesty of man against the lies and lying institutions of caste and hierarchy and power, of church and state, of technology and war, the heavy machinery of domination that has been attempting for five thousand years to enslave us all."

Lance Newman

See also: Deep Ecology; Environmentalism.

Further Reading

Abbey, Edward. Desert Solitaire: A Season in the Wilderness. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1968.

Abbey, Edward. The Monkey Wrench Gang. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1975.

Abbey, Edward. One Life at a Time, Please. New York: Holt, 1988.

Cahalan, James. Edward Abbey: A Life. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 2001.

Loeffler, Jack. Adventures with Ed: A Portrait of Abbey. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 2002.

Abolitionism

Abolitionism was the doctrine and movement that called for the emancipation of all slaves and the end of the institution of slavery. The term has referred to somewhat different views and activities in different historical contexts.

Some abolitionists, particularly in the early years of the American movement, called for a gradualist approach; others fought for immediate emancipation. There also were disputes over whether, upon emancipation, former slave owners should be compensated for their lost property. In ideological and policy terms, nineteenth-century abolitionism in the United States also was distinct from the broader antislavery ideology, which often addressed nothing more than preventing the further expansion of the slave system into the new territories of the American West.

Early Abolitionism

Some of the first abolitionists were slaves themselves. From the very origins of the slave system in colonial North America during the early seventeenth century, Africans and African Americans fought to free themselves through rebellion, escape, self-purchase, and legal action. Black resistance to slavery ultimately led to abolitionism as a political movement in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, involving both free blacks and their white allies.

This movement inspired antislavery sentiment in the North, and it compelled a Southern white reaction that ultimately led to secession and civil war. Abolitionists did not by themselves bring about the American Civil War, nor did they achieve racial justice. Nevertheless, their movement to bring about the end of slavery profoundly affected America's social, cultural, and political landscape from colonial times through the end of the Civil War in 1865.

Among the most influential white abolitionists during the colonial era were members of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, a dissident sect that first settled in North America in the 1670s. Many Quakers became slaveholders upon arriving in the colonies, but their doctrine that God's inner light unites all humans and their strict adherence to nonviolence led some to oppose slavery. One of the first Quaker abolitionists was George Keith, who, in 1693, published An Exhortation and Caution to Friends Concerning the Buying and Keeping of Negroes. By the mid-eighteenth century, Quakers such as Benjamin Lay, John Woolman, and Anthony Benezet worked to convince their brethren of the sinfulness of slaveholding. In the 1760s and 1770s, Quakers ended their participation in the slave trade, and, by 1788, Quakers in New England, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia had freed their slaves.

During the Revolutionary period, African American abolitionists took the lead in pressing for an end to slavery. Black men fought on both sides in the American Revolution, and black abolitionists used the opportunity to press state legislatures to end slavery, especially in the North. By 1790, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont all had abolished slavery. In the 1790s, Richard Allen and Absalom Jones, both former slaves from Delaware, established independent black churches in Philadelphia, thus helping to strengthen the foundation of the nineteenth-century black abolitionist movement.

The Revolutionary era also saw the rise of the first organized white antislavery societies in America. Quakers led the effort among whites, but they were soon joined by non-Quakers. Some who joined the movement did so based on ideals of the common rights of all men, pointing out that slavery contradicted the values of the Revolution. Others based their support on religious beliefs, warning of divine punishment for slaveholding. Prominent Americans such as Benjamin Rush, Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay helped to organize antislavery societies in the new republic.

Unlike their successors, who would demand an immediate end to slavery and equal rights for blacks, abolitionists during the Revolutionary era sought gradual emancipation and limited citizenship for free blacks. Many white leaders of the new antislavery societies—as well as the new government—did not free their own black servants.

Radical Abolitionism

A third generation of both black and white abolitionists emerged by the 1820s, in the midst of the Second Great Awakening, a sweeping revivalist movement that was accompanied by a wave of social activism. In 1829, David Walker, a black man who had been born free in North Carolina during the 1790s and had moved to Boston during the mid-1820s, published his Appeal to the Colored Citizens of the World, fueling a more militant, increasingly interracial abolitionist movement.

In the summer of 1830, after having read Walker's Appeal, a longtime social reformer and abolitionist originally from Newburyport, Massachusetts, William Lloyd Garrison, launched a speaking tour in which he called for the immediate, uncompensated end to slavery and the granting of black civil equality. In December 1833, Garrison and other abolitionists formed the American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS), the most influential abolitionist organization of that time.

The AASS was based in New York City, but abolitionists in other states soon formed their own antislavery societies. By 1837, there were 274 local societies in New York, 145 in Massachusetts, and 213 in Ohio; by the following year, the AASS claimed 1,350 local affiliates and 250,000 members. African Americans and white women participated directly in some of the local societies; in others, they formed auxiliaries.

The American Anti-Slavery Almanac was launched in the 1830s as the organ of the American Anti-Slavery Society. The society and its journal were the first to challenge the economic necessity of slavery and call for abolition. (Library of Congress)

In its 1838 Declaration of Sentiments, the AASS called for immediate emancipation without expatriation and the granting of all the rights and privileges of citizenship to freed slaves. Members relied on the tactic of "moral suasion" to spread their message across the North and South. The idea behind this approach was that, through propaganda and political agitation outside the halls of government, abolitionists could appeal to the better nature of slaveholders, persuading them to terminate their participation in an immoral system. Members of the AASS employed traveling speakers, distributed documents, published the weekly Emancipator, and coordinated petition drives and postal campaigns, all in an effort to arouse antislavery sentiment among both Northerners and Southerners, as well as in the U.S. Congress.

Despite its best efforts, the AASS proved shortlived. The organization disintegrated between 1838 and 1840, primarily because of internal disagreements over the relationship of abolitionists to the nation's churches, the feasibility and morality of an abolitionist political party, and the role of African American men and women, as well as white women, within the organization. By the early 1840s, American abolitionists had rallied around several key figures in the movement, most notably Garrison and Lewis Tappan, an evangelical New York merchant and founding member of the AASS. Garrison, who was left in charge of a much-diminished AASS, became more steadfast in his support of women's rights and his criticism of orthodox Christianity. He also increasingly adopted a doctrine known as nonresistance, which opposed all forms of human government that relied on the use of force. By 1843, Garrison was denouncing the U.S. Constitution as a proslavery document and calling for the dissolution of the Union.

Garrison and his radical allies were often attacked, both verbally and physically, for their ideas. In 1837, Illinois newspaper editor Elijah Lovejoy paid the ultimate price for his abolitionist ideals: He was murdered by a proslavery mob while defending his printing press. Lovejoy became the first white martyr to the abolitionist cause.

Dedicated to the elimination of slavery at all costs, Lewis Tappan embraced Garrison's radical doctrine of immediate abolition and helped financially support Garrison's abolitionist paper, The Liberator. In 1833, Arthur Tappan joined his brother in organizing the New York Anti-Slavery Society and the American Anti-Slavery Society, for which Arthur served as president until 1840. The Tappan brothers resigned from the society in 1840, when its focus became more radical and drifted into other areas, including women's rights. After withdrawing their support from the AASS, they helped form the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, a conservative organization dedicated to moral suasion and political action as ways of ending slavery.

After 1848, with the opening of much of the Western frontier to white settlement, abolitionism grew from a radical cause to a national debate. Instances of radical abolitionism were played out in some locations. In October 1859, John Brown led a band of almost two dozen men in a raid on the federal armory at Harpers Ferry, Virginia (present-day West Virginia), in an attempt to initiate a large-scale exodus of slaves to the North. The result of this violent, yet ineffective, revolt was a highly publicized trial and Brown's execution.

By this time, however, moderate abolitionists had galvanized on a broader scale. The Republican Party, which was formed in the mid-1850s primarily by advocates of "free soil," "free labor," and "free men," became the new political voice for those Americans who opposed the expansion of slavery. In 1860, Republican Abraham Lincoln was elected president, resulting in the secession of eleven Southern states from the Union and the beginning of the Civil War. In the wake of the Civil War and emancipation, many abolitionists went South. They turned their energies to educating freedmen and freedwomen and to fighting for African Americans' political and economic rights.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: African Americans: Garrison, William Lloyd: Quakers.

Further Reading

Aptheker, Herbert. Abolitionism: A Revolutionary Movement. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Blackett, R.J.M. Building an Antislavery Wall: Black Americans in the Atlantic Abolitionist Movement, 1830–1860. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1983.

Ginzburg, Lori D. Women and the Work of Benevolence: Morality, Politics, and Class in the Nineteenth-Century United States. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.

Harrold, Stanley. American Abolitionists. Harlow, UK: Pearson Education, 2001.

Abraham Lincoln Brigade

The Abraham Lincoln Brigade (or Battalion) was a group of several thousand American leftists of various political stripes who volunteered in the late 1930s to fight for the government of Spain in its war against fascist rebels led by General Francisco Franco.

With much of Europe succumbing to fascism, many on the left in the United States and Europe saw the Spanish Civil War as a decisive conflict in the struggle between authoritarianism and democracy. During the war, which lasted from 1936 to 1939, Franco's forces received military aid from the fascist regimes of Germany and Italy. Supporting the Republican government were communists from the Soviet Union and antifascists from other countries, including the United States.

In 1937 and 1938, a force of about 2,800 American volunteers fought for the Spanish Republic as part of a multinational force of 35,000 from fifty-two countries under the auspices of the Comintern, an organization of international communism. The American units included the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, George Washington Battalion, and John Brown Battery. All three were technically united with British, Irish, Canadian, and other nationals in the Fifteenth International Brigade.

The Great Depression of the 1930s had radicalized many students, unemployed workers, and intellectuals across the United States and Europe. Fascism, a right-wing doctrine embracing racism, authoritarianism, and military aggression, had originated in Italy under dictator Benito Mussolini and found expression in Adolf Hitler's Nazi Party in Germany, Spain's Falangist movement, and other parties and organizations in Europe and elsewhere.

Much of the democratic West, including Great Britain, France, and the United States, insisted on strict neutrality in the Spanish conflict. To many leftists, however, such a policy meant capitulation to fascism, as neither Nazi Germany nor Fascist Italy had compunctions about getting involved. When revolutionary Mexico and the Soviet Union sold arms to the Republican side, supposedly neutral France impounded the weapons. American corporations such as General Motors and Texaco sold trucks and fuel to Franco.

Embracing Marxist ideals and a spirit of revolutionary political activism, the Abraham Lincoln Brigade went to Spain committed to stopping the fascist takeover of yet another country. Even a 1937 U.S. State Department prohibition on travel to Spain failed to deter the Americans.

Lincoln Brigade members came from diverse backgrounds. They were laborers, intellectuals, students, and others from throughout the United States. Sixty percent or more were members of the Young Communist League or Communist Party. Others were socialists or Wobblies, members of a radical but nearly moribund union, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Some were unaffiliated with any organized political cause. The brigade also was racially integrated, the first land-based fighting force in U.S. history to be able to make that claim.

As a rule, members resisted protocol and eschewed badges and privileges of rank; some contingents even elected their officers. Reporters such as Ernest Hemingway, Lillian Hellman, and Herbert Matthews assisted their efforts by promoting antifascism in the United States, helping recruit new members, and describing the events in war-torn Spain.

The Abraham Lincoln Brigade suffered nearly 750 deaths—a casualty rate much higher than that of American servicemen during World War II—and most members of the battalion were either wounded in battle or suffered from exposure-related illnesses. Ultimately the cause was lost, however, as Franco and the fascists won the war and ruled Spain until the dictator's death in 1975.

On the home front, Lincoln Brigade members became heroes of the American leftist movement. Their reputation suffered, however, after members supported the Soviet nonaggression pact with Nazi Germany in 1939. When the Soviet Union and the United States joined forces against the Nazis in World War II, members of the brigade were again embraced by many of their noncommunist former comrades on the left.

The U.S. government was less forgiving. When certain former brigade members tried to join the armed forces during World War II, they were classified as "premature antifascists" and rejected for enlistment. Others saw action in the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), where their European ties were useful in intelligence-gathering work.

During the Red Scare of the late 1940s and early 1950s, brigade members came under attack from government investigators and were blacklisted by employers. Although the vast majority of Lincoln Brigade volunteers who had been members of the Communist Party had long since left the organization, many remained active in progressive causes. Some served as mentors to members of the New Left in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

John Barnhill and James Ciment

See also: Communism: Great Depression.

Further Reading

Landis, Arthur H. The Abraham Lincoln Brigade. New York: Citadel, 1967.

Landis, Arthur H. Death in the Olive Groves: American Volunteers in the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939. New York: Paragon House, 1989.

Lawson, Don. The Abraham Lincoln Brigade: Americans Fighting Fascism in the Spanish Civil War. New York: T.Y. Crowell, 1989.

Rolfe, Edwin. The Lincoln Battalion. New York: Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 1974.

Rosenstone, Robert. Crusade of the Left: The Lincoln Battalion in the Spanish Civil War. New York: Pegasus, 1969.

Absinthe

Sometimes referred to as “the green fairy,” absinthe is a highly alcoholic green liquor made from a variety of aromatic herbs. It is said to have been invented in 1792 by Dr. Pierre Ordinaire, a French expatriate living in Switzerland, as a means of delivering the medicinal qualities of wormwood in a relatively palatable form.

The liquor is prepared from the leaves of common wormwood (Artemisia absinthium) and other ingredients steeped in alcohol, including licorice, star anise, fennel, hyssop, and angelica root. Many absinthe drinkers believed that wormwood was the source of its legendary hallucinogenic powers, but most modern scientific analysis attributes its effects to the very high alcohol content, sometimes as high as 70 or 80 percent. In addition, some less-reputable distillers used toxic chemicals to fake the brilliant green color and other characteristics of absinthe, further contributing to its toxicity and notoriety.

The traditional absinthe drink was prepared with a special slotted spoon on which a sugar cube was placed. Water was sluiced over the sugar and into a glass containing absinthe until the liquid turned a milky, greenish-white color. This correct color and consistency, called “louche,” indicated that the bitter taste of straight absinthe had been adequately diluted. Only a few daring individuals would drink absinthe straight.

Absinthe was popular in Paris at the end of the nineteenth century among artists and writers, including the Dutch painter Vincent van Gogh and the Irish poet Oscar Wilde. Postimpressionist painter Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec combined absinthe and cognac to produce a drink he called an “earthquake.”

The popularity of absinthe in America was largely restricted to the demimonde, or cultural underworld, of New Orleans, a city with deep ties to France. On Bourbon Street in the French Quarter (Vieux Carré), an establishment known as the Old Absinthe House had a spigot used solely for dripping water through sugar-loaded absinthe spoons.

By the beginning of the twentieth century, opposition to absinthe began to develop among people who disapproved of recreational intoxicants. An almost hysterical fear of absinthism led to the drink being lumped together with opiates and other powerful drugs. Exaggerated accounts of debaucheries committed by absinthe drinkers led legislators on both sides of the Atlantic to ban its production and consumption. The United States banned absinthe in 1912, almost a decade before Prohibition; even after the Twenty-first Amendment repealed

Prohibition in 1933, bans on absinthe remained in effect.

Despite its initial popularity, absinthe was of little interest to black marketers. Substitutes, usually with anise as the primary ingredient, appeared on the market for those interested in sampling the taste of absinthe without the legendary effects. Even as a new generation discovered mind-altering chemicals in the 1960s, they paid little attention to absinthe, preferring newer and stronger chemicals such as LSD or drugs such as peyote that were associated with non-Western religious traditions.

Until recently, it was illegal to produce or sell absinthe in the United States. In 2007, foreign-made absinthes, such as Lucid and Kübler, became available on the U.S. market, and St. George Absinthe Verte from St. George Spirits of Alameda, California, became the first brand of American-made absinthe legally sold in the United States in nearly a century.

Leigh Kimmel

See also: Prohibition.

Further Reading

Adams, Jad. Hideous Absinthe: A History of the Devil in a Bottle. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2004.

Conrad, Barnaby. Absinthe: History in a Bottle. San Francisco: Chronicle, 1988.

Abstract Expressionism

Abstract expressionism was one of the most dynamic, influential, and uniquely American art movements in the nation's cultural history. Beginning at the start of the cold war in the late 1940s, the movement drew on such modernist styles as cubism, fauvism, and expressionism. Its best-known practitioners include Willem de Kooning, Franz Kline, Robert Motherwell, and Jackson Pollock.

Eschewing recognizable forms and the closed, circumscribed shapes of artists Pablo Picasso, Joan Miró, and Piet Mondrian, postwar artists instead concentrated on an aesthetic that emphasized the bold use of color and nonrepresentational masses in vivid, emotionally charged canvases that drew attention to the act of painting itself. Abstract, energetic, and heralded as spontaneous, abstract expressionism became synonymous with cultural characteristics of the postwar period: individualism, alienation, and decadence.

The term ultimately became associated with a particular method of painting that developed in New York City during the 1940s. Called "action painting" or "gestural abstract expressionism," it was a method in which the process was as important as the outcome, and a painting as a record of the action was even more important than the artistic purpose of it. New York's collectors and critics were important supporters of abstract expressionism; San Francisco also was a significant site for action painting.

Pollock is perhaps the most famous of all postwar American painters. He graced the pages of Life, Vogue, and other major magazines during the late 1940s and 1950s, exemplifying the action aspect of abstract expressionism—Time referred to him as “Jack the Dripper.” In a famous 1951 photo essay by Hans Namuth, Pollock displayed his unique method of throwing paint across a canvas, which was lying flat on his studio floor, while he moved energetically around it.

The iconoclastic painter Jackson Pollock, variously revered and reviled for his drip method of “action painting,” was a central figure in the abstract expressionist movement and the New York avant-garde that spawned it in the late 1940s. (Tony Vaccaro/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

While Pollock dominated mainstream media coverage of abstract expressionism, lending the art movement a distinct machismo and bohemian decadence, women also participated. Pollock's wife, Lee Krasner, and Motherwell's wife, Helen Frankenthaler, were important artists in their own right. Jay deFeo was one of the few female stars of San Francisco's Beat literary-artistic scene.

For the artists themselves, abstract expressionism represented a revolutionary aesthetic that allowed them to explore and articulate the fears and anxieties of an alienating consumer culture and the atomic threat. Critical of modern society and supremely individualistic, abstract expressionists tended to avoid association with any one political ideology. Yet the inherent open-endedness of abstract expressionism lent it a subversive quality in the conservative era of cold war ideology, McCarthyism, and red baiting. Congressman George A. Dondero (R-MI) made a career of attacking modern art by equating it with communism, and, in 1951, the Los Angeles City Council accused abstract painters and sculptors of being unconsciously manipulated by the Kremlin.

Postwar art critics responded by downplaying or ignoring leftist interpretations of abstract expressionism, instead emphasizing its form, individuality, and freed expression. Clement Greenberg, a New York art critic and abstract expressionism's most influential supporter, shed his socialist leanings and claimed that American art was foremost in the world, with abstract expressionism as the most emblematic of the nation's new cultural prestige. Critics and museum curators were so successful at recasting abstract expressionism that the U.S. federal government supported exhibitions featuring representative works that traveled abroad in 1948, 1950, and 1956 as examples of American freedom and cultural superiority.

Fraught with cultural and political contradictions, abstract expressionism remained a dominant movement for more than a decade. Private collectors and major museums paid significant sums to hang its works.

In the 1960s, disgusted by 1950s political conservatism, alienated by the claims of American cultural hegemony, and uneasy with the elitism of patrons and museumgoers, American artists began eschewing abstract expressionism. They moved on to new artistic styles and modes of commentary, such as pop art, junk art, and assemblage.

Sarah Schrank

See also: Greenwich Village, New York City; Surrealists.

Further Reading

Craven, Wayne. American Art: History and Culture. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2003.

Doss, Erika. Twentieth-Century American Art. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Fascina, Francis, ed. Pollock and After: The Critical Debate. 2nd ed. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Plagens, Peter. Sunshine Muse: Art on the West Coast, 1945–1970. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

Stevens, Mark, and Annalyn Swan. De Kooning: An American Master. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004.

Acid Rock

Acid rock is a genre of music that emerged from the Haight-Ashbury district of San Francisco in the late 1960s. Its appearance was directly linked to that of the hallucinogen LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide) as a recreational drug, popularly known as acid.

The music features electric instruments, instrumental improvisation, long jam sessions, experimental tape effects, intentional feedback, and repetitive drum lines suggesting an effect of psychedelic drugs. Known as the “San Francisco sound,” it borrowed heavily from folk music and Chicago blues, incorporating riffs from Indian and Middle Eastern music. Acid rock was at its best when played live at dance clubs and accompanied by psychedelic light shows.

Acid rock evolved in the permissive atmosphere of San Francisco’s folk rock scene. Bands such as the Charlatans, the Grateful Dead, and Quicksilver Messenger Service had grown disillusioned with folk rock, went electric, and brought much of the leftist politics of folk music to their new ventures. Soon after these bands adopted the electric instruments of rock music, they were “turned on” to the Bay Area psychedelic scene, where novelist Ken Kesey and his followers, known as the Merry Pranksters, were introducing LSD to a growing youth community.

As a result of the introduction of psychedelic drugs, the San Francisco rock scene moved away from rock’s old clichés of sex and adolescent fantasy. The youth movement peaked during the 1967 “Summer of Love,” with an estimated 500 to 1,500 acid rock bands in the San Francisco area alone. The most notable were Jefferson Airplane (which later became Jefferson Starship), Country Joe and the Fish, Moby Grape, the Doors, Jimi Hendrix's bands, and Santana.

The mantra of the acid rock community was the motto of psychiatrist-turned-guru Timothy Leary: "Turn on, tune in, drop out," a phrase he developed to promote the benefits of LSD. The musicians and fans of the acid rock community saw drugs and music as tools for changing the world and understanding the greater meaning of life. They believed that psychedelics, especially LSD, could serve as the impetus for cultural change. They called for retribalization, a move away from nationalism to smaller, self-sufficient communities. Their search for meaning came at a time when America was mired in the unpopular war in Vietnam and the civil rights movement was still facing violent resistance from local and state governments.

Fans of acid rock were heavily involved in the music and invested in its meaning. A prime example were the Deadheads, a loose community of individuals who traveled the country following the Grateful Dead. The intense involvement of fans with the band created a sense of community in which pharmaceuticals and ideologies served the music and the culture, rather than just the band and its celebrity. Such community building reached its zenith at the 1969 Woodstock music festival, a three-day event in upstate New York attended by up to half a million people.

Acid rock's surreal sound and visuals continue to be reflected in contemporary music. Bands such as Pink Floyd and Phish have achieved commercial success that has lasted from the 1970s and 1980s to the present day. Aspects of the acid rock scene also have been co-opted by such contemporary "art rockers" as Queen and David Bowie.

B. Keith Murphy

See also: Grateful Dead; Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco; Leary, Timothy; LSD.

Further Reading

DeRogatis, Jim. Turn on Your Mind: Four Decades of Great Psychedelic Rock. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 2003.

Shapiro, Harry. Waiting for the Man: The Story of Drugs and Popular Music. London: Helter Skelter, 1999.

Advertising

Advertising is the practice of creating and distributing messages that promote products, goods, and services. While advertising may not seem relevant to American counterculture other than as something to battle, the heritage, practice, and industry of advertising draw as much upon countercultures as upon the status quo. The countercultural voice in advertising struggles against conformity, whether against or in support of consumer society.

Advertising emerged in the nineteenth century as a challenge to tradition-bound society. Like popular tabloid newspapers and magazines, and new forms of entertainment, advertising catered to an emerging and expanding group of people who had lifestyles that fell outside traditional boundaries of class and gender. Yet, while it challenged traditional society, advertising also sought to develop effective means of controlling popular choices, thoughts, and actions.

In the twentieth century, a conception of people as susceptible masses that were easily swayed seemed to be borne out not only in rapidly standardizing advertising techniques that claimed, like Claude Hopkins's book Scientific Advertising (1923), to have discovered universal principles of effective advertising. A view of people as susceptible masses also seemed to be confirmed in the use of advertising techniques in support of government propaganda campaigns engaged in by the United States, Great Britain, Germany, and other countries during the two world wars. By the 1950s, claims by market researcher James Vicary to have discovered "subliminal advertising"—a technique of embedding hidden messages in advertising that were detectable only by one's unconscious—seemed only to reconfirm advertising's role in maintaining the status quo.

However, the counterculture and advertising informed each other in many ways, one being how advertising both drew upon and influenced various modern, countercultural artistic movements and styles. Because of the need always to be new to attract attention, advertisers developed new artistic styles, while they also were influenced by new trends in art. For example, the avant-garde technique of montage (the cutting up and pasting together of different pictures into a new composition) was quickly added to the advertising industry's visual repertoire. And, by the 1960s, advertising itself had become the topic of pop art by Andy Warhol, Roy Lichtenstein, David Hockney, and other artists.

The Creative Revolution

In the 1960s, the counterculture took a more central role in advertising through its presence in the so-called creative revolution. Bill Bernbach and his ad agency, Doyle Dane Bernbach (DDB), pioneered a newly hip, ironic, and thoughtful sensibility in their advertising. Bernbach embodied countercultural skepticism of authority in such sayings as "Rules are what the artist breaks." By the end of the 1960s, DDB's campaign for the Volkswagen (VW) Beetle helped turn a compact car that had been designed in part in Nazi Germany into a Flower Power counterculture icon.

The creative revolution helped popularize a new countercultural attitude. Rather than emphasize the fear of losing other people's admiration, respect, and acceptance, these ads emphasized the liberation of being different from everyone else. One of DDB's Volkswagen ads pictured an endless line of identical vehicles above the headline "Has the Volkswagen fad died out?" It went on to say how relieved VW was that people were no longer buying their cars in order to keep up with what other people think and do.

Instead of promoting a brainless acceptance that all one had to do to be happy was to buy mass-produced goods, these ads aligned themselves with a growing critical view of deceptive marketing techniques that tried to get people to buy more than they needed. One of DDB's 1960s Volkswagen ads showed a spotlighted Volkswagen and under it the headline "The '51, '52, '53, '54, '55, '56, '57, '58, '59, '60, '61 Volkswagen." The ad claims that other car manufacturers changed superficial features to get people to buy new cars more often, but that Volkswagen focused on making the car work better in order to give consumers a better value.

Helping fuel the creative revolution and the remaking of advertising was the upsurge in thinking about the importance of the then-new medium of television. Theories of the Canadian communications professor Marshall McLuhan—that the power of messages was a function of their medium rather than their meaning—emphasized ideas about the power of televised images, including those in advertising. McLuhan's notions were heavily promoted and adopted in the advertising industry by adman Howard Gossage and others.

At the same time that countercultural ideas infused the advertising industry, techniques from advertising infused countercultural political protests in such ways as the use of standard advertising formats on placards carried in marches that "promoted" napalm. Such examples criticized blithe acceptance of the use of the jellied gasoline as a military weapon during the Vietnam War.

Advertising Today

The three ways in which advertising and the counterculture are connected (modern art, hip consumerism, and protests) have only merged more closely since the 1960s. Today's advertising commonly adopts the irony, fragmentation, and fast pace typical of postmodernist styles, with many television ads geared to younger audiences looking much like music videos. Advertising continues to make fun of the status quo and of conformity, while glorifying countercultural values and individual liberation.

Twenty-first-century ads further this approach in a number of ways. Ford Explorers help middle-class parents escape their entangling possessions, if only for a weekend. A frantic middle manager dresses down his underlings for dancing to boom-box music, but, by answering in ten seconds all the manager's questions about deliveries and supplies using Nextel systems, the dancers shake their booties at old-fashioned ways of doing things. The opening commercial for Apple's "Think Different" branding campaign begins by saluting "the crazy ones, the misfits, the rebels," and concludes by arguing, "the people who think they are crazy enough to change the world are the ones who do."

Other examples in the United States include street art from the barrios of East Los Angeles increasingly appearing in mass-marketing campaigns that enshrine the icon of rebel cool, the cholo, or Chicano gang member. As popular-culture critic Mark Dery put it in Print magazine, "Skinning the image of badness and selling it as off-the-rack rebellion is the stuff of marketers' dreams." And urban street protest marches form the backdrop for a 2005 fashion photo spread that appeared in Harper's magazine.

The counterculture continues to use advertising as a means of political protest in even more inventive ways. What is referred to as "subvertising" continues to be a means of protesting the involvement of advertising in perpetuating the status quo.

For example, New York artist Ron English alters existing billboards to parody standard advertising techniques and subvert their accepted messages. A billboard for Camel cigarettes redone by English shows a cartoon-camel baseball player passing a cigarette to a cartoon-camel child, with the headline "Camel Kids," which critiques how cigarette manufacturers design their advertising and marketing to entice young people to become smokers.

James Hamilton

See also: McLuhan, Marshall; Pop Art; Volkswagen Beetle.

Further Reading

Frank, Thomas. The Conquest of Cool: Business Culture, Counterculture, and the Rise of Hip Consumerism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Gossage, Howard Luck. Is There Any Hope for Advertising? Ed. Kim Rotzoll, Jarlath Graham, and Barrows Mussey. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Lasn, Kalle. Culture Jam: How to Reverse America's Suicidal Consumer Binge—and Why We Must. New York: Quill/HarperCollins, 2000.

Lears, Jackson. Fables of Abundance: A Cultural History of Advertising in America. New York: Basic Books, 1994.

Packard, Vance. The Hidden Persuaders. New York: D. McKay, 1957.

African Americans

African American countercultures through the course of the nation's history reflect a divergence from both mainstream American society and, especially after the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, much of the African American community itself. As in many other cases, the resistance to cultural norms gave rise to movements that eventually were adopted into the mainstream, or the African American community at large.

Most scholars trace the beginning of African American culture in North America to the year 1619, when Dutch settlers imported the first twenty Africans (seventeen men and three women) to Jamestown, Virginia, as indentured servants. Although Africans were the only group forced to migrate to the American colonies in large numbers, they, like Europeans, forged new cultures by adapting their native ways to the new environment, often mixing their ideas with those of Native Americans and Europeans. Because of African Americans' slave status, however, their traditions were generally viewed as countercultural where they differed from English (and later other European) norms.

Indeed, oppression and segregation forced African Americans to create their own institutions. And while there always were differences in traditions and ways of life among African Americans because of their diverse origins, their common experiences in the colonies and independent United States melded them into a coherent ethnic group. After the end of slavery and state-sponsored segregation, African American countercultural activities displayed more of the diversity within the community.

Colonial America to the Civil War

From the first twenty who arrived in 1619, the number of Africans in the North American colonies increased to 750,308, almost 20 percent of the U.S. population, by the first official census in 1790. Of these people, only 59,557 were free. By the eve of the Civil War in 1860, the population of African Americans, most of whom were slaves, had increased to 4,441,830; in some Southern states, such as South Carolina, slaves outnumbered whites.

The earliest examples of African American countercultural activity came in four forms: (1) resistance and rebellion against slave owners; (2) leaving the colonies by escape or through organized movements back to Africa; (3) protests against slavery through a variety of abolitionist activities; and (4) the formation of alternative African American institutions.

Records of slave rebellions and conspiracies date to the seventeenth century and include burning down barns and houses, poisoning water supplies, and killing slave owners and their families. Slaves who participated in such activities risked their lives and often ended up executed, imprisoned, or maimed. The rebellions, which took place in both the North and the South, demonstrated the slaves' refusal to accept anything less than freedom itself.

As time passed, the number of rebellions and the level of resistance increased. Among the notable conspiracies and rebellions were those fomented by Gabriel Prosser (1800), Denmark Vesey (1822), and Nat Turner (1831). Uprisings such as these often were countered by new laws restricting collective action by and further limiting the activities of slaves and free blacks. Nevertheless, in the years leading up to the Civil War, more and more slave insurrections took place in the South and in new states such as Kansas.

Adding to the difficulties of maintaining order was the number of slaves who simply ran away from their owners. This problem had been prevalent even before the Revolutionary War, during which about 100,000 slaves became fugitives. Many slaves who won their freedom by fighting in the American Revolution on the side of the British immigrated to England or to British colonies in the Bahamas and the Caribbean.

In the decades leading up to the Civil War, the secret network of safe houses and rescuers known as the Underground Railroad facilitated the movement of slaves northward to Canada in direct opposition to federal legislation. Often with the aid of Underground Railroad operators, slaves used a number of means of effecting their escape, from forging identity papers to challenging legal norms in courts of law.

Less well known than Northern havens were the destinations for runaways in the South, including Georgia and Florida, where Africans found refuge with Native American groups, such as the Creek, the Seminole, and the Choctaw. From 1817 to 1819, following a number of incursions into the Florida Territory to recapture escaped slaves, African Americans joined Native Americans in fighting federal troops in the First Seminole War.

Some African Americans felt that the best alternative for them was to return to Africa. In 1780, the African Union Society was formed by free blacks favoring resettlement. In 1811, Paul Cuffe, a wealthy merchant and philanthropist whose father had been a slave captured in Africa and whose mother was a Native American, sailed to Sierra Leone to make arrangements, returning four years later to help thirty-eight former slaves establish a new life there.

In 1817, African Americans in Philadelphia and Virginia protested the formation of the American Colonization Society, organized by John Calhoun and Henry Clay, two white Southern legislators, to send free blacks back to Africa. The action on the part of Calhoun and Clay was intended to get rid of the free black population while retaining the system of slavery with which Southern culture was now closely bound. The American Colonization Society achieved a measure of success, if not in convincing a large number of blacks to emigrate; in 1822, it founded the African colony of Liberia, which became home to more than 2,600 African American émigrés.

Protests against the institution of slavery began as early as the colonial period, mostly by Mennonites and Quakers, who objected on moral grounds. These protests set the tone for abolitionist movements, involving both whites and blacks, that would arise and grow strong in the early nineteenth century. In 1797, Prince Hall delivered one of the first speeches by an African American against slavery, to the members of the African Masonic Lodge in Boston. In 1808, the African Society of Boston issued a statement against slavery.

African Americans joined white abolitionists in forming the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1833. The Colored Female Anti-Slavery Society was founded in Connecticut and New Jersey the following year, and the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society was founded in 1849. Harriet Tubman, Sojourner Truth, Frederick Douglass, Frances Ellen Watkins Harper, Henry Highland Garnet, Maria Miller Stewart, and Sarah and Grace Bustill Douglass were among the prominent figures in the abolitionist movement. Publications such as David Walker's journal Appeal (1796–1830) and Douglass's The North Star (1847–1851), also promoted the end of slavery.

Finally, to counter the effects of segregation in both the North and the South, African Americans formed alternative institutions to defend themselves, their way of life, and their faith. In the late eighteenth century, blacks began to form their own churches, fraternal organizations, civic organizations, mutual aid societies, labor unions, and suffrage clubs to encourage fair voting practices. For example, the African Lodge of the Honorable Society of Free and Accepted Masons of Boston became the first African American Freemasons when they formed in 1775.

Likewise, when white church leaders began to physically segregate African Americans, they formed their own congregations. Richard Allen of Philadelphia, a former slave, founded the Free African Society in 1787 to protest such treatment; in 1816, he founded the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Absalom Jones, another former slave, established the African Church of Philadelphia in 1794 under the same conditions. Such activities formed the bedrock of African American society, and it was from these organizations that future protest and countercultural activities would stem.

The Emancipation Proclamation in 1863, the Civil War, and a series of amendments to the U.S. Constitution following the war changed the status of the African Americans forever. The Thirteenth Amendment abolished slavery; the Fourteenth Amendment defined the nature of U.S. citizenship and guaranteed equal protection under the law; and the Fifteenth Amendment prohibited the use of race and previous slave status to prevent voting. Nonetheless, deeply embedded racial prejudices would lead to further injustices, protests, and countercultural activities among African Americans for more than a century to come.

Reconstruction to the Great Migration

Despite the end of slavery, cultural and ethnic differences were engrained in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century

American culture and remained a source of cultural conflict. African American countercultures following the Civil War largely revolved around the fight to implement the rights guaranteed by the new amendments, the establishment of separate African American institutions, and the continuing desire for African Americans to leave the South.

In the aftermath of the war, the rise of the Ku Klux Klan and other terrorist organizations brought an escalation of violence against African Americans. Lynching was rampant. Between 1880 and 1950, more than 3,000 African Americans were killed in racially motivated attacks by white mobs. In 1892 alone, 161 African Americans were lynched; in Memphis, Tennessee, three blacks were murdered for no more than operating a grocery store that competed with white businesses. Ida B. Wells, a journalist and early protester against the laws of segregation, took up an antilynching campaign that lasted for decades.

In 1880, African American women formed the Colored Women's Progressive Franchise Association to promote equal rights for women. In 1896, the National Federation of Afro-American Women joined with the National League of Colored Women to create the National Association of Colored Women, a self-help organization that set up day-care centers and early education centers, protested lynching, and fought for the right to vote.

African Americans set up their own educational systems, including colleges and universities; their own businesses, which often brought them into conflict with white business owners; and their own labor unions, because they were often excluded from labor unions run by whites. The year 1869 saw the first black labor meeting in the Convention of the Colored National Labor Union. And in 1925, African American labor organizer A. Philip Randolph created the nation's first bona fide black labor union, the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

Opposing views on the best course for blacks in American society were reflected in the ideas of Booker T. Washington, a former slave and author of Up from Slavery (1901), and W.E.B. Du Bois, a Northern scholar who helped found the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and edited its journal, The Crisis, until 1934. Washington advocated a nonconfrontational approach anchored in hard work and vocational training, and he used his influence with the nation's leaders to raise money for schools in the South. Regarding Washington as an accommodationist, Du Bois believed in the importance of higher education for African Americans and advocated directly challenging the system of segregation in American society. While Washington strived to bring African Americans into the cultural mainstream, Du Bois pursued a more countercultural agenda. In fact, Du Bois ultimately abandoned American society altogether and immigrated to Africa.

The largest African American counterculture, however, was the Great Migration out of the South and into the Northern and Midwestern states. This came at the expense of Southern white landowners, who coveted African Americans as cheap labor and fought Northern recruiters, who often financed the moves and guaranteed jobs. At the turn of the twentieth century, with African Americans' prospects for equal rights giving way to Jim Crow laws (which institutionalized racial segregation), with their economic and educational prospects on the wane in the largely unindustrialized South, with labor shortages in Northern and Midwestern cities due to World War I offering job opportunities, and with their eagerness to better their lot, the migration began.

At the start of the Great Migration, approximately 90 percent of all African Americans lived in Southern states. The search for a better life led many of them to New York and Philadelphia in the East; to Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis, and Milwaukee in the Midwest; and to such burgeoning metropolises as Oakland and Los Angeles in the West. Beginning in 1910 and lasting until well after the end of World War II, the mass migration of African Americans deprived the South of much of its workforce and created a critical mass of African Americans in urban areas across the country.

The growth of African American artistic culture in New York City in the 1920s produced the Harlem Renaissance. This movement showcased the literary talents of poet Langston Hughes, novelist Zora Neale Hurston, and others; embraced new forms of dance and theater; and became the center of such countercultural musical genres as jazz and blues, which had been rejected in their most avant-garde forms by mainstream culture. The concentration of so much creativity forced the recognition of African American culture and reinforced the self-esteem of many African Americans. Many of the artists who made their names during the Harlem Renaissance also would play a role in the civil rights movement later in the century.

The critical mass of African Americans in urban areas also gave rise to new religious sects and movements, such as the International Peace Mission of Father Divine (founded in 1919); the United House of Prayer for All People of the Church of the Rock of the Apostolic Faith of Bishop C.M. Grace (“Daddy Grace”), also founded in 1919; the Universal Negro Improvement Association of black nationalist Marcus Garvey (founded in 1914 in Jamaica and brought to the United States in 1916); and the Nation of Islam of Wallace Fard Muhammad and later Elijah Muhammad (founded in 1930 in Chicago). These organizations met the spiritual and social needs of the African American community and often helped them to deal with the realities of racism and the economic hardships of urban life in the North and Midwest.

World War II to the Modern Civil Rights Movement

The end of World War II and the return of U.S. soldiers generated sweeping changes in American society. The middle class expanded from about 13 percent to 46 percent of the population, due to educational opportunities made possible through the GI Bill, home purchases made possible by loans to veterans, and a general increase in wealth made possible by the growth of corporate America and the expansion of U.S. businesses into the world market. The new well-being of Americans as a whole created conditions more amenable to change in the status of African Americans, although efforts in that regard still tended to be viewed as challenges to established culture.

Following the success of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (1954), the landmark U.S. Supreme Court decision that paved the way for school integration throughout the South, the civil rights movement began in earnest. On December 1, 1955, in Montgomery, Alabama, African Americans planned a boycott of the city’s public transportation to protest segregated seating and unfair treatment by white bus drivers, and especially the arrest of Rosa Parks, a respected member of the African American community who had refused to move to the back of a city bus. The boycott drew the entire community into action. Expected to last only a day, it continued until December 21, 1956, when African Americans were no longer required to sit at the back of city buses or yield their seats to whites.

The Montgomery boycott brought Martin Luther King, Jr., a new minister in Montgomery, to national prominence. His eloquence rallied the spirit of the community, and his strategy of nonviolent noncooperation provided a template for future protests in cities across the South. In addition, the commitment to nonviolence established a moral high ground from which African Americans could pursue their cause.

The civil rights movement culminated in the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which specifically prohibited discrimination in hiring, public accommodations, and education, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which eliminated loopholes that had prevented African Americans from voting. These victories were overshadowed by the assassination of civil rights activist James Meredith in Mississippi in 1966, and the assassination in 1968 of Martin Luther King, Jr., in Memphis. King’s death set off hundreds of riots in African American communities across the United States.

The civil rights movement was soon eclipsed, however, by other events, as the African American struggle spread from the South to the entire country, becoming increasingly more militant and even violent. The apparent unity of the movement began to shatter with the emergence of other counterculture factions with different agendas and interests—such as the Black Muslim nationalist movement, the militant Black Power movement, and others—both fractious and unifying.

The charismatic Black Muslim spokesman Malcolm X, after a trip to Mecca, left the Nation of Islam and founded his own mosque in Harlem in 1964, only to be assassinated the following year. Also in 1965, Maulana Karenga, a scholar and political activist in Los Angeles, founded US, an organization that promoted Pan-Africanism. Among his legacies also is the annual festival of Kwanzaa, a weeklong celebration of African American heritage initiated in 1967.

The Black Power movement, which became prominent in the turbulent late 1960s, was an expression of revolutionary sentiments on the part of a new generation of activist groups. Notable among these were the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), originally formed in 1960 to coordinate the series of lunch counter sit-ins begun in Greensboro, North Carolina, and the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, founded in 1966 by activists Huey Newton and Bobby Seale in Oakland, California, with a ten-point program of militant self-defense.

Black Power rhetoric soon was espoused by a broader group of young people, becoming an expression of self-determination and acceptance of African American culture. It found further implementation in the black arts movement in Harlem and in the symbolism of the Black Power salute given by athletes Tommie Smith and John Carlos at the 1968 Olympics in Mexico City. Some attributed the loss of support from whites and more moderate blacks to the militant rhetoric and actions of movement participants who were perceived to be radicals.

Vietnam to the Millennium

African Americans were prominent in the major counterculture movements of the 1960s and 1970s, including the Free Speech Movement, the anti-Vietnam War movement, the women's rights movement, and the gay liberation movement.

In the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s, American society began to record a number of firsts on the part of African American citizens: Cheryl A. Brown became the first African American to compete in the Miss America pageant (1970); Shirley Chisholm became the first African American woman to run for president of the United States (1972); and Daniel "Chappie" James became the first African American four-star general in the history of the U.S. military (1975). At the same time, several major cities elected their first black mayors; the number of African American members of Congress rose steadily; and African American men and women took positions as federal judges and leaders of national service organizations.

During this period, black studies and African American history programs were established at colleges and universities across the country, albeit under protest from many mainstream academics. Temple University in Philadelphia became the first university to offer a Ph.D. in African American studies, in 1988.

As African Americans gained new prominence in the mainstream of U.S. culture, however, new criticisms of that culture and the participation of African Americans arose within the African American community. Specifically, attacks were leveled at the structural racism that still existed in society at large, which gave rise to new countercultures that were often intellectual in nature. African Americans became critics of other African Americans, abandoning the long-shared belief that criticizing the community was an act of betrayal. According to some commentators, improved social conditions created a culture of critique reflecting new gender, class, regional, and experiential differences in the black community.

The specific experience of African American women, for example, gave rise to black feminist ideology, as articulated in the writings of Patricia Hill Collins, Kimberlé Crenshaw, Angela Y. Davis, bell hooks, Alice Walker, and others. The emergence of the black feminist movement triggered debate and dialogue between African American women and men, and between black and white feminists. It also changed the way in which social oppression was viewed and treated, calling attention to the intersectionality of gender, race, and class. Thus, American feminism grew from a middle-class, white movement to a worldwide movement embracing women of all classes, ethnicities, and circumstances.

Controversy surfaced in October 1995 with the Million Man March in Washington, D.C. Organized by Louis Farrakhan and the reconstituted Nation of Islam, it was billed as a "day of reconciliation" to draw attention to the plight of African American males. However, not all African Americans felt that Farrakhan was a true representative of the community because of his anti-Semitism and demeaning comments about women. While some African American women supported the march and the purpose for which it was designed, others felt that it was exclusionary and constituted a return to the very conditions that had led to the rise of black feminism.

Among the largest issues to surface in the last years of the twentieth century was the identification of an urban underclass of African Americans. In 1987, William Julius Wilson, a sociologist at the University of Chicago, published The Truly Disadvantaged, bringing the problem to the attention of the public. He followed this with another book on the subject, When Work Disappears: The World of the New Urban Poor, in 1996. Wilson took the position that neither racial discrimination nor cultural tendencies were responsible for the plight of the poor urban black population. Rather, it was the fact that jobs once concentrated in urban areas—the very jobs, in fact, that had drawn so many African Americans from the South earlier in the century—were now concentrated in the suburbs and, therefore, out of the reach of the poorest blacks.

In the twenty-first century, a controversy surrounded comments by comedian and philanthropist Bill Cosby. Stirred by statistics on the plight of the black community in America—one third of homeless men and half of prison inmates were African American, with homicide as the major cause of death among young people—Cosby made a plea for a return to parenting and responsibility within the African American community. With Harvard psychologist Alvin F. Poussaint, he published Come On People: On the Path from Victims to Victors (2007), which urged black parents to reassert moral values in raising their children. Cosby became the object of criticism by others in the African American community, who accused him of blaming the victims, rather than the perpetrators, of social injustice.

The presidential candidacy and election of Barack Obama in 2008 marked a major turning point in the relationship between the African American community and the cultural mainstream. In one key respect, it signaled a measure of acceptance and level of participation in the political process never imagined, let alone witnessed, in previous generations. The enduring political and social effects, of course, remained to be seen.

Susan Love Brown

See also: Abolitionism; Black Panthers; Civil Rights Movement; Douglass, Frederick; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garrison, William Lloyd; Harlem Renaissance; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Ku Klux Klan; Slave Culture; Underground Railroad.

Further Reading

Beito, David T. From Mutual Aid to the Welfare State: Fraternal Societies and Social Services, 1890–1967. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Collins, Patricia Hill. Black Feminist Thought. 2nd ed. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., and Cornell West, eds. The African-American Century: How Black Americans Have Shaped Our Country. New York: Free Press, 2002.

Holloway, Joseph E., ed. Africanisms in American Culture. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1990.

Robinson, JoAnn Gibson. The Montgomery Bus Boycott and the Women Who Started It. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.

Smedley, Audrey. Race in North America: Origin and Evolution of a Worldview. 3rd ed. Boulder, CO: Westview, 2007.

Williams, Juan, and Julian Bond. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954–1965. New York: Penguin, 1988.

Wilson, William Julius. The Truly Disadvantaged: The Inner City, the Underclass, and Public Policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.

Wright, Kai, ed. The African-American Archive: The History of the Black Experience through Documents. New York: Black Dog & Leventhal, 2001.

Afrocentrism

Afrocentrism is a political, social, educational, and scholarly movement that challenges traditional interpretations of the black experience in an attempt to encourage black nationalism and ethnic pride as a psychological weapon against racial oppression. Afrocentrists argue that traditional interpretations of the black experience have been marred by racism and are therefore suspect; many claim that the Eurocentric interpretation has led to the neglect and denial of African contributions in world history. The aim of Afrocentrism is to shift the focus from the traditional emphasis of Eurocentrism to an African-centered worldview of the black experience—indeed, of the history of the world and humankind. Afrocentrism occupies an integral place in the American counterculture in its challenge to traditional Eurocentric beliefs by promoting, through scholarly discourse, the African origins of humanity and African contributions to Western civilization.

Although Afrocentrism gained momentum in the mid-twentieth century, it was heavily influenced by several earlier black nationalist movements, such as Ethiopianism and Pan-Africanism in the nineteenth century, as associated with such individuals as Martin Delany and Henry McNeal Turner. All movements associated with Afrocentrism place an emphasis on black self-determinism, self-reliance, and ethnic pride.

Marcus Garvey, the Jamaican-born founder of the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), and W.E.B. Du Bois, cofounder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), both played a major role in the development of Afrocentric ideas in the United States and abroad. Garvey was one of the first black leaders to promote the idea that Africa was the “mother of civilization.” His movement was the first and most successful black freedom movement with global proportions. Garvey’s organization swelled to an estimated 1 million during the 1920s, while the NAACP has become the largest and arguably most important civil rights organization in the United States.

The Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s and the negritude movement of the 1930s also helped to facilitate the growth of Afrocentric sentiment with the activism of such scholars and intellectuals as Carter G. Woodson, founder of Black History Month and the Association for the Study of African American Life and History (ASALH); educator and cultural critic Alain Locke; and the Senegalese poet, politician, and cultural theorist Léopold Senghor. The origins of the concept of a black aesthetic and the importance of African contributions to world civilization are rooted in these movements. The Garvey movement subsequently influenced the creation of the Nation of Islam by Elijah Muhammad in the 1930s. (Malcolm X, as the chief spokesperson for the Nation of Islam in the 1960s, was the son of a Garveyite.)

The postwar decolonization of Africa, coupled with the social activism of African Americans in the United States during the 1950s and 1960s, led to the reemergence of Afrocentric ideology that culminated in the militant Black Power movement—which emphasized the creation of black political and cultural institutions across the United States—and its related black arts movement, which encouraged blacks to establish publishing houses, magazines, journals, art institutions, and African studies programs at the university level.

In the twenty-first century, Afrocentrism has become an all-encompassing social, political, cultural, and scholarly movement that encompasses such figures as Maulana Karenga, founder of the Afrocentric holiday of Kwanzaa; the Senegalese scientist Cheikh Anta Diop, who has written about the African nature of Egyptian civilization; and Molefe Asante, an influential figure in the concept of Afrocentrism and promoter and scholar of African American studies.

Hettie V. Williams

See also: Black Power Movement; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Malcolm X.

Further Reading

Bernal, Martin. Black Athena: The Afroasiatic Roots of Classical Civilization. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1991.

Leftkowitz, Mary R., and Guy Maclean. Black Athena Revisited. Chapel Hill: North Carolina University Press, 1996.

Alcoholics Anonymous

Alcoholics Anonymous (AA) is an international organization dedicated to helping recovering alcoholics maintain their sobriety. It is often referred to as a “fellowship” for its emphasis on mutual cooperation and shared experiences.

AA traces its origins to a meeting in Akron, Ohio, in 1935 between a stockbroker named William Wilson and a doctor named Robert Smith. Wilson, born in 1895 in New York City, had been a hopeless alcoholic who had tried many times to quit drinking. In 1934, he encountered an old friend, Ebby Thatcher, who had achieved sobriety with the help of the Oxford Group, a nondenominational Christian organization headed by an Episcopal clergyman named Samuel Shoemaker. The Oxford Group had no rules, hierarchy, or organized membership lists and stressed the importance of spirituality and divine guidance in assisting members to solve their own problems.

Wilson was able to achieve lasting sobriety with the help of the Oxford Group and his doctor, William Silkworth, who believed that alcoholism was a physical disease as well as a mental obsession—an unorthodox view at the time. Following Wilson’s recovery, he joined the Oxford Group and tried to speak to other alcoholics about his sobriety, albeit with little success.

On a business trip to Akron in 1935, Wilson met Dr. Smith and shared his views and experiences about alcoholism. The idea of alcoholism as a disease struck a chord with the doctor, who dedicated himself to sobriety on June 15, 1935—regarded by AA as the date of its founding—and the two began speaking to other alcoholics in the Akron area. Eventually, Wilson and Smith split from the Oxford Group and formed AA chapters in Akron and New York City. By 1940, twenty-two American cities had AA chapters.

In 1939, Wilson and Smith published Alcoholics Anonymous—also referred to as the “Big Book” because of its size—which contained articles and case histories outlining the beliefs of AA. It became the cornerstone of the organization. In the process of compiling Alcoholics Anonymous, the two authors outlined the so-called Twelve Steps, a set of principles and guidelines that must be followed by an individual before achieving sobriety. The underlying philosophy of the Twelve Steps derived from the Oxford Group’s emphasis on self-examination, acknowledgment of personal shortcomings, redemption for wrongdoings, and helping others. Smith and Wilson continued their work with AA until their deaths in 1950 and 1971, respectively.

As of 2010s AA claimed more than 1.2 million members in the United States and nearly 2 million worldwide. Members typically meet in local groups—more than 50,000 in the United States alone—that vary in size from only a few people to several hundred. AA’s General Service Office is located in New York City and publishes a monthly newsletter, AA Grapevine. Despite its vast and ever-growing international membership, AA remains committed to the ideals and beliefs of its founders.

Further Reading

Alcoholics Anonymous. <http://www.aa.org>

Alcoholics Anonymous World Services. Alcoholics Anonymous: The Story of How Many Thousands of Men and Women Have Recovered from Alcoholism. New York: Alcoholics Anonymous World Services, 2001.

Cheever, Susan. My Name Is Bill: Bill Wilson—His Life and the Creation of Alcoholics Anonymous. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2004.

Alcott, Amos Bronson (1799–1888)

The New England teacher, education reformer, and writer Bronson Alcott was a key contributor to the American philosophical movement of transcendentalism. He became famous for his unorthodox teaching methods, the controversial schools he founded and ran, and a utopian community he founded in the 1840s that was memorialized in the writing of his daughter, Louisa May Alcott.

He was born Amos Bronson Alcox on November 29, 1799, in Wolcott, Connecticut; he altered the spelling of his last name beginning in about 1820. The neighborhood was populated by Alcott relatives and provided the model for Bronson Alcott's later utopian visions of "consociate family," a community of friends and colleagues who chose to behave as an extended family.

From 1818 to 1822, Alcott worked as a traveling peddler in the American South. The journeys were financial failures but exposed him to the depredations of slavery and made him a committed abolitionist. From 1823 to 1828, Alcott taught school in Connecticut, where he eschewed the Calvinist model of "taming" students through fear and rote memorization. By contrast, Alcott based his approach on European reform theories and encouraged children to learn through observation and self-examination. Another important influence on Alcott's educational approach was the Second Great Awakening, the religious revival that swept the nation from 1800 to 1830, rejecting the doctrine of inherent sin and regarding childhood as an age of innocence.

Alcott's controversial methods brought him to the attention of the reformist May family of Boston. He married Abigail May in 1830. Through his wife, he met abolitionists Lydia Maria Child, Lucretia Mott, and William Lloyd Garrison, as well as the writers Ralph Waldo Emerson, Margaret Fuller, and George Ripley and the utopianist Robert Owen.

Although he lost interest in formal religious practice, Alcott remained an ardent Christian, and he modeled his teachings on Jesus's use of parables and conversation. In 1836, he joined Emerson and others in founding the Transcendental Club, a philosophical society based in Cambridge, Massachusetts, that encouraged pursuit of the divine through self-knowledge rather than through religious ritual, Scripture, or ministry. The transcendentalists rejected the Romantic movement of the age, which encouraged knowledge through the senses, and distrusted the materialism of the emerging industrial economy.

While his friends studied German philosophy and Eastern religions, Alcott favored the ancient Greek philosophers, especially Pythagoras, who insisted that morality must be embodied in daily living. Alcott read avidly about such subjects as dietary, health, and dress reform, as well as phrenology, women's rights, and abolition.

Alcott operated his first school in Germantown, Pennsylvania from 1830 to 1833, before moving to Boston. The Temple School, which he founded there in 1834, was initially popular but closed in 1837 amid controversy over his radically egalitarian methods. Visiting British author Harriet Martineau criticized Alcott's "indulgent" pedagogy, which individualized plans of study for each child. The school and its founder were further denounced for opposing corporal punishment of students and for admitting an African American child.

Alcott and his assistant, Elizabeth Palmer Peabody, defended their methods in Record of a School (1835) and Conversations with Children on the Gospels (two volumes, 1836–1837), but enrollment dwindled and the school closed in 1839. Despite the failure of the Temple School and other educational initiatives, Alcott's experiments in progressive democratic education provoked discussion—and attracted adherents—both in the United States and abroad. In England, admirers founded the Alcott House School in 1840.

In 1843, Alcott and fellow transcendentalist Charles Lane formed Fruitlands, a utopian "consociate family" community outside Boston. The Alcotts already had given up molasses and cotton to protest slavery, and now they rejected meat, dairy products, and wool as well, in their belief that subjugating other creatures was immoral. This strict regime discouraged converts, and Lane became fascinated with the celibacy of the Shakers; thus, Fruitlands failed within a year of its founding. The short-lived community's struggle with farming and practical morality were humorously recorded by Louisa May Alcott in Transcendental Wild Oats (1873).

After the failure of Fruitlands, Abigail Alcott supported the family by becoming one of the first salaried social workers in Boston. The four Alcott daughters joined her in leading literacy, nutrition, and sewing classes for the poor. The Alcott family remained active in the cause of abolition, housing runaway slaves as part of the Underground Railroad, joining protests against the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, and sheltering the families of abolitionists William Lloyd Garrison and John Brown from angry mobs. Louisa May Alcott's books eventually provided financial security.

Bronson Alcott continued to teach, conducting conversations and lecture tours in communities as far away as St. Louis. His talent for drawing people in to philosophical reflection—especially on reconciling the desire for individual economic achievement in the new market society with the older values of communal life—attracted a wide audience. Alcott died on March 4, 1888, at the Boston home of his daughter Louisa May.

Janice Lee Jayes

See also: Communes; Fruitlands; Transcendentalism.

Further Reading

Schreiner, Samuel A., Jr. The Concord Quartet: Alcott, Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau, and the Friendship That Freed the American Mind. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley and Sons, 2006.

Sears, Clara Endicott, ed. Bronson Alcott's Fruitlands, with Louisa May Alcott's Transcendental Wild Oats. 1915. Whitefish, MT: Kessinger, 2003.

Shepard, Odell. Pedlar's Progress: The Life of Bronson Alcott. Boston: Little, Brown, 1938.

Algonquin Round Table

The Algonquin Round Table was a group of literary figures, mostly writers and press agents, who met regularly for lunch at the Algonquin Hotel in New York City during the 1920s. The members became a cultural institution, famous mostly for being famous, enjoying humorous conversation and games, and furthering each other's careers and reputations.

In 1919, the publicist of playwright Eugene O'Neill, John Peter Toohey, was looking to get some good press for his client. He invited Murdock Pemberton, press agent of the Hippodrome Theater, and Alexander Woollcott, the well-known drama critic for The New York Times, to lunch at the Algonquin Hotel. Woollcott refused to write the story proposed by Toohey; instead he changed the topic, regaling the party with stories of his days in Paris during World War I.

The afternoon was enjoyable and had the potential to strengthen the relationship between newspaper writers and publicists. The two agents soon organized another luncheon, inviting a number of New York theater critics. That event included representatives from nearly all of the twelve New York newspapers. The list would change over time to include about ten regulars and sometimes their guests, often actors and actresses seeking publicity.

Besides Woollcott, some of the other regular Algonquinites over the years were Woollcott's assistant, George S. Kaufman; Marc Connelly of the Morning Telegraph and a playwright; Arthur Samuels, editor of Harper's Bazaar; Robert E. Sherwood, a staff writer at Vanity Fair; Robert Benchley, editor of Vanity Fair, later a drama critic for The New Yorker, and a sometime actor; and Dorothy Parker, short story writer, poet, and Vanity Fair drama critic. As the group grew in reputation and social connections, it drew in new members, such as the well-known actor Harpo Marx, and the cost of annual membership was raised to $1,000, further strengthening the group's exclusivity.

The group met for witty conversation, generally steering clear of serious topics, and became something of a mutual admiration society. At a time when newspaper columnists were both powerful and celebrated, members of the group kept each other's names in the papers and reviewed each other's books; this was particularly true of columnist Franklin P. Adams. These were not solitary writers who cherished the word on paper, but rather people who wrote to be funny or to make money.

The Algonquinites did not necessarily have a positive influence on each other. The humor would often turn vicious, and the great amount of time spent together at the lunches and frequent card games kept many of them from pursuing their work. Over time, some began to feel as if they were performers for the entertainment of others and that fame was overshadowing their accomplishments.

While most members were low-paid writers when they joined, the group's growing reputation brought social connections with the rich and famous, from actors to businessmen to gangsters. The success of many members eventually rendered the group obsolete; they no longer needed each other's encouragement or connections.

Over the course of the 1920s, America's worsening economic situation also struck at the wealthy culture that had nurtured the members' reputations. Regular members lost interest in the group, and, by the early 1930s, the Algonquin Round Table had officially disbanded.

Caren Prommersberger

Further Reading

Bryan, J., III. Merry Gentlemen (And One Lady). New York: Atheneum, 1985.

Gaines, James R. Wit's End: Days and Nights of the Algonquin Round Table. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977.

Ali, Muhammad (1942–)

Muhammad Ali achieved fame as the world heavyweight boxing champion and as an outspoken critic of American racism and social injustice.

He was born Cassius Marcellus Clay, Jr., on January 17, 1942, in Louisville, Kentucky, the son of a piano player. He grew up determined to help end segregation and empower African Americans. Standing 6 feet, 3 inches tall (1.91 meters), Clay came to the public's attention when he won a gold medal in the light heavyweight boxing division at the 1960 Olympic Games in Rome. He began to box professionally shortly thereafter.

By February 1964, Clay had earned a title fight against heavyweight champion Sonny Liston. Promising to “float like a butterfly, sting like a bee,” the brash young challenger entered the ring in Miami, Florida, with the confidence that would become his trademark. He stunned the boxing world by defeating Liston in a technical knockout.

The next month, Clay, a follower of the black nationalist Malcolm X, announced that he had changed his name to Muhammad Ali and joined the Nation of Islam, an African American religious and sociopolitical organization formed to restore the spiritual, mental, social, and economic situation of America's blacks. Ali brought politics into the ring and became a role model for young black men who were angry at racial and economic injustice.

Promoting himself as “The Greatest”—a claim with which many boxing historians agree—Ali reaped the ire of political and social conservatives, the admiration of radicals in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and Black Panther Party, and the praise of celebrities such as writer Norman Mailer and sports broadcaster Howard Cosell. With a heavy dose of media savvy, Ali adroitly turned himself into a global icon and inspired student rebels from New York to Berkeley with his opposition to the war in Vietnam and support for Third World revolution.

For the next decade, Ali's confrontational gestures put him repeatedly in the eye of public storms, especially in 1966 when he declared himself a conscientious objector and when he refused military service the following year, during the height of the Vietnam War. “No Vietcong ever called me nigger,” he had declared, expressing at once his condemnation of racism in the United States and his opposition to war as a political solution.

The U.S. government prosecuted him in 1967 for draft evasion in a case that gained international attention. Found guilty and sentenced to five years in prison, he filed an appeal and waited impatiently, on bail, for a reversal of the verdict and for public exoneration. The World Boxing Association (WBA) stripped him of his heavyweight title and banned him from the sport, but his fans and supporters called him “The People's Champ,” a title he accepted with pride.

Heavyweight boxing champion Muhammad Ali (left), a Black Muslim, joins supporters after refusing military induction in April 1967. His conviction on draft evasion charges was ultimately overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court on religious grounds. (Library of Congress)

Ali made his comeback in the early 1970s, after the U.S. Supreme Court reversed his conviction (Clay v. United States, 1971) and the WBA reinstated his boxing privileges. In March 1971, in a title bout billed as “The Fight of the Century,” Ali lost to reigning champion Joe Frazier in a unanimous decision. In October 1973, however, in a fight held in Zaire (the present-day Democratic Republic of Congo) and promoted as “The Rumble in the Jungle,” Ali defeated George Foreman with an eighth-round knockout to regain the heavyweight crown.

Ali continued to attract attention for his provocative remarks and the turns in his spiritual journey. In 1974, he converted from the Nation of Islam to mainstream Sunni Islam; in 1975, he published his autobiography, The Greatest: My Own Story. After a defeat at the hands of Olympic gold medalist Leon Spinks in February 1978, Ali retired from boxing. He made a brief return, only to retire permanently in 1981 with a record of fifty-six wins and five losses.

Diagnosed with Parkinson’s disease, Ali witnessed the gradual decline of his physical reflexes and the loss of his legendary verbal skills. In another return of sorts, he was welcomed as an American hero when he appeared in the opening ceremonies of the 1996 Olympic Games in Atlanta to light the Olympic flame. A beloved humanitarian, Ali has traveled widely and conferred with such world leaders as President Bill Clinton, South African civil rights leader Nelson Mandela, and Pope John Paul II to advocate for social and economic justice. In retirement, he settled in Berrien Springs, Michigan, with his wife Yolanda (“Lonnie”).

Jonah Raskin

See also: Black Muslims; Malcolm X; Sports.

Further Reading

Ali, Muhammad. The Greatest: My Own Story. New York: Random House, 1975.

Early, Gerald, ed. The Muhammad Ali Reader. Hopewell, NJ: Ecco, 1998.

Edmonds, Anthony O. Muhammad Ali. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2005.

Mailer, Norman. The Fight. Boston: Little, Brown, 1975.

Marqusee, Mike. Muhammad Ali and the Spirit of the Sixties. New York: Verso, 1999.

Remnick, David. King of the World: The Rise of an American Hero. New York: Random House, 1998.

Alice's Restaurant

Alice's Restaurant is the title of the 1967 debut album by singer and songwriter Arlo Guthrie (son of legendary folk singer Woody Guthrie) and the 1969 film adaptation of his song-story, "Alice's Restaurant Massacree." The comic, satirical song and film tell the story of Guthrie's arrest for littering in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, the ensuing trial, and his subsequent experience at a U.S. Army induction center when he was called up for the draft during the Vietnam War. Contrary to popular opinion, the story is based on actual events.

Directed by Arthur Penn, who cowrote the screenplay with Venable Herndon, the film stars Guthrie along with James Broderick, Stockbridge police chief William Obanhein ("Officer Obie"), and the judge in the real-life court case, James Hannon. Evidence photos from the actual trial appear in the trial scene of the film.

Guthrie and friend Ricky Robbins traveled to Stockbridge for Thanksgiving in 1965 to visit Alice and Ray Brock at their commune in the former Trinity Church on Division Street. Guthrie and Robbins hauled the Brocks' trash to the dump, but finding the dump closed, they deposited the refuse on top of another pile of garbage at the bottom of a ravine.

Later, the local sheriff found the illegal dumping and tracked down the perpetrators. Guthrie and Robbins were arrested, spent a night in jail, and appeared in court. They pleaded guilty, and they were fined twenty-five dollars each and ordered to clean up the garbage. When they arrived back at the church, Guthrie and Robbins wrote the first half of the song. Guthrie wrote the second half after the U.S. Army declared him unfit for duty. In the song and film, his ineligibility is given as a result of the Thanksgiving Day incident and his arrest for dumping the garbage.

The song made Guthrie a cult hero at the 1967 Newport Folk Festival, where he performed it to a standing ovation in the afternoon and twice more during the evening concert. These were among the most memorable performances of that year's festival; Guthrie's third performance of the song was the finale, bringing many of the star performers onstage for the last chorus.

The film was released on August 19, 1969, four days after Guthrie appeared at the Woodstock music festival in Bethel, New York, and there were countless showings at art film houses and on university campuses across the United States. Guthrie's Newport folk hero status and his historic Woodstock performance helped turn the film into a cult classic. Its appeal, Guthrie has observed, also was a function of its universal theme of the "little guy against a big world."

The film's antiwar, antiestablishment message and its glimpse into hippie culture during the 1960s made it popular among counterculture and mainstream crowds alike. It also foreshadowed America's experiment with communes and communal living; Ray and Alice's church/commune welcomes all who visit to share in the work and be part of the "family."

Guthrie has continued to adapt the song to more recent events. He revived—and revised—it during the Ronald Reagan administration (1980–1988), performing it at the 1985 Farm Aid concert in protest against selective service registration and President Reagan's heightened cold war rhetoric. A new version was released on a thirtieth-anniversary compact disc in 1997, Alice's Restaurant: The Massacree Revisited. The song also received radio play in protest against the Gulf War of 1990 to 1991 and the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq.

The themes of Alice's Restaurant have a timeless quality that has endured into the twenty-first century. Guthrie was still on the road giving concerts, performing “Alice’s Restaurant,” and continuing his tradition of long song-stories.

Jeff Williams

See also: Folk Music: Guthrie, Woody: Newport Folk Festival.

Further Reading

Lev, Peter. American Films of the 70s: Conflicting Visions. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2000.

Murphy, Bren Ortega, and Jeffery Scott Harder. “1960s Counterculture and the Legacy of American Myth: A Study of Three Films.” Canadian Review of American Studies 23:2 (Winter 1993) : 57–79.

Alison, Francis (1705–1779)

The Reverend Francis Alison was a Presbyterian minister and colonial educator who introduced the tenets and progressive educational curricula of the Scots-Irish Enlightenment to America.

Born in Donegal County, Ulster, Ireland, in 1705, Alison may have attended Francis Hutcheson’s academy in Dublin. Like other bright young Presbyterian boys in eighteenth-century Ulster, Alison made his way to Scotland. There he studied at the University of Edinburgh with professor of logic and metaphysics John Stevenson and graduated with a master of arts degree in 1733. Alison then pursued studies for the ministry, most likely at Glasgow University.

From what date Alison first planned to migrate to America is not known, but he did so soon after he was licensed to preach in Ireland, in 1735. Arriving in Maryland, Alison served as a tutor for the family of John Dickinson for a short period, before making his way to New London, Pennsylvania, where he was ordained in 1737.

In 1739, Alison founded the New London Academy, a school that provided students with the required grounding in classical studies as well as a smattering of mathematical and scientific subjects. Ezra Stiles, a prominent theologian and later president of Yale College, considered Alison the best classical scholar in America. But the curriculum at the academy was also notable for Alison’s introduction of Hutcheson’s moral philosophy, especially through the Glasgow professor’s Short Introduction to Moral Philosophy (1747) and Metaphysicae Synopsis (1742).

In the split between “Old Side” and “New Side” Presbyterians that occurred in America in the wake of the Great Awakening, a religious revival, Alison emerged as a leader of the moderate Old Side. He wrote pamphlets such as An Examination and Refutation of Mr. Gilbert Tennent’s Remarks upon the Protestation Presented to the Synod of Philadelphia, June 1, 1741, arguing against what he considered the unbridled enthusiasm of the revivalist New Side.

In 1752, Alison accepted an appointment as professor of moral philosophy and vice provost at the College of Philadelphia. His relationships with colleagues there were not without tensions. Alison and William Smith, the first provost of the institution, from 1755 to 1779, were often at odds, and Alison opposed fellow Philadelphian Benjamin Franklin’s efforts to make Pennsylvania into a royal colony.

Alison's instrumental efforts in spreading Scots-Irish Enlightenment ideas in early America gained him transatlantic renown. Glasgow University awarded him an honorary doctorate of divinity in 1755. Alison encouraged the Enlightenment in America in other ways as well. He was a long-standing correspondent of John Bartram, the American naturalist, a director of the Library Company of Philadelphia, and an early member of the Society for the Propagation of Useful Knowledge. Also, he helped spread Hutcheson's justification of political revolution.

It is not surprising that Alison was critical of the British Parliament's Stamp Act of 1765, which imposed a direct tax on the colonies. A number of his students—including Francis Hopkinson, Thomas McKean, James Smith, Charles Thomson, and George Read, among others—played prominent parts in the American independence movement.

Mark G. Spencer

Further Reading

Norton, David Fate. "Francis Hutcheson in America." Studies in Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 154 (1976) : 1547–68.

Nybakken, Elizabeth. "Alison, Francis." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Sloan, Douglas. The Scottish Enlightenment and the American College Ideal. New York: Teachers College Press, 1971.

Altamont Free Concert

Although rock critics and promoters touted the final, free show of the Rolling Stones's 1969 tour as "Woodstock West," the December 6 concert at Altamont Speedway in California ultimately signaled an end to the peaceful, utopian era of the Woodstock Nation.

The Rolling Stones had been scheduled to play at Golden Gate Park in San Francisco with such acts as Crosby, Stills and Nash, the Flying Burrito Brothers, the Grateful Dead, and Jefferson Airplane, but the sheer number of anticipated concertgoers forced a relocation of the event. As thousands of fans made their way to California, the bands' crews scrambled to find an available venue large enough to accommodate the crowd.

Sears Point (now Infineon) Raceway in Sonoma, in Northern California, was chosen. The day before the bands were slated to play, however, the venue changed a second time—to the abandoned Altamont Speedway. Located about 30 miles (48 kilometers) southeast of Oakland, Altamont epitomized the desolate, high-desert landscape of inland Alameda County. Not only was the location a departure from Golden Gate Park's rolling greenery, but it also was poorly equipped to hold a free, public event of such magnitude. Unlike the stage at Woodstock the previous summer, which had been raised to separate the crowd from the performers, the stage at Altamont was hard to see from the audience and difficult to distinguish from the seating area.

The bands' choice for security further complicated the difficulties posed by the geographic location and technical situation. The Grateful Dead had hired members of the Hells Angels motorcycle club for security a number of times in the past, without incident. The Rolling Stones also had used members of the club for security at a show in London's Hyde Park the previous summer and had been pleased with the Hells Angels' ability to guard the stage and performers. The Hells Angels, however, were not trained as professional security officers, and they had a reputation for drinking alcohol and taking drugs, both of which were abundant at Altamont.

By the time the first act took the stage, approximately 300,000 people had arrived. Even during the initial performance, by Santana, fights were breaking out near the stage as the Hells Angels tried to enforce crowd control with their weapon of choice: pool cues. The violence escalated as the day progressed. Performers Gram Parsons and Grace Slick, among others, tried to quell the anger of the crowd and of the Hells Angels security staff, to no avail. One Hells Angel even assaulted and knocked out Marty Balin of Jefferson Airplane.

Finally, at about seven o'clock in the evening, as the Rolling Stones began to play their first set, a full-blown melee was taking place in the crowd near the stage. From that point on, the concert would be associated with death and violence.

In an altercation with some of the Hells Angels, an eighteen-year-old African American man named Meredith Hunter was beaten and stabbed to death. Although the incident was captured on film, the events immediately preceding the beating remain unclear. The Hells Angels member arrested for the killing, Alan Passaro, was tried for murder in summer 1972 and acquitted on grounds of self-defense. Hunter, it was said, had drawn a gun and pointed it at the stage.

Whatever the events that led to the violence, Altamont came to signify the dangers of crowd behavior at such mass events. For some, at least, it signaled the end of innocence for the 1960s counterculture.

Alison Perry

See also: Hells Angels: Rolling Stones, The.

Further Reading

Davis, Stephen. Old Gods Almost Dead: The 40-Year Odyssey of the Rolling Stones. New York: Broadway, 2001.

Loewenstein, Dora, and Philip Dodd. According to the Rolling Stones. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 2003.

Amana Society

The Amana Society is the common name of a religious group formally known as the Community of True Inspiration. It is centered in seven small villages located 23 miles (37 kilometers) northwest of Iowa City, Iowa. Originally a dissenting religious community in seventeenth-century Germany, the Pietistic group migrated to the United States in 1844, where it adopted a communal lifestyle. It went on to become one of the longest-lived communal groups in American history.

After a series of financial difficulties and disagreements among members about lifestyle issues, including fashionable dress and the everyday use of the German language, Amana dropped its communal lifestyle in 1932. Two years later, member George Foerstner began the Amana Refrigeration Company, a walk-in cooler manufacturer owned by the society and sold to investors in 1950. As of the early 2000s, the Amana Society thrives as a Midwest tourist stop featuring arts and crafts, wineries, and family-style restaurants serving German cuisine. Many of the residents are descendants of people who lived in community at the time of the original settlement.

The Amana Society's origin lies in eighteenth-century German religious reform groups organized around prophets whom followers believed were inspired by God. Largely as a result of persecution at the hands of hostile government and orthodox Lutheran church officials, the community decided to move to America. Land was purchased near Buffalo, New York, and approximately 700 members immigrated to their new home, which they named Ebenezer.

The constitution of the new community established a form of communalism in which the land and the means of production were held in common. The members of the community agreed to perform all necessary work in exchange for free room and board, an annual monetary allowance, and support in old age. In 1854, when the site at Ebenezer became too small, the group purchased a tract of land in east-central Iowa, which eventually totaled 26,000 acres (10,530 hectares).

At the new site in Iowa, members constructed residences, kitchen houses, craft shops, and all the other necessities of life. The community also built a 7-mile (11.3-kilometer) canal between two points on the Iowa River to provide hydropower for their mills. At the center of each of the seven villages was a large, plain church building. The community attempted to provide for all of its members' secular and spiritual needs from birth to death. For a time, it succeeded.

Beginning in the 1920s, however, several problems beset the communities. For one thing, members faced increasing encroachment from the outside world and challenges to their lifestyle. Problems of culture and lifestyle were exacerbated by economic difficulties and shoddy bookkeeping methods, as well as growing dependence on nonsociety labor to run some of its businesses. In addition, the younger generation became more resistant to the socially restrictive lifestyle at Amana, where everything from marriages to leisure time was regulated.

In 1932, the community undertook a reorganization known as the Great Change, which created two distinct entities. The Amana Society became the name for the community's profit-oriented, joint-stock business, and the Amana Church Society was the name of the organization responsible for its religious and charitable work. Every adult member received one share of Class A Common Stock, which entitled the member to one vote in the corporation's business decisions, as well as to full medical, dental, and burial benefits.

In the early twenty-first century, the Amana Society enjoys the amenities of contemporary American life, while it is still influenced by its communal past. It has worked to preserve the bucolic appearance of the original colonies through a strict land-use plan that prevents large commercial development.

The tourist industry is a good market for the crafts and trades pursued in the communal Amana settlements. Wine and beer shops, restaurants and groceries specializing in German cuisine, a furniture factory, and a wool business are all popular attractions with visitors to the historic sites and museum at Amana, Iowa.

Jeremy Rapport

See also: Communes: Utopianism.

Further Reading

Amana Society. <http://www.amanasociety.com>

Andelson, Jonathan G. "The Community of True Inspiration from Germany to the Amana Colonies." In America's Communal Utopias. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Barthel, Diane L. Amana: From Pietist Sect to American Community. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1984.

Shambaugh, Bertha M.H. Amana: The Community of True Inspiration. 1908. Iowa City, IA: Penfield, 1988.

American Indian Movement

The American Indian Movement (AIM) was founded in 1968 in Minneapolis, Minnesota, by Ojibwe activists, including Dennis Banks, Clyde Bellecourt, and George Mitchell. Inspired in part by the Black Power movement and the antiwar movement of the Vietnam War era, AIM joined the chorus of activist groups seeking to air social grievances, in this case on behalf of disenfranchised and oppressed Native American populations. AIM began by monitoring police activities and providing legal services for the Native American communities of Minneapolis.

During the 1950s, tens of thousands of Native Americans had been sent to live and work in Minneapolis, as well as Chicago, Denver, San Francisco, and other cities, as part of the federal government's termination and relocation programs, which sought to eliminate reservation lands, break up tribal identities, and force large-scale cultural assimilation. These newly urbanized populations faced the simultaneous difficulties of employment and poverty, police brutality, and culturally inappropriate schooling.

From the beginning, one of the major goals of AIM was to reverse the relative invisibility of Native Americans in mainstream media and popular consciousness. Most Americans believed that native peoples no longer existed, that they had died off or been killed off during the course of Western settlement. To change this perception, AIM developed a media-savvy approach to generate public awareness of Native American survival, while addressing the variety of issues facing indigenous communities, both on and off the reservation.

Said AIM supporter Russell Means of AIM's impact during the 1970s, "We put Indians and Indian rights smack dab in the middle of the public consciousness for the first time since the so-called Indian Wars... ?[AIM] laid the groundwork for the next stage in regaining our sovereignty and self-determination as nation."

Dennis Banks (left) and Russell Means (center), leaders of the activist American Indian Movement, answer media

questions during the occupation of Wounded Knee, South Dakota, in 1973. The siege called attention to Lakota Sioux grievances. (Agence FrancePresse/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

In 1970, Dennis Banks and Russell Means, a Lakota, attacked the mythology of Thanksgiving. Taking over the Mayflower II in Plymouth Harbor, Massachusetts, they denounced the history of anti-Indian violence and disputed the historical image of a friendly gathering of Pilgrims and Wampanoag Indians in the seventeenth century. Arguing from a Native American perspective, they claimed that Thanksgiving should not be a day of celebration, but should be recognized as a day of mourning. This protest and attempt to garner publicity set AIM's strategy: to seek out highly visible cultural sites or events, and to use them as a platform to make demands for social programs, free cultural expression, civil rights, and full recognition of tribal sovereignty.

In 1972, capitalizing on the highly publicized shooting death of Mohawk activist Richard Oakes earlier that year, AIM organized a national publicity event that would stretch from the San Francisco Bay Area to the nation's capital. (Oakes had been one of the leaders of the 1969 Alcatraz Island takeover, during which American Indian college students and activists had occupied the former federal prison, generating global attention for the conditions of urban Indian populations.)

Called the Trail of Broken Treaties Caravan, this cross-country procession protested the violation of treaty agreements with Native Americans. Leaving in autumn 1972 and stopping at reservations along the way to pick up more supporters, the caravan eventually made its way to the office of the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) in Washington.

Just five days before the November presidential election, more than a thousand Native Americans gathered in the building where the BIA office was located and demanded to meet President Richard M. Nixon. Before any meeting could be arranged, however, police attempted to extract the protesters. The activists barricaded themselves inside the building, with many vowing to die before surrendering. AIM's occupation of the BIA headquarters ultimately forced the government to agree to address the issues raised by the caravan.

One of the more controversial events involving an AIM member came in 1977, when Leonard Peltier (Lakota and Ojibwe) was convicted of murder in a June 1975 shootout on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. Tensions at Pine Ridge had been running high since AIM's seventy-one-day occupation of the village of Wounded Knee (located on the reservation) in 1973. During that occupation, more than 2,000 AIM members had sided with one faction of the Lakota against tribal council chairman Richard Wilson and his "GOON" (Guardians of the Oglala Nations) squad. The occupation, involving hundreds of officers from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, U.S. Marshalls, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), as well as an array of heavy weapons, had resulted in the shooting of two Native Americans.

During the 1975 shootout with Peltier, one AIM member (Joseph Stuntz) and two FBI agents (Jack Coler and Ronald Williams) were shot and killed. Peltier was ultimately convicted of killing the two agents and sentenced to two consecutive life sentences. Activist organizations such as Amnesty International regarded Peltier as a political prisoner, alleging that the government had falsified evidence and arguing that the conviction should be overturned. Despite heavy grassroots support and numerous legal appeals, Peltier remained in prison more than four decades after the incident and has been denied parole.

One of AIM's most effective projects, at least in terms of public consciousness, has been the denunciation of Native American mascots used by schools and professional sports teams. To AIM and many American Indians, the mascots are racist and degrading images that deny humanity to native peoples and ignore their diverse histories and proud cultures. As early as 1968, Means began a campaign against the Cleveland Indians baseball team and its "Chief Wahoo" mascot. In 1991, AIM and other Native American activists and supporters staged their first major protest against a professional sports team. Sparked in part by the Minnesota Twins' advancement to the World Series, which pitted them against the Atlanta Braves, the Minnesota-based AIM held national press conferences and gathered crowds of protesters in front of the two stadiums.

A few months later, in January 1992, football's Super Bowl also would be played in Minneapolis, this time between the Washington Redskins and the Buffalo Bills. And, in 1995, Native American activists and supporters again gathered to protest the World Series when the Atlanta Braves played the Cleveland Indians as both professional baseball teams continued to use Native American mascots. AIM's protests at these major sporting events thrust the mascot issue before the public in a dramatic and enduring way.

Today, the American Indian Movement continues its work on the Peltier case and the use of "Indian" mascots in professional sports, while also seeking to halt the destruction of sacred Native American sites and preserve traditional lands. Along with environmental groups, AIM seeks protection for the San Francisco Peaks in Arizona, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, and other places in America that face economic development and other disruptions of tribal life and culture.

Another of the organization's goals is to develop a global network among indigenous peoples. Using communication technologies such as the Internet, AIM is involved in new global initiatives that promise to generate international pressure on nations that ignore the rights of indigenous peoples and enhance the exchange of information and political strategies.

Natchee Blu Barnd

See also: Native Americans: New Left.

Further Reading

American Indian Movement. <http://www.aimovement.org>

Nagel, Joane. American Indian Ethnic Renewal: Red Power and the Resurgence of Identity and Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Smith, Paul Chaat, and Robert Allen Warrior. Like a Hurricane: The Indian Movement from Alcatraz to Wounded Knee. New York: New Press, 1996.

Amish

Like the Mennonites, the Amish are descendants of Swiss Anabaptist groups that originated in the early sixteenth century during the Protestant Reformation. Some Swiss Anabaptists, or Swiss Brethren, took the name Mennonite from Menno Simons, a Dutch Roman Catholic priest, who in 1536 renounced the Catholic faith and converted to Anabaptism. His followers, it is believed, adopted the name "Mennonite" to escape the ceaseless persecution Anabaptists suffered for their radical religious beliefs, which included condemnation of oaths, separation of church and state, refusal to bear arms, excommunication of unfaithful members, and rejection of infant baptism. The term "Anabaptist" means to baptize again, or to be rebaptized as an adult. Mennonites were the first German settlers in America, arriving in Germantown outside Philadelphia in the 1680s.

The Amish movement takes its name from Jacob Amman, a Swiss Mennonite leader who preached that the Mennonites did not strictly abide by the teachings of their namesake, Menno Simons. Amman and his followers broke away from the Swiss Mennonites in 1693, thereby establishing the Amish movement. The first Amish to settle in the United States arrived in about 1710 in Berks County, Pennsylvania. Later in the century, many settled in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania.

As Anabaptists, the Amish do not consider infant baptism to constitute true baptism. Adult baptism is requisite for admission into the Amish church, and it is considered a solemn vow. Anyone who chooses to leave the church after baptism is spurned or shunned by the community. However, those who choose not to be baptized are not shunned by family and friends. The Amish deliberately segregate themselves from the rest of American society for religious reasons.

There are various sects of Amish. Old Order Amish maintain the practices best known in mainstream society. These practices include rigorous restrictions on the use of modern conveniences such as electricity, automobiles, and telephones. Other groups, such as the Beachy Amish and New Order Amish, use electricity and automobiles, among other modern conveniences, but they still consider themselves Amish. Named for Bishop Moses M. Beachy, the Beachy Amish left the Old Order Amish Church in 1927; the New Order Amish separated from the Old Order Amish Church in 1996. Underlying both schisms was the desire of some members for a more liberal interpretation of faith.

Old Order Amish homes are not wired for electricity, for fear that its use could lead to the acquisition of frivolous appliances such as televisions, which would introduce elements of the secular, modern world into traditional Amish life. Some Amish communities do use electricity for particular situations and purposes. Electric generators can be used in barns, especially to assist with milk production and other farm duties, and kerosene-powered refrigerators are found in some Amish homes.

Although the usual means of transportation for most Amish is the horse and buggy, some hire non-Amish drivers to transport them by automobile or van for specific purposes such as shopping and visiting distant family members. However, hiring a driver is never permitted on the Sabbath. The telephone, viewed as a disruptive device that invades a family's privacy, is found in few Amish homes. Those who do have phones typically have them installed in outbuildings shared by more than one family. These small buildings are strategically located away from the house to ensure that the telephone's use is inconvenient.

The Amish also are known for their distinctive style of dress. Women wear long dresses in dark, solid colors. They wear prayer coverings over their hair, which is considered a woman's crowning glory and is never cut. Young girls wear their hair in long braids; women wrap their hair in a bun. Heavy black bonnets are worn over the prayer coverings in cold weather. Most women wear a white or black apron over their dresses while at home; aprons are always worn during a worship service. A triangular cape is usually pinned to the apron; in cold weather, a wool shroud is worn in place of a coat. As a symbol of their plain and simple lives, the clothing is held together with straight pins or by hook-and-eye fasteners; buttons are considered showy adornments. Women do not wear makeup or jewelry of any kind, not even a plain wedding ring.

Amish men typically wear dark trousers with suspenders and a dark vest or coat. Broad-brimmed straw hats are worn during the summer and black felt hats in winter. Single Amish men are clean shaven; when a man marries, he grows his beard. Because moustaches are associated with both the military and the nobility that persecuted the Anabaptists in Europe, they are prohibited.

The use of a dialect known as Pennsylvania German is another means by which the Amish segregate themselves from the rest of society. They speak this dialect, sometimes referred to as Pennsylvania Dutch (a misinterpretation of the word Deitsch, which means German), at home and at worship services. Amish children are taught English in school, however. Children in grades one through eight typically are educated by one Amish teacher in one shared classroom. Amish teachers are unmarried women who have completed the eighth grade, the highest level of education available to an Amish child. An eighth-grade education is believed to provide the basic knowledge and learning skills needed in communal life; anything beyond that is considered superfluous.

Amish worship services are held every other Sunday at private homes; there are no Amish church buildings. Amish preachers, who have no formal theological training, serve for life and are selected from among the male membership by the drawing of lots. Similarly, Amish bishops are chosen from among those serving as preachers. Each bishop presides over a district of approximately 170 members.

With an average of seven children per family, the Amish population is growing rapidly. When a district increases in size, its bishop is responsible for separating the congregations into smaller units. Members of the same extended family sometimes end up belonging to different districts. Each district is fully independent and has its own Ordnung, a set of unwritten rules that governs its members. The largest Amish communities are located in Holmes County, Ohio; Lancaster County, Pennsylvania; and Lagrange County, Indiana.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Mennonites.

Further Reading

Hostetler, John A. , ed. Amish Roots: A Treasury of History, Wisdom, and Lore. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1989.

Hostetler, John A. , Amish Society. 4th ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1993.

Kraybill, Donald B. The Riddle of Amish Culture. Rev. ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.

Kraybill, Donald B., and Carl D. Bowman. On the Backroad to Heaven: Old Order Hutterites, Mennonites, Amish, and Brethren. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.

Kraybill, Donald B., and Steven M. Nolt. Amish Enterprise: From Plows to Profits. 2nd ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004.

Amphetamines and Speed Freaks

Amphetamines are a class of stimulant drugs. They were developed in the nineteenth century but were not commonly used until the twentieth century, especially in the decades following World War II. The class encompasses amphetamine itself, as well as related compounds (including methamphetamine and dextroamphetamine).

Since 1970, amphetamines have been illegal in the United States without a prescription, although they were used recreationally for decades before that and were an especially prominent part of the counterculture in the years before cocaine and psychedelic drugs were popularized. Heavy users of amphetamines, sometimes called speed freaks, have remained a fixture in the drug culture.

Amphetamine was first called phenylisopropylamine, by Lazar Edeleanu, the young Jewish-Romanian chemist who synthesized it in 1887. The related compound, methamphetamine, was synthesized in Japan a few years later. Both were among many compounds derived from the alkaloid drug ephedrine and went largely unnoticed for the next forty years. Then, in 1927, a British chemist working at the University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA), Gordon Alles, discovered what powerful stimulants these drugs were.

In previous work, Alles had studied a number of psychopharmacological substances, including peyote. His resynthesis of amphetamine was purchased in 1928 by the American pharmaceutical company Smith, Kline and French and sold in inhalers under the name Benzedrine, for treatment of everything from cerebral palsy to caffeine jitters. The age of snake oils and nerve tonics had only just passed, and—while pharmaceutical companies were held to a higher standard than in the previous century—it was common for them to make the broadest claims possible about their products. There was little for which Benzedrine was not recommended as a remedy.

Amphetamine, as well as methamphetamine, dextroamphetamine, and other amphetamine-derived compounds, all work by releasing dopamine and norepinephrine from nerve endings and by further releasing serotonin when taken in large doses. These neurotransmitters then become concentrated in the synaptic cleft, the gap between cell membranes where neurotransmitters travel by diffusion. The effect, varying by dose, is a euphoric rush that puts off physical and mental fatigue, reduces the urgency of the need for sleep and food, increases mental focus, and is useful in treating attention deficit disorder (ADD), attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), and depression.

Like other stimulants, even at low therapeutic levels, amphetamines can lead to insomnia and narcolepsy, nausea, low sex drive, and talkativeness. At the higher doses associated with recreational usage, these stimulants may induce anxiety and panic, compulsive behaviors such as teeth-grinding or smoking, paranoia, agitation, headaches, and even heart problems. Regular recreational users at high dosages, like most heavy drug users, tend to lose their urge to eat, have difficulty sleeping on a regular schedule, lose interest in personal hygiene, and can suffer from a compromised immune system and serious gastrointestinal or cardiac damage.

During World War II, amphetamine was widely used by American troops to alleviate fatigue. Methamphetamine was distributed among German troops; it was even added to chocolate bars called Fliegerschokolade (pilot's chocolate). German dictator Adolf Hitler is said to have received daily injections of it as an antidepressant.

During the late 1940s and 1950s, various brands of amphetamines became popular for both therapeutic and recreational uses in the United States, especially because of their stimulant effect. Users referred to the drugs as “speed,” “bennies” (from Benzedrine), “greenies,” or “bumblebees” (from the color of the pills) and used other slang terms. Their popularity as a diet aid helped introduce them to generation after generation of university students, who soon discovered—and spread the word—that they could study longer and with more intense focus after taking a couple of pills. Housewives and stay-at-home mothers relied on them as pep pills, around which there was none of the stigma that surrounded other drugs, particularly since prescriptions were easy to come by.

Although marijuana was the drug of choice for the hippies who followed them, the postwar Beat Generation favored speed long before it became a club drug in later decades. Beat novelist Jack Kerouac is rumored to have written the first manuscript of his classic stream-of-consciousness novel On the Road (1957) in a few speed-fueled days, though by his own account, the only stimulant he took at the time was coffee. Still, On the Road, like other Beat writings, has the feel of an amphetamine user, the gregariousness and rhythms of speech associated with speed freaks.

Professional baseball players also became known as users of amphetamines—referred to as “greenies” among major leaguers—as documented in several published memoirs. The steroids scandals of the early 2000s caused many commentators to bring up this previous era of performance enhancement. Amphetamines finally were officially banned by Major League Baseball in 2006, decades after being made illegal.

Although amphetamines were recognized as a social problem for years, they were not subject to significant legal control until 1970, when the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act was passed. This act defined amphetamines as Schedule II drugs (those legally available only with a prescription, and limited to a thirty-day supply with no refill). Other Schedule II drugs include cocaine, morphine, opium, codeine, and secobarbital.

Despite legal restrictions, amphetamines remain a popular club drug in cities on both coasts and retain their popularity on college and high school campuses throughout the United States as weight-loss and study aids. In recent years, the popularity of amphetamine prescriptions to treat ADD/ADHD and treatment-resistant depression has fueled the popularity of recreational uses of Adderall and other dextroamphetamine-based medications. Also, home-based methamphetamine labs deriving the drug from common prescription and over-the-counter medicines have become a nationwide problem, especially in such Midwestern cities as St. Louis and Kansas City.

Bill Kte'pi

See also: Drug Culture: Kerouac, Jack.

Further Reading

Iversen, Leslie. Speed, Ecstasy, Ritalin: The Science of Amphetamines. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Joseph, Miriam, and Julian Durlacher. Speed: Its History and Lore. London: Carlton, 2002.

Anarchism

Anarchism is the political philosophy that rejects organized government and regards its abolition as a necessary precondition of a free and just society. Its basic tenet is that humanity flourishes most without imposed authority and external coercion. While anarchist ideas have been traced back thousands of years to ancient Greece and Taoist China, anarchism first emerged as a coherent political ideology in late-eighteenth-century Europe. It developed primarily in opposition to the rise of centralized states and industrial capitalism. By the end of the nineteenth century, anarchism was a mass revolutionary movement that attracted millions of adherents worldwide.

Anarchism has been described as a creative synthesis of its ideological cousins and political rivals, liberalism and socialism. While there is some truth in this claim, what chiefly distinguishes anarchism from both liberalism and socialism is its total rejection of the state—either as a feature of a free society or as a means to achieving that end—and its correspondingly greater emphasis on culture. While liberal political philosophy is concerned mainly (though not exclusively) with the relationship between the individual and the state, and with limiting state intrusions on the liberty of citizens, and while Marxian socialism accords primacy to the forces and relations of production, anarchism alone among the major modern political ideologies regards culture as a defining feature of both its social ideals and the means of achieving them.

Opposed to all forms of domination, whether in the home, the workplace, or the political arena, anarchists have articulated broad cultural critiques of contemporary society; they have envisioned revolutionary alternatives embodying such artistic values as self-expression, creativity, and free individual development. Not content simply to theorize or strategize revolutionary alternatives, anarchists also have embraced revolution in their daily lives, spawning an enormously creative counterculture consisting of free art, free schools, free media, and free love.

The Progressive Era

In the United States, this anarchist counterculture reached its most developed form in two periods: from the end of the nineteenth century through the first two decades of the twentieth (the Progressive Era) and again in the 1960s.

In the first of these two periods, the most well-known site of anarchist counterculture was the Ferrer Center on New York City's Lower East Side. Opened in 1911, thanks in large part to the efforts of radical anarchist Emma Goldman, the Ferrer Center served as both a libertarian day school for children and an evening cultural center for adults. Among those who lectured or taught courses there, in addition to Goldman, were editor Leonard Abbott, writer Alexander Berkman, historian Will Durant, painter Robert Henri, birth control advocate Margaret Sanger, writer Upton Sinclair, and journalist Lincoln Steffens. Cultural activities at the center included theater productions, poetry readings, public lectures, political debates, art classes, and journal publications.

Anarchists march in New York City's May Day Parade of 1913. Led by Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, the anarchist political counterculture peaked during that decade. (Library of Congress)

The art classes conducted by Henri were an especially notable countercultural aspect of the curriculum. In stark contrast to orthodox academic art training, students were instructed to rapidly execute their drawings and color sketches from a live model within twenty minutes. According to Goldman, Henri and his co-instructor, George Bellows, helped create a spirit of freedom in the class that probably did not exist anywhere else in New York at that time. The efficacy of this approach was borne out in the subsequent art careers of Henri's pupils, most notably John Sloan and Man Ray.

Described by those who participated in its activities as bursting with life, with everybody working and creating, the Ferrer Center was perhaps the greatest success story of what later became known as the Modern School movement in America. However, it was by no means alone in its vigorous contestation of the dominant political culture of the time.

By the start of World War I, Modern Schools had been opened in Chicago, Detroit, New York, Philadelphia, Portland, Oregon, Salt Lake City, and Seattle. Unlike other educational experiments of the time, these were, for the most part, schools directed by workers for the children of workers. Their founders were mainly anarchists, and their aim was to create not only a new type of school but also a new, nonauthoritarian culture and way of life. Among the distinctive features of the Modern Schools were an emphasis on learning by doing, the absence of examinations and grades, and a rejection of memorization and rote learning in favor of a more student-centered form of education. Adult education was a staple of the schools, and, as at Ferrer, most encouraged radical independent activity, ranging from antimilitarism to labor activism to sexual liberation.

While most of the anarchist educational experiments in America lasted only a few years, some flourished for decades, including the Stelton School in New Jersey and the anarchist school at the utopian Home Colony in Washington State. The former opened in May 1915 when a bomb scare in New York City and the subsequent investigation and surveillance of the Ferrer School prompted its administrators to move the school to a rural location in the village of Stelton, New Jersey. The centerpiece of an anarchist utopian colony, the Stelton School carried on and developed the educational experiment begun at the Ferrer Center. In contrast to most schools of the time, attendance at Stelton was voluntary, there was no discipline or punishment, students pursued only those subjects that interested them, and craft education and outdoor pursuits featured as prominently as book learning. Insofar as longevity is one (but by no means the only) tangible measure of the success for such communal experiments, the Stelton colony was a success. It lasted almost forty years.

Nearly as long lasting was the Home Colony experiment, founded in 1896 near Tacoma, Washington. As at Stelton, settlers at the Home Colony believed that their anarchist ideals would be realized in part by means of unorthodox educational practices. They, too, experimented with radical politics, communal land holding, nudity, free love, and sexual liberation, all of which challenged the dominant norms of both their immediate neighbors and society at large.

This sometimes made for difficult relations with those who subscribed to more orthodox views. For example, at the turn of the century, Home colonists mailed out feminist and free love articles authored by one of their members, as well as issues of the aptly named paper Discontent; state authorities responded in 1902 by shutting down the Home Colony's local post office. In 1903, the state also passed a statute that curtailed the dissemination of anarchist literature from the colony. In spite of these and other external pressures, the colony survived for roughly a quarter of a century.

Less well known than the colonies, but no less an important part of the turn-of-the-century anarchist counterculture, were the numerous works of anarchist utopian fiction. Between 1890 and 1910, more utopian novels were produced than in the eighty years before or after. Anarchist authors were particularly attracted to the form, in part because of its propagandistic value at a time when anarchism was associated in the popular mind with bomb throwing and vague ideas about social reform. Their fiction suggested a very different, and far more constructive and concrete, image of anarchism. It also encouraged vigorous debate on a wide range of controversial topics, including women's emancipation, the institution of marriage, free love, sexuality and reproduction, voluntary motherhood, and the relationship between the social organization of intimate life and revolutionary sociopolitical change.

Some of these works of fiction were first published in Mother Earth. The most influential early-twentieth-century anarchist periodical, Mother Earth claimed a circulation of approximately 40,000 in 1911.

While other anarchist papers recorded smaller circulation figures, they made important and distinctive contributions to the American counterculture by representing a wide array of anarchist immigrant communities, most notably those of the Italians, Germans, Jews, Russians, and Spaniards. Between 1870 and 1980, these immigrant groups published some 400 periodicals in more than a dozen languages. One of them, the Yiddish newspaper Fraye Arbeter Shtime (The Free Voice of Labor), based in New York and Philadelphia, continued publishing for eighty-seven years (1890–1977).

The 1960s and Beyond

Such publications proved to be particularly important from the 1920s to the 1950s, when war, economic collapse, restrictions on immigration, and political repression took their toll on the American anarchist movement. Along with libertarian book clubs, poetry circles, and the like, anarchist periodicals served as a bridge between the vibrant anarchist countercultures of the early twentieth century and the 1960s.

Of particular note during this period was the group of poets and painters that joined Kenneth Rexroth's Libertarian Circle in post-World War II San Francisco. A pacifist and an anarchist, Rexroth believed in a model of human development that led from personal freedom to an ethics of universal compassion by way of love. The primary forces impeding such development, he suggested, were the state and capitalism, which conspired to quantify and commodify all human relationships, and so destroy the integrity of the personality.

The Libertarian Circle was founded in 1946 for the purpose of countering such cultural depersonalization; while it survived for only three years, its impact on the subsequent development of the American counterculture was significant. Among those heavily influenced by its ethos were the founders of the Beat movement, which was inaugurated in October 1955 at a poetry reading in San Francisco at which Allen Ginsberg recited his new poem, Howl, to an audience that included writers Philip Lamantia, Michael McClure, Gary Snyder, Philip Whalen, and the master of ceremonies, Rexroth.

One of the most distinctive features of both the Libertarian Circle and the Beat movement was their commitment to a form of countercultural “personalist” politics, inspired in part by the pacifist anarchist tradition. In practice, this meant a rejection of traditional radical political strategies involving engagement with the structures of power, in favor of more personal attempts to “live the revolution now,” in part by establishing alternative cultural institutions that ran parallel to the old ones but had as little to do with them as possible. What is now commonly referred to as the 1960s counterculture grew out of these experiments, as increasing numbers of Americans decided to drop out of the cultural mainstream.

Young people in particular turned their backs on cultural expectations of marriage, career, and materialistic social climbing, and turned instead to a Beat lifestyle of voluntary poverty, sexual freedom, heightened consciousness, personal expression, and communion with nature. Some rejected social commitment altogether. Others embraced a form of social commitment based on values very different from those that predominated in mainstream American society.

Between 1965 and 1967, for instance, American youth flocked to the low-rent Haight-Ashbury district of San Francisco and developed a communitarian subculture distinguished by residential collectives, shops run not only for profit but for the community, street festivals, and the pooling of money, food, and drugs. Much of this activity was anarchist in orientation. The members of a group named the Diggers, in honor of the radical, agrarian communards of seventeenth-century England, attempted to create a moneyless economy by recycling society's surplus goods. They also practiced a form of anarchic street theater intended to satirize the alienating and exploitive institutions of mainstream American culture.

In many respects, the American counterculture of the 1960s closely resembled its early-twentieth-century anarchist counterpart, even if many of its practitioners were unaware of this fact. The resemblance is particularly striking after 1967, when the counterculture grew by leaps and bounds, and millions of Americans chose to live in thousands of communes based on alternative norms and values. Most of these communes were urban, but a significant minority were not. Between 1965 and 1970, participants in the hippie counterculture created at least twice as many rural communes as had been established in all of American history.

In spite of their great diversity, all of the communes aimed to achieve ecological and direct, face-to-face forms of human association reminiscent of the craft-centered utopian visions articulated by anarchists such as Peter Kropotkin and sympathetic libertarian socialists such as William Morris at the end of the nineteenth century. In the 1960s, a similar vision of decentralized, self-governing organic community and pleasurable work was articulated by the anarcho-communist Paul Goodman, whose ideas exercised a profound influence on the American counterculture. Later, as the 1960s counterculture began to wane, both Goodman's ideas and those of Kropotkin inspired the literary imagination of Ursula K. Le Guin, whose 1974 anarchist utopian novel, The Dispossessed: An Ambiguous Utopia, stands as a lasting monument to the spirit of the American anarchist counterculture.

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, that spirit lives on in the decentralized networks of the alter-globalization movement, as well as in countless experiments in cooperative production and distribution, alternative media and art, and collective living. Some of the new countercultural forms that American anarchists have helped to develop since the 1970s have been primarily oppositional, designed to impede the flows of neoliberal state and corporate power or to subvert their cultural expressions. Examples of such strategies and tactics include billboard subversion (the defacing, reshaping, and overpasting of billboards to challenge corporate gloss), the performance of live plays in front of surveillance cameras, hacktivism (the jamming or infiltration of computer systems and the subversive use of domain names to attack well-known corporate brands), and the creative use of transformative play (puppet theaters, circus performances, carnival, and the like) to disrupt international financial meetings.

Other contemporary, anarchist-inspired countercultural forms are consciously intended to prefigure or create alternatives to capitalism and the state. Examples include affinity groups (small, fluid, autonomous groups of activists united by friendship and a common desire to foment radical social change), Temporary Autonomous Zones (fleeting enclaves of freedom, such as the carnivalesque Reclaim the Streets protests), the cooperative movement, informal community networks such as communal kitchens and neighborhood assemblies, eco-communes, and the ever-growing network of independent media centers (intended to counteract corporate concentration in media ownership through the creation of alternative sources of information) and social centers.

The exuberance and creativity demonstrated by those who participate in such cultural experiments suggest that, contrary to popular belief and mainstream academic opinion, the American anarchist counterculture is still very much alive and thriving.

Laurence Davis

See also: Anarchist Cookbook, The Beat Generation, Berkman, Alexander, Goldman, Emma.

Further Reading

Avrich, Paul. Anarchist Voices: An Oral History of Anarchism in America. Oakland, CA: AK, 2005.

Avrich, Paul. The Modern School Movement: Anarchism and Education in the United States. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980.

Blechman, Max, ed. Drunken Boat: Art, Rebellion, Anarchy. Brooklyn, NY, and Seattle, WA: Autonomedia and Left Bank, 1994.

Marshall, Peter. Demanding the Impossible: A History of Anarchism. London: Fontana, 1993.

Roszak, Theodore. The Making of a Counter Culture: Reflections on the Technocratic Society and Its Youthful Opposition. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Sonn, Richard D. Anarchism. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Veysey, Laurence R. The Communal Experience: Anarchist and Mystical Communities in Twentieth-Century America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.

Anarchist Cookbook, The

The Anarchist Cookbook, published in 1970, is a 160-page “recipe book for radicals” by William Powell. It offers a mix of philosophy, political ranting, and tips on revolutionary activism, including terrorist acts.

The volume begins with a “prefatory note” by Peter Bergman, a long, scholarly essay on anarchism and philosophy that has little to do with the rest of the book. This is followed by a short foreword and introduction by the author, four chapters, a postscript giving advice to protesters in trouble with the law, and a bibliography.

The four main chapters are: (1) "Drugs," including means of identification, growing techniques, cooking recipes, chemical manufacture, and somatic effects; (2) "Electronics, Sabotage and Surveillance," giving instructions on the detection of bugging devices, broadcasting free radio, and "forms of sabotage"; (3) "Natural, Nonlethal and Lethal Weapons," including tips for hand-to-hand combat, notes on pistols and revolvers, and instructions on how to make tear gas in your own basement; and (4) "Explosives and Booby Traps," a how-to guide for making TNT, mixing blasting gelatin, and placing charges, among other instructions. The book includes a number of hand-drawn diagrams and personal observations and anecdotes from Powell, who claimed to have found most of his information in military and special forces manuals in the New York Public Library.

Despite its erudite preface, The Anarchist Cookbook has little to do with political anarchism; rather, it advocates nihilism, vigilantism, and terrorism. In the foreword, Powell wrote, "In this day and age, ignorance is not only inexcusable, it is criminal and perhaps fatal.... If the people of the United States do not protect themselves against the fascists, capitalists and communists, they will not be around much longer." From a twenty-first-century perspective, The Anarchist Cookbook is a product of its historical and cultural context, combining the survivalist philosophy, revolutionary spirit, reactionary offensive, antiwar sentiments, hippie escapism, youthful hubris, and utopian vision of the late 1960s and early 1970s.

The book was originally published by Lyle Stuart, but the rights were sold in the early 1980s to Barricade Books. The Anarchist Cookbook remains in print and widely available today. A number of copycat publications have appeared in print and on the Internet, and American World Pictures distributed a film titled The Anarchist Cookbook (2002) that bears no connection to Powell's work.

The original handbook, nevertheless, continues to be controversial in the post-9/11 world, especially as a number of the "recipes" contained in it are chemically unsound, unstable, and dangerous to the maker, as well as any recipient. Indeed, the book is so error laden that it has generated its own conspiracy theories. These hold that the mistakes were made intentionally or that the book was written by the Central Intelligence Agency or Federal Bureau of Investigation to backfire on anyone attempting to follow its instructions.

"The book," Powell later wrote, "in many respects, was a misguided product of my adolescent anger at the prospect of being drafted and sent to Vietnam to fight in a war that I did not believe in.... The central idea to the book was that violence is an acceptable means to bring about political change. I no longer agree with this."

Julia Pine

See also: Anarchism.

Further Reading

Powell, William. The Anarchist Cookbook. Fort Lee, NJ: Barricade, 1989.

Anderson, Laurie (1947–)

Multimedia performance artist Laurie Anderson emerged out of an eclectic New York avant-garde group of the early 1970s that also included musician Philip Glass, artist Keith Sonnier, self-termed "anarchitect" Gordon Matta-

Clark, and others.

Anderson was born in Chicago on June 5, 1947, the second of eight children in an upper-middle-class family. In 1969, she graduated from Barnard College in New York City and, in 1972, earned a master's degree in fine arts from Columbia University.

Her first major piece, which appeared in 1973, was a twelve-hour audiovisual portrait of Joseph Stalin. Since then, she has produced numerous music albums, writings, and exhibitions, as well as films.

The artist's earliest inspiration was the work of Beat-era voice-over artist Ken Nordine. Later influences centered on the post-punk and New Wave milieu of early 1970s New York. Her reputation and repertoire, rooted in the counterculture conflation of high art and pop art, grew out of her participation in collective performances, called "happenings," at that time. With its experimental nature, her work clearly challenges traditional forms of music, art, and performance.

Anderson's performances are often characterized by the use of electronic devices to create melodically eccentric sounds and evocative abstract images. They often center on her electronic violin playing and narrative word play. She has collaborated with musicians Peter Gabriel, Jean Michel Jarre, Brian Eno, and Lou Reed, and she has toured with the Beat writer William S. Burroughs. Her 1981 song "O Superman" was a surprise hit. It reached number two on the British music charts and expanded public interest in her work.

Anderson's best-known productions include the recordings Big Science (1982), Strange Angels (1989), and Bright Red (1994), as well as the film Home of the Brave (1986). Other notable works include the stage performance The Nerve Bible (1994), a retrospective that also appeared in book form as Stories from the Nerve Bible (1995); the autobiographical performance Happiness (2002); the multimedia event Moby Dick: Songs and Stories from Moby Dick (1999); and the double CD Live in New York (2002).

In 2003, Anderson was selected as the first recipient of the artist-in-residence grant from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). As a writer, performance artist, musician, filmmaker, and composer, she continues to produce challenging work that is increasingly associated with the postmodern. Productions since 2003 have included a live performance called The End of the Moon (2004); a stage review of modern American culture called Homeland (2008); and Delusions, a series of short mystery plays that jumps from the everyday to the mythic in music, visuals, and puppetry, which premiered in Vancouver, Canada, during the 2010 Olympic Winter Games.

G. Kim Blank

See also: Performance Art.

Further Reading

Anderson, Laurie. Empty Places: A Performance. New York: Harper Perennial, 1991.

Anderson, Laurie. Stories from the Nerve Bible: A Retrospective 1972–1992. New York: Harper Perennial, 1994.

Furlong, William. Laurie Anderson: An Overview. Audio Arts, 1981. Audiocassette.

Howell, John. Laurie Anderson. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 1992.

Sparkman, David. "Laurie Anderson Interviewed by David Sparkman." Washington Review (October–November 1981): 25–26.

Anderson, Margaret (1886–1973)

Margaret Anderson was the founding editor of The Little Review, regarded as one of the most important English-language literary journals of the twentieth century for having provided an early outlet for the modernist literary movement. This journal published prose and poetry by T.S. Eliot, James Joyce, Ezra Pound, Gertrude Stein, William Carlos Williams, and William Butler Yeats, as well as drawings by Juan Gris and Francis Picabia, among others.

Margaret Caroline Anderson was born on November 24, 1886 (some sources give 1890, 1891, or 1893), in Indianapolis, Indiana. She briefly attended Western College in Miami, Ohio, but left school to pursue her talents as a musician. At the age of twenty-two, she moved to Chicago and began working for a series of magazines and newspapers while struggling to establish a career as a pianist. Her experiences as a writer and staff editor led her to start The Little Review in March 1914. Despite this literary turn in her career, her passion for playing the piano continued throughout her life.

Other individuals had important roles in shaping the magazine in its early years. Ezra Pound was the foreign editor from 1917 to 1919. Jane Heap, Anderson's partner as well as her business colleague, formally joined the staff in 1916 and took over as editor in 1923. But Anderson's forceful vision for the magazine as an "inspired conversation" among the producers, critics, and consumers of modern art and literature dominated the first several years of its publication.

According to scholar Jayne Marek, the literary importance of The Little Review went far beyond providing a venue for the luminaries of modernist literature. Anderson and Heap, Marek says, fundamentally altered the traditional role of the magazine editor. Refusing to remain passive facilitators of others' work, they engaged in active guidance and criticism.

In 1917, Anderson moved to New York, where she and Heap continued publication of their magazine. In March of the following year, The Little Review published its first excerpt of Joyce's modernist novel Ulysses. The serial publication set off the legal dispute known as the "Ulysses trial," in which Anderson and Heap were charged by the state of New York with "publishing obscene literature" and the U.S. Postal Service seized several issues of the magazine. The trial not only called upon the women to defend their right of free speech, they also felt their lesbian lifestyle was under attack.

The verdict went against Anderson and Heap. The magazine was declared obscene, the editors were fined, and Ulysses was banned in the United States. Anderson returned to the work of publishing The Little Review, but the loss of revenue from the postal confiscation and the chilled climate toward avant-garde writing crippled the journal's circulation. She left for Paris in 1923, turning over the editorship of the journal to Heap, who remained in New York. Anderson edited the final issue, from Paris, in 1929.

Anderson settled in Le Cannet on the French Riviera. She lived with the singer Georgette Leblanc, played and wrote music for the piano, and began her autobiography. She published three volumes of My Thirty Years' War before her death on October 18, 1973.

Lawrence Jones

See also: Magazines, Little.

Further Reading

Anderson, Margaret. My Thirty Years' War: An Autobiography. New York: Covici, Friede, 1930.

Marek, Jayne E. Women Editing Modernism: Little Magazines and Literary History. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1995.

Platt, Susan Noyes. "The Little Review: Early Years and Avant-Garde Ideas." In The Old Guard and the Avant Garde: Modernism in Chicago, 1910–1940, ed. Sue Ann Prince. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.

Stansell, Christine. American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century. New York: Henry Holt, 2000.

Andrews, Stephen Pearl (1812–1886)

The life and work of Stephen Pearl Andrews encompassed a broad range of activities and countercultures that highlighted many of the social and political issues of nineteenth-century America. He was an ardent abolitionist who became known for his writings on anarchism and his advocacy of utopianism and free love. Andrews supported labor reform and women's rights, and he developed his own philosophy of government, as well as a universal language.

He was born on March 22, 1812, in Templeton, Massachusetts, the son of Elisha Andrews, a Baptist minister, and Wealthy Ann (Lathrop) Andrews. Following education in several settings, he moved to Louisiana in 1830 and taught at the Jackson Female Seminary and the College of Louisiana. He studied law and began to practice in 1833. It was in Louisiana that he first expressed his condemnation of slavery.

Andrews married Mary Ann Gordon in 1835; they had three sons. In 1839, the family moved to Texas, where he practiced law and was nearly killed for his abolitionist speeches. In 1843, he traveled to London to obtain funding for a plan to eradicate slavery in Texas. Although there was sympathy for the plan in some quarters, it failed to obtain the support it needed to proceed, and Andrews returned to the United States.

Settled with his family in Boston, he became involved in the application of phonographic technology for instruction and initiated a lifelong study of languages and linguistics. In 1848, the family moved to New York, where Andrews discovered the writing and teachings of anarchist Josiah Warren, becoming the leading disciple of Warren's views on "equitable commerce" and related philosophies of individual rights.

In 1851, Andrews assisted Warren in establishing Modern Times, a utopian experiment on 750 acres (300 hectares) on Long Island, New York, where the practice of equitable commerce was to be the guiding principle. The community found only limited success, however, as it became associated with the free love movement after the publication of Andrews's Love, Marriage, and Divorce, and the Sovereignty of the Individual in 1853. Modern Times did not achieve the objectives that Warren and Andrews sought, and they abandoned the project.

Andrews's wife Mary Ann died in 1855, and he married Esther Hussey Bartlett Jones the following year. In 1857, he established another utopian community, called Unitary Home, located on Fourteenth Street in Manhattan.

A philosophy he called universology, the "science of the universe" and the unity of knowledge, fueled many of Andrews's subsequent causes, including the concept of a universal government (pantarchy) and a universal language (alwato). Into the late 1860s, he further developed his ideas of universology, while becoming increasingly active in labor reform and women's rights.

In 1870, he began a collaboration with suffragist Victoria Claflin Woodhull and her sister, Tennessee Claflin, whose Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly became a vehicle for Andrews to present his views on pantarchy and related issues. He later would endorse Woodhull as a candidate for the U.S. presidency. Two significant works by Andrews appeared in the early 1870s, The Primary Synopsis of Universology and Alwato (1871) and The Basic Outline of Universology (1872).

In his later years, Andrews continued to develop his own style of radical social thought, publishing in such organs as The Radical Review and Truth Seeker, while continuing to lecture on and teach about the many topics he championed. He died on May 21, 1886, in New York City.

James J. Kopp

See also: Abolitionism; Communes; Woodhull, Victoria.

Further Reading

Stern, Madeleine B. The Pantarch: A Biography of Stephen Pearl Andrews. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1968.

Wunderlich, Roger. Low Living and High Thinking at Modern Times, New York. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1992.

Anti-Freemasonry

Anti-Freemasonry (also called antimasonry) was a political movement of the early nineteenth century. It opposed the fraternal Freemason organization for, allegedly, having corrupting influence over the U.S. government and other major institutions, such as churches. The movement spawned a political party that elected a number of persons to state and national office in the early 1830s.

Hostility to Freemasons (or just Masons) had its origins in Europe and colonial America. It reached a peak following the 1826 disappearance of William Morgan, a former Mason who had just written an exposé of the secret order and threatened to reveal its secrets. Morgan, who was last seen in Batavia, New York, disappeared in September 1826, causing some to claim he had been abducted and killed by Masons.

A few Masons were indicted on minor charges in connection with the incident. Many residents of upstate New York became convinced that the Masons were responsible, and that their power, privilege, and influence allowed them to escape conviction. The antimasonry movement arose from the outrage about this case, and soon gained momentum as adherents worked to rid the nation of perceived vice, corruption, and subversion.

At its core, antimasonry was inspired by the belief that something had gone deeply wrong with the American experiment in republican government. In the 1820s, economic growth, geographic expansion, and individual mobility had produced rapid social, economic, political, and cultural changes that were keenly felt by the hard-pressed middle classes—farmers, artisans, shopkeepers, and other small-property holders. Among these groups, especially among those who followed orthodox Congregationalism or evangelicalism, antimasonry's message of regeneration found its strongest adherents.

According to the Anti-Freemasons, the Masonic Order was a secret, corrupt aristocracy that subverted both Christianity and the American republican order. Anti-Freemasons claimed that the Masonic oath pledged members to defend fellow Masons against any charge, “murder and treason not excepted,” and required them to favor each other in all business, political, and social relations. The Anti-Freemasons also alleged that the oath required brothers to protect the chastity of females related to Masons, implying that they took sexual license against other women. Thus they were seen to impugn the virtue and piety of outsider women, who played a crucial role in the antimasonry movement.

Anti-Freemasons interpreted Freemasonry’s mystic religious oaths and practices as deistic and heretical. They alleged that Freemasonry encouraged the elevation of private interests over the common good, subverted the law and eroded equal rights by infiltrating government, subverted virtue by encouraging vice, and undermined revealed religion by espousing deism. Antimasons promised to restore virtue by purging Masons from office and by exposing their corrupt doings, which would then allow ordinary men and women to infuse public life with republican and Christian values.

United by a commitment to purge Masons from public life, the Anti-Freemasons were an important political force in Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, western New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. There were antimasonry newspapers, public committees, political parties, and mass rallies in all of these states. Yet the Anti-Freemasons were unable to create a distinct policy platform that would distinguish them from the mass political parties that increasingly dominated politics in the 1830s. By 1840, they had been largely absorbed into the Whig Party.

Despite their rapid demise, the Anti-Freemasons’ charge that aristocratic elements would undermine the American republican order endured. Radical Republicans William H. Seward of New York and Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania began their political careers as Antimasons. And, in the 1840s and 1850s, some former Anti-Freemasons battled slavery by railing against an alleged cabal of slaveholders committed to subverting the American republic and the U.S. Constitution.

John Craig Hammond

See also: Freemasonry.

Further Reading

Goodman, Paul. Towards a Christian Republic: Antimasonry and the Great Transition in New England, 1826–1836. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Kutolowski, Kathleen Smith. “Antimasonry Reexamined: Social Bases of the Grass-Roots Party.” Journal of American History 71(1984): 269–93.

Ratcliffe, Donald J. “Antimasonry and Partisanship in Greater New England, 1826–1836.” Journal of the Early Republic 15(1995): 199–239.

Anti-Globalization Movement

Since the late 1990s, members of a counterculture made up largely of activists, intellectuals, and students from all over the world have banded together in opposition to globalization, the rise of worldwide capitalism driven by technological advances in the manufacturing and communications industries.

Mainstream economists, intellectuals, and politicians view globalization as creating better living conditions for the world's peoples. Left-leaning scholars and activists disagree. Academics and analysts such as Walden Bello, Charles Derber, and Samir Amin contend that globalization results in "a race to the bottom," a systematic widening of the gap between rich and poor that expands the power of corporations and their executives, political elites, and the world's wealthiest individuals, while exacerbating the squalid living conditions of the world's 3 billion poorest people.

Groups as diverse as AIDS activists, union laborers, animal rights advocates, environmentalists, youth coalitions, and senior citizens have united against the exploitative practices that globalization is said to result in, such as fourteen-hour workdays, sweatshop working conditions, minimal pay, environmental damage, and the corporate patenting of indigenous knowledge in the fields of medicine and agriculture.

Through the coordinated efforts of organizations such as Global Exchange, Focus on the Global South, 50 Years Is Enough, and the International Forum on Globalization, there have been several successful protests, forums, and other events aimed at raising anti-globalization consciousness and disseminating information among people in all parts of the world. Protest.net, a Web site that provides information on upcoming globalization-related protests, has reported that thirty-six countries have hosted anti-globalization activities.

The defining moment of the anti-globalization movement occurred during the 1999 World Trade Organization (WTO) Ministerial Summit in Seattle, where thousands of people representing hundreds of different organizations gathered to support the rights of the world's poorest and most marginalized people. Since that event, anti-globalization activists have successfully organized and protested at such major meetings as the 2000 International Monetary Fund/World Bank (IMF/WB) Summit in Prague, in the Czech Republic; the 2001 Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA) meeting in Quebec City, Canada; the 2001 Group of Eight (G8) Summit in Genoa, Italy; the 2003 FTAA meeting in Miami, Florida; the 2003 G8 Summit in Evian, France; the 2003 WTO Ministerial Conference in Cancun, Mexico; the 2006 G8 Summit in St. Petersburg, Russia; the 2007 G8 Summit in Rostock, Germany; IMF/WB meetings in Washington, D.C., in October 2007 and April 2009; and the 2009 G20 Summit in London, England.

The signal event of the anti-globalization movement was the massive demonstration in the streets of Seattle during the World Trade Organization summit in November 1999. (Kim Stallknecht/Stringer/AFP/Getty Images)

According to a report by the International Forum on Globalization (IFG), one of the central issues dividing citizen movements and corporate globalists is that “where corporate globalists see the spread of democracy and vibrant market economies, citizen movements see the power to govern shifting away from people and communities to financial speculators and global corporations dedicated to the pursuit of short-term profit in disregard of all human and natural concerns.” The future of the anti-globalization counterculture will be a response to the worldwide trend toward capitalist development.

Paul Miller

See also: Slow Movement.

Further Reading

International Forum on Globalization. Alternatives to Economic Globalization: A Better World Is Possible. San Francisco: Berrett-Koehler, 2002.

Moore, Mike. A World Without Walls: Freedom, Development, Free Trade and Global Governance. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Antinomianism

Antinomianism—from the Greek anti (against) and nomos (law)—is the belief that the grace of God excuses individuals and groups from any requirement to obey the laws of morality or ethics as given by the church or secular authority. Antinomians believed that God freely grants sanctification, love, and protection on whomever he chooses, regardless of the person’s behavior.

In areas dominated by Calvinist views of salvation and damnation as predestined states, individuals zealously examined their lives for signs of their eternal, preordained fate. The inevitable slip from perfect obedience could send an individual into mental anguish and nauseating fear of perpetual torment. In a sense, Antinomianism provided relief from such anxiety by removing behavior as a determinant of one’s true spiritual fate. It provided mental comfort for adherents by emphasizing God’s love and power to forgive. At an extreme, it could also be taken to mean that obeying any law, whether moral, scriptural, or even civil, was unnecessary.

In early seventeenth-century Massachusetts, those who questioned the ruling elite were branded “antinomians” by their opponents. Because the term implied a life of debauchery and heresy, it was not one they used themselves. Whether called the Antinomian Controversy or, more accurately, the Free Grace Controversy, the events of the mid-1630s threatened the leadership and dominant culture of Massachusetts.

The unique political situation there, in which Puritans controlled the Massachusetts Bay Company, the colony’s chartering corporation, ultimately gave the colonists the ability to make the laws of the colony. Because many had fled England fearing God’s imminent punishment of that country, both the ministers and the political leaders of Massachusetts sought to maintain order in the wilderness colony by creating a biblically based civil and religious society, hoping to ensure divine blessing. Although all New England Puritans believed in the doctrine of freely given (unearned) grace, community leaders needed to balance that belief with a system of laws that the people would obey.

While the infant colony struggled to reconcile obedience and freedom, Anne Hutchinson arrived in Massachusetts from England in 1634. Following her minister, John Cotton, across the Atlantic, she and her family became respected members of the Puritan congregation in Boston. Anne's husband, William, represented Boston as a deputy on the Massachusetts General Court.

Anne Hutchinson, a respected midwife, led meetings to discuss the week's sermon. Initially intended only for women, these meetings became so popular that Hutchinson added a separate series for men; more than sixty people assembled in her home each week. In opposition to Puritan orthodoxy, she argued that one's behavior gave no clue to one's true spiritual state and that concern for outward behavior did not reflect one's inner state of grace. Hutchinson hinted that the colony's preachers, other than Cotton and her brother-in-law, John Wheelwright, emphasized a "covenant of works" at the expense of the "covenant of grace" and were unqualified to preach. The ministers resented the implication and denounced it as dangerous.

The majority of the First Church of Boston shared Hutchinson's concerns and asked to have Wheelwright join their ministry, although the congregation already had a second minister, John Wilson. With the church unable to achieve the required unanimous vote, Wheelwright left to lead another congregation. The Boston Church grew increasingly divided. In December 1636, Governor Henry Vane expressed fear that God's wrath would come down upon the colony because of division and erroneous preaching. He agreed with Hutchinson that the ministers put too much emphasis on actions and behavior and not enough on God's unearned grace.

In hopes of restoring peace, the General Court declared a colonywide day of fasting and humiliation. Invited by Cotton to preach that day to the Boston Church, Wheelwright harshly condemned ministers who implied that personal behavior can determine salvation or damnation. For his provocative sermon, the General Court in 1637 judged Wheelwright guilty of sedition (but not heresy). The Boston Church presented a petition in support of Wheelwright and his views.

Seeking to weaken the political power of the Antinomians, the General Court refused the petition and arranged to hold the next elections in Newton rather than Boston. Vane went before the General Court and urged that the Wheelwright petition be heard before the elections; John Winthrop and others insisted on holding elections first.

The General Court divided into two factions, with the larger group moving across the street to conduct the balloting. They chose Winthrop as the new governor, a position he had held previously. The General Court then proceeded to disenfranchise and banish the leaders of the Antinomian Controversy; anyone who had signed the Wheelwright petition was vulnerable. In addition, visitors from outside the colony were forbidden to stay more than three weeks, preventing an influx of Antinomians.

Massachusetts's churches held a General Synod to discuss the dispute's theological ramifications, declaring nearly a hundred errors on the part of the Antinomians. The synod also sought to limit two earlier privileges that had contributed to the spread of controversy: the freedom of members to question the ministry and to hold private meetings in their homes.

Although Hutchinson had not committed any political crime, the General Court held a trial seeking to banish her in November 1637. Hutchinson's quick wit and intelligence made her accusers look ridiculous, and the court appeared about to drop the charges against her. At that point, however, Hutchinson proclaimed that she knew she would be cleared of all charges because God had told her so. Ascribing authority to immediate personal revelation undermined the very foundation of the theocracy, and the court banished her from the colony. Hutchinson and her family fled to Rhode Island.

Because the crisis occurred at a time when the Massachusetts Bay Colony and its ruling conventions were in a state of flux, it had a decisive impact on the future shape of New England. Massachusetts's churches had been unusual in allowing members and ministry to share authority. After the controversy, congregations became more formal in structure.

By branding Hutchinson an outsider, Massachusetts defined itself as a disciplined, traditional orthodoxy. The emphasis on controlling behavior would be a significant part of New England theology for the next hundred years, until the Great Awakening once again called into doubt whether or not a person's outward behavior was indicative of his or her prospects of salvation or damnation.

Melissa Weinbrenner

See also: Dyer, Mary; Hutchinson, Anne.

Further Reading

Battis, Emery John. Saints and Sectaries: Anne Hutchinson and the Antinomian Controversy in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Chapel Hill: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Virginia, by the University of North Carolina Press, 1962.

Bozeman, Theodore Dwight. The Precisionist Strain: Disciplinary Religion & Antinomian Backlash in Puritanism to 1638. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004.

Winship, Michael P. Making Heretics: Militant Protestantism and Free Grace in Massachusetts, 1636–1641. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2002.

Winship, Michael P. The Times and Trials of Anne Hutchinson: Puritans Divided. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2005.

Apocalypse Culture

Apocalypse culture is a literary and cultural milieu for those fascinated with eschatology, or the study of last things. Central elements in the eccentric orbit traversed by apocalypse culture include the ideas of German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche and French writer Georges Bataille, the careers of psychopaths, deviant sexuality, ritual magic, fascism, and mind control.

Apocalypse culture emerged out of a West Coast, post-punk demimonde and underground culture of the 1970s. It first found its voice in the periodicals RE/Search and Exit, the catalogues of the Los Angeles-based Amok bookstore and press, and editor Adam Parfrey's seminal text Apocalypse Culture (1987), a collection of essays that defines itself as "an exhaustive tour through the nether regions of today's psychotic brainscape."

The apocalypse, understood in its broadest sense, is both a moment of radical negation and one of radical potential—a confluence that has provided a home for much of American counterculture. With its morbid fascinations and will to provoke, apocalypse culture picks up on the nihilist strands of punk rock and the decadent phase of 1960s counterculture typified by murderer Charles Manson and the Process Church (a defunct religious group that worshipped both Christ and Satan) sometimes referred to as "acid fascism." It makes clear the often-unstated stakes of radical counterculture: Untrammelled freedom is ethically ambivalent. In celebration of Nietzsche's injunction to move "beyond good and evil" and the English occultist Aleister Crowley's credo that "do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the law," apocalypse culture flirts with a libertinism that holds as much potential for the retrograde as the radical.

One frequently cited, key figure is Boyd Rice, who recorded industrial/noise records under the sobriquet NON for some twenty-five years beginning in 1977. Rice is a prominent member of the Church of Satan and reputed onetime member of the White Aryan Resistance (WAR)—affiliated American Front. He consistently espouses a Social Darwinist perspective, celebrating a philosophy of might makes right.

Another well-known proponent is painter and performance artist Joe Coleman, known for his near-maniacal attention to detail and for the subject matter of his paintings—serial killers, doomed poets and musicians, visions of generative violence. Coleman captures the sensibility of apocalypse culture with his focus on dire portent and his examination of aberrance as a potential path to self-realization.

It might be argued that radical negation in its generative phase is, as Parfrey wrote, “an attempt to confront the terrifying void of a patently meaningless universe by challenging it at its own game, to remake zero by provoking it in every conceivable way.” However, by embracing the sickness said to signal the imminent demise of contemporary culture, the counterculture in apocalyptic mode can just as readily deny life as celebrate it.

Mark Harrison

See also: Manson Family.

Further Reading

Coleman, Joe. Cosmic Retribution: The Infernal Art of Joe Coleman. Seattle, WA: Fantagraphics, 1992.

Felton, David, Robin Green, and Dalton David, eds. Mindfuckers: A Source Book on the Rise of Acid Fascism in America, Including Material on Charles Manson, Mel Lyman, Victor Baranco, and Their Followers. San Francisco: Straight Arrow, 1972.

Parfrey, Adam, ed. Apocalypse Culture. Portland, OR: Feral House, 1990.

Petros, George, ed. The Exit Collection. Chicago: Tacit, 1998.

Ridgeway, James. Blood in the Face: The Ku Klux Klan, Aryan Nations, Nazi Skinheads, and the Rise of a New White Culture. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 1990.

Apple Computer

An innovative computer hardware and software company founded in 1976 by Steve Jobs and Steven Wozniak, Apple Computer won over a devoted following with its easy-to-use interface, handsome products, and cutting-edge technological developments. While IBM's personal computer (PC) soon replaced Mac hardware as the industry standard, and as Mac's operating system was displaced by Microsoft Windows for the vast majority of computer users, Apple has maintained an image as a countercultural company to the present day.

Apple began as a garage-based assembly operation for hobbyists' computers that shipped with little more than a central processor. The original machine was replaced in 1977 by the Apple II. Over time the Apple II introduced such features as a color display screen and multiple disk drives, innovations that define computers in the twenty-first century. Apple grew phenomenally in its early years, and sales of the Apple II eventually reached 1 million units. But it was not only technical innovation that drove Apple, it also was design and marketing.

Wozniak was the company's brilliant young engineer; Jobs was its brilliant young salesman. Jobs took Apple far beyond hobbyists into the mainstream consumer market, delivering, as one of its early mottos had it, "Computers for the Rest of Us." Until Apple, computers were either primitive hacker toys or mainframes used by governments and corporations. By stressing utility for the layperson and by designing ever more user-friendly products, Apple prospered.

Jobs was forced out in the mid-1980s (the company floundered in his absence). He returned in 1997 to inspire Apple's most innovative computers, as well as the groundbreaking iPod, a personal music player with exceptional sales and influence.

Apple's real breakthrough came not with hardware, but with software. Drawing both on in-house work and research results that Xerox had gathered but never exploited, Apple produced the first commercial graphical interface, featured in its 1983 Lisa computer. Although the Lisa failed in the marketplace, it provided a glimpse of the future, departing radically from operating systems that required users to type in arcane codes. When the first Macintosh computer (Mac, for short) shipped, in 1984, it announced its friendly intentions with a large, apparently handwritten "Hi" on the box.

The Macintosh kick-started the field of desktop publishing, an entirely new technology that enabled users to create professional-looking documents without expensive hardware. The Mac also became an indispensable tool of multimedia designers. Similar easy-to-use software such as iMovie and GarageBand now brings near-professional-level video and music production capabilities to nonprofessional users.

Apple has had little success with corporations and government. IBM's PC, introduced in 1981, immediately became computing's de facto standard. Despite its cheeky advertisement when the PC shipped, "Welcome, IBM. Seriously," Apple ceased being a genuine competitor. Later, IBM was replaced as Apple's nemesis by Microsoft, which had written the IBM PC's operating system but shrewdly retained the right to market it to other hardware manufacturers. Microsoft soon became computing's leviathan. "The war's over," Jobs said when he returned to Apple, "and Microsoft won."

The Macintosh computer proclaimed that Apple—although itself a multibillion-dollar company—was not run by or made for the faceless drones of business. Apple's 1984 Super Bowl television ad showed a Technicolor young woman vanquishing an auditorium of black-and-white automatons in the thrall of Big Brother. Accordingly, the Mac's most loyal customers have remained home and education users, as well as multimedia designers.

Few multibillion-dollar companies can claim Apple's counterculture status. The Mac remains the computer that big business does not use, despite its elegant power, multimedia superiority, and users' devotion. The runaway success of the iPod, moreover, signaled a revolution in the music listening and purchasing habits of twenty-first-century American youth, in the recording industry, and, no doubt, the image of Apple. The introduction of the popular iPhone, a portable multimedia player and smartphone, in 2007, and of the iPad, a tablet computer, in 2010, likewise set new trends in personal telecommunications and computing technology while burnishing Apple's image as a trendsetter.

Arnie Keller

See also: Hackers: Whole Earth Catalog.

Further Reading

Carleton, Jim. Apple: The Inside Story of Intrigue, Egomania, and Business Blunders. New York: Times Books, 1997.

Linzmayr, Owen W. Apple Confidential: The Real Story of Apple Computer, Inc. Berkeley, CA: No Starch, 1999.

Malone, Michael. Infinite Loop. New York: Doubleday, 1999.

Markoff, John. What the Dormouse Said: How the Sixties Counterculture Shaped the Personal Computer Industry. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Moritz, Michael. Return to the Little Kingdom: How Apple and Steve Jobs Changed the World. New York: Overlook, 2009.

Armory Show

Held at the 69th Regiment Armory in New York City from February 17 to March 15, 1913, the Armory Show art exhibition challenged and changed academic and popular attitudes toward art, artists, and artistic practice. It is recognized as a seminal moment in Western art history, signaling a radical departure from nineteenth-century traditions and tastes. Officially titled the International Exhibition of Modern Art, the Armory Show displayed about 1,250 paintings, sculptures, and decorative works by more than 300 European and American modern artists. The show was the first widespread American exposure to the European avant-garde, and as such, it was treated harshly in the contemporary press.

Modern art generally was panned by American critics of the time as being aesthetically repellent and lacking in technique. It was, indeed, a sharp turn from the artistic values esteemed since the Italian Renaissance. Exemplified by the most scathingly criticized work of the Armory Show, Marcel Duchamp's Nude Descending a Staircase, No. 2 (1912), modern art negated the most basic formulations and values of traditional, academic art in favor of growing interest in light, color, form, and material. It thereby deeply challenged the art establishment and its members, patrons, and critics.

Times were changing. Also in 1913, the renowned Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City purchased French impressionist painter Paul Cézanne's Hill of the Poor. This was one sign that modernism was slowly making its way into the art establishment. Many art critics, while hostile to the work on display at the armory, nevertheless admitted that the show represented a major breakthrough in the history of art.

One group of American artists, trained in the art academies of Europe and the United States, was responsible for bringing the Armory Show to New York. The show had been on display in France, Germany, Italy, and England. In 1911, in reaction to conventional restrictions of the National Academy of Design, a frustrated group of modern artists—among them Gutzon Borghlum, Arthur B. Davies, Robert Henri, and Walt Kuhn—had formed the American Association of Painters and Sculptors.

These artists' manifesto proclaimed an abandonment of obligation to realistic depiction, casting aside allegiance to academic ideals in favor of a newfound freedom. In their modern world, artistic vision was not restricted to ideal forms, noble subject matter, harmony, decorum, and nature, but turned instead to visual expression that engaged fully with contemporary life. It was in the spirit of protest and freedom that they organized the Armory Show of 1913.

Laura A. Macaluso

See also: Ashcan School; Luhan, Mabel Dodge.

Further Reading

Brown, Milton W. The Story of the Armory Show. New York: Joseph Hirshhorn Foundation, 1963.

Joachimides, Christos, and Norman Rosenthal, eds. American Art in the 20th Century: Painting and Sculpture 1913–1993. New York: Neues, 1993.

Ashcan School

The Ashcan School, also referred to as the New York Realists, was a group of artists active in New York City in the early twentieth century who painted scenes of unglamorous city life. Maligned by critics as the “revolutionary black gang” and “apostles of ugliness,” the members of the Ashcan School were interested in subject matter regarded as inappropriate for works of fine art: alleyways, tenements, slums, and the people who inhabited these gritty urban places.

In about 1907, six artists who had been members of a slightly earlier group called The Eight—Arthur B. Davies, William Glackens, Robert Henri, George Luks, Everett Shinn, and John Sloan—as well as George Wesley Bellows, Alfred Maurer, and Guy Pène DuBois, founded the Ashcan School. The name for the group of artists was originally a pejorative label.

Both The Eight and the Ashcan School converged around artist and teacher Henri and his circle of students and peers, a diverse group of painters opposed to academic or traditional art. Henri was an influential teacher and an admirer of the American realism of Thomas Eakins.

Members of the Ashcan School had been frustrated by the restrictive procedures for displaying art at academic exhibitions. Rebelling against the status quo, the group organized a history-making exhibition in New York in 1908 that announced a decisive break with tradition. This was the first exhibit organized and selected by a group of American artists without a jury or prizes. Their rebellion against the academy led several of the artists to play key roles in what would be one of the most famous exhibits in the history of modern art, the Armory Show of 1913.

If conservative in style, Ashcan School paintings were revolutionary in content. Departing from the elite portraiture and genteel landscapes of the nineteenth century, the artists focused on urban scenes, particularly those exposing the shabbier aspects of city life. The intent of the Ashcan School was not eye-opening social commentary but rather the representation of urban life, with all parts intact. In this way, the Ashcan School was part of larger Progressive Era concerns about the social problems created by industrialization, immigration, and urbanization.

The titles of Ashcan School paintings signify the spontaneous moments of everyday life they were depicting, such as Robert Henri's The Laundress, George Luks's The Boxing Match, and George Wesley Bellows's Steaming Streets. In tandem with the departure in subject matter, Ashcan School paintings were characterized by a loose and spontaneous brush style, in opposition to the polished style taught in American art academies of the period. The fast handling of thick oil paint, which left individual brushstrokes visible to the naked eye, was another Ashcan School characteristic scorned by the critics. The painters often employed a dark, subdued palette in their work, a direct result of Henri's European education and travels, during which he studied the Dutch masters, such as Franz Hals, and the Spanish painters Francisco de Goya and Diego Velazquez.

The spirit of the Ashcan School was carried on by the mainstream realist and antimodernist style of American scene painting of the 1920s and 1930s, as in the work of such artists as Edward Hopper.

See also: Armory Show: Sloan, John.

Further Reading

Perlman, Bennard B. Painters of the Ashcan School: The Immortal Eight. New York: Dover, 1979.

Zurier, Rebecca. Picturing the City: Urban Vision and the Ashcan School. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.

Asian Pride

The term Asian Pride refers to calls for pan-Asian solidarity. Internationally, the idea of Asian Pride has taken a variety of forms, from the “Asia for Asiatics” slogans of the Japanese military in World War II to twenty-first-century radical movements against globalization and Western corporations. In the United States, the concept emerged out of the Asian American movement of the 1960s and a feeling of isolation experienced by Asian Americans in a culture in which racial politics were dominated by the black/white dichotomy and the larger civil rights movement.

The combination of the postwar baby boom and the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965—which abolished the restrictions on numbers of incoming immigrants that had been in place since the Immigration Act of 1924—led to a sharp increase in the size of the Asian American population. The 1965 act created a series of occupational and family preferences that made mass immigration from Asia legal for the first time since the late nineteenth century.

Early waves of highly educated and very motivated immigrants from Asia experienced visible success entering the American middle class and sending their children to college, giving birth to the concept of Asian Americans as a “model minority.” Though nominally a compliment, the moniker ignored the fact that different segments of the Asian American population experienced different rates of success and pitted Asians against so-called less desirable ethnic groups and races in the United States, notably Latinos and African Americans. Though still a very small proportion of the U.S. population, Asian Americans reacted to both stereotyping and racism with calls for unity and political activism.

Inspired by rising counterculture and anti-Vietnam War movements in American cities and by the Cultural Revolution taking place in the late 1960s in the People’s Republic of China, Asian youth in the United States joined marches calling for civil rights, racial pride, and the creation of Asian American studies programs in U.S. universities. Some groups called for “Yellow Power,” a clear reference to the contemporary Black Power phenomenon and its calls for racial pride among African Americans. Others joined pan-Asian organizations such as the Asian American Political Alliance or Asian Americans for Action, which advocated social change and equality or protested U.S. policies in Asia, including the war in Vietnam.

As students adopted some of the more popular outward signs of radicalism, such as long hair or disregard for authority, they clashed with community elders who deemed such appearances and attitudes decidedly “un-Asian.” While some campaigned for revolution along the lines of Chairman Mao’s China, others took a more reform-minded approach to the community, and set up social service organizations or ran for elected office.

In 1968 and 1969, Asian Americans participated in “Third World” strikes at San Francisco State College and the University of California, Berkeley. Joined by students of other ethnic and racial heritage, the strikers called for the elimination of racism and the establishment of ethnic studies programs for the groups taking part in the movement. In the late 1960s, many West Coast universities with high rates of Asian attendance responded by setting up Asian American studies programs. Early programs had a decidedly radical bent, but as American university education moved toward a diversity curriculum for all students in the 1980s, these programs found new life.

As the Asian American population in the United States has grown and diversified, the challenges of maintaining a united movement have intensified. The extreme religious, cultural, ethnic, and linguistic diversity among the cultures and countries that fall under the general heading of “Asian” mean that there are few traditions that all Asian Americans share. Moreover, although their numbers are increasing, Asian Americans continue to represent only a very small proportion of the total population of the United States, and the lack of nationally recognizable leaders associated with Asian Pride or the Asian American movement means that few outside of the community are aware of its history.

Today, the Asian Pride concept is vocalized most often by Asian American youth, often born of immigrant parents and growing up torn between two cultures. The phrase is sometimes spelled “AZN Pride” and represents an appreciation of a specific East-West hybrid culture and the shared challenges of American youth with cultural roots in Asia.

Meredith Leigh Oyen

See also: Black Power Movement.

Further Reading

Chan, Sucheng. Asian Americans: An Interpretive History. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Han, Arar, and John Hsu, eds. Asian American X: An Intersection of Twenty-First-Century Asian American Voices. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2004.

Ling, Huping, and Allan Austin. Asian American History and Culture: An Encyclopedia. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, 2010.

Wei, William. The Asian American Movement. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1993.

Astrology

Astrology in the Western tradition is the interpretation of the positions of planets, asteroids, and other astronomical bodies through the twelve signs of the zodiac—Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, Libra, Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricorn, Aquarius, and Pisces—and the twelve houses, which represent different spheres of life. A system of “aspects”—including conjunction, trine, square, sextile, and opposition—is used to describe the relationship of the sun, moon, and planets to each other and to key points on the horoscope chart, especially the ascendant, descendant, and mid-heaven. The uses of astrological interpretation vary from descriptive, as in characterizing one’s personality based on the position of heavenly bodies at birth, to predictive, as in forecasting future events.

History

Astrology was widely practiced as both a magical art and a science (astrologers also were astronomers) in medieval times in Europe and the Middle East, both at royal courts and as a popular entertainment for commoners. In Europe, the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century, a movement to purge the church of abuse and false doctrine, forced astrology underground.

In the British North American colonies, astrology was very much outside of mainstream Puritan culture in the seventeenth century. A community of astrologers in Germantown, Pennsylvania, during the 1690s called itself the Chapter of Perfection; these astrologers also were interested in Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism (an esoteric movement whose adherents emphasized principles of the occult, mysticism, and spiritual enlightenment).

Farmers' almanacs of the early eighteenth century contained extensive astrological information; etchings and engravings provide further evidence of the practice of astrology in colonial America. In the 1770s, the War of Independence often was depicted allegorically through astrological motifs, with America depicted as Cancer, the Crab, standing victorious.

The most influential figures in eighteenth-century American astrology were Ebenezer Sibley, a Freemason, who created the most famous astrological chart of the American Revolution, and John Varley, a painter and astrologer who was influential for his horoscopes of the newly discovered planet Uranus. In the context of Enlightenment thought in both Europe and America, however, the practice of astrology remained outside the intellectual mainstream.

The nineteenth century was a time of revival. The year 1816 brought the publication of James Wilson's A Complete Dictionary of Astrology, the first published book with instructions on casting a horoscope. One of the most famous astrologers of the century in the United States was Luke Broughton, who published a number of influential texts in the 1860s and taught thousands of Americans how to construct a horoscope chart.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, astrology became closely entwined with other esoteric movements, especially Theosophy, which emphasized reincarnation and karma. The Primer of Astrology and American Urania, published in the 1890s by William Henry Chaney, a student of Broughton, was one of the most influential American astrology texts at the turn of the twentieth century.

One of the chief occupations of many popular astrologers in the nineteenth century was to create and interpret the horoscope charts of famous world leaders, such as the French general and emperor Napoleon Bonaparte and U.S. President Abraham Lincoln. Identifying the exact place and time of a leader's birth, it was believed, would reveal the potential for genius and predict triumph or failure. Itinerant, charlatan astrologers focused on creating horoscope charts for common people, often women. These horoscopes would focus on prospects for love, marriage, wealth, and money, the same subjects focused on in popular astrological texts today.

Few women practiced the "science" of astrology until Evangeline Adams, a charismatic astrologer practicing in New York in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, brought it to the attention of the American public through her books, consulting business, and radio show. Reaching the height of her popularity in about 1930, Adams had thousands of listeners and a number of celebrity clients. She was said to have predicted New York's Windsor Hotel fire of 1899 and the stock market crash of 1929. Despite her popularity, Adams was arrested several times for practicing astrology, which was illegal in New York State.

Adams's success coincided with two major events in the history of popular astronomy that took place in 1930: the opening of the Adler Planetarium, America's first planetarium, in Chicago, and the discovery of the planet Pluto. In the 1930s, spectacular discoveries in astronomy, astrophysics, and planetaria provided the public with a hobby and with entertainment related to the stars that was sanctioned by the scientific community, widening the gulf between those who were skeptical of astrology and believers.

Modern Astrology

Astrology fell off in popularity during World War II and amid the conformism of the 1950s, but it underwent a resurgence in the 1960s and 1970s with the rise of the counterculture and New Age movements. Its reentry into the popular consciousness was evidenced by the hit song of the Fifth Dimension in 1969, “Aquarius/Let the Sun Shine In.” Still, the foremost astrologers of the day, including Llewellyn George, Linda Goodman, Robert Hand, Isabel Hickey, Derek and Julia Parker, and Sydney Omarr remained anonymous with the general public, rising to stardom only among members of a small subculture.

Astrology was a definite subculture of the 1960s—an occult practice that individuals, often women, practiced, although it was still very much an underground pastime. By the 1970s, books such as Linda Goodman’s Sun Signs (1968) and Robin MacNaughton’s Sun Sign Personality Guide (1977) began to appear. MacNaughton’s text was a groundbreaking mass-market book whose popularity itself marked the rise of modern everyday astrology. It was about this time that horoscopes began appearing as a regular feature in America’s newspapers and popular magazines.

The trend toward cultural diversity in America extended to the field of astrology in the last quarter of the twentieth century, as Chinese, Vedic, American Indian, and Celtic systems of astrology all gained in popularity. Astrology texts marketed to marginalized groups, especially feminists, African Americans, gays and lesbians, and the Wiccan community, became popular among those subcultures.

Astrologers began to reach out to academics in other disciplines, especially history, cultural studies, and psychology, with texts increasingly informed by scholarship in these fields. Isabel Hickey’s Pluto or Minerva: The Choice is Yours (1973) and Astrology: A Cosmic Science (1974) were heavily influenced by Jungian psychology. In addition, a number of scholarly histories of astrology, such as Derek and Julia Parker’s History of Astrology (1983), were written by practicing astrologers.

In the 1990s, astrology became a key component of the millenarianism movement. Some astrologers believed that the person who would usher in the Second Coming anticipated in the Christian religion was born with Pluto in Libra during the years from 1972 to 1984.

In the twenty-first century, astrology became a tool of conspiracy theorists, following the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon of September 11, 2001. The horoscope chart for the United States (cast for July 4, 1776) was compared with the charts of President George W. Bush and other government officials and with the positions of astronomical bodies on September 11, 2001.

The Internet has proven a boon not only to conspiracy theorists, but also to the do-it-yourself astrologer, with sites such as the Swiss-based Astrodienst (www.astro.com) providing free software to cast customized horoscopes and chart interpretations. In addition to Web sites for serious astrologers, there has been an explosion in popular sites catering primarily to women and offering rudimentary horoscope interpretations, along with magazine-inspired features such as quizzes.

Despite the strong ties between astrology and New Age countercultural groups, ubiquitous forms of astrology such as newspaper horoscope columns, horoscopes for housecats, popular Web sites, and online astrology readings have become decidedly mainstream in American culture. Millions of Americans now turn to horoscopes for insights into their own personalities and for predictions and advice about love, career, money, and health. Thus, the divide between mainstream and esoteric astrology, between the horoscopes read in periodicals and those cast and utilized by “true believers,” continues to widen.

Amanda Grace Tigner

See also: New Age.

Further Reading

Christo, Karen. Foreseeing the Future: Evangeline Adams and Astrology in America. Amherst, MA: One Reed, 2002.

Hickey, Isabel M. Astrology: A Cosmic Science. Sebastopol, CA: CRCS, 1992.

Parker, Derek, and Julia Parker. The New Compleat Astrologer. New York: Cresent, 1971.

Tester, Jim. A History of Western Astrology. New York: Ballantine, 1987.

Atheism

Definitions of atheism have varied over time as the definition of God has grown more complex. In simplest terms, an atheist is someone without God, or someone who does not believe in, or denies the existence of, God or any other spiritual entity. Closely allied are agnostics—from the Greek meaning “without knowledge”—or those who insist that any proof of God’s existence is beyond human knowledge.

Atheism has never been as widespread in the United States as it has been in most other modern nations. Estimates vary, but less than 5 percent of the population professes not to believe in a god. The majority of these people are agnostics.

Several reasons have been cited for this. Some ascribe it to the fact the United States has never had an established church against which people have had to rebel in order to bring about social and political reform, as in France and Russia, for example. Others argue that the separation of church and state in America has resulted in a kind of competitive free market for churches, denominations, practices, and theological thinking, in which religion as a whole has flourished. Still others suggest that belief in God has become so central to the American identity that to deny God’s existence is un-American.

Atheism as a Pejorative

For most of American history, the term atheist has seldom referred to a person’s general disbelief in God. Instead, much as Socrates was condemned for being an atheist because he questioned the Greek gods, or early Christians were persecuted for refusing to worship Roman deities, Americans have been condemned chiefly for not believing in the Christian God, and especially the God of a Protestant church. The word was used as a pejorative for differing, or dissident, religious beliefs rather than a denial of God’s existence.

In the 1620s, Plymouth Plantation Governor William Bradford condemned fellow Englishman Thomas Morton for his “licentiousness,” “dissolute life, and “profaneness,” and charged him with maintaining “a school of atheism.” Morton was a Christian, albeit too liberal a Christian for the Puritan Pilgrim Bradford; he also incurred Bradford’s anger for praising some elements of Native American culture as being superior to those of the Puritans. Half a century later, Massachusetts settler Mary Rowlandson, who was captured by Native Americans during King Philip’s War (1675–1676) and kept as their prisoner, condemned her captors as “atheistical, proud, wild, cruel, [and] barbarous.”

A more widespread fear of atheism, of which Henry More’s An Antidote Against Atheisme (1652) was a seminal document, arose in England in the seventeenth century. That fear did not spread to British America for another century, but when it did, as in England, the chief threat was perceived to be a new way of thinking called deism and branded “atheistical.” A product of the Enlightenment, deism challenges the long-held view that God plays a direct and immanent role in the lives of individuals and the conduct of society; instead, it maintains, God creates natural laws by which the world is governed. Deists did not deny the existence of God but were critical of revealed religion, especially its more miraculous or supernatural elements. Among deism’s most influential European adherents were the writers and philosophers Denis Diderot, Thomas Hobbes, David Hume, and Voltaire.

Several of the American founders harbored deistic sentiments, among them Benjamin Franklin and John Adams. American Revolutionary War hero Ethan Allen drew criticism for his deist tract, Reason, The Oracle of Man (1785). Even Thomas Jefferson was charged with being an atheist for his deistic tendencies. But the early American most savagely attacked was patriot Thomas Paine, for his book The Age of Reason (1797). Even a century later, President Theodore Roosevelt referred to Paine, author of the influential Revolutionary tracts Common Sense and The Crisis, as a “filthy little atheist.”

Golden Age of American Free Thought

The world of Theodore Roosevelt was quite different from that of Thomas Paine. Historians such as James Turner have argued that for Americans of Paine’s day, the idea of not believing in God was not only rare, but “a bizarre aberration”; to give up belief in God, it was widely agreed, one had “to abandon not merely the best but the only really coherent scientific explanation of the world.” By Roosevelt’s day, however, disbelief had become a plausible alternative to the still dominant theism. What had intervened was the undermining of the principal proofs of God’s existence that had dominated Western thought for centuries—proof based on a literal reading of the Bible.

In the face of scientific evidence to the contrary, some abandoned Christianity altogether for atheism and agnosticism, a term coined by Thomas Huxley in 1869. Most, however, retained their faith in God and revealed religion. Indeed, there was a resurgence of Christianity, albeit in new or at least different forms. Church membership rose dramatically, and new theologies were developed to meet the crisis of challenges to the old beliefs. Nevertheless, the counterculture of disbelief held firm.

Atheists and agnostics advanced their cause through organizations such as the Free Religious Association and the American Secular Union, as well as periodicals such as the Truth Seeker. Perhaps their greatest asset in the nineteenth century was “Great Agnostic” or “Pagan Prophet” Robert Ingersoll. As the historian Susan Jacoby has written in Freethinkers: A History of American Secularism (2004), “Without him, the golden age of American freethought is as difficult to imagine as abolitionism without Garrison or the first wave of feminism without Stanton.” Ingersoll’s public lectures, especially “Why I Am an Atheist,” delivered during the 1870s and 1880s, were well attended and highly regarded. As he also maintained an impeccable public persona and a respected place among the nation’s attorneys and Republican Party leaders, he added respectability to the cause.

Modern America

The event that most directly impacted atheism in twentieth-century America was the Russian Revolution. In brief, the Soviet leadership’s attack not only on capitalism, but also on religion, provoked the first assault on godless communism in America—the first Red Scare, from 1917 to 1920. The targets of the campaign were homegrown socialists and radical labor leaders, many of whom were jailed, as well as a number of immigrants who publicly espoused those causes and were deported. Nevertheless, atheists and agnostics continued to defend, and even advance, the separation of church and state.

In 1925, nonbelievers organized the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, the most explicitly antireligious movement in America to date. In 1928, nonbelievers organized the Humanist Fellowship (it became the American Humanist Association in 1941), which espoused “nontheistic humanism.” And a prominent group of humanists, led by philosopher and educator John Dewey, published The Humanist Manifesto in 1933 (with a second manifesto in 1973).

But the most public articulation of religious nonbelief came in the highly publicized Scopes “Monkey Trial” of 1925 in Dayton, Tennessee, pitting the evangelical political figure William Jennings Bryan—a three-time presidential candidate and a former secretary of state—against the high-profile agnostic defense lawyer Clarence Darrow. The case settled nothing. John Scopes was convicted of violating a Tennessee law that made it illegal to teach evolution in school, but the verdict was reversed by the state supreme court on a technicality. Bryan was publicly humiliated when he took the stand to testify on the meaning of the Bible, but to his followers, Bryan’s death soon after the trial made him a martyr to the cause. Rather than being the last gasp of anti-evolutionism, as some saw the Scopes trial, it became only round one of the debate between evolution and creationism.

The period from the end of World War II to the 1960s was a study in contrasts, as public religion reached its high mark in America and secularists made their greatest gains in maintaining, even advancing, the separation of church and state. The result was the seemingly improbable reenergizing of both evangelical religion and secular civil libertarianism. On the one hand, the cold war rekindled and stoked to new heights the fear of godless communism, bringing a new revival of religion as well. Public expressions of faith included the addition of “under God” to the Pledge of Allegiance in 1954 and the adoption of “In God We Trust” as the nation’s motto in 1956.

At the same time, a series of U.S. Supreme Court cases, beginning with Everson v. Board of Education (1947), advanced the cause of divorcing government from religion, especially in public schools. Justice Hugo Black set the tone for these decisions by declaring in Everson, “The First Amendment has erected a wall between church and state. That wall must be kept high and impregnable.”

The seeming incongruence of secularist success at a time of rampant religiosity can be explained to a large extent by the establishment of a new secularist-liberal alliance, whereby secularists gained the support of religious liberals for causes upon which both could agree in exchange for secularist willingness not to attack religion per se. The most notable exception to this unwritten rule was the outspoken atheist Madalyn Murray O’Hair.

O’Hair was both the product of the separationist movement of the 1940s and 1950s and the leading figure of the counterculture movement of the 1960s to attack religion and advance the cause of atheism. She became the first prominent American to publicly proclaim herself an atheist, whereupon Life magazine in 1964 labeled her “the most hated woman in America.” O’Hair is best known today as the person whose Supreme Court case, Murray v. Curlett (1963), made teacher-led Bible reading and recitation of the Lord’s Prayer in public schools unconstitutional. But for the next thirty years and more—on television and radio, in the press and through her many books, as well as in hundreds of public appearances—O’Hair led a public crusade on behalf of American Atheists (her organization) against a long list of what she perceived as violations of the separation of church and state. Among these were the use of the phrases “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance, the printing of “In God We Trust” on U.S. currency, and the tax-exempt status of religious organizations.

Atheist Madalyn Murray (later O’Hair) shares a moment with her sons after winning a 1963 U.S. Supreme Court case in which mandatory prayer and Bible readings in public school were declared unconstitutional. (Library of Congress)

With O'Hair's murder in 1995, American atheism lost its most prominent figure. Her organization would continue to survive, but without O'Hair it lost visibility. Other groups, such as the Freedom from Religion Foundation, and individuals such as Michael Newdow, who also campaigned to have "under God" stricken from the Pledge of Allegiance, have kept the fires of atheism alive.

Any significant resurgence of atheism in contemporary America, however, has been hampered by the response to the events of September 11, 2001, and the heightened religiosity, or at least public expressions of faith, that have followed. Some believe that atheism in America is yet to have its day, but they are in the minority, by far. As even O'Hair was forced to admit near the end of her career: "I don't think atheism has a chance in the future.... [The] window of opportunity for nonreligion has closed, not only in the United States but perhaps in the world."

Bryan F. Le Beau

Further Reading

Cramer, C.H. Royal Bob: The Life of Robert G. Ingersoll. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1952.

Jacoby, Susan. Freethinkers: A History of American Secularism. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2004.

Le Beau, Bryan F. The Atheist: Madalyn Murray O'Hair. New York: New York University Press, 2003.

McGrath, Alister. The Twilight of Atheism: The Rise and Fall of Disbelief in the Modern World. New York: Doubleday, 2004.

Rinaldo, Peter. Atheists, Agnostics, and Deists in America: A Brief History. Briarcliff Manor, NY: DorPete, 2000.

Turner, James. Without God, Without Creed: The Origins of Unbelief in America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1985.

Aurora Commune

The Aurora Commune was one of two socialistic communes established by German immigrant William Keil, who sought to create a utopian existence with his followers. It operated from 1856 to 1881 in Marion County, Oregon. Aurora was a late entry in a series of communes established in antebellum America as part of a movement to perfect human beings and human society, along lines laid out in Christian Scripture and, in some cases, socialist writings.

Keil, a short, stocky, gray-bearded man, was a mystic healer and self-proclaimed physician. He was referred to as Dr. Keil, although he lacked formal medical education. Once a follower of the Methodist faith, Keil had come to believe that the correct way to abide by God's law involved full participation in a communal society in which all members contributed to the welfare of the group. In 1844, he founded the Bethel Commune in Missouri, but he left that community to start a colony of believers in the western United States, where he believed there was greater potential for expansion. Keil and several families relocated to a remote forest area in Oregon where he established Aurora. The communards were primarily German immigrants. People outside the commune often referred to it as "Dutchtown."

Like the earlier commune at Bethel, Aurora was founded on newly settled territory. The size of the property was significant—almost 18,000 acres (7,284 hectares)—and the commune, significantly larger than its predecessor, had 300 to 400 members at various times. Keil functioned as the society's religious leader, as well as its physician and civic authority. The governing structure at Aurora was based on the family model, in which each family in the community possessed a separate residence. The economic system was communist in spirit. All property was maintained in common, and all funds derived from labor were placed in a general treasury and evenly distributed among members. Children were expected to follow the teachings of their parents and Dr. Keil. In addition to religious instruction, the youngsters were given free education in rudimentary subjects by tutors from the commune.

There was a well-defined division of labor. Communards labored at sawing logs, blacksmithing, clothing manufacture, carpentry, and other jobs. Aurora also produced vegetables and fruits in large gardens and boasted some of the finest orchards in the area. The goods that were not consumed normally were sold, mostly to neighboring farmers.

In 1872, Keil, who owned the entire property, divided the land among the communards. He died of heart failure in 1877, and the members began to disperse over the next few years. Aurora officially dissolved in 1881, one year after the dissolution of Keil's Bethel Commune.

Leonard A. Steverson

See also: Communes.

Further Reading

Hinds, William A. American Communities and Co-operative Colonies. 2nd ed. Philadelphia: Porcupine, 1959.

Nordhoff, Charles. The Communistic Societies of the United States. New York: Hillary House, 1960.

Austin, Texas

Set in the Texas hill country along the banks of the Colorado River, the capital city of the Lone Star State has been a crossroads for unexpected musical combinations since the 1920s, when jazz and blues players crossed paths in its African American neighborhoods.

Bluegrass and swing met in Austin's dance halls over the following decades. Then, in the early 1970s, the intersection of rock and country gave Austin its unique signature in American popular culture. The blend of singer-songwriter, Western swing, psychedelic rock, two-step, blues, and Latin rhythms created a unique sound. It appealed to both rock and country listeners at a time when rock was losing its lyrical edge and mainstream country music was relying on the polished, orchestrated arrangements known as the Nashville sound.

The Austin sound was something quite different, a rough-edged music with an uninhibited willingness to experiment with new sounds and different lyrics. Guy Clark, Steve Fromholz, Willie Nelson, Townes Van Zandt, and Jerry Jeff Walker personified the song-slinger-with-guitar who attracted listeners—as likely to be old cowboys as young hippies—to such city venues as the Armadillo World Headquarters, the Broken Spoke, the Cactus Cafe, and the Soap Creek Saloon. Doug Sahm, whose music fused elements of rock, blues, and country, called the city “Groover's Paradise.” Songwriter Michael Martin Murphey nicknamed its musical inhabitants “cosmic cowboys.”

In 1975, Austin style and music became more widely known with the premiere of Austin City Limits, a live concert program recorded in the studios of the local public television station and distributed nationally by the Public Broadcasting Service (PBS). At first intended to showcase Texas music (Nelson taped the pilot show), it soon grew to include many flavors of original American music. It is now the longest-running live music program in the United States. It still features performances by Texas artists such as Ruthie Foster and Alejandro Escovedo, along with such international stars as B.B. King, Rosanne Cash, and Bonnie Raitt. Austin now bills itself as the live music capital of the world.

The city remains a magnet for rising musicians as well, now as likely to be alternative country or punk rock bands as country songwriters and folk singers. Over the years, it has been home to or a launching pad for the careers of such diverse artists as country songstress Nanci Griffith, Americana songwriter and singer Kelly Willis, the alternative rock band Los Lonely Boys, folk singer Caroline Herring, bluegrass maverick Peter Rowan, progressive bluegrassers the Two High String Band, and Mexican American singer-songwriter Tish Hinojosa, each of whom has found success outside the mainstream music business.

Those hippies and cowboys in the 1970s audiences got to talking at a time when politics and lifestyles kept their counterparts in other parts of the country disconnected. Thus began a confluence of laid-back ambiance and mutual acceptance that continues in the city. In addition to having a lively music scene, and perhaps because of it, Austin remains a politically liberal bastion in a very conservative state.

Kerry Dexter

See also: Folk Music.

Further Reading

Davis, John T. Austin City Limits: Twenty-Five Years of American Music. New York: Billboard, 2000.

Reid, Jan. The Improbable Rise of Redneck Rock. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2004.

Baby Boomers

Between the years of 1945 and 1964, 76 million babies were born in the United States. This unprecedented demographic phenomenon came to be dubbed the “baby boom,” and the cohort “baby boomers.”

From the beginning, baby boomers have been a most fortunate population. They grew up in a period of post–World War II prosperity; they are the healthiest generation on record; they were socialized by parents who followed the child-centered guidance of Dr. Benjamin Spock, whose best seller, Baby and Child Care (1946), fostered permissiveness and treated transgressions indulgently; and new schools were built for them, and they entered college in record numbers. Baby boomers also were the first group to be raised on television, which fostered a sense of generational identity: They watched the same shows, listened to the same news, and laughed at the same jokes.

Ingrained in the Counterculture

The first baby boomers began to move into the workforce in the early to mid-1960s. A majority of white boomers had been raised in suburbia, their parents pursuing the American Dream. For many, the civil rights movement opened their eyes to the facts that African Americans were not welcome to pursue the same dream and that individuals in positions of authority were not always trustworthy.

By 1964, boomer alienation and anger were further aroused by the escalation of the Vietnam War. The brutal realities of the war were a nightly feature on television, and opposition to the conflict continued to mount. Those of draft age were primarily baby boomers. What ensued was a profound loss of faith in the leadership of the adult generation, seen as a web of lies and deceptions about a war that few could justify.

For radical groups, such as the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), Vietnam was an example of a U.S. policy of racism and imperialism, and they called for nothing less than revolution. The civil rights movement turned militant, as organizations like the Black Panthers espoused Black Power—a movement that sought to redress years of social, political, economic, and cultural oppression and victimization of African Americans by the dominant white society.

Opposition to the Vietnam War proved to be a political rallying point for the student movement and the counterculture. It exerted a major influence on the American political scene and led to dramatic events, such as President Lyndon B. Johnson refusing to seek reelection in 1968, violent demonstrations at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago that summer, and the Watergate scandal, which led to the resignation of President Richard M. Nixon in August 1974.

The radical questioning of authority evident in the civil rights and student movements also gave rise to the hippie movement, the country's largest and most flamboyant counterculture. Hippies defined themselves in opposition to the dominant "straight" world, and their dominant catchphrase was "Make love not war." As epitomized by the Summer of Love in and around San Francisco in 1967 and by the Woodstock Music and Art Fair in Bethel, New York, two summers later, hippies espoused nudity, free love, and the use of mind-expanding drugs as the path to enlightenment.

The hippie subculture had its own rituals, music, poetry, and literature, as well as a fascination with New Age spiritual practices, such as astrology and paganism. Some hippies opted out of mainstream society completely, moving to rural areas and living in communes in an attempt to transcend materialistic values. The theme of the counterculture was a libertarian one of self-exploration and personal authenticity, in contrast to what they regarded as social conformity or conventional respectability. A zealously nonjudgmental attitude prevailed, a rule of "Do your own thing."

The imperatives of personal authenticity and self-discovery were reinforced by the women's movement, which urged women to reject traditional social-role limitations. Women were encouraged to raise their consciousness, rethink their self-identities, and discard preconceptions about women's capacities and autonomy. The message was given a powerful impetus by the availability of the birth control pill after 1960, which allowed women to assert greater control over their sexuality.

Homosexuals and lesbians, aggrieved by the stigma that surrounded their lifestyle, began their fight for gay liberation. Together, the black, women's, and gay liberation movements began to change the face of American society. Traditional gender roles, the structure of the family, and the values handed down by their parents' generation were all called into question.

Overall, the baby boom counterculture sought to repair the bad, reject the unacceptable, and embrace the new and different. A love of the environment and a desire to protect it became a movement in its own right, and brotherhood among all people became a core principle and oft-repeated song refrain. The counterculture burned itself out in less than a decade, but it left a legacy in the enduring baby boom motto: "Question authority!"

Legacy

The broader picture of the baby boom generation goes beyond the clichés of the counterculture. On the one hand, baby boomers were raised in an era of unprecedented affluence and national omnipotence. On the other hand, they came of age in a time that recognized more limited resources and diminished American power.

In various ways, it has been observed, this combination of disparate cultural forces has led the boomer generation to indulge in an ongoing quest for personal satisfaction and the finer things—sometimes criticized as sheer narcissism and greed. As a generation, the boomers have always seemed to want it all: cheap energy, consumer plenty, low taxes, governmental entitlements, ageless beauty, and an ever-rising standard of living.

On the other hand, many of the older boomers were involved in the civil rights movement and in protests against the war in Vietnam. They later extended the call for social transformation into other areas of their lives. In enforcing a new liberalization of sex and romance, they insisted on everyone's right to satisfaction and self-realization. This meant liberalizing not only married couples, but also unmarried partners, no matter their sexual orientation.

It has been no small source of discussion among historians as to how the boomer generation—born into national wealth and power, raised on the promise of limitless potential and self-worth, reared on television and advertising, and enthralled by the wonders of modern technology, science, and medicine—will inform and guide upcoming generations.

Leslie Rabkin

See also: Black Panthers: Black Power Movement: Spock, Benjamin: Students for a Democratic Society.

Further Reading

Hilt, Michael L., and Jeremy H. Lipschultz. Mass Media, An Aging Population and the Baby Boomers. New York: Lawrence Erlbaum, 2005.

Jones, Landon Y. Great Expectations: America and the Baby Boom Generation. New York: Ballantine, 1986.

Steinhorn, Leonard. The Great Generation: In Defense of the Baby Boom Legacy. New York: Thomas Dunne, 2006.

Backus, Isaac (1724–1806)

Isaac Backus was a prominent New England Baptist minister, a champion of religious liberty in the fledgling United States, and a delegate to the First Continental Congress. One of the most widely known evangelical orators in eighteenth-century America, he preached devoutness of faith and, at the same time, advocated religious freedom and the separation of church and state in the new republic.

He was born near Norwich, Connecticut, on January 9, 1724, to parents of the political and social elite. The little historians know of his early years shows the heavy influence of his mother, especially after the death of his father in 1740. The following year, when the Great Awakening religious revival made its way to Norwich, Backus's mother had a conversion experience. Soon thereafter, Isaac and two of his brothers went through similar rebirth experiences. Joining the ranks of "New Light" converts, Backus also followed his mother in joining the Bean Hill Separate Church. He decided, as well, that he had been called to spread the gospel and did so as an itinerant preacher in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts.

Backus settled in Titicut, Massachusetts, in 1747, and lived there for the rest of his life. He was ordained in 1748 and married Susanna Mason the following year. Backus and his wife came to support the requirement of full-immersion baptism. In 1756, he founded the Middleborough Baptist Church, of which he remained the pastor for the next fifty years, until his death.

During the 1750s, Backus increasingly relied on his pen to support his causes. He published A Discourse Showing the Nature and Necessity of an Internal Call to Preach the Everlasting Gospel (1754) and A Short Description of the Difference Between the Bondwoman and the Free (1756), in which he opposed infant baptism. He also began work on A History of the New England with Particular Reference to the Denomination of Christians Called Baptists, which would eventually be published in three volumes (1777–1796) and is still widely consulted by historians.

Backus published numerous pamphlets throughout his career, as well as frequent polemic in the newspapers of early America. Perhaps his best-remembered publication is An Appeal to the Public for Religious Liberty (1773), in which he argued not only for the separation of church and state but also for civil disobedience in support of that principle. Among contemporaries, however, his Government and Liberty Described (1778), in which he spoke out against state-supported churches, may have had greater impact.

Politically, Backus supported the American Revolution, opposed the uprising of Massachusetts farmers in Shays's Rebellion of 1786, and backed the U.S. Constitution of 1787. He played an influential role during Philadelphia's First Continental Congress in 1774, when he joined other Massachusetts Baptists in lobbying the state delegations for a guarantee of absolute religious liberty. Backus backed Thomas Jefferson based on the common ground they shared in their support of the principle of deism.

He also was a founder of the College of Rhode Island (later Brown University), the first Baptist institution of higher learning in America, in 1764. Isaac Backus died in Massachusetts on November 20, 1806.

Mark G. Spencer

Further Reading

Dun, Elizabeth E. "Backus, Isaac." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

McLoughlin, William G., ed. The Diary of Isaac Backus. 3 vols. Providence, RI: Brown University Press, 1979.

McLoughlin, William G., ed. Isaac Backus and the American Pietistic Tradition. Boston: Little, Brown, 1967.

McLoughlin, William G., ed. Isaac Backus on Church, State, and Calvinism: Pamphlets, 1754–1789. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1968.

Baez, Joan (1941–)

Folksinger, songwriter, and guitarist Joan Chandos Baez has recorded albums across five decades. She is widely known for her distinctive soprano voice and haunting vibrato, musical tastes ranging from centuries-old British folk ballads to tunes by contemporaries Bob Dylan and Phil Ochs, and an outspoken commitment to left-of-center political causes.

Born on January 9, 1941, on Staten Island in New York City, Baez came to the attention of Vanguard Records as a teenager, when she sang several tunes as a guest of Bob Gibson at the Newport Folk Festival in Rhode Island in 1959. This gathering of traditional, new folk, and topical singers was fertile ground for what would become the folk music revival of the 1960s. It also sowed the seeds for Americana and contemporary folk strains of the twenty-first century.

Baez's first recording, a self-titled disc on Vanguard in 1960, offers distinctive interpretations of Appalachian ballads, spare arrangements of British folk songs, and a dramatic Mexican story of defying authority even in the face of death, "El Preso Numero Nueve." The album captured widespread attention upon its release and is now considered a folk classic.

As a Hispanic, Baez often felt like an outcast in the various American communities where she grew up. Her father, who had immigrated to the United States from Mexico as a child, was a well-known physicist who took teaching jobs at several universities. As an adult, Joan transformed her experience of childhood alienation into compassion for others who felt the sting of discrimination. In addition to giving concerts and donating money, she put her income and physical safety on the line to support racial integration during the 1960s. She refused to perform before segregated audiences. Taking an even more personal stance, she walked black children to school alongside Martin Luther King, Jr., in Mississippi.

Baez was also outspoken in her opposition to the Vietnam War and the military draft, commitments that arose from her immersion in the principles of nonviolence. For a time, she refused to pay a portion of her taxes in protest against the war. She participated in frequent protest marches and gatherings, for which she was sometimes jailed. Baez made her political points from the stage as well as outside the concert hall, which angered some who felt she should not mix her politics with her art. Although she became a lightning rod for criticism (cartoonist Al Capp satirized her in his nationally distributed L'il Abner comic strip with a character named Joanie Phonie), Baez was also widely regarded as a voice of conscience for her generation. During the 1970s, she cut back on live performances to focus on recording and working for political causes. She returned to the stage in 1985 to open the Live Aid benefit concert.

Folk musician and activist Joan Baez sings out against the Vietnam War and the Selective Service draft at a rally in New York's Central Park in 1968. Baez was a mainstay of the political and social counterculture of the 1960s and beyond. (Bernard Gotfryd/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Among the songs with which she is most associated are “Joe Hill” and “We Shall Overcome,” both of which she sang at the Woodstock music festival in August 1969, “The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down,” and “Diamonds and Rust,” which she wrote. She has inspired such artists as folk and country Grammy winner Emmylou Harris, Hispanic composer Tish Hinojosa, and Irish singer Mary Black.

Although she has performed songs in a broad range of styles and genres, Baez has remained essentially a folk singer throughout her half century of music making. She also continues to be widely associated with the counterculture and leftist political causes. In the early 2000s, Baez maintains an active career performing and recording songs by contemporary voices of conscience such as Dar Williams and Richard Shindell, and remains an active and vocal critic of injustice and political shortcomings wherever she sees them.

Kerry Dexter

See also: Dylan, Bob; Folk Music; Newport Folk Festival.

Further Reading

Baez, Joan. And a Voice to Sing With: A Memoir. New York: Summit, 1987.

Baez, Joan. Rare, Live, and Classic. Vanguard Records 125/27. Three-disc sound recording with booklet.

Baker, Chet (1929–1988)

Trumpeter, flugelhorn player, singer, and band leader Chet Baker was a pioneer in West Coast jazz of the 1950s, a style characterized by its lyrical nature, softer dynamics, and minimalism. Derived from the “cool jazz” of the late 1940s, it allowed musicians more freedom to improvise. Baker recorded more than 900 songs and 100 albums.

Born on December 23, 1929, in Yale, Oklahoma, Chesney Henry Baker was the only child of Vera Pauline Moser and Chesney Baker, Sr., an aspiring semiprofessional guitarist who worked in oil fields. In 1931, Chesney Sr. joined a band that performed live hillbilly music on the Oklahoma City radio station WKY.

In the 1940s, Chet Baker learned trombone, but he switched to trumpet, inspired by jazz trumpeters Harry James and Bix Beiderbecke. In November 1945, he enlisted in the U.S. Army. Stationed in Berlin, he discovered jazz on the U.S. Armed Forces Radio Service, heard music performed by big band leaders Stan Kenton and Woody Herman, and became fascinated by the sounds of jazz trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie.

Released from the army in 1948, Baker moved back to his parents' home briefly, but he was arrested for possession of marijuana and subsequently reenlisted in 1950. First assigned to the Sixth Army Band at the Presidio in San Francisco, he was transferred to Fort Huachuca in the Arizona desert. One of Baker's duties was to play reveille each morning. He went AWOL (absent without official leave) from the service in 1951. After psychiatric treatment, he was discharged and deemed “unacceptable to Army life.”

In 1951, saxophonist Charlie Parker chose Baker to play with him for a series of engagements from among many fine trumpet players because Baker played in a pure and simple style. In 1952, he joined saxophonist Gerry Mulligan in a pianoless quartet and explored West Coast jazz, a style that differed from the hard bop of New York City.

The omission of the piano as a harmony instrument was unusual in jazz at the time. It meant that the other instrumentalists could play more freely, not being restricted by chords. The ensemble made more effective use of counterpoint and melody, with an understated rhythm section, which soon became the trademarks of West Coast jazz. This music was quintessentially minimalist—characterized by intentionally simplified rhythms, melodies, and harmonies—a countercultural style that continues to exert appeal in the present day. The pianoless quartet format also allowed Mulligan to experiment extensively with improvisation. Baker's singing was often softer and smoother than that of the bebop artists who were popular at the time.

Baker and Mulligan experimented with communal living, their families sharing a house during the early 1950s. Baker was arrested several times for marijuana or heroin use, drug habits that caused him to be deported from Switzerland, Germany, and Britain. In the summer of 1966, he was assaulted in San Francisco and lost part of a tooth. Within two years, the condition of his teeth had deteriorated to the extent that he had to be fitted with dentures and did not play the trumpet for three years.

Baker died in Amsterdam as a result of a fall from a second-story hotel room on May 13, 1988. His self-destructive lifestyle became as much a part of his legend as his musical genius.

Ralph Hartsock

See also: Jazz.

Further Reading

Gavin, James. Deep in a Dream: The Long Night of Chet Baker. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2002.

Valk, Jereon de. Chet Baker: His Life and Music. Berkeley, CA: Berkeley Hills, 2000.

Baker, Josephine (1906–1975)

As a stage entertainer, social activist, and humanitarian, Josephine Baker was an important figure in the American counterculture through her transmission of American Jazz Age culture to Europe in the 1920s and her activism against the status quo of segregation. Although she is known primarily for her exotic performances as a dancer and singer, Baker served as an important advocate for social justice by refusing to perform before segregated audiences (she was known to demand the seating of black patrons before she went on stage); through her work as a Red Cross nurse during World War II; and through her various charitable works, including the adoption of twelve children from around the world “to prove” that children from different ethnicities can live together peacefully.

She was born Freda Josephine Carson in St. Louis, Missouri, on June 3, 1906, to Carrie McDonald and Eddie Carson, a vaudeville drummer. She also had a stepfather, Arthur Martin, Carrie McDonald’s second husband. Josephine’s introduction to show business came at an early age. Having dropped out of school at the age of twelve, she first found work cleaning houses, babysitting, and waitressing. At age thirteen, she met and married her first husband, Willie Wells. She would marry three more times after her divorce from Wells, and keep the name of Willie Baker, her second husband, whom she married in 1921.

Baker began her show business career in the 1920s, at the height of segregation and discrimination against African Americans. She started out with such acts as the Jones Family Band and the Dixie Steppers, first as a costume girl and then as a dance extra. It was with the Dixie Steppers that she began to incorporate a comedic flair into her act. Still a teenager, she began attracting attention at the Plantation Club in New York City and then on Broadway in the musicals Shuffle Along (1921) and Chocolate Dandies (1924).

She left New York for Europe in 1925 and created a sensation in Paris with her exotic dancing. She was first noticed at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées in La Revue Nègre. Before the end of the decade, she became one of the most photographed women in the world as a result of her performances of her topless “banana dance” at the Folies Bergère, a music hall, during the 1926–1927 season. She pushed the boundaries of artistic and social convention, both on stage and off. She also went on to star in movies such as Zou-Zou (1934) and Princess Tam-Tam (1935).

Baker felt the sting of racism when she returned to the United States in 1936 to perform with the Ziegfeld Follies and American audiences rejected her. So began her career as a crusader for social justice.

She settled permanently in France. During World War II, she put on shows for the troops and was active in the French Resistance as an underground courier. She would smuggle messages written on her sheet music in invisible ink across enemy lines, and she also served as a sublieutenant in the Women’s Auxiliary Air Force. The French government later awarded her the Medal of Resistance, and she was named a chevalier in the prestigious Legion of Honor.

Returning to the United States, Baker was refused entry into New York City’s famous Stork Club in 1951. Thereafter, when performing in the United States, she demanded that her audiences be integrated. Her acceptance in America finally came in 1973, when she received a standing ovation at Carnegie Hall in New York City.

Baker died on April 12, 1975, after suffering a cerebral hemorrhage. The first American woman to be buried with French military honors, she was laid to rest before a crowd of an estimated 20,000 mourners.

See also: Civil Rights Movement; Jazz.

Further Reading

Baker, Jean-Claude, and Chris Chase. Josephine: The Hungry Heart. New York: Random House, 1993.

Jules-Rosette, Bennetta. Josephine Baker in Art and Life. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2007.

Rose, Phyllis. Jazz Cleopatra: Josephine Baker in Her Time. New York: Doubleday, 1997.

Baldwin, James (1924–1987)

Novelist, essayist, and playwright James Baldwin was one of the most visible and respected literary figures in the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. As an African American intellectual and homosexual in mid-twentieth-century America, he was doubly alienated from mainstream society. He found refuge in the bohemian world of New York City's Greenwich Village and, later, the expatriate community in Europe.

James Arthur Baldwin was born on August 2, 1924, in Harlem in New York City, to Emma Berdis Jones and an unknown father. When he was three years old, his mother married David Baldwin, the son of a former slave, who was a factory worker and lay preacher. At the urging of his stepfather, Baldwin joined the Church of Mount Calvary of the Pentecostal Faith in 1938, and, at age fourteen, he became a preacher. In later years, he would express contempt for his youthful religious activities.

After attending high school, Baldwin worked at a number of menial jobs in New Jersey. He moved to Greenwich Village in 1944 in order to support his family after the death of his stepfather. Failing in his first attempt to complete a novel, he began writing for magazines such as The Nation and The New Leader, and eventually gained notoriety for a controversial essay, "The Harlem Ghetto," published in Commentary.

In 1948, Baldwin received a Rosenwald Foundation fellowship and immigrated to Paris, where he lived for the next nine years. After publishing a number of essays, in 1952 he visited Switzerland to finish the semi-autobiographical novel Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953), in which he explores the religious and social maturation of a boy in a racist and repressive society. The award of a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1954 allowed Baldwin the freedom to travel in Paris, New York, and Istanbul, and to continue to create socially relevant, psychologically insightful literature.

His second novel, Giovanni's Room (1956), focuses on a young man torn between homosexual love and love for a woman. The next, Another Country (1962), is a wide-ranging treatment of homosexual, bisexual, and interracial love. During this time, Baldwin published two collections of essays, Notes of a Native Son (1955) and Nobody Knows My Name (1961), which address the social, cultural, and personal issues of importance to him as a black man in America.

An impassioned literary voice during the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, James Baldwin was alienated from the social mainstream, both as a black intellectual and as a homosexual. He took up residence in France, where this portrait was taken. (Ulf Andersen/Getty Images)

Baldwin became actively involved in the civil rights movement. In 1963, he published The Fire Next Time, a powerful and highly acclaimed two-part essay that predicted a social apocalypse in America if the question of racial harmony was not addressed. The play Blues for Mr. Charlie (1964) and memoir No Name in the Street (1972) also attack racial prejudice and discrimination in America.

Baldwin's later works display a more restrained approach to racial issues. The nonfiction works The Devil Finds Work (1976) and The Evidence of Things Not Seen (1985), for example, thoughtfully explore the history of race relations in the United States. Novels such as Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone (1968), If Beale Street Could Talk (1974), and Just Above My Head (1979) reveal Baldwin's continuing fascination with homosexuality and with the place of music in black culture.

None of Baldwin's later books, however, achieved the critical success of his earlier work. He died of stomach cancer in St. Paul de Vence, France, on December 1, 1987.

Brett F. Woods

See also: Civil Rights Movement.

Further Reading

Porter, Horace A. Stealing the Fire: The Art and Protest of James Baldwin. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1989.

Standley, Fred L., and Nancy V. Burt, eds. Critical Essays on James Baldwin. Boston: G.K. Hall, 1988.

Sylvander, Carolyn W. James Baldwin. New York: Ungar, 1980.

Baldwin, Roger (1884–1981)

Roger Nash Baldwin was one of the founders, in 1920, of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), the nation's foremost nonprofit organization devoted to "defending and preserving the individual rights and liberties guaranteed to every person in this country by the constitution and laws of the United States." Serving as the ACLU's executive director throughout its first thirty years, Baldwin came to be regarded as one of the most notable American civil libertarians of the twentieth century.

Born on January 21, 1884, to an affluent family in Wellesley Hills, Massachusetts, he graduated from Harvard University in 1905 with both bachelor of arts and master of arts degrees in anthropology. He then moved to St. Louis, Missouri, became a social worker, and served as the chief probation officer of the St. Louis Juvenile Court. Baldwin achieved a national reputation with his 1914 book (coauthored with Bernard Flexner), Juvenile Courts and Probation, and through his role as secretary of the National Probation Association, helping create the nation's first federal probation laws.

In 1909, Baldwin attended a lecture by the anarchist Emma Goldman, who became a friend and mentor, and opened up to him the world of radical politics. During this period, Baldwin had his first involvement with a civil liberty case, which revolved around his defense of the right of Margaret Sanger, the birth control advocate, to make public speeches.

When the United States entered World War I in 1917, Baldwin joined the pacifist movement. He became a member of the American Union Against Militarism (AUAM), an organization that lobbied against U.S. entrance into the war and later for a negotiated peace. He became head of the National Civil Liberties Bureau (NCLB), an arm of the AUAM, founded to defend conscientious objectors and wartime dissidents, including members of the radical Industrial Workers of the World (IWW).

In 1918, Baldwin was called up for military service. In an act of solidarity with wartime resisters, he refused to serve, a violation of the Selective Service Act that resulted in his arrest, a celebrated trial, and his spending a year in prison. Soon after his release from prison, Baldwin came to New York City, joining with like-minded reformers, such as Jane Addams, John Dewey, and Norman Thomas, who recognized the need to protect the civil liberties embodied in the Bill of Rights. This concern led to the creation of the ACLU, with Baldwin selected to head the organization.

Under Baldwin's guidance, the attorneys and staff of the ACLU moved to defend and preserve individual rights and liberties guaranteed by the constitution. Among their early cases were that of the Italian-born American anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, accused of murder in what became a notorious political trial (1921) during the post-World War I Red Scare; the censorship (1920) of James Joyce's novel Ulysses, confiscated as obscene by the U.S. Postal Service; the Scopes Trial (1925), in which a young teacher in Tennessee was prosecuted for instructing his students on the theory of evolution; the Scottsboro Boys case (1931), in which nine black teenagers in Alabama were accused of the gang rape of two white girls; and the civil rights violation by the U.S. government during World War II whereby more than 120,000 Japanese were removed from their homes and held at War Relocation Centers.

Baldwin visited the Soviet Union in 1927 and wrote a 1928 book praising the Russian regime. But he later became disillusioned with Soviet Communism when Joseph Stalin signed the German-Soviet Nonaggression Pact in August 1939. This led to a revision of the ACLU charter, banning anyone affiliated with totalitarian organizations from serving on the union's board of directors.

In 1947, the Department of War invited Baldwin to assist in developing civil liberties agencies in Japan, South Korea, Austria, and Germany. After his retirement from the ACLU three years later, he became a consultant to the United Nations' International League for the Rights of Man (now the International League for Human Rights).

Baldwin died at his home of heart failure on August 26, 1981.

Leslie Rabkin

See also: Goldman, Emma: Industrial Workers of the World: Sacco and Vanzetti Case.

Further Reading

American Civil Liberties Union. <http://www.aclu.org>

Cottrell, Robert. Roger Nash Baldwin and the American Civil Liberties Union. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Walker, Samuel. In Defense of American Liberties: A History of the American Civil Liberties Union. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1990.

Baraka, Amiri (1934–)

A controversial poet, playwright, and community activist, Amiri Baraka (who published early works under his birth name, LeRoi Jones) is best known for a series of searing dramas about urban African American life during the mid-to late 1960s, when the civil rights and Black Power movements were transforming the black experience in America.

Everett LeRoi Jones was born in Newark, New Jersey, on October 7, 1934, to Colt LeRoy Jones, a postal supervisor, and Anna Lois Jones, a social worker. He attended Rutgers University in his home state, and received his bachelor of arts degree in 1954 from Howard University in Washington, D.C. He then spent three years in the U.S. Air Force.

In 1957, Jones settled in Greenwich Village in New York City, the heart of the Beat literary scene. Over the next five years, later regarded as his "Beat period," he associated with such bohemian literary figures as Allen Ginsberg, Frank O'Hara, and Gilbert Sorrentino. With the assistance of his first wife, Hettie Cohen, Jones founded the influential avant-garde literary journal Yugen.

In 1961, he garnered the respect of literary critics for his first volume of poetry, Preface to a Twenty Volume Suicide Note. He established his reputation as a playwright and radical voice of black America with the 1964 play Dutchman, dramatizing a shocking symbolic confrontation between whites and blacks; the play won an Obie Award (given for off-Broadway theater productions). He extended his reputation, and militancy, in two plays produced off Broadway in 1964 and 1965, The Toilet and The Slave, which depict the confrontation between a black revolutionary poet and a white female friend.

Following the assassination of Black Muslim leader Malcolm X in 1965, Jones became fully immersed in black nationalism and the black arts movement, the literary and artistic branch of the Black Power movement. He divorced his wife, a white woman, moved to Harlem, and opened the Black Arts Repertory Theatre/School (BART/S) to bring original African American drama, music, art, and poetry to the people and streets of Harlem. In 1967, he published a collection of black nationalist poetry titled Black Magic, which details his emotional transition from life in white culture to black identity and pride.

Also in 1967, after moving back to Newark, Jones married African American poet Sylvia Robinson and founded Spirit House, a cultural, educational, and spiritual center offering workshops, performances, and impromptu gatherings for the African American community. The following year, he edited Black Fire, an anthology of African American writing, with Larry Neal and produced a play, Home on the Range, as a benefit for the Black Panther Party.

It was in 1968, as well, in the aftermath of the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., that LeRoi Jones changed his name to Imamu (meaning "spiritual leader") Amiri Baraka (meaning "blessed prince"); he later dropped the title Imamu from his name. He also founded and became the leader of his own Black Muslim organization in Newark, called Kawaida.

By 1974, however, Baraka had abandoned his black nationalist views, which he considered racist, in favor of a Marxist-Leninist philosophy and the fight for the working class. He dropped the spiritual title Imamu and focused his efforts on political activism and education. He has taught at a number of institutions, including the New School for Social Research and Columbia University in New York, Yale University in Connecticut, and George Washington University in Washington, D.C. From 1985 until his retirement in 1999, he was a professor of African studies at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

In his retirement, Baraka continues to write and speaks frequently at colleges and universities throughout the country, addressing the social, sexual, psychological, and artistic implications of race in the United States. He has been honored with a number of literary prizes and awards, including fellowships from the Guggenheim Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts, the PEN/Faulkner Award, the Rockefeller Foundation Award for Drama, and a lifetime achievement award from the Before Columbus Foundation.

Joann M. Ross

See also: Black Arts Movement; Black Power Movement.

Further Reading

Benston, Kimberly W. Imamu Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones): A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1978.

Brown, Lloyd W. Amiri Baraka. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

Jones, LeRoi. The Baptism and The Toilet. New York: Grove, 1966.

Sollors, Werner. Amiri Baraka/LeRoi Jones: The Quest for a Populist Modernism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1978.

Barnes, Djuna (1892–1982)

Djuna Barnes was a modernist fiction writer, poet, journalist, and dramatist whose literary reputation rests largely on a single work, the novel Nightwood (1936). In her time, however, Barnes was prominent in the bohemian scene of Greenwich Village during the 1910s, and in the expatriate community of Paris and other European cultural centers during much of the 1920s and 1930s.

The influence of her family history can be seen in much of her work. Barnes was born on January 12, 1892, on a rural farm near Cornwall-on-Hudson, New York. She was educated by her father, Wald Barnes, a failed artist, and her paternal grandmother, Zadel Turner Barnes, a feminist. Wald Barnes was a polygamist who forced his theories of sexuality on his family: He brought his mistress into the family home when Djuna was five, and Djuna was raped at age sixteen with her father's consent and knowledge.

Djuna Barnes went to New York City in the early 1910s, eventually writing and illustrating for most of the city's major newspapers, including the Brooklyn Daily Eagle and the Press. Her most provocative early reporting was a story for World Magazine in 1914 about what it was like to submit to force-feeding.

The following year, she moved to Greenwich Village and published her first book, The Book of Repulsive Women: 8 Rhythms and 5 Drawings. It was the first modern literary novel in English to broach the theme of lesbianism (a decade before the publication of Radclyffe Hall's novel The Well of Loneliness).

Her apartment in Greenwich Village became a common meeting place of avant-garde artists and writers, contributing to the image and reputation of the Village as a center of bohemian culture. Barnes also was a member playwright for the amateur—but enduringly influential—Provincetown Players theatrical collective, which by then was also based in Greenwich Village.

Barnes traveled to Paris for the first time in 1921 on assignment, and her time in that city brought her into contact with such notable literary figures as T.S. Eliot, James Joyce, Ezra Pound, and Gertrude Stein. Although Barnes was influenced by their work, her personal relationships played a prominent role in her writing as well. Ryder (1928), heavily influenced by Joyce's Ulysses, is an autobiographical novel with a lusty protagonist based on Wald Barnes. Ladies Almanack (also 1928) is a satiric chronicle of the salon and lesbian circle of heiress Natalie Barney, a friend of Barnes's in Paris.

Perhaps the most important relationship of Barnes's life was that with Thelma Wood, with whom she lived for eight years. Barnes once stated, famously, "I'm not a lesbian. I just loved Thelma." Although both Ryder and Ladies Almanack were dedicated to Wood, 1928 marked the end of her and Barnes's time together.

The disintegration of her relationship with Wood became fodder for Nightwood (1936), Barnes's major work. Before its publication, Eliot edited the novel out of concern that Barnes's discussions of sexuality and religion would be censored. In his introduction to the published work, Eliot praised the novel's prose style, stating that only those trained in poetry could fully appreciate it.

Barnes returned to the United States permanently in the late 1930s, and she lived reclusively in Greenwich Village until her death on June 18, 1982. Despite the near poverty of her later years, she continued to write. The Antiphon (1958), a drama dealing with the same subject material as Ryder, was translated into Swedish and produced in Stockholm in 1962. Her last work, published in 1982, was a collection of nursery rhymes for adults titled Creatures in an Alphabet.

Sarah McHone-Chase

See also: Bohemianism: Greenwich Village, New York City.

Further Reading

Field, Andrew. Djuna: The Formidable Miss Barnes. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985.

Barnum, P.T. (1810–1891)

The most influential American showman of the nineteenth century and self-proclaimed "prince of humbugs," P.T. Barnum had a genius for media manipulation and an understanding of human nature that made his life story a classic American rags-to-riches tale.

Phineas Taylor Barnum was born on July 5, 1810, into a large family in Bethel, Connecticut, where his father was a storekeeper. He began his working life as a clerk and lottery-ticket salesman. At the age of twenty-five, he fell into professional showmanship when he purchased an old, nearly disabled black slave named Joice Heth, said to be 161 years old. Promoting her as the former nurse of George Washington, Barnum capitalized on the patriotic sympathies of far-flung audiences and earned a fortune on tour. When Heth died in 1839, it was determined that she had not been more than eighty years old.

Two years later, Barnum purchased Scudder's American Museum in New York City, renamed it the Barnum American Museum, and institutionalized his business of, as he called it, "humbuggery." Rather than make false and outrageous claims outright about his acts and exhibitions, however, Barnum mounted massive publicity campaigns inviting the public to witness the curiosities firsthand.

For example, he brought in two hit attractions in 1842: the midget Charles Sherwood Stratton, billed as "General Tom Thumb," and, with Boston impresario Moses Kimball, the so-called Feejee Mermaid, said to be half mammal and half fish. For the latter, Barnum invited audiences to view a dead body and determine for themselves if, indeed, it was that of a mermaid from the South Pacific. He went so far as to publish both false denunciations and letters of support from experts so as to generate controversy, and hype, for the Feejee Mermaid. Although most visitors could tell that the body was merely the preserved tail of a large fish crudely sown to the stuffed torso of a monkey, they had a good laugh and left with the idea that other people might be fooled.

Presenting human “freaks,” exotic animals, plays, and lectures—all as wholesome entertainment for middle-class families, in contrast to the city’s vaudeville, burlesque, and minstrel shows—the Barnum American Museum lasted twenty-seven years. Barnum rebuilt the museum after the original facility burned down in 1865. When the new building was razed by fire three years later, he abandoned the business, primarily because its Manhattan neighborhood had become working class and was less attractive to middle-class family audiences.

Barnum keenly understood that in a time of rapid economic change, Americans were concerned about consumer fraud and eager to prove their own discernment. As the nation’s industrial urban centers absorbed more and more people, life seemed more anonymous, and the individual felt more powerless. What a laborer produced and what a consumer purchased were determined increasingly by the impersonal forces of the marketplace. Misrepresentation seemed rampant, as salesmen and advertising commonly made unfounded claims that bilked the unwary of their hard-earned money.

In his 1866 book, Humbugs of the World, Barnum wrote that every person was anxious to test his or her own judgment in evaluating the new culture of trade, its benefits, and its dangers. As a way to help Americans cope with the changes in modern life and commerce, he felt that his own entertainments offered an opportunity for the same exercise in judgment.

Barnum presented the public with acts and attractions that became American icons, from his curiosities of the 1840s, to vocalist and media sensation Jenny Lind, the Swedish Nightingale, in the 1850s, and, beginning in 1871, his most influential and enduring venture, the Dan Castello, William Cameron Coup, Barnum & James A. Bailey Circus—also known as the Barnum and Bailey Circus, “The Greatest Show on Earth.” Later purchased by the Ringling Brothers, it became world famous as the Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey circus.

In addition to his career as a showman, Barnum was active in politics and the temperance movement. He served two terms in the Connecticut legislature (1865–1866) and one term as mayor of Bridgeport (1875–1876), where he was the founding president of Bridgeport Hospital and where the Barnum Museum still operates today. In accordance with the egalitarian spirit of his amusements, Barnum was an enthusiastic Jacksonian Democrat until around 1860. Although he had started his career by purchasing a slave, he came to support the abolition movement while maintaining a traditionally Republican belief in open markets.

Barnum was a religious man who absorbed the belief in human perfectibility current during the Second Great Awakening. His advocacy of temperance was a sincere attempt to reform the morality of the people he served—a philosophy brought to bear in his entertainment ventures as well. The employees of his circus were barred from drinking and gambling, for example, in the hope that they might set an example for ticket purchasers.

In 1855, he published the first of his autobiographies, The Life of P.T. Barnum. Revealing the inner workings of the entertainment industry and celebrating the ethic of a self-made man who eschewed alcohol and laziness, it was one of the most commercially successful autobiographies ever published in America. His Art of Getting Money, or, Golden Rules for Making Money, was published in 1880. P.T. Barnum died on April 7, 1891.

Susan Nance

See also: Circus and Carnival Culture: Freaks, Freak Shows, and Freakatoriums.

Further Reading

Adams, Bluford. E Pluribus Barnum: The Great Showman and the Making of U.S. Popular Culture. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1997.

Barnum, P.T. Humbugs of the World: An Account of Humbugs, Delusions, Impositions, Quackeries, Deceits and Deceivers

Generally, in All Ages. New York: Carleton, 1866.

Barnum, P.T. The Life of P.T. Barnum, Written by Himself. New York: Redfield, 1855.

Cook, James W. The Arts of Deception: Playing with Fraud in the Age of Barnum. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.

Harris, Neil. Humbug: The Art of P.T. Barnum. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.

Beach, Sylvia (1887–1962)

The American bookseller and publisher Sylvia Beach was a literary force in France in the early decades of the twentieth century, serving as a mentor and friend to many American writers who relocated to Paris during and after World War I. As the owner-operator of the English-language bookstore and lending library Shakespeare and Company, Beach provided an unofficial home to the so-called Lost Generation of expatriate American writers and published the first complete edition of James Joyce's novel Ulysses in 1922.

She was born Nancy Woodbridge Beach, on March 14, 1887, in Baltimore, Maryland. Her father, Sylvester Woodbridge Beach, was a minister at the First Presbyterian Church in Baltimore. Frail and unhealthy as a child, Sylvia often missed school but became an avid reader of poetry, language, and philosophy and escaped into books as often as possible.

In 1901, her father was named assistant pastor to the American Church in Paris, and the family relocated to France for the next three years. In Paris, Sylvia immersed herself in art and culture and fell in love with the country. The Beaches returned to the United States in 1905, when Sylvia's father became a pastor in Princeton, New Jersey, but France was not forgotten. With her sisters, Sylvia returned often, sometimes for months at a time. In August 1916, she returned to Europe for good.

Witnessing the tragedy of World War I in person, Beach felt compelled to join the cause. She enlisted in the Volontaires Agricoles (Agricultural Volunteers), working in Touraine for two months picking grapes and bundling wheat, and then served in the Red Cross. While consumed with helping the war effort, she also was concerned about her future plans and career aspirations. In 1918, back in Paris studying literature, she met Adrienne Monier, the proprietor of a bookshop. The young Frenchwoman would become Beach's life partner and would play a pivotal role in helping Beach realize her life's ambitions. In 1919, with Monier's help, she opened the doors to the first English-language bookshop in Paris.

Shakespeare and Company became a creative and intellectual center for English-speaking expatriates in France. Among its shelves, Beach forged friendships and business relationships with the greatest writers of the time, including T.S. Eliot, F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, James Joyce, Ezra Pound, Gertrude Stein, and William Carlos Williams. She introduced the writers to one another, secured typists for their manuscripts, received their mail, offered criticism on their drafts, and published some of their work. Described in her memoirs as "a club without a name," the shop was a popular gathering place for literary talent and those interested in it. "There were no tables and no drinks," she wrote, "but the people made it a hangout.... ?The people knew each other only as The Crowd."

In 1922, Beach made literary history by publishing James Joyce's groundbreaking modernist novel, Ulysses. The work had been serialized in an American literary magazine and banned from publication in book form after being judged obscene, but Beach believed in the literary merits of the work. The first 100 copies were printed in Dijon, France, and Beach continued to distribute the book even after it had been barred from sale in both Great Britain and the United States.

She also published Joyce's Pomes Penyeach (1927) and Our Exagmination Round His Factification for Incamination of Work in Progress (1929), a collection of critical essays on Joyce's Finnegan's Wake. Beach's support of Joyce's work secured her reputation in literary circles. Shakespeare and Company remained popular among the literary set and commercially successful into the early 1930s.

In the depths of the Great Depression, the shop began to struggle. With the support of friends and literary patrons, however, it remained open even after the fall of Paris to the Nazis in 1940. Beach was imprisoned for six months during the war, after which, in late 1941, she finally closed the doors of Shakespeare and Company.

She later wrote a memoir of the bookstore and Parisian culture during the 1920s and 1930s, titled Shakespeare and Company (1959). She also granted use of the name to an American entrepreneur who opened another English-language bookstore at a different Left Bank location. Sylvia Beach died in Paris on October 5, 1962.

Melissa Williams

See also: Bookstores, Alternative; Lost Generation.

Further Reading

Beach, Sylvia. Shakespeare and Company. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.

Fitch, Noel Riley. Sylvia Beach and the Lost Generation: A History of Literary Paris in the Twenties and Thirties. New York: W.W. Norton, 1985.

Beat Generation

The Beats, or the Beat Generation, were a group of American countercultural writers who achieved notoriety in the late 1950s and 1960s for their irreverent, anticonformist, radically experimental drug- and jazz-influenced literary themes, forms, and lifestyle. The Beat aesthetic was a reaction to 1950s mainstream American culture. Members of the Beat Generation tended to blur the boundary between their work and their lives, writing about extremes of experience with drugs, music, homosexuality, non-Western religion, and a rambling bohemianism.

Three friends, Allen Ginsberg, Jack Kerouac, and William S. Burroughs, made up the nucleus of the group. Other influential figures include the poets Gregory Corso, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Michael McClure, Peter Orlovsky, Gary Snyder, and Philip Whalen, and the novelist John Clellon Holmes. The movement originated in New York City, where several of the leading figures had been raised or attended university, and later found a home in San Francisco.

Novelist Jack Kerouac (left) and poet Allen Ginsberg, leading lights of the Beat Generation, peruse a text together in 1959. Spontaneous and nonconformist in lifestyle as well as writing style, the Beats rejected conventional consumer society and literary standards. (John Cohen/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Beats' work is distinguished by its experimental form, high energy, and emphasis on confessional or autobiographical subjects. It has a strong antimaterialist bent, opposing the sociocultural conformity of mainstream America and advocating self-exploration and self-expression, especially through drugs, music, spirituality, and open-minded engagement with the world.

The novelists, poets, and other figures of the Beat Generation came to be associated with the popular media stereotype of the "beatnik" as a black-clad, bongo-playing, goatee-sporting, beret-wearing, reefer-smoking dropout. That image dissipated with the growing recognition of their sheer artistic talent and social influence, especially on the hippie movement of the 1960s and 1970s.

Origins of the Term

The word beat was essential in bringing a sense of identity to the group. The term draws on a dense network of cultural associations. After World War II, it was mainly used by jazz musicians as a slang expression for down-and-out—down on one's luck and exhausted by life—while carrying the musical connotation of being "on the beat." In 1944, the use of the term by a Times Square hustler, Herbert Hunke, came to the attention of Burroughs, who passed it on to Ginsberg and Kerouac at Columbia University. According to Ginsberg, Hunke's original street slang meant to be "exhausted, at the bottom of the world, looking up or out, sleepless, wide-eyed, perceptive, rejected by society, on your own, streetwise."

Kerouac added a more spiritual association. Drawing a connection with the words beatific and beatitude, he suggested that to be beat was also to achieve a higher level of insight or enlightenment. Kerouac first used the term Beat Generation in an interview with his friend John Clellon Holmes, who then referenced the phrase in his novel Go (1952). With its depictions of Kerouac, Ginsberg, and the wanderer Neal Cassady, Go has been called the first Beat novel, even though it reflects Holmes's ambivalence about the movement. The protagonist, Paul Hobbes, struggles to reconcile the riotous existence of his friends with his desire to live a stable life with his wife.

The idea of beat captured the attention of critic Gilbert Millstein when he reviewed Holmes's novel, and he commissioned an article from the writer to explain it. "This Is the Beat Generation" appeared in The New York Times on November 16, 1952, and the term entered public discourse. By the late 1950s, the word had become a synonym for anyone living a bohemian or rebellious life.

Major Works

Ginsberg's poetry collection Howl and Other Poems (1956), Kerouac's novel On the Road (1957), and Burroughs's novel The Naked Lunch (1959) are regarded as the preeminent, defining texts of the movement.

Ginsberg's long poem Howl, a hallucinogenic rant against materialism and a crying out against the suffering of the powerless, established him as an important new voice in American letters and a leader of the Beats. It is at once a denunciation of contemporary American life, a confessional love poem to Carl Solomon (whom he had met during a brief stay in a psychiatric hospital in 1949), and a declaration of life's "Holiness."

Soon after the poem's release, Ginsberg encountered problems with federal authorities for its explicit language. In March 1957, the second printing was seized by customs officers while en route from the City Lights bookstore in San Francisco, where it had been published. Lawrence Ferlinghetti, the proprietor of City Lights Books and a significant poet, had anticipated such problems and had obtained assurances of legal support from the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). Ferlinghetti was briefly arrested by San Francisco police for publishing what was deemed literature likely to corrupt juveniles. The legal interventions ultimately lent the work an air of notoriety, however, not to mention free press coverage in such national magazines as Time and Life. The judge at the book's obscenity trial ruled in Ginsberg and Ferlinghetti's favor, finding the poem to be of "redeeming social importance." Howl has since become one of the most anthologized works in postwar American letters.

The year 1957 also brought the publication of the next seminal Beat work, Kerouac's second novel, On the Road. A semi-autobiographical stream-of-consciousness account of road trips across the United States, the novel recounts the turbulent friendship between Sal Paradise (a thinly disguised Kerouac) and the charismatic Dean Moriarty (based on Neal Cassady). Also represented in the stories are fictional versions of Ginsberg (Carlo Marx) and Burroughs (Bull Lee). The novel is noted for its vivid descriptions of jazz music, hitchhiking, fast driving, a changing postwar America, and spiritual and narcotic experiences. The novel expresses a fascination with aspects of Mexican and African American life, anticipating the disillusionment with mainstream white identity that would be a salient feature of the 1960s counterculture.

On the Road was immediately hailed as a modern classic. Millstein, writing in The New York Times, described the novel as "the most beautifully executed, the clearest and most important utterance yet made by the generation Kerouac himself named years ago as 'beat' and whose principal avatar he is."

Burroughs's novel Naked Lunch, the third major Beat text, is different from anything produced by Kerouac or Ginsberg—or anyone else ever before. Charged with powerful images of degradation and surreal sexual violence, Naked Lunch has lost none of its shock value since it first appeared. Written while Burroughs was hiding out in Tangiers and addicted to opiates, the novel pioneers the experimental "cut-up" technique he developed in later writings. Cut-up is the literary equivalent of cutting a printed page into sections and rearranging them to break with established, rational order. Darker and more satirical in tone than the work of Burroughs's contemporaries, Naked Lunch exposes the deranged underside of the American psyche based on its author's own experiences as a drug addict.

Naked Lunch was originally published in Paris in 1959; a U.S. edition would not appear until 1962. Sections were published in a student-run magazine at the University of Chicago in 1959, but copies were confiscated by U.S. postal authorities, and the magazine's editor, Paul Carroll, was prosecuted for distributing obscene material through the federal mail. When the full book edition was published in the United States, it was immediately banned by courts in Boston. An extended legal battle culminated in a landmark decision in 1966 by the Massachusetts Supreme Court, which found that the book did not violate obscenity statutes.

Other Beats

Among the poets, writers, and artists who achieved prominence in the late 1950s and early 1960s and who shared artistic and social concerns with Ginsberg, Kerouac, and Burroughs was the poet Gregory Corso, sometimes referred to as the “fourth Beat.” Corso was a rebellious outcast whose muscular poetry found its most powerful expression in Bomb (1958), a denunciation of the atomic age typeset in the shape of a mushroom cloud.

Ginsberg’s reading of Howl in San Francisco during the late 1950s helped bring together the East Coast Beats with a group of avant-garde poets in San Francisco and Berkeley. Referred to as the San Francisco Renaissance, the latter group was part of a larger movement of writers, visual artists, and performers that had been flourishing in the city in the decades after World War II. The founding figures of the San Francisco Renaissance included poets Kenneth Rexroth and Madeline Gleason, whose coming together with the Beats produced a bold new direction in postwar American literature. The Beat Generation ceased to be a small coterie of friends and emerged instead as a literary movement and national phenomenon, now heavily based on the West Coast.

Foremost among the West Coast Beats were Snyder and Ferlinghetti. Snyder’s work combines his interest in Zen with a strong ecological emphasis. His first collection, Riprap (1959), included poems about hitchhiking and working as a mountain ranger. Turtle Island (1974) won a Pulitzer Prize, and was followed by Left Out in the Rain: New Poems 1947–1986 (1986).

Ferlinghetti, already at the center of San Francisco’s literary scene and the Beat culture as the owner of City Lights Books and publisher of Howl, also contributed to the Beat movement as a poet in his own right. His collections include A Coney Island of the Mind (1958), Starting from San Francisco (1961), Back Roads to Far Places (1971), Wild Dreams of a New Beginning (1988), When I Look at Pictures (1990), and A Far Rockaway of the Heart (1997).

Poems and other work published by such West Coast Beats as Michael McClure, Harold Norse, and Kirby Doyle revealed their shared interests in Eastern religions, hallucinogenic experiences, and the natural world.

The 1960s

Despite the deaths of Kerouac and Cassady in the 1960s, the spirit of the Beat Generation continued to evolve and take new form. A variety of figures formed a bridge between the Beats and the hippie counterculture movement of the 1960s, including the “American Rimbaud,” Bob Kaufman, poet and peace activist Ed Sanders, singer-songwriter Bob Dylan, and novelist Ken Kesey, author of One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest (1962).

Shaped by a similar rejection of mainstream American values, these individuals became increasingly political during the 1960s, reacting to escalation in the Vietnam War and the rise of Black Power and other minority protest movements. Throughout this period, Ginsberg and Burroughs remained influential figures in the American counterculture, producing some of their best work long after the original Beat Generation had passed.

James Miller

See also: Baraka, Amiri; Buddhism; Burroughs, William S.; Ginsberg, Allen; Kerouac, Jack; Rexroth, Kenneth.

Further Reading

American Museum of Beat Art. <http://www.beatmuseum.org>

Buhle, Paul. The Beats: A Graphic History. New York: Hill and Wang, 2009.

Campbell, James. This Is the Beat Generation: New York, San Francisco, Paris. London: Vintage Books, 1999.

Chandralapaty, Raj. The Beat Generation and Counterculture: Paul Bowles, William S. Burroughs, Jack Kerouac. New York: Peter Lang, 2009.

Charters, Ann, ed. The Penguin Book of the Beats. London: Penguin, 1992.

Hrebeniak, Michael. Action Writing: Jack Kerouac's Wild Form. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2006.

Miles, Barry. Ginsberg: A Biography. London: Viking, 1989.

Morgan, Ted. Literary Outlaw: The Life and Times of William S. Burroughs. New York: Henry Holt, 1988.

Beatles, The

Arguably the most influential band of the rock-and-roll era, the Beatles was a group of four musicians from the industrial city of Liverpool, England: guitarist John Winston Lennon, bassist James Paul (Paul) McCartney, guitarist George Harrison, and drummer Richard Starkey (Ringo Starr). The Beatles were the vanguard of the so-called British Invasion of English rock groups into the United States, and the group created the signature pop-rock sound that defined the 1960s. The witty and cheekily upbeat band of Liverpoolians also became the highest-grossing entertainment act of the twentieth century.

Social Revolution

Unlike earlier pop acts, the Beatles did not consist of one starring front man, such as an Elvis Presley, backed by less essential sidemen. The band was always a unit and a collective enterprise, despite the obvious centrality of the Lennon-McCartney songwriting duo.

The group's dynamic was consonant with the emerging egalitarian ideals of 1960s England, where an extremely class-conscious society's long-standing tradition of social stratification was beginning to give way to upward economic mobility based on merit rather than on inherited wealth and privilege. In addition to the commercial success achieved by the Beatles's compelling and surprisingly sophisticated brand of pop music, the very fact that four young everymen from England's northern hinterlands found such enormous success performing and recording their own compositions, rather than songs chosen for them by music industry executives, conveyed a message of hope and optimism to which youthful audiences around the world responded with unparalleled enthusiasm.

Although the compositions, recordings, and performances of the Beatles were both critical and commercial successes, the band's initial conquest of the United States also was abetted by fortuitous timing. When the "Fab Four" performed before a television audience of more than 70 million Americans on The Ed Sullivan Show on Sunday, February 7, 1964, the assassination of President John F. Kennedy—which took place on November 22, 1963—was still a recent trauma. A grieving nation's desperate need for escape and succor doubtless had much to do with the fervency with which American teens embraced the band.

Throughout 1964, the Beatles cemented their status as beloved international stars with further appearances on The Ed Sullivan Show, U.S. and world concert tours, album releases, and an innovative and witty movie debut in A Hard Day's Night (1964). The film presented a fictionalized, comedic account of a typical day in the band's hectic life that put the audience on a first-name basis with the performers, intimately showcasing each Beatle as a natural movie star with a distinctive personality—John as the acerbic "smart one," Paul as the ballad-crooning "cute one," George as the understated "quiet one," and Ringo as the lonely, melancholy funnyman.

Success piled on success for the Beatles through the next year, with a second film, a romp titled Help! The movie's slapstick-comedy-with-a-rock-soundtrack formula was later emulated by many pop-culture icons, from the Monkees to Scooby-Doo.

Maturity and Countercultural Leanings

By the summer of 1966, the pressures of nonstop touring and recording had taken their toll on the band, as had the controversy that swirled about them in the United States over remarks Lennon had made in a British interview comparing the Beatles's popularity to that of Jesus Christ. The Beatles stopped touring, concentrating instead on constructing ever-more-elaborate music in the recording studio. These compositions would have been extremely difficult to perform live, given the technology of the day.

As the individual band members matured—they had all still been in their early twenties back in 1964—so did their musical expression. Songs such as the McCartney composition “Yesterday” (1965), the groundbreaking, psychedelic Lennon composition “Strawberry Fields Forever” (1967), and albums such as Rubber Soul (1965) and Revolver (1966) proved that the Beatles were serious artists rather than a mere flash-in-the-pan bubblegum act.

Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band (1967), a “concept album” in which the Beatles subsumed their own identities within that of the record's eponymous fictional band, not only showcased the group's increasingly sophisticated music. The album also demonstrated their innovative, experimental performance and recording techniques, which included the use of random tape loops and exotic instruments such as the Indian sitar.

Harrison began to flower as a composer in his own right during these years. His artistic growth curve would culminate in his 1969 Beatles hits “Something” and “Here Comes the Sun” (from the 1969 album Abbey Road), as well as a successful post-Beatles solo career.

Liberated artistically both by drugs such as marijuana and LSD and by their unprecedented clout in the recording studio, the band grew and experimented artistically throughout the 1960s. They only occasionally missed the mark commercially, as was the case with their poorly received self-produced film, Magical Mystery Tour (1967).

The Beatles always captured the zeitgeist of their times. As the 1960s progressed, their lyrical content frequently intersected with the rising Flower Power movement and the drug counterculture. This thrust the Fab Four into the role of trendsetters in everything, from clothing to hairstyles to recreational drug use, and surrounded the band members with no small amount of controversy.

The band members' restless aesthetic questing, along with the advent of new wives and girlfriends, inevitably led to stresses in their group dynamic and the establishment of individual agendas beyond the framework of the Beatles. These tensions were exacerbated by the drug-overdose death of longtime manager Brian Epstein on August 27, 1967.

The group continued working together for the next two years. Its music, however, recorded on albums such as Magical Mystery Tour (1967), The Beatles (1968; better known as the “White Album”), Abbey Road (1969), and Let It Be (1970), increasingly became the artistic statements of individuals more than the collective work of a group.

Cultural Legacy

Although the four band members disbanded acrimoniously in 1970 and began pursuing solo careers, fans held fast to the hope of a Beatles reunion throughout the next decade. The murder of John Lennon in New York City on December 8, 1980, dashed this hope but failed to dampen public enthusiasm for the band and its artistic legacy.

The three surviving Beatles reunited in the mid-1990s to assemble The Beatles Anthology, a documentary film (1995), a three-volume audio CD collection (1995–1996), and a hardcover book (2000) detailing the “official” version of Beatles history. Included in the audio collection were the first previously unreleased Beatles songs to appear in a quarter century, “Free As a Bird” (1995) and “Real Love” (1996). Both were based on 1970s-era Lennon demo tapes, which were fleshed out and completed in the studio by the remaining Beatles. They clearly transcended their countercultural beginnings, as McCartney's rendition of classic Beatles tunes at the 2005 Super Bowl half-time show amply illustrated.

The Beatles's song catalogue was exposed to new audiences yet again in 2006. It was the soundtrack for Love, a Cirque du Soleil performance tour with songs digitally remastered by the Beatles's original producer, Sir George Martin, and his son, Giles Martin. Also that year came the release of the Julie Traynor musical film Across the Universe, featuring thirty-four Beatles compositions and an original story line that ties them together.

Harrison died of cancer on November 29, 2001. Despite the fact that only two members of the band remain alive, Paul and Ringo, the cultural legacy of the Beatles remains evergreen. Fully remastered recordings of all original Beatles albums were released in both mono and stereo versions in 2009.

Michael A. Martin

See also: Lennon, John; LSD; Marijuana; Rock and Roll.

Further Reading

The Beatles. <http://www.beatles.com>

The Beatles. The Beatles Anthology. San Francisco: Chronicle, 2000.

Davies, Hunter. The Beatles. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1985.

Lewisohn, Mark. EMI's The Complete Beatles Recording Sessions: The Official Story of the Abbey Road Years. London: Hamlyn, 1990.

Norman, Philip. Shout! The Beatles in Their Generation. New York: Fireside, 2005.

Spitz, Bob. The Beatles: The Biography. New York: Little, Brown, 2005.

Bebop

The modern jazz style known as bebop (sometimes referred to as rebop or bop) originated in the early 1940s. It is generally credited to saxophonist Charlie Parker, trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie, and pianist Thelonius Monk.

Parker, nicknamed "Bird," is regarded as the greatest saxophonist in modern jazz history. Gillespie, known for his mastery of the trumpet, conveyed a melodic and harmonic language that was supremely innovative and unpredictable. Monk, with his unorthodox melodies and unusual chord progressions, is known as the most influential and challenging of the bebop composers/performers. Together, they forged a musical style associated with the early days of World War II.

The term bebop is an onomatopoeic expression of the quick, two-note phrase often played in unison by the lead instruments to mark the conclusion of major sections of the music or to introduce the beginnings of improvised solos. Rather than using melodies and harmonies based on the major and minor, seven-note diatonic scales (comprising five whole steps and two half steps) traditional in the West, bebop is based on the more colorful chromatic scale (twelve equal half steps).

The typical bebop combo consisted of an alto saxophone, bass, drums, and piano—a much smaller instrumentation than the dance orchestras emblematic of swing, the popular big-band jazz style of the 1940s. Swing relied heavily on written arrangements, utilized popular melodies, and functioned primarily as dance music. Bebop featured complex melodies and harmonies, varied rhythms, faster and more agitated tempi, and elaborate improvisations. Historically, bebop has been viewed as a reaction against the popular and commercially more successful swing style, though some music critics and historians maintain that bebop evolved naturally from swing, with the U.S. role in World War II playing a major part in the transition.

Bebop pioneer and trumpet master Dizzy Gillespie (beret) keeps the beat during a 1948 jam session. His small-group compositions, like those of other bebop innovators, represented a complex, technically demanding departure from popular swing music. (Allan Grant/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

The drafting and voluntary enlistment of musicians into military service, the gasoline shortages and rationing of goods on the home front, and the ban on album recording implemented in 1942 by the American Federation of Musicians (AFM) as a method to conserve resources are a few of the reasons cited for the decline of swing and the advent of bebop during World War II. Others view bebop as a response to the closing of dance halls and the emergence of after-hours clubs, perceived as disreputable, smoked-filled places. With the advent of smaller combos came a subculture that promoted the musicians as artists rather than merely performers; and these artists were different and separate from the mainstream. The bebop culture promoted a philosophy of nonconformity, and rebellious teenagers, regardless of race or socioeconomic class, embraced the music.

The appearance of bebop marked the paradigm shift from jazz as music primarily for dancing and entertainment to jazz as music for serious listening and appreciation. Accordingly, bebop musicians were elevated from background entertainers to serious artists of great skill and technical ability. Despite its attributes, bebop never achieved the popularity or commercial success of swing. The style and its practitioners often were criticized for being inaccessible, and the technical demands of bebop created an elite echelon of musicians that eliminated all but the most talented. Bebop, however, has had more influence than any style before it on all the jazz styles that have followed. Many contemporary musicians judge younger, less experienced players by their aptitude for performing bebop.

See also: Jazz.

Further Reading

DeVeaux, Scott. The Birth of Bebop: A Social and Musical History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Owens, Thomas. Bebop: The Music and Its Players. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Be-Ins

Be-ins were spontaneously planned, loosely organized gatherings identified with the counterculture of the late 1960s and inspired by the first Human Be-In, held in San Francisco on January 14, 1967. Advertised as a “Gathering of the Tribes,” the Human Be-In took place in the Haight-Ashbury district, a focal point of counterculture activity on the West Coast during the 1950s and 1960s. The stated purpose of the event was to bring together various elements of the California counterculture—poets, artists, musicians, political activists, and social critics—in a demonstration of solidarity and a celebration of the ideals, modes of expression, and lifestyles of the era, emphasizing freedom of expression in art, drugs, and sexuality and growing opposition to the Vietnam War.

This initial Human Be-In was so named in homage to the nonviolent civil rights sit-ins of the early 1960s. It featured appearances by numerous counterculture icons of the 1950s and 1960s, including the Grateful Dead rock band, poet Allen Ginsberg, comedian Dick Gregory, and activist Jerry Rubin. Psychologist Timothy Leary, a featured speaker, encouraged attendees to “Turn on, tune in, drop out,” coining a now-famous phrase that articulated the counterculture ethos of free inquiry, consciousness expansion, communal living, and rejection of conventional societal norms that had inspired the event.

The 1967 Human Be-In brought national media exposure to the West Coast youth counterculture, giving rise later that year to the mass migration and social phenomenon known as the Summer of Love, which attracted thousands of idealistic youth known as hippies to the Haight-Ashbury community, along with reporters, talent scouts, criminals, tourists, and others seeking financial gain, recreation, and anonymity. Exposure of Haight-Ashbury to a national media audience spread counterculture ideals, fashion, music, and art to other communities in the United States and abroad.

Yet as the American media capitalized on popular fascination with the counterculture, many of its elements were presented to the public in a superficial, heavily censored, or commercialized light. As its terminology became part of mainstream popular culture, the suffix “-in” emerged as a trendy way to designate various gatherings. One of its most prominent manifestations in conventional popular culture was Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In, which first aired on the NBC television network in January 1968. The commercialization of the Haight-Ashbury scene prompted many participants and observers to identify the summer of 1967 as the end of the hippie era in San Francisco.

The 1967 Human Be-In inspired numerous similar events across the United States and around the world in the late 1960s with themes and content similar to those of the original. Yet none of the later events attracted as large an audience or achieved comparable media notoriety. Some of these, such as the Central Park Be-In held in New York City on March 26, 1967, were advertised as “be-ins,” while others did not use the term at all.

Many of these events eschewed the first Human Be-Ins focus on intellectual and artistic inquiry, instead emphasizing more hedonistic aspects of the counterculture, such as drug use and sexual activity. In the 1990s and 2000s, a series of technological conventions titled “Digital Be-Ins,” held in the San Francisco area and other locations, cited the 1967 Human Be-In as inspiration.

Michael H. Burchett

See also: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco; Leary, Timothy; Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In.

Further Reading

Perry, Charles. The Haight-Ashbury: A History. New York: Random House/Rolling Stone, 2005.

Taylor, Derek. It Was Twenty Years Ago Today. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Bellamy, Edward (1850–1898)

Best known for his utopian novel Looking Backward 2000–1887 (1888), Edward Bellamy was a nineteenth-century writer and critic who envisioned an egalitarian society based on socialist principles. His ideas, especially as described in Looking Backward, possibly the world’s most popular utopian novel, inspired many other economic and political thinkers, including philosopher John Dewey, sociologist Thorstein Veblen, economic historian Charles Beard, Pulitzer Prize–winning journalist William Allen White, and Socialist Party leaders Norman Thomas and Eugene V. Debs.

Born in the industrializing town of Chicopee Falls, Massachusetts, on March 26, 1850, Bellamy was raised in a Baptist household; religion would be a constant theme in his life and writings. Reticient and physically frail as a youngster, he also was very intelligent.

He began the study of law as a young man but entered the field of journalism instead and moved to New York as a freelance writer—an unsuccessful excursion that soon found him back in his hometown as an editor for a nearby newspaper. After publishing some essays and his first novel, Six to One (1873), he decided to devote his full time to writing and produced a number of published works, especially in the area of socialist politics.

In 1888, Bellamy published his highly successful Looking Backward, a novel about a man who, suffering from a bout of insomnia before his wedding, goes into a deep sleep and awakens 113 years later, in the year 2000. The new world the protagonist observes is a utopian society, made perfect on the strength of socialist principles. The work is a critique of the individualistic American ethos, and Bellamy invites the reader to consider the possibilities of a socialist alternative. With its dreamy style and convergence of romance and politics, the novel became a major success and one of the best-selling works of American fiction in the nineteenth century.

The influence of the book was almost immediate, as socialist organizations called Nationalist Clubs, or, more informally, Bellamy Clubs, began springing up after its publication. The term nationalist was used by Bellamy to characterize his socialist ideology, which advocated state ownership of such services as utilities, railroads, and telegraph lines.

The first of the Bellamy Clubs was formed in early 1889 in Boston under the name the Boston Nationalist Club

Number One. It was attended by such prominent writers of the day as Edward Everett Hale and William Dean Howells. Other clubs were started in major cities of the East, such as New York and Washington, D.C., and quickly spread to the West, most notably California, which had the most Nationalist Clubs in the nation. Within a year, nearly fifty clubs were formed throughout the United States with a reported 6,000 members, owing largely to the popularity of Looking Backward.

In 1889, some of Bellamy's followers in Boston established a magazine called The Nationalist, edited by Henry Willard Austin as a publication of the Nationalist Educational Association. Two years later, Bellamy himself created a new weekly magazine, The New Nation, which promoted his ideas of nationalization. The magazine dissolved in 1894 as the nationalist movement began to dissipate and the Nationalist Clubs began to dissolve.

Bellamy produced a sequel to Looking Backward, Equality, in 1897, but it did not begin to approach the attention and accolades accorded to its predecessor. Around the same time, Bellamy's health began to fail due to tuberculosis. He died of the disease on May 22, 1898, at age forty-eight.

Bellamy's ideas on nationalism created a movement in the United States based on the idea that state control should be exerted by the intelligentsia rather than the workers, an idea that differed from Marxist theory. Although his views fell out of favor with many, Looking Backward continues to intrigue readers, and his ideas on nationalism continue to be studied by those interested in political and social counterculture movements.

Leonard A. Steverson

See also: Socialism.

Further Reading

Aaron, Daniel. Men of Good Hope: A Story of American Progressives. New York: Oxford University Press, 1951.

Kopp, James J. "Looking Backward at Edward Bellamy's Influence in Oregon, 1888–1936." Oregon Historical Quarterly 104:1 (Spring 2003) .

McClay, Wilfred M. "Edward Bellamy and the Politics of Meaning." American Scholar 64:2 (Spring 1995) : 264–72.

Patai, Daphne , ed. Looking Backward, 1888–1888: Essays on Edward Bellamy. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1988.

Ben & Jerry's

Ben & Jerry's is an ice cream manufacturing and retail chain that was founded in 1978 in Burlington, Vermont, by Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield. Their corporate strategies and social involvement inaugurated the age of "societal marketing," the idea that a commercial enterprise should take into account the best interests of society as well as consumer preferences and its own profits.

From the moment of its birth, Ben & Jerry's integrated the everyday practices of the company with a set of socially progressive values that the founders defined as "caring capitalism." In this approach, the profit orientation of a corporation is not only compatible with a socially progressive agenda, it is informed by it. Prominent among Ben & Jerry's social values are preserving the environment, recognizing the role businesses play in the local community, and making a commitment to peace in the world and helping the disempowered.

Cohen and Greenfield were born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1951, and both attended junior-high school in Merrick, Long Island, where they became friends. After graduating from high school, both struggled in higher education and the professional world. Cohen dropped out of college twice, working as a potter, janitor, cashier, and security guard. Greenfield, disappointed after having been rejected twice for medical school, settled for work as a lab technician.

In 1976, the two men drifted back together, living as roommates in Saratoga Springs, New York, where they made plans to start a food business. Although both had worked in ice cream companies as teenagers and Cohen had experimented with making ice cream as a teacher, their decision followed strict business logic. The key marketing point was that ice cream was less expensive than many other food products.

In 1978, after extensive research, they opened their first ice cream parlor in Burlington, Vermont, a college town with little competition for their product and customers with a social conscience. As children of the 1960s, Cohen and Greenfield understood that America's youth—especially college students—had become socially conscious and eager to participate in public affairs. From the beginning, the two ice cream entrepreneurs recognized their social responsibility, incorporating progressive values into their company's management philosophy, relations with the community, and commercial marketing. They sought to build loyal customers who would buy Ben & Jerry's products not only because of their fresh ingredients, innovative flavors, and great taste, but also because they symbolized a commitment to social justice.

In 1988, for example, the corporation helped establish the "1 percent for peace" nonprofit initiative, which sought to redirect 1 percent of the nation's defense budget to peace-promoting projects and activities. To support this effort, Ben & Jerry's released the Peace Pop, a chocolate-coated ice cream bar on a stick with information on the program. The program gave rise to a permanent activist group known as Business for Social Responsibility, with national offices in New York and San Francisco.

Ben & Jerry's also introduced the "Eco-pint" carton, made from unbleached brown paper with nontoxic, printable clay coating. This ice cream packaging became the American food industry's first container manufactured from unbleached paperboard.

In succeeding years, the company launched a variety of other environmental initiatives, including a partnership with the World Wildlife Fund to open Climate Change College and a collaboration with Save Our Environment.org to fight global warming. The concept of societal marketing extended to the design of products and choice of ingredients. With the introduction in 1989 of a flavor called Rainforest Crunch, the corporation chose nuts that would increase the demand for living rainforests, help to raise public consciousness about disappearing rainforests through the marketing and advertising campaign, and redirect a portion of the ice cream sales to benefit rainforest preservation efforts.

Despite its innovations, the Ben & Jerry's approach is clearly part of a mainstream process in American business. In the 1970s, consumer marketing entered a phase characterized by the notion of market segmentation, in which demographics inform the content of advertising and such abstract concepts as youth and lifestyle are promoted as much as the products themselves. Although Ben & Jerry's has certainly indulged in market-segmentation strategies, it has reconciled the capitalist profit incentive with a progressive ideology, making the latter both a product and a corporate cause. Thus, Ben & Jerry's reflects the counterculture values of the 1960s brought to the corporate world. Its founders' desire for consciousness raising led to a financially successful company and marketing phenomenon in its own right.

In April 2000, Cohen and Greenfield announced that they were selling the company to Unilever, a major international manufacturer of food, home care, and personal grooming products. The founders maintained that the Ben & Jerry's brand, natural ingredients, and commitment to "global economic and social missions" would be preserved.

See also: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco.

Further Reading

Cohen, Ben, and Jerry Greenfield. Ben & Jerry's Double-Dip: Lead with Your Values and Make Money Too. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997.

Lager, Fred "Chico." The Inside Scoop: How Two Real Guys Built a Business with a Social Conscience and a Sense of Humor. New York: Crown, 1994.

Berkeley, California

Located on the eastern shore of San Francisco Bay, Berkeley was a focal point of the American youth counterculture movement of the mid-to late 1960s. The movement was opposed to the Vietnam War, racial injustice, and the middle-class social and cultural values pervasive at the time. It brought to Berkeley, along with the rest of the San Francisco Bay Area, several counterculture efforts including the Free Speech Movement at the University of California, Berkeley (UC Berkeley) and the civil rights, antiwar, hippie, and Black Power movements.

The Berkeley counterculture grew out of a series of events in the early 1960s, the largest of which were protests against a 1960 House Committee on Un-American Activities hearing in San Francisco to investigate purported communist activities in the Bay Area. The protests began when Douglas Wachter, a UC Berkeley student, was called to testify. Several hundred noisy demonstrators showed up. They were locked out of the hearing and dispersed from the steps of San Francisco's City Hall with fire hoses. This was recorded and broadcast that evening on national news programs. The next day, 5,000 demonstrators were there, including several thousand longshoremen, their support drawing even more press coverage. Rather than discouraging such "subversive" activities, the protest attracted more leftist students to Berkeley.

At the same time, UC Berkeley had become known around the world, and attracted international students and professors to the city. They brought their social, cultural, and political customs and beliefs. In addition, many organizations in Berkeley had become involved in issues that UC Berkeley students focused on, including free speech and other civil rights. For example, the Berkeley School Board held two interracial conferences, in 1961 and 1962, to end de facto segregation in the city's schools, and appointed a committee to recommend a program for school desegregation. In 1968 this made the Berkeley School District the first to undertake non-court-ordered mass busing in the United States.

Other prominent civil rights activities in Berkeley included the nation's first shop-ins, at a local supermarket in February 1964. They were organized by the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) to protest the store's practice of excluding blacks from employment. The Free Speech Movement at UC Berkeley, also organized in 1964, saw massive protests against the university's policy of restricting student speech. By 1965, the movement had gained momentum and began to focus on broader national and world issues, including the Vietnam War.

Beginning in 1966, the on-campus and off-campus movements increasingly joined forces to oppose the war, organizing on a massive scale. The once-peaceful protests became increasingly violent and characterized by rioting. By the late 1960s, the demonstrations had moved off campus onto Telegraph Avenue, putting increasing strain on the relationship between the counterculture and the “establishment” of local business owners, government, and law enforcement. The escalating confrontation between protestors and law enforcement culminated in May 1969 at People’s Park, a university-owned lot that students and community members wanted to turn into a public park. The conflict led to several days of rioting and a two-week occupation of the city by the U.S. National Guard.

Aside from the protests, the counterculture began to affect the everyday life of the city. This was particularly true in areas south of the university, where the convergence of student activists, hippies, street people, and black militants gave rise to a number of communal-living groups committed to social, cultural, and political change. The cultural changes centered on Telegraph Avenue, which saw the spread of European-style coffeehouses, secondhand bookstores, newsstands, art galleries, restaurants, and alternative media such as underground newspapers and radio stations. Berkeley became one of the few U.S. cities to sell foreign newspapers, cigarettes, and coffee and to show foreign films.

A number of notable businesses were started during this time, including the Berkeley Barb, first published in August 1965 by lawyer Max Scherr. One of the nation’s first underground newspapers, it covered the antiwar and civil rights movements and included events and activities associated with the counterculture throughout the Bay Area. The Berkeley Barb remained in publication until late 1980. Another icon was Cody’s Bookshop on Telegraph Avenue. Owners Pat and Fred Cody organized student peace marches and started community services, including the Free Clinic, a collectively run facility that was still operating in 2010.

The counterculture movement also influenced food and dining in Berkeley, culminating in the establishment of the Gourmet Ghetto district on Shattuck Avenue between Rose and Hearst streets in the late 1960s and early 1970s. The restaurants there featured food that took the counterculture’s slogan “you are what you eat” to mean that only the best ingredients, organically grown by a local or small grower, should be used.

The cornerstones of the Gourmet Ghetto are two iconic Berkeley institutions, Peet’s Coffee, which brought gourmet coffee to the corner of Vine and Walnut streets in 1966, and the Cheese Board Collective. The latter was opened in 1967 by Elizabeth and Sahag Avedesian, who granted equal wages and management authority to all workers. Today, it remains wholly owned by its members and has expanded the menu to include pastries, pizza, and specialty breads.

Perhaps the best-known restaurant in the neighborhood is Chez Panisse, a modest bistro started by Alice Waters and Paul Aratow in 1971. Its original recipes and use of fresh, local produce earned it a reputation as the birthplace of what has come to be known as California cuisine.

The large public protests in Berkeley subsided with the end of the Vietnam War in 1974, but the liberal politics associated with the counterculture movements of the 1960s had become entrenched in the cultural and political life of the city. This was evidenced by the election and tenure of Ron Dellums, a Democrat who in 1971 became the first African American to serve Northern California in the U.S. Congress and the first openly socialist congressman since World War II. He served until 1998, when he resigned his seat, and was elected mayor of nearby Oakland in 2006.

Judith Gerber

See also: Black Power Movement; Free Speech Movement; Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Anderson, Terry. The Movement and The Sixties. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Dellums, Ronald V. Lying Down with the Lions: A Public Life from the Streets of Oakland to the Halls of Power. Boston: Beacon, 1999.

Berkman, Alexander (1870–1936)

Alexander Berkman was a prominent anarchist activist and theorist of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Although born in Lithuania, he lived and worked in the United States for most of his adult life and played a central role in radical activities there for more than three decades, until his deportation in 1919. Berkman is most famous for his attempt to assassinate the industrialist Henry Clay Frick in 1892, which led to his equation in the public mind with the stereotype of an anarchist as a wild-eyed émigré given to random violence whose goal was the destruction of American society. Berkman was a prolific writer, and many of his works are still influential today, including Prison Memoirs of an Anarchist (1912) and Now and After: The ABC of Communist Anarchism (1929).

Berkman was born Ovsei Osipovich Berkman on November 21, 1870, in Vilna, Lithuania, the youngest of four children in a prosperous Jewish merchant family. He grew up in St. Petersburg, Russia, where he adopted the name Alexander. At the age of eighteen, he immigrated to the United States.

Berkman settled in New York City, where he worked as a typesetter for Freiheit, a newspaper published by the German American radical Johann Most, and he became part of the radical counterculture that was thriving in the city at that time. Like many in that counterculture, Berkman was acutely aware of the contrast between the promise of America as a land of freedom and prosperity, and the reality for most people, particularly the working poor. It was during this time that he met fellow anarchist Emma Goldman, who became his lifelong companion and colleague.

Berkman embraced the concept of “propaganda by the deed” (from the French propagande par le fait), which justifies acts of violence (such as the assassination of public figures) as a necessary means to bring about social and political revolution. In 1892, Berkman attempted to assassinate steel magnate Henry Clay Frick in retaliation for his violent strikebreaking activities. The act did not advance Berkman's cause, however, and may, in fact, have damaged it by garnering sympathy for Frick, who was seriously injured but survived.

Berkman was sentenced to twenty-two years in prison, of which he served fourteen. After his release in 1906, he continued his radical activities, including writing for Goldman's paper Mother Earth. In 1916 and 1917, Berkman published an anarchist journal, The Blast, in San Francisco.

Berkman and Goldman opposed World War I and were repeatedly incarcerated for their campaigns against conscription. They were targeted during the Palmer Raids of 1919 to 1921, a controversial crackdown on the far left by the U.S. Department of Justice and the Immigration and Naturalization Service. As a result of their long association with anarchist and radical causes, Berkman and Goldman were deported to the Soviet Union in 1919.

Berkman was impoverished in his later years, earning only a meager income from his writings and translations. After unsuccessful prostate surgery that left him in constant pain, he committed suicide on June 28, 1936, in Nice, France.

See also: Anarchism: Goldman, Emma.

Further Reading

Berkman, Alexander. Now and After: The ABC of Communist Anarchism. New York: Vanguard Press, 1929. Reprinted as What Is Anarchism? Edinburgh, Scotland: AK, 2003.

Berkman, Alexander. Prison Memoirs of an Anarchist. 1912. Pittsburgh: Frontier Press, 1970.

Berlin Heights Commune

In 1856, free love activists Joseph Treat, Francis Barry, and Cordelia Benschoter established the Berlin Heights Commune, a farming community also known as the Free Love Farm, in Berlin Heights, in the north-central part of Ohio near Lake Erie. Historically, the term free love refers to a social movement that dates to the nineteenth century and promotes the principle that love relationships should not be regulated by law, thereby rejecting traditional marriage.

By 1857, the Berlin Heights Commune was advertised in John Patterson's Social Revolutionist and other reform periodicals. With the leasing of the Davis House, the community's only hotel, an archaic water-cure establishment, twenty people could be accommodated in their quest for a better life. The harsh winter of 1857 to 1858 cast the region and the entire nation into a recession, which, in turn, put strains on many families. The Berlin Heights Commune attracted a wave of converts.

Not everyone was emotionally ready to dissolve their marriages, pool their resources, and live communally. Those who did, however, often enjoyed an improved socioeconomic status. This was especially true for the women who joined, often widows or runaway wives. Berlin Heights was an egalitarian society in which women's rights were fully embraced. Reproductive choice, property ownership, preservation of surnames, and opportunities for economic self-sufficiency were among the many rights and privileges afforded to the women of Berlin Heights.

Because the women often wore their hair short, sported knee-length dresses over trousers, and practiced vegetarianism and temperance, the Free Love Farm women often were the subject of ridicule. Writing under the name Artemus Ward, humorist Charles F. Browne penned a highly derogatory satire about the members of the Berlin Heights Commune in an article titled "Artemus Ward Among the Free Lovers" (1858).

Contemporaries of the Berlin Heights communards who lived in the more well-known utopian society founded by John Humphrey Noyes in Oneida, New York, also were practitioners of free love. As a result of expanding railroad connections in the mid-nineteenth century, residents of Berlin Heights traveled frequently between northern Ohio and Oneida, and when the number of Berlin Heights residents eventually waned in 1866, some sought membership in the Oneida Community.

One of the more famous inhabitants of Berlin Heights was spiritualist Thomas Cook, the editor of a small monthly periodical called Kingdom of Heaven. Advocating what he referred to as the "love principle," Cook renounced his marriage vows in 1860. Refuting the authority of the state to govern his private life, he did not seek a legal divorce; rather, he "gave" his wife her freedom, along with the responsibility for their five children. By the late 1860s, Cook had settled in Berlin Heights with the remaining members of the original Free Love Farm.

The founders of the Berlin Heights Commune were some of the first to leave. Treat, sued for defaulting on the Free Love Farm's mortgage, left the area shortly after the property was sold at a sheriff's auction in 1857. Barry and Benschoter moved to Illinois, where their son was born in 1860. They later returned to Ohio, then moved to New York City, and finally settled in Portage County, Ohio.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Communes.

Further Reading

Passet, Joanne E. Sex Radicals and the Quest for Women's Equality. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003.

Berrigan, Daniel (1921–), and Philip Berrigan (1923–2002)

Roman Catholic priests best known for their participation in radical Vietnam War protests, Daniel and Philip Berrigan were central figures of the Catholic Left, a loosely organized group of liberal clergy, nuns, and lay Catholics active in social justice causes. Their religiously inspired, nonviolent civil disobedience made the brothers poster boys for the antiwar movement of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Their willingness to sacrifice themselves for a larger cause inspired thousands of people of faith to pursue lives of nonviolent resistance.

The fifth of six sons of an Irish-German Catholic family, Daniel was born on May 9, 1921, in Virginia, Minnesota. Philip followed on October 5, 1923, in Two Harbors, Minnesota. Daniel was a shy, bookish child; Philip was a burly, handsome all-star athlete. Despite their outward differences, the brothers shared a deep, abiding faith and a passion for social justice.

By his senior year in high school, Daniel heard his calling and joined the Jesuits immediately thereafter, in 1939. Ordained in 1952, he became increasingly involved in local antipoverty and antidiscrimination activities, while enjoying a burgeoning reputation for profound and provocative poetry, winning several national prizes.

Philip followed a somewhat different path to faith-based nonviolent resistance. In 1942, he studied for just one semester at St. Michael's College in Toronto, Canada. Then, in 1943, he was drafted by the U.S. Army. His exposure to virulent racism and excruciating poverty in the American South during combat training, followed by the horrors of war in Europe—where he served in the artillery in the Battle of the Bulge and other campaigns—convinced Philip that the ills of society must be confronted directly.

Returning to college after the war, Philip graduated from Holy Cross University in 1950 and immediately entered the seminary of St. Joseph's Society of the Sacred Heart, an order dedicated to serving the African American community. Ordained as a Josephite in 1955, he led community activities, taught classes at inner-city schools, and provided spiritual guidance.

By the early 1960s, it had become increasingly difficult for the Berrigan brothers to reconcile their deeply held religious convictions with the federal government's reticent stance on civil rights and its escalation of the Vietnam War. Philip traveled to a 1963 civil rights march in Jackson, Mississippi, with the intent of being jailed for the cause, only to be recalled by his superiors before carrying out his act of civil disobedience. Daniel took part in the historic marches from Selma to Birmingham, Alabama, with black civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr., in March 1965, and he negotiated the release of prisoners of war in Vietnam.

In 1964, the Berrigan brothers, along with prominent Catholic priest, Trappist monk, and author Thomas Merton, cofounded the Catholic Peace Fellowship, the first Catholic antiwar organization in America. The brothers' vehement and vocal opposition to the government's prosecution of the Vietnam War irritated the Roman Catholic Church hierarchy, but their steadfast opposition to violence and social injustice inspired thousands, especially liberal Catholics, to reject the status quo.

As the military draft absorbed an alarmingly high number of poor, black youth, Philip Berrigan saw the need for more direct resistance. He and a growing number of followers staged public protests, picketing the houses of the military chiefs of staff and other administration officials. By 1967, he believed it was time for a dramatic symbolic gesture.

On October 27, Philip and three fellow protesters entered the Custom House in Baltimore, Maryland, and poured blood on Selective Service System records on file there. He was arrested and sentenced to six years in prison.

The following May, Philip joined with Daniel and seven followers in raiding the Selective Service offices in Catonsville, Maryland, stealing hundreds of draft files and ceremoniously burning them in the parking lot with homemade napalm. The Catonsville Nine, as they became known, were convicted of conspiracy and destruction of government property in October 1968.

Philip became the first Catholic priest to be jailed for civil disobedience over the Vietnam War. He was sentenced to three and a half years (to run concurrently with his six-year term for the Baltimore incident). Daniel received a three-year sentence.

With the help of fellow radicals, in 1970 both brothers went into hiding prior to imprisonment. They surfaced periodically over the course of the next several months, showing up at antiwar rallies and delivering fiery antiwar sermons, and then slipping away. The embarrassment to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Catholic Church delighted counterculture and antiwar activists. Later that year, however, both brothers were apprehended and taken into custody.

Daniel gained early release because of ill health. A government informant later implicated Philip in a plot to kidnap National Security Advisor Henry Kissinger, but the resulting trial, held in 1972 in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, ended in Philip's acquittal on appeal.

The eventual withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam did not diminish the brothers' opposition to war. Both served additional time in prison for the confrontational activities of the Plowshares Movement, a campaign of civil disobedience launched in 1980 and dedicated to the abolition of nuclear weapons. Over the course of the next two decades, the group carried out and was convicted of dozens of felonies and misdemeanors in the United States and other countries.

Philip Berrigan left the priesthood in 1973 after secretly marrying Sister Elizabeth McAlister, a nun involved in the Harrisburg debacle. They spent years in and out of prison for their antiwar activities and together founded Jonah House, a faith-based nonviolent resistance community in Baltimore. Philip died of cancer on December 6, 2002.

Daniel Berrigan remains an active member of the Jesuit community, continuing to write and speak. Living in New York City, he has taught at Fordham University, also serving as poet-in-residence, and he has ministered to AIDS hospice patients.

Ann Youngblood Mulhearn

See also: Civil Rights Movement; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Berrigan, Daniel. The Trial of the Catonsville Nine. Boston: Beacon, 1970.

Berrigan, Philip. Widen the Prison Gates: Writing from Jails, April 1970–December 1972. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1973.

Polner, Murray, and Jim O'Grady. Disarmed and Dangerous: The Radical Lives and Times of Daniel and Philip Berrigan. New York: Basic Books, 1997.

Bethel Commune

The Bethel Commune was a socialistic community near Hannibal, Missouri, from 1844 to 1880. Its charismatic leader, William Keil, sought to establish a utopian existence for its members. The communards of Bethel practiced a unique blend of individualism and communism and, despite early hardships, were able to increase their membership to more than 1,000.

Keil, a mystic preacher and self-proclaimed physician, had come to America from Germany in 1838. After spending several years in the cities of the Northeast, he made plans to move to a rural area and start a new religious colony. He had left the Methodist faith, believing that the correct way to live God's law involved a communitarian existence in which all members contributed to the welfare of the group. Enlisting a few people from other communes, he established the Bethel Commune on government land.

The first years were difficult for Bethel's inhabitants. Food, clothing, and shelter were in short supply, and disease and desertion nearly led to its early dissolution. The residents who remained, all of whom were German descendents, saw the commune grow and prosper for a few years. The property was expanded to nearly 4,000 acres (1,600 hectares), and the communards could take part in farming, blacksmithing, log milling, tanning, carpentry, and other trades. In addition to several stores, there were private homes, a hotel, and a church. Formal education was not a priority of the communards, who regarded it as less important than training in a trade.

The utopian Bethel Commune, founded by German charismatic William Keil in northeastern Missouri in 1844, became a close-knit community of modest means. It peaked at about 1,000 residents before Keil's departure in the mid-1850s. (Library of Congress)

Keil served as the community physician (he was referred to as Dr. Keil), head of government, and spiritual leader, despite having no formal training in any of these areas. The government structure was simple, consisting of a president (Keil), a deputy-president, and a group of trustees. The members practiced simple and moral living, eschewing luxuries, based on an unyielding faith in their spirituality. The community emphasized love, forgiveness, selflessness, morality, and other Christian principles that were reinforced by the leader. It was a tightly knit community whose members were not allowed to marry outsiders.

As time passed, communards drifted away, and the membership began to wane. When Keil left the area in 1856 to form a larger commune in Oregon called Aurora, many of the Bethel inhabitants followed. From 1856 to 1863, approximately 400 members left Bethel, many to avoid being drafted into the American Civil War.

Keil died of a heart attack in 1877 at Aurora. By 1876, only 175 members remained at Bethel, which dissolved completely by 1880.

Leonard A. Steverson

See also: Communes.

Further Reading

Hinds, William A. American Communities and Co-operative Colonies. 2nd ed. Philadelphia: Porcupine, 1959.

Nordhoff, Charles. The Communistic Societies of the United States. New York: Hillary House, 1960.

Bicycles

The introduction of the bicycle in American society offered ordinary citizens the possibility of freedom as never experienced before. The vehicle provided a new, completely independent mode of travel that held the promise of true equality. At the height of its popularity in the 1890s, the bicycle seemed an ideal response to its era, representing true progress. It ushered in fads in tourism, health, and exercise, and led to societal changes as well, with long-lasting effects.

Although the first bicycle was brought from Paris in 1865 and enjoyed fleeting popularity, the vehicle really caught on in the United States in the 1880s after the development of the safety bicycle, which incorporated such features as two equal-sized wheels, chain-gear drive, a diamond-shaped frame, and pneumatic tires. These improvements, coupled with increased production and significantly lower prices, led to the bicycle boom of the 1890s. At the beginning of the decade, there were an estimated 150,000 cyclists in the United States; by 1896, the number of bicycle riders had reached some 4 million.

The first avid cyclists came from the upper and middle classes, whose members had the extra income and leisure time to pursue the hobby. Soon, however, declining prices made the bicycle available to people from all walks of life.

Dismissed as a fad in its early days, the bicycle became ubiquitous in U.S. cities and small towns by the mid-1890s. It was regarded as an unparalleled mode of transportation and a revolutionary force in society. Until that time, private travel had been possible only on foot or horseback. The relatively high speed that could be attained on a safety bicycle made for travel that was not only cheaper and faster, but proved exhilarating for riders as well. The many Americans who became obsessed with it were labeled “scorchers.”

Life in America’s rapidly changing, industrialized society was increasingly hectic and stressful. Ironically, the technology that made this new society possible also gave its citizens a means to escape it, as the bicycle allowed riders to leave the city quickly and easily. Indeed, industrialization meant that more people were living increasingly sedentary lifestyles, and bicycling was touted as an ideal form of exercise. The cyclists of the 1890s played a central role in promoting the doctrine of Physical Culture—the idea that physical activity is essential to good health.

New patterns of recreation and leisure also emerged during this period, with bicyclists establishing the prototype of modern tourists. As large groups of middle-and upper-class riders began going on long tours, service industries sprang up to cater to their needs, including hotels, repair shops, and restaurants. Maps showing the best cycling routes were eagerly sought after, and cyclists began demanding more and better roads. Cycling enthusiasts also formed clubs and leagues dedicated to their pastime, such as the League of American Wheelmen (founded in 1880), and they took part in a growing network of tournaments and outings.

The democratizing qualities of the bicycle were inherent in the way the machine was operated: Regardless of the operator’s social status, it had to be pedaled. The bicycle also allowed its owner to cross regional and social boundaries. Women were especially affected by the advent of the bicycle, attracted by its healthful benefits as well as the potential freedom from the family and home. Although some contended that bicycles led to immodest and inappropriate behavior on the part of women, such concerns were soon dismissed by society at large. Fashions also changed, as women shed corsets and long skirts for clothing better suited to riding—leading to the popularity of bloomers, for example.

The boom began to wind down beginning in the late 1890s, as the bicycle lost its novelty and early automobiles came on the scene. In the United States, the bicycle came to be regarded as a juvenile amusement for much of the twentieth century.

A second, smaller bicycle boom in the 1970s was precipitated by interest in the new ten-speed bicycle and the energy conservation movement. In the mid-1970s, the League of American Wheelmen was revived and renamed the League of American Bicyclists. The mountain bike furthered the resurgence of recreational cycling in the 1980s and 1990s and into the twenty-first century.

While it seems unlikely that the United States will again experience a bicycle boom such as that of the early 1890s, cycling remains a popular recreational activity, competitive sport, and means of transportation in some locations, especially cities. Its enduring countercultural appeal derives primarily from its identification as an environmentally responsible means of transportation.

A number of organized events emphasize the environmentally friendly and political aspects of cycling. Among these are Critical Mass, held in major cities on the last Friday of every month since the early 1990s; Midnight Ridazz, held on the second Friday of each month in the Los Angeles area; and Bikes Not Bombs, which repairs bicycles and sends them to Third World nations. The Rails-to-Trails Conservancy has been working since 1986 to promote the conversion of abandoned railroad beds into bike trails.

A number of U.S. cities also have focused on the creation of bike trails for recreation and transportation. Community bicycle programs have been created to provide cheap or free use of bicycles in some cities.

Sarah McHone-Chase

Further Reading

Harmond, Richard. "Progress and Flight: An Interpretation of the American Cycle Craze of the 1890s." Journal of Social History 5:2 (1971–1972) : 235–57.

Herlihy, David V. Bicycle: The History. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2004.

League of American Bicyclists. <http://www.bikeleague.org>

Bierce, Ambrose (1842–1914?)

Ambrose Gwinett Bierce was a writer, poet, and critic famous for his scathing wit and grim humor, and for contributing to the realism movement in American literature. Writing in the years of Western expansion that followed the American Civil War, his contemporaries included writers Stephen Crane, Theodore Dreiser, William Dean Howells, and Mark Twain.

Bierce was an outspoken pessimist whose editorial columns and reviews could make or break aspiring young writers, although he is best remembered today for his short stories and a collection of satirical definitions titled The Devil's Dictionary (1911). Bierce used his writing talent to voice his strong opinions and political stances on topics such as corruption in Washington, his fierce opposition to American military involvement, and the burgeoning careers of his fellow writers. Bierce wrote vehemently against oppression in all forms, whether religious, racial, or political, often espousing views that were unpopular at the time and put him at risk of gaining many enemies.

Bierce was born on June 24, 1842, into a poor farming family in the small religious community of Horse Cave, Ohio. He was the tenth of thirteen children in the household and spent much of his youth entertaining himself with his father's uncommonly large library. When he was a small child, the Bierce family moved to Elkhart, Indiana, where he remained distant from his peers and disparaging toward his rural community.

In 1861, at the outset of the Civil War, Bierce enlisted in the Union Army. Fighting in some of the most horrific battles of the conflict, including Shiloh, Chickamauga, Murfreesboro, and Chattanooga, he witnessed carnage and savagery. These experiences left their mark on the psyche of the man who later came to be known as “Bitter Bierce.”

In 1866, Bierce traveled west as a civilian engineering attaché on an expedition into Indian Territory. Arriving in San Francisco a year later, he settled down and began his long career in journalism.

Bierce soon gained notoriety as a sharp-tongued and darkly humorous critic and social commentator in a newspaper column called “The Town Crier.” The column, published regularly in the San Francisco News-Letter and California Advertiser, routinely savaged local political and cultural personalities Bierce deemed worthy of reproval. He rose to the position of editor of the News-Letter before leaving for England with his new wife, Mary Ellen Day.

Bierce and his wife spent the next three years in England. During this time, Bierce collected his writings into three books of essays, satires, and short stories. In 1876, he returned to San Francisco and continued to publish scathing commentaries and reviews, this time, in a column called “The Prattler” in the newly founded Argonaut magazine. In 1887, he was hired by newspaper giant William Randolph Hearst for the Examiner. Bierce would write for Hearst for the next twenty years.

It was during this period that Bierce wrote most of the material for which he is best remembered, including many pieces detailing his experiences in the Civil War, written in stark, unromantic prose. His most famous and most anthologized short story, “An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge,” was published in 1890. It is the best example of Bierce’s fiction, displaying an unsentimental, realistic style and a tendency toward the grotesque and supernatural. The story tells of Confederate sympathizer Peyton Farquhar’s escape from hanging and subsequent flight from Union soldiers, leading to the revelation at the story’s end that the hanging had been successful, and Farquhar’s “escape” had been the imaginings of a mind in the throes of death.

The Devil’s Dictionary was assembled in 1906 as The Cynic’s Word Book, a collection of cynical definitions that Bierce had started in his column. Marriage, for example, was defined as “the state or condition of a community consisting of a master, a mistress and two slaves, making in all, two”; religion was defined as “a daughter of Hope and Fear, explaining to Ignorance the nature of the Unknowable”; birth was “the first and direst of all disasters”; and voting was “the instrument and symbol of a freeman’s power to make a fool of himself and a wreck of his country.”

As a writer for Hearst’s Examiner, Bierce was thrust into national attention several times, often for the controversial nature of his work. In 1896, Hearst sent him to Washington, D.C., to expose the deceptions and bribes behind a bill that industrialist Collis P. Huntington was attempting to push through Congress to excuse Huntington’s railroad company from a $75 million debt to the government.

As Hearst led a major journalistic push to urge America’s entrance into what would become the Spanish-American War, Bierce became an outspoken opponent of the conflict, retaining his job only because of Hearst’s realization that controversy was good for business. Bierce remained a critic of American military endeavors throughout the next decade, denouncing war because it was war, rather than for specific political reasons. He also often sided with the minority or the oppressed in his editorials. He spoke out against racial discrimination and religious persecution, publicly condemning both the violent movement in San Francisco against Asian immigration and the lynching of a group of Mormons bound for Utah.

The last years of Bierce’s life were marked by tragedy. He had separated from his wife after discovering evidence that she was having an affair, and in 1905, a year after filing for divorce, she succumbed to illness. Two sons also preceded Bierce in death (he was survived by a daughter).

Restless, Bierce crossed into Mexico to witness the Mexican Revolution in 1913. He was never seen or heard from again. Rumors of his death spread north (including one rumor that he died fighting alongside the Mexican revolutionary general Pancho Villa in 1914), but no facts were ever substantiated—a mysterious end to an often controversial life.

Further Reading

Berkove, Lawrence I. A Prescription for Adversity: The Moral Art of Ambrose Bierce. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2002.

Bierce, Ambrose. The Devil's Dictionary. New York: Bloomsbury, 2003.

Fatout, Paul. Ambrose Bierce: The Devil's Lexicographer. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1951.

Morris, Roy, Jr. Ambrose Bierce: Alone in Bad Company. New York: Crown, 1995.

Biker Culture

Although motorcyclists have been on the road since the early years of the twentieth century, the outlaw image connected with motorcycling is a phenomenon of the post–World War II era. It was then that the non-mainstream motorcycle rider transformed into the biker, seen alternately as a social predator and a counterculture hero. In part a product of American popular culture—film, television, magazines, and books—the biker has become an ingrained social type, recognizable by his appearance and attitude no less than by his mode of transport.

Subculture Roots

When William Harley and the Davidson brothers began manufacturing motorcycles in 1903, they did not expect that their machines would become associated with one of the most notorious subcultures in American society. Harley-Davidson initially imagined that their vehicles would be used for basic family and personal transportation. In the 1920s, for example, Harley-Davidson began producing motorcycles with sidecars for the purpose of transporting wives and children. But with the advent of affordable automobiles, epitomized by the Ford Model T, motorcycles were recast primarily as recreational and sport vehicles. In the 1920s and 1930s, motorcycle clubs were formed for the purpose of competing in races, performing stunts, and gathering for group rides and other events.

The biker subculture as it is known today began to take form as veterans returned home from World War II. Many of these men, especially those who had been pilots during the war, found domestic life staid and constraining, and longed for the adventure that flying had afforded them. A shared sense of alienation and desire to flout the conventions of postwar life prompted some of them to form motorcycle clubs such as the Hells Angels and the Boozefighters. These clubs devised their own codes of conduct, detailing appropriate behavior among members, proper roles for women, and rules governing the initiation of new members. Biker behavior often was intentionally at odds with conventional social mores.

Bikers wore jackets or vests emblazoned with “colors,” or their club’s insignia, to signify membership. Many also adopted other modes of appearance—long hair, facial and ear piercings, ragged denim—to illustrate their allegiance to a subculture community. After the American Motorcycle Association (AMA) issued a report in the late 1940s that asserted the “outlaw” element constituted only 1 percent of motorcyclists, biker-club members adorned their vests or jackets with a “1 percent” badge to celebrate their position on the fringes of the mainstream.

The public became aware of this growing subculture in 1947, when bikers, including members of the Boozefighters, disrupted a rally sponsored by the AMA in Hollister, California, and further disruption followed in the small town. A photographer from Life magazine was on the scene, and the July 21 issue included a full-page picture of one of the renegade bikers. The menacing photo—which showed the biker on his machine, beer bottles scattered around him (some have since speculated that the scene was staged)—became the first iconic image of the biker subculture, portraying their kind as dangerous predators.

The Hollister incident became the basis for The Wild One (1953), a film starring Marlon Brando that follows the antics of motorcycle club members. Depicting bikers as rebels and nonconformists, the film added to their allure in American’s burgeoning youth culture.

Marlon Brando’s portrayal of a motorcycle gang leader in The Wild One (1953), based on a violent incident at Hollister, California, in 1947, helped affirm the image of the rebel, outlaw biker. (Central Press/Stringer/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Evolution of an Image

By the 1960s, motorcycle clubs were making national headlines, often for alleged involvement in assault and rape cases. Thomas Lynch, the attorney general of California, issued a report in 1964 that characterized them as a social menace. The press continued to detail criminal allegations against them and position them as social miscreants.

Then “gonzo” journalist Hunter S. Thompson spent a year riding with the Hells Angels and wrote a book about the experience (Hell’s Angels: A Strange and Terrible Saga, 1966). It defused much of the hysteria surrounding bikers by presenting them as mostly uneducated and unskilled men making a life for themselves in a society that otherwise had no place for them.

In the 1960s, motorcycle clubs had a tumultuous relationship with the counterculture. Members of the counterculture viewed bikers as “holy primitives,” outlaws who embodied the spirit of their cultural protest. Beat novelist Ken Kesey arranged for the Hells Angels to spend an evening with his Merry Pranksters at his home in La Honda, Oregon. Allen Ginsberg wrote two poems about them. Bikers became visible fixtures in the Haight-Ashbury section of San Francisco and other sites of counterculture activity. However, bikers often were stridently patriotic, and they disapproved of the antiwar movement. At times, some club members violently attacked those protesting the Vietnam War.

Approximately forty movies were made about motorcycle clubs between 1966 and 1973. Most were low-budget productions shown in drive-in theaters and depicting biker protagonists in the mythic garb of the cultural outlaw. The apotheosis of the biker movie was Easy Rider (1969), which focused on the cross-country journey of two bikers seeking freedom on the open road.

In December 1969, the Rolling Stones rock band hired the Hells Angels to act as security guards at a free concert at the Altamont Speedway outside San Francisco. Aspiring to be “Woodstock West,” Altamont was an all-day music festival that was marred by outbreaks of fighting. Toward the end of the concert, concertgoer Meredith Hunter was stabbed to death during an altercation in front of the stage. It was alleged that Hunter had brandished a gun; a member of the Hells Angels was tried and acquitted on the grounds of self-defense. The incident marked a symbolic end to the love affair between bikers and hippies, as well as to the decade that had forged their union.

In the decades that have followed, the biker’s place in the American cultural lexicon has both changed and stayed the same. In the 1970s, television provided an image of the domesticated biker in the character of Fonzie in the series Happy Days. Still a cool outsider, he also was a moral character and closer to the mainstream, comfortable living side by side with his middle-class neighbors.

The 1980s gave pop culture the ironic biker in the person of multimillionaire magazine publisher Malcolm Forbes, who formed a motorcycle club called the “Capitalist Tools” with friends. Other celebrities and public figures also were featured riding motorcycles.

The 1990s also saw the rise of biker fashion, as the outlaw look, more than its attitude or behavior, became popular with motorcyclists of all social classes. At the same time, motorcyclists, manufacturers, and organizations, such as the AMA, various brand-related clubs, and Ride to Work, sought to transform the public view of most motorcyclists as average American enthusiasts, sport riders, and commuters. While bikers and biker clubs still existed, a subculture that had long been defined by its marginality in American society had largely gone mainstream.

Allison Perlman

See also: Altamont Free Concert; Easy Rider; Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco; Hells Angels; Rolling Stones. The.

Further Reading

Thompson, Hunter S. Hell’s Angels: A Strange and Terrible Saga. New York: Random House, 1967.

Wagner, Herbert. Harley-Davidson 1930–1941: Revolutionary Motorcycles and Those Who Rode Them. Atglen, PA: Schiffer, 1996.

Yates, Brock. Outlaw Machine: Harley-Davidson and the Search for the American Soul. Boston: Little, Brown, 1999.

Birth Control Pill

In 1960, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approved the birth control pill, the first oral contraceptive product and medication ever designed for purely social rather than therapeutic purposes. Within a year of its introduction, the oral contraceptive became the birth control method of choice for more than 400,000 American women. The number tripled the following year and reached some 5 million by 1965. Today, an estimated 12 million women in America are “on the Pill.”

Mothers of the Pill

The force behind the legalization of birth control and its availability to women was the nurse and activist Margaret Sanger. It was she who coined the term “birth control” in 1914 and opened the first birth control clinic in the United States in 1916. For decades, the indefatigable Sanger challenged federal and state laws to allow the distribution of birth control information and contraceptive devices to women. Her wholehearted ambition was to find the perfect contraceptive that could rescue long-suffering women from repeated, unwanted pregnancies.

By the 1950s, Sanger’s mission was to seek a contraceptive pill that would be as easy to take as an aspirin—a pill that would be cheap, safe, and effective and provide female-controlled contraception. She found a financial sponsor in the International Harvester heiress Katherine McCormick and a medical expert in human reproduction in Gregory Pincus. Their collaboration ultimately led to the development of Enovid, the first oral contraceptive, and its approval by the FDA.

Social Implications

The Pill became a significant factor in the feminist movement of the 1960s, as American women embraced what was a radical concept at the time: that they, like men, enjoyed sex, had sexual needs, and should have sexual freedom. For feminists, both young and old, it provided a major step forward in female empowerment.

A pill to inhibit normal fertility and avoid unwanted pregnancy allowed women to overcome the double standard in sexual mores, take charge of their own sexuality, and, for the first time in history, break free of their reproductive imperatives. Because the Pill is almost 100 percent reliable in preventing pregnancy, it provided an opportunity to be sexually adventurous without the fear of unplanned pregnancy. For couples, the Pill was a breakthrough that made it possible to control the size and timing of their families. All in all, it was one of the most socially significant medical advancements, revolutionizing birth control by its effectiveness.

The Pill also helped trigger what became known in the 1960s as the sexual revolution, in which a diffuse counterculture movement espoused revolutionary changes in sexual attitudes and behaviors. Central to the movement was a growing acceptance of sexual encounters between unmarried adults. Throughout this period, men and women engaged in their first acts of sexual intercourse at increasingly younger ages, with the average age of first marriages rising correspondingly. This meant that young men and women had more time available to acquire sexual experience with partners before entering into long-term monogamous relationships. In addition, the growing number of marriages that resulted in divorce, as well as a lessening of the stigma attached to it, provided further encouragement for men and women to engage in nonmonogamous sexual activity.

The counterculture of the 1960s and 1970s was associated with public displays of nudity and a new openness about sexual ideas and practices, such as living with the opposite gender outside of marriage, sex as a “turn-on,” and the philosophy of free love. All of this contributed to the awareness that brought the Pill to the forefront of the sexual revolution.

Religious Response

The growing popularity of the Pill caused an uproar among religious figures and institutions over the appropriate role of sex and its relationship to reproduction.

The Roman Catholic Church strongly protested against the legal use of oral contraceptives. On July 25, 1968, Pope Paul VI addressed the issue in an encyclical titled “Humanae Vitae: On the Regulation of Birth,” in which he officially reaffirmed traditional Catholic teachings on contraception and abortion. Specifically, the encyclical forbade “any action which either before, at the moment of or after sexual intercourse, is specifically intended to prevent procreation.” According to Catholic Church doctrine, oral contraceptives violate the purpose and nature of sex and distort what God intended.

Although many Protestants and other non-Catholics used various forms of birth control, a number of conservative Christian organizations—such as the Christian Medical and Dental Associations—posed strong objection to almost all forms of birth control.

In the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, a concerted counterrevolution on the part of the Religious Right has attempted to turn back the sexual revolution. Advocates of this movement have sponsored new organizations, elected supportive political representatives, lobbied for applicable legislation, and sought to defund sexually progressive social programs and to fund more conservative ones.

Perspectives

The Pill first came on the market as a form of medical technology, but its cultural ramifications have been profound and enduring. The new freedom it offered women caused a shift in male-female relationships, raising new complexities.

New sources of gender conflict were created as well. For example, while the Pill relieved women of the burden of unwanted pregnancies, it also laid the responsibility for contraception entirely on them. The widespread acceptance and use of the Pill led men to expect or assume that a woman would “go on the Pill” when a couple undertook a sexual relationship.

Questions about side effects and safety also have altered feminist responses to the Pill. As early as 1964, researchers began to examine some of its health effects. Unlike other prescription medications, perfectly healthy women were taking the Pill for long periods of time, even though little was known about the long-term health hazards. By the 1970s, while Planned Parenthood maintained its strong support for the Pill, some feminists came to see it as a poorly tested contraceptive foisted on women through the collusion of the drug industry and the medical profession. The woman’s health movement was created, in part, out of controversy over the Pill.

Since its introduction, more human beings have swallowed the Pill than any other prescribed medication in the world—neither to cure an illness nor to prevent one. The total number of users has been estimated at more than 100 million worldwide, consuming the Pill by the hundreds of billions. Its use has raised enduring religious and moral issues, while its effects of separating reproduction from the sexual act and giving women control of their own fertility have caused nothing less than a global social revolution.

Leslie Rabkin

See also: Feminism, Second-Wave; Free Love; Sanger, Margaret; Sexual Revolution.

Further Reading

Gordon, Linda. The Moral Property of Women: A History of Birth Control Politics in America. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002.

Kennedy, David M. Birth Control in America: The Career of Margaret Sanger. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Black Arts Movement

The black arts movement (BAM) was the artistic offshoot of the Black Power movement of the late 1960s, the militant effort to establish a political and economic base for blacks independent from that of whites. Paralleling the social activism of the Black Panther Party and other groups, BAM encompassed the fields of literature, art, theater, and dance roughly from 1965 to 1976. It represented an attempt by African American artists to merge a black aesthetic with the spirit of social activism through a rejection of the traditional norms of American art and literature. While it ultimately involved such notable writers as Maya Angelou, Toni Morrison, and Ishmael Reed, the movement extended beyond literary and artistic circles, directly influencing the creation of black studies programs at colleges across the United States.

In a 1968 essay titled "The Black Arts Movement," Larry Neal (the writer and co-editor of the BAM manifesto, Black Fire: An Anthology of Afro-American Writing, 1968) declared BAM an "aesthetic and spiritual sister of the Black Power concept." Although "Black Power!" was a phrase made popular by civil rights activist Stokely Carmichael in 1966, it was the poet LeRoi Jones (later known as Amiri Baraka) who coined the term black arts.

The death of Black Muslim leader Malcolm X in 1965 and the "exodus" of Jones from Manhattan's Lower East Side to Harlem is said to mark the beginning of the black arts movement in America. Jones is perhaps the best-known African American writer of his generation, recognized as a poet, publisher, and music critic and the Obie Award-winning playwright of Dutchman (1964).

Jones's move to Harlem led to the creation of the Black Arts Repertory Theatre/School (BART/S), a collective workshop and performance center for poets, writers, actors, and musicians. Similar organizations included Umbra, a collective of young black writers concentrated on Manhattan's Lower East Side, and the Harlem Writer's Guild. US, a black nationalist group established by Kwanzaa founder Maulana Karenga, and the revolutionary action movement (RAM) were two more organizations instrumental in shaping the ideological goals of the black arts movement.

BAM encompassed the work of pro-activist editors such as Neal; poets such as Nikki Giovanni and Sonia Sanchez; and stage performers and playwrights such as Ron Milner. The journals Black America, Soul Book, and Black Dialogue served as vehicles for the writings of African Americans. A coalition of individuals in various artistic fields, such as LeRoi Jones and actor-producer Barbara Ann Teer, founder of the National Black Theatre, created programs and associations to advance a black aesthetic. Robert MacBeth's New Lafayette Theatre, also in Harlem, served as a forum through which African American culture was put on display specifically to attract white audiences.

Amid a rising conservative backlash in the mid-1970s, along with the decline of civil rights activism and the demise of the Black Power movement, BAM also began to wane. Its demise was further hastened by criticism from black feminists that it was misogynistic and homophobic.

In addition to the creation of a new black aesthetic and a number of notable works, the legacy of the black arts movement includes a greater recognition of the black experience in academic circles and the creation of such influential journals as The Black Scholar and the Journal of Black Poetry.

See also: Baraka, Amiri; Black Power Movement.

Further Reading

Conyers, James L. Civil Rights, Black Arts, and the Black Power Movement in America: A Reflexive Analysis of Social Movements in the United States. New York: Ashgate, 2002.

Smethurst, James Edward. The Black Arts Movement: Literary Nationalism in the 1960s and 1970s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2005.

Van Deburg, William L. New Day in Babylon: The Black Power Movement and American Culture, 1965–1975. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Black Mountain College

Founded in the autumn of 1933 by educator John Andrew Rice, Black Mountain College was an extraordinary experiment in education and communal living near Asheville, North Carolina, close to the village of Black Mountain. Although the school lasted only a little over two decades, it left a strong imprint on modern American art and music.

Rice founded the college with other faculty from Rollins College in Winter Park, Florida, with the intention of creating a new type of educational institution. It would not be bound to stultifying traditions and formality, but devoted to creative collaborations between the arts and humanities, and the human and natural sciences. Rice was an early Rhodes scholar whose experiences of the decentralized residential college system at Oxford University in England may have informed his ideas about how Black Mountain should be structured.

The college was formed as a collective, owned and run by the faculty, with student input into both school governance and the curriculum. All students and faculty ate in a common dining hall, and the members of the community were responsible for maintaining the campus buildings and grounds. The unconventional curriculum disposed of the traditional grading system and allowed students to decide for themselves when they were prepared for the challenging final examinations.

What truly distinguished the college from its inception, however, were the talented faculty and students, who were committed to collaborative learning in this unique environment. Over the years, the faculty included artists Josef and Anni Albers, Willem de Kooning, Fannie Hillsmith, Albert William Levi, and Robert Motherwell; poets Robert Creeley and Charles Olson; composers John Cage and Arnold Schoenberg; conductor Heinrich Jalowetz; choreographer Merce Cunningham; architect Buckminster Fuller; and physicist Theodore Dreier. The rolls of talented students over the years were one of the college's great strengths. They included some of the most important figures in post–World War II American art: Joseph Fiore, Betty Jennerjahn, Ray Johnson, Kenneth Noland, Robert Rauschenberg, Cy Twombly, and Susan Weil.

The instruction and collaboration between faculty and students (learning often flowed in both directions, according to faculty and alumni), as well as the intensive communal environment, made the college “a microcosm of the artistically vital New York scene with the intimacy of summer camp,” according to scholar Martin Brody. The impact of Black Mountain College on the mid-century American avant-garde is evident not only from the artistic products and events produced during the college's life span—such as Cage's "Williams Mix" tape collage (1951), Schoenberg's symposium on twelve-tone music held during the Summer Music Institute of 1944, and the famous yet short-lived literary journal Black Mountain Review—but also in the artistic collaborations and conversations that far outlived the college's formal existence.

Despite its creative vitality, the one area in which the college had long-standing difficulty was finances. After twenty-three years of operation, it was the inability to attract funding or large numbers of students (at its peak, the college enrolled approximately ninety students) that forced the school to close its doors in the autumn of 1956.

Lawrence Jones

See also: Communes; Schools; Alternative and Experimental.

Further Reading

Black Mountain College Museum and Arts Center. <http://www.blackmountaincollege.org>

Duberman, Martin. Black Mountain College: An Exploration in Community. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1972.

Katz, Vincent, ed. Black Mountain College: Experiment in Art. Essays by Martin Brody. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2002.

Black Muslims

Black Muslims are members of the Nation of Islam (NOI), a religious sect with a black nationalist ideology that was founded in 1930s. They have both inspired many in the African American community with their religiosity, self-discipline, and strong ideological convictions and frightened many white Americans with their militancy and hostility toward the nation's dominant white culture.

Origins and Founding Beliefs

In summer 1930, Wallace Fard, a Detroit street peddler of mixed African origin, established the Lost-Found Nation of Islam. Claiming to be a prophet of Allah—he went by a variety of titles, including Wali Farrad, Professor Fard, Farrah Muhammad, F. Muhammad Ali, Wallace Fard Muhammed, and sometimes even Allah—he began preaching an alternative account of human creation. In his version, white people were the work of an ancient mad scientist named Yacub. Fard said whites enslaved the original black people of Earth, whom he called the Tribe of Shabazz, robbing them of their African names and keeping them bound with Christian names.

To free themselves, Fard claimed, blacks had to abandon their Christian monikers and adopt Islamic ones, or use an X to symbolize their lost names. He also suggested combinations of X and other letters to symbolize spiritual rebirth. Fard taught that blacks should engage in businesses that would allow them to achieve financial independence from whites and, in line with traditional Islamic theologians, he held that women were weaker creatures and needed men and the temple to protect them from temptation.

Fard's doctrines differed from orthodox Islamic teachings not just in the creation myth, but also in the emphasis on black nationalism, which he absorbed from the teachings of Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). The UNIA was founded in 1914 as an African American self-help and back-to-Africa movement.

Fard also borrowed a number of ideas from Noble Drew Ali, the founder of the Moorish Science Temple of America in 1913. Noble Drew Ali taught that American blacks were not of Ethiopian origin (as some early black nationalists espoused), but rather Moors from Africa, descendants of the Moabites of Canaan. Finally, Fard used stories from the Bible, the Koran, books on Freemasonry, the teachings of Joseph F. "Judge" Rutherford, leader of the Jehovah's Witnesses, and other sources. Fard's writings include The Secret Ritual for the Nation of Islam and Teaching for the Lost-Found Nation of Islam in a Mathematical Way (dates unknown).

Fard's initial preaching came at an opportune time. By the early 1930s, the Moorish Temple was defunct, and Noble Drew Ali had died. The UNIA was in rapid decline, a victim of federal government harassment, corruption, and financial difficulties. Moreover, African Americans, first to be fired from ever-scarcer jobs, were feeling the brunt of the Great Depression and feeling lost in the urban environments to which many had recently migrated from the rural South.

Fard's message attracted many of the semiliterate, impoverished blacks that the UNIA had served, among them an unemployed factory worker named Elijah Poole. In 1923, the former sharecropper and son of a Baptist preacher had migrated from Georgia to Detroit. After listening to Fard in 1931, Poole came to believe that the preacher was God incarnate, converted to the Nation of Islam, and changed his name to Elijah Muhammad.

At about this time, Fard organized the Fruit of Islam—a body of men trained in religion and self-defense—and the Muslim Girls' Training Class, for elementary school-age girls. The school caused Fard to run afoul of the law, because it was not accredited. After being arrested several times, he mysteriously disappeared in 1934.

Elijah Muhammad took charge of the NOI and moved the headquarters to Chicago, but tensions among several factions prompted him to spend the next seven years traveling across the United States spreading Fard's message. Muhammad ran afoul of the law during World War II, when he recommended that black men not participate in the military unless instructed to do so by Allah. He was convicted and sent to prison in 1942 for conspiracy to commit draft evasion and sedition, and not released until 1946.

The self-proclaimed “Last Messenger of Allah,” Elijah Muhammad, speaking here at the 1961 annual convention of the Nation of Islam, led the movement from 1934 until his death in 1975. After his passing, the Black Muslims split into competing factions. (Frank Scherschel/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

The Malcolm X Era

Despite the nation's prosperity in the late 1940s and early 1950s, many blacks, including veterans, chafed at the continuing racial oppression in America, both north and south of the Mason-Dixon Line. Among the dissatisfied was Malcolm Little, a former petty criminal serving time in a New York prison, where he was introduced to the teachings of the NOI. He converted in 1952, changing his name to Malcolm X.

Charismatic, articulate, self-disciplined, and extraordinarily hardworking, Malcolm X quickly rose through the ranks of the NOI. He also founded and edited the weekly newspaper Muhammad Speaks, which grew to have a circulation of 500,000. By the early 1960s, Malcolm X seemed to challenge Elijah Muhammad himself as the leading public face of the organization.

Malcolm X preached a fiery message of black self-defense and nationalism, including the idea that a “black state” be formed out of several Southern states. Such a message challenged the nonviolent, integrationist ideas of the mainstream civil rights movement and drew a fearful and sometimes angry response from the white mainstream press and public.

It was during this period that Black Muslims entered the larger public consciousness. To many white conservatives, the NOI represented a new black militancy rooted in the hatred of whites and a willingness to use violence to achieve its ends of a separate black nation. To more liberal whites, Black Muslims served as a warning that white racism inevitably produces an angry and violent African American backlash. The sentiment was captured in the title of a widely viewed 1959 CBS television documentary on Malcolm X, The Hate That Hate Produced.

Two developments led to Malcolm X's formal break with the NOI in 1964. First came rumors in 1963 that Muhammad had engaged in sexual affairs with young NOI members, which Malcolm later said Muhammad confirmed to him in private. Second, Malcolm X made a pilgrimage to Mecca in 1964 that opened his mind to the idea that an alliance for social and racial justice could be forged between African Americans and progressive, nonracist whites, refuting the NOI's strict adherence to black nationalism. The trip to Mecca also revealed to him how far from true Islam the message of the NOI had strayed.

Shortly after his return home, Malcom X resigned from the NOI and formed a rival organization known as Muslim Mosque, Inc. Meanwhile, his growing fame was making Muhammad and many of his followers jealous. On February 21, 1965, Malcolm X was assassinated in New York City by three black gunmen who were believed to be associated with the NOI.

Reorganization and New Leadership

Meanwhile, the NOI had begun to lose influence in the black community, as rival and more explicitly political organizations such as the Black Panthers gained appeal with disaffected African Americans. Upon Elijah Muhammad's death in 1975, he was succeeded by his son Wallace Muhammad, who, within two years, had reorganized the NOI as an orthodox Muslim organization, the World Community of al-Islam in the West (WCIW). The changes, especially the downplaying of black nationalist elements, did not suit everyone in the NOI, however, including the leader of the powerful Harlem mosque, Louis Farrakhan (born Eugene Walcott).

A member of the NOI from the age of ten, Farrakhan had initially sided with Malcolm X in the dispute with Elijah Muhammad, but he had turned against Malcolm X when the latter broke with the NOI. Some historians suspect that Farrakhan may have had a hand in Malcolm X's assassination, though there has never been hard evidence to that effect. Shortly after Elijah Muhammad's death, Wallace Muhammad had removed an increasingly disaffected Farrakhan from his Harlem post.

In 1978, Farrakhan, separated from the WCIW, refounded the NOI on more strictly black nationalist terms. While rebuilding the organization, Farrakhan earned a reputation for racist and anti-Semitic utterances. He also made an alliance with Libya's radical leader, Muammar Qaddafi.

In 1995, Farrakhan helped organize one of the largest demonstrations in American history, the Million Man March in Washington, D.C. Its message was one of black male responsibility to family, community, and society. In 2000, Imam Warith Deen Muhammad (formerly Wallace Muhammad) and Farrakhan publicly reconciled at the NOI's annual Saviors' Day convention, which marked the Nation of Islam's seventy-year anniversary in United States.

Andrew J. Waskey and James Ciment

See also: Black Panthers; Garvey, Marcus; Malcolm X; Universal Negro Improvement Association.

Further Reading

Barboza, Steven, ed. American Jihad: Islam after Malcolm X. New York: Doubleday, 1994.

Curtis, Edward E., IV. Islam in Black America: Identity, Liberation, and Difference in African-American Islamic Thought. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2002.

Lincoln, E. Eric. The Black Muslims in America. 3rd ed. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1994.

Malcolm X, with Alex Haley. The Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: Grove, 1965.

Nation of Islam. <http://www.noi.org>

White, Vibert L., Jr. Inside the Nation of Islam: A Historical and Personal Testimony by a Black Muslim. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001.

Black Panthers

A radical black political organization of the 1960s and 1970s, the Black Panther Party (BPP, originally called the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense) was founded in 1966 by activists Huey Newton and Bobby Seale in Oakland, California. Authors of a ten-point program proclaiming “what we want, what we believe,” the BPP founders created a party that would become a national political and cultural phenomenon with chapters in cities such as Seattle, Los Angeles, Kansas City, New Haven, Baltimore, New York, and Chicago.

According to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO), a government campaign to disrupt domestic radical political organizations, the BPP's calls for black militancy constituted one of the major threats to American national security in the 1960s and 1970s. Though the Black Panthers did promulgate the idea of African American armed self-defense against police abuse and brutality, they also were involved in peaceful efforts to alleviate poverty and improve conditions in the largely inner-city neighborhoods in which they functioned.

The Black Panthers, as an autonomous black liberation organization, embodied both the validity of revolutionary black nationalism and the need to forge dynamic multiracial united fronts to fight injustice. Organizing armed community patrols to fight police brutality, breakfast programs for children, independent media, and community health programs, the Panthers for a time forged a socialist ethic of popular self-management through direct action in urban, working-class African American communities, and became an international inspiration toward a free society.

The Panthers were the self-proclaimed children of civil rights activist Malcolm X, the organization of the new political power he had identified, alienated street youth, and prisoners who aspired to redeem themselves through political activism. The BPP was also profoundly influenced by the Chinese Marxist military and political leader Mao Zedong (Mao Tse-tung), anti-imperialist theorist Frantz Fanon, and Robert Williams, a renegade National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) leader who built a popular militia to defend his North Carolina community from the Ku Klux Klan. In addition, the party had links to insurgent national liberation movements and defiant communist regimes in Algeria, China, Cuba, Mozambique, and Vietnam.

The BPP was known for a militaristic media image and the macho cultural ethos personified by Eldridge Cleaver in black beret, leather jacket, and sunglasses. The Panthers' rank and filers, however, were often women holding unsung positions as community organizers. These dynamic activists included Elaine Brown, Safiya Bukhari, Kathleen Cleaver, Ericka Huggins, and Assata Shakur, among others.

In the late 1960s and the 1970s, the BPP was the object of concerted efforts at repression and disruption by local, state, and federal law enforcement. Not a few became political prisoners for their underground military operations and propaganda.

Members of the militant Black Panther Party take to the streets of New York City in 1968 to protest the trial of cofounder Huey Newton for the manslaughter of an Oakland, California, policeman. Newton was found guilty, but the verdict was later overturned. (MPI/Stringer/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Chicago's Fred Hampton and Mark Clark were among the most prominent members killed by police. They were shot in December 1969. The group known as the New York Panther 21 was tried for planning to bomb public places; it was acquitted in 1971. Also that year, "Soledad Brother" and author George Jackson was gunned down by California prison guards. John Huggins and Bunchy Carter of Los Angeles were among the other Black Panthers who became martyrs to the movement. They were killed by a rival black nationalist organization called the United Slaves, led by Maulana Karenga. The conflict between the two groups, according to government documents, had been instigated by the FBI.

Nevertheless, the Panthers were divided internally, both philosophically and organizationally. Especially substantial issues marked the division between East and West Coast chapters. While Newton, Seale, and the Oakland leadership counterposed class struggle to African cultural nationalism, the New York chapter was founded on the Harlem tradition of not seeing these two concepts as mutually exclusive. While some Panthers began to run for office on the Democratic Party ticket as reformers, others formed the Black Liberation Army and began to carry out guerrilla operations against banks and police. Newton's centralization of authority in Oakland and hoarding of funds from sales of the party newspaper also became sources of contention.

The contributions of the BPP to the American counterculture were many, including new terminology (the pejorative "pig" for police and the military); fashion (leather jackets, berets, and dark sunglasses); and image making and propaganda (widely seen posters of Panthers posing with firearms). Liberal white supporters of the Black Panthers engaged in what was called "radical chic" by adopting these cultural accoutrements and convincing themselves, to a greater or lesser degree, that they were in solidarity with underprivileged people in the United States and around the developing world. On a more serious note, the Panthers elevated the place of prisoners and youth in the black freedom struggle of the day.

The BPP has many legacies. Without its activism, many public schools would not have had breakfast programs for children from low-income families. Many Head Start-type early-childhood education programs were initiated, public health clinics were funded and expanded, and traffic lights were installed in urban African American communities. If only out of fear of the BPP's alternative example, the black community developed as an electoral constituency and expanded opportunities for blacks to become middle-class professionals.

Furthermore, the dream of a black, autonomous community free from white supremacy has been passed on through Black Panthers who remain political prisoners and the activists who defend them. These include Shakur, Geronimo Pratt, Sundiata Acoli, and the death-row prisoner Mumia Abu-Jamal.

Matthew Quest

See also: Black Muslims: Black Power Movement: COINTELPRO: Malcolm X: Newton, Huey.

Further Reading

Black Panther Party. <http://www.blackpanther.org>

Churchill, Ward, and Jim Vander Wall. The COINTELPRO Papers: Documents from the FBI's Secret Wars Against Dissent in the United States. Boston: South End, 2002.

Cleaver, Kathleen, and George Katsiaficas, eds. Liberation, Imagination, and the Black Panther Party. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Foner, Phillip S., ed. The Black Panthers Speak. New York: Da Capo, 2002.

Jones, Charles E., ed. The Black Panther Party Reconsidered. Baltimore: Black Classic, 1998.

Ogbar, O.G. Black Power: Radical Politics and African American Identity. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004.

Seale, Bobby. Seize the Time: The Story of the Black Panther Party and Huey P. Newton. New York: Random House, 1970.

Black Power Movement

The Black Power movement was a broadly conceived militant national movement of the late 1960s and early 1970s that sought to redress ongoing social, political, economic, and cultural oppression, marginalization, stigmatization, and victimization of African Americans by the dominant white society. Black Power advocates— informed by the global anticolonial struggles of people of color, dissatisfied with the pace of change in the post– World War II United States, and frustrated by the accommodationist rhetoric of older, more conservative civil rights leaders—turned inward to black communities, black cultures, and African traditions in an attempt to empower themselves.

In 1966, during a voter registration drive in Greenwood, Mississippi, civil rights worker Stokely Carmichael was arrested and jailed. After his release on bail the same evening, Carmichael, who had been arrested more than two dozen times previously, publicly expressed his anger and frustration. Nonviolent acts of civil disobedience, he said, were not working as a means of social protest. Blacks had been “saying freedom for six years without success,” he went on, and the time for change had come. “What we gonna start saying now is Black Power,” he declared. The crowd repeated the slogan, “Black Power!”

The “Black Power!” slogan and culture emerged out of a growing sense of anger and frustration within the black community, especially among young African American civil rights workers and poor urban blacks. Aimed primarily at creating a political, cultural, and economic base independent of that of whites, the Black Power movement directly challenged the integrationist politics of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). Although some white Americans considered the Black Power movement a call for race war, which given the mounting urban violence during the mid-1960s did not seem implausible, young African Americans considered it a logical next step in the ongoing civil rights struggle.

Organized by Huey Newton and Bobby Seale in Oakland, California, in September 1966, the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense (later shortened to the Black Panther Party) was one of the most visible and influential Black Power organizations. The Panthers advocated community service and promoted self-defense for blacks, started a newspaper called The Black Panther: Black Community News Service, instituted a breakfast program for poor children, and wrote the “Black Panther Party Platform and Program” (1966), which they distributed throughout the black community. The platform included, among other things, restitution from the government for generations of slave labor, self-determination for black communities, full employment, and adequate housing.

The Panthers regarded blacks as essentially a colonized people living within the United States, and they considered the police an occupying force within the black community. They sought to mobilize poor and working-class urban blacks in an effort to combat what they considered an oppressive white power structure in the United States and abroad.

The Panthers were not alone. By the end of the 1960s, Black Power groups had emerged in most of the nation's cities, north and south. Students at colleges and universities as diverse as San Francisco State, the University of Mississippi, Columbia University, and Cornell University, and groups ranging from autoworkers to athletes and artists and entertainers all organized under the “Black Power!” slogan. Among the more active organizations were Columbia University's Black Student Congress, the Onyx Society of City College in New York, FMO (For Members Only) of Northwestern University, the Olympic Project for Human Rights, the Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement (DRUM), and the League of Revolutionary Black Workers. In the summer of 1967, more than 1,100 delegates attended the First National Conference on Black Power in Newark, New Jersey.

In the realm of culture, the Black Power movement manifested itself as a search for authentic African-inspired expression that represented a challenge to the aesthetics and ideals of the larger, white-dominated culture, as well as the middle-class, integrationist aspirations of older African Americans. Eschewing the neatly groomed and conformist fashions of mainstream civil rights leaders, Black Power activists wore their hair long and natural in the Afro style and doffed suits for dashikis, colorful flowing shirts that represented an Afrocentric fashion statement. Black Power advocates also adopted more militaristic fashions to better represent their growing sense of being enmeshed in an economic, political, and cultural battle. The ubiquitous black leather jacket and black beret worn by many activists are powerful icons of the late-1960s counterculture.

In descriptions of themselves, Black Power advocates challenged the dominant white society and their own elders by discarding the old-fashioned and condescending term Negro for black or Afro-American, and adopting the expression “Black is beautiful.” In perhaps the most memorable expression of the movement, black track-and-field stars John Carlos and Tommie Smith defiantly raised their fists in the Black Power salute during the playing of the American national anthem at a 1968 Olympic Games award ceremony in Mexico City. The two sprinters were denounced as unpatriotic and even subversive by many white—and some black—leaders.

Infighting and sabotage by the federal government in the form of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO), a government campaign to undermine radical political organizations, ultimately led to the disintegration of the Panthers and other high-profile Black Power groups.

In the end, Black Power activists were not successful in eradicating poverty, segregation, discrimination, and social injustice, nor were they able to bring “power to the people.” They were, however, quite successful in decolonizing the minds of a generation of African Americans who abandoned processed hair and other aspects of white culture and reveled in their blackness.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: Black Panthers: Carmichael, Stokely; Civil Rights Movement: COINTELPRO;

Further Reading

Austin, Algernon. Achieving Blackness: Race, Black Nationalism, and Afrocentrism in the Twentieth Century. New York: New York University Press, 2006.

Carmichael, Stokely, and Charles V. Hamilton. Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America. New York: Random House, 1967.

Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Meier, August, John Bracey, Jr., and Elliot Rudwick. Black Protest in the Sixties. New York: M. Wiener, 1991.

Van Deburg, William. New Day in Babylon: The Black Power Movement and American Culture, 1965–1975. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Blavatsky, Helena (1831–1891)

Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's idiosyncratic distillations of Hinduism and Buddhism are rightly understood as primary source material for occult and alternative religious practice in twentieth-century American culture. As the founder of the Theosophical Society and its esoteric teachings of Theosophy—the study of God or divine wisdom—Madame Blavatsky is credited with introducing the knowledge of Eastern religions to the West, including the ideas of karma (cause and effect) and reincarnation (surviving death and being reborn into a new body).

She was born Helena Petrovna Hahn to an aristocratic Russian family on July 31, 1831 (by the old Russian calendar; August 12 by the modern calendar). At the age of seventeen, she abandoned a brief, unsatisfactory marriage to a government official and entered into a peripatetic life that would take her throughout Europe and eventually, in the summer of 1873, to the United States. As a lifelong devotee of the esoteric, Blavatsky was drawn to U.S. shores by her interest in American spiritualism, then immensely popular.

At the age of forty-two, Blavatsky traveled from Paris to New York. After a year of scraping by, sewing purses and pen wipers, and a brief, unsuccessful flirtation with animal husbandry (a chicken farm), she met her partner and champion, journalist for the New York Daily Graphic Colonel Henry Steel Olcott. They were both at the Eddy farm in Chittenden, Vermont, the center of a then-resurgent American interest in spiritualism. Olcott had been writing a series of articles on Chittenden for the Daily Graphic. Blavatsky was, by this point, long conversant with matters spiritual. She claimed to have been in communication for some twenty years with two Mahatmas—roughly translated, “great souls,” highly evolved beings whose ongoing mission was to oversee the spiritual advancement of individuals and civilizations.

Blavatsky and Olcott took to one another immediately and began a long and by all accounts platonic relationship. In contrast to her brief, ill-advised marriage to fellow exile Michael Betanely (a bigamous relationship since she had not divorced her first husband), Blavatsky's chaste relationship with Olcott was lifelong.

In New York City in 1875, Blavatsky began Isis Unveiled (1877), the text that would reveal to the world the content of her ongoing communication with the Mahatmas; it became the founding text of Theosophy. September of that year saw Blavatsky's establishment of the Theosophical Society, a group devoted to collating and distributing “knowledge of the laws of the universe.”

Failing initially to generate a substantial following stateside, Olcott and Blavatsky left New York for India in December 1878. In Madras (present-day Chennai), the two established the headquarters of what was to become an international movement, leaving the affairs of the U.S. branch of the Theosophical Society to founding secretary William Judge. By 1896, U.S. membership in the organization had reached 6,000.

The turn to the East for spiritual authority constitutes perhaps the fundamental leitmotif of a long countertradition in American religion. That tradition arguably began with the Buddhist leanings of American transcendentalism, but first bore popular fruit with the late-nineteenth-century rise of Theosophy and that of its charismatic leader. The perceived and actual constraints of organized religion, Christianity in particular, are a recurring concern in American counterculture, and the emergence of Theosophy was a key moment in the religious response to those constraints.

Theosophy puts forth a proposition that is central to most New Age religions: All religions and wisdom traditions are fundamentally one, each being a different face presented to the material world by the divine. It was Blavatsky’s self-appointed task to articulate the links among various religious and esoteric traditions, discern their shared roots, and describe their ongoing effects on culture and society. It was a task convened in two central texts, Isis Unveiled, first published in 1877, and The Secret Doctrine, which came out in 1888. Much of the “wisdom” proffered within these texts was ostensibly communicated to Blavatsky by various Mahatmas. Blavatsky is of note as well for the figure she cut as a woman in an overtly sexist Victorian America. Prone to mannish dress and public fits of rage, an avid smoker of tobacco and hashish, she dramatically transgressed the norms of feminine propriety. William James’s Society for Psychical Research captured something of her character in its assessment, published as “Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, Part IX”: “For our own part, we regard her neither as the mouthpiece of hidden seers, nor as a mere vulgar adventuress; we think that she has achieved a title to permanent remembrance as one of the most accomplished, ingenious, and interesting imposters of history.” Blavatsky died in London, England, on May 5, 1891.

To this day, the Theosophical Society has had an immense influence on American occultism and alternative religion; it is estimated that no fewer than forty-six organizations have emerged directly from the original society. This lineage extends to the United Lodge of Theosophists (ULT), the Theosophical Society based in Pasadena, California, and the Theosophical Society based in Adyar, Chennai. The latter organization alone boasts ninety-seven active lodges in the United States.

In addition to Blavatsky’s influence on these and other theosophical organizations, it should be noted that the very language and structure of New Age thought are based in large part on terms and conceptions she created, synthesized, or popularized. Regardless of her spiritual bona fides, the writings of Blavatsky and her followers continue to exert an immense influence on New Age spiritualities into the twenty-first century.

Mark Harrison

See also: New Age: Theosophy.

Further Reading

Blavatsky, H.P. Isis Unveiled: A Master-Key to the Mysteries of Ancient and Modern Science and Theology. Pasadena, CA: Theosophical University Press, 1972.

Blavatsky, H.P. The Secret Doctrine: The Synthesis of Science, Religion, and Philosophy. Pasadena, CA: Theosophical University Press, 1977.

Campbell, Bruce F. Ancient Wisdom Revived: A History of the Theosophical Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.

Bloggers

Weblogs, commonly referred to as blogs, are Internet sites that allow individuals to communicate and share information and opinions—usually in text form—in a virtual environment. Individuals who contribute content to blogs are known as bloggers. Bloggers write personal content that chronicles their lives, comment on current events, and offer opinions on a range of topics. Bloggers are motivated by a desire to share their creativity through personal reflection, to exchange knowledge, or to have their opinions heard. They are able to create blogs using free Internet-based services such as Blogger, Movable Type, or WordPress, which allow anyone interested in taking part to quickly create and distribute content.

Bloggers, as a group, received national and international attention for their coverage of the 2004 presidential election, which went beyond the scope of the mainstream media. During a September 2004 television broadcast by CBS News, anchorman Dan Rather reported on a story regarding President George W. Bush's National Guard record. Shortly after the broadcast, bloggers began posting entries that questioned the authenticity of the documents on which the story relied. The uproar on the part of bloggers led to a more thorough investigation of the matter, which finally led to a retraction and apology on the part of CBS.

Despite widespread criticism of the “blogosphere” (as the world of blogging is known) by the conventional media, this incident demonstrated the power of bloggers to fact-check the reporting of a major national news organization. Bloggers have continued to monitor mainstream media and the way information is disseminated. Blogs such as the Drudge Report (www.drudgereport.com) and the Huffington Post (www.huffingtonpost.com), founded and run by Matt Drudge and Arianna Huffington, respectively, offer a new means of revealing facts and disseminating opinion. The Drudge Report, in fact, was the first source to break the Monica Lewinsky scandal in 1998.

Print publications and television news programs continue to be challenged in the timeliness and accuracy of their reporting by bloggers, who have attracted many readers away from traditional print media or, at the least, provided a supplementary source of news and information. Bloggers build communities of readers around specific news and current events, professions, and recreation activities. As bloggers are able to change the flow of information and challenge the distribution of information from traditional sources, anyone interested in contributing content is able to disseminate his or her point of view.

Blogs can be found on any range of topics based on an individual's interest, from simple journals of daily life to an in-depth focus on a particular subject. A blog called the Counterculture Criteria (http://noise.typepad.com/counterculture_criteria/) seeks to create an environment in which members of the counterculture can communicate freely. ComicMix (www.comicmix.com) is a blog for those whose interests range from comics and graphic novels to video games. It's Getting Hot in Here (<http://itsgettinghotinhere.org>) is focused on providing youth with an outlet for discussing environmental issues.

Even groups traditionally not associated with technology have embraced blogging. Librarians, for example, have become bloggers in large numbers. Sites such as Librarian (www.librarian.net) and the Shifted Librarian (www.theshiftedlibrarian.com) provide a channel for librarians to discuss issues important to them.

As popular bloggers become celebrities based on their blogs, there have been consequences. For example, Kathy Sierra of Creating Passionate Users (http://headrush.typepad.com/creating_passionate_users/), a popular technology-related blog, began receiving death threats in 2007 because she was a high-profile woman in the male-dominated technology field.

The ability for interaction between bloggers and readers has developed a culture in which fact checking is a community responsibility. Even though a blogger is a single individual working at a computer, the software and the Internet environment help create a community of users. Already this new counterculture has had a major influence on the mainstream culture—to the point that blogs have become common in conventional media outlets, such as newspaper, magazine, and television news network Web sites.

Michael LaMagna

See also: Internet.

Further Reading

Kline, David, Daniel Burstein, Arne J. De Keijzer, and Paul Berger. Blog!: How the Newest Media Revolution Is Changing Politics, Business, and Culture. New York: CDS, 2005.

Rodzvilla, John, ed. We've Got Blog: How Weblogs Are Changing Our Culture. Cambridge, MA: Perseus, 2002.

Blue Man Group

Blue Man Group is an innovative performance troupe known for creating unusual stage productions that blend mime, rock music, humor, creative lighting, and audience participation. The trio of performers is easily identified by a blue, gooey greasepaint that covers their exposed skin and latex caps, as well as by their utilitarian dark clothing. In their own words, “Blue Man Group is a creative organization dedicated to creating excitement-generating experiences for our audience and ourselves.”

Formed in the 1980s in New York City by Phil Stanton, Chris Wink, and Matt Goldman, Blue Man Group began with impromptu performances on the street and in the underground cabaret scene, before moving on to full-length, choreographed shows. Common themes in these shows include information, science, and technology. Musical interludes are provided by percussion-based, custom-made instruments that emit interesting and often unusual sounds. Blue Man is an accomplished musical group, with recorded albums and a Grammy nomination to their credit.

Blue Man Group has demonstrated universal appeal, stimulating the senses of young and old alike. Mechanisms for creating unique experiences include improvisation, audience participation, and interaction between performers and audience. Attendees are encouraged to wear casual clothing, for all the activity that may ensue. Shows offer a wide range of sensory stimulation, including lights, sound, confetti, and even water or paint that may splash on the first several rows, otherwise known as the “poncho section.”

Blue Man Group is variously regarded as high brow for its depth of character, humor, and social commentary—information overload is a common theme, demonstrated by multiple scrolling messages—and low brow for its seemingly nonsensical messages, such as paper streamers or confetti dropping from the ceiling.

Early on, Blue Man Group developed a near-cult following for its avant-garde approach. As the creators evolved from street performance to staged performance art and finally to a permanent show at New York's Astor Place Theatre in 1991, they studied vaudeville as a way to push the boundaries of the cultural norm. Differentiation from standard entertainment built a grassroots following largely by word of mouth. Fans often have been described by show reviewers as "faithful" and "devoted."

Far from being a fad, however, Blue Man Group has endured and stayed fresh by remaining innovative and experimental. Its loyal fan base constitutes a kind of subculture in its own right, with members attending performances multiple times and connecting with each other at online and live venues.

Blue Man Group has helped develop its fan base by providing as many opportunities as possible to attend live shows, including long-running theatrical productions based in Boston, Chicago, New York, and London. Larger, more elaborate shows are based in Las Vegas and Berlin. Additionally, Blue Man Group tours extensively throughout the United States in a kind of "rock tour" format. The fan community is further augmented through online message boards on the Blue Man Group Web site, official message postings, chat sessions, a fan club called Blue Man Library, and a podcast, Switchback.

The enduring success of Blue Man Group has demonstrated the appeal in the United States and much of the rest of the world of lighthearted, message-filled, sensory stimulation delivered by nonstereotypical characters that defy categorization or classification.

Todd Anderson

See also: Performance Art.

Further Reading

Blue Man Group. <http://www.blue-man.com>

Blue Man Library. <http://www.blue-man-library.com>

Blues Music

Blues music is characterized by minor-key melodies, slide-and string-bending techniques that fill guitar notes with as much emotion as the human voice, and lyrics that evoke the hardships and impermanence of life, especially as endured by generations of blacks in America.

Culturally, the blues style arose from the confluence of musical forms brought to the American South by slaves from different parts of Africa with the gospel and folk traditions already present. The style further evolved through the confrontation of that music with the harsh conditions of strange landscapes, strange people, and hard physical labor. The cadences of work songs, set to the rhythms of chopping cotton and cutting sugarcane and timber, marked the origin of the blues. The lyrics spoke of hard work in the present, hopes of better days ahead, and relationships good and bad that filled workers' minds as they labored.

Roots

Blues music developed primarily among African Americans in a geographical arc from the pine forests of northern Florida through the wiregrass of Alabama, the dark soil of the Mississippi Delta, the bayous of Louisiana, and west to the Hill Country of Texas, with branches flourishing in the Piedmont of North Carolina and up the Mississippi River through Tennessee and Arkansas. There were variations among regions, with the Delta favoring solo guitarists, New Orleans adding piano and horn, and Texas blues bringing in Western swing rhythms. Across those changes and places, it remained a music that gave first place to emotion and that was based on a mix of African and Western musical heritages.

In the years before World War I, this rural style took a quick swing uptown as Memphis composer W.C. Handy published sheet music for "Memphis Blues" in 1912 and "St. Louis Blues" in 1914. Around the same time, music producer Perry Bradford saw a market for black musicians among black audiences at segregated traveling stage shows. Many of the singers who recorded the so-called theater blues of the prewar era were women who had their first performing experiences in vaudeville. They recorded tunes such as Mamie Smith's "Crazy Blues," often called the first blues hit; Sippie Wallace's "Mighty Tight Woman," a double-entendre tune that reached a new generation decades later through the recordings of white blues woman Bonnie Raitt; and Bessie Smith's classic "T'aint Nobody's Business If I Do."

Down in the Delta, men were singing the blues, too. Charley Patton, who grew up on the Dockery Plantation in central Mississippi, spiced up his live shows with flashy moves, such as playing guitar behind his back and between his legs. But it was his growling, impassioned, almost desperate-sounding vocals that made an impression on contemporaries such as Lightnin' Hopkins, Skip James, and Robert Johnson, as well as musicians of later generations, including Eric Clapton and John Hammond, Jr.

Robert Johnson perhaps most personified the essence of Delta blues and the blues life itself. Johnson made his living as an itinerant musician, playing a range of tunes that would appeal to his audiences in juke joints and clubs in the Deep South. At the time of his death in 1938, at age twenty-seven (under mysterious, perhaps violent, circumstances), he had recorded only twenty-nine songs. Yet Johnson's music proved a legacy so influential that it has affected almost every blues musician, and many who work in other genres, right up to the present day. Delivered in a high, moaning voice backed by fluid, idiosyncratic guitar playing, such songs as "Dust My Broom," "Hell Hound on My Trail," "Terraplane Blues," "Come On in My Kitchen," "Sweet Home Chicago," and "Stones in My Passway" cast a dark light on the lives, lifestyles, and emotions that give rise to the blues.

Post-World War II

When blacks moved to the North after World War II, they took their music with them. In Chicago and other cities, the blues took on an urban outlook in rhythm and lyrics as electric instruments joined the band. What had been primarily a songster-driven music now developed a stronger instrumental dimension with the work of such artists as B.B. King, James Cotton, and, in Texas a generation later, Stevie Ray Vaughan.

Electric blues influenced and merged with rock music, finding outlets and connections in the music of Clapton, the Rolling Stones, and the Doors. The acoustic Delta tradition and its musicians found a home in the folk music revival of the 1960s and the singer-songwriter movement of the 1970s, fueling the work of Raitt, Bob Dylan, Maria Muldaur, and Chris Smither.

Musicians of both rock and folk styles found an authentic reference to the roots of the blues in the extensive field recordings of Southern blues, gospel, and folk music, made by John and Alan Lomax as they traveled across the American South in the 1930s and 1940s, which were issued by the Library of Congress. The Lomaxes had found treasure troves of handed-down blues tunes among the inmates of Southern prisons, especially Parchman Farm (Mississippi State Penitentiary), in conditions not far removed from those of the birth of the blues in slave times.

Traditional blues players of both Chicago and Southern styles also were rediscovered by the folk revival musicians of the 1960s. Several traditional blues players, including John Lee Hooker, Son House, and Mississippi Fred McDowell, saw flourishing careers in their later years with the appreciation of these younger musicians and their audiences.

Despite its mainstream acceptance, blues acquired and nurtured a reputation as music of the back rooms and back roads. Songs about prison life, drug addiction, and murder, forthright and double-entendre songs about sex, and songs lyrically and melodically drenched with emotion identified the music and those who played and listened to it as part of the counterculture rather than the mainstream of society in the twentieth century. It was not nice music, and whether one was deeply or casually involved in it, the blues—especially in its urban settings—was seen as hip, daring, or both. White listeners and players, as well as those who presented blues in their clubs and allowed the races to mingle there, defied long-established social ideas and rules that did not change appreciably until the 1970s.

In the twenty-first century, blues music continues to speak to the human condition with emotion, passion, and humor through the music of artists, black and white. These modern blues musicians include Raitt, King, Smither, Keb' Mo', Marcia Ball, Rory Block, Cyd Cassone, Corey Harris, Taj Mahal, Koko Taylor, and such next-generation artists as John Mayer, Kenny Wayne Shepherd, Shemekia Copeland, Susan Tedeschi, Jonny Lang, and Sean Costello.

Kerry Dexter

See also: Dylan, Bob.

Further Reading

Cohn, Lawrence , ed. Nothing But the Blues: The Music and the Musicians. New York: Abbeville, 1999.

Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: New Press, 2002.

Waterman, Dick. Between Midnight and Day: The Last Unpublished Blues Archive. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 2003.

Body Arts

Body arts are ways of adorning the body for aesthetic rather than functional purposes. The body may be altered temporarily, as in the case of cosmetics or body painting, or permanently, as in the case of tattooing or piercing.

Many cultures around the world have traditions of body arts. There is a long history of body arts in the United States. Members of various Native American cultures painted their bodies for special occasions, tattooed themselves, or sported facial piercings. Body arts became a widespread American phenomenon in the 1980s and 1990s. Prior to that time, body arts among non-Native Americans, especially permanent body modification, were confined to a handful of subcultures.

Tattooing

Prior to European contact, many North American native peoples, including the Ojibwa, Cree, Sioux, Crow, and others, practiced tattooing to ornament the body, to facilitate communication with the spirit world, and to ward off disease. By the mid-1800s, tattooing practices among many Native Americans declined, as their customs changed in response to European infiltration of the New World.

In 1891, Samuel O'Reilly improved upon a machine that had been invented by Thomas Edison and created an electric tattoo machine, which he used in the first tattoo shop in the United States, located in Chatham Square in New York City. Sailors often visited the shop to get pigs or roosters tattooed on their feet as symbols of good luck to prevent drowning; other members of the armed forces asked for military insignias. In the early 1900s, a few men and women tattooed their entire bodies and exhibited themselves in circuses.

As American youth culture and the movement toward free expression began to blossom in the 1950s and 1960s, tattooing was adopted by various countercultural groups. Motorcycle gangs developed a unique style that often included tattoos. A common Latino youth tattoo was a small cross or three dots between the thumb and forefinger as a sign of Latino identity. Prison inmates often engaged in crude forms of tattooing, using handmade equipment and inks. Many American prison tattoos were (and still are) religious in theme or conveyed specific messages. For example, a teardrop tattooed near one eye usually signified that the bearer either had killed someone or had a friend killed in prison.

Today, prison tattoos are common among inmates, and some may be marks of gang affiliation. Other specific subcultures also sport specific tattoos. Members of white supremacist groups typically are tattooed with the initials of the organization to which they belong or with the Nazi swastika. Some college fraternities also encourage members to get a particular tattoo or other body modification.

Proliferation of Forms

Beginning in the 1970s and 1980s, other forms of body art, including piercing, also were adopted by various counterculture groups in the United States. Many members of the punk subculture adopted both tattoos and piercing as a way to set themselves apart from the mainstream. The underground gay subculture began to explore piercing as a form of adornment and a way to mark homosexual identity.

The first professional piercing shop in the United States, the Gauntlet, which opened in San Francisco in 1975, originally catered mainly to a gay clientele. For some, piercing also could be an exploration of sadomasochist sexual activity in the form of "play piercing," in which one person pierces another with needles that are later removed.

Body modification experienced a renaissance in the 1990s, when a new tattoo machine allowed for finer lines, and new inks allowed for more brilliant colors that were less susceptible to fading. In the early 1990s, fashion designer Jean Paul Gaultier exhibited tattooed models on the runway. Rock musicians, sports stars, and other celebrities contributed to the popularity of body modification by publicly exhibiting their own tattoos and piercings.

Tattooing and piercing reached a new level of professionalization with the advent of tattooing and piercing magazines, professional conventions, and licensing laws and health regulations for tattoo and piercing shops. Also, a new way to remove tattoos, using a laser, was much less painful than previous methods and left little scarring. This reduced some peoples' reluctance based on the permanence of tattoos and further increased their use as body art, even among more mainstream groups.

While certain forms of body modification, such as small tattoos or navel piercings, became common by the first decade of the 2000s, more extreme body arts also had developed in the Modern Primitive movement and "neo-tribal" style of body modification. These two trends share an adoption of body art styles and practices from other cultures, such as Inuit, Polynesian, or Maori style tattoos; certain forms of piercing, like a labret pierce through the skin between the chin and lower lip adopted from an Inuit culture; and practices like stretching a hole in the earlobe with a plug borrowed from various African tribes. Modern Primitives, a term taken from a book of the same name published in 1989 that features body modification, indicates extreme body modification practices, such as genital or facial piercing, branding, scarification, and body implants.

Some individuals attempt to transform their entire body into a work of art. The Enigma, a male stage performer tattooed in blue puzzle pieces over the entire surface of his body, is a prime example. Another is Katzen, a musician and tattoo artist who has adorned herself with cat stripes, attempted to modify the shape of her ears to be more catlike, and tried to implant a tail as well.

While the term neo-tribal refers to a more casually adopted style, the Modern Primitive movement involves the most extreme body art, which remains relatively rare, but is practiced by a small core of devotees.

Kim Hewitt

Further Reading

Ebin, Victoria. The Body Decorated. London: Blacker Calmann Cooper, 1979.

Hewitt, Kim. Mutilating the Body: Identity in Blood and Ink. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1997.

Pitts, Victoria L. In the Flesh: The Cultural Politics of Body Modification. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.

Mascia-Lees, Frances E., and Patricia Sharpe, eds. Tattoo, Torture, Mutilation, and Adornment: The Denaturalization of the Body in Culture and Text. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.

Rubin, Arnold. Marks of Civilization: Artistic Transformation of the Human Body. Los Angeles: Museum of Cultural History, University of California, 1988.

Sanders, Clinton. Customizing the Body: The Art and Culture of Tattooing. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.

Bohemianism

The term bohemianism traditionally refers to an attitude of nonconformity and dissent from middle-class and mainstream values, typically expressed through an alternative lifestyle and artistic endeavors. Bohemian culture first emerged among the middle-class youth of Paris in the nineteenth century and was characterized by the supreme valuation of aesthetic pursuits over the strict work ethic that had grown out of the Industrial Revolution. The bohemian lifestyle typically entailed an aloof, detached attitude—or the affectation thereof—toward prevailing cultural norms, as well as voluntary poverty, sexual experimentation, transience, altered states of consciousness through drug use, and the elevation of unrestrained self-expression as an ideal.

Bohemianism thus provided disillusioned Parisian youth with an outlet to express their disapproval of the direction the modern world was taking. The term itself reflects a mistaken belief that Gypsies, in whose lower-class neighborhoods young French artists congregated at the time, came from the Central European region of Bohemia (now part of the Czech Republic). In any event, the lifestyle, attitudes, and artistic inclinations of the early bohemians recurred in subsequent antinomian movements, including the Beat, hippie, and more recent American countercultures.

Bohemian as a descriptive term became prominent after the publication in 1845 of Henri Murger's collection of short stories, Scènes de la Vie de Bohème (Scenes of Bohemian Life), which later inspired Giacomo Puccini's opera La Bohème (1896). Cafés became the focal point of bohemian culture, providing meeting places in which to discuss philosophies of art and existence, creating a community out of a group of people with otherwise loose and tenuous connections to one another.

The Parisian bohemians, as opposed to other countercultural groups, had little interest in direct political action, preferring instead to drop out of society and focus on personal vision and artistic self-expression as the height of meaningful experience. Withdrawing from the practical pursuits of their bourgeois parents, bohemians turned inward, experimenting with substances such as opium, belladonna, and absinthe to find alternatives to the expectations of society.

Strains of Romanticism ran strong in bohemian culture through the valorization of peasant life and a nostalgic yearning to return to a primitive “golden age,” free from the modern industrial mechanism of work and capitalistic social stratification. The later distortions and amplifications of expressionism, Dadaism, and surrealism, as well as the chaotic forcefulness of the poetry of Arthur Rimbaud and Charles-Pierre Baudelaire, reflect a similar resistance to industrial commodification, the new urban landscapes, and the bourgeois class.

The bohemian obsession with the value of aesthetic expression emerged from Romanticism’s focus on intuition and imagination over rational logic and reason. In particular, the writings of philosopher Jean-Jacques Rousseau on the purity of man in his natural state, without the imposition of social conceptions of “good” and “bad,” were highly influential on the disaffected middle-class youths of Paris.

In the early 1900s, the movement spread throughout Europe, manifesting itself in London in the form of the literary Bloomsbury group. Virginia Woolf and E.M. Forster are among the more famous members of that group, which carried on many of the antithetical themes of the Parisian bohemians and previous antinomians, including outspoken pacifism and open sexual experimentation.

In Germany, the Wandervogel, or Roamers, appeared in the mid-twentieth century. They were the disillusioned sons and daughters of the newly prosperous postindustrialization middle-class burghers. They often could be found wandering the countryside, putting on musical and dramatic performances in attempts to align themselves with what they perceived as the simpler, closer-to-nature values of the rural working class. The advent of World War II, however, drastically changed the face of European bohemianism, and many of the ideals and practices of the Wandervogel were put to infamous use by the German Nazi Party.

Early American Bohemian Culture

In the early 1900s in the United States, New York City’s Greenwich Village became the center of American bohemianism. It was a haven for artists, writers, intellectuals, activists, and others who rejected bourgeois values, materialism, and sexual and artistic norms—among them Djuna Barnes, Maxwell Bodenheim, E.E. Cummings, Mabel Dodge, Marcel Duchamp, Max Eastman, Joe Gould, Eugene O’Neill, Jack Reed, Edna St. Vincent Millay, William Carlos Williams, and Thomas Wolfe.

The writer Malcolm Cowley, a member of the so-called Lost Generation, participated in the Greenwich Village scene and wrote that, after World War I, a completely new set of bohemian ideas separated his generation from the one before it. In Exile’s Return: A Literary Odyssey of the 1920s (1951), Cowley summarized the bohemian ideals that were prevalent by 1920, as follows: (1) the idea of salvation by the child, that standardized society and its conventions destroy the gifts of childlike innocence and intuitive wisdom; (2) the importance of self-expression and creativity; (3) living for the moment and not living for the future; (4) the idea of paganism, that the body is a temple in which nothing is unclean, but rather “a shrine to be adorned with the ritual of love”; (5) a strong belief in personal liberty, that any law or convention that prevents full self-expression and enjoyment should be abolished; (6) female equality, that women should be the economic and moral equals of men, and be allowed the same freedom of expression; (7) the idea of psychological adjustment, that people in modern society are unhappy and maladjusted because they are repressed; and, finally, (8) the idea of “changing place,” or the importance of traveling and living in other cultures, and a love of the exotic. These ideas were to reappear in subsequent American countercultural and bohemian movements, and eventually they were diffused throughout American society at large.

Greenwich Village and the Lower East Side in the early 1900s also were hotbeds of a more politically charged form of bohemian subculture. Labor strikes and the rise of unionization entranced the dissatisfied and socially aware youth. Socialism and anarchism began to gain adherents, as pamphlets and magazines poured out of the Village, spurred by the incendiary ideas of people such as Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, who called for an end to the class system, by violent means if necessary. The outbreak of World War I and the aftermath of the Russian Revolution fractured the scene, and eventually much of such sentiments were suffocated beneath tighter government watch and increasing fears of communism.

During the 1920s, a number of American bohemians relocated to Paris, seeking an escape from the political climate at home and a more affordable lifestyle. Meanwhile, given the soaring rents in Greenwich Village and the increasing presence of tourists and poseurs, the bohemian scene there began to decline. Still, Lower Manhattan retained its fair share of nonconformists and avant-garde antinomians, while uptown, bohemian ideas were present in the Harlem Renaissance movement and at salons hosted by the African American arts patron A'Leila Walker.

Bohemianism persisted in other parts of the United States as well, such as the artistic community in Carmel, California. It even had adherents such as train-riding hoboes and drifters, or mobile bohemians (“hobohemians”).

Post-World War II Bohemianism

World War II and the unleashing of American atomic power changed the face of modern bohemia even more drastically. The Beat writers brought a certain nihilism to the bohemian lifestyle and aesthetic sensibility, living between the threat of mass annihilation posed by nuclear proliferation and the empty escapism they saw in mainstream consumerism. The beatniks, as the Beats also were known, sought to live in the continuous and visceral experience of the present moment, searching for spiritual fulfillment, taking cues from Eastern religions, mysticism, French existentialism, and the spontaneous and urgent free-form bebop style of African American jazz musicians such as Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie.

Familiar bohemian trends were central to the Beat lifestyle—antibourgeois attitudes, libertine tendencies, antimaterialism, the physical and spiritual transcendence symbolized by the open road, sexual experimentation in the forms of promiscuity and homosexuality, and the seeking of “ecstatic moments” through the use of drugs such as marijuana, opium, barbiturates, and methamphetamines.

Sprawling, jazz-influenced works of literature such as Jack Kerouac's rambling novel, On the Road (1957), and Allen Ginsberg's extended free-form poem, Howl (1956), romanticized the bohemian spirit in images of poetry readings in coffeehouses, all-night discussions of philosophy and art, and constant, spontaneous motion. The alienated Beats tended to valorize street life and the African American working-class hipster, making use of black slang expressions and the aesthetic freedom of jazz in their own artistic and social endeavors. A more apocalyptic and surrealistic Beat vision was epitomized by the influential novelist William S. Burroughs, whose writings depicted an American society doomed and rotting from within, plagued by evil technology, violence, addiction, consumerism, and paranoia.

From the 1940s to the 1960s, singers Woody Guthrie, Pete Seeger, and others involved in the folk music revival were less nihilistic than the Beats and more politically active, yet they often promoted the bohemian themes of personal liberty, self-expression, social justice and equality, antimaterialism, coffeehouse culture, and a veneration of ordinary people and others who were marginalized in society.

By the tumultuous 1960s, folk music was flourishing (promoted by such up-and-coming young performers as Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Phil Ochs, and others), and hippies replaced the Beats as the primary youth bohemians. Originating among educated middle-class youth in the Haight-Ashbury and Telegraph Avenue districts of San Francisco and Berkeley, California, the hippie ethos can be found in the famous admonition of acid guru Timothy Leary to “Turn on, tune in, drop out.” In response to what they saw as the staid and static values of the older generation, hippies, like the Beats, rejected materialistic and technocratic society.

Often adorned in a bricolage of colorful and fanciful clothing styles, hippies encouraged personal freedom, peace and love, communalism, hedonism, psychedelic spirituality, and alternate modes of perceiving the world in their efforts to discover a more meaningful existence. The sudden availability of LSD was a major influence, as was the use of marijuana and other drugs in the attempt to transform consciousness and gain spiritual insight. Some, like novelist Ken Kesey and his cohorts, the Merry Pranksters, sought to “freak out,” or shock, the mainstream culture into a deeper awareness of existence through “acid tests” and their legendary cross-country bus excursion. Musical acts of the day echoed the psychedelic culture, as rock groups and performers such as the Grateful Dead, Jimi Hendrix, Jefferson Airplane, and the Doors experimented with elaborate studio recording techniques, surreal lyrics, and exotic instrumentation.

Hippies sought a romantic revival and a return to simpler ways of life, often adopting Eastern religions and Native American styles, and eschewing material possessions and traditional sexual constraints as overbearing conformist pressures in larger American society. While embracing bohemian values and often “dropping out” of society, many to communes, hippies also were actively involved in influencing social change, participating in Vietnam War protests, the civil rights movement, and the feminist and environmentalist movements.

Neo-Bohemianism

After the 1960s, as the hippie movement declined in a wash of excessive drug use, fragmentation, and politicization, some commentators declared that American bohemianism was dead. Others argued that bohemia was killed by “yuppies” (young urban professionals) and middle-class, white-collar workers moving into hip neighborhoods such as Greenwich Village, destroying traditional bohemian and artistic communities.

Bohemia did not die, however. It was just displaced, as bohemians created new communities in places where the rent was cheap. In New York City, for example, after Greenwich Village became unaffordable, artists and others moved across town to the East Village, and then to nearby Alphabet City, or Hoboken, New Jersey, or Greenpoint or Williamsburg in Brooklyn.

In the twenty-first century, large communities of bohemians living together in specific urban areas may be in decline because of gentrification, but bohemian ideas continue to be disseminated through zines and the Internet, the reflection of a more diasporic bohemian community that is dispersed across the United States, with networks of bohemians meeting online and exchanging ideas in cyberspace cafés. Bohemian tendencies have persisted in numerous subcultures, including the punk and post-punk movements in their various permutations, as well as in the rave and club culture and post-rave techno-tribalism.

Bohemian values also are evident at alternative events such as the Burning Man Festival, Rainbow Family Gatherings, and other Temporary Autonomous Zones. Bohemian ideas have been kept alive at artistic centers such as the Nuyorican Poets Café in Manhattan and also may be found in varying degrees among New Age travelers, surfers, neo-tribalists, postmodern hoboes, and other subculture groups.

While bohemian ideals may be embraced at a subcultural level, bohemianism as a cultural phenomenon continues to fascinate broader American society. In 1996, Rent, a Broadway reinterpretation of Puccini’s La Bohème, garnered national attention. The popular musical focused on a group of struggling artists, many of them gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgender, living in the East Village and Lower East Side of New York and embracing a bohemian lifestyle in pursuit of their artistic ideals. The image of starving bohemians, willing to sacrifice everything for their art, has an enduring popular appeal.

In the twenty-first century, bohemian ideas pervade American society. These ideas, in diluted form, are widely accepted, especially by the educated class, resulting in the emergence of “bobos”—bourgeois bohemians, a new upper class that combines aspects of bohemianism with capitalist ideology. In fact, some cultural critics argue that bohemian and countercultural values have been completely co-opted by corporate America and have become a central part of capitalist orthodoxy and advertising strategies. From this perspective, the ideas and symbols of bohemian dissent and countercultural rebellion have been appropriated and mass-marketed, then sold back to the public in the form of chic bohemian styles, cool subcultural commodities, and alternative lifestyle products that are irresistible to the “rebellious” consumer.

Bohemian ideas and values have been a central aspect of numerous counterculture movements in the course of American history and have had a significant influence on mainstream culture and consciousness. The death, renewal, commercialization, and transformation of bohemianism will continue to be an object of interest to observers of American culture and neo-bohemians in the years ahead.

Daniel Wojcik and Robert Dobler

See also: Beat Generation: Bebop: East Village, New York City: Folk Music: Greenwich Village, New York City: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco: Harlem Renaissance: Hippies.

Further Reading

Brooks, David. Bobos in Paradise: The New Upper Class and How They Got There. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2000.

Cowley, Malcolm. Exile's Return : A Literary Odyssey of the 1920s. New York: Viking, 1951.

Duncombe, Stephen. Notes From the Underground: Zines and the Politics of Alternative Culture. London and New York: Verso, 1997.

Gitlin, Todd. The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage. New York: Bantam, 1989.

Graña, César, and Marigay Graña, eds. On Bohemia: The Code of the Self-Exiled. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1990.

Wetzsteon, Ross. Republic of Dreams: Greenwich Village, the American Bohemia, 1910–1960. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2007.

Wilson, Elizabeth. Bohemians: The Glamorous Outcasts. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2000.

Bookstores, Alternative

From the 1950s through the 1970s, alternative bookstores served as counterculture centers that attracted political, social justice, environmental, peace, feminist, New Age, and free speech activists. Meccas for all kinds of outsiders, they offered difficult-to-find hardcover titles as well as affordable “pocket books”—paperbacks that were often disdained by “legitimate” bookstore owners (and their patrons), who did not consider them real books.

Independents traded in used books and magazines and were primary sources of underground periodicals such as Rolling Stone, The Village Voice, Zap Comics, The East Village Other, the Berkeley Barb, and the San Francisco Oracle. After offset printing made publishing more affordable, some, like the Eighth Street Bookshop in New York City and City Lights Books in San Francisco, established small presses of their own or launched publications like City Lights' Journal for the Protection of All Beings.

Alternative bookshops were always more than businesses. Their owners generally were activists whose passions ran the gamut from radical politics to opposing censorship, promoting experimental literature and fiction, and encouraging ethnic and local writers through open readings. They employed book lovers, students, and academic dropouts who functioned more like librarians and research assistants than store clerks.

Because music was such an integral part of the counterculture, alternative booksellers often provided performance space, and many sold new and used recordings. In the early 1960s, Jerry Garcia, the vocalist and guitarist of the Grateful Dead, periodically used Kepler's Books in Menlo Park, California, as a rehearsal hall. The surrounding Stanford University community became a counterculture hub in the 1960s and 1970s, with Stewart Brand's Whole Earth Truck Store and the People's Computer Company (an early techie mecca) just blocks from Kepler's (whose owner, Roy Kepler, was imprisoned as a conscientious objector during World War II and later served as executive director of the War Resisters League).

Other stores, like Seattle's Red and Black Books Collective, established in 1973, were run as cooperatives. Like-minded leftists volunteered to work a number of hours each week to keep the enterprise going. An urban phenomenon, counterculture bookstores could be found where rents were cheap—near universities, in immigrant neighborhoods, and in conclaves of poets, writers, and artists.

City Lights, one of the more famous independent enterprises, opened in 1953 at the corner of Broadway and Columbus Avenue in San Francisco's North Beach district. Its founders, artist and poet Lawrence Ferlinghetti and publisher Peter Martin, modeled it after George Whitman's Mistral English Language Bookshop in Paris. Ferlinghetti had discovered Whitman's salon for writers, artists, and free thinkers during World War II. It was initially a competitor of Sylvia Beach's Shakespeare and Company, which closed in 1941 when the Nazis invaded Paris (Whitman later purchased and reopened Shakespeare and Company). Beach had edited and published James Joyce's manuscript Ulysses after established publishers, who considered it obscene, refused to publish it.

Like the Mistral and Shakespeare and Company, City Lights Books became a haven for counterculture Beat poets, including Allen Ginsberg, Michael McClure, Kenneth Rexroth, and Gary Snyder. City Lights Publishers began publishing their work in paperback in 1955. Like Beach, Ferlinghetti was drawn into an obscenity trial, in his case for publishing Ginsberg's Howl and Other Poems in November 1956. Now considered an American classic, Howl caught the attention of censors with its vivid depictions of drug use and homosexuality.

The East Coast's Eighth Street Bookshop, the largest of the independents, was located in New York City's Greenwich Village. Owner Ted Wilentz, who lived upstairs, operated his bookstore like a low-rent literary salon. According to Bill Reed, author of Early Plastic (2000), the store functioned as a "mail drop, social club, post office, loan department, and employment agency for much of New York's literary avant-garde." Like City Lights, it established its own press, Corinth/Totem, in the late 1950s and published several poetry series—including the work of San Francisco poets Gary Snyder and Philip Whalen; Black Mountain poets Robert Creeley and Charles Olson; New York poets Barbara Guest and Frank O'Hara, and black poets LeRoi Jones, Clarence Mayor, Tom Weatherly, and Jay Wright.

In 1964, activist Ed Sanders opened the Peace Eye Bookstore in a former kosher meat market on New York City's Lower East Side. Sanders published Fuck You: A Journal of the Arts, and his shop attracted political satirists, artists, antiwar activists, and musicians. Sanders joined with musician Tuli Kupferberg to form the Fugs, a satirical folk/rock band that performed at Vietnam War protests all over the country.

In 1968, Peace Eye sponsored one of the earliest underground comics-art exhibits, including the works of Robert Crumb and Art Spiegelman. Sanders also threw a memorable book party for yippie leader Abbie Hoffman's Revolution for the Hell of It (1968). As a community service, Peace Eye ran a free neighborhood printing center, which produced flyers, poetry booklets, and newsletters for neighborhood activists and their organizations.

By 1970, approximately 7,000 independent booksellers were operating across the United States. Since 1980, however, they have steadily lost ground to superstore chains, such as Barnes and Noble and Borders, and to Web outlets, such as Amazon.com. With the coming of urban gentrification, many owners were unable to keep up with rent increases and were forced to close. A shift in undergraduate concerns from social and political issues to economics and business also took a toll on the alternative shops, as did the contracts university administrators signed with large bookselling chains to manage their campus bookstores.

By the early twenty-first century, the passion for revolutionary ideas, books, and music that had fed the alternative bookstore culture was in obvious decline, and with it went many of the intellectual community centers they had spawned. As Linda Bubon, the owner of Women and Children First, a long-standing feminist bookstore in Chicago, observed, “There is a struggle going on for public space, something that is desperately needed in a democracy.”

Mary Stanton

See also: Beach, Sylvia; Beat Generation; City Lights Books; Comics, Underground.

Further Reading

Beach, Sylvia. Shakespeare and Company. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.

Braunstein, Peter, and Michael William Doyle. Imagine Nation: The American Counterculture of the 1960s and '70s. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Cody, Pat, and Fred Cody. Cody's Books: The Life and Times of a Berkeley Bookstore, 1956–1977. San Francisco: Chronicle, 1992.

Reed, Bill. Early Plastic. Los Angeles: Cellar Door, 2000.

Boston Marriages

The term Boston marriage refers to a relationship between women who set up a household together, independent of men. Such relationships were most common in New England in the nineteenth century, particularly in conjunction with the community of young women who took advantage of new educational opportunities at such all-women colleges as Vassar, Smith, and Wellesley. The women involved in Boston marriages were not necessarily college educated, but they were likely to challenge the gender norms of their era by being financially independent (either through their own earnings or through family allowances or inheritance), career minded, and a feminist or suffragist.

Some, but not all, of these relationships were romantic or sexual in nature. When they were, the women might exchange rings to symbolize the significance of their relationship, might commit to monogamy, and often owned property jointly, planned vacations and traveled together, and shared family holidays and celebrations.

Boston marriages were typically characterized by affection and intimacy, though the extent to which partners engaged in sexual activity is unclear. These relationships were not necessarily lesbian in the sense in which the word is used today. During this period in American social history, women were understood to have little sexual drive, and the inclination toward same-sex affection or romance was widely regarded as asexual in nature. The view of women as being asexual allowed many women in Boston marriages to have socially accepted relationships that were not suspect for gender or sexual inappropriateness. Affectionate friendships—also called “romantic friendships”—between same-gendered persons were common for both men and women before the twentieth century. After World War I, platonic Boston marriages were arrangements of convenience for many women who had lost their husbands in combat.

The term Boston marriage gained prominence after the publication of Henry James’s novel The Bostonians in 1885, apparently inspired by his sister, Alice James, who shared a Boston marriage with a woman named Katharine Loring. Another noted Boston marriage associated with the literary world was that between Maine writer Sarah Orne Jewett and her companion Anne Fields. Jewett wrote about the dynamics of Boston marriages in her novel Deephaven (1877).

As terminologies, identities, and understandings of same-sex relations expanded, the practice of the Boston marriage began to decline. Later, the emergence of a true lesbian identity and an open lesbian community created new opportunities for women to construct social identities and engage in relationships more suited to their needs and preferences. It is worth noting as well that while Boston marriages were available for women, there was no similar term or construct for the intimate relationships of men.

Daniel Farr

See also: Lesbian Culture.

Further Reading

Freedman, Estelle B. "Boston Marriage, Free Love, and Fictive Kin: Historical Alternatives to Mainstream Marriage." OAH Newsletter 32:3 (August 2004) : 1, 16.

Pryse, Marjorie. "Archives of Female Friendship and the 'Way' Jewett Wrote." New England Quarterly 66:1 (March 1993) : 47–66.

Vicinus, Martha. Intimate Friends: Women Who Loved Women, 1778–1928. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.

Bowery B'hoys and G'hals

The Bowery B'hoys and G'hals were street gangs that inhabited the Lower East Side of New York City primarily in the decades before the American Civil War. "Bowery" is an anglicized version of the Dutch word for farm, and the Bowery remains a prominent thoroughfare that runs through this area of Manhattan, roughly from Chatham Square to Cooper Square.

The spellings of B'hoys and G'hals reflect the Irish pronunciations common to the neighborhood. Shaped by poverty and life on the margins of society, these largely Irish gangs gained an early reputation for crime, violence, and an anarchic spirit. The girls shared with the boys the same streets, criminality, and alienation from genteel culture.

Together, they created a separate slang and fashion that distinguished them from mainstream society. Expressions such as bender (anything great, spectacular), blow out (a feast), corn g'hals (rowdy girls), big bugs (important people), cheese it (quit it, stop it), lam him (beat somebody), shucks (worthless), a brick in one's hat (drunk and hung over), and many others constituted a rich vocabulary that helped identify the Bowery gangs as wild and rebellious youth. There was an active subculture that was the antithesis of mainstream American middle- and upper-class life and society.

Girls dressed in bright, secondhand finery of one-piece dresses with fitted bodices and attached skirts. Corsets were mandatory; undergarments were not. The boys were distinguished by their black frock coats, black stovepipe hats, red shirts, black flared pants, high-heeled calfskin boots, black vests, slicked hair, and muttonchop whiskers. Their entertainment was found in places such as the Bowery Theatre, where they made up enthusiastic and rowdy audiences for the popular blackface minstrel shows of the day.

Streets north of the Five Points slum district attracted other Bowery gangs, who were far from progressive in their politics but equally violent and criminal in the pursuit of their interests. William Poole, also known as Bill the Butcher, became a well-known member of the Bowery B'hoys gang of the 1840s (by this time often referred to as Bowery Boys) and saw himself as a leader of the Republic of the Bowery. His gang battled Irish rivals such as the Dead Rabbits and Tammany Hall, the Democratic Party machine that controlled New York City politics at the time, and promoted the Know-Nothing Party politically. With its anti-Catholic, anti-immigration agenda, the Know-Nothings profited from the wave of Irish immigration in the late 1840s. In later years, the Bowery youth gangs contributed to such violent social upheavals as the New York draft riots of 1863—a series of revolts over federal legislation to draft men to fight in the Civil War—which provided an excuse for settling grievances, real or imagined.

The Bowery B'hoys and G'hals proved to be useful tools in the struggle for political control of New York City. The gangs resorted to intimidation to muster votes on behalf of their preferred candidates. When granted leadership roles by politicians such as Irish-born U.S. Representative Mike Walsh, they could even exert pressure on the city's establishment.

These were turbulent times in American history, and the rough-and-tumble streets fed an emerging working-class radicalism that sought to expand the concept of equality on many different levels. To some historians, the Bowery gangs symbolized an early form of class consciousness, expressed as political struggles between the haves and have-nots. At times, the gangs professed a progressive political agenda, tinged by criminal instincts, that had an impact on poets such as Walt Whitman but caused uneasiness, at best, among many in the general public. The Bowery gangs also inspired such writers as Herbert Asbury, whose interest in crime and transgression inspired a novel titled The Gangs of New York in (1928).

The tradition of the Bowery gang gained new popularity during the Great Depression of the 1930s, largely through Sidney Kingsley's Broadway play Dead End (1935), which dramatized the relationship between slum life and crime. The Depression made poverty a pressing reality and focus of social action for millions of Americans. This was particularly the case for Kingsley and other members of the Group Theatre movement who held left-wing views. Such politics would later place many members of this group on the Communist blacklist after World War II.

The Dead End Boys or Bowery Boys format later became a Hollywood entertainment phenomenon, with nearly 100 films released in twenty years. In most cases, the most subversive and countercultural elements of the original Bowery B'hoys and G'hals had been sanitized for public consumption. But some contemporary films such as Gangs of New York (2002), directed by Martin Scorsese, have re-created the nineteenth-century atmosphere in which the Bowery gangs flourished, the rough edge of street life revealing the sometimes deadly mix of power and politics on the streets of New York.

To modern historians, the Bowery B'hoys and G'hals represent America's first youth counterculture that was as provocative as the hip-hop culture of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. Theirs was a vulgar, threatening, and often violent presence in the overcrowded streets and tenements of Lower Manhattan. The gangs reflected the rapid growth of New York City in the mid-nineteenth century and the many social problems that came with it.

Theodore W. Eversole

See also: Gangs and Gang Culture.

Further Reading

Adams, Peter. The Bowery Boys: Street Corner Radicals and the Politics of Rebellion. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2005.

DiGirolamo, Vincent. "Such Were the B'hoys." Radical History Review 90 (2004) : 123–41.

Hayes, David, and Brent Walker. The Films of the Bowery Boys: A Pictorial History of the Dead End Kids. New York: Citadel, 1987.

Getz, Leonard. From Broadway to the Bowery: A History and Filmography of the Dead End Kids, Little Tough Guys, East Side Kids and the Bowery Boys Films. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2006.

Sante, Luc. Low Life: Lures and Snares of Old New York. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2003.

Bowie, David (1947–)

British rock musician David Bowie rose to prominence in the late stages of the British Invasion of the 1960s and early 1970s, during which a number of musical artists from the United Kingdom—from the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, and the Who to Led Zeppelin, Pink Floyd, and Bowie—attained major commercial success in the United States. Bowie, like other British rock artists of the period, drew from sources such as African American music and Eastern religions that were outside the cultural mainstream of Europe and North America to inspire counterculture trends in music, fashion, and lifestyle.

Innovative British rock star and actor David Bowie epitomized the glam rock culture of the early 1970s with his transgender personae, carnivalesque live performances, and intergalactic themes. (Terry O'Neill/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Born David Robert Hayward Jones on January 8, 1947, he spent his childhood in the Brixton section of London, England, and in nearby Kent, where he studied music and drama and developed a reputation for fighting and delinquency. He began singing with various blues bands in the London area, using the name David Jones in the mid-1960s and later adopting the stage name David Bowie to avoid confusion with Monkees singer Davy Jones.

Although he released an eponymous first album in 1967 and wrote songs for other artists, Bowie failed to attract a large audience until the release of the single "Space Oddity" in 1969 brought him a measure of fame in Great Britain. The following year, he abandoned the acoustic folk-influenced style that characterized his previous work for a harder-edged style featuring guitarist Mick Ronson, with whom he would work for the bulk of the 1970s. Bowie's collaborations with Ronson differed from other hard-rock music of the era by incorporating theatrical and literary elements into his compositions and stage performances.

Like many of his contemporaries, Bowie embraced several countercultural phenomena during his early career, from the mod subculture of mid-1960s England to the cocaine-fueled disco craze of 1970s America. Yet he is most closely identified with the glam rock movement of the early 1970s, which was characterized by ambiguous sexual imagery, hard drug use, and elaborately theatrical live performances.

Bowie and other male glam performers often appeared in public wearing makeup and women's clothing, and Bowie claimed in interviews to be bisexual (although he later denied these claims). By distorting traditional gender roles, glam rock presented a direct challenge to the cultural norms that had prompted adverse reactions to earlier counterculture male fashion statements, such as long hair and sandals, that traditionalists viewed as effeminate.

The flamboyant clothing and costumes of glam rockers also echoed the excessive personal behavior in which many, including Bowie, engaged. His drug use and eccentricity became legendary during this period, but his work remained popular and critically acclaimed. His 1972 album, The Rise and Fall of Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars, is considered one of the most influential glam rock recordings and one of the best rock albums of the 1970s. Diamond Dogs (1974) and Young Americans (1975), including the hit single "Fame," were other major recordings of this period.

Bowie remained active as a recording artist for the remainder of the twentieth century, garnering critical acclaim and popular notoriety with such hit recordings as the album Let's Dance (1983). He also drew praise for his work as an actor, music-video director, and record producer. His work and public persona gained increasing respectability, as it was introduced to audiences of various ages and backgrounds.

By the end of the twentieth century, Bowie had become part of the cultural mainstream as a respected "elder statesman" in the world of popular music. Artists considered outside the cultural mainstream, however, have continued to cite his work as an influence.

Michael H. Burchett

See also: Glam Rock.

Further Reading

Buckley, David. Strange Fascination: David Bowie: The Definitive Story. London: Virgin Books, 2001.

Rock, Mick. Glam! An Eyewitness Account. London: Vision on Publishing, 2006.

Tremlett, George. David Bowie: Living on the Brink. New York: Carroll and Graf, 1997.

Branch Davidians

The Branch Davidians are a small, loosely organized religious group whose teachings strongly reflect American fundamentalist Protestant apocalypticism. They believe that people live in the violent, final period of history, soon to be ended in a great apocalypse by God. One congregation of this group received an inordinate amount of public attention in February 1993. Investigation of charges of weapons stockpiling and child abuse caused the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to raid the congregation's compound in Waco, Texas. Its members, under the ardent minister David Koresh, offered armed resistance. The result was a standoff and siege that lasted fifty-one days. The siege ended in a massive show of government force, resulting in a near-total burning of the compound and more than eighty deaths, mostly of Branch Davidians, including women and children.

Government representatives claimed that the fire was an accident and that there was credible evidence that at least some of the inhabitants died by gunshots from within the group itself. Nevertheless, the "Siege at Waco" quickly became a potent symbol of resistance against government power in many circles of the right-wing American counterculture.

Branch Davidian history is rooted in the large Protestant denomination known as Seventh-Day Adventists (SDA). Although the SDA denomination itself began as an apocalyptic movement in the nineteenth century, it has since more or less joined the mainstream of American Protestantism. For this reason, it periodically produces so-called reformers who claim that the denomination has strayed from, and needs to be called back to, God's truth. Schisms often are the result of such reformers' work.

One such split, occurring in the 1930s, produced the Davidian Seventh-Day Adventists, who understood themselves to be in the vanguard of reestablishing the biblical Davidian Kingdom on earth as a prelude to the apocalypse. The Branch Davidians were the result of a schism within the Davidians themselves. Although the countless splits and schisms among American fundamentalist Protestants focus on theological and doctrinal issues, they result as much from issues of personality, social class, and the intergenerational struggle for leadership control. Such also was the case with the Branch Davidian schism.

The tragic events associated with the Siege at Waco appear in retrospect to represent a textbook case of what not to do in dealing with a countercultural group such as the Branch Davidians. Primed by their readings of biblical prophecy to expect nothing but oppression, persecution, and subterfuge from the government, the Branch Davidians interpreted every attempt on the part of federal agents to negotiate as trickery.

Furthermore, convinced that a violent battle between the forces of good and evil is inevitable, and that any such confrontation could be the spark that prompts God to bring history to its conclusion, the Branch Davidian negotiators were much less panicked by facing superior force than government negotiators thought they would be. At a number of points during the siege, negotiators were literally speaking different languages: that of rational, cost/benefit calculation on one side versus emotion-soaked prophetic poetry on the other side.

The congregation at Waco was only nominally supported by other Branch Davidian congregations. Disputes between Waco's Koresh and other ministers already had alienated this congregation from others in the sect. Members of these congregations have subsequently made claim to the Waco property and removed all traces of monuments there to the leadership of Koresh.

See also: Cults.

Further Reading

Newport, Kenneth G.C. The Branch Davidians of Waco: The History and Beliefs of an Apocalyptic Sect. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Tabor, James D., and Eugene V. Gallagher. Why Waco? Cults and the Battle for Religious Freedom in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Wright, Stuart A. Armageddon in Waco: Critical Perspectives on the Branch Davidian Conflict. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

Brando, Marlon (1924–2004)

Marlon Brando was an American actor whose work on stage and screen over the course of more than fifty years forged a new direction in the craft and was acclaimed by critics and the viewing public alike. Trained in method acting—whereby the actor attempts to enter the thoughts, feelings, and psychological condition of the character being portrayed—Brando became the leading proponent of a new, more naturalistic form of drama that resonated with post–World War II audiences. His sex appeal broadened the limits of what was permissible on Broadway and in mainstream movies, and the conduct of his private life contributed to an image of independence and rebelliousness. He rebelled against then-prevalent social norms concerning married life, tormented studio heads and producers with demands calculated to offend them, and dedicated significant time and energy to social activism. The civil rights movement, Indian fishing rights conflicts, and capital punishment were among the issues to which he committed his time and money. His activities on behalf of social causes included marching outside the prison where convicted rapist Caryl Chessman was executed in 1960, and joining Native Americans in a number of acts of civil disobedience.

He was born on April 3, 1924, in Omaha, Nebraska, to Marlon Brando, Sr., an accountant and businessman, and Dorothy Pennebaker, a housewife with artistic aspirations. Brando was a troubled student, in part a consequence of his mother's alcoholism and marital problems between his parents, which culminated in their divorce when he was eleven. After the end of his secondary education in 1943, Brando followed his older sister Jocelyn to New York, where she was an aspiring actress.

In New York, Brando became a student of the Stanislavski system of acting, which emphasized emotional honesty and the use of personal memories to evoke it, a method advanced by drama teacher Stella Adler. Within a short time, Brando was earning parts in a variety of plays and attracting the attention of writers and producers. It was his appearance in Tennessee Williams's 1947 play A Streetcar Named Desire that secured his fame and the place of method acting in American drama.

Moving on to Hollywood, Brando made some forty feature films during the course of his career, including one he directed, the “anti-western” One-Eyed Jacks (1961). A succession of hits followed the film version of Streetcar in 1951 (for which he won his first Academy Award nomination), including Viva Zapata! (1952), about the Mexican revolutionary Emiliano Zapata; The Wild One (1953), about a biker gang; and On the Waterfront (1954), about corruption in New York's dockworker unions.

Resisting the public adulation that came with film success, Brando stayed out of the limelight and consistently made films that reflected his politics. He won two Academy Awards for Best Actor during his career, one for On the Waterfront and one for The Godfather (1972). In a widely publicized snub of Hollywood, he sent an actress posing as an Indian to accept his Oscar for The Godfather. The gesture served two purposes for Brando: to mock what he regarded as the artificiality of the ceremony and to provide a national forum to decry the treatment of Native Americans.

The Godfather and the acclaimed Last Tango in Paris (1972) ended an artistic dry spell for Brando that had lasted through the 1960s; during that time, he had appeared in many films that critics deemed beneath his talent (generally comedies, thrillers, and westerns). When he did accept a role, his reasons usually were based on the politics of the film or the filmmakers. When he agreed to media interviews, it was under the condition that he could devote as much time as he wanted to promoting his cause. Indeed, he had to fight to win the role for which he is best known, of Don Corleone in The Godfather.

Capitalizing on his renewed fame, Brando asked exorbitant prices for subsequent films—including Superman (1978) and Apocalypse Now (1979)—but he continued to prefer works that reflected his political concerns. Among these were The Formula (1980), a film about the oil industry, and A Dry White Season (1989), an anti-apartheid film.

Brando's later years were rife with personal tragedy. He was married four times and acknowledged eight children; three more were adopted. One son served time in prison for shooting his half-sister's boyfriend, and that daughter later committed suicide.

After years of battling obesity, Marlon Brando died of respiratory failure in Los Angeles on July 1, 2004.

D.K. Holm

See also: Film, Hollywood.

Further Reading

Brando, Marlon. Songs My Mother Taught Me. New York: Random House, 1994.

Manso, Peter. Brando: The Biography. New York: Hyperion, 1994.

Schickel, Richard. Marlon Brando: A Life in Our Times. New York: Atheneum, 1991.

Thomson, David. Marlon Brando. New York: DK, 2003.

Brautigan, Richard (1935–1984)

Richard Brautigan was an American novelist and poet whose style developed during the final years of the Beat Generation of writers and the formative years of the hippie movement.

He was born on January 30, 1935, in Tacoma, Washington. He never knew his father; his parents divorced before his birth and his mother raised the boy in the Pacific Northwest. Following a childhood marked by abuse and abandonment, Brautigan was briefly confined to a mental hospital after throwing a rock through a police station window in 1955. He moved to San Francisco the following year, where he married Virginia Adler in 1957. They had a child, Ianthe Brautigan, in 1960 and divorced in 1970.

In San Francisco, Brautigan became involved with the city's growing counterculture movement. He read poetry at rock concerts and helped publish underground newspapers with the Diggers, a street theater and social activism group whose sociopolitical agenda incorporated theater and New Left, antiwar, civil rights, and anticapitalist themes. During this time, Brautigan also developed friendships with a number of Beat authors, including Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Allen Ginsberg, and Michael McClure.

Brautigan published his first poem in late 1956. Two collections of poetry followed, The Galilee Hitchhiker (1958) and Lay the Marble Tea (1959), both of which were published by small presses, and neither of which was critically acclaimed. Brautigan's first novel, A Confederate General from Big Sur (1964), is in part about an agreement between the narrator and a drifter to believe in a Confederate general who is not mentioned in any history books. The novel blends a comic sensibility with cynicism, deals with the loss of innocence and idealism, and uses the sparse language and vivid, metaphorical imagery, themes, and styles Brautigan would employ in subsequent works.

Trout Fishing in America (1967) was Brautigan's next published work, although it was written in 1960, before A Confederate General from Big Sur. The novel Trout Fishing criticized American capitalism for its commercialization of the environment, which frustrated the narrator's desire for an authentic relationship with nature, and robbed its characters of the benefits such a relationship would inspire. Readers in the hippie movement were highly receptive to this message, and the book was widely reprinted in 1969, making Brautigan one of the most popular of the 1960s counterculture authors. The book went on to sell 2 million copies, and several hippie communes named themselves after it. In the spring of 1967, Brautigan was appointed poet-in-residence at the California Institute of Technology.

Despite his popularity among counterculture readers, Brautigan became increasingly disillusioned with many countercultural ideals, especially those of the hippie movement, though he continued to consider mainstream America an unsuitable alternative. His third novel, In Watermelon Sugar (1968), reflects this development, describing life in an idyllic pastoral commune called iDEATH, whose maintenance depends on a denial of identity, emotional attachment, history, and intellectual development. The work also critiqued the hippies' idealized vision of nature, one that Brautigan had himself seemed to share in earlier works.

After 1970, Brautigan continued to write, although his popularity declined with the waning of the hippie counterculture, and his work became increasingly unpopular with literary critics. Later books include the novels The Abortion (1971), The Hawkline Monster (1974), Willard and His Bowling Trophies (1975), Sombrero Fallout (1976), Dreaming of Babylon (1977), The Tokyo-Montana Express (1980), and So the Wind Won't Blow It All Away (1982), as well as four books of poetry and Revenge of the Lawn (1971), a short-story collection.

By the early 1980s, Brautigan was struggling with depression and living alone in Bolinas, California. On October 25, 1984, he was found dead in his home of a self-inflicted shotgun wound.

Skylar M. Harris

See also: Beat Generation.

Further Reading

Abbot, Keith. Downstream from Trout Fishing in America: A Memoir of Richard Brautigan. Santa Barbara, CA: Capra, 1989.

Brautigan, Ianthe. You Can't Catch Death: A Daughter's Memoir. New York: St. Martin's, 2000.

Brisbane, Albert (1809–1890)

Albert Brisbane was the leading American disciple of Charles Fourier, a French utopian socialist whose scheme for social reform was based on the concept of small cooperative communities, or phalanxes.

Born on August 22, 1809, in Batavia, New York, the son of James Brisbane, a wealthy landowner, and Mary (Stevens) Brisbane, he was educated at home and in a local schoolhouse. He attended boarding school for two years in Flushing, New York, and then embarked in May 1828 on a six-year tour of Europe.

He studied first at the Sorbonne in Paris, with the philosopher Victor Cousin, and then went to Berlin to study with Georg Wilhelm Hegel in 1829. After further travel in Europe, Brisbane returned to Paris, where he encountered the teachings of Henri de Saint-Simon, a utopian socialist who had died in 1825. Brisbane took the message of Saint-Simonianism to Berlin in late 1831, and there read Charles Fourier's Traité de l'association domestique agricole (1822). He returned to Paris in 1832 specifically to study with Fourier and, over the next two years, developed his ideas alongside other Fourierist disciples.

Brisbane returned the United States in 1834 with the goal of establishing a model phalanx, but his effort was preempted by poor health and the economic upheaval of 1837. Dedicating himself to spreading the word about Fourier to American audiences, he published Social Destiny of Man (1840), a condensed version of Fourier's philosophy that advocated a revamped model of the concept of the phalanx. Brisbane also lectured in several cities, where he helped establish Fourier clubs.

He found an influential advocate in Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, who agreed to run a daily column by Brisbane on associationism (the psychological theory that mental processes follow a sequence of increasingly complex ideas, in a kind of stream of consciousness, accordingly to certain laws of association). The column ran from March 1842 to September 1843, with a compilation published in book form as Association; or, A Concise Exposition of the Practical Part of Fourier's Social Science (1843). That same year, Brisbane also began the Phalanx, the official organ of the Fourier movement, which ran for two years.

Beyond propaganda, Brisbane continued his attempts to establish phalanxes in America. His most notable effort was in the conversion of Brook Farm, the transcendentalist community in Massachusetts, to Fourierist beliefs in 1845. The most enduring community was the North American Phalanx in Red Bank, New Jersey, which Brisbane helped to organize in 1843 and which lasted until 1855. Other phalanxes were established in Michigan, Wisconsin, and elsewhere, while other utopian communities of the period adopted Fourierism briefly. By the late 1840s, the movement had lost much of its momentum.

Brisbane moved to other pursuits, including travel, music, and astronomy, although he continued to champion the Fourierist philosophy for the rest of his life. And while Fourierism never found a strong foothold in America, it served as a catalyst for other reform movements, including abolitionism, women's rights, free love, and individualism.

In his later years, Brisbane turned to inventing; among his notable innovations were pneumatic tubes for road transportation, improved ship propellers, and enhancements to underground fertilization systems. He continued to travel extensively and died on May 1, 1890, in Richmond, Virginia, while touring the United States.

See also: Communes: Transcendentalism: Utopianism.

Further Reading

Brisbane, Redelia Bates. Albert Brisbane: A Mental Biography, with a Character Study. New York: B. Franklin, 1969.

Guarneri, Carl J. The Utopian Alternative: Fourierism in Nineteenth-Century America. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1991.

Broadside

Homespun and informally produced, Broadside was the influential and often controversial magazine of the 1960s folk revival published in New York City by musician Agnes “Sis” Cunningham and her husband, writer Gordon Friesen. Early editions provided a creative outlet for California-based activist and musician Malvina Reynolds, an up-and-coming Bob Dylan, and other urgent, if less-known, voices. Broadside would make a home for the political and social observations of Eric Andersen, Phil Ochs, Tom Paxton, Pete Seeger, Lucinda Williams, and many other leading lights.

The first issue appeared in the winter of 1962, and publication continued intermittently for the next twenty-six years. A new version appeared in 1982 and remained in print until the latter part of the decade. The simple, mimeographed pages of the original Broadside featured topical songs considered too strong for commercial music outlets or the mainstream press, many of them agitprop (agitation-propaganda) compositions about the civil rights movement.

A desire to share and disseminate music on timely subjects, especially protest songs, motivated Cunningham and Friesen to start the publication in a corner of their living room on an old printer donated by the American Labor Party. Both were left-wing political activists who had relocated to New York from their native Oklahoma in the 1940s. With a commitment to music and a passion for left-of-center social and political issues, they saw the power of topical songs to move people but observed that the major music publications of the day were not presenting them. Thus Broadside was born, initially as an outgrowth of jam sessions and conversations among like-minded musicians in Cunningham and Friesen’s home.

The couple chose the name Broadside after the colonial-era publications that distributed topical ballads, stories, and scandals on single printed sheets. It was a quick, populist method for getting out the news in the days before mass newspapers.

In the early days of Broadside, lyric writers addressed such issues as the threat posed by nuclear stockpiling during the cold war, racial discrimination, and the Vietnam War. Songs appearing in the magazine included such antiwar anthems as Dylan’s “Blowin’ in the Wind” and Seeger’s “Waist Deep in the Big Muddy,” and Len Chandler’s civil rights–based lament “I’m Goin’ to Get My Baby Out of Jail.” The publication became required reading for musicians of the American counterculture and anyone interested in cutting-edge, non-mainstream composition.

In the 1970s and 1980s, the pages of Broadside were filled with lyrics that commented on a new set of issues, especially gender discrimination, environmental concerns, and other wars. It remained a shoestring venture for Cunningham and Friesen, however, and problems of health and finances forced them to cut the issues back from twice-monthly to twice-yearly publication by the mid-1970s. Cunningham and Friesen gave up control of the publication in the early 1980s, but regained it as part of an eight-person collective in 1987 and continued publication until the end of the following year.

Kerry Dexter

See also: Dylan, Bob: Folk Music; Seeger, Pete.

Further Reading

Best of Broadside 1962–1988. Smithsonian Folkways. Five-disc set with essay booklet.

Groce, Nancy. New York: Songs of the City. New York: Billboard/Watson-Guptill, 1999.

Brook Farm

The Harvard College graduate and former Unitarian minister George Ripley purchased property in West Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1840. The following year, with his wife, Sophia, his sister, and fifteen others, Ripley founded the transcendentalist utopian commune Brook Farm.

Ripley's vision of heaven on earth centered on the establishment of this community based on social reform. The community was dedicated to the abolition of slavery and class distinctions and the establishment of equal education and economic rights for all. Brook Farm's members signed Articles of Association and formed a joint-stock company officially known as the Brook Farm Institute of Agriculture and Education. Each share entitled the owner to voting rights and granted the privilege of educating one child within the facilities.

The most eminent of the early members were writer Nathaniel Hawthorne and painter Sophia Peabody, who later became Hawthorne's wife. Brook Farm soon became an intellectual and cultural retreat for many prominent New England literati who embraced transcendentalism, including Ralph Waldo Emerson, Margaret Fuller, and Henry David Thoreau. Although Hawthorne and Peabody did not remain at Brook Farm for an extended period, Hawthorne depicted a fictionalized version of socialist life at the commune in his novel The Blithedale Romance (1852).

The transcendentalist movement of mid-nineteenth-century New England emerged in opposition to doctrines espoused by the established religious authorities, most notably those of Unitarianism as taught at Harvard Divinity School. According to transcendentalist principles, the individual is an extension of the universal spirit and should be able to live harmoniously and humanely with others by freely following the moral authority of his or her own conscience. At its core, transcendentalism promoted the belief that one's ideal spiritual state transcends one's physical self, so that true harmony is attained through the merging of mind, body, and spirit.

Ripley originally envisioned Brook Farm as a successful agricultural venture, with the members working the land to offset the price of their room and board. Those who did not labor were charged a fee of $4 per week to live on the property. In keeping with the transcendentalist principles, physical labor was considered essential to the ideal of achieving a balance of good physical, mental, and spiritual health. There was, however, an attempt to make the jobs as interesting as possible. For example, reading stands were attached to the ironing boards, enabling one to read while ironing. Variety also was recognized as crucial to success, and members regularly changed duties in an effort to avoid tedium and boredom.

The property in West Roxbury, which is now within the city limits of Boston, was situated on sandy, gravelly soil and was not conducive to planting crops, but it could support a dairy farm. In addition to agricultural pursuits, members labored primarily as carpenters and cobblers. The manufacture of small household items, such as lamps and coffee pots, as well as the establishment of a small printing business, were other business pursuits at Brook Farm.

During its operation, from 1841 to 1847, Brook Farm grew to include 208 acres (84 hectares) and housed more than 120 members. The community purchased additional houses and built dormitories to complement the original farmhouse, which was referred to as "The Hive," and served as a community house where meals were shared. A workshop measuring 60 feet (18 meters) by 40 feet (12 meters) and a large greenhouse were erected by the members as well.

It was the establishment of the educational enterprise, which included schools at all levels from primary to college preparatory, that proved to be Brook Farm's most notable and financially profitable achievement. With a faculty composed entirely of Harvard and Radcliffe graduates, the Brook Farm Institute was celebrated as one of the finest boarding schools in New England. Harvard recommended the school and its curriculum to students preparing to enroll in the college.

Over time, the community became inspired by the socialist teachings of Charles Fourier, a French scholar who espoused the view that human nature, though basically noble, is corrupted by commerce, and that harmonious communal living will liberate humankind from this corruption. On May 3, 1845, Brook Farm was reorganized into a Fourierist commune and renamed Brook Farm Phalanx. (Phalanx was the term Fourier used for commune.) Ripley began publishing a weekly magazine, The Harbinger, committed to addressing social and political issues, and it became recognized as the official U.S. Fourierist publication.

Although financial difficulties were escalating, the Brook Farm association agreed to undertake the construction of a phalanstery, an enormous house to accommodate the entire community of 120. This impressive structure was to symbolize a new beginning for the community, and it was hoped that it would attract new members with additional resources to the community. Unfortunately, as soon as the building was constructed, it caught on fire and burned to the ground. Because it was not yet insured, the structure was a total loss. Instead of representing a new beginning, the charred remains of the building came to symbolize the broken spirit of the membership. Within a few months of the tragedy, only thirty members remained.

In an attempt to raise capital, Ripley sold at auction several hundred volumes from his library, which was considered one of the finest personal collections in the United States. Brook Farm still could not recover financially, however, and bankruptcy proceedings were completed in 1847.

During the American Civil War, the state of Massachusetts used the land as a training camp for Union soldiers. In 1870, the property was purchased by the Association of the Evangelical Lutheran Church for Works of Mercy, which established an orphanage there, known as the Martin Luther Orphan Home.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Brisbane, Albert; Communes; Emerson, Ralph Waldo; Fuller, Margaret; Ripley, George.

Further Reading

Delano, Sterling F. Brook Farm: The Dark Side of Utopia. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 2004.

Brown, H. Rap (1943–)

H. Rap Brown's varied and eventful life as a civil rights activist, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC; a direct-action civil rights organization of the 1960s), justice minister of the Black Panther Party, fugitive, prisoner, and Muslim spiritual leader encapsulates much of the postwar African American experience of militancy and resistance.

Hubert Gerold Brown was born on October 4, 1943, in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. His involvement in the civil rights movement began in 1964 while he was studying at Howard University in Washington, D.C. After working for the Mississippi Summer Project to register voters, he became chairman of the Nonviolent Action Group (NAG), the local SNCC affiliate, in 1965. In that capacity, Brown was invited to be part of a delegation that met President Lyndon B. Johnson at the White House to discuss police repression of civil rights protests in Alabama. Brown's verbal confrontation with the president caused widespread outrage, and brought the young activist to national attention, when it was reported in the press. In 1967, Brown succeeded Stokely Carmichael as chairman of the SNCC.

Like his predecessor, Brown abandoned the organization's philosophy of nonviolent protest against segregation and advocated armed resistance to white oppression. Reflecting the shift in ideology and purpose, the organization under his leadership changed its name from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee to the Student National Coordinating Committee.

Brown's term of office marked one of the most violent periods in twentieth-century American history, as the pacifism of the first generation of civil rights protest gave way to the more militant proclamations of Black Power. A political-cultural ideology, Black Power emphasized racial pride and challenged white hegemony by calling on African Americans to take control of their own interests.

In a July 1967 speech in Cambridge, Maryland, Brown urged black people to arm themselves and be ready to meet violence with violence. "If America don't come around," he is alleged to have said, "we're going to burn it down." The event set off a round of violence and arson that razed parts of the city's black neighborhood. Brown was arrested and charged by the state of Maryland with incitement to riot, the first in a series of protracted legal maneuverings between the black power advocate and state and federal authorities.

In 1968, Brown formalized his commitment to armed struggle when he left the SNCC and joined the Black Panthers, a political group that emphasized armed self-defense as part of its community-centered, radical-socialist politics. "Violence is as American as cherry pie," he declared. Over the course of the next two years, Brown was repeatedly arrested and detained as the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) covert Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO) sought to harass black militants and subvert their activities.

Meanwhile, like other black militants such as Huey Newton and Eldridge Cleaver, Brown had become something of a celebrity darling among the liberal elite. His radical chic was confirmed in 1969 with the publication of his memoir, Die Nigger Die! With its strident rhetoric and predictions of revolution and race war, the autobiographical polemic captured the mood of defiant anger among radicalized black men and the appeal of radical causes to left-leaning society figures of the time.

In 1970, having failed to appear in court for trial on charges of inciting a riot and carrying a gun across state lines, Brown was placed on the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Most Wanted list. Despite his profile, he managed to disappear without trace for the next eighteen months. He resurfaced in 1971, when he was wounded in a shoot-out with police and arrested after a bar hold-up in New York City. He was convicted of robbery and spent the next five years in the upstate Attica Correctional Facility.

During his time behind bars, Brown converted to orthodox Islam and changed his name to Jamil Abdullah al-Amin. After his release on parole in 1976, he settled in Atlanta, opened a grocery store, and became the leader of the National Ummah, one of America's largest Black Muslim groups.

Although he had renounced violence, in March 1995 he was implicated in the fatal shooting of Deputy Richard Kinchen and the wounding of Deputy Aldranon English in an incident near his mosque. Several leading national Islamic organizations, including the Islamic Society of North America and the American Muslim Council, appealed in his defense, pointing out discrepancies in the circumstances of his arrest and the charges brought against him. Despite their efforts, he was sentenced to life without parole in March 2002.

James Miller

See also: Black Muslims; Black Panthers; Black Power Movement; Civil Rights Movement.

Further Reading

Brown, H. Rap. Die Nigger Die! 1969. Chicago: Lawrence Hill, 2002.

Lester, Julius. Look Out Whitey! Black Power's Gon Get Your Mam. London: Alison & Busby, 1970.

Newton, Huey P. To Die for the People: The Writings of Huey P. Newton. Ed. Toni Morrison. New York: Writers and Readers, 1995.

Seale, Bobby. Seize the Time: The Story of the Black Panther Party and Huey P. Newton. New York: Random House, 1970.

Brown Berets

The Brown Berets were a collective of Chicano youth who emerged in and around Los Angeles during the 1960s to protest the cultural and racial discrimination they experienced in school, at the hands of police, and in the court system. Although the group's members did not begin with an extreme agenda, they eventually evolved into a militant branch of Chicano civil rights activism.

Origins

The Brown Berets officially were formed in late 1967 and early 1968 under the leadership of activists David Sanchez and Carlos Montes, both of whom had been involved in lobbying against racism in their Los Angeles neighborhoods. Sanchez and Montes organized the Berets after witnessing police beatings—and the deaths of Chicanos in police custody in 1967—and coming to the conclusion that peaceful protest was insufficient to protect their neighborhoods from such attacks.

Sanchez served as “prime minister” of the Brown Berets and, under his direction, members began to wear the signature uniform of brown berets and field jackets. Although the strict dress code suggested alliances with other civil rights activist groups, such as the Black Panthers and Puerto Rican Young Lords— both of whom wore uniforms in order to identify themselves as part of their respective groups—the Brown Berets’ uniforms were worn to present a visibly unified front against the uniformed police officers.

The group organized protests against police brutality, recruited local youth to work on outreach programs such as a free neighborhood health clinic, published the newspaper La Causa, and helped to build coalitions to protest the Vietnam War. In these ways, Brown Berets were determined to counter negative stereotypes of Mexicans and Mexican American youths that led to them being treated by mainstream society as intellectually inferior, ethically questionable, and second-class citizens.

Prior to forming the Brown Berets, Sanchez, Montes, and other friends had worked with the Young Chicanos for Community Action (YCCA), a group established by high school students in 1967 to address inequities in public education and to protest episodes of police brutality in East Los Angeles. At school board meetings, YCCA members presented demands for changes in the curriculum and expressed their belief that Mexican American culture was being systematically repressed within the school system in the areas of language, history, college preparation, and faculty hiring practices. The youth also picketed the police, and, as a result, they often became targets of police investigation and harassment.

As violence escalated through 1967 and into 1968, high school students who protested school board decisions were increasingly subject to police intervention at meetings and expulsion from school. By early 1968, many of the original YCCA members had graduated from high school. This, combined with their desire to confront oppression at the political level, led to the creation of the Brown Berets.

Community Activism

Although the Berets continued to support the school reform agenda for which East L.A. high school students were lobbying, they began to serve the broader Chicano community in two primary capacities.

First, they saw themselves as a necessary line of defense between the Anglo police and the Mexican American community. In this regard, they often supported protesters against police repression. For example, the Berets accompanied protesting students during the March 1968 “blowouts,” when thousands of Chicanos from East L.A. high schools walked out in frustration over discriminatory practices whereby, for example, they were being automatically tracked into vocational school rather than college-prep coursework.

The Berets also spoke out against cultural discrimination in the courts. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, in self-published news outlets and public demonstrations, they called for changes in the racial profile of the police force and of juries. Their goal was to increase minority representation—across minority groups—within institutions that traditionally had been Anglo-dominated, so that a minority person in the justice system would have access to law officers more familiar with the local neighborhoods and to trial by a jury of his or her peers.

Second, the Brown Berets were vocal against the Chicano death rate in the Vietnam War. As other Beret chapters emerged in the Southwest, and in partnership with such other Chicano activist groups as El Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlán (The Chicano Student Movement of Aztlán), a multichapter, university-based student organization that emerged in 1969, the Berets helped organize protest moratoriums against the war, as well as sit-ins and occupations of strategic locations, in the early years of the 1970s. At such events, Chicanos celebrated their culture in many forms, including street art, posters, dance, speeches, plays, and poetry readings.

As the Berets worked to expose and counteract discrimination and brutality against Chicanos, violence with the police continued to escalate. This often was complicated by the Berets’ explicit recruitment of gang members and former juvenile prisoners to their ranks.

Additionally, since Beret members regarded protecting their community from police brutality as one of their primary missions, they adopted a policy of active resistance and fighting back rather than passive or nonviolent policies. They often interfered with police at protests in order to let someone else escape a beating; for example, they stood between students and police during high school blowouts, and the Berets suffered injuries and the death of at least one of their members during a Vietnam War protest on August 29, 1970.

Disbandment

In the face of internal conflict over their primary mission, police infiltration, and grand jury indictments on conspiracy charges (beginning in 1968 in the Los Angeles County system, against four members of the Berets, including Sanchez and Montes), and government infiltration by the counterintelligence branch of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (which created distrust in the chapters as no one knew who might be arrested, when, or by whom), Sanchez officially disbanded the Brown Berets in 1972. Because the chapters were largely autonomous and spread out, there is no complete record of chapter numbers or sizes. Most estimates range from fourteen chapters in the Southwest to ninety chapters nationally at the height of the movement, in 1970.

Since that time, Brown Beret chapters have reopened, but with different agendas than their Chicano Movement predecessors. While they continue to address youth issues within their communities, today's Brown Berets eschew the paramilitary aspects of the group's earlier activities.

Jean Anne Lauer

See also: Black Panthers: Chicano Movement.

Further Reading

Haney, Ian F. Racism on Trial: The Chicano Fight for Justice. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 2003.

Muñoz, Carlos, Jr. Youth, Identity, Power: The Chicano Movement. New York: Verso, 1989.

Treviño, Jesús Salvador. Eyewitness: A Filmmaker's Memoir of the Chicano Movement. Houston, TX: Arte Público, 2001.

Brownson, Orestes (1803–1876)

Orestes Augustus Brownson was an early-nineteenth-century political philosopher, editor, social reformer, and religious critic. A restless and mercurial intellect, he established, then abandoned, a workers' movement, a free church, and two quarterly journals. The single consistent theme throughout his religious, literary, and political work is his commitment to social justice. A true free thinker, he refused to remain faithful to any position or institution that did not reflect his views at the time. Because of his shifting attitudes and concerns, he defies easy classification or categorization.

New England theologian and social commentator Orestes Brownson underwent a series of religious conversions, joined the transcendentalist movement, and finally broke with it to join the Catholic Church. Through it all, he championed the cause of the poor. (Library of Congress)

Born in Stockbridge, Vermont, on September 16, 1803, Brownson was sent to live with relatives after his father's death in 1805; he remained with them until he was fourteen. The puritanical family raised him in the Congregational church, and Brownson began struggling with his religious beliefs at an early age. That struggle would last throughout his adult life as he successively joined and became disillusioned by the Presbyterian, Unitarian, and Universalist churches, although he served as a minister in each. It was not until 1844, when he converted to Roman Catholicism, that he found a faith he could sustain.

As a young man, Brownson was apprenticed to a printer, and he later became a writer, editor, and publisher. In 1829, he served as corresponding editor of the New York–based, socialist-leaning Free Enquirer newspaper, a position that brought him into association with the paper's publishers, reformers and free thinkers Robert Dale Owen and Fanny Wright.

Brownson began advocating communal living experiments such as Brook Farm in Massachusetts and became a member of the Transcendental Club, a group—including writers and social reformers Ralph Waldo Emerson, Margaret Fuller, Theodore Parker, and Henry David Thoreau—that met to discuss transcendental ideas and the general state of American culture. Transcendentalism, with its emphasis on individualism, self-reliance, and the search for truth, appealed both to his religious sensibility and to his growing social conscience. Ultimately, however, Brownson judged the transcendentalists, especially Emerson and Thoreau, as too cerebral and lacking the will to implement the social reforms they advocated, and he broke with them.

Through his own writing, including essays in the Boston Quarterly Review, the Democratic Review, and Brownson's Quarterly, and in his book The American Republic (1857), Brownson commented on nearly every major political event between 1830 and 1860 and critically examined the “American experiment”—the democratic republic, free of class distinction, in which an individual could succeed through his or her own effort. While he praised the national experiment, he had reservations about how democratic systems opened themselves to abuse. For example, Brownson detested capitalism, because it exploited workers, promoted new class distinctions, and supported expansionist actions such as the Mexican-American War.

In 1839, Brownson became active in Democratic Party politics, believing that the Democrats stood against the forces of privilege and monopoly. He was greatly disappointed when the Whigs roundly defeated the Democrats in the 1840 election, declaring that his faith in “the wisdom of the people” had been shaken.

That year, he established a short-lived workers’ party, which evolved into the Society for Christian Union and Progress, a model progressive church anticipating the early-twentieth-century Social Gospel movement. Christ was not merely interested in a man’s soul, Brownson observed in New Views of Christian Society and The Church (1840), but in a kingdom of peace and justice for the poor. In his book The Laboring Class, also published in 1840, Brownson warned that “the coming of the Kingdom of God means a fundamental reorganization of society.”

Brownson’s last foray into politics was with the Republican Party in 1862, when he was nominated for an unsuccessful run for the U.S. Senate. He stood for universal male suffrage and states’ rights, maintaining that the federal government had no authority to dictate policy to the states. For that reason, he also was against abolition. While he did not believe that slavery was morally right, he felt that it was a greater evil to take power away from the states. He went so far, based on his labor experience, to attest that slave life often was better than life for a wage earner, since wage earners were considered not only valueless but also highly replaceable within the capitalist system. Despite these views, Brownson supported Abraham Lincoln in the presidential election of 1860.

One of Brownson’s key contributions is the articulation of a principle that was to be tested in both the civil rights and the counterculture movements of the twentieth century. He concluded that government, not religion, was the appropriate agent of social reform and that lasting reform is predicated on institutional change. He believed that individual ethical, political, and even economic reforms are nothing more than patchwork solutions. Brownson’s spiritual descendents would use this principle to identify and articulate the systemic roots of social ills such as institutional racism, de facto segregation, and corporate sexism.

Brownson died in Detroit, Michigan, on April 17, 1876.

Mary Stanton

See also: Transcendentalism; Unitarianism.

Further Reading

Butler, Gregory S. In Search of the American Spirit: The Political Thought of Orestes Brownson. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.

Gilhooley, Leonard. Contradiction and Dilemma: Orestes Brownson and the American Idea. New York: Fordham University Press, 1972.

Schlesinger, Arthur. Orestes A. Brownson: A Pilgrim’s Progress. Boston: Little, Brown, 1939.

Bruce, Lenny (1925–1966)

With a provocative mix of politics, personal revelation, and profanity, Lenny Bruce rewrote the rules of comedy in the 1950s. He earned himself both a place in the law books, fighting obscenity charges, and a reputation as a pioneer of modern American stand-up comedy and social satire.

Born Leonard Alfred Schneider on October 13, 1925, he grew up in the suburbs of Long Island, New York, and was raised separately by his divorced parents and other relatives. Joining the U.S. Navy in 1942, he saw action in World War II but was dishonorably discharged in 1946 after feigning homosexuality.

After changing his last name to Bruce in 1947, he began doing stand-up routines at small New York nightclubs, which led to an appearance on CBS's Arthur Godfrey Talent Scouts. The television appearance boosted his career sufficiently for him to eke out a living as a comic, frequently emceeing at burlesque venues.

By the mid-1950s, Bruce was working better clubs and television shows, earning mainstream notice as an obscene but very funny comedian. By 1960, he was consistently pushing the envelope of socially acceptable subject matter. He was reviewed as "sick" by such establishment media as Time magazine, and Walter Winchell's influential column dubbed him "America's Number 1 Vomic." At the height of his career in 1960 and 1961, despite the "adults-only" tag on his act, Bruce performed to sold-out audiences at New York's fabled Carnegie Hall.

Not a conventional stand-up comedian, Lenny Bruce was a master of the spritz, a free-form, rapid-fire, nothing-sacred delivery of wisecracks, one-man shticks, and satire. One moment he would impersonate a bishop ministering to lepers ("Look, ah, nothing personal, but, ah, don't touch anything, OK?"). The next moment he would be a B-movie killer refusing the good Father Flotsky's plea to surrender ("Yadda yadda yadda, Father!"). Bruce was known for simultaneously mixing sexual politics and standard comedy: "My mother-in-law broke up my marriage; my wife came home and found us in bed." His first performance after President John F. Kennedy's assassination in 1963 began with a sigh, a long pause, and finally, "Poor Vaughan Meader," a reference to the comedian-impersonator whose entire act consisted of aping JFK.

Bruce's first arrest for obscenity took place in 1961 in San Francisco. By 1965, he had been taken into custody seventeen times across the country. At first, he considered his legal problems free publicity. He was convicted of obscenity charges only twice, and one of the convictions was overturned. Despite testimony on his behalf and public expressions of support from other entertainers, artists, journalists, and crusaders for First Amendment rights, however, he was sentenced in December 1964 to four months in a workhouse. Although he was set free on bail during a protracted appeals process, the string of arrests had caused his bookings to dry up, and his career went into decline. In 1965, nearly broke, Bruce asked a federal court for protection from police harassment.

After 1965, Bruce lived mostly in seclusion, heavily addicted to heroin. He gave his final performance on June 25, 1966, at San Francisco's Fillmore Auditorium. Less than two weeks later, on August 3, 1966, he was found dead of a drug overdose in his house in Hollywood. He was forty years old. In 2003, Governor George Pataki of New York granted an official pardon for his 1964 obscenity conviction.

Arnie Keller

See also: Heroin.

Further Reading

Bruce, Kitty. The Almost Unpublished Lenny Bruce. Philadelphia: Running, 1984.

Bruce, Lenny. How to Talk Dirty and Influence People. Chicago: Playboy, 1965.

Cohen, John, ed. The Essential Lenny Bruce. New York: Pan Macmillan, 1987.

Goldman, Albert. Ladies and Gentlemen, Lenny Bruce!! New York: Random House, 1974.

Nachman, Gerald. Seriously Funny: The Rebel Comedians of the 1950s and 1960s. New York: Pantheon, 2003.

Buddhism

Along with Hinduism and Jainism, Buddhism is one of the so-called dharmic religions—those that embrace the moral concept of dharma, a natural order in the universe that provides a model of proper conduct— that developed in ancient India. The various forms of Buddhism all derive from the teachings of Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha, or “enlightened one,” who lived from about 560 to 480 B.C.E.

From India, Buddhism spread throughout Asia in succeeding centuries. A variety of branches, schools, and sects were formed in different locations at different times. Zen Buddhism, a movement that emphasizes meditation as a path to enlightenment, emerged in China (as “Chan Buddhism”) in the seventh century and later spread to Japan and other countries.

Few, if any, Buddhists lived in the United States until the first Chinese immigrants arrived in the nineteenth century. Although Buddhist temples were built in San Francisco’s Chinatown and elsewhere on the West Coast, the general public remained uninterested, uninvolved, and uninformed for the rest of the century. Unlike Christian churches and Jewish synagogues, the few nineteenth-century Buddhist temples in America had no clergy in residence. They were places of prayer and worship, but not vectors for the spread of Buddhism. Not until the twentieth century did Buddhist clergy arrive in the United States.

In the meantime, Buddhism was known primarily to intellectuals. Transcendentalism, the philosophical movement that flourished on the East Coast in the 1830s and 1840s, was informed by Eastern religion in general, as were aspects of the Unitarian Universalist church, which had originated in America as early as the turn of the nineteenth century. The Buddhism known to intellectuals was largely the form practiced in India, where it was introduced to British colonials. Later in the nineteenth century, American scholars became familiar with German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche’s sympathy with Buddhism (though more attention was paid to his condemnations of Christianity).

During the Progressive Era of the early twentieth century, changes in religious thinking after the Third Great Awakening—including the Social Gospel movement, new debates about modernism in the Protestant denominations, the advent of Reform Judaism, and a general feeling of ecumenism—helped promote interest in the life and teaching of the Buddha among American readers. Actual participation in Buddhism still remained rare, however, especially outside of California.

In California, a small number of white Americans had converted to Buddhism during the latter part of the nineteenth century, enough to support several magazines. Although the Chinese had first brought Buddhism to the country, it was the Japanese who became most involved in its popularization. In the first decades of the twentieth century, a number of Buddhist teachers from Japan were hosted by Californians, and several relocated permanently to the United States. As a result, Japanese Buddhism—especially Zen—became the most popular strain among American converts. The Harada-Yasutani tradition, or Sanbo Kyodan Zen, was especially popular, beginning in the years after World War II (though it retained a minority status in Japan).

Philip Kapleau, an American student of founder Yasutani Haku’un, had been introduced to Zen while working as a court reporter in the Tokyo War Crimes Trials (1946–1948). After returning to the United States, he published The Three Pillars of Zen (1965), a practical guide to Zen that emphasized its universal appeal, in any cultural or ethnic context. The book remains one of the most popular English-language works on the subject to the present day.

Several American writers of the Beat Generation in the 1950s were practicing Buddhists, or closely familiar with the religion, and were instrumental in making it a central element of the counterculture movement. Poet Allen

Ginsberg and novelist Jack Kerouac discussed Buddhism frequently, the former adopting it as his primary belief system (later embracing Hinduism and the Hare Krishna movement), and the latter incorporating Buddhist philosophy into his native Catholicism. Kerouac's novel The Dharma Bums (1958) explored the early days of the Beats after Ginsberg's reading of his poem Howl (1956) and Kerouac's friendship with Gary Snyder, a Beat poet and Buddhist who practiced a self-taught form of zazen (meditation).

The Dharma Bums is not a Buddhist text in the sense that The Three Pillars is, but it lays out a number of conversations about enlightenment, consciousness, the self, and wisdom that reinforce a long-held understanding of Buddhism on the part of Westerners: that it is more a philosophy than a religion and that adopting it neither betrays nor requires the abandonment of a formal religion (such as Christianity) that one has been raised with. This was a popular idea among American Catholic intellectuals before and after World War II, which contributed to the exposure of Buddhism; books and sermons comparing the ideals and sayings of the Buddha and Christ became common. Rather than finding a false prophet in the Buddha, many American Catholics found independent verification of Christian teaching.

The Zen koan, for example, a parable or riddle that could not be fully understood by rational means, was said to offer a parallel with the parables of Jesus. The Beats and others embraced the spiritual liberation, the antimaterialism, and the very paradoxes of Buddhism.

Buddhism and Eastern religion in general remained fixtures of the counterculture of the 1960s and 1970s. In 1974, author Robert Pirsig named his book—which would become a counterculture classic—Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance, even though it had little to do with Buddhism per se. The title was a play on that of the Buddhist text Zen in the Art of Archery (1948) by Eugen Herrigel, which had been popular on college campuses years before.

Bill Kte'pi

See also: Beat Generation: Pirsig, Robert M.

Further Reading

Fields, Rick. How the Swans Came to the Lake: A Narrative History of Buddhism in America. London: Shambhala, 1992.

Kerouac, Jack. The Dharma Bums. New York: Penguin Modern Classics, 2000.

Lehnert, Tomek. Rogues in Robes. Nevada City, CA: Blue Dolphin, 1997.

Tworkov, Helen. Zen in America. San Francisco: North Point, 1989.

Bukowski, Charles (1920–1994)

Charles Bukowski was a poet, short-story writer, and novelist who gained notoriety and a cult following beginning in the 1960s for his terse and painfully honest writing and his famously self-destructive persona. The street life of Los Angeles provided the subject matter for much of his work, earning him the nickname “Poet Laureate of Skid Row.”

Bukowski was born in Germany on August 16, 1920, to an American soldier and German mother. He grew up in Los Angeles, and lived there for the rest of his life. Bukowski's father was strict and abusive, his mother submissive. When Bukowski left home, he dedicated himself to a life of writing. After his early attempts at publication failed, however, he wrote nothing for a decade, working a variety of odd jobs and drinking heavily.

Bukowski returned to writing in the 1950s, supporting himself by working for the U.S. Postal Service. He began to gain recognition in the 1960s within the Los Angeles literary community, although critics were bitterly divided over the value of his work. In 1963, one Los Angeles publisher declared him "Outsider of the Year"—faint praise, but recognition nonetheless.

In his poems and prose works, Bukowski dealt honestly with his drinking problem, his complex relationships with women, and his own meditations on the meaning of masculinity and humanity. Characteristically blunt, scatological, and obscene, his writing was somehow elegant as well, and often funny. Bukowski's literary alter ego, Hank Chinaski, was the basis for his hard-drinking macho public persona. That image often obscured the dedication and care that Bukowski brought to his writing. He was nothing if not prolific, producing thousands of poems, hundreds of short stories, and several novels and screenplays—more than fifty books in all, published during his life or posthumously.

Bukowski continued to gain attention during the 1960s. By the end of the decade, he was able to quit his post office job and work full-time as a writer. He gave his first public readings in 1973, which contributed to his public recognition—and dubious reputation. The readings, in which he insulted and swore at the audience and paused between poems to expound on his philosophy, were an instant sensation. An award-winning documentary film about them, Bukowski (1973), was aired on public television and helped make him a cult celebrity.

After the film's release, Bukowski received a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts and began giving readings across the country. His public persona and the blunt honesty of his writing gained him notoriety and a measure of fame and financial success. While his writing garnered mixed critical reaction, many readers were vehement in their support. Bukowski was especially lionized in his native Germany, where translations of his works were extremely successful among book buyers.

Bukowski gained more public notice when a semibiographical film, Barfly, was released in 1987. Starring Mickey Rourke, the movie chronicled Bukowski's years as an alcoholic drudge before his writing gained recognition. The film won minor acclaim, and Bukowski's participation (he wrote the screenplay) opened new doors for him. He continued to work until the end of his life.

Bukowski died of cancer on March 9, 1994. A steady stream of reprint editions, as well as several posthumous publications, have preserved his reputation in the years since.

James L. Erwin

Further Reading

Brewer, Gay. Charles Bukowski. New York: Twayne, 1997.

Cherkovski, Neeli. Hank: The Life of Charles Bukowski. New York: Random House, 1991.

Buntline, Ned (ca. 1823–1886)

Ned Buntline was the pseudonym of the American journalist, writer, and publisher Edward Zane Carroll Judson. Best known as the promoter of Buffalo Bill, and also known as “King of the Dime Novelists,” Buntline was as much an invention of the public imagination as a shaper of it.

Even the details of his birth are clouded by speculation, with dates ranging from 1820 through 1823, and birthplaces noted in both New York and Pennsylvania. The most commonly cited among these is March 20, 1823, in Stamford, New York, as stated in his biography but called into question elsewhere.

Judson, who had used the name Ned since boyhood, added the surname Buntline (a nautical term for the rope at the bottom of a square sail) to his pseudonym to shield his identity after writing “The Captain’s Pig,” an autobiographical tale of a prank he played on his captain while sailing with a U.S. Navy squadron. That short story, published in 1844, marked the beginning of Buntline’s extensive literary career and the genesis of a colorful persona.

A prolific writer, Buntline wrote for and edited a number of periodicals from the 1840s until his death in 1886. Among these were the Knickerbocker, Western Literary Journal and Monthly Magazine, Prairie Flower, Empire State, New York Weekly, and the Banner Weekly.

In 1844, Buntline started a periodical called Ned Buntline’s Own, which he would produce intermittently over the next twenty years. After 1846, Buntline wrote more than 400 novels, with such titles as The Comanche’s Dream (1860) and The Mysteries and Miseries of New York (1848).

The highlight of Buntline’s colorful career came in 1869, after the July skirmish at Summit Springs, Colorado, in which Major Frank North slew the infamous Chief Tall Bull. Buntline intended to write North’s story, but North’s distaste for journalists forced him to look elsewhere for a hero. He found an outgoing, attractive, and rugged stand-in in young William F. Cody, who, in Buntline’s hands, was transformed from an often inebriated hunter and scout into a Western icon.

Buntline’s promotion of Buffalo Bill, combined with his dime novels, played a significant role in American cultural mythmaking. The melodramas and Wild West shows offered their audiences a romantic, adventurous, exoticized West that stood in stark contrast to the increasingly staid, urban life of the East. Their images of treacherous Indians, rugged terrain, and hypermasculine heroes would fuel both expansionist ambitions and American national identity in the nineteenth century and beyond.

The chronicle of Buntline’s exploits also includes six marriages and his being hanged for murder. In the case of the hanging, Buntline had been condemned for the fatal shooting of Robert Porterfield in a duel on March 14, 1846, and he survived the lynching only because the rope was secretly cut by a friend. Porterfield had challenged Buntline to the duel after it was suggested that Buntline had had inappropriate relations with Porterfield’s wife.

Buntline gained additional notoriety for his role in the Astor Place Riot of 1849, a working-class, anti-British demonstration in New York City that resulted in the deaths of twenty-one rioters. Buntline was arrested, fined, and sentenced to a year’s imprisonment.

After his release, Buntline’s career took a turn toward high-profile politics, as he traveled the country giving temperance lectures (in spite of his own heavy drinking). In 1852, he became a key figure in the Sons of ’76, or the Know-Nothing Party, an anti-immigrant, anti-Catholic organization whose name reflected its extreme secrecy.

Buntline continued writing until his death on July 16, 1886. His literary output included novels, newspaper articles, poetry, at least one hymn, and the play The Scouts of the Prairie, which played at Niblo’s Garden in New York in 1873 and launched Buffalo Bill’s stage career.

Cynthia J. Miller

See also: Temperance Movement.

Further Reading

Monaghan, Jay. The Great Rascal: The Life and Adventures of Ned Buntline. New York: Bonanza, 1952.

Pond, Frederick Eugene. The Life and Adventures of Ned Buntline. London: Cadmus Book Shop, 1919.

Burning Man Festival

An alternative arts festival held annually in the Nevada desert since the early 1990s, Burning Man was founded by Larry Harvey, a member of San Francisco's countercultural art community. The first festival was a spontaneous event to mark the Summer Solstice on June 21, 1986. Harvey and his friend Jerry James built a wooden figure of a man that stood 8 feet (2.4 meters) tall, and, with about twenty friends and bystanders, burned it on Baker Beach in San Francisco. From these unlikely origins, an enormous experimental community arose.

In the 2000s, the festival has attracted more than 30,000 participants each year; by 2008, the number had grown close to about 50,000. Now an eight-day event, Burning Man is held the week before and including the Labor Day holiday in the challenging climate of the Black Rock Desert of Nevada. (Temperatures in this desert region may range from 40 degrees Fahrenheit at night to over 100 during the day.)

The spirit of Burning Man challenges participants to become part of a temporary planned community at what has come to be known as Black Rock City, located 120 miles (193 kilometers) north of Reno and the largest town in Nevada's Pershing County for the duration of the festival. The event has become so large that year-round planning by many people is required to bring it off successfully. There are few organizational principles, but there are rules governing health, safety, respect for others' experience of the event, and environmental concerns. Participants must bring in everything they need for the duration of their stay, including their own water, and must take everything with them when they leave.

The Burning Man Festival, an eight-day celebration of creative experimentation, temporary communal living, and participatory free expression, is held annually in the Black Rock Desert of Nevada. It culminates in the burning of a giant human effigy. (Hector Mata/AFP/Getty Images)

The bywords of the event are “creative participation involvement”; mere observation is discouraged. In the weeks leading up to the event, individuals set up art installations, build the structures needed to accommodate the tens of thousands of participants, schedule performances, and develop hundreds of theme camps. In addition, each annual festival follows a unique artistic theme, designated by Harvey. Themes in the past have included “The Wheel of Time,” “The Body,” “The Floating World,” and “Psyche: The Conscious, the Subconscious, and the Unconscious.”

What attracts such large numbers of people to this event is not only the creative art installations, artistically designed vehicles, theme camps, and Burning Man himself—now nearly 40 feet (12.1 meters) tall— but also the “anything goes” ethic of the community itself. Public nudity and sexual activity coexist with religious shrines, musical performances, and children’s events. The festival attracts radical and countercultural participants from around the United States and other countries. Individuals and groups who experience hostility, confinement, and discrimination in their own communities regard the festival as a place where they can express themselves freely.

With these freedoms, however, has come commercial abuse. In recent years, Harvey has brought lawsuits against unauthorized videographers who have attempted to market videos of nude women at the festival. As a result, camera equipment is restricted, as are activities that risk commercial exploitation of what organizers and most participants still value as a radical experiment in art, self-expression, and spontaneous community.

Lawrence Jones

See also: Free Love: San Francisco, California.

Further Reading

Burning Man Project. <http://www.burningman.com>

Chen, Katherine K. Enabling Creative Chaos: The Organization Behind the Burning Man Event. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2009.

Gilmore, Lee, and Mark Van Proyen, eds. AfterBurn: Reflections on Burning Man. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 2005.

Burns, Otway (1775–1850)

Otway Burns was the operator of an American privateer (an armed private ship licensed to attack enemy shipping) and a pro-abolition Southern politician. As one of the most famous privateers of the War of 1812, Burns was considered a hero, but his association with the Southern antislavery movement, as well as his stubborn defiance of the old regime in North Carolina, eventually led to his downfall.

Born near Beaufort, North Carolina, in 1775, Burns went to sea at an early age. In 1812, when the United States found itself at war with Great Britain, a group of North Carolina businessmen whose shipping had been interrupted by the war offered to pay Burns, by then an enterprising young sea captain, to help protect their shipping.

The British navy’s 600 ships were stretched thin at times between 1812 and 1815, largely because of the amount of territory the British had to control. The fledgling American navy, by contrast, had a mere sixteen ships with which to defend the U.S. coast. Burns received a license, or letters of marque, from the U.S. federal government, authorizing him to seize and capture British vessels. In addition to legalizing his activities, the license guaranteed that, in the event of capture, Burns and his crew could only be held as prisoners of war rather than hanged as pirates.

Unlike pirates, who acted indiscriminately and often raided even their own country's shipping, privateers would only attack enemy vessels during a time of war. Consequently, from the era of the American Revolution through the War of 1812, the U.S. government relied heavily on men such as Otway Burns to help augment the efforts of its navy.

Although Burns considered himself a patriot, others regarded him as little more than a licensed robber. Privateering was indeed a profitable business. As compensation for their services, the U.S. government agreed that Burns and the crew of his ship, the Snap Dragon, would receive a share of whatever spoils they managed to capture from the British. The total value of shipping captured by the Snap Dragon was more than half a million dollars. By the end of the war, Burns was a rich man.

Despite his success and fame, however, Burns continued to be regarded as a maverick. In 1821, he was elected to the North Carolina state legislature. His opposition to slavery, unusual for a Southerner, made him many enemies. Throughout his political career, which ended when he was voted out of office in 1835, Burns refused to endorse bills that would prohibit the eventual emancipation of slaves, advocated the repeal of acts making it a crime to teach slaves how to read, and opposed legislators who wanted to keep free blacks out of North Carolina.

Many people in the established eastern counties of North Carolina, particularly the landed gentry, considered Burns a traitor when, in the 1830s, he supported the creation of new western counties. Slaveholders were not as powerful in the mountainous western parts of the state, and, by creating new counties, men such as Burns attempted to redraw the lines of power.

The town of Burnsville was named in his honor, but Burns was never fully accepted by mainstream society. After losing his seat in the legislature, he was appointed keeper of a lighthouse on the Outer Banks of North Carolina. There, having lost most his fortune, he died on October 25, 1850.

Michael Taylor

See also: Abolitionism; African Americans.

Further Reading

Dudley, Wade G. Splintering the Wooden Wall: The British Blockade of the United States, 1812–1815. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 2003.

Lemmon, Sarah McCulloh. Frustrated Patriots: North Carolina and the War of 1812. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1973.

Robinson, Jack. Captain Otway Burns and His Ship. Snap Dragon. Wilmington, NC: Lulu, 2006.

Burroughs, William S. (1914–1997)

Variously referred to as Uncle Bill, “El Hombre Invisible,” and William Lee, the avant-garde novelist and artist and notorious drug addict William S. Burroughs was a protean figure in the American literary underground. He was a central figure in the Beat Generation of artists and writers, a primarily literary movement that countered the prevailing middle-class culture of 1950s America.

He was born William Seward Burroughs II on February 5, 1914, in St. Louis, Missouri, the grandson of the inventor of the Burroughs adding machine. He attended private high school in St. Louis and went on to Harvard University in 1932, working summers as a cub reporter for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. After graduating from Harvard in 1936, he continued his exploration of gay lifestyle and culture in Europe, drifting through a series of unfulfilling jobs back in the United States and becoming a drug addict while living in New York.

He enlisted in the U.S. Army in the aftermath of Pearl Harbor—only to be given a disability discharge for depression—and settled in New York with friends, including Jack Kerouac. Despite his sexual preference, Burroughs was married twice. His marriage to Joan Vollmer Burroughs ended in Mexico in 1951 with her accidental shooting at Burroughs's hands. The event prompted him to write.

His first three novels—Junkie (1953; originally published as Junk and reissued in 1977), Queer (written in 1953, published in 1986); and Naked Lunch (published in France in 1959 and in the United States in 1962)—echo the French poet Charles Baudelaire's call for a "systematic derangement of these senses." These works also reflect some of Burroughs's preferred topics: drugs (heroin) and sex (with men). From his perspective, humans are fundamentally sick creatures and human culture is pathological. As a seminal figure and mentor of the Beat Generation, Burroughs propagated a powerful sense of the decay of American civilization and the liberating power of aberrant behavior—leitmotifs in the counterculture of the 1960s. His themes of drugs, altered states of consciousness, space travel, and criminal behavior constitute avenues of escape that have carried literary appeal through three generations of hipsters.

In collaboration with painter and writer Brion Gysin, a fellow tenant of the "Beat Hotel" in Paris during the early 1960s, Burroughs developed creative devices that he referred to as the dream machine and the cut-up. The former consists of a column of paper, perforated by specifically shaped and arranged holes, and rotated, with a light bulb hung in its center, on a record turntable at 78 rpm. The user, seated before the machine with eyes closed, is struck by rapidly oscillating waves of light, the effect of which is ostensibly to induce a trance state characterized by graphic visions of religious icons and other optical effects.

The cut-up is a method for short-circuiting rational thought. In his ongoing effort to break the bonds of language, Burroughs worked with Gysin to develop a method by which a printed page is cut into sections and rearranged in a predetermined fashion. At the formal level, the method was intended to advance writing, which in Gysin's view was "fifty years behind painting." By allowing the physical manipulation of text and the application of montage techniques, Burroughs and Gysin hoped to close the gap. As a tool for writing, the cut-up was said to disrupt the relationship between words and phrases as dictated by syntax—a technique for violently disrupting rational linguistic codes.

While his 1964 novel Nova Express represented the first systematic application of the cut-up method in published form, the development and initial application of the method had taken place around the time Naked Lunch—Burroughs's most famous work—was published in Paris in 1959. A loosely linked series of hallucinatory vignettes or "routines," Naked Lunch was marked by its vivid and sordid imagery no less than the fertile imagination of its author, but the work became best known for the highly public obscenity trial that followed its American publication in 1962 by Grove Press.

In the latter part of his career, Burroughs continued to write as well as work as a film actor (Drugstore Cowboy, 1989), librettist (Robert Wilson's The Black Rider, 1991) and spoken-word performer (with John Giorno and Laurie Anderson, among others). He also continued to create works of visual art. At his home in Lawrence, Kansas, where he moved from New York in 1981, Burroughs pursued some of the same goals and obsessions that had driven his writing and life—guns, chance, and the vistas opened by attention to detail—in his so-called shotgun paintings (pieces of plywood rent by shotgun blast and splattered with containers of paint).

By the time of his death on August 2, 1997, Burroughs had gone from a reviled, marginal literary figure to an artist who commanded respect in the academy and popular culture. He had been elected to membership in the American Academy of Arts and Letters (1984) and was widely recognized as an American cultural icon.

See also: Beat Generation: Ginsberg, Allen: Kerouac, Jack.

Further Reading

Chandraraj, Raj. The Beat Generation and Counterculture: Paul Bowles, William S. Burroughs, Jack Kerouac. New York: Peter Lang, 2009.

Harris, Oliver, ed. The Letters of William S. Burroughs: 1945–1959. New York: Viking, 1993.

Miles, Barry. William Burroughs: El Hombre Invisible. London: Virgin Books, 2002.

Sobieszek, Robert A. Ports of Entry: William S. Burroughs and the Arts. Los Angeles: Los Angeles County Museum of Art, 1996.

Cambridge, Massachusetts

The city of Cambridge, Massachusetts, has been a meeting place for those whose thoughts and actions run counter to prevailing culture since almost as far back as its settlement in 1630. Known originally as New Towne, it was one of several settlements founded by John Winthrop, governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Along with Watertown, Dorchester, and Boston, the settlement, based around what is now Harvard Square, originally was intended to be a place where Puritans, who sought a simpler and more disciplined form of religious and social practice than they enjoyed in England, could live according to their principles.

In 1636, a college to train ministers, devised along the classic English model of tutorial studies, was founded in the town; the school was later named after John Harvard, who donated his library to the college. Although it trained ministers, Harvard College was not affiliated with the Puritans or any other religious group. There also was a small community of Anglicans who lived and flourished economically in the city. Several of their houses in an area known as Tory Row, as well as Christ Church, where they worshipped, still stand.

In the eighteenth century, the town found itself growing away from England and toward the politics of revolution. Once things began to unravel between colony and mother country, those on Tory Row found it best to flee, many resettling to the north in Nova Scotia. In 1775, days after the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, Cambridge Common became a camp of more than 20,000 men volunteering for service, and Harvard canceled classes so that more soldiers could be housed on its campus.

Also in 1775, General George Washington took command of the Continental Army in Cambridge. There is a story that he did so under an elm tree on Cambridge Common, though this has not been substantiated by historical research. The image of the elm tree (the actual tree fell prey to disease in the 1920s) remains a symbol of freedom, and Washington made his headquarters in the city and housed his family there for a number of months.

Artists and scholars, students, musicians, politicians, immigrants, and refugees all have found homes in Cambridge since its founding. As the university and the city began to grow in the nineteenth century, Cambridge became the home of notable poets and writers, including Richard Henry Dana, Margaret Fuller, and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

There also had been a small African American community in the city since its beginnings. With the controversy over slavery heating up nationwide in the mid-nineteenth century, the combination of education, religious progressivism, and proximity to the transportation hub of Boston made Cambridge a welcoming place for those who held countercultural views on the institution of slavery.

Abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison lived in the city, as did several African Americans who were pioneers in their fields, including Maria Baldwin, who taught black students in her home. Among her students were the scholar and civil rights leader W.E.B. Du Bois and John J. Fatal, who helped escaped slaves make it to the free North in the 1840s. Garrison published The Liberator, an influential abolitionist newspaper, and the city had a racially integrated school system by 1850. In the time before and during the American Civil War, fugitive slaves and those advocating the end of slavery found themselves welcome in the city.

As the twentieth century unfolded, representatives of the newly formed and politically controversial Irish Free State (later the Republic of Ireland) toured America seeking resources to support their new government. They found strong financial and political support among the residents of Cambridge.

Perhaps one of the best-known and most dramatic expressions of Cambridge's counterculture came in the early 1960s with the work of Harvard professor Timothy Leary. Experimenting with drugs in his research, Leary advocated the "Turn on, tune in, drop out" lifestyle that became a guiding principle of the hippie culture. In the late 1960s, anti-Vietnam War rallies and protests came to Harvard Square and other parts of Cambridge, as did bombings and street demonstrations associated with those times.

At Harvard and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), the burgeoning computer culture of the 1970s and 1980s saw a counter movement of software developers and computer hackers. Most prominent among them was Richard Matthew Stallman, known for his pioneering of the free software license GNU (General Public License), among other things.

Counterculture also has found expression in Cambridge's take on the arts, particularly music. The American Folklore Society was founded in Cambridge in 1888; Harvard professor Francis James Child authored a six-volume collection of ballads and folk songs (1882–1898) that remains a source of information and inspiration to storytellers and musicians from many genres more than a century later.

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, while most of the country listened to such mellow crooners as Patti Page and Frank Sinatra, Cambridge's Club 47 (now Club Passim) became a hub for performers of the folk music revival and its attendant counterculture scene. Future folk revival superstar Joan Baez made her debut at Club 47 in 1958. Bob Dylan, Carolyn Hester, Chris Smither, and Dave van Ronk all played there early in their careers, offering music that ranged from political broadsides to personal introspection, and leading the way to the singer-songwriter style that continues today. Shawn Colvin, Nanci Griffith, and Bruce Springsteen were among those who came as players and audience members.

The people of Cambridge have a long history of movements and lifestyles that run counter to prevailing lines of thought, from the time of the city's founding fathers to present-day seekers of alternative choices in politics, arts, and personal styles. Although not every citizen agrees with every cause, Cambridge remains a place where counterculture in politics, lifestyle, and the arts is often as strong, and certainly as visible, as are mainstream ideas.

Kerry Dexter

See also: Garrison, William Lloyd; Leary, Timothy.

Further Reading

von Schmidt, Eric, and Jim Rooney. Baby, Let Me Follow You Down: The Illustrated Story of the Cambridge Folk Years. 2nd

ed. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994.

Wilson, Susan. The Literary Trail of Greater Boston: A Tour of Sites in Boston, Cambridge, and Concord. Rev. ed. Boston: Commonwealth Editions, 2005.

Carlin, George (1937–2008)

Irreverent, profane, politically radical, and willing to tell jokes on taboo subjects, ranging from sex and drugs to religion and mainstream American culture, the stand-up comic and recording artist George Carlin became especially popular among hippies and other members of the counterculture in the 1970s. He continued to entertain audiences into the twenty-first century.

George Dennis Carlin was born in New York City on May 12, 1937. His parents separated a year later, and he was raised by his mother in the Morningside Heights neighborhood of Manhattan. He quit high school at age fourteen and joined the U.S. Air Force three years later. While stationed at an airbase in Louisiana, he began working off base as a disc jockey on a Shreveport radio station.

After being discharged from the service in 1957, Carlin began his full-time career with small radio jobs in Boston and Fort Worth. In 1960, he left Texas for Hollywood with radio friend Jack Burns, and they formed the nightclub comedy team of Burns and Carlin. Performing stand-up routines, the duo got radio work, recorded an album, and appeared on The Tonight Show before parting ways in 1962 to start solo careers.

During the rest of the decade, Carlin performed stand-up in New York City's Greenwich Village, appeared on television, and recorded his first solo album (Take Offs and Put Ons, 1966). In a prelude to future controversies, a Las Vegas hotel fired him in 1969 for using the word shit on stage.

Carlin achieved lasting fame in the 1970s, transforming his physical appearance from clean-cut conservative to long-haired, bearded hippie. He also transformed his humor, recording several best-selling albums on the Little David label. Later considered comedy classics, these early albums contained profanity and groundbreaking commentary on drugs, sex, politics, religion, and mainstream culture. In 1972, he was arrested after a concert in Milwaukee for performing his famous “Seven Words You Can Never Say on Television” (or “Seven Dirty Words”) routine.

In 1973, Carlin's album FM and AM won a Grammy Award. In 1975, he hosted the very first broadcast of Saturday Night Live, and he taped the first of his many cable television performances for Home Box Office (HBO) in 1977, earning a prominent place in American pop culture.

Perhaps most significantly, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation—a 1978 case about the daytime radio broadcast of Carlin's “Dirty Words” routine—that the government could ban the use of certain words from the public airwaves during hours when children might hear them. Despite the Court's decision, Carlin remained popular with both mainstream and counterculture audiences.

Overcoming health problems and drug addiction, Carlin continued recording albums and television concerts throughout the next two and a half decades. Since the late 1980s, his humor took aim at organized religion, big business, consumer culture, and the perversion of the English language. His album Jammin' in New York won a Grammy Award in 1992.

Meanwhile, branching out into other creative avenues, Carlin played the role of Mister Conductor on the popular children's television show Shining Time Station (1991–1993), and he appeared in the films Bill and Ted's Excellent Adventure (1989), The Prince of Tides (1991), Dogma (1999), and Jersey Girl (2004). His 1997 book, Brain Droppings, became a surprise best seller, as did Napalm and Silly Putty in 2001.

Regarded by fans as something of a philosopher, Carlin remained popular for articulating often unpleasant and sometimes acerbic, but usually hilarious, truths about the way Americans live, or pretend to. The comedian, who died of heart failure on June 22, 2008, was hailed by critics as a cultural renegade, and one of America's most relevant—and funniest—comedians.

Roy L. Sturgeon

See also: Radio.

Further Reading

Carlin, George. Brain Droppings. New York: Hyperion, 1997.

Cooper, Marc. "Interview: George Carlin." The Progressive, July 2001.

Carmichael, Stokely (1941–1998)

As head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC, a direct-action antiracist organization) during the tumultuous late 1960s, a chief proponent of the Black Power movement, and a revolutionary Pan-Africanist, Stokely Carmichael galvanized and fundamentally altered the course of the civil rights movement and contributed to the development of African American consciousness. His most notable achievement as leader of the SNCC was popularizing the ideology of Black Power during the 1966 Meredith March Against Fear in Mississippi, but Carmichael's career began when he was a student and lasted the rest of his life.

Born on July 29, 1941, in Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, and raised in New York City, Stokely Standiford Churchill Carmichael became involved in radical activism as a student at Howard University in Washington, D.C., after studying Marxism and attending a 1960 protest against the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The following year, he was arrested for participating in the Freedom Rides bus campaign against racial segregation in the Deep South.

In 1965, Carmichael was among the founders of the all-black Lowndes County Freedom Organization (LCFO), an independent political party that led voter registration drives and organized marches for civil rights in the Alabama Black Belt. Perhaps the LCFO's most lasting contribution to the freedom struggle, however, was the choice of a black panther as its logo. According to LCFO chairman John Hulett, the panther was selected because the animal will fight for its life when cornered.

Carmichael rose to the forefront of the civil rights movement and received national media attention in 1966 when he popularized the phrase "Black Power!" Riding the wave of that phrase and the prevailing sentiment of the African American community, Carmichael sought to nationalize the goals of the civil rights movement and extend them beyond mere voting rights and the end of segregation. For Carmichael, this meant tackling larger cultural, social, and economic issues that disproportionately afflicted the African American community, including underemployment, inferior housing, and inadequate schools.

Believing that capitalism and racism were operating in tandem to oppress African Americans, Carmichael devised an anticapitalist, black nationalist platform for the SNCC that represented a secular alternative to the dogmatic, fundamentalist program said to have been espoused by Malcolm X and Elijah Muhammad as leaders of the Nation of Islam. Moreover, Carmichael helped broaden the SNCC's antiracist agenda to include Marxist criticisms of capitalism, a denunciation of the Vietnam War, and a rejection of white, bourgeois values and culture.

Carmichael's identification with Africa and African values was crucial to his definition of Black Power and his refusal to recognize integration as the primary goal of the civil rights movement. His countercultural view is perhaps best characterized by Martin Luther King, Jr.'s description of Black Power as "the view that American society is so hopelessly corrupt and enmeshed in evil that there is no possibility of salvation from within."

For Carmichael, Black Power was a holistic revolutionary program that celebrated traditional African communal values, asserted the necessity of a positive African American identity, and advocated a political program that alienated white liberal allies in the civil rights movement. He espoused the psychological necessity of African American self-determination and considered white efforts to organize the black community superfluous. Black Power, as he defined it, was an ideology in which cultural and political aims were inseparable.

Carmichael's Pan-Africanism influenced his 1978 decision to honor his two revolutionary mentors— Kwame Nkrumah, the first president of Ghana, and Sekou Touré, the first president of Guinea—by changing his name to Kwame Ture.

Before succumbing to prostate cancer on November 15, 1998, Carmichael dictated his memoirs to longtime comrade Ekwueme Michael Thelwell, who transcribed and organized the text. Carmichael's autobiography, Ready for Revolution, was published in 2003.

As a political radical and critic of mainstream, middle-class society, Carmichael was a product of the 1960s youth rebellion. However, the seriousness of his activity as a political organizer and his assertiveness as an African American working for cultural and political autonomy combined to make him a more significant threat to the establishment than his peers in Students for a Democratic Society and the hippie movement.

David Lucander

See also: Black Power Movement: Civil Rights Movement: King, Martin Luther, Jr.: Malcolm X.

Further Reading

Carmichael, Stokely, and Charles V. Hamilton. Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America. New York: Random House, 1967.

Carmichael, Stokely, and Ekwueme Michael Thelwell. Ready for Revolution: The Life and Struggles of Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Ture). New York: Scribner, 2003.

Zinn, Howard. SNCC: The New Abolitionists. 1964. Cambridge, MA: South End, 2002.

Carroll, Jim (1950–2009)

Jim Carroll, a poet, writer, and punk rock musician from New York City, was catapulted to quasi-fame in America's counterculture with the publication of his autobiographical book The Basketball Diaries in 1978. Graphically detailing his life as a teenage basketball phenomenon, heroin addict, and prostitute, The Basketball Diaries achieved a notoriety and commercial success that often overshadows the lasting influence of Carroll's gritty, personal, expository style on literature and music.

He was born on August 1, 1950, to an Irish Catholic working-class family. He attended various Catholic schools in New York City, eventually earning a scholarship to the prestigious Trinity School. It was there, inspired by the writings of Jack Kerouac, that Carroll recorded the events of his teenage years in stark, unself-conscious detail, morphing from a typical twelve-year-old to a heroin-addicted male prostitute on the fringes of the notorious New York drug scene.

Carroll left school, becoming increasingly involved with artist Andy Warhol and his avant-garde art and counterculture movement. Proclaimed a prodigy by such legendary Beat writers as Kerouac and William S. Burroughs, by age seventeen Carroll was a published author and poet, and a member of Warhol's inner circle. The allure of New York's vibrant but drug-saturated art scene soon faded, however, and Carroll used the proceeds from Living at the Movies (1973), a collection of poems penned while comanaging Warhol's Theater, to fund his move to California.

While in California, Carroll kicked his drug habit and continued to write, publishing The Basketball Diaries aboveground. A chance encounter with ex-flame, poet, and punk icon Patti Smith inspired Carroll to try his hand at music. He pulled together a band, recorded a few demos, and signed with Rolling Stone Records. Despite critical acclaim for the brutal edge to Carroll's lyrics, the 1980 debut album, Catholic Boy, included the Jim Carroll Band's only commercially successful single. The single was "People Who Died," a lyrical punk/rap ode to friends and acquaintances who had met untimely deaths, many drug connected. After fulfilling the terms of his recording contract, Carroll retired from the music world and returned to writing.

The sustained success of Carroll's works, the cult status of his band's early albums, and his draw as a speaker attest to his continuing influence on various factions of American culture. Carroll's cathartic, über-realistic portrayal of addiction, recovery, self-loathing, sexual exploration, and self-discovery inspired many modern literary, music, and film projects, such as Irvine Welsh's Trainspotting (1993), James O'Barr's graphic novel The Crow (1981) and the goth cult character it is titled after, and Put Your Tongue to the Rail (Genus Records, 1999), a showcase of Philadelphia musicians heavily influenced by Carroll.

Carroll collaborated with a number of notable musicians, while enjoying a lucrative career reading his works and giving spoken-word performances. The 1995 release of The Basketball Diaries as a feature film, starring Leonardo di Caprio, cemented the unintentional transformation of Jim Carroll, the literary countercultural savant, into Jim Carroll, the bourgeois provocateur. Uncomfortable to a degree with the adulation and emulation of his life and work, Carroll continued to write and perform spoken-word pieces to his death from a heart attack in New York City on September 11, 2009.

Ann Youngblood Mulhearn

See also: Beat Generation: Heroin.

Further Reading

Carroll, Jim. The Basketball Diaries. New York: Penguin, 1987.

Carson, Rachel (1907–1964)

The author, scientist, and naturalist Rachel Louise Carson wrote scientifically grounded works that inspired readers with her love of nature. Her most notable book, Silent Spring (1962), sparked a public outcry against the use of chemical pesticides and helped shape the ecology movement of the 1960s and 1970s.

Born in Springdale, Pennsylvania, on May 27, 1907, Carson grew up on a nonworking farm just outside the city. As a girl, she spent innumerable hours with her mother and lifelong best friend, Maria McLean Carson, reading and hiking in the nearby forests. These quiet hours instilled in Carson two enduring loves that would shape her career and her place in history: nature and the written word.

Carson pursued a career in biology, but she never lost her love for writing and the natural world. While enrolled at the Pennsylvania College for Women in Pittsburgh in 1924, she encountered a young biology teacher named Mary Scott Skinker, whose infectious enthusiasm inspired the young Carson to study the subject. After graduating with a degree in biology in 1928, Carson enrolled in graduate school at Johns Hopkins University, where she earned her master's degree in marine zoology in 1932.

She subsequently worked for the information division of the U.S. Bureau of Fisheries, initially producing a series of radio scripts called Romance Under the Seas to explain the subject of marine life to the general public. Assigned to write a synopsis of the series, Carson produced such a remarkably florid piece that her boss rejected it for government publication and told her to submit it to a literary journal. She published the resulting essay, "Undersea," in the Atlantic Monthly, marking her entry into the literary world.

She published her first book, Under the Sea Wind, in 1941. Her second book, The Sea Around Us (1951), reached the best-seller list and allowed her to resign from her government position to become a full-time nature writer.

Carson's writing sparked popular interest and conveyed a love for the intrinsic beauty of nature, while remaining grounded in scientific research. Silent Spring, an exposé of the harmful effects of agricultural chemicals on humans and the environment, constituted her greatest writing achievement. Based on the research of leading biologists, the book captivated readers with its musings on the beauty and wonder of nature. At a time when most American scientists and chemical manufacturers lauded humanity's ability to conquer nature, Silent Spring questioned the wisdom of efforts to manipulate the natural environment and commented on the potential damaging effects of such actions.

Carson died of breast cancer on April 14, 1964, soon after the publication of Silent Spring. While many twentieth-century Americans had assumed that humans would benefit most by manipulating the environment, Carson's view, and that of the new ecological movement, saw people as but a small part of the complex and delicately balanced ecological system—one whose balance and beauty could be sustained only by minimizing human interference.

Steven Sheehan

See also: Environmentalism.

Further Reading

Carson, Rachel. The Sea Around Us. New York: Oxford University Press, 1951.

Carson, Rachel. Silent Spring. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1962.

Carson, Rachel. Under the Sea Wind: A Naturalist's Picture of Ocean Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1962.

Cash, Johnny (1932–2003)

Popularly known as “The Man in Black,” American country-music singer and songwriter Johnny Cash was known for his rebel persona and dark songs—including the 1956 hit singles “Folsom Prison Blues” and “I Walk the Line”—that spoke to the heart of America while cutting at its underbelly. Personal friend and fellow country musician Kris Kristofferson said of Cash, “He stood up for the underdogs, the downtrodden, the prisoners, the poor, and he was their champion.” As a testimony to a career that appealed to fans worldwide, Cash’s posthumous album The Legend of Johnny Cash (2005) was certified platinum when it sold 1 million copies.

J.R. Cash was born in Kingsland, Arkansas, on February 26, 1932. At the age of three, he moved with his family to Dyess, Arkansas, just outside Memphis, Tennessee. The family was poor, so it was no small gift when his mother, Carrie Cash, gave him a guitar on his tenth birthday. That gift, and the family’s proximity to the center of the country-music recording industry, laid the foundation for Cash’s future as a musician.

After marrying Vivian Liberto in 1954, Cash moved to Memphis, the source of much of the music he had enjoyed in his youth. While working as a home-appliance salesman, he befriended amateur musicians Marshall Grant and Luther Perkins, and they began playing together.

The trio eventually earned a fifteen-minute spot on a local radio station and persuaded producer Sam Phillips of Sun Records (the future recording home of Jerry Lee Lewis, Roy Orbison, Elvis Presley, and other rock-and-roll legends) to turn out their first record in 1955. Cash wrote the songs “Hey Porter” and “Cry, Cry, Cry” and the trio—called Johnny Cash and the Tennessee Two—had their first release. The group’s popularity rose steadily as it went on tour, and Cash recorded some of his most famous songs during this early period.

The three musicians decided to split ways, and, in 1958, Cash signed a solo contract with Columbia Records in Los Angeles. The move to California allowed him to pursue more religious and political themes, reflected in such songs as “Lead Me Father,” “It Was Jesus,” and “Going to Memphis.” His lyrics often focused on the fringes of society, such as outlaws, or minority groups, such as Native Americans, but managed to resonate with mainstream audiences.

Cash’s simple rhythms and distinctive baritone voice made his albums and live performances ever more popular, and his music brought him unimagined financial success, but his personal life began a downward spiral. A growing addiction to painkillers culminated in his arrest in 1965, and his long absences from home led to his wife filing for divorce, which was finalized in 1968.

In February of the same year, Cash married singer and songwriter June Carter. Cash had first met Carter, a member of the Carter Family, one of the decade’s most popular country-western ensembles, backstage twelve years before, and the two had performed together. By the end of 1968, he succeeded in kicking his drug habit and released the live album At Folsom Prison.

The following year, Cash released another album of his famous prison performances, At San Quentin, which included the comical pop hit “A Boy Named Sue.” Cash went on to star in his own television variety hour and to cameo in several Hollywood films.

One of the most prolific recording artists of all time, in any genre, Cash released his 129th, and final, album, American IV: The Man Comes Around, in 2003. Its fusion of religious tunes and covers of songs by such contemporary artists as Nine Inch Nails and Sting earned Cash his eleventh Grammy Award.

Cash died of complications from diabetes on September 12, 2003, having sold more than 50 million records in his lifetime. He was one of only two men (with Elvis Presley) to be inducted into both the Country Music and Rock and Roll halls of fame.

Chris Rutherford

Further Reading

Cash, Johnny. Cash: The Autobiography. San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1998.

Miller, Stephen. Johnny Cash: The Life of an American Icon. London: Omnibus, 2003.

Castaneda, Carlos (1925–1998)

Carlos Cesar Salvador Arana Castaneda was a controversial counterculture philosopher and writer often hailed as the literary embodiment of the drug-infused 1960s. Through his Don Juan series of books, Castaneda reached out to those who feared that modern civilization alienated them from their spiritual natures, and he provided them with guides to help explore older and more esoteric forms of knowledge.

In The Teachings of Don Juan: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge (1968), Castaneda described his 1960 apprenticeship to Don Juan Matus, a Native American shaman (sorcerer) who initiated him into what he called “non-ordinary reality.” During this period, Castaneda was studying anthropology at the University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA) and maintained that his conversations with Don Juan were real; the objectivity of his writings was later questioned. Castaneda based his 1967 master’s thesis on his field notes and was subsequently granted a doctorate for his third book, Journey to Ixtlan: The Lessons of Don Juan (1972), which had followed on the heels of his second book, Separate Reality: Further Conversations with Don Juan (1971).

Whether he wrote fact or fiction, Castaneda’s timing was exquisite and his works struck a chord with the public. He published during the turbulent 1960s and early 1970s, a period in which many Americans turned away from education, affluence, and even social movements as sources of personal happiness. Many turned inward, seeking inspiration or comfort from Asian religions, transcendental meditation, mysticism, music, and the mind-altering drugs endorsed by such counterculture icons as Timothy Leary and Ken Kesey.

Castaneda maintained that shamanic wisdom could not be understood in logical terms. Don Juan instructed him to renounce all desire for rational explanation and to use the psychotropic plants that Native Americans had used for centuries to assist them on their internal journeys: peyote (mescaline), jimson weed, and psilocybin mushrooms. Drugs, he maintained, are neither good nor evil in themselves, but they have the power to evoke strong emotions and enable the user to discover and/or explore possibilities inaccessible to the rational mind.

Castaneda described his yearlong apprenticeship to Don Juan as difficult, his drug experiences as both exhilarating and terrifying. At one point, he turned into a crow, and later he struggled with a witch for ownership of his soul. Although he wanted to trust Don Juan’s assertion that fear is the enemy of knowledge, he initially ended his training and returned to the secular world of modern America. It took him many years to attain the status of shaman.

Castaneda's books all became best sellers. They were well written and credible, and they sent many admirers rushing to the Sonoran Desert, although none ever located Don Juan. Botanists maintained that hallucinogenic mushrooms never grew in that desert, and critics began accusing Castaneda of filling Don Juan's mouth with the ideas of other philosophers and writers: Ludwig Wittgenstein, Friedrich Nietzsche, and C.S. Lewis.

Critics also questioned Castaneda's account of his own background. Although he gave his date of birth as December 25, 1931, and the birthplace as São Paulo, Brazil, immigration records indicated that he was born in Cajamarca, Peru, on December 25, 1925. Castaneda claimed that his mother died when he was seven years old and that he was raised by his father, a university professor. His father was, in fact, a goldsmith, and his mother died when he was twenty-four.

Philosopher or con man, Castaneda profoundly affected the American counterculture. His books have remained in print into the twenty-first century. Defenders of Castaneda's work maintain that his writings contain deep spiritual truths that would be valid even if Don Juan Matus never existed. Castaneda died of cancer on April 27, 1998.

Mary Stanton

See also: Hippies; Kesey, Ken; Leary, Timothy.

Further Reading

De Mille, Richard. Castaneda's Journey: The Power and the Allegory. Brooklyn, NY: Capra, 1976.

Fikes, Jay Courtney. Carlos Castaneda, Academic Optimism and the Psychedelic Sixties. Victoria, Canada: Millennia, 1996.

Silverman, David. Reading Castaneda: A Prologue to the Social Sciences. London: Routledge, 1975.

William, Donald Lee. Border Crossings: A Psychological Perspective on Carlos Castaneda's Path of Knowledge. Toronto, Canada: City, 1981.

Catcher in the Rye, The

J.D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye (1951) is a bildungsroman, or coming-of-age novel, that first achieved cult status and then found its way onto high school and college reading lists across the United States. The novel's protagonist, Holden Caulfield, has become—like Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn, to whom he is sometimes compared—an icon of youthful alienation. In its twentieth-century iteration, Caulfield's adolescent rebellion may be credited with making existential angst (if not depression) fashionable. Written in provocative language and dealing with adolescent sexuality, this controversial book has been both venerated and scorned since its publication, while selling tens of millions of copies and being translated into dozens of foreign languages.

The novel takes place in a post–World War II era that is depicted as materialistic and conservative, marked by growing affluence, conformity, and fear of nuclear attack. Rebelling from an adult world that he sees as relentlessly “phony,” superficial, and dishonest, the exquisitely sensitive and judgmental Caulfield champions a nonconformity fabulously (and famously) symbolized by his red hunting hat. His quest for truth and for an authentic identity as a protector of childhood innocence and honesty depends not only on championing individuality, but also on resisting the pressure to grow up. Maturity, for Caulfield, is necessarily connected to adult hypocrisy. Ironically, the novel is complicated by its first-person perspective—a flashback that Caulfield narrates from a psychiatric hospital.

More than half a century after its publication, The Catcher in the Rye remains at the center of debates over censorship and the First Amendment right to freedom of speech, occupying a position near the top of the American Library Association's list of banned books. In the twenty-first century, it has continued to be torn from library shelves, challenged for its sexual content, vulgar language, and subversive tone.

Critics have even condemned the novel for encouraging murder and suicide: Mark David Chapman, who murdered singer-songwriter John Lennon in New York City in 1980, was carrying a copy of the novel at the time of the shooting. The book also is criticized for inspiring John Hinckley, Jr., who attempted to assassinate President Ronald Reagan in 1981, and for influencing musician Kurt Cobain, who committed suicide in 1994.

Despite the book's notoriety, countless readers, both male and female, have identified with the isolated, lonely, and misunderstood Holden Caulfield. His expression of discontent and his paean to innocence, sincerity, and nonconformity have resonated with generations of teenagers. A favorite of baby boomers and their offspring, this core work of countercultural literature continues to speak to alienated adolescents everywhere who seek to resist authority.

Deborah D. Rogers

See also: Baby Boomers: Salinger, J.D.

Further Reading

Bloom, Harold, ed. J.D. Salinger. New York: Chelsea House, 2002.

Kubica, Chris, and Will Hochman, eds. Letters to J.D. Salinger. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2002.

Catholic Worker Movement

The Catholic Worker Movement, founded in 1933, promotes the “justice and charity of Jesus Christ” by providing food and shelter to the needy. While its 185 communities worldwide are officially unaffiliated with the Catholic Church, each house is dedicated to Christian belief in the God-given dignity of every person and pursues the cause of social justice in a unique way.

The Catholic Worker Movement arose in New York City through the efforts of religious social activists Dorothy

Day and Peter Maurin. As a student in college, Day had struggled to reconcile her childhood Christian faith with a growing sense of responsibility for the urban poor. She had joined with several Greenwich Village socialist writers during and after World War I to protest what she saw as the excessive materialism and injustice of America's capitalist system. Following a period of intense spiritual searching, Day and her daughter, Tamar, left New York's bohemian community for the more structured world of Roman Catholic worship and tradition. It was there that she met the communitarian anarchist Maurin, who showed her how her newfound faith also provided fertile ground for a radical cultural politics. Under Maurin's tutelage, Day took a vow of poverty as an expression of solidarity with America's working and lower classes.

An ardent critic of American capitalism, social injustice, poverty, and war, Dorothy Day cofounded the Catholic Worker Movement with Peter Maurin in 1933 to address society's problems "in accordance with the justice and charity of Jesus." (Library of Congress)

On May Day 1933, in the midst of the mass unemployment of the Great Depression, Day and Maurin began handing out copies of their new periodical, The Catholic Worker, in New York's Times Square. Their mission was to offer readers a religious, small-group alternative to the secular, state-centered reforms of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal economic recovery program, which, they believed, would simply perpetuate the subjugation of individuals to impersonal economic and political forces. Communist and socialist organizing, they believed, also failed to live up to the divine standard of Catholic liturgy and fellowship, which Day now asserted was the only true communism.

By 1936, The Catholic Worker enjoyed a circulation of more than 150,000, primarily in New York City parishes. Sympathetic volunteers set up urban "houses of hospitality" as a means of instituting their communitarian piety. Worker houses in New York City promoted familial bonds among staff, while providing opportunities for them to feed, clothe, and shelter those hurt most by the Depression. Although they did lend occasional support to the labor movement led by the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), Day and Maurin's interests lay more in liberating Americans from industrialism and wage labor altogether.

To that end, Catholic Workers established their first farm commune, in Easton, Pennsylvania, in 1936. The commune was run on principles of worker agrarianism, after the manner of medieval monasticism, to stimulate cooperative hard work, ascetic discipline, and mutual respect, while nurturing participants' ties to God and nature. Both house and farm members set aside regular time for prayer and worship, and they held meetings each week to "clarify" the goals of their movement.

After losing significant support during World War II for its staunch pacifism, the Catholic Worker Movement recovered quickly and expanded operations during the postwar era. The commitment of members to nonviolence, which they regarded as a natural extension of the teachings of Christ, became more pronounced during the social and political upheaval of the 1960s, when the organization joined student protestors against the Vietnam War.

Today, Catholic Worker houses and farms engage in a number of relief and resistance efforts, from combating inner-city poverty to aiding environmental causes and opposing the death penalty. The organization remains bound by hope for the kind of cooperative society that, in Maurin's oft-repeated words, "makes it easier for people to be good."

Mark Edwards

See also: Communitarianism.

Further Reading

Catholic Worker Movement. <http://www.catholicworker.org>

Day, Dorothy. The Long Loneliness: An Autobiography. New York: Harper and Row, 1952.

Fisher, James Terence. The Catholic Counterculture in America, 1933–1962. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1989.

Piehl, Mel. Breaking Bread: The Catholic Workers and the Origins of Catholic Radicalism in America. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1982.

CBGB

CBGB, a famous New York nightclub located at 315 Bowery in Manhattan, was founded by Hilly Kristal in December 1973. The rundown neighborhood, adjacent to Greenwich Village, consisted of industrial buildings and flophouses that housed alcoholics, drug addicts, and ex-convicts. Despite its unseemly location, however, CBGB thrived as a destination for punk bands throughout the 1970s and 1980s.

Kristal had operated a bar at the same location from 1969 to 1972, called Hilly's on the Bowery. The new club—with the full name CBGB & OMFUG (Country, Bluegrass, Blues, and Other Music for Uplifting Gormandizers)—was established as a venue for the musical styles indicated by its acronym, but it soon emerged as a legendary club for punk rock.

The first punk band to perform at CBGB was Television, whose debut concert was held on March 31, 1974. A number of other punk acts appeared at the club throughout the 1970s. These included leading bands and solo performers of the genre such as Blondie, the Fleshtones, the Ramones, the Shirts, Patti Smith, and Talking Heads. Kristal required that every band perform original music, thereby barring "cover" bands, or those that performed other artists' music exclusively.

CBGB gained further notoriety when one of its most frequent performing groups, the Ramones, was signed to a recording contract with Sire Records in 1975 and went on to superstardom. In addition, Kristal organized the Festival of Unrecorded Rock Talent in July and August 1975, which had on its roster several prominent punk rock bands. The event intentionally coincided with the Newport Folk Festival, a long-standing annual event in Rhode Island known for featuring musicians who would eventually become superstars. The CBGB festival was very well attended, assuring its place as an iconic rock and roll destination.

During the early 1980s, CBGB continued to be a hot spot for bands touring in New York, among them Bad Religion, Living Colour, Sonic Youth, and Soul Asylum. Staying true to its origins as a punk music destination, CBGB also had so-called Sunday Matinees that featured hardcore punk bands, such as the Gorilla Biscuits, Reagan Youth, and Youth of Today. The 1990s also brought a varied mix of musical talent, such as Cowboy Junkies, Helmet, Lisa Loeb, and G. Love and Special Sauce.

During its later years, CBGB was often without heat and adequate plumbing. This did not keep a number of famous bands from making the landmark nightclub a stop on their tours. In the 2000s, headliners, such as Guns N' Roses, Alan Jackson, and Shakira, performed on its stage.

CBGB closed its doors on October 15, 2006, after a lease dispute between Kristal and his landlord, the Bowery Residents' Committee, which accused him of owing more than $91,000 in back rent; Kristal claimed that he had never been notified of a rent increase. (The two parties had reached an agreement in 2005 that would allow the club to remain open for fourteen more months.) The final concert was performed by Patti Smith, who was joined by Flea from the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Richard Lloyd from Television. Hilly Kristal died of complications from lung cancer on August 28, 2007.

Lindsay Schmitz

See also: Punk Rock.

Further Reading

Kozak, Robert. This Ain't No Disco: The Story of CBGB. Boston: Faber and Faber, 1988.

Kristal, Hilly. CBGB & OMFUG: Thirty Years from the Home of Underground Punk. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 2005.

Cedar Tavern

The Cedar Tavern, also known as the Cedar Street Tavern, located at 24 University Place in the West Village of New York City, was a hangout for abstract expressionist artists and emerging literary voices in the 1950s. Painters, such as Franz Kline, Willem de Kooning, Robert Motherwell, Jackson Pollock, and Mark Rothko, met to talk theory and drink heavily. Poets such as Kenneth Koch and Frank O'Hara could be seen in the Cedar Tavern, as were the Beat writers Gregory Corso, Allen Ginsberg, Jack Kerouac, and Jack Micheline. Tourists seeking a glimpse of a well-known artist or writer finally found their way into the crowded, smoky bar as well.

The Cedar Tavern was not considered one of New York's true literary hangouts, like the San Remo bar, the legendary White Horse Tavern, or the West End bar. It stood in contrast to the conservative values and style of post-World War II suburban society, featuring austere wooden tables, simple booths, and small tables. Patrons demanded that the room be free of jukeboxes or televisions. It was an unadorned public space to drink and smoke, often to excess, and talk. The Cedar Tavern was not a haven for all to come for understanding and acceptance. Rather, it was a place where established and newly emerging artists, both literary and artistic, gathered to discuss—or argue about—their ideas and inspirations. Pollock was known to challenge newcomers to fistfights, which usually resulted in his buying the person a drink; actual fistfights in the confines of the Cedar Tavern were rare. Sometimes, in a drunken, macho mood, Pollock would harass Frank O'Hara for being gay; this did not keep O'Hara from liking to drink there and writing poems inspired by the conversations of the abstract expressionist masters. De Kooning and his wife, Elaine, often worked out their marital issues in the midst of their peers.

Artistic temperaments fueled by whiskey led to other outbursts and raucous behavior. Legend has it that Pollock, who eventually was banned from the place, ripped the door from the men's room. In an unrelated incident, Kerouac was reported as urinating into a sink, or an ashtray, depending on who tells the story.

The original Cedar Tavern burned in a fire and was reopened in 1963 three blocks north, at 82 University Place. The new location welcomed alternative voices, especially those who protested the Vietnam War, such as Tuli Kupferberg, the poet, publisher, and cofounder of the rock group the Fugs, and other counterculture figures. The bar finally closed in December 2006, to allow unrelated construction on the building.

Michael Susko

See also: Abstract Expressionism; Beat Generation.

Further Reading

Gooch, Brad. City Poet: The Life and Times of Frank O'Hara. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1993.

Kerouac, Jack. "The Roaming Beatniks." In Kerouac and Friends: A Beat Generation Album, ed. Fred W. McDarrah and Timothy S. McDarrah. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 2002.

McDarrah, Fred W., and Gloria S. McDarrah. "Cedar Street Tavern." In Beat Generation: Glory Days in Greenwich Village. New York: Schirmer, 1997.

Chautauqua Movement

Chautauqua was a nineteenth-century educational experiment that pioneered the concepts of adult education and lifelong learning. Established in 1872 at a Methodist camp meeting site in a small resort town on Chautauqua Lake in western New York State, it was originally a two-week Bible institute to train teachers for the Sunday schools that had become a popular feature of Protestant churches. The Reverend John Heyl Vincent, editor of the Sunday School Journal and responsible for Sunday school programming for the Methodist-Episcopal Church, served as director, offering his students outdoor classes, swimming, a variety of recreational activities, comfortable lodging, and supplemental lectures in the sciences and humanities. As word spread about the quality of his program, applications increased.

In 1874, Vincent welcomed Lewis Miller, an Ohio industrialist and father-in-law of inventor Thomas Edison, as the camp's codirector. Miller's generous financial contributions allowed the program to expand to eight weeks long. With Miller's organizational skill and Vincent's vision, Chautauqua thrived. More lectures were added, boardinghouses were constructed, and registration was opened to paying guests who had no connection to church work but simply wanted a stimulating summer vacation.

Vincent gave the participants access to theologians, politicians, explorers, writers, musicians, scientists, and orators, including former president Ulysses S. Grant, educator Booker T. Washington, social worker Jane Addams, and prohibitionist Carry Nation. Many of them, especially women, found in Chautauqua an alternative to the higher education that they had never been able to pursue. D.H. Post, writing in the August 1879 issue of Harper's New Monthly, praised Vincent for "meeting the wants of those to whom the doors of knowledge and culture have hitherto been locked and barred."

In its time, the Chautauqua concept was as revolutionary as the "freedom schools" and "people's universities" of the 1960s and 1970s. The format was so compelling that assemblies of "little Chautauquas" soon formed across the nation—the vast majority in rural communities.

By the turn of the twentieth century, there were more than 200 local chapters, and the "mother Chautauqua" had added a winter session and a Literary and Scientific Circle, offering home study through a guided reading program. In 1884, Vincent established Chautauqua University and granted diplomas for completing a four-year correspondence course. He also published the monthly Chautauquan and sponsored the first book-of-the-month club through the Chautauqua Press, founded in 1898.

Chautauqua assembly grounds, like this one in Indiana in 1908, attracted throngs of small-town Americans for secular adult education, culture, and entertainment. The Chautauqua movement peaked in the years leading up to World War I. (Library of Congress)

Vincent's intellectual curiosity, energy, and enthusiasm for adult education constituted the "Chautauqua idea," praised as both progressive and democratic. President Theodore Roosevelt called it the "most American thing in America." While the institute was nondenominational, it broadly subscribed to the tenets of the Protestant Social Gospel, a movement dedicated to alleviating suffering and injustice by changing society, rather than by saving individual souls. Chautauqua endorsed political reform, temperance, woman suffrage, and child-labor laws.

Although social reformer Edward Everett Hale maintained that "if you have not spent a week at Chautauqua you do not know your country," and populist William Jennings Bryan called it a "potent human factor in molding the mind of the nation," novelist Sinclair Lewis derided Chautauqua as "nothing but wind and chaff and the laughter of yokels," and psychologist William James called it "depressing and mediocre." Lewis and James considered it a poor imitation of its predecessor, the American Lyceum, a forum established in 1826 as a platform for lecturers such as Charles Dickens, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Mark Twain, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and the abolitionist Henry Ward Beecher. Although the American Lyceum had inspired Vincent's work and he shared many of its objectives, Chautauqua was more inclusive, lighthearted, and anti-elitist. The Lyceum appealed primarily to Northeastern intellectuals, while Chautauqua's roots grew deep in the rural Midwest.

Like the lyceum movement, which had not survived the American Civil War, Chautauqua employed speakers' bureaus to book lecturers. The most successful of these agents was James Redpath, a former abolitionist and journalist for the New York Tribune. In 1904, Redpath's Chicago booking agent, Keith Vawter, proposed that towns and villages that were unable support their own Chautauqua chapters sign up for his "circuit Chautauqua," which, like the circus, would return every summer.

A Vawter Chautauqua contract provided a three-to seven-day educational program of lectures, music, dramatic readings, and entertainment. He assumed all transportation costs and talent fees and hired work crews to set up and take down the tents he supplied for performance space. Local communities were responsible for selling tickets and guaranteeing coverage of any financial shortfalls. In 1907, Vawter's circuit included thirty-three towns. By then, the emphasis was clearly shifting from education to entertainment, and Vawter was booking opera singers, magicians, oompah bands, acrobats, and comedians. Chautauqua tents were pitched in more than 10,000 communities before World War I and had reached audiences totaling nearly 45 million.

Chautauqua remained a popular fixture of early-twentieth-century American culture, reaching its peak in the mid-1920s. The Great Depression, however, beginning with the stock market crash of 1929, sowed seeds of decline. Families were no longer able to afford tickets, and towns and villages could no longer guarantee booking-agent fees. By the time the Depression lifted, radio and "talkies" were offering year-round entertainment, and automobiles and paved roads had increased mobility, effectively ending rural isolation.

Unable to compete, Vawter retired in 1926, and most Chautauqua tents vanished by 1933. Interest in lifelong learning continued, however, fed by a growing demand for university-level adult education, extension courses, community colleges, and, later, such programs as Elderhostel, which combine vacation time and study.

Mary Stanton

See also: Le Sueur, Meridel.

Further Reading

Crocker, Kathleen, and Jane Currie. Chautauqua Institution. Charleston, SC: Arcadia, 2001.

Gould, Joseph E. The Chautauqua Movement: An Episode in the Continuing American Revolution. Albany: State University of New York, 1961.

Harrison, Harry P. Culture Under Canvas: The Story of Tent Chautauqua. As told to Karl Detzer. New York: Hastings House, 1958.

Reiser, Andrew. The Chautauqua Movement: Protestants, Progressives and the Culture of Modern Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.

Scott, Marian. Chautauqua Caravan. New York: D. Appleton-Century, 1939.

Simpson, Jeffrey. Chautauqua: An American Utopia. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1999.

Chávez, César (1927–1993)

Born into the early-twentieth-century U.S. Southwest, where the majority of Mexican Americans were trapped in cycles of poverty propagated by discriminatory labor practices, César Chávez devoted his life to effecting change for migrant farmworkers, and he became one of the most prominent and influential leaders of the civil rights movements of the 1960s and 1970s. As a strict adherent to nonviolent protest and activism, Chávez organized strikes and boycotts, cofounded and directed labor organizations, campaigned with Democratic presidential contender Robert F. Kennedy for workers' rights, and successfully lobbied for agricultural labor reform.

Chávez was born in Yuma, Arizona, on March 31, 1927, the grandson of Mexican immigrants. After his parents lost their farm during the Great Depression, Chávez's family joined migrant workers in California to earn a living. As was the case for many children of migrant workers, Chávez was able to attend school only through the eighth grade; he then had to work in the fields to help support his family.

Despite this early end to his formal education, from a young age Chávez devoted much of his time to reading about and studying diverse topics, especially philosophy and history. Along with his personal experience of exploitative practices as a migrant worker and as a Mexican American, Chávez's readings shaped his philosophy with respect to farmworkers' rights and civil rights in general.

During the 1950s, Chávez worked with the grassroots Community Service Organization (CSO), a Los Angeles–based organization with chapters across California that sought to increase Chicano and Latino participation in political change. Initially recruited to help with CSO's voter registration project, Chávez served with CSO for many years—including a term as national director from the late 1950s to 1962. In the latter years, when he could not convince the CSO to devote more time to farmworkers' rights, he left the organization to form the National Farm Workers Association (NFWA), a nonprofit organization based in Delano, California, specifically created to organize workers and lobby for their rights.

At the time, in California and many other states, the formation of a union to negotiate wages and working conditions on behalf of workers was illegal. This left farmworkers largely at the mercy of employers, who treated them as second-class citizens because they were of nonwhite descent. Chávez worked with NFWA cofounder Dolores Huerta to join Mexican Americans in cooperation against discrimination and horrendous working and living conditions. Both Chávez and Huerta believed that the differences between employers and workers were exacerbated by long-standing stereotypes and racism in the Southwest. One of their main organizing goals was to encourage Mexican Americans to be proud of their culture and stand up for their rights.

In Delano, on September 16, 1965, Chávez spoke to Mexican American workers who were employed by local grape growers, and inspired them to join Filipino laborers in a collective strike against their employers. The success of his efforts that day contributed to Chávez's recognition as the central figure of the strike and a symbol of solidarity within the larger Chicano counterculture.

During the grape strike, the NFWA faced many obstacles, including extreme poverty, exacerbated by the fact that no one on strike could earn any money. Additionally, the strikers faced police brutality and other strikebreaking practices, as well as investigation by the U.S. Senate for including people alleged to be Communist sympathizers.

Chávez stood firm in his beliefs and consistently fought against racism and exploitation. Inspired by the teachings of peace activists Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and Mohandas Gandhi, Chávez endorsed only nonviolent means of protest and activism. His stance often conflicted with that of other NFWA members, who—after years of frustrating experiences on the picket lines and in the courts—believed that Mexican Americans would not gain any ground with peaceful tactics.

In 1966, still in the early phase of the campaign against grape growers, Chávez led a march from Delano to Sacramento, in which the workers put their Roman Catholic faith and Mexican American identity proudly into the foreground. An image of the Virgin of Guadalupe, the patron saint of Mexico and intercessor for indigenous peoples, led the march. The flags of Mexico and the United States, as well as the Aztec black eagle on the red flag of the NFWA (later the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee; UFWOC or UFW), were central to the battle to valorize the history and identity of Mexican Americans. In Sacramento, Chávez read from the Plan of Delano, a document by Luis Valdez, a key figure in the Chicano Movement. The text recounted the history of Mexican and Mexican American exploitation in the United States, which Chávez evoked as an inspirational call for the strikers and other poor to persevere against oppression.

Chávez was also an advocate and practitioner of fasting on behalf of social justice and spiritual causes. In 1968, in the middle of a strike action, tensions were particularly high among the strikers. Chávez chose to fast, ultimately gaining national attention for the workers' cause. At the end of Chávez's twenty-five-day fast, Kennedy visited him to show his solidarity with the farmworkers and, as a fellow Catholic, to join Chávez as he broke the fast at mass.

In 1970, Chávez and other leaders of the UFW sat down with grape growers and negotiated to end the strikes, with the growers agreeing to substantial changes in the treatment of workers. Later in the decade, in the wake of contract disputes, Chávez coordinated an international boycott of grapes. This boycott resulted in further protections for farmworkers and, ultimately, passage of the 1975 Agricultural Labor Relations Act, which provided for the right of workers to unionize.

Chávez continued to fast, study, pray, and organize until his death on April 23, 1993. His work was an integral part of the entire Chicano Movement, and the victories in the fields for even the most uneducated Mexican Americans inspired the Chicano community as a whole to demand recognition for their place in U.S. society. Chávez took his place in history books as one of the most inspiring and effective leaders of the modern civil rights movement.

Jean Anne Lauer

See also: Latino and Latina Culture: United Farm Workers.

Further Reading

Garcia, Richard A. , ed. The Chicanos in America 1540–1974: A Chronology and Fact Book. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1977.

Muñoz, Carlos, Jr. Youth, Identity, Power: The Chicano Movement. New York: Verso, 1989.

Treviño, Jesús Salvador. Eyewitness: A Filmmaker's Memoir of the Chicano Movement. Houston, TX: Arte Público, 2001.

Cheech and Chong

Richard Anthony “Cheech” Marin and Thomas “Tommy” Chong, known as the comedy duo Cheech and Chong, became icons of the drug, hippie, and free love counterculture of the 1970s and early 1980s with their stand-up comedy routines, ten comedy albums, and seven feature films. Marin, who is Mexican American, played a cholo, or Chicano gangster from Los Angeles; Chong, a Canadian-born actor, musician, and songwriter of Chinese and Scotch-Irish descent, played a stereotypical burnt-out drug addict whose life centered on “getting high.”

Marin was born on July 13, 1946, in the barrio of East Los Angeles. He was one of eight children. Marin's father, a Los Angeles police officer, eventually moved his family to the city's San Fernando Valley section. Marin earned his nickname, Cheech, from cheecharone, a Chicano delicacy made of deep-fried pork skins, also known as cracklings. In later interviews, Marin described himself as a “wise-ass” who played hooky from high school, but still managed to graduate with straight As. He earned a B.A. in English from California State University, Northridge, in 1968 and moved to Vancouver, Canada, to flee the draft during the Vietnam War. It was in Vancouver that he met Tommy Chong.

Thomas “Tommy” B. Kin Chong was born in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, on May 24, 1938, and grew up in a neighborhood of Calgary he referred to as Dog Patch. Chong’s father, a World War II veteran and truck driver, had moved the family to Calgary to be closer to a veterans’ hospital. Chong began his career as a rhythm-and-blues musician while still a teenager. After moving with his band to Vancouver, he bought an after-hours bistro called the Elegant Parlour, where he played music and entertained the local crowd. When his interests shifted to comedy, Chong formed City Works, a local comedy troupe that performed at the bistro. In 1968, he hired Cheech to perform with City Works for $60 a week. The pair soon formed a comedy duo and headed out on the road, performing one-night stands down the West Coast to California.

Cheech and Chong were performing at the influential Troubadour Club in Los Angeles when they were spotted by a record-company executive and signed to a contract. Their first album, Cheech & Chong (1972), went gold, and their second, Big Bambu (1972) was voted the year’s number one comedy album. Their third release, Los Cochinos (The Pigs), earned a Grammy Award in 1973 for Best Comedy Recording, and their fourth, Cheech & Chong’s Wedding Album (1974), extended their success.

Cheech and Chong’s first movie, Up in Smoke, directed by Lou Adler, was the runaway comedy hit of 1978; its box-office success made them the most successful film comedy duo of all time. Their second film, Cheech & Chong’s Next Movie (1980), directed by Chong, was critically acclaimed but marginally less successful at the box office. Nevertheless, the combined revenue for theatrical release of both films was more than $160 million.

In the early 1980s, Cheech and Chong each bought homes outside Los Angeles, married, and had children. They continued to make albums and films together until 1985, after which the act broke up over creative differences.

Cheech went on to a successful career as a character actor in major Hollywood movies and became a collector of Latino art. Chong, however, was convicted of selling drug paraphernalia and served nine months in a federal prison in 2003 and 2004. Since his release, Chong has appeared on Broadway in a one-man show and guest-starred on the Fox network hit television series That ’70s Show, playing, predictably, an aging “stoner,” or marijuana smoker.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: Marijuana.

Further Reading

Chong, Tommy. The I Chong: Meditations from the Joint. New York: Simon Spotlight Entertainment, 2006.

Sharon, Adam and Greg Sharon. The Cheech and Chong Bible. Harrison, NY: Brown Stane, 2002.

Chelsea Hotel

The Hotel Chelsea (dubbed the Chelsea Hotel or simply the Chelsea by guests) is the fabled residence of writers, artists, musicians, and bohemians on the West Side of Manhattan in New York City. A self-proclaimed “rest stop for rare individuals,” construction on the landmark red-brick building was begun in 1883, and it opened as an apartment cooperative the following year. The twelve-story structure, located at 222 West Twenty-Third Street, between Seventh and Eighth avenues, was the tallest building in the city until 1902. The original co-op dissolved due to financial problems, and the Chelsea was converted into a hotel in 1905.

Among the literary lights who lived and worked in the Chelsea during its early years as a hotel were O. Henry, Edgar Lee Masters, and Mark Twain. It became a hotbed of leftist political ideology during the Great Depression, while a host of writers and poets found it a propitious place to work. Novelist Thomas Wolfe completed Look Homeward, Angel (1929) and The Web and the Rock (1939) while living there. Composer Virgil Thomson, who won the Pulitzer Prize for Music in 1949 for his film score for Louisiana Story, moved in in 1937 and stayed until his death in 1989. The poet Dylan Thomas died of alcohol poisoning under the hotel's roof in November 1953.

In 1940, the hotel was bought by an investment group at a foreclosure sale, and David Bard became the manager. He continued in that capacity until the mid-1960s, when his son Stanley took over; grandson David managed the Chelsea in the early 2000s. Over the years, the management of the hotel has sought to accommodate the creative and sometimes eccentric spirit of its tenants and respect their privacy above all else. The choreographer and dancer Katherine Dunham once used an upstairs corridor for a rehearsal of the opera Aida, complete with the large cast and two African lions. Andy Warhol made a film, The Chelsea Girls (1966), about the lives of his fashion "superstars" there. Science fiction writer Arthur C. Clarke, who wrote 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) while he was a tenant, once said the only hotel rule was "Bring out your own dead."

The names of residents and guests who have passed through the Chelsea's doors include a litany of the famous and infamous: Beat Generation writers William S. Burroughs, Gregory Corso, and Allen Ginsberg; playwrights Brendan Behan, Arthur Miller, and Tennessee Williams; musicians Bob Dylan, Janis Joplin, and Patti Smith; and visual artists Jasper Johns, Robert Mapplethorpe, and Diego Rivera. Folk singer Joni Mitchell wrote the popular song "Chelsea Morning" while living there. And it is believed that punk rock musician Sid Vicious murdered his girlfriend, Nancy Spungen, in Room 100 (later incorporated into four other apartments) in 1978.

Of the more than 400 rooms and apartments in the Chelsea Hotel today, about 75 percent are occupied by long-term residents. Paintings by present and former residents adorn the lobby, along with five commemorative plaques celebrating past tenants. The open stairway with iron railing leads up to a skylight twelve stories above the lobby.

The Chelsea continues to attract avant-garde artists and a bohemian clientele. While it now offers cable television and wireless Internet connections, it remains an enclave where residents are assured of their privacy and the freedom to create their art.

Jerry Shuttle

See also: Beat Generation.

Further Reading

Hotel Chelsea. <http://www.hotelchelsea.com>

Dudar, Helen, and Enrico Ferorelli. "It's Home Sweet Home for Geniuses, Real or Would-be: New York's Chelsea Hotel." Smithsonian 14 (December 1983) : 94–105.

Turner, Florence. At the Chelsea Hotel. San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1987.

Cherry Lane Theatre

Since opening in March 1924, the Cherry Lane Theatre has provided a venue for avant-garde dramatic artists and writers in New York's Greenwich Village. Today, it is the city's longest-operating off-Broadway theater.

Unhappy with the commercial playhouses of the time, the poet and playwright Edna St. Vincent Millay and members of the Provincetown Players chose to renovate an abandoned box factory at 38 Commerce Street. Since its founding, the Cherry Lane Theatre has been known for producing experimental performances not to be found in traditional commercial playhouses. Especially in the 1950s and 1960s, it provided a space for experimental performances connected with the counterculture.

In 1951 and 1952, the Cherry Lane Theatre was the home of the Living Theatre, an American stage company founded by painter Julian Beck and playwright and actress Judith Malina. Its performances provided an alternative to the commercialism and trend toward realism then prevalent in American theater. The plays had no structure or narrative and were more like poetry than traditional drama. In those two years, the group performed a total of nine plays, including Desire Caught by the Tail and Faustina. In 1952, the New York City Fire Department shut down the facility, canceling the group's final two plays, Ubu Roi and The Heroes, because the sets were deemed fire hazards. Some suggested that the closure actually was a reaction by municipal authorities to the nontraditional character of the productions.

The Cherry Lane Theatre also hosted musical performances. In 1952, it accommodated a series of folk music concerts; the performers included such counterculture figures as Pete Seeger and Bob Dylan.

Cherry Lane Theatre also played host to early performances of the Theatre of the Absurd, a group of plays written in the decades following World War II primarily by European playwrights. These plays attempted to dramatize the meaninglessness of life; they lacked meaningful plots and realistic characters and negotiated the line between art and chaos. Among these works was a staging of Samuel Beckett's Endgame at Cherry Lane in 1957. In 1962, the Cherry Lane Theatre hosted a series of Theater of the Absurd productions, featuring works by Beckett, Edward Albee, Fernando Arrabal, Jean Genet, Eugène Ionesco, Kenneth Koch, and Jack Richardson.

The theater also featured shows that depicted and commented on racial tensions in America. In 1964, for example, Cherry Lane mounted LeRoi Jones's Dutchman. In that work, as in others, Jones, later known as Amiri Baraka, focused on an interracial relationship and attempted to show how whites corrupted African American culture. The play won an Obie Award for best off-Broadway play in 1964.

In 1996, Angelina Fiodellisi took over the theater, hoping to revitalize the Greenwich Village landmark physically, financially, and artistically. She formed a nonprofit organization called Cherry Lane Alternative to mentor and support emerging playwrights. In addition to continuing the commitment to up-and-coming writers, the theater has revived popular plays from earlier decades, including Beckett's Happy Days (1961) and Jones's Dutchman.

Matthew J. Johnson

See also: Greenwich Village, New York City: Theater, Alternative.

Further Reading

Cherry Lane Theatre. <http://www.cherrylanetheatre.org>

Esslin, Martin. The Theatre of the Absurd. New York: Vintage Books, 2004.

Wilson, Edwin. Living Theatre: A History. Boston: McGraw-Hill, 2000.

Chicago Seven

The Chicago Seven were anti-Vietnam War activists who were charged with criminal conspiracy and incitement to riot in the wake of violent protests outside the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. The trial, held from September 24, 1969, to February 18, 1970, was originally to include eight defendants— Rennie Davis, David Dellinger, John Froines, Tom Hayden, Abbie Hoffman, Jerry Rubin, Lee Weiner, and Bobby Seale. The case against Seale, a cofounder of the Black Panther Party, was later separated from the main proceeding.

In August 1968, the Democratic National Committee gathered in Chicago to formally choose a presidential candidate. Antiwar groups from around the country came to protest what they regarded as the party's lack of commitment to ending the conflict in Vietnam. Despite being denied a permit to rally near the convention, approximately 20,000 demonstrators— carrying signs, banners, and bullhorns—gathered at the site and encountered heavily armed municipal police. Under the direction of Mayor Richard J. Daley, the police promptly launched tear gas at the demonstrators, pummeled individual protestors with their batons, and arrested hundreds—all in front of the national television media.

Representatives from an array of left-wing organizations were among those arrested and charged. As cofounder of the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), Hayden represented the student-based New Left; Seale was a leader of the militant Black Panther Party; Davis was the national coordinator for the National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam (the Mobe); a longtime pacifist, Dellinger was affiliated with the wider peace and antiwar movement; and Rubin and Hoffman were the founders of the Youth International Party, a national organization, whose adherents were known as yippies, that actively protested the Vietnam War and was strongly identified with the American counterculture. Despite their significant contributions to planning the protest, no women faced criminal prosecution. Several members of the Chicago Seven had never even met each other before the protests at the convention.

Ramsey Clark, the attorney general for the Lyndon B. Johnson administration, declined to bring charges against the group in 1968. Early the following year, however, the newly installed administration of President Richard M. Nixon—in particular, Attorney General John Mitchell—having campaigned on promises of law and order, decided to seek criminal conspiracy charges.

Grand jury indictments were handed down on March 20, and the trial began in federal court six months later. Judge Julius Hoffman presided over the trial; U.S. Attorney Thomas Foran and District Attorney Richard Schultz prosecuted the case for the government; and civil rights and civil liberties lawyers William Kunstler and Leonard Weinglass represented the defendants.

From the beginning, Seale protested being tried with the other defendants. His lawyer, Charles Garry, could not be present because of medical reasons; Seale demanded to defend himself or be represented by a lawyer of his own choosing. Judge Hoffman denied both requests, and Seale began hurling accusations and epithets. On October 29, Judge Hoffman responded to the unremitting outbursts by ordering Seale bound and gagged in the courtroom—which he was for two days of the proceedings. Judge Hoffman finally declared the proceedings against Seale a mistrial and separated his case from that of the other seven defendants.

The trial also featured theatrical tactics from Abbie Hoffman and Rennie Davis, who donned judge's robes to mock Judge Hoffman and the political system. During questioning, Hoffman declared that he was a citizen of "Woodstock Nation." A number of writers and notable counterculture figures testified on behalf of the defendants, including author Norman Mailer and LSD advocate Timothy Leary.

On February 19, 1970, the jury found all seven defendants not guilty of conspiracy. Davis, Hayden, Hoffman, Dellinger, and Rubin were found guilty of the lesser charge of incitement to riot. Weiner and Froines were found not guilty on all counts. The outcome of the trial was as controversial as its conduct, prompting the antiwar counterculture to ask why it had been prosecuted in the first place and angering the more conservative establishment for the failure to punish “hippie radicals.”

Meanwhile, a report to the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, titled Rights in Conflict and published in December 1968, had blamed police actions for the violence outside the convention center.

To the media and many observers, the trial seemed designed to intentionally disrupt the antiwar movement. The charge of conspiracy demonstrated how strong a threat the Nixon administration considered the antiwar movement. The leveling of criminal charges against the leaders and spokesmen of the major counterculture groups suggested the seriousness with which their opposition was taken. To the political left, the members of the Chicago Seven were enshrined as heroes.

Andrew Hannon

See also: Black Panthers; Hoffman, Abbie; New Left; Rubin, Jerry; Students for a Democratic Society; Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Alonso, Karen. Chicago Seven Political Protest Trial: A Headline Court Case. Berkeley Heights, NJ: Enslow, 2002.

Hayden, Tom. Reunion: A Memoir. New York: Random House, 1988.

Hoffman, Abbie. The Autobiography of Abbie Hoffman. 2nd ed. New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 2000.

Seale, Bobby. Seize the Time: The Story of the Black Panther Party and Huey P. Newton. Baltimore: Black Classics, 1991.

Chicano Moratorium

The Chicano Moratorium is the name of both an anti-Vietnam War protest movement nationally active during the years 1969 to 1971 and a pivotal protest event organized by that movement that took place in East Los Angeles on August 29, 1970. Chicano activists opposed to U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War were especially vocal about the discrimination they saw as responsible for disproportionately high Mexican American participation and casualties.

Chicano activists regarded the statistics as appalling: While Mexican Americans constituted approximately 6 percent of the total U.S. population in the late 1960s, they accounted for approximately 20 percent of U.S. casualties in Vietnam. Activists also viewed these statistics as representative of deeper social issues affecting Chicanos, who were statistically less likely to finish high school than Anglo-Americans and were consistently encouraged by guidance counselors to take vocational classes instead of college-prep course work. Without access to higher education, they were especially vulnerable to the draft and more likely to enlist in the armed forces as a career choice. Although these trends were especially evident in the East Los Angeles school system, young people from East L.A. who met other Chicanos at national meetings—such as the Chicano Youth Liberation Conferences, held in 1969 and 1970 in Denver—realized that they were not alone.

In 1969, a number of activists formed a coalition to protest Chicano participation in the war. The coalition was called the National Chicano Moratorium Committee (NCMC). Principal members included Rosalio Muñoz, who had publicly resisted the draft by leading protests at the downtown Los Angeles Selective Service center during 1969, refusing to be inducted; the Brown Berets, a paramilitary Chicano youth organization headquartered in East L.A. from 1967 to 1972, led by David Sanchez; and representatives of El Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlán (The Chicano Student Movement of Aztlán), a multichapter, university-based student organization that emerged in 1969 and still exists in the 2000s. This committee helped local communities organize antiwar rallies and protests in cities across the United States, including East L.A., Chicago, San Francisco, and Houston.

Members of the Brown Berets, a Chicano nationalist youth organization, stand watch during a National Chicano Moratorium Committee demonstration against the Vietnam War, held in Los Angeles in February 1970. (David Fenton/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

At the Chicano Youth Liberation Conference held in March 1970, the NCMC decided to organize a National Chicano Moratorium for August 29, 1970, in East L.A. The event was planned as a peaceful march and demonstration, to unite as many Chicanos from across the nation as possible and to raise the visibility of the Chicano protest to a new level. Prior to the moratorium, the Los Angeles protests had gathered approximately 2,000 people. On August 29, an estimated 30,000 Chicanos gathered for a march down Los Angeles's Whittier Boulevard, to what was then named Laguna Park.

During the march and in Laguna Park, the crowds displayed their unity by affirming both their stance against the war and their Mexican American heritage. Banners called for an end to Chicano deaths in Vietnam, with many declaring that the greatest enemy was not North Vietnam, but social injustice in the United States. Marchers carried signs and flags proclaiming their Mexican heritage, including indigenous cultures. Especially prominent was the banner of the Virgin of Guadalupe, a traditional symbol of Mexican Catholicism with which many Chicanos identified.

Finally, the crowds gathered in Laguna Park to listen to the rally speakers, including César Chávez, the California-based organizer whose primary focus was improving the living and working conditions of migrant agricultural workers, and Gonzalez, who was influential in shaping Chicano community organizations, especially Crusade for Justice, which he had founded in Denver in 1965. The demonstration was peaceful until mid-afternoon, when altercations with the police broke out.

Panic soon erupted, and police tried to clear the area using clubs and tear gas. Protesters responded by rioting, and the violence quickly escalated. Three people died, including Ruben Salazar, a Los Angeles Times reporter who had written extensively about the discrimination, poverty, and lack of access to education that Chicanos in Los Angeles faced. In his honor, Laguna Park is now named Ruben Salazar Park.

After the demonstration, members of the NCMC and other activists of the Chicano Movement renewed their commitment to addressing injustices in the United States against Mexican Americans. The violence of the National Chicano Moratorium galvanized activists and inspired Chicanos to continue to build coalitions with others sharing their causes, including joining national protests against the war and identifying more firmly with other minority-activist groups, such as those in the African American civil rights movement.

Jean Anne Lauer

See also: Chicano Movement.

Further Reading

Garcia, Richard A., ed. The Chicanos in America 1540–1974: A Chronology and Fact Book. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1977.

Haney-López, Ian F. Racism on Trial: The Chicano Fight for Justice. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 2003.

Chicano Movement

The Chicano Movement was a multi-organizational, national campaign during the 1960s and 1970s, in which an unprecedented number of Mexican Americans actively sought ways to increase the visibility of Mexican and Mexican American culture and history in the United States. The activists of the movement called themselves “Chicanos” as a way to declare that they belonged to a new cultural generation—they were not Mexican, not Mexican American, and not American, but rather a combination of all of these identities.

Chicanos from all over the United States created alliances to counter the systematic discrimination they suffered as a historically marginalized community. They did this through protests and occupations on land in the Southwest that had been seized from Mexicans and Mexican Americans through the course of history; labor strikes in California and the Southwest; the creation of a Chicano political party; national voter registration campaigns; protests and sit-ins for education reform, especially in East Los Angeles high schools; the organization of demonstrations against the Vietnam War; media-reform campaigns that called on the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to redress discrimination in television programming; and the display of public art that featured themes significant to Chicano history and culture.

Opposing Assimilation

For generations, many Mexican Americans had lived as second-class citizens in the United States, believing that once they became “American” enough, they would be assimilated into mainstream society. The youth of the Chicano Movement, and the adults who joined them, declared this assimilation both unattainable— from what they experienced daily in Anglo society—and undesirable, as they did not want to have to give up their culture in order to “fit in” to Anglo society.

Until the beginning of the 1960s, Mexican and Mexican American cultures were the objects of official and unofficial oppression at the hands of white society. Sanctions, especially strict in the U.S. South and West, prohibited such activities as voting if someone could not read English (even if that person was a U.S. citizen) or speaking Spanish in public forums (especially in public schools, where students risked expulsion if overheard speaking Spanish). The activists of the Chicano Movement focused attention on learning the history of the U.S. Southwest and the ways in which Mexicans and Mexican Americans had participated in that history, in order to be able to reintroduce their culture into mainstream discourse.

Chicano activists were especially interested in counteracting the repression of Mexican American history in textbooks, and two major historical events were pivotal in inspiring the movement: the 1848 Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, whereby half of Mexico’s territory was annexed by the United States; and the idea of Aztlán, an Aztec ancestral homeland prior to their move south into what is now central Mexico and long before the conquest of the New World by Europeans. According to mythology, Aztlán is located in the heart of the territory Mexico ceded to the United States in 1848. While the Treaty of Guadalupe was an ever-present concern for activists, it was not until the 1970s that the idea of a nation of Aztlán became central to the Chicano counterculture, especially among the youth.

Fighting for Land Reform and Civil Rights

In 1960, the Chicano activist Reies López Tijerina began investigating land treaties in New Mexico and discovered that many Mexican villagers had lost their lands in 1848—despite the Treaty of Guadalupe, which was intended to protect their property during the transition from Mexican to U.S. territory—because they had no written proof of ownership, or the U.S. court system would not recognize Spanish-or Mexican-issued land titles. In 1963, López Tijerina organized La Alianza Federal de Mercedes (The Land Grant Alliance), which fought for years to redress injustices sanctioned by U.S. courts in the wake of the treaty. The group staged protests and occupied lands in question all around New Mexico until being forcefully removed or arrested.

On June 5, 1967, La Alianza and López Tijerina stormed the courthouse in Tierra Amarilla, New Mexico, to demand that various tracts of land be returned to their rightful owners. Violence erupted as police and military personnel stormed the courthouse, and López Tijerina and his group were effectively silenced in the ensuing weeks. But the national attention to the demonstrations and court battles inspired other Chicanos to step up and fight discrimination in their communities.

Another major fight for rights was spearheaded by the grassroots Community Service Organization (CSO), a Los Angeles-based organization founded in 1947 by Fred Ross, with chapters throughout California, that sought to increase Mexican American and Latino voter registration. In the 1960s and 1970s, the younger Chicano generation saw the value of voting as a way to effect political change, and encouraged their peers and parents to register and to vote for politicians sympathetic to Chicano causes.

Young César Chávez was active in the CSO and worked at the front lines of voter registration drives during the 1950s and until 1962, when he left to begin his work organizing migrant laborers to stand up for better working conditions and living wages. As cofounder of the National Farm Workers Association in 1962 (later the United Farm Workers), Chávez inspired Chicanos to organize politically on their own behalf and to support politicians such as Robert F. Kennedy, a vocal advocate for Mexican American rights in the U.S. Senate. By the 1970s, substantial improvements in worker conditions—including modified pesticide use and improved working conditions, better wages, and better housing—were achieved or in the offing for migrant workers.

In urban centers in the late 1960s, especially in East L.A., students began to speak up and demand change. By 1967, student organizations like the East L.A.–based Young Chicanos for Community Action (YCCA) routinely presented proposed changes to their school boards: improved Chicano access to education (especially bilingual classes and classes in Mexican American history); increased hiring of minority faculty and administrators; and a no-tolerance approach to racism on campuses. Groups allied with the YCCA included the Brown Berets, a paramilitary group founded in the late 1960s and led by David Sanchez, and El Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlán (The Chicano Student Movement of Aztlán), a national multichapter advocacy group founded in 1969.

Fighting for Self-Determination and Political Power

In March 1969, Rodolfo “Corky” Gonzales, an activist based in Denver, organized the National Chicano Youth Liberation Conference, at which Chicano leaders from various projects came together to discuss ways in which they could present a united front against exclusionary mainstream society. One of the most important documents of the Chicano Movement originated at that conference: El Plan Espiritual de Aztlán (The Spiritual Plan of Aztlán), a collectively written declaration of Chicano pride and community goals. El Plan asserted a racial and ultimately national identity of Chicanos as descendents of Aztec warriors, called to stand up and fight for their communities. El Plan evoked the community of la raza (“the race,” in this case, of mixed brown blood) and a war against Anglo society.

The tension between la raza and mainstream America was exacerbated by the war in Vietnam. Most Chicanos believed the war was unjust, and they were especially vocal against the drafting of young Chicanos to fight a war they did not support. In 1969, a number of activists formed the National Chicano Moratorium Committee (NCMC) to organize protests against U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia, most notably the East L.A.–based Chicano Moratorium. From 1969 to 1971, the NCMC helped local communities organize antiwar protests in cities across the United States, including East L.A., Chicago, San Francisco, and Houston. At these rallies, speakers and protesters decried the government’s blind eye toward Chicano deaths and urged Chicanos to stand firm against the draft. Another outcome of the shift toward Aztlán nationalism and away from Anglo society was the organization of the Chicano political party La Raza Unida (The United Race), founded in Crystal City, Texas, in 1969 as a kind of correction to the mainstream two-party system. Although Chicanos had counted the Democratic Party as an ally for many years, by the 1960s, and especially after the death of Robert F. Kennedy in 1968, many felt that the party was not making a real difference in ending racism. As a result, Chicanos became increasingly disillusioned about working within the “system,” and leaders of the community considered a separate political party essential to providing direct representation of their interests.

After Crystal City, the party spread throughout the nation, most notably in Texas, California (beginning with an Oakland-Berkeley chapter in 1970), and Denver. Although La Raza Unida lasted only from 1969 to 1974, the party’s conventions drew considerable attention to Chicano activism. Its legal branch, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, successfully challenged racist voting systems in Bexar County, Texas, in 1972, which led to changes across the country.

Media Representation and Visibility

Chicanos, largely based in Los Angeles, also united for representation in the media, focusing their attention on two areas: combating stereotypes and fighting for more industry hiring of Chicanos and other Latinos.

The Frito Bandito, an advertising mascot of the Frito-Lay snack food company, was regarded as emblematic of mass-media stereotyping, and the Mexican American community mounted a campaign to have the company stop the ad campaign and drop the character. After four years of coordinated efforts, including boycotts, letter-writing campaigns to television stations and Frito-Lay, and antidefamation suits presented before the U.S. House Subcommittee on Communications and Power in 1970, the company pulled the Frito Bandito character from its ads in 1971.

Los Angeles Chicano activists also targeted local television stations, demanding more coverage of issues pertaining to the Chicano community and the hiring of more minority workers at stations. Through various government and legal channels, including an appeal to the FCC (responsible for ensuring that local stations respond to and reflect community interests), Chicano television producers were successful in creating and airing series on local Public Broadcasting System (PBS) stations and network affiliates, including the public affairs series ¡Ahora! (1969–1970) and Acción Chicano (1972–1974). These shows and others like them were dedicated to airing program content, such as interviews and documentaries on community programs and issues, that allowed Chicanos to be the creators of their own material and the producers of their own stories and histories. Theater productions, poetry readings, murals, and other arts and media also included images and themes significant to the movement, through which Chicano artists attempted to make visible their culture in society.

For example, a grassroots theater movement accompanied the organizational efforts of the United Farm Workers (UFW) from 1965 to the early 1970s, in which students and other nonprofessional actors worked with migrant laborers to create plays about their working conditions and their hopes for change. From the late 1960s on, Chicano theater groups such as El Teatro Campesino (The Farmworker's Theater, founded in California in 1965 by Luis Valdez) created plays that exposed the discrimination that they experienced in their workplaces, neighborhoods, and court systems. Plays also often included celebratory imagery representative of Chicano culture, such as Aztec warriors and Christian symbols.

Poetry was another artistic and motivational tool employed from the beginning of the movement, perhaps best exemplified by Rodolfo Gonzales's "I Am Joaquin" (Yo Soy Joaquín), an epic poem written in 1967 that recounts Chicano history and experience in the United States. "I Am Joaquin" and other poems were circulated at public gatherings, and works of prose fiction—such as Rudolfo Anaya's Bless Me, Ultima (1972), the story of a New Mexican Chicano—helped make Chicano characters worthy of a place in mainstream literature.

Other major areas of artistic mobility were painting, drawing, and sculpture, most publicly visible in mural art. In projects across Los Angeles and other cities, mural artists worked to preserve, celebrate, and create Chicano identity by incorporating images related to the causes of the movement. Examples include images of Che Guevara (a Latin American revolutionary figure with whose struggles against Anglo oppression Chicanos identified); César Chávez and the UFW's eagle symbol; Aztec historical and mythical figures; zoot-suiters (to commemorate the tension between Mexican American youth and Anglos in Los Angeles in the early 1940s); and symbols pertinent to local politics. Las Mujeres Muralistas (a collective of women muralists who worked in San Francisco's Mission District in the 1970s) illustrated race and gender issues in works of public art, and the group Los Four (an artists' collective founded in Los Angeles in 1973) worked with symbols of the Chicano Movement as well as elements of local East L.A. culture—including cars popular with young Chicanos, graffiti art, crucifixes, and Mexican masks.

Legacy

As Chicano groups made gains toward accomplishing the movement's agendas, opinions changed among coalition members. Divergent goals led to the dissolution of La Raza Unida, for example, and the rise of feminism challenged the often overtly masculinist rhetoric of Chicano national identity. Many of the groups formed in the heyday of the Chicano Movement took separate directions, and the national-coalition character of the movement faded.

The activists had succeeded in many areas, especially in increasing social awareness and acceptance of Chicanos in society, politics, and education, and, by extension, the acceptance of other Latino groups in the United States. While there remain Chicano artists, scholars, and others committed to ideals founded during the movement's initial years, notions of Chicano identity and community have since adapted to changing social and political conditions.

Jean Anne Lauer

See also: Brown Berets: Chicano Moratorium: Los Angeles, California.

Further Reading

Gaspar de Alba, Alicia. Chicano Art: Inside/Outside the Master's House. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998.

Haney-López, Ian F. Racism on Trial: The Chicano Fight for Justice. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 2003.

Muñoz, Carlos, Jr. Youth, Identity, Power: The Chicano Movement. New York: Verso, 1989.

Noriega, Chon A. Shot in America: Television, the State, and the Rise of Chicano Cinema. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2000.

Stavans, Ilan. The Hispanic Condition: Reflections on Culture and Identity in America. New York: HarperPerennial, 1996.

Chicano Theater

Chicano social protest theater emerged in 1965 in Delano, California, as a project of the National Farm Workers Association (NFWA), a grassroots organization working there and elsewhere to coordinate migrant-fieldworker strikes against substandard working conditions and low wages. A young man named Luis Valdez created El Teatro Campesino (The Farmworker's Theater) to travel to various work sites in the United States and increase awareness of the strikes, raise money for workers who were unemployed while on strike, and provide a forum in which farmworkers could speak out about the injustices they were experiencing. Valdez's theater group worked alongside other artists and theater groups during the 1960s and 1970s, within the social struggle of the Chicano civil rights movement as a whole.

Early Years

The principal theater groups of the Chicano Movement included Valdez's El Teatro Campesino and the Teatro de la Esperanza (Theater of Hope), which was formed in 1969 out of a student theater collective at the University of California, Santa Barbara and officially took the name Teatro de la Esperanza in 1971. These groups and others inspired by them were not composed of professional theater actors, but rather of students and other nonprofessionals.

Chicano students, many of whom, like Valdez, came from farmworker backgrounds, experienced discrimination throughout their education and identified more with the laborers' position in society than with that of their university peers. From the inception of Chicano theater, participants identified with outsiders to mainstream culture and believed that the theater arts could be used to voice and act out opposition to discrimination, as well as to affirm Chicano identity and culture.

El Teatro Campesino, Teatro de la Esperanza, and other groups started out in the fields with a form of theater they called the acto. An acto is a one-act play or skit, usually with very basic guidelines instead of a fixed, detailed script. It would be performed in makeshift stage areas, such as a tent or the back of a truck. The actors, both students and fieldworkers, used minimal (if any) props, and characters often were identified by signs around their necks or some basic costuming. The idea was to let the actors' imaginations and personal histories inform their participation. For example, in the skit La Quinta Temporada (The Fifth Season, collectively created by El Teatro Campesino in the mid-1960s), volunteer actors were given character types such as "Don Coyote" (the farm-labor contractor) and "Don Sotaco" (the naive farmworker), and they were encouraged to improvise based on their own experiences. As nonprofessional actors took the stage, playing themselves, their employers, or other characters, they were able to laugh at difficult situations and develop camaraderie among the group, while, at the same time, practicing speaking out at unjust treatment in a safe environment.

By the early 1970s, Valdez and other Chicano theater practitioners found that their paths were diverging from that of the farmworkers' movement. As they grew and matured as theater companies, and as they met with other activists at national meetings—such as the Chicano Youth Liberation Conferences in 1969 and 1970 in Denver—their work began to include other themes. For example, plays began to expose discrimination against Chicanos in the education system, the anger that many Chicanos felt toward the Vietnam War and the draft, and ongoing community issues such as police harassment and brutality.

Troupes began to move from the open-air tents of the fields into more formal situations, such as university stages and community theater settings. Efforts focused on common causes, such as Teatro de la Esperanza's collectively created Guadalupe (first performed in 1974), which, through a series of loosely structured actos, sought to expose systematic repression against Mexicans in the schools and other institutions of Guadalupe, California. Another influential work by El Teatro Campesino was Soldado Razo (Buck Private, created in 1971), which highlighted the barrio life of Chicanos as families and individuals faced the consequences of the Vietnam draft.

Stage plays celebrated Mexican and indigenous cultures, often incorporating the mythology of the Aztecs and their gods into the sets or story lines, and used iconography representing Chicano identity in the plays, such as the calavera (a skeleton figure symbolic of the life and death cycle); La Virgen (the Virgin Mary of the Catholic faith, or an idealized woman); and la cucaracha (the cockroach, a symbol of an Anglo view of Mexicans as brown and dirty, and used in skits to expose racism).

As these examples illustrate, language was an important aspect of the Chicano theater movement. Depending on the audience, plays were performed in different combinations of Spanish and English. In many cases, the use of "Spanglish" dominated, and authors chose from Spanish or English words or phrases, according to the significance needed. The artists recognized that some words held more significance to the audience in their original language than when translated—for example la cucaracha instead of "cockroach" or patrón instead of "boss" or "overseer."

Decline and Changing Directions

After the boom in Chicano theater from the mid-1960s to the late 1970s, many practitioners found it difficult to find work. Funding for the arts declined in the United States in the 1980s, and the Chicano civil rights movement that had flourished in the 1960s and into the mid-1970s was also losing steam; few Chicano theater groups survived past that time.

Valdez was successful in converting Chicano theater and art projects to the screen, most notably his play Zoot Suit. Valdez directed it first for the stage in 1978, and then as a film in 1981. The film stars Edward James Olmos, a prominent actor and activist from East Los Angeles. Additionally, El Teatro Campesino and Teatro de la Esperanza were able to tour internationally with their plays through the 1980s. Since then, they have continued to produce work that is performed frequently in California and the Southwest.

The politics of the acto and other play formats eventually expanded as feminism and other countercultures overlapped Chicano activism. To the present day, playwrights and actors who challenge dominant notions of class, race, gender, and sexuality feel indebted to the Chicano theater of the 1960s and the paths it opened.

See also: Chicano Movement: United Farm Workers.

Further Reading

Broyles-González, Yolanda. El Teatro Campesino: Theater in the Chicano Movement. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994.

Huerta, Jorge A. Chicano Theater: Themes and Forms. Tempe, AZ: Bilingual Press/Editorial Bilingue, 1982.

Muñoz, Carlos, Jr. Youth, Identity, Power: The Chicano Movement. New York: Verso, 1989.

Yarbro-Bejarano, Yvonne. "The Female Subject in Chicano Theatre: Sexuality, 'Race,' and Class." Theatre Journal 38(1986) : 389–407.

Chick, Jack (1924–)

Jack Thomas Chick is a fundamentalist Christian writer, artist, and publisher most famous for producing a series of small comic tracts intended to aid evangelical Christians in witnessing to the public. Published as 3-by-5-inch (7.6-by-12.7-centimeter) black-and-white tracts, Chick Tracts are easily recognizable for the distinctive cartoonish style of Chick's artwork, as well as for the intense morality exhibited in the stories, many of which end in a character's banishment to eternal damnation. The apocalyptic millennialist beliefs shared by many fundamentalist Christians are heavily reflected in Chick's work.

The world as presented in these tracts is hurtling toward the apocalypse, pushed to destruction by foolish men and women caught in the shadowy machinations of a vast conspiracy of Satanists and Jesuits. The only hope for salvation lies in acceptance of Jesus Christ, who will return on Judgment Day. Laughing devils lurk at every turn, waiting to lead humanity astray. Tracts such as This Was Your Life! and Somebody Goofed offer explicit depictions of the fate of an unsaved soul, while Doom Town and The Death Cookie condemn, respectively, homosexuality and Catholicism.

Other Chick targets include Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, rock music, television, evolution, the New Age movement, Hinduism, and the United Nations. These and other subjects are attacked in tracts with titles such as Bad Bob!, The Sissy?, and Party Girl. Central to Chick's theology is the idea that people can be saved by faith alone—often repentant prostitutes and murderers ascend to heaven while charitable, though misguided, law-abiding citizens are cast into the lake of fire. Every tract features a relevant passage from the King James Bible.

Chick is believed to have been born on April 13, 1924, in Los Angeles. He grew up in Alhambra, California, where he showed aptitude for drawing and theater. As a high school student, he was nonreligious, and, as he would find out later, his Christian friends decided he would be the last person to accept Christ, due in large part to his use of foul language. After graduation, he received a scholarship to study acting at the Pasadena Playhouse, but, in 1943, after one year, he enlisted in the U.S. Army and was sent overseas to serve in Australia, New Guinea, the Philippines, and Japan. After three years, he returned to the Pasadena Playhouse and met the woman who would become his wife, Lola Lynn Priddle.

Chick's religious conversion occurred during a visit with his Canadian in-laws, when his mother-in-law asked him to listen to a broadcast of Charles E. Fuller's Old Fashioned Revival Hour radio program. While working at AstroScience Corporation in El Monte, California, Chick began to sketch religious cartoons on his lunch breaks. He soon put together what would become his first tract, Why No Revival?, which he published with an $800 loan from a credit union in 1960. His employer funded the next tract, and, within a few years, he had founded Chick Publications, which in the 2000s remains a small company, employing about thirty workers. Chick has said that he got the idea for distributing his work as comic tracts upon hearing that the Communist Party of China used similar methods to spread its message to workers throughout the country.

In the 1970s, Chick employed another artist to help with the production of his tracts. Although he remained unacknowledged for a time, the new artist's style was noticeably different from Chick's own, and there was much fan speculation as to the identity of the "good artist." In 1980, Chick revealed that the second artist was an African American pastor named Fred Carter, who remains the only artist other than Chick to work with him on the tracts.

After meeting anti-Catholic activist Alberto Rivera in 1979, Chick created some of his most controversial work. Rivera claimed to be an ex-Jesuit who had broken ties with the Vatican after learning of certain high-level secrets, including, as he explained to Chick, the role of the Catholic Church in the creation of Nazism, communism, and Islam, as well as the responsibility of the Vatican for the American Civil War, the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln, both world wars, and the Holocaust. Six issues of Chick's Crusader Comics were printed detailing Rivera's claims, illustrated by Carter. Christian bookstores across the country began to withdraw orders for Chick Tracts, and Chick resigned from the Christian Booksellers Association in 1981.

Chick continued to produce tracts and, by the early 2000s, had sold an estimated 500 million copies worldwide; they have been translated into more than seventy languages, from Spanish to Zulu. Noted underground-comics writers Robert Crumb and Daniel Clowes have expressed a fascination with Chick Tracts. The independence of Chick Publications, its focus on existential questions, and the simplicity and cheapness of production of Chick's work connects it with the small-press or self-published "comix" movement that emerged in the late 1960s. Chick has published more than 150 tracts, making him one of the world's most published comic book authors.

Robert Dobler

See also: Fundamentalism, Christian.

Further Reading

Chick Publications. <http://www.chick.com>

Fowler, Robert B. The World of Jack T. Chick (The History of the World According to Jack T. Chick). San Francisco: Last Gasp, 2001.

Kuersteiner, Kurt. The Unofficial Guide to the Art of Jack T. Chick: Chick Tracts, Crusader Comics, and Battle Cry Newspapers. Atglen, PA: Schiffer, 2004.

Raeburn, Daniel K. The Imp 2: The Holy Book of Chick with the Apocrypha and Dictionary-Concordance. Chicago: Imp, 1998.

Chomsky, Noam (1928–)

A celebrated linguist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), Noam Chomsky won a following among political radicals in the United States and around the world beginning in the 1960s for his trenchant and highly critical analysis of American foreign policy.

Avram Noam Chomsky was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on December 7, 1928. His parents, both Eastern European immigrants, worked as Hebrew-language teachers and influenced the young boy's growth as a thinker, educator, and activist. Chomsky attended a progressive elementary school, which published a political editorial he wrote at age ten, and Central High School of Philadelphia. He earned undergraduate and graduate degrees at the University of Pennsylvania (Penn), where he studied linguistics, mathematics, and philosophy, and served as a fellow at Harvard University while finishing his doctorate, which he received from Penn in 1955. He joined the faculty at MIT that year and has taught continuously there ever since.

His book Syntactic Structures (1957), his best-known academic work, introduced the revolutionary theory of generative grammar. Syntactic Structures and later related writings continue to provoke controversy and debate among scholars in disciplines ranging from linguistics to psychology, education, and philosophy.

Chomsky began engaging in public political discourse during the tumultuous 1960s. From the beginning, his views were highly critical of U.S. foreign policy and were said to resemble libertarian anarchism, a philosophy that is suspicious of hierarchies and seeks to end them if unjustified. For protesting the Vietnam War, he spent time in jail and ended up on President Richard M. Nixon's infamous "enemies" list.

Chomsky's first political book, American Power and the New Mandarins (1969), is widely considered one of the most damning accounts of America's role in Vietnam. Later books, including Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance (2003), address issues associated with the Middle East, Latin America, human rights, terrorism, and the media.

With more than seventy books and 1,000 articles to his name, Chomsky is among the most cited living authors in the English language. In 1979, The New York Times called him "arguably the most important intellectual alive." He received the 1988 Kyoto Prize, the Japanese equivalent of the Nobel Prize, for his work in linguistics. He is extremely popular among university students in the United States and Canada, booking speaking engagements a year or two in advance.

Detractors call Chomsky anti-Semitic, a conspiracy theorist, and a Holocaust denier. They say he is unqualified to write about politics, because he is not formally educated in political science, that he writes with predetermined conclusions, rarely discusses America's enemies, and always portrays the actions of the U.S. government in the worst possible light. In the early twenty-first century, he remains a leading political dissident, gadfly, and leftist radical.

Roy L. Sturgeon

See also: Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Barsky, Robert F. Noam Chomsky: A Life of Dissent. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1997.

Chomsky, Noam. The Chomsky Reader. Edited by James Peck. New York: Pantheon, 1987.

Christian Science

The Church of Christ, Scientist, more commonly known as the Christian Science Church, emerged in America in 1879, following a personal healing experience thirteen years earlier by founder Mary Baker Eddy. Eddy was the youngest of six children raised by strict Congregationalist parents in New Hampshire. Early in life she rejected many of the teachings of that faith community, although she remained deeply committed to Christianity and the Bible.

From childhood, Eddy suffered from a host of physical ailments, including chronic problems of paralysis, seizures, and convulsions. From her suffering, she developed a strong interest in biblical accounts of early Christian healing. At the same time, she also was drawn to new forms of healing, such as homeopathy, herbalism, and naturopathic medicine, which were then sweeping the nation. For a time, she dabbled in the common occult practices of spiritualism and clairvoyance as well. From these beginnings, the Christian Science Church experienced an inconsistent rate of growth. Today, the church finds itself in slow decline.

At age forty-five, after turning to the Bible, Mary Baker Eddy unexpectedly recovered from injuries sustained in a fall. She went on to found the Christian Science Church and write its official text. (Library of Congress)

Early History and Beliefs

Like other organizations set to challenge the existing culture, the Christian Science Church evolved in the nineteenth century at a time of dramatic social and cultural ferment. Americans had just been traumatized by the tragic suffering and upheaval of the Civil War; the ideas of Charles Darwin and Sigmund Freud and others had begun to challenge the assumptions of traditional religion; and American society confronted a series of economic and social problems that resulted from the unbridled rise of industrialism. The health and well-being of Americans also took center stage, as medical science diagnosed and cured a host of illnesses. The Christian Science faith appeared on the scene to connect modern science and traditional religion by offering a nominally scientific approach to human disease and suffering that nevertheless relied upon a restatement of Christian faith.

Following a sudden abatement of medical symptoms from a near-fatal injury incurred when she fell on an icy sidewalk in 1866, Mary Baker Eddy devoted three years to Bible study. She paid special attention to the words and life of Jesus in an attempt to understand why she had experienced such a miraculous cure. Eddy struggled to learn whether knowable laws governed spiritual healing, and she read the Bible and experimented with prayer to see if she could repeat her recovery. She soon tried her new healing methods on seriously ill patients whom medical doctors seemed unable to cure, and, in some cases, reported successful recoveries.

Convinced that physical illness itself was an illusion that could be cured by a clear perception and understanding of God, Eddy began to teach her views of religious healing to others. It was from these teachings that the Christian Science Church eventually emerged. Stepping further outside the cultural and religious mainstream, Eddy taught that she had discovered a principle of healing that could be located in a new understanding of God as an infinite Spirit not limited by the material sense of reality that she termed “error.”

Certain that she had discovered a lost Christian truth related to faith and healing, Eddy in 1875 published her controversial ideas in Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures to spread the new belief as widely as possible. The book sold just over 1,000 copies in its first edition, and it has sold more than 10 million copies in seventeen languages, as well as versions in Braille, on audiotape, and in software packages, in the years since.

The work describes Eddy’s discovery, practice, and teaching of what she called the “science” of Christian healing. After its publication, she remained devoted to the establishment of the new church. Eventually, thousands flocked to hear her lectures; others studied at her newly formed Massachusetts Metaphysical College in Boston from 1882 to 1889. Fully trained, these students—called the “Christian Science Practitioners”— spread across the country to heal the sick in ways consistent with the teachings of the new church, but out of line with both traditional modern medicine and conventional religious views on patient care.

The new religion spread by Eddy and her followers depended on a belief that the absolute perfection of God made impossible the divine creation of sin, disease, and death. None of these, therefore, could be real. According to their beliefs, evil and its physical manifestations are terrible lies about God and all of creation. Eddy even argued that the human body does not exist in any real sense but is only imagined.

The important requirement for Christians, as Eddy saw it, was to unmask the lies and reveal the true and eternal perfection of God’s creation. The error of evil can be remedied through a better spiritual understanding of one’s relationship to God, and this corrected relationship can enable spiritual healing. Thus, it is the foundational principle of Christian Science that disease or any other adversity can be cured or alleviated by prayerful efforts to fully understand one’s correct relationship with God.

Practice and Controversy in Modern Times

In practical, earthly terms, belief in the unreality of imperfection is the basis of the Christian Scientist’s characteristic and controversial reliance on prayer in place of traditional medical care. Practitioners also depend on prayer to help resolve personal issues, such as those associated with relationship difficulties, employment problems, and emotional distress. To many Christian Scientists, the correction of sin itself is more important than healing disease. Still, it is the healing of physical sickness that remains at the center of church activity and keeps the religion on the fringes of modern culture.

The church does not absolutely require members to forgo medical treatment, but most do so voluntarily because their faith demands it and because they have come to believe reports of successful healing by faith alone. The pressure from other Christian Scientists to avoid medical care often is strong, leading members to tend to turn from traditional medicine even more. Many Christian Scientists do not rely on doctors, medicine, or surgery at all. The proper use of prayer and spiritual training is instead employed to battle the “nonreality” of illness.

While many dispute the precise numbers, the Christian Science Church claims more than 50,000 personal testimonies of successful healing since its founding. In most cases, these spiritual healings represent recovery from ailments not diagnosed or treated by medical professionals.

Whatever the actual numbers of spiritual healings, the Christian Science Church from the beginning has been subject to criticism and public controversy, with the relationship between faith and medicine the most common issue. Church members often have been charged with being merely faith healers; they respond that they do not claim to heal by the application of blind faith, but through a well-defined mental process that leads to the healing.

To those outside the church, healing that eschews scientific medical treatments is particularly questionable when it involves the health and well-being of children. In a small number of cases that received national attention in the 1990s, prosecutors charged Christian Scientist parents with manslaughter when their children died of curable diseases without having been treated by medical professionals. While most of the parents were legally exonerated, critics saw the deaths as irrational and unnecessary. Church members understood the tragedies as the result of poor spiritual guidance and an insufficient understanding and application of the Christian Science process of healing.

By the early 2000s, the “Mother Church,” as Christian Scientists call it, had grown to be a 14-acre (5.7-hectare) complex in Boston, Massachusetts. Built in 1894, and expanded in 1906, the church boasts one of the world’s largest pipe organs, as well as the Eddy Library for the Betterment of Humanity in an eleven-story structure, originally built for the Christian Science Publishing Society.

In 1908, Eddy began publishing the Christian Science Monitor. Along with the establishment of local Christian Science Reading Rooms, the newspaper has helped bring greater credibility to the church, while winning a number of Pulitzer Prizes and other awards for journalistic excellence.

Local branches of the Christian Science Church are subordinate to the Mother Church but are self-governing in terms of day-to-day affairs. Still, to be officially recognized, they must abide by the practices of the larger church and must follow a constitution that covers everything from the duties of officers to the discipline of members. Finally, the church is governed by a five-person board of directors that continues to follow the rules established by the founder.

The church has no ordained clergy, and Sunday services consist of hymns, prayer, and Bible readings, followed by interpretations from Eddy’s original writings. Every service includes the reading of her “Scientific Statement of Being,” read from the pulpit by men and women elected from the congregation to conduct the services. Wednesday services typically include testimonies of healing by members of the congregation, as well as comments by men and women “practitioners” who devote their time to spiritual healing. Members also congregate in small groups in Christian Science Reading Rooms to read and discuss Eddy’s work to aid in their spiritual development.

The church experienced a period of rapid growth during the first half of the twentieth century, reaching a membership of nearly 400,000 by some accounts. Since then, however, the numbers have gradually declined. Dozens of local churches have closed in recent years, and by some accounts there are currently fewer than 100,000 members worldwide.

Despite these declines, the Christian Science Church has undertaken an aggressive marketing campaign designed to attract new members. For example, church leaders are trying to find ways to promote the church as an active participant in contemporary discussions regarding mind/body connections and new forms of alternative medicine. They have been finding common ground with modern New Age groups. Convinced that through these means they will find renewed organizational vitality, church leaders insist that new members will accept the spiritual truths articulated in the nineteenth century and will maintain that tradition for decades to come.

Since the late twentieth century, the Christian Science Church has attempted to connect with the larger culture by experimenting with electronic broadcasting. For example, the church purchased a Boston cable television station for the production of elaborate in-house programming and established a station for syndication with National Public Radio. As in the case of other religious groups seeking expansion through the media, however, a combination of rapid expansion, poor management, and insufficient funds led to the closing of most of these facilities, and the church lost an estimated $250 million in these ventures, bringing it to the edge of bankruptcy.

Mary Baker Eddy conducted church affairs until her death in 1910. While members revere her as the discoverer of the faith and founder of the church, they do not regard her work as having added anything to essential Christianity. Instead, they believe that she elaborated on what already was understood and returned the faithful to a more accurate understanding of biblical truth. In 1921, the centenary of Eddy's birth, a 100-ton (90.7-metric ton) granite pyramid was dedicated on the site of her birth in Bow, New Hampshire. A gift from the Freemasons, the statue was later dynamited by order of the church board of directors. Reflecting the Christian Science rejection of cults of personality and sacred shrines, the board also demolished Eddy's home out of a fear that it would draw visiting pilgrims.

Today, the Christian Scientists remain a radical, though small, challenge both to mainstream religion and to the exclusive application of modern science to the problems of human health and disease. Their practice of spiritual healing keeps them on the fringes of modern culture.

Bart Dredge

See also: Harmonialism: New Thought.

Further Reading

Baxter, Nancy. Open the Doors of the Temple: The Survival of Christian Science in the Twentieth Century. Carmel, IN: Hawthorne, 2004.

Church of Christ, Scientist. <http://www.tfccs.com>

Gardner, Martin. The Healing Revelations of Mary Baker Eddy: The Rise and Fall of Christian Science. New York: Prometheus, 1993.

Gill, Gillian. Mary Baker Eddy. Radcliffe Biography Series. New York: Perseus, 1999.

Gottschalk, Stephen. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.

Gottschalk, Stephen. Rolling Away the Stone: Mary Baker Eddy's Challenge to Materialism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2005.

Circus and Carnival Culture

The circus—long associated with an out-of-the-mainstream lifestyle, exotic attractions, and taboo appeal— began in Britain during the mid-eighteenth century with demonstrations of trick horsemanship. It developed into traveling tent, or wagon, shows in Europe and the United States by about the 1830s. Larger train circuses soon were traveling the country, and, by 1910, there were about thirty, run by men such as James A. Bailey, Phineas T. Barnum, William C. Coup, the six Ringling brothers, and “Lord” George Sanger. The American carnival began in the late nineteenth century and got its name from street festivals of excess, dancing, and ridicule of the wealthy and powerful, such as New Orleans’s Mardi Gras.

With its sideshows and carnival areas, the circus appealed to virtually every popular interest and entertainment trend in the United States. It created a colorful juxtaposition of acts that was unique in show business: exotic animals, brass bands, clowns, trapeze acts, contortionists, vaudeville variety skits, “freak shows,” imported “curiosities,” historical displays, ethnological displays, fortune-tellers, games of chance, and more. The carefully timed and disciplined crews that erected, packed, and moved these circuses were a testament to modern labor and business organization for local people, who often closed their shops, skipped school, or otherwise found a way to spend the day watching circus crews at work.

Smaller wagon circuses known as “dog and pony” or “mud” shows persisted through the nineteenth century. Trained dogs might not be as glamorous as Barnum’s “Jumbo the Elephant,” but the smaller shows were more personable, catering to local humor and culture in ways that the train circuses, with their tight schedules and generic shows, could not. With time, however, the wagon circuses began to seem shabby to customers who were able to attend one of the bigger productions.

Commercial traveling carnivals emerged in the 1890s out of the sideshow acts and games associated with the circus, Coney Island’s amusement parks in Brooklyn, New York, and the world’s fairs. From seventeen carnival companies in 1902, the number traveling the country grew to about 300 in 1937, while the number of circuses had begun to decline. Carnivals, which absorbed workers and adopted acts from the circus, thus came to include more games of chance, as well as shooting galleries, mechanical rides, and medicine shows. Promoters sent their carnivals from place to place to coincide with agricultural fairs or annual civic celebrations, and they usually paid a commission or percentage of revenues to the community in which they set up for business.

Traveling circuses and carnivals constituted some of the earliest forms of truly mass entertainment in the United States, as ordinary people throughout the country experienced the same attractions. Circus and carnival owners sent advance crews to blanket communities with promotional flyers, posters, and newspaper ads to create audience enthusiasm. Exotic animals that periodically attacked their trainers, trapeze artists who fell to their deaths, big-top tents that collapsed onto crowds, and carnival hucksters who fooled their customers injected an element of danger and excitement into circus and carnival day.

Both circuses and carnivals presented the exotic and bizarre in ways that communicated accepted truths to audiences. Training tigers and elephants reasserted man’s power over nature. Ethnological exhibits of Native Americans and foreign performers reasserted white supremacy over ostensibly backward people. Disabled or otherwise physically unusual people presented as freaks gave viewers a chance to consider the medical or evolutionary implications of the “normal” human body.

The famous promoter P.T. Barnum worried that the circus would be open to attack from social reformers for the unconventional behavior and fraud said to invade small towns when the circus rolled in—a reputation that came to be associated with carnivals as well. Nineteenth-century critics pointed to the effects the performances had on social values and public morality. They were concerned, for example, that a woman in a short skirt performing tricks on horseback would challenge women’s subservient role in society. Public drunkenness and brawling also were part and parcel of circus or carnival day, as intoxicated customers fought with each other or became embroiled in contests with circus employees. And, of course, traveling shows removed needed money from the local economy. Rather than compete with the circus or carnival, some local business owners offered special sales to capitalize on the spending sprees in which otherwise-frugal audiences often indulged.

Circus and carnival workers presented audiences with a particular kind of counterculture, namely a tight-knit community of producers, managers, performers, and laborers drawn from around the world. Carnival and circus people have long regarded themselves as a breed apart from mainstream society, often marrying other show people and raising children in the business.

Performers from Europe, Asia, and Latin America who work the circus and carnival circuit as acrobats, animal trainers, dancers, musicians, magicians, and fortune-tellers have been respected by many of their American colleagues, even as other immigrants often have not been by society at large. The commonality of interracial marriages and friendships in circus and carnival culture has stood in contrast to the racism frequently found among audiences and has further contributed to the unusual subculture of circus and carnival performers.

As the entertainment options open to American consumers have expanded, fewer traditional circuses survive today. Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey, and circuses sponsored by the Shriners fraternal order, are among the most notable. One of the central issues for circuses in the twenty-first century is that of animal welfare, with many managers choosing to give up animal acts, as audiences and animal rights organizations have publicized cases of cruelty associated with training and the international trade in animals. Carnivals remain popular at agricultural fairs and other venues. Perhaps the greatest dangers they pose today are the same as in the past: large quantities of unhealthy food and rigged games of chance designed to empty visitors' wallets.

Susan Nance

See also: Barnum, P.T.: Freaks, Freak Shows, and Freakatoriums.

Further Reading

Bogdan, Robert. Freak Show: Presenting Human Oddities for Amusement and Profit. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.

Davis, Janet M. The Circus Age: Culture and Society Under the American Big Top. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

McKennon, Joe. Pictorial History of the American Carnival. Sarasota, FL: Carnival, 1971.

City College of New York

The City College of New York (CCNY), located in Upper Manhattan and originally founded as the Free Academy in 1847, was the first free public institution of higher learning in the United States and the center of a radical movement among students and faculty during the Great Depression. Known as a college for the city's poor, CCNY was home to a number of controversial intellectuals in the 1930s. During this period, many Americans were concerned about the spread of fascism throughout the world and the possibility that the United States would become embroiled in a major overseas conflict, and the themes of antifascism and pacifism dominated the political activities at CCNY. The campus became known as a hotbed of activism, giving rise to grassroots organizations, sit-ins, and public expressions of dissent that presaged the counterculture movement of the 1960s.

The radicalism of CCNY's student body gained national attention in April 1934, during the First National Student Strike Against War, when police were called in to calm the tensions. Later that year, twenty-one students were expelled by the president of the school, Frederick B. Robinson, for disrupting an event honoring a delegation of visiting students representing the Italian Fascist regime. Over the next several years, radical students and President Robinson clashed repeatedly, until he resigned in 1938.

In 1936, CCNY was home to the largest student sit-in of the time, as 1,000 students protested the firing of respected English faculty member and public supporter of communism Morris Schappes. Under mounting pressure from students and faculty, school administrators reinstated Schappes two months later. Also in 1936, a number of CCNY student activists traveled to Spain to fight against the fascist leader Francisco Franco. Thirteen students from the college died in the Spanish Civil War.

The college gained more national attention in 1940, when the British philosopher Bertrand Russell was offered a professorship. Russell was controversial for his liberal views on sexual freedom.

Then, between September 1940 and December 1941, more than 500 faculty, students, and administrators from CCNY faced subpoenas for allegedly taking part in communist activities. John Ackly, the CCNY registrar, was formally tried, and Schappes was convicted of perjury. The hearings led to fifty faculty members being dismissed, not reappointed, or forced to resign—the largest removal of college faculty in American history.

As McCarthyism gripped the nation in the 1950s, and the fear of a communist uprising swept across the country, CCNY radicalism diminished. The legacy of the radicals continued to echo throughout American college campuses in the 1960s, however, especially as the antiwar and civil rights movements gained momentum.

In 1961, CCNY became part of the City University of New York (CUNY). As the decade continued and the civil rights movement progressed, calls for open admissions became prominent. In 1969, a group of African American and Latino students forced a shutdown of the South Campus in Harlem and demanded that the student body, faculty, and administration reflect the racial and cultural identity of the area. It was finally decided that every New York City high school graduate would be offered a place in CUNY. This policy would last until the late 1990s, and opened the college door to many minorities.

Ultimately, the activism at CCNY during the 1930s helped bring the counterculture movement to college campuses across the nation. The college itself remains a multicultural institution of higher learning in New York City that continues to thrive in the twenty-first century.

Gavin J. Wilk

See also: Communism.

Further Reading

Anderson, Terry H. The Movement and the Sixties: Protest in America from Greensboro to Wounded Knee. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

City College of New York. <http://www.ccnycuny.edu>

Diggins, John Patrick. The Rise and Fall of the American Left. New York: W.W. Norton, 1992.

City Lights Books, located in the North Beach section of San Francisco, was a pioneering institution in the development of Beat literature and culture during the 1950s—a movement that countered the prevailing middle-class values of 1950s America—and went on to support alternative and radical writers in subsequent decades.

Founding

In 1950 the poet and writer Lawrence Ferlinghetti left Paris, France, and, after a cross-country train trip, arrived in San Francisco the following year. He began to establish himself in the local literary community by writing criticism for the San Francisco Chronicle. Several years later, while driving through North Beach, he happened to see Peter Martin, a local store owner, putting up a sign for his Pocket Book Shop. Martin's idea was to offer paperback books on a large scale.

At the time, paperbacks were either expensive, limited editions of avant-garde literature or pulp fiction that sold for 25 or 30 cents per copy. The books usually were associated with the primary place of purchase: drugstores and newsstands. Martin had created a pop-culture magazine called City Lights, named after the 1931 Charlie Chaplin film, and he started the paperback-only bookstore to fund the magazine. The magazine did not last, but the bookstore would become a center of bohemian culture.

In June 1953, with $500 and a handshake, Ferlinghetti became half owner of what the partners called City Lights Pocket Book Shop. Located at 261 Columbus Avenue, City Lights soon became known as a place for people to browse and hang out. Ferlinghetti's philosophy—that art should be accessible to all people—was central to the development of the shop.

In 1955, Martin moved to New York, and Ferlinghetti paid him $1,000 for his share of the business. Ferlinghetti's vision soon expanded to include publishing (a commonplace business model in Paris), particularly of inexpensive works that represented a broad perspective on political and popular culture, for mass consumption. A book of Ferlinghetti's own poems, Pictures of the Gone World (1955), was City Lights' first publication, but it was Pocket Poets Series Number 4, Allen Ginsberg's Howl and Other Poems (1956), that established City Lights as a powerful alternative voice in American publishing.

On October 13, 1955, Ferlinghetti heard Ginsberg deliver the anthem of a generation in a poetry reading at the Six Gallery. Poet Kenneth Rexroth was the master of ceremonies, and the evening also included readings by Philip Lamantia, Michael McClure, Gary Snyder, and Philip Whalen. Jack Kerouac, who had declined the invitation to read, passed around jugs of wine, while cheering the poets and exhorting the audience to respond to the energy unleashed by these young, unknown artists. It was the symbolic beginning of the San Francisco Renaissance.

Publication of Ginsberg's explosive Howl and Other Poems, with its shocking imagery and graphic sexual language, and support of the work during the subsequent obscenity trial established City Lights as a center for the dissemination of free—even subversive—ideas. As a countercultural entity, an alternative to institutions that reflected the American idealism of the 1950s, City Lights has beckoned, nurtured, and dispersed ideas and artistic innovators throughout the latter half of the twentieth century and into the twenty-first century.

Poetry Readings

The culture of City Lights inspired a movement of popular oral poetry, along with musical, often jazz, accompaniment. Although Ferlinghetti does not consider himself a Beat poet, the bookstore and publishing house provided impetus for Beat literature and a cultural space for Beat writers and thinkers to gather. Later, City Lights would launch the Poets' Theatre, a popular venue for mass poetry readings. City Lights, through its publications and by sponsoring public readings, also brought the Russian poets Yevgeny Yevtushenko and Andrei Voznesensky to the American consciousness.

City Lights continued to be a powerful alternative voice in the 1960s, publishing works by new writers as well as those called subversive and obscene by earlier generations. In 1961, Ferlinghetti joined Michael McClure and David Melzer as coeditors of the first issue of the Journal for the Protection of All Beings. Its revolutionary spirit was reflected in contributions devoted to anarchist and pacifist themes, as well as to ecological ones, years before ecology became a national concern. That year, City Lights also published the first edition of what was conceived of as an annual, City Lights Journal, which addressed political and social issues of the day. The publication included contributions by little-known writers, characteristic of City Lights' devotion to presenting authentic voices, regardless of social or professional status. In 1966, the store opened a magazine section, in which it featured underground comics by such notables as Robert Crumb, broadening its subculture appeal even further.

While the counterculture of the 1960s grew older and college campuses became more sedate in the 1970s and 1980s, City Lights continued its tradition of publishing avant-garde poetry, fiction, and nonfiction. In the 2000s, the bookstore boasts both hardcover releases and quality paperbacks from all major publishing houses, as well as titles from smaller, more obscure specialty publishers.

Michael Susko

See also: Beat Generation: Bookstores. Alternative: Ferlinghetti, Lawrence: Ginsberg, Allen.

Further Reading

City Lights Booksellers and Publishers. <http://www.citylights.com>

Ferlinghetti, Lawrence, and Nancy J. Peters. Literary San Francisco: A Pictorial History from Its Beginnings to the Present Day. San Francisco: City Lights and Harper & Row, 1980.

Ginsberg, Allen. Howl and Other Poems. San Francisco: City Lights, 1956.

Morgan, Bill. The Beat Generation in San Francisco: A Literary Tour. San Francisco: City Lights, 2003.

Peters, Nancy J. "The Beat Generation and San Francisco's Culture of Dissent." In Reclaiming San Francisco History, Politics, Culture, ed. James Brook, Chris Carlsson, and Nancy J. Peters. San Francisco: City Lights, 1998.

Silesky, Barry. Ferlinghetti: The Artist in His Time. New York: Warner, 1990.

Smith, Larry. Lawrence Ferlinghetti: Poet-at-Large. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1983.

Civil Rights Movement

The modern civil rights movement was the mid-twentieth-century struggle of African Americans to secure the liberties granted to all Americans by the U.S. Constitution. In the landmark 1954 case of Brown v. Board of Education, the U.S. Supreme Court declared unanimously (9–0) that separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. The high court's ruling, which stated that the de jure racial segregation of the Jim Crow South violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, overturned earlier decisions dating back to the historic Plessy v. Ferguson decision of 1896. With the Brown decision and the subsequent Brown II ruling (1955), which compelled Southern states to desegregate “with all deliberate speed,” the African American struggle for freedom shifted from a movement centered upon legal challenges to Jim Crow, labor organizing, and Northern, interracial civil rights organizations to a predominantly Southern, black-led social movement rooted in African American churches.

Leaders Challenge Segregation

Emboldened by the Brown and Brown II rulings, African American civil rights leaders began to challenge segregation in the South through mass direct action or civil disobedience. The first major confrontation in this new era began on December 1, 1955, when seamstress and longtime civil rights activist Rosa Parks refused to give up her seat to a white man on a public bus in Montgomery, Alabama.

Following Parks’s arrest, E.D. Nixon, president of the Alabama chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Jo Ann Robinson, leader of the local Women’s Political Council; and fifty other community members met at the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church to begin organizing a boycott of Montgomery’s buses. By December 5, the day of Parks’s trial, more than 90 percent of Montgomery blacks stayed off the city’s buses. Determined to desegregate the municipal transportation system, African Americans walked, carpooled, drove wagons, and even rode mules.

The Montgomery Bus Boycott lasted 381 days and cost blacks nearly a quarter of a million dollars, but it brought about a new grassroots social movement that would settle for nothing less than full integration. It also provided the movement with its most charismatic leader, the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and one of its most influential organizations, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC).

The SCLC, which emerged out of the Montgomery Improvement Association, believed in creating a “beloved community” through nonviolent direct action, which was the dominant guiding force during the early years of the civil rights movement. At 6 A.M. on December 21, 1956, King and his aides boarded a Montgomery bus and sat in the front, behind the driver. A protest that began as a call for courtesy and convenience on city buses ended with complete desegregation.

Despite Brown, Brown II, and the success in Montgomery, change came slowly in the South. Blacks faced tremendous resistance from Southerners determined to maintain white supremacy. Public opinion polls showed that 80 percent of white Southerners opposed school desegregation. Fearing a loss of Southern support in Congress, the administration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower did not officially endorse or support the Brown decision.

The desegregation crisis came to a head in Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957, when the local school board refused to integrate the city’s Central High School. Facing pressure at home and abroad, the Eisenhower administration reluctantly federalized the Arkansas National Guard and called in 100 troops from the 101st Airborne Division to protect the nine African American students attempting to integrate the school. Arkansas Governor Orval Faubus and the school board supporters backed down. Polls showed that 90 percent of whites outside the South approved of Eisenhower’s actions.

Grassroots Movement Expands

Following Montgomery and Little Rock, the grassroots movement took root and spread. Blacks across the South engaged in protests, boycotts, and demonstrations that often erupted spontaneously and only later drew the attention of black civil rights organizations and the national media.

In February 1960, four African American students held a sit-in at a Woolworth’s lunch counter in Greensboro, North Carolina. Within weeks, a wave of similar protests, led by thousands of college students, swept across the South.

In April 1960, King and the SCLC sent Ella Baker, a longtime civil rights leader, to Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina, to organize the students. Two hundred delegates showed up for the meeting. In discussions and workshops, students expressed their desire to remain nonviolent—the guiding philosophy of King and the SCLC—but they also demanded nothing less than full equality. Unlike King and the SCLC, student leaders regarded nonviolence as a political weapon, not as a fundamental moral philosophy.

Over the next three years (1960–1963), students—black men and women, and some whites—became the vanguard of the movement. In the 1961 Freedom Rides, and in kneel-ins (churches), read-ins (libraries), watch-ins (movie theaters), play-ins (parks), and wade-ins and swim-ins (beaches and other segregated waterfronts), young people came to compose the forefront of the movement. The struggle to end Jim Crow through direct action, to secure a federal civil rights law that would end discrimination in public accommodations and facilities and in hiring and employment, and to secure a federal voting rights act had truly become a mass movement.

In many ways, the 1963 March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom marked the high point of the civil rights movement. It also laid bare the divisions that ultimately would end it. In August 1963, some 250,000 Americans—75,000 of them white—including nearly all of the prominent civil rights leaders in the nation, descended upon Washington, D.C.

The leaders of the civil rights movement join hands for the historic March on Washington in August 1963, a high point of the movement. A quarter-million blacks and whites congregated at the Lincoln Memorial for a succession of inspirational speeches. (Robert W. Kelley/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Disagreements primarily between older and younger movement participants concerning the pace and militancy of the movement, the level of cooperation with the white establishment, and the issue of economic empowerment versus civil rights had been bubbling beneath the surface for months. John Lewis, leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), revised his speech, because older movement leaders felt it would be too controversial. Black nationalist Malcolm X called the march “The Farce on Washington.” James Farmer, leader of the Northern-based, interracial Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), did not attend the march because he was stuck in a Los Angeles jail cell.

In 1964, movement participants got the legislation they desired. President Lyndon B. Johnson signed a federal civil rights act that, among other things, banned discrimination in public accommodations. Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act banned discrimination based on race and sex in hiring and employment practices and created the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to process grievances.

In 1965, President Johnson signed a federal voting rights act that banned the denial or abridgment of the right to vote based on literacy tests. Perhaps even more importantly, he empowered the U.S. attorney general or the District Court for the District of Columbia to review any legal changes that could affect voting in targeted areas. Under the new law, the attorney general also could appoint federal examiners and observers to monitor voter registration and local polling places.

Together, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 enabled African Americans to begin to enjoy the rights and freedoms that they had sought for 100 years, since the end of slavery.

The Movement Fractures

In 1965, amid mounting white violence, increasing American involvement in Vietnam, and the growing antiwar and Free Speech movements, the African American civil rights movement became irreparably fractured. The emergence of the Black Power movement, dominated by younger, more militant, urban blacks outside the South, fundamentally shifted civil rights discourse in the United States away from integration to economic, social, and political empowerment.

Despite the pleas of King and other moderates for nonviolence and cooperation, a black revolution seemed imminent to many African Americans, such as Huey Newton and Bobby Seale, who organized the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense in Oakland, California, in September 1966. The Panthers advocated community service and promoted self-defense for blacks, started a newspaper, instituted a breakfast program for poor children, and wrote the Black Panther Party Platform and Program, which they distributed throughout the black community. The platform called for, among other things, restitution from the government for generations of slave labor, self-determination for black communities, full employment, and adequate housing. The Panthers considered blacks in the United States an essentially colonized people, and they considered the police an occupying force within the black community. Infighting and sabotage by the federal government ultimately caused the disintegration of the Panthers by the early 1970s.

King himself became more radical, at least rhetorically, in the years before his assassination on April 4, 1968, but he and other religious leaders never abandoned their desire to create a “beloved community” in the United States. Although it became fractured and ultimately diminished, the African American civil rights movement produced countercultural forces that forever altered the American social, political, and economic landscape. Much work remained, but racial and ethnic minorities made significant strides toward securing fundamental rights and freedoms during the period of the African American civil rights movement.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: Black Panthers: Black Power Movement: King, Martin Luther, Jr.: Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Anderson, Terry H. The Movement and the Sixties. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Birmingham Civil Rights Institute Archives. <http://www.bcri.org/archives/index/index.htm>

Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Touchstone, 1989.

Branch, Taylor. Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–65. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.

Civil Rights in Mississippi Digital Archive. <http://www.lib.usm.edu/~spcol/crda>

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. <http://www.naacp.org>

Sitkoff, Harvard. The Struggle for Black Equality: 1954–1992. Rev. ed. New York: Hill and Wang, 1993.

Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954–1965. New York: Viking Penguin, 1987.

Clafin, Tennessee (1846–1923)

Tennessee Celeste Clafin was a medium, writer, suffragist, activist, editor, businesswoman, and politician active in New York City during the mid-nineteenth century. Along with her sister, Victoria Clafin Woodhull, she endured numerous scandals and successfully challenged gender roles and stereotypes of nineteenth-century American women.

Born on October 26, 1846, in Homer, Ohio, Clafin was surrounded by controversy and scandal from an early age. At five, she was famous for her purported skill as a clairvoyant. As a teen in Ottawa, Illinois, she dispensed medicinal care under her father's direction, including cancer treatments. When a poultice she applied led to a woman's death, Clafin and her father were accused of manslaughter. The family fled to Chicago.

In Chicago, Tennessee undertook the practice of "magnetic healing," and the family was accused of charlatanism and prostitution. After attempting to blackmail a local man, the Clafins left Chicago in 1864 to tour as a traveling medicine show, with Tennessee and Victoria eventually settling in Memphis to read palms. While there, Clafin met and married gambler John Bartels, whom she would divorce a year later.

The sisters moved to New York City in 1868, where they earned money by selling antiseptics and arousal guides to local prostitutes. Clafin met the wealthy industrialist Cornelius Vanderbilt in New York, and the two began an affair. The following year, Vanderbilt helped the sisters open a Wall Street brokerage firm, Woodhull, Clafin and Company, and the two became instant media darlings. Susan B. Anthony, the noted suffragist, visited the firm and praised the idea of women entering the world of business so dramatically.

It was during this time that Tennessee—or "Tennie C," as she rechristened herself—took to wearing men's clothing to work. She further tested gender rules by visiting restaurants without male accompaniment.

In 1870, the sisters started Woodhull & Clafin's Weekly, a journal that promoted woman suffrage, socialism, and reform, and provided a mouthpiece for Victoria's unsuccessful run for the U.S. presidency. Clafin attempted to enter New York politics in 1871, when she ran unsuccessfully for the Eighth Congressional District seat in a predominately German district.

The following year, the sisters were indicted for violating the Comstock Law by sending "obscene materials" through the mail, after accusing noted abolitionist Henry Ward Beecher of an adulterous affair in the Weekly's pages. Tennessee was touched further by scandal in 1872, when she wrote an article accusing a minor Wall Street figure, Luther C. Challis, of seducing two young girls during the infamous French Ball, at which New York society men were revealed to have cavorted with prostitutes. Challis sued Clafin for libel, but the case was dropped.

After Vanderbilt's death in 1877, his family paid for both sisters to leave the United States to avoid legal challenges to his will. The sisters settled in England, where Clafin was made a baronet after her marriage to Viscount Francis Cook in 1885. She became a noted society figure and died in London on January 18, 1923.

See also: Suffragists: Woodhull, Victoria.

Further Reading

Gabriel, Mary. Notorious Victorian: The Life of Victoria Woodhull, Uncensored. Chapel Hill, NC: Algonquin, 1998.

Goldsmith, Barbara. Other Powers: The Age of Suffrage, Spiritualism, and the Scandalous Victoria Woodhull. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.

Johnston, Johanna. Mrs. Satan. New York: G.P. Putnam's Sons, 1967.

Clapp, Henry (1814–1875)

An editor, poet, translator, social reformer, and inveterate raconteur, Henry Clapp, Jr., inspired a group of artists, writers, journalists, and actors who became associated with Pfaff's Cellar, a subterranean meeting place for the bohemian crowd of antebellum New York City. Sometimes referred to as the King of Bohemia, Clapp inspired critical thinking, alternative lifestyles, social causes, and original writing in fiction, criticism, and editorials. In many ways, he helped to bring French bohemian life of the mid-1800s to the United States, exerting a distinct, out-of-the-mainstream influence on lifestyle, culture, and letters.

Born on November 11, 1814, in Nantucket, Massachusetts, Clapp devoted his early reformist energies to the temperance movement. In the late 1840s, he traveled to France as secretary to Albert Brisbane, a social reformer who wanted him to translate the writings of French utopian theorist Charles Fourier. Clapp became enamored of the writings of Charles Baudelaire and Honoré de Balzac, as well as of Parisian café life and bohemian culture, which he attempted to re-create when he returned to New York in 1850.

The literary and artistic center of the United States during the antebellum period was New England. Clapp and others in New York sought to establish that city as an intellectual and cultural center by presenting alternative voices. In 1858, Clapp founded the Saturday Press as New York's alternative to the Atlantic Monthly, primarily a New England publication. He is perhaps best known for his promotion of the third edition (1860) of Leaves of Grass, the classic collection of poems by Brooklyn's Walt Whitman.

Clapp also published such up-and-coming Western writers as Bret Harte. He published Mark Twain's story "Jim Smiley and His Jumping Frog" (a tale also known as "The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County"; 1865), which launched Twain's literary career. Clapp also printed the work of women authors—not a common practice for publications at the time—including Sarah Orne Jewett, Juliette Beach, and the woman who perhaps most embodied the bohemian spirit, Ada Clare.

The first issue of the Saturday Press appeared on October 29, 1858. The magazine ran weekly until 1860. After the American Civil War, Clapp brought it back on August 5, 1865. Although it lasted only one year longer, the Saturday Press rivaled the Atlantic Monthly in presenting fresh American voices. In its short life, the Saturday Press stirred the imagination and creativity of its readers.

Clapp was known to do everything—from telling stories to editing his magazine to pursuing causes—with passion and conviction. Along with his fellow Pfaffians, as the other bohemians who met regularly in Pfaff's Cellar were called, he rebelled against the puritanical and middle-class traditions and values that continued to influence America society in the mid-nineteenth century.

Clapp joined the abolitionist movement and was jailed for his antislavery protests. He translated Fourier's The Social Destiny of Man and works by Baudelaire and Balzac, among others. In the 1850s, after returning from Paris, he became actively involved with New York Free Love League. Believing that every person had the right to pursue an iconoclastic lifestyle in a society that often promoted traditional moral values, he was before his time in defending nonconventional sexual behavior.

Clapp had learned to be cynical early in life and, according to his peers, he became even more cynical and bitter in his later years—especially about American politics and customs. He drank heavily, and his drinking increased after the death of his closest friend, George Arnold, at age thirty-one, in 1865.

His final years dominated by drink, Clapp was admitted several times to the New York State Inebriate Asylum (now the Binghamton State Hospital). He died an alcoholic, broke and alone, on April 2, 1875.

Michael Susko

See also: Bohemianism: Pfaff's Cellar.

Further Reading

Loving, Jerome. Walt Whitman: The Song of Himself. Berkley: University of California Press, 1999.

Parry, Albert. Garrets and Pretenders: A History of Bohemianism in America. New York: Dover, 1960.

Clare, Ada (ca. 1836–1874)

Known as the Queen of Bohemia for her writings about the cultural demimonde of nineteenth-century New York City and her friendships with many of its denizens, Ada Clare embraced the city's cultural life as an actress, frequenter of the neighborhood bohemian bar Pfaff's Cellar, and contributor to the New York Saturday Press, a weekly magazine of the arts.

Jane McElhenney—who eventually adopted the name “Clare” and then “Ada Clare,” perhaps after a character in Charles Dickens's novel Bleak House—is believed to have been born in July 1836, in Charleston, South Carolina. The town was prospering in the mid-nineteenth century, on the strength of rice, cotton, and indigo cultivation in the area and shipping activity at its ports. McElhenney's family belonged to Charleston's privileged class. By the time she was eleven years old, however, she was living with her mother's father, who took her to cities in the North.

When she was about eighteen, she moved to New York and published her first works, love poems and stories, using pseudonyms. Her first sale was to Atlas in January 1855. Clare also sought out acting roles on the stage, appearing in The Hunchback in August 1855, followed in the next two years by Love and Revenge, The Wife, Hamlet, The Marble Heart, Jane Eyre, and The Phantom. Although her earliest performances were not outstanding, her notices improved.

Her artistic endeavors opened new social circles to her in New York. She met the celebrated pianist-composer

Louis Moreau Gottschalk, and they became involved in a brief but torrid affair. In 1857, Clare, who was by that time in Paris, gave birth to a son she claimed was Gottschalk's.

While in Paris, Clare wrote about theatrical productions for the Atlas. She returned to New York in 1859 and appeared in Antony and Cleopatra. She also pursued writing, publishing bold columns on topics of political and artistic concern in the Saturday Press and the Leader and associating with such literary stars as the poet Walt Whitman and the poet and actress Adah Menken. Clare became known as the "Queen of Bohemia." Bohemianism, as she defined it, was sympathy for "all things above and beyond convention." A bohemian, she added, is not a "victim of rules and customs; he steps over them with an easy, graceful, joyous unconsciousness."

Ever carefree and itinerant, Clare traveled to San Francisco in 1864, writing for the Golden Era. Then, while visiting Hawaii, she wrote a series of letters that were published in the San Francisco Bulletin. After appearing in a poorly received production of Camille, she returned to New York, where she published a novel, Only a Woman's Heart, in 1866. The book, which glamorized passion and ended tragically, was not commercially successful. Contemporary reviewers panned it for being disrespectful of social conventions; modern critics have tended to praise its insight and originality.

After joining a traveling stage company and playing in The Merry Wives of Windsor under the name of Agnes Stanfield, Clare married actor J. Franklin Noyes in September 1868. She continued acting after marriage; her last play was East Lynne, performed in Rochester, New York, in 1874. On March 4 of that year, she died from the bite of a rabid dog, suffered in the office of her theatrical agent.

Kelly Boyle Sagert

See also: Bohemianism.

Further Reading

Clare, Ada. Only a Woman's Heart. New York: M. Doolady, 1866.

Goldblatt, Gloria. "The Queen of Bohemia Grew Up in Charleston." Carologue (Autumn 1988) : 10–11, 28.

Cocaine

Cocaine, an alkaloid extract of the coca plant (Erythroxylon coca), produces a feeling of intense euphoria and invincibility when inhaled or injected. It gained widespread popularity in America after a German chemist, Albert Nieman, first succeeded in distilling it in 1860. In the next several decades, cocaine became a common ingredient in medicinal elixirs and beverages, such as Angelo Mariani's Vin Mariani (a coca wine) and John S. Pemberton's Coca-Cola (introduced in 1886). Endorsements by psychiatrist Sigmund Freud and neurologist and former U.S. Surgeon General William A. Hammond helped increase its popularity, until the Harrison Narcotics Act of 1914 instituted the requirement of a prescription for purchases.

The drug surged in popularity again in the 1970s and 1980s, as the rock music culture, movies, and the disco scene promoted cocaine as hip, pleasurable, and energy inducing. The media influence, coupled with the sense of invincibility induced by the drug, reinforced the notion that a user could accomplish anything. Cocaine thus became associated with sheer fun and an upwardly mobile, ambitious, "yuppie" lifestyle. It became the drug of choice among corporate professionals, attorneys, and athletes as well.

The high cost of cocaine generally limited its use to middle-and upper-class Americans, but it spread to the up-and-coming generation of college and suburban high school students. Cocaine paraphernalia, such as spoons, pipes, and preparation kits, contributed to the identity of the cocaine culture.

The advent of crack cocaine in the mid-1980s radically altered the effects, cost, availability, and demographics of the drug. Crack, derived from powdered cocaine mixed with baking soda and water, forms a rock that makes a crackling sound when burned. The intense, almost immediate rush obtained from crack diminishes within five to ten minutes, leaving the user with an all-consuming desire for more—making it much more addictive than snorted cocaine in powder form.

Crack cocaine is cheaper because it is less pure and sold in smaller quantities. It became more accessible to users from poor urban communities and a highly profitable business for inner-city gangs. As a result, the crack epidemic has brought higher incidence of violent crime, more drug-related deaths, the emergence of crack houses in abandoned or run-down buildings, higher rates of child abandonment, and a growing number of crack babies (children born to crack-addicted mothers) in American urban centers in the twenty-first century.

At the same time, the concern of mainstream America over crack use has exposed socioeconomic and racial biases about a drug hierarchy, in which cocaine is viewed more favorably than crack. For example, drug laws generally dictate much harsher penalties for users and sellers of crack than for those who consume and deal cocaine. Women who exchange sexual favors for crack are called “crack whores,” while women who do the same for cocaine are referred to as “snow bunnies.”

Jennifer Aerts Terry

See also: Drug Culture.

Further Reading

Barter, James. Cocaine and Crack. San Diego, CA: Lucent, 2002.

Berne, Emma Carlson , ed. Cocaine. Farmington Hills, MI: Greenhaven, 2006.

Karch, Steven B. A Brief History of Cocaine. 2nd ed. Boca Raton, FL: CRC, 2006.

Coffeehouses

Coffeehouses haven taken a variety of forms in the counterculture, becoming widespread in the 1960s. Some were daily hangouts for students, artists, and activists, some were the sites of weekly concert series, and some were nightly music venues. What they had in common—whether privately owned or sponsored by a church or a university—was an atmosphere that encouraged conversation and the sharing of ideas and music, a place where intellectuals, or at least those with intellectual interests, met for coffee and serious discussion. In this, coffeehouses followed their seventeenth-century British predecessors, known as “penny universities,” a penny being the cost of admission and one cup of coffee, the university education coming from the challenging political, social, and artistic ideas that were exchanged.

A group of U.S. Army veterans opposed to the Vietnam War gathers at a coffeehouse—a traditional hangout for the sharing of countercultural ideas, music, and literature—in Tacoma, Washington, in 1969. (John Bryson/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

In twentieth-century North America, the discourse was often framed in musical terms, and a number of coffeehouse headliners of the day went on to higher-profile careers. Folk singer Joan Baez made her first stage appearance at Club 47 (now Club Passim) in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Joni Mitchell, who would go on to a career as a top songwriter and performer in the folk, pop, and rock genres, hung out at L’Hibou in Ottawa. Future folk and country Grammy Award–winner Emmylou Harris played the Prism in Charlottesville, Virginia, in the late 1960s for the then-standard cover charge of less than a dollar.

Patrons and performers alike enjoyed coffeehouse concerts because of the intimate nature of the shows, as most such spaces held no more than 125 people at one time. The relaxed nature of the venues also encouraged performers to experiment with new material and to talk openly with their audiences, trends not witnessed in large concert halls.

A number of coffeehouses from the 1960s have survived changing musical tastes and continue to present intimate acoustic music shows, as do many places— now more likely called clubs or cafés than coffeehouses—that sprang up in the 1970s to continue the tradition. As of the early 2000s, the Prism and Club Passim were still open for business. (L’Hibou closed in 1975.) Other popular establishments that retain the spirit of the counterculture include Me and Thee Coffeehouse in Marblehead, Massachusetts, and the Cactus Cafe in Austin, Texas.

Kerry Dexter

See also: Baez, Joan; Bohemianism; Greenwich Village, New York City.

Further Reading

von Schmidt, Eric, and Jim Rooney. Baby, Let Me Follow You Down: A History of the Cambridge Folk Years. 2nd ed. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994.

COINTELPRO

The Federal Bureau of Investigation's Counter Intelligence Program, dubbed COINTELPRO, consisted of covert operations sponsored and organized by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), under the directorship of J. Edgar Hoover. Active from 1956 to 1971, COINTELPRO sought to infiltrate, disrupt, misdirect, and neutralize left-wing organizations such as the Communist Party, the Socialist Workers Party, the Puerto Rican independence movement, the student-led New Left, the underground press—indeed, virtually all of the key movements and organizations associated with the 1960s counterculture, especially antiwar and student groups. Targets of COINTELPRO included Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), the Black Panther Party (BPP), the American Indian Movement (AIM), the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and the women's liberation movement.

COINTELPRO's tactics included extralegal and illegal activities. Its more benign activities included the publication of derogatory cartoons, anonymous letters, and insinuating articles, and creating jealousies and suspicions among the staff and leadership of targeted groups. On a wider scale, COINTELPRO engaged in effectively planned and executed disinformation campaigns. Illegal tactics included bombing selected editorial offices and orchestrating the assassinations of BPP leaders Fred Hampton and Mark Clark. Such information about COINTELPRO became known to the public between 1968 and 1978, with new evidence and documentation continuing to appear into the 2000s.

Under COINTELPRO, the FBI worked closely with the National Security Agency (NSA), the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), military police, local law enforcement, and right-wing radical groups, which were enlisted in some of the bombings of underground press editorial offices. Covert operatives conducted surveillance on private citizens (e.g., Operation CHAOS, Project MERRIMAC, and Project Resistance), compiled lists of persons associated with targeted groups, sewed dissension among members, and dispersed negative media images for the public.

FBI agents infiltrated target groups and implicated staff members as undercover agents. They also posed as violent demonstrators and arranged to be interviewed in spontaneous media coverage of demonstrations and other protest events. Even nonviolent political groups would be infiltrated; COINTELPRO agents attempted to steer them toward illegal activities. A favorite tactic for disrupting the underground press was to continually arrest street vendors. Although the defendants always won their cases because of First Amendment protection, the accumulated court costs drove the publications into bankruptcy.

The FBI conducted an estimated 2,000 COINTELPRO operations before officially abandoning the program in 1971, under the threat of public exposure.

Jeff Williams

See also: American Indian Movement; Black Panthers; New Left.

Further Reading

Churchill, Ward, and Jim Vander Wall. The COINTELPRO Papers: Documents from the FBI's Secret Wars Against Dissent in the United States. Cambridge, MA: South End, 2002.

Rips, Geoffrey. Unamerican Activities: The Campaign Against the Underground Press. San Francisco: City Lights, 1981.

Collins, Judy (1939–)

In the folk music revival of the 1960s, Judy Collins, Joan Baez, and Carolyn Hester were three women who rose above the field of emerging female musicians to endure as stars. In addition to her singing and musicianship, Collins's particular contribution to the musical scene was her restless search for the great song, the great lyrics, the fine idea artfully expressed, whether in the centuries-old lament of a grieving mother from Ireland, a pop tune from Beatles songwriter John Lennon, or a vivid, emotional vignette on the complexities of love from the young Canadian songwriter Joni Mitchell.

Judith Marjorie Collins was born in Seattle, Washington, on May 1, 1939, and grew up in Denver, Colorado. She studied classical piano with the respected teacher Antonia Brico and made her debut with the Denver Symphony at age thirteen. As a teenager, however, Collins fell in love with the acoustic guitar and the possibility of connecting emotionally with others through singing. Married at nineteen, with a husband in college and a young son, Collins followed her husband's suggestion to audition at a coffeehouse for a paid singing job.

Audiences were soon won over by her soprano voice, guitar playing, and ability to connect with listeners. A career was born. As Collins's star began to rise, her husband's academic career led the family to relocate to the East Coast. Collins soon became immersed in the Greenwich Village folk scene, playing top clubs and meeting musicians such as Eric Andersen, Bob Dylan, and Tom Rush.

Elektra Records founder Jac Holzman was taken with Collins's pure, rich voice and confident performing style, and invited the singer to record her first album, Maid of Constant Sorrow, in 1961. The album mainly was comprised of Anglo-Irish folk tunes, but, by the time of her third album, Judy Collins Number 3 (1964), Collins was recording more of the adventurous folk music she already was sharing with her concert audiences—songs by Dylan, Woody Guthrie, Tom Paxton, Pete Seeger, and Billy Edd Wheeler—alongside traditional songs. At around the same time, she became romantically involved with Stephen Sills, of the rock trio Crosby, Stills and Nash, who composed the 1969 hit single "Suite: Judy Blue Eyes" as a tribute.

Whether considering older ballads or newly written pieces, Collins chose tunes that reflected her personal and political beliefs, including Dylan's stark antiwar indictment "Masters of War" and Gil Turner's civil rights anthem "Carry It On." Perhaps drawn by what she had learned from her love of older ballads, she made it a point to select songs that were timeless as well as topical.

Collins's generosity to unknown writers also opened doors for other musicians. Her recording of Mitchell's "Both Sides Now" and Leonard Cohen's "Suzanne" brought new listeners to the folk genre and those artists, as did her spare version of the traditional hymn "Amazing Grace," which became an unexpected radio hit during the Vietnam War in 1971.

Collins has continued to make records and perform live into the 2000s. She also has written several books and acted in theater and film. She remains committed to social causes as well, working for peace across the globe, participating in the Campaign for a Landmine-Free World, and volunteering on behalf of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF).

Kerry Dexter

See also: Dylan, Bob; Greenwich Village, New York City; Seeger, Pete.

Further Reading

Claire, Vivian. Judy Collins. New York: Flash, 1977.

Collins, Judy. Sanity and Grace: A Journey of Suicide, Survival, and Strength. New York: J.P. Tarcher/Penguin, 2003.

Collins, Judy. Singing Lessons. New York: Pocket Books, 1998.

Collins, Judy. Trust Your Heart. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987.

Columbia University

As the recognized birthplace of the 1950s Beat social and literary movement and the site of several high-profile political protests in the 1960s, Columbia University, located in the borough of Manhattan in the heart of New York City, developed a reputation as a seat of counterculture activity during the late twentieth century.

Several key figures of the Beat movement, such as writers Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, and Lucien Carr, were students at the university and formulated their iconoclastic views of literature and society there. Many early poetry readings and legendary events in the creation of Beat culture took place either on or near the Columbia campus.

The New York-based folk music revival also inspired counterculture activity at Columbia in the 1950s and 1960s, as many of its students embraced the themes of social consciousness and political activism represented in folk music. The folk music revival was instrumental in laying the groundwork for the student protests of the 1960s and inspiring the participation of Columbia students in the civil rights movement. Several key figures of the folk revival, such as archivist Alan Lomax and musicians Art Garfunkel and David Bromberg, attended the university.

Columbia University was the site of a series of antiwar protests in 1968 that came to symbolize student radicalism in the late 1960s. The protests began with a brief demonstration on March 27 inside the university's main administrative building over the discovery of documents linking Columbia to the Institute for Defense Analyses (IDA), a weapons research firm under contract with the U.S. Department of Defense.

The following month, protesters, led by Mark Rudd of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) and members of the Student Afro Society (SAS), grew more confrontational, occupying several campus buildings. Administrative offices were taken over on April 23, in protest against the proposed construction of a gymnasium whose design they perceived as segregationist. The protesters occupied campus buildings for several days, ransacking offices and demanding an end to the gym construction and the university's affiliation with the IDA. Although police surrounded the occupied buildings, the protesters were able to disseminate information to the press, including a famous photograph published in Life magazine showing a protester sitting at the president's desk smoking a cigar. Obtaining food and other supplies proved more problematic; on at least one occasion, students outside the buildings attempted to catapult food to the protesters.

The protests ended violently on April 30, when officers of the New York City Police Department stormed the occupied buildings, arresting over 700 protesters and injuring dozens of others. (SAS protesters, occupying a separate building, surrendered nonviolently with the assistance of civil rights attorneys.)

A second wave of demonstrations on May 17 and 18 resulted in more arrests and injuries. The demonstrations, despite the violence, were largely successful in meeting the objectives of the organizers, as the university subsequently abandoned plans for the gymnasium and broke its ties with the IDA.

The Columbia protests inspired demonstrations on other university campuses during the late 1960s and early 1970s, including the 1969 People's Park protest at the University of California, Berkeley, which involved a similar student occupation of university property. Columbia University also was the site of student demonstrations against the apartheid policy in South Africa in the 1980s and against U.S. immigration policy in the early twenty-first century.

Michael H. Burchett

See also: Beat Generation; Folk Music; Students for a Democratic Society.

Further Reading

Columbia University. <http://www.columbia.edu>

Kunen, James Simon. The Strawberry Statement: Notes of a College Revolutionary, 1968/69. St. James, NY: Brandywine, 1995.

Raskin, Jonah. American Scream: Allen Ginsberg's Howl and the Making of the Beat Generation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.

Come-Outers

Although the term come-outers has been applied to adherents of various radical social movements that have opposed religious and social structures, it refers specifically to a religious and social reform movement in nineteenth-century America. The movement was most prevalent in the northeastern United States, though some sects spread as far as Canada.

The movement takes its name from the book of Revelations, verse 18:4: "And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her [Babylon], my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Followers were urged to "come out" from corrupt religious and social organizations. Come-outerism also was loosely associated with a drive to become less subjugated to government, sometimes to the extent of advocating anarchism. Some adherents even objected to the U.S. Constitution, which enshrined structures and institutions that limited freedom, including, at the time, slavery.

Culturally, the influence of come-outers is squarely in the tradition of religious individualism, spiritualism, and piety; the belief that individuals need no intermediary between themselves and God; and a belief in voluntary self-discipline rather than subjugation to an authoritarian legal or governmental structure. It is strongly allied with freedom of speech, and its emergence coincided with the rise of abolitionism.

The amount and reliability of information about different come-outers varies. One sect, the Cape Codders—named for the Massachusetts peninsula where they practiced—was relatively well documented, with references dating to the 1840s. There was no physical church and no religious or social hierarchy. All members could preach or speak in front of the “congregation,” believing that all were equally qualified to do so, and that God needed no intermediaries. Disregarding the Sabbath, they met on any day that was convenient; how one lived one’s life superseded formal meetings in importance. They believed in self-government, piety, self-discipline, equality, and communal sharing of resources. These beliefs constituted a major cultural and social shift from the norms of the time.

Variations of come-outerism drew adherents from diverse classes. It proved popular among factory workers in Lynn, Massachusetts, for example, where the movement was sometimes referred to as “no-organizationism.” According to this iteration, all forms of organizational structure were evil. Among the adherents, however, were many one would today consider members of the professional, educated classes and its institutions: teachers, writers, lecturers, printers, publishers, clergy, and professors. The radical abolitionist and free speech advocate William Lloyd Garrison of Boston began publishing the leading antislavery journal of the movement, The Liberator, in 1831; by 1844, he and many of his followers were calling themselves “come-outers.”

Prominent among Garrison’s abolitionist associates were Sarah and Angelina Grimké, Theodore Weld, Lydia Maria Child and David Lee Child, and Wendell Phillips, all of whom became culturally influential through writing, lecturing, or both. Other prominent come-outers included Henry Clapp, Jr., editor of New York City’s Saturday Press, and Nathaniel P. Rogers of New Hampshire, one of the most fervent advocates of free speech of his time.

Additionally, after consideration of slavery and the desirability of abolitionism, many women who were involved in come-outerism looked at the marginality of their own lives and became increasingly active in the nascent women’s rights movement.

Stephanie R. Walker

See also: Abolitionism: Garrison, William Lloyd.

Further Reading

Perry, Lewis. Radical Abolitionism: Anarchy and the Government of God in Antislavery Thought. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1973.

Strong, Douglas. Perfectionist Politics: Abolitionism and the Religious Tensions of American Democracy. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1999.

Comics, Underground

Underground comics, or comix as they are more commonly called, played a vital role in the 1960s U.S. counterculture. Comix allowed for visual representations of the drug culture, antiestablishment sentiments, and other expressions of the movement. Comix, like their mainstream counterpart, the syndicated comic strip, helped sell underground newspapers. And, most importantly in terms of the development of the comics medium, early underground cartoonists and comix writers represented a new artistic vanguard and influenced a new generation of alternative-comics creators in the 1980s and 1990s.

Zap Comix, featuring the art of Robert Crumb, was published in San Francisco beginning in 1968. It was the first and most popular of the underground comics of the 1960s youth counterculture. (Library of Congress)

Origins

Underground comics in the United States date from 1968. A handful of comic strips similar to the undergrounds (e.g., Gilbert Shelton's Wonder Wart Hog, 1961, and Dan O'Neill's Odd Bodkins, 1963) had appeared in college newspapers, underground newspapers, some mainstream newspapers, and alternative magazines; some of these comics were self-published and distributed among friends. These were not considered undergrounds, however, because most were not regularly published, they had limited press runs, and they did not serve as an expression of the 1960s counterculture, still in its nascent stages. The most noted comic books of this period are God Nose by Jack Jackson (also known as Jaxon), published in Texas in 1964, and Frank Stacks's Adventures of Jesus, published in 1962.

Robert Crumb's Zap Comix #1, printed and distributed in San Francisco on February 24, 1968, generally is recognized as the first true underground comic. Inspired by Zap, cartoonists began flocking to San Francisco, and, within five years, 300 new comix titles were published and distributed. The four major comix publishers—Print Mint, Rip Off Press, Apex Novelties, and Last Gasp Eco-funnies—had more work than they could publish. New technology in offset printing made publishing relatively inexpensive and further contributed to the proliferation of the medium.

The appellation “underground” came from the environment where comix appeared, their form of production, and their content. Early strips were published in the underground press, including such publications as the Los Angeles Free Press, the Berkeley Barb, The East Village Other, and Yarrowstalks. The printing, publication, and distribution of comix bypassed the traditional means utilized by mainstream magazines and newspapers. Head shops, record stores, and other retail outlets catering to hippies, rather than newsstands, were the common distribution points.

Many mainstream and independent printing companies refused to handle underground comics, due to their content. Some of the early publishers were entrepreneurs involved in printing psychedelic concert and dance posters who were not afraid to venture into new territory. Comix aimed at breaking restrictions established by the Comics Code Authority, a comic-book censoring organization whose standards described strict editorial guidelines for depicting sex, crime, horror, and violence within the pages of comics. Undergrounds satirized social norms, violated social taboos, expressed antiwar and other antiestablishment sentiments, promoted various social protest movements, and celebrated the new counterculture of drugs (especially marijuana and LSD), psychedelic music, political and artistic freedom, Eastern philosophy, and liberal sex. Psychedelic posters, underground newspapers, and comix were the print media symbols of the counterculture.

Creators and Influences

Comix were heavily influenced by the horror comics of the 1950s, especially EC Comics, and satirical magazines such as Mad and Help! They also were influenced by the psychedelic dance posters produced by such artists as Victor Moscoso and Rick Griffin. And, according to Crumb, comix derived direct inspiration from psychotropic drugs.

In 1965, while in New York, Crumb knowingly took some bad LSD and was in and out of its hallucinogenic effects for more than two months. It was during this period that he created the characters Shuman the Human, Mr. Natural, and the Snoids. Crumb's name quickly became the best known in comix; he is often referred to as the father of the movement. Among his most familiar characters are Mr. Natural and Fritz the Cat. His slogan, “Keep on truckin,” became ubiquitous on T-shirts, bumper stickers, and counterculture paraphernalia; Crumb eventually sought copyright protection for the phrase and filed lawsuits against violators.

Among the many notable comix titles that have appeared over the years from important cartoonists are Shelton's The Fabulous Furry Freak Brothers, O'Neill's Air Pirates (the subject of a lawsuit filed by the Walt Disney Company in 1972, because it depicted Disney characters performing oral sex and smoking marijuana, among other activities), Bill Griffith's Zippy, and Justin Green's Binky Brown Meets the Holy Virgin Mary. Other influential cartoonists have included Jay Lynch, Spain Rodriguez, Art Spiegelman, Skip Williamson, and S. Clay Wilson; other notable titles include Bijou Funnies, Moondog, Mother Oats Comix, Slow Death, Tales from the Leather Nun, Yellow Dog, and Young Lust.

While the mainstream comic-book industry of the era was dominated by white men, other groups, including women, gays, and African Americans, were better represented among comix cartoonists. This was especially true of African Americans, such as Richard "Grass[hopper]" Green and his 1972 Super Soul Comix.

Another African American underground cartoonist was Larry Fuller, the creator of Ebon (1969), a black superhero story; White Whore Funnies (1975), the first underground to have porn shop distribution; and Adults Only Comics Magazine (1976). He also edited the first gay comix anthology, Gay Heartthrobs (1975). Underground gay comix had appeared earlier than Fuller's Gay Heartthrobs, with Harry Chess: That Man from A.U.N.T.I.E. (1971) by Al Shapiro (also known as A. Jay) as one example. However, Fuller's work continued through the 1970s and into the 1980s.

In celebration of women cartoonists, Lee Marrs, Willy Mendes, and seven other women published the first all-woman comix anthology, It Ain't Me, Babe (Women's Liberation) in 1970. It contains the work of notable female cartoonists such as Michele Brand, Nancy Kalish, Meredith Kurtzman, Lisa Lyons, Willy Mendes, Trina Robbins, and Carole Sobocinski. Joyce Sutton Farmer and Lyn Chevli published the first all-woman collaborative comix series, Tits'N' Clits, in 1971. Cartoonist Roberta Gregory was part of the Wimmen's Comix Collective, which produced Wimmen's Comix in 1974; it included lesbian themes and was published by Ron Turner. In 1976, Gregory produced the lesbian-oriented Dynamite Damsels.

Underground comix emerged as one of the most popular forms of literature generated by the modern American counterculture. In 1968, Gary Arlington opened the San Francisco Comic Book Company, the first all-comix store in the city, which became a hub for cartoonists to meet and discuss projects. In 1973, the first comix convention was held in Berkeley.

By the mid-1970s, however, several factors had contributed to the demise of comix. During the early part of that decade, the cost of paper had soared, anti-drug paraphernalia laws had caused head shops to close their doors, and the end of U.S. involvement in Vietnam had brought about the waning of the antiwar movement. The underground press thus went into decline, and a number of cartoonists shifted their attention from sex and drugs to other themes, such as revisionist history, autobiography, and angst-filled coming-of-age stories.

Although underground comix have been faulted by some critics for perpetuating stereotypical gender and racial images and for disseminating misogynistic messages, they did provide a limited voice for women and minorities. They were also instrumental in advancing the sales of underground newspapers, opening the door for a freer press. But perhaps the greatest contribution of comix to American culture was in the comics medium itself. In breaking from the prevailing Comics Code of the day, comix opened the door for adult-oriented stories and complex plot structures that had long been popular in Europe, where comics were no longer seen as literature for children.

The undergrounds also created a market for self-published comics, and many underground cartoonists (Spiegelman and Gregory, among others) found mainstream commercial and critical success, and are still producing comics today. Some of the most notable titles include Spiegelman's graphic novels Maus I: A Survivor's Tale: My Father Bleeds History (1986) and In the Shadow of No Towers (2004), Gregory's Naughty Bits series, Harvey Pekar's American Splendor series, Joyce Brabner's graphic novel Our Cancer Year (1994), Gilbert and Jaime Hernandez's Love and Rockets series, and Spain Rodriguez's My True Story (1994).

Jeff Williams

See also: Crumb, Robert.

Further Reading

Estren, Mark James. A History of Underground Comics. 1974. Berkeley, CA: Ronin, 1993.

Geerdes, Clay. "The Dating of Zap Comix #1." Comics Journal 218 (December 1999) : 117–20.

Juno, Andrea , ed. Dangerous Drawings: Interviews with Comix and Graphix Artists. New York: Juno, 1997.

Rosenkranz, Patrick. Rebel Visions: The Underground Comix Revolution 1963–1975. Seattle, WA: Fantagraphics, 2002.

Communes

Commune is one of many terms used to refer to communities in which residents share equally in the ownership of the property and most resources and all members contribute equally to the economics of the commune, typically through the division of labor; often, possessions are owned collectively. Other common terms for communes include intentional community, cooperative, collective, and colony.

Communes generally are distinguished as secular or religious and urban or rural. The establishment of most communal experiments in the United States, as elsewhere, has been motivated by the desire for a better way of life, either spiritually or economically, than that found in conventional society. By their very nature, therefore, most communes are countercultural entities. In attempting to identify distinguishing characteristics, however, it is essential to consider the motivation for their establishment, whether egalitarian, religious, or individualist-anarchist experiments.

Members of the Family of the Mystic Arts commune in Oregon pose in front of the home they built and shared in 1969. Hippie collectives, some of which remain in operation today, follow a long tradition of egalitarian, antiestablishment communes in America. (John Olson/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Secular, Egalitarian Communes

Egalitarian communes are based on the tenet that all members are equal within the society. Residents have equal access to all possessions, and all decisions are made by consensus of the group. Throughout the history of the United States, secular communes generally have been connected with a political or economic revolution, and many often existed only for a decade or less. Often, members within these communities are regarded with suspicion and are considered outcasts by those living in mainstream society.

From 1841 to 1847, the Brook Farm commune in West Roxbury, Massachusetts, established by transcendentalist and former Unitarian minister George Ripley, was one of the best-known egalitarian communes. The community was inspired by the socialist concepts of French philosopher Charles Fourier, who believed that it was necessary for people to share everything in order to enjoy a better lifestyle.

Fruitlands was another transcendentalist commune, founded by writer and educator Amos Bronson Alcott and abolitionist Charles Lane in Harvard, Massachusetts, in 1843. The social movements of the day—abolition of slavery, temperance, and vegetarianism—were espoused and practiced at the commune, which lasted less than two years. Though not successful as a secular communal experiment, the community was the subject of an interesting account written by Alcott's famous novelist daughter, Louisa May Alcott, in Transcendental Wild Oats (1873).

William H. Bennett founded two cooperative communes near Long Lane, Missouri. The first was the Bennett Cooperative Colony (1873–1877); the second was the Home Employment Cooperative Company (1894–1906). The latter was home to twenty members who referred to themselves as socialists, simply because they held all property and possessions in common. The cost of membership was $300, and each member was required to work an eight-hour day. The 180-acre (73-hectare) property included houses, a store, a shingle mill, a broom factory, a barbershop, and a blacksmith shop.

Both of Bennett's cooperatives were established as a result of his dissatisfaction with Alexander Longley, who had organized the Friendship Community (1872–1877) near Buffalo, Missouri. Longley was one of five sons of a Universalist minister in Cincinnati, Ohio. Like Ripley, he also was inspired by the socialist concepts of Fourier. Eventually, Longley became disillusioned by Fourierism, moved his family to St. Louis, and began publishing The Communist (later renamed The Altruist). Many members of the Friendship Community, including Bennett, left because of Longley's desire to convert from Fourierism to Christian communism.

Secular communal societies were the ancestors of the antiestablishment communes prevalent in the United States during the late 1960s, whose inhabitants were dubbed "hippies" and were considered the epitome of the counterculture movement that rejected established institutions and vehemently opposed the Vietnam War. Many embraced Eastern religions, championed sexual liberation, and promoted the use of psychedelic drugs to expand one's consciousness. The largest enclave of hippies was established in the Haight-Ashbury neighborhood of San Francisco, and, by 1966, it was estimated that 15,000 hippies were living communally in the large Victorian apartments there.

The Twin Oaks Community, founded in 1967 on a 123-acre (50-hectare) tobacco farm in Virginia, is one of the most enduring egalitarian intentional communities in North America. About 100 residents live in eight large houses on the property. The houses are named after noted utopian communities of the past: Degania, Harmony, Kaweah, Morningstar, Nashoba, Oneida, Ta Chai, and Tupelo. The Twin Oaks Community is most noted for its hammock-making business and tofu factory. Some members are employed as computer programmers and construction workers. Many others labor within the community, tending the garden, preparing food, and cleaning the residences. Members typically work forty-two hours per week, for which they receive the basic necessities of food, housing, and clothing. Each member also receives medical care and a modest monthly allowance to be spent outside the community, which operates as a cashless society for members. As a secular community, Twin Oaks is religiously diverse; Christian, Jewish, Buddhist, and pagan celebrations all are observed. The anniversary of the community's founding, June 16, is celebrated as a holiday as well.

Two other communities are considered offshoots or daughter communities of the Twin Oaks Community: the Acorn Community, also located in Virginia, and the East Wind Community in the Missouri Ozarks.

Located 7 miles (11 kilometers) from Twin Oaks, on 75 acres (30 hectares), the Acorn Community was founded in 1993 as a result of overpopulation at Twin Oaks. Southern Exposure Seed Exchange, a mail-order seed business, is the primary source of income for the approximately twenty members living at the Acorn Community. The East Wind Community, founded in 1973 on 1,045 acres (423 hectares) near Tecumseh, Missouri, owns and operates several businesses. The best known are East Wind Nutbutters, a nut-butter business; Slackjaw Drums, a drum-making industry; and Utopian Rope Sandals, a footwear enterprise. As in the parent community, members of the Acorn Community and the East Wind Community are required to work and hold all assets in common. In return for their labor, members receive food, clothing, housing, medical care, and a monthly allowance. Unlike the Twin Oaks Community and the Acorn Community, clothing is optional at the East Wind Community.

Ganas, another intentional commune of note, is located in the New Brighton section of Staten Island, New York. Ganas is a Spanish word meaning “motivation sufficient to act.” The commune was founded in 1979 and consists of ten partners who share ownership of ten houses and four commercial buildings that house retail stores. The focus is on recycling, and the stores sell used furniture and used clothing. The commune also includes an Internet café that sells organic espresso and used books. Seventy to eighty residents live in the houses at Ganas. In return, they either must pay rent or must work in the stores.

Religious and Spiritual Communities

Mother Ann Lee established the most successful and well-known religious communal society in the United States—the Shakers—in the 1770s. Officially known as the United Society of Believers in Christ’s Second Appearing, they were a radical offshoot of the English Quakers dubbed the “Shaking Quakers” by those outside the community.

The first Shaker settlement in the United States was located at Niskayuna (later Watervliet), New York, in 1776. The first organized community, however, was established at New Lebanon, New York, in 1787. Besides New York, the Shakers established communities in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Maine, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Georgia, and Florida. With their few remaining members living in a community at the Sabbathday Lake Shaker Village in New Gloucester, Maine, the Shakers today are recognized as the oldest surviving religious communal society in the United States.

Another successful religious commune was the Oneida Community, which flourished from 1848 to 1880 in Oneida, New York. Led by social reformer John Humphrey Noyes, the inhabitants at Oneida shared everything, including marriage partners. This practice of “complex marriage” was viewed by outsiders as adulterous and sexually immoral. In 1881, Oneida became a joint-stock company involved primarily in the production of flatware; the enterprise has continued to do business to the present day as Oneida Limited.

Another religious commune still in existence today, the House of David, was founded near the turn of the twentieth century. Established in 1902 by Benjamin Franklin Purnell, the House of David was known from the 1920s to the 1950s primarily for its barnstorming baseball teams (recognizable by their long hair and beards), which drew large crowds at amateur and semipro exhibition games around the country. At its peak, more than 900 members lived at the commune in Benton Harbor, Michigan. The group was also known for its world-renowned amusement park and zoo, which attracted as many as 200,000 visitors each season. As of the early 2000s only a few dozen members of the House of David still remained.

Founded in 1958 by Charles “Chuck” Dederich in Santa Monica, California, Synanon was one of the first and most infamous of what came to be known as the rehabilitation communes. Originally a drug rehabilitation program with an emphasis on spirituality and self-examination, Synanon began as a two-year residential program. However, Dederich, a recovering alcoholic himself, concluded that full recovery was never possible; thus, members could never graduate. Eventually, Synanon became an alternative community where members examined their lives and participated in group “truth-telling” sessions, which evolved from group therapy into social control, as members divulged their innermost weaknesses. Over time, women were required to shave their heads, men were forced to submit to vasectomies, and married couples were mandated to divorce. In an attempt to avoid paying taxes on the growing establishment, Dederich reorganized Synanon as the cultish Church of Synanon in the 1970s. After lengthy clashes with the Internal Revenue Service, Dederich faced charges of child abuse and tax evasion, and allegations of abduction, assault, and threats of violence were lodged against the facility or its members. Synanon shut down permanently in 1989.

The Farm, a spiritual intentional community in Summertown, Tennessee, was established in 1971, when counterculture icon Stephen Gaskin led 300 hippies in a caravan of sixty buses, trucks, and vans from San Francisco to the Tennessee site. Members practice a so-called hippie spirituality, in which respect is shown to all religious practices and philosophies. They vow to hold all possessions in common and advocate pacifism, vegetarianism, natural methods of birth control, and natural childbirth. By 1979, 1,500 residents were living at the Farm. At the turn of the twenty-first century, there were approximately 200 residents.

Individualist-Anarchist Colonies

Another type of communal experiment, whose founding principle is contrary to that of the social or collective commune, is the individualist-anarchist colony. Rather than advocating joint ownership of all property and possessions, members of individualist-anarchist communities contend that property should not only be held privately, but that it should be disseminated through the open market.

Modern Times was an individualist-anarchist colony established in 1851 by Josiah Warren and Stephen Pearl Andrews on 750 acres (304 hectares) at present-day Brentwood, New York. All land was bought and sold at cost. Members were paid for their labor in certificates rather than currency, and no one was permitted to make a profit. The certificates were used to trade for goods and services. Believing that crime was a result of man-made laws and authority, Warren refused to establish any penal system or police force in Modern Times. He spoke out against the institution of marriage as a social evil, and some members practiced polygamy. Pressure to conform to a less libertarian ideology resulted in the dissolution of Modern Times in 1864.

Other significant communes based on the principles of individualist anarchism were the Glennis Cooperative Industrial Company on Puget Sound in Washington (1894–1896), the Ruskin Commonwealth in Tennessee and later Georgia (1894–1901), and the Home Colony in Washington (1895–1919). The writings of Edward Bellamy were the inspiration for the founding of both the Glennis Cooperative and the Ruskin Commonwealth. Bellamy's best-selling novel, Looking Backward (1888), argued against capitalism and depicted a sweeping utopian reform that resonated with those espousing a new social order. When the Glennis Cooperative failed, three of its members— George H. Allen, Oliver A. Verity, and B.F. O'Dell— determined to create a new community for like-minded individualist anarchists, and the Home Colony was established near Puget Sound.

Both historically and presently, some communal ventures are a consequence of economic necessity, political or societal pressure, or religious obligation. The reasons for the establishment of a commune are as numerous and varied as the groups themselves. The universal constant in the success of any intentional community is the individual members' complete belief in and total commitment to the vision of the group.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Alcott, Amos Bronson; Anarchism; Brook Farm; Farm, The; Hippies; Lee, Ann; Oneida Community; Quakers; Shakers; Transcendentalism; Vegetarianism.

Further Reading

Calverton, Victor F. Where Angels Dared to Tread: Socialist and Communist Utopian Colonies in the United States. Freeport, NY: Books for Libraries, 1969.

Christian, Diana Leafe. Creating a Life Together: Practical Tools to Grow Ecovillages and Intentional Communities. Gabriola Island, Canada: New Society, 2003.

Fellowship for Intentional Community. <http://fic.ic.org>

Friesen, John W., and Virginia Lyons Friesen. The Palgrave Companion to North American Utopias. New York: Palgrave

Macmillan, 2004.

Kanter, Rosabeth Moss. Commitment and Community: Communes and Utopias in Sociological Perspective. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1972.

Kanter, Rosabeth Moss. Communes: Creating and Managing the Collective Life. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

Pitzer, Donald E. , ed. America's Communal Utopias. Chapel Hill and London: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Veysey, Laurence R. The Communal Experience: Anarchist and Mystical Communities in Twentieth-Century America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.

Zablocki, Benjamin David. Alienation and Charisma: A Study of Contemporary American Communes. New York: Free Press, 1980.

Communism

Communism is an ideology that advocates the abolition of class societies and the creation of a new social, economic, and political order in which people live free from class oppression and government authority. Communist doctrine is most closely identified with a particular interpretation of the theories of the nineteenth-century German thinkers Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels—that of Vladimir Lenin, Russian revolutionary theorist and founder of the Russian Communist Party. According to Lenin, communist society can come into existence only after a violent revolution to overthrow industrial capitalism. Such a revolution, he maintained, would require a radical consciousness on the part of workers, cultivated by a vanguard of party elite.

In 1917, with Russia suffering the depredations of World War I, a domestic faction called the Bolsheviks led an uprising that forced the abdication of Czar Nicholas II in March and replaced the provisional government that succeeded him with the first communist regime in world history in October 1917. Two years later, the Bolsheviks established the Communist International, dedicated to spreading the revolution throughout the world.

In a number of countries, socialists disaffected by their governments' participation in the war began to split off and form new communist parties. The United States was no exception, and an American communist movement was born in the years immediately following the war. Throughout the course of American history, however, a number of social and intellectual movements have existed that reflected some of the most important communist ideas, such as the breaking down of class distinctions.

Proto-Communist Ideas in the United States

During the period of territorial expansion and industrial development in the early to mid-nineteenth century, American social reformers set up experimental towns, such as New Harmony, Indiana, in which the population lived in a quasi-communistic fashion. Social labor was shared without regard to class distinction.

These so-called utopian communities were set up to exist outside the broader capitalist culture of the time. The inhabitants believed they lived according to a culture of sacrifice, sharing, and mutual assistance, one that was markedly different from the culture of personal acquisition, greed, and competition that characterized American society at large. Nevertheless, these utopian communities still functioned on a strong work ethic and sold their goods on the capitalist market.

Following the Civil War, the main thrust of communism in the United States was taken up by the nascent socialists, who found their constituency in the growing industrial working class in Northern cities. The socialist parties of this period, such as the German Socialist Party, shared Marx's vision of creating a classless society. However, they also tended to argue that the goals of socialism could be best achieved through democratic politics and by working with labor unions to improve the working class's living conditions.

While many socialist parties retained a rhetorical commitment to revolution, they often tended to accommodate the growth of the capitalist system. American socialists from the 1880s to World War I tended to be either educated intellectuals who rejected the norms of the broader society or immigrant workers who were isolated from mainstream society and had experienced industrial conflict in their homelands.

In the early twentieth century, the American socialist and labor movements both underwent changes brought on by structural shifts in the capitalist economy itself. As capitalist production spread across the country and industry began to challenge agriculture for control of the economy, a large supply of unskilled labor became important to the development of American manufacturing.

An influx of immigrants created many organizational problems for the old craft unions of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and the mainstream socialist parties—which mostly represented skilled workers from older immigrant groups. The older craft unions were unable to integrate these newer generations of unskilled workers, many of whom were not yet assimilated into American culture. New unions began to emerge that sought to represent the interests of all workers, while a burgeoning anarchist movement challenged the passivity of the established socialist parties.

The emergence of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW, or Wobblies) in 1905 was an important moment in this process. Many of the founding members of the American communist movement, such as John Reed and William "Big Bill" Haywood, were originally associated with the IWW. The Wobblies' belief in the principle of "one big union," an international body representing everyone who worked for a wage, put them at odds with the established unions of the AFL, which led to conflicts over organizing, strikes, and politics. Still, the IWW was much smaller than the AFL, and it tended to attract intellectuals, immigrant workers, and workers in the Western states.

Impact of World War I and the Russian Revolution

The direct spark for the development of a specifically American communist political movement came from Europe: the outbreak of World War I. Despite Marxism's assertion that working people across the globe shared the same fundamental interests regardless of nationality, many European socialist parties supported their nation's involvement in the war. This provoked a severe crisis in the global socialist movement, with many left-wing socialists breaking away from their respective parties to oppose the war. Almost overnight, new communist parties began to emerge in places such as Germany, Hungary, and Great Britain; these parties were based on the Bolshevik model, which had been responsible for the successful revolution in Russia in 1917.

In the United States, this movement began in 1919 with the expulsion of the Socialist Party's left wing from the party convention in Chicago. The left-wingers, led by journalist Reed, who had witnessed the Russian Revolution firsthand, promptly met to form a new party called the Communist Labor Party of America. Moreover, several communist-leaning elements associated with foreign-language federations broke away at about the same time to form the Communist Party of America. These elements, led by the Italian immigrant Louis C. Fraina, were mostly associated with immigrant workers.

Tension developed between the two new parties, as they debated which one was better able to lead the revolution in the United States. The members of Reed's Communist Labor Party were primarily Greenwich Village intellectuals or workers with a background in the craft unions. They argued that Fraina's party was too closely associated with immigrants to win the sympathy of American workers. Fraina argued that the revolution would depend precisely on these immigrant workers, many of whom had previous revolutionary experience in their homelands.

In 1919, the two parties sent delegates to the Communist International in Moscow, hoping to gain recognition from the Bolsheviks. Instead, the Communist International instructed the two parties to merge, a feat that was accomplished with some difficulty in 1921. The result of this merger, the early American Communist Party, was numerically small and made up mostly of intellectuals and immigrant workers. Its connection to the broader working class was tenuous at best, even though party members participated in strikes and agitated within the unions.

American Communists in this period, as they would throughout most of history, lived a life estranged from mainstream society, and their devotion to the cause of revolution and the class struggle became the defining characteristic of their lives. While many party members held jobs in the mainstream economy, they would not hesitate to uproot themselves and their families—for example, by changing careers or moving to a different city—for the greater good of society, which, in their view, demanded the proletarian revolution.

The situation of the early party was made even more tenuous by repression from the federal government. During the 1920s, U.S. Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer led an effort to investigate, harass, and arrest Communists and suspected sympathizers. The so-called Palmer Raids took a heavy toll on the party. Many Communists were arrested and harassed, and many of foreign origin were deported or forced to flee the country.

During the 1920s and 1930s, the party went through a number of political shifts and several internal splits and factional disputes based on broader shifts in the world communist movement, such as the switch from opposing socialist parties to cooperating with them. Still, personal rivalries and theoretical differences specific to the United States played a part as well. These splits and cleavages came to define the movement and its adherents.

The Popular Front and Emergence of Trotskyism

In 1927, leadership of the American Communist Party (now the Communist Party USA, or CPUSA) passed to Jay Lovestone, a founding member of the party with a previous history in the Socialist Party. At this same time, James Cannon—the leader of a prominent faction opposed to Lovestone—attended the Sixth Congress of the Communist International in Moscow, where he encountered the ideas of Leon Trotsky. A coleader of the Russian Revolution and influential early polemicist, Trotsky had emerged as a strong critic of Stalin, who had taken over power in the Soviet Union following Lenin's death in 1924.

The party leadership, under orders from Moscow, expelled Cannon and his associates for their allegiance to Trotsky. Cannon went on to form the Communist League of America as the American wing of Trotsky's International Left Opposition to Stalin. The Left Opposition argued that Stalin's bureaucratization of Russia had turned the Soviet Union into a "deformed workers' state" and that a second political revolution in the Soviet Union had become necessary. The emergence of the Trotskyist movement marked the development of two alternative communist movements in the United States, which, despite their theoretical differences, played remarkably similar roles in American counterculture.

With the departure of Cannon's faction, the United States had a full-fledged Trotskyist party that competed with the original Communist Party. Although Cannon's party would undergo numerous splits and factional disputes of its own, Trotskyism has played an important part in the history of American communism over the years.

During the 1930s, the question of how Communists should organize the working class for the coming revolution and to what extent they should work within the existing unions was the subject of constant debate for both Stalinists and Trotskyists. For most of the Great Depression, the international communist movement argued that capitalism was collapsing, and the road to world revolution had opened.

The CPUSA responded by abandoning all work within the AFL and began an all-out attempt to organize broad industrial unions on a mass basis. Many Communists, regardless of their personal backgrounds, followed the policy of "going to the working-class" by taking factory jobs, so they could play a part in the formation of unions. During this period, the discipline of the party—whether Stalinist or Trotskyist—was paramount, as Communists were expected to be willing to uproot their own lives and subsume their personal interests in order to follow the instructions of the party. For many, this might mean changing jobs, moving across the country, or even taking or leaving an intimate partner.

With the outbreak of World War II in 1939, the CPUSA followed the foreign policy interests of the Soviet state, which had signed a nonaggression pact with Nazi Germany. When Adolf Hitler attacked the Soviet Union in 1941, however, the Communist Party rallied to its defense and urged the American working class to support the war effort. Most of the Trotskyist groups also joined in support for the allied war movement. Across America, Communist and Trotskyist cadres found themselves on the same side once again, urging the working class to exercise labor discipline in the name of the war effort and recruiting young workers for the military.

These dramatic changes in policy, first supporting the Nazis and then becoming energetic recruiters for the Allied war effort, were characteristic of communist subculture throughout the twentieth century. As the needs of the Soviet state changed, so did the priorities, politics, beliefs, and entire worldview of American Communists.

Cold War Era

Following World War II, the Communist Party enjoyed a brief period of legitimacy, during which it was able to participate in American political life to a limited extent in coalitions with other parties. It played an important part in Henry Wallace's bid for president on the Progressive Party ticket in 1948, helping to organize and staff the campaign. However, this period came to a quick end with the emergence of the cold war between the United States and the Soviet Union, which put American Communists in allegiance with their nation's greatest enemy.

The right-wing political culture that dominated the United States in the 1950s drove Communists underground once again. Liberal groups who before had been willing to work in coalitions with Communists were no longer open to collaboration. The federal government began to require people to take loyalty oaths in order to qualify for public-service jobs, and Hollywood personalities suspected of sympathy to communism were blacklisted.

A Red Scare developed, led by Senator Joseph McCarthy, a Republican from Wisconsin. McCarthy set about to expose purported Communist infiltration of the U.S. government, recklessly ruining countless individual careers and instilling a witch-hunt mentality among the population. The fear that American Communists were divulging nuclear secrets to the enemy was a constant theme in popular culture. Communists reacted by developing a virtual siege mentality, where the fear of arrest and persecution was a paramount concern in local party cells.

By the time the Red Scare died down, the communist movement had suffered a tremendous toll. Numerous individuals had been imprisoned, countless people had had their careers ruined, and Communists Julius and Ethel Rosenberg had been tried and executed for divulging nuclear secrets to the Soviet Union.

Despite these difficulties, Communists of both orthodox and Trotskyist conviction played an important— if behind-the-scenes—role in the African American civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. While many leaders of the nonviolent civil rights movement were reluctant to be identified with Communists, others—such as Black Muslim spokesman Malcolm X—openly collaborated with them. The popular African American singer Paul Robeson was criticized in mainstream media for his alleged communist sympathies during this period.

Robeson highlights an important feature of the communist counterculture throughout the twentieth century. During much of this period, Communists participated in cultural and artistic activity “as Communists.” In other words, attending a performance by Robeson or some other sympathetic performer was a symbol of one's commitment to the communist cause.

Local party cells organized such outings to help make communism more than a mere political affiliation, but a culture and way of life. The children of Communists were very much part of this movement; the phenomenon of so-called red-diaper babies was a central aspect of this period. Communists often sent their children to Communist Party youth meetings, classes organized by the party, and even summer camps. Being the child of a Communist at this time often meant being isolated from society at large and raised in a semicomunal fashion along with other children of party members.

The 1960s and New Left

The emergence of the student protest movement of the 1960s was the most important event in the evolution of the American communist movement during the postwar period. As the student movement grew more radical, many activists turned to the teachings of Chinese communist leader Mao Zedong (Mao Tse-tung). The university-based Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) included a prominent Maoist-inspired faction. Groups such as the Weathermen and the Black Panthers began to argue for a strategy of urban guerrilla warfare against the state, based on Mao's ideas.

The emergence of Maoism in the 1960s added a new element to the communist counterculture. The American New Left focused less on the industrial working class and more on oppressed minorities as the driving force of the communist revolution. Therefore, the New Left appealed to the emerging generation of radical youth in ways that the Old Left could not.

Long-standing Communists now operated in a state of tension with the emerging counterculture. Many Old Left Communists rejected the new ideas of personal freedom and sexual libertinism as artifacts of a decadent capitalist society. Young New Left Communists, meanwhile, generally embraced the new cultural atmosphere—indeed, they were a driving force of it.

Owing primarily to the theory of strict party discipline that they took from Lenin, the CPUSA continues to function today, despite the demise of the Soviet Union. Several of the main Trotskyist groups also survive, although the relevance of both Soviet-style communism and Trotskyism to social emancipation has been increasingly called into question by a new transnational social movement opposing globalization.

In the early twenty-first century, it is unclear what role communism and communist ideas will play in the future of American counterculture. While many young activists implicitly and explicitly reference communist ideas in their opposition to globalization, they largely reject the strict party discipline. While it is likely that both the Communist Party USA and several Trotskyist groups will continue to play a role in organizing protests against war and globalization, they will likely remain as they are today: small political sects whose overall relevance to the broader movement for social justice is uncertain.

Michael F. Gretz

See also: Industrial Workers of the World; New Left; Socialism.

Further Reading

Bell, Daniel. Marxian Socialism in the United States. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1987.

Buhle, Paul. Marxism in the United States: Remapping the History of the American Left. New York: Verso, 1991.

Draper, Theodore. The Origins of American Communism. New York: Elephant, 1989.

Service, Robert. Comrades: A History of World Communism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2007.

Communitarianism

Communitarianism is a set of loosely associated philosophical and cultural commitments that place the value of community over—or at least on the same level as—that of the individual or any other political entity. Communitarians did not and still do not necessarily identify themselves by this term. The moniker derives from their diverse criticism of liberal philosophers who believe in the primacy of the individual. Instead of focusing on the individual, communitarians emphasize the social and shared nature of human existence and human experience. This collectivist outlook leads them to thoroughly reject the epistemological and ontological claims of philosophical liberalism on the grounds that it entails an unnatural, myopic focus on individual rights, duties, and obligations that are abstractly removed from the social contexts and communities in which people live their everyday lives.

Communitarians should not be confused with Marxists or communists, as they do not believe in submission to a centralizing or domineering political authority. Further, their belief in possibilities for social progress and mobility separates communitarians from many Marxists; communitarians do not hold strictly to the tenets of economic and historical determinism. Thus, they often find themselves at odds with both the cultural left and the cultural right on many social, economic, and political issues.

Communitarians entered the void between the mainstream, orthodox visions for political and social life. They attempted to redefine the questions that were being asked and tried to establish a new basis on which to judge the answers to these new questions, as well as preexisting ones.

The origins of the communitarian movement came about in the wake of the publication of John Rawls's A Theory of Justice (1971). The varied responses of more community-oriented political philosophers—including Alasdair MacIntyre, Michael Sandel, Charles Taylor, and Michael Walzer—centered on the ways in which Rawls misunderstood the self, devalued community, and tacitly promoted applying a universalistic perspective regarding modern Western values and ethics upon other societies.

Each of the aforementioned authors sought to respond to the dominant liberal tradition that Rawls had codified by publishing volumes in the 1980s that criticized the orthodox liberal assumptions about individuals and their relations to others. These philosophers illustrated the importance of communal ties and traditions to the social life of individuals. However, the books they produced were not the work of a cohesive movement and, although at points their writing was compelling, many of their arguments created strange bedfellows for theorists interested in justice. For example, the Indian caste system was used to illustrate what another form of justice could be.

Some of the criticisms leveled by the communitarians fell away as the philosophical conversation dubbed the “liberal versus communitarian debate” became increasingly more political. Yet the allegations of Rawls's having an atomistic understanding of the individual and claiming universal applicability of Western values to all populations despite their different histories and traditions prompted him to respond. Rawls's 1993 work, Political Liberalism, addresses some of the concerns germane to a more socially oriented conception of the individual. In his 1999 book, The Law of the Peoples, Rawls answers critics who allege that he sought to universalize his ideas beyond the traditions in which he grew up and lives. In the later volume, Rawls makes clear that the ideas he advocates may not be applicable to all social groups and political entities around the globe.

Communitarians hold to the view that if the world valued community more than it presently does, it would be a vastly different and significantly better place for everyone. Even without a unified communitarian philosophy, these various critics of the liberal status quo dared to ask questions that stepped out of the traditional boundaries of liberalism and represented a counterculture to the mainstream of political philosophy.

Their efforts have brought greater prominence to books, studies, and other initiatives that address concerns about the state of community in the United States and abroad. The impact of communitarian philosophy has been felt in a wide range of instances, from the political maneuvers of Bill Clinton's first presidential campaign, to protests against the World Trade Organization, to local efforts to cut polluting emissions when the federal government will not act.

There are, however, many unresolved questions about communitarianism. Chief among these is what the boundaries of communities will be in the future. From a communitarian perspective, how will evolving electronic communities shape future conceptions of individuality and community? How will communities come to interact with each other if there is no universal platform for judging human rights? How will conflicts among these groups be resolved when they have less and less common ground from which to carry on a dialogue?

Despite these looming questions, it is clear that communitarianism will continue to remain relevant to political theory for decades to come. What is less well known is if it will achieve its aim to re-center political discussions altogether and whether it will have an impact in the realm of everyday governance. The legacy of communitarianism lies in seeking a different path to a better future—a path that acknowledges and honors the importance of the social bonds that individuals have from the moment they are born.

Aaron Cooley

See also: Communism.

Further Reading

Daly, Markate , ed. Communitarianism: A New Public Ethics. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1994.

MacIntyre, Alasdair C. After Virtue: A Study in Moral Theory. 3rd ed. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2007.

Paul, Ellen Frankel, Fred D. Miller, and Jeffrey Paul. The Communitarian Challenge to Liberalism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Sandel, Michael J. Liberalism and the Limits of Justice. 2nd ed. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Con Artists

Con artists, also called grifters, swindlers, and hustlers, are professional, master manipulators who take advantage of unsuspecting subjects often referred to as “marks.” Their goal is to take advantage of the confidence of their marks using deception and exploitation. Grifters reject conventional standards of behavior by intentionally misleading a person or persons, generally of lesser skill or knowledge, with the goal of financial or other gain. Thus, the world of con artistry is a counterculture predicated on acquiring quick money from unsuspecting subjects using a variety of criminal activities.

The fundamental tenets of grifting have been seen throughout the course of American history. Con artists seek to exploit human weaknesses, such as greed, vanity, naiveté, and paranoia, as well as human compassion. Classic con artists are driven by a need to illustrate to the world how clever they are in terms of the meticulous planning and execution of their cons. Some of the most common forms of grifting in the United States and elsewhere are identity theft and impersonations, real estate and investment fraud, and various e-mail scams.

Grifting in America flourished during the nineteenth century. William Thompson, one of the first well-known con artists of the nineteenth century, was arrested and brought to trial for his scams in 1849. During the trial, the New Orleans Picayune used the term confidence man to describe Thompson’s character and his use of illegitimate means to acquire personal property and material wealth. Such were his skill and persuasiveness that he could befriend strangers and walk off with their watches.

Another notorious swindler of the nineteenth century, financier Daniel Drew, built his financial empire on hustling cattle and fraudulent railroad deals. The term watered stock, or artificially inflated company shares, derived from Drew's scam of having his cattle drink water to gain weight before he sold them.

The counterculture of con artistry became more pervasive in the United States with the rise of mass media, such as radio, television, and the national press, in the twentieth century. Arrests for scams and schemes of all kinds were on the rise, with some kind of hustle seemingly associated with every major historical event and emerging trend, fad, or invention. In the 1920s, there were Florida real estate scams and Ponzi schemes, named for Charles Ponzi, who duped thousands of New England residents into investing in a postage stamp speculation plot. By the 1970s, popular Christian ministers, such as the Reverend Jimmy Bakker, used their television shows to exploit ministry members. As the twenty-first century began, scams to get monetary compensation on the part of persons who claimed to have survived the September 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center were revealed. The biggest con of all was revealed in 2008, when Wall Street investor Bernard Madoff was arrested for what was described as a Ponzi scheme that bilked investors for some $50–$60 billion; Madoff pleaded guilty in March 2009 and was sentenced to life in prison.

One of the most pervasive cons of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries is identity theft, in which the grifter steals the identity of an individual (often in the form of a Social Security number, credit card number, or Web site password) and uses it to make purchases, execute transactions, or otherwise benefit illegally. Among the most notorious impersonators of recent decades is Frank Abagnale, a self-confessed con man who has paraded as a pilot, doctor, lawyer, and professor. He is best known for check forgery, as portrayed in the 2002 motion picture Catch Me If You Can, acquiring millions of dollars from various banks across the United States.

As in the past, today's con artists generally live as transients, which affords them the opportunity to use the same or similar scams on different marks. Many embrace a distinctive grifting lifestyle, forgoing a regular paycheck and the commitments of a mortgage and family. By the time a scam is discovered, the grifter often has escaped social, physical, and legal sanctions. Thus, a con artist's mobility is a functional behavior pattern that allows him or her to elude capture and evade punishment.

As ever, today's grifters rely on naive individuals who place their confidence in "get-rich-quick schemes" and believe what is "too good to be true." Some of the most-practiced cons of the twenty-first century are mortgage and investment frauds. Through the first quarter of 2006, according to the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), mortgage-fraud cases in the United States increased approximately 92 percent over 2003. Another common scam is one known as "phishing," which uses the modern technology of the Internet. Phishing allows the con artist to reach a very large number of individuals in a short amount of time. The grifter communicates with the mark by e-mail, pretending to represent an organization or company doing business with a bank or other financial institution, in order to extract personal information that can be used later to steal money. The e-mail messages are formatted exactly like those from the actual company. They ask the mark to "verify" personal information regarding an account—information that actually gives the grifter access. Thus, with all its benefits and conveniences, the Internet also serves as a vehicle to exploit unsuspecting marks, costing American citizens and companies more than $100 million a year.

Grifters also rely on cultural and economic trends as cornerstones for modifying, improving, and developing new hustles. As the material artifacts of mainstream culture change, the counterculture of hustlers and the art of grifting remain ever-evolving forces in society.

Anita Bledsoe-Gardner

Further Reading

Abagnale, Frank. The Art of the Steal: How to Protect Yourself and Your Business from Fraud—America's #1 Crime. New York: Broadway, 2001.

Hattunen, Karen. Confidence Men and the Painted Women: A Study of Middle Class Culture in America 1830–1870. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1982.

Jackman, Ian, ed. Con Men. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2003.

Kaminski, Marek M. Games Prisoners Play. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.

Maurer, David W. The American Confidence Man. Springfield, IL: Charles C. Thomas, 1974.

Nash, Robert Jay. Hustlers and Con Men: An Anecdotal History of the Confidence Man and His Games. New York: M. Evans, 1976.

Streissguth, Thomas. Hoaxers and Hustlers. Minneapolis, MN: Oliver, 1994.

Conceptual Art

Conceptual art, also known as idea art, refers, primarily, to art produced during the 1960s and 1970s that eschewed the material and manner of execution and attached primary importance to its underlying concept and ideation. During this period, artists in North America, Europe, and Latin America sought to change the parameters of art production in order to subvert the political and economic systems surrounding it. Conceptual artists sought to break down the hierarchy of conventional media and to emphasize the role of the viewer in the production of meaning.

Conceptual art was not without precedent. In the early twentieth century, the Dadaists, and particularly Marcel Duchamp, questioned the valuation of the art object. Duchamp's "readymades" challenged the definition of art as he selected objects such as a bicycle wheel or a urinal and declared them art. They not only destroyed ideals of beauty and uniqueness but identified art as an intellectual rather than a material endeavor. By displaying his readymade objects in conventional exhibition spaces, Duchamp further questioned the monetary value assigned to art.

In the 1960s, American artists resuscitated Duchamp's ideas. Robert Rauschenberg was an early practitioner of conceptual art, but it was not until Sol LeWitt published the article "Paragraphs on Conceptual Art" in 1967 that the term and the aesthetic gained widespread attention. That year, Joseph Kosuth exhibited photographed dictionary definitions in his series Titled (Art as Idea as Idea), while Lawrence Weiner radically forwent the production of any object at all, considering the conception of the artistic idea to be the completed project.

By ascribing greater importance to communicating an idea than to producing an art object, conceptual art had the potential to alter fundamentally the systems of art reception. Conceptual artists took over the role of the art critic, intellectually framing their own ideas rather than producing objects for a critic's evaluation. Conceptual art thus gave priority to the artist's intentions and made known the intellectual premise of the work, rather than favoring mere appearance. Conceptual artists, again following the example of Duchamp, also depended on the viewer as an active participant in the production of meaning.

The primacy of the idea made documentation a key component of conceptual art. On Kawara produced a continuous documentation of his daily life in I Got Up (1970), a series of postcards recording the time and location of his morning rising. Hans Haacke researched social structures and business transactions to highlight sociopolitical issues. His Shapolsky et al... (1971) included data sheets, photographs, and charts, revealing the business practices of a New York slumlord.

Not definable as a true movement, conceptual art encompassed a wide range of media. By emphasizing the artist's idea over its material realization, conceptual art leveled the hierarchy of artistic media and took such disparate forms as paintings, found-object sculptures, photographs, films, live performances, and musical scores. The legacy of conceptual art endures in work by Martin Creed, Jenny Holzer, Barbara Kruger, Sherrie Levine, and many others.

Rachel Epp Buller

Further Reading

Battcock, Gregory , ed. Idea Art: A Critical Anthology. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1973.

Meyer, Ursula , ed. Conceptual Art. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1972.

Conroy, Jack (1898–1990)

John Wesley “Jack” Conroy was a working-class author and editor who wrote about the struggles of workers from the 1920s through the 1960s. Although he enjoyed only limited commercial success, Conroy encouraged and mentored future generations of radical writers. During his lifetime, he remained true to his Midwestern roots, a fact finally embraced by his hometown when Conroy was near the end of his life.

Conroy was born in Monkey Nest, near Moberly, Missouri, on December 5, 1898. His father had studied for the priesthood before becoming a miner and labor union organizer. The elder Conroy was killed in a mine explosion in 1909, along with Jack's older brother and two half-brothers. Conroy's mother remarried when Conroy was thirteen. Her new husband was an alcoholic who could not support the family.

Also in 1911, Conroy began working in a Wabash Railroad car shop in Moberly and joined two railroad workers' unions, serving as recording secretary in one local. With no time to finish his formal education, Conroy read widely. He was greatly influenced by the classics republished by E. Haldeman-Julius in the Little Blue Books series.

By the time the United States joined World War I, Conroy was a devoted pacifist and opponent of capitalism. Nonetheless, he attempted to enlist in the U.S. Army but was turned down because of a heart murmur. After a brief time at the University of Missouri, he returned to his job in Moberly, only to be thrown out of work by the Great Railroad Strike of 1922.

Conroy spent the next five years riding the rails, working at menial jobs, and listening to other members of the working class talk about their lives, their hardships, triumphs, and dreams for the future. Such accounts provided the basis for many of Conroy's writings, such as The Disinherited (1933), an autobiographical novel that follows the adventures of a young man from a Missouri mining town as he travels around the country looking for work during the Great Depression.

In 1927, Conroy began writing on behalf of the disgruntled working class. Unlike other authors and intellectuals who were sympathetic to the plight of the American proletariat, Conroy could draw on his own experiences and family history. His first poems and essays soon began appearing in radical Midwestern magazines such as Pegasus and Northern Light. Even as he coedited publications like Spider, The College Radical, and Unrest: The Rebel Poets Anthology for 1930, Conroy continued to work at factory jobs to support his family.

Conroy's writings garnered increasing attention, especially after his piece on unemployment appeared in the prestigious American Mercury in February 1931. H.L. Mencken, the magazine's editor, encouraged Conroy to continue writing about the workers' plight and their folklore, with a dash of Conroy's wry humor. The result was his most important novel, The Disinherited. Although it sold less than 3,000 copies, The Disinherited was praised by critics and influenced other radical writers.

Conroy continued his editorial work during the 1930s, founding the leftist journals The Anvil (1933–1937) and The New Anvil (1939–1941). Support from the American Communist Party provided a steady readership, although Conroy refused to align himself with the party. He encouraged and published unknown left-wing writers, such as Nelson Algren, Meridel Le Sueur, and Richard Wright, whose influence later became widespread.

He wrote a second novel in the proletarian genre, A World to Win (1935), during the Depression. It followed the lives of two half-brothers, one a laborer and the other an intellectual. Although separated early, the brothers are eventually reunited. The story is an allegory for Conroy's belief that America needed both elements to prosper, as well as his desire to combine them in his own life. The novel, however, was panned by critics and ignored by readers.

Conroy was employed by the Works Progress Administration in the late 1930s on various projects, including industrial folklore narratives and a study of rural black migration to Northern urban centers, They Seek a City (1945). He also lectured on folklore at a number of universities during the 1950s and 1960s, including schools in Alabama, Oregon, Minnesota, and Pennsylvania. To provide a steady income, he wrote for The American Peoples' Encyclopedia, a reference work intended for the general public and sold by Sears, from 1943 to 1966.

Asked to resign from his encyclopedia job in 1966, he returned to Moberly. In 1985, the city celebrated Jack Conroy Day in honor of its radical, and most famous, son. Conroy died on February 28, 1990, two years after suffering a debilitating stroke.

Tim J. Watts

See also: Communism.

Further Reading

Madden, David. Proletarian Writers of the Thirties. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1968.

Wixson, Douglas C. Worker-Writer in America: Jack Conroy and the Tradition of Midwestern Literary Radicalism, 1898–1990. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994.

Conscientious Objectors, Draft Dodgers, and Deserters

Military conscription, or compulsory enlistment in the armed forces, has been a controversial—and, at times, volatile—issue during the course of U.S. history as it has placed in direct conflict two core American values: patriotism and individual freedom. Although most Americans have accepted their service obligations in times of national need, a substantial minority have opposed, evaded, or, in other ways, resisted them.

Methods of avoiding military service have included conscientious objection, outright draft dodging, and desertion. A conscientious objector (CO), according to the Selective Service System, “is one who is opposed to serving in the armed forces and/or bearing arms on the grounds of moral or religious principles.” In 1971, the U.S. Supreme Court restricted CO status to persons morally or religiously opposed to all wars, not a specific one. CO status may “not be based on politics, expediency or self-interest” and requires proof of a pattern of previous behavior consonant with CO beliefs.

The most common illegal method of resisting military conscription—or draft dodging—is simply to ignore one’s induction notice and either hide from the authorities or leave the country, a frequent practice during the Vietnam War. Others avoid the draft legally. Some join the National Guard or Reserves, while others procure draft deferments or exemptions. Deferments and exemptions are granted to persons who support dependents, work in jobs considered essential by the government, pursue higher education, or have physical or psychological conditions that preclude service.

Finally, deserters are persons inducted into the armed forces who then refuse to serve or who go absent without official leave (AWOL). Punishments for desertion have varied but may include the death penalty.

Early Resistance

Each time the United States has imposed a military draft (generally during wartime), it has incited opposition that reflects fears of government tyranny or conscientious objection to bearing arms. Some colonial governments conscripted men into local militias, which provoked resistance from religious pacifists such as Quakers, Mennonites, Amish, and Moravians. Even among the general population, conscription was unpopular during the American Revolution. Several colonies, including Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, allowed young men to avoid conscription by paying a fee.

Desertion was a more serious problem. An estimated 20 to 25 percent of colonial soldiers went AWOL annually during the Revolution. Indeed, desertion remained an issue for the nation’s all-volunteer force during the War of 1812 and the Mexican-American War of 1846 to 1848; annual desertion rates ranged between 7 and 15 percent.

The first national drafts occurred during the American Civil War, in both the Union and the Confederacy. Only about 2 percent of Union soldiers were conscripted, however, and another 6 percent were paid substitutes. Even so, the draft was opposed by pacifist religious groups, communal utopians, civil libertarians, and those who refused to fight for a cause they did not support. In July 1863, passage of federal legislation making able-bodied men between the ages of twenty and forty-five eligible for induction led to the bloody New York Draft Riots, in which more than 300 people died.

The Union draft law was especially controversial because the wealthy could buy their freedom by paying a $300 fee or hiring a substitute. In the Confederacy, the price was $500; additionally, one slaveholder or overseer was draft exempt for every twenty slaves.

As the conflict progressed, desertion rates rose. Officially, the Union listed a total of 278,000 deserters (11 percent of its armed forces), while the Confederacy counted 104,000 (10 percent). The actual figures were probably higher.

When the Civil War was over, the reunited nation returned to an all-volunteer military for the next half century. AWOL rates remained high, especially for the U.S. Navy, but the total number of desertions was relatively low, because the armed forces were so small (approximately 27,000).

In 1917, during World War I, the U.S. government reintroduced conscription by creating local draft boards; a total of 2.8 million men were eventually drafted. The administration of President Woodrow Wilson dealt harshly with opponents of the war, but the federal government did set up a system for conscientious objectors to serve in noncombatant roles. About 4,000 draftees registered as COs, primarily as religious pacifists. About half performed in noncombat roles; 2,000 refused any service.

The government inducted draft resisters and then subjected them to military justice, such as courts-martial, for desertion. Although government statistics vary, approximately 21,000 servicemen were deserters by the standard definition. After conviction for desertion, 17 resisters were sentenced to death, 142 were sentenced to life in prison, and 600 received other long-term prison sentences. Those who went to prison often were mistreated and even tortured.

Conscription ended with the war in 1918. A period of widespread isolationist and pacifist sentiment followed. The War Resisters League, made up of men and women who had opposed U.S. participation in the Great War—many of whom had gone to jail—was founded in 1923.

In preparation for World War II, Congress enacted the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, which required that men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty register with local draft boards. A total of 10.1 million American men ultimately were drafted under the legislation. The act also created the Civilian Public Service (CPS), which set up 152 camps for 12,000 COs to perform “work of national importance,” such as fire fighting and forestry projects. Nevertheless, some 5,500 COs—overwhelmingly Jehovah’s Witnesses—refused any and all service; most received prison terms averaging forty-two months.

Meanwhile, desertion rates had reached 6 percent by 1944. During the course of the war, a total of 21,000 military personnel were sentenced for desertion, although only one—Private Eddie Slovik—was executed for it.

Post-World War II

In 1948, after a one-year hiatus, Congress reenacted military conscription, which continued through the cold war, until 1973. The Selective Service System made all men from ages eighteen to forty-five eligible for military service and created the 1-W category for COs, who served in noncombatant positions, mainly in hospitals. Manpower demands declined after the conclusion of the Korean War in 1953. By 1962, for example, only 76,000 men were drafted, whereas 1.7 million received deferments or exemptions.

From 1965 to 1973, the Vietnam War brought a major increase in military conscription: A total of 1.9 million young men were drafted into the U.S. armed forces. The draft itself became a central issue in the cultural conflicts of the late 1960s. Conservatives supported mandatory military service as a national necessity and patriotic duty. The youth counterculture, political left, and other opponents of the war opposed the draft as an immoral infringement on personal freedom and a vehicle of American imperialism. Draft evasion and resistance became commonplace. Although most draft evaders avoided conscription by obtaining exemptions or deferments, more than 100,000 young men avoided service illegally; many fled to Canada.

Many draft dodgers evaded conscription for personal rather than political or religious reasons. Open defiance of the draft, on the other hand, was closely correlated with opposition to the war itself. As the strategy of the New Left shifted “from protest to resistance,” antiwar demonstrators led by the War Resisters League and other groups burned draft cards, blocked troop trains, and harbored draft resisters and deserters. The draft also was seen as unfair, because it affected minorities and the poor (less likely to have student deferments) disproportionately.

The volatility of military conscription lessened after 1969, when troop call-ups declined, the number of deferments was reduced, and a more equitable lottery system—by which the likelihood of conscription was randomly associated with one’s birth date—was instituted. Nevertheless, desertion rates soared. In 1971, for example, the armed services reported 79,000 AWOL cases (7 percent).

Although conscription ended in 1973, disagreements between conservatives and liberals about the draft helped fuel the so-called culture wars of the 1970s and 1980s. In 1977, conservative Republicans and others denounced Democratic President Jimmy Carter for granting amnesty to Vietnam draft evaders and deserters. In response, the Carter administration reinstated draft registration in 1980. Nevertheless, Republicans continued to impugn the patriotism of Democrats by associating them, especially President Bill Clinton, with draft evasion during the Vietnam era. This strategy was undermined somewhat by the fact that some prominent, right-wing Republicans had themselves avoided military service as young men.

The U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003 brought renewed attention to the issues of military conscription, conscientious objection, draft resistance, and desertion. Democratic congressman Charles Rangel of New York called for reinstating the draft, because he believed that members of the working class, who were disproportionately minorities, were bearing the brunt of an all-volunteer war. The unpopularity of the draft and of the war itself made that idea politically untenable. Indeed, the hardships of the Iraq War raised desertion rates to their highest level since 1980. From 2003 through 2009, the armed services counted more than 15,000 deserters.

George Rising

See also: Draft, Military: Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Anderson, Martin, and Barbara Honegger. The Military Draft: Selected Readings on Conscription. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 1982.

Fantina, Robert. Desertion and the American Soldier: 1776–2006. New York: Algora, 2006.

Kriedberg, Marvin A., and Merton G. Henry. History of Military Mobilization in the United States Army, 1775–1945. Stockton, CA: University Press of the Pacific, 2005.

Rostker, Bernard. I Want You!: The Evolution of the All-Volunteer Force. Santa Monica, CA: RAND Corporation, 2006.

Consciousness Raising

Consciousness raising (CR) is a process in which people share and examine their own experiences to learn about the context of their lives in society. Consciousness-raising groups attempt to increase members' self-awareness of a moral or social issue with a view to encouraging them to take action and educate others. Originating in the women's liberation movement, consciousness raising helped women understand that matters of sexuality, marriage, divorce, and job discrimination were not individual, personal issues but indicators of society's systematic oppression of women. Although CR first entered the women's movement's dialogue, it later became part of the broader counterculture. CR is a practice still used in quests for social and political action.

Although CR groups were pioneered in the late 1960s by New York Radical Women, a proto-feminist organization formed to discuss and take action against women's oppression, Betty Friedan's groundbreaking book, The Feminine Mystique (1963), was the primary catalyst of the consciousness-raising movement. In it, Friedan outlined, for the first time, the feelings of desperation and depression experienced by countless women, because the only roles available to them were as wives and mothers. Friedan described how women felt relegated to the home, doubted their self-worth, and were particularly vulnerable to depression. The book resonated with millions of American women, who realized that their own experiences were not isolated but part of a cultural problem.

As early as 1966, women came together in discussion groups they called "rap sessions" or "bitch sessions," but it was not until the 1970s that consciousness-raising groups as such became a widespread phenomenon. The consciousness-raising phenomenon swept the United States, as untold thousands of women joined small groups to discuss their common experiences as women in a patriarchal society. Through CR, women enacted the connections between the personal and the political, building on their shared life experiences to encourage social and political change. CR adherents were, according to the Chicago Women's Liberation Union, the "backbone of the women's liberation movement." The majority of consciousness-raising groups adhered to a structure that formed a safe haven for women to voice all manner of opinion and experience. By 1972, the National Organization for Women (NOW) had outlined the purposes of consciousness raising, primarily to encourage communication and to break down barriers between women. By sharing personal experiences, rather than speaking abstractly on women's issues as a whole, women would begin to understand the collective and political nature of their problems.

NOW issued a list of suggested topics—such as puberty, adult sexuality, marriage, divorce, and employment—one of which would be the central topic of discussion at a CR meeting. During the meetings, each woman was allowed to speak on the topic at length without interruption; testimonies were not to be criticized, praised, or otherwise evaluated. Any discussion in the CR meeting was assumed to be confidential, so women could freely express themselves without fear of reprisal. It was hoped that, in this isolated and nonjudgmental atmosphere, women would develop strong bonds and raise their awareness of collective oppression.

While embraced by many in the women's movement at large, the process of consciousness raising was derided by others in the early days as trivial or nonpolitical. While there existed radical CR gatherings and groups interested in racial or lesbian politics, the vast majority of women drawn to consciousness raising came from a white, middle-class background and did not necessarily consider themselves feminist. Through consciousness raising, it was hoped, women might not only transform their own lives but act as agents of change in society as well.

While the history of consciousness raising has been associated primarily with the women's liberation movement, the concept has been employed by other countercultural groups as a tool of enlightenment. CR played a central role in the Free Speech, antiwar, and environmental movements of the 1960s and 1970s, for example, and their efforts to educate the general public about various issues and concerns. Advocates of the contemporary environmental movement seek to raise public consciousness regarding potential threats and thereby stimulate public action.

Rachel Epp Buller

See also: Feminism, Second-Wave.

Further Reading

Dreifus, Claudia. Woman's Fate: Raps from a Feminist Consciousness-Raising Group. New York: Bantam, 1973.

Hogeland, Lisa Marie. Feminism and Its Fictions: The Consciousness-Raising Novel and the Women's Liberation Movement. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.

Shreve, Anita. Women Together, Women Alone: The Legacy of the Consciousness-Raising Movement. New York: Viking, 1989.

Conspiracy Theories

Conspiracy theories are mythologies or narratives that individuals and societies construct and embroider, based on little or no hard evidence, to make sense of a frequently confusing and chaotic world. Whether to explain the assassination of political leaders or the displacement of workers stemming from globalization, conspiracy theory narratives typically suggest that the events and trends of history reflect the secret efforts of cabals of powerful, and generally unaccountable, behind-the-scenes string-pullers. According to the narratives, those who are “in the know” about any given conspiracy usually represent the only hope of exposing the evildoers’ machinations to the world at large, thereby restoring order to the universe.

Garden of Conspiracy: A Thousand Flowers

Conspiracy theories are as numerous as they are diverse:

The ancient and secretive Masonic Order, whose members included a number of the nation’s founding fathers, rules the world from behind the scenes, as it has done for centuries. The ancient order of the Illuminati has similarly dominated civilization from the shadows since the time of the ancient Egyptians. The Jewish people seek complete control of the global economy, a theory set forth in a rabidly anti-Semitic—and forged—document known as The Protocols of the Elders of Zion (1903) and perpetuated ever since.

An extraterrestrial spacecraft crashed at Roswell, New Mexico, in 1947, and civilian and military authorities have conspired ever since to conceal the alien corpses collected at the site. The Apollo program’s lunar landings were faked, an idea that remains evergreen, despite repeated and thorough debunking. The U.S. government is hiding evidence that extraterrestrials constructed huge monuments on Mars.

President John F. Kennedy was killed by a conspiracy involving the Central Intelligence Agency and organized crime, with assassin Lee Harvey Oswald merely playing the role of a patsy. President Bill Clinton and First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton had their friend and confidant Vince Foster murdered, disguising the deed as a suicide in order to cover up this and other crimes. The U.S. government is establishing a leftist totalitarian regime, heralded by fleets of ominous black helicopters, and the only hope for freedom lies in the hands of the militia/survivalist movement. And the U.S. government (or the Israelis, take your pick) actually carried out the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

Propagation

Like religions and religious sects, conspiracy movements often develop their own scriptures, in the form of specialized tracts, books, Web sites, and blogs. Conspiracy “priests” have arisen in the mass media to spread and reinforce the gospel. Talk radio personalities Rush Limbaugh and Michael Savage, for example, have promulgated right-wing conspiracy notions for years, while radio host Art Bell is known for disseminating conspiracies involving UFOs, extraterrestrials, and the paranormal. Thanks to his 1991 film, JFK, director Oliver Stone is an icon for those espousing any of the numerous conspiracy theories that have arisen to explain the assassination of President Kennedy.

Like the related phenomenon of urban legends, the generation of conspiracy theories is not confined to any one social class or political persuasion, though paranoia is often a common denominator. Sociologists and folklorists sometimes refer to the paranoid worldview as “conspiracism,” described by social critic Frank P. Mintz as “serv[ing] the needs of diverse political and social groups in America and elsewhere. [Conspiracism] identifies elites, blames them for economic and social catastrophes, and assumes that things will be better once popular action can remove them from positions of power. As such, conspiracy theories do not typify a particular epoch or ideology.”

Researchers Chip Bertlet and Matthew N. Lyons define the essence of conspiracism as “a particular narrative form of scapegoating that frames demonized enemies as part of a vast insidious plot against the common good, while it valorizes the scapegoater as a hero for sounding the alarm.” Political commentator Christopher Hitchens places the phenomenon in a somewhat more opportunistic framework, defining conspiracy theories as “the white noise which moves in to fill the vacuity of the official version.”

Indeed, most conspiracy theories arise from the confluence of public distrust of the prevailing power structure, a paucity of real information to counter that distrust, and the tendency of the human mind to recognize—as well as its bias to create—patterns, even among unconnected data points. The terror attacks of September 11, 2001, which played on all of these factors, thus added more fuel to the fires of conspiracism than any other event in memory.

Paradoxically, conspiracy theorists tend to shun traditional methods of political organization or broad coalition building, thereby marginalizing themselves and rendering unlikely the very societal changes they claim to desire. This predilection likely relates to the necessary tendency of conspiracy theories to explain their own lack of objective supporting evidence—a phenomenon that gives rise to a narrative seamlessess that often makes the alleged conspirators all but untouchable, if not downright omnipotent. Such paranoia-driven narratives provide the faithful with a built-in excuse for being inactive, other than engaging in the self-sustaining act of gathering additional data about the supposed conspiracy.

Real Conspiracies

Largely owing to their conspicuous lack of supporting evidence, most conspiracy theories tend to be treated as disreputable. Therefore, characterizing any assertion as a “mere conspiracy theory” is often an effective way to discredit both an idea and its articulator. Indeed, most conspiracy theories fall apart when examined critically. Nevertheless, many examples of real conspiracies exist, with far-ranging consequences:

Governmental collusions enabled both Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin to kill millions in the mid-twentieth century. The Federal Bureau of Investigation’s anticommunist Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO) activities degenerated into an authoritarian conspiracy against peaceful political dissent, including the placement of agents as provocateurs inside the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) and other anti-Vietnam War groups during the 1960s. The burglary of the Democratic Party’s office in the Watergate Hotel complex and the subsequent cover-up attempt by President Richard M. Nixon really did take place in the early 1970s. Ronald Reagan administration officials illegally sold arms to Iran to finance a secret guerilla war in Nicaragua in the 1980s, in defiance of the U.S. Congress and Constitution. A “vast right-wing conspiracy,” such as that described by Hillary Rodham Clinton, did indeed encourage and enable Bill Clinton’s impeachment in 1998–1999, with financial backing from billionaire newspaper publisher Richard Mellon Scaife.

National Security Agency operatives have collaborated for decades with the World Bank to maneuver Third World nations into handing over their natural resources to multinational corporations. Automakers, oil producers, and tire manufacturers conspired to kill public transportation in post-World War II Los Angeles. General Motors conspired with the oil industry to destroy hundreds of clean, fuel-efficient electric cars in California during the late 1990s. The oil industry manipulates its refinery capacity to keep the price of gasoline artificially high. Corporate criminal conspiracies, such as the accounting frauds that brought down the Enron Corporation and Arthur Andersen LLP, were commonplace in the early 2000s.

The secretive, libertarian Federalist Society was strongly represented in the Department of Justice and judicial branch during the presidency of George W. Bush. And few can deny the influence of political dirty tricks, vote tampering, and other forms of fraud on the outcome of American elections at every level of government for centuries.

Conspiracism and Popular Culture

Pollster John Zogby reported in 2006 that 42 percent of Americans believed that the 9/11 Commission was guilty of a cover-up. In 2004, a Zogby poll showed that half of New Yorkers believed that President Bush had advance knowledge of the September 11 attacks. Whether describing truth or not, such theories bespeak a remarkable lack of public confidence in the “official line” on the subject.

Since conspiracy narratives such as these have had such a profound effect on the national psyche, it is no surprise that similar notions have pervaded American popular culture for decades. Robert Shea and Robert Anton Wilson’s Illuminati! novels began chronicling the dark deeds of the world’s secret rulers in 1975. Dan Brown’s 2003 novel, The Da Vinci Code (and the 2006 film of the same title), posits that the Knights Templar still exist in modern times, and that they protect the secret of an extant ancestral bloodline leading back to Jesus Christ. A common theme in television series such as The X-Files (1993–2002) and The Lone Gunmen (2001) is that all manner of UFO-and occult-related phenomena are true, but the information is obscured by a web of government (and sometimes alien or paranormal) intrigue. The film Conspiracy Theory (1997) depicts a paranoid New York City taxi driver (played by Mel Gibson) who discovers that the various conspiracy theories he has constructed over the years are indeed real.

Despite their ubiquity in American culture, most conspiracy theories are built on a fatally erroneous assumption about the real efficacy of conspiracies. As historian Bruce Cumings puts it, “if conspiracies exist, they rarely move history; they make a difference at the margins from time to time, but with the unforeseen consequences of a logic outside the control of their authors: and this is what is wrong with ‘conspiracy theory.’”

Michael A. Martin

See also: COINTELPRO: UFOs.

Further Reading

Conason, Joe. It Can Happen Here. New York: St. Martin’s, 2007.

Fenster, Mark. Conspiracy Theories. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

Hitchens, Christopher. “On the Imagination of Conspiracy.” In For the Sake of Argument: Essays and Minority Reports. London: Verso, 1993.

Hofstadter, Richard. “The Paranoid Style in American Politics.” Harper’s, November 1964.

Palast, Greg. Armed Madhouse. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Palast, Greg. The Best Democracy Money Can Buy: The Truth About Corporate Cons, Globalization and High-Finance Fraudsters. New York: Penguin, 2002.

Perkins, John. The Secret History of the American Empire: Economic Hit Men, Jackals, and the Truth About Global Corruption. New York: Dutton, 2007.

Pipes, Daniel. Conspiracy: How the Paranoid Style Flourishes and Where It Comes From. New York: Free Press, 1997.

Cooperatives, Consumer

Consumer cooperatives constitute an alternative form of merchandise distribution that uses a combination of shared ownership and membership governance to allow a group of like-minded citizens to control how they purchase goods. Through the democratic control of a commercial enterprise such as a grocery store, consumer cooperatives empower their members to have a greater say in the products available, to exert more influence on the working conditions of retail, manufacturing, and agricultural labor, and to voice their collective concerns over social issues such as environmental sustainability.

Through open, voluntary organizations in which citizens accept rules of membership and either one-time or recurring financial investments, consumer cooperatives have allowed the evolving American counterculture to critique the inequality and competitiveness inherent in free-market capitalism for nearly 200 years. At the same time, they have provided members with a method of binding themselves together to communicate a desire for progressive change in American political, social, and cultural values.

Cooperatives in America began as early as 1752, with Benjamin Franklin and the Philadelphia Contributionship, a mutual fire insurance association, and they have been present in European and American society since the beginnings of industrialization. Robert Owen, a Welsh factory manager, labor advocate, and outspoken critic of laissez-faire economics, came from England to found the New Harmony community in Indiana in 1825; he promoted the social and economic benefits of cooperative living before Congress and in cities across the country. The model for what became the modern consumer cooperative was the Rochdale Society of Equitable Pioneers, founded partly by Owenites in Rochdale, England, in 1844. It legally registered a store, incorporated a set of fundamental cooperative principles into its charter, and is still in operation.

The first consumer cooperatives in the United States were begun by farmers. By the late nineteenth century, labor unions such as the Knights of Labor, as well as farmers' groups such as the National Grange and the Farmers' Alliance, had established numerous merchandise stores in order to supply essential goods to their members at shared costs, while providing consistent markets for local producers. These early American attempts largely failed as the populist tide subsided and with the demise of the Knights of Labor.

By the end of the century, however, with continued economic and labor strife, cooperative ideas again garnered attention from intellectuals and social activists, such as economics professor and prominent progressive thinker Richard Ely. In 1922, the Capper-Volstead Act finally legalized farmers' cooperatives.

Strengthened by the interest of Russian, Jewish, Finnish, and other immigrant groups, the ranks of consumer cooperatives grew again after the turn of the twentieth century, including several with pronounced radical political agendas, such as the Jukola cooperative in Virginia, Minnesota. The Cooperative League of America formed in 1916, and cooperatives gradually became less class conscious, although still politically left-leaning, and more concerned with consumer and democratic control.

The Great Depression witnessed a surge in consumer cooperatives, particularly in areas with a history of back-to-the-land movements and cooperative settlements, such as rural New England. For example, the Hanover Food Co-op of Hanover, Vermont, has been in continual operation in a region sympathetic to cooperative enterprise since it was founded in 1936.

That same year, the famous writer, muckraker, and political activist Upton Sinclair published Co-op: A Novel of Living Together, and cooperatives were an integral part of the End Poverty in California (EPIC) programs, the platform for his nearly successful California gubernatorial campaign. EPIC inspired numerous buying clubs across the state, including the first co-ops in Berkeley, and local EPIC clubs sprang up around the nation.

During the Depression years, community organizations and labor union members launched a majority of the 2,400 co-op stores tallied by the government in 1936, although city and suburban neighbors also joined. With more than 330,500 members, consumer co-ops were responsible for 1.5 percent of all retail sales nationally during the 1930s.

After World War II, cooperatives in all sectors began consolidating, and the numbers of consumer cooperatives again dwindled. However, the possibility that cooperatives offered of locally controlled, countercultural alternatives to corporate business and their rebuke of the perceived materialism and conformism associated with middle-class affluence led to their receiving renewed attention from political and cultural radicals during the 1960s.

Consumer cooperatives attracted young leaders, such as antiwar activist and longtime editor of Cooperative Grocer magazine David Gutknecht and consumer food advocate Ronnie Collins, as well as interest from more radical groups such as the Black Panther Party. Art Danforth, prolific writer, peace activist, and expert on the legal and financial aspects of consumer cooperatives, helped younger organizers integrate cooperatives into the growing counterculture movement taking shape.

Meanwhile, universities began establishing research institutions devoted to developing cooperatives. For example, the University of Wisconsin Center for Cooperatives was established in 1962, and numerous other university cooperative extensions followed suit.

By the early 1970s, a new generation of consumer cooperatives emerged. These tended to be much more centered on lifestyle choices, often embodying aspects of New Age culture, alternative and homeopathic medicine, and the increasingly influential natural and organic foods movement. Many, such as the Sevananda Natural Foods Market, founded in Atlanta in 1974, also published alternative journals and began aggressive consumer education efforts. The Wedge Natural Foods Co-op, also founded in 1974, has become an institution in Minneapolis, Minnesota, contributing money to nonprofit and community organizations through donations and grants. The Weavers Way Co-op, founded in 1972 in Philadelphia, expanded beyond selling groceries from its storefront in a historic neighborhood to include an organic farm, coffee shop, and pet supply store. These new-generation cooperatives relied on strong member investment and commitment to counteract weakening farm and industrial sectors and to address growing concerns over product safety and environmental degradation.

Despite the renewed popularity of consumer cooperatives, several stores soon experienced severe financial distress, with several closures during the 1980s and early 1990s, while more centralized, national cooperative businesses, such as REI (for Recreational Equipment, Inc.), the Seattle-based outdoor-equipment retailer, continued to grow and expand their services. In response, national organizations such as the National Cooperative Business Association and the National Cooperative Grocers Association began trying to unite cooperatives across the United States in order to establish more, and more financially secure, consumer cooperatives.

Alongside larger consumer cooperatives, such as REI, are the hundreds of local cooperative market stores, farmers' markets, and wholesale buying clubs, such as Costco and Sam's Club, that persist and grow in number every year. Consumer cooperatives are found throughout the United States and increasingly in the Pacific Northwest, although they are most prevalent in New England and the upper Midwest states.

Joshua Youngblood

See also: Cooperatives, Producer.

Further Reading

Co-op Handbook Collective, The. The Food Co-op Handbook: How to Bypass Supermarkets to Control the Quality and Price of Your Food. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.

Furlough, Ellen, and Carl Strikwerda, "From Cooperative Commonwealth to Cooperative Democracy: The American Cooperative Ideal, 1880–1940." In Consumers Against Capitalism? Consumer Cooperation in Europe, North America, and Japan, 1840–1990, ed. Ellen Furlough and Carl Strikwerda. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999.

Merrett, Christopher D., and Norman Walzer. Cooperative and Local Development: Theory and Applications for the 21st Century. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, 2004.

Rozwenc, Edwin Charles. Cooperatives Come to America: The American Utopian Adventure. Philadelphia: Porcupine, 1975.

Cooperatives, Producer

Producer cooperatives are a means for farmers and manufacturing labor to assert greater control over the distribution and sale value of their goods while ensuring that essential goods and supplies are available and affordable to the producers themselves. Often included in the radical political agendas of labor unions and utopian reform movements, producer cooperatives represent an effort to strike a balance between the interests of the farmers and workers who make consumer goods on one side, and the business interests that most often profit from the sale of those goods on the other. Producer cooperatives have served prominent roles in counterculture movements at different stages in American history, such as the populist uprising of the late nineteenth century. Other producer cooperatives have found acceptance in mainstream society; the most successful ventures have survived and flourished by embracing a more centrist commercial image.

During the 1830s, protective trade unions established cooperatives to resolve work floor disputes and to procure fair prices for the work of craftsmen and artisans. This early movement for labor cooperatives did not survive the turbulent economic trends in the decades before the American Civil War. During the 1860s, however, the Knights of Labor formed a broad-based collection of trade and labor unions, and the organization employed cooperative strategies to help workers; this effort represents one of the most radical attempts to reshape American society by empowering the ranks of labor. More than 500 cooperative workshops and factories were in operation in the three decades after the Civil War, before the collapse of the Knights of Labor in the 1880s. The Knights of Labor was the last large-scale effort to use cooperatives as a method of labor reform in the United States.

In 1867, Oliver H. Kelley, a government employee living in Washington, D.C., started the Grange (now the National Grange), a Masonic-inspired network of local organizations that promoted self-help and coordination among farmers. The organization quickly spread across the Midwest and South, with a total of more than 25,000 local Granges founded during the 1870s. The Grange sponsored cooperative farmer-run stores and established grain elevators, central warehouses, and wholesale centers.

After the economic recessions of the 1870s, including the devastating Panic of 1873, and growing political unrest among farmers, the Farmers' Alliance was founded in Texas in 1877, gaining strong support among economically depressed farmers throughout the South and Midwest. The Farmers' Alliance employed traveling lecturers and organizers who set up cooperatives and suballiances to coordinate seed and equipment and to ensure that farmers had affordable access to basic necessities. Emphasizing the need for farmers to retake the agricultural economy from business interests, the Farmers' Alliance, according to one strain of historical assessment, offered a countercultural critique of national trends. The United States, they believed, was becoming ever more urban, materialistic, and disrespectful of the self-sufficient, republican ideal on which the nation was founded.

Emerging out of protests in the South over the crop-lien system, the Farmers' Alliance was overtly political and more radical than previous farmer organizations. By the 1890s, it had laid the groundwork for a national wave of populism and the significant, if short-lived, political challenge to the two-party system by the People's Party.

With the rise of the farmers' union movement at the turn of the century, led by less radical organizations, such as the American Society of Equity (established in Indiana in 1902), the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union (founded in Texas in the same year), the National Farmer's Union, and the American Farm Bureau, there were more than 14,000 cooperatives operating in the United States by 1920.

In 1922, the Capper-Volstead Act recognized the right of farmers to produce and market their products cooperatively. It reflected a growing acceptance of producer cooperatives as a reasonable form of economic combination (in contrast to business "trusts") that successfully helped sustain farmer livelihoods.

Cooperatives were integral to helping farmers survive the Great Depression of the 1930s, although tenant farmers and sharecroppers in the South were among those hardest hit by falling crop prices and incomplete federal measures to protect landless farmers and unskilled workers. New Deal banking measures, in addition to national cooperative financial and organization institutions, helped ensure that producer cooperatives had access to the resources they needed to continue providing essential services to farmers and agriculture processors.

After World War II, producer cooperatives became more centralized, with most smaller regional cooperatives swallowed by consolidation. During the 1950s and again in the 1970s, agriculture co-ops amalgamated resources for bringing their products to market, including the costs of supply distribution and marketing in addition to the actual growing and processing.

By the 1970s, cooperatives were plagued by problems, as they attempted to evolve strategies to compete against monolithic corporations and vertically integrated firms with networks of subsidiaries, joint ventures, and outsourced labor. Since the late twentieth century, producer cooperatives have explicitly reinfused core principles into their organizations, including the goals of saving family farms and reducing environmental impact in the hope that cooperative ventures can again offer a more socially responsible alternative to unfettered corporate capitalism.

The Frontier Natural Products Cooperative, founded in 1976 and located in Norway, Iowa, is jointly owned by its wholesale customers. It has carved out a unique place among producers catering to the demands of the post-1960s counterculture by offering products as diverse as gourmet cinnamon and a full line of aromatherapy oils. The company promotes the sustainable cultivation of herbs and plants both in its home fields and in environmentally endangered regions around the world, where many of the medicinal herbs originate.

The Organic Valley Family of Farms, founded in Wisconsin in 1988, has formed a nationwide network of dairy and meat producers that have successfully competed in the expanding market for organic foods. It has stayed true to its central purpose of protecting small family farms by facilitating the cooperative marketing of high-quality goods through the most sustainable and equitable means possible.

Producer cooperatives providing specialty products such as beer, herbal tea, and natural cosmetics have achieved success since the mid-1970s by responding to the natural food and alternative lifestyle markets, while traditional producer cooperatives, such as Land O'Lakes, founded as the Minnesota Cooperative Creameries Association in 1921, and Sun-Diamond Growers, continued to utilize cooperative structures and producer ownership to compete in a modern marketplace increasingly dominated by multinational corporations.

Joshua Youngblood

See also: Cooperatives, Consumer.

Further Reading

Furlough, Ellen, and Carl Strikwerda. "From Cooperative Commonwealth to Cooperative Democracy: The American Cooperative Ideal, 1880–1940." In Consumers Against Capitalism? Consumer Cooperation in Europe, North America, and Japan, 1840–1990, ed. Ellen Furlough and Carl Strikwerda. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999.

Leikin, Steven. "The Citizen Producer: The Rise and Fall of Working-Class Cooperatives in the United States." In Consumers Against Capitalism? Consumer Cooperation in Europe, North America, and Japan, 1840–1990, ed. Ellen Furlough and Carl Strikwerda. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999.

Merrett, Christopher D., and Norman Walzer. Cooperative and Local Development: Theory and Applications for the 21st Century. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, 2004.

Montgomery, David. The Fall of the House of Labor: The Workplace, the State, and American Labor Activism, 1865–1925. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

Rozwenc, Edwin Charles. Cooperatives Come to America: The American Utopian Adventure. Philadelphia: Porcupine, 1975.

U.S. Department of Agriculture Rural Business-Cooperative Service. Co-ops 101: An Introduction to Cooperatives. Cooperative Information Report 55. June 1997.

Coyote, Peter (1941–)

Peter Coyote is an American actor, voice-over artist, and arts advocate who began his career in entertainment as a member of a politically radical street theater troupe in San Francisco, became an active member of that city's counterculture from the mid-1960s to the mid-1970s, and established himself as a dependable Hollywood character actor in the 1980s. Since then, he has lent his distinctive voice to documentaries, television commercials, and audiobooks, while writing, maintaining ties with the counterculture, and continuing his long-standing practice of Zen Buddhism.

Robert Peter Cohon was born on October 10, 1941, in Colver, Pennsylvania, to Morris Cohon, a businessman, and the former Ruth Fidler. He attended Grinnell College in Iowa and graduated in 1964 with the intention of becoming a writer. To that end, he entered the creative writing program at San Francisco State University, only to be bitten by the acting bug.

After a brief stint at the San Francisco Actor's Workshop, Cohon joined the San Francisco Mime Troupe, a company founded in 1959 and dedicated to political satire. He was soon cowriting and directing many of the Mime Troupe's productions, including the controversial The Minstrel Show, or Civil Rights in a Cracker Barrel, which toured nationally and earned the cast jail time at some stops along the way.

Back in San Francisco, Cohon was a founding member of the Diggers. This group of self-described "community anarchists" was an underground social service organization that helped provide free food, housing, and medical care for young runaways during the Summer of Love and later established a chain of communes. Cohon remained active in the San Francisco counterculture and was a member of the Black Bear Ranch commune in Northern California until the mid-1970s.

Returning to the cultural mainstream, in 1975 he became a member of the California State Arts Council, where he proved to be a successful budget reformer and ultimately was elected chairman. Unable to resist the lure of acting, Cohon returned to the stage in 1978, and, two years later, he gained notice in the world premiere of Sam Shepard's True West in San Francisco.

Taking the name Peter Coyote (out of sympathy for the shamanistic role of coyotes in Native American beliefs), he embarked on a screen-acting career that has spanned seventy films and numerous television shows. His most famous early role was as Keys, the scientist trying to track down the alien in E.T.: The Extra-Terrestrial (1982). Other films in which he has had roles include Heartbreakers (1984), Jagged Edge (1985), and Erin Brockovich (2000).

Throughout his acting career, Coyote has remained both a writer and a political activist. During the Cuban missile crisis, Coyote and eleven other college students went to Washington, D.C., to support President John F. Kennedy's peace initiative, and the commander in chief invited them into the White House. Coyote also has been a delegate to the Democratic National Convention and has contributed essays to Mother Jones magazine. His autobiography, Sleeping Where I Fall (1998), includes a number of his articles and stories.

Of his spiritual practice, Coyote has said, on a number of occasions, “I’m a student of Zen Buddhism first, an actor second. If I can’t reconcile the two lives, I’ll stop acting.”

D.K. Holm

See also: Film, Independent.

Further Reading

Coyote, Peter. Sleeping Where I Fall. New York: Counterpoint, 1998.

Grogan, Emmett. Ringolevio (A Life Played for Keeps). Boston: Little, Brown, 1972.

Crumb, Robert (1943–)

Robert Crumb is an American cartoonist, musician, and collector of early Americana who is widely regarded as the father of the underground comic book movement that began in the mid-1960s. His work has been widely praised by serious art critics, and his contributions to mainstream American culture include such characters as Fritz the Cat and Mr. Natural, and the catchphrase “Keep on truckin’.”

Crumb was born on August 30, 1943, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, to Charles Crumb, Sr., a Marine and later a management consultant, and the former Beatrice Hall. The family moved frequently because of the senior Crumb’s military career, and Robert Crumb lived in several of America’s major cities before the age of eighteen. He drew comics from an early age, at first under the tutelage of his older brother Charles, Jr. (he committed suicide in 1994). The brothers began producing comic books together, which they would sell door-to-door and later at school. Many of the characters Crumb created at this time, he later revisited as an adult cartoonist.

After high school, Crumb went to work for American Greetings in Cleveland, writing and illustrating gift cards. Dissatisfied with corporate life, contemptuous of modern American culture, and eager to pursue his own creative instincts—admittedly enhanced by the use of LSD—he abruptly moved to San Francisco in 1967. Living on the fringes of the hippie community, Crumb began to publish his own comic book series, beginning with Zap Comix in 1968, which he sold on the street and through “head shops” (which sold drug paraphernalia) and comic book stores.

Drawn in black and white with color covers, Crumb’s underground comics announced an instantly recognizable style (a thick line, extensive use of crosshatched shading, outrageous subject matter, and confessional stories) that has remained consistent throughout his career. Conventional comic books of the time featured animal characters, superheroes, and war heroes, among other types, and they were published by corporations that showed little regard for their artists. Crumb showed that the genre was flexible and could be used for almost any subject matter, from sexual fantasy to autobiographical tales of his political and romantic life. His instincts were correct: Crumb’s comic books proved especially popular among counterculture readers, and he became an iconic figure to hippies, college radicals, and aspiring artists.

After his most prolific period, from the late 1960s to the early 1970s, Crumb moved to rural California, where he continued to draw and publish comics but at a quieter rate. A divorce, tax problems, and the loss of legal rights to his popular Keep on Truckin’ cartoon were major distractions, as was his cessation of drug use. By the 1980s, his creative outlet was the magazine Weirdo, which he founded and edited for its first several issues. Sometime after 1988, he moved to France.

After several years outside of the mainstream, Crumb was suddenly prominent again thanks to the documentary film Crumb, by Terry Zwigoff, a friend of Crumb's. Released in 1994, the film chronicles Crumb's unusual family history, his obsession with playing and collecting 78-rpm records of early African American jazz and blues, and his move out of the United States. At the same time, Crumb's work began to appear in such mainstream publications as The New Yorker, for which he did several cover illustrations. In 1987, the Seattle-based comic book publisher Fantagraphics began issuing a multivolume collection of Crumb's work in chronological order, along with reprints of his sketchbooks.

More recently, Crumb has taken to painting and sculpture, and art galleries around the world show both his comic book work and his newer art. He continues to live in rural France with his second wife and his daughter, where he produced a comic book version of the book of Genesis, published in 2009.

D.K. Holm

See also: Comics, Underground.

Further Reading

Crumb, Robert. The Complete Crumb Comics. 17 vols. Seattle, WA: Fantagraphics, 1987–2005.

Estren, Mark James. A History of Underground Comics. 1974. Berkeley, CA: Ronin, 1993.

Holm, D.K., ed. R. Crumb: Conversations. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2004.

Holm, D.K., ed. Robert Crumb. Rev. ed. London: Pocket Essentials, 2005.

Rosenkranz, Patrick. Rebel Visions: The Underground Comix Revolution 1963–1975. Seattle, WA: Fantagraphics, 2002.

Cults

The word cult, from the Latin cultus (to care for), traditionally refers to the system of beliefs, rituals, and observable practices of any community of religious believers. With the surge in what many religious scholars call “New Religious Movements,” or NRMs, in the 1960s and 1970s, the term cult began to take on a more ominous meaning.

Counterculture and the Redefinition of Cult

Pejorative use of the term dates at least to the publication of a book titled Chaos of the Cults (1934) by Jan Karel

Van Baalen, an evangelical Christian who made an association between new and alternative religious beliefs and social decline in America. His ideas remained relatively obscure until 1965, when Christian theologian Walter Martin published The Kingdom of the Cults. Inspired by Baalen's connection between cults and social decline, it became a national best seller.

The growing disdain for NRMs on the part of conservative Christians and others corresponded with the growing diversity of spiritual belief and experience in the United States during the 1960s. The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 had opened the door to religious and cultural traditions that were new to mainstream American society and intriguing to many, especially with the rise of the youth counterculture. Meanwhile, the ever-increasing mobility of the American people was weakening more traditional, locally based religious communities. As a result, many young Americans began exploring a new diversity of religious beliefs and practices.

From the asceticism of Eastern Buddhists to the hedonism of free love and psychedelic drug use, spiritual experimentation took place alongside the political and social manifestations of the counterculture. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, however, a series of high-profile media events involving NRMs forced the new spiritual diversity—and the term cult—into the public spotlight. Journalists began to use cult to refer to the New Religious Movements many in mainstream America found threatening.

In August 1969, Charles Manson and fellow members of a group called the Manson Family were arrested for the murders of actress Sharon Tate and six others outside Los Angeles. A minor musician and participant in the L.A. counterculture scene, Manson had controlled his so-called family, made up mostly of young women, by means of drugs, fear, and cult teachings about God and the devil—to the point that they committed the murders at his direction, without his direct participation. The group's communal lifestyle, drug use, and heinous ritual crime quickly forged an association in the minds of many Americans between the counterculture and the dangers of cults.

One of the first NRMs to face public scrutiny in the new environment was the Unification Church, or the "Moonies," founded by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon in South Korea in 1954. Seeking to promote international Christian ecumenism, Moon exported his growing movement to other nations in Asia during the 1960s and to the United States in 1971. With nationwide speaking tours, he managed to launch himself into the spotlight. The church soon began facing accusations of brainwashing adherents, leading to publicity for rescue attempts on the part of cult-fearing family members. Moon's conviction on tax-evasion charges in 1982 contributed to the tarnishing of the group's reputation. However, the National Council of Churches, among others, viewed the prosecution as harassment.

The Unification Church of the Reverend Sun Myung Moon was among the most popular of the “New Religious Movements” of the 1960s and 1970s that came under scrutiny for purported kidnapping, brainwashing, and other “cult” practices. (Stephen Jaffe/AFP/Getty Images)

Although the Moonies were known for their conservative politics, most so-called cults were strongly associated with the counterculture left. The World Plan Executive Council, the institution associated with the transcendental meditation (TM) movement, gained a wide following among the hippies of the 1970s. Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, who brought the movement to America, was a controversial Hindu spiritual figure catapulted to fame when the Beatles rock group joined him as followers in 1967. As other left-wing celebrities of the time experimented with TM, its popularity was reflected in the founding of some 3,600 “World Plan Centers.” Regarded by some mainstream Americans as a cult that risked psychological damage to practitioners, TM remained in and out of the media spotlight through the 1980s.

Also associated with George Harrison of the Beatles, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), or the Hare Krishna movement, gained a significant following in the 1960s. Its followers live a close-knit monastic life and practice a kind of ecstatic worship. Partially based on the teachings of a sixteenth-century Bengali spiritual figure, ISKCON was founded in New York City in 1966 by A.C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada, who had immigrated to the city in 1965 and became a guru to local hippies. Under the direction of its charismatic founder, the Hare Krishna movement expanded rapidly and continued doing so even after his death in 1977. Today, the organization claims a wide following in more than fifty countries.

Among the most enduring and high-profile NRMs often referred to as a cult, the Church of Scientology has been one of the most controversial and beleaguered religious organizations in the United States. Founded in the early 1950s by popular writer L. Ron Hubbard in Los Angeles, the movement began as a philosophical self-help system called Dianetics. The system is based on Hubbard’s book Dianetics (1950), in which he outlines a method for resolving emotional distress and improving the quality of life. A religious dimension was added with the publication of his Science of Survival: Simplified, Faster Dianetic Techniques in 1951, and the Church of Scientology was formally established in 1954. Membership grew steadily throughout the 1970s and 1980s, and neither controversies surrounding the movement—including run-ins with the Internal Revenue Service and the Federal Bureau of Investigation—nor Hubbard’s death in 1986 has diminished the popularity of this NRM.

The Anti-Cult Movement

Perhaps the single most significant event cementing the religious counterculture and cult violence in the minds of many Americans was the murder and mass suicide of members of Jim Jones's Peoples Temple. On November 18, 1978, in the South American country of Guyana, the charismatic leader of the California-based group orchestrated the deaths of over 900 people.

Beginning in the early 1950s, Jones emerged as a self-taught preacher who mixed communist ideals with a Pentecostal framework focused on faith healing. As a small church in Indianapolis, the Peoples Temple pursued goals of social justice and founded a social service center for the homeless. Preaching a gospel of social and racial integration, the group began gaining media attention in 1964 and moved to California the following year.

Linking his prophetic brand of religiosity to politics, Jones insisted that his followers give up their normal lives to opt out of the capitalist system, which was seen as the source of social injustice. Amid growing rumors of his control of members and a cult-like aspect to the group, Jones founded a communal "utopia" in Guyana and ordered the mass migration of his followers in 1977. Conflict, especially regarding the treatment of children, began to increase soon after the resettlement.

Former members, concerned family members of adherents, and other Temple opponents joined to form the group "Concerned Relatives" in an effort to retrieve children that were born in Jonestown. After writing an open letter to the U.S. Congress asking for help, they held public demonstrations.

When a former member returned from Jonestown and suggested that the group might be preparing for mass suicide, Congressman Leo Ryan (D-CA) took up the cause. Framing it as an anti-cult expedition, Ryan flew to Jonestown with four members of Concerned Relatives and a cadre of reporters. At Jonestown, Jones organized a grand media event to demonstrate the success of his commune. During the visit, however, two members secretly handed a note to one of the reporters that read, "Help us get out of Jonestown." The next day, U.S. embassy officials began to organize the exit of the two signers of the note. Soon, other followers expressed a desire to leave.

Ryan, the four Concerned Relatives, and sixteen Peoples Temple members left Jonestown for the local airstrip in a small truck. As the group began boarding planes, members of the Temple emerged with guns and started shooting. Ryan, three reporters, and a defector were shot dead. Meanwhile, back at Jonestown, Jones exhorted his followers to drink cyanide-laced punch. Only four members of the commune escaped alive.

Publicity surrounding the event gave rise to the anti-cult movement as a powerful force on the American scene. Frightened parents whose young adult children had become involved in alternative living groups of many stripes sought ways to rescue their loved ones from perceived danger. Often aided by conservative Christian organizations and thinkers, support groups were established to fight anything resembling a cult. Individuals such as Rick Ross of the Cult Awareness Network (CAN) maintained that charismatic leaders brainwashed impressionable college-aged youths, who needed to be forcibly removed from the cult environment and deprogrammed.

Growing from grassroots meetings, national organizations—such as the American Family Foundation, Christian Research Institute, Watchmen Fellowship, and Spiritual Counterfeit Project—emerged to combat cults into the late 1990s. At first, they were highly successful at bankrupting NRM institutions by winning civil suits. Slowly, however, the legal tide began to turn against them. When Rick Ross abducted and attempted to deprogram a member of United Pentecostal International, a civil suit ensued. Ross and CAN were found to have conspired to thwart the individual's right to religious freedom. The damages awarded by the court bankrupted CAN.

In an ironic turnabout, the Church of Scientology—a longtime target of CAN's attacks—purchased the bankrupt organization. The name and resources of CAN were used to create the Foundation for Religious Freedom, with a newsletter and board of directors composed of individuals with different religious beliefs.

Despite the transformation of CAN, several extreme cases have kept the negative connotations of the term cult active. In 1993, for example, a break-off sect of the Seventh-Day Adventists known as the Branch Davidians became trapped in a gun battle with federal agents at their compound in Waco, Texas. The incident resulted in the deaths of more than eighty people. And in March 1997, thirty-nine members of a New Age NRM called Heaven's Gate committed ritual suicide in a wealthy suburb of San Diego, California, under the belief that their souls would be transported by an alien spacecraft following the Comet Hale-Bopp.

At any given time, according to scholars, thousands of NRMs are operating across the United States. UFO groups such as the Unarians in El Cajon, California, are known for their outlandish events and festivals. The Raelians advocate religious freedom and more open attitudes toward sexuality. The Yearning for Zion (or YFZ) Ranch, a polygamous sect owned by the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, was raided by Texas law enforcement officials in April 2008 after authorities removed more than 400 children on suspicion of forced marriages, incest, and abuse. The media began referring to the YFZ Ranch as a polygamous cult, even as state authorities faced criticism for their handling of the situation.

Some NRMs, like the Hare Krishnas, Scientologists, and others, can be understood as peaceful advocates for views on religion and spirituality that are merely outside the mainstream. Many commentators warn that the mindless labeling of an NRM as a cult represents an unfair deprivation of religious freedom and a violation of American principles. On the other hand, observers cite abundant examples of cult-like groups that commit serious breaches of the law and pose a physical or psychological threat to individuals.

Robert Glenn Howard

See also: Branch Davidians: Hare Krishna: Manson Family: Moonies: Peoples Temple: UFOs.

Further Reading

Bromley, David G., and Jeffrey K. Hadden. The Handbook of Cults and Sects in America. Greenwich, CT: JAI, 1993.

Chryssides, George D. A Reader in New Religious Movements. Ed. George D. Chryssides and Margaret Z. Wilkins. New York: Continuum, 2006.

Cowan, Douglas E. Cults and New Religions: A Brief History. Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2008.

Dawson, Lorne L. Comprehending Cults: The Sociology of New Religious Movements. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Lalich, Janja. Bounded Choice: True Believers and Charismatic Cults. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.

Lewis, James R. Odd Gods: New Religions and the Cult Controversy. New York: Prometheus, 2001.

Martin, Walter R. The Kingdom of the Cults. Minneapolis, MN: Bethany House, 1965.

Stark, Rodney, and William Sims Bainbridge. The Future of Religion: Secularization, Revival, and Cult Formation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.

Tabor, James, and Eugene V. Gallagher. Why Waco? Cults and the Battle for Religious Freedom in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Cummings, E.E. (1894–1962)

Best known as a poet, E.E. Cummings devoted his life to the creative arts as a painter and an author of poems, plays, novels, and a ballet. He published more than 900 poems and twenty-three poetry volumes. Throughout his career, he remained at the forefront of modernism, a countercultural artistic movement that arose in Western Europe during the late nineteenth century.

Edward Estlin (E.E.) Cummings was born on October 14, 1894, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, to Harvard University sociology professor Edward Cummings and his wife, Rebecca. He attended Cambridge Latin high school, where he published in the school paper, the Cambridge Review. Cummings received his bachelor's (1915) and master's (1916) degrees at Harvard, where his poetry appeared in Harvard Monthly and where he became interested in the avant-garde works of authors such as Ezra Pound and Gertrude Stein.

After the 1917 publication of Eight Harvard Poets, coauthored with John Dos Passos and other schoolmates, Cummings's first major appearance as a poet was in the first issue of the resurrected publication The Dial in 1920. His first book of poetry, Tulips and Chimneys, was published in 1923.

Like many other writers and artists of the modern period, Cummings was acutely aware of the relationships between various forms of artistic expression. The innovations of the cubists and futurists influenced his own paintings, in which he employed abstractions to evoke emotion. This fragmented style carried over into his poems. Cummings experimented with new forms and ideas. He played with punctuation, spacing, and typography, believing that the formation of the poems on the page is often essential to understanding the meaning. The themes of his poems range from nature and love, sometimes with sexual references, to the invisible spirit world and to war and politics.

In form, style, and subject matter, many of Cummings's poems shook up the puritanical sensibilities of 1920s America and shocked critics. Some of his poems evoke childlike wonder, while others are sharply satirical. He often used verse as a platform for his leftist political leanings and criticisms of modern consumer society. "My country, 'tis of you," he wrote, "land of Cluett/Shirt Boston Garter and Spearmint Girl... Land above all of Just Add Hot Water And Serve."

During World War I, Cummings volunteered for the ambulance corps in France and fell under the suspicion of authorities for letters home that criticized the conduct of the war. He spent four months in an internment camp in Normandy on suspicion of treason, which he later documented in the fact-based novel The Enormous Room (1922). A staunch pacifist, Cummings also opposed armed conflict throughout World War II, despite the overwhelming nationalism and patriotism of the United States and its allies.

Cummings's personal life was outside the norm. He had a daughter, Nancy, in 1919 with Elaine Orr Thayer, the wife of his friend Scofield Thayer. The three agreed that Thayer would be named the baby's legal father, although Elaine divorced Thayer and married Cummings in 1924. That marriage lasted only a few months, and Cummings failed to win custody of the child, who did not learn that Cummings was her biological father until 1948. From 1929 to 1932, Cummings was married to Anne Barton. After his divorce from Barton, Cummings had a relationship with model, actress, and photographer Marion Morehouse; they referred to each other as husband and wife, but there is no official record of their marriage.

Cummings focused his later years on traveling and giving speaking performances. He died on September 3, 1962, at his New Hampshire farm.

Caren Prommersberger

See also: Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Further Reading

Kennedy, Richard S., ed. Selected Poems: E.E. Cummings. New York: Liveright, 1994.

Marks, Barry A. E.E. Cummings. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Sawyer-Laucanno, Christopher. E.E. Cummings: A Biography. Naperville, IL: Sourcebooks, 2004.

Cushman, Charlotte (1816–1876)

Charlotte Cushman was a famous nineteenth-century actress celebrated for being one of the first native-born stars on the American stage. She was also an avid patron of the arts and an early feminist. During a time when women were being forced to do work beneath their capabilities, Cushman was known and respected for contributing both emotional and financial support to many of her fellow female performers and for motivating them toward more autonomous lifestyles. Physically, professionally, and personally, Cushman served as an example of unconventionality and helped to inaugurate a strong and creative feminine force against the patriarchal social standards that encompassed American culture throughout the 1800s.

Cushman was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on July 23, 1816, the eldest of three children. She was reared by her mother and grandmother, who raised their families almost completely without paternal influence. Cushman's first public appearance was on March 25, 1830, in a singing recital at the age of fourteen. This choral debut led to her discovery by Robert Sheppard, who would later become her patron.

Unsuccessful at fulfilling her mother's operatic dreams for her, Cushman tried acting and made her stage debut in 1836 in New Orleans. After a successful season and much critical acclaim, she returned to New York City under contract with the Bowery Theater. While launching her acting talent, Cushman also worked to showcase her creative writing skills by submitting poetry and short stories to local women's journals, including Godey's Lady's Book and The Ladies Companion.

Unlike most actresses of her time, Cushman was not perceived as a conventional beauty. Standing 5 feet, 9 inches (1.75 meters) tall, she was much larger than most women of her time and was considered to have "masculine" features. These physical distinctions gave her stage performances a more androgynous quality, and enabled her take on many more quality roles, both male and female.

Cushman soon became recognized both in America and abroad as one of the greatest actresses of her time. She was especially respected by critics for her ability to capture a kind of "masculine energy" in her performances. Cushman is best known for her roles as Meg Merriles, the mysterious gypsy queen in Sir Walter Scott's Guy Mannerling, Queen Katherine, and Lady Macbeth.

Offstage, Cushman was romantically affiliated with other women. This was not perceived as obscene or scandalous because, at the time, women were believed to be incapable of same-sex eroticism and desire. The actress's close friendships with other women were not questioned. The term lesbian had not yet been established, but Cushman's letters imply that such passions were part of her female companionships.

Cushman's quest to overcome patriarchal dominance did not end with her personal relationships. In 1852, she traveled to Rome with partner Matilda Hays and other self-motivated women in hopes of creating a more unified and respected community of female artists. Stressing that emancipation from men was an integral step toward becoming a successful and autonomous woman, Cushman inspired many of her peers to see beyond the masculine confines of their trades and personal lives.

For most of her life, Cushman resided in London, England. In 1869, she was diagnosed with breast cancer. Preparing to make the most of her last years, she set forth on a series of farewell performances across the globe in 1874. She succumbed to pneumonia in Boston and died on February 17, 1876.

Siobhan Kane

See also: Lesbian Culture.

Further Reading

Leach, Joseph. Bright Particular Star: The Life and Times of Charlotte Cushman. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1970.

Merrill, Lisa. When Romeo Was a Woman: Charlotte Cushman and Her Circle of Female Spectators. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1999.

Stebbins, Emma, ed. Charlotte Cushman: Her Letters and Memories of Her Life. 1878. New York: Blom, 1972.

Cyberpunk

Alternatively referred to as radical hard science fiction, the Eighties Wave, and neuromanticism, the literary movement known as cyberpunk is a subgenre of science fiction that commonly features near-future extrapolations of the Internet, artificial (and frequently malevolent) intelligence, cybernetic/bionic/pharmacological body enhancements, and direct brain-to-computer interfaces. Often dealing with themes of alienation and rebellion against oppressive societal authority structures, cyberpunk stories generally are set against a dystopian backdrop, perhaps best represented visually by Ridley Scott's 1982 film Blade Runner, juxtaposing backward-looking elements of hard-boiled film noir chiaroscuro onto the cautionary anxieties produced by the relentless forward march of technology and industry.

A fusion of the flesh-and-hardware technology known as cybernetics and the antiestablishment sensibility of 1970s punk rock music and fashion, cyberpunk derived its name from the title of the Bruce Bethke short story "Cyberpunk" (Amazing Stories, November 1983), and the term was widely popularized by Asimov's Science Fiction magazine editor Gardner Dozois. Cyberpunk came into full flower as a literary subgenre by the late 1980s, gaining prominence largely via the writings of Pat Cadigan, William Gibson, Rudy Rucker, Lewis Shiner, John Shirley, Neal Stephenson, and Bruce Sterling.

Cyberpunk protagonists tend to be young, streetwise, and bright, as well as alienated from an establishment that tends to regard them as undesirable. According to science-fiction writer Lawrence Person, "Classic cyberpunk characters were marginalized, alienated loners who lived on the edge of society in generally dystopic futures where daily life was impacted by rapid technological change, an ubiquitous datasphere of computerized information, and invasive modification of the human body."

Such protagonists, many of them antiheroes, are the product of a nihilistic socioeconomic milieu, in which democracy is functionally irrelevant, with multinational corporations having grown into vast, implacable forces that wield virtually all of society's power. However, such entities are far from invulnerable to sabotage at the hands of a clever “hacker,” such as the cheekily named Hiro Protagonist in Stephenson’s influential 1992 novel, Snow Crash.

Sometimes, the postdemocratic industrial forces that oppose and oppress the cyberpunk protagonist control humanity’s perceptions of reality itself, as in the Matrix films of Andy and Larry Wachowski (The Matrix, 1999; The Matrix Reloaded, 2003; and The Matrix Revolutions, 2003), in which heroes and villains alike live as digital constructs inside painstakingly detailed, yet sometimes nightmarishly unreal, electronic simulations controlled by the establishment. Such ideas owe much to earlier writers such as William S. Burroughs and Philip K. Dick, both of whose works were replete with a paranoid “all is not as it appears to be” subtext.

So-called virtual reality—“cyberspace” presented as a vividly real place, as in the Matrix trilogy and earlier films such as Steven Lisberger’s Tron (1982)—became a mainstay of prose cyberpunk thanks to Gibson’s seminal 1984 novel Neuromancer and its sequels, Count Zero (1986) and Mona Lisa Overdrive (1988). Although the term virtual reality first appeared in The Judas Mandala (1982) by Damien Broderick, it was Gibson’s work that provided the clearest glimpse of a near-future scenario, in which the world’s computer networks function in aggregate to create a digital netherworld that humans can enter via direct cybernetic linkage to the brain.

Rising in parallel with the computer revolution that made billionaires of Bill Gates and Steve Jobs, rival founders of Apple and Microsoft, cyberpunk by the mid-1980s had hit the broader world of literary science fiction with the force of a political or social movement, complete with earnest manifestos, such as Sterling’s preface to the groundbreaking 1986 cyberpunk anthology Mirrorshades. Sterling spoke of cyberpunk in almost messianic terms, painting it as the savior of an otherwise moribund science-fiction genre.

Veteran science-fiction writer Norman Spinrad has defined cyberpunk somewhat rhapsodically as “a fusion of the romantic impulse with science and technology.” Writer and critic Thomas Disch identified cyberpunk’s “acquiescence in the moral sharkpool politics of the ’80s, its acceptance of urban squalor, global pillage, and systemic corruption as the facts of life” as among its most defining literary characteristics. “In the cyberpunk future,” said Disch, “Third World poverty belongs to everyone, and the American dream has gone belly up. This vision—call it Pop Despair—is ameliorated only by two elements: fashion and an interior life lived in cyberspace. The best hope it offers is that one may be in possession of one’s own sensorium, and that it is a literature designed to reconcile the youth of middle-class America to their lot.”

With globalization progressing apace near the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, a time when terabyte personal computers are routinely available, cyberpunk and its economic environment no longer seem quite as futuristic as they did when the subgenre debuted a quarter-century earlier. But regardless of where one stands on cyberpunk’s current propinquity to the cutting edge of science fiction (or fiction in general), its influence on ordinary life in the so-called real world is undeniable and profound. Cyberpunk arguably has shaped, or at least predicted, the emergence of its own near-future world to a far greater degree than have most other branches of science fiction.

A case in point is the word cyberspace. This 1980s neologism took less than two decades to filter from the pages of cyberpunk fiction to the consciousness of ordinary Americans, who now commonly understand that the term describes the ubiquitous electronic Erehwon, in which their paychecks clear and their automated-teller transactions take place. Just as the Apollo space missions failed to put an end to futuristic tales of interplanetary travel, the ever-increasing reach of information technology cannot render the struggles of cyberpunk’s antiheroes irrelevant.

Michael A. Martin

See also: Burroughs, William S.: Science Fiction.

Further Reading

Ash, Brian, ed. The Visual Encyclopedia of Science Fiction. London: Trewin Copplestone, 1977.

Clute, John. Science Fiction: The Illustrated Encyclopedia. New York: Dorling Kindersley, 1995.

Clute, John, and Peter Nicholls, eds. The Encyclopedia of Science Fiction. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Gunn, James. Alternate Worlds: The Illustrated History of Science Fiction. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1975.

Gunn, James, ed. Inside Science Fiction: Essays on Fantastic Literature. I.O. Evans Studies in the Philosophy and Criticism of Literature, No. 11. San Bernardino, CA: Borgo, 1992.

Gunn, James. The New Encyclopedia of Science Fiction. New York: Viking Penguin, 1988.

Sterling, Bruce, ed. Mirrorshades: The Cyberpunk Anthology. Westminster, MD: Arbor House, 1986.

Daughters of Bilitis

The Daughters of Bilitis was formed in San Francisco on October 19, 1955, by Dorothy "Del" Corn and Phyllis Lyon to provide lesbians with an alternative meeting place to local bars, which were increasingly under scrutiny by the San Francisco Police Department and the state's newly formed Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control. The group took its name from a long nineteenth-century poem by Pierre Louÿs titled Songs of Bilitis, in which the title character seduces the famed poet Sappho of the island of Lesbos. Although the organization was clearly influenced by the Mattachine Society, established in Los Angeles the previous year on behalf of homosexual males, the Daughters of Bilitis focused on lesbianism more as an outgrowth of gender identification rather than a sexual orientation. Viewed in the context of the social conservatism of post-World War II America, the Daughters of Bilitis not only fought for homosexual awareness, but also anticipated many elements of the feminist struggle to attain sociocultural and political recognition.

Like many civil rights and activist organizations, the Daughters of Bilitis was formed as a response to societal and scientific trends of the postwar period. In 1953, President Dwight D. Eisenhower had issued Executive Order 10450, which excluded homosexuals from service in the federal government. This measure served as a watershed event for the homophile movement, as it placed gays and lesbians in the same category (anti-American) as communists. Amidst the Red Scare of the McCarthy era, homosexuals were vilified and portrayed as deviants who threatened the very fabric of American society.

While President Eisenhower's actions brought greater scrutiny of homosexual behavior, they also provided an object of derision against which the growing homophile movement could unite. Also in 1953, Alfred C. Kinsey published his landmark study, Sexual Behavior in the Human Female, which, like its predecessor on males five years earlier, challenged Victorian notions of sexuality that persisted in twentieth-century America and reported the prevalence of homosexuality. It was within this context that the Daughters of Bilitis was formed.

Differences of opinion regarding the group's purpose divided its members and threatened to dismantle the organization from the outset. One major point of contention was whether or not the group should be more of a social organization promoting lesbian activities, or one that specifically addressed legal issues.

Despite this internal strife, the organization began publishing a newsletter, The Ladder, in October 1956. The Ladder originated as a small, mimeographed pamphlet that promoted the organization's policy of integrating lesbians into American society. As it became more popular, The Ladder included articles intent on increasing awareness of legal recourse for the homophile community, reviews of literature, and scientific articles regarding human sexuality and gender identification. One of the most important contributions of The Ladder was its creation of a new lexicon, including such terms as lesbian and homophile, which solidified a standard discourse for all lesbian organizations.

In the 1960s, the Daughters of Bilitis became more politically active, aligning itself with the American Civil Liberties Union and organizing demonstrations against sexual discrimination on both the East and West coasts. The national organization closed down in 1970, though several local chapters continued operating for several more years, and The Ladder continued publication until 1972.

Kenneth Shonk, Jr.

See also: Gay Liberation Movement: Lesbian Culture: Mattachine Society.

Further Reading

Esterberg, Kristin G. "From Accommodation to Liberation: A Social Movement Analysis of Lesbians in the Homophile Movement." Gender and Society 8:3(September 1994): 424–43.

Gallo, Marcia M. Different Daughters: A History of the Daughters of Bilitis and the Rise of the Lesbian Rights Movement. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2006.

Davis, Andrew Jackson (1826–1910)

A metaphysical healer who rose to preeminence in the burgeoning spiritualist movement of the nineteenth century, Andrew Jackson Davis established a lasting name for himself with his crusade to link spiritualism and the struggle for social reform.

Davis was born on August 11, 1826, in Blooming Grove, New York, a small town in Orange County north of New York City. His father was a struggling farmer and shoemaker who moved the family regularly in his search of work. They settled for a time in Poughkeepsie, New York, where, in 1841, Davis was apprenticed to a shoemaker. His demonstration of healing powers surfaced early in life and set him on a course that propelled him into leadership roles in the spiritualist movement. His ability to clairvoyantly diagnose illnesses, prescribe treatment, and render prophetic sayings earned him the nickname "Poughkeepsie Seer."

Denied a formal education by poverty and family instability, Davis was assisted by more literate followers in publishing a series of psychic discourses in 1847 titled The Principles of Nature, Her Divine Revelations, and a Voice to Mankind. It was the first of his more than thirty books on the subject of spiritualism. From 1847 to 1849, he published a newspaper called the Univercoelum that heralded the coming of a more harmonious age. Davis's unique contribution to the spiritualist movement was his insistence that the tenets of spiritualism and social reform were irrevocably linked. The reform spirit manifest in antebellum America—on behalf of peace, antislavery, health, women's rights, and other goals designed to uplift and transform society—was essential in Davis's understanding of spiritualism.

After a short stay among the small colony of spiritualists in Hartford, Connecticut, in 1857, Davis became a prominent lecturer at Dodworth's Academy, a center for Eastern spiritualism in New York City. His time in New York proved highly productive. In addition to publishing the Herald of Progress (1860–1864), he undertook two initiatives in 1863 that reinforced the bond between social reform and spiritualism. The first was the Children's Progressive Lyceum, an organization dedicated to developing reasoning abilities and healthy bodies in children and adults. A spiritualist response to the Christian Sunday school, the lyceum concept took root in seventeen states by 1871. The second enterprise was the Moral Police Fraternity, a body set up to provide social services to those in need. While unsuccessful in fulfilling its mission, the fraternity inspired a number of municipal agencies to address related social issues.

Davis had helped found the National Association of Spiritualists in the 1860s, but, in the 1870s, he broke with that organization due to ideological differences. A rift had opened between “phenomenal” spiritualists, those committed to the manifestation work of mediums and séances, and “philosophic” spiritualists, practitioners such as Davis who were committed to broad reform. Dismayed by the spurious claims made by the many charlatans who had permeated the spiritualist movement, Davis created the First Harmonial Association of New York in 1878. Meeting at Steck’s Music Hall at 11 East Fourteenth Street, the new organization stressed the uplifting of humankind through science and the arts and rejected the frenzy over manifestations exploited by phenomenal spiritualists.

Thereafter, Davis increasingly distanced himself from mainstream spiritualism. In 1883, he obtained a doctorate from the United States Medical College, an unorthodox and eclectic school of medicine whose charter was later revoked by the state of New York.

The Poughkeepsie Seer relocated to Boston to practice medicine and continued to diagnose illnesses through clairvoyance. Davis died on January 13, 1910.

A.J. Scopino, Jr.

See also: Spiritualism.

Further Reading

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Pocket Books, 1972.

Carroll, Bret E. Spiritualism in Antebellum America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Delp, Robert W. “Andrew Jackson Davis: Prophet of American Spiritualism.” Journal of American History 54 (June 1967): 43–56.

Davis, Angela (1944–)

Angela Davis is a political activist, writer, and scholar who in the early 1970s became an international symbol for the persecution of African Americans by the U.S. legal system. A radical black activist, she was arrested for murder, kidnapping, and conspiracy in connection with a prisoner escape at a Marin County, California, courthouse in August 1970. Held without bail, she became the object of a nationwide “Free Angela” campaign until being acquitted on all counts.

Professor, radical black activist, and American Communist Party member Angela Davis addresses the Soviet International Women's Seminar in Moscow in 1972. The seminar marked the fiftieth anniversary of the formation of the Soviet Union. (Express/Stringer/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Davis was born on January 26, 1944, in Birmingham, Alabama, to two schoolteachers, B. Frank and Sallye E. Davis. Racial injustice permeated Davis's childhood in the Deep South. She attended segregated schools, where any and all attempts to challenge racial inequality were met with explicit resistance. Homes in Davis's neighborhood frequently were bombed by white supremacists, and she developed a deep antipathy toward the white power structure from an early age.

Davis left Alabama as a teenager to attend a private high school in Greenwich Village, New York, on scholarship. She graduated in 1961 and received a scholarship to Brandeis University. During a year abroad at the Sorbonne in Paris, Davis met students from African nations whose stories of oppression under colonial rule led her to understand the international scale of discrimination against peoples of color. She set about finding a philosophy that could explain and challenge such a biased system.

Under the tutelage of Herbert Marcuse, the German American philosopher popular with the burgeoning youth culture and then teaching at Brandeis, Davis began her study of Marxist philosophy, which she continued in graduate work at the University of Frankfurt in Germany, and then at the University of California, San Diego, where she was awarded her master's degree in philosophy under Marcuse in 1968.

At about this time, Davis became involved with a number of activist organizations, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Black Panthers, and the all-black Marxist collective the Che-Lumumba Club. She also formally joined the Communist Party USA, which led to her dismissal in 1969 from her job as assistant professor of philosophy at the University of California, Los Angeles. Faculty support led to her reinstatement by court order, but her teaching contract was not renewed.

With the Black Panthers, Davis agitated on behalf of the Soledad Brothers, a group of inmates in California's Soledad Prison who were serving time for the murder of a guard. Davis purchased several firearms that she stored in the headquarters of the Che-Lumumba Club. On August 7, 1970, a teenage sibling of one of the Soledad prisoners used these weapons to take hostages during trial proceedings at the Marin County Courthouse. The standoff ended in the shooting death of Judge Harold Haley and the paralysis of prosecutor Gary Thomas.

Davis was put on the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Most Wanted list. She went into hiding but was found two months later. During the course of her imprisonment and trial, T-shirts and pins bearing the slogan "Free Angela" and images of the young woman with a defiant gaze and a large Afro became iconic of the unfair treatment of African Americans by the U.S. legal system.

Acquitted of all charges, Davis went on to a career as a scholar and activist, working tirelessly on behalf of minorities, women, and prison inmates. Although President Ronald Reagan once vowed that Davis would never again teach in the University of California system, she retired as a tenured professor at the University of California, Santa Cruz, in 2008, after seventeen years in the History of Consciousness Department.

Susanne E. Hall

See also: Black Panthers: Communism.

Further Reading

Collins, Patricia Hill. Black Feminist Thought. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Davis, Angela Y. Angela Davis: An Autobiography. New York: Random House, 1974.

Davis, Miles (1926–1991)

Miles Davis was an innovative trumpet player, composer, and bandleader who invented or popularized a wide variety of jazz styles from the 1950s to the 1990s. Among them were bebop, cool jazz, modal, and jazz-rock fusion. Known for his clear tone and melodic style, Davis is considered one of the great jazz soloists of the twentieth century, and he is credited with pioneering the use of the metal Harmon mute.

Born in East St. Louis, Missouri, on May 25, 1926, Miles Dewey Davis III was the son of a relatively affluent African American dentist and a pianist. At the age of thirteen, Davis began playing the trumpet, and by age fifteen he was playing in public.

After graduating from high school, Davis received a scholarship to study music at the famed Juilliard School of Music in New York City. He neglected his studies, however, and began playing in clubs and meeting such bebop luminaries as Charlie Parker, Thelonious Monk, and Coleman Hawkins.

Abandoning bebop's rhythmic and harmonic complexity, Davis formed a nonet (nine-piece) ensemble and began exploring long, legato melodic lines coupled with modal harmonies. Recordings by this group eventually were released as The Birth of Cool (1957), featuring subtle, complex arrangements and improvisation. The nonet created even more tonal colors with the addition of the French horn and tuba. Although the nonet was not commercially successful, its sound defined "cool jazz," which became one of the dominant trends in jazz over the next decade and was especially embraced by practitioners of the antimaterialist beatnik counterculture. Many of the Beats feverishly championed African American literature, art, and music, especially the cool jazz style of Davis—the epitome of all things hip and cool.

By 1950, Davis had developed a heroin addiction, and in 1954 he retreated to St. Louis and his supportive father to conquer the habit. He returned to New York five years later and formed the Miles Davis Quintet. The group recorded Davis's masterpiece, Kind of Blue, that same year. The twenty-two tracks on the album, all written by Davis, were said to revolutionize jazz music and made Kind of Blue one of the most acclaimed and best-selling jazz albums of all time.

In the late 1960s, influenced by the success of contemporary rock musicians, the Miles Davis Quintet began to incorporate electric instruments and use multitracking and extensive editing on their recordings. The albums In a Silent Way (1969) and Bitches Brew (1970), featuring electronic rather than acoustic instruments, are considered the first successful amalgamations of jazz and rock music, a style that later became known as "fusion."

By the mid-1970s, failing health caused by a kidney problem, complications from diabetes, and a relapse into heroin and cocaine addiction forced Davis to retire from the music industry for another five-year period. His health returned by the beginning of the 1980s, and he performed regularly until his death on September 28, 1991, after a stroke.

Davis's many honors and citations have included a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award in 1990, knighthood in the French Legion of Honor in 1991, and induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2006.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Jazz.

Further Reading

Carr, Ian. Miles Davis: The Definitive Biography. London: HarperCollins, 1998.

Davis, Miles, with Quincy Troupe. Miles: The Autobiography. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.

Szwed, John F. So What: The Life of Miles Davis. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2002.

Dean, James (1931–1955)

An acclaimed film actor and countercultural figure who represented the epitome of moody adolescence, James Dean personified youthful disillusionment and frustration in the 1950s. He died, tragically, at the height of his film career, at age 24, and became an idol of American youth for generations to come.

James Byron Dean was born on February 8, 1931, in Marion, Indiana. His mother died when he was young, and Dean was raised by an aunt and uncle. After finishing high school in Indiana, he went to live with his father in California. There, he studied theater at James Whitmore's drama workshop in Los Angeles and was introduced to the Stanislavsky method, an acting approach that embraces the psychological and emotional aspects of the art. He also studied at the famed Actor's Studio in New York City. Shortly thereafter, he appeared in two Broadway plays, See the Jaguar (1952) and The Immoralist (1954).

Dean's performances captured the attention of Hollywood, and he signed a contract for a lead role in the film East of Eden (1955), which was adapted from the novel by Nobel Prize-winner John Steinbeck. Dean's portrayal of the brooding son, Cal Trask, won him critical acclaim. "He scuffs his feet, he whirls, he pouts, he sputters, he leans against walls, he rolls his eyes, he swallows his words, he ambles slack-kneed," The New York Times noted.

Dean's next movie, Rebel Without a Cause (1955), which was released a month after the actor's death, catapulted him to star status and remains the definitive film of teenage alienation. Typecast in Rebel as an awkward, troubled young man, Dean became identified with the rebellious and inarticulate youth of the 1950s. In Giant (1956), based on the novel by Edna Ferber, Dean played the part of a rough, coarse ranch hand. This trio of films cemented Dean's role as the symbol of the idealistic, nonconformist, misunderstood, and confused teenager of the 1950s.

Actor James Dean poses on the set of Rebel Without a Cause (1955), the film that made him a cult idol and symbol of misunderstood youth. His portrayal of a moody, rebellious teen was said to epitomize the alienation of the postwar generation. (John Kobal Foundation/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The social phenomenon of youth alienation in America had spurred a hunger for a representative cultural icon. In James Dean, Hollywood provided an image for the youth culture to emulate and for mainstream parents to abhor. Each of his films depicted— even celebrated—a rejection of accepted social norms and a defiance of middle-class customs and traditions. In retrospect, they reflect a shift in spirit from escape to revolt among American youth.

Dean died in a racing-car accident on September 30, 1955, in Paso Robles, California, shortly after the filming of Giant. His sudden passing triggered mourning throughout the nation, and contributed to the mythologizing process in years to come. A year after Dean's death, Warner Bros. film studio continued to receive more than 5,000 fan letters per week. Decades later, fans still made pilgrimages to his grave in Fairmount, Indiana, and to the intersection on California Highway 46 where he was killed in his Porsche Spyder. Dean's meteoric rise in filmdom, his countercultural persona, and his violent, early death became symbols of identification for many young people who shared his characters' disillusionment, puzzlement, and dreams.

Yuwu Song

See also: Biker Culture: Film, Hollywood.

Further Reading

Bast, William. James Dean: A Biography. New York: Ballantine, 1956.

Herndon, Venable. James Dean: A Short Life. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1974.

Howlett, John. James Dean: A Biography. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1975.

Debs, Eugene V. (1855–1926)

Railroad labor leader, cofounder of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), longtime standard bearer of American socialism, and five-time presidential candidate Eugene Victor Debs was one of the most influential union organizers and advocates of leftist causes in the history of the United States. He was born on November 5, 1855, in Terre Haute, Indiana, to French immigrant parents. In the early years of his life, the United States underwent a civil war, a period of rapid industrialization, and a massive influx of immigrants. Debs dedicated his life to the struggle to create an egalitarian society in response to the political, economic, and social implications of these events.

Journalist and Militant

Debs's writings helped promote the "alternative press" tradition of American socialism. He worked in the railway industry during his teen years, becoming involved with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen as a journalist.

Many railway workers believed that mainstream newspapers and magazines were biased in favor of employers, and called for the establishment of an independent, prolabor press. Debs served as editor of the Locomotive Firemen's Magazine and was elected grand secretary of the brotherhood in 1880 in recognition of his writing and organizing talents. He also wrote extensively for such publications as The Social Democrat, The International Socialist Review, Industrial Unionism, and The Appeal to Reason. Debs's writings are widely regarded as the founding documents of the American socialist tradition and still are read by the political left.

Debs's militant organizing tactics contributed greatly to union political culture. During the turbulent labor disputes of the 1890s, he promoted the creation of a larger "industrial union" that would incorporate all railway workers into a single organization. In June 1893, Debs helped establish the American Railway Union (ARU), which coordinated the interests and efforts of all railway workers regardless of position.

Within a year of its inception, the ARU participated in some of the greatest labor disputes in U.S. history, including the infamous 1894 Great Northern Railway and Pullman Palace Car Company strikes, which virtually shut down the city of Chicago. The Pullman strike was defeated only by the direct intervention of President Grover Cleveland, the U.S. Army, and the federal courts. After twelve weeks, Debs and other leaders of the ARU were arrested, and the Pullman strike was brought to an unsuccessful end.

The experiences of Pullman polarized the labor movement over the issue of strikes and perceptions of the state. Samuel Gompers of the conservative American Federation of Labor (AFL) insisted that radical, industry-wide strikes harmed the cause of labor and encouraged violent state intervention. Debs drew very different conclusions. During his six-month internment, he immersed himself in Marxist writings and, in contrast to Gompers, became convinced that only the independent organization of the working class, both industrially and politically, could win lasting concessions. Debs believed that by controlling industrial organization and the coercive powers of the state, the labor movement could transform the United States into a socialist commonwealth. Upon his release from jail on November 22, 1895, he began his long and controversial career as a socialist politician.

Socialist Vision

American socialists emphasized the need for workers to organize political parties and independent institutions to advance their class interests. In June 1897, therefore, Debs and the ARU helped form the Social Democracy of America (SDA). After a variety of factional breaks over political strategy, Debs transformed the SDA into the Socialist Party of America in 1901. He ran as the party's candidate for president of the United States five times, beginning in 1900. In the campaigns, the socialists criticized the ways in which American educational institutions were being utilized to instill "ignorance and subjugation" in the nation's youth. Debs actively promoted such educational initiatives as the Socialist Sunday School movement, summer camps, the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, and the People's College of Fort Scott.

Debs's vision of socialism was a fusion of leftist radicalism, religion, and American tradition. He gained international notoriety for his fiery and often evangelical-style speeches. Although he was an industrial militant, his socialist rhetoric blended the economic critiques of German political philosopher Karl Marx and the moral lessons of Christian Gospel. Debs often spoke of American leaders such as President Abraham Lincoln to justify his own critiques of racism and poverty. In short, his blending of potentially conflicting worldviews made him a unique, popular, and feared figure in American political culture.

In 1905, Debs joined with longtime nemesis Daniel De Leon to found the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Popularly known as "Wobblies," members of the IWW promoted a militant program of industrial unionism with the slogan "One Big Union." The Wobblies relied heavily on posters, strike bulletins, newspapers, folk music, and other cultural initiatives to "agitate, educate, and organize" workers. Through the dual threat of industrial sabotage and social revolution, the IWW won important concessions from employers but eventually alienated Debs and other more politically oriented socialists. Though still supportive of industrial unionism, Debs broke with the IWW in 1908. The IWW continued focusing upon militant unionism and revolutionary counterculture, while Debs and the Socialist Party emphasized political activity and the reconstruction of American political culture.

Peace campaigns were a central tenet of socialist politics, and Debs joined socialists in other countries in condemning World War I. In 1917 and 1918, as scores of peace activists were harassed and imprisoned under the Espionage Act for their antiwar activities, Debs was arrested for giving an antiwar speech in Canton, Ohio. He was sentenced to ten years in prison, during which he ran his most successful presidential campaign, winning almost 1 million votes in 1920.

In ill health, Debs was granted a pardon by President Warren G. Harding on Christmas Day 1921, and he returned to his home in Terre Haute. Debs later retired to Lindlaur Sanitarium in Illinois, where he died on October 20, 1926.

Debs's legacies of alternative journalism, industrial unionism, political struggle, socialist education, and cultural initiatives inspired a new generation of radicals during the 1930s. Although his socialist commonwealth never came to fruition, many of Debs's policy goals were fulfilled in the economic and social reforms of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal.

Joel A. Lewis

See also: Industrial Workers of the World: Socialism.

Further Reading

Debs, Theodore. Sidelights: Incidents in the Life of Eugene V. Debs. Terre Haute, IN: Eugene V. Debs Foundation, 1973.

Salvatore, Nick. Eugene V. Debs: Citizen and Socialist. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1982.

Tussey, Jean Y. , ed. Eugene V. Debs Speaks. New York: Pathfinder, 1972.

Deep Ecology

Deep ecology is a philosophical perspective in which human beings are regarded as one species among others in the ecological patterns and processes of existence, neither more nor less important than any other species or process. It has been cited, legitimately or not, as the underlying philosophy of groups such as Earth First! that employ various forms of civil disobedience against developers' bulldozers, as well as of the more radical edges of the Green Party and other political environmentalists.

Deep ecology is a radically alternative point of view to that of established religious and secular understandings that place the human species at the pinnacle of the ecological order. Such perspectives imply or directly declare that the human species is qualitatively set apart from the rest of the natural order and that the natural order exists for human benefit. Even much of the mainstream conservationist ecology movement leans in this direction, inasmuch as it emphasizes the custodial role human beings should play so as to be able to maximally, albeit responsibly, exploit the planet's natural resources.

Deep ecology does not emphasize pragmatic conservationism so much as the inherent being-worthiness of all that is. Capitalism and ecological conservationism foster an attitude of demystified calculation in relation to the orders of nature. Essentially, they differ only on what data should be figured into the calculation (though this is not an insignificant difference in terms of planet Earth and its future). Deep ecology, in contrast, fosters an attitude of awestruck wonder in the face of the natural order.

The philosophy is fed by a number of intellectual and social streams. Often identified as the philosophical father of deep ecology is Norwegian philosopher Arne Næss, who, in turn, points to the contemplative pantheism of seventeenth-century Jewish heretic Baruch Spinoza and the thoughtful activism of Mohandas Gandhi as his own major influences. Others point to such contemporary figures as philosopher George Sessions and New Age poet and mystic Gary Snyder, and to the Gaia hypothesis of eco-scientist James Lovelock, as fundamental building blocks of deep ecology.

In 1984, Næss and Sessions summarized eight key points of deep ecology, including the following: the well-being and flourishing of human and nonhuman life on Earth have intrinsic value independent of human purposes; richness and diversity of life-forms are valuable in themselves; the flourishing of human life and cultures is compatible with a substantially smaller human population; the flourishing of nonhuman life requires a smaller human population; and a call for a new ideology of appreciating life's quality rather than pursuing an increasingly higher standard of living.

Daniel Liechty

See also: Environmentalism; Green Party; Snyder, Gary.

Further Reading

Katz, Eric, Andrew Light, and David Rothenberg , eds. Beneath the Surface: Critical Essays in the Philosophy of Deep Ecology. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2000.

Lovelock, James. Gaia: A New Look at Life on Earth. 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Næss, Arne. Ecology, Community and Lifestyle. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Sessions, George , ed. Deep Ecology for the 21st Century: Readings on the Philosophy and Practice of the New Environmentalism. Boston: Shambhala, 1995.

Sessions, George, and Bill Devall. Deep Ecology: Living as if Nature Mattered. Layton, UT: Gibbs Smith, 2001.

Witoszek, Nina, and Andrew Brennan , eds. Philosophical Dialogues: Arne Næss and the Progress of Ecosophy. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999.

Deganawidah (ca. 1500–ca. 1600)

Deganawidah (or Dekanawidah), also referred to as the Great Peacemaker, was the author of the Great Law of the Iroquois Confederacy in the late fifteenth or early sixteenth century. Along with Hiawatha, he attempted to join rival Native Americans of the Great Lakes territory into one extensive family, the League of the Iroquois, also known as the Iroquois Five-Nation Confederacy. Although Deganawidah's vision would be frustrated by European invaders, it has stood as a model of dispute settlement and political, social, and cultural alliance ever since.

According to Iroquois oral tradition (first mentioned in European records in a 1743 report by a Moravian missionary to the Mohawks), the Great Peacemaker traveled widely among the Great Lakes nations in the mid-fifteenth century, calling for an end to tribal warfare, murder and revenge, and ritual cannibalism. His most important convert was the Mohawk chief Hiawatha, who applied his formidable oratorical skills to spreading Deganawidah's charter of peace, the Great Law.

The Iroquois Confederacy, organized sometime between 1450 and 1525, united five major Iroquoian-speaking nations: the Mohawks, Onondagas, Oneidas, Cayugas, and Senecas. Following centuries of intermittent warfare between these peoples of the eastern Great Lakes, the Great Law instituted a system of diplomacy conducted by a council of forty-nine hereditary chiefs. The Iroquois thereafter imagined an expansive peace based on broad kinship ties, symbolized by the longhouse.

The Great Law represented nothing short of a moral and cultural revolution in the Great Lakes region. While the Confederacy offered the Five Nations strategic advantages over their neighboring Huron and Algonquian enemies, the Iroquois commitment to enacting and extending familial bonds to outsiders, although often by means of bloodshed, was genuine. Their kinship-based pacifism generally was demonstrated after a period of warfare, when, as a part of the Iroquois condolence ritual, captives would be “adopted” as brothers, sisters, or children to replace lost family members. Christian missionaries, moving among the Iroquois in the 1650s, reported that adopted foreigners composed the majority in some villages. In 1722, the Iroquois admitted the entire Tuscarora nation into its longhouse, thereby becoming the Six Nations.

Deganawidah's influence also was evident in relations between the Confederacy and French and British colonists. The Iroquois considered themselves Ongwehoenwe, or superior men, but routinely invited Europeans to become “one nation” with them. French and British captives adopted into Iroquois communities testified to the strong family sensibilities of their captors, and several refused to leave their Iroquois kin when given opportunities to do so. The Great Law was not well received, however, by most European settlers, who eventually followed promises of inclusion within the Confederacy with campaigns of extermination. Nonetheless, the Iroquois and British did establish an alliance known as the Covenant Chain in 1677, which preserved the integrity of the Six Nations through the colonial era.

The Iroquois Confederacy represents one of the first forms of interstate, representational government in North America. Some historians and Native American scholars believe that Iroquois unity directly affected the coming together of the colonies against Britain and the writing of the U.S. Constitution. Scattered descendants of the Six Nations, numbering about 130,000 across Canada and the United States, still testify to Deganawidah's familial form of pacifist diplomacy.

Mark Edwards

See also: Native Americans.

Further Reading

Dennis, Matthew. Cultivating a Landscape of Peace: Iroquois-European Encounters in Seventeenth-Century America. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993.

Richter, Daniel K. The Ordeal of the Longhouse: The Peoples of the Iroquois League in the Era of Colonization. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.

Delany, Martin R. (1812–1885)

Regarded as an early proponent of black nationalism, Martin Robinson Delany was a tireless and protean figure in American blacks' freedom struggle. As an abolitionist, physician, reporter, newspaper editor, author, explorer, and major in the U.S. Army, Delany had interests that were nearly as diverse as his developing political ideology. At various points in his life, Delany advocated armed insurrection by slaves, emigration by free blacks to Africa and South America, enlistment in the Union Army, strategic cooperation with both Republicans and Democrats, and the colonization of Liberia. Perhaps more than anything else, Delany represents the historically dynamic nature of African American social and political ideology as it adjusts to changes in American race relations.

Born in Charles Town, Virginia (now West Virginia), on May 6, 1812, to free blacks, Delany began his career as an editor-writer, briefly collaborating with abolitionist Frederick Douglass as coeditor of The North Star in 1847 and editing the Pittsburgh Mystery. After being accepted to Harvard Medical School but forced to leave a month later by white students and faculty, Delany adopted more extreme views on race in America: Blacks had no future there and should establish their own sovereign nation.

Delany pioneered a program for nationalism with his landmark book of 1852, The Condition, Elevation, Emigration and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States, which advocated African American emigration. He organized a National Emigration Convention that met regularly throughout the 1850s, and he explored potential homelands for blacks in Central America and Africa. Delany then joined thousands of blacks who left the United States for Canada after passage of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, which required the return of escaped slaves between states. In Canada, he remained involved in the U.S. antislavery movement, assisting radical abolitionist John Brown in his efforts to recruit blacks in Canada for a planned revolt in the U.S. South.

Delany's other major publication, Blake; or, The Huts of America, was released in serial form in 1861 and 1862 by The Weekly Anglo-African. In this novel, Delany presents Henry Holland, a heroic, solitary fugitive slave also known as Blake, preparing a full-scale armed revolt that would overthrow chattel bondage throughout the Western Hemisphere. Blake articulates Delany's advocacy of violent force to overthrow the slave regime. Moreover, Blake clearly presents Delany's confrontational nationalism, informing readers that "You shouldn't pay white folks no mind."

Delany's emigrationism briefly ebbed after President Lincoln's 1863 Emancipation Proclamation. For roughly a decade afterward, Delany optimistically committed to work within the confines of establishment institutions, becoming the first black major in the U.S. Army and an officer in the Freedmen's Bureau, a War Department-created organization that oversaw all relief and educational activities relating to black refugees and freedmen, including issuing rations, clothing, and medicine. Delany's faith in America's ability to fully actualize its egalitarian ideals was short lived, however, and by Reconstruction's collapse in the mid-1870s he reverted to promoting emigration. In this final campaign to alleviate the burdens of racism, Delany controversially aligned himself with the notoriously anti-black American Colonization Society, a predominantly upper-class white organization seeking to resolve America's persistent racial strife by deporting freedmen to Liberia.

While Delany's tactics and political loyalties altered throughout his lifetime, his pride in black heritage and his belief that African Americans were entitled to full citizenship rights never wavered. One of Delany's contemporaries, the American Methodist Episcopal bishop Daniel Alexander Payne, commented, "He was too intensely African to be popular." Delany died of consumption on January 24, 1885.

David Lucander

See also: Abolitionism: African Americans.

Further Reading

Delany, Martin R. The Condition, Elevation, Emigration, and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States. 1852. Amherst, NY: Humanity, 2004.

Levine, Robert S. Martin R. Delany: A Documentary Reader. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

Ullman, Victor. Martin R. Delany: The Beginnings of Black Nationalism. Boston: Beacon, 1971.

Democratic Party

Although the Democratic Party has a long history of embracing "otherness," including both mainstream and counterculture constituencies, the rejection by mainstream voters of perceived excesses, failures, and violence on the part of the counterculture has made the relationship between the two groups difficult at best. While the Democratic Party dubs itself "the big tent party," the conflicting nature of its special interest groups has made it difficult for the party to chart a successful electoral course on the national level.

Democrats trace their roots to Thomas Jefferson's opposition to the ruling Federalists in the early republic. Called the party of the "common man" after the great victory of Jeffersonians in the elections of 1800, the opposition party became the establishment party for almost 150 years. During the Republican-dominated latter half of the nineteenth century, the Democratic Party gave shelter to immigrants, laborers, union activists, and farmers. In an effort to regain political superiority, the Democrats co-opted many of the planks of the most significant counterculture of the era, agrarianism, and its political arm, the Populist Party.

The Democratic Party of the early twentieth century languished in obscurity, finding little electoral success outside large urban areas and the rural Deep South. In the economic and social upheaval of the Great Depression, the Democratic Party harnessed the passion and strength of various countercultural elements, regaining political power and dramatically reshaping the nation's political, social, and economic landscape. Franklin D. Roosevelt, elected president for the first of four terms in 1932, partially implemented progressive social and economic ideologies. His aggressive pursuit of radical solutions to the nation's problems energized the social and political left, resulting in an expanded federal presence in the economy, a vibrant labor movement, and small, but ultimately significant, gains in civil rights.

The backlash against Roosevelt and his successor, Harry S. Truman, resulted in the election of Republican Dwight D. "Ike" Eisenhower in 1952. As Ike struggled to maintain normalcy in the face of increasingly vocal and visible opposition to racial inequities, the Democratic Party, at great risk to its electoral strength in the South, stepped into the breach. The party's traditional supporters, Catholics and Jews, and its mercurial labor component quickly closed ranks with the newest constituent base, African Americans. The sight of white priests, nuns, rabbis, and laborers marching in solidarity with oppressed black fieldworkers, garbage collectors, and domestic workers shook the party and the nation.

Cultural reaction to the civil rights movement and against the escalating Vietnam War finally exploded into the mainstream in the late 1960s. The children of capitalist affluence began to actively reject the society that provided the education, economic opportunity, and freedom to protest its existence. As more young people joined marches, sit-ins, and rallies, the more shocked their traditionally Democratic parents became. Political protests quickly morphed into societal protests. To prove hipness and leftist credentials on a college campus, it was de rigeur to try psychedelic drugs, engage in free love, and attend a protest. Young African American activists, disillusioned with Martin Luther King, Jr.'s nonviolent civil disobedience approach, increasingly turned to militancy, forming groups such as the Black Panthers as their answer to continued racial oppression. The party that, arguably, had created the social and economic conditions that led to these opportunities became the enemy. Its leader, President Lyndon B. Johnson, became the face of the despised Vietnam War.

The showdown between the counterculture left and the Democratic Party establishment came at the August 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. As some of the protestors established an alternative-lifestyle carnival outside, others attempted to gain floor credentials in order to bring the concerns of the antiwar counterculture to the delegates. Chicago's Democratic mayor, Richard Daley, regarded both approaches as attempts to subvert the system and responded with brutal force. City police stormed the protestors, indiscriminately swinging clubs and firing tear-gas canisters. Inside the convention, power was cut as national news outlets began to televise the violence.

The fissure between the Democratic Party and its leftist element resulted in several lackluster national tickets. Saddled with the violence of the Chicago convention and the excesses of the Woodstock generation, and tarred with the brush of civil rights, Democrats struggled to hold such traditional constituencies as Irish-Catholic union members and white Southerners.

From the 1970s to the 1990s, the Democratic Party struggled to merge its various special interests into a cohesive political force on the national level. Race, pacifism, immigration, environmentalism, gender equity, and sexual orientation all clamored for position in the big tent. The national party structure was moribund, unable to present a coherent message to the public. The election of Bill Clinton as president in 1992 appeared to vindicate the baby boom generation. Arguing that it was possible to embrace countercultural elements while maintaining a viable national presence, they were sorely disappointed when Clinton equivocated on party positions and agreed to measures to placate the ascendant right wing. The election of Barack Obama in 2008 energized the party with a stronger minority constituency and young voters, along with a message of "hope and change" that resonated with independents as well, but the nation's financial crisis and Republican resistance to the Obama agenda defused the call for policy innovation within the first year of his administration.

The Democratic Party, ironically, relies on its activist, countercultural constituents as foot soldiers in the party apparatus—distributing literature, working polls, staffing phone banks—while distancing itself from many of the same constituents' issues on the national stage. Although it remains the big tent party, with hundreds of minority groups and special interests relying upon it for funding, publicity, and political support, many countercultural activists have grown disgusted with the power plays, compromises, and betrayals that are compulsory for a national party in the twenty-first century.

Many reject the American democratic system entirely, judging it rigged for the moneyed interests. Others have created smaller, interest-and ideology-specific parties, such as the Green Party, the Freedom Socialist Party, the Labor Party, and the Peace and Freedom Party. Without a major realignment of the American political system, however, the only viable method for leftist countercultural advocates to achieve national attention and political success is through the Democratic Party.

Ann Youngblood Mulhearn

See also: Black Panthers: Great Depression: Green Party: Peace and Freedom Party: Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Heath, Joseph. Nation of Rebels: Why Counterculture Became Consumer Culture. New York: HarperBusiness, 2004.

Judis, John B., and Ruy Teixeira. The Emerging Democratic Majority. New York: Scribner's, 2002.

Parment, Herbert S. The Democrats: The Years After FDR. New York: Macmillan, 1976.

Rubin, Richard L. Party Dynamics: The Democratic Coalition and the Politics of Change. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Dial, The

The Dial, published in its original form from 1840 to 1844 and revived later in the century, was the leading magazine of the transcendentalist movement. Although circulation reached only several hundred, it has received considerable attention from historians and literary critics as a vehicle of transcendentalist thought. Ralph Waldo Emerson and Margaret Fuller were two of its founders, and the magazine published writings by Henry David Thoreau, Amos Bronson Alcott, Theodore Parker, and other members of the circle.

Revived as a political magazine in 1880 and again as a modernist literary journal in the 1920s, The Dial was one of the so-called little magazines published in the mid-nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Little magazines were primarily noncommercial ventures that provided a forum for ideas, experimental and provocative verbal and visual art, and criticism. Often funded by private citizens, and thereby free from commercial influence, these magazines regarded themselves as guiding lights in a world run by industrialists and corporate bureaucrats.

Regarded by historians as the first independent and original American journal—not following European models and literary trends—The Dial had been a dream of Emerson, Alcott, Fuller, and others for years. Issue number one was published in 1840 under the editorship of Fuller, who guided the publication for the first two years. Emerson became the editor in 1842 and remained in the position until the magazine folded in 1844.

The name of the magazine was suggested by Alcott to evoke a sundial, an association on which Emerson elaborated in his introduction to the first issue: “We wish it may resemble that instrument in its celebrated happiness, that of measuring no hours but those of sunshine. Let it be one cheerful rational voice amidst the din of mourners and polemics.”

Claiming a shared lineage with the transcendentalists, Francis Fisher Browne in 1880 began publishing a political magazine in Chicago called The Dial, which he edited for the next three decades. Among its writers was book critic Margaret Anderson, who later founded The Little Review. The Dial published by Browne was not nearly as influential as its predecessor, but it was bought by a young publisher named Martyn Johnson in 1916 and, under his direction, became a leading journal of liberal politics. Johnson moved the magazine from Chicago to New York City in 1918 but soon faced financial difficulties and political squabbling among the magazine staff.

In its third and most commercially successful iteration, The Dial was revamped in New York by Scofield Thayer, a young Harvard graduate and friend of the poet E.E. Cummings. With financial backing from James Sibley Watson (an heir to the Western Union telegraph fortune), he purchased the magazine from Johnson in 1919 and published the first monthly issue in January 1920. From the beginning, Thayer’s The Dial attracted leading and up-and-coming voices of the modernist literary and artistic movement. The first issue included poems by Cummings and Carl Sandburg; in the first year alone, the magazine featured contributions by Hart Crane, Marianne Moore, and Ezra Pound, among many others.

The next ten years would be a period of cutting-edge literary and artistic expression, intellectual discourse, and commercial success, as The Dial became a compelling source of new ideas, fiction, poetry, and visual art throughout Europe and the United States. Its pages included the first U.S. publications of William Butler Yeats’s poem “The Second Coming” and T.S. Eliot’s “The Waste Land.” And the magazine became a primary vehicle for the poetry and fiction of Sherwood Anderson, D.H. Lawrence, and other leading voices of modernism. Contributors and editors included Conrad Aiken, Kenneth Burke (The Dial’s music critic in the late 1920s), Marianne Moore, Marc Chagall, Pablo Picasso, Georges Seurat, and Virginia Woolf.

During the 1920s, The Dial could be found on newsstands throughout America and Europe. Sylvia Beach carried it in her expatriates’ bookstore, Shakespeare and Company, in Paris. Ernest Hemingway read it regularly there, and Ezra Pound was the foreign editor as well as a regular contributor.

Among the tangible contributions by The Dial to the spirit of artistic freedom was the Dial Prize, established by Thayer and Watson in the early 1920s for artists of promise. The first recipient of the $2,000 gift was Sherwood Anderson; poet Marianne Moore was a recipient in 1924. After Thayer suffered a mental breakdown, Moore became the magazine’s editor in 1925, bringing new energy and vision to the publication. Without Thayer’s participation, however, The Dial faced increasingly dire business circumstances and folded in July 1929.

Michael Susko

See also: Magazines, Little; Transcendentalism.

Further Reading

Hoffman, Frederick, J. Charles Allen, and Carolyn F. Ulrich. The Little Magazine: A History and a Bibliography. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1947.

Joost, Nicolas, and Alvin Sullivan. D.H. Lawrence and The Dial. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1970.

Molesworth, Charles. Marianne Moore: A Literary Life. New York: Atheneum, 1990.

Myerson, Joel. The New England Transcendentalists and The Dial. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1980.

Sutton, Walter, ed. Pound, Thayer, Watson, and The Dial: A Story in Letters. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.

Dick, Philip K. (1928–1982)

Science fiction writer Philip K. Dick produced metaphysical short stories and novels that transformed the genre and, according to critics, presaged the cyberpunk movement. He developed a cult following, and finally achieved mainstream publishing success, for his unique literary vision, which explored themes of alienation and mental illness, the nature of reality, alternate universes, drugs, politics, religion, and corporate monopoly.

Philip Kindred Dick was born on December 16, 1928, in Chicago. His early childhood was marked by the death of his twin sister and his parents' divorce, after which he moved with his mother to Berkeley, California, in 1939. After graduating from Berkeley High School, he attended the University of California, Berkeley, in the fall of 1948, but dropped out two months later when he refused to take Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) classes.

In 1951, Dick began attending writing workshops under Anthony Boucher, then editor of the pulp magazine Fantasy and Science Fiction. Boucher bought one of Dick's first short stories, "Roog," marking his debut as a professional writer. Dick quit his day job as a record-store clerk to write full time for science fiction and fantasy magazines. By 1954, he had sold sixty stories, followed the next year by his first novel, Solar Lottery.

Dick continued his remarkable output in the ensuing years, publishing ten books between 1955 and 1960. In 1963, he received the first widespread acknowledgment of his work, winning the Hugo Award for best science fiction novel for The Man in the High Castle (1962). He later won the John W. Campbell Memorial Award for his 1974 novel, Flow My Tears, The Policeman Said.

To fuel his intense literary output, Dick consumed large quantities of amphetamines. He suffered from paranoia and a number of phobias, spending most of his time at home, a recluse. After his apartment was broken into in 1971, Dick began a period of rampant drug usage, ending in a suicide attempt and rehabilitation a year later. He was married and divorced five times, and he had two daughters, Laura and Isolde.

Dick's fiction is a unique blend of science, metaphysics, surrealism, and biting humor, with critiques of human consciousness, modern society, and the absurdities of rational thought in contemporary and future society. He published a total of forty-two books and hundreds of short stories, but his fiction remained too strange and inaccessible to succeed in the mainstream literary market until after his death. Long pigeonholed as pulp fiction, his books and short stories generally were published by small, poorly funded presses that specialized in genre paperbacks.

Dick thus fought a lifelong battle with poverty, never earning more than $12,000 a year. He died of a stroke on March 2, 1982, in Santa Ana, California, shortly before the debut of Blade Runner, director Ridley Scott's film adaptation of his 1968 novel, Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep?

Dick's popularity and critical reception grew exponentially in the years that followed. Six films have been made based on his books, including Total Recall (1996), Minority Report (2002), and A Scanner Darkly (2006). Previously unpublished works are continually being discovered and brought to press. By the 2000s, the corpus of Dick's writing has reached millions of readers across the globe.

Jeffrey Sartain

See also: Cyberpunk: Science Fiction.

Further Reading

Dick, Philip K. The Collected Stories of Philip K. Dick. Los Angeles: Underwood/Miller, 1987.

Sutin, Lawrence. Divine Invasions: A Life of Philip K. Dick. New York: Harmony, 1989.

Disco

A shortened form of the word discotheque, “disco” refers to a form of music popular in the 1970s and its associated style. The roots of the phenomenon, however, can be traced back to the establishment-defying “swing kids” of 1930s Germany, whose love of American jazz and swing music, behavior, and style defied Nazi racism and militarism. The dance clubs known as discos began appearing during World War II in occupied France, where a disc jockey selected songs to play—often American—while avoiding the expense of a live band and providing a wider selection than a jukebox could. In the United States, early discos were edgy and controversial, patronized primarily by minorities such as gays, African Americans, and Latinos. Called the “most democratic form of popular music ever conceived,” the 1970s disco culture hastened public acceptance of gay lifestyles and the crossing of racial and class lines. Hedonistic sites of drug use, promiscuity, and public sex, disco clubs began as sparse, cheaply run inner-city clubs, moved to wealthier neighborhoods as they became more popular, and finally attracted middle-class devotees in the suburbs.

Disco music was multi-instrumental, almost symphonic, with a strong, repetitive bass known as “four to the floor,” in which the drumbeat falls on each of the four beats of a measure. To emphasize the drumbeat’s hypnotic, drug-like sensuality, disco clubs used mirrored balls (dating from the dance halls of the 1920s), dry-ice fog, and elaborate light displays. The increasing popularity of the clubs was both a reaction against the social activism of the 1960s and, in a sense, a fulfillment of the integrationist desires of the minority and gay liberation movements. The disco scene, with its promise of momentary pleasure, also offered an escape from the disillusionment of the political scandals of the early 1970s, including Watergate, and from the weariness that came from constantly trying to change society for the better.

The world’s first disco radio show originated on New York’s WPIX-FM in 1974. By the next year, the music had gone mainstream. Van McCoy’s “The Hustle” dominated the singles charts, followed six months later by Donna Summer’s orgasmic “Love to Love You Baby.” Other popular disco music of the 1970s included the Bee Gees’s “Stayin’ Alive” (1977) and “YMCA” (1978) by the openly gay Village People. The ultimate disco dance, the Hustle, originated in the Hispanic community of New York City and spawned several regional variations.

The movement peaked in 1977 with the opening of the Manhattan club Studio 54 and the release of the film Saturday Night Fever, starring John Travolta as an alienated Brooklyn youth by day and disco king by night. Nearly everyone wanted to produce a disco song, including performers as varied as country-and-western singer Dolly Parton and crooner Frank Sinatra. Oversaturation led to a backlash, and Chicago rock DJs staged a massive disco-album burning at Comiskey Park in 1979.

With the political and social conservatism of the 1980s and rising awareness of the HIV/AIDS epidemic, the disco movement, with its public sexuality and openly gay elements, faded from favor. Permeation of the market and the sheer repetitiveness of the beat no doubt contributed as well, but some cultural commentators argue that disco never really died.

Indeed, it has been said, disco has directly influenced most of twenty-first-century dance music. According to Donna Summer's music producer, "It's interesting to hear not just the sounds but the exact notes and rhythms I used on my albums, used now as they were twenty-five years ago."

Melissa Weinbrenner

See also: Studio 54.

Further Reading

Lawrence, Tim. Love Saves the Day: A History of American Dance Music Culture, 1970–1979. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2003.

Shapiro, Peter. Turn the Beat Around: The Secret History of Disco. New York: Faber & Faber, 2005.

Doonesbury

Doonesbury, a newspaper comic strip by Garry Trudeau that debuted in syndication in 1970, broke new ground in the medium, blending traditional humor and continuous story lines with the political and social satire of the editorial cartoon. While previous satire strips, such as Walt Kelly's Pogo and Al Capp's Li'l Abner, generally had handled political issues through allegory and fictional characters, Trudeau used real-life politicians as characters. In 1975, Doonesbury became the first newspaper comic strip to win the Pulitzer Prize for editorial cartooning. Still widely syndicated in the early twenty-first century, it has been a model for other left-wing, counterculture strips, such as Berke Breathed's Bloom County.

Garry Trudeau's Doonesbury avoided few political issues or institutions—including the Reagan White House—in its anti-establishment satire. In 1975, Trudeau became the first comic strip creator to win a Pulitzer Prize for editorial cartooning. (Library of Congress)

Doonesbury, which Trudeau began in the Yale Daily News as a student in the 1960s, was politically and socially liberal from the outset. The comic strip was initially most remarkable for its strong opposition to the Vietnam War, commentary that generally was as absent from newspaper comic strips as it was omnipresent elsewhere in American culture. Trudeau's strip was frequently criticized by conservative politicians and commentators, especially during the national controversies over Vietnam and Watergate.

The influence of the counterculture on Doonesbury was strongest in its early days. Its everyman main character, Michael Doonesbury, was surrounded by such standards of the period (many based on life at Yale in the late 1960s and early 1970s) as the stoned hippie, Zonker Harris, the campus radical, "Megaphone" Mark Slackmeyer, and the disillusioned-housewife-turned-feminist, Joanie Caucus. The Reverend Scot Sloan was openly modeled on liberal minister and peace activist William Sloane Coffin. The strip also included a militant black character, Rufus, who eventually disappeared. "Straight" characters, such as the college quarterback and later soldier, B.D., and his conventionally feminine girlfriend, Boopsie, were mocked. Much of the Doonesbury cast in the 1970s lived on a commune named Walden after the work of Henry David Thoreau. Joanie eventually entered law school at the notoriously left-wing University of California, Berkeley. Trudeau even introduced a character, Raoul Duke, clearly based on "gonzo journalist" Hunter S. Thompson.

The 1980s and 1990s saw a mellowing of Doonesbury's counterculture edge, particularly after it returned from a hiatus in 1983 and 1984. Drug humor, a staple of the strip's early days, virtually disappeared. Joanie got her law degree and eventually went to work for the Clinton administration, while Doonesbury himself joined the yuppie ranks, serving in the quintessentially establishment field of advertising and marketing, and even joining the Republican Party to support the conservative candidate Steve Forbes for president. (Doonesbury met his second wife at a Forbes rally.)

Over time, Zonker's adventures drifted more and more into fantasy, while Trudeau openly mocked the self-centered and pretentious radical artist J.J., Joanie's daughter and briefly Doonesbury's wife. Beginning in 2004, Trudeau even retreated on his mockery of the U.S. military, sending B.D. into the Iraq War and creating a moving series of strips on B.D.'s loss of a leg and slow physical and psychological recovery.

William E. Burns

See also: Gonzo Journalism.

Further Reading

Doonesbury Town Hall @ Slate. <http://www.doonesbury.com>

Lamb, Christopher. "Changing With the Times: The World According to 'Doonesbury.'" Journal of Popular Culture 23(1990): 113–29.

Weingarten, Gene. "Doonesbury's War." Washington Post Magazine, October 22, 2006.

Douglass, Frederick (ca. 1818–1895)

"I was born in Tuckahoe, near Hillsborough, about twelve miles from Easton, in Talbot county, Maryland. I have no accurate knowledge of my age, never having seen any authentic record containing it. By far the larger part of the slaves know as little of their ages as horses know of theirs, and it is the wish of most masters within my knowledge to keep their slaves thus ignorant."

These are the first lines of what would become the most widely read of many slave narratives published in the decades before the Civil War. The Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass was first published in 1845 and has remained in print ever since. Its author was a recently escaped slave who would go on to become the leading figure of the abolitionist movement and one of the most influential African Americans of the nineteenth century.

Born Frederick Augustus Washington Bailey in Maryland around 1818, Douglass was the son of Harriet Bailey and an unknown white man. As a slave, he worked as a domestic servant, farmhand, and ship caulker in and around Baltimore. Perhaps inspired by his literate mother, from whom he was separated as a young boy, he taught himself to read with a rhetoric textbook, the Columbian Orator, that included speeches by and about his namesake, George Washington.

The radical egalitarianism of revolutionary oratory inspired Douglass to struggle against his enslavement. When he was sent to an infamous slave breaker, Edward Covey, to be whipped into submission, he fought back successfully, physically defying Covey for a period of months. Finally, on September 3, 1838, he escaped to Philadelphia in a borrowed sailor's uniform. He adopted the name Douglass, which he found in Sir Walter Scott's poem "The Lady of the Lake."

Douglass married Anna Murray, a free black who had funded his escape from Baltimore, and they settled in New Bedford, Massachusetts. He subscribed to William Lloyd Garrison's radical abolitionist newspaper, The Liberator, and began to speak regularly at abolitionist meetings. For several years, Douglass toured the northeast as an agent for the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, earning a reputation for his moving oratory.

He published his Narrative in 1845, in part to refute charges that he was an imposter, for it was often claimed that no escaped slave could speak so eloquently. The book delivers a startlingly graphic portrait of the South as a society governed by naked physical violence as well as mental and sexual humiliation. And it describes in detail Frederick's heroic self-transformation and escape. Douglass's story turns on a powerful chiasmus: "You have seen how a man was made a slave; you shall see how a slave was made a man." Ironically, publication of the Narrative alerted bounty hunters to his identity and he was forced to flee the country.

For two years, Douglass lived in Britain, lecturing across England, Scotland, and Ireland. Supporters paid £150 for his freedom papers, which allowed him to return to the United States in 1847, and his backers raised more than $2,000 to fund the establishment of a newspaper under his editorship. Settling in Rochester, New York, he published The North Star (later Frederick Douglass' Paper) from 1847 to 1851, taking his place as one of the most influential radical journalists in American history.

The newspaper's founding marked the beginning of a long process of differentiation between Douglass and the Garrisonian organizations in which he had first begun to work for abolition. While Garrison's The Liberator dedicated itself to "the overthrow of prejudice by the power of love," Douglass came to believe that moral pressure was not enough and that direct action was necessary. "If there is no struggle," he maintained, "there is no progress."

In the first issue of The North Star, Douglass wrote that, in the "Negro-hating" United States, it was important to have a newspaper "under the complete control and direction of the immediate victims of slavery." The paper set out to "attack slavery in all its forms and aspects" and called for universal emancipation. Moreover, its offices were a frequent stop on the Underground Railroad, along which escaped slaves were conducted to freedom in the North. By the 1850s, Douglass openly endorsed organized violence against slaveholders; he spoke publicly in approval of John Brown's 1859 raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia.

Douglass also was a principled supporter of women's rights. He was one of the few men to speak at the historic Seneca Falls Convention, the first major gathering of the woman's movement, in 1848.

He was acknowledged as one of the most riveting public speakers in an era of great oratory. His address, "The Meaning of the Fourth of July to the Negro," delivered in Corinthian Hall, Rochester, New York, on July 5, 1852, remains one of the most urgent and compelling attacks on the hypocrisy of racism in America. Perhaps his least-known accomplishment is authoring a novella, The Heroic Slave (1852), a slightly fictionalized account of the 1841 rebellion, led by Madison Washington, on the slave ship Creole.

During the American Civil War, Douglass acted as adviser to President Abraham Lincoln and recruited black troops, including his own sons, for the renowned Massachusetts 54th and 55th regiments. After the war's end, he held a series of public offices in Washington, D.C., and continued to fight for racial equality, especially as Reconstruction collapsed and the former slave owners of the South reasserted their power. In 1881, he published his third and final autobiography, The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass. The following year, after a long and painful illness, his wife died.

In 1884, Douglass remarried to Helen Pitts, a white woman. The couple was savagely attacked; in response, Douglass calmly observed that his first wife "was the color of my mother, and the second, the color of my father."

Appointed minister to Haiti by President Benjamin Harrison in 1888, Douglass became the first official black diplomat in the U.S. government. He died in Washington on February 20, 1895, just after delivering an address in support of woman suffrage before the National Council of Women.

See also: Abolitionism; African Americans; Garrison, William Lloyd; Underground Railroad.

Further Reading

Foner, Philip S., ed. The Life and Writings of Frederick Douglass. 4 vols. New York: International, 1950–1955.

McFeely, William S. Frederick Douglass. New York: W.W. Norton, 1991.

Quarles, Benjamin. Frederick Douglass. Washington, DC: Associated, 1948.

Draft, Military

The draft, or military conscription, is compulsory induction into the armed forces. Throughout U.S. history, conservative nationalists have typically viewed the draft in positive terms, regarding military service as the highest expression of patriotism (and masculinity). By contrast, cultural libertarians have opposed it as an infringement of a citizen's right of freedom. Views about the draft also have correlated closely to overall opinions about militarism. During the Vietnam War, conscription became an extremely divisive issue, pitting mostly older cultural conservatives against mostly younger, counterculture-influenced Americans.

Although the U.S. Supreme Court has consistently upheld the constitutionality of the draft, its unpopularity has caused the federal government to avoid instituting it except when absolutely necessary—primarily during wartime. Colonial and state governments sometimes conscripted civilians into militias, but the first national drafts did not occur until the American Civil War. The Union and Confederate governments both used conscription, which provoked widespread resistance on both sides.

The federal government reintroduced the draft in World War I, conscripting 2.8 million men. Again, there was public opposition, primarily because U.S. involvement in the war was controversial. The administration of President Woodrow Wilson dealt harshly with opponents of conscription, imprisoning hundreds of conscientious objectors (those who opposed military service for moral or religious reasons).

In 1940, during the run-up to World War II, conscription was reenacted. After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in Hawaii, however, resistance was negligible, and Congress authorized alternative service, rather than prison, for conscientious objectors. A total of 10.1 million men were conscripted. After a one-year hiatus, Congress reimposed conscription in 1948, which continued through the Vietnam War and much of the cold war, until 1973.

The draft again became a controversial issue in the late 1960s. Escalating U.S. intervention in Vietnam after 1965 required increasing draft calls. This move was supported by cultural conservatives, especially among the older generation, many of whom had served in World War II or the Korean War. However, opposition to conscription increased as questioning of U.S. involvement in Vietnam grew, along with the youth movement and the counterculture.

The controversy was heightened by the fact that not everyone was drafted. Only young men were subject to conscription, and only a small minority of them were drafted. During the Vietnam War era, about 27 million men came of draft age and about 10 million served; only about 1.9 million of them were drafted (the remainder volunteered). The Selective Service System allowed deferments or exemptions for a number of reasons, including support of dependents, working in “essential” jobs, being enrolled in higher education, having severe medical or psychological problems (homosexuality was included), or being the member of a pacifist denomination.

Middle-and upper-class men disproportionately benefited from this system. They typically had better access to college and graduate-school deferments and to sympathetic doctors who could provide medical exemptions. Additionally, wealthier Americans sometimes used family or other connections to gain coveted spots in the National Guard, which exempted them from combat duty in Vietnam. As a consequence, there was a widespread public perception that the draft fell most heavily on poorer men, especially racial or ethnic minorities.

Draft evasion and resistance became major issues during the Vietnam era. Although most evaders avoided conscription by obtaining exemptions or deferments, more than 100,000 young men avoided service illegally, with many of them fleeing to Canada. Many “draft dodgers,” as they were called, evaded the draft for personal, rather than political, reasons. Open draft resistance, on the other hand, was closely correlated with opposition to war. As the New Left moved from protest to resistance, antiwar demonstrators burned draft cards, stopped troop trains, and harbored draft resisters and deserters.

After 1969, the draft became a less prominent issue. The number of conscripted decreased, as the U.S. military pulled out of Vietnam; deferments were reduced; and the system became fairer, based on a lottery connected to a draftee’s birth date. Conscription ended in 1973, and the United States moved to an all-volunteer armed force. However, draft registration was reinstated in 1980 for all male U.S. citizens and aliens between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five.

The draft remained a divisive issue in the “culture wars” of the late twentieth century between liberals and conservatives. Conservatives denounced Democratic President Jimmy Carter for granting amnesty to thousands of draft evaders and deserters in 1977. Additionally, Republicans attempted to impugn the patriotism of Democrats by associating them, especially President Bill Clinton, with draft evasion during the Vietnam era. This strategy was undermined by the fact that a number of prominent Republicans—including George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, Dan Quayle, and Newt Gingrich—also had succeeded in avoiding the draft.

In 2003, during the Iraq War, U.S. Representative Charles Rangel of New York, Senator Ernest Hollings of South Carolina, and others called for reinstating conscription to rectify the socioeconomic inequity of the all-volunteer system. The widespread unpopularity of the draft, however, made the idea politically untenable.

George Rising

See also: Conscientious Objectors, Draft Dodgers, and Deserters.

Further Reading

Anderson, Martin, and Barbara Honegger. The Military Draft: Selected Readings on Conscription. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 1982.

Flynn, George Q. Conscription and the Military: The Draft in France, Great Britain, and the United States. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2002.

Drag

The term drag refers to the wearing of clothes associated with the opposite gender, and to the general aesthetic associated with the wearing of female-typed clothes by men. In both performance and protest, drag has been closely connected with gay culture and politics. It is predominantly associated with drag queens, or men in female clothing. More recently, however, drag kings, women who take on the persona and attire of male characters, have developed their own performance style, as captured in the photographs of Del LaGrace Volcano.

Drag queens may perform publicly, typically dressed as glamorous or celebrity women. In drag persona, they are referred to as "she." Transvestites, or cross-dressers, on the other hand, express a fetish for the clothing of the opposite gender that may not correspond to a homosexual orientation. The term transgender refers to identification as a member of the opposite gender. Although there is some blurring of behavioral identity, drag for drag queens is generally a profession or performance art.

A drag queen (man in female clothing) takes part in the 2007 Gay Pride Parade in Seattle. Drag culture is closely connected with, but not identical to, gay culture, politics, and sexual preference. (Scoop/Getty Images)

Theater and Pop Culture

Drag has played a significant part in theatrical history, from ancient Greek theater to medieval street carnivals, Elizabethan drama, the balls of the Belle Époque, Native American ritual, English pantomime and music halls, and American minstrel shows. The term is found in print in the 1870s, referring to women's skirts "dragging" along the stage, but may not have taken on specifically gay connotations until the 1920s.

Despite drag's relationship with homosexuality, audiences frequently have been heterosexual, particularly in the case of high drag, or female impersonation of celebrity entertainers. Whatever the audience, legal restraints on the wearing of women's clothes by men in public have extended to theatrical representations. The drag performer and film actor Ray/Rae Bourban, for example, was arrested repeatedly from 1920 to 1960. Mae West's second play, The Drag (1927), was closed following police raids.

When combined with gay identity, drag helped to create film imagery regarded as particularly subversive. The documentary The Queen (1968) by Frank Simon looked at the Miss All-America Camp Beauty Pageant to show the camp parody of gender roles behind drag beauty competitions. The films of Andy Warhol relied on the “radical chic” of drag queens such as Candy Darling and Holly Woodlawn (the latter was further immortalized in the lyrics of Lou Reed’s 1972 hit single “Walk on the Wild Side”).

Similarly, in the films of John Waters, drag signifies radical and rebellious lifestyles. Waters’s films starring the drag queen Divine, especially, championed drag as an integral part of a wide variety of radical and transgressive behaviors. These films include Multiple Maniacs (1970), Pink Flamingos (1972), and Female Trouble (1974).

The marketing of drag predominantly for heterosexuals can be seen in the 1959 comedy film Some Like It Hot (starring Jack Lemmon, Tony Curtis, and Marilyn Monroe), which continued a well-established cinematographic tradition of straight men in drag played for laughs, and in Alfred Hitchcock’s 1960 suspense classic, Psycho, in which drag is associated with freak show horror.

Performing in drag for predominantly heterosexual audiences can be seen in later films as well, including To Wong Foo, Thanks for Everything! (1995) and The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert (1994), the appeal of which is based in part on the casting of known heterosexual actors as drag queens. More recently, there has been an increase in popular interest in cross-cultural experiences of drag, as in the 2003 Hindi film The Pink Mirror (Gulabi Aaina). The film was refused certification in India, where homosexuality remains taboo, but it attracted large and widespread international audiences.

Activism

Along with its theatrical significance for both gay and straight audiences, drag has a strong activist history as well. José Sarria, who performed in drag in San Francisco nightclubs from the 1940s, spearheaded legal defense campaigns for homosexuals and cross-dressers, ran for county supervisor in 1961, and helped found the Society for Individual Rights (SIR) in 1963. The Stonewall riots of June 1969, often cited as the flashpoint of the gay liberation movement, erupted in reaction to ongoing police harassment at the Stonewall Inn, a drag bar in New York’s Greenwich Village. In San Francisco, Sarria encouraged the wearing of badges with the words “I Am a Boy” to prove that dressers had no intent to deceive. In 1970 in New York City, Sylvia Rivera, whom some have credited with initiating the Stonewall riots, and activist Marsha P. Johnson, founded Street Transvestite Action Revolutionaries (STAR), an organization that combined the founders’ alternative-sex lifestyles with helping young people on the streets.

Beginning in the late 1960s, the wearing of drag began to be explicitly politicized by exponents of radical drag and identified by the theoretical label “genderfuck.” Countercultural wearers of radical drag did not attempt to mimic femininity, seeking instead to confuse and refuse gender divisions. Thus, imagery from either sex might be combined in startling ways, such as a man with a beard wearing a cocktail dress, with no attempt to conceal or transform his masculinity.

The San Francisco–based communal activists The Cockettes combined grassroots activism with flamboyant drag and performance. One of their number, Sylvester, left the collective in 1973 and went on to mainstream musical success as a disco performer. His clothing continued to challenge traditional masculine roles, however, and encouraged a particular camp and drag aesthetic in disco culture.

The mid-1970s brought a reaction against what were seen as the excesses of the gay liberation movement. Along with legal restrictions on the wearing of drag, drag aesthetics and drag activism came under attack from within the lesbian and gay community itself. Reformist homosexual groups from the 1960s on have sought to distance themselves from drag, seeing it as confusing homosexuality with transgender or transvestism and as undermining a normalizing model of homosexuality. Some feminists also have suggested that drag celebrates stereotypical images of women, whereas defenders of drag have argued that, in denaturalizing femininity, drag undermines rigid patriarchal roles for both men and women.

At the same time as the women’s and gay liberation movements of the early 1970s encouraged challenges to dominant male roles, the impact of a drag aesthetic was seen in the androgynous performance style of acts such as those of David Bowie, the New York Dolls, and Marc Bolan, and in the lyrics of the Kinks's song "Lola" (1970), "She walks like a woman but talks like a man."

Lucy Robinson

See also: Reed, Lou; Transvestites; Waters, John.

Further Reading

Bullough, Vern L., ed. Before Stonewall: Activists for Gay and Lesbian Rights in Historical Context. New York: Harrington Park, 2002.

Chermayeff, Catherine, Jonathan David, and Nan Richardson. Drag Diaries. San Francisco: Chronicle, 1995.

Fausto-Sterling, Anne. Sexing the Body: Gender Politics and the Construction of Sexuality. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Fleisher, Julian. The Drag Queens of New York: An Illustrated Field Guide. New York: Riverhead, 1996.

Munt, Sally. "The Personal, Experience, and the Self." In Out in Culture: Gay, Lesbian, and Queer Essays on Popular Culture, ed. Corey K. Creekmur and Alexander Doty. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1995.

Senelick, Laurence. The Changing Room: Sex, Drag, and Theatre. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Drifters

Drifters and vagrants have played a vital role in the course of American history while resisting the norms of society and forming a variety of distinctive subcultures. The early trappers and traders who pioneered the frontier lands made it possible for stable communities to develop, and traveling salesmen were as much a source of news to rural settlements as the postman was. The hobo lifestyle that first developed in the nineteenth century with the advent of the railroad proved to be a particularly vital and long-lived subculture. Both the end of the American Civil War and the Great Depression of the 1930s led to surges in the population of men riding the rails, or freight-hopping.

As many as 1 million people—mostly men—illegally rode the freight trains, dodging the hired security of railway companies and living hand to mouth. Some of these drifters were recently arrived immigrants, others were simply men out of work for one reason or another. The general perception of the public was that "hoboes" had more self-respect and were less given to violent crime than "tramps," but there is no clear delineation between the terms; both were used as self-identification labels by the wandering homeless. The novelist Jack London, poet Carl Sandburg, and folk singer Woody Guthrie, among others, all hoboed and drew on the experience in their work.

The hobo subculture was unique and pervasive, with its own slang (newspapers were called "California blankets," for example, and "crumbs on your clothes" meant you had lice), cuisine (mulligan stew was probably inspired by the hearty burgoo of Kentucky), and writing system. Hobo code was a system of signs that could be carved or written in chalk or charcoal to let others know about mean dogs, nearby doctors who would help the homeless, and other dangers and benefits. Although the code varied somewhat by region, its development despite the lack of a central disseminating vehicle demonstrates the intelligence and ingenuity of the individuals who had chosen to leave "proper" society behind for this new shadow society. Just as remarkable is the hobo nickel, a form of art especially prominent in the nineteenth century, in which five-cent pieces were smoothed out and engraved with elaborate bas-relief designs that were often more elaborate than the original.

In the 1950s, the work of Jack Kerouac and other writers of the Beat Generation cast the itinerant lifestyle in a new light. The new drifters were not men who had failed in mainstream society, but young men who had not even tried their hand in it, setting off barely after coming of age to pursue the freedom, excitement, and gritty adventure of life on the road. In the post–World War II era, as the American dream became increasingly associated with home ownership and a settled life in the suburbs, an itinerant lifestyle was the clearest step outside the mainstream. The willful abandonment of home was embraced by many of the Beats (at least temporarily) and integral to the hippie movement that succeeded it.

In later decades, transient “gutter punks” dropped out of society, usually by choice, and more and more people became perpetual travelers to take advantage of cheap transportation, to avoid taxes or military service, or to escape domestic or other situations. Many of these travelers seek a sort of personal sovereignty, taking the self-sufficiency of the early pioneers to a new level.

Bill Kte'pi

See also: Tramps and Hoboes.

Further Reading

Allsop, Kenneth. Hard Travellin': The Hobo and His History. New York: New American Library, 1967.

Williams, Clifford. One More Train to Ride: The Underground World of the Modern American Hobo. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003.

Drug Culture

Recreational drug use, both legal and illicit, is a common aspect of American life with a unique social history that has influenced, and been influenced by, various cultural changes. Although discussions of the American drug culture typically center on the psychedelic era of the 1960s, its history dates back considerably further and continues to the present day.

History

Alcohol and nicotine (in the form of tobacco) have been widely consumed from the colonial period to the present. Rum was part of the Triangle Trade, between the North American colonies, the Caribbean, and Africa, and the drink was especially abundant in supply. American colonists also brewed other alcoholic beverages for domestic use. Tobacco became a staple crop of the Virginia and Carolina colonies, and while much of it was shipped to European markets, it also was traded and used in North America.

Over the course of the next five centuries, alcohol and nicotine altered the course of social interaction in America, contributed mightily to the nation's domestic economy and foreign trade, and gave rise to the concomitant problems of habituation and addiction among millions of people. Youth, in particular, have often turned to such drugs as a means and symbol of rebellion, as a statement of maturity, and for social acceptance among peers.

They have been closely associated with a variety of counterculture movements and subcultures, and the essential element of others.

Law enforcement agencies at all levels, as well as antisaloon and anticigarette leagues in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, have attempted to control the problems associated with the use of these substances. Prohibition, the so-called noble experiment that outlawed the manufacture, sale, and consumption of alcohol, began in 1920 and was met with great resistance from many Americans. In the face of the enormous black market that had sprung up, with heavy involvement by organized crime syndicates, and concerns over a real or imagined “crime wave” during the gangster period, the futility of the policy was realized and Prohibition ended in 1933. Attempts at controlling tobacco had a similar fate, if not at the federal level. In 1921, several states enacted cigarette prohibition laws, the last of which was repealed six years later.

In the mid-nineteenth century, another drug that developed its own cultural milieu was opium. America’s first exotic, nonindigenous drug, opium was brought to the United States by Chinese immigrants who worked on the transcontinental rail system in the West. Many medications and palliatives, legal at the time, were prescribed by physicians who were unaware of their addictive potential. Some patent medicines and potions called “elixirs,” which claimed miraculous powers, were opium-based, without the knowledge of the doctor or the patient. And when morphine and later heroin were extracted from opium and were given to soldiers to alleviate pain associated with war injuries, some members of these users became addicts and abusers. Morphine was used to stop alcohol addiction, until enough medical evidence was discovered about its own addictive properties. And by the late 1800s, an untold number of American women had become quietly addicted to opiates, frequently prescribed for so-called female problems.

Another drug thought to be a panacea for physical maladies during the nineteenth century was cocaine. At midcentury, doctors experimenting with the drug were amazed by its potential to alleviate stress and fatigue, as a local anesthetic, and as a cure for morphine addiction. Among the most famous users of cocaine during this period was the founder of psychoanalysis, Sigmund Freud, who used the drug until he became aware of its serious side effects. Cocaine also found its way into the country’s most popular drink, Coca-Cola, until legislation was passed to limit the drug’s use. The Pure Food and Drug Act of 1906 required that all products containing tonics must list the ingredients; the Harrison Narcotic Act of 1914, which regulated the production and distribution of opiate drugs, included restrictions on the cocaine additive in soft drinks and other consumer products.

The alcohol prohibition movement of the early twentieth century brought about an increase in the use of another drug—marijuana. Cannabis sativa had been cultivated and used since colonial times, primarily for the fiber derived from hemp. In the 1920s, marijuana use became a growing concern in many cities, as jazz musicians, artists, writers, migrant farmworkers, and thrill-seeking inner-city dwellers began using it for recreational purposes. Alarm over the glamorization and spread of marijuana use was reflected in the 1936 film Reefer Madness, which warned the nation’s teenagers of the dangers of the drug in highly sensationalized—and inaccurate—terms.

Postwar Era

In the 1950s and into the early 1960s, the beatniks—politically and social aware young people who found expression of their beliefs in music, art, and poetry—integrated marijuana and other drugs, which were by this time illegal, into their lifestyle. Beat writers such as Jack Kerouac, William S. Burroughs, and Allen Ginsberg became the voice of the generation and introduced many readers to this new lifestyle. Kerouac’s iconic novel On the Road (1957) contains numerous references to the use of drugs, especially marijuana, while echoing the feelings of alienation and thrill seeking among America’s youth. Beatniks smoked “grass” and met in coffeehouses to share poetry, music, and critiques of a society they regarded as overly materialistic and conformist.

The changes in American society and culture during the 1960s were so pronounced that many academics and other commentators described the period as one of social revolution. The political and social transformations, accentuated by changes in popular culture, produced an ethos that differed markedly from that of the previous generation. Highlighted by civil rights demonstrations, free speech demonstrations, antiwar protests, race riots, and a sweeping rejection of many aspects of the mainstream “establishment,” the period of the mid-to late 1960s produced a counterculture of predominantly middle-class youth alienated by what they considered an overly conservative, oppressive society. Much was written and said about the “generation gap” between young people and their parents. The countercultural expressions of the younger generation, with its long hair, loud music, unorthodox dress, and liberal attitudes toward sexuality, deepened and widened the political chasm over the Vietnam War. Drugs were at the heart of it.

It was in the middle part of the decade that two professors at Harvard University called on American youth to “Turn on, tune in, drop out”—that is, to use hallucinogenic drugs, revel in the heightened state of awareness, and leave the rat race of conventional society. Professor Timothy Leary, who became the primary advocate for lysergic acid diethylamide (LSD), and colleague Richard Alpert, who later changed his name to Ram Dass, promoted the use of the hallucinogen, commonly called “acid,” to experience greater understanding of self and of the universe.

The psychedelic effects of the drug had a sweeping influence on the youth counterculture, beginning with music. A new genre called “acid rock” was made famous by bands in the San Francisco Bay Area such as the Grateful Dead, Jefferson Airplane, and Janis Joplin’s Big Brother and the Holding Company. Indeed, the Bay Area was the hotbed of hippie activity, and San Francisco’s Haight-Ashbury district (also referred to as “Hashbury”) became the counterculture epicenter. So populated with young runaways, dropouts, and free-spirited “hipsters” was the neighborhood that bus companies from downtown San Francisco gave visitors what was billed as America’s “only foreign tour.”

This drug culture of the 1960s took root during the Summer of Love in San Francisco in 1967, when “flower children” from across the country met for a summer of marijuana and LSD use, free love, and rock music. The hippies also advocated peace, especially as the war in Vietnam continued to claim the lives of other young people, many of whom were drafted into military service. Antiwar sentiment intensified, with protests becoming larger and more widespread. When protestors clashed with police at the 1968 Democratic Party National Convention in Chicago, the violence was captured on film for television audiences. The older generation was appalled to see young people behaving in such a manner; the younger generation was outraged at the handling of the situation by the establishment.

In August 1969, the Woodstock music festival in Bethel, New York, brought together hippies from all around the country—over 400,000 in all—for three days of counterculture music, drug use, and open sexuality. For an assembly of so many people, and so many drugs, the event was remarkably peaceful and safe. It seemed for a while that the hippie movement, with its accompanying drug culture, would continue to grow. That December, however, another music happening—the Altamont Free Concert in California—was by all accounts a disaster. Violence was rampant, including the fatal stabbing of a spectator by a member of the Hells Angels motorcycle gang hired for security.

The 1960s drug culture was relatively short-lived, though the use of drugs did not cease. Like other elements of the hippie counterculture, drugs simply became incorporated into the mainstream. The 1970s was a period of even greater substance abuse, in fact, but not associated with a particular counterculture movement. The disco trend of the mid-to late 1970s, with its unique dance music, new style of dress, use of powdered cocaine, and emergence of homosexual nightclubs, was not viewed as a countercultural phenomenon per se. Legislation against illicit drugs continued to be enacted during the decade, and many drug treatment programs were created. Drug use hardly waned, but much of the novelty and glamour did.

The late 1980s and 1990s gave rise to a bona fide new drug culture. The “rave culture,” as it was called, was born in Western Europe but quickly caught on in the United States. Attendance at a “rave,” or “clubbing,” typically consisted of dancing to loud, pulsating music at an underground location (such as a rented dance club, empty store, or abandoned strip mall) and the use of a new suite of “club drugs.” To maintain their stamina at such events, which could last an entire weekend, ravers resorted to the use of synthetic MDMA (more commonly known as ecstasy); GHB (called “G” or liquid ecstasy); ketamine (“Special K” or “Vitamin K”); Rohypnol (“roofies,” or the “date rape drug”); or the hallucinogens LSD and psilocybin (“mushrooms”). The raves replaced live bands with disc jockey–led, computer-generated sounds known as “techno music”— also referred to as “house,” “acid-house,” “jungle,” “trance,” or “ambient” music—typically played in synch with strobe lighting. Ravers often used pacifiers or lollipops to avoid the jaw clenching and teeth grinding that often accompanies the use of ecstasy; the pacifiers became a fashion statement for ravers.

Meanwhile, the 1990s also saw a rise in the use of heroin and a new fashion ideal associated with it—the “heroin chic” look. Gaunt, waiflike, pale, dark-eyed models wearing ragged clothes in advertisements set the trend.

Leonard A. Steverson

See also: Amphetamines and Speed Freaks: Cocaine: Ecstasy: Heroin: Marijuana.

Further Reading

Dudley, William, ed. The 1960s. San Diego, CA: Greenhaven, 2000.

Hickman, Timothy A. “Heroin Chic: The Visual Culture of Narcotic Addiction.” Third Text 16:2(2002): 119–36.

Lattin, Don. The Harvard Psychedelic Club: How Timothy Leary, Ram Dass, Huston Smith, and Andrew Weil Killed the Fifties and Ushered in a New Age for America. HarperCollins, 2010.

Mandel, Jerry, and Harvey W. Feldman. “The Social History of Teenage Drug Use.” In Teen Drug Use, ed. George Beschner and Alfred S. Friedman. Lexington, MA: Lexington, 1986.

McWilliams, John C. The 1960s Cultural Revolution. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2000.

Ram Dass, Baba, and Ralph Metzner. Birth of a Psychedelic Culture: Conversations about Leary, the Harvard Experiments, Millbrook and the Sixties. Santa Fe, NM: Synergetic, 2010.

Spann, Edward K. Democracy’s Children: The Young Rebels of the 1960s and the Power of Ideals. Wilmington, DE: Scholarly Resources, 2003.

Du Bois, W.E.B. (1868–1963)

A writer, publisher, scholar, and founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), William Edward Burghardt (W.E.B.) Du Bois inaugurated the modern civil rights movement, began the systematic development of black studies, was a catalyst in the development of the Pan-African movement, and was one of the most influential historians in late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century America. An advocate of rule by progressive ruling elites, he never quite transcended his theory of “the talented tenth” in African American politics: the idea that progress for the black community would come through the leadership of its most educated members.

Born on February 23, 1868, in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, Du Bois was a mulatto of African and French descent. For much of his career, he maintained an ambiguous relationship with the working class. He saw social revolution as undesirable and destructive, but he also saw merit in aspects of state planning by Russia, China, Scandinavia, and New Deal America. In addition, his historical scholarship and literary endeavors, often distinguished by uncommon creativity and rigor, were almost always touched by a utopian quality.

Du Bois's view of history was remarkable for a method that highlighted the capacity of African Americans to take control of their own destiny. Although his political activities tended toward lobbying for reform and equal rights under the law, his legacy is in many respects more radical. Du Bois fought not only for civil rights for African Americans and independence from colonialism for Africans, but also for the democratization of American and Western civilization as well.

Du Bois articulated, far ahead of their time, ideas that later became staples of democratic thought and racial justice. His Philadelphia Negro: A Social Study (1899) exposed racial segregation, poverty, and moral crisis in the inner city. The Souls of Black Folk (1903) posits in classical terms "the double consciousness" of African Americans, foreshadowing debates about integration and ethnic nationalism that developed later in the twentieth century. Similarly, Dark Princess (1928), a fictional account of a romance uniting Afro-Asian intellectuals in an international conspiracy for freedom, anticipates the idea of the Third World.

Du Bois's Black Reconstruction—written in 1935 about events that took place in America from 1868 to 1888—illuminates a clash between the black and white working classes. In this historical account, "free labor" is defined not as workers liberated from bosses who behaved abusively, nor as an enlarged concept of citizenship to which all could aspire. Instead, white laborers identify themselves as "free" to distinguish themselves from the enslaved and subordinated workers of color. Black Reconstruction is thus a seminal work of the American counterculture, engendering the white-privilege theories of the 1960s (exemplified in the Black Power movement).

Du Bois spent most of his life as an elite intellectual who identified with the dilemmas and biography of the black community. He believed the majority needed moral uplift by personal example, and that his professional training and achievements as a Harvard-educated teacher and author illustrated the potential of the community as a whole, if blacks were given equal opportunities.

In The Souls of Black Folk, Du Bois makes his famous critique of Booker T. Washington and defends the civil rights of the black community. Although the book generally was perceived as militant, Du Bois's political credentials would be questioned many times over the decades by black insurgents. For example, in the Niagara Movement, the forerunner of the NAACP, Ida B. Wells and William Monroe Trotter challenged Du Bois on his willingness to advocate direct action and armed self-defense (even as he organized antilynching crusades).

In the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s, leftists such as Cyril Briggs and George Padmore believed Du Bois was insufficiently opposed to capitalism. Marcus Garvey, the rising black nationalist and advocate of entrepreneurship, disagreed with Du Bois's brand of Pan-Africanism, which focused on lobbying and educating imperial governments rather than building a mass movement. During the same period, as expressed in his editorial perspectives in The Crisis, the journal of the NAACP, literary figures such as Claude McKay advocated free sexual lifestyles for urban working-class African Americans, much to Du Bois's dissatisfaction.

In 1934, Du Bois came into conflict with other NAACP leaders for promoting, in the pages of the group's journal, The Crisis, provisional urban survival programs. With an emphasis on economic cooperatives rooted in black autonomy, the programs were criticized for eschewing social integration. The controversy led to his resignation as editor of The Crisis.

After retiring from Atlanta University in 1944, however, Du Bois again assumed a prominent role in the NAACP, focusing on anticolonial education. A catalyst of the Pan-African congresses, he participated as the elder patron of the fifth Pan-African Congress in Manchester, England, in 1945. Du Bois became increasingly critical of the Western Powers' unwillingness to relinquish the jewels of their African empires. In 1948, he broke with the NAACP for the last time, in conflict with Walter White, who was by that time the organization's leader.

In 1949 and 1950, Du Bois joined with Paul Robeson, Alphaeus Hunton, and their Council on African Affairs to challenge U.S. foreign policy toward colonized nations. As an advocate of world peace and opponent of nuclear weapons during the cold war, he had his passport seized, was put on trial as an agent of a foreign power, and became a prime target of McCarthyism in 1951.

After having his passport reinstated in 1961, Du Bois joined the Communist Party to protest the repression of his civil liberties. Two years later, at age 95, he became a citizen of the West African nation of Ghana. He died there on August 27, 1963, one day before the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, at which Martin Luther King, Jr., gave his “I Have a Dream” speech.

Matthew Quest

See also: African Americans; Garvey; Marcus; Harlem Renaissance; McCarthyism.

Further Reading

Foner, Philip S., ed. W.E.B. Du Bois Speaks. 2 vols. New York: Pathfinder, 1970.

Horne, Gerald. Black and Red: W.E.B. Du Bois and the Afro-American Response to the Cold War, 1944–1963. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1986.

Lewis, David Levering. W.E.B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Art and Imagination of W.E.B. Du Bois. New York: Schocken, 1990.

Reed, Adolph. W.E.B. Du Bois and American Political Thought: Fabianism and the Color Line. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Dyer, Mary (ca. 1611–1660)

The early Quaker martyr Mary Dyer was one of the so-called Antinomians exiled from Boston with the English religious dissenter Anne Hutchinson in 1637. She was excommunicated by the Boston Puritan Church, which considered her religious views—that trust in God is more important than obedience to church-given law, that individuals can communicate directly with God, and that salvation can be assured without the assistance of a minister—heretical.

Born Mary Barrett in England in about 1611, she married Puritan merchant William Dyer in London in 1633, and the couple emigrated to Massachusetts in 1635. After settling in Boston, Dyer became attracted to the ideas of Hutchinson.

Dyer was prominent among Hutchinson’s followers for accounts of a dead and deformed infant, or “monster,” she had borne. The Puritan leader who led the attack on the Antinomians, John Winthrop, interpreted Dyer’s deformed infant as divine punishment for her “monstrous” opinions. He published his view of the events in England as “A Short Story of the Rise, Raigne and Ruine of the Antinomians, Familists, and Libertines that Infected the Churches of New-England.” Like many other religious exiles from Massachusetts, the Dyers settled in Rhode Island, where religious liberty was practiced and where William Dyer held positions of authority.

On an extended visit to England, from 1652 to 1657, Mary Dyer converted to a new religious movement called the Society of Friends, or Quakers. As one of the few Christian sects of the time to encourage women to be missionaries, the Quakers encouraged Dyer to return to America when Puritan persecution of Quakers there was at its height.

On landing in Boston, Dyer was briefly imprisoned. She was released when her husband, who had not become a Quaker, paid a heavy bond to guarantee that she would leave Massachusetts without spreading her opinions.

In the summer of 1659, Dyer returned to Boston to visit imprisoned Quakers, and again she was arrested and jailed. Banished in September, she returned once again in October to visit another imprisoned heretic. Along with two male Quakers, William Robinson and Marmaduke Stevenson, Dyer was led to the gallows in Boston on October 27, 1659.

At the last minute, with the rope around her neck, Dyer was reprieved on condition that she go back to Rhode Island and never return to Massachusetts. Led by Governor John Endicott, a stern opponent of Quakerism, the Massachusetts authorities were influenced in their mercy by the intervention of two other colonial governors, Thomas Temple of Nova Scotia and Acadia, and, ironically, John Winthrop, Jr., of Connecticut, the son of Dyer's persecutor in the Antinomian case.

In the late spring of 1660, Dyer returned to Boston. Soon arrested by Massachusetts authorities, she would not refute her beliefs and was hanged on Boston Common on June 1, 1660. Shortly thereafter, the colony was forced by the English government to abandon the death penalty for Quakers.

William E. Burns

See also: Antinomianism; Hutchinson, Anne.

Further Reading

Plimpton, Ruth Talbot. Mary Dyer: Biography of a Rebel Quaker. Boston: Branden, 1994.

Worrall, Arthur J. Quakers in the Colonial Northeast. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1980.

Dylan, Bob (1941–)

Widely referred to as the poet laureate of rock and roll, Bob Dylan's songwriting, performances, and social and political persona make him one of the most prominent pop-culture figures of the second half of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first. His fusion of traditional, blues-based music and poetic lyrics (sometimes searing, sometimes mystical, sometimes poignant), his strident voice on behalf of the civil rights and antiwar movements of the 1960s, his tectonic shifts in religious beliefs, and his inscrutable public persona all have placed him—inevitably and perhaps eternally—at the epicenter of his generation's counterculture.

Early Years

Robert Allen Zimmerman was born on May 24, 1941, in Duluth, Minnesota, and grew up in nearby Hibbing. He taught himself to play the guitar, harmonica, and piano, and headed east in 1961 to perform in New York City and visit his ailing idol, Woody Guthrie, in the hospital.

Taking the name Bob Dylan, after the poet Dylan Thomas, he began performing at small clubs in New York's Greenwich Village and came to the attention of Columbia Records producer John Hammond. Dylan burst onto the folk music scene like a thunderbolt. His voice—at times reedy, shrill, and adenoidal, at other times powerful, evocative, and dramatic—was like that of no other popular singer. His early songs drew on a variety of standard sources, including traditional American music, African American blues, and Appalachian folk tunes.

Dylan rose to fame, however, with a series of overtly political songs on timely themes: civil rights in “Blowin’ in the Wind”; the youth revolution in “The Times They Are A-Changin’”; and the antiwar movement in “Masters of War.” He also focused on individual cases that demonstrated the corruption of the American legal system and the military establishment, as in the songs “The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll” and “John Brown.”

By the summer of 1963, Dylan's role as a musical activist earned him a place onstage at the 1963 March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, along with Odetta, Joan Baez, and Peter, Paul and Mary. He sang an antiwar song (“With God on Our Side”) and a song about the civil rights martyr Medgar Evers (“Only a Pawn in Their Game”).

His first albums were primarily solo acts: Dylan singing, playing the guitar, and playing the harmonica. Even in this spare context, however, he quickly expanded his oeuvre, creating a psychedelic panorama replete with multitextured, apparently drug-inspired images, with lyrics that seemed to draw on the French poet Arthur Rimbaud as much as on Guthrie (as in “A Hard Rain’s A-Gonna Fall,” “Chimes of Freedom,” and “Gates of Eden”).

Then, in the summer of 1965, Dylan stunned the musical world by taking the stage at the Newport Folk Festival in Rhode Island with an electric guitar and a standard rock ensemble and launching into a snarling rendition of “Maggie’s Farm” (not coincidentally a song about emancipation). He had appeared at the Newport festival with his acoustic guitar the previous two years. Dylan’s decision to “go electric” was simultaneously reviled by folk purists as heresy and embraced by others as a brilliant fusion of folk and rock and the inevitable next step in the revolutionary spiral of American popular music.

Widely known as a folk singer and writer of protest songs, Bob Dylan performs at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival, where he was booed for using an electric guitar. More than forty years later, Dylan has continued to resist labels and surprise audiences. (Andrew DeLory/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The tension between Dylan's traditional fans and those who supported his use of electric guitars and apparent embrace of what was called “the rock culture” culminated in a now-famous exchange between Dylan and an audience member at a concert in Manchester, England. When a fan called him a Judas, Dylan shot back, “I don’t believe you. You’re a liar!” and told his band to play louder.

In 1966, Dylan released his signature work of the rock era, Blonde on Blonde. The first double-disc rock album ever produced, Blonde on Blonde was a musical tour, ranging from the raucous “Rainy Day Women Numbers 12 and 35” (with the anthemic refrain, “Everybody must get stoned”), to the haunting and allegoric “Visions of Johanna” and the picaresque, nearly phantasmagoric “Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands” (which unprecedentedly took up the entire fourth side of the album).

By this time, psychedelic music dominated the popular charts, and it would have been reasonable to expect that Dylan would continue down this road in subsequent albums. Startlingly, he chose not to. His two albums of the late 1960s—John Wesley Harding (1967) and Nashville Skyline (1969)—are spare, minimalistically arranged, country-tinged records, reflecting none of the 1960s ambiance of Blonde on Blonde. One of the songs on John Wesley Harding, “All Along the Watchtower,” achieved independent fame through Jimi Hendrix’s incendiary, near-apocalyptic cover version.

Tumultuous Career

A motorcycle accident in 1966 kept Dylan from touring until 1974. At that time, he reunited with The Band, the group (originally appearing as The Hawks) that had backed him for many of the early electric concerts.

The following year, he released Blood on the Tracks, the album that many Dylan fans consider his greatest single achievement. It is an intensely personal album, about lost love, regret, and the fragmentation of relationships. Songs on the record range from the introspective “Tangled Up in Blue” (“All the people we used to know/They’re an illusion to me now”) to the breakup-as-political-metaphor imagery of “Idiot Wind” (“I been double-crossed now for the very last time and now I’m finally free/I kissed good-bye the howling beast on the borderline which separated you from me”).

Dylan returned to the overtly political soon thereafter, in the context of the Rubin “Hurricane” Carter case. A prominent prizefighter, Carter had been convicted of homicide in a trial that had attracted national attention because of both the fame of the defendant and the allegations of improper police practices and racial bias. Dylan took up Carter’s cause and wrote “Hurricane,” an angry song about the politics of the trial:

*Here comes the story of the Hurricane
The man the authorities came to blame
For somethin' that he never done
Put in a prison cell, but one time he could-a been
The champion of the world.
To see him obviously framed Couldn't help but make me feel ashamed to live in a land
Where justice is a game.*

“Hurricane” became the fulcrum of Dylan’s legendary Rolling Thunder tour, in which, along with a rotating array of guest artists, he performed nightly across the nation. Musically, the Rolling Thunder tour took on added significance, as Dylan began a pattern that continues to this day: the art of constantly reconstructing and reconstituting songs, altering tempi, phrasing, structure, and chords and lyrics.

Within a few years of the release of Desire (1976), Dylan changed his personal direction once again, and dramatically. Having been born Jewish and raised in a traditional Jewish household, he had roots in the faith that were both religious and cultural. He had been bar mitzvahed, and in his one year at the University of Minnesota he had lived at a Jewish fraternity house. Desire, the album on which “Hurricane” was first released, also included music that contained echoes of the Eastern European synagogue liturgy, such as “One More Cup of Coffee (Valley Below).”

In 1979, however, Dylan renounced Judaism and proclaimed himself a born-again Christian. Over the next several years, his albums—especially Slow Train Coming (1979) and Saved (1980)—were overtly religious. This is seen in their lyrics, as in these lines from “In the Garden”: “When they came for Him in the garden, did they know?/Did they know He was the Son of God, did they know that He was Lord?” and in their gospel-influenced music (“Gotta Serve Somebody”).

During the early 1980s, Dylan abandoned Christianity, erasing any doubts about the renunciation with the release, on the 1985 Empire Burlesque album, of “Seeing the Real You at Last.” During this period, Dylan continued to compose regularly but, inexplicably, declined to release some of the strongest songs of his career (such as “Blind Willie McTell”) on any commercially available album. Generally, however, the mid-to late 1980s were not fertile years for Dylan, and most of his albums from that period have vanished from the public’s consciousness. One exception is Oh Mercy, which was released in 1989.

In 1992, musicians from all popular genres—rock, folk, country, soul, and alternative—traveled to New York City’s Madison Square Garden to pay homage to Dylan in a thirtieth-anniversary concert that produced some of the most dramatic Dylan covers to date (including Neil Young’s “Just Like Tom Thumb’s Blues” and Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers’ “License to Kill”) and featured a rare appearance by Al Kooper, the organ player whose distinctive style helped energize Dylan’s original recording of “Like a Rolling Stone.”

Soon after the tribute concert, Dylan reorganized his road band, and his “never-ending tour” has continued to this day. While each tour features a few core songs that are repeated nearly nightly, Dylan’s set lists are never duplicated, and his song selections range from predictable oldies, to gospel and bluegrass covers, to rarities from his own songbook that leave audiences gasping. An example of the latter was his performance in New York City in 2002 of “Yea! Heavy and a Bottle of Bread,” a song released on The Basement Tapes in 1975 and never previously performed live.

Return

The period beginning in the late 1990s has been extraordinarily creative for Dylan. His 1997 CD, Time Out of Mind, looks at life from the world-weary perspective of a man in late middle age confronting mortality (a perspective jolted by a case of histoplasmosis, a potentially fatal disease that causes swelling of the sac that surrounds the heart). Songs from this CD such as “Not Dark Yet” and “Love Sick” show a side of Dylan rarely before seen: poignant, reflective, mature, and contemplative.

Over the next several years, Dylan won an Academy Award for Best Original Song for a Movie (“Things Have Changed” from the 2000 film Wonder Boys) and released Love and Theft—which he called “an electronic grid” of “variations on the 12-bar theme and blues-based melodies”—that won the 2002 Grammy Award for Best Contemporary Folk Album. In addition, Dylan has made public some of the most famous historical artifacts of his musical career: recordings of the Manchester concert (Live 1966, released in 1998); a Rolling Thunder concert (Live 1975, released in 2002), and the legendary Philharmonic Hall concert (Live 1964, released in 2004). In 2006, he released the critically acclaimed Modern Times CD and became the oldest living artist to enter the Billboard record-sales charts with the best-selling album of the week; Modern Times was later chosen as Billboard’s best album of the year. Together Through Life (2009), likewise well reviewed, rose to the top spot on the U.S. Billboard the week it was released. And later that year, Dylan surprised his fans yet again by releasing a collection of Christmas standards (and not-so-standards) called Christmas in the Heart.

Bob Dylan’s never-ending tour continues, spanning the world. His nightly introduction inevitably includes the phrase “the voice of the promise of the 1960s counterculture.” He continues to puzzle, perplex, and challenge listeners, forever reconstructing himself and his band (changing musicians, instruments, and instrumentation). Nearly forty years after Dylan’s self-description in “My Back Pages” (“I was so much older then/I’m younger than that now”), he remains “Forever Young.”

See also: Baez, Joan; Folk Music; Newport Folk Festival; Rock and Roll.

Further Reading

Bob Dylan. <http://www.bobdylan.com>

Dylan, Bob. Chronicles. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2004.

Johnson, Tracy, ed. Encounters with Bob Dylan. Daly City, CA: Humble Press, 2000.

Marcus, Griel. Like a Rolling Stone: Bob Dylan at the Crossroads. New York: PublicAffairs, 2005.

Marcus, Griel. The Old, Weird America: The World of Bob Dylan's Basement Tapes. New York: Picador, 2001.

Riley, Tim. Hard Rain: A Dylan Commentary. New York: Da Capo, 1999.

Shelton, Robert. No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan. New York: Ballantine, 1987.

East Village, New York City

The East Village in New York City—the neighborhood in lower Manhattan east of Greenwich Village, north of the Lower East Side, and south of Fourteenth Street—has been home to a succession of countercultural groups and movements since the end of World War II. Originally considered part of the Lower East Side, the East Village gained a distinctive character when artists and writers of the Beat Generation migrated into the streets east of Lafayette and Fourth Avenue, south of Fourteenth Street, and north of Houston Street.

As “beatnik” artists and writers began to descend upon New York City in the 1950s and populate the West Village, many decided to move east in search of more affordable living and a more invigorating sense of freedom and disorder, outside the postwar cultural mainstream. The East Village, with its feeling of separateness, soon became a popular destination. Writers such as Jack Kerouac and Frank O’Hara could be spotted in the many ethnic restaurants and bars in the area. Abstract expressionist artists such as Willem de Kooning, Jackson Pollock, and Franz Kline displayed their work in its studios and storefronts. Musicians such as jazz saxophonist Sonny Rollins played in the numerous clubs throughout the neighborhood.

The 1960s brought the influx of a new group and new counterculture: hippies. So extensive and distinctive was the transformation that the media came to recognize the neighborhood as a center of the counterculture movement. It was at this time, in fact, that the neighborhood came to acquire the name East Village. St. Mark’s Place became the center of hippie activity, full of people reciting poems, singing songs, and organizing protests. Shops in the area sold beads, drug paraphernalia, and secondhand clothing. Experimental theaters became prevalent. And pop artist Andy Warhol opened an experimental club on St. Mark’s Place showcasing the rock band Velvet Underground.

By the end of 1967, the hippie movement in the East Village was beginning to wind down. That October, a hippie couple had been murdered in their East Village apartment, and the sense of peace and tranquility associated with the area dissipated into fear of urban violence. As hippies moved out of the city to the countryside, the singing and poetry reading stopped, and the head shops and alternative theaters closed down. The East Village became known as a violent and seedy neighborhood.

The year 1971 marked the symbolic end of the hippie era as the popular Fillmore East, the longtime mecca of East Coast rock music, closed its doors. Frank Zappa, John Lennon, and Yoko Ono performed on the final night.

The image—and reality—of decay characterized the East Village for the remainder of the 1970s. Indeed it came to symbolize the economic decline of New York City as a whole. Amid the chaos and decline, however, a new counterculture emerged that centered on these very aspects of urban degradation. By the end of the decade, the East Village had become a haven for the punk movement in America. Focusing on social decay and rituals of violence, punkers brought their music, style, and culture of rebelliousness to the nightclubs of the East Village.

Perhaps the most popular club of the punk movement was CBGB, located in the crime-riddled area at Bleecker Street and the Bowery. Crowds lined up among prostitutes and drug dealers outside the club to hear such seminal punk rock acts as the Ramones, Patti Smith, and the Talking Heads.

By the early 1980s, New York City was beginning to recover from its fiscal crisis, and the East Village slowly shed its negative reputation. Artists of all kinds flocked to the area, and the commercial art scene prospered. By 1984, more than seventy commercial galleries were operating in the neighborhood, and popular artists, including Jean-Michel Basquiat, socialized in the East Village scene.

Once again the neighborhood's reputation was transformed. It was now known as a trendy art district. Although many of the galleries closed down by the end of the decade, the infusion of culture attracted yet another counterculture—gay people. An influx of younger and more radical gays men and lesbians brought a proliferation of gay clubs, bars, and coffee shops.

The countercultural image of the East Village remained largely intact even with the sweeping redevelopment of the 1990s. New apartment buildings were built, and the upper middle class settled in. The neighborhood came to be viewed as an alternative to Soho and Greenwich Village, two of the trendiest areas in Manhattan. Parks and other public spaces were cleaned up, and many areas that had promoted public expressions of the counterculture—in whatever form—were vacated.

The East Village today is a thriving neighborhood in which artists and writers share space with students and more mainstream residents. The countercultures that shaped the East Village in the second half of the twentieth century are still evident in the colorful coffee shops, bars, clubs, and stores that dominate the area, as well as many of the people who still call the neighborhood home.

Gavin J. Wilk

See also: Beat Generation: CBGB: Greenwich Village, New York City: Hippies.

Further Reading

Caldwell, Mark. New York Night: The Mystique and Its History. New York: Scribner's, 2005.

Homberger, Eric. New York City: A Cultural and Literary Companion. New York: Interlink, 2003.

Mele, Christopher. Selling the Lower East Side: Culture, Real Estate, and Resistance in New York City. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2000.

Pye, Michael. Maximum City: The Biography of New York. London: Sinclair-Stevenson, 1991.

Eastman, Max (1883–1969), and Crystal Eastman (1881–1928)

The radical editor and writer Max Eastman and his sister, Crystal Eastman, a lawyer and social reformer, were prominent socialists of the early twentieth century. Max was heralded for his editorial leadership of the socialist magazine The Masses, while his sister worked tirelessly in the areas of labor reform, suffrage, civil liberties, and the nascent women's movement.

Max Eastman and Crystal Eastman were born to two Congregationalist ministers of Canandaigua, New York, on January 4, 1883, and June 25, 1881, respectively. Their mother was a formidable early influence, engaging their interests in topics, such as suffrage, feminism, and psychoanalysis, that would become lifelong passions.

Crystal attended Vassar College, graduating in 1903, and obtained her master's degree in sociology at Columbia University in 1904. She nearly completed her law degree at New York University in 1907. Early that year, after graduating from Williams College, Max moved to Greenwich Village to become a writer and to be closer to his sister. Through Crystal's academic connections, Max was appointed by John Dewey as an instructor of philosophy at Columbia, where he taught for several years.

Later in 1907, Crystal joined the staff of the Russell Sage Foundation's Pittsburgh Survey, the first comprehensive study of industrial accidents in the United States. Her work on this project brought her to the attention of New York Governor Charles Evans Hughes, who, in June 1909, appointed her to the New York Employers Liability Commission, making her the state's first woman commissioner. In her work on this commission, Crystal drafted the first workers' compensation law of New York State, which would become the basis for similar laws in other states. A year later she published Work Accidents and the Law, an influential book for the labor reform movement.

In 1909, at Crystal's urging, Max formed the Men's League for Woman Suffrage. Both were married the following year, Max to Ida Rauh, and Crystal to Wallace Benedict. In 1912, Max was appointed editor of The Masses, a position he held until 1917, when the federal government forced the magazine to cease publication for its antiwar sentiments. From 1918 to 1922, Max and Crystal edited a second radical publication, The Liberator.

Crystal had moved to Milwaukee with her husband in 1911, and, in October of that year, she accepted the position of campaign manager for the ultimately unsuccessful 1912 woman suffrage referendum in Wisconsin. In the years following that defeat, Crystal became estranged from her husband, moved back to New York, and continued to work in a national campaign for suffrage and other women's rights.

When World War I broke out in Europe in 1914, Crystal focused her efforts on running the New York Woman's Peace Party and the American Union Against Militarism (AUAM). In 1917, with U.S. entry into the war, she helped found the Civil Liberties Bureau of the AUAM, which sought to defend conscientious objectors and antiwar militants. (The organization ultimately became the American Civil Liberties Union, ACLU.) On July 8, 1928, at the age of forty-six, Crystal died of nephritis, an inflammation of the kidney.

Max had spent the years 1922 to 1924 in the Soviet Union. Following that trip, he began to criticize the turn the revolution had taken under Soviet political leader Joseph Stalin. In books such as Since Lenin Died (1925), he argued that the totalitarianism of Stalin's regime threatened the future of socialism. Max allied himself with the Russian communist leader Leon Trotsky, for whom he would act as translator and literary agent throughout the 1930s.

As World War II approached, however, Max became disillusioned with socialism entirely. In the 1950s, he supported Joseph McCarthy and the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) and published a book titled Reflections on the Failure of Socialism (1955). Thus, Max Eastman moderated his political positions long before his death on March 25, 1969. The height of his influence and fame, however, had been in his role as the editor of radical socialist journals in the early twentieth century.

See also: Liberator, The; Masses, The; McCarthyism; Socialism; Suffragists.

Further Reading

Cook, Blanche Wiesen. Crystal Eastman on Women and Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Eastman, Max. Reflections on the Failure of Socialism. 1955. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1982.

Eastman, Max. Since Lenin Died. 1925. Westport, CT: Hyperion, 1973.

Stansell, Christine. American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century. New York: Henry Holt, 2000.

Easy Rider

Released in July 1969, Easy Rider quickly earned a reputation as the definitive film representation of the American counterculture of the 1960s. Directed by Dennis Hopper, and written by Hopper, Peter Fonda, and Terry Southern, the movie chronicles the mystical motorcycle journey of two buckskin-wearing “longhairs” as they cross the American Southwest on their way from Los Angeles to the Mardi Gras festival in New Orleans. Along the way, they experience the conflicting extremes of freedom and social violence, the idealism of communal living, and the emotional agony of alienation. Easy Rider presents an overall vision that epitomizes the ambiguous legacy of the 1960s.

Peter Fonda (left) and Dennis Hopper star as Captain America and Billy, respectively, in the 1969 hippie road picture Easy Rider, about two bikers who set out from Los Angeles to New Orleans in search of the “real America.” (Silver Screen Collection/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

At the beginning of the film, the two main characters—Captain America (Fonda) and Billy the Kid (Hopper)—complete a cocaine deal that will finance their trip. They symbolically throw away their watches. Before the opening credits are finished, they are riding down the highway on their custom choppers, accompanied by the pounding rhythm of Steppenwolf’s “Born to Be Wild.”

The camera pans lovingly over the sun-drenched desert and scattered cattle ranches they pass along the way. When they stop to have dinner with a rancher and his family, Captain America cannot help but express his admiration for the pastoral Western lifestyle he witnesses.

The idyll continues as the counterculture pilgrims pick up a hitchhiker—a hippie who hears the voices of dead American Indians rising from the earth—and stay for a while at the commune where he lives. The simplicity of the communal life is enchanting to Captain America, but the skittish Billy is made uneasy by the eccentricities of the resident mime troupe and by the strange hostility of the men of the camp. After a quick skinny-dip with two female members of the community, Billy and Captain America return to the open road.

The two free spirits soon join up with George Hanson, a small-town lawyer played by Jack Nicholson, and the three end up in jail together—Hanson for drunkenness and the travelers for illegally joining a marching band on parade. After their release from jail, the three head off together, with Hanson riding pillion and wearing an old football helmet.

One night around a campfire, Captain America acquaints Hanson with marijuana. Hanson regales his companions with crackpot stories about alien invaders. The next day, the three run afoul of the locals. That night, Hanson is clubbed to death in his sleep by vigilantes who view the presence of the longhairs as a threat to the purity of their daughters.

Captain America and Billy continue their ride to Mardi Gras, disillusioned by the violence they have encountered.

Upon reaching New Orleans, they pick up two prostitutes, take LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide, or acid), wander into a New Orleans cemetery, and experience a collective bad trip—a drug-induced mania filled with hallucinatory images and ravings inspired by Catholic icons in the graveyard.

As they get ready to leave New Orleans, Captain America enigmatically tells Billy, “We blew it.” Shortly thereafter, the idyll comes to a violent end. Riding down a lonely country road, the two riders are blown away with shotguns wielded by good ol’ boys passing by in a pickup truck.

With its tragic ending, moral ambiguity, and idiosyncratic personal vision, Easy Rider has been hailed by some film historians as the beginning of a new wave of creative filmmaking that would take place in the 1970s. Others see it as the symbolic end to America’s hippie counterculture and an enduring evocation of that era.

Michael Van Dyke

See also: Biker Culture: Film, Independent: Hippies: Hopper, Dennis.

Further Reading

Biskind, Peter. Easy Riders, Raging Bulls: How the Sex-Drugs-and-Rock’n’ Roll Generation Saved Hollywood. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1999.

Eckankar

Eckankar, better known as ECK, is a religious movement that stresses personal effort and personal responsibility in discovering the light and sound of God, which adherents view as the ultimate method of linking the soul with God. The name Eckankar derives from Hindi words meaning “worker with the One.” Since 1965, up to 100,000 people in the United States and around the world have sought peace and fulfillment through ECK.

Eckankar was founded by Paul Twitchell in California in 1965. Twitchell, born in 1909, had worked as a journalist and was an avid reader of occult literature. He and his wife joined the Self-Revelation Church of Absolute Monism, founded by Swami Premananda, in 1950; Twitchell was expelled for personal misconduct five years later. Twitchell also took instruction from Kirpal Singh, the founder of the Ruhani Satsang movement, and belonged to L. Ron Hubbard’s Church of Scientology (and worked as Hubbard’s press agent).

Twitchell originally established ECK as a for-profit business, later changing it to a nonprofit religious organization (thereby exempting it from federal taxes). The original headquarters were located in Las Vegas, Nevada, and later moved to Menlo Park, California, and then to Chanhassen, Minnesota, where a large temple was built.

According to Twitchell’s account, he “rediscovered” ECK in the 1960s. In his view, other religions included only parts of the true message of soul travel and self-realization, which he believed had been brought to Earth by Gakko from the city of Retz on the planet Venus. Twitchell received his instruction from two past “Living Masters,” who were no longer on this plane of existence. Twitchell was the 971st Living Master, charged with helping others discover the light and sound paths that would make them coworkers with God.

Twitchell spoke and wrote prolifically. He claimed that his teachings gathered the best and most truthful aspects of other religions. ECK drew especially upon the Sant Mat movement of northern India, although Twitchell dropped many of the specifically Indian terms that movement used. In many of his writings, including The Tiger's Fang (1967) and Far Country (1970), he directly copied passages from Sant Mat writings without attributing them.

ECK teaches that the soul is a part of God, sent to this plane of existence on a spiritual journey of discovery. It constitutes an individual's true identity; as a person advances in knowledge and realization, the soul advances to different levels of existence. The Living Master and ECK facilitate that journey. Tapping into the inner light and sound that flow from God will allow a person's soul to travel to other planes and advance in knowledge. Karma or sin accumulated by an individual will be wiped out as one's realization increases.

ECK has few moral taboos. Issues such as abortion, violence, and sexual orientation are left to the individual to address personally. Alcohol and tobacco use are discouraged, however, and drug use is considered a step backward on the spiritual journey.

A variety of rituals are practiced by adherents of ECK. Because light and sound are important, spiritual exercises are intended to help students master them. One important exercise is the singing of "HU," an ancient name for God. Followers sing it for extended periods, either alone or in groups and as part of their worship. Rituals also include ceremonies to mark the entrance of young people into ECK, the passage of adolescents into adulthood in the faith, marriage between two members, and memorial services for members who have left this plane of existence.

ECK is unique among religions in that clerics are volunteers who serve without pay. They are organized according to their spiritual level, up to the Living Master, of which there is only one. International membership meetings are held annually.

Twitchell died on September 17, 1971. Soon thereafter, his widow told ECK members that he had appeared to her in a dream and named Darwin Gross as his successor. Gross named Harold Klemp as the new Living Master of ECK in October 1981, but the two fell into dispute. Gross launched his own group, known as Ancient Teachings of the Masters (ATOM), and Klemp ordered ECK records be purged of any mention of Gross.

ECK remains very much alive in the early twenty-first century, with an estimated global membership of over 50,000 (the organization does not publish membership figures) and especially strong growth in Africa. In the early 2000s, more than 160 ECK centers were operating in the United States, with over 360 others around the world. U.S. membership is relatively stable, with some loss to breakaway groups such as the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness (MSIA).

Tim J. Watts

See also: Cults: Scientology.

Further Reading

Eckankar. <http://www.eckankar.org>

Johnson, Ford. Confessions of a God Seeker: A Journey to Higher Consciousness. Silver Spring, MD: ONE, 2003.

Lane, David Christopher. The Making of a Spiritual Movement: The Untold Story of Paul Twitchell and Eckankar. New York: Garland, 1993.

Twitchell, Paul. Eckankar: The Key to Secret Worlds. San Diego, CA: Illuminated Way, 1969.

Ecstasy

Ingestion of the synthetic drug ecstasy, or methylenedioxymethamphetamine (MDMA), causes the release of high levels of the neurotransmitters serotonin and dopamine, while at the same time blocking the reuptake of serotonin, resulting in an almost immediate feeling of euphoria, heightened physical sensation, lowered inhibitions, and an increased sense of empathy for others. The visual, auditory, and physical stimulation experienced at “raves” (all-night dance parties) enhances the psychotropic effects of ecstasy, making it the “club drug” of choice in the 1990s. It is also referred to as the “hug drug,” as users claim a sense of peace and oneness while under its influence. Negative side effects may include increased heart rate, dehydration, muscle tremors, and involuntary teeth clenching, as well as severe depression and intense headaches following the initial high.

The German pharmaceutical company Merck inadvertently discovered MDMA in 1912 as an intermediate step in its quest for a hemostatic drug (one that stops bleeding). In 1953, the U.S. Army Chemical Center, in search of potential cold war espionage drugs, secretly experimented with MDMA (which it dubbed EA 1475) on dogs, mice, and monkeys in hopes of finding an effective brainwashing agent.

A handful of American psychiatrists tried using the drug in psychotherapy with little fanfare until the 1970s, when Dr. Sasha Shulgin and Dr. Dave Nichols promoted its clinical use in calming patients for therapy sessions. MDMA therapy soon caught on with other therapists, who referred to the drug as “Adam” (invoking the innocence and oneness with nature personified by the biblical figure). Its clinical use remained discreet, however, as the therapeutic community was concerned that the general public would catch on to its effects and open the door to recreational abuse.

MDMA was widely used and readily available in Europe, however, and by the 1980s, British “ravers” introduced the drug to dance clubs in the United States. Several Dallas entrepreneurs, called the Texas Group, met the American demand by producing and selling little brown bottles of “Sassyfras,” or ecstasy in pill form. Consumers could purchase the little-known (and not yet illegal) drug over the phone by credit card or in many dance clubs in the Dallas and Fort Worth area.

By the mid-1980s, the increased popularity and notoriety of MDMA sparked widespread concern about the safety of the drug and its potentially addictive properties. At the urging of U.S. Senator Lloyd Bentsen (D-TX), the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) imposed an emergency ban on the drug on July 1, 1985. Over the protests of psychotherapists, ecstasy was permanently classified as a Schedule I drug (making it illegal for any purpose and acknowledging no known medical use) on March 23, 1988.

Ironically, all the media attention contributed to increased recreational use in subsequent years. Thus, illegal trafficking of the drug has become a problem for the nation’s law enforcement authorities, while the ban has hindered legitimate clinical use.

Jennifer Aerts Terry

See also: Drug Culture; Rave Culture.

Further Reading

Holland, Julie, ed. Ecstasy: The Complete Guide. A Comprehensive Look at the Risks and Benefits of MDMA. Rochester, NY: Park Street, 2001.

Swarts, Katherine. Club Drugs. The History of Drugs. Farmington Hills, MI: Greenhaven, 2006.

Electrical Bananas

During the spring and summer of 1967, a rumor circulated in the American counterculture that a person could experience euphoria and hallucinogenic effects by smoking dried banana peels. Although the rumor soon proved false, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) responded on May 26, 1967, by issuing a press release that declared scientific analysis of several banana concoctions had failed to produce “detectable quantities of known hallucinogenics.”

Members of Country Joe and the Fish, a San Francisco Bay Area psychedelic band, were primarily responsible for setting “The Great Banana Hoax” in motion. One night in late 1966, before a show in Vancouver, Canada, the band’s drummer, Gary “Chicken” Hirsh—who had a long history of experimenting with folk recipes—persuaded his band mates to smoke banana peels, based on the theory that they might contain chemical qualities similar to marijuana. That same night, members of the band also drank from a jug of water that had been dosed with LSD. They joked that they had experienced the drug’s effects from the banana peels. Soon afterward, at a Bay Area benefit concert for the legalization of marijuana, the band passed out hundreds of banana “joints” (hand-rolled cigarettes) and encouraged the crowd to smoke them.

Around the same time, the Scottish-born folk balladeer Donovan released his hit single “Mellow Yellow,” which contained the lyric: “Electrical banana/Is gonna be a sudden craze/Electrical banana/Is bound to be the very next phase/They call it Mellow Yellow.” Many people mistakenly believed that the song was about smoking bananas, and hippies began referring to dried banana peels as “Mellow Yellow.” Donovan later explained that the lyric had nothing at all to do with bananas but was instead a sly reference to a yellow electric vibrator for which he had seen an advertisement.

In the March 3, 1967, issue of the Berkeley Barb—a well-circulated underground newspaper of the Bay Area—Country Joe and the Fish’s manager, Ed Denson, extended the hoax by printing a recipe for turning banana peels into a marijuana-like substance. Soon thereafter, the San Francisco Chronicle ran a story with the banner headline “Kicks for Hippies: The Banana Turn-On.” According to the article, “Bananas—the ordinary bananas found in every grocery store—may be the new trend in the psychedelic world.”

As Newsweek later recounted, underground newspapers started reprinting the Barb’s recipe for Mellow Yellow “almost before anyone could peel a banana.” Several papers began running advertisements for a company called Mellow Yellow, which sold “100 percent LEGAL, PURE BANANA” from its offices in San Francisco’s Haight-Ashbury district. Elsewhere, merchants sold yellow pipes that were made to resemble bananas and T-shirts emblazoned with the blue logo for the United Fruit Company.

At hippie gatherings, youths signaled to each other with the banana salute (a bent middle finger) and invented comical ditties and chants heralding banana highs. A New Jersey congressman, Frank Thompson, Jr., facetiously proposed the Banana Labeling Act of 1967, which would have required stickers on bananas that said “Caution: Banana Peel Smoking May Be Injurious to Your Health.” Later, an acid-rock band called the Electric Prunes wrote a song called “The Great Banana Hoax.”

The hoopla around electrical bananas owed much to the power of suggestion. To a receptive state of mind, it seemed plausible that smoking bananas could cause a mild high or a relaxed disposition. But hippies also used the banana rumor to taunt defenders of the established culture. Bananas were ubiquitous, and the youth counterculture was intrigued by any hint of a corrupting influence in the mainstream marketplace. Also attractive to them was the degree to which the banana rumors bypassed rational thought.

In fusing avant-gardism with social agitation, Mellow Yellow's champions acted in what historians P. Braunstein and Michael William Doyle called a "countercultural mode" that "reveled in tangents, metaphors, unresolved contradictions [and] conscious ruptures of logic and reason." The Great Banana Hoax also underscored the reach and capability of the underground press, which, in the late 1960s, became an elaborate mechanism for disseminating alternative news and opinions.

John McMillian

See also: Drug Culture.

Further Reading

Braunstein, P., and Michael William Doyle , eds. Imagine Nation: The American Counterculture of the 1960s and'70s. New York: Routledge, 2002.

McMillian, John. "Electrical Bananas: An Epistemological Inquiry into the Great Banana Hoax of 1967." The Believer 25 (June/July 2005) : 18–26.

"Tripping on Banana Peels." Time (April 7, 1967) : 52.

Ellison, Harlan (1934–)

Harlan Jay Ellison is one of America's most prominent and contentious science fiction authors, editors, screenwriters, and critics. As an editor, he helped foster the New Wave movement in American science fiction, which placed less emphasis on such traditional topics as space travel and technology and more on psychological, sociological, and sexual elements of a story, as well as on a work's literary merit.

Ellison was born on May 27, 1934, in Cleveland, Ohio, to Jewish American parents. His father died in 1949, and the young Ellison spent much of his youth running away from home and taking on an assortment of odd jobs. He attended the Ohio State University briefly before moving to New York City in 1955 to pursue a career in writing, primarily in science fiction.

After a two-year stint in the army from 1957 to 1959, he settled in Chicago, where in addition to writing he worked as an editor with Regency Books, publishing works by science fiction luminaries such as Kurt Vonnegut, Robert Bloch, and Philip José Farmer. He also published a number of soft-core pornographic stories under the pseudonym Cordwainer Bird; later, he would use that pseudonym whenever he felt an editor or director had substantially changed his work.

Ellison moved to California in 1962, and, in addition to his short story and novel writing, began selling scripts to a number of television series, including Burke's Law and Route 66. He wrote scripts for the original series of The Outer Limits and Star Trek, winning Best Original Screenplay awards from the Writers Guild of America for the episodes "Demon with a Glass Hand" and "City on the Edge of Forever," respectively. In addition, he wrote a column on television for the Los Angeles Free Press, served as a creative consultant on the series The New Twilight Zone and Babylon 5, and did voice-over work on a number of films.

His varied efforts have earned him numerous awards, including more than ten Hugo Awards, four Nebula Awards, five Bram Stoker Awards, two Edgar Allan Poe Awards, two George Méliès Awards, the Silver Pen Award, and four Writers Guild of America Most Outstanding Teleplay Awards. In 2006, he received the title of SFWA Grand Master from the Science Fiction and Fantasy Writers of America.

Ellison wrote some of his most celebrated short stories during the 1960s, including such award winners as “Repent, Harlequin!’ Said the Ticktock Man,” a paean to civil disobedience; “I Have No Mouth and I Must Scream,” an allegory of hell in which an all-knowing supercomputer torments five humans for eternity; and “A Boy and His Dog,” which examines love and loyalty in a post-apocalyptic future. Such themes represented a major transformation for the science-fiction genre, breaking from the space travel and alien stories that had been standard to that time. Other like-minded writers, forming what would be called the New Wave movement, found sponsors in British author and editor Michael Moorcock and his New Worlds magazine, and in Ellison, who challenged other science fiction writers to take up broader themes in his two anthologies, Dangerous Visions (1967) and Again, Dangerous Visions (1972).

In the introduction to Dangerous Visions, Ellison calls it “more than a book. If we are lucky, it is a revolution.” The thirty-two original stories in that volume, with introductions to each by Ellison and afterwords by the authors themselves, were written by a veritable who’s who of 1960s science fiction. Nevertheless, encouraged by Ellison, they all sought to challenge the genre’s existing boundaries by incorporating concepts from psychology and sociology, as well as sexual themes. The work earned Ellison a special Hugo Award, and major awards and nominations went to six of the contributors: Philip José Farmer, Philip K. Dick, Larry Niven, Fritz Leiber, Theodore Sturgeon, and Samuel R. Delany.

The even-larger sequel, Again, Dangerous Visions, also was well received, gaining Ellison his second special Hugo for editing, as well as producing awards and nominations for five contributors: Ursula K. LeGuin, Gene Wolfe, Kate Wilhelm, Joanna Russ, and Richard A. Lupoff. The two anthologies also featured the work of other leading voices in the New Wave movement, including Brian Aldiss, J.G. Ballard, John Brunner, Thomas M. Disch, M. John Harrison, R.A. Lafferty, and Roger Zelazny.

By the time Again, Dangerous Visions appeared, however, the New Wave “revolution” was beginning to wane. This corresponded to a general decline in the rebelliousness that had marked the 1960s counterculture, and the New Wave movement had been largely assimilated into the science fiction mainstream by the early 1970s. While there would be counterrevolutions (such as the hard science fiction movement of the 1980s) and even more radical efforts (in the cyberpunk movement), Ellison had played a unique role in opening the world of science fiction to more of the concerns of society at large.

George R. Ehrhardt

See also: Cyberpunk: Science Fiction.

Further Reading

Ellison, Harlan , ed. Again, Dangerous Visions. New York: Doubleday, 1972.

Ellison, Harlan. Dangerous Visions. New York: Doubleday, 1967.

Harris-Fain, Darren. Understanding Contemporary American Science Fiction: The Age of Maturity, 1970–2000. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2005.

Weil, Ellen, and Gary K. Wolfe. Harlan Ellison: The Edge of Forever. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2002.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo (1803–1882)

A nineteenth-century essayist, Ralph Waldo Emerson helped define the transcendentalist movement—an idealistic spiritual and literary movement that emphasized the divinity of humankind and the immanence of God over the material, the empirical, and the teachings of organized religion. Emerson seemed destined for a career in the church, but he went on to become America's first public intellectual of truly international stature.

Born in provincial Boston on May 25, 1803, Emerson traced his paternal ancestry back through an unbroken line of preachers to William Bulkeley, who immigrated in 1634 and took office as the first minister of Concord, Massachusetts. Emerson's pious and intellectual aunt, Mary Moody Emerson, challenged him to regular theological debates, making him a serious and bookish boy. Despite the family's poverty following his father's early death, young Emerson entered Harvard at age fourteen, supporting himself by tutoring and waiting tables in the dining hall.

Emerson was an undistinguished student, and he later remarked that the official curriculum did little for his academic development. But it was at Harvard that he began a fifty-year habit of keeping a journal to record the state of his mind and soul, working patiently through every question of philosophy and faith that arose within.

After graduating from Harvard, he taught school unenthusiastically for four years, then entered divinity school in 1825. Despite difficult bouts with tuberculosis and personal doubts about doctrine, he persevered. In 1829, he was elected minister of Boston's Second Church, quickly making a name for himself as a sincere and challenging preacher.

Ellen Tucker, Emerson's first wife, died of tuberculosis in 1831, just seventeen months after they were married. This heartbreak initiated a period of intensified religious questioning for Emerson. What he called the "corpse-cold" rationalism of Unitarian Christianity seemed to offer him no consolation for his loss. In summer 1832, Emerson left his congregation, telling them that he could no longer administer communion in good conscience, as he did not believe in transubstantiation. In his journal, he wrote, "I have sometimes thought that in order to be a good minister it was necessary to leave the ministry. The profession is antiquated."

After leaving the church, Emerson traveled for a year in Italy, France, and England, where he was deeply impressed by the emotional depth and sophistication of European literature and culture. On his return to the United States, he began to speak regularly before lyceum audiences, experimenting with a new role as a public intellectual. The lyceum movement consisted of hundreds of local clubs that hired traveling lecturers to talk on miscellaneous topics. Emerson became by far the most successful speaker in this milieu, taking up a wide range of cultural, philosophical, and spiritual topics.

Addressing his audience from what amounted to a secular pulpit, delivering his message in richly poetic cadences, he attacked the materialism and shallowness of American culture, as well as the formality and hypocrisy of organized Christianity. Emerson also helped popularize much of European Romantic literature, especially the philosophical writings of Thomas Carlyle, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Friedrich Schiller, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, and William Wordsworth. In the context of the long economic depression of 1837 to 1845, his lectures struck an inspirational chord, enjoining listeners to rise above the muck of this world and focus instead on the ideal life of the heart.

Emerson's first book, Nature (1836), was inspired by German philosopher Immanuel Kant's speculations on human knowledge, by the spiritual writings of Swedish mystic Emanuel Swedenborg, by the long tradition of Platonism, and by various Asian religious texts. Nature articulated a spiritual philosophy that came to be known as transcendentalism. Its central focus was the intuitive power of the individual mind or soul to understand divine truths immediately and spontaneously.

“Why should not we enjoy an original relation to the universe?” Emerson wrote. “There are new lands, new men, new thoughts. Let us demand our own works and laws and worship.” He felt that the natural world was the most reliable teacher, since the attentive seeker, a “schoolboy under the bending dome of the day,” could find correspondences between visible forms and spiritual truths. The sunrise, for instance, might operate as a moving emblem of individual awakening for those alert enough to witness it.

Essays, First Series (1841) and Essays, Second Series (1844) developed and expanded the ideas mapped out in Nature, cementing Emerson’s reputation within a growing counterculture that sought an emotional and optimistic alternative to the Calvinist Christianity that was dominant in New England. His 1837 address to Harvard’s Phi Beta Kappa Society, “The American Scholar,” is one of the most influential statements of nineteenth-century cultural ambition, calling for “thinking” scholars to produce a distinctly American literature, free from the constraints of European works and culture. In it, he defined the cultural role of the public intellectual: “He is the world’s eye. He is the world’s heart.”

Perhaps the community most satisfying to this public figure was the village of Concord, where Emerson spent his mornings writing, his afternoons walking and gardening, and his evenings socializing with an ever-growing circle of friends and literary acquaintances, including Amos Bronson Alcott, Margaret Fuller, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Henry David Thoreau, and others, who would help him form a loose-knit discussion group known as the Transcendental Club. Emerson had remarried in 1835, finding a steady partner in Lydia Jackson, with whom he had four children.

From 1842 to 1844, Emerson edited the transcendentalist journal The Dial, with Fuller, an influential feminist. He encouraged Thoreau as a poet and transcendental experimenter. He enjoyed friendships with Alcott and George Ripley, the founders of the utopian communities Fruitlands and Brook Farm. And he maintained warm relationships with a wide circle of progressive ministers, including Theodore Parker and Orestes Brownson.

Emerson’s instinctual response to political struggle was to withdraw into abstraction, as he tended to feel that only through individual self-reform could broader social change be accomplished. As the crisis over slavery intensified, however, he rose to the occasion, writing, “It is not possible to extricate ourselves from the questions in which our age is involved.” When the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 took force, Emerson began to oppose slavery openly, lending his considerable countercultural prestige to the abolitionist movement.

After the Civil War, Emerson primarily led a life of books, occasionally emerging from Concord to lecture before admiring audiences. In his later years, he gradually lost his memory, especially after the burning of his home, and came to require constant attendance. He died quietly on April 27, 1882.

Lance Newman

See also: Abolitionism; Alcott, Amos Bronson; Brook Farm; Brownson, Orestes; Dial, The; Fruitlands; Ripley, George; Transcendentalism.

Further Reading

Buell, Lawrence. Emerson. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 2003.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo. Selected Writings of Emerson. Ed. Donald McQuade. New York: Random House, 1981.

Paul, Sherman. Emerson’s Angle of Vision: Man and Nature in American Experience. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1952.

Richardson, Robert D., Jr. Emerson: The Mind on Fire. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Rusk, Ralph. The Life of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1949.

Emo and Hardcore

The emo (“emotional core”) movement is a musical offshoot of hardcore punk that surfaced in the late 1980s and the culture that emerged with it. While the movement’s early music was structurally similar to much of that popularized in early regional hardcore scenes, emo was characterized by lyrical content that emphasized introspective depictions of raw emotion. As emo gradually increased in popularity during the 1990s, major record labels started to court and sign popular bands from the subgenre. While the term was originally coined to describe a music-centric underground subculture, it has gained a larger connotation.

The origins of the emo movement can be traced to the mid-1980s, when several veterans of regional hardcore music scenes grew tired of escalating violence among participants. Early emo bands often added a revelatory, personal tone to their lyrics. The success of the independent emo scene grew in the early 1990s. Many California-based bands applied emo conventions to a traditional pop structure to increase the accessibility of the music, and record labels started to pay attention. Sub-Pop Records, Capitol Records, and other major labels began mass-market campaigns for bands such as Seattle’s Sunny Day Real Estate and Arizona’s Jimmy Eat World.

The push by major labels to homogenize emo music led to a backlash from artists within the community, and many bands dissolved as a result. Traditional emo culture lost much of its definition in the late 1990s, as record labels were quick to file fundamentally dissimilar new bands under a figurative emo umbrella to increase record sales.

In the early twenty-first century, mainstream record labels fervently increased the emo marketing push in an attempt to appeal to teenagers. Bands such as Dashboard Confessional, Taking Back Sunday, and My Chemical Romance give lyrical focus to themes of alienation, heartbreak, unrequited love, and the inability to relate to society or personal circumstances—emotions expressed on a regular basis by American youth. Thus, the emo movement is said to provide a popular template for the reflection of contemporary teen angst.

As an expansion of emo culture, many young fans also reflect a self-imposed inability to relate to mainstream American culture through fashion, poetry, and other forms of art. Contemporary emo fans often embrace cult films (such as the work of David Lynch), self-produced poetry readings (often held in coffee shops), and distinct brand loyalty in fashion. Stores such as Hot Topic have opened in recent decades to accommodate the material demands of contemporary emo fandom, though many young fans also frequent thrift stores in search of retro fashion items.

Thus, over the years, emo has become less of a subgenre descriptor and more of a cultural adjective: in many circles, references to emo-like behavior refer to persistent isolation and pessimism. The homogenization of mainstream emo culture by American corporate interests and the lack of universal traits in the movement’s music have added a negative connotation to the term in many social circles. The emo scene has lost many of its original followers over the years, as much of today’s emo culture caters to younger audiences.

Wesley French

See also: Punk Rock.

Further Reading

Greenwald, Andy. Nothing Feels Good: Punk Rock, Teenagers and Emo. New York: St. Martin's, 2003.

Kelley, Trevor, and Leslie Simon. Everybody Hurts: An Essential Guide to Emo Culture. New York: HarperEntertainment, 2007.

Encounter Groups

A product of the 1960s and hallmark of the counterculture movement, the encounter group is a form of unstructured psychotherapy in which participants seek to express their feelings and increase their sensitivity and responsiveness. The term is used in reference to any of an assortment of groups—variously known as T-groups, sensory awareness groups, marathon groups, truth labs, human relation groups, personal growth groups, psychodrama groups, human potential groups, and sensitivity training groups—that employs a variety of techniques.

While the formats of these groups vary, their styles and goals share common features: They provide an intensive group experience; they generally comprise a small number of participants in order to facilitate face-to-face interaction; they focus on the here and now, or the behaviors of participants as they emerge within the group; they encourage openness, honesty, interpersonal confrontation, and total self-disclosure; they elicit strong emotional expression; participants are not referred to as “patients”; and they focus on increasing inner awareness. The goals of the group inevitably entail some form of personal change—in behavior, values, or one’s manner of being in the world.

By the late 1960s, one of the “gurus” of the encounter movement, humanistic psychologist Carl R. Rogers, accurately announced that the intensive group experience was “one of the most rapidly growing social phenomena in the United States.” This was especially true in the West, where, for example, there were more than 200 encounter groups in the immediate vicinity of Palo Alto, California, alone.

Another index of the encounter group movement’s popularity was the proliferation of “growth centers.” The prototype for these was Esalen Institute in Big Sur, California, which, since its founding in 1962, has been a mecca for workshops by luminaries of the human potential movement. Among these have been the British writer Aldous Huxley; German American psychiatrist Fritz Perls; Ida Rolf, creator of the structural-integration massage-therapy technique known as Rolfing; Ukrainian physicist Moshe Feldenkrais, developer of Awareness Through Movement, a verbally directed mind-body exercise technique; Alexander Lowen, founder of bioenergetic analysis, a type of mind-body therapy intended to provide release from emotional issues; anthropologist and systems theorist Gregory Bateson; family therapist Virginia Satir; and psychologist Abraham Maslow. By the end of the 1960s, more than 50,000 individuals had participated in one or more of their programs.

Varieties and Content

Rogers called the style of encounter group he created the “basic encounter.” It consists of participants sitting in a circle, generally on chairs, and interacting primarily on a conscious verbal level. The leader’s role is to facilitate the encounter, actively take part in the proceedings, and encourage participants to be honest and open. The leader makes every effort to be empathic, genuine, and accepting.

The most common form of encounter, however, derives from the work of Will Schutz, a psychologist at Esalen and author of the best-selling Joy: Expanding Human Awareness (1967). In what he called the “open encounter,” participants also sit in a circle, usually on cushions. The emphasis of the session is on the body and “energy” of participants, with the leader responding to any manifestations of the energy of the group. When the leader believes that some physical action would enable an individual to delve more deeply into an experience, he or she makes a specific suggestion. The open encounter is thus an intense and often unpredictable affair, entailing a great deal of physical movement on the part of the group. The leader is proactive in suggesting ways of pursuing the ramifications of an individual's concern, using techniques drawn from gestalt therapy, psychodrama, primal therapy, psychosynthesis, and bioenergetics.

All forms of encounter groups provide the impetus and safe space for participants to let go of constraints against what is ordinarily regarded as forbidden. The group not only gives permission to do so; it demands self-expression by imposing an imperative of blunt frankness and openness. Whether the impulse is to speak, touch, express a strong emotion, or remove one's clothes, the encounter group may provide a wide range of reinforcing tactics—screaming, arm-wrestling, caressing, and even nudity. Some groups, of course, are more tame than others, but they all function by imposing a kind of libertarian imperative.

To enact the forbidden and be told it is a virtue can have a powerful therapeutic effect, according to practitioners. Impulses and self-imposed prohibitions (conscience) are brought into balance. The group itself acquires the power of the conscience, declaring that which had been forbidden to be good and necessary. As pleasure is embraced, guilt feelings are quelled and hostility released; equanimity is restored.

Social Meaning

The dramatic rise of encounter group culture in the 1960s, with its center in California, suggests that certain psychological and sociological forces were at work. For one thing, an enormous migration to California in this period brought together large numbers of people with no roots or sense of permanence, who were in need of intimacy. The extended family was rare, as one of every two California marriages ended in divorce. The residential neighborhood and professional work group had diminished in importance, as the average Californian changed homes with bewildering frequency, and organized religion had become irrelevant to many younger adults and their children. In all, the cultural institutions that typically provide for stability and intimacy were in disarray.

The encounter group came to be viewed as an oasis of attachment, a setting for shedding social norms and façades of adequacy and competence, satisfying unfulfilled longings for intimacy and nurturance. The group setting offered a unique source of intimacy—one that has no commitment to permanence. This meant that a participant could commit to others more readily and fully, with the emotional safety of time limitations. In short, the encounter group offered emotional gratification without the responsibility inherent in a long-term relationship and without the pain of separation.

Leslie Rabkin

See also: Esalen Institute; Huxley, Aldous.

Further Reading

Coulson, William R. Groups, Gimmicks, and Instant Gurus: An Examination of Encounter Groups and Their Distortions. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Rogers, Carl R. Carl Rogers on Encounter Groups. New York: HarperCollins, 1970.

Yalom, Irvin D., and Modyn Leszcz. The Theory and Practice of Group Therapy. New York: Basic Books, 2005.

Environmentalism

Although the roots of American environmentalism—a concern for the preservation, restoration, or improvement of the natural environment, including the conservation of natural resources—began in part with the settlement of the newly discovered continent, the movement itself did not begin to coalesce until the late nineteenth century, after the “close” of the American frontier. The protection of the environment was cause for some action in the first half of the twentieth century, but it was not until the 1960s that the movement flourished, both popularly and in the counterculture. Today, numerous environmental organizations across the political spectrum work to spread awareness of environmental responsibility, with mixed results.

Beginnings of the American Movement

In the pre–World War II era, environmental reform patterns began with the political elite and filtered down to the public. In many cases, the main goal of national leaders was to ensure that future generations would have adequate supplies of game and essential natural resources.

Early actions by the federal government focused on conservation, including the creation of national parks and forests, beginning with Yellowstone National Park in 1872. President Theodore Roosevelt created the U.S. Forest Service in 1905, and Congress established the National Park Service in 1916 to manage the growing acreage of protected lands. These initiatives established the precedent that the government is responsible for maintaining the environment.

There are early examples of popular environmentalism as well. The Audubon Society, which fought to protect birds, other wildlife, and their habitats, was created in 1886. The Sierra Club, established in 1892, fought to explore, enjoy, and protect the wild places on Earth. These organizations marked the beginning of public-initiated environmentalism in America and helped support the efforts of the national government.

Concurrent with the rise of mainstream environmentalism was the beginnings of a more radical approach. Henry David Thoreau was arguably the first American radical environmentalist. Thoreau is remembered largely for his extensive writings in the 1840s about forays into the “wild,” where he denied his privilege and chose to live a rugged lifestyle that he considered closer to nature than to culture. Preservationist and Sierra Club founder John Muir also had a strong impact on the development of radical environmentalism, combining an ecocentric worldview with political action.

Naturalist Aldo Leopold had a major impact on both mainstream and radical environmentalism. His writings helped initiate the deep ecology movement, which acknowledges the interdependence of all life systems and rejects a modern society that threatens them. As a preservationist, Leopold cofounded the Wilderness Society in 1935 to protect and conserve America’s wilderness and roadless areas.

Post–World War II

Environmentalism in America had come to a near standstill during the Great Depression of the 1930s (though the period saw a dramatic increase in the size and number of national forests) and generally took a back seat to international issues and economic interests through World War II and the 1950s.

One event in the early 1950s, however, had a significant impact on the emergence of environmental lobbying groups and the establishment of their political influence. The federal government considered proposals to construct dams at Glen Canyon in Utah and Echo Park on the border between Utah and Colorado. For six years, environmental organizations such as the Sierra Club and the Wilderness Society lobbied to stop the Echo Park dam because of its potential to destroy wildlife habitats. As a direct result of their efforts, plans for the project were dropped from the Colorado River Storage Project Act of 1956. While some cite this incident as the birth of the modern environmental movement in the United States, the victory came at a price: a concession not to block proposals to flood Glen Canyon and build a dam there.

The American environmental movement came of age in the 1960s and 1970s. In 1962, Rachel Carson wrote Silent Spring, revealing the devastating effects of chemical pesticides and fertilizers on the natural environment, specifically on bird populations. Almost single-handedly, Carson catapulted the environmental movement to the national level.

David Brower and Sierra Club members also had a significant impact on bringing the movement to public attention and materially advancing the cause. They led a successful legal battle to bar the federal Bureau of Reclamation from building two dams on the Colorado River that would entail flooding of portions of the Grand Canyon.

The period from 1964 to 1973 brought major steps forward in the American environmental movement, including passage of the Wilderness Act in 1964, creation of the Environmental Protection Agency in 1970, and enactment of the Endangered Species Act in 1973. This period also saw the creation of Earth Day, first celebrated on April 22, 1970. The 20 million demonstrators and the thousands of schools and local communities that participated in the first Earth Day were a result of a spontaneous response of citizens at the grassroots level.

Earth Day, modeled after the “teach-ins” of the anti–Vietnam War movement, originated on college campuses to raise public awareness of threats to the natural environment. The first annual event was celebrated nationwide on April 22, 1970. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

These developments roughly corresponded with the explosive growth of the youth counterculture. Hippies in particular were drawn to the radical writings of Thoreau, Muir, and Leopold and regarded interconnectedness with nature as a simple extension of their ethic of peace, love, and personal freedom. It was a combination of the dissenting spirit of the hippie era and the dissatisfaction of mainstream environmental groups that gave rise to the modern construction of radical environmentalism.

Factionalization of the Movement

In 1974, as the real value of wages in America started to decline, the political climate began to shift away from environmentally friendly policies. Factionalization of the movement, including debates over meanings of the word environment, led to infighting and a marked decline in the effectiveness of the rhetoric of environmental alarm. Increasingly, environmental groups had to pick their battles, as corporations began to strike back at the movement. Environmentalists were forced to make political alliances and promise not to oppose one damaging initiative in order to gain the political support necessary to defeat another. In 1980, with the election of Ronald Reagan and his decidedly anti-environment and pro-corporation stance, the movement was very much out of the mainstream and forced to compromise on many issues.

Frustrated by the direction in which the movement was heading, Dave Foreman left his job at the Wilderness Society and was joined for a desert retreat by friends Mike Roselle, Bart Koehler, Howie Wolke, and Ron Kezar. It was during this trip that the ideals for Earth First! were formulated, as well as its slogan: “No compromise in defense of the Earth.” Inspired by Edward Abbey’s satirical novel The Monkey Wrench Gang (1975), the group decided that the best way to prevent corporations from destroying the natural world was to “monkey wrench” (sabotage) ecologically damaging projects or activities. Disgusted by what they regarded as the professionalization of the environmental movement, they decided early on that Earth First! would be not an organization but a movement and that there would be no “members,” only Earth First!ers.

A radical identity was deliberately chosen as the alternative to mainstream environmental nonprofit groups that relied on membership dues to support their work. As a result, Earth First! and radical environmentalism were practically synonymous for the first ten years of the group’s existence. Earth First!ers recognized that they were often making unreasonable demands, but their no-compromise approach made the mainstream environmental groups seem all the more reasonable.

Although Earth First! was highly effective at first, it housed too many divergent groups to remain cohesive for very long. In 1992, a militant offshoot called the Earth Liberation Front (ELF) was founded in England and eventually became active in the United States. ELF (and the associated Animal Liberation Front, or ALF) favored not only monkey wrenching as an effective method of causing economic harm to those who damaged the Earth, but also the nonviolent use of arson. In 2001, the Federal Bureau of Investigation classified ELF as America’s number one domestic terrorist threat; in 2006, it arrested eleven alleged ELF members on some fifty-six counts of ecotage.

Modern Environmentalism

Environmentalism serves as a convergence point for a number of different philosophical camps. Most notable among these are deep ecology (a term coined by Norwegian philosopher Arne Næss in 1973) and ecofeminism, which operates under the belief that destroying the environment is a result of male domination of society. The philosophical and class differences between those who want to preserve the environment and those who make their living extracting resources from it have led to tensions in many rural communities, as evidenced by derogatory terms such as tree hugger (referring to practitioners of a direct-action technique in which participants literally hugged trees to prevent their logging) and occasional acts of violence between the two groups. In September 1998, for example, redwood forest activist David “Gypsy” Chain was killed when a logger with the Pacific Lumber Company felled a tree in his direction while he was trying to prevent its cutting.

In mainstream America, the environmental movement underwent a resurgence in the 1990s under the Clinton administration. The so-called greening of the presidency included the appointment of several government officials considered to be environmentally friendly. The election of conservative Republican George W. Bush in 2000 marked a turnaround in federal policy. He consistently received F ratings by environmental groups, despite his work on ocean habitat preservation and emphasis on hydrogen fuel-cell technology.

In 1999, Michael Shellenberger and Ted Nordhaus wrote an influential article titled “The Death of Environmentalism,” which described the decline of the movement into a special-interest lobby. (Greenpeace, for example, saw its membership decline from 4.8 million in 1991 to 2.8 million in 2006.) The article sparked a large-scale debate in the movement, pushing some to seek new tactics and attract new adherents.

Both the popular and radical environmentalist movements have struggled in the first decade of the twenty-first century, though specific topics—such as global warming—continue to garner attention. Specifically, former vice president Al Gore wrote the documentary An Inconvenient Truth (2006), which became the recipient of an Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature. For his efforts to draw the world’s attention to the dangers of global warming, Gore, along with the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2007.

See also: Abbey, Edward; Deep Ecology; Thoreau, Henry David.

Further Reading

Earth First! <http://earthfirst.org>

Earth Liberation Front. <http://earthliberationfront.com>

Kline, Benjamin. First Along the River: A Brief History of the U.S. Environmental Movement. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2007.

Lee, Martha M. Earth First!: Environmental Apocalypse. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1995.

Levine, David. Defending the Earth: Debate Between Murray Bookchin and Dave Foreman. Montreal, Canada: Black Rose, 1991.

Lytle, Mark H. The Gentle Subversive: Rachel Carson, Silent Spring, and the Rise of the Environmental Movement. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Rome, Adam. "Conservation, Preservation, and Environmental Activism: A Survey of the Historical Literature." National Parks Service (September 26, 2006).

Scarce, Rik. Eco-Warriors: Understanding the Radical Environmental Movement. Walnut Creek, CA: Left Coast, 2006.

Steffoff, Rebecca. The American Environmental Movement. 10th ed. New York: Facts on File, 1995.

Ephrata Cloister

Located sixty-five miles from Philadelphia, the Ephrata Cloister was founded in the early eighteenth century on two main religious concepts: celibacy and Sabbatarianism, or strict observance of the Sabbath as a day of rest. Other religious observances at Ephrata were similar to those of the Dunkers (the Church of the Brethren, a pacifist Baptist sect): baptism by trine, or triple immersion; feet-washing (a symbolic act of humility during communion); and observance of the love feast (the sharing of a common meal symbolic of Christian fellowship and charity).

Ephrata's founder, Johann Conrad Beissel, was born in Eberbach, Germany, in April 1691, just months after his father's death. He was orphaned at the age of nine by the death of his mother and was apprenticed in his late father's trade of baking.

At the age of twenty-four, Beissel converted to Pietism, a dissident Lutheran sect that emphasized an emotional connection to God; he subsequently was arrested for this transgression and placed in jail. Following his release, he was held before the ecclesiastical court and banished from Mannheim and Heidelberg. He eventually came into contact with the German Baptist Brethren and other Pietists, during a period of great German migration to Pennsylvania. Beissel, fleeing religious persecution, arrived in Boston in 1720 and found his way to the German community in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania.

In Germantown, Beissel found little demand for his trade as a baker and became an apprentice in the weavers' trade with Peter Becker, a Dunker elder who baptized him into the church. Beissel later served as elder of a congregation of believers known as the Conestoga Congregation. After serving for seven years, however, he began preaching the evils of marriage and sexual intercourse and insisting on the observance of Saturday as the true Sabbath, which led to a schism with the parent church. Although the Dunkers repudiated Beissel's teaching, a few followers left with him to establish the Ephrata Cloister in 1732.

The celibate society at Ephrata, which came to be known as the German Seventh-Day Baptists, consisted of both a brotherhood and a sisterhood; a third order, comprising married couples known as "householders," met weekly to worship with the cloistered orders. At its height, Ephrata had nearly 300 members. The monastic brothers and sisters occupied separate buildings and underwent rigorous discipline.

In keeping with the group's ideas of humility and commitment to a mystical way of life, the buildings at Ephrata contained narrow halls symbolic of the straight and narrow path and low doorways requiring the celibates to bow in humility. Members slept in tiny cells measuring 5 by 10 feet (1.5 by 3.0 meters) with a small window, a narrow, 15-inch (38-centimeter) bench for sleeping, and a wooden block for a pillow. The members believed that the more they denied themselves physically, the greater their rewards spiritually.

The cloister at Ephrata was recognized throughout the colonies for its unique music, and Beissel introduced singing and writing schools as methods for self-improvement and discipline. Beissel developed his own system of harmony and composition, and trained his followers to compose hundreds of hymns and anthems according to his compositional system. The Ephrata Commune also was known for its impressive printing establishment, which was the fourth such enterprise in the colonies. Hymn books were printed and copied by hand on paper manufactured at the cloister. As part of the writing school, members adorned the pages of their books with a decorative, illuminated calligraphy known as Fraktur.

During the fifteen years from 1739 to 1754, five main collections of Ephrata music manuscripts were created. One of the most important was printed in 1747 and issued under the title Das Gesäng der einsamen und verlassenen Turtel-Taube (The Song of the Solitary and Lonely Turtle Dove). Containing works by Beissel and his followers, it is recognized as the first book of original hymns published in the American colonies.

The Ephrata communal culture went into decline after Beissel's death on July 6, 1768. The society remained in existence until the death of the last celibate sister in 1813. The following year, the remaining householders and their descendants petitioned the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for a charter, and the group was incorporated as the Seventh-Day Baptists of Ephrata.

Increasingly neglected and damaged by vandalism in the early twentieth century, the Ephrata property was acquired by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in 1941. The Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission assumed administration of the Ephrata Cloister, which remains one of the most visited historic sites in Pennsylvania today.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Communes: Utopianism.

Further Reading

Bach, Jeffery A. Voices of the Turtledoves: The Sacred World of Ephrata. University Park: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 2003.

Viehmeyer, L. Allen. An Index to Hymns and Hymn Tunes of the Ephrata Cloister 1730–1766. Ephrata, PA: Ephrata Cloister Associates, 1995.

Erhard Seminars Training (est)

Erhard Seminars Training, or est (usually rendered in lowercase letters), is a self-help training regimen that gained popularity in the 1970s as part of the larger self-realization movement of that period, which, in turn, grew out of the counterculture movement of the previous decade. A personal growth workshop conducted over two weekends, the program has been heavily criticized for its pseudo-religious overtones, for taking on the characteristics of a cult, and for the emotional stress said to be inflicted on its followers.

The regimen was founded by Werner Erhard (born John Paul Rosenberg) in 1971. It was initially popular in San Francisco and later made inroads in other major U.S. cities, where it retains adherents in the twenty-first century. Rights to the intellectual property of the EST Foundation, including the philosophy of the original movement, were purchased in 1991 by Landmark Education, which continues to host a profitable seminar series.

At first, standard training for est consisted of rigorous paid sessions, totaling sixty hours, with the goals of personal transformation and life enhancement. At the weekend sessions, trainers would scream insults and obscenities at participants to help them transcend their fears and enhance their power. The basic est philosophy evolved over time into a more mainstream focus on self-help, though the contemporary seminars held by Landmark Education are still strongly influenced by the original philosophy and techniques.

Est critics have long questioned the philosophy and business practices of founder Werner Erhard, resulting in sometimes bitter controversies over his reputation and influence. Critics contend that Erhard got the name “est” from a 1970 science fiction novel by L. Clark Stevens, which included a concept called “electronic social transformation.” The est philosophy also has been criticized as a simplistic distillation of Zen Buddhist beliefs, of the type popularized by 1960s counterculture figures such as Alan Watts. Est also bears traces of various nonmainstream religious fads such as encounter therapy and Scientology.

Est became the center of full-blown national controversy after the death in 1983 of a seminar participant, James Slee, under conditions of high emotional stress. The trainer had refused to allow paramedics to enter the room, and contended that Slee may have willed his own death. Other participants have suffered nervous breakdowns during est training sessions, leading medical researchers to investigate the psychological effects of its cultlike philosophy and high-pressure training methods. Erhard also was charged by the Internal Revenue Service multiple times for tax evasion; he won one case but was found accountable for underpayment of taxes in a later case.

In 1993, est was cited in a survey of fifty-three clergymen as one of the most worrisome cults in America. It has been characterized as “psychobabble” by cultural commentators such as gonzo journalist Hunter S. Thompson and as poor psychology by medical practitioners, including Jonas B. Robitscher and Alex Howard. Nevertheless, est has had continued, if limited, popularity, with such celebrity adherents as Yoko Ono, Cher, Joe Namath, and Ted Danson.

Benjamin W. Cramer

See also: Buddhism: Gonzo Journalism: Scientology: Watts, Alan.

Further Reading

Bartley, William Warren, III. Werner Erhard: The Transformation of a Man, The Founding of est. New York: Crown, 1978.

Dowhower, Richard L. “Clergy and Cults: A Survey.” Cult Observer 11:3, 1994.

Glass, L.L., M.A. Kirsch, and F.N. Parris. “Psychiatric Disturbances Associated with Erhard Seminars Training.” American Journal of Psychiatry 134:3, 1977.

Esalen Institute

The Esalen Institute in Big Sur, California, has been a center for the exploration of human potential since its founding in 1962. It has been the site of workshops, symposia, and seminars on topics ranging from Gestalt therapy (based on the unity of mind and body, and focusing on the relationship between the self and the environment), to holistic medicine (an approach to treatment that takes the whole person into account rather than particular symptoms or illnesses in isolation), meditation, and Eastern philosophy. Esalen has hosted a long list of influential participants, including psychotherapists Fritz Perls and Virginia Satir; psychologists Timothy Leary, B.F. Skinner, and Abraham Maslow; philosopher Alan Watts; mythologist Joseph Campbell; anthropologist Gregory Bateson; scientists Ida Rolf and Linus Pauling; and inventor Buckminster Fuller. The Esalen Institute is noted for fostering a kind of group therapy known as the encounter group, which was popular in the 1960s and 1970s, and for encouraging a vision of human possibility far beyond that which is experienced in everyday life.

Esalen was founded by Michael Murphy and Richard Price, who had attended Stanford University and graduated in 1952 but did not meet until 1960. When they met, both were residents at an ashram in San Francisco called the Cultural Integration Fellowship, run by a disciple of Sri Aurobindo, a Hindu mystic and guru. Murphy's interests were along spiritual and intellectual lines, while Price was more concerned with the psychological aspects of human experience. Murphy had been considering the idea of opening a retreat center where people could explore new ideas, particularly the spiritual connection between Eastern and Western philosophies. Price envisioned a place that would offer alternatives to conventional approaches to addressing mental health—issues with which he had grappled personally.

Recognizing that their visions might complement one another, Murphy and Price drove down the Pacific Coast from San Francisco to look at a 375-acre (152-hectare) tract owned by Murphy's family in Big Sur. The property, once inhabited by a Native American tribe called the Essalen, featured a motel-resort that was known for its natural hot springs baths. Murphy's grandmother rented him the land, and they occupied it in late 1961.

Their first seminar series, offered in the fall of 1962, was called The Human Potentiality and was based on a lecture by the British author Aldous Huxley. From the outset, Murphy and Price fostered an atmosphere of free thinking and spiritual and emotional investigation. The Esalen ethic of uninhibited personal exploration soon began drawing a wide range of thinkers, as well as crowds of young people.

The hot baths where people soaked in the nude, the sharing of personal feelings in encounter groups, the emerging awareness of the body-mind connection, and the general attitude of experimentation and innovation gave rise to and supported many ideas that would later become mainstream. Fritz Perls promoted his theories of Gestalt psychology. Ida Rolf and Will Schutz explored the connections between body and mind. The mythologist Joseph Campbell gave annual lectures for twenty-seven years. Individual freedom and the exploration of one's potential, in spite of or in contrast to social norms, were tenets at Esalen that became fundamental principles of the 1960s counterculture.

Esalen has continued to function as a retreat and experiential education center into the early twenty-first century, as ever “devoted to the exploration of what Aldous Huxley called the ‘human potential,’ the world of unrealized human capacities that lies beyond the imagination,” according to the Esalen Web site. Guests are invited to stay for overnight visits, weekend or five-day workshops, twenty-eight-day work-study programs, or special long-term seminars and professional training programs.

Diana Stirling

See also: Encounter Groups: Huxley, Aldous.

Further Reading

Anderson, Walter Truett. The Upstart Spring: Esalen and the Human Potential Movement: The First Twenty Years. Boston: Addison-Wesley, 1983.

Esalen Institute. <http://www.esalen.org>

Kripal, Jeffrey John, and Glenn W. Schuck, eds. On the Edge of the Future: Esalen and the Evolution of American Culture. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2005.

Eugene, Oregon

Located at the confluence of the Willamette and McKenzie rivers, Eugene, Oregon, is located approximately 100 miles (160 kilometers) south of Portland at the southern end of the Willamette Valley. Eugene is the third-largest metropolitan area in the state after Portland and Salem, the state capital. About 150,000 people live in the city, with another 50,000 people residing in the adjacent town of Springfield.

Originally home to Kalapuya Indians, the city is named after Eugene Skinner, the first European settler in the area. Skinner, who ran a ferry business and trading post, established a post office there in 1850, nine years before Oregon became a state. The city and much of the state underwent rapid growth after the arrival of the railroad in the early 1870s.

City leaders today promote Eugene as “The Emerald City,” alluding to the natural, green landscape. Unofficially, the city is referred to as “The People’s Republic of Eugene,” a reference to its counterculture tradition. Eugene also boasts a large track-and-field community. The legendary runner Steve Prefontaine and Nike (the sportswear company) cofounders Bill Bowerman and Phil Knight are credited with launching the modern running movement there. Eugene also is known as the home of the University of Oregon, with a student population of roughly 20,000.

Largely due to the influence of Beat novelist Ken Kesey, who was raised in Springfield and attended the University of Oregon, Eugene established itself as a counterculture center in the 1970s. Since then, waves of people seeking alternative lifestyles have settled in and around the city, creating a diverse countercultural community.

Eugene is home to America’s first Saturday market, restricting vendors to those who have made, grown, or gathered the goods they are selling. The annual Oregon Country Fair, held in nearby Veneta, is a celebration of Eugene’s alternative leanings and one of the largest all-volunteer events in America. As home to a number of cultural organizations, alternative ideas, and recreational enthusiasts, Eugene bills itself as “The World’s Greatest City of the Arts and Outdoors.” Eugene Celebration is an annual three-day block party held downtown. Most neighborhoods host a community grocery, the most notable of which is Growers Market, the only food cooperative of its size with no paid employees.

Eugene is home as well to a significant anarchist population, which has been active in forest defense projects (including the famous Warner Creek protest in 1995) and such other activities as firebombing a police substation in 2000. Two members of this movement have stood out. One, Jeff “Free” Luers, was caught setting fire to three SUVs at a car dealership in 2000, for which he is serving a twenty-two-year sentence. The other, John Zerzan, edits the radical journal Green Anarchy and hosts a weekly radio show in town.

The Whitaker neighborhood of Eugene is home to a significant anarchist population, and the violence at the 1999 World Trade Organization protests in Seattle was blamed by some on “Eugene anarchists.” In 2006, the Federal Bureau of Investigation launched Operation Backfire to round up environmental and animal-liberation activists it regarded as terrorist threats; ten defendants were tried and convicted in federal court.

Matthew Branch

See also: Environmentalism: Kelsey, Ken.

Further Reading

Koekkoek, Brad, and Mike Helm. The First Eugene, Oregon Coloring Book. Eugene, OR: Rainy Day, 1979.

Moore, Lucia W. The Story of Eugene. New York: Stratford House, 1949.

The Register-Guard on the Web. <http://www.registerguard.com>

Evergreen Review

Evergreen Review (ER), a literary magazine founded and edited by Grove Press owner Barney Rosset, published ninety-six issues from 1957 to 1973. Showcasing a broad range of poetry, prose, essays, political and social commentary, photographs, and illustrations, it brought the best of the avant-garde art world and the views of radical politics to national awareness.

The first issue of Evergreen Review clearly established its tone and intended audience. It contained an essay by philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre decrying Soviet aggression in Hungary; a short story by Samuel Beckett, author of the play Waiting for Godot; and an interview with jazz drummer Baby Dodds.

The second issue, San Francisco Scene, devoted to a group of emerging writers known as the Beats, brought widespread attention to that literary movement. The entire text of Allen Ginsberg’s long poem Howl, which had been a target of U.S. government censorship attempts, appeared in its pages, along with poetry by Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Gary Snyder, Michael McClure, Philip Whalen, and Kenneth Rexroth, all of whom would gain national prominence as members of the artistic revival known as the San Francisco Renaissance. Also featured was Jack Kerouac’s story October in the Railroad Earth, which appeared in ER before the publication that same year of On the Road, Kerouac’s best-selling novel and the guidebook for the emerging antimaterialist counterculture.

ER continued to provide a venue for the Beats and numerous other writers from around the world, including such well-known literary figures as Edward Albee, Samuel Beckett, Jorge Luis Borges, Richard Brautigan, William S.

Burroughs, Albert Camus, Jean Genet, Günter Grass, Eugene Ionesco, Henry Miller, Harold Pinter, and Hubert Selby, Jr. Articles focused on such visual artists as Helen Frankenthaler, George Grosz, Franz Kline, Louise Nevelson, Jackson Pollock, Robert Rauschenberg, and Larry Rivers. Cover photographs were taken by such noted photographers as Werner Bischof, Brassai, Henri Cartier-Bresson, and Robert Frank.

ER was also a venue for radical social and political ideas. Counterculturalist Timothy Leary promoted the use of LSD, and Abbie Hoffman urged revolution. Existentialist writer and 1957 Nobel Prize winner Albert Camus wrote an essay opposing capital punishment, African American activist Malcolm X wrote on Black Power, and an article by North Vietnam's President Ho Chi Minh also appeared. Issue Number 51 in 1968 featured a cover portrait and selections from the diaries of Cuban revolutionary Che Guevara that provoked a group of anti-Castro Cubans to bomb the magazine's offices.

ER also was noted for graphic depictions of erotica and sexuality, often to make a political point. Congressman Gerald R. Ford (R-MI) denounced the magazine on the floor of Congress for printing a lampoon of Richard M. Nixon beside the photo of a nude. Issue Number 32 in 1964 was confiscated as obscene by the Hicksville, Long Island, Police Department, but Rosset took the matter to court and won.

ER began as a quarterly journal, then became a bimonthly, and, in 1968, adopted a larger magazine format. Its highest circulation was 150,000. The magazine ceased publication in 1973 because of financial difficulties at Grove Press.

According to author Ken Jordan in the introduction to Evergreen Review Reader, 1957–1966, ER “not only helped to define the literary avant-garde of the fifties and sixties; it helped create an audience for this new kind of writing. Evergreen Review was the matrix of a new cultural alignment.” Barney Rosset revived ER as a free online publication in 1998.

Jerry Shuttle

See also: Beat Generation: Ferlinghetti, Lawrence: Ginsberg, Allen: Kerouac, Jack: Leary, Timothy: Miller, Henry.

Further Reading

Evergreen Review. <http://www.evergreenreview.com>

Rosset, Barney, ed. Evergreen Review Reader, 1957–1966. New York: Arcade, 1994.

Rosset, Barney, ed. Evergreen Review Reader, 1967–1973. New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 1998.

Existentialism

Existentialism is a philosophical and literary movement that was most prominent in the mid-twentieth century, though its roots date to the nineteenth century. Its best-known proponents were the French authors Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus, but this European philosophy proved highly influential on the emerging American counterculture following World War II.

European History

Existentialism was a rebellion against European philosophies that dated back to Aristotle. According to the Western philosophical tradition, each human being is born into a universe that has an inherent meaning, to lead a life with a preordained purpose, subject to an established system of moral values. These meanings and values, it was generally held, can be discerned through rational thought. According to mainstream Christian philosophy, God endows the universe and existence with meaning and establishes moral ideals. Hence, essence precedes existence.

Existentialism reverses this principle. Existentialists believe that people are born into a universe that is empty of meaning and indifferent to human needs. There is no inherent purpose to life, and there is no external source of human morality. The universe is irrational, and any attempt to use reason to try to understand it is futile. In other words, as Sartre put it, “existence precedes essence.”

Understanding the world as empty of meaning, purpose, or hope, existentialists described it as absurd. Those who did not believe in God likewise did not believe in a hereafter: death is nothingness. This vision of existence was bleak if not terrifying, and existentialists voiced humanity’s sense of alienation, the anxiety or angst that it inspired, and what Sartre termed “nausea.”

On the other hand, existentialists also regarded their vision of existence as liberating. Humans were regarded as radically free, since there was no preexisting set of moral values or laws to bind them. Since existence is meaningless, it was argued, every person has the responsibility to create meaning for his or her own life through personal action. To make one’s own moral choices and commit to them emotionally is to live with “authenticity.”

Two of the fathers of existentialism were the Danish theologian Søren Kierkegaard and the German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche. Kierkegaard believed that there is no material evidence or rational proof for the existence of God. Nevertheless, he arrived at a belief in God by taking a “leap of faith.” Nietzsche, by contrast, declared that “God is dead,” by which he meant that there never had been a God at all. Hence, in Nietzsche’s view, the universe has no inherent meaning and there is no divine source of moral standards.

The existentialist movement has been widely attributed to the disillusionment with traditional philosophy and religion that many European intellectuals felt as a result of the horrors of World War II. Sartre’s monumental Being and Nothingness, a central text of existentialist philosophy, was published in 1943. Philosopher and novelist Simone de Beauvoir, Sartre’s life partner, wrote another core work of the existential movement, The Ethics of Ambiguity, which was published in 1947.

Existentialist writers also expressed their philosophy through works of fiction. Among the best known of these works are Sartre’s novel La Nausée (Nausea, 1938) and Camus’s novel L’Étranger (The Stranger, 1942).

Existentialism in America

In his book Existential America (2002), intellectual historian George Cotkin demonstrates how existentialism had a major influence on American thought through much of the twentieth century. Rather than allowing themselves to become mired in alienation and despair, however, many American existentialists embraced “the upside of existential freedom, the freeing from the shackles of tradition, the possibility of a more authentic existence, and the headiness that comes with the freedom to create and be creative,” Cotkin contends. Hence, existentialism became a philosophical component of American countercultures that sought to reform society.

Existentialism is said to have been introduced to America by Episcopal clergyman Walter Lowrie, who published English translations of Kierkegaard’s works in the 1930s. In the period following World War II, New York intellectual circles became interested in the works of Camus, Sartre, and Beauvoir. Examples of the European “theater of the absurd,” such as Samuel Beckett’s Waiting for Godot (1952), began appearing on American stages.

Existentialism exerted a major influence on the Beat Generation writers of the 1940s and 1950s, notably Jack Kerouac, who voiced his existential angst and alienation from mainstream American society. In his book Nothing More to Declare (1967), Beat author John Clellon Holmes wrote that if the Beats were existentialists, they were “in the Kierkegaard, rather than the Jean-Paul Sartre, sense.” While the Beats had rejected what they regarded as outmoded moral systems, they were searching for a new vision of personal liberation.

The African American writers Ralph Ellison and Richard Wright (who moved to Paris in 1946 and befriended both Sartre and Camus) brought a distinctly existentialist perspective to the black experience in America in their novels—Ellison’s Invisible Man (1952) and Wright’s The Outsider (1953). Each work dramatizes African American alienation from white society, depicting the role of the black man as absurd in the existential sense.

Beauvoir’s landmark study of the role of women in society, The Second Sex (1949), advocated an existentialist approach to feminism, through which women would take responsibility for their own lives and choose to become free. Betty Friedan, a pioneer of the modern women’s liberation movement in America, was greatly influenced by Beauvoir’s works. In her memoir Life So Far (2000), Friedan refers to the “existential guilt, which I have to this day when I’m just coasting and not using my powers to meet serious new challenges.”

Through the leftist political ideology as well as their existentialist philosophy, Camus and Sartre also provided inspiration for the New Left in America, including radical student movements of the 1960s. Tom Hayden, a founder of the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), and other leaders of the American New Left identified with Camus’s and Sartre’s sense of alienation from modern society. Radical activists of the 1960s also were highly influenced by Camus’s 1947 existentialist essay “Neither Victims nor Executioners,” which proposed that individuals band together under a new social contract to establish values for a peaceful world. Camus died in 1960, but Sartre continued to inspire the American Left through his opposition to the Vietnam War and what he regarded as U.S. imperialism.

Existentialism was superseded in the 1970s by postmodernist philosophy, though the latter also rejected the notion of absolute truth. Nevertheless, the cultural influence of existential thinking and literature has endured to the point that the adjective existential remains widely used in both academic circles and society at large. Cotkin points out the frequency with which existential philosophy continues to resurface in works of American popular culture.

Peter Sanderson

See also: Beat Generation; New Left; Students for a Democratic Society.

Further Reading

Camus, Albert. The Stranger. 1942. New York: Vintage Books, 1989.

Cotkin, George. Existential America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.

Sartre, Jean-Paul. Being and Nothingness. New York: Routledge Classics, 2003.

Exorcism

The idea of evil spirits that infect the human body and must be expunged by a special healer has some analogue in the majority of the world’s religions and spiritual belief systems. Such evils often have been blamed for both physical and mental ailments, especially disorders now recognized as mental illnesses. Over time, the model of supernatural infection as the cause of illness has been largely rejected, but a belief in the possibility of supernatural possession remains in many faiths. In the United States, the term exorcist is reserved for Christian priests who perform a special rite—or exorcism—to compel a demon to vacate the body it has possessed. The possession may be seen as merely an influence or infection, or—as it is often portrayed in fiction—a complete subsumption of the host’s personality.

Exorcism is most commonly associated with the Roman Catholic Church, the largest ecclesiastical body that prescribes it. Church authorities rarely have prescribed it in the United States, where Catholics lacked a significant presence until the immigration of the nineteenth century. And by the twentieth century, the Church had begun to move away from supernaturalism.

As in the case of validating miracles, the Roman Catholic Church will prescribe an exorcism only when all other approaches have been exhausted. Indications of a possessed subject are said to include knowledge of things to which the individual has no access (including fluency in previously unknown languages) and demonstrations of supernatural strength. Signs such as blasphemy, aversion to sacred objects, personality changes, and erratic behavior are too easily explained by psychological means or simply feigned.

In 1999, the Catholic text used in exorcisms was rewritten for the first time since the seventeenth century, to the dissatisfaction of many who performed the rite. The revised text, like much Catholic literature written in the wake of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), focuses less on the idea of Satan as a supernatural intelligence, though it does not deny the existence of supernatural evil.

William Peter Blatty’s best-selling 1971 novel The Exorcist, made into a hit film in 1973, was said to be based on a real exorcism conducted in 1949 on a thirteen-year-old boy in Maryland. The novel and film helped solidify the image in the public mind of exorcism as an essentially Catholic ritual, but far more exorcisms in the United States are performed by evangelical, Pentecostal, and charismatic churches. In these groups, which may embrace such phenomena as speaking in tongues and the laying on of hands, war between supernatural good and supernatural evil is a prominent part of day-to-day spiritual life. While mainstream Protestant groups have rejected exorcism as relying on extra-biblical sources of power, the rise of the Christian Right and the Satanism scares of the 1980s brought a surge in practice among more radical churches.

Unlike the Catholic rite, Protestant exorcism (which is not confined to any one denomination, and which is practiced by many unaffiliated churches) does not require the involvement of a priest. Just as faith healing and other miracles can be performed by any of the faithful, so, too, can exorcism. Formal rites are eschewed in favor of a dialogue between the exorcist and the possessed subject. The signs of possession, too, are not as strictly defined as those identified by the Catholic Church. Some Pentecostals blame demonic possession for all manner of perceived evils, and psychological explanations might not be pursued before the diagnosis of possession is reached.

Several cases of death resulting from exorcism have been reported in the United States. In 1995, a Korean immigrant named Kyung-A Ha was beaten into a coma and died during a six-hour prayer meeting called by the Jesus-Amen Ministries outside San Francisco; the meeting had been arranged by family members who believed she was possessed by demons. In 2003, an eight-year-old autistic boy named Terrance Cottrell, Jr., was suffocated to death at a prayer service in Milwaukee where untrained church members tried to expunge him of spirits.

Not all—in fact, few—Protestant exorcisms put the subject at risk of physical harm. In some churches, exorcism is simply a form of directed prayer. While physical and psychological explanations for illness are not rejected as such, they are treated as proximate causes, while the supernatural is regarded as the prime cause. In other words, while a fever may be caused by a virus, the virus and the suffering are said to originate with supernatural evil. The deliverance ministries of many charismatic churches thus resort to exorcism, usually in the form of a prayer and a reading from Scripture, to combat most maladies, while calling for the elimination of all evil influences to avoid future demonic possession.

See also: Fundamentalism, Christian.

Further Reading

Amorth, Gabriele. An Exorcist Tells His Story. New York: Ignatius, 1999.

Cuneo, Michael W. American Exorcism: Expelling Demons in the Land of Plenty. New York: Broadway, 2002.

Fortea, Jose Antonio. Interview with an Exorcist. New York: Ascension, 2006.

Martin, Malachi. Hostage to the Devil: The Possession and Exorcism of Five Americans. New York: Harper, 1992.

Peck, M. Scott. Glimpses of the Devil: A Psychiatrist's Personal Accounts of Possession, Exorcism, and Redemption. New York: Free Press, 2005.

Roman Catholic Church. The Rites of the Catholic Church. New York: Liturgical Press, 1999.

Extrasensory Perception and Parapsychology

The term extrasensory perception (ESP)—the ability to perceive objects, events, or another person's thoughts by paranormal means, other than the known human senses—has been applied to a number of anomalous mental phenomena, including telepathy, clairvoyance, and psychokinesis. The scientific study of ESP has alternated through periods of serious activity and neglect, while interest in the popular culture peaked in the late nineteenth century and underwent a revival in the late twentieth century.

Sustained modern interest in psychic or parapsychological phenomena began in the nineteenth century, both in Great Britain and in the United States, with the advent of the spiritualist movement. Mediums became extremely popular, especially with the upper class, and their psychic abilities attracted the attention of scientists and serious intellectuals.

While considerable energy was devoted to uncovering fraudulent mediums, the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) was founded in England in 1882, and the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) was established three years later. Among the founders of the ASPR were the noted astronomer Simon Newcomb and psychologists G. Stanley Hall and William James. The American society took a more skeptical view of psychic phenomena than did its British counterpart, and, led by prominent men of science, was more open to mundane explanations. Still, initial research findings were disappointing, and the interest of many scientific members waned. Under the direction of nonscientists, the ASPR languished for many years.

Key to the reestablishment of psychical research in America were the efforts of experimental psychologist and Harvard professor William McDougall, who began his career in England and then worked with the ASPR for several years. In 1927, he left Harvard to become chairman of the Philosophy and Psychology Department at Duke University in Durham, North Carolina.

McDougall then hired the botanists J.B. Rhine and Louisa E. Rhine (husband and wife) to conduct research on psychic phenomena. The former developed a method of scientifically testing extrasensory phenomena using cards and dice, and, in 1934, published Extra-Sensory Perception, which described the experiments and their results.

Popular press accounts, particularly those by The New York Times science editor Waldemar Kaempffert, brought attention to the new field of parapsychology, as J.B. Rhine termed it, and the founding of the Journal of Parapsychology in 1937 gave the field an outlet to share scientific research.

Rhine established the Duke Parapsychology Laboratory to carry out research and train new experimenters. Following on this newfound success, scientists in the ASPR regained control of the organization in 1941, and, once again, turned it into an organ for rigorous controlled studies.

The founding of the Parapsychology Foundation in 1951 gave the field needed financial resources, which were used to sponsor research, international scientific conferences, and the establishment of a research library. Rhine's group at Duke, however, remained the center of scientific psychic research in the United States. Rhine eventually separated his lab from the university, establishing the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man, now called the Rhine Research Center, just off campus, in 1962.

Other parapsychology labs sprung up during the late 1970s, including the Psychophysical Research Laboratories at Princeton University and the Maimonides Dream Laboratory in Brooklyn, New York. Existing laboratories at the Mind Science and Science Unlimited foundations in San Antonio, Texas, and the Stanford Research Institute in Palo Alto, California, added parapsychological research to their activities or at least tolerated the activities of interested staff members. Other research centers have included the University of Virginia's Division of Parapsychology (renamed the Division of Perceptual Studies), the Communications Department at Syracuse University, and the psychology departments of City College and St. John's University in New York.

It was also during the 1970s that the U.S. Department of Defense carried out classified experimentation in remote viewing (an attempt to gather information using paranormal means) at the Stanford Research Institute. By the late 1990s, however, most of these centers had closed, turned their attention to other types of scientific research, or shifted their focus to public education. As of the early 2000s, the only remaining academic unit was at the University of Virginia, and the only institutionally based research laboratory was the Institute for Noetic Sciences in Northern California, founded by former astronaut Edgar D. Mitchell and devoted to a variety of New Age causes.

The ASPR, meanwhile, underwent another "revolution" and ceased its research activities. The Parapsychology Association, a purely scientific international society founded in 1957, has only a small membership and is largely segregated from the rest of the academe, although since 1969 it has maintained an affiliation with the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Certainly one reason for the decline in scientific interest is the sheer difficulty researchers have had in providing measurable experimental evidence of parapsychological phenomena. While meta-analyses of ESP research have suggested the existence of some kind of paranormal mental phenomena, the inability of researchers to explain them within the established laws of physics has made it difficult for most mainstream scientists to take any such claims seriously. The media attention devoted to such self-proclaimed psychics such as Uri Geller and John Edward has furthered alienated the scientific community, while the public has seemingly responded positively to the same coverage. According to a 1991 survey by the Princeton Religion Research Center, about half of the American public believed in ESP at the time.

Indeed, while academic or professional interest in ESP has waxed and waned, American popular culture—especially television and film—has maintained a steady interest in such phenomena. Beginning in the early 1960s with the hit television series The Twilight Zone and The Outer Limits, science fiction programs often included ESP in episodes or as attributes of important characters. The trend continued in the Star Trek series and subsequent sci-fi shows, including Babylon 5, The X-Files, and Heroes. A few have focused specifically on ESP, including the whimsical The Girl with Something Extra and the more dramatic The Dead Zone. From 1999 to 2004, Edward had his own television show, Crossing Over with John Edward; in 2006, he launched John Edward Cross Country.

Hollywood films have reflected similar trends, often including ESP as a subplot (as in the comic book-derived X-Men and its sequels) or as the main focus of the story, whether for laughs (as in On a Clear Day You Can See Forever, 1970) or played straight (Village of the Damned, 1960 and 1995; Carrie, 1976; and Scanners, 1981).

Cultural commentators are divided as to whether the increased interest in ESP and paranormal psychology marks a return to an irrational mode of thought or a broader willingness to consider alternative ways of thinking, but it seems clear that, at least in the public imagination, ESP is not going away. While the future of parapsychological phenomena as a field of scientific research is in doubt, its place in American culture seems secure.

George R. Ehrhardt

See also: X-Files, The.

Further Reading

Hess, David J. Science in the New Age: The Paranormal, Its Defenders and Debunkers, and American Culture. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1993.

Mauskopf, Seymour H., and Michael R. McVaugh. The Elusive Science: Origins of Experimental Psychical Research. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1980.

Moore, R. Laurence. In Search of White Crows: Spiritualism, Parapsychology, and American Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Rhine, J.B. Extra-Sensory Perception. Boston: Bruce Humphries, 1934.

Farm, The

The Farm is an intentional community located on approximately 1,750 acres (710 hectares) near Summertown, Tennessee, about 60 miles (100 kilometers) southeast of Nashville. In 1971, Stephen Gaskin left San Francisco State College, where he taught English and creative writing, and led 300 hippies in a caravan of sixty buses, trucks, and vans from California to the site in Tennessee, where they established the Farm and vowed to hold all possessions in common.

Members advocated pacifism, vegetarianism, natural methods of birth control, and natural childbirth. They agreed to practice a hippie spirituality in which all religious traditions and philosophies are respected. Meditation services were held frequently, and Gaskin's wife, Ina May, a certified professional midwife, trained many of the women living at the Farm to become midwives. Her book Spiritual Midwifery (1977) is considered a seminal work on that subject and contributed significantly to the national movement of home births.

By 1979, 1,500 residents were living at the Farm, and many successful businesses had been developed to supplement the agricultural portion of the venture. The Farm maintained its own school, clinic, ambulance service, laundry, and bakery. Some of the most successful businesses were in the fields of construction, trucking, publishing, and specialty food sales.

By the early 1980s, however, it was apparent that the community's infrastructure could not continue to sustain the growing population. Lack of adequate housing, sanitation facilities, and running water prompted many residents to leave. In 1983, escalating financial struggles led several disillusioned members to challenge Gaskin's leadership, and the communal lifestyle was abandoned for a cooperative one. Under the cooperative structure, the land and community businesses were jointly held. The residents were required to become self-sufficient and to pay monthly dues to the cooperative. Personal assets no longer were held in common.

As of 2010, approximately 175 individuals were living at the Farm. Many were involved in overseeing the various businesses associated with the community. Additionally, a variety of auxiliary organizations were connected to the Farm, the two best-known being Plenty International and the Midwifery Center. Plenty was formed in 1974, when the Farm's residents assisted in the cleanup efforts following a tornado that ravaged several of their neighbors' properties. Two years later, Guatemala suffered a devastating earthquake, and numerous members of the community traveled to Central America to participate in the relief effort; some remained among the Mayan people for four years. Plenty International also provided assistance to those affected by Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans, Louisiana, in 2005.

The Midwifery Center is recognized as one of the first out-of-hospital birth centers in the United States. Promoting the recommendations of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Ina May Gaskin is the recipient of the ASPO/Lamaze Irwin Chabon Award and the Tennessee Perinatal Association Recognition Award. She served as president of Midwives' Alliance of North America from 1996 to 2002, and her book Ina May's Guide to Childbirth was published in 2003.

Still recognized as the spiritual leader of the Farm, Stephen Gaskin continues to lead Sunday morning group meditation and church services in the meadow. He remains active as a writer and lecturer and has published several volumes of his spiritual teachings, including Monday Night Class (1970), This Season's People: A Book of Spiritual Teachings (1976), Sunday Morning Services on the Farm (1977), Mind at Play (1979), Cannabis Spirituality (1997), and An Outlaw in My Heart: A Political Activist's User's Manual (2000). Promoting universal health care, campaign finance reform, and the decriminalization of marijuana, Gaskin was a Green Party candidate in the 2000 presidential primary.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Communes.

Further Reading

The Farm. <http://www.thefarm.org>

Fike, Rupert. Voices from the Farm: Adventures in Community Living. Summertown, TN: Book Publishing, 1998.

Shi, David E. The Simple Life: Plain Living and High Thinking in American Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Farmers' Alliance

The Farmers' Alliance was an organized movement among American farmers in the 1880s and 1890s that pursued collective means to improve their lot. By the late nineteenth century, Thomas Jefferson's vision of a nation of independent citizen-farmers was under assault, as large corporate interests, especially railroads, monopolized distribution and maximized profits at the expense of individual farmers. In the late 1860s and early 1870s, the Grange movement (now the National Grange) sought to mobilize farmers in the upper Midwest against the railroads and grain-elevator monopolies, but it finally proved ineffectual in resolving basic economic issues. Discontent in the agricultural heartland did not evaporate with the withering of the Grange, however, and the Farmers' Alliance asserted the right of growers to stand up for themselves and work together to challenge the root causes of their difficulties—specifically, to push for higher commodity prices. From it arose the Populist Party in the 1890s.

The Farmers' Alliance consisted of three separate and independent organizations. The Northern Farmers' Alliance was organized in 1880 to represent growers in the Great Plains states. The Colored Farmers' Alliance was established in 1886 for African American farmers, primarily in the South. And the Southern Farmers' Alliance was established in late 1877 in Lampasas County, Texas, as a fraternal order designed to protect the interests of farmers in Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas, primarily. The Southern Alliance was the most influential, as it aggressively sought to attack the root causes of farmers' difficulties. The appointment of S.O. Daws as a traveling lecturer in 1883 was a key development in the success of the Southern Alliance.

American farmers during this period were under tremendous economic pressure as a result of collapsing prices for agricultural products and a shortage of available credit. Many lived from hand to mouth, with their survival or failure in the hands of local merchants. Farmers' Alliance lecturers such as Daws asserted that farmers ought to be proud of themselves as hardworking Americans and should collaborate in a community effort to improve their situation. The Alliance worked to pool farmers' production in order to obtain better prices from middlemen, a practice known as "bulking." The organization formed other collaborative enterprises such as grain mills and cooperative stores that were member-owned and-operated, and it also established a program to assist farmers in drought-stricken areas. Alliance lecturers championed the benefits of the movement at rallies that attracted tens of thousands of people and gave members a sense of collective power that they had not felt before.

The Farmers' Alliance's agenda was far more radical than that of the Grange. It reached out to wage laborers through the dominant labor union of the period, the Knights of Labor, which Alliance members assisted by honoring union boycotts and providing foodstuffs to striking workers. A Farmers' Alliance exchange was founded in 1887, capitalized by member funding; it threatened to break the economic stranglehold that banks and merchants had on cash-poor farmers. In 1889, the Alliance also successfully boycotted the jute bag monopoly, forcing it to agree to pricing demands. Although the exchange failed and jute prices went up as the Alliance weakened, such measures represented radical attacks on the existing economic structure and struck at the fundamental causes of farm distress.

Measures such as these also combined with a souring of the overall U.S. economy to contribute to a whirlwind expansion of the Farmers' Alliance movement during the late 1880s. The leaders of the Southern Alliance aggressively pushed the movement into the rest of the South. In 1887, they also sought to unite the various regional groups under the National Farmers' Alliance, with Charles Macune as its leader. Macune had been the instigator of the Southern Alliance's attempt to establish a cooperative exchange, and he unsuccessfully lobbied Congress in 1890 to adopt a federally funded farmers' bank known as the Sub-Treasury System that would have given farmers an alternative to the exploitive credit systems of local merchants. The National Alliance responded to the emerging populist movement by adopting a platform calling for the direct election of senators, government regulation of the transportation network, and the sub-treasury plan.

The Farmers' Alliance began to decline during the 1890s as it struggled with thorny political and economic issues. Economic conditions during the period were so difficult that many farmers could not afford to maintain their Alliance memberships, and the failure of many of the organization's cooperative enterprises drove others away.

The issue of whether the Farmers' Alliance should formally join with the emerging Populist Party was critically important, especially for the more active Southern Alliance. Once the organization leaned toward the populist third party, the Southern Democratic elite turned all of its guns against it. One by one, the Farmers' Alliance's chapters flickered and died. By 1900, the movement had all but disappeared.

For nearly twenty years, farmers had organized in regional alliances to collectively address the structural and social problems that plagued them. They had correctly identified and attacked the economic causes of their difficulties, uniting in an attempt to remove the middlemen and financiers who collaborated to squeeze every penny from small, independent farmers. The political goals of the Farmers' Alliance could not be achieved within the confines of either the Democratic or Republican party, and defection from the Democratic Party proved to be a suicidal act for the well-organized Southern Alliance.

Although the Farmers' Alliance's efforts proved unsuccessful in the short term, its members' belief that collaborative action was needed to ensure that all classes share in the fruits of prosperity was the basis of future efforts at reform, from the populist and progressive movements to the liberalism of the New Deal.

Charles E. Delgadillo

See also: Democratic Party: Populism.

Further Reading

Goodwyn, Lawrence. The Populist Moment: A Short History of the Agrarian Revolt in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

McMath, Robert C. Populist Vanguard: A History of the Southern Farmers' Alliance. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1975.

Fashion

In the context of a counterculture movement, fashion operates at two levels. It can be a form of media, conveying information about the differences between a subculture and a mainstream culture. For example, a man in the late 1970s wearing a fluorescent-colored Mohawk haircut, his T-shirt intricately and intentionally torn and safety-pinned, visually proclaimed his affiliation with punk rockers rather than with conservative preppies. Yet fashion also can be a marker of individual identity. Individuals within a subcultural group offer flourishes (such as the multicolored Mohawk) that make a personal statement. Thus, fashion is employed for two seemingly contradictory purposes: to identify with a group and to express an individual identity.

Pre-Twentieth-Century Trends

By definition, fashion is continually changing and shifting, with trends falling in and out of favor. Throughout early American history, style traditionally was established by the upper classes and gradually adopted by the lower classes. As a style became popular with society at large, the elite moved on to a new fashion trend, and the cycle of adoption and rejection would repeat.

By the time of the American Revolution, fashion in the United States was shifting approximately every decade, especially in women's clothing. Sheer, empire-waist dresses of the 1790s begat the corsets of the early 1800s. Leg-of-mutton sleeves and layers of underskirts in the 1830s gave way to narrow shoulders and a bell-shaped silhouette by the 1840s. The hoop skirt of the 1860s was drawn back into a bustle by the 1870s.

Men's fashion had become plainer by the 1800s, roughly similar to modern-day men's suits and sport coats. Sober, dark colors in sensible cloths such as wool or linen predominated, with only subtle changes over the years in coat length and cut.

Challenges to this narrow menswear norm generally came from the artistic classes. The British writer and dandy Oscar Wilde was largely ridiculed in the mainstream press for his sartorial choices during an 1880s U.S. lecture tour. Wilde wore a baggy velvet jacket and vest, a floppy bow tie, knee breeches, and long, shaggy hair, which became the “uniform” of male bohemians. These artists, writers, and like-minded individuals used their clothing choices to demonstrate contempt for societal conformity.

But it was not just bohemians who rejected the menswear standards of the times. The idea of pants—tube-legged, full-length trousers—was initially embraced by peasants and later accepted by settlers of all social classes in the New World for practical reasons. Heavy, cotton fabric was imported to the British colonies shortly after the first immigrants arrived. But it was not until 1873, when Levi Strauss and David Jacobs patented their method for making blue jeans with twilled cotton cloth and strengthening rivets, that the pants became popular with the working class, because of their rugged durability. The pants also were worn by members of the urban elite, such as poet Walt Whitman.

Women likewise began challenging the fashion standards. In 1851, New England temperance activist Elizabeth Smith Miller designed what she considered a practical alternative to the heavy, multilayered, highly-starched dresses of the time: long baggy pants worn under a full, knee-length skirt. Suffragist Elizabeth Cady Stanton was among those who adopted the practical style. Editor Amelia Bloomer latched onto the fledgling fashion trend, and gave her name to the new “bloomer suit,” but the mainstream press ridiculed the style. By 1859, bloomers were all but extinct.

Victorian dress reformers persisted, however, promoting other alternatives to the female fashion standards of the time. They questioned the safety of corsets, undergarments reinforced with whale baleen, animal bone, wood, or flexible metal that pushed body organs above and below the waistline, exaggerating the breasts and hips, and creating an unnaturally small “wasp” waist. Women listened to the reformers in part because undergarments were largely invisible to the public. A wearer could challenge fashion trends without being exposed to societal ridicule or pressure to conform. By the early twentieth century, corsets had fallen out of favor.

Other visible challenges to fashion standards also emerged. Annie Oakley popularized short skirts for athletic or working women in the 1880s. While not a widely accepted fashion trend, much like the urban adoption of blue jeans, calf-length skirts offered a practical alternative to fashionable dress of the time. In the 1890s, bloomers reemerged, minus the overskirt, as a sex-appropriate costume for climbing aboard a newly popular invention, the bicycle.

Early Twentieth Century

The twentieth century would prove especially fertile for countercultural fashion trends. As women moved into the workforce, demands for more comfortable and practical clothing increased. Skirts gradually became shorter. While style was still embodied by the upper classes, youth culture also began to play an important role in driving and establishing clothing trends.

The flapper of the 1920s was the epitome of the new youth culture in action. Female flappers emerged after World War I, as youth rebelled against the standards of the older generation. Young men and women began driving automobiles, drinking liquor banned by Prohibition, and holding “petting parties” with members of the opposite sex. As part of the rebellion, young women also rejected the fashion choices of older women. Exaggerated waists and hips were considered passé; a rail-straight figure was in vogue. Long, flowing hair was bobbed to chin length. Women abandoned stockings (or donned sheer silk flesh-colored hose) and wore noticeable makeup. The waistlines of dresses dropped to just above the hips, and hemlines crept upward toward the knees.

French fashion designer Coco Chanel was one of the key promoters of this new fashion trend. More importantly, for the first time older and upper-class women began looking to younger women for fashion inspiration. Not only were young women considered the trendsetters, but their slim figures were the epitome of style. These trends were not embraced by everyone, but the flapper was an important milestone for fashion in the modern era: a style developed by youth counterculture and later adopted by the mainstream.

Designers were beginning to acknowledge that societal trends and individual attitudes could be important influences in fashion and style. American designer Elizabeth Hawes, writing in the 1930s and 1940s, was a strong believer in the link between fashion and cultural identity. "It is not very difficult for a designer to understand the motives of wearing clothes for physical protection," she wrote. "The hard thing is to grasp how important it is to many people to get psychological protection from their clothes." Hawes believed people wear clothes for self-satisfaction, but also to project an image to others. Clothing could make a statement about the person's beliefs and ideals.

The counterculture already understood the link between fashion and group identification. The zoot suit, characterized by high-waisted, wide-legged, tight-cuffed pegged trousers and a long coat with wide lapels and padded shoulders, first gained popularity in the Harlem jazz culture of the 1930s. The style soon became popular with other minority men, including the Mexican American pachucos of Los Angeles. The zoot suit became infamous after a series of racial riots erupted between soldiers and pachucos in Los Angeles during World War II.

Twentieth-century subcultures crafted a sense of group style, cobbled together from other sources and influences and often centered on music. The bebop movement in 1950s jazz developed competing stylistic norms: the beatnik and the hipster. The hipster's style sense (zoot suits, "continental" black turtlenecks) stood in marked contrast to the studiously ragged jeans and sandals of the Beat Generation. Both challenged the mainstream.

But it was not only the avant-garde that produced sartorial challenges to the status quo. Rock and roll, which in the 1950s was a heady blend of black gospel, blues, and white country-and-western music, produced its own form of fashion rebellion. The greaser, with his white T-shirt, rolled-bottom jeans, black leather jacket, and slicked-back hair, offered a stylistic threat to the conformity of 1950s life. The look became a hooligan uniform of sorts, embodied, for example, by actor James Dean in the film Rebel Without a Cause (1955). Later the image was made less threatening in television programs such as Happy Days (1974–1984) and films such as American Graffiti (1973) and Grease (1978).

The 1960s and Beyond

Through the first half of the twentieth century, mainstream fashion trends were driven by the Parisian couture world. Truly "fashionable" clothes were made to measure and hand sewn in a designer's salon.

In the 1960s, however, an important shift took place. The fashion industry became decentralized, with "outsiders" producing the most influential trends, such as Londoner Mary Quant's miniskirt, New Yorker Betsey Johnson's use of nontraditional vinyl or metallic fabrics, and Italian Emilio Pucci's psychedelic and op art–influenced designs. Clothes were prêt-à-porter, or ready-to-wear off the store rack without modifications. The outsiders, as exemplified by Pucci, often looked to the counterculture for fashion inspiration.

Counterculture styles were antifashion markers of the groups' differences from the mainstream. Hippies donned unisex, tie-dye garb as a visual demonstration of both their disdain for consumerism and their growing political awareness. Young feminists embraced the relative androgyny of clothing such as blue jeans as a symbol of gender equity. From the waist down, jeans-clad men and women looked the same. Men, meanwhile, began wearing long hair, floral prints, vivid colors and patterns, and accessories such as fringe and floppy hats—fashions formerly donned by women. The Black Panthers (and others) advocated a radical chic that visually linked them to their African genealogical roots; followers wore the traditional dashiki or styled their hair in a natural Afro. As for the hipsters, Beats, and greasers of the 1950s, the counterculture styles of the 1960s were closely tied to musical tastes.

A sociopolitical commentary also was inherent in many fashion statements. For instance, two very different groups adopted jeans as a way of differentiating themselves from the mainstream. Self-styled radicals and underground outlaws took their fashion cues from biker culture. The look, and the political sensibility, was epitomized in prime-time television by All in the Family's Mike Stivic, the politically left-leaning, jeans-and-denim-shirt-clad, argumentative son-in-law of the more closed-minded "bigot" Archie Bunker. Meanwhile, the back-to-nature movement adopted jeans as a way to reject American consumerism. The irony was that advertising agencies representing manufacturing companies such as Levi Strauss used musical heroes of the youth underground, including Jefferson Airplane and Country Joe and the Fish, as spokespeople for their products.

The trend would continue in subsequent decades. Punk rockers of the 1970s and 1980s protested the corporate structure of the music world (and some of their hippie forebears) and expressed their own sense of frustration with national and global politics through antifashion statements. Punks wore their political messages on their backs, literally, donning T-shirts with political symbols or handwritten slogans on clothing. One popular statement was the anarchy symbol, a capital letter "A" in the middle of a circle, hand drawn on everything from leather jackets to T-shirts. Band names and logos also became part of the antifashion trend. The names themselves offered symbolic challenges and proclaimed punks' separation from the mainstream. The Dead Kennedys, Black Flag (linked to both anarchy and the deadly bug spray), and the Misfits, among others, were marker-written on T-shirts, jackets, torn flannels, and jeans.

The 1990s saw the arrival of the less-political grunge subculture, whose look was epitomized by the rock band Nirvana. Grunge styles made punk rockers seem like fashionistas: The typical look was layered and disheveled, including ripped jeans, loose-fitting T-shirts, long, stringy hair, and flannel shirts. Like the hippie style of the 1960s, the grunge look was unisex, adopted by men and women alike. During the same era, hip-hop emerged as a musical and fashion force, characterized by skintight, revealing outfits for women, baggy clothing for men, and a conspicuous use of designer labels and oversized, flashy jewelry. These trends would be absorbed and rearticulated by fashion houses, which would produce ready-to-wear versions of subculture styles—such as designer jeans, Vivienne Westwood's move from punk darling to the fashion mainstream, Marc Jacobs's grunge line of the early 1990s, and Christian Dior's 2000 fashion homage to hip-hop star Lauryn Hill.

In the meantime, mainstream fashion became dominated by clothing mass-produced by recognizable brands or former couture designers creating ready-to-wear lines. True couture fashion itself became a form of counterculture, largely irrelevant to the majority of consumers.

In its July 9, 2007, issue, The New York Times reported that the number of houses producing genuine couture fashion had dwindled to just six. The designers who still do this sort of work create clothes that may be seen via press coverage but are rarely, if ever, actually worn.

Kathleen M. Ryan

See also: Bebop; Black Panthers; Bohemianism; Dean, James; Flappers and Flapper Culture; Gangsta Rap; Harlem Renaissance; Hippies; Jazz; Punk Rock; Suffragists; Zoot-Suiters.

Further Reading

Davis, Fred. Fashion, Culture, and Identity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Entwistle, Joan. The Fashioned Body: Fashion, Dress and Modern Social Theory. Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2000.

Hawes, Elizabeth. Why Is a Dress? Who? What? When? Where? New York: Viking, 1942.

Hebdige, Dick. Subculture: the Meaning of Style. London: Methuen, 1979.

Sullivan, James. Jeans: A Cultural History of an American Icon. New York: Gotham, 2006.

Father Divine (ca. 1877–1965)

Proclaiming himself God incarnate, the charismatic black religious leader Father Divine espoused ideals of self-help and racial equality as the founder of the International Peace Mission during the Great Depression. The cultish Peace Mission, which began as a small black congregation and grew into an international movement, laid a foundation for the civil rights reforms of the 1960s. Although many religious leaders and members of the traditional black church were skeptical of Father Divine's motives, others praised him as an agent of social change.

Little is known of Father Divine's early life, but historians agree that he was born around 1877, most likely somewhere in the Deep South, as George Baker. In 1899, he moved to Baltimore and regularly visited the vibrant storefront churches where many of the city's migrant blacks congregated. On a trip to California in 1906, he developed an interest in the New Thought philosophy of Charles Fillmore, which advocated positive thinking as a way to reconnect with God and attain perfect health and well-being. The following year, as a Baptist preacher in the American South and West, Baker traveled with the evangelist ministers Samuel Morris (Father Jehovia) and John A. Hickerson (Bishop Saint John the Vine) and adopted a new identity as the "Messenger."

Baker began his own ministry in 1912 and started preaching mainly in Georgia. His message of liberation appealed to many women, but his claim to divinity and call for celibacy drew suspicion from men. In 1917, after numerous civil confrontations, Baker and a small number of female followers, including his future wife, Peninniah ("Sister Penny"), moved to New York City. Baker changed his name to Father Major Jealous Divine, and the group relocated to the primarily white middle-class neighborhood of Sayville, New York, in 1919.

Divine's Peace Mission movement gained thousands of new members after the 1929 stock market crash. "Angels," as his disciples were called, were required to forfeit their possessions, live in communal settings, and remain sober, debt free, and celibate. During the hard times early in the Great Depression, Divine held extravagant banquets free of charge. His message of self-help and equality—which challenged his followers to rise from poverty through hard work and honesty—was empowering for the many impoverished blacks in the area. His advocacy of New Thought principles also intrigued and attracted many wealthy, educated whites.

Despite Divine's popularity, the residents of Sayville in 1931 compelled the police to arrest him for disturbing the peace. A day after sentencing Divine to a year in jail and a $500 fine, the judge died of a heart attack—this, to Divine's followers, only confirmed his godliness. An appeals court later overturned the case, and Divine moved to Harlem in 1932. The Peace Mission movement flourished in New York City and Los Angeles through the mid-1930s, but it began to lose momentum by the end of the decade.

In 1937, Divine was sued by a former Angel, who demanded that he repay the $4,000 she had given to the movement. Divine lost the case but refused to pay the settlement; to avoid law enforcement authorities in New York, he moved to Philadelphia in 1942. Peninniah died shortly thereafter, and Divine was remarried in 1946, to a white twenty-one-year-old Canadian disciple named Edna Rose Ritchings ("Sweet Angel"). The marriage cast doubt in the minds of some followers on Divine's commitment to celibacy, even though he insisted that Ritchings was the eternally virginal reincarnation of Peninniah.

The movement went into decline after Divine's death from complications of diabetes on September 10, 1965. His widow Ritchings continued propagating Divine's legacy, and the Peace Mission, as Mother Divine.

See also: Great Depression: New Thought.

Further Reading

International Peace Mission. <http://www.libertynet.org/fdipmm>

Watts, Jill. God, Harlem U.S.A.: The Father Divine Story. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.

Weisbrot, Robert. Father Divine and the Struggle for Racial Equality. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983.

Federal Art Project

Established in 1935 as part of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal economic relief and recovery program, the Federal Art Project (FAP) was the government's initiative to employ out-of-work artists as part of the federal Works Progress Administration (WPA). Under the direction of writer and curator Holger Cahill, the FAP sought to promote the intellectual, artistic, and cultural rebuilding of the United States at a time when the nation was plagued by economic depression. In addition to employing out-of-work artists, the FAP sought to restore a sense of credibility and artistic sensibility to the American cultural community.

Many well-known artists found outlets for their artistic expression in the FAP. Willem de Kooning, Philip Guston, Jacob Lawrence, Jackson Pollock, Mark Rothko, and Moses Soyer are just a few of the more famous artists who participated in the program. All together, some 5,000 artists produced more than 2,500 murals, 17,000 sculptures, 108,000 easel paintings, and 350,000 fine prints under the FAP. The subject matter and genres of these works varied greatly. From murals on nonfederal public buildings, such as county courthouses, post offices, and libraries, to sketches and other representations of WPA workers, the FAP artists sought to capture a moment in American history and the essence of the American people.

The government envisioned these artists as educators and promoters of artistic sensibility among the masses. To that end, the FAP established more than 100 community art centers in twenty-two states—including galleries, classrooms, and community workshops—that served approximately 8 million people. A primary objective of these centers was to provide art education to children. Both the centers themselves and the art they produced helped the FAP to bring art closer to the daily life of the people, develop native talent, and enable artists to gain “a new orientation and a new hope and purpose based on a new sense of social responsibility,” according to Stuart Davis in Art for the Millions (1973).

Some politicians opposed to the New Deal charged that the FAP was filled with communist sympathizers who were seeking to propagandize the country through their art, leading to cuts in funding. The demise of the FAP ultimately came in 1943 when the WPA was formally ended by a presidential proclamation. Like the WPA's other artistic initiatives, the program lost out as the United States shifted its primary attention and resources to the World War II effort.

The FAP had allowed artists to pursue their crafts without fear of economic devastation. At the same time, it had contributed significantly to the propagation of culture in America and the artistic sensibility of the American public, something that had never before been attempted. During the hard times of the Great Depression when most Americans were preoccupied with economic survival, the FAP had offered a much-needed diversion for both artists and the general public.

See also: Abstract Expressionism; Federal Theatre Project; Federal Writers' Project; Great Depression.

Further Reading

O'Connor, Francis V., ed. Art for the Millions: Essays from the 1930s by Artists and Administrators of the WPA Federal Art Project. Greenwich, CT: New York Graphic Society, 1973.

Hirsch, Jerrold. Portrait of America: A Cultural History of the Federal Writers' Project. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

Federal Theatre Project

Begun in 1935 as part of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal economic relief and recovery program, the Federal Theatre Project (FTP) employed thousands of actors, directors, playwrights, vaudeville artists, and stage technicians and staged hundreds of productions during the Great Depression. It was also responsible for some of the most innovative staging of its era.

The FTP operated under the auspices of the federally funded Works Progress Administration (WPA) and was led by Hallie Flanagan. Flanagan, according to historian Glen Jeansonne, was a "Marxist playwright who viewed the stage as a weapon in the class struggle." The FTP was perhaps the most controversial component of Project One, the government-funded arts initiative that also included the Federal Art Project and the Federal Writers' Project. In keeping with Roosevelt's vision to provide a vital public service to all Americans and despite criticisms lodged against it, the FTP was the most ambitious effort assumed by the federal government during the Depression to organize and produce theater events.

In an effort to establish theater as a vital component of local communities, the FTP was primarily a touring company, staging productions in towns across America. Many of these productions were of theater classics, such as William Shakespeare's Macbeth and Christopher Marlowe's Dr. Faustus. However, the FTP also staged original plays and musicals, many of which fell under government suspicion because of their radical content.

A large percentage of FTP productions were experimental in nature and some were decidedly pro-communist, such as the musical revue Sing for Your Supper. This 1939 production, like many other FTP offerings, was aimed at blue-collar audiences, as reflected in these lines from the musical number "Leaning on a Shovel":

*We didn't lift a finger
To build the parks
That you see in every city.
At home we always linger
And read Karl Marx.*

Many opponents of the WPA denounced the FTP as ideologically subversive. Others regarded it as at least a propaganda arm of the Roosevelt administration because it produced pro-New Deal dramas and aired polemics that encouraged class hatred. Representatives in Congress who had at first supported government relief for actors felt Project One extended beyond its original intent of promoting American ideals and was instead proselytizing radical politics.

Flanagan was brought before the House Committee on Un-American Activities in 1938 to respond to accusations that the FTP had a communist agenda. As a direct result of such suspicions, funding for the project was cut in 1939. The project was shut down completely in 1943 with World War II under way, and Flanagan returned to her teaching position at Vassar College.

At its height, the FTP employed some 12,700 people, over half of whom were actors. But its impact extended far beyond the employment of theater professionals. For the first time in the nation's history, the federal government had contributed to the large-scale staging of theatrical productions, giving the American people an opportunity to see live stage productions and experience the craft of theater to an unprecedented extent.

Lisa A. Kirby

See also: Communism; Federal Art Project; Federal Writers' Project; Great Depression.

Further Reading

Jeansonne, Glen. Transformation and Reaction: America, 1921–1945. New York: HarperCollins, 1993.

Parrish, Michael E. Anxious Decades: America in Prosperity and Depression, 1920–1941. New York: W.W. Norton, 1992.

Federal Writers' Project

The Federal Writers' Project (FWP) was a government-sponsored New Deal initiative launched in 1935 to provide employment for writers during the Great Depression. As part of the federally funded economic relief and recovery program known as the Works Progress Administration (WPA) the FWP was regarded as a vehicle for chronicling the history and cultural life of Americans as well as providing work for unemployed members of the literary and journalistic communities.

The FWP had two main components: the American Guide Series, intended to provide detailed descriptions of each of the fifty states, from their physical landscapes to their historical landmarks and tourist attractions; and the Life Histories Project, in which writers collected oral histories of Americans from all walks of life. Together, these two elements would provide a comprehensive overview and progressive vision of the sweep of American life.

The FWP employed a variety of writers who went on to complete landmark works in their respective genres. Among these were novelist Richard Wright, whose fiction dealt with the alienation of urban American blacks; anthropologist and novelist Zora Neale Hurston, who produced the celebrated portrayal of black life Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937); novelist Ralph Ellison, who won the 1953 National Book Award for Invisible Man; and the Nobel Prize–winning novelist Saul Bellow. The body of work produced by these and other writers as part of the FWP was unprecedented in scope and subject matter, intended to preserve the history and culture of the United States. Because the government perceived “fiction as too subjective and too controversial to underwrite,” according to historian Glen Jeansonne, “the project employed writers at practical tasks such as preparing guidebooks, taping oral histories, indexing newspapers, making inventories of historical records, and interviewing former slaves.”

The life histories are among the most impressive of the FWP's accomplishments. In the late 1930s, FWP writers were sent out to record the experiences of more than 10,000 men and women from a wide variety of regions, occupations, and ethnic groups. From the stories of packinghouse workers in Chicago to those of working cowboys in Texas, these accounts chronicle the lives of working Americans and weave a history of the Great Depression through the eyes of those who were most affected by it. The poignancy of the Life Histories Project was due in part to the fact that the writers who collected and recorded the stories—themselves a step away from economic despair—could sympathize with the plight of the working class and the unemployed.

Much like the artists in related WPA programs—the Federal Art Project and the Federal Theatre Project—many FWP writers resisted the government's suggestions of overtly patriotic themes and instead produced writing that was considered subversive. Thus, much of their work met with resistance by those in the government who feared the FWP was becoming a mouthpiece for communist sympathizers.

Many in Congress became intent on shutting down the FWP, and, by 1939, the project had lost federal funding. Like other WPA programs, the FWP was officially disbanded in 1943 when the WPA was ended by a presidential proclamation.

Lisa A. Kirby

See also: Communism; Federal Art Project; Federal Theatre Project; Great Depression; Hurston, Zora Neale; Le Sueur, Meridel; Wright, Richard.

Further Reading

American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Washington, DC: Library of Congress, 1998.

Carter, Robert, and Ann Banks. Survey of Federal Writers' Project Manuscript Holdings in State Depositories. Washington, DC: American Historical Association, 1985.

Jeansonne, Glen. Transformation and Reaction: America, 1921–1945. New York: HarperCollins, 1993.

Feminism, First-Wave

The term first-wave feminism refers to the first organized U.S. woman's rights movement, dating from the mid-nineteenth century to the beginning of World War II. While the major focus of the movement was woman suffrage, especially in the early period, supporters also advocated equality in education, employment, and marriage law.

Although women in America had long argued for social, political, and economic equality, it was not until the 1848 Seneca Falls Convention in New York that their demands gave rise to an organized movement. The longtime antislavery and temperance reformer Elizabeth Cady Stanton drafted the goals of the convention in a document called the Declaration of Sentiments. Using the Declaration of Independence of 1776 as a model, Stanton devised eleven resolutions to affirm a woman's right to full equality. The ninth resolution was the most radical, declaring that it was the duty of women to secure the right to vote. With the support of Frederick Douglass, the former slave and renowned abolitionist and orator, 100 men and women signed the Seneca Falls Declaration.

National woman's rights conventions were held every year from 1850 to 1860, except 1857. Following the example of the antislavery movement, women petitioned individual state legislatures to grant equal rights. In 1860, Stanton addressed a joint session of the New York State House and Senate, which eventually passed a bill that gave women the right to own their own property, collect their own wages, sue in court, and enjoy inheritance rights such as those of men.

The onset of the American Civil War broke the momentum of the organized woman's reform movement; the last woman's rights convention before the war took place in New York in February 1861. During the war, women entered the workforce in dramatic numbers, filling positions out of necessity and duty; they worked as nurses, as relief workers, and in factories. The leaders of the woman's rights movement—Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Lucy Stone, Ernestine Rose, Angelina Grimké Weld, and others—instead focused their efforts on the antislavery cause and pledged their support of the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery in the United States.

After the war, the labor movement was revived, and several national unions were organized. The first two unions to admit women were the cigar makers' union in 1867 and the printers' union in 1869. By 1884, increasing numbers of women also were joining the Knights of Labor—the first labor organization to attempt to unionize women on a national scale—and the first Working Girls Club was formed in New York. By the turn of the twentieth century, women were pouring into the labor force, retuning to factory work, entering domestic occupations and farming, and taking jobs as teachers, sales clerks, and secretaries.

Women also were entering higher education in rapidly increasing numbers. A number of women's colleges opened in the years following the war, including Vassar in 1865, Smith and Wellesley in 1875, Radcliffe in 1879, Bryn Mawr in 1885, and Barnard in 1889. By 1900, some 35 percent of undergraduates at American colleges were women, earning 20 percent of the nation's bachelor's degrees. By 1920, those numbers rose to 47 percent of undergraduates and 34 percent of bachelor's degrees (though both would decline significantly in the decades that followed).

The overwhelming majority of women who entered higher education, however, were still white and middle class. Before 1899, Radcliffe and Wellesley had graduated only two black women each, and Vassar had graduated one. By 1910, Smith and Radcliffe still had graduated only four black women each, Wellesley only three, Mount Holyoke (founded in 1837) only two, and Vassar only one; Barnard, Bryn Mawr, and Mills (founded in 1852) had not graduated a single black woman. Although black women did have access to all-black institutions of higher learning, that access often was limited and thus made their struggle for autonomy doubly difficult.

The consequences of the influx of women into higher learning and the workforce provided new momentum to the woman's movement. Because large numbers of women were no longer dependent on men for support, they advocated their own political rights. Beginning in the 1910s, women from diverse ethnic and political groups began joining the reform movement. Socialists, African Americans, immigrants, and college students joined in rallying for the cause of human rights.

The struggle for such rights as individual autonomy, access to higher education and the professions, paid employment, and suffrage reached across ethnic and gender lines, though the bulk of the movement remained dominated by white, middle-class women who were criticized for not openly acknowledging the plight of the poor and disenfranchised. For these reasons, historians often criticize first-wave feminism for its Eurocentrism and implicit racism and classism.

The onset of World War I added fuel to the woman's movement, despite divided opinion. Questioning the patriotic rationale for joining the war, many women asked why it was necessary to fight for democracy abroad when it was clearly deficient at home. Still, women joined the war effort in record numbers and they demanded recognition for their efforts in the form of suffrage.

Women continued to lobby for their rights, with the National Woman's Party—the militant wing of the suffrage movement—organizing open public demonstrations to gain popular attention for the right of women to vote. The subsequent arrests, imprisonments, and hunger strikes of women who took part were successful in spurring public discussion and winning publicity for the cause of suffrage. In 1919, in the aftermath of the war, President Woodrow Wilson and the Democrats altered their position on suffrage from neutral to supportive. The result was congressional passage of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1919, granting women full enfranchisement, with ratification following in 1920.

The National Woman's Party looked to continue the fight for equality. It backed the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) of the 1920s, ensuring full legal protection for women and the constitutionally mandated end of discrimination against them. But the movement fragmented, and the ERA failed.

The first-wave feminist movement stalled, because many women lost interest in the cause after gaining the vote. After World War I, many women left outside employment and returned to the home, and fewer entered higher education. It would not be until the 1960s, with the advent of the second wave, that an organized woman's movement would again demand equal rights.

Melissa Williams

See also: Abolitionism: Feminism, Second-Wave: Feminism, Third-Wave: Feminism, Social Justice: Suffragists.

Further Reading

Buechler, Steven M. Women's Movements in the United States: Woman Suffrage, Equal Rights, and Beyond. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1990.

Ferree, Mayra Marx, and Beth B. Hess. Controversy and Coalition: The New Feminist Movement. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Flexner, Eleanor. Century of Struggle: The Woman's Rights Movement in the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1975.

Freedman, Jane. Feminism. Philadelphia: Open University Press, 2001.

Mitchell, Juliet, and Ann Oakley, eds. What Is Feminism? Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell, 1986.

Feminism, Second-Wave

The feminist movement in America underwent radical changes in the post–World War II years, leading up to its “second wave” in the 1960s and 1970s. The organized movement of the early twentieth century, which had lost momentum after ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution, granting women the right to vote, in 1920, continued to stagnate through the 1940s and 1950s.

With the return to the home of many female workers after World War II, the national birthrate in the 1950s doubled that of the Depression era, making female occupation outside the home increasingly difficult. Many women confined themselves to the roles of housewife and mother, forsaking their previous occupations. Yet not all women were willing or able to abandon the workplace or their quest for higher education. The war had succeeded in opening higher education to the mass public, as the numbers of colleges and universities increased to accommodate returning veterans. Many women took advantage of the opportunity to enter college and the professions, though in smaller numbers than earlier in the century.

The growth of the suburbs during the 1950s increased the isolation of the housewife. Women who felt restricted by a life focused on the home had no place to express their discontent, for the kinds of organizations that had once championed the rights of women were few and far between. Unmarried women who desired gainful employment faced wage discrimination, and the growing numbers of women lacking husbands through divorce or widowhood increased the pressure for social change. The National Woman's Party (NWP) focused solely on passing the Equal Rights Amendment—which sought to guarantee equality of rights for men and women under the law—but ignored other social issues, such as housing, birth control, unionization, and the stabilization of poor and immigrant populations. Thus, the amorphous but growing discontent of the 1950s set the stage for the modern feminist movement of the 1960s.

Starting in 1963, fertility rates once again declined, and women entered the workforce in increasing numbers. Women voiced their concerns about equality in the labor force, and President John F. Kennedy took specific notice of women voters. While he did not support the Equal Rights Amendment, Kennedy appointed the Presidential Commission on the Status of Women in December 1961. The commission's final report, in October 1963, cited various sources of discrimination against women and made specific recommendations. The Equal Pay Act of 1963 was one direct result, and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibited both race and sex discrimination, was another.

Federal recognition of women's issues in these ways marked a dramatic success for the women's movement. Seeking to seize the new momentum, leading advocates followed the model of the civil rights movement and established a broad-based political action and lobby group in Washington, D.C., the National Organization for Women (NOW), in 1966.

Challenging the same ideologies that fueled racism in America, many white women became publicly involved in the civil rights movement as an extension of their own battle. Black and white women called for the eradication of discrimination and oppression based on race and sex, and they mobilized together to attain their goal.

With the emergence of black nationalist and Black Power groups in the latter part of the decade, however, white women were eased out of the civil rights movement, leading to increased fragmentation and alienation within the women's movement. Many black women claimed that they were excluded from participation in either group. They felt caught in the middle, called traitors to the civil rights cause if they took up the feminist banner. The black feminist movement was thus created in response to black women's experience of racism in the women's movement and to sexism in the black liberation movement. Black women and white women continued to fight the forces of oppression throughout the decade, but they did so on increasingly separate terms.

The 1970s saw a rapid proliferation of women's advocacy groups and activities, and the words women's liberation, women's lib, and libbers became commonplace in public discourse. Even as the movement expanded and became more structured, however, it nonetheless remained fragmented. Class, education, and age differences among the various groups resulted in divergent politics and internal strife. At the same time, virtually all the women running the organizations were college educated, quite different in class and education from rank-and-file members.

Second-wave feminism in America, during the 1960s and 1970s, was characterized by the pursuit of numerous, sometimes divergent rights issues on the part of diverse women's advocacy groups. (Peter Keegan/Stringer/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Race issues continued to plague the movement, with women of diverse ethnic backgrounds having risen to leadership. Although ethnic women were joining the movement in large numbers and creating their own organizations—such as the National Black Feminist Organization (1973) and the Comision Femenil Mexicana Nacional (1973)—many groups failed to recognize the needs of lower-class women of any ethnicity. While the issues of equal pay, professional development, and education affected middle-class women, few groups were voicing the concerns of the poor.

Reproductive rights were a continuing concern for the feminists of the 1970s, and the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Roe v. Wade (1973) secured a woman's right to choose abortion within certain broad parameters. NOW supported the constitutional protection afforded by the decision and advocated a woman's complete control over her own reproduction. Not all groups were excited about the decision, however. Many Catholics and Marxist women, for example, did not celebrate, and NOW lost members as a result of its position. Nevertheless, the reproductive rights movement of the 1970s focused almost exclusively on the abortion issue and failed to recognize related matters of class and race. In the 1960s, medical personnel had begun the involuntary sterilization of women they believed to have had too many children. For poor and ethnic women, the pressing reproductive concern of the day was not abortion, but securing the right to have as many children as they pleased without fear of government or societal involvement. Abortion, therefore, remained a predominately white and middle-class concern.

Another major split within the women's movement of the 1970s centered on the acknowledgment of lesbianism as a concern of feminists. In 1971, NOW recognized that lesbian interests were inherently female interests, and internal division resulted immediately. Those who opposed alignment with the gay movement argued that the cause of feminism would be impeded by public fear of homosexuality. Feminists who supported alignment argued that the fear of homosexuality was a product of antiquated gender roles that needed to be abolished.

These and other differences of opinion have plagued the second-wave women's movement for years and remain issues of contention in feminist discourse into the twenty-first century. Thus, while the 1970s brought a great expansion in the awareness of female concerns and women's rights became a household issue in American society, divisions in the movement also hindered further growth.

Melissa Williams

See also: Birth Control Pill; Civil Rights Movement; Feminism, First-Wave; Feminism, Third-Wave; Lesbian Culture.

Further Reading

Buechler, Steven M. Women's Movements in the United States: Woman Suffrage, Equal Rights, and Beyond. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1990.

Ferree, Myra Marx, and Beth B. Hess. Controversy and Coalition: The New Feminist Movement. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Freedman, Jane. Feminism. Philadelphia: Open University Press, 2001.

Mitchell, Juliet, and Ann Oakley, eds. What Is Feminism? Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell, 1986.

National Organization for Women. <http://www.now.org>

Feminism, Third-Wave

Third-wave feminism emerged in the early 1990s as a response to both a popular backlash against feminism and the perceived weaknesses of second-wave feminist organizations and platforms. The third wave of feminism, which has persisted into the first decade of the twenty-first century, is characterized by challenges to any one universal idea of “women” and “women’s needs,” an attention to the simultaneous pleasures and dangers of popular youth culture and the media, and an increasingly transnational analysis of feminist concerns.

Origins

After the peak of second-wave feminism in the 1960s and 1970s, the 1980s gave rise to a national media backlash. The success of the movements for gender equity in the 1970s led to assumptions widespread in the media that the presumed goal of feminism—gender equity in the workplace—had been achieved, rendering feminist activism unnecessary. Feminist journalist Susan Faludi argued in Backlash (1991) that the popular media of the 1980s framed feminism as a successful movement that had nonetheless failed to satisfy women’s desires because, according to this perspective, most women who were successful in the corporate world were deeply unhappy with their lives. During this era, the female corporate executive became the ubiquitous image of feminist success; however, television and film represented these ambitious executives as cold, power hungry, and asexual.

Meanwhile, mainstream news magazines ran stories suggesting that feminism had produced a new set of shackles for American women, chaining them to their desks when they longed to return to the home. Among the most famous of these is the Time magazine cover story of December 4, 1989, titled “Women Face the ’90s,” which framed the debate by declaring, “In the ’80s they tried to have it all. Now they’ve just plain had it. Is there a future for feminism?”

While the national media climate remained unfriendly to feminism during the 1980s, activism on behalf of the cause was not in abeyance. Feminists of color and U.S. Third World feminism, which Chicana professor Chela Sandoval defined as feminism that recognizes the significant differences in the experiences of women of different races and different geographic locations, successfully challenged second-wave feminism’s limited view of race and racism. Writers and scholars, including Gloria Anzaldúa, bell hooks, Cherrie Moraga, and Sandoval, argued against the notion of a universal subject of feminism. They contended that a successful feminism must account for the constantly shifting intersection of identities, affinities, and forms of oppression. Anthologies such as This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color (1981), which documents the experiences of women of color, challenged mainstream (and largely white) feminist ideas about the experience of gender oppression. For example, feminists of color pointed out that the domestic prison described in Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique (1963) did not reflect the historical experiences of women of color, who usually worked outside their own homes, often in the homes of white women who felt oppressed by their exclusion from work in the public sphere.

The 1991 confirmation hearings for U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, which brought allegations of his having sexually harassed former colleague Anita Hill into the public eye, helped spur the reemergence of feminism in the national political imagination. In a 1992 Ms. magazine article expressing her feminist outrage at Thomas's confirmation, Rebecca Walker coined the term "third wave feminism." Later that year, she cofounded the Third Wave Foundation, a feminist organization with a strong focus on diversity, coalition-based activism, and the concerns of young women and men regarding issues such as reproductive rights, sexual freedom, and equal opportunity regardless of gender expression, race, sexual preference, or socioeconomic class.

The Third Wave Foundation's mission focused on mentoring "the next generation of feminists." Existing organizations, such as the Feminist Majority Foundation, a national organization founded in 1987 to advance the legal, social, and political equality of women, also launched youth-focused and-directed campaigns. Publications targeting an audience of feminist readers between the ages of twenty-five and thirty-five, including Bust (1993) and Bitch: Feminist Response to Pop Culture (1996), began to appear on newsstands.

Feminism and Pop Culture

Third-wave feminism's interest in the diverse perspectives of feminist youth created a focus on popular culture, and, for better or for worse, the mainstream media quickly appropriated aspects of third-wave feminism. The late 1990s and the early 2000s witnessed an increasing popularization of "girl power," the tagline for a largely apolitical, superficial, and media-driven promotion of the empowerment of girls and women in television, film, and music. Cultural phenomena such as the Spice Girls, the HBO television series Sex and the City (1998–2004), and the soft-core video pornography series Girls Gone Wild (1998–) all claimed to be promoting sexual liberation and girl-empowering rebellion. However, these media depictions often located the source of women's power in their sexual prowess and beauty, advancing a version of empowerment that ignored second-wave feminist critiques of the sexualization of women.

In response to these pop-culture manifestations, some young women rallied around the concepts of individual empowerment and the "freedom to choose" (sex and other aspects of their lives, including if and when to have a husband, career, or children), rejecting earlier feminist analyses that, they argued, too often represented women as victims. Journalist Ariel Levy pointed out in Female Chauvinist Pigs (2005) that these pop-culture renditions of feminism focused so much on individual freedom and choice that they often lost sight of the longer-term, collective goals of feminism, such as eradicating global labor policies that exploit women workers, or improving access to affordable health care, reproductive and otherwise. Critics agree that overattention to individual empowerment addresses only the narrow context of U.S. consumer capitalism and fails to account for injustice as a collective structure and an ideological system.

While nearly all of the women of the generation born between the early 1960s and the early 1980s supported the idea of gender equity, many hesitated to call themselves feminists, claiming that the term had too many negative connotations. Some young women also wished to distance themselves from the essentialism and whiteness of mainstream second-wave feminism. Feminism's apparent ubiquity compounded this alienation: Having come of age in an era transformed by the hard-won battles of second-wave feminism— including reproductive rights, increased gender equity in the workplace, and a critical analysis of beauty culture—many young women claimed not to see material evidence of sexism in the world. Many also reported feeling constrained by second-wave feminist critiques of beauty and sexuality. As a result of these conflicting perspectives on the future of feminism, the term postfeminism emerged contemporaneously with third-wave feminism. These two terms have at times been used interchangeably, marking the feminist uncertainty of this era.

Third-wave feminism has struggled with the paradoxes posed by popular culture; however, this generation of activists also has succeeded in addressing many of the perceived weaknesses of prior feminist eras. The work of feminist philosophers such as Judith Butler, whose foundational book Gender Trouble (1990) questions the idea of an essential or “authentic” self and highlights the unstable nature of gender identity, influenced the theoretical underpinnings of the third wave. This has produced a focus on a more diverse range of feminist issues and the use of affinity-based activist coalitions, which encourage activists to organize around political goals rather than personal identities.

Third-wave feminism has responded to the pressures of globalization by forming transnational alliances with feminists in other locations, and by connecting local U.S. feminist goals with movements for global economic and racial justice. Contemporary queer activism also has affected third-wave feminism, successfully challenging the heterosexism that limited the scope of previous feminist perspectives on sexuality, health care, and reproductive rights.

Margaux Cowden

See also: Feminism, First-Wave; Feminism, Second-Wave; Lesbian Culture.

Further Reading

Baumgardner, Jennifer, and Amy Richards. Manifesta: Young Women, Feminism, and the Future. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

Henry, Astrid. Not My Mother's Sister: Generational Conflict and Third-Wave Feminism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2004.

Heywood, Leslie, and Jennifer Drake, eds. Third Wave Agenda. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1997.

Walker, Rebecca, ed. To Be Real: Telling the Truth and Changing the Face of Feminism. New York: Anchor, 1995.

Feminism, Social Justice

Social justice feminism (also known as social feminism), whose place in American history has been obscured by more conventionally defined feminism, played an important role in expanding feminist concerns beyond the boundaries of class, and sometimes ethnicity and race. It originated in the late nineteenth century as an offshoot of the Progressive movement, and continued through the 1920s, when ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment granting women the vote dampened other feminist activism, and into the 1930s as a factor in the New Deal.

In focus, social feminist activists differed from their individualist counterparts by their emphases on protective legislation and their opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), which proposed that “Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged... on account of sex,” a principle that social justice feminists believed would harm working women by disallowing laws to protect women, who enjoyed little if any equality in the workplace. Social justice feminism was therefore countercultural in the public role it granted to the women who became its chief activists and in its role in promoting the needs of working women in ways that the general reform movements ignored, notably in seeking to improve working conditions and to provide services to improve the health of mothers and children.

The social justice feminist movement began during the last decades of the nineteenth century, when the public reforms of the Progressive Era got under way and the term feminism itself came into vogue. Although women had played semipublic roles in reform prior to this time—most notably in the temperance movements and various public welfare efforts that became known as “social housekeeping”—women activists by the end of the century were increasingly championing the needs of working women in ways that went far beyond melioration. One of the most significant of the early activists was Florence Kelley who, as the Illinois State factory inspector in 1893, successfully lobbied for the passage of legislation limiting women’s workdays to eight hours. From 1899, as head of the National Consumer’s League (a lobby group founded to promote the purchase of goods made under fair labor conditions and to advocate for laws to protect working women and children), Kelley, along with numerous other women activists, lobbied for minimum wages, maximum hours, and other workplace protections for women workers. They viewed women as more vulnerable to exploitation than male workers, who were more likely to enjoy the protection of unions.

Social justice feminism continued as an active movement during the 1920s, when the Nineteenth Amendment appeared to have made the American feminist movement obsolete. The activists of this movement included settlement house leaders, union activists, and increasingly politicized society women, such as First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt. The latter sought to increase women’s political participation in order to advance social justice goals—for example, the forty-eight-hour workweek for women and social legislation such as the Sheppard-Towner Maternity and Infant Protective Act (1921)—that were becoming increasingly difficult to promote in the politically conservative environment of the 1920s. Their opposition to the ERA further split and weakened an already less popular feminist movement.

Social justice feminism would move increasingly from the counterculture to the mainstream during the Great Depression and the New Deal of the 1930s. During the early years of the Depression, social justice feminists, including Eleanor Roosevelt, fought against legislation that limited married women’s employment. And they lobbied to have women activists, such as Molly Dewson, Ellen Woodward, and Frances Perkins, included in policy-making roles in President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s administration.

Only Perkins would be appointed to a cabinet post—she was secretary of labor, and the first woman cabinet officer in U.S. history. Nevertheless, she and her subcabinet colleagues played an important role in ensuring that at least some New Deal programs and legislation—including the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, establishing a minimum wage and maximum hours for all businesses that engaged in interstate commerce—addressed the needs of working women.

Susan Roth Breitzer

See also: Suffragists.

Further Reading

Cott, Nancy F. The Grounding of Modern Feminism. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1987.

McGuire, John Thomas. “From the Courts to the State Legislatures: Social Justice Feminism, Labor Legislation, and the 1920s.” Labor History 45:2(Spring 2004): 225–46.

Sklar, Kathryn Kish, Anja Schuler, and Susan Strasser, eds. Social Justice Feminists: A Dialogue in Documents, 1885–1933. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1999.

Ferlinghetti, Lawrence (1919–)

Poet and publisher Lawrence Ferlinghetti, one of the central figures in the Beat Generation of American writers of the 1950s, was instrumental in publishing and promoting many of the biggest names in that literary movement as co-owner of City Lights Bookstore and Publishers in San Francisco. Public readings of his own verse helped fuel the San Francisco Renaissance and poetry revival of that period, urging political and social engagement on the part of a new generation. “Poets, come out of your closets,” he wrote. “Open your windows, open your doors,/You have been holed-up too long/in your closed worlds...”

Beat poet, publisher, and bookstore owner Lawrence Ferlinghetti holds a reading in San Francisco in 1957. His City Lights bookstore and publishing company was the heart of the Beat movement. Live readings were an integral part of the culture. (Lawrence Ferlinghetti/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Lawrence Monsanto Ferling was born on March 24, 1919, in Yonkers, New York. His father was of Italian descent and died before Lawrence was born. His mother was of Jewish descent, and, after Lawrence’s birth, she was institutionalized in a psychiatric hospital. Lawrence was raised by relatives in France. When he reached school age, he attended school in the United States, including Mount Hermon prep school in Gill, Massachusetts.

After graduating from high school in 1937, Ferlinghetti attended the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where he majored in journalism and graduated in 1941. Although he hoped to attend graduate school, he enlisted in the U.S. Navy after Pearl Harbor was attacked. He served as an officer on a U.S. Navy subchaser in 1943 and 1944, participating in the D-Day landing in Normandy, France. Transferred to the Pacific theater of operations, he visited the ruins of the Japanese city of Nagasaki in the aftermath of the U.S. atomic bomb explosion. The experience made him a lifelong pacifist.

Continuing his studies with a grant provided by the GI Bill, he received a master's degree in English from Columbia University in 1947. Upon graduation, he matriculated at the University of Paris, popularly known as the Sorbonne, and earned a Ph.D. in French literature in 1950. While at the Sorbonne, Ferlinghetti met the noted American poet Kenneth Rexroth, who had been a conscientious objector during World War II. Rexroth had personal connections with many of the writers who would constitute the Beat movement and would go on to publish much of their work.

After receiving his doctorate, Ferlinghetti traveled to the United States, settling in San Francisco in 1951. Over the course of the next two years, he performed a variety of jobs to make ends meet. He taught French in adult education, wrote art criticism, and composed poetry. In 1953, he joined with local bookstore owner Peter Martin to open City Lights, the first all-paperback bookshop in the United States, specializing in antiauthoritarian works. In 1955, the pair parted ways and Ferlinghetti, who became the store's sole owner, launched the publishing wing with his own first poetry collection, Pictures of the Gone World (1955). City Lights Publishers and its Pocket Poets series proceeded to publish works by other Beat poets, including Kenneth Rexroth, Allen Ginsberg, and Gregory Corso.

It was during this period that Ferlinghetti began writing poems reflecting his anger and frustration with American culture. His body of work to date includes more than ten volumes of poetry, two novels, and several plays. His best-known work is his second collection of poems, A Coney Island of the Mind (1958), in which he develops themes of anarchy and mass corruption. One of the central texts of the Beat Generation and one of the most popular books of contemporary American poetry, A Coney Island of the Mind established Ferlinghetti as a compelling literary voice in his own right.

Ferlinghetti's Starting from San Francisco (1961) and The Secret Meaning of Things (1969) reflect a heightened inner awareness as he explored Zen Buddhism, mind-altering drugs, and sociopolitical issues of the time. His later works include Wild Dreams of a New Beginning (1988), When I Look at Pictures (1990), A Far Rockaway of the Heart (1997), Love in the Days of Rage (2001), Americus: Part I (2004), and Poetry as Insurgent Art (2007).

Jaime Ramón Olivares

See also: Beat Generation: Bookstores, Alternative: City Lights Books: Ginsberg, Allen: San Francisco, California.

Further Reading

Cherkovski, Neeli. Ferlinghetti: A Biography. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1979.

Ferlinghetti, Lawrence. These Are My Rivers: New and Selected Poems, 1955–1993. New York: New Directions, 1993.

Smith, Larry R. Lawrence Ferlinghetti: Poet-at-Large. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1983.

Fetish Culture

Fetish culture is a term used to describe the community and culture of those who engage in sexual and sensual activities commonly perceived as “perverse.” The scope of activities understood as part of fetish culture varies. At its narrowest, fetish culture refers only to specialized sexual interest in specific objects, such as shoes, items of clothing, stuffed animals, or other seemingly arbitrary everyday objects. Broader conceptions of fetish culture also include activities such as bondage and discipline, sadomasochism, sensory deprivation, and other forms of consensual power exchange, especially (although not exclusively) during sex. Pioneers of fetish culture include the eighteenth-century author of erotic novels the Marquis de Sade (for whom sadism was named) and the nineteenth-century German novelist Leopold von Sacher-Masoch (whose name gave rise to the term masochism).

Historical Understandings

Until the late nineteenth century, fetish was used primarily in the anthropological study of “primitive” religions, as coined by the French anthropologist Charles de Brosses in 1757. In this context, a fetish was an icon or symbol given ritual significance (for example, the totem animal and certain plants and animals). Fetishes functioned as sacred objects in religious rites, from Santería to Roman Catholicism.

Beginning in the 1880s, sexologists examined sexualized obsessions with objects, a phenomenon that French psychiatrist Alfred Binet first named “fetishism” in his 1887 article “Fetishism in Love.” Binet classified obsessions with objects and homosexuality as the two predominant forms of fetishism, and argued that fetishism presented a troubling perversion of the reproductive aims of sex, which he understood as the foremost motive for “normal” sexual activity.

Other turn-of-the-century sexologists further extrapolated the notion of sexual fetishism, including Richard von Krafft-Ebing in his Psychopathia Sexualis (1886), Havelock Ellis in his Studies in the Psychology of Sex (1896), and Sigmund Freud in his Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (1905). Krafft-Ebing, Ellis, and Freud still understood fetishism as an aberrant sexual practice, but they did not classify its practitioners as constitutionally degenerate. Freud, for example, argued that fetishism was a perversion of “normal” sexual aims, but he also used his case studies of fetishism to demonstrate that sexual desire has no “natural” objects or predetermined goals, and that these are not established psychologically until adolescence.

As a descriptor of a twentieth- and twenty-first-century sexual culture and community, the term fetish borrows elements of these earlier definitions and combines them with a critical perspective regarding sexual norms. The denotation of fetish culture includes the psychological sense of a uniquely sexualized relationship to a specific object, while also broadening this definition to suggest that certain kinds of sexual behavior, such as masochism or role playing, also might be understood as fetishistic in nature.

Contemporary fetishism encompasses a vast array of preferences and desires. Examples of fetish subcommunities include looners (who enjoy sexual play with balloons), splooshers (who use messy and wet materials, such as baked beans, for erotic satisfaction), plushies and furies (people who fetishize stuffed animals and people who enjoy dressing up as animal mascots, respectively), and leather folk (who enjoy bondage, discipline, and sadomasochism).

Twentieth-Century Culture

Fetish culture burgeoned in the United States following World War II. British artist John Alexander Scott Coutts (John Willie) began publishing Bizarre, a magazine that included erotic, fetishistic drawings and stories, in 1945. Willie’s own illustrated fetish stories, including his well-known tales of fetish heroine Sweet Gwendoline, often appeared in Bizarre. Willie’s drawings blended the conventions of erotic pinup drawings of the 1940s with fetish motifs, resulting in a trademark style. Other fetish artists, including Eric Stanton and Touko Laaksonen (better known as Tom of Finland), created their own iconic fetish images during the mid-century years.

The impact of the drawings of the 1950s and 1960s remains evident in twenty-first-century comic books and fetish artwork. Alan Moore and Melinda Gebbie’s graphic novel Lost Girls (2006), for example, recasts classic fairy tales as fetish stories. Comic book characters such as Wonder Woman and Aeon Flux, while not explicitly erotic, also show the influence of fetish art, particularly after the 1990s.

Fetish bars and clubs also began to emerge in American urban centers during the early 1950s. Shaw's, New York City's first leather bar, opened in 1951, followed by the Lodge in 1952. San Francisco's first official leather club, The Why Not, opened in 1960, but was quickly raided and closed by police.

By the 1970s, areas such as New York's Times Square and San Francisco's Tenderloin district had become infamous markets for all sex culture, including fetish publications and accessories. Many of the early leather bars and popular fetish districts also were important sites for the emergent gay and lesbian community. While the concerns of these two communities sometimes overlap, particularly regarding rights to sexual freedom and unlegislated sexual privacy, the gay and lesbian community and the fetish community remain distinct. Not all fetish practitioners are gay or lesbian, and vice versa.

Through the 1980s, changes in obscenity codes and sodomy laws profoundly affected the success of fetish publications and clubs. The U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Mishkin v. New York (1966) officially deemed depictions of fetishism, sadomasochism, and homosexuality to be obscene, and its decision in Miller v. California (1973) mandated that each state and locality determines the boundaries of obscenity locally. These two cases effectively allowed state governments to ban specific representations and forms of fetishism on the grounds of obscenity. Religious conservative groups and antipornography feminists, including Andrea Dworkin and Catherine MacKinnon, continued to push for conservative interpretations of obscenity law through the 1980s, leading to the evacuation of much of the public sex culture, fetish and otherwise, from places such as Times Square.

Today, fetish culture continues to operate clubs, produce magazines and Web sites, and organize events that allow the practitioners to connect with each other. Magazines such as Skin Two, Exotique, and Janus keep members of fetish subcommunities informed about techniques, new products, and community events. Social-networking Web sites such as bondage.com and collarme.com provide opportunities for fetishists to network and chat with like-minded people. Fetish parties, play parties, and conventions permit attendees to participate in a given fetish and meet other fetish fans without fear of judgment.

Steve Maidhoff founded the National Leather Association in 1986 and, later the same year, organized the first official "leather/SM/fetish conference." Living in Leather, as it was called, remained an annual event twenty years later and beyond. Events such as Living in Leather and San Francisco's infamous Folsom Street Fair, which is attended annually by more than 400,000 people, demonstrate the extent to which fetish culture has moved into the mainstream sexual imagination.

Margaux Cowden

See also: Film, Cult.

Further Reading

Apter, Emily, and William Pietz, eds. Fetishism as Cultural Discourse. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993.

Califia, Pat. Public Sex: The Culture of Radical Sex. San Francisco: Cleis, 1994.

Gates, Katherine. Deviant Desires: Incredibly Strange Sex. New York: Juno, 2000.

Steele, Valerie. Fetish: Fashion, Sex, and Power. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Film, Cult

Generally overlooked or rejected by mainstream audiences, cult films are those that attract a small but highly devoted fan base. To these fans, cult films often serve as more than mere cinema, creating a social space in which viewers can interact with the characters on screen and each other. The true mark of a cult film, then, is that a relatively small audience knows it in minute detail and finds the experience of the film a source of shared identity rather than mere entertainment or even art.

Origins

Cult films became a full-fledged countercultural phenomenon in the 1970s, when the term itself began to be used, but its roots go back to the early days of the cinema. In France, the silent movie classic Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) set a precedent by playing continuously in one Paris theater from 1920 to 1927, often to audiences largely composed of repeat viewers.

In the United States, experimental, avant-garde, underground films after World War II paved the way for the emergence of cult films. Kenneth Anger's Fireworks (1947) was among the early works in American avant-garde cinema, filling its fifteen surrealistic minutes with homoerotically charged shots of sailors, restrooms, and sexualized violence. In the 1950s and early 1960s, experimental filmmakers such as Stan Brakhage continued exploring the bounds of film, allowing the camera to wobble like the drunken partygoers it depicts in Desistfilm (1954), showing the filmmaker and his wife making love in negative exposure in Wedlock House: An Intercourse (1959), and graphically depicting the birth of a baby in Window Water Baby Moving (1962).

Such films helped to coalesce an audience for what became known as “underground” film in the 1960s. The November 1959 double-premiere of John Cassavetes's Shadows and Alfred Leslie and Robert Frank's Pull My Daisy heralded the birth of the underground. Shadows used improvisation and gritty locations to tell an interracial love story, while Pull My Daisy featured Beat poets such as Allen Ginsberg and Jack Kerouac simply hanging out, without much in the way of narrative.

As the underground film industry began to proliferate, largely out of New York City's East Village, its films challenged cinematic and sexual convention by including unscripted scenes, amateur actors, found footage, rapid and disjointed camera movements and editing, as well as nudity and frequent depictions of homosexuality (which mainstream Hollywood films of the time either ignored or pathologized as deviant). For instance, when the pop artist Andy Warhol began making films in 1963, he “just kept shooting until the actors got bored,” one participant recalled; Warhol used neither scripts nor plots. Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964), meanwhile, featured sexually charged scenes of male bikers intercut with shots of Jesus Christ and the German dictator Adolf Hitler.

Audiences

One way these underground films laid the groundwork for cult films was by inviting audience participation. At Jack Smith's Flaming Creatures (1963), viewers would boo, hiss, applaud, and shout suggestions to the onscreen characters. The cinematic underground, some film historians have argued, also played a role in the formation of an urban gay subculture determined to locate nonderogatory representations of gay life. The prevalence of such representations in films such as Flaming Creatures, an intentionally campy depiction of transvestites, chaotic dancing, and sexual anarchy, met that demand.

An important event in the development of the cult film came with the release of Alexandro Jodorowsky's El Topo in late 1970. Ben Barenholtz, manager of the Village Theater in New York City, began screening the film virtually without advertising or publicity, showing it only at midnight seven days a week; by early 1971, the film was selling out almost every night. A bizarre combination of sex, violence, and Christian allegory, El Topo drew from influences as far-ranging as spaghetti Westerns, surrealism, Buddhism, and science fiction. The story of a "holy killer" traversing the desert in an effort to shoot four master sharpshooters and thereby prove his love to a scheming woman, El Topo appealed to the youth counterculture formed in the late 1960s, many of whom watched the film repeatedly in an effort to uncover its deep-seated truths.

Jodorowsky's next film, The Holy Mountain (1973), continued his mystical cinematic quest, but the director never matched the success of El Topo, which gave birth to the "midnight movie." John Waters's Pink Flamingos (1972) quickly emerged as the next midnight sensation, telling the intentionally disgusting story of a contest for the title "Filthiest People Alive."

The diverse threads of the cinematic underground and the midnight movie came together in 1975 with the picture that crystallized the cult film. The Rocky Horror Picture Show, based on a British stage musical, told the manic story of Dr. Frank-N-Furter, a "sweet transvestite from Transsexual, Transylvania" working like Dr. Frankenstein to create a beautiful male creature. When an innocent couple, Brad and Janet, stumbles into the doctor's lair, chaos ensues, as do seductions of every sexual orientation. With its bisexual theme and campy musical interludes, Rocky Horror harkened back to the days of Flaming Creatures. Yet midnight audiences quickly moved past verbal interactions with the screen, such as memorizing dialogue and inserting witty comments, and introduced props. When Frank-N-Furter proposed a toast, for example, audiences would throw slices of toast at the screen; Brad's declaration, "Great Scott!" inspired the throwing of rolls of toilet paper (referencing a product brand name). Audience members also began to dress as characters, singing and dancing in the aisles and onstage before the film started and during the musical numbers.

The paragon of midnight cult films, The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975) stars Tim Curry as Dr. Frank-N-Furter (center). Into the twenty-first century, showings of Rocky Horror continue to attract audiences who dress like characters, shout out their lines, and act out scenes. (Michael Ochs Archives/Getty Images)

Other films continued the cult audience phenomenon in the 1970s. David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977) told the futuristic story of an alienated man with a deformed baby, while the Jamaican film The Harder They Come (1972) attracted fans with its reggae music and radical politics. The re-released 1936 antimarijuana film Reefer Madness, which had fallen into the public domain, became a staple of 1970s college life, as students laughed at its histrionic portrayal of the dangers of the evil weed. But while these and other films drew dedicated and repeat viewers, none came near matching the fervor inspired by Rocky Horror, which continued its weekend midnight screenings into the 2000s.

With the invention and commercial availability of home-video technology, the 1980s saw a shift in the nature of the cult film. Midnight screenings of offbeat films continued apace, but the sense of community engendered by cult films often was fragmented by the prevalence of private home viewing.

Nonetheless, several cult films emerged, from Frank Henenlotter's splatter epic Basket Case (1982) to Alex Cox's punk-influenced Repo Man (1984). The 1990s continued this trajectory, with overlooked films such as The Big Lebowski (1998) often finding their cults only after their theatrical releases ended.

Whitney Strub

See also: Beat Generation: Film, Independent: Rocky Horror Picture Show, The: Warhol, Andy: Waters, John.

Further Reading

Hoberman, J., and Jonathan Rosenbaum. Midnight Movies. New York: Harper & Row, 1983.

Peary, Danny. Cult Movies. New York: Delta, 1981.

Suárez, Juan. Bike Boys, Drag Queens, and Superstars: Avant-Garde, Mass Culture, and Gay Identities in the 1960s Underground Cinema. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.

Film, Hollywood

Hollywood film has a complex relationship with the images, icons, and individuals associated with American counterculture. Referring to the district in Los Angeles that has been the historical center of the major motion picture studios, the term Hollywood film is used to indicate mainstream films made within the studio system.

These films typically are made with large budgets, allowing for extensive, well-researched settings and costumes, as well as the support and enhancement of elaborate special effects. High-budget films also have the advantage of lengthy filming and production schedules, and are populated with high-profile actors and production personnel. Typically, these films are released in major theaters across the country, share promotional links with other entertainment media, and effectively utilize business synergies to promote products and services of nationally recognized brand names featured in the films.

In the decades since the development of the studio system, Hollywood films have been regulated from within and without to safeguard mainstream values, ideals, and moralities, often leading to the exclusion, marginalization, or negative representation of the American counterculture. Nevertheless, Hollywood film also has consistently appropriated and exploited the counterculture to expand its thematic and visual range and to increase box office receipts.

Regulation of Images and Ideas

Classical Hollywood film is considered to have begun in 1915, with the release of D.W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation. The Hollywood studio system gave structure to the standards and organization of filmmaking, ensuring that films conformed to particular modes of production and that all individuals working in the industry were studio employees. Over time, this standardization resulted in a distinct uniformity among the films produced (as well as audience expectations), rewarding productions that supported the studio vision, blocking auteurism, and resisting other attempts to expand the styles, techniques, and thematic offerings of feature films.

The content of individual films, however, often reflected the more liberal attitudes of the day, which defied conventional morality and routinely contained reflections of the counterculture of the era, including sexual liberalism, deviation from gender-role standards, and drug use, as well as featuring morally ambiguous endings that failed to enforce mainstream morals and values. Films such as Glorifying the American Girl (1929), with its virtual nudity and pioneering use of the word damn, and the notorious Convention City (1933), in which themes of lechery, drunkenness, and blackmail dominated, gave a complex dimension to the early years of film.

The culture into which these films would enter, however, sought to ensure that the new medium, with all its possibilities, was kept in line with mainstream norms and attitudes (generally reflecting values and standards of rural areas, rather than those of more liberal cities). In the decision in Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio (1915), which remained in force until 1952, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the content of motion pictures was not safeguarded by the First Amendment. This opened the door for local cities to pass ordinances banning the screening of films deemed inconsistent with public morality, in keeping with accepted standards that defined obscenity as material which might “deprave or corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences” (Rosen v. United States, 1896).

In the first decade of the studio era, scandals of drug abuse, bisexuality, rape, and murder were linked to such Hollywood actors as Roscoe “Fatty” Arbuckle, Jeanne Eagles, and Wallace Reid and were sensationalized in newspaper headlines as a clear threat to the moral fabric of society. Public outcry to “clean up” Hollywood threatened the economy and future of the motion picture industry. The lax, high-profile lifestyles of affluent Hollywood figures, coupled with political and philosophical viewpoints that were frequently far removed from the mainstream, made the Hollywood community a frequent target of suspicion, regulation, sanction, and reform for decades to come. (A similar outcry would arise against major Hollywood figures in the McCarthy era of the 1940s and 1950s, when communist sympathies, rather than sex and drugs, would be the focus of suspicion and persecution. Among those targeted were actors Paul Robeson and Eddie Albert, and screenwriters Lillian Hellman and Ring Lardner, Jr.)

In response, the Motion Pictures Producers and Distributors Association (MPPDA) was formed in 1922, charged with establishing a moral standard for Hollywood films. The Motion Picture Production Code was written in 1930 by a Jesuit priest, Father Daniel Lord, but the code went largely ignored until 1934, when it officially took effect.

The Motion Picture Production Code also was known as the Hays Code, after Will H. Hays, then head of the MPPDA. Hays had attempted to regulate the content of motion pictures for years, beginning with his 1927 publication Don'ts and Be Carefuls. With the enactment of the code and the establishment of the Production Code Administration as an enforcing body, Hays's name became synonymous with censorship and reinforcement of mainstream values and morality. His efforts were both prompted and supported by the Catholic Legion of Decency, which would urge Catholics to boycott any film deemed indecent by Catholic moral codes.

Tenets of the code mandated the advocacy of “correct moral standards” and required that films not draw into question the laws of man or nature. Specific prohibitions were enumerated for the portrayals of sexuality, “perversions” (including, but not limited to, homosexuality), and miscegenation, as well as framing lifestyles outside of mainstream norms and values as attractive or appealing in any way.

Major studios challenged code rulings on a number of films, such as The Outlaw (1943), which contained highly sexualized scenes not seen before in the Western genre, and Confessions of a Nazi Spy (1939), deemed out of line with the government's prewar foreign policies. But it was largely the small, independent studios that challenged regulations and censors and produced films that explored beliefs, values, and lifestyles outside the mainstream. For major studios that relied on good box office receipts and good public relations, the Motion Picture Production Code successfully cut off films from many of the key social, moral, and cultural debates of the time.

With the increasing influx of foreign films, as well as the evolution of the moral and political stances of mainstream America, close adherence to the Motion Picture Production Code lagged. Its impact weakened significantly throughout the 1940s and 1950s, allowing for only minor editing of films such as Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf (1966), which portrayed domestic violence and alcoholism, and contained an abundance of strong language.

In 1966, when director Michelangelo Antonioni's film Blowup was denied a certificate of compliance with the Motion Picture Production Code because of its inclusion of full frontal female nudity, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM) studios disregarded the legally unenforceable code and went ahead and released the film. With this final blow to its authority, the 1934 code was abandoned in 1968 in favor of the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) rating system. That system, which indicates suitability for particular audiences based on a film's content, was refined over the next forty years to more closely reflect the age-appropriateness of material.

While the MPAA system has significantly broadened the representation of non-mainstream issues, interests, and individuals, it also has drawn severe criticism for its inconsistency and the secrecy that shrouds both the process by which ratings decisions are reached and the committee members who make them. While intended to be adaptable to changing social norms and the needs of an increasingly diverse population, individual film ratings undoubtedly are affected by the personal views of the members of the ratings committee as well as by mainstream opinions.

Strong language, nudity, sexual content, and violence are all key factors in determining a film's rating. In keeping with the overarching social and moral conventions of the United States, however, MPAA ratings tend to favor violence over sexuality, and displays of hetero-normative sexuality over the range of gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgendered involvement.

Countercultures in Hollywood Films

The demise of the Motion Picture Production Code, along with the financial collapse of the existing studio system, made the 1960s and 1970s landmark decades for expression, experimentation, and thematic expansion in Hollywood. With the increased options made available by the ratings system, mainstream films such as The Graduate (1968), in which an older woman seduces a young college graduate about to be married to her daughter, and Bob and Carol and Ted and Alice (1969), a comedy/drama about two married couples experimenting with open marriages and partner swapping, explored the "new sexuality" with significant box office success and critical acclaim. The two films netted numerous Academy Award, Grammy, Golden Globe, and other nominations and wins for their respective directors, Mike Nichols and Paul Mazursky, as they ventured into the sexual revolution with themes of sexually aggressive women, intergenerational seduction, and swinging, simmering just beneath the surface of respectable middle-class lifestyles.

John Schlesinger's 1969 Midnight Cowboy, the only X-rated film to win the Academy Award for Best Picture (the designation was later changed to R), also explored sexual taboos on screen, incorporating explicit homosexuality as part of a male hustler's dark struggle to survive. Other on-screen forays into the world of the forbidden were portrayed in Roger Corman's The Trip (1967), as drug dealer Dennis Hopper ushers commercial director Peter Fonda into a vortex of psychedelic tripping on LSD.

The relationship between Hollywood films and the American counterculture, however, extends well beyond issues of sexuality and substance abuse. From the 1960s forward, not only representations of illicit behavior gained ground, but political commentary, rebellion, antiestablishment sentiment, minority perspectives, and alternative lifestyles also were cultivated as themes worthy of exploration. This era saw the creation of a dialogue between film and politics that was novel for its time and that many argue has not been repeated since.

Filmmakers and social commentators insisted that film and social commentary were intimately related, and Hollywood film was profoundly affected by that growing association. Films such as Bonnie and Clyde (1967), which celebrated the exploits of America's notorious gangster couple during the "public enemy era," Alice's Restaurant (1968), a counterculture commentary on American bureaucracy and justice, and the antiestablishment road movie Easy Rider (1969), which celebrated rebellion and outsider culture, all helped shape the present-day notion of American national cinema, although the latter has subsumed the 1960s counterculture into mainstream nostalgia.

Political satires, which arose from a more critical cold war trend in the 1960s—such as The President's Analyst (1967), a send-up about a psychiatrist burdened with the inner world of the head of state as he becomes a target for spies from around the globe, and Seven Days in May (1964), about a plot by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to overthrow the president of the United States—exploded in Hollywood's New Wave with films expressing disillusionment with political institutions and the American Dream. Among these were The Strawberry Statement (1970), whose depiction of anti-Vietnam War protests at Columbia University was exploited by MGM for its counterculture message advocating student uprisings and resistance to authority; the box office smash All the President's Men (1976), which exposed the Nixon administration's Watergate scandal; and the post-Watergate conspiracy film The Parallax View (1974). These releases, along with others of their era, reflected and shaped a sociopolitical environment that drew into question mainstream values and lifestyles.

The shift in political and social consciousness in the film industry in the post-studio era also gave rise to increased representation of African Americans in major motion pictures. For the first time, mainstream films expanded opportunities for African American actors, such as Richard Roundtree, Melvin van Peebles, and Pam Grier, in films such as Shaft (1971), Superfly (1972), and Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971). However, while they did propel African Americans into the mainstream cinematic forefront, the body of films produced in this era generally is categorized as "blaxploitation" films—because of their stereotypical images and themes and the studios' financial exploitation of the African American community as a target audience.

Not until the mid-1980s would a major African American perspective emerge in film, from the work of director-producer Spike Lee. Like that of many directors who utilize their films to explore issues of identity outside the mainstream, Lee's work, including the award-winning blockbuster Malcolm X (1992), starring Denzel Washington and Angela Bassett, remains separate from the Hollywood system.

The loss of centralized influence and regulation that accompanied the downfall of the classic studio system also created space in the mainstream film industry for the rise of the auteur director. Beginning with the groundbreaking low-budget exploitation films of Roger Corman, known as "King of the Bs," auteur films by notable directors such as Wes Craven, Martin Scorsese, Francis Ford Coppola, John Sayles, and Steven Spielberg have attained prominence in mainstream film and cult status among audiences.

The relationship that inheres among cult films, Hollywood, and major theater chains is complex: cult films historically have emerged from independent studios, are shot on low budgets, and are destined for limited release in art-house theaters or at midnight screenings. In the 2000s, however, independently produced cult films drawing heavily on countercultural interests and themes, such as auteur director Quentin Tarantino's Academy Award-winning crime mosaic centered on the Los Angeles underworld, Pulp Fiction (1994), his two-volume homage to classic samurai movies and spaghetti Westerns, Kill Bill: Vol. 1 (2003), Kill Bill: Vol. 2 (2004), and Grindhouse (2007), a return to the classic B movies of the 1950s, increasingly display the characteristics of major Hollywood films. These characteristics—"name" actors, big budgets, and nationwide release in major theaters—blur the lines between Hollywood film and the independent and cult genres.

Cynthia J. Miller

See also: Easy Rider: Film, Independent: Hopper, Dennis: McCarthyism.

Further Reading

Bernstein, Matthew. Controlling Hollywood: Censorship and Regulation in the Studio Era. Piscataway, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1999.

Bordwell, David, et al. The Classical Hollywood Cinema. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.

Kisch, John, and Edward Mapp. A Separate Cinema: Fifty Years of Black-Cast Posters. New York: Noonday, 1992.

Vaughn, Stephen. Freedom and Entertainment: Rating the Movies in an Age of New Media. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Film, Independent

Independent films are those produced outside the Hollywood studio system. They are created, advertised, and exhibited separately from the first-run theatrical circuit maintained by the oligopoly of major studios (Disney, Paramount Pictures, Sony Pictures, 20th Century Fox Film, Universal Pictures, and Warner Bros.). Independent filmmakers, producers, and their audiences historically have pushed the boundaries of acceptable themes and forms relative to mainstream or dominant-studio-produced films. “Indie” films, as they are nicknamed, generally have much smaller budgets than Hollywood features for production, advertising, and distribution; utilize producers, directors, and actors who work outside the studio system; deal with controversial or overlooked subject matter; rely on niche or specialized audiences to attend screenings; and experiment with filmic storytelling, through narrative (order or structure) and aesthetic (visual or aural) innovations.

Since 1979, the Sundance Film Festival in Park City, Utah, has been the preeminent American venue for showcasing the work of independent filmmakers. (Kristan Jacobsen/Getty Images)

Antecedents

While scholars and studios identify independent film as a distinct category starting in the 1980s, the United States boasts a long tradition of practices and products cultivated outside the studio system. Outside the Hollywood mainstream—which by the 1950s was entrenched in repetitive, profit-driven formulas—filmmakers produced and circulated works of avant-garde sensibility, cultivating personal and political uses of film and developing technique and content alongside other modernist art forms. Americans creating avant-garde films challenged subject matter and film form, as seen in Manhatta (1921), a modernist depiction of New York City; The Enchanted City (1922), a modernist blend of live-action and animated film; Meshes in the Afternoon (1943), an expressionist depiction of women in domestic spaces; and Introspection (1941 and 1946), an abstract construction of the human body and dance.

In the 1960s, avant-garde filmmaking surged in the United States with the advent of technology that made cameras smaller and easier to operate. Films were freed from genre or other “classifying” constraints, and many emerged in the context of counterculture movements themselves, with filmmakers addressing such personal and social issues as drug cultures, alternative lifestyles, race relations, and other topics ignored by Hollywood fare. Youth labeled “hippies,” “activists,” and “rebels” and other antiestablishment figures sought out films that reflected more of their concerns than did Hollywood films, and the U.S. countercultures of the late 1960s and into the 1970s were especially engaged in women’s liberation, civil rights, and the antiwar movement. As an expression of their antiestablishment mind-set, they looked for films produced by and for outsiders to mainstream culture.

Armed with handheld cameras and dedication, filmmakers recorded and created new kinds of films. Some artists experimented with film as a medium, including manipulating the film stock by scratching it, painting on it, or otherwise making physical modifications. Among these filmmakers were Stan Brakage, whose silent, nonnarrative films Cat’s Cradle (1959), Window Water Baby Moving (1962), and Mothlight (1963) were and remain an inspiration to cinematic innovators; Yvonne Rainer, one of the premier feminist avant-garde filmmakers; and Ron Rice of the Beat filmmakers.

“Underground” filmmakers such as John Cassavetes also emerged. Cassavetes’s films—including the personal narrative films Shadows (1959), Faces (1968), and A Woman Under the Influence (1974)—and that of other underground filmmakers are known for an aggressive, handheld camera style and anti-Hollywood form in general, as well as for challenging mainstream depictions of interpersonal relationships while openly presenting alternative lifestyles.

From the 1960s on, independents gained market share by producing films for audiences who were unimpressed or underrepresented by Hollywood. Independents filmed controversial or unusual subject matter, and they developed distribution strategies outside those of the major studios.

Cinema created by minorities often responded to their exclusion from and misrepresentation in mainstream cinema. Chicanos raised during the civil rights movements in the United States made films about their experiences, including Luis Valdez’s I Am Joaquín (1969), an interpretation of Mexican American heritage based on the poem by Rodolfo “Corky” Gonzales, and Jesús Salvador Treviño’s Yo soy chicano (I Am Chicano) (1972), a documentary of Mexican American history.

African Americans also actively attempted to assert control over their representation on screen. One of the most influential black independent films in America was Sweet Sweetback’s Baadasssss Song (1971), written and directed by Melvin van Peebles. Its breakthrough success opened the door for other African Americans to create socially engaged films.

The box office success of counterculture movies such as Easy Rider (1969), which celebrated rebellious outsiders and drug culture (directed by Dennis Hopper) and Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song, which was a hit not only with black audiences but with nonblack youth as well, encouraged Hollywood executives to take chances on younger talent that might be better connected to what audiences wanted to see. While Hollywood of the 1970s permitted an unprecedented amount of experimental work to be made by directors within the system, the studios ultimately clashed with directors who wanted creative control over their films.

Many American directors studied rebellious and groundbreaking European directors who exerted primary artistic control over their work, such as the directors of the French New Wave (Jean-Luc Godard, François Truffaut, and others). Idealistic Americans, believing that they deserved the same creative freedom, sought financing outside the strictures of the major studios.

Emergence

After unprecedented grosses from Hollywood blockbusters such as Jaws (Steven Spielberg, 1975) and Star Wars (George Lucas, 1977), studios increasingly demanded commercially oriented mass-audience films. In the 1980s, working within the system meant being subject to oversight that demanded formulaic, predictable cinema. As a consequence, space was created for a new wave of independent film in the United States. Indeed, there still were filmmakers who strived to make, and audiences who supported, films that were not Hollywood mainstream products.

Directors such as Jim Jarmusch and John Sayles have demonstrated that there are ways to make films without studio support by taking advantage of funding by smaller companies or private investors. Among Jarmusch's acclaimed films, his Stranger Than Paradise (1984) often is cited for inspiring the wave of American indie projects that followed. Noted for its artistic qualities and narrative patterns that defied the Hollywood model, Stranger Than Paradise was a favorite at the French Cannes Film Festival. Sayles's work follows similar trends, in that he chooses subjects and styles at odds with mainstream cinema. Sayles has made films that explore such themes as incest (Lone Star, 1996, perhaps his best-known work), racism and labor rights in mining country (Matewan, 1987), and guerilla warfare and government corruption in Central America (Men with Guns, 1997). Jarmusch's and Sayles's films consistently have earned critical if not popular acclaim, contributing to their longevity as indie filmmakers and indirectly supporting the work of others.

The symbiotic relationship among producers, distributors, directors, and all creators of an independent film cannot be overstated. Networks created through festivals, most notably the Cannes Film Festival in France (founded in 1939) and the Sundance Film Festival in Utah (inaugurated in 1979), provide exposure for films to find distribution funds and introduce new talent to producers and distributors. Cable television stations such as the Independent Film Channel (launched in 1994) and the Sundance Channel (launched in 1996) have provided much-needed space for independent film on the small screen. Premium lines of DVDs, especially the Criterion Collection, have focused attention on niche American audiences by supporting independent and foreign films.

These outlets are crucial in supporting minority and women directors and producers. Within the studio system, women's participation is concentrated in areas such as costume design, screenwriting, and editing; it has been rare for women to participate in more high-profile creative roles such as directing. Into the twenty-first century, minorities continue to be drastically underrepresented in Hollywood and often rely on independent producers to make films about issues relevant to their communities and to employ minority workers.

Prominent examples of women and minorities in independent cinema include Spike Lee (director, writer, and producer), whose breakout film She's Gotta Have It (1986) paved the way for explorations of race, gender, and other controversial issues in subsequent work; Julie Dash (director, writer, and producer), whose work explores race, gender, and alternative narrative, focusing especially on black women and identity; and Christine Vachon (producer), whose company, Killer Films, supports work challenging mainstream status quos. Vachon established herself as a leading independent producer of the 1990s and 2000s exploring taboo social topics, especially alternative sexual identities, as evidenced by her ongoing relationship with directors Todd Haynes (Poison, 1991; Velvet Goldmine, 1998; and Far From Heaven, 2002) and Todd Solondz (Happiness, 1998; and Storytelling, 2001), as well as by her support for the highly controversial Kids (directed by Larry Clark, 1995) and Boys Don't Cry (directed by Kimberly Peirce, 1999).

While independent filmmakers prefer to work outside the system so as to retain primary creative control over their projects, independent film exhibition also introduces up-and-coming talent to the studio system. Arguably, the leaders of American indie cinema from the late 1980s and into the 2000s were Harvey and Bob Weinstein, the creators of Miramax Films. They were behind the biggest landmarks of indie distribution, from The Thin Blue Line (Errol Morris, 1988) and sex, lies, and videotape (Steven Soderbergh, 1989) to Pulp Fiction (Quentin Tarantino, 1994). The Weinsteins invested in films with controversial material, often appealing to counterculture interest in over-the-top or alternative sexual lifestyles and depictions of drugs and violence, which they hoped would turn a profit. The Weinsteins' lives changed dramatically when they acquired sex, lies, and videotape at Cannes. With aggressive marketing, it was a hit both critically and popularly. Its box office gross (about five times the previous standard for indie success) changed expectations for many aspiring filmmakers who, by the 1990s, hoped that the right exposure would make them famous and rich.

Prospects

Despite the trend toward "star searching," many filmmakers and producers remain committed to transgressing the rules of acceptable content or form as followed by Hollywood, working with smaller budgets and lower chances of breakout success than the mainstream blockbuster model. Filmmakers such as Richard Linklater (Slacker, 1991), Robert Rodriguez (El Mariachi, 1992), Kevin Smith (Clerks, 1994), and many more have proven that a low-budget production with a nonprofessional cast about nontraditional subjects can become quality cinema and popular cinema, which holds out hope to dreamers yet to make their first film.

The future of independent film is always an interesting topic. Independent film is defined as a product that distinguishes itself from Hollywood in multiple ways, yet Hollywood is known for absorbing successful innovations into its commercial domain. Thus, filmmakers interested in cinema as an innovative art form must continuously respond to that which has become passé and create something fresh.

As a product that circulates in a commercial sphere, however, indie cinema cannot survive if it does not appeal to a wide enough audience to finance future endeavors. This paradox is exactly what makes it so attractive to countercultures. The fact that it can and does serve niche audiences, and that it must be supported by specialized audiences to survive, is precisely what inspires many cinephiles to believe that indie cinema is more responsive to countercultures and subcultures than any other form in the public arena.

Jean Anne Lauer

See also: Chicano Movement: Easy Rider: Film, Hollywood.

Further Reading

Biskind, Peter. Down and Dirty Pictures: Miramax, Sundance, and the Rise of Independent Film. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2004.

Cook, David A. A History of Narrative Film. New York: W.W. Norton, 2004.

Dixon, Winston Wheeler, and Gwendolyn Audrey Foster, eds. Experimental Cinema: The Film Reader. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Kramer, Peter. "Post-Classical Hollywood." In The Oxford Guide to Film Studies, ed. John Hill and Pamela Church Gibson. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Neale, Steve, and Murray Smith, eds. Contemporary Hollywood Cinema. London: Routledge, 1998.

Pierson, John. Spike, Mike, Slackers, and Dykes: A Guided Tour Across a Decade of American Independent Cinema. New York: Hyperion, 1996.

Pribram, E. Deidre. Cinema and Culture: Independent Film in the United States, 1980–2001. New York: Peter Lang, 2002.

Fitzgerald, F. Scott (1896–1940)

The great American novelist and short-story writer Francis Scott Key Fitzgerald was a major voice of the generation that epitomized the Jazz Age, the period roughly between the end of World War I in 1918 and the stock market crash of 1929. In a succession of novels and short stories, Fitzgerald presented Americans of the 1920s as a disaffected, energetic, searching people. He became a leading figure of the so-called Lost Generation, writers and artists who became disillusioned with American life and culture after World War I and chose to live and work in Europe.

Fitzgerald was born on September 24, 1896. Coming of age in the early decades of the twentieth century, he not only chronicled the Jazz Age, he embodied it. In 1913, Fitzgerald entered Princeton University, where he established himself as a colorful campus personality and talented student, but not a particularly successful one academically. He dropped out in 1917. In This Side of Paradise (1920), based heavily on his college experience, Fitzgerald introduced a generation of Americans consumed by booze and petting parties and a peripatetic lifestyle of hip flasks, bob-haired flappers, and the freedom afforded by automobiles. The novel, however, dramatizes the lost ideals, youthful ambitions, and excesses of Fitzgerald's peers as well as their frivolities. The work seduced a generation of readers by reflecting what they were feeling and doing, and by dramatizing the values and behavior that would come to personify the Jazz Age.

Shortly after the publication of This Side of Paradise, Fitzgerald married Zelda Sayre, a young woman known in her hometown of Montgomery, Alabama, as a beautiful and popular girl, albeit an aggressive coquette. The couple came to define the opulent and, at times, decadent lifestyle of the Roaring Twenties. Their public drunkenness and idiosyncratic behavior—such as riding on the hoods of taxicabs and wading in public fountains—established them as entertaining public figures. Fitzgerald became as well known for his outlandish escapades as for his writing. Indeed, his public image and his literature fed on each other. His 1922 novel, The Beautiful and the Damned, is about a couple whose alcohol consumption and partying life mirrored that of the Fitzgeralds.

Fitzgerald's third novel, The Great Gatsby (1925), generally is regarded as his masterpiece—and one of the great works of American literature of any vintage—but it was largely ignored at the time. Indeed, the novel's literary merits would not be recognized until a decade after the writer's death. Depicting the lavish parties and reckless lifestyles of the rich, The Great Gatsby is a narrative commentary on the core of dissatisfaction, ennui, and selfishness that lay at the heart of the upper class during the Jazz Age. Its dramatic power derives as well from the classic American tension between romantic idealism and materialism—with the triumph of the latter.

Fitzgerald's creative output ran roughly parallel with the Jazz Age itself. As the stock market crash of October 1929 brought an end to the affluence of the 1920s, it also marked the beginning of Fitzgerald's personal difficulties. Zelda suffered a mental breakdown the following spring, and she was institutionalized for schizophrenia for much of the rest of her life.

As F. Scott's alcohol consumption increased, his popularity declined proportionately. He suffered a nervous breakdown of his own in 1935, which he chronicled a decade later in a three-part Esquire magazine series called "The Crack-Up." His candid self-assessment, a kind of secular confession, would inspire a generation of poets and writers who became known in the 1950s and 1960s for their confessional writing, including Sylvia Plath, Anne Sexton, and Robert Lowell.

"The Crack-Up" series also let Hollywood know that the philosopher of the Jazz Age was available and fit for work. Used to being in full control of his work, however, Fitzgerald could not yield to the demands of Hollywood screenwriting, where a script passed through many hands and was subject to change by any of them. His drinking did not subside in Hollywood; in fact, it contributed to his firing by United Artists in 1939.

At the time of his death on December 21, 1940, at age forty-four, Fitzgerald was working on The Last Tycoon, an unfinished novel about Hollywood. Within a decade, his novels and story collections were back in print, the focus of serious criticism, and the objects of acclaim.

Michael Susko

See also: Fitzgerald, Zelda, Jazz, Lost Generation.

Further Reading

Brucoli, Matthew J. Some Sort of Epic Grandeur: The Life of F. Scott Fitzgerald. 1981. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Brucoli, Matthew J., and Judith S. Baughman, eds. Fitzgerald: A Life in Letters. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1994.

Meyers, Jeffrey. Scott Fitzgerald: A Biography. New York: HarperCollins, 1994.

Fitzgerald, Zelda (1900–1948)

The wife of Jazz Age novelist F. Scott Fitzgerald, Zelda Sayre Fitzgerald was defined by her contemporaries as the quintessential "flapper"—a new type of woman who emerged during the 1920s wearing short skirts, fashioning bobbed hair, listening to jazz, and engaging in socially unacceptable behavior. She gained notoriety for her social exploits as well as for her role as muse, inspiring many of her husband's most famous female characters, including Nicole Diver of Tender Is the Night (1934), set in the hedonistic society of the Roaring Twenties.

Zelda Sayre was born in Montgomery, Alabama, on July 24, 1900. The youngest of six children, she was named after a gypsy queen in a novel, and she worked throughout her life to create an artistic identity. As a child she was said to be impetuous, independent, and intelligent. Her father was a conservative Alabama Supreme Court judge, but Zelda rejected the strict gender roles prescribed for the young, genteel, Southern women of the time. She was highly popular in her hometown but felt suffocated in the rigid social atmosphere.

In July 1918, a month after her high school graduation, she met a young first lieutenant in the Sixty-seventh Infantry named F. Scott Fitzgerald. He proposed marriage a short time later, but she rejected his offer. He asked again after the success of his first novel, This Side of Paradise (1920), and the couple was married on April 3, 1920. Wearing a midnight blue suit for the ceremony, Zelda boldly eschewed the social norms of the era.

The Fitzgeralds became icons of the freedom and exuberant lifestyle that epitomized the Jazz Age. Spending money freely and drinking liberally, they were regulars on the New York social scene, carousing publicly. As the drinking continued, however, their marriage became troubled, and the happiness that defined the honeymoon began to erode.

Zelda soon became pregnant, yet continued her wild lifestyle. At a time when pregnant women rarely walked down the street, she went to a public swimming pool and was promptly asked to leave. The couple's daughter, Frances "Scottie" Fitzgerald, was born in October 1921, which did not keep the new parents from continuing their raucous living. Moving to Paris, to the French Riviera, and back to America, the couple became entrenched in the 1920s literary scene along the way, forging friendships with the Lost Generation of writers and artists, including Ernest Hemingway, John Dos Passos, Gertrude Stein, and others.

As her husband found growing critical acclaim and celebrity, Zelda Fitzgerald, herself a writer, sought to establish her own artistic identity. She wrote a number of articles for various magazines, including two on the flapper. Between 1922 and 1923, she published two short stories, a review, and two articles.

In 1927, after returning to America, Fitzgerald commenced intensive ballet training, intending to become a professional dancer. The couple returned to Europe in 1929, and she continued her obsession with dance training.

In the spring of 1930, she suffered the first of several mental breakdowns and was admitted to a hospital in Switzerland, where she remained until the following year. Diagnosed as schizophrenic, Fitzgerald would spend the remainder of her life in and out of sanitariums. After a relapse in 1932, she was admitted to the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, and it was there that she wrote her first and only published novel, Save Me the Waltz (1932), which closely mirrored her own life.

Zelda Fitzgerald continued to write during her institutionalization but failed to gain the literary notoriety she so desired. On March 10, 1948, she died in a fire at the Asheville, North Carolina, sanitarium where she lived.

Melissa Williams

See also: Fitzgerald, F. Scott: Flappers and Flapper Culture: Jazz.

Further Reading

Fitzgerald, Zelda. The Collected Writings of Zelda Fitzgerald. Ed. Matthew J. Bruccoli. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1991.

Milford, Nancy. Zelda: A Biography. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.

Flappers and Flapper Culture

Flappers and flapper culture have long been regarded as quintessential symbols of the Roaring Twenties. Flapper, the term popularly used to designate young, fashionable, daring women of this period, derived from the “flapping” sound made by the unbuttoned galoshes that were part of the largely movie-created image. The flapper was a young woman known first and foremost for her distinctive look: a slim, boyish silhouette, noticeably short skirts, and hair worn much shorter than women had previously, in a style that became known as the “bob.” The flapper, whose image was especially inspired by the popularity of the movie star Clara Bow, the 1920s “It Girl,” also pushed the boundaries of accepted behavior in young, single women.

The flapper culture of the 1920s reflected a new independence and carefree spirit on the part of young women. Flapper style, featuring short, form-fitting skirts and bobbed hair, likewise represented a break from straight-laced Victorian convention. (Sasha/Stringer/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The image of the flapper became almost completely intertwined with the image of the Roaring Twenties as a period of unprecedented social permissiveness, especially for white middle-class young women. The post–World War I economic boom produced wealth for many Americans, and a decade of opulence and leisure for many. Flapper culture featured jazz music, daring new dances such as the Charleston and Lucky Lindy, and, most significantly, changes regarding acceptable feminine behavior. Prohibition fueled flapper culture by creating speakeasy saloons, establishments where alcohol could be purchased illegally. The parameters of acceptable social interaction and sexual behavior between unmarried partners were also challenged, with the aid of the automobile, the increased availability of which created new opportunities for couples to be alone together and led to the decline of the chaperone.

The flapper culture permeated American society during the 1920s. It was in many ways the first American youth culture, in which the younger generation chose to radically break from, rather than imitate, the styles and modes of behavior of its elders. Yet the freewheeling social life of the flapper and her beaux also shaped the expectations of married women (and men), shifting them toward the idea of the “companionate marriage”—a more intimate and less hierarchical relationship between husband and wife.

The flapper culture came to an abrupt end with the stock market crash of 1929 and the Great Depression that followed. Despite their countercultural leanings, flappers enjoyed a liberation that was largely on the surface, with increasingly daring social behavior substituting for substantive political activism. Nevertheless, flapper culture ultimately expanded definitions of acceptable feminine behavior and empowered women to become more independent; many of its ideals would inspire later movements for women’s rights.

See also: Fashion; Fitzgerald, Zelda; Jazz; Prohibition; Smoking, Tobacco.

Further Reading

Israel, Betsy. Bachelor Girl: The Secret History of Single Women in the Twentieth Century. New York: HarperCollins, 2002.

Landay, Lori. "The Flapper Film: Comedy, Dance, and Jazz Age Kinaesthetics." In A Feminist Reader in Early Cinema, ed. Jennifer M. Bean and Diane Negra. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2002.

Sagert, Kelly Boyer. Flappers: A Guide to an American Subculture. Wesport, CT: Greenwood, 2009.

Flower Children

The term flower children, a common synonym for hippies, refers to the mostly young people who congregated in and around San Francisco in 1967 for the so-called Summer of Love and whose counterculture style and lifestyle epitomized the hippie movement for a time thereafter. Following the lyrics of John Phillips and Scott McKenzie's hit song of that spring, "San Francisco (Be Sure to Wear Flowers in Your Hair)"—"If you're going to San Francisco/be sure to wear some flowers in your hair"—hippies who attended the Monterey Pop Festival that June and then congregated in Haight-Ashbury wore flowers in their hair and painted them on their clothes, backpacks, and drug paraphernalia as symbols of peace and love.

During the Summer of Love, the use of drugs, interest in Eastern religions and Native American spirituality, and sex with multiple partners all became expressions of dissidence against mainstream American culture, which was considered fraudulent and repressed. Even the physical appearance of the flower children embodied the desire to rebel against mainstream America. Men wore beards, mustaches, sideburns, and long, unkempt hair. Women did not perm or roll their hair, as was common at the time, and often left their underarms and legs unshaven and went without makeup or bras. For the flower children, clothes were costumes—they wore India beads and headbands, big granny glasses, long dresses, homemade tie-dye, and jeans and flannel shirts. Bright colors were important as they contrasted with the perceived blandness of mainstream culture and supposedly enhanced the experience of psychedelic drugs.

Scott McKenzie's recording of "San Francisco" was so successful in rallying young people to the city that an estimated 100,000 people arrived from all over the country. The Summer of Love proved integral to the dissemination of the counterculture, as many newly converted flower children left the city carrying its message and style. With them went new ideas (of love and peace as a panacea to social and political ills), behaviors (promoting the use of marijuana and LSD), and fashions (long hair, tie-dye) into their own suburbs and cities.

"San Francisco" was hardly the only song embraced by the flower children. Bands such as the Grateful Dead had the ability to generate reactions from their audience members that challenged the perceived rationality and order of mainstream America. The audience, many of whom were high on marijuana or LSD, found their own particular rhythms and movements thanks to the unpolished sound of the Grateful Dead. Flashing lights contributed to the psychedelic experience.

Many flower children followed the exhortations of drug gurus such as Timothy Leary, who promised that LSD would take users on a deep spiritual journey. “LSD is the sacrament that will put you in touch with the ancient two million year old wisdom inside of you,” he said. “It frees one to go to the next stage, which is evolution, timelessness, the ancient reincarnation thing that we always carry inside.”

The drug-induced state of the flower children had other theme songs, such as Jefferson Airplane’s “White Rabbit.” The lyrics, beginning with “One pill makes you taller/And one pill makes you small/And the ones that mother gives you/Don’t do anything at all” declared a rejection of what they believed their parents symbolized—repression, boredom, and hate—and replaced it with a desire to drop out of mainstream American culture through music and drugs (both considered revolutionary), as well as the advocacy of peace and love to cure social ills. The Beatles’s album Sgt. Pepper’s Lonely Heart’s Club Band (1967) also became popular with the flower children, as nearly every song seemed to reference hippie ideals and the drug culture.

The love and innocence of the flower-child movement gave way to community activism in April 1969. A group gathered in Berkeley, California, to discuss developing some unused University of California–owned land into a public park called the People’s Park, a space they claimed for the public. The claim of public space reflected a shared belief that all property should be communal and never owned by an individual, corporation, or government. In the People’s Park, the flower children planted flowers, shrubs, trees, and grass. Although the park was well received by the Berkeley community, conservative California Governor Ronald Reagan considered the creation of the park a direct leftist challenge to the property rights of the university and sent in the National Guard to demolish what had been done and install a tall fence around the park perimeter. After the government seizure, planting flowers became a sign of peaceful political resistance against the government. A now-famous photograph taken in May 1969 shows a young woman placing a flower in the muzzle of the rifle of a National Guardsman who was “guarding” the People’s Park from the flower children.

Political action on the part of the flower children also manifested itself in communes, settlements where people shared resources, responsibilities, and often a common living space. One of the most famous communes from the 1960s was in the Haight-Ashbury district in San Francisco. The Diggers, a community service organization and street theater group that emerged out of Haight-Ashbury, attempted to work for political change by fostering cooperative collectives. The antimaterialist group opened free clinics, provided free meals and lodging, and gave free concerts in the Bay Area. Other groups provided free services out of what they deemed a commitment to spreading joy and love.

As the countercultures of the 1960s and 1970s faded, many of the participants took up domesticity and family life. The term flower child was then appropriated to describe Generation X children (those born in the 1960s through the early 1980s) who were raised by the original flower children. Thus, a 1990s reference to “flower children” is usually to those raised in a household that advocated the ideals of love and peace. Often the children were given unusual names by their flower-child parents, such as Sunshine, Star, Moon, and Cree Summer.

Lindsey Churchill

See also: Drug Culture: Free Love: Grateful Dead: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco: Hippies: Leary, Timothy: LSD: Marijuana: San Francisco, California: Woodstock Music and Art Fair.

Further Reading

Bloom, Alexander, and Wini Breines, eds. Takin’ It to the Streets. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Gitlin, Todd. The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage. Toronto, Canada: Bantam, 1987.

Roszak, Theodore. The Making of a Counter Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968.

Folk Music

Folk music is a means of both oral history and popular entertainment. By utilizing active participation, oral traditions, and group improvisation, folk music has played a central role in both forming and sustaining countercultures. Historically, folk music has included ballads, broadsheets, protest songs, cowboy songs, spirituals, hymns, carols, and chants of rural communities. Folk songs discuss a wide array of subject matter, such as social-protest movements, internationalism, peace, everyday life, love, and labor struggles. Traditional and commercial folk music have changed over time in diverse ways, but their functions as a form of oral history and a strategy for social change have remained consistent. Further, folk music has acted as a bridge from counterculture movements to mainstream music by influencing the development of blues, jazz, country, Cajun, bluegrass, and rock.

American folk music of the nineteenth century embraced a blending of European and native traditions. Many of the non-English European ballads imported into the United States were integrated into native folk forms, as immigrants adapted to American culture by learning English. Early American folk appeared primarily as railroad, chain-gang, and spiritual songs. These songs embraced themes of hard work and struggle that reflected the lives of American waged and slave workers.

Especially for new immigrants in the labor force, folk songs provided a sense of collective class identity that often challenged mainstream American notions about equality, opportunity, and justice. Folk music reflected the struggles of daily life, not idealized values. As a result, even in its earliest forms, American folk became closely associated with labor and protest movements, providing outlets for group cohesion and challenges to social injustice.

The Labor and Antiwar Movements

American folk did not become a subject of serious inquiry until the post–World War I era. In 1928, the Library of Congress (LOC) founded the Archive of American Folk Song. Under the leadership of Robert Gordon, the LOC undertook this unique archival project to preserve and document American folk culture.

In 1933, John Lomax replaced Gordon. Lomax and his teenage son, Alan, sought out unorthodox sources of folk throughout the American South. The Lomaxes traveled to cowboy ranches, lumber camps, and prisons, recording folk songs for the LOC archive. During their first trip, in 1933, they met and recorded Huddie “Leadbelly” Ledbetter at Angola prison in Louisiana.

By 1937, Alan Lomax, at the age of twenty-one, had become head of the LOC archive. In contrast to his father's interest in the preservation of traditional folk culture, Alan's main emphasis was on the promotion of leftist folk singers associated with the New Deal and the Communist Party USA (CPUSA).

The CPUSA played an integral role in the promotion of American folk music during the 1930s. Folk music was utilized as a propaganda tool for the labor, peace, and antifascist movements. The Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) had organized folk musicians such as Joe Hill and T-Bone Slim to promote labor struggles earlier in the century. The CPUSA tapped into this American tradition, working closely with such folk musicians as Woody Guthrie, Lee Hayes, Aunt Molly Jackson, Leadbelly, Pete Seeger, and Josh White to promote “communist” themes—labor solidarity, racial unity, peace, and antifascism.

During World War II, the CPUSA’s Almanac Singers helped popularize folk music by composing patriotic and antifascist anthems, including “When the Yanks Go Marching In” and the rowdy, hootenanny, sing-along classic “Round and Round Hitler’s Grave.” Noncommunist activists such as Miles Horton also utilized folk music at the Highlander Folk School in Tennessee to train and entertain Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) and civil rights activists.

Itinerant folk singer and songwriter Woody Guthrie plays for patrons at a pub in New York’s Greenwich Village in 1943. A longtime voice of working people and the downtrodden, he carried a sticker on his guitar that read, “This Machine Kills Fascists.” (Eric Schaal/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

In 1945, Seeger and Mario Casetta founded a new organization in New York City and Los Angeles called People’s Songs. The organization was in many ways a direct outgrowth of the “Double-V” campaigns of African American World War II veterans to battle for victory against racism at home and abroad. The goal of the group was to popularize progressive peace, labor, civil rights, and patriotic folk songs to counter the reactionary politics of the early cold war.

Although People’s Songs musicians were victimized by McCarthyism and the Red Scare, Seeger and his associates succeeded in much of their mission. Seeger, Ronnie Gilbert, Lee Hays, and Fred Hellerman formed the Weavers in 1948; the folk group made a lasting impact before it disbanded in 1953, after the members were brought before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The success of the 1960s folk revival relied heavily on the foundations laid by People’s Songs, the Weavers and the promotional work of Moe Asch at Folkways Records.

Other folk musicians avoided politics to gain wider audiences in American culture. Groups such as the Kingston Trio, the Brothers Four, and the Limelickers gained commercial success in the late 1950s with their brand of nonpolitical folk. The Limelickers even sang jingles for Coca-Cola in order to promote their career. To bridge the gap forming between activist and pop folk musicians, George Wein and Albert Grossman founded the Newport Folk Festival in 1959, featuring upcoming artists such as Bob Dylan and Joan Baez alongside Pete Seeger.

Folk Revival

While progressive folk music had evolved from its countercultural origins of the interwar era into a mainstream force in American culture, the civil rights and anti-Vietnam War movements revived the protest-song traditions of American folk. Musicians such as Arlo Guthrie and Phil Ochs linked radical youth culture and earlier folk traditions of the American left by producing music that was activist oriented.

Folk singing was a powerful method for disseminating activist themes and inspiring solidarity within various 1960s counterculture movements. Songs such as “We Shall Overcome” and “I Ain’t Marchin’ Anymore” became popular anthems for labor organizers, peace protestors, and civil rights activists. Hippies embraced folk-inspired rock anthems such as Jefferson Airplane’s “Somebody to Love,” the Grateful Dead’s “Turn on Your Love Light,” and Buffalo Springfield’s “For What It’s Worth.”

In 1969, the Woodstock Music and Art Fair featured infamous antiwar folk songs, including “I-Feel-Like-I’m-Fixin’-to-Die Rag,” spirituals such as “Amazing Grace,” and the traditional labor anthem “Joe Hill.” Woodstock represented a culmination of nearly every trend in American folk and became the lasting symbol of 1960s counterculture.

By contrast, folk music of the 1970s and 1980s was dominated by popular nonpolitical singers and songwriters. Punk rock and hip-hop became the primary outlets for political youth culture, while popular folk took on soothing and often apolitical characteristics. Artists such as Cat Stevens, Gordon Lightfoot, Simon and Garfunkel, and James Taylor brought themes of personal struggle, romance, and the individual’s spiritual journey to mainstream audiences. Traditional and political folk thrived in countercultural venues such as coffee shops and regional folk events like the Wheatland Music Festival in Michigan.

During the 1990s, folk music became intimately connected with the women’s, LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender), and punk revival movements. Artists such as the Indigo Girls and Melissa Etheridge helped bring activist-inspired folk styles back into the mainstream.

Ani DiFranco blended elements of traditional folk with punk-, feminist-, and queer-inspired themes in her music and promotional work with Righteous Babe Records. DiFranco extended her own vision of folk revival by networking with traditional IWW folk artists such as Utah Phillips for various albums and performances.

Other artists, including Bitch and Animal, Tegan and Sara, Vanessa Marie Spitzer, Lazy Sunday, and Ember Swift, have embraced similar styles with their feminist folk-inspired music. Modern artists such as Flogging Molly, the Dropkick Murphys, the Pogues, Cameron Lewis, Billy Bragg, Alistair Hulett, Liam McKay, Roaring Jack, and Greg Graffin have integrated folk traditions with modern punk counterculture.

Joel A. Lewis

See also: Baez, Joan: Communism: Dylan, Bob: Guthrie, Woody: Industrial Workers of the World: McCarthyism: Newport Folk Festival.

Further Reading

Cohen, Ronald D. Rainbow Quest: The Folk Music Revival and American Society. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2002.

Filene, Benjamin. Romancing the Folk: Public Memory and American Roots Music. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Folk Music Archives. <http://folkmusicarchives.org>

Lieberman, Robbie. My Song Is My Weapon: People’s Songs, American Communism, and the Politics of Culture, 1930–1950. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989.

Foster, Charles H. (1838–1888)

Charles H. Foster was a nineteenth-century American spiritualist who established his reputation as a medium in both the United States and Great Britain. He displayed unusual talents from an early age and, until his premature death from alcoholism, confounded doubters with unexplained phenomena such as skin writing and pellet reading.

Foster was born in 1838 in Salem, Massachusetts, where he attended public school. Spiritualism became a national phenomenon during his childhood, in the late 1840s and early 1850s, thanks to the popularity of Margaret, Kate, and Leah Fox of Hydesville, New York, who claimed to be able to communicate with the dead. At the age of fourteen, Foster began to claim that he, too, could communicate with spirits. Unexplained rapping was said to be heard on his school desk, and furniture in his bedroom was alleged to move around on its own.

Foster's abilities as a medium gained him fame and wealth as a young man. His particular skills were displayed in two areas. One was in skin writing, or stigmata. When he held a séance or other reading, the names of the spirits with whom he communicated would show up on Foster's skin, usually on his forearms. The letters formed bright red welts. Foster's biographer—George C. Bartlett, whose book about him was called The Salem Seer (1891)—related a story of how two men challenged the medium to prove that his abilities were real. As they held his arm, letters appeared on it spelling out the words "Two Fools."

Foster's other skill was known as pellet reading. Participants would write the names of loved ones who had died on slips of paper. The slips were rolled up into pellets and mixed with blank slips. Foster would enter the room, name and describe a deceased loved one to a sitter, and pass along a message to the living. He would then select a pellet, upon which the name of the deceased would be written. Sometimes, Foster would also roll up his sleeves and reveal the name of the dead written upon his forearms.

Foster toured Great Britain in 1861, giving his first séance there in the home of William Wilkinson, editor of The Spiritual Magazine. The intellectual leaders of Victorian society—including novelist Charles Dickens, poet Alfred Lord Tennyson, and novelist William Makepeace Thackeray—also attended séances conducted by Foster. Some attendees reported seeing apparitions, including disembodied hands and a levitating piano.

Foster's reputation soon went into decline, after The Spiritual Magazine reported in 1863 that it had received evidence that he had faked certain phenomena. Some observers noted that the writing on his forearms was consistent with his own handwriting. They also reported that he palmed pellets and examined them under the pretense of lighting a cigar; that the messages from different deceased were very similar; and that names misspelled on pellets were misspelled the same way by the "spirits" Foster invoked.

Foster had always enjoyed fine living, including cigars and alcohol, and his consumption of liquor began to interfere with his work. He later became an alcoholic and in 1881 was taken for treatment to Danvers Insane Asylum in Massachusetts. From 1884 to his death in 1888, he was said to be living in a vegetative state under the care of relatives.

Tim J. Watts

See also: Fox, Kate, Leah Fox, and Margaret Fox: Spiritualism.

Further Reading

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Hawthorn, 1970.

Fox, Kate (1838–1892), Leah Fox (1814–1890), and Margaret Fox (1833–1893)

The sisters Kate, Leah, and Margaret Fox of western New York State are widely acknowledged as the originators of modern spiritualism in the United States, a philosophy that promotes the immortality of the human spirit, in which personality and communication continue after death. Associated with advocates of other nineteenth-century countercultures, such as free love, temperance, abolitionism, and women's rights, spiritualists did not accept traditional religious or social beliefs; the majority of its millions of members were drawn from various reform movements.

In March 1848, the Fox family was alarmed by a series of “rappings” and other apparently parapsychological manifestations at their Hydesville, New York, farm home. After several nights of noises, footsteps, and thudding, first Kate and then Margaret entreated the spirit to copy the clapping of her hands. After a series of questions and answers in the form of rapping, the Fox family determined that the house was haunted by an unhappy, restless spirit. Their neighbors witnessed the phenomenon, and word spread quickly across the region. Curiosity seekers flocked to the house, all of them wanting to make inquiries of the resident spirit.

The Foxes' parents believed that the manifestations would cease if the sisters were separated. Kate and Margaret were therefore sent to live with older siblings—Kate to brother David in nearby Auburn, and Margaret to sister Leah in nearby Rochester—but the rappings followed them. People who sat with the sisters found that they, too, had similar powers. The sisters were able to reproduce the rappings in response to specific questions. Public fascination with the phenomenon spread across the United States and Europe, and Leah managed the sisters' growing business affairs.

In 1850, press agent and business manager Eliab Capron convinced the sisters to visit New York City, where they could give public demonstrations and make themselves available for private séances with wealthy patrons. These intimate gatherings attracted such prominent figures as the writers James Fenimore Cooper and William Cullen Bryant, as well as newspaper publisher Horace Greeley, who arranged for Kate's education.

At first, Kate was the only sister to make a living as a medium, lecturing on behalf of the Society for the Diffusion of Spiritual Knowledge for a salary of $1,200 per year. Leah channeled spirits for the abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, and Margaret began an intimate correspondence with Arctic explorer Elisha Kent Kane, with whom she later exchanged vows, becoming his common-law wife.

As the spiritualist movement proliferated and the physical phenomena produced by other mediums eclipsed the Fox sisters' rappings and Kate's displays of automatic writing, the public began to lose interest in them. They were the first to experience the backlash after accusations of fraud began to grow louder among those in and around the movement.

Finally, in 1888, after Margaret had converted to Roman Catholicism and Kate had begun to drink heavily, and both had had a falling out with Leah, Margaret demonstrated at a public gathering how she could produce the rapping sound with her big-toe joint. She recanted the confession the following year, claiming she had made it only for money, and attempted to return to spiritualism for her livelihood.

The sisters never published writings or attended conventions on spiritualism, nor were they involved at a high level with any spiritualist organizations. Leah gave readings at her home for no charge until her death on November 1, 1890. Both Kate and Margaret struggled with alcoholism and died in poverty, on July 2, 1892, and March 8, 1893, respectively.

Rebecca Tolley-Stokes

See also: Spiritualism.

Further Reading

Braude, Ann. Radical Spirits: Spiritualism and Women's Rights in Nineteenth-Century America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Hawthorn, 1970.

Carroll, Bret E. Spiritualism in Antebellum America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Freaks, Freak Shows, and Freakatoriums

Freaks was the name given to performers with physical abnormalities and disabilities put on public display in freak shows and circus and carnival sideshows, some of America's most popular forms of entertainment from about 1840 to 1940. The most popular freaks were the ones who, despite their physical limitations, could perform unusual feats. Conjoined twins, extraordinarily tall, short, thin, or obese individuals, and persons with exotic physical deformities—real or contrived—were among those displayed for profit at freak shows.

Freakatoriums, also known as dime museums, housed "freakish" phenomena said to have been discovered throughout the world. Among the marquee attractions were the Feejee Mermaid (the mummified body of a half-fish, half-mammal creature), two-headed turtles, the jackalope (a jackrabbit with antlers like an antelope), shrunken heads, and other elaborate hoaxes. The most popular of the freakatoriums was P.T. Barnum's American Museum (1841–1868).

The display of persons with physical deformities—real or phony—was a popular form of American entertainment for more than a century. Many “freaks” suffered horrible cruelty; some lived together in insular off-season communities. (Library of Congress)

Rise

While people had been exhibited as freaks for hundreds of years, the spectacle of the freak show was born in the mid-nineteenth century. Its popularity was inspired by the first truly scientific investigations of persons with physical anomalies at a time that also saw the rise of mass entertainment in American society. Rapid urbanization and shorter workweeks enabled consumer-oriented cultural institutions to thrive. Entertainers capitalized on popular consumer culture by thrilling and shocking their audiences with the freakish and exotic.

Barnum, the most influential circus showman of the nineteenth century, institutionalized the sideshow as part of circus culture with his self-proclaimed “Greatest Show on Earth,” including P.T. Barnum’s Great Traveling Museum, Menagerie, Caravan, and Hippodrome. Many imitations followed, with more than 100 freak shows touring the country as a profitable appendage to circuses and carnivals. Middle- and working-class patrons attended in droves to view the deformed and disabled, who were sometimes indiscriminately grouped with exotic (usually nonwhite) performers such as contortionists, snake charmers, and belly dancers.

Before the abolition of slavery in 1865, masters sometimes sold slaves born with physical anomalies to freak shows. The conjoined twins Millie and Christine McKoy were slaves born in North Carolina whose owner sold them as infants to an exhibition agent. They ended up in Barnum’s American Museum, appearing as “the celebrated African United Twins,” and were later tracked down in England by their mother. Back in the United States, they resumed public appearances and, billed as the “Two-Headed Nightingale,” achieved acclaim and financial security for their musical performances.

While some freaks did sign contracts, perform willfully, and profit from their work, others were sold by their parents or guardians to show organizers. Many of those sold into freak shows were mentally handicapped or young and unable to understand what was happening to them. Among the former were so-called pinheads, individuals with microcephaly, a neurological disorder in which the head and the brain do not develop as the person ages and remain abnormally undersized. To enhance the shock value of the deformity, the hair of pinheads was trimmed into a small pointed tuft toward the back of their heads.

Sideshow freaks sometimes were displayed under a sign that read, “Is it human?” or the like. Zip, the “What is it?” exhibited by Barnum’s American Museum in 1860 and later in his traveling show, was said to exemplify the concept of a “missing link” between humans and apes, made familiar to audiences by Charles Darwin’s On the Origin of the Species (1859). Zip, purportedly found in Africa, donned a furry suit and was displayed in a cage in which he would rattle the bars and shriek wildly.

Those with hypertrichosis, a disorder that causes excessive body hair, were likewise displayed as nonhumans. Krao, billed as “Darwin’s Missing Link,” had this disease when she was first exhibited in Europe in 1880 at the age of six. She was bought by P.T. Barnum for his freak show as an example of the intermediary between humans and apes. The exhibition of freaks viewed as subhuman, many of whom were said to be found in Africa, reflected the pervasive racism in American society as well as a fascination with the “other” (the paradoxical attraction to and repulsion from those who are different). The freak show capitalized on this fascination.

Performers’ Culture

Freak show performers often wound up as wards of the state in institutions or on social welfare. However, many freaks lived in their own communities during the off-season of the traveling freak shows. Gibsonton, Florida, one of the most famous sideshow wintering towns, had the only post office with a counter for dwarves and zoning laws that allowed residents to keep elephants and circus equipment on their front lawns.

During World War I, some sideshow performers enlisted in the U.S. Army. In Coney Island, New York, another community popular with freaks, army enlistees such as the Strong Man, the Lion Faced Boy, and the Tattooed Man were honored by fellow freaks with a parade.

Many freaks also married and lived conventional family lives. Physical abnormalities rarely hindered them on the marriage market. Lady Olga (the Bearded Lady) was married four times, and Percilla the Monkey Girl found love with Benjano the Alligator Boy.

In 1932, as the popularity of freak shows began to wane, director Tod Browning made a movie, Freaks, about the lives of sideshow attractions, casting real freak show performers. In the film, a beautiful trapeze artist named Cleopatra tricks Hans, a midget, into marrying her so she can steal his money. The freaks discover Cleopatra’s plan, turn her into a feathered hen, and put her on display in the circus. The film was banned in a number of cities in the United States and many countries in Europe. After a public outcry, MGM sold the distribution rights to showman Dwain Esper, who traveled the country showing the film under the titles Forbidden Love and Nature’s Mistakes.

The reaction to Browning’s film reflected the growing public outcry against freak shows during the twentieth century. Medical advances, moral and ethical debates, and the advent of new forms of entertainment—from vaudeville and recorded music to radio and television—contributed to the decline of the freak show. On July 16, 1956, the original Barnum and Bailey Circus gave its final performance, blaming television, labor disputes, traffic, and bad weather on its demise.

Few permanent freak shows remain in America today, with the notable exceptions of those in Coney Island, New York, and Venice Beach, California. These modern venues have moved away from the display of human deformity and focus instead on such attractions as fire-eaters, sword swallows, and animal mutations such as a two-headed turtle and four-legged duck.

Lindsey Churchill

See also: Barnum, P.T.: Circus and Carnival Culture.

Further Reading

Adams, Rachel. Sideshow USA: Freak Shows and the American Cultural Imagination. Chicago: University of Chicago

Press, 2001.

Bodgan, Robert. Freak Show: Presenting Human Oddities for Amusement and Profit. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.

Free Love

The term free love refers to various iterations of a social movement that rejects the institution of marriage and the religious, political, and social structures that interfere with the freedom of sexual relationships between individuals. Because advocates of free love openly reject one of the social foundations of Western civilization—the institution of marriage between one man and one woman, and the monogamous sexual relationship within that marriage—they have met with strong opposition from government regulations, religious doctrine, and mainstream social attitudes. In America, the principle of free love has been espoused by both male and female philosophers and practitioners since the mid-nineteenth century, and it has often been linked to other non-mainstream movements, such as religious revivalism, the women's rights movement, anarchism, libertarianism, and the hippie counterculture of the 1960s.

Nineteenth-Century Expressions

Two of the earliest expressions of the free love movement in the American counterculture were connected with the early-nineteenth-century religious revival known as the Second Great Awakening. Itinerant preacher Theophilus Ransom Gates of Philadelphia led more than two dozen of his followers to Free Love Valley, a religious community he had established on the Schuylkill River in Pennsylvania. Worshipers there praised the concept of free love during Gates's revival meetings, and the practice of communal nude bathing among residents scandalized neighbors. In 1844, several community members were arrested and tried for violating Pennsylvania's marriage laws.

Farther north, in upstate New York, Christian socialist and reformer John Humphrey Noyes also was experimenting with the idea of communal living and open sexual relations as a part of a religious lifestyle. After fleeing his native Vermont to avoid trial for adultery with one of his followers, in 1848 Noyes moved to the village of Oneida in central New York State. His followers soon joined him, and by the 1850s the Oneida community had attracted around 300 people. Men and women were considered equals in terms of sexual freedom—both sexes had the right to refuse requests for sexual partnership—and all men were regarded as “married” to all women of the community.

Neither Free Love Valley nor the Oneida religious community lasted long after their founders had either died or moved on. However, these communities demonstrated that free love was by no means anathema to certain kinds of Christian religious beliefs, that traditional concepts of the sanctity and sacrament of marriage were not set in stone, and that a community of like-minded men and women could govern itself and survive in accordance with the movement.

Free love often has been connected with the first wave of the American feminist movement in the nineteenth century, but by no means did all of the women who participated in the early campaign for woman suffrage and equal rights believe in its precepts. Some regarded free love as outright depravity, believing that women should be more in control of their sexual and emotional passions than men. Nevertheless, certain other feminist thinkers, such as anarchist Lillian Harman, saw in free love a chance to redress the inequality of a woman's status in marriage, particularly in the context of laws that restricted the rights of married women to own property or have independent legal status. In the minds of many who opposed woman suffrage, the free love movement's push to redefine the terms and equality of legal marriage was part and parcel of the attack on long-standing social and religious institutions, an attack launched by those who sought to extend the vote to women.

The free love movement gained national prominence during the late nineteenth century through the political activism of social reform advocate Victoria Woodhull. An outspoken advocate of equality and suffrage for women, she used her political journal Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly to advocate for controversial ideas such as free love, divorce, and legalized prostitution. Cartoonist Thomas Nast once depicted Woodhull as Satan in an illustration that showed her preying on a woman (who was burdened with children and an alcoholic husband) by offering the "salvation" of free love. In the national election of 1872, Woodhull ran for president on her Equal Rights Party ticket, only to find herself in jail on election day for sending obscene literature—on the subject of free love—through the U.S. mail.

By the turn of the twentieth century, the free love movement had a place in various anarchist communities and the bohemian community of Greenwich Village in New York City. Free love was one of an array of sexual freedoms promoted by the bohemian set, including poet Edna St. Vincent Millay and anarchist Emma Goldman, in connection with improved access to contraception and the decriminalization of homosexuality.

The 1960s

With the rise of new social and political movements in the 1960s, the free love movement gained new prominence, as young people in the counterculture sought to redefine traditional standards of morality and sexuality. The Summer of Love in 1967—in which thousands of hippies flocked to the Haight-Ashbury district in San Francisco to experiment with free love and hallucinogenic drugs—epitomized the new openness. The slogan "Make love not war" linked the new sexual freedom with the protest movement against the Vietnam War. In the second wave of feminism, many advocates of women's equality regarded free love as part of a wider sexual reform movement; others suggested that it was used by men to pressure women into sexual relationships they might otherwise resist.

In the mid-1960s, the free love movement established a place on U.S. college campuses and contributed to ongoing debates concerning social and political reform. In 1963, New York City resident Jefferson Poland established the Sexual Freedom League (SFL) to promote free love (sometimes called free sex) and agitate for political reform, including the repeal of existing laws against abortion.

In 1966, having moved to the San Francisco Bay Area, Poland founded a chapter at the University of California, Berkeley. Along with its counterpart, the East Bay SFL, the organization achieved national prominence for its promotion of nude parties and sex orgies. In addition to other activities promoting free love, the group distributed literature on birth control, abortion, and sexually transmitted diseases on the college campus and lectured on these subjects with university approval. In the years that followed, the SFL inspired other student bodies that promoted sexual freedom, including Stanford University's Sexual Rights Forum and the University of Texas's Texas Student League for Responsible Sexual Freedom.

A vital component of the free love movement of the 1960s was the promotion and accessibility of the birth control pill, which allowed women to have sex without the fear of pregnancy. As a result, the Pill not only permitted women to become engaged sexually in the 1960s in an unprecedented way, but also allowed them to trade traditional monogamy for sexual relationships with more than one partner.

By the late 1960s, the free love movement, like most of the counterculture trends of the time, began to founder. Many Americans in the cultural mainstream, meanwhile, had opposed free, open sexuality from the outset, equating it with promiscuity and immoral behavior. By the 1980s, growing concerns about sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/AIDS, marked a definitive end to the movement, even if the values of free love—in all its countercultural forms and expressions throughout history—had exerted an undeniable influence on American

See also: Birth Control Pill: Bohemianism: Communes: Feminism, First-Wave: Flower Children: Goldman, Emma: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco: Hippies: Millay, Edna St. Vincent: Noyes, John Humphrey: Oneida Community: San Francisco, California: Sexual Revolution: Woodhull, Victoria.

Further Reading

Anderson, Terry H. The Movement and the Sixties. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Ullman, Sharon. Sex Seen: The Emergence of Modern Sexuality in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Woodhull, Victoria C. Free Lover: Sex, Marriage and Eugenics in the Early Speeches of Victoria Woodhull. Seattle, WA: Inkling, 2005.

Free Speech Movement

During the 1964 to 1965 academic year, students at the University of California's flagship campus in Berkeley initiated, organized, and led sit-ins, picket lines, and protests against the university administration, demanding recognition of students' rights to freedom of speech as well as academic freedom. The movement's questioning of authority promoted an oppositional attitude to the status quo that swept college campuses in the mid-to late 1960s. Known collectively as the Free Speech Movement, these protests catapulted the San Francisco Bay Area into the national spotlight, setting the stage for its rise as a counterculture mecca.

The early 1960s saw a marked increase in the number of student groups on the Berkeley campus— traditional political groups such as the Young Republicans, as well as issue-specific groups such as the civil rights advocacy group Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). Even in designated free-speech zones on campus, university rules barred student groups from advocating particular positions on social and political issues and fund-raising. Some, such as antiwar groups and civil rights organizations, increasingly ignored the rules.

In response, on September 14, 1964, Dean Katherine Towle issued a statement to all university-sanctioned student groups. Effective immediately, the administration would strictly enforce university regulations prohibiting public advocacy of political and social causes on campus, particularly around Sather Gate. Most students believed this area at the intersection of Telegraph and Bancroft avenues was city property and therefore beyond university control, but the university claimed otherwise. The epicenter of student political activity, the area around Sather Gate hosted informational tables and speakers on a daily basis, as thousands of students poured through the south entrance to campus. Student activists viewed Sather Gate as both logistically and symbolically vital to not only the health of their organizations, but also the exercise of their First Amendment right to free speech.

Student leaders approached the administration with a list of possible alternatives to a crackdown on student activism, such as time restrictions and continuous occupancy of the tables. Rebuffed by President Clark Kerr, student groups defiantly set up tables in the disputed area. On October 1, former graduate student Jack Weinberg manned the CORE table at Sather Gate; he refused to show his school identification card when approached by university police and also refused to leave. As Weinberg was being arrested, a crowd gathered at the scene. In an effort to prevent an escalation, police moved a squad car into the area to whisk Weinberg away. Hundreds of students spontaneously surrounded the police car, some lying down in front of it.

One student, Mario Savio, emerged from the crowd and took up a megaphone. Savio was a philosophy student inspired by Henry David Thoreau's works on nonviolent civil protest, student-oriented civil rights leaders such as James Farmer, and his own participation in the Mississippi Freedom Summer voter registration drive earlier that year. He climbed on top of the police car to address the burgeoning sea of students. His intense and charismatic calls to action in defense of civil liberties sustained the crowd as the sit-in stretched into the night. Student leaders reached a temporary truce with the administration after thirty-two hours, allowing the police to take Weinberg to jail. The question of free speech and political advocacy was left unresolved.

Mario Savio, the fiery leader of the Free Speech Movement at the University of California, Berkeley, calls on fellow students to protest the administration's refusal to allow political activities on campus in 1964. (Bill Ray/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Student leaders such as Savio, Delta Phi Epsilon pledge mother Jackie Goldberg, her brother, Art, and others moved quickly to capitalize on the momentum of the sit-in. Forming an executive committee with representatives from major student groups, they began organizing what they called the Free Speech Movement (FSM). Despite the university's attempts to characterize the students as outside agitators, left-wing radicals, beatniks, and Communists in its statements to the media, the FSM represented a cross-section of the student body, including fraternity and sorority members, Young Republicans, civil rights activists, and apolitical independents.

As the impasse continued, the students' motivation shifted. The legal principle and university policy of in loco parentis (Latin for "in place of the parent"), whereby the university acts as a surrogate parent to students, conflicted with the younger generation's beliefs about sexuality, personal responsibility, and the role of the individual in society. Although passionately devoted to the constitutional principle of free speech, many students came to view the conflict as one about their status as adults.

Ongoing protests and negotiations failed to move the administration from its position of restricting student activism, and the FSM leadership saw no choice but to take direct action. On December 2, they implemented their plan of taking over Sproul Hall, the administrative hub of the university. Police moved in to evict the students early the next day, arresting some 800 students, faculty, and supporters. In the aftermath, President Kerr presented a faculty-sponsored compromise at a campus-wide meeting. When Savio approached the microphone to give an FSM rebuttal, several police officers tackled him, manhandling him off the stage.

A stunned university community rallied to the FSM banner, calling a strike for the following day. Thousands of students skipped class, and supportive professors and instructors canceled hundreds of classes. With the university essentially paralyzed and the entire nation focused on the events unfolding there, the administration finally backed down and established provisional new rules for political activity on campus. The FSM disbanded.

The concept of student activism and open discussion of controversial issues on college campuses championed by the FSM became a hallmark of the 1960s youth counterculture. Its successful challenge of authority, however, opened a Pandora's box. The loosening of rules and regulations on the Berkeley campus led to a burgeoning of the bohemian community in neighborhoods surrounding the university and then to San Francisco. Soon, tens of thousands of young people, seeking freedom of expression and an alternative to the materialistic world of their parents, flocked to the hills around San Francisco Bay. Empowered, students across the nation soon shifted their attention to the Vietnam War, adopting the tactics of the FSM—such as massive sit-ins and strikes—to protest escalating U.S. involvement, sometimes devolving into violence.

The steps of Sproul Hall, a center of political activity on the Berkeley campus to this day, were named the Mario Savio Steps in 1997 to commemorate the historic speech of the FSM's young spokesman on December 3, 1964. "There is a time when the operation of the machine becomes so odious, makes you so sick at heart, that you can't take part," he declared. "You've got to put your bodies upon the gears and upon the wheels, upon the levers, upon all the apparatus, and you've got to make it stop."

Ann Youngblood Mulhearn

See also: Berkeley, California: Hippies.

Further Reading

Free Speech Movement Digital Archive. <http://bancroft.berkeley.edu/FSM>

Goines, David Lance. The Free Speech Movement: Coming of Age in the 1960s. Berkeley, CA: Ten Speed, 1993.

Heirich, Max. The Beginning: Berkeley, 1964. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971.

Rorabaugh, W.J. Berkeley at War: The 1960s. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Free Universities

From the mid-1960s through the mid-1970s, universities that offer noncredit courses free of charge to the general public were started in cities and college towns across the United States. An outgrowth of political activism among college students, these nonprofit education centers were intended largely as havens for counterculture dissenters, offering courses on such timely and highly charged subjects as the Vietnam War, race relations in America, and sexual mores. Another openly declared purpose of many founders was to undermine the regimentation of traditional universities. Like underground newspapers, free universities emerged as central alternative institutions in a number of cities and towns, serving as a meeting place for participants in the counterculture and helping to define the activities and values associated with it.

Roots

From the start, free universities sought to create an egalitarian setting for learning and teaching, hoping to inspire the transformation or downfall of publicly administered education. Most adhered to the principles that anyone could teach, anyone could learn, and classes should be held on any topic of interest to students. Classes were attended by a mix of college students and members of the local community. Despite the designation “free,” many of the schools charged a modest fee for taking courses.

Free universities tended to share several characteristics. Most offered a smorgasbord of courses, reflecting the broad spectrum of social change. They abandoned academic structure and formality, creating a casual, intimate atmosphere. Fostering free discussion in classes and sometimes action outside of them were common goals. Most free universities were run by a cooperative of volunteers and retained at least a de facto relationship with a conventional university. Where they did, locations varied; a majority opened headquarters off campus, with some groups remaining on campus.

Free university founders cited a series of events as the inspiration for their initiative. The Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), the radical protest group launched in 1962, declared in its founding statement that universities had failed to address the moral consequences of current events. Also in 1962, social critic Paul Goodman published The Community of Scholars, which discusses the historical precedent of scholars seceding from institutions of higher learning. In Mississippi in 1964, college students volunteering as civil rights workers helped create “freedom schools,” in which local people shared teaching and learning experiences across racial boundaries. Then, in December of that year, University of California students who seized the Berkeley campus administration building held a series of teach-ins on free speech and academic freedom.

The founders of the earliest free universities generally were students and professors concerned about the failure of mainstream institutions to acknowledge political dissent. In 1965, professors who had been fired from universities for protest activities related to events in Cuba and Vietnam launched the Free University of New York (later the Free School) above a coffee shop on the Lower East Side of Manhattan. The school offered classes on Marxist geography, the theory and practice of radical social movements, black ghetto radicalism, and Vietnamese liberation literature. Its founding statement proclaimed that the country’s faculty members had been reduced to “servant-intellectuals, required, for regular promotion, to propagate points of view in harmony with the military and industrial leadership.”

On the West Coast, newly radicalized students created the Free University of Berkeley, which offered its first courses in February 1966. The founders desired a place to discuss problems of social commitment, asserting in the catalog that a University of California education “confuses rather than encourages action.” They had participated in recent demonstrations, and saw a need to create an institutional anchor for a social-change movement that until then had existed episodically.

Students in Ann Arbor (University of Michigan), Boulder (University of Colorado), Gainesville (University Florida), and other college towns thought likewise. By the end of 1967, fifty free universities had been started, twelve by chapters of the SDS. The SDS national organization debated sponsoring a national free university, but ultimately it decided to focus on organizing in poor neighborhoods.

Not all free universities made a clean break from established institutions. While most declared themselves community learning centers, serving the inner city as much as privileged college students, others aimed to reform the university from within. A few programs, such as the influential Experimental College at San Francisco State College, actually were sanctioned by a mainstream university.

Shift in Focus

The initial emphasis on political action began to fade. Indeed, even those free universities most ardently promoting political discussion had offered a broad array of courses from the start. Of the Free University of Berkeley's eighty-one courses in 1966, for example, forty-one pertained to social change. Nonpolitical subject matter included Beethoven, cinema as art, and the origins of mathematics. That same year, the Experimental College in San Francisco offered seminars titled "Urban Action" and "Astronauts of Inner Space." Students at the Free University of New York could take a course on the search for authentic sexual experience, called "A Quest for Self."

As new enterprises, free universities needed to attract students, and arts and personal growth courses helped draw them in. "Students have been systematically dehumanized, deemed incompetent to regulate their own lives sexually, politically and academically," proclaimed the New York school in its catalog, vowing to give students "the concepts necessary to comprehend the events of this century and the meaning of one's life in it." Participants at Berkeley, one of its founders wrote in 1968, "wanted an education which was—as the word suggests—a drawing out of their potentialities."

By 1968, the number of free universities had doubled, fueled by workshops and national conferences sponsored by the National Student Association and other organizations. The largest of the free universities were enrolling more than 3,000 students each. The movement peaked in 1969, with more than 250 schools in the United States, and an estimated 75,000 or more students enrolled in courses.

Course listings grew large enough to warrant separate subject categories in the catalogs, which were also growing more colorful and artistic. The fall 1969 catalog for the Free University of Berkeley described courses using drawings and comic strips. Its listings also included a number of experiential (or jokey) courses, such as "Kissing," "Scrounging," and "Gold Stars." The catalog philosophized that "with no credits & no degrees to confuse motives/creative education for living can flourish/warm & free." A kaleidoscopic spectrum of courses was available, for example "Graphics, Guts & Graffiti," "Graphology," "Greek Dancing," "Gun Technology," "Happy Music," and "History & Operation of Japanese Abacus."

By the early 1970s, many free universities had folded after only three or four years of operation. To a great extent, they were victims of their own influence, as mainstream institutions adopted some of the informality, flexibility in instruction and curriculum, and student control that free universities had pioneered. In addition, efforts to organize the movement had essentially failed, and some schools succumbed to the organizational disarray endemic to nonprofit organizations run by young adults. Some original organizers lost interest as their free universities grew less explicitly political. Some organizations failed to attract new groups of students or organizers.

Many persisted, though, by adapting to the nonacademic public. As of 1972, there were a total of 110 free universities in operation. Although they remained informal and unpredictable, their course offerings were more practical. Rather than adopt the latest twists in the American counterculture—in the late 1970s, few offered classes addressing glam or punk preoccupations, for example—they catered to the leisure and social advancement desires of postcollegiate adults.

By the 1980s, almost all adult education institutions in America once called free universities had folded or been renamed. Some were transformed into for-profit adult education programs. Periodically over the next twenty-five years, American adult educators interested in serving poorer communities resumed using the "free university" label for their programs.

See also: Berkeley, California: Students for a Democratic Society.

Further Reading

Draves, Bill. The Free University. Chicago: Association Press/Follett, 1980.

Finestone, Aaron. "Free University." Collegiate Press Service 44-1. Washington, DC: U.S. Student Press Association, January 25, 1966.

Hamilton, Blair. Free Universities, Experimental Colleges and Free Schools. Yellow Springs, OH: Antioch College Department of Educational Research/Union for Research and Experimentation in Higher Education, 1968.

Lauter, Paul, and Florence Howe. Conspiracy of the Young. Cleveland, OH: World, 1970.

Lichtman, Jane. Bring Your Own Bag: A Report on Free Universities. Washington, DC: American Association for Higher Education, 1973.

Rossman, Michael. On Learning and Social Change. New York: Random House, 1972.

Freemasonry

Freemasonry—the institutions, practices, and principles of the international fraternal order of Free and Accepted Masons—began as a craft guild in the Middle Ages, developed into a secret society during the seventeenth century, and was extremely influential and controversial in the early American republic, given the size and power of its membership and its presumed incompatibility with democracy. Under attack for its elitism and secrecy, Masonry went into decline in the United States and reinvented itself as a broader, nonpolitical movement in the late nineteenth century. It remains a quietly influential part of American society in the twenty-first century.

Origins

During the Middle Ages, skilled stoneworkers, or masons, were in great demand in Western Europe, where the construction of castles, cathedrals, and other large structures put a premium on their skills. Masons were therefore free of many of the strictures of medieval European society. They were allowed to travel widely and were not tied to lands or medieval lords. In order to protect their privileges, masons formed a guild, closely guarded their trade secrets, and developed an elaborate system of codes to prevent others from claiming to be members.

By about 1700, the Mason's Guild had been taken over by scientists and philosophers who were less interested in Masonry than in the guild's progressive tradition and ancient roots. The Masons had, over the years, invited nobles and merchants to join the guild in order to gain business and extend their influence. These new members had brought an interest in the ideals of the Renaissance, and especially the mystical progressivism of Rosicrucianism, into Masonry. (The Rosicrucians of the early seventeenth century combined utopian ideals with the metaphors of alchemy and other magical traditions to challenge traditional morality and religion.)

After Pope Clement XII banned Freemasonry from Catholic countries in 1738, asserting that its ideals were in conflict with Roman Catholic Church doctrine, the organization became completely divorced from its roots as a trade guild. It instead evolved into a secret society devoted to scientific exploration and social and political progress. The collapse of Freemasonry in continental Europe accelerated its identification with English society and ideals, and helped push aside the older emphasis on mysticism and ritual.

The new English Masonic movement established its first American lodge in 1717. The Masonic movement in America was slow to expand, largely because of controls by the Grand Lodge in London. During the American Revolution, however, lodges in North America gradually severed their ties with the Grand Lodge. By 1790, American Masonry was independent of British control; by 1800, the new American movement boasted 16,000 members in more than 350 lodges. A Boston man, Prince Hall, founded a lodge for black Americans, called Prince Hall Freemasonry, which survives to the present day.

Growth

Freemasonry grew especially quickly in larger cities such as New York and Philadelphia, where it became almost synonymous with the upper class. Various elements of Masonic symbolism, especially images emphasizing secular progress and idealism, were adopted by the fledgling American government. The Great Seal, the designs on paper currency and coinage, and arguably the American flag all bear Masonic symbols.

An emblematic chart of 1877 identifies many of the symbols associated with Freemasonry, including the square and compass, all-seeing eye, and globe-topped columns. For centuries, the Masonic movement has quietly exerted a major influence on Western culture. (Library of Congress)

The involvement of many public officials with an unaccountable secret society, however, provoked an increasing backlash. When a Freemason named William Morgan disappeared and was presumed murdered in 1826 after writing an exposé of society rituals, antimasonic fervor exploded, leading to the formation of the Antimasonic Party in 1826. The Antimasons gained a surprising amount of political power and elected a number of state and federal legislators, but soon collapsed. Their brief surge had a major effect on Masonry, however, as more than half of the U.S. members left the movement.

While Masonry was on the wane during this period, several of its rituals and concepts were borrowed by Joseph Smith and included in the development of the Mormon religion. The first three presidents of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints—Smith, Brigham Young, and John Taylor—were Freemasons. Indeed, the identification of Masonry with Mormonism was one of the factors that contributed to its unpopularity during the mid-nineteenth century.

After the American Civil War, Freemasonry regained much of its lost influence. In 1879, the various Masonic organizations in America claimed a combined membership of more than 550,000. The period of Masonry's greatest growth, though, came after World War I. By 1925, perhaps 3 million American men had joined a Masonic group.

As the organization gained new recruits, its focus shifted. The traditional emphasis on ritual and mysticism was all but obliterated, as Masonry reinvented itself as a movement focused on social and charitable activities. The movement also took on an element of patriotic boosterism, spurred by mid- and late-twentieth-century debates over communism, immigration, and involvement in world affairs. The movement's careful identification with American ideals helped defuse any resurgence of the debate over Freemasonry's compatibility with democracy.

Freemasonry has waned since its heyday, but there were still over 2 million Freemasons in the United States as of the middle of first decade of the twenty-first century. They constituted about half of the global membership. The movement continues to concentrate on charity and social activities, and its relative openness and visibility have kept it from sparking fresh controversy.

Nevertheless, some Americans still find reasons to distrust the movement. A number of conspiracy theorists and some professional historians have attempted to connect Masonry with historical mysteries, ranging from the assassinations of Presidents Abraham Lincoln and John F. Kennedy to the influence of corporations on American life. Many, but by no means all, of these theorists are Christian extremists. In addition, some Americans believe that Masonry's esoteric traditions mask a more sinister purpose, and that the higher levels of Masonry are involved in pagan practices.

While scandals involving Masonic groups have been uncovered in other nations, and many British government bodies require that its officials disclose membership in Freemasonry, it seems unlikely that the movement in the United States will ever come under the kind of attack it once did.

James L. Erwin

See also: Anti-Freemasonry.

Further Reading

Bullock, Steven C. Revolutionary Brotherhood: Freemasonry and the Transformation of the American Social Order, 1730–1840. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Dumenil, Lynn. Freemasonry and American Culture, 1880–1930. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.

Freemasonry.org. <http://www.freemasonry.org>

Ridley, Jasper. The Freemasons: A History of the World's Most Powerful Secret Society. New York: Arcade, 2001.

Vaughn, William Preston. The Antimasonic Party in the United States, 1826–1843. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1983.

Friedan, Betty (1921–2006)

As one of the first women of her era to publicly question the role of women in American society, writer and activist Betty Friedan—author of the highly influential 1963 book The Feminine Mystique and a founder of the National Organization for Women (NOW)—helped usher in the women’s movement of the 1960s.

Born Betty Naomi Goldstein on February 4, 1921, in Peoria, Illinois, she attended Smith College and graduated in 1942 with a degree in psychology. After completing one year of graduate school at the University of California, Berkeley, she moved to New York City and worked as a journalist and labor journal editor until marrying theater producer Carl Friedan in 1947.

For the first ten years of her marriage, she was a housewife, mother, and freelance writer. After circulating a questionnaire to her 1942 Smith College classmates, she discovered that many of the women were as dissatisfied with their lives as homemakers as she was. Intrigued, Friedan widened her study, formulating detailed questionnaires and interviews. Discussing the findings with psychologists, she organized her results and completed the groundbreaking but highly controversial work The Feminine Mystique.

Translated into several languages, The Feminine Mystique was an immediate success, and it has sold over 2 million copies in paperback. The thesis of the book is that American women suffered many forms of discrimination and were victims of an insidious system of delusions and false values that urged them to seek personal fulfillment and identity solely as wives and mothers. Friedan argued that because women were encouraged by advertisers and society to submit cheerfully to their roles, they suffered disillusionment and spiritual malaise. Without genuine and creative work, she believed, American housewives had little choice but to live vicariously through their husbands and children.

Calling this “the problem that has no name,” Friedan questioned the emotional, financial, and intellectual dependency to which women in America were confined. Her thesis stood in contrast to prevailing post–World War II belief that women should find fulfillment and an idyllic life by focusing on domestic tasks as a suburban housewife, rather than from a career or higher education. Historians have recognized the book as a major impetus for the second wave of feminism in America and a founding document of the modern feminist movement.

In 1966, Friedan cofounded NOW, a group dedicated to achieving equal opportunity for women. As the organization’s founding president, she worked to increase the number of women in government positions and end sex-classified employment notices. She advocated greater access to child care for working mothers and launched widespread movements to legalize abortion. Although Friedan relinquished her role as president in March 1970, shortly after her divorce, she continued to participate actively in NOW and other feminist organizations. On August 26, 1970, on the fiftieth anniversary of woman suffrage, NOW launched the Women’s Strike for Equality, with Friedan as lead organizer.

Continuing with the cause of women’s equality, Friedan became the founding member of the National Women’s Political Caucus in 1971 and took a leading role in the campaign for the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In 1973, she assumed the role of director for the First Women’s Bank and Trust Company, all the while continuing to write and conduct research on the lives of women. In 1976, she published It Changed My Life: Writings on the Women’s Movement, followed in 1981 by The Second Stage, in which she emphasizes the importance of children and the role of men in the women’s movement, and in 2000, by her autobiography, Life So Far.

At the time of her death from heart failure on February 4, 2006, Betty Friedan was widely celebrated for her contributions to the lives of women in America. As a direct result of her writings and political advocacy, women made clear gains in securing social equality at a time when acknowledging their needs outside of the home was controversial, or even subversive.

Melissa Williams

See also: Feminism, Second-Wave.

Further Reading

Friedan, Betty. The Feminine Mystique. New York: W.W. Norton, 1963.

Friedan, Betty. It Changed My Life: Writings on the Women's Movement. New York: Random House, 1976.

Friedan, Betty. The Second Stage. New York: Summit, 1981.

Hennessee, Judith. Betty Friedan: Her Life. New York: Random House, 1999.

Fruitlands

In the summer of 1843, the transcendentalists and educational reformers Amos Bronson Alcott and Charles Lane established a “new Eden” called Fruitlands, a short-lived utopian community located in Harvard, Massachusetts, about 15 miles (24 kilometers) west of Concord. The only substantial account of the experiment was recorded by Alcott’s daughter, Louisa May Alcott, who lived at the community as a child and later wrote the best-selling Little Women series of novels. Her brief, satiric memoir, Transcendental Wild Oats (1873), describes how “these modern pilgrims journeyed hopefully out of the old world, to found a new one in the wilderness.”

Fruitlands was a more radical version of the nearby Brook Farm, which Bronson Alcott regarded as not “austere enough” since, by bringing the produce of their fields to market, its members participated in the degrading system of commerce. By contrast, he hoped to “initiate a Family in harmony with the primitive instincts of man.”

The members of Fruitlands carried no money, even when they ventured into town. No beings, including insects, could be deprived of life during the cultivation of the 90-acre (36-hectare) communally owned farm. Utilizing appropriated labor, including the labor of draught animals, was proscribed. Manure was forsworn as an unfairly requisitioned pollutant. The members wore tunics and trousers sewn from brown linen and broad-brimmed straw hats, and they avoided using animal-based products such as whale oil and leather.

The eleven adult members of the community’s “consociate family” set out to raise their vegan fare solely by the work of their own hands: “Ordinary secular farming is not our object,” they announced to the Boston press. “Fruit, grain, pulse, herbs, flax, and other vegetable products, receiving assiduous attention, will afford ample manual occupation, and chaste supplies for bodily needs.” Their aim was to exist entirely independent of the outside world and to grow only enough pure crops to feed themselves, so that they could focus their attention on higher things: “Pledged to the spirit alone, the founders anticipate no hasty or numerous additions to their numbers. The kingdom of peace is entered only through the gates of self-denial.”

A library made up mainly of Bronson Alcott’s many books formed the center of community life. Daily philosophical discussions were conducted in place of the services of any organized religion, which the founders regarded as debased. Fruitlands, like Brook Farm, garnered wide attention, especially since Alcott and Lane lectured regularly on vegetarianism and the spiritual virtues of their Spartan lifestyle.

Still, the community survived a mere seven months, from June 1843 to January 1844. It had proven impossible to raise enough food to support the group through the winter. In her account, Louisa May Alcott concluded that “the brethren... were so busy discussing and defining great duties that they forgot to perform the small ones.”

In 1914, the site of the failed experiment was resurrected as the Fruitlands Museum, later to contain a transplanted Shaker house, a fine art collection, and native American artifacts, established by the Boston socialite and patron Clara Endicott Sears.

Lance Newman

See also: Alcott, Amos Bronson; Communes; Transcendentalism.

Further Reading

Francis, Richard. Transcendental Utopias: Individual and Community at Brook Farm, Fruitlands, and Walden. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1997.

Fruitlands Museum. <http://www.fruitlands.org>

Stoehr, Taylor. Nay Saying in Concord: Emerson, Alcott, and Thoreau. Hamden, CT: Shoe String (Archon), 1979.

Fugs, The

Founded in New York City by Beat poets Ed Sanders and Tuli Kupferberg in 1965, the Fugs was an antiestablishment rock music group that became famous for its unabashed opposition to the Vietnam War. Its antiwar sentiments and challenges to the government were epitomized by the title of its first Folkways Records album, The Village Fugs—Ballads and Songs of Contemporary Protest, Points of View, and General Dissatisfaction (1965). Under the scrutiny of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and the New York County District Attorney’s Office, the band was repeatedly discouraged from performing at any venue a second time, yet they continued to voice their opinions on social and political matters.

The group took its name from Norman Mailer’s substitute term—fug—for an expletive in his 1948 World War II novel The Naked and the Dead. Original members of the band included Sanders, Kupferberg, and Ken Weaver (drums), followed shortly thereafter by Steve Weber, Peter Stampfel, and others. A number of other members have come and gone in the more than forty years since the band was formed, some by choice and some by draft.

The Fugs began performing at clubs, theaters, and galleries in New York City, including the Bridge Theater, Cafe Au Go Go, the Astor Place Playhouse, and the Players’ Theater. In the fall of 1965, they went on tour as part of a national anti-Vietnam War campaign. From the outset, their self-proclaimed lyrical inspiration combined various sources, most notably the freedoms and rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and a perception that they were going to waste.

The political sentiments expressed in the Fugs’ records and live performances elicited negative reactions from government authorities throughout the decades, especially in the 1960s. In 1966, after New York City authorities heard that the group had burned “a flag” on stage at the Astor Place Playhouse, fire and building inspectors were immediately dispatched to the venue. The Fugs were barred from playing again at the theater, and the FBI began an investigation of the group and its members. Release of The Fugs Second Album later in 1966 prompted the FBI to intensify its efforts.

One of the boldest public acts engaged in by the Fugs took place in the heightened antiwar atmosphere of 1967, as band members joined a mass protest march on the Pentagon in Arlington, Virginia. With tens of thousands of protestors chanting “Out, Demons, Out!” and the Fugs chanting in litany, the protestors performed a ritual exorcism on the building. Along with other protestors, the Fugs placed yellow daisies in the rifle barrels of Pentagon guards lined up in front of the entrance.

In 1968, with the assassinations of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Senator Robert Kennedy rocking the nation and the Vietnam War continuing to escalate despite the growing protest movement, the Fugs continued to rebel publicly against the government. Among their actions was another symbolic exorcism, this time of the grave of the late Wisconsin senator and notorious “red baiter” Joseph McCarthy.

The Fugs went their separate ways, writing, publishing, and performing on their own in the 1970s and early 1980s. They reunited in 1984 after Sanders and Kupferberg worked together on a film (which never reached final production). Sanders, Kupferberg, Steve Taylor, Scott Petito, and Coby Batty became the new sounds and sights of the Fugs, which has continued to comment on sociopolitical issues, such as the influence of technology, South African apartheid, sexual expression, the cold war, and the space race.

The band agreed to take part in the Woodstock’94 rock concert (commemorating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the original Woodstock music festival), but objected to what it regarded as the excessive commercialism of the event. Instead, the Fugs organized their own concert, called “The Real Woodstock Festival.” The Fugs Final CD (Part 1) was released in 2003, with part two said to be forthcoming.

Sueann M. Wells

See also: Rock and Roll: Vietnam War Protests: Woodstock Music and Art Fair.

Further Reading

Charters, Ann. “Marching with The Fugs.” Review of Contemporary Fiction 19:1 (1999) : 47.

The Fugs. <http://www.thefugs.com>

Weinreich, Regina. “Ed Sanders: The Un-fuzzy Fug.” Review of Contemporary Fiction 19:1 (1999) : 57.

Fuller, Margaret (1810–1850)

Margaret Fuller was a social reformer, literary critic, and transcendentalist who advocated for equality of the sexes in the nineteenth century. A friend of Ralph Waldo Emerson and a leading force in the transcendentalist movement, she has been called America’s first major woman author and journalist, as well as the most influential gender theorist of her time.

Fuller was born in Cambridgeport (present-day Cambridge), Massachusetts, on May 23, 1810. Timothy Fuller, a lawyer and a member of Congress, educated the eldest of his nine children, teaching Margaret Latin by the age of six and Shakespeare at age eight. As she grew up, Fuller attended several local and “finishing” schools, gaining a classical education rare for girls of her day. She gained admittance to the men-only Harvard Library, the only woman to do so in that era, and was fluent in five languages, including English.

Following her father's death in 1835, the family's financial need forced Fuller to forgo a planned trip to Europe, where she had hoped to further immerse herself in the Romanticism that she loved. Friends prevailed upon the American poet Ralph Waldo Emerson to invite her to Concord as compensation, and there Fuller became closely identified with the transcendentalist movement. From its inception in 1840 until mid-1842, she served as editor of the group's publication, The Dial, which she had helped found with Emerson and others. At the same time, she also worked as a teacher in several schools.

In 1839, Fuller moved her family to Jamaica Plain, near Boston, where she became known as a “conversationalist,” moderating small group discussions on a variety of intellectual and philosophical topics. These conversation groups were sufficiently profitable to allow her to undertake translations of several important pieces of German literature that were, in turn, well received and profitable.

Based on the group discussions, Fuller also published Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1845), calling for the independence of women and gender equality in American society. During this same period, she published her most important piece of writing in The Dial, an essay titled “The Great Lawsuit: Man versus Men, Woman versus Women” in which she argued forcefully for women's rights.

Horace Greeley, editor of the nationally circulated New York Tribune, hired Fuller in late 1844 as his newspaper's literary critic—the first such columnist in any American newspaper. She relocated to New York City, where she became romantically involved with James Nathan, but the affair ended unhappily for Fuller. Life in New York offered compensations, though, including the opportunity to become more directly involved in reform movements concerning slavery, women's rights, prostitution, and prison conditions.

In 1846, Greeley appointed Fuller as the Tribune's foreign correspondent, an unheard-of promotion for a woman of the time. She traveled throughout Europe and by 1848 or 1849 had taken up full-time residence in revolutionary Italy. In the meantime, in 1847, she had fallen in love with Marquis Giovanni Angelo Ossoli (who was some ten years her junior); in 1848, she gave birth to their son, Angelo Eugene. Letters to her family and friends in late 1848 and 1849 indicate that the couple was married at that time, but no independent record of the marriage exists; scholars speculate that the story may have been fabricated to avoid scandal.

The young family sailed for America in May 1850, but their ship was wrecked in a hurricane at Fire Island, just off the coast of New York State, on July 19. Henry David Thoreau and several of Fuller's other transcendentalist friends commissioned searches of the site, but only the remains of the infant son were recovered. The bodies of Fuller and Ossoli, as well as Fuller's manuscript of her experiences in Europe, were never found.

Barbara Schwarz Wachal

See also: Dial, The; Emerson, Ralph Waldo; Thoreau, Henry David; Transcendentalism.

Further Reading

Balducci, Carolyn Feleppa. Margaret Fuller: A Life of Passion and Defiance. New York: Bantam, 1991.

Kornfeld, Eve. Margaret Fuller: A Brief Biography with Documents. Boston: Bedford, 1997.

Fuller, R. Buckminster (1895–1983)

R. Buckminster Fuller was an inventor, engineer, architect, scientist, futurist, educator, cartographer, author, and visionary. Perhaps best known for his invention of the geodesic dome, a structure that maximizes enclosed space using a minimum of materials, he was inspired by the challenge of doing more with less. He envisioned a future in which many problems of the world could be solved by science and technology. Although members of the 1960s and 1970s counterculture generally were leery of technology, they embraced Fuller's humanistic vision, which offered an optimistic counterpoint to the perception of technology as inhumane and destructive.

Richard Buckminster Fuller was born on July 12, 1895, in Milton, Massachusetts, the son of Caroline Wolcott Fuller and Richard Buckminster Fuller, Sr. (He also was the grandnephew of transcendentalist writer and editor Margaret Fuller.) He spent much of his youth in coastal Maine and attended Milton Academy in Massachusetts. Twice expelled from Harvard, he worked as a mechanic and meatpacker before serving in the U.S. Navy during World War I. In 1917, he married Anne Hewlett, an inventor and the daughter of a well-known architect and artist.

The Fullers had two daughters, Alexandra and Allegra. Alexandra was sickly, and her death at the age of four inspired in Fuller a lifelong quest to provide safe, hygienic shelter within financial reach of the average person. His first such project was the 4-D House, later called the Dymaxion House, which he patented in 1928. The design called for a round, inexpensive, low-maintenance structure that produced its own power, was naturally heated and cooled, and was virtually earthquake proof.

Next, Fuller applied his pursuit of efficiency to transportation and designed the Dymaxion Car, which he patented in 1937. The three-wheeled vehicle, which measured 19 feet (5.8 meters) long, could hold eleven passengers and travel 120 miles (193 kilometers) per hour, with a fuel efficiency of about 30 miles (48 kilometers) to the gallon.

Then Fuller revisited the issue of hygiene and designed the Dymaxion Bathroom, patented in 1940, which could be made of sheet metal or plastic and could easily be carried up the stairs and installed in an existing bathroom. Its hot-vapor shower required only a cup of water to clean hygienically without soap. Fuller also developed the Dymaxion Map, which depicted the earth with a minimum of distortion, and the World Game, a simulation intended to help groups cooperate in solving world problems.

Fuller's greatest fame came with his patent of the geodesic dome in 1954. A spherical form with triangular or polygonal facets made of aluminum, plastic, or wood components, it was stable, lightweight, and relatively easy to construct. Fuller hoped the geodesic dome would revolutionize the building industry. Although it may not have achieved that lofty goal, the design proved popular in the 1960s and 1970s. An estimated 300,000 domes eventually were built throughout the world.

While Fuller's intention was to provide mainstream solutions to the challenges of modern living, his popularity soared among the counterculture youth of the 1960s and 1970s, who were drawn to his egalitarian vision of a better life for all people. The geodesic dome came to represent both a utopian urban future and the independent spirit of the counterculture. Fuller's commitment to the efficient use of resources also held great appeal to those concerned with environmental issues, as well as those concerned about the inequities in worldwide resource distribution. During a time when society questioned whether the costs of technological advancement were worth the benefits, Fuller demonstrated the potential for technology to address society's most pressing problems.

Buckminster Fuller died of a heart attack on July 1, 1983, in Los Angeles. During his lifetime, he was granted twenty-eight U.S. patents, wrote twenty-five books, and received dozens of honorary degrees and many other prestigious awards. His voluminous papers, models, and recorded media are housed at Stanford University in the

Further Reading

Baldwin, J. Bucky Works: Buckminster Fuller's Ideas for Today. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1996.

Chu, Hsiao-Yun, and Robert Trujillo, eds. New Views on R. Buckminster Fuller. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2009.

Zung, Thomas T.K., ed. Buckminster Fuller: Anthology for a New Millennium. New York: St. Martin's, 2001.

Fundamentalism, Christian

Although it has roots dating at least to the nineteenth century, modern Christian fundamentalism in America emerged in the early twentieth century as a movement to defend traditional Christian doctrines against the inroads of modernism. By the latter part of the century, however, it also had become a political movement that opposed abortion, same-sex marriage, and the complete separation of public education and religion.

Roots

Four streams of conservative Christianity contributed to the formation of twentieth-century fundamentalism. One stream was millenarianism, the belief that countered the dominant optimism of American culture with the assertion that the second coming of Jesus could occur at any moment. In the early 1860s, the Prophetic Times was the most important millenarian journal, but people associated with a minor publication, Waymarks in the Wilderness, played an important role in creating the Prophecy and Bible Conference movement. Beginning with the interdenominational Niagara Bible Conferences in 1868, several major conferences took place through the 1890s.

A second stream was the Princeton theology of Charles Hodge, A.A. Hodge, and Benjamin B. Warfield, all of whom taught at Princeton Theological Seminary. Believing that the theologian's job was to rationally or scientifically collect and organize Scriptural data, these men also argued that the words of the Bible, in its original autographs (manuscripts), were both inspired and inerrant. Scripture was, therefore, the final authority on Christian belief.

The Holiness movement provided a third stream of influence. A group of Americans, notably Hannah Whitall Smith, were pursuing revivalism in England in the 1870s when they began teaching that sin could be eradicated through personal acceptance and experience of the Holy Spirit. Influenced by these ideas, a series of British conferences held at Keswick beginning in 1875 put forward the less radical concept that the Holy Spirit, rather than eradicating sin, helps the individual move toward righteousness. The American evangelist Dwight L. Moody brought Keswick teachings to the United States through his Northfield Conferences, which led to the organization of an American Keswick movement in 1913. Meanwhile, the Sunday School Times, a major Christian publication, adopted Holiness in 1910 and publicized it under the phrase “Victorious Life.” Pentecostalism, which emphasizes the coming of the Holy Spirit, spiritual purification, and religious ecstasy—as evidenced by glossolalia, or speaking in tongues—arose out of the Holiness movement in the early twentieth century.

A fourth stream was revivalism. During the Second Great Awakening (1800–1830s), evangelist Charles Finney forged the major techniques of modern revivalism, using such means as informal preaching, prayer sessions, and music to elicit an emotional response from his listeners. Later revivalists, led by Moody and Billy Sunday, further refined revivalist methods in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Emergence

In the first decade of the twentieth century, two oilmen from Southern California, brothers Lyman and Milton Stewart, became concerned that modern, or liberal, ideas, particularly Darwinian evolution and higher criticism (historical analysis) of the Bible, were undermining Christianity. In response, they funded the publication of The Fundamentals, a series of twelve volumes published between 1910 and 1915, and distributed them to ministers and seminary teachers throughout the United States. The twelve volumes include essays by sixty-four contributors defending the Bible and cardinal Christian doctrines against the inroads of modern thinking.

About the same time that The Fundamentals appeared, Charles I. Scofield published his Reference Bible (1909), an edition of the Bible with extensive notes that offered a dispensationalist interpretation. Dispensationalism was a particular version of millenarianism, stemming from John Nelson Darby, founder of the Plymouth Brethren, which asserted that at the Second Coming, Jesus would invisibly take the saved individuals out of this world. This predicted event was called the “Secret Rapture.” Over time, the Scofield Bible edition became extraordinarily influential in spreading dispensationalist ideas among conservative American Christians.

In 1913, the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago held a Bible and Prophecy Conference, which was followed by two conferences in Philadelphia and New York in 1918. As they helped plan the conference to be held in 1919, two emerging leaders, William Bell Riley and Reuben A. Torrey, shifted its emphasis from millenarianism to what they regarded as the fundamentals of the faith—in particular, the verbal inspiration of the Bible, the virgin birth of Jesus, the physical resurrection and ascension of Jesus, Jesus’s substitutionary atonement for humankind’s sins, biblical miracles, and the Second Coming of Jesus (although not everyone took a dispensationalist view). Thus was born the World’s Christian Fundamentals Association (WCFA), formed in 1919 at Philadelphia.

Attack on Modernism

At this point, the fundamentalist movement began an aggressive attack against modernism on two fronts. The major front was within the denominations, particularly the Northern Baptists and Northern Presbyterians, where fundamentalists believed that liberals were undermining traditional Christian doctrine. Among the Northern Baptists, beginning in 1920, fundamentalists organized to stop the spread of liberal teaching in denominational schools, pushed for adoption of a conservative confession, and sought to control the views of missionaries. After losing on all three issues, many fundamentalists left the denomination to form the Baptist Bible Union in 1932.

When Harry Emerson Fosdick, a Baptist pastoring a New York Presbyterian church, attacked fundamentalism in a 1922 sermon, Clarence Macartney, a Philadelphia minister, called on the Northern Presbyterians to censure Fosdick and affirm a conservative theology. Although Fosdick left his pastorate rather than follow Macartney’s appeal, by 1925 the denomination had taken a position favoring toleration over exclusivity.

Meanwhile, controversy erupted at Princeton Theological Seminary, particularly after Professor J. Gresham Machen published Christianity and Liberalism (1923), in which he argued that the terms referred to two different religions. After being pushed to the sidelines of influence at the seminary, Machen and other conservative faculty members left in 1929 to form Westminster Seminary in Philadelphia. Eventually, Machen helped establish the Presbyterian Church of America in 1936.

A second front was Charles Darwin's theory of evolution. With former presidential candidate and Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan publicizing their cause, fundamentalists were successful in getting several Southern states to pass laws banning the teaching of evolution in the public schools between 1923 and 1925.

Soon after Tennessee passed its law in 1925, teacher John T. Scopes challenged the law in a test case supported by the American Civil Liberties Union. With the famous attorney Clarence Darrow defending Scopes and Bryan prosecuting, the trial became a media sensation. Although Scopes lost the case, the trial created a negative public image that long linked fundamentalism with the rural South, despite the fact that up to this time the movement had been mainly a Northern and urban phenomenon. The antievolution crusade essentially ended with this case, and the WCFA went into decline.

Separatism

After these battles, fundamentalists generally retreated from public combat and pursued a separatist agenda by working through local church congregations and building their own institutions. In addition to Riley and Torrey, influential preachers included J. Frank Norris, T.T. Shields, J.C. Masee, and John Roach Stratton. Although organizations such as the Independent Fundamental Church of America (founded in 1930) were established, Bible schools were more influential. The Missionary Training Institute (founded in 1882) in New York City, Moody Bible Institute (founded in 1888) in Chicago, and Bible Institute of Los Angeles (founded in 1908) provided the models for nondenominational schools that emphasized practical training of Christian pastors and missionaries. By 1930, there were more than fifty such schools in the United States, with another twenty-six founded in the following decade.

Fundamentalists also gave attention to liberal arts college education with the establishment of Bob Jones College (founded in 1926; now Bob Jones University in Greenville, South Carolina), and the rapid growth of Wheaton College (established in 1857) in Norton, Massachusetts, in the 1930s, after its turn in a fundamentalist direction under the leadership of J. Oliver Buswell. To provide professional ministerial education at the graduate level, fundamentalists formed Dallas Theological Seminary in 1924.

In addition to education, fundamentalists took advantage of the new medium of radio. During the mid-1920s, Charles Fuller's Old-Fashioned Revival Hour became the most popular religious radio program in the United States. Other popular programs throughout the late 1920s and 1930s included Donald Grey Barnhouse's Bible Study Hour, R. DeHaan's Radio Bible Class, and various productions of the Moody Bible Institute. During this time, John R. Rice's Sword of the Lord emerged as the major fundamentalist newspaper.

As the fundamentalist movement grew, some of its leaders became increasingly concerned that its separatist strategy discouraged a thoughtful Christian perspective on social, political, and economic issues, a viewpoint expressed in Carl F.H. Henry's The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism, published in 1947. Meanwhile, J. Elwin Wright and Harold John Ockenga helped organize the National Association of Evangelicals in 1943; during the next few years, this association established agencies for public affairs, media, missions, and humanitarian aid. Fuller Theological Seminary (founded in 1947) and the Evangelical Theological Society (established in 1949) sought to engage the academic theological world, though both retained their fundamentalist identity with a commitment to biblical inerrancy.

Evangelist Billy Graham, who had been educated at Wheaton College, rose to national prominence with his 1949 Los Angeles crusade. In 1956, Graham, along with L. Nelson Bell, established Christianity Today, edited by Henry, as the principal voice of the evangelical movement.

Christian Fundamentalism emerged in America in the early twentieth century. In the post–World War II era, the Reverend Billy Graham and other evangelists opposed the separatist strategy of the early movement and built a politically active mainstream. (John Dominis/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

As Graham increasingly worked with mainline churches in his crusades, fundamentalist leaders Bob Jones, Sr., Bob Jones, Jr., and John R. Rice publicly opposed him. Fuller Theological Seminary softened its stand on biblical inerrancy in 1962 and dropped the doctrine from its statement of faith in 1970. In 1976, Harold Lindsell, the editor of Christianity Today, published Battle for the Bible in defense of inerrancy. Conflict over inerrancy and related issues also erupted among the Missouri Synod Lutherans and the Southern Baptists, with the fundamentalists largely victorious in both denominations. Despite these disputes, the line between fundamentalism and evangelicalism was unclear, and the media often used the terms interchangeably.

The fundamentalist movement continued to spawn numerous additional organizations. These included Jack Wyrzten's Word of Life (founded in 1940), a youth ministry; Carl McIntire's American Council of Christian Churches (founded in 1941); the Conservative Baptist Association (founded in 1947); the Baptist Bible Fellowship (founded in 1950); the Baptist Missionary Association (founded in 1950); and the Southwide Baptist Fellowship (founded in 1957).

In addition to such intradenominational organizations, fundamentalists also developed "megachurches." This phenomenon dated back at least to J. Frank Norris's churches in Fort Worth, Texas, and Detroit, Michigan, which claimed a combined membership of 25,000 in the mid-1940s. By the 1960s, other very large churches included Highland Park Baptist Church in Chattanooga, Tennessee, First Baptist Church of Hammond, Indiana, and Landmark Baptist Temple in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Political Engagement

Although a few fundamentalists such as Carl McIntire and Billy James Hargis engaged in anticommunist crusades in the 1950s, fundamentalists generally did not become politically active until the late 1960s. The U.S. Supreme Court decisions in Engel v. Vitale (1962) and Schempp v. Murray (1963), which banned devotional Bible reading and state-sponsored prayers in public schools, and its landmark ruling in Roe v. Wade (1972), which legalized abortion, along with the cultural changes that accelerated in the 1960s, goaded fundamentalists into action.

On the local level, in Kanawha County, West Virginia, fundamentalists gained control of the school board and, in 1973, banned sex education, providing a model that fundamentalists would follow elsewhere. In Texas, with mixed success, Mel and Norma Gabler pressured the State Textbook Committee to approve books that met fundamentalist standards in their treatment of evolution and sex. California experienced controversy in the 1960s and 1970s over its science curriculum's treatment of evolution. Such disaffection with public schools spurred the growth of independent Christian schools, which grew rapidly in the 1970s; more than 1,700 institutions were educating about 2.5 million students by the end of the decade.

Evolution also became a public issue for fundamentalists with the emergence of "scientific creationism," the belief that creation had taken place in seven literal days about 6,000 years ago and that most geological phenomena were the result of Noah's flood. These beliefs gradually became dominant in fundamentalist circles after the publication of Henry Morris's and John C. Whitcomb's The Genesis Flood in 1961. Led by such organizations as the Creation Research Society (established in 1963), fundamentalists pushed for laws that mandated a "balanced" approach to origins that included scientific creationism as well as evolution. Although Arkansas and Louisiana passed such laws in the early 1980s, federal courts declared them unconstitutional, decisions ultimately affirmed by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1987.

Fundamentalists had broader concerns than sex education and evolution, however. Jerry Falwell, who traced his conversion to Fuller's radio program, served as pastor of a megachurch in Lynchburg, Virginia, and had a radio and television program, The Old-Time Gospel Hour, which aired in 1956. With other pastors, including James Kennedy, Tim LaHaye, Charles Stanley, and Greg Dixon, he formed the Moral Majority in 1979, which organized both nationally and locally to oppose abortion, homosexual marriage, pornography, and the Equal Rights Amendment. Although initially established by fundamentalists, the Moral Majority soon also included Mormons and conservative Catholics and Jews. By the time the organization disbanded in 1989, it had played a key role in the emergence of the Christian Right, which became increasingly influential in the Republican Party.

Continuing to make effective use of the media, fundamentalists reached large audiences through such preachers as Rex Humbard and James Robison; during the 1960s and 1970s, Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network and Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker's PTL Club offered more entertainment-oriented programming. In 1987, however, the Bakkers' media empire crashed amid a sex and financial scandal. James Dobson's Focus on the Family increasingly moved from issues such as how to deal with a strong-willed child to political matters, particularly homosexual rights. Dispensational millenarianism reached the best-seller list through Hal Lindsey's and C.C. Carlson's book Late Great Planet Earth (1970) and Tim LaHaye's and Jerry B. Jenkins's Left Behind series of novels (1995–2007).

Through much of its history, fundamentalism in America had been a counterculture, even within Christian circles. By the late twentieth century, however, it, along with its close relative evangelicalism, had become the mainstream of American Christianity. And while fundamentalism remained a minority position in American society at large, it had become a major force in the Republican Party and thereby pushed Democrats to address the role of religion in public life.

Gary Land

See also: McPherson, Aimee Semple.

Further Reading

Beale, David O. In Pursuit of Purity: American Fundamentalism Since 1850. Greenville, SC: Unusual Publications, 1986.

Bendroth, Margaret Lamberts. Fundamentalism and Gender, 1875 to the Present. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993.

Carpenter, Joel A. Revive Us Again: The Reawakening of American Fundamentalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Dollar, George W. A History of Fundamentalism in America. Greenville, SC: Bob Jones University Press, 1973.

Marsden, George M. Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Numbers, Ronald L. The Creationists: From Scientific Creationism to Intelligent Design. Exp. ed. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2006.

Sandeen, Ernest R. The Roots of Fundamentalism: British and American Millenarianism, 1800–1930. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.

Gangs and Gang Culture

Gangs are loosely organized groups, bound by neighborhood, ethnicity, or belief systems, that engage in illegal or antisocial activities for financial gain, to protect their territory, and for the perpetuation of group identity. Their social organizations, cultures, and changing contexts pose especially complex and paradoxical issues in the study of American countercultures. As local networking associations, gangs often have helped immigrants adapt to their new community, or have helped young men facing discrimination on the basis of race, ethnicity, or class to negotiate between everyday rejection and the distant goal of assimilation into mainstream culture. As such, gangs have helped organize marginal neighborhoods and foster racial and ethnic pride, and produced a rich, albeit predominantly male, alternative culture since the origins of the republic.

At the same time, gang violence, criminal behavior against neighbors, and confrontations with police have elicited aggressive reactions from society at large and often have distanced gangs from discussions of social and political reform, even among those who share gangs' positions and concerns. Ties between certain gangs in the United States and those in other countries also have made them suspect and feared.

Nonetheless, the culture, style, and agency of gangs have continued to make them attractive to many youths, especially in poor and ethnically marked neighborhoods. And gangs and gang style (for example, the musical style gangsta rap) also have spread to rural and suburban areas, appealing to women as well as men.

With an estimated 20,000 to 30,000 gangs and hundreds of thousands of members, gang culture represents a significant segment of American society, however fragmented, that has endured for generations without sanction or respect from most citizens. Whether viewed as a nuisance, an epidemic, a social problem, or a social movement, gangs clearly represent an important cultural phenomenon outside mainstream definitions of virtue, civic participation, and success.

History and Imagery

Contemporary, urban gangs began to take shape with the Industrial Revolution of the nineteenth century. Emblematic, conflicting groups were New York natives and Irish immigrants with colorful names such as the Kerryonians, Hell's Kitchen Gang, Plug Uglies, and Roach Guard. Herbert Asbury's 1928 book, Gangs of New York, vividly portrays these groups and their milieu, providing the foundation for Martin Scorsese's 2002 epic film of the same name.

As those earlier immigrants matured, gained citizenship, and formed connections in politics, business, and education, new gangs formed around new immigrants, primarily Jews and Italians, their neighborhoods, and their experiences of exclusion. Sometimes, these local gangs maintained ties with their homelands, in some cases with global adult criminal organizations such as the Sicilian Mafia and Chinese Triads.

Even as the United States limited immigration in the 1920s, adult gangster involvement in crimes of liquor distribution, gambling, prostitution, and concomitant violence during Prohibition (1920–1933) increased public concern and systematic controls. Asbury's many writings on gangs and Frederic Thrasher's classic sociological study, The Gang: A Study of 1,313 Gangs in Chicago (1927), date from this era. The new Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and state and local law enforcement all targeted these organizations, while Hollywood generally glorified them.

Youth gangs remained less glamorous but were ubiquitous, including bands of African American youths displaced by the Great Migration that had flowed from the Jim Crow South to Northern industrial settings. African American gangs had appeared in Los Angeles by the 1920s.

In the 1940s and 1950s, American concerns with juvenile delinquency were on the rise, spurred by Los Angeles's zoot suit riots of 1943 involving Mexican American youth and racial incidents in Northern cities. Urban gangs challenged an optimistic postwar society, spurring systematic analysis of gang recruitment, organizational structure, activity, and group identity.

Such studies underscore cultural patterns that seem consistent through history. Most gang members have been males in their teens or early twenties (with others ranging from eleven to thirty), with shared identities of territory and race, ethnicity, or class. Organization usually is relatively loose and ephemeral, and many gangs disappear after just a few years. Others have continued to recruit for generations and have claimed interurban associations of thousands of youths. Gangs also have created and displayed group unity through clothes, symbols, language, and ritual. Illegal or antisocial behaviors have played important cultural roles in many gangs, whether this entails mere isolation from the social mainstream or an active commitment to violence, crime, or other antisocial behavior. Despite widely perceived threats and drastic responses, the studies consistently have shown that gang victims have been men similar in age and background to the perpetrators. Many victims have themselves been associated with gang activity.

The 1950s saw increasing portrayals of gangs in popular books and films such as Blackboard Jungle (1955), Rebel Without a Cause (1955), and West Side Story (1961). Often, these works combined messages about social and psychological concerns over the origin and treatment of delinquency with glamorization of young male rebel stars.

Gangs and Gang Culture Today

Older social and cultural patterns have persisted with gangs that formed among disenfranchised groups in the 1960s. Such groups include Cuban refugees and other Hispanics in Florida, Latinos from Texas to California, African Americans in inner cities, or new Asian immigrants. Despite labeling these youths as juvenile delinquents, analysts continue to recognize the cultural values of socialization, support, and masculine identity that come with gang membership. Associations of gangs that campaigned for civil rights or neighborhood security also challenged reductive visions of gangs that emphasized only violence and criminality, especially as opposition to the Vietnam War and demands for Latino rights brought widespread youth protest into the streets.

Since the late 1970s, the perception of gang violence as a widespread problem has reemerged as the multinational drug trade has become associated in the media and the popular culture with smuggling, drugs, and turf battles. Still, some scholars dispute the common association of gangs with drug dealers. Although many gang members indeed have used and sold drugs, they have lacked the organizational expertise to control large-scale trafficking. Their crimes more often involve graffiti, vandalism, extortion, and theft. Meanwhile, media coverage of Los Angeles's predominantly African American Crips and Bloods has contributed to the public's image of large, organized gangs—whose members sport salient colors and symbols—spreading across the entire United States and the Western Hemisphere. It remains unclear, however, how many of these gang members have actually been allied with other gangs, or how effectively those who adopted a flashy, well-known “brand” name were actually organized only within Los Angeles.

Gang-related graffiti covers a neighborhood fence in South Central Los Angeles, an area synonymous in the media with street crime and gang culture. Graffiti is a means by which gangs declare their turf; music, clothing styles, and tattoos are other cultural markers. (Hector Mata/AFP/Getty Images)

Latino and Asian gangs have raised additional concerns because of their association with illegal immigration, smuggling, and criminal connections since the 1970s. Larger-scale organized crime, whether in Chinese Triads or Caribbean drug rings, has become conflated with local youth activities, while differences among immigrant communities have erupted in battles among Vietnamese, Cantonese, and Fujianese and among Mexicans, Central Americans, Cubans, and Colombians.

Connections between gang members in the United States and their country of origin underscore the significance of international gangs, including some who have taken American gangs, as seen in the mass media, as their models. Gangs and institutional responses to them have garnered attention in British cities, French banlieues (working-class suburbs), Latin American cities, post-communist Russia, South Africa, South Asia, East Asia, and Australia. Many of these share social and cultural attributes with American gangs—young, male, socially marginalized groups displaced by economic shifts or immigration. These gangs typically seem to be less driven by territorial imperatives and less violent than their American counterparts, especially in terms of access to advanced weaponry.

Gangs also have spread within the United States, among Native Americans, suburbanites, and poor, alienated whites, especially those in prison. Neo-Nazi fringe groups known as Skinheads and Stoners (for their shaved-head militaristic look and their involvement with drugs, respectively) have clashed frequently with ethnic and African American gangs.

Nevertheless, among bikers (a group of non-mainstream motorcyclists), who the media have long associated with gangs and who share a degree of marginalization, racialization, gender focus, and illicit aspects (not to mention romanticization, as epitomized in the 1953 film The Wild One starring Marlon Brando), some aging associates have sought to maintain a position outside mainstream society while avoiding criminality, legitimizing the biker gang as a social association.

Women have been involved in mixed gangs for decades, and in all-female ones with vivid names like the Black Widows (1940s Los Angeles), Dagger Debs and Persian Queens (1960s New York), Five Percent Nation, Little Diablas, and Sex Girls. Still, women in gangs often act as girlfriends or allies rather than as independent agents, especially in the realm of violence. Names such as Little Diablas, Molls, and Queens evoke the dependence of many female gangs on their local male counterparts. Only 6 to 10 percent of gang members are female, although social interventions often have targeted them because of perceptions of vulnerability. Responses thus reflect gender distinctions in mainstream society.

The diffusion of gangs and gang style into areas beyond traditional zones of urban alienation underscores the impact of mass media images of gang cool. Gangs have been criticized in youth-oriented films such as Boyz n the Hood (1991), Sugar Hill (1994), the comedy Friday (1995), and American History X (1998). They are depicted as villains in incessant portrayals in television shows from Miami Vice to Law and Order, Oz, and, say some media critics and sociologists, even on the nightly news. Yet these same media also incorporate music, style, and images of masculine heroism that belie reform messages.

Music has become an especially important part of mediated gang culture and its dissemination, ever since rebellious images became associated with rock and roll. In the 1990s, gangsta rap, an offshoot of African American urban hip-hop, produced national stars including Ice-T, Dr. Dre, N.W.A., Wu-Tang Clan, Tupac Shakur, and Notorious B.I.G. The deaths of the last two stars, however, made clear the intersections of the music business and gang territory—East Coast versus West Coast—that underpinned a larger-than-life gangster lifestyle. Critics have attacked these musicians for their glorification of misogyny, racial difference, violence, and easy wealth. The sales of their recordings and their cultural influence indicate that gang imagery remains attractive for a wide range of American youth seeking identity.

The 2006 film The Departed, which borrows from the elaborate media culture surrounding youth gangs and male stardom in Hong Kong, won the Academy Award for Best Picture. It shares that accolade with such films as West Side Story, The Godfather (1972), The Godfather II (1974), and Gangs of New York. All of these films underscore how mainstream media perpetuates interest in the alternative lifestyle and culture of gangs.

Labeling gangs as countercultures cannot mitigate the human costs associated with gang violence, members' involvement with drugs, and crimes in terrified neighborhoods. Communities and governments, however, might profit from consideration of this perspective to modify their simplistic and unsuccessful strategies to eliminate gangs at any cost. National tracking, task forces, raids, and enforced imprisonment may unfairly profile minorities and even aggravate gang problems, given the activities of gangs behind bars. Experts recommend, instead, socially oriented projects that focus on early intervention with younger males and opportunities for older gang members such as employment and community integration.

Meanwhile, antigang strategies that prohibit individuals from engaging in illegal and legal activities in certain zones (civil gang injunctions, or CGI), treating gangs as street terrorists, raise wider civil liberties issues that resonate with the experience of other countercultural groups. Gangs as countercultural organizations and representations thus embody disillusionment with the ideal of American opportunity and enduring American countercultural images of masculinity, rebellion, and camaraderie.

Gary W. McDonogh

See also: Biker Culture: Bowery B'hoys and G'hals: Gangsta Rap: Hip-Hop: Los Angeles, California: Mafia: Prohibition.

Further Reading

Brotherton, David C., and Luis Barrios. The Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation: Street Politics and the Transformation of a New York City Gang. New York: Columbia University Press, 2004.

Franzese, Robert J., Herbert C. Covey, and Scott Menard. Youth Gangs. 3rd ed. Springfield, IL: Charles C. Thomas, 2006.

Hagedorn, John M. Gangs in the Global City: Alternatives to Traditional Criminology. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2007.

Klein, Malcolm W., and Cheryl L. Maxson. Street Gang Patterns and Policies. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Moore, Joan, and John M. Hagedorn. Female Gangs: A Focus on Research. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 2001.

Thrasher, Frederic M. The Gang: A Study of 1,313 Gangs in Chicago. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1927.

Gangsta Rap

Gangsta rap is a subgenre of hip-hop music that initially rose to popularity in the late 1980s. Throughout the late 1980s, several landmark gangsta rap artists avoided the positive demeanor or sociopolitical consciousness of popular hip-hop music to present a lyrically explicit, misogynistic, and cruelly violent panorama of inner-city turmoil. Gangsta rap lyrics often abandon messages of hope or racial uplift to embrace portrayals of violent criminal activity among young black men. As the subgenre amassed popularity in the early to mid-1990s, gangsta rap became a target for parents, politicians, and watchdog groups who worried about the potential effects of the music on impressionable children and teens. Most artists within the subgenre defended gangsta rap by framing it as a fictionalized caricature of inner-city life. Although the controversy over gangsta rap only served to boost sales for record labels, the subgenre faded in popularity after competition between the coasts finally erupted in the 1997 murders of two popular gangsta rap artists.

In the mid-1980s, hip-hop artists such as MC Schoolly D (Jesse Weaver), Ice-T (Tracy Marrow), and KRS-One (Lawrence Parker) established many of gangsta rap's conventions. These artists described inner-city violence, routine drug use, and rampant criminal activity on their respective albums. The subgenre was established in the public eye in 1988, when Southern California gangsta rap group N.W.A. (Niggaz With Attitude) released its first full-length LP, Straight Outta Compton. By early 1989, Straight Outta Compton had become the first album to reach platinum status (1 million copies sold) without marketing support. While earlier gangsta rap pioneers had established the contextual framework for N.W.A., the group's graphic depictions of violence and misogyny were unparalleled and immediately became a target of controversy. Because of its explicit content, Straight Outta Compton was instrumental in the creation of the parental advisory sticker by the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA). After the critical failure of the group's next recording, N.W.A. disbanded in the early 1990s.

Several California artists who worked to develop and popularize gangsta rap in the mid-to late 1980s peaked critically and commercially in the early 1990s. Ice-T, whose early music contained some of the first references to misogynistic hallmarks of the subgenre, released O.G.: Original Gangster in 1991, which was the most popular solo album of his career. Former N.W.A. member Ice Cube (O'Shea Jackson) released several sociopolitically conscious gangsta rap albums in the early 1990s to widespread critical and commercial acclaim. Because of the enormous success of artists such as Ice-T, Too $hort, and the former members of N.W.A., many music critics credit the West Coast for the birth of gangsta rap.

California's dominance of gangsta rap continued in 1992, as former N.W.A. member Dr. Dre (Andre Young) solidified the popularity of the subgenre with the overwhelming success of his first solo effort, The Chronic. That album, which introduced Dre's young protégé, Snoop Dogg (Calvin Broadus), also introduced gangsta rap to the mainstream. The enormous success of The Chronic led Dre's record label, Death Row Records (co-owned by Suge Knight), to an era of prosperity virtually unprecedented in the music industry. The Chronic is also credited with ushering in the so-called g-funk phase, which heavily sampled the music of George Clinton. Although this style was established and popularized by The Chronic, Snoop Dogg's 1993 solo effort, Doggystyle, also contributed to the success of g-funk. In 1995, popular California gangsta rap artist Tupac Shakur also signed with Death Row. His first recording with that label, All Eyez on Me (1996), was the first double album in the subgenre's short history; it reached platinum status during its first four hours of release.

Despite the West Coast's status as home to many of the subgenre's pioneers, like-minded artists on the East Coast began attempts to capitalize on the success of gangsta rap. Throughout the late 1980s and early 1990s, groups such as Memphis's Geto Boyz, Staten Island, New York's Wu-Tang Clan, and Cleveland's Bone Thugs-n-Harmony were greeted with formidable record sales and widespread acclaim. Instead of adhering to the g-funk style that was popularized by the Death Row label, many East Coast artists tried to apply gangsta rap conventions in new and exciting ways.

In the mid-1990s, Bad Boy Records emerged as the East Coast's first competitive equivalent to Death Row Records, thanks to the enormous success of artists such as Puff Daddy (Sean Combs) and Notorious B.I.G. (Christopher G. Wallace), popularly known as Biggie Smalls. Bad Boy sought to increase mainstream accessibility by sampling popular songs and releasing radio-friendly material without compromising explicit content. Unlike much of Death Row's popular-yet-explicit material, many Bad Boy recordings were designed with mainstream accessibility in mind.

Competition between the Death Row and Bad Boy labels fueled a rivalry between rappers from the East Coast and the West Coast for pop-chart dominance and street credibility. Throughout the mid-1990s, rappers from each coast would often insult rival MCs in public comments and musical references. Tension between the factions erupted in violence in 1997, and Wallace and Shakur were murdered by gunfire.

The deaths of Wallace and Shakur effectively ended the era of traditional gangsta rap's overwhelming popularity. After 1997, several independent Southern labels, such as No Limit and Cash Money, attempted to continue marketing traditional gangsta rap. Despite modestly impressive sales, the labels consistently failed to approach the previous critical and commercial success of Bad Boy or Death Row. The 1997 murders injected a harsh dose of reality into the subgenre, and mainstream artists started to release comparatively tame and radio-friendly material as a direct result.

Many contemporary rappers have abandoned the rampant violence and misogyny of traditional gangsta rap to focus on materialism or generic depictions of inner-city turmoil. In the early twenty-first century, successful new subgenres in mainstream hip-hop also abandoned controversial gangsta rap conventions to embrace radio-friendly accessibility.

Wesley French

See also: Hip-Hop: Rap Music.

Further Reading

Dyson, Michael Eric. Between God and Gangsta Rap: Bearing Witness to Black Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Kitwana, Bakari. The Rap on Gangsta Rap: Who Run It? Gangsta Rap and Visions of Black Violence. Chicago: Third World, 1994.

Quinn, Eithne. Nuthin' But a "G" Thang: The Culture and Commerce of Gangsta Rap. New York: Columbia University Press, 2004.

Zephaniah, Benjamin. Gangsta Rap. New York: Bloomsbury, 2004.

Gangsters

Criminals and con men have a long and storied history in the United States, but the modern gangster as a counterculture icon did not come into being until the 1920s. Indeed, the gangster culture in America was born of a single event: the enactment of national Prohibition—the federal ban on the manufacture, sale, or transportation of alcoholic beverages—on January 16, 1920.

Within hours after the Eighteenth Amendment went into effect, gangsters in Chicago and other large cities robbed liquor supplies and hijacked delivery trucks. One month later, on February 19, 1920, the first government agents were arrested for corruption. By June 1920, it was estimated that doctors in Chicago alone had issued about 300,000 phony prescriptions for liquor; by summer 1920, the nation's courts were clogged with thousands of Prohibition cases.

It had become apparent almost immediately that most Americans were unwilling to obey the new liquor law and that many government officials were either unable or unwilling to enforce Prohibition honestly. Longtime criminals such as Arnold Rothstein and Al Capone quickly recognized the opportunity to build powerful criminal organizations and wasted no time consolidating their power. By the end of the 1920s, they had created one of America's most enduring symbols: the Prohibition-era gangster.

Historian David E. Ruth argues that the gangster became the “paragon of modern criminality” during the 1920s and 1930s. The subject of innumerable newspaper and magazine articles, novels, plays, and more than a hundred Hollywood films, the gangster was as much a product of the American imagination as he was of his own actions. By the end of Prohibition in December 1933, the gangster had become the archetypal American antihero. Ruth describes the gangster as energetic, confident, successful, a model of stylish consumption, and a rebel, not only against the law, but also against established behavioral codes. The gangster, he wrote, was “resolutely urban, a product of the city and an enthusiastic participant in its culture.” The embodiment of the gangster was Al Capone, whom the Chicago Crime Commission named “Public Enemy Number One” in April 1930, but there were many other gangsters in nearly every city in the United States.

Gangsters and gang culture proliferated during Prohibition. In cities across the country, gangs and thugs who had once been limited to vice and violent crime, or worked as enforcers for local political machines, were transformed into socially and economically powerful figures who often controlled corrupt law enforcement officials and politicians. In Detroit, the Jewish Purple Gang, which had once been limited to robbery and murder for hire, became one of the most powerful organized-crime syndicates by taking control of smuggling liquor into the United States from Canada. Similar criminal organizations formed in other large cities, such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Cleveland.

Gang culture during the 1920s revolved around an extensive network of crime syndicates. Prohibition-era gangsters ran their operations as if they were legitimate corporations, employing accountants, salesmen, guards, enforcers, and drivers. One contemporary magazine heralded Capone as the John D. Rockefeller of the underworld, because he, like the oil-company magnate, understood the imperative of the modern economy: organize or perish.

Prohibition made Capone a powerful businessman and a media sensation, and “Scarface Al,” as he was called, made Chicago the center of the criminal underworld. Capone and his partners had taken over a number of illegal operations in and around the city by the mid-1920s, including nightclubs, whorehouses, gambling joints, and the highly lucrative brewing and bootlegging industry. Alva Johnston, a reporter for The New Yorker, wrote that in Chicago, “Beer has lifted the gangster from a local leader of roughs and gunmen to a great executive controlling a big interstate and international organization.” Johnston characterized Al Capone as the “greatest gang leader in history,” and Chicago as the “imperial city of the gang world.”

For most Americans, Capone and the gangsters he represented were little more than cultural inventions. Most people encountered them only through the pages of newspapers, magazines, and books, or on movie screens. Capone, perhaps more than any other gangster, understood this, and he worked to cultivate his public image through press conferences, interviews with reporters, and his own theatrically staged lifestyle. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s, Capone’s business prowess, lavish living, and vicious gangland slayings became the subject of numerous pulp novels (short, inexpensive picture books sold on newsstands), as well as the focus of longer books and Hollywood films. In March 1930, thirteen months after Chicago’s brutal St. Valentine’s Day Massacre—during which seven people were murdered as part of a conflict between Capone’s South Side gang and Bugs Moran’s North Side Irish and German gang—Capone’s smiling face appeared on the cover of Time magazine.

Along with business prowess and violent criminality, stylish consumption defined the Prohibition-era gangster. Americans had entered a new age of consumerism, driven by advances in technology and production, and a burgeoning advertising industry. Gangsters, like other Americans, increasingly measured their success by the things they owned. Clothes, automobiles, homes, offices, and lavish social lives became powerful symbols of their personal abilities, hard work, good fortune, and ruthlessness in dealing with competitors. After violently climbing his way to the top of the Chicago underworld, Capone managed to get his fingers into nearly every major business transaction in and around Chicago. By 1928, he was earning $105 million a year. He rode in the back of a $30,000, bulletproof limo, wore an eleven-carat diamond ring, owned a $500,000 Florida estate, a yacht, and hundreds of fine suits. Capone and the rest of the gangsters, like many of the era’s film stars, became models of consumption for eager readers and moviegoers.

Al Capone’s meteoric rise to international infamy ended almost as quickly as it began. He was found guilty of tax evasion and went to prison in October 1931. He spent the last year of his sentence, which had been reduced to six years and five months for a combination of good behavior and work credits, being treated for syphilis in the hospital section at Alcatraz Prison in San Francisco Bay. He was released from prison in November 1939 and taken to a hospital in Baltimore, where he was treated until March 1940. He spent his remaining years in deteriorating health at his Palm Island estate in Miami. Capone died on January 25, 1947, but the image he helped create remains a quintessential aspect of American culture.

The Prohibition-era gangster became the model for succeeding generations of mobsters, hit men, cons, criminals, and Mafia bosses, as well as the journalists, authors, and filmmakers who tell their stories and invent their fictionalized versions. Remnants of Al Capone and other gangsters from the 1920s and 1930s pervade contemporary American popular culture, whether in films such as The Godfather (1972) and its sequels, television series such as The Sopranos (1999–2007), or the real-life exploits of crime bosses such as New York’s John Gotti.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: Mafia: Prohibition.

Further Reading

Bergreen, Laurence. Capone: The Man and the Era. New York: Touchstone, 1996.

Kelly, Robert J. Encyclopedia of Organized Crime in the United States: From Capone's Chicago to the New Urban Underworld. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2000.

Ruth, David E. Inventing the Public Enemy: The Gangster in American Culture, 1918–1934. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879)

William Lloyd Garrison was a leading figure in the American abolition movement and ultimately one of the most vilified men in antebellum America, both north and south of the Mason-Dixon Line. He initially advocated a moderate antislavery position, but as the founder and editor of the abolitionist newspaper The Liberator beginning in 1831 and as a cofounder of the American Anti-Slavery Society two years later, he became perhaps the most visible and outspoken member of the radical wing of the abolitionist movement. The vehemence of his proclamations—including a declaration that the U.S. Constitution was “a covenant with death and an agreement with Hell” for allowing slavery—alienated much of mainstream society even in his native New England.

Garrison was born on December 10, 1805, in Newburyport, Massachusetts. His father and older brother abandoned the family when Garrison was young, leaving him in the care of his very religious mother and extended family. At the end of 1818, after several failed attempts at finding a vocation, thirteen-year-old Garrison became a printer's apprentice at the Newburyport Herald. By spring 1828, he had mastered the printer's trade and became the editor of two local papers, The Free Press and National Philanthropist. He also had met the Quaker abolitionist Benjamin Lundy, who introduced him to the emerging counterculture that was the American antislavery movement.

By the end of the 1820s, abolitionists, primarily in New England and the mid-Atlantic states, were well on their way to forming a complex organizational network rooted in local and regional churches, social clubs, and newspapers. Lundy, a harness maker and printer who had been traveling the country denouncing the evil of slaveholding, hired Garrison, who moved to Baltimore in the summer of 1829, where he briefly co-edited Lundy's weekly, Genius of Universal Emancipation.

After touring Washington, D.C., Philadelphia, and New England in search of much-needed funds and support for the antislavery cause, Garrison returned to Boston and at the end of 1830 began work on The Liberator. With the help of Isaac Knapp, he published the first issue of The Liberator on January 1, 1831. The paper remained in continuous publication until the end of the Civil War and was nationally known for its unyielding demands for the “immediate and complete emancipation of all slaves.”

In his writing and his speeches, Garrison frequently invoked the Bible and the Declaration of Independence to argue for the immediate abolition of slavery and equal rights for African Americans. In addition to editing The Liberator, he devoted much of his time in 1831 and 1832 to discrediting the American Colonization Society, an organization that favored gradualism and African American expatriation, as racist and elitist.

In December 1833, a group of abolitionists met in Philadelphia and formed the American Anti-Slavery Society (AAS). Garrison, who had helped establish the New England Anti-Slavery Society the previous year, wrote the new group's declaration of sentiments. By 1838, the AAS had thirty-eight agents in the field and approximately 1,400 local auxiliary organizations. Members had circulated 600,000 pamphlets and forwarded 400,000 petitions with nearly a million signatures to Congress protesting the gag rule (a measure adopted in the U.S. Congress in 1836 to bar debate of the slavery issue), the annexation of Texas, and the continuation of slavery and the slave trade in the nation's capital.

As the abolition movement gained momentum and incurred increasingly hostile opposition, Garrison became more radical in his thinking. In 1839 and 1840, the AAS experienced a schism over the issues of religious perfectionism, political action, and the participation of women in the movement. The opposition to Garrison, led by the more moderate Lewis Tappan, broke away from the AAS and formed the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. Garrison emerged from the controversy as the most widely recognized and, in many cases, most angrily criticized leader of the faction that favored moral suasion and the equal participation of women in the movement over restrictive social traditions and political expediency.

In May 1844, Garrison convinced the AAS to adopt the slogan "No union with slaveholders!" After years of debate, agitation, and conflict, Garrison had come to regard party politics, voting, even the U.S. Constitution as proslavery. He urged readers of The Liberator and abolitionists everywhere not to participate in America's corrupt political system until emancipation and full equality for African Americans had been realized.

The war with Mexico from 1846 to 1848, the admission of California to the Union in 1850, the Compromise of 1850, the violence of Bleeding Kansas in the mid-1850s, the Dred Scott decision in 1857 extending legal slavery into the territories, and John Brown's raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia (now West Virginia), in 1859 all transformed slavery into a sectional crisis, but Garrison did not waver in his convictions or his efforts to wage a national campaign. In 1851, he split with the prominent black abolitionist Frederick Douglass primarily over the issue of political participation, and in 1854, in the wake of the Anthony Burns case (in which an escaped slave from Virginia was captured in Boston and ordered by a judge to be returned to his owners), Garrison burned a copy of the new Fugitive Slave Law and the Constitution in front of a crowd of 3,000 cheering spectators.

Although Garrison remained critical of President Abraham Lincoln and the Republicans for not moving fast enough to end the "peculiar institution," he supported various wartime measures designed to liberate slaves.

He published the last issue of The Liberator in December 1865, following ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery. Thereafter, he championed such other reform movements as temperance, women's rights, and radical pacifism. He died on May 24, 1879.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: Abolitionism: Quakers.

Further Reading

Garrison, William Lloyd. William Lloyd Garrison and the Fight Against Slavery: Selections from The Liberator. Bedford Series in History and Culture. New York: St. Martin's, 1994.

Mayer, Henry. All on Fire: William Lloyd Garrison and the Abolition of Slavery. New York: St. Martin's, 1998.

Merrill, Walter M. Against Wind and Tide: A Biography of William Lloyd Garrison. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1963.

Perry, Lewis. Radical Abolitionism: Anarchy and the Government of God in Antislavery Thought. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.

Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940)

The pioneering black nationalist Marcus Garvey initiated the largest mass movement of blacks in world history, primarily during the 1920s. Convinced that unity was the only way to improve the harsh working conditions and substandard living conditions of blacks around the world, Garvey founded the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) in his native Jamaica in 1914. Adopting the motto “One God! One Aim! One Destiny!” the association sought to unite “all the people of African ancestry of the world into one great body to establish a country and Government absolutely their own.” Garvey thus became a leading proponent of the Back to Africa movement, encouraging African Americans to return to their ancestral or native homeland. His message of racial pride and his vision of an African homeland resonated with blacks in Jamaica, the United States, and many other countries. Although the peak period of Garvey’s movement lasted only ten years, he had millions of followers in three continents.

Marcus Mosiah (“Marcus”) Garvey was born on August 17, 1887, in St. Ann’s Bay, Jamaica. His father was a stonemason who was reputed to have descended from Maroons, runaway slaves who escaped from plantations in the West Indies and elsewhere in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Garvey’s father was known in the community for his private library and his love of reading, a trait manifested in the younger Garvey’s affinity for books and learning.

Garvey left school at age fourteen to become a printer’s apprentice in Kingston, where he developed an interest in public speaking. After a failed printers’ strike in 1908, Garvey, who had been one of the strike leaders, was blacklisted and unable to find work in his trade. Like many other Jamaicans at the time, he spent the next several years traveling around the Caribbean and Central America working at a variety of jobs. In 1912, he went to London for the first time, where he wrote articles for the Africa Times and Orient Review, a publication edited by black Egyptian Dusé Mohamed Ali. While in London, he became interested in the marginalization of blacks in both the United States and Europe. He was profoundly affected by black educator Booker T. Washington’s autobiography Up From Slavery (1901), in which he chronicled his life as a slave, his upward mobility through the West Virginia salt mines, and his establishment of the Tuskegee Institute (now Tuskegee University) in Alabama as an occupational-training school for blacks.

Returning to Jamaica, Garvey established the UNIA on August 1, 1914. Seeking to broaden his international base of support, he traveled to New York City in March 1916 and spent the next year and a half traveling throughout the United States, visiting thirty-eight states to spread his message of black unity.

In August 1918, he began publishing the Negro World, which quickly became one of the leading black American newspapers, with a circulation of at least 50,000. In 1919 and 1920, the UNIA grew rapidly in American cities with significant black populations, including Boston, Chicago, New York City, Washington, D.C., and others. The migration of thousands of Southern blacks to Northern cities between 1916 and 1918 in search of work, the disillusionment of black American soldiers over their treatment during World War I, and the wave of race riots that struck the United States during the summer of 1919 all contributed to the warm reception in the African American community for Garvey’s message of black pride and power. In 1920, the UNIA held its first international convention in New York City, attracting several thousand black delegates from the United States and other countries. This impressive show of organizational strength brought the UNIA and Garvey to the attention of the mainstream white press for the first time.

In 1919, Garvey launched the Black Star Steamship Line, a company created to provide transportation to blacks wishing to return home to Africa. The venture proved to be a financial disaster for several reasons. The UNIA did not keep detailed records of its operating expenses, its leaders were inexperienced in running a steamship line, and the ships in the fleet were old and outdated. Operation of the line was suspended in 1922, and Garvey was arrested for mail fraud in the sale of Black Star stock. He was found guilty at trial in 1923 and appealed the verdict, which was upheld in 1925 by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. President Calvin Coolidge commuted Garvey's sentence in 1927, whereupon he was released from prison and deported to Jamaica.

Black nationalist Marcus Garvey (seated at rear, plumed hat) inspired a mass movement in the 1920s with his rhetoric of racial pride and self-reliance. His call for the unification of all black people through the establishment of an African homeland struck a chord. (Michael Ochs Archives/Stringer/Getty Images)

Back in his homeland, Garvey attempted to revitalize the UNIA and held the Sixth International Convention of the Negro Peoples of the World in Kingston in 1929. He campaigned for a seat in the Jamaican legislature in 1930 but was defeated. The UNIA and the Garvey movement declined rapidly in the early 1930s. Garvey organized several more conferences in Kingston and Toronto, but attendance was only a small percentage of what it had been during the UNIA's peak years.

In 1935, the UNIA's headquarters was moved to London. Garvey was living there when he suffered a stroke in January 1940. He died on June 10 of that year, at the age of fifty-two.

Paul Kauppila

See also: Rastafari Movement: Universal Negro Improvement Association.

Further Reading

Cronon, Edmund David. Black Moses: The Story of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1968.

Fax, Elton C. Garvey: The Story of a Pioneer Black Nationalist. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.

Hill, Robert A., ed. The Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

Gay Liberation Movement

Gay liberation refers to one strand of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) politics that emerged in the late 1960s. It was characterized by confrontational politics, a refusal of mainstream sexual and political values, belief in the universality of same-sex desire, the adoption of alternative gender and sexual arrangements, and the shedding of secrecy associated with same-sex sexual acts and sexual identities by “coming out.” Informed by the homophile movement, the civil rights movement, and the student-led New Left movement, gay liberation in the 1960s and early 1970s espoused a radical political stance and decried the sexist, racist, and homophobic politics of mainstream America.

Antecedents

The homophile movement, which preceded and enabled gay liberation, emerged after World War II as a result of the growth of gay identity and gay communities and the persecution of gays and lesbians by federal, state, and local governments. In an expansion of antihomosexual policies, federal and state governments and the military purged gays and lesbians from their ranks and excluded them from federal benefits such as the GI Bill.

Gays and lesbians were regularly harassed by police when congregating in public, and homosexual conduct was criminalized under antisodomy and obscenity codes. Affirmative representations of homosexuality, as a result, were excluded from the public sphere. The absence of penalties for discrimination based on sexuality and informal cultural policing, which included harassment and physical assaults, created oppression in public and private and isolated individuals who engaged in or desired same-sex sexual activity.

These repressive contexts, which continued well beyond the 1950s, promoted a shared sense of oppression and the belief among some gays and lesbians that they deserved better treatment. The Mattachine Foundation (later the Mattachine Society), begun in 1950 in Los Angeles, and the Daughters of Bilitis, a lesbian organization formed in San Francisco in 1955, marked the beginning of the homophile movement, which sought to promote self-esteem, equal rights, and group consciousness among gay men and women. Homophiles also sought to end the secrecy and isolation associated with gay and lesbian life by publishing gay journals, by organizing protests and social events, by offering counseling and medical referrals, and through political advocacy. Homophile efforts enabled many gays and lesbians to find each other, forge an identity, and establish a community, while seeking integration into mainstream society. Many homophile leaders promoted a political culture of respectability when engaging in protest and advocated a gradual and reformist politics.

By the early 1960s, a new militancy infused parts of the homophile movement. For example, gay rights activist Franklin Kameny, who led the Washington, D.C., chapter of the Mattachine Society, adopted rhetoric from the civil rights and Black Power movements to advocate for social equality. Kameny and others were frustrated with the cautiousness of the homophiles and sought more immediate changes based on the premise that homosexuality was equal to heterosexuality.

Stonewall

The 1969 Stonewall riots were both a historical event and a political narrative that inaugurated gay liberation and helped gays and lesbians imagine themselves as oppressed but also as capable of collective public resistance. The Stonewall Inn, a dive bar on Christopher Street in the heart of Greenwich Village and the gay ghetto in New York City, served a mixed clientele of gay and lesbian youth, transvestites or “street queens,” and working-class youth. Operating without a liquor license and thought to have ties with organized crime, the bar was an especially inviting target for police. Raids on gay bars routinely saw the arrest and physical intimidation of those who were cross-dressing, were under age, or at all resisted the police. Following raids, newspapers would sometimes announce the names and addresses of those arrested, humiliating them in front of friends, coworkers, and families who may not have known about their sexual identities or orientations.

On Friday, June 27, 1969, shortly before midnight, plainclothes detectives raided the Stonewall Inn. Stonewall patrons and those who gathered on Christopher Street did not react fearfully, but defiantly, pelting the detectives with beer cans, bottles, coins, and cobblestones ripped from the street. The detectives retreated inside the building, and the angry crowd laid siege and tried to burn the bar to the ground. When the riot squad arrived to disperse the crowd, many drag queens, gays, lesbians, and other patrons fought back. Rioting continued through the weekend.

News of Stonewall spread quickly and became laden with symbolism. Although there were other moments of collective defiance, such as the 1966 Compton Cafeteria riot in San Francisco, Stonewall has come to serve as a foundational political narrative for gay liberation. Marches and parades have been organized annually to commemorate the Stonewall riots and have emphasized the central trope of post-Stonewall activism: public visibility and proud acceptance of sexually variant identities.

Gay Liberation Front and Gay Activist Alliance

Within weeks of the Stonewall riots, gay men and lesbians in New York had formed the Gay Liberation Front (GLF), a self-described radical organization named after the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam. GLF drew members and inspiration from the New Left, a radical sociopolitical movement comprised primarily of college students, but at the same time were frustrated with leftist homophobia and sexism.

GLF member Martha Shelley highlighted these tensions when she wrote the following in her 1970 manifesto, “Gay Is Good”:

“Look out, straights. Here comes the Gay Liberation Front, springing up like warts all over the bland face of Amerika, causing shudders of indigestion in the delicately balanced bowels of the movement.... ?We’re gonna make our own revolution because we’re sick of revolutionary posters which depict straight he-man types and earth mothers, with guns and babies. We’re sick of the Panthers lumping us together with the capitalists in their term of universal contempt—faggot.... We gays are separate from you—we are alien.”

GLF also attracted many members from the homophile movement who were excited by a more active, open, and militant movement and who were frustrated with the homophile movement, which GLF members castigated for being timid and assimilationist. In order to make their existence known and to attract new members, gay liberationists staged their own demonstrations and supported New Left political protests as a means of spreading their message. They also attracted media attention by publicly confronting political candidates and protesting negative representations of gays and lesbians in the media.

From the New Left, GLF borrowed a highly effective political language about identity and oppression, which they modified to describe a liberationist politics for gays and lesbians. GLF members spoke of resisting genocide, called for a revolution against “imperial Amerika,” and understood gay oppression as being connected with other forms of social injustice such as racism and sexism. Rather than asserting a stable gay identity, gay liberationists claimed that all people were capable of loving members of the same or opposite sex and sought to break down the social barriers that they believed prohibited others from actualizing their sexual potential.

Likewise, gay liberation marked a rejection of mainstream values and the establishment of new cultural values. As gay liberationist Carl Wittman wrote in "A Gay Manifesto" in 1969, "Liberation for gay people is defining for ourselves how and with whom we live, instead of measuring our relationship in comparison to straight ones, with straight values." Notably, the central trope of gay liberation was the idea of coming out. Gay liberationists predicated their activism and ideology on shedding self-hatred and promoting a visible gay identity. Because becoming visible put into jeopardy their family, job, and friendships, many participants in gay liberation became profoundly invested in the political success of the movement.

Even as GLF chapters proliferated, gay liberation groups negotiated internal divisions along political and identity-based lines. In 1970, GLF-inspired groups formed in a number of other locations in the United States including Chicago, Lawrence (Kansas), Los Angeles, and Philadelphia. Like the New York GLF, these groups espoused a countercultural ethic and solidarity with an array of progressive causes. The Lawrence GLF, for example, proclaimed its identification with "other oppressed brothers and sisters of Amerika and the Third World to struggle against the nightmare and create one world of people living together." Philadelphia's GLF was multiracial and helped organize the Radicalesbians.

Although the GLF empowered gays and lesbians to be agents for social change and encouraged them to liberate their consciousness by developing "homosexual ethics and esthetics independent of, and without reference to, the mores imposed upon heterosexuality," New York's GLF was internally divided in its goals, politics, and identity. To accommodate social and political differences, GLF subdivided into cells such as Street Transvestite Action Revolutionaries (STAR), Third World Gay Revolution (TWGR), and Radicalesbians, all begun in 1970.

STAR was founded by Marsha P. Johnson and Sylvia Rivera to advocate on behalf of homeless straight, gay, and transgender youth. TWGR was founded by Asian, African American, and Latino activists who challenged homophobia and male supremacy among revolutionaries of color and advocated for "the right of self-determination for all third world and gay people" by resisting the "totalitarian, authoritarian, sex-controlled, repressive, irrational, reactionary, fascist government or government machine."

Radicalesbians combined feminist and lesbian politics, and they played a pivotal role in confronting antigay prejudice within the women's rights movement and sexism within gay liberation. Like gay male liberationists, Radicalesbians minimized the importance of sexuality to lesbian identity and emphasized the commonalities between lesbians and heterosexual women by describing lesbianism as "a political choice"; in their 1970 manifesto, "The Woman-Identified Woman," they defined a lesbian as "the rage of all women condensed to the point of explosion." Their protest against homophobia within women's liberation at the Second Congress to Unite Women in May 1970 saw Radicalesbian members take the stage while wearing T-shirts bearing the phrase "lavender menace" and passing out copies of "The Woman-Identified Woman." Radicalesbians' activism and ideology presaged a lesbian-separatist politics that flourished in the 1970s, which saw the creation of alternative cultural institutions and women-only spaces that were separate from gay male and heterosexual society.

New York GLF's radical ethos, internal divisions, and broad politics frustrated some of its members, who decided to found a gay organization that was reform oriented and united around the single goal of gay rights. In December 1969, members of the GLF formed the Gay Activist Alliance (GAA). The alliance had a formal organizational structure and followed parliamentary procedure as laid out in Robert's Rules of Order to make decisions and run their meetings. GAA sought to mobilize a broad constituency of gay men and women. They chose issues that would attract media attention and yield general support, such as the passage of antidiscrimination laws, inclusion in the mainstream press, and attention and accountability from politicians. GAA, in effect, incorporated the confrontational style of the New Left and the reformist and rights-based goals of the homophile movement in their effort to end "all oppression of homosexuals" by implementing and maintaining "social and political rights which are guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and the Bill of Rights."

Like GLF, other gay liberation groups faced internal divisions, divided priorities, and competing interests over what cultural traits, attitudes, and sexual practices were authentic and which were the results of oppression and societal factors; whether gays and lesbians should identify first and foremost or even exclusively with their sexuality; and how demands for sexual difference should accommodate claims of sexual and social equality. By 1971, New York's GLF had disbanded, and many other gay liberation groups dissolved over the next three years. Despite its lack of longevity, the GLF provided a model for a confrontational and anti-assimilationist gay politics.

Legacies

Gay liberation's radical aspirations and emphasis on gay consciousness and countercultural values continued through the 1970s and beyond. Subsequent struggles over gay rights brought ongoing debates within the gay community about the meanings of social and cultural equality and the value of countercultural identities.

These debates played out in 1977 during the anti-gay rights backlash in Dade County, Florida, led by the conservative coalition Save Our Children. The liberal gay organization Dade County Coalition for Human Rights (DCCHR) and the radical gay group Miami Victory Campaign (MVC) sought to retain a civil rights law that prohibited discrimination based on sexual or affectional preference. DCCHR espoused a liberal-oriented and middle-class politics of respectability; MVC espoused sexual and human liberation, linked gay oppression to the oppression of all people, and believed that it was essential to unapologetically project "what is positive and joyful in the same-sex experience."

Since the 1970s, other groups have worked within some of gay liberation's legacies and have refused both mainstream straight and assimilationist gay values. The Radical Fairies, a rural queer collective founded by Harry Hay in 1980, urged members to reject urban gay male commodity culture and "throw off the ugly green frogskin of hetero-imitation to find the shining Faerie prince underneath." In the 1990s, Queer Nation and AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) espoused a militant, confrontational politics of visibility to address AIDS, gay violence, government apathy, and right-wing homophobia.

ACT UP was founded in 1987 by Larry Kramer and other New York-based activists to protest the government's and pharmaceutical companies' roles in making the treatment of persons living with AIDS financially prohibitive and inhumane. Members of ACT UP founded the activist organization Queer Nation in 1990. Using direct-action protests such as publicly displaying queer sexuality and holding media-savvy protests, Queer Nation protested violence against queer people and discriminatory media representations of LGBT people.

In 2006, Beyond Marriage, a group of LGBT and queer activists and academics held a two-day workshop and issued a statement that criticized those who explicitly supported gay marriage while ignoring wider social-justice issues including poverty and racism. Beyond Marriage argued that the "LGBT movement should reinforce the idea that marriage should be one of many avenues through which households, families, partners, and kinship relationships can gain access to the support of a caring civil society."

These groups all operated within a tradition of creating alternative sexual values, while struggling for an inclusive form of social justice that linked sexual liberation to freedom from racial, economic, and gender oppression.

Gillian Frank

See also: Daughters of Bilitis; Greenwich Village, New York City; Mattachine Society.

Further Reading

Adam, Barry D. The Rise of a Gay and Lesbian Movement. Boston: Twayne, 1997.

Armstrong, Elizabeth A., and Suzanna M. Crage. "Movements and Memory: The Making of the Stonewall Myth." American Sociological Review 71 (October 2006) : 724–51.

Bailey, Beth. Sex in the Heartland. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.

Beemyn, Brett. "The Silence Is Broken: A History of the First Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual College Student Groups." Journal of the History of Sexuality 12:2 (April 2003) : 205–23.

Berlant, Lauren, and Elizabeth Freeman. "Queer Nationality." boundary 2 19:1 (Spring 1992) : 149–80.

D'Emilio, John. Sexual Politics, Sexual Communities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Gallo, Marcia M. Different Daughters: A History of the Daughters of Bilitis and the Rise of the Lesbian Rights Movement. Emeryville, CA: Seal, 2006

Jay, Karla. Out of the Closets: Voices of Gay Liberation. New York: New York University Press, 1992.

Jay, Karla. Tales of the Lavender Menace: A Memoir of Liberation. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Marotta, Toby. The Politics of Homosexuality. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1981.

Third World Gay Revolution. "The Oppressed Shall Not Become the Oppressor." 1970. Reprinted in We Are Everywhere: A Historical Sourcebook of Gay and Lesbian Politics, ed. Mark Blasius and Shane Phelan. New York: Routledge, 1997.

Timmons, Stuart. The Trouble with Harry Hay: Founder of the Modern Gay Movement. Boston: Alyson, 1990.

Gaye, Marvin (1939–1984)

Marvin Gaye was a singer and songwriter of soul and R&B music who rose to fame in the 1960s with recordings of love songs on the Motown Records label. He expanded his themes in the 1970s to include urban decay, race, war, and ecology. His album What's Going On (1971) was part of the popular soundtrack to the political counterculture of the 1970s.

He was born Marvin Pentz Gay, Jr., in Washington, D.C., on April 2, 1939, the son of an evangelical preacher. After a brief stint in the U.S. Air Force, he began singing in doo-wop groups in the late 1950s. His first solo recording, The Soulful Moods of Marvin Gaye (1961), was also one of the Motown label's first releases. Between July 1962 and June 1971, Gaye had a total of twenty-two Top Ten R&B singles (including nine number ones) and fourteen Top Ten pop singles. He was the leading male artist at Motown during the 1960s, with such hit recordings as "Ain't No Mountain High Enough" (1967), with frequent duet partner Tammi Terrell, and the solo "I Heard It Through the Grapevine" (1968).

His popularity gave Gaye credibility with the American people that allowed him to tackle difficult social issues. With no end to the Vietnam War in sight and the nation's rebellious spirit deflated by the oratory of the Richard M. Nixon administration, the youth of America looked to popular music for answers and insight into difficult social questions. In 1971, after Terrell's death from brain cancer and with American society in turmoil, Gaye forged a radically new direction in his music. He wrote and produced songs of his own and released them on his album What's Going On to offer hope.

The concept of the album was both simple and complex. Anyone could understand its central message—love—but listeners had to find love in depictions of the most ugly, violent, and angry situations of modern society. The album was an inside look at the destitution in American ghettos, the frustration of the war in Vietnam, and the destruction of the natural environment. With the authenticity and earnestness of Bob Dylan and the musical flair of the Beatles, Gaye had written and recorded an album that became an icon of the counterculture and of the social conscience of the American people. What's Going On encouraged the youth of America to continue fighting for the values they believed in. "Brother, brother," Gaye sang in the title track, "everybody thinks we're wrong,/but who are they to judge us,/simply'cause our hair is long."

What's Going On went to number one on the R&B album charts and number six on the pop charts. The title track went to number one on the R&B singles charts and number two on the pop singles charts. Another thematic song on the album, "Inner City Blues (Make Me Wanna Holler)," speaks critically on issues of social justice such as the ghettoization of African Americans. It, too, was a number one R&B single; it also was a number nine pop single. And "Mercy, Mercy Me (The Ecology)," about the lack of awareness of environmental issues, charted number one on the R&B singles charts and number four on the pop singles charts.

Gaye explained his connection to the counterculture thus: "They were smoking weed and dropping acid, and I went along with them. I loved the hippies. They were rebels, like me, and they did this country a world of good. They finally stopped a terribly unjust war. They looked at the status quo and called it bullshit and they were right."

Gaye's career was plagued by personal and financial challenges. By the mid-1970s, divorced and addicted to cocaine, he attempted suicide. He made a musical comeback in 1982 with the album Midnight Love, which includes the runaway hit single "Sexual Healing," and returned to stage performance the following year. After a further bout with depression, however, he moved in to his parents' house, where he reportedly had frequent arguments with his father. Marvin Gaye died on April 1, 1984, a day short of his forty-fifth birthday, of gunshot wounds at the hands of his father.

Stephen Gennaro

See also: Hippies.

Further Reading

Edmonds, Ben. What's Going On? Marvin Gaye and The Last Days of The Motown Sound. Edinburgh: MOJO, 2001.

Ritz, David. Divided Soul: The Life of Marvin Gaye. New York: Da Capo, 1991.

Turner, Steve. Trouble Man: The Life and Death of Marvin Gaye. New York: Ecco, 2000.

Whitburn, Joel. The Billboard Book of Top 40 Hits. 8th ed. New York: Billboard, 2004.

Generation Gap

The term generation gap refers to the differences in social and cultural values (opinions, moral principles, tastes and styles, standards of behavior, and political leanings) between generations, generally parents and children. The resulting conflicts contribute to the development of counterculture movements as one generation (usually the children, but occasionally the parents as well) seek to define themselves by exploiting the growing divide with another generation. Not without strong precedent, the term became prominent in the Western media during the social and cultural upheavals of the 1960s, when the values of postwar baby boomers came into stark conflict with those of their parents' generation (referred to as "the establishment").

The concept of a generation gap, if not the specific term, gained currency in America during the early twentieth century, as the social and political upheavals of World War I influenced the perspective of the generation that had come of age during the war. In the 1920s, for instance, the increasingly relaxed social mores of affluent young people contrasted sharply with those of their parents and grandparents. Young women cut their hair shorter, wore shorter skirts (often provoking confrontations with decency laws that regulated clothing length and style), and chose to smoke cigarettes, creating the image of the flapper who flouted traditional social and sexual standards for young women. The illicit production of liquor during the Prohibition years and the jazz clubs and speakeasies that flourished because of Prohibition also illustrated the changing cultural standards favored by the younger generation. These actions served as symbolic representations of a desire to rebel against the constricting fashions and values of previous generations and to create a new definition for their generation.

The jazz and illicit alcohol of the 1920s eventually gave way to a different generation gap in the 1940s and 1950s. The social mobility and opportunities afforded by World War II brought many adolescents out of the home and away from their parents for the first time, whether in the armed forces or on the home front. Several teen countercultures developed in the unsupervised atmosphere of World War II and the immediate postwar years, including swing dance clubs and motorcycle gangs, and adolescents scandalized adults with their increasingly liberal social and sexual behaviors. By the 1950s, new forms of intergenerational rebellion included “mods,” “rockers,” and the artist-influenced Beat Generation (or beatniks) with their drug counterculture. Moreover, the 1950s helped create and solidify the identity of the teenager as part of a counterculture devoted to furthering and expanding the generation gap.

The cultural shifts of the 1960s produced a more marked generation gap, between baby boomers—the generation that began with children born in the twenty years following World War II—and their parents. A combination of high-conflict social, political, and cultural factors helped to produce this divide, including the civil rights movement, the Vietnam War and the draft, the women’s rights movement, the growth of the hippie counterculture, and other, smaller counterculture movements. The teenagers of the 1960s rejected the materialism, conformity, and conservatism that they regarded as the hallmarks of their parents’ generation. Jerry Rubin’s famous phrase “Don’t trust anyone over thirty” was teenagers’ rallying cry, a declaration of the perceived divide between themselves and the older generation. Their parents, in contrast, denounced the younger generation as the product of overly lax parenting standards and the “long-haired” social and political radicalism that had influenced their children. Just as the social and cultural changes of the 1960s lasted well past the end of the decade, the repercussions of the 1960s generation gap did much to define the baby boom generation as one with a collective identity distinctly different from that of their parents.

The development of new computer and communication technologies from the 1980s through the end of the twentieth century and beyond has created a more recent generation gap. The children who grew up using computers have contributed to the creation of a new counterculture centered on the Internet and its social-networking sites, a realm that their less computer-savvy parents often have difficulty understanding. The new forms of social interaction, such as those provided by social-networking Web sites like MySpace.com and Facebook.com, have pushed the boundaries of parental supervision.

Nevertheless, as in previous generations, this new generation gap illustrates the younger generation’s attempt to create a new or revised definition of self separate from the standards and cultural values of their parents’ and grandparents’ generations. The repercussions of this new generation gap have yet to be fully recognized, but the counterculture movements it is likely to produce will play a defining role in the intergenerational relationships of the twenty-first century.

Shannon Granville

See also: Baby Boomers: Beat Generation: Flappers and Flapper Culture: Internet: Jazz: Prohibition.

Further Reading

Arber, Sara, ed. The Myth of Generational Conflict: The Family and State in Ageing Societies. London: Routledge, 2000.

Howe, Neil, and William Strauss. “The New Generation Gap.” The Atlantic Monthly, December 1992, 67–87.

Generation X

Although its precise demographic boundaries are debated, Generation X is typically used to identify the mainly American generation born between the early 1960s and the early 1980s. Members of Generation X, often shortened to Gen X, are typically children of the baby boomers, the generation born in the years following World War II. Generation X had a sweeping influence on American popular culture during the 1980s and 1990s. Iconic members of Generation X include rock musicians Kurt Cobain, Courtney Love, and Eddie Vedder, filmmaker Cameron Crowe, and writer and activist Janeane Garofalo.

The origins of the term Generation X are uncertain, but may date back to the 1960s. The term became prominent in popular culture and public consciousness after the 1991 publication of Douglas Coupland's novel Generation X: Tales for an Accelerated Culture. In the popular media stereotype, Gen Xers were upper-middle-class "slackers," overeducated and undermotivated, clad in flannel and with multiple body piercings, and generally discontent with the prospect of employment in corporate America. Not all Gen Xers fit the stereotype, but the culture and politics associated with the group were permeated by a sense of malaise and dissatisfaction with society at large.

Although Generation X has been characterized as apathetic and directionless, its discontent was not dissimilar to the feelings of other generations during their coming-of-age years. Indeed, Gen Xers have been compared to members of the Lost Generation of the 1920s, whose general disillusionment following World War I has been mythologized in the imagery of the flapper and speakeasy. Though different in tone and image, members of Generation X shared a sense of disillusionment and rebelliousness with the Lost Generation.

As in the cases of the Lost Generation, baby boomers, and other generations of the twentieth century, music played an important role in defining the character of Generation X, especially as perceived by the public. Grunge music, a hybrid of classic rock and roll, punk rock, and heavy metal, epitomized the angst of Generation X. Much of the grunge-music world was centered in Seattle, Washington, where artists such as Mother Love Bone, Soundgarden, Pearl Jam, Alice in Chains, Mudhoney, and Nirvana created distinctive sounds that moved away from the synthesized pop and glam rock of the 1980s. Around the nation, the Woodstock'94 rock concert in Saugerties, New York, and annual festivals such as Lollapalooza brought millions of Gen Xers together in the 1990s to celebrate their music, politics, and culture, fusing social classes, regions, and diverse musical tastes from grunge to hip-hop.

Kurt Cobain, the lead singer and songwriter of the band Nirvana, became the leading icon of the generation, albeit reluctantly, and he was mourned by Gen Xers following his death by suicide in 1994. Through his bleary, abstract lyrics, Cobain expressed the feelings of millions of young Americans contemplating confusion, anger, and a loss of purpose in an increasingly corporatized world. Lines from the hit song "Smells Like Teen Spirit" captured the essence of Generation X's feelings, as Cobain challenged authority and the older generations: "here we are now/entertain us." Cobain also made the prescient comment that Generation X was becoming an important demographic to both the corporate and political worlds, and deserved attention.

While Generation X consciously sought to rebel against the authority and legacies of the baby boomers, the generations shared many interests, including political activism, particular music, and a general awareness of social issues. In the 1992 presidential campaign, Democratic nominee Bill Clinton actively courted Gen X voters, while MTV (Music Television) pushed a large voter registration campaign focusing on young people throughout the 1990s. Woodstock'94 also tied Generation X to the baby boomers, with artists from the boomers' August 1969 Woodstock music festival, including Joe Cocker, the Band, Santana, and Crosby, Stills and Nash, sharing in the festivities. Like the activists of the 1960s, moreover, Generation Xers would become active in a variety of progressive campaigns, from environmentalism to antiglobalization criticism of the World Trade Organization and free trade.

Members of Generation X experienced vast changes in technology during their lifetime; they were, among other things, the first generation to utilize personal computers on a daily basis. Other technological innovations welcomed by Generation X included videocassette recorders (VCRs), handheld audio devices such as Sony's Walkman, and compact discs. Most Gen Xers embraced the new technology-centered culture, and a number created Internet start-up companies in the 1990s, driving an economic boom—and a stock market bubble that burst—in the late 1990s and early 2000s.

The influence of Generation X in popular culture began to dissipate in the late 1990s and early 2000s as Gen Xers graduated from college, entered the work-force, got married, and started families. Most members of Generation X have moved beyond the discontent of their youth and contribute to society through their work and community activism. Their children, Generation Y, the first to grow up with little or no knowledge of life before the personal computer and the Internet, are often called the New Silent Generation, and they face the impending challenges of an uncertain future.

Eric J. Morgan

See also: Baby Boomers; Generation Y; Grunge Rock; Internet; Lost Generation.

Further Reading

Coupland, Douglas. Generation X: Tales for an Accelerated Culture. New York: St. Martin's, 1991.

Cross, Charles R. Heavier Than Heaven: A Biography of Kurt Cobain. New York: Hyperion, 2001.

Holtz, Geoffrey T. Welcome to the Jungle: The Why Behind "Generation X." New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Nelson, Rob. Revolution X: A Survival Guide for Our Generation. New York: Penguin, 1994.

Ulrich, John M., and Andrea L. Harris, eds. GenXegesis: Essays on Alternative Youth (Sub) Culture. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2003.

Generation Y

Generation Y is the primarily American age cohort born from about 1981 until about 1994. (As with any generational demarcation, the specific span of years associated with Generation Y is a matter of some debate.) Generation Y is known by many names that reflect its members' historical placement, interests, attitudes, and lifestyles: Y Gen, Millennium Generation, New Silent Generation, Net Generation, Reagan Babies, Hip-Hop Generation, Echo Boomers, iGeneration, the Second Baby Boom, D.A.R.E. (Drug Abuse Resistance Education) Generation, Google Generation, MySpace Generation, MyPod Generation (a fusion of MySpace and iPod), Generation Next, Grand Theft Auto Generation, Nintendo Generation, Halo Generation, Boomerang Generation, Me Generation, and the Cynical Generation. As of 2008, the youngest members of Generation Y were about fourteen years old, the oldest nearing thirty.

Author Douglas Coupland is credited with coining the term Generation X in his 1991 novel Generation X: Tales for an Accelerated Culture and initiating the alphabetic designation of age groups. The term Generation Y first appeared in an August 1993 editorial in Advertising Age, the ad industry's major trade publication.

Whereas baby boomers had experienced the impact of the Vietnam War, the rise of rock music, and the threat of nuclear war, their first-born children— otherwise known as Generation X, or those Americans born between the early 1960s and the early 1980s— witnessed the rise of awareness of HIV/AIDS, the first Gulf War, personal computers, and corporate downsizing. Members of Generation Y, like their older Gen X siblings or Gen X parents (depending upon age demarcations), were raised in a mass-mediated world yet differentiated by a number of historical events and social trends—the spread of cell phones, the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and increasing awareness of the global environmental crisis. The oldest individuals of the Generation Y group were in high school during the 1999 Columbine High School massacre in Colorado and similar incidents elsewhere.

As a market force of more than 70 million, Generation Y rivals the baby boomers and represents significant economic clout. Depending on when they were born and family dynamics, Generation Ys may be closer to their parents than their older brothers and sisters, who as teenagers were busy rebelling. The Net Gens are most numerous in North America, but the group also is recognizable in Pacific Rim countries and in Europe, places where consumerism and mass production are high priorities.

Generally, this is an educated, privileged, confident, globally oriented group. The counterculture of this group is often pejoratively associated with a drive to shop and to spend inordinate amounts of money, much of it charged on credit cards marketed to them since grade school. A fickle group, it has forced manufacturers and retailers to rethink not only the products they make but also how they sell them. The spending power of this group exceeds $275 billion annually. Coolness, ironic humor, and indirect selling are key advertising appeals.

Gen Ys stand apart from members of previous generations in several important ways. For one, Echo Boomers are racially and ethnically more diverse: one in three are not white. Also, one in four live in single-parent households. Most are immersed in technology and multiple media as early as preschool. Yet, they are savvy consumers, fickle, and less impressed with celebrities. This cohort has rejected many of the traditional high-end brands embraced by their parents and older siblings. The fashion cycle spins at an unprecedented rate, with the Internet driving their dollars. Unlike their baggy-pants-clad siblings dressed for skate-and surfboarding, Gen Ys wear clothes that fit and shoes unsuited for board sports, such as massive Steve Madden platforms. No longer are the brands of choice Nike, Gap, and Converse. Instead, Mudd, Paris Blues, In Vitro, and Cement are the must-haves of this generation. With numbers large enough to break a brand, a preference shift on the part of Gen Y could be disastrous for a company. They are suspicious of advertising and not impressed with celebrity endorsers. The soft drink Sprite found this out with its successful celebrity-spoofing ad campaign, which sported the tagline "Image is nothing. Obey your thirst." Other favorite brands include Apple and its iPod and iPhone, Vans, American Eagle Outfitters, Axe, Baby Phat, YouTube, Facebook, Google, Hollister, MTV (Music Television), MySpace, and Second Life.

As the first members of this cohort move up the job ladder, they do not carry the slacker label of Gen X, but their style is casual. They are often seen in flip-flops with iPods firmly attached to their heads. And, having seen many workaholic parents, this generation does not want to be defined by work but wants work to be a fulfilling experience.

Gen Ys are a "question-authority" group that is not afraid to challenge the status quo. While Gen X rebelled against materialism, paternalism, and authority, Gen Ys are into activism, as evidenced by their involvement in the Battle of Seattle of 1999 (against World Trade Organization policies) and demonstrations for animal rights. Comedy Central's satirical Daily Show is a primary political news source for them.

These media multitaskers are pure digital age. The MyPod Generation have spent their entire lives surrounded by technology, fully immersed in a digital, Internet-driven world. They are accustomed to everything happening fast— information, travel, and satisfaction of desires. Thus, learning, shopping, creating, and even working routinely take place digitally. Easily bored, many members of the Boomerang Generation move back home with their parents for a period of time after college. They grew up protected—some say spoiled—having lived during some of the best economic times in U.S. history. Their opinions flow freely, as they expect to be allowed to say and ask about anything they like. This suggests not only a high level of confidence but also creativity in terms of expressing opinions about ideas, change, and progress.

Their ambition is to make money and do so right away. Whereas the heroes of Generation X were rebels such as Kurt Cobain, members of this generation look up to successful, young businesspeople, especially the ones who got rich fast in technology fields, and go for the glamour of the gender-bending metrosexual.

Generation Y also has been witness to the HIV/AIDS global epidemic. They are aware of the health risks associated with unprotected sex. Yet, they have a relatively casual attitude toward sex and relationships, as indicated by their expression “friends with benefits.” Gen Y has redefined intimacy in seeing oral sex as less emotionally significant than do older cohorts. In a 2002 study, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found that more than half of Americans age fifteen to nineteen had experienced oral sex. In a world that struggles against the AIDS epidemic, some feel this is a safe alternative to other sexual activity. Others worry about this generation’s future ability to feel emotional closeness and commitment to long-term relationships. Whereas Gen Xers explored gender identity and bisexuality, Gen Ys are more inclusive of interracial and interethnic relationships.

As the Millennium Generation moves forward in the twenty-first century, the question remains whether this largest teen generation in history will remain mired in marketing. Or, will they rise up with strength and resolve to confront global social and economic issues following their initiation into adulthood, marked for many of them by the terrorist attacks on the United States of September 11, 2001.

Debra Merskin

See also: Anti-Globalization Movement; Baby Boomers; Generation X; Hip-Hop; Internet.

Further Reading

Howe, Neil, and William Strauss. Millennials Rising: The Next Great Generation. New York: Random House, 2000.

Martin, Carolyn A. Managing Generation Y: Global Citizens Born in the Late Seventies and Early Eighties. Amherst, MA: HRD, 2001.

Tapscott, Don. Growing Up Digital: The Rise of the Net Generation. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1999.

Twenge, Jean M. Generation Me: Why Today’s Young Americans Are More Confident, Assertive, Entitled—and More Miserable Than Ever Before. New York: Free Press, 2006.

Ghost Dance

The Ghost Dance consisted of a religious movement and associated rituals that originated among Native Americans of the Far West in the 1870s and became prominent among Plains Indians in the 1880s and 1890s. Expressed in divergent teachings and activities among the various native peoples and tribes who took part, the Ghost Dance expressed a common yearning for a return to the peace, health, and natural abundance that had prevailed before the arrival of European settlers. Participants believed in the imminent return of dead relatives, the buffalo, and their native lands and resources.

As symbolized by the circle dance for which it was named, the Ghost Dance movement was an expression of cultural unity, spiritual wholeness, and collective defense against racism and oppression at the hands of whites. Adherents believed that if they performed the ceremony fully and completely, the settlers would leave. At its height, approximately thirty-five tribes with a combined population of 60,000 participated in the movement.

The Ghost Dance was a religious movement among Western and Plains Indians in the late nineteenth century. It expressed a fervent longing for the return of the dead, of native lands, and of tribal life before white subjugation. (Library of Congress)

The Ghost Dance reached its peak in the late 1880s, under the leadership and according to the teachings of a Walker River (Nevada) Paiute prophet called Wovoka. Referred to by whites as Jack Wilson (the name given by his adoptive, white father), Wovoka was trained as a shaman, and he had a vision during a solar eclipse on New Year's Day, 1889. Upon recovering from this experience, Wovoka declared that he had received a message from God and began to teach divine lessons for renewing the native world.

Calling for nonviolence, prayer, chanting, and dance, Wovoka's revelation promised that the dead would return to life, that the earth would be regenerated with all its resources, and that Native Americans would be free of disease and suffering. If the ceremonies were performed properly, European Americans and all of their influences would disappear from Indian lands.

An earlier but less commonly known Ghost Dance movement began during the early 1870s and was adopted by the native peoples of the Great Basin and California regions. Both movements originated among the Paiute people of Nevada, spread to other Native American nations, and required participants to cleanse and purify themselves in ceremonies that included long periods of prayer, song, and dance.

The California practitioners of the Ghost Dance were especially concerned with the hundreds of thousands of new American settlers, prospectors, and vigilantes who, spurred by the Gold Rush, poured into and raided their territories from the 1840s to the 1860s. Numerous California tribes—including the Karok, Patwin, and Wintu in the northern portion of the state; the Maidu, Miwok, and Pomo in the central region; and the Yokuts of the Central Valley and foothills areas—recognized that white settlers regarded them as nothing more than obstacles to the “development” of their land. By the early 1870s, many native peoples in the region readily embraced the Ghost Dance. By the end of that decade, when the movement had proven ineffective, a number of the tribes gave up the Ghost Dance for the Earth Lodge, Bole-Maru, or Big Head religions, some of which endure into the twenty-first century.

The gold rushes of the late 1800s and the waves of migration to the West Coast began a process in the Great Plains similar to what had occurred in California and the Great Basin in previous decades. By the 1880s, the United States was implementing a national policy of cultural transformation for all Native Americans, while completing its military conquest of the last tribal resisters. Children were being sent away to Indian boarding schools for education and cultural training according to white European norms. During this time, traditional cultural practices, such as dances and healing ceremonies, were outlawed. Native Americans not residing on reservations were considered renegades, hunted down, and relocated to reservation land at gunpoint by the U.S. military.

The Ghost Dance movement of the 1880s, even more so than its predecessor in the Far West, reflected an active sharing of cultural practices among native peoples as a means of collective resistance to white oppression. The promises of the dance inspired traditional enemies—the Utes, Cheyenne, and Shawnee, for example—to join together. The Ghost Dance thus was an expression of unity among Plains tribes and a rejection of European assumptions that the native peoples were destined to be defeated, that such a defeat would be a function of their cultural and racial inferiority, and that their religious and cultural practices were somehow barbaric.

The Ghost Dance was especially attractive to the Lakota Sioux, many of whom refused to concede victory and despised the imposed reservation lifestyle. Taking up the rituals of the Ghost Dance, however, represented blatant resistance to the religious and cultural restrictions imposed by federal authorities. More importantly, the movement raised fears among many American settlers and military leaders that it would spark an uprising.

When the Lakota began making and wearing “Ghost Shirts,” which they believed protected them from the white man’s bullets, white settlers in the area panicked. Federal authorities quickly dispatched troops to capture Lakota leaders. This action resulted in the death of Chief Sitting Bull during his attempted arrest in December 1890.

Two weeks later, U.S. cavalry rounded up dispersed members of the Lakota tribe, brought them to an encampment at Wounded Knee Creek in South Dakota, and ended up killing nearly 200 men, women, and children in what a U.S. general later acknowledged was a “massacre.” More than 100 other Lakota fled the scene and died of exposure. The Wounded Knee Massacre marked the end of widespread practice of the Ghost Dance.

Natchee Blu Barnd

See also: Native Americans.

Further Reading

Kehoe, Alice Beck. The Ghost Dance: Ethnohistory and Revitalization. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1989.

Mooney, James. The Ghost Dance Religion and the Sioux Outbreak of 1890. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1991.

Smook, Gregory. Ghost Dances and Identity: Prophetic Religion and American Indian Ethnogenesis in the Nineteenth Century. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.

Ginsberg, Allen (1926–1997)

The Beat poet Allen Ginsberg, whose groundbreaking long poem Howl (1956) blamed materialist mainstream culture for destroying “the best minds of my generation,” emerged with that work as major voice of the American literary and social counterculture of the 1950s and 1960s—indeed as the leader of a vital new direction in American verse. Called the most recognized American poet of the twentieth century, he was a seminal figure in the postwar San Francisco Renaissance and, with his raw, nonconformist style and subject matter, a seminal figure of the Beat Generation of writers. His rage against mainstream American conformism, embrace of drug use and a “new consciousness,” and direct involvement in the anti–Vietnam War movement also made him a central figure in the 1960s hippie counterculture.

Poetic rage against the materialism and conformity of postwar America established Allen Ginsberg as a key figure in the Beat Generation. His embrace of drugs, a “new consciousness,” and antiwar politics also put him at the center of the 1960s counterculture. (Jim Johnson/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Irwin Allen Ginsberg was born on June 3, 1926, in Newark, New Jersey, to Louis and Naomi Ginsberg. He grew up in nearby Paterson with his brother, Eugene. His father was a schoolteacher and an accomplished poet whose works appeared in such publications as The New York Times Magazine. His mother suffered from mental illness and epileptic seizures. Ginsberg’s parents were of Russian Jewish ancestry with ties to the Communist Party USA. He often wrote of his mother’s mental plight in verse, including in the long autobiographical poem “Kaddish for Naomi Ginsberg” (1961). Institutionalized and lobotomized, Naomi died in an asylum in 1956.

Ginsberg began to read poetry seriously while in high school and would later claim as major influences William Blake, Walt Whitman, Ezra Pound, T.S. Eliot, and his mentor, William Carlos Williams. After graduating from high school, Ginsberg briefly entered Montclair State College in New Jersey, then Columbia University in New York on a scholarship.

It was in 1943 at Columbia that Ginsberg met fellow undergraduate Lucien Carr, with whom he fell “madly in love.”

Carr introduced Ginsberg to fellow writers Jack Kerouac, William S. Burroughs, and John Clellon Holmes; all of them would become key figures in the Beat movement. Ginsberg developed his writing skills as a contributor to the literary magazine Columbia Review and the humor magazine Jester.

In 1944, after Carr was sentenced to prison for the stabbing death of an acquaintance, Ginsberg underwent psychiatric counseling and was suspended from Columbia for one year. In 1948, while still an undergraduate, he had what he called his “Blake vision”—an auditory hallucination of the poet William Blake reading his work—which he later regarded as a pivotal moment in his life, a revelation of truth and the universe.

After graduating from Columbia in 1949 with a bachelor's degree in English, Ginsberg worked briefly for Newsweek magazine as a market-research consultant in New York and San Francisco. In San Francisco, he found a room near Lawrence Ferlinghetti's bookstore City Lights. On October 7, 1955, at the Six Gallery poetry reading, Ginsberg gave the first public reading of Howl. That event came to be celebrated as the birth of the Beat movement. According to poet Michael McClure, who was in attendance that night, the recitation “left us standing in wonder, or cheering and wondering, but knowing at the deepest level that a barrier had been broken, that a human voice and body had been hurled against the harsh wall of America.”

Upon the death of his mother the following year, Ginsberg embarked on a series of travels around the world, to such places as India, Cuba, and Czechoslovakia. He traveled with Peter Orlovsky, whom he had met in San Francisco and who became his lifelong partner. Ginsberg wrote prolifically and lectured extensively during the course of his travels, producing such works as Kaddish and Other Poems (1961), Reality Sandwiches (1963), and Planet News (1968). In 1972, he won the National Book Award for The Fall of America.

Ginsberg was also actively involved in the antiwar movement, dedicated to the promotion of Buddhism in America, an ardent supporter of ecological issues, and a champion of gay rights. He continued to publish poems throughout his career and to live a robust life of activism against conservative government policies; he spoke openly of his affinity for leftist political ideology and drug use.

He taught for many years at Brooklyn College in New York and was honored with a Guggenheim Fellowship and grants from the National Endowment for the Arts. In 1993, he was named Chevalier dans l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres (Knight of the Order of Arts and Letters) by the French minister of culture. Ginsberg died on April 5, 1997, of liver cancer.

Hettie V. Williams

See also: Beat Generation; Burroughs, William S.; City Lights Books; Ferlinghetti, Lawrence; Kerouac, Jack.

Further Reading

Miles, Barry. Ginsberg: A Biography. London: Virgin Books, 2001.

Morgan, Bill. I Celebrate Myself: The Somewhat Private Life of Allen Ginsberg. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Raskin, Jonah. American Scream: Allen Ginsberg's Howl and the Making of the Beat Generation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.

Schumacher, Michael. Dharma Lion: A Biography of Allen Ginsberg. New York: St. Martin's, 1994.

Glam rock (short for “glamour” rock), or glitter rock, was one of several musical genres that thrived in the 1970s in the United States and the United Kingdom and other areas of Western Europe. Glam is generally recognized as a British phenomenon, although North America clearly made an important, and often overlooked, contribution. While a highly commercial phenomenon in England—where it played itself out in the cultural imagination of the taste-making television show Top of the Pops—glam was more of a subcultural phenomenon in the United States, where, as a predominantly white experience, it took second stage to its equally showy African American counterpart, funk.

Glam’s peak period in both the United Kingdom and the United States began about 1970 and gave way to disco and punk around 1976. The genre was self-consciously spectacular and characterized by a more or less satirical performance of “rock stardom,” or what the cultural theorist Dick Hebdige calls “albino camp”—in which exaggerated clothing, objectification of sexual conquests and prowess, carnivalesque stage performances, blatant foregrounding of gender transgression, and larger-than-life lyrics were primary indicators. Self-display was a going concern for glam performers, who embraced pomp and performed in glittery ensembles, exaggerated tailoring and hairstyles, excessive makeup, boas, sequins, and styles inflected with fetish overtones—from Gary Glitter’s outsized “greaser” hairdo and gold lamé jackets to KISS’s comic-book superhero appeal and Alice Cooper’s ghoulish, B-horror-movie persona.

In addition to Cooper and KISS, American performers working in the glam idiom included the puckish Iggy Pop, the sinister Lou Reed, proto-rocker-chick Suzie Quatro, the ill-starred prodigy Jobriath, the campy and barely-in-the-closet Queen, and the cross-dressing New York Dolls. Even the apple-pie, Mormon family band the Osmonds put out a glam-inspired album in 1972, the surprisingly meaty Crazy Horses. Among the most tenacious relics of the phenomenon is David Bowie’s character, Ziggy Stardust, from the quintessential glam album The Rise and Fall of Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars (1972).

The cult film Rocky Horror Picture Show, released in the United States in 1975, ties together the most glaring glam themes of sexual libertinism, camp, self-transformation, trashy cultural references, megalomania, space aliens, and intergalactic travel. Most poignantly, it foregrounds issues of gender and sexuality, glam preoccupations, in the character of the lead transvestite, Dr. Frank-N-Furter. Bowie, who was popular in the United States, and the New York Dolls, who frequently hopped gender fences in stage costuming, were pioneers in putting issues of nonnormative sexuality and gender performance into popular music.

While glam rock remains one of the least documented musical styles in the United States, it was highly influential on later North American and other Western regional styles, particularly disco, punk, goth, and, most notably, heavy metal of the 1980s and early 1990s, which clearly inherited the hubris, kitsch, and gender blurring of the earlier style. A revival of sorts arose in the twenty-first century, with the retro-glam sensibility of performers such as Marilyn Manson, Suede, and the Canadian band Robin Black and the Intergalactic Rock Stars.

A number of other films referencing glam also have helped capture the essence of the period, including Todd Haynes’s Velvet Goldmine (1998) and John Cameron Mitchell’s instant cult classic Hedwig and the Angry Inch (2001), which documents the rise and fall of a transgendered glam-punk rock star.

Julia Pine

See also: Bowie, David; Pop, Iggy; Reed, Lou; Rocky Horror Picture Show, The.

Further Reading

Hebdige, Dick. Subculture: The Meaning of Style. 1979. New York: Routledge, 1987.

Hoskyns, Barney. Glam: Bowie, Bolan and the Glitter Rock Revolution. New York: Pocket Books, 1998.

Rock, Mick, and David Bowie. Blood and Glitter. London: Vision On, 2002.

Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)

As perhaps the most notorious anarchist in American history, Emma Goldman influenced and alarmed a wide array of late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century Americans, ranging from Leon Czolgosz, who assassinated President William McKinley in 1901, to members of the federal government who feared the presence of her ideas enough to press for her deportation.

Although Goldman sympathized with the actions of Czolgosz and Alexander Berkman, who attempted to assassinate Henry Clay Frick, a management leader in the Homestead, Pennsylvania, steel strike of 1892, her brand of anarchism did not advocate violence. Rather, drawing on the teachings of the Russian revolutionist Pyotr Kropotkin, Goldman championed a paradigm of voluntary cooperation between individuals outside the authority of centralized forces such as the state and church. Goldman believed that these forces controlled naturally free individuals through economic exploitation and popular notions of morality that promoted unequal gender roles and materialism. In published writings and public speeches, Goldman dismissed the efficacy of traditional political avenues such as voting in achieving social change, tied centralization to the oppression of women, and promoted free love and birth control. Her controversial ideas and fiery rhetoric drew many followers, but more often captured the fearful attention of mainstream Americans and government officials.

Despite her inflammatory speeches and writings, anarchist Emma Goldman repudiated violence. Advocating peaceful cooperation among individuals under a communist system, she was deported by the U.S. government in 1919. (Library of Congress)

Born in Kovno, Lithuania, on June 27, 1869, Goldman immigrated to Rochester, New York, in 1886. She soon moved to New York City and, while working in clothing factories there, began to participate in local anarchist circles and forged an intimate friendship with Berkman, an anarchist, who was shortly thereafter sentenced to twenty-two years in prison for attempting to assassinate Frick.

Goldman, too, maintained an adversarial relationship with authorities during these years. In 1893, for example, she was arrested on charges of inciting a riot for criticizing the government in her speeches and served one year in prison. Following her release from prison, she embarked on a lecture tour across Europe. She returned to Europe in 1899 to study medicine, but anarchism continued to captivate her interest and monopolize her time. Cognizant of her inability to focus on medicine, benefactors withdrew their financial support and Goldman resumed her life as an American anarchist activist.

Upon her return to the United States in 1906, Goldman focused her efforts on producing and maintaining the periodical Mother Earth, which provided anarchists with a medium of public activism. But supporting Mother Earth while championing the causes of anarchism and birth control proved to be an arduous endeavor. Lecturing virtually nonstop, she had little time for rest. Forced to work within the American capitalist system, Goldman raised funds by charging attendance fees for the lectures she delivered throughout the country and by convincing comrades to provide both financial support and manpower. These actions, as well as dealing with frequent criticism from fellow anarchists for focusing on middle-class audiences, made Goldman frequently exhausted.

Although she was unpopular with law enforcement authorities and most of American society, Goldman brought the radical community unparalleled success in attracting followers. Rapid industrialization had forever changed the makeup of American life, and many sought radical solutions in the battle to combat its negative effects, such as growing socioeconomic inequality. Socialist Eugene V. Debs received nearly 1 million votes for president in 1912, and the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), a nationwide syndicalist labor union, led a number of strikes among chiefly “unskilled” workers that drew national attention. Working from this backdrop, Goldman garnered support from many individuals seeking radical change.

The entry of the United States into World War I, however, led to a more inauspicious situation for radicals. Congress passed the Espionage Act in 1917, which regulated wartime dissent, and many Americans adopted a brand of patriotism that has been characterized as super-patriotic hysteria. In Thetford Township, Michigan, for instance, local residents tarred and feathered a man for purchasing only $1,500 worth of Liberty Bonds, instead of the $3,000 worth expected of a man of his wealth.

While Goldman was not tarred and feathered, she did suffer as a result of patriotic sentiment and federal law. After she denounced America’s entry into the war, branding it an imperialist conflict, the federal government charged her and Berkman with attempting to obstruct the draft and subvert the war effort. Upon conviction, both served two years in prison and were ordered to pay a $10,000 fine.

Imprisonment was a relatively familiar predicament for the two radicals. Berkman had served fourteen years in prison for his assassination attempt on Frick. Goldman had been incarcerated in 1916 for allegedly disseminating birth control information—a violation of the Comstock Law, which declared it illegal to spread “obscene” material.

In 1919, after serving her two-year term, Goldman was deported by federal authorities to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, where the Bolshevik Revolution had installed a communist regime. While at first she showed enthusiasm for the new Soviet government, Goldman later voiced criticism of Bolshevik repression, and she left for Great Britain in 1921.

During the following years, Goldman directed a propaganda campaign to combat fascism in the Spanish Civil War, lectured in Canada, and, in 1934, was permitted to reenter the United States on a speaking tour under the stipulation that she would refrain from discussing political topics.

The America to which she returned was largely devoid of the anarchist fervor she had helped to engender during the first two decades of the twentieth century.

Emma Goldman died in Toronto, Canada, on May 14, 1940. Federal authorities allowed her body to be returned to the United States for burial.

Mark Robbins

See also: Anarchism; Berkman, Alexander; Industrial Workers of the World.

Further Reading

Anderson, Carlotta R. All-American Anarchist: Joseph A. Labadie and the Labor Movement. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1998.

Chalberg, John. Emma Goldman: American Individualist. New York: HarperCollins, 1991.

Drinnon, Richard. Rebel in Paradise: A Biography of Emma Goldman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

Goldman, Emma. Living My Life. Garden City, NY: Garden City, 1936.

Goldman, Emma. Red Emma Speaks: Selected Writings and Speeches. Ed. Alix Kates Shulman. New York: Random House, 1972.

Morton, Marian J. Emma Goldman and the American Left: "Nowhere at Home." New York: Twayne, 1992.

Wexler, Alice. Emma Goldman in America. Boston: Beacon, 1984.

Gonzales, Rodolfo "Corky" (1928–2005)

The charismatic political activist and poet Rodolfo "Corky" Gonzales was a founder and leader of the Chicano Movement of the 1960s and 1970s. He was active in the Mexican community of his native Denver in the period leading up to that social and cultural awakening, and his efforts on behalf of the sociopolitical organizations Crusade for Justice (CFJ) and La Raza Unida Party helped spread the movement nationwide.

Gonzales was born in Denver on June 18, 1928. In his twenties and early thirties he was a champion boxer from the barrio, a bar owner, and a bail bondsman. He passionately embraced the new wave of activism he saw in the younger generation of Mexican Americans as they began to call themselves "Chicanos."

At first actively involved in the Democratic Party—he helped run the Viva Kennedy campaign for presidential contender John F. Kennedy in 1960—Gonzalez became increasingly disillusioned with the party, as he observed little change taking place in America under its stewardship. In 1965, therefore, he founded the CFJ, which focused on transforming Chicano life in Denver by starting schools, organizing Chicano-friendly community activities, and encouraging Chicanos to become actively involved in their neighborhoods. It was his first step toward a national Chicano political agenda independent of the two dominant parties.

As a leader devoted to the plight of Mexican Americans, Gonzales recognized the inherent divisions within his community. In 1967, he wrote “I Am Joaquin” (Yo Soy Joaquin), an epic poem of Chicano history and experience in the United States. The poem spoke to Chicanos of their “conflicted” psyches—neither wholly Mexican, because of a history of conquest through land grants and treaties, nor truly American, because of a history of oppression on U.S. soil. While it was composed almost entirely in English, the poem incorporates historical allusions, Spanish terms, and indigenous words and phrases to evoke the fragmented history of la raza. (La raza, which literally means “the race” or “the people,” also signifies the common ancestry and traditions of the Chicano community.)

Mexican Americans identified with the poem on many levels, including the question of what to call themselves: Mejjicano, Latino, or Chicano, for example. During its circulation in English, Spanish, and multilingual versions, “I Am Joaquin” inspired Chicanos and other immigrants to explore how language shapes identity and paved the way for future countercultural alliances. Cultural historians have credited Gonzalez with defining what it means to be Chicano in full historical and cultural context.

In the years after composing “I Am Joaquin,” Gonzales worked to mobilize Chicanos politically. In March 1969, he organized the Chicano Youth Liberation Conference, the first large-scale gathering of Chicano youth. More than 1,000 Chicanos convened in Denver in an attempt to outline their common social and political objectives, with cultural identity being central to their mission. Meetings featured poetry, song, dance, theater, and other expressions of Chicano identity and culture. In discussions, Chicanos argued that assimilation into Anglo culture was counter to preserving and defending their Aztec and Mexican heritage, and they claimed an identity rooted in their native land of Aztlán—territory that Mexico surrendered to the United States in 1848. The conference caught the attention of the national media and of the federal government, which monitored the activists of the Chicano Movement through the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

Gonzales and other leaders believed that Chicanos needed their own political party to directly represent their interests, since neither the Democrats nor the Republicans had leaders who adequately represented their community. To this end, La Raza Unida Party was founded in Crystal City, Texas, in 1969; it spread quickly. Along with the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF), La Raza Unida fought to challenge local policies and prejudices that kept Mexican Americans from voting. A key victory in Bexar County, Texas, in 1972, provided the spark and precedent they had been seeking to realize change on a larger scale. The numbers of registered voters of Mexican American heritage increased significantly in the years that followed.

Internal disagreements among constituents and leadership, as well as increasing pressure from the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and FBI, affected the trajectory of Gonzales’s political projects. By 1972, CFJ was a prime target of the FBI, and clashes with the police became routine. By 1974, La Raza Unida Party had almost completely dissolved, and by the 1980s CFJ was declining in influence. As central political organizations of the Chicano Movement, however, both left their marks. Mexican Americans had achieved representation at all levels of government, had successfully challenged long-standing racial prejudices and practices, and had made their heritage a matter of pride rather than shame.

Much of this success was credited to Corky Gonzalez. He died of liver and heart disease on April 12, 2005, in Denver.

Jean Anne Lauer

See also: Chicano Movement; Democratic Party; Latino and Latina Culture.

Further Reading

Garcia, Richard A., ed. The Chicanos in America 1540–1974: A Chronology and Fact Book. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana, 1977.

Gonzales, Rodolfo. Message to Aztlán: Selected Writings of Rodolfo “Corky” Gonzales. Houston: Arte Público, 2001.

Muñoz, Carlos, Jr. Youth, Identity, Power: The Chicano Movement. New York: Verso, 1989.

Stavans, Ilan. The Hispanic Condition: Reflections on Culture and Identity in America. New York: HarperPerennial, 1996.

Gonzo Journalism

Gonzo journalism is the self-described rhetorical style employed by author Hunter S. Thompson in such writings as Hell's Angels (1966), Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas (1971), and Fear and Loathing: On the Campaign Trail (1973), among other writings. According to Thompson, gonzo journalism is written in the moment, describes the instantaneous effect of an event in a literary photograph of impressions and images, and is relayed directly to the reader with no revision. Gonzo journalism is reminiscent in tone and philosophy of Jack Kerouac's literary style, called "spontaneous prose." Thompson's style evolved, however, to encompass a literary journalism that blends elements of fact with fantasy in an often-illuminating mixture. The loose interplay of fact and fiction in gonzo journalism actively works to debunk the objectivity stressed in more traditional journalistic forms, exposing the relativity of perception and experience.

Although pioneering in his efforts, Thompson was not alone in his endeavor to subvert dominant journalistic paradigms with fiction and subjectivity. He was working within a genre of journalism that emerged in the mid-1960s with the works of writers such as Tom Wolfe (The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test, 1968), Truman Capote (In Cold Blood, 1966), Gay Talese (The Kingdom and the Power, 1969), and Norman Mailer (Armies of the Night, 1968). These nonfiction novels, representative of the so-called New Journalism or literary journalism, typically go beyond the scope of traditional reporting by giving the story an arc and narrative.

One of the primary differences between Thompson's gonzo journalism and other forms of New Journalism is that the former focuses reflexively on the narrator as much as it does on its ostensible subject. In his writings over the years, Thompson created a literary alter ego in the person of Raoul Duke, a drug-crazed self-described "Doctor of Journalism." Although Duke generally is an absurd reflection of Thompson, at times the distinction between the author and the protagonist disappears entirely.

Thompson's public image gave him the freedom to expand fancifully on the events that he reported on, highlighting his own participation as a critical component of the story. The cultural impact of Thompson's style was such that the term gonzo quickly made its way into the cultural lexicon, even appearing in the Oxford English Dictionary (OED).

Both gonzo journalism and Thompson have been immortalized in the films Where the Buffalo Roam (1980) and Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas (1998). Gonzo journalism itself is frequently referenced in pop culture—examples include the Uncle Duke character in Garry Trudeau's widely syndicated comic strip, Doonesbury, and actor Scott Bakula's role as gonzo journalist Peter Hunt on the television series Murphy Brown (1988–1998).

According to the OED, the term originated in Thompson's articles "The Kentucky Derby Is Decadent and Depraved" (Scanlan's Monthly, June 1970) and "Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas" (Rolling Stone, November 1971). Although the etymology of gonzo is unknown, its use in this context is credited to Bill Cardoso, then editor of the Boston Globe, who read the piece in Scanlan's Monthly and, reportedly, sent Thompson a letter complimenting his style, calling it "totally gonzo." Over the years, the word has evolved to imply wildness, looseness with fact and fiction, and biting satire.

Thompson's loose attitude toward fact and fiction has left critics, scholars, and librarians alike in a quandary about how to classify his work. Despite these difficulties, Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas stands as the high point of gonzo journalism, marking Thompson as an important figure in the search for American identity and elevating gonzo journalism to a legitimate literary style—eventually inspiring other journalists, who work in the genre today. Among those cited as latter-day practitioners are Rolling Stone columnist Matt Taibbi, political and boxing writer Tom “Bunky” Luffman, and political commentator Alan Cabal.

Jeffrey Sartain

See also: Doonesbury: Hells Angels: Kerouac, Jack: Merry Pranksters.

Further Reading

Hellmann, John. Fables of Fact: The New Journalism as New Fiction. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

McKeen, William. Hunter S. Thompson. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Thompson, Hunter. Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas: A Savage Journey to the Heart of the American Dream. New York: Random House, 1971.

Thompson, Hunter. Fear and Loathing: On the Campaign Trail '72. San Francisco: Straight Arrow, 1973.

Thompson, Hunter. Kingdom of Fear: Loathsome Secrets of a Star-Crossed Child in the Final Days of the American Century. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2003.

Whitmer, Peter O. When the Going Gets Weird: The Twisted Life and Times of Hunter S. Thompson: A Very Unauthorized Biography. New York: Hyperion, 1993.

Gorton, Samuel (ca. 1592–1677)

Samuel Gorton was a New England heretic and colonist and the founder of the Gortonites, whose eccentric religious views led him to found his own settlement in Rhode Island in 1632.

Born in Gorton, Lancashire, in about 1592, Samuel Gorton had abandoned belief in a literal hell and heaven by the age of thirty and adopted a belief in universal redemption. He rejected the established clergy, believing that each man should be his own priest.

Gorton arrived in Massachusetts in 1637, but he found Boston—then at the height of the Antinomian Controversy that banished independent religious thinker Anne Hutchinson—uncongenial. He moved to Plymouth, where the private religious meetings he held attracted suspicion from the authorities. Expelled from Plymouth in 1638, Gorton and his wife, Mary, went to Aquidneck Island in Narragansett Bay, where, after a political dispute with the community's ruler, William Coddington, Gorton again found himself banished, this time after a public flogging.

From Aquidneck, Gorton and his family made their way to the refuge of New England heretics, Roger Williams's colony of Providence. Gorton agreed with Williams's rejection of religious coercion, although Williams was gravely suspicious of Gorton's theology. In Providence, Gorton attracted so many followers that there seemed a danger of dividing the colony between Williams's disciples and Gorton's. Some of the former, themselves refugees from the ministers and magistrates of Massachusetts, invoked the aid of the Bostonians against Gorton.

In 1643, Gorton and his disciples settled in Shawomet, outside the Massachusetts jurisdiction, on land they claimed to have purchased from local Narragansett Indians. Tribal leaders who disagreed with the sale appealed to authorities in Boston, who sent soldiers to seize Gorton and his followers.

Brought back to Boston, Gorton and the Gortonists were tried and condemned by the General Court of Massachusetts, and they narrowly avoided the death penalty. Gorton openly attacked the ministerial oligarchy of the Massachusetts Bay Colony as gilded hypocrites whose religious profession covered greed and arrogance.

Thereafter, Gorton and his disciples were scattered to different towns in Massachusetts, where they attracted sympathy from some residents. Eventually, the Massachusetts authorities expelled Gorton and his followers from the colony entirely.

After a short stay in Rhode Island, Gorton made his way through New York to England in 1645. There, he published Simplicities Defence against Seven-Headed Policy (1646), an attack on the Massachusetts authorities, and An Incorruptible Key Composed of the CX Psalme (1647). Despite the opposition of Massachusetts envoy Edward Winslow, Gorton secured the approval of the Earl of Warwick's governmental Committee on Foreign Plantations for the inclusion of Shawomet (renamed Warwick) in Rhode Island. He returned to Rhode Island in 1648, becoming one of the leaders of the colony and serving as its president in 1651.

Gorton published two more books, both in London: Saltmarsh Returned from the Dead (1655) and An Antidote Against the Common Plague of the World (1657). He also offered sanctuary to Quaker missionaries, although he disagreed with their doctrine. He died in Warwick in late 1677.

William E. Burns

See also: Antinomianism; Hutchinson, Anne.

Further Reading

Staloff, Darren. The Making of an American Thinking Class: Intellectuals and Intelligentsia in Puritan Massachusetts. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Wall, Robert Emmet. Massachusetts Bay: The Crucial Decade 1640–1650. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1972.

Goth Culture

Originally a part of the punk movement, goth culture developed a distinctive character by the late 1970s. The term gothic was originally applied in a disparaging sense to a number of bands in the post-punk music scene, particularly Bauhaus, the Sisters of Mercy, the Fields of the Nephilim, and the Mission, that were heavily influenced by Edgar Allan Poe and other horror writing. At first applied to individual bands, the term came to be applied to an entire musical movement. Meanwhile, it began to be used by band members themselves in a defiantly positive sense.

The goth movement developed a distinctive fashion style as well, strong on contrasts of black and white with silver highlights for jewelry and often incorporating religious symbols such as crosses. Many members of the goth movement favored ruffles and lace in styles hearkening back to the eighteenth century. White foundation makeup and black eyeliner were also common, creating an unhealthy-looking pallor. Hairstyles varied from close-cropped to long and flowing, but hair generally was dyed black. These factors worked together to give goths an androgynous, unsettling appearance that critics have compared to that of futuristic vampires.

Goth culture, which emerged in Britain as an offshoot of punk in the late 1970s, was defined by a shared aesthetic of music and fashion. The latter emphasized black-white contrasts in clothing and makeup, with tattoos, body piercings, and morbid trappings. (Stringer/Getty Images)

By 1985, many of the original goth punk bands had broken up, clearing the way for a new direction that could better be described as gothic rock, and was exemplified by such bands as the Cure. Fashions became more elaborate, with the torn clothing of earlier days giving way to expensive velvet jackets and fancy hats that made goths look more like eighteenth-century aristocrats.

By the 1990s, goth music had largely been subsumed by various other musical movements, including industrial and grunge. However, the fashions associated with goth culture continued to flourish and develop. The popularity of the vampire novels of Anne Rice helped to bring goths into contact with science fiction and fantasy fandom. By the turn of the millennium, it was common to see people in typical goth fashions at science fiction and fantasy conventions.

Goth culture had become increasingly philosophical, regarding itself as a witness to the dark, horrific side of human nature. Many mainstream Americans took this to mean that goths glorified or celebrated the dark side, and they began to associate goths with Satanists and other evil-worshipping cults. This misapprehension intensified after the 1999 Columbine High School massacre in Colorado, in which two high school students, mistakenly identified as goths, carried out a shooting rampage, killing twelve fellow students and a teacher and wounding twenty-four others, before committing suicide.

The mainstream media carried stories about a potential goth menace, and goth culture—especially as exemplified by artists such as Marilyn Manson—became a popular symbol for everything deemed corrupt and dangerous in American youth. The gothic scene lost its chic, but the goth culture has continued to attract new adherents and retain the involvement of old ones, into the new century.

Leigh Kimmel

Further Reading

Acker, Kerry. Everything You Need to Know about the Goth Scene. New York: Rosen, 2000.

Baddeley, Gavin. Goth Chic: A Connoisseur's Guide to Dark Culture. Medford, NJ: Plexus, 2002.

Mercer, Mick. Hex Files: The Goth Bible. Woodstock, NY: Overlook, 1997.

Graffiti

Graffiti, from the Italian word graffiare meaning “to scratch,” refers to a wide variety of writings, designs, and other markings made in spray paint, chalk, charcoal, crayon, or scratchings in public spaces. Graffiti became especially prominent in American culture during the 1970s and 1980s, helped by an association with the burgeoning hip-hop music movement. A predominantly urban phenomenon, graffiti began appearing commonly in such cities as Philadelphia, New York City, and Los Angeles. As a youth subculture, the graffiti world is remarkably self-contained, having developed a unique jargon, aesthetic code, and set of mores among graffiti artists.

Central to an understanding of graffiti is the longstanding debate over its value. In the 1980s, the high art world heralded graffiti as an authentic vernacular art form and, by placing pieces in galleries, made stars of graffiti artists such as Jean-Michel Basquiat and Keith Haring. It often has been put to political use as well, from the Black Panthers's messages of social awareness in the 1960s to expressions of nihilistic angst in the punk movement.

Scholars have sought to explain graffiti as a creative and personal youth reaction to the increasingly drab and sterile face of the city. Some have seen graffiti as a self-consciously ironic stab at the capitalistic ideals behind the billboards and fliers that are so much a part of modern consumerism. Still others, including public officials, law enforcement officials, and concerned citizens, have focused on the association of graffiti with urban areas of high crime and territorial gang rivalries, seeing vandalism and youthful disrespect in the marker and spray-paint signatures and scenes that suddenly adorned buildings and subway cars.

Graffiti has been found among the preserved ruins of Pompeii, on the walls of centuries-old churches and pubs in England, and more recently in the form of the ubiquitous World War II scribbling "Kilroy was here." But it was in the 1960s and 1970s in the United States that graffiti first captured mass attention. It was during this period that a New York City teenager working as a messenger began to write "Taki 183" all over city walls and subway cars to which he had access as he performed his job. The tag was a combination of a shortened form of his name plus the number of the street on which he lived. Although he was hardly the first teen to write his name on public walls, Taki 183's work garnered much media attention, including a July 21, 1971, article in The New York Times that led to an explosion of imitators and competitors.

"Tagging," or writing a stylized personal signature in marker or spray paint, became a ubiquitous feature of the urban landscape. It was from there that the style of graffiti began to evolve, spawning larger and more highly stylized forms and methods of "getting up," or covering a surface in personal graffiti. Wild style, one of the most complex styles, used aggressive artistic technique to allow a graffiti artist to create a personalized signature that could not be easily imitated, using interlocking letters and arrows to create a tag that is nearly unreadable to those not involved in graffiti.

Railway cars and subway trains are favorite targets for graffiti because they offer the thrill of moving one's tag across the city, or even across the country, to potentially vast audiences. Crews of young artists began to gather and cover entire trains in artwork, spray-painting scenes on subway cars, often incorporating elements of popular culture such as characters from comic books, television, and cartoons into their work. This top-to-bottom painting of train cars additionally made it more difficult for competing writers to get their own tags up in the same space, as virtually no part of the car was left uncovered.

In the twenty-first century, graffiti is found in all corners of the world, rural and urban. The acceptance of the art world has led to the use of graffiti style in countless mainstream advertisements and logos. On the streets, it continues to thrive despite repeated attempts by authorities to eradicate it.

Regional variations of graffiti style also have emerged, most notably the "West Coast style," or "old style," a form of Old English used by Chicano youth in Los Angeles who are said to favor the style for its associations with formality and respectability. Graffiti remains very much a part of contemporary gang life, used to mark territorial boundaries and to communicate messages, threats, and warnings among rivals.

Robert Dobler

See also: Black Panthers: Gangs and Gang Culture: Hip-Hop: Punk Rock.

Further Reading

Austin, Joe. Taking the Train: How Graffiti Art Became an Urban Crisis in New York City. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Howorth, Lisa N. "Graffiti." In Handbook of American Popular Culture, ed. Thomas M. Inge. 2nd. ed. New York:

Greenwood, 1989.

Kim, Sojin. Chicano Graffiti and Murals: The Neighborhood Art of Peter Quezada. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1995.

Rafferty, Patricia. "Discourse on Differences: Street Art/Graffiti of Youth." Visual Anthropology Review 7:2 (1991) : 77–83.

Graham, Sylvester (1794–1851)

An ordained Presbyterian minister, Sylvester Graham was a pioneer of dietary reform in the early nineteenth century, believing that vegetarianism could cure virtually all of the ills that plagued civilization. Children raised on a diet of vegetables, fruits, and whole-grain bread, he maintained, grow up to be healthy, sober, and law abiding. At a time when most Americans viewed meat as essential to good health, the Reverend Graham preached that a diet of vegetables and grain curbed sexual appetite and cured alcoholism. Toward those ends, he developed the graham cracker as part of the Graham Diet in 1822 and graham bread, made of ground whole wheat flour, in 1829.

Graham was born on July 5, 1794, in West Suffield, Connecticut. His father died when Graham was young, and he spent most of his childhood living with neighbors. The family counted several members of the clergy among its ranks, which Graham joined in 1826. In the late 1820s, Graham had a series of apocalyptic visions in which he witnessed the collapse of the United States at the hands of ignorant and immoral hordes. The fear of social collapse prompted Graham to devote his energies to diet and nutrition in an attempt to save future generations.

Like many other social reformers of the nineteenth century, Graham promoted the cause of temperance. In 1830, he delivered several addresses on diet and health for the Pennsylvania Society for Discouraging the Use of Ardent Spirits, arguing that chronic drunkenness could be prevented by avoiding all meats and consuming a vegetable diet. Out of this idea, Graham developed the theory that proper nutrition and a dietary regimen could cure virtually any disease or ailment—this at a time when physicians remained baffled by most epidemic diseases, including the potentially fatal cholera.

In 1832, Graham moved to New York City, where he lectured on the dietary deficiencies that he believed caused cholera. Many contemporaries believed that the disease had dietary causes, because heavy vomiting in the early stages suggested the body's attempt to cleanse itself. While some asserted that hearty, heavy foods would help, Graham prescribed a bland, plain diet consisting of fruits, vegetables, and bread from unsifted flour or coarsely ground grain. Moreover, he urged his audiences to adopt a lifestyle including regular baths, ample exercise, and well-ventilated rooms.

While he often attracted audiences numbering as many as 2,000, Graham was a source of controversy as well. Twice, he was mobbed by Boston butchers for denouncing meat as sexually arousing. In 1847, a mob of bakers in that city physically attacked him during a speech about the evils of commercially produced bread and the virtues of unbolted flour. The riotous bakers were subdued when Graham's followers shoveled slaked lime from the windows of the lecture hall onto the crowd below.

Nevertheless, Graham's ideas enjoyed wide circulation and exerted considerable influence on nineteenth-century American lifestyles. He made lasting contributions to ideas about diet and nutrition. He popularized the use of unbolted flour, later named after him, along with the graham cracker. And his lectures on diet and nutrition paved the way for increased consumption of cereal and fruit.

Graham also had a direct influence on fellow health reformer John Harvey Kellogg, who read his articles as an apprentice typesetter. Unlike Kellogg, however, Graham never actually established a working health center. The Graham Boarding Houses founded in New York City and Boston in the mid-1830s were operated by followers. Graham died in Northampton, Massachusetts, on September 11, 1851.

Caryn E. Neumann

See also: Health Foods: Vegetarianism.

Further Reading

Nissenbaum, Stephen. Sex, Diet, and Debility in Jacksonian America: Sylvester Graham and Health Reform. Chicago: Dorsey, 1988.

Sokolow, Jayme A. Eros and Modernization: Sylvester Graham, Health Reform, and the Origins of Victorian Sexuality in America. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1983.

Grange, National

American farmers in the latter half of the nineteenth century were able to produce greater quantities of agricultural products and deliver them to increasingly distant markets in part because of dramatic advances in technology. These improvements, however, came at a price: farmers became increasingly reliant on a network of middlemen, railroads, and corporations that garnered a hefty share of the profit. The growing discontent among farmers with those interferences finally led to the formation of the Order of the Patrons of Husbandry, also known as the National Grange, on December 4, 1867. The Grange movement reached its peak in the mid-1870s, but its existence exemplified the discontent in America's heartland that paved the way for the populist movement that shook the core of American politics in the 1890s.

The credit for forming a national fraternal order to organize American farmers belongs to Oliver H. Kelley, a Minnesota farmer who obtained a position in the newly formed Department of Agriculture in Washington, D.C., during the American Civil War. Kelley was a forward-thinker who recognized that farmers needed to apply the latest scientific methods and technology to their work. He also recognized that farmers could not prosper under political and economic structures that showered favors on manufacturers and monopolies at the expense of individual farmers. He founded the Grange to advocate for the right of individual farmers to share in the prosperity they helped to create.

The Grange was established in Washington, D.C., by Kelley and six other prominent individuals. It was a secret society organized along the lines of the Freemasons, using a variety of regalia, ranks, and degrees to create a sense of fraternity among its members. As both a writer and a Grange evangelist, Kelley was personally responsible for much of the organization's growth, and local branches radiated from his Minnesota farm. Kelley built the Grange from an organization of local farmers into a national force of more than 850,000 members by 1875.

Although nonpartisan, the Grange was active in national politics, pressing for a variety of legislative measures to balance the scales between farmers and the monopolies that exploited them. Grange lobbying forced a number of states to establish regulatory commissions to oversee the prices that could be charged for services such as railroad transportation or grain storage. Local Granges experimented with cooperatives that were designed to cut out middlemen entirely by providing goods and services at fair prices.

Radicals such as Kelley gradually lost power in the National Grange during the mid-1870s, and the organization declined to approximately 100,000 members by early in the next decade. The decline was not due to any decrease in discontent among farmers. Instead, the rise of conservative elements within the Grange leadership drove members to join farm-protest movements that more closely matched their views on the need for change, such as the Farmers' Alliance. Although it was surpassed by other groups, the Grange was the first national expression of farm discontent in America, and it influenced the tone of national politics over a period of some twenty years.

Charles E. Delgadillo

See also: Farmers' Alliance.

Further Reading

Nordin, Dennis S. Rich Harvest: A History of the Grange, 1867–1900. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1974.

Woods, Thomas. Knights of the Plow: Oliver H. Kelley and the Origins of the Grange in Republican Ideology. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1991.

Grateful Dead

The Grateful Dead, a rock band formed in the San Francisco Bay Area in 1965, helped create and popularize the “acid rock” sound of the 1960s, became an icon of the hippie counterculture, and ended up as one of the most enduring, top-grossing touring bands in rock history. The original members were Jerry Garcia (guitar, vocals), Bob Weir (guitar, vocals), Ron “Pigpen” McKernan (keyboards, harmonica, vocals, percussion), Phil Lesh (bass guitar, vocals), and Bill Kreutzmann (drums). Another long-standing member of the band, Mickey Hart (drums, percussion), joined in 1967. Bill Graham, the rock impresario who extended his vision, management, and promotional talents to such pillars of live music as the Woodstock music festival in 1969 and the Live Aid concert in 1985, managed and promoted the Grateful Dead.

Birth

The origins of the band and its music may be traced to a confluence of the diverse musical interests of its founding members and the cultural upheaval of the times. Lesh was influenced by classical, jazz, and avant-garde electronica; Garcia was influenced by rock and roll, bluegrass, and folk; Weir was influenced by rock and roll, blues, and folk; McKernan was influenced by blues and R&B; and Kreutzmann was influenced by jazz and rock and roll.

As a burgeoning coffeehouse folk music scene developed in Palo Alto (south of San Francisco) during the mid-1960s, the musicians came together there as a jug band, a group of people playing farmhouse instruments for fun and for free. They studied the compositions of innovative jazz saxophonist John Coltrane, whose complex style of chord progression was a major influence in their musical development. In mid-1966, they moved to the Haight-Ashbury district of San Francisco, which became known as a hotbed of the hippie movement.

Pioneers of “acid rock” in 1960s San Francisco, the Grateful Dead remained popular for decades on the strength of their distinctive sound and unique concert “happenings.” Legions of dedicated fans, called Deadheads, followed the band from event to event. (Michael Ochs Archives/Stringer/Getty Images)

Although the music was always the focal point of the band, social interaction was often considered the highlight of its concerts. Thus, the cultural phenomenon known as the Grateful Dead derived from their playing improvisational music with extended jams, a multitude of concerts, providing forums for social interaction, and interplay between band members and audience. The unpredictable nature of the experience fostered a unique excitement, which became the draw to many fans. When attending a Dead show, one never knew quite what to expect, as no two concerts were precisely alike. According to Deadbase XI (1999), a complete guide to Grateful Dead song lists, the group never repeated a single song list during a span of 2,000 concerts from 1965 to 1991.

For some, the experience soared beyond the music to the attainment of a higher level of consciousness. For most, this came from the power of the music, endorphins released by dancing, and reveling in the camaraderie of fellow fans; for others, the high came from combining the musical experience with supplements such as hallucinogenic drugs.

For thirty years, from 1965 to 1995, when the group disbanded, the Grateful Dead toured almost constantly, weaving a circuitous path throughout the United States and abroad, drawing from a repertoire of more than 500 different songs. A typical Dead tour consisted of approximately fifteen shows over a period of three weeks.

Dead shows attracted many fans, or “Deadheads,” the most dedicated of whom would attend multiple shows at various venues, constituting their own tour. It is estimated that during the last five years of the band’s activity, 3,000 people nomadically followed the tour circuit; more than 1 million people in all manifested their affinity for the concert experience by attending live shows, with many more listening to live recordings. Dead concerts were the ultimate destination and Dead tours were the ultimate journey.

A significant number of fans prided themselves on the ability to gain entry to a concert through unconventional means, including knowing someone who could get them in, or by receiving a “miracle” or free ticket, often from a stranger. Increasing access for everyone, Deadhead protocol maintained that the right thing to do with extra tickets was to either give them away, trade them, or sell them for no more than face value.

Community and Culture

The Grateful Dead had not expected such a large following, although they unwittingly promoted its growth by fostering a sense of community. The Grateful Dead organization, from band members to roadies, from managers to ardent fans, referred to itself as “family.” The band operated democratically, requiring a consensus on any major decision. During the early to mid-1960s in Haight-Ashbury, the Grateful Dead provided community outreach including free food, lodging, music, and health care.

The Grateful Dead distinguished itself from other musical acts in a number of ways, including lower ticket prices, gentler security, sections in the audience for taping, an information hotline, mail-order ticket distribution, and licensed vending in the parking lots, otherwise known as “the Shakedown lot” (a reference to a fictional place in the song “Shakedown Street,” on the 1978 studio album of the same name). Likewise, Deadheads distinguished themselves from other fan bases in many ways, such as a code of ethics and values that emphasized community, cooperation, sharing, barter, introducing themselves to one another, and freely engaging in conversation. Generally, the audience was diverse, though followers were stereotyped as hippies. Fans wore any and everything, yet tie-dyes dotted the landscape when the Dead came to town (as did Volkswagen buses).

The content and meaning of the Dead’s songs, which generally promoted a belief in the attainment of a positive state, also influenced the social scene. Examples include “Touch of Grey” (from the studio album In The Dark, 1987) with the refrain “we will survive.” Deadhead protocol was demonstrated in “Jack Straw” (from the live album Europe’72, 1972): “We can share what we got of yours, ’cause we done shared all of mine.” And “Eyes of the World” (from the studio album Wake of the Flood, 1973), contains the following lyrics: “Sometimes we live no particular way but our own/And sometimes we visit your country and live in your home/Sometimes we ride on your horses, sometimes we walk alone/Sometimes the songs that we hear are just songs of our own.”

Mythical folklore evolved through the Dead’s songs, and also through other media such as bumper stickers, T-shirts, bonfire chats, drum circles, road-trip anecdotes, hacky-sack sessions, and so on. The evolution of what became known as the Grateful Dead phenomenon may be summarized as the synergistic effect of its participants: No one designed it, yet everyone created it. Environmentalism, antiwar sentiments, social tolerance, constitutional freedoms, and random acts of kindness may fall in and out of favor in society at large but are considered mainstays in Grateful Dead circles.

The Grateful Dead as a musical act came to an abrupt end in 1995, when integral member Jerry Garcia died, reportedly of a heart attack. Surviving members continued the musical tradition with solo projects and coming together as the Dead.

The legacy of the Grateful Dead can be readily observed in hundreds of other bands (including Phish, the Dave Matthews Band, and Widespread Panic) that carried the baton in disparate directions yet have common denominators directly traceable to the Dead: extensive touring, improvisational music, extended jams, and the promotion of social interaction with and among fans.

Todd Anderson

See also: Acid Rock; Haight-Ashbury; San Francisco; Hippies; Psychedelia; San Francisco, California; Woodstock Music and Art Fair.

Further Reading

Adams, Rebecca, and Robert Sardiello. Deadhead Social Science: You Ain't Gonna Learn What You Don't Want to Know. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira, 2000.

Lesh, Phil. Searching for the Sound: My Life with the Grateful Dead. New York: Little, Brown, 2005.

Scott, John W., Mike Dolgushkin, and Stu Nixon. Deadbase XI: The Complete Guide to Grateful Dead Songlists. Cornish, NH: Deadbase, 1999.

Gray Panthers

The Gray Panthers is an activist organization, established by senior citizens in 1971, that works to combat age discrimination and promote social causes of particular concern to the elderly. Nevertheless, the Gray Panthers is an intergenerational organization whose scope covers issues of social and economic justice for people of all ages, including peace, equity, and civil liberties. It actively lobbies local, state, and federal governments on issues such as Social Security, housing, health care, campaign reform, and antidiscrimination laws.

The Gray Panthers began as a group of elder citizens organized by Maggie Kuhn, who had been active in promoting social justice throughout her career but became a victim of age discrimination in 1970. That was the year she turned sixty-five and was forced to retire from her job as a program executive with the United Presbyterian Church.

During more than twenty years working with the church, and throughout her career, Kuhn had worked tirelessly for causes such as improving living and working conditions for the poor, equal pay for women, social health programs, and elder rights. As a result, she was a skilled grassroots organizer. In August 1970, in response to her forced retirement, Kuhn met with a group of five friends, all retirees from religious or social-work organizations, to address such issues as mandatory retirement laws and the resulting loss of income and marginalization of elder citizens.

At around the same time, Kuhn organized a meeting at Columbia University in New York City to discuss issues relevant to older Americans. This meeting generated interest in the newly formed group, which took the name the Consultation of Older and Younger Adults for Social Change. The fledgling group operated out of a converted janitor's closet in the basement of Philadelphia's Tabernacle Church and membership soon grew to nearly 100. With a membership of diverse ages, the group adopted the slogan "Age and Youth in Action." The first issue it took on was opposition to the Vietnam War; Kuhn sent a delegate to Hanoi to meet with prisoners of war in 1970; later, the group sent care packages to draft resisters who had fled to Canada.

In 1972, a New York City talk show host nicknamed the group the "Gray Panthers," an allusion to the civil rights group the Black Panthers. The name seemed apt, as both groups were action oriented, and the Gray Panthers was officially adopted soon thereafter. Membership in the organization expanded rapidly after Kuhn filled in as a last-minute speaker at the 1972 General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church in Denver, Colorado.

The following year, Ralph Nader's Retired Professional Action Group moved its headquarters to Philadelphia, the home base of the Gray Panthers, and the two groups merged. Together, they worked on a report that led to legislation and reform in the hearing-aid industry.

Gray Panthers's political actions have taken the form of letter writing, consciousness-raising groups, demonstrations, rallies, and petitions. In 1971, Gray Panthers were involved in planning the White House Conference on Aging. When they realized that minority voices would not be represented there, however, they cosponsored the alternative Black House Conference on Aging. In 1974, Gray Panthers staged a street theater performance at the American Medical Association's conference to promote the concept of health care as a human right. In 1975, they established the National Media Watch Task Force to raise awareness of ageist stereotyping in the broadcast media. And in the 1980s and 1990s, Gray Panthers backed efforts to protect gay civil rights and to legalize the medical use of marijuana.

From a group of six concerned elders in 1970, the Gray Panthers had grown to more than 40,000 members of all ages by the time of Kuhn's death in 1995. Intergenerational collaboration has continued to be crucial to the group's mission and objectives, distinguishing it from activist groups that focus entirely on the concerns of elders.

Diana Stirling

See also: Black Panthers.

Further Reading

Gray Panthers. <http://www.graypanthers.org>

Kuhn, Maggie. No Stone Unturned: The Life and Times of Maggie Kuhn. New York: Ballantine, 1991.

Kuhn, Maggie, and Margaret Kuhn. Get Out There and Do Something about Injustice. New York: Friendship, 1972.

Great Depression

For most Americans, the Great Depression of the 1930s summons images of breadlines, apple sellers on street corners, shuttered factories, rural poverty, and Hoovervilles (named for President Herbert Hoover), where homeless families sought refuge in shelters cobbled together from salvaged wood, cardboard, and tin. It was a time when thousands of child tramps and adult hoboes drifted around America; when marriages were postponed and birthrates declined; and when children grew up quickly, taking on adult responsibilities that burdened their despondent parents. It was a time when the number of women in the workforce increased, which aided needy families but was a psychological strain on men, the traditional breadwinners of the American family, millions of whom had lost their jobs. One of the most popular songs of the time was "Brother, Can You Spare a Dime?"

Yet the images of a society mired in distress and helplessness were accompanied by a universe of counterculture actions and government interventions seeking to alleviate want and need, and to provide the means to rejuvenate self-respect, spur action, and endorse alternative forms for social life and even the structure of society.

Voices from the Left

For a small but important group of Americans—intellectuals, artists, workers, blacks, and others who felt disenchanted with the prevailing values of American life—the Depression led to an embrace of radical politics. The Great Depression had created the most dramatic economic crisis in the nation's history, which prompted interest in capitalism's strongest critic, the ideology of communism. Some became members of the American Communist Party, which achieved a size and visibility in the 1930s that it had never attained before and would never attain again; others expressed sympathy for the party and its ideas without becoming members. By American standards, the 1930s brought forth a high level of acceptance of radical activism.

For intellectuals, the counterculture of the left offered an escape from the detachment and alienation that many had embraced in the 1920s. It combined a harsh critique of mainstream American society with an intense commitment to a political movement offering meaning and purpose to their lives.

The Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) was of particular importance to American intellectuals as an example of the left's sense of commitment. In Spain, a democratically elected government was in danger of being overthrown by fascists led by Francisco Franco, who was supported by German chancellor Adolf Hitler and Italian dictator Benito Mussolini. Three thousand Americans formed the Abraham Lincoln Brigade and went to Spain to fight for the Republic. About one-third of its members died in combat, but for many of the survivors, the experience was an epiphany. In his novel For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940), Ernest Hemingway, who had been a war correspondent in Spain, wrote about these Americans who played a part in "something that you could believe in wholly and completely and in which you felt an absolute brotherhood with others who were engaged in it."

The creation of the Lincoln Brigade, and the direction of its activities, was the work of the American Communist Party, whose membership peaked at 100,000 during its heyday in the mid-1930s. While Americans were not sympathetic to many of the actions of the party, they found its long-range goals appealing. It was active in organizing the unemployed; it staged an anti-hunger march in Washington, D.C., in 1930; and party members in the labor movement were typically among the most effective union organizers. The party also was one of the few political organizations to take a firm, unequivocal stand in favor of racial justice. Its active defense of the black Scottsboro Boys, youth who had been unjustly accused of the rape of two white women in Alabama in 1931, was an example of its efforts to ally itself with the aspirations of blacks.

Despite its efforts to appear as a humane and patriotic organization, however, the American Communist Party was always under the close and rigid control of the Soviet Union. Its leaders took their orders from Moscow, and most members followed the "party line" or found themselves expelled from its ranks. As a result, most Americans continued to view communism as an alien force.

The Great Depression of the 1930s, regarded by some at the time as the final failure of capitalism, brought a resurgence of radical politics. Here, members of the Communist Party march in downtown Minneapolis in 1939. (Anthony Potter Collection/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Voices from the Right

Of the radical right figures in the 1930s, Huey P. Long was the only one to wield political power, becoming governor of Louisiana in 1928 and U.S. senator in 1932. During 1934 and 1935, the Louisiana legislature enacted without debate a series of laws abolishing local government and giving the Long machine control of the appointment of every policeman, fireman, and teacher in the state. Meanwhile, control by the “Kingfish” of the militia, the judiciary, the election officials, and the tax assessors put all citizens at his mercy with no possibility of redress. The flamboyant oratory and populist vocabulary of this demagogue, his widely heralded Share-the-Wealth Society, and especially his slogan, “Every Man a King,” made Long the idol of millions. The end came only with Long’s assassination in September 1935. Robert Penn Warren’s Pulitzer Prize–winning novel All the King’s Men (1946) was based on Long’s career.

The Reverend Charles E. Coughlin, pastor of the Shrine of the Little Flower in Royal Oak, Michigan, moved in early Depression days from weekly radio sermons to radio talks on money, economics, and “international bankers.” In 1932, Coughlin supported Franklin D. Roosevelt for president, proclaiming “Roosevelt or Ruin,” but he soon turned against the New Deal. Increasingly anti-Semitic comments, a large tolerance for Hitler’s Germany, and intemperate attacks on American political leaders swelled the ranks of his followers but drew reprimands from the Vatican. In 1937, Coughlin was attacked in The Michigan Catholic by the new archbishop of Detroit, but he was not completely silenced until he was faced with federal threats of a sedition trial in 1942.

Works Progress Administration

The Works Progress Administration (WPA) was the largest and most important of the New Deal’s cultural and work programs. It was a massive governmental employment program launched in the spring of 1935. There were those who believed WPA projects were of dubious utility or were created for political reasons as a vehicle for reelecting Democrats, but the essential fact was that the WPA proved to be the most successful relief operation in American history.

Millions of people who had previously relied on handouts were provided with a source of income and, perhaps even more important, respect, while their talents and skills were maintained for use when better times arrived. From the summer of 1935 to the end of the WPA in 1943, about 8 million people were on the payroll—about 20 percent of the nation's labor force. The average number of people on monthly payroll was about 2.1 million, with a peak of 3.2 million in November 1938.

The WPA built highways, airfields (among them New York's LaGuardia Airport), playgrounds, schools, and hospitals around the United States, and there were projects that included the restoring of historic buildings and the development of other public facilities. WPA workers transcribed millions of pages into braille, taught illiterate citizens to read, served hot lunches to schoolchildren, established dental and medical clinics, and even operated the municipal functions of the bankrupt town of Key West, Florida.

One of the most striking features of the WPA was the inclusion of unemployed writers, actors, and artists. Thousands of post offices, public buildings, and schools were adorned with murals and other paintings produced by the Federal Art Project. Many notable artists, such as Ben Shahn, Willem de Kooning, Jackson Pollock, and Stuart Davis, were among those employed by the WPA at the standard weekly wage of $23.86. The Federal Theatre Project, which produced work of unusually high quality, brought live theater to towns that had never before seen a professional company. In four years, some 30 million people witnessed productions from those by Shakespeare and works in Spanish and Yiddish to performances with all-black casts. The Federal Writers' Project, which employed 6,000 writers, turned out a variety of nonfiction works, including the comprehensive American Guide series covering each state and territory. Richard Wright, Nelson Algren, John Cheever, and Saul Bellow were among the young writers who got their start on the project.

The National Youth Administration (NYA) did for young people what the WPA accomplished for their elders. Nearly one-third of the unemployed were in the sixteen-to-twenty-four age bracket. Part-time jobs were created in colleges and schools that helped students complete their educations and kept them out of the full-time labor market. These jobs included work as clerks and typists, as assistants in libraries and laboratories, and in campus maintenance. Pay was not high—$6 a month for high school students, up to $20 a month for college students, and $30 for graduate students—but to many it meant the difference between remaining in school and dropping out. Between 1935 and the outbreak of World War II, about 1.5 million young people were employed by the NYA.

In 1938, a coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats pressed their opposition to New Deal cultural programs. Late in July 1938, Representative J. Parnell Thomas (R-NJ) of the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC, known in the 1930s as the Dies Committee, after chairman Martin Dies) claimed to have “startling evidence” that the Federal Theatre and Writers' Projects were “a hotbed of Communists” and “one more link in the vast and unparalleled New Deal propaganda network.” He announced that an investigation would be launched.

In the first six weeks of investigation, which centered on Boston, New York City, and San Francisco, the committee produced a parade of disaffected former WPA workers who testified that the projects were tools of the Communist Party, designed to breed class hatred in the United States. The hearings came on the heels of a campaign to withdraw the Massachusetts edition of the American Guide series, which included in its 675 pages thirty-one lines concerning the Sacco and Vanzetti case (in which two Italian-immigrant anarchists had been executed for murder in 1927 despite nationwide protests). Similarly, the New Jersey state guidebook was criticized for its depiction of a 1935 shipbuilders' strike. According to Representative Thomas, the guide was “written as if there had been trouble between capital and labor.” The Dies Committee reported that ominous “Communist phraseology had been inserted in guides of the states and here in Washington.”

End of an Era

The chilling effect of continuing Dies Committee hearings, headlines about “red artists,” and the buildup to World War II led to a reorganization of the WPA. The Federal Writers' Project began to concentrate on creating recreation guides, especially for areas where World War II military training was beginning in earnest.

The war finally put an end to all federally subsidized cultural programs other than those related directly to the war effort. The WPA was formally ended by presidential proclamation in 1943.

Leslie Rabkin

See also: Abraham Lincoln Brigade: Communism: Federal Art Project: Federal Theatre Project: Federal Writers' Project: Sacco and Vanzetti Case: Tramps and Hoboes.

Further Reading

Banks, Ann. First Person America. New York: Vintage Books, 1981

Brinkley, Alan. Voices of Protest: Huey Long, Father Coughlin, and the Great Depression. New York: Vintage Books, 1983.

Leuchtenberg, William E. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. New York: Harper & Row, 1963.

Lindenmeyer, Kriste. The Greatest Generation Grows Up: American Childhood in the 1930s. New York: Ivan Dee, 2005.

Watkins, T.H. The Hungry Years: A Narrative History of the Great Depression in America. New York: Owl, 2000.

Greeley, Horace (1811–1872)

A newspaper editor, politician, and champion of socially progressive ideas, Horace Greeley advocated such countercultural causes as abolitionism, women's rights, pacifism, and higher tariffs. He opposed capital punishment, Freemasonry, the use of tobacco and alcoholic beverages, and marital infidelity. Greeley also opposed the war with Mexico (1846–1848), the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, the Compromise of 1850, and the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854—the latter three reflective of his abolitionism. Founder of the influential New York Tribune and a cofounder of the Republican Party, he was perhaps best known for the phrase “Go west, young man!”

Greeley was born on February 3, 1811, in Amherst, New Hampshire, the oldest child of Zaccheus and Mary Woodburn Greeley. He grew up in poverty and became a printer's apprentice at age fifteen at the Northern Spectator, a paper in East Poultney, Vermont. When the paper ceased publication in 1830, Greeley sought other print-shop jobs, becoming a typesetter at the Erie Gazette in Pennsylvania in 1831.

He worked at various other papers until March 22, 1834, when he launched his own publishing venture, a literary weekly called The New Yorker. He went on to become editor of The Jeffersonian (1838) in Albany, New York, and The Log Cabin (1840), a campaign paper that supported William Henry Harrison for president.

Greeley merged The New Yorker and The Log Cabin into one publication, the New York Tribune, first published on April 10, 1841. As its editor, he favored political news, lectures, book reviews, book excerpts, and poetry. He wrote in a vigorous yet terse style, with clarity and simplicity. In 1844, he hired the transcendentalist Margaret Fuller as the newspaper's first woman editor.

Appointed to serve out the incomplete term of Democratic New York congressman David S. Jackson from December 4, 1848, to March 3, 1849, Greeley quickly made enemies in Washington, D.C. He kept track of absences by fellow congressmen and sought to curb what he saw as corruption.

He helped organize one of the first labor unions for printers, the New York Typographical Union, serving as its first president in 1850. From 1851 to 1862, the socialist political thinker Karl Marx was the Tribune's European correspondent in London; German socialist Friedrich Engels was a contributor. Greeley's support of such radical philosophies as communism and Fourierism—a social reform philosophy that advocated the transformation of society into self-sufficient, independent “phalanges”—was widely criticized. He opposed the Kansas-Nebraska Act because he believed that popular sovereignty would result in “slavocracy” in the West. While Greeley agreed with the antislavery position of radical abolitionist John Brown, he disagreed with the violent method Brown used in his raid against the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia (now West Virginia) in 1859. In 1864, Greeley met with Southern peace commissioners in Niagara Falls, Canada, for what turned out to be a failed attempt at peace.

During Reconstruction, Greeley promoted equality for African Americans as well as amnesty for Confederates. He joined nineteen other men in signing the bail bond that freed Confederate president Jefferson Davis, being held in federal prison on charges of treason, in May 1867.

In April 1872, Greeley accused the Ulysses S. Grant administration of corruption, and the Liberal Republicans nominated Greeley for president the following month; the Democrats followed suit in July. Resigning as editor of the Tribune on May 15, Greeley campaigned throughout the mid-Atlantic states in August and September. In the election on November 5, he garnered 2.8 million votes (44 percent) to 3.6 million for President Grant, carrying only six states.

Despondent and exhausted by the election and the death of his wife only a week before, Greeley suffered a mental breakdown. His health fell into rapid decline, and he died on November 29, 1872.

Ralph Hartsock

See also: Abolitionism; Feminism, First-Wave; Freemasonry.

Further Reading

Schulze, Suzanne. Horace Greeley: A Bio-Bibliography. New York: Greenwood, 1992.

Williams, Robert C. Horace Greeley: Champion of American Freedom. New York: New York University Press, 2006.

Green Party

The Green Party of the United States—the contemporary American counterpart to environmental, grassroots “green politics” organizations in Europe and elsewhere—has been active as a third-party alternative since the 1980s. The party rose to prominence with its nominations of Ralph Nader as a presidential candidate in 1996 and 2000. Nader's candidacies prompted debate among liberal Democrats as to whether to vote for a more progressive third party or to support a more centrist Democratic candidate for president. Many Democrats attributed their party's inability to keep control of the White House in 2000 to the presence of the Green Party on the ballot in forty-four states. Unlike the Democratic and Republican parties, the Green Party emphasizes local political autonomy and grassroots organization through state chapters. While no Green Party candidate has been elected to national office in the United States, more than 200 have held elective positions at the state and local levels.

The Green Party of the United States is rooted in international political movements uniting environmentalism and nonviolent, populist philosophies that became prevalent during the 1970s. In the 1980s, members of the Green movement won their first parliamentary seats in Germany. In 1984, reflecting the growing international trend, St. Paul, Minnesota, became the site of the first Green meeting in the United States. Today there are more than 1 million Green Party members in more than a dozen countries.

Early Green activism in the United States during the 1980s did not focus on elections but on building the environmental movement. By the latter part of the decade, however, with the establishment of hundreds of local chapters and the marshaling of resources, attention began to be directed toward the voting booth. While not all Greens supported the idea of participating in national politics, the party was granted ballot access in Alaska in 1990, the first time in any state.

Many Greens active at the state and local levels in the 1980s and early 1990s looked down on the national organization. Nevertheless, in 1996, various state chapters joined to form the Association of State Green Parties, and the movement to mount a national Green campaign led to the nomination of a candidate for president that year. On June 24, the state Green parties held a nominating convention in Denver, Colorado, selecting consumer protection advocate and activist politician Ralph Nader as its nominee for president and Native American environmental activist Winona LaDuke as its vice-presidential candidate. In the November 1996 election, the Green Party ticket received some 650,000 popular votes (0.7 percent).

The 1996 Green Party convention also resulted in the ratification of a document called "Ten Key Values of the Green Party." It represented the core values of the party but was intended to be interpreted uniquely by local chapters. In strong contrast to the Democratic and Republican parties, the Greens emphasized grassroots democracy, social justice and equal opportunity, ecological wisdom, nonviolence, decentralization, community-based economics and economic justice, feminism and gender equity, respect for diversity, personal and global responsibility, and future focus and sustainability.

In 2000, the Green Party again nominated Nader and LaDuke as its presidential and vice-presidential candidates. This time the ticket fared much better, garnering nearly 2.9 million votes (2.7 percent). The party officially became known as the Green Party of the United States in 2001. At the 2004 national convention in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, it named David Cobb and Pat LaMarche as its national candidates, but the ticket captured only 120,000 votes (0.1 percent) that November.

The national party continues to view its efforts to support state parties as its central focus. Policy directions and activist efforts are frequently organized by the state parties. As a result, the Green Party's major electoral successes have been achieved at the state and local levels. As of 2005, nearly 305,000 Greens were registered nationwide in states allowing voters to register with the party. The largest Green Party memberships were located in California, Maine, New York, and Pennsylvania. As of January 2007, at least 223 members of the Green Party in the United States held elective office at the state or local levels; the most were in California, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin.

Organizers for the Green Party typically view the Democratic and Republican parties as equally beholden to corporate interests and committed to centrist compromises. In contrast, the state Green Party in Wisconsin took the radical step of organizing a ballot initiative during the 2006 elections calling on President George W. Bush to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq. The initiative was approved in thirty-four of forty-two municipalities. On this and other issues, the Greens have maintained that their commitment to countercultural activism, nonviolence, and social justice sets them apart from the Democratic and Republican parties. The party's ticket in 2008, with former six-term Congresswoman Cynthia McKinney of Georgia as the presidential nominee and Rosa Clemente as the vice-presidential nominee, received 162,000 votes (0.1 percent).

Nathan Zook

See also: Democratic Party: Nader, Ralph.

Further Reading

Nader, Ralph. Crashing the Party: Taking on the Corporate Government in an Age of Surrender. New York: St. Martin's, 2002.

Greening of America, The

The Greening of America is the title of a widely read book by Yale Law School professor Charles A. Reich published in 1970. The book holds a peculiar place in the history of American countercultures. It attempted to provide a philosophically sophisticated interpretation of the counterculture ideas and movements associated with the latter half of the 1960s. In this, it was arguably successful. The work was serialized in The New Yorker magazine and published in book form by a major publisher (Random House). At the very least, it provided much of the terminology that would be employed subsequently to discuss the late 1960s.

Beyond mere interpretation, however, the book was intended as a proclamation, a tool of countercultural propagation, and a celebration of counterculture values as espoused at the Woodstock music festival of August 1969; however, it can only be said to have succeeded in this regard as an ironic swan song. Just as the book was being finished and put into production came such violent events as Chicago's Days of Rage riots (October 1969), the Altamont Free Concert (California, December 1969), and the Kent State University protests and shootings (Ohio, May 1970). These events made cynicism, frustration, drug abuse, and violence as much a legacy of the period as were visions of an age of love, light, and humanity.

In terms of content, Reich's book purports to trace the history of consciousness in American society from its earliest point to the present. In the fashion of Western philosophy, he discerns three essential periods of consciousness, each characterized by its own sense of what is real, what is good, and what is possible.

Consciousness One (hereafter C1), according to Reich, is a rural consciousness, most likely to be held by farmers and shopkeepers. This mentality, which dominated in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, is parochial, conservative, local, suspicious of anything new, and skeptical of changes. Tradition is highly respected and utilized to maintain social order. It is seen as good that much of one's life is mapped out at birth according to one's station and family. C1 is essentially a precapitalist, Whig mentality.

Arising as an antithesis to C1, Consciousness Two (C2) is the mentality of the urban, industrial, capitalist society. For those moving away from farms and into cities, C2 represents liberation from family and tradition. What is seen as right and good is that social and economic rewards should flow from one's own hard work, ingenuity, and willingness to take risks. This is the mentality of the great American meritocracy, of "moving up in the world." One's place in society is not set in stone, and social conditions themselves are subject to human creative engineering and betterment. This is the consciousness of classical American social and political liberalism.

According to Reich, an epic struggle between C1 and C2 characterized much of the twentieth century, with C2 increasingly dominant after World War I. During the latter 1960s Reich maintains, this struggle was yielding to a wholly new synthesis, Consciousness Three (C3). Like C2, C3 holds personal freedom and philosophical egalitarianism in high regard. Reflecting some of the C1 criticisms of urban industrial societies, C3 sees communing with nature and, in general, a celebration of simplicity, color, and living apart from "the clock" as a necessary corrective to the “all gray” and regimented world of the industrial city. Most of Reich's book is devoted to a survey of American youth culture, in which he finds examples of emerging C3 in everything from music and poster art to hair and clothing styles.

Ironically, Reich's analysis appeared just as the 1960s counterculture was falling into decline. Much of what he pointed to as harbingers of C3 proved to be the most self-destructive aspects of the counterculture, such as open drug use and free sex.

In retrospect, perhaps the most enduring aspect of Reich's book is the title itself. The year the book appeared also was the year of the first Earth Day and the emerging awareness of pollution and its consequences. “The greening of America” thus became a potent phrase for the environmental movement, and the symbol of one counterculture movement fed into the foundational vocabulary of one of its successors.

Daniel Liechty

See also: Hippies.

Further Reading

Reich, Charles A. The Greening of America. 1970. New York: Three Rivers, 1995.

Roszak, Theodore. The Making of a Counter Culture: Reflections on the Technocratic Society and Its Youthful Opposition. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Greenwich Village, New York City

For more than 100 years, New York City's Greenwich Village has represented a cultural process and an evolving social milieu as much as it has been a physical space. It is a place where native-born Americans and immigrants to the United States have reinvented themselves and the world they inherited.

The center of the Village is Washington Square, an 8-acre (3.24-hectare) park covering four city blocks in lower Manhattan. As early as the 1820s, residents had successfully fought the extension of the grid street plan that characterized most of Manhattan, and the Village retained its network of small, winding streets. This enabled it to remain isolated from the physical and cultural urbanization that took place in the rest of New York City in succeeding decades.

Beginning in the 1890s, Irish, German, and Italian immigrant workers moved in to Greenwich Village as members of the middle and upper classes moved out. By the turn of the twentieth century, it was a relatively small residential area, set apart from the rest of the city, composed of large homes that had been transformed into apartment buildings and offered inexpensive housing to its working-class population. Despite its set-apart feeling, it was close to the business center in Midtown Manhattan, and that proximity, along with the low rents, also attracted young people—the first generation born to the new industrial, urban society that now dominated the United States.

Bohemia, 1900–1917

By 1900, the number of Midwesterners seeking escape from the cultural claustrophobia of small-town America matched the number of immigrants escaping from the political claustrophobia of Eastern Europe. Both groups saw New York as the city that promised an opportunity to remake their lives, and Greenwich Village became the place where that change might occur.

On a practical level, the Village provided inexpensive housing. Single rooms averaged $8 per month, while an entire floor of a brownstone building might be available for $30 per month. On a cultural level, the Village provided an environment that was tolerant of anything different. One reason that people moved to Greenwich Village was to escape the pressure of conforming to a particular lifestyle, set of rules, religion, or sexual code—and to accord a reciprocal tolerance toward others.

Finally, whether from a farm in Iowa or a fishing village in Italy, immigrants to the Village realized that they had come to a far different world that was being shaped by a new age. For the immigrant worker, the nature of work changed with the introduction of the assembly-line process, the concept of timed production, and the importance of the machine rather than the worker in the production of goods. The newness of this context to both foreign immigrants and American migrants necessitated a new cultural and political response. Their challenge to conventional politics and cultural norms earned the label “bohemian,” a term that originated in Europe for persons considered unconventional in behavior and temperament.

The first evidence of this temperament occurred in the 1890s in the boardinghouse of Madame Katharine Branchard, who had transformed a row house on Washington Square into inexpensive rooms that attracted artists and anarchists. By the early 1900s, the Branchard home was one of a series of residences near the square that housed a growing number of young people who questioned the cultural and political assumptions of mainstream society. Especially disenchanted by the response of established literary and visual artists to the political and cultural crisis occasioned by rapid industrialization, Village residents called for both a political and a cultural revolution.

The voice of rebellion was heard in a number of so-called little magazines that originated in the Village or whose writers were Village residents. The most prominent of these publications was The Masses, featuring the iconoclastic writings of such social critics as Randolph Bourne, Max Eastman, and John Reed, a founder of the American Communist Party. Joining The Masses as the local voice of the new political sensibility were The Nation and The New Republic, whose most prominent contributor was Walter Lippmann. Near Washington Square, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) published The Crisis, edited by the respected civil rights activist W.E.B. Du Bois. The Village also served as the home for publications that supported the causes of woman suffrage and free love, such as the New York Call and birth control advocate Margaret Sanger's The Woman Rebel.

Joining these magazines of political protest were a number of journals that provided a forum for new literary works. Margaret Anderson and John Heap moved their modernist literary magazine, The Little Review, from Chicago to the Village in 1917, and soon thereafter published James Joyce's Ulysses in serial form, until the courts pronounced the work obscene. Seven Arts, American Magazine, and The Dial joined The Little Review as publications that provided forums in which to discuss the latest innovations in the literary and visual arts. Often, the words printed in these magazines first appeared in conversations that took place in the many clubs and salons that operated in the Village. One of the first of these was the X-Club.

The X-Club was organized by historian Charles Beard and philosopher John Dewey in 1903. Its members debated the progressive reforms called for by activists such as the muckraking author Upton Sinclair. The sites of the two most famous weekly meetings of social and political activists, however, were the home of Walter and Louis Arensberg on West Sixty-seventh Street (outside of the Village) and the apartment of Mabel Dodge on Fifth Avenue. The Arensbergs were art collectors, and their home became the support center for the emerging avant-garde art movement. Dodge also supported the art world, most importantly through her financial support of the Armory Show of 1913. The show was the catalyst for the modernist art movement in the United States.

It was Dodge's apartment that became a gathering place for Village artists, political activists, and writers. The wife of a wealthy architect, Dodge re-created the European salon experience of Paris, and her home became a haven for feminists, socialists, atheists, and free-love advocates. To bring some order to the chaos of her gatherings, she introduced thematic evenings. Each Wednesday night from 1913 through 1917, the evening would be given over to a specific topic. Psychoanalysis and politics were the most popular. Frequent speakers included Lippmann on the intersection of psychology and politics, radical activist "Big Bill" Haywood, leader of the Industrial Workers of the World (the IWW), and anarchist Emma Goldman. A Village resident might hear Dodge speak on Wednesday night, followed by novelist Theodore Dreiser on Thursday. Dreiser hosted a weekly conversation on the role of the writer in the modern world. Among those who attended were writers who would become noted literary critics, including Carl and Mark Van Doren and Joseph Wood Krutch, poets Edna St. Vincent Millay and Floyd Dell, and novelist F. Scott Fitzgerald.

Public clubs matched the private salons as places to eat, drink, and debate. The first and best-known was the Liberal Club, which proclaimed itself "A Meeting Place for Those Interested in New Ideas." Opened in 1913 by Henrietta Rodman, the establishment was one of the most popular spots in the Village. On the floor below the Liberal Club was a restaurant run by Rodman's friend Polly Halliday, an anarchist. Villagers joked that visitors could feed their mind upstairs and their stomach downstairs.

Other favorite gathering places for activists were Heterodoxy, a feminist café, and Alfred Stieglitz's art gallery at 291 Fifth Avenue, where the visitor could be tutored in the aesthetics of modern art. In addition, the Washington Square Players (later the Theatre Guild), and the Provincetown Players (named by Village writers for the location of their summer retreat, Provincetown, Massachusetts) staged new works by such emerging playwrights as Eugene O'Neill for Village audiences.

The clubs, theaters, galleries, and salons of Greenwich Village, however, disappeared as suddenly as they had appeared. The entrance of the United States into World War I resulted in the perception of unconventional politics and behavior as unpatriotic. Publications such as The Masses and The Little Review ceased production because of government suppression.

The government arrested and exiled Haywood and Goldman for their antiwar activities. Reed traveled to Russia to see the communist revolution firsthand and never returned. Beginning in 1916, Dodge underwent psychotherapy and the following year abandoned the streets of Greenwich Village for the rural countryside near Taos, New Mexico. Her departure marked the end of the first bohemian era for the Village.

Bohemian Rebirth, 1935–1975

During the 1920s, more tourists than radicals inhabited Greenwich Village, with its reputation as a place of sexual freedom, access to alcohol, and growing gay culture making it a mandatory destination for visitors to New York. Struggling artists could no longer afford to live in the Village, as rents rose more than 140 percent from 1920 to 1930.

The real estate boom ended, however, with the economic crisis of the 1930s. The Great Depression acted as a catalyst for a rebirth of social and political activism in the United States, and the Village once again became a home for those who challenged the moral authority of the state.

By the late 1930s, Village residents were known for their opposition to fascism, segregation, and corporate capitalism. Dorothy Day's Catholic Worker organization and a club called Café Society, where jazz singer Billie Holiday first performed the antilynching song "Strange Fruit," symbolized these sentiments. They openly challenged the segregationist policies of the nation and provided a forum for advocates of democracy, integration, and socialism. By the mid-to late 1940s, Greenwich Village housed dozens of jazz clubs that not only were venues for the beginnings of "cool" jazz but also were the few public establishments in New York where white and black patrons sat together. The management of one of the clubs, the Village Vanguard, boasted that every major figure in modern jazz had performed on its stage.

Greenwich Village also was the venue for the beginnings of the New York school of abstract expressionist art. Through the patronage of Peggy Guggenheim and her Art of the Century Gallery, the careers of such notable figures as Jackson Pollock and Willem de Kooning blossomed there. By the early 1960s, Andy Warhol and pop art had become staples at Village galleries. The Living Theatre took art to the people by incorporating pop, abstract expressionism, performance art, poetry readings, and the screenings of independent or foreign films into its weekly productions.

The Village also was the home of writers who used new literary methods to question the values of the new consumer society. The Beats, notably poets Jack Kerouac and Allen Ginsberg, began their careers there in the early 1950s. These and other literary figures could be found at the Eighth Street Bookshop, which also sold copies of The Village Voice, one of America's first successful underground newspapers. Beginning in the early 1960s, coffeehouses provided other venues for artists to debate the merits of modern society. Clubs such as the Bitter End, Café Wha?, and Gerde's Folk City presented folk musicians such as Bob Dylan and Joan Baez, whose antiestablishment songs suggested that a cultural rebellion was on the horizon.

By the early 1960s, the coffeehouses, cafés, and pubs of New York's Greenwich Village had become a hotbed of antiestablishment discourse and culture. (Marvin Lichtner/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

That cultural rebellion exploded a few years later as young people challenged the war in Vietnam, declared their own war on poverty, and insisted on extending the goals of the African American civil rights movement to all peoples and classes in society. By the late 1960s, the Village housed dozens of antiwar groups and women's organizations, and a growing number of gay advocacy groups. In 1969, patrons of a gay club called the Stonewall Inn fought city police, who had made it a habit to harass anyone who entered or exited the club. The Stonewall riots, as the encounters became known, were seen as a catalyst for the modern gay movement. A year later, members of the Weather Underground revolutionary group died in an explosion while making a bomb in a Village townhouse.

Legacy

By the mid-1970s, the energy and money needed to sustain so many different political and cultural organizations had dissolved. The war in Vietnam was over, the country faced an economic crisis, and many of the participants in Village activism found themselves pushing forty years of age and responsible for children.

Again, as had happened in the 1920s, the Village became a fashionable place to live. Gradually, as the economy rebounded in the late 1980s, rents went up and a more affluent, mainstream group moved in, although a number of artists and other creative individuals continue to call it home. Greenwich Village remains a physical reminder of a time and place where members of a counterculture once met and, through their creative process, remade the literary and visual landscape of modern America.

David O'Donald Cullen

See also: Abstract Expressionism; Beat Generation; Bohemianism; Catholic Worker Movement; Coffeehouses; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Fitzgerald, F. Scott; Gay Liberation Movement; Goldman, Emma; Holiday, Billie; Living Theatre; Luhan, Mabel Dodge; Magazines, Little: Masses, The Nation, The; Performance Art; Provincetown Players; Sanger, Margaret; Theater, Alternative; Warhol, Andy.

Further Reading

Beard, Rick, and Leslie Cohen, eds. Greenwich Village: Culture and Counterculture. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1993.

Miller, Terry. Greenwich Village and How It Got That Way. New York: Crown, 1990.

Selzer, Jack. Kenneth Burke in Greenwich Village: Conversing with the Moderns, 1915–1931. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1996.

Stansell, Christine. American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century. New York: Henry Holt, 2000.

Wetzsteon, Ross. Republic of Dreams: Greenwich Village: The American Bohemia, 1910–1960. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2007.

Gregory, Dick (1932–)

Richard (“Dick”) Claxton Gregory is an African American comedian, social activist, and author who, in the 1960s, broke the racial barrier for black comedians by playing in mainstream venues and offering no-holds-barred racial humor to white patrons (“If you actually like me, you’ll invite me to lunch when it isn’t Brotherhood Week”). Prominent in the anti–Vietnam War movement, Gregory has been a persistent advocate for civil rights and health care, lecturing, fasting, and leading protests to call attention to the ills of society. He was the 1968 presidential candidate of the radical Freedom and Peace Party.

Born on October 12, 1932, in St. Louis, Missouri, Gregory grew up fatherless and in poverty. In 1951, he received a track scholarship to Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, and two years later he was named the school's outstanding athlete. Gregory's college education was interrupted in 1954, when he was drafted into the U.S. Army. It was in the service that he got his start in comedy, winning several talent shows. After completing his service in 1956, he returned briefly to the university, but he left again to begin a career as a comedian in Chicago.

After performing at small all-black nightclubs, Gregory got his big break in 1961, when he was hired by Hugh Hefner to play a one-night stand at the Chicago Playboy Club as the replacement for an ailing white comedian. His performance ("I never believed in Santa Claus because I knew no white dude would come into my neighborhood after dark" was one joke) wowed the all-white audience, a convention of frozen-food executives from the South. Hefner gave Gregory a three-year contract, and his career took off. Within the next year, he appeared on The Jack Paar Show, was profiled by Time magazine, made his first comedy album, and became America's first nationally known black satirist. By 1962, he was a millionaire.

In 1964, Gregory published his best-selling autobiography, Nigger, and became more involved in the civil rights and other social movements, playing numerous benefit performances for these causes. In mid-1963, he spent six months in the South leading demonstrations for black voter registration. He was arrested for civil disobedience on several occasions, and jailed in Birmingham, Alabama. His activism spurred him to run against Richard Daley for mayor of Chicago in 1967 and for president of the United States in 1968 as a write-in candidate of the Freedom and Peace Party.

In the 1970s, Gregory put aside his career as a comedian to focus full-time on social issues, from civil rights to health care, capital punishment, and the hostage situation in Iran, engaging in hunger strikes to publicize his causes. Also during this period he became a vegetarian, took up marathon running, and became a nutritional consultant, founding a company that distributed weight loss products.

The food enterprise failed in the 1990s, but Gregory continued his social activism and returned to the stage as a comedian. In 1996, he performed in an off-Broadway one-man show, Dick Gregory Live!

In his seventies, Gregory has continued to express strong countercultural views about life in America. At the fortieth anniversary of the Voting Rights Act in 2005, he called the United States the "most dishonest, ungodly, unspiritual nation that ever existed in the history of the planet," and, in a speech in 2006, he declared that the problems faced by African Americans are due to our country's "insane, racist system."

Leslie Rabkin

See also: Hefner, Hugh: Peace and Freedom Party.

Further Reading

Gregory, Dick, and Robert Lipsyte. Nigger: An Autobiography. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1964.

Gregory, Dick, and Shelia P. Moses. Callus On My Soul: A Memoir. Atlanta: Longstreet, 2000.

Groupies

The term groupie, specifically in reference to fans of rock and roll, was coined and popularized by the counterculture of the 1960s and 1970s. The word referred to a fan of rock music, usually a young woman, who went to great lengths to make contact with the musicians. In about 1970, the term took on a distinct sexual connotation, as the stereotype groupie offered favors to rock stars. Groupies eventually entered the general language to refer to those seeking contact with any celebrity.

Groupies and rock journalism have always been closely linked. The word is believed to have been used for the first time in print on June 16, 1966, in what was arguably the first rock music column to appear in a major American newspaper or magazine. Written by Richard Goldstein, a twenty-year-old graduate of the Columbia University School of Journalism in New York City and an ardent rock fan, the column was called "Pop Eye" and appeared in The Village Voice. Goldstein used the term groupies to refer to the screaming, fainting girl fans of the Beatles and other British Invasion bands. He would continue to popularize the term during his tenure as a music writer at The Village Voice. One of his trademark questions to rock musicians, he wrote, was "What's your ideal groupie?"

For several years, there was no assumption of sexual contact between the groupies and their idols, at least not in print. That would change in February 1969 with the publication of a Rolling Stone issue devoted to groupies. Often referred to as "The Groupie Issue," its lead article was titled "The Groupies and Other Girls" and was written by John Burks, Jerry Hopkins, and Paul Nelson. The article was interspersed with interviews with groupies, some of whom were among the most well-known of the era. It was illustrated with stunning pictures of the women taken by Rolling Stone photographer Baron Wolman. The magazine's editor, Jann Wenner, believed so completely in the project that he spent the last $7,000 in its bank account on a full-page ad in The New York Times.

The issue caused a sensation among Rolling Stone's readers and generated a new level of publicity for the groupie phenomenon, beyond the ranks of the rock counterculture. After "The Groupie Issue," groupie took on sexual implications that began to overshadow the innocent fan aspect of the phenomenon.

Changes in the groupie subculture during the 1970s reflected changes taking place in the rock music business and the world at large. No longer were groupies regarded as savvy members of the nascent counterculture, helping to orient musicians in its unfamiliar and potentially hazardous landscape. They became permanent fixtures of the rock and roll landscape. In the 1970s, counterculture values had spread even to the suburbs, while the lives of successful rock musicians were filled with jet planes, cocaine, business managers, and groupies. The most publicized groupies of this era were those associated with Rodney Bingenheimer's English Disco in Los Angeles.

The concept of the groupie has remained a potent one in American popular culture. The groupie subculture itself has endured through a succession of new musical trends and subcultures, while the experience of groupies has found expression in popular culture. Former Rolling Stone writer Cameron Crowe wrote and directed the film Almost Famous (2000), featuring Kate Hudson as groupie Penny Lane, in a fictionalized portrayal of a friend of Crowe's from Portland, Oregon; Crowe won the Academy Award for Best Original Screenplay for this film. In 2002, Oscar winners Goldie Hawn, Susan Sarandon, and Geoffrey Rush starred in another film about groupies, The Banger Sisters.

Lisa Rhodes

See also: Rock and Roll: Rolling Stone: Village Voice, The

Further Reading

Burks, John, Jerry Hopkins, and Paul Nelson. "The Groupies and Other Girls." Rolling Stone, February 15, 1969, 11–26.

Gaar, Gillian G. She's a Rebel: The History of Women in Rock & Roll. Seattle: Seal, 1992.

Powers, Ann. "The Love You Make: Fans and Groupies." In Trouble Girls: The Rolling Stone Book of Women in Rock, ed. Barbara O'Diar. New York: Random House, 1997.

Grunge Rock

Emerging in mainstream American culture in the early 1990s, grunge rock was a subgenre of alternative rock marked by loud, sludgy guitar riffs, anguished vocals, and the rejection of onstage theatrics. Pioneered by Seattle-area bands such as Nirvana and Pearl Jam, grunge rock quickly became associated with Generation X (Americans born between the early 1960s and the early 1980s), whose general apathy toward life was said to mirror the themes of confusion, anger, and loss of purpose prevalent in grunge music. Grunge also inspired a look of its own, which included long hair, torn jeans, and flannel jackets.

The roots of grunge go back to the mid-1980s, when the band Green River debuted in Seattle. Although that group was short lived, its members went on to prominence in later grunge bands of note: singer Mark Arm formed Mudhoney, and other members formed Mother Love Bone, which became Pearl Jam after its singer suffered a drug overdose and was replaced by Eddie Vedder in 1990. Reflecting the incestuous nature of the grunge scene, Vedder also sang for Temple of the Dog, a side project involving members of Soundgarden, another seminal group from Seattle.

The bands that would come to be labeled “grunge” actually pursued disparate musical agendas. Mudhoney extolled the virtues of 1960s garage rock; Soundgarden displayed an obvious Led Zeppelin influence; Pearl Jam evoked arena rock in its anthemic choruses; and Alice in Chains owed much to heavy metal. One young band in the late 1980s, Nirvana, brought the noise-inflected influences of indie rock groups such as Scratch Acid and the Butthole Surfers to the Seattle scene.

Nirvana would be the catalyst of grunge rock’s ascension from local scene to national phenomenon, though that transition was well under way by the time the group’s 1991 Nevermind album topped the charts. Seattle record label Sub Pop had worked hard in the late 1980s to create a unifying aesthetic for its bands, which included several of those already mentioned (including Nirvana, Soundgarden, and Mudhoney), as well as Tad, the Screaming Tress, and others. Staff photographer Charles Peterson’s album shots created intense portraits of long-haired Sub Pop bands playing small shows, emphasizing their intimate connection to audiences. British press support for Mudhoney created a sensation in 1989, and Soundgarden signed with a major label, A&M, that year. But it was the release of the multiplatinum Nevermind, quickly followed by Pearl Jam’s Ten, that heralded in the era of grunge rock. The hair metal bands of the 1980s, such as Poison and Mötley Crüe, who sang of the thrills of life in the fast lane, suddenly found themselves superseded by groups singing angst-ridden tales of broken homes, drug addiction, and self-loathing.

While a Sub Pop press release had used the word grunge as early as 1986, it became a catchphrase only after reporters latched onto it in 1991 to describe the burgeoning music scene in Seattle. Recognition came swiftly on various fronts, such as Cameron Crowe’s reverent 1992 film Singles, set in the Seattle grunge scene. But controversy also followed the term, as few musicians willingly accepted the label, and the façade of community was abandoned when Nirvana's Kurt Cobain made disparaging comments about Vedder in interviews.

Another controversy concerned a perceived corporate co-optation: Once major labels had signed all the major grunge bands (even the iconoclastic Nirvana was on Geffen Records), a frenzy of signings ensued. Some bands received contracts simply for coming from Seattle, such as the critically reviled Candlebox, while others were quickly merchandised as grunge, despite their lack of substantive affinities to the key bands. Still others offered imitation, such as Pearl Jam—soundalikes the Stone Temple Pilots.

The Seattle-based rock band Nirvana—front to rear: lead singer Kurt Cobain, drummer Dave Grohl, and bassist Krist Novoselic—elevated grunge to a national phenomenon. Cobain, who died of a self-inflicted shotgun wound in 1994, became an icon of Generation X. (Steve Pyke/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

A backlash was inevitable, and the very artificiality of the “grunge rock” label allowed most bands to distance themselves from it. Cobain’s 1994 suicide signaled the passing of an era. Within a decade, most of the grunge bands had either broken up or fallen in stature. The long-term significance of grunge rock is likely to be its role in alerting major labels to the commercial viability of underground, independent, or alternative rock, rather than any lasting influence of its own.

Whitney Strub

See also: Seattle, Washington.

Further Reading

Azerrad, Michael. Our Band Could Be Your Life: Scenes from the American Indie Underground, 1981–1991. Boston: Little, Brown, 2001.

Cross, Charles. Heavier Than Heaven: A Biography of Kurt Cobain. New York: Hyperion, 2001.

Guerrilla Girls

The Guerrilla Girls is a group of anonymous artists, writers, and critics who call themselves the “conscience of the art world.” Beginning in 1985, the feminist group targeted gender and racial discrimination in the art world through pointed, yet humorous, poster campaigns. Although they are best known for their New York–centered art posters, the Guerrilla Girls have addressed a host of cultural and political subjects, from gay rights to the 1991 Persian Gulf War, and they have lectured and performed the world over.

The Guerrilla Girls defy art-world conventions through their anonymous group identity. They wear gorilla masks at all public appearances, a humorous tribute to their “guerrilla art” tactics, and the individuals involved have never publicly identified themselves. Their anonymity provides a strong collective identity that circumvents the art world’s typical focus on the individual, while also protecting the careers of the Guerrilla Girls from potential backlash. To distinguish among the group members, each has taken on the name of a dead female artist or writer. Their pseudonyms, such as Frida Kahlo, Romaine Brooks, Gertrude Stein, and Georgia O’Keeffe, thus draw attention to female predecessors.

From their inception, the Guerrilla Girls have positioned themselves as countercultural activists. They use humor as a subversive tool, imparting serious messages in a tongue-in-cheek style. Their actions and choice of medium pose alternatives to the artistic mainstream. Turning to posters as a way to disseminate their messages to the widest audience, the Guerrilla Girls intentionally chose a lowbrow medium during the heyday of painting in the 1980s. In keeping with their name, they have employed “guerrilla” tactics in the distribution of the posters, plastering them in public spaces during the dead of night. Their messages, too, have been provocative in their critiques of mainstream culture.

Early posters addressed the issue of gender discrimination in the art world by noting which New York galleries had shown the work of women artists less than 10 percent of the time or not at all. Perhaps their most famous poster, from 1989, posed the question, “Do women have to be naked to get into the Metropolitan Museum?” It went on to note, “Less than 5 percent of the artists in the Modern Art Sections are women, but 85 percent of the nudes are female.” While imparting a serious message, the poster also featured a parody of Jean-Auguste-

Dominique Ingres's 1842 painting Odalisque, showing a nude, reclining woman seen from behind—now wearing a gorilla mask.

Art collectors, too, have been targets. A poster from 1989 asked, "When racism and sexism are no longer fashionable, what will your art collection be worth?"

Although the Guerrilla Girls have continued to combat racial and gender marginalization in the art world, since the early 1990s they have also expanded their field of vision. They have issued posters opposing war, decrying the treatment of the homeless, supporting abortion rights, and bringing attention to violence against women and sexual harassment in the workplace. The Guerrilla Girls disseminate their cultural criticism through posters, books, and worldwide lectures, workshops, and performances.

While they continue to position themselves as a critical voice from the outside, the Guerrilla Girls have simultaneously entered the mainstream. Their posters appear in art history textbooks and are collected internationally by art museums. The Guerrilla Girls have also published five books: Confessions of the Guerrilla Girls (1995), The Guerrilla Girls Bedside Companion to the History of Western Art (1998), Bitches, Bimbos and Ballbreakers: The Guerrilla Girls Guide to Female Stereotypes (2003), The Guerrilla Girls Art Museum Activity Book (2005), and The Hysterical Herstory of Hysteria and How It Was Cured From Ancient Times Until Now (2010).

Rachel Epp Buller

Further Reading

"An Interview with the Guerrilla Girls," Utne Reader, May-June 1998.

Guerrilla Girls. Confessions of the Guerrilla Girls. With an essay by Whitney Chadwick. New York: HarperPerennial, 1995.

Guerrilla Girls. The Guerrilla Girls' Bedside Companion to the History of Western Art. New York: Penguin, 1998.

Guerrilla Theater

The term guerrilla theater (also referred to as street theater) is attributed to counterculture actor and playwright Peter Berg and was codified in R.G. Davis's manifesto for the San Francisco Mime Troupe (SFMT) in May 1965. Borrowing from the image and tactics of the Latin American rebel fighter Che Guevara and sharing beliefs with the contemporaneous Free Speech Movement in Berkeley, California, Davis envisioned guerrilla theater as a nonviolent cultural insurrection aimed at fundamentally altering a morally bankrupt postwar America.

In his essay "Staging the Revolution: Guerrilla Theater as a Countercultural Practice, 1965–1968," Michael William Doyle traces guerrilla theater's stages of evolution, which began in the parks of San Francisco, moved to the streets of that city's Haight-Ashbury district and then to the media spectacles at the New York Stock Exchange and the Pentagon, and culminated at the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Mayor Richard Daley's notoriously ironfisted Chicago. Davis—a mime who had founded the SFMT in 1959—initiated guerrilla theater in 1961, when he became acquainted with Saul Landau and Nina Serrano, founders of the journal Studies on the Left. Landau and Serrano collaborated on several early performances and were instrumental in helping to define guerrilla theater's tripartite objective: to teach people, to change people, and to embody change for people.

With SFMT, Davis revived and elaborated the commedia dell'arte style of public theatrical performance that flourished in Italy in the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries. In May 1962, Davis and SFMT initiated their first commedia dell'arte performance, The Dowry. They performed it for free in a San Francisco park, as they would do with future works. Also following the approach of modernist German playwright and poet Bertolt Brecht, The Dowry and plays such as The Minstrel Show, or Civil Rights in a Cracker Barrel were a highly controversial and provocative means of engaging audiences in social critique. Such performances quickly attracted notoriety, especially among other members of the burgeoning cultural revolution.

The Haight-Ashbury Diggers, a splinter group of SFMT, formed in 1966 to begin the "Free City" experiment and a new stage in the evolution of guerrilla theater. Among the twenty or so members of SFMT who left to form the Diggers were actor Peter Coyote and Peter Berg. The Diggers took Davis's guerrilla theater to the streets of San Francisco, where it acquired a character of insurgency, spontaneity, and what is now called "culture jamming."

Performed irregularly and often improvised, productions aspired to Russian philosopher Mikhail Bakhtin's concept of the carnivalesque—dissolving the boundaries between actors and audience, stage and hall, real and make-believe, male and female, black and white, and past, present, and future. They were fluid irruptions of theatrical performance critically aimed at their sociopolitical enemies. A guiding tenet was that one must enact the future, not just imagine it.

In its third stage, the guerrilla theater movement spread across the country through underground newspapers and networks of student groups. It was taken up in New York City by such counterculture groups as the Youth International Party (yippies) and the East Side Service Organization (ESSO). Yippie founders Jerry Rubin and Abbie Hoffman adopted the methods of the Haight-Ashbury Diggers, even calling themselves the New York Diggers for a time. But they added a new element: the media. They viewed the media as an easily manipulated propaganda arm for turning the nation's youth on to the cultural revolution. Hoffman's attempt to levitate the Pentagon and the New York Stock Exchange stunt—where members of ESSO and the New York Diggers infiltrated a tour of the exchange and scattered dollar bills from the balcony, causing a frenzy on the floor—were perfectly suited to the mass media's spectacle-oriented news programming. By staging spectacles designed for consumption by mainstream Americans, guerrilla theater became the means through which protest movements transmitted their messages to an eager media.

In 1967, Hoffman and Rubin established the yippies, in part to address the ideological differences between West and East Coast Diggers. The San Francisco Diggers wanted the New Yorkers to dissociate themselves from the group. They felt that rather than breaking down the barriers between actors and audience, Rubin and Hoffman reinforced spectatorship through their use of the media. The goal of the yippies, much broader in scope than that of the Diggers, was to publicize the revolution and bring members of the various counterculture movements together. This would culminate in the Festival of Life in Chicago during the 1968 Democratic National Convention. It was designed to be a vast, theatrical, guerrilla event in Grant Park, where thousands of youth were to converge in protest against the war in Vietnam, poverty, and racism, for the world to witness on television.

A sibling of guerrilla theater, which shares its subversive history, is radical puppetry, such as that practiced by Bread & Puppet Theater, beginning in 1963 in New York. Radical puppetry is descended from the Italian opera dei pupi, whose characters can be traced back to the "masked" stock characters of commedia dell'arte. Both radical puppetry and guerrilla theater have become mainstays of contemporary protest strategies and theatrical troupes around the country. The environmental organization Greenpeace, for example, adopted guerrilla-theater strategies as early as 1971 to publicize its agenda.

At the turn of the millennium, a number of local guerrilla theater troupes were performing in the United States. Street theater has become standard practice at demonstrations and rallies, especially with the use of puppets, in what are often called "direct action" campaigns. Groups such as Art and Revolution, Billboard Liberation Front, the Cacophony Society, and Adbusters use guerrilla theater tactics as a primary mode of expression and critique. Guerrilla theatrics have even become common in television advertising, as in the "truth" campaign to publicize the practices of tobacco companies.

See also: Free Speech Movement: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco; Hoffman, Abbie; Rubin, Jerry; San Francisco, California; Yippies.

Further Reading

Braunstein, Peter, and Michael William Doyle. Imagine Nation: The American Counterculture of the 1960s and '70s. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Farber, David. Chicago'68. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.

Guthrie, Woody (1912–1967)

Folk singer-songwriter Woody Guthrie is perhaps the best-known cultural icon of the Old Left in American society. In a life filled with instability and personal struggle, Guthrie dedicated his entire folk music career to labor politics, social justice, and the propagation of leftist political values. For much of his life, he was a traveling musician, playing to migrant laborers, unionists, hoboes, and other working-class audiences across the country. Woody's son Arlo carried on his musical legacy to the next generation of the American counterculture, helping bridge the gap between the class-conscious Old Left and the student-led New Left of the 1960s. The music and life of Woody Guthrie also inspired such up-and-coming performers as Bob Dylan and the great folk revival of the 1950s and 1960s.

Woodrow Wilson Guthrie was born on July 14, 1912, in Okemah, Oklahoma. After the onset of the Great Depression when he was still a teenager, Guthrie began a life of “rambling.” From Oklahoma, he found his way to Pampa, Texas, where he fell in love with and married Mary Jennings in 1933; they had three children.

When the Dust Bowl storms devastated the area, Woody, like many of his generation, took to the road to try and find a way to support his family. Heading toward California, he hitched rides on the roads and railways in search of work and adventure. The themes of economic hardship, simple needs, travel, free living, and social justice came to dominate Guthrie's music, politics, and vision of America.

After collecting and playing songs as a wandering folk minstrel, Guthrie began his formal music career in Los Angeles during the late 1930s. He made a name for himself there in radio broadcasts of hillbilly and folk music with singer Maxine “Lefty Lou” Crissman. In 1940, Guthrie moved to New York City, where he met folk-industry icons Alan Lomax and Moses Asch. Guthrie and Lomax, a music historian, recorded three hours of music and conversation for the Library of Congress, and Guthrie recorded his first commercial album, Dust Bowl Ballads, later that year. Also during this time, Guthrie wrote what would become his most famous song, “This Land Is Your Land,” which he recorded with Lomax and Asch in 1944.

In New York and elsewhere, Guthrie developed a close relationship with members of the Communist Party USA (CPUSA). He and his fellow musicians also performed songs of protest and activism as part of a loosely knit group they called the Almanac Singers. Guthrie became notorious for his leftist politics, brandishing the slogan “This Machine Kills Fascists” on his guitar during World War II and writing a column called “Woody Sez” for the CPUSA's daily newspaper, the People's Daily World.

During this time, Guthrie met his great friend and fellow folk singer, Pete Seeger. Guthrie toured and recorded with Seeger and the Almanac Singers throughout the 1940s. Guthrie and his comrades wrote catchy “people’s songs” to politicize, educate, entertain, and inspire the morale of the New Deal and World War II generations. The Almanac Singers proved integral in shifting the focus of American communism from proletarian revolution to broader initiatives, often performing at factories and union meetings.

In 1941, Guthrie moved with his family to Portland, Oregon, where he provided music for a film documentary. After this project, the Guthries moved back to Texas, and Woody left again to hitchhike back to New York. He was busy traveling, performing, writing, and increasingly involved in radical politics, and, by early 1943, his marriage ended. In 1945, he married a young dancer, Marjorie Mazia; they had four children, including son Arlo.

During the war, inspired by his opposition to fascism, Guthrie served in the U.S. military and continued to write songs. His postwar life was plagued by loss and turmoil. By 1952, he had lost his four-year-old daughter Cathy Anne in a fire and had split up with his wife (he later was remarried to Anneke Van Kirk). He was diagnosed with Huntington’s disease, the degenerative neurological disorder that had caused the death of his mother. And he came under political attack by the rabidly anticommunist senator Joseph McCarthy.

Despite his personal circumstances, throughout the late 1940s and early 1950s, Guthrie continued to write protest songs such as “1913 Massacre” about a miners’ strike in Calumet, Michigan, and “Deportee” about a plane of Mexican farmworkers that crashed on its way from Oakland to the El Centro, California, Deportation Center.

Finally unable to control his muscle movements due to progression of Huntington’s, he was permanently institutionalized. During his institutionalization, a number of folk musicians kept in contact with Guthrie, offering moral support and keeping his music alive. Seeger and Dylan visited often, and they used his protest songs to arouse and embolden political progressives.

Guthrie’s music also helped inspire people involved in the Newport Folk Festival, the civil rights movement, and Vietnam War protests. His songs, many of which were popularized by the 1950s folk group the Weavers, were recorded by virtually every major folk musician and ensemble for decades to come, and by many mainstream performers as well. “This Land Is Your Land” was and is sung in schools, summer groups, and other youth venues throughout the United States. In 1968, presidential candidate Bobby Kennedy proposed making it the national anthem.

By the time of his death, on October 3, 1967, Guthrie had been transformed from an unknown hobo into a cultural icon. His 1943 autobiography, Bound for Glory, was adapted for film in 1976, and stars David Carradine as the rambling Dust Bowl folk singer. In 1998, Mermaid Avenue, a new collection of Guthrie songs, unveiled lyrics he wrote in the late 1940s and early 1950s, with music composed and performed by British singer-songwriter Billy Bragg and the American country-rock band Wilco.

Joel A. Lewis

Further Reading

Cray, Ed. Ramblin’ Man: The Life and Times of Woody Guthrie. New York: W.W. Norton, 2004.

Guthrie, Woody. Bound for Glory. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1943.

Klein, Joe. Woody Guthrie: A Life. New York: Random House, 1980.

Santelli, Robert, and Emily Davidson. Hard Travelin’: The Life and Legacy of Woody Guthrie. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1999.

Hackers

A hacker is a computer expert who uses his or her knowledge to destroy or obstruct software, hardware, or online operations for personal enjoyment or gain. Sometimes called “crackers” by other computer virtuosos, these criminals are often very bright but alienated young men. Drawn by the challenge of defeating the security measures taken to protect computer systems, hackers derive pleasure from making sure their successes are known. While some may carry out harmless pranks, an increasing number trumpet their successes through the destruction of data, denial of service, or theft of information for personal gain.

The mainstream media and general public regard hackers as criminals who present a danger to a smoothly functioning society. Hackers may spread viruses to other computers, use spyware to obtain sensitive information, or attack popular Web sites and impede online business. Both federal and state governments have enacted statutes to make hacking a crime with varying degrees of punishment.

Early Hackers

Hackers trace their roots to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) in Cambridge in the late 1950s, when selected computer science students were allowed to work with campus mainframes to explore ways of improving the software. They borrowed the term hacking from model-railroad hobbying, where it refers to the modification of switches and controls to make the trains run faster or on different paths than expected. The original computer hackers did similar things with software, finding new ways of performing operations and shortcuts to make software perform beyond the capabilities of the original design. Many of the early hackers joined the staff at MIT and other universities, where they improved upon existing software and wrote new software. They were driven to solve complex technological problems and share their accomplishments with others.

The development of a darker hacker subculture dates to 1971, when “phreaking” became a fad among many young men. The word is a combination of phone, freak, and free. According to urban legend, a blind San Francisco boy named Joe Engressia with perfect pitch happened to whistle a 2,600-hertz tone into the phone while talking to his grandmother. The signal disconnected his grandmother, but did not hang up the phone. The boy was then able to dial another number and get connected without being charged.

Engressia told his friend John Draper about the experience. Draper, a member of the San Francisco counterculture, learned that a toy whistle being given away in Cap'n Crunch cereal boxes could emit a tone of the same frequency. He soon perfected the technique and shared it with other members of the counterculture. Word quickly spread, thanks largely to yippie cofounder Abbie Hoffman, who published the information in his underground counterculture newsletter, Youth International Party Line. Draper became known by the nickname “Captain Crunch,” and using the whistle to make free calls became a way of rebelling against the establishment.

As telephone-company fraud spread among the subculture of phreakers, many became interested in other ways technology could be used to tweak big business. Most phreakers adopted code names. Members of a West Coast group of phreakers calling themselves the Homebrew Computer Club devised something they called the “blue box,” which could use different signals to manipulate the telephone company’s computers and make calls for free. Two of the creators of the blue box were Berkeley Blue (Steve Jobs) and Oak Toebark (Steve Wozniak), who would go on to found Apple Computer in 1976. Meanwhile, in 1971, Esquire magazine published an article titled “Secrets of the Little Blue Box” that provided instructions to make the blue box.

The late 1970s saw the development of a national computer network called ARPANET (the precursors of the Internet), which initially connected computers at the U.S. Department of Defense, universities, and selected businesses. Hackers, who were among the first to get personal computers (PCs) before they became available and affordable to the mass market, used their PCs to break into computers linked to ARPANET through telephone lines, with the goal of breaching security measures and gaining access to information on other systems.

It also was at this time that the term hacker came to be used among practitioners. Reflecting the original meaning at MIT, hackers used their PCs to break into more powerful mainframes.

During the early 1980s, the first bulletin board systems (BBSes, or online message centers accessible only to members) appeared. Hackers had their own BBSes and restricted access to members of designated groups, such as the Legion of Doom and the Chaos Computer Club. BBSes allowed hackers to share secrets and boast of their exploits. In 1984, one of the first electronic newsletters devoted to hacking, 2600: The Hacker Quarterly, appeared.

Mainstream society became conscious of hackers and the hacking subculture in 1983 with the release of the feature film WarGames. Starring Matthew Broderick as a high school computer genius, the movie depicts him breaking into the school computer and changing grades, as well as getting free airline tickets and phone calls. He also breaks into a Department of Defense computer and nearly causes nuclear war. The movie captures many aspects of the hacker subculture, including the attention on gaming.

Hacking activity gained increasing attention from the media, and public pressure forced the federal government to begin considering criminal penalties for intentional breaches of computer security. The first prosecutions were based on existing federal and state laws, such as those against trespassing. In 1981, Pat Riddle (code name Captain Zap) became the first hacker to be prosecuted, for breaking into Department of Defense computers. Because the federal criminal codes had no specific provisions against computer hacking, Riddle got off lightly.

In 1986, Congress passed the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, which prescribed penalties for unauthorized access to financial information or information in federal government computers, the transmission of programs that could damage another computer or network, and interstate trafficking of passwords. Because the legislation did not cover juveniles, however, many hackers could not be prosecuted.

Further Crackdown

In the late 1980s, a new type of hacker appeared. Instead of simply breaking into a system for the purposes of personal pleasure or observation, the new breed of hackers began to take or destroy information for their own profit or enjoyment.

In 1987, the first computer virus appeared at the University of Delaware. Known as the "Brain Virus," it infected floppy disks and was intended to deter unauthorized copying of programs. A year later, Robert Morris, Jr., the son of a researcher at the National Computer Security Center in Washington, D.C., created a virus that shut down ARPANET for weeks.

Realization of the harm viruses could do caused federal and state governments to crack down harder on hackers. On January 18, 1990, the U.S. Secret Service and law enforcement agencies from Arizona and Chicago launched Operation Sundevil, an attempt to round up computer hackers for alleged illegal activities. Many known computer hackers were targeted, especially members of the Legion of Doom, as well as individuals suspected of credit card fraud and theft of telephone services.

Despite the efforts of law enforcement, hackers continued to break into computer systems. As Internet commerce grew, companies such as Amazon, eBay, and Yahoo! suffered attacks that brought their systems to a halt. Every attempt to strengthen online security just presented a new break-in challenge to hackers. When the 1995 film Hackers took a less than favorable attitude toward computer break-in specialists, hackers responded by attacking the movie's Web site.

The hacker community today remains an underground subculture. A tradition of secrecy, nicknames, and fear of law enforcement makes members reluctant to reveal their true identities. It has been estimated that more than 1,000 so-called true hackers (experts on computer systems) are active as of the early 2000s, and that many thousands of others use existing software to commit cybercrimes. The annual damage they do has been estimated at between $800 million and $1.5 billion, though a definitive figure remains elusive.

Tim J. Watts

See also: Internet.

Further Reading

Mitnick, Kevin D. The Art of Intrusion: The Real Stories Behind the Exploits of Hackers, Intruders and Deceivers. Indianapolis, IN: Wiley, 2005.

Platt, Charles. Anarchy Online. New York: HarperPrism, 1997.

Thomas, Douglas. Hacker Culture. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2002.

Wark, McKenzie. A Hacker Manifesto. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco

The Haight-Ashbury district of San Francisco, commonly known as “the Haight,” was named after the intersection of Haight and Ashbury Streets. The neighborhood, located in the western part of the city near Golden Gate Park, gained international recognition as the center of the hippie movement in the mid-1960s.

The Haight became a haven for the youth counterculture, including illegal drug use and the rock and roll lifestyle, beginning in about 1965. Groups such as the Diggers—a loosely organized community group with anarchist leanings that staged street plays, political art shows, and free concerts—helped sustain the community and its wayward youth, many of them teen runaways, who arrived from all over the country. The Diggers, who operated from 1966 to 1968, ran stores and free programs that provided food, medical care, transportation, and housing. The Ashbury Free Clinic opened in June 1967 to help alleviate the public health problems associated with drug use and life in the streets and park.

Local businesses catering to the Haight’s psychedelic counterculture, such as the Blue Unicorn Coffee House, the first coffeehouse in the neighborhood, began operating. One especially popular hangout was the Psychedelic Shop, which opened in January 1966 and is considered the granddaddy of “head shops” for being the first to openly sell drug paraphernalia and other products to the youth counterculture, such as black lights and incense.

The birth of psychedelic culture in America is often traced to another event in Haight-Ashbury in January 1966, the so-called Trips Festival. San Francisco’s first major psychedelic “happening,” the three-day event attracted 10,000 people and featured local rock bands such as the Grateful Dead and Big Brother and the Holding Company (with lead singer Janis Joplin), punch spiked with the psychedelic drug LSD, and the first major light show of the era. In the aftermath of that event, the music of the Grateful Dead became identified as “acid rock,” because it was meant to be enjoyed while under the influence of LSD.

San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury district, named for the streets that intersect at its center, was the heart of the 1967 Summer of Love and the hippie movement. (Michael Ochs Archives/Stringer/Getty Images)

Media attention surrounding the Trips Festival brought young people flocking to Haight-Ashbury. By June 1966, an estimated 15,000 hippies were believed to be living in the neighborhood, a movement that led to larger and larger public events. A massive gathering called the Love Pageant Rally was held on October 6, 1966, in Golden Gate Park to decry the fact that LSD had been made illegal and to show middle-class, mainstream America that those who took it were not criminals or bad people but free-thinking individuals seeking creative and artistic expression. To prove their point, free LSD was distributed, while again the Grateful Dead and Big Brother and the Holding Company played for free.

The Love Pageant Rally brought even more publicity to the Haight-Ashbury district and to the youth movement in general. One of the largest subsequent events was the Gathering of the Tribes for a Human Be-In, held in the Haight and Golden Gate Park in January 1967. The outdoor event, which attracted more than 20,000 hippies, hucksters, tourists, media representatives, and others, featured speeches by psychologist and LSD advocate Timothy Leary, poet Allen Ginsberg, and comedian Dick Gregory, and music by popular San Francisco rock bands. The main philosophy of the Human Be-In was that of the hippie counterculture itself: encouraging people to question authority and to reject middle-class morals and values.

The Human Be-In also was the event that introduced Leary's famous phrase, “Turn on, tune in, drop out” and brought the word psychedelic to middle-class America. The event attracted national media attention and drew hordes of young people to Haight-Ashbury. An estimated 100,000 people arrived in the neighborhood in what became known as the Summer of Love of 1967.

The frenzy of Haight-Ashbury was nourished as well by the increasing popularity of psychedelic rock, which was gaining more radio airplay. As a result, the Haight became internationally famous for the well-known psychedelic rock groups that lived and played there, including Big Brother and the Holding Company, the Dead, Jefferson Airplane, and Quicksilver Messenger Service. Collectively, their music came to be known as the “San Francisco Sound.”

The 1967 release of Scott McKenzie's recording of the song “San Francisco (Be Sure to Wear Flowers in Your Hair)” marked the apex of the San Francisco Sound and the Haight-Ashbury youth movement. The song reached number one on the European music charts and number four in the United States, and became the unofficial anthem of the Haight-Ashbury movement, earning its members the nickname “flower children” from the mainstream press.

It was at this time as well that the term hippie became widely associated with the youth counterculture movement, largely because local newspaper columnist Herb Caen began using it regularly in his column. The incessant media coverage of the Summer of Love thrust Haight-Ashbury into the public eye and national cultural consciousness. The area quickly became a popular tourist attraction, with one company offering what it called “Hippie Hop” bus tours through the neighborhood.

The media coverage also contributed to strong cultural backlash against hippies and the youth counterculture. Indeed, many of the movement’s original members were prompted to declare the “death” of the hippie in a protest parade through the Haight in 1968, staged by the Diggers.

Nevertheless, many young people who had come to the Haight before and during the Summer of Love adopted the hippie lifestyle—from the music, drugs, and clothing styles to communal living—and helped spread it across the United States and Europe, giving momentum to a broader youth counterculture movement that lasted until the early 1970s. Today, despite high rents and the presence of chain stores such as the Gap and Ben & Jerry’s, Haight-Ashbury retains its counterculture flavor with many stores, cafés, restaurants, and music clubs still having an artsy, bohemian feel.

Judith Gerber

See also: Beat Generation: Be-Ins: Flower Children: Free Love: Grateful Dead: Guerrilla Theater: Hippies: Leary, Timothy: LSD: Psychedelia: San Francisco, California.

Further Reading

Anthony, Gene. The Summer of Love: Haight-Ashbury at its Highest. San Francisco: Last Gasp, 1995.

Perry, Charles. The Haight-Ashbury: A History. New York: Random House, 2005.

Perry, George. San Francisco in the Sixties. London: Pavilion, 2002.

Hair

The two-act stage musical Hair: The American Tribal Love-Rock Musical is about a group of young men and women involved in the peace, drug, and free-love movements of the late 1960s. Hair was the first major musical about the hippie movement and general youth counterculture of the 1960s, and it would forever be associated with them.

Created by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, Hair made its debut off-Broadway in New York City in 1967. The show moved to Broadway’s Biltmore Theatre the following April and ran for more than 1,500 performances there until closing in July 1972. A production also ran in the Aquarius Theatre on Sunset Boulevard in Los Angeles, and in London at the Shaftesbury Theatre in September 1968, where it ran for nearly 2,000 performances. The Broadway cast album won a Grammy Award in 1969 for Best Musical Score. A film version of Hair, with a plot slightly different from that of the stage show, was released in 1979. Several songs from Hair, such as “Aquarius/Let the Sun Shine In” and “Good Morning, Starshine,” became famous in their own right.

The story revolves around the Tribe, a group of hippies involved in the anti-Vietnam War protests of the 1960s. One member, Claude Bukowski, has received a draft notice and is struggling to decide whether to report for conscription or continue to protest the war. By the end of the musical, Claude chooses to leave the Tribe and report for military service. Few of the songs in the show, however, are directly related to the plot, reflecting instead the opinions of the Tribe on everything from the merits of long hair and the evils of the Vietnam War to the pleasures of sex and drugs.

Hair was controversial from its debut. The act 1 finale includes a “happening” in which the entire cast, male and female, sing and dance in the nude. During the course of the show, cast members desecrate an American flag and challenge social and political conventions in other ways as well. A number of songs are sexually explicit (“Sodomy”), racially charged (“Colored Spade,” a list of derogatory racial epithets sung by a black cast member), or politically sensitive (“Three-Five-Zero-Zero,” which describes the horrors of the Vietnam War). But not all of the show’s lyrics are intended to shock. Act 2 includes a song titled “What a Piece of Work Is Man,” with lyrics from a soliloquy in William Shakespeare’s Hamlet.

The staging of Hair prompted a number of informal protests and legal actions in the 1960s and 1970s, mainly over the show’s obscene language, onstage nudity, and flag desecration. The show was the subject of two cases that went before the U.S. Supreme Court. In May 1970, the high court overturned the ruling of a Massachusetts state court that shut down the production in Boston for alleged obscenity. And in 1975, the Supreme Court ruled that the city of Chattanooga, Tennessee, had exercised “unlawful prior restraint” in barring a performance of the show in its civic auditorium. By denying the show’s producers access to the venue, the Court held, the city had breached their right to free speech under the First Amendment. Thus, in addition to symbolizing the 1960s counterculture and paving the way for future rock musicals in the 1970s and beyond, Hair challenged public opinion and help change American law regarding theater censorship and the right to free speech.

A 2009 Broadway revival earned strong critical notices and a healthy box-office return. Although the production was praised for its “kinetic” energy and choreography, few could dispute the fact that it derived part of its appeal from pure nostalgia and that it could not replicate the impact and daring of the original Hair.

Shannon Granville

See also: Be-Ins: Hippies: Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Horn, Barbara Lee. The Age of Hair: Evolution and Impact of Broadway’s First Rock Musical. New York: Greenwood, 1991.

Wollman, Elizabeth L. The Theater Will Rock: A History of the Rock Musical from Hair to Hedwig. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2006.

Happenings

A happening is an event-based work of art that takes the form of a performance, spontaneous or orchestrated, that may include any combination of sound, light, image projection, collage, sculpture, text, and audience participation. The term is said to have been coined by American artist Allan Kaprow, who referred to it in a 1958 article, “The Legacy of Jackson Pollock,” published in the prominent journal ARTnews. From its origins as a complicated, technical concept that represented the culmination of a number of avant-garde approaches to artistic production, happening eventually was assimilated into mainstream culture as a synonym for groovy.

Before it took on these pop cultural overtones, however, Kaprow's idea of a work of art as an organic act or event—in short, something that happens—proved deeply influential for cutting-edge art created during and after the 1960s both in the United States and in other countries. With Kaprow as its main practitioner and theorist, the happening aesthetic informed a wide range of later artists, such as those associated with the transatlantic, New York-based Fluxus circle, the Japanese Gutai Group, and Viennese Actionism.

In his treatise on Pollock, penned two years after the artist's death, Kaprow identified Pollock's action painting as a key moment in the development of modern art, a clear response to early-twentieth-century surrealist innovations but also a point of departure for the younger generation of American artists. He characterized Pollock's artistic process as the product of automatic or unconscious direction; reliance upon artistic gesture as opposed to technical skill; bodily involvement within the creation of the work; entanglement of artist, spectator, and artwork; transcendence of the confines of conventional artistic format and materials; a manifestation of Zen ritual; incorporation of everyday life or "reality"; and inclusion of randomness and chance. These same qualities appeared within Kaprow's own artwork from the late 1950s onward, soon to be referred to as happenings.

The creator of a happening traverses the traditional boundaries between disciplines, drawing from a wide variety of media and sensory experiences to create event-based works of art. In a 1961 text titled "Happenings in the New York Scene," for example, Kaprow describes scenarios that took place in artists' lofts during which "a nude girl runs after a racing pool of a searchlight, throwing spinach greens into it. Slides and movies, projected over walls and people, depict hamburgers.... You come in as a spectator and maybe you discover you're caught in it after all, as you push things around like so much furniture."

High-art production generally circumscribed and segmented forms of artistic practice, relegating artists to specific categories such as "painter," "sculptor," "actor," "composer," or "writer." Makers of happenings, by contrast, are simply "artists." Their processes include any or all of these separate genres, and they generally do not adhere to the usual roles of an artist. Indeed, anyone can produce a happening at any time and in any context, the looseness of its form and content rendering obsolete the typical notion and function of the fine artist within society.

Although happenings belied strict categorization as an art form, they nonetheless displayed some common characteristics. Generally, a happening was enacted as some kind of performance, and Kaprow describes his early pieces as theatrical in nature. Kaprow orchestrated the first of these in 1957 while working as an art history instructor at Rutgers University's Douglass College (then the women's division).

This was soon followed by a "collage performance" at the farm of sculptor George Segal near New Brunswick, New Jersey. He planned a later event, 18 Happenings in 6 Parts, to coincide with the 1959 opening of the Reuben Gallery in New York City; 18 Happenings drew from the conventions of musical composition, theater, and literature. Mimicking the rigid and sparse style of his former teacher, avant-garde composer John Cage, the piece also incorporated peripheral and random noises. Parts of its text were fragments from the avant-garde works of French poets Stéphane Mallarmé and Guillaume Apollinaire.

From the outset, the format of happenings was not only interdisciplinary, but also heavily indebted to modernist theory and artistic precedent. After beginning his career as an action painter, first studying as an undergraduate at New York University and then working under the tutelage of abstract expressionist painter Hans Hofmann, Kaprow went on to obtain a master's degree at Columbia University under art historian Meyer Shapiro. As he matured as an artist, his work came to incorporate sound and light, as well as techniques associated with assemblage and environment art. Indeed he is credited with helping advance each of these other genres and with founding the performance art movement.

After testing out his ideas at Rutgers, Kaprow elected to study under Cage at the New School for Social Research in New York in 1957 and 1958. His decision to continue his education in avant-garde music and composition was based, in part, on a desire to expand the capacity of his work to accommodate "more action." Cage, in fact, encouraged Kaprow to hold some of his experiments during class. In addition to the precedent set by action painting, surrealist automatism, and Cage's music, early-twentieth-century futurist manifestos and dada chance experiments also contributed to Kaprow's understanding of the happening.

During the 1960s, the increasingly popular use of the word happening (such as "Bobby Kennedy is a happening") deflated its value as a means to describe works of art or artistic processes. Indeed, the popular Motown singing group the Supremes released a pop song called "The Happening" in 1966.

To distinguish between artistic happenings and other, mainstream uses of the term, Kaprow later delineated a seven-point definition of what constituted a happening. To further compensate for the mass dissemination of the term, artists developed other phrases through which to characterize their activities. Fluxus member Dick Higgins, for example, used the term intermedia to characterize the hybrid, interdisciplinary character of his work, as well as the breaking down of barriers between modes of cultural production, including mass media such as television. Even Kaprow preferred to describe his later work as "acts" or "events."

Colleen Becker

See also: Abstract Expressionism: Performance Art.

Further Reading

Berghaus, Günther. "Happenings in Europe in the '60s: Trends, Events, and Leading Figures." TDR 37:4 (Winter 1993) : 157–68.

Buchloh, Benjamin, and Judith F. Rodenbeck. Experiments in the Everyday: Allan Kaprow and Robert Watts—Events, Objects, Documents. New York: Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Art Gallery, Columbia University, 1999.

Higgins, Dick. "The Origin of Happening." American Speech 51:3/4 (Autumn–Winter 1976) : 268–71.

Kaprow, Allan. Essays on the Blurring of Art and Life. Ed. Jeff Kelley. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.

Hare Krishna

Hare Krishna is the popular name of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), a Hindu movement founded in the United States by A.C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada in 1966. The name, also used in reference to members ("Hare Krishnas"), derives from a chant—Hare Krishna ("O, Lord Krishna")—repeated by devotees. Swami Prabhupada, born Abhay Charan De in Calcutta, India, in 1896, migrated to the United States in 1965 to preach his philosophy of devotion to the West. Prabhupada belonged to a Hindu sect called the Gaudiya Vaishnava, which claimed a direct line of succession of disciples since the fifteenth century of Sri Krishna Chaitanya Mahaprabhu of Navadvip or Nadia in eastern India.

The Gaudiya Vaishnavas practice bhakti-yoga, or the yoga of devotion, and worship Krishna as the supreme and original deity. Krishna is known in classical Hinduism as the eighth avatar, or reincarnation, of Vishnu—Vishnu being one of the three godheads in the Hindu trinity (with Brahma and Shiva). In the Gaudiya Vaishnava sect, however, Krishna is regarded as the original, primeval form of Vishnu and, according to Prabhupada, “the source of all forms of incarnation.”

The act of chanting the names of Krishna can lead to salvation, it is believed. These chants include the one by which the group became identified: “Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna, Krishna Krishna, Hare Hare. Hare Rama, Hare Rama, Rama Rama, Hare Hare.”

Early Success

Prabhupada founded the first center of the ISKCON in 1966 in New York. Many of his early followers were hippies, who were attracted to the idea of Eastern spirituality as an antidote for Western materialism and aggression. The doctrine of love—a central element of Vaishnava bhakti-yoga—attracted and resonated with the hippie worldview of peace and free love.

The Hindu tradition is said to have been introduced to America in 1893, with the welcoming address to the Parliament of World Religions in Chicago by Swami Vivekananda, a Bengali Indian monk. Swami Vivekananda, who taught nondualist (advaita in Sanskrit) Hindu philosophy, later founded the first yoga centers and the first Hindu organization, the Vedanta Society, in the United States.

Vivekananda’s success in making Hinduism accessible to Americans inspired a wave of Hindu gurus and scholars to travel from India to the United States. Among them decades later was Prabhupada, a middle-class Bengali Indian Hindu, who likely dreamed of tracing Vivekananda’s journey to the West and repeating the success of the latter.

ISKCON has been the most significant counterculture movement in the United States that originated in India. In terms of visibility, organization, and membership, it has been far more widespread than Vivekananda’s Ramakrishna Mission or Vedanta Society.

Hinduism from the 1990s onward also has been represented in the United States by the Indian-run Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP) and its allies, which cater mostly to the nostalgic sentiments of expatriates from India. In spite of the growing visibility of traditional Hindu temples and Indian Hindu immigrants, the VHP movement has barely scratched the surface of American mainstream, posing little competition to the Hare Krishnas.

Although ISKCON’s early success was soon dampened by accusations that it is a cult—by the Citizen’s Freedom Foundation (CFF) and other bodies—it has survived the legal and extralegal attacks with resilience and organized effort.

The Movement Spreads

Prabhupada’s initial success was meteoric. As early as 1967, a temple was founded in San Francisco’s Haight-Ashbury district. Within eight years of the founding of the first center in New York, ISKCON had sixty-eight listed centers across the globe; twenty-eight of them were in the United States. The organization began a business of manufacturing and selling incense to support itself financially, which proved lucrative. Prabhupada, who believed fervently in the dissemination of religious knowledge through print, published an annotated translation of the Hindu classic Bhagavadgita, titled Bhagavad Gita as It Is, soon after his arrival in America. The book sold about 50,000 copies in the first six months of publication, and continues to be distributed by ISKCON members and volunteers throughout the United States.

Members of the Hare Krishna sect wear traditional saffron-colored robes and chant their mantra while walking through a park in 1967. The Hindu-based movement was introduced in the United States the previous year. (Vernon Merritt III/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Among Prabhupada's other significant publications is the annotated translation of the Shrimad Bhagavatam, a key Vaishnava text. During U.S. Senate hearings on cults in 1979, ISKCON spokesmen projected the scholarly nature of its founder and his publications, quoting words of praise for both by a number of Western scholars.

It was during and following this time that the ISKCON movement began merging into the Hindu mainstream and formed an alliance with the growing ranks of mainstream Hindu immigrants in the United States. With its temples, schools, and educational centers, ISKCON provided a vital service to many Indian Hindu expatriates who wanted their children to know and learn about Hinduism. In more recent years, several former students have reported physical abuse they suffered in Krishna schools and centers during the 1970s and 1980s. ISKCON has since revised its policies and launched a campaign to revive its image.

Recruitment and Rituals

As a recruiting movement, ISKCON differed greatly from the earlier groups initiated by religious leaders from India. Prabhupada had initially tried to recruit the elderly population, but soon shifted his attention to American youth, with whom he had far greater success.

The young people who became interested in ISKCON were more inclined to a liberal counterculture movement than to Prabhupada's Vaishnava philosophy per se. They were not always keen on radically changing their lifestyle, but many were willing to support the temple-based infrastructure in the early stages. Prabhupada, aware of that disposition, fine-tuned the requirements for membership. As a result, recruitment grew dramatically, through encounters in public places as well as social networks. Men and women wearing salmon-colored saris became common sights on university campuses, in airports, and on street corners almost anywhere, selling incense and books on Indian philosophy by Prabhupada, eager to speak to anyone willing to listen and invite them to a nearby ISKCON temple.

As of 2009, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness claimed 10,000 temple devotees and 250,000 congregational devotees. The Hare Krishna movement, it maintained, comprised 400 centers, 60 rural communities, 50 schools, and 90 restaurants worldwide.

Rini Bhattacharya Mehta

See also: Cults: Hippies.

Further Reading

Bromley, David G., and Larry D. Shinn, eds. Krishna Consciousness in the West. Cranbury, NJ: Associated University Presses, 1989.

International Society for Krishna Consciousness. <http://www.iskcon.com>

Judah, J. Stillson. Hare Krishna and the Counterculture. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1974.

Harlem Renaissance

The Harlem Renaissance was a flourishing of literature, music, and visual art by African Americans in and around New York City from roughly 1920 until 1939. Although the term itself is largely a misnomer—much of the art associated with the Harlem Renaissance was produced by those living and working outside the boundaries of that Upper Manhattan neighborhood—Harlem became a cultural hotbed during the second and third decades of the twentieth century.

By 1920, most of New York City's African American population resided in Harlem. Such notable figures as the civil rights activist and scholar W.E.B. Du Bois, novelist and editor Jessie Redmon Fauset, author and reformer James Weldon Johnson, poet and writer Langston Hughes, and novelist and folklorist Zora Neale Hurston each lived for at least some time in what Johnson referred to as “Black Manhattan.”

The Arts as Cultural Nationalism

Although the background and motivation of each participant in the Harlem Renaissance differed, several leaders of the movement conceptualized their activities in explicitly political terms. By the 1920s, Jim Crow practices foreclosed most traditional political avenues to African Americans, and Du Bois and Johnson, in seeking to attain full equality for black Americans, believed that art could play a critical role in their uplift efforts.

In the early decades of the twentieth century, a number of key African American social organizations were formed, several of which had official publications that featured the essays, poems, fiction, and painting of African American artists. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), which directed much of its efforts toward exposing and ending racial violence, was led for many years by Du Bois.

The Crisis, the organ of the NAACP, was guided by Du Bois and literary editor Fauset, who helped “discover” such black writers as Hughes and Jean Toomer. In addition to its often scathing political commentary, The Crisis included drawings and paintings by visual artists such as Laura Wheeler Waring and Vivian Schulyer. In short, every aspect of The Crisis—from its cover to its content—was designed to positively shape conversations about race in the United States. Other important publications of the movement included Opportunity, first published in 1923 by the National Urban League; The Messenger, a radical leftist magazine edited by socialists Asa Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen; and Negro World, the weekly newspaper of Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association.

While these journals were essential to introducing America to a new generation of black artists, they also were critical in supporting and publicizing African American artists beyond the pages of their periodicals. Both The Crisis and Opportunity offered yearly contests for the best African American writing and art; organizations such as the Harmon Foundation gave monetary awards to black painters, sculptors, scientists, inventors, and educators. In March 1925, Survey Graphic published a special issue titled “Harlem: Mecca for the New Negro,” which contained articles about Negro life by sociologist Charles Johnson (the editor of Opportunity), Elise Johnson McDougald, Kelly Miller, and Walter Francis White; fiction and poetry by Langston Hughes, Rudolph Fisher, and Countee Cullen; and visual art by Winold Reiss. Alain Locke’s introductory essay, “The New Negro,” became the basis for an anthology with the same title published later that year, wherein Locke reasserted the centrality of art and cultural heritage in the drive for democracy in the United States.

The New Negro (1925) was just one of several important collections that appeared in the 1920s (others included The Book of American Negro Poetry, 1922, and Ebony and Topaz, 1927), and by the mid-1920s, more and more African American authors were producing works with major publishing houses. The proliferation gave readers a more varied portrait of African American life than they had ever witnessed.

While Fauset’s novels There Is Confusion (1924) and Plum Bun (1929) focus on the “respectable” middle-class lives of educated African Americans, Claude McKay’s best-seller Home to Harlem (1928) and Fisher’s The Walls of Jericho (1928) do not shy away from issues of sex, crime, and drugs. Although the latter two novels are set primarily in Harlem, other writers concentrated on life outside New York City. Toomer’s Cane (1923), considered one of the first and most experimental Harlem Renaissance texts, contrasts the “folk” life of the American South with that of urban locales such as Washington, D.C., and Chicago. Hurston’s Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937) follows the life of Janie Crawford as she moves around the state of Florida. Eric Walrond’s stories collected in Tropic Death (1926) are set in the Caribbean, and McKay’s Banjo: A Story without a Plot (1929) unfolds in Marseilles, France.

In addition to depicting different geographies, younger African American writers continued to address a range of social issues. Wallace Thurman’s The Blacker the Berry: A Novel of Negro Life (1929) examines the problem of colorism in African American culture, and Nella Larsen’s Passing (1929) and George S. Schulyer’s Black No More (1931) each analyze the arbitrary nature of the color line in American culture. And although many Harlem Renaissance novels, poems, and paintings have homoerotic subjects and subtexts, the poet and visual artist Bruce Nugent was one of the first African American artists to be openly homosexual and to write explicitly about same-sex desire.

The Renaissance

Despite the fact that Du Bois and others of the “older guard” aimed for African Americans to be fully and fairly incorporated into American political and social life, there is much about the Harlem Renaissance that appropriately can be considered counterculture. On the one hand, African American artists and writers were at the absolute cutting edge of modernist art. In terms of both aesthetics and content, black men and women were experimenting with dialect, jazz forms, and “primitivism,” along with European traditions, to depict life in their communities.

For example, painter Aaron Douglas, perhaps best known for the many book covers he designed for Harlem Renaissance texts, sought to connect contemporary African American culture with a spiritual Africa. His murals often layer symbols of contemporary black life (jazz instruments and city buildings) on top of symbols from African landscapes, including pyramids, tropical plants, and such. In most instances, the people in Douglas’s paintings mediate the contemporary and the historical: They are silhouettes, with no color distinction to divide them, and it is not unusual for his subjects to be dressed in traditional African or Egyptian clothing while holding a saxophone or banjo.

Some critics during and after the Harlem Renaissance argued that such primitivism (also evident in the writings of Claude McKay, Helene Johnson, and Langston Hughes) only promoted easy stereotypes of African Americans. Others, such as Alain Locke, insisted that Africa could be a site of authenticity and cultural history, which any emergent racial or social group needs in order to build a strong future.

No matter that some African Americans were introduced to African art via European cubists. This primitivism (a term also sometimes used in connection with the celebration of folk cultures of the American South) had a tremendous impact on the art and music of both Europe and white America.

For example, Negro spirituals (or “sorrow songs”)—which James Weldon Johnson described as “songs voicing all of the cardinal virtues of Christianity... through a necessarily modified form of primitive African music”—gained widespread attention during the 1920s. Building on the successes of the Fisk Jubilee Singers on nationwide tours, performers Roland Hayes and Paul Robeson often are credited with increasing the commercial popularity of spirituals.

Although the Harlem Renaissance often is remembered in terms of the literature that the era produced, the 1920s also signaled an increased awareness of two developing genres of music: jazz and blues. Jazz, which developed out of ragtime, was remarkably innovative and gave musicians such as Louis Armstrong and Duke Ellington the opportunity to become some of the first African American celebrities. Black Swan Phonograph Corporation, a “race” recording label that featured black musicians, was founded in 1921, and the company’s first hits were Ethel Waters’s “Down Home Blues” and “Oh Daddy.” And while neither jazz nor blues began in New York City, both forms gained popularity in Manhattan’s nightclubs and saloons.

Notably, much of the Harlem Renaissance unfolded during Prohibition, the nationwide ban on alcohol sales that lasted from 1919 until 1933. As in most major American cities, illegal bars and speakeasies sprouted up everywhere; Harlem, in particular, became an enormously busy locale for the trade of liquor. According to most popular estimates, there were at least 100 drinking establishments that operated in Harlem alone, not even taking into account the ubiquitous “rent” parties that tenants threw in order to pay their bills.

Harlem’s nightlife culture was radical for the simple fact that African Americans and whites often interacted on more equal terms than they would have at other times and in other areas of the city. White interest in Harlem exploded with the publication of the special issue of Survey Graphic as well as Carl Van Vechten’s Nigger Heaven (1926), a best seller that played up the more scandalous aspects of Harlem’s cabaret scene. As one of George

Schuyler's characters in his 1931 novel Black No More notes, the nightclubs were, in a sense, "democratic": whites and blacks frequented "black and tans" (clubs that allowed both African American and white patrons), where people of various backgrounds mingled and danced with one another. Increasingly, African Americans were afforded opportunities to perform in theatrical productions that allowed them to move beyond the limiting minstrel roles that continued to confine many black actors. Shuffle Along, a Broadway show whose cast included Florence Mills and Josephine Baker, became a tremendous success in 1921, and each year of the remaining decade produced at least one hit show featuring African Americans.

Yet for all of this advancement and interracial contact, Harlem's nightlife scene, centered in "Jungle Alley" around 133rd Street, also could be extremely exclusive and racist. There were about a dozen upscale cabarets in Harlem, including the Cotton Club, Connie's Inn, and Barron's, which were usually reserved for white patrons, who came to listen to musicians such as Ellington and watch African Americans perform in spectacular, often acrobatic floor shows. In one famous episode, popular bluesman W.C. Handy was denied entry to the Cotton Club, even as he heard his own music being played inside.

Similarly, black clubs and saloons, such as the Lenox Club, the Sugar Cane, and Ned's, were known either to have few white customers or to ban whites or "mixed" parties altogether, out of fear that police scrutiny would be heightened. On occasion, certain songs and dances, such as the Turkey Trot, were forbidden by club owners for the same reason.

Sex also played an important role in Harlem's nightlife. The strict social codes of other parts of Manhattan became blurred north of Central Park, and there was a common belief that New York City police monitored Harlem less closely than other parts of the city. Harlem's nightclubs were places where potential partners could meet and form intimate relationships across color lines and nationalities. This appealed to many whites, who were hesitant to risk their reputations as they would if they were to be seen publicly interacting with African Americans on such terms.

So-called buffet flats, or private apartments where paying customers could view a sex show or hire a prostitute, offered men and women the space to engage in a range of sexual acts. Importantly, Harlem, like Greenwich Village to the south, had a thriving gay and lesbian culture. Same-sex couples acted openly in Harlem's cabarets and saloons, and many performers, including Ma Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Gladys Bentley, celebrated homosexuality in their songs and routines. Drag balls, featuring men elaborately dressed in women's clothing, were particularly popular (and legal) in Harlem. The Hamilton Lodge Ball, Harlem's most famous yearly masquerade performance, attracted transvestites and female impersonators, gays and lesbians, male and female prostitutes, and others in what one historian described as "a grand jamboree of dancing, love making, display, rivalry, drinking and advertisement." With up to 7,000 spectators in any given year, the event was widely covered by the New York press.

This is not to suggest that all Harlemites participated in or endorsed such activities. Members of the church-going middle class often spoke out against such behavior, which they viewed as deviant. Outside of sanctioned balls, cross-dressing men and women were known to be harassed and arrested. Black newspapers such as the Amsterdam News, working in tandem with ministers such as Adam Clayton Powell, often "outed" those arrested for "female impersonation" or "homosexual solicitation" by publishing their names, ages, addresses, and occupations and details of their activities.

Clark Barwick

See also: African Americans: Drag; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Jazz; Prohibition; Randolph, A. Philip; Robeson, Paul.

Further Reading

Baker, Houston. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.

Chauncey, George. Gay New York: Gender, Urban Culture, and the Making of the Gay World, 1890–1940. New York: Basic Books, 1994.

Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 1995.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Random House, 1981.

Schwarz, Christa A.B. Gay Voices of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003.

Harmonialism

Harmonialism was an American religious movement that linked spiritual peace and physical health with one's ability to tap into a higher spiritual power. The roots of Harmonialism date to the mid-nineteenth century, when other spiritualist movements such as mesmerism (a theory of "animal magnetism" according to which health can be restored through the manipulation of the body's inner substances) and Swedenborgianism (a philosophy suggesting that the material world corresponds to the spiritual world) began to gain adherents in America. Although Harmonialism was presented in a loosely traditional Christian framework, its emphasis on the power of the individual and his or her own mind to achieve inner peace was counter to Christian teachings.

Harmonialism was never a separate church or defined theology. Its founder, if it could be said to have one, was the psychic Andrew Jackson Davis. Davis was a barely educated shoemaker who became known as the Poughkeepsie (New York) Seer. Beginning in 1844, Davis would assume a hypnotized state and describe to clients their ailments and health, believing that he could tap into a higher spiritual plane to receive greater knowledge. Davis believed this self-enlightenment was available to all individuals and that organized religions prevented individual growth. His "Harmonial Philosophy" called for men and women to live in harmony with nature and according to natural law.

In 1851, Davis founded the Harmonial Brotherhood, an organization to promote spiritual harmony. Harmonial organizations were formed in many states, primarily in the Midwest, including Colorado and Missouri. In 1863, Davis founded two other organizations to promote Harmonialism: the Children's Progressive Lyceum, established as an alternative to the standard Sunday school; and the Moral Police Fraternity, which sought to reduce crime by aiding the needy, instructing the ignorant, and providing employment for those without jobs.

Harmonialism shared certain beliefs with Christian Science, and many proponents of Christian Science during the late nineteenth century were former members. The term New Thought began to be used around 1895 to refer to the belief in mental healing. The followers of New Thought abandoned the idea of biblical authority and concentrated on the idea that good was within each person. The leading figures in this movement were Phineas Quimby, a scientist in Belfast, Maine, and Emma Hopkins, a former Christian Science follower who taught many of the future New Thought leaders.

In contrast to Christian Science, which had a centralized organization, the Harmonialists who became advocates of New Thought believed in decentralized authority. Institutes, not churches, were founded across the United States, and the written word became more important in spreading ideas than group meetings. A flood of writings about how individuals could achieve enlightenment and power through harmony with higher spiritual spheres followed, and attempts to create a formal national organization failed.

Regional organizations that built on the Harmonialism tradition include Divine Science, founded in Denver in 1889, and the Unity School of Christianity, established in Kansas City, Missouri, in the same year. Just as Harmonialism had no clear founding date, it had no specific ending date. Instead, it transformed into such twentieth-century movements as “Positive Thinking,” as preached by Norman Vincent Peale.

Tim J. Watts

See also: Christian Science; Davis; Andrew Jackson; New Thought; Spiritualism; Swedenborgianism.

Further Reading

Ahlstrom, Sydney E. A Religious History of the American People. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1972.

Fuller, Robert C. Mesmerism and the American Cure of Souls. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.

Wrobel, Arthur. Pseudo-Science and Society in Nineteenth-Century America. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1987.

Harmony Society

Founded in the village of Iptingen (Württemberg), Germany, in 1785 or 1786, the Harmony Society was a Christian theosophical group whose intense millennialism and belief in the second coming of Christ, based largely upon the Book of Revelation, fostered a distrust of secular authority in every form. Members practiced celibacy, abstained from tobacco, and consumed alcohol only minimally.

The group was founded and led by Johann Georg Rapp (also known as George Rapp), who was born on November 1, 1757, and trained as a weaver. The Harmony Society was persecuted by the Lutheran Church and moved to the United States in 1803 and 1804.

On February 15, 1805, after purchasing land in west-central Pennsylvania, Rapp formally organized his 400 followers as the Harmony Society. Placing all their goods in common, they founded the town of Harmony in Butler County. By 1807, the society numbered 750 members and had established a small, functional community. Consisting of fifty houses, a church, a school, and various workshops and storage facilities, Harmony developed into a prosperous agricultural and industrial community.

In 1814, the group moved to Indiana and founded the town of New Harmony in the Wabash Valley, where they were challenged by disease, hostile neighbors, and difficulties in farming the land. In 1825, the Harmonists sold their holdings to utopian socialist Robert Owen and returned to Pennsylvania. They established a third village, named Economy (present-day Ambridge). Frederick Rapp, the adopted son of Johann Georg Rapp, had purchased the 3,000-acre (1,214-hectare) tract on the Ohio River and oversaw the establishment of wool and cotton production facilities. Located on an ideal river route near Pittsburgh, the community thrived on textile, clothing, and alcohol trade.

New Harmony, Indiana, was a communitarian experiment established in 1825 by the Welsh utopian and socialist Robert Owen. The original settlement at the site had been founded by members of the Harmony Society, followers of German pietist George Rapp. (MPI/Stringer/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Within the next three years, seventy-eight members left the community, and a charismatic figure named Count Maximilian de Leon arrived in Economy. Professing to be the divine messenger, Leon advocated marriage and other indulgences, which disrupted the lives of the more devout Harmonists. Finally asked to withdraw, Leon took with him $105,000 and some 250 disgruntled Harmonists.

The death of Johann Georg Rapp on August 7, 1847, was another severe blow to the society. Over the course of the next sixty years, the remaining members became less focused on the traditional ways of the society and more concerned with financial success, hiring outsiders to work in the mills and trading companies. Adhering to the practice of celibacy and making little effort to recruit new members, the community declined in number. By the end of the nineteenth century, John Duss, whose mother had been a Harmonist and who had lived in the community off and on throughout his life, was asked to administer the society's financial assets. Despite the strict rule of celibacy, Duss and his wife, Susie, were permitted to become members and run the community's affairs. Over the next fifteen years, in an effort to pay off debts, John Duss liquidated most of the Harmonists' financial holdings.

In 1903, the town of Economy and all of its assets were sold to the Liberty Land Company for about $3 million. In 1906, a century after its founding, the Harmony Society was officially dissolved. Today, under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission, Old Economy is maintained as a historic site.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Communes: Utopianism.

Further Reading

Arndt, Karl J.R. George Rapp's Disciples, Pioneers, and Heirs: A Register of the Harmonists in America. Ed. Donald E. Pitzer and Leigh Ann Chamness. Evansville: University of Southern Indiana Press, 1994.

Harris, Thomas Lake (1823–1906)

From spiritualist and mystic to poet and founder of a utopian community, Thomas Lake Harris embodied many aspects of the counterculture of nineteenth-century America. He was a highly effective speaker and influential writer who prompted many to adopt his views on a bisexual God, immortality, and sexual relations. Many believed his psychical powers allowed him to transcend his mortal existence.

Harris was born on May 15, 1823, in Fenny Stratford, England, the son of Thomas Harris, a grocer, and Annie Lake Harris. In 1828, the family moved to Utica, New York. Four years later, his mother died; his father soon remarried. Harsh treatment on the part of his stepmother and the strict Calvinist Baptist values of his parents led the young Harris to move out of the house to live with a Universalist minister, and he converted to Universalism at the age of twenty.

In the late 1840s, Harris experienced a crisis of faith and turned to spiritualism as practiced by Andrew Jackson Davis, known as the Poughkeepsie (New York) Seer. Through Davis, Harris learned of the teachings of the eighteenth-century Swedish spiritualist Emanuel Swedenborg. In Swedenborgianism, Harris found the tenets of free will, love, truth, and a new age as a foundation on which to build his own philosophy. Harris began the Independent Christian Organization in New York City, and his preaching caught the attention of a number of prominent individuals, including Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune.

Beginning in 1850, Harris participated in the Mountain Cove religious community in Virginia until 1853. During this time, he experienced several spiritual events that inspired him to write poetry, including The Epic of the Starry Heaven (1854), the first of his many poems on the theme of celestial sexuality.

In 1855, he married Emily Isabella Waters. The marriage lasted until her death in 1883 but, according to Harris, was void of sexual relations. Also in 1855, he wrote The First Book of the Christian Religion, presenting his interpretation of Swedenborgian principles. Two years later, he started the Herald of Light, a monthly Swedenborgian publication that ran until 1861. In 1858, Harris published the first volume of The Aracana of Christianity with a report on his communication with a demon.

Invited to travel to England in 1860, Harris attracted the attention of Laurence Oliphant, a writer and member of Parliament. Returning to the United States the following year with backing from Oliphant, Harris established the Brotherhood of New Life. This religiously eclectic group was established first in Wassaic, New York, then moved briefly to nearby Amenia, and finally settled in Brocton, New York. Members followed the principles of what Harris called "Theo-socialism," according to which Jesus Christ was a socialist and individuals should live together in equal social conditions.

In 1875, a rift with Oliphant prompted Harris to take his followers to a 1,200-acre (486-hectare) tract outside Santa Rosa, California, which he named Fountain Grove. There, Harris produced several poems, including the 5,000-line Star Flowers.

A complete break with Oliphant in 1881 led to a decade of increased dissatisfaction within the community. In 1890, Harris finally sold his interest in Fountain Grove. The following year, he married Jane Lee Waring, his personal secretary, and published his last major work, The New Republic.

In 1892, Harris and his wife moved to New York City, where he continued to write until his death on March 23, 1906. His passing was viewed by many followers as merely a deep sleep, as they believed he had already achieved immortality on Earth.

James J. Kopp

See also: Davis, Andrew Jackson: Spiritualism: Swedenborgianism: Utopianism.

Further Reading

Schneider, Herbert W., and George Lawton. A Prophet and a Pilgrim: Being the Incredible History of Thomas Lake Harris and Laurence Oliphant; Their Sexual Mysticisms and Utopian Communities, Amply Documented to Confound the Skeptic. New York: Columbia University Press, 1942.

Hasidim and Hasidism

Hasidim (plural of Hasid and Hebrew for “pious ones”) are adherents of a mystical Orthodox Judaism, founded in Eastern Europe during the eighteenth century, that emphasizes a personal relationship with God, joyful celebration of an omnipresent God, and nonassimilation. Although Hasidim appear to live rigid lives and represent a distinct, more devotional counterculture than other Orthodox Jews, the movement traditionally places greater emphasis on celebrating love for God than on adhering to rules. Nevertheless, the term pious ones is not misplaced, as Hasidim are among the most observant followers of the Torah’s commandments.

The movement was founded in the Carpathian region of Eastern Europe by Rabbi Israel ben Eliezer, known as the Ba’al Shem Tov (Hebrew for “Master of the Good Name”), sometimes referred to by the acronym Besht. The Ba’al Shem Tov traveled from village to village in what is today Poland and the Ukraine, teaching a mystical form of Judaism that included exuberant prayer, joyous dancing, and celebratory singing, in addition to keeping the biblical commandments. In stark contrast to other forms of Judaism practiced in the early 1700s, the Besht de-emphasized intellectualism in favor of inner piety, enabling even illiterate villagers to have a relationship with God. Following his death in 1760, the Besht left behind approximately 10,000 people in his movement.

Today, there are perhaps a dozen major Hasidic groups and up to several hundred altogether, most of them in Israel and the United States. Many Hasidim emigrated from war-torn Eastern Europe in the aftermath of World War II. The total world population of Hasidim is uncertain, as members have resisted census-taking (a practice associated with negative consequences in the Bible and reminiscent of the Holocaust to families who survived it). As of 2006, there were an estimated 180,000 Hasidim in the United States, constituting about 3 percent of all Jewish Americans. Their high birthrate leads some scholars to predict that the Hasidim and other ultra-orthodox groups will become dominant among American Judaism within the next half century.

Most Hasidim in America live in the Brooklyn, New York, neighborhoods of Borough Park, Williamsburg, and Crown Heights. Tight inner-city communities both support the separatist (nonassimilationist) spirit of adherents and make it possible to live within walking distance of a synagogue. (The Hebrew Bible forbids vehicular transportation on the Sabbath and holy days). Another distinguishing characteristic of Hasidism is devotion to a dynastic leader, or rebbe, who acts as a kind of spiritual guide, dispenser of justice, and granter of blessings. Separate groups within the Hasidic movement, with names and traditions that go back to towns of origin in Eastern Europe, have been led by dynasties of rebbes. Prominent groups include the Lubavitcher—with 100,000 or more followers in Brooklyn alone—Breslover, and Satmarer.

Unlike many Jewish adherents, some Hasidic groups look forward to the return of a prophesied messiah. The Satmarers, who believe a future messiah will usher in a perfected Jewish state, tend to remain even more isolated from the rest of the world than other Hasidic groups and have been largely opposed to the secular state of Israel. Some Lubavitchers believe that the seventh Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died in 1994, was the messiah or will return as the messiah. Nevertheless, they have supported the modern state of Israel while awaiting this redemption.

Strict observance of biblical commandments, close-knit communities, and use of the Yiddish dialect have helped protect Hasidim from assimilation into American or even mainstream Jewish culture. And while many Hasidim continue to live in large cities, some have relocated to rural communities such as Postville, Iowa. Unlike mainstream Reformed and Conservative Jews, Hasidim are recognized by their distinctive appearance. Albeit with variations among groups, Hasidic men wear clothes that derive from eighteenth-century Eastern Europe—long black coats, brimmed hats, and the yarmulke (Jewish skullcap)—with curly, hanging sideburns and untrimmed beards. Women dress modestly. Worldly education is avoided as much as possible, and young boys often are encouraged to devote much more time to studying the Torah and Talmud than to secular scholarship.

Hasidism provides a countercultural alternative to secular society as well as to less observant forms of Judaism. It has helped preserve a strong awareness of traditional Judaism, while encouraging more exuberant worship and belief in God that transcends ritual practices. By encouraging less observant Jews to join their ranks and by following the biblical precept to “be fruitful and multiply,” the Hasidim have expanded rapidly since the threat of decimation in the Holocaust.

Nathan Zook

See also: Jews.

Further Reading

Jacobs, Louis. Their Heads in Heaven: Unfamiliar Aspects of Hasidism. Portland, OR: Vallentine-Mitchell, 2005.

Mintz, Jerome. Hasidic People: A Place in the New World. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Rabinowicz, Harry M. Hasidism: The Movement and Its Master. New York: Jason Aronson, 1988.

Hatch, Cora Scott (1840–1923)

Cora Scott Hatch, also referred to as Cora L.V. Scott, was one of the most celebrated and successful mediums in the American spiritualist movement of the mid-nineteenth century.

Born Cora Lodencia Veronica Scott on April 21, 1840, near Cuba, New York, she was nurtured in a household that espoused political radicalism, communitarianism, and unorthodox religious beliefs. Her father, David W. Scott, was a free thinker who was influenced by the radical deist Thomas Paine and the utopian schemes of the Reverend Adin Ballou. Her mother, Lodencia Butterfield Scott, was said to possess mediumistic powers.

By the time she was eleven, Cora was offering medical advice, suggesting cures, and even conducting minor operations on those who ventured into the Scott household. In fact, for four years, she was reputed to perform medical procedures with help from the spirit of a German doctor who spoke to her during trances. At fifteen, Cora appeared on public platforms before large audiences, speaking on a variety of subjects while in a trance.

With the death of her father in 1853, Cora married B.F. Hatch, a much older mesmeric physician who arranged for his young wife to undertake trance-speaking and lecture tours in New York City and Boston. According to numerous accounts, Cora Hatch was enormously effective and popular. In 1858, the Hatches became embroiled in a highly publicized scandal that jeopardized Cora's career and threatened the integrity of the spiritualist movement itself. Cora charged her husband with sexual abuse and mismanagement of finances, and she was granted a divorce.

Cora Hatch's career continued to flourish despite the scandal, with the lecture circuit taking her to Washington, D.C., Baltimore, St. Louis, San Francisco, and other cities. Predictably, her spiritualist beliefs collided with those of conventional religion. She distrusted organizations of any kind, especially religious institutions, claiming that they were the "fetters or bonds of the human mind." She called upon women to challenge the subordinate role allotted to them in the theology of St. Paul. In 1857, when asked to explain the revival of religion then sweeping the country, Hatch explained, "fear is the origin of religion." She criticized the concept of an "avenging Deity," so familiar in evangelical Christianity, as destructive to the human spirit. While visiting Washington, D.C., she accepted invitations to speak in African American pulpits, something most white clergy were loathe to do.

In the early 1870s, Hatch relocated to Chicago with her fourth husband, William Richmond, a successful businessman, to serve the First Society of Spiritualists. She administered to that congregation, better known as the "Church of the Soul," for fifty years. The group met in the city's Masonic Hall, where weekly audiences numbered from 2,000 to 2,500.

Throughout her career, notable literary and reform leaders attended Hatch's lectures, among them the poet Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, abolitionist Wendell Phillips, and novelist Henry James. In fact, James's novel The Bostonians (1886) includes a character based on Cora Scott Hatch, the spiritualist Verena Tarrant. Hatch died in Chicago on January 3, 1923.

A.J. Scopino, Jr.

See also: Spiritualism.

Further Reading

Braude, Ann. Radical Spirits: Spiritualism and Women's Rights in Nineteenth-Century America. Boston: Beacon, 1989.

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Pocket Books, 1972.

Carroll, Bret. Spiritualism in Antebellum America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Kerr, Howard. Mediums and Spirit-Rappers and Roaring Radicals: Spiritualism in American Literature, 1850–1900. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1973.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel (1804–1864)

The enigmatic Nathaniel Hawthorne, the preeminent American novelist to depict the colonial period, had a dark view of human nature. He performed a variety of public roles, from magazine editor and critic to customs house surveyor and U.S. consul to England, as his writings explored the moral issues associated with New England's Puritan heritage. Many of Hawthorne's works probe the murky psychological side of American culture, specifically the destructive impulses beating beneath a veneer of pleasant civility. Tackling such issues as adultery, eroticism, independence, revolution, utopian communities, and other cultural realities of nineteenth-century America, Hawthorne considered writing a "pleasurable toil." While he obtained political appointments to make money, he also associated with such transcendentalist luminaries as Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau.

He was born Nathaniel Hathorne on July 4, 1804, in Salem, Massachusetts, to Nathaniel Hathorne and Elizabeth Clark Manning. When he was four, his father died at sea. In 1821, at age seventeen, the budding writer entered Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine, returning to live with his family upon graduation in September 1825.

His first novel, Fanshawe, was published anonymously at his expense in 1828; that October, he added the w to his surname. In January 1836, Hawthorne moved to Boston to edit the American Magazine of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge but resigned in August to complete Twice-Told Tales, published in March 1837. In a letter to poet Henry Wadsworth Longfellow shortly after the publication of that work, Hawthorne confided, "I can assure you that trouble is the next best thing to enjoyment, and that there is no fate in this world so horrible as to have no share in either its joys or sorrows."

Hawthorne's joys included his sisters, Elizabeth and Louisa, and his wife, Sophia, to whom he became secretly engaged in 1838. They married in 1842. Conversely, at least some of his troubles resulted from his well-disguised ambition. Hawthorne's letters suggest a preference for solitude and industry, a dislike of writing for the public and making public appearances, disenchantment with poetry, and a frustration with the inherent defects of language that make it difficult to portray complex ideas accurately.

Despite these perceived obstacles, Hawthorne published his masterpiece in 1850, The Scarlet Letter, a novel of seventeenth-century New England that continues to thrill readers' imaginations with its representations of romance, religious and cultural tension, and difficult questions about the fate of America as seen through the lens of a self-contained Puritan society. In 1851, Hawthorne explored the moral inevitability of American democracy, the idea of inherited sin, and the sharp distinctions between social classes in The House of the Seven Gables.

Prior to marriage, Hawthorne had experimented with social and political ideas outside traditional boundaries, when he spent April to November 1841 at Brook Farm, a utopian community outside Boston. Although he was friends with the transcendentalists, Hawthorne was skeptical of the viability of utopian communities, doubting the farm's philosophy that manual labor was uplifting and that everyone had an equal chance for social, intellectual, and spiritual growth. To his credit, Hawthorne invested in Brook Farm and spent time there to discover the truth for himself.

The Blithedale Romance (1852), his third major romantic novel, was partially based on his experiences at Brook Farm and portrays the utopian ideal in an unflattering light. In fact, the main character, Miles Coverdale, experiences a journey that mirrors Hawthorne's, at first throwing himself into the socialistic experiment and then becoming slowly disenchanted as the story progresses.

When Franklin Pierce, an old friend, ran for president of the United States in 1852, Hawthorne wrote his campaign biography. And when Pierce became president the following year, the writer was rewarded with an appointment as U.S. consul to England in 1853.

Hawthorne remained in Europe for nine years, where he published the fourth of his romantic novels, The Marble Faun (1860), an exploration of time, the burden of inheritance, and the transformation of the soul. On May 19, 1864, while on tour in New England with President Pierce, Hawthorne died in his sleep.

Amanda L. Morris

See also: Brook Farm: Emerson, Ralph Waldo: Thoreau, Henry David: Transcendentalism.

Further Reading

Bloom, Harold, ed. Nathaniel Hawthorne. Broomall, PA: Chelsea House, 2000.

Myerson, Joel, ed. Selected Letters of Nathaniel Hawthorne. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2002.

Wineapple, Brenda. Hawthorne: A Life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2003.

Haywood, William “Big Bill” (1869–1928)

As a leader of the Western Federation of Miners (WFM) and organizer of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), William “Big Bill” Haywood was one of the most prominent and widely feared labor leaders in the United States during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. An early advocate of industrial unionism, militant strike leader, member of the Socialist Party, accused murderer (acquitted), and convicted seditionist who fled to the Soviet Union, Big Bill Haywood became a legendary figure in the American counterculture.

William Dudley Haywood was born in Salt Lake City, Utah, on February 4, 1869. His father, a rider for the Pony Express, had met and married Haywood’s mother when she was only fifteen years old; he died when Haywood was three years old. At age nine, Haywood poked out his right eye, blinding it for life. By the time he was twelve, he had quit school and begun working as a farmhand; disgusted with his treatment by his employer, he walked off the job.

At fifteen, Haywood left home and went to work in a mine at Eagle Canyon, Nevada. There he met his future wife, Nevada Jane Minor, and an old, Irish labor radical named Pat Reynolds. A veteran of the Knights of Labor workers’ organization, Reynolds taught Haywood the fundamentals of class struggle and exposed him to the controversy of the 1886 Haymarket incident, a demonstration in Chicago for the eight-hour workday that ended in bloodshed when the police intervened, all leading to the trial and execution of several radical labor leaders.

Haywood and Minor were married in 1889, and the couple moved to Salt Lake City, where Haywood held a series of odd jobs. The family then moved to Winnemucca, Nevada, and on to Silver City, Idaho, where in August 1896 Haywood and more than 100 fellow miners signed union cards and enlisted as charter members of Local 66 of the Western Federation of Miners.

Haywood served as financial secretary and president of the Silver City local and as a member of the national union’s General Executive Board. At the 1901 convention, union members elected Haywood to the position of secretary-treasurer, making him second-in-command of an organization that consisted of 17,000 members in 100 locals. Haywood moved his family to Denver, the new home of the WFM’s national headquarters, and immersed himself in the day-to-day operations of the union.

Following a series of tumultuous labor disputes in Colorado—none of which brought material gains for miners or smeltermen—Haywood and other labor leaders met in Chicago in June 1905. Haywood, a member of the Socialist Party of America, called for the creation of an industrywide union that would provide workers with a more militant alternative to the craft-based American Federation of Labor. Haywood’s fiery rhetoric led to the formation of one of the most radical labor unions in American history—the IWW, or Wobblies.

From 1905 to 1919, Haywood and the IWW worked to unite all workers in the struggle against capitalists and the federal government. The union sought to achieve fundamental social and economic change by organizing along collectivist lines, capturing the means of production, ending the wage system, and redistributing wealth according to need. The Wobblies argued that worker control at the point of production would be the force of change and that noncooperation, not violence, was the means to power.

In September 1917, in the midst of World War I, the U.S. Department of Justice initiated nationwide raids of IWW headquarters, resulting in the arrest and conviction of key union members, including Haywood, who spent four months in the Cook County (Illinois) jail. By the end of 1919, the IWW was leaderless. Associated not only with labor violence, but now also with the Bolshevik Revolution and international communism, the union disintegrated.

Haywood was fined $30,000 and sentenced to twenty years in prison, which he appealed. When the Supreme Court rejected Haywood's final appeal in 1921, he fled to the Soviet Union. He died there on May 17, 1928.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: Industrial Workers of the World.

Further Reading

Carlson, Peter. Roughneck: The Life and Times of Big Bill Haywood. New York: W.W. Norton, 1983.

Conlin, Joseph R. Big Bill Haywood and the Radical Union Movement. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1969.

Health Foods

Health foods are those that confer some physical or psychological benefit, or both, when consumed. This may be a function of an inherent property of the food itself, such as natural vitamin content, or derived from conditions under which it is grown or processed. While health foods occupy a visible and substantial niche in the social and economic life of modern America, they have a long association with American countercultures— from nineteenth-century vegetarianism to the hippie and New Age movements of the 1960s and 1970s, holistic medicine, environmentalism, and the organic farming, natural, and whole foods traditions. Health foods have been among the defining elements of each of these groups and traditions.

Early History

Health foods in the United States had their beginnings in the vegetarian movement of the early 1800s, popularized by such health advocates as Sylvester Graham and Caleb Jackson. The cereal industry got its start in the 1890s when brothers John Harvey Kellogg and Will Keith Kellogg in Battle Creek, Michigan, and Charles William “C.W.” Post—a former patient at the Kelloggs’ sanitarium—developed and marketed the first cold cereal products as health foods.

In the late 1800s and early 1900s, a number of trends worked together to promote the actual and perceived qualities of healthy food. For one thing, researchers began to isolate and define the composition of foods: proteins, carbohydrates, and fats, vitamins, and other essential nutrients. Importantly also, the creation of the U.S. Department of Agriculture (1862) and the Pure Food and Drug Act (1906) charged the government with overseeing the food industry.

The effects of diet on human health, however, were recognized long before scientists identified the nutritional elements of food. One of the first medical treatises on the subject was written in 1633 by the English physician James Hart, who described the consequences of immoderate sugar consumption. Before the advent of modern science, diet was believed to affect spiritual as well as physical health.

The British clergymen who brought the teachings of vegetarianism to Philadelphia in 1817 cited biblical injunctions for the eating of grains and fruits. American clergymen such as William Metcalfe and Graham helped found the American Vegetarian Society in 1850 and issued the nation's first vegetarian publications. Vegetarianism was well established by the end of the 1850s, sharing its status as a reform movement and some of its underlying ideals with other groups and movements: the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (1824), the New Thought Society (1838), and the Theosophical Society (1875)—the latter two of which incorporated Eastern spiritual elements—and the temperance movement, which worked to eliminate the consumption of alcohol.

While vegetarians were promoting the connection of diet to a superior moral stance, others were concerned with matters of the digestive tract. Food preservation techniques in the first half of the nineteenth century meant that an average American diet was heavy with salted and smoked meats, starchy vegetables, puddings, and baked goods, all of which caused people to suffer frequently from an associated indigestion called dyspepsia.

Graham, a self-styled physician and Presbyterian minister, advocated a vegetarian regime that he believed would not only cure digestive ills, it also would curb cravings for alcohol and sexual desire. Bread occupied a central position in Graham's diet, specifically a coarsely ground, whole wheat bread that retained the nutritional elements lost by the processing of white flour. With his hard "Grahamish cake" (precursor to the graham cracker) and promotion of healthy living, Graham created a solid foundation for an alternative lifestyle based on diet.

In the latter half of the nineteenth century, Battle Creek became the center of the next major impetus for the popularization and commercialization of health foods. The Kellogg brothers, in conjunction with the Battle Creek Sanitarium (founded by the Seventh-Day Adventist Church in 1866 to restore patients' health through a regimen of simple foods, fresh air, and exercise), introduced a list of new products: Caramel Cereal Coffee, Granola, wheat flakes, and "vegetable meats." Post expanded the enterprise into cereal products with Grape-Nuts, claimed to prevent such ailments as consumption, malaria, and loose teeth and to benefit the brain.

Will Keith Kellogg worked with his brother, doctor and nutritionist John Harvey Kellogg, to develop flaked cereals as a health food in the 1890s. In 1906, he founded the W.K. Kellogg Company to market toasted corn flakes as a breakfast food. (Frederic Lewis/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Twentieth-Century Trends

Whereas the health faddists of the nineteenth century were concerned with foods to avoid (meat, white bread, alcohol) and introduced new products to promote physical and mental health, the twentieth century saw the rise of concern over the production and content of the nation's regular food supply. The Pure Food and Drug Act was prompted in part by Upton Sinclair's muckraking classic of the same year, The Jungle, an exposé of conditions in the meatpacking industry.

The period after World War II brought a number of changes in how American food was grown and processed. Farms became bigger and more mechanized, moving to mono-cropping, large-scale animal rearing, and the intensive use of fertilizers, herbicides, and pesticides. Food companies consolidated, increased automation, and expanded the use of additives and artificial ingredients in their products. New preservative techniques provided a vast array of frozen, boxed, bottled, canned—and extensively advertised—foods for busy families. The 1950s and 1960s brought a proliferation not only of prepared foods, but also of largely artificial foods: flavored drinks, whipped toppings, cheese spreads, and the like.

Books and magazines in the early 1960s began calling attention to the dangers associated with the chemicals used in growing and processing foods. Influential works included William Longwood's The Poisons in Your Food (1960) and Rachel Carson's Silent Spring (1962), which revealed the toxic effects of the pesticide DDT. There was concern as well for the dismal living and working conditions of migrant workers who picked the produce sold in supermarkets.

The synthetic substances, mass production, and commercial packaging that came to characterize the food chain in postwar America prompted a reaction from the same segment of the population that advocated change in other areas of society: anti-Vietnam War protestors, civil rights activists, women's rights advocates, the hippie subculture, and early environmentalists. As well as a necessity of life, food became at once a lifestyle statement and a proposed solution to health and environmental ills. Health foods in the 1960s and 1970s were defined not only by what they were and how they were produced and cooked, but also by how they were packaged and marketed.

Still, the definition of health food itself had not changed all that much from the 1800s, if the definition were expanded to include such new products such as soy-based foods and foreign foods. Health foods largely have been vegetarian, preferably grown under organic conditions and unadulterated by chemical additives, sweeteners, or fillers. They have been unprocessed—such as beans, nuts, seeds, and whole grains—and less processed, such as dried fruits, honey, and nut butters.

A large number of popular cookbooks helped get these foods to the table, often with a focus that included the environmental effect of choosing certain foods in preference to others. Frances Moore Lappé's Diet for a Small Planet (1971) has sold more than 3 million copies since publication.

Organic farming and gardening, popularized by writer and publisher Jerome Rodale in the 1940s, became an optimal choice for small farmers and gardeners, and related knowledge was disseminated to a growing body of practitioners through magazines like Mother Earth News. Communes were established in both rural and urban settings, growing and producing their own food, and fostering an enduring trend in community gardens.

Food cooperatives, owned and worked by members, generally started out as small-scale operations to provide a source for basic foodstuffs and often grew into larger stores with exotic international offerings. While the number of health food cooperatives has declined since their peak in the 1970s, they and some of their brand names still flourish. Among the product lines that went mass-market are Health Valley Foods (soups, snacks, and cereals), Celestial Seasonings (teas), White Wave (soy products), and Snapple Fruit Juices. Health food stores continue to be a source for products that are not profitable for large chains but are preferred by people practicing alternative lifestyles, such as cheese without rennet for vegetarians, eggs and milk from free-range stock for animal rights advocates, and “fair trade” (fairly priced products from developing countries) chocolate, coffee, and tea.

Health foods remain a strong and growing business in early-twenty-first-century America. The food industry is embroiled in legal issues pertaining to labeling, including what qualifies as “organic” and the claims of nutraceuticals or functional foods targeted at specific ailments. As a matter of consumer market and lifestyle, meanwhile, health foods remain, as they have been from their inception, as much a statement about how their consumers view the world as about what those consumers eat and drink.

Karen Hovde

See also: Carson, Rachel; Graham, Sylvester; Vegetarianism.

Further Reading

Belasco, Warren J. Appetite for Change. New York: Pantheon, 1989.

Carson, Gerald. Cornflake Crusade. New York: Rinehart, 1957.

Fromartz, Samuel. Organic, Inc.: Natural Foods and How They Grew. Orlando, FL: Harcourt, 2006

Nestle, Marion. Food Politics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.

Heaven's Gate

Heaven's Gate was the name of a religious cult whose thirty-nine members committed mass suicide in Rancho

Santa Fe, California, in March 1997, to coincide with the appearance of the comet Hale-Bopp. The group had been in existence for more than twenty years, founded as Human Individual Metamorphosis in 1972 by Marshall Herff Applewhite, who went by the nicknames “Do” or “Bo,” and Bonnie Lu Nettles, referred to within the cult as “Peep.” Together, they were known as “the Two.”

The message of the group was a mix of occult spirituality, New Age ideology, Asian religious philosophy, Theosophy, and Christianity. Members believed that Jesus had returned through Applewhite, Nettles was an incarnation of God the Father, and both were considered ascended extraterrestrial masters. Specifically, they were understood to be extraterrestrial “walk-ins,” which meant that an entity from another planet had taken over the place previously inhabited by their souls. Applewhite and Nettles taught that spiritually advanced members would ascend to a transhuman state and be met by spacecraft that would transport them to the “next level.” After the death of Nettles in 1985, the theology of the group emphasized spiritual rather than physical resurrection.

Heaven’s Gate also incorporated elements from the metaphysical subculture that posited alien visitations to Earth thousands of years ago. The mythologies and attributes assigned to the gods of many ancient religions, they believed, were in fact the legacies of these early voyagers. The leaders of the cult came to revise this hypothesis, preaching that extraterrestrials planted the seeds of knowledge in early human civilizations and would return when humanity had advanced sufficiently. According to this worldview, humans were constantly growing and evolving to the next level of intelligence and experience. The leaders also embraced the concept that death was a means of liberation from the New Age movement. Drawing on the imagery of the resurrection of the faithful in the Book of Revelation, the group, under the name Total Overcomers Anonymous, placed an advertisement in USA Today in 1993 that foreshadowed an apocalyptic and horrific end to the world of those left behind.

In 1997, the expected appearance of the comet Hale-Bopp signaled to Applewhite that the day of judgment was at hand. Unlike certain survivalist groups, radical right-wing factions, and religious cults, the members of Heaven’s Gate were not facing threats from law enforcement or any other outside authority. In fact, the members videotaped calm farewells describing their intentions. There were no charges of sexual impropriety; indeed the members practiced sexual abstinence. (Sexuality was regarded as just another aspect of their physical bodies that would be left behind when they departed for the next level.) Members wore uniform haircuts and the same style of clothing, but not under duress.

While their mass suicide was tragic and perplexing to outside observers, certainly, the followers of Applewhite and his religious philosophy considered themselves martyrs for a profound and ancient cause, destined for a higher reality.

Julius Bailey

See also: Cults: New Age.

Further Reading

Lewis, James R. Legitimizing New Religions. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2003.

Muesse, Mark W. “Religious Studies and ‘Heaven’s Gate’: Making the Strange Familiar and the Familiar Strange.” In The Insider/Outsider Problem in the Study of Religion: A Reader, ed. Russell T. McCutcheon. New York: Cassell, 1999.

Heavy Metal

Heavy metal arose as a musical genre in the late 1960s, began to solidify in the 1970s, and flourished in the 1980s and early 1990s. Although music critics and historians debate its genealogy, they generally agree that the founding fathers include British and American rock groups such as Led Zeppelin, Black Sabbath, Blue Öyster Cult, Deep Purple, and KISS, and individual musicians such as Jimi Hendrix and Alice Cooper.

In the late 1970s, bands that made up the New Wave of British metal gained notoriety and found an American following. The New Wave featured more hard-edged groups, no doubt influenced by punk, such as Iron Maiden, Judas Priest, and Motörhead. In the United States, bands such as Metallica, Mötley Crüe, and Quiet Riot followed suit. The use of the epithet “heavy metal” has been traced as far back as William S. Burroughs’s 1961 novel The Soft Machine, although music historians have cited several other possible sources as well.

In the mid-1980s and early 1990s, heavy metal became highly successful commercially, as bands performed well in the Billboard charts and spawned a number of more accessible groups, known as “hair bands” (after their predilection for voluminous coifs) such as Bon Jovi and Platinum Blonde. When Seattle Grunge suddenly became popular in the early 1990s, and other musical styles such as rap and hip-hop gained popularity, the reign of the more popular version of heavy metal on the airwaves and video channels declined. Into the 2000s, however, there remained a great deal of interest in the genre, and a number of original bands continued to tour successfully.

Heavy metal music is characterized by a heavily amplified and powerful blues-and rock-inspired sound. Musical formations typically center on an ideally virtuosic lead guitar, rhythm, bass, drums, and often harmonized, falsetto, or screeching vocals. Although there is a softer side that surfaces in love songs and ballads, lyrics and visuals characteristically evoke sexy women, fast cars, grandiose themes, and extreme emotions, with a strong interest in psychological deviation, cultural underworlds, the mythological, the medieval, and the sinister. It is also almost exclusively a heterosexually oriented, white, male phenomenon in terms of product output. Notable exceptions include the all-female metal band Pre-Metal Syndrome (PMS), the female singer Lee Aaron, and the African American metal band Living Colour, the first mainstream black heavy metal band in history.

Heavy metal is notable for its multitude of subgenres, including speed metal, death metal, Christian metal, goth metal, and black metal. There is also considerable overlap with other musical genres, such as punk, grunge, glam rock, blues, progressive rock, rock and roll, and occasionally even classical music.

Its hubristic and highly spectacular nature also has tended to make heavy metal the focus of satire, such as Rob Reiner’s famous film This Is Spinal Tap (1984), the mid-1980s British television comedy Bad News, and the film Rock Star (2001), starring Jennifer Aniston and Mark Wahlberg. Also of note is Penelope Spheeris’s documentary The Rise and Fall of American Civilization Part II: The Metal Years (1990), a wry and highly revealing look at the aspirations and preoccupations of various fans and musicians involved in the American heavy metal scene of the late 1980s.

Julia Pine

See also: Rock and Roll.

Further Reading

Bukszpan, Daniel. The Encyclopedia of Heavy Metal. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2003.

Weinstein, Deena. Heavy Metal: The Music and Its Culture. New York: Da Capo, 2000.

Hecker, Isaac (1819–1888)

With the possible exception of transcendentalist and religious critic Orestes Brownson—a major influence—Isaac Thomas Hecker was perhaps the most notable American convert to Roman Catholicism in the nineteenth century. Ordained as a priest, he went on to found the Paulist Fathers order in 1858 and the Catholic World monthly in 1865. Hecker is noteworthy both as an intellectual convert (rare in America) and for his unorthodox relationship with the church.

Born on December 18, 1819, in New York City, Hecker was the youngest of three boys of German immigrants. His father was nonreligious, his mother an active Protestant. In his preteen years, family poverty compelled him to give up his schooling and work in a bakery with his brothers. A voracious reader, Hecker discovered the eighteenth-century German philosopher Immanuel Kant at a young age and became immersed in two subjects while pursuing Kant's work: philosophy and the social condition of working people. These interests, along with information gained from street corner speeches on political and social topics, led to a friendship and correspondence with Brownson.

In religion, Hecker rejected standard Protestant doctrines about human depravity and sinfulness. He lived with the transcendentalists for six months at their Brook Farm utopian settlement in Massachusetts but finally judged them too humanistic. His own inclinations were more mystical. Dissatisfied with the extremes of the sixteenth-century theologian John Calvin and the transcendentalist essayist Ralph Waldo Emerson, Hecker continued his search for a religious home.

In 1844, shortly after leaving Brook Farm, Hecker was baptized into the Catholic Church by Bishop John McCloskey in New York. Drawn to the community life and religious mission of the regular clergy, he entered the Redemptorist order as a novitiate in Belgium in 1845. Upon completion of his studies and ordination, he worked as a parish priest in England for a year and then returned to New York in 1851. Working with four other converted Redemptorists ministering to immigrants, he earned a reputation as an excellent teacher and public speaker. His speaking tours, featuring lectures on doctrine and history, attracted large crowds.

On behalf of fellow Redemptorists, also American-born converts from Protestantism, Hecker traveled to Rome to ask the Vatican if a Redemptorist novitiate might be started in the United States. Instead of reaching an accommodation, he was expelled from the order.

In 1858, Pope Pius IX authorized Hecker and like-minded American Redemptorists to form their own order dedicated to missionary work in America. Hecker was elected superior of the Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle in the state of New York (commonly called the Paulist Fathers), the first Catholic religious order formed in the United States. He served in that capacity until his death despite disagreements among members as to whether their principal mission should be as evangelizers or keepers of the faith.

Hecker also organized the Catholic Publication Society (1866), later known as the Paulist Press, founded and edited The Catholic World from 1865 until his death, and wrote several books, including Questions of the Soul (1852) and The Church and the Age (1887). As a minister, he endeavored to evangelize the unchurched, promote Catholic doctrine among the faithful, teach immigrants about democracy, and work against the defamation of the church in America.

Hecker opposed compromising church teachings to adapt to American circumstances, a common accusation against many late-nineteenth-century prelates in the United States. Nevertheless, he advocated a change in the method of missionary work to suit an advanced republic with a large urban, working population. He urged the Catholic Church to meet the people on common ground, to move from the periphery of society to a place that commanded respect without official privilege. Contrary to many of his peers, Hecker preached the values of freedom, patriotism, and God's providence for America. He reconciled his national identity with his faith, believing that Christianity needed to be Americanized in order to convert the world.

After his death, on December 22, 1888, Hecker's teachings inspired French and American clergy to embrace his ideals of republicanism and modernism. In 1899, however, Pope Leo XIII wrote a letter to James Cardinal Gibbons in Baltimore, the most respected prelate in America at the time, in which he condemned "Americanism"—or the watering down of church doctrine to suit the fashions of the time—also referred to as "Heckerism."

Michael D. Jacobs

See also: Brook Farm; Brownson; Orestes; Transcendentalism.

Further Reading

O'Brien, David J. Isaac Hecker: An American Catholic. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1991.

Portier, William. Isaac Hecker and the First Vatican Council. Ceredigion, UK: Edwin Mellen, 1985.

Hefner, Hugh (1926–)

The founder of Playboy magazine and Playboy Enterprises, Hugh Hefner is widely regarded as the premier chronicler of the sybaritic bachelor lifestyle that appealed to millions of men in the United States and around the world in the mid-and late twentieth century. Some identify him as a central figure and leading spokesman of the sexual revolution of the 1960s and liberal social values; feminists, especially, have reviled him for objectifying and denigrating women.

Hugh Marston Hefner was born to Methodist parents in Chicago, on April 9, 1926. While attending high school, he started a newspaper and championed student causes. He joined the U.S. Army in 1944, mostly drawing cartoons for military newspapers. He studied at the Chicago Art Institute before earning a bachelor's degree in 1949 from the University of Illinois, where he edited the magazine Shaft and introduced a new feature, "Coed of the Month." He then spent a semester studying individual freedom and human sexuality at Northwestern University.

After working as a subscription clerk and copywriter for Esquire magazine in the early 1950s, Hefner stayed behind in Chicago when that publication relocated to New York City and he was denied a raise. He took a job at a children's magazine, but soon quit to start a venture of his own: a sophisticated men's magazine that challenged the repressive sexual views of the post–World War II generation.

With $8,000 raised from family and friends, Hefner printed and distributed the first monthly issue of Playboy magazine in December 1953. Produced on his kitchen table, it featured the now-legendary nude photos of Hollywood film icon Marilyn Monroe and sold more than 50,000 copies. The original issue did not carry a date, because Hefner did not know whether there would be another. By the end of the decade, Playboy was selling more than 1 million copies per month.

Hefner aimed his innovative magazine straight for the male libido. It contained glossy photos of seminude young women—one highlighted as Playmate of the Month—as well as cutting-edge fiction from such celebrated authors as Ray Bradbury and Kurt Vonnegut, Jr., bawdy humor, and newsmaker interviews. In the early 1960s, he published in its pages the “Playboy Philosophy,” which details at length (in twenty-five parts, totaling almost 250,000 words) America’s religious heritage of sexual repression.

New, more sexually explicit magazine competitors in the early 1970s caused Hefner to follow suit with fully nude Playmates. Radical feminists and anti-pornography fundamentalists accused him of exploiting women’s bodies. A report commissioned by President Ronald Reagan in the mid-1980s linking pornography to violence led to the removal of Playboy from many nationwide sales outlets.

At about the same time, Hefner suffered a stroke. His daughter, Christie, took over Playboy Enterprises, but Hefner remained in charge of the magazine.

Surviving health problems and political controversies, Hefner wed Playmate Kimberley Conrad in 1989. In the mid-1990s, Playboy became the first national magazine on the Internet. Into his eighties, Hefner continued to publish Playboy, support First Amendment rights, and maintain a high public profile.

Admirers credit Hefner with celebrating the female body, educating people about sex, and breaking down prudery. Conversely, detractors blame him for objectifying women, glorifying hedonism, and popularizing pornography. For better or worse, Hugh Hefner has deeply influenced America’s sexual attitudes for more than half a century.

Roy L. Sturgeon

See also: Pornography; Vonnegut, Kurt, Jr.

Further Reading

Brady, Frank. Hefner. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1975.

Miller, Russell. Bunny: The Real Story of Playboy. New York: New American Library, 1984.

Hells Angels

Hells Angels is an outlaw motorcycle gang formed in the Fontana area of San Bernardino County, California. In its early stages, the Hells Angels were known as POBOB, an acronym for “Pissed Off Bastards of Bloomington” (California). It was established by a group of World War II veterans, some of whom felt alienated from American society upon their return from service overseas and sought refuge from its constraints in the newly formed biker club.

Shortly after the group’s founding on March 17, 1948, the bikers changed its name to Hells Angels, a moniker adopted from a company of fighter pilots in World War II. The official club insignia, proudly displayed on the backs of leather riding jackets and vests, features a grinning, winged skull wearing a leather aviation helmet. Active members of the Hells Angels are required to have a tattoo of the crest. Individuals whose membership is revoked must have the tattoo altered with a line through it. Retired members are permitted to keep the tattoo, but their date of departure must be indicated beneath the crest.

By the 1960s, the Hells Angels had come to epitomize the outlaw motorcycle counterculture. Still, in accordance with the founders' armed-forces background, the structure and relationships within the organization reflect a quasi-military model. While women are included in organizational activity, full-scale membership is exclusive to Caucasian, working-class males.

History

Between its inception and the late 1960s, the Hells Angels were largely confined to Southern California and Australia. Beginning in the latter part of the 1960s and into the early 1970s, the group's influence was widened by the influx of returning Vietnam veterans and an improved media image, which portrayed the biker as a free spirit symbolic of the Old West cowboy.

Films such as The Wild One (1954) and Hells Angels on Wheels (1967) depicted outlaw motorcycle gangs not as menacing transients but as eccentrics yearning for a simple life in a society that hampered freedom, forced to reject conventional norms and seek reprieve in a select group of "brothers" pursuing the same goals. The Hells Angels, in fact, kept frequent company with the countercultural groups known as hippies and flower children. A divergence of opinion over the Vietnam War, however, eventually split their superficial bond.

In the early 1960s, the Hells Angels had begun infiltrating the U.S. narcotics market, and the money derived from drug dealing spawned a new era for the biker subculture. The organization was affected in two major ways. First, drugs provided income; second, the group morphed into an organized-crime syndicate. In 1985 alone, more than 100 Hells Angels were arrested for involvement in drug trafficking.

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms estimated that in 2004 there were more than 500 outlaw motorcycle gangs in the United States, which varied in scope but shared characteristics with the Hells Angels. The federal government considered only four to be criminal organizations—the Hells Angels, Outlaws, Pagans, and Bandidos. Although their members make up only 1 percent of the biker population, the rivalry between these groups has not been inconsequential. In fact, it has prompted terrorist-type activity as a means to intimidate rivals. Violence is an inherent attribute of the culture in that it is used not only to maintain hegemony over occupied regions, but also internally, to control member activity.

Organization and Bureaucracy

The Hells Angels today boast more than eighty-five chapters in fifteen countries. At the national level, the club is divided geographically into the West Coast and East Coast regions, with Omaha, Nebraska, being the midpoint. The headquarters, referred to as the "motherclub," is located in Oakland, California. Ralph Hubert "Sonny" Barger, Jr., a notable figure in the organization who joined during the late 1950s and became its president shortly thereafter, was responsible for moving the headquarters there.

The Hells Angels has an elaborate bureaucracy, with a hierarchy, policies, and procedures that have both legal and illegal overtones. The gang is a legally established corporation whose name is a registered trademark. Every three months, chapter officers from each coast attend regional meetings known as ECOM (East Coast Officer Meeting) and WCOM (West Coast Officer Meeting). The location of the meeting rotates among chapters in each region.

Chains, bandannas, earrings, and black “leathers” are standard accoutrements for members of the Hells Angels motorcycle gang. The organization is run according to a quasi-military model, with strict rules, sanctioned activities, and a hierarchy of leadership. (Michael Ochs Archives/Stringer/Getty Images)

An annual meeting, called a “USA Run,” is held for all members. In addition, there are three annual runs—held on Memorial Day, July 4th, and Labor Day—in which members are required to participate (unless incapacitated or imprisoned) on a Harley Davidson motorcycle.

Each chapter of the organization is headed by a president and an executive body made up of a vice president, secretary-treasurer, sergeant-at-arms, enforcer, and road captain. The secretary-treasurer oversees the collection of membership dues and other revenues. The organization’s coffers, containing millions of dollars, are used to finance legal expenses and support the families of deceased and imprisoned members. The sergeant-at-arms is ordinarily the person perceived as the toughest member of the chapter. He is primarily responsible for sustaining order within the organization and also may function as an enforcer and executioner. The road captain is responsible for security, protecting organization members and interests; he is principally responsible for charting travel routes.

Probationary members, called “strikers,” must be sponsored by an active member, who assumes responsibility in mentoring the neophytes and is held accountable for their actions. Strikers spend an indeterminate period of time as prospective members, during which they must commit various felonies in order to substantiate their allegiance to the group. An extensive background investigation is conducted by a National Enforcement Unit on all prospective members. Membership is affirmed only by the unanimous vote of all chapter members.

Women generally are regarded as inferior, though distinctions are drawn between “old ladies” (the wives or steady girlfriends of members) and “mamas” or “sheep” (considered joint property of the gang and used primarily for sexual purposes). Women are not permitted to wear the club insignia, though they may sport apparel that alludes to their connection with the group—such as a shirt that reads “Property of Hells Angels.”

Giuseppe M. Fazari

See also: Altamont Free Concert; Biker Culture; Rolling Stones, The.

Further Reading

Quinn, James F. "Angels, Bandidos, Outlaws, and Pagans: The Evolution of Organized Crime among the Big Four 1 percent Motorcycle Clubs." Deviant Behavior 22:4(July 2001): 379–99.

Quinn, James F., and Shane D. Koch. "The Nature of Criminality within One-Percent Motorcycle Clubs." Deviant Behavior 24:3(May 2003): 281–306.

Thompson, Hunter S. Hell's Angels: A Strange and Terrible Saga. New York: Random House, 1967.

Wood, John. "Hells Angels and the Illusion of the Counterculture." Journal of Popular Culture 37:2(Fall 2003): 336–52.

Hemingway, Ernest (1899–1961)

One of the most influential American writers of the twentieth century, Ernest Miller Hemingway was a central figure of the Lost Generation, a term he popularized in the epigraph of his 1926 novel The Sun Also Rises. It refers to a group of American writers and artists who lived in Paris and other parts of Europe after World War I.

Hemingway was born in Oak Park, Illinois, on July 21, 1899, and began his career as a newspaper reporter with the Kansas City Star in 1917. During World War I, he volunteered as a Red Cross ambulance driver in Italy and was severely wounded. When the war was over, he moved to Paris with his first wife, Hadley, and joined a large group of expatriate American writers, including Gertrude Stein, Ezra Pound, F. Scott Fitzgerald, and Ford Madox Ford.

Abandoning what he regarded as the wordiness and bombast of the Victorian literary tradition, Hemingway pioneered a taut, simple, understated writing style. "If a prose writer knows enough about what he is writing about," he said, "he may omit things that he knows. And the reader, if the writer is writing truly enough, will have a feeling of those things as strongly as if the writer had stated them." Such short, declarative sentences became the hallmark of his writing and had a profound effect on modern American literature.

Hemingway's first book, Three Stories and Ten Poems, was published in Paris in 1923. This was followed by a collection of fifteen stories, In Our Time (1925), his first American publication. The Sun Also Rises, which appeared the following year, came to be regarded as the quintessential novel of the Lost Generation. Men Without Women, another story collection, came out in 1927, followed two years later by the acclaimed novel A Farewell to Arms, based on Hemingway's personal experience in World War I.

On the advice of fellow expatriate writer John Dos Passos, Hemingway settled in Key West, Florida, in 1931 and visited Cuba, Africa, and Spain during the course of the decade. He produced two nonfiction works based on his travels, Death in the Afternoon (1932) and Green Hills of Africa (1935), which examined bullfighting and big game hunting, respectively. Critics agree that Hemingway's work during this early period captured the spirit of the first half of the twentieth century perhaps better than any other writing.

After his travels through Africa, Hemingway went to Spain to cover the Spanish Civil War. His novel based on that conflict, For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940), is considered by many to be Hemingway's greatest literary achievement. With the outbreak of World War II, Hemingway went to Europe as a magazine correspondent. His experiences there inspired the novel Across the River and into the Trees (1950).

Perhaps the crowning moment of Hemingway's career came with the publication of The Old Man and the Sea in 1952. The novella won the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction in 1953, and Hemingway was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature the following year. The Nobel committee cited his "powerful, style-forming mastery of the art of narration.”

Despite the financial and critical success of his work, Hemingway battled depression throughout his career. During the last decade of his life, he drifted further into depression and alcoholism, and was unable to replicate in his mind the magic of his earlier writing.

“The Dangerous Summer,” an account of his 1959 trip to Spain published in Life magazine—a lesser work according to many critics—made Hemingway feel ashamed and sick. The essay would be his last work published before his death. Desperate and no longer able to continue writing, Hemingway committed suicide at his home in Ketchum, Idaho, on July 2, 1961.

Eric J. Morgan

See also: Fitzgerald, F. Scott: Lost Generation; Stein, Gertrude.

Further Reading

Baker, Carlos. Ernest Hemingway: A Life Story. New York: Collier, 1988.

Baker, Carlos. Hemingway: The Writer as Artist. 4th ed. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1972.

Lynn, Kenneth S. Hemingway. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1987.

Meyers, Jeffrey. Hemingway: A Biography. New York: Da Capo, 1999.

Trogon, Robert W., ed. Ernest Hemingway: A Literary Reference. New York: Carroll and Graff, 2002.

Hendrix, Jimi (1942–1970)

One of the most influential musicians to come out of the late 1960s acid rock scene, Jimi Hendrix established new heights for rock-guitar virtuosity and showmanship. During his short, four-year stint as a rock superstar, Hendrix pushed the boundaries of electric guitar. He was able to coax a staggering variety of sounds from his Fender Stratocaster, including the illusion of there being two separate guitarists, as he created feedback on two strings while playing lead on the others.

He was born Johnny Allen Hendrix on November 27, 1942, in Seattle, Washington, but his father later changed his name to James Marshall Hendrix. He got his first guitar at age fourteen and taught himself to play. He was a fan of Elvis Presley and Little Richard and was later influenced by the blues guitar of Muddy Waters and B.B. King. After finishing high school, he joined the U.S. Army and became a paratrooper, but he was discharged after suffering an injury while parachuting in 1961.

After his release from the military, Hendrix moved to Tennessee, playing with a succession of club bands and working as a session guitarist. He played backup guitar for such stars as King and Sam Cooke, performed on the all-black club circuit across the South and up to New York, and toured with such stars as the Isley Brothers, Little Richard, and Ike and Tina Turner.

By 1966, he had formed his own band, called Jimmy James and the Blue Flames. It was while performing with the group at New York’s Café Wha? that he was discovered by record producer Chas Chandler, who convinced Hendrix to go to London to record an album. With Chandler's help, the Jimi Hendrix Experience was formed with bassist Noel Redding and drummer Mitch Mitchell.

The Experience played a few concerts in 1967 and quickly impressed its musical peers. The concerts were followed by the group's first single, a cover of "Hey Joe." Their next two singles, "Purple Haze" and the ballad "The Wind Cries Mary," became rock standards. All three hits were showcased on the band's first album, Are You Experienced (1967), though it was not until the Monterey International Pop Festival in June of that year that Hendrix became a star. During the band's set, Hendrix played his guitar with his teeth, then behind his back, and eventually set the instrument on fire, literally. The performance was immortalized by D.A. Pennebaker's documentary film of 1968, Monterey Pop.

After a brief stint touring the United States with the Monkees, the Experience released its second album, Axis Bold as Love, in December 1967, followed by the seminal Electric Ladyland in October 1968. Hendrix's fame grew; he was enormously popular in Europe even before catching on with American audiences. His personal life, however, became increasingly mired in drugs. Associated problems, including an arrest for drug possession in May 1969, along with creative differences finally prompted Chandler to quit as Hendrix's producer and Redding to leave the band. After a final concert performance in June 1969, the Jimi Hendrix Experience officially broke up.

Hendrix formed a new band, the Gypsy Suns and Rainbows, to play at the Woodstock music festival, to be held in Bethel, New York, that August. At Woodstock, Hendrix played his notorious instrumental version of "The Star Spangled Banner," which the audience understood as a musical comment on the Vietnam War. Taking a solemn, respectful tune that honored America and patriotic allegiance to the "land of the free," Hendrix added the simulated sounds of bombs falling and created a piercing, satiric statement screeching with defiance. Those who saw the world through the eyes of the establishment were outraged by the performance; those who identified with the counterculture saw the song as a rallying point against the war and a cry for revolution. Four decades later, much of mainstream American culture continued to be offended by the recordings, while the counterculture regarded the song as an anthem.

Hendrix died in London on September 18, 1970, after choking on his vomit in reaction to a barbiturate overdose. With his death, Hendrix completed the trinity of 1960s rock musicians known as "the three Js": Janis (Joplin), Jim (Morrison), and Jimi. The hard-living lifestyles of these three superstars had prompted the rock and roll mantra "Live fast, die young, and leave a pretty corpse."

B. Keith Murphy

See also: Acid Rock; Joplin, Janis; Morrison, Jim; Woodstock Music and Art Fair.

Further Reading

Shadwick, Keith, and Douglas J. Nobel. Jimi Hendrix: Musician. San Francisco: Backbeat, 2003.

Shapiro, Harry, and Caesar Glebbek. Electric Gypsy: Jimi Hendrix. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Heroin

An opiate synthesized from morphine (a derivate of opium), heroin was originally developed in the late nineteenth century as a nonaddictive analgesic, or painkiller. It was soon found to be highly addictive, however, and to cause a feeling of euphoria after introduction into the bloodstream. From its initial use as a painkiller through its recreational use in the 1960s hippie counterculture and its central role in the nation's drug-related crime, heroin has made an indelible mark on American society. It is illegal to manufacture, sell, or possess heroin in the United States today. Common street names include smack, junk, horse, and many others.

Heroin is usually distributed in loose powder form, often dissolved in saline mixed with such additives as talc and baking powder. It is normally injected or snorted by the user. The drug creates a pleasing, relaxing effect through its chemical interaction with the brain's opiate receptors. It enters the brain rapidly. Tolerance to the drug develops easily and withdrawal can be severe, causing the user to continue taking the drug to avoid the severe flu-like symptoms that occur during withdrawal.

Opium is believed to have been cultivated in Mesopotamia more than 5,000 years ago. The practice of smoking opium was passed from India to China in the seventeenth century. The spread of opium addiction finally prompted the Chinese government to restrict importation and distribution in the nineteenth century. Meanwhile, the drug also became widely used in Europe and America as a medical analgesic.

The alkaloids morphine and codeine were isolated from opium in 1805, and heroin was first synthesized from morphine in Germany in 1898. With its addictive potential yet unrecognized, heroin was marketed as a morphine substitute and cough medicine for more than a decade. After the discovery of its addictive potential, Congress passed the Harrison Narcotics Tax Act of 1914 to halt the sale of heroin in the United States, opening a lucrative black market.

Mexico became the primary source of the drug, and smuggling operations into the United States became widespread. The black market expanded as more heroin crossed the border. The highly addictive nature of the drug, combined with its severe withdrawal symptoms and increase in tolerance, in turn contributed to the spiraling demand. Additional federal legislation was passed in 1924 to limit the manufacture and distribution of heroin.

In the 1920s, heroin use was popularized by such jazz musicians as Charlie Parker and Billie Holiday. After World War II, the drug was believed to be a major contributor to the crime wave sweeping the country. Heroin was even part of the Red Scare of the McCarthy period, as communists were said to use the drug to corrupt America's youth. In the Beat Generation of the 1950s, writers and poets such as Jack Kerouac, William S. Burroughs, and Allen Ginsberg became associated with heroin use as part of their rebellious response to conservative society.

During the Vietnam War in the 1960s and early 1970s, thousands of American soldiers were introduced to heroin and brought their addictions home. Heroin was among the most powerful and addictive recreational drugs used by the hippie counterculture, causing particular alarm among government and public health officials because of its highly addictive quality. Major rock stars were known to use the drug regularly, and several—including Janis Joplin in 1970 and Jim Morrison of the Doors in 1971—were believed to have died from overdoses.

The use of heroin began to spread to middle-class America during the 1970s, prompting new law enforcement measures and treatment modalities. Films such as More (1969), The French Connection (1971), and The Panic in Needle Park (1971) and songs such as Heroin (1967) by the Velvet Underground, The Needle and the Damage Done (1972) by Neil Young, and The Needle and the Spoon (1974) by Lynyrd Skynyrd reflect the growing public interest in heroin and heroin addicts.

In the 1990s, the drug developed new commercial appeal as "heroin chic" came into vogue. The image of pale, emaciated models with darkened eyes graced the covers of many magazines and sparked a fashion trend, albeit brief. President Bill Clinton and other political figures denounced the trend.

Leonard A. Steverson

See also: Beat Generation: Drug Culture: Holiday, Billie: Joplin, Janis: Morrison, Jim.

Further Reading

Hickman, Timothy A. "Heroin Chic: The Visual Culture of Narcotic Addiction." Third Text 16: 2(2002): 119–36.

Kuhn, Cynthia, Scott Swartzwelder, and Wilkie Wilson. Buzzed: The Straight Facts about the Most Used and Abused Drugs from Alcohol to Ecstasy. New York: W.W. Norton, 1988.

Morgan, H. Wayne. Drugs in America: A Social History, 1800–1980. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1981.

Wilson, Morrow, and Suzanne Wilson. Drugs in American Life. New York: H.W. Wilson, 1975.

Hester, Carolyn (1937–)

Folk singer Carolyn Hester may be most widely known for giving future folk superstar Bob Dylan his first chance to appear on a record, by inviting him to play harmonica on her third album, Carolyn Hester (1962). If not as prominent as such contemporaries as Joan Baez and Judy Collins, Hester was a key figure in the folk music revival of the 1960s and one of the few women to be remembered from that era.

Hester was born on January 1, 1937, in Waco, Texas. Growing up in Texas in the 1940s, Hester heard Pete Seeger sing songs of social justice on the radio and fell in love with traditional American folk music. After high school, she set out for Greenwich Village in New York City to become a folk singer. There, she met fellow Texan and rockabilly recording artist Buddy Holly, and gradually began playing clubs around the city and up and down the East Coast.

In 1957, with Holly's producer, Norman Petty, Hester recorded an album of folk songs at Petty's studio in Clovis, New Mexico, and signed a contract with Coral Records, a subsidiary of the prominent British label Decca, for distribution. The resulting LP, Scarlet Ribbons, established Hester as the first female folk artist to release an album nationally.

While working in the New York folk scene during the early 1960s, Hester met songwriter and novelist Richard Fariña (whom she married), a young folk singer from Minnesota named Bob Dylan, former military man and singer-songwriter Tom Paxton, the Irish troubadours the Clancy Brothers, and a teenage Joan Baez, among others. The Clancy Brothers produced her second album, Carolyn Hester, for their Tradition label. John Hammond signed the singer to Columbia Records for another eponymous album. Dylan's participation on the latter record led to his introduction to Hammond and eventual signing with Columbia.

With her three-octave range, ability to connect emotionally with audiences, and wide song selection—ranging from her Texas country roots to British ballads to Southern blues—Hester rose to the top of the folk ranks. She was chosen to appear on the cover of the Saturday Evening Post in May 1964 as a representative of the 1960s breed of folk singer.

Hester put her politics into action by participating in the interracial Freedom Rides across the South as part of the civil rights movement and in protests against the Vietnam War. Along with other singers and activists, she spent time in Mississippi in the mid-1960s, sharing her music with black and interracial audiences, boarding with black families in their neighborhoods, and following her calling to stand with those who were struggling for equality. Sacrificing her own career interests, she refused to continue appearing on the popular television show Hootenanny after Seeger was banned from the program for his antiwar politics.

After a break from touring and recording in the 1970s to raise her children, Hester returned to the stage the following decade, putting her own songs on record and recording a tribute to her friend Tom Paxton. She has nurtured the careers and dreams of newer generations through her work with the Kerrville Folk Festival, the World Folk Music Association, and her own performances. Original songs about Native American life and ecology have expressed her later social concerns.

Kerry Dexter

See also: Dylan, Bob; Folk Music; Seeger, Pete.

Further Reading

Gahr, David. The Faces of Folk Music. New York: Citadel, 1968.

Heckman, Don. "Folk Singer Carolyn Hester Is Back—Still Feisty, Still Full of Concerns." Los Angeles Times, February 11, 1989, part V.

Thompson, Bob. "The Ballad of Carolyn Hester: Four Decades After Stardom Passed Her By, She's Singing Her Heart Out." The Washington Post, January 12, 2005, sec. C.

Hip-Hop

Hip-hop is a cultural and aesthetic movement that arose from the disenfranchised and disenchanting African American and Puerto Rican communities of the South Bronx (New York City) during the 1970s. This broad-based movement encompasses several distinct but interrelated elements, including graffiti art, break dancing (B-boying or B-girling), beat-boxing (creating beats or rhymes with the mouth), rapping (MCing), street language, street knowledge, and urban fashion. Hip-hop culture is characterized by subversive performance, spontaneity, and a general sense of nonconformity in art, music, language, dress, and attitude. Rap lyrics, along with hip-hop fashion and slang, are heavily imbued with nonconformist messages and themes. The term hip-hop was first used in reference to the rap music produced by African American and Puerto Rican MCs and DJs in the late 1970s, such as Kool DJ Herc (Clive Campbell) and Disco King Mario. It later came to include the broader cultural expressions of the communities from which the music emerged.

Hip-hop culture emanates from an oral tradition that is intrinsic to the history of African Americans. This is the same tradition from which the cultural antecedents of hip-hop—including work songs, spirituals, the blues, jazz, rock and roll, and funk music—derived. When the drum, an instrument of African origin, was outlawed in eighteenth-century South Carolina (following the 1739 slave uprising called the Stono Rebellion or Cato's Conspiracy), slaves began to create rhythmic beats with their hands and bodies—called "hand-bone" (beating the hand to the body or "bone"). The "beat-boxing" (vocal percussion) technique popularized by hip-hop pioneers Doug E. Fresh and Darren Robinson ("Buffy, the Human Beat Box") emulates the form of subversive performance in slave communities during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Beat-boxing is also a form of mimicry that attempts to replicate the sounds associated with the original drum-box machines, or "beatboxes." The tradition of "call and response" dialogue is also central to rapping, and repetitious verse patterns buttressed by contrapuntal rhythms are central to the music and culture of hip-hop.

The hip-hop phenomenon began in a climate of social rebellion and upheaval following the civil rights activism of the 1960s and the ghetto uprisings of the latter part of the decade. Its birth paralleled both the Black Power and black arts movements of the early 1970s. In this climate of radicalism, both in the African American community and society at large, the results of “tagging,” or creating graffiti, first appeared on the subways in Philadelphia, then in New York City, and eventually in urban neighborhoods across the United States. By the mid-1970s, “tags” (gang identifiers made with spray paint, chalk, or markers) involved into elaborate calligraphy with the work of such graffiti artists as Lee Quinones and hip-hop deejays such as Afrika Bambaataa. Graffiti art was first introduced to the mainstream as a distinct aspect of urban culture in the book Subway Art (1984) and the PBS television program “Style Wars” in 1984.

The same period gave rise to B-boying and B-girling—or break dancing—the style of performers at Kool DJ Herc’s parties, who saved their most elaborate moves for the break section of a given song. The film Beat Street (1984) and the documentary feature The Freshest Kids (2002) introduced the art of break dancing to a wider audience. The Zulu Kings were the first B-boy crew. Along with urban art and the frenetic, spontaneous dance style that characterized urban culture of the mid-1970s and early 1980s, a distinctive system of communication or slang began to flourish. Phrases such as “B-boy,” “going off” (break dancing), and “droppin’ science” (spreading knowledge), among others, eventually entered the American lexicon. Break-dancing shows became popular across the country in the 1980s.

While derived from break dancing, hip-hop also incorporates funk styles such as “popping,” “locking,” and “ticking” that originated in California during the 1960s. Early performers associated with hip-hop include the DJ Afrika Bambaataa, the break-dancing group Rock Steady Crew, and the hip-hop music groups Fat Boys and Run DMC, along with individual rap artists such as Doug E. Fresh, Biz Markie, and Kurtis Blow.

Hip-hop has become a national and international phenomenon, with graffiti art, break dancing, and hip-hop styles found from New York to Los Angeles to Tokyo. Urban fashions have gained international prestige with such designer brands as FUBU and Baby Phat. The nonconformist elements of hip-hop have come to resonate with the world’s youth across ethnic lines, as American artists have represented the African American, Latino, and Caucasian communities alike.

The hip-hop culture has come under increasing criticism for song lyrics and a value system that promote misogyny and violence, most notably in reference to the gangsta rap subgenre. Hip-hop is a diverse culture, however, with its own critical voices. Indeed, the method of call and response has engaged some of the leading purveyors of hip-hop music and culture, such as Queen Latifah and Mary J. Blige (dubbed the “Hip-hop Diva”), to respond in verse to the sometimes overtly sexist lyrics of their male counterparts.

Hettie V. Williams

See also: Black Arts Movement; Black Power Movement; Fashion; Gangsta Rap; Graffiti; Rap Music.

Further Reading

Dyson, Michael Eric. Between God and Gangsta Rap: Bearing Witness to Black Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

George, Nelson. Hip Hop America. New York: Penguin, 2005.

Perkin, Eric William. Droppin’ Science: Critical Essays on Rap Music and Hip Hop Culture. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1996.

Watkins, S. Craig. Hip Hop Matters: Politics, Pop Culture, and the Struggle for the Soul of a Movement. Boston: Beacon, 2006.

Hippies

Hippies is the term applied to members of the most visible and extreme wing of the counterculture of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Hippies comprised not a formal movement but, rather, a loose collection of individuals and small groups defined by their unconventional values, behavior, and tastes in fashion, music, and the arts. Although people from many walks of life adopted the counterculture lifestyle, the stereotypical hippie was a white youth from a middle-class background. The hippies developed out of earlier countercultures— most notably the antimaterialistic, nonconformist Beat Generation of the 1950s—and first arose as a distinct subculture in the mid-1960s. Media fascination with the group spread its influence in the late 1960s.

Since the 1970s, mainstream American culture has tacitly adopted many values and behaviors originally associated with the counterculture. During the same time, however, the media and most of the public have depicted hippies (and neo-hippies) as relics of the 1960s. Additionally, cultural conservatives have denounced the hippie legacy for causing a decline in American morality and resort to hippie bashing as a weapon in their “culture wars” against their liberal opponents, whom they portray as the hippies’ heirs.

Background and Influences

In America, the term hippie derived from the “hipsters” of the 1940s and 1950s, who rejected mainstream society and centered their subculture on jazz music and the recreational use of drugs, especially marijuana and heroin. The hippies’ immediate forerunners were the Beats or beatniks of the 1950s. The Beat Generation was influenced by the era’s improvisational and experimental art forms, such as jazz music, abstract-expressionist painting, and stream-of-consciousness poetry and prose. Leading Beat personalities included poet Allen Ginsberg and novelists William S. Burroughs, Neal Cassady, and Jack Kerouac.

The Beats dissented from what they viewed as the stifling bourgeois culture of the 1950s. They anticipated the hippies in rejecting such middle-class values as social conformity, self-repression, delayed gratification, hard work, suburban lifestyles, material acquisition, and mindless consumerism. Instead, they embraced hedonism, existentialism, personal authenticity, and experimentation. They glorified spontaneity, madcap humor, adventurous travel, sexuality, drug use, and unconventional—often Eastern—forms of spirituality. The Beat’s countercultural sensibility was bolstered by the burgeoning youth culture, which found rebellious role models in Mad magazine, novelist J.D. Salinger’s characters, actors James Dean and Marlon Brando, and singer Elvis Presley and other rock and roll stars.

The counterculture of the 1960s developed out of this Beat and youth-culture background. The hippies embraced many of the Beats’ values and behaviors, and their oppositional cultural ethos was further shaped by the era’s events and issues: continuing cold war militarism, fears of nuclear war, resistance to racial integration, paternalistic attitudes toward women and youth, and concerns about ecological damage. Perhaps most important was U.S. escalation of the Vietnam War, which many Americans regarded as a distortion of national ideals that threatened, through the military draft, the liberty and lives of young men. The hippies also gained numbers and power from the huge baby boom generation that came of age in the late 1960s and often congregated on college campuses. Finally, technological innovations, such as the development of the birth-control pill and the drug LSD (“acid”), also helped to enable hippie behavior.

Emergence of a Counterculture

By the mid-1960s, a distinct subculture of hippies had formed in several places throughout the United States. Like the Beats, hippies first congregated in such urban areas as New York's Greenwich Village, San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury, and Los Angeles's Venice Beach, and in such college towns as Berkeley, California, and Cambridge, Massachusetts. Hippies also sought the existentialist pleasure of large gatherings of like-minded individuals, such as the Human Be-In in San Francisco, which inaugurated 1967's Summer of Love.

Hippies espoused values that were nondoctrinaire, if somewhat vague, including peace, love, harmony, pleasure seeking, and personal freedom. This meant opposing militarism, racism, sexism, intolerance, and sexual repression, though the opposition tended to be personal rather than conventionally political. Hippie lifestyle and behavior featured communal living, free love (an openness to sexuality and multiple partners), psychedelic drug use, an embrace of Eastern and New Age religions, listening to and performing folk or rock music, creating and admiring pop art, and acting in street or "guerrilla" theater.

Although hippies never formed a unified movement, they often massed together as fans of folk and rock music. Folk music's association with personal authenticity in the face of social pressures and its sing-along communalism appealed to hippies. In the 1950s and early 1960s, folk revived as a popular-music form, and musicians such as Pete Seeger, Joan Baez, and the group Peter, Paul and Mary became best-selling artists. Folk's biggest star was Bob Dylan, a young musician whose lyrics and lifestyle embodied the counterculture's search for personal meaning and questioning of authority. Dylan's impact on other musicians was enormous. One band, the Byrds, helped Dylan popularize folk rock music, which fused folk's meaningful or experimental lyrics with rock's muscular electronic rhythms.

The Beatles—along with the Rolling Stones, Cream, the Jimi Hendrix Experience, Jefferson Airplane, the Doors, the Grateful Dead, and Pink Floyd—helped popularize "psychedelic" rock, perhaps the central unifying element of hippie culture. This music was characterized by pounding rhythms, distorted sound from overamplified guitars, experimental recording techniques, and outlandish and often sexualized lyrics. Hippies found that "acid rock," the form especially evocative of the psychedelic drug experience, enhanced the "head trips" produced by marijuana, LSD, psilocybin mushrooms, peyote, and other psychoactive substances.

Rock music thus served as a kind of soundtrack for the hippie bohemianism of the late 1960s, with concerts and festivals providing a gathering place for their "beloved community." The emblematic rock concert of the period was the Woodstock Music and Art Fair, held in Bethel, New York, over three days in August 1969. The hippie counterculture came to be referred to as the "Woodstock Nation."

Recreational drugs joined rock music as an activity separating the counterculture from what was regarded as the "straight" or "square" culture. Some hippies glorified the use of marijuana or LSD as a means of raising consciousness to a higher, more authentic level. For example, LSD guru and Harvard University professor Dr. Timothy Leary counseled people to "Turn on, tune in, drop out." For many hippies, however, drug use was simply an act of pleasure seeking; "If it feels good, do it," was a frequent refrain.

The same ethic, regarded as hedonism by much of American society, informed hippies' embrace of the sexual revolution. The focus on sex as pleasure rather than as procreation was facilitated by materialism and economic prosperity after World War II, advances in birth control (especially the Pill, introduced in 1960), and the increasing mingling of the sexes at school and on the job. Hippie women often portrayed their involvement in the sexual revolution as a rejection of the cultural double standard that allowed men, but not women, to engage in sexual activity freely and openly, outside of marriage. Many gays and lesbians, who had had their own closeted counterculture for decades, became hippies, too.

Although some hippie males held traditional views about women's place in society, the egalitarian ethos of the counterculture was conducive to feminism's reemergence. Just as African Americans demanded freedom from racist laws and drug users desired an unshackling from repressive social norms, women sought liberation from patriarchal oppression. Feminists split between radical "women's libbers" and more conventional feminists, who called for gender equality but accepted middle-class values and mores. A major dividing line was homosexuality: Hippie feminists often depicted lesbianism as a principled rejection of patriarchal values, while mainstream feminists, like many in mainstream society at the time, regarded it as a distasteful sexual perversion.

For both women and men, fashion and grooming served as the most obvious emblems of countercultural loyalty. The style was garish but casual and often was influenced by Eastern, African, ethnic, or working-class fashions. Hippie females usually wore their hair long and straight, spurned makeup, and dressed in brightly colored (often tie-dyed) shirts, tight bell-bottom jeans or skirts (either short minis, or long and flowing), and sandals. Males also wore their hair long (which became the main badge for countercultural men), grew facial hair, and dressed in colorful shirts, bell-bottom jeans, and sandals. Embracing “naturalness,” hippies often rejected meticulous personal hygiene and perfume or cologne as bourgeois conventions.

Most hippies shunned conventional electoral politics, but their values and lifestyle were often seen as a protest against traditional political values. Some hippies did engage in politics, typically joining the student-driven New Left. However, hippies tended to focus on issues personally affecting them. For example, they often lobbied against drug laws and legal discrimination based on race, gender, or age. The military draft was a chief political concern of male hippies. Many hippie feminists defined politics broadly, criticizing power imbalances in all human relations, including marriage and the family. The feminist slogan “the personal is political” encapsulated the viewpoint of many hippies.

Colorfully combining rebellion, hedonism, sex, drugs, youth, celebrity, and politics, the hippie lifestyle soon became a focus of the media. Dominated by older traditionalist males, the press and electronic media were both outraged and fascinated by the hippie lifestyle. Various hippie groups took advantage of the media’s interest to promote causes, tweak conventional sensibilities, or gain notoriety. The Diggers (a community-action group of improvisational actors based in San Francisco) and others staged outrageous stunts to promote political causes (especially opposition to the Vietnam War and the Washington, D.C., political establishment), publicize events, or advertise products such as organic foods and underground publications. Activists Abbie Hoffman and Jerry Rubin combined countercultural values with New Left politics by forming the Youth International Party (also known as the yippies), which gained notoriety by leading antiwar protests at the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

The 1970s and Beyond

Although hippies were closely associated with the 1960s, many Americans continued to live counterculture lifestyles in the ensuing decades. Communes and cooperatives remained popular into the 1970s. Many rock groups persisted in personifying hippie behavior, epitomized by the Grateful Dead, who served as a kind of traveling counterculture, attracting committed fans known as “Deadheads” from concert to concert. A number of college campuses also remained hospitable to the hippie life.

Thus, beginning in the 1980s, people too young to have experienced the 1960s nonetheless emulated the era’s lifestyle, becoming “neo-hippies.” Epitomizing the new counterculture lifestyle were raves—all-night dance parties held in warehouses and clubs and outdoors—the annual Burning Man alternative-arts festival in Nevada, and such rock groups as Phish.

Beginning with their emergence in the 1960s, hippies became the primary target of cultural traditionalists. Conflict between these groups developed into the so-called culture wars. Conservative politicians realized that the “silent majority”—a term used by President Richard M. Nixon in 1969 in reference to the masses of mainstream Americans who do not express their opinions publicly—disliked hippies, perceiving them as selfish, immature, arrogant, ungrateful, lazy, dirty, criminal, drug addled, sexually perverse, and determined to destroy American institutions. For many conservatives, mass murderer Charles Manson and his crazed, homicidal “family” epitomized the danger that hippies posed to American society.

From the 1960s through the 2000s, conservatives—including Republican presidents Nixon, Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush, and George W. Bush—condemned the legacy of the hippies, blaming it for the alleged decline in American morality. Republicans also depicted Democrats as relics of the hippie counterculture; President Bill Clinton, most notably, was regarded as a direct legacy of the 1960s counterculture.

Although hippies helped to inflame the culture wars and often were the object of ridicule in mainstream American culture, the latter quietly assimilated many counterculture values, among them egalitarianism, informality, disapproval of sexism and racism, concern for the environment, tolerance for diversity, and tolerance of libertine behaviors. Contemporary tastes in fashion, hair, and music also owed much to the hippie movement. Yoga and New Age religions appealed to many Americans. And corporations used counterculture-themed advertisements to sell their products.

As a result, some commentators believed that much of the counterculture has been assimilated into the dominant culture. As syndicated columnist David Brooks noted in 2000, many Americans have combined middle-class values at work with hippie values at home to form a new “bourgeois bohemianism.”

George Rising

See also: Baby Boomers: Beat Generation: Be-Ins: Berkeley, California: Birth Control Pill: Brando, Marlon: Communes: Dean, James: Drug Culture: Fashion: Folk Music: Free Love: Grateful Dead: Greenwich Village, New York City: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco: Heroin: Jazz: Leary, Timothy: Los Angeles, California: LSD: Marijuana: New Age: New Left: Psychedelia: Rock and Roll: Sexual Revolution: Venice, California: Vietnam War Protests: Woodstock Music and Art Fair: Yippies.

Further Reading

Braunstein, Peter, and Michael William Doyle , eds. Imagine Nation: The American Counterculture of the 1960s and'70s. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Brooks, David. Bobos in Paradise: The New Upper Class and How They Got There. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2000.

Frank, Thomas. The Conquest of Cool: Business Culture, Counterculture, and the Rise of Hip Consumerism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Gitlin, Todd. The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage. New York: Bantam, 1987.

Hoffman, Abbie. Revolution for the Hell of It. New York: Dial, 1968.

Leary, Timothy. High Priest. New York: World, 1968.

Roszak, Theodore. The Making of a Counter Culture: Reflections on the Technocratic Society and Its Youthful Opposition. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1969.

Rubin, Jerry. Do It! Scenarios of the Revolution. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1970.

Hitchhiking

Hitchhiking is the practice of hailing strangers driving motor vehicles and asking for a ride. Hitchhikers in North America signal drivers by extending their thumb; thus, hitchhiking is often referred to as “thumbing a ride” or “riding your thumb.” Drivers willing to pick up hitchhikers often take them only for a portion of their intended journey, and hitchhikers typically have to rely on a number of rides to reach their final destination. In many parts of the world, hitchhiking is an accepted practice with few legal restrictions. In parts of the United States, including New Jersey, Florida, Utah, Washington, and other states, hitchhiking is prohibited by law.

One of the earliest published references to hitchhiking appears in a 1914 collection of writings by the American poet Nicholas Vachel Lindsay, Adventures while Preaching the Gospel of Beauty. In a letter dated June 23, Lindsay wrote:

About five o'clock in the evening some man making a local trip is apt to come along alone. He it is that wants the other side of the machine weighed down. He it is that will offer me a ride and spin me along from five to twenty-five miles before supper. This delightful use that may be made of an automobile in rounding out a day's walk has had something to do with mending my prejudice against it, despite the grand airs of the tourists that whirl by at midday.

Hitchhiking became a powerful symbol of the search for a better life during the social upheaval of the Great Depression. In novels such as John Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath (1939) and John Dos Passos's Adventures of a Young Man (1939), characters use their thumbs to travel in search of work or simply a change of scenery.

The most influential literary evocation of hitchhiking—one that has inspired countercultures since it first appeared in 1957—is presented in Jack Kerouac's novel On the Road. This work, more than any other source, contributed to the image of hitchhiking as a freewheeling, romantic expression of life on the open road, free from the everyday burdens of work and family. The central character in On the Road, Dean Moriarty, stands as the iconic image of the hitchhiker as utopian dreamer, the angel-headed hipster who has taken to the road in search of something more authentic and meaningful than the dull conformity of America's consumer society.

Hitchhiking has been an appealing means of travel for people in different countercultures for a variety of reasons, ranging from the prosaic and material to the poetic and mystical. In material terms, for people who may be lacking in financial resources, hitchhiking presents an affordable way to get around. For the counterculturally inclined, hitchhiking usually holds greater social or philosophical significance—an example of human solidarity, sharing, and mutual aid, even in the context of advanced capitalist society. If nothing else, hitchhiking offers an opportunity to go beyond one's own social circle and meet new and possibly interesting people.

In the countercultures of the 1960s and 1970s, hitchhiking served as an aspect of social networking and solidarity building. People sharing rides to music concerts or political demonstrations could spend time discussing and debating everything from their favorite bands to political and social issues. The lingo was spread, drugs shared. Hitchhiking stood as a marker of one's membership in, or at least openness to, the counterculture and the values it espoused, especially those of communalism and mutual aid.

The mythologies surrounding counterculture icons such as folk singers Bob Dylan and Woody Guthrie included hitchhiking adventures across America's heartland in search of songs and "truth." Authenticity, common sense, and the decency of ordinary folks were the hallmarks of the hitchhiker experience. It was life on the road, a guitar slung over one's shoulder, in search of America. The image and romance were promoted in countless songs of the 1960s and 1970s counterculture, from "Sweet Hitchhiker" by Creedence Clearwater Revival to "Riding My Thumb to Mexico" by Johnny Rodriguez.

Hitchhiking remains a regular means of transportation for the American counterculture, for reasons both material and philosophical. Participants in contemporary global justice movements rely on it as a way to travel to far-flung demonstrations against the World Bank, World Trade Organization, and other institutions. Since the 1980s, however, hitchhiking has come to play a less significant part in countercultural activities, largely as a result of criminalization and stepped-up law enforcement in many parts of North America.

In the Canadian province of Ontario, for example, the Safe Streets Act of 1999 outlawed hitchhiking and other acts of solicitation, such as panhandling. The measure was conceived in the context of moral concern over youth crimes and right-wing discourses advocating a need to get tough on youth crime. In the United States, local anti-hitchhiking laws have been precipitated largely by concerns over highway safety.

Jeff Shantz

See also: Dylan, Bob: Great Depression: Guthrie, Woody: Kerouac, Jack.

Further Reading

Dos Passos, John. Adventures of a Young Man. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1939.

Kerouac, Jack. On the Road. New York: Viking, 1957.

Lindsay, Vachel. Adventures while Preaching the Gospel of Beauty. New York: Kennerley, 1914.

Steinbeck, John. The Grapes of Wrath. New York: Viking, 1939.

Hoffman, Abbie (1936–1989)

Abbie Hoffman was a political and cultural revolutionary of the 1960s who sought to politicize the youth of America. Uniting techniques such as guerrilla theater, mass protest, and playing to the media, Hoffman engineered new methods for fighting the status quo and became a powerful member of the counterculture as well as a figure who has come to characterize the era.

Early Life and Activism

Born Abbott Howard Hoffman on November 30, 1936, to a financially comfortable, middle-class family in Worcester, Massachusetts, he showed a rebellious attitude toward authority while a youth. Educators regarded him as intelligent, and despite his expulsion from the local public high school (for disrespecting authority), Hoffman was accepted by the prestigious Worcester Academy in 1955 and, later, Brandeis University in Waltham, Massachusetts, from which he graduated in 1959.

Although Hoffman's activism did not surface immediately, he read widely at Brandeis. While pursuing an advanced degree in psychology at the University of California, Berkeley, in 1960, he joined his first protest, demonstrating against the death penalty outside San Quentin prison in an attempt to stop the execution of convicted felon Caryl Chessman. In later years, Hoffman pointed to this event as his earliest activist experience.

Returning to Massachusetts in July 1960 without completing graduate school, Hoffman married artist and fellow activist Sheila Karklin. He also became a community organizer, fighting racial discrimination in local hiring practices while running a neighborhood art cinema. He spent the summer of 1965 in McComb, Mississippi, registering impoverished and oppressed blacks in the area to vote.

Upon his return from the South, Hoffman resolved to continue his civil rights work and opened a cooperative business through the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), called the SNICK Shop, in Worcester. The store sold handmade craft items and clothing made by poor Southern blacks in an attempt to help them achieve economic independence. Following his divorce from Karklin in 1966, Hoffman left Worcester to become the landlord of New York City's Liberty House, a rent-controlled apartment building.

Hippies

Around the time of Hoffman's move to New York City, Stokely Carmichael became the new chairman of SNCC, and the organization, adopting a more militant Black Power platform, voted to exclude all whites from membership. Hoffman took the changes personally, reacting strongly in a series of articles he wrote for The Village Voice and other publications.

Rejecting his previous path, Hoffman decided that the only way to continue his activism in a meaningful way was to drop out of the mainstream culture and become part of the hippie counterculture, smoking marijuana and using the mind-altering drug LSD. During this time, he also met Anita Kushner, whom he married in 1967 in a hippie ceremony in New York's Central Park.

Hoffman's intent to adopt the hippie lifestyle quickly shifted, however, as he realized that hippies were overwhelmingly apolitical. He believed that in order to enact serious sociopolitical change, hippies needed to be politicized—and he made it his personal responsibility to radicalize them.

Radical activist Abbie Hoffman, cofounder of the yippie movement and member of the Chicago Seven, represented the wild side of the 1960s counterculture. He was arrested in 1968 for wearing this U.S. flag shirt, but the conviction was later overturned. (Tyrone Dukes/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Yippies

Hoffman sought imaginative new methods for social and political protest in order to raise the consciousness of hippies and other counterculture youth. With the input of friends and fellow activists Paul Krassner, Jerry Rubin, Stewart ("Stew") Albert, and wife Anita, Hoffman helped form and lead the Youth International Party (known as yippies), a loosely organized group of individuals who aimed to politicize the 1960s counterculture. Taking their cue from the Diggers, a San Francisco–based group of street actors, the yippies began to manipulate the media to publicize their offbeat, guerrilla performance art activities.

Much of the yippies' power existed in the realms of words and myth, of which Hoffman was author and purveyor extraordinaire. Among their most well-known exploits, the yippies planned an antiwar demonstration during the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago, calling it a "Festival of Life." Using stream-of-consciousness dialogue and writing, profanity, drug references, and threats of sex in public during their demonstration in order to draw crowds, the yippies garnered the attention of not just the youth counterculture and media, but also the Chicago authorities. The protests erupted in violence, though mainly on the part of Chicago police; Hoffman, Rubin, and other demonstrators were arrested. Charged with conspiracy and incitement to riot, they were later acquitted.

Life Underground

Although yippie actions gained media attention, the group was unable to politicize as many young people as they had hoped. When the social movements of the 1960s began to fade in the early 1970s, Hoffman was emotionally devastated. He began using and dealing cocaine, and on August 28, 1973, he was arrested for selling the drug. The crime was a federal offense with a penalty of fifteen years to life in prison. Rather than face an almost certain prison term, Hoffman went underground and remained a fugitive for nearly seven years.

During his years underground, Hoffman continued his activist work. Taking the pseudonym Barry Freed, he worked as an organizer for the Save the River campaign in New York and Canada, which opposed a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers plan to dredge the St. Lawrence River. At the same time, however, he was fighting a more personal battle with bipolar disorder. Though initially Hoffman did not want to confront his illness, his moods became more volatile, and he finally accepted treatment. Shortly thereafter, in September 1980, he turned himself in to police in New York City.

Later Life

After serving a few months in prison, Hoffman was permitted to participate in a work-release program as a counselor, followed by his permanent release. He embarked on a speaking tour of college campuses and was dismayed by the students' lack of knowledge about the social movements of the 1960s.

Hoffman's old friend and colleague Jerry Rubin had changed his politics and had become a conservative stockbroker. Seeking to raise awareness of the movements he had been involved in and to interest students in the sociopolitical issues of the day, Hoffman began a speaking tour in 1984 during which he debated Rubin—an event billed as "Yippie vs. Yuppie."

In 1987, Hoffman moved to Bucks County, Pennsylvania, where he lived out the last stage of his life, fighting against a plan for a nuclear power plant on the Delaware River. His troubles with bipolar disorder increased, however, and depression followed. On April 12, 1989, Hoffman chose to end his life with a combination of barbiturates and alcohol. He was found dead in his apartment in Solebury, Pennsylvania.

Kathryn L. Meiman

See also: Chicago Seven; Cocaine; Hippies; LSD; Rubin, Jerry; Vietnam War Protests; Yippies.

Further Reading

Hoffman, Abbie. Soon to Be a Major Motion Picture. New York: Putnam, 1980.

Hoffman, Abbie, and Daniel Simon. The Best of Abbie Hoffman. New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 1989.

Jezer, Marty. Abbie Hoffman: American Rebel. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1993.

Raskin, Jonah. For the Hell of It: The Life and Times of Abbie Hoffman. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Holiday, Billie (1915–1959)

Billie Holiday was the definitive jazz singer from the 1930s to the 1950s, committed to the musical genre she helped define before it became an acceptable part of mainstream American culture. She recorded songs on at least six record labels—Brunswick, Capitol, Columbia, Commodore, Decca, and Vocalion—and sang with some of the top orchestra leaders of her era, including Benny Goodman, Count Basie, Artie Shaw, and Lionel Hampton. Although Holiday became more popular over the decades, performing at such distinguished venues as the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, the Apollo Theater in Harlem, and Carnegie Hall in New York City, her reputation was cemented only after her early death, at the age of forty-four, due to poor health brought on by drug use and alcoholism.

Jazz singer Billie Holiday, recognized as one of America's great female vocalists of the 1930s–1950s, helped bring jazz into the musical mainstream. Her personal life was plagued by tragedy. (Gjon Mili/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

She was born Eleanora Fagan on April 7, 1915, in Philadelphia, to teenaged parents Clarence Holiday, a jazz guitarist and son of a slave, and Sadie Fagan. She was raised largely by relatives in Baltimore, Maryland, attending both public and parochial schools through the fourth grade, before dropping out. Her childhood was difficult because of long separations from her mother, constantly moving from one household to another, and the physical abuse she suffered, including rape by a neighbor. By the age of twelve, she had become a prostitute.

Sometime during the 1920s, she began to sing in speakeasies in Baltimore and later in the bars and grills of Harlem. It was during this time that she changed her name to Billie Holiday, taking the first name of a movie star (Billie Dove) and the last name of her father. Singing from table to table, she built her reputation and experience as a jazz vocalist.

Holiday began recording in 1933, when music critic and record producer John Hammond discovered her in a Harlem club and introduced her to big-band jazz orchestra leader Benny Goodman. She appeared at the prestigious Apollo Theater in 1935, and over the next few years recorded with notable musicians such as Goodman, swing era jazz pianist Teddy Wilson, and jazz balladeer Ben Webster. From 1935 to 1937, she toured with swing bandleader Count Basie, becoming known for her soulful voice, infused with emotion. Poignant renditions of such songs as “Don’t Explain,” “Fine and Mellow,” “God Bless the Child,” and “Gloomy Sunday” (banned from radio for its expressions of deep despair) came to define her career.

Traveling with an all-white band throughout the South, Holiday experienced the racism endemic to the United States in those days and often rebelled against it. She suffered the indignities of having to use back entrances at the segregated clubs in which she worked.

One of her great contributions to racial consciousness came when she sang “Strange Fruit,” a song written by Abel Meerpol in response to the thousands of lynchings of black people in the South. Her performance had a profound effect on the integrated audience at Café Society, the Greenwich Village club where Holiday first introduced the song in 1938. She recorded “Strange Fruit” in 1939; it became one of her signature songs and one of the first widely disseminated protest songs.

Holiday reached the peak of her popularity in the 1940s. Making as much as $1,000 per week, she appeared on stage in elegant gowns with what would become her trademark, a white gardenia in her hair.

While her professional career was reaching new heights, her personal life was plagued with bad choices. In 1941, she married Jimmy Monroe, who introduced her to opium use. Her drug habit soon turned to heroin, which consumed much of her income and interfered with professional engagements. Following an attempt at rehabilitation, the Federal Bureau of Narcotics began observing her activities, looking for signs of relapse.

In 1947, Holiday was arrested for drug possession and placed in a federal drug-rehabilitation center for a nine-month sentence. Two weeks after her release later that year, Holiday performed to a sold-out crowd at Carnegie Hall. The audience, welcoming her back, was rewarded with one of her most brilliant performances.

Between 1952 and 1957, Holiday recorded more than 100 new songs with the Verve recording label. But the decade also brought a return to heroin use and an arrest on drug charges. She was finally able to kick the drug habit but took to heavy drinking that often impaired her performances. Her last performance was at the Phoenix Theater in New York City in May 1959.

Holiday had an aversion to singing what she considered poorly written popular songs and had a slow, deliberate singing style that was hard for some audiences to grasp—but that widened the audience for jazz music in America and elsewhere. Critics would later suggest that the hardships of her life gave her music added depth and meaning.

By the time of her death from heart and liver ailments on July 15, 1959, she had made hundreds of recordings. She also published an autobiography, Lady Sings the Blues (1956), a frank account of her life and work.

Susan Love Brown and Joann M. Ross

See also: Heroin; Jazz.

Further Reading

Davis, Angela Y. Blues Legacies and Black Feminism: Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Billie Holiday. New York: Vintage Books, 1998.

Griffin, Farah Jasmine. If You Can't Be Free, Be a Mystery: In Search of Billie Holiday. New York: Ballantine, 2002.

Holiday, Billie, with William Dufty. Lady Sings the Blues. 1956. New York: Penguin, 1984.

Margolick, David. Strange Fruit: The Biography of a Song. New York: Ecco/HarperCollins, 2001.

Nicholson, Stuart. Billie Holiday. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1995.

hooks, bell (1952–)

The author of more than twenty-five books, writer, educator, and social activist bell hooks (the pen name of Gloria Jean Watkins), is widely regarded as one of the most prolific and most anthologized black feminist theorists and cultural critics of the late twentieth century. She is best known for her works Ain't I A Woman: Black Women and Feminism (1981), Feminist Theory: From Margin to Center (1984), Teaching to Transgress: Education as the Practice of Freedom (1994), and Feminism Is for Everybody (2000). Most of her writings address themes of race, racism, class, gender, sexuality, and sexual orientation. She also writes about the writing process and, in recent works such as Salvation: Black People and Love (2001), Communion: The Female Search for Love (2002), and Rock My Soul: Black People and Self-Esteem (2003), the issues of love and self-esteem.

Watkins was born on September 25, 1952, in Hopkinsville, Kentucky, where she and six siblings were raised in poverty by her mother, a homemaker, and her father, a custodian. After attending racially segregated schools in Hopkinsville, she received a bachelor's degree in English from Stanford University in 1973, a master of arts in English from the University of Wisconsin–Madison in 1976, and a Ph.D. in literature from the University of California, Santa Cruz in 1983.

As a college instructor in California in the late 1970s, she published her first book—a short poetry collection titled And There We Wept (1978)—under the name bell hooks, after her grandmother and mother. She uses the lowercase spelling to emphasize that readers should pay attention to the content of her work, not the author.

From the early 1980s, hooks has taught English, literature, African American studies, and women's studies at several institutions of higher learning, including the University of California, Santa Cruz, San Francisco State University, Yale University, and Oberlin College. She was distinguished professor of English at City University of New York from 1994 to 2004, after which she returned to Kentucky to teach at Berea College.

In her writings, hooks often uses her own life as a starting point for in-depth analyses of social and theoretical issues, as in Bone Black: Memories of Girlhood (1996) and Sisters of the Yam: Black Women and Self-Recovery (1993). In many of her works, she addresses the ways in which different types of oppressions are interlinked, making resistance all the more difficult. As reflected in her references to the "white, supremacist, capitalist patriarchy," hooks regards race, gender, and political and economic domination as a powerful, tightly linked social dynamic that perpetuates the oppression of minorities, women, and the poor. The power and accessibility of her writing and her attention to issues of importance to African American women and men alike have helped her advance the cause of feminism in a broad cross section of the black community.

Other notable works include Black Looks: Race and Representation (1992), Outlaw Culture: Resisting Representations (1994), Killing Rage: Ending Racism (1995), We Real Cool: Black Men and Masculinity (2003), The Will to Change: Men, Masculinity, and Love (2004), Soul Sister: Women, Friendship, and Fulfillment (2005), and Homegrown: Engaged Cultural Criticism (2006). She is the recipient of the Before Columbus Foundation's American Book Award (1991) and the Lila Wallace–Reader's Digest Fund Writer's Award (1994).

Emily C. Martin-Hondros

See also: Feminism, Third-Wave.

Further Reading

Florence, Namulundah. Bell Hooks' Engaged Pedagogy. Westport, CT: Bergin & Garvey, 1998.

Guy-Sheftall, Beverly, ed. Words of Fire: An Anthology of African-American Feminist Thought. New York: New Press, 1995.

Hopper, Dennis (1936–)

Best known as the director and costar of the 1969 counterculture film Easy Rider, Dennis Hopper is an acclaimed independent actor and filmmaker, despite his frequent portrayal of misfit characters and his own bad-boy image. His offscreen propensity to violence and history of alcohol and drug abuse have led to a number of acting roles as troubled outcasts and tormented figures of various kinds. To the surprise of Hollywood and the movie-going public, he has endured in the business into the twenty-first century, while pursuing interests in photography, painting, art collection, spoken-word poetry, and Republican political causes.

Dennis Hopper was born in Dodge City, Kansas, on May 17, 1936, and he moved with his family to San Diego, California, at the age of fourteen. After some early television appearances, he landed a role in the film Rebel Without a Cause (1955) opposite film icon James Dean. Hopper and Dean became fast friends, and Dean served as a mentor and adviser to the fledgling actor. Already a prolific painter, Hopper was advised by Dean to begin taking photographs as training for his film career. The advice served him well, as Hopper pursued his creative instincts as a candid photographer off and on for the rest of his life. In the meantime, he appeared in Giant (1956) with Dean, who died in a car accident before the film's release.

Hopper continued to act through the 1950s and most of the 1960s, landing small roles in a series of films, mostly Westerns. He also continued to work as a photographer and painter, until a fire at his home in 1961 consumed almost 300 of his paintings. Thereafter, he concentrated on art collecting and photography, cementing his reputation as a photographer with exhibitions of candid portraits of notable personalities and artists of the 1960s—civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr., pop artists Andy Warhol and Roy Lichtenstein, among others.

Hopper was catapulted to superstar status with the release of Easy Rider. He costarred with Peter Fonda and Jack Nicholson, and cowrote the film with Fonda and Terry Southern. Tapping the angst and disillusionment of the late 1960s, Easy Rider captured the blend of social criticism, political commentary, and drug-culture alienation that typified the counterculture of the time.

Made independently for $340,000, Easy Rider was bought and distributed by Columbia Pictures—making it the first widely successful independent film in America. Its guerrilla-style filmmaking, stark cinematography, and low budget set a precedent for the independent film market for the next thirty years. Grossing more than $60 million worldwide by 1972, the counterculture classic still maintains one of the top investment-to-return ratios in film history.

After Easy Rider, Hopper directed a critical and commercial flop called The Last Movie (1971), which sent him down a self-destructive path of drugs and alcohol. In 1980, he directed Out of the Blue, which received moderate critical attention. His acting career was revitalized by a supporting role in David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986), in which Hopper invoked his aggressive and sometimes violent personality to full advantage playing psychopath Frank Booth.

Hopper earned an Academy Award for Best Supporting Actor in Hoosiers (1988), playing the alcoholic father of a high-school basketball player. Also in 1988, he earned critical acclaim as a director for his film Colors about Los Angeles gangs and police.

Married five times and with a list of film and television credits that has continued to grow, Hopper also resumed his painting and photography in earnest. Over the years, dozens of exhibits of his work have been mounted internationally. Maintaining a home and studio outside of Taos, New Mexico, he continues to pursue his creative expression as an actor, director, and visual artist.

Jeffrey Sartain

See also: Dean, James: Easy Rider: Film, Independent.

Further Reading

Fuchs, Rudi, and Jan Hein Sassen. Dennis Hopper (a Keen Eye): Artist, Photographer, Filmmaker. Rotterdam, The Netherlands: RAI, 2001.

Rodriguez, Ellen. Dennis Hopper: A Madness to His Method. New York: St. Martin's, 1988.

Hot-Rodding

The term hot-rodding refers to the car customization and custom car “sport” racing counterculture that emerged in America following World War II, peaked in the mid-1950s, and lasted through the mid-1960s. Hot-rodders tweaked their cars for performance and appearance, usually through the remanufacturing of salvaged scrap parts. The customization process typically involved reducing the weight of the original vehicle to make it more aerodynamic and fast, and modifications that also made it more visually appealing. Hot-rodding often required the installation of special tires for traction and handling, fine-tuned or high-power engines for greater speed, and the removal or alteration of body parts, such as the windshield, roof, bumper, lights, hood, and fenders. In addition, hot-rodding frequently involved custom paint jobs that affixed pinstripes, flames, and other colorful or artistic designs.

Although customizing cars for speed and looks dates to the very beginning of the commercial automobile industry, hot-rodding culture per se is a post–World War II phenomenon. It gained a major following among youth and adult car enthusiasts who formed competitive teams that customized the appearance and performance of their hot rods; some of these groups achieved regional notoriety. The car-customization movement originated in Southern California, whose many dry lake beds provided flat, smooth, open surfaces ideal for racing high-speed vehicles.

Hot-rod enthusiasts proudly claimed to be part of “Kustom Kulture,” hordes of eccentric car customizers and artists who propagated the creed of DIY—Do It Yourself. It was one way among many in which America’s postwar youth were encouraged to think outside the mainstream and express themselves creatively. Led by visionary hot-rod artists such as Von Dutch, Robert Williams, and especially Ed “Big Daddy” Roth—creator of the quintessential caricature of hot-rod counterculture, Rat Fink—the Kustom Kulture became an important piece of American cultural identity. Hot-rodding and Kustom Kulture exerted their influence on the vernacular as well, popularizing slang terms for car parts and customization that became parts of common speech. Terms such as “fire up” (an engine), “haul ass,” and “souped-up” all derive from the jargon of the hot-rod counterculture.

From the beginning, the hot-rodding counterculture was distinctly iconoclastic. It developed from an unrefined amateur endeavor in which a vehicle’s performance was the primary concern into a sophisticated art form where aesthetics were equally noteworthy. Standard-issue vehicles of postwar Detroit were transformed into tire-squealing sport racers with bold, edgy designs.

The hot-rodding craze began to wane in the mid-1960s, when car manufacturers began to increase performance and engine size in new models, and the youth counterculture took more politically and socially oriented directions. Still, the hot-rod culture in America remains very much alive today, as reflected in the many magazines on the subject and the widespread interest in vintage cars of the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s. Moreover, burgeoning interest in the National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing (NASCAR) and drag racing harkens back to the glory days of hot-rodding as high-octane entertainment.

Trevor J. Blank

See also: Los Angeles, California.

Further Reading

Turner, Ron , ed. Kustom Kulture: Von Dutch, Ed “Big Daddy” Roth, Robert Williams and Others. San Francisco: Last Gasp, 1993.

Vincent, Peter. Hot Rod: An American Original. St. Paul, MN: Motorbooks, 2002.

Houdini, Harry (1874–1926)

Harry Houdini was a Hungarian American magician, escape artist, and stuntman who achieved unprecedented fame for an entertainer of his kind in the early decades of the twentieth century. In the latter part of his career, he devoted his energy, reputation, and knowledge of illusion arts to expose fraud among unscrupulous mediums and spiritualists.

He was born as Ehrich Weisz on March 24, 1874, in Budapest, Hungary, to Mayer Samuel Weisz, a rabbi, and Cecilia Steiner. In 1878, the Weisz family immigrated to the United States (where the spelling of their name was changed to Weiss), settling first in Appleton, Wisconsin, and then moving to New York. After a restless and troubled childhood, Ehrich became a trapeze artist at the age of ten, calling himself Erich, Prince of the Air. He began his career as a professional magician in about 1891, taking the stage name “Harry Houdini” from the great French conjurer Jean-Eugène Robert-Houdin.

Houdini achieved international notice as an escape artist on the vaudeville circuit in 1899 and after returning from a successful European tour in 1900. Appearances in stage shows and movie serials alternated with outlandish public stunts, such as escaping from a straightjacket while hanging from a rope, or escaping from a water-filled tank in which he was immersed upside down, feet tied.

In the years that followed, as escape stunts diminished in public appeal, Houdini preoccupied himself with running a magic supplies firm, making movies (after 1918), and participating in aviation (including the first controlled powered flight over Australia, in 1910). By the 1920s, Houdini was as much a celebrity as lawyer Clarence Darrow, aviator Charles Lindbergh, and actor Will Rogers.

It was in the 1920s, however, after the death of his mother, that Houdini became fixated on debunking the spiritualist movement. As a professional magician himself, he was versed in the tricks that self-styled mediums and psychics used to beguile their audiences and demonstrated them on stage. He became a member of the Scientific American magazine committee that offered a monetary reward for anyone who could prove supernatural abilities, and he attended séances in disguise for the purpose of debunking them. As recounted in his book A Magician among the Spirits (1924), he exposed, among others, the Boston medium Mina Crandon, known as Margery.

As a final test of the validity of supernatural powers, Houdini and his wife, Beatrice, arranged a series of coded signals by which they would try to communicate after one of them died. Harry died of complications from appendicitis in Detroit, Michigan, on October 31, 1926. After years of attempting to contact him by means of the signals, Beatrice finally declared the effort a failure.

D.K. Holm

See also: Los Angeles, California: Magic and Magicians: Spiritualism.

Further Reading

Brandon, Ruth. The Life and Many Deaths of Harry Houdini. New York: Random House, 2003.

Houdini, Harry. Houdini: A Magician among the Spirits. New York: Fredonia, 2002.

Houdini, Harry. Houdini on Magic. New York: Dover, 1953.

Kalush, William, and Larry Sloman. The Secret Life of Houdini: The Making of America's First Superhero. New York: Holiday House, 2000.

Lalicki, Tom. Spellbinder: The Life of Harry Houdini. New York: Atria, 2006.

Silverman, Kenneth. Houdini!!!: The Career of Ehrich Weiss. New York: HarperCollins, 1997.

Hughes, Langston (1902–1967)

Known for his evocations of modern African American life and culture, his deceptively simple prose and poetry, his sympathy with radical thought, and his flirtation with the American Communist Party, Langston Hughes was one of the twentieth century's most productive African American writers. Although most recognized for his poetry, Hughes also published novels, short stories, children's books, dramas, opera libretti, translations, and anthologies. His artistic production and political consciousness reflect the times in which he wrote, from the cultural celebrations of the 1920s and 1930s Harlem Renaissance, during which African American literature, music, and art flourished, through radicalist threats during the 1950s Red Scare, a period of strong anticommunism in the United States.

The poetry and prose of Langston Hughes evokes the modern African American experience in rhythms of jazz and the blues. His literary output spanned more than four decades, but he is most frequently associated with the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s and 1930s. (Robert W. Kelley/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Born in Joplin, Missouri, on February 1, 1902, he wrote the first poem he ever published and his most anthologized work, "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" when he was a teenager, while on a train to Mexico. In 1921, Langston relocated to the burgeoning literary and cultural scene of New York. There, he became one of the most recognizable figures in the Harlem Renaissance.

Hughes's short and unpretentious poetry celebrated, among other things, the vibrancy of African American life, the beauty and strength of black women, and various African American musical traditions, including blues, jazz, spirituals, gospel, and ragtime. These themes can be seen in works such as The Weary Blues (1926), The Negro Mother and Other Dramatic Recitations (1931), The Dream Keeper and Other Poems (1932), and A New Song (1938). Hughes's early literary career was supported by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)'s Crisis magazine, a political and literary journal founded by the African American intellectual W.E.B. Du Bois.

Drawing on the deep-rooted oral tradition of African Americans, Hughes believed that artists needed to recognize the cultural importance of America's urban and rural folk literature, music, and lifestyles. His recognition of African American artistic originality was perhaps best exemplified by a 1958 collaboration with jazz legend Charles Mingus. In this project, distinctly black American music was united with the poetry of an African American writer, as Hughes recited his work over a background of jazz arrangements.

Hughes felt that poetry should be cast “in simple, understandable verse, pleasing to the ear, and suitable for reading aloud,” and he aimed not at highbrow academicians or the black bourgeoisie but directly “at the hearts of people.” He believed that poetry and prose should provide inspiration to the widest possible audience. Thus, most of his major literary accomplishments—including the short-story series Simple, published throughout the 1950s and 1960s—were intentionally devoid of linguistic pretentiousness and uncommon words.

While never a dogmatic leftist ideologue, Hughes frequently published in radical magazines and newspapers, and he traveled extensively overseas, including to the Soviet Union. Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) surveillance and hounding by the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) was stepped up after Hughes’s 1944 participation in a nationally broadcast radio debate over segregation. In a moment of post–World War II anti-Communist hysteria, Life magazine published an article criticizing Hughes’s politics, along with those of physicist Albert Einstein and singer-actor Paul Robeson.

In 1953, Hughes joined the dozens of high-profile leftists who were intimidated and interrogated in Congress by Senator Joseph McCarthy. Despite recurring surveillance by the FBI, the only time Hughes was physically threatened as a result of his political beliefs came in the form of a bomb threat during a 1960 book tour.

On May 22, 1967, Hughes died in New York City of congestive heart failure. Throughout his career, he confronted the literary establishment and wrote elegantly simple poetry that was meant for oral performance. Hughes’s work affirmed his connection with common people and made lasting contributions to American letters. His belief that literature reaches its widest audience when it is recited inspired and influenced later literary movements, including the Beat writers of the 1950s, the black arts movement of the 1960s and 1970s, and contemporary slam poetry.

David Lucander

See also: Harlem Renaissance: Jazz: McCarthyism.

Further Reading

Hughes, Langston. The Collected Works of Langston Hughes. Ed. Arnold Rampersad. 10 vols. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001–2004.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes. 2 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986–1988.

Tracy, Steven, ed. A Historical Guide to Langston Hughes. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Hurston, Zora Neale (ca. 1891–1960)

Novelist, anthropologist, teacher, and feminist Zora Neale Hurston is best known as the author of Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937) and other novels of black life in America, including Jonah’s Gourd Vine (1934), Moses, Man of the Mountain (1939), and Seraph on the Suwanee (1948), as well as her autobiography, Dust Tracks on the Road (1942). Her anthropological works, ethnographic and folklore studies of blacks in the American South and Caribbean, include Mules and Men (1935), Tell My Horse (1938), and Voodoo Gods (1939). A prolific essayist, short story writer, and playwright, she also wrote more than fifty shorter works between the mid-1920s and the early 1950s.

Born in Notasulga, Alabama, sometime around 1891, Hurston moved to Eatonville, Florida, at a young age. Her father, a Baptist minister, farmer, and carpenter, also served as the mayor of Eatonville, the first incorporated all-black city in America. Her mother was a homemaker and seamstress who nurtured the girl's independence and self-reliance but died when she was thirteen.

After living with several family members and attending private schools while working part-time to support herself, Hurston attended Howard University and received her associate's degree in 1924. She eventually received a scholarship to Barnard College in New York City, entering as its first and only black student and graduating with a bachelor of arts degree in anthropology in 1928. She did graduate work in anthropology at Columbia University, receiving a fellowship to work and study under the famed anthropologist Franz Boas.

Themes of race, black independence, and reverence for black culture permeate Hurston's work. According to African American studies scholar Henry Louis Gates, Jr., she saw "black people as complete, complex, undiminished human beings." Her childhood in Eatonville, a town rich in black culture and largely sheltered from the depredations of racial prejudice, had a deep and enduring influence on her writing. Many of her works depict black communities unaffected by whites, and white racism is not addressed directly.

Hurston did not share the goals and perspectives of many of her contemporaries in the Harlem Renaissance, the cultural movement in New York City during the 1920s and 1930s that produced a flowering of African American art, literature, and music. She wrote with unique insight and compassion about black female sexuality and rural, Southern, illiterate black culture, embracing her cultural heritage with pride at a time when many of her contemporaries felt that blacks should discuss their victimhood at the hands of racist white society. She also opposed educational integration. Because of these stances, controversy seemed to follow her and she was portrayed negatively in the black press. As a result, she was forced to work as a maid, school teacher, and secretary to support herself.

Hurston is rumored to have been married three times, but only two marriages are documented: In 1927, she was married to Herbert Sheen, and in 1939, she married to Albert Price. In 1959, Hurston suffered a stroke and became a resident of the St. Lucie County (Florida) Welfare Home. She still continued to work on her final project, a book about Herod the Great, king of ancient Judaea.

She died penniless on January 28, 1960. Hurston's grave lay unmarked until the 1970s, when African American author Alice Walker found the site and had a gravestone erected on it.

Emily C. Martin-Hondros

See also: Harlem Renaissance.

Further Reading

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr. "Afterword." In Their Eyes Were Watching God, by Zora Neale Hurston. New York: HarperPerennial, 1990.

Washington, Mary Helen. "Introduction: Zora Neale Hurston: A Woman in Half Shadow." In I Love Myself When I Am Laughing... And Then Again When I Am Looking Mean and Impressive: A Zora Neale Hurston Reader, ed. Alice Walker. New York: Feminist Press, 1979.

Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643)

Anne Marbury Hutchinson, a seventeenth-century Puritan layperson, was excommunicated from the First Church of Boston for her belief that the individual need not answer to church laws and for challenging the authorities in Boston. Hutchinson's bold actions resulted in a crisis for the Puritan colony in Massachusetts. Because she had gathered a strong following, including many men of prominence, and because she challenged those in power, Hutchinson was accused of blasphemy, tried, and exiled from the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Her story represents an early fight for religious freedom and gender equality.

She was born in Alford, Lincolnshire, England, in 1591, into an English family in which religious dissent was a matter of course. Her father Francis Marbury was a Puritan Anglican minister. He served a jail sentence and was arrested multiple times for openly questioning the competency of the English clergy, although he himself was a deacon of Christ Church, Cambridge, and would go on to hold a number of respectable church positions.

Hutchinson became a follower of John Cotton, a Puritan minister. Cotton went to Massachusetts in 1633 to escape English authorities, who were on the verge of charging him with blasphemy against the Anglican church. There, he became the pastor of the First Church of Boston. In 1634, Hutchinson, her husband, William (a textile merchant), and their fifteen children moved to Boston and joined Cotton's church.

In 1635, Hutchinson began to hold weekly meetings at her Boston home. At first, these meetings were for women, with whom she was known as a nurse and midwife, and they included discussions of Cotton's sermons, Bible study, and prayer. Soon, word spread, and the meetings were attended by both women and men, including regular citizens and such prominent men as Governor Henry Vane. Over time, Hutchinson became more outspoken at these gatherings. She did not merely summarize or interpret the weekly sermons. She began to elaborate on them, give weekly lessons, and eventually criticize the sermons and contradict church leaders on matters of doctrine.

Hutchinson was unusual because she took upon herself activities that were considered inappropriate for women at the time. Any man attempting to challenge the authority of the church would have been subjected to harsh treatment and charges of blasphemy. For a woman to do so also violated the cultural norms for gender roles of the day.

Among other prominent Puritans who took exception to her actions was the Hutchinsons' neighbor John Winthrop, who became the next governor. In November 1637, Winthrop brought charges of sedition against Anne Hutchinson, and he presided at her trial.

At the age of forty-six, Hutchinson had to defend herself against charges of Antinomianism, the conviction that she was under no obligation to obey the laws of the Church of Boston and that salvation was a faith-based gift bestowed upon individuals by Christ (the covenant of grace). She accused church leaders of practicing a covenant of works, which emphasized that salvation can be earned through good works. Hutchinson stressed God's grace to the exclusion of works in determining salvation; further, she believed that an individual could only know if he or she had been saved if this was revealed directly by God, and she put herself forth as one who had received such a blessing based on her own revelations. Church leaders regarded her ideas as heretical.

Although Hutchinson's mentor, John Cotton, had defended her at first, he eventually abandoned her and vocally supported her banishment. Many speculate that he did so in order to save himself from similar charges for his own role in the matter.

In 1637, Hutchinson was convicted by the Great and General Court of Massachusetts and her supporters were derided. She was excommunicated from the First Church of Boston and banished from Massachusetts. Shortly thereafter, her family and sixty followers left Massachusetts and settled in Rhode Island, founding the town of Portsmouth.

Following her husband's death in 1642, Hutchinson and her children moved to Long Island, then part of the Dutch colony of New Netherland. The next year, the whole family, except for a ten-year-old daughter, was killed in a massacre by local native peoples.

Because of the circumstances she encountered following her expulsion from the colony—the loss of her husband and her death at the hands of Native Americans—the church fathers felt justified in their conclusions. A friend of Hutchinson's, Mary Dyer, a Puritan who became a Quaker, was hanged in 1660 and herself became a martyr to the cause of religious freedom.

Hutchinson is widely regarded as a harbinger of the modern quests for religious freedom and of women's equality. There is a statue erected in her honor in front of the State House in Boston to acknowledge and commemorate her role in these struggles.

Susan Love Brown

See also: Antinomianism.

Further Reading

Hall, David D. The Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638: A Documentary History. 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1990.

Lang, Amy Schrager. Prophetic Woman: Anne Hutchinson and the Problem of Dissent in the Literature of New England. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

LaPlante, Eve. American Jezebel: The Uncommon Life of Anne Hutchinson, the Woman Who Defied the Puritans. New York: HarperCollins, 2004.

Huxley, Aldous (1894–1963)

Aldous Huxley was a writer, cultural critic, and counterculture icon whose works explore issues of science, religion, and philosophy. The scion of a prominent scientific and literary British family, he spent the latter part of his life—from 1937 to his death in 1963—in Los Angeles. As the civil rights movement and Vietnam War transformed life in America, baby boomers eager to redefine themselves saw in Huxley a social critic and countercultural visionary who was not afraid to speak out against the establishment or to buck convention.

Aldous Leonard Huxley was born on July 26, 1894, in Godalming, Surrey, England, to a family that included some of the most distinguished members of England's intellectual elite. His father, Leonard, was the son of Thomas Henry Huxley, a noted biologist, agnostic, and defender of Darwin's theory of evolution. His mother, Julia Arnold, was the sister-in-law of Humphrey Ward, the novelist; niece of Matthew Arnold, the poet; and granddaughter of Thomas Arnold, a famous educator. Huxley's half brother, Andrew, won the Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine in 1963, and his brother Julian served as director-general of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

Two events that helped shape Huxley's sense of living outside the norm occurred while he was a teenager: the death of his mother in 1908, when he was fourteen, and his contracting an eye disease two years later that left him nearly blind. He recovered enough sight to go on to Oxford University and graduate with honors in 1915, but his career options remained limited. He was unable to join the fighting in World War I, which many of his friends had done, or to pursue the scientific work he had dreamed of as a young child. Instead, he became a writer.

Although Huxley is best known as a novelist and essayist, he also wrote short stories, plays, travelogues, and screenplays. He produced a total of forty-seven books in his career, the first of which was a collection of poems published in 1916, when he was only twenty-two.

Huxley is best remembered today for his thought-provoking novels, including the early comic works Crome Yellow (1921), Antic Hay (1923), and Point Counter Point (1928), followed later by Brave New World (1932), After Many a Summer Dies the Swan (1939), Time Must Have a Stop (1944), Ape and Essence (1948), and others. In 1959, the American Academy of Arts and Letters gave Huxley, who had moved to Los Angeles in 1937 for health reasons, the Award of Merit for the Novel, a prize given every five years that also has been awarded to Ernest Hemingway, Thomas Mann, and Theodore Dreiser.

In his essays and other nonfiction works, Huxley examined and often criticized dominant social mores, norms, and ideals. Early writings reflect a consistent ambivalence toward the authority assumed by England's ruling class and a growing sense of the transience of human happiness. During the 1950s, Huxley became more interested in parapsychological research and mysticism. He began using the psychedelic drugs mescaline and LSD in search of enlightenment, which he wrote about in The Doors of Perception (1954)—a central text of the 1960s drug culture—and Heaven and Hell (1956). In 1958, he published Brave New World Revisited, a collection of essays in which he addresses the question of whether society had moved closer to the dystopia he envisioned in Brave New World more than a quarter-century before; it had.

Aldous Huxley's satiric denunciations of conformity and orthodoxy made him a major voice of the 1960s counterculture, which he never witnessed. After years of battling cancer, he died of a lethal injection made on his own request, on November 22, 1963 (hours before the assassination of President John F. Kennedy).

Michael A. Rembis

See also: Esalen Institute: LSD.

Further Reading

Huxley, Aldous. Selected Letters. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2007.

Kuehn, Robert, ed. Aldous Huxley: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1974.

Sawyer, Dana. Aldous Huxley: A Biography. New York: Crossroad, 2002.

Icarians

The Icarian movement, founded by French radical Etienne Cabet, consisted of a series of socialistic communes in the United States that lasted from 1848 to 1898. Cabet's followers, called Icarians, initially numbered about 1,500 and established communal settlements successively in Texas, Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa. The Icarian movement is often cited as an early experiment in utopian socialism in which religion was not a focal point.

Cabet, like fellow European social reformers Robert Owen and Charles Fourier, believed that the unsettled areas of America would be conducive to utopian communities in which the means of production were communally owned. As Owen had in Great Britain, Cabet had become a celebrity in his home country prior to his American utopian experiment. His description of a perfect society in the novel Voyage en Icarie (Voyage in Icaria, 1845), heavily influenced by the English statesman Sir Thomas More's Utopia (1516), had made the young radical popular in some circles but a threat in the eyes of the French government. In 1848, he organized his followers in the port city of Le Havre and sailed for America to start his colony.

Through a property company, Cabet had arranged the acquisition of 1 million acres of farmland near present-day Fort Worth, Texas, which he understood to be easily accessible by boat. When the first residents made the trip from France, however, they found the site extremely difficult to access—and closer to 10,000 acres than 1 million. Moreover, many of the plots were not adjoining, and the sales contract stipulated that every half square mile of real estate had to have an occupied residence within a short period of time or the land would return to the property agency. Bad weather, illness, and inexperience in farming practices contributed to the difficulties of the settlement, and the venture fell through after three months. The Icarians split up, with some returning to France, others setting out on their own, and the rest deciding to follow their leader to a new destination.

When Cabet heard that the former Mormon establishment in Nauvoo, Illinois, had been deserted, he purchased the land but did not expect to stay in the area for long. The communards moved to the area in 1850, established trades and factories, and prospered. Cabet set up a printing press for publishing pamphlets and books. Schools were provided for the children, and theatrical and musical events were held for all the communards. Surrounding property was rented for crop production.

Cabet's followers eventually turned on him, however, and expelled him from the community. The aging visionary sought a new home base for his movement and decided on an area near the small railroad town of Corning, Iowa. At the time, Cabet was living in St. Louis, Missouri, with a small band of followers. Before he could move with them to the new settlement in Iowa, he died of a stroke in 1856. As the nineteenth century drew to a close, the Icarian movement, which by this time had splintered into several factions, disbanded.

Leonard A. Steverson

See also: Communes; Utopianism.

Further Reading

Calverton, Victor Francis. Where Angels Dare to Tread: Socialist and Communist Utopian Colonies in the United States. Freeport, NY: Books for Libraries, 1941.

Hinds, William Alfred. American Communities and Co-operative Colonies. 2nd rev. Philadelphia: Porcupine, 1975.

Nordhoff, Charles. The Communistic Societies of the United States. New York: Hillary House, 1960.

Webber, Everett. Escape to Utopia: The Communal Movement in America. New York: Hastings House, 1959.

Indie Rock

Indie rock, short for “independent rock,” or music not distributed by the major record labels, began to emerge in the underground music scene during the 1970s. Although it was not the first musical genre to be established outside the confines of the mainstream recording industry—ragtime, jazz, rhythm and blues, and other styles had long been recorded and distributed by local and independent labels—indie rock was unique in its overt rejection of the trappings of major-label, or “corporate,” rock and roll. Inspired by the do-it-yourself (DIY) ethos of punk, indie rock celebrated the underground world of small clubs, self-published zines (fanzines), and independent record labels. Participants saw themselves as part of a grassroots culture whose authenticity stood in contrast to the bland homogeneity of the mainstream mass media and its products.

The punk influence on indie rock manifested itself in the speed, ferocity, and simplicity of such bands as Black Flag and Minor Threat. But while these bands wore their hardcore (a fast variant of punk) roots on their sleeves, their respective labels quickly branched out to include a wider range of sounds. Dischord Records, run by members of Minor Threat, signed such luminaries of the Washington, D.C., underground as Rites of Spring, whose songs achieved a complexity labeled “post-punk” by some. Meanwhile, Black Flag’s home label, SST, moved beyond hardcore to sign the Meat Puppets, who brought a psychedelic edge to their music, and the Minutemen, who synthesized various influences, including punk, classic rock, and jazz into their singular sound.

By the mid-1980s, indie rock had transcended its punk roots to encompass a plethora of styles, united more by the grassroots nature of the scene than by any shared musical values. For instance, Black Flag sometimes shared bills with the utterly dissimilar Beat Happening, an acoustic trio from Olympia, Washington, whose artless songs expressed a childlike sense of wonder and set the template for an entire Pacific Northwest scene based on member Calvin Johnson’s K Records. Some indie labels, such as K, Dischord, and the Minneapolis Twin/Tone, identified themselves with specific local scenes, while others aligned themselves with specific types of bands. Touch & Go, for instance, defined itself through noisy, dissonant groups such as the Butthole Surfers and the Jesus Lizard.

Several indie rock bands signed with major labels during the 1980s, generally without losing their fan bases. The Replacements and Husker Du signed with Warner Bros., and Soundgarden signed with A&M Records. A militantly indie ideology already had been developed by bands such as Fugazi, but only after the 1991 breakthrough of Nirvana’s distortion-laden but melodic Nevermind album on major label Geffen Records did the issue of label become intensely politicized.

With Nirvana, formerly based at indie label Sub Pop Records, conquering the charts, major labels began a concerted effort to sign indie rock bands in the hopes of discovering the next major act. Scores of bands eagerly cashed in. The Afghan Whigs, Jawbox, Mudhoney, and the Ass Ponys were only a few of the many indie converts to major labels.

Other indie bands of the 1990s turned down lucrative major-label offers to maintain their independence. Superchunk, Guided by Voices, and Sleater-Kinney all preferred the indie world to that of the corporate mass media. Still other groups were caught in the acidic debates over indie credibility and “selling out.” For instance, Jawbreaker lost many fans by signing with Geffen in 1995, a situation that ultimately contributed to the band’s breakup. By the mid-1990s, corporate radio had created the categories “alternative rock” and “modern rock” to disguise the fact that few bands on the air were actual indie bands.

By the end of the 1990s, popular culture had shifted its focus from indie rock, as rap-rock hybrids and the resurgence of manufactured bubblegum pop dominated the airwaves. But indie rock continued to flourish, adapting easily to the Internet, as free MP3 downloads fostered a new sense of grassroots community and an innovative method for bands to find an audience. New labels such as Omaha’s Saddle Creek merged the established indie tradition of local scene-building with new techniques of easy, online global communications, exemplifying the ability of indie rock to harness new technology for its own grassroots purposes.

Whitney Strub

See also: Punk Rock: Rock and Roll.

Further Reading

Arnold, Gina. Route 666: On the Road to Nirvana. New York: St. Martin's, 1993.

Azerrad, Michael. Our Band Could Be Your Life: Scenes from the American Indie Underground, 1981–1991. Boston: Little, Brown, 2001.

Industrial Workers of the World

The Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), an international trade union, was founded in 1905 as a radical socialist labor organization open to all members of the working class. (The union was not, as its name might imply, restricted to workers in industrial professions. Only “employers”—owners and management— were excluded.) Although IWW continues to operate today, with about 2,000 members (900 in the United States) and headquarters in Cincinnati, Ohio, its peak of influence and membership was reached in the early 1920s.

Historically, IWW members have been referred to as “Wobblies,” a nickname whose origins remain unclear to this day. A number of major strikes and countless rallies have contributed to the IWW’s prominent place in the history of the American labor movement. Its radicalism, cultural aspect, and role in uniting members as a social organization also made it unique within the counterculture movement.

Origins and Growth

On June 27, 1905, an industrial convention of nearly 200 anarchists, socialists, and radical trade unionists assembled in Chicago and established the IWW in an attempt to correct what they regarded as the inadequacies of the American labor movement. The founding members rejected the policies and organizational structure of the American Federation of Labor (AFL), then the largest industrial organization in the United States.

The AFL, they claimed, was constricting the power of the working class by dividing workers into narrow groups according to their crafts and industries. The AFL also promoted racial segregation in its affiliated unions and supported discriminatory legislation that prevented unskilled immigrants from China and Southern and Eastern Europe from joining affiliated trade unions.

The IWW’s founding members wanted all members of the working class, regardless of craft or discipline, to join in a single united front against the “capitalist class.” The founding of the IWW thus marked a new direction in the American labor movement, one that embraced more radical, often violent means of expressing the opinions of workers than previous labor organizations had advocated.

The IWW increased its membership in the years after its creation, particularly among workers in the textile, lumber, and mining industries. Bands of IWW activists would travel to places where labor unrest was most likely, often attempting to stir up strife—and by doing so, to crowd the jails and courts and overwhelm the legal system.

In 1912, for instance, textile workers in Lawrence, Massachusetts, went on strike in an action organized and endorsed by the IWW and supported by labor activists from other parts of the country. The Lawrence strike popularized the ideas of syndicalism (the promotion of trade union control of government and industry) and anarcho-syndicalism, philosophies that until then had been less well known in the American labor movement than in Europe.

In response to the increasing popularity of and sympathy for the IWW, employers, managers, and others who were opposed to the organization soon began to disparage it in public and private statements. IWW was said to stand for “I Won’t Work” or, sarcastically, for “International Wonder Workers.” IWW members were painted as bomb-building radicals, violent saboteurs, and advocates of revolution and anarchy.

The Industrial Workers of the World, or “Wobblies,” were a revolutionary socialist union that advocated permanent class warfare against employers. By the time of this rally in 1914, the IWW had been involved in a number of major strikes. (Library of Congress)

The IWW’s enthusiasm for militant actions, such as violent strikes and sabotage, prompted a harsh response from industrial and political leaders. The governors of four Western states urged the Wilson administration to investigate the IWW, claiming that the organization’s actions were a potential threat to national security. The actions of the IWW were in part responsible for the passage of laws that made it illegal to advocate syndicalism or any philosophy that promoted labor militancy and the overthrow of the capitalist system.

Many members and associates of the IWW were noted for their work in social and political causes related to the labor movement. As a political activist, Helen Keller joined the IWW and connected the union’s work with her campaigns for parliamentary socialism, woman suffrage, social justice, and advocacy for people with disabilities. Five-time Socialist Party presidential candidate Eugene V. Debs was an early supporter of the IWW, although he was not entirely comfortable with some of the more violent tactics promoted by radical members. Roger Nash Baldwin, one of the founders of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), became a member of the IWW, in part because members shared his internationalist and pacifist stance during World War I. Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas worked with the IWW during his early legal career.

Even with the organization’s connections to such well-known advocates of social justice, membership in the IWW remained controversial. In 1951, for example, Senator Joseph McCarthy accused journalist and television news presenter Edward R. Murrow of having been an IWW member, in an attempt to raise doubts about Murrow’s patriotism and political affiliations. The IWW’s history as a radical and often violent organization made affiliation with it a declaration of connections to or sympathies with the counterculture.

American Labor Culture

In addition to its place in twentieth-century American political and social history, the IWW made profound and lasting contributions to the culture of the American labor movement. Because the IWW’s messages were targeted at an audience that was predominantly illiterate or moderately literate, messages often had to be conveyed through powerful, memorable images. IWW artists and illustrators produced political cartoons, posters, banners, and leaflets designed to have a visceral impact on the viewer—such as the often-seen illustration of an IWW workingman raising his clenched fist in determination and solidarity.

Another IWW contribution to the labor movement was its use of memorable songs, usually calling for class solidarity, denouncing companies and their exploitative practices, or praising the efforts of unions and union leaders. Many of the earliest songs were parodies of religious hymns, taking familiar tunes and rewriting the lyrics in a mocking or otherwise satirical vein. The Little Red Songbook (also known as The Wobbly Songbook) was the best-selling radical publication in twentieth-century America, running through more than thirty editions after its initial publication in 1909. In the 1960s, the folk songs of the early IWW found new life and audiences as a result of the folk music revival popularized by musicians such as Woody Guthrie and Pete Seeger, giving the IWW a place in a new kind of radical counterculture.

The IWW continues to recruit and organize members in the United States and other countries around the world. The union is entirely independent, not requiring that members work for a shop company, not affiliated with any political party or other movement, and run entirely by volunteers. While it is a shadow of its former self and a small voice for workers' rights and working-class concerns, it is a living reminder of the long and varied history of the radical American labor movement and its counterculture.

Shannon Granville

See also: Debs, Eugene V.; Folk Music; Guthrie, Woody; Haywood, William "Big Bill"; McCarthyism; Seeger, Pete.

Further Reading

Buhle, Paul, and Nicole Schulman, eds. Wobblies!: A Graphic History of the Industrial Workers of the World. London: Verso, 2005.

Carlson, Peter. Roughneck: The Life and Times of Big Bill Haywood. New York: W.W. Norton, 1983.

Foner, Philip S. History of the Labor Movement in the United States. Vol. 4, The Industrial Workers of the World, 1905–1917. New York: International, 1965.

Industrial Workers of the World. Proceedings of the First Convention of the Industrial Workers of the World. New York: Merit, 1969.

Kimeldorf, Howard. Battling for American Labor: Wobblies, Craft Workers, and the Making of the Union Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

Miles, Dione. Something in Common: An IWW Bibliography. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1986.

Nelson, Eugene. Break Their Haughty Power: Joe Murphy in the Heyday of the Wobblies. San Francisco: ISM, 1993.

Renshaw, Patrick. The Wobblies: The Story of Syndicalism in the United States. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1999.

Ingersoll, Robert (1833–1899)

Known as the “Great Agnostic,” lawyer and orator Robert Green Ingersoll lectured across America in defense of religious freethinking during the post–Civil War Reconstruction period of the American South. While idolized by socialists such as labor leader Eugene V. Debs and activist Ella Reeve Bloor, Ingersoll, a Republican, was socially and economically conservative and disdained proponents of reform who characterized the Progressive Era of the 1890s to 1920s.

Born on August 11, 1833, in Dresden, New York, to John, a clergyman, and Mary Livingston, the daughter of a judge who died during her son’s infancy, Ingersoll was schooled at home and read broadly from the classics. His rejection of organized religion, especially his father’s Christianity, was interpreted as childish rebellion. As his father accepted positions across the Midwest, the family moved to Ohio, then Wisconsin, and Illinois.

At the beginning of 1854, Ingersoll read law in Illinois and was admitted to the bar in Shawneetown, where he practiced with his brother Ebon Clark until the Civil War. Before the war, Ingersoll was a staunch Union Democrat. In politics as in the realm of religion, however, he could not abide orthodoxy, and he soon joined the Republican Party. After a stint as colonel of the 11th Illinois Volunteer Cavalry Regiment, in which he fought at Shiloh and Corinth, he was captured by General Nathan B. Forrest, imprisoned, released on the promise that he would fight no more. He was discharged from the army on June 30, 1863.

Disillusioned by the incompetence of military command, Ingersoll was drawn deeper into his radical beliefs. Perhaps the person with the most influence on his outlook was his wife, Eva Amelia Parker, a freethinker whom he married in 1862. Ingersoll embraced British naturalist Charles Darwin’s theory of evolution and natural selection, and he was an advocate for woman suffrage. He served the state of Illinois as attorney general from 1867 to 1869 and ran for various offices, yet experienced little political success because of his unconventional religious beliefs.

An eloquent and skilled debater, Ingersoll drew crowds regardless of the topic. Even those who disagreed with his position were charmed by his charisma, manner, and way with words. As a delegate to the Republican Convention at Cincinnati in 1876, Ingersoll gave a nominating speech for James G. Blaine. Although he failed to gain the presidential nomination for Blaine, the speech earned Ingersoll nationwide renown, after which he spoke in support of Republican presidential candidate Rutherford B. Hayes at all political gatherings.

After his success in the political arena, Ingersoll moved his family and law practice in 1879 to Washington, D.C., where he immersed himself in federal litigation. In 1885, he moved to New York, where he could court richer clients and larger audiences for his lecture circuit. Two of his most famous lectures were “Some Mistakes of Moses” (1879), in which he attacked the literal meanings of Scripture, and “Why I Am an Agnostic” (1896), in which he explained his convictions gained from reading William Shakespeare, Voltaire, and other literary greats.

Ingersoll died suddenly in Dobbs Ferry, New York, on July 21, 1899.

Rebecca Tolley-Stokes

See also: Socialism.

Further Reading

Anderson, David D. Robert Ingersoll. New York: Twayne, 1972.

Greeley, Robert E. “Robert Ingersoll.” In The Encyclopedia of Unbelief, ed. Gordon Stein, 349–50. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1985.

Smith, Frank. Robert Ingersoll: A Life. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1985.

Internet

Perhaps the most significant development in modern communications and information technology, the Internet—a publicly accessible global “network” of computer networks—emerged in the 1990s as a global storage and retrieval medium that enables individuals to search for and retrieve information, gain access to entertainment, and conduct business without regard to geographical location. Evolving from modest beginnings as a U.S. Defense Department project in the 1960s and continuing through the creation of the World Wide Web in the early 1990s, the Internet has become a vast, collaborative environment that has shaped American culture and counterculture in new and profound ways.

Early History

The original design and architecture of the system that would become known as the Internet began in the late 1960s as the Advanced Project Research Agency Network (ARPANET). ARPANET enabled communication between computers at government research agencies and universities holding defense contracts. This early network helped develop Transmission Control Protocol and Internet Protocol (TCP/IP protocol), or the set of communications rules on which computer networks and the Internet run.

By the 1970s, the government was collaborating with universities to expand the connections among computer networks. Some of the benefits and opportunities offered by the Internet began to be seen at this point, as e-mail messages were sent and online discussion groups were set up that allowed individuals to communicate despite the barrier of distance.

It was not until the 1990s, however, with the invention of the World Wide Web (www), that the Internet as we know it became available and accessible to a larger segment of society. The Web is a graphical user interface that provides easy access to documents and media files through hyperlinks. It functions by means of hypertext transfer protocol (HTTP), which allows for fast access. The Web, combined with commercial Internet browsers—software to identify, retrieve, and display text, images, and other data from the Web—and reasonably priced personal computers (PCs), made it possible for individuals of all demographics to use the Internet.

It was at this point, as millions of people across the country began logging on, that the Internet began having a significant impact on American culture. The end of the 1990s became known as the dot-com era, in which businesses, industries, and individuals took advantage of the power of the Internet by establishing Web sites for conducting business.

Communities and Anonymity

Today, the Internet affects the daily lives of individuals without regard to their location. It provides the power to search for and find virtually any information from the comfort of one's home or office. Google is recognized as the leading search engine—a user-interface and retrieval system that enables users to find and access information—becoming so widespread in American life that googling has entered common parlance. Founded in 1998 by Larry Page and Sergey Brin in a dorm room at Stanford University in California, Google has indexes and caches millions of World Wide Web pages on any conceivable topic.

In addition to the ability to search for information, the Internet provides individuals with the ability to communicate and interact with each other. E-mail has revolutionized personal and business communications. In a matter of minutes, an e-mail message can be created, sent, and received anywhere in the world. The advent of instant messaging (IM), which allows users to exchange text messages in real time by means of the Internet, has surpassed even e-mail in terms of speed.

Beyond the direct one-to-one exchange of text, the Internet also allows users to build social networks using such popular Web sites as Facebook, Friendster, and MySpace. These sites provide individuals with a virtual community in which to create personal profiles with data, photographs, video clips, and journal postings, and then invite friends and others with similar interests into their personal network. Such forums, which have developed a unique set of behavioral norms, rules of etiquette, and language, have attracted hundreds of millions of users, building vast virtual communities across cultural, racial, and socioeconomic lines.

The ability to help people communicate provides an exciting medium for creativity. The popular Web site YouTube, for example, enables users to upload and view video clips with a designated community of viewers. Founded in February 2005 by Chad Hurley, Steve Chen, and Jawed Karim, YouTube not only allows individuals to share video clips of local, regional, national, or international events, but it also provides an outlet for those interested in sharing their creative side through self-produced short videos—at once, a universal current events medium and a personal multimedia distribution outlet.

As of 2007, the YouTube Web site was receiving some 70 million hits per day, transforming it from a primarily youth-based cultural phenomenon to a mainstream media competitor. Also in 2007, the reach of YouTube became apparent when the mainstream media network CNN teamed up with the Internet site for a debate among the candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination, with individual users submitting videotaped questions via the Web site. The purchase of YouTube by Google, completed in November 2007, was expected to boost its popularity and cultural influence even further.

Experts have noted the ability of users within virtual communities to remain anonymous online, offering the freedom to meet new people without risk of rejection or to experiment with new identities. Anonymous e-mail, Web pages, and postings further allow users to express their views freely—especially nonconformist or countercultural ones—without the fear of repercussions or even identification. By the same token, however, social networking sites have come under scrutiny because of the ability of sexual predators and other criminals to change their identities or remain anonymous.

Cultural Implications

In short, the Internet has challenged mainstream cultural norms in the way individuals communicate and interact. IM and e-mail challenge mainstream communication, both written and oral. Formal greetings have been abandoned online, and written words have been replaced by letters and acronyms. Symbols called “emoticons” have been created to express the emotional response of the writer.

Beyond challenging normal modes of communication and entertainment, the Internet has helped develop new countercultures. Hackers—computer experts who seek unauthorized access to network information—believe that information on the Internet should be free to everyone, without controlled access, and that obtaining information without permission is an art rather than a crime. Hackers thus constitute a true Internet counterculture, challenging traditional concepts of intellectual property, challenging the corporate and government establishments, and resisting societal norms of authority, security, and privacy.

Another community that has grown with the development of the Internet is that of gamers. Spending much of their time on screen and divorced from the everyday outside world, gamers have developed thriving online communities devoted to virtual role-playing games. Online gaming environments enable users in the United States to interact with their counterparts in other countries, playing games that challenge conventional social values, such as Grand Theft Auto and Doom, in which points are awarded for violent, unlawful activity.

More in line with the hippie culture of the 1960s, the Internet also has given rise to what is referred to as the “open source movement,” which challenges the computer-technology industry by calling for full, free, universal access to application source code, enabling anyone to adapt it to his or her own purpose and provide improvements and enhancements for others. The idea is to build a communal environment in which everyone is able to work together to produce the best programs.

Michael LaMagna

See also: Bloggers: Hackers.

Further Reading

Abbate, Janet. Inventing the Internet. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1999.

Dominick, Joseph R. Broadcasting, Cable, the Internet, and Beyond: An Introduction to Modern Electronic Media. Boston: McGraw-Hill, 2008.

Gillies, James, and R. Cailliau. How the Web Was Born: The Story of the World Wide Web. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Segaller, Stephen. Nerds 2.0.1: A Brief History of the Internet. New York: TV Books, 1998.

Young, Gray, ed. The Internet. Bronx, NY: H.W. Wilson, 1998.

James, C.L.R. (1901–1989)

Trinidadian writer and activist Cyril Lionel Robert (C.L.R.) James was perhaps the most libertarian revolutionary intellectual of both the Pan-African and international labor movements of the twentieth century. His work was characterized by an abiding belief in the capacity of all people to be self-governing. James is best known as the author of The Black Jacobins (1938), the classic account of the revolutionary leader Toussaint L'Ouverture and the Haitian Revolution of 1791 to 1804. His other works include American Civilization (1950), Mariners, Renegades and Castaways (1953), Facing Reality (1958), and A History of Pan-African Revolt (1939, 1969).

Born in Chaguanas, Trinidad, on January 4, 1901, James arrived in the United States in 1938 from Great Britain, where he had advocated Pan-Africanism, West Indian independence, and socialist causes. He was to lecture on anticolonial revolt and to discuss black nationalism and self-determination with Russian Communist leader Leon Trotsky, then living in exile in Mexico.

James became a leader of formidable Marxist collectives within and autonomous from the American Trotskyist movement between 1938 and 1953. He also developed a rich, pioneering literature in support of direct democracy, workers' self-management, and the autonomy of black freedom movements. His charismatic lecture tours and teaching engagements in university classrooms, prisons, and movement study groups were instrumental in coalescing the collective memory of the black radical tradition. He was both an antecedent and defender of the Black Power and black studies movements of the latter part of the twentieth century.

During the 1940s, James agitated against America's role in World War II—seen by most as a democratic struggle against fascism—because he believed the war was waged by advocates of white supremacy and empire on all sides. After World War II, James rejected the cold-war mentality that the world was divided between two fundamentally different political systems, capitalism and communism. An independent socialist, he examined closely the role of professional intellectuals, the welfare state, and trade union bureaucracy in the United States. He concluded there were similar obstacles to freedom in America and in the one-party state of Stalinist Russia.

Whether organizing a sharecroppers' strike in southeast Missouri in the early 1940s or advocating for the potential of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) labor movement to transform society in the 1950s, James saw no distinction between the work of economic production and government. He believed that economic planning and cultural, judicial, and military affairs were within the capacity of everyday people. That perspective, he taught, was found in both classical literature and popular culture.

Whether studying ancient Greece, Hegelian dialectics, Herman Melville's Moby Dick, Dick Tracy comic strips, the novels of Richard Wright, or the energy of Harlem's Apollo Theater, James saw a more democratic way of life distinct from mainstream society emerging in the United States. As an illegal immigrant, he would write these perspectives almost always under pseudonyms, including J.R. Johnson. His undocumented status led to his imprisonment at Ellis Island in New York during the politically repressive McCarthy era, and his deportation in 1953.

James returned to the United States in 1969 by popular demand of the Black Power movement, radical African American activists who challenged the integrationist goals of Martin Luther King, Jr., and aimed instead at establishing a political and economic base independent of whites. He taught some of the first black studies courses at Northwestern University in Illinois and Federal City College in Washington, D.C., in 1969 and 1970.

Lecturing in Detroit, Atlanta, Mississippi, and elsewhere, James spoke of the work of such black intellectuals as the civil rights advocate W.E.B. Du Bois, the French West Indian social philosopher Frantz Fanon, the Jamaican black nationalist leader Marcus Garvey, and the Ghanaian political leader Kwame Nkrumah. These intellectual legacies, he argued, were now wielded by ordinary African Americans of humble rural and urban origins. James continually challenged his audiences, insisting that individuals of all races appreciate the contributions by peoples of African descent to Western and American civilization as a whole. He inspired community organizers associated with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the Black Panthers, and the League of Revolutionary Black Workers.

In 1974, James wrote the call to organize the Sixth Pan-African Congress from the United States. It was to be held in Tanzania. When Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere refused to allow delegations from movements against postcolonial regimes in the Caribbean and Africa to attend, James boycotted the conference. He died of a chest infection in London, England, on May 31, 1989.

Matthew Quest

See also: Black Panthers; Black Power Movement; Du Bois, W.E.B.; Garvey, Marcus; McCarthyism.

Further Reading

Bogues, Anthony. Caliban's Freedom: The Early Political Thought of C.L.R. James. London: Pluto, 1997.

Buhle, Paul. C.L.R. James: The Artist as Revolutionary. New York: Verso, 1988.

James, C.L.R. Marxism for Our Times: C.L.R. James On Revolutionary Organization. Ed. Martin Glaberman. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.

Worcester, Kent. C.L.R. James: A Political Biography. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.

Jazz is a folk music of the United States that blends European melody and harmony with West African rhythms. Although there are many distinctive subcategories of jazz, almost all jazz styles incorporate two basic elements: improvisation and a rhythmic swing.

The term jazz (originally spelled “jass”) first appeared in print in 1917; and New Orleans, Louisiana, with its diverse populations of French and Spanish people, Creoles, Creoles of color, African slaves, and free blacks at the turn of the twentieth century, is the birthplace of jazz. Early jazz influences appeared in the marching bands hired to lead funeral processions through the city and in the dance band music of Bourbon Street at the turn of the twentieth century. The instruments of these groups became the essential instruments of jazz: trumpet, trombone, clarinet, banjo, drum, and, later, piano.

Ragtime Roots and Northern Migration

Ragtime, or “ragged time,” was another important characteristic of early jazz. The term typically refers to a form of written piano music made famous by Scott Joplin, the son of a former slave and a free woman of color. Ragtime, while not strictly a style of jazz, certainly influenced the medium with its use of a steady march tempo and beat, coupled with a syncopated melody and rhythm.

With the closing of New Orleans’s famous prostitution district known as Storyville in 1917 and the start of Prohibition in 1919, many musicians left the party atmosphere of the city and traveled north to New York and Chicago. Dixieland band music became the rage, typified by Joe “King” Oliver’s Creole Jazz Band, an integral part of the demimonde culture of Chicago, as organized crime, bootleg whiskey, and bathtub gin ushered in the Jazz Age of the 1920s.

The most popular and commercially successful style of jazz from the mid-1930s to the mid-1940s was swing. Because most swing bands consisted of at least ten to fifteen performers, it is often called “big band” music. The key figures in developing the swing music were arrangers and bandleaders: Fletcher Henderson, Don Redman, and Edward Kennedy “Duke” Ellington, who, along with Benny Goodman, Glenn Miller, and Tommy and Jimmy Dorsey, became famous celebrities. Swing was music for dancing, and the size of the ensembles required a greater reliance on written arrangements. The primary instruments were the brass and rhythm sections.

The economic hardships and rationing of goods during World War II created a mentality of scarcity across the United States. As dance halls closed and the American Federation of Musicians (AFM) imposed a ban on recording in 1942, the Swing era entered its decline. In response, after-hours clubs, often cramped and smoke filled, emerged as venues for smaller combos to perform a new type of jazz known as bebop. The small clubs and bebop musicians, who were regarded more as highly skilled artists than merely background entertainers, appealed to an emerging subculture, which promoted nonconformity, rebelliousness, and restless excitement.

From Bebop to Jazz

The origination of bebop, or bop, considered the first modern jazz style, is generally credited to alto saxophonist Charlie Parker, trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie, and pianist Thelonius Monk. The typical bebop combo consists of an alto saxophone, trumpet, piano, guitar or bass, and drums. Bebop marked a major shift from music for dancing to complex music for serious listening and appreciation. Bebop’s complex improvisations are based on chord progressions rather than melody.

The term cool jazz refers to a style that is softer and easier than the “hot” tempi and rhythms of bebop. In 1949 and 1950, trumpeter Miles Davis organized recording sessions in New York City for his nine-piece band, the Miles Davis Nonet, that resulted in the album The Birth of Cool in 1957. In addition to Davis on trumpet, alto saxophonist Lee Konitz and baritone saxophonist Gerry Mulligan played in a lighter, subtler tone. The nonet utilized a standard rhythm section of piano, bass, and drums; however, Davis added French horn and tuba, which created the overall subdued effect and the “cool” sound. Other influential cool jazz musicians were pianists Lennie Tristano, Dave Brubeck, and Stan Kenton.

The cool jazz of Davis is often associated with the Beat Generation and specifically the beatniks of San Francisco’s counterculture, stereotyped as bongo-playing men with goatees and berets and long-haired women wearing black leotards. The beatnik lifestyle was the archetypical representation of hip, and, when coupled with the youthful rebelliousness portrayed in popular films by screen icons Marlon Brando and James Dean, was a powerful illustration of the rebellion against the middle-class standards of white America. Cool jazz resonated deeply with this group.

Hard bop was a move away from cool jazz and an attempt to make bebop more appealing by incorporating influences from soul music, gospel music, and the blues. Hard bop differs from bebop in that it is less complex and has a darker tone quality. The most influential musicians associated with hard bop were drummer Art Blakey; pianist Horace Silver; trumpeters Clifford Brown, Davis, and Freddie Hubbard; alto saxophonist Julian Edwin “Cannonball” Adderley; and tenor saxophonists Sonny Rollins and John Coltrane, regarded as the most influential jazz saxophonist after Charlie Parker.

Jazz historians refer to the innovations of the 1960s and 1970s as avant-garde. “Free jazz” and “modal jazz” are the two most common substyles of jazz during this time. Saxophonist Ornette Coleman and pianist Cecil Taylor are the two most famous artists associated with free jazz, so named because the musicians improvise from predetermined chord progressions. In modal jazz, the performers improvise based on melodies, or modes, rather than on the harmonies produced by chord progressions. Davis, Coltrane, and pianist Bill Evans were major popularizers of modal jazz.

The Rock and Roll Challenge

The appeal and commercial success of rock and roll in the 1960s led to a hybrid form known as jazz-rock fusion, or simply fusion, which became the first jazz style since swing to gain widespread popularity. Davis initiated the style in 1968 with the release of two albums, In a Silent Way (1969) and Bitches Brew (1970). Notable artists of the fusion scene include guitarist John McLaughlin and the Mahavishnu Orchestra, pianist Joe Zawinul and saxophonist Wayne Shorter and Weather Report, and pianists Herbie Hancock and Chick Corea.

Ever changing, ever evolving, jazz has proven to be a highly dynamic and fluid musical art form, reflecting and countering the ever-shifting political moods and social values of the United States. The explosion of rock and roll and the counterculture embracing it in the 1960s resulted in the creation of the amorphous free jazz. The nonconformity and hedonism of the 1970s inspired the fusion of jazz with rock and other musical styles, as well as the creation of mainstream jazz.

During the 1980s, jazz saxophonists Kenny G, David Sanborn, and Michael Brecker enjoyed great commercial success as new audiences became exposed to “contemporary jazz” or “new adult contemporary” music radio stations. The 1990s brought a revival of swing dancing, and a new generation became exposed to the music of 1930s and 1940s big bands as the dance craze erupted onto the scene.

The beginning of the twenty-first century ushered in increased stylistic diversity, as world music influences permeated the jazz sound. While there are consistently fewer venues for musicians to perform jazz today, the number of high school and college musicians choosing to learn and perform jazz has steadily increased, and the popular appeal of jazz music among sophisticated listeners continues to climb.

Denise A. Seachrist

See also: Bebop; Brando, Marlon; Dean, James.

Further Reading

Gridley, Mark C. Jazz Styles: History and Analysis. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2003.

Saul, Scott. Freedom Is, Freedom Ain't: Jazz and the Making of the Sixties. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.

Ward, Geoffrey C. Jazz: A History of America's Music. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2000.

Jefferson Airplane

The Jefferson Airplane, in many ways the seminal band of the San Francisco hippie counterculture and acid rock movement, was formed by Marty Balin in 1965. A former folk musician and member of the band known as the Town Criers, Balin took over management of San Francisco's first folk night club, the Matrix, that year and wanted to form an electric band. Balin, a vocalist, enlisted folk guitarist Paul Kanter. Kanter, in turn, approached Jorma Kaukonen, a lead guitarist who was friends with Jack Casady, a jazz-trained guitarist whom they persuaded to play bass. Rounding out the band was Skip Spence on drums (a new instrument for him) and Signe Anderson on vocals.

The group found its name when Kaukonen related that a friend, Steve Talbot, had coined the name Thomas Jefferson Airplane for a character in a blues band, but the band was not using it at the time. Kaukonen suggested a shorter version as a name for the group.

This Jefferson Airplane line-up participated in some of the first psychedelic dance parties held in 1960s San Francisco, sponsored by promoters Bill Graham and the Family Dog. Among these were events held at Longshoreman's Hall, a benefit concert for the San Francisco Mime Troupe, and the Trips Festival in 1965 and 1966. The dance concerts featured psychedelic projections by lighting artists such as Bill Hamm and Glenn McKay.

Balin used his expertise in graphic arts to help create distinctive poster art, and the band capitalized on the craze for buttons and bumper stickers (used heavily by the Berkeley Free Speech and antiwar movements) by having thousands printed that read "The Jefferson Airplane Loves You." In September 1966, the band released its first album, The Jefferson Airplane Takes Off, on RCA Records. RCA would remain its label until the Airplane formed its own record company, Grunt, in the early 1970s. Graham, a noted ballroom promoter, acted as the band's manager for a short period, until Balin's long-time friend Bill Thompson took over those duties.

Anderson, who left the band in late 1966 to take care of her newborn baby, was replaced by Grace Slick, former lead singer for another early San Francisco band, the Great Society. In 1967, Spence was replaced by Los Angeles drummer Spencer Dryden. Slick brought material from her former band to the Jefferson Airplane, including the song "Somebody to Love" (written by her brother-in-law, Darby Slick) and her own composition, "White Rabbit." These two songs would be the band's highest ranking songs on the American Top 40 charts, peaking at number five and number eight, respectively, in the late spring and early summer of 1967. They also helped propel the band's album Surrealistic Pillow, which had been released by RCA in February of that year, to the top of the charts as well. To many during this time, the Jefferson Airplane was the musical heart and soul of the San Francisco hippie counterculture.

The band continued recording and touring, releasing After Bathing at Baxter's in 1967, Crown of Creation in 1968, Bless Its Pointed Little Head (a live album) in 1969, and Volunteers in 1969, all on RCA Records. On the Grunt label, they released Bark in September 1971, Long John Silver in 1972, and Thirty Seconds Over Winterland (another live recording) in 1973. It would be their last recording as the Jefferson Airplane, as members disbanded to form other ensembles.

Lisa Rhodes

See also: Acid Rock; Hippies; Psychedelia; San Francisco, California.

Further Reading

Gleason, Ralph J. The Jefferson Airplane and the San Francisco Sound. New York: Ballantine, 1969.

Slick, Darby. Don't You Want Somebody to Love: Reflections on the San Francisco Sound. Berkley, CA: SLG, 1991.

Slick, Grace. Somebody to Love? A Rock and Roll Memoir. New York: Warner, 1998.

Jehovah's Witnesses

Founded in the late nineteenth century by evangelist Charles Taze Russell, the organization known since 1931 as Jehovah's Witnesses also has been known variously as Dawnites, Russellites, Watch Tower Bible People, Rutherfordites, and, perhaps most commonly, Bible Students. Based in Brooklyn, New York, this international organization with members in 235 nations uses Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York as its legal name, and the name Jehovah's Witnesses for its practice of preaching door to door.

Raised a Presbyterian, Russell spent several years as a Congregationalist, before briefly giving up on religion, dissatisfied with existing expositions of Bible doctrine. Later influenced by a Second Adventist meeting led by Jonas Wendell, Russell started a Bible study group in the early 1870s with the purpose of clearing up misunderstandings of the Bible. By the late 1870s, he and his associates began spreading their views through lectures, preaching, essays, tracts, articles, books, and, in 1879, the magazine Zion's Watch Tower and Herald of Christ's Presence, later renamed The Watchtower: Announcing Jehovah's Kingdom.

Jehovah's Witnesses take part in a mass baptism in California in 1947. Adhering to what they regard as Christianity in its original form, Witnesses eschew conventional church doctrine and holidays. Their principle of separateness also extends to politics. (Loomis Dean/Stringer/Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Jehovah's Witnesses practice strict adherence to Bible principles. Its practices distinguish the group from others espousing similar principles on cultural, political, religious, and medical matters. Based on passages John 17:14 and Revelation 18:4, for example, Jehovah's Witnesses do not participate in such popular celebrations as birthdays, Christmas, Easter, Halloween, or Mother's Day, denouncing them as pagan and biblically unfounded. The principle of separateness from the world is extended to political affairs based on Messianic Kingdom prophecies in Isaiah, Daniel, and Revelation, and on passages in Matthew and John, which declare that Jesus's kingdom is "no part of the world" and instruct disciples to pray for the kingdom. Witnesses recognize Jehovah's kingdom as sovereign, maintain political neutrality in what they view as worldly affairs, and refuse to salute the flag, to vote, or to serve in the military. In terms of medical practice, Witnesses refuse to accept blood transfusions, based on their understanding of Leviticus 17:12 and Acts 15:29.

Witnesses remain steadfast in these principles despite substantial peer pressure, loss of jobs and freedoms, and threats to their lives and physical well-being. This abstinence, along with persistent evangelizing, has led to persecution of the group at various times in U.S. history. Such harassment was particularly severe during World War I, when eight members of the organization's leadership were charged with conspiracy and imprisoned after refusing to support the war, as well as during World War II. In the decades since, the organization has been party to a number of civil rights cases, including some that reached the U.S. Supreme Court.

Former members of the Jehovah's Witnesses have been outspoken in their criticism of the group's religious practices and treatment of members. But Shawn Francis Peters in his award-winning book, Judging Jehovah's Witnesses (2000), and other scholars have argued that the group's determination to defend itself and its right of free expression in court has significantly expanded civil liberties for all Americans. Indeed, the organization's struggle to defend its civil liberties extends beyond the United States, leading political analysts to view the treatment of Jehovah's Witnesses as a measure of a nation's commitment to religious freedom.

James Griffith

See also: Cults.

Further Reading

Jehovah's Witnesses. <http://www.watchtower.org>

Jehovah's Witnesses: Proclaimers of God's Kingdom. Brooklyn: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York, 1993.

Peters, Shawn Francis. Judging Jehovah's Witnesses. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Stroup, Herbert Hewitt. The Jehovah's Witnesses. New York: Russell & Russell, 1945.

Jemison, Mary (1743–1833)

Mary Jemison, the daughter of European immigrants, is known for her life of captivity among Seneca Indians in the mid-eighteenth century, in which she adopted their ways and married into the tribe.

Jemison was born aboard a ship carrying her parents from Northern Ireland to America in 1743. She grew up on a farm near present-day Gettysburg, Pennsylvania. On the morning of April 15, 1758, a raiding party of Shawnee Indians and French soldiers swooped down on the Jemison farm. Mary's two oldest brothers escaped to Virginia, but her parents, her three youngest brothers, and her sisters all were killed.

The raiding party carried off fifteen-year-old Mary and sold her to a group of Seneca Indians, who took her with them to the Ohio Country. The Senecas adopted Mary and christened her Dehgewanus, which means "Two Fallen Voices."

As Dehgewanus, the white girl learned the Seneca ways and married Sheninjee, a Delaware Indian. They had two children, only one of whom survived. Soon after their second child was born in 1762, Dehgewanus and Sheninjee began the journey to Sheninjee's homeland along the Genesee River in New York. Sheninjee died before they arrived, but Dehgewanus pressed on with her infant son and settled in a town on the Genesee River near present-day Geneseo, New York.

In 1765, she married a Seneca warrior. They had six children. Her husband was a leader in the Cherry Valley (New York) massacre of November 1778. The following year, General John Sullivan and his troops destroyed Dehgewanus's village. She relocated to Castile, New York, where she lived in a log cabin.

Dehgewanus had become a member of Seneca society and would remain in New York for the rest of her life. A tribal grant in 1797 made her one of the largest landowners in the region; she also owned the largest herd of cattle in the area. The state confirmed her land title in 1817, and she became a naturalized U.S. citizen that same year. Because she preferred the lifestyle and customs of the Indians to her white lifestyle, she was an object of fascination. She was known for her generosity, cheerfulness, and vigor well into her eighties.

In 1823, James E. Seaver interviewed her and wrote down her experiences, which were published as A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison (1824). The book soared to the top of the captivity narrative genre and ran through about thirty printings.

By 1831, a number of whites had settled the Castile area. Dehgewanus sold her land and moved to the Buffalo Creek Reservation near Buffalo, New York, where she died on September 19, 1833. In 1874, her family moved her remains to near her old home on the Genesee River, a site that later became Letchworth State Park.

Kathy Warnes

See also: Native Americans.

Further Reading

Namias, June. White Captives: Gender and Ethnicity on the American Frontier. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.

Seaver, James E. A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison. New York: Random House, 1929.

Jesus People

Members of an evangelical Christian movement that grew out of the hippie counterculture, Jesus People, or Jesus Freaks, identify themselves as “fanatics for Jesus.” Today’s Jesus Freaks are the cultural descendants of the Jesus movement or Jesus revolution of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Much of the terminology, music, dress, and religious art of the original Jesus Freaks has spread informally among Christian youth for almost three generations.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the hippie movement—an antiestablishment youth movement that questioned conformist society, advocated free love, used psychedelic drugs, and opposed the war in Vietnam—gave rise to a spontaneous religious movement in various cities across the United States. Press reports began to circulate of seemingly spontaneous Christian conversions that had occurred in San Francisco, followed by other locations in California, and then on college campuses across America and into Canada. The conversions often were ecstatic, accompanied by such charismatic phenomena as glossolalia, or speaking in tongues, a phenomenon witnessed in traditional Pentecostal churches. Youths known for their heavy drug use and promiscuous sexuality suddenly were transformed by conversion to the teachings of Jesus Christ. Many cases of instantaneous, symptomless withdrawal, even from hard drugs such as heroin, were reported.

Around the same time, recent converts began to organize informal gatherings, sometimes in the form of communes, sometimes in the form of regular meetings. Most of the leaders of these groups were not ordained, but simply Christian laypersons. Informal “religious houses” were dedicated to prayer, fasting, Bible study, singing, and testimonies of faith conversion. Despite not having a formal church affiliation, many of the participants hailed Jesus as their “Lord and Savior.” Some believed that Jesus had “escaped” from the church and that His spirit could now be found on the streets and among these informal religious groups.

Newspapers, music groups and concerts, art, and new songs in the style of the Christian youth culture began to appear. Posters proclaiming “Turn On to Jesus” or “WANTED, Jesus of Nazareth, alias the Christ, the Messiah, the King of Kings” were plastered throughout neighborhoods frequented by members of the counterculture in cities across the United States, Canada, and even Western Europe. As the movement grew, informal baptisms were performed at beaches, riverfronts, and lakeshores. Those who attended gatherings heard the testimonies of members who said that instead of drug trips, “tripping on Jesus was the ultimate high.”

Those who had been radical in drug experimentation now became radical in their religious experience. The movement even came to include Jewish converts, some of whom joined the new Jews for Jesus group. Some converts joined communal groups, such as Jesus People and the Shiloh Youth Revival Centers. The latter was one of the largest religious communes of that era, with more than 175 communal houses and farms and more than 1,000 active members across the country. Others joined groups that developed reputations as cults, such as the Children of God.

The transient lifestyle of the youth counterculture meant that many of the new religious groups were impermanent as well. Many Jesus People dropped their new faith altogether, while others gravitated toward more mainstream sects and evangelical groups.

Yet the legacy of the Jesus People remained strong, as many of those brought to Christianity by the movement would take on leadership roles in churches and denominations, emphasizing the need to reach out to youth. The musical genre known as Christian rock is one of the enduring cultural phenomena that evolved directly from the Jesus People movement.

Andrew J. Waskey and James Ciment

See also: Fundamentalism, Christian; Hippies; Pentecostalism.

Further Reading

Hubbard, Richard. The Jesus Freaks. New York: Pyramid, 1972.

Steiker, Lowell D. The Jesus Trip: Advent of the Jesus Freaks. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1971.

Jews

Throughout the course of the twentieth century, Jews in America, whether practitioners of Judaism or members of the Jewish ethnic community, have been visible participants in virtually every major attack on, or retreat from, mainstream secular culture.

Individual Jews helped lead the socialist and communist movements from the early 1900s through the 1950s. Later, Jews were among the most active contributors to the civil rights movement and protests against the Vietnam War.

Although Jews often have provided leadership to these movements, their participation also has prompted controversy within them. The sometimes disproportionate number of Jews has led some fellow advocates to question whether certain movements have been perceived as “too” Jewish and whether that appearance has been harmful to the cause.

Immigration and Labor Organizing

Much twentieth-century Jewish radicalism in the United States can be traced to the influx of Jews during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Thousands of Jews emigrated from rural Eastern Europe during those decades to cities in the eastern United States, particularly New York. Their dense, clamorous, often impoverished neighborhoods made the need for social change an increasingly powerful sentiment in the immigrant Jewish community.

Newcomers typically received help from a mutual aid group made up of people who had come from the same town or region in the old country. These groups, called landsmanshaften in Yiddish, funneled many of the new arrivals into jobs in the garment industry.

Union organizing inevitably followed. Yiddish-speaking workers in the garment, cigar-making, bakery, and hat-making industries went on strike regularly during the 1880s. In 1888, a central body of Jewish unions, the United Hebrew Trades, was organized in New York. Two years later, thousands of Jewish workers marched to Union Square in downtown New York in a show of solidarity and defiance.

At the same time, other upstart social-change groups attracted immigrants. In 1890, the Socialist Labor Party, emphasizing economic inequality, and the anarchist Knights of Freedom, stressing bohemianism and antireligious mockery, each launched a Yiddish newspaper. Two years later, the Arbeiter Ring (Workmen's Circle) was founded. This organization offered classes and promoted social cooperation beyond the workplace. It held theatrical and musical events with socialist themes for workers. Many of the organization's members read the Jewish Daily Forward, which was launched in 1897 with a similar socialist outlook and soon became the most popular newspaper among New York City's immigrant Jews.

Over the next two decades, the labor unions grew rapidly, with a steady flow of new immigrants replacing earlier arrivals who prospered and moved away from the slums. By 1914, 104 different unions had affiliated with the United Hebrew Trades, representing 250,000 workers. They still regularly took job actions, as in Chicago, where Jewish workers engaged in a general strike against clothing makers. They also organized for elections. In 1912, the Lower East Side elected one of the two socialists who have served in the U.S. Congress, Meyer London. The unions and the Workmen's Circle continued creating arts groups, schools, and camps. In the late 1920s, the unions created cooperative housing colonies that sheltered several thousand people, mostly immigrant Yiddish speakers.

The newly formed Communist Party organized similar groups and cooperatives throughout the 1920s and 1930s, even though the party openly disdained Jewish identification beginning in 1925. Some of its Jewish organizers chose new Anglo-Saxon names; party chairman Jacob Liebenstein, for example, became Jay Lovestone.

Jewish participation in the garment unions waned during the 1930s, as immigration slowed and longtime members aged, prospered, or assimilated into American society at large. The rise of the Nazis in Germany prior to and during World War II led many Jews in the United States to abandon their universalist ideals, which by the end of the decade curtailed participation in socialist and communist organizations.

Post-World War II Era

The genocidal slaughter of Jews during World War II further pushed U.S. Jews away from European political movements, while prompting more focus on injustice in the United States. In the mid-1950s, after a spate of anti-Semitic incidents in the South, the American Jewish Congress and other mainstream Jewish organizations organized against racial segregation (even as they expelled suspected communists).

After criticism that long-distance protesting was ineffective in the effort to obtain civil rights for blacks, Jewish college students began heading south to participate directly in the drive to register African American voters. This effort culminated in 1964, as hundreds of young Jews volunteered in a campaign called Freedom Summer. In what became a cause célèbre, three volunteer civil rights workers from the North were found slain that July in Philadelphia, Mississippi, allegedly at the hands of the Ku Klux Klan; two of them, Michael Schwerner and Andrew Goodman, were Jews.

The fall of 1964 saw an outbreak of angry student demonstrations on the campus of the University of California, Berkeley, that marked the beginning of the Free Speech Movement (FSM). The university administration had banned political activity on campus, which student leaders regarded as a violation of their rights and cause to demonstrate. A majority of the FSM's steering committee was Jewish, it was observed, as against only about 3 percent of the student body.

Likewise, Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), a New Left group organized in the early 1960s to promote "participatory democracy" that later protested U.S. military activity in Vietnam, had many Jewish leaders. Forty-six percent of delegates to a national meeting of the organization in 1966 identified themselves as having a Jewish religious background; other Jews likely specified “none” when asked for religious membership.

Throughout the 1960s, freethinking Jewish innovators gained prominence in diverse fields of culture and society: Bob Dylan and Leonard Cohen in music, Allen Ginsberg in poetry, Lenny Bruce in comedy, Julian Beck in theater, and Fritz Perls in psychology, to name a few. Abbie Hoffman and Jerry Rubin founded and led the loosely organized Youth International Party, whose protests confronted authority and mainstream politics by using pranks and other nonstandard methods to gain media attention.

Some Jews who participated in the 1960s counterculture movement had grown up in the Jewish socialist subculture and were referred to as “red diaper babies.” For example, Mickey Flacks, a leader of the SDS, had grown up in the residential cooperative of a New York trade union. Others were raised in the relatively apolitical middle class. Those who tied their countercultural activities to their Jewishness typically pointed to idealist traditions in the religion and culture. In 1964, Steven Schwarzschild, the editor of Judaism magazine, wrote that a Jew is by definition an outsider, making criticizing society a Jew’s obligation.

Abbie Hoffman tied his own rebelliousness to the debate over assimilation, which preoccupied immigrant Jewish families throughout the twentieth century. In his childhood home, he wrote, “great psychological dilemmas revolved around religious traditions at odds with the desire to be accepted” in the United States. “The acculturation process lets you know very early in life that you were put on earth to make choices. Jews, especially first-born male Jews, have to make a big choice very quickly in life whether to go for the money or to go for broke.”

As the broader counterculture movement of the 1960s splintered, Jews were among the many subgroups to organize themselves. Jews for Urban Justice was established in Washington, D.C., in 1965 to protest Jewish entanglement with society’s power structure. Later, Jewish-focused groups evolved in parallel with other countercultural organizations. Jews for Urban Justice added spiritual exploration to its social justice pursuits, while others sought to diversify U.S. Jewish culture through artistic innovations or experiments in cooperative living.

Through the decades that followed, Jewish groups were prominent among those rejecting or challenging mainstream American life, often by seeking to merge Jewish traditions with New Age, environmental, social justice, or other countercultural philosophies.

Matt Fleischer-Black

See also: Bruce, Lenny; Dylan, Bob; Ginsberg, Allen; Hasidim and Hasidism; Hoffman, Abbie; Jews for Jesus; Rubin, Jerry; Students for a Democratic Society.

Further Reading

Bershtel, Sara, and Allen Graubard. Saving Remnants: Feeling Jewish in America. New York: Free Press, 1992.

Howe, Irving, and Kenneth Libo. World of Our Fathers: The Journey of the East European Jews to America and the Life They Found and Made. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1976.

Kaplan, Judy, and Linn Shapiro. Red Diapers: Growing Up in the Communist Left. Carbondale: University of Illinois Press, 1998.

Liebman, Arthur. Jews and the Left. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1979.

Porter, Jack Nusan, and Peter Dreier, eds. Jewish Radicalism: A Selected Anthology. New York: Grove, 1973.

Staub, Michael E. Torn at the Roots: The Crisis of Jewish Liberalism in Postwar America. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.

Jews for Jesus

Like their Christian counterparts, the Jesus People, Jews for Jesus arose out of the growing evangelist movement in the hippie counterculture of the early 1970s. In some cases, the young Jews who came to profess faith in Jesus Christ joined churches. In other cases, they joined with older Jews in “Messianic synagogues.” Messianic Jews are Jewish by birth and religion, but they also believe that Jesus (Y’shua, in Hebrew) of Nazareth is the long-awaited Messiah of the Jewish people. While there have always been Jewish converts to Christianity, Messianic Jews do not see themselves as leaving Judaism, but rather as “completing” their Judaism by recognizing Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah.

The official Jews for Jesus organization was founded as the Hineni Ministries in 1973 by a small, informal group of Jewish hippies led by Moishe Rosen. A convert to Christianity as a teenager, Rosen was an ordained Baptist minister assigned to San Francisco by the American Board of Missions to the Jews. Jews for Jesus was incorporated as an independent evangelistic agency with the goal of persuading Jews that Jesus is God and the Messiah.

To reach out to fellow members of the faith, Jews for Jesus continue to participate in Jewish community life and causes, while at the same time vigorously promoting their Christian beliefs. In this way, they seek to demonstrate that accepting Jesus is not an automatic rejection of Jewish heritage. They use a wide variety of media to communicate their message, including evangelistic advertisements in national magazines and newspapers, tracts, books, music, and the Internet. Jews for Jesus also is known for its distinctively Jewish gospel music. For example, the song “Behold Your God” by the group The Liberated Wailing Wall sets biblical passages to Jewish-style melodies.

Since 1974, Jews for Jesus has conducted “witnessing campaigns” in New York City, where staff workers and volunteers engage in street evangelism, distribute tracts, preach on sidewalks, and use drama and music to reach potential converts. Such efforts have earned Jews for Jesus a reputation for assertive confrontation, involving intense face-to-face discussions of their message. In addition to its North American ministry, based in San Francisco, the organization has offices in Europe, South America, Africa, and Israel.

The beliefs and often aggressive conversion tactics of Jews for Jesus have generated strong criticism, especially from the mainstream the Jewish community, where members are regarded as apostates, pests, and an embarrassment. Criticism has not slowed the activity of Jews for Jesus, however, and it appears to continue to increase in adherents. Membership statistics are not known, but the organization claims eighty chapters and ten national branches.

Andrew J. Waskey and James Ciment

See also: Fundamentalism, Christian, Hippies, Jews.

Further Reading

Jews for Jesus. <http://jewsforjesus.org>

Rosen, Moishe, and Bill Proctor. Jews for Jesus. Old Tappan, NJ: Fleming H. Revell, 1974.

Tucker, Ruth A. Not Ashamed: The Story of Jews for Jesus. Sisters, OR: Multnomah, 2000.

John Birch Society

Since 1958, the John Birch Society (JBS) has been an ultraconservative organization focused on opposing communism and perceived attempts by international “insiders” to undermine U.S. society, culture, and constitutional freedoms. While sometimes dismissed as a fringe group on the extreme right of the political spectrum, the JBS has had an undeniable impact on American society by encouraging the active participation of right-wing “outsiders” in the political process.

On December 9, 1958, in Indianapolis, retired candy manufacturer Robert Welch, Jr., presented his idea for a society dedicated to exposing a conspiracy of bankers, politicians, and others he viewed as internationalists and who, he claimed, controlled the governments of both the United States and the Soviet Union. The first chapter of the society was organized in February 1959 and named after John Birch, a Baptist missionary to China and U.S. military intelligence officer during World War II. Birch was killed by Chinese Communists shortly after the war’s end and was hailed by the JBS as one of the first anticommunist victims of the cold war.

Welch was a business entrepreneur who had successfully marketed confectioneries, including what became known as the “Sugar Daddy.” Although he left the business world in 1957 to devote his energies to the cause of anticommunism, the JBS drew heavily on Welch’s connections with the National Association of Manufacturers, attracting many of its early members and leaders from this organization.

As founder of the JBS, Welch began publishing American Opinion magazine, which became the official JBS publication in 1959. Within its first year, the JBS had seventy-five chapters consisting of 1,500 members. By March 1961, there were fifty-eight paid, full-time staffers in the society’s home office and throughout the field. Total membership by the end of that year was estimated at 60,000 to 100,000. Members tended to have higher-than-average incomes and to be Republicans. Typical JBS activities included mass letter-writing campaigns to members of Congress.

The John Birch Society represented a unique right-wing counterculture that did not fit into the mainstream Republican Party, neo-Nazi extremism, or religious fundamentalism. In 1960, Welch produced a book titled The Politician that made headlines for declaring that President Dwight D. Eisenhower was “a dedicated conscious agent of the communist conspiracy.” Such rhetoric created a deep division between conservative Republicans and ultraconservative JBS members.

The JBS strongly opposed the civil rights movement, defending its position on the principle of states’ rights and suspicion of communist support for the antisegregation cause rather than on the grounds of white supremacy. Similarly, JBS conspiracy theories regarding international banking and Jewish control of financial institutions were said not to be motivated by anti-Semitic ideology. The JBS differed from fundamentalist religious organizations in focusing its efforts on anticommunism and internationalist conspiracies rather than on the purported moral decline in the United States. Indeed, the prominent conservative commentator William F. Buckley criticized an early draft of The Politician for ignoring the decline of faith in the United States.

After Welch’s death in 1985, JBS magazine subscriptions dropped to under 20,000. In 1989, the JBS moved its central offices from Belmont, Massachusetts, Welch’s hometown, to Appleton, Wisconsin. Subscriptions climbed back over 50,000 in the 1990s.

Describing itself as “a membership-based organization dedicated to restoring and preserving freedom under the United States Constitution,” the JBS has continued its opposition to perceived internationalist conspiracies through campaigns against the United Nations, immigration, the Council on Foreign Relations, and the New World Order. An entrenched counterculture and extremist minority, the JBS has nevertheless provided training for thousands of ultraconservative activists in the half-century since its creation.

Nathan Zook

See also: Communism; Fundamentalism; Christian.

Further Reading

Berlet, Chip, and Matthew N. Lyons. Right-Wing Populism in America: Too Close for Comfort. New York: Guilford, 2000.

John Birch Society. <http://www.jbs.org>

Schoenwald, Jonathan M. A Time for Choosing: The Rise of Modern American Conservatism. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

John Reed Clubs

In November 1929, nine years after the journalist, poet, editor, and Communist activist John Reed was laid in state at the Kremlin, the American Communist Party and the editorial board of The New Masses, a left-wing political journal, honored the radical editor and writer by creating several literary clubs in his name. The clubs were modeled on proletarian literature-writing groups formed in the Soviet Union. With the slogan “Art Is a Class Weapon,” they were intended both to radicalize writers and artists and to bring ordinary workers into the radical literary fold. In 1934, at the height of their popularity, the clubs boasted more than thirty chapters from New York City to Portland, Oregon (Reed’s birthplace), with a membership of nearly 1,200. Although the majority of members were writers, the clubs also attempted to include visual artists in their activities.

The clubs’ activities included sloganeering and poster design for Communist Party demonstrations, as well as the writing of commodities-price reports, poetry, novellas, and nonfiction pieces. Many writers in the clubs complained bitterly about Party-enforced distractions from the literary work they felt was the purpose of the organization. The clubs also were plagued by ideological conflicts that would inevitably arise from multiple perspectives (however sympathetic) coming into conflict with official Party doctrine.

Despite these problems, the clubs boasted significant success on a number of fronts. They arranged for prominent writers, such as Kenneth Burke, Granville Hicks, and Philip Rahv, to lecture to members, and the journal of the New York club, Partisan Review, edited by Rahv and William Phillips, would later break from the Party to become one of the most important journals of anti-Communist left-wing criticism in the United States. Furthermore, the Chicago club would cultivate the young, pathbreaking African American writer Richard Wright, a member from the summer of 1933, who was elected to the editorial board of the club’s magazine, Left Front. Thus the Chicago club was influential in supporting one of the most important writers of the period at a time when there were few progressive outlets in which writers’ talents could germinate.

While these developments were significant, the limited life of the clubs, and, with few exceptions, their inability to transcend their Communist Party heritage, made their effect on the American literary scene less than far-reaching. The Communist Party disbanded the John Reed Clubs in September 1934, concluding that official doctrine and literary experiment were difficult to reconcile. Nevertheless, independent clubs and their attendant journals continued to be active into the 1940s.

Lawrence Jones

See also: Communism.

Further Reading

Homberger, Eric. American Writers and Radical Politics, 1900–39: Equivocal Commitments. London: Macmillan, 1986.

Stansell, Christine. American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century. New York: Henry Holt, 2000.

Joplin, Janis (1943–1970)

Janis Joplin was both a talented rock vocalist of the 1960s and a symbol of the era's rebellious, drug-infused lifestyle. Her gritty, bluesy vocal style thrilled audiences and brought her to the brink of superstardom. Her untimely death from a heroin overdose at the age of twenty-seven and at the height of her career became a symbol of the dark side of rock and roll's excessive lifestyle.

Janis Lyn Joplin was born on January 19, 1943, to Seth and Dorothy Joplin in Port Arthur, Texas. Her teenage years in the small refinery town were very difficult ones, and she retreated into painting and folk singing to cope with being ostracized by her peers. After graduating from high school in 1960, Joplin enrolled at Lamar State College of Technology in nearby Beaumont, Texas, but she moved to Los Angeles the following summer, drifted to the San Francisco Bay Area, and then returned home to Port Arthur.

In the summer of 1962, Joplin moved to Austin and enrolled in the University of Texas, which she attended until December of that year. Casting her lot with the remnants of the beatnik and bohemian community there, she began to sing in earnest. She drew praise and gigs at a local bar named Threadgill's as a member of the Waller Creek Boys.

In January 1963, she hitchhiked to San Francisco, where she joined the underground music scene, sang in clubs, and developed a serious speed (methamphetamine) habit. She returned to Port Arthur in May 1965, ostensibly to get married and overcome her addiction, but her wedding plans collapsed and her attempt to go "straight" was abortive. After moving back to Austin briefly in the spring of 1966, she returned to San Francisco.

Upon her return, Joplin joined up with a psychedelic rock band called Big Brother and the Holding Company and became its lead singer. One of the seminal bands of the San Francisco hippie counterculture of the late 1960s, Big Brother signed a recording contract with Mainstream Records while on tour in Chicago and began cutting an album there, which they finished in Los Angeles. The record, named after the band, was released in the fall of 1967 and failed to garner much attention from disc jockeys or critics. Joplin's debut recording never made money.

After an impressive performance at the Monterey Pop Festival in June 1967, the group was offered and accepted a recording contract with Columbia Records. This led to the release in August 1968 of the album Cheap Thrills, which sold 1 million copies during the first month of its release. Later that month, the single "Piece of My Heart" reached number eight on the American Top 40 charts. Joplin, with her frenetic performance style, funky hippie clothes, and tortured, soulful vocals, became a star and a role model to many in the counterculture.

After splitting from Big Brother in September 1968, Joplin formed a Memphis-style soul band called Squeeze, which debuted at the Stax-Volt Record Company's Christmas party in 1968. She recorded an album with the band, I Got Dem Ol' Kozmic Blues Again Mama!, which was released in the fall of 1969. It met with mixed reviews but generated relatively solid sales. Joplin's version of the Chantels' hit "Maybe" from that album was one of the few songs by a white artist to receive airplay on African American radio stations during this era. It was with the band Squeeze that Joplin gave her historic performance at the Woodstock music festival, held in Bethel, New York, in August 1969.

In May 1970, Joplin formed a new band, Full Tilt Boogie, and she went on the road with it that summer. Her new musical direction had a decidedly country edge, as evidenced on the album Pearl, released in January 1971. "Me and Bobby McGee," a cut from the album, went to number one on the American Top 40 charts in the winter of 1971. Joplin did not live to see that success, however, as she had been found dead of a heroine overdose at a Hollywood hotel on October 3, 1970.

Lisa Rhodes

See also: Haight-Ashbury, San Francisco: Heroin: Rock and Roll: San Francisco, California: Woodstock Music and Art Fair.

Further Reading

Amburn, Ellis. Pearl: The Obsessions and Passions of Janis Joplin. New York: Warner, 1992.

Dalton, David. Piece of My Heart: A Portrait of Janis Joplin. New York: Da Capo, 1991.

Echols, Alice. Scars of Sweet Paradise: The Life and Times of Janis Joplin. New York: Metropolitan, 1999.

Friedman, Myra. Buried Alive: The Biography of Janis Joplin. New York: William Morrow, 1973.

Kerouac, Jack (1922–1969)

The novelist and poet Jack Kerouac was the leading chronicler and one of the foremost members of the Beat Generation, a group of writers who gained notoriety in the 1950s for countering the prevailing American middle-class culture. Best known for his novel On the Road (1957) and an unconventional style of writing he cultivated, called "spontaneous prose," Kerouac helped define the national consciousness of early cold-war America and greatly influenced subsequent varieties of nonmainstream cultural expression.

He was born Jean-Louis Lebris de Kerouac on March 12, 1922, in Lowell, Massachusetts. His parents were French Canadian immigrants, and his first language was Joul, a dialect of Quebec. Although he was married three times, Kerouac frequently returned home to live with his mother. In 1940, he entered Columbia University on a football scholarship.

He dropped out in his sophomore year, briefly joined the Merchant Marine in 1942, and after an unsuccessful stint in the U.S. Navy, gravitated back to the Columbia campus with friends. It was there that student and poet Allen

Ginsberg introduced Kerouac to the writer William S. Burroughs, and the three became the hub of a new literary enclave. With the support of this group, in 1950 Kerouac published his first novel, The Town and the City, a conventional narrative in the style of Thomas Wolfe, which met with mixed reviews.

In 1947, Kerouac met author Neal Cassady, who became an important figure in his life, most notably appearing as the character Dean Moriarty in On the Road. It was both Cassady's free-spirited adventures in Denver, which he described in a letter, and the exciting new sound of bebop that propelled Kerouac to experiment with writing down ideas as they came to him without stopping for revision. Fueled by drugs and alcohol, he wrote On the Road in three weeks in 1951 on a continuous roll of teletype paper. After years of revision and rejection by publishers, when it was finally published in 1957, On the Road catapulted Kerouac to fame. The New York Times called its publication "an historic occasion."

Kerouac later perfected his spontaneous prose style in texts such as Visions of Cody (unabridged 1972), a more experimental version of the events depicted in On the Road, and The Subterraneans (1958), which he notoriously wrote in three days and three nights on a Benzedrine binge. Although he was raised Catholic, Kerouac discovered Buddhism in the mid-1950s, which further shaped the philosophical outlook of his writing. Taking the name Duluoz, he told the story of his life in twelve novels, which he referred to as the Duluoz Legend. These novels were written and published out of sequence, beginning with The Town and the City and ending with Vanity of Duluoz (1968).

Proclaimed "King of the Beats," Kerouac found himself endlessly defending the meaning of Beat Generation, a term he had coined. After the publication of On the Road, a journalist used the word beatnik, which was picked up by the media as a derogatory blanket term for the new wave of young bohemians. Beat meant "beatific," Kerouac would explain, giving it a more spiritual dimension, but the term was co-opted and misused to define a generational type that did not accurately represent him. When asked what he was searching for, he explained to one magazine interviewer, "I was waiting for God to show his face."

By the end of his life, Kerouac was increasingly defined by his conservative political beliefs and his Catholicism. He had alienated himself from the other Beat writers and felt little solidarity with the hippies of the counterculture. Embittered by critics who attacked his improvisational style of writing, frustrated by his misrepresentation by the public, and disenchanted with the new version of radicalism, he succumbed to alcoholism. On October 21, 1969, he died in St. Petersburg, Florida.

Kerouac's legend survives, both in the beauty of his writing and in the historical import of his work. Although he wrote, "I'm sick of words" in his semi-autobiographical novel Desolation Angels (1965), his words continued to inspire his literary and cultural heirs searching for the egalitarian, borderless spirit of America so resonant in On the Road.

Penny Vlagopoulos

See also: Beat Generation: Buddhism: Burroughs, William S.: Columbia University: Ginsberg: Allen.

Further Reading

Campbell, James. This Is the Beat Generation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

Charters, Ann. Jack Kerouac: A Biography. San Francisco: Straight Arrow, 1973.

Gifford, Barry, and Lawrence Lee. Jack's Book: An Oral Biography of Jack Kerouac. New York: St. Martin's, 1978.

Kesey, Ken (1935–2001)

The American novelist Ken Kesey influenced the counterculture of the 1960s with his novel One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1962), his advocacy of the hallucinogenic drug LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide, or "acid"), and his flamboyant style of defying social norms.

Born on September 17, 1935, in La Junta, Colorado, Kenneth Elton Kesey grew up on a dairy farm in Oregon. He wrestled as an undergraduate at the University of Oregon, and entered the writing program at Stanford University in 1958. Winning a writing grant from Harper Brothers Publishers, Kesey was influenced by Beat writer William S. Burroughs and comic books. He became engaged in a lively community of students who lived on Perry Lane, a block-long bohemian enclave on the Stanford campus.

At the urging of Vic Lovell, a psychology graduate student, Kesey entered a study at the Menlo Park veterans' hospital in Palo Alto, California, that administered psychoactive drugs as part of a government-sponsored research project. Shortly thereafter, Kesey worked the night shift on a psychiatric ward at Stanford Hospital, where doctors were conducting LSD experiments. After ingesting some pilfered LSD, Kesey was inspired to write a story about events on a psychiatric ward.

The result, One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, introduces a protagonist (Randle Patrick McMurphy) who is committed to a psychiatric ward and is at odds with the strict, emasculating control of the system and the head nurse (Miss Ratched). The book includes the perspective of another patient, a Native American called Chief, who observes the events on the ward in a hallucinatory but insightful manner.

By questioning the goals of conventional psychiatry, the book fits neatly into the 1960s counterculture. At the same time, it poses dilemmas of masculine identity in response to the then-burgeoning feminist movement and offers a metaphorical critique of the social systems of the 1960s. Although Kesey believed that the novel portrayed the sickness of American society, he also maintained that it could be read as a Christian allegory. When it was made into a movie in 1975, Kesey was dismayed that Jack Nicholson was cast as McMurphy and maintained that the film shifted the emphasis away from his original intent.

Kesey moved to La Honda, California, and formed connections with a variety of street performers and a fledgling musical group in San Francisco called the Grateful Dead. Kesey staged parties at which LSD was readily available and made every effort to provide a fantastic, multidimensional psychedelic experience. Advertised as "Acid Tests," these events popularized the idea that LSD could lead to profound insights.

In 1964, Kesey and a group of friends painted a school bus with neon colors, loaded it with movie equipment and LSD, and set off on a trip to the East Coast, filming their journey as they traveled. The group, known as the Merry Pranksters, became the subject of Tom Wolfe's work of New Journalism, The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test (1968). Kesey and his Merry Pranksters were the West Coast contingent of the psychedelic culture that exploded in the 1960s. They countered what they saw as East Coast psychedelic elitism by wearing outrageous clothing, blasting loud music, attracting media attention, breaking as many social norms as possible, and committing as many pranks as possible.

In 1966, after being arrested for possession of marijuana, Kesey faked suicide and fled to Mexico. Upon his return to the United States, he was caught by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and spent five months in jail.

Kesey later settled on a farm in Eugene, Oregon, with his wife, Faye, and continued to write. Although he published several more books—including the novels Sometimes a Great Notion (1964) and Sailor Song (1992)—his literary achievements have largely been associated with One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. He died on November 10, 2001, following surgery for liver cancer.

See also: LSD: Merry Pranksters.

Further Reading

Carnes, Bruce. Ken Kesey. Boise, ID : Boise State University, 1974.

Kesey, Ken. One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. New York: Signet, 1962.

Leeds, Barry H. Ken Kesey. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1981.

Stevens, Jay. Storming Heaven: LSD and the American Dream. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Whitmer, Peter O. Aquarius Revisited: Seven Who Created the Sixties Counterculture that Changed America. With Bruce VanWyngarden. New York: Macmillan, 1987.

Wolfe, Tom. The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1968.

King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)

Deeply committed to racial reconciliation and nonviolent methods of social change, Martin Luther King, Jr., galvanized an interracial coalition into the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, shaking the entrenched political, cultural, and economic power structure of America. As president and founding member of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), the author of five poignant books, a key organizer and strategist of crucial desegregation campaigns, and the unofficial liaison between African Americans and the White House, King was the preeminent figure of the civil rights movement.

Early Years

Born on January 15, 1929, in Atlanta, Georgia, King enjoyed family stability, community involvement, and access to exceptional educational opportunities while being raised as a pastor's son in the relative comfort of Atlanta's middle-class African American community. His superb scholastic training brought him to Booker T. Washington High School and Morehouse College, where he received a B.A. in sociology in 1948. King continued on to theological training at Crozer Seminary in Chester, Pennsylvania, where he received a B.D. in 1951; he earned a doctoral degree in systematic theology at Boston University in 1955. At these institutions, King formulated his synthesis of liberalism and neo-orthodoxy by studying such groundbreaking Western thinkers as Protestant theologian Reinhold Niebuhr and German political philosopher Karl Marx, along with the life and thought of Indian nationalist and spiritual leader Mohandas Gandhi.

Upon completing his formal educational training, King took a position as pastor at Dexter Avenue Church in Montgomery, Alabama. He arrived just in time to be selected by local clergy and activists, who looked favorably on his charismatic leadership and status as a highly trained, energetic newcomer, to be a spokesperson for the boycott of city buses by the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA). This organized effort was in response to the arrest of local citizen Rosa Parks for refusing to accept segregated seating arrangements on a city bus. The 1955–1956 boycott drew national attention, as more than 40,000 African American residents carpooled and walked to work for over a year in protest against segregated seating on the city's bus lines. By combining economic sanctions, public scrutiny, and moral suasion, King and the MIA successfully pressured the U.S. Supreme Court to uphold a ruling ordering that the city's public transportation lines must be integrated.

At the conclusion of the Montgomery bus boycott, King joined a host of other African American ministers in January 1957 to establish the SCLC, an organization that advocated for federal civil rights legislation to prepare for a racially harmonious, integrated society. Most notably, the SCLC taught and implemented nonviolent protest tactics aimed at attacking Southern Jim Crow laws, which mandated "separate but equal" status for African Americans, and addressing issues related to national poverty. King endured arrest, violent reprisals, and federal surveillance while serving as president of this high-profile civil rights organization for the remainder of his life.

King and his cohorts organized and participated in protest campaigns for civil and political rights throughout the notoriously segregated Deep South and the impoverished urban North. King relied on the spectacle of white violence to bring notice to these campaigns, but the tactic did not always work. During a campaign in Albany, Georgia, in 1961–1962 against inadequate enforcement of a federal law desegregating interstate transit and public facilities, King's nonviolent protest tactics were criticized by members of the civil rights movement who recognized that a weak federal presence, combined with a lack of high-profile police repression, made for an unremarkable demonstration that failed to draw attention to the cause.

The next major campaign in which King would participate incorporated the lessons learned in Albany. In 1963, the city of Birmingham, Alabama, was selected because of its well-earned reputation as the most solidly segregated city in the South and the inauguration promise of the state's newly elected governor, George Wallace, of "Segregation forever." King and other movement planners correctly anticipated that the city's police force could be counted on to draw national media attention by assaulting nonviolent demonstrators.

King served time in jail for refusing to stop the protests, prompting the writing of one of his most famous essays, "Letter from a Birmingham Jail," on April 16, 1963. This pamphlet-sized essay summarized and justified King's nonviolent approach as a Christian duty, declaring civil disobedience a moral responsibility in the face of segregation and other unjust laws. Drawing upon his role as a religious leader, King reminded readers that, like many civil rights activists, Jesus Christ suffered violent reprisals for threatening the entrenched authority.

Some four months later, in August 1963, King delivered his historic "I Have a Dream" speech to more than 250,000 people gathered at the Lincoln Memorial during the landmark March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom. King concluded this stirring keynote address with a call for interracial unity, equal opportunity, and religious tolerance that, for many, would become the hallmark of King's message:

When we allow freedom to ring, when we let it ring from every village and every hamlet, from every state and city, we will be able to speed up that day when all of God's children—black men and white men, Jews and Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants—will be able to join hands and to sing in the words of the old Negro spiritual, "Free at last, free at last; thank God almighty we are free at last."

Backlash against the Birmingham desegregation campaign featured extraordinarily aggressive police suppression using clubs, attack dogs, and high-pressure water cannons. More disturbingly, anti-black terrorists bombed the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church on a Sunday morning in September, killing four black girls. For many, the blast exemplified the impossibility of King's dream to create a "beloved community" free of racism and bigotry. His optimism would be further rattled after "Bloody Sunday"—March 17, 1965—when state troopers mercilessly attacked 600 civil rights marchers with nightsticks and tear gas outside Selma, Alabama. Following these events, insider criticism of King's commitment to nonviolent tactics rose to unprecedented levels.

Growing Radicalism

In addition to his role as a spokesman for the civil rights movement and president of the SCLC, King had won a Nobel Peace Prize in 1964, been monitored by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), and held audiences with three American presidents: Dwight D. Eisenhower, John F. Kennedy, and Lyndon B. Johnson. There had been major gains in federal legislation, including the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which outlawed discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, and the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which outlawed the requirement that would-be voters take literacy tests to qualify to register to vote. Despite these laws, King grew to realize that his magnanimous efforts were insufficient to fundamentally alter America's racial and economic landscape.

Although he was unwavering in his commitment to interracial cooperation and tactical nonviolence, King's goals gradually radicalized, as he campaigned against national poverty and spoke out against the Vietnam War. Resisting the urging of colleagues who cautioned against channeling his time and energy away from the civil rights movement, King denounced American imperialism, materialism, and militarism, while criticizing the U.S. government as "the greatest purveyor of violence in the world today." In his view, the enormous human and financial resources expended in Vietnam undercut programs necessary for domestic social and economic progress.

King's and the SCLC's struggle against economic inequality came to an apex with the 1968 Poor People's Campaign on Washington, which had the lofty goal of drawing upon the poor from all races and ethnicities for a mass movement advocating a federally guaranteed income for all Americans. The Poor People's Campaign failed to achieve its federal antipoverty goals despite the efforts of 50,000 demonstrators camped at "Resurrection City" near the Lincoln Memorial. King would not live to share the disappointment. While in Memphis, Tennessee, to support striking African American sanitation workers, he was assassinated by a gunman's bullet on April 4, 1968.

Throughout his career as a minister, author, activist, and social theorist, Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., was a patriot who held fast to the promise of America's democratic egalitarianism. Faced by increasing repression and steadfast resistance from grassroots white citizen's organizations and America's political establishment, he gradually became disillusioned and radicalized. He would ultimately diagnose America as "much, much sicker than I realized when I began" and eschew reform in favor of "a reconstruction of the entire society, a total revolution of values." Nevertheless, throughout his life, Reverend King was unwavering in his commitment to nonviolent social change and a "beloved community" of interracial cooperation.

David Lucander

See also: African Americans: Civil Rights Movement: Vietnam War Protests.

Further Reading

Albert, Peter J., and Ronald Hoffman, eds. We Shall Overcome: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Black Freedom Struggle. New York: Pantheon, 1990.

Branch, Taylor. At Canaan's Edge: America in the King Years, 1965–1968. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2006.

Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1988.

Branch, Taylor. Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–65. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.

Carson, Clayborne, ed. The Autobiography of Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Warner, 1998.

Garrow, David J. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: William Morrow, 1986.

Washington, James M., ed. I Have a Dream: Writings and Speeches that Changed the World. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1992.

Kitchen, The

The Kitchen Center for Video, Music, Dance, Performance, Film and Literature had its start in a New York City kitchen. Established on July 5, 1971, by a collective of video artists and performers as a venue for collaborative projects using live and recorded elements, it was originally housed in the unused kitchen of the Mercer Arts Center, located in the Broadway Central Hotel in Greenwich Village. Its name, however, had a double meaning, as the center was envisioned as a kind of experimental laboratory where daring artists in a variety of mediums could throw together ingredients and create concoctions to serve before the hip downtown New York public.

By 1974, the organization abandoned its first home, incorporating as Haleakala and moving to 59 Wooster Street in the Soho neighborhood of lower Manhattan. The original name stuck, however, and, over the next ten years, the group steadily added to the artistic components in its unique mix, eventually coming to support theater, dance, music, visual art, and film, in addition to the video performance art with which it started. Along with more strictly theater-based venues such as PS 122 and La MaMa, The Kitchen stood at the forefront of the experimental performance movement in New York during the 1970s.

The Kitchen served as a meeting place for emerging artists in the city, where collaborative endeavors could be both conceived and realized. Writer and actor Eric Bogosian, who curated The Kitchen's nascent dance program from 1977 to 1981, wrote of the space in the mid-to late 1970s: "The boomer generation of artists was flooding into a dying New York. It was a time of tremendous idealism and energy, of ambition and experimentation, of youth and career carnage. The premier space downtown was the Kitchen." Artists who got their start at The Kitchen include, in addition to Bogosian, composer Philip Glass, dancers Bill T. Jones and Arnie Zane, dancer/choreographer Meredith Monk, and musician David Byrne of the Talking Heads.

In 1985, The Kitchen relocated again, this time to an expansive eighteenth-century icehouse at 512 West 19th Street. Its two black-box theaters are among the largest in the United States, and the new venue offers room for video-editing facilities.

In the 2000s, The Kitchen's focus is as much on planned festivals as on spontaneous collaborations. Its annual Bang on a Can series presents a week's worth of minimalist performance, including "computer-generated music, shadow theater, and rap soliloquies," according to New York City's Culture Catalog. The SPEW/New York festival, as described by The Kitchen literature, provides video and music-based performances that deal with "unorthodox feminisms and queer sex practices."

Through such organized showcases, The Kitchen continues to highlight the work of unknown or little-known artists, offering a home to those interested in experimenting with new media technologies as well as those intent on reinvigorating traditional, low-tech methods of performance. Though more of an institution than the original back-room organization founded in 1971, The Kitchen continues to stand at the forefront of avant-garde performance in New York.

David Kornhaber

See also: Performance Art: Theater, Alternative.

Further Reading

Alliance for the Arts. NYC Culture Catalog. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1994.

The Kitchen. <http://www.thekitchen.org>

Knights of the Golden Circle

In the mid-1850s, doctor and editor George W.L. Bickley formed a secret society of Southern sympathizers in the North, called the Knights of the Golden Circle (KGC), whose avowed purpose was “strengthening the South” and its way of life. Specifically, the KGC sought to protect Southern slaveholder society by increasing its territory, wealth, influence, and power through the conquest of the “Golden Circle”: the lands stretching from the Mexican Gulf Coast to Central America, the northern rim of South America, and the rich, plantation islands dotting the Caribbean. Hailed throughout the South and condemned in the North, the KGC ultimately did little to advance Southern interests, let alone build an empire, but it did contribute to the subversive forces and sectional mistrust that ultimately led to disunion and the Civil War.

Southern slaveholders in the 1850s increasingly feared that a growing North would soon reduce a complacent South to permanent minority status in the Union, and then proceed to destroy slavery and the society built upon it. Southern thinkers responded to this perceived threat with grandiose dreams of an expansive Southern slave empire. After conquering new lands, establishing new plantations, and founding new states and territories, they contended, the South either would dominate the U.S. government or would create an independent Southern confederacy. In either case, the imperiled Southern plantation culture would not only be saved, it would prosper. The notion of Manifest Destiny added to this distinctly Southern expansionist impulse; so did the well-established antebellum tradition of filibustering: the practice of individuals and private armies conquering or attempting to conquer tropical foreign lands that seemed ripe for Southern expansion.

In 1854, the Virginia-born Bickley seized on Southern expansionist desires and created the first KGC “castle” (local chapter) in Cincinnati. He appointed himself president and commander-in-chief of the KGC American Legion. By conquering the gold-and silver-producing provinces of Mexico, along with the sugar-, cotton-, and coffee-producing lands of the Caribbean, Central America, and South America, he contended, the Knights would make the plantation South so enormous, so wealthy, and so powerful, that the free North could never threaten slavery.

By 1860, Bickley was promoting the Knights of the Golden Circle and its cause throughout the South. He encouraged young men to join local castles, asked Southerners to donate $1 for each slave they owned, and claimed a membership of 40,000, including 16,000 in the KGC “army.” In July 1860, Bickley confidently announced plans for the Knights to conquer Mexico, saying that they would make it “Americanized and Southernized” in the process. Southern newspapers, slaveholders, and politicians voiced support for Bickley and the Knights, exacerbating Northern fears that the South was rife with secret, subversive cabals of slaveholders intent on destroying the Union. A few thousand self-described Knights arrived in Texas in the fall of 1860 to invade Mexico. Upon Abraham Lincoln’s presidential election, however, they abandoned their plans of invasion and instead worked to ensure that Texas would join the new Southern confederacy.

Most Knights served the Confederacy during the Civil War, and Northern fears of the secret organization haunted the Ohio Valley and the Midwest. In 1863 and 1864, Republicans charged that Northern Democrats were secretly working with the Knights to win the 1864 elections, end the war, and recognize Confederate independence. Though the KGC was never as numerous or influential as Bickley or his detractors claimed, the powerful myth of the Knights exemplified the aggressive Southern desire to protect Southern culture through conquest and expansion.

See also: African Americans.

Further Reading

Dunn, Roy Sylvan. "The KGC in Texas, 1860–1861." Southwestern Historical Quarterly 70 (1967) : 543–73.

Hicks, Jimmie, ed. "Some Letters Concerning the Knights of the Golden Circle in Texas, 1860–1861." Southwestern Historical Quarterly 65 (1961) : 80–86.

May, Robert E. Manifest Destiny's Underworld: Filibustering in Antebellum America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Ku Klux Klan

The Ku Klux Klan (KKK) is the best known of a number of white supremacist organizations that emerged in the aftermath of the American Civil War. While its primary political purpose was to prevent newly enfranchised black Southerners from electing Republicans to office in the Southern states, the secret organization opposed the exercise of all African American rights—also including land ownership, work opportunities, educational advancement, and social equality—through violence and terror. Like many secret societies, the Klan was bound by an elaborate system of special rites and rituals, ceremonial titles, costumes, gestures, signals, symbols, and oaths. Later iterations of the organization incorporated anti-Catholic, anti-Semitic, and anti-immigration agitation as central elements of their agenda.

The Original Klan

The original Klan was established on Christmas Eve 1865 in the law office of Judge Thomas Jones, in the town of Pulaski, Tennessee, near the Alabama border, by six former officers of the Confederate Army. They originally called the organization Kuklid, from the Greek word kuklos, meaning “circle,” which they then shortened to Ku. The words Klux and Klan were added shortly thereafter.

Klan members were embittered by what they viewed as usurpation of white Southerners’ social and political power by the Republican-controlled U.S. Congress, the Freedmen’s Bureau (established by the federal War Department to supervise relief and educational activities for refugees and freedmen), freed slaves, and white carpetbaggers. They vowed to return control of the South to white Southern Democrats.

By the end of the 1860s, the KKK existed in nearly every Southern state. It was most popular in the Piedmont area and counties where the black and white populations were nearly equal—that is, in areas where the struggles for social and political power were most hotly contested. Between 1868 and 1872, the KKK waged a widespread terror campaign in an effort to keep Southern blacks from exercising their rights to vote, own property, hold a job, and get an education.

Klan participation crossed socioeconomic lines. Ordinary white farmers and laborers constituted the bulk of membership, but many Klan leaders came from the ranks of planters, merchants, lawyers, and even ministers. The Klan attacked both white and black politicians and community leaders who supported Reconstruction. They attacked black churches and schools, workers, farmers, and landowners, all in an effort to regulate blacks' status in Southern society.

Klansmen garbed in white robes and hoods, usually on horseback, moved throughout the countryside terrorizing superstitious ex-slaves, many of whom thought the Klansmen were the ghosts of dead Confederate soldiers. Klansmen relied on threats, intimidation, vandalism, brutal beatings, and murder to terrorize the black population. In many cases, local and state authorities were complicit in Klan activities.

To arouse public curiosity, maintain anonymity, and cloak the organization in an aura of mystery and danger, Klansmen adopted their own secret vocabulary and rituals. A secret oath bound members to absolute secrecy. Klansmen were prohibited from disclosing their membership, giving the name of any other member, or soliciting members on their own. Each member was required to appear at Klan meetings dressed in a long robe with a white mask and hood. Meetings typically were held at night in secret locations.

Klan officers—including the “Grand Cyclops” (president), “Grand Maji” (vice-president), “Grand Turk” (marshal), “Grand Exchequer” (treasurer), and two “Lictors” (inner and outer guards of the “den”)—presided over Klan meetings. Both Lictors dressed in full Klan regalia and held enormous spears to ward off potential interlopers. The only business transacted at Klan meetings was the initiation of new members in a special ceremony.

Membership increased rapidly, as local papers began reporting on Klan activities. Young men throughout the South were initiated and organized into local dens, or klaverns, several hundred of which sprang up in Middle and West Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama alone. Initially, they had no general organization nor means of communication, and, in most cases, they acted autonomously. For example, the idea of using Klansmen as patrolers, informal vigilance committees or “patter rollers” as they were sometimes called, spread spontaneously among the new dens, without consultation among the scattered local leaders.

As activity increased, Klan leaders became more organized. In spring 1867, the Grand Cyclops of the Pulaski den sent out a call to all dens to send delegates to a convention in Nashville. The group convened in secret and adopted a master plan of organization. The region in which the Klan operated was called the “The Invisible Empire,” and the empire was divided into “realms,” corresponding with the states.

By 1871, despite Congressional efforts to curb Klan violence, the secret organization had wreaked havoc on the Republican Party in the South. In April of that year, Congress passed a series of enforcement acts specifically aimed at the KKK. Collectively referred to as the Ku Klux Klan Act, the measures enlisted federal election supervisors and federal courts to protect black voters. Conspiracies to deprive citizens of the right to vote, hold office, serve on juries, and enjoy the protection of law could be blocked by military intervention and prosecuted by federal district attorneys.

Although hundreds of Klansmen were indicted under the legislation and many of them went to jail, and although federal armed forces were used to root out the KKK in South Carolina, the law proved difficult to enforce. Thousands of crimes went unpunished, in part because local Democrats resisted enforcement. Parts of the legislation were ruled unconstitutional in 1882.

Klan violence in the South declined significantly beginning in 1872, in part because the organization had achieved its primary goal of wresting political and social control for Democratic Redeemers, a Southern political coalition that opposed the Radical Republican coalition of freedmen, carpetbaggers, and scalawags. By 1877, Reconstruction was over, and the Jim Crow system of segregation and discrimination was already beginning to emerge throughout the South, leading to a further decline in Klan activity.

The Modern Klan

The Ku Klux Klan underwent a widespread resurgence during the 1920s. Unlike the original organization, the Klan of the 1920s was neither exclusively Southern nor primarily a terrorist organization. Despite its rabidly nativist and racist politics, the Klan went mainstream, operating as a powerful—and open—social and political movement.

The Klan of the 1920s built a multifaceted agenda based on the slogan “100 percent Americanism,” by which it meant white, nativist, militant Protestantism. While the original Klan had focused on the immediate issues of Reconstruction and sought to restore white supremacy in the South, the second Klan, while also hostile to African Americans, expanded its agenda to include anti-Catholicism, anti-Semitism, and the supremacy of native-born whites over all other racial and ethnic groups. As opposed to “night riding” and other forms of vigilantism on the part of local klaverns during Reconstruction, Klan leaders of the 1920s worked, at least publicly, to distance the organization from paramilitary activity and declare its reverence for established legal authority. The rebirth of the Klan began on Thanksgiving night 1915, when a former Methodist preacher, history teacher, and fraternal organizer named William Joseph Simmons called a meeting at the summit of Stone Mountain in Georgia. Kneeling before a burning cross and an American flag, Simmons and fifteen followers vowed to resurrect the Invisible Empire of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. The new movement got off to a slow start. By 1920, there were only about 4,000 or 5,000 Klansmen scattered throughout Georgia and Alabama.

During the next several years, Simmons enlisted the aid of two promoters, Edward Clarke and Elizabeth Tyler of the Atlanta-based Southern Publicity Association. Clarke and Tyler, in turn, hired 200 more recruiters and instructed them to exploit any issue or prejudice that would draw people to the organization. This army of recruiters, or Kleagles, who worked on commission, attracted 85,000 new members to the Klan between June 1920 and October 1921. In 1922, Hiram Wesley Evans became the KKK’s Imperial Wizard, replacing Simmons. Evans would remain the leader of the Klan for the next seventeen years.

The Ku Klux Klan has undergone several revivals since its founding in Tennessee in 1865. In addition to its racist ideology, the secret white-supremacist organization continues to be bound by special rites, rituals, ceremonies, and symbols. (FPG/Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The second Klan initially admitted only native-born, white, Protestant males over the age of eighteen. As its popularity grew, however, it attracted support from all sections of the country and encouraged wives and sisters of Klansmen to form auxiliaries. Thousands did. The KKK attracted members in New York, Connecticut, Maine, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Colorado, Oregon, and Washington in addition to the Southern states. There were thousands in Detroit and Chicago alone. Membership in the new Klan consisted primarily of small businessmen, farmers, and professionals who felt threatened by the changes taking place in America. The KKK reached the height of its political power during fall and winter of 1924 to 1925, when Klansmen managed to win a number of political elections.

By 1925, at the peak of its power, the KKK had 6 million members who heeded its call to resist the deleterious influences of Catholics, Jews, lawbreakers, “new” immigrants, and African Americans. Although the size and scope of the modern Klan had expanded greatly, it maintained many of the traditions of the old fraternal order, continuing to stress the importance of ceremony, ritual, and secrecy. The range of formal titles expanded, and all members were expected to use them. Ritual greetings and processions into and out of meetings also were continued. As more women entered the Klan, ritual titles began to be devised for them as well. The Kriterion Konservitor—a means of ranking women hierarchically within the organization—affords an example of typical Klan naming practices. The leader was known as the Excellent Commander, and the ranks comparable to a sergeant-at-arms were called the Klarago and the Klexter.

As its base of support grew, the Klan expanded its white supremacist agenda, portraying itself as the protector of American ideals and institutions. Klansmen were characterized as white-robed guardians of liberty, and the organization itself was said to stand for fair elections, honest leaders, and efficient government. Klansmen also considered themselves protectors of “old-time religion” and promised to unite Protestants in battle against the teaching of evolution and the infiltration of Catholics and Jews into American society. The Klan claimed to stand for law and order, seeking to restore faith in God, the Bible, and basic Christian fundamentals. Klan appeal extended across party lines during the 1920s, as members achieved positions of influence in both the Democratic and Republican parties.

The organizational infrastructure began to unravel in 1925, when state and local authorities uncovered one Klan-related scandal after another, resulting in the arrest and incarceration of key leaders. The KKK managed one final display of power and popularity in August 1925 when 40,000 Klansmen and women marched down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, D.C. A similar parade the following year attracted half as many participants, and, by 1929, KKK membership was down to 85,000 nationwide. In 1944, the Internal Revenue Service demanded $685,000 in back taxes from the Klan, effectively ending the organization’s existence.

Although the Klan underwent another resurgence as a secretive society in the post–World War II era, primarily in response to the growing civil rights movement, it never achieved the power and influence it enjoyed during Reconstruction or the 1920s. In the Deep South, loosely organized Klan sympathizers operating on the fringes of society terrorized and, in some cases, murdered both black and white civil rights workers attempting to organize and empower Southern blacks. Many Southern law enforcement officials and all-white juries remained reluctant to prosecute their fellow white citizens, and many of the racially motivated crimes of the 1950s and 1960s remained unsolved until the late twentieth century.

Although high-profile Klansmen such as David Duke experienced a measure of political success during the rise of the New Right in the latter part of the twentieth century, the Klan itself remained a fringe organization, consisting of approximately 5,000 to 8,000 members nationwide in the early 2000s.

Michael A. Rembis

See also: African Americans: White Supremacists.

Further Reading

Blee, Kathleen M. Women of the Klan: Racism and Gender in the 1920s. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.

MacLean, Nancy. Behind the Mask of Chivalry: The Making of the Second Ku Klux Klan. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Kunstler, William (1919–1995)

One of the leading, and most radical, defense lawyers of the twentieth century, William Kunstler championed the rights of unpopular causes and social outcasts, even if they conflicted with the will of mainstream society. He is best known for his 1969–1970 defense of the Chicago Seven, the New Left defendants charged with conspiracy and inciting riot at the 1968 Democratic National Convention; his involvement with the ultimately tragic negotiations in the 1971 prison riot at the Attica (New York) Correctional Facility; and his defense of Russell Means of the American Indian Movement (AIM) after the clash with federal law enforcement authorities in 1973. Despite such high-profile cases, Kunstler also argued dozens of lesser-known but equally significant and groundbreaking civil rights and free speech cases.

William Moses Kunstler was born in New York City on July 7, 1919. A brief flirtation with juvenile delinquency ended when he reached high school and proved to be an excellent student. Kunstler was admitted to Yale University, and he graduated in 1941. Drafted to serve in the U.S. Army during World War II, he served in the Pacific Theater and eventually attained the rank of major.

After the war, Kunstler returned to New York and earned a law degree from Columbia University in 1948. The future radical lawyer seemed destined for a life of pedestrian, if profitable, law practice in New York. Indeed, this was the life he lived from 1950 to 1956.

It was in 1956 that Kunstler took his first civil rights case. A black journalist had traveled to Cuba without a passport and was subsequently denied reentry to the United States. Kunstler argued successfully that citizenship was a status and privilege that ran deeper than mere possession of a document.

This civil rights case was followed by others, and, by the late 1950s and early 1960s, Kunstler had become a reliable lawyer for the civil rights movement. Traveling across the Deep South and representing civil rights activists, he was responsible for a number of legal victories that were important to the movement. These included the transfer of civil rights cases to the federal court system and the desegregation of Washington, D.C., schools.

By the late 1960s, Kunstler had moved beyond political and social liberalism and become an antiestablishment radical. The case that was to make him a national celebrity was the Chicago Seven trial. The Democratic convention of 1968 had drawn enormous crowds of protestors to the streets and parks of Chicago, casting the city into chaos and its police into a state of heightened alert. Charged with conspiracy and other related offenses, seven (originally eight) left-wing student radicals were put on trial.

In arguing the case, Kunstler went beyond the normal role of defense attorney, putting “the system” itself on trial and identifying so completely with his clients that he was sentenced to four years in jail for contempt of court. Nevertheless, the activists were found innocent of the most serious charges, and an appeals court overturned Kunstler’s contempt citation.

For the next several years, Kunstler became a familiar figure in many of the most high-profile cases. In September 1971, he attempted to negotiate a peaceful solution to the inmate occupation of a state maximum-security prison in Attica, New York—a circumstance, he maintained, that was precipitated by the prison’s inhumane conditions. Tragically, the situation ended with police storming the prison and the deaths of forty-three people, including police, hostages, and prisoners.

Then in 1973, after AIM protestors occupied the town of Wounded Knee, South Dakota, for seventy-two days with U.S. marshals holding siege outside, they requested that Kunstler represent them in their criminal trial. He was successful in his defense of AIM leader Russell Means, but he was unable to secure the freedom of fellow American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, who had been charged with murdering two Federal Bureau of Investigation agents at the Pine Ridge (South Dakota) Indian Reservation in 1975.

After a brief retreat from the public spotlight, Kunstler returned to controversy in the 1980s and 1990s, representing such divisive figures as New York City's "subway vigilante" Bernard Goetz; the accused assassin of Jewish Defense League founder Meir Kahane, Egyptian Muslim El Sayyid Nossair; the alleged New York crime boss John Gotti; and those responsible for the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

Critics charged that whereas Kunstler's earlier cases had been pursued on principle, his later ones tended to embrace pointless social pariahs and controversy for its own sake. Kunstler responded that it was his duty as a defense lawyer to take on tough cases and unpopular causes. Either way, his successful 1990 argument that flag burning was a protected act of free speech returned the venerable radical to his roots.

It was his last appearance before the U.S. Supreme Court. William Kunstler died of heart failure on September 4, 1995, in New York City.

Charles Allan

See also: American Indian Movement; Chicago Seven; Civil Rights Movement.

Further Reading

Kunstler, William Moses, and Sheila Isenberg. My Life as a Radical Lawyer. Secaucus, NJ: Carol, 1994.

Schultz, John. The Chicago Conspiracy Trial. New York: Da Capo, 1993.

Latino and Latina Culture

Latino and Latina culture are ambiguous but commonly used umbrella terms that refer to the shared speech habits (language), folklore, arts, ways of living, and identity of immigrant or native people living in the United States whose ethnicity or ethnic ancestry is from Mexico, Cuba, Central and South America, or the commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The cultural productions of these various Latino/a populations have long had an impact in the southeast, south, and west of the territory that is now the United States. These geographic areas and the communities established within them have Spanish profiles dating back to the sixteenth century.

As a result of the Latino/a cultural renaissance that occurred during the cultural unrest and political consciousness raising of the latter half of the twentieth century and the concurrent prevalence of pop culture and visual media since the 1960s, focus has been placed on categorizing the identity of the peoples who make up these populations. From the civil rights activists Rodolfo "Corky" Gonzales and César Chávez, who were essential to the naming of the Chicano Movement, to mainstream pop-culture icons of the latter part of the last century, such as singers Christina Aguilera and Gloria Estefan, Latino/a cultural contributions have been diverse and continue to have a significant impact on Anglo American society.

Origins

The Latino/a counterculture movement of the late twentieth century had its roots in the nationalist Chicano Movement of Mexican Americans that manifested itself in various forms throughout the twentieth century. The term Chicano is a shortened version of the pronunciation of “Mexican” in the native Nahuatl (Aztec) language: Me-shee-cano. The conquest and incorporation of the northern territories of Mexico by the United States in the mid-nineteenth century included the appropriation of the area’s inhabitants. These indigenous peoples were distinguished by race, language, and culture, and therefore never were allowed to assimilate fully as equal citizens of the state.

As a result of the revolution of 1910 to 1920, drastic changes in Mexico and the border regions intensified relations with the United States. During that decade, more than a million Mexicans entered the United States legally or illegally, ultimately residing in Mexican American enclaves along the border regions.

One of the first countercultural developments was the establishment of Spanish-language newspapers and print news networks. The principal Mexican émigré journalist was Silvestre Terrazas, whose leftist politics and dislike of the new Mexican regime displaced him to El Paso, where he founded one of the first Spanish-language newspapers, El Correo. The network of Spanish-language newspapers that spread throughout the region became the primary source of information for Mexican communities about developments on both sides of the border. Terrazas and other Mexican American journalists remained in the United States after 1920, contributing actively to the reinforcement of Mexican culture in the Southwest.

Adding to the countercultural fervor of the time were two controversial revolutionary Mexican leaders, Emiliano Zapata and Pancho Villa. Both became heroes of the Mexican Revolution. Despite the objections of some Mexican Americans and Anglos, both men, Zapata in particular, remain central figures in Latino countercultural myth: fighters for the poor and founders of a new Mexican state.

In 1910, Zapata became part of a democratic political movement in Mexico whose main purpose was the restitution of lands to the peasantry and the establishment of a decentralized federation of autonomous communities. Peasant lands had been appropriated by violent capitalist modernization for the haciendas of great companies supported by the dictator Porfirio Díaz. By leading armed riots and guerrilla attacks in the south, Zapata was able to free the territory of Morelos from rich landowners and government soldiers.

Like Zapata, Pancho Villa was a protagonist of this peasant insurrection. Accompanied by his band of armed cowboys, Villa became the revolutionary general who led the war in the northern part of Mexico. In November 1914, his peasant troops and Zapata entered Mexico City victorious over the government armies. A bandit, Villa was wanted by the government for his murderous bank robberies years before, and his Robin Hood-like escapades became legendary along the Mexican American borderlands, with the aid of Hollywood cinematography.

Throughout the 1920s and 1930s, agitation was growing among Mexican Americans who labored in agriculture, mining, and industry. The devastating effects of the Great Depression on agriculture in the 1930s caused discontent among Latino migrants, leading to the formation of indigenous, radical labor organizations: the Confederacion de Uniones Obreras Mexicanas and the Confederacion de Uniones de Campesinos y Obreros Mexicanos based in El Monte, California. The intensified radical activities by these groups against farm operators and chambers of commerce sparked a wave of Chicano incarcerations and arrests as the dominant Anglo-controlled companies resisted labor unionization. Prejudice and discrimination heightened when repatriation programs were put into place.

It was during these tense times that a countercultural religious philosophy known as sinarquismo (synarchism) began proliferating throughout Mexican American borderland communities. Imported from Mexico, sinarquismo emphasized strong Mexican nationalism, corporate statism, and a return to traditional religious (Roman Catholic) life, as opposed to the anticlerical reforms of the Mexican government. Its ideals—including the goal of securing the return of “Mexican” lands in the Southwest from the United States, and withholding support for the war effort after 1941—resonated with Mexican Americans, even if the movement proved short-lived.

With the onset of World War II, the repatriation programs of the 1930s were replaced by the Bracero Program, implemented by the U.S. and Mexican governments as a way of combating labor shortages in Southwestern agriculture and industry. The program infused U.S. agribusiness with much-needed Mexican labor and guaranteed medical care, transportation, and a minimum of education for the workers. There were few protections against the exploitation of workers by farm owners, however, and discrimination was rampant; wages were suppressed either by local government policy or by growers; housing and food were substandard; and working conditions in the fields were deplorable. Thus, the war years were a time of great Chicano-Anglo tension and polarization.

From these conditions of socioeconomic inequality and segregation developed the youth-centered countercultural Chicano groups known as pachucos. Pachucos were between the ages of thirteen and nineteen, dressed in nonconformist clothing, and participated in various forms of illegal behavior. Organized as palomillas, or small barrio gangs, pachucos strove for identification outside mainstream Anglo culture. Historical antecedents of 1960s Chicano resistance groups such as the Brown Berets, they reflected the injustice and resistance of a society that had failed to assimilate them. During the war period, the pachuco phenomenon was responsible for many acts of violence, especially in Los Angeles County.

Chicano music, art, and theater played an important role in solidifying and maintaining Latino identity. As America entered the postwar period, tent-theater groups such as El Teatro Campesino, known as carpas in Spanish, emerged in the Southwest and California. During the late 1950s, a time of social conflict and change, El Teatro Campesino produced roadside performances for Mexican American migrant farmworkers. The company's primary purpose was to disrupt status-quo power structures and labor exploitation. This also would be the main purpose of the full-fledged Chicano Movement that would begin in the following decade.

The 1960s and Beyond

Latino/a culture came to the forefront of the more general counterculture movement of the 1960s, the battles fought by minorities who sought to demand their civil rights, be recognized as legitimate actors in the mainstream culture, and alleviate the economic depression of their communities. The civil rights movement galvanized Latinos and Latinas into a political and cultural force. As the primary institutions of assimilation, schools and universities became the main theater for civil rights battles. Young Latino/a students and activists of Mexican descent in California, Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona fought for their history and culture to be included in public school curricula. In New York, the Young Lords, a Puerto Rican activist organization dedicated to the liberation and independence of Puerto Rico, made similar demands. These civic battles were fought under the sweep of labor and political campaigns led by such Latino organizations as the United Farm Workers under César Chávez and Dolores Huerta, the Young Lords in Chicago and New York, and La Raza Unida of Texas, a third political party established along Mexican ethnic lines in 1970.

The social, political, and cultural movements of the 1960s and 1970s coincided with a massive increase in the immigrant Latino population—an expansion that continues into the twenty-first century. Reasons for the phenomenon vary from revolution and political unrest in home countries to economic deprivation.

After World War II, from 1946 to 1956, Puerto Ricans immigrated to the United States, mostly settling in New York City and Chicago, at a rate of more than 40,000 per year. The Cuban Revolution of 1959 and the subsequent U.S. trade embargo triggered a flow of political refugees that numbered well over 500,000 Cuban exiles. Their expanding communities in Miami and Tampa over the course of two to three generations, combined with the Mariel Boatlift of 1979, which added another 100,000 exiles, dramatically altered the demographic, political, and cultural landscape of South Florida.

Changes in immigration law favoring family unification further opened U.S. borders to immigrants from Mexico and Central and South America. But no government policy would have the impact that trade pacts—such as the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) and the Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA)—would have on the Latin American diaspora. Grinding poverty, limited employment opportunities, and uneven economic development in Latin America during the latter half of the twentieth century continued to move people north.

With the expansion of global capitalism and massive population growth, the integration of Latino/a culture within the mainstream popular culture of Anglo American society became clearly evident in music, movies, literature, and the visual arts during the 1980s. Salsa, Latin jazz, and Tex-Mex achieved popularity and notoriety as crossover genres in popular music. This led to the Latin boom of the late 1990s, which was spearheaded by projects such as Ry Cooder's Buena Vista Social Club and Gloria Estefan's solo album Mi Tierra. Moreover, the 2000 Grammy Award-winning album Supernatural by Chicano Carlos Santana, who had been popular in the United States since the 1960s, solidified the place of Latin music in American pop culture. During the same decade, Univision became the dominant Spanish-language television network in the United States, with more than 600 affiliates.

Regardless of the massive commodification of Latino culture in the 1990s and early 2000s, however, only marginal gains were made in the position of Latinos/as in the society at large. Media stereotypes—such as the Frito Bandito, Chiquita Banana, and Taco Bell's heavily accented Chihuahua—reflected the persistence of inequities in social and economic opportunity.

In response, the Latino counterculture movement adopted new voices. Prominent among these would be the late Gloria Anzaldúa, a lesbian feminist writer and one of the first to address the realities of being a Chicana in mainstream Anglo-American culture. Her magnum work, Borderlands/La Frontera (1987), was the first to flip the linguistic paradigm on English-only speakers, forcing them to assume the status of other.

More contemporary but equally prominent is historian Michelle Habell-Pallán, whose Loca Motion (2005) chronicles Latino/a counterculture during the 1980s and 1990s in the feminist writings of poet Marisela Norte. Other significant statements include the work of playwright and performance artist Luis Alfaro, the comedy of Marca Gomez, the films of Jimmy Mendiolas, and the critique of sexism and homophobia in the performances of El Vez.

Juan Carlos Gonzalez

See also: Brown Berets: Chá vez, César: Chicano Movement: Chicano Theater: Gonzales, Rodolfo "Corky": Theater, Alternative: United Farm Workers.

Further Reading

Anzaldúa, Gloria. Borderlands/La Frontera. 2nd ed. San Francisco: Aunt Lute, 1999.

Darder, Antonia, and Rodolfo D. Torres, eds. The Latino Studies Reader: Culture, Economy, and Society. Malden, MA: Blackwell, 1998.

Flores, William V., and Rina Benmayor, eds. Latino Cultural Citizenship: Claiming Identity, Space, and Rights. Boston: Beacon, 1997.

Garcia, John A. Latino Politics in America: Community, Culture, and Interests. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.

Gracia, Jorge J.E., and Pablo de Greiff, eds. Hispanics/Latinos in the United States: Ethnicity, Race, and Rights. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Habell-Pallán, Michelle. Loca Motion: The Travels of Chicana and Latina Popular Culture. New York: New York University Press, 2005.

Habell-Pallán, Michelle, and Mary Romero, eds. Latino/a Popular Culture. New York: New York University Press, 2002.

Leonard, David J., and Carmen R. Lugo-Lugo. Latino History and Culture: An Encyclopedia. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, 2010.

Machado, Manuel, Jr. Listen Chicano! An Informal History of the Mexican-American. Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1978.

Ruiz, Vicki L., and Virginia Sánchez Korrol, eds. Latina Legacies: Identity, Biography, and Community. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.

Le Sueur, Meridel (1900–1996)

Meridel Le Sueur wrote realistic fiction about women, Native Americans, workers, and other oppressed groups during the 1930s. Well known as a leftist author of short stories and poetry, she endured blacklisting during the next two decades. It was not until the 1960s, when the feminist movement gained momentum, that Le Sueur's writings received new attention, and her lyrical depictions of the lives of women of all backgrounds were embraced by mainstream audiences.

Meridel Le Sueur was born on February 22, 1900, in Murray, Iowa. Her mother, Marian Lucy Wharton, was a suffragist who left her husband in 1910 and took Meridel and her brothers to Oklahoma. During her childhood, Meridel spent time with Native American children and became familiar with their history and culture. To support the family, her mother spoke about birth control and woman's rights on the Chautauqua circuit, a traveling program that brought entertainment and educational speakers to rural communities.

In 1914, Meridel's mother took a job as the chair of the English Department of the People's College in Fort Scott, Kansas, and soon after married Alfred Le Sueur, president of the college and chair of the Law Department. Originally from Minnesota, Alfred Le Sueur was a socialist who had helped found the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) labor union. Meridel was very close to her stepfather and took his last name.

The People's College was founded as a socialist correspondence school, intended to educate workers who had few other educational options. The school was destroyed by vigilantes in 1915, leading the Le Sueurs to relocate to St. Paul, Minnesota. Their home was often visited by prominent leftists, including Eugene V. Debs, five-time Socialist Party candidate for president; Emma Goldman, a leading feminist and anarchist later deported by the federal government; and Alexander Berkman, Goldman's partner and a leading anarchist and advocate of political violence.

Meridel Le Sueur studied at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York in 1917, living in a commune that included Goldman and Berkman. After performing in small parts on Broadway, she moved to Hollywood in the early 1920s, where she worked as a stuntwoman and actress. While in California, she met and married labor organizer Harry Rice in 1926.

Le Sueur was politically active from the time she could march with her mother in protests. In 1927, she was jailed for protesting the execution of anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, whom she believed had been unfairly convicted of murdering two payroll clerks in 1920. After the birth of her second daughter in 1930, Le Sueur divorced Rice. She later met Robert Brown, who became her companion until his death in 1954.

During the Great Depression, Le Sueur worked in manual jobs to support her daughters, while writing at night. By the early 1930s, her short stories and essays began appearing in leftist magazines such as American Mercury and New Masses. Many were based upon her own experiences, such as her description of a Minneapolis Teamsters strike in 1934.

By 1924, she had joined the American Communist Party. Alexander Trachtenberg, the party's unofficial commissar for culture, helped direct Le Sueur's choice of subject matter in her writing. Although party leaders encouraged her to be less "defeatist" and to promote party membership, Le Sueur countered by claiming that oppression of women was part of a capitalist society. Many of her stories about women deal with the theme of survival. One of her most important works during this period was her first novel, The Girl (1939), in which an innocent young woman from rural Minnesota survives the Great Depression thanks to the aid of other poor women, leaving readers with the belief that the female characters will prevail.

During the 1930s, Le Sueur joined the Federal Writers' Project, a New Deal program to put writers to work. She taught creative writing classes and wrote a history of Minnesota, North Star Country (1945). Criticized at the time for its negative perspectives on capitalism and the treatment of Native Americans, this book has since been viewed as a microcosm of the history of the United States.

In 1947, Le Sueur came under investigation by the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC). Finally blacklisted for her membership in the Communist Party, she was unable to get most of her writings published and lost a number of jobs because of Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) surveillance, but she refused to stop attending Communist Party meetings. During this time, she lived with various Native American tribes, including the Oglala Sioux in South Dakota and the Hopi in New Mexico.

In the 1960s, Le Sueur was active in protesting the Vietnam War. By the 1970s, leaders of the feminist movement began to publicize her writings, including short stories from the 1920s and 1930s. Many of these were collected and republished, including Harvest: Collected Stories (1977), which brought together eight stories published between 1929 and 1946, and Song for My Time: Stories of the Period of Repression (1977), a collection of seven stories published while Le Sueur was under fire for being a communist, from 1947 to 1958. All were based upon Le Sueur's life and dealt with the problems women faced from society's mores, men, and a capitalist system. Works that Le Sueur had not been able to publish previously also were issued, including a poetry collection titled Rites of Ancient Ripening (1975). These poems centered on the cycle of life and women's central role in ensuring the future of humankind.

Le Sueur's championship of women's rights through her writings received recognition from feminists around the world, including invitations to speak at international conferences. She was awarded the American Book Award in 1991 for Harvest Song (1990), a collection of essays and stories. Meridel Le Sueur died on November 14, 1996, in Hudson, Wisconsin.

Tim J. Watts

See also: Berkman, Alexander: Chautauqua Movement: Communism: Federal Writers' Project: Goldman, Emma: Industrial Workers of the World: Native Americans: Socialism: Suffragists.

Further Reading

Coiner, Constance. Better Red: The Writing and Resistance of Tillie Olson and Meridel Le Sueur. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Ellis, Jacqueline. Silent Witnesses: Representations of Working-Class Women in the United States. Bowling Green, OH: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1998.

Roberts, Nora Ruth. Three Radical Women Writers: Class and Gender in Meridel Le Sueur, Tillie Olsen, and Josephine Herbst. New York: Garland, 1996.

Leary, Timothy (1920–1996)

A vocal advocate of the use of psychedelic drugs, especially lysergic acid diethylamide (LSD), Timothy Leary became an iconic figure in the hippie counterculture of the 1960s. Leary's drug-promoting slogan, "Turn on, tune in, drop out," made him a world-famous flashpoint of controversy and served as a clarion call to a generation coming of age at a time of widespread experimentation with chemically altered states of consciousness. Leary's lawsuit against the U.S. government persuaded the Supreme Court that the principal federal restriction on marijuana use—the Marijuana Tax Act of 1937—required users to incriminate themselves in violation of the Fifth Amendment and was therefore unconstitutional (Leary v. United States, 1969). Although possession, cultivation, and trafficking of marijuana remained illegal under other statutes, President Richard M. Nixon regarded Leary as a pernicious influence on America's youth and a significant threat to law and order, labeling him "the most dangerous man in America."

Timothy Francis Leary was born in Springfield, Massachusetts, on October 22, 1920. After service in the U.S. Army Medical Corps during World War II and an undergraduate academic career fraught with chronic discipline problems at such varied institutions as the College of the Holy Cross, West Point, and the University of Alabama, Leary received a master's degree in psychology at Washington State University (1946) and a doctorate from the University of California, Berkeley (1950).

After teaching at Berkeley from 1950 to 1955, he became the director of psychiatric research at the Kaiser Family Foundation in Menlo Park, California, from 1955 to 1958. From 1959 to 1963, he was a lecturer in psychology at Harvard University, in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

LSD Research and Advocacy

It was during his tenure at Harvard that Leary became interested in the effects on human consciousness of the still-legal psychoactive drug LSD (or acid) and other hallucinogens. Working with fellow academics Ralph Metzner and Richard Alpert (later known as the spiritual guru Ram Dass), Leary conducted studies in which psilocybin (a synthetic version of so-called magic mushrooms) and LSD were administered to 300 subjects, including students, faculty, prison inmates, clergy, and others. Harvard fired Leary and his colleagues in 1963 because of ethical concerns over these controversial experiments.

Undeterred by academic opprobrium, Leary and his associates founded the Castilla Center in Millbrook, New York, where they continued their research with LSD and other psychotropic substances, such as mescaline and psilocybin. Such drugs, they believed, possessed real psychological therapeutic properties, with applications ranging from the treatment of alcoholism to the reform of convicted criminals, as well as the potential to unlock previously unknown properties of the human mind.

"We saw ourselves as anthropologists from the twenty-first century inhabiting a time module set somewhere in the dark ages of the 1960s," Leary wrote of this period. "On this space colony we were attempting to create a new paganism and a new dedication to life as art."

The testimonials of many of Leary's test subjects seemed to confirm his instincts about the benefits of drug use, reporting that the substances in question had catalyzed life-changing spiritual experiences. Leary himself partook liberally, perhaps in part to medicate himself after the suicide of his first wife, Marianne, whose death in 1955 had left him a single father.

Through the remainder of the 1960s and beyond, Leary insisted that LSD could be a vehicle for the liberation of the human mind, channeling it toward higher levels of consciousness. The hippie counterculture of the times provided Leary with a receptive audience, supported by such other influential cultural figures as writers William S. Burroughs and Aldous Huxley, Beat poet Allen Ginsberg, and a number of popular rock and roll bands. When Leary adopted Hinduism in 1965, his teachings took on a patina of spiritual mysticism, increasing his appeal to a counterculture youth movement in search of meaning and truth.

Extolling the benefits of psychedelic drugs, Timothy Leary famously called on America's youth to "Turn on, tune in, drop out." President Richard M. Nixon called him "the most dangerous man in America." (Michael Ochs Archives/Stringer/Getty Images)

In 1966, Leary established the League for Spiritual Discovery—an ersatz church that regarded LSD as one of its holiest sacraments—with the goal of legalizing the drug based on the First Amendment protections of religious rights. (LSD was made illegal in the United States in 1967.) Leary toured college campuses throughout 1966 and 1967, extolling the benefits of LSD and taking part in high-profile anti-Vietnam War demonstrations.

Crackdown and Demise

Predictably, Leary's activities drew law-enforcement scrutiny throughout the latter part of the 1960s, particularly during the Nixon administration. Sentenced to ten years in prison on a marijuana conviction in 1970, Leary escaped from prison and was sneaked out of the country by the radical Weather Underground.

Recaptured while aboard an American airplane departing from Afghanistan in 1973, Leary was held on a record $5 million bail and placed in solitary confinement at California's Folsom Prison. In exchange for information about the Weathermen and other 1960s radicals, the remainder of Leary's prison term—now ninety-five years behind bars—was reduced, and he was released in 1976 by California Governor Jerry Brown.

For the last two decades of his life, Leary remained in close touch with the countercultural zeitgeist, writing prolifically and serving as a critic of American society. He reemerged on the lecture circuit in the late 1970s and early 1980s as a self-described “stand-up philosopher” with ambitions of mainstream Hollywood celebrity. Those hopes never quite materialized, though he did achieve notoriety in the early 1980s by touring with convicted Watergate burglar and media personality G. Gordon Liddy.

In the early 1990s, Leary embraced the emerging Information Age, praising the nascent technology of virtual reality and the Internet as “the LSD of the 1990s.” Even his lingering death from prostate cancer on May 31, 1996, occurred in the context of a counterculture, an electronic one. It was recounted in detail on the Internet in a kind of proto-blog.

Leary’s enduring contributions to American counterculture include not only numerous tracts and treatises about drugs, but also autobiographical works detailing his pharmacological and legal adventures. Among these are The Psychedelic Experience (1964, coauthored with Ralph Metzner and others), Jail Notes (1970), Flashbacks (1983), and Psychedelic Prayers (published posthumously in 1997). The effects of the psychedelic experience he advocated are immeasurable.

Michael A. Martin

See also: Beat Generation: Drug Culture: Hippies: LSD: Marijuana.

Further Reading

Greenfield, Robert. Timothy Leary: A Biography. New York: Harcourt, 2006.

Higgs, John. I Have America Surrounded: The Life of Timothy Leary. Fort Lee, NJ: Barricade, 2006.

Lee, Ann (1736–1784)

Ann Lee, known to followers as “Mother Ann,” was an early member of the radical religious sect called the United Society of Believers in Christ’s Second Appearing—also known as the Shakers—and she brought it from England to America in the 1770s. Heralded as a female messiah and prophet, she helped spread this faith in the fledgling nation until her death at age forty-eight.

Born on February 29, 1736, Lee lived the majority of her life in Manchester, England. An illiterate mill worker and cook, she joined the “Shaking Quakers,” a religious society led by Jane and James Wardley, in 1758. Like the Quakers, the Shakers were pacifists who cherished the divine revelatory powers of the “inner light”; unlike the Quakers, the Shakers foresaw an imminent apocalypse in which Christ’s female counterpart would fulfill the millennial prophecy.

Lee married Abraham Standerin in 1762 and delivered four children over the next seven years, all of whom died in infancy. While mourning these losses, Lee began publicly denouncing Manchester’s formal religions. She often disrupted Sunday church services and served numerous jail terms as a result. While in prison in 1770, Lee had a vision of the Garden of Eden and realized that Adam and Eve’s carnal lust was humanity’s greatest sin. Purity and perfection as envisioned by God, Lee concluded, could only come through celibacy. The vision augmented Lee’s spiritual status, and fellow Shakers began calling her “Mother Ann.”

With her husband and seven others, Lee departed for America in 1774. The small group lived and worked in New York City for nearly two years, during which time, Standerin left her because she would not compromise her commitment to celibacy. Undaunted, Lee established a settlement in Niskayuna, New York, just outside Albany, in 1776.

Mistaking her pacifism for British Loyalism, many locals initially were suspicious. A 1779 revival held in nearby New Lebanon, however, created an environment of religious enthusiasm. Joseph Meacham, a Free Will Baptist minister and leader of the New Lebanon revival, found Lee to be spiritually compelling, and he joined the Shakers in 1780. Many others in the region followed his lead.

From 1781 to 1783, Lee, her brother William, and James Whittaker evangelized throughout New England. They found receptive audiences among the liberal Protestants, who embraced Lee's millennial message and revivalistic worship style. On other occasions, the trio met with brutal mob violence, due in part to Lee's advocacy of celibacy, gender equality, abolition, and communal ownership.

On September 8, 1784, one year after returning to Niskayuna, Lee died. Meacham and Lucy Wright subsequently founded the New Lebanon Shaker Village southeast of Albany, which became the "mother colony" and seat of an increasingly institutionalized movement. Over the course of the next decade, new Shaker communities were established at several locations in New England, followed by still more in Kentucky and Ohio. Those who continued "Mother Ann's Work" during this peak period claimed that Lee was the female incarnation of Christ.

Interest in the Shakers began to fade by the 1850s, however, hastened by the lack of new members due to the practice of celibacy. Nevertheless, the religious society continued through the twentieth century. As of 2008, a few remaining Shakers still lived and worshipped in a community in Gloucester, Maine.

Arthur J. Remillard

See also: Communes; Shakers.

Further Reading

Andrews, Edward Deming. The People Called Shakers: A Search for the Perfect Society. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953.

Stein, Stephen J. The Shaker Experience in America: A History of the United Society of Believers. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.

Lennon, John (1940–1980)

A founding member, singer, guitarist, and (with Paul McCartney) lead songwriter of the Beatles, John Lennon was the most outspoken and creatively daring of the four musicians in what was perhaps the most popular and influential of all rock and roll bands. Lennon's music often magnified his own personal issues (as in the song "Help!") or commented on and helped define the social climate of the times (as in "Revolution"). He became known as a peace activist, author, and musician in his own right, recording such original hit songs as "Imagine" and "Give Peace a Chance" as a solo performer.

Born on October 9, 1940, in Liverpool, England, John Winston Lennon moved in with his aunt after his parents separated. His mother, who visited often, taught him to play the banjo and guitar, and introduced him to American rock and roll in the 1950s.

Enthralled by the music of Elvis Presley, Chuck Berry, Little Richard, and their contemporaries, Lennon started his first band, the Quarrymen, with another teenage guitarist living in Liverpool, Paul McCartney. Bringing in guitarist George Harrison shortly thereafter, they changed the name of the band to the Beatles and added George Best (followed later by Ringo Starr) as drummer.

After several years of playing in clubs in England and Germany, the Beatles emerged as international superstars in 1963. By the time they disbanded in 1970, the group had had a profound and enduring influence on contemporary music, the counterculture, and mainstream society.

Nearly from the outset, Lennon had worked on side projects of his own. In 1964, he published a book of quirky, nonsensical poems called In His Own Write, followed in 1965 by the self-illustrated A Spaniard in the Works. He was the first Beatle to marry, and he and his wife, Cynthia, had a son, Julian, in 1965.

Lennon did not shy away from controversy. In 1966, while on tour in America, he caused an uproar by observing that the Beatles were more popular than Jesus. Some radio stations refused to play the group's songs, and Beatles records were burned in public. Also in 1966, Lennon had a role in an anti-Vietnam War film called How I Won the War and met the Japanese-born artist and musician Yoko Ono. In 1968, Lennon's wife Cynthia filed for divorce, as Lennon was spending more and more time with Ono.

In November 1968, Lennon and Ono released the album Unfinished Music No. 1: Two Virgins, featuring John and Yoko fully naked on the front and back covers. Thousands of copies of the album were confiscated in New Jersey on the grounds that the photos were pornographic.

Lennon and Ono were married in March 1969. Shortly afterward, they staged two seven-day "bed-in" protests for peace, the first (March) in Amsterdam, the Netherlands, and the second (May–June) in Montreal, Canada. During the Montreal bed-in, Lennon wrote the song "Give Peace a Chance," which would become an anthem of the antiwar movement and international counterculture of the late 1960s. In November of that year, Lennon returned his membership in the Order of the British Empire, an honor that had been bestowed on him by the queen in 1965, partially as a protest against British support for American involvement in Vietnam.

In 1971, Lennon and Ono moved to New York City. With strong opinions on a variety of social issues and world events, including the Vietnam War, Lennon developed contacts with radical left-wing groups and was vocal about the causes he promoted. In December 1971, for example, he performed at a Michigan rally for writer John Sinclair, who had languished in jail for years based on a marijuana conviction. In early 1972, Lennon demonstrated in New York City against Britain's Northern Ireland policy. Also that year, Lennon and Ono spoke out against the arrest and incarceration of black activist Angela Davis, releasing the song "Angela" in protest.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), which had been investigating Lennon's activities and associations, sought to have his visa revoked. Among other things, the FBI was interested in a $75,000 contribution Lennon had made to a group called the Election Year Strategy Information Center (EYSIC), which planned to demonstrate during the Republican National Convention in 1972. Deportation hearings were held in March 1972, stemming from a narcotics conviction in England dating back to 1969. Although the U.S. government was unsuccessful in deporting Lennon, it did take four years for him to obtain his green card, granting permanent residence. Lennon, who loved living in New York City, moved into a landmark apartment building called the Dakota, just off Central Park.

Lennon's songs of the early 1970s were about peace, love, and social power. The most notable include "Power to the People," "Working-Class Hero," "Imagine," and "Woman Is the Nigger of the World." After an eighteen-month split from Ono beginning in late 1973, he came back a changed man. The couple had a son, Sean, later that year, and Lennon settled into domestic life, taking an extended break from recording until 1980.

In mid-November 1980, Lennon released his final album, Double Fantasy. Just a few weeks later, on the morning of December 8, 1980, he was shot and killed by a crazed fan outside the Dakota.

Richard Panchyk

See also: Beatles, The.

Further Reading

Beatles, The. The Beatles Anthology. New York: Chronicle, 2000.

Coleman, Ray. Lennon: The Definitive Biography. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.

Giuliano, Geoffrey, and Brenda Giuliano. The Lost Lennon Interviews. Holbrook, MA: Adams Media, 1996.

Wiener, Jon. Come Together: John Lennon in His Time. New York: Random House, 1984.

Lesbian Culture

In the midst of the apparent blossoming of cultural and sexual freedom during the 1960s and 1970s, several sexual minorities—lesbians among them—took their place in the attempted overthrow of mainstream social norms. At the height of the counterculture movement, much of lesbian culture was informed by the radicalism of the times, and often had close philosophical affinities to, and cross-membership with, the women’s liberation and gay liberation movements. These movements provided sweeping critiques of sexuality and patriarchy, particularly in the context of the heterosexual nuclear family. Feminists coined the phrase “the personal is political” as a way of calling attention to the power relations inherent in the most intimate relationships.

As with other political and social movements of the time, the appearance of lesbian culture within the broader American counterculture was the product of complex historical developments. The counterculture, with its widespread disruption of social norms, produced unprecedented lesbian visibility, yet represented only a fraction of the diverse range of lesbian lives and culture as they had been experienced over the previous 100 years and more.

Foundations

The first glimmers of what would later become lesbian culture began to garner attention in nineteenth-century America when the phenomena of “romantic friendships” among middle-and upper-class women and of working-class women “passing” as men both gained increasing notice. In romantic friendships, women formed strong attachments to a female friend and felt free to express their deep devotion to this beloved companion, often in terms that were intense and passionate, and sometimes overtly sensual. There is a substantial body of evidence in the form of letters, journalism, and literature to demonstrate that “Boston marriages,” as these relationships were called, were relatively common, were widely considered acceptable, and were of great emotional significance to the women involved in them. This apparent tolerance may have resulted from the commonly held Victorian views about women’s lack of autonomous sexual desire. The historical record is ambiguous on this point. Many of the women in question shared both homes and beds with their companions, yet the evidence does not clearly indicate whether these relationships typically involved genital sex.

The situation was different for working-class women, however, who generally did not enter into romantic friendships. These women were more likely to be involved in relationships that appeared to be heterosexual, in which one woman passed as a man. It was these passing women, rather than women in romantic friendships, who attracted the interest of sexologists, who by the late nineteenth century were beginning to investigate what they referred to as “sexual inversion,” or homosexuality. Within this framework, same-sex desire, for both women and men was considered an expression of a man being trapped in a woman’s body (or vice versa for male homosexuals), and thus was constituted as an “abnormality” or “deviation” from normal sexual development.

Because of this heightened medical interest, both scientific and literary musings about the invert’s “essential inner nature” multiplied. As the twentieth century commenced, the figure of the lesbian began to enter into American popular culture for the first time as a way for women with same-sex attractions to make sense of who they were and to identify others like themselves. Meeting places for lesbians became known in large cities like New York; in Harlem, performers such as the cross-dressing lesbian Gladys Bentley performed publicly, a magnet for lesbian and gay male audiences.

The increased visibility and growing emphasis on sexuality proved to be a mixed blessing; it invited increased medical scrutiny and stigmatized lesbians as sexual deviants in a way that romantic friends of the nineteenth century had never experienced. More positively, the conceptualization of lesbian identity provided a point of reference for women who felt same-sex desire and provided a foundation on which lesbian culture could begin to emerge.

Not surprisingly, representations of lesbians in the first half of the century, including those produced by lesbians themselves, did not escape the negative connotations of “deviance.” The first popular lesbian novel, Radclyffe Hall’s The Well of Loneliness (1928), which proved to be highly influential in both Britain and the United States, contains a story as tragic as its title suggests and reproduces the negative stereotypes of lesbians as lonely, mannish, and maladjusted that were common at the time. Even the lesbian pulp novels of the 1940s to 1960s, while graphic enough to be titillating for lesbian and straight male audiences alike, contain cautionary tales about the tragic consequences of indulging in “forbidden love.”

There were occasional refuges from this kind of negativity. In the 1920s, participants in the artistic explosion of African American culture known as the Harlem Renaissance exhibited considerable tolerance for homosexuality and bisexuality, as did white bohemians living in places such as New York’s Greenwich Village. Nonetheless, women who identified as inverts or lesbians generally lived their lives “in the closet” in order to avoid damage to their reputations, livelihoods, and relationships with family and friends.

Impact of World War II

During World War II, however, the closet door slowly began to swing open. Massive numbers of troops were needed for the war effort, and lesbians and gay men responded to the call in large numbers alongside their heterosexual compatriots. They formed part of a broad social upheaval in which thousands of Americans were uprooted from close-knit communities and became part of the war effort in urban and military centers far removed from their hometowns. The armed services and related industries afforded young people a degree of independence that was generally impossible within their home communities, and their gender-segregated nature provided ample opportunity for same-sex liaisons.

